We might finally see some roundabout justice in the Duke LaCrosse case, the national disgrace that showed exactly why boys are falling behind in school. Crystal Gail Mangum might have gotten away with her false accusation at Duke, but this time she's been arrested for attempted murder, a charge that's taken far more seriously.

Mangum allegedly tried to stab her boyfriend, set his clothes on fire and fought police responders. It's beyond me why any man would want to be involved with Mangum, but despite the man's lack of judgment and good taste, he doesn't deserve to be stabbed and have his property destroyed. Additionally, the three children who were at home when police arrived should never be exposed to such a scene.

If Mangum had been held accountable for the crime of filing a false report of rape against the Duke Lacrosse players, she might have learned her lesson a few years ago. However, it seems that she believes she has a certain immunity when it comes to victimizing men. Former prosecutor Mike Nifong, for his part, should be in prison today for his part in the original Duke case.

Olympic Sports and Gender Parity

Welmer · 19 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I was reading a rather strident article in my local college newspaper written by some feminist in training about how women are being oppressed by not being allowed to have their own ski-jumping competition. According to Rebecca Kuensting, feminist crusader at the UW Daily, the International Olympic Committee's rationale for not holding a women's ski jumping event is wholly unjustified:

> The International Olympic Committee (IOC) contends that the reason why ski jumping remains the only Olympic sport from which women are excluded is not a matter of sexual discrimination. They claim that the women's version of ski jumping lacks the size, universal appeal and history of world championships that is required of Olympic sports. If the fact sheet on their official Web site is any indication, the ladies of the Visa U.S. Women's Ski Jumping Team aren't buying it. The page attacks the IOC's allegations point by point, citing that, "in 2009, more than 160 women from 18 nations were registered with FIS as elite ski jumpers."
> The disturbing truth is that there is no good reason why the IOC has chosen to exclude female ski jumpers from the Vancouver games. Female jumpers use the same jumps that men use, are scored according to very similar technical criteria, and have accumulated the numbers and support necessary for the success of their sport.
> We always think of the Olympics as an event that celebrates equality, that brings people of all nations together. But if you're a fan of ski jumping, you know there's a whole host of willing athletes who aren't allowed on the slopes.

Frankly, I think Kuensting is full of it. There's no way that the number of women ski jumpers is sufficient. She cites 160 women from 18 nations, and that may comprise every single female ski jumper in the entire world from what I've seen. That isn't nearly enough to sustain an Olympic sport. As for interest, who cares at all about women ski jumpers?

Honestly, most people don't care much about male ski jumpers. However, there's a big difference here: men – boys in particular – love to jump. When I was a kid I ski jumped all the time. There's no way I could have ever been an elite ski jumper — I'm too big and heavy. To be competitive you have to be light and thin to catch the air. Guys like me have the trajectory of a cannon ball. But as a kid I didn't care. I'd jump for hours just for the feeling of being free and airborne. I did it on skis, my bike, and even on the basketball court. I fell all the time, and hurt myself a couple times, but it was all worth it. I've never met a woman – ever – who had the same zeal for that experience.

Because men love flying so much, there will always be plenty of guys willing to launch themselves off ramps to sail for hundreds of feet through the air. The sport won't be lacking, because it is an archetypically male pursuit, as exemplified by Icarus, the boy who flew too high.

What this leads me to is a question about the very origin of sports. Sports were created by men because they love the pursuits they represent. Boys naturally run, throw things, kick and jump. They love sticks and balls, and they want to perform feats with all these natural abilities and tools. As far as I know, every single sport in the Olympics, with the possible exception of figure skating and synchronized swimming, was invented by men. Is there any one single sport that women came up with by themselves? If not, why do they deserve exact equality in representation? What the hell is their point?

I suspect that if women created their own sport, the vast majority of men wouldn't want to have anything to do with it. So why is it that these feminist blowhards are so set on parity in everything men have invented? Why don't they create their own sport? Maybe we could have Olympic sock darning competitions, or Olympic Christmas tree decorating. Of course, gay men would probably win these events, but at least the girls could put in a decent effort.

But when it comes to men's sports, what's really the point? Sometimes, I think it's simply to inflate the medal count. In fact, that's probably how it started. Some countries figured they could sneak in a few more medals by training their women in ice hockey or something similarly ridiculous when played by women, and now we're stuck permanently with a bunch of programs for freakish, butch women that nobody wants to watch anyway.

Welmer · 19 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Spearhead reader and blogger Dirk Johanson, a practicing attorney who runs the guyinism blog, wrote a concise and amusing letter to the Dean of the John Marshall Law School, pointing out the "specious legal reasoning" of feminist law professor Colin Miller, who is on John Marshall's faculty.

In the following passage, Johanson flays Miller's legal reasoning:

> The case Miller believes supports his argument is Taylor v. Fairfield Resorts, Inc./Wyndham, 2009 WL 5195973 (D.Nev. 2009). In that case, an aspiring timeshare sales con artist claimed that she was given inferior suckers lists due to her race and gender. In denying the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the court considered an uncertified transcript of a non-party witness deposition submitted by the plaintiff. The court noted that the plaintiff was proceeding pro se, and that the defendant did not challenge the accuracy of the deposition. The court in no way indicated that it would have allowed the plaintiff to simply repeat what another employee had said – the very definition of hearsay.
> Nevertheless, Miller argues that the Taylor decision is somehow supportive of using the residual hearsay exception to admit statements of other employees in gender and race discrimination suits – deposition transcript or no. Miller's reliance on Taylor for such, I am confident you will agree, is ridiculous.

Johanson sent copies of the letter to a number of other male professors on John Marshall's faculty, pointing out the they have a mangina in their midst and should keep Miller's third rate legal skills in mind when tenure comes up.

This is a great use of the resource provided by the feminist law professors blog, which kindly provided us with the list of feminist law professors we published yesterday. Standing up to those who would further enslave us with bad law and unfair advantages for women, despite their clear dominance in university enrollment and employment, will eventually draw more attention to our plight and start turning things around.

This won't happen if we don't use the tools at our disposal, but Dirk Johanson has given us a good example of how we can start to do so.

Defeating Patty Murray Should be a Priority for Men

Welmer · 20 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Senator Patty Murray of Washington State, although considered one of the dimmer bulbs in congress, has been a rock-solid proponent of feminist laws, including IMBRA, VAWA and others. Currently, she is promoting SAFE, The Security and Financial Empowerment Act, which would give women another powerful weapon in family law. SAFE allows women to take time off work to prepare for court and mandates that employers must pay them while they do so. As with other federal DV bills, women would likely be able to do so without any proof other than their own word.

According to Murray, VAWA was only the "first step":

> VAWA was the first step. It helped us respond to the immediate threat of abuse. Now we need to address the long-term problems that victims face — from insurance and employment discrimination to finding permanent housing.

Feminists love Patty Murray, seeing her as a staunch ally in their war against men. Her tireless fight to give women advantages in relationships and the workplace have earned her high praise from self-described radicals. Gloria Steinem herself showed up unexpectedly at Patty's birthday during her first senate run to lend her support.

Murray knows where her base of support lies, so she highlights her feminist accomplishments, which turn out to be pretty much her only accomplishments.

Fortunately, Murray isn't looking so hot any longer. There's even a chance she could go down come fall. She lacks charisma, and a serious candidate could give her a run for her money.

A Murray defeat would be a real victory for American men, so we should keep a close eye on Murray and see what we can do to fan the flames of opposition to her radical feminism. We also ought to identify additional feminist politicians in weak positions and take measures to work for their defeat and eviction from office.

These people have done real harm — removing them from power is imperative.

Marry Him! (Really?): A Clear Example Of The Eternal Solipsism Of The Female Mind

Obsidian · 20 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This time of year when one of the biggest holidays on the calendar burns through the dead of Winter-Valentine's Day, what else?-it's common to hear of the newest/latest books and the like, almost always aimed at Women, to help them find their Mr. Right. Ms. Lori Gottlieb's "Marry Him: The Case For Settling For Mr. Good Enough" is no exception; in fact, it appears that her missive has started quite a backlash among her fellow travellers. It seems that all of the Usual Suspects of the Femosphere have kneejerked their disapproval at Ms. Gottlieb's sisterly betrayal: what, actually settle for some lowly Man? Women need Men like…oh, well you get the point.

Not only has Ms. Gottlieb's book been the talk of the town on the Web, but apparently it's been optioned to be made into a feature length film, by none other than Tobey "Spider-Man" Maguire himself-which, when one thinks of his Peter Parker persona, really makes sense.

That's because only a non-Venomnized Pete could ever, ever even consider such a thing. Not only is the very premise-that a Woman, any Woman, has to put up with a guy because she's simply run out of options-but the Y-chromosome yammering over the whole thing once again, leaves out one crucial element:

US.

But, we'll get to that in a moment, as well as the gist of Ms. Gottlieb's book. But before we do that, let's consider one little thing, shall we?

Gottlieb's book no doubt will be viewed as "dating advice"; perhaps even as "self-help"-and in any event, such books are marketed in droves to Women, for years. All kinds of truly dehumanizing language and allusions are made to Men, such as the very title of the book we're discussing; we're rated and objectified, ranked and given the heave-ho for the slightest imperfection, infraction or just the misfortune of being human-a necessary evil all in the name of the Precious Ladies' search for "Mr. Right".

Moreover, none other than the High Priestess of Relationship & Dating Advice herself-Oprah Winfrey-is known for her pricey workshops and seminars as she is for her long running tv chat show. And of course, she endorses everything for Women from The Rules to He's Just Not That Into You, to now, of course, "Marry Him!".

Yet, one of the biggest complaints and charges by those who decry Game-almost, but not always Women, is that it is not only disrespectful to Women and trades in dehumanizing terminology to and about them, but it suckers in unsuspecting guys too, on the grounds that the Game/PUAsphere is chockfull of hucksters-21st century snakeoil salesmen who rake in the dough while their clients and customers get feeble, at best, results.

And to be sure, for my part at least, I don't deny that the Gamesphere has its share of hucksters and shady types. But the sheer hubris it takes on the part of many Women to actually fix their mouths to make such charges, in the face of scads of books and the like, such as the one we're examining today, really takes the cake. It, along with the other points that need to be raised and presented in the light of day for all to see, counts as just one of many examples of what fellow Game and all-around blogger Ferdinand Bardamu called the Eternal Solipsism of The Female Mind.

But wait, there's more!

Not only is Gottlieb's screed a half-hearted attempt to sound like she's gained some wisdom in her more than a quarter century of frutiless dating, but she has the nerve-the unmitigated gall-to suggest that she still has every right to be picky, because, afterall, she has a son to think about.

That's right. Ms. Gottlieb is a Baby Mama. The question becomes, how did she achieve this monumental feat, without so much as a hubbie, boyfriend, or even a Hookup?

The answer comes from Gottlieb herself. In her Mar 2008 article of the same name of her book in the Atlantic (and which is still available online; , she makes it clear that she took a trip to the local fertility clinic with time running out on her biological clock so she could knocked up the good old fashioned way-with the Turkey Baster-because, well, there just wasn't anybody out there good enough for her to make a baby with otherwise.

Let that sink in for a moment.

OK, so let me get this straight: she can't find anybody "good enough" for 25 YEARS, then finally, at the fag end of her fertile years, decides to get the Butterball Treatment. Then, STILL expects to find "Mr. Right", and failing that, will grudgingly "settle" for "Mr. Good Enough".

Is this Beeyotch out of her ever-loving mind?!?

Oh yea-I can just see the swarms of Men now, who can't wait to lineup to take to one knee and humbly beg for this Middle-aged Maiden's hand in holy matrimony, Test Tube Baby in tow, no less.

The sheer arrogance, hubris and out and out megalomania, that this Woman exudes is something the likes of which I've never set my eyes on before-and believe you me, I done seen a lot of stuff. She honestly thinks that her stuff don't stink-and she's by no means alone. More and more, both here in the States and across the pond in the UK, Women are being seen as increasingly demanding, narcissistic, unrealistic and haughty-with average, at best, cred to back it up. Consider the recent London Daily Mail article that talks about this very problem, the one written by American homegirl Kay Hymowitz, and others. Heck, forget all that-just take a look at Gottlieb herself-one can understand why she finally had to go under the Turkey Baster to do the deed. Girlfriend is hardly a prize by any Man's standard, even if you took the baby out of the equation and rolled the clock back a decade. At best, I'd rank her a middling 5. But the way she talks about herself, it's as if she's the identical twin to Megan Fox or something.

NOT.

And that's another thing that burns me up about Women like Gottlieb-which, I am very sad to report, are the coin of the realm in our times: they not only want, or expect, but DEMAND the tip-top absolute best Man in the Universe, but give little if anything in return. They surely aren't offering equal value, that's for certain. Ever took a peek at Craig's List, or Match.com, or eHarmony, and looked at these ladies ads? Their "lists" of the ideal Man are yay long, but notice something:

They never, ever, offer what the guy gets in return. It's almost as if these gals are doing such sought after guys a favor just to be in their hallowed presence. What's in it for me? Not a whole lot. Gimme, gimme, gimme.

No, screw that. It ain't "almost as if"-it IS as if.

Nor does it surprise me one little bit that Gottlieb's supposed cautionary tale talks about how all the guys she passed up in her life have moved on to have families of their own-you know, the one you make with someone you actually know and doesn't require a petrie dish-and trust me, they're thanking GOD in Heaven that they didn't get hitched to this Royal Headcase, or others like her. Men, in case no one's figured it out by now, are just simpler, more pragmatic and are much, much more likely to "settle" than are Women, and when they decide that the dating game ain't for them, they find happiness elsewhere. Which explains why for every Game or PUA website, blog, book or seminar, you can find easily dozens of the female-versions in any direction you want to go. Happiness for Men is a heck of a lot easier than for Women for the simple reason that we expect a lot less than do Women. And once Women, for all their vaunted brainpower, finally figure this out, they too just might get a freaking clue.

The ASSumptions this book and attendant squawking by the Femmetariot makes-very, very dangerous ones-is that the guys will simply go along with whatever the ladies eventually decide to do, assuming that's even humanly possible in the first place. It doesn't occur to them that Men have minds of their own, connected to their own ideas of what they'd like to have and do and be in life, and who to do that with. Moreover, they assume that the reason why they haven't found Mr. Right, is because, well, they just haven't found Mr. Right. It never occurs to them that the real reason why they haven't found Mr. Right, is because they're NOT Ms. All That-and the Mr. Good Enough's of the world aren't exactly beating a path to their door either. They can't seem to make the connection between what goes on in their heads and what goes on outside it, and line the two up accordingly. And they can't seem to understand why anyone with any modicum of options, self respect or just plain ole sanity, would be out of their mind to even give one nanosecond, or one spark of brainpower towards even considering standing in the same room as such a Woman, let alone dating or worse, mating with her. Once again: Feminine Solipsism, anyone?

Parting Shot:

As if I couldn't be more pissed off by reading Ms. Gottlieb's crocodile tear-laden "cautionary tale", her constant rejection of Men for congenital features (among a great, great many things), such as lack of the height she wanted and so on, really got me to thinking-you know, Women do not hesitate to call a Man a Misogynist-usually because he disagrees with her-and some Men have tried to "answer" back by charging some Women with Misandry.

But it doesn't work, in my view. Why? Because the word is too esoteric, and besides, it smacks of a kind of loserdom; they call you a Misogynist, you call them a Misandrist? Nah.

But as I was out talking a walk to cool off after reading Gottlieb's mad ravings, something else occurred to me; Bigotry. The intense dislike of another, just because of how they look. In fact, Gottlieb's book, stands as an A1 case study in perhaps thee most pernicious form of discrimination around, and that's the kind that Women of her ilk visit on Men all the time. In fact, now that I think about it, I have been discriminated against MORE by Women-and in this case, Black Women-than I EVER have by job employers, banks, landlords and the like. In other words, being an "unacceptable Male" has been the cause of my being discriminated against, by BLACK WOMEN, than my being discriminated against, simply because I'm Black.

Therefore, it is wholly appropriate, and I call on all my Brothers-and Sisters of Good Will-to begin to call such people like Gottlieb for what they are:

Woman, thou name art Bigot. And Hypocrite. And just plain ole Cwazie.

And like Archie Bunker, we'll laugh AT you, too.

Now adjourn your pathetic arses…

America's Most Decorated Winter Olympic Athlete Raised by a Single Father

Welmer · 21 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yuki Ohno immigrated from Japan and set up a hair styling shop roughly 30 years ago, marrying an American woman and having a son. Within a year his wife was gone and he was struggling to raise an infant child by himself. Working long shifts to keep his business going, he had to hire daycare providers to take care of the little boy. But Yuki stayed as involved as possible in his son's life, carefully choosing daycare providers and, as he grew up, keeping him involved in after-school activities so that he wouldn't drift into delinquency like so many other neglected children – known as "latchkey kids" – of the 1980s and 90s.

After many ups and downs, the effort paid off, and now Yuki Ohno's son Apolo has achieved Olympic fame and success. Apolo credits much of this to his father, who never gave up on him, fostering his talents and steering him in the right direction as only a caring father can guide a son.

At one point, when Apolo was 15 and entering a rebellious time in his ife, Yuki told him he would have to spend some time alone to decide for himself what he wanted. Apolo stayed in a remote cabin in the rainy, cold Pacific Northwest for eight days, pondering his future and inner desires. At the end, he called his father and said he was ready to go back to training in speed skating.

Following the angst of adolescence, Apolo went on to become one of the best Olympic skaters in the world, as attested by his wealth of medals and victories. In addition to his Olympic success, Apolo appeared on Dancing With the Stars, earning the show's first ever perfect score in a samba routine with partner Julianne Hough. He has also been involved in charities in his native Seattle, raising funds for sick children and working for the Salvation Army.

Apolo knows how lucky he was to have a father like Yuki, but there must still be something bittersweet about his life. Being abandoned by one's mother is a harsh burden to bear, and Apolo expresses no desire to see her or talk much about it. Perhaps, given women's newly liberated status and frequent eagerness to break their marital vows and abandon their husbands, we will see more men reluctantly thrust into the role of single parents. We can only hope that they will have the wisdom and determination that Yuki Ohno displayed in his struggle to raise a successful son.

Although Michael Phelps' mother was lionized in the press for raising an Olympic-caliber athlete as a single mother, Yuki Ohno has had a lower profile. However, the bond between Apolo and Yuki appears to be every bit as strong, and in contrast to Phelps' mother's case, Yuki never had anyone to pick up the slack for him — he was truly alone with his son throughout all the long years it took to raise him.

In Apolo and Yuki's case, victory arose out of the tragedy of abandonment. How sweet success must be for the father-son team.

In a call to arms featuring the same old predictable bogeymen, Jessical Valenti was given space in the Washington Post today to editorialize on why the battle against men is far from over. According to Valenti, Americans are suffering from the “mass delusion” that women don’t have it so bad in the West. She goes on to use the exaggerated statistics concerning rape and women’s earnings that have been thoroughly debunked by people who have bothered to run the numbers, painting a picture of a suffering, victimized American womanhood.

Valenti’s job is to promote a sense of female vicitimhood, whether it exists or not, so even her supporters should be skeptical of her claims, but the real issue is why she is given such publicity and space to promote her radical, questionable views. Does the Washington Post actually profit from Valenti’s strident declaration that we are facing “an epidemic of sexism?” Is there any chance that someone with opposite, equally strident opinions will be given any space in a major national publication to offer some editorial balance?

Sadly, the PC culture in newsrooms around the country suggests that there will be no effort to achieve balance, but the profit question still remains. As demonstrated by Jezebel and Cosmo, feminism is best promoted with an eye toward women’s interests, which include things such as fashion, celebrities and sex. Strident feminists such as Valenti aren’t the greatest draw in that department, but I’d be willing to bet that there are some women on WaPo’s editorial board who are very sympathetic to her brand of activism.

This is just the thing: as media has found it more and more difficult to make a profit, it has become more elitist. Major newspapers are becoming charities for activists such as Valenti, supported by the rich and powerful rather than the average consumer. Exacerbating the problem is the huge disparity in wealth that has arisen in the United States over the last generation, allowing the rich to fund their pet projects, many of which involve outdated ideologies and the warped view of reality that big money tends to create.

Valenti is making a direct appeal to these people. Although she doesn’t state it explicity, she’s clearly asking for money:

> There is so much more work to be done. The truth is, most women don’t have the privilege of being able to look at gender justice from a distance; they have no choice but to live it every day. Those of us who are lucky enough not to have to think about sexism, racism, poverty and homophobia on a daily basis — those of us who have the privilege of sending money to an international cause via e-mail while ignoring the plight of women here at home — have a responsibility to open our eyes to the misogyny right in front of us. And then to stop it.

For the foreseeable future, we should expect more of the same fantasy-laden editorials in national publications. There is little remaining motivation to cater to the typical American, and the money is flowing in from the kinds of people who vacation in Paris every year, so editorials will be skewed toward the interests of perhaps 10% of the American population. This will further erode profitability, leading to a positive feedback loop that forces the old media into the position of boutique publishers who cater to a small elite.

Of course, this is unsustainable over the long-term, and new models will eventually find their way and rise up to relegate the old media to its proper place, much as printing eventually pushed old manuscripts into museums and the hands of wealthy private collectors. But in the meanwhile, we should expect “respectable” media outlets to increasingly become platforms for fund raising for the pet causes of the very rich.

Another Tragedy Amongst Millions

Welmer · 22 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of Roissy's commenters posted a link to an audio file where a man dumps his girlfriend on the radio, demanding she pack up and leave by Valentine's Day. The young man, who had been with his girlfriend for five years, including three years of living together, and was preparing to propose on Valentine's Day, had found out that she was cheating with "an old friend." The dumping, which was pretty harsh, can be listened to at the following address:

Valentine's Dumping

The young woman believed that she was about to be proposed to on air, but instead she was shamed, humiliated and unceremoniously dumped. Her pain is obvious, and was actually hard for me to listen to, although I'm sure plenty will feel no such squeamishness. The young man almost certainly dodged a bullet. He's lucky he had friends who told him when they saw his girlfriend out on the town with another guy. If he had married her, clueless the entire time to her affairs on the side, he would have found out, probably after a kid or two, that he was married to a tramp who had no respect for him as a man, and he would have endured the pain and humiliation so many American men go through these days. He's a lucky guy in many respects. Sure, he blew five years of his life with an skank, but he doesn't have to give her one red cent and he's free to move on.

However, if you think about the fallout from this breakup, the lives of these two young people will probably be forever changed. The young man will never be as trusting and willing to love as he had been, having had his heart broken by the woman he was prepared to marry, and the young woman will be thrust back into a merciless dating market just as her sexual value is on the decline.

If it weren't for our culture of female promiscuity and entitlement, these incidents would not be nearly as common as they are today. As awful as it may seem, it is not uncommon for young women to play the field sexually as they pull the wool over the eyes of the man they expect to marry them. Women love the attention of multiple men — in many ways they are less monogamous than men. It isn't that they are more sexually predatory, but the allure of "romance" and clandestine relationships is far stronger for the so-called "fairer sex." Men may be more sexually adventurous, but women are surely more emotionally adventurous, and while men may have a number of sexual partners, they tend to bond with one woman above all others. Women, on the other hand, crave "connecting" with multiple partners. Combine that with the assumption that sex with multiple partners carries fewer physical risks than it used to, and there are bound to be many, many young women who sleep around on the men who love them.

In an era of sexual permissivity, the long term well-being of both men and women is sacrificed. For most young men and women, their lives would be enhanced by a long, monogamous marriage. For a few men and women, there is much to gain from sexual adventure, but these are in the minority. The typical result is unfortunate incidents such as the above heartbreak of two young people who, in another time, might have gone on to be a happily married couple.

The wreckage of lives introduced by feminist policy is a subtle evil, in that one cannot see it as clearly as a corpse-strewn battlefield, but its victims are legion, and the real harm and tragedies it has introduced to millions of young people is taking an enormous toll. It is up to us to expose this scourge and hold those who profit from it morally accountable.

Styles Makes Fights — And Game

Obsidian · 22 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Fans of the Sweet Science will recognize the words in the title of this post; in boxing, its one of the first principles. As much as learning the universal basics of boxing are important, such as the rules, conditioning and so on, so too is it very, very important for a boxer to find a style of boxing that best works for him. Some boxers, being tall, can utilize their superior reach; others, speed; and still others, power. Some boxers, while not having awesome "one-two" knockout power, may nevertheless be able to use their keen understanding of the mechanics of boxing and the human body, as well as being astute students of history and watching tapes of their opponent, to use all of this knowledge to their advantage during the fight, using the "point" system and endurance to wear their opponent down. Other boxers are shorter, more compact, and may do much better as an in your face kind of fighter-which quite a few boxers aren't able to handle, especially for extended periods of time, say three or four rounds back to back.

The point is that very often, the boxer who has the best fit of his chosen style to his natural abilities, talents and gifts, more often than not, wins the fight. The same can be said of Game-after you learn the basics, such as the fundamental differences between Male and Female, what turns on both and why, etc, and when you've learned key principles such as Negs, Social Proof, PAS and so on, you're then ready to give serious consideration to the style you will use, to best take advantage of your natural abilities.

Since Game tends to attract geeky types, and because many Game writers and the like will tend to draw analogies between Game and the Force-I've done it myself-I thought to illustrate a bit more by discussing the styles a Gamesman can use, by way of the various combat styles the Jedi, the fictional ancient order of Force users in the Star Wars universe, display in the franchise of films.

In the Star Wars universe, there are what is known as the Seven Forms, a series of styles of combat that developed over millennia. Shortly after a Jedi trainee is finished with their basic training, they are then sent off to study the ways of the Force with a Master. It is usually at this time that they choose a style of combat that best suits him; often, his Master will aid him in this regard.

The Seven Forms are as follows:

1. Shii-Cho
2. Makashi
3. Soresu
4. Ataru
5. Djem-So
6. Niman
7. Juyo

Let's examine these forms briefly:

Shii-Cho is the first and most basic of combat for the Jedi. This covers all the fundamentals-stances, thrusts, striking points, swings, defence, offence. In Game parlance, this would be about learning all the most fundamental basics of Seduction, and while this style isn't as effective against more higher powered Targets, no other form can be effective without a firm grounding in this one. It's for this reason that such a style, for the aspiring Gamesmen, is most closely aligned in my view, with "Solid Game".

Makashi is a bit more obscure, owing to the fact that, at the time when the Star Wars films are made, very few Jedi encounter another Force user in combat. Makashi was designed with dueling in mind, and relies on elegant, subtle, yet quick and precise, almost balletic moves. It is most effective in one-on-one situations, though a verified

Master of the form can take on two highly trained Force users and defeat them both (as Count Dooku did to Obiwan and his apprentice Anakin in Attack Of The Clones). In Gamespeak, this style is best in terms of Direct Game, yet elegant, swift, with a rapier wit (Negs in this form are ultra smooth, subtle and highly, highly effective), perfect timing and a flair for fashion, elegance and style, perhaps just a bit over the top or having a thing for the dramatic.

Soresu is the third form of combat for the Jedi, and developed in the early days of blasters, which meant that Jedis had to learn to defend themselves from such attacks. In the films, for example, when you see a Jedi blocking incoming fire from a blaster, he's practicing this form to some degree. At the time of the Star Wars films, this form was pretty much the "default" style of combat, due mainly to the prevalence of blasters and the rarity of coming across Force using opponents.

Because of its focus on defense, and not on offense and attacks, this form is often referred to as "the true Jedi form" because of the Order's emphasis on passivity and peace, as well as mercy-Soresu tends to focus more on disarming an opponent rather than taking him out altogether. Obiwan Kenobi is recognized as the undisputed Master of the form and displays it beautifully, even as an older Man in the famous "cantina" scene of Star Wars: Episode Four, and his final duel with Darth Vader on the Death Star; and in his epic duel against his one time apprentice Anakin Skywalker in Star Wars: Episode Three. Notice how no matter how much rage and sheer power Anakin used against Obiwan, Obiwan remained calm and parried all his attacks, blocked all his blows and patiently bided his time, until, finally, Anakin revealed a blindspot-and Obiwan took him out.

Its for this reason that Soresu is considered virtually invincible, because opponents have been known to get tired and give up. In Game parlance, this form doesn't expend much energy chasing Targets around, but rather draws them in and then uses their energy with which to build attraction. "Maximum effect with minimum output" is a big feature of this style, and it is for this reason that its one of the best styles to have.

But it's also heavily dependent on one cultivating strong Inner Game, because that's where this style's true strength comes from. This style of Game relies on patience, tranquility and calm-cool, smooth, refined, yet focused and determined in the eye of the storm. Through this inner calm and peace, firm yet relaxed cool and confidence, and ability to draw in a Target to himself, such a Gamesmen rarely encounters flakes, LMR or ASD. Closes are almost always complete and full.

Ataru is the forth form of Jedi combat, which is focused on the body; this style makes use of the Jedi to accomplish great physical feats, such as leaping far distances, or performing acrobatic moves in combat. Yoda is a Master of this form of combat, because it both takes advantage of his shorter height, and as well his deep connection to the Force which makes it possible to for him to move as if a young Man. Ataru is also more attack oriented; notice Yoda doesn't "defend" himself per se; offense is the best defense in this form. In the films, perhaps the best examples of this form in action was when Yoda engaged Count Dooku, and, more importantly, Senator Palpatine, who uses a Sith variant of Ataru as well. In Gamespeak, this style most relates to flashier displays, like Peacocking, that are really over the top, working a room hard and taking it over, taking full advantage of the situation and engaging a group at full blast. The Gamesmen really puts his all into it and pretty much overwhelms or bowls over the Target and her entourage.

Because this style demands high levels of energy, it is recommended that only high energy guys use it, otherwise you can burn out pretty quick. Also, an older and/or short Man can use this style to great effect, because both states infer a less vibrant or powerful Man, and your Target can be both taken aback as well as impressed by your "Big Man" personality and/or your formidable level of energy, despite being older.

Djem-So, the fifth form of Jedi combat, is actually a mixture of Makashi and Soresu, a joining of both a dueling style, and a more defensive, "protective" style. Less "flashy" then Ataru, Djem-So concentrates on the principle of "peace through strength" and even a "might makes right" mentality. Unlike Soresu, where the user defends himself but doesn't hurt the attacker, a practitioner of Djem-So deliberately turns defence into offence. This is seen for example, when both Anakin Skywalker and his son Luke, turn blaster fire right back on those who fired it at them.

Some Jedi frown on this style, as it tends to focus more on the aggressive side of the Force. In Game parlance, this style tends to focus more on Direct Game, strong approaches, and taking any defences the Target will put up and turning back on her. Such a style is perfect for barrelling through a Target's "Bitch Shield", via use of sheer persistence, determination and will. Plus the more raw or naked displays of power is very often a big turn-on for many Women.

The sixth form of Jedi combat, Niman, is considered more of a diplomat's form or style, because instead of focusing on any one form, these users kind of dabble in all of them, having a basic understaning of each. The problem with this form though, is that there isn't enough of a grounding in any one style to really be able to make an impact when out in field and going up against hardcore opponents-this is why most Jedi were killed at the Battle of Geonosis in Attack Of The Clones.

However, one important feature of this form is its use of two weapons at once, known as Jar Kai; the only practitioner to do this in the films was Anakin in his first confrontation with Dooku, and for a time he held his own, but was eventually bested by the Makashi Master. In Game parlance, this relates to "Game theorists" but not Game doers, who know all the theory and what not, but have very little actual hands on experience. However, if one is able to make use of two "weapons" at once or in tandem-say both be able to work Social Proof and Preselection at once-this form can be highly effective. But by and large, not highly recommended.

Juyo, the seventh and final form of Jedi combat, is similar to both Ataru and Djem-So, in that it focuses on physicality, offence, power and passion, but much moreso than either of the two forms-in fact, it so relies on the latter, that it brings the user very close to the Darkside. It is for this reason that very few Jedi can even learn the form, much less have the inner focus needed to keep from veering over to the Darkside. Only two displays of this form have been seen in the flms-Darh Maul's Sith variant of Juyo, and Mace Windu's "take" on the form, which he calls Vaapad.

A major feature of this form is the blinding speed at which attacks are mounted, coming from all directions in a seemingly disconnected and unorthodox manner, but which are intended to both overwhelm and disorient the opponent. In Game, the practitioner using this style focuses on his inner passions as a source of his Game, and basically overwhelms his Target, coming at her from all directions and throwing everything at her including the kitchen sink. When executed correctly, it takes a Woman by storm and sweeps her off her feet. However, the downside here is that things can get too hot too fast, and can be over almost as quickly as it began. That's OK, if that's what you're looking for-but it does come at a price. For starters, the emotional toll this places on Women can be huge, since for them emotions and sex are closely linked; and the longterm effects can be hazardous to the Gamesman as well, unless he's constantly doing inner monitoring of his own state, and focusing on the Light. For this reason, it is best that should a Man choose to use this style, it is highly recommended that he first have a very clearly defined code of conduct and rules of engagement, lest he be seduced himself by the Darkside of Game.

Speaking of which, I've mentioned several times the term "Sith variant" to the differing forms of Jedi combat, and this applies to both boxing, or any other martial art, and as well, to Game. The difference is that while the former focuses on a code of ethics and the highest good, the latter focuses on the exact opposite-being amoral/immoral, and using the style in question to humiliate, demoralize or in some other way, bring the Target down or low. In boxing this would equate to hitting below the belt, using head butts and so on.

For example, much has been said about the Neg. It is a powerful tool, no doubt, but it can also be used to hurt a Woman, sometimes deeply. In Jedi speak, when it comes to Sith, there is the tactic of Dün Moch, basically taunting your opponent while using other "dirty" tactics designed to demoralize your opponent. Darth Vader did this to Luke Skaywalker during their first duel on Bespin, by using the Force to hurl objects at him from many directions while also attacking him at the same time. Senator Palpatine did this to Yoda during their battle on Coruscant while in the main chamber of the Galactic Senate. And Darth Vader did it again during his final duel with his son on the Deathstar, by mentioning Leia Organa, Luke's sister and his daughter.

In Gamespeak, Dün Moch is basically Negs Gone Bad, used intentionally to bring a Woman low, in a pernicious way. Other “dirty” tactics can be brought to play, too-just think of how a Gamesman can use Game in a negative, morally questionable way, and you have Dark Game. It’s something that is both highly effective, but also very, very damaging, to the Target and the Gamesman both.

Anyway, the above should give you something to think about as we head into spring. Remember: styles makes fights.

And Game.

We Got Your Self Esteem Here

Dr. Paul · 22 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Let me tell you what I'd do if I liked money more than self respect. I'd go to the local shoppers club and buy a hundred gross of small brown paper bags. Then I'd drive out of town to the nearest auction barn and pay them a fair price to let me go into the stalls and fill every bag with an even pound of cow crap.

Then I'd slap on some shiny pink labels with "Bag-O-Women's-Self-Esteem," printed on them in a distinctly womanish font, add a five, no, ten dollar price sticker, and tie 'em closed with couple of nice frou frou ribbons. Next, I'd set up a kick back arrangement with Dr. Phil in exchange for an endorsement and take out an ad in Cosmo or Redbook.

Then I would head down to Belize and sit on the beach, throw back cocktails and check the bank account on my Droid 8 or 10 times a day. After about a week I'd buy the beach I was sitting on, and maybe that cute little senorita that was fetching my drinks. The word expatriate would start sounding pretty good.

And I'd be doing myself and you ladies a big favor. It would be perfect synergy. I like money, and you like buying bullshit.

You've been doing it for as long as I can remember. Fake self esteem, like 98% of everything else that is marketed just to females, has become the psycho-porn of the western woman, with profits that would put a twinkle in Bill Gates eyes. How much profit exactly is anyone's guess.

What I do know is that the self esteem racket comes in a lot of guises. I will deal with the two major ones here because that is all I have time for.

First, the plastic surgery route. With 8 year olds getting bikini waxes and high school juniors getting fitted for an instant C cup, it is a growing industry for the grrls. For the supposed grown ups it is a monster. Plastic surgeons know how much better you will feel about yourself if your tits draw some more stares and your lips look a little more blow job ready.

This is what they pass off as self esteem, and they use it as an advertising come on in the same way beer companies use girls in bikinis. Since you are the consumer, it sells like cheap crack in a bad neighborhood. And so now you and your sisters are lined up like schoolgirls for tickets to see Pink, to get cut and stretched, injected and inflated, and to have your fat asses suctioned down to bubbles of perfection.

But, there is one ever so slight problem. Actually, it's a big one.

You see, vanity isn't self esteem. Neither is narcissism. Not the real deal, anyway. If you think self esteem and self obsession are the same thing, then go buy those plastic titties. They will match your character and personality just fine, and they might go a long way toward a career as a porn star or topless dancer if the scars don't show too much. After all, it's common knowledge that self esteem abounds for women who can squat down and pick up folded dollar bills off the floor with the crack of their ass while a room full of drunks howl at them.

Then you can attract more men and join the millions of other women that spend their time bitching about how those men won't look at them from the neck up. It's a small price to pay for all that self worth.

Tell you what -today only- two bags of cow crap for the price of one.

Now, if you are not on an elective surgery budget, you needn't feel left out. There is a whole world of cheaper but equally fake assistance with your problem. It's the Stuart Smalley route of the self esteem simpleton. And it is for sale in the wacky world of mental health. The purveyors, usually women who don't have any more self esteem than you do, are scattered across the world wide web, thicker than Henry Kissinger's accent. For a mere hundred or so per hour, they will give you the stalwart advice to look in the mirror -each and every day- and say really affirming things like "I am unique. I am special. I am the only 'me' there is!" They will advise you to smile while saying it, but I dare you to simply keep a straight face.

They will tell you there are lots of reasons you don't have self esteem. The most common one being men that don't see just how special you really are, or don't tell you as much every 15 minutes. Those are the relationships where you lose your self esteem. Yes, ladies, you can have it and then lose it, like there was a big hole in your pocket and it fell through and rolled under the sofa.

Actually, they will make it look a little more sinister. It's like this: You get into a relationship and at first he is all roses and chocolates. After time though, he starts saying things that are not really bad, but just a little cutting, like "I'm going fishing with my friends,"

After some more time passes, it gets worse. When his fishing trips don't stop simply because you tell him how important it is for him to give them up for you, what started as "I'm going fishing with my friends," ends up being "Get off my back you insufferable fucking control freak."

Self esteem into the drink, right then and there.

Seriously though, ladies, disinformation about your self esteem aside, the self help gurus aren't any better at it than the cutters. And they miss the most important thing about self esteem, just like you do.

The cold truth is that if you have self esteem, nobody can take it from you. And if you can surrender it to someone, even an asshole that says he loves you, then you never had it to begin with.

That is partly because there is no such thing as self esteem. It is just a made up word; a marketing tool to get to your purse, or through you, your mans wallet. There is, however, self respect. And self respect, since it must be earned, is rarely sacrificed.

When you have it, respect from others is a given. But you can't have respect from others or yourself if what you keep chasing is scripted adoration and unearned preeminence. And if you are the average woman in today's world, you don't have a damned clue as to the difference. It makes selling you bags of bullshit all the easier. In fact, as long as you insist on hanging on to the idea that your being special is a demand you can put on anyone else, or obtain by making an ass of yourself in a mirror, it makes selling you anything but bullshit impossible.

Unlike what any plastic surgeon or psychobabble spouting huckster will tell you, you have to get off your ass and earn the way people see and treat you, and the way you see and treat yourself.

You do this through the development of your character, not as a princess or little girl or the self designated center of someone else's universe, but as a grown human being with more focus on your responsibilities than your entitlements. Ante up like a big girl and see how quickly the world, and men, treat you like one.

And if you are taking shit, stop it.

If you don't stand up, and I mean immediately, to any mistreatment from any other human being, and put an end to it, then don't whine about being a door mat. You volunteered for it the second you laid down.

But the real trick here is for you to understand that people, particularly men, failing to meet unrealistic expectations isn't robbing you of anything. They aren't respecting you by catering to your childishness, they are just giving in to it, and, in the mother of all ironies, disrespecting themselves.

Now you can take this advice, which is totally free, and start applying it today. You can start growing up this very minute. Before you know it other people, men included, will be looking at you in a way you have likely never seen before. With genuine admiration. I know, it's a poor substitute for adulation, but in the real world it has to do.

Or, if you just can't wrap your mind around the idea that the onus is on you to get the job done; that self respect is a by-product of maturity and humility, I have another form of self esteem, right here, by the bag full.

Operators are standing by.

Best of Craiglist: How men handle the current society

Gx1080 · 23 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Damn, just discovered it and the stories there are really funny.

First, resignation:

To the guy doing my wife at my house

“Dude, I’m chained to a warpig, but you are the one that is desperate enough to pork her. So respect my stuff”

Chances are that, since he’s porking his wife, the other guy will not give a damn anyways. As usual, the children are the only reason of why a man would take this abuse. If he wants to keep seeing them (as much as he can before she decides to divorce), he’s gonna have to take it on the rear.

One would think that giving males reasons for not reproducing would be counterproductive, you know if you want to avoid having to cut pensions at all just for avoiding bankruptcy due to low replacement rate. It’s common sense, right? Hah. When was the last time that a politician cared about that?

Second, advice to female posters, Dr. Paul’s style:

Note to the female posters

“We are MEN. We already know everything about “commitment”. We won’t be apologizing for the former and like hell we’ll be going to the latter. Get used to it.”

It says another things, like telling women what men know since a long time ago: You aren’t an unique snowflake, much less a better one. Sounds reasonable, right? Unfortunately the manginas who will attempt to please women and fulfill what they say that they want (not what they really want) will make this advice fall in deaf ears. Sigh.

Finally, an old favorite of mine. I laughed when I found this story in another website a long time ago, and it’s funny no matter how much times I read it:

Vasectomy: $400. Speechless look on her face: priceless.

Many men can guess a summary of the story, but still should read it. A paragraph worth mentioning (an actual quote):

> I also heard that the real father was some guy in a band she had met. I assumed that after 30, women stopped going after musicians, bikers, criminals, and thugs. Silly me for thinking the best of American women.

That’s everything you need to know about Western women.

The capacity to stoically cope with hard situations hasn’t been lost in Western males. It’s a part of manhood, that’s something that cannot be removed, no matter how much they try. Stories like these prove that all the mangina conditioning of the world cannot destroy manhood.

College Professor Amy Bishop Always Got a Pass

Amy Bishop, the University of Alabama in Huntsville professor arrested in the shooting of six colleagues on February 12, left a long, bloody trail of violence and conflict in her wake throughout her adult life. Details of the many incidents she was involved with are coming to light in the aftermath of the Alabamas rampage, but what remains unexplained is why she never had to answer for them.

Readers of The Spearhead probably already know why this is the case, but for the uninitiated it is a clear case of women getting a pass on violent – often criminal – behavior, even as men face heavy social and police scrutiny for their every move. Even as men are forced to attend anger management classes for raising their voice in an argument, or even making phone calls when their visitation is interfered with by ex-wives, women like Dr. Bishop get away with some breathtakingly violent acts.

In 1986, at the age of 21, Amy Bishop was attending Northeastern University with her 18-year-old brother Seth. She and Seth got into an argument, and somehow Seth ended up dead on the floor with a shotgun wound to his chest. Bishop's mother claimed it was an accident, and the incident was swept under the rug — the police accepted her and Amy's version and halted the investigation. No charges were filed, despite the fact that Amy attempted to rob a car dealership in an apparent attempt to procure a getaway car. One would think that this is an indication of guilt.

Here is an excerpt from an in-depth NY Times story on Dr. Bishop:

> Carrying the shotgun, she descended the stairs to the kitchen, where her brother and mother were standing.
> "I was at the kitchen sink and Seth was standing by the stove," Mrs. Bishop told the police. "Amy said, 'I have a shell in the gun, and I don't know how to unload it.' I told Amy not to point the gun at anybody. Amy turned toward her brother and the gun fired, hitting him. Amy then ran out of the house with the shotgun."
> Mrs. Bishop said the shooting had been an accident.

In 1994, Bishop was questioned concerning a mail bomb plot against a Harvard professor.

In 2002 Bishop attacked another woman in a Peabody, Massachussets International House of Pancakes over the use of a child booster seat, punching her in the head. Although she was charged, she apparently got off the hook with a slap on the wrist and probation — she was never convicted.

Bishop was an aspiring writer, and worked with a writers' group in Massachussetts, where one of the collaborators on a novel she planned to write about biological warfare described her as "always within striking distance of the edge."

A man with a similar history wouldn't have escaped the criminal justice system. Even the IHOP incident would have, in all likelihood, landed a man in jail for a spell, and at least with a conviction on his record.

We live in a society in which the innocence of women is an article of faith. When men have their legs crushed for allegedly making a phone call to their ex-wives, and women get off scot-free for murdering their own brothers, there's bound to eventually be some blowback. It is sad to see what happened to Dr. Bishop's colleagues, and although Dr. Bishop should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law, others, including the prosecutor and police chief in Braintree MA who let her off the hook, should answer for letting her crimes go unpunished.

No End of Young Women Seeking to Capitalize on their Promiscuity

Welmer · 23 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Ashley Cole, a famous UK footballer, has been following in Tiger Woods' footsteps by having a string of affairs with blondes despite having an attractive, accomplished wife. His most recent escapade was in Seattle, where his Chelsea team was playing an exhibition game against the Seattle Sounders.

Cole hooked up with a 28-year-old City Council staffer named Ann Corbitt at the Four Seasons Hotel. The soccer player is portrayed as being a sly, tricky devil in this article, but the tactics he allegedly used to bed the star-struck staffer, including sending her pictures of himself in underpants, were pure cheesecake.

His clumsy attempts to "seduce" the young woman didn't matter, because all she could think of was his status as a famous athlete. It took very little for Cole to convince Ms. Corbitt to go to bed with him the first night they met. Pictures of her with the athlete portray a giddy woman grinning from ear to ear, looking for all the world like she'd just hit the jackpot.

Corbitt claims not to have had any idea he was married. Of course, she could have asked, but it probably wouldn't have mattered, given that she is the kind of woman who will jump into bed with an athlete at a moment's notice and then make the details public (she has even hired a British publicity agent).

Here's Ann Corbitt spilling the beans:

> "All in all, the sex lasted three or four hours," she told us. "I was very taken aback by how intimate he was and how needy he was.
> "It was like having sex with a boyfriend, someone who loves you. Ashley took my clothes off and was incredibly attentive.
> "He was a creative and adventurous lover. At the end he was satisfied and so was I. He was aiming to please, not just out to satisfy himself.
> "When we went to sleep, he wanted to snuggle up close. I don't like sleeping like that and he made me too hot.
> "But even when I moved to the other side of the bed Ashley still wanted to hold hands and have that contact. And that was sweet."

Why do American women love sharing with the world what sluts they are? Could it be because they are rewarded for it? Whatever the reason, it takes not only shamelessness, but a vicious attitude toward the man's wife to do something like this. I suppose the only conclusion one can come to is that Corbitt is pure trash, and as low-class as it gets, but unfortunately she's the norm.

An additional observation I would make is that women who are attracted to politics seem to be amongst the most consistent offenders in this regard. Perhaps this is how they get their jobs as "staffers" in the first place. Wouldn't surprise me at all if a plurality of female staffers sleep with all the high-status men they can get their hands on (as opposed to those who only do it sometimes and those who don't do so at all). Perhaps Tom Rasmussen, Seattle City Councilman and Corbitt's boss, hired her for just that reason.

Obsidian · 24 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By now everyone on the planet has heard about the recent arrest of former exotic dancer Crystal Gail Mangum, who, nearly four years ago, falsely accused three White students of gang raping her on Duke University's campus. The story, fueled by the joining of two of America's most potent taboos-Sex & Race-quickly sprouted legs, and became the cause celeb of do-gooders everywhere.

Despite the opportunistic zeal of Durham NC DA Mike Nifong, the case was eventually thrown out, due both to Mangum's story having been flimsy in the first the and the DNA results proving the accused so-called Duke Three's innocence. But by then, the damage had been done-the Duke Three's families spent more than a million dollars in legal fees defending their sons' good name; upwards of 100 Duke faculty, much of them tenured academics, signed an open letter condemning the Duke Three; and the whole of the Femosphere, aided and abetted by the mainstream news media, led the charge in vilifying in the worst ways imaginable, the Duke Three.

If ever there was a case to be made for a High-Tech Lynching, this was it. The sheer irony of it all, during Black History Month no less, is something you just can't make up.

Mangum's recent arrest on a litany of charges, including domestic abuse, along with a long history of legal trouble, and some even suggest mental and emotional problems, only goes to show the Woman for what she is — not some hapless victim, but the problem herself. And ironically enough, it is Women like her who make true victims of rape harder to believe.

Part of the personal code that I live by is to always respect Universal Law, because its true-what goes around, comes around. Not only that, but the Truth ALWAYS comes out, sooner or later. If you're standing on Truth, you have nothing to worry about for Truth crushed to earth, shall always rise again. That the cacophony of academics, talking heads and Feministas, are now strangely silent, only proves the point. And worse, notice that not a one of them have so much as offered an apology, not just to the Duke Three – their lives ruined regardless of their innocence proven in a court of law – but to the general public either. All of them go on as if nothing happened, even as Ms. Mangum's mugshot is plastered all over the news media and Internet.

Earlier this morning, the local NPR affiliate, instead of covering the Mangum case, instead decided to run yet another story of a young lady who claims to have been raped on college campus, after attending a frat/keg party and drinking heavily. Hmm. I defy anyone reading this to check in with the leading Feminist blogs and sites: Alas! A Blog, Feministing, Feministe, Jezebel, Pandagon, and tell me that they've even mentioned Mangum's name in the past week, much less even fixed their mouths to offer a mea culpa. Remember, these are the same folks who say, that Women never LIE about being raped, and that anyone who suggests otherwise is a rank Misogynist. Right?

I'll wait.

As I've always said, and it bears repeating now, tough times don't shape character; they reveal it. If the Femosphere-which absolutely includes Academia and Legacy Media-had a scintilla of character, they would be among the first to offer a "my bad". They. Remain. Silent. And then have the nerve to continue running "hate against Women" propaganda as if nothing ever happened.

If nothing else proves that this foul triumvirate has no credibility, that the Empress is walking around in the buck, the Ballad of Crystal Gail Mangum most definitely does. And, I assure my Brothers-and Sisters of Good Will-do not be troubled.

For the Truth needs no defense.

And it will always win out in the end.

Just ask Ms. Crystal Gail Mangum.

Little Sparky, my macbook, has finally entered his death throes. Victim of a faulty power source, he has started to sputter and rattle like an old man at the end of the line. Poor little Sparky! He served me so well throughout the years…

I'll have to get a new machine, despite my dire straits, but what really bothers me is what will become of the little guy. I'd give him a proper burial, but his corroding components would likely leach out and poison the soil. I'd part him out on e-bay, but that just seems so cynical and cruel. Perhaps I should shellac the little machine and mount him on the wall.

If anyone has been the workhorse of The Spearhead, it has been Sparky, who has patiently endured so much pounding and poking without so much as a whine or beep. Never once did he present me with the Blue Screen of Death, and he obeyed my every command. If only I could find a wife as fine as Sparky, I'd be a made man!

So, if there are a few gaps in content over the next day or so, mark it down to grief (and to all the time it will take me to install all my junk on a new machine).

Why Women Shouldn't Preach

Welmer · 24 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Elusive Wapiti, a contributor to The Spearhead, has a great post up on why "Conservative" women are as much a problem as their strident, infanticidal sisters in the left-feminist movement. EW is a committed Christian. Considering the abuse that Christian men are subjected to these days not only from their country, but their church as well, it is a wonder that any of them exist at all these days. It must be a testament to the strength of the faith, so maybe all is not lost.

In any event, none of the Abrahamic religions have any room for feminism, but this heresy has infected Christianity to an alarming degree. One might even compare contemporary American Christianity with the state-sanctioned churches that were dedicated to promulgating the sham notion that the USSR and other Communist countries tolerated religious freedom.

As women increasingly voice their opinion on church matters, Christianity becomes more and more of a farce. Search the internet, and you will find female theologians popping out of every crevice, virtually preaching their own brand of femino-centric Christianity to the world.

Although I definitely inherited a Christian sensibility from my family and culture, I've pretty much given up on the faith. However, I still think it's within my rights to tell Christians that if they don't tell these mouthy ladies to shut up (1 Timothy 2:11-13) they might as well call it a good run and start over with something else.

Look around at EW's place, and throw in a comment over there if you have an opinion.

Delusions of Masculinity

The other night my compadre and I were watching some coverage of the winter Olympics. There was some sort of skiing on, slalom I think, and it caught my eye. Impressive stuff. Then women's figure skating comes on and the compadre gets ready to turn the channel.

"Don't even say it…I know you won't watch this."

"Why not? You basically have some pretty girls being graceful and dancing to Western classical music. Nothing wrong with that. That's what they're supposed to do. Like ballerinas. Like women. Ice skating is a good sport for women. It's pretty and feminine. Only the male skating is offensive. If I wanted to see some f—ing queen in spandex gyrate like a f—ing whore I would go to a f—ing gay bar."

So obviously I'm not watching the men's figure skating competitions. But you've seen them. Maybe not this year. But they've looked pretty much the same for the past 20 years, right? Gay guy in a sparkly outfit fags out, middle class housewives clap. Husbands wince. End of story.

TEXT MESSAGES – FRI APRIL 19

Jack: I feel like kicking every dude I see today in the balls. No idea why.

Max: Because America just won its first gold medal in mens figure skating and fag who lost is accusing the fag who won of skating like a woman.

Jack: Now it makes perfect sense. Thanks.

But why do men wince?

I was laughing about the text exchange above with a guy I work with a few days later. He says:

"Dude, I hate watching that stuff. It's embarrassing."

So I did what I do. I applied the narrative.

"That's what I get from most men. It's embarrassing to watch because the skater is embarrassing himself. It's uncomfortable to watch a man dishonor himself."

"Yeah. Exactly."

I don't know if I'm willing to go on record as saying that men's figure skating is always unmanly. I can't recall one off the top of my head, but there are probably guys who have put a testosterone spin on it—who really made the ice their bitch.

This is the part where I really want to say, "What would Brian Boitano do?," but he ain't exactly Clint Eastwood, is he?

He did build the pyramids, and he beat up Kubela Kong.

And NAPOLEON. He dressed like Napoleon. So there's that.

Figure skating isn't really a sport. Figure skating is an interpretive dance that requires a high degree of athleticism. Ballet is also an interpretive dance that requires a high degree of athleticism. Figure skating is more like ballet than it is like swimming or sprinting or weightlifting. But the audience for the Winter Olympics this year has been 56% female. Women love watching figure skating, which is all about backstory and expression and emotion—not raw numbers or linear achievement. It's ratings gold and they'll call it whatever they want to call it. Men will continue to tune it out. It's women's entertainment; skaters are entertainers catering to a largely female audience. In fact, from the looks of it, they're catering to roughly the same audience as American Idol—where faggotry also abounds.

For the record, my application of the term "faggot" is inclusively pansexual, and that usage seems to be increasingly common among men. Homosexuality and effeminacy correlate on average but effeminacy is not the exclusive domain of homosexual males. Not by a longshot. I don't care who a man says he's having sex with. If he's wearing something f—ing bedazzled and prancing around like a tart, he's a fag to me. Fruitcakes are fruitcakes. Likewise men who act like men should be regarded as men and treated like men.

Fagtastic figure skating is fine and dandy, so to speak.

If some guy wants to get in touch with his inner Tinkerbell, well, I guess someone has to do it.

But don't expect men to get excited about it, or watch it, or approve. It is what it is.

And when a male figure skater says something stupid like, "I think masculinity is what you believe it to be," men need to stand up and correct him, instead of caving in to women and gay groups and apologizing.

Men need to control the definition of masculinity.

Masculinity is not "whatever you believe it to be."

If it is "whatever you believe it to be" then it is a word without meaning. So why even say it?

The argument itself is completely insincere.

Johnny Weir knows he's not masculine. He's "gender bending." He knows it, and he loves it. He knows he's playing at being a half-woman. He knows the kind of reaction it gets from men. He knows it gets a lot of attention, negative and positive. He wants that attention. He's not just "expressing himself." He's being purposefully transgressive, and the people close to him obviously enable and validate it.

His feigned innocence is a lie. Fags like Johnny Weir subscribe to a feminist agenda. They believe they are changing the world, and they are absolutely giddy about it. And unfortunately, they're right.

They are remaking "masculinity" in their own image.

Because men are allowing it. They don't want to deal with these guys, because arguing with fags is like arguing with women. There's no honor in it.

Some French Canadian guys joked on-air about what most guys think when they are forced to watch some queen shame himself on ice. They said he should be tested to make sure he's really a man.

He's acting like a big queen, he knows he's acting like a big queen, he has no shame about it, so they shame him a little. They're not afraid of him—it's not a real phobia. It's like a peculiarly male form of empathy coupled with a peculiarly human form of social control. They're embarrassed for him, they're ashamed of him and they want to distance themselves from him. Weir is an omega. He's rejected the form—he's openly mocking it. So they push him out of the world of men and he continues to thrive as the little darling of women.

There's a lot of talk in "men's movement" circles about shaming language, because women use it to control men. But men also use it to control each other.

Johnny Weir and his supporters want figure skating in fur and sequins to be equal to showing strength and valor in battle—at least in terms of "masculinity." Unfortunately, I sometimes see men's advocates saying essentially the same thing.

"Throw off those old roles!"

"Do whatever you want!"

"Don't let anyone tell you how to be a man!"

"Kill the alpha!"

“Beta power!”

“Masculinity can be whatever you believe it to be!”

Oh, wait. That last one was Johnny Weir.

Don’t be a tool.

Masculinity means something. Some men are more masculine than others, just like some men are taller than others. Some men are good at being men, but they are not always good men. There is room for distinction and discussion—men have always talked about what it means to be a man.

But men don’t need to live in a world where nothing means anything, and everyone gets to be “alpha for a day.” That’s not winning.

That’s the way women think.

That’s the world that women want.

That’s the world feminists want.

When masculinity means whatever you want it to mean, it means nothing.

And being a man means nothing.

When being a man means nothing, women have won “The Battle of the Sexes” completely.

And they know it.

Men have got to start saying “no” again.

To Johnny Weir, to politically correct groups, to women, and to each other.

Take back the power of “NO.”

NY Times: Cultural Signals Missed in Amy Bishop Case

Welmer · 25 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for the NY Times, Sam Tanenhaus suggests that art has failed to keep pace with the rising tide of female power and violence. According to Tanenhaus, American artists have usually had a good sense of the direction society was moving, and have produced faithful representations of their contemporary times:

> [...] the Jazz Age is better known through the fiction of F. Scott Fitzgerald, who captured its energies in real time, than through any number of retrospective studies. And the alienated teenager, that fixture of modern American life, didn't fully exist until J. D. Salinger, with his faultless ear and attentive eye, coaxed him into being.
> But every now and then, it seems, a gap is exposed. Events occur; art offers no guidance. The powers of imagination and attunement falter. Artists suffer a collective loss of awareness. "The culture" emits signals, but they are picked up only fitfully or are missed altogether.

He writes that today is one of those times of artistic failure, and skates dangerously close to the edge of truth in the following passage:

> But the landscape of unprovoked but premeditated female violence remains strangely unexplored. Women who kill are "relegated to an 'exceptional case' status that rests upon some exceptional, or untoward killing circumstance: the battered wife who kills her abusive husband; the postpartum psychotic mother who kills her newborn infant," Candice Skrapec, a professor of criminology, noted in "The Female Serial Killer," an essay included in the anthology "Moving Targets: Women, Murder and Representation" (1994).
> Ms. Skrapec was writing at a time when Hollywood seemed preoccupied with women who commit crimes — in productions like "The Burning Bed," the 1984 television film in which a battered wife finally sets her sleeping husband aflame, and "Thelma & Louise" (1991), in which a pair of women go on a outlaw spree after one of them is threatened with rape.
> Both are essentially exculpatory parables of empowerment, anchored in feminist ideology. Their heroines originate as victims, pushed to criminal excesses by injustices done to them. The true aggressors are the men who mistreat and objectify them. So too with "Monster" (2003), in which Charlize Theron, in a virtuosic instance of empathy (and cosmetic makeover) re-enacted the story of Aileen Wuornos, a real-life prostitute who, after years of sexual abuse, began murdering her clients.

A few writers at the NY Times are beginning to show signs of breaking out of this "feminist ideology." Tanenhaus, in exploring the possibility that female empowerment has led to the rise of female violence and criminality over the last decade or so, is exposing the fact that feminist rhetoric is dated and out of touch with contemporary reality.

Expanding on Ezra Pound's assertion that artists are the "antennae" of culture and society, he writes that, for many of our artists, their antennae have grown rusty, or simply aren't working. That we could read appeals from Jessica Valenti for the poor, oppressed American women – those eternal victims of the patriarchy – even as the blasts of Dr. Amy Bishop's gun echoed through the halls of the University of Alabama actually suggests something more sinister.

It isn't a mere oversight to inaccurately depict society, after all, when objective reality flatly contradicts feminist discourse. Rather, it is a deliberate attempt to shore up the very power that has led to atrocities, both large and small, carried out by those with more political and social power in the United States.

Tanenhaus takes a step in the right direction by airing this discrepancy, and demonstrates that his own antennae are in good shape. However, I suspect that the real trick in keeping them that way lies only in the ability to fire up the browser and navigate to some of the sites that are spearheading this social revelation.

Potiphar's Wife: False Rape Accuser of the Bible

Welmer · 25 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the spirit of the current discussions on religion and and false accusations, I thought I'd bring the two together by introducing the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, found in Genesis. Joseph was a Hebrew who was sold into captivity and eventually purchased by Potiphar, but due to ability and perseverance rose to become the head of his master's household.

Potiphar's wife took a fancy to the young and virile Joseph, and set out to seduce him. Being a loyal servant to his kind and trusting master, Joseph resisted her, but she took hold of his cloak, forcing him to flee. Angry, and left with nothing but Joseph's cloak in her hand, Potipher hatched a plot to accuse him of attempted rape.

Here is the account given in Genesis 39:

> When Joseph was taken down to Egypt, a certain Egyptian (Potiphar, a courtier of Pharaoh and his chief steward) bought him from the Ishmaelites who had brought him there.
> But since the LORD was with him, Joseph got on very well and was assigned to the household of his Egyptian master.
> When his master saw that the LORD was with him and brought him success in whatever he did, > he took a liking to Joseph and made him his personal attendant; he put him in charge of his household and entrusted to him all his possessions.
> From the moment that he put him in charge of his household and all his possessions, the LORD blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; in fact, the LORD'S blessing was on everything he owned, both inside the house and out.
> Having left everything he owned in Joseph's charge, he gave no thought, with Joseph there, to anything but the food he ate. Now Joseph was strikingly handsome in countenance and body.
> After a time, his master's wife began to look fondly at him and said, "Lie with me."
> 8
> But he refused. "As long as I am here," he told her, "my master does not concern himself with anything in the house, but has entrusted to me all he owns.
> He wields no more authority in this house than I do, and he has withheld from me nothing but yourself, since you are his wife. How, then, could I commit so great a wrong and thus stand condemned before God?"
> 10
> Although she tried to entice him day after day, he would not agree to lie beside her, or even stay near her.
> 11
> One such day, when Joseph came into the house to do his work, and none of the household servants were then in the house, > 12
> she laid hold of him by his cloak, saying, "Lie with me!" But leaving the cloak in her hand, he got away from her and ran outside.
> 13

> When she saw that he had left his cloak in her hand as he fled outside, > 14
> she screamed for her household servants and told them, “Look! my husband has brought in a Hebrew slave to make sport of us! He came in here to lie with me, but I cried out as loud as I could.
> 15
> When he heard me scream for help, he left his cloak beside me and ran away outside.”
> 16
> She kept the cloak with her until his master came home.
> 17
> Then she told him the same story: “The Hebrew slave whom you brought here broke in on me, to make sport of me.
> 18
> But when I screamed for help, he left his cloak beside me and fled outside.”
> 19
> As soon as the master heard his wife’s story about how his slave had treated her, he became enraged.
> 20
> He seized Joseph and threw him into the jail where the royal prisoners were confined. But even while he was in prison, > 21
> the LORD remained with Joseph; he showed him kindness by making the chief jailer well-disposed toward him.
> 22
> The chief jailer put Joseph in charge of all the prisoners in the jail, and everything that had to be done there was done under his management.
> 23
> The chief jailer did not concern himself with anything at all that was in Joseph’s charge, since the LORD was with him and brought success to all he did.

As I have grown older, I’ve come to realize that we ignore ancient wisdom at our peril. The Bible, the Greek and Roman classics, the Chinese classics, and many other great works of wisdom are available to us to clearly show that for all our “progress” human nature has changed very little.

We educate our children only in “modern” disciplines, and in so doing them we cripple their judgment and deprive them of some of vitally important lessons. Sometimes, I think movements such as feminism are born out of ignorance more than anything else, and a stupidity that can only arise from a lack of real education and understanding of the world.

"Anti-theist" Angie is live-tweeting her abortion, and is being applauded by Jessica Valenti and her crew for doing so. Although I'm not in favor of using legal pressure to end abortion (I think law got us into our fix in the first place), I have to admit that it would be nice to see these snuff films disappear. When women have control of the mic, anything's fair game, including the elimination of their own children.

Angie looks like a $20 whore to me. I don't know what she expects to get out of this awful display. Perhaps she thinks the feminists who are cheering her on will kick a few bucks her way for using abortifacients. Of course, this won't happen. To feminists like Jessica Valenti, she's just a useful idiot, and the activist women with the big money in their purses wouldn't dare associate themselves with something so banal — they prefer doing it from a distance, hence the support for RAWA and other third world female brutality.

Watch single mother Angie tell the world how abortion is so much easier and more rewarding than being a mother:

This is the perfect representation of the American woman. A woman who publicly celebrates poisoning the children in her womb. And they call men dangerous!

I wonder how her son will feel about his mother's eagerness to eliminate inconvenient children.

If anything, this proves that the Christians who oppose abortion are absolute idiots for the most part. They kill abortion doctors and call the women – who make the ultimate choice – "victims." If you believe abortion is murder, then why is the person who takes out the contract any less guilty than the hitman?

Wheels of Justice Beginning to Turn

Welmer · 25 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Biurny Peguero Gonzalez, a single mother who has admitted to lying in court to convict an innocent man of rape was sentenced to 1-3 years in prison by Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles Solomon, who has apparently decided to live up to his name. Gonzalez originally lied to placate her friends, who were upset that she had ditched them to accept a ride from her victim, William McCaffrey.

After Mr. McCaffrey had already served four years of his sentence, exculpatory evidence came to light, and Gonzalez, under pressure from her priest, recanted. She will be eligible for parole in under a year, less than a quarter of the time McCaffrey spent in prison. However, her sentence is exceptional in that most women who lie to put men behind bars are never inconvenienced at all.

Having a man falsely imprisoned is an act of violence. It is worse than all but the most egregious domestic violence in that it not only deprives a man of freedom for an extended period – sometimes for life – but ruins his reputation as well. When people make generalizations about which sex is more violent and prone to do harm, they tend to ignore the willingness of a significant minority of women to destroy the lives of innocent men. This fraction may even be higher than the proportion of men who are violent criminals. It is exaggerated by a lack of accountability, highlighted by Crystal Mangum's false accusation of the Duke Lacrosse players, for which she faced no penalty at all.

Only justice can prevent false accusations and, for once, it appears that it has been done in such a case.

Canadian Women Hockey Players Get Drunk, Chomp Cigars on the Ice

Welmer · 26 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a show of poor sportsmanship, the Canadian women's hockey team, gold medals around their necks, swilled Canadian lager and puffed Cuban cigars for their post-game photo op. Later, some were seen sprawled drunkenly on the ice. The IOC is not amused, and has taken steps to investigate the team for what, to most of the rest of the world, was a rather tasteless display.

For some reason, despite the "liberated" spirit of the players, women's ice hockey is not as popular as women's figure skating among women, for whom it has about the same appeal that men's figure skating does for most men.

ESPN's Tony Kornheiser Suspended for Criticizing Awful Cougar Outfit

Welmer · 26 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Tony Kornheiser, an ESPN sports reporter, deeply offended his colleague Hannah Storm by dissing her outfit on his radio show a few days ago. For this he was suspended, but what really ought to be asked is why Storm's stylist wasn't suspended instead. The outfit really is awful, and although Kornheiser's statement may have offended Hannah, it couldn't have been any worse than the offense her unfortunate viewers were subjected to.

Kornheiser's remarks, quoted below, were actually pretty funny:

> "Hannah Storm in a horrifying, horrifying outfit today. She's got on red go-go boots and a catholic school plaid skirt … way too short for somebody in her 40s or maybe early 50s by now." [She's 47.] "She's got on her typically very, very tight shirt. She looks like she has sausage casing wrapping around her upper body … I know she's very good, and I'm not supposed to be critical of ESPN people, so I won't … but Hannah Storm … come on now! Stop! What are you doing? … She's what I would call a Holden Caulfield fantasy at this point."

Feminists are predictably outraged, but what was "sexist" or "misogynist" about what he said? All he did was suggest that she looked bad in a particular outfit. Women criticize each other's clothing all the time.

These days, "sexism" is pretty much anything women don't like to hear from men. What a joke.

Sally Quinn has been writing a column called "The Party" for the Washington Post for some time, but she's been kicked off the print version due to certain indiscretions. Quinn thought it would be a good idea to air her family's dirty laundry in the newspaper, and use her column as a platform to explain away what looks like a dirty trick she played on her step-granddaughter. The article is terribly boring, and I don't have any idea why your average reader would care one whit about her private drama, but Sally seemed to think it was worth throwing up. I really can't believe the editors let this one get through. Maybe everyone involved was drunk.

Here's an excerpt from the column:

> Our son Quinn Bradlee is marrying Pary Williamson in Washington on April 10. My husband's granddaughter Greta Bradlee is getting married the same day in California. In the past few days there have been a spate of negative stories, both online and in print, about the "dueling weddings." It's been hurtful to all four of these wonderful young people. This "dueling" characterization couldn't be further from the truth.
> The unfortunate result of the dates being the same was an inadvertent mistake on my part. My error had nothing to do with the two couples who will wed that day.
> Quinn and Pary decided on Oct. 10, 2010, as their wedding date. Over Christmas, Greta's mother and I came to an understanding that, because of existing tensions, it would be best for all if none of us attended Greta's wedding. Then, in mid-January, we were thrilled to learn that Pary is pregnant, due Sept. 21, and decided to move up the date as quickly as possible.
> Unfortunately, our church does not do weddings during Lent or Easter. The only date we could arrive on when both church and minister were available was April 10, and the next wasn't until after Memorial Day.

This is in a national newspaper? I'm shaking my head. This belongs on a blog that nobody reads, but is being projected far and wide.

When we talk about the feminization of certain professions, this is what we mean. This kind of irrelevant fluff is as responsible for killing major publications off as the internet. I've never had much pity for newspapers' failures, but every time I see this junk I actually feel optimistic about their demise. Could it be any worse?

Naturally, the others involved expressed outrage, and Quinn was disciplined by being demoted to online only. Why didn't they just fire her outright? Any man who made such a boner would get the axe for sure.

In the distant past, it was commonly thought that women were naturally more modest than men, and had more of a sense of shame. However, I can't think of one single period in the history of the entire world when men behaved with such shameless indiscretion and were so eager to air the personal in public as our women are today.

Just goes to show how wrong we were about women.

Major Drama in US Armed Forces as Women Take on Combat Roles

Welmer · 27 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing in the NY Times, Steven Myers examines the rising tide of sexual harassment and rape complaints made by female soldiers serving in combat zones. Evidently, many of the problems occur when women choose to break up with their boyfriends. One such woman, Captain Margaret White, was engaged in a tryst with a married man at Taji, a base in Iraq, and then decided he had become "creepy." When he attempted to win her back, she became "afraid" and later complained that he had forced her to have sex, and sometimes waited for her for a long time at various spots around the base.

Ms. White eventually obtained the military version of a no-contact order, but expressed frustration about the fact that she might face recrimination. According to the military, only 10% of sexual harassment incidents are reported. However, if sexual harassment is as loosely defined as it is in the civilian world, that is not saying much. For example, the article reports one female soldier, Specialist Erica Beck, based in Diyala, as claiming that a soldier harassed her by expressing, apparently on one occasion, interest in her. In all likelihood, the proposition came from a beta male soldier.

In another incident, a female soldier reported sexual harassment, only to find herself drummed out of the army for adultery:

> When Sgt. Tracey R. Phillips told a superior about an unwanted sexual advance from a private the night their unit arrived in Iraq in May, the accusations unleashed a flurry of charges and countercharges, an initial investigation of her on charges of adultery, a crime in the military justice system, and, according to her account, violations by her commanders of the new procedures meant to ease reporting of abuse.
> In the end, she was kicked out of Iraq and the Army itself, while the private remained on duty here.
> The military disputed her account but declined to state the reasons for sending her out of Iraq. Her paperwork showed that she received an honorable discharge, though with "serious misconduct" cited as the reason. The so-called misconduct, she said, stemmed from the Army's allegation that she had had an inappropriate relationship with the private she accused. She denied that.

These kinds of "injustices," where females soldiers do not always have their sexual preferences and behavioral choices enforced the the military, have led some politicians to bring up the issue of our poor, beleagured ladies in uniform.

According to California Representative Jane Harman, "A woman in the military is more likely to be raped by a fellow soldier than killed by enemy fire in Iraq." This statement has been trumpeted by feminist media outlets as proof that the US Military has a crisis on its hands, but it actually reflects the tiny proportion of combat deaths suffered by women.

If the problem is that men simply can't be trusted to behave themselves around women in a combat zone, perhaps women really do not belong in combat. Or, on the other hand, men do not belong in combat. To settle the matter, all men should be withdrawn from combat zones, and the women should be left on their own to handle war.

Just like Jane Harman, I'm sure the enemy will be much nicer to them than our nasty boys in uniform.

Stopping Male Genital Mutilation

Jay Hammers · 27 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I'm circumcised and fortunate not to have had any serious lasting complications from it. Of course, like many other males lacking their foreskin I have reduced sexual sensitivity and if my Johnson gets in a pickle he's more likely to end up chafed.

However, those are the least of the negative effects resulting from cutting off protective, nerve-rich flesh from one's genitals. Complications and even death can result during circumcision surgery. Some of these complications can cause problems into adulthood, even resulting in painful – and smaller – erections.

If I father a boy he won't be circumcised. There is no medical reason for routine circumcision of baby boys. Circumcision creates new risks, it does not prevent HIV or other diseases, and cleaning the foreskin is easy. I'm not going to circumcise my son for the sake of some American trollops who have been led to believe a mutilated penis is more aesthetically pleasing than a natural one. Would you circumcise your son so that when he's older he can "last longer" for selfish little girls produced by the feminized Western world?

I received an e-mail from Intact America, an anti-circumcision organization whose mailing list subscribe to:

> On March 2, the Massachusetts State Senate will consider the Male Genital Mutilation Bill, legislation that would outlaw the genital mutilation of both young girls AND boys in Massachusetts.
> We urgently need your help to show Massachusetts legislators why passing this bill is the right thing to do.
> Submit your own personal story about why you oppose circumcision before March 2 – and we'll make sure your testimony is heard by the Massachusetts State Senate Joint Committee.

I would urge you to consider sharing your own story to help stop this barbaric practice. Massachusetts could set a precedent for the rest of the United States to follow.

A Word From the Big Head About the Little Head

Dr. Paul · 28 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Ladies,

In a woman's world, half-baked complaints about men get passed around like joints at an early 70's Zeppelin concert. Most of them have the same result in the cognitive realm. Pot makes you stupid. Misandry makes you stupid and chronically angry.

But there was actually one of those complaints that was rooted in some truth, and now I'd like to share that with the red-eyed, pissed off lot of you.

Men think with their dicks.

True dat.

When it comes to women we are just wired that way. When we meet you, we size up your body part of choice first and then check our the rest of the terrain as a follow up. We wonder if you swallow before we want to know your last name. If you are not what we want sexually speaking, we make some small talk, but start figuring on an escape route even as we nod and smile to whatever it is you are saying. If we are attracted to you, then in one way or another, everything we say or do is geared to matters horizontal.

It is just the way we are. Take it up with God or Darwin as you please, but don't whine about it. It's never going to change. And it doesn't make us defective. Truth is, you would not be reading this if things were not just as they are because homo sapiens would have just been another evolutional dead end. And truth tell, it lands us men in a lot more trouble than it ever brought on you. So if you are looking for sympathy about it, inquire elsewhere.

Actually, rather than being cranky, you should be thankful. If men thought with anything other than their dicks, 98% of them wouldn't give you the time of day. I mean, why would any man pay any attention to you at all were it not for the prospect of boning you? What, your personality? Your companionship; sharing interests?

Please.

Let's just get real here, ladies. Think of every time a man has ever bought you dinner, flowers, candy, jewelry, taken you on vacation, paid your bills, carried your crap, repaired your car or fixed any of those other thingy's in your life with moving parts that seem to escape your grasp. Now take your pussy out of the equation. You can kiss it all goodbye. If you think that isn't true you are seriously deceiving yourself.

And let's get even more real. You, of course, already know all this don't, you?

That is why you spend billions collectively on cosmetics, alluring clothing, fake tits and the like. And before you come across with some tired old "I do those things for me," bullshit line, just stop. Save that for your girlfriends. They need their delusions reinforced much more than I need my intelligence insulted.

See, here is the problem. Men thinking with their dicks and you playing on that to get ahead has always been a really good deal for you. I mean, c'mon, surely you can see that biology has dealt you the get-out-of-jail-and-everything-else-free card, platinum edition. Just use it with some measure of dignity and it will be passed down to your daughters and their daughters, forever and ever halleluiah.

You should seriously think about the long term impact of a meme that shames men's natural inclinations, even as you exploit them. In fact you can already see the result.

Numbers of men, and I mean growing numbers, have been so barraged with the message that they have started listening to it. Many of us have started thinking, and have concluded, "Man, they're right, I do think with my dick."

Ladies, that is not good news for you. Because the day men stop thinking with their dicks, you are truly fucked.

So my suggestion to you is this. One, smarten up enough to know a good thing when you see it. And two, use the thing you are most gifted at, self interest, and see this realistically.

I have already covered the material and free labor incentives for embracing the natural state of things. But there is another benefit you probably never considered.

It can help keep you from being so psychotic.

Like so many of the things you like to bash men for, it requires you to embrace two diametrically opposed sets of beliefs at the same time. When you are lamenting men who think with their dicks, yet continue parasitic use of them, you just end up in a hostile-dependant mindset that will always keep you in conflict.

It may appear that as a woman you can change beliefs to suit situations as easily as a man can change crank baits in a bass boat, but the resultant craziness is unavoidable, and so is the ensuing state of permanent dissatisfaction.

You can't depend on something you hate and ever be happy or completely sane. That is just as hard wired as a man's sexuality. So you only have three options here.

First, stay crazy and unhappy That will be the choice for almost all of you, which pretty much explains why modern femininity is better explained as a mental disorder than an adaptive aspect of evolution.

Two, drop the dependency. Fat chance.

Or last, drop the hate. I have a sneaking suspicion that the number of women who drop the hate will somehow have a positive correlation to the number of men who start telling women to find their purse if they want to go out to dinner, even if it means, god forbid, doing a little thinking with the big head.

Manliness is Love

Jack Donovan · 28 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of people have a hard time defining manliness and masculinity.

In fact, some people insist that because it doesn't always mean exactly the same thing, masculinity doesn't mean anything at all. They pillory words like manhood, manliness, manly and masculine by locking them up in quotation marks where they are to be mocked, scrutinized and castrated.

This is a political position, and it's a fundamentally dishonest one. I don't believe for a second that men and women who say masculinity can mean anything—or nothing—are really, honestly at a complete loss when it comes to sensing manliness in men. They can distinguish a manly man from an unmanly man as well as the rest of us, but they dislike the unfriendly, unequal implications of doing so. Some of these people have probably had negative experiences with sensing manliness. Manliness can be frightening, aggressive, impressive, off-putting, threatening, belittling and envy-producing.

Men who are regarded as being manly are usually at a loss for words to describe exactly what makes them different from others. Even those of us who think and write about the concept of masculinity on a regular basis are unable to nail it down in precise terms. If manliness was a disease—and our society often treats it like one—we would identify it by describing its symptoms. We quickly reach for examples and stories to give it a certain shape. We make lists of traits, but we acknowledge that it is sometimes this and sometimes that and almost never the other thing—except in certain situations handled a certain way. Manliness doesn't lend itself to exact scientific measurement. I suppose a man could measure his manhood, but while we may joke about it I don't know many men who honestly believe that manhood can be measured in inches. There is no Guinness World Record for the manliest man. Men could collectively come up with a list of contenders, and the most popular picks would have a lot in common. But no one man can ever really hold that title. Manliness is a phenomenon, a quality or a collection of qualities and while we can't quite measure it, we know some guys are dealt a weak hand and others have manliness in spades. We can't describe it exactly, but we know it when we see it. Or hear about it. Or feel it.

Masculinity is something we can recognize on television and in the movies but in real life it is something we sense, something we feel. When a man is strong with The Force his masculinity almost has a physical presence to it.

The experience of recognizing masculinity is a little different for everyone. It depends on who you are, and whose masculinity is being recognized. But there is enough crossover to make some sort of universal understanding of this phenomenon possible. We all know masculinity, it touches all of our lives, and in some way or another we are all in its thrall. To know manliness is to be human.

We agree that we can sense and feel things which we cannot measure all of the time. Without doing so, we could not have poetry or literature.

We know what we mean when we say something is beautiful, but what is beauty? A sunset? A symphony? A sportscar? There are equations and commonalities and disagreements but I don't know anyone who can't appreciate the beauty of a mountain or the ocean or a waterfall. These things evoke stronger responses in some than others, but we set aside viewpoints and send postcards for a reason. We know what it is to experience beauty, to be in its presence. Like manliness, what we perceive to be beautiful probably has a root in our hard-wired collective history.

Fresh water good. Waterfall good. Drink water. Waterfall beautiful.

Young healthy woman make good baby. Less cooties. Firm flesh. Tight vagina. Sex feels good. Young healthy looking woman beautiful.

And that last little vulgarity brings me to the subject of love.

Isn't love also something that touches all of our lives, that holds all of us in its thrall in some way, that we all experience differently but also something that we universally understand? Isn't love also something we have trouble talking about and describing definitively? Isn't love something we treat a little bit like a mysterious disease with familiar symptoms? Something we can't measure, but we can recognize. We can distinguish great love from weak love. And while there are no Guinness World Records for loving the most, some people probably love a little too much. To know love is to be human.

Manliness is a lot like love and beauty and all of those other damned messy complicated parts of the human experience. It is so powerful and at the same time a little bit mysterious. Perhaps it is powerful in part because it is so difficult to put into a tidy little box. But we feel it, we sense it, we experience it as a natural reaction to the natural differences between us and the advantages—or disadvantages—they bring with them.

Manly man strong, tough, get stuff done, hunt big game, make good war, hard to hurt, take control when others afraid.

Manliness good.

Manliness is love.

Is This Really What Men Want?

Jay Hammers · 1 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

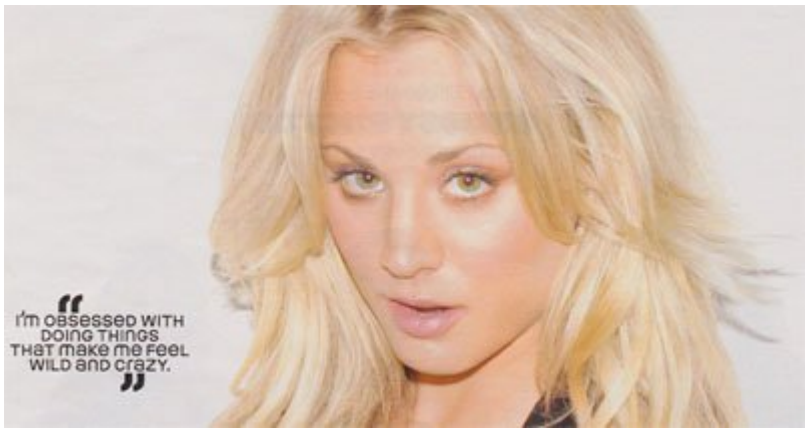
The March 2010 Maxim cover: Is this what men want? Really?

Do men want a saggy-lipped, droopy-eyed, floppy-boobed bimbo like this?

Kaley Cuoco looked much better on the sitcom, The Big Bang Theory, where several super nerds worship the ground she walks on for no other reason than her perky breasts, ample makeup, supple flesh, and propensity for exposing said flesh as much as possible.

Here's an example of her portrayal on the show:

Contrast this photo with the Maxim cover and you'll notice a key difference: makeup. Why Maxim didn't apply more makeup to this Courtney Love lookalike I'll never know. As it is, her photos in Maxim are rather unpalatable, at least to me.



Ms. Kaley plays Penny, a young blonde who somehow manages to pay for her own apartment on a waitress's salary whilst four graduate and doctoral students have to share an apartment across the hall. Penny is a caricature of modern Feminist Woman: dimwitted, slutty, shallow, begging for attention and entitlements, prevailing due to the support and undeserved subservience of beta males.

Ms. Kaley apparently does not have to stretch her acting "skills" very much to play Penny. I know the only reason Maxim articles exist in conjunction with photo shoots is to allow beta males the opportunity to feel they are bonding with what they perceive to be a "bombshell", but let's examine a few quotes from the Maxim article anyhow.

> Maxim: Does being a bad driver mean you've been in a lot of accidents?
> Ms. Kaley: I've had so many, I can't event count. Just yesterday I was driving along, and all of a sudden I hear this loud sound. I was like, "Oh, my God! What was that?" I totally knocked someone's mirror off their van.
> Maxim: Whoops.
> Ms. Kaley: I did leave a note – I was very proud of myself. It said, "Hi! Sorry! Broke your mirror! Call this number…"
> Maxim: You gave them your number?
> Ms. Kaley: Ha, well, it was my lawyer's number. Another time I was driving a Vespa in the Dominican republic with my Big Bang cast mate Johnny Galecki on the back like a little bitch. I ran us right into the wall, and he went flying. I almost killed Johnny Galecki. I'm dead serious.

Men's car insurance rates skyrocket while dizzy blondes like Ms. Kaley parade around callously, nearly killing the poor emasculated schmucks they associate with. Fact: Women have more accidents per mile driven than men.

> Maxim: Do you prefer dating older guys?
> Ms. Kaley: I've always dated older guys. I still do – I'm very attracted to older men, never anyone my age. I always felt, even in my teens, that guys my age were just so dumb, young, and immature. Guys are just a little behind girls.

Because guys, unlike Kaley with her propensity for running into parked vehicles and solid walls, are SO immature.

> Maxim: Have you ever had an unrequited crush?
> Ms. Kaley: I'm sorry, but I usually get what I want. When I go for something, there's nothing that stops me. Nothing.

Sorry Ms. Kaley, but I'd stop you. I can do better.

> Ms. Kaley: There was one extra who was kind of eyeing me, and Johnny was like, "We have to have him removed!" I'm like, "What's wrong with him looking at me?"

As you can see, her fellow cast members are classic beta male "protectors".

> Ms. Kaley: I went to American Apparel and bought hot pink shorts, a teeny-tiny hot pink tank top, pink knee socks, hot pink Converse, and a headband. I haven't lost a game [of Ping-Pong] since I put that outfit on. I've got my boobs hanging out and legs showing. The guys cannot even concentrate.

Classy. At least she understands where her worth lies.

I just hope more guys see through the cosmetics girls like Ms. Kaley hide behind. I hope guys realize that feigned beauty ain't everything, that flakiness is not appealing, that taking advantage of pervasive women's privilege is not independence.

And that women like Ms. Kaley are worthy only of scorn and aversion.

Alternative Right Interview

Welmer · 2 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In addition to The Spearhead, Jack Donovan is going to be writing for a web startup called Alternative Right, which is the brainchild of former Takimag editor Richard Spencer. Jack will be contributing mainly to the "Virtus" department. I've had some correspondence with Mr. Spencer, and I appreciate his efforts to shift the political paradigm, which both of us believe to be somewhat outdated. Although I'm essentially a Libertarian (and, above all, a cynic when it comes to government), I have no problem with people on the left or right who respect people's right to live life as they choose.

To start things out, Jack suggested an interview, and of course I obliged. It's about what it means to be a father today, and I responded with a little more candor than usual, since this is a subject that is near and dear to me.

So head on over and take a look at the interview, and those of you on the right side of the political spectrum may find a new online emporium of ideas:

Harvard Business Review: Women Held Back by Bad (Women) Bosses

Welmer · 2 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A reader forwarded me an article in the Harvard Business Review that bemoans the lack of women at the top of the corporate hierarchy. This complaint is nothing new, and it shouldn't be in the least surprising that Harvard is as dedicated as any other American university to propping up female status above other, less important goals such as, say, productivity, profit and international competitiveness.

However, the article inadvertently reveals that one of the main reasons women with MBAs aren't getting ahead despite the best efforts of Harvard et al is other women — female bosses in particular.

According to HBR, it isn't that men necessarily get more opportunities from the get-go, but rather that they tend to advance faster. And the faster advancement of men is tied to early career success, which is largely dependent upon one's relationship with the manager:

> Can we attribute men's disproportionate advancement to early managerial assignments? No. Although it's true that people who have managed others reached higher levels, the women and men in our study were equally likely at every career stage to have had direct reports.
> We think that gender difference in advancement may reflect another problem altogether: bad first bosses.
> And so we circle back to those fate-sealing first jobs. A quarter of the women in our study left their first job because of a difficult manager—nearly as many as those who moved on for more money (26%) or for a career change (27%). Only 16% of the men left because of a difficult manager. Of course, these results suggest that women and men may be treated differently by their first managers.

But who are these early managers? Well, it turns out that they are, more likely than not, other women!

As the graphs in the article demonstrate, more women with MBAs are in management than men, who are more likely to be in executive positions than women. So in that fateful first job our young, female MBA grad gets, she's more likely to be under the supervision of a female than male manager, and, according to Harvard, that manager is the biggest obstacle to her success.

So, if women's main obstacle to advancement is other women, then how to solve the problem with an acceptable feminist outcome? This article is valuable in that it reveals exactly the wall that feminism is about to crash right into.

Preparing to Change Machines

Welmer · 3 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been backing up my old files and programs in preparation for the transfer to the new machine, which ~~should arrive soon~~ just got here! I'm afraid it might be a little tricky to make the change from Tiger to Snow Leopard, and I'll probably lose some applications, so I think I'm going to make a partition so I can run the old 10.4 on the new machine. Needless to say, this has cut into my writing time, but when I get everything put back together it will be a lot easier to work with the desktop's bigger screen, and should substantially improve productivity (no more working with windows piled on top of each other).

BTW, does anyone know whether Adobe programs will work if opened on another machine from a bootable hard drive, or do they have to be reinstalled?

Canada Conservatives to Neuter National Anthem

Welmer · 4 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Conservative" Canadian politicians have proposed changing the Canadian national anthem to make it more "gender-neutral." Evidently, the lyrics "true patriot love in all thy sons command" are offensive and sexist to some people (probably feminist academics). It has been suggested that they be changed to "True patriot love thou dost in us command."

Perhaps, given the extent to which Canada has been feminized (some suggest even more than the United States), this would be appropriate, but given the true scope of feminist changes made to society, perhaps this is not going far enough.

It might be more appropriate to change the line to "true sacklessness in all thy sons command."

Feminist Icons Starting to Crack

Welmer · 4 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Australian playwright Louis Nowra has come out on the offensive against fellow Aussie Germaine Greer, dismissing her notions of the true nature of women as fantasy. 40 years after Greer launched her feminist career with The Female Eunuch, Nowra has published a scathing critique in The Monthly, an Australian society magazine (requires registration, so for more quotes see this article).

Nowra's criticism is mainly directed at Greer's first book, which he describes as having utterly failed to predict how women would respond to women's lib. Having grown up with an angry, frustrated and thrice-married mother, Nowra was initially supportive of the book. He writes that it convinced his mother to divorce his stepfather:

> But my mother was the main reason I read feminist works. My father, a truck driver, was her second husband. An intelligent woman, she felt frustrated at living on a Housing Commission estate and her dissatisfaction showed itself in her volatile emotional states that ranged from vociferous anger to inarticulate fury at her predicament. From a young age, I knew she should never have married and had children. In my naive way, I hoped that feminism would change the world enough to enable women like my mother to find satisfaction in careers rather than marriage and childrearing.
> Greer's chapters were short and the one about women's isolation in their homes and their monotonous and thankless work was particularly powerful. It changed many a woman's life dramatically. A journalist friend gave it to her mother, who after reading it left her husband. There were countless similar stories.

Over time, Nowra grew increasingly "disenchanted" with Greer's book, and finally, as a grown man who beat the odds and managed to thrive despite being raised by a volatile single mother, he has come out firmly against it.

As more and more men who grew up victimized by feminist ideology find their voice, feminist excesses will come under increasing scrutiny. It remains to be seen how this will play out politically, but the dam is starting to leak.

Levi Johnston: 19 Years Old and Over $20k In Arrears

Welmer · 4 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a crystal clear illustration of why conservatives are not to be relied on to do anything ease men's pain, the Palins have demanded and received an order for back child support for over $21,000 for the last year. Johnston is now facing a monthly child support bill of nearly $2,000 for one child in addition to the hefty arrears.

While Bristol Palin lives with her millionaire mother, Johnston's mother is under house arrest for dealing prescription drugs. Johnston's family support is negligible.

Levi Johnston is no hero, but he's a kid, and has little hope of maintaining the kind of income that justifies such an exorbitant child support order. Some have suggested that he may have work in pornography to pay the bills. Unfortunately, that's probably the only job he's qualified for that might pay around $100k per year.

Johnston is probably far from wealthy right now, and if he pays the rest of the order almost certainly will be close to tapped out after legal fees. If he isn't careful or lucky, his arrears might build to a level that he cannot hope to repay any time soon, crippling him for his young adult life.

Conservatives commenting on blogs and websites have little pity for Levi, laying all the blame for the pregnancy on him, as though he raped Bristol. Sarah Palin, likely furious about Levi's public criticism, has access to top-flight attorneys and piles of money. She can bury this kid, and it appears that she has.

Whatever people may think of Levi, this court order doesn't bode well for any young men and boys in similar situations.

On a "Man" Finding His Inner Vagina

Chuck Ross · 4 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For American youth, which industry controls the spigots of information flow? Within this certain industry, which company holds most sway over cultural and social perceptions of same said youth? Unless you've been cryogenically frozen for the last 30 years and aren't a Dire Straits fan, you'll know that the answers – in order – are "the entertainment industry" and "MTV".

This post isn't a profound insight into MTV's scrap-metal mangling of youth culture. Rather, I want to point out the attitude of one particular cultural gate-keeper and expound briefly on how that affects boys and young men growing up today.

After a reading of Eve Ensler's new monologue "I Am an Emotional Creature", Jason Rzepka – who works in "social issues and entertainment" – had this to say:

> "She's an extremely remarkable person. The world needs more Eve Enslers…I found my inner vagina."

Perhaps Rzepka should speak to Caster Semenya about that affliction.

I googled Rzepka to learn more about the type of sack-loathing Herb who would be caught dead uttering such a phrase on the record. Turns out, Rzepka is VP of Public Affairs at MTV – which sounds like the type of job that could control propaganda and programming. I'm particularly troubled that a young man who holds an important position at MTV – and therefore in our culture – says things like this. In an overfeminized time when boys should be developing themselves as men, comments like Rzepka's tacitly encourage them to move more towards androgyny and outright femininity. If youthful minds are Playdough, MTV's cultural dictates are hands. Molding young peoples' minds as they do – and using the pink dough to boot – is especially detrimental to boys whose core identities aren't as malleable as girls'. The ideas that come out at the tail end of the boob tube have been hand-picked, distorted, filtered, and steam-pressed by minds like Rzepka's. Young men today are being shaped by an elitist group of other slightly less young men who continually worship at the alter of V.

Young men have no need to find an inner vagina; in fact, Ensler's current monologue or her famous one have no place for a man to find anything. Her writings are gynocentric – just read the fucking titles. If Rzepka found a vagina somewhere while at the reading, he should put it back because its not his.

But Rzepka's trite comment is troubling on a more fundamental level. Why is it that young men are made right, whole, or correct by developing their feminine side? They are fledgling men; the only tools they have are those of men. Their brains, their bodies, their attitudes, their hormones, desires, and motivations operate in a completely masculine realm. Anything they "find" has to occur based on a bedrock foundation of their being male.
So searching for their inner vagina is a snipe hunt; understanding the full scope of what it means to be a man – finding their descended nutsack – is a better endeavor.

> Chuck Ross had his inner vagina surgically removed by an ex-girlfriend and Dr. Roissy. As of this writing, the IV is still in remission. He blogs daily at Gucci Little Piggy.

A Tyrant on the High Seas

Welmer · 5 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As USS Cowpens – a guided missile cruiser with a 400 man crew – patrolled the seas in defense of the United States, all was not well on the ship. Sailors describe an atmosphere of abuse and intimidation, with foul invectives frequently hurled in their direction, along with solid objects, by the raging captain. One sailor, a strapping 6′4″ officer, describes shaking with fear in the presence of his superior. Others documented the incessant profanity and humiliation.

Who was this fire-breathing monster? A burly, bearded thug in uniform? No, it was a strong-jawed 1985 Naval Academy graduate named Holly Graf.

Graf was almost universally despised; her inclination to demean her subordinates was legendary. Some of her alleged abusive statements and actions are as follows:

> "Take your goddam attitude and shove it up your f_____ ass and leave it there," she allegedly told an officer during a stressful maneuver
> "This is one of the reasons I hate you," she allegedly told one who was seeking her help. When another officer visited her quarters to discuss an earlier heated discussion, her response was terse: "Get the f___ out of my stateroom." She allegedly told a male officer, "The only words I want to hear out of your mouth are 'Yes ma'am' or 'You're correct, ma'am.' " She also allegedly put a "well-respected master chief" in "time out" — standing in the ship's key control room doing nothing — "in front of other watch standers of all ranks."
> A younger woman recalled going to Graf to seek her help. " 'Don't come to me with your problems,' " she said, quoting Graf. " 'You're a f_____ department head.' " The officer also said that Graf once told her, "I can't express how mad you make me without getting violent."
> A second female officer told the IG that Graf was a "terrible role model for women in the Navy," alleging that Graf once told her and a fellow officer on the bridge, "You two are f_____ unbelievable. I would fire you if I could, but I can't."
> Paul Coco, a 2002 Naval Academy graduate, served as a gunnery officer under Graf aboard the destroyer U.S.S. Winston S. Churchill from 2002 to 2004. "She would throw coffee cups at officers — ceramic, not foam," he recalls, "spit in one officer's face, throw binders and paperwork at people, slam doors."

The litany of tyrannical acts goes on, concluding only when she is removed from command, upon which the crew – to a man – cheers vociferously.

How did someone so clearly unfit for command last so long, despite the profound dissatisfaction of her crew? The answer appears to be a Navy policy to push women into positions of leadership. Nicole Waybright, who served under Graf for a year of her five-year stint as a junior officer, says that the Navy was too hasty in its efforts to achieve gender equality:

> "She was a terrible ship handler," Waybright recalls. "I was 23 years old and I wanted to show, just by my actions, that women could do it and just blend in like the gray doors with the rest of the gray ship," she said. "But she betrayed our gender." Waybright felt the Navy pushed women into command too quickly at the time, but adds that Graf's "sadistic cruelty" didn't help.

Like Amy Bishop, Holly Graf's unstable behavior was overlooked because of gender. She was an equal opportunity bully, who pushed around both men and women alike and, according to subordinates, was physically violent toward them. To have someone with these tendencies in command of a billion-dollar warship might seem very unwise, but as in so many other institutions, the ideology of gender equality overrides all other concerns.

We are already starting to pay dearly for this foolishness, and the end is nowhere in sight.

“Catholics Come Home” Campaign Portraying Men as Abusers

Welmer · 5 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Is the Catholic Church trying to bring men back into the fold? If so, its latest campaign won’t help. Some of our readers may have seen the Catholics Come Home (catholicscomehome.org) commercials that have popped up on TV recently. I just saw one that didn’t leave me – a lapsed Catholic – feeling anything but pissed off. After a quick search I found it on Youtube, and thought I’d post it here to invite comments from Catholic and non-Catholic men alike.

Let me ask you: how do you feel about this kind of portrayal of men?

I’m beyond disappointed, but not really surprised.

Because blog comments appear to be disabled, perhaps our Catholic readers (and others if they object strongly to the abhorrent, one-sided portrayal of men), should contact the program director to communicate their thoughts (please be civil):

Domestic Violence Lobbyist Murders Her Husband

Hawaiian Libertarian · 5 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

EXTRA! EXTRA! READ ALL ABOUT IT!

This looks to be a story straight out of The Onion.

A 45-year-old woman, charged with ending a domestic dispute by killing her 26-year-old husband of five days, is a registered lobbyist for a group fighting domestic violence.

This feminazi cougar married a man 19 years her junior, got into an argument with him and killed him 5 days after saying "I do."

Arelisha Bridges was ordered held without bond in the Fulton County Jail. She is scheduled for a preliminary hearing later this month on charges of felony murder, murder, aggravated assault and possession of a firearm during the commission of a felony.

Officials said Bridges claimed she was unemployed. But records show she is a lobbyist for an organization called the National Declaration for Domestic Violence Order; its Web site says the group is pushing legislation to create a database of those convicted of sex crimes or domestic abuse.

If this group is successful in pushing through their agenda, I wonder if Mz. Bridges will be registered? Somehow I doubt it. In fact, it's an almost virtual certainty she'll be lawyering up and we are about to hear the sordid details of an abusive 5 day old marriage…probably involving "marital rape" and abusive behavior like pressuring her to wear white high heels during sex…but maybe they'll put her dead husband in this database, after all, the only reason an activist against domestic violence would murder her husband is if he were being abusive! After all, everybody knows that domestic violence is only committed by men!

Ahh….but we have witnesses…

Usually an accused felon will appear at a preliminary hearing a day later, but Bridges' hearing was within hours of the shooting death of Anthony Rankins. Officials said the court appearance was moved up because of the unusual circumstances around the crime.

Witnesses told police that Bridges was wearing a nightgown and a shower cap as she argued with Rankins on the sidewalk on North Avenue near West Peachtree Street around 10:45 p.m. Monday.

And moments later, witnesses said, they heard shots. They said she then "calmly walked away."

This cougar is a cold-blooded man killer…

A MARTA police officer stopped her as she was getting into her car, perhaps to return to her home nearby on Centennial Olympic Park Drive.

According to Atlanta police, Bridges told investigators that she and Rankins had been dating for a few months and were just married on Feb. 24.

I think it's safe to say, a 26 year old man marrying a 45 year old feminist activist was a relationship destined to end badly. Let's see if this story gains any kind of national prominence. It will be interesting to read and hear the spin on this from our feminist-driven mass-media matrix.

Women Engage In Double Standards Far More Then Men Do

Obsidian · 6 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday's discussion, along with other items in the news, has inspired me to write this post, about just how much Women engage in doubles standards all. The. Time.

This is an important topic, since it won't be long, if you're a guy, before you hear some lady bemoan stuff like "the sexual double standard" or "the income gap", a form of a double standard, and so on. And to be sure, both of these issues gets mad facetime and ink. Much, much less is said though, about the very real double standards in reverse, let alone Presidential attention. But fear not, for I have come to shed the searing Light of Truth on these and other pressing matters of the day, for once you know the Truth, it shall set you free.

So let's dive right in:

Female Double Standard #1: Women Objectify Men MORE Than Men Objectify Women. This is a fact, easily proofed by the most casual of observations. How? Simple: height. Women make no bones about not wanting to date a Man their own or shorter height. Take a quick spin around the Internet, there you will see Women being quite flippant, and others downright adamant, about rejecting out of hand a Man's lack of vertical cred. Of course, many of these very same Women will call any Man who judges a Woman's objective beauty scale to be "objectifying" and the like, and notice, have you ever heard Men en masse deny this? Even more to the point, isn't it true that Men settle much quicker than do Women, all things being equal? Then there's the reaction of many of these ladies when they're called out on the carpet for their blatant objectification of the Male form and rank discrimination based on physical factors one has no control over. Even when you freely acknowledge their right to choose whomever they want to be with they'll attempt to shame you by calling you names and the like. Yet these are the very same people who have no problem labeling others as racist, homophobe, fascist, etc. Pot, meet Kettle much? Of course, a Woman's desire for a taller Man hearkens back to our Evolutionary past, when choosing a Man based on his physical size was a reasonable thing to do; after all, somebody had to do the heavy lifting and if necessary, killing of potential enemies. But in an age where even a kid can pull the trigger of an AK47, and when much smaller wives kill their hubbies all the time, such a fixation is really kind of silly. Yet Women will vehemently defend their right to be basically, a bigot, and will engage in rank hypocrisy at the same time. The reason why I say that, you see, is because often these very same Women will poo poo Evolutionary Psychology as being inherently misogynistic. But as we can see here, they have no problem actually embracing with a big ole bear hug, EP when it suits them.

Hmm.

For more on this, please see anything in the current press about Lori Gottlieb, also my recent post on her and her book "Marry Him!"

Female Double Standard #2: Women Are Snobs Much More Than Are Men, AND, Don't Really Believe In Merit Either-We are often berated about this sort of thing by Women en masse, yet many of these very same Women have no problem looking down their noses at "lesser" Men for not coming from the "right" pedigree, or not having gone to the "right" school (or school at all), not being in the "right" social circles, and so on. As author and avowed lesbian Norah Vincent chronicles in her must-read book, Self Made Man, Men are much more inclusive than Women are, especially when it comes to merit-if you can do the job, you're in. Moreover, Men are more apt to create a system that's more "flat", that is to say, that is more amenable to Men or Women being able to move from one social class to another, based again on merit or at the very least, effort. Not so for Women, and this can be most vividly seen wrt Game — you wanna know the real reason why so many Women flail so wildly about on this issue?

Because Game gives Men the tools to move up through the social hierarchy that was once reserved only for the "natural Alphas" Women always desired; "how dare those poor schlubs step out of their place!" It rankles many Women deeply, in ways they themselves may only be dimly aware.

For more on this point, please see my post, Why Game Elicits So Much Hate.

Female Double Standard #3: “Reproductive Rights” Is About WOMEN, Not Men. And Women Want To Keep It That Way, with quite a few news items appearing before us involving this thorny issue, for example: the recent Pro-Life promotion efforts in the Black community, or the Woman who live Tweeted her abortion, or the Healthcare Bill that’s tied up with abortion-none of them addresses the very basic and simple premise: that it only deals with one half of the population. “Reproductive Rights” is taken to mean something that only Women can have. Men have no reproductive rights that any court is bound to respect.

This becomes deeply problematic because Women have successfully put forward the notion that dads are optional now. Indeed, many Women are becoming single mommies by choice, and not just among the Lori Gottlieb set. Have we forgotten the “pregnancy pact” girls in New England a few years back? As the book Promises I Can Keep clearly shows, poor Women want to be moms and are prepared to go it alone if need be. Of course, there is no Male equivalent to such a book, even when I asked its authors whether they had interviewed the baby daddies. They hemmed and hawed and finally had to admit, no, they didn’t. Hmm.

At any rate, the issue is clear: if a Woman has the right to determine when, and under what circumstances she is to become a parent, it is only right and just to say that the same should apply to Men. But, a quick perusal of some of the much staunch advocates for “Choice” on the Internet, will have no compunctions vociferously denying a Man’s right to choose, too. Here again, Women want the double standard to be removed when it impacts them negatively, but have no problems with it when it doesn’t. Like I said, hmm.

And don’t even get me started on Mandatory Paternity Testing…

Female Double Standard #4: Women Have No Desire To Financially Support A Man For ANY Reason-Here we get to the good part. While Women en masse are all for overturning archaic notions of gender and the like, when the rubber hits the road, they not only balk but are vehement in their refusal to Man Up. Case in point? Paying for dates. Regardless of the fact that Women now make up a clear majority of the American workforce and are more educated and higher earning than many Men, to say nothing of the effects of the Mancession, Women can still be heard trying to shame Men into paying for dates, or paying more for dates, or saying “I’m not gonna support a lout” and so on. Yet, when has any Man said such a thing, historically speaking? It was expected that not only was the Man to pay for the date(s), but he was also to support the wife for life. We all either saw firsthand, or have heard of the guy who, on payday, hands his check over to his betrothed. Well, Today’s Women say “screw that!” — they’re having none of it. They want the goodies of earning a higher income, but none of the responsibilities that come with such a high honor.

But wait Obsidian, I’m not like that, some of you ladies reading along may say. And indeed, some of you aren’t like that, my own personal life, present and at some points in the past, attests to this. And for this you are to be commended. Nevertheless, you know as well as I do, that there are easily twice or thrice as many Women out there, who take the view I outlined above, with no problem whatsoever engaging in double standards.

Research Question for the Fellas; listen closely, and please respond:

1. Of the past 10 Women you’ve dated or otherwise were romantically involved with, how many offered to pay for the 1st date, without you prompting them to do so?

2. How many of them paid, or offered to pay, for any dates during the life of your courtship?

3. When’s the last time a Woman called you up and asked you out on a night on the town — on her dime?

4. When’s the last time a Woman bought you a drink?

The responses, should be most interesting to read.

The bottomline here is that Men en masse, never seemed to have that much of a problem paying for dates and supporting their Women when it called for them to do so; after all, until relatively recently, Women weren’t as fully self-supporting in that regard. But now that the tables have turned, Women have made it quite clear that not only do they not have any desire to return the favor, but they also don't have any problem denigrating any Man who fails to measure up.

Yet another case of the Female Double Standard.

My job is done here.

Holla back

Men and Open Source

Welmer · 7 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last few days I've been building a new system, picking and choosing what I want to keep from my old machine and installing some new software. I don't have the disks for my old installation of Adobe CS3, so I can't run it on the new OS. This was annoying, but from personal experience and a "writing for the web" class I attended at the University of Washington (probably the most valuable class I ever took in school), I knew there would be a way around it. I've made use of Photoshop, but not even close to its full potential. I've wanted to see what I could do with InDesign, but I'm not producing any print magazines, and it's kind of overkill for what I have in mind. For most of my letterhead and pdf creation I've used LaTeX through the LyX interface. This was helpful for legal correspondence, as I could match opposing attorneys' letterhead with my own superior creations. Petty, I know, but small triumphs help sustain us through the absurdities of the American judicial system. When I have to open Word documents, I simply use Open Office, and for writing code or text to post online I prefer a text editor such as Bare Bones' BBEdit, which color codes tags and code and doesn't foul up the text with some proprietary encoding.

About half of the programs I've been using in desktop publishing are proprietary software, but I've found a substitute for every single one. This is great for me, because I can't afford to buy Creative Suite all over again, and I'd like to avoid paying for the cheaper ones as well if at all possible. For Photoshop's replacement I installed the GIMP, which is more than adequate for my needs. I also checked out and downloaded Scribus, the open source replacement for InDesign. I'm sure that will be sufficient for me as well. And instead of BBEdit, I am now using the free Textwrangler, which is produced by the same company and has all the features I was using with the old version of BBEdit (it appears to be essentially the same thing). Of course, I installed the latest stable version of MacTeX and LyX, both of which are open source.

After finishing up, it occurred to me that all the bright guys out there who put work into these applications have done me a big favor. I really owe them one. One might ask why in the world they would bother to put this stuff together and give it away for free, but as a guy who is putting out content online for free I totally understand: men build and create things because it is in their nature. Money, although great to have (and, unfortunately, necessary), is not our primary motivation. Gearheads get a thrill out of watching that engine turn over for the first time, programmers love to see their code doing what it was designed to do, and architects are delighted by the buildings they design. Even ordinary guys often find their greatest joys involve the small projects in their garages, basements and back yards.

If you go out anywhere there's civilization and look around, you'll see the fruits of these labors. In fact, they are so common that we take them for granted. When you see a beautiful breed of dog such a golden retriever, you tend not to think of the years of care and work it took to develop the breed. When you drive through town you don't usually consider that the reason hundreds of thousands of huge vehicles have not hopelessly clogged the streets is that some guys who were fascinated by maps and streets worked out a system to keep traffic flowing. One could go on with this ad infinitum, but the point is that this is simply what men do. Civilization was developed to reward them for this, and we can see the impressive results, but sadly we seem to have taken a turn in the opposite direction in recent years.

Now, this being The Spearhead, I thought it might be worthwhile to investigate what's going on with the other gender as far as Open Source is concerned. It occurred to me, after seeing so many names, that the open source community is thoroughly dominated by men, so I did a little searching to see if this is actually the case. As one might expect, it certainly is.

According to an article in Network World, women comprise somewhere between 1.5 and 5 percent of the OS community. I'd be willing to bet the lower figure is more accurate. Writer Amy Vernon is not happy about this, but at least she isn't whining that it's all men's fault:

> Instead of worrying that other people aren't going to think we can do things, we need to just do them. Show people what we can do instead of waiting for someone to ask us. That's what the boys do; haven't we spent the last 40+ years saying we want to be treated equally?

She's a bit more optimistic about female involvement in cutting-edge tech than I am. In fact, as much as I admire her go-getter attitude, I'm afraid that, as usual, an entirely different approach will be implemented to "equalize" the open source community. Another article, written by a member of "PHPWomen," opens with a far more familiar tone:

> The topic of the difficulties women face in the open source community comes up often. Here at OStatic we've discussed everything from the gender bias and harassment some women say they face, to highlighting the projects that are helping change the way females experience the developer community.
> A new project has gotten underway recently that aims to foster a healthy and respectful environment between female PHP developers and the PHP community. PHPWomen has teamed up in a partnership program with six open source projects that it feels represents the best the community has to offer in terms of an open, respectful, and friendly community.

So, if you ask the PHPWomen, the reason women are underrepresented in open source development is because of "gender bias" and "harassment" (i.e. having to endure being approached by beta males). However, gender bias as a factor excluding women from open source development is a fantasy, because so many developers are virtually anonymous, and many use pseudonyms anyway. The best OS developers, such as Don Knuth of TeX fame, produced their masterpieces largely on their own time and without a "team." Most people have no idea who wrote the OS software they use, and don't really care. All that matters is that it works.

I sincerely hope that efforts to equalize open source development do not destroy it, but unfortunately I can see some potential damage in the future. All it takes is one lawsuit or public allegation to tarnish the reputation of an entire project, and considering that the development is largely a product of goodwill, the disappearance of mutual respect and an atmosphere of comradery could easily sink some important efforts.

In the meanwhile, I think open source development is worth our support. First of all, men ought to use open source software when possible, and then if they have the means donate to projects. If you don't need MS Office, download Open Office — hell, use Linux instead of Windows if you're feeling adventurous. If you're an audio junkie, check out Audacity. Try out the GIMP instead of Photoshop, and see if you can find any other programs to replace or avoid purchasing. Before purchasing any software, first do some research to determine whether you could do the same job with an open source program. Not only will you save money, you'll be supporting guys who work outside of the big software and Silicon Valley companies, which are fully committed to affirmative action and propping up female entitlement.

People of The Promised Land

Featured Guest · 7 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Submitted by Piercedhead]

It's a familiar story. News of a new land is brought back by adventurers, and tales of its gold, its vast forests and the endless plains of good grazing lands immediately take the public imagination. The same idea is hatched simultaneously in each of the minds of millions: "if only I could get there! I could fence off a few acres for myself, live independently and say goodbye to all this drudgery that is my life!". And the idea becomes an over-arching ambition. The first settlers set off. Reports of their new-found prosperity soon return to the home country and their former fellows, emboldened by their success, start making plans for their own journey. Soon a flood of people are taking that trip to the promised land, all on one-way fares.

On arrival, a new immigrant notices a strange bunch of bedraggled people living in the most abject poverty on the streets of the new city. Alarmed, she asks a passerby who these people are, and why they would live so poorly. "Oh them", the passerby snorts, "they're some of the native people. Sub-human. How could anyone live like that?". The new immigrant is stunned. "You mean there were people living here before us?", she asks, her mouth a little too wide-open, betraying a simple heart. The passerby laughs at her ignorance, "why of course there were!", he replies. "Hundreds of thousands of them, maybe millions. Initially they were all right, but they turned nasty and attacked the city a few years ago. We soon showed them who was boss. Those that you see there living like pigs used to raise gardens and trade their produce – but now they're all lazy good-for-nothings. They give us no end of trouble. Prisons are full of them".

The new arrival, too used to the ways and customs of the country she has only just left, asks "but what did they do with all their money?". The passerby raised one eye-brow and quickly asked "What money?". It seemed almost too obvious to ask, and so the immigrant hesitated a little, wondering how such a simple question could be misunderstood. "Why, the money they got when they sold their land – or haven't they sold it yet?".

At this the passerby stared thunderously at her, his face reddening with anger. "What sort of fool are you taking me for? Go and ask your stupid questions of someone else! They should be grateful to have their worthless lives considering the harm their ilk have done us, never mind paying them for land that they never owned in the first place!", and with that he stomped off in a fury.

For some reason that the newcomer couldn't explain to herself, the sight of these people and their pathetic state had left a large impression. The realization that she wasn't in a new land at all, but in the land of others bothered her much more than it seemed to bother anyone else she talked to – and she found herself talking to anyone who could tell her anything about them. The dialog was universally one of near hatred for the people who once lived unmolested in this land:

"Before we arrived, they lived like brutes. They were forever at war with each other. We civilized them."
"They had no religion. They worshipped the seasons, the rain, the earth, the sun, the wind – everything. They refused to believe in the most basic truths and decencies!"
"Why the concern? The natives are better off because of us. Look at all the great things and new knowledge we bring with us. Besides, we're their moral superiors. What harm can come to them so long as our great charities are there to save them from starvation or exposure to the elements?"

The more the newcomer learned, the more sickened she became with her own people. She learned that the natives, apart from filling the prisons, also killed themselves at rates well above the average. They died younger from all sorts of diseases that the immigrants were immune from. Their word mattered for nothing in the courts they were forever being herded through. They were jailed and executed out of all proportion to any wrongs they did. Their families were torn apart. Their property was stolen. They were denied the same education as the immigrants. They were specifically exempted from protection by the law – an immigrant, and the primacy of the immigrant – was the central theme of all thinking. A native could be held as a slave in certain circumstances that were becoming increasingly common. And they were being starved to death en masse deliberately by immigrant soldiers who had identified their vital dependencies and were systematically annihilating them.

If you haven't gathered by now that I'm really talking about the great Feminist immigration into, and takeover of, male spaces over the past 50 years I have been too subtle for you. Isn't it interesting that colonialism, that great staple of the socialists, is actually being practiced by them as thoroughly now as any they accuse in the past?

Department of Labor: Gender Wage Gap a Myth

Every now and then the Federal Government does a decent job of getting to the heart of the matter. Actually, this happens more frequently than one might think. I used to work with a lot of government reports, and I found a number of them to be very professional, objectively written documents. The real problem is that our politicians too often ignore them. In fact, I doubt our politicians read many at all; they probably just have adolescent staffers write little summaries or talking points for them to use in support of one piece of legislation or the other.

While reading "The Gender Silent Majority," an article written by Gordon Finley, I came across a link to a report produced under contract for the DOL that Dr. Finley claimed debunked the gender wage gap. Sure enough, when I took a look at the report the foreword concludes that any wage gap that may exist is almost entirely explained by differences in choices that men and women make, and that if all data were taken into consideration there is probably no gap at all.

Here are a couple of excerpts:

> There are observable differences in the attributes of men and women that account for most of the wage gap. Statistical analysis that includes those variables has produced results that collectively account for between 65.1 and 76.4 percent of a raw gender wage gap of 20.4 percent, and thereby leave an adjusted gender wage gap that is between 4.8 and 7.1 percent.
> Research also suggests that differences not incorporated into the model due to data limitations may account for part of the remaining gap. Specifically, CONSAD's model and much of the literature, including the Bureau of Labor Statistics Highlights of Women's Earnings, focus on wages rather than total compensation. Research indicates that women may value non-wage benefits more than men do, and as a result prefer to take a greater portion of their compensation in the form of health insurance and other fringe benefits.
> Although additional research in this area is clearly needed, this study leads to the unambiguous conclusion that the differences in the compensation of men and women are the result of a multitude of factors and that the raw wage gap should not be used as the basis to justify corrective action. Indeed, there may be nothing to correct. The differences in raw wages may be almost entirely the result of the individual choices being made by both male and female workers.

This is a valuable, up-to-date report, and I'm glad I came across it. All too often, these conclusive findings are buried under the snow of polemic, so having them available for instant reference can be of great benefit. Fortunately, government documents are open source, so this report will be available from now on at The Spearhead as a resource for all readers who would like to use it to counter spurious feminist claims of unfair compensation for their labor.

Feel free to view or download the report at your convenience.

The Marxist Origins of International Women's Day

Welmer · 8 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I almost forgot it was International Women's Day, but fortunately the feminist blogs I frequently check reminded me. Obviously, most people could give a damn about the event, but it does usually result in some publicity and, naturally, some political pandering.

Because most people do not pay it much attention, the origins of the event are shrouded in ignorance. So, it falls again to The Spearhead to pierce the darkness and shine the illuminating torch of knowledge on the fetid annals of feminist history.

It turns out that the first International Women's Day was launched by the Socialist Party of America in 1909. The SPA was a fervently Marxist organization — its most famous leader, Eugene Debs, became a convert after reading Das Kapital. As Marxism gained steam, the holiday became increasingly popular throughout Europe and the United States. In Europe, during the fateful years preceding WWI, hundreds of thousands of women marched, rioting and fighting police after agitators such as Clara Zetkin (later a staunch Bolshevik) spurred them on.

When Czarist Russia was teetering on the brink, it was an International Women's Day riot by the women of Petrograd that set off the spark of revolution. In recognition of the crucial support these early feminists gave to the nascent Bolshevik regime, International Women's Day was made an official holiday of the Soviet Union.

Due to its strong affiliation with Communism and the monstrous excesses of the Bolsheviks, International Women's Day fell into obscurity in the West until revived by the Marxist feminists of the 1960s. Since then, it has become a day of triumph, during which women have desecrated churches, excluded men from public places, and generally congratulated themselves.

In some countries, the day has very negative connotations, because it symbolizes Soviet occupation. In the former Czechoslovakia, for example, Women's Day rallies were huge events sponsored by the Communist Party. Since regaining independence, these countries have generally had a negative opinion of the holiday, which is only commemorated by diehard Communist loyalists.

As Western men grow increasingly burdened by authoritarian feminism, perhaps we can identify with the subject peoples of the Communist Bloc. Perhaps, some day in the future we, too, can throw off the shackles of oppressive dogma and forced equality and once again stand and live as free men. Then, as it is now in recently liberated countries, the day will be remembered only as a hated symbol of a cruel regime.

Harvard: From Nation's Most Prestigious University to Feminist Farce

No social class enforces the damaging lie of absolute gender equality so much as the elites. It is no small irony that those with the greatest wealth and social power are often the most self-righteous about their moral superiority. All humility is lost on the highest tiers of American society, and today their hubris is exaggerated to ridiculous levels. Although it may seem like a joke to those of us in the real world outside of the sheltered institutions of most hallowed academe, it is the little people who inevitably pay the consequences of power's excess.

On February 23, Jason Mattera, spokesman for the Young America's Foundation, criticized feminism in front of an audience in Washington DC. Now, the YAF appears to be little more than a Republican front dedicated to bringing cornfed kids into the shameful charade of national politics, so it would be a mistake to see throw our lot in with these guys. However, Harvard's indignant response to Mr. Mattera's criticism of feminism demonstrates the degeneration of a once proud institution into the burlesque.

For example, Mattera brought up classes such as "Cyber Feminism" and a class on deconstructing the "new feminist black man," and criticized feminism for presenting a warped view of diversity. In response, Linda Ellison, who lectures in Harvard's Women and Gender Studies Program, defended feminism, saying that it was diverse because it challenges conservative viewpoints on abortion and premarital sex. This is ridiculous, because this is sacred feminist dogma, and there's nothing "diverse" at all about a feminist upholding orthodox feminist principles. This would be analogous to a Jesuit missionary in pre-Christian Guatemala calling his conversion of natives a contribution to diversity.

Linda Ellison is apparently a former Mormon who, at Harvard's Divinity School, became an ardent feminist, so the missionary comparison is quite apt in this case.

Perhaps in part in response to increasingly vocal opposition to feminism on the part of proles, Harvard launched a "Feminist Coming Out Day" to celebrate feminist victories. Organized by the Radcliffe Union of Students and the Harvard Queer Students and Allies, the exercise in feminist triumphalism went on display in Harvard's Adams Art Space, where Harvard luminaries such as Alan Dershowitz and Timothy McCarthy metaphorically dropped their trousers and came out as feminists. Dershowitz is a strange case here, because he has explicitly argued against certain rape shield laws that prevent any inquiry into accusers' past sexual behavior (including past false rape allegations) on the part of the defense counsel. Maybe, to maintain his prestige in the new Harvard, he needs to declare himself a feminist, but that certainly doesn't say much for his principles.

It has been less than 40 years since Harvard became fully coed, and in that short time it has apparently become a slave to feminist ideology. In retrospect, it is amazing how quickly such institutions can decay from pillars of tradition to hotbeds of crass radicalism, following every ideological fad that blows in like some foul wind. I wonder sometimes what should be done with them when the inevitable collapse of feminist supremacy occurs. Should these tragic failures be preserved and reformed, or should they be allowed to expire to make way for a new society?

I should stop posting about this, but....

Some articles are just begging for it:

Women finding love in the World of Warcraft.

Women cheer when other women become cheating skanks because they are protecting the right to become cheating skanks themselves. News at 11. As biased as you could expect. An extract (and actual quote from the skank herself):

> "We spent every night sharing photos and talking on webcam. In time we grew closer and closer. We didn't play WoW for the game any longer, but rather to be together. Both of us were scared of our feelings but one night we declared our love for each other."

As any people who has surfed the Internet enough for finding a porn add (that being about 5 seconds) can tell you, we know perfectly well what they were sharing on webcam. That's the webcam main use.

Blah blah blah, WoW is a MMORPG (introduction for those who can't Google it) the mostly female guild likes the easygoing atmosphere (aka only sit and talk), maybe I'm biased but I want to kill stuff, not just use a glorified Messenger.

Some words from Felicia Day, a woman who was just a minor character in Buffy and started her own show The Guild, an Internet show. Saw it, got bored. It isn't funny and it just shows a woman who is blaming the game for all her failures in life. Blah blah blah wanna introduce more woman to WoW (please don't, all the drama for WoW becoming a female fad isn't worth it, not that it is likely) and the jewel of the crown, a quote from the woman herself:

> "I would consider myself a feminist. If I'm helping women get into playing games when they wouldn't have before, I'm proud of that. Women should be on equal footing everywhere."

Of course she's a feminist. Feminism a) produce the crops of manginas who only watch her unfunny crap for her not so good pussy that sustains her career and b) doesn't hold her accountable as a man would for spending so much time online.

And a interview to a member of the woman-only guild, Got Girls (duh). They bring these "benefits":

> "Men assume you play because you're lonely and looking for love, but we bring equality to a very male-dominated online society and even offer relationship advice to our male companions."

Equality isn't possible or wanted, my dear. Also, your relationship advice sucks. A lot.

> Sometimes political correctness goes out of the window — but it's all OK as we know that they're joking and we give as good as we get."

You are saying it like Political Correctness was a good thing. Is not.

As I've said, some articles just beg to be eviscerated.

Single Mother Tries to Get Toddler Son to Take the Fall for Arson

Welmer · 9 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Terminkia L. Humphrey has been charged with first-degree arson after several fires erupted in an apartment she had just been asked to leave. She was staying with her former sister-in-law and six children in the apartment in Kent, a working-class suburb south of Seattle. Ms. Humphrey denied noticing any fires or smoke before leaving to move her belongings to a storage facility, but a witness allegedly saw her packing bags in her van as smoke billowed out of the apartment window.

While firemen questioned her, her four year old son claimed to have found a lighter in his mother's purse and set a fire in the closet. The fire investigator noted four separate locations at which fires had been set, and that the kitchen burners had been left on. Investigators do not believe the toddler set the fires, and even if he had she would have had to allow [or encourage] him to do so.

Hopefully this case will see Ms. Humphrey's little boy removed from her custody and sent to live with his father, if he can be identified and is not incarcerated.

The Plague of Modern Masculinity

Dr. Paul · 9 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Authors note: Dr. Paul is on sabbatical. I decided to offer this one up. It is an overhaul of an earlier work, and is most likely still a transitional piece. So comments, especially from those with and eye for lapses in consistency, are most welcome.

Scores of our young men today are stranded at an impasse on the road to realizing manhood. They are bogged down in the confusion of a generation lost to treacherous forces they never saw, for reasons they were never able to comprehend. They are struggling and starving; unable to feed their souls in a world that finds them increasingly unnecessary and burdensome.

They have come of age in a time of coerced impotence, their nascent masculinity gutted and stripped long before having the opportunity to shape their character and their destiny. In that they are suffering from the loss of things never held, from things missing but never known. They are, quite literally, a lost generation of the walking wounded, wandering blindly from a battlefield on which they never knew they stood.

In that light, the path they are on is not really the road to manhood, but simply a retreat from the effacing malice woven into the very fabric of their developmental lives. And it takes them not to safe ground, but directly into a dismal culture of shallowness and self indulgence; a realm of options without obligations; of self gratification without self awareness or self discipline. It is the death march of the western male, destined for a withering end ensured by intellectual, psychological and moral atrophy.

This aimless, narcissistic existence is a forced escape from lives shrouded in shame; from manhood being reduced to an evolutionary joke in the eyes of a culture that holds it in contempt, even as the elders deny it is happening. With the wholesale whitewashing by society and abandonment by the fathers more or less complete, the newly (de)engineered young man is all but defenseless against this downward spiral into terminal insignificance.

It's happening all around us. One only need look at current events to see that the world of men is quite literally circling he drain; disappearing from the stable foundations of education and employment. They are targeted with disinformation about crime and domestic violence, and about deviant sexual proclivities with women and children. These are no longer just the ruminations of twisted ideologues. The demagoguery now emanates directly from the government, backed by men with gavels, and men with guns. The judicial apparatus has been reshaped, not to pursue justice, but to incarcerate men at every opportunity, even to enable and encourage false accusations to accomplish that goal. This isn't just about male bashing any more. It is about male subjugation. And it is not being executed by feminists or women, but by men.

We might proffer that the solution is a redirection to days past, when we imagine that men made masters of sacred codes; when they possessed strength and purpose and would stand against this growing tragedy and defeat it. We would be wrong. We can only find that Thomas C. Wolfe was right. You can't go home again. And what's more, you really don't want to. It was, in a sense, home that got us here. And that is a truth we must face, no matter how natural or compelling the tendency to point to any other "outside" force and satisfy our frustrations with the simplistic convenience of an easily identified enemy.

As always, our true enemy is in the mirror. The only thing that will save us is to face up to that and act accordingly.

In the fitful and often strange world of the men's movement, we attempt to answer this social malady; to create a haven, if only an intellectual one, for the refugees of this godforsaken gender war. It is a mission often hobbled by our own hands, yet the work goes on, limping toward solutions. We strive, I think, as men who have taken the red pill and seen through the Matrix, to formulate an appropriate response, and in our own way to push some sanity and balance back into the collective consciousness; to force it past the architects of institutional misandry, both male and female. But even as we exert pressure, we don't have a firm grasp on what it is we are fighting.

We have not ascertained, nor have we even really thoroughly tried to, what role traditional manhood plays in the problem. Unfortunately, what we have too often done is practice the obstinate politics of wounded children who insist that they have no role in whatever befalls their lives. We have, at times, angrily and energetically reacted to misandry, but have balked with equal vigor at seriously examining how we fostered and enabled it with masculine codes of conduct. Consequently, all of our efforts rooted in this approach have failed, and miserably so. We have made some progress, and will no doubt eventually mature into a more effective movement, but not before we embrace more than the hostility we feel for perceived enemies.

Our most functional response thus far is to check out and go our own way, but I contend that an exit is not a destination, but just a needed removal from the line of fire; a chance to collectively regroup and rethink. Remember that the young men festering at those crossroads have, in their own way, checked out, too. It isn't looking too good on them.

And it forces us, sooner or later, to swallow a pill that some will find bitter. And to face a reality that some will find unconscionable.

The feminists were right. Masculinity has, as it relates to modern realities, corrupt, oppressive and destructive elements that need to change.

And yes, I mean that literally. And no, I'm not kidding.

In fact, the entire thrust of my argument is that the monstrous social degeneration we are now witnessing, more than anything else, is the result of outmoded and horribly misguided masculinity.

Of course, once we dig more than a nanometer deep into the subject we find that objectivity and reason veer us onto an entirely different philosophical trajectory than the pathologically twisted and apoplectic mindset of feminist ideologues.

To chart our course, we will do two things that feminists never did. First, we will look at the subject without a politically driven agenda for unjustified revenge, or a mandate to dominate the other half of the population. And two, we will proceed with the sincere goal of benefit for everyone, not just an elite group.

The only sensible place to start is with a more grounded understanding of masculinity itself, something that can't be done in a 3,500 word essay, but can, with even marginally appropriate treatment, arrive at far better conclusions than the last forty years of women's and gender studies. We can rely on the combined contributions of history, mythology, politics and, most importantly, human sociobiology. For in the end we are a species of animals whose very existence depended on the development of reproductive strategies, the primary of which is that the most aggressive and powerful males are selected for mating by the most reproductively viable females. Those strategies arose from an environment of necessity and produced an effective way to produce offspring with the highest probability of survival. As a function of survival, that strategy, and not patriarchal conspiracy, shaped the male hierarchy, as well as what we now call masculinity.

Some dry facts- The hierarchy of men:

Despite the numerous male archetypal figures of history and legend, there are truly only four basic types of men. Three of the more commonly known are the alphas, betas and omegas. The fourth I will address later.

Alpha males are a very, very small fraction of the male population. They are highly dominant men who reside at near the top of all populations, from social groups to national governments. These men are generally characterized by the ability to force the deference of other men, often mistaken for leadership, and to obtain and hold power, which lends them dominance in being selected for mating by the most desirable females. There is no evidence to suggest this is any different now than at any other time in history, and there is no way to underestimate the importance of the mating strategy in the phenomenon of the alpha male.

Success often has its price. Alphas also tend to be obsessively controlling, abusive and megalomaniacal. If you point to any despot in world history that slaughtered scores of his own people, for the need to maintain control, or for sheer sadistic pleasure, you are pointing at an alpha male. With alphas, you can throw your imagined codes of honor out the window. Those codes are nothing more than tools used to force betas and omegas into compliance with their agendas. All romanticism aside, the code of the alpha male is to conquer and control, both the objects of his desire and the men he exploits and expends to acquire them. Characterologically speaking, they are a minute, worst representation of the male of the species. But they also get things done, and with great efficiency if you don't factor weigh the loss of freedom and human life.

Incidentally, their characteristics are also the same ones that feminists have erroneously used to define masculinity in one broad stroke, painting all men as domineering and oppressive. Success at this enabled them to take other microscopic minorities of men and attribute their characteristics to men in general as well, e.g. abusers, pedophiles, rapists, etc…

Historically, the challengers to alphas frequently came from other alphas and often from the ranks of beta males, who form the next tier down in the male power structure. Betas serve as the alphas enforcers, the strong-arms used to maintain control over greater numbers. They also play the role of "yes men," affording them their own realm of power and putting them within striking distance (or scavenging proximity) of the alphas position and status, including sexual primacy. Like roadies for a rock band, fortune often filters its way into their hands, and beds.

At the bottom, and most heavily populated part of the hierarchy, are the omega males. These are the pawns on a chessboard, often under the direct control of alpha, or by proxy, beta males. This is the common man, and the one most vulnerable to the hazards of common life.

A good way to look at this is to take a look at the military chain of command. The general tendency is that the alphas, betas and omegas shed increasing amounts of blood in descending order and claim increasing shares of the spoils of victory in ascending order.

Government runs in the same way. In the simplest of terms, alpha lawmakers use beta law enforcement officers to exercise their will on the generally omega population.

Or rather government used to work that way, but it really doesn't any more.

The political sell out that changed the world.

Alpha males in government didn't just collude with feminist ideologues in order to garner a sizable and dependable voting bloc. They had wives to contend with, many of whom were supporting feminism, which effectively reduced everything to the biological imperative. Alpha males are no less, and arguably even more disposed to take whatever measures are necessary to ensure sexual status. Faced with a perceived threat to that, they effectively ceded the alpha position and became beta enforcers for the feminist agenda. You won't find better examples of that than Barak Obama or Joe Biden, or George Bush for that matter. These alphas became the beta muscle for a feminist Mafioso, maintaining rank and privilege through enforcing ideological imperatives on the defenseless masses beneath them. They became cops hauling men to jail on the simple accusation of their wives. They became judges bludgeoning men with their gavels in corrupt courtrooms; politicians passing ever more misandric legislation; C.E.O.'s of pharmaceutical companies pushing drugs like Ritalin to sap the vitality and strength out of our boys, to make them more malleable in female hands once the father had been removed from the home.

Isn't this ironic? The supposed pinnacle of strength in the male hierarchy was revealed by feminism to actually be the pinnacle of sexual weakness. This series of events is also a lesson in real power, and where it resides, which in the realm of sexual selection has always been in the hands of the women who did the selecting.

But an even greater irony is revealed. Women, who have bemoaned a lack of power for ages, and in fact still do, found out four decades ago that all they had to do to gain almost complete control was step up and demand it be handed over, playing the sex card as they did so. And it was handed over, by the most powerful men in the world, who in the presence of these women became like butlers offering cocktails on a serving tray.

I am not fond of that conclusion. In fact, as a man who continually struggles to break old world ties, I am rather embarrassed by it.

Nothing learned, nothing gained.

Nonetheless, what happened here on the whole was that women, their raw biological power masquerading as feminism, have taken the dominant alpha status in our culture, and the result is quickly becoming an age of oppression and injustice more insidious and intractable than any other. It is in the biological, survival oriented nature of women to enhance their lives through the utilization of male labor and male expendability, without compunction or moral constraint, and that is exactly where our culture has ended up on an Orwellian scale.

Defeating this monstrosity requires the insanely formidable task of battling (figuratively) through beta enforcers masquerading as alpha controllers, not to a command post with someone in charge, but through a pervasive ideology that snakes like countless invisible tentacles through the consciousness of the population at large, and that emanate from the very heart of human evolutionary psychology.

And the first strike in that battle should be, must be, at the elements of masculinity that allowed it all to happen.

Meet the new boss, same as the old boss.

They say there is nothing new under the sun. History infers wisdom in those words. We can see with proper discernment that the women's movement was not really a new era for women at all. It is, on close inspection, just women and men practicing their biological strategies in a highly successful manner. So successfully, in fact, that it is rendering large portions of the male population even more expendable. So expendable, in fact, that we are now creating reasons to get rid of them.

It was destined to happen once male control of the environment made it safe enough for women to start acquiring power and resources outside the traditional and protected realm of the home. This is why you see feminism with its strongest foothold in industrialized nations founded on the rule of law. And it is why you see that law itself is now being manipulated away from the idea of justice (which was its intent in a man's world) and toward the funneling of added protection and resources to women (which has always been the intent in the world shared by both sexes).

It is not the pursuit of equality or the love of egalitarian values that has led to feminist governance, but pure blind human biology, practiced in the same way it was on the plains of Africa a million years ago. And the stunning successes of men making all manner of advances since then has now begun to take us out of the picture.

Quite simply, men have worked themselves out of a job.

As noted earlier, we have already begun to disappear from the ranks of the employed and educated, and the government is adopting policies to accelerate that process. It doesn't take a conspiracy nut to understand that this will eventually become a disappearance from the planet. In practical terms, there are not near as many men needed proportionally as there once was. The ones that remain will be of increasingly lower status and will be subject to ever more draconian control.

But of course, there is one factor that will turn the tide before it's over. It is the instinct for survival. It is the only instinct stronger than sex, and it has already shown signs of emerging. We call it the men's movement; MRA's, MGTOW, and the like. We are the evidence that men transcending biology is possible; proof that there actually can be something new under the sun. And we are growing rapidly because more and more men are beginning to see misandry for what it is; a loaded gun pointed directly at their heads, and at the heads of their sons.

Unlike feminism, which is simply a normal, functioning part of the female sex role advanced to destructive levels, masculism is the exact polar opposite. This is the first time in human history that men are organizing to overcome their biological mandate and to reverse the flow of survival power back to the world of men. And while our ranks contain many who are misinformed, and who in fact unwittingly play into the wrong agendas with support of chivalry and traditionalism, those notions are becoming increasingly unpopular and more commonly attacked on philosophical grounds. The men's movement is starting to get it.

And this is precisely the battle we need to fight! Not with women and not with feminists of either sex, but with the aspects of masculinity that are leading to our destruction because they are now outmoded, archaic and self defeating. What remains of chivalry is better described as toxic waste in the water supply. And just as we depart from the old definitions of masculinity, we must do the same with chivalry. It may have once also been a code of honor used by alphas to control other men, but in the modern world we all know it has but one meaning- female privilege. And so now we can call chivalry by more modern names, e.g. VAWA, primary aggressor laws, family court, prosecution on false accusation, media bias against men- and misandry.

The fourth type of man- the zeta male.

As previously noted, the men's movement is a unique and literally unprecedented phenomena. It will bring with it some other firsts. One of them is the socio-sexual warrior, and I refer to him for the purpose of this discourse as the zeta male. The tag remains faithful to the Greek alphabet classification of the other three types of men, but there is more purpose to the label. I took it from the star Zeta Persei. I liked the navigational metaphor of the star as it is applicable in the context of the lost generation. But I was also intrigued to learn that Persei is a variation of Perseus, the first of the Greek mythological heroes. Perseus had a remarkable talent for slaying archaic monsters, Medusa the Gorgon among them, who as a mortal woman possessed great beauty, and was self enamored and struck with the power of her sexual allure until she was turned into a hideous monster by Athena, who later used her severed head as a weapon on her shield.

In 1940, an article by Sigmund Freud was posthumously published, entitled Medusa's Head (Das Medusenhaupt) in which he postulated that Medusa represented castration in a child's mind related to discovered and denied maternal sexuality.

Even more interesting is that in modern times, feminists (Women: A Journal of Liberation, 1978) adopted and reinterpreted the image of Medusa as representative of women's rage, and it served as a binding symbol of feminist solidarity.

So Perseus, namesake of Zeta Persei, was the slayer of oedipal shame (control) and the murderously powerful raging feminist archetype.

The zeta male.

This classification of a male is new because this is a male that until recent times was never needed, and indeed was never there. He is emergent and unpolished and struggling to find his legs, but is doing so thanks to the fertile, safe ground, provided by, of all things, other emerging zetas on the internet. He has no allegiance to tradition or nostalgia for the past, and in fact is charged with plotting a new course. He cannot be shamed into control or intimidated into silence or seduced into capitulation. He doesn't fit in the classic hierarchy, and would gladly bring it down in the name of his cause. When someone says he needs to act like a real man, he smiles and says, "No, thank you."

He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him.

He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self hatred and self destruction.

Are Foreign Women Really Better Looking?

Just for the fun of it, I decided to look around at various female news anchors around the world to see how our own stacked up (heh) against them. I chose TV news anchors because, although they have to be attractive compared to the average woman, the standards are more realistic than they are for, say, bikini models. A news anchor should be at least a 7, and might represent (in terms of looks) an attainable woman for the average, ambitious guy. Needless to say, the results were depressing, as these things so often are for American men. Not only are we often disappointed while out on the streets of our once-mighty nation, we can't even see something pleasant when we watch the nightly news, and to top it all off, now we know how much better other guys have it in the rest of the world.

It was harder than I thought to find photos of international news anchors (language barrier presents a problem in Google search), but I came up with a few for comparison. The header photo is of French news anchor Melissa Thieuriau.

Russian anchor for RT English language Russian broadcast Anna Federova:

Chinese CCTV anchor Shi Dan (puts Connie Chung in the proper perspective):

Brazilian news anchor Patricia Poeta:

And, finally, our very own Katie Couric:

I think we'll all agree that France takes the gold in this competition. But if you aren't sure of that, simply get a load of Melissa without her makeup on.

Are Women Lightweight?

[This post submitted by codebuster]

What does Game tell us about the psychology of women? Why is an alpha bad-boy most likely to get the gal? Let's take a peek. But first, let's establish the basis why women think differently to men, because it is not in the genes.

Introduction to the basic theory

A woman can never be attracted to a man if she perceives him either as less than her or, worse, equal with her. Why is this? It is because being provided for is a woman's birthright. And the provider/provided for roles are about much more than just money. They represent very different states of mind. Parents provide for their children, boys and girls, up until they come of age. But where the boy is encouraged early on in his life to learn to stand on his own two feet, the girl is not. The girl unconditionally enjoys an entitlement to being provided for, and she is reminded of this whenever she is provided with the soft options, whenever anyone steps in to protect her from the nasty world outside. A girl carries with her the expectation of this entitlement through to adulthood, marriage, and into old age, and it is reinforced in the politics of affirmative action and VAWA.

But these sorts of entitlements come with costs. Entitlement-thinking is impulsive and compulsive thinking. It encourages indulgence and discourages rationality. I want. Gimme gimme gimme. Me, I, me, me, I want, I need, I hurt, gimme gimme gimme. What a woman has never learned to confront and control she instead learns to avoid. She learns inadequacy and dependency, and she learns to look up to those who are more capable than her. She cannot avoid this. It is an emotional reaction over which she has little control. She is unable to resist the type of man that fits the sort of profile she values and respects. And as Steve Moxon (author of the Women Racket) once pointed out in an online forum, men fall in love, women fall in respect.

Yes, that's right. Even with bad-boy bikers and musicians, 'respect' is the crucial component behind 'dangerous'. 'Dangerous' provides that spicy thrill that combines fear with excitement to give a lady the tingles.

If a man is unable to deliver on respect, he misses out altogether on that wetting-her-panties enthusiasm that yearns "Here I am! Here I am! Talk to me!" If he fails to impress, he'll never see that flick of her hair as she glances back to see if he's noticed her.

Clearly, women have different notions to men as to what constitutes respectably, but that's a topic beyond the scope of this essay.

Entitlement and the flight response

When a woman is confronted with a situation, avoidance becomes fear and an impulsive retreat from the situation is her first instinct. While it may be true that women often 'play' hard-to-get exactly as instructed in rule books written by dating 'experts', it is also true that women spook easily, and being hard-to-get is often less a strategy than it is a reflex, a flight response, a manifestation of women's proclivity to avoidance.

Women jump to conclusions, reading more into situations that more rational minds would be inclined to leave undefined. They have trouble making up their minds and committing to a course of action, and would rather flee a situation than deal with it head on. Whether as deliberate strategy or as instinctive flight response, playing hard-to-get ultimately taps into the psyche of the entitled, for whom an escape route, a way out, is just another entitlement. If women find a situation too stressful, they freak and head for the hills. Why? Because the entitlement mentality that they've enjoyed since childhood has never taught them to confront the situations that are important to them. This is why even the most attractive women, women you'd think can do better, can sometimes finish up settling for wealthy but hunch-backed gnomes or 'financially secure' but sniveling gollums. But hey, why look a gift-provider in the mouth? Why work yourself up in anticipation over a handsome, successful dude who can leave you for another woman, when you can be provided for for the rest of your life by a predictable non-descript who is at least financially secure? For a man, looks can help, but looks can be quite incidental to the ultimate priorities that many women value.

Let's pause a moment here. Does evolutionary psychology (EP) help us in understanding any of this? Of course it doesn't. No amount of referencing on the topic of hunter-gatherers on the savannah from the Pleistocene era sheds any light whatsoever on what motivates women and men. What does shed light on all of this is context (associative learning, conditioning, Pavlov's dog).

The things that a woman has learned throughout her life come to bear on her impulses, her choices and her flight response. A pampered princess learns that she will always be served, and that this is her entitlement where the only requirement of her is, certainly as far as contemporary western women are concerned, to turn up. There is no onus on her to bear responsibility either for her choices or the outcome.

But it has not always been this way. There was a time, not all that long ago, when women were also held accountable, when they also had their own responsibilities, when they too were judged in accordance with the choices they made. Back in a not-so-distant past, when a woman chose a knucklehead, there was perfect justification for everyone else to conclude that she too must be a knucklehead-equivalent… a slut, a bimbo, or just a really dumb doormat.

Notice how women work themselves into a lather about things, arbitrary things, that for one reason or another are noticed, become an issue and go on to become the focus of their collective attentions. It's all in the spirit of jumping to conclusions – if you have limited information, just accept as given that which everyone else accepts. And, true to form, they'll come to a consensus about some dude in the office, work themselves into a lather and decide that he's 'hot'. They'll wet their panties, falling over themselves vying for his attention. It's a collective feeding-frenzy thing, rarely related to logic or fact. It's as arbitrary as the weather and as predictable as the winning number in a lottery. Brad Pitt? George Clooney? Yeah, ok… but I think this Clooney/Pitt cliché has more to do with lather and froth than with better, taller, more handsome, more formidable. Nothing beats the social proof of publicity and fame and the self-indulgence of women working themselves into a lather.

Ever notice how women are drawn to your vicinity when you are accompanied by an attractive woman? A man might be forgiven for muttering under his breath, "I'm with her standing alongside me, you dumb fuck, leave us alone." This is social proof in action. It's the lament of many a man that it's either a drought or a flood. Success breeds success, and this applies more so to women than anything else. If you are on your own, if you're down on your luck, regardless of your potential, regardless of your courage and natural charisma, you can forget the flood, and it is more likely the drought with which you will be most acquainted. Social proof. It is perhaps the most essential component of context.

The importance of context

Here's something that you can't learn from the hunter-gatherers of the Pleistocene era. First, let's consider 'traditional' women outside of the Anglosphere. Do we know why providing a woman with gifts used to be so effective? Do we know why taking a woman to fancy restaurants with ambience and atmosphere used to win her over? Of course these practices don't work as well as they used to, because they can create a context that makes the modern woman uncomfortable – too much anticipation, too much angst, so much to be responsible for. So let's fast-forward to today's zeitgeist. Do we know why single women are attracted to married men? Do we know why married women like to make out with strangers? Do we know why married women like to fantasize about being raped, or why single women like to fantasize romance with George Clooney or Brad Pitt?

Let's put this into more tangible terms. Context is what grabs a woman. Let's go back to our restaurant example, even if it is a bit out of date, because restaurants are all about creating context. I remember one of my first jobs after graduating, taking a client to an expenses-paid fancy restaurant in London and immersing myself in the context of it all, the view through the windows from high up to the bright lights of the city below. I remember thinking to myself… "hmmm, I can dig this. I like this job." After the initial exposure, though, eating at fine restaurants was not a big deal, because for a man, with his identity defined by his success, fine restaurants are just a part of the job and the routine. A man is in control of the contexts he creates, and therefore he is not so easily impressed by them.

But think of the same situation from the perspective of a woman that you are taking on a date. She's not really into you, at first, but once you've had the opportunity to have her taste a context, a sense of what you stand for, you've put yourself in the position of changing her mind. Whether she prefers the humble context of a cozy restaurant with intimacy and atmosphere, or the more flash surrounds with celebrity, bright lights, status, connections and happenings, if you get the context right, she's as good as hooked. She thinks to herself, "hmmm, I can dig this. He's not my type, but I like this context. I like meeting his friends. I like the package." Because she's not in control of the context, she's less likely to understand it, and she'll be more easily impressed by it. And you've passed first base.

Of course, you could still blow it, especially if you come across as a needy wuss who is eager to provide her with a free lunch, no strings attached. Why? Because you've jinxed the context. You no longer fit with the context as a success. The success-context that has been so important in the lead-up no longer applies. But if you stay consistent with the context, you should have no problem.

Same with sex with married men. Married men provide a context. They have assets, a luxurious mansion and exotic cars. They represent a package. They have family, wife, kids, a package that spells 'influence' and 'success'… and of course, social proof, because somebody 'loves' them. For many women, a married man may be out of bounds… but not necessarily uninteresting. But for other women, a man's marriage is the only kind of social proof that they can take with them to the bank. A married man is dangerous, and the context that he represents is addictive. There are risks associated with getting involved with a married man, and this provides some of that spice that suites many women just fine.

Same with sex with strangers… a new kind of context, a new kind of package. The thrill of illicit sex is the thrill of the forbidden, and this alleviates the boredom for many a novelty-seeking woman who is tired of her stale relationship with predictable Joe Sixpack. Illicit sex with a dangerous, bad-boy rock star bears no comparison to illicit sex with a bespectacled nerd with a whiney voice. Illicit sex with a bespectacled nerd sounds too much like pity or charity to get a woman's rocks off, but illicit sex that meets all the standards of a rape fantasy works a treat.

Same if you own a yacht. A cynical woman wanting a free ride and boasting-credits enters your lair, and for all her wariness, for all her clever cynicism, depending on how you play the context and how comfortable you can make her feel, a part of her begins to yield. What accounts for this? Context. You work your magic and you change her mind. You do this by applying the laws of context.

Of course you can still blow it all… women these days are propositioned all the time and if the context you create is one of a needy wuss who is just trying to impress her, you will likely fail. Own your yacht, own yourself, allowing for the odds that she has her own self-indulgent agenda, and you'll be fine. And you'll never be disappointed.

Gifts, diamonds, trips, it's all about creating context. It's all about spinning a web that draws her in, that a woman can call home – or at least, in our current zeitgeist, an entertaining diversion. The key to context is that it plays on a woman's subconscious motivations. It develops over time and as she immerses herself into your world, your friends and the way to do things, she becomes addicted to this context, she becomes addicted to you. Even a hunch-backed gnome, if he can create a compelling enough context, can become an integral part of something of which she cannot let go. Even a hunch-backed gnome can own a label, he can stand for something, he can deliver on a context. And a powerful context can move even the tennest of tens.

A bum without a brass razoo to his name can create a powerful context that can draw a woman into his orbit. A freedom-fighter, a rebel with a cause has been known to inspire the odd romantic fantasy. Sometimes women misconstrue bad-boys for rebels with a cause, so it's not necessarily always about danger and rape fantasies. What it is all about is context. EP does not shed any light on how context works.

I'm not passing any value judgment here. This is just the way it is, it is how nature works. If I have any value judgment to make, it is the responsibility that contemporary women fail to take for the choices that they make. Women (feminists excepting) are not stupid. They know what they want, and they usually have a pretty good sense of what they are about to enter into.

So let's review what we know about game, and apply our preceding discussion on context and entitlement to understand why game works.

Why game works

The three main reasons that first come to mind (no doubt, there are others) all tap into the avoidance and flight responses that cannot be separated from a woman's learned sense of entitlement:

1. He owns himself. He does not expect much of her. Mocking, teasing and making fun of her, all in a good-natured kind of way of course, is integral to defusing her expectations. This defuses her self-consciousness and her feelings of inadequacy. It tells her, "honey, your jip is up… I'm not intimidated by your looks, I know you're kinda dumb, but I like you anyways, just as you are." She no longer feels that she has to live up to any expectations, and this relieves the pressure;
2. His assumed confidence controls her low self-esteem and her inability to act decisively. She is relieved of the terror of decision-making and confrontation;
3. Her low self-esteem implies something important about the reality that she inhabits. More specifically, if someone comes across as 'valuing' her, or seeing her as an equal, she is likely to assume that there is something deficient in that person for doing so. It's a woman's interpretation of Groucho Marx's famous quip "I wouldn't want to belong to any club that would accept me as a member."

Brief note to the above… do women really have low self-esteem? Of course they do. I'm not talking about their deluded princess arrogance that is fed on a daily basis by chivalry and feminist propaganda. I'm talking about their real self-esteem, the one that they deny, lying just under the surface, the one that shrivels up when tested by reality. This is the approval-seeking self-esteem that makes them an easy target for the manipulations of PUAs (pick-up artist).

There are many layers that can be explored here, and as we look deeper, we realize that there are troubling aspects in the dynamics that hold sway between modern women and alphas:

- To begin with, imagine a man behaving as a woman in response to being mocked, teased and made fun of. What a loser, eh? And yet, women eat it up. They love being treated like children. Why? Because it consolidates their lower position on the pecking order. It resonates with a woman's entitlement to be provided for and a man's role as the successful provider;
- What's the significance of the fact that only if you don't expect much of a woman (that is, if you don't respect her), only then are you most likely to have your way with her? Weren't women only a couple of generations ago concerned about whether or not they'll be respected in the morning? These days, it seems that the absence of respect for women is virtually the only thing that will guarantee your success with women.

An aspiring PUA's most essential first lesson, then, is to realize that every woman is, deep down inside, little different to most moms. He's got to learn to humor them and baby them. The vast majority of women, if they can look beyond their narcissistic, career-grrrl delusions, are just moms-in-waiting with motherly priorities and a ticking clock fast approaching midnight. If he knows which buttons to push to set his own mother off, our aspiring PUA will be well-enough equipped, in the first instance, to learn Game.

Female sexuality explained

Now that we've introduced the basic elements of female entitlement and why context is so important, let's take a brief, introductory look at what this implies for female sexuality. A common assumption is that women have a diminished sex drive, virtually non-existent. Nothing can be further from the truth. For example, Rookh Kshatriya observed that "… the female sex drive is so miniscule compared to that of males", to which the following two paragraphs is the gist of my response to this line of reasoning.

Most of us have heard of the Islamic saying 'nine parts of desire'. Quoting Ali Ibn Abu Taleb (founder of the Shiite sect of Islam and also the husband of Mohammed's daughter, Fatima), "Almighty God created sexual desire in ten parts; then he gave nine parts to women and one to men."

Here's my take on the reason why women's nine parts of desire go unnoticed. It's because women, traditionally, are shielded and protected from birth through to infancy through to adulthood through to old age, and therefore ('traditionally' speaking) they are rarely put into the position of having to test their sexuality, to explore it. So they go through their shielded lives never knowing their true selves… they are in a perpetual state of virginal babyhood. But once they discover their own little secret, oftentimes there is no turning back, and this gives us a sense of where chivalry, and the impulse to 'save' a damsel in distress comes from… she needs to be saved from herself.

What manifests as low sex drive is, in reality, untested sex drive. Many women, preoccupied with the priority of being provided for, have no idea of the nature of the beast that lurks within.

So what's the gist of female sexuality? Anais Nin contends that violation is a secret erotic need in women. What does this mean? It seems to conjure up conflicting concepts relating to the forbidden, and the fear of the unknown. Think of women's proclivity to indulge in rape fantasies. And immediately in this we see the potential for one part vocally, consciously, insisting NO, but another part secretly, hesitantly, yearning for YES. This is the gist of Nin's contention that is played out in her stories. It is also a dynamic played out in romance novels.

Think about the forbidden for a moment, if you will. Every culture has it. And so I am talking about something primal, something that cuts across all cultures. Why? Because the forbidden is defined by culture. Sure, there are different forbiddens in every culture, but ultimately the most primal thing across all cultures is this notion of no-go zones, the notion of the forbidden. Anais Nin captures the essence of these notions in her writings, without spelling it out. If women are inclined to safe, predictable lives where routine defines security and a life worth living, it is this primal thrill of the forbidden that lurks in the shadows, an ever-present uncertainty that a fine lady of impeccable breeding might lower her guard to discover the depraved beast within.

Porn star Sasha Grey is interesting because she brings some credible analysis to the matter of women's roles in pornography. She seems to be better able than most women to analyze things from a more tangible perspective that others can better understand – I'm deliberately avoiding value judgments here, we're here to learn, not judge… right? She's ventured beyond the forbidden, and her journey is not yet over. Were any other woman also to go there, they might discover things they could never have imagined and they would be justified in being concerned whether or not there was a way back.

Female sexuality is not trivial. Just like male sexuality, female sexuality must also contend with the forces of darkness. Women of entitlement, oftentimes even those that behave like complete sluts, can be entirely oblivious to their sexuality and its more formidable aspects. The 'lie back and think of Mother England' type is alive and well, and this type you'll encounter in places as varied as strip joints and HR departments. Don't let this type fool you. They may be completely ignorant of their most primal natures, but there are many others who prefer to keep what they know to themselves. All this is fascinating stuff that is beyond the scope of this essay, so let's wrap up for now.

The future of Game

Included among the practitioners of Game is an assortment of pretenders and mommas' boys, who wouldn't last long in a bloodlust society ruled by warlords. They would have their heads lobbed off long before they would be cast out and laughed into the surrounding desert.

It raises concerns about modern society that men (of the PUA school) would be motivated to learn techniques to pick up women. While the motivations for developing Game vary from casual sex through to strengthening existing long term relationships (hence the acronym 'LTR'), it seems that we've lost sight of the purpose and meaning of manhood.

It is not the purpose of men to be trying to measure up in the eyes of women – not as nature intended, anyways. But it seems that this is the only way that most contemporary manifestations of Game can be interpreted. Game is about pleasing women, and measuring up to their terms – yet avoiding being seen to be seeking their approval. It's a fine balancing act, a deception that conceals a shortfall. And I'm not so sure that I'd care to measure up in the eyes of those predisposed to believing that astrology is science or that social proof establishes character.

This sad indictment of modern society extends to women. For ultimately, Game, in its mainstream, marketed form, would not work if women were not so shallow, self-indulgent, predictable and so easily manipulated.

In other cultures from other times, boys often underwent challenging initiation programs to establish their coming of age into manhood. That was the test of a man, not whether he had an soh (sense of humor) or passed an assortment of popularity tests. Men do need to learn about things like courage and honor… not the smash-face variety of the thugs that attract the sluts and the bimbos, but the more formidable variety that resonates with something more profound.

Game is useful. It works. It provides a true test of how men and women think in very different ways. But we should see it as a stepping-stone. May we move on to the next stage, towards a higher plane of evolutionary development.

CONCLUSION

EP sheds no light whatsoever on how men and women think. It sheds no light whatsoever on the motivations, fears or desires of men and women. Its sole insight is the neo-Darwinian interpretation of natural and sexual selection. Natural/ sexual selection is an important dynamic that operates in any ecosystem, and whilst it is certainly not a trivial force of nature, it doesn't really help us to understand how men and women think.

Are women 'lightweight'? It's probably not too different to asking if men are 'evil'. If we consider that women enjoy entitlement privileges that no longer require them to take responsibility for the choices that they make, then of course, women are lightweight. But what about the men who accept this absurdly unfair situation? What about the men who persist with chivalry and their role as provider chumps in the face of all this injustice? In a culture where one sex is lightweight, it thus follows that so too is the other. For the reality is that men and women deserve each other, and 'lightweight' is the common ground that they share. It is the common ground that allows absurdity to feed absurdity.

A popular myth is that men are so predictable because they think with their dicks. But the reality is quite the opposite. When you understand how context works, then you can better appreciate that it is women who are more predictable, more easily corralled into a desired outcome. The idea that men think with their dicks is an assumption, and that's all it is. Whilst it is an assumption that has force in the current zeitgeist, because men have allowed it, the reality is that men who do not subscribe to this zeitgeist often find themselves in the position of trying to reassure some dingbat that she's misread his cues, and that he really has no intentions on her.

Understanding context is the key to understanding how and why Game works so well. EP provides nothing of the sort.

English Degree Worth $8.55 Per Hour

As our feminized education system devalues credentials by pumping out hundreds of thousands of young women with humanities degrees, the glut is taking its toll on the labor market, leading to plummeting wages amongst the literate set. Now, right here in the US, we have our very own Chinese sweatshop content production line run by lolcat internet entrepreneur Ben Huh, who employs college grads at Washington state's minimum wage of $8.55 per hour.

Huh claims that offering such low wages is how he attracts premium talent, but that's obviously a load. He's paying people so little because he can, and he can because there are so many people out there who think of themselves as "writers."

As I well know, the market for content producers is absolutely saturated. Only a few can stand out of a field of millions, and the rest will be relegated to low-wage jobs. A few experts, such as tech writers and editors can make a decent living, but when you've got dozens of people competing for the same job, all else being equal, the one who will take it for the lowest wage will be the one who gets the job.

Huh's website, icanhascheezburger.com, is based on the lolcat meme he ripped off from 4chan. Sure, the pictures of cats are a bit amusing, but this is one trend that isn't going to last. He's got 30 employees producing this junk for peanuts, which is essentially the same model Walmart used to bring us millions of tons of cheap trinkets produced in factories in Canton.

When our colleges are pumping out kids with degrees that qualify them for little more than putting pictures of cats up on the internet, it's time to take a serious look at what's gone wrong. Was the feminization of our universities a good idea if this is the result? Does this add any real value to the US economy?

Old Men more Likely to Have Sex than Old Women

According to Time, a pending British Medical Journal article finds that even past retirement, most men are sexually active, while the same is not true for women of that age. Even among men between 75 and 85, over a third are still having sex.

Researcher Patricia Goodson, working at Texas A&M, is attempting to figure out why older women do not see this as a problem, probably because feminists are becoming concerned about the geriatric sex gap.

We will likely see efforts by old feminists such as Pepper Schwartz and Gloria Steinem to address the geriatric sex gap by encouraging old women to have sex even if they don't really want to. If that doesn't work, one can imagine a public campaign to stop old men from having sex, possibly accompanied by legislation.

A Call for Support

The Spearhead has been around for almost six months now, and considering its short life and rather sudden emergence, it's made quite an impact. Looking around, subtle cues are emerging even in the mainstream that people are recognizing that feminism has gone too far, and men across the Anglosphere are starting to let it be known that they are fed up. We are getting nearly a thousand first-time visitors every day through searches and referrals, and a significant proportion of those people are sticking around to see what we have to say.

I suspect some higher level pundits have read some of our articles, and are thinking about the implications of a society filled with rootless, disenfranchised men. Perhaps they are a bit worried; they should be if they value stability, productivity and growth.

I'm delighted that our publication has been climbing its way into the public consciousness, and excited about its potential. In fact, I'm so optimistic about the prospect for making a real difference that I've taken it on as my primary job, and that's where things get complicated.

As much as I'd like to pretend that money doesn't matter, little things like my computer falling apart recently, the need to feed my kids and pay bills, and the other mundane costs of life continue to pile up. As a simple man with simple tastes, my needs are not great, but there is a bare minimum associated with life in America. Because I am primarily motivated by abstract ideals rather than concrete profits, I'd be perfectly happy to keep putting a great deal of work into The Spearhead for that bare minimum, but I do have to meet it.

Ad and affiliate revenue has risen to almost $200/month, which covers my costs as far as bandwidth and overhead (not counting hardware). This is roughly 10% of what I need to get by. My next goal, which I have mentioned before, is to start publishing books in both electronic and print format, and I have recently set up a good system for producing them. All I need to proceed is to purchase some ISBNs to finish setting up my account with the printer. I am hopeful that The Spearhead will be self-sustaining through a combined income approach in due course, but that will take some time.

Eventually, we're going to have to go from words to action, and I have some plans along those lines as well. Of course, one can only take on so much at once, but I can imagine putting some effort into influencing some political campaigns come summer and fall. Defeating feminist senator Patty Murray, champion of VAWA and IMBRA, is something I'd be thrilled to help accomplish, and I already have some potentially useful ideas that might help with that.

Last time I asked for some support – three months ago almost to the day – quite a few people came through. Some donors have truly humbled me with their generosity. Following that appeal and subsequent response, I began to put substantially more work into The Spearhead. This paid off with rapid growth over the next couple months. In fact, it grew so fast that I could barely handle all the comments and attention. Things have evened out a bit over the last month, but as our database continues to grow, more and more links and views are coming in every day. We have almost 1,100 subscribers now, and the number continues to rise week after week.

In short, The Spearhead is still gaining steam. I can foresee a day – not too far off if I may be optimistic – when we outrank Feministing, which operates with a paid staff and has connections at the highest levels of national government as well as ridiculously wealthy supporters. We are like David facing an Amazon version of Goliath, and we should have all the same confidence the shepherd boy did before he sank a stone in the monstrous Philistine's forehead.

Once again, I'd like to thank our writers, to whom The Spearhead owes its success. Their content has been brilliant and thought provoking. Ordinary men from many different walks of life have contributed thoughts that are being read by hundreds of thousands of people. Their voices together have grown strong and reached far and wide. For far too long these men and others like them have been silenced and pushed aside, but now that they've found their voice it turns out that the people want to hear what they have to say. If anything, seeing that happen has been the most rewarding thing about being a part of this publication.

So in closing, I'd like to ask for your support, and to offer my most sincere gratitude to those who have already pitched in. Any contribution is helpful, and will allow me to continue the fight for a better society for men and mankind.

Eating Grass

Given the current state of affairs, it is very easy to be cynical about the prospects for any political change. If you take a long term view, cynicism is usually justified. People forget past lessons, they usually don't know a good thing when they have it, and they wreck things by trying to fix what worked pretty well. However, for some reason we seem to keep on moving forward even in the darkest of times: technology progresses, we adapt, and buried truths are brought to light.

The odds against men are formidable. Governments across the Anglosphere have crafted increasingly complex legal constructs designed to extract the maximum amount of resources from men to turn them over to women and the state, and have built the most extensive peacetime prison network the world has ever seen to enforce them. Our consumer-driven economy has helped push this trend along, as women are more reliable spenders and more susceptible to advertising. Finally, thick-skulled men with an atavistic sense of chivalry have aided and abetted this process every step of the way.

When taking into consideration that some enlightened men's best efforts over the last generation to warn us and point out the obvious have been totally ignored and ineffectual, one can't be blamed for giving up hope. Men, it seems, are determined to allow themselves to lapse into a permanent state of subjection due to passivity and and a refusal to act in their self-interest.

When I lived in China, I was bemused by Chinese assertions that they, the Chinese people, could take anything, and could even survive by eating grass. I wondered why that was something to be proud of. "What's the point of taking all that abuse, and shouldn't you have been less tolerant?" I'd ask them. Stubbornly proud of this trait, they would give me a smug look as though the answer was so obvious that there was no need for explanation.

To an American, it might be understandable that the Chinese were proud of their ability to survive great deprivation, but that was only part of it: they also declared that not only could they survive terrible conditions, they would actually allow things to get that bad before they would do anything about it. To me, it seemed absurd that people could be so proud of being humble and passive, almost as though it were a completely illogical contradiction. From an American perspective, there is something shameful about not "doing something" immediately to fix some problem.

However, in retrospect, this trait is far from useless. Perhaps, as a relatively new people (I count the British people as fairly new as well), we have little historical perspective from which we can understand why, and its counterintuitive nature must be learned from experience rather than deduction, but there are plenty of examples for the familiar.

What is really going on is that the humiliation, suffering and oppression endured by the meek gives them a messianic zeal and a moral imperative that cannot be gained in any other way. After decades of warlordism, war with the Japanese, and finally civil war, the starving peasants marching with their savior Mao Tse-tung were an irresistible force that Chiang Kai Shek's corrupt, urban nationalists couldn't hope to defeat. Their determination, ferocity, and – mostly importantly – conviction, gave them an overwhelming edge.

Christianity incorporates the same principle. In fact, it is the image of the Via Dolorosa and the cross that gave it the kind of moral determination that comes from enduring the unendurable. The Jewish Shoah had the same effect, galvanizing the Jews and leading to the establishment of Israel. The crushing poverty of late Bourbon France created the radicalism that led to the French Revolution. The list goes on.

I hope Western men never have to face the kind of travails endured by mid-20th century Chinese, European Jews, and 18th century French peasants, but more of us are being crushed under a severe economic burden than at any time since the Great Depression, and today the law and political atmosphere is more hostile than it was in those grim days. Millions of men will face pretty severe hardship, if not starvation. Many of them are inexorably being pushed to the margins and out of a legitimate, above-board position in society. These men – many of whom are fathers – have all the rights of illegal aliens, and none of the political support. The law is ruthless toward them, and given the prevailing trend, will only get worse. All that they can hope for is that states don't have enough money to imprison them.

From our Western, Anglo perspective this just looks hopeless. Men are being taken to the cleaners, legislated into quasi-criminality, stripped of their children — and they aren't doing anything about it. It would be easy at this point to simply write them off, just like the world wrote off the Chinese in the 1930s as hopeless and powerless against the arrogant, modern, imperialist Japanese, but it would also be too hasty.

In every man and boy cheated, dispossessed and abused by venal politicians and their churlish, feminine masters, a new strength and certainty will take root. Men will stop blaming themselves, and, as they realize that they have no say or choice, they will no longer be plagued by indecision, which is a luxury reserved for those with options.

It is not such a bad thing that so many men are now under the boot, and beginning to recognize their pathetic, hopeless position. Let more of them plumb the depths of despair and hit bottom with a thud. When they finally stand up, they will be much tougher customers than before.

It was once said that "the meek shall inherit the earth." This was not merely eschatological prophesy; it is the way the world works.

On Women And Their (Occasional) Beauty

[This post was submitted by Michael Claymore]

Quick, picture a woman in your mind, right now. So, what did she look like? Was she fat and /or plain? Probably not, despite the fact that in the real world that is what most women look like!

If you're anything like most men you probably pictured some hot piece of tail out of Penthouse, or your favorite porn star , or maybe just a generic "Girl Gone Wild!". Either way, you pictured something that is not representative of women, and in doing so you on some level transferred at least some of the feelings that you have towards "good looking women" to the larger group called simply "women"!

And are those feelings just the self-serving ones like lust? No. If you're one of those men who goes against what he's been taught all his life and actually examines his feelings, you will probably find other emotions triggered by female beauty – tenderness, affection and protectiveness.

Feminists often whine about the proliferation of beautiful women in our media, yet ironically these images do men more damage than they do women, precisely by giving many of us a false inner image of what "women" are. This leads many of us to respond emotionally not to the prosaic reality of "Actual Woman", but to a glittering, media-induced mirage best described as "Idealized Woman"! So when bastards like Obama get up there and whine about domestic violence, do most men picture a fat and/or ugly woman? No! They picture a good-looking woman with a black eye, thereby triggering feelings of affection and protectiveness and attaching them to the concept of the abused woman, and in turn increasing the likelihood that they will support whatever nutty D.V policy President Useless has up his frilly sleeve!

There is nothing wrong with appreciating beauty in women, and I should know, I've drawn and painted hundreds of gorgeous women over the years. But men have got to make a conscious effort to separate the affection and protectiveness induced by what is at best a tiny minority of women, from a reality which does not support the same feelings.

Perhaps I'm wrong in this. Perhaps I'm projecting the way artistically inclined, beauty-loving males see things. Perhaps I am the exception rather than the rule, but even if so, who do you think ends up generating the media's images of both men and women? Yes, it's the artistic men who create those images inside your head, and on that fact alone, it's time we took a serious look at how false images of women influence the way we feel about the real deal.

Second Wave Confronts Third Wave

Welmer · 12 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is like the hydra — every time you cut off one of its heads a couple more grow back. Some older feminists are horrified by the new growths that have replaced their own cherished brand of feminism. Charlotte Raven, writing for the Guardian, deplores the image of the modern woman, which she sees as excessively sexualized and narcissistic.

To Raven, artificially augmented British sex symbol Katie Price epitomizes the new woman:

> Katie Price's currency is as high today as when she published her million-selling autobiography in 2004. She has generated much outrage in the last few years, but it is nothing compared with her influence. Her narcissism no longer seems so aberrant. Women's belief in specialness and a concomitant sense of entitlement has inflated in line with Price's most famous assets.
> Two new exposés of the dehumanising effect of the Price worldview feel like too little too late. The fantasy world described in Natasha Walter's Living Dolls: The Return of Sexism, where appearances are everything, has already come to pass. Today's young women are right to think they will be judged on how they seem, rather than who they are. In this context, Kat Banyard's promise to tell "the truth about women and men" in her new book The Equality Illusion is the promise of a horse-drawn plough in the machine age. The truth is no longer enough; she needs a promotional gimmick.
> In a recent study of 1,000 British girls (admittedly by a mobile entertainment company), quoted in Walter's book, 60% said glamour modelling was their preferred career. A quarter said they would consider becoming lap dancers. By all measures, the value map has shifted in Price's favour.

Raven does something one very rarely sees any feminist do: she takes responsibility, and admits that "thinking women have turned their backs on feminism." This bit of introspection marks a turning point for the old guard, which is increasingly uncomfortable with the monster it has spawned.

However, despite her regret, Raven still can't bring herself to admit that second wave feminism itself was a failure. Instead, she blames corporate culture and asserts that women were simply being manipulated by pervasive branding.

Her biggest fear, it seems, is that women are losing that asset that got them so far in the heady, early days of our own sexual revolution: permanent victim status. However, the image she returns to is deeply conservative, which raises interesting questions about what truly motivated feminists in the first place:

> If awareness returned – if modern woman were no longer disassociating from her pain and victimhood – all her decisions would be different. The things that hurt us would never seem "potentially enjoyable". We wouldn't wear silly shoes, blog about our sex life, worry that our babies are upstaging us. Most importantly, we'd resist the temptation to caricature ourselves. We'd lose the Nigella-esque pinny, the Price-esque lash extensions; the Belle-esque pose of erotic empowerment would seem inhibiting. We'd recover our desire for the missionary position with the person lying next to us. In every sphere of existence we'd be free to choose normality.

Taking Credit

This post may present a slightly new wrinkle for this site, as most of the populace of the MRA/PUA realm seem to either take the approach of wanting to free or disassociate themselves completely from women, or want to sufficiently alter their behavior so they can use them and lose them at will. But some of us are still in the thick of it, attempting to retool a marriage that seems assaulted from innumerable external forces and inbred expectations, and are trying to make the best of a difficult situation….

Obsidian's March 6 post briefly alluded to the issue I am going to address ("…Female Double Standard #2: Women Are Snobs Much More Than Are Men, AND, Don't Really Believe In Merit Either"), and so I decided I needed to strike while the iron is hot.

In our current Mancession environment, there is a lot of talk about credit, and its supposed scarcity. But I would like to examine a different kind of credit, and how its abuse has rankled me, and I suspect, many more men in committed relationships.

I am specifically speaking of credit in the intellectual sense, referring to an acknowledgement of those who contributed to a work, whether through ideas or in a more direct sense.

I'll start with the axiom that women "put on airs", and that they do this based on the most tenuous justifications. Why do women buy into and breathlessly promulgate the "two become one" vision of marriage? Because it permits them to absorb all the accomplishments, social status and rank that the man has worked so hard to accumulate. With a stroke of the pen on the marriage certificate it is instant and legal entitlement. "What's yours is mine, and what's mine is yours". Of course, when the woman doesn't bring any meaningful assets into the relationship (and no, the cats don't count), and indeed brings considerable debt in the form of student loans, that sort of sentiment is easy to adopt as a credo.

The phenomenon is best described as "achievement without accomplishment", just like the corrosive basis of our current public school system, where grade inflation and social promotion are rampant.

The anecdotal evidence for this is everywhere. At work I have heard the receptionists talk about how the rudest callers to the front desk aren't angry clients, but the wives of the owners of the company. Their bosses would never speak to them the way their wives do – after all, they are employees in a professional environment, where a collegial atmosphere is valued and personal relationships are cultivated to enhance efficiency. A good boss knows that there is an office karma, and rude, demeaning behavior comes back to haunt you at some point. Respectful interactions with your employees earn you loyalty and encourage them to go the extra mile when it is called for. So where do these wives get off pulling this attitude? Because they assume they have the same authority as their executive husbands – the two are "one", you see, and so the receptionists better hop to it and follow their orders! Furthermore, like most women, they don't like to acknowledge the pitiless edicts of Cause and Effect, and in this case the consequences of their actions can be avoided (or at least deferred) because they can just hang up the phone and never go into the office. Let their husbands deal with the resulting resentment…

A colleague of mine related to me a story about how he decided he had to relocate a tree so his driveway could be enlarged, and that his wife stood there watching him on and off for three hours while he was laboring at this, making sure he put it in the spot they agreed upon. And the next week he stood there, his back still in pain from the ordeal, aghast, as he overheard his wife say to her sister, "you wouldn't believe how hard we had to work to move this tree!" "What is this 'we' you speak of?" he asked wryly.

Now I'm no Norm Abrams, and my handyman skills are modest, but in the first year my wife and I moved into the house I planted five trees, replaced eight light fixtures, painted four rooms, refinished the stairs, installed two cabinets, built several shelving units, and put in a flagstone walkway. And then there was the stuff I couldn't do, that I hired people [men] for: replacing the roof shingles and basement windows, installing new exterior doors and locksets, sealing the driveway, tiling the fireplace, cutting down three trees, installing gutters on the garage, and repairing a rotted windowsill. Did the Wife contribute any money to these endeavors? No. Did she ever pick up a tool and pitch in? No. Which is fine, I know what I signed up in that regard when we married so I am willing to shoulder that burden. But when you then hear your wife say to visiting friends or neighbors, "yes, we've put in a lot of hard work on this place," or "yeah, we spent a bundle to remodel this kitchen," the incredulity always strikes me afresh. What is this "we" you speak of, woman? Whose work? Whose money?

If a man is to have a satisfying relationship, he needs recognition when it is due him. And if a man is to have a satisfying life, he needs to be able to take pride in something: his work, the fruits of his labors and/or ingenuity. Pride is grounded in personal achievement – anything else is delusion. One flows from the other. It is an emotional form of Cause and Effect. Anything that sullies the purity of that, or that compromises that simple equation should be neutralized. How to do that is another matter entirely.

When you can't actually DO anything, the most efficient way to seem impressive is to appropriate the work of others. Culturally, poseurs do that (accompanying track: "Jumping Someone Else's Train", by the Cure). In literature, this forms the underlying theme of Atlas Shrugged. In industry, it's like India mass producing generic drugs that American firms spent decades formulating, or China bootlegging DVD's of movies that cost $100 million to make. It is piracy, though not of an intellectual property sort, but of a value-added sort.

Yet somehow, of course, pointing this out is seen as petty.

Twenty Thousand Dollars

$20,000.

That seems to be the asking price for killing off one's soon-to-be-ex-husband.

In an interesting case in New York, 43-year old Susan Williams has been arrested because she contracted with an undercover cop to arrange for the killing of her estranged husband of 21 years. The Williams couple was apparently in the middle of a bitter divorce, and I suppose the $20k sounded cheap compared to the legal bills she'd incur trying to secure her, ahem, fair share of the assets. Strangely, the mother of four seemed nonplussed the entire arrangement, going about her normal beauty salon treatments routine (and complaining to her hairdresser about the difficulties of dating as a soon-to-be-divorced woman in her early 40s) as she anticipated her husband being killed and his body quietly and mysteriously disposed of.

Unfortunately for Williams, she's now behind bars and Mr. Williams has been granted temporary custody. It always strikes me as strange when a woman flips her lid like this during a divorce, because if a woman plays her cards correctly, she's going to win the divorce 99% of the time. I suppose there is the greed factor (nothing beats getting 100% rather than something between 50 and 100%) and perhaps the revenge factor (if her husband was cheating or something like that – a la Elin Nordegren yet a bit more organized and determined). But perhaps the strangest thing about this case is the following little factoid:

Why, if you were planning to hire a hit man to kill your spouse, would you approach an ex-cop for advice?

Readers, Thank You!

Welmer · 13 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to thank our readers for your generosity following the appeal for support. Many people came through, and now The Spearhead is ready to take it up another level. In fact, it shouldn't be long now before The Spearhead Press goes into operation, and we are producing real, physical books.

I just met an artist last night who has gone through all the typical misery associated with being a divorced American father, and he was quite excited about the idea of helping out and getting his name out there, so now, if things work out, we have a professional illustrator as well. This is something we've needed for a while, and should help in book design as well as add to the site (comics would be great).

The Spearhead has potential to effect some cultural change, and this is how I foresee it realistically making a difference. When the truth about how imbalanced society is and how ridiculously overprivileged and advantaged young women are today becomes widely known and discussed, changes will start to occur. For the majority of Americans, the supremacist sham that is feminism will come to be seen as a dirty word, because it only benefits a minority of women and men, and hurts everyone else.

Our job at The Spearhead is to hasten this process, and to put the feminists and their enablers on the defensive. It's time for them to start explaining why the 50% divorce rates, exploding illegitimacy and fatherless homes are a good thing. They should defend the coercive transfer of resources from men to women even as the male unemployment rate far exceeds the female. Let them explain why it's a good thing that boys are failing in school, and wandering about aimlessly in their youth. Why are girls wasting their chances for a functional family by bouncing from one sexual partner to another for half or more of their fertile lives? Feminists have a whole lot to answer for, and it's time someone stood up and rebuked them to their face.

We want to make it easier for ordinary people to stand up, armed with facts and a strong conviction that what feminists have done is wrong and indefensible. We'll expose the lies about rape and domestic violence they use to tar all men, and shine a light on the abuses of the family law system, which is used to bludgeon millions of innocent, loving husbands and fathers across America — all so that women can do whatever their impulses dictate and transfer all the negative consequences onto the rest of society, men in particular.

Perhaps I am biased in this matter, but I think this is the most important social issue of our time. I suspect a great many of our readers feel the same way. It is thrilling to be a part of something of such fundamental relevance to so many people's lives, and it is rewarding to be able to put effort into making a positive difference.

I'd like to thank readers for their support, and for affirming that we're all in this together. It is through combined effort that we will pop the lid off this pressure cooker and break out into the mainstream.

And the best part about it is that we'll have a good time doing so.

So once again, thank you all for your time, attention and support!

The Decline of the Matriarch

Yesterday, it came to me that perhaps the most destructive aspect of feminism is that it empowers young women at the expense of everyone else. Although I had observed that older women are usually more reasonable and have a much better perspective on the matters of family and decent behavior, I tended to attribute that to generational differences. But that can't be true any longer, because the only women who were really untouched by feminism during the years it would have been relevant to them are very, very old these days. Today, a woman at retirement age would have been right in the middle of the sexual revolution during her most fertile and sexually active years, but these women do not seem thrilled by the behavior of the younger cohort.

In my short writeup of Charlotte Raven's piece, I exposed the discomfort some older feminists have with the rampaging sexuality of today's younger women. Certainly, young women seem pretty out of control today, but are they really much worse than they were in the late 1960s-70s? Probably not. The 1970s, which I can just barely make out through the mist of earliest awareness, were excessively libertine. In fact, the advent of AIDS had a chilling effect on sexual license in the 1980s, and the rampant "anything goes" promiscuity of the 70s was shut down for a while.

So it isn't as though sexual behavior is significantly worse than it was decades ago, although promiscuity might be more socially acceptable. According to some of the men and women I know who were young during the 1970s, there was plenty of fun to be had. In fact, at the local university, one sorority became a brothel during the 70s, and was eventually shut down. Some of my friends' mothers did stints as hookers back then. They never told me or their children about this, but word of these kinds of things gets around. Rock band groupies were notorious, and women at concerts were a seething mass of sexuality. Listening to girls screaming at Beatles' concerts is probably one of the most intimidating sounds I've ever heard on tape.

Women who are pushing retirement now lived the sexual revolution with as much abandon as young women "hook up" today. Human sexuality is a biological constant, so there's nothing qualitatively different about today's young women (except perhaps environmental estrogen), but there is an important difference.

That seething, sexually chaotic mass of the early stages of the sexual liberation was a demographic mammoth. The young women of the baby boomer generation had disproportionate power due to numbers. Their goals in the early stages were exactly the same as young women's goals are today: empowerment. Women seek power through sexuality, and they wanted free reign to do so. They got it, and now we have a culture and legal regime dedicated to allowing them free expression of that powerful sexuality.

Young men express power through force. Not only violence, but that sublime mental and physical athleticism that only young men possess. The R&B singer/dancer, the metal guitarist and the young professional athlete epitomize youthful male power. Unfortunately, the street thug does as well, so the dark, dangerous aspect of the young male is greatly feared in peacetime. Stanley Kubrick did a brilliant job delving into the subconscious fear that society has for male force. Several of his films captured the terrifying brutality and bestiality that young men are capable of. Clockwork Orange, Full Metal Jacket and The Shining come to mind. Even Kubrick's male computers were homicidal!

His art, and that of others, was taken as a warning. Those in power should fear the masculine, and rein it in. The silly liberals who defended young men were setting themselves up to be beaten and smashed by them. People took that to heart, and soon policy began to reflect the new attitude toward young men. Young men were deliberately disempowered, and male tendencies suppressed and punished.

However, at the same time the equally disruptive sexual power of young women was aided and encouraged by these powerful people who had grown to fear young men. For powerful men, sexually liberated young women are intoxicating. There is a symbiosis between socially dominant men and fertile, sexually powerful young women.

Together, they can exercise a great deal of control over society — so long as most men are pacified. Younger men, who do not have much social power, are left out of this.

But there is another group that is explicitly disempowered: older women.

In years past, women who survived past their childbearing years exercised a great deal of control over family matters. Even – and perhaps most strikingly – in staunchly patriarchal societies, such as traditional Italian Catholic, Confucian Chinese, and Orthodox Jewish, these matriarchs held enormous power and sway. The Chinese nai nai, the Italian nonna, and Yiddish bubbe were formidable, highly influential people in their families and out. In my own culture, Ma Joad of The Grapes of Wrath epitomized the American matriarch. They had earned respect through a life of work, childrearing and devotion to their family, and even the toughest of young men would humbly submit to them in the confines of the home.

I suspect that the second wave feminists who are increasingly nervous about the direction society has taken are starting to realize that now that their sexual power is all but gone, there will be no dignified role for them. Many of them are childless, many divorced, and many put their children in the hands of others to further their careers. Their role as matriarch is greatly diminished by their failure to earn it. But even the women who do deserve it are being upstaged by their daughters and granddaughters, who have been told over and over again that they can do whatever they please, and any criticism they may get from the older women in their lives is only the result of jealousy.

There is always some danger in empowering the young. Authority requires perspective that can only be gained from maturity. There is also evidence that the brain changes as we age, giving us better control over impulses and potentially rash decisions. For women, the disappearance of the hormonal cycle that accompanies fertility probably promotes mental stability. Today, instead of having older women calling the shots in the family, we have young women, overflowing with hormones that drive a great deal of their behavior, exercising power and control over everyone around them. This is one reason it can be such a nightmare to work with younger women, who are so often capricious and volatile.

I would like to think that older women could be allies in an effort to restrain the rampant sexuality of young women and their alpha male partners in crime, but unfortunately too many of them were disciples of feminism for their entire productive lives. It is very difficult for people who have supported an ideology for a long time to admit that they lived for an evil cause, and I'm not sure more than a fraction of older women will do so. However, I remain hopeful that a few will break ranks and add their voices to the growing number of people in the Anglosphere who are saying "enough!"

After all, it is not only ordinary men who stand to gain from the defeat of feminism: grandmothers, too, would find their lives vastly more rewarding and their influence greatly expanded. And so, in one of those curious twists, we men may find ourselves advocating for the return of the matriarch.

New York Madwoman Alleges Abuse, Murders 8-Year-Old Son

Gigi Jordan, a Manhattan millionaire, poisoned her autistic son with prescription meds, claiming that she was saving him from rape orgies perpetrated by the child's father and stepfather. Both men deny the allegations, which suggest that Ms. Jordan is clinically psychotic.

Although it is not always possible to protect children from the criminally insane, the American assumption that a child is always safest with its mother ought to be reevaluated. In many – probably most – instances of severe neglect or abuse leading to a child's death, the child was in the custody of its mother. Given that custody of children is awarded to mothers almost as though by default, this is hardly surprising.

A great number of fathers have exerted enormous effort to regain custody of their children when the mother has proven herself to be wholly unfit for parenting. The custody bar is set so high for men that a woman with a severe drinking or drug problem will usually still get custody simply by promising to go to rehab, which is usually unsuccessful in achieving full remission, even when the father of the child is a sober, responsible man.

There is no doubt that this overwhelming mother bias in custody decisions has cost the life – not to mention the future – of many a child. When a woman is descending into insanity, addiction or wanton promiscuity, fathers should be given the right to care for their children without having to go through years of court battles and spend tens of thousands of dollars. This could save the lives and salvage the futures of untold numbers of children, preventing needless tragedies such as the murder of Jude Tzekov, Gigi Jordan's helpless, innocent little boy.

Victim Industry Encourages Fantasies of Childhood Abuse

Welmer · 14 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Jo Woodiwiss, a UK sociologist at the University of Huddersfield, writes that women are encouraged to see themselves as vistims of childhood sex abuse on the basis of "feelings" rather than concrete memories. It seems that when women feel that something is wrong or missing from their lives, they tend to seek therapy, and then emerge convinced that they were abused as children.

According to Dr. Woodiwiss, vague symptoms such as dissatisfaction are enough to convince women that people in their family did something horrible to them at a very early age:

> These "alternative" or "recovered" memories can take the form of physical or bodily experiences, feelings such as sadness or anxiety, and a whole range of other events or difficulties experienced in adulthood. They are often displayed in self-help literature as checklists of symptoms that the reader is encouraged to identify in their own lives, and include the following taken from The Courage to Heal:
> Do you have trouble feeling motivated?
> Can you accomplish things you set out to achieve?
> Do you feel you have to be perfect?
> Do you often feel taken advantage of?
> Do you find your relationships just don't work out?
> Can you say no?
> Do you often have sex because you want to, or only because your partner wants it?
> Are you satisfied with your family relationships?
> Have you ever been rejected by your family?

The above-mentioned book, The Courage to Heal, is one of many self-help publications aimed at convincing women that their adult problems are linked to suppressed childhood events. A growing number of psychologists and sociologists such as Woodiwiss are speaking out to criticize such publications.

These ideas can be extremely disruptive to families, and when taken to extremes can result in severe abuses of power, such as the "Wenatchee Sex Ring" witch hunt, in which 43 mainly impoverished and mentally challenged people were arrested on nearly 30,000 charges of sex abuse (yes, 30,000).

Of course, child abuse is a terrible thing, but that's all the more reason to base any accusations on concrete evidence. The potential for hysteria and moral panics accompanying these accusations is very real, as the above and other examples illustrate.

Encouraging women to see themselves as victims of sexual abuse when there is no physical evidence on the basis of "feelings" is irresponsibility of the highest order. Perhaps there is no way to stop people from pursuing profit from pandering to some of the most destructive impulses in the female psyche, but those who do should be strictly barred from any positions of authority.

A Skank's True Love

Today in GQ, Rielle Hunter tells her side of the sordid story of her affair with John Edwards. She expresses her undying, profound devotion to the lying scumbag, proving that there is still such a thing as true love in America — as long as it involves a sleazy, cheating alpha and a scheming tramp.

Ms. Hunter poses with her daughter, and then suggests that Edwards swept her off her feet. So much, in fact, that she couldn't resist sleeping with him the same night they met. The article goes on for ten pages, so it's a painful read. GQ, supposedly a men's magazine, and the female interviewer (Lisa DePaulo) give her kid glove treatment. More than anything else, it's a justification for infidelity from a woman's point of view. Rielle loved him, and it was so profound, so it's all OK. She describes cheating as "pulling off the band aid," and goes on and on about how honest John Edwards is…

Because the article is little more than a long, hormonal gush, it's hard to say it's worth reading, however it does give some glimpses into the female world of self-delusion, prevarication and logical contradiction. I'll give a few examples below:

> Why do you think he loves you?
> Um… How do I answer that? [long pause] I mean, I could give so many answers. I could give a spiritual answer, that I reflect back to him large parts of himself that were unconscious. Like, he's a huge, huge humanitarian. He is very kindhearted and sweet. He's very honest and truthful. And all of that was hidden.

Edwards the honest humanitarian, and…

> And wasn't that when he was asked if he loved you and he responded by saying there was only one woman he ever loved, Elizabeth?
> I believe so. Yeah. I mean, it was very painful. Because I had this thing in my head like a lot of women, where you want your man to stand up on a cliff and scream, "I LOVE HER." You know, the knight in shining armor. And that wasn't what was going on.
> Did he call you after the interview?
> Yes. And I said, "Ouch, that hurt." And he said, "I'm sorry." And "It doesn't mean anything." And it didn't. I know he loves me. I have never had any doubt at all about that. We love each other very much. And that hasn't changed, and I believe that will be till death do us part. The love doesn't go away. It's unconditional. It's unconditional on my part, but our connection is profound. There's a lot of passion there.

Edwards the lying sack of sh-t.

> I sat on the other side of the room. I wouldn't go near him. And he kept saying [she mimics his southern drawl], "What are you doin' over there? Come over here. I can't even see you. Come closer. I won't bite you." I was just—there was sooo much attraction and sooo much… I want to say love, but it wasn't love at that point. You know, it was just this, this magnetic force field like I had never experienced. It terrified me. Absolutely terrified me. And, um, I eventually walked over to his side of the room. [laughs] He was pretty relentless. And that's all I'm gonna say on that! Now fade to black!

Rielle completely disavowing any responsibility for the destruction of Edward's marriage:

> How were you able to reconcile learning these things about her, from him, at the same time knowing that she's ill?
> Well, his relationship with her and the problems in it really had nothing to do with me. You remove me from the equation and they still exist. They existed before I was there. They're still existing. His dynamic with me is completely different.

Here is possibly the biggest whopper Rielle tells in the entire interview:

> What was your reaction when you found out you were pregnant?
> I was shocked. I was 43 years old, you know, and pregnant? And I had never been pregnant in my life. Didn't think I could get pregnant.

I know a lie when I see one, and Rielle Hunter must have been praying to Gaia that her rapidly expiring womb would bear such golden fruit. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if it came to light that she was popping fertility pills at the time.

Edwards, on the other hand, was not so thrilled:

> And what was his reaction?
> He was always very gracious about it. And always said that he would support whatever decision I made. But I believe on some level he was hoping I would get an abortion. Because he didn't—he wasn't happy about the timing. Which is understandable. [laughs] He was married and running for president. And I find it interesting that my daughter thought that would be a good time to come into the world. That daddy was running for president and married to someone else. "Gee, I think now's the perfect time." There's something to be said for divine timing.

Divine timing indeed!

If this was God's doing, He must not have been too pleased with John Edwards.

Here is Edwards' reaction when he finds out he's about to be a daddy, and everyone else is about to find out, too:

> How did the whole plan go down for Andrew to claim paternity?
> It was Andrew's idea. The first time Andrew said it, I was on the phone with Johnny, and Johnny was screaming at me about the National Enquirer finding me and photographing me. He was very angry. And Johnny doesn't scream. He's not a screamer. But he was screaming at me that day, and Andrew suggested, right then and there, "Hey, tell him that I'll claim I'm the father."

Additional bits of information, such as Rielle's interest in astrology and her youthful penchant for cocaine, are peppered throughout the interview, but it's really only remarkable for being a portrait of a common, American skank. There isn't too much to be gained from it, but it does show what's behind the sparkle in the eye of women who gravitate toward power and success.

Ah, the times! It's all a farce, I tell you.

Legislating Propriety

Welmer · 15 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One might think that people writing for influential publications have enough common sense to understand that legislation is no cure all, but perhaps this is too much to ask. In the Huffington Post, writerette Holly Kearl demands that "harassment" of women be regulated just as it is in the workplace. Examples of harassment include: "acts like leering, whistling, honking, sexual comments, sexist comments…"

As offensive as boorish behavior may be to some people, I can imagine that there could be some confusion in interpretation. What exactly constitutes a "leer," for example? Is all honking at women harassment, or could it be that the clueless bimbo with the mobile phone glued to her ear is drifting into somebody's lane? And what constitutes sexism? I can imagine some poor beta fool getting hauled in front of a judge for opening the door for some angry feminist on PMS.

Once, when I was about 18, I was walking to a girlfriend's house in an inner-city neighborhood late at night, and a woman happened to be walking in front of me, taking the exact same route I was. I kept walking, about a half block or so behind her, thinking little of it. When I had almost arrived at my destination, I noticed she had picked up her pace a bit and was looking over her shoulder from time to time. I didn't really care, and continued on my way. By the time I was at the apartment, she was virtually running into her own place, which was directly across the street from my girlfriend's. I stood in front of my destination, finishing a smoke before ringing the doorbell. Just as I was ready to go in, some guy opened a window several stories up in the apartment building the frightened woman had entered and started yelling at me about "stalking." In somewhat rough language, I explained that I had every right to walk from one place to another, and told him to mind his own business. He shut the window and left me alone.

If there were some "harassment" law, I imagine I could have been arrested and brought to court just because some woman was frightened that a man happened to be walking behind her at night. It wouldn't matter why the man was walking behind her, because in the feminist world all it should take to have men arrested is a "feeling."

I, and probably most American men, think it's in poor taste to hoot or whistle at women. However, I've noticed that plenty of women rather like the attention. In fact, I'm pretty sure I've seen television ads where a woman buys some new shoes or something and all the construction workers leer at her, much to her satisfaction. The funny thing is that the women who like this would probably be all in favor of a law against street harassment themselves, because this would give them the power to make the men stop in case it didn't feel right. For example, she might not call the police if some strapping, young Navy officer propositioned her from across the street, but if a pasty, thin nerd remarked that she had a "nice dress" she'd call in the boys in blue to give him a concrete sandwich and dislocated shoulder as they wrestle him into cuffs.

I have a friend who, when we were teens, used to engage in what might be called harassment under Ms. Kearl's definition. It embarrassed the hell out of me, because as we were driving around, he'd proposition every good-looking girl he saw. He was a good-looking guy, so they just loved it. Unlike me, he had absolutely no shame, and would simply blurt out whatever he thought upon seeing women. Sometimes, he'd see a woman with an unfortunate hairdo, and he would make hilarious comments about her hair and laugh uproariously. Unsurprisingly, like most young rascals, he had been raised by a libertine single mother. Would insulting women be illegal under an anti-harassment law? I'm sure it would, and my scamp of a friend would have ended up behind bars many a time for simply saying what was on everyone else's mind.

Although it is conceivable that these laws might be passed, how would they be enforced? Accusations of harassment would probably swamp 911 lines, and we'd have to at least double police forces to enforce them all. Do women realize how expensive cops are? In a big city, it probably costs about a quarter million per patrol officer per year, taking salary, equipment, administration, insurance, training, facilities, pensions and legal costs into account. That's a lot of money. Of course, that isn't even taking into account the costs of prosecution, incarceration, legal

Finally, there is the issue of civil liberties. Is an expression of desire, if it does not include physical assault, protected speech? Probably, but since when did a feminist care about the Constitution?

Hopefully, people are starting to realize that if feminists have their way, not only will we be legislated into a police state, we'll be sucked absolutely dry to accomodate the feelings of women who demand that every aspect of their lives be defended with force of arms and law. We are already starting to reevaluate out profligate consumer culture; isn't it about time we question the voracious hunger for entitlement our women have developed?

Staying married but moving out

Novaseeker · 15 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of our most beloved peddlers of female pap, Oprah Winfrey, recently published an article in her magazine (linked by CNN, of course) about women who are deciding to move out of the marital home while remaining married to their husbands.

In the article, Jean Morgan, a woman in her early 50s, wrote that she simply decided that once her sole child reached 21, she was no longer in the mood to make marital compromises:

> Must compromise, if it's no longer necessary or practical to preserve the family unit, be part of the equation in a marriage? Not sure, not sure, not sure, not sure.

So, she simply decided to move out and get her own apartment. Morgan claims she has no interest in having sex with other men, but simply wants her own "space" (yep, we've heard that one before, at least some of us have).

The article goes on to detail other women who live apart from their husbands by choice, so that they can be "independent". Frankly they seem to me to be tired of marriage but want to retain the legal and financial benefits of being married. The author muses:

> And marriage—even my sometimes difficult marriage—has in many ways been good for me. My husband's interests in art and in India have widened my own. Our joint incomes allowed me the gift of a flexible work schedule while raising our son. Most important, he and I have encouraged (or at least tolerated) each other's emotional growth and enjoy an appreciation of that. But now…

It doesn't take very long until we get to the real agenda of the article however:

> It turns out that among the masters of supple, long-term, enduring attachments are gay men and women. "The successful gay relationships I've seen are better than successful heterosexual relationships," says Judith Stacey, PhD, professor of sociology at New York University and senior scholar at the Council on Contemporary Families. That's partly because gay couples—without the social scripts, rules, and conventions that bind heterosexuals—can negotiate more honestly and openly about what works for them in a relationship. According to Stacey, a lower percentage of homosexuals have long-term relationships than heterosexuals because there's little institutional support, but those who do navigate them more creatively. Their relationships are, in a way, custom-made. "Our scripts for marriage are limited and trap people when they don't have the courage or the creativity or the resources to be able to imagine and implement an alternative," said Stacey.

And there you have it. The trouble with straight couples is that they do relationships wrong. In reality, straight couples should learn from gay couples, because gay couples are better at relationships than straight couples are. We can expect more of this nonsense from the female and gay psychology and therapy communities as gay marriage becomes increasingly accepted in the US: more insistence that straight relationships become like gay ones so that women can be more free-wheeling and so preciously "independent". The kind of independence that comes from leaving a boring suburban home with a husband in his late 50s for an exciting urban apartment where younger, more vibrant people live — all the while still being married and benefiting financially and legally and so on from the marriage and, well, getting around to seeing your husband when you feel like it. It's clear whose "flexibility" this arrangement favors, even on its face. The woman gets her "freedom and independence" while retaining the benefits of marriage and husband … while he gets to put up with it and shut up, otherwise she'll just rape him in divorce court financially for having been the hard worker that allowed his loving wife the "flexibility" to work from home.

Of course, not a word in the article from the husbands themselves in these arrangements, other than a perfunctory shrug:

> “And your husband?” she said. He’s not happy about it, but we’re talking about it, and he’s accepting it, I told her. She shook her head. Then she said, “I’ve seen it all. I’ll write you a move-out letter detailing your agreement.”

Readers of The Spearhead will, of course, recognize well the situation presented here for the husband. Of course he doesn’t like it — what man would? It doesn’t take a rocket scientist to figure out that having your wife move out of the house is a bit of a problem, even if she claims not to want a divorce or to seek out other men. Both of those things may, in the end, be true, yet what is essentially happening is that the wife is participating in the financial benefits of the marriage while living alone. It’s quite telling how the author is appreciative of the fact that her husband’s work and income allowed her the “flexibility” to work from home — something which she is now rewarding by moving out of the house against his wishes so that she can rediscover herself and be independent and all rest of that female empowerment bullshit happily peddled by the likes of Oprah Winfrey and Elizabeth Gilbert.

Not that the readers of this site need to be re-warned, but let this article nevertheless stand as yet another warning to all men who are considering marriage in today’s cultural and legal environment. Even in marriages that are long-lasting, and even where a wife does not for whatever reason want to divorce, you may still find yourself being effectively “left” holding the bag once your usefulness has come and gone. Despite the grating nature of the sheer narcissism of the article, nevertheless it serves as a useful reminder to men of just what kinds of things can happen, even in seemingly “working well enough” marriages, and what you can expect from today’s women.

Truth and Humor from Saturday Night Live

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 15 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Chances are you're familiar with Saturday Night Live's Tom Brady sexual harassment skit. If not, you can watch it at this link. While Saturday Night Live is trying to be funny, they end up presenting a very accurate portrayal of how "sexual harassment" really ends up working. This is particularly true with the "three rules" they came up with to avoid sexual harassment lawsuits, "Be handsome. Be attractive. Don't be unattractive."

With this weekend's episode Saturday Night Live has done it again. This skit is a spoof of a commercial for one of those home security companies. Watch it below:

While this skit is a hilarious spoof, it shows how unreasonably paranoid women have become of men. You have a guy who was at the woman's party break into her house 20 seconds after leaving the party in addition to her grandfather, her rabbi, a couple of boys, etc. Why does this skit have a basis in reality? It's because feminism produces propaganda that men everywhere are out to get women, and the skit hits on this by talking about how if you're a woman "most men want to kill you".

One thing that makes this funny is how it doesn't make sense. Why would a guy already in a woman's house leave just to break in 20 seconds later? That even more true with the woman's grandfather. How would a couple of nine year old boys break down her door so quickly? We know such things but, the paranoia of men that many women have is not rational. A woman's grandfather or a nine year old boy isn't a threat to a woman. Feminists produced and continue to produce anti-male propaganda that men are out to murder, rape, and/or assault women, but as we know it doesn't reflect reality. It makes no sense that a guy already inside a woman's house would leave and then break in 20 seconds later. However, there are plenty of women who believe such things.

What's very ironic about this skit (and still very true) is how despite this woman's paranoia about men, she is still dependent on men for her protection. The office of "Broadview Security" is staffed by men. This also is very poignant. While feminists have produced all this anti-male propaganda to make women paranoid about men, their protection is still dependent on men. This includes male police officers and male legislators who produce anti-male laws for feminists. In the woman's paranoia had any logic whatsoever, she should be just as afraid about the men from Broadview Security breaking down her door.

In conclusion, Saturday Night Live has created a skit (probably unintentionally) that shows the levels of female paranoia against men that many women have today. Just like with the Tom Brady sexual harassment skit, it tells truths about the subject that only humor can deliver over feminist dominated media.

UK Gyms face Prosecution if they Warn Women about Heavy Weights

Welmer · 15 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Harriet Harman, Britain's top equality commissar, is pushing an "Equality Bill" that would criminalize stereotyping based on gender, even when accurate. This will certainly put gyms in a bind, because insurance costs are sure to go up if they are barred from warning women about the dangers of freeweights, which can do significant damage if improperly handled. Although not explicitly stated, other implications of the bill might include criminalization of urinals, because they discriminate on the basis of gender.

Harman is apparently widely-hated in the UK, but has a great deal of power. She once bragged that there would not be "enough airports for all the men who would want to flee the country" if she became PM. As an American, I am curious as to how this woman, who is even worse than Hillary Clinton, has amassed so much power.

After reading about what's going on in Britain, I can now understand why this poor British expat lost his marbles and went on a rampage in Japan:

Female Prison Guards More Likely to Fraternize with Inmates than Male

People's behavior when in a position of power can be very revealing, and there are few more stark examples of difference in power than the relationship between jailer and prisoner. According to the Justice Department, female prison guards are more likely than male prison guards to have sexual relationships with inmates. There are several reasons for this, the most important being the fact that male prisoners are, on average, more attractive to the opposite sex than female prisoners, and, of course, that men comprise the overwhelming majority of prisoners in our country, but none of them excuses such a breach of responsibility.

Unsurprisingly, female prison guards usually describe their incarcerated lovers as the aggressor, and often claim they had relationships out of fear. I'm sure "fear" may be something they genuinely felt, but there is a strong correlation between fear and sexual arousal in women, as suggested by Rielle Hunter in her interview about her lover John Edwards. In fact, it wouldn't surprise me if many of the women who work in prisons choose to do so for the thrill, just as women are drawn to horror movies.

In Montana, inmate Michael Murphy, a con artist, managed to initiate relationships with five different women, including his therapist. I suspect, but do not know, that he and his lovers were only caught because one of them became jealous of the others. It seems that con artists are the penultimate alphas, as their sociopathic tendencies are irresistible to women. This raises the question of whether women should be allowed any interaction with male prisoners at all.

These issues aside, the most disturbing aspect of these cases is that, according to Martin Horn, former head of NYC's corrections department, there is a double standard at work when female guards abuse their positions of power and initiate relationships with male prisoners. In these cases, although the women may lose their jobs, they are rarely prosecuted, and are usually treated as victims of male prisoners. When male prison guards have sex with female prisoners, on the other hand, the consequences are more severe, and the female prisoners are treated as victims.

Horn deplores the inconsistency:

> "As long as we have a double standard we are going to see these kind of behaviors," Horn said. "It is a very slippery slope we go down if we say we are not going to hold female officers to the same standard."

When white knighting extends even to people who fraternize with criminals, it is clear that our society cannot handle so-called gender equality, which is a fraud of a concept that serves only to reinforce irresponsible female behavior at the expense of men.

Femivorism

In The New York Times Magazine, Peggy Orenstein explores the trend in California for educated women to take fully to domesticity, going even so far as to raise their own chickens. Ms. Orenstein seems a bit perturbed by the development, as though she is afraid that she couldn't hope to keep up with the neighbors in the chicken farming department, what with her freelance writing job. California is a state of fads and trendiness, so her anxiety is likely quite real; if one can't keep pace with the latest in California, it entails a loss of status that must be unbearable for the Orensteins of the world.

As for raising chickens, it is not the most difficult job in the world. I once had the opportunity to raise a chicken after my cat brought home a chick from a wild flock in the neighborhood (yes, we do have wild chickens in Seattle, although even most Seattlites don't know about them). I couldn't discern the bird's sex, so I named it "Pat," after the androgynous character on Saturday Night Live. Fortunately for me and my neighbors, Pat turned out to be a genuine female chicken, and I built her a little coop to nest in. She was a wonderful, funny little bantam, who amused me to no end as she ran back and forth clucking in the backyard. As a very territorial animal, any other birds who tried to fly in to eat her food were promptly chased off with extreme prejudice. She was also affectionate, and constantly pecked at the window in an attempt to gain entry to the home. Of course, given her lack of toilet training, this was not going to happen.

Eventually, poor little Pat was murdered by one of our local masked bandits — a vicious raccoon who only survived because it is illegal to discharge firearms in the city. Next time I get a chicken, I will definitely be more careful about locking up the coop.

All that about chickens aside, what is most curious about Orenstein's article is that it brings up the feminine conflict between work and domesticity that has been raging since women entered the workforce in large numbers. Many women want to have it all, but even they know this is impossible, so they expend huge amounts of effort rationalizing their choices, whatever they may be, and making an argument one way or the other about which choice is superior. Usually, the pro-career women win the argument because, after all, who else has all that free time to write for national publications? That isn't something one can do with small children tearing up the house, chickens to tend to, or a garden to grow.

So it is perhaps unavoidable that Orenstein, the important writer, eventually passes negative judgement on the idea of hearth and home, concluding by calling it a "gilded cage":

> I understand the passion for a life that is made, not bought. And who doesn't get the appeal of working the land? It's as integral to this country's character as, in its own way, Wal-Mart. My femivore friends may never do more than dabble in backyard farming — keeping a couple of chickens, some rabbits, maybe a beehive or two — but they're still transforming the definition of homemaker to one that's more about soil than dirt, fresh air than air freshener. Their vehicle for children's enrichment goes well beyond a ride to the next math tutoring session.
> I am tempted to call that "precious," but that word has variegations of meaning. Then again, that may be appropriate. Hayes found that without a larger purpose — activism, teaching, creating a business or otherwise moving outside the home — women's enthusiasm for the domestic arts eventually flagged, especially if their husbands weren't equally involved. "If you don't go into this as a genuinely egalitarian relationship," she warned, "you're creating a dangerous situation. There can be loss of self-esteem, loss of soul and an inability to return to the world and get your bearings. You can start to wonder, What's this all for?" It was an unnervingly familiar litany: if a woman is not careful, it seems, chicken wire can coop her up as surely as any gilded cage.

Orenstein's rationalization may work for her, but I suspect that the phenomenon of many women choosing domesticity over career will not end any time soon. It is, after all, as timeless as the broodiness of the hen, who gathers her chicks under her wings as the sun sets.

Jihad Jane and Jihad Jamie

Usually, when we think terrorists, we think of men. However, there are women terrorists too. And they aren't just coming from the Middle East. Colleen LaRose, a middle aged divorced woman from Pennsylvania who went by the name "Jihad Jane" and "Fatima LaRose" online, was arrested for conspiring with other terrorists to assassinate Swedish artist, Lars Vilks. (Lars Vilks is the artist who created the cartoon of Muhammad as a dog.) LaRose traveled to Europe last year to train with and assist other terrorists in their plot to kill Vilks. She was arrested when she arrived back in the US.

LaRose's arrest was due to the work of the Jawa Report and Youtube Smackdown who have been tracking supporters of terrorism on Youtube and twitter and having their videos on Youtube flagged for removal. She spent a lot of time on Youtube where these groups discovered her calls for violent jihad on Youtube and her use of twitter to raise funds for terrorists. You can read more about how LaRose was tracked on Youtube from the Jawa Report. In that link, the Jawa Report has described LaRose as a "middle aged sociopath woman desperate for love, lonely and isolated". The Jawa Report has more about LaRose here.

It turns out LaRose wasn't the only American woman involved in this terrorist plot to murder Vilks. Jamie Paulin-Ramirez, a 31 year old medical assistant, originally from Colorado, was arrested recently with several others involved in this plot. She was later freed, but still may face charges. Ramirez's story is somewhat similar to LaRose's. Last year Ramirez started spending a lot of time in Muslim chat rooms where she met LaRose and other extremists. In September, she left the US for Ireland to marry an Algerian man taking her son with her.

This is a still developing story. Originally, when I was going to write this post for The Spearhead there was only one American woman identified in this terrorist plot. We'll see what happens.

Tennessee Taking the Lead in Family Law Reform

Welmer · 16 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A couple years ago, Tennessee State Representative G. A. Hardaway proposed a bill that would require mandatory paternity testing at birth for all children born int Tennessee. Hardaway's argument was that every child has a right to know who its father is, which seems reasonable enough, especially given the high rate of contested paternity, out of wedlock birth and cuckoldry in the United States. However, the bill faces stiff opposition from women, who believe it is their right to determine who the child's father is, rather than genetic reality.

Now, a new bill requiring evenly split custody in the case of divorce has come up in Tennessee as well. Of course, women's groups are bitterly opposed, claiming that it will grant "abusers" (i.e., anyone who stands in the way of women getting exactly what they want all the time) too much power in divorce. Men overwhelmingly support the bill, as do a number of grandmothers, who have been stripped of access to their grandchildren by selfish, vengeful ex-daughter-in-laws.

Evenly split custody is mandated in much of Europe, including the ultra-feminist nation of Sweden, so obviously it does not portend the return of patriarchy or anything like that. However, it could go a long way toward healing fractured bonds between fathers and children, and eliminating punitive child support obligations that would probably be best replaced by actual parenting, which, although very tough, is far more rewarding than having the state seize money and give it to one's ex to spend however she pleases.

It is interesting to see Tennessee tackling this issue, which other states are largely avoiding. In my opinion, Tennessee's cultural heritage as a border state where several different cultures converge gives it some perspective and freedom that others may not have. Tennessee is neither strictly Protestant and conservative like deep South states nor hyper-feminist and liberal like many Northern states. Additionally, Tennessee has a large black population – mostly Democratic, of course – which has been hit very hard by dysfunctional family law. If there is any group in America that has been disproportionately alienated from its children and hurt by liberal divorce laws, it is black men, who are all too often summarily evicted from their children's lives. We all know how that's worked out…

When we think in terms of politics, it is important to see through partisanship and understand the complex nuances of American culture. For example, while I, personally, may despise the Democratic, feminist Senator Patty Murray of Washington State, I find myself strongly agreeing with G. A. Hardaway, a black Democrat from Tennessee. Likewise, Mike Bell, the white Republican Tennessee Rep. sounds like a good guy to me. I don't care about "Republican" or "Democrat" — I care about whether or not they support my most basic rights as a man and father. If men begin to develop some consciousness about important issues like paternity testing and custody, we can make an appreciable difference in the lives of millions of men. It is The Spearhead's mission to help plant the seed of that consciousness in men around the world.

I've long considered Elizabeth Wurtzel a kind of image girl for the generation of women I grew up with. Wurtzel was in the same college graduation year as I was, and although her school was ~3,000 miles away from mine, she is not dissimilar to many of the women I knew at my school: smart, pushy, in-your-face with their sexuality, bitchy (and proud of it), intemperate, and shockingly entitled.

The world knows Wurtzel for her mostly confessional autobiographical books: Prozac Nation, detailing her early struggles with depression and anti-depressants; More, Now, Again, detailing her later addiction to Ritalin which almost killed her; and Bitch: In Praise of Difficult Women (and its follow-on, The Bitch Rules).

Well, Wurtzel – who could easily turn heads in her twenties when she wasn't strung out on some or other drug – is now aging into her middle forties and she's not at all happy about it. In a confessional piece in Elle Magazine (confessional seems to have always been Wurtzel's writing niche – she seems to be at her best when giving readers a voyeuristic glance into just how royally screwed up a person she is) published last year, she waxes poetically about her regrets about her life in her twenties, and her anger about how her looks are inevitably fading now that she is in her forties.

It appears, as we men often note when discussing such things, that Wurtzel, like many women, actually had a relationship with a viable marriage partner in her twenties – a young man she refers to as "Gregg":

> When I was still in my twenties, for several years I had this wonderful boyfriend; I'll call him Gregg—he's the one we're all waiting for: tall, blue-eyed, with this thick black hair, all smart and sensitive, an inveterate graduate student who used to rub my feet at the end of the day with a lovely pink peppermint lotion from the Body Shop. It was young and romantic. You'd have thought we were happy. I think really we were happy. He was good for me: People met him and liked me better because I was going out with him; his sweetness redounded to me like a sunny day on a dark sidewalk. I could have and probably should have spent the rest of my life with him, might have avoided scenes like the time some guy I was seeing later on chased me down Topanga Canyon with a hot frying pan, screaming at me something about learning to make my own goddamn omelets. In other words, had I just stuck with the good boyfriend, I could have prevented a good deal of extraneous craziness.

But, of course, most of the readers of the The Spearhead magazine already know what happens next without even having to read her text, given many of our own experiences with women in their twenties these days:

> But something went wrong—terribly wrong.
> The idea of forever with any single person, even someone great whom I loved so much like Gregg, really did seem like what death actually is: a permanent stop. Love did not open up the world like a generous door, as it should to anyone getting married; instead it was the steel clamp of the iron maiden, shutting me behind its front metal hinge to asphyxiate slowly, and then suddenly. Every day would be the same, forever: The body, the conversation, it would never change—isn't that the rhythm of prison?
> I was temporarily credentialed with this delicate, yummy thing—youth, beauty, whatever—and my window of opportunity for making the most of it was so small, so brief. I wanted to smash through that glass pane and enjoy it, make it last, feel released.
> And so, I cheated on him. With everyone I could. Bass players, editors, actors, waiters who wished they were actors, photographers. And everywhere I could, like that Sarah Silverman and Matt Damon video: on the floor, by the door, up against the minibar. I couldn't sit still or stand still or lie still. And I didn't want to lose Gregg either.

> Months later, when Gregg found out for sure what I was doing, when he went through files on my Mac and found letters never sent to this lover or that one, he didn't want to make me feel better anymore. He threw a two-thirds-empty bottle of Stolichnaya at my head when I finally found him at a friend's house. He told me, I was your only chance at happiness—now it's over for you.

As it turns out, our man Gregg was no wuss. But apart from that, and despite the fact that what Wurtzel did goes well beyond the average behavior of women of her generation (Wurtzel has always had something of a flair for not just behaving badly, but behaving spectacularly, extravagantly badly), the basic theme is common to many women of her generation: why should I stay with the guy I love now in my early to mid 20s who is good for me when this is the prime time of my attraction and I can enjoy that by spreading myself around numerous interesting, yummy men? And so that's what she did, throwing away what was probably her best shot at lifetime happiness in the process. Wurtzel's reflections on this reality are, however, disappointingly, if somewhat characteristically for her writing, confused and contradictory. On the one hand, she seems to realize the power of her lost opportunity, but on the other she seems desperate to fight what her mind tells her is unshakable reality:

> Age is a terrible avenger. The lessons of life give you so much to work with, but by the time you've got all this great wisdom, you don't get to be young anymore. And in this world, that's just about the worst thing that can happen—especially to a woman. Whoever said youth is wasted on the young actually got it wrong; it's more that maturity is wasted on the old. I was both emotionally unkempt and mentally unhinged—deeply depressed, drugged, sensitive, and nasty all at once—during the years I was supposed to be spousing up.
> Now that I am a woman whom some man might actually like to be with, might actually not want to punch in the face—or, at least, now that I don't like guys who want to do that to me—I am sadly 41. I am past my perfect years.

Even there, we can see the anger at how life works juxtaposed with an almost resigned acceptance of reality. And that reality hits hard, when she realizes the depths of it in fullness:

> So here's the funny thing: There seem to be more men coming around these days, and they keep getting younger as I get older—I'm an interesting, mature woman to a man in his twenties, while to a guy my age, I'm just jaded—but I think they are falling in love with a person I used to be, with a girl in a picture, with an idea or an image, not with who or what I am now. Because with every passing second, I feel I am less physically desirable, even though I'm finally, in fact, a desirable person. It makes no sense, it's not fair, and it sucks.

Characteristic of Wurtzel and her writings, however, after making this rather good and solid insight, she then proceeds to more or less completely blow it:

> But eventually, at some somber and sobering calendar date, most of us lose our looks and likewise one of our charms—and I will lose mine. At which time, for me at least, there won't be much point to life anymore at all.
> I don't want to look back at what was, tell stories of once upon a long time ago, of what I used to do, of the men I once knew way back when, of 1,001 rapturous nights that were and are no more—I don't want my life to be the trashy and tragic remains of a really great party, lipstick traces on a burned-out cigarette at the bottom of a near-empty champagne goblet. Sex and sexuality, at least for me, are not some segment of life; they are the force majeure, the flood and storm and act of God that overtakes the rest. Without that part of me, I'd rather be dead. And I know all I can do right now is hold on tight to the little bit of life that's left, cling to the edge of the skyscraper I'm slipping off of, feel my fingers slowly giving way, knowing I'm going to free-fall to a sorrowful demise.
> Maybe I would not have to hold on with such tough white knuckles if I'd done things right when I was still > young.

> Oh, to be 25 again and get it right. People who say they have no regrets, that they don't look back in anger, are either lying or boring, not sure which is worse. Because if you've lived a full life and don't feel bad about some of what you did, pieces are missing. Still, there are some mistakes that one is eventually too old—either literally or spiritually—to correct. I can't go back.

Ugh.

It bears remembering that Wurtzel is a woman who has suffered from serious bouts of clinical depression and chemical addiction. Perhaps that frames and explains her extreme case of "not getting it".

Not getting what? Not getting this rather obvious fact: for a woman (or a man, for that matter, but particularly for a woman, given the time frames involved) to base her life and identity and value and enjoyment and so on around her sex appeal and hot sex with numerous men and so on is to live a self-defeating life. Wurtzel rightly realizes, perhaps finally, that beauty and sex appeal have a shelf life that, for women, is somewhat shorter than it is for men. Yet she draws the completely wrong lesson from this. The lesson is not that life is unfair (although it can seem so, to everyone at some stage, for different reasons), or that life has no more point after sex appeal fades! It rather obviously means that sex appeal is but one part of a fully lived life, and surely not the central part, given that it is a rather fleeting thing. The obviousness of this truth remains apparently elusive even for the more introspective than average Wurtzel — something which makes me think it is a truth being rather deliberately avoided.

By my estimation, Wurtzel appears to have become addicted to her own sexiness. Perhaps her predisposition to addiction led to this. Perhaps her intrinsically narcissistic approach to life for most of it, as far as one can tell from her various writings, was another factor. But for a woman of 41 years of age (she'll be 43 this year) to believe that life has no point if she isn't sexy any more is quite sad – almost shockingly so. There is no sense of Wurtzel's troubles having given her a useful perspective, or having woken her up to the truly transcendent and important things in life, or to learn to place her sex appeal in its proper perspective. None of that. Instead we get wailing and gnashing of teeth at how the focus on youthful beauty "sucks" (even as she exploited that focus to the hilt in her younger years), about how life has no point if your sex appeal is diminishing and so on.

I can't help but wonder how many women of my generation, of my age, share Wurtzel's perspectives, even if her own life trajectory has been more spectacularly exaggerated, as is her style. I wonder whether Wurtzel is really giving us a look into the inner psyche of "generation lost", of the "hollow women" of my college class, women in their forties who now look exhausted after having spent the last twenty years chasing their collective six in so many creatively self-defeating ways. And I wonder if Wurtzel is giving all of us, ultimately, a mental roadmap as to why so many women in her age group stray, or long to become cougars, or become seemingly dependent on psychotropic meds.

Ultimately, as with most of Wurtzel's work, this piece is very saddening, even if it is revealing of a broader mindset – or, rather a lack thereof, – among so many women of my generation.

What a ridiculous waste of a life, Elizabeth.

Historian Tony Judt on The 60s, Sex and the New Puritanism

Welmer · 17 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the New York York Review of Books blog, Judt reflects on how culture has changed over the years, from the radical sexuality of the 60s to the "sexual correctness" of today. He recounts several examples of academic censure, and contrasts his own life with that of younger generations.

I always enjoy getting some perspective from an older man who has seen so much more than I have. Perhaps, as more of these older academics retire and are liberated from the campus culture of rigid control, we will see more open and thoughtful criticism of gender politics as they have played out over the last several decades.

It's a short enjoyable read, with a surprise ending that takes a poke at the enforcers of sexual correctness.

Prominent Orthodox Rabbi Backs Down on Ordaining Women

Welmer · 17 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Facing expulsion from the Rabbinical Council of America, Rabbi Avi Weiss, leader of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in the Bronx, made a statement last week promising not to confer the title of 'Rabba' [feminine form of Rabbi] on graduates of Yeshivat Maharat, a Jewish religious school for women.

Weiss's statement is a reversal from his January promise to call his student Sara Hurwitz "Rabba," which provoked severe criticism from Orthodox groups around America. Only Orthodox Judaism still forbids women from serving as rabbis, but the only group of Jews that is fertile and committed to maintaining the Jewish faith happens to be Orthodox as well.

However, there is a contemporary movement to bend Jewish tradition and introduce feminism into Orthodox Judaism, most notably represented by JOFA, the "Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance," which just released a nebulous statement pertaining to the hubbub over Weiss.

Despite popular pressure and cultural phenomena such as "Yentl," Orthodox Judaism has quite successfully resisted contemporary fads. Perhaps having a very limited missionary agenda has been helpful in this regard.

The 10 Harmful Things Single Mothers Do to Ruin Their Sons

I recently came across a Black Christian Pastor by the name of Gills Tripplett, and he has written an article entitled 10 Harmful Things Single Mothers Do To Ruin Their Sons Lives.

It is an excellent piece regarding what I consider to be the single greatest cause in perpetuating the so-called "cycle of poverty." As pointed out by Kay Hymowitz in her seminal article, The Black Family: 40 Years of Lies, the Black American family was devastated en mass years before the same pathologies were spread to other racial groups in every country in considered "first" world. As fellow Spearhead contributors and bloggers like Obsidian and Whiskey have pointed out on numerous occasions, the subsidization of single mother households through tax redistribution schemes to fund entitlement programs is something that corrupts all communities and societies, regardless of race. The black family in America was simply the canary in the coal mine. Well, much of society has ignored that canary's reaction to the experiment of the "GREAT SOCIETY," and we now see the same thing infecting all corners of our most-assuredly declining Western Civilization.

Look in any white trailer park, or any other community across the country that is largely poverty stricken and is predominantly composed of single mother households on welfare, you will see the same pathologies of a matriarchal-modeled community. The same thing is apparent even here in Hawaii – the same kind of projects and ghettos can be seen amongst areas of the State that are essentially homogenous Samoan, Hawaiian, and Filipino enclaves. Wherever we see single mother households as the majority of "family" units, you will find the "Cycle of Poverty" is evident.

However, like most Christian-based articles concerning the travesty and tragedy of single mother households and it's overall effect on society as a whole, there is certain elements in his piece that are certainly oblivious to the insights those of us who have studied Game and social hierarchy's role in mating and dating…so here's a "Fisking" of his article. While I agree wholeheartedly with the big picture, I believe there are few minor errors that needs to be corrected…

(Note that Pastor Tripplett provides plenty of links to back up his sources…visit the original article if you're interested in following up on anything he cites.)

Raising Boys Wrong…
In the state of Georgia, as in most urban areas, two thirds of the Black children born, are born to unwed mothers. Most of those boys will grow up to be unproductive men in our society. For irrefutable proof one only needs to examine:

 The high school drop out rate amongst boys from single-family homes.*
 The incarceration statistics for boys raised by single moms.*
 The mass number of single mothers who have trained their boys to devalue and disrespect the entire female gender*

Am I blaming society's ills on single mothers? No! Am I attacking or demonizing single mothers? A thousand times no!

Of course Tripplett needs to begin with a general disclaimer. This is a tacit admission that he at least understands the eternal solipsism of the female mind. I'm sure he wrote that first to preempt receiving numerous emails of protestations from single mothers who claim to be the exception to the rule. This was futile. He no doubt will get those anyways.

I am dealing with a critical issue that has devastated multiple generations. One that has not been properly dealt with for too long. I have watched this particular group of single mothers reek havoc and sow seeds of discord in the lives of countless children.

Amen, Pastor.

I had one incident in which a woman, (I'll call Racine) was dating a man, she got pregnant by him and they moved in together.

Like many women who give themselves to dishonorable men, Racine assumed that she could change him and that he would eventually marry her. She was so convinced of her abilities to alter his conduct, that she got pregnant, AGAIN! You should know that Racine was in the church while this disgraceful chain of events took place. After their second child, her live-in boyfriend just up and left. He coldly and calculatedly abandoned her and both of their kids.

Here's the first bit of "So-Con" rationalization. See how he basically positions his example as simply a woman done wrong…her intentions were noble, she was trying to "save" her boyfriend, but this "cold and calculating" scum bag abandoned them.

Pastor, what we have here is a classic case of a CHURCH GOING WOMAN chasing a known "bad boy" and basically thinking with her 'gina tingles instead of her head. Come now, give her an equal share of the responsibility here: she CHOSE an irresponsible guy to impregnate her, not once, but twice. She is not a victim here. She is an active participant in perpetuating the cycle of poverty by creating yet another single mother household.

Her means of getting revenge against her ex was to physically abuse both their children. She would do things such as force them to sit outside in the freezing cold for hours at a time. She would choke her older son, (I'll call Joseph) while swearing at him and cursing his father. Because of her physically and verbally abusive behavior, Joseph learned to hate females.

Because of how his mother abused him and his little brother, Joseph detests the female gender with an unforgiving passion.

Ah yes. Thanks to the society wide acceptance and subsidization of the single mother household, another Misogynist is born!

Like his mother had been drilling in his ears for years, he followed in the footsteps of his father. He got a female pregnant while in high school, but instead of abandoning her and baby like his dad, he married her. Not because he loved her, but to prove his mother wrong. Joseph had taken on the same vengeful and abusive spirit as his mom. In less than two weeks after saying, "I do!" he physically assaulted his new bride. He has been abusing her ever since. Even at my behest, his wife refused to file charges. She felt as though she could change him.

Pastor, pastor, pastor…"SHE FELT" is nothing more than the rationalization hamster wheel furiously churning in her brain. It's how she justifies to herself why she stays involved with an abusive guy… because he makes her 'gina tingle.

Their little girl will be 5-years-old in 2004 and Joseph has never held a conversation with her because of distrust and hatred of all females. The only things he has said to his daughter is, "Shut up! Didn't I tell you… No! Sit down and, go get me a…"

Joseph kicked her across the room one night when she attempted to stop him from physically assaulting her mother. Did you comprehend what you just read? You just read how generational curses are started. Even worse, Joseph's daughter is a likely candidate to believe that all men are dogs and become an angry Black female.

Depends. If Joseph and her mother stay together all throughout her childhood, she may instead grow up to actively seek out an abusive thug that makes her 'gina tingle like her mom, and repeat the pattern of putting up with physical and mental abuse as long as she is excited by his thuggish behavior.

What you are reading are not aberrations. These incidents happen everyday. I could share with you so many other cases and incidents such as the large number of single mothers who for various reasons refuse to divulge to their kids who their true biological father are. These women don't realize how their callous insensitivity has damaged their children.

Ah, but Pastor, you're forgetting the number one response to pointing out any single instance of a woman behaving badly: Not All Women Are Like That!

Some of you will read this article and say, "What about the things the men are doing and why didn't you mention how daughters are affected when they don't have a dad?" I'll deal with the dishonorable men, deadbeat dads and daughters in another session. I cannot cover all of life's issues in one article. Right now, our focus is the ten harmful things certain single mothers do to ruin their son's lives.

Save it, Pastor. There's no need to go over how dastardly and dishonorable deadbeat dad's are. We already live in a culture and society for which our mainstream media and entire cable TV channels are dedicated to never letting us forget how Men are the problem, and single mothers are heroic martyrs and paragons of self-sacrifice.

Nevertheless, on with the list:

1. Do You Poison Your Son's Mind Against His Biological Father?
Some women knowingly and intentionally perform this evil scheme. Others do it unintentionally. While boys are young, this vengeful act seems harmless, but as they grow older, they develop bitterness against their fathers.

Note: Women can do this to their children, even if their Father didn't abandon them and still remains married and an able and competent provider in the home. This is what happens when you have a mother who doesn't respect her husband – most likely because he's an emasculated "herb" or "beta nice guy."

2. Do You Instill In Your Son: "The All Men Are Dogs," Mentality?
You may hate the father of your child. You may hate all men. You may feel justified in your malice because of how men have treated you. However, all men are not dogs! Good men do exist! A portion of the men who become dogs were trained to be that way by their disgruntled mothers. These boys listen to their moms speak hypercritically, denounce and condemn all men until they develop a disparaging complex about being a male.

Once those seeds are planted in their impressionable minds and hearts, these boys lose hope about being an honorable man. Their mother's words become a prophetic utterance. Albeit a negative one. Single moms, you must find ways to encourage your son and put a stop to words and actions that dismantle his vision of being a decent man. All men are not dogs!

Amen!

Unfortunately the next point comes right out of the So-Con playbook:

3. Do You Play The Dating Game?
As a single mother, you cannot afford to play the worldly dating game of love, sex and relationships. When you become a revolving door for hordes of males, you indoctrinate your son to systematically devalue and disrespect the female gender. By watching an assortment of males freely enter into and abruptly exit out of your life, your son learns firsthand how to become a playa player, pimp, baller and shot caller.

On the other hand, you're simply giving your son a first hand view of what it means to be a slut.

As he witnesses your failed relationships, tears of regret from your manifold sexual liaisons and learns how you were dumped, played, dismissed and disgraced at the hands of detestable males, his conscience becomes desensitized to the well being of all women. As you play the dating game, you persuade your son that males were called to be pimps.

There's probably a lot of truth to this.

As a single mother, if a man refuses to respect you as a woman and honor the fact that you have a child, he is not worthy of your companionship.

Whoa there Pastor! The fact that she already made the mistake of getting impregnated by an irresponsible thug already severely limits HER WORTHINESS of the companionship of a worthy man!

You need to know that a man should not date you if he is not prepared emotionally, psychological, physically and financially to take on the responsibility of raising your child.

This is true…but you need to add that a woman who actually does find a "good" man "worthy" of her companionship, she should also seek to avoid deceiving him into thinking being a single mother is easy, and that she should imply or deliberately deceive a man with the idea that she will put him first in any future relationship…than not do so once the sucker (oops, I meant "Man") was actually foolish enough to commit to you.

It is an absolute waste of your time for you to date or court a man who:

> - Doesn't want children
> - Doesn't like children
> - Is averse to raising another man's child
> - Is not interested in getting married
> - Has it made clear that his objective is to dishonor you sexually

Sigh.

More So-Con pedestalization here. I agree with the rest of this list, but let's be frank about this last one: Women have the choice, the control, and the responsibility of dishonoring their own sexuality! A man who makes it quite clear that he is not interested in a long term, committed relationship is NOT dishonoring her! He's being honest! If she has sex with him anyways, in the hopes of "changing his mind," SHE IS DISHONORING HERSELF AND HER SON.

As a single mother of a boy, you are largely responsible for how your son will treat the next generation of women. Take that charge serious. Don't set your son up for sure relationship, marital and manhood meltdown. Set before him an example of honor, respect and virtue.

As important as it is for a single mother to avoid engaging in the cock carousel of thugs and bad boys in plain view of her son, she should also be aware of choosing a man who is NOT a pedestalizing, feminized mangina that she can manipulate and run roughshod all over either. That kind of role model will have it's own set of issues and pathologies that will affect him when he is older…and in some cases, this can cause just as much psychological damage as having a string of abusive bad boys for his primary male role models.

4. Do You Engage In The Sleepover Trap?
Time and time again, I meet single mothers who allow men to spend the night, move-in or do long-term layovers. When boys see their moms engaging in such shameful activity, they become indoctrinated to see women as sex objects, booty calls and casual sex partners.

Don't worry…even if you don't do this, he'll get plenty of that indoctrination from watching TV and going to school with all the other little boys whose mothers do it.

5. Have You Made Your Son The Man of The House?
As cute as it may seem, your son IS NOT the man of the house. He is your child! Most single mothers will never understand the psychological damage they cause by anointing their sons to be the man of the house. By falsely convincing their boys that they are men, these single moms pigeonhole their adolescents into a pressure-based environment God never intended for them to be in.

Many of these undeveloped boys feel such emotional duress, that they resort to doing the unthinkable to meet their mom's fanatical demands of manhood. These teenage boys freely talk about selling drugs, robbing people, car jacking and committing other crimes to take care of their household.

Amen.

6. Are You Feminizing Your Son?
To feminize means to cause a male to assume feminine characteristics. The way single mothers feminize their sons is by doing things such as:

> - Having him with them while they go shopping for women's clothing
> - Taking him to the beauty salons while they get their hair and nails done
> - Having him in the bathroom and bedroom while they primp and pamper
> - Buying him feminine toys such as girl's bikes, dolls, etc.
> - Providing him with feminine clothes, makeup or accessories
> - Involving him in feminine activities
> - Calling him cute, primping and pampering him
> - Piercing his ears and giving him earrings
> - Belittling or minimizing male-female gender differences
> - Bringing feminine or homosexual males into his life or presence

Single mothers who allow or inspire their sons to engage in activities that cause him to be feminized are partly responsible for the mass number of passive and effeminate males in our society.

Don't forget to add that young boys raised by a single mother also pattern their emotional responses to their mothers. This is why many young men from single mother households become violent and abusive criminals. They never learn to control and channel their aggression properly by a good masculine role model. Instead, the only role model they have is the emotional roller coaster of their mother's hormonal mood swings. When his body changes, you will have a young man full of testosterone and aggression, but no self control of his emotions.

7. Are You Training Him To Be a Man?
Get this irrefutable truth engrained into your mind and heart as expediently as possible. A woman cannot train a boy to be a man any more than a man can train a girl to become a virtuous woman. A man has his limits when it comes to raising and training girls.

While I'm sure there are plenty of problems men have when it comes to raising girls, I don't think "virtuous" is one of them. A strong, protective Father most certainly can train a girl to be virtuous. I think the Pastor would have been better served to state any more than a man can train a girl to become a feminine woman.

He can read a thousand books and attend countless lectures, but he will never be able to fully understand or explain to a girl what PMS is, a woman's hormones or what to expect when she gets pregnant. Most men won't even attempt to broach subjects such as a woman's broad range of emotions and feelings, her weight or looks, tampons or why women break out and cry at certain events and situations. It takes a woman to talk to a girl about those critical facets of her life.

Agreed. THIS is what Men cannot adequately do in raising girls…but none of that has to do with virtue.

In the same token, as a woman, there is only so much that you can instill in or teach a boy. Accept that fact and do not try to cross your boundaries. There are certain things that boys need psychologically, spiritually, mentally and emotionally, that you as a woman will never be able to impart to them. You will never understand or be able to help your son understand:

> - Masculinity
> - Testosterones
> - The male ego
> - A man's penis
> - Why men are territorial

> - Why men love a good battle
> - A man's need to conquer
> - A boy's rites of passage

Like most females, you will spend an eternity scratching your head trying to understand why men gravitate towards brute competition. Since you will never comprehend these masculine things, you will never be able to properly communicate them to any male. Including your son!

SO STOP TRYING!

Leave the manhood training to the men!

Hallelujah!

8. Are You Emasculating Your Son?
Some single mothers ruin their sons by emasculating them. To emasculate means: 1. To castrate. 2. To deprive of strength or vigor and to weaken. These single moms accomplish this catastrophic emasculation process by:

> - Impeding the boy's natural gravitation towards things that boys love to do, (i.e. rough sports and aggressive play)
> - By constantly scolding, condemning, yelling and screaming at him. This commonly used tactic erodes a boy's self-confidence
> - By being a domineering or overbearing mother. These single moms not only bruise their son's male ego, but they mutilate his male identity and condition him to be a cowardly passive male
> - Constantly seeing his mother crying or throwing temper tantrums. When a boy sees these seemingly harmless emotional outbursts, he becomes conditioned to respond to the issues and pressures of life in the same manner as his mom.

Excellent advice. Once again, Amen, Pastor.

I also cannot find any fault with his last two points as well…

9. Have You Made Your Son Into a Momma's Boy?
I constantly meet single mothers who delight in the fact that they are raising momma's boys. Let me put things into proper perspective by first defining what a momma's boy is. He has been raised and taken care of by his mother. She has dressed him, cooked his meals, did his laundry, put a roof over his head, babied and spoiled him since birth and still does so… although he is a grown man.

She has come to his rescue, fought his battles, spoken up for him, lied for him, blamed others for his sins and protected him from harm and still does so… although he is a grown man. She has bought his shoes and socks, paid his bills, bought his groceries and got him out of jail and other jams and still does so… although he is a grown man.

In their strange and contorted mother-son relationship, neither of one them is willing cut their now grotesque umbilical cord. By the way their mothers have raised them, these males have been indoctrinated to believe that women exist for the sole purpose of serving and taking care of men. They have no problem with moving in with a female and sitting at home, watching television while their wives, girlfriends and baby's mothers work two and three jobs to pay the bills.

Their understanding is, "What's the problem? That's what my mom did and that's what women are supposed to do!" When it comes to marriage and relationships, I advise all women to avoid momma's boys. One way or another, these males are going to cause you heartache. Especially if you attempt to snip their umbilical cord. Single mothers who truly care about their son's future will not raise their sons to be momma's boys!

10. Do You Avoid Finding Strong Male Role Models For Your Son?
By having no strong male role models in their lives, boys are prone to gravitate towards:

> - Having a distorted sense of self-worth
> - Feeling irrelevant in our society
> - Rebelling against authority
> - Being passive males
> - Having a deep sense of vulnerability
> - Wondering about their legacy
> - Not respecting the female gender

This is our Brave New World molded and fashioned by a feminist movement and a sexually libertine culture promoting Matriarchal values and unleashed female sexuality. Teaching a boy to "respect the female gender" is another way of teaching him to pedestalize women, as a gender. Teach him to respect only those men and women that have earned it! No woman deserves respect simply because she has female plumbing.

> - Not understanding, respecting or embracing manhood
> - Not understanding, respecting or embracing marriage

Heh. If he understands marriage…more specifically Marriage 2.0, he certainly should NOT embrace marriage…

> 1. Not understanding, respecting or embracing fatherhood

As they reach adulthood, these harmful traits make men become societal undesirables. As a single mom, you must make seeking out strong godly male role models for your son a top priority. Start with your child's father. The only reasons you should keep your son away from his biological father is because his dad:

> - Is an alcoholic, drug user or drug dealer
> - Is wanted by the police or other authorities
> - Has harmful mental or other psychological issues
> - Is a thug or is involved in other criminal activity
> - Is an abuser, molester or perpetrator of domestic violence
> - Has threatened physical harm or violence
> - Poses a safety threat to you or child in some other fashion

Barring none of the above, you should not prevent your child's from interacting with his dad. After the child's biological father, look at the men in your family, church, after school programs and organizations that are passionate about raising boys. Be clear on this irrefutable fact: your son needs honorable men in his life if he is going to properly transition from boyhood to manhood.

If he has no godly strong male role models, your son will go from boyhood to adulthood, while skipping manhood. Don't deceive yourself into believing that you can raise your son without men, you cannot.

Overall, I really don't have too much quibble with this article. It would probably be better for society if more boys in single mother homes were raised to be pedestalizing doormats for women when they get older than violent, anti-social and emotionally out control adults…but still, the better answer would be to prevent the promulgation of the ubiquity of single mother households in the first place.

As long as we have a welfare and family court system defining any “family” as a mother and children, and subsidizing and/or forcefully removing men from their families and their roles as Patriarchs, the “cycle of poverty” will continue to escalate and hasten the decline of our declining civilization.

St. Pat's a Bust

I don't know if it's just my boring neighborhood or the lousy economy, but it seems as though what used to be fun celebrations are simply not so fun any longer. There is something a bit depressing in the air lately, and the exuberance that normally bursts forth from time to time at the appointed days is coming out with barely a fizzle.

However, as I said, it may simply be where I live. I don't know how things are in the rest of the country, but last night was a pretty big disappointment to me. The only local bar that celebrated St. Pat's was filled with people who made me feel like a kid, and I'm in my mid-30s! All they were doing was sitting down to eat Irish food and drinking microbrews. There wasn't even a band at the local cabaret/theater, which was boarded up and looks to be going out of business.

Just out of curiosity, do readers find that America just isn't as fun as it used to be? If so, is it just that people are broke, or is there something else going on?

Manhattan Girls go Thelma and Louise for Feminism

Welmer · 19 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Emma Bernstein and Nona Willis Aronowitz, a couple of Sex and the City types from Manhattan, came up with the idea to go on a road trip and write a book about it in the midst of a liquor-fueled brunch. Aronowitz, who had never ventured outside of Manhattan much before, said the trip was "about discovery and opening your eyes to other people's realities. It was a perfect coming-of-age thing to do."

Aside from the fact that America is awash in feminist literature, these girls come off as clueless, privileged little princesses. Stopping mainly in cities, they asked women what they thought about feminism. Interestingly, while in San Francisco, they found that while women knew plenty about feminism, they couldn't explain how it might be relevant to their personal lives.

This is rather amusing, because San Francisco is chock full of high-powered career women. Lawyers, doctors, professionals of all sorts… For women, it's a utopia full of culture, nice parks, restaurants and great shopping opportunities. Perhaps this is why they don't have much time to think about feminism in SF. In fact, knowing San Franciscans, they were probably thinking "how long do I have to keep talking to this annoying New Yorker? I really want to go to that new Italian boutique on the Embarcadero!"

However, even in places where women might feel the need to be "empowered," our feminist dynamic duo didn't get such a great reception. The poor women they spoke with thought of feminism as "elitist." Gee, wonder why? Couldn't have anything to do with a couple of nosy Manhattan girls driving around and bothering women who've got more important things to worry about than "coming of age," could it?

Although I'm not going to buy the book, I am curious as to how much outright hostility they ran into. Most people are a lot more reasonable than your typical entitled, urban princess, so probably not much, unfortunately. However, I'd be willing to bet that they were more successful in raising eyebrows than in raising feminist consciousness.

Worst Nightmare for Divorced Fathers

Welmer · 19 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Divorced fathers whose children spend a good deal of time away from them and out of their protective influence often worry a great deal about their children. Babymomma's boyfriends and behavior can be a huge source of anxiety, but under our feminist family law regime there isn't a thing these fathers can do to alleviate their anxiety. In fact, simply stopping by to check on a child can result in arrest.

When stories about the tragedies that disproportionately strike the children of single mothers appear in the news, they can be a real source of pain and worry for divorced fathers.

Here in Seattle Joel Zellmer, a Kent man, is facing trial for the murder of a 3-year-old girl. He allegedly killed her for a $200,000 life insurance policy he took out on her with her mother. In 2003, the girl drowned in a pool in her new stepfather's back yard. When the child drowned, the death was initially thought to be accidental, but prior incidents involving the children of single mothers Zellmer proposed to came to light, and Zellmer was arrested in 2007. His first wife's son had his legs broken in 1990, supposedly in a hit and run by an uninsured driver. Zellmer received a $25,000 insurance settlement from the "accident." Later, the baby of a single mother he was dating somehow ended up in his hot tub, and was injured. In 2002, he started dating several single mothers at once, and then got engaged to one, who left him after some suspicious incidents and his suggestion that she and her daughter get life insurance policies.

Another single mother, to whom he proposed within two weeks of meeting her, also left him after life insurance suggestions. She also claims she found numerous photos of single mothers with children in his house.

Of course, there's a chance that Zellmer didn't murder or hurt anyone, but a $200,000 life insurance policy on a three-year-old looks pretty suspicious. So does his obsessive interest in single mothers, and the numerous injuries children sustained in his care.

The facts state that if a woman with small children is having a relationship with a man who is not the child's father, the man is 60 times more likely to kill the children than a resident biological father. Of course, plenty of men who date and marry single mothers are perfectly decent, but sadly a lot of them are not. Some of them are downright homicidal.

In this day and age, an interest in single mothers is also a bit odd. Personally, I'd recommend avoiding them, because in the majority of cases they chose to become single mothers. Only a fraction of them faced the kind of abuse or neglect that justified putting their children in that situation. In most cases, they either got tired of their husbands and dumped them or intentionally got pregnant by a man who had no intention or desire to become a father. A man with good sense should approach any relationship with a single mother with extreme caution. However, they are also an easy mark. In many cases, they are desperate, so some guys might choose to take advantage of that.

It is every caring divorced father's nightmare that some guy who doesn't give a damn about his kids might soon become the "man of the house." In these situations, the children suffer disproportionately from the choices that were ultimately made by their mother, and these choices are facilitated – even encouraged – by the law of the land.

Men like Zellmer, if he really did murder the girl, are only taking advantage of easy prey.

Another Single Mother, Another Dead Kid

Welmer · 20 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Little Azriel Carver's corpse just washed up on a beach in southern Puget Sound. The boy and his mother, who is still nowhere to be found, had been missing for a few days. Authorities have been searching for them since their car was found partially submerged in shallow water in a pond.

After reading about the discovery of the car, I was hoping that his mother had made a break for it, as many single mothers do, fleeing the pressures of her life to live in anonymity with her child. That's far from an ideal situation, but at least the little boy would have had a fighting chance. It would have been far better than drowning in the cold water of the sound, only to be thrown up by the hard saltwater cold and blue on a mudflat or rocky shore.

I've seen them pull people out of the water a couple times before. It's always a tragedy, but so much more for a child. A friend of mine used to be a lifeguard, and had to haul in a couple dead kids. I can't think of anything more painful than that.

Since the discovery of the boy's body, some new information has come to light. It turns out that his mother, Shantina Smiley, had been seen by several people prior to her disappearance, and seemed disoriented. There was a half-empty bottle of wine in her car, and a man working at a convenience store saw her trip and fall after leaving the store.

Additionally, she has been investigated three times by CPS, which in itself doesn't constitute guilt, but in one investigation a finding of abuse was made after Azriel sustained a serious injury at the hands of one his mother's boyfriends, who was arrested for breaking the kid's arm. In 2007, Smiley was found to be negligent after she had passed out drunk while with her son. The boy was returned after she completed a stint inn rehab.

Unsurprisingly, Azriel was not returned to the custody of his father, who hadn't seen his son in years and lived on the other side of the country. If an abused or neglected child has a parent who has never been found to be abusive or negligent, why not send the child to live with that parent? Oh wait, it was his father, so we can't have that…

Big Sister Killing More Jobs

While surfing Google Finance I stumbled upon another instance of Big Sister stifling the economy with her victimhood-saturated menstrual pads. This time Big Sister takes the form of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

> Four Jack in the Box restaurants formerly owned and operated by Abe Alizadeh will likely close because a federal agency wants to impose regulations on new owners based on sexual harassment charges from four years ago.
> The four restaurants will likely close around April 15, leaving about 200 out of work.

Just what our economy needs. Thanks, Big Sister!

> The bidder who had won the stores in a bankruptcy auction declined to buy the stores after discovering in a court hearing that the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission wants stipulations to carry on to the new owner.
> Four years ago, a manager of one of the Chico-area restaurants was fired after allegations surfaced of sexual harassment. The manager was fired, the regional manager was fired and Alizadeh even fired his director of operations supervising that group of restaurants. That all happened four years ago. The EEOC filed a lawsuit over the incidents in October of last year, when the stores were already in bankruptcy.

Nice timing, Big Sister.

> The stores are all profitable. None of the managers from four years ago is still involved in the restaurants. The ownership is different now and it would be completely different after the asset sale, Gallup said. The bidders had no interest in picking up liability from the previous management through the bankruptcy court.
> The EEOC didn't define what its stipulations might be.
> "The stipulations scared the crap out of my buyers," Gallup said. "These are good operators with clean histories. Not one of them said they would open themselves to unknown levels of scrutiny. … One of them said: 'I will not take a dog with fleas into my house.' "

Big Sister knows someone has to pay when a woman claims to have been the victim of a crime. She has to make an example of someone so we remember to tread softly lest we inadvertently step on one Big Sister's toes. She has a lot of toes of varying sizes and shapes, over 150 million in the United States alone. And every one of these toes is a potential victim in need of additional protections and entitlements at the expense of men and families, which Big Sister gleefully provides.

> The EEOC's position is that it wants [to] make sure good management policies are in place to protect the workers where there had been a history of poorly managed environments.

What a noble cause, Big Sister, but instead of protecting these workers you've destroyed their jobs in an already harsh economy. I suppose we don't have to worry, though; they can just collect unemployment fueled by taxes paid by men.

French Philosophette Confronts Tyrant Babies

Elisabeth Badinter, author of Le Conflit, La Femme et La Mère (The Conflict, The Woman and The Mother), argues that to truly be liberated, women should reject all the healthy mothering advice about breastfeeding and organic food, plug the screaming kid with a bottle full of formula, kick back on the couch with a bottle of wine and a smoke and fire up the TV. According to Badinter, this would not only further empower women, but lead to an increase in fertility as well.

As a French "philosopher," Badinter probably isn't aware that millions of women in America have already taken wholeheartedly to her recommended lifestyle, and have been doing so for years. The so-called "ghetto queen" reclining on a sofa with a pack of Newports and a bottle of Cisco, basking in the glow of her widescreen TV featuring a larger than life Oprah Winfrey, surrounded by a passel of chaotic progeny, and host to various men from surrounding residences, is far from a rare phenomenon in the American inner-city. Her rural counterpart in a middle-American trailer park is legion as well.

Although these women may feel liberated, what they are actually doing is shifting their obligations onto the rest of us. As an example, I used to enjoy visiting the local library, but some years ago I noticed it was always full of screaming kids. I asked the librarian what was going on, and she told me that the mothers leave their kids at the library and then go do as they please for a few hours, coming back to pick them up later. The librarians had become de facto daycare providers. I actually asked a guy who was rather high up in the Seattle library administration what they intended to do about this problem, and he said they were working on it.

Eventually, they came up with a compromise. Now, there are still kids in the library, but they are mainly playing free video games on the computers, so they aren't underfoot quite so much. Additionally, for those of us who like quiet libraries, there are a couple small "study rooms" where one can close the door to shut out the babbling. I saw a librarian tell a teenage girl to stop playing her ipod at a high volume once, and the girl refused and threatened to give the librarian a beating. The librarian was a small woman, so she couldn't do anything about it. The compromise was obviously a failure. I don't go to libraries much any longer.

The point is that Badinter's notion of empowerment is simply about ditching one's responsibilities and letting others deal with the fallout. This is nothing new, as feminism is fundamentally about 1) increasing privileges, and 2) avoiding responsibilities. These are the twin pillars of the feminist movement, and have been from the very beginning. Every single feminist cause is directly related to one or the other, or both.

However, if Badinter's position indicates anything, it is that there is little more that can be foisted on individual men than already is, and that to remain dynamic and relevant feminists will now have to turn their guns directly on children and society.

NOW Denounces Health Care Bill

The National Organization for Women is infuriated with Barack Obama for passing a Health Care bill that does not provide subsidized abortion or extend benefits to illegal aliens. Citing the fact that abortion is one of the most common medical procedures women undergo in the United States, NOW President Terry O'Neill blames "Catholic bishops and extremist abortion rights opponents" for preventing government-backed abortion coverage.

Reading O'Neill, one might assume that most Americans like the idea of chipping in to help women eliminate unwanted babies. However, that is far from the case, and it is more likely that most Americans have moral issues with abortion, and would rather not be involved in paying for it. The hysteria and mischaracterization that NOW engages in is part of a long tradition of left-feminist activism, and brings the antics of Bob Avakian's Revolutionary Communist Party (read their amusing publication) to mind.

As objectionable as the concerns of NOW may be, the health care bill does raise issues that divorced/single fathers may want to consider. For example, will men be required by law to pay premiums for their ex-wives and children, whether they have the money or not? Given legislation passed in the 1980s and 90s, it seems almost inevitable that this will be the case, and the bill will impose yet another obligation on struggling fathers who are having a tough time making ends meet in this economic recession.

Reproductive Justice For Men

Elusive Wapiti · 22 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

> Infancy's the tender fountain,
> Power may with beauty flow,
> Mother's first to guide the streamlets,
> From them souls unresting grow—
> Grow on for the good or evil,
> Sunshine streamed or evil hurled;
> For the hand that rocks the cradle
> Is the hand that rules the world.

This is the second stanza of a poem penned by William Ross Wallace in 1865. I note with interest that Wallace was raised by a single mother, which may help put some context to the worshipful tone of the poem as a whole. Personally, I infer a prescient warning of sorts from this poem, a warning that may or may not have been intentional on the part of Wallace…that men who permit themselves to be locked out of fatherhood will find themselves ruled by those whose education was of, by, and for women with nary a masculine tutor in sight. Keep this 150 year old warning in mind as you read this post about the femmarxist "reproductive justice" movement.

The recent kerfuffle over the "Black Babies are an Endangered Species" billboard in Hotlanta spotlighted for me the race-tinged activism of the fine femmarxists over at SisterSong. I found myself wondering why the author of the news article would give lend a global platform to the mouthpiece of such an obscure–to me, anyway–group.

A few seconds of googling offered up an explanation. Hotlanta also appears to be the headquarters for the SisterSong special interest group. Exploring their site, another explanation made its way to the fore…the "Black Baby" billboard controversy was merely a convenient target of opportunity in a deliberate media-outreach campaign by a loosely organized network of feminist groups to push an agenda they call "reproductive justice" (RJ).

What is RJ, you say? Here is a brief excerpt from the SisterSong site:

> …the complete physical, mental, spiritual, political, social, environmental and economic well-being of women and girls, based on the full achievement and protection of women's human rights. It offers a new perspective on reproductive issue advocacy, pointing out that as Indigenous women and women of color it is important to fight equally for (1) the right to have a child; (2) the right not to have a child; and (3) the right to parent the children we have, as well as to control our birthing options, such as midwifery. We also fight for the necessary enabling conditions to realize these rights. This is in contrast to the singular focus on abortion by the pro-choice movement.
> One of the key problems addressed by Reproductive Justice is the isolation of abortion from other social justice issues that concern communities of color. Abortion isolated from other social justice/human rights issues neglects issues of economic justice, the environment, immigrants' rights, disability rights, discrimination based on race and sexual orientation, and a host of other community-centered concerns directly affecting an individual woman's decision making process. By shifting the definition of the problem to one of reproductive oppression (the control and exploitation of women, girls, and individuals through our bodies, sexuality, labor, and reproduction) rather than a narrow focus on protecting the legal right to abortion, we are developing a more inclusive vision of how to move forward in building a new movement.

It is easy to see how RJ, as holistically described like this, is a gun pointed at each and every man on the planet. By asserting control of when and when they will not have a child and the right to parent those children as they see fit (implied is that male interference will not be tolerated), RJ is nothing less than a bold move to assert control of the entire enchilada, to finish the job of locking men and boys out of society entirely–don't let the 'women of color' stalking horse fool you, my non-white bretheren, they're coming for you too–and institute a full-up matriarchy.

One thing that our adversaries has done very well has been to organize and institute a sort of lawfare on men that the male sex…being concerned with the well being of the tribe as a whole and not usually given to narrow parochialism for the benefit of men alone…has been slow to respond to. So, in a case of imitation being the sincerest form of flattery, I propose that we men adopt and tailor feminist RJ activism to our particular needs and concerns, and then use the focal points identified by that activism as vectors to direct our energies and fight for our own reproductive justice.

First, then, we need to define what reproductive justice is when applied to men. I offer the following initial–albeit not terribly creative–chop:

> Reproductive Justice is the complete physical, mental, spiritual, political, economic, and social well-being of men and boys. It will be achieved when men and boys have the economic, social and political power and resources to make healthy decisions about their bodies, sexuality, and reproduction for themselves, their families, and their communities in all areas of their lives, and when men have the right to have a child when they wish, the right to not have a child when they wish, and the right to parent in the manner as they wish.

From there, we bridge to how we should focus our efforts. Again, the success of our adversaries is instructive: As first suggested by the Asian Community for Reproductive Justice in their "A New Vision" manifesto, I suggest our RJ fight be centered around three "frameworks" that organize and focus activist's efforts:

> There are three main frameworks for fighting reproductive oppression: [1] Reproductive Health, [2] Reproductive Rights, and [3] Reproductive Justice.
> The Reproductive Health framework emphasizes the very necessary reproductive health services that women need.
> The Reproductive Rights framework is based on universal legal protections for women, and sees these protections as rights. Issues that were historically seen as private issues in the lives of women and girls have been made public and mainstream.
> And the Reproductive Justice framework stipulates that reproductive oppression is a result of the intersections of multiple oppressions and is inherently connected to the struggle for social justice and human rights.

I suggest we adapt these frames for reducing and eventually eliminating reproductive oppression below (please feel free to suggest others in your comments):

For the reproductive health frame, we men should focus on prostate and erectile health and on the supporting issues that adversely affect and even unnaturally truncate our reproductive lives. These issues include, but are not limited to, heart disease, decreased fertility due to phytoestrogens in our diet and female sex hormone effluvia in the water and food supply, suicide, victimization from homicide, incarceration for non-violent "crimes", discrimination in sentencing, particularly for non-Asian minority men, decreased male participation (and increased marginalization) in education, and health research and funding inequalities.

For the reproductive rights frame, we men should make "our body, our choice" our rallying cry. We should aim to achieve universal legal protections of these God-given rights for men and to ensconce those protections as State-enforced rights. The focus of this agitation should be the ownership of our labors and our genetic material, and resistance to any efforts to deprive us of the fruits of our labors without our affirmative and voluntary choice to do so. What is presently seen as "responsibilities" for men must be connected in law to their affirmative choices.

And the Reproductive Justice framework should stipulate that reproductive oppression is a result of the intersections of multiple oppressions and is inherently connected to the struggle for men's social justice and male human rights.

The following table summarizes the task set before us. In constructing it, I again heavily leveraged a similar product produced by the feminists:

Framework	Reproductive Health	Reproductive Rights	Reproductive Justice
Model	Service delivery to address men's reproductive and suporting health needs	Legal and policy advocacy to protect an individual man's right to reproductive and supporting health services	Organizing individuals and communities to foster change and challenge situations in which men suffer from power inequalities
Central Theme(s)	Our society needs to address men's health disparities through increased access to the full range of reproductive and supporting health services, tailored to the specific needs of various male communities	Linking positive choice with responsibility in making reproductive decisions	The control and exploitation of men as a sex, the labors of their bodies, and the focus on incarceration versus therapeutic correctives has historically been the means of controlling entire communities--particularly low-income men and their families
Strategies	Improving and expanding services, research, information, and access, particularly prevention of STDs	Social, legal, and policy advocacy; Emphasis on controlling genetic material and avoiding unintended pregnancies	Organizing, leadership development, cross-sector alliance building, and movement building
Key Players	Providers: professional medical community, health care providers, researchers, health educators	Advocates: legal experts, lawyers, policymakers, elected officials	Organizers: community members, allies
Limiting Factors	Focus on the individual, resources intensive, differing levels of access	Societal emphasis on male responsibility; the State's regulation of "behavior" and options in certain populations; assumes access to education, and access and influence in the policy process; requires a belief in the efficacy of the political system	Asks organizations and individuals to take personal, financial, social, and legal risks to challenge power relations, values, assumptions, present hierarchies; Long-term movement building is resource-intensive, requires endurance and patience on the part of movement members

Please note that I do not think that men adopting the same "victim" mental model as the feminists do will be productive, despite the fact that the above table tends toward donning the victim mantle in a few areas, mostly in "oppression" and power differentials. But noting that one is oppressed by Big Sister is not the same as being a victim; a victim mentality is one of helplessness. We are not helpless, we are in control of our own destinies and over our own thoughts and actions. I think that being yet another victim grievance group will have adverse effects to any male RJ movement in that it will turn off many right-minded men, precisely the set of go-getter independent men that we need to execute the social change that we desire. We don't need and don't want victims, we want do-ers, men who aren't seeking for someone else to help them be better.

This brings me to my next point, a point ably made by Jack Donovan not long ago (and I paraphrase): that fighting oppression and securing these rights will be a fight. Merely sidling up to the table and doing an Oliver–more gruel please, sir–will not succeed for us as it did for the feminists. Matt Dubay's experience with C4M in the legal system is evidence of that. If the post-enlightenment history of Western Civ, particularly the 20th Century, is any indicator, one only has as many rights as one has the political power to enforce them. "Political power flows from the barrel of a gun" Chairman Mao observed, and he is exactly correct. Specific to our case, we must have the will to do political, social, and legal violence to secure those rights against those who are equally determined to do political, social, legal, and even physical violence to us men to keep us in our place.

That is all for now. More ideas will be forthcoming about attacking reproductive oppression, and I am looking forward to reading some of yours. Some are already in work: expatting, marriage striking, ensuring sperm surety, but more will be required.

I'll close this post with the following Heinlein quote:

> “Violence, naked force, has settled more issues in history than has any other factor, and the contrary opinion is wishful thinking at its worst. Nations and peoples who forget this basic truth have always paid for it with their lives and freedoms.”

What we want–freedom, equality, restoration of patriarchy, whatever–won’t be given to us. We have to take it. And then endeavor to keep it.

Facing Scorn, Germaine Greer Struggles for Relevance

Welmer · 23 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an attempt to salvage her flagging reputation, Germaine Greer is declaring victory in the feminist revolution. As proof, she offers the high divorce rate, which she attributes to "heroic" women. Furthermore, like Gloria Steinem, she asserts that we are still in the initial stages of the feminist revolution.

Although Greer claims she has written better books than The Female Eunuch, she reveals herself to be a one-trick pony, and is still banging the same drum she was forty years ago. Choosing to ignore the raunchy sexuality that has exploded into the Anglosphere's streets and culture following feminist successes, she focuses on the old feminism of dissatisfied 1960s housewives, who are a feature of a bygone age.

Today, what possible relevance could the world of postwar Anglo culture have to young women, whose primary concern is attracting the attention of the flashiest thug in the local nightclub? Greer inevitably brings up the image of the poor, abused wife that still animates the imagination of the older generation, but this woman is a mythical creature. The kind of men who cheat on and beat their wives 40 years ago don't generally get married any longer; they are the guys who who spawn bastards and and engage in "pump and dump" one night stands with the many women who lust after them.

Men who marry today are, in general, decent, trusting caring guys — in short, the kind of men that many women find unattractive. Women don't leave men for abuse or infidelity so much as they leave men for being saps. Women leave men they don't respect. Rather than a means to escape abuse, divorce has become a weapon used against emotionally fragile men whose wives are no longer interested in them.

Greer misses the point. She's a blind old woman who is simply trying to justify the atrocities she and her cohort perpetrated on society. To the end, women like Germaine Greer and Gloria Steinem will defend their legacy, even as society's disgust with what they have wrought grows to outrage.

Prostitute Writer Supports Double Standard in Sexual Harassment

Journaliste and hooker Tracy Quan takes issue with men who report sexual harassment, telling them to "take it like a man." She compares sexual harassment complaints to "tattling," and impugns the masculinity of middle class men who complain about being groped by other men. She doesn't mention women, but the issue is obviously on her mind, and as a sex worker, she probably fears that female sexuality may also become taboo in the workplace, ruining women's strongest advantage in a corporate setting.

As a straight man, I can't see anything masculine about allowing men to fondle me at work. Quan, on the other hand, thinks it ought to be part of the job, even in the Navy! Here, she suggests that any guy who joins the Navy ought to expect sexual harassment:

> Speaking of battlefields, Massa's Naval career antics have been dredged up to prove a pattern of abuse. Do we really have to view the sailors who never filed complaints as "victims"? They're not women. This happened in a volunteer Navy. Guys: if you can't deal with the occasional overbearing bisexual prankster, please don't join up.

For middle class guys who want to keep what's left of their manhood intact at work, there are essentially two options for dealing with sexual harassment:

1. File a formal complaint
2. Beat the crap out of the offender

Number 2, while perhaps the most satisfying, will get you fired and probably arrested as well, and while number 1 may not always work, at least it gives you a shot at avoiding a deeply humiliating office environment.

Quan goes so far as to say that men who complain about being fondled at work are abusing the concept of victimhood. Yes, the staffers Massa dry-humped are now abusers…

Finally, Quan suggests that women can have no respect for a man who doesn't take it in the rear at work. This makes absolutely no sense. I don't think she understands men at all. Perhaps this is because, as a prostitute, she only has experience relating to them sexually:

> One of the more appealing American archetypes—despite modern feminism—is the man who will physically protect us. It's impossible for me to imagine this of a man who files an official complaint when his masculinity is challenged by an embarrassing jerk. As financial parity becomes a reality in our culture, as women sometimes even out-earn men, it's more crucial than ever for masculinity to retain its integrity. We need to feel something primal and irrational—it's called admiration—in order to respect the men around us. Too many women find themselves shacked up, legally partnered or otherwise connected with men they don't admire.

What a confused, disordered woman Quan is. Men do not react to sexual humiliation by superiors by becoming more masculine: they react with broken spirits or aggression toward the weaker among them. Were the abuses of Abu Ghraib intended to build character and make prisoners more manly? No, they were intended to sadistically break men.

Feminism is indeed the world's biggest shit test. It is a constant challenge to masculinity, and a call for men to prove themselves to women like Quan.

I tell you guys: she isn't worth it. Even if you're the kind of guy who's into hookers, you can find a cheaper, better-looking and more pleasant one than Quan.

The Myth of the Victim Wife

[image]

Perhaps the most potent weapon in the feminist arsenal has long been the widely-held belief that women are helpless victims in the face of male aggression, and that they would never wreck their families without being victims of some vile form of abuse on the part of their husbands. Although the younger generations have realized that this is a fantasy, older Americans – men in particular – often cling to the image of the wife as eternal victim, and husband as aggressor. Unfortunately, a lot of these older folks are still in very influential positions as judges, politicians, CEOs, etc. On the bright side, they won't be for too much longer.

If I had to give a rough estimate of the age that marks the cutoff, I'd have to say it's somewhere in the 50s. People who were born before 1960 are far more likely to hold to chivalrous, pedestalizing ideals concerning women; perhaps even more so than the GI generation that raised them. I think Zed's post on toxic fathers explains a lot of what was going on. I've observed the phenomenon he referred to in my own family, where I had a far more benevolent relationship with my grandfathers than their own sons did. For a lot of men who grew up in postwar America, there was a rivalry between father and son that manifested itself in a hatred and fear of men in general.

And then, of course, there was the unnatural phenomenon of the 50s and 60s housewife, who stayed at home in the 'burbs with a whole lot of time on her hands. Her mother was more likely to have been a worker than she was, and before the benefits of mass production brought every woman a fridge, washing machine, vacuum cleaner and electric range, women were performing the equivalent of light industrial labor in the home every day. Without the distraction of having to work for her own and her family's survival, the 50s suburban housewife was therefore left without a sense of purpose, except in being a proper housewife. She was, in a real sense, disempowered, and therefore a more sympathetic figure.

To the young men growing up resentful of their tough, authoritarian fathers, who were themselves children of the Great Depression and WWII, it was easier to bond with the nurturing and tragic mother. Zed suggests that there was an element of emotional incest underlying family dynamics:

> …boys and young men who sense that their fathers are destructive and not using their male power in a constructive and responsible manner will seek to psychically and emotionally castrate them and take away their power.
> Such men are sitting ducks for women, because in the absence of approval and blessing of their fathers, they sought it from the only place they could get it – their mothers. And thus does an unholy alliance of emotional incest often form between boys and mothers, with the boys displacing the fathers as the emotional mate of the mother. For many of them, being a "good man" involves both making "mama" happy, and being as unlike their fathers as they can manage to be.

The emotional bond between mother and son and the resentment men felt toward their fathers translated into action against men in general. Men who grew up in the midst of the postwar paradigm saw feminism as justice, and a means to destroy the hated father figure, but from my perspective and those of my generation, it appears that – in a cruel twist of irony – they only succeeded in destroying their sons.

I don't think these men will change much with age. Their cherished image of the mother-victim will follow them to the grave, just as the old Soviet veterans paid their respects to Lenin and Stalin up until the fall of Communism. Guys like Zed and Paul were pioneers, and there were few of their kind. For a couple of decades, there were a few men trying to warn the rest of us about what was going on, but until recently, they were speaking into the wind.

Change is certainly coming, but the sacred icon of the feminist revolution – the victim wife – will only fade away with the generation that cherishes it.

Estrogen Overload

I used to work in intelligence, compiling endless reports on radical groups and jihadis from open source, newspapers, government documents, and other sources. After a while it felt pretty repetitive. It's easy to get tired of reading about the endless village massacres in Kashmir, documenting sectarian murders in the Sunni Triangle, identifying associations between between Al Qaeda and Somali smuggling gangs and dealing with many other mundane evils of our time. It got to be somewhat demoralizing after a while.

Lately, it seems that the relentless emphasis on feminism in our culture in general is having a similar effect on me, and perhaps men in general. Turn on the TV, open the newspaper, take a class at a university or go to a bar, and you've got a good chance of immediately being confronted with some declaration of grrrl power. It could be in the form of a talk show, an article on the "glass ceiling," a class on feminist theory, or some cougar divorcée out on the prowl. It is surrounding and overwhelming. Most of us can't even escape it at work, as the ever-present threat of a harassment suit or the tyranny of female HR managers lurks overhead.

Sometimes, we need an escape from all this, but finding one is quite difficult. A trip to a non-feminist country would always be nice, but that could be out of reach for a lot of guys, and many of us have little time or opportunity for vacationing during the recession. In the old days, men had male associations and clubs they could visit to escape and enjoy themselves in a relaxing environment, but these have largely been outlawed or shamed into gender integration. In the meanwhile, female-only health clubs, spas and professional associations have blossomed throughout the land. Perhaps the hardest hit is the working man, who now has nothing but some free space in the garage.

When we at The Spearhead and others write about how men have been rendered eunuchs of sorts, it's important to point out that this didn't happen in a vacuum. Simply being male has become something akin to a civil infraction, and acting like one a crime. When the masculine has been stripped from the public sphere, the workplace, educational institutions and civil society in general and reduced to a few raw outlets such as professional sports and gaming, it's inevitable that the men one sees out and about in public will be emasculated.

It isn't certain that there is much of a solution to this problem in the near term, but perhaps a couple ideas are in order. For starters, the reintroduction of the men's health/athletic club might be helpful. There's an old boxing gym in my neighborhood – the Hillman City Gym – that trained Greg "Mutt" Haugen, who took the WBO Light Welterweight Title from Hector Camacho back in the early 90s. Relics such as these are good models, because they are far from appealing to the typical female, but unfortunately a lot of them have been compromised by training female fighters, which inevitably attracts the attention of the hardcore feminist butch lesbian types. Once they get involved, then the crack in the dike inevitably bursts and the masculinity is lost forever.

However, one thing these old gyms and clubs have going for them is that they are cheap. Men don't necessarily need luxurious surroundings to enjoy themselves, so a set of freeweights, a few punching bags and a ring are often good enough. One could apply the same principle to another type of club as well — it doesn't have to be about physical combat or working out. As long as there isn't any official or criminal business going on, making a club all male still isn't illegal.

So I'd suggest that guys get together with a few others and start making space where men can be men again. If we are forced to leave our manhood in the garage every time we leave the home, we might as well go to work building spaces in our neighborhoods and towns where we can reclaim a bit of masculinity for both our health and peace of mind. A few public "caves" could go a long way toward restoring both.

Gamers: Manginas Extraordinaire

Ferdinand Bardamu · 24 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The transition of video games from a niche hobby to a mainstream pastime that occurred in the past decade has wallpapered over many of the more sordid realities of the gaming community. It's not a stretch to say that most hardcore gamers are nerds, and while not all manginas are nerds, almost all nerds are manginas. Remember the brouhaha over Pro-Male/Anti-Feminist Tech's science fiction article back in October? The hordes of sniveling dweeboids who screamed bloody murder over his piece on blogs, forums, and The Spearhead's own comment section were doing what they do best – kissing the tails of the less-fair sex in vain hope of a little tail being tossed their way. Your average gamer is a servile sack of snot who will roll over and beg for a woman who so much as brushes him in the hallway.

In that context, this new service which charges men to play online games with women is not surprising in the least:

> What if you could pay a bit of cash to play Modern Warfare with an attractive girl? Or maybe relax with a casual game of checkers while you video chat with said female? A new social service launching tomorrow, March 23, called GameCrush (www.GameCrush.com) is hoping there are gamers out there willing to pay for the opportunity to play with girls.

> On GameCrush, guys are Players and girls are PlayDates. Players pay to play and PlayDates get paid to play. Guys can browse PlayDate profiles (there are currently around 1,200), view photos, and even chat with girls for free.

> For $8.25 you get 500 credits, which is enough for one game (400 credits) and a 100 credit tip at the end. An Xbox Live game will last 10 minutes, while a casual Flash game will get you six minutes of face time with your PlayDate.

"PlayDates" is quite appropriate, since the dorks who sign up for GameCrush are basically paying women like prostitutes, but without the sex. It's like phone sex but just as pricey and only half as retarded.

> GameCrush says it modeled its pricing structure after the cost of buying a girl a drink at a bar. In a bar, you're basically buying the opportunity to chat a girl up. GameCrush is hoping players will look at their service the same way.

Yeah, and how often does buying a drink for a girl work when it comes to getting some? This is an even dumber idea, because while the chick you bought a jello shot for is right in front of you (thus making sex possible, if improbable), given the global nature of the Internet and online gaming, there's a very good chance that the chick you just paid to kick your ass in Halo 3 isn't even in your time zone. Add in the fact that online dating sites are already Weißwurst parties, and you've got a recipe for continued blue balls.

> During an early demo of the service I played a couple casual games with PlayDate Ambibambi23. She was a nice girl (and totally kicked my ass in both pool and Battleship, btw) but her boyfriend was hanging out behind her and she made mention of him a couple times. Her game mood is set to "flirty," but there was zero flirting going on.

To normal men, the above scenario might sound lame. But to nerdy beta uber-gamers, who are likely the same group who get their rocks off to cuckoldry porn, this sort of thing is probably quite arousing.

I could go on and on, but to summarize, GameCrush is a ludicrous scam designed to bilk fools out of their hard-earned dollars in order to give them the opportunity to waste time with girls who will never so much as touch their joysticks. In other words, it will be a massive hit among gamers.

The Exaggerated Danger of Speaking Your Mind

I know it's a tough, highly politicized world out there. While in college courses listening to feminists spout garbage about how oppressed women are all over the world, and while reading their offensively bad material, I thought I'd better keep my mouth shut and try to play along. I really wish I hadn't done so. Feminists always graded me poorly — I was the "white male oppressor" and, even worse, an obvious smartass. I couldn't hide who I was from them no matter how I tried. If there's anything that might have helped me, it might have been some sassy game, which would have allowed them to overlook my clearly contrary views. Hell, I've known red-diaper social workers to drop their pants for skinheads, provided the shorn, tattooed serial criminals were adorable enough in their badness.

I know a guy who did time for felony weapon-dealing and then won a Marxist, Latina social worker to his side in a custody dispute. The kicker? This guy had a swastika tattooed on his back in prison and was a known gangster. He won custody, too! And then he proceeded to knock up another girl and father four more babies in addition to the two he already had. Despite heavy drinking and cheating, he's still got a devoted wife — and a successful business.

I've also known guys who were decent, honest, hardworking and careful men who got hauled into DV diversion programs despite never having laid a hand on anyone – man or woman – in their entire lives. Men who innocently compliment coworkers get dragged before HR on sexual harassment complaints. The men who follow the rules consistently get nailed. They are hated for being obedient, polite and compliant.

More and more, I've come to realize that Whiskey is right: women hate beta males. They hate them with a vengeful passion. They want their jobs, their money and their credentials. And after taking these things, they want to punish them severely. The war of the sexes is, above all, a war women wage against the pillars of civilization: those men who swallowed their pride and did their duty to build the magnificent cities and systems that sustain us today.

So what I'd like to suggest is that the men who timidly do their duty in fear of the axe hanging over their head ask themselves what they are truly gaining from their obedience. I'd like to see more guys simply tear off the gag and be a bit more open. It might actually do these men some good to be a bit more daring. One thing I've noticed is that people's affections toward others aren't usually based on political views, but rather more visceral feelings. If you hate feminism and keep it bottled up, the feminist coworker will know, and she'll hate you just the same as if you were a "male chauvinist pig" demanding sandwiches. In fact, she'd probably like you far more if you demanded a sandwich with a twinkle in your eye than she would if you merely stared at the ground, saying "yes ma'am" every time she made a demand.

Now that experience has taught me these truths, I'd like to go back to some of these classes, and tell the feminist professors exactly what I think of them. I'd be happy to tell them in front of the entire class that I think their assignments are garbage. They can love me or hate me, but I honestly don't think it would make much difference in terms of grades. I imagine it would be the same in a work environment, but I can't say for sure on that score. Perhaps some guys who work at highly PC establishments can give us their opinion as well.

I'd like, once again, to bring Niccolo Machiavelli's quote concerning fortune to attention:

> I conclude therefore that, fortune being changeful and mankind steadfast in their ways, so long as the two are in agreement men are successful, but unsuccessful when they fall out. For my part I consider that it is better to be adventurous than cautious, because fortune is a woman, and if you wish to keep her under it is necessary to beat and ill-use her; and it is seen that she allows herself to be mastered by the adventurous rather than by those who go to work more coldly. She is, therefore, always, woman-like, a lover of young men, because they are less cautious, more violent, and with more audacity command her.

When Rationalization Rears its Ugly Head

Both men and women do terrible things to each other. They betray, abandon, neglect and abuse. Honestly, I don't think either sex beats the other when it comes to treating spouses like garbage. However, when men do something horrible, they are usually contrite. Often, they take the blame. In fact, in many cases men will take the blame even when they weren't at fault.

However, with women it is an entirely different story. I have only once in my life heard anything approaching regret from a woman for hurting her husband. This woman, who had destroyed a marriage to a decent man by having affairs, only said, many years after the fact: "don't get married too young; I regret the mistakes I made because I was too immature." I liked her much better for it, but still this wasn't a real mea culpa.

A reader sent me an article about a woman who left her husband after he came home from Afghanistan with severe wounds, including the loss of two limbs. It should be shocking, but it isn't. Few people have the strength of character to choose a life in service to the higher ideals of family at any cost. In days past, they might not have had as much of a choice, but I'm sure the same thing happened then. It just wasn't spoken of.

Today, however, communication of this shameful, tragic reality about the human condition is no longer relegated to tragic songs and art, but to the tabloids, where women frankly rationalize the unjustifiable.

Sue Norton, wife of bomb disposal technician Peter Norton, explains why she left her husband and restricted his access to his young sons, who I suspect, given the picture in the article, were the only source of true joy in his life:

> On a bright winter's morning in January 2007, I found myself in a busy car park in Cheltenham with my family. I noticed how happy and relaxed everyone else seemed.
> Occasionally, a small child would stare in our direction before their parent whispered to them to look away or shot us a sympathetic glance.
> I looked down at my husband, Pete, sitting in his wheelchair in front of me, one arm and a leg missing. On Pete's lap was our eldest son Tom, then four, pushing his two-year-old brother Toby forward in his pram as I took the weight of all three of them. We must have been a bizarre sight. But by then I was almost beyond caring.

Notice the shame she feels at being stuck with this shell of a man. How could she be reduced to an object of pity?

> I still loved my husband, as he probably still loved me, and wanted us to stay together as a family. But I also knew I couldn't take any more of the physical and psychological strain of looking after two small children and an amputee.
> My priority had to be our two small sons. If I allowed myself to be ground down to the point where I could no longer care for them properly, I would be letting the whole family down.

Here's the usual, common rationale: she's doing it for the children. That's a base lie. It's for her. This is why it is so ugly when women rationalize their choices in such matters: it lays bare the most disgusting truths about humanity. It may be reality, but it is like cutting open the flesh of a beautiful form and revealing the squirming, quivering guts beneath.

Here's more:

> An archeologist and former MoD civil servant, I'd given up my career after becoming pregnant with my first child. On top of looking after the children, I began to feel as if I'd been turned from being Pete's wife into his > carer and nurse.

She resents him now for smashing her dreams. We always turn the blame on those we love…

To me, however, this is the worst:

> Pete, now 48, teaches at the UK Defence Academy at Shrivenham, Wiltshire. Tom and Toby's happiness is paramount to us both, so I take the boys to see their father for one day each fortnight.
> Although Pete's brother helps him with this, it is difficult for me to leave the boys for much longer with their father as he is still confined to a wheelchair and could not run after them in an emergency.

The man is blown to pieces in service to his country, and now, despite struggling back to becoming a productive member of society, becomes a virtual stranger to his own children. Oh, the lot of men. Remember Peter Norton whenever you hear women speak of their "oppression."

In closing, here are a couple songs about how men suffer from war:

Some New Info Comes to Light in the Peter Norton Case

Welmer · 26 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Peter Norton, the war veteran and amputee whose ex-wife went fishing for sympathy for ditching her injured husband, may be a more capable father than his former wife suggested. While reading through the comments on the interview with Sue Norton, I noticed that a Sheffield man identifying himself as a friend of Peter Norton's claims that the story Sue gave the Daily Mail is far from accurate. In fact, if the information provided by "a friend" is accurate, Peter is making the trip to see his boys by himself!

Here is what the man who claims to be Norton's friend has to say:

> Pete is a good friend of mine and I can confirm that this is a very one sided story and one I believe he is unlikely to read. Pete is a completely open, cheerful and independent man who does NOT require a carer, can drive and will soon be out of his wheel chair and back on his prosthetic leg again.
> He adores his children and they are his life. He has tried to see his children more regularly that fortnightly but his ex-wife has refused, even when Major Norton has agreed to helpers being present.
> Major Nortons ex-wife does NOT drive her boys to see their father, he drives himself every fortnight to see them as she is unwilling to travel.
> - A friend, Sheffield, UK, 25/3/2010 11:04

This raises my disgust for Sue Norton, as well as my regard for Peter, to an entirely new level.

So the man has actually put in the effort to become self-sufficient, and his wife is using his injuries as an excuse not only to leave him, but to withhold his children as well. In fact, I'll bet one of the reasons Sue Norton gave her one-sided story to the press was to ensure that she could absolutely bury any chances Peter had to get a fair custody arrangement. This is the kind of below-the-belt tactic millions of men across the Anglosphere are already familiar with, but all the more outrageous considering the circumstances.

I hope that some men in Britain can take some action to help Peter be more than a 7% dad. If Major Norton can win a fair amount of time with his boys, it would be a victory not only for him and his children, but fathers all over Britain and beyond.

Here's a little background info on Major Norton:

> At 1917 hours on 24th July 2005, a three vehicle patrol from B Company, 2nd Battalion, 121st Regiment of the Georgia National Guard was attacked by a massive command initiated improvised explosive device in the Al Bayaa District near Baghdad. The ensuing explosion resulted in the complete destruction of a patrol vehicle and the deaths of four United States personnel. Parts of the vehicle, equipment and human remains were spread over a very large area. Due to the significance of the attack, a team from the Combined Explosives Exploitation Cell, commanded by Norton, was tasked immediately to the scene. On arrival, Norton was faced with a scene of carnage and the inevitable confusion which is present in the aftermath of such an incident. He quickly took charge and ensured the safety of all coalition forces present. A short while later he was briefed that a possible command wire had been spotted in the vicinity of the explosion site.
> With a complete understanding of the potential hazard to himself and knowing that the insurgents had used secondary devices before in this particularly dangerous part of Iraq, Norton instructed his team and the United States forces also present in the area to remain with their vehicles whilst he alone went forward to confirm whether a command wire improvised explosive device was present. A short while later, an explosion occurred and Norton sustained a traumatic amputation of his left leg and suffered serious blast and fragmentation injuries to his right leg, arms and lower abdomen. When his team came forward to administer first aid, he was > conscious, lucid and most concerned regarding their safety. He had deduced correctly that he had stepped on a victim operated improvised explosive device and there was a high probability that further devices were present. Before allowing them to render first aid, he instructed his team on which areas were safe and where they could move. Despite having sustained grievous injuries he remained in command and coolly directed the follow-up actions. It is typical of the man that he ignored his injuries and regarded the safety of his men as paramount as they administered life saving first aid to him. It is of note that a further device was discovered less than ten metres away and rendered safe the following day. Norton's prescience and clear orders in the most difficult of circumstances undoubtedly prevented further serious injury or loss of life.

> -In the London Gazette, 2006-03-24

And, to hear it from Sue Norton, this man – recipient of the George Cross and the FBI Star – is unfit to be a father to his boys… Unbelievable.

According to all accounts, Major Norton is a dignified man who, unlike his ex-wife, respects the privacy of family, so if anyone is willing to help him, more action than words is probably in order. Perhaps fathers4justice UK can help out. I don't know much about resources in the UK, but there must be something out there.

For my part, I'm going to declare Major Peter Norton "Hero Father of the Month."

The Divas Doth Protest Too Much

If you're in the NYC metro area, you might have heard about the big brouhaha over a recently painted mural over on Times Square. More than 90 feet long, the mural depicts African American and Latina Women in various poses.

The mural itself was painted by a Latina artist from Puerto Rico and lives in the Bed-Sty section of Brooklyn. She's come under fire from some Black and Hispanic communities up in NYC for making a mural that demeans Women and the rest of it.

Then I get word of an outfit of professional Black & Latina Women called "Phenomenal Women Inc." basically waging a media campaign against the powers that be who bankroller the mural in the first place. Now, I've seen pics of the mural itself, and while I can see their point, I'm sorry but somehow I really don't see this as something to raise much of a ruckus about-but I DO have something to say about these "Baps". I'll let er rip after you get a chance to see the mural for yourself:

OK.

You may recall my recent posting up of an all-White step team who won a nationwide step competition? I didn't say much about the issue at the time, mainly because I really wanted to hear what you all had to say about it instead. This time though, I gots to vent my spleen…

You know, the thing that really burned me up about the White step team incident, wasn't that they won, but that the haters were mad 'cause they got beat at their own game-worse, they're so pretentious that it all would be a big joke if the stakes weren't so high. The Black Greeks claim to be about "the community" but after a century of being in existence the only time in recent memory they can make the headlines is when an all-White squad shows them up at a contest the Black Greeks organized to begin with. Sure, their supposed noble aims are outlined in their charters, and that's exactly what I'm zeroing in on here — exactly what do they have to show for all their claims of "community involvement"? From where I sit, not a lot, unless one wants to count corporate sponsored step shows, the latest of which was won by a White team, I might add.

Meanwhile, all the familiar and longstanding problems besetting Black America continue, unabated: HIV/AIDS, among other STDs, are still astronomically high. So are highschool dropout rates, Black Male unemployment rates, homicide rates, incarceration rates, illiteracy rates, homelessness rates, infant mortality rates (btw, Bronx has one of the highest infant mortality rates IN THE COUNTRY — where are the "Phenomenal Women" on that???), etc. In Baltimore, the school that Thurgood Marshall attended is now on the brink of being closed down, just like half of all schools in Kansas City last week. Where's the "Phenomenal Women", the socalled "Divine Nine" on that?

Why, they're really making moves addressing White step teams and racy murals, of course.

Meanwhile Black and Hispanic America dies slowly on the vine, and a big part of that reason is because outfits like the two mentioned above not only major in the minors, but also because they're all too quick to wanna ape their White betters. There, I said it. I mean, let's not mince words here-the Black Greeks and "professional" outfits like the one this post is about wanting to be Muckety Mucks in their own right, but can't get on in White America for real, so they make their own cliques and basically do the exact same thing they see Ms. Ann and Mr. Charlie do. Only in Black – and now it seems – Latinface.

If the "Phenomenal Women" really want to make an impact on Times Square without so much as firing a metaphorical shot, all's they gots to do is DON'T GO THERE. Do spend money there. In short, do all they can to simply avoid the place. Simple. Problem. Solved.

That's what I do when I have reason to believe groups or businesses or corporations are dissing me and mine: I simply take my business elsewhere. For good. When Eddie Bauer gave those two Brothas a workout in one of their stores in suburban Maryland a decade ago, I decided Eddie Bauer couldn't get my money anymore, and this is coming from someone who actually liked Eddie Bauer apparel a lot. But I did it. And I never looked back. I didn't ring up the Reverends Jackson and Sharpton. Didn't flail about trying to organize a boycott. I just simply stopped buying Eddie Bauer shit. The end.

And as for the group/association thing, of which their exists a gazillion umpteen of em in Black USA, I belonged to one that had within its ranks Men from all walks of life and ages. We put up the money to run our own candidate for local elected office; we lost, but it felt good to know that I could make a difference in the local politics of where I lived. We adopted a few public schools and volunteered to mentor the young boys. One of them is a national chess team legend. We put out our own local journal magazine, airing issues and putting a spotlight on problems we thought needed to be addressed, and for a good five years it was highly profitable. And we organized our own town watches, which aided the police in reducing crime. For my money, that beats just about anything the Divine Nine or the Phenomenal Women are doing.

Look. I hear these gals on the symbolism thing, and for what its worth, I do think a bit of balance could have been depicted in the artwork – theres nothing wrong with showing a few Sistas and Latinas carrying briefcases, too – but the plain truth of it is we've got some seriously big fish to fry in both communities, to be wasting so much time and energy on something that, at the end of the day, really won't help do much to turn the things I wrote about above around. I f these Women really want to be Phenomenal, they can start by actually taking some of the Sistas and Latinas in the hood under their wing and do some longterm one on one mentoring, starting with the basics, like relationships, childrearing, deportment and so on, all the way through seeing them through job training or schooling. This is something all of them can do, doesn't cost a lot if anything at all, and doesn't require getting a grant, waging a media campaign or organizing a boycott. If things are gonna get any better for Black and Brown folks, its Talented Tenth is gonna have to do a lot better than making mountains out of moehills.

Actually showing their faces in the hood is a good start.

Now adjourn your uppity asses…

Affirmative Action CIA Agent gets Herself and Others Blown Up

Welmer · 27 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for GQ, Robert Baer describes an incident in Khost, Afghanistan in which a CIA analyst was promoted beyond her capabilities and then proceeded to botch her job of handling the alleged informant. This incident occurred less than three months ago, yet I had never heard of it, despite it being a very significant blow to the CIA.

Baer describes agent "Kathy"'s (her name is withheld) abrupt rise from desk jockey to running the CIA base in Khost:

> The base chief is a covert employee of the CIA; her identity is protected by law. I'll call her Kathy. She was 45 years old and a divorced mother of three. She'd spent the vast majority of her career at a desk in Northern Virginia, where she studied Al Qaeda for more than a decade. Michael Scheuer, her first boss in Alec Station, the CIA unit that tracked bin Laden, told me she had attended the operative's basic training course at the Farm, the agency's training facility, and that he considered her a good, smart officer. Another officer who knew her told me that despite her training at the Farm, she was always slotted to be a reports officer, someone who edits reports coming in from the field. She was never intended to meet and debrief informants.
> Kathy knew that there was a time when only seasoned field operatives were put in charge of places like Khost. Not only would an operative need to have distinguished himself at the Farm; he would've run informants in the field for five years or more before earning such a post. He probably would have done at least one previous tour in a war zone, too. And he would have known the local language, in this case Pashto. Kathy skipped all of this. Imagine a Marine going straight from Parris Island to taking command of a combat battalion in the middle of a war.

The 45-year-old divorced single mother was handed a job that was guaranteed to make her career, but sadly she bungled it badly, taking the bait from a dedicated jihadi who detonated a suicide vest in a bid to make it into Jannah, taking out a number of CIA officers with him.

The jihadi, a Jordanian Palestinian named Balawi, managed to fool Kathy by emailing pictures of himself whooping it up with various Al Qaeda leaders. He had first been identified after starting up a radical Islamic blog, which prompted the Jordanian government to haul him in for some serious interrogation, where he agreed to become an Al Qaeda mole. It seems the rough treatment at the hands of Jordanian intelligence only served to further radicalize Balawi, and he made up his mind to blow some people up.

There were a number of errors here, including the failure to search him before he got into the debriefing room (that's pretty shocking, given that they were in Afghanistan), and the exposure of his identity to Afghan civilians.

One might be tempted to blame Kathy for her incompetence, but it was not her decision to be thrown into such a position without the requisite experience. Ultimately, the blame lies with ideologues in high positions, who thought it would be a good idea to put the poor woman in over her head.

If this kind of ideologically-driven blundering has made its way to the top levels of the CIA, one can only imagine what kind of inefficiencies and poor judgment plague the rest of America's power structure, from our corporate boardrooms to the highest levels of military command.

Feminists not all that Impressed by Manginas

Welmer · 27 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jacky Friedman, described as a "feminist rock star," reveals a bit about her dating preferences, and supplicating manginas are not her type. Although it doesn't seem that Ms. Friedman has all that much latitude given her physique, she still holds out for men who stand up to her shit tests, despite the fact that they tend to leave her when she lashes out at them.

For the supplicating manginas out there, this is how feminists truly think of you:

> So do you meet guys who pass the feminist test but then turn out to be disappointments for other reasons?
> JF: Oh God. There is a type of feminist guy who is so eager to fall over himself to be deferential to women and to prove his feminist bona fides and flagellate himself in front of you, to the point that it really turns me off. And it makes me sad, because politically, these are the guys that I should be sleeping with! You know what I'm talking about?
> JF: Everyone knows what I'm talking about. And some of them are even really cute! I want to say to them, "If you could be a person, like a whole, complicated person, who I feel like I could crack jokes around, then I would really like you." But they're so serious about their feminism at every moment that I don't feel like a person to them. I feel like I'm on a pedestal, almost. I know that they're not going to disagree with anything I say under any circumstances. And I don't feel like I can make a raunchy joke about sex, because they'll be horrified. . . . I hate to be critical of our allies in any way, because we need them, but there's something about that certain kind of hyperfeminist guy that makes them unappealing to date, to me. I suspect it has something to do with our internal conceptions of masculinity, which is terrible on my part.

This reveals pretty clearly that feminism is a massive shit test. Jacky doesn't really want a feminist man, because she sees them as weak little puppy dogs begging for a treat. No, she wants a man who will fight back, but these men have a tendency to dump her and go on to greener pastures:

> So do you have any other fucking while feminist horror stories?
> JF: . . . What happens to me that drives me up a tree is this: The guys who respond to me and are like, 'You're awesome. You're kind of a hellcat." They think it's cool and kind of bad-ass that I'm outspoken and passionate about things. They think that's really hot. They're into it. But then when that outspokenness gets applied back to them, it's suddenly game-over. You know the idea of the Manic Pixie Dream Girl? She's light, and quirky, and she has no inner life of her own, and just there to serve our hero's development and erotic interests. I sort of feel that I get cast in these dudes' narratives as the Hellcat Dream Girl, there to prove how bad-ass they are because they're dating such a bad-ass woman. They think it's cute or sexy. But when I use that smart, outspoken bad-assery to challenge their own perspectives, it's suddenly not sexy at all. It happens when they say something that I disagree with, and I act like a person and not someone that is playing out their particular fantasies.
> It's happened to me a million times . . . they want it as a trophy. "Hey, look at my bad-ass girl." They don't want to deal with me as a person. It follows this pattern where it usually comes from a person who seeks me out. They try to seduce me. They think I would be an accomplishment to conquer or something. They seek me out and try to get me interested in them, and then I am, and then they flee. . . . I feel like the same thing happened with the guy I dated for two years. He liked the idea of being a guy who would be with someone like me, but ultimately it turned out that he wanted someone who wouldn't challenge him as much, a person who > was easier and quicker to sweep away. I got evidence of that when, within three months of breaking up with me, he was dating a 23 year old who lists her political views on Facebook as "moderate."

Who can blame the guy? Faced with a barrage of feminist shit tests, a 23-year-old politically moderate girl certainly seems like a more reasonable choice than a fat, aggressive feminist.

A Bit of Discipline is in Order

Welmer · 28 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The comments issue has come up again, drawn to my attention through emails from concerned parties. In fact, I was already getting a little annoyed by a couple things before these reminders, but it's one of those things I've put off.

First off, I'm going to draw attention to the commenting policy, which has remained the same for many months now. There have been a lot of violations of #4 lately. Occasional profanity is OK, but "c-nt" and "bitch" in every other sentence is getting to be too much. Admittedly, profanity is one of the least of my concerns, but it is symptomatic of what's been going on.

I'd like to remind people that those registered and logged in represent a small fraction of all the people visiting the site — usually around 10% at any given time, and in terms of individuals throughout the day far less, probably on the order of 2%. It doesn't look good to have profanity underneath every single post.

Secondly, unprovoked personal attacks are starting to become an issue. I should point out that the prohibition against unprovoked personal attacks includes those carried out against women. Criticism is fine, but let's try to be civil.

And finally, there is the matter of no bullshit. Now exactly what constitutes BS may be a matter of debate, but ultimately it is up to the authors and contributors to decide. Unfortunately, I have caught a few whiffs of it lately.

The group of people to whom The Spearhead owes the most responsibility is its readers. Authors, contributors and commenters all have this responsibility. Rants about our personal battles are not helpful, nor are wheelbarrows of obscenity and BS. If comments are overly offensive to our readers, I'm going to start removing them. Likewise, if The Spearhead comments section becomes a platform for someone's personal vendetta, I'm going to put a stop to that.

The majority of commenters are posting thoughtful stuff, and even those who have pushed the limits a bit are, for the most part, valued commenters, but I'm going to ask those who are really getting carried away to cool it, and take another look at the commenting policy.

I'd also like to remind people that if they really want to get the word out in their own way, they can start up their own blogs. Absolutely nobody is stopping them.

I'll be perfectly honest about why I offered that last piece of advice: If I feel that certain commenters are acting like competitors in regards to The Spearhead and its authors, I'm going to treat them as such. Nothing personal, mind you; a little competition keeps a man on his game, but hell if I'm going to give an opponent free run of the field.

Rest for the Weary

Recently, I wrote about how the struggle against feminist excesses eventually becomes tiring. It starts to kill morale after a certain point, because there are so many far nicer things one can contemplate in life. Of course, there are still legions of men who haven't yet been through the meat grinder of family law, or are just being thrown into it, so there's a steady stream of freshly drafted men out there ready to do battle, but for the veterans, battle-fatigue inevitably sets in at some point.

I'm using war metaphors here because The Spearhead itself is, in part, named after a battle tactic, in which an armored column punches a hole through enemy lines in an attempt to split defenders and restrict their maneuverability. In order to succeed, the column has to be backed by considerable, concentrated firepower. It's actually a pretty risky move, and can fail if defenders can successfully engage the corners of the spearhead and choke the column, keeping infantry from flowing through. A couple successful examples include the Israeli invasion of the Sinai in 1973, and the German "race to the sea" in early 1940, which cut off the British Expeditionary Forces and forced a hasty evacuation from Dunkirk. Heinz Guderian probably pioneered its successful use, and later Ariel Sharon exploited the concept to considerable success in the Arab-Israeli wars.

Not everything is in a name, but it is a useful metaphor in this case. As I fire off and post articles, it feels as though I am throwing shells into the breech, one after the other, pausing only to advance and reset the sights. It does seem repetitive and never-ending because of the intensity — and we need intensity. But at some point, The Spearhead will have served its purpose, and it will be time to move onto other things. Mopping up, politics, figuring out where we go from here, etc. Not yet, but maybe it's time to start thinking about that.

One thing I've noticed is that most of the guys who have been in this fight for a long time develop a fairly deep cynicism about men themselves. Having spent a good deal of time observing and thinking about how we got into this mess in the first place, veterans begin to accept that some things will never change, and that we are simply repeating the same timeless mistakes that have plagued humanity since the inception of civilization, and probably before. When one comes to this realization, it's easy to develop the attitude that it isn't worth it, because every step forward is inevitably followed by a step back.

However, this isn't entirely accurate. We have made some impressive advances in a relatively short period of time. Not only are our memes propagating across the blogosphere and beyond; I've noticed a definite change in men's attitudes over just the last year. In fact, I'd say we're just starting to recover from the long step backward of the 60s-today. Of course, we aren't trying to go back to the past — that's never worked after all. Ideally, we should be able to make things better for both women and men. And, as Zed has pointed out, much progress has been made over the years despite our current frustration. So why do we still push on? Because it's in our nature to move forward, to build, and to strive for higher peaks. This is what men do.

It's exhausting work. At times it seems thankless, just like my grandpa's job mining the Comstock Lode as a teenager must have, but at the end of the day we find that we've inched forward. However, sometimes it becomes overwhelming. Heavy duty day after day wears us down, and eventually morale starts to flag. People grow irritated with each other, and sniping commences. When this happens, it's time for some R&R.

So for the veterans out there who have been on the offensive for months or years, if you find yourself feeling apathetic, frustrated, or even pissed off by the often chaotic and sometimes counterproductive atmosphere, you've earned a break, and should definitely take one. Go for a ride on your bike, take a walk in the hills, enjoy some time with a woman, or attend a symphony. Whatever inspires you, just go do it and enjoy yourself. The pleasures in life, both great and small, are ignored at a cost, and often it is only in moments of relaxation and enjoyment that we find our best insights. Importantly, we also find the happiness and strength to carry on in those moments, and they give us the vision of a better future.

It’s springtime. Enjoy the scents and the blooming flowers, and watch the people as they emerge from the winter gloom. Take it all in, and let the worries and tension evaporate into the open air to be carried away by the sweet breeze.

Black Widows Strike Again

At least 38 were killed in twin blasts in the Moscow Metro this morning, reminding Muscovites that the troubles in the Caucasus are far from over. As in many previous attacks, the bombers are suspected to have been women — a common tactic that exploits assumptions that women are less dangerous than men. In fact, the so-called “Black Widows”, Chechen female terrorists, have been responsible for hundreds of deaths over the years, participating in some of the most deadly terrorist assaults in Russia.

The acts of Black Widows are often excused as a result of family trauma and loss (i.e. relatives killed by Russian troops), whereas one rarely sees the same excuses applied to male mujahideen, who usually come from exactly the same communities that created their deadly sisters.

One of the bombs was detonated beneath the FSB headquarters at Lubyanka, formerly the KGB headquarters, which is responsible for monitoring and fighting terrorism in Russia.

Given the very wide latitude given women in the United States, a terrorist operation using female bombers would probably have a significant chance of success. This was likely the idea behind the recruitment of American women for bombing missions by European jihadis.

Boob Brouhaha

Following a Disney casting call for young, naturally endowed women, feminists have gone on the warpath. The requirements are as follows:

> beautiful female fit models. Must be 5ft7in-5ft8in, size 4 or 6, no bigger or smaller. Age 18-25. Must have a lean dancer body. Must have real breasts. Do not submit if you have implants.

What really sent the women of Feministing into a rage was the warning that applicants will be subject to a test to determine whether or not they have real breasts. The test will involve running and jumping in place so as to observe breast movement, which, when considerable, is an indicator of natural breasts.

Among other objections, Feministing calls this "sexual slavery":

> This is not to mention Disney extends its apparent regard for women to the Pirates attraction at Disney World too. I was there in November and it was disturbing, to say the least. So fake boobs don't make the cut, but sexual slavery is a-okay for your kids' viewing. Nice.

Given that millions of young women would give whatever they had to be Keira Knightley, calling this "sexual slavery" is the grossest of hyperbole. It is equivalent to calling the NFL combine, where young men go through rigorous physical tests that are far more extensive and invasive than running in place "slavery."

Perhaps, however, the feminists feel that they should be able to star in Hollywood blockbusters no matter what the quality of their assets happens to be. Of course, if this were the case, the films would likely turn out as floppy as their female stars.

They Can't Have It Both Ways

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 29 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the past I have talked about non-feminist (i.e. non-leftist) forms of female supremacism. Something that all forms of female supremacism or misandry have is an attempt to have it both ways when it comes to women. Women are "independent" yet are dependent of men either through the state (feminism) or marriage (conservative female supremacism).

I found a conservative female supremacist example of this at the [Non] Thinking Housewife:

> I should say that I find the idea of a "men's movement" not merely quixotic but wrong.
> What is needed is a movement which places families at the heart of things
> The feminist attack on masculine authority is not, at bottom, about misandry. It is about misanthropy, expressed through a demonic attack on the family. Its source is not really the desire to see men brought low, though that is necessary if Christian civilization is to be annihilated. It is much, much easier to believe otherwise, but I urge all men of a conservative bent to resist this self-flattering lie! Its source is a hatred of the feminine, borne of Satan's fear of the Blessed Virgin

One of the great pretty lies that conservative female supremacists promote is the idea that feminism is an attack on "families" not men. The hordes of men sitting in jail because of the false rape industry and the hordes of men who lost their job due to the sexual harassment industry and affirmative action and all the boys who had to suffer through female supremacist teachers can explain in detail why this is wrong. You may ask if the conservative female supremacists want to destroy feminism wouldn't they want to play up how men are being hurt by feminism? They don't because that would expose themselves as being minimally different than the feminists. Since they can't do that, they try to have it both ways by saying, "men are getting hurt but not really since they benefit from feminism so the real problem is an attack on 'families'".

What does it mean when conservative female supremacists say that feminists are trying to destroy "familes"? They're trying to claim that the "real victims" are women not men. This is borne out of the fact that what conservative female supremacists are really worried about is the gravy train ending. They're worried that men are wising up and not going to be on the plantation anymore. From that greedy and craven perspective, women are the victims despite the fact that it's men who are losing their jobs, getting thrown in jail, etc.

Another commenter there wrote:

> In my view, the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) is even worse than the feminist movement. I say this because the mainstream feminist culture does believe in protecting and supporting women to some extent while the MRM is opposed to any support and protection of women. Indeed the MRM promotes equality between men and women to a radical degree, more so than typical feminists do. The MRM is very anti-family and anti-marriage, constantly talking about and promoting "the marriage strike" and producing websites like "Dump Your Wife Now." They talk of how marriage is a bad deal for men and how men should avoid marriage at all costs. They are against child support as well; they seem to be against any imposition of responsibility upon men.
> If there is one thing that Men's Rights Activists (MRAs) hate more than anything else it is chivalry. Chivalry is the great enemy of MRAs because chivalry imposes responsibilities and duties upon men towards women
> I am against feminism because feminism doesn't protect women as well as patriarchy does. MRAs are also opposed to feminism but they are opposed to feminism because it offers too much protection to women in their view.

I have for a long time said that the argument between feminists and most conservative “anti-feminists” is really about how to best extract money and resources from men (i.e. arguing about how to hold the whip over men). Outside of a few minor issues conservative female supremacists like the one I just quoted are in total agreement with feminism. This proves what I have said more than anything else in such stark terms that I never thought I would actually see in writing.

Yes, MRAs (and others) are against the imposition of “responsibilities” on men. That’s because it has a simpler name, slavery. This conservative female supremacist is claiming that each individual man has “responsibilities” to women, not specific women but all women by the fact of his birth. (This is no different than feminists who have created massive transfers of wealth from men to women via the state.) This is slavery because these men did nothing to create these “responsibilities”. They didn’t get married to all women. They didn’t have children with all women. If a man doesn’t get married and doesn’t have children then he has no family “responsibilities” in the manner the person above is describing. This person I quoted should be happy about the marriage strike since men who are a part of the marriage strike are being responsible. However, this isn’t about responsibility. The person I quoted is worried that more and more men are figuring out the scam and avoiding it by not getting married.

If any of these conservative female supremacists really wanted marriage striking men to get married, then they would address these men’s concerns, namely the existence of no-fault divorce and the corrupt “family” court system. This would solve the problem and all of those websites this person would complain about would go away. To you and me that seems like the logical solution. However, since this isn’t about solving real problems, but trying to get men back on to the plantation, we instead get nonsense about “responsibility” from the conservative female supremacists. Plus, the logical solution would expose that women including conservative and religious women are a major part of the problem. Right now people like the person I quoted try to have it both ways by saying divorce is a sin but divorce is all the man’s fault for failing to show “leadership” or “responsibility” which is just a way to avoid placing the responsibility for divorce where it belongs, on women. This is especially true since women file for most divorces.

The person I quoted also claims that women are in need of “protection”. That brings up the question of whether women are really adults or children. If women need “protection” then they’re children and should be treated like children. If women are adults then they don’t need “protection” and should be held responsible for their actions. I’m not going to argue either side of this question except to say that the person above like all female supremacists tries to have it both ways. Either women are adults or children. Instead what this person is promoting a hybrid that enslaves men. That is trying to have it both ways.

Uma Thurman Mommy Film Tanks in UK

Commenter Krauser brought the disastrous opening weekend of "Motherhood," Uma Thurman's new film to my attention. The take from the opening weekend was an amusing 88 pounds, or $130. Uma, who is approaching 40, may have lost some of her star power due to age, but the subject matter – single motherhood in Manhattan – probably didn't help much either. The only film that has ever done worse on its opening weekend was about an illiterate, consumptive and toothless Polish street artist.

In addition to Thurman, the film featured Minnie Driver, Anthony Edwards and an appearance by Jodie Foster (can't go wrong there!). Women who reviewed the film hated it, one them writing: "It's a yummy-mummy newspaper column splurged onto celluloid, like baby sick on your best cashmere sweater." Funny, I have similar feelings about the mommy blogs that have proliferated across the internet in recent years.

Rather than cutting her losses and letting this one go, producer Jana Edelbaum has gone on a rampage, blasting Metrodome, the firm responsible for marketing the film in the UK. Edelbaum also expressed unease about having to tell writer and director Katherine Dieckmann how poorly her film had performed. Edelbaum's fury is but impotent rage at this point, as the performance of the film has become a joke across the land.

It is quite possible that Thurman, Dieckmann and Edelbaum's collaboration has resulted in irreparable damage to the careers of all three.

BTW, if anyone wants to see a truly decent film about parenting in Manhattan, Dustin Hoffman's Kramer vs. Kramer is worth the time.

Professional Inbreeding

[This post was submitted by Meistergedanken]

In the science fiction/satire novel Brave New World, humanity has become divided into distinct classes based on genetically engineered levels of ability and intelligence. It's all very tidy – and artificial, and implies that such a society would severely limit our innate freedoms, even though most of us wouldn't notice.

But as it so happens, I have seen the same thing beginning to happen within the last decade. However, it is occurring precisely because people have complete freedom to choose – or at least compete for – their partners (I would say spouses, but with roughly half of births occurring out of wedlock, I want to keep this discussion broad).

Anecdotal evidence is often scorned and summarily overlooked by pundits and other aspiring members of the intelligentsia, but observations gathered from your personal surroundings can hardly be anything but anecdotal, so I tend to accept it. And so, just in my own little circle of acquaintances, I know:

- a doctor who has married another doctor
- a lawyer who has married another lawyer
- a musician that has married another musician
- a minister who has married another minister
- and an engineer who has married another engineer (actually, I know several of those).

Let's face it, these people tend to end up in their own little specialized bubbles. It's incestuous, I tell you – and annoying at parties. Have you ever been the odd man out at a cozy gathering of lawyers or musicians? You can't substantively contribute to the conversation, and it soon becomes obvious that these people have zero interest in you. In short, it blows. But I digress…

There are other, more innocuous pairings, of course, that are forming the bedrock of a reconstituted 21st century middle class: engineers with nurses/teachers is a popular category (one to which I myself fall into), or, current economic crisis notwithstanding, the real estate agent and the mortgage broker (which require less education but perversely can be more lucrative). And while opposites may attract in the short term, (and then repel or annihilate each other), like tends to go with like.

The unexamined mechanism for all this is underpinned by two recent developments in the Western World:

1. Women are completely free to select their mates, without being subject to familial or societal approval (part of the freedom from responsibility so crucial to feminism's core philosophy)
2. Women are just as likely as men to become educated and engaged in well-paying professions

In the past, you married your high school sweetheart or hooked up with someone in college, and if you were still involved with them by the time you graduated, chances were pretty good you would eventually marry them also – it's the whole "shared history" thing at work. This will still occur in limited instances, but with men and women marrying later and later, it is far more likely that coworkers, or at the very least vocational peers, become romantically involved. This means intellectual compatibility. This means smart people begetting smart children, driven people begetting driven children, creative people begetting creative children, and so forth. Before that, it was a crap shoot. A man may have been a great writer or artist or scientist, but if he married the "girl next door" because of looks or convenience or wealthy parents, his children may have inherited none of his abilities. Conversely, how many stodgy, unimaginative bankers or merchants had genius children that seemed to come out of nowhere? The answer is that the talents were inherited from the mother, who never got to explore those talents because of gender restrictions. I realize the situation is more complex than this, but I stand by the fundamental premise.

Now those restrictions are removed, and women are working, for better or for worse for their families, and the game is different…

Although the resultant dual-income households were supposed to yield a measure of security due to an "earning redundancy", and in fact have had a demonstrable impact on consumer spending and the greater economy in general, the far greater long-term effect in my opinion is that the practice of eugenics, abandoned (prematurely, in my view) back in the 1930's due to ethical qualms and incomplete knowledge of genetics, has been inadvertently revived – and I suspect that this is ultimately for the greater good. Unfortunately, this particular "ultimately" may refer to a time centuries from now, and there will be a lot of discord to work through before then.

Liberals talk about class in America, but constantly get sidetracked by fixating on race, or more infrequently, gender (haven't heard screams about the "feminization of poverty" lately – must have something to do with the fact that more women are attending college than men now, and the bulk of the lost jobs within the last two years have turned the recession into the "mancession"…). And while the paramount importance of education is acknowledged by all, the quality of the "raw material" upon which this instruction must be focused is rarely accorded significant consideration. Being ignored, the possibility of its improvement due to greater refinement and predictability through what is essentially "good breeding" has been slim. But after all, a sculptor requires that his hunk of marble has suitable quality before he can produce his masterwork.

We have highly educated people – married to each other now for the first time in history, who are scaling to, if not the top echelons of society, than to a comfortable place indeed. Actually, as I have read in several MRA articles recently, marriage seems destined to become a hallmark of the affluent class. Meanwhile, an immense underclass – predominantly created out of wedlock – is forming beneath our feet. For on the one hand, we have people who are surfing the internet, carefully researching financial info for their retirement plans, are up on the latest nutritional recommendations for their children's meals, and are savvy enough to search online and compare deals on everything from airline tickets to interest rates, but on the other hand we have even more people that can barely read, let alone use computers, have little knowledge of geography, history, science or economics, and furthermore are not troubled at all by their ignorance. Of course it is inevitable that society becomes more and more stratified! As my mother always said, "water and people always find their own level". As pointed out so effectively in The Origin of Species, the important concept to keep in perspective is that given sufficient time, only a tendency is necessary to bring about dramatic change.

Now it is true that, having come up with these thoughts a couple years ago and independently of the HBD theorists that I have only just been made aware of, they lack the seasoning provided by the knowledge I have imbibed lately from such sources as The Spearhead. And although it's refreshing to have a "jargon-free" article once in a while, I realize that the MRA sphere contributes a lot of content that lends needed sophistication to this thought experiment and other related matters. For starters, women can't always get the mates they choose – or perhaps I should say, they can only get them for one night, particularly if they are "alphas" (there's that jargon)! For another, some women beget offspring with one male and end up having another male, like the "beta-provider" (more jargon), raise it. Such factors muddy the waters, and even set up counteractive forces. The question then becomes: which set of forces will dominate? At stake is the Fate of Man: have we reached the zenith of our evolutionary potential because liberal nanny-states have sabotaged the process of natural selection, or will some segment of it branch off and attain greater heights, leaving its erstwhile brethren in the dustbin of history like so many other ancestral precursors or Neanderthals?

Now, obviously, at one end of the socioeconomic spectrum there are always the few guys gaming the system and skimming the cream off the top for themselves via unscrupulous means, and at the other end there are the unfortunates screwed over through no fault of their own and often by misandrist policies, as I am sure some readers will remind me. But I am writing about the Middle, the center of the curve, just like most of the articles posted here deal with the typical woman (and hence explain why we dismiss the standard counterargument from female apologists that “they’re not all like that”). Therefore, it still must be said: there remains a profound ethical consequence of all this. As the generations roll by, it will be increasingly difficult to honestly say that poor people don’t deserve their poverty, and that affluent people didn’t earn their prosperity. And that’s when the true “culture wars” will begin, because to the masses being preached to by the populists and liberals with all their class warfare rhetoric at the ready, socialism and other more draconian forms of “wealth redistribution” will never seem more tempting – even as they become far less justifiable.

The Upshot of the Latest Militia Bust

Someone once told me that political power is as much concerned with punishing one's opponents as it is with rewarding one's constituents, and possibly more so. Although this is a somewhat disturbing way to look at it, history – both ancient and modern – confirms the truth of that statement. So, it is instructive to take a close look at who governments choose to punish, because that reveals who they see as their opponents.

In the latest sensational bust, a small but well-armed Christian sect was effectively dismantled by the FBI and BATF for "seditious conspiracy," among other charges, all of which concern plots and potential rather than actual crimes. Although, according to a marine I know, the Hutaree appear to be trained in military tactics with the ability to carry out staggered patrols and advance as a squad, and from what I saw they appeared to have some fairly high-end equipment, they are not all that sophisticated. Their website features some recruiting videos set to Christian rock songs that depict patrols, tactics, and, amusingly, the burning of the UN flag:

From some brief reading and research, it appears that they are a Christian survivalist group preparing for battle with the Antichrist and/or some political upheaval in the US. They have allegedly compared themselves to John Brown, the abolitionist who led an insurgency against southern planters and local governments prior to the Civil War. According to other militia groups, the Hutaree were reckless in their radicalism, but have not – as far as anyone knows – committed any violent or financial crimes. I would tentatively identify them as "neo-Puritans."

One might expect these arrests to ramp up under a Democratic administration, but the timing in this case is rather significant, and I doubt it's coincidental. For the last few weeks, the political strain surrounding the health care law has allegedly resulted in a number of senators receiving death threats, and Sarah Palin has been making the rounds, trying to capitalize on the Tea Party movement with belligerent rhetoric. I have long heard leftists claim that the right "fans the flames of radicalism," and for the most part it's been ridiculous fearmongering, but as things stand today, they may actually have a point. However, before they assign sole blame to the right wing, they might want to take a long, hard look at what their policies have wrought as well.

As for what this means to men regardless of party affiliation or ideological stance, I see a system that is increasingly strained and unable to hold the confidence of enough Americans to promote long-term stability. As I've written many times before, a police state can only be maintained at enormous expense, and resources will never be allocated evenly across the board. If, as the renewed focus on "homegrown radicals" indicates, law enforcement resources are increasingly used to target domestic political opponents, there will necessarily be fewer resources devoted to tracking and preventing foreign terrorists from carrying out operations on US soil. This could have far-reaching consequences.

Back in the late 1990s, as the Taliban were consolidating power in Afghanistan and hosting radicals from all over the world, the US was on top of a globalist wave during the Clinton administration, which focused considerable energy on mopping up various domestic radicals while all but ignoring the growing terrorist threat abroad. The tensions surrounding Afghanistan were fairly clear to see, and I personally saw some evidence of this while in Beijing back in 1998, when conflict between Iran and the Taliban nearly broke out into war. One night, while walking along embassy row, I noticed heavy patrols with police dogs (only time I ever saw K9 units in China) and soldiers around the Iranian embassy, and later found that there had been threats of attacks. Anyone in the know would have realized at that time that trouble was brewing.

Later, a couple years after my return to Seattle, the 911 attacks brought a number of local terrorist networks to light. These had been flourishing virtually in my back yard: a local Muslim activist named James Ujaama had been acting as an international courier for Abu Hamza al-Masri, a one-armed Egyptian mullah with strong ties to Al Qaeda and the Taliban. In 1999, along with al-Masri, Ujaama had set up a training camp in Bly, Oregon, where Al Qaeda operatives stayed for months at a time plotting attacks on US targets. Eventually, Ujaama balked at some suggestions or otherwise proved himself incompetent, and nothing much came of the Bly cell, but disturbing plots included, among other things, the proposed poisoning of Seattle's reservoirs. Immediately after this, security fences topped with barbed wire were quietly installed around all the local reservoirs, which had previously been easily accessible.

Prior to 911, foreign radical groups in America were flourishing almost in broad daylight. Anyone tracking the situation would have known that an attack was coming, probably sooner rather than later. Careless assessments and the attitude that the most dangerous enemy came from within almost guaranteed that outside enemies could operate in a less restricted environment. We all know how that worked out.

At this point, however, the stakes are even higher than they were at the dawn of the new millennium. The economic recession, increasingly polarized political climate and paranoia on both sides of the political divide could lead to further destabilization of American society in the case of a terrorist campaign, no matter where it came from. If the recent past is any indication of what leads to domestic terrorism, the current administration's renewed focus on domestic opponents suggests that we will see acts from either domestic radicals responding to government provocation or foreign terrorists taking advantage of the lower level of scrutiny.

So rather than take sides, I'd suggest that men take a cautious look at the situation as it evolves, and prepare for a tense few years. Personally, I'd recommend avoiding engagement with the primary actors on either side of the debate, acting in our own self-interest and living according to the principle that "the last man standing wins."

Reverse Triangulating the Feminists: Reform I Can Get Behind

Chuck Ross · 31 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For all the wrangling I've done over the new health care reform legislation, perhaps there is a silver lining in this dark heady cloud. Perhaps the exorbitant taxes that are coming our way and the inevitable government failure that will soon follow are worth the price of admission to watch feminism stab itself in the heart and die a slow gurgling death.

That was my grand vision as I read Taylor Marsh's article at Huffington Post titled "There is No Women's Movement". Marsh does a lot of crying about the Stupak compromise and the failure of Nancy Pelosi, the pro-choice Congressional caucus, and feminist organizations like NOW and NARAL to fight for women's "right" to have an abortion – even if they can't afford it (her shrillness, not mine).

Perhaps this socialistic reform marked the last great hurrah of the liberal progressive movement – the big tent which houses feminism. Perhaps this progressive victory was like the scene in Gladiator where Russell Crow's character defeats Caesar but crumbles from the hard road (and back-stabbing) that he endured along the way. This is my hope for feminism.

The Democratic party has always been a fractured party that was only able to solidify its various attitudes and ideals under a greater goal of "Hope & Change". The health care bill has served to "reverse triangulate" the feminist bloc thereby alienating them and forcing to shop elsewhere for their political power. I'm fine with this given the long odds of their gaining any traction. Marsh writes what I hope will rally many feminists:

> "Honestly, you expect this ineptitude on women's behalf from Republicans, but it's been a sharp stab of betrayal to see it done by Democrats who hold both houses of Congress and the presidency, while "women's groups" fumble around for an excuse to cover their flatfooted surprise and incompetence…

> Women in America no longer have any political party willing to stand up for our full freedoms. No politicians willing to fight our fights."

So I encourage feminists to take their solid 3% voting bloc with them and either vote for grassroots fopulists (feminist populists) or radically leftist Democratic candidates. This will pave the way for either more moderate Democratic voices or Republican ones – both of which will at least not support whatever tripe you, feminists, support.

Saudi Women Pressing for Reform

Maureen Dowd has recently shown some interest in Saudi Arabia, writing a few columns about the state of affairs in the desert kingdom. Perhaps Dowd has been secretly reading sheikh romance novels, which have skyrocketed in popularity over the last decade or so. Whatever the reason for her interest, she spent some time there recently, and naturally feminism – one of her favorite subjects – came up.

As an American woman, Dowd is naturally most concerned with the right to show some skin, mingle with men, wear makeup and display hairstyles. She also bemoans the fact that divorce is easy for men, but not women — surely it should be the other way around, just like home… However, to her credit, Dowd includes a quote from a Saudi woman who says: "I find a lot of people minimize the women's cause in Saudi by how we dress, and that is actually offensive."

This quote exposes the vast cultural gulf between Western women and women in other parts of the world, who usually have more pressing concerns that what shade of lipstick to wear. As our readers know, there has never been a more privileged group of people on planet earth than contemporary Western women, so naturally some non-Western women might feel a wee bit of resentment when being told how they are being oppressed.

I found a blog written by one Sabria Jawar, a Saudi woman who is a doctoral student in Britain, and she addresses the concerns of Saudi women in very practical terms. Her objection to the Saudi prohibition on women driving, for example, is framed in terms of the hassle and expense of having to pay others to drive women around. Her argument is that women can drive as well as men (I'd say the jury's out on that one), driving would make their lives easier and allow them to save more money, and that if morality is a concern, women are safer from harassment in their own cars than in a taxicab.

Ms. Jawar makes some good points. In a society where women do have some legitimate grievances, the women themselves tend to be far more agreeable and sympathetic characters. However, the question this raises is how does one address these legitimate grievances without creating a society such as our own, where even women like Maureen Dowd, who have high status, plenty of money and good jobs, are prone to endlessly complain and attack men? Is there a balance between shutting women in their homes and giving them license to wreck society and trample on the lives of those around them? I suspect that this will be one of the most difficult questions to answer, and we may have to put a great deal of effort into working it out.

Young men returning from war are finding themselves without many prospects in the current job market. The youngest veterans – those under 24 years old – have an unemployment rate of well over 20%. Compounding the problems these young men face, many veterans' wives left them while they were on tour, taking advantage of the generous benefits the armed forces provide to soldiers' ex-wives. Out of work and owing child support, a number are finding themselves on the street or forced to check into homeless shelters.

Older pro-veteran activists have expressed surprise at the number of young, homeless veterans who have children. Sister JoAnne Talarico, of Des Moines Iowa, has been protesting war and helping veterans since the Vietnam War, but even she was shocked by the preponderance of fathers of young children amongst the young, homeless veterans.

Given the ruthlessness with which the state prosecutes divorced and single fathers, the sister shouldn't be surprised, but few people are aware of just how bad it is due to media apathy concerning the subject. Not only are military wives notorious for fooling around on their husbands while they are overseas, they are given clear incentives to divorce, all the while courted by attorneys who hover around bases hoping to get a cut of a divorce settlement. In conjunction with their attorneys, military wives can often put such a financial burden on a young veteran that he has no choice but to sleep on the streets or in his car, even if he is lucky enough to be employed.

Persecution and abandonment of young veterans has had dire consequences before. In some countries, it has been enough to tip the balance in favor of revolution. While this appears unlikely in the United States (for the time being), disgruntled veterans have options for expressing their dissatisfaction in manners beyond the capabilities of most others.

Churches Starting to Become Aware of Feminization Issue

Welmer · 1 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

According to a British charity, Christian Vision for Men, the church has become too feminine, and is driving men away. Carl Breech, a Baptist Minister who is General Director of CVM, points out that most churches are currently about 70% women, and this disparity ought to be addressed through male-targeted language, imagery and programs.

CVM thinks that the old-fashioned language, which emphasizes “love” of Christ, is misinterpreted by young men today, because love has come to be equated with sexual intimacy. Rather than using such flowery, effeminate language, they suggest that sermons emphasize why men should respect and admire Jesus. Discussion of issues that are concerns for men, such as pornography, are also suggested.

Personally, I am skeptical about the chances for revival of a patriarchal institution in a society in which most wealth is in the hands of women. It is often older donors who give the most to churches, and old women outnumber old men significantly. Even preachers want to make a living, and if that means catering to women, that is what they will do.

The structural changes brought about by the sexual revolution may be too much for most of Christianity to handle, as the message churches preach is becoming irrelevant in today’s society, and the advice spiritual leaders give is often counterproductive, and sometimes harmful. If, as many churches have already done, the bulk of Christianity simply becomes matriarchal and feminist, the contradiction between scripture and practice will slowly tear it apart, just like the Episcopalian Church in the US, which is a shell of its former self.

Women and the Fine Art of Guilt-Free Guilt

Dr. Paul · 1 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The words were staring at me, printed in a huge, gaudy screaming pink font on the cover of some woman's rag that was also headlining a story about poor Sandra Bullock's cheating husband.

"50 Guilt Free Desserts and Other Indulgences," it said.

Of course, the smart ass in me almost expressed relief that they had actually found something women can feel guilty about. After all, I have known more than one woman that would all but self flagellate after eating a candy bar, but could stare a judge straight in eye, lie through her teeth about her husband being abusive, and then walk from the court room sporting a movie star smile.

Before the "not all" police show up to remind me that not all women are like that, consider the point stipulated. Still, It's an occurrence that is common enough to have made it into modern musical lore. A snip from Don Henley's "If Dirt Were Dollars," tells it pretty well.

Lookin' like a beauty queen
Loyal as a wife
She raised her little voice and testified

"I'm a good girl. I've been one all my life"
But her virtue was as swollen as her pride

She should have had the Oscar
She must have been miscast
Her fifteen minutes went by so fast

I said, "Now, baby, have you got no shame?"
She just stared at me, uncomprehendingly
Like cows at a passing train.

It is hard to follow that. Well, unless you're Dr. Paul. And that little moment at the grocery check out did take me back a few years and spurred some reflections on my previous life as a counselor. It also reminded me of some discoveries I made about women and guilt in the course of that work.

I was in the trenches of treating alcoholism during the glory days of self help gurus. Robin Norwood was all the rage, as was Susan Forward and a host of other know nothings that made millions promoting and then exploiting women's resentments toward all things male. They were so successful at it that the lines between self help and clinical treatment became as blurry as a wino's night vision. Their crappy books became standard issue on employment (and on admission) at most drug treatment facilities. Many mental health providers began to ride the popularity of these books and began basing their practices on them.

Who needs an education or training when you can buy counseling skills at the half price book store?

Of all the books that did well, the most wildly popular in my time was Melody Beattie's "Codependent No More." It became the bible of treatment industry efforts to counsel the spouses, OK wives, of alcoholics and drug addicts. And primary among Beattie's volume full of misguided ideas was the notion that women felt guilty about everything under the stars and lived a life of over responsibility as a result.

They were victims of their own goodness, and of course Beattie's answer for that was for them to care about no one but themselves. Did I say "wildly" popular? I meant feverishly, frenetically, orgiastically popular…on meth.

I'll leave you to your own conclusions about why the idea of pathological self interest was so well received.

But there was a real problem with Beattie's thesis. It was an utter fail in the real world. And more importantly, it was an utter fail in the realm of treatment. The latter is attributable to the fact that Beattie, likely because of her sex, didn't understand the nature of women's guilt. She failed to grasp that food guilt is just a function of narcissism and vanity, and that much of the remainder is actually a lack of appropriate guilt.

Let me explain by example.

Mary is a composite of many wives I counseled over the years. She is a nurse or office manager, maybe a teacher. She has two young children with her husband John who is in residential treatment with us because he has been drinking chronically for eight of the ten years they have been married. He has lost several jobs, became violent and has refused treatment till a recent arrest for DUI. His court case is pending.

I have Mary in group with seven other wives, and one husband. Most all of them are in more or less the same boat.

Mary: (sniff, sniff) I just don't know what I did wrong. I tried doing everything to help John get sober, but nothing worked. I pleaded, begged and prayed but he just wouldn't stop. I feel like such a failure.

Another wife: You are taking too much responsibility. You need to learn that you can't control his drinking! (several knowing nods and one "uh huh" pass though the group like a mini wave. The home team just scored!)

Me: That is right, Mary. You can't control his drinking, which I am sure you discovered before too long into his eight year binge, so why don't we talk about what you could control? (Mary nods in affirmation, and for some reason the tears just stop. But the look of anguish is still on her face)

Me: You said that John had become violent and raging in the home on many occasions? (Mary nods again) So….then….where did you take the children?

Mary: (looking nonplussed) I am not sure what you mean.

Me: Your children were in the presence of a violent drunk. What did you do to protect them? Where did you take them?

Mary: Well once I took them and spent the night at my sisters. (Mary's affect has changed considerably at this point. There is something different in her expression. It looks kind of like anger.)

Me: Once? You got your children out of that hellish situation once? Why didn't you do more to protect them?

Mary: (and now Mama is really not happy) What? You're blaming me? He's the drunk! It wasn't my fault!

Me: Well, you seemed to struggle with that idea just a minute ago.

Mary: (silent, fuming, and the home team looks very nervous)

Me: Here's how it works. For you to do the work you need to do here you have to come to terms with the fact that you were the only sober adult in that house, and rather than take care of your children you left them exposed to a raging drunk. So, Mary, you are just as much of a problem as your husband.

Mary: (all pretense to playing the wounded wife is now gone, and Mary's true nature is on display) This is bullshit! I didn't come here for this. I just want you to sober my husband up so he can come back home. If you won't do that, I will convince him to leave, right fucking now! (her eyes were bulging and little bits of projectile spittle issued from between her tight lips)

Me: So, if you have to work on your problems, then treatment for John is out?

I didn't really care if Mary tried to get her husband out of treatment or not. His motivation to be there was not for her, but to impress on the court that he was getting help for his drinking. And we got paid for his being there, not hers. Sad but true.

The point in all of this was that it demonstrated exactly why Beattie missed the mark by such a wide margin. Mary didn't have any real guilt about anything she had done. Perhaps it was there, buried under the stifling weight of sociopathy, but that is too deep to fish for. And so what remained was just a show for sympathy, and to make sure that everyone knew that he was the real problem. The women I encountered during all those years of doing treatment, and more than a few in the "real world," weren't much different. They displayed guilt pretty much in two fundamental ways.

The first one was the most common. They expressed guilt over things that no reasonable person would assume they had any control over, e.g. someone else's alcoholism. In other words, they expressed guilt only about things for which the could not be held accountable. But once their actual mistakes were revealed and they were held to account, they became as denying and hostile as a drunk that is not ready to put the bottle down.

The second way they experienced guilt was just an extension of the first one. Guilt was used to manipulate their way into a pass on whatever they had done.

Twenty years of working with drunks and I saw many more of them sober up than I ever saw their enablers ever get really accountable for their actions. It just wasn't in them, and Melody Beattie was full of shit.

It was well known in the treatment field that as high as recidivism was for men, it was even higher for women with substance abuse problems. Many of the gurus that gave us work like Beattie's attributed this to the presence of men in treatment centers (no, I am not kidding) so we set about segregating treatment by sex for the sake of women, who continued to fail at a higher rate than men just as they had before.

That left a lot of people scratching their heads, except for those who understood that the only real ingredient for successful treatment was accountability. And that accountability does not exist where it is not driven by a healthy sense of guilt.

What is your experience with women and accountability?

The Fatalism of the Manosphere

Gx1080 · 2 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been struggling with this post for the last few months.

But Roosh's and Roissy's recent post finally broke the camel's back. Maybe Roissy's post was an April's fool joke, but it's composed and drenched of the same Nihilistic feeling that was felt in the HBD'ers a few months ago (don't know how to classify Ferdinand, so bear with me).

There's only one way to describe that feeling:

Frustrated Idealism.

We believe that we are oh-so-smart for discovering the truth of this world, but what are the common reactions? Either resignation to women and many, many of our fellow men or anger against them. I understand the feelings for being wronged by them (and damn straight we were), but hating them just for being? Disgust, maybe, but aren't we the ones that said to women to drop the hate against males for being what they are?

I'm not saying that women and manginas should be forgiven for their acts against us. But before I get the torches and pitchforks, let's review some of the random truths that I've discovered here:

- The female natural instinct is Hypergamy, that being the desire to have the genes of the Alpha Male in her descendants so her genes keep reproducing.
- The Male natural instinct is Polygamy, which is wanting to spread his seed to as many women as possible.
- Those two instincts are opposite to each other, and since "men display, women choose", the former will take precedence.
- The ruling caste will eventually try to screw those who are under their authority because, as Robert. A Heinlen can tell you:

> Political tags – such as royalist, communist, democrat, populist, fascist, liberal, conservative, and so forth – are never basic criteria. The human race divides politically into those who want people to be controlled and those who have no such desire.

- Given or because the former (really a chicken and egg argument) is possible because the human herd, the "Average Citizen", the "American Voter" or whorever you want to call it is stupid.

There's something in common with all those facts:

NONE OF THEM IS GOING TO CHANGE. EVER. PERIOD.
We got to this whole mess because the ruling caste of our society, which guys like Globalman and Hawaiian Libertarian had researched and put a name and a face, took advantage, not only of those facts, also of the ignorance that they created of said facts by the general populace in that cozy, naive and relatively short time between World War II and the 60's (15 or so years, give or take).

A responsible society wouldn't allow continual denial of said basic truths to the general populace for the benefit of the elite (the Right) or would tell people to wallow in their instincts, their "emotions" like pigs in their own filth so the cattle is so busy fighting in the trees that they can't see the damn forest, once again, to the benefit of the elite (the Left).

No, a responsible society would insist on every one of their citizens that yes, those instincts exist, but as human beings we cannot let them dominate every single of our actions if we want to have a working Civilization.

Civilization is done in spite of nature, after all.

Ok, let's get back a little. My point is that we need to accept that those instincts are in all of us, but also that the capacity of controlling said instincts for actual concern of others is a fairly good way to judge others.

For example, a woman can feel the temptation to cheat, but if she actually caves in to said instincts she is uncivilized, a simple whore. All of Oprah's speeches won't change that.

There's a caveat of course, said elites, despite of all the brave macho talk of the "Red Pillers" of those who see "The Matrix", still control your expectations. Why is that? Many, many men in here still expect a relationship where everything just "clicks", where they can layoff the LTR Game, where everything just cruises along because of love.

As Stepthen Covey said, Love is not a feeling, is a verb. For a relationship to work, there's a necessity of compromise on both parts to make the relationship to work with the person besides you. Not with some Prince Charming/Edward Cullen fantasy, not with a pedestalized, even-her-farts-are-gold illusion, but with the person besides you.

For that to happen, both parties need to be held accountable of their actions, not only by each other, but by society at large. But if the cattle aren't too busy with the minutiae of their lives, they are not going to let us rule them! They are going to keep us at bay! To us, the elites, who are "superior"! What the elites did? Simple.

They took all the accoutability of the woman and transfered it to the man.

They put all the charge to men, to keep us down as beasts of burden and let women roam free, so we have to chase them around, keeping us busy in the Game of attraction, so that Men are either drowning in vaj or broken spirited. Both cases unwilling to do something against the elites.

The acts, both selling the "perfect relationship" hoax and the concentration of punishments in males are extremely evil acts. Both need to be fought against, both in the personal and group level.

In the personal, we learn Game, we learn to lead a relationship, but also, we learn to actually try to find someone worthy to be leaded. There's a woman who is worthy of a committed relationship (NOT MARRIAGE OF COURSE, her temptation to make your life hell will be too strong). If she isn't worthy, well, you get your dick wet. That's something. Also, even if you don't find that girl that makes the struggle worthwhile, find something else that fulfills your life.

As a group, we can actually spread the word, to try to wake others; knowledge is worthless if we hoard it as a badge of validation for our "superiority".

There's plenty of effort on both levels, I just want it to be oriented to realistic expectations, to ways to make our lives happier.

That's the whole point, isn't it?

Training Boys to be Dogs

Welmer · 2 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago, an Arizona schoolteacher made the news by forcing the male students in his class to bow and scrape to the females. This guy, who is doing serious damage to these boys by forcing them to act like supplicating beta white knights, thinks the world would be a better place if only men did even more for women. Cord Ivanyi (feel free to contact him), the misguided – or sadistic, I don't know which – teacher, has forced his male students to seat girls, open doors for them, take their backpacks, stand when they leave the room, etc. He might as well have them wear dog collars, too. Of course, Ivanyi is not having the girls make sandwiches for the boys, wash their clothes, take notes for them or anything at all to reciprocate.

Inevitably, when these boys get into college, girls are going to laugh at them if they continue to behave in this manner, but what might actually be dangerous is that some will take offense, and in an academic environment that could have serious consequences for the young men.

Feminists may take offense when men do such simple things as open the door for them, and if a guy attempted to take a feminist's pack or item of clothing there's a good chance she'd cry harassment. A young man accused of harassment at a university will probably face some stern disciplinary action from the school, as women and their feelings are sacrosanct on campus.

Getting back to PMAFT's post on conservative vs. feminist women, I think there's a good way to look at their approaches to men. Both in fact demand chivalry, but in different ways. Left feminists want socialist chivalry, in which men in aggregate support women, whereas "conservative" women favor the individual man (i.e. husband) bearing the burden. In the current situation, we have a mix of both, but there is still a fight over resources, as some of the working married man's money goes to support single mother feminist types, but perhaps not as much as feminists would like.

Neither left feminists nor conservative women favor easing men's burdens, but there is a fundamental philosophical difference concerning how best to extract male resources. For men, neither system is favorable, as we will simply be paying more for women through alimony on the one hand and taxes on the other. Note that conservative women are just as likely to divorce as their liberal sisters.

For today's young men chivalry is not a choice: it is a mandate. Therefore, we must look at men such as Cord Ivanyi as supporters of an oppressive system. If Mr. Ivanyi wants to be a servile, Quixotic fool, he should do that on his own time. But given the fact that young men will undoubtedly be forced to support women in one way or the other eventually, forcing them to do so at a young age is simply robbing them of the few remaining years of freedom left to them.

Jay Hammers · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I watched Kramer vs. Kramer after a suggestion by Welmer a few days ago. The wife, played by Meryl Streep when she was decent looking, abandons her husband, played by Dustin Hoffman, and their child. Eighteen months later she returns, infused by feminist counseling, to steal their child away from the father who has worked so hard to maintain employment while raising his son alone. A classic example of woman's lack of guilt to which Paul Elam spoke the other day.

The problem I have with this movie is that – SPOILER ALERT – at the end of the movie, after she has won custody through the biased family courts, she suddenly realizes it would be cruel to her son to take him away from his home and decides she will let the father keep custody. What? THIS DOES NOT HAPPEN.

The film won five Oscars and boasted stars to attract people to the box office, so people obviously paid attention to it (though I, a young lad, had never heard of it until Welmer mentioned it). Maybe if Kramer vs. Kramer had ended honestly, with the mother taking her child away and nailing the father for child support, more people would have realized two truths:

1) The family court system is heavily biased against the father.
2) Women don't have a conscience.

I'm exaggerating on the second point but in a lot of cases it's absolutely true, as women are generally ruled by their own selfish desires.

The media's painting of all women as moral and virtuous is part of the reason men still get the shaft. Even though Kramer vs. Kramer went astray in the last few minutes, it is well worth watching to gain an appreciation of the struggles of fatherhood and the ills of family court.

Note to Readers

I'm going to keep contributing as best I can over the next week or so, but my father just passed away without much warning. It's up to me to handle his affairs and put him to rest, so I'll be preoccupied with that for a while.

Hang in there. All will be back to normal soon. If any readers want to contribute a guest piece, let me know — this would be a good time.

My dad would want to see The Spearhead going strong, so in honor of his memory I'll make sure the site isn't neglected. Perhaps when I get my thoughts and feelings straightened out in a bit, I'll write a little eulogy here. I know he'd like that.

A Miracle in February

Dr. Paul · 4 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As I just read of Welmers loss, I was of course reminded of the loss of my own father. I respectfully submit this story in honor of Welmer and his father. May the memories keep all good men alive in our hearts and minds.

Every word of the following is true.

It was February, and I drove through Athens into the heart of east Texas with a chilled wind blowing dead leaves and debris across the highway. The sky, dark and moody, mimicked the cold turmoil in my heart.

"Just talk to him," Jim had said. "There's much you have to say and you won't have many more chances."

"You just don't fucking get it, do you?" I blasted back at him. "He has Alzheimer's. It's late in the game. He doesn't even know my mother most of the time, much less me. What possible good is this going to do?"

Jim smiled, placed a hand on my shoulder and gently squeezed.

"Just talk to him."

I cursed him again but made the commitment. I thought he was out of his mind to hand me this as a task. But the man, part friend, part brother, and all mentor was seldom off the mark.

Nonetheless I cursed him some more as I drove on, watching the buildings in the small town give way to bare trees and farmland.

I had no idea at all of what I was going to say. My father, at least when it came to our relationship, had always had Alzheimer's. He was there, and not there; close but closed off, as though guarding his humanity were a fatherly duty. I spent the first eighteen years of my life living with him, but never really knowing who he was. We lived in the same house without living together, ate at the same time at the same table without ever actually sharing a meal. We even watched and laughed at some of the same 1960's television shows, but that laughter was no more shared than our lives.

There was me. There was my Dad. But never me and my Dad.

His idea of fatherhood stopped at disciplinarian. A product of the great depression, a military career and two wars, his edges were cut in granite, his hand even but forged in steel. And his tolerance for nonsense, as he called most of the interests of my youth, was nonexistent.

The only real gentleness I ever saw in him was with my mother, whom he loved beyond words. But that tenderness didn't translate to his sons. He had three boys, and all of them had marching orders for manhood.

In my home, his word was the law, as surely as if it had been carved into stone tablets and carried down from the mountainside. He taught me, sometimes brutally, the importance of hard work and discipline. His affections were almost never spoken. They were considered to be implied in the lessons he taught, even when delivered on the back of his hand.

Honor. Work. Obedience. Especially obedience.

And it was the obedience, of course, that I ultimately refused to embrace.

That refusal was a source of chaos in my home. It earned me the lifetime ire of my brothers and the stern disapproval of my mother. It eventually pushed me out the door and into the army recruitment office, the quickest escape I could find. Despite all the circumstances, I can say, largely with thanks to my father, that I left with my head high. If nothing else, anyone raised by that man would have a spine.

But the echoes of all that family combat lingered, and were still with me as I pulled into the driveway and shut off the car.

The last time I was there was for Christmas. It was a time of pleasantries and temporary amnesia of past conflicts. Just as it always had been since I left home. But this wasn't other Christmases. My father had a disease that had carved a sinkhole in his mind and all of us seemed to teeter on the edge of it, at times clinging to our fractured connections to each other for balance; to keep from falling in after him. We went though the holiday rituals somberly, mechanically. The Christmas music seemed cruel; a haunting, melodic reminder that this was the last time we would all be together, and alive.

My father sat in the corner watching a dark TV screen while we opened presents.

I watched my mother open one wrapped in red and green striped paper. She untied the ribbon and took off the card which read

TO: Ann FROM: Jerry, with love.

It was in her handwriting.

She opened the box and pulled out the robe, a long white drape of thick terry cloth. She hadn't bothered to remove the price tag when she wrapped it.

"Oh, look," she said, "He got me a new robe. Isn't it pretty?"

She got up, went to him, and kissed his forehead.

"Thank you, sweetie. I just love it."

He never took his eyes off the TV.

As I got out of the car I cleared my mind of that memory and went to the front door. This was going to be hard enough without thinking about Christmas.

When I got inside, the sight of him paralyzed me. Just since I had last seen him almost all of his hair had fallen out. Even his eyebrows had thinned into slight whisps. There were sores on the top of his head, a simple skin condition that often came with the disease, but the image in my mind was that the horror of his rotting brain had spread through his skull and was eating through his scalp.

He was seated in his easy chair. An apron covered his chest and stomach. And then I noticed that the apron was fitted with strands of thick fabric that ran behind the chair and were tied together.

I looked at my mother. She sighed plaintively, and regarded me with concern.

"It was necessary," she said. "It was either that or send him somewhere. He has taken to turning the burners on the stove and pulling everything out of the fridge unless I am here to stop him. I'll leave it on while I am gone, but you can take if off if you want to. Just don't leave him alone, even to go to the bathroom, unless he is tied in."

Her words battered my brain and my heart. Suddenly, my memories transformed themselves, as if the sight of him in such degradation rewrote thirty years of history in an instant. I was enraged at his loss of strength; that strength I used to fight so hard to resist. I wanted to rip that goddam apron off of him and shred it. I wanted to shake my fist at God and curse him for the shell of a man that was bound like an animal in front of me.

I wanted my father back. Even if he was a father I never really had.

My mother interrupted my internal fit when she picked up her purse and keys. She had never asked why I wanted time alone with him, she just agreed without comment.

"He doesn't talk much," she said, as she opened the door, "But he can still surprise you. He has these…moments. I can't explain them."

And with that she was gone and I found myself thrust into the most profound silence of my life. I stood there for a small eternity wondering what to do. The room felt like a vacuum; time suspended and hanging still in the air, like a noose waiting for a neck. I shook myself out of it and untied him.

I took a seat on the sofa just adjacent to his chair and he got up. He shuffled to a set of bookshelves and ran his fingers along the wooden edges. He sat back down and was up again just as quickly. This time he went to the front door and jiggled the doorknob. He didn't try to open it. He just seemed to like feeling it rattle in his fingers.

'Oh God, Jim, what do you have me doing here?' I asked myself. And somewhere in my struggling thoughts, the answer was whispered.

Just talk to him.

When my father returned to his chair again, that is exactly what I did.

I won't tell anyone everything I said to him. This was between my father and me. But I will say that I left nothing unsaid. I covered every heartache and every disappointment. And I made every apology I could think of. There were many. And I told him the secrets of my heart that I could never have spoken before. I talked and talked. I wept and talked some more.

How long this went on, I don't know. But what I do know is that the whole time I was talking he never got out of that chair, which is to say, in his own way, he never stopped listening.

And then, just when I thought I was done, I found myself reaching for his hand. I took it in mine and held on to it like a little boy, then leaned over and touched it to my cheek. His skin felt thin and fragile, not even a memory of the hand that had so often found my face in screaming anger.

Tears rained down my face and my breathing shuddered and hitched. I swallowed and, finally, managed to say the only real thing of importance that I had come to say.

"I love you, Daddy."

And with those words every wall that had ever been built in me tumbled down. Every chip I carried on my shoulder fell to the ground and every bit of manhood that I had used to prop myself up through life gave way to a heartbroken boy that had been voiceless for a lifetime.

I looked up through my tears and studied his eyes. I couldn't believe what I saw. He was looking back at me, directly in the eyes, and he seemed to search my face for who I was.

He wanted to know who I was!

A small, sentient light flickered his eyes. It looked like a fire to me, burning with the fury of the greatest human spirit. And then, as though from some other lifetime, some other history that I had longed to live, he spoke.

"I love you, too," he said. "I always have."

For the first time since my arrival I heard a clock ticking in the background, as though time had started again. It thundered in my ears as I sat there, stunned and shaken, trying to wrap my head around the magnitude of the moment, my moment. And just as what had happened began to register fully, I saw him slipping back into the void of his shattered mind.

'No! Come back! Come back!' raced through my mind, but my pleading was too late. He got up from the chair, his hand sliding from mine lifelessly, and he went toward the kitchen. This time I got up and lead him back to his chair. I sat with him in silence till my mother got back home. I spent that evening dodging questions from my mother, who for some reason had taken more interest in my visit than she had shown before.

The winter weather chased me back to Houston the next day. The clouds were no less dark; the trees just as bare and lifeless.

But it was not the same drive as the drive up. I left the radio off and listened to the chilly wind howl around my car. I watched the ribbon of asphalt come at me and disappear behind like bad memories. And I carried with me a gift from my Dad, the man who had just given me everything I ever needed.

My hand was steady on the wheel.

Hysteria Breaks Out After Campus Newspaper Mocks Victim Culture

A reader alerted me to an article written by Alex Knepper, a bright young man with an irreverent attitude toward the prevailing PC norms on campus. Writing for The Eagle, American University's campus paper, Knepper tears into the campus culture of victimhood:

> Let's get this straight: any woman who heads to an EI party as an anonymous onlooker, drinks five cups of the jungle juice, and walks back to a boy's room with him is indicating that she wants sex, OK? To cry "date rape" after you sober up the next morning and regret the incident is the equivalent of pulling a gun to someone's head and then later claiming that you didn't ever actually intend to pull the trigger.

Indeed! Seems as though someone may have come across The Spearhead at some point.

What I really like about this article – and about Mr. Knepper – is that this proves my point about speaking one's mind. Sure, hundreds of feminists are howling and barking at the moon, but it looks to me as though young Alex just proved that people really like to read his controversial views. This kid just may have a career as a cultural commentator ahead of him.

As a stark contrast, I offer the cowardly reaction of the school's administration, which behaves in the predictable manner by denouncing Knepper's article. Amusingly, in their denunciation, Scott A. Bast (Provost) and Gail Short Hanson (Vice President of Campus Life), claim to have been "stunned and mobilized" by Alex Knepper's editorial:

> Our campus community has been stunned and mobilized by opinions expressed about date rape by an Eagle columnist in this week's paper. The emotion provoked by the column and the seriousness of the subject make this a powerful learning opportunity for our community and a moment for us to affirm our values as an educational institution.
> In this challenging moment, when many are searching for what they can do to address the breach that has occurred in the fabric of our community, we invite you to familiarize yourself with the university's position on sexual misconduct and renew your personal commitment to live up to our community values.
> [blah blah]
> Gail Short Hanson, Vice President of Campus Life
> Scott A. Bass, Provost

Looks to me as though young Alex Knepper applied a cattle prod to these two, who promptly began to moo obediently. The fealty to feminists on the part of school administration is amazing. In normal life, as Knepper suggests, nobody takes feminists seriously, but on campus it is holy dogma.

The comments underneath all of the articles I linked are also revealing, in that one finds a high proportion of students spouting feminist ideology. Kids are generally obedient, and feminists are hard at work indoctrinating them with feminism, so this is hardly surprising, but it does suggest that there's going to be a lot of work ahead deprogramming these poor kids.

In additional news surrounding Mr. Knepper's editorial, some radical feminists criminally vandalized the paper, which is a typical tactic by frustrated types who can't stand the concept of open opinion. These miscreants should be arrested and prosecuted for their petty act of destruction. If video footage exists around any of the vandalized distribution points, The Eagle should request copies of the tape and publish stills to identify and prosecute the offenders.

Send your support to Alex Knepper (edpage@theeagleonline.com) if you value integrity and honesty in campus journalism.

Renewed Interest in Classical Themes Suggests a New Focus on Masculinity

Welmer · 5 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

According to Jen Yamato of film.com, we are about to treated to a slew of Hellenic-themed movies over the next few years. This week a remake of Clash of the Titans is set to come out, and others in the works include Dawn of War, described as "an action take on the Theseus myth helmed by the visually-gifted filmmaker Tarsem Singh (The Fall)."

I am looking forward to Dawn of War in particular, as the Theseus myth is highly charged with sexual politics and the struggle between the masculine and feminine. Hopefully, Singh doesn't disappoint by playing down the Amazonomachy in which Theseus claimed Hippolyta as his bride.

In addition to the Amazonomachy of the Theseus myth, there is the story of Phaedra, his second wife, who lusted after Theseus and Hippolyta's son Hippolytus. Hippolytus spurned her advances, and Phaedra falsely accused him of rape, causing his own father (Theseus) to curse him. There is a lot of rich material in here, and it would be great to see it play out in the movie theaters, which are the most influential art medium in modern times.

Artists tend to be ahead of the curve, so one might come to the cautious conclusion that this subject matter portends some changes from the feminist orthodoxy which now holds our society in a crushing grip.

Sexual Antagonism May be Evolutionary Reality

Welmer · 5 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an experiment on fruit flies, which are often used for evolutionary research, it was found that when evolution proceeded without sexual restraints males became more masculine and females more feminine. Because there are a number of genes that influence sex-specific behavior, and these genes are mainly shared by both males and females, there is a constant tug-of-war that prevents overmasculinization and overfeminization.

Olivia Judson, writing for the NY Times, finds the results fascinating, and is curious about what might happen if women were allowed to evolve without the constraints placed on feminization by masculine genes:

> I find this tantalizing. I'd love to know how much of the human genome is similarly constrained, and I wonder what would happen if human males were prevented from evolving while females were allowed to keep going.

If the fruit flies are any indication, I imagine they would become caricatures of femininity. In fact, I think we have been seeing something akin to this process in our own society, albeit culturally rather than strictly biologically speaking. When the masculine is repressed, we see a society that is increasingly exaggerated in its femininity, and males that are unattractive as mates to the hyperfeminized women who have come to the fore.

Man Runs For Public Office Against His Wife

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 6 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In Missouri John Fischer has decided to run for the Missouri State Legislature to represent MO District 107. He is running as a Republican against the current holder of that seat who is his wife, Linda Fischer, a Democrat. They are the only two people running for this seat and the filing deadline has already passed so there will be no other candidates.

Linda Fischer claims her husband, a former employee of Chrysler who was forced into early retirement last May, has committed violence against her. She has already gotten a protection order against her husband claiming that he has "harassed" her and has caused or attempted to cause her physical harm. John Fischer denies the allegations and is willing to take polygraph test to prove his innocence. The protection order has prevented John Fischer from entering his home so he is currently living in a camper.

Mr. Fischer says that he is not running against his wife because of the protection order but because of how the Democrats have handled the economy, health care, and the stimulus. He said:

> I figured if I'm going to be on my own, then I'm going to have to do what suits me. I'm standing up for people who lost their job. I don't think they're being represented fairly in this state because they do not take care of the working man.

This state legislature race is a microcosm of many of the issues that we write about, the mancession, the false abuse industry, etc. John Fischer has not let all of the things his (presumably soon to be ex-) wife and the state have done to him stop him. Despite being forced from his home, he is fighting back in his own way.

Young Men: Avoid American University

In the wake of the column written by Alex Knepper in The Eagle, a campus newspaper published by AU students, AU officials have come out with new policies designed to punish men who are accused by women of various improprieties. The school plans to keep a blacklist of men who have been accused, apparently whether they have been convicted of anything or not. This extrajudicial, arbitrary punishment of men should be a warning sign to any parents that might think about sending their sons to American University.

That schools are keeping records on students that do not pertain to academic issues should be cause for concern. Crimes are the jurisdiction of the courts — not of universities. If schools keep records on students for alleged crimes rather than convictions, the schools themselves may be skating on thin ice legally speaking. Eventually, these records may have to be subpoenaed to ascertain just what American University is up to in regards to student records, and whether or not the school is complicit in libel and breaches of confidentiality. There is a possible FERPA violation here if such records are being shared, which would make this a matter of civil rights. Until their policy and procedures are published, we cannot know for sure, but recent developments warrant close attention.

In the meanwhile, parents of male students and male students themselves should seriously consider withdrawing from American University, and avoiding enrollment in the same. Gail Hanson, at the behest of radical feminists, is creating a climate of intimidation and fear for males. The recent example of the Duke Lacrosse case has already cast a dark cloud over higher education, and it appears that, rather than take steps to halt false accusations and abuse of young men, universities are only stepping up the pressure and making further attacks.

How many more young men's lives will have to be ruined by false accusations, and how many more chased away from education by totalitarian feminist policies at universities before things start to change? Hopefully, not many, but from the looks of things at American University there will undoubtedly be more victims.

Attention Whore Gets Angry At Her Success

Recently some women marched topless in Portland, Maine to protest for topless women being treated the same as topless men. The march was organized by Ty McDowell who was enraged at the men who were attracted by the march. This was despite the fact that some of the marchers posed for pictures. McDowell is planning more marches where she will be more "aggressive" in "discouraging" men who she thinks are watching the marches too much.

This march was attention whoring because Maine law says that it is only illegal to show genitals in public. In other words, it is legal in Maine for women to be topless (and this is why none of the women were arrested for marching topless). There is no reason except attention whoring to march to treat topless women the same as topless men in Maine because legally that is already the case. Since attention whoring was the purpose of this topless march, it is absurd for Ty McDowell to complain about men watching the march.

What Ty McDowell really wants is to be topless anywhere, but force men to not look at her while she is topless. Like with so many things, Ty McDowell is a woman trying to have it both ways. Either you're in public and anyone can look at you or you're not. That's the truth of the matter, and anything else is attention whoring.

Feminists Resort to Ninja Tactics

The National Women's Law Center is again seeking continued privileges for women:

> Tell Congress to Reauthorize the Elementary and Secondary Education Act
> Soon Congress will consider a major education reform package. It could not come sooner – the students in our nation's schools are in crisis. And unfortunately, the problems facing girls at risk in school largely have been masked by overgeneralizations about their performance. It's up to us to ensure that all of our nation's children have equal opportunities to learn and succeed.

Yes, the NWLC believes that women need more entitlements even as they outperform boys in education. It was a national crisis when girls weren't doing as well in school but it's a trivial generalization when boys aren't.

Nevertheless this is a good sign. Feminists are concerned because the plight of boys and men is gaining more national attention. They are concerned that people will wake up and realize just how good girls and women have it when compared to boys and men.

Let's break down their little petition. They are trying to mask their requests for continued entitlements by inserting seemingly reasonable points in the petition, an act of deliberate subterfuge. Feminists are trying to use stealth, camouflaging their misandry like ninjas in the shadows.

They hope education reform will:

> * Transition to an accountability system that promotes "data-driven" reforms that improve outcomes for all students;

This says absolutely nothing. It's here merely to disorient.

You hear the sound of footsteps in the corner. Distracted, you don't notice the next bullet point.

> * Require collection and reporting of data on pregnant and parenting students and authorize supportive programs for those students;

I thought this was about education? How about educating young girls not to get pregnant in the first place and young guys not to provide the necessary semen?

> * Support high-quality early learning opportunities that help prepare children to enter kindergarten;

You hear a faint whisper and turn your head to look around. Your attention diverted as you stare hard into the darkness, you miss the next three bullet points.

> * Require high school sports data collection;

I thought this was about education? Feminists will use the results of this data collection, which will show that girls are less interested in sports, to further take away boy's opportunities to be involved in sports. Gotta love Title IX.

> * Collect data and support programs to increase girls' participation in and completion of STEM courses;

Feminists just can't stand the fact that men are better at science, math and engineering. Feminists were unable to break men's dominance in fields that require high level reasoning and innovation because men are simply better at these things than women – and corporate America knows it. Sadly for women, results matter in these fields and they don't get as big a handicap as in the Olympics.

> * Ensure a positive school climate and support the health and safety of all students;

By painting all boys as rapists and abusers and all females as victims, I'm guessing.

> * Adopt and strengthen programs to engage communities and address barriers that decrease student engagement;

As the moon comes from behind the clouds, you see the glint of steel as a dark figure draws near.

> * Clarify that supplemental educational services providers are subject to civil rights laws;

Oh, here's Title IX again, as feminists would hate to see "discrimination" on the basis of sex as long as that "discrimination" is against girls. Now that girls are ahead of boys, they couldn't bare to see boys getting educational assistance to overcome the widespread anti-male mindset in education.

As the dark figure approaches, the moonlight reveals its features. It hisses at you, teeth bared, its breath making you recoil. You smell feminist.

Remembering feminists always travel in packs, you whirl around to see dozens more approaching from the rear wielding golf clubs and handguns. You even see a few camouflaged in ball caps with the letters "MRA" scrawled on them in black lipstick.

Good thing they can't golf or shoot worth a damn, you think to yourself as you advance to confront them.

Men Don’t Listen Well: Myth or Fact?

Welmer · 8 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A friend sent me an interesting piece from the University of Pennsylvania Language Log in which the author debunks The Male Brain a sloppily-written pop-science book that attempts to explain why men allegedly can’t listen. Of course, the book was written by a female scientist, one Louann Brizendine. The debunking is excellent, and shows just how much pure garbage makes its way into books, especially when they are written by so-called “experts.”

The debunking is highly technical, so I can’t really do it justice with a summary, but one of the explanations for why men supposedly have an inability to listen well is that testosterone somehow impairs their brains. We’ve all heard this one before. Conventional opinion does tend to view testosterone as a poison of sorts, which is reflected in the law. For example, synthetic testosterone is strictly regulated, whereas half the fertile female population in the West is popping estrogen/progesterone pills on a daily basis.

Young Women Refusing to Call Themselves Feminists

Welmer · 8 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

When I was a kid back in the 80s, lots of people proudly called themselves feminists. Even many men declared themselves feminists. They were so in-your-face about it that they'd say "I'm a feminist" and then glare in an intimidating manner at the young boys in the class. Yes, lots of teachers were that nasty. I'm sure lots of them still are. Only half of teachers are better than average, after all.

However, today, despite the succession of triumphs feminists can point to as their legacy, such as on-demand abortion, on demand divorce, on demand restraining orders throwing men out of their houses, on demand seizure of ex-husbands' assets, etc., young women are hesitant to call themselves feminists.

Why might this be?

Chloe Angyal, writing for The Guardian, says it is because "In the popular imagination, feminists are still the ugly, angry extremists who killed chivalry and who seek not gender equality, but world domination."

Well, yes, Chloe, but it isn't imagination — it's fact. As women make up the majority of students and now workers, and as male opportunities slip away, people like you continue to demand more for women and less for men. You don't want equality, you want supremacy.

I'm sure most young women want to keep the privileges feminism has won for them, but they sense that people are starting to hate feminism because they are seeing it for what it truly is: a power grab. It is distilled selfishness, backed up only by a sham victim cult that is fast becoming exposed for the fraud that it is.

Women are sensitive to social moods; probably more so than men. They are hyper-aware of how people around them feel, and try to adjust their words and expressions to create an aura of consensus. Women are starting to realize that most men are thoroughly disgusted with feminism, and that their trust for women is at an all-time low. All the signs are out there, and a few of us men are actually opening our mouths and saying what we think without worrying about the consequences.

So now young women don't want to call themselves feminists, because they know exactly what men will think when they hear that word. Chloe Angyal wants them to stand up and proudly exclaim their support for feminism, but she's going to be frustrated in this endeavor.

Here's why:

Women, in general, look out for themselves first, and they've already got about as good a deal as they are ever going to get. I'm not sure they consciously and rationally understand this, but I'm sure they feel it. There's a point of diminishing returns, and they sense that they may have already passed it. At this point, disenfranchising men even further and then rubbing it in their faces is not going to help them get that pack-mule husband they were counting on. Putting their exes on the street isn't going to keep that child support flowing in. Taxing men out of business won't support their social programs and jobs at nonprofits.

Even women have started to understand that they've gone too far, and they understand that the feminists have taken them there.

It's too bad they didn't figure this out earlier, because there will be consequences for women in general. Frankly, their value is going to tumble when the misandry bubble pops. If, some 35 years ago, women had seen this coming and stopped the feminists, they would have been able to cut their losses and maintain the kinds of blessed lives their grandmothers have lived. Now, they'll be lucky to avoid working well into their 70s. Imagine that: 40 years of work after the Wile E. Coyote moment.

Ouch.

Could She BE Any More Self-involved?

Recently, commenter Broadsword made what I considered an insightful observation linking women, homosexuality and narcissism:

Broadsword April 7, 2010 at 11:35

"…When it comes down to it women know that a homosexual relationship with a woman facilitates their innate narcissistic tendencies. It's why most of them secretly want to be with a woman. Feminists certainly know this, since homosexuality and narcissism are the foundations of feminists' lifestyle and personality. Which is why it should not be assumed that if men pull out of American University that it will make much difference to women. This is what feminists and women want, no men in the way to stop feminists indoctrinating women, and no men around to date which will enable women to indulge in the their latent homosexual desires."

As it so happens, by strange coincidence a MSM article a few hours later presented a scenario that nicely featured all the elements he mentioned in a nice, tidy, thoroughly revolting package. I had been warily watching this story unfold from afar for several weeks, and was wondering if its conclusion would be reported…

So along with abortions, it would appear that prom attendance is now also a constitutional right:

> By SHELIA BYRD, Associated Press Writer
> JACKSON, Miss. – Senior prom fell far short of the rite of passage Constance McMillen was hoping for when she began a legal battle to challenge a ban on same-sex dates.
> The 18-year-old lesbian student said Tuesday she was one of only seven students to show up at a private event chaperoned by school officials last Friday night. She said the rest of her peers went to another private event where she wasn't invited.
> The ACLU sent a demand letter to Superintendent Teresa McNeece in February, saying the rules against same-sex prom dates and girls wearing tuxedos violated McMillen's constitutional rights. The district responded by withdrawing its sponsorship and canceling the April 2 event.
> In an apparent compromise, school district officials said parents would organize a private event with school chaperones that McMillen could attend, tuxedo and all.
> McMillen didn't take her girlfriend because the girl's parents wouldn't let her go to the event. McMillen escorted another female instead. She did, however, wear a black tuxedo with a blue green vest. But when she, her date and a friend showed up at Fulton Country Club, only four other people were there. She left after half an hour…

So let's see what we've got here:

A woman's hurt feelings? Check!

Ironclad state of victimhood due to "civil rights violations"? Check!

Trying to force your peers and other people to condone your deliberately non-conformist choices and bend over backwards to accommodate your every amoral whim? Check!

Abusing the court system to bully a school district or other entity that has neither the money nor patience to properly give you the legal thrashing you so richly deserve? Check!

I imagine the next logical step will be her filing a lawsuit to force all her classmates to sign her yearbook at the end of the year! After all, we don't want to hurt anyone's feelings, do we?

There is nothing worse to a narcissist then being forced to confront the fact that reality does not adjust to be in line with her desires, and that other people are not mere props, but sentient beings with beliefs and opinions that often conflict with one's own. Sadly, as Ms. McMillen is only 18, she potentially has several more decades of misery to inflict upon the general populace.

This is the general progression of the path to feminist and homosexual dominance, fulfilled through lies and deceit, and enabled by its agents and sympathizers in the realms of education, the arts, politics and journalism: desensitization to indifference, indifference to tolerance, tolerance to acceptance, acceptance to preference, preference to ideal. We are entering the final stages because we have been on autopilot for too long. In the meantime, we can at least heap some contempt upon the woman who sparked this whole sordid affair. Go on, I know you want to…

Fatherhood: What's The Point?

I know a lot of readers and commenters advocate avoiding children and family. I can understand why they do so, having survived a brutal divorce myself. Sometimes the fear of losing one's children is so painful that one gets the feeling that it would have been best if they'd never been born at all. This pain is all the worse for men who really love their kids, so I suspect that some of the men we see condemning marriage and family in the strongest terms are the men who were hurt the worst by the loss brought on by divorce.

There are also men who saw the writing on the wall early on and avoided family, because they weighed the consequences and made a decision based on their best interests. It was probably a wise decision. There is no guarantee for a man that he will grow up with his children these days, and there is a good chance that he will be financially ruined if he loses them. Divorce carries a double penalty for men these days: first comes loss of loved ones, and then comes loss of property, wealth and financial freedom. It's a severe blow, as attested to by the elevated risk of suicide for men (but not women) following divorce.

Rationally speaking, it would be very difficult to make a case for having children today. There's no farm to work, they can't be employed at a young age in the family business, they probably won't support a man when he's old, and they get in the way of many of life's pleasures, both great and small.

However, for some of us they still mean a great deal. Despite all the trouble and heartache, fatherhood is a cherished role for millions of men. Men regularly follow their ex-wives around the country to be near their children, often incurring great hardship in doing so. I recently read about a man living in a tent – he had lost his license, and then his job, because of child support arrears – in the town his children lived in. He had given everything up to be near his kids, and was being punished by the state for doing so. Despite enormous financial and sometimes criminal penalties, men still struggle to be fathers.

One might ask "Why?" What's the point?

Too often we are treated to saccharine notions of fatherhood. The man throwing a ball to his kid in the park, or the beaming father at his daughter's wedding. This all makes for good TV, I suppose, but it goes so much deeper than that. Our relationships with our parents reach to the very core of our humanity, and are intertwined with our ideas about our origins, purpose in life and legacy after death. Being a child or parent is such a fundamental concept that it infuses all religions and permeates our creation myths. It is the inescapable metaphor for the beginning of all things.

I'm convinced that this fundamentally human world-view is at least partly instinctive. Children understand the relationship between parents and children before any others. It is the standard by which they measure all other relationships throughout life, and the basic concept upon which they build their understanding of society.

But as fundamental as parenthood may be, fatherhood is the more tenuous of two basic parent-child relationships. It is a fragile flower – a gift to humanity – that sets us apart from the beasts of the field. Anthropologists like to speculate about what it is that makes us uniquely human. Could it be language? The use of tools? The ability to plan ahead? All of these things may set us apart to one degree or another, but fatherhood surely is just as important as any of them. Whether one believes that humans evolved from troglodytes or were created in God's own image, we can all agree that the human father-child bond is unique. In most other species, what sets sires apart from other males tends to be that they avoid killing their progeny. However, these beasts seem to have nothing more than a built-in tolerance for their offspring. In humans, there is mutual recognition of a special bond. That human fathers and children have a close, unique relationship is a very rare, special thing in the realm of life on earth.

So rather than argue about the benefits or drawbacks of fatherhood, I think we should take a step out of the debate and acknowledge that fatherhood is simply an integral part of ourselves as men, whether we have children or not. It is in our nature, and it influences how we relate to the world around us. The domestication of animals, the birth of art and material creativity, and the fostering of civilization are all fruits of the paternal nature of the human male.

In short, fatherhood is what makes us human.

Male Studies Program Already Under Attack

Welmer · 9 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Amanda Hess of the online Washington City Paper (her blog is called "The Sexist"), has posted a nearly unreadable interview deriding the concept of male studies. It is so over-the-top snarky and dripping with sarcasm that it's barely intelligible, and I wonder whether she was drunk when she conducted the interview. Here are a few quotes:

> SADY: Well, The Man has staked his claim in those. BASICALLY WE NEED TO TAKE THE QUARTERBACK OF DISCOURSE TO THE GOAL NET OF DISCUSSION TO SCORE A HOME RUN HAT TRICK OF ANTI-OPPRESSION THEORY! Is my understanding.
> AMANDA: I plan on blaming all of my deficiencies in forming metaphors, drawing conclusions, and overall making sense on my Oppression today. For the record.

Here, as far as I can tell, the interviewee suggests that she is actually noticing when men call her out on her feminist BS:

> AMANDA: But, I write about a lot of really minor shit that women are expected to do and about how these very little things are reminders of society's expectations of men and women. And a lot of times men get really pissed when I do that, too! For it is annoying to be forced to think about.
> SADY: Right. I mean, here's the thing: I'm a lady who gets called out on my privilege. A lot. As I see it, my job description is: Write about lady stuff, try to remember not all ladies have exactly the same life as I do, listen when ladies with different lives are like "uh, you missed something." So the plague of dudes on the Internet who are like, "WHAT DO YOU MEAN LADIES EXPERIENCE THINGS DIFFERENTLY THAN I DO, SOMETIMES NOT WELL?!???!" Like: I try to listen to people EVERY SINGLE DAY, dude, and I haven't actually had an aneurysm and died yet, so maybe it's not actually that fucking hard. You know? The Internet is not a thousand little knives stabbing you in the face. The Internet is some people talking. In conclusion, calm down.

Amanda objects that male studies is about actual, biological males:

> AMANDA: Yes. And that traditional man has always been permitted to appear. It's all the other men who haven't. But Male Studies cuts them out of the picture when it devotes itself to "males as males," as if we're only talking about one very clearly defined and biologically determined type of person.

Interviewee admits to being drunk (as I suspected):

> SADY: Like, if we start looking at "masculinity" as this very exclusive concept that has all of these other concepts and privileges packed into it, then we get to my I Went To Liberal Arts College And Have Simplistic Ideas Place where, like… we can create a discourse without you, substantially, Ultimately Privileged People. If we can get over our own bullshit and have each others' backs, we can do a lot. And maybe this conversation needs to take place on THOSE terms. Provided you're okay with getting yelled at when you fuck it up. Also, I have had three beers, because it's hot. THE REVOLUTION WILL NOT BE SOBER!

Well, Paul Elam's been keeping our end up over there in the comments. Feel free to join him.

Studies Show Increased Likelihood for MRAs to Be Pansies

Jay Hammers · 10 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Pansy: a timid man or boy considered childish or unassertive.

I've noticed an increased likelihood for some people involved in the men's rights proto-movement to pander to feminists and others who hate men. Here are three recent examples of misguided actions by MRAs (men's rights advocates/activists) in the community.

Men's News Daily refers to masculism as hateful because apparently they don't want to lose their (non-existent) female readership. At the same time, publisher Mike LaSalle has hosted countless articles stirring up hatred for Obama and anyone who isn't a far, far right-winger, but these articles apparently aren't considered "hateful or inciting". Furthermore, editor-in-chief Paul Elam even stated quite recently at The Spearhead,

> Because the day will come, no matter how psychotic you are when infatuated, that she will be sitting there talking and you will want to shove a recliner down her throat to shut her up.

If masculism is hatred (it's not) then so is a statement indicating all women become nagging and tiresome after being with them long enough. You know what, that's exactly how I feel about some MRAs!

MND censors honest commenters they disagree with. That women are biologically different than men and that men are better than women at many things is obvious. The people running MND do not appear to value dissenting opinions and are as emotional and hypocritical as any feminist. They could at least be consistent in their thought-policing.

Why do we care? Men's News Daily has a good deal of influence on the men's rights community and as a site that consistently appears on pages 1 and 2 of a Google search for "men's rights", it is likely to be a starting point for someone who is interested in learning more.

The False Rape Society becomes more about women than men. The blog description now reads, "Giving voice to falsely accused men and women," as if women share a comparable burden with men when it comes to false rape accusations. That's like a website that sells tampons claiming to give all-day protection to menstruating men and women.

The original website had this description: "News and commentary about wrongful accusations of rape and sexual assault." Furthermore, the FRS consistently refers to "persons falsely accused of rape" rather than "men accused of rape," which is the only accurate way of phrasing it. This is a subtle example of misandry from a website in the men's rights realm. It is the same thing the media does when it refers to men and women dying in service even though men account for 98% of deaths in modern wars. When you watch a documentary on World War II they don't talk about the men who died fighting for their countries, they talk about the "soldiers", but whenever you hear about a man who commits a crime they are referred to as men. For an excellent YouTube video on the phenomenon, watch Men Don't Exist.

What does the FRS think will be gained by denigrating men while stroking the egos of women by insinuating there is a significant, or rather any problem of false rape accusations of women? They won't gain the support of women on the false rape issue by appealing to women's victimhood complex regarding something they are never victims of. In order to gain women's support you must show them how false rape accusations can affect the good men in their lives. Be more honest and less politically correct, for our sake!

The FRS insults men, especially men who are raped by women, by implying that false accusations of rape against women (and by men) are common or even significant. It just doesn't happen. For a man to be raped is perceived as shameful and unmanly. A man accusing a woman of anything, especially rape of a man, would be shunned as a misogynist because women are beyond reproach. Even if you have the courage to out your rapist, it's extremely unlikely you will find justice in the law. False rape accusations simply do not happen to women because an individual falsely accusing a woman has nothing to gain from it – the law will not help them, the community will shun them, and generally things will only get worse for them.

The FRS is on page 2 of a Google search for "rape accusation", but it does far more good than harm by raising awareness of false rape.

Reddit: Men's Rights taken over by feminist apologists, misandrists, manginas, and women. This Reddit has become a place where good quality links are immediately down-voted by man-haters and beta males in an attempt to censor anything but the most PC pro-female submissions. They don't always succeed and there are still some good articles submitted. However, many of the posters there are simply feminist attention whores who have nothing to contribute; they attempt to paint every genuine supporter of men's rights as a misogynist, which isn't really an insult. Zed has told us misogynists are made, not born. And as Hestia once put so well:

> "Misogynist" might be an irksome term to have thrown your way, but in today's world the term almost seems to be a compliment, as it means a person doesn't sit back and take all the garbage the world wants to throw their way but looks around and comes to conclusions based on reality, however un-PC these conclusions might be. To be a misogynist nowadays is to value liberty and justice rather than the unearned special privileges and power to be a slaveowner that comes with the territory of being a misandrist. If a person must be one or the other, it seems clear to me which one is the bigger insult.

Schopenbecq of The Anti-Feminist has described the problem with Reddit: Men's Rights before. He has created a men's rights Reddit that doesn't tolerate misandry but it is difficult to sustain as there are few MRAs who recognize that man-haters cannot be bargained with.

Reddit: Men's Rights is on the first page of a Google search for "men's rights".

In conclusion, if we allow those (men and women) who are against us (mostly men) to dictate our strategy, we will fail to achieve significant accomplishments. Sadly, that's exactly what Men's News Daily, the False Rape Society, Reddit: Men's Rights, and too many others in the loosely networked men's rights community are doing. And too often they are in the habit of denouncing people – mostly men – who warn them of their error.

About the author: Jay Hammers is a young lad who throughout his life has been a witness to Western society's embrace of pervasive misandry and female privilege. He recently became aware of the men's rights movement and started a blog as both an outlet for his rage and a way to raise awareness in others: Men's Rights with Jay Hammers.

Male Studies Media Awards

Dr. Paul · 11 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Imagine that one day you see, in all seriousness, an announcement regarding the upstart of a male studies program at a major university that has been developed to address, research and educate people on the effects of misandry that is practiced against men and boys across the western world."

I posted that to Men's News Daily on January 20th of this year. I had the good fortune to know about the conference well in advance and the privilege of being the first person to write about it. I also had the stress of having to keep my mouth shut till it was time, which is stressful because I am not very good at that.

I had anticipated that there would first be a good deal of skepticism about it from MRA's, and I wasn't disappointed. Hell, we still have plenty that are fuming about the minutia of it being called male studies instead of men's studies, even though it has been well explained that men's studies has been around and under feminist control for 30 years.

It was also pretty predictable that once the conference took place, replete with esteemed academicians uttering some long absent truths about feminist ideologues, that eyebrows would be raised and heads would turn.

Some of those heads aren't just turning; they're spinning like Linda Blair's on a shaking bed and puking up green sludge.

It is glorious.

And so, in the early stages of what I am quite sure will result in a Texas Death Match, I want to announce some award winners for media coverage of the Big Event.

The first award, for balanced and reasonable coverage, goes to

Dr. Michael Blumenfield, The Huffington Post

Qualifier: Blumenfield wrote his column before the conference and matter-of-factly questioned why anyone would object to such an academic pursuit.

The "Almost Got it Right" Award

Jenna Goudreau, Forbes

Qualifier: Jenna thought we need to address the issues of men, but took exception to Lionel Tiger's statement at the conference that "A lot of feminist argument is just irritating." She also made the point that there was no need to denigrate other gender studies in the process, as though they don't do that themselves without help.

Most Obtuse Coverage

Daniel de Vise, Washington Post

Qualifier: Daniel never heard the word misandry till he read the conference description. Pretty good trick for a "journalist" who practices it. His one attempt at crack analysis was to make fun of Lionel Tiger's name.

Completely Clueless Coverage Award

Newsweek writers Jessica Bennett and Jesse Ellison on their Equality Myth Blog

Qualifier: The two Jess's were qualified by, well, their qualifications. They identify themselves on their blog with the trippy triad of Newsweek writers, pop culture enthusiasts and feminists. For opinion on the conference they sought the opinion of the lady cab driver who dropped them off at the event. Next week they are interviewing Pink's thong designer.

The Psychopulitzer Prize

Amanda Hess, The Washington City Paper

Qualifier: Hess always was a neurotic idiot. But in her coverage of this event she has demonstrated that she is one stress factor away from talking to herself while she pushes a shopping cart down the street with wild streaks of lipstick running up the sides of her face.

The conference, and the idea of uppity males, has so gotten under her skin that she has posted no less than four pieces on it, each one more poorly written, sloppy and bizarre than the one before it- in the last 24 hours. She has also started a twitter campaign to, well, I suppose, roar.

Amandas idea of an interview

Amandas idea of journalism

Amandas idea of humor

Wacky video

And the final award, The Internet Heisman, goes to the MRA community. If you go through the comment sections on almost all of these articles, you will find an amazing assortment of rational people intellectually bitch slapping every gender ideologue posting their normal drivel. In fact, even on feminist sites like the Jess's and Hess's, the majority of comments are pro male studies, and the authors are very well informed.

It must also be noted that the conference has received a great deal of support from the likes of Mike LaSalle, Welmer, Angry Harry, Glenn Sacks, John Dias and a host of other bloggers who will not be mentioned because they are too numerous to ensure they all get credit.

And in the media, we got to see something I am not sure we have ever seen before. Some really nervous feminists.

Like I said, it's glorious.

Mad Groper Terrorizes College, Feminist Angry at Students' Flippant Response

Ferdinand Bardamu · 11 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this week, a merry prankster at Ball State University in Muncie, Indiana threw this quiet college town into a panic when he went around on his bicycle smacking women on their asses and speeding away before he could be nabbed, no doubt while twirling his mustache and cackling maniacally. A grand total of two females were traumatized by this chauvinist's cheeky cheek-violating ways, enough to encourage campus police to send a emergency email to students and faculty telling them to be on the lookout for this terror on two wheels. The same emergency system that is usually reserved for serious safety warnings, like when rapists and muggers are on the loose.

The police's overreaction to our buttock-bruising friend inspired someone to set up a Facebook page to highlight the absurdity of the situation. As of this writing (3:30 am Green Mountain Time), the Ball State Ass Slapper has just shy of 11,00o fans. Not only that, you can now score cool Ass Slapper swag, including T-shirts with phrases like "BSU: Slappin' Ass On The Way To Class Since 1918″ and shirts for the ladies that read "I Got Spanked By The BSU Ass Slapper…And I Liked It". There's even a song dedicated to the Ass Slapper's awesomeness:

Of course, there are folks out there who say that this is no laughing matter, and that anyone who finds humor in this whole thing is evil and should be hunted down by a lynch mob. BSU's student paper covered their asses adequately with this milquetoast editorial demanding that this crime be taken seriously, and a Facebook group that opposes "MEMEBRS" of the Ball State Ass Slapper page (IT IS NOT A JOKE!!!) is a mere 328 fans strong at the time this sentence was tapped out. But the real laughs are to be had from an indignant blog post from ScienceBlogs scribbler "Isis the Scientist" of On Becoming a Domestic and Laboratory Goddess… (haha, don't you get it? Her name is Isis, the Egyptian goddess of motherhood and fertility and her blog is called, eh heh…). You'd think a blog on a site called ScienceBlogs would be more about, y'know, SCIENCE, but Isis would rather chew up their bandwidth to show how shocked, appalled, offended she is that people would dare to find this incident funny:

> I've never seen such an overt celebration of assault against women on a college campus. While Ball State President Jo Ann Gora has denounced the group, I'm still disappointed in the student body of Ball State. I'm even more disappointed that it doesn't just seem to be the students that have clearly lost their minds. Apparently a contingent of the faculty are acting like first rate asshats too. And, because a group of students have decided that BSU is making a mountain out of a molehill, they want to raise some money to help "real victims of sexual assault." Thomas Bible of Nashville, a douchey-looking fucker and fan of "Women bringing you sandwiches", suggests "how bout at your little charity event instead of a kissing booth you have an ass slapping booth? $1 a slap. have a buncha girls with nice tight booties who can take a joke rotate in and out." Way to keep it classy, Muncie. Thanks for educating the next generation of mansplainers.

Okay, let's get one thing out of the way – groping random women is not cool. But it's not a crime worthy of an entire campus menstruating over. The Ball State Ass Slapper didn't bend these girls over in a dark alleyway and ravish them like scoundrels do in those romance novels women like to read. He just…slapped their asses. They weren't physically hurt, they weren't forcibly impregnated, and if they develop mental issues from getting their haunches manhandled, they were probably screwed in the head to begin with. Calling what he did "assault" dilutes the meaning of the word.

Secondly, if a woman ran around spanking guys on their rear-ends, the police would have laughed any complainers off the phone, and Isis and her cohorts would no doubt impugn the manhood of any man who didn't like having his tush grabbed.

Thirdly, as the reality of game tells us, whether a woman regards something as sexual assault is contingent upon how hot she finds the "assaulter." If George Clooney came up and smacked Isis on the butt, she'd probably melt into a gooey puddle of gina juices.

And can anyone tell me why feminists are so deeply in love with the word "asshat"? Aside from Paul Elam (who gets a pass because he's cool), they're the only denizens of the internet I've seen that use it as an insult.

But wait, that's not all! As furious as Isis is at the men who are making light of this story, she's really cross with the girls who are stabbing the sisterhood in the back:

> I'm disappointed in the young women who are supporting the fuckwittery of this group. I wonder if they truly believe that this is all "harmless fun", or if they are participating in this Facebook group because they believe that this behavior will get them accepted by their male counterparts. I'm old enough to know that it doesn't matter how much of a "cool chick" you are, or whether most of your friends are guys. It doesn't matter how much you publicly proclaim your hatred of other women, or whether you label those other women as "bitchy", "sluttly", or "dramatic." You'll never really be one of the boys and it's not sufficient defense to stop some men from objectifying or abusing you.

Or maybe they just realize, like the rest of us normal people, that this whole thing is hilarious, and that getting your butt-cheek fondled for a split-second barely ranks on the hierarchy of sexual assault. God bless those girls for having both the common sense and the sense of humor that an employed scientist lacks.

> What's most disappointing to me is the attitude that "kids will be kids" and that these are simply college-level hi jinx that these young men will grow out of. I see no evidence that boys who act disrespectfully toward women in college ever change their ways. Instead, I fear that these attitudes are simply translated to the workplace when these they graduate and enter the workforce.
> Yesterday, one of you sent me an article about the current discrimination suits that Novartis is facing. Novartis is being accused of preventing the promotion of women, actively firing women who became pregnant, and overt sexual harassment. Yet, Novartis attorney Richard Schnadig defends one manager who is accused of showing his female subordinates pornography and asking them to sit on his lap by saying, "He wasn't that bad a manager. He was just terrible with women."

Yeah, because laughing at something that is so transparently funny translates into being a socially retarded imbecile. A thousand curses on affirmative action for letting this brainless bimbo anywhere near the hallowed halls of science!

> This all makes it very hard to be excited about students coming from Ball State. At least they've gone through the trouble of forming a public Facebook fan page to put their douchecockery out in the open. Still, perhaps its time they had their education redefined.

That's another thing – why do feminists have an obsession with the word "douche?" Go to any feminist blog and you'll find it used repeatedly and attached to all sorts of descriptors, such as "douchenozzle" and "douchecockery." It's like they're trying to tell us something…

In the meantime, show your solidarity with the smart students of BSU by becoming a fan of the Ball State Ass Slapper on Facebook. I never miss an opportunity to push a feminist's blood pressure a few points higher.

Old Chiefs and Young Braves

I knew Jay's article would upset some people, but I put it through anyway because I thought that, although Jay might have been tactless, he made a few points that are worth hearing. And, frankly, sometimes we ought to let the young men have their say, even if they can be a bit brash and impetuous. Finally, in my opinion it's often best to let the people who feel something the most make the point. Of course, this might not be the advice an attorney would give you in court, but the last thing The Spearhead should be trying to do is appeal to some hand-picked jury.

Younger men have always been impulsive and filled with passion. It is a blessing and a curse, but those who've been around a while should be able to see it for what it is, and use it to understand what passions are motivating people at any given time. Older men tend to be more cautious, politically astute and guarded in their speech. These are valuable traits, but they have their drawbacks as well — they tend to lead to avoidance of uncomfortable realities.

Of course, the old chiefs ought to be making the final decisions, but if they are truly wise, they'll let the young braves have their say, and take it all into consideration. In time, the fiery young men get a bit more perspective, and they understand where they took things too far, but they will never get to learn if never given the opportunity to open their mouths and put their opinion out there.

The most controversial posts on The Spearhead so far have all been written by younger contributors. I, personally, have taken more flak for publishing them than any others. However, I'm not going to stop doing so, because I think they often have a point, and I think we ought to listen.

Jay had a point. He didn't make it in the most diplomatic manner, but at least he made it. I, personally, have been rankled by the concessions to feminism a lot of prominent MRAs have made. In order to be diplomatic, I've avoided the subject. I didn't want to offend anybody. Admittedly, I think Jay was shooting at the wrong targets. The FRA and MND are actually not even close to as accommodating of feminism as some other purported pro-male sites. In fact, FRA in particular is pretty close to being on the front lines. But I know what he was getting at.

Another thing to keep in mind is that things are a lot worse for young men now than they were a generation ago. Some of the guys who've been involved in MRA for a long time may be committed activists, and may have our best interests in mind, but I'm not sure they can understand just how stifling the atmosphere is for young men today. The campus radical feminists from the 1970s and 80s are now professors, judges, lawyers, administrators, senators, etc. They are still fighting the same battle against young, male coeds, but now their opponents are hopelessly outclassed.

Given this, can one blame young men for adopting a siege mentality? To a lot of young guys, this looks like something approaching a real, shooting war. The rape hysteria on campus has morphed into totalitarian treatment of young men, which includes the use of armed force. They are reacting the situation as they see it. We ought to pay attention, in order to understand the true extent of the problem.

Of course, young men ought to stop and think every now and then to take stock of who their allies are, but human nature being what it is, young men will always take things a step too far. This is how they learn. Lord knows I regret a great deal of what I said and did in my adolescence and youth, but if I hadn't screwed up as much as I did I'd know a lot less. It's just part of the human condition.

In conclusion, I'd like to suggest that the old chiefs and young braves pick up the peace pipe and take each other's respective burdens into account. We're dealing with a common problem, and although it affects us in different ways, we've got the same goal.

American Mother Claims Adopted Russian Son Abusive, Sends Him Back

Just when it seemed that the International image of American women couldn't get much worse, single adoptive mother Torry Hansen of Tennessee drove Artyom Savalyev, her seven-year-old adopted son, to the airport with a one-way ticket to Russia, put him on a plane and shipped him back to where he came from.

Ms. Hansen used the standard excuse American women use when opting out of relationships: abuse. All we have at this point is her word that the boy was violent, disturbed and homicidal. To many men such excuses sound suspicious, as well they should, because they usually are. Interestingly, the Russians aren't buying it at all, which suggests that only in the US do people take the word of a woman seriously when she claims abuse even in such unlikely circumstances.

Hansen is quoted saying "I'm sorry to say that… I no longer wish to parent this child." This is a fairly shocking statement, but not all that long ago, if a woman said "I'm sorry to say that I no longer wish to be married to this man" it would have sounded pretty bad, too. Of course, that's changed a great deal, so perhaps it shouldn't shock us to see American women abandoning their children, adopted or not.

Naturally, the rest of the world views this with horror, and the Russians have threatened to cut off all adoptions to the US. American women – who, above all, want options – are not happy about this, despite the fact that they were all too happy to legislate strict controls on American men meeting with foreign women.

In the case of Artyom Savalyev, we see the familiar tactic of the woman making accusations and allegations against a defenseless, voiceless opponent. Ms. Hansen took care to make sure the kid was long gone before anyone could get another side of the story, and surrounded herself with female allies who would corroborate her story (another common tactic). Of course, being only seven years old and still learning English, little Artyom probably couldn't have defended himself all that well in the first place. However, that she sent him back before coming out with the abuse story makes her claims all the more suspicious.

Perhaps this kind of behavior was bound to crop up sooner or later, because just about every man in the US who could be halfway credibly accused of abuse already has been in one form or another, so children are simply the next target. When even this has run its course, one wonders who American women will target next — space aliens?

Miracle At St. Anna – The Other "Saving Private Ryan"

Obsidian · 12 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Although I've always loved movies I admit I don't watch as many as I should. I had heard of the Spike Lee joint "Miracle at St. Anna" when it first came out, but I was too busy being a workhorse at the time to catch it during its run in theaters. Big mistake.

Last night, and just again a few minutes ago, I had the chance to watch what may be Lee's best film in recent years, perhaps ever. And I mean that. His story about war, life, death & faith, to say nothing of race, set against the backdrop of the Italian campaign during WW2, is a must see for anyone who wants a full understanding of those times and the "other side" of the Greatest Generation.

Lee's film, of course, harkens back to Steve Spielberg's epic "Saving Private Ryan", which bosted an all-star cast and was hailed as a cinematic masterpiece for its accurate, grisly depiction of war on the shores of Normandy. And no doubt, it was and is, a great film. Nevertheless, Lee's "St. Anna" goes where Speilberg's magnum opus doesn't-it explores the very real racial politics of the US war effort, the emotions all of this generates in its Black soldiers, and how this plays itself out the military campaign against the Nazis.

"St. Anna" focuses on a Band of Brothas from the US Army's 92nd Division-the Buffalo Soldiers-and their ill-fated attempt to take a town in Tuscany, Italy. Like many African Americans my age, it was a deeply moving experience, as we too had relatives who fought in the "Good War", and what Lee shows on screen are things we can relate to; I know I could, having been told about many of the very same things myself by my Dad and Grand Dad.

For example, there's a scene in a film when, before the fighting starts (a scene every bit as evocative as "Ryan"'s famed Normandy battle sequence), the Germans attempt to dissuade the Buffalo Soldiers from fighting ("Axis Sally"). They make the point that it is foolish to fight for a country that doesn't even recognize you basic human rights-something I know well.

Because my own dad-himself a Marine vet of the Korean War-told me on several occasions, how the Koreans would drop leaflets saying the exact same thing. And as "St. Anna" shows, where Black soldiers had to with enemies within and without, or as my daddy would put it, how he "fought the Koreans in the daytime, and fought the crackers at night".

Another scene in the film is powerfully evocative for me as well. When still training to be deployed, this same Band of Brothas attempts to be served some ice cream at a local store. The shop owner, a stompdown racist, pulls a gun on them, while Nazi prisoners of war are sitting in a both, enjoying sundaes. Nor was this unusual-in addition to things like this, my grandfather, who was a DI in the USMC during WW2, often told me about how "Krauts" could ride in the front of the bus-and how he had to ride in the back-even in uniform.

There's more to the story, but I don't want to spoil it for those who have yet to see it, and believe me, you want to see it-not just because of the "flipside" of the usual WW2 narrative, but also because its a damned good story, too. Many have believed that Lee was snubbed for an Oscar for "Malcolm X" and "Do The Right Thing". I suspect his "Miracle at St. Anna" just might get buried in the Hollywood shuffle, too.

For the usual reasons.

Wanted: Moderators

Welmer · 12 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One thing I've got to admit is that I've never particularly liked managing people. I'm the type of guy who dislikes being managed, and I tend to assume that other people feel the same way. However, I might be a bit extreme in that regard: I really can't stand it. This probably leads me to be overly cautious when it comes to moderating, laying down the law, etc.

For the past couple weeks, things have been getting a bit contentious on The Spearhead's message boards, and they've come to a head in the last couple days. Much of that is doubtless my own responsibility, so I'm taking steps to fix it.

I've come to the conclusion that the forum, at this point, is woefully undermoderated, so I'd like to ask for some moderation help. All I ask is that the comment policy be implemented in an unbiased manner and volunteer moderators do their job in as impartial a manner as possible.

Zed has some experience with this, and he is a forum administrator, so in addition to my own judgment, I'm going to rely on his as well to a considerable degree in deciding who is appropriate. Anyone who is interested in helping should feel free to email or PM me or Zed (ideally both of us at once), and let us know which forum you'd like to moderate. There is also the option of creating new subforums for people who might be interested in expanding the conversation, but for now I won't do that unless that subforum has a dedicated mod.

With a little bit more attention paid to the forum, I think it can be a lot more productive and less aggravating for those who are interested in making thoughtful contributions.

Alpha Dreams and Beta Genes: Male Sexual Entitlement

Chuck Ross · 13 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This article has been cross-posted at Gucci Little Piggy.

Because women have relaxed their sexual standards and because the sexual market has become laissez-faire allowing the invisible hand to "finger out" the marketplace, men have developed an entitled attitude towards sex. Humans regularly display a self-assessment bias where a majority think that they are better than average (80% of people think they are above average intelligence). The male subset of humans is no different in their fallacious conclusions. Since women give up sex easier than they used to and because men think that they are at least as deserving as the men who are actually getting it, they develop a "why not me" attitude when they are relegated to sexual Siberia.

Because it has turned society on its ear, feminism and sexual liberation have created a logical dilemma for men; they would prefer to uphold the ideal of marriage, monogamy, and sexual socialism, yet they want to engage in easy-peasy sex with a woman who meets their attractiveness threshold. When they don't get what they expect even though they abhor the thought of such behavior for the rest of the men in society, they get angry. But these two positions are incompatible.

Sexual Socialism: Haves versus Have-Nots

Humans align on a social hierarchy that basically determines their sexual attractiveness. While the middle portions of this hierarchy can become convoluted the general timbre of this concept is that there are men at the top who control their sexual destiny while there are men at the bottom who control their sexual destiny only insofar as they control which hand they jack off with and which porn sites they subscribe to. In other words, by nature, there are haves and there are have-nots.

This is an important point to harp on as it is at the root of all social disenchantment from affirmative action policies to gender-neutrality to disparate sexual experiences among males. Like most face-offs between haves and have-nots, the position of the have-nots supports socialist mechanisms in order to keep up with the Jones' as they say. We see this argument in economics all the time. In particular, advocates for welfare and entitlement programs complain that the wealth gap is continually growing – the poor are getting poorer. But this is patently untrue; the poor are getting richer if rich is defined as "having more stuff". It's just that the rich are getting even more rich; they are getting even more stuff. But by historical standards, the economically impoverished are wealthy. They have TVs, cars, cell phones, and travel further distances and see more things than even the wealthiest people of past eras. But financial economics much as sexual economics – and empowerment through it – is all about relativity in the have-nots' eyes. The have-nots' ammunition and their power is gleaned from convincing us that life should be fair when we all know that it is not.

Male Entitlement Exists Even Under Female Hypergamy

The current sexual regime is monogamy with a tendency towards female hypergamy. Now, men have to make their sexual choices within this type of regime. The male hierarchy which allocates mate/date pairings has ostensibly adapted to the current sexual regime that has existed for over 30 years now. Most men in the mating/dating market have existed under this type of regime; this implies that our nakedly rational expectations – without cultural influences – would have shifted in order to form a sexual market equilibrium. In other words, mens' sexual tastes and preferences should have shifted to account for their true-to-life options. If they haven't aligned over time, there is some barrier – which I'm calling entitlement – standing in the way.

Female hypergamy has this effect: it slices off a portion of the bottom end of the male spectrum of the sexual attractiveness hierarchy. Male 1s, 2s, and 3s – the omegas of the bunch – are virtually eunuchs. They are the worker bees or the compost heap of humanity depending on how much you want to sugar-coat their precarious situation.

But this is how it has been for most of human history. If we have 100 men and 100 women, 10% (the hierarchy is not a uniform distribution) of men don't factor in to the sexual marketplace. The other 90 men become distributed across the 100 women; the attractiveness scale adjusts to where the distance between the highest ranking male and second-highest male is greater than that for the women. From this point on, after the omega males who have always existed have been dealt with, men and women pair up in accordance with their own ratings i.e. male 7s pair up with female 7s.

Because beta males could find mates – if they wanted to – their entitlement lies in their refusal to settle. When I say that men feel entitled, part of my argument rests on the feeling that men don't accept the women who will accept them. To these men, because of untethered female hypergamy female 6s go after male 7.5s and get them. Since the inverse of this would have to be true – male 7.5s can only get female 6s and below – entitled men feel that they are "falling through the cracks of the new sexual marketplace". But I maintain there are barriers to falling through these cracks – chubby womens' bellies provide one such remedy.

A man's attraction to a woman is based on several things, and this is where his entitlement comes in to play. Female 3s do have sex with men which implies that men are able to have sex with female 3s – some man is able to stomach the idea of having sex with these 3s. Those men are most likely 3s or 4s themselves who don't have many other options, but the point is that men are physically capable of maintaining an erection around these women (it won't be as quality as an erection around a 10, but it will do) if that woman is all they can get. So any man who can't get an erection around these 3s is suffering from a construct which tells him that he is above banging out 3s. Usually this construct is his own memory of his past sexual dalliances. Perhaps the man is used to getting 5s or he sees men who he thinks he resembles having sex with 7s. When he sees a lot of good-looking women spreading their legs for men he thinks he compares favorably to, he's naturally going to think that he has been shafted when those very same women aren't interested in him.

Examples of Entitlement

So what does sexual entitlement actually look like? Entitlement is expressed in different ways. Men show it on the micro-level by having lofty expectations of the women they decide to date, and it is displayed on a more macro level in that men are unwilling to settle for a woman that they should rationally be willing to settle for.

First off, let me say that, in the past, I've felt overly entitled to sex. I have developed an attitude that if a woman doesn't have sex with me soon after I begin wooing her I will stop pursuing her. This entitlement is felt by many men and it stems from our preconceived notion that all women are sexually empowered and that we meet their threshold of "do-ability". This entitlement is manifest in other ways too. Perhaps we feel that a particularly good-looking woman should prefer us based upon our qualities over the types of guys she usually goes for. If those women don't like our particular swagger or our look, we call them "bitches" or we impugn their intelligence. In many instances in the Manosphere I've witnessed men constructing self-defense mechanisms by which they make the argument that a particular (slutty) woman isn't worth their time and energy. But we all know that these men would capitulate to this woman's advances at the drop of a hat.

There is also a sense of entitlement in the complaints men have about the women available to them. A large enough number of men complain that they don't want to date fatties and ugly women, but the truth is, those women are the only viable options for these men. The title of my post sums it up: Alpha Dreams and Beta Genes. Most men have beta dispositions and lead beta lives, yet they want to score on the same level as alpha males. But as we all know, there is a relatively fixed hierarchy that dictates the distribution of alphas, betas, and omegas through society. Too far gone are the words of wisdom that men in these parts are loathe to utter: "Take what you can get." If you read any Manosphere comment board, you'd get the impression that most of these men are apex alphas who wouldn't settle for anything less than an 8. But it would be a huge coincidence if alpha males came together on these comment boards in such high numbers. Chances are that most of us around here would do well to score a 5; while plenty of us would do well to score anything at all.

This attitude was captured in Charlotte Allen's now famous Weekly Standard article titled "The New Dating Game". She wrote, regarding Mystery, the Game salesman whose profits are maximized by convincing as many men as possible that they can score 8s,9s, and 10s:

"Mystery advises his readers not to bother with any female who rates lower than a 6…on the 1 to 10 scale, while assuring them that if they follow his advice, they can readily score a "supermodel hot" 10."

One wonders what Mystery would do if one of his readers was Quasimodo or the Elephant Man. I don't really need to blather on any more about this point as it has pretty much made itself.

Anecdotal Evidence

I'll use my roommate as an example of male entitlement. He is in his late 30s, has had legal problems that involved jail time for a non-violent felony, and he works with me as a waiter. Physically his looks are on par with your average man in his late Thirties. He had a dry-spell for quite a long time which is no surprise given his circumstances. He had a couple of opportunities to bust his slump – one with a slightly chubby 25-year old chick from work with a decent enough face. Even though she rates more attractive than him, my roommate didn't want to pursue anything because this chick didn't get him amped up enough for him to put in the leg work. She wasn't hot enough for him to put forth any effort to ask her out, go out with her, or even have sex with her. So instead of doing something about his problem – his perpetually unsatiated horniness – he complained about how there weren't any hot chicks around for him to bang. I pointed out to him on a couple of occasions that hot chicks don't grow on trees and they aren't rationed out to every man like loaves of bread during the Depression (although that would be an entitlement program I could get behind). His response was always that he couldn't force "it".

George Sodini is another example of male entitlement and the Bolshevekian sexual have-nots who I'm arguing against. Sodini had sex less than 100 times in his life; by the time he commited his murders in his late 40s, he hadn't had sex in almost 20 years although he seems to have had more than one partner in his life. These facts, on their face and compared to men throughout history, indicate that Sodini was sexually fortunate. Many men in our recent history and in prehistoric times went celibate their whole lives. Research on mitochondrial DNA shows that perhaps only 40% of men who ever existed on this Earth reproduced implying that a lot of men went completely celibate in the olden days. Once again, while he wasn't sexually rich by any means, Sodini's error is that he compared his sex life to the sex lives of the men around him and determined that he was sex poor. He went on a rampage against a group of women because the women he wanted in general wouldn't give it up to him. Sodini saw himself as some ranking – maybe a 4 or a 5 – and saw that he couldn't get the women he believed a 4 or 5 should get. But if he wanted to and if his market analysis wasn't out of whack from the male entitlement running rampant in the wake of feminism Sodini could have settled for a female 3. But Sodini decided to go on a rampage and then kill himself rather than settle for this fate. While Sodini's behavior can never be justified, it would be more understandable if he were part of the omega class who didn't even have the option to settle. But Sodini pined after young, nubile women who were far outside his grasp. He sought to date women many years younger than himself rather than women in their 40s who may have been happy to date the decent-looking and financially secure gunman.

Porn and Hollywood

Of course, porn and Hollywood imagery plays a role in male sexual entitlement. The real women that strut in front of us usually can't hold a candle to the women we see on our computer screens; this makes for less desire to pursue them (not just because our libidos are drained but because they don't meet our threshold of attractiveness). So even when female hypergamy chops off a portion of the male underclass, male porn use does the very same thing to the female underclass. These two opposing vectors balance each other out and – nullifying the distortion of female hypergamy – align the attractiveness ratings of "doable" men and "doable" women.

To say all of this boldly, men need to take stock of the women that seem willing to form relationships with them. By taking a sample of 4 or 5 of these women, a man can figure up his own ranking on the attractiveness scale. If a man is successful with 4s,5s, and 6s, then he is most likely a 5. To pine for 7s and complain when he doesn't get them is entitlement through and through. If a man gets rejected either women are systematically blamed for it or the particular woman has something wrong with her. The problem is, women have become just as entitled by the sexual revolution as men. This dual-headed entitlement, these two Tectonic sexual forces rubbing up against one another, creates a situation where the only people having sex nowadays are those that meet in bars or those that meet in church. To blame his position on the underlying social structure is to ignore the reality of his situation; he is what he is – if he wants sex he has to take what is available to him. If he chooses to forgo sex because the women available to him aren't up to snuff, he is left with very little room to complain about anything. Other than his genes. He can complain about his genes if he wants to.

Duke University Committed to Creating Hostile Environment for Men

Welmer · 13 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that the latest trend at universities is to set up kangaroo courts to punish students accused of "sexual misconduct." Needless to say, almost all of the accused will be male students. At Duke, these courts will hand out punishments and sanctions to students following a hearing in front of a tribunal composed of two teachers and one undergraduate student. Punishments may include expulsion, suspension, mandatory "counseling," etc. Prior to the hearing, accused students may face something like a restraining order, which could prohibit them from certain areas on campus, ban contact with the "complainant" and boot them out of student dorms. Sounds just like family law, so I guess they want to teach the boys early on what they might face if they get married.

Under the definition of consent provided by Duke, most sexual acts will probably qualify as sexual misconduct.

Here are the two clauses that virtually guarantee this:

> Sexual misconduct defined. Sexual misconduct is defined as any physical act of a sexual nature perpetrated without consent or when an individual is unable to freely give consent. Acts of a sexual nature include, but are not limited to, touching or attempted touching of an unwilling person's breasts, buttocks, inner thighs, groin, or genitalia, either directly or indirectly;
> Consent defined. The university's definition of sexual misconduct mandates that each participant obtains and gives consent in each instance of sexual activity. Consent is an affirmative decision to engage in mutually acceptable sexual activity given by clear actions or words. It is an informed decision made freely and actively by all parties. Relying solely upon non-verbal communication can lead to miscommunication. It is important not to make assumptions; if confusion or ambiguity on the issue of consent arises anytime during the sexual interaction, it is essential that each participant stops and clarifies, verbally, willingness to continue.
> Conduct will be considered "without consent" if no clear consent, verbal or nonverbal, is given.

The ambiguity of the phrase "nonverbal consent" is going to a be a big problem here. Does a woman have to grab the male's organ and place it in an orifice to indicate consent? Who knows.

The above passages were written by the Duke Women's Center, so it's probably intentionally vague so as to give the "complainant" (i.e. woman) as much latitude as possible in deciding whether she was violated or not. Of course, there's also the matter of these attempted indirect touches. If a man attempted to put his hand on a girl's shoulder, which might theoretically be an indirect way of touching the breasts, but missed and got nothing but air, and she hadn't clearly consented to the shoulder-pat, she could turn him in for sexual misconduct. Ridiculous. Virtually anything a young man at Duke does in close proximity to a girl could get him in hot water under this policy.

Needless to say, some girls will use the tribunals to exact revenge on current or former boyfriends. Some will use them to keep guys they regretted having sex with away from them — possibly by getting them expelled. Some may use them for legitimate grievances, but there's a problem even there: it isn't even clear that these tribunals are legitimate at all.

These disciplinary measures are extrajudicial punishments meted out to adults. They have no standing in a court of law, and cannot be enforced by the police. Where I see a real issue is the matter of the academic restraining orders. I'm not sure how these would be enforced, especially in regards to students in dorms. Even if students can be legally evicted without standard procedures, it would be a very abusive thing to do.

But abusing male students is something that comes naturally to Duke. During the infamous Duke Lacrosse case, dozens of teachers condemned innocent young men. How many of these teachers who jumped the gun in a rush to accuse will sit in on these tribunals? This is a question parents ought to think about long and hard before sending sons to Duke.

For Women, Dumping Husbands Much Easier than Breaking up With Friends

In more depressing evidence that most women may be incapable of love as men understand the term, a study in England suggests that they have a much harder time dumping friends than lovers, even if the friends were unwanted.

Professor Carol Smart of Manchester University suggested that, for women, leaving friends is an ethical problem that leads to guilt, whereas dumping men apparently raises no such moral objections. From the male perspective, it would appear that women think treating men as inhuman – worse, indeed, than they would a pet dog – is perfectly natural.

The question this raises is whether women in the West have been socially conditioned to behave this way. Increasingly, I am beginning to think that they have. I'm not sure this is natural outside of the Anglosphere, and I'd like to think it isn't, because the alternative – that women are instinctively callous and brutal toward men – is an uncomfortable conclusion. Of course, this may be the case, and we men may have to accept that we have simply been deluding ourselves all along in thinking that women have ever had any genuine feelings of affection for men.

Fortune & Fame Mean Nothing...If You Don't Have Game

Hawaiian Libertarian · 14 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I watched Ben Roethlisberger's press conference last night regarding the Georgia DA's decision to not press rape charges against him. Based on his body language, overall nervousness, and obviously well rehearsed (probably memorized) speech, I have a feeling that he is not exactly completely innocent of SOMETHING here.

This is nothing more than pure speculation and deductive guesswork on my part…but I do believe that what we are seeing with Ben here is a pattern emerging.

As a 2-time Superbowl winning QB, the face of one of the most storied franchises in NFL history, a highly-publicized multi-millionaire, who plays the ultimate "alpha" position at football's highest level, Ben is most certainly by all accounts and appearances, one of the most eligible bachelors in the country.

Yet it now appears that we have a pattern of women who are initially excited at the prospect of meeting, partying and presumably hooking up with him…and come away making claims of rape after an evening alone with him.

I think there are now only two possible explanations for what clearly now looks like a pattern of behavior – either Ben is a sadistic rapist…or he's got no game.

People who understand the concepts of game know that one of the primary keys to a successful seduction is to build comfort. A man who has all the outer appearances of an Alpha will attract women by virtue of their publicly obvious status. Hence the common storyline here regarding Ben in which young women are excited about the opportunity to spend time with him…

…but once he gets them alone, something seems to be going very wrong here.

Thanks to the feminist movements efforts to expand the definition of rape to now include any woman who regrets sex after the fact, she can now backward- rationalize her regret at consenting to sex with a "creep" by claiming she was raped. We will never really know if in fact Ben is a rapist….or a guy who simply got no game and gives women the creeps once he gets them alone and naked.

If Ben is indeed not a rapist, it is imperative that he learn about game, because what should be relatively easy for a guy in his position of fortune and fame – effortlessly banging hot women, and having his choice of the top-tier females for selection should he want marriage and kids – appears to be rather difficult for him to manage without facing investigations by the justice system and all of this bad publicity for himself, his family, his fans and his franchise.

Male British Politicians Play Kitchen Bitch for Female Votes

To court the female vote, leaders of Britain's major political parties are polishing up their beta credentials. Political commentators are allegedly calling the pending election the "Mumsnet election," in reference to a UK mommy blog, which is one of thousands of feminist blogs catering to mothers.

I have no idea whether this will work, but there's always the chance that it will backfire, as women could come to view them as contemptuous beta males. If history – recent and distant – is any indication, female voters prefer men to be alphas. Political leaders who were particularly popular with women include Idi Amin, Adolf Hitler, Chairman Mao, Josef Stalin, Kim il-Sung, Fidel Castro and Genghis Khan, as well as other less notorious tyrants. I can't imagine any of these men, who were so passionately coveted by their countrywomen, would don an apron and talk about baking cookies. In fact, it would appear from the record that the best route into the hearts of one's female subjects/constituents is to be a totalitarian mass murderer.

Of course, things are a bit different today, and the age of world-dominating alphas has been replaced by the age of cheesy pop star and athlete alphas, so perhaps the old rules no longer apply. Still, given the contempt women have expressed concerning their kitchen bitch husbands, I think the British politicians may be taking the wrong tack. In fact, having an affair or two might do more for their popularity with women, given the female adulation of JFK and Bill Clinton.

Maybe some of the Game proponents out there could write up some of their thoughts on how to court the female vote. I'll bet Roissy could give far better campaign advice for male politicians than some feminist consultant, not to mention a mommy blog…

Titanic Day

Dr. Paul · 14 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Ours is not to question why, ours is but to do or die.
Alfred Lord Tennyson

Every man's a captain, men know how to drown
Man the lifeboats if there's room, otherwise go down.
Loudon Wainwright III

Thursday, the 15th of April will mark ninety eight years since the majestic ship Titanic sank somewhere south of Newfoundland, Canada. All but 705 of 2,228 passengers and crew were entombed in the icy waters.

It is an epic story of life and death that has captured the attention of generations since, and continues to be a subject of interest for historians and the fascinated masses. Exactly what happened on the decks of the ill fated ship in its final hours remains the subject of a century old debate.

Many differ on whether that night saw a grand display of chivalry, or simply an lethal round of class warfare, though it seems only plausible that both factors were in play. Either way, the rarely, perhaps never spoken reality is that whatever drove the actions aboard that ship in its waning moments, it was not a valiant rush to preserve life. It was, in all certainty, a grim and depraved battle to sort out the entitled from the doomed.

And despite the ideological struggle to control our historical interpretation of events, the unblinking truth is that the night the Titanic went down was a night of great shame.

Determining whether it was the poor banned from lifeboats for being poor, or the men for being men, does not give us a distinction between classism and something else more noble. Chivalry, like classism and feminism, is just another form of fatal bigotry. It gives privilege, even life, to one person by taking it from another, and it does so by force. We just don't notice it because chivalry demands we ignore the death of men.

To understand this is to reveal the evil that lies hidden behind the false honor of the chivalrous code, and strip away the thick and antiquated façade of feigned nobility to expose the architecture of a great falsehood.

To whatever extent chivalry played a role in who lived and who died that night, it sent the mammoth liner to its watery grave in disgrace.

We can't turn back time and relive what happened. We can study the accounts of those who survived, but we have to understand the bias of those chosen not to drown with the others. The best way, the only way to understand it, is by allowing the dead to speak, provided we are able to still the voice of bias in our own minds.

Of the people who met their end in the Atlantic depths that night, the following facts are indisputable.

- The overall death ratio by sex was 9 men to 1 woman.
- By percentage, third class women did far better than first class men.
- The male to female death ration of crew members was 233 to 1.

While there is convincing evidence that men traveling first class received preference over men traveling in second or third class, by and large the dead wore pants, no matter how fine the cut of cloth.

It is symbolic of a time when such sacrifices were the stuff of manhood, and supposedly worthy of our lasting praise. And though the time for that praise has passed, it is a tradition we still embrace as we watch our young men fall in obscenely disproportionate numbers on battlefields overseas. Those that submit we call hero's, and those that resist we call cowards. Ridicule, for them, can be the least of consequences. There were several reports of men being gunned down by officers on the Titanic as they tried to force their way into life boats.

Those gunshots emanated from the same forces that are alive and well and at play today. They have written laws that provide multiple national offices for women's health, but not a single one for men, even though it is men on the short end of the gender death gap, and men who suffer more often from fatal disease and suicide than women. It is the driving force behind VAWA, where male victims and female perpetrators of violence simply do not exist.

It is the systematic utilization of men as expendable fodder; the standard of man as an appliance. Tom Golden, LCSW, a psychotherapist who has worked closely with men, put it this way. "People often assume that men's roles are about power, but really it's about death and emotional pain."

And rather than honestly address that role as a culture, we seek through social and legal pressure to enslave men to it. We have institutionalized it, glorified it, wrapped it in false dignity and in doing so have painted targets on the backs of men from the day they are born.

Today we simplify the code into two synonymous words. The first is chivalry, and the other is feminism, which is code speak for a social classism far more pernicious than one rooted in economic status. In the west, you can still choose and earn your economic future. When it comes to sex, you can't choose how you were born.

Is it really any wonder why an effective response to modern misandry is still the stuff of dreams?

One can only hope that the wisdom we might gain from this particular bit of history is not that men once made honorable sacrifices and that we have simply lost touch with glorifying them for it, but rather we need to learn something else. The false honor of chivalry is of far less value than a life wasted in its name.

We must come to terms with the fact that no coerced sacrifice is even remotely honorable. It is, quite simply suicide at best, murder at worst.

I do not honor the men who robbed their own wives of a husband and their own children of a father so that the wife or mother of a stranger, or indeed a childless and single woman, could live. And I certainly don't honor the pathetic, brainwashed enforcers who shot men down for simply trying to survive.

I say look back on April 15th as a day of solemn reflection; a day that fathers will share with their sons, and teach them that their lives are of value; that it is not their role in life to die for the sake of others just because those others are women. And I hope our sons are taught that this is really much more about how we choose to live than how we choose to die.

It should be an easy enough day to remember. Tax day. The same day the government officially confiscates the income of hard working men and passes on a good piece of it to entitlement scams for women, at the behest of crooked politicians.

If you want to know who Joe Biden is, picture him on the deck of a sinking ship, gun in hand and bloody corpses at his feet.

April 15th, the day that men drowned like rats, should be a reminder of what is happening in family courts, where state functionaries are trampling on whole families, but their first footprints are on the backs of fathers.

April 15th should be a reminder to men of the indisputable wisdom residing on the home page of Angry Harry's website:

*"I don't know who you are sir, but I can tell you what you are worth. If your partner was to cut off your penis tonight, the world would laugh. What a piece of sh*t man is."*

April 15th should be a day for a new breed of man unashamed to value his own life and his own worth. A day for recognition of the zeta male, or whatever else you choose to call him. He is the man who says no, and who says no more. No more chivalry, no more disposability, no living life as a machine for the benefit of ingrates, leeches and the malignant elites that feed off the sweat and blood of the powerless in the name of caring about women.

I have started a petition, simply for use within the MRM, to support the idea of April 15th being designated as Titanic Day; not in honor of the men who died on that night, but as a pledge to stop that sort of thing from happening in our own lives and the lives of our sons.

The petition won't go to Washington, or any government agency, but is simply there for the use of men to make the commitment to themselves, their sons, and each other.

False Rape Accusation From a Boy?

Welmer · 15 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A Scottish five-footer named Hannah MacIntyre has been exonerated in court of sexual impropriety with a 16-year-old boy who was one of her pupils. MacIntyre, who is 25, was alleged to have gotten the boy drunk and then seduced him. While MacIntyre admitted to giving the boy hard cider (Bulmers, perhaps?), she denied having sex with him. Instead, she said he simulated sex while in her room, making sex noises and poking her with his finger while she simultaneously hyperventilated, and then immediately afterward passed out drunk on the floor.

MacIntyre also claimed that the boy would often taunt her and she had a difficult time controlling him in class.

Although this is a weird story, it could be true. As for the false rape allegation, it might have been wishful thinking on the part of the boy. On the other hand, the two could well have had consensual sex and the teacher simply denied it after the boy bragged to friends. This is a good example of why rape, as it is defined in Anglosphere countries today, is so difficult to prosecute. Whether or not there was sex, the teacher did give the boys cider, and she did allow them into her house at night, both of which were bad ideas.

The most important lesson I would take from this is that 25-year-old petite women probably shouldn't be teaching teenage boys in the first place.

Russia Suspends Adoptions to US

Following single mother Torry Hansen of Tennessee's rejection and return to Russia of her seven-year-old adopted son, Russian authorities have temporarily banned adoptions to the United States pending talks with US officials.

Russians are reportedly "outraged" that the single mother is not facing any charges for placing the little boy alone on a plane, but apparently they do not understand that American single mothers are possibly the most politically privileged demographic on the planet, and have broad practical immunity from prosecution, even extending to license to commit homicide, so long as they take care to claim "abuse," as Torry Hansen wisely did.

Although American single mothers rarely, if ever, have to make concessions in any purely domestic matters, when international politics come into play they may actually be forced to deal on a somewhat more even playing field. Fortunately for them, as their tireless advocate, they have Feminist Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in their corner, who will doubtless defend their right to adopt Russian children and treat them as they please without the possibility of facing consequences for criminally abusive and negligent parenting.

What Made Us Eunuchs?

A friend of mine has been working as a contractor for some years now, and he told me he was sick of it, and would like to go on to something else. What really bothers him about it is that he ends up working in people's houses for months on end, and he has to deal with the wives, who inevitably start treating him as they treat their husbands: like a eunuch.

He said he doesn't understand why the guys put up with it. They just hand all authority over to their wives, sitting in front of the TV and drinking beer while the women run the show. My friend found himself feeling a pretty strong contempt for the domesticated men he worked with. He seemed angry at them for just rolling over and taking it, calling them "dicks with wallets."

I was interested, so I asked him to explain a little more. He told me he was really sick of a the lack of honor he observed around him amongst men, who would do such things as call other men "bitch," because they all knew they were beaten men and nobody would do anything about it. He also said there was no real "code" of behavior, and the men's word couldn't be counted on, nor would they trust the word of others. He said he admired Latin men for having more of a code of honor, and expressed contempt for mainstream urban American culture.

I wonder, at times, whether this defeated attitude doesn't play a role in the behavior of women today. Perhaps women trample on men and treat them with contempt because so many men are contemptible today. But what made them so?

Contemporary America is definitely not the only place in history where men have become submissive and beaten shells of their former selves. Actually, this is a pretty common phenomenon, and has been so for a long time. It is exactly what happens when men lose a war. As Americans, we don't have any recent experience of this; although the plight of returning Vietnam veterans offers some perspective, none of our countrymen have been utterly defeated since the Civil War.

However, if one looks at countries such as Vichy France and postwar Japan and Germany, one can see that their societies had a lot in common with our own. Their women were sexually liberated to a very high degree and openly consorted with the former enemy, the demobilized soldiers had almost no political rights, many were impoverished and many were incarcerated for extended periods of time. Families broke up left and right, and a sense of hopelessness prevailed.

Eventually, the men of those societies reclaimed their masculinity, but it was a long, hard, thankless road.

So how could this happen to us without losing a war?

In a sense, we turned on ourselves. America, which pioneered the war on men, was the sole undisputed victor after a century of unprecedented conflict. Sometimes I have to remind myself that nearly half of my life was lived under the shadow of nuclear annihilation, and that the outcome of the Cold War was very much in doubt when I was a small child. We were constantly mobilized for nuclear war, and apocalyptic scenarios were on many people's minds. In fact, as a young child I even had nightmares about nuclear war.

We lived in a society that had been engaged in or prepared for war for half a century when the Berlin Wall finally came tumbling down. The crowning example of American military prowess was the first Gulf War, after which our armed forces put on very impressive displays of military might in parades the following summer.

However, when we emerged as the world's sole superpower, we didn't demobilize psychologically. Culturally, we were still ready to fight something. First in the George HW Bush presidency, and then even more so during the Clinton presidency, American aggression started to turn inward. There was the war on drugs, the war on crime, the war on sexism, the war on racism, the war on poverty, etc. All of these suggested some internal enemy, and the enemy turned out to be young American men. Young black men were locked up in prodigious numbers in the war on drugs and war on crime. Young white men were legally discriminated against in the fight against sexism and racism (whether they were sexist or racist or not — it didn't matter), and divorced men of all sorts were targeted in the war on deadbeat dads. All heterosexual men were suspect in the war on domestic violence, sexual harassment, and so on.

Although the stage had been set before the 1990s, that is when the real smackdown began. The 1994 crime bill and VAWA, combined with the earlier draconian drug laws, turned the US into something of a police state. I can clearly remember the difference before and after the bill. In the late 80s and early 90s, cops weren't all that common. Suddenly, by the mid-90s, they were everywhere, and they were on a mission to lock you up! They also had much more formidable weapons and armor than they had a few years prior.

All of the pent up aggression from the Cold War came down on the heads of America's young men, and they didn't stand a chance. Within about a decade, they were beaten into submission, and today we see the result: submissive, defeated men. When you think about what's been stacked up against them since the 90s, there's really nothing to wonder about. It should be obvious to anyone that when one implements an abusive, punitive system designed to break men down, they will eventually become broken men.

When all that men can do to get by is use deception and avoidance, there will be no honor and no code. This is what has been bothering my friend, and this is why Game is the only tool that works with women today: only by bluffing can a man appear to be masculine in the eyes of a woman, because in reality he is at her mercy and the mercy of the state, and for all intents and purposes the loser of a war waged against him.

Obama to Nominate Radical Feminist for Supreme Court?

There has been some speculation that Elena Kagan, the allegedly lesbian Solicitor General, is a favorite for Supreme Court nomination. Perhaps this is to be expected, but it remains to be seen what the American public's reaction would be to having a radical feminist up for a position as a Supreme Court justice, which is one of the most powerful positions in the United States.

Kagan's appointment as Solicitor General was enthusiastically endorsed by the Feminist Law Professors blog, which gives a good indication of exactly what her positions are in regards to feminism.

However, according to Salon, her liberal credentials are suspect. Not only does she supposedly support the "the Bush/Cheney vision of Government and the Thomas/Scalia approach to executive power and law," she has maintained a suspicious silence about the constitutional abuses perpetrated in the "War on Terror" that followed 9/11.

Therefore, Kagan may represent the worst of both the liberal and conservative worlds, being a staunch defender of feminist entitlement on the one hand, and willing to allow breaches of the Constitution in the name of security on the other. We should remember that feminism isn't about left or right, but rather about supremacy and power. It has transformed from a movement into a regime, and therefore we should expect its powerful leaders to behave just as power always has: ever hungry for more.

Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose

Elusive Wapiti · 16 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Readers at Laura's Full of Grace blog are sometimes treated to entries in her ongoing series titled "Anti Feminism University", abbreviated "AFU".* One of the things I find truly remarkable about this series is Laura's uncanny ability to dig up examples of how La Resistance to feminism has a long pedigree going back over a century. On one hand, I take some solace in the knowledge that we merry band of brothers are walking in the same footsteps as our brothers did four generations ago. On the other, I note with some disappointment we are walking in the same footsteps as our brothers did four generations ago. Nothing has changed for the better, and in many ways, it has gotten worse.

Anyways, her latest entry maintains her long-running string of excellent historical cave-diving, and is instructive times two. First we have historical confirmation that the female sex's congenital inclination toward overweening solipsism is not a new phenomenon; in fact, it is quite the opposite, making me think that it is an innate characteristic of the female condition. Their own cross to bear, as it were. Here is today's historical example of extreme feminine egocentricity bordering on blatant chauvinism, in excerpts from a letter to the editor of the Gray Lady in 1904. Somewhat ironically, the name of the author is "Dorothy Dix". (Aptly named, sez I).

In a turn-of-the-last-century instantiation of "girls rule, boys drool", we have the old saw about how men want stupid women because, well, because men are more stupider than women, who are so obviously better than us knuckle-dragging guys:

> The most cursory glance around any social circle will show that a fluffy-haired little ingenue without two ideas in her head will be in demand for parties and balls and theaters, and have to cut her dances in two to go around among her partners, while the earnest student is left undisturbed by man to the pleasures of a quiet evening at home with our best authors. Nor is this without reason. Primarily it is based on suitability and congeniality. The average American man is not highly educated in books…He wants somebody whose ideas and thoughts and interests gibe with his own; one who prefers farce comedy to grand opera and the daily papers to Maeterlinck philosophy, and whose general information won't be a standing reproach to his ignorance of everything but his own business.

Then we have a declaration that men don't wed smart chicks because our egos allegedly wouldn't be able to handle it:

> …every man desires, and rightly, to be an oracle to his own wife. As long as a woman begins every sentence with "John says so and so" about the matter under discussion it is a guarantee of domestic happiness strong enough to draw money on at the bank…but in a family where the wife is superior and corrects her husband's grammar and pronunciation, a discriminating ear can hear the skeleton rattling its bones in the closet. The man is afraid of his wife, and she looks down on him with the pitying contempt that knowledge always has for ignorance.

And apparently a discussion about male and female achievement, even back then, wouldn't be complete about how women are supposedly smarter than their male peers because they stay in school longer and are more widely read. Forget about the dubious relationship between schooling and actual knowledge or skills, or the even more tenuous relationship between reading 19th century chick lit with literacy. What is remarkable here is to note how easy it apparently was for early feminists to forget, just as they do today, exactly who it was that quit school early to seek gainful (and often dangerous) employment to put food on the table. How easy it was for early fembots to take for granted the masculine labors that served up privilege to their pampered white female derrieres, enabling them to complete their schooling and have all that excess time to engage in recreational reading in the first place. Wanna-be white knight provider-slaves, take note: your sacrifices will not be appreciated. Instead, you will be scorned while the recipient of your beneficience basks in the warm comfort of your provision. To wit:

> [I]t is utter folly to say that the general young man doesn't marry because of the ignorance of the women. As a plain matter of fact the average girl is better educated than the average boy because she stays in school longer and when she leaves school she has more time to read. It is the women and not the men who suppport the literary clubs and raid the public libraries.

The second teachable moment here is the observation that the present day woes of men and the decline of marriage are not easily dismissable one-off Marxist curmudgeons like Belfort Bax, but your average Joe Sixpack on the street:

> Now why is it that they do not want to marry? The reasons are easy to find. The strong-minded leaders of the female sex have been for years rushing to the Legislatures and the courts and securing laws and common law court decisions that make a husband a slave to his wife, and provide a prison for the poor man who dares to disobey these new-fangled laws. Courtship is hedged with the fear of breach of promise suits, marriage has menacing over it separate support for the wife whenever some quarrel causes her to leave him. Our newspapers are full of these cases, also of divorce cases with enormous weekly alimony payments to the wife and prison for the husband if the cash is not regularly forthcoming. These things scare decent, economical, hard-working men, and the result is that they prefer to keep out of a marriage trap that may bring all these dire things upon their heads.
> All that the average man of good sense wants is a healthy wife, able and willing to keep house and to make a good mother. The fancy education is not in demand: it is rather feared because the tendency of highly educated women is to become extravagant,and to spend money beyond their husbands' means of supply. In short, the men want marriage a success with the limited cash means at their command, and they want the courts and the Legislatures to keep their hands off their family affairs. This rushing of the women to the lawyers' offices to prosecute every poor wretch of admirer who has failed to marry them, or to prosecute about every third man who has married them, has become a terror. Every new case reported has probably broken off several matches that were in process of being made up. That being the real the state of the case, the women never realize it, and set their heads to wondering why the men leave them alone, and wonder why President Roosevelt talks of race suicide.

A few comments are in order here. First, I note that even a century ago, women were petitioning the ultimate Alpha male…government…to cashier their beta male courtiers and/or husbands. Hypergamy and serial polyandry are not new developments, folks. Neither are "breach of promise" suits…they simply have transmogrified in modern times into false rape accusations.

Second, men of sound mind look for a woman to make a family with. They did then, and they do now. Otherwise, what reason is there for a man to marry, if not to settle down and have children? This likely means that she should be complementary to him, to bring qualities and capabilities to the fight that he does not himself possess…such as an inclination toward homemaking and, more specifically, an ability to bear children and the time available to raise them. A man is not looking for his clone, and is most certainly not impressed by superficial educational and/or economic achievements, particularly if their degrees are from lib-arts diploma mills and their jay oh bees are make-work service or government sector jobs. Moreover, as indicated by the second article's author, excessive smarts or a rapier wit in a woman, instead of an demonstration of higher value, may instead be an indicator of future trouble and men are right to regard it as such. For a smart and sassy woman is likely to be unable to keep her supposed intellectual superiority in perspective; chances are she'll eventually come to regard him as not worthy of her respect. Such a woman presents a potential suitor with a higher risk of marital disruption. The female author of the first letter thus completely misses the point that the male author of the second nails down tight…it's not her intellect he fears, but the collateral damage her probable lack of humility, of a sense of justice, of morality will wreak upon him.

Third, brothers, you gotta know that most women think themselves better than you. If not intellectually, then morally and spiritually. This also appears to be a constant through the ages. Keep this in mind as you screen women for the position of wife and homemaker and mother.

The bachelor's letter closed with a refrain that we see on men's boards a lot these days, over 100 years later. It is a refrain that seems to suggest that, for all our wishful thinking that feminism will collapse under its own weight, it may very well be that we and our sons will be dealing with our openly misandrist matriarchal culture for quite some time:

> The disease has become so deeply engrafted on our laws that I despair of ever seeing a change, in my lifetime at least. Perhaps the next generation may find a supply of wives who will not be armed with such oppressive laws, and who will not be as costly to support as the present set. Let us hope that it may come to that and they may be happy, but that is not for us.

I myself take solace in data presented by one of Laura's commenters. For if Ms. Dix complains about how men didn't marry in 1904, I wonder what she'd make of this:

The more things change, the more they stay the same indeed. Until next time, keep the faith.

The Young Dead Soldiers Do Not Speak

Hestia · 16 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The young dead soldiers do not speak.
Nevertheless, they are heard in the still houses:
who has not heard them?
They have a silence that speaks for them at night and when the clock counts.
They say: We were young. We have died.
Remember us.
They say: We have done what we could but until it is finished it is not done.
They say: We have given our lives but until it is finished no one can know what our lives gave.
They say: Our deaths are not ours: they are yours,
they will mean what you make them.
They say: Whether our lives and our deaths were for peace and a new hope or for nothing we cannot say, it is you who must say this.
We leave you our deaths. Give them their meaning.
We were young, they say. We have died; remember us.

~Archibald MacLeish

Driving through Wyoming last month, our family stopped off for the night in a small town with a main street lined with flags on both sides. As I marveled to my husband about the apparent patriotism of this town, my words came to a pause as we noticed the large flag at the end of the street flying at half-mast. Knowing that the POTUS and other political officials were alive and well last we heard, we knew what that flag most likely meant: another young person had been killed in combat. As we often do when we hear of a service member who has been killed, MovingTarget and I searched with Google to find the name and face of the one who has left too soon. This puts a name and face to Casualty #X. They are one of “our boys”. Their families “one of us”. And while we may not know the dear soul who has been lost, we grieve for them just the same.

Our grief is not reserved solely for troops killed in combat, but also for those who lose their lives when they bring the war home with them. The demons of combat experience do not go away when a soldier deploys home. They can’t be left back in Iraq or Afghanistan as the other unpleasantness can be, but rather the memories and upset come home right alongside the tattered ACUs and well-worn desert boots. Since the beginning of the war in Afghanistan through the summer of 2009, the Army has lost 761 troops to combat in that country and 817 due to suicide. In January of this year, 24 soldiers are believed to have killed themselves during that month alone. It’s safe to say we have a serious problem on our hands. Many of us would call it an epidemic.

The reasons given for the rising suicide rate are numerous. Everything from multiple deployments and an inadequate amount of dwell time to an overtaxed mental health system and a stigma against accessing such services is being blamed. Whatever the culprit may be, this is an issue that must addressed by military officials and one for which the public needs to be aware, for without this knowledge we cannot hold our elected officials accountable for providing our returning soldiers and veterans with the care they need. Our soldiers have served nobly and deserve the support they need to heal from whatever demons they may face, reintegrate back into their families and communities, and have a functional mental health support system at the ready when life seems to tough to bear. Battlemind may be a start, but this program does not have all of the answers to the crisis the Army is facing.

The young dead soldiers do not speak. Neither do those in too much pain, be it physical or mental, to speak for themselves. We need to be their voices and serve as advocates on their behalf.

The Real Basis of Women's Power

Welmer · 17 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes, as we theorize and agonize over the details of what's happening to men in the West, we lose sight of what's really backing up female entitlement. What actually underlies feminism and its associated evils is unadulterated force, and many, many men have experienced it first-hand, especially in the United States, where force is often seen as the most expedient solution by the state.

Sometimes words can't adequately convey this message, but fortunately we have other means:

Now try to put yourself in that man's shoes, at that time, for a moment. Guns are being shoved in your face, a dog is attacking and biting you, lights blind you and a gang of men with weapons and armor are shouting at you and mocking you as your ex wife looks on approvingly. This happens every single day in America.

This is feminism in action.

Be Extreme and Unreasonable

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 18 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I would remind you that extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice! And let me remind you also that moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue!
-Barry Goldwater at the 1964 Republican Convention

The reasonable man adapts himself to the world; the unreasonable one persists in trying to adapt the world to himself. Therefore all progress depends on the unreasonable man.
-George Bernard Shaw

These two men have a lot to tell us. Too often when talking about various issues that affect us we intentionally or unintentionally hold back or try to be at least somewhat politically correct. This has not stopped any form of misandry from moving forward. Instead we should be extreme and unreasonable for the reasons that Goldwater and Shaw point out.

You will not be able to win more women to our side by "toning down the rhetoric", "being more politically correct", etc. Most women aren't going to want to give up the benefits they receive from misandry. This is a fundamental problem, not the level of your rhetoric. We have all seen women come to The Spearhead and other boards and tell us that we should "tone down the rhetoric" since women won't listen. These women claim to support us yet never do anything but criticize us instead doing something productive to solve these issues. This is because they are really concern trolls and listening to concern trolls has not produced any results for us.

You will be accused of being a misogynist, sexist, having a small penis, being secretly gay, etc. regardless of what you say. You will be called names and told you have a small penis. Get used to it. It doesn't matter how "politically correct" you are. Unless you are a slave to misandarists they will try to shut you up by calling you names, claiming you're secretly gay, and making claims about the size of your genitalia. Using this technique to shut people up isn't limited to us. As this person from the Tea Parties points out, it doesn't matter what he says as he will be accused of racism regardless. Regardless of what the misandarists say about us, you need to keep going. Beyond baseless accusations they don't have many weapons that aren't obvious totalitarianism which would prove everything we say about them is correct.

We are fighting for freedom. As Goldwater pointed out extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice. Many of us have found ways to limit misandry in our own lives. However, many other men aren't so lucky, and if we ignore them eventually the misandarists will come for us. There are men sitting in jail because of false rape charges. There are men who have lost their jobs due to the sexual harassment industry, affirmative action, and other government policies to unemploy them (such as the recent stimulus). There are men who are victims of paternity fraud. There are men who have had their children taken away from them. There are boys suffering under the jackboot of misandarist teachers. There are boys being forced to take ritalin as young as 5 years old because they don't act like girls enough. Our colleges have turned into enclaves of anti-male totalitarianism. As Welmer pointed out, from the perspective of younger men this is starting to approach a real shooting war. For those of us who are older and don't have kids we don't really know just how much totalitarianism younger men are experiencing, and they don't have the same options for escaping it yet.

Extremism pulls the center in the direction we want. By being extreme we can produce a new center that is more of what we want. This new center will thus look more reasonable than it did before. This tactic has been used many times in history with success. That includes feminists. After all Andrea Dworkin's ideas weren't put into law, but they did allow other feminist ideas to look "reasonable" which allowed for the current misandarist state of the law we now experience.

Being extreme and unreasonable gives a voice to those men who are thinking the same things but afraid to speak up. Many men out there are thinking the same things we are. However, they keep it to themselves because they're afraid they are the only ones who have noticed what they know. The success of misandry is dependent on many men believing that they are alone in their observations of the world. We need to show them that there are many others who have the same ideas they do.

So go out and be extreme and unreasonable. That's how we will make progress against misandry.

Prenup Discussion

Welmer · 18 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Doug1 and Novaseeker, both seasoned attorneys, are discussing the ins and outs of prenuptial agreements, which can be a valuable, although limited, tool for damage control in the case of marital dissolution. Those who are considering marriage at any point would do well to follow the discussion and learn a bit about how they can protect themselves from the ravages of the anti-male family law regime.

For those who are already married, it may be worth paying attention to as well so as to gain a better understanding of how family law works in the US. Of course, it varies considerably from state to state, but there is a common theme throughout the land.

I'm thinking about creating a separate forum for this discussion, but for now this post is probably a good place to continue the discussion. The posts can be moved to any new forum whenever it's ready.

For now, here's some of the content from the original thread (written by Doug1):

Here is a summary of the main provisions other than technical ones and inheritance etc. ones I'd want in a prenup to even consider marrying a woman and living under American law, and then only if we both wanted children right away. Before that, I'd definitely want to be living together at most. As well a man is in a lot better psychological position to lay out a prenup proposal orally at first to a woman who loves him and is trying hard to convince her to marry him, if he's living with her and it's a change from that status she's arguing for. This is in a sense an outline or backgrounder on what you might say to her, after having discussed such things as: what all the time happens now to men who make any money under divorce 2.0 in America today, and also such things as the differences between female vs. male complete fidelity in marriage.

The birds eye overview is that my prenup would mimic in divorce what happens when living together and then breaking up. Child support remains unaffected and is the same as in a marriage w/out a prenup (and is a very large part of the ex husband's after tax income). So if a wife divorces her husband she takes what she's earned but not what he has, other than ongoing CS. However if a husband divorces his wife for no compelling good reason i.e. other than due to her fault in prenup specified ways, she will get half up to a very high cap that will only effect the wealthy. No alimony post divorce for either party under any circumstances period. The wife should work and develop and keep her skills up and monetarily contribute (and / or make the marriage work with a purpose). It would actually be drafted in terms of high and low earners to make it gender neutral, but it's simpler to talk about how it would overwhelming work between the genders, given female hypergamy on income too, when marrying.

Part of the reason for the prenup is to discourage wives, who file for 70% of divorces in 50% of marriages, from doing so, and instead help incent them to work harder to make the marriage work and ride out tough periods and give their husband best efforts duty sex when she's not feeling it to start with and so on. (And yeah he should relationship game her too, but he needs no extrinsic incentive for that if he believes it might work.) This is particularly important in marriages with kids. (I actually think women cause more than 70% of divorces, due to infidelities they won't stop and which lead them to sexually and emotionally abandon their husbands even if they aren't yet divorcing him. Whereas it's rarely genuinely comparable on the man's side. Men caught in infidelity are usually desperate to keep the marriage together, will stop, and want very much to go on or resume sexing and giving affection to their wives if she'll let him. Which often SHE won't . In these cases the wife wasn't usually abandoned by her husband due to his infidelity cutting all of his interest in her; rather she's using his infidelity as an excuse to move on w/a lot of his money in her pocket and/or she believes feminist propaganda that she "has to for her dignity . But for couples that are willing to allow a limited degree of male just sex stepping out after the marriage has gone on some time, there would be veto powers for her to help safeguard against his falling in love w/another woman in ways that threaten her. Most men though esp. more beta men may not want to fight this battle in the prenup. That's fine.

In some more detail, but without getting into the nitty gritty:

1) The prenup has the starting position of mimicing a living together breakup, upon any divorce. The basic concept of this prenup is that because none of the obligations traditionally undertaken by a wife in marriage are enforceable against her during the marriage or upon divorce, then for the most part his obligations of support for her as opposed to solely his children after divorce at least, shouldn't be enforced or required by holding only his money hostage either. The traditional wifely obligations in marriage that are no longer enforced whatsoever include that she will stay with her husband through thick and thin, for richer and for poorer for the rest of his life. No fault divorce killed that. As well they include that she will give her husband reasonably frequent, measured in times per week if he wants that, best efforts sex for so long as they both shall live, when and for so long as she's physically (not bs mentally) capable of that. She was traditionally required to provide other wifely services to him such as companionship and being his partner and helpmate, and housekeeping services to the extent that she doesn't work as many hours out of the home earning money or bring in as much as he does. None of these are any longer obligations he can in any way enforce during the marriage nor in any way expect if she at any times wants to leave the marriage, nor ones much required by our culture or her friends if she isn't feeling like it for some extended period during the marriage, much less enforced by the state.

Accordingly, in order for marriage to not be a completely one way commitment of a man and his money if he's the higher earner as is overwhelmingly still the case (because women are income hypergamous and strongly want that whatever they claim, in the great majority of marital cases), the starting point of this prenup is that it mimic in the case of divorce what would happen in a cohabiting breakup. Each partner walks away with what they brought, inherited, or earned during the marriage, with no claim on their former partner's money. The starting point is that neither has obligations to the other only to children, through life or at any time after the marriage has ended. Certainly we know that the wife about never has them post marriage to her ex husband, unless she's a hugely higher earner, but 97% of alimony in America is paid by men.

2) No alimony for either party. If a woman doesn't enforceably guarantee a man sex or other wifely services for so long as they both shall live when she marries him (and indeed it's now the felony of marital rape if he tries to take what was traditionally his right in marriage when she's withholding that), or certainly any sex or other wifely services one minute after she files for divorce regardless of her reasons, then neither should a man owe his wife lifetime support for so long as they both shall live when she becomes his ex-wife, nor should he owe his ex wife any spousal support the moment she files for divorce and stops providing sex and other wifely services or any prospect of them in future.

She should be independent and self supporting before he marries her, as the overwhelming majority of American women are today, with their almost 50% greater graduation rate from college and their presence at all levels of the workforce. Sure she probably married up but that was her choice, the fruits of which she enjoyed by sharing his lifestyle while providing him wifely services. A wife should retain her ability to be self supporting during her marriage, by working through at least almost all of it. Her decision to stay home and care for infants, while her husband bears the burden of supporting her and the baby entirely on his own (and thus is in a sense paying her by sharing the home, food, her and the baby's clothes and equipment, utilities, entertainment, any vacations and so on), are always hers to make.

No American husband can either require that she do stay home, nor require that she shall have to continue working right after birth with child care, nor can he physically threaten or abuse her to do as he likes. Domestic violence laws. Nor does American culture urge that she obey him in these things. It strongly says it's really entirely up to her, after consulting him. After a year or so of infancy at any rate, and increasingly as the infant becomes a child and even more so when he/she starts preschool, being a stay at home mother is a very easy and low stress and low dedicated hours "job" compared what her husband does for a living in the great majority of cases, what with washing machines, vacuums, refrigerators, dishwashers, convenience and labor saving devices galore compared to a century ago, large one stop for many things stores and nearby convenience stores, cars and so on.

However work does tend to occupy, if not always fully, a lot of the time available for it, and so the luxury of inefficiency often makes caring for infants and household work seem more work for a stay at home mom than it is. Yet most mothers of minor children work. Daytime soaps and programming and for that matter most mass market novels and so on are all aimed at mothers at home w/time to kill. It's her choice and at most something he can lobby about (with too much pressure either way vastly socially disapproved), but choices have and should have consequences, including those of the wife. If she leaves the marriage but hasn't worked for a long time despite knowing what's in the prenup, yes she will have rusty skills and will be starting from "behind" where she would have been if she worked all through the marriage, with or without kids. Aside from keeping up and advancing her skills she shouldn't have contributed so little to the marriage financially for so long. I want to encourage her to at least part time or light hours work except when the kids are preschoolers, anyway, and work full time if light hours by middle school.

3) Child support. Generally this will not be changed (and it can't generally be) from what the state would determine in the event of no prenuptial. She should bear in mind that with two kids and an upper middle class father in a high tax coastal state, that will generally mean about 45-50% of his aftertax or take home income will be paid to her in child support, which since the early 90s was raised way up to include a substantial stealth alimony component from high income payers. There would however be provisions providing that it's the couple's intention in entering into the marriage, that joint physical custody be awarded by the state and that according no or little child support would be paid to the ex wife, but rather directly for the support of the children. As well, in the event the husband becomes an extremely high earner such that his statutory recommended child support becomes something more completely up to the judge's discretion, there can be provisio ns that advise the judge what the couple wanted when entering into the marriage, for the judge to decide in this area. Such as capping the amount at the highest level before this income threshold is reached. It is supposed to be child support, not lavish spousal support.

4) Consent by the wife in the prenup to DNA paternity testing right after birth and before the issuance of a birth certificate of any children born during the marriage. There's about a 10% rate of the father not being whom the woman claims he is, that is, generally, not being her husband (though it's much higher than that, around 30%, in certain low confidence situations that are inapplicable here, one hopes).

5) Property division when she abandons the marriage. As suggested in 1) above, in all but a narrowly specified number of cases, more narrow than traditional fault when that was widely considered, each spouse would take from the marriage on divorce what they brought in, inherited, or earned and saved or turned into their separate personal property during the marriage, plus any clear gifts to them (rather than items primarily for their use). Clothes etc are clearly those of the wearers and the like. Not cars necessarily, but I'd give on this, one car she didn't buy, or rather the equity in it, if she wouldn't otherwise have equity enough for it and other basic stuff. Equity in the house to be divided according to the cumulative mortgage and down payment contribution of each. The party with more equity has the option of buying out the other's equity interest.

If and only if there are kids and she gets custody but not the house, and wouldn't have enough money from her own savings and ongoing income, any buy out of her equity in the house and other things, to at least rent a relatively cheap and much less nice house in a less good neighborhood in the same school district or a reasonably comparable school district, then he should provide enough up front money to pay the deposit and move in etc. She'll be getting child support and if she's not working should be right quick. If she needs more very temporary money to avoid being a public charge he should provide that.

I might well do better than this to a degree, if her savings were very low and there were kids that she unfortunately got full physical custody over, but that should be the abandoned husband who has kids choice, not the right of his abandoning him and ripping away his kids ex wife. Keep in mind how onerous child support now is for high earners, and how rich for those that receive it from them.

6) She gets half if he divorces her for no compelling reason. In the event he leaves the marriage and files for divorce for no compelling reason, then the wife shall get half his net retirement account money accrued during the marriage in excess of hers, plus half his net savings and wealth increase during the marriage, up to some very high cap. (I might structure this a bit incrementally with one cap below which she gets half and another below which she gets an incremental 1/3, but then none of what's above the higher cap.) The cap will only effect the wealthy. No she doesn't get half his fortune if that's what it is just for having been his wife, and because he leaves her for a younger woman. But she does get a large amount.

7) Compelling reasons for his leaving his wife which wouldn't trigger this payout of half of his net marital wealth in excess of hers, are her female infidelity (we'd have discussed and she'd have agreed about the relative severity of female vs. male infidelity), her blowing up like a sea lion and still wanting half his money, or stopping giving him regular best efforts sex when she is physically (not bs mentally) capable of that. If she gets fat and tolerates his infidelity unless or until she slims down and she still wants to sex him, and he still leaves her, then prob. she should still get half his retirement money. If she's not sexing him she either has hidden her infidelity well, or wants to provoke his leaving her so that she'll get half his money, as she wouldn't if she filed for divorce under this prenup. At the very least she's not making an effort.

She divorces him for cause. Same as if she walks out for no compelling reason. She gets what she's brought or earned and that's it. I personally would refuse to agree that trivial male infidelity is reason for her to get half his money. Other men's mileage will vary on this, particularly beta men's often will. That's fine. Adjust it accordingly and make his infidelity or continuing infidelity after caught once sufficient for her to divorce him and take half his money. Not for me.

As for abuse constituting a sufficient reason to walk away with his money, DO NOT AGREE. It will be falsely claimed or manufactured abuse if there's big to her and her lawyer money at stake, absolutely count on it. Even serious abuse can be faked by having a friend beat her up. Hey what's being beaten up or cut compared to hundreds of thousands or more if that's at stake? Esp. after she and her girlfriends convince her that she really has endured "years of mental abuse", as women are so apt to do in this feminist environment even if only her rep in seeking a divorce and no money difference is at stake, and besides her girlfriends will convince her as she's contemplating divorce that she's rightfully owned half anyway, regardless of what the "nasty unfair to her" prenup says. So NO to abuse giving her half. Argue that of course she can walk away, and as well if there's gonna be any actual significant abuse aside from the bullshite feminist kind, the p attern would reveal itself early on, when not much marital property will likely have accrued anyway. And well, if she does something like cheat on him repeatedly and taunt him with it and he loses it, then hell no she doesn't deserve half for that isolated and likely deserved, and certainly massively provoked event. She can testify against him in court and hope he gets some jail time. But no not half his money.

9) Finally in negotiations with her I might relent on husband infidelity not giving her half the marital assets if a) it occurs in the first two years of marriage (unless they've been living together for a long time) or b) he persists despite her veto and warning re: certain specified but not all women. Obviously this is only gonna be in the prenup if she'll allow some limited well into the marriage male just sex dalliances.
If she exercises her veto over his continuing to see any particular woman either because she believes that woman is stealing his heart and attention and sexual interest too much from her, his wife, in actual fact rather than in future predicting theory, or because he's not been discreet in his sexual liason w/her and has in fact conducted himself or she has in a humiliating way to the wife, or that that the particular woman would be inherently humiliating to the wife due to their close relationship of one kind or another — and he still persists even after a second veto re: that woman, accompanied by a statement that she will leave him if he persists with this particular woman, then here too the wife get's half the net of his earned marital assets over hers. He's had warnings. However vetos issued with respect to all sexually attractive women to him or what amounts to that or nearly that over a period of time won't trigger her getting any of his net marital assets. T hough there could be provisions about him not acting like Roissy while married to her etc. or close.

Of course the parties can agree to amend the prenup in various ways as the marriage progresses (but only by a mutually signed writing).

Well the male infidelity w/out abandoning her bit obviously adds complications in the prenup that those who would give a wife half for trivial male one time infidelity won't have, so many men won't have those complications. I don't think I'd marry though if any stepping out of any kind gave her the right to half my money.

Defeated as Men, Japanese Boys Don Skirts

The phenomenon of the Japanese “herbivore,” or grass eating boy, has been explored on The Spearhead before, but it has apparently been raised to a new level. Young Japanese men and boys have given up on being male, because there are only penalties for being so, and are now wearing skirts and acting like girls.

I have studied postwar Japan to a limited extent, and one of the things I learned was that feminism was never much of an issue for the postwar Japanese, because the US occupational authorities imposed suffrage and women’s rights from the top. It seems that our policy has borne fruit, and that Japanese masculinity has been severed at its root. It might be said at this point that Japan is the first true eunuch nation — surpassing even the Anglo societies that imposed feminist supremacy on the Japanese.

This problem is (obviously) not limited to the Japanese. However, in a culturally isolated island nation such as Japan, the effects might be more pronounced in some respects than in more integrated societies such as Europe, the British Commonwealth, or the US.

Although these trends may seem like cause for dismay, I don’t think “redefining masculinity” is always a bad thing. Boys and young men have a way of reinventing things when what they are faced with is awful, and it appears that being a man in Japan, with the stagnant economy, rising divorce rate and disintegration of the family is a pretty raw deal. If this silly trend of foppish and girlish behavior is actually a flat-out rejection of the role that a misandrist society has handed to men, then at least we might be a bit optimistic in that the boys are actually making some form of protest.

Schools' "Sexual Misconduct" Policies Starting to Trigger Lawsuits

Welmer · 19 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A former Brown University student, William McCormick III, is suing the school in federal court for interfering with his efforts to exonerate himself following a rape accusation. The student, a star wrestler and straight-A student from Wisconsin, had been attending the Ivy League school on scholarship, when fellow student Marcella Beth Dresdale (identified by the Crime and Federalism blog) made a complaint that he was "following her" in the student dorm they both lived in.

Ms. Dresdale's friends weighed in, calling Mr. McCormick "creepy" (i.e. beta and poor), and after she spoke with her father, prominent alumnus and donor Richard C. Dresdale, he contacted the school. Shortly thereafter, school officials pressed Ms. Dresdale to identify McCormick, which she initially did not want to do because she "did not want anything bad to happen," and add to her complaint. According to Ms. Dresdale, she felt that school officials were "yelling at her" in an effort to get her to amend the complaint to include rape. At the time, she was distressed because she was missing sailing lessons and needed to study for a test. To get it over with, she wrote a statement, with the help of her resident coordinator, claiming that Mr. McCormick had raped her.

Immediately after she had done this, Mr. McCormick was summoned into the dean's office, told he had been implicated in "sexual misconduct," and given a one-way plane ticket back to Wisconsin. He has said that the school threatened him with criminal charges if he did not sign off on the expulsion.

Throughout this process, police were never notified, and Mr. McCormick was never given a chance to give his side of the story.

This case brings up an interesting point, which is that these sexual misconduct policies are often supported wholeheartedly by parents of the mainly female students at these schools. In fact, without parental support for these policies, I doubt the feminists would have been able to put them in place. As universities become increasingly female, there will be more and more support from wealthy daddies such as Richard Dresdale, who operates a multi-billion dollar company, for measures that treat any males in their daughters' vicinity with extreme suspicion.

Some people may sympathize with Mr. Dresdale, but he's part of the problem ordinary men are facing. In order to extend his protection and control over his daughter, he flaunts his wealth and power to trample on the concept of due process. If Mr. Dresdale is so protective of his daughter, why send her away to school where she will live on her own? If he doesn't think the police are up to the job of protecting her, shouldn't he keep his precious daughter at home so he can look after her until she's married off to some suitably wealthy young man? Rather, Mr. Dresdale's choice is to throw his weight around to bully men, just like the crooked cops beating Carlos Ferrell in front of his ex-wife.

As for Marcella Dresdale, we have no idea whether she was telling the truth or not. Evidently, she didn't want to write a statement accusing McCormick of rape, so she may not have felt that he raped her in the first place. It isn't even clear whether the two actually had sex. Nothing's clear, because her daddy made sure it was all handled abruptly and extrajudicially. Personally, I'm inclined to think McCormick did not rape her. If he had, he probably would have happily accepted the offer given him by the school and never uttered a peep about the matter to anyone, thankful that he got away with a crime that could put him behind bars for years. However, it seems that when he came to his senses after being railroaded by Brown, he chose to challenge the school.

This lawsuit should prove to be an interesting test for the sexual misconduct policies that have been springing up around the country. However, no matter how the lawsuit goes, men will win this one. If McCormick wins, Brown will have to shell out more money – hopefully more than it has received from Mr. Dresdale – to settle. If Brown wins, it will become known as a place where men are no longer welcome, and the school will begin to wither on the vine, although that may take decades. Ultimately, the best thing about this is that more people will open their eyes to the fact that men, whether innocent or guilty, have very few rights at all.

As Paul Elam suggested in a comment yesterday, “Game should be considered an arm of the Men’s Movement.” My take on Game is that, whatever one thinks of it, it’s one of the only tools available for young men in today’s merciless sexual marketplace. I think it’s also a step toward reasserting masculinity.

Game is essentially what you make of it. Some guys, like Hawaiian Libertarian, use it to strengthen their marriage. Others, like Roissy, use it for sexual adventure and pleasure. It’s really up to the individual man how he chooses to apply Game, but without it he’s something of a cripple in dealing with women.

Fortunately, Roosh has put together a good book on the subject which is, according to Ferdinand Bardamu’s review, “a title that anyone interested in improving their success with women should buy, post-haste.”

I talked Roosh into giving our subscribers a promotional deal on the book, so all current subscribers to The Spearhead newsletter and anyone who signs up in the next couple weeks can buy a copy at our discount.

When you sign up for the Newsletter, after you confirm membership, you will receive a welcome email with a link to the promotional deal. I’ll also put up a lightbox reminder for those who visit the site regularly so they don’t miss out. Game is something that could have a profound influence on our society, and I’d like all readers of The Spearhead to have at least an understanding of the concept. I’d also like to offer gratitude to Roosh for giving our readers a deal on his book. One of the things I’ve been working on lately is collecting helpful resources for our dedicated readers, and this is a step in the right direction.

So if you haven’t already signed up for the newsletter, this is a good time to do so, and an opportunity to learn about Game from someone who has put a great deal of effort into learning and teaching the fundamentals and techniques.

All healthy male sexual expression is criminalized in our culture today. Look around and the examples are scattered about everywhere. Men are said to “think with their penises” and have only “one thing on their mind”. Left leaning feminists consider all men to be potential rapists while their right wing sisters believe all men are potential adulterers. Both sets of grrls consider their thoughts justified by the “visual nature” of men and the fact men typically have a higher sex drive than do women. There is nothing wrong with either parts of man’s nature; they are part of normal male sexuality, but female supremacists have turned these natural expressions into crimes and elevate female sexuality as being normal. Well, a sanitized form of female sexuality anyway.

Men were made to appreciate female beauty and to respond to it. Such responses are noble and help us make new life and move forward as humanity. A man admiring a beautiful woman is as natural as admiring the beautiful view of a mountain or a flower filled valley, even a spiritual experience at times, and a positive part of human life. Even women can appreciate, in different ways, the beauty of women. Think of the portraits of beautiful women that hang in museum, bits of beauty many different people respond to in some way. Not all responses to female beauty are supposed to culminate in some act with the admired person, at times the longing and desire will be the extent of the experience and sometimes possession can even ruin the magic (consider the idea of the muse), but the vast majority are healthy and should be seen as positive, perhaps even flattering. Beauty is something special, an experience that can take us to a higher plane in life, whether we be the attracted or the attractor.

Considering this normal, natural response to be a negative one, as is done today, has criminalized male sexuality and left it open for abuse. Women dress and behave in ways that allow them to use their beauty power over men, men whom they have no intention of sharing themselves with, all to earn favors or manipulate men into performing for them. This is a terrible abuse of something good, a perversion, and damage that has reached the bedrooms of most people growing up in this feminized world. While feminism has left much worse devastation in its wake, the perversion of male virility is something to be mourned. To claim that heterosexual sexual expression is rape is to desecrate noble love expressed physically by two people. To criminalize a man simply for being a man, for feeling sexual desire as a man, is to hate him and his masculinity to the core.

Today, Joe Biden will announce changes to a Title IX loophole that has allowed schools to determine male and female sports requirements based upon student surveys of interest in participation. In 2005, the Department of Education allowed student surveys to be used to determine the number of sports programs required per gender rather than relying on the metric that men's and women's sports teams be in line with sex ratios at college campuses.

Feminists will hail the measure's alteration because it allows the demand for sports teams to be divorced from the actual market demand for said teams. As with most feminist agendas, a resolute detachment from simple supply and demand decisions does wonders for their cause. By wiping a simple method for determining the level of interest in female sports, feminists gain an undeserved hand in controlling school administrators' purse strings which will inevitably encroach on sports funding for more popular mens' programs.

But, if feminist agendas were rooted in logic rather than ideology, there would be one important fact undermining their cause: girls don't want to play sports nearly as much as boys do. Therefore girls high school sports shouldn't have nearly as much funding or spots available and neither should womens' college sports. Creating a lot of positions for girls who only have ho-hum attitudes to sport participation would be no different than creating 3 varsity teams for each NCAA college. Why not let any young man who enjoys playing any sport participate at an upper level?

First, it is clear that fewer girls than boys participate in sports. But feminists respond to that by saying that girls have fewer opportunities than boys to participate and that there is a cultural barrier that curtails their sports involvement when they are children. Erase that barrier and girls will enjoy sports just as much as boys – say feminists.

The feminists, of course, operate on the premise that boys and girls are the same. Citing research published in The New England Journal of Medicine, the Women's Sports Foundation which was begun by Billie Jean King, reported that girls' sports participation declines during adolescence. From my interpretation, this strikes a gigantic hole in the feminist argument for gender-parity and egalitarian sports participation. Some natural occurence – lets call it "puberty" – reallocates girls' priorities away from sports. This makes sense as she is naturally compelled to worry about potential procreation and child-rearing rather than playing sports.

Compound this with another finding published at WSF that 49% of boys aged 6 to 11 participate frequently in sports while only 32% of girls do, and we figure that the gap in frequent participation grows as boys and girls age. As such, even after 30 plus years of Title IX, girls still don't participate as much, practice as hard, or generally care about sports as much as boys do. Since youth sports at the high school and AAU levels are feeder programs for university level sports that Title IX is mostly concerned with, not only do we find that there are fewer girls than boys willing to fill an equal number of positions, we also find that the young women who do participate are less motivated and less dedicated to their particular sport than young men. Since colleges are mandated to provide a certain number of positions and scholarships for both genders, this pulls a large number of females up to the college athletic ranks that wouldn't have normally chosen to play college sports if the supply of sports teams was in line with bottom-up high school participation/demand. Feminists have sought – and succeeded in – letting the supply create its own demand.

So when I came across a "10 Point Play" list put forth by an AAUW (American Association of University Women) branch drumming up support for female sports I figured I'd share it with you so we could laugh in unison. They suggest:

1. Buy a basketball, glove, soccer ball or other sport gift for your favorite sports girl – send her the message that you think she can play sports.

Why, so the basketball deflates in a moldy corner of the shed in the backyard, or the glove gets sold in a garage sale 2 years later?

2. Take your friends and family to a women's sports event: high school, college, or professional sports.

Why, so they can be bored to tears and never want to hang out with you again if your idea of fun is sitting around a bunch of chicks' parents and boyfriends/girlfriends while they screech Grrrl Power euphemisms and ring cowbells for good deeds – or at least good intentions? If you must subject your "friends" to such torture you better hope there is a good concession stand near – hopefully with beer and that good nacho cheese.

3. Watch a women's sports program on television and call the station to thank them for carrying women's sports (so they'll continue to air women's sports programs).

Only to be laughed at by the station worker who thinks you're prank-calling them.

4. Write a letter to your local newspaper editor either asking them for fairer coverage of women's sports or thanking them for great coverage.

This is based upon the premise that women's sports doesn't already get "fair" coverage. From my observation women's sports gets plenty of fair coverage – it is completely in line with the demand the sport warrants. A short blurb once a week on page 6D is plenty fair. Oh, wait, we have different definitions of "fair" don't we?

5. Buy women's collegiate and professional sports merchandise like T-shirts and hats. It 's an important way to advance the economic success of your favorite team.

Are we also supposed to wear this gear or can we use it to clean up refuse and kitchen spills? I'd like to have an option here; I don't want to be tied in to having to wear this shit.

6. Take someone who has never attended a women's sports event to a high school, college, or professional women's sports game. Introduce others to the excitement of women's sports. Help grow the fan base!

I think they (and ostenbsibly I) covered this in point 2. above. But it bears worth repeating: if you value family and friends and don't want them to hate you, don't follow the advice of points 2. and 6.

7. Visit your local sports retail store. If they are not carrying licensed merchandise for your favorite women's sports team (college, WNBA, WUSA, etc.), write to the manager to tell him or her you want to purchase this product and you would appreciate it if they would carry it. If they are carrying the product, thank them for doing so.

Ah. I see the tactic. Drum up faux support for these teams so that the support will become legitimized and the merchandise will actually have value to real sports fans rather than feminist activists out to make an ideologically-driven point. Quick: Who holds the record for most points scored in a WNBA game? Who holds the record for points scored in an NBA game?

8. Write to sponsors of women's sports to tell them how much you appreciate their support of women's sports.

These points – all relying on activist-inspired displays of support – don't provide a proper picture of the real market demand for womens' sports. I sincerely hope that sponsors and retailers recognize this; the money-generating fanbase is actually much smaller – respective to other sports supported by fans rather than non-activists (i.e. men's sports) – than the vociferousness of the supporters suggests. In other words, feminist activists are organizing a "Google bomb" tactic to trick the system into supporting their cause. These women don't actually care about female sports qua sport, they merely want to reallocate attention, resources, and power to women and girls.

9. Conduct a sports clinic for local elementary school girls. Tell each girl why it 's so important for them to play sports and how much fun it is.

Except, don't do it if you're a man. They'll all think you're a pervert and pedophile. The last sentence is laughable; tell a girl the importance and enjoyment of sports. And here I always though telling a girl/woman something was anathema to The Cause. Funny, we don't have to tell boys this because they already know, and boys know because they are predispositioned to enjoy sports. Using this tactic on young girls is like telling me that I like gay porn (to avoid confusion, I don't like gay porn).

10. Grade your school on whether it is treating male and female athletes equally. Write a letter to the principal either asking for change or applauding the school's commitment to girls' sports.

Boys and mens sports suffer from the guerilla-warfare tactics of feminists. You see, female sports have a niche audience. Usually it consists of parents, families, and hardcore gamblers who had to sniff around for a decent 4-team parlay. Other than that, televised female sports have a TV rating on par with CBS's 4 a.m. "National Anthem" sign-off. Because female sports don't have an audience, they can put pressure on admins and sponsors and boycott male sports. While the damage would be miniscule, no organized group can have that affect on female sports. Since there is nobody watching female sports – since these feminists have nothing to lose – they can create an outcry and take potshots at male sports.

The people who want to watch sports have already drawn their battle lines. Demand for those sports – in either viewership or participation – can't be fuddled with any more. Girls who want to play know that they can play; if they don't, that means they choose not to. People who want to watch women's sports on TV will have already chosen to do so; they know the product is out there, but their choosing men's basketball over women's is like being given the choice between a Mercedes and a Hyundai – when the sticker price is the same. As such, the number of available spots and resources dedicated to both gender's sports should be in line with what people want to play and what they want to see.

Women Discuss Rise of the Fembots

Welmer · 20 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for The Daily Beast, Rebecca Dana expounds upon the "fembot" phenomenon, describing these women as surgically augmented, power hungry and litigious. I'm not exactly sure where the term "fembot" came from, but I think it has something to do with the killer female robots in the Austin Powers movie (Wikipedia says it comes from The Bionic Woman). Wherever fembot originated, the word has been used extensively by a number of male bloggers (Roissy in particular makes good use of it), and has come to connote a youngish, aggressive feminist.

So when I saw the article written by Rebecca Dana, it appeared to me that her use of "fembot" to describe slutty celebrities was slightly off. However, her understanding does jibe with my own to some extent, as suggested in the following passage:

> Modern-day Fembots aren't just debatably pretty faces. They're also lawyered up. Last week, Montag announced she is suing Hills creator Adam DiVello, without whose intervention she would probably still be an anonymous aspiring fashion designer in Los Angeles. She alleges unwanted touching. And then, of course, there is Gloria Allred's entire legal practice. In the last year alone, Allred has become the first name in pre-emptive Fembot litigation. Southwick will likely employ celebrity divorce attorney Robert Kaufman, if she goes ahead with the divorce.

It is always interesting to see how memes propagate across the blogosphere and are adapted to fit the perspective of whoever seizes upon them. Obviously, fembot has negative overtones these days, but women often have somewhat different ideas of what constitutes a negative trait, and thus we see that Ms. Dana's main issue with the women she describes as fembots is that they employ exaggerated sexuality to further their goals:

> Here is Heidi Montag-Pratt, in her teeny-weeny bikini, posing half-nude next to every single swimming pool between Nevada and the Pacific, ever since her gag-inducing 10-in-one-day full-body reconstruction this winter. Here is new mother Kendra Wilkinson discussing her plans to follow in Montag's footsteps and get a whole new body before she turns 30. Here are Tiger Woods' frighteningly lifelike blowup-doll mistresses. Here are Eliot Spitzer's.

From my perspective, these women would be more properly termed "tramps," and I would reserve the term fembot for someone like Jessica Valenti, who is a hardcore female supremacist and has punitive rather than mercenary intent when it comes to males. Whatever the proper definition of fembot is, it is fascinating to see women taking hold of some of the concepts that have floated down into the common consciousness from the heights of the manosphere.

My recent post on Baby Adoption and Race was not only provocative in its own right, but also kind of puts the icing on the cake as it were, when one considers the nature of my postings of late. In the main, they were focused on Black Men, and the challenges they face. If we put them together with what we already know on this score, and add again, yesterday's post, a powerful, mind-numbing narrative emerges.

We know that Black Men are twice as likely to be unemployed, even when controlling for college education, when compared to White Men. We know that Black Men are six times more likely to be in prison, parole or probation, than White Men. We know that Black Men have shorter lifespans than White Men, the going average now is around 70 or so. We know that Black boys are more likely to be suspended and/or expelled from school, to be disciplined more often than their White counterparts, and to drop out of highschool at a rate significantly higher than White boys. We also know that they are more likely to be prescribed behavioral modification drugs like Ritalin, and to be assigned to Special Ed classes, more than White boys.

We know that Black Men suffer from diseases like prostate cancer at a much higher rate than do White Men, that an African American young Man has a better chance of survival in Baghdad or Khandahar than in Baltimore or Washington, DC. We know that Black Men are often the last hired and the first fired. We know that Black boys are adopted dead last, and at a quarter of the price as Asian babies from avowedly Communist countries. And we know, for a fact, that Black soldiers were often treated worse than sworn enemies of the United States government.

We also know that Black Men have far and away more run-ins with the nation's police force than anyone else, certainly more than White Men. Nor will his manner of speaking or dress will matter much-last year's incident involving well known Ivy League academic Henry "Skip" Louis Gates, proved that, as if Black Men needed any more such evidence. For Black Men-any Black Man-merely stepping outside one's door for something as mundane as going to the corner store can prove deadly.

When one just stands back and takes all this in, just lets the stats and data of just about every measure that industrialized societies considers important, and notes the fact that Black Men come in at or near dead last, the effect is as if one has been sucker punched with a concrete fist. Perhaps then, it is understandable as to why so many Black Men seem apathetic, deeply cynical and defensive. After all, psychologists say that a bunker mentality is a common defense mechanism to protect oneself from real or perceived threats.

All of these thoughts occurred to me yesterday, while having a conversation with a good friend of mine of over a decade. We often discuss racial issues, politics and the like, and we often disagree with each other, especially when it comes to the divide between Black Men and Women. And to be sure, yesterday's convo was no different; but I had an epiphany during the exchange:

One major reason why Black Male/Female relations is so fraught with acrimony in our time, is because in a very real sense, Black Men and Black Women live in very different worlds.

As we've noted here in this forum, Black Women, taken as a group, have made significant gains that Black Men, in aggregate, have not. For example, we've seen how education has undeniably and literally paidoff for Black Women, often exceeding the incomes earned by White Women. We cannot say the same thing for Black Men. Moreover, Black Women have gained tremendously from the Women's Movement-for example, it is documented that Black Women make up a full third of all abortions performed in this country, a bedrock goal of the Feminist cause. And again, Black Women have made powerful gains.

This helps to explain the views of many Black Women toward Black Men, after all, "the system" works for the former in ways that it just does not for the latter. Even Black girls can be adopted quicker than Black boys.

None of this is to suggest that Black Women don't have their fair share of problems and challenges-they must certainly do-nor do I want to give the impression that Black Women have made gains at the expense of Black Men-I don't feel that way, either. Still, its hard to deny the basic and simple facts on the ground. As noted earlier, Black Men die of prostate cancer and a much higher rate than do White Men, and to date there has been nothing done about this; meanwhile, Black Women have the comfort of knowing that not only the current President, but several ones before him, have made tackling HIV and AIDS in Black America a major area of concern, because Black Women were impacted the most. And that's not including breast cancer awareness, heart health, and so on.

Personally, I think Black Men know a lot more than they're willing to let on about their place in American life and how they feel about it. Perhaps this explains the higher rates of hypertension and the like among Black Men. Surely, the swirl of deep emotions emanating from all of the above, has to have deleterious health effects. Something else that, to my knowledge, has never been studied.

At any rate, I think this explains why Black Men don't seem to have that kind of gung-ho spirit that other groups, and even Black Women, seem to have. That's hardly surprising, when put into perspective of the things I layout here.

One of the things that occurred to me yesterday during my convo with my buddy, was that for Black Women, particularly those who have had the college experience, the world of possibilities is open to them; the gulf between them and Jennifer and Emily, isn't that wide after all.

Until its time to find a husband. Then, Reality comes crashing in.

In my personal travels, I am struck by just how many Black folk consider themselves "post racial". Although I didn't catch it at first, something dawned on me: the majority of those who took such a view, were Black Women, not Black Men. To be sure, a few Brothas were in the mix, but the overwhelming majority were Sistas who felt this way.

Now I understand why. For many Sistas, life really IS "post racial". Brothas on the other hand, cannot say that. Not with the vim and vigor with which so many Sistas do.

There will be those who read this and say that whatever problems Black Men have and now face, are problems of their own making. Indeed, we can and will continue to hear this line of reasoning from newly minted American citizens, fresh off the boat, and eager to tell Black folks, Black Men especially, what's "wrong" with them. Nor will they be alone-for scores of more native born Americans will think the same way, not the least of which, will be Black Women.

And to be sure, Black Men have shown that they are quite capable of indulging in self-destructive behavior, "proof positive" for the views of those mentioned above. What gets lost in the shuffle of course, are things like the adoption story, or middle aged Black academics being spread eagle on the hoods of police cars.

Perhaps the most interesting-if not difficult-part of all this, is in how we impart what we know above, to the next generation of Black Men. On that score of course I don't know what any of you would say to your son, brother, cousin, grandson or nephew; but I know for a fact that I cannot look at mine and tell them, that they can be whatever they want to be with a straightface. The best I can tell them is that it is possible.

Which is quite a far sight from what is probable.

Feminists Use Mad Men to Agitate Against Fictitious Pay Gap

Welmer · 21 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've only seen a few episodes of Mad Men. I didn't find it all that impressive. Although Jon Hamm is a pretty good actor (despite the unfortunate surname), there's only so much you can do with the poor material. One thing that annoyed me while watching the series was the thinly-veiled social commentary, which is loaded with worn-out old themes. The depictions of an America dominated by cigar smoking capitalists reminded me somewhat of the hackneyed Communist propaganda of the late postwar era.

Now, an article in a mommy blog has reminded me why Mad Men bothered me. Claire Moshenberg, writing for Moms Rising, has taken an episode from the show to demonstrate the crushing burdens that fall on the poor, oppressed women of America today. Trotting out the tired old lie that women "make 77 cents to every dollar earned by a man," Moshenberg suggests that things haven't changed much for women since 1963.

I suspect that this is the point the writers of the show – seven out of nine of whom are women – are trying to make. Although the irony of powerful women writing victimhood propaganda is probably lost on the young feminist activists, it's pretty obvious to me, and demonstrates that where women are in charge today, consolidation of eternal victim status and concomitant privilege for women is the overriding goal in all endeavors.

This is really where the pressure responsible for the rise of the manosphere came from. In our culture, feminism has come to so dominate the efforts of women that there is almost nothing that women in power do that isn't tainted by it to a large degree. There is no true desire for equality — it is an eternal power grab at the expense of everyone but educated middle class and elite adult women that will never, ever end unless someone puts a stop to it. If no one does, it will consume and wreck our society, which, in my more pessimistic moments, I see as an inevitable consequence.

But at least some of us can try…

Is Male Studies OK? Forbes Magazine Not So Sure

Welmer · 21 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Forbes Magazine has been publishing a lot of feminist material lately, and has set up an exclusively female community to give women a male-free department where they can pressure the publication and its readers without any interference from pesky males.

One of the current conversations concerns the legitimacy of Male Studies, which is a new discipline that aims to provide boys and men with some space of their own where they are not subject to endless feminist tirades against men. Needless to say, the Forbes women are not all that enthusiastic about the idea.

Forbes women's objections include the rejection of feminism by Male studies. Interestingly, April Scarlett of the Forbes Women (posting on their Facebook page) conflates feminists with all women:

> But creating a new studies program for men by ripping on women/feminism is hypocritical. The gentleman in the article is doing exactly to feminists what he is accusing [them] of doing to men."

This is something men ought to pay attention to, because it is not at all clear that all women are feminists. Although it is often a tempting thing to do, painting all women with the feminist brush is no more accurate than it would have been to paint all Germans as National Socialists during the years the Nazi regime was in power.

It may well be true that all women at Forbes Magazine are feminists, and it seems that feminism (or at least lack of resistance to the same) is a virtual prerequisite for women, not to mention men, in positions of power, but I'd go so far as to say that most women do not self-identify as feminists.

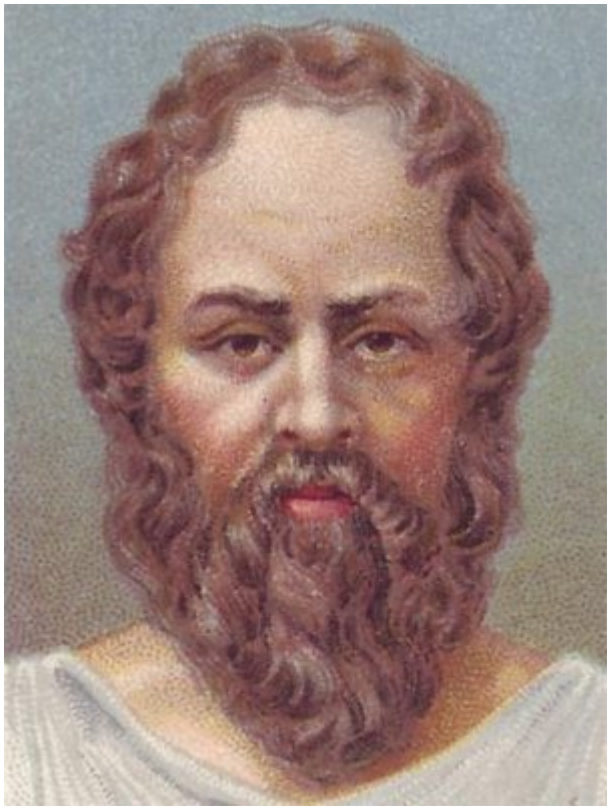
The feminist party, if we may call it such, probably claims only about 20% of America's women, and the hard core likely little more than 2-3% of all women. In fact, the predominance of lesbians, who comprise roughly 2% of America's female population, at the highest levels of feminism suggests that true radical feminists are a small group indeed. However, this small group wields enormously disproportionate power in media and politics, and much of that power is due to the willingness of men like Steve Forbes to support and foster its members with jobs and cold, hard cash.

Forbes Magazine is probably shooting itself in the foot by betting that the future will be dominated by this tiny group of power-hungry women. Perhaps, because Steve Forbes has five daughters, he sees them as the future corporate masters of the United States, but I doubt it will play out like that. Forbes has always been favored by conservative men, and these kinds of attacks on its core readership are bound to eventually sink the ship.

The sooner the better, as far as I'm concerned.

Channeling Socrates

Gx1080 · 22 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original



Although it sounds arrogant, I would describe the Manosphere, at least when not invaded by Trolls, as Socratic.

What does that mean?

First, we are Social Gadflys. Wikipedia:

> "Gadfly" is a term for people who upset the status quo by posing upsetting or novel questions, or just being an irritant.

Since the status quo is a Pedestalization Epidemic, the Manosphere opposes it by questioning it and upsetting is a given when people don't agree with something, the concept applies.

Second, although unintended, when males discuss, we apply the Socratic Method:

> …is a form of inquiry and debate between individuals with opposing viewpoints based on asking and answering questions to stimulate critical thinking and to illuminate ideas. It is a dialectical method, often involving an oppositional discussion in which the defense of one point of view is pitted against the defense of another; one participant may lead another to contradict him in some way, strengthening the inquirer's own point.

Ok, let's make that blurb clear:

- One side present his argument.
- The other side presents a counter-argument, pointing out flaws in the logic of the first one.
- Both sides go back and forth, until one debater cannot logically defend his argument.

As it is a discussion method based on logic, and men are naturally inclined to logic, we attempt to use at least a rough approximation of the Socratic Method in all discussions. The young men of Athenas also favored it, after all.

But, that method simply falls flat against the enemies we fight, namely Feminists and Manginas. When we win the argument, which happens quite a lot, what they do?

Dodging and/or Shaming Tactics.

Sure, we win the audience, but we cannot convince the opposite side; we cannot change their behavior. We fight against weak debaters, but strong manipulators. And, here's the crux of the matter:

HUMAN BEINGS FEAR BEING WRONG.

Let's take a hypothetical example:

Imagine for a second that we are wrong. That women ARE the innocent angels that they claim to be instead of flawed human beings like all of us, that we as males are the evil beings that try to destoy their innocence, that we should be grateful when they finally stop screwing jerks and notice the true love that was in front of them and give themselves to it. Oh, and that it isn't for pity.

Scary isn't?

Don't worry, in that example women are desirable up to their 40's. LOL.

Feminazis and Manginas simply cannot admit that they are wrong. Their political beliefs are not only the base of their self-steem (really pathetic per se), they are also their main source of credibility and a major source of income. The Athenian wise men, poets, statemen, artisans, couldn't admit their own ignorance not only because they lacked humilty, also because they had a major emotional and economic investment in their belief that they possessed wisdom. Socrates, in the other hand, could freely say: I know that I know nothing.

Which ironicaly, just as the Oracle of Delphi said, made him the wiser.

This is why attempting to use logic against Feminazis and Manginas is useless, they simply cannot admit that they are wrong because they depend too much on their emotions and their lies-selling business to do so. We are speaking of people who try to use their emotions as logical arguments. As an example, let's see the common "I'm Offended."

> To cause displeasure, anger, resentment, or wounded feelings in.

Those are emotions — they should not be accepted as arguments in a logical discussion. The problem is that we are up against people both unfit for and without any desire for a logical discussion. So, by inserting emotions in the mix, they try to make us fight in their terms. Note that an emotional argument is usually covered with a heavy dose of nonsense.

Finally, as they stop contributing to the discussion and only spout nonsense, they are met with the banhammer, and they are removed from the discussion. A predictable result, but it simply proves that they are not to be convinced.

That cycle repeats itself over and over again; all that changes are the names and the writing styles. Whatever is OK, depends. If we were fighing for complete annihilation of the enemy, it would require several underhanded measures and a serious investment of money and time far beyond the scope of this magazine.

Fortunately, there is another way, which can be followed by all. The way of resilience. We don't fight to win, we fight to avoid losing. The individual approach of cutting all influence of Feminism and Cultural Marxism from our individual lives works perfectly with this style. We are watching how the truth is reaching the mainstream, both favorably and not.

This decade will mark history and our society way beyond the stagnation of the past one.

Also, if you aren't going to have children, write a novel or articles, teach others — do whatever it takes, because we are mortal beings, and for our ideals to outlast Feminism in the decades, centuries to come, they need to outlast us.

The teachings of Socrates lasted from the time before Christ until now. Is it impossible that ours might last as well?

Professor Tiger Schools Bratty DC Blogger

Welmer · 22 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a recent debate on CBC (Canadian Broadcasting Corporation), Lionel Tiger calmly and rationally explained why male studies is needed, outlining the problems boys and men are having in school and society. Amanda Hess, sounding like a 12-year-old girl, piped in to denounce the idea. According to Amanda, Dr. Tiger's interpretation of "what it means to be a man" is "narrow." Amanda further says that it is feminism that will solve boys' problems, and that the current "men's studies," which she admits is a feminist construct, is adequate.

Amanda was clearly outclassed. She sounded like a clueless, sophomoric twit, and when, late in the interview, she tried to use some of the worn out old feminist tropes, such as "you want to take us back to the past" and "you're against birth control," Dr. Tiger shut her down immediately with a properly executed verbal spanking, saying she hadn't read his work and had no idea what she was talking about. Knowing she had been soundly beaten, Amanda conceded that male studies was a legitimate discipline, but said that the professors ought to to talk things over with women's studies professors. To conclude the interview, Dr. Tiger responded, saying that wasn't on the table.

Despite all of Amanda's braggadocio and her flippant, sarcastic dismissal of male studies on her blog, she sounded very small and meek in the presence of a greater mind. I've never seen Ms. Hess in person, and I know this shouldn't matter, but her high-pitched voice and Valley Girl intonation (like, umm…) gave me the impression that she is five feet even at best.

Listening to the interview should give men the proper perspective on feminism: when it isn't backed up by money and men with guns, it falls flat on its face.

Let's wish the best to Dr. Tiger, and feel free to add your comments to CBC's blog; if you wish, offer your condolences to Amanda for losing so badly.

Top “Men’s Studies” Authority is a Tranny

Welmer · 22 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

If there’s anything that underscores the need for a new academic discipline devoted to the study of men and masculinity, it is that Australian academic Raewyn Connell (formerly known as “Bob Connell”), author of several of the most popular men’s studies texts, has had himself entirely castrated. Paul Elam brought this to my attention in the comments, and although I shouldn’t have been surprised the news still gave me a good laugh (for a full treatment of the subject, see Paul’s article on his blog).

“Raewyn” Connell has authored a book called Masculinities, which argues that masculinity is a social construct, and that there are actually many different forms of masculinity, which are constructed to oppress women, etc.

Here’s part of the product description on Amazon:

Just an ordinary day in Bob's class

> This is an exciting new edition of R. W. Connell’s ground-breaking text, which has become a classic work on the nature and construction of masculine identity. Connell argues that there is not one masculinity, but many different masculinities, each associated with different positions of power.

I doubt many of our readers would want to read the book, which is likely filled with nauseating feminist argot, but it should be noted that thousands of young men are forced to wade through this garbage in college.

Interestingly, some months ago The Spearhead was denounced by an anonymous Australian academic blogger who runs the “Critical Masculinities” blog. I don’t know who runs the blog, but I suspect it is one of Raewyn’s acolytes. The denunciation focused on two websites dealing with men’s issues, including the “Art of Manliness” blog and The Spearhead. While the author approved of The Art of Manliness, he (she, or it) had this to say about The Spearhead:

> The Spearhead on the other hand, does not attempt to rectify the perceived ‘problems’ through meaningful self change, preferring to espouse an easier message of opposition to all who have done them wrong, with feminists and women uppermost on that list. I am finding it difficult to come up with any more cogent analysis of that site, because it is making me so angry. So I will stop.

Personally, I consider it an honor to be denounced by avowed feminists, so I was quite pleased to know that our content enraged this particular feminist. Additionally, if “meaningful self change” includes castration (as it did for Bob Connell), I think I’ll take a pass on that suggestion.

Postfeminism

Welmer · 23 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I came across a blog written by a woman who calls herself a postfeminist (among other things), and is apparently hated by feminists despite the fact that she seems to deal with similar issues and themes. This woman, Susannah Breslin, strikes me as someone who is genuinely curious about the world, and is looking for truth in her own way. Breslin has written extensively about the porn industry and contemporary American sexuality, publishing some very revealing stuff, such as her "Letters from Working Girls" and "Letters from Johns" series on prostitution.

I came across Breslin while researching the concept of "triggers," because The Spearhead has been accused of "triggering" on many occasions, and I thought finding out what triggers feminists might be revealing. Evidently, Susannah Breslin does, and that alone sparked my interest.

What is it about Breslin that causes mutual dislike between her and feminists? My take on it is that she's a radically honest person. She has the artist's tendency to bring out the substance of a subject, including the stuff that is usually hidden out of some social consideration, and feminism is dedicated to perpetuating a massive fraud. She threatens their facade of lies, and it sends them over the edge. Kind of reminds me of Roissy, I guess.

I'd suggest readers take a look at Susannah's work. As far as I can tell, she's an example of one of those rare women with a true hunger for truth and knowledge — the type who cuts through the pretty lies and reveals the beating heart of humanity. In the process, she manages to retain her own humanity. Impressive.

True Activism

Welmer · 23 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've written many times that The Spearhead isn't an MRA site. My first post dealing with that spelled it out fairly clearly, but I guess I ought to further elaborate my stance.

Writing is not true activism. Ideas are important, and opinion can have a huge influence, but it isn't the same as actually going somewhere in person and getting the job done. If I called myself an MRA, I'd be a liar, and insulting those who really are. There are men who go down to legislatures and lobby for laws to uphold the rights of fathers, divorced men, male students and the like, and there are men who actually carry out physical street protests and confront legislators and politicians in person. These are true activists.

Along these lines, much, much more could be done. Firepower, who until fairly recently was a frequent commenter, made this point often. He was right. Activism is not writing articles on the Internet or commenting on forums. It requires getting close and personal. It is political in the old sense of the word. You actually have to go out there and get to know people in person, and sometimes you have to confront them.

The knowledge that one can find on the internet is supplemental to activism, but it is just boot camp — not real battle. And if you think about it, boot camp would be totally counterproductive if soldiers stayed there throughout the war and never joined the true fight. So in a sense there is the danger that people simply get wrapped up in posting online and never do anything else. This is exactly what politicians and the like would prefer, because nothing will change in that case.

So I guess I'll break my taboo about posting activism advice and make a few suggestions that I think would work well.

First, start going to state legislatures and testifying about the bias in family law procedures. Pass out information concerning the abuse of ex parte restraining orders, mandatory arrest laws, imputed income child support orders, etc. Get in front of cameras with signs. Find a spokesman to speak on TV, etc.

Next, start getting to know some of the politicians. Offer to volunteer on their campaigns if they are supportive of men's rights. Canvas neighborhoods, put up campaign signs, become a precinct committeeman, etc. Go to local party meetings, get to know your state representative, show you can deliver some votes, and they'll start to pay attention.

Finally, you can even start a local PAC, like fathers for fair courts or some such group. Recruit members and supporters and hold get togethers. Start lobbying for real bills, putting pressure on elected officials, and making presentations in legislative committees.

This stuff actually works. I know guys who did a lot of this back in the 80s and 90s, and they got some very helpful legislation passed even during the darkest days. Given what I've been through, I feel that I owe them one.

If you want to go the radical route, there are options for that as well. Whenever there is some feminist event, such as the "take back the night" rallies of the 1990s, show up with a dozen guys with signs and bullhorns and protest false rape prosecutions. I can guarantee that this will cause the feminists to go absolutely apeshit, and will entirely spoil their party. The entire event will become focused on the issue of false rape accusations, and just a few guys can steal the spotlight. In these situations, be prepared for some minor physical confrontation, and be prepared to get no help from the police.

Although it is a lot more difficult to confront people to their face than it is to do so from the anonymity of the internet, the payoff is much bigger. It really ruffles people when you tell them off in person. They never expect it, and most will be shaken by the experience. Of course, you have to be the kind of guy who can handle being denounced by a screaming crowd, and I can tell you from experience that that is kind of intimidating. But it is a thrill nonetheless, and people will secretly admire those who can pull it off.

Also, campus protests could be very effective, and could be pulled off with only a couple dedicated guys. Maybe one man could have a significant effect on a college campus. Crash vagina monologues presentations, call out the professors on their feminism and anti-male bias, and don't back down when they make threats. There's a good chance there will be punishments, such as being graded down in certain classes (who cares), but as a student one can file complaints about this and it won't look good on a teacher's record.

At my local university, they'd do a campus sexual violence thing every now and then, saying that so many men and women are raped/abused, and they'd plant red flags in the grass for women, and white ones for men. Of course, they used their own numbers, so there would be a sea of red flags and only a few white ones. Why not do something for war dead? Plant red flags for dead men, and white ones for dead women. The disparity will be obvious, and will enrage feminists. You coud go on and on. Do occupational deaths. Again, men would outnumber women by an order of magnitude. Just use their own tactics to prove your point.

There is so much that can be done, and much could be accomplished with relatively few people, but unfortunately we don't appear to have many takers. The internet has been a great thing for getting the word out, but if we're honest with ourselves we'll see that it's been a hindrance as well in that it allows people to sit at home and avoid getting their hands dirty.

Honestly, I don't think anyone whose activism is limited to the internet should call themselves an MRA, so I'd have to conclude that there probably aren't more than a handful of true MRAs out there.

Crooked IOC President Championed Feminism in Sports

Juan Antonio Samaranch, who died recently, presided over a tumultuous and corrupt period in the history of the modern Olympics, but succeeded in bringing increasing numbers of women into the Olympics. Although his tenure was marked by bribery and doping scandals, some, according to the New York Times, believe that his work promoting women overshadows the scandals.

Interestingly, the women interviewed in his obituary state that his goal was equality, but Samaranch did not create equality as much as he bolstered the segregated women-only sports, such as women's softball, women's soccer, etc. If he truly wanted to create "equality," Samaranch could have made the Olympics entirely gender neutral, allowing both men and women to compete on an even basis.

The entire concept of women's sports contradicts the notion of equality, because it suggests that women do not care to compete on even terms with men. Additionally, there is so little interest in some women's sports, such as women's ice hockey, that it is questionable whether they belong in the Olympics at all, so their status as official Olympic sports signifies privilege rather than equality.

One of the problems with feminism is that it purports to seek equality, but in practice it seeks privilege. Women's sports, with a few exceptions such as figure skating, do not generate enough interest from either spectators or participants to stand on their own, and must be subsidized by a big man (or big gorganization). Samaranch, therefore, was practicing a sort of patrimonialism, which accords perfectly with the corruption that characterized his Olympic regime.

Patrimonial governments, whether local or national, are very often characterized by widespread corruption. Examples would include Sicily, Indonesia under Suharto, and various late 20th century Latin American regimes.

In a truly free and egalitarian society, feminism would wither on the vine. Without big government and patrimonialism to give it favors and protection it wouldn't stand a chance. Feminists instinctively know that, so they will always support more government and more control over the lives of citizens.

MAN vs. “Person”

Jack Donovan · 24 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I recently took part in a “males only” workshop at a local private high school. It was an unlikely opportunity for an advocate of traditional masculine ideals, especially given the fact that the workshop was part of this fairly liberal school’s yearly “Diversity Conference.” I was thankful for the chance to get across some countering viewpoints. I shared the floor with a veteran leader of men’s groups, and I knew we had different aims from the get-go, but I had the first hour.

To begin, I played the guys my favorite scene from The Outlaw Josey Wales—the part where Wales rides up to the Comanche chief Ten Bears and bargains for peace.

> “There is iron in your words of death for all Comanche to see. And so, there is iron in your words of life. No signed paper can hold the iron. It must come from men.”

There is iron in your words of death.

This is how civilization happened.

Agreements between men, backed by the threat of violence.

This is how men made this world.

That’s not something the kids hear every day. And yet, it is absolutely fundamental to any realistic understanding of how the human world has always worked.

Has anyone ever been told to “act like a man,” to “man up?”

All hands raised.

What were they trying to get you to do?

And they gave me gold. All of the right answers. I wrote them on the whiteboard under the heading “MAN.”

Tough it out.

Be strong.

Don’t be afraid.

No whining.

Don’t show emotions. Stoicism.

My counterpart chimed in with “Do what I want you to do.”

Yeah, that’s true.

I talked it out a bit and made the point that all of those things (with the exception of the last one) could be reduced to some form of STRENGTH. Strength of body, strength of will, strength of purpose.

Two circles. One for all of the things that women do and are, one for all of the things that men do and are. Substantial overlap, but as you move in either direction, you get qualities that are more often attributed to one sex or the other. The overlap is “personhood,” being human. The edges are the extreme masculine and the extreme feminine. And the exceptions don't disprove the general rules.

It's not that no woman can beat me up. But most can't. Most men are stronger than most women.

Some women are very brave, but more men are less risk-averse. More men seek out risk and take dangerous chances.

It's not that there aren't any men who are extremely emotional. Some men are very emotional. But most aren't. I've had 41 jobs in my life, and I've seen many "tough" female managers break into tears at work. That's just not common in men. Men get angry more often than they cry.

The masculine ideals, the ones we listed, the ones that represent strength, are grounded in some basic facts about human nature and the differences between the sexes—at the extremes. Outside the overlap. Outside of "person." The ideal of what a man should be is something men get together and create, based on those differences, to push themselves toward the extreme. To make themselves better men.

It probably a little more scrambled and rambling than that, but I think I got it across.

"Do what I want you to do."

I was thankful for that one.

There are people, usually men, who will tell you to "act like a man" to manipulate you, to get what they want. But make no mistake, the people who want you to forget about being a man and just be a person—they want something, too.

A MAN in the ideal is a terrifying creature. A man on top of his own game, pushing himself toward that ideal—a man in control of his own passions and powers—inevitably makes others envious. He makes lesser males and females feel bad about themselves because it is undeniably good to be strong and smart and courageous. It is undeniably good to be able to control your emotions effectively, to expand when others shrink, to push on when most would let up. A MAN is a legitimate threat to the agendas of other men and especially the agendas of feminists. Their efforts to "redefine masculinity in the 21st century" are not aimed at helping men reach their full potential—they want to stop men from reaching their full potential. Because a MAN is going to assert HIS will.

And a group of MEN, united by a common strength-based masculine ideal, mindful of honor, and working toward a common purpose…do yourself a favor and GET THE HELL OUT OF THEIR WAY.

A handful of made up "phobias," political in nature, have made their way into pop consciousness to the extent that we almost believe that they're real "phobias." Xenophobia. Homophobia. Trans-phobia. I think I had some queeny kid refer to me as “sissy-phobic,” once. So many of these “phobias” are, like the words “racist” and “sexist,” merely tools used by master-debaters to stop debates by shifting to a sly ad hominem disguised as a diagnosis.

Xenophobia is the translation of potentially legitimate concerns about the effects of foreign interests and foreign cultures on domestic or local interests and cultures into a mental illness. The repression of xenophobia serves the interests of economic globalists. Homophobia is really a bundle of rational and superstitious concerns about the affect of open expressions of homosexuality on the family unity, all mixed up with powerful male emotional responses related to the fear of emasculation. Transphobia is a valid fear of letting the lunatics run the asylum, as well as collective emasculation via the dissolution of gender roles. Racist is used to place one race on higher moral ground than another. Sexist is used to further the interests of women at the expense of the interests of men.

A “phobia” at least as legitimate as any of these might be called “alpha-phobia” or maybe “androphobia.” Or something like that. People—especially women and feminists—are really afraid of MEN.

And they should be.

MEN, unlike trannies and queers for the most part, represent a legitimate physical threat to their interests. It is rational for those who wish to further the interests of feminists, and gays and the transgendered—as well as multi-culturalists and globalists if you think about it—to maintain an intense and persistent fear of MEN.

This is why our gender-neutral, self-esteem oriented, globalist culture wants MEN to think of themselves merely as “persons.” It has nothing to do with what is in the best interest of MEN, as individuals.

A “person” is a fucking housepet.

A MAN is a threat.

And men are starting to realize that. They’re starting to get a sense that they’re being played.

Even young men.

I didn’t have to prod these kids at all—they signed up for the workshop because they had a list of grievances ready. One guy volunteered that he felt like “everything seemed like it was about what women wanted and what women needed.” Another said that he felt like whenever males do something well, it is “taken for granted,” but whenever females do something well, everyone wants to make a big deal about it. Several talked about the fact that men are portrayed as bumbling idiots, and after mentioning The Simpsons the group started using the word “Homer” as a shorthand for this. They were aware that they still have certain advantages—privileges, to use PC lingo—but they were also aware that they face higher expectations. Because being a MAN is still harder than being a “person.”

I finished my hour with a recording of Micheal Caine reading “If,” by Rudyard Kipling. I passed out copies.

This poem, better than anything I’ve found or anything I could write myself, explains how to be a MAN without being an asshole.

> If you can keep your head when all about you
> Are losing theirs and blaming it on you;
> If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
> But make allowance for their doubting too;
> If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
> Or, being lied about, don’t deal in lies,
> Or, being hated, don’t give way to hating,
> And yet don’t look too good, nor talk too wise;
> If you can dream—and not make dreams your master;
> If you can think—and not make thoughts your aim;
> If you can meet with triumph and disaster

> And treat those two imposters just the same;
> If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
> Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
> Or watch the things you gave your life to broken,
> And stoop and build 'em up with wornout tools;
> If you can make one heap of all your winnings
> And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings
> And never breathe a word about your loss;
> If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
> To serve your turn long after they are gone,
> And so hold on when there is nothing in you
> Except the Will which says to them: "Hold on";
> If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
> Or walk with kings—nor lose the common touch;
> If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you;
> If all men count with you, but none too much;
> If you can fill the unforgiving minute
> With sixty seconds' worth of distance run -
> Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
> And—which is more—you'll be a Man my son!
> —Rudyard Kipling

Why would you NOT want to be a MAN like that?

Boobquake

Hestia · 25 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Last week, an Iranian cleric by the name of Hojjat ol-eslam Kazem Sediqi, blamed earthquakes in Tehran on the unrepentant and impious behavior of young people in his nation, including the immodest dress and whorish behavior of women. He also insisted provocative clothing is tempting young men and is a cause of adultery. In reaction to the clerics remarks, feminists around the globe will be flashing their boobs in protest. April 26 has been declared Boobquake and thousands of empowered grrrls have pledged to dress in their sexist attire in support of equality and the right to never be criticized or judged for wearing sleazy clothes.

While anybody who has wandered down streets in the Western world might have to wonder what is different between this day and every other one, seeing as such provocative sexual harassment attire is commonplace everywhere you go, the criticism aimed at the Boobquake founder Jen McCreight by her sisters in the feminist ranks has been rather intense. So much so that McCreigt felt it necessary to issue a clarification on her blog:

That being said, I don't think the event is completely contrary to feminist ideals. I'm asking women to wear their most "immodest" outfit that they already would wear, but to coordinate it all on the same day for the sake of the experiment. Heck, just showing an ankle would be considered immodest by some people. I don't want to force people out of their comfort zones, because I believe women have the right to choose how they want to dress. Please don't pressure women to participate if they don't want to. If men ogle, that's the fault of the men, not me for dressing how I like. If I want to a show a little cleavage or joke about my boobs, that's my prerogative.

I also hate the ideal of "big boobs are always better!" The cleavage joke was just a result of me personally having cleavage, and that being my choice of immodesty. And I thought "boobquake" just sounded funny. Really, it's not supposed to be serious activism that is going to revolutionize women's rights, but just a bit of fun juvenile humor. I'm a firm believer that when someone says something so stupid and hateful, serious discourse isn't going to accomplish anything – sometimes light-hearted mockery is worthwhile.

Against feminist ideas this is not, but against any notion of equal accountability Boobquake surely is. Why women like Miss Creighton expect to be able to dress in a way that does, indeed, push men out of their comfort zones and demand no men look at them or think of less of them is beyond my scope of understanding. Boobquake is not about raising awareness on the silly earthquake declarations by an Iranian cleric, but protesting the social censure he'd like to see placed on female sexual power and it's inappropriate use.

White Nationalism? More like White Knight Nationalism

As I have discussed before female supremacism isn't limited to just feminism. As we know there is conservative female supremacism and Islamic female supremacism. There are a lot more than three forms of female supremacism. White Nationalism is also a form of female supremacism. White Nationalism promotes misandry by attempting to turn what would otherwise obviously be issues caused by misandry to issues of race. It seeks to keep men of different races from working together and discovering how much they have in common.

Our own Ferdinand Bardamu had a post at his personal blog recently about a dustup at AltRight among the White Nationalist crowd there that laid bare the misandry inherent in White Nationalism. As you can see from the link, White Nationalism is filled with women who except for the racial rhetoric sound like feminist, manginas, and (ironically) white knights. Let's look a few examples of the comments from the White Nationalist crowd at AltRight starting with this one:

> Mr. Locklin, I do hope that your desire for foreign women won't overshadow the white man's duty to reproduce with his own racial group.

Other than the racial rhetoric this could have been written by a conservative female supremacist white knight. Look at this one:

> To broadly insult our mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters in this manner is tasteless. Both American women and men have some changing to do, changing we can do ourselves. But you're doing what feels good for you and that's what counts for you. Paradoxically, you're the typical modern American man: empowered, sassy, sarcastic, and dedicated to gratifying yourself. You're not loyal to the nation or interested in seeing it through to a restoration. You're doing your own thang and won't take no bojive from people who are offended when you insult them.

This is nothing but garden variety anti-male shaming language. However, that doesn't beat what a White Nationalist woman has to say:

> Lock-load is an insulting cretin. As well as an utter moron. The article is loaded with errors. He shows two pictures of actresses. Lillian Gish was an American woman She had a career that spanned decades.This makes her a successful career woman – who succeeded in a business crawling with the Tribe. She would not have endured the juvenile insults of a pathetic, inadequate joke Lockloser for 2 seconds.
> Neither would have Hedy Lamar – a woman that used her exquisite beauty to garner every type of material benefit imaginable. She was bi-sexual, and fled Nazi Germany, to serve the goalso of Die Jude, in America. Lockloser most likely would not have had enough cold hard cash to elicit her attention. Her idea of a dinner date would have included diamond bracelets, as hors d' oerves.
> Lockboor then includes the photographs of an assortment of foul Lesbians, and Jewesses, as representative of American females. Which they are decidely not. The promotion of every sort of denegeracy, in every American institution, is the work of the Franfurt School of Talmudic Jewry. The horrors of a degraded American, and global, womanhood, is the work of the Jew.
> Lockinadequete-appendage rhapsodizes about the helpfulness of foreign females, and asserts that they aren't as greedy and grasping. I suspect Lockmommy'sboy is exceptionally good at retaining his small hoard of cash, and resents the expenditure of the price of a hotdog, on a sidewalk stand, on any female – but if he thinks that foreign females are not materially obssessedm and greedier than George Soros – he's still a virgin. Asiatics are the most soulless, heartless, absolutely ammoral hardheaded gold-diggers, that have ever befouled the Earth.

> Impovershed Eastern European females are not far behind. I have personally witnessed the very thorough skinning of every assett, of American White males, who have sought “submissive, demure” foreign brides. I have laughed in the faces, of those men, when they bemoaned their impovershment, and legal ravagement. They got what they sought, and they got what they deserved.
> Finally – the White Nationalist movement is always whining about the absence of females. Gee – I wonder if snarky, snot-drenched attitudes, exemplified by Locksociallyretarded, have anything to due with this problem? Sorry, fellas – it’s not women that have to please you – you have to please, and lure in women.
> Yup. It’s true. My 9 year old nephew has better social skills, than do 90% of you.
> Gee, thanks, Richard Spencer, for publishing this insulting garbage. All this article has done is PISS OFF a lot of WN females.
> I demand an apology. And a retraction.
> Really – I do.
> As a White American Woman. Who talks to a lot of other White American women. Who have HAD IT with snarky, juvenile, insulting socially-cretinous WN men.

This same woman wrote another similar comment:

> Many, many of the comments reveal the precise nature of the problem – the boorishness, childishness, and social inpetitude of American males.
> Once again, fellas – the onus is on YOU to please women. Not the other way around. Ghetto Negroes have better wooing, and flirtation skills, than so many White males. A lot of you guys are beyond pathetic. You really have nothing to offer females of any Race. A lot of you have very little money, and you are not as physically attractive as you flatter yourselves to be. To many of you – not all – but many – your attitude towards women is the most repellent aspect of your being. It’s not women – it’s you.

As anyone can see it’s all massive amounts of misandry and shaming language with some racial rhetoric thrown in. The misandry inherent in White Nationalism goes deeper than a few comments on the internet. Where did the false rape industry start? It wasn’t with feminists. The KKK (Ku Klux Klan) had their own version of the false rape industry white women would make false accusations of black men. Drop the racial terms and it’s no different the the current feminist false rape industry. Take a look at what happened during the Rosewood Massacre. A woman lies about being beaten and raped and a random black man living in Rosewood gets lynched. Then a massive battle between white men and black men happened where at least several men got killed. Multiple men died all because a woman lied about rape, but the Rosewood Massacre is not properly recognized as being part of the false rape industry because race was involved.

The misandry in White Nationalism goes even farther than just incidents like the Rosewood Massacre. The KKK had a corresponding group for women called the Women’s KKK or WKKK. The WKKK is very similar to feminism both in action and language. (Read the link for documentation of the similarities.) All you have to do is drop the words white and black from WKKK language, and you end up with feminist language.

We have to remember that misandry is the central problem facing all men today. That’s true regardless of what race a man is. Men of all races have a great deal in common. White Nationalism tries to hide that fact effectively acting as a vehicle for the promotion of misandry to benefit (white) women. White Nationalism and other racist ideologies are misandarist and benefit no man.

American Girls: Hookers in Training

Some time ago, someone posted a link to Ke$hA's "Tik Tok" in the comments, introducing me to part of the contemporary youth culture that I usually ignore these days. I thought Ke$hA's homepage was rather amusing, what with the narwhal and howling dogs, but I didn't take it all that seriously. However, it seems that legions of young women do, and she has become an idol and a role model. Perhaps she isn't any worse than Madonna was during her heyday back in the 80s, which isn't saying much, but something has definitely changed.

Today, the girls have access to the internet and have been posting their own versions of Tik Tok, generally slutting it up in front of the camera in an effort to gain some attention. Their efforts have filled Youtube, and would appear to be a pervert's dream. On seeing some of the videos, and thinking of my own middle and high school experience, I thought "these girls are really asking for it." Things must have changed drastically in the 20-odd years since I was that age, because this kind of outright strumpetry wouldn't have been tolerated in pubescent girls back then.

All I can see coming from this is a wave of prostitution, because it seems that is exactly what these girls are training for.

Here are a couple of examples:

The above girl, who goes by "blondiewet," looks to be about 12.

The next one really skanks it up:

Jesus…

French Consider Burqa Ban

Welmer · 26 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

France, which is currently home to the largest Muslim population in Western Europe, is struggling with issues of identity and what constitutes French values. French President Nicholas Sarkozy frames the debate over the veil in feminist terms, stating that the veil is "contrary to the ideals we have of a woman's dignity." From my perspective, that is an odd rationale, because it would seem that what is most contrary to women's "dignity" is the slutty attire on display in so many Western cities. In fact, opposing the veil on the basis of feminism may eventually be a failing proposition, because the hypocrisy is so blatant that eventually most people will catch on.

Of course, most people who don't like face veiling do not see women in veils as oppressed so much as offensive. Everyone in the West knows that women who don the burqa in areas not covered by Sharia are doing so out of conscious choice, despite the feminist characterization of the issue as one of helpless, oppressed women. Where I live, in liberal Seattle, I occasionally see Somali women wearing veils, usually in line at the grocery store with a fist full of food stamps. Sometimes, I see them walking along the lake pushing strollers as well. I really could care less, although I might be a bit worried if we had a real suicide bombing problem here, as the burqa could effectively hide a lare explosive belt or vest.

However, some American women, upon seeing the veiled women, have expressed anger and contempt in my presence. They are angry at the women in the veils, and see them as a sort of tribal enemy. My take on it is that Western women don't see the Muslim men or imams as so much of a threat, but rather dislike the women.

Despite the feminist slant to attempts to outlaw the veil, my bet is that some feminists will come out and support burqas as a legitimate lifestyle choice for women. Feminism is, above all, about giving women the power to do whatever they want, whether it is dressing and behaving like a cheap whore at a party full of intoxicated young men without having to worry about one of the men "touching" her, or wearing a ninja outfit in public. It really doesn't matter what it is; if a woman somewhere wants to do it, it's OK by feminism. Therefore, I don't see a burqa ban in the West as being high on the feminist list of priorities, and Sarkozy and the other white knighting politicians aren't going to get an ounce of extra support from the feminists for their misguided efforts. On the other hand, I can imagine considerable support from ordinary French women if he simply banned it on patriotic grounds. In fact, given the preponderance of female voters, one of the most effective means to garner support might be through the politicization of style.

Seattle Biotech Company Pioneers Novel Prostate Cancer Treatment

Dendreon, a Seattle biotech company, has come out with a new drug for treating aggressive forms of prostate cancer that utilizes a patient's immune response rather than the traditional methods of surgery, radiation or chemotherapy to combat the disease. The drug, called Provenge, boosted patients' survival time some 4 months when compared to men who received standard treatment, so although it isn't a miracle cure, it does offer some benefit and solid potential.

Provenge treatment will initially be very expensive – from $50,000-$75,000 – and will likely be approved by the FDA in the near term. Dendreon's stock, already worth some $5 billion, may soar even higher if the roughly 100,000 men who develop aggressive prostate cancer per year all receive the treatment.

9th Circuit Court of Appeals Opinion in Wal-Mart Appeal

Welmer · 27 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I thought I'd host the pdf of the 9th Circuit's opinion regarding the gender bias suit against Wal-Mart for the benefit of those who might be interested. The 9th Circuit's website is pretty slow, so it's probably more convenient to download from the file from here anyway.

Here's some of the preliminary text:

> BACKGROUND
> Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint, brought on behalf of certain named plaintiffs and those similarly situated, asserts claims against Wal-Mart for sex discrimination under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Plaintiffs allege that women employed in Wal-Mart stores: (1) are paid less than men in comparable positions, despite having higher performance ratings and greater seniority; and (2) receive fewer—and wait longer for—promotions to in-store management positions than men. Plaintiffs contend that Wal-Mart's strong, centralized structure fosters or facilitates gender stereotyping and discrimination, that the policies and practices underlying this discriminatory treatment are consistent throughout Wal-Mart stores, and that this discrimination is common to all women who work or have worked in Wal-Mart stores.
> Plaintiffs sought to certify a nationwide class of women who have been subjected to these allegedly discriminatory pay and promotion policies. The proposed class consists of women employed in a range of Wal-Mart positions, from part-time entry-level hourly employees to salaried managers. The class seeks injunctive and declaratory relief, back pay, and punitive damages, but not traditional "compensatory" damages. Plaintiffs proposed that the district court certify the following class pursuant to Rule 23: All women employed at any Wal-Mart domestic retail store at any time since December 26, 1998 who have been or may be subjected to Wal-Mart's challenged pay and management track promotions policies and practices.
> After the parties had conducted extensive discovery and filed copious briefs, the district court heard oral argument. At the hearing, Wal-Mart emphasized the "historic" nature of Plaintiffs' motion, including the size of the putative class, involving women employees at Wal-Mart's 3,400 stores in 41 regions. The court acknowledged Wal-Mart's concerns but noted that, while the class size was large, the issues were not unusual.
> The district court issued an eighty-four-page order granting in part and denying in part Plaintiffs' motion for class certification. With respect to Plaintiffs' claims for equal pay, the district court granted Plaintiffs' certification motion as to issues of alleged discrimination and all forms of requested relief. With respect to Plaintiffs' promotion claim, the court's holding was mixed. The court certified the proposed class with respect to issues of alleged discrimination (including liability for punitive damages, as well as injunctive and declaratory relief); however, the court rejected the proposed class with respect to the request for back pay, determining that data relating to the challenged promotions were not available for all class members. The court also exercised its discretion to provide for notice and an opportunity for employees to opt-out of the punitive damages portion of the class.

Over One Million Women Set to Take Down Wal-Mart

Welmer · 27 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The notorious 9th Circuit US Court of Appeals has given the go-ahead for a gender discrimination lawsuit against Wal-Mart on behalf of more than a million women. The settlement could run well into the billions, which must have a battalion of attorneys salivating at the potential windfall. Originally filed by six women in San Francisco in 2001, the lawsuit has taken on gargantuan proportions. Lead attorney Brad Seligman has accused the company of discriminating against women on an ongoing basis, sweeping as many women as possible into the class action suit.

Wal-Mart spokesmen have been prostrating themselves before the feminist juggernaut, claiming that they have always given preferential treatment to female employees, but apparently there will be no mercy, as punitive damages are still on the table. Already struggling in the recession, this lawsuit could be a crippling blow to the retail giant.

If the suit is successful, it could open the doors to scores of similar class action suits brought on behalf of women against successful corporations, providing huge profits to attorneys and their female clients. In fact, it could even be seen as analogous to the lucrative field of family law, in which women – in league with their attorneys – can consume all of a man's life work in one fell blow. If this suit becomes standard practice across the US, there will be a corporate slaughter the likes of which has never yet been seen.

Unfortunately, almost all corporations have either supported or turned a blind eye to the ravages inflicted on men and children by the rise of feminism, so for those of us men who have already lived through the holocaust of feminist family law it may be difficult to sympathize with Wal-Mart. On a positive note, a lawsuit running into the billions will not pass by unnoticed by corporate titans, and we may see a new hostility to feminism emerge amongst the moneyed class.

Some Thoughts On Black Men & "Acting White"

Today we continue our ongoing examination of one of America's most curious social animals-the Black Male. But, unlike previous posts, where we look at the matter from the perspectives of employment, or relations with law enforcement, today's post will plumb the depths of territory that in my humble view, gets short shrift in the public square.

In more recent years, the notion that one reason why Black kids haven't done as well in school and by extension in life, is a result of the idea that doing so is seen as "acting White." Virtually all eyes reading this right now are familiar with those words and the ideas they generate. Prominent Black figures from Bill Cosby to Barack Obama himself, have addressed this issue. Black scholars, like the late John Ogbu, have done detailed studies of the phenomenon. Even books have been written about it, not to mention articles and chapters of larger works.

What seems to have gotten lost in the shuffle within the midst of this debate are some clarifying questions: first of all, exactly WHO among African Americans makes such a claim? We assume and lump in "kids," but the facts on the ground as we have it from test scores and other objective measures flies in the face of this assumption — as we have learned in as many weeks, Black Women consistently outscore and just do better overall in terms of education than do Black Men. From grade school to highschool and on into college, and beyond, this is easily documented. So, it's difficult to square all of this with the notion that it is Black kids who hold this "acting White" view. I posit that we need to be much more precise; it is fair to say, based not only on the aforementioned evidence but other more admittedly anecdotal but nevertheless powerful measures, that it is BLACK MALES who may indeed hold these "acting White" views.

So, if we accept and start out from that premise, more questions emerge. One of them is where precisely did this idea come from? Was it always thus in American life? Or is it a relatively recent thing that has come upon us? And in any event, a much deeper question for me is, WHY do so many Brothas take this or similar views? What's the psychology involved, the rationale, the reasoning, or the emotions that drive it? Surely, people do things for a reason, no matter how seemingly nonsensical they may be to the rest of us. Up until now, I've never really heard these questions being asked; the "default" position seems to be to wag a finger at the collective face of Black Men and shout/shame them into "acting right." Needless to say, the stats don't look encouraging in that regard.

History records that the idea of Black Men thinking that to have a rich life of the mind was akin to "acting White" is a relatively new thing in American life. Nor have Black Men always done well in school either, for a number of reasons, when compared to Black Women — indeed, the historical record is that Black Women have always tended to have more formal education than Black Men, going back a century ago and beyond. But this didn't stop Black Men from wanting to learn about the world around them. In fact, a kind of self-teaching has long been a part of the Black tradition when it came to its Males, and we can point to very well known examples who were for all intents, largely self-taught: Malcolm X, Frederick Douglass, James Baldwin, Stanely Crouch, Richard Wright, and many, many others. It would be a mistake to assume that just because a Brotha did work requiring a strong back he didn't have a strong mind as well.

So, what happened? We are now in the early 21st century, and this "acting White" business has been around in the public discourse since at least the 90s. Something took place to transform Black Men who saw learning vital to their sense of self-actualization regardless of whether they went to school or not into Black Men who are at the very least indifferent to any form of education, if not outright hostile to it.

On this score, to be sure, there will no shortage of speculation and theories flung about; many will point to the "Great Disruption" that was the 1960s and early 1970s as the cause and culprit. And in fairness, it may indeed play a role, however small or tangential. For my part, I am not entirely sure exactly what happened or precisely when, but the evidence as we have says to me that what we're dealing with isn't something chronic, but rather relatively new. And we're light years away from understanding why, which means we'll also be lightyears away from actually solving this riddle.

But I do have some thoughts to share on the matter…

After much thought on this and related questions, it occurs to me that perhaps one reason why Black Men are disengaged from education and learning, is because in so many ways, they don't see it as being worth the effort, that it is a world that for all intents and purposes is cut off from them. On this score, many Black Women are quite vociferous in their response — after all, if they were able to do it, why can't Black Men, too?

And this is a legitimate question, if for no other reason than the fact that very often such sentiments come from Women who face very slim pickings out on the mating market. While there are perennial murmurs about the need for Black Women to "broaden their horizons," the best evidence we have that that is happening is that for better or for worse, and for the foreseeable future, Black Women in aggregate see Black Men as their ideal mates. And because, like White Women, and indeed other groups of Women in modern American life, they too want a mate that shares many of the experiences, interests and outlooks on life that they have. For Women, such things are vastly important.

Hence the all-importance of college education, because it not only confers a middle class lifestyle and income, but is also is a kind of "finishing school credential" that Women find very appealing in a Man. Indeed, it is not at all unsual for a Women, regardless of color, to reject out of hand potential suitors who lack this credential, because it serves as a rough proxy for the aforementioned qualities. Of course, on this front, because the pickings for Black Women are so slim, every suitor rejected means there are even fewer ones left, regardless of their level of education.

In many ways, the gains Black Women have made seem to have come at an almost Faustian price — it is difficult to say today, in 2010, that Black Women on a whole haven't done quite well for themselves, but the "catch" was that their Men will not be able to share in their success.

Nevertheless many Black Women and even some Black Men will essentially tell Black Men to "get over it," but aside from this strategy clearly not working, the other part that they overlook is that again, a major reason why so many of them seem disinterested in learning and education is because they've "learned" through their own life experience and that of other Black Men they've known, that there is relatively little gain to be had from it, and often the cost put in outweighs the return on investment. At this point, if moral shaming doesn't work, we can turn to grids, graphs, studies and statistics, but what we fail to see here is that for so many Black Men, the perceptions they have override the "reality" we may be trying to advance in a misbegotten effort to change their minds. This is especially true when it comes to Black Women-we have to remember that they, like all Women, have been shown to be more willing to do what is required than are Men, in the main. And Men have shown that when there is little to be gained in the effort of anything, they begin to vote with their feet.

Some tend to react violently to the idea that people tend to be more interested in something when they see others like themselves doing it, too (although the whole of marketing schemes and political campaigns are built on this truism, informed as it is by psychological understanding of the human mind), but somehow, we expect Black Men to suddenly be immune to this facet of behavior and just soldier on anyway, regardless of what they've seen or witnessed in the negative. Others will attempt to argue, well, look at Obama! He's made it! Or they'll bring up other high achieving Black Men. And there's something to be said for that.

Nevertheless, these are more like Black images than real flesh and blood Black Men that other Black Men see during the course of their everyday lives. Here is where sports and entertainment – most notably Hip Hop – comes into play, especially in the case of the latter. If ever there was a kind of cultural "public enemy number one" Hip Hop is it. The sheer bromides and assaults on the artform, blaming it for everything that ails Western Civilization from virtually all sides of the sociopolitical spectrum, would in some ways be construed as silly if the charges levelled against weren't so serious. After all, Hip Hop is hardly the first form of music/culture that shook up the establishment — Rock music stands as stark witness to that fact. Still, one cannot shake the feeling that Hip Hop gets extra added scrutiny, disdain and harsh critique, because of the appearance of its performers.

At any rate, while Obama is an image on the tv screen, Jay-Z is someone much closer to home that Black Men can relate to – he is from Brooklyn, NY after all – and moreover, unlike Obama, who has to bend to the wishes of a world that has at best a guarded view of Black Men, if not an outright hostile one, Jay-Z and countless other rappers have proven that not only can they have their voices heard, but make quite successful businessmen out of themselves to boot — and most importantly, to do it all on their own terms. For this is another very important aspect of Masculinity, that Women, and this includes Black Women, who are often seen as arguably the most independent- and that is to stand apart and define oneself as a Man. I have no studies or "proof" to back me up here; but years of observation of this phenomenon coupled with my own thinking on the matter, leads me to these conclusions. Hip Hop, whether one likes it or not, gives Black Men a chance to be heard, in their own voice, in their own idiom, in a way where they define the rules of engagement, so to speak. And to add to all this, their message resonates with Men far outside the hood: record sales consistently show that the biggest purchasers of Hip Hop for some two decades have been White suburban teen and young adult Men.

So its quite understandable why so many Black Men would look to the Hip Hop and sports worlds in the way that they do; true, not all Black Men will wind up a successful rap or sports stars. But we shouldn't look too askance at such a dream; after all, there are plenty of areas of American Life that are easily as fraught with the same odds for failure. We all know scores of well-off kids who went to the best of schools and had all manner of opportunities who washed out. The same is true for the hundreds, if not thousands, of business startups who crash and burn within the first five years. The thousands of law school and medical school grads who couldn't pass the final exams needed to get them over the finish line. The scores of hopefuls who are routinely (and often harshly) rejected from American Idol. The point is that it is somewhat foolish to berate Black Male aspirations as impractical and nonsensical, when the very nature of America is to "dream."

Ironically, given the subject matter of this post, the lyrical content, delivery (or in rap parlance, "flow") and topics of so many rappers gets short shrift in favor of the art form's cruder and more crass genres, coupled with what some consider to something endemic to Hip Hop itself, its ostensible "misogyny." On this score it can't be denied that at least some rappers have some quite harsh things to say about Women, and there seems to be an entire cottage industry of young Black Women academics who "deconstruct" this and other facets of Hip Hop life and culture, often attempting to make the case for a Feminist niche within it all. Of course, what's left out in all of the reconstruction and recriminations from all sides, is the tiny little question as to whether there is any truth to what the rappers are saying on that front. Again, in light of its sales figures and those who are among its biggest purchasers, if nothing else such facts should give one pause.

At any rate, Hip Hop has shown itself to contain a kind of mental acuity and acumen that rivals some of the best song writers, poets and writers of other eras and genres. Talib Kweli's talking about his child being born, Mos Def's ruminations about the Earth's water supply, Common's take on why Socratic questioning is so important, Chuck D's many stylings on the state of the times for Brothas, and many, many other finely attuned rhyme spitters, kind of pours cold water on the notion that Black Men are turned off by education and learning. Perhaps it is the wrapping that it's presented in that's the turnoff…

In my own personal experience, I've found that many Black Men highly value learning, so long as it can be seen to benefit their life directly in some way. Perhaps then, the "acting White" phenomenon, is more a reaction to the notion of an "alien"-and a hostile one at that-concept that means little to no good in a Black Man's life?

Just a thought.

In any event, it seems clear to me that we're getting nowhere fast by pursuing the present strategy of trying to shame Black Men into "doing right." Like the late great Aaliyah said, we need a resolution.

The thoughts presented in this post today, I humbly submit, as a step in that direction.

I'm just sayin…

Comment & reply, holla.

WSJ: Kids' TV Shows Increasingly Feminized

Welmer · 27 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a tantalizing hint that the mainstream is finally beginning to take note of the emasculation of our society, the Wall Street Journal recently published an opinion piece decrying the lack of conventionally male characters on children's television programs. Written by Jonathan Last, the editorial states that "the creators of children's television choose to present strange visions of men."

Last decries the effeminate nature of male characters on kids' shows, poking fun at a few of them:

> The men on kids' shows tend to be either aged, and hence harmless, or young, and vaguely effete. Bob, Gordon and Luis—the three bulwarks of the current cast of "Sesame Street"—are all well past Social Security age. Alan, who minds the departed Mr. Hooper's store, is right behind them. The other main male characters are a teenager (Miles) and a campy tramp (Mr. Noodle).
> Hop over to cable and you'll find "Yo Gabba Gabba!," a show whose master of ceremonies is a skinny fellow named DJ Lance Rock. Wearing a clingy orange track suit, oversize hipster glasses and a tall, furry orange hat, he creeps and slinks around the screen carrying a giant boom box while the show's obnoxious theme song blares. He isn't exactly Clint Eastwood. Another popular show, LazyTown, features only two men—a hero, "Sportacus," and a villain, "Robbie Rotten," neither of whom would look out of place in a Village People tribute band.

Having kids of my own, I've definitely noticed the difference. Back in my day we had the Transformers, He-Man and GI Joe, not to mention Star Blazers, in which a giant battleship cruises through space (my favorite). Today, I suppose there are those turtles and the hedgehog, but it isn't quite the same.

What really has me curious about this article is that the WSJ, recently acquired by Murdoch, is making aggressive moves to establish itself as a rival to the NY Times. Could it be that Murdoch, canny businessman that he is, sees some advantage in bringing up the obvious problem of the suppression of masculinity, a subject that the politically correct Times is too afraid to take on?

Nevada Woman Gets Life for Lewd Acts With Child

Epoxytocin found an interesting example of what goes on in America's courtrooms, forwarding it to me and suggesting that perhaps women are no longer getting a pass on account of their sex.

Due to draconian sentencing guidelines meant to punish men, a Nevada woman received a life sentence for allowing a 13-year-old boy to fondle her breasts. Although eligible for parole in ten years, the woman's life is essentially destroyed. In the video of the sentencing, her female attorney breaks down in tears at the "injustice" done to her client. Certainly, it is harsh, but what this woman is facing is reality for American men. Nobody would shed any tears if a man were to receive the same sentence for having a girl that young touch him sexually. In fact, this happens to men all the time in the US.

Honestly, I think the sentence is excessive, and the judge appears to have the same opinion, but if women expect equality in all spheres of life, then it is necessarily just under an equalist regime.

Let the lawyer weep over the monstrosity that her sisters have helped to create, and that put her in front of a judge to make a futile statement against the brutal laws that our man-hating society put in place.

We Are All Fascists Now

Hawaiian Libertarian · 28 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Fascism should more appropriately be called Corporatism because it is a merger of state and corporate power" – Benito Mussolini

Ron Paul's latest article at LewRockwell.com gets even more specific in it's definition:

> Socialism is a system where the government directly owns and manages businesses. Corporatism is a system where businesses are nominally in private hands, but are in fact controlled by the government. In a corporatist state, government officials often act in collusion with their favored business interests to design polices that give those interests a monopoly position, to the detriment of both competitors and consumers.

Paul's article goes into detail about how Conservatives and opponents to ObamaCare are actually doing their cause harm by calling ObamaCare "socialist" or opposing Obama's agenda on the grounds that it is based on "socialism."

> When he is a called a socialist, the President and his defenders can easily deflect that charge by pointing out that the historical meaning of socialism is government ownership of industry; under the President's policies, industry remains in nominally private hands.

The key word here is nominally, which is why Paul is advocating that Obama's agenda be correctly called Corporatist.

> This also promotes the understanding that though the current system may not be pure socialism, neither is it free-market since government controls the private sector through taxes, regulations, and subsidies, and has done so for decades.

While Paul discusses this in the context of how the ObamaCare is essentially a corporatist act granting a Government enforced cartel to the insurance and pharmaceutical industries…there is another bill pending before congress that has just as far reaching consequences as health care.

The Fascists are going after our food supply.

Just who are these fascists? The nominally private corporations like Cargill, ConAgra, Kraft, Monsanto et al. And who are their Government partners in this fascist takeover attempt? The USDA's Food Safety Inspection Services (FSIS).

Why yes…the same folks that brought us the wondrous food pyramid, are now ostensibly going to protect us all from contaminated meat.

H.R. 2749: Food Safety Enhancement Act of 2009.

A website dedicated to saving small, family farms in the face of the agribusiness corporate fascists, called Farm Wars, discusses the implications of this bill in an article entitled History, HACCP and the Food Safety Con Job:

> Vested interest groups have orchestrated a legislative lullaby to hush the public's growing unease with the safety of its food supply. Their enablers in the mainstream corporate controlled media amplify a chorus of government officials and non-governmental organizations admonishing that the public must be confident that the food it buys is safe. But having confidence our food is safe is not the same as having food that is safe and wholesome to eat.

> The American public has a great and unmet need to understand the true impacts (that is, the predictable consequences) of the Food Safety Enhancement Act of 2009, before the Senates passes its version of this dangerous bill. The US Congress has a long, tragic history of passing legislation that promotes the industrialization of our food supply, effectively implementing the wishes — both stated and unstated — of agribusiness, and it's about to do it again.
> Using the pretext of food safety, those behind the Food Safety Enhancement Act seek to institute changes the American public would not condone if it understood what is at stake. The country is being duped into believing that the pseudo-scientific measures prescribed by the bill will prevent new outbreaks of food-borne illnesses when in reality FSEA will usher in a number of undesirable outcomes, none of which do a thing to improve food safety. On the contrary, these measures will permit large processors to become an essentially unregulated segment of the industry by privatizing the inspection process, and — at the same time — the new regulations will constitute a cost-prohibitive barrier for small players to remain in business, making them easy targets for indiscriminant enforcement and greater market consolidation.

The cost-prohibitive barrier is precisely the objective!

Another site also involved in the same fight, offered more details on some of the bill's provisions.

From FairFoodFight.org:

> Expanding an existing program, the FSIS wants to shore up food safety requirements by fully implementing and enforcing its 14 year old HACCP program. What is HACCP? From Wikipedia:

> "HACCP is used in the food industry to identify potential food safety hazards, so that key actions, known as Critical Control Points (CCPs) can be taken to reduce or eliminate the risk of the hazards being realized."

> This is a good idea, right? A HACCP plan describes the places in a meat processing plant or a butcher shop where food could be contaminated, and it describes what daily and hourly routine steps are taken to prevent that from happening. Cleanings, pathogen tests, pH tests, temperatures, water activity, and other food safety practices are documented by workers and managers to insure that the HACCP plan is being followed. Poultry, eggs, seafood, and juice all require HACCP programs. (Most other FDA products do not.)
> HACCP went into effect over a decade ago, but one aspect that was never fully realized was "Verification," that is, proving that a business is following its own HACCP plan, and that's part of what these new FSIS regulations address. The new approach to Verification seeks to "verify" that meat processors are testing for pathogens (among other food safety practices) and documenting those tests in order to prove that their HACCP plan is working.
> THE PROBLEM
> Local butchers and small meat operations are going to get steamrolled by these requirements.
> As just one example, small meat processors will need to collect microbial data for at least one product from each HACCP category that they process (beef, pork, chicken, lamb, etc), under the new Validation program. These products can be grouped (chicken breasts, chicken thighs, chicken sausage), but the similarities and differences in species, process, product public health risk, and food safety hazards might require further testing. If your butcher's meats vary even slightly (various sausages can be significantly different in how they're made from one recipe to another), they may be required to "verify" all their products in each and every category.
> This is exasperating and frightening to many meat shops and small- to medium-sized processors. Even small operations offer a wide variety of foods, after all (think about all the cuts and various types of meat you see in your local butcher shop or at a farmers market). But these tests are expensive, so the more cuts and varieties of meats that an operation offers, the more it will cost that butcher to keep selling those various cuts. The obvious solution won't be to invest more money for further testing, but to raise prices, reduce the variety of their product > mix, and offer only what sells very well.

> Or close up shop.

Ding ding ding ding! We have a winner!

That is precisely the point of this type of legislation! This is how competitors are regularly driven out of business by special interest groups enlisting the Government bureaucracy to grant them a market cartel.

Joel Salatin, owner of PolyFace Farms, also wrote about the way in which government regulation favors the giant, industrial agriculture corporations versus the small operation farmer, in an article entitled Everything I Want to Do is Illegal:

> Everything I want to do is illegal. As if a highly bureaucratic regulatory system was not already in place, 9/11 fueled renewed acceleration to eliminate freedom from the countryside. Every time a letter arrives in the mail from a federal or state agriculture department my heart jumps like I just got sent to the principal's office.
> And it doesn't stop with agriculture bureaucrats. It includes all sorts of government agencies, from zoning, to taxing, to food inspectors. These agencies are the ultimate extension of a disconnected, Greco-Roman, Western, egocentric, compartmentalized, reductionist, fragmented, linear thought process.
> ON-FARM PROCESSING
> I want to dress my beef and pork on the farm where I've coddled and raised it. But zoning laws prohibit slaughterhouses on agricultural land. For crying out loud, what makes more holistic sense than to put abattoirs where the animals are? But no, in the wisdom of Western disconnected thinking, abattoirs are massive centralized facilities visited daily by a steady stream of tractor trailers and illegal alien workers.
> But what about dressing a couple of animals a year in the backyard? How can that be compared to a ConAgra or Tyson facility? In the eyes of the government, the two are one and the same. Every T-bone steak has to be wrapped in a half-million dollar facility so that it can be sold to your neighbor. The fact that I can do it on my own farm more cleanly, more responsibly, more humanely, more efficiently, and in a more environmentally friendly manner doesn't matter to the government agents who walk around with big badges on their jackets and wheelbarrow-sized regulations tucked under their arms.

Sure is hard trying to compete with the factory farming corporations here in the land of the fee and the home of the debt-slave, eh?

> Our whole culture suffers from an industrial food system that has made every part disconnected from the rest. Smelly and dirty farms are supposed to be in one place, away from people, who snuggle smugly in their cul-de-sacs and have not a clue about the out-of-sight-out-of-mind atrocities being committed to their dinner before it arrives in microwaveable, four-color-labeled, plastic packaging. Industrial abattoirs need to be located in a not-in-my-backyard place to sequester noxious odors and sights. Finally, the retail store must be located in a commercial district surrounded by lots of pavement, handicapped access, public toilets and whatever else must be required to get food to people.
> The notion that animals can be raised, processed, packaged, and sold in a model that offends neither our eyes nor noses cannot even register on the average bureaucrat's radar screen — or, more importantly, on the radar of the average consumer advocacy organization. Besides, all these single-use megalithic structures are good for the gross domestic product. Anything else is illegal.

Never forget the way enforcement works too.

Big Ag corporations who violate the food safety codes that result in recalls, outbreaks of listeria or e. coli, that make consumers sick and even die?

They simply pay large fines to the Government.

Just another cost for doing business…the same fines that literally bankrupt smaller farms.

We the sheeple are caught in a fascist pincer. We get sick and malnourished from our fascist food supply, and we must than seek treatment from our soon to be enacted fascist health care system.

CNN: Women Increasingly Crude, Raunchy, Drunk

Welmer · 29 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A clueless CNN video that features commentary from Jaclyn Friedman questions whether women are going too far in their drunken debauchery. Of course, the concern is that “rapists use alcohol to facilitate sexual assault,” despite the fact that all women portrayed seem to be fairly predatory themselves. Interestingly, a girl interviewed for the piece says that women are doing this to “challenge” men, suggesting that this behavior, like all feminism, is simply another one of the endless string of shit tests American women inflict on their men.

Feminists and Alpha Males vs. Civilization

Female Masculinist · 29 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of the big puzzles of feminism is how it ever got off the ground at all. Men run the world and always have; men are smarter, stronger, and more aggressive than women; feminists could never have gotten anything they wanted if men hadn't permitted them to have it. So why did men give up their position of power?

This is only partly answered by the inventions and discoveries (made by men) that made female independence remotely possible. Birth control methods were unreliable until a few decades ago, when scientific advances by men improved them. Before a man discovered penicillin, sexual experimentation could lead to horrific incurable diseases; the well-founded terror of syphilis, not "men's need to control women's sexuality", was what used to keep the unmarried chaste. And before the many machines men invented, a lot of work required more musclepower than women have; their engaging in it was impossible before men made it easier. Not to mention that men's labor-saving inventions created enough prosperity to create more jobs that were not back-breaking manual labor. I would have a great deal more respect for feminists if any of them ever thanked men for these gifts which have made all of their current privileges possible.

The reason men allowed feminism to progress is that alpha males are not harmed by feminism, and it is alpha males who have the power to grant women the privileges of feminism.

In fact, alpha males often benefit from feminism. If women have contraception and can sleep around without censure, this means the alpha males have harems who don't whelp children he will then have to support. If women have disposable income of their own, they can and will buy piles of junk from companies owned and headed by alpha males. If women are permitted to vote, they will vote for the alpha males who 1) make them tingle and 2) promise to steal lots of stuff from the beta males and give it to them. This is what motivated alpha males in government to allow such atrocities as default mother custody, alimony, ludicrous "domestic abuse" laws, and sex discrimination lawsuits. Really, women were only given the vote because alpha males in government knew that they would win the next election or two based on the gratitude of the females they enfranchised, i.e. women would vote for the men who gave them the vote. That another decade down the road they would have to find more bread and circuses to trade for votes, and that allowing the irrational sex to vote would progressively damage the country over the years, did not concern them; politicians do not take a long view of consequences, they care only about winning the next election. In the next couple of decades we will see politicians extending the vote to twelve-year-olds so that said twelve-year-olds will vote for them.

PUA websites frequently conflate the terms "beta male" and "omega male" (or "mangina"). This is a grave error. A mangina is a doormat. A beta male is not the dominant stud who can melt a woman's panties off with a glance, but he is far from a doormat. Furthermore, beta males are the foundation of civilization.

Really, civilization could get along without alpha males if we were not hierarchical creatures; psychologically, we need to have a figurehead playing the part of leader, even if their role is ceremonial, which it often is. The fact is that beta males not only do most of the work, they make most of the discoveries and advances. Alpha males don't do this because they're too busy convincing everyone around them that they are alphas. Most of the time, the only useful functions alpha males serve is to hold the ceremonial place of "leader" and to make ginas tingle.

Polygyny and female hypergamy is the natural human social system. Women will claim that they want a man all to themselves, but what they want is the wealthy handsome playboy from the Harlequin romances to stop playing the field and commit to them exclusively. When he won't, which is almost always, women will and do settle for sharing one alpha male with several other women. On a personal level, this is more in their interest; an odalisque in a harem with two dozen other women will be better provided for than a peasant's only wife, and so will her children.

It is an irony much remarked on by PUAs that the "sexual liberation" of women has lead to a harem system: "Women want the top man…so the top man fucks lots of women. That's right – the sexual revolution, feminism, etc has resulted in a return to harems. Women, at the mercy of their own emotions, are volunteering for the modern-day equivalent of harems."

But while the sluts and alphas are having fun, this is not a good system. Polygamous societies are notoriously politically unstable. They are prone to civil wars. Further, they tend to have high levels of poverty and crime and very little scientific advance or artistic achievement.

> The most that any government (authoritarian or otherwise) can do to control the behavior of its citizens is to threaten them with death. From an evolutionary psychological perspective, as Rubin himself (2002, 120–21) recognizes, the threat of death does not carry much weight for young men in highly polygynous societies faced with the distinct possibility of total reproductive failure because of a lack of reproductive opportunities. From the perspective of the genes, total reproductive failure—not leaving any offspring—is death. Thus, for the same reasons that polygyny (and a consequent lack of reproductive opportunities) inclines men to murder, rape and assault, despite the distinct possibility of state criminal penalty, the same desperate situation can lead them to wage civil wars for potential reproductive opportunities (Kanazawa 2007). There is very little the state can do to control the behavior of young men in polygynous societies even with the threat of death.

Evolutionary Psychological Foundations of Civil Wars by Satoshi Kanazawa

Why? Well, because of their treatment of the people who make both social stability and cultural advance possible: beta males. As Roger Devlin pointed out, "No one has ever discovered a better way of employing [young men's] time and energies than by making fathers of them." With children of their own to raise and provide for – or at least the reasonable hope of such – young men will educate themselves, work hard, and submit to mind-blowingly dreary jobs instead of robbing, rioting, and raping. (Note that those three activities are common pastimes of young Muslim men, the ones always referred to by left-wing journalists as "youths".)

By denying the majority of males any stake in civilization, any incentive for good behavior, feminists and alpha males are conspiring to create a world in which violent crime is commonplace and scientific advance is doomed.

Why the Beta Male Exists

Women to Join Silent Service in 2011

Welmer · 29 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It has been 17 years since women began serving on US Navy surface warships, but until now submariners have remained entirely male. However, change is coming, as women are expected to begin serving on submarines by late 2011.

Not all submariners are thrilled about the idea. Rear Admiral Barry Bruner, Commander of Submarine Group 10, has been posting updates concerning the issue on his blog, inviting comments from current or former submariners. Bruner supports the change (that's his job), but the comments on his blog indicate that quite a few have serious reservations about the idea.

Writes Karl Newman:

> I've been underway on a SSN for extended periods with women and have observed first hand all the screwing around that goes on onboard mixed-gender surface ships. This plan to put women on the boats is a train wreck waiting to happen.

Joseph Shook:

> 1. Wives of submariners will not accept this situation…this will greatly reduce the number of those skilled, married men who now serve!
> 2. Submariners themselves…they respect women and accept, like myself, their ability to do many, if not most, Navy jobs with great skill, dedication and efficiency. It's just that it is not a proper nor conducive environment in which to combine the sexes…much like SEAL training. Extensive and expensive, plus time consuming, modifications will need to be made on those boats now operable and the submarine service and Navy cannot afford any of this. They are going to be hard pressed to maintain operational commitments as it is.
> 3. There have been two recent events, USS Truxtun, DDG-103, where the Commanding Officer, a married man, father of two and carreer officer, was just relieved for fraternizing with a junior female officer from his ship, and aboard the USS Cowpens, CG-63, where yet another career Navy officer and the Commanding Officer, this time a woman, Capt. Holly Graf, misused and possibly hazarded her vessel by "drag racing" with another Navy ship. These both sadly indicate how human we are, and intensify, I feel, how, where conditions are even more acute and living quarters closer and more confined, people should not be subjected to any more pressure than already exists. It won't work and I know from contact with a large number of submarine veterans and current sailors and officers, over 99% do not wish to see it happen, all knowing it will not work as envisioned by whatever idiots have thought it up.

> It is very close quarters in Submarines and a simple thing as passing in passageways will invite unwanted contact. IT WILL HAPPEN, NO MATTER HOW GOOD THE DISCIPLINE.
> These people making the decisions need to do a 60-day patrol to understand how it works. They need to go thru Qualification. Qualifications alone will promote opportunities for mixed gender.
> The other element I have not seen mentioned is the uprising of the wives of the married Submariners. They will give their man a choice, to sea with women or your family. If this comes to pass, I predict in a short time there will be gross disqualification of men from Submarines. And if that doesn't work, they will leave the service at EAOS.

Even some women think it's a bad idea:

> Given what is known about current non-deployment rates due to pregnancy among enlisted women as well as officers, what is the Navy's estimate of comparable non-deployment rates of female officers and enlisted women on submarines? (As the Washington Times article made clear, extensive programs to discourage Navy pregnancies have failed—rates have increased.)
> How many mid-ocean evacuations are expected to occur on an annual basis and how will these evacuations be accomplished in remote areas; i.e., under the Polar icecap?
> If a submarine CO is faced with the operational necessity to continue an undersea mission, despite high risks of birth defects for a newly-discovered embryonic "passenger"–what does the Navy expect the skipper to do? (Elevated carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide in the constantly recycled atmosphere are safe for adults but not for embryos in the earliest weeks of life.)
> WRT life-threatening ectopic pregnancies, which are not statistically rare, how many women are likely to permanently lose reproductive capability due to botched undersea surgeries or worse—how many are expected to die due to hemorrhage in conditions offering no options for immediate evacuation via mid-ocean helicopter?
> Elaine Donnelly
> President,Center for Military Readiness

Some major issues are raised by the above commenters, including the obvious problem of jealous wives and pregnant crew members, but I didn't see anyone mention the issue of sexual harassment suits or rape accusations. If there's anywhere that these will be generated it is on a submarine — a giant metal phallus plunging through the depths. The visual symbolism alone will sensationalize any accusations (no, I'm not kidding — people really are like that).

Sailors will inevitably be dragged before courts martial for alleged rape, crews will be divided even while under polar ice, etc.

Putting women in our submarines is a purely political move supported by an administration that looks increasingly feminist with each passing day. Despite stated support at the top, sailors and veterans think it's a bad idea. Looking at the situation objectively, I would have to agree.

Misandry In The Depopulation Agenda Conspiracy Theory

There are many different types of conspiracy theories about many subjects. However, most conspiracy theory you will encounter follows a "standard model". This "standard model" conspiracy theory usually includes some type of unified group of elites such as the NWO or the Illuminati. In many "standard model" conspiracy theories you will find demons, reptile aliens, or grey aliens really running the show. The "standard model" conspiracy theory almost always has some type of "depopulation agenda". The unified group of elites in the conspiracy theory want to reduce the population of the human race radically. Various final population numbers such as 500 million and 1.2 billion are given. The reason usually given that the unified group of elites supposedly want to eliminate that much of the human race is to better enslave the survivors.

The depopulation agenda conspiracy theory has quite a few problems. The biggest is the lack of hard evidence. The depopulation agenda is usually connected by a conspiracy theories to how feminist a society is, meaning that feminism is used to collapse fertility rates along with abortion and birth control. However, no such correlation exists. While feminized societies in the first world have seen their fertility rates collapse, this isn't limited to places where feminism is prevalent. Japan's fertility rate collapsed without feminism. Fertility rates even in the Islamic world have collapsed. For example, thirty years ago Iran's fertility rate was 9 children/woman. Now it's 1.8. Feminism has no influence in the Islamic world. Abortion and birth control aren't used there either. Yet fertility rates are collapsing in the Islamic world the same as they are in feminized countries.

Another problem is that events after a depopulation event historically do not happen the way the depopulation agenda conspiracy theory claims. The black death was an event that caused depopulation. After the black death the nobility was not able to tighten the screws on their populations. In fact the opposite happened. Wages and other compensation went up for the survivors. This is consistent with supply and demand in economics. There was a major drop in the supply of labor so compensation of the remaining laborers went up. The elites that want depopulation would run into the same problem since they can't annul the basic laws of economics.

However, all of those are side issues for us. In the future the depopulation agenda conspiracy theory will be used as a vehicle of misandry against men. So far it has only been used to attack feminism (and certain environmental issues). When it has been used to attack feminism, its attack has only been on aspects of feminism related to abortion and birth control. It's fits in very well with conservative female supremacism which only attacks that portion of feminism and completely avoids what is happening to men. Conservative female supremacists go as far to say that feminism actually benefits men and that women are the only "real victims" of feminism. They will say that feminism "allows" to avoid "responsibility" in creating families and having children. (Of course, this is absurd since there is no responsibility to create a family and/or have children, just to take care of the children you already have.)

Due to the misandry in churches, many men have left the churches. On top of that due to marriage 2.0, many men are part of the marriage strike. This extends into the churches as well. Divorce is just as common in the church as outside of it. That is one of the reasons for the fear that conservative female supremacist women have of not having enough children. As we have seen, conservative female supremacist women and their white knights have not fixed the divorce system or created incentives for men to marry. Instead they use more and more shaming language. Since progressively using more and more shaming language isn't have the effect they want they will need to up their shaming language. The depopulation agenda conspiracy theory will allow them to do that.

The conservative female supremacist women and their white knights will claim that the marriage strike, men's rights, MGTOW and related ideas are all part of the depopulation agenda. Their "evidence" will be that men who have discovered these ideas aren't getting married and having children. They will try and club men over the head with the idea that we're voluntarily following the Illuminati in their depopulation agenda and that we need to man up and get married and have kids to fight the Illuminati. They will claim that the marriage strike, men's rights, and MGTOW are Illuminati ideas to continue the depopulation agenda. Whenever a man points out what a disaster marriage and many other things having to do with women have become, he will be told to “man up” because he’s failing to fight the Illuminati. If a man is a victim of paternity fraud, the divorce industry, has his kids taken away etc. they will say that we all have to make sacrifices to fight the Illuminati. Since the Illuminati is a fictitious concept, conservative female supremacists can ascribe whatever motivation they like to the Illuminati which they will use to claim that any man who isn’t obeying them is a tool of the Illuminati.

While many conservative female supremacist women and their white knights will use this form of absurd shaming language in the future, most of them will not completely believe it. That does not matter to us. Even though they may not believe it, they will still use it out of desperation. While this will probably happen, it probably won’t be any more effective as other forms of shaming language are now. If anything it will be less effective since in addition to sounding crazy, shaming language has been becoming less and less effective over time.

Sandra Bullock Gains Accolades for Becoming Single Mother and Divorcing at the Same Time

Welmer · 30 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the perverse world of American celebrity drama, divorce and infidelity have long been the norm. Unfortunately, the rest of America – particularly the female segment – has been following suit.

In an article in the True/Slant online media outlet writer Lisa Todorovich holds Sandra Bullock up as an example of someone who has successfully maintained a sympathetic image by simultaneously divorcing and adopting a child. It would be difficult to blame Bullock for divorcing her husband Jesse James given his infidelity, but is it really a good idea to divorce and become a single mother at the same time? This would be akin to a woman deliberately getting pregnant while she knows that she is about to split up with her husband.

Todorovich tells it below:

> …when the tattooed nightmare hit, she told People, she grabbed a bag, took baby Louis and got the hell out of Dodge, keeping out of sight while the Category 5 storm swirled around her. And it sounds like her organizational skills in planning how she'd stay out of sight are nothing short of remarkable.
> She's reportedly filed for divorce, saying she was totally blindsided by the scandal. Jesse James has reportedly given up parental rights to little Louis, and she'll finalize the adoption as a single parent, though she'll continue to co-parent James' three kids.

It's true that Bullock had been trying to adopt a child for years, and this may simply be a case of unfortunate timing on her part, but Todorovich holds it up as a fortuitous convergence of events: dump the guy and run off to be a single mom and the world will love you! I'm pretty sure that's the lesson young women will take away from it as well.

The idea that becoming a single mother is a triumphant thing is one of the most disgusting aspects of American culture. Not only does it deny the importance of a father in raising a child, it also denies the reality that single motherhood is no walk in the park, and the huge demands it places on mothers and children are not good for children – and hence society – in the long run.

We have to accept that, as absurd as it may be, celebrities are role models for the great masses, and when they send the wrong messages to the people that admire them there will be consequences for all of us. Perhaps Bullock should declare a commitment to finding a man to participate in the raising of her adopted baby boy. If she were to do so, then she would truly be worthy of respect.

On "Whining"

Jack Donovan · 1 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Any man who spends any amount of time writing or speaking about a real or perceived injustice will eventually be accused of "whining."

Men are particularly susceptible to the whining charge because it is an insult to their manhood, a smear on their honor. An inveterate whiner is impotent, incompetent, dependent, helpless, childlike, lazy and not in control of his own destiny. He is a weak and colicky creature, not quite a man, unable to assert his own will, crying for attention and casting about for anyone to blame for his failures and his circumstances but himself. Men tend to loathe victim politics for this reason – to play the victim means relinquishing control. Like the twelve-stepper, he admits he is powerless. Unless this admission is sanctioned by his peers, other men will distance themselves from his act of submission to avoid "contact emasculation."

The whining charge is "shaming language," but sometimes men should be ashamed of themselves. I'd rather be ashamed of myself for failing to demonstrate a virtue that I hold in high regard than I would be regarded as "shameless." A man who has no shame has no virtue and no conscience, or he is a liar.

But if we agree that there is such a thing as justice, even if we suspect it is somewhat subjective, then unless we believe we live in a perfectly just world, it follows that there is legitimate injustice. In a society that seems to be enamored with the notion of "social justice" one might think that any man who points out injustice or who seeks justice for others would rightly be regarded as heroic. And he usually is, unless he is pointing out perceived injustices against those who may only be regarded as the architects of injustice.

In America today, men and whites are regarded as the primary architects of injustice. White men, it is assumed, have been accorded so much privilege by birthright that any perceived injustices against them should be regarded as slights or perhaps even just correctives. Take it from the white man; he can afford it. If he complains, he's a whiner. According to the establishment rhetoric he has so many advantages that no matter what we do to him it is his own fault if he doesn't succeed.

It's hard to deny that it is still good in some ways to be a white man. But it ain't all it used to be. Boys today are raised in a world far, far removed from the good old boys club. Truth be told they really didn't always have it that great anyway — the life of a white coal miner a century ago could hardly be called "privileged." But even if, for the sake of argument, white men had always ruled the world together, free from personal sacrifice, hardship or responsibility, from the back porch of some golden country club…they clearly don't anymore. Things are different now, legally and socially. Isn't fair to say that this group of men might actually face some legitimate hardships or injustices? Wouldn't any other position be blatantly racist sexism?

I've argued that seeking victim status and a place at the national grievance table is far from desirable.

If you're facing some legitimate hardships or injustices, there must be an honorable way to speak about them. But, because inborn privilege in all areas will continue to be assumed whether reality-based or completely theoretical, and other groups stand to lose ground if Western Men regain it, men will continue to be called whiners by some no matter what they say or how they say it. These sorts of accusations can more or less be ignored. Men will also call each other whiners to make themselves feel better about their own shortcomings — it's a form of chest-thumping that should be taken with a grain of salt.

However, it's worth trying to define what whining really is. Because while every man whines a little bit sometimes, no man wants to be a whiner. Where do you draw the line?

Real* whining is infantile.

Whining is a cry for sympathy on one's own behalf, as if from the mouth of a babe. It says, "I can't because…" and demonstrates helplessness and impotence because it takes no responsibility for changing one's own circumstances.

There are legitimate grievances in life, and there are legitimate reasons to draw attention to one's own hardships. Sometimes there really are powerful forces working against you, or major obstacles in your path. The difference between whining and acknowledging a problem is that the man who is acknowledging a problem also demonstrates that he is doing everything within his own power to overcome that obstacle or to make the best of the hand he's been dealt. The whiner rationalizes and blames without taking responsibility for any wrongdoing or poor judgment on his own part, and makes no sincere effort to improve his own circumstances — he cries out and expects others to make sacrifices to come to his rescue.

A matter-of-fact statement of a problem cannot be considered whining.

Unless you are asking for something. Sympathy is something. And asking is begging.

A call to arms is not whining.

If you are identifying an obstacle and trying to enlist others who face the same obstacle to work together to do something about it, you are taking responsibility for changing your circumstances. The people who created the obstacle or who benefit from it in some way may call this whining, but they are merely protecting their own interests by dismissing your concerns.

Real* whining is self absorbed.

Real whiners don't care that other people have problems, too. Whiners are excessively focused on their own problems. The following passage about poor men in postwar Japan from Confessions of a Yakuza came to mind:

> In that world, there were a few things you just never said. One was "I'm hungry"; the others were "I'm cold" and "I'm hot." As far as being hungry was concerned, they were all in the same boat, so long as it was a kind of competition to see who could bear it the longest. If any of the men standing around there complained of being hungry, he'd be treated as an outsider, a slob who didn't have the guts to stick it out. They were all barely keeping going as it was, and as for someone to talk about food would have been the last straw.

No one wants to hear your problems, especially when they are in the same boat. Commiserating is an undignified but understandable feature of human nature. One-sided whining in the company of other people who have the same (or worse!) problems is obnoxious.

Calling attention to the problems of others is definitely not whining.

It is impossible to whine on the behalf of someone else. Speaking up to correct real or perceived injustices is a noble gesture (or at least an attempt at one). Others may disagree with your aims, with your opinions, with your logic, or with your assessment of the situation – but if they accuse you of whining on the behalf of someone else, they don't deserve to be taken seriously.

If you have faced injustices in the past, and overcame them, and are telling your story to elicit public support for change so that others do not have to face the same hardships, that is not really whining either.

Sometimes, altruistic statements are obviously a front for those who want to become "victim celebrities." Some people will exploit or even manufacture hardships to get attention. When that's the case, it's not as much whining so much as cynical, opportunistic and dishonorable. And usually, it's not hard to spot. Think about Oprah Winfrey and the majority of her perpetually "recovering" celebrity friends who luxuriate in their own melodramatic miseries to increase their status within a community of professional victims.

Social criticism is not whining.

Social criticism is social criticism.

In basic terms, social criticism is, “Here’s some bullshit, here’s why it is bullshit, and here’s why I’d like to see it change to improve our society.”

Whining is “Here’s some bullshit that affects me and here’s why I want you to feel sorry for me and take care of me.”

It’s important to be able to separate legitimate charges of whining from general self-interested bitchiness, knee-jerk reactions, and attempts to manipulate or silence debate. All charges of whining are not equally valid, and knowing when to let other people’s bullshit roll off your back allows you to devote your energy to more productive pursuits.

Swedish Chick Flick Playing in US

Welmer · 1 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Girl With the Dragon Tattoo, a movie based on the book by dedicated Swedish Communist Stieg Larsson, is now playing in the US. Surprisingly, I haven't seen the film mentioned by any feminist bloggers, as Larsson's primary character is a hardcore Riot Grrrl type with facial piercings, tattoos, bisexual tendencies and a hefty dose of homicidal rage. According to director Niels Oplev, main character Lisbeth Salander is a "squatter, punker, hacker." Unlike most squatters and gutterpunks I've known, rather than being addled by daily infusions of malt liquor, crank and cheap Mexican heroin, she has a photographic memory and is well-versed in martial arts. She also solves crimes committed by sadistic misogynists, who are the stock bad guys in Marxist-influenced Larson's books.

In fact, the original title of the book the film is based on was "Men Who Hate Women," but some thought that might be a bit too cliché in the US, where it is the standard theme (and might as well be the title) of daytime TV shows such as Steve Wilkos. Being a feminist film, it has naturally garnered only positive reviews written by female no-names — probably because nobody else cared enough to watch the movie.

Weighing in for the NY Times, Manohla Dargis writes:

> More seductive to some, Salander is also a victim turned avenger, who, rather than taking her traumatic past out on herself in classic female style, say, by cutting, externalizes her rage. She doesn't take anything lying down, including sex and violence. She's the top dog in bed as well as in the streets, where she follows the creed that it's better to die on your feet than on your knees.

I wonder, do Swedes take this garbage seriously? Even American women might be embarrassed by how far comrade Larsson takes it.

Fortunately, I found another review, written for the New Yorker, that sheds a bit more critical light on the subject:

> Why can't Lisbeth, if her old laptop is broken, claim a new one, using a quaint process that the rest of us call "insurance," and thus save herself the bother of being tortured? The answer is that Oplev has not just thrills to purvey but anxieties to air. His film is an adaptation of the novel by the late Stieg Larsson, the first of a trilogy, which has sold by the wagonload around the world. Larsson was a reporter, like Blomkvist; he specialized in exposing the activities of the far right, and his fiction is concerned, to the brink of obsession, with cruelties of every stripe. The Swedish title of the book translates as "Men Who Hate Women," and Lisbeth's private history—which, unsurprisingly, was riven by familial abuse—is linked to the Vanger saga not by any causal logic but simply by a vague, insistent dread of the tyrannical.

So Larsson the Leninist has an axe to grind. How surprising…

When you scrape the cover off of a feminist mangina, it's curious how often you'll find a Bolshevik maggot squirming in the muck.

Here's the trailer:

I'm sure we'll all be rushing out to buy tickets.

The U.N. is the World's Largest Exporter of Feminism

Hawaiian Libertarian · 1 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In Pro-Male/Anti-Feminist Tech's latest article, Misandry In The Depopulation Agenda Conspiracy Theory, the comment thread got off into a little tangent regarding conspiracy theory about whether or not feminism is or is not indeed a movement primarily about population control. While it is an interesting debate, one fact remains: the primary means of spreading feminist ideology around the world is through the U.N.'s NGOs.

Many assistance programs offered to impoverished third world countries are offered by the U.N. organizations like the IMF, WHO etc. with "Strings attached." Often times, these 'Strings" are feminist policy proscriptions – allowing the UN NGO's to administer birth control and/or abortion "services", before the assistance is allowed to be "given."

This has also lead to a clash of opposing ideologies – the liberal, feminist morality that is diametrically opposed to countries who's populations are still practitioners of patriarchal-based, mono-theistic religion.

Reason magazine recently posted an article about women's rights in Iran. In it, Iranian feminists protested that the ruling regime of Iran has refused to sign the UN's CEDAW:

> The letter refers to Iranian laws that gender-equality groups say discriminate against women. These include statutes relating to such matters as divorce, child custody, education, and the ability to choose a husband.
> Women have been "arrested, beaten, and imprisoned for peacefully seeking change of such laws," the letter says. "The Iranian government will certainly use [CSW membership] to curtail the progress and advancement of women."

Look at what the Iranian feminsts are citing when they refer to discrimination and "advancement" with regards to CEDAW: "…divorce, child custody, education, and the ability to choose a husband."

Let's review the stated purpose of CEDAW:

> The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), adopted in 1979 by the UN General Assembly, is often described as an international bill of rights for women. Consisting of a preamble and 30 articles, it defines what constitutes discrimination against women and sets up an agenda for national action to end such discrimination.

Now, granted, most rational men of the West don't support the Iranian regimes supposed enforcement of feminist oppression (the Reason article has the pictures of women being beaten and executed for their offenses), nevertheless, it's plainly obvious that the UN Feminist agenda is clearly an agenda of exporting the exact same policies the feminists have promoted in the West: abortion rights, no-fault divorce, default child custody for women.

The religious-based countries look at our popular culture, our portrayal of promiscuous women and the resulting broken homes…and they want no part of it. While many practices of vastly different cultures are barbaric when viewed through the lense of Western ideology, the UN feminists merely highlight these sorts of abuses as the justification for exporting the ENTIRE feminist agenda to a given country or culture.

Under the guise of combating the practices of foreign cultures such as widows being burned on their husband's funeral pyres, beatings for immodesty, execution for adultery, having the misfortune of being raped resulting in "honor-killings," or female genital circumcision — which most Westerner's would agree are all barbaric and abuses of women's basic human rights — the UN feminists conflate "equality" — the right for women to abort their children at will, default child custody, the right to no-fault divorce, and all the other society-wide corrupting aims of Western feminism – with fighting all of the other barbaric cultural practices of third-world countries.

Note this pro-CEDAW political cartoon from the Women's International League For Peace and Freedom:

Copyright 2002 by Signe Wilkinson

Note the implications: "Ratifying the International Women's Rights Treaty will undermine Traditional Families" juxtaposed with a sign listing: "Traditional Bride Burning, Wife Stoning and Genital Mutilation."

Ahhhhh yes. Because everyone knows TRADITIONAL FAMILIES is nothing more than abuse, torture, murder and enslavement of women!

The Feminists that played a pivotal role in implementing their misandrist, patriarchy-destroying (i.e. family destroying) policies here in the West, are trying to do the same thing to the rest of the world through the U.N.

General Orders Soldiers not to Get Pregnant, Female Senators Outraged

Welmer · 2 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This is a somewhat old story, but in light of the recent controversy over the new submarine policy, it appears relevant. In December, Major General Anthony Cucolo issued an order to his soldiers to refrain from getting pregnant or impregnating other soldiers. Pregnancies have been an issue in Iraq, with a woman under Cucolo's command getting pregnant in Iraq every couple weeks, and a roughly equal number of women getting pregnant immediately before deployment and having to be sent home upon discovery of the fact. Because 1,682 women are under Cucolo's command, the pregnancy rate would work out to over 3% per year, which is significant, if not crippling.

Some of the pregnancies are a result of adultery and fraternization, both of which are crimes in the military, so the pregnancies have an effect that goes beyond the female soldier who must be sent home. Fortunately for the Army, women can be sent home individually.

However, this is relevant to the submarine issue, because if a submarine had only 10 women onboard, and the pregnancy rate was the same as it is among Cucolo's troops, a half year deployment would stand roughly a one in six chance of being interrupted by a pregnancy, meaning that for every six subs deployed, one would have to either steam home or surface to evacuate an impregnated crew member. If half of a sub's crew were female, interruption due to pregnancy would become highly probable on each mission. Imagine what that would do for national security to have multibillion dollar vessels, equipped with ballistic missiles, devoted mainly to ferrying pregnant women around the high seas.

Nevertheless, four female senators, including Barbara Boxer of California, Barbara Mikulski of Maryland, Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire, and Kirsten Gillibrand of New York, wrote a letter to General Cucolo, excoriating him for the order banning pregnancies. Of course, NOW butted in as well, with President Terry O'Neill chiding Cucolo, saying "How dare any government say we're going to impose any kind of punishment on women for getting pregnant."

It is instructive to note that the women complaining about the policy aren't concerned about combat effectiveness, but rather that the policy is "demeaning" and restrictive. It certainly does raise the question of whether the United States can – or should – maintain its status as a global power when feminist concerns about the self-esteem of female soldiers take priority over matters of war at the highest levels of government.

Manhood Academy: Special Ed at Best

Dr. Paul · 2 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is characterized by one primary and toxic element.

The women's movement failed to self police.

By valuing power over principles, and unity over legitimacy, they coalesced around malevolent elements that would ultimately define, and disgrace, their cause. Rather than remaining true to an ostensibly reasonable call for inclusion, they mutated into a bald faced grab for female centricity. They became the very sexist louts they claimed to abhor.

As a result, gender feminism is not the light of reason, but much more like a burning cross, issuing a grotesque, dystopian glow; a suitable backlight for an Orwellian nightmare.

I know, not all feminists are like this. But until the voices of those supposed "not all's" break their convenient and conspicuous silence, this is all the mention they will get, which is more than they deserve.

There is a lesson here for the men's rights movement, and one we need to observe, in my opinion, with thoughtful diligence. And as fortune would have it, we now have just that sort of opportunity.

It is a training exercise in moral housekeeping courtesy of The Manhood Academy, a website that is flying the banner of men's rights, and claims to promote advocacy for men, but actually does nothing more than hide a couple of fascist pigs beneath a thin veneer of social consciousness.

At the core of their "philosophy" is an e-book entitled Principles 101, Feminism, Manhood and You. The title is the most succinct thing about it. The contents are like an assortment of cut outs from internet discussions pasted together in a stereotypic fit by a tweaking meth freak. As a result it reads like a plane (a loose thesis) circling an open field in search of a landing strip (a cogent description), and runs out of fuel before even making the initial approach.

As far as I was able to extrapolate from the jumbled maze of irrelevancies, it all boils down to a few central points.

1. Men are superior to women in every way and have the right, and duty, to subjugate them- by any means necessary.

2. Any form of majority rule (or human decency) gets in the way of this. We need masculine dictatorship, Manhood Academy style.

3. They are willing, hoping rather, to teach other men to be just as screwed up as they are, and turn a buck in the process.

When I say they, I am referring to the sites admins, who go by the pseudonyms of Professor Plum and Dr. LeDice. In the book they support their ideas with several gems of Academy wisdom, oh hell, lets call it *his*dom for the sheer manly thrill of it. Here's Doc's and Prof's central tenets, in their words:

- Simply put, manhood is your authority- to govern the lives of others, especially women.
- Do not tolerate disorderly behavior from women. (Paul's note: "disorderly" appears to be interchangeable with "disobedient")
- Allowing women to vote is no different than allowing children to govern themselves.

And, in one of my favorite passages, the authors take a shots at Angry Harry and yours truly for apparently not being willing to dwell on the "superior strength and intelligence of males." p. 45 Radio personality Tom Leykis takes a hit as well for distracting men from their "loss of authority" with women by saying that sitting down to pee

Hey, I don't make this stuff up. Go read for yourself if you have time to waste. Or, if you set your watch back 100 years, it may prove to be a home away from home.

Now, there are some snippets throughout the text that ring true. Nothing new, mind you, mostly the standard critique of political correctness and feminist ideology. Most of it in some form or another could be found in the comment sections of any MRM forum going back at least 15 years. But even those tidbits of accuracy are wasted. Whatever truth these morons possess is as useful as a Stradivarius to a man with no arms.

One of feminisms most successful hoodwinks was that it convinced the world that the <1% of men who are real deal sloping brow bullies are somehow representative of men in general. It is a lie I have refuted with so much regularity over the years that I had all but forgotten that some of these guys are actually out there.

And now a couple of them are waving our flag. The first two words at the top of their home page are "Men's Rights." When I read it I wanted to hurl.

One might ask why all the fuss. Why give any press to or pay any attention to a couple of rejects on the internet? The place is full of them. It is a fair question that deserves an answer.

Actually it deserves a couple of answers.

One, as messy as it can get, we do have the responsibility to do what feminists won't, e.g. pursue justice, not domination, and do so without practicing the bigotry we are fighting. That's the simple part.

Another reason is that this stuff can hurt us if we are not careful.

In a totally innocent effort to support the idea of examining the effects of feminism on men, Dr. Miles Groth, who hosted the recent Symposium on Male Studies at Wagner College, made a comment to the Manhood Academy forum in which he stated the general idea that literature that pursues that course of inquiry was suitable to be evaluated for inclusion in a male studies program.

Doc and Prof Manhood played it though, just as though Professor Groth had given them an honorary doctorate, and the next thing you know, the "endorsement" is being "exposed" over at the Daily Kosby some writer named Angry Mouse, as proof that the male studies initiative is about oppressing women.

I have had the pleasure of speaking with Dr. Groth on several occasions, and working with him on the articles he publishes at Men's News Daily. Any idea that he is interested in subjugating women would come as a complete shock to me.

In responding to the Kos article. Dr. Groth told me the following:

"The authors of Principles 101 took my comment entirely out of context. I was simply supporting the idea that all materials addressing the effects of feminist ideology on men should be reviewed for inclusion in male studies curricula. It was not a direct endorsement of Principles 101, which I had not read. Upon reviewing the material in that book, I can only conclude it is promoting a misguided and now certainly dangerous perspective on boys and men."

And for the record, Dr. Groth's statement is consistent with every bit of experience I have with him.

I have to hand it to Angry Mouse over at Kos. She played a good round of gotcha, with a major assist from the faculty at Mantard School. She even blocked off quotes from the book under Groth's name, as though those specific words had been read and endorsed by him, though no such thing ever happened.

Sometimes lessons come hard, as I am sure Miles Groth just found out. I am sure he would do that one over. But I hope we are all paying attention. The men's movement is not just playing comment wars any more in obscure forums populated by opinionated spectators of a growing cultural battle. The movement is actually moving now, and where we have always been targets for condescension and ridicule, those little cap pistols will be replaced by much bigger guns. Even a totally innocent misstep like the one from Dr. Groth will be seen as a cut in which to pour salt. It will be exploited the same way we see gaffs by politicians played in the media.

Every vulnerability, real, perceived, or fabricated, will be played against us in a major league game of dirty pool that will make Kos's antics look like nothing.

Expect it. Count on it. And be prepared to draw lines.

Now would be a good time. Allow me to respectfully suggest that if you are an MRA blogger and/or activist, that you go on record about this one. If you link to them, please consider removing it. If you visit the site, please consider there are better options that don't put you in the company of the mentally unemployed.

There are enough MRA's, and the numbers are growing, that we don't have to defend every idiot that can start a website and say he's against feminism. Indeed, things are getting to the point that if we aren't careful about that, it is going to really do some damage.

Let's do what they didn't and what they won't. Let's go on the record that we stand for something greater than this lunacy. Let's take out the trash and keep our house in order.

Reader Poll: Dealing With Manosphere Warfare

Welmer · 3 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last few months, I've received something of a crash course in online politics and how to manage them on a website/forum. I can't say I'm an expert yet, but I've learned a thing or two.

First, forums are endless trouble. Managing passions and disagreements is a thankless job, and it never ends. If one were to devote all the time needed for this, publishing would be impossible, but publishing is our primary endeavor here at The Spearhead. In fact, I'd like to publish as many opinions as possible, even if those opinions make some people angry.

Unfortunately, when people get really worked up, the comment threads start to intimidate and bother a number of regular readers, and that's a problem. Without its dedicated readers, The Spearhead would be nothing more than another random opinion blog out of millions. As the publisher, I, personally, owe it to these people to deliver the content they come for, and to ensure that their experience is not muddied by the online equivalent of trench warfare in the comments.

Still, I'd like to give the passionate people out there an opportunity to do battle in the war of ideas.

So the question is: how do I accommodate both?

Zed came up with the idea of having a "fight club" in the forum, and that's a good concept. In fact, if The Spearhead were purely a forum it would probably work pretty well, but this site is primarily an online magazine, and people really want to comment on the articles. The fight club is therefore neglected. So I've decided to take Zed's idea and adapt it to fit The Spearhead's publishing model.

Because the magazine article comments are the most popular discussion medium, I came up with the idea of allowing one controversial piece per week with a very loose application of the commenting policy (i.e. only the most egregiously offensive comments, such as photoshopped porn and the like, will be deleted). It will also be my policy not to take any responsibility for comments on these articles, so those who choose to participate will be on their own whether I sympathize with them or not. In other articles' threads, flaming will be promptly suppressed and the rules enforced with considerably more vigor. I suppose I could create a category and call it Thursday Throwdown, Tuesday Night Fight, or something along those lines. If one party in the manosphere is attacking another, there will be an opportunity to respond. Requirements for submissions are only that a modicum of decency (avoid pointless obscenity) is observed, the subject is not tangential, there is no advocacy of crime, the writing is passable and not insane, and any factual statements are backed up. Otherwise, fire away.

I don't know if this will work, but I'm willing to give it a try.

However, before I implement this policy, I'd like our readers' opinion, so I've posted a poll below. I will place a good deal of weight on the results of the poll, so I'd appreciate it if our readers would take the time to vote. The poll will be open for one day.

The Wisdom of the Ancients

Something that always strikes me afresh whenever I wade deeply into history is how human nature does not change. If you read about the Romans as they were 2,000 years ago, or the Greeks 2,500 years ago, one invariably comes away with the feeling that we are fundamentally not so different from them, despite the accumulated knowledge and nifty gadgetry currently at our disposal.

If human nature has remained essentially static since the advent of the Bronze Age, then the same issues between the sexes that we have now had already arisen back then. However, ancient society addressed and dealt with these issues in a completely different manner, of course, resulting in a balance of power the total opposite of the one in modern Western culture. How did it get that way? I'll get to that in a moment…

I was reacquainting myself with Edith Hamilton's "Mythology" recently, and I noticed a theme running through many of the myths, serving as a motive back-story to the primary tale. In these myths, mortal women who submitted to advances from a particular god proceeded to suffer accordingly:

• Io and Zeus – First turned into a cow by Zeus to shield him from his wife's wrath, then she was imprisoned and guarded by the hundred-eyed Argus, then chased by stinging flies over vast distances.

• Antiope and Zeus – She subsequently abandoned her illegitimate offspring on a mountaintop.

• Callisto and Zeus – She was transformed into a bear to be killed by her own son until she was turned into the constellation Ursa Major.

• Semele and Zeus – She died because she insisted on beholding Zeus in his full glory.

• Leto and Zeus – Abandoned by Zeus, and exiled by everyone else, she wandered the earth aimlessly until her children were born.

• Danae and Zeus – She subsequently bore a child that killed her own father.

•Tyro and Poseidon – She abandoned her children to protect herself but was nonetheless spurned by her cuckolded husband.

• Coronis and Apollo – She was killed by his sister Artemis when she cheated on Apollo with a mortal.

Contrasting with these was a story on the other side, in which Marpessa refused the advances of Apollo from the first, preferring a mortal, and consequently lived happily ever after.

There are a lot of tales like this. Often they are explained by scholars as a makeshift attempt at melding disparate belief systems together as various Hellenic tribes migrated, clashed and mingled with other tribes. But this time I gleaned a new insight that permitted me to form a different hypothesis.

A lot of keystrokes have been logged describing the "alpha" male and his irresistible appeal to women. Readers are familiar with all that, so there is no need to linger on that topic. I would merely remind the reader of the axiom that most women would rather have 15 thrilling minutes with an alpha than 15 tedious years with a beta.

Here's what occurred to me as I was reading the myths: the gods were the ultimate alphas.

If women are hypergamous, then their greatest fulfillment would come from getting banged by one of the Olympians. These perfectly formed, handsome, virile, immortal, powerful beings were the male ideal fully realized, as all the Greco-Roman deities were idealizations of some sort. If you suspect your usually loyal wife/girlfriend would nonetheless open up her legs in rapturous glee if a willing Brad Pitt sauntered into the house while you were away at the office, then how much more willing would ancient women be to be ravaged by a god?

Or a man that could be called “god-like”?

Of course, a woman can’t reasonably expect to have a relationship with an alpha (the conclusion being that the inevitable progeny from the union would necessarily be bastards, a heavy burden until recent times). No, this is strictly a one-night stand, a pump-and-dump encounter with the god vanishing immediately after, no doubt already anticipating his next conquest following a well-deserved repast of nectar and ambrosia.

But here’s the thing: as indicated above, many of the myths that relate tales of lustful immortals chasing after women end badly – for the women. These are cautionary tales at their finest. They said, to the credulous woman: however tempted you might be, don’t let the god-like alpha roger you senseless, or bad things will happen.

Social control is often effectively imposed first by fear, and then by punishment. And later on, the mere fear of punishment will suffice. Much like the slasher movies that always kill off the women as soon as they take their tops off/have sex, these myths served as warnings, tailored to prevent women from destabilizing young, still forming civilizations by indulging their promiscuous instincts. They said: protect your virtue, ladies, and don’t fall prey to the charms of the mysterious stranger. Stick to your tribe, and keep yourself pure for the boy next door. This is when the concept of Honor was not alien to women, or a “useless”, solely male preoccupation of doubtful utility unless it could be used to further romantic manipulations.

That’s what we’ve now lost: the FEAR (along with shame, of course). The ancients knew the nature of women, and thus they knew its value. Now women have been liberated – from fear, from shame, and from responsibility. Consequences, though…that’s another story.

What do Men Find Attractive?

We are subjected to endless female fantasies about desirable men through every form of mass media, as well as narcissistic portrayals of the imagined American woman. In sitcoms, women are all in command of their faculties and emotions, in good shape and supremely competent. We're all familiar with the bumbling men on these shows, with whom many believe men are supposed to identify. These men do not serve as male role models, but rather as comic relief, which exposes a fairly profound difference between the contemporary Western male and female psyche. Men appear to be capable of laughing at themselves and their lot, while women do not seem to have the capacity for humor where portrayals of females are concerned, so female characters all tend to represent an idealized woman with only very minor flaws. However, these characters represent the idealized woman from the female – not male – perspective.

The idealized male is a constant feature of entertainment media, and we have all become fairly familiar with him. He is wealthy, attractive, and something of a bad boy. He is a merciless sadist toward other men, and curiously an occasional defender of women while simultaneously something of a sexual predator. We are all too aware that what Western women prefer is an amoral alpha thug — a handsome, borderline psychopath if you will. Because this character is created by and for women, we know it's at least somewhat accurate, and this gives students of Game a serious advantage: all they need to do to figure out what women want is watch TV.

However, women are deprived of some potentially helpful information. These days, they don't seem to have an understanding of what men truly find attractive. They know men like the female form and a pretty face, but that's where it ends. This is why one so often sees otherwise attractive women walking, laughing, speaking and gesticulating in a manner that is repugnant to most men. And while they grasp the basic principle that displaying certain parts of the female anatomy arouses men, many of them could do a lot more with less. Perhaps because porn is the last genre that makes any real attempt to appeal to men, this is what women are going by; it certainly looks that way out on the street.

Maybe movies would give them a better idea of what it is that men truly desire in a woman, but idealized female characters in the most masculine of movies tend to be poorly developed and peripheral. Reaching into literature, we often find unrealistic, exaggerated fantasies, from the Dickensian Doll Lucie Manette to the bisexual punker of Stieg Larsson's Men Who Hate Women. The problem here, as in the TV sitcoms, is that so much of the market consists of women that famous authors and producers also profit from catering to female ideals.

Have men failed in defining what they truly want in women? Would it matter to anyone if they did?

Actually, I think it would matter a great deal, especially to women. If there's anything women care about, it is how others perceive them. This is why, in general, women are better students, more likely to seek consensus, and deathly afraid of shame.

As to why men have failed to adequately express their desires, it has become a cultural taboo to do so. Any statement that might lead to some women losing so much as an ounce of self esteem is considered to be in the poorest taste in our culture. When it comes to criticism, women are considered off-limits. The result of this is that we have a society full of confused women who want nothing more than to know what attracts men, but who will, in unison, denounce any man who threatens to let them know. Hence we have models judged only by women and gay men, actresses receiving only praise from men in public and young women dressing and behaving in extremely bizarre ways in the mistaken belief that they are desirable by doing so.

Men ought to do women a favor and let them know what they find attractive. Women might be surprised to find out that it is rarely what they expected, and often quite far removed from what is considered the standard for feminine beauty. Of course, men who do this should expect to be met with howls of protest and condemnation, but after these die down they will inevitably find women listening from behind the curtain.

If men don't make some effort to define what is attractive in women not only in terms of looks, but behavior and dress, their attempts to attract men will only grow increasingly absurd and gay fashion designers will be the only men who have any input. Obviously, gay and straight men are not attracted to the same physical qualities, straight men being far more interested in distinctly female characteristics, so leaving it up to homosexuals would tend to push women toward the androgynous archetype that they themselves find more aesthetically appealing in females. For an example of this, behold the statue Night by Michaelangelo who, for obvious reasons, did a better job with his male statues:

When artists are heterosexual men, they tend to do justice to the female form, so one could probably divine the sexuality of the masters simply through the attractiveness of their female subjects. For example, if Lorenzo Bartolini was queer I'll eat my hat:

Unfortunately, today women are left pretty much in the dark, and have only outlandish, unnatural models to follow. Could this be why they are so neurotic? I think it's time men – actual straight, normal men – started making some effort to define what is attractive in women. I can't remember the last time I heard an influential man give women any advice on what attracts men — they've all dropped the ball on that score to avoid upsetting any women. And although women will make a huge fuss if men do so, it will be beneficial for them in the long run to know, and they'll secretly appreciate it.

So I'd like to invite readers to comment on some of the things that they actually do like about women. What are those things that can make you fall for a girl? What sets her apart from the others?

Game is for Jerks, Too?

This is a guest post written by Factory

This post will actually come a little too close to TMI in spots, be forewarned.

I have never really had all that much trouble attracting women. For whatever reason, I have constantly had women tell me they "feel comfortable" with me, for example, for as far back as I can remember. And I was 31 before I first asked out a girl, which was me trying something new after my split with the ex.

Because I have had such fortune with women, I have indeed had many sexual partners. It's not uncommon for me to go to a bar, and have some woman make the thinnest of pretexts before trying to lean in for a kiss…

Again, not sure why. Maybe it's because I'm regarded as attractive physically (this much has to be a given, I would say), maybe it's because I'm not a very intimidating guy physically (I'm 5 foot 8 – maybe 160lbs soaking wet).

But here's the thing. Like I said, I have VERY limited experience "dealing with women" because I have NO idea what to do if they don't throw themselves at me (ok, these days it's more like lack of interest, but I digress).

I imagine that's a bit of an uncommon state for a man to find himself in. I imagine there would be a lot of men that say "boo hoo" to all of this, and are even now unclenching a fist…but consider:

Even I, a guy who has had way more success with women than he has any right to expect, could benefit greatly from Game. Because even though I have no problem at all getting "women", getting a QUALITY woman is not easy.

A couple of personal examples to show what I mean.

The other weekend, a friend called me up, and suggested we hit a bar we hadn't been to in years. This bar is a meat market pick up joint, and strange things happen there (the last time I was there some chick bit me…at random…just walking by, and I guess I looked tasty. No, she didn't break the skin, and yes, it hurt).

While there, I ran into one of the women who has done some modeling for me (I'm an ex commercial and advertising photographer that does digital art now and again), and as it turned out, she was interested in "partying" after the bar..

I take her back to my place…

Where she proceeds to make out with BOTH of my roommates! (No lectures on taking her to my place… she'd been there before).

So, attempting to rectify the mistake of taking this obviously crazy woman home, I call her a cab and wait for it with her outside. Which is when she tells me she doesn't want a "cheap night" with me, she wants me to COMMIT to her (if you can believe it) and go on "dates" before I get any.

I didn't have the heart to tell her she was such a screwed up slut, she wasn't even going to get the one nighter, let alone the relationship she wanted. I was still sort of in shock that she thought I wanted Thing One to do with her, to be honest….

Another one….

A few months ago, I was seeing (OK, FWB type seeing) a girl 18 years my junior. This was an on and off, over the course of three years casual kind of thing. One night I was at her place when a friend called with an invitation to go see another friend play in a band. She and I went to said bar, where she at the end of the night proceeded to go home with another guy…and I mean RIGHT at the end of the night.

Now, don't get me wrong, the "no strings" thing is fine by me, and if she wanted to go home with this guy any other day, get his number and call him later…whatever, I wouldn't have cared.

But no, she ditched me right there, publicly. Then called me the next day hoping to apologize.

I'm no idiot, this was a huge diss, and both of us knew it, but what blew me away in this case was not that she ditched (I've been the guy ditched FOR way too many times to get angry when it happens to me), but that she genuinely couldn't understand why I tossed her, since we weren't "dating". Apparently, common courtesy is an alien concept.

Needless to say, while I mourn the loss of pussy half my age(-ish), it was the only acceptable solution.

So why the public self-flagellation?

If nothing else these experiences have taught me these simple truths:

You can have all the "natural advantages" in the world, and still fail due to lack of knowledge/training. This is as true for the dating/mating world as it is for Professional Sports or your Career.

AND

Without a clear idea of where you would like to be, all the forward motion in the world cannot guarantee you're not headed in circles.

I have had, oh, well over a hundred sexual partners I would imagine. I got married and Divorced (and had numerous "partners") before I ever asked out a girl, and to this very day have 19 and 20 year old women literally throw themselves in my lap (it's happened more than once this year – and I'm OLD now). Yet not once, never, have I had any real control over my own "dating destiny".

And that's what it's really all about, isn't it?

Taking control of one's own destiny? Deciding what you want, and then finding a way to get it?

There is no one that cannot benefit from at least a basic understanding of "Game". There are very few men that would not benefit from a little more self confidence, and for many men, self confidence is really all Game instills…

We all have our troubles with the opposite sex (even same in some cases – Game works for Lesbians too). The point is, learning Game does not make one "weak". It doesn't turn you into a "manipulator", although it will initially likely drop women quite a few pegs in your eyes, to see how vain and easily led "astray" many are…forewarned is forearmed.

But it does, to some degree, give men back some autonomy. If nothing else, it shows the games women play for what they are.

For example, I know EXACTLY what went on in those two examples given. I know what it says about their regard for me, and their expectations. And while I may not have had enough of an interest to "play the game" to ensure these scenarios never took place, I do at least have an idea of how to avoid this in cases where I actually care.

That's something you can't take away from Game…once you see these things for what they are, you see them that way forever. And this knowledge has at the very least given me the backbone to tell these life-sucking harpys to piss off…

Because in my younger years, I would have put up with it.

Men Reveal What is Attractive in Women

Welmer · 4 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday's post asking what men found attractive to women received quite a few genuine, thoughtful responses. Unfortunately, I can't fit them all into a post, so I picked out a few to demonstrate that what is depicted as attractive in popular media is highly misleading, and far from what men actually like. In fact, the sassy, demanding, uncaring and promiscuous women of popular entertainment are behaving in a manner that many men find unattractive, and young women who imitate these stars and the solipsistic behavior displayed on the shows are doing nothing but hurting their chances of finding a decent man.

Additionally, it is revealing to see that most men who responded are actually caring human beings who want someone to love; they are not simply dumb brutes who will settle for anything with T&A. Women who actually want a relationship rather than a string of one night stands would do well to recognize this. Men who don't call back usually don't do so because, besides the sex, they don't feel the woman has anything positive to offer, and they are worried, often with some justification, that she might be a genuinely unpleasant person.

TDOM has long known what he likes in a woman, and was lucky enough to find one who fits the bill:

> I have always been attracted by a strong, confident, yet vulnerable woman. I want a woman to challenge me, not in a competitive way, but in a way that brings out my best. She needs to be smart, witty, and pleasant. She must accept my faults and not constantly be trying to change me into someone else. She also needs to be as loyal to me as I am to her. Should we have a disagreement, she needs to be able to discuss it without yelling. she must not be an arrogant bitch. Physically, I like somenone pleasant to look at, though not necessarily a raving beauty. My wife possesses most of these qualities.

PrairieLark brings up one of the most important but also most neglected traits that men value in women: sincerity.

> The most attractive thing is GENUINE KINDNESS. Not the syrupy fake kindness that so many women are able to project with a pearly white smile and fake small-talk. I'm talking about a woman who actually likes you as a person, takes an interest in you, and is nice and kind to you.
> Don't think I'm talking about the cashier that smiles at you and makes small talk. I know when a woman genuinely likes me and when she is putting on some routine. I have had girlfriends that did not even return my phone calls or emails. It would be nice to have a girlfriend that actually cared enough about you to call you or email you just to see how you were doing, without some hidden motive like they want you for money or sex or they want you to assuage their own loneliness.
> -PrairieLark

Again, honesty, sincerity, and kindness are important to men:

> WARMTH! I'm not just talking about a cheery attitude. I'm talking about warmth that springs from a woman who not only likes you but likes men in general. Allow me to clarify: a woman who appreciates and loves men. You'll know such women when you encounter them.

Justus' wife is not only attractive, but has impeccable taste:

> My wife introduced me to the Spearhead. I don't know anything more attractive in a woman than that.

> -Justus

3Dshooter revives a concept foreign to today's young women: Honor.

> True beauty requires honesty, integrity and honor, someone who is comfortable with who they are without regard to the hand that nature has dealt them. They need to be truly affectionate and not use their sexuality in relationship power-plays. One who is playful, yet contemplative; silly yet open to broad discussion; discrete when society requires it but will jump your bones in the back yard on a nice summer night.

Like PhakeNaim, I've found myself attracted to granola-type girls before (provided they bathe regularly):

> I've always had a fondness for hippie chicks. I wasn't alive back during the sixties, but I like the girls who carry on the hippie vibe these days. I like the loose clothes they wear, how they wear their hair naturally and freely, their lack of hair grooming (yeah, I like hairy chicks). Basically, I like a free thinker. It doesn't mean we have to agree on everything, in fact I prefer her to stick to her beliefs… as long as they're not too outlandish. A girl who wears glasses wouldn't be bad either.
> Someone who likes to make things, whether it's her own clothes or jewelry or beads or whatever. Someone who isn't afraid to do her own thing and doesn't give a shit what the rest of herd thinks. Someone who doesn't abuse their body with drugs or alcohol or cigarettes.
> I don't know… the hottest chicks I've seen have been at the Community Food Co-Op or Farmer's Market. Just my two cents.
> -PhakeNaim

Red's comment could have been a post of its own, and now it is (Read it here). I chose the most poignant passages for display below:

> Wow, where to start. I've always admired a quality in women that could be described as grace. To me female grace would imply a woman who is not selfish and will forfeit the spoils of good graces from men in the name of the higher ideal of reciprocal obligation, truth, respect, honor and responsibility, a tepid trepidation toward the receiving excesses to suit her selfish and self centered desires.
> A woman who is capable of nurturing, selflessness, empathy and who is giving only opens up the door for me to bestow my honor upon her. Someone who likes children, animals and nature.
> I simply want a woman who is not selfish and self centered as so many have become now in character and by law. I want a woman who respects sexuality and could only wish that sex did not play such a public and promiscuous role in her interactions with men in society and as now a part of her public identity. In essence someone who does not believe that females should be "sex objects".

Alkaline proves that men are far from shallow, and can appreciate a lot more than one standard type:

> I would have to say femininity is what I find most attractive. However, I find that my definition of it often varies between women. I have found the "tomboy" type attractive among some females (so long as they also have a sense of humor and a lack of drilled-in hostility towards men, that is) – my current girlfriend is athletic (and more logical and realistic than me), but also has the same dark sarcastic sense of humor I have; yet somehow she's very, very female with it all, from my POV. It's a nice combination for me. With other women

> I find the more “traditional” type of femininity attractive – I’m thinking of one girl I know who wears dresses/makeup/etc, but much more importantly has that certain kind of delicate grace that would make her beautiful wearing a potato sack.
> -Alkaline

TMOTS explains that although guys value appearance, a pretty face alone isn’t close to enough:

> Obviously initial attractiveness is key – it’s what starts the ball rolling so-to-speak. For if you do not find a woman attractive, the ‘game’ stops there.
> The real test is when you find a woman that is attractive internally as well. That is to say morally, fair minded, responsible, not afraid to take responsibility for her faults, respectful… etc.
> Many women are beautiful on the outside and worth the initial contact, but when that layer is removed (and I don’t mean the makeup), what is inside her head as well as her heart is what matters most to me.
> Since I brought up makeup; women with loads of it on and designer this and that tend to be red flags to me. It tells me that they are either neurotic with self esteem issues or they believe that it makes them somehow prettier when in reality it is a faux front of who they really are. A beautiful woman is a woman that can remove the makeup and still appear naturally pretty…Then backs it up with a pretty inside, for lack of a better phrase.

I hope this was edifying for our readers. Men are far more complex and discriminating than popular culture would indicate; above all, they want good women in their lives. Is that too much for men to ask?

Public Radio Argument Against Arizona Immigration Law: Immigration Laws Should not be Enforced Because American Men are Rapists and Molesters

Welmer · 4 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've heard a lot of defenses of illegal immigration, but last Thursday afternoon was the first time I heard it defended on the basis of the alleged propensity of American men to sexually assault undocumented immigrants. Although there is absolutely zero evidence that there is an epidemic of American men raping and molesting illegal immigrants, a local radio personality named Sable Verity, who offers opinion on KBCS, a Bellevue, Washington public radio station, has raised the specter of sexual assault to condemn Arizona's new anti-illegal immigration law.

> Most alarming is the lack of a provision that would protect undocumented residents should they report a crime. If a woman who is in this country illegally is raped, the last place she'll be going is to the police. If a child who is a US citizen is molested, and her parents are not legal citizens, it's unlikely they will seek medical attention, let alone justice for the wrong committed. What happens to that rapist? What happens to that child molester? Will they feel they have license to get away with it again?

I suppose it is simply a symptom of the times — if you want to make a political point, you start writing or talking about rape. Although it appears from news reports and court cases I've seen that illegal immigrants are more likely to rape American citizens than American citizens are to sexually abuse illegals, we are apparently supposed to believe that in order to prevent rampant sexual assault Americans must tolerate illegal immigration.

I don't know where Ms. Verity came up with this idea. Perhaps it is a feminist meme. Sable lives in Seattle — my very left-wing hometown. Sexual assault happens here like anywhere else, but I can't think of a specific instance where an American citizen used undocumented status to rape women. Not one. It may have happened in some massage parlor/brothel run by Chinese snakeheads (human smugglers) or Mexican coyotes, but it just doesn't seem to be a widespread problem, and wouldn't there be less overall abuse of illegals if there weren't so many of them? This is simply another example of women's issues being raised to defend governmental neglect or malfeasance, in this case the refusal of those in power to regulate immigration.

Sex and Power Part 1: The Legitimacy of Consent

Featured Guest · 5 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This post was submitted by wdf, a German reader

From the dawn of history to about a hundred years ago, women could not give consent to sex. I don't know about the African plains, nor am I familiar with details of the laws about sex in all foreign cultures, but I've read different old writings, namely the Bible, ancient Greek and Nordic mythology, fairytale and legends from different countries, including Asian and African, as well as more modern novels and plays. Not everything written there is meant to be taken as an accurate description of past events, but I think that the values in those texts do represent the values of their authors. It is interesting to see how these writings, spanning several thousand years and different continents, are pretty consistent in their sexual mores: The question was not whether or not a woman wanted sex, the question was whether or not she wanted marriage. There was no consent to sex outside of marriage, nor was there rape inside marriage. And the same applied to men.

Doubtless there has always been consent to sex, both before and outside of an existing marriage; the old writings make mention of this, just as they tell of rape and false accusations of rape. These things happened, but they were considered unlawful, and if anyone got caught, he was punished, and – here's my point – no matter how much consent there was. Consent was no justification for sex: marriage was.

By now, the system is officially changed from a system being based on marriage to a system based on consent. Consent establishes not only the legal, but also moral legitimacy of sex. Society watches over sexual purity. It did back then, and it does now. There were times when a couple that wished to rent a room together had to prove that they were married, otherwise the person who had rented them the room out was held responsible for their fornication. Which proves another thing: sleeping in the same room was considered to be consent to sex. And if that sex was unlawful, then they were prosecuted independently of what had actually happened in that room. And not only the couple, but also their landlord. Today's society, in a similar way, watches over consent to establish the legitimacy of the sex, just as it once did over marriage, but strangely enough, entering the same bedroom at night is no proof of consent any more. After all, what would society have to watch over otherwise?

Society watching over consent as the legitimization of sex partially explains why there is so much concern over child pornography, child molestation, and other sex crimes with children: underage persons can not legally consent to sex, and therefore it is amoral. First the obligatory disclaimer: Rape, as in rape, is wrong in all moral systems that I know of. There is no excuse for it, and it has been prosecuted from the dawn of history. The old writings talk about that as well. But consensual sex between teenagers is not rape, nor are teenagers children. The only reason they have no right to choose to consent to sex is the fear that they might not understand the consequences of said choice, like the spreading of STDs, involuntary pregnancies and other problems that I will address later. Sex does not harm them physically and they are able to produce children. Whether they are able to properly take care of those children is an entirely different story, and one of the reasons they are not entitled to sex.

We don't give children the right to consent to sex to protect them from the consequences of their own actions, and to a lesser degree, to protect the people around them. This is similar to preventing children from signing contracts, or handling firearms unsupervised. But when you look at the proceedings of justice, you don't see that reflected. Underage people who committed no other crime than being too young for their actions are sent to prison for years and put on a database for pedophiles, essentially ruining their lives. A good amount of community work would be more appropriate, and probably enough to deter them, if they stop to think that far.

These long jail sentences come about by a double standard: either those teenagers are old enough to bear the consequences of their actions, in which case they should have the right to consent to sex, making it both legally and morally legitimate, at least by modern standards, or they are not old enough to bear the consequences of their behavior, and they should not be tried and sentenced under the terms of adults. This is not about protecting children, nor is it about prosecuting criminals: this is about hunting down sinners who committed the grave sin of illegitimate sex. That is, sex without (legally accepted) consent.

This, basically "liberal" rage is partially fueled by conservatives, who finally have an opportunity to crack down on extramarital sex, while at the same time excusing the sexual liberties the grownups in their church take, that aren't permitted in the bible either, such as divorce, for example, or using sexual denial as a means to win the upper hand in marriage. This is similar to the apparent dichotomy between feminism and chivalry, which seems so contradictory at first, but at second glance is only another justification for the same action. But the official charge is "sex without consent," not "sex without marriage", so I talk about the "liberal tribunal" at the moment, although I am well aware that some of this tribunal's seats are held by conservatives.

To further prove this is no misapplication of the law, but that it was intended to do what it does, bear with me for a moment:

Usually a person is tried and sentenced in the land he committed the crime. When somebody from Germany gets caught speeding in Switzerland, he is fined under the regulations of Switzerland, where fines are higher than in Germany. This is sensible. Maybe the fines are higher because, due to the mountains, the streets are narrower, and speeding is more dangerous than in Germany. Maybe Germans value speed higher in ratio to their safety than the Helvetians do; Germany is in fact one of the few countries in Europe that doesn't have a general speed limit on the highways. If the Germans choose to live that way, this is one thing, but endangering lives in Switzerland is quite another. Or perhaps the fines are higher because income and prices are generally higher in Switzerland, in which case it was still everybody's choice to go there, because they obviously thought it was worth it. You can find other examples of the same thing: women from Germany have been fined in the US for tanning topless on a public beach, which is commonplace in Germany. US citizens on the other hand are not allowed to bear arms in Germany even if they have the right to do so in their home country. The same principle persists in cases that received more media attention: Marco W., then 17, from Germany, alleged of date raping then 13 yo Charlotte M. from Britain on a holiday in Turkey, was tried in Turkey. In a similar way John Demjanjuk is being tried in Germany, because the crimes he allegedly committed were under German jurisdiction.

But this rule obviously does not apply to sex with minors in South East Asia, where western countries like the US or Germany prosecute their citizens for breaching the law of their own land. If the laws of that country were broken, then that would usually be prosecuted according to the laws of that country. Maybe punishments there are higher because premature sex is ostracized and the victim looses the prospect of marriage, and financial provision along with it. Or the age of consent is lower, because poverty makes people mature quicker. The age of consent has changed in the West, why shouldn't it be different in other parts of the world? Or regulations are similar to ours. Then we, as the West, don't need to make separate rules to prevent our citizens from sex we disagree with. Whichever it is, sex crimes are treated differently from other crimes. Note the fact that legislation was changed to make this even possible.

Do Muslims countries prosecute their citizens if they watch pornography abroad? That is, prosecute them according to the standards of their own country? Honestly, I don't know. If they do, it would be logical as Islam is a religion and its adherents are expected to honor it wherever they live. In the Muslim faith it is also the obligation of the government to watch over that allegiance. So if our governments watch over our sex lives abroad as diligently, then that shows that we, too, follow a religion that obliges government to watch over the religious practice of it's subjects. Call it liberalism, call it feminism, call it modernism; it's a state enforced religion.

Making laws for our citizens abroad, by the way, also shows governments in third world countries that we deem them incompetent to manage their countries properly. While there is often some truth to this belief, divorce was considered a sexual offense for most of our history — even worse than prostitution. In many more remote parts of the world people still see it that way. Even countries as advanced as the US show a distinct discomfort with promiscuity. Tiger Woods didn't do anything illegal, he wasn't even charged with anything, and still he's put in the stocks. In other parts of the world adultery is considered sinful and they have legal provisions to deter people from doing so. Our own governments on the other hand fail terribly to address it. As a matter of fact, I've never heard of a third world country publishing a guide to prostitution, but ours publish guides to divorce.

Manhood Academy: Magnet for Rape Supporters

Welmer · 6 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

When I published Dr. Paul's post on the Manhood Academy, I thought he might have been making a mountain out of a molehill. I thought these guys might just be some harmless radicals who wouldn't make any difference. I skimmed through their e-book, and although it was offensive and moronic, I didn't think it worth responding to. However, recent events have changed my mind.

Since Paul's post, The Spearhead has been subjected to relentless, disgusting and offensive trolling. The supporters of the "Manhood Academy" came out of the woodwork and went after this site, authors on this site, and anyone who sounded somewhat reasonable. One poster in particular, who goes by a number of different pseudonyms but first identified as MikeeUSA, has been posting endless abusive pro-rape comments.

We have to recognize that some men are simply scum. Mikee, who advocates raping 12-year-old girls, is definitely scum, and probably a dangerous individual. Given the timing of his sustained troll attack, I am going to assume that he associates with the Manhood Academy. That being the case, I think it should be referred to as the rape academy. I honestly think the guys who run it should be watched by the FBI, because one of these days someone affiliated with them is going to commit some act of violence against either an underage girl or one of their opponents. Mikee has also suggested that he supports jihadis in various Middle Eastern countries, because they are pro-rape.

But what else about the Manhood Academy is offensive? Why, one only has to read their screed, Principles 101, to figure it out. The dominant thread that runs through "Principles 101″ is pain. The application of pain is pored over in meticulous detail. How to apply pain, when to apply pain, types of pain, effects of pain, etc.

Here's an example:

> Without applying pain to dysfunctional behavior, women will refuse to acknowledge your authority, despite your reasonable explanations. Their willingness to violate your authority with specious emotional arguments is a symptom of your failure to apply sufficient pain to establish your authority. [pp. 116, 117]

The e-book goes on and on about pain. One gets the distinct impression that whoever wrote this book is obsessed with pain. We call these people sadists.

It is not only women who must be "trained" through pain, but friends as well:

> Functional women and functional friends don't grow on trees because functional people are trained not found [...] Instead of looking for a needle in a haystack, you'll need to start creating your own desirable, functional, orderly relationship environment. [p. 112]

I don't know about most readers, but I never considered it conducive to friendship to dish out pain. That's pretty twisted, and I don't think anyone with that attitude could be said to have any true friends at all.

So when should one apply pain? According to the author, "As long as disorder/dysfunction exists, pain should be applied." [p. 112]

What's disorder/dysfunction? According to some illustrations provided in the book, it could be being overweight, deformities, or just being unattractive [p. 56]. So I suppose we should kick people we don't find attractive…

This is disgusting stuff, so I suppose I shouldn't be surprised that Paul's criticism of Manhood 101 brought out a horde of pro-rape commenters. Rather than explain their position rationally, the Manhood 101 partisans resort to name-calling, calls for mass rape, and online vandalism.

I try not to take sides, and I try to give people an opportunity to make their case, but this was just going too far. I think it would be best for society and for men in general if the guys behind this were outed publicly, so if any readers know who they are feel free to do so and I'll post their names right here. Trolling obliterates any concerns I might have had about privacy, so I have absolutely no moral qualms about pointing the finger directly at these fellows. In fact, given the calls for rape and other crimes they are engaging in, I really do think someone ought to be keeping an eye on them. Not only are they doing a lot to discredit men who have legitimate grievances, they could well be dangerous individuals who will really carry out these kinds of acts.

If these guys want to pre-emptively out me, then I'll make it easy for them:

My name is Bill Price, I live in Seattle, and I'd be perfectly willing to have a little one-on-one chat — especially with rape-o Mikee.

Trolls

Welmer · 6 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I have to address the perception that I was “tolerating” some of the pro-rape commenters on The Spearhead, because that is totally false. In fact, these guys have been using a Tor proxy service to create users and spam the board with pro-rape comments. All I know is one of them goes by MikeeUSA, and another appears to be connected with the Manhood 101 site, given the hysterical reaction to Paul Elam’s post.

These guys have been wreaking havoc on the forum for the last several weeks, and it’s come to the point where I’m almost ready to shut the forum down, which is probably what they want. This form of trolling is likely a civil offense, and if I could find the guys I could probably sue them, but that would, in all likelihood, be a waste of time.

So what I’ve done is changed the settings on the board so all new registrants have to be personally approved by the administrator. This is a pain, but unfortunately necessary. People who register will have to wait for me to approve them before they can post, which might discourage a few people, but probably not too many.

It’s too bad that there are people out there who seem to think vandalism is fun. For me and readers of The Spearhead, it is a frustrating problem that does nothing but degrade the online experience.

Kick-Ass for Dads!

Featured Guest · 7 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Today's guest post was written by EP

So I actually read one of those pre-teen girl magazines for the first time, and it was just WRONG. There was actually a 14-year old girl writing in for advice on how to properly give blowjobs to her boyfriend. When I have a daughter, I'm raising her on comic books and video games.

-Mike Krahulik (Gabe), of Penny Arcade, sometime in the early Oughts, explaining the entire motivation for this particular movie. Sadly, his original quote is lost in the mists of the early decade's newsposts.

Your standard conservatives are usually not movie critics. (Breitbart is an honorable exception.) This holds double for libertarians, triple for paleocons of the more cultured, Pat Buchanan school, and quadruple for all you guys coming in from survivalist communities in the Ozarks. (We'll be glad to have you and your shotguns around when the zombie apocalypse hits, though!) Generally those of us on the right-ish end of the spectrum prefer fighting over first principles and statistical trends in human behavior over watching and critiquing what Hollywood produces any day of the week. Who cares what the liberal media want to say to the sheeple, amirite?

This is, in general, both advisable and productive. However, in rushing to condemn all of Hollywood, one misses the good stuff. And occasionally, the good stuff can be incredibly, awesomely, and indescribably good. So I've taken up the rather inadvisable task of doing (sigh) a movie review for this site and its esteemed creator. Your responses will determine whether I keep doing it.

Earlier in the year, I saw Legion, noted how every single element in it was part of exactly the same female supremacist Hollywood twaddle that had been so exhaustively described by EW, Welmer, Roissy and the like, and decided to start watching movies from that perspective. And Kick-Ass is like the anti-Legion. It's even an almost anti-Mother's day movie, as it specifically celebrates everything about fathers, sons, and male acquaintances of the friend and co-worker variety, and gleefully showcases all the worst aspects of female nature when it's not killing them offhandedly. I'm not saying it's the perfect man movie, but it's as near as you're going to get in the theatres right now. (Really should have come out around Father's Day instead of Mother's day, but Hollywood release dates is what they be.)

Let's bullet point it! And by the way, SPOILERS BELOW!!!!

-Our protagonist's mother dies of an aneurysm in the opening scene. Protagonist notes that "as it happened, life simply goes on."

-Hero's father is a beta provider of the 'barely there' variety. Still portrayed positively.

-Nicholas Cage plays a neurotically obsessed father who trains his little girl to kill criminals Old-Testament John Woo style. Portrayed positively.

-The little girl absolutely idolizes her father, with very, very, good reason, as it turns out.

-Hell, even the bad guy is portrayed as a positive father figure, though more in the alpha thug than beta provider style, naturally.

-Alpha thugs actually act like alpha thugs. And get killed like alpha thugs.

-The hot girl the hero pursues goes through a textbook bad-boy defending script when she hears of his presumed death-by-superhero. Specifically: Cries, then says: "I thought it might be my fault!"

-The hot girl, in fact, does every single slut-rationalization hamster dance as is possible on screen.

-Almost all the motives, problems, and unexpected twists of actually trying to be a vigilante are addressed, visualized, or at least mentioned offhand. The question is less about how unbelievable the stunts are than why we tolerate having every other action movie hero do these stunts without questioning them.

-The teenage beta 'losers' who try the superhero thing are still portrayed as heroes even when they screw up, simply because they actually did something rather than sitting on the sidelines.

-The waif-fu killer girl is somewhat regrettable, but it's hammered into our heads that all the awesomeness came from her father's strict training. Most of which on screen involves teaching emotional control under pressure, the very first thing you'd want a girl to learn before giving her easy access to an arsenal of knives and guns big enough to run Zimbabwe for a year.

-There's also a great scene where a particular Rent-A-Slut slowly realizes: "Aw crap, they gave the girl a double naginata and an order to kill everyone in the room; that means I can actually die too!"

-The little girl's mother simply overdosed on pills when her dad got sent to jail. Father rather blankly says that 'she couldn't handle it.' Girl more correctly notes that her mother 'died for nothing.'

-People who do wrong things are neither ignored nor ruthlessly condemned by the plot when they do wrong things. They actually have the fact that they've done something wrong sink in and deal with it accordingly.

END SPOILERS!!!!

This particular adaptation of a Mark Millar comic book was far better than that Wanted thing about bullet-curving wax-healing types that came out a few years ago. (The actual Wanted comic book, when I read it in the Barnes and Noble under the Freedom of Information For Broke Writers Act, could have been ghostwritten by the disgruntled-er Spearhead posters and Roissy's entire comment section.)

I'm told that Kick-Ass had a lot of trouble finding a producer, and given its ridiculously honest (by Hollywood standards) portrayal of modern womanhood in between its endless celebration of nerditude, fatherhood, and male leadership, I can see why.

See it now before Iron Man 2 obliterates all previous comic-booky movies. You will regret it much less than many other things Hollywood makes. (I guess if you wanted a sweeter, more socially palatable and family-friendlier version of gender realism, you could always see Date Night. After you bought yourself a machiatto and a bikini wax, sissy.

Sassy Girls to be First on Subs

Welmer · 7 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The first new female submariners have been chosen, and they are a couple of young, bubbly girls who are “excited” by the prospect of serving on subs. One, Jessica Wilcox, seems to have a defiant attitude, and the other, Tabitha Gant, is a cute, curvy young woman with a girlish voice and cheerful demeanor.

They can be seen on video here.

Although neither of these girls is a knockout, there’s no doubt that the whiffs of pheromones picked up by their male counterparts will have an effect. To put it plainly, a lot of the young men on the sub are going to lust after them. I think this is an attractive prospect to the young women, as women tend to really like the idea of being at the center of attention and objects of desire.

In fact, it’s my theory that much of the reason women have pushed into what were formerly male-only spaces is that they really like the idea of being surrounded by men — lots of men. And the more men, the more choices and opportunities they have. These girls are going to be strutting around the subs like little princesses, and, sadly, a lot of guys will do everything they can to please them.

There will be favoritism, jealousy, and, from submariners’ wives, extreme suspicion. I can only imagine what the Navy wives who see these girls will think — they’ll probably hate them with a passion. Putting women on the subs is a purely political move, which has been taken without the goal of increasing combat effectiveness, but rather to serve feminist ideology. When some female submariner inevitably gets pregnant or files a harassment suit, the military will cover it all up and we likely won’t hear about it. If we do, it will only be in the context of the need for more privileges for women in the military, or more restrictions on males.

WSJ: Dim Future for Men

Welmer · 7 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an article titled "Meet the Unemployable Man," the Wall Street Journal paints a dismal picture of the future for men in America, particularly those without college degrees. Lawrence Summers, Obama's economic advisor, is quoted in the article saying:

> A good guess…is that when the economy recovers five years from now, one in six men who are 25 to 54 will not be working

So it looks as though the future is bleak for men, and there won't be much of a recovery at all if America's top economist knows what he's talking about. For the poorly educated men who do get work, it will likely be low wage, but they may be lucky — for those who have been out of work long-term, chances that they will ever work again drop precipitously.

The article, written by David Wessel, actually seems to hint that it would be morally wrong to do nothing about the current crisis — a consideration that has not entered the public conscience for a long time in regards to men:

> Sidelining a huge part of an entire generation of men would waste human potential, create economic misery for their families and fuel political discontent.

Could it be that people are beginning to feel that abuse and neglect of men is in itself morally objectionable? We can only hope so. I don't think such a sentiment has existed in America since the Great Depression, when depictions of men as human beings in works of art such as The Grapes of Wrath spurred action to alleviate the miserable lot of so many men.

Book Review: The Sling and the Stone

Elusive Wapiti · 8 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: The Sling and the Stone, by Thomas X. Hammes, Colonel, USMC. 291 pages.

The Gist: Hammes' book postulates that what is termed "4GW", or fourth generation warfare, is merely the evolution of warfare to keep pace with the parallel political, technological, social, and economic evolution of the world in general. Just like a living organism, warfare changes with its environment; thus, as the world becomes more and more networked, more and more flat, more and more fragmented with more and more non-state actors on the international scene, and with the rising power of multinational corporations and mega-markets, warfare itself also changes to make the most advantage of this new environment.

Hammes begins his book by introducing Toffler's wave theory, which posits that human society is characterized by great waves of technological progress that propagate through societies and change the society's structure, values, and moral codes. The first such wave was the shift from hunter-gatherer to organized agriculture. This gave rise to complex, hierarchical societies, a professional warrior class unencumbered with concerns about growing food and, more importantly, where the additional riches generated by organized agriculture gravitated to landowners.

The second Toffler wave was industrialization, where wealth again shifted hands, this time from landowners to captains of industry. The professional warrior classes made possible by organized agriculture now became mechanized, and those societies that were not industrialized could not withstand the onslaught of new wealth and more lethal weaponry and tactics.

The third Toffler wave is information, where "intellectual property" is the new widget, and with this change, the stuff that used to indicate power and wealth can now be 'stolen' without any physical change in possession. Moreover, the democratization (for lack of a better word) of information means that states no longer have a monopoly on information. In fact, information technology takes power away from governments and other hierarchical institutions and gives it back to individuals and loose confederacies of individuals, bound together based on blood, language, creed, skin color, political wedge issues, or other common trait or interest or affinity. Worse still (for government, that is), governments can no longer take for granted the loyalty of the people residing within the State's borders…they have to compete for that loyalty, an important change that is crucial to 4GW. In other words, the new way of social organization is a return to a more tribal way of existing, and 4GW warriors leverage those ties and interests to mass lethal force in battle against their foes faster and more robustly than 3GW forces.

In short, with each successive wave, how humanity associates, how humanity interacts, what constitutes wealth and how that wealth is acquired and defended, changes with each wave that passes through society. Thus, as the information wave enhances the ability of individuals to communicate and associate with one another on an unprecedented scale, so too does the nature of warfare change to reflect this environment.

Hammes briefly describes 1GW, 2GW, and 3GW as follows: 1GW featured the tactics of line and column that massed men at the point of effort. 1GW was characterized by the advent of gunpowder, and technological improvements in agriculture and transportation that increased societal wealth and the size of excess manpower that could be used for fighting. The technology of nationalism was developed to politically mobilize a citizenry into a levee en masse ready to fight and die for the State, a population that may otherwise have little connection to the State. 1GW peaked with the Napoleonic war.

2GW sought advantage over massed manpower through the massing of firepower. 2GW was characterized by the technologies of the rifled musket, breechloading firearms, the machine gun, "king of battle" artillery, improved transport, the telegraph, and the development of the general staff (which enabled the effective control progressively larger and larger armies). The advent of industrialization increased societal wealth even more, and shifted wealth from landowners (the locus of wealth for milennia ever since the transition from hunter-gatherer societies) and concentrated it in the hands of the captains of industry. The defense, always the strongest form of warfare, became predominant, as more lethal firepower made foot-borne assaults on fixed fortifications suicidal.

3GW restored maneuver to the battlefield with the mechanization of armies via tanks, personnel carriers, mobilized artillery, and aviation. 3GW could be viewed as the maturation of industrial-era warfare.

As mentioned previously, the key thread running through Hammes' book is that changes in society drive changes in warfare, and that recent changes in global human society as a result of social evolution are key to 4GW. One factor that Hammes identifies as crucial to 4GW warfare is the proliferation of international actors, such as the UN, IAEA, and WTO, regional actors such as NAFTA and OAS, and NGOs, such as Amnesty International, Hamas, and the Red Cross. Whether benevolent or not, one thing is certain: each non-state actor usurps, erodes, and/or bypasses the sovereignty of the nation-state. Another factor is the rise of influential nations in their own right that lack defined political states, such as the Palestinians and Amerindian tribes in the United States. A third factor is the proliferation of states cause by the break up of great colonial empires and subsequent wars of independence. The fourth and final factor that Hammes identifies is the rise of multi-national corporation and the increasingly significant influence of large marketplaces and electronic trading exchanges. Taken together, these last two developments greatly constrain the power of traditional hierarchical institutions like the nation-state, either from fear of economic pain inflicted by the marketplace for unpopular actions, or from multi-nationals that ignore the diktats of a government or, if unable to do so, simply moves their wealth-generating (and tax-generating) activities elsewhere.

Hammes traces the beginning of 4GW to the end of WWII, to the dawn of the information age. IT is what catalyzed 4GW…information technology permits the easy flow of information across national boundaries through communication nodes (people and organizations, as well as hardware), the connections between which can be viewed as networks. Through these military/political/economic/social networks, 4GW aims to convince the enemy's decision makers that their strategic goals are either unachievable or too costly for the perceived benefit. This is a radical departure from previous 'GWs', all three of which are more or less characterized by how they go about targeting the enemy's fielded forces, and is a return to a more classical way of war. A way of war that is more Sun Tzu than Clausewitz and Jomini, more anything goes than Augustinian 'just war' theory, more Eastern than Western. In a way, 4GW is a "back to the future" of sorts where the polite, ordered, rule-based Western way of war–warfare which requires both sides to play along by a pre-agreed set of rules–is rejected in favor of a more total, anarchic, all's-fair attack not on the opponent's warrior class but on the society's political will. 4GW warriors have no truck with attacking targets considered to be off limits, 'protected', or 'non-combatants'. They may, in fact, prefer to attack these non-traditional target sets because of the asymmetric impact those attacks may have on the 3GW enemy's will to carry on the fight.

Hammes spends about half of the book painstakingly chronicling the evolution of 4GW, starting first with an in-depth evaluation of Chairman Mao's employment of early 4GW (characterized by the 'political mobilization' of peasants against the government and by network-building with outside constituencies to bring international pressure upon Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalists) and incrementally examining, in series, the application of and incremental improvements upon 4GW by Ho (who perfected Maoist insurgency and internationalized his conflict to degrade the political will of the French and American populations, bolster the political will of their international left-wing allies, and erode the legitimacy and credibility of the French and American governments), the Sandinistas (who transitioned 4GW from Mao's/Ho's peasant-based insurgency to urbane urban insurgencies, and added a religious liberation theology to what was previously an atheistic doctrine), by the Palestinians in their first Intifada (who used the media to devastating effect), and finally by UBL and al Qaeda (which turned insurgency into an endeavor not unlike a venture capital firm).

Hammes finishes his book by analyzing the current conflicts in Iraq (which he uses as a case study to argue the fecklessness of technological solutions to 4GW warfare) and Afghanistan (where we are fighting a 4GW tribal network with a modern hierarchical 3GW military), characterizing 4GW in depth, and by suggesting ways in which modern technological societies can address and combat this existential threat to their existence. Hammes offers several ways in which our miiltary can better handle the 4GW threat, starting first with organization. Hammes contends that our military is organized, trained, and equipped, and has an entire culture, an entire personnel system, and entire military-industrial complex built around 2GW and 3GW warfare. In addition, the military is a hierarchical institution structured very much like the 2GW and 3GW societies that birthed it. It is centralized, cumbersome, slow to react, and consensus-driven at the top, where our foes are decentralized and agile and quick to respond to opportunities…their networked organization more effectively transmits information and decides on courses of action where analysts in our structure are still staffing their information through the hierarchy. Changing these structures will be difficult, as doing so will dislocate many workers, each of whom are Congressional constituents. But Hammes argues that changed it must be.

In short, a 4GW adversary will not find it difficult to get inside our OODA loop, particularly so when commercial imagery is readily available and the whole of the MSM–broadcasters of leaked information to the world, they are–is a sensor for them. Furthermore, DoD is continuing to centralize and become more top-heavy, where the dominant forces in society and in business is decentralize and flatten, making DoD that much less able to respond or to be able to leverage techniques and lessons learned from industry.

Analysis

One thing I noted early on was the Euro-centric naming convention about the “generations of warfare”. In 1GW, the armies raised by nation-states clashed in a contest of men and materiel, thereby isolating populations weary of decades of total war and eager to have someone else (a) do the fighting by proxy for them, and (b) ease human suffering from war, and (c) lessen the impact to the fabric of society from losing a fight. One could argue that 1GW is a more “Christian” way of war. 2GW and 3GW followed in this same suit, making warfare more and more lethal yet still more or less confining that deadly force to uniformed personnel. In fact, it is quite interesting to consider just how artificial the Western way of war really is when compared to the Eastern way, particularly in the way it depends on both actors adhering to a set of rules about how each side conducts itself. The Geneva conventions and the ‘laws of war’ can be seen as extensions of this Western way of war, extensions of the Westphalian nation-state, ways to limit the suffering and adverse effects of such an inherently violent and worldly act.

It is this nation-state model, and the powerful 2GW and 3GW armies that such societies are able to field, that 4GW evolved to attack. While agrarian society made equalitarian hunter-gatherer societies hierarchical, and while industrialization made them more hierarchical still (as well as ever more specialized), informationalization tends to undermine hierarchical societies and the vertically integrated institutions that comprise them. Moreover, informationalization introduces a new social contract that challenges the power base of a centralized state–loyalty based not on nationalistic pride or duty-honor-country, but loyalty based on affinity or on a rational cost-benefit analysis. This affinity or “what’s in it for me” attitude contrasts significantly with the sort of patriotic loyalty that the nation-state model demands, a loyalty demanded of an (ideally relatively homogenous) citizenry solidified and maintained via tight control of information, political or otherwise. Another feature of the nation-state’s control over its citizens is its monopoly on violence, applied politically against those who rebelled against the state’s assertion of authority.

Indeed, 4GW seems to drive at the very root of what makes a government legitimate, what gives a government its right to rule. It thus raises a critical question…is the right to rule determined by who has the most guns or a monopoly on deadly force? Or is the right to rule the choice of the people, who themselves decide which group does best by them and therefore gains their (fickle) allegiance? Thus while the reductionist view of government as simply a glorified protection racket still retains its validity in a 2GW or 3GW society, 4GW seems to exploit the modern notion that a people’s rulers are chosen by the consent of the governed, and the government that wishes to remain in power must cater to the needs and desires and wants of the people. In a way, 4GW appears to simply be the methods of warfare catching up to the radical concepts of America’s Founding Fathers–that the legitimacy of a government is determined by the strength of its support among the polis, and in this way is government assured to be the people’s servant, not the people’s master.

A related thought I had while reading this book was that I more clearly see now the folly of our nation's refusal in the 1990s to "do" nation building, to refuse to consider the need to secure the loyalty of the people when engaging in overseas empire-building. It goes beyond 4GW, all the way back to at least the Romans, who recognized that if one is to have an empire, one must convince your subjects that you have the right to rule, that your way is best for them. The ruler must provide law and basic civil institutions. And this 'convincing' must go on in the face of competing visions, for throughout Hammes' book, I noted a pattern repeated time and again…the insurgents undermined the legitimacy of the host government before moving in with their surrogate. They did so by propoganda (Mao's "political mobilization") and, when necessary, false-flag operations that cast the government as much a problem as the criminals themselves. They also did so by sowing fear caused by a climate of fear of crime and violence that the insurgents themselves generated. Then, as the 'last man standing', they filled the power and civil services vacuum, better serving the needs of the populace than the legitimate government. Perversely, and host government efforts to crack down on the insurgents often radicalized the citizenry even more, sometimes pushing them even further toward the insurgents.

This brings me to my next point, one that Hammes himself brought up: we must know what sort of fight we are about to engage in before we decide to get involved. That dictum appears to apply in spades to the United States' current fights in both Iraq and in Afghanistan…that we are approaching that conflict from the classic Western/American/3GW perspective, one that seeks technological advantage in an arena where technology yields victory. Unfortunately, 4GW is a war more about ideas than about whose technologies are superior. Hammes states in his book that the political power an idea generates was crucial to the 4GW warrior. Thus the center of gravity of a 4GW opponent is not how many guns or muj fighters he has; instead, his center of gravity is the idea(s) that rallies more fighters to the 4GW opponent's cause. It is this idea that must be countered, discredited, or subverted, and our current approach of seeking technological military advantage is as wasteful as it is beside the point. It may be worse than that, as Hammes contends that technological advancements, in particular our focus on 3GW technology, have actually eroded our capability to fight potential 4GW opponents. Worse, such technological superiority may in fact may entice us to become involved in situations we do not fully understand nor are prepared to fight in…a sort of technological hubris…because we think our superior (fill in the blank) technology will assure actual combat superiority on the ground.

In addition, I think it isn't enough to fight the insurgent's messages defensively, responding tit-for-tat when presented with a new message attempting to gain the loyalty of the people. So long as they retain the propoganda offense, the government will always be at a disadvantage against the 4GW warrior. Instead, the government must seize the propoganda offense, to find its own message that appeals to the citizenry both at home and abroad and play on that.

Hammes' work appears to dovetail nicely into the theories of futurists such as David Ronfeldt and John Robb, who have postulated that society in general is on the cusp of transitioning from an institutional market-based society (I+M society) into a networked society (I+M+N). While I have posted on these theories here, I see the social fabric moving regressing toward a less ordered, more tribal-like existence, facilitated by the presence of information technology and catalyzed by the disintegrative influence of aggressively atheistic Marxism. 4GW exploits this lack of cohesion in Western countries and turns our weakness into one of their primary strengths. Moreover, this disintegration portends badly for governments struggling to maintain their hold on power…the trends favor the 4GW warriors.

Lastly, I found myself wondering what a 4GW military would look like. How does a country stuck in 3GW thinking recruit, indoctrinate, train, organize, and equip forces in a 4GW or 5GW manner to fight a 4GW foe? One thing appears certain…a tall, risk-averse hierarchy where decision-making power and authority is concentrated at the middle cannot innovate fast enough to keep pace with a thinking enemy that wants to win too.

Overall, this was a good book that well illustrates the challenges we face when fighting a global fourth-generation enemy. Well recommended for anyone who wishes to understand the nature of what we as a society are up against in Iraq and Afghanistan.

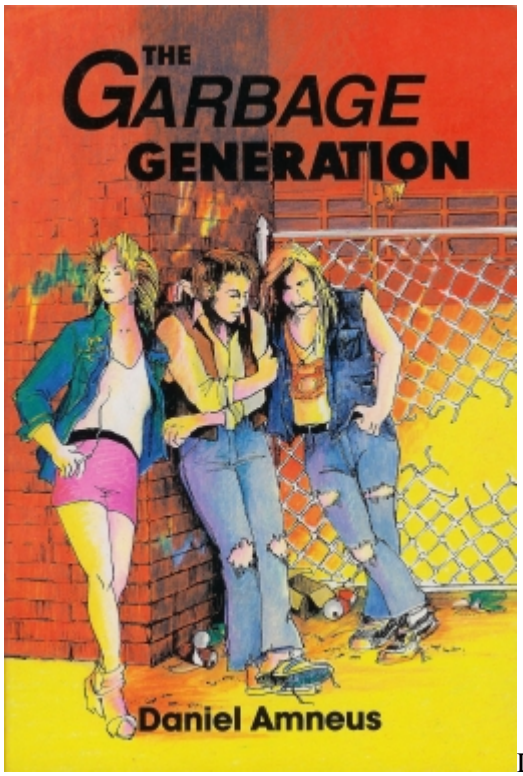
The Matriarchal Paradigm is Ascendant

Hawaiian Libertarian · 8 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original



Dr. Daniel Amneus wrote the Garbage Generation in the late 1980's.

It was a seminal indictment of Matriarchy and about the long term, societal results of the feminist platform's loosening of sexual mores and the institutions of no-fault divorce and family court system becoming normalized.

It's now been two decades since he wrote about the inevitable results of instituting Matriarchy to replace Patriarchy. He predicted that the more Matriarchy became ascendant, the more America would resemble the matriarchal ghettos of the inner cities.

We're almost there.

Four in ten babies are born outside marriage in the U.S.

> The number of children born outside marriage in the United States has increased dramatically to four out of ten of all births.
> Figures show that 41 per cent of children born in 2008 did not have married parents – up from 28 per cent in 1990.

Remember this the next time you encounter the "conservative" argument that is passionate about "saving marriage" from the gays.

> Researchers have concluded that although Christian values still play an important role in American society, public attitudes have changed.

Hah. Most "Christian" values have changed to accommodate the public attitudes.

> Having a child out of wedlock does not carry the stigma and shame it once did, they say.

Anybody remember the huge media brouhaha when VP Dan Quayle criticized the portrayal of single motherhood as no big deal on the TV show Murphy Brown? He was lambasted, ridiculed and had all sorts of insults directed at him.

Oh yes, Dan Quayle was absolutely right.

Let's take a look at some substantial excerpts of the speech that contained the criticism of the TV show that got so many feminists and liberals panties twisted in a bunch…and put it into the overall context of the accurate points Quayle was making.

> This country now has a black middle class that barely existed a quarter-century ago. Since 1967, the median income of black two-parent families has risen by 60 percent in real terms. The number of black college graduates has skyrocketed. Black men and women have achieved real political power — black mayors head 48 of our largest cities, including Los Angeles. These are achievements.
> But as we all know, there is another side to that bright landscape. During this period of progress, we have also developed a culture of poverty — some call it an underclass — that is far more violent and harder to escape than it was a generation ago.
> The poor you always have with you, Scripture tells us. And in America we have always had poor people. But in this dynamic, prosperous nation, poverty has traditionally been a stage through which people pass on their way to joining the great middle class. And if one generation didn't get very far up the ladder — their ambitious, better-educated children would.

You can see the exact thing here in Hawaii. I've seen it play out amongst Filipino, Korean, Vietnamese, Samoan, Chinese and Micronesian families that migrate here. They often live in poverty-laden areas, with 10 family members living in a 2 or 3 bedroom apartment, with the parents working long hours at menial blue color jobs…saving money to put their kids through school. Within a generation, these families go from penniless immigrants to middle and upper-middle class citizenry, when their educated kids become doctors, lawyers, bankers or small business owners.

This, of course, is a stark contrast to all those families that come here and instead of working hard and saving to invest in their children's future, they opt to go on the welfare, become dependent on hand outs and adopt the matriarchal ghetto lifestyle. I've seen families of all races take one or the other path, with reliably predictable results. The underclass really has nothing to do with race.

Nevertheless, the Black family in America leads the way in manifesting the societal results that occur when you adopt Government policies and laws that offer incentives for single mothers to have children out of wedlock. The black American family was the canary in the coalmine in terms of what happens when you effect social policies that impact the structure of the nuclear family.

As Dan Quayle noted:

> The inter-generational poverty that troubles us so much today is predominantly a poverty of values. Our inner cities are filled with children having children; with people who have not been able to take advantage of educational opportunities; with people who are dependent on drugs or the narcotic of welfare. To be sure, many people in the ghettos struggle very hard against these tides — and sometimes win. But too many feel they have no hope and nothing to lose. This poverty is, again, fundamentally a poverty of values.
> But the underclass seems to be a new phenomenon. It is a group whose members are dependent on welfare for very long stretches, and whose men are often drawn into lives of crime. There is far too little upward mobility, because the underclass is disconnected from the rules of American society. And these problems have, unfortunately, been particularly acute for black Americans.

> Let me share with you a few statistics on the difference between black poverty in particular in the 1960s and now.

>  In 1967, 68 percent of black families were headed by married couples. In 1991, only 48 percent of black families were headed by both a husband and wife.*
>  In 1965, the illegitimacy rate among black families was 28 percent. In 1989, 65 percent — two thirds — of all black children were born to never-married mothers.*
>  In 1951 9.2 percent of black youth between 16-19 were unemployed. In 1965, it was 23 percent. In 1980, it was 35 percent. By 1989, the number had declined slightly, but was still 32 percent.*
>  The leading cause of death of young black males today is homicide.*
> It would be overly simplistic to blame this social breakdown on the programs of the Great Society alone. It would be absolutely wrong to blame it on the growth and success most Americans enjoyed during the 1980s. Rather, we are in large measure reaping the whirlwind of decades of changes in social mores.

Of course, these changes in social mores didn't "just happen."

> Unless we change the basic rules of society in our inner cities, we cannot expect anything else to change.

Indeed.

Instead of changing the basic rules of society in our inner cities, we've adopted them society-wide, which is precisely why we are now living through the decline of Western Civilization and entering into a Brave New World Order: Global Socialism Based on the Matriarchal family model; controlled and manipulated by dependence on the Ruling Elite.

> For the government, transforming underclass culture means that our policies and programs must create a > different incentive system. Our policies must be premised on, and must reinforce, values such as: family, hard work, integrity and personal responsibility.

But that would be racist, sexist and homophobic!

> I think we can all agree that government's first obligation is to maintain order. We are a nation of laws, not looting. If a single mother raising her children in the ghetto has to worry about drive-by shootings, drug deals, or whether her children will join gangs and die violently, her difficult tasks becomes impossible.
> Safety is absolutely necessary. But it's not sufficient. Our urban strategy is to empower the poor by giving them control over their lives. Empowering the poor will strengthen families. And right now, the failure of our families is hurting America deeply. When families fail, society fails. The anarchy and lack of structure in our inner cities are testament to how quickly civilization falls apart when the family foundation cracks. Children need love and discipline. They need mothers and fathers. A welfare check is not a husband. The state is not a father. It is from parents that children learn how to behave in society; it is from parents above all that children come to understand values and themselves as men and women, mothers and fathers.
> And for those concerned about children growing up in poverty, we should know this: Marriage is probably the best anti-poverty program of all. Among families headed by married couples today, there is a poverty rate of 5.7 percent. But 33.4 percent of families headed by a single mother are in poverty today.
> The system perpetuates itself as these young men father children whom they have no intention of caring for, by women whose welfare checks support them. Teenage girls, mired in the same hopelessness, lack sufficient motive to say no to this trap.

That Dan Quayle sure was a stupid, moron, wasn't he?

> Answers to our problems won't be easy.
> We can start by dismantling a welfare system that encourages dependency and subsidizes broken families. We can attach conditions — such as school attendance, or work — to welfare. We can limit the time a recipient gets benefits. We can stop penalizing marriage for welfare mothers. We can enforce child support payments.

Heh. I wrote too soon…note the inherent contradiction in that last paragraph. He first calls for dismantling the welfare system…than immediately makes proscriptions that reform the welfare system, not dismantle it. And in fact, all of those conditions he mentioned were eventually effected with "Welfare Reform" during the Clinton administration. The Daily Mail article now shows us just how effective that was. American bastardy is at an all time high.

They should have ended it, not "mended" it.

This is what happens when you get "compromise" by "conservatives" so they can appeal to the "left" to achieve "bi-partisan consensus."

> Ultimately, however, marriage is a moral issue that requires cultural consensus and social sanctions. Bearing babies irresponsibly is, simply, wrong. We must be unequivocal about this.

Too late, Mr. Quayle. They reformed welfare and normalized babies born out of wedlock. The Matriarchal paradigm continues it's ascent.

> It doesn't help matters when primetime TV has Murphy Brown — a character who supposedly epitomizes today's intelligent, highly paid, professional woman — mocking the importance of fathers, by bearing a child alone, and calling it just another "lifestyle choice."

> I know it is not fashionable to talk about moral values, but we need to do it. Even though our cultural leaders in Hollywood, network TV, the national newspapers routinely jeer at them, I think that most of us in this room know that some things are good,and other things are wrong. Now it's time to make the discussion public.

Our cultural "leaders" in Hollywood, network TV and the national newspapers have won that particular debate.

Sounds to me like Quayle was well versed in Senator Moynihan's report about the destructive effects of Matriarchal policies and programs on the black American family.

No wonder the liberal mainstream media, talking heads and late night comedians had to continually push the meme that Quayle was barely above the intellectual level of retardation because of his dispute with a grade schooler on the spelling of the word potato(e).

Dan Quayle was right, and he certainly was no dumbass when he made the argument that Murphy Brown's single mother storyline was in fact a glorification of single motherhood, a marginalization of the role of Fathers, and that it would subversively influence the viewers by normalizing bastardy in our culture.

Can anyone now say it with a straight face that Dan Quayle's predictions didn't come true?

American University Student Calls for Vigilante Action Against Male Students

Welmer · 9 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Chloe Rubenstein, an American University sophomore, posted a rape accusation on her Facebook page, naming two male students (April 22 on her wall — view pdf screenshot here at bottom of page), and exhorting students to "take them down." She decided to take this course of action a week after attending a "Take Back the Night" rally following Alex Knepper's editorial in The Eagle, a student run publication. Knepper's piece was skeptical of rape accusations made following drunken hook ups at frat parties, and suggested that women bear some responsibility for putting themselves in highly sexually charged situations.

Amanda Hess of the Washington City Paper's "The Sexist" blog, has written a sympathetic article lionizing Rubenstein for outing the two men, who, as far as I know, haven't been charged with or convicted of anything. Rubenstein also admitted to being one of the students who vandalized The Eagle's distribution points in an anti-speech action. She justified the probable crime as a response to an insult:

> The article was insulting to every woman who has ever been sexually assaulted on campus. So it was an effective action…

Rubenstein claimed to have witnessed a date rape in her apartment following a night of drinking cheap vodka:

> Two months earlier, the American University sophomore and a group of her fellow students had gathered to pass the time during the snowstorm. As feet of snow blanketed the city, Rubenstein's apartment filled with friends and one new acquaintance—a male AU student who lived in the same building. They drank cheap vodka and danced. At the end of the night, a female friend left the party and entered Rubenstein's bedroom. Five minutes later, the new guy followed. Rubenstein noticed and followed him in.

Perhaps Hess, who writes for a private publication, knows better than to write that a rape occurred, but Rubenstein has no qualms about making accusations without strict evidence:

> "You're playing with fire when you throw people's names out," admits Rubenstein. "I was aware of the dangers of that. I knew it was a bold move," she says. "But when I told people that I was fully aware of what I was doing, it made them feel a little more fearless. After that, I started getting a lot more support from people."

I don't know whether American University has a policy covering false accusations made by students, but if it does it probably entails nothing more than a slap on the wrist. Just as courts very rarely prosecute women who make false accusations, AU will probably decline to punish Rubenstein if her accusations turn out to be libel. Therefore, there is nothing courageous or heroic about what she has done. If she's wrong, and there's a good chance of that, she's doing immense harm to innocent people.

American University appears to be a very hazardous place to be a male student. It remains to be seen what, if any, action will be taken to address the female hysteria that has taken hold of the university, which has an overwhelmingly female student body. As I have written before, the only response should be for male students to leave and avoid the school at all costs. Let the Chloe Rubensteins of the world have it to themselves.

I haven't read every article on The Spearhead, so I don't know if there have been any offerings of fiction before. If not, this will be the first one, though I am guessing that for some Spearhead readers this will read more like a screenplay for a documentary than a piece of short fiction. The original version of this was first published at The Oddville Press, a source of edgy and often quirky fiction that I highly recommend to fans of the craft.

The following is based on a true story. Actually, it's based on many of them.

Tobi Pitts leaned forward in her seat, clasping her hands together with forearms resting on her knees. She looked at Howard with tired green eyes that were sunken into a patchwork of premature wrinkles and thin make-up. Her hair was a mass of bleached, neglected curls that hung to the sides like twists of tattered rope.

"I can't make you say a word, Mr. Franks," she said. "But the court did order you to come here, and I do think it's in your best interest to talk about why that happened."

Howard scanned the room. There were eight other men in the circle, some watching him, others with eyes to the floor. All of them silent; waiting. He looked back at Tobi and found her unblinking gaze still on him, patient as alabaster.

"I see," he said. "My best interest." And the room sank into silence again. Tobi remained fixed.

A man to Howard's left, three seats down, cleared his throat and adjusted his tie. He had the meticulous look of a newscaster, complete with handsome profile. His hair was a highly styled crown of silver-gray perfection. He regarded Howard with eyes that were two striking pools of azure resting behind glasses that that had an executive sparkle.

"Howard," he said, in highly practiced tenor, "Tom Watson here, and believe you me I feel for you. I didn't want to talk when I got here either. But once I got over that I learned a great deal. Today's my last day."

Tom glanced over to Tobi and seemed annoyed to find her still looking at Howard.

"Anyway, I don't mind telling you I used to be a real bastard. I gave my wife so many beatings I couldn't even begin to count them. In here I learned where it was coming from. Power, man, and I am just flat addicted to it. It gave me a rush, a sick rush, to do what I did to her. I'll bet you can identify with that a little."

Howard studied the other men in the group. He noted some smirks and the look of disgust on the faces of others that seemed to deepen with each one of Tom's passing words. Suddenly, without warning, he was rocked by the familiar cascade of grief that seemed to pour from core of his chest. He closed his eyes and braced himself as the other man continued to speak.

"So I hope you open up a little, buddy. Remember, we're all the same here," Tom concluded. He then pointed at Howard with his hand formed into a mock pistol, winked and clicked his tongue.

"Forget that asshole," said a heavyset man. He had a cheerless face, shadows of stubble spread across his cheeks like a dark mood. "If you don't talk they will keep you here longer, and they'll use it against you in court."

Howard pondered that for a moment and finally spoke again.

"They?" he asked, "Don't you mean, her?" And he tilted his head in Tobi's direction.

The large man grinned without even slightly diminishing the sadness in his eyes. "It's all the same." he said.

"No, it's not," Tobi interjected. "Mr. Franks, I am a therapist, not a judge. I don't tell the court anything you say in here. That's held in confidence. All I do is report whether you have attended and whether you are cooperative. Believe it or not, I am here to help you."

Howard considered her words briefly.

“And what is cooperative, Ms. Pitts?” Howard asked. “Am I uncooperative if I don’t spill my guts to you, perhaps put on a little dog and pony show?” he said, cocking a thumb back at Tom, whose brow scrunched, as though in feigned indignity .

Tobi swallowed. Her fingers, once woven loosely together tightened and began a slight tremble. A rose hue painted itself across the skin of her face and her eyes hardened. Howard looked at the big man, whose expression now simply pled caution. And silence again filled the room. This time a silence as taut and bloodless as Tobi’s fingers.

Howard raised his hand and bowed his head pensively. The grief passed through him again like a great wave, stirring up the sediment of a thousand other feelings, all of which he was trying desperately to keep in check. He choked it all back down and drew in a great, settling breath. Then he lifted his eyes to meet Tobi’s and spoke.

“Six weeks ago I was a happily married man. Sixteen years with the same woman, Kate, and two beautiful daughters. I had a good business, a decent enough business partner and everything to look forward to.”

“Then my father died. It was not unexpected; he’d been fighting cancer for three years. Kate convinced me that it wouldn’t be best to pull the kids out of school and fly them to Baltimore for the funeral. I agreed and went on my own.”

Howard didn’t notice, but at this point none of the other men were looking at the floor. Each of them leaned forward, studying his face as they listened.

“When I got back I stopped on the way home to pick up some flowers. Just something for Kate, for carrying the weight while I was gone. But my credit card was declined. I called the bank and was informed that all my accounts were closed. All the money was gone.”

Tom interrupted. “Oh man, here come the excuses. I can see it already.”

Howard shook it off and continued. “I went home and nobody was there. I found the kids with her mother. And she, she was…” Howard raked his fingers through his hair and took a deep breath. “She was with my business partner. They had taken it all. The money, the business; everything. All gone.”

I caught up to them at his place. She came to the door wearing a silk robe I gave her last Christmas. I just stood there dumbfounded for, I dunno, what seemed like forever. When I could finally make myself speak all I could do was ask her why. Why had she done this? She told me it was because I was a loser. She told me she was a woman with needs and that I never, from the day we were married, met them. She told me the kids would be better off without me and that any more contact with her or them would have to be through a lawyer.”

“Then she told me something else.”

Howard closed his eyes and seemed adrift for a moment in the vacuum of the soundless room. He opened them again and found the group transfixed, as though mesmerized and teetering toward whatever he would say next.

“She told me that she would kiss me goodbye but she didn’t think I’d like the taste of another man’s cock on her lips.”

A single tear slid from Howard’s eye and tracked down his cheek.

“I lost it,” he said, clinching his hand into a fist and beating it against his knee. “I punched her in the face and broke her nose. I just stood there afterward, looking at her on the ground with her face full of blood. It was like I was watching a movie with the sound off. Her mouth was moving and I knew she was crying and saying something, but I couldn’t hear any of it.”

“Of course I went to jail and that’s how I ended up here, as your new assignment, Ms. Pitts. Another statistic of domestic violence."

Tobi adjusted herself in her seat and gently cleared her throat, as though sensing her opportunity to speak and announcing that she was taking it. She spoke in a soft, rehearsed whisper, beaconing Howard to consider her question.

"Are you saying she deserved to be battered, Howard? That she deserved a broken nose?"

Howard seemed to think for a moment and then replied.

"No, Ms. Pitts. I am saying she deserved the ass kicking of a lifetime." The entire room seemed to animate in a flash as the men shifted around in their chairs. The circle filled with nodding heads. One of the men muttered "Fucking A right," under his breath but Howard heard it, and apparently so did Tobi. Her eyes narrowed to slits and she looked around the room at the men, as though wanting to identify who said it.

Nonplussed, she turned back to Howard and started to speak again, this time awkwardly, but he cut her off. "I'm not done." he said, His tone was final and unyielding. "You wanted me to talk and I am talking. You just listen." He settled himself for a moment, and then said, "Please."

Tobi gently bit her lower lip, and then gave Howard a reluctant, almost unperceivable nod.

"You'd think this was the worst of it, but it's not. After doing flips for weeks to try to see my daughters, last week I was allowed to talk to my oldest, Lisa, on the telephone. I was thinking the whole time that as bad as things were that I could live with it, that I could manage a way to move forward if I could just be with my children. I was so happy to have Lisa on the phone. I couldn't wait to tell her how much I missed her and that I couldn't wait to see her."

"But you know what she said when I told her that?" he said, and then whatever composure Howard had faltered. His will and strength buckled and folded under the brutal pressure of one last cataclysmic wave of wrenching pain. The tears poured forth like two rivers and his breathing came in great heaving hitches as he cupped his hands over his face and sobbed. He had to force out every word, one at a time, to finish his story.

"She said, 'I can't see you till you're better Daddy. Mommy told me that you're sick.' "

An hour later, Tobi Pitts sat in her office at a desk that was a sea of open charts. A dusty picture of two blond haired boys, one a toddler and the other about kindergarten age was taped on the side of her computer screen. There was no father in the snapshot.

She cradled the phone against one ear and drug a chart into her lap as she talked. "The last one here, Howard Franks. First show today. Pretty typical. His wife had an affair so he thought it would be fine to rearrange her face. Totally in denial."

She paused for a moment and reached for a pen.

"He could be a problem, though. Smooth talker, that one, and calculated. In his first session the sick bastard had most of my group thinking he was the victim. Not that those morons know the difference. Luckily, I know the CPS worker assigned to his kids. I'll be giving her a call on this tomorrow."

A moment later, Pitts hung up the phone and turned to a blank page in Howard Franks chart. She wrote with the steady and dispassionate hand of a surgeon.

More She-male Trouble

Jack Donovan · 9 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A few months ago, I wrote a piece for The Spearhead about sportswriter Mike Penner, who was struggling with "gender identity issues" and who eventually killed himself. I took a little flak for suggesting that a large number if not a majority of male-to-female transsexuals were mentally unstable, and that feminists and cultural Marxists were doing these men harm by convincing them that they should try to become something that they could never truly be: women.

I was amused to find this fishy, tragicomic story today in The Oregonian.

Portland man accuses Hawthorne psychic of defrauding him of $150,000 including cash, Rolexes and a Hummer

> Drakar Druella was struggling with wrenching emotional problems last October when he walked into the Hawthorne Psychic Shop in Southeast Portland for a palm reading and met Cathy Stevens. […]
> Druella, who was struggling with his gender identity after undergoing a sex change, said Stevens told him she sensed his "twin-flame energy," and used Catholic symbolism that resonated with Druella, who was raised Catholic. She connected with him in a way that other spiritual teachers had not.

This story has a lot of potentially interesting angles.

Are lawyers infringing on the religious rights of gypsies? Do professional soothsayers offer any services that do not qualify as a con? How might a ruling in this case against the defendant impact tony Feng Shui advisers? And isn't a hummer something you're supposed to get at a Chinese massage parlor?

I'm frankly a little skeptical about the doe-eyed, confused tranny thing in this case. The Portland Center for Spiritual Living has a profile for Drakar Druella that indicates he is a "Certified Science of Mind Spiritual Practitioner" who "blends music with the healing art of meditation and prayer in his practice." In other words, he wasn't exactly a tortured soul who wandered off the street on a rainy night looking for answers. He was a pro. Stevens' lawyer claims that the two were business partners. Maybe they were, maybe they weren't.

Either you have a mentally unstable post-op here who was vulnerable enough to give $150,000 to a cheesy gypsy psychic, or you have a gypsy-tranny team who had a falling out, or maybe even a gypsy-tranny con team trying to play the legal system. No matter how this all plays out, it doesn't really do much to validate the feminist, politically correct, "celebrate diversity" public relations line on the transgendered.

File this under "a lot of trannies are a little bit nuts." Many are also apparently wrapped up in the kind of sketchy New Age mumbo jumbo that can mean anything you want it to mean — ask my critic, the Nuclear Unicorn, Quinnae Moongazer.

By the way — I'm up for jury duty this summer.

Pick me, pick me!

EDIT/UPDATE -

So I was just emailed by a female friend of mine on Facebook who knew the transgendered person in question when she (that's right, the papers were being politically correct–Drakar Druella was born female) was first "questioning" a couple of decades ago as a teenager. According to my friend, Druella seemed "deeply troubled" and was clinging to New Age spirituality even then. My friend also suspected that this was a business partnership gone bad, based on her experiences with Druella.

To clarify, Druella is a female-to-male transsexual. This story is very Portland, Oregon.

Chairman Mao's Offer

Welmer · 10 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A couple of years ago, redacted notes of negotiations Mao Zedong had with Henry Kissinger in 1973 were released, and they highlighted an amusing exchange between the supreme leader of China and the great statesman.

Noting that China was a poor country with little to offer, the Chairman suggested that he could ship over Chinese women. First, he suggested sending thousands of women, but after some thought came up with a figure of 10 million.

His reasoning was as follows:

> Let them go to your place. They will create disasters. That way you can lessen our burdens.
> Do you want our Chinese women? We can give you ten million. By doing so we can let them flood your country with disaster and therefore impair your interests. In our country we have too many women, and they have a way of doing things…

The talks continued for some time, and Mao kept bringing up the subject of women and the troubles they were causing for China. One of his aides suggested that the public would be upset if the offer were made public, but the elderly Chairman, hinting at his mortality, said: "I'm not afraid of anything. Anyway, God has sent me an invitation."

Envy: The Root of All That Kills

Hestia · 10 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Pride, envy, avarice – these are the sparks have set on fire the hearts of all men.
~Dante

It's said that love of money is the root of all that kills, but all too often it seems that the problem runs deeper than money itself, which places envy at the root of all that kills. Envy comes in many different forms, some positive and welcome, such as admiration and emulation, but other forms are far darker, to the point of being destructive — perhaps even deadly.

While envy colors human interactions of all kinds, women seem to be especially prone to the most harmful effects envy can bring about. This is clearly on display when interactions between women are observed. Women fight amongst themselves over who is prettier, married to the best man, has children who are the most gifted, or owns the nicest things. There are harsh verbal exchanges even between friends when one friend enjoys success the other has not achieved. Friendships that seemed strong may fizzle over such a happy time as an engagement or a new baby's birth. Envy has the potential to run so deeply in some women that no meaningful connections and relationships can be shared between a particular women and others, including a woman's own daughters. For some Snow White is not merely a fairy tale but a realistic glimpse into their life.

Sadly, the destructive nature of female envy does not stop there. Far from it in fact: envy also runs amok in connections between the two sexes, both on the individual level and on a grander scale. All too often women look at men and what feminists say men collectively have and start wanting what they do not have. The idea of male power, greater earnings and careers that are more powerful may all have great appeal, but in the envious pursuit of such things, women neglect to see what it takes to attain such success or what sacrifices were necessary for men to have power in a patriarchal society of the past. They see the man sitting on top as a CEO but can't imagine for an instant the immense burdens on his shoulders by virtue of being the man in charge. They see the newly divorced dad being given partial custody, less of the burden they say, not appreciating the grief that comes with losing an important full-time role in the lives of his kids. They see the warrior receiving a medal for his valor but not his dead and gravely wounded comrades suffering far away from the limelight. A stay-at-home mother may envy her husband's time with adults at work but cannot empathize with the pressures that come with being the sole breadwinner. They see men portrayed as heroes who never cower back in fear but don't realize how many men commit suicide, live homeless on the streets, or suffer from heart attacks and stress related diseases.

Women are missing out on the fact that the privileges that were afforded by masculinity in the past and are claimed by feminists to exist in the present day, came with immense sacrifice, responsibility, and hardship. They weren't gifts that were handed to men, unearned and on a silver platter, but privileges that had to be earned, ones that often came with a heaping helping of responsibility. When these important facts are forgotten, women lose out on the ability to see men as humans, as fellow travelers in the twisting and turning journey that is life. Envy is deadly, for it not only holds back the sufferers but denies them the ability to see others as humans, to feel their pain, care about their burdens, and empathize with their plight. It poisons the deeply afflicted to the point they lose their rationality, the hope of connecting with others, of seeing reality for what it is, and possibly even their humanity if true evil comes to fruit from the seeds of their envy. Until women get their envy in check en masse and convert their feelings to the starting point for purposeful change and self-examination, the fire of the gender war will continue to blaze with no hope of being extinguished.

Iron Man 2: A Brief Interpretive Analysis

Elusive Wapiti · 10 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Went to see Iron Man 2 yesterday. Overall, it was an enjoyable movie, although not nearly as good as the first. What follows is a brief review and interpretive analysis of the movie.

Basic Review. I stand aside and let the pros at CSM have that honor.

Character development. Both movies are technologically excellent and technologically equivalent–the sequel doesn't wow with special effects that the first lacked. What distinguishes a sequel in this case, then, is the depth and development of its characters and their movement along the story arc. This, unfortunately, is the big weakness of the movie. Stark of course remains the sigma he was in the first, only this time around, his ego swells to such Rush Limbaugh, sun-eclipsing proportions that it is almost painful to watch. His buddy Rhodes (played this time by Don Cheadle) sinks from delta to near-gamma-dom (note: I am using Vox Day's game taxonomy here), as the pecking order that Rhodes works in forces him to do some things that he'd rather not do, right before he is converted into Samsonite–that is, baggage–trapped inside a hijacked super suit. The new villain Vanko is probably the character in this movie written and played with the most depth; in fact, Rourke's Vanko would have stolen many of the scenes had it not been for Downey's natural magnetism. The Potts character loses much of her mommy-girlfriend-secretary depth in a flat performance by Paltrow. I find myself wondering why Jackson's Nick Fury character is there at all, other than to confuse the viewer with a reprise of one of Jackson's many other 'bad mutha f*cka' roles as Jules Winnfield in Pulp Fiction. And the Rushman/Romanoff character, which, I'll be honest, is probably the single best reason why male IronMan fans will see this movie (other than the CGI graphics and the super suits, that is), is the stereotypical two dimensional super-woman that we are all have come to expect for female lead and/or supportive characters in action movies.

Themes. I'm really waiting for Hollywood to come up with some new tropes, for the standard bad/neglectful father meme (both the protagonist Stark and the antagonist Vanko have an absent father and an abusive/acoholic father, respectively), the evil corporatist, and the ass-kicker-yet-looks-great-in-heels female lead are getting rather threadbare.

Interestingly, and as the counterpart to the bad-dad meme, the mothers of the two leading male characters figure into the story not at all, leaving this viewer to wonder to what deficit are we to attribute the defects in the Stark and Vanko characters…to ill- or malfunctioning fathers, or to mothers so ineffectual as to be absent from the narrative entirely? Continuing the curious slight against female characters, women are by and large a fashion accessory in this movie–particularly on Stark's arm where they appear happy to be, in a nod to hidden-in-plain-sight female hypergamy and giving lie to womankind's loudmouthed agitations for equality. However, one notable exception to this fashion accessory rule is the Potts character who, while still donning somewhat conservative knee-length dresses and shoulder-baring garb, manages to perform a useful economic function other than eye candy. Unfortunately for Potts, this movie reveals her character to be quite out of her depth as anything other than a combination executive assistant and a nagging mommy/love interest.

Then we have Rushman/Romanoff, the petite yet unrealistically large breasted, ass-kicking, smart-chick Lara Croft archetype so common to mainstream action-oriented entertainment marketed to priapic adolescent males. We see this archetype quite often, which is a shame because, in the absence of any other model for women, this movie joins the chorus of countless others singing one single, three-pronged tune to the boys and girls who happen to view it: that (a) it is quite okay for a girl/woman to spam the environment with her sexuality via provocative dress (more on that later), (b) that a female can wear high heels and defeat nearly a dozen men twice her size in hand-to-hand-combat, and (c) that given sufficient training, a woman can reasonably expect to best men in physical hand-to-hand combat. None are realistic expectations, and any sane woman would eschew attempting to do lest serious, even fatal consequences result. Yet this movie propagates this theme to an audience of girls and young women who haven't been told much different their entire life. And therein lays the problem.

Social Commentary. This movie is chock full of social commentary if one bothers to look. One of the more obvious editorials is against slimy corporatists personified by Justin Hammer, played quite well in all its disgusting glory by Sam Rockwell. The viewer is invited to hate on evil corporations and the amoral suits that lead them. However, a point that would be easy to miss in this movie is this one: the slimy corporatist defense contractor requires an equally slimy military-industrial complex to survive, thus illustrating the seamy symbiotic relationship between government agencies and the companies they fund. Keep that in mind the next time you, dear reader, are tempted to voice support for government 'regulation' of the private sector of any kind…calls for more regulation are merely a smokescreen for government agents colluding with big corporations to force out smaller competitors, and/or enhancing their power by blurring the line between public and private.

Another sly commentary offered up by the movie, again if one bothers to look beneath the surface, regards women in the workplace. In one scene, after catching Stark repeatedly eyeballing a provocatively dressed Rushman, Potts chides him for oogling her and for thereby exposing himself and the company to a sexual harassment lawsuit. Particularly since the Rushman character works in the legal department. The surface message here is that men are to be rightly punished for noticing that an attractive woman in their midst is wearing a skin-tight sheath to the office and that her battleship guns are slewed prominently forward for everyone's ocular enjoyment. But that was the surface message…the first underlying message for me however, is how retrograde women can be in the workplace, how much potential they have to rob a male office environment of its natural efficiency, and how hazardous it it to employ women in this day and age. Of course, said sexual harassment suit would never be forthcoming because Stark is a sigma; lesser men, say deltas or lower, well I have no doubt had they gazed upon Rushman's platter, they would have been roundly punished. For we all know that sexual harassment is one of the only crimes that is dependent on the feelings of the woman receiving the attention. If she likes it–i.e., the man is within her erotic field of regard, all is well. If she doesn't like it, i.e., the man is a 'loser' or a 'creep' or any other appellation given to a fellow not within her erotic field of regard, well he's about to be on the receiving end of our society's control of errant male sexuality.

This brings me to the second sub-surface message embedded in the Stark-Potts-Rushman oogling scene–the contrast between the libertine permissiveness granted to expressions of women's sexuality in the culture and the legally enforced restraints upon expressions of male sexuality. Call it Victorianism in reverse…whereas female sexuality was limited and restricted in the Victorian era, in the feminist era, male sexuality is suppressed, punished, branded with the proverbial scarlet letter whenever it surfaces. Women can flaunt, but men dare not leer. Women can brazenly tease, but men dare not react. Riddle me this, Black Widow: which sex is oppressed and which sex is the oppressor in the new sexual calculus?

The third piece of commentary that Iron Man 2 offers pertains to the permissible roles of women in the feminist era. Once again, we are treated to yet another installment of woman in film as either the sexpot or the strong, hot, smart, capable Superwoman. What does that say about modern feminism's allowable roles for women when they should aspire to be an unattainable Lara Croft or, failing that, to be arm candy for some polygynous alpha? Where is the role for the old-school woman who built this culture and this society right alongside her man, bearing his children along the way? Where is the archetype of the frontier woman, who worked hard, had grit, helped her husband provide for the family, and was undeniably strong, yet feminine? Nowhere to be found in this movie or in the culture at large is this archetype…the strong woman who shovels the f*cking gravel with dignity, grace, and anonymity. Instead, we are treated to images of blustery paper tigers who are pussies underneath all the sturm und drang. That is what our daughters are to aspire to, I suppose, which is too bad. No thanks, says I…my daughter(s), should I be blessed with any, will not be limited in this fashion and instead be taught to be the full woman, the complement to man, that God intended her(them) to be.

Bottom line: Iron Man 2 was entertaining and technologically competent, but the character development was flat and the plot was recycled and unimaginative. A bit of subterranean social commentary in there for those willing to do the spade work to find it.

French Finance Minister Christine Lagarde: Constant Efforts Required to Realize Women's Power

One of the things that bothers me the most about putting women in positions of power is that they almost always plainly state that their job is to empower women over men. I can't think of one single female politician or appointed official who has said that she will be entirely impartial in matters of sex, and refuse to favor women over men. Men, on the other hand, always state either their impartiality or their willingness to favor women.

Say an Italian American were elected in New Jersey – not much of a stretch there – and upon assuming his office he declared it his intention to promote people of Italian descent over other Americans, noting all the ways in which they are superior to others. Of course, the guy would be pilloried by the press. He'd be mocked and denounced across the nation. But give a woman a chance, and she'll tell the world how much better women are and clearly state her intent to favor them over men — and the kicker is that she'll be applauded for doing so and given a pedestal upon which to stand and dish out abuse to men.

For a prime example of this, take a look at the New York Times editorial in which Christine Lagarde expounds upon the superiority of females with that pompous, Gallic certitude that we all know and love:

> When women are called to action in times of turbulence, it is often on account of their composure, sense of responsibility and great pragmatism in delicate situations.
> Audur Capital, an Icelandic private equity fund wholly managed by women, is the only such fund to have made it through the crisis without a hitch. And in February 2009, Iceland's citizens chose a woman, Johanna Sigurdardottir, as prime minister in the midst of the country's financial crisis. At the other end of the spectrum, Muhammed Yunus first turned to women to promote micro-lending. They now account for 97 percent of his 8 million borrowers in Bangladesh. When he launched that revolution in 1976, he knew that women would use their loans to advance projects or purchase tools, while he was wary of what men might do with the money.

For her examples, she chooses some obscure stories from countries that don't matter much at all in terms of global finance. Iceland's economy is smaller than Idaho's, and Bangladesh is one of the world's most impoverished, backward states. Audur Capital, which has about 30 million Euros, is in league with Björk, and has been around for all of three years. Yunus may lend primarily to women in Bangladesh because it is easier to collect from them, and because they need loans for dowries.

> The time is long past when women were relegated to discussing world events at tea time. In the economic and political arena they are assuming ever greater power. The current economic crisis affords us an opportunity to impose more responsible, moderate and equitable approaches to finance.

Women are more responsible, moderate and equitable? Where did this received wisdom come from?

> The list of women who hold positions of responsibility is growing daily, and a woman in a position of power is no longer the exception that proves the rule. I know, however, that nothing can ever be taken for granted, that the situation remains tenuous, and that constant efforts are required to turn "women's power" into a shared reality.

OK, here's where we really ought to be worried. What are these "constant efforts" that are required? Must men be smashed down on a constant basis to "turn women's power into a shared reality?"

I'm afraid that's exactly the idea.

> Although the compensation gap is closing gradually and universities have enrolled as many women as men, if not more, many boards of directors and cabinet meetings should better reflect the world's diversity and draw on different viewpoints and experiences.

Here we see the familiar, constant refrain of "you build it, we take it over." Do women feel even the faintest bit of gratitude toward men for having developed these institutions in the first place? Does that mean anything to them?

I suppose I don't understand why all of these things that were created by men will be better managed by women. It simply doesn't make sense. In fact, I don't think women will run them as well as men — I think it would be a disaster to hand male-created institutions wholesale over to women. But that seems inevitable, so I suppose we'll see what comes of it.

The truth is that people always make a mess of things, no matter who's in charge. There will be no brave new world with a woman at the helm, guiding us to a better society. With women in charge the mess will probably be worse than otherwise, because the most vital attribute of the state is force, which is expressed by men, and vanishingly few women can effectively command men. It's simply contrary to human nature for men – especially fierce ones – to submit to female authority.

Female power in the West has rested solely on the willingness of men to enforce a chivalric ideal, but that ideal has been turned on its head by its own excess. Now, women will have to pay men cash for their allegiance, and that will prove to be their undoing, because it is also contrary to human nature for women – especially proud ones – to pay men.

Guest Post Guidelines

Welmer · 11 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We've been getting quite a few reader submissions lately, but unfortunately I haven't been able to get to all of them due to the torrents of email I've been getting lately. I'm getting so much email from readers and others that submissions are simply getting lost in the midst of it all. This is too bad, because I really appreciate guest submissions. They add content and perspective, and readers who may not want to regularly write articles have an opportunity to share what's on their mind with thousands of people.

So, to make things a little smoother, I've come up with a few guidelines that will help me identify reader submissions and make it easier to post them:

- Put "Spearhead article" in the email subject line
- Submit the post as an .rtf (rich text file) if you want me to use your formatting, and I can fairly easily transfer it into the post
- Include links (links will carry over from .rtf)
- Let me know what name/pen name you want me to put in the introduction
- Finally, if you have a blog of your own be sure to plug it at the end of the post (if you want)

That ought to do it.

Keep 'em coming!

Trans-Fashion

Welmer · 11 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A reader recently posted a link to a hilarious set of photos in the Sidney Morning Herald. Apparently, there was an Australian fashion show last night in which men wore black dresses and sashayed around in androgynous display. Absurd gender bending has become the norm as popular culture metastasizes into grotesque parody.

I'd post more of the photos, but they're owned by the local Getty Images co., and I don't think they'd be happy about that, so if you want to feel both amused and sad at the same time, follow this link.

When you see this kind of stuff, it's pretty hard to deny that our society is a farce. If I were some Taliban mullah in Afghanistan and I saw these photos, I'd be very optimistic about defeating NATO.

Witch Sacrifices Man, Then Cries Rape

I don't know if reading the Spearhead has opened my eyes wider and sharpened my senses when it comes to detecting the misandry lurking beneath the surface of American life, or if society is just getting progressively wackier, but these news articles just keep popping up, and every time I think I've heard it all, something comes along to prove me wrong…

> Cops: Wiccan listed victim as 'sacrifice' in phone
> ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) – A self-described Wiccan had a man's phone number programmed in her cell phone under the word "sacrifice" before she stabbed him to death, then claimed he had tried to rape her, authorities said Thursday.
> She told police she stabbed Leyba three times in the stomach after he tied her up and tried to assault her.
> But police say Leyba was stabbed 11 to 13 times, and a detective reviewing Sanford's cell phone found the nickname "sacrifice" instead of Leyba's name.
> "It makes us absolutely confident there was something more here than her claims of self-defense," said Patrick Davis, a spokesman for the Bernalillo County district attorney's office.
> [...]
> She told police Leyba attacked her, tied her hands with her rope belt, took the dagger from her pocket and made sexual gestures.
> Sanford told investigators that to keep from being raped, she let Leyba think she wanted to seduce him. She stripped to her underwear and persuaded him to lie down, then knelt above him, grabbed the dagger and stabbed him three times before fleeing.

Many would say the woman in question is plainly insane (the pagan aspect of the case sure doesn't help, I mean, who really believes in that stuff?), but leaving aside the fact that she purchased this ritualistic dagger and conveniently had it on her person during a date, she clearly had the presence of mind to know that an accusation of "RAPE!" would afford her an excellent chance of getting off scot-free. If she hadn't actually listed the hapless male as a "sacrifice" on her cell-phone, she might have even escaped the murder charge altogether.

Is this incident freakish and titillating because of its unusual trappings? Yes. But on a personal note, this story speaks to me because of an experience I had when I was online dating, 5 or 6 years ago. I made the [brief] acquaintance of a woman on "Yahoo personals" who was a clear 9, if the profile pictures were anything approaching reality. At it happened, she was rather coy about the particulars of her relationship status, and directed me to her personal web page to find out more about her. A cursory search did not find it, but did find numerous entries of someone with the same username on a satanic website. After reading some of the posts under that name, I was convinced that this was the same woman, as the avowed Satanist lived in my area and employed a few of the exact same phrases that she had used in emails to me. Furthermore, it turned out she was in an "open" marriage and boasted of having an underground vault with a stone altar upon which she practiced bloodletting ceremonies, some of which were capable of summoning demons! I was appalled, yet, truth be told, perversely fascinated. I emailed her with my findings and hit the ball in her court, interested to hear whatever bizarre explanation she could supply, but she never replied again. Upon further reflection, I can't help but think: What if I had arranged a date with her? Would I have even made it out alive?

Obviously, up to this point men have been directly responsible for far more murders than women, and no doubt this will continue, despite the increased propensity for violence that modern-day women are exhibiting. I can sense the trolls gearing up now, “What? Do you know how many women are killed by MEN every year?!!!”, etc. That’s not the point. Though she told hikers at the scene that she had been raped, she modified her story to the authorities, no doubt to account for the fact that there was no physical evidence of sexual trauma. Note the subtle distinction here: the justification is not even that she killed him because she was supposedly raped. It’s that she killed him because he might have raped her if she didn’t kill him. Ms. Sanford was actually seriously advocating murder as a now acceptable means of rape prevention!

Ironically, a lot of the Yahoo comments on the article consistently addressed the Wiccan angle, saying, “well, she’s not a real Wiccan if she murdered someone”, or even “most Wiccan’s aren’t like that!”, a dim echo of the standard female apologist line heard so often in this venue. It goes without saying that these neopagan and allegedly pre-historic practices are primarily gynocentric, with the earth, moon or nature viewed as a female goddess figure. Such spiritual world views would be very appealing to feminists, just as the patriarchy codified within traditional Christianity is distasteful to them.

In this particular event, the authorities were smart enough to call her out on the blatant B.S. emanating from her story. But it begs the question: if false rape claims are now a standard weapon in the feminists’ arsenal, are claims for potential rape going to now be popularized to justify further misandric crime?

Conservative Misandry

Hestia · 12 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The evils of misandry and feminism are oftentimes believed to come packaged in one particular way, the leftist branch feminism that immediately pops into mind when the topic is mentioned. While this may indeed be the most visible type of anti-male streak running through our culture today, this is not the only form, nor the type of misandry that is most harmful. There is a strain of feminism, one I've dubbed "conservative feminism" that is typically comes packaged in sparkles, ribbons, and bows. At first glance, this form may seem innocent, but upon pondering certain ideas and stereotypes floating around out there, one will quickly realize that something sinister is flying around the conservative religious world that proclaims their hatred for feminism.

Any belief system or idea that attempts to elevate women above men or proclaim femininity better than masculinity is feminism. In both leftist and conservative feminism this is done, often using the same wrongful ideas about men, just spinning them a bit differently for their intended audiences.

As you will see below, in conservative feminism, we find hatred of men in many ways:

Men As Wallets- In every part of society, men are now treated as walking breathing wallets. It is their job to hand over money to state through child support and alimony when marriages go wrong. Men are still expected to cover the bill for dating and they typically bear the burden of breadwinner even in two income households.

In the conservative world, the burden of work takes an even more troubling turn as woman are taught they have a right to stay home with their children and if their husband cannot afford to provide the standard of living that makes this necessary, then he is out of God's will, a sinner, or backslidden. When the talk turns to Titus 2 or other other verses used to support this women's right, there is not an admonishment to wives to be frugal, to be industrious and start a home business, a garden for cooking and canning, or so forth, just a strict requirement for men without a rule of cooperation on the part of women. Staying at home is simply her right, with no responsibility to aid the burden of breadwinning.

Men are not allowed to express their anxiety, anguish, or upset about this rule and expectation, but are made to suffer in silence, carrying their burden alone. In fact, men's fear is so poorly tolerated that should a man express genuine concern over not being able to have more children, for fear of feeding them in tumultuous economic times, his worry will be brushed aside and said to be the sin of "not trusting the Lord". The poor man is simply to worry himself to a heart attack, work more hours and miss out on the lives of his children, or risk having his worst fear–that of being a financial failure–come true.

Men As Expendable- Our culture sees men as disposable. We have yet to establish an Office of Men's Health, do not provide the same amount of funding for diseases that primarily effect men as we do for women, and we collectively expect men to perform the most unpleasant and dangerous of jobs, from coal mining and logging to law enforcement and serving in the military, without so much as an ounce of appreciation for putting their lives on the line for the enjoyment/protection of us all.

Conservative feminism takes this a step farther by expecting men to take on the responsibilities of modern day chivalry. Some ministries have publicly expressed contempt for men at Virginia Tech who did not take bullets for their women classmates when the tragic shooting occurred on the campus. Others preach that it must be husbands who do the dirty and gross jobs around the house, that is must be husbands who check for the bumps in the night, and that should there be an emergency of some sort, it better be the husband who is operating the fire extinguisher or hammering the boards before the hurricane arrives. There is no talk of women humbling themselves and learning to help alongside their husbands, if this is what their husbands would like, or being prepared to be their own heroes should a situation warrant this. On the contrary, in many instances, anything labeled as "mans work" will be considered a feminist activity and thus inappropriate for a wife to do, even if she must (as in the case of the wife of a deployed soldier like myself) or if her husband encourages her to help him with such tasks. There is not even admonishments to be appreciative of men for taking on chivalrous duties, but rather an expectation of such special treatment is taught.

Fathers As Optional- We all know in what low regard fathers are held in today, and sadly this reality does not end at the church door. The contempt had for fathers may not be as open as it is in mainstream society, however, it's well and alive despite being a bit more hidden. We often hear talk about how much small children need their mother at home, how they cannot grow and thrive without them. We'll see motherhood elevated to the highest levels, being considered the most important and difficult job in the world. While this isn't a bad thing, the lack of high praise for fatherhood, or even mere mention of a father's importance, is striking. Yes children of all ages need their mothers, but they need their fathers just as much, from the bittiest baby to the teenager entering adulthood.

When traditional women bemoan women being in the military, the typical reason named is because the children miss and need their mothers. The reality of fathers deploying and leaving behind children is absent, not thought of at all. This is the same when the Titus 2 mandate is discussed. The importance of having mothers spending quantity time with their children is raised to the level of the highest importance, yet the reality of fathers perhaps working two jobs or more than 40 hours work week, and thus hardly seeing their children at all, does not warrant a mention. If fatherhood was being held in the high position it needs to be, this stunning disregard for daddies wouldn't be uttered without objections and dissent.

Men As Perverts- "All heterosexual sex is rape" the leftist feminists proclaim, and while the conservative feminists may take the gross crime of rape off the table, a respect for healthy male sexuality they do not bring. In the conservative world, there are numerous harmful stereotypes floating about when it comes to sex. For starters, all men are not seen to be potential rapists but potential adulterers. There exist books and advice is shared that encourages wives to use sex as a means of manipulation. Women are being advised they need to be intimate with their husbands not because they love them and desire to be close to them, not for the bonding experience, not to celebrate this special gift God has given to married couples but rather to prevent their husbands from straying. What could be a beautiful expression is lowered to the level of deceit and manipulation just like that.

Perhaps not quite as sinister but still problematic is the contempt had for the male sex drive. A man's sexual desire is at best merely tolerated and at worst, looked at as a perverted dysfunction for he is not "normal" like a woman. Cruel jokes are often made by woman, both in mixed company and not, about a man's sex drive, remarks about how husbands always want it, laughter about denying one's husband, and many other words to pathologize healthy male virility.

Men As Immoral Uncivilized Brutes- The Victorian "angel in the house" is still alive and well in today's world and nowhere does this appear to be more true than in the churches today. Never pausing for a brief moment to consider that the cherished idea of chivalry and men as soldiers allows women to live in a civilized world with special perks, the declaration of women as the more civilized & moral sex is shouted from many a pulpit today. (And nevermind that it is women who have initiated 70% of divorces and killed millions upon millions of precious babies, neither of which are moral or civilized by any definition…) Typical male traits, such as courageousness, justice, fairness, and take charge initiation are denigrated so that female nurturing, passivity, openminded love, and modesty can instead be elevated as the correct way to be morality. The reality of an important balance existing between these two types of morality, making both worthy of celebration is never mentioned and becomes all the more downplayed as churches feminize further, pushing men from their pews.

Men At Fault- Men are blamed for much in today's day and age, both in and out of the church, but the most disturbing fault I have ever heard placed on men is that of their wife's willful rebellion and self chosen sins. There are people preaching the heresy that if only men led their wives better, these women would never sin, commit adultery, or do anything of this sort. If men were taking charge correctly, their wives would submit to them and never do wrong. In some denominations and churches, this is taken a step further, not merely placing the burden of a wife's sin on a husband here on earth, but for all eternity as well. Lessons are being taught that state a man will be held accountable to God for the decisions his wife made, including those that went against his wishes and directions. Actions of which the husband had no part. This is outrageous.

Men As Unfeeling Robots- This final idea about men should be perfectly obvious with all the terrible ideas that are allowed to circle around about men and masculinity, for if we cared about men's feelings, these lies would not be allowed to spread. In our culture, we have a very narrow view on male emotional expression and are quick to judge a boy or man who does not fit into this stereotype. "Man up" and "boys don't cry" starts on the tot lot playground.

We expect men to be able to hear the most cruel of words and not take them to heart. Men are expected to put themselves on the line for others with no appreciation and no way to seek emotional support to ease the many burdens placed upon their shoulders. All men are expected to handle trying times without help or support and some men–especially law enforcement, firemen, soldiers, and others we'd see as "tough guys"– are expected to hold in all the terrible sights they have seen, man up and keeping going on. Men from all walks of life are told to toughen up all the way to a suicide, heart attack, or breakdown. And even then, we'll collectively feel for his family more than we will for him. "Oh his poor wife and children, I wonder how they are handling this tragedy."

We also expect men to express their anger at real slights in a feminine way, so we women feel most comfortable. Women seek to tell me how to feel. They seek to own the experiences of men. They attempt to tell men how masculinity should be lived and what they experienced. Men are not allowed to own their emotions, life experiences, or masculinity, for this makes women uncomfortable. Our culture attempts to silence them, to appease those who are scared of men being men on their own terms.

Woman As Children- For my final note on conservative feminism, women as children is the topic I must bring up. Just as is the case with leftist feminism, the conservative strain does not seek to help us mature into capable adult women who can be true helpmeets to our husband and mothers to our children. Instead, it seeks to keep us as children forever.

The Christian principle of male headship is often twisted to mean that women do not need to take responsibility for anything in their family for this falls in the husband's duties. A husband must provide the paycheck, the discipline for children, and all the hard work around the house while the wife stays home with the children and doesn't truly work at home. Wives are not encouraged to ask their husbands what they need to best help them, to form a healthy type of cooperation in which a marriage and children can thrive, to help bear the load with the men with whom they are supposed to share and build a life with. The talk is most often exclusively on privilege rather responsibility, leaving husbands with a lopsided bargain which adds far more the his plates of responsibility than to his wife's.

Misandry and women-first ideology come in many forms, not always from the left-leaning bra-burning side of the political sphere.

The Church's Own Teachings Create Broken Homes

Elusive Wapiti · 12 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Author's note: this post first appeared over at The Elusive Wapiti on July 3d, 2008. It remains as timely now as it did then]

Joe Carter's post titled "Don't Marry a Proverbs 31 Woman" got me thinking about how today's church inadvertently reinforces traditions that run counter to scripture–often conflating human traditions passed down through the years with scriptural directives–and creating suffering and misery as a result. Simply because things are done a certain way for a certain amount of time does not mean that tradition is ordained by God or is reinforced anywhere in scripture. Yet the Church does just that.

For instance, take the "men as provider" paradigm that Christian men are supposed to aspire to. Yes, men are to care for their families and others who depend on them (1 Tim 5:8, et al). But that is not their only function–they are to "provide" in other ways as well, such as instruction of their children (women as primary/sole teachers of children is a very recent phenomenon in Western Civ), provide covering to their wives, and provide leadership to the family. The problem here is that the Church propagates a role for men in keeping with the post-Industrial Revolution paradigm. This paradigm reinforces a strict specialization of duties within the home along sex lines–it specifies that men are to sell their labors outside the home for wages with little involvement inside the home, while women are to labor only within it. I contend that these sex roles fall well short of the Biblical roles for men and women in the family.

Prior to industrialization, when the economy was more agrarian, men worked within or very near to the home, often with their children (and their wives) at their sides. However, industrialization tore men away from the home to exchange their labor for money in locations distant to the home and family. This left their wives behind to assume the full burden of domestic duties. Over time, those elements of provision performed by men within the four walls of the home–such as instruction and leadership of the home–were abdicated to women entirely as the men simply weren't there to perform the full range of their God-given duties, and unfortunately contemporary Christianity has assimilated this culture. The modern church teaches that man is to provide financially for his family; little mention is made of the other roles that men used to perform within the family. The traditional family model employed by the West for thousands of years was forgotten over the span of two centuries. The Church enforces this truncated conceptualization of male provision its membership, thus leading to sin and inflicting suffering and harm on the Body, particularly the children of the Body, which I will address in a moment.

But it isn't just men who are artificially limited by this teaching of sex roles–women are limited as well. Yes, women are equal heirs to the Good News. Yes, they are to be help meets. Yes they are to focus their efforts primarily on the home. But an objective read of Proverbs 31 provides many examples of women working outside the home–including income-generating activity–to support and even complement the husband's effort to provide for those that reside within it. Yet the message from the church is that a woman's place is in the home, never in the paid employ of another, or even herself. Again, this stunted view and legalistic of the proper female role in the family leads to sin and misery.

This brings me to my critique of the church's promotion of overly restrictive and counter-scriptural sex roles for men and women. The error of the Church's erroneous prescriptions is expressed in many ways. First is that men are defined by the money they earn or the job that they have; their contribution to the family is solely a financial one, with the result that the family is deprived of male headship, a father's guidance, a father's teaching, and a fully developed masculine role model. Over time, the family is deprived of the husband/father entirely through elevated male mortality, as men literally work themselves into the grave providing money to their families when what that family needs more is his leadership.

Second, women are burdened with responsibilities that aren't theirs to bear, while being told by the Church that they can't work outside the home if they are to be Godly women. The result is incomplete teaching of children, exhausted mothers, unhappy wives married to ghosts, and women given a disproportionate share of responsibility and authority in the central building block of society…the home.

The third way that the error of the Church is expressed perhaps comes to a head most poignantly during a divorce. Since men and women are taught that the man's job is to provide income for the family and the woman is to be in charge of everything else pertaining to the family, the Church's teachings cast the woman as the head of the family, if not in law, at least in practice. This inversion of God's intent greatly multiplies the divorce rate as well as putting men at a decided disadvantage during a divorce, where the secular culture, having assimilated the Church's teachings that a man's only duty to the family is to provide an income stream to women and children, maintains the status quo and continues to limit him to the role of visitor-banker after the marriage is dissolved. Once again, the Church reinforces the Industrial family paradigm: it lectures men about their financial responsibility to children who live with their ex wives, while failing to see value in the man's involvement with the children, or how the Church's own teachings lead to exactly the situation that religious leaders tut-tut about.

As a result, some of the people who are the biggest obstacles to family law reform and shared parenting are Christians, evangelical and otherwise. They cling to distorted notions of male and female sex roles, and in doing so, deprive children of the example of appropriate paternal and maternal involvement in the home. They simply cannot conceive of a role for men in the family beyond that of a walking bankbook, and a role for women beyond that of caring for children. Thus, in a post-divorce environment, they strongly reinforce the mother-custody, father-pays model to the long-term detriment of the children and society in general.

Unfortunately, in the West today, we are harvesting the rotten fruit of this grave misinterpretation of Scripture. Dads weep bitterly at the loss of their children before dying at a premature age. Moms groan under the burden of both providing and keeping the home. Children wonder why everyone is so unhappy and reject both marriage and the Church. And those concerned about liberty grow increasingly alarmed at the scope and size of the government Hydra that grows more and more heads when the atomistic family disintegrates.

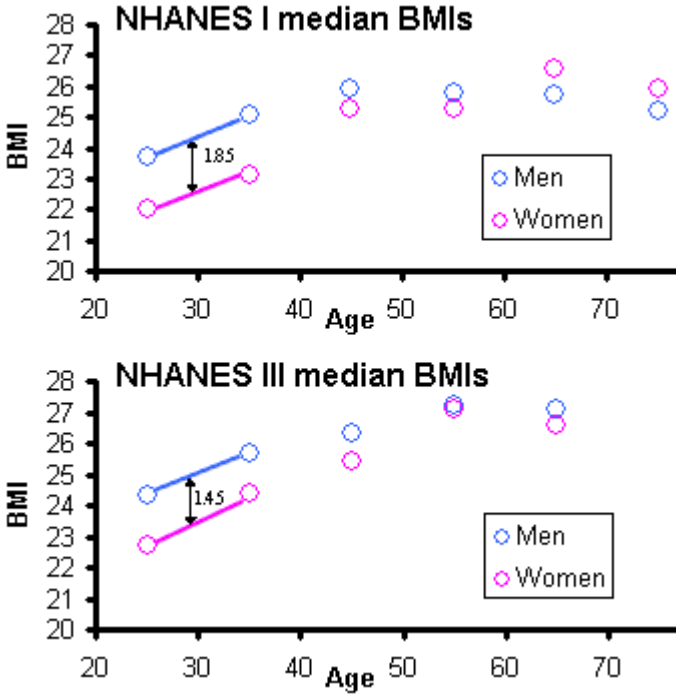
BMI Standards Mask Western Women's Growing Weight Problem

Welmer · 13 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've long wondered why men and women have both been assigned the same BMI value for being overweight, because it's obvious that if you take your average, normally-built man and woman of the same height, the man will be heavier. Despite this fact, the CDC and WHO use the same Body Mass Index (BMI) threshold for both men and women to determine whether they are overweight.

Exactly why these organizations choose to do so has not been explained, but it may be because Western women have grown increasingly fat since the 1960s. In fact, in a fifteen year period from the early 70s to the late 80s the BMI difference between men and women narrowed by nearly a half a point.



Does this mean that larger women are more natural? Was it the evil patriarchy that was keeping women thinner, healthier and more attractive?

Probably not, but the refusal to honestly address the fact that today's women are significantly fatter than men probably has a lot to do with the rise of female power. The last thing women want to hear is that they are fat. No, they'd rather Dr. Phil tell them how beautiful and special they are from his pulpit on TV as they gobble down cookies and ice cream. If some mean old government agency suggested they had a weight problem there'd be hell to pay, so the figures are manipulated to assuage their self esteem.

Fortunately, I found a doctor who is willing to set the record straight. Steven B. Halls, who runs a simple website with a number of health charts and calculators, has written an article discussing the problem with assigning the same BMI standards to men and women:

> Statistical fairness
> One problem with the current CDC & WHO threshold of "overweight" at 25 kg/m2 is that it is unfair to men. It labels a larger percentage of the Male population as overweight. If the male threshold were higher, or the female threshold were lower, then the proportion of overweight men and women would be more equal.
> A Danish study6 used a purely statistical method to define alternate BMI thresholds for overweightness, with equality between men and women as an important statistical criteria. It suggested a BMI of 27.2 kg/m2 for > men and 25.0 kg/m2 for women, as overweight thresholds. The “gap” between these figures is 2.2 kg/m2.

So, in the interests of equality, there should be a gap. However, it’s unlikely that this change will be made because, after all, equality would favor men in this case, and suggest that our women are fatter on the balance than men.

Facebook Accusation Lands Woman in Jail

Welmer · 13 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Zoe Williams, a British woman who accused her ex-boyfriend of rape after they broke up in 2007, has received a four month jail sentence for her lies. Her ex-boyfriend was investigated and briefly jailed when he declared himself innocent.

Ms. Williams, who was angered because she thought the police were skeptical of her accusation, faked a Facebook threat to make it appear that her ex was interfering with the investigation by warning her to drop her complaint.

In all likelihood, she was only jailed for trying to fool the court rather than trying to destroy a man's life, but her punishment is at least a step in the right direction. When the damage done to men by these false accusations becomes a factor in punishment, then we'll know that justice is starting to reform and take a hard line against women who use their power to accuse for evil purposes.

How to Build a Man Bomb

Dr. Paul · 13 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We have seen it through the ages countless times before. Whether in the French Revolution, or the dense and decaying inner city enclaves of Los Angeles and Detroit, the suppressed outrage of marginalized populations can erupt into mob violence, setting buildings and entire cultures ablaze.

The same precursors are always there, though by tradition, and perhaps by design, we ignore them. The discrimination, oppression, bigotry and other human failings we justify or disregard are the tools in the Great Societal Bomb Making Kit; a kit that has been a permanent fixture in human civilization. It is as though the occasional burning city, streets littered with the dead, or even toppled governments are every cultures proof of human authenticity. And we ignore the ticking down of the timer until the body bags begin to fill.

Until it is too late.

And now, in keeping with the annals of our rigorously ignored history, we are setting about the business again of orchestrating a future catastrophe. After a bloody revolution for our freedom, the scourge of slavery, an even bloodier civil war, and a civil rights campaign that we handled with police dogs, riot guns and water cannons, we have put ourselves right back on the course of an inescapable social crisis.

This time we are building a man bomb. And when this one detonates it could make the American race riots look like a Thanksgiving Day parade.

The misandric Zeitgeist, the system of feminist governance that most are sill loathe to acknowledge is about to head toward its inevitable and ugly conclusion, and the results of that will inflict another deep wound on the psyche of the western world.

In the men's rights community, a minority in its own right, we have long lamented the cruel and destructive war that has been waged against men and boys for the past half century. We've shouted endlessly at a deaf world that we were on the path to destruction, and we have watched our predictions of men being reduced to indentured servants to a malicious matriarchy come true, even as society continues to dismiss and humiliate us for speaking.

The buzz words and catch phrases have gone largely unchanged. They are now part of the common lexicon for those no longer blinded by the wool of a matriarchal matrix being pulled over their eyes. VAWA, child support, Title IV-D, false allegations, family court corruption, paternity fraud, male bashing, assumed guilt, man bad/woman good paradigm, phony wage gap, phony DV stats, media bias, etc., etc., etc.. All these terms and more are familiar to men and women who have seen through this transparent culture of hate and into an awareness of the problems we face, but do not acknowledge; problems we suffer from, but from which there is no relief.

Some have reacted with anger, some with hate, some with righteous indignation and others with resignation and hopelessness. But during these dark years there has been little public outrage, thanks to the benefit of human denial. For many men, it is always the other guy who gets raped in family court. It is someone else that lands behind bars on a false rape charge; some other unfortunate loses his career and reputation because the culture and the legal system assumes he must be guilty of whatever claim is made against him by a woman.

We have been a culture of head shakers, quick to say "tisk, tisk," and move on about our business, blind and indifferent, because it is not happening to us.

But there are forces in play today that will almost certainly unleash a fury that few can comprehend, and that nobody wants.

A recent Wall Street Journal article, Meet the Unemployable Man, predicts that over the next several years, one in six men between 18 and 54 years old, or 18 million, will be unemployed, and unemployable.

That is 18 million men who will look for work and find none; millions of others who once carried briefcases or hammers and nails, but who will, in the days ahead, push brooms make French fries. There will be 18 million men who become the other guy. And that is in addition to the millions of other guys that are already walking among us.

In other times, this would just be a run of economic bad luck which would pass with better times. But all the indicators are that better times will not find these men.

The typical escape route from poverty is education. But that route, too, for men, is being cut off by the very forces that are the source of the problem. Men are now only 40% of college students, with the indicators pointing to even more drastic reductions in the future. College, like employment, will soon be a woman's world.

And the 18 million men with nothing to do but worry and stagnate cannot be expected not to notice. And they may well begin to notice a great many things that they never did before, because they were happening to the other guy.

The ticking should be as thunder in our ears by now.

Oh, but wait, some might say. We can fix that. We can address what is happening to these men before their being marginalized and disenfranchised results in problems that no one can ignore.

We can, but it is not likely we will. Look at how the educational establishment is reacting to the proposed male studies initiative, an idea that actually would seek some answers. Men's studies activists like Michael Kimmel and American Men's Studies Association President Robert Heasley, are doing everything in their power to ensure men remain in trouble. These feminist ideologues appear roundly offended that any amelioration of these problems would come to men, and are proving it daily in word and deed.

The ranking members of the matriarchy, like social terrorists, are partnering with and guiding government toward the inevitable explosion, and when it goes off they will be the first to point the finger at men, even at MRA's, for the fallout.

It won't help them, though. Because whatever tragic end this comes to, it will not be at the hands of MRA's, but in spite of our efforts to prevent it.

If the streets erupt again, as they have so many times before, they will be filled with average men who never heard of the men's rights movement. They will just be poor men, many of them young and fatherless due to the current system, acting our their rage against a world that includes and idealizes women, but that treats them like social pariah.

They won't be thinking of VAWA or domestic violence hypocrisies, because they will be in large part the same men who have denied these problems all along.

We may see them in a tax revolt, or at tea parties gone violent at some point in the future when things are much worse than they are now. Or they may not have any political affiliation at all. But one thing is certain, that many desperate and hostile men are not going to remain silent. They will act as men have always acted in similar circumstances throughout history. And during the process, they will be looking again at many things they have ignored in the past. There will be volumes of information, long ignored, that will suddenly make devastating and dangerous sense to them.

It is a testament to men, and an exposure of lies perpetrated against them by gender ideologues that we have come this last half century without blood in the streets. It has always been in men's nature to take care of others better than themselves, and they have proven that with their silence in the face of so many constant abuses. Betting on that silence to continue when men are hungry is foolish.

It is possible that none of this will come to pass. I do not pretend to be a social prognosticator and I do not have a crystal ball. But I can add two and two and still get four, even in this crazy world. And I know that anyone, even men, if backed into a corner and kicked long enough and hard enough, will come out swinging. The 60's were not just peace, love and dope. They were cities on fire and bodies on the ground.

And because of that I write this genuinely afraid. The men's movement, the only bomb squad we have, had better catch on in grand fashion, I think. And even if it does, we better hope it happens before the society we live in finds itself at ground zero when the clock ticks down.

Tea Party Feminist?

So asks Slate, which quotes statistics that suggest that more women than men are involved in the Tea Party movement, and points to the fact that most national and state coordinators are women:

> If the Tea Party has any legitimate national leadership, it is dominated by women. Of the eight board members of the Tea Party Patriots who serve as national coordinators for the movement, six are women. Fifteen of the 25 state coordinators are women. One of the three main sponsors of the Tax Day Tea Party that launched the movement is a group called Smart Girl Politics. The site started out as a mommy blog and has turned into a mobilizing campaign that trains future activists and candidates. Despite its explosive growth over the last year, it is still operated like a feminist cooperative, with three stay-at-home moms taking turns raising babies and answering e-mails and phone calls. Spokeswoman Rebecca Wales describes it as a group made up of "a lot of mama bears worried about their families." The Tea Party, she says, is a natural home for women because "for a long time people have seen the parties as good-ole'-boy, male-run institutions. In the Tea Party, women have finally found their voice."

Well, if this is all true I suppose that explains why I haven't found the Tea Party all that appealing — or even interesting for that matter. However, perhaps we should take note, because this is a truly strange trend. Now that we have a party that has been firmly in favor of feminist goals for nearly 40 years in power, all of the sudden a number of women are up in arms.

What is driving all this feminine discontent? For all the cheering about the "women's nation," the female takeover of higher education and the successful destruction of a number of traditionally male industries, you'd think women would be happy with those in power, but instead we have Sarah Palin barnstorming around and whipping women into a frenzy.

Maybe part of what's going on is that men have been disenfranchised to such an extent that younger men have pretty much dropped out of politics. Young white men in particular, who would be more likely to support a right-leaning movement, are so routinely vilified that they might think they should simply keep their mouths shut and stay out of it all.

Are men finally dropping out of politics as well?

Justice is Our Responsibility

Welmer · 14 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Too often, when something terrible happens to people, others justify it as somehow the victims' fault. African slavery has been justified as necessary due to black laziness, the liquidation of European Jewry due to Jewish provocation, and the desolation of 17th century Ireland because of Papist savagery. This attitude only guarantees that people will commit atrocities and resort to inhuman measures again, because such callousness is the foundation of injustice.

If one faction feels that another approves of and may have participated in a calamity inflicted upon them, they often will not hesitate to return the favor, and thus grievances are perpetuated. It may be an unavoidable part of the human experience that people face tragedy and hardship, but where it is in our power to prevent it, we should. To avoid doing so by simply blaming others is a form of moral laziness. In fact, it is more honorable to simply say "I don't care" than it is to attempt some justification of misery by pointing to the flaws of others.

Unfortunately, many men in our society prefer to abandon their responsibility to fellow human beings by doing exactly that. Even as the numbers of entirely disenfranchised men grow beyond a double-digit percentage of the population, some are content to sit back, smug and content in a feeling of superiority. Perhaps they tell themselves that these others are genetic losers, or they are lazy and stupid, or even that this is necessary to keep markets competitive. What they don't realize is that the growth of a class of discontented people will eventually come to have a negative effect on everyone. Not only the helpless and forgotten and their families, but even the content and powerful will face growing instability and a measurable decline in standards. For example, in Latin American countries with a huge gulf between the privileged and desperate, we find a very high murder rate, kidnappings, insurrections and civil war, powerful criminal gangs, and people living in either garbage dumps and favelas or communities surrounded by walls topped with barbed wire.

Here in the West, the lot of ordinary men has always been closely tied to the more egalitarian society we have come to idealize as a better way to live. As we lose any consideration for the ordinary man, that society is slipping away, and once gone it may not come back for centuries, if ever. In that case, we can expect women to suffer, too. More daughters will go into prostitution, more mothers will live in poverty, and in the absence of domestic stability, violence as a solution to problems will inevitably become a cultural norm.

The men who deny that there is a problem – those who insist everything is OK because their own tiny corner of the world is healthy and prosperous for now – are in fact our biggest obstacle. With their myopic view of the world they can ignore the big picture, fiddling as the rest of the world smolders around them. Today an insurrection is playing out in Bangkok, tomorrow, perhaps Mexico, and then one will follow another; finally, there will be one here as well.

If we don't do anything to address imbalances and restore justice, then whose fault will it be when that happens?

Mom Busted Teaching her Daughter to be a Ho

Welmer · 14 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Lashawnda Sharmaine Potts, A 29-year-old Seattle woman, has been charged with sex crimes for making sexually explicit videos with her daughter, who is 13 years old. The video showed them both dancing nude as the mother directed and instructed her daughter in the fine art of sexy dancing.

The mother was visiting the girl in violation of a court order during the incident, and has also been accused of having her daughter drive her around while she bought drugs, probably crack cocaine.

If convicted of the sex crime, Ms. Potts would face a mandatory minimum sentence of 3.5 years.

Events such as these confirm the emergence of the society envisioned by Roissy, who predicts that women will encourage their daughters to use their sexuality to gain maximum advantage in a chaotic society wracked by feminism and other associated degenerative trends.

Sticks and Stones

Welmer · 14 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[First Posted in August 2008 on the Welmer blog].

It strikes me that in our contemporary culture there is a basketful of negative stereotypes about men from which people can pick and choose and subsequently hurl like stones at the hapless scapegoat for family and social ills. There's the "deadbeat dad," "abusive husband," "batterer (or wife-beater)," "couch potato," "unromantic husband," "stalker," "predator" etc. A number of fathers' rights and men's activists deplore the negative stereotypes, condemning their use as unfair and hurtful. Sure, these are harsh characterizations, and largely unearned, but it is typical of modern American men, encumbered as they are by a useless, vestigial chivalry, to demand only that others "play fair" (this is, however, a democracy, where chivalry is about as useful as an extra pinky).

Nasty slurs such as deadbeat dads were deliberately crafted as a weapon to persuade society that dubious methods of extortion are legitimate when used to force men – abandoned husbands in many cases – to pay the mothers of their children. Terms such as stalker and batterer served to rush along the suspension of due process in the Violence Against Women Act. In the meanwhile traditional terms of opprubium targeting irresponsible or misbehaving women were dropped as politically incorrect. Hooker and whore are out; "sex-worker" is in. "Slut" is sexist, as is "nag." Some claim that the overtly sexual nature of terms of abuse concerning women proves that women are disproportionately victims of sexism. Let's examine a few terms applied to men, such as "jerk," "perv," "prick," and "mother——." Aren't those overtly sexual? Words of abuse, whether directed at men or women, are very frequently expressed through sexual imagery.

It is characteristic of power to make attempts to block and erase smears, whether verbal or otherwise, on its shining facade. Ridicule and demeaning words are real threats to political power, and as feminists have so stridently declared, they can also be used to encapsulate and demean the less powerful — in our current case abandoned husbands and dispossessed fathers. Men, all of whom are imperfect and most insecure to some degree or another, are relatively easy targets in this new age of material irrelevance of husbands and fathers. Being called a batterer or deadbeat – regardless of the truth of the accusation – is a real threat to a man these days, when divorce could strike at any time. When such terms are incorporated into laws and the lobbying efforts attached to said laws, they become instruments of state oppression. When words alone from a hostile partner, absent due process, can remove a man from his house and children and potentially result in a violent arrest, they become a form of terrorism directed at a segment of society.

As is common in arguments for slavery, men are portrayed as both threatening and indebted, i.e. they must be controlled physically as well as forced to provide materially for others. Men's civil rights are entirely ignored, as they are held to be subordinate to their wives' and children's welfare. This is a real dilemma for good men, and for thinking men, because there is no doubt that one's children's welfare should be of the utmost importance. However, consider the brilliant manner in which feminists frame the debate: what's good for women is good for children. This allows for a huge latitude in behavior on the part of women due to the very subjective nature of one's concept of good. Fathers are faced with a far more limited range of options: pay up whether your status as father is respected or not or go to jail.

What is entirely absent from debate is the question of men's welfare, and whether it has any benefit to society as a whole. Is men's welfare less or more important than women's, or is it equal? Does a man's social and legal status have any influence on his children's well-being? Perhaps the most relevant question is what implications men's civil rights have for society in general. Clearly, a society that is generally happy and industrious is a much better place for children than one that is contentious and expends its efforts in strife. Isn't it likely that when men's rights are respected equally the greater good is served? Creating an entire class of individuals with fewer civil rights simply for having reproduced may be expedient to some single mothers (although it appears that the neediest frequently derive no benefit whatsoever; rather, it is the more affluent who reap the largest reward), but overall it creates a polluted social atmosphere with negative consequences for child development.

Perhaps the best response, one that worked in the Great Depression – last major crisis of fatherhood – is the social rehabilitation of the American man. Instead of the recent approach of beating and shaming him into submission, which causes him to flee fatherhood and social responsibility, man must be offered a redeeming role — one that fits current social and economic realities. Punitive, coercive laws and social censure are hardly a just reward for the majority of adult, American men, and will likely result in a defensive reaction. The reaction has already begun, but we still do not know what form it will ultimately take. Perhaps we shall catch a glimpse of it during the presidential election, as Joe Biden, a contributor to the unjust and unequal "Violence Against Women Act" – which greatly enhances punitive, coercive and often violent state measures against men – comes under greater scrutiny.

An Example Of How Women Deal With Unemployment

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 15 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the Mancession continues the mainstream media finds new ways to avoid talking about how men have had to deal with 80% of the job losses from the current economic downturn. This article from the New York Times talks about clerical jobs lost due to technological advances. This means secretaries, "administrative assistants", and the like so the New York Times profiled Cynthia Norton, a 52 year old woman living in Jacksonville, FL who was an an administrative assistant. While the article tries to paint a picture of (a subset of) women being hit hard by the economic downturn, the fact is for every Cynthia Norton there are four men unemployed. However, it does show us how women deal with unemployment. Here are some excepts from the article:

> Ms. Norton is reluctant to believe that her three decades of experience and her typing talents, up to 120 words a minute, are now obsolete. So she looks for other explanations.
> Employers, she thinks, fear she will be disloyal and jump ship for a higher-paying job as soon as one comes along.
> Sometimes she blames the bad economy in Jacksonville. Sometimes she sees age discrimination. Sometimes she thinks the problem is that she has not been able to afford a haircut in a while. Or perhaps the paper her resume is printed on is not nice enough.
> The problem cannot be that the occupation she has devoted her life to has been largely computerized, she says.

Notice how this woman blames anything and everything else other than herself. It must be misogyny (which is blaming men) or age discrimination (which is code for blaming men). It has to be the paper she used for her resume or her inability to "afford" a haircut. If the problem is simply paper or a haircut that get paper or get a haircut. How much is she paying for a haircut that she "can't afford" it now? The paper a resume is printed on doesn't matter that much anymore since resumes are sent over email now and scanned into a computer system when received on paper.

> Ms. Norton has spent most of the last two years working part time at Wal-Mart as a cashier, bringing home about a third of what she had earned as an administrative assistant. Besides the hit to her pocketbook, she grew frustrated that the work has not tapped her full potential.
> "A monkey could do what I do," she says of her work as a cashier. "Actually, a monkey would get bored."

If this job at Walmart is so terrible then why not quit? There are lots of unemployed men right now who would love to have it.

> Ms. Norton says she cannot find any government programs to help her strengthen the "thin bootstraps" she intends to pull herself up by. Because of the Wal-Mart job, she has been ineligible for unemployment benefits, and she says she made too much money to qualify for food stamps or Medicaid last year.

> "If you're not a minority, or not handicapped, or not a young parent, or not a veteran, or not in some other certain category, your hope of finding help and any hope of finding work out there is basically nil," Ms. Norton says. "I know. I've looked."

This is what men have always been dealing with. There are no government programs for men (outside of very limited categories like veterans). Welcome to the real world, Cynthia Norton.

> Ms. Norton, for her part, may be reluctant to acknowledge that many of her traditional administrative assistant > skills are obsolete, but she has tried to retrain — or as she puts it, adapt her existing skills — to a new career in the expanding health care industry.

> Even that has proved difficult.
> She attended an eight-month course last year, on a $17,000 student loan, to obtain certification as a medical assistant. She was trained to do front-office work, like billing, as well as back-office work, like giving injections and drawing blood.
> The school that trained her, though, neglected to inform her that local employers require at least a year's worth of experience — generally done through volunteering at a clinic — before hiring someone for a paid job in the field.
> She says she cannot afford to spend a year volunteering, especially with her student loan coming due soon.

It wasn't the job of this school to do research into this field for her. I doubt that volunteering at a clinic would conflict with her job at Walmart. Even if it did then she could go on unemployment and qualify for all those government programs she didn't previously qualify for a year and then get a job.

She blames her student loan, but even that is a solvable problem. While student loans can't be discharged in bankruptcy, they can be deferred. Several types of deferments are available including economic hardship deferments and unemployment deferments. Norton will qualify for one of those types of deferments. All of this ignores how taking out a $17000 student loan for just an eight month course is a bad idea. (Of course, Norton should be thankful that she isn't in as dire straits as Michelle Bisutti who ended up with a student loan bill of $555,000.)

There are people who would say that I'm just kicking a woman when she's down by writing this post. The fact is I have been laid off and unemployed. But I also was able to get employed again without worrying about the paper my resume is printed on or about getting a haircut. It's not the job of the government or educational institutions to wipe your ass. Again, for every Cynthia Norton there are at least four men who lost their jobs during this economic downturn. Unlike Norton, these men understand there will be no one to bail them out.

PTSD

Dr. Paul · 16 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Authors note: I have spent over twenty years protesting the way men are maligned. During that time I have been accused more times than I could possibly remember of either being ignorant of or indifferent to the experiences of some women. It is pretty common to the MRA life.

Like most men, and most MRA's, I have seen a lot more of life than the ways men are harmed. I don't focus on those things because advocacy for them abounds while men drown in the worlds indifference. Just the same, from time to time, I find some things need to be spoken, even in a place like this from a man like me.

Amy sat across from me in one of the two Queen Anns. She looked vacantly at the floor and her shoulders slumped, as if ready to collapse under the weight of a hard life. She used a pale finger to absently toy with a strand of hair that hung by her cheek, and was silent save the sound of her breathing. She was the third of four assessments I would do that day. Clients came in waves in residential treatment and that day I was surfing.

I had read her intake notes, a page of dispassionate scrawls from the admissions nurse, and was already sketching a brief history in my head before I asked her any questions.

22 year old white female, complaint of cocaine dependence. Patient admits to alcohol and poly-substance abuse since age 11. Began using intranasal powder cocaine 3 years ago and has been using I.V. intermittently for the past six months in amounts averaging from 1-2 grams daily while binging.

I didn't need the chart to tell me she had likely been supporting her habit with dancing or hooking or both. It came with the territory.

She was a pretty girl, or once was, even with the dark bags under her eyes that looked like bruises against her wan skin. But it was a beauty turning hard and fading, much like whatever was left of her innocence.

She shivered, but remained silent. I went to a linen closet and got her a blanket. She wrapped herself in it without speaking.

I would get past the preliminaries with her as quickly as possible. Like all addicts, she had a story that went past her drug use. That story was my job. The rest, the drugs she used, how much and when and for how long was just the requirements for documentation; an insurance matter; the perfunctory gathering of details to justify payment. Even when a life is circling the drain, it all goes back to the money.

I wish I could tell you that my work is like breaking a great and mystical code; that it requires a combination of high intellect and finely honed skills. I can't. One look at her and most people would have a pretty good idea what the story was. Something, somewhere in her life had caused her enough pain, enough trauma, that she would stick needles in her arm to keep from thinking about it. Something, likely someone, had robbed her of enough self worth that she could smile while crawling naked on a dirty floor, scraping up the money for her habit from a crowd of drunken lechers.

The only trick was getting her to talk about it, even though there were no assurances it would help. Addictions have no memory and no conscious. They are like an ancient feud that continues to draw blood long past the time that the reason for it is remembered. But when things forgotten are killing you as surely as the drugs, the only thing that makes sense is to get it out; to conjure up the demons of the past and talk them down. It's not a cure, but it's a chance. And sometimes a chance is as good as it gets.

And talk she eventually did, though it didn't come easy. She sat through most groups as though cloaked in a shadow, responding to queries with short, sometimes monosyllabic answers designed more to fend off other questions than to give up information. In her individual sessions she would talk a bit more, focusing mostly on her drug use, but quickly withdrew when I nudged the conversation a little deeper.

At two weeks into her treatment, and more importantly with only two weeks remaining, I tossed in the towel on tact and strategy and asked her the question.

“Amy, did someone sexually abuse you?”

It was the most animated I ever saw her. Her eyes went wide in surprise, like two blue saucers. Her mouth opened and froze in place. Her skin color, which she had regained with two weeks of abstinence and regular meals, drained from her face and was replaced by a bloody flush. Tears pooled and teetered on her lower eyelids, but didn’t fall.

“Can you talk about it?”

She shook her head slightly.

I waited a moment, then leaned forward and spoke to her as softly as possible.

“I understand,” I said. “But I want you to consider putting it on paper. You don’t even need to show it to me. You may find at some point you want to show it to someone. And maybe whoever you show it to can help you understand that it wasn’t your fault.”

I let her go early from the session and called the nursing station to have her put on close observation. Tapping in to peoples pain sometimes has tragic results.

When I got to work the next morning I found a blue folder that had been slid under my door. In it was Amy’s story, in Amy’s words, and each page I turned cut through me like hot, cruel blade.

It was her father.

He started touching her at age six. That progressed to other things as he continued grooming her; using her.

And along the way he taught her, in his own way, what all fathers are supposed to teach their children; her worth as a human being.

For him, her hand was worth five dollars. Her mouth twice that much, even more if she “finished.” Other parts of her body had their value, too. And he paid for, owned, all of them.

For ten years.

He trained her well enough. Eventually, when she wanted money or other things, she came to him. She would tell me later that it made her feel special, even powerful.

But that illusion of power eventually played it’s way out, and you could see the crippling toll in all its unvarnished ugliness as the facade was finally lifted. Every degradation she ever suffered had traveled through a spike and up her arms. Every violation of her childhood had become a prescription for being passed around in a dope house by some carbon copies of her father. Her humiliation and abuse became a deviated septum and hepatitis C.

Every needle mark was a sea of unshed tears.

That power? That lasting gift from her father? It had lead her, no, dragged her, to my office. She had the skills to talk a man out of his wallet, or to offer her body in exchange for it, if it was for drugs. But she was unable to look me in the eye or even to tell someone, anyone, that she was cold and needed a blanket.

The one necessity of my work is detachment. You get too close, too involved, you are helping no one, and you run the danger of causing harm. Anyone in this field will tell you that the ground rules mean doing the best you can and letting go of the results. That was no longer an option for me. I wanted Amy to make it. Part of me selfishly needed her to, as though her resurrected life would lend some meaning to my own. And of course, I wanted her bastard father dead. But treatment centers are full of unfulfilled wants. They are scattered like tombstones in a graveyard of broken dreams.

The rest of Amy’s time there was spent much as it started. A cat and mouse game with trying to get her form a different bond than life had afforded her before; trying to earn a trust she was past giving to anyone.

I found her in the hallway a couple of days before she left. She was sitting on the floor with her back to the wall. An assortment of family photographs was scattered across the tiles at her feet. She was sifting through that collection of memories as though it were a puzzle. Her face was cheerless, even more than usual, and her fingers trembled as she stopped to take a longer look at a particular picture.

“You O.K.?” I asked.

She looked up and seemed to notice me for the first time. She hesitated, then tilted her head to the side in an invitation to sit with her. It was the most intimate gesture she’d made to me since her arrival.

I took a spot on the floor next to her and looked at the picture. It was her at about eight or nine years old. The camera had caught her in a smile, but she carried a sadness in her eyes that remained with her till that day. I started to say something, then remembered that one of my most valuable tools was knowing when to keep my mouth shut. I just sat with her, joining her in her silence and we studied her picture together. After a few moments she cleared her throat and spoke.

“I used to love horses,” she said. “I used to day dream that like a prince or something would come and take me away on a horse and I would be happy and safe my whole life.”

A tear fell down her cheek and she laid the picture down on the floor. She rubbed her eyes and tried to offer a half-hearted smile. When she saw I wasn’t buying it she turned away.

I spotted a tablet on the floor. ‘Amy’s Artwork’ was written calligraphy style across the cover. I pointed at it and asked, “Do you mind?”

“Sure, I used to draw, some.” she said, her tone confirming her mind was elsewhere.

I opened the tablet and my first reaction was simply being impressed. But as I turned the pages my reaction went from just impressed to startled, then to disbelief, then, finally, to complete awe.

The subjects of her drawing were people. Not just faces and features, but emotions and states of mind. She went far beyond the simpler interpretations of anger, sadness and joy. She drew curiosity into the eyes of a child, contemplation in an old woman; brief hesitance in the expression of a man; and of course, despair in a young girl. She drew the depth and subtlety of human emotion with the deftness and clarity of a great master.

In her work, done with merely pencil and paper, she demonstrated more understanding of the human soul than most therapists would gain in a lifetime. Each page I turned was another awakening, another breathtaking revelation of the genius that sat next to me. Suddenly, I felt as humbled and inept as I ever have in my life. I reached up and wiped my eye, then looked at the tip of my finger, now moist with one of my own tears.

Two months after she left treatment, a month after her father began serving time, I got the call that she was dead. It was an overdose, of course. They found her splayed out next to a dumpster. Whoever she was using with just dumped her onto the pavement amid the garbage to avoid problems with the law.

I’m sure the coroner’s report cited cocaine as the cause of death. But that was just the interpretation of cold science. The coroner no more knew what caused her death than I knew how to help her live. What I do know is this: Amy’s death was a homicide. Her father murdered her when she was six years old.

It just took her 16 years to figure it out.

What is Domestic Violence?

Featured Guest · 16 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post was submitted by Hughman]

Domestic violence, the catch-all nuke from orbit excuse feminists love to use.

But what is it?

"Domestic violence is any threatening behaviour, violence or abuse between adults who are or have been in a relationship, or between family members. It can affect anybody, regardless of his or her gender or sexuality.

The violence can be psychological, physical, sexual or emotional. It can include honour based violence, female genital mutilation, and forced marriage." – British Home Office

Now, the majority of people (in my personal anecdotal opinion) are under the impression that domestic violence is something that happens to purely women, from their male partners. Seems sensible really –- men are larger and more aggressive, and feminists are happy to admit to this. Yet note what the Home Office says. "…it can affect anybody." Hmm, interesting.

So, I dug around through various government and university websites and pdfs. And lo and behold, the truth:

DV Myths

· According to the FBI, a woman is beaten every 15 seconds – The FBI a) does not collect statistics on domestic violence, and b) has never said such a thing

· 4,000 women each year are killed by their husbands, ex-husbands, or boyfriends [in the USA] – The stats just don't add up to this. Total homicides of women is at about 5000, which means 80% of murders are from DV, which doesn't seem right. Looking through and adding up all cases where the husband or partner was the murderer, there are about 1500 incidents. And this is counting all of them as domestic violence (some may well be related to gangland violence, retribution/crimes of passion etc etc). Either way, the figure is much smaller.

· All women, of all races, creeds, incomes and educations, are just as likely to be recipients of domestic violence – true at the baseline, but adjusting for income and education levels has not been done. Those from African or Middle Eastern nations, those below the poverty line and in the age range 18-30, are more likely to be a victim of abuse.

Domestic Violence 'Acceptable' Truths

I am not going to totally piss on feminism's parade. There are some truths in their assumptions. Namely that men are more likely to commit sustained abuse on women (though it is hard to adjust for men, who may be more likely to leave abusive relationships, but that is speculation). Serious injury and fatalities are more likely to occur to abused women as well. The figures range from 2 to 10 times increased risk, depending on the report, and I will go with the Bureau of Justice's report 'Intimate Partner Violence Has Declined', which puts it at about 3 times. (on a side note, in 1975, chance of injury and homicide was almost equal between genders. I wonder why this difference has opened up. Genuine, cooking the books, who knows)

Inconvenient Truths

· The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention report says : "In nonreciprocal violent relationships, women were the perpetrators in more than 70% of the cases. Reciprocity was associated with more frequent violence among women, but not men." [Source: Whitaker, Haileyesus, Swahn and Saltzman, Differences in Frequency of Violence and Reported Injury Between Relationships With Reciprocal and Nonreciprocal Intimate Partner Violence, American Journal of Public Health, May 2007, Vol 97, No. 5, pp. 941-947]

Why Feminists can 'claim' there are 'no abused men'

According to the National Family Violence Survey, female victims of DV are nine times more likely to call the police than male DV victims. These are the percentages of victims who called the police in response to the assault, with 8.5% of women calling the police, and only 0.5% of males.

Blind surveys where anonymity is preserved shows equal rates of domestic violence between the sexes.

Conclusion

Domestic Violence is serious, and very much exists. But what I am trying to get across is that women are not angels. They are just as likely to engage in abuse, and from the statistics that show men are more dangerous in their actions, one can conclude women are more verbally abusive and psychologically manipulative towards their male partners. And I haven't even touched on homosexual DV.

You would think feminists would jump at equal DV ratios to 'prove' men and women are the same. But in this situation they are happy to highlight the 'differences' for their own benefit.

And that just sum up the orthodox feminists – total and unapologetic hypocrisy. Actually, they do not even admit to having double standards.

Can Men Thrive as Independent Operators?

Welmer · 17 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I've been thinking about the issue of economic survival in these lean, politically strange times, and I noticed that a few of our commenters have been discussing the idea of independent businesses as a solution to men's problems. So many men have been pushed out of the work force that I find the idea appealing, but the overwhelming number of regulations and convoluted tax laws has severely hampered the common man's ability to operate as an independent contractor/businessman. Additionally, legal issues have the potential to take men down at any minute.

It would be interesting to see the opinions and experiences of readers who have run their own businesses, both large and small, and to get some hints for how to do this in the most efficient way possible. I support the idea that men should try to do business on their own if at all possible, as our position as employees is a tenuous one. Men have very little in the way of protection if they are discriminated against at work, and there is almost nothing they can do about it if falsely accused of sexism or sexual harassment. HR will gladly sacrifice a man to avoid even a spurious lawsuit, so unless a man is in a very secure position or willing to completely submerge his masculinity at work he can be terminated at any time.

Anonymous Protagonist suggests networks of independent contractors, which seems plausible to me, because I've seen something like this in action in the creative community in Seattle. In fact, women do it, too, and are very open about supporting each other as women through electronic lists such as Digital Eve.

Could men develop something similar?

Dressing in Drag at Work Now a Civil Right in NY

Welmer · 17 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Although I've often countered the saying that America is a free country by bringing up the fact that the typical American workplace is one of the least free places on the planet, it appears that the interests of certain groups – if sufficiently abnormal and bizarre – can trump even the capitalist mandate.

American Eagle Outfitters, which is one of those trendy brands that sell second-rate sweatshop apparel, had a policy in place that stated that employees had to wear "gender-appropriate clothing." The rule probably applied mainly to the male employees, because women generally get a free pass to wear whatever they want, and also because cross-dressing men are not always as convincing as they think they are.

Evidently, Attorney General Andrew Cuomo got involved in the issue after Make the Road, a New York activist group, raised a fuss over the language. Cuomo strong-armed the company into dropping the rule against dressing in drag at work and forcing sensitivity training on non-trans employees, who will be instructed as to which pronouns to use when addressing gender-ambiguous co-workers.

The settlement is the first prompted by a new section of New York's Human Rights Law that prohibits employers "from discriminating against applicants because of their gender identity."

In the strange world of contemporary America, gender is now a "choice," and making this choice a civil right that is granted more protection than speech and political views. In a way, it seems that prioritizing the absurd might be an effective way to trivialize the fundamental rights envisioned by America's founding fathers.

Feminist "Spy" Languishes in Iranian Prison

Welmer · 17 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Sarah Shourd, who describes herself as a "teacher-activist-writer" who "loves fresh broccoli, Zapatistas and anyone who can change her mind," has been locked up in solitary for nearly a year in Iran, accused of being an American spy. In July of last year, Shourd and a couple of her friends came up with the idea of going for a hike in Iraqi Kurdistan, right along the border with Iran. This hike occurred shortly after political unrest in Tehran that shook the Islamic Republic to its core, which was blamed in part on Western interference.

I suppose one can only draw a couple reasonable conclusions about the three young Americans who apparently strayed in Iranian territory: they were either spies or profoundly careless and thoughtless. Let's try to look at this from the Iranian perspective. Say some well-educated, privileged Iranians happened to wander through the Sonoran Desert from Mexico into US territory and were picked up by ICE sporting cameras and some communications equipment (let's assume at least one of the American hikers had a cell phone with GPS). We can even burnish the comparison by imagining that Mexico was occupied by Iran at the time, and Iran had been threatening military action against us. In such a case, the detention of the young "activists" would hardly seem out of the ordinary. In fact, in George Bush's America they probably would have been flown to Gitmo for some Inquisition-style torture and held for years before given any hope of release.

So we have to admit that what the Iranians are doing with the three is not out of the ordinary by our own standards, and is probably even somewhat less severe. However, this does not mean that they are actually spies any more than a few years in Camp Delta meant a detainee was necessarily a terrorist, as opposed to, say, a very unlucky goatherd. But if they aren't spies – and we can't rule out that possibility – what are they?

From all indications, they are a couple of herbs and a clueless feminist who thought the world was her playground. On a website dedicated to freeing the hapless hikers, Shourd is described as "a women's rights activist who, earlier in her career, was volunteers coordinator working to help stop the femicides in Mexico." As a supporter of Zapatistas, Shourd is decidedly left-wing – to the point of being on the radical fringe – and the use of the term "femicides" only confirms this. If there was any doubt of her politics, she wrote a piece for Brave New Traveler in which she expresses shame about her country:

> At that very moment, amidst all the commotion, it dawns on me that this is my first time sitting around a table with Iraqi people. I tell them that everyday I feel ashamed at what my country has done to their country.

Shourd is beginning to sound rather like Rachel Corrie, who confronted a bulldozer in Gaza and lost her life in the process. This highlights the irony of her captivity in an Islamic nation, which is probably using her as a hostage pending negotiations with the United States, and underscores the profound foolishness of the feminist worldview, which holds that all evil proceeds from Western patriarchal imperialism, and that women of sufficient holiness are needed to sally forth and save the world.

Usually, young Western women who insert themselves into foreign politics and culture quickly tire of this mission – particularly when they realize that the deal they've got back home is actually pretty sweet – but from time to time it ends in some spectacular tragedy, as in the cases of Rachel Corrie and Amy Biehl. Shourd, despite her current predicament, may eventually have the opportunity to realize just how lucky she was that her thoughtless foray across a frontier in a war zone didn't have a similarly deadly outcome. Whether she does eventually come to that conclusion is another matter.

One might wonder what it is that encourages these young women to sacrifice themselves in vain for people who really could give a damn about them, and don't have the slightest bit of respect for Western feminist values. The answer is that the blame falls squarely on the shoulders of the radical feminists who have carved their pound of flesh out from academia. Parents send their idealistic, ambitious daughters to college in the hopes that they will find nice, restrained and responsible young men, but quite a few of them end up victims of the cult of campus feminism, and some even lose their lives for it.

As an American, I hope Ms. Shourd is released soon, but what I'd really like most is for Western men and women to learn a lesson from her folly. Unfortunately, given past incidents, that seems unlikely.

A Modern Day Don Quixote

Scott Farrell, a renaissance fair enthusiast, is making a one-man effort to resurrect chivalry. To spread the word to the masses, he has set up a website and business where he offers podcasts and seminars to businessmen and children.

Mr. Farrell is a bit of a kook if he thinks chivalry has any relevance whatsoever in our feminist, secular society, but he can blow his horn into the wind all he wants. However, I do take issue with the idea that boys should be forced to be chivalrous toward girls, who will likely crowd them out of universities, shove them out of jobs and tax the money out of their pockets, not to mention divorce them and ruin them financially and emotionally in a number of cases.

White Knight Today

It is abusive in this day and age of legislated male inferiority to demand that boys bow down to women and act as their chattel. It is, actually, inculcating a slave mentality in helpless children. It's also severely damaging their chances of getting any action from women when they get older — no matter what they say, there's nothing women despise more than a white knighting chump.

I have no idea how successful Farrell's chivalry enterprise is, but I think we ought to label it a harmful endeavor that won't do any good for the men who take him up on one of his seminars. In fact, the guy's a feminist who insists that King Arthur had females sit at the Round Table as knights. If anything, that proves that the man is a straight-up liar who feeds falsehoods to children. He might argue that King Arthur was legendary, so he can say whatever he wants about the Knights of the Round Table, but none of the original myths said a thing about women being knights.

Although some of the themes Mr. Farrell touches on, such as honor and morality, are valuable and relevant, there is nothing moral about teaching children to act against their interests and sacrifice their well-being for a thankless, entitled class of people who would gladly take advantage of them and cast them aside.

It's time these guys pushing the socon line that boys have some duty to defer to girls who are anything but ladies were outed and identified as a harmful influence.

Entitlement Complex Lands Girl in Jail

The Smoking Gun has a funny report up on a girl who got loaded at her prom and attacked police and paramedics. Jessica Halter, the intoxicated promster, repeatedly banged her head against a chair, spat blood on the police, and refused to walk to the patrol car.

According to the police report, at one point she said: “This is my fucking prom, this is bullshit. You are fucking bitches, this is my prom, I’m not drunk.”

Halter, who appears to be fairly hefty, put up quite a fight and eventually had to be carried away.

Although this kind of extreme behavior may be more characteristic of a young person who can’t hold her liquor, women are acting out in other ways throughout life. Domestic violence perpetrated by women, extramarital affairs and female crime are all on the rise. Unrestrained and empowered, women of all ages are increasingly likely to display poor behavior and aggression.

Good Old Girls Club

In the New York Times, Adriana Gardella blogs about women doing business with women, and how they help each other out. Perhaps we could learn a thing or two about how women network to do business with each other. Of course, as some of our readers have pointed out, men and women don't do business in the same manner, but that doesn't mean we can't use some of the same tools.

So how do women do it?

Here's a hint as to how women's networking operates:

> You raised important points, many of which relate to topics that will be considered in future posts. Among them is the issue of women doing business with other women. For example, Janet commented:
> "One of the things I have noticed is that a lot of my work comes from other women. It's not that I consciously focus on women as prospective clients or colleagues, but somehow that's what tends to happen. I wonder whether other women business owners have had similar experiences."

It seems that women deliberately favor each other in business and referrals. They have a network.

In fact, Gardella's blog itself, which she calls "She Owns It," is intended to be a networking platform:

> With this blog, I hope to highlight the challenges and successes of women who are business owners and entrepreneurs across industries and disciplines, and at many different stages in the growth of their businesses. I think the women we highlight will be sources of information, inspiration and connections to your peers. She Owns It is intended to help you reach your business goals, whether that means getting your tech start-up financed, earning a spot for your consumer product on Costco's shelves, making your first hire or conducting less painful layoffs.
> Most important, it will be a conversation. I want to hear from you and provide a forum in which you can connect with other owners. This blog will be what we make it, and I look forward to beginning this adventure with you. Please share your thoughts in the comment section below, or, if you prefer, by e-mail (adriana.gardella@nytimes.com) and please follow me on Twitter, where I hope we can connect and work to develop the stories that are most important to you.

There's nothing revolutionary here. Networking is how you do business. It's very difficult for anyone – man or woman – to get off the ground without connecting with others. It might even be impossible.

I'll let you all in on a little secret: I use women's networking lists, and have made money off them. I simply subscribe to the lists (it would be illegal for them to exclude men, and I'd simply use a gender-neutral email in that case anyway), and look through them from time to time for leads. You'd be surprised how many companies post to these lists looking for services.

Companies might not do the same for a men's list, but guys could easily post leads and tips, helping each other out and passing info along.

I think someone ought to start a men's version of Digital Eve, or something along those lines.

The “Right to Feel Sexy”

Welmer · 19 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are always coming up with new rights. Anything they want suddenly becomes a “right,” and therefore the very term loses its meaning. Feministing, which is struggling to remain relevant in our postfeminist society, has a post and video up on street harassment, and asserts that women “have the right to feel safe, confident and sexy when [they] walk down the street.”

Actually, nobody has any of those legal rights under the Constitution, because it was written by men, and reality – not how people “feel” – was the legal standard, but hell if they won’t try to legislate them anyway.

So now the feminists have come up with “Hollaback,” an anti-street harassment campaign, that seeks to stop men from saying mean/dirty things to the poor, frail little virginal creatures on the streets of America’s cities. The following videos are actually kind of amusing, because the only harassment I can imagine most of these women being on the end of is humor at the expense of their unfortunate looks/weight:

Some guy must have been really hard up to go for this one:

“Hey baby, want some of my hamburgers?”

I guess there are some really sick men out there:

Men comment on woman’s hairstyle, she flips out and yells “SHUT UP!”

These hollaback videos actually are pretty funny. They would make an awesome Saturday Night Live skit.

Time for Men to Abort Fatherhood at Will

Dr. Paul · 19 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Abortion is baby killing.

Only in the reality averse feminism-is-about-equality mindset is abortion anything but the termination of a human life.

Technically speaking it can't accurately be called murder, since technically speaking, it's legal. The baby is no less dead, though, for that paltry distinction. But since it is a lawful action in which men are completely voiceless, and looks to remain that way, there is only one appropriate response.

It's time for men to be allowed to legally abort fatherhood during the same period of time a woman is allowed to do the same by visiting her local clinic.

It's time for a man to have the unfettered social and legal backing to look at a woman whom he has just impregnated directly in the eye and say, "See ya, wouldn't want to be ya," and to stroll off whistling a tune, to enjoy less inconvenient relationships, without his wallet being any lighter or his conscious any heavier.

If you are waiting for a punch line or some well placed literary device to put this into a different perspective…don't. There isn't one coming, nor should there be.

In the spirit of calling abortion what it is, let us examine the motives behind the decision to get one with the same unblinking candor. Abortion, in most circumstances, is not a decision to avoid pregnancy, but to avoid motherhood. In fact, the term reproductive rights is a misnomer; a postmodern guise to cover the real issue. It isn't "My body, my choice," it's "My lifestyle, my choice," even if it means killing a baby because it gets in the way.

In many, many cases, it is about choosing personal freedom and a social life over life itself. But what the heck, it's 2010 people, and grrls gots to have choices.

But with that in mind, you will have to excuse me if I yawn at any outrage over the idea of a man being given the same options, especially given that men have already been aborted from the decision making process. That suits a lot of people and any idea of changing things will anger some as well.

The traditional male, from atop his white stallion, will scoff at the very idea of men's choice, of course. His indignation will be echoed by his twin sister, the gender feminist. Somewhere, in the midst of sorting out responsibilities, both will invoke the "your baby, you pay," catch-all, one of many shared attitudes that make these ostensibly strange bedfellows more like two peas in a pod when all is said and done.

But in their rush to ensure that she is given the role of sole arbiter, they will both adamantly deny the major flaw in their position.

There is no reason at all to use the expression "your baby," when talking to any man in western culture, any more. Because when push comes to shove, as it often does, it is not his baby, it is hers.

He is a father with her permission and approval only. His genes, in the form of another human being, have become her property, lending new meaning to wearing the pants in the family, phonetically speaking.

And if the man is "fortunate" enough to be allowed access to his child, it will often be just enough involvement to ensure him the status of glorified visitor, and the opportunity to watch powerlessly as the child's mind is poisoned against him.

There is no one to stop her. Indeed, there is the full force of the legal establishment at her disposal to ensure she gets away with this and that he keeps his mouth shut while it happens.

She will also be the master of where the father's money goes, and when. She can spend that money, confiscated for the supposed benefit of the child, at the grocery store, a department store, or at a crack house. It is all up to her. More choices for women in a world full of them.

If he refuses to pay, whether from defiance or from poverty, it will land him in jail. He can stand behind her, or sit behind bars. Such are the other worldly of choices for fathers.

So when we look at a man and say "your baby," we need to practice doing that with a straight face. And it might be better if we didn't say it with an air of moral authority. Anyone who understands how hollow that morality and authority are will find any haughtiness quite laugable.

If you want to really understand how the western legal establishment sees men, take a trip to the nearest retail shopping center. Find some poor guy there, the one we call the modern mall mule. He will be the one walking behind a woman carrying her packages as she shops; her only burden being the weight of his credit card.

There's your legal model of masculinity, and it bears out in court nearly every time you see a man pitted against a women for pretty much any reason. Nowhere is this more evident than when a child is involved.

If you have a car, but have to ask for the keys from someone else who always holds them, it isn't your car. It is just something you get to borrow, even if you're the one making the note, paying for repairs and buying the fuel.

And speaking of the note, this will also be a matter of contention from fiscal conservatives. I am sure the cringes from some of them reading this are intense as they imagine the massive spike in welfare and other entitlements stemming from walk away fathers who ought to be paying for their own choices.

My reaction to that?

Who freakin' cares? I sure don't.

The government is currently operating with 100 trillion in future liabilities, half of which are unfunded. Yes, that is 100 trillion dollars, and that is from just two entitlement programs. And now the same government is selling us the lie that we can climb out of a cavernously deep recession with a non producing service based economy, fueled only by credit based consumerism, by simply printing more money every time a failed bank proves that the system isn't working.

The lunatics and liars are already in charge, so what is another hundred billion or so in entitlements?

And as long as the voting public has seen fit to shape a government that ignores its own constitution, stealing from some of its citizens and giving it to others (minus the big skim, of course), then who should deny them?

And we have been on this track for well over a generation. A change in administration won't make any difference in the age of Obamabush.

And at last some will be asking "Hey, what about the baby? What about what is best for the baby? Are we really supposed to support men for the right to walk away from the children they create and shun all responsibility?"

The answer is yes. First, equality, for those that can stomach it, is a cruel master. Deal with it. Second, if 'What about the baby?' isn't allowed to be asked before one is cut out of a woman's womb and thrown into a garbage bin, then anyone asking the question now should just shut up.

We don't care about what is best for children in this culture, we care about what is best for women or whatever they happen to say is best for them at the moment. More than anything else, it is about giving women their way. In pursuing that we regularly kill children or rip their lives to shreds in a hundred other ways. And people want to ignore all that and start drawing lines here?

Please.

Suddenly engaging in a fit of concern and morality when it involves a walk away father may be instantly popular. But let's face it; we all know the legal system is not seriously going to allow men to stop women from using children to siphon off their finances to support unilateral decisions any more than it is ever going to stop abortions.

But we also know that things will continue this way because we live in a parasitic matriarchy, and that any sense of real justice that gets it the way of its operation will be simply removed, as easy as an unwanted baby.

If a man wants to walk away from that, no one should fault him.

Execution of Adulterers: Women's Rights Issue?

Welmer · 20 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've long wondered why execution for adultery – usually by stoning – was considered a women's rights issue. The stoning of adulterers is an exactly equal punishment, after all. Theoretically, for every single male adulterer who is stoned to death, a female adulterer should get it as well. Maybe that's the problem: it is real equality in both punishment and accountability, and that is contrary to women's rights. In feminist logic, men should be punished far more severely and more often for the same transgression, and that is "equality."

I'm not advocating stoning for adultery; that would likely eliminate nearly half of the adult population of the United States, but this issue is one that perfectly underscores the hypocrisy of "women's rights" activists. I doubt that stoning male adulterers bothers feminists much at all, but the idea that women might receive the ultimate punishment in equal numbers to men for the same crime scares them out of their wits.

Of course, we all know that women have no real problem with stoning:

How Women Are Shooting Themselves in the Foot

Welmer · 20 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've written before about the decline of the matriarch, and how women used to have a high-status role within the family in traditional societies after they reached a certain age. This role of matriarch was, of course, partly dependent on the status of the husband (but not entirely), and therefore created a vested interest in cooperation between husband and wife throughout the many years of marriage. For example, if a man and woman got married while young, the husband would strive to work his way up to a position of stability and prosperity, and the wife had an interest in helping him do so, because she would share in that.

This is one reason homewreckers – younger women who used their youthful allure to steal older, more prosperous husbands – were held to be one of the worst examples of womanhood. Women who did this were cheating by leaping over all the hard work and dedication to jump directly into a position of affluence and comfort.

Today, however, women's well-being has been severed from their husbands' prosperity by government programs and family law. Although many women may see this as a liberating victory, all they are doing – in most cases – is trading in future stability and status for a short-lived power trip during their youthful, attractive years.

Some men may strike it rich while still young, but this is rarely the case. For the large majority of successful men, making their way to the top requires decades of uninterrupted dedication to their career. In their 20s and 30s, a lot of them are on a knife's edge, and only well into middle age do they finally get a chance to rest on their laurels. All it takes is one misstep in the long path to success to derail them, and having a supportive, helpful wife throughout that journey is immensely helpful. Unfortunately, most wives no longer foot that bill. They are a dangerous liability rather than a rock of support. At any moment they could blow the entire thing apart and send the family and man's career spiraling down in flames. Rather than partners, women have become land mines buried under the path to success.

The result of this is that the homewrecker type has become more and more the norm, as evidenced by the rash of scandals involving married, middle-aged politicians and single women. Rather than hanging in there for the long haul, women are going for the hail mary shot at the big time while they are still fertile and attractive. This has a lot to do with the lack of success younger men, who are still relatively unknown quantities, are confronting. Women figure that they have over a decade to keep shooting for the big time that could well be wasted on some guy who isn't by any means sure to do well in life. In their minds, they are making a rational choice.

This contemporary reality is exacerbated by the fact that while young, women often make more money than men. In fact, in many parts of the country men's and women's salaries equalize in the 30s, and only in middle age do men begin to substantially out-earn women. Women's greater social power when young and attractive does translate into higher salaries, but this boost wears out after the steep decline in fertility of middle age. Perhaps this explains why women are most likely to leave their husbands in their late 20s, when they feel that their status is higher than their husband's.

Unfortunately for the women who pursue this strategy, it often doesn't work out as well for them as they imagine. Nailing Mr. Big is out of the reach of most women, and although they may have a few passionate nights with those kinds of high-flyers, the successful men who fool around with ambitious women are usually smart enough to avoid entrapment, and very rarely marry a de facto tramp. Instead, these women end up having a string of relatively short relationships with men who know how to act the part of the alpha male, and when they hit their Wile E. Coyote moment end up in a decidedly lower status position than they would have had they married young and stuck with it for the long haul.

In coming years there will be a lot of washed up women out there working low-status jobs, unappreciated by any men, and without any financial support except their own. Men have been paying the price for a few decades now, but that isn't going to last forever; we will adapt to the new reality and learn to avoid the walking bombs in our midst. No amount of shaming language will trump self-interest and economic reality, so cultural change is inevitable. My bet is that when the boomers start to lose power and economic clout, their outdated views will be rejected with alacrity, and there will be a return to normalcy in domestic relations. It's a shame that they will have left so much wreckage in their wake, but human societies are known for fitful progress and reckless defiance of nature, or God if you will.

Older Women Starting to Catch On?

Welmer · 20 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I sometimes watch these court shows on TV for lack of anything better (I don't waste money on cable), and I've noticed a few changes regarding how women are portrayed. Just a decade or so ago, you'd never see women cast as the "bad guy" in a domestic case. It was all straight-up Steve Wilkos type TV, with men as monsters and women as innocent victims.

While shows hosted by men still almost never take a hard line against women, a few female hosts are starting to rip into the entitled, spoiled and manipulative younger women who are pulling strings to kick their husbands, ex-boyfriends and other men around.

Below is the second part of a Judge Judy show in which Judy gives the third degree to a young woman who swore out a TRO on her babbydaddy after coming to his house at 4AM and kicking down the door:

I think we're seeing the beginning of a cultural recognition that things have gone too far. It's pretty sad that men are refusing to say or do anything about the abuses and it's left up to older women to make the point, but perhaps that's simply the nature of politics.

In any event, at least people are starting to wake up. When you see it on TV, you know it can't really be swept under the carpet any longer.

Frontier Feminism

Hawaiian Libertarian · 21 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Conservative female columnists have gone gaga over Sarah Palin. She's a "conservative" feminist…aka a "pro-life feminist" that still believes women were oppressed by men, didn't have "equal rights" and that suffrage and the social engineering that has propelled women en masse into what was once the male sphere of gender roles are all still "good" things.

Left wing, or right wing, "feminism" is still an ideology of female pedestalization…female superiority. It promotes the same myths of female "Strength and independence."

One "conservative feminist," Townhall columnist Maggie Gallagher, wrote about a recent Palin speech she attended, in a column entitled Sarah Palin's Girl Power:

> Palin understands that she is building not just a new political movement, but a new cultural identity. She dubbed it "frontier feminism," and it was the theme she carried through from beginning to end.

Well isn't that special. Palin is not just a feminist…she's a FRONTIER FEMINIST.

> She speaks emotionally as a mother, from the heart of motherhood, and she makes it what it should be: a source of power, not an admission of weakness or dependency, and a bond, the deepest bond among women.

See…"conservative" women are no different. The appeal of herd bonding through the sharing of emotional experience is a "source of power." Note how dependency is associated with weakness.

This association is precisely how the feminists appealed to the solipsism of the female mind to get them to embrace the ideological platform to destroy the dynamics of the Patriarchal nuclear family.

Sickening. Oh Maggie, you are just as much the useful idiot for feminist's goals as any left wing abortion fanatic.

Marriage is supposed to be a partnership…and what is a partnership but a relationship based on CO-DEPENDENCY? Where one partner is weak the other partner's strength meets the need. That's a complementary relationship! Dependency is a hallmark of any successful relationship…not a weakness.

Maggie than quotes a particular passage from Palin:

> And I thank the SBA List, too, for being a home to a new conservative feminist movement, is how I look at this. It's an emerging conservative feminist identity. Far too long, when people heard the word 'feminist,' they thought of the faculty lounge at some East Coast women's college, right? And no offense to them, they have their opinions and their voice, and God bless them; they're just great."

Do Pro-Life conservatives get that? Palin says the left-wing, abortion supporting feminists are just great!

> "But that's not the only voice of women in America. I'd like to remind people of another feminist tradition, kind of a western feminism. It's influenced by the pioneering spirit of our foremothers, who went in wagon trains across the wilderness, and they settled in homesteads. And these were tough, independent pioneering mothers, whose work was as valuable as any man's on the frontier. … They went where no woman had gone before."

How in holy hell was a pioneer woman a "feminist" tradition? I must have missed reading about all those women that INDEPENDENTLY braved the travails of settling the wild west. This is pure, revisionist bullshit by Palin. And so-called “conservative” women eat this shit up.

Tough? Hell yes. The pioneer women were indeed tough…they had to be. But “independent?”

Hardly.

The pioneer women were absolutely dependent on their men…just as the men were dependent on their women! It was a tough, rigorous and dangerous life…and each played their role in building a new life so that their next generation could succeed. IT TOOK BOTH MEN AND WOMEN WORKING TOGETHER TO SURVIVE AND THRIVE IN THE HARSH ENVIRONMENT OF THE FRONTIER.

The right wing version of feminism is just as subversive as the left. Note that the implications of Palin’s line of thought is just as divisive of men and women as any left wing version of feminism. After all, isn’t this the logical conclusion of the idea of “Independence?” An “independent” woman doesn’t need a man. Hah.

Maggie than summarizes Palin’s speech, while quoting an especially egregious line Palin used:

> A speech that began with women as “mama grizzlies” defending their children’s economic interests (“My kid is not your ATM”) ends with a call for a new kind of feminism:

My kid is not your ATM?!?!??!??!?!?!?!?!

That’s right….Palin, why don’t you just go ahead and say it…that you agree with your left wing sisters (they’re great! God bless them!) YOU, the unfortunate sperm donor for MY kid is MY ATM. Child support for 18 years BAAAYYYYBBBBEEEE!

> “As an Alaskan woman, I’m proud to consider myself a frontier feminist like those early pioneering women of the West.”

LMAO. Why yes Sarah…your 21st century experiences in Alaska, your experiences are JUST LIKE what those frontier women of the West!

> She proceeded to thank one of the largest and most effective pro-life organizations in the country, the Susan B. Anthony List, named for a key 19th-century leader who opposed abortion. “I’m grateful to have a place like this, full of sisters who are not put off by a gun-toting, pro-life mom of a fun, full family — never dull.”

Ah yes. Now “conservative” women are hailing that wonderful Susan B. Anthony, the primary change agent to institute women’s suffrage. Just because she was “anti-abortion” means Susan B. Anthony is an “acceptable” feminist icon for “conservative” women.

What a farce.

Here’s what Susan B. Anthony wrote about abortion:

She blamed men, laws and the “double standard” for driving women to abortion because they had no other options. (“When a woman destroys the life of her unborn child, it is a sign that, by education or circumstances, she has been greatly wronged.” 1869) She believed, as did many of the feminists of her era, that only the achievement of women’s equality and freedom would end the need for abortion.

Hahahaha…the jokes on you, Susan! We have more abortion now than you probably ever thought possible in your time…but I’m sure, now, just as back than, this is all the fault of “men,” right?

But I digress…

Back to Maggie Gallagher’s finishing paragraph:

> Women can do anything.

Right. Try writing your name in the snow with your piss.

We can bear children under less than ideal circumstances.

Hilarious. When you are pregnant, your biological directive will make you go into labor whether the circumstances are ideal or not. This is like being proud of the fact that women can take a shit in less than ideal circumstances. GIRL POWER!

But Maggie's last line is a real hoot:

> Like Sarah and her "strong and independent" daughter Bristol.

Why yes….she's so strong and independent, she's still living at home with mommy and daddy helping to raise her little kid…and her parent's are filing a lawsuit to get Bristol's baby's daddy to pay child support. Now THERE'S strength and independence for you!

> "2010," Sarah Palin announced exuberantly, is the year "when commonsense conservative women get things done for our country."

Frontier Feminism and commonsense are an oxymoron…and Sarah Palin, you are no "conservative."

Over the Mountains

Welmer · 22 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some years ago, not long after I got married and about nine months before my son was born, I took a trip to Britain and Ireland with my wife. Of course, she wanted to go to Europe as most American women do, but I had a different sort of motivation and goal to fulfill.

As a little boy, there was nobody I was closer to than my grandpa, and he was passionately attached to a land he'd never seen. His mother, Mary Price, née Kennedy, came from An Daingean in County Kerry, and he was fiercely attached to the land of her birth. He knew a few fragments of the Irish she spoke, and the stories she had told him as a boy animated his view of that distant land throughout his life.

So when I got the chance to go to Britain, I made sure that I could spend some time in the land of those ancestors. I figured that it must be a place loaded with significance, and resolved that I wouldn't miss it.

After landing in London, we took a train to Wales, from where my first American ancestors sailed 400 years ago to Virginia. It was early spring, and Wales was dark and somber. The people were laconic and sincere, and its shadowed green hills and grey coasts had a familiar severity, reminding me of the overcast half-light of my home in the Pacific Northwest.

Soon, we took a ferry across the Irish Sea from Anglesey to Dun Laoghaire, staying in Dublin for a couple days before heading out by rental car across Ireland. It was all strangely familiar, but still foreign enough to keep me from dwelling on my roots. Still, there had been a few eerily familiar experiences. While on the ferry from Anglesey, in the sunbreaks, I'd seen a handsome, middle-aged man who looked very much like my uncle Lindy, my mother's brother. I looked at him intently, amazed at the resemblance. His blondish hair and Gaelic features stood out in the slanting sunlight against the glittering waves and spray, and I wondered at it. Who was this man who bore such a strong family resemblance? It is one of those things that plays games with us American outcasts, scattered as we are from such faraway places.

Dublin was friendly enough, with the old men drinking beer in the pubs in the morning and the coldness of the rooms when I'd get out of bed reminding me of home. However, it was nice to leave and set out across the island for the other side.

It didn't take long to drive across Ireland — it is a small country after all. However, cresting the Kerry mountains brought out feelings that I hadn't anticipated. After driving up and over the weathered hills on a relatively narrow highway, suddenly we broke out of the clouds and saw the wide sea shining beneath us. I knew we had arrived at the land my grandfather had always known but never visited, and suddenly I was filled with memories and regret. As I remembered my grandfather and all of the love I felt for him it all came pouring out of me in a flood of tears. Such a beautiful shining place, and finally I was there, but he was gone. It was a bittersweet moment, and I was overcome by love, joy and an aching sadness that he wasn't with me.

I think that may have been the beginning of the end of my marriage. My wife was appalled by my emotion. In her woman's heart, she saw the depth of my emotion as a fatal weakness and flaw. It must have inspired contempt, and she must have seen it as a fatal vulnerability. Despite her disapproval, I still see this kind of love and devotion as a strength, but I'm not sure women can understand that. All they see is loathsome weakness. To a woman, poetry without fame and public accolade is contemptuous. A man's love is suspicious and hateful — better that he is as cold and unfeeling as a stone.

Of course, without that male passion we never would have made our way out of the caves, but this doesn't matter in the hard calculus of female desire and judgment. It is because of this truth that I am more and more convinced that we men need our own society, safe from the judgment of women, where we can love, wonder and create, safe from the ruthless disapproval and contempt that women employ to crush our dreams and punish us for our very humanity.

A Middle Aged Man's Manifesto

Featured Guest · 23 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post was written by Jourdan]

I apologize in advance for what is going to appear to many to be a depressing post. However, I would ask for you to consider for at least a moment what I have to say here, if only by way of a basic explanation—understanding is something that I have long felt is out of the question.

When I was a young man, I found myself—for reasons partly of my own making but also in no insignificant part for reasons of the making of unthinking and heedless men whose leadership positions expected more of them—in a very bad situation. This came hard after a horrific teenage era, which saw me suffer deep rejection, coolly, calmly and wickedly delivered, at the hands of the girls I found so beautiful and magical and those of my male peers. A heavy blow under any circumstance but made all the worse by the total failure of my hapless father to provide anything by way of guidance, of governance, of expectation, of benevolent leadership.

The end result of this twin blow was me, broken and helpless, unable to so much as shave without supervision lest I try to hurt myself with the blade.

It was during this time in hospital that I met, purely by chance, a scared and wild-eyed young women, who I spoke to again and again, trying to help. She killed herself a few weeks later when our masters weren't looking.

A short while later, as I began to recover back home in Los Angeles, I took a long walk in the evening. It was one of those evenings only Southern Californians know: a cool, luminescent orange-blue sky, a soft and refreshing ocean breeze, bright green grass, the city lights twinkling on around me. And I found myself thinking of that poor woman, and of myself, and I made a vow then to myself.

Not just some random vow, not some low-rent version of a New Year's resolution, but a real vow, an oath, a sworn undertaking. I vowed: that should I ever reach the point in my life where that woman found herself, that instead of taking that dark path I would, as an alternative, as a means of escaping a situation which has become unbearable, simply walk away from my life to date and attempt to build a new life elsewhere, far away. No matter how bad things got, I could not willingly walk away from the beauty of this world, of such skies.

Have I reached that point? This is where the explanation gets tough, because, yes, but, no, I didn't fulfill that vow.

On the one side I have a wife who loves me, three almost divinely beautiful children and a job that many wish for and only a few get.

All of this is true. But what makes this all the more sad and difficult is that due to what happened to me as a young man I was broke and beyond repair before I even met my wife, before those children were conceived, before that job offer came my way. Because I did not heretofore realize this in any real way (hints, always, hints, but never the cold hand of reality intruded upon my daily thoughts), I did what any apparently healthy man in my position would do: I assumed that my situation would better as I matured and began to succeed through hard work and effort. And, so, I married, went to law school to better myself, succeeded beyond my hopes, even owned my own home and, of course, had those three souls that convinced me beyond all other available evidence that God, indeed, must exist.

Despite such apparent success, the underlying reality of my condition never really changed. I was a broken man by 24 and I remained a broken man even as I became a whirlwind of productive, socially-sanctioned activities. I remained a broken man even despite my wife's smile, despite my oldest son's sweetness, despite my younger son's hugs, despite my daughter's twirling in the sun.

It is not in spite of such things but because of them that I have come to realize the terrible and full scope of the problem. Any normal man, any healthy individual should be able to derive a sense of purpose, of human satisfaction from such work and such a wonderful and beloved family.

And yet, I remain a fundamentally broken man, whose heart aches with a poisonous mixture of regret and a deep longing for the past, whose mind seethes with ever-present anger about what happened to me when at some point in Junior High we were placed in the “winner” and “loser” baskets, and, above all, about my own people’s judgment that everything that I love and find dear and worthy of honor and veneration is hated and despised. From then to now, women continue to hold me in deep contempt, a clear sign that I have failed in some deep and fundamental way that is beyond any ability of mine to correct.

The result—despite a mighty effort on my part that has taken me from penniless on the streets of Berkeley to success by any conventional measure—is that I as a man have been effectively dead since around the age of 25. A gate closed in me, a road was barred, the sense of growth and possibility ended for me at that point.

So, the vow was broken as soon as it was made, for the maker had already passed from this world to a shadowy simulacrum.

I say, dead, but am I not 45? What has this dead man been doing for the past two decades?

Until recently, the answer would be: pulling myself up by my boot-straps, overcoming a poor start to life, learning the hard way what I should have been taught, finding success despite a starting handicap in the race, being the best husband and father I can be.

Today—of all days, today—circumstances, hard, cold and uncaring circumstances, objectively compel me to answer quite differently: I have been only acting out of an overwhelming sense of duty, like a man on a military mission who knows he has but a short time to live and yet feels compelled to do his duty lest he let his comrades down. I have never (or, to be more precise, have only momentarily) allowed myself to give up that sense of duty.

This duty allows this dead soul to keep moving.

I write this not to scare or to depress, nor, God forbid, to seek pity or, worse, help. Instead, I write this in the hope that my example will or can serve as a warning to young men out there in this modern world. We are taught—above all in America—that what happens to us or what we do as young people doesn’t matter.

It does matter. It matters deeply.

Young man! Seek the guidance of an older man, a man brave enough, experienced enough and manly enough to ignore the fog and noise of our poisonous culture, to ignore the dead hand of political correctness. (Note that this rules out, completely, college professors.) Find out the truth of your situation: about what it is and means to be a man; about how to ignore the romantic songs and movies and know the true essence and unforgiving judgment of women; about the full and real value of true education; about duty; about honor; about what competition really means; about what work and career actually are in the real world of real men.

Young man! Arm yourself not with degrees and credentials, but with wisdom!

Young man! Be ever watchful, be ever careful, assume you have been misled and misguided and proceed cautiously from there.

Lest one day you find yourself deep in middle age and decades dead.

Astonishing Logic

Featured Guest · 23 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[This guest post was written by Dirk Johanson of The Balls Monologues]

The New York Times ran an article today on the authors of a new book, "Three Wishes: A True Story of Good Friends, Crushing Heartbreak, and Astonishing Luck on Our Way to Love and Motherhood." The book consists of the joint memoirs of three women, at ages when they were on the brink of losing their fertility, who, intending to become artificially inseminated, passed a vile of sperm between them. Before any of them used it, they each got knocked up and had babies with guys the "old-fashioned way."

The Times quotes one of the women, Carey Goldberg, stating, "Every time we told someone our story, they said you have to write it down." I don't think I'm going out on a limb here by stating that its safe to assume that most if not all of the "[e]very time … someone[s]" were their girl friends.

Of course, its perfectly natural that a woman who has gone to the lengths of buying sperm would consider the expense, hard work, and social impact that having a child on her own would entail, and decide to get less hypergamous on the eve of making that leap. Women like Lori Gottlieb have been spreading the word – after the fact, of course – about their own tales of woe trying to be a responsible mother on their own. In fact, Gottlieb has turned her belated revelation into a career. The contempt these women – who had planned to use sperm from a guy 6′5″ tall - have for the saps who became the fathers of their children is palpable in the article. All three "bristle[d and fidgeted] at the suggestion that theirs is a Cinderella story times three, with men coming to their rescue." Goldberg added, "my happy ending began when I became a mother."

There's nothing – let alone "astonishingly" lucky – that a lot of women would settle rather than purposely confront motherhood on their own. It would seem like pure logic.

Then again, since when are more than the most minute slice of womanhood logical?! The coincidence that two women (the third woman ended up with the married guy who was cheating with her) who were connected by a mutual friend all came to the same logical conclusion about something is truly astonishing!

Wow! The astonishing nature of the coincidence which forms the core of this book cannot possibly be understated.

Then again, it could just be that the three women aren't being candid about their opportunism. Just sayin'.

Judge Ignores Father's Plea, Child Dies

Welmer · 24 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Little Ethan Stacy's life was torn apart by a divorce in which his mother had run off to Utah to be with Nathan Sloop, a man who has allegedly murdered the boy. His mother, Stephanie Stacy, was described by Joe G. Stacy, the boy's father, as "unstable" and likely to disappear with the child.

Last November, Mr. Stacy informed the court of his fears, but judge Maura T. Smith claims never to have read the filing. Mr. Stacy also said that Ethan had expressed reservations about leaving to visit his mother in Utah.

Nevertheless, Mr. Stacy complied with the court order and sent Ethan to stay with his mother in Utah, upon which Mr. Sloop immediately began abusing the boy, locking him in his room and beating him about the face and head. Soon, Ethan began suffering from symptoms of a brain injury, but despite his grave condition Mr. Sloop continued and escalated the abuse.

When the boy's mother and her boyfriend went to get married, Ethan was locked in a room in which the doorknob had been removed because his mother and her boyfriend didn't want anyone to see him in his battered condition.

During this time Joe Stacy tried to call his son on a daily basis, but the boy's mother made up excuses as to why he could not speak with the boy. Finally, on Mother's Day, Stephanie found the little boy dead in his bed, upon which she and her new husband drove his corpse up to a mountain, where Nathan Sloop took a hammer to the child's face in an attempt to render him unidentifiable.

After Stephanie reported her son missing the next day, police began to search for him, and in the meanwhile her story fell apart under questioning, and the tragedy was revealed.

This is every parent's worst nightmare, and it is made all the more tragic because the judge could have paid closer attention to the fears of Ethan's father.

When women accuse fathers of violence or neglect, judges almost always take it seriously. Men are forced to attend classes and seek "treatment," even in cases where they have done nothing wrong. Where men are concerned, the system prefers to err on the side of caution. Perhaps this explains why children are significantly more likely to die in the custody of mothers than biological fathers.

The free pass and benefit of the doubt given to women in our society can have deadly consequences for the most vulnerable among us. Assuming that women are always a safe choice has been a grave error, as has removing paternal oversight of children. Most fathers care about their children, and will protect them if given the chance. Unfortunately, courts all too often sever that protective influence at the behest of mothers who would rather exclude fathers from their children's lives.

Ethan paid for the errors of the American family law system with his life. It is time we started holding those in power accountable for the countless tragedies – both large and small – that play out every day in the fractured families of America.

Sarah Palin: Feminist or Not?

Welmer · 24 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Now that Palin has made her way to celebrity status and is basking in the glory of all the attention, the female commentariat is engaged in a passionate debate over whether not she can be called feminist. Most contributors to The Spearhead have already come to the conclusion that, whatever she calls herself, her actions have spoken for her, and Palin is a feminist of the "conservative" variety.

Now, apparently, Sarah Palin herself has taken to using the word to describe herself, so as far as we're concerned the cat's out of the bag. However, some of the left-feminists are having a hard time giving up their exclusive rights to the term. According to them, it isn't enough to call oneself a feminist:

> So, simply declaring oneself a feminist is all that it takes to be a feminist? Methinks not. Under this standard of feminism anyone – a racist, a misogynist, etc – could be a feminist just because they identify as such. Ridiculous. Daum's argument also presupposes that it took "guts" for Palin to identify as a feminist, something that's so often maligned in U.S. culture.

You'd think that even the Marxist nutjobs behind Feministing and such would see these decalrations of feminism a victory, but maybe, as feminism becomes the National Ideology of the United States of America, they are embittered by the resulting marginalization of the fringe radicals that got it started.

As men, perhaps we can take some comfort in the fact that whenever conservatives embrace an ideology, that means it is usually on its way out.

Splitting the Chores?

Hestia · 24 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this month a study was released from the London School of Economics that concluded couples who split the housework enjoy more stable marriages than those who don't….or so they do if wifey acknowledges the work her husband does.

This conclusion was interesting for several reasons. As most of us know all too well that many issues in marriages today boil down to how the wife feels about this or that and if she is willing to humble herself and accept the responsibility for her own faults and failures rather than blaming her husband. With this knowledge in mind, it's not at all shocking that women who care enough about their husbands to appreciate them would have more stable marriages. Treating others with respect and being realistic tend to be qualities that bring peace, not conflict into a relationship.

The fact that men contribute to the chores in ways that are seldom classified under the traditional "housework" label is also essential to consider. Work need not take place in the four walls of the home to be essential. Mowing lawns, yard work, taking out the trash, handling car repairs, and keeping tabs on the finances are just as important as marketing, cleaning, and laundry. In many families this work is handled by the husband and is far too easily forgotten when an argument arrives over which spouse does what work. I've listen to many rants at women-only social functions about men who don't fold the laundry or put their socks in the hamper but who get the oil changed in the car and never forget to take out the trash.

More interesting is the fact that this is yet another study and resulting discussion that fails to highlight what might be the most important point in this debate. In many homes it is the man who pays for the mortgage or rent. He is the one who provides the place to cook, clean, and raise the children and the necessary tools for women to engage in "domestic drudgery". Without his financial contribution, there would be no chores to do and for this reason providing the money for the check is arguably the most imperative housework of all.

An objective look at chore splitting should make a woman consider all of these points and more, but ultimately the attitude change must go farther than this. Women need to see not only what their husbands do for them, but the big picture their own domestic labor is contributing to. Scrubbing floors, laundering sheets, and cooking a casserole on a busy night are not glamorous and exciting work, but this work is important nonetheless. Such tasks are what builds a home that shelters a family from the world and provides a warm and caring environment in which children can thrive. The little jobs are the building blocks of domestic life with a family and the privileges that come with having a husband and children to take care of. They are bits of selfless service and ways to turn love into a verb.

Much as this study concludes an attitude check and grateful heart need to be cultivated for lifelong marital success for a sour outlook on the contributions of husbands and domestic work tend to have harmful results. Much reality needs to be acknowledge when it comes to marriage and the tasks required by family life.

Husband and Friend Arrested in Suspicious Beating

Welmer · 25 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In Issaquah Washington, a suburb of Seattle at the base of the Cascade foothills, a couple of men have been arrested in the severe beating of a man who is accused of raping the wife of one of the arrested men.

So far, the up-to-date police version of the story is that:

- Woman leaves bar and heads to friend's house
- Accused rapist, who knows woman and people at house, goes back to house
- Accused rapist allegedly has sex with woman
- Woman calls friend and tells her about it
- Someone tells husband and his friend
- Husband and friend go back to the house where alleged rape occurred
- Alleged rapist is sleeping on the couch
- Husband and friend arm themselves with a brick and mallet
- Man wakes up, husband and friend beat him unconscious
- Police are called and rape accusation is made
- Police arrive, find accused rapist bloody and unconscious, and arrest husband and friend
- Police do not advise woman to seek medical treatment and rape test

Now, nobody knows exactly what happened, but the events look pretty fishy to me. Would a rapist simply go to sleep after a rape? Would he rape the wife of a man he knew to be within walking distance – and a man he in fact knew personally – and then go to sleep in a place where he knew the husband would return?

This is either a case of an incredibly stupid rapist or a woman who made up a story. Or, perhaps, the guy was set up, but I kind of doubt that given the improvised weapons.

In any event, the accused rapist is in a coma, and obviously can't answer any questions.

Personally, I've got no pity for the guy even if the wife is lying about rape and just had consensual sex with him, but it isn't even clear that he had sex with the woman at all. If he did, and it was consensual, well, that's what you ought to expect for sleeping with your buddy's wife. Screwing married women should properly be a dangerous thing to do, and has only become a safe option because women have demanded that their "right" to adultery is protected by law.

If it turns out she was lying, the woman should be the one charged with first degree assault — not her husband and his friend. I'll be interested to see where this one goes. It certainly smells rotten.

One Morning in Baghdad

Baghdad, Iraq, Spring 2004

“49 weeks down in this desert” said Ian to Elliot as they walked through the rail station on one of their last days of work before handing the reins over to their replacements. Just three weeks until their boots hit the soil in the States after a year spent in the heart of Baghdad, helping patrol the city and training Iraqis to assist Coalition forces with certain tasks in the city. Of all the experiences he and Elliot have shared through their years of friendship, this deployment at the beginning of Operation Iraqi Freedom was hands down the most intense. The tents they shared as Boy Scouts in middle school were just the beginnings of a special sort of friendship that developed through the years. They’ve done everything together. Built fires, tied knots, stood in line for the latest greatest video game, and chased girls in high school. They even went into the recruiters office together, signing on the dotted line to join the Reserves when they were seventeen, barely in need of razors, barely able to drive, barely turning into men. And here they were, several years later, a part of history, wrapping up a year long deployment to Iraq at the beginning of a controversial war.

Walking into work, the conversation turns to planning for their first weeks back to the US. “I say we have a Stargate SG-1 marathon and then ride down the Oregon Coast. Our last boyish hurrah before you get married Elliot” suggests Ian. Elliot nods, liking the plan very much, adding “this winter we’ll have to be sure to go snowboarding again. Man, it’s been too long since we had a fun weekend trip like that.” Heading into their respective offices, the friends end their jovial conversation until break time when they plan, like always, to meet out front.

The morning was like so many others: mundane, routine, nothing out of the ordinary. Signatures were necessary here and there. Paperwork had to be done to tie up loose ends before the hand off to the replacements in just a matter of days. As the morning dragged on, lunch time was becoming all the more enticing. Around break time, Elliot set his papers aside and got ready to join his buddies outside. As he stood up to leave the room, he noticed something in the window. It looked as if the sun were rising, but this wasn’t the right time of day. “Oh fuck” Elliot managed to blurt out, right as the window shattered and the glass came flying at his face, cutting him on all exposed skin and clinging to his uniform. Grabbing his weapon, Elliot took off outside, not fully comprehending what had just happened but on high alert, primed with adrenaline for fight or flight.

When he arrived outside a large number of the Iraqi men who had been outside working were nothing but blood and guts strewn across the ground. The remnants of a vehicle was ablaze and was clearly the car that had held the bomb. Debris was everywhere and the officer in charge was freaking out and panicking, unable to gain composure and issue orders. Time seemed to stand still, yet it passed quickly all the same. The chaos was loud but inside his head was a deafening quiet. Elliot could hear his heart beat clearly with yelling outside his head jumbled and unclear. One of Elliot’s soldiers followed him and once they made sure everything was clear, that the danger was gone, they began to offer medical aid to the survivors of the blast. There were too many people who needed help for them to adequately tend to everybody, and some were too far-gone to offer anything beyond comfort and an ear to listen to their precious last words as they died outside under the hot desert sun. The men who could be moved to safety were flung over shoulders and carried away until more help could arrive. The soldiers stopped bleeding with torn up pieces of their own clothing, cleaned and bandaged wounds, provided IVs and treated shock with whatever makeshift blankets they could make, and kept traumatically injured men breathing and alive until transport arrived.

As Elliot and his soldiers ran around assessing the damage, locating those who were still alive and those who needed immediate care, he heard a familiar voice cry out. He looked over to the side of the building where the noise was coming from. Elliot couldn’t see much in the bright sunlight, made all the more confusing by the surrounding chaos, but then he saw a peek of camo around the corner. He ran over and realized right away who it was: the man on the ground was Ian. Bloody and gravely wounded, but his friend all the same. Desperately, Elliot applied pressure on the worst of his friend’s wounds, ripping off part of his clothing to serve as tourniquets to stop the bleeding. As he worked frantically, Ian told him to stop, “The pain is leaving. I’m going to die, aren’t I?” Before Elliot can answer his buddy, Ian gives him a message to bring home.

“No NO NOOOO!”

Elliot desperately screamed, demanding his friend hold on, but it was too late. He’d lost too much blood. He was hurt too badly to hold on. There was nothing left to do. “I love you, man” said Elliot as his best friend, the closest thing to a brother he had ever had, slipped away to the other side. Ian was just twenty years old. He was intelligent, talented, extremely gifted in the sciences, and had a world of opportunity awaiting him at home. So many plans for the future, so many dreams left unfulfilled. All gone in just a second as he left this world too soon.

With his DCUs ripped, torn, and covered in blood, with bits of debris lodged into his helmet and even stuck on his body armor, it was only then Elliot realized he was injured and could attend to his own medical needs. Bits of shrapnel from the bomb, bone fragments from the people who had died, and gravel from the ground were lodged in wounds all over his body and he realized he had been treating patients, bloody patients, with his wounds unprotected. He might not only be injured but could have been exposed to HIV, hepatitis, or any number of other diseases. After returning to camp, he went for medical treatment and returned to his tent where he could finally let the events of the day sink in. Thirty five men had been killed. Men who were simply trying to feed their families were murdered for being involved with the Coalition Forces. Some of the soldiers he worked with were dead, and his tent was now empty except for the ghost of his best friend, the laughs they shared inside just this morning nothing but a cherished memory now. He looked over to the cot across the tent, the one that no longer had an occupant, a friend gone in just a instant… Elliot just sat there and stared for a while. How much time he’ll never know but it felt like a lifetime. Unsure of what to think or how to feel, he lay in his cot, listening to mortar attacks around the airport until he finally awoke the next morning, groggy and numb, and called home to connect with loved ones for the first time since the blast. One voicemail said, “there’s been an accident, but I am okay.”

Two weeks later, when his boots hit ground in the USA, the homecoming was not the joyful celebration originally imagined, but rather a dark and somber occasion. They were home with three fewer men than they left with last spring. They’d said goodbye to three brothers in arms just about the time they thought they were safe and danger was over. Elliot kept his promise to Ian and visited his friend’s parents to share the message he had been entrusted with. This wasn’t all, he said; far from it in fact. He had an apology to offer for these people who were nearly family. With a guilty survivor’s conscience he offered an apology for not getting there in time, for not being able to save their son. They were supposed to come home together. They always did everything together.

Arlington National Cemetery, Spring 2010

Six years since the blast and Ian still lives on in hearts, in love, and in memory. Once again Elliot traveled to his grave in Arlington, as he does whenever the opportunity has arisen, to place a wreath on the grave of his lost friend. This time is different, however, as he doesn’t go alone but brings his little girl along. Ever curious, the little one asked why they are here. Elliot told her that he wants her to know a special man, a true American hero, somebody who was brave even when it hurt. His little girl doesn’t yet understand death, but she does know what it means to be brave and serve in the Middle East. She remembers well when her daddy was gone for a year. With the innocence only a child can posses, she lays her small American flag on Ian’s grave and offers a salute for “being Daddy’s bwave fwend.” This she repeated as she and Elliot walked away, her tiny fingers clasped in her daddy’s strong, but trembling hand.

Life And Times in Old Peking: The Expats (Part II)

Welmer · 26 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It's been a while since I wrote my first installment of the China experience, so I thought I'd better get on to the next one.

As a Westerner in China, I was part of a relatively small group of people. During the Cold War, China was host to very few foreigners, and the mere sight of a white or black person would attract a great deal of attention. By the time I arrived in 1997, the novelty had begun to wear off a bit in the capital, but remained anywhere outside of major cities. And even the citizens of Beijing had not fully come around to the idea of living in an "international city," so foreigners were viewed with a mixture of curiosity, suspicion and envy.

Because we were still outsiders – known as "laowai," which means something akin to the German term "auslander," to Chinese – we foreigners tended to stick together in our own little digs. Many lived in entirely foreign enclaves, but these were pricier than even apartments back home, so the younger and poorer among us, such as myself, lived in Chinese housing, which put us in a legally ambiguous position.

The vast majority of foreigners at the time – probably upwards of 90% – were men. China was not a very attractive destination for Western women due to the socio-sexual dynamics of the place. Not only is Chinese culture very patriarchal, it is also a very easy place to find a girlfriend for Western men. Being a foreign male – but especially a Westerner – gave one a certain cachet among the ladies. Guys from America, Britain and Europe were spoiled rotten by the hordes of young women chasing them at every opportunity. Even 70-year-old American men had no trouble finding girlfriends. Needless to say, this was not a favorable environment for Western women, as their sexual market value was markedly lower in this situation.

American and European women suddenly found that their brassy, mannish behavior and pushy attitude would see them all alone in no time. Those who couldn't handle their new, lowered status usually left quickly. Those who stayed often became uncharacteristically sweet and feminine. I have never seen American and European (i.e. white) women as humble and sweet as they were in China. Even so, that didn't do them much good; many of the Western men in China carried a chip on their shoulder from the treatment they'd received as men back home, and I witnessed some plainly hostile behavior toward Western women from time to time. In one characteristic instance, a young American woman was saying something nondescript to a Canadian man I knew, and without any prompting he simply said, "That's nice — I'm not interested. Why don't you go home?"

However, amongst the men there was generally comradery and mutual goodwill. We'd swap tips on this or that new pub, tell hilarious stories about adventures about town, and occasionally gripe about the inconveniences of life in a developing country. As we did so, we generally drank a great deal of beer, shot pool and watch the girls parade by as we spent our few nights a week at the pub.

Most of the expat pubs in Beijing were in Sanlitun, which is a festive street on embassy row that would liven up with music and raucous partying every night. There were bars for every flavor of expat, and of course I generally went to the British and American ones. However, my favorite bar of all was the Lido Holiday Inn's sports bar, which featured darts, billiards and an island bar in the middle. It was a great place to hang out with my British and American friends after work and have a couple cold beers during happy hour, then shoot some pool. It also happened to be relatively near my apartment, so I could simply walk home at the end of the night.

The Lido was built with expats in mind, so it features a few restaurants, bars and a bank that specifically cater to foreigners — Americans in particular. It was like a little outpost of America in the middle of the overwhelming vastness of Chinese culture and civilization. Needless to say, it was a relief for me, and I spent a good deal of time there. However, it still had its own quirks. The Pig and Whistle, an English themed bar in the hotel's interior, was notorious for the hookers, about half of whom were Mongols. I could never quite figure out exactly why the Lido was stocked with Mongol women, but I assumed the Chinese security – who appeared to be the de facto pimps – thought it was appropriate that foreign prostitutes should serve the foreign clientele. It also may have been due to the fact that Mongols generally despise Chinese, and the girls preferred non-Chinese clients.

For the most part, the hookers avoided the sports bar, but they were thick in the hotel disco and "The Pig," as we knew the Pig and Whistle. The Mongol girls not only "dated" Western men, but most of them kept an African boyfriend on the side. It was an odd situation, so I advised the Western guys I knew personally to avoid them, as I was suspicious about the chances for the spread of HIV, which I knew to be prevalent in some of the countries their African boyfriends called home. It turned out that my suspicions were warranted — a few years after I left China there was a scandal in which some Mongol girls went back to Ulan Bator infected with HIV, and the entire urban Mongol population turned on the few Africans who happened to be unfortunate enough to be in Mongolia at the time. Of course, the women were as much to blame, but that seldom enters people's minds — even in Mongolia, I suppose.

One of the side-effects of living in what was an overwhelmingly male environment was that we Western men became much less guarded about what we said. Our language was a lot more candid, and we didn't worry much about offending people. For the most part, the Chinese couldn't understand us, and even if they did know English we salted our conversations with so much slang and, in many cases, such a drawl, that they simply had no idea what we were talking about. Chinglish – a mixture of Chinese terms and English – became the norm, and grammar suffered accordingly. It was all great fun, and our speech evolved (or devolved some might say), into a lively creole that was only competently understood by our little Anglo-expat community.

Some of the characters I remember from our community included a widowed Texan wildcatter named Ray; Duffy, a weatherbeaten old Canadian jockey from Alberta; George, a man-of-Kent (or Kentish man?) with a distinctly bourgeois English character and a penchant for cognac; Francisco, who was a Canadian of Chilean descent; and Cliff, a retired American engineer with a wife in Hawaii and a girlfriend in Beijing.

There were many more who came and went, including some more memorable for their habits and appearance than their company. One fellow who we called "red," because of his atrocious toupée, would spend all of his time with various women and rarely utter a word in our presence. If I needed proof that any guy could get some action in China, old Red provided it.

Of course, there was occasional rivalry – unfortunately often over women (men are incorrigible in that way) – but in the end we almost all grew to have some affection for each other. Across ages, nationalities and occupations, our common bond as Western men pulled us together. For example, there was one fellow named Ian, who worked as a technician or engineer in some firm or the other and was engaged to a Chinese woman named Sue. Ian, who was British, was a bit ornery, and seemed to dislike me for one reason or another — he probably thought I was an arrogant young American punk. I was always polite and did my best not to let his sarcastic remarks or skepticism get under my skin, but for some time he remained the same. However, when his son from a previous marriage back home (a common source of affliction for expats), a handsome kid who was close to my age, came to visit and I ended up showing him around town and having a good time with him, suddenly I was just fine and dandy in Ian's eyes, and when he eventually relocated to Singapore we parted on affectionate terms.

China really brought a number of us men together, and I look back on the fellowship as one of the best aspects of my trip there. I still have a friend I ran into in Beijing – he practices law in Minnesota now – with whom I speak on a regular basis. And this isn't even to mention my Chinese friends, with whom I continue to correspond.

It is curious, although considering that I married an American woman after returning home perhaps not surprising, that I still stay in touch with several men on a frequent basis, but of all the women I knew over there – and there were many and diverse women I knew there from all over China and the world – there is only one I continue to correspond with from time to time, and she's a married professor in Metz, France.

I certainly spent more time with women than with men in China, but the only lasting benefit I can honestly say that I obtained from them was a higher level of proficiency in spoken Mandarin, which is certainly something to be grateful for, but in any event could have been achieved in another manner with less trouble. But alas, I was very young, and young men are hopeless in such matters. But enough of the women for now; I will get to them in another installment.

There are dozens of stories I could tell about the adventures we had over there, but this being a blog post rather than a book, I'll have to save some of them for a more thorough treatment of the Wild East of the late 90s. Without the men I met and befriended in China, my stay in that faraway country would not have been nearly as memorable as it was. From the dangerous to the absurd and bizarre; through the good times as well as the bad; and amidst all the loneliness and sometimes sorrow that characterize the life of a man far from home, there were men to share it all and offer support, wisdom and indispensable company. I will never see most of those men again, but I certainly won't forget them.

Political Choices

Welmer · 26 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Unfortunately for men these days, we don't have much of a choice when it comes to politics. Vanishingly few politicians will support men's interests, especially where family law is concerned, while plenty of them will actively bash fathers and men in general. Essentially, we've been reduced to choosing between the lesser of two evils in almost every case.

I know we don't all have the same politics here on The Spearhead, so I think we ought to break down the issues to a few things everyone here ought to agree with.

Some would be:

- Equal father custody
- Elimination of alimony
- Elimination of discrimination against men in education
- Ending debtor imprisonment of fathers/ex-husbands
- Imprisonment of women who make false accusations
- Reforming domestic abuse laws to prevent their use as a tool in civil cases
- Parity in health funding for men and women
- Revocation of affirmative action for women
- Removal of women's divorce incentives
- Repeal of VAWA
- Repeal of IMBRA

Of course, there are many more issues (feel free to add to the list in comments), but there's no way we'll find a politician who would support us on all of these. In fact, given the excessively androphobic nature of our society, we'd be lucky to find one who supports us on even one of these issues, but if we find one that does we'll have to give him (or her — we might actually find a fair woman out there) our support.

Most likely, however, rather than supporting a champion of men's issues, we'll find ourselves opposing someone who is a truly awful, feminist man-hater.

I have the misfortune of living in Washington, a very feminist state with two female senators who have been intimately involved in two of the most androphobic bills ever passed in the United States — IMBRA and VAWA.

We have Patty Murray, who was visited shortly before assuming office by Gloria Steinem, and Maria Cantwell, one of the sponsors of IMBRA.

This year, Patty Murray is up for reelection, and she is being opposed, unfortunately, by Dino Rossi. Rossi has lost in the governor's race twice, defeated both times by Democrat Christine Gregoire. He's a lawyer and real-estate trader, and not particularly charismatic. He's a pretty typical Republican, which doesn't make me all that enthusiastic. I have no idea where he stands on men's issues, but he can't be any worse than Patty Murray, so I may have to give him my support.

For those out there with the time and inclination, I think the summer's political campaigns might be a good way to bring some men's issues to the surface. If a candidate is a particularly nasty feminist, like Murray, hammer them on it if at all possible. Start a blog, write letters to the editor, support their opponent, and make some noise about it.

I've noticed on newspaper discussion boards that a lot of men have started to wake up to what's going on, so I'm pretty confident that people will be out there listening. Given the mancession and the blatant discrimination against men, this really is the right time to start making some noise in defense of men.

Uncle Sam's Predator: How a Woman Games the System by Snaring Soldiers

Welmer · 26 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Bobbi Ann Finley has been taking young soldiers for all they're worth for years, draining their bank accounts, getting pregnant with their children, and marrying multiple men at once. The system set up by feminist family law has made her job a lot easier, and armed with false identification she targets one victim after the next, making off with benefits, cash and their progeny.

Bobbi Ann has at least 9 children and has been married to at least 11 men, but the hapless young men keep falling prey to her scam. It seems outrageous that she can get away with what she has, but one must keep in mind that every military base is surrounded by attorneys and services for soldiers' wives — even if these leeches don't offer a thing to the soldiers themselves.

America's feminist political climate has opened the door wide to this kind of abuse, and it was only a matter of time before Bobbi Ann and the like learned the game and started consuming young men.

Finally, one of the young men's mothers has caught on to her and launched a campaign to bring her to justice. She may be facing some punishment, but if she is caught it is sure to be light, and the back child support from the many men she has snared will be a payoff that should keep her going for quite a while after any short jail sentence she may serve. Evidently, she lies to the police, too (big surprise there), and has even taken that so far that she was arrested for giving a false statement.

Here's one young soldier's experience:

> Cheeseman says he married Bobbi Ann on a Monday and she was gone the following weekend. When she took off, Shane's credit cards were maxed out and his bank account was empty. It wasn't until months later that he learned he wasn't the only victim.

Ms. Finley has been at large for almost a year. Anyone who knows her whereabouts should contact local authorities and do their part in bringing her to justice.

Feminism and the S.A.D.

Hawaiian Libertarian · 27 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

(NOTE – This is not a review or a fisking of Orbach's book…but it is an attempt to point out that FAT is most certainly a Feminist issue – just not in the way Orbach thinks…)

The connection between feminism and the Standard American Diet (appropriately referred to as S.A.D.), may not seem apparent to most. Bear with me in this rather long piece, as I belabor to make the point in showing this connection, and how it's contributed to so much ill health in America today.

Laura Wood, The Thinking Housewife, wrote a short post in which she quoted a Salon.com feminist's reaction to a great article by Michael Pollen in the New York Review of Book, The Food Movement, Rising.

The feminist's complaint?

> Michael Pollan blames the movement for our fast-food culture. What about untold men who've never tied on an apron?

Laura Wood responded to the feminists complaint humorously:

> Men have been doing nothing all these years while women slaved away in the kitchen. Here's an all-points bulletin: Do not accept a dinner invitation from anyone named Anna Clark. Unless you like chicken nuggets.

While I found Laura's quip in response hilarious, these two articles have a lot more content worthy of consideration. Pollan's first mention of how the feminist movement changed the food culture of America was to tie it to the rise of fast food:

> Besides drawing women into the work force, falling wages made fast food both cheap to produce and a welcome, if not indispensable, option for pinched and harried families.

Of course it did. Women who chase the chimera of "having it all" live in denial of the fact that their are only so many hours in a day, and when you invest your time in one area – like your career – you simply don't have the time to dedicate to the other areas of your life, like homemaking and cooking. This is common sense. Than again, no one would accuse feminists for having an abundance of that particular virtue…

Many anti-feminists correctly recognize that feminist ideology is essentially a cult-like belief with articles of faith that are accepted at face value without question…and if any facts or evidence is presented that contradicts a feminist tenet, than the facts or evidence must surely be wrong, falsified, or just not relevant. The standard method of dealing with the cognitive dissonance of reality contradicting feminist doctrine is to simply shift the focus of debate.

Note the Salon feminist Anna Clark is a self-described fan of Pollan's work:

> I'm a fan of the journalist who has become the food movement's top chronicler. I pass on copies of "The Omnivore's Dilemma" and "An Eater's Manifesto" like it's my job. I social network the living daylights out of Pollan's articles.

That is of course until Pollan dares to skewer one of Anna's sacred cows…note her reaction:

> So while reading Pollan's latest piece in The New York Review of Books, I was nodding along as he articulated how the local food culture manifests the good kind of movement fragmentation — threading together diverse > interests to create a powerful force. I was nodding, at least, until I got to the part where he discusses Janet A. Flammang's new book, "The Taste of Civilization: Food, Politics, and Civil Society." Pollan writes:

> > "In a challenge to second-wave feminists who urged women to get out of the kitchen, Flammang suggests that by denigrating "foodwork" — everything involved in putting meals on the family table — we have unthinkingly wrecked one of the nurseries of democracy: the family meal."
> Pollan chooses not to challenge the assertion that second-wave feminists are responsible for "wrecking one of the nurseries of democracy" because they urged women to explore possibilities outside of cooking the family meal. Nor does Pollan question the notion that feminists are to blame for "urging" women to leave the kitchen, when one might imagine that those who left the aprons behind were thinking beings who made their own choice to leave, regardless of the persuasions of feminists and family alike.

Now why would he challenge or question those assertions? The second-wave feminists did in fact demean the role of the American housewife…this is indisputable. And is it really a stretch to say that cooking and feeding the family was one of the primary chores the housewife role entailed, for which the feminists so bitterly attacked? The famous feminist description of the domain of the housewife in her domicile as a "comfortable concentration camp" comes to mind…

Note that instead of recognizing the truth of Pollan's indictment, Anna does what all lefty femi-nazis do when confronted with the truth – blame men!

> My take, as a feminist and local foodie? Blaming feminism for luring women out of the kitchen, stealing the ritual of the family meal, and thereby diminishing "one of the nurseries of democracy" is both simplistic and ridiculous. It's true that shared meals are powerful spaces for building relationships and "the habits of civility." But if we're going to talk about who's to blame for our current culture of processed food, why not blame untold generations of men for not getting into the kitchen, especially given Pollan's characterization of the family meal as having a meaningful role in cultivating democracy? If it's so important, why is their absence excusable?

Because those "untold generations of men" were out working to earn the money to pay for the house and the appliances and the food that the women were cooking for the family to eat, you deluded dolt! Feminism preached that women should get out of their "concentration camps" and get into the workforce and compete with the men…equality bayyybbeee!

This didn't result in the mass exchanging of gender roles…it just made life harder and more difficult for both men and women. But I digress…

Pollan concluded his article with some points I wish to expand upon:

> …perhaps the food movement's strongest claim on public attention today is the fact that the American diet of highly processed food laced with added fats and sugars is responsible for the epidemic of chronic diseases that threatens to bankrupt the health care system. The Centers for Disease Control estimates that fully three quarters of US health care spending goes to treat chronic diseases, most of which are preventable and linked to diet: heart disease, stroke, type 2 diabetes, and at least a third of all cancers. The health care crisis probably cannot be addressed without addressing the catastrophe of the American diet, and that diet is the direct (even if unintended) result of the way that our agriculture and food industries have been organized.

As I've covered before, there is an almost synergistic relationship between feminism and the industrialization of our food supply. The industrialization of the food supply was every bit as important for the cultural-Marxist, social engineers that carried out the long march through western institutions, as was the advent of feminist ideology to subvert and destroy the Patriarchal nuclear family. The two have gone hand in hand, and we've all suffered for it in both our physical, spiritual and mental health…it literally affects every area of our modern lives.

That being said, I have a small bone to pick with Pollan's conclusion:

> the American diet of highly processed food laced with added fats and sugars is responsible for the epidemic of chronic diseases that threatens to bankrupt the health care system.

While this is technically correct, the distinction between the types of fats that are added has a lot to do with it as well. This topic is fast becoming a pet peeve of mine, as I notice so many people that regurgitate the lipid hypothesis-based memes regarding "fat" as the primary culprit in causing heart disease.

Not all fats are equal.

More precisely, one of the primary contributors to ill health is the ratio of Omega-6 and Omega-3 fatty acids in your bodies cells…and the Standard American Diet contributes to a massive imbalance in the average person, with way too much Omega-6 fatty acids and not enough Omega-3's. This is why you sometimes hear about the need for eating more fish from some health "experts," to increase your Omega-3 intake.

What most people don't know, is that eating more fish won't make a bit of difference in your Omega-6 to Omega-3 ratio if your diet is still heavy in Omega-6 fatty acids…and the S.A.D. which is largely composed of the Federally subsidized grain and seed oil crops is THE single biggest source of Omega-6 in the S.A.D.

So why do the health "experts" always talk about fish as the necessary food to boost your Omega-3 levels?

One scientific researcher, Susan Allport, did extensive research into the differences between Omega-3 and Omega-6's and the role they play in human health. She wrote a book entitled The Queen of Fats: Why Omega-3s Were Removed from the Western Diet and What We Can Do to Replace Them.

While I've yet to read this book, I've read an excellent interview (pdf) she conducted in promotion of this book, in which she gave some eye opening insight into the topic.

First, she discussed the major difference between these two essential fatty acids and why they are related to our biology and the changing of the seasons:

> We finally began to understand that the omega-3s are predominantly concentrated in the green leaves of plants and the omega-6s are concentrated in the seeds of plants, and that basically what we're talking about here is two families of fats that allow us animals to prepare for the changing seasons, to either speed up, get ready for times of activity and reproduction when green leaves are available and abundant — or to slow down, hunker down, get ready for times of survival — when the fats of seeds are more prevalent.
> It's really a cool system. Plants use the changing light as the Earth makes its orbit around the sun — they adapt to the changing light, and then we adapt to the change in plant food. It really is an amazing thing, but it's not generally understood. We just think, oh, we'll eat this food, if we eat enough fish we'll be healthy. There is a much bigger story than just how much fish we need to eat, or which seed oils to eat.

Two important points regarding the distinction between the two – your not going to get enough of the Omega-3 you need by eating a bunch of leafy plants. This is where animal foods play an important role in getting enough Omega-3 in your diet. To put it succinctly – in plant form, Omega-3 fatty acids are largely in the form of ALA — alphalinioleic acid — for which the human body's digestive system is very poor in using. Our bodies need docosahexaenoic acid and eicosapentaenoic acid…aka EPA and DHA.

While the human digestive system doesn't do a good job of converting ALA into the needed DHA and EPA that we need (it will do it somewhat…but nowhere near as much as we require), other animals are very good at it…cows eating grass (the leafy greens rich in ALA) and convert it into DHA and EPA and store it in their meat and fat. This is precisely why free range, pastured cows (and other ruminants like buffalo) contain Omega-3 fatty acids while the feedlot produced meat and dairy contains almost none.

Feedlot ruminants are predominantly fed Omega-6-rich grains. Same goes for factory farmed chickens and pork. The quality of food products that come from animals raised on feedlots versus open pasture is affected dramatically.

From The Health Benefits of Grass Farming.

> When cattle are taken off grass and shipped to a feedlot to be fattened on grain, they lose their valuable store of LNA as well as two other types of omega-3 fatty acids, EPA and DHA. Each day that an animal spends in the feedlot, its supply of omega-3s is diminished.
> When chickens are housed indoors and deprived of greens, their meat and eggs also become artificially low in omega-3s.
> Eggs from pastured hens can contain as much as 20 times more omega-3s than eggs from factory hens.
> Switching our livestock from their natural diet of grass to large amounts of grain is one of the reasons our modern diet is deficient in these essential fats. It has been estimated that only 40 percent of Americans consume a sufficient supply of these nutrients. Twenty percent have levels so low that they cannot be detected.11 Switching to grass fed animal products is one way to restore this vital nutrient to your diet.
> The CLA Bonus: The meat and milk from grass fed ruminants are the richest known source of another type of good fat called "conjugated linoleic acid" or CLA. When ruminants are raised on fresh pasture alone, their milk and meat contain as much as five times more CLA than products from animals fed conventional diets

This is why we are told to eat more fish (but not too much…mercury poisoning!), or to take fish oil pills to boost our Omega-3 intake. It's not because fish are the only source…just the only source left in the S.A.D. that still eats leafy greens at the base of their food chain. (Which, of course, brings to mind the difference between farmed fish versus wild caught fish…).

As Allport noted:

> All the omega-3s in seafood come originally from plants. Fish are so important to us because they're one of the last animals in our food supply that still eat greens. That is one of the reasons why fish have become so important.
> Another is that because they live in water, they require more of those omega-3s in their tissues in order to move around in that much colder environment, under pressure. So they require omega-3s in their diet, and because we now feed the majority of our animals grains instead of grasses, they're one of the last animals we're eating in any kind of quantity that eats greens.
> Eating fish is one way to correct this imbalance of 6s and 3s in our food supply. But it's not the only way, and it is not the best way. We have to eat 10 times as much fish to get a really healthy balance of those two families of essential fats is we would if we were eating healthy amounts of the omega-6s. If our omega-6s were at healthy levels, we would need just tiny amounts of fish or omega-3 enriched eggs or cattle that have been raised on grass.

So we now understand why American diets are so deficient in Omega-3's…because most of our meat and dairy comes from animals fed Omega-6-rich grains. Why is the ratio between Omega-6 and Omega-3 so important anyways? Allport explains:

> These two families of fats compete for enzymes, for positions in our cell membranes, which don't care whether they get loaded up with omega-6s or omega-3s. They don't care for a reason — because they're built that way so > that they can change with the changing seasons and the changing food supply. They're meant to go through these seasonal changes, slight seasonal changes. The reason we've run into problems is because we eat this high omega 6 diet year round.

So we know why the S.A.D. doesn't have enough Omega-3 in it because of the Omega-6 rich feed for our food animals…but that's not the only reason why we the S.A.D. has such a dramatic imbalance in Omega-6 vs. Omega-3's. Thanks to the marketing efforts of agricultural corporations and their incestuous relationship with the US Government to promote propaganda like the USDA food pyramid and the whole "saturated fat causes high cholesterol which causes heart disease" meme, Americans began shying away from animal fats and began using o6 rich vegetable oils instead.

> From the vegetable oils that have replaced butter and lard, from other fats in our diet, from the processed and packaged foods that use vegetable oils as a convenient and inexpensive fat, from the process of partial hydrogenation, which specifically eliminates omega-3s, turning them into 6s as well as trans-fats, from the fact that our livestock are no longer fed grass and other greens but are fed grains, which are much richer in the omega-6s. . . . I don't know how many ways! We wouldn't need to eat as much fish if we'd stop eating those high omega-6 vegetable oils.

So what vegetable oils specifically? Corn, soy, sunflower, safflower, peanut, cottonseed and canola are typically the most widely used oils in the SAD. Not only is most manufactured, processed junk food made with these oils, but so too are most fare cooked in restaurants (fast food and slow food alike), and many Americans have also responded to the USDA/Pharmaceutical industry propaganda by substituting "non-fat' and "low-fat" cooking oils and margarine instead of the traditional oils like butter and lard in their own cooking.

So what specifically are the long term effects of having an Omega-6 rich diet year round? Remember Allport's initial explanation regarding the seasonal role of these two essential fatty acids: Omega-3's are kind of like a lubricant, meant to get things flowing and operating at a higher metabolism on a cellular level – which is why fish living in cold, dark water are so dependent on Omega-3's to move about – while Omega-6's slow down your metabolism, and promote inflammation. It's this overabundance of Omega-6 that contributes to inflammation on a cellular level. Over a long period of time, this inflammatory condition begins to contribute to a whole host of degenerative diseases. Allport expands on this, here:

> Remember, we're talking about every cell in the body — and we're talking about these fatty acids first winding up in the cell membrane, every cell, which is why every day you see a new disease that's being linked to this imbalance.
> The last one I saw was Parkinson's disease. I've seen recent reports on autism, obesity, Type 2 diabetes, macular degeneration, all of those. OK, so you're picturing every cell, and every cell likes a certain amount of polyunsaturate in it, > and that's what keeps it moving optimally, right? But that amount can be made up either of omega-3 or omega-6 fats, so it's got that discretion, which is meant to work with the changing seasons.
> The rest of the fats in those cell membranes will be fats of the saturated and the monounsaturated families. Those are fats that we make ourselves, depending on what we need. So, given anything that we eat, we can make whatever saturated and monounsaturated fats we need, but the polyunsaturated fats we need have to come from the diet, and each different cell type is going to want a slightly different > ratio of polyunsaturated than the others, but the family that it comes from > depends upon what you're eating.

As detailed earlier, we know what kind of polyunsaturated fatty acids predominates in the S.A.D….Omega-6.

And this effect of having way too much Omega-6 and not enough Omega-3 in the body?

> Let's say that omega-6s are a little stiffer, and omega-3s are a little looser. That looseness enables all those enzymes in the membrane — and that's where most enzymes live, in cell membranes — it enables them to go about their business that much faster. You can imagine it is kind of a WD-40 for the entire body, or you can think about doing jumping jacks in the air versus doing them in a thicker medium like water — that's what the difference is. You have this slowing-down effect when the omega-6s have replaced the omega-3s, and that fits in with that hunkering down for times of leanness and survival. You're putting on weight, and you're slowing down.

> These two families have different overarching effects. They are also snipped out of the membrane and used to make important cell messengers called prostaglandins. The first thing that we knew about these two families of fats was the fact that they made very different cell messengers. The ones made from the omega-6s are highly inflammatory, highly likely to promote blood clotting or increased blood pressure — they affect all kinds of bodily processes linked to diseases such as heart disease, obesity and diabetes. The omega-3 messengers are far less likely to promote inflammation.

So remember this the next time you read, see or hear someone blaming high fructose corn syrup for the American obesity epidemic. Yes, HFCS definitely contributes…but it's not the only thing behind the epidemic of obesity, diabetes and heart disease. You have to factor in the chronic inflammation caused by too much Omega-6 in the S.A.D. America's too fat, because we eat too much sugar AND too much inflammatory Omega-6 fatty acids.

And of course, lets not forget the pivotal role the feminist movement had in creating the society wide demand for fast and convenient foods, which have now become the mainstay of the S.A.D. Since Feminism was one of the primary cultural and political drivers of promoting the types of foods that promote Omega-6 fatty acid imbalance in our diet, one could say that feminism has certainly been inflammatory in more ways than one.

How “Uppity Sistas” Make Life Harder For All Black Women

Obsidian · 27 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Regular readers of The Obsidian Files will know well my epic struggles with commenters Deery and Jamila, two Black Women who seem to delight in disagreeing with me, LOL. That I don’t mind, actually: if everyone agreed with my take on various things, life would be very boring indeed.

But, as some of my readers have noted, there is a bit more going on than mere disagreement with these two, a kind of “meta message” that both seem to be transmitting, just under the radar, in Game parlance, what we would refer to as “subcommunication”; some have suggested that these two ladies seem to want to “put me in my place” as a Black Man, one who they deem isn’t as smart, sophisticated or urbane.

And to my mind, these astute observers would have a strong point indeed — it has long been known in the Black community of the existence of such Women. In fact, a goodly part of the long-running historical tensions extant between Black Men and Black Women, finds much, by no means all, but much, of its basis in this fact.

I’ve seen the likes of Deery and Jamila all my life. They are often the most haughty, snobbish and bigoted people around. Recently in my post about writer Lori Gottlieb, I argued that I had experienced MORE discrimination and outright bigotry from Black Women than I ever have from Whites, and I stand by that statement today, because it’s true. In another post where I outlined how and why Women were MORE wedded to the notions of a “double standard”, I made the case that Women, taken as a group, were far and away MORE snobbish than are/were Men. Deery and Jamila are Exhibit A & B respectively, on these fronts.

For example, I’ve said before that, based on her comments made here, that Deery not only sees herself as one of the Black Elite, but actually holds lesser Blacks in a goodly bit of contempt-especially Black Males who don’t come from or necessarily aspire to become one of the landed gentry. This was borne out in a discussion where she mentioned her disgust at her own brother’s decision not to continue his formal education and instead chose a more modest life. While I have refrained from publicly commenting, either way, on Deery’s views in this regard, I will now break my silence to say only this: I have four siblings, and at no time did it ever occur to me to hold them in contempt for not doing what I THINK they should be doing with their lives. So long as they were happy and weren’t a net drain on society-not a criminal, having 3 and 4 baby daddies, in jail or on relief forever and a day-so long as they were contributing to the local tax base-I was perfectly cool with whatever they wanted to do or be in life, be that a corporate raider, or working in a pie factory. My love for them didn’t change one bit.

So, to hear Deery talk about her brother in such acerbic terms, was to be frank, quite painful to me. But it was also quite illuminating, too. In so many ways, Deery values social climbing more than blood.

We saw this in a discussion where I asked whether Axe cleaning products was seen as lowbrow; Deery went to great lengths to suggest that it was, despite the fact that a majority of female commenters were quite clear that what mattered most was that the Man in question smelled clean, regardless if the soap that took to make that happen came from the dollar store or Macy’s.

We saw it again just recently, with a discussion about my take on SCOTUS nominee Elena Kagan; during the conversation, Thomas Sowell’s name came up, and Deery’s reaction to said name, was, again, quite instructive. Although I could immediately see that Deery’s real opposition to Sowell was the simple fact that he’s aligned with the Conservative Right, I decided to let the convo run until it became clear to everyone else what her personal biases were, and the gambit worked. I’ll have more to say about that in a moment, but the point I want to make here is that, aside from his being a Black Conservative, another thing Sowell has gone on record with is his suspicion and disdain of The Elite — the very thing Deery is wedded to. It then makes perfect sense why Deery would have the reaction she did at the mere mention of Sowell’s name, now don’t it?

Jamila is no better. Despite her own personal failings, glaring cognitive dissonance and blatant contradictions among her own stated beliefs, still she manages to find a way with which to impugn Black Men as a group; Y, a regular reader here at the O-Files, called it a “Black Men ain’t shit” meme. Indeed, it is, but I’d like to take it a step further-it’s a “Black Men ain’t shit” meme in pseudoscientific drag.

This is because Jamila, in her own sordid attempt to backward rationalize her own mis-steps in life, does so by giving aid and comfort to HBDers like Planet Grok (whom she finally pulled back from, only when he began to get a bit too familiar for Jamila’s tastes) and known and avowed “academic racists” like Michael Levin, a regular speaker at Jared Taylor’s American Renaissance conferences. Initially, on her recent blog post entitled “Why Race Matters”-which is the title of Levin’s 1997 book-Jamila attempts to use Levin’s arguments as to why BLACK MEN were so bad at marrying and being baby daddies. ONLY WHEN I noted that it took two to tango, did Jamila had to admit that, if Levin is correct, it would have to mean that both Black Men AND Women, weren’t too sharp cognitively. She agreed.

But when I then stepped up the Socratic Questioning, asking her that, given the events of her own life would she still agree with Levin’s analysis, she balked. Instead, she blames her own failings not on being fundamentally dim-witted, but rather taking a page out of WEB DuBois’ book(s), and says that her predicaments past and present are the result of her being forced to sharing breathing space with more dimmer Black folk.

Woman, thy name is Cognitive Dissonance.

It got so bad, that even other Black Women readers/commenters could see what was going on; commenter Terry asked Jamila whether she felt this way about the very people who loved and fed and clothed her; in another post, Terry asked how Jamila’s seeming unquestioned embrace of the HBD position jibes with her own self-professed Christian beliefs and worldview. Y, having extensive familial relations in Nigeria, West Africa, demanded proof that Black people and Black Men in particular, were somehow genetically predisposed not to pair bond with Women. Even Chic Noir, who has thus far defended Jamila, had to question the latter on her views, since Chic also has extensive family relatives, this time in Ethiopia-a far sight from Nigeria.

Would it surprise anyone here that Jamila has yet to respond to either of these Sistas?

Chic continues to defend Jamila nonetheless; Terry continues to pray for the gal; Y left in disgust.

And the beat, as they say, goes on.

A little while back I posted up an article written by Psychology Today regular Satoshi Kanazawaa, about why really smart people say, do and believe in really stupid things. He argued that in evolutionary terms, such people are novel, and they use their smarts as a way to signal to others, particularly potentially mates, that they have a kind of extra feather in the cap. The problem with this is, that they’re misapplying their smarts-the vast majority of situations, problems and the like that most of us face in life, don’t require a 130-plus IQ; indeed, far from it. For most people, most of the time, simple commonsense will do.

But for the smarties of the world, they simply cannot bring themselves to grips with the fact that it ain’t that deep — very little of life is. Hence we see these folks do, think, say, really dumbass stuff. They should be FEELING their way through much of life, instead of trying to show everyone how big their brain stem is.

This creates real problems for Women like Deery and Jamila, all up and down the social foodchain, but especially when it comes to relationships. This is because Black Women are already up against it when it comes to their love lives as a group, and being what some would call an “uppity Sista” can only be a bane, not a boon, to their existence. Instead of merely relating to others on an emotional level, Sistas like Jamila and Deery instead attempt to find some overwrought, overarching paradigm that both demonstrates their smarts, and as well explains (read: justifies/rationalizes) their position. Instead of merely saying, in the case of Deery, “I don’t like Sowell because he’s a Black Conservative”, or in the case of Jamila, “I made some personal mistakes and now I’m gonna do better”, instead these gals have to go through all these mental contortions to explain, defend and justify, their FEELINGS.

This is why Deery can't discuss ANYTHING without a sliderule or a flowchart, and this is why Jamila can't discuss ANYTHING without copiously quoting from whatever flavor of the month author she's reading.

And to many Men, regardless of color, such a thing is really, truly, one. Big. Turn. Off.

Of course, such Women get very defensive when they read/hear such things, for reasons I've indicated elsewhere in the forum, but it doesn't change the facts on the ground. The vast majority of guys simply aren't interested in what your ACT score, or SAT score, or your GRE score, or your LSAT score was or is. Most guys walking around don't consider matriculating through a top tier uni that big a plus, or a dealbreaker if you didn't go. Most guys really ain't interested in debating a chick over something that is bleedingly obvious to like, Stevie Wonder. And most guys HATE having smoke blown up their ass, and when Smarty Women like Deery and Jamila do the kind of things I noted above, that's when a lot of guys vote with their feet.

So long as you're not breathing through your mouth and write and speak in complete sentences, for most guys, you're good to go. There, I said it.

Much has been said about this particular dispensation of time; whatever the reasons for Black Men not going on to higher ed, the fact is that they are now hardly alone-even ASIAN Males are beginning to fall off in comparison to their female counterparts. This spells some serious trouble for Women in general, and for Black Women in particular, because it can point to some real problems culture wise, and, as it always does whenever two people come together, the blame cannot be laid at the feet of just one party. Smarty Women have a lot to answer for, too, and here is why I say that the Deerys and Jamilas of the world are making it a heck of a lot harder for the Ys. That's because, unlike so many Women, who talk that Keith Sweat, "I'm gonna, I'm gonna" stuff, Men simply vote with their feet if and when they determine things have gone as far as they can, they run across a better option, or have simply had enough. They don't make a big brouhaha over it. The MSM won't devote hours and hours of primetime coverage to it. They. Simply. Do. It.

And because human beings being human beings, most guys, after having a taste of the Deerys and Jamilas, won't want to take a roll of the dice to find out if Y is or isn't the same.

See where I'm going with this?

A final point. If you're reading this and think, "Obsidian's just got issues with Black Women", I can save you the trouble. I had a Black mom. I have Black sisters by blood. The majority of the Women in my life romantically, were Black BY MY CHOICE, and the love of my life now, is Black — in fact, many of you who read this blog regularly know that I refer to her as such: Ms. Brown Sugah. I do not hate Black Women, far from it. I am proud of their achievements, and want them to succeed.

But that doesn't mean that I won't call certain groups among them on the carpet for their ridiculous dumbassery either when I deem it fit to do so. Just remember, that I'm stepping in the name of love.

Which is a heck of a lot more than can be said for Smarty, Uppity Sistas like Deery or Jamila when they talk about Brothas like me.

Now adjourn your asses…

More Sarah Palin Feminist Blather

Welmer · 27 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The amount of noise coming from trad-feminists over Sarah Palin's claim that she is a feminist has increased considerably lately, and shows no signs of letting up. One would think there's a fox in the feminist henhouse from all the frenzied clucking emanating from their blogs.

I'm not sure what to make of it, and not sure I should care, but I suppose anything that gives them such a wedgie (I like that — feminism has become a "wedgie" issue) might at least be instructive as to their tactics and vulnerable spots.

Here's some of the latest hysteria concerning the socon-feminist invasion:

> As it is, these "conservative feminists" are erecting so many straw feminists to define themselves against, all of America should be protected from crows who are insecure about their masculinity for generations to come. To hear these women tell it, those of us who were using the word before it was cool (see Look 5) are not only anti-men, anti-motherhood, and obsessed with abortion, we are now also anti-woman. "In fact," writes Lori Ziganto at Hot Air, "they are diametrically opposed to feminism, by it's very definition, because their entire agenda is actually harmful to women." (Did you know there was one handy link to the entire feminist agenda? I did not!) "This is why I now call them Femogynists and I'm taking the term feminist back."

Here she slips into the familiar feminist obsession with jargon:

> So why is the idea of "Sarah Palin, feminist," any worse than the umpteen bona fide prominent feminists who have promoted racism, homophobia, transphobia, classism, ableism and the ongoing dominance of only a certain type of women's voices over the years? Arguably, it's not. Arguably, it's the logical endpoint of a movement long shaped by women who are but one –ism away from the top of the heap in the first place, and perhaps more interested in taking that one step up than in ending oppression all the way down. If the feminist movement primarily serves women who are already tantalizingly close to full kyriarchal approval, we probably shouldn't be surprised when a group of women who are even closer – basically just like the old feminists, except they don't expect the government to help anyone and aren't fussed about bodily autonomy! – decide they're yet more qualified to run it.

She throws down the gauntlet:

> The problem is, they support the kind of female candidates who make us old-fashioned feminists root for men.

It's always funny to see women at each other's throats. Now that so many women have power, we no longer have political mud slinging, but rather something even better: political mud wrestling.

I suppose this is one thing we men can now start to sit back and enjoy as the ship of state slowly slides under the waves. For all their "you go girl" solidarity and fist-pumping on Oprah, women's cooperation and claims of common interests is a big sham. When Mistuh Gubmint Sugahdaddy's cash runs out they'll all be at each other's throats, blaming one another with as much vigor as a cheating wife blames her husband.

Supreme Court Rules Against Child Abductor Mother

Welmer · 27 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In some good news, the US Supreme Court recently ruled against a woman who violated her parenting plan by removing her child from Chile and returning to the US despite signing an agreement with the child's father stipulating that he would be involved in decisions as to where the child lived. The father is British and the mother American, but they divorced in Chile.

Interestingly, the man did not have custody of the child, but the parenting plan was given enough weight by the judges to overturn an appeals court ruling that excused her abduction of the child. The key factor in the ruling was the Hague Convention on child abduction, a treaty aimed at preventing parents – primarily mothers – from crossing borders with children to sever their connections with the other parent.

According to Justice Kennedy:

> To interpret the Convention to permit an abducting parent to avoid a return remedy, even when the other parent holds a ne exeat right, would run counter to the Convention's purpose of deterring child abductions by parents who attempt to find a friendlier forum for deciding custodial disputes…

Dissenters included Justices John Paul Stevens, Clarence Thomas and Stephen Breyer.

What's Your Style? The Six Traits Of The Alpha Male

Obsidian · 28 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I thought to take a respite from the more heavier sociopolitical themes we've been discussing here in the forum, and return to another theme of mine, which is Game and human sociosexual dynamics.

In his groundbreaking memoir The Game, Neil "Style" Strauss recounts his very first meeting with Mystery, who almost singlehandedly revamped the modern day pickup scene with his keen insights into the psychology of the human mating dance. Mystery tells his students that there are a number of traits that all Alpha Males possess:

1. Alpha Males smile.

2. Alpha Males are well-groomed.

3. Alpha Males are the social center of the room.

4. Alpha Males have a sense of humor.

5. Alpha Males connect well with other people.

6. Alpha Males are confident.

I've personally found that where a lot of guys trip themselves up is in trying to gun for the more complex or complicated stuff about Game, and completely lose sight of simple things like that which Mystery outlined above. Think about it: EVERY Alpha Male does, to lesser or greater degrees, what the list outlines above. Don't believe me? Then go test it out for yourself: spend the next few weekends just being out and about, in parties, social gatherings, clubs, bars. Heck, you can even do this by going to church. Anywhere where there are groups of Men and Women interacting with one another. And you'll see what Mystery said above to be in full operation.

Most guys think that by being/acting "hard" that will get them Women. WRONG, LOL. Looking mean will mean that you'll be by yourself.

A lot of guys think that by playing he background they'll look cooler and thereby get Women. Wrong-they'll just be holding the wall up, like the vast majority of Men do at social gatherings.

A lot of guys think having a sense of humor and busting it up w/lots of smiles makes one look foolish. Wrong-it's the exact opposite.

Lots of cats think a lot of stuff that's just so flat-out wrong till it's not even funny. Then they wonder why, though they'll never say it outloud as to why they don't get laid*.

All of the six items mentioned above are the basic, fundamental traits that all Alpha Males have. Again, don't take my word for it. Go and see for yourself.

Another major, major point Style made in his book in his first meeting with Mystery, was where Mystery laidout the importance of Peacock Theory. He said that most guys think that if they look "average" they'll be able to appeal to the widest possible number of Women-WRONG. You gotta specialize your look, if you want to succeed with Women.

Now, what I've found is that many guys get this all twisted-they think that, because Mystery wears outlandish hats and paints his nails black, that they have to do this, too. But that's simply not the case, and Mystery himself has said as much. What he's simply meaning is that if you're going to have a chance of attracting attention from a Woman you want, you have to standout in some way. You can't look like all the other cats-you have to do something that sets you apart somehow.

So, take a look at yourself-an honest look at yourself. In a full length mirror. Checkout your clothes, your hair style, etc. Now, go outside and take a look at all the guys around you. Take careful note of how they look. Do you blend in with them, or do you stand out?

When I buy clothes, or do pretty much anything for that matter, I am always mindful of the fact that my style is distinctive-personal and unique only to me. Nor is it something I do “just because”-it all has a purpose, a meaning. My style is such that people know who it is simply on hearing about it alone-”that’s Obsidian”, or, “Obsidian would do that”, and so on.

So, what’s your style? What is it about you that’s distinctive, that sets you apart? Why do you wear the clothes you have on, what do they say? Same for your hair style, tats, piercings, jewelry, etc. How do they measure up against everyone else out there? Do they stand out-or do they blend in?

WHY should that Hot Mami stop to speak to YOU? Hmm? What makes you so different from all the other cats out there on the block?

Me? Well, I guess you could say that I’m something of a Dandy-and it flows with what I like to call my cultural cross-dressing tendencies and experiences, if you will. What I mean by that is, I dabble in styles spanning many genres and periods-a bit of Victorian here, some Goth there, a dash of Metro over here, some thug there…you get the idea. But all w/a Brotha’s spin on it, you see. Like that. In fact just over the weekend I was looking into those frock coats gents used to wear back in the day online. Didn’t really find what I wanted, so maybe I’ll checkout a few of the local spots, and if that don’t work, then I’ll just have the thing custom made.

Anyway, taking the time to find what style best works for you is very, very important. Do a bit of research. Allow you imagination to roam free. Experiment! You never know what works until you try.

In the comments below, let’s expand on all of this a bit, shall we?

Gynarchy International

Welmer · 29 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A reader sent me a link to the Gynarchy International website, which is a strange publication that advocates a female supremacist society ruled by Amazonian lesbians. I've seen the site before, and at first thought it must be a joke of some sort (read the FAQ), but the more I look into it, the more convinced I grow that these people are serious.

For the most part, the women involved appear to be dominatrixes of one kind or another, which means some of them are probably prostitutes. Lesbianism is quite common among prostitutes, so this isn't all that surprising, but what really gets me about the site is the men involved in the forum.

These guys are really, truly sick.

Here's an excerpt from a forum topic titled "Personal Bidet:"

> Sissy:
> i truly hope your post did not offend any Superiors as my previous Mistress had not urinated in a toilette from the first day She claimed me as Her servant. While She has never forced me to serve as Her toilette when She has had to relieve her bowels (thankfully), it is still the duty of every male on this planet to obey every command from their Superiors. Now that my Mistress has moved back to Sweden, i find myself missing waking up with the hot, acrid and wonderful taste of my Mistress relieving Herself in my mouth every morning.
> wolhet:
>
> Personally, i love the taste and warmth of my Mistress's urine flowing into my mouth.
> Funny how the taste varies; sometimes a bit salty, other times bitter, depending on her diet and other things. Any one else notice this?
> She likes to bottle her pee and store it for me to drink later, but when it's refrigerated it tastes enitery different.

One might be tempted to dismiss this as the ravings of deranged perverts, but the men on the site appear to have swallowed the ideology as willingly as the excretions of their masters:

> Tbob:
> Caste is a interesting way of thinking about it!
> I guess their's 3 seperate things that will have to constitute any real societal change:
> 1. mindset of Womyn
> 2. mindset of males
> 3. society
> Easiest of the above should be to convince Womyn they are superior, hardest will be to convince all males. Society itself would probably be changed along the way to adapting needs and beliefs. I think it's obvious societies any larger then a small town will not be able to enforce a caste system onto males – so we have to either convince all male's or convince enough male's to defend the majority vote in a democracy.
> So how to convince, really important to outline why the gender relationship is not 50-50, and that Womyn are the primary organism, most capable and complete. The male is a rough, low featured 'worker' version. This imbalance needs to be accepted, recognised and that it makes the Womyn more capable, especially with > intellectual and spiritual intelligence – not necassarily more logical, or computationally intelligent, as this is a function also within the ability of the male so it can achieve complex 'work'. I think that is more than just a different societal caste, but actually a different creature. It does redefine a few text book's but all are made up of varying amounts of facts surrounded by supporting assumptions.

> Another of the reason's why the Gynarchy appeal's to me is that increasingly future societies should allow greater level's and ranges of individual sensation together with broader community wealth and security. That really increases the requirement of societies to be able to understand and manage personal welfare more and more in the context of an evolving technobiological society. Skill's like empathy are much more natural for a Womyn to employ.
> I guess we are all here on these forum's to think about it and hopefully try and make progress towards what we feel is a hidden truth that the world is needing to recognise now. I feel a bit stupid not realising about Female Supremacy earlier, but I find it so liberating embracing something that feels so true.

Additionally, they are interested in implementing new castration techniques so as to achieve their goals:

> Ian:
> Hi Ms Aline et al,
> I happened to see the question and answer below at a Yahoo Group.
> A Female member asked whether male castration by injection was possible. The answer given was, " The drug, Neutersol, has now been approved for use in pets in the U.S. It works by injecting a dose into each testicle. I have no idea how much a human dose would be. Right now they're only talking about using it on puppies. "
> I think it may be worth the Lesbian Sorority asking American members to find out more about this, but that is just my opinion. Hopefully all the Gynarchy membership can consider the ethics and implications of utilizing such a new and potentially useful though untested development.
> Ian.

Although these fellows probably represent the extreme, I think they are actually a good caricature of the prevailing mentality of a number of men, including so-called conservatives.

As disgusting as what they are writing is, their opinions are valuable in that they give us a very clear view of the goals of female supremacism, which, as it turns out, involve drinking urine and castration.

The Crowning of Rima Fakih: Supplication or Provocation?

Welmer · 29 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

There is no denying that the Miss USA contest is a heavily politicized event. The selection of women of a certain type is intended to send a message about what politically correct America feels is the right and proper representative of American women at the time. Race has been a major consideration since at least the 1980s, and more weight is given to what women represent politically than how they look in their various outfits.

Therefore, it isn't all that much of a surprise that an Arab woman won the event this year. This year's winner, Rima Fakih, is obviously an attractive woman — not strikingly so in comparison to the others, but she also happens to be an Arab "Muslim." Additionally, as it turns out, she's an exhibitionist skank.

It's odd in the first place to elect a Muslim woman who defies her faith's conventions to flaunt her nearly naked body on the world stage, but to select one who is clearly a little hussy seems a bit overboard.

Recently, there was a small uproar in Uppsala Sweden over film depictions of Muhammed as a gay socialite. A number of Muslims attended the screening and made a ruckus over the film, which was created by one Lars Vilks, and made some noise about it. Swedish police were on hand to quell the dispute and keep the Muslims under control, but the producer has chickened out and gone into hiding over it. Seems like little more than a publicity stunt to me. If one really has a firm belief about something, one should be prepared to accept the consequences and literally fight for it, so I have little respect for Mr. Vilks, who is hiding behind security. In any event, I don't think any of these "artists" are doing anything but self-promotion, so it doesn't surprise me when they scurry off and hide under the tresses of the nanny-state.

Of course, there are those, such as Theo Van Gogh, who paid the ultimate price for their principles, and that's worth a thing or two. However, I have yet to see one of these guys actually fighting back, which is what you do when you actually believe in something. So, I've got to wonder whether they believe in anything at all, or if they are simply making some effort to attract attention to themselves.

In the Miss USA contest, however, there seems to be a more subtle form of provocation going on. It is a decision by a panel of judges, so the woman is chosen by a sort of "consensus," which, in this year's case, is supposed to suggest that America in general wants to project itself as exemplified by a slutty Muslim apostate.

Who were these judges? Well, they were mostly females and gay men – including ice-dancing queen Johnny Weir – which is kind of odd for a competition that is supposed to decide upon who is America's most desirable woman. Can one imagine America's women taking it seriously if they were told by men and lesbians who they should find attractive? The notion is laughable. But apparently it is considered perfectly reasonable for women and homosexual men to decide which women are most alluring.

So who do they come up with but an Arab stripper…

Lest any women accuse men of only wanting lousy, low-quality women, let it stand on the record that half of the Miss USA judges for Miss USA 2010 were women, at least one was a gay man, and still they chose a skanky, pole-dancing, skinny little tramp who sticks a thumb in the eye of her (impressively ethnic!) heritage and religion.

American men hardly could have done worse. In fact, although some American men may hate and despise Islam, I doubt any but the worst of them would go so far as to make that kind of provocation.

Perhaps American men wouldn't take it that far because we know we're the ones asked to fight the Muslims these people are provoking. How many of the dead American boys in Iraq or Afghanistan would, had they survived, ever have had the chance to even judge a high school beauty pageant these days, much less a Miss USA contest? If they had, would they have deliberately chosen Ms. Fakih? Somehow, I doubt it.

Why We Write

Obsidian · 30 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Since I've been thinking about my "mission statement", and since I just had to course-correct Deery on the post and thread of the same name, I figured this would be a good time to let er rip.

Many years ago, when I was first starting out my tenure of teaching at Temple U, I got into the poetry reading scene-alright, I ain't gonna front, it was a good way to meet chicks, LOL. But, as so often happens, I learned a lot about life, others, and most of all myself.

For those who may not be aware, there has been for some years a burgeoning poetry reading scene in certain pockets of Black America-poets of all manner of interest and ability will gather and read their stuff. Much of it is good, some of it whacked, all of it interesting, in that they give a kind of window onto the world of others, how they think, and why they feel the way they do.

One of the themes I saw very early on in m poetry going, was that of a steady stream of Sistas who would, in prose, discuss their love lives in general and Black Men in particular; this was something that invariably placed all the blame for whatever trouble they had in their lives squarely at the feet of the Brothas. And, because Men or all shades and colors, all walks of life, have been taught (read: browbeat) into being deferential to Women regardless as to how ridiculous some of them are and/or sound, very rarely did the Brothas react negatively or respond in kind; when time came for Brothas to get on the mic, they waxed slam-poetic about the police, racism, or some other amorphous entity wreaking havoc in their lives.

As always, Women got a pass.

Among other things, this raised my Archer's hackles, and offended my Libran sensibilities-after all, I was always taught it takes two to tango, and why weren't Brothas speaking up for the other side of the story? In fact, I said to myself then, now that I think about it, how come we have so few Black Male writers (blogs hadn't arrived on the scene just yet) of any particular stripe? Sure, we all can rattle a few names here and there, but for the most part, Black Lit is done by the Sistahood.

I was livid.

I stormed into my Dept Head's office one day, and vented my spleen. He listened intently for about 10 minutes, and then he said one word:

"Write!"

His move knocked me off my square. "Write?", I asked. What do you mean?

What he told me would stick with me all my days.

"One of the biggest problems Black Men have is they don't write. They don't convey to others their views or feelings or impressions of the world around them, and its a shame because the world needs to listen to what you have to say, and you have A LOT to say. Don't blame the Sistas because they got it going on-blame yourselves because for whatever reason, you don't write. If you want to change things, you can start, by sitting down at your desk and writing."

I bought a computer that day, and did just that.

In fact, I decided to "respond" to what I'd heard at so many poetry slams/readings around the city, even though I had no background in poetry whatsoever. I simply copied the style and cadence of the poets I heard-especially the female ones-and wrote about what we in the Game community calls the "LJBF" thing. I talked about the blatant hypocrisy so many Sistas engage in, how they lust after the bad boys then wanna cry victim when they get burnt. I talk about how they claim to want good guys but turn their nose up at them. I talked about all the pretty lies and blatant contradictions so many Sistas seem to revel in, daily, yet expect guys to adhere to some outmoded and anachronistic standard. I talked about the defile he very word “friend” when they utter it to a Man, because as Men, we take such a word very, very seriously, when so many Women do not.

I decided to do my thing acapella, if you will; just the sound of my voice.

The place roared. Brothas were on their feet. Of course, Sistas felt some kind of way.

But so be it. The truth can often be like that.

My Dept Head at Temple U had armed me with something more powerful than a Bomb-for that night, I truly learned, that the pen, is mightier, than the sword.

Much to the chagrin of many, Hip Hop-a creation of and by Black Men-is now a worldwide phenomenon. People the world over, want to hear what Black Men have to say. This is not lost on me, even now, and especially since the beginning of my own blogging effort.

This blog is one Black Man’s take on the world around him. It is from a perspective that not even some other fellow Black Americans may not be used to or even like. So be it. It is important that the record show, that there were quite a few Brothas who willing to stand up, be counted, and most importantly, to be heard.

What I find so very interesting, is in how when Women blog, or write books, or read poetry, they aren’t assailed with demands to give stats or other forms of “proof”; it is simply and merely understood that they’re giving their take on things, on life. Yet, whenever Black Men speak, be it via a blog or a mixtape, all manner of feathers are ruffled.

Don’t tell me Brothas don’t have power.

One other thing I’ve learned all these years: I don’t know about the notion that Women are such better listeners than are Men. My personal experience, including that of today, doesn’t bear this out much at all. In fact, I would argue that Women can be horrible listeners, because when they hear something they don’t like, they go bananas. This explains why so many Black Women lose it about certain forms of Hip Hop, never once asking why the rappers say it in the first place, and God forbid if they ever ask if what they’re saying has an iota of truth to it. Oh, no.

For those who want to better understand where Black Men are coming from, why they think, feel and act as we do, what we feel and think about the great issues of the day, and to just hear a different take on things, this is the place to be, and you’re most welcome. And for those who are a bit uncomfortable with what I have to say, I can only offer you the way out the door, for I will not change. Not. One. Bit.

The world needs to hear more from Brothas. The Obsidian will do his part.

That is, after all, why I write.

Now adjourn your asses…

America's War Dead Spit Upon

Featured Guest · 1 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post submitted by Dirk Johansen of The Balls Monologues]

Many of America's soldiers were spit upon when they returned from Vietnam. Those guys who were American soldiers but did not live until the end of their service were spit upon coast-to-coast today.

Memorial Day commemorates U.S. soldiers who died in military service. It doesn't honor all military veterans – we have another holiday for that, in November.

Nonetheless, MSN.com's lead story was "Women in Uniform," described by MSN as "In honor of Memorial Day, meet some of the many women who have dedicated themselves to America's defense, from 1778 until today."

The St. Petersburg Times chimed in with its main front-page story taking up most of the page, written by a woman, "Honors at last for WWII's women with wings," and while some women did die flying those planes, none did so in combat since they women didn't fly in combat – though, of course, thousands of guys have

As if that were not enough, the Times ran another story entitled, "Remembering Tampa Bay area Servicemen and Women," memorializing those who have died in Iraq and Afghanistan. While plenty of women around Tampa Bay have pocketed some nice coin prancing around stages naked while those conflicts have been raging, not a single broad from Tampa Bay has died in either.

A West Coast feminist Facebook Friend of mine wrote that what she was thinking about today were the rapes of female soldiers in our military, and PTSD. Of course, the rates of female soldiers suffering PTSD are staggeringly high relative to guys. I wrote back to remind her that today was to memorialize those who died in service, and that the gender disparity was staggeringly disproportionate, and suggested that a ban on straight guys in the military would resolve both the gender death-disparity issue and the problems she was raising. She promptly unFriended me.

From Sea to Shining Sea, women are hijacking Memorial Day as yet another celebration of what in fact are the miniscule contributions of women to our country. To those that many that are doing so, I spit on them.

By the way, the beach was great today. Lots of hot asses and freakish tattoos! Here's a picture from today, of The Dominatrix in a thong!

That's my foot in the foreground, blocking a side view of her voluptuous right breast.

The Fountain of Youth

Hestia · 1 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

According to legend Ponce de Leon searched in vain all over Florida and the southern states for the fabled fountain of youth, but his explorations were in vain when this magical water was never found. Little did Ponce de Leon know that the real fountain of youth had been with him all of the time, that he knew it intimately it could be said, for this secret was in his pants. The anti-aging properties attributed to this mythical fountain has been found by the modern woman in the form of foreskin fibroblast cultivated from the medical waste leftover after circumcision procedures on baby boys. So popular are such products they have been highly recommend by the Queen of Gab herself, Oprah Winfrey.

Every year millions of newborn baby boys in the United States undergo a circumcision procedure to remove skin and nerve endings from their penis. This procedure is known to cause a loss of sensation and skin mobility and may possibly lead to sexual performance problems later in life. The tissue removed from this procedure is then sold for profit to cosmetic companies and medical research labs where the tissue is utilized in the development of new technology and products. In other words, young boys, barely part of this world, are welcomed to the human family through this cruel rite for the benefit of aging women who will pay top dollar to stay forever young. It's revulsion and misandry packaged in a bottle, put on the shelf, and sold for top dollar!

If these products utilized tissue from the circumcision or excision of baby girls, would they still be popular? Would they even be allowed to be sold? I think not and for this reason my disgust is especially great.

I had my kids over the extended weekend, starting on Friday, and at three and five years old they are quite a handful for me alone. Add to that the fact that babymomma didn't show up to pick them up yesterday, and I've been a bit snowed under.

However, after today things should get back to normal, and the content will once again be flowing.

Whatever the case, despite the driving rain and sub-arctic temperatures in Seattle over most of the weekend (highs in the low 50s), we had a nice time together, and the kids have seemed perfectly happy to spend all this time with daddy. I've been pretty happy, too, but I wouldn't recommend going the single parent route if you can avoid it — it is hard work!

Historical Fact: NOW Supported Child Murderer Andrea Yates

Welmer · 2 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Because a feminist commenter has called me a liar for saying that feminists support the right of women to kill family members without consequences, I'd like to highlight the efforts of the National Organization for Women to overturn Andrea Yates' conviction for murdering her five children.

Here's an excerpt:

> The Houston Area National Organization for Women is rallying support for Andrea Pia Yates, the Clear Lake mother who has admitted to drowning her five children.
> In addition to forming the Andrea Pia Yates Support Coalition, the local chapter of NOW plans to help raise money for Yates' defense fund, the organization's state president said Thursday.
> Shortly after Andrea Yates was arrested, NOW adopted a resolution regarding postpartum depression during a national conference, Bell said. The resolution urges the judiciary to "consider tragedies of this sort in the full context of the nature of postpartum depression," and calls for more research into the illness.

So there you have it. Child murder totally excusable according to NOW. Call it "postpartum depression" or use whatever excuse you want: the fact remains that the feminists do not want to see a woman punished for murdering her children, and are willing to pay money to have her conviction overturned

Does anyone think a man should be excused for murdering his family because something was bothering him such as, say, his wife whoring around town?

How about it, feminists?

Mother Slits Daughters' Throats in Divorce Revenge

Welmer · 2 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of the girls survived, and the other died. The girls were 12 and 13 years old, and the mother said she felt that because she was upset about the divorce, she would "take away all of that pain." She also said she'd kill her husband in his sleep.

Family annihilation by mothers is a growing trend, encouraged by feminists, who suggest that women are entitled to exterminate their children and other family members for any reason, at any age.

Parallels with Soviet Society?

Welmer · 2 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I recently came across a short paper titled Women and the Soviet Military, which was written in 1982, and it gives us a picture of the results of an enforced gender equalist society. Although there are some important differences, especially in regards to the officer corps, women's participation in the Soviet military was quite significant, starting in World War II, when they comprised some 8% of mobilized forces:

> The common historical perception of the woman in the Soviet Army is that of a heroic, highly motivated, well-disciplined, tenacious soldier fighting in defense of the Motherland. Growing out of the Soviet experience of World War II, in which more than 8 percent of the Soviet Union's mobilized troops were women,2 the image may reflect more the propaganda efforts of the Soviets than reality.3 Nevertheless, the Soviet Union is one of the first contemporary societies to employ women extensively in its armed forces. Women served as "women soldiers" in World War I,4 fought in the Revolution, and even provided combat units during World War II, when three women's air regiments flew combat aircraft and 23 of their fliers were named Heroes of the Soviet Union.5
> Women also served with ground combat units as snipers, machine gunners, and tank crew members.6 While 40 percent of the medical officers at the front were women, the greatest percentage of women served in rear areas to release men for combat duty.

As time went on, however, female participation dropped significantly:

> The greatest value of women to the Soviet military, however, seems to be their potential for large-scale wartime mobilization. Indeed, the Universal Military Duty Law of 1967 specifies the drafting of women in wartime, and the Soviets have established several programs and procedures to prepare women for mobilization. These include mandatory participation in military-oriented youth programs, draft-board registration of women with special skills, participation of discharged servicewomen in reserve status until age 40, and reservist status for all women who complete mandatory reserve officer training at university level.14 In summary, the present utilization of women in the active Soviet military, beyond their potential as a large reservoir of manpower in time of war, is restricted to carefully and deliberately controlled positions.

The results of the equalist policies in Soviet – particularly Soviet Russian – society eventually started to take a toll on the family:

> However, the ideologically inspired and pragmatically applied concept of women's equality in the work force has not been without costs. As a result of a contradiction in Soviet policy that urges women to be both productive workers and housewives, a "double burden" has been created by emancipation — raising children and managing a household on one hand and holding full-time, often technical jobs in industry on the other.
> This double burden has been largely responsible for a significant trend that is causing alarm to Soviet sociologists and demographers: the decision of the overburdened working mother, particularly in urban, ethnic Russian families, to limit family size to one or at most two children. As a result, ethnic white Russian birthrates are declining, while the Asiatic Russian minority birthrates are rising. Their concern is not ill-founded. Statistics indicate that between 1959 and 1970, the percentage of ethnic Russians in the U.S.S.R. dropped from 55 to 53 percent of the total population.

It's clear that there are a lot of differences between contemporary American society and late Soviet, but some of the same factors are obviously at work. In the drive to achieve gender equality as dictated by Marxist-Leninist doctrine, extra burdens were placed on the family, and eventually these began to take a demographic toll. Women found themselves increasingly responsible for both work AND family, and men eventually drifted off into irrelevance, drinking and whoring their time away rather than being productive citizens. This goes a good way toward explaining the collapse of the Soviet Union and the subsequent mess Russia is still dealing with.

From observing the trajectory of the Soviet Union, one might come to the conclusion that the United States is facing a similar collapse in a relatively short time that will result in significant economic and political decline.

As Feminism Takes Over US Universities, Decline Sets In

Welmer · 3 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Ross Forman, who earned his doctorate in comparative literature at Stanford, had a tough time finding work in American universities, but found an inviting atmosphere in Asia, where his education and skills were valued despite his being male. More and more American academics – most of them male – have been traveling far afield to find work in the better environment provided outside of the United States, where higher education has increasingly come to resemble a ladies' book club.

In addition to the ideologically-rooted hostility against men standard in American universities, skyrocketing tuition costs and bloated budgets for the benefit of such departments as women's studies have taken their toll.

Although foreign students continue to flock to American universities, the best and brightest in countries such as China and India are increasingly likely to stay home and attend elite, domestic universities. Fortunately for them, professors such as Ross Forman are stepping in to fill in to provide them with the best America has to offer, allowing them all of the benefits of American expertise without the drawbacks and mediocrity that have come to characterize American higher education.

Men at Work

Obsidian · 3 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Several of my esteemed readers have been, online and off, sent me a spate of articles and have been asking me about all the scuttlebutt surrounding the arrival of the New Grrl Order-the fact that we have now crossed the labor market rubicon, where Women now makeup a simple majority of the American workforce. After giving a bit of thought to this, I've decided to respond in this way.

First off, we have to keep in mind that the Chattering Classes are wholly divorced from the rest of the country, no matter how hard they may try to act differently. Simply put, they live and die, in a completely different world than the rest of us plebes. Most of these folks live in the richest areas of the country, and their salaries are counted in the millions of dollars a year if not more. It is very difficult to live that kind of life and have any real understanding of what day to day living is like for the rest of us.

So, the notion that the Mancession has hit mostly married, more well to do couples, is at best a polite contrivance. To be sure, it can happen there, but we all know, as the recent announcement of the Gores going splitsville demonstrates, that fewer Americans are getting married to begin with, and sticking it out when they do. So in a very real sense, such points as raised by the MSM is, at best, moot. If not an out and out diversion.

Where the rubber really hits the road for me, is what I like to call the Acid Test of Equality-for more than three decades, we all have been told that Women have been working against a stacked deck, and in many ways, they were right. But that was then, and this is now. Not only are Women more employed in the workforce, but they often outearn many Men and have more formal educations, to boot. Whatever the gripes of the past may have been, and again, I fully and freely admit they may have been legit, Women can't say that such things obtain any longer, not with the wholesale carnage the Mancession has left in its wake.

So, for me, this period of time will be a perfect one in which Women will demonstrate what they will do when in the Big Chair at last. I for one, can't wait to see what will happen.

Will Women be willing to support Men who no longer work at all? For decades in this country, and centuries worldwide, Men did this for Women. Yes, you may say, but Women bore the babies and took care of home and hearth. Fair enough, but it's been proven that guys can care for babies just as well as Women can, and who said that busting suds or making your bed was a "Woman's thing"? Rubbish.

We know, for a fact, that Men, for all their faults and foibles, did the toughest, dirtiest and most dangerous jobs, often without fanfare or complaint. And they did it to support their families, where, more often than not, their wife wasn't working outside the home. Millions of Men would return home on a Friday and hand over the check to the wife. It remains to be seen if Women will return the favor now that they're the breadwinners.

We also know, that it was very common for Men to literally fall down dead at work. Its been said that more people (read: Men) have heart attacks on the morning drive/commute to work on Mondays than any other week, and I've personally seen that theory borne out in real life-one of my uncles died while having a massive heart attack drving to work one Monday morning; by the time his car crashed into a tree, he was already as dead as a door nail. And one of my best friends of nearly three decades' father died on the way in to work on a Monday morning. In his case, he made it to the job-then collapsed on the shop floor, DOA.

In my own life, a week before I started on my job, a Man died, in the same spot I would be working. Several more have died since my tenure began. Quite a few others would receive career ending injuries. And as we all saw back in April of this year, not a Woman was to be found among those lost in the Upper Big Branch mine or British Petroleum oil rig disasters; the dead were all, to a Man, Men.

So, it remains to be seen if and what kind of stresses White Collar, largely services-oriented workers experience. Something tells me that it won't quite parallel what I've noted above.

Personally, I think this is an excellent time for Men. Why? Because for the first time in a long time, if not ever, we don't have to do what our dads and grand dads did. Make no mistake, they often did jobs they hate, and there wasn't a Chattering Class or Oprah with which they could cry into their beer to. Many Men, stoic as all get out, simply did the damned thing, day in, and day out, handing over the paycheck/wallet to the Missus every Friday like clockwork. Like Tiger said, that's one heck of a transfer payment when you think about it.

But anyway, yea, we guys now have options-real options. We can go back to school-or drop out from a life chained to a desk. We can travel, if even only within the country itself, and see new things. We can remake ourselves anew, try new things, meet new people. And most of all, we can define ourselves away from what society says we should be, which is what we do and have much we make doing it. In this respect, the Mancession was a blessing in disguise.

It's also a blessing in disguise because, when it comes to the ladies, we now know what they truly are all about. Let's face it, money has always been the buffer that kept the wolves of a relationship at bay. With that no longer a factor in the mix, we now get to see what Women, as a group now, are truly made of. What do they really value in a Man? It was one thing to talk a mean game of Keith Sweat stuff back when they didn't have any pull, but that day has long past and they are now in the driver's seat. So I say it's a good thing that you may not have as much moolah as you once did, fellas. Now you get to see what the Women in your life are truly made of.

Somehow, because I have a bit of understanding about human nature that includes Women, I have a hard time believing and seeing Women simply taking on the roles that Men once did, even as it is highly unlikely that so many of them would meet the same fates. Its hard to see Women openly and without complaint, paying for dates outright; or paying the rent/mortage outright; or, gasp!-handing over her paycheck to her significant other to handle the household expenses. To be sure, there are individual cases of Women who don't play to this kind of type; I consider myself blessed to be a Man who has known of this kind of Woman firsthand. But the exceptions don't kill the rule, they only strengthen it.

Of course, I could be totally wrong.

The Ladies will decide…

Update on Lorenzana “Fired for Being Sexy” Case

Welmer · 3 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the recent post on Gynarchy International, which is filled with feminist fetishist men, I found it interesting that Jack Tuckner, the attorney representing Ms. Lorenzana in her discrimination suit against Citibank, allegedly has exactly these sorts of submission fantasies.

One of Mr. Tuckner’s former employees has sued him for sexual harassment, alleging:

- Jack Tuckner watched porn at his desk
- Jack Tuckner discussed his “pierced genitalia”
- Jack Tuckner wore a “bondage [slave] collar” at work
- Jack Tuckner had a sadomasochistic relationship with Mia Metzger
- Mia Metzger was Jack Tuckner’s designated slave master
- Jack Tuckner consistently demeaned all of the women who worked for him

Evidently, Tuckner also has Nazi submission fantasies:

> According to Ms. Brockington’s lawsuit, she said Jack Tuckner told her he was a piercing enthusiast who was “extremely into spanking” [Cool!] and kept a screen saver on his computer that shows him kneeling at the feet of his girlfriend, who was dressed in a black dominatrix outfit. She also said that Jack Tuckner called her “Aryan babe” and the ultimate shiksa…

There was some discussion in the comments on the Gynarchy International post concerning the mentality of men who fetishize female dominance, and some suggestion that when these guys are in positions of power, it could be bad news. Well, it appears that Mr. Tuckner may be just one of these men, and feminism has given him the opportunity to act out his fantasies of being a woman’s “slave” by using the law to rob other men blind.

More in Brockington’s complaint:

> After Jack Tuckner told Ms. Brockington about Mia “The Dominatrix” Metzger, she searched her name on Google and found a Web-site ad in which Mia wrote: “I am a Dominant Woman with a long-term male slave [Jackie]. I seek to add a female service oriented slave to our family,” and also a “man who is interested in partnering with me in a cuckold [married man whose wife has sex with other men] relationship.” Wheweee!
> Mia Metzger is presently employed as a “client liaison” at Jack Tuckner’s law firm.
> Jack Tuckner touts Mia’s abilities on the firm’s website as: “Mia brings her expertise in Wholistic medicine to TSWS (Tuckner, Sipser, Weinstock & Sipser). As a nursing professional, her skills [spanking and bondage] translate seamlessly into an ability to assist potential clients towards healing the wounds created as a result of aggressive spankings, I’m sorry I mean discriminatory experiences. Her close association with Jack Tuckner [paddle to butt] and their similar views in which all inhabitants are given equal and fair spankings; I mean treatment creates a cohesive communication which ultimately serves clients.

Isn’t it revealing to see what kind of men are attracted to feminism?

Woman Fired for Wearing “Distracting” Outfits; Sues, Naturally

Welmer · 3 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Debrahlee Lorenzana, a 33-year-old single mother, was fired from Citibank after refusing to follow dress guidelines that restricted her from wearing clothing designed to show off her breasts and buttocks. Ms. Lorenzana, who is Puerto Rican, said: “I was raised very Latin. We’re feminine.”

And, in Latin countries, men aren’t fired or sued for making remarks about a woman’s figure…

Jack Tuckner, Ms. Lorenzana’s attorney, brings an element of shame to the dispute, suggesting that there must be something wrong with men when they notice a woman flaunting her sexuality:

> It’s like saying that we can’t think anymore because our penises are standing up – and we cannot think about you except in a sexual manner – and we can’t look at you without wanting to have sexual intercourse with you.

Mr. Tuckner’s personal reaction to Ms. Lorenzana’s provocative dress is unknown, but he staged a photo shoot – in which he personally acted as the cameraman – for “evidence” in the lawsuit.

Sex and the City 2 Opens Vein of Critical Gold

Welmer · 4 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I don't often read movie reviews, and when I do it's usually simply to ascertain whether or not the movie in question might have something interesting about it. Ever since Boys Don't Cry, one of the most androphobic, man-hating movies ever produced, was almost universally hailed as a great work of art by critics, I've been pretty skeptical of their opinions.

In addition to my skepticism, I haven't found movie reviews very entertaining in and of themselves, and generally simply used them for whatever factual information I could gather. However, Sex and the City 2 seems to have brought out the best in movie critics, who have panned the film with superlative gusto.

Manohla Dargis, writing for the NY Times, seems a bit taken aback by the critical drubbing the film received, but even amidst some protestation concerning implied sexism, ends up echoing much of it herself:

> Fast forward to "Sex and the City 2," the sequel to the hit 2008 movie, written and directed by Michael Patrick King, that has generated some of the most hostile and outraged reviews in recent memory. "The horror, the horror," wrote one critic. "Nothing says putrefying, rotten and vile quite like this sequel," wrote another.
> The gravest of these sins in my unscientific survey are behavioral: the women act like ugly Americans and debase every aspect of Muslim culture they come in contact with. Also: they're women. And middle aged. Girlish. Have had bad work done. Or maybe not enough. "A cross," David Edelstein wrote in New York magazine "between (late) Mae West and (dead) Bea Arthur." "Like a plastic surgeon," Tom Maurstad wrote in The Dallas Morning News, "storyteller King keeps trying to find new ways to lift and tighten his characters, but they have become garish caricatures of themselves." "What's not to loathe?" Richard Roeper asked. Apparently nothing. At rottentomatoes.com, which compiles reviews, the first "Sex and the City" movie earned a 53 percent approval rating from top critics, while the sequel received — eek — just 9 percent.
> The new film's sex-capades turn on Carrie's restlessness in her new marriage to Big (Chris Noth), an agitation she quiets during a junket to Abu Dhabi with "the girls": Samantha (Kim Cattrall), Miranda (Cynthia Nixon) and Charlotte (Kristin Davis). After flying first-class-ultra in separate compartments, they are picked up at the airport in their own white Maybach sedans (which start at $417,000, in case you were wondering) and whisked to a hotel that's a stand-in for the Emirates Palace, an haute-decadent Abu Dhabi hotel with amenities like a gold-dispensing ATM ("gold to go").

Manohla writes a good – and amusing – review, which is definitely worth reading in its entirety, but she can't hide the fact that her male colleagues may have ever-so-slightly hurt her feelings by bashing the cougar quartet:

> The scene of Samantha in the souk has been branded insulting to Muslims. Certainly it's insulting to comedy lovers and to the character, a shrewd number sold out by her director for an unfunny gag about the unruly female body. This and other scenes of the women with Muslims are often awkward, though that's partly a function of Mr. King's direction. Yet there's also something touching about a few of these encounters, as when the women wonder how you eat fries when you're wearing a veil, a question that strikes me as an uncharacteristically honest admission of difference in a mainstream American movie. Too bad the women weren't guys and went to Las Vegas, where they could have indulged in the kind of critically sanctioned masculine political incorrectness that made "The Hangover" such a darling.

Fortunately, Thomas Leupp gives no quarter in his assessment of the film, which he refers to as "the new torture porn“:

> Whereas the close of 2008’s Sex and the City found heroines Carrie (Sarah Jessica Parker), Miranda (Cynthia Nixon), Charlotte (Kristen Davis), and Samantha (Kim Cattrall) more or less getting everything they’ve ever wanted, the sequel finds them faced with the inconveniences that come along with having everything they’ve ever wanted.

The Chemical Sterilization of the Western Man

Hestia · 4 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In our sick, toxic world, men have come under attack through many avenues. A hateful ideology began the attack and legal repressions have followed. Our culture kicked out the father from his rightful place as the respected leader of his family and replaced him with the deadbeat dad, ordered to pay child support by a misandrist justice system all while denied access to his kids. The sugar, spice, and everything nice sex has been encouraged to embrace the dark queen and let her do unchecked, poisoning the well of gender relations and destroying meaningful relationships for several generations of men and women now. Such attacks are well-known by those of us familiar with the gender war, but there has been another grenade of toxicity thrown onto the battlefield, one that is seldom spoken of: the chemical sterilization of the western male.

The class of chemicals known as phthalates and Bisphenol A are used as additives in many plastic items on the market today. Baby bottles, childrens toys, food storage containers, shower curtains, personal care items, and water bottles are among the thousands of consumer products that contain some for of these chemicals. These chemicals have wreaked havoc with the human body and are believed to be endocrine disruptors in both men and women. While these chemicals cause harm to both sexes, the damage done to the male body is particularly disturbing and worrisome. Testicular atrophy and decreased sperm counts have been attributed to phthalates and Bisphenol A. Reproductive malformation in male babies has been shown to begin in the womb and an increased rate of testicular cancer may be caused by this class of chemicals. Testosterone levels are also on the decline thanks to these toxins. These are clearly some very serious issues and ones we all need to consider for the health of ourselves and those we care about.

Whether the ill effects of these chemicals was unintentional or not is debatable, but what isn't is the damage these chemicals have caused. In the last fifty years, we've seen men destroyed from all angles and unfortunately our environment itself has quickly become anti-male with technology gone awry.

Thankfully in this case there are a few ways for men to protect themselves and their sons:

*Avoid purchasing plastic items unless they are free of these chemicals as many consumer products are quickly becoming. This is especially important when it comes to items that young boys might play with and/or put into their mouths. Toys, baby bottles, disposable diapers, teething rings, and the like all need to be considered carefully. Alternatives are available and I'd be happy to pass along information for anybody interested in items for babies and small children that are not only toxic plastic free but "unleaded" as well.

*Look for alternative ways to store leftover food. Canning jars are a good alternative as they are sturdy, inexpensive, and can be used in a variety of situations including freezing. Glass food containers are available for purchase. A variety of metal water bottles now abound.

*Switch out your shower curtain or curtain liner for a new PVC-free variety available at nearly every big box store now. These curtains are only a dollar or two more expensive than their toxic counterparts.

*Know what to look for on plastic products. Items with the recycling codes 3,6, and 7 typically contain phthalates or Bisphenol A. Forgo purchasing such items whenever possible.

*Use low or no-VOC paint when painting the interior of your home, especially rooms that will be used by little boys.

*When shopping for home improvement supplies, personal care products and bug sprays, avoid products containing the chemical ingredients found in this article to avoid harmful additives as much as you can.

Understanding the System of Corporatocracy in the USA Inc.

Hawaiian Libertarian · 4 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I pledge allegiance, to the Logo, of the United Corporate States, formerly known as America; and to the Corporations, for which it stands: one market, under law, divisible into niche segments, with rampant consumerism, debt slavery and serfdom for all.

Whenever there is some kind of economic trouble, you will always find some left wing, socialist Democrat blogger, pundit, journalist, talking head on TV, or a columnist in the print media declare that the problem is "greedy capitalism" and the "lack of regulation" (or "de-regulation") as the root of the problem.

Since most of the mainstream mass media propaganda corporations are largely composed of left wing socialist Democrat useful idiots, they dutifully espouse this party line at every opportunity. Unpopular TARP bailouts for banks "too big to fail?"

GREEDY CAPITALISTS!

The advent of our current Great Depression 2.0 because of the housing bubble being inflated by the Federal Reserve, causing significant mal-investments in nearly every sector of the economy?

WALL STREET BROKE OUR ECONOMY!

The anti-captalist/pro-socialist/pro-communitarians that spout this garbage really are useful idiots for the government-corporation complex. By screaming for MORE Government regulation, they are basically throwing the protesting brer rabbit into the briar patch.

The truth of the matter is that the USA has not been a free market, capitalist country for quite some time. We are a corporatacracy – in which corporations lobby the Government at every level to gain some sort of cartel advantage…by having the Government officials "regulate" the industry…effectively stifling or eliminating the competition (usually a small business owner or local business) by enforcing regulations, fee schedules and safety requirements that are prohibitively expensive for the small business to handle.

As I've linked to in the preceding paragraph, I've written about this before…but I decided to reiterate this point again, after coming across an anonymous author at reddit.com revealed his story about how this works in the real world of USA INC.

How Real World Corruption Works

> I'm a mid-career guy in a business that does a lot of work with governmental and quasi-governmental agencies. I've never ripped anyone off personally, but I have seen and occasionally been an incidental beneficiary of quite a bit of patronage, insider dealing, nepotism, misuse of taxpayer money, and outright corruption. While I have always been honest in my own dealings on a case-by-case basis, I have refrained from many opportunities to be a "whistleblower".
>
> A lot of stuff on reddit misunderstands the relationships between wealth, power, and influence. For starters, all the above three are always and have always been inter-related, and probably always will be. And that might not always be a bad thing: those who have risen to high levels of wealth are often pretty smart, and surprisingly often exceptionally honest. Those who rise to high levels of influence usually have some pretty good insight and talent in their area of expertise. Those who have acquired a lot of power tend to be good at accomplishing things that lots of people want to see happen.
> None of which is purely democratic, nor even purely meritocratic, but there is a certain dose of both kind of baked into the cake: stuff like wealth or family connections only gets you so far in modern, developed, and relatively open and transparent societies such as the US. And while that can be pretty far by normal standards, at some point sunlight does shine through any crack, and outright robbery or complete incompetence is difficult to sustain indefinitely.

But there is an awful lot of low-level waste, patronage, and corruption that happens both in the private and in the public sector.

Without going ideological, the private sector in a free-ish market has a more immediate system of checks and balances if only because you have to actually persuade the end users to keep buying your stuff for the price you're charging: if it's no good, or if you are grossly over-charging, your customers will tend to catch on sooner or later.

But in the public sector, the "consumer" often has little choice… so-called "market discipline" is a lot more diffuse when you have a former-schoolteacher-or-real-estate-broker-turned city councilman whose job it is to disburse a multi-million-dollar street-paving contract or whatever. And neither the schoolteacher nor the real-estate broker has any clue how to write or evaluate a road-paving contract…

Let's say that there are three credible bidders for that street-paving contract:

Bidder 1 is "Paver Joe", a local guy with a driveway-paving company and three trucks who sees this as a big opportunity to expand his business and get the city to pay for five new trucks. He puts in a dirt-cheap bid that he wrote up himself with the help of his estate attorney. The cost to taxpayers is very low, but the certainty that he will complete it on schedule and as specified is a little iffy. Paver Joe plans to work overtime and bust his tail on the job, not for profits, but to grow his business. He's offering the taxpayers a great deal, but a slightly risky one.*

Bidder 2 is "Muni Paver Inc", a company who has the experience and expertise to do the job, who knows what's involved and who has done this work before. They already have the trucks, their workers are all unionized and paid "prevailing wage", everything will be done by the book, all their EPA certifications are in place, etc… The bid is a lot more expensive than Paver Joe, but it's credible and reliable. They are offering the taxpayers a degree of certainty and confidence that Paver Joe cannot match.*

Bidder 3 is me, "Corruptocorp". Instead of Paver Joe's 2-page contract with typos, or Muni-Paving's 20-page contract, I'm offering the city council a full package of videos, brochures, and a 40-page contract with a price just a tad higher than Paver Joe (my quoted price is meaningless, as we will see). Moreover, I'm inviting the city council to Corruptocorp-owned suites in a golf resort near my headquarters to give my presentation (all expenses paid, of course, and of course, bring your spouses). There the city council members will, after the first day of golf, dinner, dancing, and cocktails, see a slideshow and chorus-line of smiling multi-ethnic faces and working mothers talking about how much Corruptocorp's paving improved their town and their lives. I'll then stand up and tell a self-effacing joke about being one of those corporate guys trying to get their money, and then I'll wax a bit emotional about my small-town roots and how Corruptocorp was started by a man with a simple dream to make life better for everyone, and to do well by doing good in local communities, and that we actually plan to hire local contractors such as Joe's Paving to do the work, backed our economies of scale and reliability. I'll mention that paragraph 32 subsection B of our proposal mandates twice-yearly performance reviews by the city council, to of course be held at the golf resort, at Corruptocorp's expense, ("so I hope to see you all back here every February and August!"), and of course I make sure that each of them has my "personal" cell phone and home numbers in case they have any questions….*

So needless to say I get the bid, and six months later it's time for our review at the golf resort. After dinner and cocktails I step up to the podium and announce that there is both good news and bad news:

"The bad news is that our subcontractor has found over 1,000 rocks in the road. And as I'm sure you know, paragraph 339 subsection D.12 specifies that any necessary rock removal will be done at prevailing wages, currently $1,500 per rock, for a total cost overrun of $1.5 million. But the good news is (and believe me, I had to > fight long and hard for this with the board of directors), Corruptocorp has agreed to remove those rocks for only $1,000 apiece! So even though there have been some cost overruns, your smart decisions have saved your taxpayers half a million dollars! Give yourselves a round of applause!"

> "Now, the other situation is that there has been some 'difficult terrain' as described in subsection 238b, which I'm sure you're all familiar with. And as you know, 'difficult terrain' is not covered by the contract, which is for paving, not for turning mountains into flat roads… (wistful chuckle). Now, technically, according to the contract, we should be charging your town prevailing rates for these sections, but I've worked it so that you will be allowed to re-bid them, if you wish, since our contract doesn't specifically include terrain as described in subsection 238b."
> Now the contract price has doubled, and Corruptocorp has completely sidestepped all of the difficult and costly work, taking profits only on the easy stuff. The city council members can either admit that they were duped and bought (political suicide), or can simply feed corruptocorp's line to the voters. Which do you think will happen?
> And it gets even worse on smaller scales: look up your local building or electrical inspector. Ten-to-one he is a relative, friend, or campaign donor to the mayor or city council. What's in it for him? Every single construction or home improvement project not only has to pay him a fee, it also has to pass his inspection. Guess which contractors are most likely to pass his inspection? His brothers, friends, family… or the cheapest guy who for some reason has a hard time finding work in this town? Guess how the local inspector feels about homeowner self-improvements: does he think they are a great way for regular people to improve their wealth with a little elbow grease, or does he see them as stealing work from his friends and family?

I've seen this exact thing play out to a "T" like this in my own 2 year stint of working for the State Government here in Hawaii.

In our current system, at the County, State and Federal level, this is how business is really done in this country…which is also why most budgets are in the red and States like California are about to go completely broke.

Remembering Feminist Terrorism

Welmer · 5 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On June 3, 1968, 42 years ago last Thursday, Valerie Solanas stormed into Andy Warhol's Factory in New York, furious that he had not produced a movie from Up Your Ass, a play she had written about a man-hating prostitute.

When Solanas originally approached Warhol, he was intrigued by the idea behind the play, but after reading it decided it was so over-the-top pornographic that it might be part of a sting operation to get him arrested for obscenity (Warhol had already had some trouble on that score).

Enraged, Solanas obtained two guns, a .32 auto and a .22 caliber backup pistol. Here is an excerpt from an account of the attack:

> Warhol arrives at the Factory in a cab, wearing a brown leather jacket over a black t-shirt , black jeans and black Beatle (Chelsea) boots. Previously, he had picked up a prescription for Obetrol, then browsed at Bloomingdales, and had also rung the bell of Miles White, the costume designer, who lived on East 55th Street, but he wasn't home. When Andy arrives outside the Factory, his boyfriend Jed Johnson approaches from 17th and Broadway carrying some fluorescent lights. Valerie Solanas joins them and all three enter the building. While waiting for the elevator, Warhol notices that Valerie is wearing a thick turtleneck sweater underneath a trenchcoat on a hot summer day. Even stranger, she has on mascara and lipstick even though as a die-hard feminist she never wears make-up. Warhol also notices that she is "bouncing slightly on the balls of her feet, twisting a brown paper bag in her hands."
> Upstairs, Fred Hughes is sitting at his desk writing a memo, Paul Morrissey is talking to Viva on the phone who is ringing him from Kenneth's Hair Salon where she is having her hair dyed in preparation for her role in John Schlesinger's film Midnight Cowboy. Art critic and curator, Mario Amaya, is waiting for Andy in order to discuss an upcoming retrospective in London.
> When Warhol, Jed and Valerie arrive, Paul leaves the office to go to the bathroom, leaving Andy to talk to Viva. (L&D) Jed goes into Warhol's private office in the rear corner of the room. Andy signals to Fred Hughes to take over the conversation with Viva.Valerie Solanas takes a .32 automatic from the paper bag and fires a shot. Viva hears the shot over the phone but thinks it is somebody cracking a whip left over from theVelvet Underground days. Andy screams "No! No! Valerie! Don't do it!" She fires a second time. He falls to the floor and tries to crawl under a desk. She fires a third time. The bullet enters Andy's right side and goes straight through him, coming out the left side of his back. Warhol later tells friends "It hurt so much, I wished I was dead."
> Thinking that she has killed Warhol, Solanas turns to Mario Amaya who is crouching on the floor and fires a fourth shot at him. She misses so she shoots again, hitting him slightly above the hip. The bullet goes through him without damaging any organs, exiting from his back. He gets up and runs into the back room, using the weight of his bleeding body to hold the doors shut.
> Valerie Solanas points the gun at Fred Hughes who begs her not to shoot him. "I'm innocent," he protests. "Please, just leave." She walks over to the elevator and presses the button then returns to him, aiming at his forehead with the gun. She pulls the trigger, but it jams. She grabs a back up gun, a .22 caliber from the paper bag but the elevator arrives and she leaves.
> As soon as she leaves, Fred Hughes calls for an ambulance and the police. The phone rings. It is Viva, still at the hairdresser's, wondering what is going on. Fred tells her that Valerie just shot Andy and that there is blood everywhere, then hangs up the phone. Viva, thinking it is a joke, decides to have her hair trimmed before having it dyed. She tells the hairdresser to charge it to United Artists.
> Gerard Malanga arrives at the Factory with Angus Maclise two or three minutes after the shooting. Gerard was > preparing a one man show at the Cinematheque and was picking up money from Andy to pay for a film announcement. The scene at the Factory was “total mayhem.”

> Warhol lies bleeding on the floor with Billy Name leaning over him crying, while they wait for the ambulance to arrive.

Warhol survived, but just barely. The small .32 caliber bullet bounced around his rib cage before exiting his body, damaging a number of organs and leaving wounds that would aggravate him for the rest of his life. Warhol’s heart stopped for a minute and a half before medics restarted his pulse with a cardiac massage. These wounds may have contributed to his early death.

Solanas was tried and convicted of attempted murder, eventually receiving a three-year sentence.

Ultimately, the attack had no negative political fallout for feminists, who went on in the next decade to one victory after another. The National Organization for Women hailed Solanas as a “champion of women’s rights.” Florynce Kennedy, a NOW activist, represented her at trial and declared her “one of the most important spokeswomen of the feminist movement.”

Valerie Solanas wrote The SCUM Manifesto, a book that called for the extermination of all men. She later claimed that her calls for gendercide were satire, but given her terrorist attack on one of the most famous artists of the late 20th century, it seems likely that she meant it.

Excerpts from the SCUM Manifesto

Welmer · 6 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've heard of the SCUM Manifesto many times before, but I never bothered reading it. It is very common for people to talk about something without knowing what it really is, and I'm guilty of that sin (a subcategory of laziness, probably), so I thought I ought to look through Valerie Solanas's screed to see what it's about. The SCUM Manifesto, after all, is widely hailed by the vanguard of second wave feminists, who probably count on most people ignoring its true contents.

I read the manifesto, and although it isn't a pleasant read, it's certainly instructive. I'd urge other readers to do the same, but for those who may not be inclined to do so right away I'll publish a few excerpts:

> Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex.
> It is now technically feasible to reproduce without the aid of males (or, for that matter, females) and to produce only females. We must begin immediately to do so. Retaining the mail has not even the dubious purpose of reproduction. The male is a biological accident: the Y (male) gene is an incomplete X (female) gene, that is, it has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.

Evidently, Solanas has embraced the pseudobiological idea that men are deformed, incomplete women. This thread runs throughout the manifesto, and serves as justification for the elimination of men. To Solanas, wiping out men is a way to achieve perfection on earth.

This is clearly an eliminationist philosophy, and echoes others that we are all familiar with.

> Fatherhood and Mental Illness (fear, cowardice, timidity, humility, insecurity, passivity): Mother wants what's best for her kids; Daddy only wants what's best for Daddy, that is peace and quiet, pandering to his delusion of dignity (`respect'), a good reflection on himself (status) and the opportunity to control and manipulate, or, if he's an `enlightened' father, to `give guidance'. His daughter, in addition, he wants sexually — he givers her hand in marriage; the other part is for him. Daddy, unlike Mother, can never give in to his kids, as he must, at all costs, preserve his delusion of decisiveness, forcefulness, always-rightness and strength. Never getting one's way leads to lack of self-confidence in one's ability to cope with the world and to a passive acceptance of the status quo. Mother loves her kids, although she sometimes gets angry, but anger blows over quickly and even while it exists, doesn't preclude love and basic acceptance. Emotionally diseased Daddy doesn't love his kids; he approves of them — if they're `good', that is, if they're nice, `respectful', obedient, subservient to his will, quiet and not given to unseemly displays of temper that would be most upsetting to Daddy's easily disturbed male nervous system — in other words, if they're passive vegetables. If they're not `good', he doesn't get angry — not if he's a modern, `civilized' father (the old-fashioned ranting, raving brute is preferable, as he is so ridiculous he can be easily despised) — but rather express disapproval, a state that, unlike anger, endures and precludes a basic acceptance, leaving the kid with the feeling of worthlessness and a lifelong obsession wit being approved of; the result is fear of independent thought, as this leads to unconventional, disapproved of opinions and way of life.

She pathologizes fatherhood. In some ways, there may be a grain of truth here. There certainly were some problems associated with the role when Solanas was writing SCUM, but it was culturally specific rather than biologically rooted. Interesting how feminists embrace biological determinism when it advances their goals, but reject it when it doesn't.

> Isolation, Suburbs, and Prevention of Community: Our society is not a community, but merely a collection of isolated family units. Desperately insecure, fearing his woman will leave him if she is exposed to other men or to anything remotely resembling life, the male seeks to isolate her from other men and from what little civilization there is, so he moves her out to the suburbs, a collection of self-absorbed couples and their kids. Isolation enables him to try to maintain his pretense of being an individual nu becoming a `rugged individualist', a loner, equating non-cooperation and solitariness with individuality.
> There is yet another reason for the male to isolate himself: every man is an island. Trapped inside himself, emotionally isolated, unable to relate, the male has a horror of civilization, people, cities, situations requiring an ability to understand and relate to people. So like a scared rabbit, he scurries off, dragging Daddy's little asshole with him to the wilderness, suburbs, or, in the case of the hippy — he's way out, Man! — all the way out to the cow pasture where he can fuck and breed undisturbed and mess around with his beads and flute.
> The `hippy', whose desire to be a `Man', a `rugged individualist', isn't quite as strong as the average man's, and who, in addition, is excited by the thought having lots of women accessible to him, rebels against the harshness of a Breadwinner's life and the monotony of one woman. In the name of sharing and cooperation, he forms a commune or tribe, which, for all its togetherness and partly because of it, (the commune, being an extended family, is an extended violation of the female's rights, privacy and sanity) is no more a community than normal `society'.
> A true community consists of individuals — not mere species members, not couples — respecting each others individuality and privacy, at the same time interacting with each other mentally and emotionally — free spirits in free relation to each other — and co-operating with each other to achieve common ends. Traditionalists say the basic unit of `society' is the family; `hippies' say the tribe; no one says the individual.
> The `hippy' babbles on about individuality, but has no more conception of it than any other man. He desires to get back to Nature, back to the wilderness, back to the home of furry animals that he's one of, away from the city, where there is at least a trace, a bare beginning of civilization, to live at the species level, his time taken up with simple, non-intellectual activities — farming, fucking, bead stringing. The most important activity of the commune, the one upon which it is based, is gang-banging. The `hippy' is enticed to the commune mainly by the prospect for free pussy — the main commodity to be shared, to be had just for the asking, but, blinded by greed, he fails to anticipate all the other men he has to share with, or the jealousies and possessiveness for the pussies themselves.
> Men cannot co-operate to achieve a common end, because each man's end is all the pussy for himself. The commune, therefore, is doomed to failure; each `hippy' will, in panic, grad the first simpleton who digs him and whisks her off to the suburbs as fast as he can. The male cannot progress socially, but merely swings back and forth from isolation to gang-banging.

I found the hippie denunciation somewhat amusing, but this passage probably shows most clearly how prostitution influenced Solanas's thinking. If there's any good argument against prostitution, it's that it does encourage women to think in this manner. The attitude that "pussy" is the only thing men value at all is one that most prostitutes hold.

> SCUM will kill all men who are not in the Men's Auxiliary of SCUM. Men in the Men's Auxiliary are those men who are working diligently to eliminate themselves, men who, regardless of their motives, do good, men who are playing pall with SCUM. A few examples of the men in the Men's Auxiliary are: men who kill men; biological scientists who are working on constructive programs, as opposed to biological warfare; journalists, writers, editors, publishers and producers who disseminate and promote ideas that will lead to the achievement of SCUM's goals; faggots who, by their shimmering, flaming example, encourage other men to de-man themselves and thereby make themselves relatively inoffensive; men who consistently give things away — money, things, services; men who tell it like it is (so far not one ever has), who put women straight, who reveal > the truth about themselves, who give the mindless male females correct sentences to parrot, who tell them a woman's primary goal in life should be to squash the male sex (to aid men in this endeavor SCUM will conduct Turd Sessions, at which every male present will give a speech beginning with the sentence: `I am a turd, a lowly abject turd', then proceed to list all the ways in which he is. His reward for doing so will be the opportunity to fraternize after the session for a whole, solid hour with the SCUM who will be present. Nice, clean-living male women will be invited to the sessions to help clarify any doubts and misunderstandings they may have about the male sex; makers and promoters of sex books and movies, etc., who are hastening the day when all that will be shown on the screen will be Suck and Fuck (males, like the rats following the Pied Piper, will be lured by Pussy to their doom, will be overcome and submerged by and will eventually drown in the passive flesh that they are); drug pushers and advocates, who are hastening the dropping out of men.

Above she begins to outline the Final Solution for men. Note the violence and hatred. Very extreme.

> A completely automated society can be accomplished very simply and quickly once there is a public demand for it. The blueprints for it are already in existence, and it's construction will take only a few weeks with millions of people working on it. Even though off the money system, everyone will be most happy to pitch in and get the automated society built; it will mark the beginning of a fantastic new era, and there will be a celebration atmosphere accompanying the construction.
> The elimination of money and the complete institution of automation are basic to all other SCUM reforms; without these two the others can't take place; with them the others will take place very rapidly. The government will automatically collapse. With complete automation it will be possible for every woman to vote directly on every issue by means of an electronic voting machine in her house. Since the government is occupied almost entirely with regulating economic affairs and legislating against purely private matters, the elimination of money wand with it the elimination of males who wish to legislate `morality' will mean there will be practically no issues to vote on.
> After the elimination of money there will be no further need to kill men; they will be stripped of the only power they have over psychologically independent females. They will be able to impose themselves only on the doormats, who like to be imposed on. The rest of the women will be busy solving the few remaining unsolved problems before planning their agenda for eternity and Utopia — completely revamping educational programs so that millions of women can be trained within a few months for high level intellectual work that now requires years of training (this can be done very easily once out educational goal is to educate and not perpetuate an academic and intellectual elite); solving the problems of disease and old age and death and completely redesigning our cities and living quarters. Many women will for a while continue to think they dig men, but as they become accustomed to female society and as they become absorbed in their projects, they will eventually come to see the utter uselessnes and banality of the male.
> The few remaining men can exist out their puny days dropped out on drugs or strutting around in drag or passively watching the high-powered female in action, fulfilling themselves as spectators, vicarious livers*[FOOTNOTE: It will be electronically possible for him to tune into any specific female he wants to and follow in detail her every movement. The females will kindly, obligingly consent to this, as it won't hurt them in the slightest and it is a marvelously kind and humane way to treat their unfortunate, handicapped fellow beings.] or breeding in the cow pasture with the toadies, or they can go off to the nearest friendly suicide center where they will be quietly, quickly, and painlessly gassed to death.
> Prior to the institution of automation, to the replacement of males by machines, the male should be of use to the female, wait on her, cater to her slightest whim, obey her every command, be totally subservient to her, exist in perfect obedience to her will, as opposed to the completely warped, degenerate situation we have now of men, not only not only not existing at all, cluttering up the world with their ignominious presence, but being pandered to and groveled before by the mass of females, millions of women piously worshiping the Golden Calf, the dog leading the master on a leash, when in fact the male, short of being a drag queen, is least > miserable when his dogginess is recognized — no unrealistic emotional demands are made of him and the completely together female is calling the shots. Rational men want to be squashed, stepped on, crushed and crunched, treated as the curs, the filth that they are, have their repulsiveness confirmed.

> The sick, irrational men, those who attempt to defend themselves against their disgustingness, when they see SCUM barrelling down on them, will cling in terror to Big Mama with her Big Bouncy Boobies, but Boobies won't protect them against SCUM; Big Mama will be clinging to Big Daddy, who will be in the corner shitting in his forceful, dynamic pants. Men who are rational, however, won't kick or struggle or raise a distressing fuss, but will just sit back, relax, enjoy the show and ride the waves to their demise.
> -end-

Quasi-Communist fantasy, utopian promises, etc. Goes to show how demented and out of touch feminists were in the 1960s. Interesting how the utopia she sees mirrors almost exactly the program of Gynarchy International.

Read the entire thing if you have the time. It may be an ugly screed, but it provides a window into the black soul of feminism, where no light dwells, only hatred and bestial fantasies.

Joran Van der Sloot: New Pin-Up Boy for Starry-Eyed Female Fans of Killers?

Welmer · 6 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Now that Joran Van der Sloot has been found to have been in the company of another dead woman – one whose corpse was found in this instance – will he become the new darling for women around the world?

The tendency for women to fall deeply in love with sadistic murderers has confused many men for quite some time, because women and their representative groups have always held – in public at least – that they want men to behave humbly and peacefully.

[image]

However, despite what they say, women seem to be most enthralled with society's most dangerous and violent men. In fact, convicted killers and rapists such as Scott Peterson and Richard Ramirez are far more likely on any given day to receive amorous attention from women than, say, some guy schlepping away day after day to provide a nest egg for a future wife and children. Scott Peterson received dozens of marriage proposals on his first day of incarceration.

Therefore, it is hardly surprising that Joran Van der Sloot, who has long been suspected of murdering Natalee Holloway, has had an active sex life since the teenage girl disappeared — most likely under the waves of the Caribbean Sea off the coast of Aruba. His success with women since the original case has been legendary: Van der Sloot has appeared in numerous sexually suggestive photos with women who are obviously deeply in love with him.

[image]

Now that Van der Sloot has been caught with a dead woman in his hotel room, he will become even more appealing to women worldwide, and millions of them will be lying in bed dreaming of a night with the infamous killer, and hating the good men around them who don't have what it takes to be a "real man."

It certainly is instructive to know that Genghis Khan, the world's greatest mass murderer of all time, has been the most genetically prolific of any man known to history. Perhaps it's time that humanity woke up to the realities of female desire.

Here he is entering the hotel room with a woman, and then leaving alone:

Father Shot After Custody Exchange

Welmer · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Moments after a Dekalb County, Georgia man handed his year-old twins off to their mother during a routine custody exchange, someone opened fire on him from a white SUV, hitting him twice in the leg and once in the hand.

Fortunately, the man is expected to survive.

According to police, the main suspect in the shooting is the woman's new boyfriend, who may have been put up to the task by the mother, as his car was directly behind hers. Hopefully, this will mean a change in custody, but given that this is the United States, that is by no means assured.

Violence by proxy is a common tactic used by mothers in custody disputes, whether it be through manipulating police, lovers or family members.

Police are looking for the mother or a female friend of hers who fled with the children.

Feminist False Consciousness

Featured Guest · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[This guest post, originally posted in comments, was written by ISP, and is well worth reposting as an article for discussion]

Feminist false consciousness: Restricting male identity to what suits the female collective (and individual). Defining the boundaries of acceptable "maleness". Gender colonization (female colonization of males). An absolutely essential component of the women's movement/feminism.

Women (through feminism) have been complaining for years that men, supposedly, consciously set out to disempower women and restrict/limit/re-mould women's identity to types that suit men only. This system would of course be systematized. Well, turns out once again that this "men oppressing women" sentiment is yet more projection on the part of women.

Feminism need merely activate the feminist inside every woman's psyche/being – however men must be remoulded. Women in general don't need to be taught/brainwashed into a feminist mindset (a bogus narrative that some MRAs use), it comes naturally. For men however, indoctrination is needed [at this stage at least, after multiple generations of reinforced feminist/gynocentrist culture this might not be the case].

The solution to NOMAS etc. are organizations that support/promote/defend/endorse masculinist male archetypes.

Feminist "men's studies" "re-moulding men"-type discourse and organizations must to be countered with masculinist-type discourse and organizations. It's not enough merely to point out that women (surprise surprise) are oppressing men when they are given the opportunity to do so. A masculinist alternative must be offered. The core ideas of this "masculinist alternative" can be (perhaps only) developed by raising male consciousness.

Men must talk/operate outside of feminist/female-centred/gynocentric paradigms/narratives. They must not accept feminist boundaries of discourse, which are designed specifically to prevent the communication of male concerns, and thus, oppress men. Men must operate outside of the dominant paradigm (i.e. feminism). They must be willing to accept all possibilities, explore all ideas; it is only by doing this that a true picture will emerge. If you don't think outside the box, by default you revert to feminist pro-women mythology.

Just as [radical] feminists advocate[d] female-only environments for women to speak, to raise female consciousness and develop ideas – arguing they could not do so otherwise – we masculinists should advocate male-only environments to raise consciousness. This is not a case of "being as bad as the feminists" as disingenuous/useful-idiot feministic MRAs like to say. This is simply a case of working out a mechanism that will work to advocate/defend male collective interests against female/feminist aggression. This is simply a case of effective strategy. We must do what works.

Other approaches may sound nicer – e.g. politely asking feminism/the female collective to back off on the misandry. But if they do not work, they are useless; useless to us as masculinists, thus they should not be approached.

These approaches are inherently useless by the inherently radical anti-male nature of feminism — i.e. it exists to eliminate all male power thus preventing the possibility of patriarchy.

It is no surprise, given that, that attempts at the "ask kindly" approach have been absolute, unequivocal failures. The female collective does not acknowledge male interests, let alone does it discuss them. Our arguments aren't engaged in; instead psychobabble double-speak – e.g. "sexist", "gender gap" – are trotted out.

This has been the to-date experience of the "ask kindly" approach, it will be the future experience, because of the inherently radical anti-male nature of [all] feminism which cannot accept the existence of any form of male power. If feminism cannot tolerate male power in general, obviously it cannot stand defense of male power in a general or specific sense. It must delegitimize such efforts; the long-term goal being elimination of pro-male memes from the discourse/culture. (Delegitimization of meme = path to elimination of meme.)

The only time feminists will say “hey, those guys have some legitimate gripes” is when they are dealing with fake feministic MRAs who will frame the argument around male discomfort being caused by “patriarchy” and “[patriarchal] gender roles”. Femininsts can of course agree with this, they are back in controlled-discourse territory.

Feministic MRA groups will be pretty much exactly the same as older, 1970s-style “Men’s Studies” groups. Except they will be more subtle, they’ll hand pick some masculinist ideas and subvert them. They’ll take a few masculinist premises and build a feminist framework around them. It will be 95% pure bullshit, the 5% designed simply as a lightning rod to attract male supporters/visitors. It will take special care to not blame feminism unequivocally, as should rightly/logically be done. Rather, blame will be redirected/misdirected to “patriarchy” and “[patriarchal] gender roles” [which will be called singularly oppressive].

The leaders of these movements will actually be devoted anti-male feminists – doctrinaire feminists – whether they refer to themselves as feminists or not. It is strategically bad to identify directly as feminist, largely because of the efforts of masculinists who have rightly enhanced feminism’s anti-male connotations. The goal is to feed bullshit “information” to the target audience – masculinist/anti-feminist inclined males – turning them into useful idiots who believe/endorse/repeat bogus arguments. If calling a group “feminist” or endorsing “feminism” is bad in the minds of the target audience – remove associations with feminism. Equivocal/fence-sitting statements on feminism are the order of the day. E.g.:

“Feminism is good/necessary/just but…”

“Original feminists had pure non-anti-male intentions but radicals hijacked the movement…”

“There are many forms of feminism and some of them, e.g. radical feminism[tm] can be bad for men…”

“Equality feminists[tm] are our allies in the fight for gender equality[tm]…”

“While the changes caused by feminism, which were justified, cannot and should not be undone…”

The ends justify the means. The ends being, subverting the hunches of masculinist men, turning these would-be allies of ours, whose instincts are good, into useful idiots parroting consciously engineered bogus, self-defeating propaganda lines. If you need to downplay the real links between the feministic MRA narrative and feminism, do it.

At the end of the day, it’s the same old “Patriarchy Hurts Men Too(TM)” propagandistic double-speak bullshit, redux. It’s the reiteration of a bogus, false consciousness discourse that the women’s movement has been pushing since the 1970s.

Masculinist discourse and ideas must not engage in this self-defeating, fence-sitting sophistry. We name feminism, unequivocally, as the enemy. We name the female collective as the enemy. We define and defend welfare and the interests of the male collective [and individual]. We legitimize the righteousness of male welfare, male interests and male power as ends in themselves.

Consideration of female welfare does not enter the equation, an inversion of the feminist position. The question of us “being against women’s rights etc. [as insanely defined as they are nowadays]” is moot. Our raison d’etre is male welfare: the lens through which matters are viewed, the operative paradigm. ”Is it good for men?” is the question being asked at all times.

Female “rights” can be cut back to the full extent needed to preserve male welfare. We recognize “equality”, rightly, as a fallacy incompatible with reality (Battle Of The Sexes/Sexual Conflict). We recognize it, also, as a propagandistic tool of the enemy. It is a form of language-as-a-form-of-oppression (controlling the thoughtspace of the Out-Group [i.e. men]). [Equality defined as "oppression of men/infinite empowerment of women" - that's the basic definition that the public internalize. No, they don't care about the contradiction: they just internalize the definition promoted without critical analysis.]

Again, in an inversion of feminism, where conflict arises between male welfare and [evolutionary] interests, and female welfare and [evolutionary] interests, we will defend those of males.

Masculinist consciousness raising, occurring in male-only environments [needed to enable debate] is the context in which the concerns above will be developed. The critical ideas, and the critical mass of both ideas and supporters will be reached through consciousness raising. Masculinists should use wedge-issues against both feminism and the female collective (picking a single, easily-accessible topic to popularize the idea of oppression of men by women/feminists.)

The use of masculinist wedge-issues will have two effects [both intended], among others:

1. Delegitimizing the enemy [i.e. feminism/women as a group]. Pre-empting and delegitimizing their rebuttals. (If feminism and the female collective are guilty of oppression they cannot legitimately defend themselves.) The enemy will be described on our terms and put on the defensive.

2. Igniting/awakening interest among the targeted audience / targeted supporters – i.e. men. These men will seek further information. We can lead these men in the right direction through the ideas developed in consciousness raising. We can provide coherent, developed, integrated explanations which take a systems-level view of feminism's oppression of men.

These men will in turn do their own efforts at consciousness raising at their local level, further improving the energy of masculinist theory/discourse. (Compound effect, self-amplifying cycle.)

A problem masculinists have with wedge-issues is that the Capitalist Media and the Feminist* State will not propagate them, as they enthusiastically did/do with feminist wedge-issues. Capitalism and feminism go hand in hand; corporations know that feminism = more $profit, which is why they are and have been amongst the heaviest supporters of feminism. (Capitalism is an enemy of men; tool of feminism/matriarchy/oppression of men.). In spite of men's lack of support among the establishment (i.e. Government + Media), masculinist wedge-issues are nonetheless a sound strategy in themselves.

The solution is not at all "individualism" or "MGTOW" strategies. These at best solve problems for the individual, and even then, the individual still lives in a feminist state and culture. Why should men have to do that?

Libertarian/neo-con/political-conservative treatises against "Big Government" are of no use to masculinists either. They work basically on the principle that more "individual liberty" (less state control) will solve everyone's problems [evangelists for libertarianism simply stress the "men" part of "everyone" in this explanation of the world].

Clearly the battle is a collectivist one however; one with strong collectivist features which the "individualist" false paradigm cannot solve. While we go the individualist road of "do what you want", feminist women are defining and moulding our roles in ways that suit them. They are altering the male archetypes of the culture to suit them. They have the power of the government, the media and cultural hegemony [zero opposition in the mainstream] to achieve all of this.

In not taking a collectivist stance, standing up for male collective interests and establishing/supporting masculinist male archetypes, two things happen:

1. Gender colonization. The lack of organization in defending male collective [and individual] interests, leads feminists to taking ever more power and influence away from men [to the nth degree, as per [radical] feminist doctrine – basis of all feminism]. In absence of defense for men as a group, women as a group become ever more aggressive against men.

2. When men give up the area of culture, archetypes in favor of "men going their own way" as isolated individuals

[they say these things don't matter, only the individual really matters], they leave it to women and feminists to remould male identity on the basis of what suits them.

Feministing Supports Helen Thomas Ship ‘em Back to the Shtetl Comment

Welmer · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Although The Spearhead has no official position on international regional disputes (unless they pertain to paternity issues), it is interesting to see Feministing taking a stance in defense of a woman who has demanded that Israeli Jews be evacuated to Northern Europe and have their property seized. Of course, relocation and property seizure are considered par for the course for feminists, who have seen to it that millions of American men face such a prospect.

Perhaps Mrs. Thomas thinks it as simple to remove the Jews from Israel as it is for a wife to remove an American man from his home. She may have had something like a racial protection order in mind, where some international judge (Kofi Annan?) tells the Jews to leave Israel and not “harass” the Arabs, Turks, or whoever is supposed to take over in their place. Well, whether or not this is what Helen Thomas was thinking of, it is probably reasonable to assume that the fine ladies at Feministing see this as an acceptable “solution.”

In any event, the feminists think Thomas should get a pass, but I very much doubt they would say the same concerning Don Imus, who made an offensive, but ultimately harmless, remark about female basketball players’ hair. Imus did not demand they be dispossessed, he did not suggest removing them from their school, and he did not in any way state that they should be deprived of their property. In fact, all he did was make a smart-ass insult on air.

The double standard kind of gives the game away, doesn’t it?

Man Torches Himself Over Family Law Injustice

Welmer · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday afternoon, a Brisbane, Australia man in his 40s set himself on fire right in front of Brisbane's Supreme Court building. Witnesses were reportedly badly shaken by the scene. According to one witness, the man remained eerily quiet as the flames enveloped him, burning him over 90% of his body. He is in critical condition, and considering the extent of his injuries and the fact that he had resolved to die, probably won't make it.

The man had earlier been in court over a family law matter and had, as is usual in these cases, been hammered by a brutal judgment.

Authorities have no comment on the incident. The judge and some family law attorneys are likely already cracking jokes about it.

NOMAS: A Totalitarian Program for Men

Welmer · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

NOMAS, the National Organization for Men Against Sexism, is an activist organization dedicated to "changing men." You see, there's something wrong with us men, and the good folks at NOMAS have just the program to fix us.

According to NOMAS, our biggest problems revolve around sexuality and violence. We're scared of homos, and we run around beating up women, raping people, sexually harassing folks, etc. You may not see it when you look out the window, at the restaurant, on the bus or at work, but rest assured that just around the corner, or maybe behind some curtains, there are hordes of men out there who need "changing."

NOMAS comes right out in the beginning to let us know how nasty we men are. Their tenets page begins with this passage:

> Whatever psychological burden men have to overcome, women are still the most universal and direct victims of our patriarchy. Our organization must take a highly visible and energetic position in support of women's struggle for equality. Our movement was born directly out of and continually nourished by feminism. Our support for women's rights and specific women's issues must be vigorous and unmistakable.

I'd like to dismiss these people as your typical university radicals, but they are plugged into family law policy in some important and disturbing ways.

Although NOMAS claims to want men to emotionally bond with their children, their policy on child custody could have come straight out of a feminist family law seminar:

> The National Organization for Men Against Sexism is committed to make substantive this nation's ideals of equality and justice. In choosing loyalties in disputes over child custody, any society that cares for its future must make its primary concern that which is truly in the best interests of children. In a society such as ours in which men daily subject women to violence, oppression, and discrimination, men who would not add to this violence must not blindly side with other men in custody disputes. Indeed, men must relinquish the privilege of sitting idle while the lives and freedoms of women and children are impoverished by vindictive men who lobby, in our name, for laws that benefit men. An examination of custody laws in the various states reveals widespread injustice toward women and children. There is a disturbing national trend toward laws mandating joint custody despite a lack of psychological and social research showing this to be in the interests of the child. In fact it is clear that court mandated joint custody is not in the best interests of the child.

You guys want some men to fight? NOMAS is starting to look like a good place to find them.

NOMAS supports the right of women to restrict fathers' access to children:

> "Friendly parent" provisions are particularly disastrous because a woman who does not assure "frequent and continuing contact" may be seen as "uncooperative," resulting in the child being placed in the care of an abusive parent.

NOMAS insinuates the typical lie that women do not cooperate with their husbands only because they were abusive.

Although the support for the status quo of female advantage in family law is disturbing, what is even worse is

NOMAS' position on domestic violence:

According to NOMAS and the articles it posts on its "Ending Men's Violence" page, domestic violence is an entirely one-sided affair in which men beat women to maintain the patriarchy. One writer, who works for the New York Batterer Program, suggest that only a "minuscule portion" of men who assault their wives are ever arrested, so presumably most men are doing so. Another suggestion is that most "abuse" is legal. This suggests that the organization uses a very loose interpretation of abuse, which probably means that abuse is anything a woman wants it to be, such as, say, refusing to buy her a piece of jewelry or getting upset about her amorous liaisons with the next door neighbor.

And speaking of the NY Model for Batterer Programs, NOMAS finds that "This model was determined to be most in keeping with NOMAS principles and beliefs about sexism, domestic violence and batterer programs."

The NYMBP is focused on "How Courts and Programs Can Bring Real Meaning to Offender Accountability." This means that it is in full support of the kinds of programs that force men to confess, very much like the Maoist "self-criticism sessions" that were a major component of the abuses committed during China's Cultural Revolution.

Here's a summary of why NOMAS likes the NYMBP:

> The focus of batterer programs under the NY Model is quite different: to provide the courts with a mechanism for offender accountability and judicial monitoring. Expectations thus shift from individual rehabilitation to a range of attainable, measurable individual and systemic outcomes. These include uniform court enforcement of orders to batterer programs, batterer program implementation of reasonable and verifiable policies, and meticulous feedback to the court regarding compliance.

For men who have been falsely accused – and they are legion – this is a nightmare. Lots of men have no choice but to attend court programs to see their children, whether they have been convicted or not. The NYMBP is actually quite explicit in its advocacy for a "civil" means to force men into their program — there is a financial incentive, after all. The more men ordered into their program, the more funds they will get. Therefore, there is both an ideological and financial incentive to punish men, many of whom certainly committed no crimes. Of course, as Phyllis Frank, Director of VCS Domestic Violence Program for Men, admits, "Batterer program sessions should acknowledge that most intimate partner violence committed by men against women (as defined by the domestic violence movement) is not illegal."

I'd like to delve into the NYMBP a bit more, but that will have to wait for another post. For now, it should be taken as an indication of NOMAS' real program for men, which is vindictive, cruel, punitive and quite clearly oppressive. Underneath the treacle on their site there's a black hatred of ordinary men that can't be hidden by a cloak of empathy.

NOMAS is a dangerous organization, and well worth fighting.

As for who is responsible for NOMAS, the organization has helpfully provided a list that I'll publish in a separate post today.

The Nonviolence Lie

Welmer · 7 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists and their satellite organizations like NOMAS always pretend to deplore violence. They consistently claim to be striving for a nonviolent society, and to be opposed to all forms of physical force. Usually, they take a stand against "violence against women," but sometimes they suggest that a peaceful society in general is their goal.

This is a snow job. It is not really nonviolence that these people want, but power. Whether raw or distilled, they crave the intoxicating rush of power. Solanas, perhaps the only truly honest feminism out of the entire lot of them, openly advocated murder and slavery. She exulted in the idea of murder and destruction, and was – and still is – cheered on for it.

But one need not read Solanas's SCUM Manifesto to see that the claims of peaceful intentions are false; the facts on the ground bear witness to the violent intent of feminism. To achieve the power they lust for, feminists and their allies have passed laws that result in a great many men being imprisoned for anything from grabbing the wrist of a woman who was hitting them to losing their jobs and being unable to pay child support. Imprisonment is a form of violence, and is recognized as such by law.

Not only are men imprisoned, they are beaten or arrested with excessive force every day. Witness the case of the man set upon by dogs at the behest of his ex-wife in Tennessee. Every year, scores of men are shot and killed by police responding to domestic disputes. In many cases it is the police response, mandated by feminist law, that precipitates the crisis. Men who couldn't afford child support orders are beaten and raped in jail and prison. Some have died there. Untold thousands have been driven to suicide.

This, to the feminists, is "nonviolence."

Achieving domination by turning uniformed men with guns on their enemies is the means by which feminists pursue their aims. Throwing men in jail is how they do it. Forcing confessions from men who are under threat of imprisonment and losing their children is another method.

Shooting people works for feminists.

Beating people is OK.

Attacking men with dogs? Just fine.

Confiscating property is considered "benign" from a feminist point of view.

Shocking and gassing people to subdue them is all in a day's work.

Caging impoverished fathers like animals is "justice."

There is no country in the world that practices this brutality to the same degree as the United States, but others, such as Australia, Canada and the UK, are catching up. What we have to recognize is that men have paid an enormous price for so-called women's liberation, which has brought the world little more than Oprah, Hillary Clinton and the worn out, skeletal old hags of Sex and the City. Oh, and lest I forget, rampant illegitimacy, hundreds of millions of victims of broken families, and enormous, incalculable social welfare costs.

Men have lost a great deal of liberty. Men have lost a great deal of property. Millions of men have lost their children. Many men have lost their freedom, and many their lives.

If there is such a thing as a human rights crisis, this is one, and yet the feminists make the rounds as though they have halos floating over their heads. You'd think they are all clones of Mother Teresa from the deference they are shown in public and the mainstream press.

It's time to call a spade a spade. Feminists are not nonviolent. They are not good people. Their vision for the future entails, to paraphrase Orwell, a stiletto heel stamping on a man’s face, forever.

Feminism is bare-faced barbarism.

Louisiana Man Stabbed to Death by Girlfriend

Welmer · 8 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday evening, a woman plunged a knife into her boyfriend, Ian Matherne, in south Lafourche Parish, Louisiana, killing him in the course of a domestic dispute.

Police are investigating, but so far have released few details. The DA has not decided whether to press charges or not.

Chances are good that the girlfriend will not be charged, as Matherne has a criminal record, and in such a case a weeping woman can easily convince authorities that she was fighting for her life.

Another Triumphalist Piece Consigning Men to Irrelevance

Welmer · 8 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are in pretty high spirits these days. Equality is no longer the goal, but rather outright supremacy. Bolstered by lopsided laws (enforced by men) that give women a sense of social superiority, they're now pretty sure they've won forever and ever.

Call it pride, hubris or whatever. From my studies of history, this kind of attitude almost always precedes disappointment, and often a major crash from the pedestal.

However, it may simply be that The Atlantic knows a pressing social issue when it sees one, and is capitalizing on that. Interestingly, the managing editor, one James Bennet, is quite thoroughly male, and his uncanny ability to pick up on the subtle cues of society has given the magazine he runs a significant boost since he became editor in 2006.

So read the article The End of Men with that in mind, and, of course, don't forget the massive entitlements and advantages that have been put in place for women over the past 50 years.

Man Commits Suicide Following DV Call

Welmer · 8 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

After a domestic dispute in Concord, California in which a man allegedly threatened his wife then fled with a gun, police began a manhunt to find the man. However, realizing that the police were closing in and that his life was about to be destroyed, the man shot and killed himself in some bushes under highway 242.

Suicides following “domestic disputes” have become epidemic in the United States. Knowing that they are destined to be destroyed in court, many men become desperate and arm themselves during such incidents. While sometimes they vent their rage on girlfriends, wives or family in acts of violence, in the large majority of cases they simply kill themselves or commit “suicide by cop.”

Men At Work 2

Obsidian · 8 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As I expected, my recent post, "Men At Work" elicited numerous replies and comments, running the gamut of opinion and this is something I welcome. Let a thousand flowers bloom and all that.

One thing that continues to fascinate and amaze me about people, is in just how little they question their own assumptions. I'm not necessarily knocking anybody here, we're all prone to doing this; the human condition is such that it is often quite myopic. And history has shown us that it takes a deliberate effort to expand beyond one's one parochialism in order to see the bigger picture.

This post will attempt to make plain what I said in the last post of the same name, as well to address some of the concerns other commenters have made therein.

Ok, so let's get to it…

First we have to understand, that we humans are no different from all other forms of life on this planet, in that we are subject to our environment and our success or failure as a species will depend on our ability to adapt to the demands and changes of said environment. Indeed, of all the planet's forms of life, humans have shown a marked tendency to be among the more adaptable; we exist, live and many cases, thrive, in just about every corner of the Earth, often for centuries. There are entire species of other forms of life on our planet, who wasn't so lucky. The dinosaurs easily come to mind.

Simply put, we do what th environment allows. When it comes to the topic of this and the previous post of the same name then, it means that when Men were able to be sole breadwinners, they did that. It doesn't take a historian however to see and know, that the Male as sole breadwinner model has long been in decline-easily three decades if not more-and that the current changes to our social environment suggests that it will change, yet again. In its simplest terms, this means that the breadwinner model, as a means of signalling fitness and worthiness as a mate, is fast becoming a non-factor for Men in our time. This is due to a number of forces-not only have Women gained greated access to formal education and economic freedom, but so too has the more "manly" fields have gone into decline, due to outsourcing and the inexorable march forward technologically. And we are beginning to see this "seeping" trending upwards-as I noted previously, it is not at all uncommon to see solidly middle class, White Collar Men now out of work, their fates being the same as their Lunchpail brethren-being the victims of circumstance, outsourcing, and ever-increasingly morphing tech. The assumption that earning a college degree was a viable hedge against being unemployed, is something many of those Men are no doubt giving a serious rethink to, as they now begin to share the same unemployment line as Joe Sixpack.

And that trend, as the economy continues its contraction/correction, will continue.

This has to have a serious and profound effect on how these and other Men are to signal their worthiness as mates; if your an anthropologist type, one that is a lover of watching how animal life gets on (or not) with one another, you understand well that at the end of the day, said species lives or dies on its ability to get together or not. We know the social environment no longer supports a Man being the breadwinner in aggregate.

So now what?

Well, from where I sit, several things.

One of them will reside in how Women will choose to respond. On this point, there has been much speculation-but I think we have a bit of evidence, however anecdotal it may be, to give us some clues as to what we can expect in the very near future:

1. For one thing, Women's criteria as to what they find desirable in a mate will considerably change. Since the Man as Breadwinner model is fast becoming obsolete, other factors will take centerstage; in simplest terms, these "other factors" can be taken together to be classified as Game, that constellation of habits, behaviors and traits that have been shown to have the most appeal to the most numbers of Women overall. Although Game can and often does occur naturally among Men, it has also been shown and proven that it can be acquired and indeed taught; stories abound of Men who were able to learn enough Game to significantly change their love lives for the better, at a fraction of the cost and time that it takes to go the more traditional Male as Breadwinner route, such as paying tens of thousands of dollars for a college degree, for example.

2. And indeed, we're seeing clear and present evidence of this happening. Aside from the popularization of Game by the likes of Mystery, Neil "Style" Strauss and others with their bestselling books and so on, we also know that Male gym memberships have skyrocketed over the past few decades; even Nutrisystem, a weight loss company that primarily catered to Women, now has among its pitchmen NFL legends Dan Marino, Lawrence "LT" Taylor, and Don Shula, all hawking weight programs designed specifically for Men. Where at one time the whole of Men's grooming products consisted of Brute, Alqua Velva and Barbisol, today the industry is bursting at the seams with just about every player in the business marketing their brand of aftershave, bodywash, hair gel, mirrors, deodorants, lotions and colognes, for every Man in every price bracket, from Axe and body oils you can get from the Muslim vendor on the corner, to Armani and Ed Hardy that you can cop from Sephora or Macy's, and everything in between. Even the traditional barbershop has changed; aside from "the usual" a guy can also get a manicure, special facials and massages and the like; in my native Philly, several such shops exist-I know because one in particular is a place I regularly frequented, and I must say they do a really good job! Back in our pop and grand pop's day looking good was a plus; today, its mandatory. As Prof. Andrew Hacker clearly shows in his excellent book "Mismatch", Today's Women are quite vocal and demanding in what they expect of Men-they are, because they can. Yesterday's "Brawny Man" is out; today's Pretty Boy is IN.

3. The question remains though, as to whether Today's Women will be cool with supporting a Man who is either out of work from the get go, or makes substantially less than herself. On this score I don't think we have any hard evidence to say either way within an American context, though I could be wrong on that point. If someone out there does have access to such evidence either way, by all means bring it forward. But what I will say right now, is that if indeed Women do wind up supporting their Men, they also need to understand that the same rules will apply to them, that once applied to Men. What do I mean by that?

I mean that Women cannot expect, because they pay the bills, that gives them the right to treat their mate any way they wish. Of course it falls on every individual Man to decided for himself how he will respond, but when it comes to our law and social custom, both are indeed quite clear on the matter: a Man, who was the traditional breadwinner, couldn't justify his abuse of his mate, be it physical or emotional; both the law and social custom has decided that financial responsibility has no role whatsoever to play in the matter. He simply had no right to beat, or browbeat, his wife.

Period.

That same law and social custom, can and I posit, will be applied to Women, as more and more of them come to assume the breadwinner role. This will also extend to alimony and child support payments, too, as more Men assume primary caretaker roles.

Nor should any of this really come as a big shock and surprise to Women either-after all, many if not the vast majority of them, will totally agree with the notion that, just because a Man paid for a date and night out on the town, didn't entitle him to sex-the Women still had the right to say "No". Well, if it's good for the Gander, and all that. My point in all this, in case you haven't caught it by now, is that it would be true folly for Women to think that because they pay the bills in the New Grrl Order that gives them the right to run the roost in any way they wish-if they do, they'll be in for a very rude awakening, first legally, and then socially, if only because of the changes in the environment.

4. Of course, all this comes down to how well both Men and Women can and are willing to adapt to the new "game" of love. For Women, they will now get the full reigns of leadership, which inherently comes with risks and responsibilities. And for Men, it comes down to whether he is able to disentangle himself from obsolete models of masculinity that have far outlived their purpose and utility in a meaningful, tangible way in our time for the vast majority. Again, it cannot be overstated enough-the Male as Breadwinner model is all but dead now for most Men reading this. Either they'll share that role with the mate in their lives, or they won't be able to have that role at all. So, by the demands of a changed environment, he will have to look to other things which makes him a viable mate that a Woman deems worth having around-and paying for it.

Here is where Game has the most direct answers, though it must also be said that it comes with a bit of fineprint. It is not a panacea, nor will it solve all problems in our Brave New World. Nevertheless, it's the last, best hope Today's Man has-and if he is smart and diligent, he can improve his chances for love dramatically, even as the Mancession continues ruthlessly apace. Consider the following, just for an example:

Most of the Men reading this can and often do get haircuts. They typically cost no more than say, $15. Now consider how much Women pay to get their hair done-in the Black community, it can easily be four times that amount, if not vastly more, depending on the hairstyle. Grooming, in the main, is a very important aspect of Game-and does anyone here really dispute how good a nice haircut can make a Man look? It's as if he's reborn or something. I've seen Women give a guy a double take based on that, alone.

My point is, that a Man reinventing himself isn't as hard as it seems, and in absolute dollars comparatively speaking, is way cheaper than it is for a Woman of comparable age, etc. I say this from experience. Yes, one can spend a King's Ransom on books and cds and dvds and bootcamps, with a return on investment that's shaky at best-or, he can spend next to nothing on a few books and the many free websites and blogs devoted to the matter and within anywhere from six months to two years (depending on his learning curve, diligence, etc) can reap the rewards. Again, I've done it. So have many, many other Men.

So, in summary, I'll just say this: whether we like it or not, whether we believe it or not, the social environment that dictated the terms upon which Male and Female came together, is vastly changing. What used to do the job for our dads and grand dads, simply ain't gonna get it for us, if for no other reason than because for most of us, it is no longer an option on the table to be considered. That means we'll have to look to other ways of being, of presenting ourselves to the world. And for Women, at long last they will be truly equals. With all that entails-the good, the bad, and the ugly, too.

Comment and reply, holla.

The Result of Women's Lib

Welmer · 8 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In Silverdale, Washington, just south of the Bangor nuclear submarine base on Hood Canal, some middle school students decided to amuse themselves by engaging in oral sex on the bus while on a field trip. One girl filmed the incident with her cell phone while her friend serviced a boy sitting next to her.

Somehow, the news got around, and parents contacted the principal, who has suspended the students who were involved. In all likelihood, one of the parents saw it as sexual assault on the girl performing the act, otherwise I doubt it would have been reported. Stupidly, the case has been forwarded to law enforcement, although the only potential crime was probably the filming of the act (child porn laws).

Overpaid bureaucrat Cynthia Morris, a sexually transmitted disease education coordinator with the Washington State Department of Health, naturally sees only one thing wrong with middle school students having oral sex: STDs.

> "With teenagers, especially the young ones, they don't understand the risk and they think it's harmless play," Morris said. "The thing they worry most about is getting pregnant. You can't get pregnant with oral sex, but you can get other things."

I know there are plenty who would disagree with me, but I don't think it's appropriate for children to be engaging in open sex — on the bus or elsewhere. The argument that "they're going to do it anyway" doesn't really hold water. Not all that long ago, it was pretty rare for middle school kids to be engaging in sexual activity, but the focus on birth control and disease prevention has given them the idea that as long as it's "safe," sexual precocity is perfectly fine for girls (but boys will still be made out to be sex criminals at every opportunity).

Marriage: It's Not About YOU, It's About US

Hestia · 9 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Fellow Women,

An idea that seems to be prevalent in the mind of women today is the one of marriage being a goal to check off the to-do list, a way to find fulfillment, a way to enrich your own life and gets things you want. This me-focused idea of romantic relationships starts long before the courtship process even begins, perhaps while planning a princess style wedding in one's head or envisioning how things "ought" to be in a perfect world. From there the self-centered approach to love continues as the idea of romance is seen as superior to the realness of true human interaction and the courtship process must involve niceties that have come to symbolize love more than words and non-material actions do in today's world. The man must of course pay for the entire process, to show he cares, even if the woman earns her own money.

This process, when successful, culminates with the necessary three months pay diamond ring, the lavish celebration that focuses mainly on the bride rather than the important commitment to be shared with family and friends on this special day, and the lovely and costly home to follow. Soon after the wedding there is the mandatory splitting of the household duties, to ease the workload of the wife and later the cries of "I want to have a baby" and a battle for the division of household labor that surely gets worse once the baby arrives.

All of this we are told is a the proper and right way to find fulfillment as a woman today. We must check off all the boxes on our list and conduct our lives with new gender roles when we see fit and when it would suit us, not our husbands, to do so. We're princesses and the world revolves around. We are entitled to everything we want and if we don't get it, well, HE is a bad man for not making it happen. How dare our every whim not be fulfilled when the mean evil patriarchy has been so cruel to us all of these years! This narcissistic madness is nearly everywhere you turn, from magazines and television shows to sermons at church and books that are supposedly anti-feminist. It's all about what women deserve and how to make ourselves happy. Female superiority it could be called.

Enough is enough!

This is all a lie. A BIG twisted sinister lie that is causing all sorts of sickness in our society today. When you are married, it's not about YOU it's about US. When children arrive, it's not about "wanting a baby" but about wanting to be a mother. Both marriage and motherhood are noble desires and two of the most beautiful roles to fulfill in life but they aren't about fulfillment and happiness in the sense these words are used in pop culture, dating books, magazines, and the world at large. The joy and delight that comes is not about you but something else entirely.

Marriage and motherhood are about humbling yourself, learning to be selfless & giving beyond what you ever thought you had to give, and placing the needs of others ahead of yourself. It's about caring for others and being given the wonderful opportunity to give yourself completely and with abandon to a man you belong to and little ones who have been given to you as a great gift. It's about sharing burdens, not being afraid to get your hands dirty, and learning to accept others for who they are, imperfect messy humans just like yourself. As a wife, you are to be your husband's helpmeet, fiercely loyal to him through thick and thin. You are to be the one who encourages him and helps prop him up when times are the tough, the one who celebrates his triumphs and helps him achieve his goals and dreams in any way you can. With beaming eyes and a heart full on intense love, you'll wonder how you could ever be so lucky to be married to such a fine man and might even feel a bit inadequate when you ponder this thought. As a mother, you are given a fragile and helpless baby who needs you for his/her's very survival. You must give your all to this little one, fret & worry around the clock for their safety, and feel so much love for this itty bitty human that you think your heart might explode. These are both important parts of a woman's life, ones that are about other people far more than they are about yourself.

In a marriage, splitting duties shouldn't be a priority but rather getting done what needs to get done. You are to cooperate with your husband, not worry about making deals or fret about who is getting the raw end of the deal. With an eager loving heart, you learn to look around and ease the burden of work your husband has to do. You might take it upon yourself to do all the domestic chores and find a way to work lawn care into your schedule as well. You might start a home business and really learn to pinch pennies until they scream to help provide your family with the cushioning of a good emergency fund. Part time work in the evening might be something you look into, to help assure your husband has quality time with the precious little ones that you share, while your family still thrives financially. Contests over who has it worst will kill your marriage and make your husband resent you. Pushing for an equal split in housework as a high priority is not the recipe for a beautiful thriving marriage but may very well be one for divorce.

When others depend on you, your emotions need to be under control. Maybe you will need to force yourself to get extra sleep during certain delicate times of the month. Perhaps keeping a journal and being cautious of what foods you eat might help. Whatever works, though, hormones, bad days, and sleep deprivation are not excuses for bad behavior. We all had our bad days, the moments when we make mistakes, but these shouldn't be actions for which we make excuses. Instead they should be painful moments that spur us to learn and understand ourselves to do better next time. I realize that blaming biology and excusing icky behavior is very prevalent nowadays, but to give everything you can to others, self-control is an important part of character to work on, as is having the prudence to plan accordingly for times you know might be rough on you physically and emotionally.

Once children arrive equal parenting investment is important, but this doesn't mean tallying up diaper changes and midnight feedings. To parent equally means you make sure your husband has enough quality time with the kids, that you do not tell him how to be a father, and that you are sure to instill a healthy love and respect for daddy in your children, thanks both to your words and your actions. You both leave an important mark on your children and must be sure your children are provided with the proper balance of both mommy and daddy, of discipline and unconditional love, and all the heaps of time they need to grow and develop into confident and productive young adults in the future.

But parenting is far from just giving mom & dad both equal influence. Children should not be had because one wants to have a baby. They should come about because a married couple wants to take on the lofty job of parenting a child together and has a stable marriage and loving home to provide a child with the best possible welcome into the world. Small children take up far more time and require much more work than you can ever realize until you bring your precious babe home. To make a conscious choice to bring a child into a single mother household is selfish to the extreme and detrimental to the child and so too is bringing a child into a situation where they aren't going to receive not only quality time but quantity time. Children deserve parents who are going to give them all the love, attention, affection, and careful care they need to grow and thrive. They need lots of stories, numerous games of peek-a-boo, and daily trips outside to explore the big outdoors. They demand many sleepless nights spent nursing the night away, rocking a colicky baby, or soothing painful teething gums. They need somebody who wants to be their parent and give all they have to give, not just somebody who wants to bring them into this world to fulfill their desire for a baby or to be needed or to appease their biological clock.

All of this is hard work, not the easy, pretty picture painted by glossy magazine pages or sitcoms on prime time television. When you become a wife, certain doors close as the Mrs one opens. The same is true with motherhood as well. You learn to say no to what isn't important and invest fully in what is. Ideally you will find that what might seem like drudgery is far from it. Cooking and baking become cherished ways to express your love for your family, as does doing their laundry, picking up the laundry strewn about your bedroom, and even scrubbing toilets. You learn to accept the sleep deprived months for what they are–time that will soon pass–and quickly come to realize that it passes far too soon. You learn to not only look past the annoying habits your husband might have, not only to accept them, but to come to see them as part of who he is, the wonderful man you married and the one with whom you're building your "to death do us part" life. And you learn to smile and delight in the pleasures that can only come with the comfortably mundane life that is marriage and motherhood, preferring them to even the most exciting and glamorous bits of the life you left behind and the one you could have had.

I suppose you could say you come to find deep fulfillment in it all, but it's not about you, it's about your very special & irreplaceable us.

Or so it should be.

With Love,

Miami Domestic Dispute Triggers Massacre of Women

Welmer · 9 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A former NY Mets pitcher's brother argued with his wife in the parking lot of a Cuban restaurant in Miami, then pulled out a .45 and shot her dead. After killing his wife, from whom he had recently separated, he entered the restaurant and opened fire on the women inside, killing three and wounding three others. He may have known a couple of the women he shot in the restaurant, but it appears that he targeted several simply for being women.

After the rampage, the man drove a few blocks down the street, and then committed suicide by shooting himself in the head.

Murders, suicides and other acts of violence have become routine events during marital conflicts in the United States. Usually, as we have often pointed out, the man simply commits suicide (which is rarely reported) or gets himself shot by a cop, but it appears that men are increasingly lashing out at others, perhaps due to a feeling of hopelessness and rage engendered by the domination of women so triumphantly announced by Hanna Rosin in her recent piece in The Atlantic.

When men are put under extreme pressure, such as the prospect of losing everything they care about in a pending divorce, violence is to be expected in a certain number of cases. This has always been the case, and has a great deal to do with the development of the institution of marriage as a sort of "guarantee" that assured men that they would not be subjected to the kind of emotional stressors that cause them to act out with aggression. To assume that human nature can be changed simply by passing a few laws is the greatest folly, and I expect untold numbers of people to lose their lives for the thoughtless rejection of ancient laws that feminists demanded.

Rather than a utopia, feminism is edging us closer to a chaotic society in which violence simmers and crackles under the lid of a badly strained criminal justice system. The real injustices that feminists write off as irrelevant will have real consequences, and will result in real tragedies, such as this latest killing spree in Florida.

Obsidian's Survival Guide For The 21st Century Male

Obsidian · 9 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The past four articles by me, in addition to my posting up of the Atlantic's piece, "The End of Men", has elicited a great deal of responses, both online and off. Among them, are the concerns on the part of many Men, quite a few who now find themselves in the midst of the Great Mancession, as to how they will navigate the choppy waters that is the first decade of the third millennium. They are unsure of their place and role, in the Brave New World that beckons, in some cases, downright fearful of the portents of what some call the New Girl Order. This post then, will attempt to offer one Man's take on how Humanity's Y chromosome carriers, can survive and in many cases, even thrive in our times, and the times ahead.

To do that, let us consider the hit film and Oscar winning "Training Day", starring Denzel Washington, and Ethan Hawke…

For those who haven't seen the movie, the premise centers around a day in the life of LAPD NARC Detective Alonzo Harris, and his green trainee, Jake Hoyt. Harris gets Hoyt's feet wet in the world of deep cover drugs trade work-and what he teaches young Hoyt, you don't learn in the Academy.

Among other things, Harris teaches Hoyt that you have to use your head out on the streets, that its better to outthink your opponent, than to out-muscle them. Besides, as Harris notes, the years following the Rodney King and OJ trials and the like, have placed additional constraints on the Boys in Blue; we have to be quite crafty in coming up with ways to get around said constraints. When Harris asks how good is Hoyt's Espanðl, and Hoyt responds in the negative, Harris admonishes him to "learn that shit; these guys are plotting all kinds of shit out here".

Harris demonstrates a keen understanding of both the Law of the Land and the Code of the Streets, AND he does it all with a kind of sexiness that makes Women melt. It will serve Today's Guy well to study this film.

As it has been already noted, it is all but impossible for guys in our time to get over with what our dads and grand dads did. We have to be more saavy, more aware, and more fluid in how we meet the demands of our environment. Besides, we're not able to do what our forebears did, if for no other reason than it is no longer legally feasible to do so. You can't go upside a gal's head, or even yell at her, without running the serious risk of being locked up for a very long time. The point is, as Harris noted, that mere brawn/muscle simply ain't gonna get it anymore; instead, you gotta use your head.

This means, as Harris showed above, that you gotta understand the rules of the game if you plan to win. The first place you gotta start, is with the Law. Learn not only the Constitution, but all that came before it. In that case, that means British Common Law, and before that, the Magna Carta. For example, do you know what the Magna Carta is, and why it remains so very important today? What is the basis of British Common Law-the legal system extant throughout the Anglosphere and beyond? Why is the US Constitution so very important-and unique-in world history?

Trust me when I tell you fellas, all my nights spent burning the midnight oil reading up on all this has paid off, bigtime. I've beaten court cases because of it. Someone remind me to discuss it sometime.

Next, learn what the laws are specifically wrt Family Court issues, which extend to child custody, domestic partner violence and abuse, alimony and palimony, and paternity rights. What does the law say wrt say, rape allegations? Does your state have a "rape shield law"? Do they administer rape kit tests on the accuser? Some states are more amenable to Men in particular than others-study what those laws are in your home state, and then consider those in the surrounding tristate area. If those laws are more favorable to you than where you are, seriously consider moving there-and whatever you do, don't allow yourself to be fooled by the Conservative/Liberal thing. Just because a state is "Red" doesn't necessarily mean that its good for you, as a Man; and just because a state is "Blue" doesn't necessarily mean that its stacked against you either. Your personal self-interest is what is key here, not blind political ideology. Always remember that.

Next, learn Game. Learn it. Learn it well enough so that you got the basics down pat: Social Proof, Negs, Peacocking, Body Language-and this is something that isn't normally mentioned but should be-know how to fuck. Seriously. Women have never, and will never, have much trouble getting a Man into her bed-but there is a caveat. For one thing, she has no way of knowing, for certain, that he'll be good in bed; and second, everytime a Woman opens her legs for a Man, she also opens herself up to the very real possibility of STDs, including Herpes and HIV. Women contract STDs at a rate of roughly two to one to Men-so Women are really taking a gamble all the way around here. Trust me when I tell you, no sane Woman (kinda sorta an oxymoron, I know, LOL) wants to lose a guy who knows his way around the bedroom if she can help it, because she knows just how hard it is to find a replacement, all things being equal, of course. For Women, dicks are a dime a dozen; but a bona fide Woodsman is golden.

Therefore, among your Game learning, you need to be learning stuff like the Kama Sutra and the Perfumed Garden. You need to understand Women's anatomy better than they do, and how to play it like a virtuoso.

A huge part of Game lay in role reversal-the best seducers are those who simply reverse roles with Women. This has already begun to manifest on the macro scale, with the Mancession and Women's gains really gaining apace. But that's only a part of the matter; another big part of it is psychological. Study your The Art of Seduction, and you'll see what I mean.

Learn to unlearn old, ossified, and truly outdated notions of Manhood. If there's one major stumbling block for Men overall, this is it. Notice how those guys who are more fluid with their masculinity tend to also do well with Women? That's not for nothing, chief. Those guys do better than the prototypical hard rock, because they signal complexity-and Women LOVE complexity. So, if you're one-dimensional, dead it: you need to diversify your personality portfolio. What do you know about literature? Art? Music? If you don't know much, learn it. You don't have to be a master of all trades here, just to have a good basic grounding. This is hugely important. The degree to which you can demonstrate complexity, will determine your potential success in the Brave New World.

Moreover, challenge yourself to question the conventional wisdom of what makes a Man, a Man. This should be fun, since Women seem all too quick to tell Men what "a real Man is". Put it to the test-challenge them to define it, and if they can pass said test. Now, this will depend in large part on what you've done in your own life, but just to give you an idea, I'll give you glimpse of how I would handle such a charge:

"Sly grin: Hmm. Well, let's see-I know what it's like to kill what I eat, and not with a gun either-with a bow & arrow. The whole of my working life-which extends back to when I worked under my dad when I was knee-high to a grasshopper-was one where I produced real goods and services, not just for myself, but for others. People ate because of me. I've done my duty per the Good Book and buried both my parents and grandparents-literally. I've seen Men die, held a few in my arms in their final moments. I've protected my family from threats, been shot at, have walked among thieves, murderers, rapists, druglords. I've led Men in the business world, and have taught other Men how to read. I've known the phrase, if you don't work, you don't eat, in spades, and have lived out on the bricks when things got bad. I know what its like to work from can't see in the morning till can't see at night, six days a week, in the snow and heat, for years, without fanfare or complaint-and if something goes down, right now, I know how to handle myself. When that great getting' up morning comes when you can say you've done any of the above, holla back. We'll talk. In the meantime though, I have nothing to prove to you or anyone else. Trust me when I tell you madam, that I know a heck of a lot more about what it means to be a Woman, than you will ever know what it means to be a Man."

Ball's back in her court.

I've said it before, and I'll say it again because it bears repeating: this is an excellent time for Men to reinvent themselves, on their own terms. Never before have we had such an opportunity, and it is not at all certain that it will happen again. Carpe Diem, my Brothers-the World is waiting on you.

NOTE FOR THE LADIES: If you find yourself becoming a bit unsettled by what I have said above, simply consider the following-it is there for the benefit of the Men in your lives too. Your sons and grandsons, your brothers and nephews. Surely, you want them to have the means to protect themselves, yes?

Now adjourn your asses…

Police Respond to “Domestic Disturbance” Call, Man Shoots Himself

Welmer · 9 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a scene played out across America just about every single day, a Miamisburg, Ohio woman called the cops on her boyfriend when he hinted that he was thinking about harming himself, and when they showed up in force he shot himself.

In the US, police calls very frequently result in suicide, because a police response is essentially a military intervention, with assault rifles, body armor, helicopters, etc., and the threat causes sufficient nervous response that many men resort to violence — usually against themselves.

Additionally, it is not uncommon for police to preemptively shoot men who have expressed thoughts of suicide and a desire to harm themselves, which is often a way to reach out and a cry for help.

In this particular case, when police arrived and yelled at the man to drop his weapon, he promptly shot himself, and then they fired a few more rounds in his direction for good measure.

Across America, the standard police tactic in the case of potential male suicide is to always have a backup plan in place to eliminate the despondent man by shooting. This is not the fault of police, rather, it is procedure implemented from the top down in response to pressure to view all men as potential homicidal maniacs due to occasional sensational murders.

I found another excellent piece written by Susannah Breslin about the recent death of porn star Stephen Hill. I'd thought about posting the incident as a news item, but Breslin, who has written fairly extensively about the sex industry, is far more qualified than I am to put it in perspective, so I'm glad I came across her article, written in Salon and titled "Stephen Hill's dark life in porn."

What's really remarkable about Ms. Breslin is that she is a female writer who actually cares about men – even "losers" like Stephen Hill – and isn't faking it. These days, that's a rare quality, even in men.

Here's an excerpt:

> If porn is a joke — and, particularly these days, it most assuredly is — male porn stars are its punch line. Reams of text have been written about how porn supposedly victimizes the women who work in this branch of the sex trade, but inside the straight porn industry, it's the female performers who have the greater power, higher status and bigger paycheck. (The gay porn industry is a different beast altogether and to compare the two is to compare apples and oranges.) So-called woodsmen are paid significantly less than their female counterparts, for their efforts are treated like props on the movie sets where they perform near Herculean sex acts of which most men can only dream ("Get it up, get it on, get it off" is the woodsman's mantra), and more often than not end up as decapitated, frantically thrusting tubes of meat in this industry's final product. Due to the hardcore nature of the porn business and the toll it takes upon all its workers, the porn industry functions as a meat grinder for the human condition, and men are its offal. They may score bragging rights as professional cocksmen, but the reality is these are the working stiffs of a business that has virtually no interest in the men it employs and all the interest in the world in the women with whom its movies are forever preoccupied.

American Women Resorting to Desperate Measures

Welmer · 10 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This is too funny. An Ohio woman, all alone at home, probably with a few cats, got drunk and decided she needed a man. So she did what women have been trained to do when they have a problem: she dialed 911.

Although calling 911 has proven to be very effective for removing husbands from women's lives, a system whereby it replaces them has not yet been worked out. But never fear; I'm sure feminists will come up with a new program that court orders single men to attend to desperate, lonely and aging women who have blown it in life and need some man to change the oil, mow the lawn and make them feel "special."

Former Mayor in Trouble for Fooling Around With 14-Year-Old Boy

Welmer · 10 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Linda Lusk, who held a term as mayor of Prosser, Washington, initiated a relationship with a student at Prosser High School, where her husband is principal. She frequently sent the boy steamy text messages and communicated with him on Facebook, eventually luring him to her house where she engaged in various acts with him. The boy told some friends about it, and when word got around the police contacted the boy's parents, then handed the case over to the sheriff's office due to potential conflicts of interest arising from her political career.

Lusk is 49 years old and a mother of four.

The boy's parents were unavailable for comment, but his uncle said that she'd frequently lure groups of boys to her house for pool parties, where she would flirt with the boys and show off her breasts. He also said that the boys were reluctant to talk to police, because they didn't want to "ruin her life," adding that although he'd like to feel sorry for her, he still wants to see her prosecuted.

Most of all, the uncle felt sorry for the woman's husband and daughter.

As women gain power, their potential for sexual misconduct is rapidly being revealed, suggesting that they are not actually the "safer" sex.

Men's Studies: The Complete Freak Show

Dr. Paul · 10 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A disgraced shyster. A male feminist comedian that admits to being sexist and prone to violence. A transsexual. A grandiose, pathological exaggerator. A supporter of domestic violence perpetrators. A McCarthyesque academic thug out to get anyone around him that doesn't have their mind right. And a gaggle of puffy, self loathing, pseudo intellectual ne'er do wells; the inhabitants of a picaresque house of postmodern freaks.

No, this isn't the set up for a work of comic fiction, but rather an unblinking look at a real life cadre of laughable gender activists in the world of men's studies. And by their stranger than fiction behavior, they amplify the meaning of Jonathan Swift's famous words, "When a true genius appears, you can know him by this sign: That all the dunces are in a confederacy against him."

In this case, the genius isn't a man, but an idea. Male studies. It is admittedly radical in that it is a proposed discipline intended to further scholarly investigation that would actually benefit men and boys without feminist permission or approval.

In another time, perhaps, this would only be sensible. But in today's world, it is genius.

And the mere mention of it has set these less than relevant academic autocrats, this Men's Studies Confederacy of Dunces, on the warpath.

And so they have appointed themselves the defenders of feminist orthodoxy; the male guardians of misandry in academe. It is fitting, then, that they are now introduced to the larger world of men; that they be seen, even as they sit on their stools in the corner, for exactly who they are, right up to the very tops of their pointed hats.

All of them belong to, or are in some way affiliated, with two men's [sic] organizations called the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) and the National Organization for Men Against Sexism (NOMAS). Those are the new age fig leafed boys clubs, so let's meet their versions of the alpha dogs.

Barry Goldstein

We'll start with Barry Goldstein, JD., who is listed on the NOMAS website as their co chair on child custody. He is also an expert witness on domestic violence and has written a book on the subject, Scared to Leave, Afraid to Stay: Paths from Family Violence to Safety. The book chronicles the experiences of ten females, alleged to be victims of domestic violence, including, get this, how the courts abused these women for seeking help.

But even aside from the idea that courts discriminate against battered women, there's a credibility problem here. Goldstein had his law license suspended by a New York appellate court for deceit, fraud and misrepresentation. The laundry list of charges against him stemmed from two cases. One was misappropriation of funds involving his representation of a not-for-profit tenants housing resource center. The other was from his involvement in the Gina Shockome divorce case, which was a feminist cause célèbre in New York just a few years back.

In an internet article he wrote about the case, he accused the presiding judge of denying his client due process and of causing her to suffer PTSD, among a slew of other accusations he leveled at the court. None of it turned out to be true, or at least provable, and that was added to the charges against him.

Perhaps the most comical of Goldstein's antics was to claim to the court during the Shockome case that he had a seen a video tape that showed a court appointed supervisor had slept for 15-20 minutes during a visit. When the court demanded that Goldstein produce the tape he claimed to have lost it. During one court appearance, he claimed the video tape was in his car, and later, at another appearance, he denied ever having had the tape in his car or anywhere else.

Well, apparently, to Goldstein's misfortune, his dog didn't eat the tape, which was about the only excuse he didn't offer. Officials eventually acquired it, and after viewing the video, the court stated, "Anyone looking at that video will see that there is nothing on that video that suggests that [the supervisor] was asleep for 20 minutes."

It seems that Goldstein was caught lying like a, well, like a crooked lawyer. And misappropriating money like one, too.

Among some of the other complaints was that Goldstein repeatedly defied a court directive to refrain from calling the father in the case, who was eventually awarded custody, "the abuser" as there was no proof to support such a statement.

Imagine that.

Additionally, in the last 60 days, the Supreme Court of neighboring Pennsylvania disbarred attorney Barry Goldstein.

Despite all of this being a matter of public record, NOMAS retains the now legally defunct Goldstein as an elected member of its national council.

Ben Atherton-Zeman

Perhaps his presence there is actually funnier than that of another council member that touts himself as a professional comedian. Any sense of ironic metaphor notwithstanding, Ben Atherton-Zeman, hyphenated surname and all, is the designated spokesman, excuse me, spokesperson, for NOMAS. He lists among his primary qualifications that he is an actor and a comedian; that he does impersonations and that he is a feminist.

Impressive credentials, but given the circumstances in the organization, it's probably good that they don't require a license.

Among many notable statements attributed to Atherton-Zeman is that he identifies himself as a “recovering sexist” and believes that every man should challenge sexism and violence, in the world, and in themselves.

Let us hope that there is a mental health professional on the board at NOMAS. Perhaps with some counseling, Ben’s projection of his personal struggles with sexism and violence onto the entire male sex can be resolved. Or, if he can identify the women he discriminated against and people he battered before getting into “recovery,” he can make amends to them as a part of the healing.

He might benefit from a referral to Doug Gertner, another NOMAS National Council Member. Gertner, it seems, has considerable experience counseling men, particularly young fathers for whom he runs a “Boot Camp for New Dads.”

But there is a concern about that one, too. The boot camp looks to have a problem with condoning and enabling domestic violence.

Seriously.

According to information reported on their website, the young male recruits in his basic training have made reports of “their hormone driven mates sometimes using them as a punching bag.”

Gertner’s answer to the abuse? Well, there isn’t one. After all, if a young soldier can’t take an ass kicking with his mouth closed, who can? He sends them home “with a new sense of confidence.” Perhaps it is from their reeducation.

No intervention on the violence. No protection. No concerns. Gertner just ignores the assaults and issues marching orders for his young men to go home and take it.

National Organization for Men Against What?

Google Image return on Robert Brannon

Also, NOMAS President Robert Brannon penned a piece on their site, Does Consensual Prostitution Exist?, in which he implies that female prostitutes are not competent enough to make informed decisions on what to do with their own bodies, and tacitly implies their male customers are raping them.

Men Against What?

Perhaps the best explanation for NOMAS as an acronymic misnomer can be found in their motto, “Pro feminist, gay affirmative, anti racist, enhancing men’s lives.”

As you take a trip through their website, you get a sobering dose of what they mean by “enhancing” men’s lives; they demonize anything masculine and further every anti male sexist stereotype imaginable, including a wholesale endorsement of the New York Model for batterer programs. That program explicitly sees all domestic violence as male perpetrated, despite the overwhelming proof that it just isn’t so. And with that endorsement they embrace a proscription on any notion of counseling or treatment for batterers in favor of criminal consequences.

Do you hear that Mr. Atherton-Zeman? There is no recovery. You are unfixable. Please turn yourself in to the nearest authorities. And bring the rest of the male sex with you.

The NOMAS mission is enhancement through sexism, bigotry and incarceration. And they are steadfastly working to further those ideas.

AMSA, a similarly misnamed organization, with a similarly misleading mission, turns out to be just as misandric as NOMAS, with a crew no less motley than their abhorrent brothers. But they are significantly more dangerous if taken seriously, which an unfortunate few in the mainstream media have done.

Robert Heasley

After the recent conference on male studies in April, AMSA president Robert Heasley was spotted in places like Forbes.com complaining that the new discipline wasn’t really new, but actually an unnecessary redundancy. Regarding male studies he told Forbes “Their argument is that they’re inventing something I think already exists.”

That sentiment was also expressed by Michael Kimmel, author of Guyland, which is basically an attack manual for use against almost all men and on women who don’t subscribe to feminism. Kimmel admonished me personally not to think that male studies was anything new, and informed me that “a robust and healthy field of Masculinity Studies already exists, and is well institutionalized in the US and abroad.” He also went on to boast, “I myself have been working to build this field for nearly thirty years.”

Michael Kimmel

These would seem to be two of the authorities on men's studies, such as they are; The President of AMSA and a well regarded author on masculinities. Both are touting the idea that any new approach to studying men is unnecessary, but perhaps, as Heasley suggested, "Why not just add some new classes?" [to already existing studies]

The question becomes where to add them actually. Despite Kimmel's assertion of the field's vitality and Heasley's call for male studies to be surrendered to men's studies, here is the track record.

After thirty years of Kimmel's personal work and AMSA's group contribution, the field has yielded the following degrees awarded in men's studies.

Ph.D. – 0

Masters – 0

Bachelors – 0

Associates – 0

That is correct, after three decades of effort, begging for (and then spending) money, and the current territorial, defensive reaction we are witnessing from the men's studies leadership, we are left with a discipline that for all practical purposes does not exist, except in a handful of publications and in the minds of an intellectually incestuous group of ideologues seeking their fifteen minutes of fame.

I think I understand Kimmel's thinking very well now. Exactly squat = robust and healthy. No degrees = well institutionalized.

A man could run for elected office on the tricks from academe.

And win.

The lack of substance in Masculinities is apparently in direct proportion to a lack of substance in those who supposedly study it. It isn't just Kimmel and Heasley. And a quick look at AMSA conference literature reveals even more.

At one of their more recent conferences, all of which appear to float on paper submissions from grad students and even some undergraduates, the focus of men's studies is revealed in all its irrelevant glory.

Here are a few of the topics presented.

Contemporary Queer Cinema in a Men's Studies Curriculum

Masculinities in Play: Examining Hegemonic and Technomasculinity in Action-adventure Video Games

A Queer Greenwood Beyond the Cricket Pitch: Queer Sporting Masculinities in the writings of E.M. Forster, D.H. Lawrence and Edward Carpenter

Foucalt and Parenting: A Feminist Essay of Personal Reflection and Application

What are You? Transvestism in Octavia Butler's Kindred and Fledgling

Black Gay (Queer) Masculine Studies: Insights from Richard Bruce Nugent

And

Differently Straight Guys: How Did That Happen?

Setting an example for such scholarly pursuits relevant to the average man is Dr. Christopher Kilmartin, a former comic (yes, another comedian) who recently presented the master lecture, Guy Fi: The Fiction that Rule Men's Lives

How they have avoided a wild proliferation of university courses and degree programs in this discipline is mind boggling, unless you consider that the men's studies group is actually representative of, and obsessed with, about 4% of the male population, while condemning and attacking the other 96%.

Paying attention to the issues of homosexuals and the transgendered has its place in modern culture, but to use that agenda to play a part in hoodwinking people into believing you are addressing the lives of men in general demonstrates a deficit in integrity and a pathological drive to ensure the problems of the great majority of men and boys are either ignored or exacerbated, or both.

It's bullshit. And not just bullshit that helps a bunch of middle aged, meagerly accomplished men get together once a year to feel important and mark the progress of receding hairlines, but crazy, mean spirited bullshit that draws attention away from some very serious problems in our society.

Raewyn Connell- Masculinities Guru

And how could we ever have expected a different outcome? The circus of men's studies has gone so far astray that they have coalesced around an ultimate masculinities icon, Raewyn Connell, who is a tranny. He opted to have his balls cut off and started wearing dresses, at least publicly, about four years ago. And note that Connell isn't just an icon for men's studies, but the icon. The widely published and acclaimed Connell is roundly regarded by the entire men's studies community the erudite harbinger of forward thinking modern masculinity, sans the penis and testicles, of course.

There's your study of men, men. And if you don't like it, they'll sure 'nuff don a strap on and take care o' bidness.

Harry Brod

Recently AMSA board member Harry Brod (no, not even in this gender bending train wreck of a true story did I make that name up) wrote an editorial on the AMSA website in which he departed from the notion that male studies was a repeat of men's studies and opted to just paint the entire new discipline as bullshit, using that exact word, though with not the same credulity as when it is used to describe his own arena.

He invoked the surgically altered Connell, though, to vilify the new discipline as "just another excuse to ignore gender injustice." It was the first of what will sure to be more salvos aimed at publicly ridiculing the proponents of male studies.

MND publisher Mike LaSalle posted a brief, but courteous dissent in the comments section of Brod's article, as follows:

The kernel of your argument against Male Studies is revealed here: Men's Studies scholars are primarily concerned with Justice, not Science.

Male Studies assumes knowledge comes before justice, not the other way around.

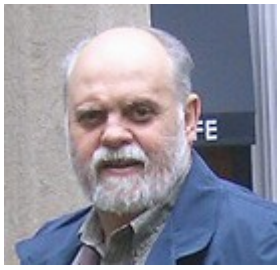
The comment was posted, and then promptly deleted.

And that is the very least of their efforts at censorship.

MND contributor and Wagner College professor of psychology Miles Groth, who hosted the recent conference on Male Studies, is a former member of AMSA. He is also the co founder and former editor of Thymos*: Journal of Boyhood Studies* which became a part of the Men's Studies Press (MSP).

Some time into his involvement with AMSA, he grew concerned with aspects of the organization that he described as "out of touch with the current concerns and needs of most males, especially young males."

Groth went on to express concerns with the nature and quality of literature being featured at AMSA conferences. "Some presenters at the last conference were undergraduates. At such events [annual conferences in a major discipline] it is customary to hear the work of senior researchers."



James Doyle

MSP director James Doyle became aware of Groth's unfortunate propensity for independent thought, and didn't take to the idea of such intellectual diversity with much enthusiasm. In an email he wrote the following to Groth:

Over the past several months, it has become clear that you believe the field of "men's studies" in all its forms to be a pointless, if not harmful, pursuit. As disseminating "men's studies" research, serving "men's studies" scholars, and promoting a positive image of "men's studies" to a broad readership are the central purposes for the Men's Studies Press and its publications, it seems clear to me that you current involvement with the Men's Studies Press is antithetical to your new found philosophy for the study of men's lives.

Therefore, it is with regret that I must terminate your editorial duties with the Men's Studies Press as of this day, April 29th, 2010

In short, when ousting Groth for not having his mind right, he stripped him of his editorship of Thymos, the journal that he co-founded and edited all the years of its existence.

Booted, berated and burned, all for having an actual concern for men and boys in defiance of a group of bigots that seek to undermine the same. There is no greater demonstration of the kind of people we are talking about here. And all my attempts to add levity to this situation aside, it is clear they are capable of the most pernicious kinds of fascist bullying.

It now seems they are gearing up to exert the same, if they can, on anyone else interested in helping men and boys, especially those furthering the idea of male studies.

After a decade old split between the organizations, that by their own account demonstrates that slash and burn politics are no stranger to this crowd, there is a lot of kissing and making up. Kimmel, who has operated more or less independently since the split, is returning to give the key note address in 2011. This had to happen for a reason that overcomes the petty divides that sent them on their own separate paths.

In an email from James Doyle provided to me by someone within their ranks who wishes to remain anonymous, Doyle reveals his personal feelings about Kimmel while acknowledging the sacred adherence to ideology.

Says Doyle:

"I have no problem with people being turned off by Kimmel (I am also) but only in terms of his arrogant and self-centered personality. As for social constructionism, I think this an extremely useful theory."

Aside from the fact that neither social constructionism, nor narcissism, begin or end with Kimmel, Doyle tips his hand on priorities quite nicely, and along with his treatment of Groth solidifies his ideology over values, truth and scholarship mentality.

This entirely sordid matter would be far funnier if it were not so serious. We might even expect a punch line or two from Atherton-Zeman or Kilmartin. We might even laugh. But we are, in some of the most serious ways possible, talking about the future of our sons in this culture.

These fascist pigs are part and parcel to a system that helps shape government policy. If you are interested enough in those policies to have read this far into this article, then you are likely all too aware of what those policies are and in how they are harming our men and boys. When the intellectually carcinogenic on this level operate under the blanket of political and social denial, their work eventually becomes cancerous and starts to metastasize.

It is time to gear up for treatment.

This is especially true now, as we watch these frauds broadcast their intent to start a campaign of bullying and strong arming against anyone who disagrees with them.

The men's studies establishment does not pursue knowledge, but a program of wholesale skullduggery, all to fit a political agenda whose only connection to education is to corrupt it.

After all, if you'll lie to a court of law about domestic problems, about men being abusers when they are not, is there anyone you won't lie to, about anything?

Sailor Girl Fails in Solo Circumnavigation Attempt, Sparks Huge Rescue Response

Welmer · 11 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Abby Sunderland, a 16-year-old girl whose parents thought it would be a good idea to allow her to attempt a global circumnavigation by sailboat, has been found floundering in heavy seas in the Indian Ocean without a mast. Perhaps her parents, Marianne and Laurence Sunderland, who have six other children, figured that with that many kids the risk was acceptable.

These days, sailing is largely automated, so even a girl can appear to be a heroic, swashbuckling sailor on the high seas. Comparing her attempt to much earlier circumnavigations would be something like comparing taking a turboprop to the South Pole to the Amundsen and Scott Antarctic expeditions. Nevertheless, Abby failed, probably because of some technical error (e.g. she sailed right into a heavy storm) or malfunction.

Although the girl's pluck is admirable, her parents' decision to support this trip was unfortunate. Sometimes, when equipment fails, you need muscle, something that 16-year-old girls don't have in abundance. Hopefully, the massive rescue, which involved numerous boats and planes, will be paid for by the Sunderlands, so next time they'll think twice about sending a kid off alone on the high seas.

The recent trend of having children break age records in extreme situations strikes me as a bit bizarre and unhealthy. Although some kids may succeed, a number will fail – some tragically – and unlike when adults attempt extreme feats, in their case there will be others to blame besides just themselves.

In my opinion, this is part of the infantile 1970s ideology, born of Marxist thought, that held that anyone can be or do anything they want if they only want it enough (ironically, people who lived in real Marxist countries were disabused of that notion before us, because it led to mass starvation due to idiotic production goals). Now that people who were indoctrinated by that as children are parents themselves, they are encouraging their children to act out their own childhood fantasies.

Spotlight on “WAGS” at the World Cup

Welmer · 11 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Englands so-called “WAGS,” wives and girlfriends of football (soccer) players, made a name for themselves at the last World Cup in Germany, where they went on a spending and drinking rampage. This time, England’s coach, Fabio Capello, has taken a hard line against them, restricting them from their husbands and boyfriends during the competition. Their scandalous behavior at the last World Cup is cited by some as the reason England couldn’t make it past the 2006 World Cup quarterfinals.

Evidently, they can spend prodigious amounts of money and have a penchant for drunken table dancing.

The WAGS highlight the race in Anglosphere society toward the bottom of the barrel, and represent the triumph of feminist ideals. Most English football players are not particularly sophisticated guys, and while young and egregiously overpaid, become targets for the most aggressive, promiscuous and mercenary women out there, so perhaps it is little wonder that they have come to be surrounded by such a bawdy assortment of women.

However, the WAG culture has evidently been spreading throughout Britain, leading girls to attempt to emulate their heroes by engaging in shopping and drinking binges while wearing expensive, revealing clothing.

This is just another trend that proves that, when given the opportunity, women’s behavior can be every bit as ugly as men’s.

In Defense of "Starter" Marriage – A Tale of Marriage 2.0

Hawaiian Libertarian · 12 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Author Sascha Rothchild, achieved some notoriety for her 2010 book, How to Get Divorced by 30. In it, she discusses what she calls her "Starter" marriage. This tale as narrated by her, is quite instructive to understanding modern American woman's views on the institution most of us in the MRA-sphere call Marriage 2.0. – aka – "til death do us part…or I get bored and just don't feel in love anymore."

Now, of course, I would never pay to read an obvious auto-hagiograpy that undoubtedly gives yet another glaring example of the Eternal Solipsism of the 21st Century, Western Female Mind. But I did come across an article she wrote, entitled In Defense of Starter Marriage, in which she discusses reader's reactions to her book and goes on to reiterate the same case she makes for in her book – that "Starter" Marriages are a great way for people to "test run" before finding the "right" one.

This article is just begging for a red-pill fisking of her blue-pill delusions.

Let's get started…

> For every email or comment I get thanking me for writing my book, How To Get Divorced By 30, or for expressing in articles and blogs how a first marriage can be a positive rite of passage, I get an angry email or comment asking, "How dare you destroy the sanctity of marriage!?"
> To those irate people I say, thanks for giving me all the credit and power of destroying an ancient institution. (In truth, my contribution was hardly necessary; there were major matrimonial problems long before I came into the picture.)

Let's start off nicely…I agree Sascha! Sanctity? Sanctity got nothing to do with Marriage 2.0!

> I'm not causing divorce, I'm just relaying my own divorce experience, which has been overwhelmingly fantastic.

Of course! Divorce for women under Marriage 2.0 usually is.

> The first time I got married, I was 27 and made many of the standard mistakes, including adhering to an arbitrary timetable. I thought dating for three years meant it was time to get married, and marriage at the time seemed easier than breaking up. I also believed that opposites attracted, and I was a type-A, neurotic go-getter and he a laid-back, lovable stoner.

Red flag gentleman. If your thinking of getting married to a particular lady…and she describes herself as a type-A, neurotic go-getter, RUN TO THE HILLS! (Gratuitous plug of one of my fav Metal vids of all time).

> At first we complemented each other; I helped him get motivated to put down the video game controller and actually pursue an acting career, and he helped me calm down and enjoy the quiet moments between stressing out about my writing career.

TRANSLATION FROM WOMENESE INTO ENGLISH:

At first we were happy…but than I got annoyed with him always playing his video games, so I began nagging him to find a job. He started auditioning as an extra for B-Rate Rom-Coms in between the latest exploits of virtual-thuggery on Grand Theft Auto just to shut me up. Eventually he'd tell me to chill and smoke a joint with him whenever I got too worked up about him being such a total loser.

> But after awhile we both just resented the other's very different attitude, rhythm and personality. We were also so > conscious of never stepping on each other's toes that we ended up compromising to the point that we were both miserable.

Take note guys. A classic case of Women saying they want one thing but not happy when they get it. Note the magic word here: compromise. Wasn't this supposed to be the holy grail of EQUALITY? If she were married to a man she looked up to and respected…which would satisfy her intrinsic biological drive for hypergamy…there would not be this talk of "compromise."

> I loved Hollywood; he loved Venice Beach. So we bought a condo in a place we both hated: Sherman Oaks. This sense of democracy just left us feeling unfulfilled.

TRANSLATION: "I can't believe I married a loser beta."

> My ex and I had a very small nontraditional wedding, too embarrassed and cool to say words like "love," "forever" and "til death do us part." We thought by laughing in the face of tradition we were being original, when really we were just setting ourselves up for divorce.

Heh. Very fitting…given the state of Marriage 2.0, at least you were not being a hypocrite or a liar by giving a meaningless gesture towards the serious commitments and vows of Marriage 1.0.

> I bought my own engagement ring and walked down the makeshift aisle to Joe Jackson's "Is She Really Going Out With Him," and, at our reception in a friend's back yard, the best man's toast was "to the best five years of your life."

Let's all give our heartiest round of applause for her ex-husband. Well done sir! You didn't bust the bank on this flake, and try to live up to yet another Princesses dream of being the center of attention in a grand ceremony of over-indulged fluff.

> He was off by two-and-a-half. While I was planning my 30th birthday party, I realized I didn't want my husband on the guest list. I wanted to start this new decade of my life single and free. I was way too young to be stuck in nuptial mediocrity, and getting divorced would be better than spending the next 50 years in a hell of my own making. I now see that divorce isn't an evil at all.

Just like Roissy's maxim 101: For most women, five minutes of alpha is worth five years of beta.

In this case, 2 and a half years of beta was hell enough. Time to go alpha-cock hunting!

> My definition of a starter marriage is one that lasts less than five years and in which there are no children. But based on my experience, I coined the term "learner marriage"—the kind that helps keep you from making the same mistakes the second time around. It's true that second marriages have an even higher divorce rate than first marriages, but that's because many people don't investigate why things went wrong and instead repeat the same self-destructive patterns.

We do have to give Sascha some credit here. She's not putting all the blame on her ex-husband here. The big problem here is that it appears she's investigated why things went wrong, but because she's a typical, 21st century, empowered female endlessly searching for Equality, she doesn't even understand the patterns of self-destruction. Watch the pretty lies she recites in the next paragraph…

> I wasn't emotionally available in my twenties, but instead of confronting that, I married a man who was even less emotionally available.

"Emotional availability" is a code word, and it indicates that her ex-husband most likely started failing her shit tests, and as this drove her crazy, she'd try to "communicate" with him. But because he no longer made her 'gina tingle, and he was most likely clueless about LTR Game, she grew to despise him. Beta contempt. But most women don't even consciously realize what is going on. So they resort to vague rationalizations and pop-psychological buzzwords like "emotionally unavailable" to justify their decision to end their marriages.

> I tried to hide my own issues behind his. Once married, I realized that keeping the knot tied is a lot of daily work, which only just begins with "I do."

That's because you married a slacker-stoner-video game addict who you did not look up to and respect. It sure does take a lot of work to try and live with the cognitive dissonance of going against your basic hypergamous hard-wiring.

> I made the mistake, as do many women, of focusing on getting married rather than on the actual marriage.

Ok, I'm finding hard to work up too much schadenfreude here….she at least has a level of awareness not typical of most Western women nowadays.

> It wasn't until it fell apart that I forced myself to look inward, went to therapy, spoke honestly with friends about my fears and feelings. I also decided that instead of being bitter and baggage-laden, it was time to be a more independent, wiser, and all-around happier person. In a radio interview about my book, a DJ said I sounded cheery for a divorced lady. I replied, "Divorce shouldn't make you depressed; it's being unhappily married that does that."

Of course divorce made you happy…what negatives are there for women getting divorced under the Marriage 2.0 regime? Nevertheless, I do have to give you kudos for avoiding the trap of victimization and letting your baggage make you embittered and unpleasant like so many other divorcees.

> More than 50 percent of marriages end in divorce, yet the wedding industry is booming, which means the belief in nuptial bliss remains.

More like their is still a sizable section of men that don't know any better and are still susceptible to being suckered into Marriage 2.0.

> And so it should! If you find yourself divorced, as I did, and actually take the time to dissect the death of your marriage and make some needed changes in your life, then learning from that starter marriage can prove to be a crucial step towards happiness.

Too bad you missed the most important lesson. Cross your own hypergamous instincts when choosing a spouse, you will almost certainly end up divorced.

> I recently got engaged again, but rather than living like glorified roommates and watching TV every night, my fiancé and I actually spend time together out in the world (snowboarding, trying new restaurants, going to concerts and actually holding hands).

I'd bet an entire paycheck that the subtext of her new relationship has aspects she doesn't even realize is going on here: her new guy has taken on an assertive role, and she submits and follows…tingling her hypergamous instincts. I'd bet he introduced her to snowboarding ,and introduced her to new restaurants…rather than her trying to beg her stoned ex to put down the controller and take her out.

> Sure sometimes I have to sit through a Cubs game and he has to watch me try on shoes, but we don't avoid conflict by losing ourselves in compromise.

Don't you want EQUALITY in your relationship?

> We moved to a neighborhood we both enjoy, communicate by expressing actual feelings rather than just saying, "OK, whatever," and combined our books on shelves knowing we will never have to separate them.

"OK, whatever," I think this corroborates my initial suspicions that her ex-husband was regularly failing her shit tests, she'd get upset, and he'd just blow her off.

> Our wedding will be filled with family and friends, traditions and the word "love." We have a wedding planner, I will wear an actual wedding dress and we'll say vows that are emotional rather than snarky. But most importantly, my second marriage will work because I'm armed with the knowledge gained through my misguided first.

Good luck Sascha. I only hope your new partner doesn't get too comfortable and routine and starts to bore you.

Of course, the more important thing to take away from this entire experience is the general attitude of Sascha when she "settled" for Mr. Good Enough. Ladies, don't settle to get married.

Given the realities of Marriage 2.0 and the divorce regime that ruins so many men and children's lives, thanks…but no thanks.

Obsidian Writes An Open Letter To Ms. Irin Carmon, Reporter For Jezebel.com

Obsidian · 13 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I knew it wouldn't be long before I would see a "response" to The Atlantic's piece by Hannah Rosin, "The End of Men" from someone somewhere out there the Femisphere, and Ms. Irin Carmon , staff writer/blogger for Jezebel.com, whom I consider to be one of the Internet's "Cyber Sisters", didn't disappoint. Her piece, which was posted on the Jezebel site yesterday, has all of what we've come to expect of today's Estrogen-injected commentariat-heavy on the high falutin' snark, but woefully light on the substance. You can see her column for yourself in full, but for my purpose I'm gonna present what I consider to be its most salient points in the form of what we Black folk know as a "call and response" format-a kind of conversation between Ms. Carmon and moi. Let's roll:
MS. IRIN CARMON: Men Are Over. Except At The Top.

OBSIDIAN: In the words of the Gipper, see there you go again, doing that Hypergamy thing. You run right past the points the article itself makes and instead bemoan the fact that the topmost spots are still all Male. Sure didn't take you long to get right to the point, now did ya?

IC: But, see, it's different this time because that one had a question mark! And this one has a limp-dicked and downward-indicating male symbol. All of which means, I guess, that women have a slight edge over non-white supremacy. Must we always compete?

O: Hold up, Ms. Carmon. You know, I've been watching you and your "sisters" throw down for quite sometime now, from the sidelines, and I gotta tell ya-as a Black Man, it gets tiresome listening to upper middle class White (or Jewish, as the case may be) hipsterettes work themselves up into a self-congratulatory lather talking about how "down with the people" they are. Truth be told, there is a tenuous relationship between you all and the Sistas to begin with at best, and in that I've lived or worked in most of the Eastern seaboard's inner city hoods, I have yet to run across the likes of you there making fellowship with Tanya and Rashidah. So, please, spare me the racebaiting, I simply ain't having it.

Moreover, based on your curricula vitae, you haven't done so bad for yourself: magna cum laude from Harvard, worked for the Boston Globe, both at home and its Jerusalem Bureau, the New York Times, Women's Wear; you've globetrotted a bit and got paid doing it; and you were born into what most people would agree was quite auspicious surroundings. Nice work if you can get it, hmm, Irin? All that lathering up about Patriarchy and how The Man's keeping you Womenfolk down's gotta be sooooo tiring…

IC: It can be difficult to shake the suspicion that the Atlantic has an unwritten editorial policy to consider feminism — and any discussion of say, workplace discrimination, sexual assault, reproductive freedom — such hoary conventional wisdom that any issue labeled "Ideas" has to bravely blow it up. (The same may go for critiques of racism). We're so over it all already, and now the supremacy of the feminist establishment needs to be interrogated by some fierce, independent-minded sort like Caitlin Flanagan.

O: What's difficult to shake-to say nothing of keeping a straightface to keep from busting out in laughter-is the notion that "reproductive freedom" is something that is actually evenly applied to ALL people, not just one half.

Shall we go there, Ms. Carmon. Hmm?

IC: Rosin did actually report out her piece, though there is an unmistakable tone of handwringing to it, a worry that all women will turn out like the poor unmarried black women, and a fairly unexamined assumption that when women thrive in the economy, men will grow rightfully angry and resentful that their naturally brawny and vigorous selves are being oppressed.

O: Then it must be true, that two people can look at a piece of art or read a book and take completely differing impressions from it. When I read Rosin's piece (complete with the video clip that I see you forgot(?) to mention, I don't see a heck of a lot of overwrought handwringing; I saw a Woman and her daughter doing a victory dance Terrill Owens himself would have a hard time matching. Go figure.

IC: And yet, for all the hand-wringing over the lonely spinster, the real loser in society—the only one to have made just slight financial gains since the 1970s—is the single man, whether poor or rich, college-educated or not. Hens rejoice; it's the bachelor party that's over.

It's ladies' night! Are you having fun yet?

O: Let's ask Ms. Lincoln, Ms. Whitman, Ms. Fiorina and Ms. Haley, hmm?

IC: Some of this evidence is quite convincing to Rosin's point that women are taking over and men are lagging and it's only going to get worse.

O: Yes, let's examine a bit of that evidence for a moment, shall we? According to the article, girls are being requested at fertility clinics now, at a rate of nearly two to one-if ever that was an indicator that things are very good for the ladies, that would be it. Please point me to the part in your piece where you mention that? I must've missed it.

IC: And some of it very much isn't. This is true when she implies that pop culture caricatures (overwhelmingly created by male executives and creatives) are a form of female-friendly social change, and even more so when she glosses over the fact that female domination is most prominent in the least empowered classes.

O: Excuse me? "Least empowered" where? Perhaps you missed the part of her article where, at a young Men's group meeting, a fella relayed his story about being kicked out of the house with the word "bitch!" by his baby mama, because he didn't have any money? Or, perhaps you missed the part of the article where Rosin quotes one of the authors of the book Promises I Can Keep, about how POOR WOMEN call ALL the shots in the mating dance, from start to finish? And, again, as someone who's actually lived a very large chunk of his life in the hood-like, um, all of it-I can tell you, without fear of retribution or rebuke, that those accounts are true. Nor is this "dominance something that is only to be seen among the poor – all up and down the social scale, Women call the shots – they can decide who lives and who dies, who pays if they decided on life. And it doesn't stop there – it extends to who gets dragged into court for all manner of stuff, like rape and sexual harrassment charges, domestic abuse charges, stalking charges, you name it. The way things are right now, all a Woman needs is her say so in order to put a guy – be he Damon on the block or Dimon on Wall Street's butt in a sling. If that ain't "dominance" then I don't know what is, Ms. Carmon.

But, move along, there's nothing to see here…

IC: Here are the nods at the evidence that it might not be so simple:

Yes, the U.S. still has a wage gap, one that can be convincingly explained—at least in part—by discrimination. Yes, women still do most of the child care. And yes, the upper reaches of society are still dominated by men. But given the power of the forces pushing at the economy, this setup feels like the last gasp of a dying age rather than the permanent establishment.

O: Interesting that you completely ignore the fact that boys are failing in school at ever-increasing rates, and aren't choosing to go on to university. Nor is this surprising: in my hometown of Philly, fives years ago, the White Feminists of the Main Line swooped in like flying monkeys when the very idea was floated of creating gender specific schools to adress the city's burgeoning crime and homicide problem. Even as Philly's murder rate was climbing toward 500 for the year, the Main Line Feminists were staunchly against the idea, on the grounds that it would make girls feel bad. Forget the fact that said White Main Line Feminists didn't live anywhere near where the action was, and kept it that way, making sure to send their girls to safe and tidy ALL GIRLS prep schools-no, they not only had the loud mouths, but also had the loot and political pull, to squash the idea of trying to save Black boys' minds and lives.

Said idea hasn't been heard from since.

But of course, you'll never write about that…

And as for this notion that the Women work and toil from sun up to sundown both at home and on the gig, the facts don't bear this out, Ms. Carmon. Indeed, studies show that American Men are spending more time with their kids than ever, and are contributing to home chores more than ever. Now, could it be better-absolutely. But where I come from, making note of such watershed things is called…progress. I suppose you're not aware of that word?

IC: Near the top of the jobs pyramid, of course, the upward march of women stalls. Prominent female CEOs, past and present, are so rare that they count as minor celebrities, and most of us can tick off their names just from occasionally reading the business pages…The accomplishment is considered so extraordinary that Whitman and Fiorina are using it as the basis for political campaigns. Only 3 percent of Fortune 500 CEOs are women, and the number has never risen much above that.

O: Yea, but here's the kicker Ms. Carmon-is that because "The Man" is still keeping (well to do, upper middle class White & Jewish, in the main) Women down, or are there other factors at play? I say, at this stage in the game, the answer tends to lean toward the latter than the former, and not quite for the reasons you might think. Or assume.

In any event, and surely by now you must know, that both Fiorina and Whitman were able to successfully parlay their businessworld cred into votes at the ballot box-the latter spent more money than Goldman Sachs golden boy Jon Corzine and rivalled Michael Bloomberg for God's sake. I mean, call me crazy, but I thought the other night was a good thing for Women? smh…

IC: In his editor's letter, Atlantic editor-in-chief James Bennet tries to explain the dissonance more directly:

"Our politics and corporate boardrooms are lagging indicators of what is happening in the society, where women already hold most positions in middle management and would be overwhelming our universities were it not for stealthy affirmative action on behalf of overmatched young men. Small wonder the Tea Party is mostly male, as well as white."

IC: You could quibble about whether the Tea Party is evidence that white men are going out kicking and screaming because they're so over, or whether it's just a repackaged insurgency of the same old dominant norms. But in the haste to declare the end of all men, everywhere, what's missing here is the fact that this supposed male disempowerment has yet to seriously affect the major citadels of power — who has access to economic and political capital, or positions of influence ranging from Hollywood to Wall Street to, well, The Atlantic . Is it a lagging indicator that will trickle upward somehow, or is it just a reconfigured landscape in which class, race, and gender converge to keep the concentration of power relatively unchanged?

O: Oh, I get it-so what happens to Joe Sixpack ain't all that important, huh, Ms. Carmon? It ONLY matters when Ted Turner gets his comeuppance-is that it? Very empathetic of ya. And please, stop with the "we're all in this together" BS, because we're NOT. Neither you, nor the whole lot of you Feministas, have shown any evidence of really giving one whit of care or concern about what happens to Black or Brown lives. I know, because I'm where the action is.

IC: As Ann Friedman notes ,

"Sure, college-age women tell her they hope to become surgeons and marry men who will be primary caregivers. But research shows that few women actually realize this domestic arrangement— they tend to marry other high-achieving men who expect their own careers to take precedence."

O: Hmm, I wonder why that is? Could it have anything to do with the fact that in truth, the vast majority of Women, given the choice do NOT want to hookup with Mr. Mom?

IC: Many of the fastest-growing, female-dominated industries, which do not require a college education, are among the lowest paid. And while there are a handful of female CEOs and senators, women have yet to crack the glass ceiling with any sort of critical mass.

O: Meanwhile, many of the jobs don't require a college education, like uh, coalmine worker or oil rig operator, just happen to be ones where fatalities occur, and which are overwhelmingly staffed by Men-you know, like the ones that who died back in April, Ms. Carmon? Wonder if you wrote anything about that. I have to check your website…

IC: To argue that female valedictorians and single mothers getting social work degrees will someday mean "the end" of a society in which men still set almost all the terms is skipping steps. You know, the ones in which we reshape our cultural norms so that male identity isn't polarized between Marlboro Man and "omega male," as Rosin posits and implicitly enforces. And in which increased and broader participation of women isn't concentrated at the most disadvantaged segments of society, or uncritically construed as a dangerously unstable zero-sum game.

O: Please-you know just as well as I do that if and when Women can choose-and we all know they most certainly can and do-they ain't that crazy about "reshaping cultural norms" to the extent that Michael Cera replaces, or even keeps pace with, Tom Brady. And as so many authors, yes, quite a few of them Women like yourself have noted so many times, quite a few Women in our time are CHOOSING to be singlemoms, and despite all the spinning from your corner of the blogosphere, no one's forcing Women to make their academic bones in the Humanities departments. This is all their own choice, so if they don't like said choices, who should they then blame? Why Men, of course!

IC: By the way, with all of the Atlantic 's talk of women and brown people ruling the roost, what will that mean for their own staff? Let's look at their line-up of star bloggers:

O: Come now, Irin, why stop there? Here's a shortlist of the Internet's top ten feminist blogs-maybe you've heard of a few of em:

1. Feministing
2. Feministe
3. Our Bodies Our Blog
4. Jezebel
5. Broadsheet (part of Salon.com, don't ya know)
6. Finally Feminism 101
7. Women in Media & News Blog
8. Holla Back NYC
9. MediaGirl
10. Bitch Magazine

And let's not stop there-theres the traditional "Seven Sisters" mags, Cosmo, Marie Claire, Vogue, People and its many variants, Essence (since you're so concerned about "people of color")…and let's not forget the Queen of them All, "O" magazine, named after its "mama" Oprah Winfrey herself (and soon to have her own network-all Oprah, all the time, oh joy). There's Ana Marie Cox, founder of Wonkette…I mean the list of Women in media, legacy or new wave, is virtually endless. The mere thought or suggestion that somehow Women aren't getting their message(s) out and/or having their voices heard, is patently absurd, when one just takes the most casual of glances around. You could not have written the above with a straightface…right?

IC: And as has already been pointed out , eleven of the fourteen pieces that make up the Ideas issue were written by men. Either the Atlantic is another lagging indicator, or they've read their own cover stories and decided to throw a bone to the beleaguered white man — that future of affirmative action they mention, perhaps.

O: If the shoe fits, my lady. After all, Affirmative Action was designed to redress historical injustices. With the way things are going now, it ain't too far fetched to say that being Male is the New Black.

I just happen to know a little something about that.

If you got a mind-holla back…

Corporatism Ahoy! Chaos in the Video Game Industry

Gx1080 · 14 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

Once again, inspiration for posting comes from another blogger in the Manosphere, in this case Dave from Hawaii, with his take on the US, but which applies to a good chunk of the Western World too, exposing unholy alliance between Corporations and Goverment for screwing the civilian population.

It is when the larger trend is seen that the small incidents make sense.

The videogame industry, an entertainment industry like many others, is an interesting one. Part design, part creativity, part coding, its batches of fresh meat can't come from either unskilled immigrant labor, and the natural repulsion to the High IQ-Low Testosterone enviroment in there keeps the AA wimmin away.

None of those are neccesary. Fresh meat come from the surplus of Technician/College Graduate/Self-educated, starry-eyed 20-something guys that don't know any better.

Given that eternal source of fresh meat, the larger corporations can simply do massive marketing and churn out mediocre game after mediocre game, burning out developer teams by crunching them in sub-human terms.

Now, that's a massive accusation Gx, I hear you say. Well then, let's take a look at the incidents. We have several.

Evidence A: The Scratchware Manifesto.

Written a decade ago, although forgotten for being an attempt at over-glorification of the indie industry, it raises several points about the nature of the office enviroment and the corporations role on it:

> Descriptions of crunch seem to have a lot in common with the kinds of work practices you find south of the border. Here's one from Ion Storm Dallas, as reported in Salon. It's rife with 'I love my vampire masters' baloney.
> All-nighters, 18-hour days, sleeping at the office — John Romero's posse keeps up a "death schedule" to get Daikatana out of beta.
> Since Daikatana's inception, elite and obsessive gamers have road-tripped from around the world to work with their hero, Romero. They've quit school, left relationships and literally built beds under their desks to live and breathe nearly every breath in the house Romero built. Their commitment to a self-described "death schedule" — the final, endless rush to perfect their game — isn't just some start-up novelty, it's a way of life.

> "Aaaaarrgggggggh!" Shawn Green screams as he thrashes his computer keyboard against the ground. It's midnight in the coders cove of Ion Storm and the cubes are as dark as the city below outside. Green, a stocky, long-haired programmer in a paunchy black T-shirt, hunches like an ape at the beginning of "2001″ and whacks keys across the floor like loose teeth.
> Green, the 28-year-old lead coder on Daikatana and a veteran of id Software, is 14 hours into one more 18-hour day. In a few minutes, he'll take his first and only break, heading off to an abandoned abortion clinic to practice with his doom-metal band, Last Chapter…

> "I call myself a mushroom," Weasl told me as I crouched inside, "because I'm always working in the dark." With a couple extra layers of felt draping his cube, there's not even the slightest trace of light, let alone fresh air. But Weas[illegible] doesn't seem to mind. "Darkness is really helpful when you're trying to shut out outside influences," he explains, tweaking an animated pool of lava on his screen. "After you spend enough time in here, your personality adapts."

> After you beat a child repeatedly, it's personality adapts, too.

Veterans of the Office Wars in design companies can relate to said tales. And they wouldn't be Office Wars if the internal rewards for a work weren't decided for who markets the idea better to the upper echelons of the totem and who speaks more with the media and the costumers. The latter have been almost eliminated, a sad but certain consequences of making the brand more important than the human beings on it:

> For the first 100 years of the US, corporations were highly limited. But they were plotting and planning their release. They got their big break during the Civil War. At the same time that black folks were getting freed from slavery, the vampires of Wall Street were slipping their bonds, setting up a slave system for all of us. In 1872, they convinced the Supreme Court that corporations had all the rights of a person. And that's what we have today; America Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of GlobalCapitalists'R'Us.

Bingo. The top dog changes, but the Corporation is still there. Immortal. Immoral. Outliving it's hosts.

Once again, I need to remind people that this was written in 2000. It took a recession and the Obushama regime to make that truth sink in, and getting people to wake up from their indoctrination is HARD.

Evidence B: The EA Spouse.

Another lawsuit of a disgruntled employee would be usually swept under the carpet and given an out of court settlement to the ones not so easily dismissed, but this case was not meant to be like that. His wife whined on LiveJournal:

> Within weeks production had accelerated into a 'mild' crunch: eight hours six days a week. The producers even set a deadline; they gave a specific date for the end of the crunch, which was still months away from the title's shipping date, so it seemed safe. That date came and went. And went, and went. When the next news came it was not about a reprieve; it was another acceleration: twelve hours six days a week, 9am to 10pm.

> And the kicker: for the honor of this treatment EA salaried employees receive a) no overtime; b) no compensation time! ('comp' time is the equalization of time off for overtime — any hours spent during a crunch accrue into days off after the product has shipped); c) no additional sick or vacation leave. The time just goes away.

> This crunch also differs from crunch time in a smaller studio in that it was not an emergency effort to save a project from failure. Every step of the way, the project remained on schedule. Crunching neither accelerated this nor slowed it down; its effect on the actual product was not measurable. The extended hours were deliberate and planned; the management knew what they were doing as they did it.

That expousure, which attracted the MainStream Media attention (because was a woman saying it, of course) made the lawsuit a victory.

It needs to ba said that 60-hour week only create efficient cultures of slacking. Hence, IP blockers, and the whole NSFW culture. BTW, IP blockers can be bypassed easily. (Thank me for that link latter).

Evidence C: Infinity Ward Lawsuit.

Another lawsuit. In this case, Activision decided that it was cheaper to fire the creators of Modern Warfare 2 than pay them their due royalties and bonuses. That was for creating one of the best selling games of all time. They reward? They were held hostage by thugs for "insubordination" like local shop owners paying money to mob bosses at gunpoint.

Let's examine the kind of slimeballs that make those decisions, in this case Bobby Kotick, Activision's CEO. Here's some words from him:

> "I don't think it is specific to video games. I think that if you look at how much volatility there is in the economy and, dependent upon your view about macroeconomic picture and I think we have a real culture of thrift. And I think the goal that I had in bringing a lot of the packaged goods folks that we brought in to Activision 10 years ago was to take all the fun out of making video games."
> "I think we definitely have been able to instill the culture, the skepticism and pessimism and fear that you should have in an economy like we are in today. And so, while generally people talk about the recession, we are pretty good at keeping people focused on the deep depression."

Well, you read it from the man. That's the writing on the wall in Corporate America, creating easily scared sheeple that will happily submit to almost slavery for a pathetic salary, and if they refuse? There's the way out, we got college graduates and unskilled labor. Good luck paying your taxes/family/child support!!

Although there's a place in hell for slime balls like Kotick, they are replaceable and the next schmuck will keep the program in place. Just the same as the Wall Street shiny boys. Corporations themselves must be held accountable, or else we are just going to be consumed by an amoral parasite ruled by an algorithm of profit.

Wouldn't surprise me if they become self-aware one of these days. Stranger things have happened.

Media Claims Terrorists Are “Unmarried Men”

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 14 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Robert Spencer of Jihad Watch recently wrote about how the media is describing terrorism related news. There was a recent arrest of two Muslim men at JFK Airport who were on their way to Somalia to allegedly take part in terrorist activities. This arrest was reported by Reuters but Reuters did not say that these men were Muslim or point out the connection to wider Islamic terrorism. Instead Reuters described the men as “men”, “unmarried American citizens”, and “residents of New Jersey”.

While Spencer covered how the media is ideologically against identifying these men as Muslim, he did not cover why the media chose to refer to these men as essentially “unmarried men”. The media refused to describe the men arrested as Muslim because of their political correctness. However, there are many ways Reuters could have written this. Reuters chose “unmarried men” because of their anti-male and feminist ideology. It makes it sound like the men arrested at JFK Airport were more like George Sodini than Mohammed or Osama. It’s not just about hiding that it was Muslims involved in these arrests. It’s an attempt to kill two birds with one stone by also trying to shift the blame on to men by implying that terrorism is caused by regular (unmarried) men who are American citizens.

The media like other feminist and anti-male ideologues see the average man as the problem not the guys who are actually flying planes into buildings. Unmarried men are free of parts of the system that are designed to extract wealth from men such as the divorce court system. There is a real threat that men will either go ghost in greater numbers or fight back in the future. Expect to see more of this general blaming of men or unmarried men specifically in the future.

NJ Civil Rights Potentate Spikes Ladies' Nights

Welmer · 14 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Following a complaint from a man, a civil rights official in New Jersey has decreed ladies' nights in bars illegal. States across the US are not in agreement on the issue, as several have ruled them permissible, while a few others have banned them.

As far as I'm concerned, it really isn't my business who bars choose to let in or what they charge. I don't like the idea of businesses being forced to eradicate discrimination, because it isn't their job to do so; it is simply their job to make money, and one would think that discrimination wouldn't be the best way to do so anyway.

Nevertheless, if the gander must pay I suppose the goose can do so as well. And who wants to go to a bar that inculcates a sense of entitlement in women anyway?

White Knight Network Extends its Reach to our Communities

Welmer · 14 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an effort to start a new social crusade, organizations spawned by academic feminism are extending their tentacles into our communities in what appears to be a bid to stir up vigilante action against men. As usual, they claim to come in peace, but the breathless exaggerations of the problem of domestic violence and the witch-hunt nature of the campaign give the lie to their disguise as self-styled "peacemakers."

In fact, the latest group calls itself "Men as Peacemakers," and exhorts men to "stand up and take action," asking "How many women have to be demeaned, beaten, raped or killed before we men decide it's too much?"

When one phrases a question in that way, perspective is totally ignored. The fact that men are overwhelmingly the victims of violence in the US is of little consequence to these folks, because, well, in their minds they probably deserved it. Additionally, the fellows running this kind of feminist version of Promise Keepers make such idiotic statements as: "Women are experiencing male-perpetrated violence at incredible rates, and yet men remain on the sidelines."

Incredible?

The women I see out and about every day must be "incredible" make-up artists to hide all those black eyes and busted lips, or else millions of them are holed up in women's shelters, because I haven't seen any evidence of this. But Men as Peacemakers would have us believe that we've all abandoned our sisters, wives (yes, it's unbelievable, but they suggested that husbands are standing idly by while men beat their wives — perhaps their wives' badboy lovers?) and coworkers to be thumped by some bad guys.

Truth is, adult Western women lead the safest lives of any people on the planet, but we're supposed to believe that they are suffering under some terrible brutality that must be stopped now.

The real motivation of these guys is pretty obvious to me: they're trying to cash in on the dominant feminist victim ideology. Making the rounds at companies preaching "nonviolence" and "protection of women" is how they plan to make a buck, whether or not they are making any difference at all.

The only difference they will make will most likely be to spur a few scapegoat prosecutions of guys who let the wife or girlfriend have it during a booze-fueled hurly burly in some hovel on the wrong side of the tracks. Domestic violence is generally prevalent in lower socio-economic groups where there are substance abuse and other behavioral problems that cut across both genders, not to mention high rates of unemployment, poverty and illegitimacy. In fact, contrary to what feminists maintain, it is precisely in communities where women are most empowered relative to the men – the ghettoes and trailer parks of America, for example – where they are most likely to get punched in the face.

However, these guys' teachings may also have the unfortunate effect of convincing some dimwit to intervene in a domestic dispute and get himself killed. More police are killed on domestic calls than any other classification, and if people are willing to kill cops in those situations, they'll definitely be willing to kill civilian strangers. Every now and then one reads about some guy who attempts to quell an argument between a man and a woman, and who then ends up getting the crap kicked out of him by both the man AND the woman.

Of course, Men as Peacemakers will disavow any responsibility for getting people killed by saying "we promote peace," but the imagery and language they use, combined with the calls to action, are sure to cause trouble.

I think it's important to stand up to these guys and ask them some hard questions about facts, and to question their motives. They aren't bringing peace, but rather more conflict, and they are all but calling for vigilanteism.

Feminist Actress Beats Boy at Mall

Welmer · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jodie Foster, perhaps America's most renowned feminist actress, allegedly seized a boy and beat him in a mall parking lot, leaving marks and scratches on his arm when he attempted to take her picture, according to the boy and his father. Foster claims that she manhandled the boy because he was bothering her and her artificially conceived, genetically superior progeny, and anyway he was a "professional paparazzo."

Although it might appear on the surface that this attack was an indication of hatred for men, I think something different is at work: Jodie's having a rough time as a single mom.

Jodie Foster has told the world over and over that she doesn't need any help from a mere man raising a couple of boys, but it seems that the stress is getting to be a bit much for her. Foster may be a highly charged, ambitious woman, and she may have set about trying to create the master race by having herself inseminated with Übermensch sperm, but even she has her limits, and all that pent up frustration came out in an explosion of rage against the hapless boy with a camera.

Women like Jodie Foster are why I think men should think twice about donating sperm — they will be your children, after all, and do you really want that kind of woman raising your kids?

Girls Display Entitlement in Fight With Cop

Welmer · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In this dust-up in Seattle, not far from where I live, a young woman is shown fighting a cop as he struggles to maintain control without using excessive force. When her friend intervenes, the cop lets her have it in the face. I wonder whether NOMAS and Men as Peacemakers would approve? Would they step between the cop and this fine young lady?

As a guy, I know that I'd likely be tased or shot for the same level of resistance/aggression, but these girls have no such fear. The irony of it is that there's a good chance the exact same girls here who are cursing and fighting this cop will call the police to use them against some man in their lives at some point.

This is why being a cop is such a lousy job.

SPLICE — Hollywood is Finally Getting it Right!

Featured Guest · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[For today's guest post we have a movie review, written by EP]

The timesink site known as TVTropes.org has a wonderfully even-handed page entitled Men are the Expendable Gender. It notes the different treatment and 'noteworthiness' of male and female deaths in movies, and how very few treat male and female experiences exactly the same. These practices are so sunk in moviemaking and life that I highly doubt that this will ever change no matter how much feminist influence in our society is reeled back. But every so often, a movie comes out that makes you sit up and say: "What? Did I just see equal treatment of different motivations that I just saw there?" Feels…weirdly invigorating, like the larger culture finally gets what we've been working for…wait, was that Joel Silver's name in the producer's credits?

And Splice is precisely that kind of movie. Spoilers are left, right, and center in this review, so if you haven't seen it yet, do so immediately, then read my analysis. (Ideal audiences are young couples just starting out, but any parent of a child of any number of years, especially male parents, should see it, as it specifically affirms the value of masculine virtues in raising daughters.)

So, Splice. It's being marketed on the sex angle (even the logo is reminiscent of that Species movie, which, as I recall, starred Gahndi as an evil scientist and Doctor Octopus as an amiable co-star. If you want to see them in pretty much exactly the same roles, just go watch Prince of Persia instead.) Moviebob loved it because it was a movie about genetic engineering that didn't go for the "We must not tamper in GODS DOMAIN!" message. And, despite being a Christian of some years, I emphatically agree. God's domain is what we have not mastered, and it is the glory of man to seek out a matter-within defined moral limits. The true message of Splice is "Adam's sin was to let Eve do what she wanted." This message is wrapped up in one of the most effectively disturbing movies ever made-that's also occasionally very funny, heartwarming, and obliquely but firmly condemning of everything feminism does to women and men.

The true backstory of Splice is alluded to in asides throughout the movie. As near as I can figure out, an intelligent, fairly well-off feminist of the Andrea Dworkin variety left college sometime in the 60s. Being a near-lesbian feminist true believer, yet lacking neither skills nor functional beauty, she bought a farm in the remote part of the country, conceived a girl (with the suitably eugenic name of Elsa) by some drifting unnamed thug, and then proceeded to raise her to not need men, ever. The girl slept on a mattress on the floor, her room was kept as bare and Spartan as possible, any pets she became attached to were taken from her, she was forbidden makeup, and worst of all, she was raised entirely on feminist theory, pop sociology, and biology textbooks. Then she went to college. Unfortunately, she was beautiful. Doubly unfortunately, she was driven toward theoretical and experimental biology, traditionally a more male-heavy field, by her mother. Triply unfortunately, she was actually intelligent enough to hack it in the field until she was able to secure the alpha-among-his-peers played by Adrien Brody in a marriage meant for career success more than children. Thanks to the aforementioned unfortunates, her mother's fanatical views were never criticized by the intelligent men she was surrounded with when brought up, but rather pushed under the hood by everyday mundane career focus.

And then Adrien Brody enters the picture, playing Clive, and demonstrating that a girl-of-your-beta-dreams who seemingly shares all your nerdly interests is still not the one you want when feminism still has a hold on her psyche. Clive is the eldest brother of a family of high-IQ people who had all the benefits of a good upbringing and a large family. He does biology because it's something he loves, he can mouth the platitudes of the university without actually losing too much fem-cred due to his sigma status as smartest elder in the family and the founder of his own successful biotech company, and his game is good enough to get Elsa to quit talking feminism and focus on their shared research project, though not good enough to convince her to get off the birth control and give him a kid already. Couples therapy ensues, though at this point it's only the low-level recommended 'educational' version for nice liberal rich types.

They create life. More accurately, they patch together a chimeric mammphibian super-slug that can biologically produce expensive proteins that would require far more time and expense if made by traditional chemical means. But it's still pretty cool, because, hey, we created a new form of life! Give us a Nobel and let's go on to humans before the Chinese try it or something! And all of a sudden Elsa grabs the feminist opportunity of her lifetime-secretly using her own DNA to create the Brave New human amalgam.

The resulting creature (called "Dren,") is ugly-cute at first, ages at an accelerated rate, develops like an embryo outside the womb from a chicken-kangaroo thing into a lithe, sexy, she-lizardess, and packs a mean neurotoxic stinger on its tail. Dren also has features of all major animal classes that make occasional appearances when under stress, which will guarantee her as the prime subject for deviantart submissions in the foreseeable future. Every minor milestone of her life is met with asides on parenting actual children, and in the most honest depiction of real life parenting ever seen:

> …dear God, puberty hits. Other things being equal, women are better parents than men for small children. A man would go crazy. For older kids, no.

It hits Elsa particularly hard when her creation all of a sudden starts paying more attention to and then pining for the only male she's allowed to see: her husband. (Elsa's knowledge of parenting stops at 'stand in the corner' and 'I love you.' For some strange reason, the second one is more effective when her husband says it.) The husband in this case is eventually shamefully drawn toward unnatural sexual relations with a woman who's a younger, prettier, more animalistic, and less-tainted-by-feminism version of his current wife. I'm sure Welmer would note the Jungian undertones, though one might question whether Dren truly qualifies as his daughter, since he has no DNA in the business that he doesn't inject personally. Thankfully, when his wife calls him on it, he fires right back and raises the stakes on exactly what his wife was trying to accomplish.

The final fourth of the movie simply proves that even when unwillingly having sex with the jerks they helped create, women don't hate them enough to forfeit their children. And that the most horrifying thing that can personally happen to a woman is to end up turning into her mother, having learned nothing in her own life from the men she meets to break that cycle.

The pursuit of knowledge through science at any cost is often corrupt and destructive, but it is not the prime evil. Corporatism and Gekkonian officialism is often corrupt, but it is not the prime evil. Men themselves are responsible for much terror through callousness and fear of financial failure, but even they are not the prime evils. The true prime evil in the movie, that existed only to steal, kill, and destroy any hope of a non-Hollywood horror ending, was simply feminism, the philosophical abstraction created by many women and a few men, that cut women off from understanding the nature of man, the nature of themselves, and the nature of anything. Against this destructive soul poison not even the greatest of marriages with both parties possessing the finest of minds, bodies, ambition, funding, and social acumen could last. Nor could their offspring, whether natural or artificial.

Few movies are made as well as this one. Fewer science fiction movies that are rated R that actually deal with real child-raising issues and condemn feminism are made…ever, though with success that trend may change. It's almost like a French film that grew up and married an American sensibility, trading away academic references to obscure authors for a modern sensibility, tighter plotting and a good special effects budget without losing the essential message. Good thing, too, since the last movie I saw by a French director was all about car chases and explosions, though that may have been an anomaly.

Hollywood is getting it. Support this movie and they'll get it that much faster.

State Department Releases Slavery Report, Ignores Problem at Home

Welmer · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

According the to the State Department's latest report on modern slavery, 12 million people around the world are trapped in some form of slavery, including forced labor, bonded labor and forced prostitution. Of course, media reports focus only on forced prostitution, which accounts for only about 10% of modern slavery, ignoring others – mostly men – who are enslaved for their labor.

It is probably the cavalier attitude toward the enslavement of men that perpetuates the barbaric practice, which is arguably officially condoned by judicial systems of Anglosphere countries through family law court orders.

The hypocrisy of a country that presumes to condemn slavery when it forces millions of men to pay their ex-wives under threat of imprisonment should not be lost on any man who has been divorced and lost his children.

The US alimony and child support system could fairly be described as debt bondage, in that men are often saddled with payments they cannot meet, and then face increasing restrictions on their freedom of movement, and finally face real imprisonment for debts they cannot afford to repay. It may be that, under the bonded labor category of slavery, the United States enslaves more people than any other country on earth.

Conservatives Celebrating Feminism

Welmer · 16 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Ross Douthat recently wrote an article for the NY Times that basically endorses feminism, saying that conservative female candidates are proof of its success. Whether or not women in high offices is a good thing I'll leave up to individuals to decide, but there's nothing benevolent about feminism, which is at its core a supremacist ideology.

Only a couple decades ago, the idea that conservatives would embrace and support feminism would have been ridiculous, but here we are with Palin declaring herself a feminist and male conservatives emphatically agreeing and supporting her:

> The question of whether conservative women get to be feminists is an interesting and important one. But it has obscured a deeper truth: Whether or not Palin or Fiorina or Haley can legitimately claim the label feminist, their rise is a testament to the overall triumph of the women's movement.
> What Tuesday's results demonstrated, convincingly, is that America is now a country where social conservatives are as comfortable as liberals with the idea of women in high office. More strikingly, they're comfortable voting for working mothers — for women publicly juggling careers and family obligations in ways that would have been unthinkable for the generations of female leaders, from Elizabeth I's Virgin Queen down to Margaret Thatcher's Iron Lady, who were expected to unsex themselves before being entrusted with the responsibilities of state.

The real problem with conservatism is exactly what its name implies: it seeks to "conserve" whatever happens to be the standard value system. In the Soviet Union in the 1980s, a Stalinist Bolshevik would have been a conservative. In North Korea, a hardline follower of Juche thought is a conservative.

In America today, an androphobic feminist who supports female supremacy can easily be a conservative.

I and readers who oppose the feminist status quo are considered wacky radicals who are not right-thinking Americans. We should properly be cheering every time a man's wife leaves him and takes his children. We should be clamoring for more severe extrajudicial police responses to men accused by their wives and girlfriends. The disappearance of the American male from college campuses should be cause for celebration, and the rising financial burdens on men even as they are pushed out of employment should give us a feeling of self-righteous satisfaction.

This is what has become of American conservatism.

The Face of an Abuser

Welmer · 16 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

21-year-old Malorie A. Crisp of Boise, Idaho was arrested on felony battery charges yesterday after beating a man with a cane. Before or during the beating, Ms. Crisp attempted to disable the man's telephone to prevent him from calling the police.

Given that the man was beaten with a cane, it is likely that he was elderly or disabled and Ms. Crisp seized his cane in order to give him a more severe beating.

According to women's groups, abusers like Malorie Crisp do not exist, because domestic violence is all about perpetuating the patriarchy. Therefore, when a woman assaults a member of "the patriarchy", it cannot possibly be domestic violence. Note how the article states that she was arrested for "aggravated battery," whereas if it were a man arrested during a "domestic dispute" the police report would have indicated "domestic violence." This is one method by which domestic violence rates are skewed to make it appear that women do not perpetrate domestic violence.

In other news in Boise, a woman assaulted a store employee to help a shoplifter.

Woman Kills Ex-Girlfriend, Uncle in “Domestic Dispute”

Welmer · 16 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Kim Wolfe, a Nassau County corrections officer, allegedly shot and killed her ex-girlfriend, 45-year-old Stacie Williams, and her 56-year-old uncle in separate events this morning. She also gunned down her 88-year-old grandfather, but he was not killed.

After opening fire at her uncle and grandfather’s house, she seized her niece, kidnapping her at gunpoint before fleeing the scene.

After a womanhunt that lasted several hours, police eventually tracked down and arrested Wolfe, finding a 9mm handgun in her possession.

Neighbors and coworkers expressed shock, and reported that they’d never known of any bad blood between Wolfe and her relatives or trouble at work. It is unknown whether Ms. Wolfe’s girlfriend took legal actions against her prior to the outburst, but in many cases rubber stamp ex-parte HROs (Harrassment Restraining Orders) and other legal novelties introduced by VAWA have sparked mass murder.

Interestingly, a high court has just ruled that punitive measures in VAWA apply to gay partners – married or not – as well as to men.

Days of Sperm Donor Anonymity are Numbered

Welmer · 17 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an article in Slate, the practice of using donor sperm to conceive is coming under scrutiny as more donor-conceived children reach adulthood. Many of them, it turns out, are not all that happy about not knowing who their father is:

> Others speak of the searching for their biological father in crowds, wondering if a man who resembles them could be "the one." One donor-conceived adult responded to an open-ended question on our survey by writing: "Sometimes I wonder if my father is standing right in front of me." Still others speak of complicated emotional journeys and lost or damaged relationships with their families when they grow up. One wrote at the end of our survey: "I still have issues with this problem and am seeking professional help. It has helped me to become a stronger person but has scarred me emotionally." Another said, "[I am] currently not on seeing or speaking terms with family because of this."
> Listening to the stories of donor-conceived adults, you begin to realize there's really no such thing as a "donor." Every child has a biological father. To claim otherwise is simply to compound the pain, first as these young people struggle with the original, deliberate loss of their biological father, and second as they do so within a culture that insists some guy who went into a room with a dirty magazine isn't a father. At most the children are told he's a "seed provider" or "the nice guy who gave me what I needed to have you" or the "Y Guy" or any number of other cute euphemisms that signal powerfully to children that this man should be of little, if any, importance to them.

I always thought this would happen eventually. I've known a few women who have conceived with donor sperm, and I sometimes wondered whether these women were really suited to motherhood after all. It may be that many of the problems donor-conceived children report are tied to having somewhat dysfunctional mothers, but one cannot discount the fundamental human desire to know one's origins.

Human religion, culture and art have all been deeply preoccupied with our origins from the beginning, and it must be deeply disturbing to a number of people to have no idea who their fathers are.

Our society has become so radically dismissive of the importance of fatherhood that it may seem absurd to many people that biological fatherhood could matter at all, but the experiences of these children quite clearly suggest that it does matter very much.

Father's Day Fund Drive

Welmer · 17 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The time is upon The Spearhead for another fund drive, as your humble editor is running dangerously low on cash, and needs an excuse to continue devoting a great deal of time to the publication. Father's Day seems like a good time to make a plea for donations, and it's been a while since the last drive, but most of all it is need that spurs it.

Traditionally, I disclose some of the earnings of the site for those who might be interested in how The Spearhead funds itself and pays for expenses, so here's a rundown:

Google ads provide from $160-200 per month. This more than pays for internet overhead, which runs around $100/month, but obviously doesn't leave much over.

Book sales, including Roosh's books and Amazon affiliate sales add, on average over the last three months since the last fund drive, roughly $70/month.

Donations, including those from the last fund drive, provide about $700 per month (averaged), which is obviously the bulk of The Spearhead's income.

So overall, The Spearhead is pulling in just shy of $1,000 per month, and every cent of that is needed. In fact, significantly more is needed, but I'm aware that these things don't happen overnight, and am committed to keeping The Spearhead running as long as I can squeeze by.

There is a good deal more that could be done to monetize the site. Given the amount of traffic The Spearhead pulls in, it could be making significantly more than that, but it seems to me that making the site purely commercial would detract from its mission. Nevertheless, there are still ways to capitalize on the traffic without selling out, and these projects are in development.

As for traffic, the site continues to grow, although at a slower pace than six months ago (which is entirely normal). Monthly stats at this time are:

- 41,000 unique visitors
- 283,000 page views
- 2.8 average pageviews
- 35% new visits
- 46% bounce rate

That's pretty good. Over 40,000 individuals per month are reading The Spearhead, and most of them are returning readers. This means that tens of thousands of people are visiting The Spearhead multiple times every month. Additionally, a 46% bounce rate is quite good, because it means that most people who visit The Spearhead are sticking around to look at more than one page.

I think the site is having wider influence than even these decent numbers suggest. The plight of men in the West is beginning to become a mainstream issue, and I credit the websites and articles that constitute the manosphere for that. People really are starting to pay attention, including those who are comfortably ensconced in positions of power and influence; those who are shielded from the worst abuses of contemporary family law and the excesses of misandry. Articles are showing up in the New York Times, The Atlantic and other influential publications. Our hundreds of articles, some of which have been widely linked, have begun to sway the pillar of public consciousness and open people's minds to the fact that something might be wrong with a society that has somehow organized itself around the principle that men are worthless.

I'd like to thank those who have donated time and effort by writing as well as those who have generously contributed funds. Without the efforts of many people, this site could not have lifted off the ground, and without the contributions from readers it would not be able to offer anywhere near the same volume of content.

So, if you want to see The Spearhead continue to grow and thrive, and you support the effort to bring back perspective and a measure of justice to our society, please help out with a donation. Your help is vital to the operation of the publication, and very much appreciated.

Some readers have suggested setting up a monthly subscription system, which I think is a good idea. I'm going to reveal the details of that in a subsequent post today.

Donations can be accepted through the Paypal link on the main site's front page, or sent to the mailing address below that link.

New Vows for Marriage 2.0

Welmer · 18 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I wrote these up to more accurately reflect the state of marriage today. It's tongue-in-cheek, but largely true. Wedding vows are terribly outdated, and they are part of the problem for young men, who tend to take words at face value. Let them take vows that truly represent the situation they are entering, and then maybe they will be more careful about marriage.

Commenters feel free to add your own version.

Marriage 1.0:

MINISTER TO GROOM:

Do you GROOM take BRIDE to be your wife – to live together after God's ordinance – in the holy estate of matrimony? Will you love her, comfort her, honor and keep her, in sickness and in health, for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse, in sadness and in joy, to cherish and continually bestow upon her your heart's deepest devotion, forsaking all others, keep yourself only unto her as long as you both shall live?

GROOM:

I will.

Marriage 2.0:

Do you GROOM take BRIDE to be your wife – to be shackled to her by state ordinance – in the grim servitude of matrimony, from which there will be no manumission? Will you fear her, labor for her, obey and grovel to her, whether healthy or ill, for her enrichment and your impoverishment, for her betterment and your sacrifice, in sorrow and terror, to worship and continually bestow upon her your life's essence, forsaking yourself, keep yourself in chains and debt to her as long as you shall live?

GROOM:

Help…

Marriage 1.0:

MINISTER TO BRIDE:

Do you BRIDE'S NAME) take GROOM'S NAME to be your husband – to live together after God's ordinance – in the holy estate of matrimony? Will you love him, comfort him, honor and keep him, in sickness and in health, for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse, in sadness and in joy, to cherish and continually bestow upon him your heart's deepest devotion, forsaking all others, keep yourself only unto him as long as you both shall live?

BRIDE:

I will.

Marriage 2.0:

Do you BRIDE take GROOM to be your husband – to own him by state ordinance – in the profitable contract of matrimony, which is yours to rewrite at any time? Will you use him, ride him, emasculate and dominate him, whether healthy or ill, for your enrichment and his impoverishment, for your betterment and his sacrifice, in triumph and contempt, to render him prostrate before you and continually lay upon him your heaviest burdens, indulging yourself, keep him only as long as you please and draw from his labor as long as he shall live?

BRIDE:

I win!

Marriage 1.0:

Exchange of Wedding Rings

MINISTER:

What token of your love do you offer? Would you place the ring(s) in my hand?

May this/these ring(s) be blessed as the symbol of this affectionate unity. These two lives are now joined in one unbroken circle. Wherever they go – may they always return to one another. May these two find in each other the love for which all men and women year. May they grow in understanding and in compassion. May the home which they establish together be such a place that many will find there a friend. May this/these ring(s) on her/their finger(s) symbolize the touch of the spirit of love in their hearts.

Handing ring to the Groom

Marriage 2.0:

MINISTER:

What tokens of mastery and submission do you offer? Would you place the rings in my hand?

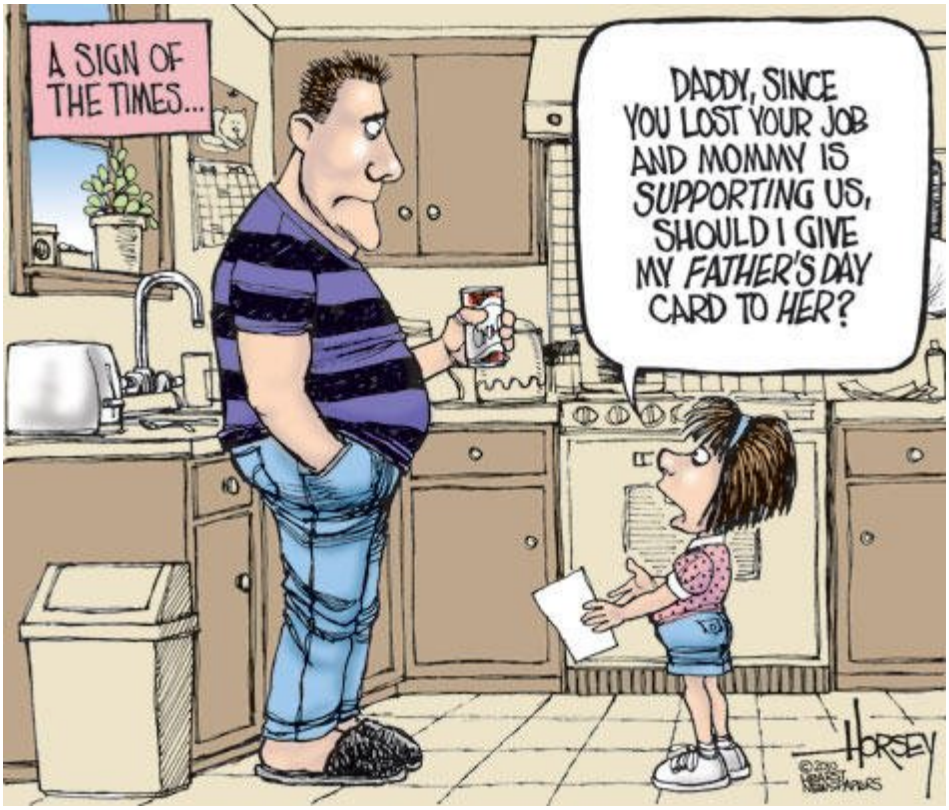
May these rings symbolize the power of family law. These two lives are now arranged in a conditional relationship. Wherever they go, one shall be subject to the other's caprice. May these two be governed by judges in black robes. May they come to understand the futility of resistance to officials. May the home they purchase together be continually accessible to the police, so that GROOM may be removed by the state at any time. May these rings on their fingers symbolize the all-powerful reach of the state. May BRIDE honor the state for its benevolence, and GROOM cower in terror under the iron fist of the law.

Taking hold of GROOM's limp hand and shoving ring on finger.

Seattle Cartoonist Kicks Dads in the Shorts Before Father's Day

Welmer · 18 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It's become something of a tradition to bash men on Father's Day. Police departments stage raids on "deadbeat dads," hauling impoverished men off to jail to humiliate them and guarantee that they won't have any contact with their children, our President gives us speeches about how we men are dropping the ball, and editorials are penned about the crisis of fatherhood that place all the blame on – you guessed it – fathers.



male unemployment is so funny

So I'm not surprised to see a cruel cartoon poking fun at unemployed men, but I do wonder if it will ever end. It can be pretty demoralizing to be exposed to this right before a day that's supposed to celebrate the special, human relationship between fathers and their children.
The truth is that it is very hard on men to be unemployed, broke and struggling, and making them the butt of jokes before Father's Day is in pretty bad taste.

But that's par for the course here in the Anglosphere.

Another Woman Caught Shaking Down Soldiers

Welmer · 19 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Another woman has been caught taking advantage of the bonanza that awaits women who snag military husbands. In this case, Tammy Treat/Patton/Benson, actually managed to pull off bigamy, marrying one soldier, and then after he deployed finding another dupe. While her deployed husband was in Iraq, Tammy took every single bit of his money, and then when he came home and found out she'd married another man she made off with every cent, leaving both husbands in the dust.

Seems Tammy had been married before, and when reporters reached her first husband he expressed no surprise at all at the event, suggesting she was just doing it for the money. Her mother was also contacted, and, of course, blamed Tammy's problems on other people bothering her.

Military Fights to Halt Rising Suicide Rate

Welmer · 19 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

An AP article with a misleading title, "A victory as Army mounts anti-suicide campaign," reveals what is all too frequently the triggering factor in military suicides: divorce. Family law in the US makes it exceedingly easy for women to take advantage of military spouses, offering them a raft of benefits for divorcing their soldier, sailor and airman husbands. Add that to the fact that military wives are notorious for infidelity, and there are bound to be a lot of casualties.

From the article:

> Godding, now stationed at Fort Carson, Colo., and Sanders, at Fort Polk, La., told their story in telephone interviews after Godding received the Meritorious Service Medal for saving Sanders' life.
> The two soldiers were in Iraq together with a 10th Mountain Division artillery battery in 2008 when Sanders' wife said she wanted a divorce, Sanders said.
> "It was mid-deployment. Things were getting pretty hectic at the time, the temperature was rising," Sanders said. "I would mainly call her to kind of vent. She was the only person I had to talk to. She just said goodbye."

The "victory" referred to in the article is one instance of an aware and caring friend preventing a suicide by disabling his fellow-soldier's weapon. We have no way of knowing how many suicides have been prevented by comrades in arms, but there have doubtless been many besides this one. In Army Spc. Joseph Sanders' case, his friend had listened to him make a plea for help by confessing his thoughts of ending his life. Spc. Albert Godding, who took him seriously and took steps to prevent it, obviously did the right thing. Whenever anyone – especially a man – talks about ending his life it is not a joke.

Sadly, too many men are left to deal with very dark thoughts all alone in this day of the casual destruction of men's lives by politicians, judges and wives. Many men have few people to talk to, and many have been conditioned to bottle up their emotions. Additionally, as a culture, we have been trained to feel little sympathy for men, which probably explains the barbaric treatment they often receive at the hands of their wives and the courts.

That suicide is a response to stress and ill-treatment should be obvious, but the fact that men are some four times as likely to kill themselves as women is seldom taken as evidence that men have it harder in our society. When certain policies, such as abusive, anti-male family law, clearly lead to suicide, one would think that decent people would make some effort to change them. However, for all the talk about reducing the suicide rate in the armed forces, I have never seen any evidence at all that any officials intend to make any changes whatsoever to the family law policies that have created this problem.

Rats for Father's Day

Welmer · 19 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Nicholas Kristof, who is currently promoting a feminist book he wrote along with his wife, suggests that donating to charity rather than buying dad a gift is the right thing to do for Father's Day. The charity he has in mind is one that trains giant rats to sniff out land mines in Africa.

Of course clearing land mines is important work, most of which will naturally be done by men, most of whom are probably dads themselves, but one ought to ask whether Kristof would make a similar appeal for Mother's Day. Can one imagine a columnist telling people NOT to buy presents for Mother's Day? Say he wrote that instead of giving mom a gift, a gift should be given to a charity that, say, built biogas latrines in Cambodia. Somehow, I think the editors at the NY Times might have a word with Mr. Kristof about that.

All Mr. Kristof is saying in declaring Father's Day is "a triumph of commercialism" is that Father's Day isn't a "real" holiday. Certainly he wouldn't tell people not to buy roses for their wives/girlfriends on Valentine's Day, or presents for people on their birthdays.

In a way, I agree with Mr. Kristof. Father's Day should be about more than a tie or a card. For millions of men out there, I know they'd happily go without a single gift just for a chance to see their children on Father's Day. For those men away at war, in prison or deprived of their children by callous mothers and a ruthless, uncaring court, no card or small token – not even an enormous, African rat – could make up for the time they've missed.

Happy Father's Day!

Have a great day with your fathers and children, and don't forget the men who, for whatever reason, are away from their families.

“Dad Camp” Empowers Expectant Single Mothers

Welmer · 21 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I was alerted to an article in Feministing about a VH1 “reality” show called “Dad Camp,” in which a bunch of single pregnant women get to decide whether or not to “allow these men [the children's fathers] to be romantically involved with them as they raise their children.”

Of course, Feministing posted this article directly before Father’s Day, which tells us all we need to know about the fine women who run the site. Rose Afriyie, the author of the article, referred to the men as “ain’t-shit baby fathers,” and suggested that absent fathers are inherent criminals. Sadly, a number of conservative men share her view. In fact, Rose’s language exactly mirrors what I could imagine coming out of some bigoted, backwoods judge’s mouth (honesty, I can’t wait until those socon dinosaurs are all in their dotage – or at least retired – leaving the feminists all alone in this world to bray into the wind).

In another parallel with with socons, the poor little pregnant women are portrayed by Rose as innocent victims in this game. Why, you’d think they were all virgins until they were fooled by some sneaky bastards imitating prince charming. Maybe the guys hypnotized the pants off the innocent little things, who surely never had any dirty thoughts ever in their lives.

But what really gets me angry is the automatic assumption that any man who isn’t there with his kids is a deadbeat. So many of us tried to be fathers, married women with the foolish idea that we were “doing the right thing,” and then got burned and unceremoniously yanked out of our children’s lives. By the standard employed by feminists and socons, a man can be a deadbeat whether he marries the woman or not. If he doesn’t live up to her standards, no matter how impossible, no matter whether he physically can, a man is a “deadbeat.” A man whose wife cheated on him, taking his house and putting him out on the street, causing his life to unravel so that he can no longer afford the bills and child support ordered by a judge, is a “deadbeat.” A man who is injured at work and can’t afford child support with his worker’s comp is a “deadbeat.”

They may say “no, we don’t mean you,” but the laws say otherwise. Deadbeat means only one thing: father. It is the only category that is absolutely open to every father in America. You may not be able to see your kids when you want (if at all), you may have no say in who babymomma drags in from the bar at night for some liquor-fueled love in the bedroom next to the kids, but you can always be a deadbeat.

So why should there be a camp for dads? Men have no realistic choice in the matter of whether or not to be fathers to their children. It is all up to the women, so what could this camp possibly be besides a gratuitous exercise of power over the men involved? Well, feministing pretty much gives it away by endorsing the show for “empowering” the single-mothers-to-be. This show merely demonstrates what depths a society will sink to when the highest virtue is “empowering” women — even and especially those who make the irresponsible, selfish choice to become single mothers.

Fluoroquinolone Antibiotics such as Cipro and Levaquin Ruin Lives

Jay Hammers · 21 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Americans are being poisoned on a vast scale by toxins generated by corporations whose only goal is profit regardless of the consequences on humanity and its future. These corporations include but are not limited to pharmaceutical companies and the medical establishment, which thrive on treating illnesses with expensive toxic drugs rather than simple, natural treatments that wouldn't turn a profit.

I stumbled upon all this after experiencing side effects from Ciprofloxacin, a fluoroquinolone antibiotic that is highly toxic to human tissue yet still prescribed like candy by doctors. My side effects have been mild so far (aching joints and muscles, primarily) but were significant enough to drive me to research the causes and treatments for exposure to fluoroquinolones, including Cipro, Levaquin, Floxin, Avelox, and others.

I quickly learned not to blindly trust doctors regarding my health and when in doubt to do my own research. I also learned that the FDA is funded largely by pharmaceutical companies and thus has a glaring conflict of interest, which is why the fluoroquinolone antibiotics have not been pulled from the market despite the debilitating side effects. The FDA had to be sued just to issue an ineffective black box warning regarding only the potential for tendon damage.

The adverse effects of fluoroquinolones include chronic fatigue, tendonitis/tendinopathy, tendon rupture, joint pain, muscle weakness/soreness/fibromyalgia, peripheral neuropathy, muscle spasms, popping/cracking joints, endurance problems, tinnitus (ringing in the ears), heart palpitations, anxiety attacks, brain fog, depersonalization, memory loss, difficulty finding the right word at times, seizures, buzzing/tingling/vibratory sensations, dry eyes/mouth/sinuses, numbness (especially at night), floaters/blank spots in field of vision, depression, and death.

The worst part about the symptoms of fluoroquinolones is that they are not short-lived. They can cause chronic mental and physical pain and disability. They can ruin lives. And the longer you are exposed to them, the more likely you will suffer these "side effects". These chronic ailments are not often connected with the use of fluoroquinolones because doctors often rely on drug reps (salesmen) for their information rather than examining the readily available literature such as the Physician's Desk Reference on the drugs they prescribe, their side effects, and contraindications. Patients are not given informed consent about the dangers of these drugs.

Ciprofloxacin is routely subscribed for urinary tract infections, which affect women about ten times more often than men, even though there are far safer alternatives than Cipro. Lo and behold, fibromyalgia and chronic fatigue syndrome affect women about ten times more often than men, too, and these illnesses just happened to sprout up all over the place shortly after fluoroquinolone use became widespread.

Fluoroquinolones are also routinely prescribed for a variety of off-label indications such as suspected sinus infections or prostate infections. These antibiotics are extremely dangerous toxins that may cause symptoms of severe fluoride poisoning quickly in perfectly healthy individuals. Sometimes they are even given to children or in combination with NSAIDs such as Ibuprofin, which increase the dangers.

Many of the illnesses we see today, such as cancer, were exceedingly rare only 100 years ago. However, toxins introduced into our environment by industry now circulate in our bloodstreams and reside in our tissues. These toxins and irresponsible agricultural practices have robbed vital minerals such as boron from the produce we buy from the supermarket, contributing to many chronic diseases of the heart, body, and mind. It is true that we live longer today and are more likely to be afflicted by cancer as we age, but at the same time carcinogenic toxins that permeate our environment, our food, and our bodies make cancer more likely at any age.

The government's fluoridation of our water supply has exacerbated our insufficient intake of iodine and is suspected as a major contributor to fibromyalgia, chronic fatigue syndrome, thyroid problems, cancer, and various neurological pathologies. Aluminum, mercury, and other contaminants in the food we eat and the cookware we use may lead to chronic diseases such as Alzheimer's and cardiovascular disease. Yet the government continues to allow us to be poisoned and devotes no effort to investigating the ill effects of these contaminants even though research has shown their detrimental effects.

Doctors continue to ignore natural, diet and supplement-based strategies to combat illness, instead relying on poisonous substances to treat the symptoms of disease rather than the underlying causes. One-third of pharmaceuticals contain fluoride, which is toxic to every cell in the body, is not an essential nutrient, and was shown in one study to lower the IQ of children. Fluoride allows chemicals to penetrate human cells more easily and even helps aluminum contaminants penetrate the blood-brain barrier.

The typical American diet provides a breeding ground for fluoride-based drugs to do their damage: we ingest copious amounts of the toxic halides fluorine, chlorine, and bromine from our food and water while subsisting on a diet low in the essential nutrient iodine, which competes against these toxins in the thyroid and other tissues. The FDA's recommended daily intake of iodine is several magnitudes too low for thyroid sufficiency, especially in an environment where most fluids we drink contain added fluoride and most breads and flour contain added bromine. Neither the government nor the medical establishment is willing to recognize or even investigate honestly the disastrous effects such toxins and poor nutrition are having on us. It will be up to us as individuals and small communities to educate and protect ourselves and our families from the physical and mental horrors resulting from fluoride, fluorine-based drugs, and other toxins the establishment callously subjects us to.

If you or a family member suffers from symptoms of fibromyalgia, chronic fatigue syndrome, or an autoimmune disease, I'd urge you to check their medical history for use of quinolone antibiotics. Cipro, Levaquin, Floxin, Avelox are common ones but there are others, although many have been removed from the market due to the dangers. And please never let a doctor give these drugs to you or your loved ones, especially children. There are always safer alternatives.

Limiting one's fluoride exposure (through drugs, fluoridated water, toothpaste, and processed drinks) is important to overall health, but fluoride and fluorinated drugs such as the fluoroquinolones, Prozac, and Paxil are just the tip of this iceberg. The truth is that pretty much everything you can buy at the supermarket is contaminated with toxins. This makes it quite difficult to limit one's exposure to harmful substances.

Dr. Joseph Mercola runs a website exposing much of the dangers of common foods and products. He is a businessman, too, so you may take his advice with a grain of salt. Always do your own research. He does have an excellent article on the fluoroquinolones and the failure of the FDA which I'd urge you to read.

I am actually thankful for my exposure to Cipro for two reasons. First, I was able to prevent my mother from taking a prescription of Cipro which I am certain would have led her to experience chronic joint pain for the rest of her life, if not worse. Second, I am now motivated to protect myself, my loved ones, and my future children as much as possible from dangerous chemicals which prevent people from reaching their full potential by stunting their growth, lowering their IQs, and leading them to an early death.

I'll leave you with a video of Bob Grozier, who lost his family, nearly died, and suffers from debilitating physical and mental side effects from the combination of Cipro and Vioxx, a dangerous NSAID. It is important to note that fluoroquinolones can do their damage alone, even without the combination of NSAIDs.

How Will it End?

Welmer · 21 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of these days the deeply unnatural and aberrant society that has emerged in the West will come crashing down for one reason or another. There's no doubt that it will happen, just as the old society came tumbling down in the Postwar cultural revolution. But how will this end come about? Will it go out with a whimper, with minimal strife and minimal resistance from the regime, or will it end with a bang?

I'm starting to think that there will be some violence associated with the end of America 2.0. I didn't think so before, but violence is usually inevitable in cases of widespread moral outrage and injustice. When one finds cosmetics companies pimping seven year old girls, as Paul Mitchell did by sponsoring a prepubescent sexualized dance, somewhere, someone is going to come unhinged and do something extreme about it.

In the local news, I see an increase in family annihilation killings over divorce; the dysfunctional nature of family law has already started to produce a rather consistent flow of murders, assaults and suicides. Acts of sexually-motivated terrorism, like Sodini's rampage, will probably continue to be quite rare, but the fact that they are occurring at all indicates that something is truly off-kilter.

I don't think the issue of men's rights will be what forces change, but it will be part of a broader discontent that begins to make its way throughout society. I'm not sure when true dissent – as in people on the streets – will begin to show itself, but if the economy doesn't begin to rebound it can't be all that far off. Given the increasing taxation in a time of austerity, I'd guess that there will at least be some pushing and shoving come election time.

If one cares to extrapolate from demographics, there can be absolutely no doubt that the feminist West's days are numbered. Women-dominated societies simply aren't fertile. This has probably always been the case, and explains why patriarchy or other forms of male dominance have been the rule throughout all of recorded history. However, humans have this odd tendency to ignore history, so people always feel that there's something different this time for one reason or another. Well, that just isn't true. We may live in a time of unprecedented technological development and population growth, but the trends are the same as in a hunter gatherer society:

The more prolific tribes always come to dominate in the end.

So the question really is "how will it end?" rather than "will it end?" Will we end it before it destroys us, or will feminism and its associated pathologies be the final demise of Western civilization, ushering in a new era of Sharia, Latin American-style strongman patriarchy, or some modern version of Confucianism?

And, finally, how will it play out? This is all speculation, but sometimes speculating can help us deal with events when they finally occur. And someday they will, so we might as well start discussing postfeminism and what it will mean for us, our children and future generations.

Weekend Observations

Welmer · 21 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I took some time off this weekend as a kind of combined birthday/Father's Day break (my birthday was on the 16th), spending some time with my kids and a cousin who is about to become a father himself.

On Saturday night, I went out with my cousin and a couple of his friends for a night on the town, which is something I don't do very often any longer, having fallen out of the habit when I was married and not having picked it back up again. I'm glad I did get out, because it gave me an opportunity to see how things are first-hand these days for the young and single.

One thing I noticed was that the single are not quite as young in general as they were ten years or so ago. People in their 30s were pretty common, and there were more than a few 40-somethings out there. I'd say that the bar scene is about four or five years older on average than I remember from the late 90s, when the older types usually could be found only during happy hour or working behind the bar. I have no idea why this is, but perhaps there's more leisure time available due to the recession, and maybe the crashing marriage rate has simply dumped more of us back on the market.

Another thing I noticed was the increase in size even amongst the young women. Women have simply gotten bigger, and although men may have put on a bit of heft, it isn't quite as noticeable. Even the fit, attractive young women are bigger. Rather than being naturally thin, a lot of them appear to have achieved a toned body only through substantial time investment in the gym, leaving them rather muscular and solid rather than waif-like. I think my generation may have been the last one with a somewhat normal body size as youths. I'm not sure exactly why women have grown heftier, but I imagine it has something to do with corn syrup sweetener and overuse of antibiotics.

Finally, women are not quite as attractive, due to a combination of factors, the most important probably being the size. Although they wear sexier, tighter clothes than those of the grunge generation, the extra weight around the belly and on the upper arms takes away from the female form by giving them a more man-like physique. I really have to wonder whether there is something in the environment, because when women put on weight these days they tend to do so in the same way men do, at least from what I could see.

Next time I go out I'm going to take a camera so I can document these things.

Dangerous Women

Hestia · 22 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

All of us who spend time at The Spearhead are well aware of the news stories of dangerous women that are featured in the headlines everywhere. We all know that evil women exist and that many laws presently enable their violence and destruction. We often read and discuss the aftermath of their dastardly deeds. As educational as all of this is, it does not adequately equip men or even women to protect themselves from the dark females who may seek to them harm. Evil women come in many forms and suffer with a wide variety of disorders that make them the way they are. Some have experienced trauma that has left them forever damaged. A large group suffers from personality disorders that harm all of the sane people with whom they cross paths. Some are emotional vampires, sucking away all of the life and love from their chosen victims. And some are dangerous, potentially violent sociopaths. No matter what the case may be, these women are dangerous and should be avoided at any cost lest you become their next victim.

Anybody can become the victim of a dangerous women, but men who are empathetic, giving, and compassionate are most at risk. These evil creatures target genuinely kind people as they know their goodness will make them an easy target. A nice person does not want to think ill of another person and will be more likely to ignore their gut instincts that a person with a bit more knowledge about the darkness that lurks in the soul of dangerous women. They may feel guilty for thinking this way and feel themselves to be the bad person when this couldn't be further from the truth. Your naivete and trust will be exploited until you have nothing left to give.

The signs of a dangerous woman are many and may vary depending on what causes her evilness, but most of the below mentioned traits are good ones to be aware of.

The dangerous woman is:

*emotionally immature and a bully
*a drama queen who turns the most minor of life experiences into a Big Deal but cares little about your struggles, trails, and joys *uses guilt and shame to manipulate, oftentimes using this to guilt a person when their gut is saying "run run run!"
*makes you feel emotionally drained after spending any amount of time with her *easily provoked and malicious *may tell stories about having been raped, sexually abused, or a victim of domestic violence in an attempt to gain sympathy *controlling but outraged if you "check up" on her or ask too many questions about herself *uses mimicry to cleverly masquerade as a human with a conscience and empathy *lives in a fantasy world of ideal everything and cannot tell truth from fiction *is exploitative, always asking for favors but does nothing in return; a taker in relationships of all kinds *possess a tremendous amount of entitlement and treats others as if they are lesser than her *envious of others and vindictive towards those who better their lot in life or are better looking, more talented, more successful than her

This list is by no means exhaustive but is a start of warning signs to look out for when you cross paths with a suspicious woman in your life, somebody seems "off".

If you do run into a woman like this there are some beginner steps to remove yourself as her prey:

*Get away as quickly as possible.
*Accept that some people truly have no empathy and conscience, do not operate like the rest of us, and can never be understood. You have done nothing to cause this and cannot control the behavior of this sick woman. Do not redeem the unredeemable.
*Do not engage this woman, try to rationalize with her, or allow her to bully you into feeling badly about yourself.

Instead get yourself out of their clutches and to safety.
*If you are already involved with her, share with those closest to you what is going on so that they may help with potential damage control.
*Document everything the dangerous woman does to attack you. Keep emails, voicemail messages, and other contact. Advise friends and family to do the same.
*Refuse any further contact with the evil woman, even if she is attempting to provoke you. Her attack may be vile, but remember nothing she says is true. Do not back down from your “ignore her” campaign and enlist people to help you keep up your resolve during moments of anger and weakness.

Female predators not only lurk in the real world, but online as well. The cyberbully and troll are two very common forms of dangerous women who target men online. While these varieties of dangerous women are typically less lethal than their offline sisters, they can still rob you of emotional energy and steal away bits of you. Avoiding these women and refusing to engage with them is your best means of defense. They derive pleasure from your anger and upset and will be ruthless in trying to make their fun at your expense.

I sincerely hope that none of you ever run across a dangerous woman, but just in case take the time to prepare yourself so you can be protected should such knowledge ever be needed. Better to know your enemy and never come across her than to experience the opposite!

Philanderers, Pornstars, and Tiger... Oh My!

Featured Guest · 22 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Today's Guest Post by: Alphattude @ http://thewateringholeblog.com

Three stories broke a while back regarding Tiger Woods and his recent harem kingdom of concubines. One being that Tiger impregnated pornstar Joslyn James twice, ending in a miscarriage and an abortion. Her blubbery 'alligator tears' press conference made me want burst out into laughter. A porn star crying about how Tiger Woods didn't love her back, only in America. In addition to this it was reported Tiger paid hush money over a sex tape filmed of him having sex with two women. The threesome tape seemed to be overshadowed by the other two stories, but read about it here. Now onto the third and final story. Tiger Woods made a 15-minute long public apology to his fans, his wife, and most importantly, his sponsors. What looked to be an Oscar award winning performance by Tiger Woods can easily be mistaken for sincerity if you don't read between the lines.

Yes, Tiger Woods apologized to appease the mobs and save his sponsorships; not out of overwhelming guilt for his actions. Whenever this topic of conversation comes up I hear conflicting views from men and what seem to be synchronized one sided opinions from many women. Men that cannot understand this unique situation that Tiger is in (no mortal man really can) side against Tiger. I hear, "Have you seen how hot his wife is?" Yes, yes I have. Also, "I'm all for sleeping with alot of women but not if you're married." <– This is interesting (Michael Jordan, Bill Clinton, JFK, FDR, John McCain, Donald Trump, Morgan Freeman, James Cameron, etc) . Women openly say that they're "disgusted by Tiger, how can he do this?!" What they're not saying is that if given the chance they would also sleep with Tiger Woods, or at least wonder if he would choose them. Women want a man that is wanted by other women. So what truly is the answer here? Was Tiger wrong?

Allow me to read between the lines here and truly take a look at the big picture. Growing up, how could Tiger Woods dream of having the opportunity to sleep with copious amounts of gorgeous women, a chance at fame and fortune, and be his own brand? He was a half Korean, half Black nerd that played golf. GOLF. Do you think he was a world beater in the dating game? I can imagine him getting swirlies and having things thrown at him on the bus. Tiger went to Stanford, not exactly a plethora of attractive females to choose from. He was likely introverted and socially awkward. His market value as a desirable mate probably didn't exist until his early 20's when he started on Tour.

Tiger Woods came onto the PGA scene in the late 90's and breathed new life into the sport, gaining international notoriety and a beloved fanbase. Tiger Woods is an icon. He has charm, charisma, and he's the richest athlete in the world. Read RICHEST ATHLETE IN THE WORLD with 800 million dollars in earnings over his 13-year career. And some guys would settle for being captain of the high-school football team. He will become the first billion dollar athlete when he gets back to golfing. To put this plainly, he can have any woman he wants and any number of them whenever, wherever. He's Tiger Woods.

The only mistake Tiger made was getting married in the first place. He should have taken a cue from George Clooney and Al Pacino. His wife is a beautiful woman, and no doubt is her value close to Tiger's, but make no mistake it is not in equilibrium. She's not the female version of Tiger Woods. Her beauty may fade, but he is and always will be an international icon. Oh by the way, I hear he's huge in Japan!

Tiger shouldn't be held to the same standard as normal people because he is not a normal person. As a society we need to get over this notion of athletes being role models, those days are gone. They are entertainers and in that regard there is none better in the realm of golf than El Tigre. He's doing what any former beta turned alpha male would be doing while salivating at all of the new opportunities that he never could have fathomed. Is he sorry? He's sorry he got caught and sorry Accenture dropped him.

Tiger Woods has moved to the top of the ranks among The Dos Equis guy, Chuck Norris, Don Draper, and Hulk Hogan's leg drop.

Police Kill Woman in Domestic Dispute

Welmer · 22 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A West Palm Beach, Florida man called the police Thursday when his drunk, agitated wife began throwing things at him. The man, Dean Perkins, had left the family home after his wife's display of belligerence, but stated that he did not fear for his life. However, he and a roommate suggested that Veronica Harding-Perkins, Dean's wife, was possibly armed.

Police approached the house in the usual manner – guns drawn and at the ready – and when, according to one officer, she pointed a gun at them, she was promptly shot dead. Usually, when a person is holding a gun, when they suddenly face another the gun does, too. Guns are designed to be held in such a way that this happens unless one consciously avoids it, which takes training and awareness. Therefore, it is all but guaranteed that there will be a lot of shootings when police suddenly approach and surprise armed civilians on their property (I know from personal experience that police use the element of surprise in these approaches and stay out of view until the last moment to gain a tactical advantage).

Mr. Perkins expressed dismay over the shooting, saying "If you know someone has a gun and they're drunk, do you just approach the residence? If they knew she had a gun, what were you hoping to accomplish by walking up to the door? I'm not painting my wife as lily white or innocent, but at the same time, I'm saying the way this was handled was unconscionable."

Unconscionable or not, this is the standard response to DV incidents, thanks to DV legislation demanded by feminists. Rather than allow people, many of whom are likely suicidal rather than homicidal, to calm down, arrests are mandated, and the sooner the better, which has resulted in an unending stream of shootings over "domestic disturbance" calls.

In the large majority of cases it is men who are killed, so feminists probably view these isolated cases as acceptable collateral damage in their crusade to have as many men shot by other men as possible.

I believe in the principle of harm reduction. The fewer people killed, the better. Feminists may point to a lower incidence of DV, but it is clear that this has come at the cost of a great number of extrajudicial executions, and has prompted many murder-suicides as people have grown aware that the likely response to a "domestic" 911 call is a swift and brutal arrest by storm troopers with assault rifles and body armor. It is easy to claim "progress" when none of the killings or violence carried out by the state make their way into crime statistics, but it is a deeply dishonest and inhumane policy to sweep tragedy under the carpet in this manner.

White Knight Tackled, Cuffed and Arrested for Intervening in Spat Between Man and Ex-Wife

Rob Chilson, a 37-year-old white knight from Trenton, NJ, saw a man, Jose Cotto, respond to being slapped by his ex-wife by hitting back and then tried to intervene on the woman's behalf. When police arrived, Mr. Chilson attempted to give them his contact information, but was immediately taken down and cuffed. The ex-wife, Brenda Jimenez, was also arrested for slapping her ex.

Perhaps after enough of these incidents in which white knights are beaten, arrested, shot or otherwise inconvenienced while sticking up for "damsels in distress" such as Brenda Jimenez, these guys will get the message and leave well enough alone. Most women who are involved in an altercation with a man they know are far from the innocent victims feminists would have us believe they are, and getting into the middle of a dispute they may well have started can turn out to be very hazardous to one's well-being.

Unfortunately, there is a recent effort to encourage vigilanteism on the part of feminists, and that will likely lead to problematic outcomes for a number of would-be heros.

Chilson has filed a complaint against the police for false arrest, saying: "I want vindication, I want justice. Not just for me, but for this woman."

As Predicted Here, Van Der Sloot Already Receiving Marriage Proposals

Welmer · 23 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Happens every time. When a guy gets locked up for a notorious murder – especially if he killed a woman – the marriage proposals start flooding in. It's got to be about more than simple fame, because the guys busted for murdering or molesting children don't get the same attention. Perhaps it is simply an extreme manifestation of the inner fantasy so many women have about violent men — men who might do some violence to them. Seems this turns them on.

According to van der Sloot, one of them explicitly stated that she wanted him to impregnate her. Amazing. If women are left to their own devices as far as reproductive choice is concerned, they'd rather have kids with murderers. Perhaps this is where feminism will take us: to a society filled with murderous thugs who, despite doing nothing useful for humanity, will at least sexually satisfy more women than the betas who built the cities that have become their playgrounds.

Does US Family Law Destroy International Competitiveness?

Welmer · 23 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It is common to see reports bemoaning the lack of student achievement in the US, and the fact that US students are falling farther behind other countries in math and science. Corporate executives insist that there are not enough scientists, programmers and engineers to fill the jobs they have, and there are frequent appeals to Americans to study subjects that could prepare them for jobs in these fields.

There will always be a subset of boys who are fascinated by these subjects, and perhaps a few girls, but they are apparently not enough for economic progress. I'm not sure whether to entirely believe the companies that are complaining about a lack of talent, because it seems to me that they would prefer to cut costs by importing cheaper foreign workers on H1B visas rather than develop native resources, but as with most things there is probably a grain of truth in their complaints.

As many have indicated here and elsewhere, boys and men need some motivation to push themselves to strive to succeed. Traditionally, this motivation has come in the form of a (putatively) loving wife and family, which gave men something to strive for. Take that away from a significant portion of the population, and it is little wonder that we see boys and men increasingly skeptical about higher education and the dedicated effort it takes to succeed in demanding fields such as engineering and the sciences. It is, after all, much more difficult to cram equations into one's head than it is to smoke weed and play video games.

Although the old ideal of the responsible young man preparing to raise a family is still held up to young men as motivation, they don't seem to take that quite as seriously any longer. How could they, after all? When around half of them have grown up without their father at home, they must know that there's a good chance they will end up in the same boat as so many of the earlier casualties of easy divorce. Additionally, as they see the attractive – and even not-so-attractive – young women "hook up" with a train of hard-partying, careless guys who would never stoop to cracking a physics text, they must have serious second thoughts about the value of the young women they are preparing to support.

So our bright young man of modest means – the perfect entry-level worker for corporations – is presented with the prospect of living the life of a monk for four years after high school, devoting himself to study and deprivation as slackers and badboys rotate through dozens of the attractive young females all around him on campus. Some may keep a stiff upper lip and power through, but many of these young guys are going to take a look at that and have none of it. A middle-class kid who is facing at least a decade of hard work and virtual celibacy, without any guarantee that he will ever find a quality woman, may well just decide to forego all that effort. Or else he might decide to emulate the players and badboys who are having so much success. In any event, there's a good chance he's simply going to say "forget it."

Now contrast this to the ambitious young man of Bangalore or Hangzhou. Although his country may be inching toward Western decadence and dysfunction, he's still a shoe-in for a virgin bride if he gets a higher degree and a good tech job. His wife will cook and clean for him, bear his children and stand by her man without complaint. She has no motivation to divorce her husband, because her status at home will fall into the toilet, and she won't get the house or kids. In fact, she'll be proud and happy to have a responsible, dedicated and intelligent husband. Her pride and his status will also make him more attractive in her eyes, and the fact that she hasn't had a string of casual sex partners will cement his feelings of love and loyalty for his wife.

Sadly, things are changing for the worse in the developing world as well, but the fact that the opportunity to succeed and have a rewarding marriage is quite realistic for intelligent Asian students tilts the balance in their favor. For Americans, this is all but gone, and virtually guarantees international decline as our young men watch the American dream hacked to pieces and devoured by selfish women and their avaricious attorneys.

As long as there is no reward for ordinary men to strive for success and excellence, there will be few who do, and the Anglosphere will slide from the height of power into mediocrity and civilizational decay.

Gender Wars

Welmer · 23 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Readers may have noticed that I've been posting a lot of articles about the crime and mayhem that the interplay between the sexes causes in the Anglosphere. At first, I thought it might be going a bit too far to highlight this stuff on such a frequent basis, but I've come to notice that rather than exaggerate the problem, it puts it in its proper perspective.

Our society has become so inured to the violence and tragedy caused by feminism and the war on men that we tend to overlook it and pay it little heed, whereas this level of killing, imprisonment, beating and seizure of property is really quite alarming from an outside perspective. For example, I once saw a COPS show in which an immigrant was arrested for DV (DV arrests make up a large portion of COPS' action). His wife had cut him on the face/ear, and he thought he'd diffuse the situation by taking the blame. Of course, he was promptly cuffed and taken to the psycho-chamber that is county lockup late at night. The man was stunned, as though he was in a dream; coming from India, he couldn't believe this was happening to him.

Sadly, none of this surprises us natives any longer. We truly live in a madhouse, and the consequences of that are beamed out of our TVs every day as apparently random acts of brutality, desperation and head-shaking senselessness. It is so common that we hardly notice any longer, as though we were in a war.

In fact, we are in a war of sorts. Back in the 1980s the "War of the Sexes" was a term frequently employed in the press, often with a sort of tongue-in-cheek humor, but today it isn't so much spoken of as it is acted out in a graphic manner in both reality and fiction.

Piercedhead, a long-time commenter, made some astute observations about this:

> One of the more striking differences between men and women is beginning to emerge on TV dramas. 40 years ago, there was virtually no gender on gender killing in a righteous context. Men certainly did not kill women brutally and carry the audience's sympathy. With the rise of women's influence, all that is changing. Women are killing men with their bare hands, and the context is always that they are right to do so (ie defending themselves, the community, the world or simply exterminating a thoroughly despicable man).
> I first noticed the ferocity of it last year in an episode of Battlestar Galactica, where a female officer tortured a male prisoner for hours, the prisoner was then tricked into an admission by false sympathy from another woman, then promptly executed by her. Since then I've seen an escalation of violence on men by women (but never the reverse) so that it's now happening every week. The most common context is a female cop blowing away a male offender, though last night it was an ordinary woman smashing a man's head in with an iron bar after a physical struggle.

This is absolutely true. The number of cross-gender killings on TV has exploded since I was a child, when it was still pretty much unthinkable to portray women as violent. There are many other signs of a fundamental change in society's view of gender roles, and most of them indicate a similar theme of female empowerment; i.e. one that involves the perpetration of violence against men as a ritualistic exercise in enforcing a new norm.

So when you see these articles I put up highlighting the growing strife and increasingly public violence that has resulted from anti-male policies in the Anglosphere, try to put them in the proper perspective: they are essentially reports from the front, intended to keep readers updated on the progress of a war raging in our society.

Why Women Choose Thugs

[Today's Guest Post submitted by Codebuster]

Let's be clear about two things:

• The New York Times poses the question, What do women want? It is well documented that women have rape fantasies;

• Feminists do not want you to know this (duh!). Indeed, at this early stage, evidence seems to suggest that not only do they not want you to know this, but they will implement measures in direct contravention of their cherished free speech traditions to ensure that you are denied the right to know this. We should expect the topic of women's rape fantasies to become the new taboo. But I digress.

We've covered the topic of rape fantasies before on Welmer's website, so we really don't need to revisit it in detail. Suffice it to say that I and the rest of us at The Spearhead abhor and reject the idea of rape. It is true to say that just because a woman fantasizes about being raped does not mean that she wants to be raped. Most of us will have no problem with respecting such basic rights and we would not wish to deny any woman the freedom to walk the streets unhindered. However, we must face the likelihood that women's inclinations to fantasize about rape must surely predispose them to making certain kinds of choices, whether it's the way that they dress or the men that they choose. Women's rape fantasies speak to the way that women actualize their realities.

What word should we use to describe this dimension of female sexuality? In her Diary II, Anais Nin made the comment, "To be violated is perhaps a need in a woman, a secret erotic need." It would seem appropriate to nominate "violation" as the word that best encapsulates this dimension.

It is nothing new or controversial to suggest that violation features in pornography – for example Frontline hosted a program called American Porn, where the violation to which one star was subjected was not entirely scripted, nor against her will. What is perhaps more controversial was her willing complicity.

Violation, then, is integral to female sexuality, and it manifests itself along a continuum. A woman fantasizes about having her prissy, crystalline niceness violated. Of course there are different contexts, but in terms of primal drives, violation is its essence.

The practical implications of women's rape fantasies

At one end of the scale is the rough stuff. It's why women have rape fantasies. At the other end of the scale is intimacy. It's why women fall in love and why they long to share their sexuality with someone to whom they are loyal. Female sexuality applies to all women, and they make their choices along this violation continuum. There are several implications:

• Every woman has within her the potential to betray and to like the rough stuff. Every woman has within her the potential to be loyal and to like the intimacy. Clearly it dishonours a man to betray loyalty – but it also dishonours him to harm even those who willingly so submit;

• I've seen fine, loyal women who've had everything going for them become sluts and I've seen sluts become loyal and loving partners. I've seen women who have had everything going for them partner up with idiots, only become the trash that they chose, and I've seen women with nothing going for them hit the jackpot by way of a wealthy fool to become entitlement princesses. Of course men also change with the choices they make – but by and large, men seem to be more in control of their destinies than women do. My point? There's complicated stuff going on, quite profound actually (perhaps I'll do a follow-up blog). The only thing that I can assert with any amount of certainty is that women don't understand either women or men anywhere near to the same depth that men do. What women interpret as "empathy" has nothing whatsoever to do with understanding people and everything to do with diplomacy and social engagement;

• Important to understanding women is their reliance on superficial labels. Women don't apprehend depth. They don't have to – it's one of the costs of living lives of entitlement. Contrast this with men who, like our Game specialists, expend considerable effort in understanding what makes people tick. No such demands are placed on women;

• I'm thinking of a friend's daughter as I write this, 17 years old, and her boyfriend. Why do girls from solid backgrounds choose annoying, characterless twerps to impact on their destinies? Think "label". Adolescent males with adolescent priorities, leaving school early to enter the workforce, have their labels sorted out. Of course their labels are short-term and transient, but young, impressionable girls relying on peer acceptance don't see this. What do I mean by "label"? It's the badge, what they stand for, lifestyle – drugs, adolescent fashion statements, maybe as leader of a pack, or maybe as belonging to the "right" pack or peer group. It all comes down to label. This is the stuff of impulse;

• Men typically get their thrills from risk – for example, extreme sports, exciting business transactions, and so on. Women also get their thrills from risk. But where sports or business negotiations are of little interest to them, women get their thrills from risky sex. It's the thrill of the forbidden.

• Nice guys don't do the rough stuff, and raunchy sex with a nice-guy is a contradiction in terms. That's why casual sex with a nice guy doesn't do it for women. That's why a woman being pumped by a nice-guy is much more likely to want to get it over with, and she has to restrain herself from blurting out "aren't you done yet?"

• Only thugs or bad-boys can deliver on the rape fantasy. The most successful PUAs are the ones that can manage that fine line between thrill and fear. If a man spooks a woman and fails to appease her fears, she'll jump to conclusions and dump him without having the faintest notion of what he stands for or what he is. But if he comes across as too safe, if she cannot respect (fear) him, he'll become invisible to her as just another nice-guy. He'll become just another piece of that vague, amorphous mass of beta-hood, another piece of the furniture. This interface between thrill and fear presents to the seasoned PUA a fine balancing-act that calls upon all his skills in psychology, deception, confidence and charm;

• Bad-boys are more likely to initiate, and this simple fact swings the statistical outcome in their favour. Most men learn fairly early on in life that if you hesitate, opportunities will pass you by. Women don't have to confront the ramifications of this basic dynamic and it is another manifestation of their lives of entitlement that precludes them from having to take responsibility for their dumb choices;

• Game theorist David DeAngelo observes that "Most men fail miserably when it comes to online dating." I disagree with David on this. It's women that fail miserably when it comes to online dating. They don't have a clue, they jump to conclusions on the basis of limited information. In one sense, we can't blame women because they have to somehow sort through the large numbers of men that are available. But in another important sense, women are essentially incapable of making astute judgements in the way that men can. And they multiply their ineptitude with their vacuous shopping-lists of requirements that bear no relationship to the Game techniques that can ultimately snare a date – on this latter point, we can definitely agree with David. You can virtually ignore what a woman states in her profile, and you will have much better luck, instead, snaring her with a bit of Game;

• Women realize, at some fundamental level, that they cannot compete with men on an intellectual basis, try as they might to deny it. Women have serious esteem issues that are very different from men's. Where men typically test themselves against reality's slings and arrows, women test themselves against the opinions of others (recommended keyword search – "relational aggression" "social proof"). One of the consequences of women's fragile self-esteem is the Groucho Marx syndrome "I don't want to belong to any club that would have me as a member". That's why many women are inclined to submit to the thugs that assert themselves. If he doesn't respect her, it is clear to her that he has the superior status that she values in a man;

• Within the context of male-female interactions, a nice-guy can make an ideal marriage partner, whose provider status can ensure a steady income for the rest of a woman's life. Nice-guys don't make demands, they pedestalize their wives, and they embrace their provider roles without complaining. But a nice-guy beta is never ever sexy, he never stirs the violation instincts of anyone. He is only ever "useful" as an agent of materialism;

• Women are more inclined to assume things than to question them. They are more likely to jump to conclusions about things, such as people's intentions. It's an extension of the mindset that relies on labels. Women don't have their delusions tested. Reality changes things and a bit of rough stuff can have the effect either of awakening a thrill that a woman never knew existed, or compelling her to retreat into a shell of frigid denial;

• How can we know this stuff? You can't ask a woman directly, not so much because she'll lie about it (though yes, they will lie), but more because she won't understand your reference point, she has no way of expressing her experience from a perspective that means something to you. You have to pretty much infer this stuff from a lot of observation, listening to women talk, and reading between the lines. You have to imagine how you yourself would alter your thinking if you were limited to a life of provided-for entitlement. Reading novels by women helps, because it can shed light on what they value and fantasize about. Reading philosophy by men helps, because philosophy concerns itself with probing analysis, and how it is that reality is perceived the way it is. Probing analysis is just not what women do.

The bottom line? The reason that women choose thugs is not a mirage. It's not a product of arbitrary statistical processes. There are very specific reasons why women choose thugs. Of course within the violation continuum, there are shades of gray and complex reasons that are factored into why women choose the men they do. But the point that I make here is that casual sex, at one end of the continuum, receives its motivations from instincts that are alien to what most men assume. Men have to come to terms with the nature of female sexuality and its relationship to violation and the forbidden. There is a direct relationship between violation, rape, female arousal and love. There is no such thing as "nice" violation. The rough stuff, at its most primal level, requires a thug. By contrast, love requires an archetype that is discouraged within the Anglosphere, wherein alphas – or at least paper alphas – go some way to filling the void. Nice-guys might make reliable providers, but they cannot be associated with respect, and they don't fall into either camp. They are just "useful" drones, as expendable as cannon-fodder in the battles instigated and headed by alphas.

It is perhaps valuable to conclude this post with a quote from another era, to take note of the timeless parallels that seem to be implied:

> Very deep-seated differences are linked with what I have been describing. The mother-woman craves for respectability in the man, not because she grasps its value as an idea, but because it is the supporter of the life of the world. She herself works, and is not idle like the prostitute; she is filled with care for the future, and so requires from the man a corresponding practical responsibility, and will not seduce him to pleasure. The prostitute, on the other hand, is most attracted by a careless, idle, dissipated man. A man that has lost self-restraint repels the mother-woman, is attractive to the prostitute. There are women who are dissatisfied with a son that is idle at school; there are others who encourage him. The diligent boy pleases the mother-woman, the idle and careless boy wins approval from the prostitute type. This distinction reaches high up amongst the respectable classes of society, but a salient example of it is seen in the fact that the 'bullies' loved by women of the streets are usually criminals. The souteneur is always a criminal, a thief, a fraudulent person, or sometimes even a murderer.
> I am almost on the point of saying that, however little woman is to be regarded as immoral (she is only non-moral), prostitution stands in some deep relation with crime, whilst motherhood is equally bound with the opposite tendency. We must avoid regarding the prostitute as the female analogue of the criminal; women, as I have already pointed out, are not criminals; they are too low in the moral scale for that designation. None the less, there is a constant connection between the prostitute type and crime. The great courtesan is comparable with that great criminal, the conqueror, and readily enters into actual relations with him; the petty courtesan entertains the thief and the pickpocket. The mother type is in fact the guardian of the life of the world, the prostitute type is its enemy. But just as the mother is in harmony, not with the soul but with the body, so the prostitute is no diabolic destroyer of the idea, but only a corrupter of empirical phenomena. Physical life and physical death, both of which are in intimate connection with the sexual act, are displayed by the woman in her two capacities of mother and prostitute. (1906: 233-234)

Textual Harassment

Welmer · 24 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A new, insidious and traumatic form of harassment is striking fear into the hearts of women across the West: phone text harassment. According to an article in the Washington Post, women sometimes receive up to 100 texts in a day from their stalkers. Sometimes the texts even come during dinner, and the women feel "compelled" to reply. Somehow, there is a strange force that prevents the women from turning their phones off…

According to Claire Kaplan, director of University of Virginia's sexual and domestic violence services, harassment is "just easier now, and it's even more persistent and constant, with no letting up."

In some murders, police have (shockingly) found threatening texts sent to the victim.

I'll admit that I don't text. I think it's a waste of time and a poor substitute for a real conversation. I also find the messages inane and annoying. However, it is a very popular practice with the younger set.

What I find most ridiculous about this article is that if anyone doesn't want a text, they can simply turn off their phones, or ignore it. In fact, that's what bothers me most about texting: you never know whether someone has actually bothered to read it. It is one of those forms of communication that females love because they have complete control over whether or not they choose to respond. It is indirect, and therefore right up their alley. One could text a woman ten times before receiving a response, if ever, and I can say with some certainty that a lot of women would really enjoy getting numerous messages pleading with them to answer.

Texts are stored electronically and easily available to police. They have been used many times to track down criminals, and provide a very effective source of information for detectives. If anything, texts should deter rather than encourage crime. However, I imagine that the manner in which some women use texts might provoke some people.

Whatever the case, this article is simply another example of feminists hyping up a non-issue. If the girls don't want texts, they can turn off their phones, or even get rid of their phones. Or how about cancel the texting plan and talk to people like ordinary human beings?

This is what makes it all worth it

Welmer · 24 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I get emails quite frequently, and they are much appreciated. There are legions of men out there who are starting to wake up, and that always gives me a boost. However, nothing quite does it like a young man who has awaken to what he faces. When I hear from these guys I know I am doing something objectively good.

Therefore, I am happy to post this email, which ought to let us know that our efforts are not in vain:

> I turn 23 this August, and I have been fighting with my depressed bi-polar girlfriend for 3 years now. I just want you to know that I have been reading your site for four days now, and, well I fucking love you man. Seriously, just by reading the articles here you have solved a multitude of my personal relationship issues. I feel like I finally understand the world I live in, and you need to know that more men in my age need you to keep writing. No matter what happens you have my total respect for facing the issues head on, without letting any social or political prejudices cloud your work.
> My whole drinking party has been busy this week discussing the content here, and I think we will be for a long time.

We are making progress, and it will be measured by the choices of younger men. We have an undeniable responsibility to them, and it is reassuring to see that we are having some influence.

Awareness Rising

Hawaiian Libertarian · 25 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Welmer's article regarding the recent email he received from a young man was inspirational to read. This is what makes it all worth it, indeed! It was a nice reminder for me as to why I myself decided to begin blogging about Men's related issues in our Brave New World Order over 3 years ago, and still find the motivation and new angles to continually write about. It's precisely why I decided to jump aboard and help contribute to The Spearhead when Welmer first requested for contributor's. Let's keep paying it forward, Men!

It's good to see all of this time and effort put into this place making real world results. Some of the ideas put forth by registered members of the forum on that thread were also good at helping to continue to raise awareness by writing the Spearhead URL in public restrooms and printing up business cards are all good methods of continuing to build momentum and helping more and more men "Take the red pill" and wake up to the reality of the Feminist-designed Matrix that is our mass media influenced culture of today. Those ideas and suggestions also reminded me of one of the first posts I made when I began my own blog back in 2007, which contained some of my own ideas about spreading awareness of Men's Right's issues.

So, in the spirit of that post and the excellent commentary, here's my own suggestions I came up with back when I first "took the red pill" myself, and began trying to get others to take the red pill as well.

MRA in Your Personal Life

Originally posted on August 1, 2007

I am of the opinion that being an MRA carries a responsibility to it that requires far more than logging on to the internet and raging on your blog about the unfairness, inequality and stupidity of feminists and their useful idiot manginas. Don't get me wrong, the proliferation of MRA blogs is vital in raising awareness, because it seems to be the only venue at this time in which MRA ideas can be discussed and disseminated to a wide audience, as almost all other mediums of communication have been corrupted by feminist groupthink and PC conventions. I myself lived a life of ignorance and just kind of went along with the general theme of feminism's ubiquity in the mainstream Western consciousness until I discovered MRA blogs.

What I'm trying to say is that Blogging about MRA, and reading other blogs daily (as I do,) is important, but it is ONLY the first step.

The next, more important one is this: each one of us that have attained awareness to just how corrupted society has become with the advent of feminist ideoloogy and it's pernicious influence on the relationship between the sexes, the justice system, the family courts and society's general attitudes and acceptance of misandry have a responsibility: we all have a personal duty to be ambassadors of men's rights in our real world lives.

This responsibility is one that really does not require much…but if we are ever going to take MRA beyond existing as a minority movement occupying a small niche in the blogosphere, it's gonna take what every grass roots movement needs to succeed: the successful transmission by word of mouth.

Because feminism has infested and corrupted just about every level of Western society, it is indeed a monumental task for us to take on…but as the old saying goes, every long journey begins with the first few steps.

But the most important thing to remember is this: no matter how hopeless it seems, we MRA have the ultimate weapon on our sides in combating the rising tide of feminist thought…the truth.

Truth is our ultimate weapon, and we need to wield it wherever and whenever it is prudent to do so. This means we need to speak up when we can to help raise awareness of the ignorant and to counter feminist myths that are repeated as facts, and to identify and counter the folly of misandry whenever we encounter it in the real world. This, I believe, is far more important than blogging.

We MRA need to be especially mindful when misandry and feminist thought surfaces in the words and actions of people closest to you; because these are the people that you will influence the most, ESPECIALLY if you are not overt, aggressive or confrontational about it. In fact, I believe you will be far more effective by applying humor and teasing when dealing with the subtle misandry of people you are close to.

With that in mind, it is the following scenarios for which we MRA need to be on the look out for as opportunities to strike a blow against feminist ideology wherever and whenever possible.

 Whenever you hear women in your life reflecting the general misandry of our culture — you should speak up and correct those erroneous assumptions.

I was at a party a few weeks ago, and a few of the women in my peer group had gathered in a corner of the room to talk, and I overheard one of the ladies, who was my good friend's live-in girlfriend and mother to their daughter say "Oh David can babysit Lisa (there daughter) so we can go shopping." (Not their real names, of course).

I interjected politely that since he was Lisa's Dad, he wouldn't be babysitting, he would simply be raising his own daughter. All of the women gave me curious looks and a little uncomfortable giggles, but she did acknowledge that I was right. The point is I planted the seed of doubt in the common feminist attitude in all of these ladies minds…the next time they hear another woman refer to her children's father as a "babysitter" perhaps my point will stick in their mind.

 Whenever you are watching TV with family and/or friend's, and the typical misandrist theme manifests itself, say something, no matter how subtle or small.

This one especially applies to the common Hollywood fantasy of a single women defeating a larger, stronger man (or worse, yet a group of men) in hand to hand combat. I'll always say something like "Oh yeah…that was REALISTIC" while rolling my eyes.

If the typical "Dad is a buffoon, mom is superwomen to the rescue" theme appears, I found the best counter is "Good thing MY/Your Dad is not that dumb or incompetent, he would have handled that with no problem!"

Such subtle messages can be an effective counter that can possibly cause at least a little cognitive dissonance in the minds of women who generally think in the misandrist terms society has indoctrinated them too.

 Be aware of how women manipulate men, than DO NOT ALLOW THEM TO DO IT UNCHALLENGED. Especially when it is sisters, friend's, girlfriends or spouses. who use this tactic.

I know plenty of women that will often make off-hand remarks of how they are strong, independent and don't need men to do things…until a spider or centipede appears; and than they are screaming and running and asking the nearest male to take care of the nasty critter. That's the best time to playfully remind them as you are killing the bug "I thought you don't need a man to take care of you?"

Same goes for women who act helpless to get men to do some particularly dirty or heavy task. If a female family member or a female friend who I do like tries this tact to convince me to do such things, I'll often do them (if I genuinely like/love her) – but I will call them on their tactics first. I'll say something like "No need to act like a damsel in distress, just ask me straight!"

Unpleasant tasks that females don't want to do also represent the perfect opportunity to remind them of any of their misandrist statements they've made in the past. For instance, one of the most over-used phrases I hear from women in my life is some variation of the "There's too much testosterone in this room," comment. So when the opportunity arises, use their own comments against them…. "Yeah, alright, I guess there wasn't not enough testosterone in the room to take care of this until I got here."

 Whenever you do a favor or give a gift for a woman in your life, and she acts like she was entitled to it, immediately call her on it.

An exaggerated “YOUR WELCOME YOUR HIGHNESS” while bowing deeply to them gets that point across fairly well.

 Whenever you have women in your life complain, demean or degrade the men in their life, turn the tables on them.

It seems like getting together and grumbling about the men in their lives is one of American Women’s favorite past times, and even the nicest, smartest, happiest and non-naggy/bitchy women I know of will indulge in it if they are amongst a group of women who are also doing it.

If I hear a relative or friend say something like “He’s such a dummy” I’ll instantly pipe up “Well who’s the dummy that married/moved in with/had kids with him?”

In summary, feminism and misandry have infested and corrupted society on just about every level, and even women in our lives that we love will in fact reflect this frequently with little comments or actions on occasion. By not letting any opportunity go unchallenged, while not being off-putting and aggressive to the women that otherwise do respect and value your opinions, you can at the very least raise awareness in women who otherwise wouldn’t give their thoughtless misandry and feminist-influenced attitudes a second thought.

Feminist Coup Down Under

Featured Guest · 25 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post was written by Aussie Antifeminist]

In the most dramatic day in Australian politics since the dismissal of a Prime Minister in 1975, today Australia got its first woman Prime Minister. But, today was not an election day… 24 hours ago, the Australian public had no idea that there would be a new Prime Minister. A brief primer on Australian politics is in order: In the Australian political system, the people are not given the right to directly elect the leader of their country. Instead, people vote for their local member of parliament, and the political party that has the most members of parliament elected takes government. The elected members of parliament, of the party currently in government are the only people who get to vote on who leads that party, and whoever leads that party becomes the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is also a local member of parliament, and must fist win his local seat in parliament to be eligible to be leader of a party. There are no primaries, as political parties internally decide on the person will stand as a candidate to be a member of parliament for their party.

By the time any candidate is offered to the people to vote on, they must have the blessing of the internal party power brokers. Currently the leftist Labor party holds government, and internally this party has an affirmative action policy when it comes to who is offered to the people as a Labor candidate for the seats in parliament. An imported gift from the feminists of the United States, is the Australian version of the pro abortion Political Action Committee EMILY's List, who took advantage of the absence of primaries in the Australian system, and convinced the Labor party to institute a feminist affirmative action rule which mandates females be handed the right to stand for Labor in 35% of seats, regardless of the merit of any male candidate.

For you Americans, I'll make an analogy, imagine if you had lived in a particular city all your life, and had given much to the community, but you believed in the tenets of the Democratic Party and wished to stand in a primary to become a congressman. Now imagine if the DNC leader told you 'sorry, this is one of the congressional races we've earmarked for women only as part of our EMILY's list affirmative action quota'… that is what happens in Australia.

One of these female candidates in the 1998 election was a foreign born, 36 year old, childless, never married feminist lawyer at an ambulance chasing personal injury law firm, this woman was named Julia Gillard. In college she was the leader of the Socialist Forum. Her party lost the 1996, 1998, 2001 and 2004 elections to the conservative John Howard led Liberal party which dominated Australian politics for almost 12 years until late 2007, when the Labor party took government. Despite Australia's political system, come election time, the people do in a very real sense make their decision on which party to vote for based on the party's leader, even though as I said, the people do not decide who leads each party. Campaigns do take on a presidential air, and generally when Australians vote for a party on election day, they expect to be choosing between two alternative Prime Ministers for a three year term. They have come to expect leadership stability, especially in the first term of a government.

Before the last election, the Labor party internally voted for Kevin Rudd to be its leader, and for Julia Gillard to be deputy leader, as she was Kevin Rudd's preferred deputy leader. No male party leader could get away with not having a woman deputy leader in these feminized times. So in 2007 the Australian people voted for a new Prime Minister, Kevin Rudd, and its first female Deputy Prime Minister, Julia Gillard. Kevin Rudd was a very popular prime minister during 2008 and 2009. He had record popular support in the opinion polls. In 2010, things fell apart, the government lost a lot of support after various policy disasters, the senate blocked a global warming tax, cap and trade, and a failed scheme to hand out free roof insulation for homes killed four young men who were electrocuted to death installing insulation, after the government artificially inflated the market, causing firms to rush to hire more hands, and setting deadlines for the free money that didn't leave time for adequate training of new insulation installers, many houses also burnt down, due to the foil insulation being laid on top of live wires, and thousands of Australian homes are still unsafe, old ladies have been burned and more people may yet die in fires, billions were wasted on this.

As usual, men are the ones that do the dying. Julia Gillard was also education minister during these recent years, and she wasted 15 billion US dollars on a failed scheme to build public school buildings, and construction firms saw dollar signs, and charged three times the price for the buildings, a huge scandal that saw schools get forced to accept unwanted multi-million dollar gymnasiums, when they needed classrooms, typical bureaucratic bungling. Then in mid 2010, the government tried to force a 40% tax on the mining industry, Australia's most important industry. Of course, thousands of men stood to lose their jobs, a huge backlash came, as mining threatened to go overseas where they would not face such unfair taxation. A new leader of the opposition Liberal party emerged, conservative Tony Abbott, and the polls started to go downhill for the government. An election is due in November this year, but will likely be called earlier by the new usurper feminist affirmative action Prime Minister, as she tries to capitalize on the honeymoon period she will get in the polls, and mindless sexists who will vote for her just because she's a woman.

So given Australia's internal party leadership rules, Julia Gillard saw that she could capitalize on the unpopularity of the government and the Prime Minister, so last night, she walked into his office, flanked by her mangina sycophants in the Labor party, and the news started to break all over Australia that she would this morning challenge him for the right to lead the Labor party, and so become Prime Minister. So behind closed doors, with the Australian people completely uninvolved, the Prime Minister Kevin Rudd saw that the other Labor members of parliament would no longer support him, and this morning, the party elevated Julia Gillard to the Prime Ministership. Since World War 2, no Prime Minister has not been allowed to complete his first term in office. There was no sex scandal, no high crimes, just pure political opportunism six months out from an election. Basically, in Australia if you're Prime Minister and you're down in the polls, your colleagues can stab you in the back, and within hours, you can be removed from office. Rudd fronted the TV cameras today, literally crying, tears streaming down his face, in High Definition, with his wife beside him (his wife is a feminist who never did take her husband's surname), he was a broken man. The woman he had chosen as his deputy, had now thrown the man elected by the Australian people out on his ass. Maybe the next male Prime Minister will choose his deputy more carefully.

Never a manly man, Prime Minister Kevin Rudd left in tears, blubbering. Tellingly, Kevin Rudd was raised fatherless, after his father died when he was 11 years old. A mandarin speaking former diplomat, he was widely reported in the press as an angry and bitter man. Stories of him flying off the handle at staffers, throwing around the C word at newspaper editors, followed him like a bad smell. His resignation was very hard to watch, seeing the most powerful man in your nation reduced to tears, there was no dignity in it. So now, the Australian people have a new Prime Minister, the first female Prime Minister. In an era of radical feminist career women, I am not surprised that this historical milestone happened to be imposed on the Australian people, rather than the Australian people being offered the right to go to an election and make a choice based on the merits of any potential Prime Ministers on offer.

The Prime Minister of Australia lives in a residence called The Lodge. Many families have lived in The Lodge over the years, and now this woman will move in. Currently she has a 'partner', a male hairdresser, who she does not currently live with. It is of course no surprise that such a careerist affirmative action radical feminist would choose to date such an unaccomplished beta. She reportedly doesn't even cook. One TV special on her showed her apartment, with its empty pantry and fruit bowl on display to all. She has no children and has no plans to, plus she is 49.

In 2007, a controversy arose when a conservative senator said she was unfit to ever lead Australia because she was 'deliberately barren'. A brave comment, and of course, he was lambasted as being a 'dinosaur'. A feminist reporter in the Sydney Morning Herald today wrote "From the suffragettes to Australia's first female parliamentarian Edith Cowan, from agitators such as Germaine Greer and Faith Bandler, women have forced their way into Australia's public life." Forced indeed. Disloyalty is a theme running through the feminized western world, over the past days, she repeatedly publicly stated she was not planning to challenge for the leadership, looked the Australian people in the eyes and consistently claimed she was very loyal to the Prime Minister she has today unseated. She's always talking about the education system, and the kids who deserve the best public schools, of course, she doesn't even have kids. And those schools she claims to care about so much, have been complaining about her wasted billions from the flawed school buildings scheme. As usual, it seems failure by women is rewarded, sometimes it seems, with the highest prize of all.

Labor Senator Claire Moore, co-ordinator of affirmative action group Emily's List, said "I think in many ways it's actually one of those symbolic moments that people are going to look back and say that is something that has been achieved, and as you know Emily's List has been all about ensuring that women are part of the political process," Of course, these women speak about equality but contrast this with their affirmative action man hating policies and you see they are nothing but feminist fascists. So in the wash up, Australians went to bed with an elected Prime Minister, and woke up with an unelected affirmative action radical feminist Prime Minister that was never offered to the Australian people at an election as one of the choices for Prime Minister.

This is a woman who is constantly talking about what she thinks she can do for 'working families', a woman who doesn't even have a family, is now the most powerful person in Australia. It's a pathetic system, blatantly undemocratic, and clearly all too easy to be co-opted by feminist activists. It is a sad day for Australia. In a way, the sooner any nation gets it's 'first' leader of any so called 'oppressed group' out its system, the better. Get it over with, so that maybe one day we can get back to merit based elections, if that will ever be possible during the long decline of the west. Third in line to the presidency in America is Nancy Pelosi, can you imagine one day waking up and she's president? This is a waking nightmare here in Australia today, and I urge all Spearhead readers to keep Australian men and families in their thoughts during this traumatic time.

I think these events speak to an overall theme of the degraded self identity of women in our societies. There is no future in a civilization where the little girls of this world grow into single minded career politicians who eschew all life experience apart from working 16 hours a day with a one eyed ambition toward gaining and wielding power for power's sake. This is a woman who never ran a business, never raised a family, never got involved in a single thing apart from climbing a career path that she hoped would one day lead to her being 'the decider', the kind of aloof arrogance that says 'I know how society should be structured and run better than anyone else', and here we are, she's not earned, but instead seized her prize, the highest office in the land. You can just imagine her getting her congratulatory phone call from Obama and the giddy, shit eating grin that will be on her face. She's got the power, now what? Now it's time for more affirmative action, more man hating, more 'violence against women' programs, more taxpayer subsidized childcare 'stranger-care', more taxes, more spending, more debt, more social engineering, from the unelected radical affirmative action feminist Prime Minister Julia Gillard. Boy, are you people in America lucky to have the constitution your founding fathers created, because ours is clearly utterly worthless. Again, keep your Australian brothers in your thoughts during this horrendous time as we reel from what is essentially a feminist coup.

Al Gore Not Sufficiently Alpha?

Welmer · 26 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Everyone's probably heard about the sexual assault accusation against Al Gore, and I wonder whether it's an indication that the former Vice President just doesn't have sufficient Game with women. It's true that Bill Clinton has been accused of sexual assault by a number of women, but when a massage therapist does so that looks pretty bad. Given their line of work, I'll bet massage therapists are propositioned on a regular basis. If they accused everyone who did so they'd be out of work very quickly, I imagine.

Here's what she says happened:

> In a transcript of the interview, the massage therapist said she had been doing requested abdominal work on Mr. Gore when he demanded she go lower.
> "I was shocked and I did not massage beyond what is considered a safe, nonsexual area of the abdomen," she said. "He further insisted and acted angry, becoming verbally sharp and loud.
> "I went into much deeper shock as I realized it appeared he was demanding sexual favors or sexual behaviors."
> She alleged he later tried to have sex with her.

I'd like to contrast this with what Rielle Hunter, John Edwards' lover, said about her meeting with the presidential candidate:

> Because I had never experienced anything like what was flowing between us. I sat on the other side of the room. I wouldn't go near him. And he kept saying [she mimics his southern drawl], "What are you doin' over there? Come over here. I can't even see you. Come closer. I won't bite you." I was just—there was sooo much attraction and sooo much… I want to say love, but it wasn't love at that point. You know, it was just this, this magnetic force field like I had never experienced. It terrified me. Absolutely terrified me. And, um, I eventually walked over to his side of the room. [laughs] He was pretty relentless. And that's all I'm gonna say on that! Now fade to black!

So, when Al Gore tries to make a move he's accused of rape, but when John Edwards does so he's a "magnetic force."

I wonder what Roissy would make of all this.

Misandry: A Reading List

Featured Guest · 27 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post submitted by EconMan]

So I couldn't sleep one night and randomly decided to come up with a reading list of anti-male books to see how many were actually out there. In fairness, I found a few books that do the opposite, but there are very few and the most obvious one, Dick Masterson's Men Are Better Than Women, is hard to take seriously. In his top ten list of why men are better than women, number 7 is men live less than women, number 6 is men write illegibly and number 3 is boys destroy things… I'm sure exposure to such hatred will ruin the self esteem of countless, impressionable young girls.

Now I guess there are a few book titles that may be considered sexist toward women, such as How Women Manipulate or That Bitch: Protect Yourself from Women with Malicious Intent. But even those are pushing it. Now I have no problem with poking fun at each other, or books with titles such as Women are Crazy, Men are Stupid and Why Men Don't Listen and Women Can't Read Maps. We shouldn't take ourselves too seriously and I think it's fine if men and women make a few sexist jokes from time to time. It takes the edge off. But the discrepancy and double standard here is simply ridiculous. Just look at the list one sleepless night and Amazon.com can put together:

- Why Men Are Clueless
- Let's Face It, Men Are @$$#%\c$,
- Are Men Necessary (the answer is, from what I can tell, no)
- Adam's Curse (men are going extinct and that is a good thing)
- The Descent of Y (ditto)
- Stupid White Men (with a chapter titled "The End of Men" again, that's a good thing)
- How to Get Stupid White Men Out of Office
- Why Women Should Rule the World
- Why Women Should Rule the World (different than previous)
- Why Women Should Rule the World (again, different than previous)
- Men Who Hate Women and the Women Who Love Them
- Christian Men Who Hate Women
- Men Are Not Cost Effective
- Can Female Power Save the Planet: The Fate of the World Depends on Women
- The Future–If There Is One–Is Female (let's go ahead and reduce men to 10% of the population)
- Things You Can Do with a Useless Man
- The Natural Superiority of Women
- The Chalice and the Blade (or as I call it, The Vagina and the Penis, basically matriarchies = peaceful, patriarchies = lots of death)
- Societies of Peace: Matriarchies Past, Present and Future (ditto)
- The Deepening Darkness: Patriarchy, Resistance and Democracy's Future (patriarchy is, from what I gather, quite bad)
- 101 Reasons Why a Cat is Better than a Man
- 101 More Reasons Why a Cat is Better than a Man
- Why Dogs Are Better than Men

- The Fragile Male: The Decline of a Redundant Species
- How to Make Your Man Behave in 21 Days or Less Using the Secrets of Professional Dog Trainers
- Men Are Dogs
- Men Are Dogs: In the Best Possible Way (I guess that's better than the last one)
- Stupid Men Jokes
- Totally Stupid Men
- Why I Hate Men
- Why I Hate Men (different than previous)
- I Hate Men (surprisingly, there is actually a complimentary I Hate Women book in this series)
- I Hate Men (different than previous, but with no complimentary book)
- I Hate Men Who…
- 100 Damn Good Reasons Why it's OK to Hate Men
- Men We Love to Hate
- Why Men Hate Women (because the opposite question obviously doesn't need to be asked)
- Boys Are Stupid, Throw Rocks at Them (yeah there's a short book along with the t-shirt, the complimentary book is Girls Are Weirdos but They Smell Pretty)
- Why Are Men So Bloody Stupid?
- I'm with Stupid (And by that she means some guy of course)
- Rule Number 1: Men are Stupid
- Completely Stupid Men
- Totally Stupid Men
- Men Are Stupid… And They Like Big Boobs
- Man Has Lost His Damn Mind: The Stupid Things Men Do
- Dogs Are Stupid: After All, They're Man's Best Friend!
- Little Book of Totally Stupid Men
- Little White Whys: A Woman's Guide Through the Lies Men Tell and Why
- The S.C.U.M. Manifesto (Society for Cutting Up Men)
- Over 70 Zingers You Can Use to Send Him Packing
- How to Aggravate a Man Every Time
- Ditch That Jerk
- Kiss-off Letters to Men
- A Bad Man is Easy to Find
- Men Who Can't Love
- Why There Are No Good Men Left
- Demonic Males
- No Good Men
- How to Catch Him With His Pants Down: and Kick Him in the Assets (haha, get it?)

- Hit Him Where it Hurts: The Take-No-Prisoners Guide to Divorce-Alimony, Custody, Child Support and More
- He Had it Coming: How to Outsmart Your Husband and Win Your Divorce
- He's Just No Good for You
- Get Rid of Him

- The Woman's Way of Divorce: 101 Ways to Make Him Suffer Forever and Ever
- Beat Him at His Own Divorce
- Cutting Loose: Why Women Who End Their Marriage Do So Well (cough alimony cough child support cough)
- Kick Him to the Curb And Keep On Smilin'!
- How to Heal the Hurt by Hating (hating men of course)

Indeed, that's not the whole of it. I could discuss the innocuously titled Intercourse by Andrea Dworkin, which at the least, implies that all sex is rape. Or in her brilliant, nonsensical way of putting it:

"There is never a real privacy of the body that can coexist with intercourse: with being entered. The vagina itself is muscled and the muscles have to be pushed apart. The thrusting is persistent invasion. She is opened up, split down the center. She is occupied–physically, internally, in her privacy."

Uhhhh, OK. Moving on there's Frances Swiney's Woman and Natural Law which asserts that men were nothing more than a genetic mistake. Of course, there's also the whole body of Catherine Mckinnon's work. Or how about Susan Brownmiller's Against Our Will which states that "[Rape] is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which ALL men keep all women in a state of fear" (emphasis mine). I was under the impression that I thought rape was abhorrent. I was under the naïve assumption that most men detest the idea of their wives, girlfriends, mothers, daughters, sisters and friends being raped. I believed it would be nice to do away with the danger of false allegations. I thought it would be easier to approach women and build trust if rape simply didn't exist. But nope, Susan has enlightened me. Rape, even though it's a crime I would never consider committing, is a weapon I personally use to intimidate and control ALL women.

Given all this nonsense, the title to David Samson's book may sum up the times better than anything I could write: Men Who Hate Themselves and the Women Who Agree With Them.

Woman Abducts American Child to Poland, American Courts Enforce Polish Child Support Order

Welmer · 27 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Gerardo Serrano was ordered to pay child support by a Polish court, and the state of Illinois has frozen his bank account and seized funds to turn over his son's mother, despite the fact that Cook County found her to have "unlawfully removed" the child from America some ten years ago.

This is an interesting case, because the Hague Convention, which I believe Poland is party to, provides for the return of children abducted from their country of residence. However, the state of Illinois apparently cares more about Polish child support orders than international law, and will seize Americans' property to enforce them.

What is most telling is that Mr. Serrano has been found to be the custodial parent by a US court, but the state of Illinois is enforcing a foreign government's contradictory order anyway. For those who care about sovereignty, this may be an issue worth looking into.

Fathers Hold The Key

Welmer · 28 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Having just come off of a few days with my kids, I'm a bit worn out. Dealing with such little ones is hard work. One of the odd contradictions of being a parent is that when you aren't around your kids you miss them terribly, but when you are with them they can drive you nuts. It is this kind of sentiment that leads me to believe that parenting is instinctive for the human male. If it weren't, after all, wouldn't men just abandon their kids? That so many do not, despite the best efforts of so many women and the state to kick men out of their children's lives settles the question.

Here on The Spearhead, we've gone over the reasons men are important to children many times. Men have a civilizing influence, they protect their kids, they instill values that boys need to learn from other men, they teach girls a sense of honor and how to relate to men without resorting to the use of their sexuality and so on.

However, I think there's a far more complementary interplay between men and children. I'd go so far as to say that children need men in order to fully develop as human beings. Deprived of certain aspects of male psychology, kids will miss out on one of the most unique and fundamental characteristics of humanity.

What I'm thinking of here is art. Creation for creation's sake. Drama, music, storytelling, works and industry. The manner in which men relate to the physical world is special and unique, and fundamentally different from women. Physical creativity has always been dominated by men so overwhelmingly that it would be entirely disingenuous to suggest that there isn't an innate difference that has made it so. Of course, that doesn't stop the feminists from claiming otherwise, but their defiance of truth and reality is nothing new.

From the dramas acted out by primitive man with intricately carved masks around the campfire to the frescoes of the Sistine Chapel, this fundamentally male expression of humanity has evolved into a cultural DNA that is passed down from one generation to the next. We see it in architecture, hear it in songs, feel it in the ancient sagas and legends that have marched on through the centuries, surviving as relics from those distant ages obscured by the mist of time.

Every single human society is characterized by myth and art. More than anything else, this is what makes us unique in this world. Chimps can learn to use money and tools, they can make war, they can communicate, and they can count and figure, but they can't paint pictures in their children's minds.

As it turns out, the humans who expend the most effort doing this – the ones who give the overwhelming share of these mental gifts to children – are men. Until I became a father, it never dawned on me what significance this could have for children. We all hear about the importance of reading stories to children at bedtime, and I assumed that was mainly to encourage literacy, so I dutifully cracked the children's books and read away. But over time I grew tired of them, and eventually dispensed with the books and simply made up stories for my kids. I found myself making up tales about supernatural animals, adventures, strange lands, etc. It seems to come perfectly naturally to me, and the kids absolutely love it, and now far prefer my stories to the books. Before bed, we all lie down together and I tell them stories made up on the fly, going into some detail about things that they've never seen or heard of before. Amazingly, they remember them with great clarity, and seem to learn more effectively from these stories than from school, TV or simple instruction. However, what really surprises me the most is how much these exchanges are a part of my own nature — using my imagination to teach children seems to be an innate skill.

Different men will naturally have different strengths and use different methods to teach children, but in the end it all comes down to a form of communication that transcends utilitarian language, which may transmit information quite efficiently, but doesn't seem to "stick" in children's minds. Art takes that information and gives it an extra dimension, creating a canvas upon which children can paint their own images, and giving them a narrative that provides structure for their own stories.

The man who is a builder can imbue his work with meaning, as can the fisherman, the farmer, and even the butcher. Obviously some of them do so quite effectively: Jesus was a builder who drew from his work to drive home his message in parables. Laozi drew from the work of a skilled butcher to explain the effortless nature of the Dao. The Hebrew prophets called forth the imagery of the fields of wheat, the vines and the orchards that all knew and saw every day. Being engaged with the world around us offers us more opportunities to teach and to spark the imagination of children. Today's professional storytellers – the moviemakers, TV producers and so on – are probably significantly less effective at developing and influencing the minds of children than the ordinary men they see around them every day.

Unfortunately, it seems that this human connection between men and children, that crucial human link that separates us from the beasts, has been suppressed in favor a shallow electronic substitute. Perhaps this explosion of mass media and entertainment has simply helped to create the impression that fathers are no longer necessary — what good is the guy when you can just park the kids in front of the TV anyway?

As I have learned from the time I've spent with my kids, there is no substitute. Humans are far more compelling than a flickering screen, and human interaction in service of imagination and learning is far superior to the sterile media to which children are overexposed. Children with an engaged father who unlocks their minds with his own imagination are receiving a nutrient essential to their full mental and psychological development, and men who engage children are fulfilling a role that nature itself has granted them. It may be – and I am starting to believe that this is the case – that the relationship between fathers and children is the foundation upon which human civilization has been built. Without this feature of humanity, we would simply be intelligent beasts living in stasis in a world devoid of meaning and significance save for the fleeting physical and emotional urges that compel us to eat, breed and survive.

The art and imagination of men unlocks gates and frees our minds. For most children, it is their fathers who hold the key, and they must be encouraged and allowed to use it.

NY Times Applauds Trend of Female Violence in Cinema

Welmer · 28 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In an article titled "Tiny but Tough: The Newly Empowered Petites," Maria Ricapito of the NY Times details how petite women are "shattering stereotypes" by shooting people, planting bombs and beating people up. Needless to say, their targets are overwhelmingly men.

Ricapito chalks it up to male fantasy:

> The violent femme, of course, is an enduring male fantasy, a Lolita who just can't help herself around a gun. She also does double duty as a symbol of Grrrl power, particularly when she appears in the form of cute-as-a-button crime fighters like the PowerPuff Girls (cartoon kindergartners whose motto was "Saving the world before bedtime").

However, she lets slip that women such as herself cherish the idea as well:

> It's anybody's guess why these anti-archetypes are striking a chord. Perhaps Americans feel powerless in an era of gushing oil, ongoing wars and a slippery economy, and want to believe that the little people can vanquish the big bad guys. If so, it might be a good sign for the small-stature Elena Kagan, who is, after all, said to wield a mean gavel.

I'd say that the ass-kicking babe is getting kind of worn-out. The theme is overdone these days, and because it no longer offers anything new it no longer feels edgy and risquée. I'm not even sure that it is much of a male fantasy any longer, especially since more men must be noticing that the real women around them are increasingly aggressive in a rather distasteful manner. When so many men have a female HR manager breathing down their neck, I wonder whether they find the idea of being targeted by an aggressive woman all that alluring.

I remember watching Hong Kong movies back in the early 90s, when this violent femme trend was in its infancy here in the US. In the Chinese kung fu flicks, women did a lot of the fighting. Not only were they kicking ass, but getting their ass kicked as well. There were even a number of jokes that incorporated women getting kicked between the legs, falling flat on their faces, being beaten, etc. I wonder whether the Hong Kong movie industry had any influence on the kick ass babe phenomenon here in the US. I suspect it did, but rather than adopt the full range of violence found in Chinese movies it was adapted to American feminist sensibility and the women were portrayed as eternal victors over bad men.

Today, the genre seems kind of flat. There's no balance to it, it isn't funny, and, as the author of the NY Times article suggests, it's heavily politicized.

In short, this stuff is starting to look a lot like ham-fisted propaganda of the Soviet sort.

British Woman Jailed for False Rape Allegation

Welmer · 29 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Bernadette Kore, a 29-year-old mother, was sick of her husband and decided to get rid of him somehow. Although her reasoning seems a bit confused here, perhaps because she was drunk, she decided that making up a story about a stranger rape might do the trick, so she invented a violent, gruesome rape and told her story to police.

She said she had been attacked at a nightclub by two men, and although she didn't name anyone, a couple guys were later arrested. As her lie grew, the young men went through the customary hell until she finally admitted she'd made the entire thing up.

Finally, she ended up being sentenced to 18 months by Judge Alasdair Darroch, who chided her for causing serious damage to the lives of two innocent young men.

In contrast to the US, British women are actually being sentenced for making false rape claims, which have become enough of a scandal that the new government is considering granting anonymity to the accused. "Victims" have been granted anonymity for 35 years now, which seems to give women the sense that they can use rape allegations as a weapon against men, including innocent ones.

Feminists are strongly against anonymity for the accused, but support anonymity for accusers. In this sense, they advocate punishment before conviction, because a public rape investigation is extremely traumatic for men, whether guilty or innocent.

Women Leaving their Husbands for Vampires

Welmer · 29 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

An article on Yahoo! Movies somewhat misleadingly states: "Twilight Fans' Vampire Addiction Affecting Relationships." The problem with the article is that it doesn't explicitly spell out which parties – husbands or wives – are wrecking the relationships in favor of their imaginary vampire lovers. Obviously, the vast majority of "Twilight" fans are female. A Spearhead author, Whiskey, has already detailed the hysterical devotion felt by female fans for Twilight, and I suspect most of our readers can figure out what's going on here, but I think I'd be negligent if I didn't highlight the facts.

Vampire romance is the aqua vitae of female fantasy — it is all the sweat of women's desires collected and distilled into a bloody, intoxicating cocktail from hell. The lovers are superhuman, they are murderous killers, and they can impregnate women with transhuman sperm. Also, they can fly around and are not bound by the laws of physics, which gives them a magical, feminist flair. And, furthermore, there is an eternal battle between the beautiful, androgynous vampires and the hypermasculine werewolves, which gives the tale a double-whammy butch/pretty-boy tallywhacker of an approach that is absolutely guaranteed to itch whatever scratch the female fan may be feeling at any given point in her hormonal cycle.

According to the article, women are naming their children after the characters in the show, which was originally penned by a Mormon female. Although the article claims that one male is addicted to the show, this is obviously an attempt to camouflage the true nature of the fad, which has middle-aged females swooning and quaking and, naturally, comparing their aging husbands to adolescent males who are swooping around at night to sink their gleaming fangs into the supple necks of virgins.

When I was in high school, there were a few guys who actually wore capes and fake fangs to school. Needless to say, they were always getting pounded and shoved into lockers by the homeboys, but they may have been ahead of their time. Too bad they didn't have superhuman strength and speed they could use to school their tormenters, but so it goes for pioneers. Perhaps Stephanie Meyer spent some time with these sad specimens, and their fantasies formed the basis of her literary efforts. If this is the case, I suppose the befanged denizens of basements, smoking cloves and playing Magic: The Gathering (unsurprisingly from Seattle), have finally made an impression on the women who always spurned them.

Too bad the girls only love the fantasies rather than the men themselves. And so the eternal tragedy plays on.

Female Senator Brings up Vampires, Werewolves in SCOTUS Confirmation Hearings

Welmer · 30 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently feeling that this was a matter of serious national significance, Sen. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota asked whether Elena Kagan preferred vampires or werewolves, in reference to the rivalry between Edward and Jacob (vampire and werewolf respectively) for the affections of Bella in the Twilight series. Kagan responded that she hasn't seen the film, so she couldn't make up her mind at this point.

I suppose one could say that discussions about sports teams are equally as inane, but it still seems surreal to see that discussions of teen fantasy books are brought into confirmation hearings for what is supposed to be one of the most dignified offices of the United States. Sometimes, I wonder whether these institutions will devolve into something resembling a daytime talk show. They certainly seem to be headed in that direction.

LTR Game & The Great Recession

OK fellas, the Summer is officially here, we're about a week out from the Nation's birthday, and…you're brokedown and busted financially. Hopefully, you're not one of the more than a million "hobos" Congress fronted on the other night and halted your hard earned UC bennies-but wherever you find yourself on the socioeconomic ladder these days, everybody's feeling the crunch, and this is especially true of you're a Brotha-let's face it, we tend to have a tougher time of it financially than do our White brethren, in aggregate.

So, in this post I wanna try to address a few points that go right to the heart of your love life and by extension, your Game. The great Carl Jung once said that every moment in time is good for something, if you but figure out what, and I say true dat-this Great Recession is an excellent time to determine how tight your overall Game is. I say that because the most commonly used "form" of Game, is what I call Wallet Game-the guy simply attempts to buy his way into a Woman. While this can and often does work, it is very, very corrupting on a whole host of levels-first off, it makes a Man lazy. We Men are serious creatures of habit, which explains why so many of us fail at Game to begin with. It's so much easier to simply buy ole gal a frilly frock than to really appeal to her natural born instincts as a Woman and her desire for a psychosocially dominant Man. This is why guys who are loaded, and have no or very weak Game, lose their Women to other guys so very quickly-money alone, simply ain't it used to be anymore, people. The sooner a Man figures this out, the better off he'll be when it comes to Women.

Another reason why "Wallet Game" is weak is because it is contingent on your cash flow and your cash flow alone-and as we all can see as of late, such a thing can come and go like a thief in the night, right? So when the loot runs out…so does she, if that's all you had to offer her in the first place.

On the other hand, if you've been diligently honing your Seduction skills, studying Womens' ways, taking stock of yourself and making adjustments, and more, you'll find that the current economic climate isn't that impactful to you at all. Of course, one could always use more cream, no doubt about it-but, for the skilled Gamesman, it just isn't as big a factor, if at all, as it is for the poor saps who have nothing else to hang their hat on.

So, let's take a look at a few things…

1. Me and Brown Sugah went out recently to a very nice venue, and we both couldn't help but notice a most disturbing trend-all of the ladies were dressed so nice in their summer dresses, their hair was did up, makeup looking good-and ALL the fellas looked like they just came from off the Appalachian trail, or came out from working under a muscle car changing the muffler, or were so sloppy/unkepmt/out of shape as to give the whole of Manhood a seriously bad name. In my humble view, they might as well to be walking around with a sandwich board that said "please come an PWN me and take my Woman right from under my nose".

Fellas, I thought we've gone over this before-you gotta clean yourself up, hmm? That means, if you're gonna take your Woman out somewhere, that means that you DON'T wear:

Sneakers. You're a grown-assed Man, look like one. Unless you're running errands, running ball or just busting it up with the homies on the block, there isn't really any reason why you need to be wearing sneaks on an outing with your girl. Get some shoes, or if preferable, boots, which is my shot. But please, whatever you do, NO Timberlands. Why? Because Trees are for one thing, over-saturated-every guy wears em. They infer nothing unique about you at all; you seen one guy with a pair of Tims on, you seen em all. Remember, you gotta specialize. Personally, I wear anything BUT Tims, and this is coming from someone who's quite a few pair-but only because of the nature of my work profile. I couldn't get out of those things quick enough come quitting time, LOL.

Now, for me, I like to wear stuff that best expresses my personality, who I am on the inside and I bring that out. So, another reason why I tend to wear boots is because it's a nod to my motorbike days-so yup, I tend to wear biker type boots. In fact, I've got on a pair right now that I copped last month on the humbug-I was just walking down the Ave in my native Philly, and decided to dip into one o the many sneaker/footwear shops. Once inside I checked out the Men's footwear section; they had the obligatory Timberlands. But I noticed that they also had a couple of nice pair of boots, and the one that jumped out at me reminded me of some boots I had many years ago. So I copped em, took em home, gave em a Marine Corps spit shine, and the rest as they say, is history. I've gotten compliments on em from guys and gals alike-even a gaggle of 12 year old girls liked em. Try getting that kind of fever with some run of the mill Trees.

Next, this droopy pants thing has gotta stop, chief. That, put together with the "beach bum" short deal I see far too many Brothas doing, just ain't gonna get it. While I own both khakis and dress slacks, for most times whe you're taking your lady out jeans will do just fine. But here's the trick-its the type of jean and its cut and fit. I mean, think about it-does Anderson Cooper wear droppy jeans? Does Hugh Jackman have his underwear all out on display? Nope. And neither should you. Get some jeans with a nice cut and fit, top if off with a nice belt. I like to wear bootcuts since I tend to wear boots a goodly bit. Take some time to actually try on different types and brands of jeans, Man. Trust me when I tell you, no one, including your girl, really is all that interested in looking at your saggy jeans wearing butt.

Shirts-that whole wife beater thing? Dead it. You're taking your Woman OUT, NOT lifting weights with the homies in the yard, hmm? Same deal with the Shaggy style supa dupa long tee shirts-uh uh. Here's a novel idea: try wearing a shirt that one, actually fits properly and two, actually looks nice? And I don't mean you gotta spend a fortune on em either-you can hit up many a vendor for some for nominal cost. I have, iin fact I'm wearing such a shirt right now. It's fitted, olive green, with a black gryphon on each side of the chest & wings on the back-definitely urban, but it looks nice. I have a number of shirts like that when I'm going out & can "dial it up or down" in terms of shirts depending on the venue. One of my favorite types of shirts to wear are the military style, real durable and they're cheap. And, if you're gonna work tees, make them fitted ones. No one wants to see you in the equivalent of a burlap bag.

Now, personally, I wear shades a lot, but not because I'm trying to look cool-well, maybe just a little. But the major reason is because I have very light sensitive eyes, and when its really bright out, it hurts. In the summers it is not at all unusual for me to wear my aviators until sundown. Here's the thing though-you gotta make sure whatever shades you're gonna wear actually fits your face and the size/shape of your head. Otherwise, you'll win up clowning yourself. Yes, people are indeed laughing at you.

Cuts and smell goods, general grooming and the like should at this point go without saying, but given that I've recently had to endure multiple Brothas on the bus who were so damned funky that I almost hurled and passed out, I gotta speak on this yet again-fellas, I get that times are hard, but damn Man, the dollar store got deo and soap, you dig me? I know because I done made use of that option myself many a time when the ends were low. Same deal with cuts-like Brown Sugah said, and she's right, if you can't afford to hit up the barbershop on the regular, invest in a pair of clippers and go for self. I know quite a few Brothas who've done this. Looking like a Mountain Man just ain't cool. Same deal with the smell goods-how many times do I have to say that Women have a stronger sense of smell than we do-especially around that time of the month, or when they're pregnant? Don't take my word for it, ask them. You coming through with the funk to overpower Bigfoot…uh uh. Granted, errbody can't afford to go in for say, Armani's Aqua Di Gio, but surely you can put together $5 for some Muslim oils? Again, I've been there done that and haven't had any complaints. As long as you're clean, smell non-funky and look somewhat together, for most Women, you're good to go. It's a kinda low bar, and that's kinda sad, but it is what it is. The good news, on the other hand, is if you're a guy who understands all this, and diligently works to put your best foot forward, you'll have no trouble in the least "breaking the ice" and/or keeping your Woman in love/lust with you. Trust me when I tell you, they are acutely aware of the fact that Men like you are in short supply.

The great thing about all this is, that it don't cost a lot, fellas. You can get cleaned up for a mere fraction of the cost that it take for most Women, trust me. Those boots I was telling you about? They cost me half the price I would have paid for some Trees, and I got a lot more compliments on em, too. Shirt I mentioned? $20. Jeans? $40.

Shades? $25. Toss in the $15 I pay for a cut/shave, and another $25 for the Paris Hilton for Men I got on, and you're looking at under $200-trust me, Women can easily spend that on getting their hair/nails/toes and maybe eke out a dress alone. Take some time to look nice, Man. It don't cost a lot.

Now, let's go to the next thing, which is taking your lady out on a tight budget. First of all, what I'm about to say assumes that you're already in a LTR; she's earned her spot and its only right to do right by her. It's important for Women that you take them out periodically. Women are much more socially inclined than we fellas are; so, being cooped up in the crib, while it may not be a big whup to you, can be problematic for them. Plus, being out and about signals to everyone that you're together, which is huge for Women; trust me, few if any Women wanna be a Bootycall, or think that they are, because you never take them out. Like anything else in life, your LTR is an investment; what you put in, is what you get back. You invest some time and ends in your Woman, and the ROI can be quite substantial.

The great thing about the Summertime, is that you can find a lot to do for very little cost. Take some to find out what's going on in your town; I like what T aka Ricky Raw said about knowing your town and how important this is for a Man. Women HATE planning outings and dates, and would much rather her guy do it. Personally, I'm a big fan of waterfronts and piers, sidewalk cafes and parks. Usually such venues are in the middle of or near other events that are going on, so that gives plenty of opportunities for spontaneity, too. Have some sense of where your going, know the lay of the land, what things cost, etc. Have it all planned out as much as you can. Usually, all this won't run you more than a Benjamin or so, and again if you're creative and have done your homework beforehand, and/or if you're someone who can improvise on the fly like me, you'll be able to keep your love life strong even as the economy crumbles around us. Keep in mind, the hospitality business is hurtin BAD-and by that I mean, anyplace where people go to chillout, relax and have a good time, which includes the aforementioned venues. Trust me, there are deals galore. The greeter gal at the spot me and Brown Sugah went to practically begged us to have a sit, and it turned out to be quite nice.

Alright, that's it. Come on fellas, you can do this!

Now adjourn your grimy asses…

This Story Has Everything

Featured Guest · 30 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post written by MB]

The Daily Mail reports that Jennifer Capriati recently attempted suicide. This story has absolutely everything – the special snowflake, entitlement syndrome, girrrl power, the Alpha bad boy and finally the Wile E. Coyote moment. There must be a rejected nice guy in there somewhere but the Daily Mail skips that part of the story. Let's take a look.

"Capriati had a glittering career as a teenage prodigy after bursting on to the tennis circuit aged 14. She was hailed at future champion (sic) and had four successful years, including reaching the Wimbledon semi-finals in 1991 when she was 15-years-old."

Special snowflake. So far so good.

"But at the age of 18 she went off the rails with arrests for shoplifting and drugs."

Entitlement syndrome.

"After a spell in a Miami Beach drug rehab centre she relaunched her career and went on to win the Australian Open in 2002 by beating the world No 1 Martina Hingis. Months later she won the French Open and went to reach the Wimbledon semi finals."

Girrrl power.

"Her career came to an end in 2005 due to shoulder and back injuries."

Interesting. One thing the feminists somehow fail to mention to young women in their pursuit of girrrl power is just how much more susceptible women are to sports injuries than men. For example, take a good look at the knees of men and women. A man's knee is bulky, the joint capsule and associated ligaments strongly braced by the surrounding muscles while a woman's knee is much narrower. Due to this and other musculoskeletal differences, women suffer sports injuries at a higher rate than men with the incidence of ACL (knee ligament) injuries much higher in women.

"Adult film actor Dale DaBone, 34, dated Capriati from 2003-2009."

Dale DaBone. DaBone. Aha. Ahahaha. Da. Bone. Dated Jennifer from when she was 27 to 33. Do I need to spell out Da Bone's role in this medieval morality play?

"Former tennis star Jennifer Capriati is reported to have attempted suicide after becoming depressed over her failed career."

Wile E. Coyote. Jennifer is 34.

"Today a former boyfriend told celebrity website TMZ that Capriati had been depressed over her failed career……..He said that her emotional state may have been heightened by his decision to return to his porn career. He told the website that he had spoken with Capriati at hospital and said she was 'hysterical' over his decision."

So.….looks like Jennifer tried to make Da Bone choose between his career and her. Might have worked when she was 23.

Atheists Having Difficulty Attracting Women

Welmer · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a Scienceblogs.com article titled "The Woman Problem," a male atheist outlines some of the problems facing male atheists, the main one being, in his opinion, that women are not interested. His attempts to attract women, however, may provide us with at least a partial answer as to to why this "problem" exists.

Here author PZ Myers suggests a solution:

> I think the right answer is for us males to shut up now and then and listen. It's not for us men to tell women how to fix our (both men and women) problems, but if we're to have a lasting and equitable representation at the tables of atheism and skepticism, the guys who currently dominate need to step back and stop pushing.

He may think it is the pushiness and that the atheist men simply have to be nice, but I would beg to differ, and suggest to Mr. Myers that the problem is actually that women have little interest in either Atheism or Atheists. Why would they, after all? What is it about Atheism that contains anything of interest to women?

Myers also writes with a style that could be considered anything but alluring to females:

> I know there are some great blogs out there run by women — Skepchicks and Greta and Ophelia and more — so share more wealth. Skepchicon 2010 is happening this weekend, so people can nag me there, too. I shall be a passive receptacle for your ideas.

"Passive receptacle?" He seems to be calling himself a douche, here.

He goes on to recommend taking a back seat to the women, promoting them and getting out of their way, and taking other submissive measures to encourage them. I'm pretty sure this won't work all that well with women in general, although it may draw a few dominatrix types.

Predictably, the women Atheists who have responded have sensed weakness and are going in for the kill. One female commenter has already demanded scholarships and childcare from Atheists:

> Here's my suggestion: Set up a fund to help women be part of the mix. Offer child-friendly activites, day care, or some other way that they don't have to leave the little ones behind with an expensive babysitter (or a fundamentalist grandma). Offer scholarships for working women to enable them to attend.

Another woman suggests that many Atheist men are "creeps" (code for beta):

> Here's an idea – creepy guys can fucking stop hitting on every woman who walks by instead. And when non-creepy guys see other guys doing it, they can tell them to fucking stop it so that it's not always up to every woman in attendance to do so.

Although I'm not an atheist, I'll give Mr. Myers a bit of advice: don't give them anything. Act like they don't matter, and then they'll want in. They'll even offer to bake cookies and make coffee. More women than men volunteer for "patriarchal" Christian churches and Jewish synagogues. Do priests, ministers and rabbis seek to gain female followers by putting women in charge? No, they do the opposite, and claim authority over women, and the women flock to services in far greater numbers than men.

But perhaps Atheism – at least the organized type – is a different kind of faith. If that's the case, I imagine it will always be a fringe religion, and never gain all that many adherents. Communist nations may have had some success with their atheist faith, but they backed that up with very male personality cults that portrayed leaders – all men – as godlike figures. And the Christian and other mainstream religions that have gone “equal” have failed miserably in the numbers game — witness the precipitous decline of the Episcopalian Church.

The thing is, when you put women in charge of something and subordinate the men, it kind of turns women off. It’s just human nature.

Encouraging Transsexualism in Kids

Welmer · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feministing is cheering on this unfortunate documentary produced by some kids in New York, in which a boy who seems to have gender identity disorder (yes, it is a real disorder) is portrayed as combatting "stereotypes." The title Feministing chooses to give it is "Beyond snakes and snails and puppydog tails."

From the title, it seems that they think this is a trend to be encouraged, and represents what males should become. If Bob Connell and his buddies at NOMAS have their way, they might actually mandate that boys dress in pink and talk like girls. I'm sure that would please feminists to no end.

If anyone thinks I'm exaggerating, recall the anti-racism class one teacher promulgated that encouraged singling out blue-eyed children for abuse. Does anyone actually believe that boys will be immune from this kind of selective abuse given the climate feminists have created?

The video's below. I feel no malice toward little Merlin, but the hard truth is that he's not a normal little boy, and trying to get other boys to behave as he does would be dysfunctional and inappropriate.

Male Birth Control Breakthrough

Welmer · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This could be very important news, or it could be another flash in the pan, depending on whether the drug makes it through trials. Israeli researchers have come up with a new method to render men temporarily infertile by chemically altering the proteins on sperm, rendering them unable to fertilize eggs. In tests on mice, there seem to be no behavioral side effects, but the drug is still in the process of being tested.

Professor Haim Breitbart of Bar-Ilan University said that one of the problems with previous male birth control techniques was that hormones were used, and these had a tendency to cause behavioral side effects, such as a loss of sex drive, which caused men to reject them. Researchers working with Breitbart say the new drug will be “100% effective at stopping pregnancy” and will be free of hormones.

According to polls, women have suggested that they don’t trust men to take pills, but I am not sure they are being entirely honest. Control over reproduction and fertility has long been a feminist priority, and an effective male birth control pill could have wide-reaching consequences that give women pause. Obviously, many men will benefit from being able to control their fertility, but there could be negative consequences as well. For example, I can imagine that it will be used to strengthen the justification for putting all of the blame for illegitimacy on men, and reinforce the notion that men are ultimately entirely responsible for all pregnancies and must pay no matter what the circumstances.

Report: Tiger Woods to Pay $750 Million for Divorce

Welmer · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Tiger Woods has reportedly been nailed with the biggest divorce bill in the history of the world, and is going to pony up $750 million to wife Elin Nordegren. Additionally, he is not allowed to introduce his children to any girlfriend unless he marries the woman. Given that he just lost a fortune for marrying a woman, that's got to be a tough pill to swallow, and seems like she's just rubbing it in his face.

Elin Nordegren will now be one of the world's wealthiest women, all for divorcing a pro golfer. The question has to be: was she worth it?

I can imagine 3 billion women around the world in awe of Elin Nordegren as the ultimate triumphant female. Perhaps shrines will be dedicated to her in temples throughout the world, and she will become a goddess of sorts that women pray to before they apply makeup and make go of it at the local hot spot.

Supermodels Dig Alpha Thugs

Welmer · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Naomi Campbell has had a subpoena served on her for testimony in the war crimes case of warlord and mass murderer Charles Taylor, the former President of Liberia. In 1997, she attended a party in South Africa hosted by Nelson Mandela, and for some reason Mr. Taylor gave her a big rough diamond as a present.

Taylor, who presided over mutilations, ethnic cleansing and mass rape, has claimed that he never had access to diamonds, so Campbell is being called to testify to set the record straight. These diamonds are the so-called “blood diamonds” that have been used by various strongmen in Africa to fund their insurgencies, purchase weapons, and, it seems, attract supermodels. Naomi Campbell has long had a thing for badboys, and is known for her own scandalous behavior, but Taylor surely tops the list in outright savagery. In one election, Taylor campaigned under the slogan “He killed my ma, he killed my pa, but I will vote for him.” He was elected in a landslide, probably because he threatened another killing spree if he lost.

We may never know what the relationship between the bratty supermodel and the Liberian butcher came down to, but it’s certain that Charles Taylor was very popular with the ladies. He probably had an entire harem to choose from in Monrovia — even as the corpses of his victims ripened under the hot, African sun.

You’d think people would have noticed the obvious discrepancies between what women say and what they do and rejected the lies of feminism from the beginning. However, perhaps when you have them on one the hand declaring peace, love and harmony, and on the other courting mass murderers, the contrast is so glaring that it blinds people. Or maybe men are blinded by beauty, and most women are hard-wired to be able to accept blatant inconsistencies, and this is really what does it.

Perhaps as Orwell put it: “To see what is in front of one’s nose needs a constant struggle.”

An Open Letter To The Spearhead Readership

Obsidian · 2 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the nature of the overall response to my recent article on Game and the Recession, I thought to write what I hope will be a brief and to the point reply.

Over the past few years in my time of observation and involvement with what has become known in some circles as the "Manosphere", I've noticed what I consider to be a palpable strain of discontent among its denizens. Men, often angry and bitter, seem attracted to this odd nexus of the Internet, where Men's Rights, Game and "HBD" all seem to converge, or at the very least, are only mere "doorsteps" away from each other. To say that there is no legitimate locus of these Mens' anger, is to be disingenuous; marriage, dating, and sex have radically changed, and not for the better. For far too many Men, the changed landscape is a veritable battlefield; one that is littered with the bodies of otherwise decent guys, trampled by the sociopolitical machine born of our "enlightened" age. Many Men have run afoul of the anti-male court system, be it via divorce or child support, or with regard to rape and sexual assault accusations. No reasonable person can say with a straight face that not only can these systems be abused, but they also contain within them very real imbalances that can prove extremely costly to Men in too many ways. On these and other points, I truly do commiserate with my brothers.

But when the anger and righteous indignation on the part of my brothers becomes counter-productive – to the point that even the mere suggestion that Men should take care in their appearance is tantamount to being gay or putting Women on a pedestal… That my friends, is where we part company.

And that's where the "Men's Rights Movement", if one wishes to call it that, is right now, in my view. It is a deeply held concern I have shared in private with The Spearhead founder, Welmer. I, for one, hope that he does something about it, because, let's face it: silence implies consent, and for those who are our opponents – namely, Feminist Ideologues – it is the shrill voices that give them the rationale and justification to paint ALL of us in the exact same light. Those who wish to denigrate any but the most obstreperous views, then, are only helping to tear down what we are hoping to create, blinded by their own bitterness and pain.

Welmer has asked me to focus a bit more on Game-related pieces for The Spearhead, and this is something I have agreed to do, because let's face it: for the vast majority of Men out there, Women will play a big role in their lives. And I for one, actually like Women, and I refuse to apologize for that. Nor am I some bitter chump in a dank basement somewhere, and that brings me to another point:

One of the most striking things I had observed about the Manosphere, was the sheer bile and vitriol; the ferocity of bitterness and anger directed at Women, and, by extension, anyone who suggests, even in the most benign way that Women ain't all that bad. This took me aback because those who seemed the most angry and bitter, were by all intents, America's Most Wanted & Preferred: White Guys. And let me refine that point just a bit more, if I may: I'm talking about middle class, college educated, good money earning, White Guys. Take it from me, a Black Male Blue Collar "Prole", who's seen a lot more pain, suffering and strife in his life than the vast majority of you will ever know in two lifetimes: you guys have the world on a string. You, for the most part, live where you want. Pickup and travel at pretty much where you want to go. There are real opportunities that are open to you that will never be open to me. You will never have to worry about being shot by those who are sworn to protect you when you go out to get something to eat. And you are still on top of the real money making and status heap. Sure, you may encounter some setbacks, but then, what guy doesn't? The point is that, all things being equal, if anything, one would think that it would be me who was bitterly grousing about the unfairness of life.

But, I don't. Somehow, I made Game work for me, found some measure of happiness and joy and yes, love, out of this place we call our world. Is it perfect? No, but then I never set out for perfection. Just a bit of satisfaction.

So, I'm really and truly sorry fellas, but I just cannot get to all that bitterness so many of you seem to revel in. The notion that a guy who takes some interest and care in how he looks, is akin to him being "gay", simply doesn't compute for me. The idea that treating the Woman who you've been with for an extended period of time as a human being is somehow weak or pandering, I just don't get it. The line of reasoning that says that being neat and clean for one's own sake, as well as that of your mate, is a kind of anti-social behavior that I find anathema to all that I stand for.

As far as I am concerned, Game can be used to improve a Man's life where it matters the most, no matter how many of you may want to try to deny it, and that's with regard to Women. I don't see the idea of advocating for basic decency and fairness on behalf of Men or Women, and also actually liking Women, as being mutually exclusive. There's a middle ground, a "both/and"; that's been the story of my life, and it still continues to work now.

I am NOT a PUA, nor am I an "MRA". I'm just a Brotha who's trying to live some semblance of a decent life, and who believes in basic justice and fairness. The ideals propounded by the PUA & MRA communities, assist in that effort, for me. Nor do I have to be nasty, vindictive or bitter about it either.

The Spearhead is on the cusp of something truly great. I can feel it. And I am just hoping that it doesn't get ruined by those who, because of their unwillingness to move beyond their own past hurt and pain, are quite fine to execute a kind of scorched earth strategy in order to make their point. If they win, we will have done no better than the very Feminist Ideologues we decry at every chance we get. We can do better than that, fellas. The Spearhead has given us a chance to really highlight what men are all about, and guess what, it's more than angry fist-pumping in the air. There's room for Welmer's great recipes (more, please!), there's room for neatly presented issues of import for us, and yes, there's room for Game, too.

I'm just sayin.

We Should Not Worry About The NSA Or DHS

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 2 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Last week a troll tried to claim that The Spearhead was being tracked by the Department of Homeland Security (or similar law enforcement/anti-terrorist entities). This idea has appeared at various times in various places in this part of the internet. We should not worry about the DHS or the NSA (National Security Agency) coming after us.

We must remember that we have no evidence that the DHS, NSA, or any other government agency is tracking us. It is imperative that we base our actions on known facts not what someone or some group may or may not be doing. While the Obama Administration's focus on "domestic terrorism" is a source of concern for several reasons (many not related to this subject), we should not automatically have a bunker mentality. We have nothing to hide. We should not act like we do. We are not a shadowy organization. We are reasonable men (and a few reasonable women) with a reasonable position. We need to be bold and out there speaking about the issues facing men. Hiding in the shadows regardless of what some three letter government agency may be doing is no way to live.

It is doubtful that men's rights and related ideas are on the radar screen of homeland security. By the time that they are, it will be much more complicated than the DHS going after us. There will be opportunistic politicians who will see the potential of developing a power base of men based of men's rights. That will make the idea that "MRA's are a bunch of terrorists" much harder to be taken seriously.

On a personal level I have much more to lose than most of you here for speaking out about men's rights. Many of you know that I work in a job in the defense industry with a high level security clearance. Various defense and homeland security government agencies have the right to search what I do online. I could lose my job because of what's on my blog or what I have written on The Spearhead. The NSA could be tracking my online activities right now. While I don't know if the NSA is tracking me online or not, it does not matter to me. I have and am going to continue to speak out about men's rights like I always have.

I hope that the NSA or some other government agency is tracking me right now. Why? Because defense and homeland security agencies aren't made up of anti-male robots. They are made up of men like ourselves. Like with any group of men there will be plenty of manginas and white knights. But there will also be plenty of men working for these agencies who will be ready to hear our message. Men who work for the NSA, DHS, FBI, ICE, etc. still go through the same things the rest of us do. These men are no less likely to be ass raped in divorce court, to have their children taken away from them, to be the victims of paternity fraud, to have false rape charges and false sexual harassment charges leveled against them, etc. If we are being tracked by a homeland security agency then after seeing are blogs and websites plenty of men working there will not think these guys are terrorists. Many of them will instead remember how their aunt divorced their uncle for no reason and their uncle was reamed in divorce court or how their best friend lost their job because some woman decided she didn't like him so she made up a bogus sexual harassment complaint against him.

Working in law enforcement or homeland security does not automatically make a man a mangina or a white knight. These are men going through the same problems we are due to female supremacism, and we should remember that rather than treating them like a faceless hive.

Software Upgrades This Weekend

Welmer · 3 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This Weekend, I'm going to put some effort into upgrading software and making a few tweaks to the forum and commenting system. WordPress 3.0 was released recently, and it comes with a lot of changes that I'm cautiously optimistic about. However, as welcome as these changes are, I'm going to have to reconfigure the site's settings, plugins and add-ons, probably throwing away some of the old ones and installing new ones. This might be a bit tricky, and it will definitely cause a few changes for readers, although none will be all that big.

I'd like to let you all know exactly what the end result will be, but until I can actually install the new release and see for myself, I can't say anything with certainty. So, if the site momentarily disappears into the ether, or starts behaving strangely over the weekend, that's because I'll be under the hood with a wrench fiddling around with it.

Hopefully, all will go well, but if not I can always restore from backups and go shopping for a php pro who can handle whatever I might have missed.

How Did Elin Nordegren Make Out Like a Bandit?

Welmer · 4 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Given the reported $750 million divorce settlement in return for a promise not to ever talk or write about Tiger, a few of us have been speculating on what she had on Tiger Woods.

What could be worth that much? Well, as far as Tiger is concerned, only one thing: his career. What could permanently derail his career?

Getting caught cheating with performance enhancing drugs.

Although this is pure speculation, and the settlement hasn't even been confirmed yet, this seems like the most likely explanation to me for such a ridiculous divorce payout. Tiger has faced some scrutiny – including a very recent interview – for associating with a doctor who touted the benefits of human growth hormone, and who undoubtedly had access to a pharmacopia of hormones and other drugs. If, as his recent physique suggested, he had been juicing, Elin would have been privy to it. She may even have physical and documentary evidence. This would be enough to permanently derail his career and all his ad contracts, and possibly even earn him some jail time. It would be an insurmountable scandal — far worse than Tiger's dalliances with skanks and porn stars.

Another Woman Jailed in Britain for False Rape Allegations

Welmer · 5 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that the British are way ahead of the rest of the Anglosphere in prosecuting false rape claims. These days, it's one after another biting the dust for victimizing innocent men.

In the latest case, Temitope Adenugba was having some trouble getting her homework done on time, so she called the police and said she had been raped. When they arrived, she pointed the finger at janitor Kunle Ogunmole, who, as luck would have it, just happened to be standing around at the time. After the janitor was arrested, her story fell apart when inconsistencies and a prior false rape claim came to light.

In the US, women make false rape allegations all the time, but even in the most egregious cases, such as the Duke Lacrosse scandal, women are very rarely punished. Feminists like to claim that the rate of false rape allegations is vanishingly small, but Britain's initiative in dealing with the problem shows that to be far from the truth.

Duke Lacrosse Accuser Holds Press Conference

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 5 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Crystal Gail Magnum, the woman who accused the Duke Lacrosse players of raping her, recently held a press conference to defend herself against domestic violence charges that have been brought against her. Currently Magnum is under house arrest and must wear a motion bracelet on her ankle at all times due to an incident between herself and her ex-boyfriend that happened in February. In addition Magnum is facing charges of arson, child endangerment and attempted murder. Police allege during the incident in February that Magnum set an apartment on fire and tried to kill her ex-boyfriend while her three children and two police officers were in the apartment.

Magnum said in the press conference:

> I don't feel like I'm going to get the justice that I deserve through the judicial system and I feel this my only and last means to reach out to the public and let them know that I did not set a fire that night. To let the public know that I am being unfairly treated due to preconceived notions that people have about me concerning another case. I feel like enough is enough.

The other case Magnum refers to is when she brought up false rape charges against the Duke Lacrosse players. She has also made claims that her ex-boyfriend abused her and about that said:

> I can't explain to you why I keep going through issues with domestic violence. Maybe it's mistakes. Maybe I tell men too much about my past and they try to take that for granted. Maybe domestic violence is more prevalent than people think.

UK Bodybuilder Goes on Rampage After DV Jailing, Targets Police

Welmer · 6 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Raoul Moat, a bodybuilder who lives in Northumbria, obtained a gun and went on a shooting spree on Saturday, wounding his girlfriend and killing her new lover, a martial arts instructor who was shot down when he ran outside to confront the armed man. The girlfriend is expected to survive. Later, Moat wrote a lengthy diatribe about how he has lost everything and intends to keep killing – targeting police officers in particular – until he is dead. He made good on his promise to attack cops by shooting one through the window of a police car. The officer was critically injured, but is currently in stable condition.

Prior to the rampage, Moat's girlfriend, the mother of his three-year-old child, had taunted him by saying that she was sleeping with a policeman. After the shootings, she issued a plea retracting her words, saying that she had only told him she was sleeping with a policeman because she was "frightened."

Moat's manifesto has not been released to the public because of the sensitive nature of the information it contains.

Given the chaotic state of sexual relations today, these incidents are inevitable. There is no avoiding the fact that certain unstable individuals, such as Mr. Moat, will crack and take violent action over jealousy or a sense of betrayal. If there is anything remarkable, it is the fact that it happens so rarely despite the pressure so many people face in the chaotic sexual marketplace, which touches on some of the deepest nerves in the human psyche.

For a dystopian view of a society in which bloodshed and murder over sexual rivalries was commonplace, one need only read the blood and gore-soaked annals of pre-Christian European literature. Perhaps we are returning to such an age, where women's proclivity to seek out violent, brutal men for drama and excitement will lend a crimson cast to our lives.

Barefoot Bandit's Mother Cheers Him On

Welmer · 7 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Colton Harris Moore, the Camano Island, Washington native who has been evading authorities since leaving a halfway house in 2008, was raised by an obviously dysfunctional single mother, who is proud of her son for his criminal exploits. First arrested at the age of 12, Moore eventually became quite a prolific thief, burglarizing homes and stealing vehicles and boats in the islands of Puget Sound. It is therefore little wonder that he has apparently chosen to fly a stolen plane to the Bahamas, which although tropical, would be a familiar environment for the Island County resident.

What is remarkable about Moore is that he has taught himself to fly (but not land, it seems) simply by using instructional books and videos, and has a knack for breaking into secure airports and marinas. However, as someone who grew up with some association with the kind of people who tend to live on the waterfront and own powerboats and airplanes in the greater Seattle area, I know that it isn't all that difficult to penetrate their security. Actually, what protects them more than anything else is the exclusivity of their lifestyle, which prevents most others from even imagining that all these toys are simply there for the taking, which they are. Additionally, your common criminal would have some serious difficulty operating a Bayliner, not to mention piloting aircraft.

I'd assume that Colton Harris Moore grew up around a number of these wealthier kids, and was only distinguished by being poor and having a particularly lousy mother. Unfortunately for Colton, that distinction might have meant the difference between becoming a respectable citizen and becoming a wanted man. Maybe he is a born criminal, but that doesn't appear to stop certain people having phenomenal success in business. From a young age, Colton probably saw all the toys the wealthier folks around him had, and figured he'd partake. I knew some rich kids who behaved like criminals at that crucial age right around puberty, but their families had the means to steer them away from that. With a mother like he had, Colton did not have that luxury.

Here are a few things Pam Kohler, Colton's mother, has had to say about her son's crime spree:

> "When the cops come and bother me that's when I think 'run Colton run, fly Colton fly.' I'm proud that he taught hisself how to fly."
> "I just want to hug him, I'm proud that he can fly planes with no lessons. You're damn right I am."
> "If anyone profits from this thing it should be me and Colt." (She intends to hire an "entertainment lawyer")

What a wonderful example she must have set for her son all these years. Maybe the teenaged Colton, now on the other side of the continent, can finally take some time to reflect on how he ended up a wanted man with an FBI reward on his head.

Bodybuilder Stepmom in Missing Child Case Accused of Attempting to Have Husband Killed

Welmer · 7 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Terri Moulton Horman, the Portland, Oregon stepmother who is facing police scrutiny in the case of missing seven-year-old Kyron Horman, has been accused of offering to pay a landscaper to off her husband Kaine Horman, the boy's father. When police notified Kaine of the alleged plot, he moved out, obtaining a restraining order and filing for divorce.

Shortly after Kyron disappeared in early June, Terri Moulton Horman began to draw scrutiny, as she had been the last person to see Kyron alive at a science fair, for which the little boy had created a diorama about the red eyed tree frog. Kyron has been described as a sweet, well-behaved boy who would be unlikely to wander off.

Terri is a large, powerfully-built woman with the physical wherewithal to easily subdue an obedient little boy with poor vision. She has so far avoided arrest, but has been put under considerable police pressure. Given the landscaper's allegations, she is beginning to look like a very credible suspect.

I must admit the focus on Terri Horman confused me a bit at first. What motive would a woman have to surreptitiously kill her stepchild, after all? If she did it in a fit of roid rage, that would be one thing, but it would take an uncommonly twisted individual to plan something like that. However, in chimp colonies, females have been known to kill their female rivals' children, so perhaps hatred of the biological mother could provide sufficient motive.

Female Columnist Calls Obama a Woman

Welmer · 7 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This Washington Post editorial, written by Kathleen Parker, is about a week old, but I thought it would be worth bringing up anyway, so as to show an example of barely concealed shaming language. Below, Parker suggests Obama isn't sufficiently Alpha:

> No, I'm not calling Obama a girlie president. But . . . he may be suffering a rhetorical-testosterone deficit when it comes to dealing with crises, with which he has been richly endowed.
> It isn't that he isn't "cowboy" enough, as others have suggested. Aren't we done with that? It is that his approach is feminine in a normative sense. That is, we perceive and appraise him according to cultural expectations, and he's not exactly causing anxiety in Alpha-maledom.

To back up her assertions, she points out that he is verbose and given to consensus-building rather than assuming the role of a commander.

This editorial isn't all that compelling, because it reads as shaming language rather than true analysis. If anything, it seems to me that Obama is acting like a lot of guys who were raised by dominant women (his grandmother in Obama's case). Men who grow up in such a situation can develop a habit of evasiveness, because directly confronting women, even when they are the ones who are really in charge, is culturally taboo. In fact, I think this evasiveness, which is characterized by a lot of empty, feel-good talk on Obama's part, has become fairly typical amongst the post-boomer generation. It is exceedingly common for younger male politicians in the Pacific Northwest – including Republicans – to behave in this manner, and the population in general shares this tendency, which often manifests itself in a kind of passive-aggressiveness.

No, I don't think Obama is acting like a "woman," but rather like the kind of man that has been created by a society that is increasingly dominated by females such as Kathleen Parker — those who shame men for being effeminate even as they demand more authority and display aggression and contempt toward those they look down upon.

Resonance

Welmer · 7 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last few days, something's been bothering me a bit. Because I can't exactly put my finger on it, I've withdrawn a bit, and sought some answers in art, which I've often found to be a better medium than the standard blabber for clearing one's mind and putting things in perspective. I thought it might have been the exceptionally muted 4th of July – probably the least enthusiastic in my living memory – that was giving me pause, but I still can't say for sure.

I felt compelled to seek answers from the years surrounding my earliest days on earth, probably because our own genesis has so much significance and would seem to hold answers. Those earliest memories resonate throughout our lives, coming up from the depths even when the present time makes little sense. My grandmother, who by the end of her life had lost almost all awareness of the world surrounding her, began to revert to the Norwegian her parents spoke to her when she was a small child, even referring to herself by her Norwegian rather than American name. Prior to that, I never even knew she had a Norwegian name. To me, she had always been grandma Sylvia, but she became a little girl named Solveig at the end. After everything else had faded away, those early memories remained, like the solid foundation of a burned out building.

So I turned to movies from the 1970s and thereabouts, trying to understand what it was about those earliest times of my life that might have framed my own sense of the world, and given me the ominous sensation that has been stalking me for some days.

First, I watched Taxi Driver, released when I was a very small child, and then Midnight Cowboy, which was filmed some five years before I was born. Although both are set in New York, and I'm no New Yorker, the films touched on some national themes and social moods that were prevalent at the time. Both also dealt quite explicitly with the theme of masculinity, and hinted at some impending futility. Robert DeNiro's Travis Bickle of Taxi Driver, a young man driven to kill by disgust for corruption and filth, was certainly a more sympathetic character than Christian Bale's Patrick Bateman in American Psycho – a soulless killer who is absolutely alienated from concepts of morality – but he is an ambiguous character whose actions are disturbing and leave one with some discomfort concerning his motives.

Midnight Cowboy, for its part, is a film that lays waste to the age-old American dream of making it in the big city. Joe Buck, played by Jon Voigt, dreams up one of the world's worst business plans – selling himself to women – while washing dishes in Texas, and hooks up with "Ratso," a sick, crippled hustler played by Dustin Hoffman. Needless to say, the pair fails miserably, and Joe Buck comes of age through the same pointless tragedy that characterized his young life up to that point. It's a deeply depressing and sad movie, but well worth watching for its touching humanity.

As I try to make some sense of these two movies that came out right around the dawn of my life, what strikes me most about them is the profound loss of confidence that characterized society at the time. I've written before about how American men live their lives much as though they have been vanquished in war, and perhaps the art from this era can give us some insight into why this is so. As I strive to recapture the mood from the time, it occurs to me that my generation was born into a very troubled time, and has lived with the consequences for our entire lives.

Perhaps, as we come of age, we are expressing that sense of futility and that loss of confidence, and that is what I have felt bearing down like a heavy weight in these recent days. Given the strange, nihilistic mood of today, I fear for my own children and others who are coming of age during the last gasps of this dying civilization.

Citizen Renegade Analyzes Californication

Welmer · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Given the recent hubbub here at The Spearhead over whether Game is about pedestalization, liberation, or something else entirely, I thought today's post by Citizen Renegade (formerly known as Roissy) might be edifying to readers.

In the post, he takes a look at the Californication TV series from the point of view of someone who practices Game. While he praises character Hank Moody's (David Duchovny) technique, ultimately he sees something amiss in his tendency to sentimentalize and pedestalize women.

Personally, I think tomcatting and chivalry go together like oil and water, but perhaps, as Citizen Renegade suggests, this is the ultimate female fantasy:

> Think about it for a minute. What is the perfect man in a feminist's eyes? He is first and foremost that charming cad who gets them wet. We all know the tingle is the necessary ingredient on the way to female fulfillment. Second, he is utterly nonjudgmental, no matter how badly the women in his life behave. Everything, ultimately, is his own fault, and he feels deeply sorry for "hurting" women, even when he can't help but continue "hurting" them. Third, he will defend a woman's honor at risk to his own well-being, health and reputation, even when the woman in question has little objective honor worth defending. Fourth, he will forgive everything bad women do to him, absolve them of all their sins (they know not what they do, lord, for they have mere vaginas), and fight those who would disagree.

Check it out for an interesting take on Game in popular culture.

Financial Crisis, Mancession Prompt Congress to Mandate More Affirmative Action for Women

Welmer · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

If anyone still has any questions about why feminists such as Hannah Rosin can smugly declare "the end of men," they need only look to the law of the land, which, with each passing year, favors women more and more explicitly. In the Dodd-Frank financial regulation bill, Congress snuck in a provision that will create yet another office dedicated to enforcing "equality" by mandating "race and gender employment ratios" in financial institutions that do business with the government.

In an article in Real Clear Markets, linked in the forum by Spearhead commenter JohnJ, Diana Furchgott-Roth details the breadth and scope of this new government intrusion on behalf of women (affirmative action has always benefited women more than the minority men it was originally intended for):

> The Treasury, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Housing Finance Agency, the 12 Federal Reserve regional banks, the Board of Governors of the Fed, the National Credit Union Administration, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the new Consumer Financial Protection Bureau…all would get their own Office of Minority and Women Inclusion.
> Each office would have its own director and staff to develop policies promoting equal employment opportunities and racial, ethnic, and gender diversity of not just the agency's workforce, but also the workforces of its contractors and sub-contractors.
> What would be the mission of this new corps of Federal monitors? The Dodd-Frank bill sets it forth succinctly and simply – all too simply. The mission, it says, is to assure "to the maximum extent possible the fair inclusion" of women and minorities, individually and through businesses they own, in the activities of the agencies, including contracting.

Furchgott-Roth brings up the abuses of Title IX, questioning how exactly this is going to work out, and warns that the new law may increase waste by forcing contractors to hire redundant staff and underqualified individuals. This is certainly a problem, but what about the obvious question:

Why is Congress passing new affirmative action laws in the middle of the mancession?

If anything, this bill is a kick in the pants to the millions of laid-off men who are struggling to pay the bills — often to their wealthier ex-wives, who have states bludgeoning impoverished ex-husbands to give more money to buy shoes and such.

Institutionalized hatred and oppression of men is officially the norm in the United States, and women, rather than have some sympathy for their brothers, husbands, fathers and sons, sit back and write articles about the superiority of their sex. Morally speaking, women are beginning to look like the uglier – not the fairer – sex.

Indian surgeons rushed to save the life of a child critically injured when its mother tried to dispose of it in the lavatory, where she had given birth. The baby was taken to the hospital still attached to the toilet bowl, which had to be sawed off to remove the child from the lavatory.

The mother, who had recently completed a degree was returning home via Turkmenistan Airlines. She managed to get off the plane before the child was found, but was identified and arrested in the airport.

Whether or not she will eventually become a doctor is unknown.

Rebuttal to “The End of Men”

Welmer · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The End of Men article in The Atlantic, penned by feminist authoress Hannah Rosin, has spawned a number of copycat articles, such as the recent “Women Will Rule the World” piece in Newsweek. There hasn’t been much to counter it in the mainstream media, probably because right at this point it seems to be a done deal. However, the American Spectator came out with a nice critique that’s worth reading, even if all it does is rehash themes we’ve done to death here at The Spearhead.

Here’s a passage from the article, titled “The End of Men, The Beginning of What?” and written by William Tucker:

> Remember “The End of History,” Francis Fukuyama post-Cold-War thesis which said that now that everything was settled between the Soviets and the West, nothing of historical importance would ever happen again? That was like saying “The End of Yugoslavia” would mean nothing interesting would ever happen again in the Balkans.
> David Brooks nailed all this in Bobos in Paradise, when he charted the rise of a typical public intellectual:
> The title of her first book [his choice of pronoun] will begin with the phrase, “The End of…” The benefit of endism is its dramatic finality; few people will remember a book called Ideology is Aging. But decades after its publication, the title The End of Ideology will still be referred to (even if its contents are utterly forgotten). The difficulty in writing an endist book is in finding things that haven’t already ended. History, equality, racism, tragedy, and politics have all been taken, and The Death of…takes in just about everything else. The End of Gardening just doesn’t have the ring of a bestseller.

The Ins and Outs of Online Dating

Featured Guest · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post written by Zammo]

Being single means treading the murky waters of online dating once more. I've used online dating in the past and it worked pretty well.

Of course, I'm not chasing girls, I'm chasing women over 35. But the fundamentals are still pretty true in the whole dating and relationship game, even if online. For men who have pretty much given up on woman and the entire relationship game, that's perfectly reasonable. This is in no way a recommendation for online dating or pursuing women. For the rest of us, knowing how to exploit online dating can be important.

I'm using Plenty of Fish (PoF), a free online dating website. As I live in a very large metropolitan area, my options are quite large. If you live in a smaller town, online dating may not work. The biggest problem with PoF is that it's free so women can merely dabble in it to get their attention fix or bide their time to switch to the next relationship. All online dating causes a false sense of abundance. There's always another guy who just might be a bigger, better deal. I can deal with this and always keep my own eyes out for the bigger, better deal. Whatever games that women play online, I match them.

There is another problem with online dating – people tend to say what they are expected to say. The woman who claims she's "looking for a nice guy" is simply parroting back what she has heard in all the TV talk shows, Oprah, and various women's magazines. What women doesn't want a nice guy? It turns out, most women don't want a nice guy. They do, however, want to be rescued. Lots of profiles mention the "knight in shining armor" or "Prince Charming".

It's quite clear that far too many women are victims of emotional pornography. They actually believe that dating and relationships should resemble the wildly unrealistic fiction of romantic comedy movies, Sex and the City, Cosmopolitan Magazine, Oprah, etc. There is the constant mention of "chemistry". This is merely woman-speak for "vagina tingle". Women still want to be swept off their feet into the arms of an alpha provider/protector and into a life of decorating, shopping, and ease.

Underneath all the social bullshit expressed in words, women want confidence over sensitivity. That want the successful alpha male with a strong backbone, emotional strength, and yes, some douchebag behavior. This goes way back in our evolution when we were running around the plains chasing mastodons with pointed sticks in an attempt to prepare dinner back at the split-level cave. The successful hunter got the women because he's the one with dinner. The poor fucker who couldn't toss a spear got to eat roots and berries and watch the better spear hurler have sex with the women. The fundamentals of this still hold quite true. Even today, women mostly insist on dating guys taller than themselves just like guys like dating women who have a pronounced feminine form and are usually younger than them. It's biology, no point fighting it.

Online dating is mostly a numbers game. Women will reject a man for quite a few reasons simply based on a photo and a few brief words. It's important to keep things organized. If there are quite a women who fit my requirements, I keep a spreadsheet of whom I have contacted and the response (if any).

The process goes something like this –

1. I peruse photos and profiles looking for some specific attributes of a potential date – attractiveness (to me) in face and body, family situation (I prefer women without kids or with kids out of the house), geography (no more than about 50 miles away), intelligence (good with words), etc. At this point, I mark the woman as a favorite so she knows I have an interest.

2. I send a brief message with mentioning something in their profile and invite them to read mine. This is the frustrating and time consuming part. Shotgun emails simply don't work unless you're a really good looking guy. Crafting a good opening message is not easy. My messages have the profile-specific response at the top. I try to find something in the woman's profile that I can respond to. While I only need two or three sentences, it requires reading the profile fairly carefully. Do not compliment a woman's photographic appearance with more than a few words. It's far better to mildly compliment her words, her pets, her outfit, whatever.

As an aside, here is what I have learned about key phrases that women use in their profiles –

No players – I am attracted to players.
No games – No man who plays better games than me.
No drama – I am a drama queen and don't need the competition
Looking for a good/nice guy – Still looking for an alpha but might accept a beta if he's affluent enough
Prince Charming/Knight in shining armor wanted – hopeless romantic and borderline gold digger.
Make me laugh – Keep me entertained as my personal court jester.
My partying days are over – 30-something former party girl with a bad case of baby rabies
Shopping as a hobby – gold digger
Real Man Wanted – she likes the BadBoys
Where are all the real men/nice guys? – worst of the worst… she's a former party girl, current gold digger, and incapable of understanding that her dating net worth is lousy.
I'm a real woman – I'm fat with a bad attitude
Friends first/looking for my best friend – I want the option to reject you first or put you in the FriendZone while I date other guys
Family is important to me – my kids, my parents, my aunts and uncles and cousins, my very distant and never-seen relatives will always come before you

A word about single moms: they present a scheduling problem more than anything else. Their child visitation schedule will dictate their dating schedule. This can work in your favor. It can be quite easy to juggle several single moms by knowing their child visitation schedule. As well, single moms are usually more willing to share you as long as you don't make it obvious that you're dating other women.

Once I send a message, here are the typical reactions –

1. My message is deleted without being read. They saw my profile and said "ewwww, as if".

2. My message is read and then deleted. They saw my message, my profile, and said "not my type".

3. My message is read and not deleted. They saw my message, my profile, and said "not my type" and had the manners to not delete my message. It's a polite form of rejection.

4. They send a polite "no thanks, but good luck" message.

5. They send a "I'm intrigued, tell me more" message.

Of those five possible options, fewer than 1 in 50 will result in the "I'm intrigued message". This is life and I accept it. That's why I send out a lot of messages and have become completely immune to rejection. It is extremely important to have a very thick skin. Women can and do reject men for the most ridiculous of reasons. If I get no response or a negative one, I delete the woman from my favorites list and never, ever contact them again even if they contact me.

Once a woman responds favorably, some Game strategies kick in –

1. Don't spend valuable time messaging back and forth or chatting online. The purpose of online dating is to meet women in person. Three messages and/or 10 minutes chatting online is quite sufficient to move on to a first date.

2. Never respond immediately. Wait at least 24 hours between messages. You're busy and they need to know that. This also implies you are dating other women. This provides you with some valuable social proofing.

3. Escalate but be extremely cautious about any direct sexual connotations. Every woman wants to be perceived as a “nice girl” even though they are hoping to be fucked senseless on the first date. The sexual element of dating is always implied so being direct about it is a needless risk.

4. Be confident with your online messaging. If she asks, “what are you doing this week?” as a friendly query, answer with Going out with you” If she stops communicating at that point, tough shit, move on. If she responds with anything other than a “no”, she’s impressed with your confidence. If she does say no without a counter, move the fuck on.

5. Never, ever ask to go out, state it. “It’s time for us to meet so we’re going out this Friday.” If she dodges and doesn’t counter with another time, she’s not that into you so be prepared to move on quickly. In fact, you should have at least three other prospects you’re working concurrently.

6. Like in real life, women flake online constantly. You might be having a correspondence and suddenly, poof!… she stops writing. Or, something in your words made her reject you. Remember that women are incredible fickle and the wrong word or phrase will stop them dead. Don’t overthink what happened, move the fuck on.

7. Don’t have “oneitis”. The woman you are corresponding with has at least six guys she’s corresponding with or have already started dating.

As for your own profile, having a good photo is crucial. Women online are extremely visual. They will look at a photo and make a judgment in a nanosecond. In the text portion of the profile, use strong and confident words that highlight your independent and masculine nature. Women loathe sensitive, emotionally accessible guys even if they state that is what they are seeking.

The final point is that it’s highly unlikely to find a woman of quality through online dating. The vast majority of women still value themselves far too much to be a suitable, long term romantic partner. Their solipsistic nature means they are incapable of understanding they must bring something to the table other than their vaginas and tits. I simply use online dating to yield some sexy time and learn more about women so I can share it with other men.

Some of my observations from online dating experiences over the years –

1. Fat is the new average when a woman describes her body type. Even an “athletic” figure may be 20 pounds overweight. This is the disappointing reality now.

2. Everyone lies about their age, especially after 40. Men lie by about 2 years, women by about 5 years.

3. Photos are misleading. If not explicitly stated, “photos are recent”, expect pictures that are several years old. If fact, I have seen completely false photos.

4. Any woman who describes herself as a princess, diva, queen, sassy, strong – and doesn’t explicitly state that she will treat her man like a prince or a king – is only good for humping and dumping.

5. Attractive women get bombarded with messages. It’s easy for them to say “next, next, next…”

6. Women still expected to be pursued. Unless you’re a savagely good looking guy with major money, the men send the messages, the women do the rejecting.

7. Many women will put up a few photos and almost nothing in the text part of the profile. This means they only value their looks and will use any responses from guys like a catalog from which to select their next date.

8. Photos of faces without bodies (even if they claim to have an athletic figure) means that the woman is fat.

9. Women continue to over value their worth.

British Airways Settles With Man They Treated as Potential Pedophile

Welmer · 9 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Mirko Fischer, the man who was forced to move from his seat next to his pregnant wife because it placed him next to an “unaccompanied minor,” recently reached a settlement of about $5,000 with British Airways, which he donated to an orphanage. Mr. Fischer said he was humiliated by the forced move, and complained that the policy was discriminatory, stating: “It is sex discrimination. I want this policy to be substantially changed as it is a matter of principle. Women are not treated like this.”

BA is defensive about the policy, which treats men as a danger to children, but was “pleased to have settled the matter.”

As a child, I flew next to men unaccompanied, and neither I nor my parents ever had any anxiety about that. It is likely the case that the full-scale demonization of men that began in the 1990s has affected popular perception, leading to these restrictions, which were never seen as necessary in the past. The institutionalized hatred and distrust of men in the Anglosphere resembles a case of mass hysteria, if not full-blown psychosis.

Male Self Defense 101

Featured Guest · 9 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post written by Cato]

The manosphere is rife with advice for men these days. Don't get married. Don't have children. Don't trust women. Fairly decent advice in today's world, but I suspect that many men out there aren't sure how this applies to their daily lives. Some men do want to get married, eventually, to the right person; others would dearly love to have children someday, either through a paid surrogate or with that one magic person they trust to stay with them for the long term. Others aren't willing to be celibate, and risk their future every time they get frisky. The problem seems to be that there aren't any clear, concise instructions on how to dodge the landmines of this dangerous modern world, written for the men who need that advice the most.

Hence this article.

First, some relevant information about the author. I am currently divorced, with one child just over ten years old that I rarely get to see. My child's mother is not my ex-wife; rather, she is an ex-friend who was strongly attracted to me back in the day. Even though I told her, honestly and directly, that I did not want to sleep with her, for fear of unwanted pregnancy, she got hold of me after a night of hard drinking and made me an offer that I should have, but did not, refuse (she was damn good at oral sex). A few months later I got the call: she was pregnant, she was keeping it, and she wanted money for the medical bills from her prenatal appointments. Things went downhill pretty quickly after that. All the rest of this sad story, issues with her family, the ridiculous bureaucracy of her state trying to administer their child support program, is fodder for another time. Simply understand that I currently pay just under $900 a month for a child I wasn't ready for, and that I got sniped before I made anything remotely resembling decent money.

So, on with the advice:

The two most common threats to men in today's world, in my humblest of opinions, are marriage and unexpected pregnancy. Marriage I leave to each individual man: consider staying single first, consider cohabitation second, be together for a few years at least, get a pre-nup, and don't go through with it unless you are absolutely sure you trust the person in question. Pretty simple.

Pregnancy is another beast entirely. Reproductive control is almost exclusively a woman's prerogative in today's world; no offense to our female readership, but let's be blunt: if a woman decides it's her "time" to get pregnant, then barring any medical issues, she will. Pills can be missed, condoms can be pinholed; the truly determined (or desperate) can acquire sperm through oral sex, then visit the restroom to "spit it out," while not letting on that it's going to be a mouth-to-vagina transfer. At the most nefarious end of the scale are the scheming women who will slyly become pregnant with another man, and then attempt to convince their provider-type boyfriend that it is his child. Many states limit paternity challenges with specific time windows and other restrictions, making this disgusting tactic a viable one for the maternally obsessed woman.

Thus the question: how do we, as men, prevent unwanted pregnancy? Modern birth control is, frankly, woefully inadequate; condoms have a dismayingly significant failure rate, and all other common methods (save abstinence, of course) rely on female cooperation, and are therefore, for the purposes of this article, untrustworthy. All methods, that is, except for one: surgical vasectomy.

"Oh my God!" I hear some readers thinking. "A knife to the nutsack!? This guy is insane!" Could be, I suppose, but then, I've had it done already, and I know it's not that bad. About three days recovery time, and you're back on your…um…feet. "Ah, but I may want kids someday! So this solution won't work for me!" Actually, it will; all you need for kids is sperm, and there's an alternative to constantly pumping out your own: freeze some choice swimmers now, while you're (definitely) younger and (probably) healthier than you will be down the road when you decide you want kids. Yes, I did this too, just on the off chance I meet that magic someone someday.

So I offered some clear, concise instructions up above, and without further ado or discussion, here it is. A simple guide that could really be the best information some young man out there ever gets his hands on.

1. STOP HAVING SEX. Can't emphasize this enough. You can easily defeat your own efforts if you don't adhere to a strict no sex policy until you're done with the whole list. It doesn't make much sense to put in the time, money, and aggravation required by this guide, just to conceive a child in the middle of your efforts.

2. FIND A CRYO BANK. Use the internet to locate a reputable cryogenic storage facility in your area. For me, it was Fairfax Cryo; your mileage may vary.

3. GO THERE. Schedule an initial interview. You'll sign a contract for storage (mine was about $1700 for a five year contract) and provide a sample for screening and reviving testing – where they'll freeze a sample, give them a day or so, then thaw them to make sure they're still wiggling after the thaw. You get these results back in a few days.

4. GO THERE AGAIN. AND AGAIN, AS NECESSARY. After the initial appointment, make further appointments to provide samples for freezing. Plan on at least two, and possibly as many as four, donation appointments. I produced an average of ten vials of sperm per appointment; it takes two vials to attempt a pregnancy. If you want to be sure you've got enough juice for the future, so to speak, make four trips.

5. GET CUT. Ah yes, the centerpiece of this whole strategy for male reproductive control. Find a reputable urology clinic and schedule a vasectomy. You'll need a friend to drive you; you won't feel much like driving afterward (it is simple outpatient surgery, with local anesthetic).

6. CLEAR THE PIPES. Even after you get cut, you can still knock someone up. It takes about two weeks or fifteen ejaculations (if I recall correctly) for the viable sperm already in the hopper to filter out.

7. GET TESTED. Return to the urology clinic, and provide a semen sample for testing. They should call back within a day or so and let you know if you're clear.

8. SCHEDULE FOLLOW UP TESTING. Go back to the urology clinic every six months or so and get tested again, just to stay on the safe side.

9. ENJOY! Do whatever and whoever you like, however you like, without fear of unexpected pregnancy. You should still use condoms, to protect yourself from STDs, but that choice is up to each of us individually.

There it is. That's it. Once you've completed this list, you should be incapable of getting anyone pregnant. Total bill for my process was just shy of $2500, since, while my medical plan covered vasectomy, I had a five hundred dollar deductible I had to wade through. While I realize this is quite a bit of money, especially for young men just starting out, I'd like to point out that $2500 doesn't quite cover three months of my child support; and my child was conceived before I ever had an idea that I'd be making decent money someday. By the time I'm done paying child support, I'll have spent well over a hundred grand over eighteen years – to my mind, that makes $2500 a superb investment for today's men. Also, bear in mind that if I had actually found that magic someone over the past ten years (or if I should find them in the next eight), that money I'm paying to my child's mother is money that I wouldn't (or won't) have available to support the family that I choose to have – the family that I would actually get to be a real part of.

I hope someone out there finds this article useful, and worth the read. If this article is enough to persuade just one man out there that it is worth doing, just to be safe, then it is worth the time it took to write it. Smart men learn from their mistakes; wise men learn from the mistakes of other men.

TIME Bemoans Suicide Among Afghan Women, Ignores Male Suicide at Home

Welmer · 9 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The plight of Afghan women who kill themselves to escape bad marriages is held to be a humanitarian disaster by TIME Magazine writer Abigail Hauslohner, who focuses on immolations, probably because they are sensational. Of course, the Taliban takes the blame in a number of links in the article, but as far as I can tell these women are not members of the Pashtun ethnic group, from which the Taliban draws support. Actually, the article suggests that they may be immolating themselves because of an Iranian movie that featured a self-immolation on the part of a girl in a forced marriage, which suggests that they are ethnic Persians — not Pashtuns. Therefore, it isn't even clear that the Taliban has anything to do with them.

Interestingly, the article actually goes into some detail about the strange family relationships that characterize these cases (and Afghanistan in general). Cousin marriage and polygamy appear to be major factors in the decisions of both girls to torch themselves — probably far more important than spousal abuse as it is understood by Westerners, which involves, in the popular imagination, some drunk brute coming home from the bar and smacking his wife around, e.g. Stanley Kowalski.

Ironically, the wanton destruction of the Western nuclear family by feminist culture-warriors will inevitably bring some different form of marriage, because without some cooperation in child-rearing our population will simply die out and be replaced. Prime candidates include the Muslim paradigm, as in Afghanistan, or The Law of the Jungle, as in the Congo. Either way women are big trouble. East Asian style patriarchy is out, because it is proving to be just as susceptible to the ravages of Western family law as Western families.

However, what is most telling about the focus on Afghan women's suicide is the silence in Western media about the highly increased rate of male suicide after divorce in the Anglosphere. Afghan women, half a world away, merit more sympathy and attention than men in our hometowns who are driven to kill themselves by a highly punitive "justice" system that is not dedicated to justice, but rather to removing children and property from divorced men.

Recently, a man immolated himself in public – right in front of Brisbane's Supreme Court – over a family law matter. There has been no public pity, no calls for change — nothing. Yet we have thousands of troops fighting and dying in Afghanistan, and this is justified on the basis that it is a fight to stop the abuses that lead women to kill themselves.

Just think about what that says about our governments' priorities.

Fashion for a Dying Civilization?

Welmer · 10 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Berlin Fashion Week featured some hideous displays of androgynous models who look like they emerged from a spacecraft from some mutant world. The men and women wear the same clothes, have roughly the same physique, and sport the same wispy beards.

I'm really curious as to who actually supports this garbage. There can't be a huge market for it, but I'm sure the designer makes a lot of money.

There is one thing that strikes me as appropriate about the show: the models look like aliens. Fashion, "culture" and all the rest is increasingly alien to ordinary people, and has little connection to the real world we live in. Just look at the photos.

Male Children of all Ages More Likely to Die From Abuse

Welmer · 10 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We often hear about the tragedy of female infanticide in China, the abused girls of Africa, Afghanistan, etc. But how many people know that boys – including little babies – are significantly more likely to die from abuse or neglect in the United States? I'm not sure about the stats from the UK, Canada, Australia or NZ, but I assume boys make up the majority of abuse fatalities in those countries as well.

And it isn't just fatalities — boys are significantly more likely to be seriously injured in cases of abuse and neglect. We're not talking about a spanking, scratch or little bruise here: "serious injury" refers to concussions, broken bones, stab wounds, gunshot wounds, internal bleeding, etc. The most at risk group of children is baby boys under the age of one. Think about that for a moment. Children who are most likely to be fatally abused or neglected are tiny, helpless, baby boys. Not sullen or provocative teens, rambunctious little kids, or even mischievous toddlers, but little babies who can't even walk and talk, and usually they're boys.

Feminists like to make a lot of noise about child sexual abuse. It's a pretty horrific thing that is mainly perpetrated by males against female victims, and they use it as ammunition against men on a consistent basis. But they are strangely silent about child fatalities and serious injuries. Rarely does one hear a peep about murdered children, severely beaten children, or fatally neglected children. Actually, there's a good reason for that: in most of these cases the biological father had nothing to do with the child's death or injury, so feminists can't use the statistics to keep making the case that fathers should be summarily ejected from children's lives. Fathers acting alone are less than half as likely as mothers acting alone to be involved in a child's death. Interestingly, the graph does not make any distinctions between biological fathers and stepfathers, which, given custody statistics, would likely show that children are safer by far around biological fathers than any other adults.

Perhaps another reason the feminists fail to mention physical abuse and neglect of children is the fact that most victims are male children, and mothers are involved most of the time.

Feminists are not concerned about children's welfare so much as they are about gaining political leverage through the use of blame and moral grandstanding. As moral cripples, feminists use sexual abuse as a crutch to give themselves the appearance of righteousness, but the statistics on child fatalities and serious injuries reveal the truth about their position. Feminists don't really care about children; they only care about political power and the leverage that gives them to steal and appropriate resources and positions of influence.

Remember: every time feminists make a moral case against men, they are covering up a festering sore of their own creation.

End of the Line for Barefoot Bandit

Colton Harris Moore was finally caught in The Bahamas, taken into custody after a water chase in which Bahamian police opened fire on his boat, disabling the engine. Colton grew up as a poor boy in a single mother household in Camano Island, Washington, learning to steal from a young age. He spent a great deal of time in the thick evergreen woods of Island County, into which he would disappear after burglarizing houses and businesses.

The teenager taught himself to fly by watching instructional videos and using flight simulators, and soon began stealing planes, which he used to leave his pursuers in the dust. After the net started closing in on him in Washington state, he fled across the country, stealing a number of cars to make his way to the midwest, where he broke into an airport and stole a Cessna, flying it to the Bahamas and crash-landing the plane near the beach of Abaco Island.

In the Bahamas, rather than maintain a low profile and hide out, Colton broke into several homes and businesses, stole boats and hung out in bars. Eventually, his brash defiance of the law led to his capture on Eleuthera Island, and now he's facing time in a Bahamian prison, and eventual extradition to the US, where he will certainly face numerous charges, and the prospect of a long stint in prison.

In the meanwhile, his mother, Pam Kohler, is lining up book and movie deals, from which she hopes to profit. Colton Harris Moore's life as a free man may be essentially over at this point, but at least the mother who did such a lousy job of raising him will get something out of the waste of a young life.

Rampage in New Mexico over Albuquerque DV Case

A man armed with a gun stormed into a fiber optics manufacturing company today killing five, including his ex-wife or girlfriend, before taking his own life. Four others are in the hospital with gunshot wounds, including two who are undergoing emergency surgery. The man's children have been located and are fine. According to one article, the man was a former employee of the company, so there was obviously some grievance besides simply the ex-wife/girlfriend. Perhaps some of her coworkers were offering her support in a pending court case, or perhaps he was laid off; these are a couple of things I can think of that have sparked mass shootings in the past.

Interestingly, the police are quoted saying that the shooting resulted from a "domestic violence dispute." This could mean that the man had recently been served with a restraining order, which seems in many cases to provoke these shootings. When a couple lives together and one would like to end the relationship, they may avail themselves of a restraining order which will summarily eject the unwanted partner from the domicile by force of law. This is supposed to prevent contact, but in some instances so enrages the recipient of the order that he (or she sometimes) retaliates with deadly force.

We don't know whether this is the case in this particular shooting, but given how many suicides these breakups cause, there are bound to be some people who will take action against others besides simply themselves.

Reporting Recent Facebook + Blizzard Copy-Pasta Fail

Ok, first a disclaimer.

I haven't played WoW since April. Got fed up of drama and bullshit and cat-herding dorks with a sense of entitlement who should have never crawled up from their "No child left Behind" classroom.

That out, if any of you got even close to a videogame blog, you just couldn't have missed the spectacle.

It all starts with this:

> The first and most significant change is that in the near future, anyone posting or replying to a post on official Blizzard forums will be doing so using their Real ID — that is, their real-life first and last name – with the option to also display the name of their primary in-game character alongside it.

Oh yeah. You read that right. Want to post in the forums? Well, you have to put yourself in mercy of the Internet.

As you can see for the 81 page thread (without mentioning the many, many others on those forums alone), anyone with, I don't know, a life, said: No. Screw That.

The funny part is this:

> The official forums have always been a great place to discuss the latest info on our games, offer ideas and suggestions, and share experiences with other players — however, the forums have also earned a reputation as a place where flame wars, trolling, and other unpleasantness run wild. Removing the veil of anonymity typical to online dialogue will contribute to a more positive forum environment, promote constructive conversations, and connect the Blizzard community in ways they havenâ€™t been connected before.

Uh huh. This is is totally for cleaning out the forums, and NOT for grabbing Facebook monies.

I'm not going to link ALL THE POSTS that cry about this, but going around the Internet found this.

Ok, first of all, I am against Facebook. For any man who has to use it, I recommend this guide. Now the basic matter, keeping it as short and simple as possible, is not only that it isn't a good idea to using Game over the Internet, but also the main reason Facebook is a problem: It sells your information for profit. That's enough money to cause a backlash.

More specially designed publicity for keeping the Consumerism machine running. Or getting death threats from whatever group decides to be offended.

Yes, I have evidence.

Also, to state the obvious, somebody is going to get killed when Dorky McDork realizes that the camwhore that he has so faithfully served isn't going to put up. Or when hubby discovers that the soon-to-be-ex (but with future payments ensured) has been getting some extra penetrations in her orifices.

Newsflash: Everybody with your name + your IP can find where you live, where you work, who is your family. Just ask the sacrified minion. Or the recent memory of "Lady" (sic) trailer trash's attack on a esteemed member of this community.

To make a long story short, after some days of raging, and (of course) getting the Legal (6 months or less, CNN is going to be broadcasting the $100 million lawsuit) and Accounting (the flow of the money has been disturbed) teams' opinion, they decided to pull it back.

Of course, many of the arguments against this measure were to protect women, children and "minorities" from the EVIL STRAIGHT WHITE GUYS. Take that as you will.

The Symbiotic Relationship Between Misandry and Power

Welmer · 12 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Not long ago, I had a vivid dream in which I was given the opportunity to confront someone who had done me wrong. There were several characters who were encouraging me to air my grievances and to act on them. They were even amplifying them, blowing things out of proportion and getting me worked up. As I went down the list of injustices, growing angrier and more indignant, I eventually reached a point where I lashed out and struck the object of my rage. At this point, everything changed, and now I was the guilty party. My feelings of anger changed immediately to fear and guilt.

It sounds like a simple dream, but it gave me a bit of insight into how people justify treating others badly, abusing them, and doing them harm. It seems obvious on the face of it that an object of scorn, fear and hatred will receive harsh treatment, but we tend to assume that we are rational people who are not susceptible to a base appeal to emotion. However, on some level it affects all of us. Perhaps the effect is subtle for the individual, but mass society magnifies it, and then politicizes it, and then it takes on a life of its own.

The demonization of men in our society is a case in point. At first it seemed that just a few crazy feminists were making ineffectual noise out there, but some of what they said struck a chord with a lot of women. It must not have been too hard to play to women's insecurities in the early days of second wave feminism, when women were still largely dependent on men for both financial and physical security. I can't exactly put myself in a woman's shoes, but I can imagine that being surrounded by stronger people with more wealth and political power would be a bit disconcerting. Relying on these people might seem a bit risky, especially during the culturally and sexually anarchic time of the 1960s and 70s. Playing to women's fears and anger at their plight right at that time would be an astute political move, so savvy activists and politicians did just that.

After the breakthrough in the late 60s, there was a crescendo of anti-male hatred that grew at least until the 1990s, when it culminated in some of the most abusive and punitive laws ever passed in the United States. Some other countries followed suit – most notably Australia and Canada – but none went quite so far. It only took a few decades of vilification of men to twist social policy into a truly oppressive instrument of punishment and resource extraction. And, paradoxically, it didn't take outright misandry or radicalism on the part of most women, or even a majority, but rather only a little fear and a little anger in enough of them to sway their votes. And all it took to place those seeds in women's minds was a few activists, a few movies and a few sensational stories.

Perhaps this is one of the inherent dangers of representative democracy in mass society. Shocking stories are transmitted instantly, blown out of proportion and turned into common experiences. Subtle undercurrents of fear and discontent are exploited by politicians for a crucial edge in elections. Promises are made, laws are passed, and in some cases the negative fallout can even appear to justify legislative fiascoes. Power is gained, above all, by exploiting, encouraging, and amplifying emotions — positive or negative is of little consequence if it can get votes and bring in the money.

In this light, it is easier to see how misandry has been exploited for over a generation — women's emotions have been fuel for the generation of political power. Misandry has made careers, elected presidents, and influenced the makeup of the Supreme Court. However, as my dream suggested, there is a dark side side to this. These emotions eventually culminated in action, and many men have been at the receiving end of this pent up hatred and anger. Just as the few sensational crimes become a common experience, so does the generalized hatred of men.

And so the fear and frustration – some of which was doubtless justified – has resulted in a great deal of injustice. Men are automatically suspect, their due process rights are ignored, and they are dispossessed without a hint of guilt. After years of being painted as the enemy, it was inevitable that men would eventually be treated that way.

According to Army Times, 18 Vets Commit Suicide Per Day

Welmer · 13 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Amongst veterans who are receiving some treatment from the VA, there are 950 suicide attempts per month, but most vets who commit suicide are not receiving any treatment. The overwhelming majority of successful suicide attempts are committed by male vets, including 1,621 known attempts by Iraq and Afghanistan vets last year.

The article in the Army Times does not delve into the reasons for suicide, but others have, and divorce and family destruction apparently play a larger role than anything else.

Attempts by the VA to perform a sort of triage for soldiers whose lives have been wrecked by wives, babymommas, girlfriends, etc., are alleviating the problem to some degree; a hotline the VA set up gets some 10,000 calls per month.

Unfortunately, the article ends on the familiar "blame the men" note we're all familiar with, stating:

> In general, VA officials said, women attempt suicide more often, but men are more likely to succeed in the attempt, mainly because women use less lethal and less violent means while men are more likely to use firearms.

This is not true. Men succeed more often because they know they will not get as much sympathy and help, and therefore have a greater desire to die. Women – especially soldiers – are not so stupid as to be ignorant of what's required to successfully kill oneself — they simply know that a suicide "attempt" will gain them great sympathy and help. As long as our culture encourages abuse and exploitation of men for the benefit of women and elite men, the male suicide rate will continue to be some four to five times as high as the female rate. Trying to obfuscate that fact by pretending that women are equally as burdened, but simply too frail and delicate to actually carry out a suicide, is part of the reason this problem is perpetuated.

Animals of the Manosphere

Welmer · 13 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've noticed that feminists often like to bring up animal behavior to justify feminism. There are some animals that behave in a manner that's agreeable to them, so they frequently point to these species as shining examples of how humans could improve themselves.

It's an interesting concept, so I thought I'd bring up a few animals and how they might relate to different philosophies and lifestyles from the gender relations point of view.

To be fair, I'll start with the feminist animals.

Egalitarian, liberated Feminist in the trees: The Bonobo

The animal feminists most often bring up in public is the bonobo, which is a lesser kind of chimpanzee they hold to be given to matriarchal organization, promiscuity, homosexuality and group masturbation. There is some dispute over this; in the 1980s some researchers reported that this behavior was primarily caused by captivity, but certain female researchers have upheld the traditional view of matriarchal, sexually liberated bonobos.

In bonobo society, groups of females dominate the communities, often rubbing each other's genitalia to reinforce their social bonds. Bonobos unbeknownst to each other will often copulate upon meeting, and they do not form monogamous pairs, but rather freely copulate with each other, including immediate family members. Interestingly, it seems that common chimpanzees, which are larger, stronger and more aggressive than bonobos, have a very different society in which males dominate. In common chimp society, the males have more access to heterosexual sex, whereas bonobo males often must compensate for lack of hetero sex through homoerotic behavior.

Although seen as peaceful animals, bonobos do sometimes practice cannibalism. In one case in the Congo, an infant died of unknown causes and was then consumed by its mother and an older sister. It appears that family bonds mean little to bonobos, since they have sexual relations so freely and with so many different individuals.

Radical Feminist of the savannah: The Spotted Hyena

The spotted hyena is a carnivorous animal that lives in matriarchal packs and frequently scavenges food. Hyenas are notable for their enormous jaw strength, which allows them to crush bones with a bite, and their cackling call that sounds like the laughter of a lunatic.

Female hyenas are not only larger and more aggressive than males; they have a similar organ known as a "pseudopenis." Formed from a greatly enlarged clitoris, the pseudopenis, which can attain an erection, is used for copulation, urination and giving birth. When attempting sex, the male hyena must cajole the female into presenting her pseudopenis for insertion. It is a tricky maneuver, and can take considerable time, during which the male may be shoved aside by another male, or possibly attacked by a predator.

Female hyena dominance is a bit of a mystery to scientists, but may have evolved due to intra-litter competition between cubs. The female cubs often fight each other while in the den, and the winner obtains the most food and survives. Over millions of years, this appears to have resulted in very aggressive, large and dominant females.

African folklore tends to view hyenas as unclean hermaphrodytes with shape-shifting properties. Tanzanian tales tell of witches riding hyenas; West Africans see the animals as representing abnormality and immorality.

MGTOW in the open sea: The Sperm Whale

[image]

Also known as the cachalot, the sperm whale is so named because spermaceti, the milky-looking substance found in its huge head, resembles semen. Male sperm whales can grow to almost 70 feet long and weigh over 60 tons. In the past, before commercial whaling took its toll by selectively hunting larger males, they may have been larger. Accounts from two hundred years ago describe sperm whales of up to 90 feet long. Former whaler Herman Melville, captivated by the story of the sinking of the whaleship Essex by a large bull, wrote Moby Dick, using the white whale to symbolize both the profundity and futility of men's struggles with fate.

Upon reaching maturity at about 18 years of age, male sperm whales break off from the pod and travel to the richer waters of higher latitudes. There, they form groups with other males to keep each other company, and possibly to cooperate in hunting giant squid, their favorite prey. As males get older they tend to travel in smaller groups, with some old males living essentially alone. From time to time, these males will return to the tropics to mate with females and then, their desire satisfied, return to their hunting grounds.

Bonding between males is little understood, but stories of males beaching themselves together suggest that they form close attachments, and may have a great deal of affection for their fellows. Having nothing to fear from any other beasts of the sea, perhaps loneliness is the only hazard of being an adult male sperm whale. Little is known about these intelligent animals, which have the largest brain of any organism on earth, due to their preference for open waters and their ability to dive to extreme depths (over a mile) for up to an hour and a half at a time.

The Noble Masculinist: The Lion

Lions, the big cats with a regal bearing, used to occupy a much larger range, living in Europe in historical times and Asia until very recently. There exists a relict population in India, but they have been extirpated from much of their former range, so almost all wild lions currently live in Africa.

Lions have long been associated with nobility and virility, the glorious manes and rippling muscles of the males contributing to an impressive form, augmented by a fearsome roar that can strike terror into those who hear it. As apex predators, lions dominate the African savannah, taking prey as large as elephants. The most social of the big cats, they live in prides dominated by a few males.

Female lions live exclusively in prides, and do the majority of the hunting. Day after day, the females are sent off to hunt while the male or males that rule the pride patrol the territory to stave off attacks by potential marauders. When the lionesses bring back the prey, the males are the first to eat, although they are more tolerant toward cubs than the females and will often allow the little ones to dine alongside them.

Male lions, upon reaching maturity, will leave their pride and form pairs with other males, with whom they cooperate in hunting and play until they are ready to take on a pride of their own. Prides usually consist of half a dozen females and a male or two, although sometimes more males may form a coalition to run a pride. Female lions do not tolerate outside females, and males must fend off opportunistic nomad males from time to time.

Aside from humans, the lions' greatest rival is the hermaphroditic, feminist hyena, who often scavenges his kills in packs and will attempt from time to time to drive lions away. The enmity between the species is extraordinary, and they have been observed systematically exterminating each other. One male lion, for example, killed several hyena matriarchs in quick succession, leaving their corpses to rot as a warning to other would be harassers.

Herb of the eelgrass: The Sea Horse

The timid, odd-looking sea horse, a distant relative of the pipefish, has a peculiar method of gestation in which the male rather than female tends the young. Female sea horses deposit eggs into a pouch on the males abdomen, where they are then sealed in by a growth of tissue and internally inseminated by the male. To attract females, the male flutters around in front of the female, pumping water through his pouch to display his receptivity to her eggs.

Once the eggs have been deposited in the male and fertilized, he produces the hormone prolactin, which is used in humans to produce milk, to stimulate the growth of the fertilized eggs. After about two months, the eggs hatch and the baby sea horses emerge as tiny, but fully formed, little fish.

Males are known to compete with each other for female attention. They have been observed slapping each other with their snouts and pulling each other's tails, but they put more effort into forming bonds with females prior to mating. In tests, the male seahorses that made an effort to greet the female every morning by holding grass with her and matching her color changes were preferentially chosen by the female.

White Knighting Socon of the rocky shores: The Elephant Seal

[image]Elephant seals, a huge, noisy seal species in which the male sports a large growth around his nose, spend an inordinate amount of effort trying to corral herds of females. Weighing in at up to five tons and insulated with a thick layer of blubber, elephant seals can nevertheless move surprisingly quickly on land. They can dive for longer than any other seals, and have voracious appetites.

To achieve dominance, and therefore mating rights, male elephant seals inflate their fleshy snouts and utter loud challenging snorts. If that fails, the males confront each other, butting chests and snorting all the while while attempting to chase each other off. In these contests, vicious bites can be exchanged, but the results are seldom deadly. In most cases, smaller or immature males are simply chased away by the bellowing bulls, who then may monopolize a huge harem of up to 100 females.

The dominant males are extremely aggressive in "protecting" females from other males, and therefore the vast majority of male elephant seals never achieve alpha – or even beta – status. It is estimated that only 10% of males will ever have the opportunity to attain breeding rights.

All in the Family: The Wolf

Widely distributed across the northern hemisphere, the ancestor of domestic dogs and rival of humans, the wolf has proven to be one of the most adaptive and successful carnivores in the world. Wolves are handsome animals, revered and feared by ancient tribes for their wit and ferocity. Although physically impressive, wolves' success derives mostly from their ability to cooperate in both the hunt and raising young. It was those traits that made them attractive companions to men in the Paleolithic, leading to the domestication and eventual evolution into dogs of some ancient packs.

The term "alpha male" is often used to denote the dominant male in a wolf pack, but in the wild this has little meaning, as packs are essentially monogamous nuclear families with some pups and juveniles biding their time until they can strike off on their own. The adult pair, one male and one female, is very intolerant of outsiders, and interlopers are frequently killed. Polygamy may occur from time to time, but females will kill the litters of their rivals, so this is not a successful mating strategy.

In providing for the family, the male and the female – and sometimes juveniles – cooperate to bring down prey, and the cubs are given preferential access to the food. While wolves will discipline cubs by nipping them from time to time, they are very tolerant of the little ones and will put up with a good deal of abuse from playful pups. When mothers are nursing very small pups, fathers hunt alone to provide food for the family, but after a few weeks the mothers rejoin the fathers to jointly provide sustenance for the young.

Most wolves eventually pair up, and do not seek out a new mate unless the current partner dies. They are unfailingly loyal to each other and dedicated to working together to secure a future for their offspring. This combination of qualities allowed the wolf – prior to its widespread extirpation by humans – to occupy one of the largest ranges of any mammalian land carnivore on earth.

After Rampage, Raoul Moat Becoming Cult Hero

Welmer · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Raoul Moat, the Newcastle man who went on a shooting spree after being jailed in a domestic violence dispute and subsequently killed himself during a police standoff on Saturday, has attracted the attention and sympathy of thousands in Britain. A number of people feel that Mr. Moat was mistreated by the courts and the law, and sympathize with his rage toward police officers, which appears to have been set off by his girlfriend – the mother of his child – taunting him by saying that she was sleeping with a cop.

I must admit that, as an American, this is a bit astonishing to me, as men are killed by the police in pretty much the same circumstances on a daily basis in the US. Perhaps the British people have not yet become desensitized to killings over family law disputes.

However, some of the glee over Moat's rampage is a bit unseemly from my point of view:

> A mother, who did not want to be named, said she was horrified when she heard young children playing in the street singing the words â€œRaoul Moat is the man, heâ€™ll kill the coppers when he can.â€
> The 26-year-old said: â€œBelieve it or not he had a lot of support around Kenton, but that is the mentality of people.
> â€œI seem to be the only one that thinks that what he did was wrong. Everybody was supporting him, they even made up a song.
> â€œItâ€™s like heâ€™s some kind of hero. My friendsâ€™ kids are running around singing about him.

Perhaps there are two things at work here:

In some respects, the US is far worse than the UK, and in others the UK takes the cake. For example, American men are killed all the time when they become despondent/enraged over being done wrong by a woman. It's fairly routine — the cops sneak up in battle gear, surround the house, and then make a surprise move to apprehend the man. If there's any resistance, "suspicious movements" or such, they try to kill him right there. If not, he's dragged to jail and thrown in a rubber room with a small hole in the floor (suicide prevention). However, if they can't actually kill or apprehend him with the surprise tactics, there is often a drawn out standoff with helicopters, loudspeakers, neighborhood evacuation, etc., that is pretty much guaranteed to place the maximum amount of stress on the subject. Often, this prompts some irrational move, which allows a sniper to take him out with a head shot, or it simply drives the man to kill himself (this seems to be the most common scenario). This is really awful stuff, but commonplace in the US. Perhaps it would be (rightfully) seen as barbaric by British people.

Where Britain may be worse than the US is in the yob/chav culture, in which young men and women behave with utter disregard for social norms. One can see drunk young men fighting in the street, young women passing out in their own vomit with their pants around their ankles, etc.

So maybe when one mixes legitimate disgust for the treatment the man received from family court with the rather degenerate behavior of a certain segment of the British population, there's bound to be some admiration for what Moat did.

Of course, here in the US, people are cheering for Colton Harris-Moore, who just got nabbed in the Bahamas following a long crime spree.

Whatever the reasons for the outlaw cults, they suggests that a whole lot of people on both sides of the pond have little respect or love for the folks in charge of running things. That doesn't bode well for long-term stability.

Have to Do It

Welmer · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been wanting to install WordPress 3.0 for some time now. Unfortunately, I can't do so without breaking the connection between the site and forum. Hopefully, WP-United will come out with a mod soon, but I can't wait forever.

What this means is that the forum will no longer be connected with commenting on the main site. Those who registered with the forum will still be able to post freely there, but now posting on the main site will be open (with moderation for first-time posters). This will probably increase posting volume, but hopefully we can maintain some quality.

What I'd like to see is some evolution of the forum into a core group of people who are seriously dedicated to men's issues. I think this will happen naturally, but time will tell. No more drive-by commenting will be tolerated in the forum, so it will become more of an elite club. We'll see how that works, but I can guarantee that disruptive forum commenters will face a lot more scrutiny from here on out.

How we Kill Johnny

Paul Elam · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It was three weeks after I left the last residential treatment center for which I would ever work. A Saturday morning to be precise, and the phone rang- jarring me from the rare pleasure of a sleep in.

It was Camille, so I knew it wasnâ€™t good. She wouldnâ€™t call me if it were good.

â€œYou remember that boy Johnny you worked with, the one from Louisiana?â€ she asked.

â€œYeah, why?â€

â€œDead,â€ she said. It was uttered in the tone of someone doing a poor job acting like they didnâ€™t like delivering bad news.

â€œDrugs?â€ I asked.

â€œNo,â€ she replied, â€œSuicide. Killed that little girl he was married to, as well. And shot some guy she was sleepinâ€™ with, but he made it.â€

I just lay there silent.

â€œAnyway, I knew you would want to know.â€

I hung up without saying anything else. Knew I would want to know? My ass. Couldnâ€™t wait to tell me was more like it. This bitch was a feminist crusader, on wheels. She made a career of telling the men we counseled what louts they were for being men, and I made a career of pulling them aside and telling them how full of shit she was. We were the only two counselors in that program and the mix was volatile. I spent many days in the administrative offices fending off complaints about my â€œunusual styleâ€ in dealing with male clients.

That is what they called not hating them.

Johnny wasnâ€™t the first in twenty years of doing that kind of work. Quite honestly, I had lost count. But counting is just for statistics anyway. In the work I did the numbers had faces. They had families and stories that I learned from listening to them. And they had pain that mostly went unnoticed by the very people that were supposed to be there to help them.

I remembered Johnnyâ€™s story, and his pain. He was a twenty two year old stock boy at an auto parts store in the hot and humid swamp lands of southern Louisiana. When he spoke, it was with rural earnestness, and a Cajun accent thicker than gators in bayou country.

â€œMan, Paul, I doan know what to do â€˜bout that girl oâ€™ mine. I know she cheatinâ€™. I know I doan make a dime what she donâ€™t spend right away. Sometime she spend it on some other guy. But I canâ€™t help it. Every time she call my name I got to come runninâ€™. Lord never made a bigger fool than me.â€

And Johnny was right. He was a fool, and couldnâ€™t be talked out of his foolishness. Just like all real men. And his story isnâ€™t reserved just for those who drink and drug themselves into oblivion because they have a woman they canâ€™t live with, or without.

In this awful age of misandry, we live so many lies about men that we have lost all touch with the reality of what they are really like. And the cost of it is written in caskets and countless souls lost in a world with no memory of why they died.

You see, men love. They love with the most profound intensity and selflessness of which any creature on this earth is capable. And the steely bond between them and women is, unlike their hearts, unbreakable. When men die on the battlefield, they often fade away telling fellow soldiers â€œTell my wife I love her.â€ Others cry out for their mothers as blood soaks the soil.

They are flattened by divorce, and many will eat a gun rather than face the loss, even if it is the loss of someone that has already destroyed their lives.

They will lay down in traffic for the women they love and stand in the way of bullets to protect them. And they will strike down any many who dares offend them. They have been doing this for all of human history.

Yet all this has been rewritten with misandric ink. It has been revised by scholars who tell us men are bad, by psychologists whose main field of work seems to be recommending divorce, complete with male scapegoat, as a cure all for women for whatever petty dissatisfactions they feel about their mates. And it has been inculcated into the consciousness of our family law system, driving men to despair and despondency on levels never before seen in history.

If you want the statistics, go look them up. I am tired of turning dead men into numbers and â€œprovingâ€ there is a problem to the Camilleâ€™s of this world.

I hope, more than anything else, that at some point in our future that people start to think. When you see the story on the evening news about a man who set himself ablaze outside a family court, ask yourself what kind of pain could drive someone to cure it with fire? When you read in the newspaper about the man who holed up in his house with a gun and his children, threatening to take them all out, ask yourself if this is just a crazy man, or a man driven to the brink by a pain so monstrous and devastating that even the unthinkable could become an option?

Indeed, there is a great deal we have to ask. The only problem is that all the wrong people are asking all the wrong problems. We have a president who marks Fatherâ€™s Day by shaming men for not being better Dads. We have psychotherapists telling us that it is women who love too much. And we have a system of higher education that cares more about the life expectancy of a fruit fly than a young man who blows his brains out.

And this in a culture that still raises men to put women in lifeboats and then try their hand at breathing saltwater, as though death were their only true calling.

Is it any wonder why, when we create men to so devalue their own existence; to be disposable, that we can so often see them doing just what we have insisted that they do? And shouldn't we, perhaps, question at times whether it is suicide that takes these men… or murder? Who, after all, is putting the gun in their hands and promising them the pain will stop if they only pull the trigger?

Perhaps Obama, in his own erroneous way, is right. We do need better Dads.

We need Dads to teach their sons, not "how to treat a woman," but how hold their own with them. We don't need to teach them to "take care of their woman," but to only accept one who demonstrates the character and integrity to be trusted, from the start. And we need to teach them how rare that is in modern life. More than anything else, we need to teach them how to let women go, and watch them as they grow up to make sure they can do it. And we need Dads to role model that, in their own families with their own wives.

In other words, we need to do a lot of things that we are not doing.

I know it is obligatory. I canâ€™t write a piece like this and not include some resources for men to call in in times of crisis, such as those paltry resources are. So I will include something at the end. But I would still like to think, that somewhere, at some point in time, we can quit offering Band-aids for men to put on tumors and start helping them with their real problems.

It seems, hell or high water, that we are going to continue to destroy men in courtrooms and therapy offices and offer them up as convenient political fodder. It isnâ€™t anything new. So we better start calling on the fathers of this world to stop raising their sons to do nothing more than stand against a wall for whatever woman is in their lives, just waiting for their turn in a box.

Raoul Moat's Manifesto

Welmer · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

At the beginning of Raoul's ill-fated defiance of authorities and vengeance raid, police mentioned that he had written a 50 page manifesto detailing his grievances. Of course, this hasn't been published, and I don't know whether it's been released or not. However, I think these things ought to be exposed so people can see what's going on inside the mind of someone who has lost it and is willing to kill.

Now that Mr. Moat is dead, there's no good reason to withhold that manifesto, and I'd like to see it. I'm sure I'm not alone in that sentiment.

If anyone can obtain the manifesto, I would be happy to publish it so people can see what drove this man to a murderous rampage. I think the Newcastle city council is morally obliged to release the information, so that we may prevent these kinds of incidents in the future.

If anyone has access to Raoul's manifesto, please contact me through the contact form. I guarantee that anonymity – if it is so desired – will be maintained. As an American, I have absolutely no restrictions on publishing this material, and will do so no matter how the Newcastle authorities feel about it. Additionally, I am not obliged to reveal any foreign sources, so whosoever might want to send it to me has nothing to fear.

The Journey of a Thousand Miles Begins With a Single Step

Featured Guest · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's guest post was written by Meistergedanken]

Just thought I would share a storyâ€¦ There are a couple commenters here who every so often show up only to accuse the SH readership of being whiners who do nothing but complain about their circumstances and how unfair society has become. â€œYou losers never DO anythingâ€, they intone self-righteously.

Well, last weekend my sister-in-law was getting married to her lost-cause beta provider (who will provide her with the funds necessary to mold her two daughters from the first marriage into the princesses they deserve to be), and my wife and I were hosting their cousin from Las Vegas, who brought along her boyfriend of six months.

While the women were out Friday night cutting loose with a â€œbachelorettaâ€ party (the purpose of which escapes me, because while the bachelor party is commemorating a voluntary relinquishment of freedom, the â€œbachelorettaâ€ is only getting more control), I was tasked with spending time with the boyfriend. I stifled my introverted nature and made an effort to get to know him, and he turned out to be more interesting and intelligent than I anticipated. Heâ€™s 24, currently unemployed because he lost his IT job, and aware that he is at a crossroads. Over a fine dinner and a few drinks we talked about goals, and how to be content in life, and how crazy everything is right now. I sensed my opportunity, and I took itâ€¦

I told him about the hidden pitfalls of long-term relationships, and we discussed gender dynamics. I told him about how marriage for Western men is a raw deal. I described what you lose, and what you gain (not much), and warned him as much as I was able. He was receptive and agreed with everything I said, having suspected some of it already, and had lots of questions about why women act the way they do, which I did my best to answer. We had a great time, despite all the heavy discussion.

The next day the cousin was curious as to what we talked about for six hours, and without disclosing the above, we mentioned a host of other topics that came up, making her eyes widen in wonder. â€œI think you know more about my boyfriend now than I do!â€ she exclaimed. â€˜Thatâ€™s because you talk too much, and donâ€™t listen enough,â€ I replied. She frowned.

At the wedding reception Sunday evening, the boyfriend made an off-the-cuff comment about how, even if he did ever get married, it would be many years from now, causing the cousin to storm off in a huff. I gave him kudos for the sentiment, but cautioned him at his lack of discretion.

Last night, my wife said â€œI donâ€™t know about the boyfriend, he doesnâ€™t seem to want to make a commitment. I think heâ€™s immature!â€

â€œHa!â€ I thought to myself, â€œmaybe heâ€™s more mature than you think.â€

We know better, donâ€™t we, gents?

Our success will come with that old, but still puissant mechanism: word-of-mouth. If everyone on this site can just convince one or two guys a year to open their eyes and make a few different choices, then the impact will inevitably ripple throughout the entire society. Itâ€™s Chaos Theory at its finest.

Upgrades

Welmer · 14 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been putting in some long hours trying to make this transition smooth, and although there have been a few bumps in the road (still having some problems with text encoding causing weird characters in old posts, but I think I can find a fix), it could have been a lot worse. Good job, WordPress!

Not sure what the upshot will be in the immediate future, but now The Spearhead will be able to host multiple sites. The idea is to give men and supportive women the opportunity to host their own blogs here. A few writers have already expressed interest, so I decided to go ahead and install this feature. Despite the frustration involved with installing the network capability, I think it's a pretty cool thing to have.

We can now import blogger blogs, wordpress.com blogs, etc.

I think this could be a powerful tool for getting the word out and giving men and women who are tired of our dysfunctional society an opportunity to be be heard and to make their case. That's really the founding idea behind The Spearhead, and I sincerely hope these new features prove to be a step in that direction.

Glowing Accounts of Female Texas Mayor Who Killed her Daughter

Welmer · 15 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Coppel Texas – Jane Peters, the mayor of an upscale Dallas suburb, committed a murder suicide last Thursday, killing her daughter and then herself with gunshots to the head. She left several suicide notes, including a warning tacked on the door to anyone who might show up to check on them.

Neighbors have expressed shock and sorrow, and a number of people are in a state of disbelief, as Peters was a respected and well-liked member of the community. They have characterized the event as a senseless tragedy, and mourn the passing of both women.

What strikes me as a notable about this reporting is that whenever a man does something like this, no sympathy is reported. Sometimes the occasional neighbor is quoted as saying he never had any trouble from the man, but this is often used to indicate that there must have been some hidden dark side to a man who appeared to be normal on the outside. Usually, the man is portrayed as a horrible person, and guilty and deserving punishment. His death is the "cowardly, easy way out." There might be some truth to this, but why the lack of any blame when a woman does the same thing, killing her own child?

There is something very odd about Anglo culture that holds that when women kill their own children it is a "tragedy" rather than a crime. Perhaps this is a result of years of indoctrination about abortion. After all these years of affirming the moral neutrality (and, in some cases benefit) of women killing their children, it may have been inevitable that women who kill adult children are also granted a pass, unlike men.

But what does this say about the moral stature of women? Does a society that holds that only men are morally culpable for what happens to their children really believe that women are fully human? To be a full human being, there must be accountability. This is reflected in our Judeo-Christian philosophy, which holds that we are judged by God for our actions. Animals are exempt, but we even hold children accountable, a practice reflected by sentencing juveniles "as adults."

However, it seems that women have somehow escaped this judgment, which suggests that there has been a fundamental philosophical change.

While in China, a female friend of mine related a story to me concerning a filicide. One family had a grown daughter who was mentally ill. She brought great shame, frustration and loss of face to the family. Eventually, fed up with it, her father killed her. My friend related the story with great sympathy for the father. The man was arrested, tried and eventually pardoned. The Chinese people understood the pain and difficulty he faced dealing with his insane daughter. In China, the father is ultimately the arbiter of a family's life and death.

Would a father have gotten away with this in the US? No chance. But a mother might have. Our reactions to violence may be the best indicator of how our society truly feels about things. It may be that feminism has made women into the ultimate arbiters of life and death in the United States, with more moral authority to kill than God Himself. Very strange days we live in.

Lutheran Woman Bishop Resigns Over Handling of Sex Scandal

Welmer · 16 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As feminists denounce pope Benedict XVI for affirming the male-only priesthood, and claim that the sex abuse scandal is proof that females must take on authority in the Catholic Church, "Bishop" Maria Jepsen of the Lutheran church, elected in 1992, has stepped down from her post for exactly the same problem.

Saying her "credibility has been put in question," Jepsen does not think she can carry out her duties any longer. The suspicion revolves around a certain Lutheran priest in Ahrensburg who had been molesting children since the 1980s. Jepsen claims that she didn't know about the priest until recently, but not everyone believes her.

Another German female church leader, Margot Kaesmann, resigned recently after being caught driving under the influence.

My own personal take on the feminist drive to put women in charge of the church is that their stated goals – to eliminate abuse is the latest excuse – are entirely disingenuous. Having been raised Catholic in possibly the most radically leftist archdiocese in the United States – Seattle – I know well that some of the most criminal priests were those most loved and favored by feminists and other assorted radical leftists. One in particular was supported with a great deal of money, and while his dalliances with boys must have been well-known, they were ignored, and possibly even covered up by his supporters.

Josef Ratzinger was actually tasked with dealing with my archdiocese back in the 1980s, and he ended up forcing the resignation of archbishop Raymond Hunthausen, who had tolerated, even appearing to encourage, a promiscuous homosexual subculture in the local church. Priests were dropping like flies from AIDS until the anti-retroviral drugs came out in the 90s (the euphemism of choice was "pneumonia"), and lesbians held weekly meetings in churches. Collections were taken up for the Sandinistas, pro-Soviet protests carried out at local military bases, etc.

So it hardly seems realistic that the current pope had anything to do with these scandals, which from all evidence I have seen emerged from this mass heresy that took hold and lasted for over a generation following Vatican II. If anything, he was one of the few officials dealing with it when the problem was at its worst in the 1980s. All I can say is that I don't envy the job that man has; from my perspective it looks like a Sisyphean task.

Vatican Reaffirms Male-Only Priesthood, Feminists Go Nuts

Welmer · 16 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, the Vatican released a document that included provisions for changing its laws regarding sex crimes. The document also contained language condemning the attempted ordination of women as a crime. Naturally, feminists are outraged, and have suggested that the Catholic Church equates the two. However, this perception may be mainly their end: a number of feminists have been drawing connections between the lack of priestesses and sexual abuse in the church for quite some time. Sinead O'Connor, for example, has come out strongly against the current and former pope and has had herself ordained as a priestess in a heretical sect. Maureen Dowd has suggested that a female pope (a contradiction in terms — pope means "father"), would solve the church's problems.

Feminist pressure groups that favor a female-dominated church have claimed that the church's denial of sexuality has led to sex crimes. Christian Weisner, of "We Are Church," said:

> The Roman Catholic Church has to revise its sexual teachings because I think that this is the root of pedophile crime

While mandated priestly celibacy may have something to do with illicit sex, it is likely that the changing external society had more to do with aberrant behavior than the centuries-old practices of the Roman Catholic Church.

For a fascinating example of how church teachings were subverted in the 20th century, watch the following video:

Ancient and modern religions characterized by priestesses have traditionally devolved into prostitution cults. Today, a persistent problem in India involves the use of sacred prostitutes, known as "yogini" or "devadesi," to augment temple income. In the ancient Nordic religion, witches would "ordain" girls, after which a number of men would have sex with them. The girls would then be sacrificed to accompany dead chiefs to Hel (nordic Hell), Valhalla, or wherever they were to go. There are countless examples of priestesses engaging in such behavior.

Summer Vacation

Welmer · 17 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I thought I'd better let readers know why the posting has been a bit inconsistent over the last week. I've got my kids staying with me exclusively for over two weeks, and my folks are in town, so I've been spending a lot of time with family, playing with the kids, on activities, dinners and so forth. This is one reason I decided to do more technical work on the site now as well — I don't have the opportunity to sit in peace and quiet and write.

My kids are happy and healthy, splashing in the kiddie pool in the yard, and getting some sun during our short but beautiful Northwest summer. They're also grazing the bounty of the backyard, stripping all the berries from their bushes, eating mostly outside and playing with all the interesting things kids can find in dirt and grass. It's a nice little respite from the usual dark, wet days and shuttling the kids back and forth between houses, but it isn't all that conducive to work.

There's one more week of this left, and then it's back to the daily grind which, by the end of this vacation, I'll probably be eager to take up once again.

So I hope everyone reading is having a nice summer (or winter if you're down under), and has a similar opportunity to spend time with family and little ones.

When I installed WP 3.0, I had to disable all the plugins, and then reactivate them. Seems I missed the Feedburner plugin for a day, but it should be back up now. Hopefully it wasn't too much trouble. Gave me a hell of a scare when my Feedburner account showed that most of my subscribers had disappeared (they're back after I reinstalled the plugin).

I'm also going to try to upgrade my WordPress theme without causing too much damage, and then install a dynamic content gallery, or something like that, so that featured posts will stay at the top for significantly longer.

Internet technology is in a constant state of evolution, and it's important to stay on top of it, so I'm glad I've got a little time to put into it this week.

Soon, I'll let readers know more about the networking capability. It's actually more powerful than I thought, and allows great customization for user blogs. For now, I'll be under the hood when I've got the time. Maybe this is the modern version of working on your car — at least it is for me.

Coppell Texas "Laughing Stock" After Honoring Murderous Mayor

Welmer · 19 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some new details in the Coppell, Texas murder-suicide have emerged that show the mayor's life as having taken a turn for the worse shortly before she put a loaded pistol to her 19-year-old daughter's head and pulled the trigger, then ended her own life. The contents of suicide notes she left, including a DNR request and provisions for her pets, have been released, as has the fact that she was under investigation for misappropriation of funds.

When first reported, the murder-suicide was painted as a tragedy rather than a crime, which, as it turns out, doesn't sit so well with all Coppell residents.

Thomas Burrows, of Coppell, thought that the decision made by the city of Coppell to lower the flags to half staff was a big mistake, and inappropriate:

> "From what I heard on one of the talk shows this morning, we're the laughingstock of the D-FW metro area right now. If we want to go through closure, put the flag back up and let's move on."

A number of commenters on the Dallas Morning News website denounced the soft touch for the child killer, prompting Coppell City Manager Clay Phillips to go on the defensive, saying:

> "We're not honoring a murderer. We're recognizing the fact that our mayor… the head of our government… has passed."

A few years back David Brame, the Tacoma chief of police killed his estranged wife and himself right in front of his children in a parking lot during a handoff. While some people called the incident a "tragedy," there was absolutely no suggestion that the police or public should publicly mourn David Brame's death, even though he had claimed to be a victim of domestic violence on several occasions (click this link and scroll down to see his sister's version of what went wrong), so in some ways was a more sympathetic figure than Jane Peters. Needless to say, the incident prompted even more punitive legislation against men in Washington state.

Although some Texans are appalled by Coppell's decision to honor a murderer, the attitude behind the choice is reflected in certain comments on WFAA's website, in which a few women go so far as to declare she wasn't a real murderer. Some of the comments hardly seem serious, but I'm pretty certain that they are.

Here are a couple of the choice quotes:

> Why would anybody want to judge and call her a KILLER of her child. Just think of what they must have been going through to see no other way out. How dare anybody bash these ladies–How dare!! Sick critiziers! You should say a prayer for them—better yet—why not HELP them BEFORE this tragic ending. Don't throw stones——and if they lowered the flag – GOOD – she was the mayor after all – not a killer, just an ordinary people in trouble in this troubled economy. They probably did not have the money for the daughter to attend UTA either. It is sad, but no one's business now that they are gone. I say we have lost two lovely ladies to our economic downturn.
> I'm amazed at how judgemental most of these comments are – no open minds here as to the mental illness involved. I can't call Mayor Peters a murderer, simply because "she was in a place in her mind that wasn't reality". I cannot hate someone in so much pain. NEVER JUDGE other's, especially in a case like this. I've "read the rich, the political, the killer, MOTHER – shouldn't be honored by her own city/friends by lowering a 'CITY' flag – not American, or Texas flag. I can't help but feel the anguish and pain she was going through, and feel sympathy for her. LOOK @ the picture, Jayne's eyes are empty/fearful, Corinnes clear/happy.It is not > what it seems in my i\opinion. The men who went on the crime spee that killed an elderly woman, an innocent truck driver, and injured others – are MURDERERS – Mayor Peters was something else – not evil – but desparate – insane. To me there's a difference, even though I know she killed – the agony of killing her daughter (if she did) surreal.

Notice how the woman who killed her daughter is the true victim in these comments (there are others). One holds up an example of true "murderers" — men, of course. Have that many American women truly lost all sense of right and wrong?

Women: Civilization's Center of Gravity

Elusive Wapiti · 19 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Those who claim "women civilize men", or its semantic counterpart "marriage [to a woman] civilizes men", are often guilty of two errors: the first is gross gynocentrism stemming from reflexive pedestalization of the feminine. Women, while central to the family by biological design, possess few overarching civilizing qualities of their own. On the contrary, a cursory look at family units and communities devoid of adult males in leadership positions reveals that the feminine in charge and in isolation is quite unable to sustain a complex civilization. In fact, to analyze the social patterns of such communities is to be transported back in time to humanity's prehistory; it takes little imagination to see that the matriarchal social patterns of the urban ghetto are little more than mud huts gussied up with brick and mortar–the cultural residue of the once-present patriarchal civilization–and that industry and industriousness has been replaced with hunting and gathering.

The second error is mistaking the symptom for the cause. While it is true that married men are more productive than singletons and also generally behave in what can be objectively judged as more socially constructive ways, it is not the presence of women per se that causes men to be more productive or be better behaved. Rather, it is the social institution of patriarchal marriage (marriage 1.0, or simply 'marriage') that does so, for marriage, properly constituted and defended, provides a fellow assurance that the children in his house are indeed his, provides a vehicle through which his need for sexual release is satisfied, and encourages him to channel his excess energies toward himself, his family, and his community. In short, the marriage institution gives him a reason to invest beyond himself. (Marriage also instills socially constructive behaviors that render girls capable of functioning positively within a society, and also accrues many benefits to women that would be absent otherwise, one of which is safety/security. Needless to say there are many other benefits due women from her upholding her role in marriage that I will not address in today's column.)

These popular but still erroneous sayings honor that which does not deserve, and gives short shrift–and therefore obscures from the conventional wisdom–to that which is responsible for and transmits civilization…the masculine. It is men who bequeath the gift of civilization to women and their children, men whose socially constructed and biologically unnecessary roles serve to socialize women, boys, girls, and other men to exist in a society for the benefit of all. So we men have something to celebrate, for our voluntary participation in society and subordination of our desires toward the good of our families and society in general is the literal key to civilization. Moreover, where one sees men focusing on gratifying their own wants first and avoiding entanglements with family is a society operating at much less than full capacity and is most certainly in decline.

But I wish to be careful here and not overstate the male power to create and instill civilization for, as it takes two to tango, the female must also participate. Thus for civilization to work, the feminine must accept the limits to autonomy placed upon it. But women must more than just participate, they must enthusiastically do so. For just as a mother is the center of the family, women are the center of a civilization, and where they go, the civilization goes. In other words, women are a civilization's center of gravity, defined by Clausewitz as > the hub of all power and movement upon which everything depends

Clausewitz encouraged practitioners of war to attack the enemy's center(s) of gravity, for attacks there will have disproportionate effects and may very well paralyze the enemy and his ability or will to resist.

With this women-are-society's-center-of-gravity conceptualization in mind, we see this fact acknowledged and reinforced repeatedly throughout history. The first example I use in the Garden, where Lucifer, knowing that attempting to convince Adam to violate the Law would be futile, focused his efforts instead on the more vulnerable and more important Eve. Why more important? Well, Lucifer knew that if he went after Eve and succeeded, not only would he enjoy a higher probability of success, but that success would be magnified well beyond that had he attacked Adam and succeeded. For Eve had influence disproportionate to her station in the created order. Lucifer corrupted her, and she drug Adam, the head of the First Family, with her into the Fall.

The second example is far more recent, and is actually four: the leaders of Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, Soviet Russia, and Maoist China all deliberately and successfully courted German, Italian, Russian, and Chinese women in their revolutions. For they knew that while some German, Italian, Russian, and Chinese men supported them, far more men opposed their authoritarian reforms. Yet by promising more power, influence, and authority to women in their future socialist utopias, these leaders surfed to power on the wave generated by Eve's Curse.

That these four radical left wing dictators did so was no accident; in fact, they were simply following the Marxist playbook, which reads:

> Anybody who knows anything of history knows that great social changes are impossible without the feminine ferment. Social progress can be measured exactly by the social position of the fair sex (the ugly ones included).

Thus history suggests that the key to any revolution isn't us men. While we are important, and can bring a lot of force and manpower to bear, we require at least the grudging cooperation of the 51% majority, who, as mothers and wives, drag the main body of the civilization with them.

Many of us here at The Spearhead spend our time thinking of ways to counter the sexual revolution, restore patriarchal civilization, and re-enfranchise beta, delta, gamma, and omega men back into society. However, while it is good for us men to cuss and discuss the options for accomplishing this revolution amongst ourselves, we must consider ways and means to convince a sufficient number of women that our cause will be of greater benefit to them in the long run than the feminist's cause. That is, if we are to succeed in reversing the Marxist takeover of our families, homes, and society.

End Game — The Beginning

[image]

Game has made a big splash in the man-o-sphere in recent times. And of late I have begun writing on the subject myself, to one degree or another.

As a primer to the uninitiated, Game is ostensibly the tactics and methods of scoring with women while placing yourself in the alpha position among other males. I offer that definition simply from extrapolating what I have read on the subject, and as I have never found a concise definition from its main proponents.

On a slightly deeper level, Game purports to differ itself from Pick Up Artistry (PUA) in that it stems from an enhanced cognizance of human female sociobiology, and uses that knowledge to manipulate women into bed.

I have to admit that I have been frequently stuck when trying to sort this thing out. Exploring the implications of Game in juxtaposition to my beliefs as a men's advocate drew me into an intellectual tug-of-war with myself that for weeks seemed to be a complete standoff. It's been a frustrating time that until now had left me with about 10 incomplete essays and nothing to post.

But then it hit me. The tug-of-war was self inflicted. And the only reason I was in struggling was because I was blinding myself to the obvious. Game doesn't really stem from PUA, it is PUA (which is also nothing new), just warmed over and re-branded with a catchy lexicon and a "new and improved" label on the bottle.

In other words, it's male pussy centrism, just like it always has been.

HOWEVER,

Roissy and the others have unearthed, or at the very least articulated an idea that has the potential for massive utility. Understanding the Evo-psychology of women, and using it to your advantage, is an untapped gold mine for male sexual empowerment, and male protection from the gynocracy. For all their work, they have introduced us to the possibilities of Game, and now it is time to take those ground breaking efforts and move forward with a model designed exclusively with male protectionism in mind, both in public and private life.

Let's face it. Pussy is power. It always has been. Pussy power is so great that women can have an entire world of men working like dogs and handing over their money, yielding seats on life boats, opening their doors, acting like trained seals for their approval, agreeing with whatever bullshit comes out of their mouths, and at the same time have those men nodding and agreeing when women claim that men have all the power and need to do more to make things better for women.

True to their unfortunate nature, men will pass laws, lock each other up and brutalize each other to make sure that all these feminine biddings are done.

If that isn't power, I'll eat my hat. And if you don't believe me, ask Sampson, Dillinger, Bill Clinton, John Edwards, Tiger Woods, the Duke Three, The Hofstra Five or any of about a million men, from average to "powerful," who have had their heads handed to them by even the weakest of women.

Clinton was outwitted by a 19 year old bimbo, with a little help from feminist governance. And if he had been a republican, whoa Nelly, his ass would have been fried to a crisp.

Am I making this up?

I think not.

Perhaps there was a time when the fake power of manhood worked. Hell, it got us top the moon when I was 12 years old. But we live in a different world than when I was 12. The average woman in today's western culture should have a manufacturers warning tattooed just below the naval at birth. I used the one on the pic for the sake of brevity, but a more accurate one would read something like this:

MANUFACTURERS WARNING: Use of this product can result in early death, suicide, clinical depression, imprisonment, false accusations, destroyed reputation, poverty, spousal support, child support, loss of property, joblessness and social isolation.

Those would do for starters.

And this is where Game, if we take out the 99% bullshit focus on chasing pussy, can have a dramatic impact that can significantly improve the lives of men by helping them weed out the most destructive females, which they will more likely if not under the pressure and influence of perceived scarcity.

And that scarcity is just a perception because getting laid is the easy part. Hell, women these days are so sexually available that the whole idea of PUA would seem to be moot. There is no "artistry" to picking up women, and anyone who thinks there is should not be trusted with a box of crayons. But the traditional methods for men to "attract" women are, in fact, a product of real historical scarcity. And while the sexual landscape has changed dramatically, three million years of programming dies hard.

But the point of Game, which I now call Zeta Game, is in recognizing that while neither sex nor women are scarce, they can both be as dangerous as they are pleasurable, and that an intimate knowledge of the forces that unconsciously drive women, and the ability to exploit it, can help men meet sexual needs and stay out of harms way at the same time.

In the end, it's not about getting women, but in being able to select them at will, and dispose quickly and safely of the unwanted and/or dangerous ones.

You don't need a book or a series of articles on this. If you are a quick starter, you can get everything you need to know about attracting women from these two eight minute videos. It isn't that I am that smart. It is that women are that simple. This isn't rocket science.

You see, the important thing here is not that I succeeded in getting laid. What was most important was that one, I put no real energy, or money, into the equation. And two, I turned the power dynamic between myself and women a full 180 degrees from what I had always known. I became the selector from a pool of willing women. No need for bullshit pick up lines.Why would I have wasted my time approaching women in bars and other places, trying to impress them or get their phone number when I could just pick among the women that were offering themselves up to have sex with me on a regular basis?

Answer, I fucking wouldn't. And neither should you. Picking one woman and "going after her" is for men who can't get a room full of women to come after them. And the truth is that almost any man can own that room, top to bottom, if he wants to.

And the advantage to this is monumental. You find out things about women who are crawling into bed with you, and even before they do. You can, and should, take the opt out when the danger signs show up. Too entitled? Next. Two kids and an attitude about the ex? See ya. Whatcha gonna buy me? Hasta la vista, baby. All these women are problems, and bigger problems waiting to happen, but you can adios any of them before or after having sex with them.

Why? Because there will be more waiting for you. And the more of them you pump and dump, the more the others will tingle when you walk into the room. They may hate you, or fear you, but they will want you just the same.

And why should you want to dump them so unceremoniously? Remember that warning label? Well, it wasn't made up out of thin air. People always broadcast who they are…if you are listening.

If a woman you barely know thinks she is entitled to dig into your wallet just because she is going to sleep with you, then what do you imagine she would feel entitled to after sleeping with you for a year? After getting married?

If a woman talks constantly about the abusive, horrible men in her life, and men in general, how do you think she will end up talking about you? And to whom, the police maybe?

The thing is, contrary to popular feminist belief, men fall in love and dedicate to women at some point in their lives. And their tendency is to give everything. Usually the routine goes along traditional lines. Man spots girl, sets out to impress her and win her affections. He leads with his wallet, puts on his best act and ignores every warning sign she is broadcasting because he views her as a scarce resource. Because he feels like he has very limited options.

So if she accepts him, he considers himself lucky. He has found the woman of his dreams, she has returned his love, and all is right with the world.

He may spend the better part of the rest of this life finding out just how wrong he was. And in most cases, while he will find out that he was wrong, he will never know why. He will usually be incapable of figuring out that when you fish with stink bait, you catch bottom feeders. If you use your money to attract women, you get shallow materialists. If you use your willingness to sacrifice to her whims, you get narcissism. If you use deference and agreement, you get entitlement.

If you use all three, you get the typical western women.

The techniques for helping you avoid that pitfall, and perhaps find someone atypical to hang with for a while, are simple. Once you have established yourself as a sexually in demand with the women in your group, there is a code, a list of four screening behaviors and attitudes that will help cull out the deadweight (almost all of them) and set you up to find what I call a “manageable” woman. More on that in the next Zeta Game piece.

Da Rules

1. Leave your wallet in your pocket. If you want a whore, go to a massage parlor. They are guaranteed to put out for a fixed price, and they don’t follow you around and talk when you’re done.

2. Don’t “date,” women. Ever. Hang out with them. Party with them. Eat with them. But it is never a date. Dating implies financial responsibility on your part, and perhaps gives the impression of exclusivity before you desire it. You owe women nothing for their company or their bodies.

Look at it this way. You can “ask a woman out” and spend a lot of money on food and drink. But if you take the social club route as I suggested in the video, she can eat and drink with the group on her dime (or some beta‘s), vie with the other women for your attention, and then go home with you if you select her.

3. Never make a pass at a woman. Never. Stay Zeta and they will make a pass at you.

4. Remember- Sleeping with a woman does not mean you owe her anything. Not a relationship, not a call the next day, not even a promise not to sleep with her sister.

Notice something about these rules. None of them govern anything you should do, but simply show you what you don’t have to do. There is nothing here that says do this or do that for women. It is just the opposite. You do nothing for them at all. You simply live your life without regard to them one way or another. They will show up offering their goods without you doing a damn thing.

It is just that simple.

When you join a social club, make it one that you would enjoy if it were just men. Keep it in your own comfort zone. Make it a group where you can and will make male friends. It has to have some value to you without the female presence.

If you are a staunch conservative, don’t join the Sierra Club thinking it is Zeta. It’s not. Joining a group like that when you think they are all morons for the sake of being around women is fake, and it calls on you to start things off with a lie.

I know what some of you are saying. Ha! Joining any club, even one you would like, with the idea of women in mind is just more pussy begging.

All puns aside, I beg to differ.

Avoiding pussy centrism does not mean you have to crawl in a hole or only go places that you think women aren’t. In fact, that can be as pussy centric, only in reverse, as practicing PUA. Living a life that presents sexual opportunities is normal for any man. Only a few are so jaded from being screwed over that they have ruled out any possibility of sex or relationship again.

Most men will keep trying. Either to meet sexual needs, or find a “partner.” And while I caution against the latter, I understand that it is going to happen whether I caution against it or not.

So unless your goal is the complete removal of women from your life, which is understandable given what many men have gone through with them, then a sexual empowerment and risk management program is in order.

When men don’t operate out of a sense of scarcity, they have the opportunity to make better decisions. When they make better decisions, they have a tendency to get screwed over a lot less.

Next in the Zeta Game series- OK, so you started something regular, what next?

Con Man Fools Woman, Charged with Domestic Violence

Welmer · 21 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In my local online paper, I came across a story about some crook who took a foreign student for all he could, convincing her he had been kidnapped while he was actually blowing her cash in Vegas, telling her he was being hunted down by the CIA, etc. The man, named Matthew Clark, has a history of this, having ripped off a guy in 2007 by fraudulently selling a BMW his mother was leasing for thirty grand.

In the case concerning the foreign student, it appears that Clark began a romantic relationship with the woman shortly after she arrived in the US from Korea, ultimately convincing her that he should move in with her, whereupon he stole money her parents sent and blamed it on the landlord. Then, he convinced her to rent a luxury apartment in Bellevue, a well-to-do Seattle suburb, where he took over the woman's finances and started stealing her mail.

He took it far enough to convince the woman he was going to marry her, and then stole $18,000 her parents sent for the wedding. Through a series of convoluted lies and tricks, he managed to give her the impression that she was legally his chattel, and eventually, as his stories started falling apart, that he was a secret agent of some sort, wanted by the FBI and CIA.

Finally, when the woman failed to register for classes, her father called Seattle police, who contacted Clark's mother to find him. Clark was subsequently found with the woman at the Seattle Sheraton Hotel and arrested.

Guys like this are obviously scum. They are opportunistic thieves who ought to be identified and locked up for a while. However, in most cons there is a degree of culpability on the side of the victim as well. Often, people go along with cons out of greed. Sometimes they do so out of altruism, but that is probably the least common con. In this case, something compelled this woman to blindly believe Clark's scams.

What was it? It was what women call love. That is, this slimy liar excited her immensely. I once lived with a small time, white trash crook when I was 20 for a few months. I was sharing a house with him, a woman and another, ordinary guy. The woman was a friend of mine from high school, and had convinced me to move in with them to share rent. At one point, the woman's TV disappeared from the house, and all of the sudden the crook had a whole lot of weed and some good food (not normal for this guy).

Somehow, the TV had disappeared while he was there, but nobody else was. We asked him what had happened. He said some people had come around asking for me, and he'd told them I wasn't there, then went and took a nap. When he woke up, the TV was gone.

In retrospect, it's obvious that he was trying to implicate me in a crime he committed, but I didn't even consider that at first. I actually thought some people may have had it in for me and stole the TV, thinking it was mine. Of course, I changed my mind pretty quickly, but I initially believed him because my female friend was so adamant that he couldn't have had anything to do with this petty theft. His attempt at blame didn't work; I've never been known as a liar or thief, but even so his hold on the woman's heart was strong enough that she wouldn't even consider that he may have done it, even after I pointed out his sudden acquisition of dope and expensive food.

So, in the case of this young Korean woman, she had obviously fallen deeply in love with a lying con-artist, which is far from rare. In fact, women seem to have a thing for con-artists, perhaps because they are better able to relate to women than your typical, straightforward, objective thinker of a man. To women, the feeling is more important than the truth, and that is what scammers exploit to make a living.

However, what is truly odd about this case is that the Clark is being charged with domestic violence for lying to this woman and taking her money. To me, that is very odd, and if it was feminist-inspired it's sure to backfire, because I'd bet good money that more men are conned by their girlfriends or wives than the other way around. Stories of women cleaning out their husbands' credit cards and bank accounts and houses and then disappearing with a lover abound. They are probably even more common than we know, because so many men are ashamed to have been so thoroughly duped and simply refuse to speak of it.

So although it's outrageous that "domestic violence" now encompasses crimes of deception rather than true violence, perhaps men should now make some effort to turn this around on women. Every time you catch a woman in a lie, tell her you'll have her charged with domestic violence. Did she charge your card for a new pair of shoes and lie about it? DV. Did she spend money on a weekend at some hotel with Julio instead of going on that business trip she'd told you about? Spousal abuse for sure. If charging liars and cons with DV becomes common practice, courts around the Anglosphere will be filled with wailing, perjuring women, digging themselves deeper with every new lie they make up to get themselves out of trouble.

The Repetitive Nature Of Shaming Language

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 21 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I wrote a post for my blog called "Facilitating Shaming Language" that among others things talked about a particular case of shaming language being used. Here is part of a response that I received:

> I'm sorry your mother didn't love you. I hope you get help.

I just wrote a post about shaming language and how do my detractors respond? With even more shaming language. This is not an atypical response. The Exposing Feminism blog which hosts a copy of the Catalog of Anti-Male Shaming Tactics received a similar response to the catalog from women that was also even more shaming language.

This tells us something important about shaming language. It is repetitive. While a user of shaming language might try to justify shaming language by claiming your behavior is "shameful", the fact is shaming language can not be used to speak about your actual behavior. The user of shaming language is just repeating the same thing over and over again with slightly different wording despite being exposed as ignoring facts. It means that the user of shaming language is creating a strawman and not addressing their opponent's ideas.

The Catalog of Anti-Male Shaming Tactics exists because of shaming language's repetitiveness. We get told the same things over and over again. You have a small penis. You are angry. You make me feel afraid. You're a coward. You won't grow up. You're gay. You need therapy. Man up, etc. Sure it may be worded somewhat differently, all shaming language is saying the same thing. There are many ways to say, "you won't grow up", but it's all the samel.

What we can learn from this is that we should not fear shaming language. It does not and can never describe our actions or behavior. The use of shaming language means by definition that our opponents have no real argument against us. If they had a real argument against us, they would use it instead of shaming language. Shaming language is the refuge of those who want to shut down legitimate debate and men who bring up reasonable questions and concerns.

Drugs, War, Blood and Money

Paul Elam · 22 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"You want me to do what?" The look on Jerome's face was bewildered, angry.

"It's like I said," I replied. "For the next 28 days you have to live at this facility. You have to go into groups of people you don't know and tell them all you are a drug addict. You have to tell them stories about how drugs ruined your life and harmed your family. You have to go to Narcotics Anonymous meetings and do the same thing. You'll have to convince everyone around you that you're an addict trying to get better. And the fact that you don't have, and have never had, a drug problem will have to remain between you and I."

"If you want to save your job," I added.

Jerome leaned back in his chair and let out a great breath. His eyes watered for a moment and then stopped. An African American man that looked younger than his 35 years, Jerome was straight up blue collar and no nonsense. It was clear that nonsense like this did not sit well with him at all.

He had worked for a large telephone company in the Southwest since he was 20, working his way up from lineman to a top tier foreman. He started working there the same year he got married and now had three children.

"How the hell could this be happening to me?" he asked, and his eyes started to glisten again.

The answer to his question was simple. He worked for a company that periodically forced employees to surrender bodily fluids for examination. On a recent weekend, he had been to a bar-b-que at a friends house and someone passed a joint. It was an infrequent indulgence for him, but he took a few hits and passed it on.

The following Monday he was tested. Company policy afforded him the option of intervention and treatment or the end of a career that was the only source of income for his family. There were no gray areas The fact that they didn't start drug testing till he had invested 10 years of his life in working for them didn't matter. If you tested positive on a drug screen, you were an addict; a liability, and you needed treatment; expensive treatment, though no one has ever demonstrated that this was true.

I could have told Jerome a lot more about how his life was about to change; the mandated outpatient treatment after he discharged, aftercare meetings for a year, and 12 step meetings, one hour each and every day for the first three months after he went home.

I didn't have the heart. He would find out at as time went by, and make the adjustments. For the time being my only goal was to help him not do anything stupid. He was caught up in the system, the system that I worked in, and if he wasn't careful he could lose everything.

I told him, as I will tell you now, that he was one of the lucky ones. Employers can have a powerful impact on your life when they decide to. But it is nothing compared to governments.

Absolutely nothing.

Jerome just got a scratch compared to what was happening elsewhere. His was a slight wound from a war on drugs that regularly kills more people than drugs do. We have been doing it a hundred years now; making criminals of our countrymen; making war on our own people in their own homes.

And as MND publisher Mike LaSalle just reported to readers, it is a war that is now hitting close to home.

It started, like a lot of deadly bad ideas, with politicians. We can thank the Democrats for the inception, but somewhere along the line, the Republicans stepped in to prove they were just as stupid.

Woodrow Wilson, who also gave us the Federal Reserve Act, the first draft since the Civil War and rave reviews of the stunningly racist movie "Birth of a Nation," helped usher in the age where America turned questionable personal habits into concrete walls and steel gray bars.

It was called the Harrison Tax Act of 1914, and it was the result of nearly fifteen years of disinformation and racist propaganda promulgated by Wilson's associates.

In 1900 the Journal of the American Medical Association published in a report that "Negroes in the South are being addicted to a new form of vice– that of 'cocaine sniffing' or the 'coke habit.'" That was followed up by several newspaper reports that cocaine was causing blacks to rape white women and was improving their pistol marksmanship.

Eight years later President Teddy Roosevelt appointed Dr. Hamilton Wright as the first Opium Commissioner for the United States. Among his most notable observations was that "cocaine is often the direct incentive to the crime of rape by Negroes of the south and other sections of the country."

Wright also postulated that "one of the most unfortunate phases of smoking opium in this country is the large number of women who have become involved and are living as common-law wives or cohabitating with Chinese in the Chinatowns of our various cities."

Let's see. A bunch of drug crazed horny black men and a growing number of loose white women with no qualms about crossing racial boundaries?

Yeah, man, it was time for war, alright; time to break out some fucking law and order.

And so it started. Police began busting heads, most of them black and poor, and prisons started to fill. Law upon law was written and enforced with no more thought to the truth than Dred Scott. The edges of The Constitution were already starting to singe.

It got a boost in 1937 with the Marijuana Tax Act, signed into law by Franklin Roosevelt. And just like the Harrison Act, its roots are steeped more in racial bigotry than in public safety. In fact, marijuana had already been criminalized in many states prior to the federal prohibition. Most of this started with border states and stemmed from a fear of indigenous Mexicans. One Texas legislator is quoted as saying, "Mexicans are all crazy, and this stuff (marijuana) is why."

Now it was brown heads getting busted, and prisons became bilingual.

And the drugs kept coming.

And there is money in it. Big money, your money, fed into a vast machine that is eating up the very freedoms it purports to protect.

Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt were Democrats, but as time passed and political stances vacillated, it was the republicans that took over the reigns of anti drug insanity, not out of racial prejudice (though for some that seems to be a big plus), but puritanical fundamentalism. Many a good Christian constituent doesn't cotton much to personal choice when it comes to drugs.

So the right has pretty much owned the war on drugs since. And for the efforts of these "keep the government off our back" conservatives, they have given us the mammoth sized DEA, a thousand federal regulations, a rainbow coalition of busted heads, overflowing prisons, enough dead bodies to please Pol Pot, a meaningless Constitution and a bevy of government functionaries that are literally out of their minds with power.

We wanted a war on drugs and that is exactly what we got. Only it isn't drugs we are attacking, it's people. It is a civil war with a guaranteed Viet-nam style ending that might be worth paying attention to.

Because the drugs keep coming.

You would think a century of this would be enough to have learned a lesson or two. I mean, we actually did learn something with alcohol. We made it illegal, and then, when we got tired of mobsters, mass murder, poisoning deaths from bad hooch, graft and the fact that everyone that wanted to was still drinking anyway, we got a little wiser.

Today, we have alcohol in its various forms being distributed nationwide, in complete peace, with no underground economy and most importantly, no bullets flying.

Are there consequences? Sure. Some tragic ones. I have seen it first hand a thousand times over. After all, most of the people I worked with were not Jerome's, though his situation is a direct result of the woefully inept way we are approaching this problem.

In the end, though, and anyone with a half a mind should already know this, there are plenty of problems you can't fix with a badge and a gun. The best we can do is damage control.

Sadly, all you have to do is get a news report from the border with Mexico, or take a look inside one of our prisons, to find out just how far we are from the best we can do.

New Moderator

Welmer · 22 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Spearhead has been a success overall, but there's one area that has been a thorn in its side from the beginning, and pretty much everything I've tried to address the commenting problem has failed. At times, it's annoyed me to the point where I wonder whether the effort is even worth it. The comments have a tendency to get out of hand, and I have never been very good at dealing with this issue. I'm pretty sure some supporters have been chased off by some of the louder, more violent comments, and that's a pretty serious problem for me.

Running The Spearhead has been a learning process for me, so it has taken time and experience for me to figure out how to handle issues. Recently, it finally occurred to me that the reason I've had such a difficult time with moderation is that I simply shouldn't be doing it. For writers and publishers it is impossible to maintain objectivity when moderating comments on their own articles, so I tend to avoid doing so. Additionally, it's really bad PR to get into the inevitable arguments over such things.

Nevertheless, for months I avoided appointing a moderator because I just didn't know what would come of it (I was also a bit nervous about the idea because an obvious pedophile offered to moderate the first time I suggested it). Well, soon enough I saw what came from not having someone moderate comments, and it was pretty ugly at times.

Fortunately, I still have someone willing to moderate, and I'm going to hand the editor keys over to him. There's going to be a division of tasks in which I keep my hands off moderation so I can focus on publishing articles and developing the site, which is plenty of work without having to deal with policing comments. Therefore, our new moderator, Christian, is going to have full authority over the comments. I'll work with him on the guidelines, but enforcement will be at his discretion. I am really looking forward to this, as it will no longer be my problem when people spout off inappropriately, so I'm very grateful for the offer.

For most commenters it won't mean anything. The policy will be fairly mild, and there are only a handful of commenters who really take it too far. So this isn't going to be a major crackdown or anything like that. Furthermore, we'll release a set of guidelines, most of which are already listed on the "commenting policy" page. If anything, this will make reading The Spearhead a more pleasant experience, and help it mature into a more constructive medium.

The American Dream: 21st Century Serfdom

Hawaiian Libertarian · 24 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Go to school.

Get good grades.

Go to college.

Get a career.

Buy a nice car.

Buy a big house.

Go on many luxury vacations.

It can all be yours for the taking…just sign your name on the dotted line at every step of the way, and you too can have your very own version of the American Dream.

This is supposedly the keys to happiness and success and achieving "a better standard of living than our parents."

It's a grand lie, designed to get the average person to pursue this dream so as to enslave themselves into the system…a benign, subversive system of hidden serfdom.

Welcome to debt slavery.

And who are our Feudal Overlords?

The bankers.

And how do they exactly trap us into forced servitude for their profit?

The twin tools of Fractional Reserve Banking and Fiat Currency.

Wanna start a business?

Take out a business start up loan!

How do you pay for the overhead of running your business? Here's a business credit account!

Wanna buy a house?

Here's a 30 year mortgage…and don't forget your mortgage insurance plan, so in case you are injured or laid off, you won't have to make your payments for up to one whole year! (Gee, you bankers are just SO generous!).

Wanna get an education?

Here's a student loan that will take you 20 years to pay off after you've graduated and still can't find a job during the current recession.

Understand that our modern economy is based not on MONEY…but on DEBT. An obligation to promise to paying the bankers – WHO DID NOTHING MORE THAN TYPE A NUMBER INTO A COMPUTER IN THEIR BANK LEDGER SHEET PROGRAM AND – VOILA! – you too can sign up for 21st century serfdom to achieve the "American Dream!"

But don't look at the Bankers in your local neighborhood bank as your Feudal overlord…he's just a mid-level overseer of the Lord's vast estates.

See, his bank, in turn, has to borrow a fraction of their funds from the central banking system so that they can turn around and obligate YOU in your pursuit of the "American Dream."

Does this sound outlandish or confusing to you?

Let's analyze this in as simplified terms possible:

Fiat currency = money backed by nothing more than the value it has printed on it. Because it is not backed by a substantial commodity, it is in essence an agreed upon fiction…in which parties exchanging fiat currency for goods or services agree to the value of that currency. Now, because fiat currency is only worth what the issuing institution says it is, there is absolutely NO check on that institution arbitrarily printing up more of it whenever they feel like it. In essence, fiat currency allows unlimited "printing" power.

However, most people think that the Federal Reserve prints the nations money supply and distributes the currency to the banks to circulate throughout the economy. What the Fed prints and distributes is but a fraction of the so-called "money" supply. (More like the "credit enslavement ratio.")

Fractional reserve lending means a bank need only hold approximately 10% of money in an account at any time. So if you deposit $100 into an account, the bank need only hold $10 in reserve and lend out $90. This doesn't sound so bad, right? Except that's not how they do it. The bank takes your $100 and puts it on their assets side of their ledger. They now have 10% of a $1000 reserve requirement. So now they can turn around and get your fellow debt slave to sign up for a used car loan of $1000. In this way, $900 of fiat currency is "created" by the click of a banker's mouse and your signature on the loan forms dotted line.

Ahhh, but it doesn't end their either. See, the bank calculates it's "reserve" by including all promissory notes, all credit accounts as "assets" which allows them to "create" even more fiat currency at the click of a mouse.

That $1000 loan (which originally came from that first $100 deposit) has paperwork in which the loan taker is obligated to repay at interest over a set period of time. For the sake of simplicity, let's just say that at the end of the terms of agreement, after adding up the interest and the principal, the debtor will have ended up paying back $1500.

Before the $1000 debtor even issues a single payment, the bank now has $1500 promissory note…which they than account for as a $1500 asset…which is 10% of a $15,000 reserve level.

Along comes Joe Blow the entrepreneur, who wants to start an internet porn business. He needs 15 grand to start up, so he goes and gets a loan from the same bank.

After signing his name on the dotted line, he now has a loan that when all is said and done, will gain the bank $20,000…which of course, is now a bank "asset" that is now a 10% reserve level for $200,000.

Here comes the next guy, and he wants to buy a house for $200,000…so he signs up for a 30 year mortgage….

Are you starting to get the picture about how fiat currency and fractional reserve lending actually work? From an initial $100 of actual cash from a bank depositor, a bank was able to leverage a 6-month $1500 debt obligation from one worker; a 5-year, 20,000 start-up debt obligation from a wannabe Larry Flynt; and a 30 year, $200,000 obligation from would-be homeowner. What started out as 100 of cold, hard cash from a single depositor, turned into 235,000 of owed debt servitude over the course of years by three other people.

This is precisely why the credit card companies (i.e. the huge, National Banks) are so eager to sign everyone up for credit cards, and they really don't care if you max them out and are unable to pay them back. Your $20,000 credit card bill, while it exists on their ledgers as current and not in default (it takes you not making any payments for months on end before it becomes "default"), that $20,000 figure is a potential $200,000 reserve loan to some other would be serf.

All of these people, pursuing some aspect of the American Dream, obligated to the bankers who did nothing more than click a mouse and get the unknowing Serfs to sign their name on the dotted line. Oh, and note what happens when a home-"owner" serf defaults on his home loan, and the bank forecloses. They've now turned their fictionally created "fiat currency" into a tangible, real asset – the seized home.

In this way, our Feudal overlords send fiat currency downwards, while the real wealth moves upwards to them – the class of people who have the power to "create" money.

Now some caveats here – this is a very very simplified explanation for how fractional reserve lending and fiat currency have ensnared the vast majority of the country into unwitting, financial serfdom. Of course there are many variations, and all sorts of complicating factors…but the general overview is a fairly accurate summation of the system's basic function.

This is precisely why inflation has occurred, devaluing the US Dollar exponentially ever since the Federal Reserve system was instituted in 1913. 1929% inflation since 1913. As money continually gets "created" by the corrupt banking practice, it puts more and more "money" into circulation, devaluing the purchasing power over time.

99% of us in America are in some way, shape or form, a serf for the bankers, because they have the power to "create" money out of thin air…by creating a debt obligation for which you must labor to pay off over the course of your working life.

And all these bankers did was click on the mouse and get you to sign on the dotted line.

With fiat currency working in tandem with fractional reserve lending, and we now have the means of ensuring that almost ALL business endeavors, all personal consumption choices, and almost all manners of subsistence are essentially done via debt to the bankers.

Remember the old saying…"He who has the gold, makes the rules?"

The new one is "He who prints the fractional-reserve, fiat currency enslaves the fools!"

Now get back to work! You owe it to our Feudal Overlords!

Patriarchy for Dummies

Paul Elam · 25 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[image]If you have followed the ongoing volumes of discussion in the gender war, you are familiar with a constantly regurgitated bit of feminist claptrap.

Feminism isn't anti-male, it is anti-patriarchal and of course, it's about equality.

Sure it is.

We should consider, though, that in their constant attempt to reshape reality to fit the needs of the moment, there is a dirty little secret that feminists continually keep from themselves. Well, one among many. This one is called reproductive strategy. And without understanding that, you can't understand why and how we developed a patriarchal system.

It is really simple. Men are wired to do whatever it takes to be selected by women for mating. Women are wired to select men that are dominant and aggressive, e.g. patriarchal.

Do I need to say that again?

Do you ever wonder why men like Scott Peterson show up at death row with a stack of marriage proposals waiting for them? That's what happened, and the proposals came from women who only knew one thing about him: He savagely murdered his wife, cutting his own baby from her abdomen and dumped them both out of a boat into the bay.

How is that for marriage material?

It isn't any different with Joran van der Sloot. After skating on the Holloway murder, van der Sloot became a sexual celebrity. Everywhere he went, young women in their sexual prime threw themselves at him like he was Mick Jagger.

Something about the missing body of a young girl and his fingerprints all over the case acted like Spanish Fly on these women.

Of course, he killed again. And of course, his marriage proposals started rolling in as well.

Here, by the way, is the video of Joran and his last next victim, Stephany Flores, checking into the hotel room in Lima, Peru, where he would kill her. Watch it closely.

Did you get the way she followed him like an obedient dog? Note the two steps behind and head bowed like a Geisha body language. It is the age old false female submission to male authority, killer authority, in order to have access and eventual control of that power. It is the same type of power that has been making women wet and tingly since the prehistoric plains of the African savanna.

Are the women gone ga ga for Peterson and van der Sloot the exceptions to the rule?

No.

What they are is more extreme examples of the norm. Everyone eats, and in every culture there is a certain percentage of people that eat to the point of obesity. It doesn't make eating abnormal, it just points to some abnormal eating. These women are the same type of phenomena.

They are attracted to killers for the same reasons that the average young woman is attracted to thugs, bad boys on motorcycles, rock stars and politicians as ugly as Henry Kissinger. It is all about power. Power to protect, power to provide, power to dominate and control.

Power to be corralled and used.

When all that power gets channeled into a box and served up on a platter for women's benefit, you have the ultimate aphrodisiac. There's your patriarchy in a nutshell, and all the laws, codes, social norms and gender roles that came with it. Women use the illusion of submission and being demure, coupled with sexual appeal, to get men to perform for their benefit.

Ultimately the master is the slave. He lives under the illusion of power, when in reality he is only the provider of it.

And this of course explains why feminism has not resulted in equality, but only more privilege for women. Feminism only takes what is already there, the female drive to benefit from the power acquired by men, power that almost all women are incapable of gaining on their own, and takes it to the extreme level. In that light, feminism is an extreme that showed up in normal sexual life, just like a letter bearing a marriage proposal on death row.

And as always of course, the chief enablers of all this are men jockeying for sexual approval/selection.

As I have said before, take it up with God or Darwin as you please, but don't blame me for telling the truth.

But that truth, in these modern times, presents a unique dilemma for men, at least the ones that have pulled their heads out and started to read the writing on the wall.

The acquisition of all the power needed to attract women brought with it a rather unfortunate consequence.

Disposabilty.

Pulling 12 hours in a coal mine with trembling walls and death in the air you breathe is a high price to enable a woman to remain at home taking care of children, especially in an age where that kind of life is absolutely unnecessary.

If you are fortunate enough to be alpha material, you get to own or run the coal mine, have men do the digging for you and perhaps even have some of their wives yield to the tingle you give them while hubby is down in the depths doing what a man has to do.

But this is really where we run into a wall that is unscaleable in the movement toward this incredulous thing called "sexual equality."

The minute that man takes a real look at what he is doing and decides less money is a better option, then that is where hypergamy kicks in to overdrive with the wife and he loses her.

The very moment he values his safety and quality of life more than he values her standard of living, the clock starts on her departure.

Without playing by the same rules that gave us patriarchy, there is no real connection between men and women. The men who undermine patriarchy in the only real way it can be undermined, by refusing to take care of women, are automatically reduced to the status of loser and placed on the sexual sidelines.

The only answer to this is to open the door for women on the way out, and perhaps give them a little shove as they go. It's the feminist equalitarian thing to do, after all. These men should be lionized by Steinem, et al, because it frees women from all the "oppressive" patriarchy that comes with marriage (which they will then, invariably, look to get from some other man) and it allows the man, at least in the case of a coal miner, to add a decade or so to his life span and perhaps enjoy it a little more.

If feminism were about being either anti patriarchy or pro equality, the only focus it would have had would be on challenging women to quit picking the most powerful provider that they can and using them to live as close to the state of royalty as possible.

It would have also told women to put down books and pick up shovels.

Instead, what we have is women dominating the work force in the most cushy jobs available, many of them low paying, while men still bear the brunt of often fatal occupational hazards so they can make enough money to be an attractive provider. Whatever financial gaps result in this for women, they simply use The State, that ultimate expression of patriarchy, to fill in.

And do you think these under employed women are more prone to marrying down than any other woman?

Let's be real here, all feminism has done is give women a new place to kick back and take it easy while men ante up the blood, sweat and tears. And it leaves their supposedly lamented patriarchy safe and completely intact, ready to do their bidding in any way they want.

Same as it ever was.

Vacation Over, Time For a Real Vacation

Welmer · 26 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For the first time in two and a half weeks, I'm alone in a quiet house. I'm beginning to wonder if there is such a thing as a vacation for parents, because it sure doesn't feel like one when the kids are around. However, I was kind of sad to part ways with them, even though I see them again tomorrow, and next week, and the following weekend and week after that…

Although family is a wonderful thing, sometimes you want to get away for a while, just like you might want to take a break from the job from time to time. And that gives me an idea, but hardly an original one, that might be of some utility to men.

One of the biggest divisions between men today is that between those who are family men and those who aren't, whether by choice or circumstance. Like a lot of divorced men, I'm somewhere in between, in this sort of half-family limbo, so I can relate to both sides. Single men have more opportunities to go out and entertain themselves, and have nobody to answer to at home, while married men do not generally have that freedom, but at least they live with their kids. After a while, however, either routine can become tiresome, and sometimes men simply want to get away and do something different.

For a long time, they did just that. Men would get together at lodges, the public house, athletic clubs, or whatever struck their fancy to escape from the drudgery of work, home and society in general. The problem today is that everything is integrated. Women even play sports with men, which is pretty ridiculous — not to mention dangerous. Women are in lodges, pubs, and pretty much every single formerly male space, largely due to legislation that forced this on men and society. This has left us men trapped, and it's even worse than that: political correctness demands that we watch what we say around women everywhere they may happen to be. In fact, it wouldn't surprise me if a woman came into a men's bathroom and told us to use the stalls because it offends her to see men peeing while standing up. It's like being a caged animal.

However, it doesn't have to be that way. Sure, the old lodges are falling apart, the pubs are full of trashy bar girls, and every time you want to play ball some girl starts kicking your shins or flailing her arms in your face, but there's still plenty of space out there. For all the time we men spend online, it's unimaginable that we couldn't set aside a day or two from time to time to get together with other men in person and enjoy each other's company. Where I live, just driving or taking a ferry a few miles outside of the city puts one in the middle of beautiful country, surrounded by tall trees, sparkling water and snow-capped mountains. I've been to the UK, and in Wales, for example, there were lesser-known historical monuments all over the place that were virtually ignored, so I had the pleasure of exploring them alone. In Canada and Australia, well, I don't need to tell you guys that there are plenty of places where you won't be bothered at all.

I know there are enough of us throughout our respective regions to have some get togethers, and I think men who are active online ought to start reaching out to people who live near them. There really isn't any substitute for meeting in person, and, let's face it: some of us need to get out more.

Given the growing consciousness surrounding the plight of men in our society, this is a good time to resurrect the idea of men's associations. Men working together in person can do some pretty amazing things, which is one reason feminists and others have fought so hard to destroy the old organizations that empowered men and gave them a sense of comradery.

Young Men Troubled More by Breakups and Relationship Turmoil than Young Women

Welmer · 26 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In NY Times, July 22: A study that surveyed over 1,600 young men and women found that trouble in relationships is more harmful to young men than women. Wake Forest sociology professor Robin W. Simon and Florida State sociologist Anne E. Barrett say “It appears that young men benefit more than women from support, and that they are more harmed than women by strain in ongoing romantic relationships.” According to Ms. Simon, what is really sad is that women are only bothered by being single, and seem to derive the same benefit from being in a relationship whether it is troublesome or not.

Could it be because the young women are most frequently the cause of the trouble in relationships?

The author of the NY Times article makes light of young men’s plight, writing “pity the men, their anguish so long overlooked…”

Interestingly, the study found that older men do not have the same trouble as their younger counterparts, suggesting that, over time, female behavior has become increasingly harmful to men.

Daughter Goes After Dad in Political Attack Ad

Welmer · 27 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It seems the fallout from divorce can last a long, long time. In what may be an extreme result of parental alienation, Jan Schill, who currently lives in Durango, Colorado, took out an ad with her husband in an Oklahoma City newspaper imploring voters to vote against her father, John Mantooth, who is running for judge. She also started a website dedicated to keeping her father from being elected, in which she posts 30-year-old documents from her parents' divorce, among other things, to put her father in a bad light.

Keith Gaddie, a University of Oklahoma political science professor, calls the ad "reality show politics," saying: "It's unsavory. It's undignified, and it's real."

Given the nightmare Mantooth's experience with his ex must have been and the apparent parental alienation that caused his daughter to hate him, I hope the man is elected. What we need is more male judges who have been through rough divorces and can sympathize with what other men are facing when they have to deal with family law. Forcing men to face older judges from another time when women didn't leave their husbands in such prodigious numbers has resulted in vast injustices, because the default assumption is that the man must have been really a horrible person to force his poor, innocent little wife to seek help from the judge in removing him (but not his income) from her life.

Another Little Girl Sets off on Circumnavigation Attempt

Welmer · 28 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dutch courts have cleared the way for another teenage girl to attempt to sail around the world. A few months ago, 16-year-old Californian Abby Sunderland was located and rescued at Australian and French taxpayer expense adrift in the Indian Ocean, and 16-year-old Jessica Watson of Australia recently broke the world record for youngest person to sail around the world.

Today, sailboats are largely automated and require little physical effort. Additionally, instruments and global positioning devices are so sophisticated that reckoning is essentially obsolete, so it isn't all that much of a stretch to have little girls sailing around the world. In fact, I wouldn't even be all that surprised to see a well-trained monkey pull it off.

However, hazards are still involved, not the least of which is the threat of piracy. If some Somali or Indonesian pirates got their hands on this girl, I guarantee that they could pull down an enormous ransom, because, after all, it's already been proven that the entire Western world will open its coffers to save some white girl who strays into dangerous waters.

Ms. Drekker isn't too worried about pirates, saying, "they don't attack yachts so much. If you're in a convoy you should be OK." She also makes light of the threat, flying the Jolly Roger from her mast, and considering a route that would take her through the Gulf of Aden, which is crawling with pirates.

Pirates aside, there is this thing called weather, and it can be a real bitch. In fact, it's so mean that it doesn't even care about teen girls — just ask Abby Sunderland, whose mast was snapped off after she sailed into a storm. However, little Laura Dekker's chances of success aren't all that bad, and if she fails some armada will surely come to her rescue.

Despite the willingness of Western fleets to intervene in these ventures when things go wrong, as a parent I still don't care for the idea of sending children off alone on the high seas. If one of my kids said they wanted to do this at 14 I'd simply say "no" and leave it at that — even if I had a great deal of money, as Ms. Drekker's parents must.

For all the money spent on setting these little princesses to sail, I wonder why we can't give some boy an opportunity to go to space. I know that sailing, old and quaint as it is, comes off as romantic for the girls, but I can think of about a billion boys who would give anything they had to be launched into orbit. However, given the contemporary political climate, they'd probably choose a girl for that as well.

Jezebel Fires a Shot Across The Bow

Welmer · 28 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The dust-up between feminist website Jezebel and the Daily Show's Jon Stewart has exposed a rift between liberal men and feminists that suggests that simply talking the talk doesn't do the trick for men any longer. Now that the feminists have had a taste of power, they want more. There was some foreshadowing of this during the presidential primaries in 2008, in which a number of feminists expressed some anger over the treatment of Hillary Clinton, but at the time it was largely muted in favor of the common cause of defeating the Republicans. It seems that we've moved past that point, as new media on the left is increasingly dominated by up and coming, ambitious, somewhat young professional females, who dominate the middle and lower ranks of text-based media, and have a yearning for more.

As the older men who called the shots at old, establishment media companies start to retire and pass on, there will not be many men left to replace them, so I expect that publications such as Jezebel will have considerable power and influence in the near future. Sure, there will be plenty of men at the standard-bearers, such as the NY Times and Wall Street Journal, but they've already been significantly diminished by the explosion of new media, and they won't be immune from the feminist onslaught, either.

To me, this suggests that political divergence by gender will also be strengthened, as the position of men is eroded even further on the left. It may be that eventually guys like Jon Stewart will be taking orders from feminist bosses, which would make it impossible for him to actually be funny or entertaining to men. Perhaps Perez Hilton can eventually take over for him.

One might ask "why the left in particular?" Take the website Jezebel's name, for example. Jezebel has come to mean a loose woman of low character, but she was a biblical figure, wife of Ahab, king of the northern kingdom of Israel. As a foreign princess (like Marie Antoinette), she was not particularly popular with the people, especially the fundamentalist prophets. She hated Elijah, pushed Ahab into apostasy, and had him murder Naboth – an innocent man – for his land. Even in biblical times the name may have been provocative — it is thought that it honors Ba'al, a god revered by the Phoenicians and others in the ancient Middle East. Yahweh and Ba'al (or, more accurately, their respective priests) did not get along very well, so fundamentalist Jews like Elijah naturally disliked her from the get go.

Eventually Elijah has another king anointed, Ahab is overthrown, and Jezebel defenestrated and subsequently eaten by stray dogs — a happy ending if you're a devout 9th century BC Hebrew, but probably not a particularly compelling story to contemporary feminists.

In naming themselves after Jezebel in particular, the site, as far as I can tell, is taking a decidedly anti-patriarchy, anti-religion, and anti-tradition stance. Although I'm not sure whether they took the ultimate fate of Jezebel into account, perhaps we can simply take heart in the choice, as the dog food symbolism is rather amusing (ancient Jewish humor?). Whatever the case, Jezebel is decidedly left wing, and it seems that today, as opposed to the time of the French Revolution, the left has a distinctly feminine (or feminist, one should say) air about it. Although it may have been inevitable, it strikes me as a pity that this is the case, because I, for one, have some sympathy with the revolutionary ideals of the late 18th century, and even like some socialists, such as Jack London and George Orwell, quite a bit.

Unfortunately, the old, manly left has been dead for some time, and we are left with snarky guys like Jon Stewart, who, despite their jokes at the expense of men, are still getting heat from the feminists.

Here's a clip from The Daily Show poking fun at men and toeing the feminist line:

The above should demonstrate why there's no reason to have any sympathy for Mr. Stewart, but perhaps it also explains why he was so indignant when Jezebel suggested he was sexist, going so far as to exclaim on his show that Jezebel now thinks he's a "sexist prick."

Indeed, this shows that feminists now have the sense that they are in charge on the left, and can exercise power over its public figures. I can't see this having any effect other than even more firmly establishing feminism in the Democratic Party, which has already taken steps to increase privileges for women in the financial regulation act (affirmative action in private financial companies that contract with the government) and the healthcare bill (medicare for young, single mothers and mandated child support in the form of parental responsibility for health insurance extended to age 26 — 8 years past the age of majority).

Not that Republicans are any better — their policy has generally been to one-up feminists by jailing men at the behest of women and to create the world's most punitive environment for divorced fathers, placing the blame for family breakdown solely on the shoulders of men, despite no fault divorce laws and the overwhelming majority of those filing for divorce being women.

Although I can't claim to be wise or educated enough to predict the future, this all looks like end-game jockeying to me. The rest of the world is abuzz with speculation about how things will turn out now that America appears to be in a downward spiral, and domestically the entrenched groups are simply grabbing at the last scraps of the shrinking pie. American manhood is wasted in wars that the politicians don't care much about winning, the federal government has affirmed its commitment to not defend our borders, and entitlements are running so high that everyone knows it's all going to fall apart.

This won't end with global, American-style feminism taking over the world, but in the meanwhile these painted jezebels will do a lot of damage. Perhaps the only solace we can take from it is that, for the most part, they are doing a lousy job of reproducing, and eventually they'll be gone. Perhaps guys like me won't live to see the end of them, but I can hope our grandkids do.

Marine General Confirms That Americans Fighting Feminist War in Afghanistan

Welmer · 29 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Avenger posted an article in the forum written by Fred, of "Fred on Everything," that takes a USMC general to task for gloating about killing "guys who slap women." The exact quote, which Fred found on antiwar.com, is:

> "Actually it's quite fun to fight them, you know. It's a hell of a hoot," Mattis said, prompting laughter from some military members in the audience. "It's fun to shoot some people. I'll be right up there with you. I like brawling.
> "You go into Afghanistan, you got guys who slap women around for five years because they didn't wear a veil," Mattis said. "You know, guys like that ain't got no manhood left anyway. So it's a hell of a lot of fun to shoot them."

I long thought that the feminism that is often used to justify our presence in Afghanistan long after the failure to capture or kill Osama bin-Laden – the longest war in American history – was a cover for something else. However, with Hillary Clinton in charge of the State Department, and now this outrageous statement, I'm not so sure any longer. Although Americans have long justified violence on behalf of women, for example by lynching innocent men – both black and white – in the old South, beating and shooting men in their homes over domestic disputes and other such displays of "righteousness," Afghanistan may be our first explicitly feminist war.

While plenty of Americans may feel with some justification that Afghan women deserve better lives than they have, it might surprise them to know that most Afghan women despise foreign troops, including Americans. Here's a passage from a Kipling poem, The Young British Soldier, about war in Afghanistan in another era:

> When you're wounded and left on Afghanistan's plains,
> And the women come out to cut up what remains,
> Jest roll to your rifle and blow out your brains
> An' go to your Gawd like a soldier.
> Go, go, go like a soldier,
> Go, go, go like a soldier,
> Go, go, go like a soldier,
> So-oldier of the Queen!

Furthermore, given the sky-high divorce rate in military families and the little the US armed forces do to ameliorate this problem (one might say that it is actually encouraged by policies), it doesn't seem that our own government or armed forces actually care all that much about our troops, either.

So why, now, do American boys have a dog in this fight?

Roller Coasters? Sky Diving? They Don't Compare

Speaking up about men's rights issues in the real world gives me an adrenaline rush.

Pondering what I ought to say at a diversity and inclusion session at work, my heart races – I feel it thumping in my chest. It's not just the fear of public speaking which I have largely overcome – it's the knowledge that if I say something pro-male and anti-women's privilege, everyone in the room will be against me. Even the white knight male who nodded his head when the speaker expressed concern about how executives are dominated by one type of person – the type with a penis – even he would be against me.

I almost didn't speak, contemplating what I might say and how I might come off, like a pick-up artist waiting too long to make initial contact and staring awkwardly at his target. Knowing there were only fifteen people in the room and I probably wouldn't change anything, but being on a diversity and inclusion steering team myself, and hoping that at least one person in the room might feel silent solidarity with me if I expressed my views, I really, really wanted to say something.

Driven more by instinct than conscious thought, I raised my hand.

I told the speaker that, when women graduate at a rate of around 100 women to every 70 men, it doesn't seem very inclusive to men to create a goal of increasing the number of women in upper management two-fold in 5 years – at the expense of men. I noticed one of the leaders of the diversity group I belong to looking at me with incredulity and a strange, contorted grin, as if what I was saying was complete nonsense and out of character. I told the speaker that a large part of the reason women are not represented as much as men at the top of the corporate ladder is by choice – just as many fields are dominated by women, such as nursing and HR.

Speaking up was at once dreadful and intimidating yet so exhilarating – it gave me a rush like riding a roller coaster at Cedar Point.

I want to go skydiving someday. In the meantime, I'll just keep speaking up about men's rights.

International Outreach at The Spearhead

Welmer · 30 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've noticed over time that The Spearhead has a lot of international readers, and they aren't all from Anglophone countries. The leading non-Anglo countries in terms of viewers are Germany, Finland and Brazil. We've had thousands of site visitors from each of those countries in just the last month, and that prompted me to think about offering some content in languages other than English.

I've always enjoyed language in its many varieties, and have learned a couple foreign languages over the years, but I'm not a native speaker in anything other than English, although I came pretty close with French as a boy many years ago, when I lived in Nantes for some time. Unfortunately, here in Seattle I haven't had much opportunity for practice, so my French is nothing like it used to be.

However, I came to appreciate the importance of languages other than English from an early age, so I like the idea of breaking the language barrier and exchanging ideas with people around the world.

So, with that in mind, I recently set about learning how to set up WordPress in different languages on networked sites, and we are putting the finishing touches on a Spanish language site, hosted by The Spearhead, right now. Spanish, being the second most spoken language of North America, seemed like the logical first step, but I'd be happy to expand to include more. Perhaps German would be a good second step, as we have quite a few German readers and there are so many people in Germany, but it depends on finding someone who is not only interested, but available as well. Whatever the case, I've deciphered the art of language customization on the network, and can easily host blogs for our non-Anglo supporters in their native languages.

Technology can really be a great tool, and it's an advantage we have over our rivals. International feminism is institutionalized, largely built on top of the old Marxist campus network. This has its advantages (for the professors at least), but we have the potential to move far more quickly and disseminate information with an efficiency they could never hope to match. I hope this is a step toward sharing international news of interest to men, and warning men in different countries about laws and political moves designed to curtail their freedom and heap burdens on their shoulders.

One advantage we have here in the US is that we really do have freedom of the press, whereas some other countries do not. This means that if we host a blog for a guy from some European country that does not have the same guarantees, they will be perfectly free to publish politically incorrect material on the site. Furthermore, they can't be easily tracked without access to my server, so if they want to maintain anonymity they are protected, because an attempt to curtail speech on The Spearhead would be a violation of the US Constitution, and the site operates on American soil. Of course, there are limits (e.g. fraud, kiddie porn and credible threats), but freedom of political speech is guaranteed.

So, if we have any interested readers who would like me to host a site for them in a language other than English, feel free to get in touch through the contact form and we'll see what we can do.

TIME Magazine Stoops to New Low to Justify Afghanistan War

Welmer · 30 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Propaganda and war go hand in hand, because to justify blowing people away one has to come up with a fairly compelling reason. As the outrage over 911 subsides, and questions about what the wars Americans are fighting were really about lead to unsavory conclusions, not in the least because of how they have been fought, even the war in Afghanistan is becoming a pretty hard sell.

So, in order to beat the war-drums, the increasingly feminist TIME magazine has resorted to showing a picture of a mutilated Afghan woman on its cover. The picture itself – although shocking – is somewhat familiar. In a way, it reminds me of the famous National Geographic picture of the Afghan girl from over twenty years ago, only this time with a hole where her nose should be.

I don't think anyone in their right mind would defend punishing a human being in this manner, and I have serious doubts as to whether this is standard policy even for the Taliban. As far as I know, the only mutilation sanctioned by Islamic law is the amputation of the right hand of people convicted of being habitual thieves.

However, if we want to talk about mutilation, well, there's a war going on in Afghanistan. People are getting shot, burned and blown to bits every single day. American soldiers are coming home without limbs, with parts of their brains missing, with their faces burned off, with colostomy bags, etc., and the Afghans – including civilians – are getting the same in much higher numbers, and usually without the benefit of modern medical care. Of course, the large majority of these victims on both sides are men, so a little bit of perspective is in order here.

Unfortunately, as with most propaganda, perspective isn't the point: this kind of picture is meant to work on an emotional level. Show a picture of an attractive young woman with her nose cut off and associate that with the Taliban and presto, there's your justification for more war. In fact, you don't even need evidence that this is Taliban policy. As the article points out, one "commander," who could be little more than a clan chief, supposedly ordered the punishment. For all we know, it could have been the mother in law the girl spurned who demanded it (this is what I suspect is the case).

Here's Jodi Bieber (the photographer) making the case for putting the photo on TIME's front cover:

> I thought long and hard about whether to put this image on the cover of TIME. First, I wanted to make sure of Aisha's safety and that she understood what it would mean to be on the cover. She knows that she will become a symbol of the price Afghan women have had to pay for the repressive ideology of the Taliban. We also confirmed that she is in a secret location protected by armed guards and sponsored by the NGO Women for Afghan Women. Aisha will head to the U.S. for reconstructive surgery sponsored by the Grossman Burn Foundation, a humanitarian organization in California. We are supporting that effort.

So long as she's a feminist symbol, I guess it's alright to use her graphic misfortune as a call to war. In my opinion, it's in extremely poor taste, and reminiscent of the awful propaganda from the late Soviet Union I saw in the 1980s, but if you think about it, this is simply what the feminists have been doing since the early days. Perhaps their domestic violence and rape awareness campaigns (which haven't worked), which often featured photos of bloodied and bruised women, were simply steps in this ghastly direction.

10 Things I'll Teach My Sons About Women

Featured Guest · 31 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[This guest post was written by Micah Sparacio, originally posted on his eponymous blog]

Sometimes the truth is not comfortable.

So if you're not comfortable with a reality that betrays our ideals, don't read on.

The most important thing I've learned about women is that you've got to be indifferent to their attempts at harnessing you in an emotional net and controlling you. Sounds harsh, but you're the man. You need to be in charge of yourself. You should not be controlled. You need to lead. You need to make decisions. Forget all the nonsense about equality. Women don't want that, even if they say that they do (duplicity of intentions is not uncommon in relationships).

What's important is to understand how women operate at a biological and emotional level. Ultimately, women are not looking for nice guys. They are looking for strong, confident, powerful men. Men who make them feel secure… comfortable. This makes sense from an evolutionary perspective as women needed men they could rely on to protect both them and their children.

So don't fall victim to the stories about intentions… the narratives about what they need… the pleas for a nice man. It's tough. But if you forget everything else, remember this one rule: don't let a woman ever gain control over you at an emotional level. Don't let her push you around with guilt or pleas for sympathy. Stand up to her when she's wrong. There's nothing wrong with providing comfort or offering a compliment… in fact, you should master these skills … but don't let her manipulate you into giving them. At that point she's controlling you.

The story you'll hear preached from the rafters of our society is that women are just looking for a few nice [read: controllable] men. Reject this narrative at all costs.

Instead, focus on being a man. Confident and capable. And don't be afraid to embrace the higher virtues like humility (just don't confuse it with cowardice) and strength (but reject the self-obsessed pride that destroys so many celebrities). Women don't necessarily need these things, but remember, your goal should be to become a great man, not a poser who's trying to pick up women.

You must become the man you want to become without regard to women… it is only then that you will find that the task of gaining and keeping the attraction of a woman is as simple as breathing. And by doing this you can beat the jerks and the thugs (the one's who get all the girls) at their own game.

The man who spends his life catering to every whim and fancy and emotional confusion that the average women goes through is quite simply not going to be able to attract or hold onto that woman for very long. He will be used and abused and have his heart broken. There's no reason to go through this.

So, with that introduction, here are the ten things that I hope my boys come to understand about relating to women.

1. Be confident

Women are attracted to confidence. The irony is that your confidence should not be for the sake of women. It should be natural. Make yourself the best man you can be. Let your confidence derive from who you are. Aim to be the best man you can be simply because that's who you want to be.

Biologically (and thus subconsciously) women gravitate towards big, strong men or men with confident personalities (sometimes coming through in humor, but humor isn't necessary). Both of these are ancient signals that the man will help her offspring survive (remember, women are motivated and act at a subconscious level, even if they don't agree at a conscious level).

2. Smile at rejection

Historically, women have been the rejectors and male the pursuers. This is just how the world works. Like it or not, you've got to be thick skinned and realize that rejection is just part of the deal for men.

The good news is that unlike the past, there are billions of women out there. So just move on. Don't let rejection rock your confidence. Learn, improve, and move on.

You can treat rejection the same way you treat the training for a sport. A necessary evil.

3. Maintain other interests

Never allow a woman to consume all of your thoughts or all of your time. Harder said then done. But there are a number of reasons that you should maintain other interests (hobbies, friends, etc.)

The most important reason is that by having a life outside of your relationship or your obsession, you won't fall hard when the relationship ends. It helps you stay grounded. It helps you move on when the time comes.

Remember: you never want to be consumed by a woman, because then she's in control. And she really doesn't want that. Trust me.

4. Enjoy the company of guys

Make sure to have a core group of guy friends that you spend time with on a regular basis. Have fun. Be active. Be a guy. Tell dirty jokes.

And never abandon your guy friends for a woman. If the woman tries to dominate your time, it's time to move on. It may be hard, but the minute the woman starts trying to control you like she's your mother, the relationship is stale and it's time to get the hell out of dodge.

5. Understand hypergamy

At a biological (subconscious) level women are always trying to upgrade. Men have a hard time understanding this because for most men, at a subconscious level, all that matters is that a woman have a certain level of fitness. Any woman who meets that threshold is fair game. Doesn't matter if she's an upgrade or downgrade.

With women it is different. Women are constantly keeping their eyes out for an upgrade (usually in the form of acquiring more power). But they are also constantly keeping their eyes on other women that might be a threat to their current situation (flirting with other women on occasion, within view of your partner, is a great way to fight hypergamy).

So why does this matter? Well, because awareness is the key here. Don't for a second think that the girl you are with transcends her biological nature. Be prepared. Women are not nearly as innocent as the media portrays.

But it matters even more because you can do things to control hypergamy. 1) don't be a pushover 2) don't give her emotional control over you (once she's dominated you, she'll definitely start looking for the next guy) 3) keep relationships with other women and flirt from time to time

Most importantly, prepare yourself for reality. Don't get caught of guard. Know what you want. Keep an eye out. Confront. And be prepared to walk away.

6. Be ready to let go

There are a billion fish in the sea. There is no one woman who was made just for you. Don't buy the Disney nonsense. Sure, there are some women who will fit your personality better than others and certainly some that will be more attractive than others. But the sea is so large… don't despair.

The minute your girlfriend or partner starts jerking you around or treating you like she's your mother or using shaming language of any kind or just acts like an entitled princess, it's a sign that it's time to walk away. But there might be other signs too. Is the girlfriend spending too much time with other guys? Let her. But not on your dime. Don't think. Just end it. And once you end it, stick to your guns. Be patient. You won't have to wait too long for the next potential "friend" to come along.

7. Enjoy the company of other women

Remember, you're the man. You're in charge of your life. And really, at a biological level (forget the socio-cultural sublayer), that's how she wants it. Keep female friends. Keep your girlfriend on her toes. Give her subtle cues that, sure you've chosen to be with her, but you could also walk away at any moment and replace her.

Oh, and don't hesitate to flirt with other women from time to time. It's the antidote to hypergamy.

8. Get good at something

Gaining skill is about the best confidence builder there is. Men need to build, to create, to invent, to solve problems. I don't care if it's learning how to play the guitar (the obvious chick magnet) or learning how to hunt deer (less so). Find something you enjoy and throw yourself into mastering it. And don't get in the habit of giving up. Learning is a long process and often it takes a lifetime. Just stick with it and keep working through those plateaus.

By having a skill or a set of skills, you will gain independence and self-reliance. You will feel confidence in your abilities. And you will always have something to fall back on and gain comfort from if the people in your life fail you.

9. Ditch the nice guy stuff

A friend once said to me: "Things changed when I became a nice guy. Women started to hate me."

Your goal is not to be nice. Your goal is to be a confident you. There's no need to be an arrogant prick or a bad boy. You can beat the thugs and pricks and bad boys at their own game. All they have going is that women perceive them to be strong, confident men. And that's what women want. You can outdo them by being strong and confident and smart.

Oh, one other thing. It's out of fashion, but you shouldn't be afraid to maintain the high ground as an honorable gentleman. A guy who treats his woman well, but who also isn't afraid to walk away with dignity when she starts playing games.

10. Your body matters

Screw the nonsense that it's what's inside that counts. Sure, in an ideal world, that would be true. But this is not an ideal world. That's one thing I am certain of.

Treat your body like a hobby. Turn it into the most fit machine you possibly can, but have fun with it. Go for hikes. Enjoy nature. Learn to gain peace from solitude. Eat the fuel your body needs. Don't put junk in the gas tank. Eat lots of meat, vegetables and nuts and drink lots of water.

And do it for yourself. Not the women.

Bonus: Most women don't want to be reasoned with about everything. Not that you won't find a rare gem of a woman (like your mom:-) who loves reason and is governed by it. But don't count on it. Most women prefer to consent via the emotions ("does it feel right?"). If you want something, lead her there. Make it feel right. Want a gun in the house? Focus on the emotions related to security. Women want to feel safe and secure, so make sure she knows you're getting the gun to protect the family.

On Jury Nullification and Rape

Paul Elam · 1 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

With the possible exception of the sexual molestation of a child, rape is a crime that evokes the most visceral of responses from the average person. And for good reason. Sex that is physically forced or obtained by threat of harm sadistically reduces victims to their most helpless state, and leaves lingering damage that may well last the remainder of a persons life.

It is fitting then, that we seek to justly punish those guilty of the crime, but also that we proceed with caution and diligence, ever observing the rule of law in the process. That rule of law is integral to maintaining order; to preventing justice from being circumvented by political motives or mob rule; to ensure, as should be ensured in a just society, that the rights of the accused are protected with vigor and transparency.

Regardless of the personal repugnance we may feel for any crime, including rape, we must remember that without an overarching concern for justice, laws invariably become nothing more than the instruments of tyranny.

Unfortunately, where it concerns the crime of rape, that tyranny has been upon us for quite some time. With the epidemic of false rape reports, poor and sometimes corrupt police work, prosecutors blind with power and ambition, and an unconscionable but successful feminist campaign to define rape in the most ludicrous terms possible, we have created a monstrous system of abject injustice, with rights of the accused routinely ground to dust in the name of convictions, and to our national disgrace, in the name of sexual politics.

Whereas feminists lament what they call a rape culture in today's society, we actually live in a false rape culture, and it is in growth mode.

It seems every day there is a news story about a man freed from prison after being falsely convicted. Just recently, two Texas men were released from prison who had been falsely convicted of rape in separate incidents. One had served 27 years, the other 19.

That's two men, at the same time, not just from the same state, but from the same city.

Both men were from Houston, and their stories are being repeated around the country, revealing a somber reality that continues unimpeded.

There are a lot of innocent men in prison for the crime of rape. And much worse, our capacity to identify and exonerate them is overwhelmingly exceeded by an unjust legal system that continues to put them there.

The Innocence Project, which seeks to free individuals falsely convicted and incarcerated has overwhelmingly had the most success with the crime of rape. In a review of the 251 cases in which they have succeeded in freeing innocent men, nearly all of them were for sex crimes, and their average length of incarceration was 17 years. Most of those were freed only because they were lucky enough to have DNA evidence that could be evaluated. Many others are not so fortunate.

While the laudable efforts to free the innocent must continue, it is clearly time to seek to understand how we got to such rampant injustice, and what we can do about it. And that begins with a candid examination of what happens in a rape prosecution, from beginning to end.

It all starts with a police report; a compliant filed by a private citizen alleging that a rape has occurred.

And that is where we encounter the first of many problems. As the facts would have it, the chances of a rape accusation being true are barely more predicable than the toss of a coin.

Former Colorado prosecutor Craig Silverman once opined, "For sixteen years I was a kick ass prosecutor who made the most of my reputation [by] vigorously prosecuting rapists. I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations made to the Denver Police Department. A command officer in the Denver Police Sex Assault Unity recently told me he put the false rape numbers at approximately 45%."

Silverman's experience is not isolated.

Just recently the Orlando Police Department made the public proclamation that false rape allegations have become an epidemic. Last June the Baltimore Sun reported that police claimed that more than 30% of rape accusations were deemed unfounded. Louisville and Pittsburgh reported similar numbers.

A longitudinal study conducted by Professor Eugene Kanin concluded that over a period of nine years, 41% of rape allegations studied were fraudulent, concocted by the alleged victim to either create an alibi, seek attention and sympathy, or to seek revenge.

And there is the McDowell Study cited by Warren Farrell in The Myth of Male Power, which concluded that of 1,218 reported rapes on Air Force Bases around the world, 45% were discovered to be fraudulent.

This 45% of cases are not ones that could not be proven or for which a suspect could not be apprehended, but cases that were proven to be fabricated by the person filing the complaint. 27% of the false claims were admitted after the accusers were asked to take a polygraph test, or having just failed one.

Keep in mind though, that these are good results. All these false claims were discovered by diligent investigators who were seeking the truth. But what happens when police are not so careful?

33 year old William McCaffery spent four years in a New York prison because a false rape claim from Biurny Perguero Gonzalez, who alleged McCaffery had raped her after she accepted a ride from him when she was intoxicated.

The truth was that her acceptance of the ride from McCaffery had angered her girlfriends, and she made up the rape story to turn their harsh feelings into sympathy.

When questioned about the events, McCaffery cast blame at the officials, including "the arresting officers, the prosecution."

Everyone, he said, "wanted to believe the lie. The ADA (assistant district attorney) first and foremost."

And that is the status quo. While arrests for making false allegations appear to be on the increase, the norm has been to treat the criminality of the reports as a mental health issue. Crystal Gayle Mangum, the notorious liar in the Duke Rape Case, was referred to counseling, as was Danmell Ndonye, the woman who falsely accused five men in the Hofstra Case of gang raping her in a men's room at a school dorm.

The police themselves add to the problem. In the Orlando, Florida story, the NBC News affiliate reported statements by police saying that they do not want to arrest these women. In fact, they only seemed to notice the problem when it got so out of hand that it was causing a stress on resources within the police department. They also noted the deleterious effect on the "real victims" of rape, but did not utter a word about the men at risk for being wrongly placed behind bars as a result of the allegations.

This type of police complicity in the false rape culture, by ignoring and enabling this criminal activity, is a cornerstone in the current crisis. And while they now publicly bemoan the false allegations, they show no signs of recognizing that the epidemic they face is partly of their own making; that it is, quite literally, the chickens coming home to roost.

And where the police leave off, the prosecutors go into overdrive.

Mike Nifong, the supposedly "rogue" prosecutor who pursued the Duke rape suspects long after there was abundant evidence to exonerate them, has become the poster boy for false rape culture.

Nifong, while getting massive amounts of coverage from the media, was hardly the exception, and not even the most extreme. Mary N. Kellett, a prosecutor in Bar Harbor Maine, is making a career of rape cases. She is averaging one indictment a week, from a population of less than 60,000.

Her most notable case so far has been against Vladek Filler, who was convicted of raping his wife, with no forensic evidence, and only her word that the rape occurred. The conviction was overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct and Kellett is appealing the case to the Maine Supreme Court.

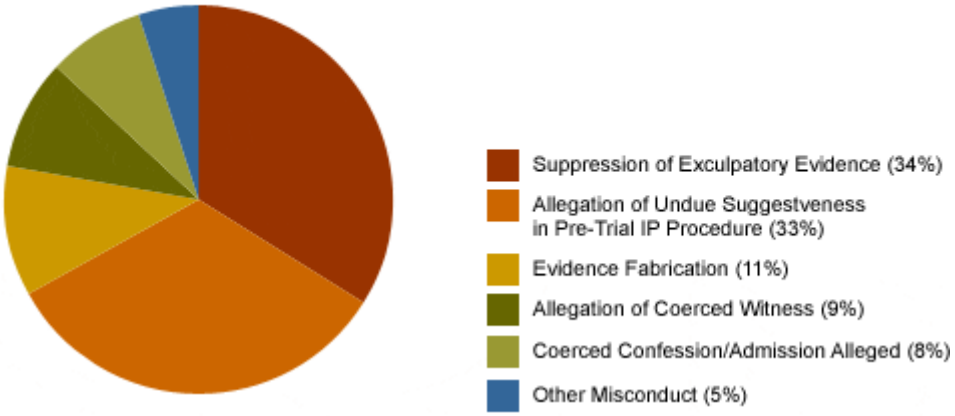
The chronology of this story is lengthy and the details somewhat complicated, but have a look, and a good listen, to the following recording of police interaction with Filler's wife.

This is what passes for a credible complainant in a modern rape case. This is the compelling reason to put a man behind bars. Kellett is clearly a prosecutor out of control, but she is nonetheless still serving as an Assistant District Attorney, and rumor has it she has ambitions to run for the District Attorney when her boss retires.

The Innocence Project gives a detailed breakdown of the factors that play into bad convictions, both from police and prosecutors. Key factors range from coercion of defendants, to knowing use of false testimony (suborning perjury) and a host of other unscrupulous tactics.

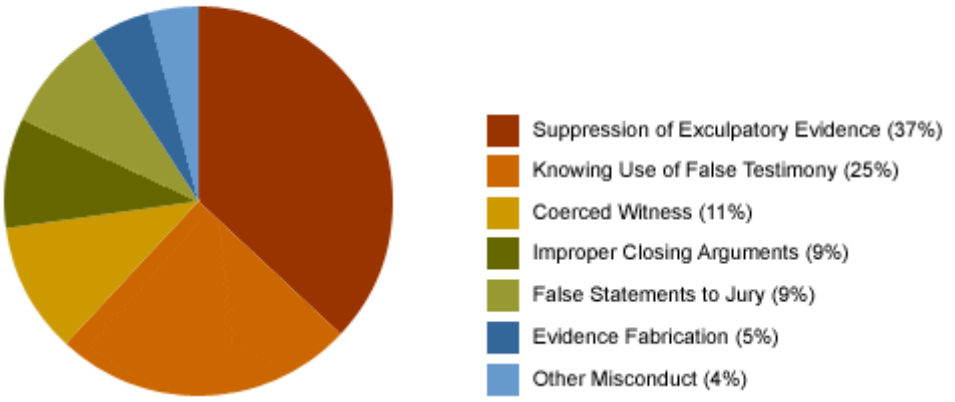
Here first, is the breakdown for police actions, representing nearly half of the first 74 people exonerated by The Innocence Project.

Police Misconduct (a factor in 37 of the first 74 DNA exonerations)



And now the breakdown for prosecutorial misconduct on the same group.

Prosecutorial Misconduct (a factor in 33 of the first 74 DNA exonerations)



In light of what is going on in our legal system, Kellett is no more a "rogue" than Mike Nifong.

It is the system that is rogue; Kellett and Niphong were/are just an unusually visible parts of it.

Even given the rampancy of false allegations and misconduct by law enforcement and prosecutors, this is still not justification for looking the other way when a crime is committed. Liars, whether shedding fake tears or wearing uniforms or arguing before a jury, cannot be allowed to so subvert justice that we abandon the law itself. For it is the law, when justly and rightly applied, that gives us the checks and balances to overcome those who abuse the system.

Enter, however, Rape Shield Laws; the final nail in the coffin that holds the remains of our presumed innocence and right to a fair trial.

Ostensibly, rape shield laws were enacted to limit a defendants ability to cross examine a plaintiff regarding her past sexual conduct, the logic being that such information is not only irrelevant, but might prejudice jurors. For instance, if it were brought out that a married woman alleging rape had engaged in extramarital affairs, it might cause a bias in some jurors that strongly disapprove of such behavior and prompt them to acquit her alleged assailant.

It would seem reasonable, until you go back and review the information provided by The Innocence Project and consider what this type of system does with these kinds of laws.

In 1998, Oliver Jovanovic was convicted and sentenced to 15 years to life for kidnapping, sexual abuse and assault. It was alleged that he held 20 year old Jamie Rzucek in his apartment against her will for 20 hours while he brutalized her with sadomasochistic torture. Rzucek testified against him for six days in court.

During the trial, the judge, under the rape shield statutes, refused to allow email communications that the she sent to Jovanovic after the incident, among other evidence.

Later an appeals court found that the judge had misapplied the laws and the conviction was overturned, but only after Jovanovich had served 20 months in prison, during which he was attacked and injured by another inmate.

The email from the woman that was excluded? In it, she described herself as “quite bruised mentally and physically, but never so happy to be alive.” And in another communication, she said, “the taste was so overpoweringly delicious, and at the same time, quite nauseating.”

It was also revealed that in the early part of the relationship the woman had expressed an interest in snuff films (films where actors are actually killed or death is simulated in a fashion as to appear real, for sexual stimulation).

Despite the conviction being overturned, and the prosecutor, Linda Fairnsteen, knowing about the exculpatory evidence, she still wanted to charge and retry Jovanovic. It was only when Rzucek, having to face the certainty of questions about her emails, refused to testify a second time that the case collapsed and was dismissed with prejudice.

In 2004, Jovanovic sued the city of New York, seeking $10 million for damage to his life and reputation, also asserting that the prosecution had prior knowledge of other false rape allegations made by the woman. An attempt by the city to have the case dismissed was denied by a federal judge.

A case grabbing even more headlines was that of Marv Albert, a formerly legendary sportscaster who pled guilty to assault stemming from an allegation made by his then girlfriend, Vanessa Perhatch. In a story that put Alpert’s admittedly unusual sexual proclivities in living rooms across the world, he was accused of sadistically biting Perhatch during a sexual assault.

Withheld from evidence by rape shield laws was Perhatch’s history of aggressive and vindictive actions against men who left her (Albert was about to be married) and the testimony of a former boyfriend that claimed that biting was a normal part of sex play for the woman.

Under the circumstances, Albert was compelled to either plead to a lesser charge or face very severe penalties at the conclusion of a trial. He opted for the former, was completely disgraced in the public eye, and in the process became nearly unemployable.

He was last seen playing a sidekick role on the television show Marriage Ref.

There are many more of these cases that are known, and undoubtedly many more that will never see the light of day. They are part an parcel to a system gone woefully astray, even if the original intent had some merit.

And there are more problems with many practices in courts during the course of a sexual assault trial. In some cases, the court will erect a partition; a screen that separates the alleged victim from the defendant, the logic being that the sight of the him will cause traumatic stress.

It has the prejudicial power of putting a sniper in the room with a gun trained on the defendant in case he decides to jump up and rape the plaintiff during proceedings.

It is clearly the presumption of guilt, legitimized by the same court that is supposed to protect the presumption of innocence.

These are all problems in need of a solution. And solutions are not forthcoming.

It would seem clear that reforming or eliminating these laws is in order. But neither is likely to happen. Imagine the professional life expectancy of a politician that tries to address this in the legislative sense. He, or even she, would be immediately branded as pro rape by feminist academics throughout the western world, and the pro-feminist machine we call the mainstream media would assassinate their image till they could not get a job alongside Marv Alpert.

Police are not going to help. They are a fundamental part of the problem.

Prosecutors? Who, Mary Kellett?

No. This is a problem so intractable and entrenched in the culture that any attempt to address it through conventional means is certain to result in failure and vilification.

So, what do you do within the system when the system is the problem? What do you do when laws that purport to serve the cause of justice can be so easily wielded as an instrument for revenge or the next rung up on a political ladder? And when there is all but impunity for those that do so?

What do you do when courts practice tyranny and innocent men are ground to dust along with their rights?

What do you do when these concerns are dismissed out of political expedience by a system that has built, with the majority of public support, a brick wall around its own systematic malfeasance?

Extreme circumstances call for extreme measures. And there is no better example of extreme than in the way this false rape culture has run common decency and sacred rights into the ground.

One possible extreme is jury nullification. When a law or system of applying laws becomes the source of injustice, jury nullification has long been a viable option.

Nullification occurs when a jury acquits a defendant despite the weight of evidence against him. It is legal and completely moral depending on the application.

For instance, a 1930's white jury finding a white male not guilty of murdering a black man despite a mountain of evidence that points to a conviction would be an immoral application of this principle.

But on the other hand, what would you think if a cancer patient were on trial for possession of marijuana, and you knew that drug was the only resource they had to help them tolerate their chemotherapy? Would it be immoral to ignore the law and let them go?

The law is clear. Marijuana is illegal. If they were in possession of it they were breaking the law. Should we not then send them to jail?

Now, I am not comparing an accused rapist to a cancer patient, but simply pointing to the fact that when the legal system fails to seek justice, when it is, in fact, undermining the very concept of justice, juries are equipped to put a stop to it.

Now what if you are on a jury in a rape trial, and you know that it is highly likely that evidence that may be exculpatory has been deliberately hidden from you? What if you think there is a genuine possibility that the trial is more about the career of the prosecutor than about the pursuit of justice?

What if you know you cannot trust what you are seeing?

In your mind, here and now, I challenge you to ask yourself. What kind of impact do the answers to these questions have on the concept of reasonable doubt?

And I would argue that if you are aware of how the system actually works, then you must be aware that reasonable doubt cannot be ascertained in a rape trial. There is just not enough trustworthy information in many cases to make that judgment, and unfortunately as a juror, you are not able to discern if the case you are seeing is one of the ones that has been tainted.

There are perhaps exceptions to this. If the state is able to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt that breaking and entering, an abduction, the use of a weapon or extensive bodily harm occurred during the alleged attack, then a guilty vote may be justified.

But I say perhaps for a reason. Remember the Jovanovic case? He was convicted of kidnapping with the other charges. It never happened. The Albert case as well. There were "injuries" involved there. All consensual. And he was convicted anyway. So even with these possible exceptions the state could be running a political circus instead of a legitimate trial.

Now, as to nullification, it is easy to conclude that the chances of getting 12 people on a jury knowledgeable enough of the system to see it for the railroad that it is, are highly unlikely. Actual acquittal is out of the question.

Never happen.

But it still takes unanimity to convict. It takes unanimity to convict on retrial as well. It takes only one to bring the system down, even if only for the time being. And it is a system so tainted that it quite clearly needs to be undermined- for the sake of justice.

There are people that will react to this with outrage and indignation. "How could you?" they will demand, "How could you let someone walk when the evidence shows you that they have committed something as heinous as rape?!"

And the same people, after reading account after account of innocent men being imprisoned, raped, tortured; destroyed, on lies, will reveal the utter depravity of their indifference by refusing to face what is happening or acknowledge that it even matters.

Their idea of justice is just as corrupt and selfish as the false accuser. They want only punishment, and only where it suits them, at any cost. They care less for the rights of men than Mike Niphong, and their objections should be discarded as quickly as they are raised.

As some food for thought, here is a video that in part addresses the process of voir dire, the questioning of jurors in preparation for a trial. Voir dire, translated literally from Latin means, "To speak the truth," which puts it in unusual company in a rape trial.

It is worth another few minutes to take a look at it.

Another Cop Killed in Domestic Dispute

Welmer · 2 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

An officer responding to a domestic call in a mobile home park in Greene County NC was shot to death by a young man when he walked up to his trailer to see what was going on. The killer then committed suicide. The officer, Deputy Jon Willis, was 31 years old and leaves two children behind. Deputy Willis was a devout Christian who liked to design and build cars and motorcycles. His 32nd birthday would have been yesterday.

Domestic disputes, as they are currently known, are the most dangerous category of police calls. One of the most hazardous things about domestic calls is that police never know what to expect. Women have been so thoroughly trained to use the police against their husbands and boyfriends that the call could simply be because she is trying to frame the guy up, or, on the other hand, there might really be a guy who's ready to die and take someone with him. Police must respond as though each one is potentially deadly, and therefore these calls are dangerous to the subjects as well as police.

Often, the extreme examples, such as murder suicides, appear at first glance to justify a militaristic approach to all domestic calls, but culture is adaptive, and people will come to expect war whenever the police are called to a home. This could raise the stakes, prompting more desperate and more violent reactions toward the other parties in disputes as well as the police, causing an overall higher death/serious injury rate.

Another overlooked consequence of making the police the arbiters of all domestic disputes is the fact that women are far more likely to appeal to them for assistance – even when it is not justified – than they would be otherwise. This is why police have no idea what to expect. The whole thing could be a lie, in which case some innocent guy could end up shot dead by the police for picking up a cell phone in view of frightened officers sneaking up on him. If women only called the police when the situation was truly serious, then cops would be justified in approaching these calls as very delicate, dangerous situations.

However, I've had cops tell me that 90% of the calls they get from women are over something trivial, so in many cases the cops simply get tired of gearing up for battle because some drunk couple got into a shouting match. Deputy Willis approached the mobile home alone, without his vest, probably expecting simply another trailer park row. Unfortunately for him, it was a fateful call, and two young men, including a father of young children – a cop known as a good man – ended up dead.

Feminist Writer Celebrates Her Inner Slut

Welmer · 2 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jaclyn Friedman, a writer who often provides an entertaining glimpse into the mind of a feminist, recently posted a piece, titled "My Sluthood, Myself", in which she revels in her promiscuity, then suggests that girls should be taught that being a slut is OK. In fact, she calls "sluthood" "soul-fulfilling."

We've featured Jaclyn before on The Spearhead, because she has a knack for spilling the beans and revealing what feminism is really about. Not long ago, she expressed distaste for feminist men, and then went on CNN to defend girls who were getting raging drunk, saying that the only concern should be predatory men.

Modern feminism, like Jaclyn, has embraced a cult-of self-indulgence, self-obsession, and solipsism. It is the celebration of the self as the most important thing in the universe, and a rejection of any duty or responsibility toward others. Hence widespread abortion, divorce, demands for privilege, etc. It would be laughable if it weren't enshrined in law and enforced by agents of the state.

Now for a few quotes:

> Last summer, I suffered the breakup of a relationship that I had thought would be permanent. Now, I've been through my share of break-ups, even of quite serious relationships, but nothing ever broke me like this one.
> Since then, I've had sexual interactions of the orgasmic kind with 9 different people, none of which I was at any time in a committed relationship with.

Not too shocking. Seems to prove the growing suspicion suspicion that by 30 most urban women have racked up over 50 partners. How did a fatty like Jaclyn find nine guys in less than a year (approximately one per month)? Craigslist encounters…

> I had never thought of my self as a Casual Encounters kind of girl. I'd read them on occasion, sure, out of fascination, horror, horniness. I'd even, once in a long while, in lonely desperate moments, posted an ad, not with the intention of actually meeting anyone, but because sometimes knowing you have a bunch of bad options that you're rejecting feels better than feeling like you have no options at all.

Although it mystifies me, finding guys who like to bottom feed is never too difficult for a woman — even a fat feminist like Jaclyn Friedman!

Jaclyn goes on in some detail about her personal, intimate life (do any guys actually find that proper?), filling us in on details we don't need to know, and then segues into a sermon about why sluts deserve support and protection.

> I'm telling you this because sluthood requires support. Because any woman who indulges these urges carries with her a lifetime of censure and threat. That's a loud chorus to overcome. A slut needs a posse who finds her exploits almost as delicious as she finds them herself, who cares about her safety and her stories and her happiness but not one whit about her virtue. A slut alone is a slut in difficulty, possibly in danger.

So what would she propose? A slut protection squad at every precinct, ready to charge in guns blazing as soon as a slut feels "endangered?" Sadly, we already have something like that, with police trained to take down any man who might catch his wife fooling around and get upset, thereby making her "frightened."

The following passage shows why Game is so effective:

> I'm telling you this because sluthood saved me. Sluthood gave me the time and space to nurse a shattered heart. It gave me a place where I could exist in pieces, some of me craving touch, some of me still too tender to even > expose to the light. Sluthood healed the part of me that felt my body and my desires were grotesque after two years in a libido-mismatched partnership. Now I felt hot, wanted, powerful.

A lot of women actually like being slutty. It makes them feel "hot," and if a guy knows how to present himself in a manner that makes her feel "hot" for having him, she doesn't care about trifling things like modesty or shame. The Puritans held that women were sexually more chaotic than men, and were probably right. One opinion that seems to be taken for granted in the manosphere, with which I disagree, is that men are by nature more promiscuous than women. Besides the fact that every single time a man has heterosexual sex, so does a woman, which makes exact equality a mathematical certainty, there's a difference in the nature of desire. For men, sexuality turns on and off; we're either thinking about it, or not. For women, it seems to be more of a constant current. I guess you could call men geysers and women rivers. Sure, the geyser is more impressive when it blows off, but the river is always flowing steadily along.

Finally, Jaclyn issues a call to sluthood, for its liberating, healing and fulfilling powers:

> Sluthood isn't just a choice we should let women make because women should be free to make even "bad" choices. It's a choice we should all have access to because it has the potential to be liberating. Healing. Soul-fulfilling. I'm telling you this because sluthood saved me, in a small but life-altering way, and I want it to be available to you if you ever think it could save you, too. Or if you want it for any other reason at all. And because even if you don't ever want sluthood for yourself, you're going to be called upon to support a slut. I'm telling you this because when that happens, I want you to say yes.

I don't really care what Jaclyn does with her life, but on reading some of the many comments on her piece, which featured a depressing litany of women confirming that this was exactly their own experience any lifestyle, it struck me as a pity that her experience is approaching the norm in our culture. Can there be such a thing as innocence any longer? Does romance even exist in a world in which women empower themselves through random hookups with men they meet online? It seems that the finer sort of love is dead, and beauty with it, because a pretty face means nothing without virtue, honor and dedication to a higher ideal than feeling "hot."

A Glimpse of Collective Hysteria, 80 Years into the Past

Featured Guest · 3 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Today's guest post written by John Dias of Misandry Review

I subscribe to a service called Netflix, and with it I am able to receive online streaming video to my TV set. Today I saw a video from the year 1931, entitled "M", by film maker Fritz Lang. It was set in Germany, and was one of the first "talkies," i.e. films with sound. The movie is subtitled in English, and is available on Youtube (see below).

The movie depicts an entire urban community in the grip of mass hysteria and fear as they struggle to track down and identify a child murderer. The police throw their full resources into finding the killer, but after eight months they still have nothing to show for their efforts. One of the problems that the overworked police force faces is a deluge of false allegations from a hyper-frightened public. In one poignant scene, a man who is walking down the street is approached by a little girl and asked what time it is. He gives her the time, but this act alone incites a mob of accusing onlookers, screaming that this man must be the child-killer and culminating in the police hauling him off to be questioned. Another scene shows a group of men sitting around a table in rapt attention as one reads them a newspaper article. That article prompts one of the paranoid men to accuse the one sitting directly across from him of being the killer. Threats between them ensue.

This movie was released prior to the rise of the Nazis in Germany, but in historical hindsight I think that it's easy to spot the ominous precursors of collective hysteria that had suffused the public mind in Germany at that time. In some ways, I see the same influences pervading our own culture today. In terms of gender, note that in the film all of the victims were little girls. Somehow the director of this movie knew that of all the possible victims that could evoke a visceral reaction in the viewer, it was little girls that would resonate more strongly than any other. That resonance — the depiction of female vulnerability — is just as palpable today. What disturbs me about it is the way that such a visceral reaction can so easily be used as a political tool to manipulate masses of people. Female vulnerability can be used as a political tool to manipulate masses of people. Netflix's description of this movie indicated that the Nazis went on to promulgate this movie as State propaganda in an effort to show the dangers of sexual deviance — namely, male-perpetrated sexual deviance against helpless girl victims. Do we not see the same undercurrent of fear about men throughout our culture today? Aren't our laws and public response to crime reflective of that fearful feeling?

The uniquely male role of protector of the vulnerable was — in fact — illustrated at the very beginning of this film. Seeing it almost felt quaint. In an opening scene, a little girl was about to cross the street but was startled by an oncoming car. A nearby policeman spotted her and took her by the hand, escorting her safely across the street. When I saw that, I wondered, "Why in our culture don't we see positive depictions of male uniqueness like that anymore?"

As the film approaches a climax, a crime syndicate decides to organize the city's homeless population into a block-by-block network of informants who report suspicious activity back to the crime syndicate (the syndicate's activities have been impeded due to the intensity of the police manhunt, and they want the killer stopped so that their "business" can resume as usual). The crime syndicate finds the killer and ultimately prosecutes him in their own secret criminal-led court, where an audience of criminals screams out demands for the killer's execution. The killer makes an impassioned plea, describing his mental illness in wrenching detail, but is nevertheless shouted down by the crowd which demands execution as the only permanent and effective solution. At the last minute, the police break in and apprehend both the killer and also all of the members of the crime syndicate, who silently put up their hands in surrender.

What a compelling movie. Watch this, people. Watch it as a looking glass through time, almost 80 years into the past. See if you can spot the cultural parallels between our current paradigm, and the time, place and culture where this movie was released. As you watch, remember what became of that time and place — Germany — less than a decade after this 1931 movie was published. The scary thing is that these people were all urban sophisticates — civilized. But watch it all unravel, a foreshadowing of things to come.

As American Women Fatten, New Beauty Pageants Emerge

Welmer · 3 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

All American women want to wear a tiara, but those old standards of beauty don't work for very many of them any longer. In fact, far fewer American women could be objectively called beautiful than a mere 30 years ago, when the fat epidemic had just begun.

Enter the "Miss Plus America" pageant, a competition specifically for "plus" women. Now, American women can eat their way to the championship, scarfing down potato chips and chugging soda pop to put them in the running for beauty queen.

I'm kind of curious as to why "plus" is the term employed. Is it supposed to suggest that it's somehow desirable, as in "that's a plus?" Maybe it simply sounds better than "Miss Fat America," but euphemisms have a way of becoming terms of ridicule, so it will probably backfire soon enough.

Personally, I don't have a problem with curvy women, naturally big women, etc. But it's obvious that these women have a great deal of body fat, and are technically obese. Obesity isn't beautiful, and it isn't healthy. Our aim should be to eradicate – not celebrate – obesity. However, it seems that these women's desire to be celebrated matters more than a national crisis that is seeing children develop type II diabetes, and adults die prematurely from weight-related diseases.

Weird Political Ad

Welmer · 3 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Here's a political attack ad aimed at a Washington State Representative, urging him to "get help before it's too late." State Rep Geoff Simpson has been arrested for DV (but not convicted), and these women are shaming him on TV:

Strange. Well, male politicians, looks like you guys are in the crosshairs, too. What goes around comes around, I suppose.

Columnist Calls Dutch Cowards, Demands World War for Women

Welmer · 4 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for Forbes, Abigail Esman is making a call to arms on behalf of the world's women, and she's gong about it by doling out a hefty dose of shame. Directly in her crosshairs are the Dutch, whom she taunts for losing to the Nazis in 1940 in a mere five days. Well, you try defending against a heavily armed, aggressive neighbor with the latest weapons and an enormous army on a flat, low-lying plain. It would be like the state of New Jersey trying to hold off the US armed forces.

Here she is slamming the Dutch:

> Of course, that the Dutch would retreat in the face of such aggression should hardly be surprising: This, after all, was the country that reduced its military after World War I, relying on other countries to come to its defense if needed; and which resisted Nazi forces for a whopping five days before surrendering on May 15, 1940. By the end of the war, 110,000 of Holland's 140,000 Jews–80%–had been exterminated.

Then, absurdly, Esman takes the Nazi analogy even further:

> But it is our fight. That fight belongs to every country of the world where women live. Because the Taliban are not just a national movement: They are a part of a worldwide and growing effort to establish Islamist rule, a renewed Caliphate, as Nazi Germany sought Aryan domination uber alles. True, the Taliban do not run concentration camps. But for the women who cannot leave their homes, who exist as veiled and faceless entities, who live in fear of being raped and then stoned to death for the crime of being unable to ward off their attacker, is there really any difference?

This is just too much. If she can't tell the difference between genocide and making women wear the burkah in public, why is this woman writing for Forbes? Furthermore, to compare contemporary Afghans – and even the Khalifa movement – to Nazi Germany shows a delusional mentality. Mid-20th century Germany was one of the most technologically advanced societies in the world, had a skilled and well-educated populace, and was capable of putting a massive, sophisticated army on the field. Taliban controlled Afghanistan, on the other hand, has one of the world's lowest literacy rates, is severely underdeveloped, and cannot project military power further than the range of an RPG. I doubt they even have a Cessna, and I think their armored cavalry consists of a fleet of donkeys pulling PK guns.

Finally, she writes that if we don't stop the Taliban, American and Dutch women will be subject to the horrors of the life of a Pashtun peasant maiden, possibly cooking dinner over an livestock dung fire, being forced to wear unfashionable clothes, etc.

> As the Taliban succeed, their power across Afghanistan will spread; and with that, similar movements, inspired by their achievements, will gain strength–indeed, already are gaining strength–across the region, in countries from Somalia to Iran, and onward to Holland and the U.S.A.
> There will be women there, as well.
> We must not abandon them.

It really is starting to look as though the biggest hawks in America today are feminists. This should alert men to the real dangers of feminists in power; when they've had their way with their enemies abroad, I can imagine that they'd want the guns turned on us.

If anything, this shows the feminist claims that female rule would usher in an era of peace and mutual goodwill for the lies they are.

Sexual Harassment Suit Backfires on California Woman

Welmer · 4 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Alameda County, CA – Paralegal Allison Moreno brought a suit against Thomas Ostly, her former boss, alleging sexual harassment, but instead found herself severely chastised by the jury when she was found liable for defamation — to the tune of $1.55 million.

Ms. Moreno said that she had felt "pressured" to have sex with her boss, and then was fired when she refused to carry on with the relationship.

Mr. Ostly told a different story, saying that she nagged him about being overweight, billed him for time spent shopping online and fought with him at work when he pointed out a bad mistake she'd made. He also claimed that she had told coworkers at a place she worked part time that he was a sexual predator.

Personally, I think sleeping with one's coworkers is idiocy these days, but it's bound to happen in mixed sex workplaces. Mr. Ostly made a bad mistake, and his former employee tried to take advantage of it. Had this occurred ten years ago, I think she would have won.

However, things are changing, and a sexual harassment suit is no longer an automatic payout. Interestingly, the jury was comprised of ten women and two men, and the judge was female, which suggests that even women are starting to question the actions of the particularly vicious members of their sex. This suggests that on men's issues sites such as The Spearhead, supportive women should not be antagonized strictly on account of their gender. We men may yet have female allies out there, and for some of us – Thomas Ostly for example – that could make a big difference.

They Were Expendable

Elusive Wapiti · 5 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: this post first appeared at the False Rape Society August 2d, 2010.

By 'they', I mean the men and males of yesterday. They were expendable because they themselves thought their lives worth less than the women in their midst. For the better, I see this attitude changing, despite attempts from old-school men, who, after having been so conditioned, can't think any differently, and lifeboat feminist women–who reap unearned benefit from male sacrifice, and, worse, consider themselves worth more than men and therefore entitled to it–to resuscitate, through shaming and manipulation, this dying tradition best left to wither and expire.

To lead this post off, I'll quote the usually excellent Robert Heinlein, but in this case, he shows his stripes as a hopelessly self-hating romantic, devaluing the male while elevating the female to the acme of society:

> Men are expendable; women and children are not. A tribe or a nation can lose a high percentage of its men and still pick up the pieces and go on… as long as the women and children are saved. But if you fail to save the women and children, you've had it, you're done, you're through! You join Tyrannosaurus Rex, one more breed that bilged its final test

This quote was not a one-off, for here's another from Heinlein clearly showing that he considers male sacrifice for the benefit of females, even unrelated, random females, to be the patriotic duty of right-thinking men:

> I said that "Patriotism" is a way of saying "Women and children first." And that no one can force a man to feel this way. Instead he must embrace it freely. I want to tell about one such man. He wore no uniform and no one knows his name, or where he came from; all we know is what he did. In my home town sixty years ago when I was a child, my mother and father used to take me and my brothers and sisters out to Swope Park on Sunday afternoons. It was a wonderful place for kids, with picnic grounds and lakes and a zoo. But a railroad line cut straight through it. One Sunday afternoon a young married couple were crossing these tracks. She apparently did not watch her step, for she managed to catch her foot in the frog of a switch to a siding and could not pull it free. Her husband stopped to help her. But try as they might they could not get her foot loose. While they were working at it, a tramp showed up, walking the ties. He joined the husband in trying to pull the young woman's foot loose. No luck — Out of sight around the curve a train whistled. Perhaps there would have been time to run and flag it down, perhaps not. In any case both men went right ahead trying to pull her free… and the train hit them. The wife was killed, the husband was mortally injured and died later, the tramp was killed — and testimony showed that neither man made the slightest effort to save himself. The husband's behavior was heroic… but what we expect of a husband toward his wife: his right, and his proud privilege, to die for his woman. But what of this nameless stranger? Up to the very last second he could have jumped clear. He did not. He was still trying to save this woman.

Lest anyone claim that said attitudes are indicative of the old ways of thinking, I give you columnist Jeannie DeAngelis at the American Thinker. She breaks out the shaming language in spades in a column from just last month, casting as barbarians men who dare do harm women and children. The implication of course being that those of us men in other cultures who witness it and let it pass are equally as uncivilized. Of course, such name calling is merely white-feather neo-con exhortations to make war on other cultures because they don't do like we do–the usual left-wing whinging about how cultures are equal curiously absent:

> When the Titanic sank in 1912, women on board had a 75% higher chance of survival than men, and children a 52% higher survival rate, because women and children were placed on lifeboats first. In a humane society, "women and children first" is a testimony to the bravery and chivalry of civilized men. Emphasis on the word

> For barbarians, the standard is much different. In the past few months, the world has witnessed how cultures rooted in brutal, millennia-old practices treat vulnerable women and, more tragically, innocent children.
> Last month, Del Awar, aged seven, was taken at dusk from the yard where he was playing. Del was found "hanging in an orchard the following day." According to those who "saw his slight body after it was cut down … the bruises and scratches around the young boy's neck suggested his murder had been neither quick, nor easy." As punishment for the absurd crime of supposedly being a spy for Hamid Karzai's government, the Taliban, made up of men, carried out the execution.
> In Iran, cowards of a similar breed prepare to mercilessly stone a "caring mother" to death. [The woman], Sakineh, was convicted of adultery while married in 2006, after which she received the punishment of 99 lashes…Sakineh's skin was sadistically and systematically peeled away from bone and muscle during a brutal, male-inflicted flogging that even strong men can't endure…a kangaroo court, similar to the one that hung a seven-year-old boy for spying, reopened the case because the woman was then suspected of murdering her husband. Sakineh was acquitted of spousal murder. Acquittal aside, "the adultery charge was reviewed and a death penalty handed down on the basis of 'judge's knowledge' — a loophole that allows for subjective judicial rulings where no conclusive evidence is present." A subjective ruling without evidence is one of many shining examples of Sharia Law.
> How about if America's Muslim-friendly president instead denounces Islam's barbaric practice of stoning women and hanging children?

But it doesn't stop there. Another man, witnessing the growing popularity of lesbian chic, declares that men are apparently useless to women sexually these days:

> I was recently reading about yet another bevy of young women who are opting for pelvic refreshment with other women, and it struck me that the abandonment of men as sexual partners might not just be a fashion of our times, but an entirely natural process. Indeed, it might well be that women are naturally drawn to one another's beds like bees to blossoms, and that only the need to get someone to make babies, or do the Neolithic equivalent of unblocking the loo, is what caused cavewomen to agree to have sex with cavemen in the first place. Otherwise, sexually speaking, the girls get on very nicely without us.
> I suspect that the taboo on lesbian sex was created by dominant males and their female allies because, deep down, so many women preferred female bodies, companionship and sexual skills. But men need women in ways that women simply don't need men. There's no general equivalent for women of the female prostitute, the call girl, the courtesan or the mistress — for different classes of men have always resorted to paid female sexual companionship. Sexually frustrated women have either abstained or, long before Anne Summers, looked after themselves.

Lessee…with the Heinlein quotes, we have an appeal to ancient, maybe even hardwired tribal traditions to protect the womenfolk, traditions invented and reinforced through the millennia when one's civilization was constantly on the knife's edge between survival and oblivion. There are two problems with this conceptualization, however. First, it is hard to make the case that, in a society that numbers over 300 million, as the modern American country does, individual womenfolk require such protection. We have far far more breeding pairs than we require. Second, the flip side to such gentlemanly self-sacrificial behavior is the implication that said women are worth saving because of their potential as breeders. Of course this assumes that women wish to be viewed as breeders, which a great many do not. But more importantly, a great majority of native American women fail to actually become breeders, and if they should deign themselves to actually whelp a child, a great great many fail to do so in sufficient quantities to replace the population. Except for the right Mormon women in Utah that is, who have the highest fertility rate in the country. This then begs the question: if so many native American women refuse to have children outright or, having had a child, have failed to execute their full duty by having more than 2.1 children, do they still merit automatic male sacrifice? What is the patriotic fellow's role since native American women have failed to uphold their (reproductive) end of the grand bargain?

DeAngelis' quote hardly needs any more amplification. Men are 'inhumane' and 'uncivilized' if they do not voluntarily surrender their lives for the benefit of women and children (why is it that 'women' and 'children' are always paired together? Isn't it just as valid to say 'men and children', particularly when automatic father custody used to be rule in Western Civilization?), even if those women and children are unrelated to him. Men are 'barbaric' for protecting the sanctity of the marriage bond, for enforcing female chastity, and for seeing to the security of the State, all three of which are goods in which women benefit greatly and suffer equally greatly when they are absent.

DeAngelis makes quite a bit of hay about Sakineh Mohammedi Ashtiani, a woman sentenced to death in Iran for adultery. Yet I note that Sakineh was also convicted of sleeping with two men out of wedlock in 2006, one of whom was also accused–along with her–of killing Sakineh's husband. I could not find any mention in media anywhere of the fate of either man she fornicated/adulterated with. Were they put to death? We do not know, partially because, as we see in this case, our culture only cares about gruesome death when it happens to women and/or children.

Yet while Angelis' quote needs little amplification, given the usual audience of this blog, it does merit a bit of commentary, for it represents a very strong undercurrent in the culture that perpetuates the principle of the 'disposable male'. As we have seen, men are lambasted from both left and right, from both males and females, heck, ABC even has an entire series dedicated to instill a sense of shame in others–usually men, for men are apparently expected to intervene to help vulnerable women–for failing to risk their lives, even die, so that unrelated women may live on in comfort and security. A good example of this would be a recent Time magazine cover, which featured the mutilated face of the Afghan girl.

Such obvious agitprop seems to have but one purpose: to beat the war drum and rally flagging American support for the effort to install mercantilist feminism at the point of a gun in Iraq and Afghanistan. And provide fodder with which to motivate/shame American men into risking their lives for the benefit of women on the other side of the planet.

From whence does this supposed duty come from? The best bottom-line source I can think of is the Bible, where Christian men were exhorted as husbands to lead and sacrifice for their wives and families, and as members of a Christian community to take up arms in its defense. Clearly there was an expectation that men had the responsibility to use their resources and strength for the good of their wives and children and for their tribe. The responsibility was theirs, as a duty uniquely inherent to being a man.

Thus was established the precedent for men to sacrifice themselves for women and for children, even women and children not related to him. Armchair heroes and heroines from then on graded a man's worth by how willing they were to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of women. Yet women, for their part, never quite satisfied with a good thing, have thrown off the old restrictions in a vain search for something better. This tectonic shift that relieves women of their social roles yet retains those for men leaves men in somewhat of a quandary: how does one act toward a woman who is a ruthless peer competitor–a competitor that enjoys social and legal advantage in nearly every way over men–in the workplace, yet demands deference in the social/familial sphere? How does a man respond when traditional patriarchal marriage has been stood on its head and, rather than being an institution where men and women team economically, physically, and spiritually to raise the next generation, has instead been converted into a vehicle to transfer wealth from male(s) to female? How does a man adjust when the traditional ways of finding a mate–male initiation and female choice–become a minefield of sexual-harassment charges and rape accusations to be successfully navigated? How should a man react when supposedly more virtuous women relentlessly pursue serially polyandrous couplings with successively higher-status men, to include thugs and criminals, shunning perfectly good men like him until they are thread-bare, shop-worn, used-up empty husks unable to sustain a long-term relationship? How should a man react when his freedom has been traded for temporary security by recently-suffraged women, when the machinery of government had been perverted to conscript him to be a government sharecropper for the benefit of high-ranking men and women nationwide? Indeed, how should a man respond to women's and other men's lecturing of him for failing to rise to–or die in, as the case may be–the defense of such women whom are not his wife or his mother, sister, aunt, or niece?

The same way they have been responding, I am afraid: with indifference. It is someone else's problem. The male willingness to act has been driven underground; in its place, a sense of self-preservation has taken root. The armchair heroes and heroines may bang on about where all the good men have gone and how cowardly the current crop of men are, but they are apparently ignorant of the fact that these good men have been driven away by women themselves lacking in virtue. Having heard, loud and clear, Dowd's declaration that men are not really all that necessary,[image] men, being the gentlemen that they are, have stepped aside and are permitting the feminine to drive for a while.

The third quote, citing the growing feminine fascination with lesbianism, strikes me as true insofar as women's flexible sexual appetites are concerned. But what Myers does not address is that, while women may very well have rejected the notion that they need men, in their mad dash to make love to themselves, they also seem to have conveniently forgotten that they are still quite dependent on men for security, prosperity, and safety. A society where the male half is not enfranchised is not one that survives for very long, for the distance between moon shots and skyscrapers to mud huts and foraging parties is quite short.

Indeed, as the below video quite well explicates (and occasionally overstates), women would do well to remember that it is the men they devalue who provide the very scaffolding that holds society up and permits women to labor comfortably in air-conditioned buildings:

To those armchair heroes and heroines who tsk-tsk at men who balk at risking their lives for women who are not their wives, mothers, sisters, aunts, or nieces, I ask: what purpose are you serving in your exhortations? Is his cost-benefit analysis really that selfish and short-sighted? Does he have that little to live for? Does your reactionary urging serve to pull society back from the abyss? Or are you merely propping up a corrupt system that holds men to their traditional roles as providers and protectors while releasing women from theirs as chaste, faithful mothers and nurturers? Are you pursuing justice, freedom, and equality under the law? Or are you enabling the continued trafficking of men into slavery on the government plantation, stripped of their rights under the law and their children at the same time?

And to those–particularly men–who think that men are expendable and that a society can well withstand the loss, either through death, warfare, or social ostracism/incarceration of a large proportion of its men, I suggest that the data speaks otherwise. The example of the urban ghetto should demonstrate to all that a society that loses large proportions of its men is a society with its future very much in jeopardy. For it is men and men alone who bequeath the gift of civilization to women and children. The society that loses its men faces many of the same challenges that a society that loses a large segment of its women–the inability to propagate and socialize the next generation of society.

The lives of men are too important than to be just thrown away in furtive efforts to protect those who may not deserve it. Women and men both would do well to value men for the invaluable contributions they make to society.

Vancouver Washington Woman Beats Man to Brink of Death With Vacuum Cleaner, Cries to Police that Man Beat Her Up

Welmer · 5 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a dilapidated trailer park in Clark County Washington, 37-year-old Michelle Hawn seized a dirt devil upright vacuum cleaner and attacked Todd Proetel, her 41-year-old boyfriend, fracturing his skull and leaving him unconscious in a pool of blood. Hawn then ran out of the house crying, telling neighbors “Todd beat me up.” Hawn is 5’6″ tall and weighs 210 pounds.

Ms. Hawn, who is currently being held on $100,000 bond on suspicion of first-degree domestic violence assault, has a history of emotional instability and substance abuse. She admitted to striking the man, and was intoxicated when police arrived on the scene. Police noted that despite her claim that he “beat her up,” she had no visible injuries or evidence of past assaults.

Hawn is unemployed and living on disability.

The story has been picked up internationally as a “humorous” news item, probably because one does not often think of a vacuum cleaner as a deadly weapon. However, Mr. Proetel, who is recovering from critical injuries, probably doesn’t think it is all that funny.

Male Expendability and the Nature of Tribes

Welmer · 6 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Having long wanted to address the idea that men are less important from an evolutionary, biological standpoint than women, I am glad to see Elusive Wapiti's post on the issue. In his post, he addresses the widely-held assumption that men are expendable from a logical and moral point of view, contrasting the difference between today and yesteryear, and bringing contemporary examples to bear prove his points. It's very well done, and probably the most effective approach for convincing people today that the old ideals are no longer functional.

However, due to a life-long interest in anthropology, I feel compelled to add to it. Most people support the idea of male expendability because they are looking at human evolution and social organization in entirely the wrong way. They take the most basic unit of human society – the family – and from there attempt to draw conclusions about how the mass of humanity behaves and functions. This is simply not how things work.

From the beginning, humans have lived in tribes, which are somewhat akin to groups of chimpanzees, cooperating to provide food, childcare, labor and dissemination of information. The family, in its varied forms, was always subordinate to the tribe, and the tribe often in conflict with other tribes. Humans have competed with each other for resources and territory from the dawn of history and before, and they have usually done so through some sort of tribal conflict. Usually, the more numerous tribe would win, because it could summon more men and defeat the other by force of numbers, but because the ideal human group is relatively small – some 50-100 individuals – summoning a larger force required relatively complex rules and strong taboos to maintain any sort of social cohesion. Hence the seeds of civilization were sown through tribal competition.

Despite the addition of all this complexity, which has enabled humans to live in mass societies, the basic tribal tendency remains part of human nature. And in a tribe, the most important component has always been the men. Without them, there is only booty, free for the taking for any group of men willing to come along and claim it. In fact, this has been the case for so long that patrilocality is the norm throughout the world. Exogamy in primitive tribes is exceedingly common, but it is usually the women who leave one group and go to another — this is reflected in our modern practice of women and children taking the husband's surname. The men stay, because without them the group would simply be swallowed up by others.

Because the tribe has been, if not the most basic, the most important unit of human society, it is highly likely that humans evolved to maximize the success of the tribe. This would include gender roles, and probably even gender phenotypes. Human females are particularly poorly suited to hunting when compared to other species that derive a similar portion of calories from meat, so division of labor has obviously been in play since at least the emergence of modern homo sapiens. Some have suggested that this division was not so clear for neanderthals, whose women may have come along on the hunt and helped bring down large animals, but the neanderthal physique was substantially different from our own.

The point is that the tribe is mainly defined by its men, and has been throughout recorded history, which suggests that this was always the case. Evidence from primitive tribes in the modern era supports this as well. And although it's counterintuitive, the fact that men are usually targeted while women are often spared in tribal conflict even further confirms the importance of males. If it were true that tribes cannot survive without women, the most successful tribes would have been those that systematically exterminated their enemies' female members, which would be far easier to do in any event. But this simply did not happen.

For the biblically inclined, I'd like to point to the story of the tribe of Benjamin, a particularly warlike Israelite tribe which was nearly exterminated after some mortal offense (inhospitality) prompted the other tribes to gang up on them. The other tribes were so angry at Benjamin that after defeating their men in battle, they slaughtered all the women and children, leaving the Benjaminites a tribe of bachelors. Finally, when the other tribes felt fairly certain that the Benjaminites had learned their lesson, the men were allowed to marry women from other tribes, and ultimately the tribe was reestablished.

Now, imagine what would have happened if every single Benjaminite man was slaughtered and the women spared. The women would have been distributed as spoils of war, and Benjamin would have been no more. From the tribal survival standpoint, who is more expendable?

It would be tempting to suggest that things have changed so much that tribal consideration no longer matter, but that would be a short-sighted argument. Civilization did not develop by repudiating humans' natural tribal sentiments, but by incorporating them into a larger organization. Military organizations, today and in the past, are broken down into manageable groups that approximate the size of a tribe. The US Army Company, the Roman Centuria (which also means tribe), the Mongol Zuut and the Germanic Hundred are all examples of this. Churches have traditionally had about a tribe's worth of parishioners, and large corporations are organized to take this optimal group size into account as well. Despite the sophistication of contemporary society, humans are still fundamentally tribal. It's instinctive and reflected in how we organize our lives and tasks.

Therefore, one can see modern states, and civilization in general, as a massive confederation of tribes, between which there remains a great deal of competition. However, men are arguably just as important as ever to these basic social units to which they belong. Where would our businesses, our military and our public service organizations be without their men? Law and order, commerce, infrastructure and defense would fall apart within days.

So why are men so often treated as expendable within society? It goes back to competition, i.e. your men are expendable, but ours are not. Elites have always been perfectly happy to use other people's sons as cannon fodder, while usually protecting their own from the battlefield. At the highest levels of society, sons are preferentially educated over daughters, and then these exact same people who favor their boys take steps to ensure that less fortunate sons are prevented from competing with them. Other people's daughters, on the other hand, are no threat to their tribe — they are a resource to be exploited. In fact, support of feminism by elites only confirms that they see other tribes' women as chattel, or perhaps tribute — either term would suffice. When men are given as tribute, it has typically been in one of two roles: the warrior or the eunuch. Hence, they want our boys as soldiers (including police) or femme homosexuals (the modern incarnation of the eunuch); for the rest of us they have little use except as peasants, to be kept in line with punitive taxes and overwhelming force.

The argument that men are expendable because of some biological mandate is perhaps the last vestige of the pseudoscience that emerged from 19th century anthropology and plagued humanity with various wrong-headed ideologies throughout the 20th century. In reality, men have always been the most essential component of the tribe, which has characterized human social organization since the dawn of our species. The world's oldest and most successful civilizations have learned this over time, and have survived because they incorporated this truth into their law and governing philosophy. We have to recognize that men are targeted for abuse and dispossession exactly because they are essential to the strength and health of their tribes. When we live in a mass society without any sense of common values or interests, where discord, envy and greed are the norm, it is perfectly natural that men will come under attack. If one thinks of it as an inchoate civil war, it becomes all the more clear.

Inconvenient Boys Chemically Neutered for Autism "Therapy"

W.F. Price · 7 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

John Dias of Misandry Review recently identified an emerging medical trend that has very disturbing implications. Some doctors in south Florida have been injecting adolescent autistic boys with lupron, a prostate cancer treatment drug that halts production of testosterone.

According to Dr. Mark Geier, testosterone binds mercury in the body, and autistic kids often have too much testosterone, so the treatment helps by restoring a "normal" level of testosterone. However, the majority of parents seeking treatment (if not all of them) appear to be mothers of adolescent boys. Normal levels of testosterone in adolescent boys are very high in comparison with other people.

Some of the parents who have been interviewed expressed frustration with the socially inappropriate behavior of the autistic boys, including some aggression and sexualized behavior. After chemical castration, Geier says that they are more aware, sociable and better-behaved.

The truth about autism is not pretty. Mental conditions are amongst the most difficult for people to deal with, particularly when their children are afflicted with them. Therefore, it is understandable that some parents, in desperation, will grasp at whatever they can. However, Dr. Geier is basing this therapy on some unproved hypotheses – such as the mercury-based thimerosal theory – that are quite controversial and likely wrong. Geier suggests that mercury causes the body to produce too much testosterone, and he is only using lupron to restore a normal balance.

In fact, Dr. Geier is not treating mercury as the poison, but rather testosterone. For years now testosterone has been painted as an evil hormone that causes most social problems we have today, so it shouldn't be surprising that a number of parents find his ideas compelling. It would be no stretch at all to suggest that the pathologization of masculinity led directly to this novel form of "treatment."

Another use for lupron is in the so-called "chemical castration" of sex offenders where, again, testosterone is treated as the problem rather than another disorder.

Over the years, there have been many, many medical treatments based on pseudoscience and bad ideas. For example, in the 19th century women's problems were often attributed to "hysteria," a malady that supposedly caused women to become emotionally disordered and troublesome. Although there is no no doubt that the symptoms existed, the treatment, which consisted of sexually stimulating the women (the vibrator was invented to treat hysteria), should have suggested that it was not a disease at all, but rather simple sexual frustration on the part of women.

Then, in the 20th century the practice of lobotomization became common to treat troublesome individuals, often including difficult or unwanted children. One of the most touching pieces I ever heard on NPR concerned a man whose stepmother had him lobotomized as a child because she just didn't like him. Lobotomy, which involved the removal of the frontal lobes, has fortunately been recognized as the barbaric treatment it was, although the doctors who touted its benefits were never held accountable for destroying crucial parts of people's brains.

In the case of lobotomy, treatments were first recommended only for the most extreme individuals, such as very agitated lunatics. However, over time it was touted as a panacea, and countless people, many of whom were not all that disturbed – if at all – lost their frontal lobes.

This is why the trend of using luprol should be cause for alarm. First, they used it on cancer patients as a last-ditch effort to keep them alive. This is acceptable, just as it would be acceptable to remove part of the brain of someone with brain cancer in hopes of saving their life. Next, they start using it on sex offenders, and here's where it becomes suspect. Not only is it unproven (and highly unlikely) that testosterone is responsible for sadistic perversions, there seems to be a punitive element to the use of the drug in this case. When a drug is used to punish, it becomes a poison. However, perhaps worse, it leads to the assumption that lupron can improve male-specific (or, widely thought to be male-specific) behavior that is conventionally seen as bad.

It's well known by now that ADD was widely used as an excuse to medicate boys for "misbehavior." ADD drugs probably started with the most extreme examples, but slowly grew in popularity and became a widespread trend. In today's anti-male climate, it is plausible that the same thing may happen with lupron. First, it will be used on autistic boys who are unable to follow social rules of behavior, and then on boys who are borderline, and then finally on boys who are simply part of what might be called the "normal" spectrum. I can imagine single mothers, struggling with sullen, rebellious teen boys, demanding that doctors chemically castrate them. In fact, it's probably already happening.

This is a real threat, and one we have to expose and nip in the bud before it gets started. Quacks like Dr. Geier should be shut down before they start doing some real damage to boys.

High Technology

Welmer · 8 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It's Seafair weekend in Seattle, and despite the unfortunate cloudy, damp weather (actually quite uncharacteristic for this time of year), the pilots are still putting on a nice show. Today, one of the new F-22 Raptors was flying around, doing the controlled stalls, climbs, spins and all the rest. Having seen the Blue Angels dozens of times in my life, these acrobatics are nothing new, but we did get one nice treat when the pilot made a transonic run just a couple hundred feet over the lake.

For the F-22, breaking the sound barrier is effortless. There is so much power in those twin engines that one can feel it reverberate through one's ribcage from a mile away. The little show of speed over the lake was impressive, but what really inspires awe is how it seems like nothing more than an easy jog for the plane.

When planes hit the sound barrier, they are enveloped in this halo of water vapor, which makes futuristic planes like the raptor look almost like alien spacecraft surrounded by flickering force fields. Then, of course, there's the sonic boom, which sometimes sounds like a thud and others a bit like the crack of a rifle shot (which is a sonic boom itself). I suppose it depends whether the shock wave created by the boom is obstructed or not.

It's really amazing to see what men can create when they put their minds to it and work together. Sure, the F-22 is an instrument of war, and it would be terrifying to be targeted by one of those machines, but there's something glorious about such superlative technology. How could the human beings who have the capacity to create such amazing things have been so thoroughly subjugated in their own homes?

Expanding Shaming Language

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 9 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As men realize how shaming language is repetitive, it loses its effectiveness. What female supremacists and their manginas and white knights do is simply produce more shaming language. Another method they use is the expansion of shaming language itself through redefining various terms, such as homosexual, to buttress their poor arguments.

Over at The (Not) Thinking Housewife (where a mangina said that men should be imprisoned on false rape charges to protect women), one of the resident manginas, Josh, tries to claim that anything regarding men's rights is homosexual. We know this makes no sense, so he tries to redefine what the word "homosexual" means, despite it having a specific definition about being sexually attracted to members of the same sex. Take a look at what Josh had to say:

> At root of both the "feminist" movement and its modern mirror, the men's rights movements, is radical homosexuality (devout dykism), i.e., radical sexual autonomy. Radical sexual autonomy is the biological "goal" of liberalism and the easiest way for a "default elite" to stay in power after convincing a populace to deny Supremacy. A populace in a state of anti-Supremacy and willing to embrace homosexuality is a self-annihilating populace.
> The core message of the men's rights movement (MRM) is to avoid marriage and kids and that Christianity is the liberal juggernaut. This is de facto homo-ism and anti-Supremacy.
> The MRM is at root a liberationist movement. Like all liberationist movements, it seeks to dissolve all relations and destroy all impediments to its autonomy. In short, all liberationist movements seek a radical autonomy. But this existence must manifest in the physical world. The two most primitive liberal manifestations are atheism and homosexualism
> The MRM is merely a MALE liberationist movement largely driven by atheists and homosexuals. It is "feminism" (euphemism for devout dykism) for males.
> I think our common understanding of homosexuality is a false one and it is easy to see why. Homosexuality is, first and foremost, sexual aversion with the "same-sex attraction" merely filling the void. More specifically, male homosexuality and devout dykism are sexual aversions to female and male, respectively. With this aversion and before the "attraction" is homo-sexuality, i.e., self-sexualization, a radical form of autonomy. A homosexual is one that is averse to the Other and attracted to self. He is a radical autonomist and ultimately a self-annihilator.

Putting aside the fact that Josh is guilty of triangulation for trying to equate feminism with men's rights, he is not only trying to redefine the word homosexual, but uses other terms such as supremacy in a manner that differs from their actual meaning. And why does he capitalize the word "supremacy?" Why doesn't Josh use words as they are defined in the English language? Because he is white knighting for women and has no real argument against us. Calling us all homosexuals makes no sense. While there are homosexual men as part of the MRM, most of us are not homosexual nor do we have any sort of "homosexual agenda". What Josh is doing is trying to expand shaming language by redefining words like homosexual so that he can call us all fags. The lack of logic in such a process is clear.

Josh's real agenda is made clear when he says, "the core message of the men's rights movement (MRM) is to avoid marriage and kids". What he is really worried about is that men are leaving the plantation and refusing to be slaves to women. Josh is incapable of admitting that actions like the marriage strike and refusing to have children are rational and sensible responses by men to the fallout caused by feminism. The clear answer to such a problem if you want men to get married and have kids is to fix problems like the family court system, the child custody system, other unjust laws and socialism. This would increase incentives and decrease disincentives for men to get married and have kids. While this seems simple, a white knight like Josh can't understand this exactly because he is a white knight. Instead, he tries to redefine words like homosexual in a pathetic attempt to tar us with the sodomite brush.

To see how absurd white knights like Josh are being, compare what Josh is doing to what he would be saying if he tried it with other shaming language. Another form of shaming language that gets used against men is, "you have a small penis". If Josh was trying to redefine that in the same way he is trying to redefine homosexual, he would be claiming that he can say that we all have small penises because our penises are less than 15 inches long.

This is not the first time that someone has tried to redefine the term homosexual beyond sexual attraction to the same sex. Extreme conspiracy theorist, Henry Makow, claims that all porn is gay, even that porn that has only heterosexual sex, and that sex is for procreation and that we are supposed to "outgrow" sex afterwards, with any further sexuality being gay. Josh is a conspiracy theorist because he believes that the MRM, the marriage strike, male refusal to have children, etc. are tools of the "elite" as opposed to a rational and sensible response by men.

We will see more attempts to redefine homosexuality so our opponents can call us "gay" and hope we will obey them for fear of this childish slur. As shaming language loses its effectiveness over time this will have little effect, because the argument is so poorly reasoned that any man with an ounce of common sense could see through it.

HP CEO Mark Hurd Fudges Accounts to Pay Female "Contractor," Gets Sued for Sexual Harassment and Fired

Welmer · 9 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Porn star Jodie Fisher hired Gloria Allred to sue Mark Hurd and Hewlett Packard for sexual harassment, and has reportedly reached a settlement with Hurd, but not HP. Hurd had hired the woman as a contractor – apparently an events planner and "greeter" – and, according to HP, was lying about time he spent with her on the company's dime and paying her even when she broke her contract.

Mark Hurd was hailed as something of a hero for turning HP around over the last five years and handling a number of successful acquisitions. His business acumen has never been called into question, but a weakness where women are involved may prove to be his undoing. However, because we really have no idea what happened, Hurd may not have desired any sexual relationship with the woman at all — for all we know he could have simply been pimping her to prospective clients.

Ironically, men are taught from a very young age that women are trustworthy, blameless creatures – almost as though they are some benevolent, superior race from outer space – even as one hears with astounding regularity about powerful men being undone by them. Here we have an example of a rich, powerful man going to great lengths to secure jobs and money for some lady, who then turns around and goes after him and his company with Gloria Allred, probably aiming to kill two birds with one sexual harassment suit.

In order to protect itself, HP probably had to fire Hurd, but the company has stated that it did not find any evidence of sexual harassment. Instead, the company appears to be suggesting that the woman took him and HP for a ride, and his weakness resulted in the misconduct and dishonesty he was fired for.

To me, these incidents are simply proof that we need to stop lying to boys about girls and women and teach them from a suitable age – probably puberty – about the trouble they can get in when they are not on their guard around women. Sexual education, although opposed by many parents, is taught on the basis of having social benefits, so why not "gender" education? Have boys take classes that show them in a graphic manner how men can get fired, arrested, thrown out of their homes, and have their families destroyed all on the word of one vindictive woman.

Suzy Strawberry Beaten in Broad Daylight

Welmer · 9 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the practice of chivalry has been delegated to the state, it appears that individual men are no longer behaving in the most accommodating manner toward women. In fact, the taboo against attacking and humiliating women has started to dissipate in the younger cohort, as incidents such as the following suggest.

Recently, in Bellingham Washington, 22-year-old James Manas approached IHOP mascot Suzy Strawberry, represented by a 19-year-old woman in a huge pancake suit, and began mocking and slapping her.

Eventually, police were called, and Mr. Manas was cited for disorderly conduct. Manas claimed that it was all in good fun, and he didn't mean any harm. An old man interviewed on TV about the attack was appalled, but otherwise people didn't seem all that disturbed by the incident.

Feminism sought to reinforce female privilege by making it a government on top of cultural priority. However, when government takes something over, people generally stop feeling that it is their job, so instead of buttressing female privilege, the effect has simply been to transfer responsibility. Although some young men may still have a white knighting, chivalrous attitude, they are increasingly in the minority. Due to cultural changes and growing awareness of female behavior, especially hypergamy, promiscuity and selfishness, there is no longer an assumption that women are worth protecting, and in some cases young men may actually think it's OK to humiliate them in public.

It looks as though feminism is truly starting to become women's problem.

Newly Liberated, Afghan Women Producing Ugly Art

Welmer · 10 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times has an article up on the wonderful blossoming of creativity amongst Afghan women, which includes a great deal of modern "art," which to me is anything but. Why it is considered progress when women are encouraged to produce these monstrosities is beyond me. If there is anything the West should not be exporting, it is our contemporary art, which seems designed only to bother and provoke people.

[image]Long, long ago, way before the Taliban, some very beautiful works of art were produced in Afghanistan. The Bamyan Buddhas (unfortunately blown up by Talibs), ancient Scythian metalwork and some statues from the Hellenic period were world class. In fact, the ancient kingdom of Gandhara, which included part of modern Afghanistan's territory, marked the emergence of classical Buddhist sculpture, which has profoundly influenced art from Central Asia all the way to Japan and Southeast Asia. Representations of the Buddha created in the present day still retain many of the characteristics of the early Greco-Bactrian masterpieces.

So Afghanistan does indeed have a rich artistic heritage, despite the cultural barbarism and depravity of the Taliban, and plenty of tradition to draw on. However, rather than encourage Afghans to contribute something of value, the NY Times features pictures of sculptures that, in some cases, look like something one is supposed to flush down the toilet. It's almost as though they are hell bent on proving the Taliban correct in their assertion that art is godless garbage that corrupts the soul and pollutes the landscape.

Perhaps the beautiful people in the NY art world think that because it is being produced by "liberated" Afghan women, it must have intrinsic value. Well, they do pay large sums of money for what most everyone knows is junk here at home, but I suspect those who do so don't really have beauty and artistic excellence in mind so much as they enjoy using their wealth to stick a thumb in the eye of the snobby old money types they hate. In Afghanistan, however, there's simply no excuse. What purpose could it serve, besides another form of torture, to expose the people of that miserable, war-torn country to these displays?

Swedish Woman Running Rape Scam on Greek Island

Welmer · 10 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On Kos, a Greek island in the southeast Aegean, just off the Turkish coast, at least four British men – and possibly others – have been targeted by a good-looking blonde Swede running a false rape insurance scam. One of the men, Ross Mitchell, is a teacher from Nottinghamshire, and was arrested and charged before the case fell apart when the woman fled the country after obtaining insurance money. As a teacher, Mr. Mitchell is worried about the effect such an accusation – even a false one – might have on his job.

Greek news reports suggest that the woman is engaged in organized fraud; Swedish police say she has pulled in at least 800,000 euros – 200,000 each time – through running the scam. She has also had innocent men thrown in jail and charged with a crime they did not commit.

The reporting in the Telegraph does not make it clear how one goes about obtaining insurance for rape, but evidently it exists in Europe, and companies pay out without waiting for the resolution of the case. That a woman can get paid to accuse men of rape is absolutely appalling. If this were possible in the United States, rape accusations would explode, and men would probably have to either avoid any and all contact with women or walk around with a recording device at all times to protect themselves.

Interestingly, the Telegraph is not naming the female crook, probably because of “rape shield” policies. All they are doing is shielding a criminal and putting innocent men in harm’s way, and if anyone in Europe has the woman’s name and can send it to me through the contact form I will gladly post it here on The Spearhead. She is believed to be hiding out in Sweden at the moment.

A photo would be even better — this woman has to exposed so that men can protect themselves from her.

Women's Sexual Peak Rests Atop a Pile of Lies

(Authors note: For those interested, Chuck Ross did an excellent piece of writing on this, in The Sexual Peak Myth, He approaches the subject with a good bit more scientific diligence than I am willing to do here. I have already accepted that the subject is mythical and am much more interested in posing some questions about why this is the case.)

Some years ago I was at a night club with a group of men and women. Naturally the conversation turned to sex. One woman, in her late forties, said, in a good natured way, "It's a shame that by the time men really learn what they are doing in bed, their equipment doesn't work like it used to."

"I understand how you feel," I said, in an equally jovial tone, "By the time women start learning what they are doing in bed their looks start fading."

Needless to say, my response, while as truthful as hers, more or less took her out of the conversation. It was not my intent at all, but you could tell by the look in her eyes that she felt like every line on her face was magnified a thousand times, reading like a giant "use by" date from the last millennium. Fortunately for me, I didn't have all manner of ego and identity tied up in my penis, or I might have felt the same way.

There was a silver lining, though. It did spark a rather lively round of verbal sparring with the rest of the people at the table. And I am sure that it was a discussion that has been echoed millions of times at millions of night club gatherings.

Why is it that men and women hit their sexual peaks at such radically different ages?

And the answer is, of course, that they don't. It is just another one of the myriad of lies we enable women to live for the sake of not disturbing their self image- and perhaps for the sake of getting in their pants in leaner times.

Where else but the current gender Zeitgeist can a woman with crows feet, sagging breasts, reduced sexual hormones, a vagina that does not lubricate as it once did, more difficulty conceiving and less ability to attract sexual partners of their preference, stand up and say "I am in my sexual prime," and have everyone in their presence nod their head in agreement?

Only in a world where we tell women whatever they want to hear, no matter how ridiculous.

And it admittedly fits with part of women's experience to maintain the lie. An observation I have, one that I cannot back up with any research, is that as women's biological clocks tick down toward the final moments, there is a tendency, in the words of Dylan Thomas, to rage against the dying of the light.

It's not sexual primacy, it's desperate horniness. Their fantasy of being in their sexual prime when they are well past it is only the labored breathing of someone in their last moments, struggling to suck air just a little while longer.

I am not knocking it. When I was 21 I had a 45 year old woman show me what fer, good and proper, for three weeks in a cabin in Oklahoma. It was an educational rite of passage and a very fond memory in my life. Wouldn't trade it for the world.

But, let's face it, the only one in that cabin in their sexual prime was me. I was a youngster with a gold mine of a horny older woman desperate for sexual relevance. And when the experience was over, I walked away smiling, and a little better equipped to take care of business with women who were, well, who actually were in their sexual prime.

And she had at least one more round of clinging to her sexual power; to her relevance in the world.

The point is that without sexual viability, the power of most women in this culture is reduced to whatever is afforded by rote chivalry. And while that chivalry affords them a great deal of latitude, if doesn't provide them with the meaningful significance of a younger woman who still turns heads- and can have babies.

Being in your sexual prime is about being ready to make babies, not about how willing you are to be ridden hard and put up wet.

In the pure biological sense, infertile women, even those that just appear to be, are just so much excess baggage. And since women as a group either cannot or will not draw their self worth from anything but sexual power (NAWALT stipulated), we will forever have them demanding to live lies. And in modern times, they even have the option of paying surgeons to cut, suction and inject that lie until it looks damned near the truth.

Business is booming.

There is a solution to this, though it is doubtful we will ever get there.

Women, feminists in particular, have long lamented the male beauty standard. They claim it drives women to extremes like surgery and eating disorders, and results in damaged self esteem, all because men want women to look a certain way.

But of course, once you peel back the layers of victimized drivel and get to the core of the matter, you find that women drive themselves to do these things, biology leading them by the nose, because that is their quickest route to personal power, and because they don't rise above it and find relevance in other ways.

Like the ways men do.

When women collectively quit worrying about sexual primacy and start focusing on their own innate human potential, when they learn to value their own accomplishments more than they value what they can sexually manipulate out of men, the plastic surgeons will be out of business and their bad self esteem, rather than their personal significance, will be facing expiration.

What's that you say, women already are like that? They already do more on their own than they try to get men to do for them through sex and other forms of manipulation?

Well, I would like to address that here, too. But I only take on one lie at a time.

Badboy Thug Boyfriend Kills Tot, Gay-Bashing Blamed

Welmer · 11 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

17-month-old Roy Jones was beaten to death on Saturday evening by his mother's badboy boyfriend, who said the little boy was acting like a sissy. Pedro Jones, the child-killing boyfriend, said he was trying to "make him act like a boy." Although Jones called the child "my baby," he was not, in fact, the boy's father.

As we have revealed on The Spearhead before, male infanticide is already a serious problem in the US, and little boys are murdered at a significantly higher rate than girls. Although mothers are involved in most of these cases, many children are killed by men as well, a fact that feminists often point to in order to condemn men. However, biological fathers are very rarely responsible for killing children, so which men are usually responsible? Why, babymomma's boyfriend, of course.

In the HuffPo article this aspect of the case is naturally ignored in favor of the gay-bashing angle. However, suggesting that the child was a victim of a homophobic attack is either naive or disingenuous. A 17-month-old child does not display many sex-specific behaviors, and only a psychopath or mentally retarded individual would expect them to do so (this may be the case with Pedro Jones). To me, Mr. Jones' explanation sounds more like an excuse he made after acting on some deep-seated impulse that has some instinctive basis.

Males of many species tend to view unrelated males – including children – as competitors, and will sometimes kill them. This behavior is documented in humans as well. When we have a set of laws that encourages women to remove their children from their biological fathers' oversight and engage in sexual adventurism with a string of different men, these incidents are bound to happen more frequently than they would otherwise, no matter what the stated motivation.

Biological fathers – like mothers – tend to have a special bond with their children that is not shared by other men. Certainly there are some that do not, and there are many men who are good people and would never harm a child that wasn't theirs, but we're talking about tendencies here, and in a country of hundreds of millions of people these will have an impact.

As an example, say a fundamentalist Christian who abhorred homosexuality had a son who displayed some effeminate characteristics as a little boy. This probably happens fairly frequently, as homosexuality often begins to manifest itself first as gender identity disorder at a fairly young age (17 months is obviously far too early, though). Certainly, the father would probably be worried, and might even want to change it somehow, but if some other man stepped in and said "I'll fix this boy by punching and choking him" the father's instincts would kick in and he'd probably reach for a shotgun and tell the guy to get his hands off the boy. Even if their children are not perfect in their own eyes, a father's first impulse is to defend them. Other men, not so much. This is clearly reflected in the numbers, which suggest that a biological father is the least likely of any caregiver to have a child die in his care.

Michael Rowe, who wrote the article in HuffPo, suggests that it says something terrible about society when a toddler is beaten to death for "acting like a girl." Of course it does. But it's no worse than an infant or child being beaten to death for crying (probably what the killer meant when he suggested the boy was acting like a girl), for being naughty or, as was the case with Ethan Stacy, simply for being inconvenient.

Rowe is doing the job of feminists by shifting the blame for child killing onto gay-hating psychopaths when the real problem – the reason so many children needlessly die – is that they have been removed from the person who has an innate biological mandate to protect them: their father. And it is Rowe's feminist allies, who have devoted enormous energy to kicking fathers out of their children's lives, who are to blame for that.

British Survey Reveals Worker Preference for Male Bosses

Welmer · 11 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Over two-thirds of Britons prefer male bosses, says a survey released by British recruitment website UKJobs.net. 3,000 employees participated in the survey, and a significant majority of both men and women indicated that they preferred male supervisors.

The issue was not that women are too meek or not intelligent enough, but rather that they backstab, slander and harangue employees. Some of the complaints revolved around hormonal issues, with most workers saying it was obvious when it was that time of the month, and others said female bosses had a hard time keeping their work and personal lives separate.

Almost half of employees said they trusted male bossses to be open and honest, whereas females often had a “hidden agenda” that created a climate of uncertainty and fear.

Some of the positive attributes of male bosses, according to the survey, include straight talking, less interested in office politics, and less likely to bitch about others.

California Housewife Busted Seducing 13yo Boys

Welmer · 11 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Below, we have a woman, perhaps in her “sexual peak,” having her way with pubescent boys. It must be pretty rough out there being a lonely, well-heeled cougar with an oversized SUV. The woman, who has a chin that would put Cary Grant to shame, would seduce the boys in her “hummer,” using her daughter as unsuspecting bait. She also lured them with expensive toys, such as video games.

Chateau/Roissy has often remarked that women with manjaws and large chins are more sexually adventurous. If that’s true, this woman fits the type to a T. She’s been arrested on 67 counts of sexual assault. As usual, this was discovered through cell phone messages. She was sending pictures of herself naked to the 13-year-old boys’ phones.

[image]

Is it just me, or are these incidents of female sexual predation a whole lot more common than they used to be? Certain women seem to feel that seducing boys is their prerogative, and an appropriate activity for aging women. Could the sexual peak myth be leading to sexual assault?

“Bo the Bailer” Prompts Chivalry Dispute

Welmer · 12 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A clip from an Astros game, in which a boyfriend deftly dodges a foul ball that then dings his girlfriend’s arm, is making the rounds in blogs and news as evidence that chivalry is dead.

There’s a bit of shame being thrown Bo’s way, but he was only acting in an equalist manner, so is it really deserved? When a baseball is headed directly at you, you have three choices: catch it, dodge it, or get hit by it. As a former pitcher I am quite familiar with the last scenario; I’ve been hit smack in the face by a line drive, and I’ve beaned a few batters as well. It’s part of the game. Also, when the ball is headed your way, it isn’t as though there’s much time to consider one’s options. I can imagine that, instinctively, if there was a little kid who might get hit, I’d probably throw myself in front of the kid, but you’d have to be trained to do it for an adult — even a woman.

I guess all this clip shows is that the training in regards to protecting women has either lost its effect or isn’t happening as much.

Now Bo is being lambasted on morning talk shows, where elderly men are shaming him and questioning his manhood.

Here’s the clip:

I wonder whether we’ll be treated to stories of women “bailing” on men who lose jobs, who aren’t “fulfilling” their fantasies or who just no longer excite them? Nah, that’s too common, so not newsworthy, I suppose.

Degeneration of Media

Welmer · 12 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I often check the NY Times to see what's going on in the Paper of Record, but lately I've been finding more and more of the bizarre and less of what would conventionally be thought of as newsworthy. One of my local papers, the Seattle PI, folded recently and went over to an all online format, and now looks like a tabloid for adolescents at first glance — except it still prominently features a couple of elderly liberal hacks, to "keep it real" I suppose.

Of course, I can't fairly compare the two papers, New York being a real, world-class city (as opposed to second rate Seattle), but I'm starting to see the inane creep into NY's vaunted institutions as well.

If you have a few minutes to spare, and care to watch a couple of women talk about who's funny and who looks hot in a bikini while saying "ummm" a lot, head on over to the NY Times' video blog for opinions on whether or not The Daily Show is sexist:

Sexist Comedy?

Readers who have seen the film Idiocracy might see something familiar in this stuff. While it was a hilarious movie, as reality sets in, the joke's kind of starting to wear off.

More on Media

Welmer · 12 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

After my little reflection on the declining state of contemporary American media, a friend sent me a link to a Weekly Standard article in which Joseph Epstein comes to pretty much the same conclusion about the NY Times.

Epstein uses a fair amount of what some would surely call sexist language and compares the paper to an aging whore:

> The New York Times used to be called the Gray Lady of American newspapers. The sobriquet implied a certain stateliness, a sense of responsibility, the possession of high virtue. But the Gray Lady is far from the grande dame she once was. For years now she has been going heavy on the rouge, lipstick, and eyeliner, using a push-up bra, and gadding about in stiletto heels. She's become a bit—perhaps more than a bit—of a slut, whoring after youth through pretending to be with-it. I've had it with the old broad; after nearly 50 years together, I've determined to cut her loose.

It's a witty piece and worth reading. Epstein is not all that impressed by Maureen Dowd, and calls Anna Quindlen "termagantial" (hennish).

> Every so often I check to remind myself that Maureen Dowd isn't amusing, though she is an improvement, I suppose, over the termagantial Anna Quindlen, whom I used to read with the trepidation of a drunken husband mounting the stairs knowing his wife awaits with a rolling pin. I'd sooner read the fine print in my insurance policies than the paper's perfectly predictable editorials. Laughter, an elegant phrase, a surprising sentiment—the New York Times op-ed and editorial pages are the last place to look for any of these things.

Getting to the heart of the matter, Epstein links the descent of mainstream media with the descent of America itself, and I couldn't agree more:

> I could go on about the artificial rage of Frank Rich—the liberals' Glenn Beck—or the forced gaiety of "Sunday Styles," but the main feeling I have as I rise from having wasted an hour or so with the Sunday New York Times is of what wretched shape the country is in if it is engaged in such boringly trivial pursuits, elevating to eminence such dim cultural and political figures, writing so muddledly about ostensibly significant subjects.

America truly is becoming a mediocre place. In my relatively short lifetime, I've seen first-hand the descent of our national dialog into frivolity, triviality and irrelevance. I suppose that's what happens when you remove certain masculine concepts such as dignity, honor and restraint and replace them with snarky gossip and a soap opera sensibility.

Bill O'Reilly Goes After Jennifer Aniston After She Declares Fathers Unnecessary

Welmer · 13 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jennifer Aniston is starring in a movie about artificial insemination, and is touting the wonders of single motherhood. Although it is a fairly common practice for older, unattached professional women who are having a hard time finding a mate, Aniston publicly voiced the main justification these women have been using for years: fathers are unnecessary.

Older single women are prone to making these statements from time to time, so it isn't all that surprising to hear it from Jennifer Aniston. But ever since the Dan Quayle/Murphy Brown controversy back in '92, in which Dan Quayle, in a speech, criticized TV character Murphy Brown about her decision to have a child out of wedlock, few have dared criticize single motherhood. I can remember the widespread derision of Quayle for daring to suggest that the progressive trend of mothers cavalierly chucking fathers out of their children's lives was anything but a sacred right, immune from criticism. Ironically, Candice Bergen, the actress who played Murphy Brown, said "I never have really said much about the whole episode, which was endless, but his speech was a perfectly intelligent speech about fathers not being dispensable and nobody agreed with that more than I did."

Nevertheless, Quayle wasn't even supported by his boss, George HW Bush, and the White House press secretary hemmed and hawed about what the Vice President meant. In short, the feminists scored a big victory and dominated the ensuing debate, successfully portraying Quayle as an out-of-touch moron for holding such outdated views. Hillary Clinton, lest anyone be tempted to defend the woman, came down squarely in the "men are unnecessary" camp, and took advantage of the situation to denounce Quayle.

However, it seems the debate has been rekindled. Bill O'Reilly, more showman than reporter, has a pretty good sense of public opinion, and he wouldn't broach a topic if he didn't think it had some resonance with the public. Remarkably, O'Reilly came at the subject from a decidedly pro-fathers' rights angle, saying that fathers are not only very important to children, but are treated unfairly in general as well:

> "Aniston can hire a battery of people to help her, but she cannot hire a dad, OK? And Dads bring a psychology to children that is, in this society, I believe, under-emphasized. I think men get hosed all day long in the parental arena."

Some of the pundits must be getting the sense that public opinion is starting to turn against feminist ideology, and are openly challenging their dominance where family issues are concerned. Yes, things are starting to change, and feminists are losing the last shreds of moral credit they built up by demonizing men over the years. It may take a few years, but I believe they will be discredited in our lifetimes, and possibly within the decade.

In other news, the Onion came out with an amusing video panning Aniston and other celebrity women for their exotic adoptions:

Does This Dress Make My Ass Look Fat?

Every man knows that when answering the question posed in the title that he does so at his own risk.

It's a typical non question, designed more for adulation on demand than an honest answer.

And you have seen it before, or one of a thousand variations of it, because it's a universal part of the male experience in dealing with women in relationships.

The general rule is, women ask a question and men search for the "right" answer, or at least for one that will result in as little trouble as possible.

Perhaps illustrating further with a joke will help.

A man and woman are leaving a movie. The woman asks, "Do you think Sigourney Weaver is pretty?"

The guy knows this is potential trouble, but he also knows he has to answer.

"Well, yeah, I guess," he says, trying not to sound at all enthusiastic. Nothing else is said and the guy feels relieved.

Two weeks later they are in a restaurant having dinner.

"How's the meatloaf?" she asks.

"A little dry," he says.

"Well, then," she says, her tone snide and suddenly hostile, "Maybe you should have had Sigourney Weaver make it for you!"

It's a funny joke, and might be best left to the realm of humor until you consider that this is how many, many men live their lives; trying their best to not say the wrong thing, even if they have to lie, and constantly being set up with a series of questions for which there is no right answer.

What does it say, one might ask, about a human being when they not only insist on being told what they want to hear, regardless of its truthfulness, but will also, in fact, deal out retribution when given the wrong answers to impossible questions?

I have three words for it.

Complete moral bankruptcy.

Actually, I have three more words that are more accurate.

Spoiled rotten child. That is actually more fitting because we don't expect children to have the moral development that we would an adult. And nowhere but in modern western culture are we satisfied when women measure up to the moral development of a five year old.

It's a state of affairs that affects both men and women. But there is a major difference in how and when and why it happens between the two.

First, for a man to have the world around him lying to him for the sake of his over inflated sense of self importance, he has to have a lot of money. You can bet that Donald Trump and Bill Gates have a slew of people around them that would point to a blue sky and call it green if they thought that is what those guys wanted to hear.

But The Donald and Gates represent a very decided minority of men- and they have to pay, literally, for the privilege of being surrounded by obsequious Yes Men.

Any of the rest of men that expect automatic deference, that become childish and punishing when denied agreement or coddling, are rightfully regarded as immature pricks and written off, by men and women alike.

It has to be mentioned though, that there is some reason to question whether the self importance of men like Gates and Trump is all that over inflated. Arrogant and spoiled? No doubt, but they have accomplished incredible things in their lives.

Women, on the other hand, have a much different set of circumstances. All men are Yes Men, or are damned well expected to be, and it costs those women absolutely nothing to realize their expectations; their only qualification for that status is the possession of a vagina. No need to build and empire or revolutionize technology. Just sport the P-nay-nay and the lap dogs will come a yappin'.

You don't have to look any further than the comments on MRA websites to see what happens when some of us get uppity and start telling the truth, without say so from the Princess Collective.

I can even hear even more of it coming now. Eeewwwwww! That's so hateful and misogynistic! You're just frustrated because you can't get laid!

Sure, cupcake, and I have no doubt you fully expect people to agree with that assessment. Aren't you entitled to that, as a woman?

I will answer those comments, should they occur, in advance.

First, the truth isn't hate speech. Never was. Second, if you don't like the truth, grow the hell up and quit living by a standards that require people to lie. And third, grow the hell up and quit living by standards that require people to lie.

Failing any of this, quit expecting anyone to regard you as an equal. It just doesn't work that way.

Sheesh, and they say men have fragile egos? Gimme a break.

I often consider all of this when women question me about a gender wage gap that does not exist. Or about the myth that women in this culture were ever oppressed. Or about domestic violence being only committed by men.

And my conclusion is that those questions aren't really those questions.

Those questions are "Do you think my ass looks fat in this dress?"

Of course, I am supposed to maintain the status quo and give the answer that is expected to those and a litany of other non questions, for fear of getting Sigourney Weaver thrown back in my face. Just as I am supposed to not recognize that such inquiries are really just fishing expeditions from the imagined infallibles that are the fairer sex in modern culture, NAWALT's notwithstanding.

Unfortunately, I lost interest in the right answers to anything a long time ago, figuring that the best answers are always the truthful ones. That became necessary when I discovered that I could not seek the truth and placate children at the same time.

But it gives women what they have claimed to want for so, so long.

Equal treatment.

After fifty years of endlessly disseminating information on the darker side of masculine nature- information that morphed into the unrestrained male bashing that now pervades modern consciousness, it is fair and just, in the name of equal treatment, that we begin to explore the darker, more destructive side of the feminine as well.

Funny how that does not sit so well with so many of them.

Heavy Reading

Today's guest post written by Mark Ellis, a writer living in Portland, Oregon

Review Roundup: I Am Ozzy, by Ozzy Osbourne (Grand Central Publishing)

As a lifelong Ozzy fan, I scarfed down his memoir like a stoner polishing off a bag of Doritos. I Am Ozzy turned out to be pretty good read, at least that's what I thought. A week after finishing the book I got curious about what other people were saying about it. Well, the reviews are in and the literary outlook is bright for rock's Prince of Darkness. Critics from the blogosphere to mainstream print agree with me, and have lauded the book for its authentic voice and startling revelations.

When I first saw Black Sabbath, at the top of an eclectic 1970 bill at Bill Graham's Fillmore West, I didn't even know what I was looking at. I had gone to see local favorite Santana, a band more in keeping with the peace/love ethic I had been weaned on coming of age in the San Francisco Bay Area. I was pretty much struck dumb when the demonic, sludge-laden Brits launched into a punishing set.

The peace/love mantra—precursor to the progressive ideology that would characterize the decade–had been stood on its head. There wasn't much of either in the band's leaden repertoire. And yet, in the lyrics to "Children of the Grave" I got a visceral dose of the kind of societal horrors my hippie friends had ineffectually warned about, the environment, mutually assured destruction, and capitalist exploitation.

At the vortex was Ozzy, who in the context of Vietnam, Kent State, and the 1968 Kennedy/King assassinations captured my intense need for some kind of male archetype, preferably apolitical. I'm not claiming there weren't some intoxicants involved, but it was Ozzy who made me head-banger, and less of a hippie. I never looked back.

A common theme in the critical assessments of I am Ozzy is that the autobiography reads "as if Ozzy himself is telling his story while sitting across from you in a pub." No doubt the Godfather of heavy metal can spin a good yarn, but reviewers also praise ghostwriter Chris Ayres for his likely role in smoothing out the narrative. For me, reading it was like a vicarious fiction; as if just once in all the scores of times I'd seen Sabbath and Ozzy solo I'd gotten backstage.

If you thought Ozzy's offstage legacy began and ended with headless bats and a piss on the Alamo, you've got another thing coming. In this profanity-laced tell-all no behavioral headstone is left unturned. He's upfront about his blunt-force epiphanies, hard-won and usually inebriated truths, and failures as a father, husband, and man. The episodic prose erases any doubt as to why genetic researchers are now interested in taking a look at Ozzy's genes.

Greg Barbich, writing for blogcritics.com, calls Ozzy's recounting of the early Sabbath days as "pretty incredible." It's true. Hearing about how these progenitors of doom rock cooked up slabs like "War Pigs" and "Sabbath Bloody Sabbath" fills blank spaces in the minds of millions whose adoration made the band one of the most successful in rock history.

The first time I saw Ozzy solo was at the Oakland, Coliseum. My idol had been kicked out of Black Sabbath and nobody really understood why. No matter. He rocked his way to vindication like a hellion on speed, soon eclipsing the Sabs in terms of celebrity and gross receipts. Listening to new and fabulously heavy tunes like "Crazy Train," I couldn't have known that it was unlikely Ozzy would remember playing that night.

The tragic end of guitarist Randy Rhoads is seared into pop culture's collective consciousness, but Ozzy's befuddled and grief-stricken reminiscence should stand as the final word on how the madness came full circle that day.

Writing about the religious avengers who hounded him from arena to arena he admits, "The funny thing is, I'm actually quite interested in the Bible, and I've tried to read it several times." In some Faustian bargain with my own Christian God, I found a way to love Ozzy Osbourne—and, truth to tell, sinfully covet his life—while still keeping the faith.

In the memoir we learn about his estranged first family, follow him through the multi-platinum years of drug and alcohol driven dissolution, and mark his redemption at the bosom of the fiery and devoted Sharon, his ultimate savior.

My first reaction to Sharon was negative. It was similar to when Yoko Ono appeared on the arm of John Lennon. The last thing I wanted was some myth-busting woman taking charge and diluting the power of my cherished, transgressive male archetype. This resistance to Sharon was ameliorated when I learned that she had rescued my idol off the floor of a rented Hollywood cottage.

I stuck around through the MTV series, The Osbournes, though many of my metallic brethren had jumped the shark on Ozzy. I was in my fifties, and though I still liked metal, other music, past and present, provided an alternate—some would say more sophisticated–soundtrack to my life. And on some level, after loving and affectionately envying Ozzy forever, it was edifying to see him schlepping around in a bathrobe, yelling about pet accidents, entrapped, however lavishly, in recognizable domestic mediocrity.

Simon Garfield of the London Observer notes that: “the shadow of an over-primped Sharon Osbourne is everywhere… {in the book}…her ambition smoldering backstage and at Ozzfest until it burnt through on television.”

Ozzy keeps his tale from degenerating into another litany of rock excess by the same disordered perseverance and dumb luck that has seen him through more lives than the cat in Stephen King’s Pet Cemetery. The last time I saw him was in early 2000 at Portland’s Memorial Coliseum. I was too old to risk the pit, but was absolutely dumbstruck again, this time by the images appearing on the massive stage’s backdrop.

Lyndon Johnson warning, Richard Nixon escalating, napalm falling, and Brezhnev threatening were but a few of the nightmarish captures which towered over the “devil sign” affirmations we headbangers offered up to the cosmos. It was just like old times.

No spoilers here. Suffice it to say that the Christian/anti-christian ethos which characterized both Sabbath and solo Ozzy permeates this memoir. Beloved and deplored, Ozzy Osbourne as self-described is at once a dream-come-true superstar and magnificent accident nobody can look away from.

There’s more I could tell. I’ve followed Ozzy since the very first Sabs record in 1969, and truth to tell, into more than a few places I probably shouldn’t have. But I’m content to give the last word goes to Kirkus Reviews, which also noted the memoir’s readable and darkly illuminating prose: “An autobiography as toxic and addictive as any drug its author has ever ingested.”

HIV+ German Singer Neglects to Tell Partners About Her Disease, Infects at Least One

Welmer · 16 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Nadja Benaissa, a singer in a girl band along the lines of the Spice Girls, tested positive for HIV ten years ago during a pregnancy test, and since that time has continued to sleep around with various men. One of them has since tested positive for HIV, and another turned her in to the police, who arrested her in Frankfurt in 2009.

Benaissa is in court on charges of attempted aggravated assault, for which the maximum penalty is ten years.

The infected man has told the court that his life has fallen apart since the diagnosis, and he is constantly sick because of the antiviral drugs. Psychologically, he is devastated, as he knows he can develop full-blown AIDS at any time.

Although it is not as easy for a man to contract AIDS from a woman as the other way around, it certainly can happen, and given the number of men contemporary Western women sleep with, one woman with an STD can be responsible for infecting multiple people. It is encouraging to see that the woman is being prosecuted, although I don't see why the charge is simply "attempted" aggravated assault rather than a standard aggravated assault charge; a man was infected after all.

The Word is Getting Out There

Welmer · 16 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We've had record heat in the Seattle area for the last few days, so I've been getting out a bit – especially in the evening when it's pleasant – and catching up with old friends. On Saturday evening, I went to a little get together just north of town, and spent the evening with a friend I've known since I was in junior high. He's working-class guy who grew up with a single mother and spent most of his youth in a dissolute manner, sleeping with scores of women, getting high and just working enough to keep a roof over his head and food on his table.

I guess he could be described as "alpha," because he has had pretty phenomenal success as far as getting laid is concerned, but while we were catching up he told me he wasn't proud of how he'd lived life as a youth. Now in his mid 30s, he's settled down with a woman who absolutely adores him, and as far as I know he's totally faithful to her. He's a good-looking man, a "tall, dark and handsome" type with strong features, an impressive physique, dark hair and blue eyes. I'm sure he'd have little trouble picking up a woman at a bar, but apparently those days are over. My friend, who I'll call "D," actually expressed some regret about his promiscuity. He said he felt as though it deprived him of some of his value as a partner in a long-term relationship, and had introduced an element of cynicism to sex itself.

As we were musing on the follies and tragedies of our youths, which were fairly epic and in some cases very funny and therefore made for good conversation, I noticed something a bit odd. The women, who were generally younger than the men (although the men at the house ranged in age from about 20 to 40), were very polite and deferential. They fetched us beer, cooked and generally looked after their boyfriends. As I spoke with my friend and the other men, they did not butt in and remained silent and respectful. I thought that might have been because they were a bit younger than us, but on second thought I've noticed that age didn't stop women from blabbing when I was in my 20s, and even the younger men were deferred to.

Maybe it was because I had travelled a few miles out of town that the women were behaving differently, but then again, I think there's a generational component to it. Women around my age (mid 30s) give or take some years, are amongst the most heavily indoctrinated feminists on the planet. Not only do they expect to be deferred to, they also expect to socially dominate wherever they are, be it work, home, school or out on the town. It seems to me that women who are somewhat younger are not all that committed to this kind of behavior, and younger men, as I found out that evening, are all too aware of what men face in society.

Somehow, while D and I were talking, some of the other men started to bring up issues of unfairness in domestic violence cases, family law and so forth. None of them knew about The Spearhead, and D, not being much of a reader, doesn't even know what it's about, so they didn't bring these matters up because of me. It was one of those topics that just comes up because it's on a lot of people's minds. Because I don't really like to mix work and friendship, I didn't say anything about The Spearhead, but was happy to give them some background on VAWA, family law procedures, and other technical matters pertaining to marriage 2.0. While doing so, I noticed that they were very interested in these things, and cared a great deal. About half of the men had children, some of them were in relationships, and at least one had been married, but whether or not they'd been put through the wringer they all had a basic understanding that as it stands today men are screwed. One of them even said marriage is a sham, and should be avoided at all costs. They didn't even care that there were young women sitting silently and listening to them.

I have to admit that this was a real eye-opener for me. Because I spend most of my free time with my children or alone, and most of my productive time alone, I don't have the opportunity to take the pulse of the common man all that often, so to see first hand that there's been a real growth in consciousness about these issues both surprised and pleased me. That ordinary guys, after the football game is over, get together and discuss the problems of contemporary family law is a huge change from ten years or so ago. Sure, there have long been groups of men who tried to warn us and organized themselves to change the law, but now it's gone mainstream. To me, seeing it happen so suddenly is like visiting a family some years after they had a child, and seeing not a baby, but a lanky adolescent. The change can be quite striking.

So I think we ought to take heart, and use this progress as motivation to keep it up. I don't think I'd be taking too much credit in saying that The Spearhead has played a part in this, so I do feel vindicated for putting as much time into it as I have. If this growing awareness continues to expand, we may see some real changes from the status quo within the decade.

The Atlantic Magazine Dumping on Men Again

Welmer · 17 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I have a subscription to The Atlantic, and I enjoy some of the articles, despite the awful stuff put out by feminists like Sandra Tsing Loh, who wrote about why she had to have an affair and wreck her marriage (her husband was a "kitchen bitch") and Hannah Rosin (The End of Men).

But this month it reads like farce, and not much like an American publication to be honest. The cover story is about the inevitability of an Israeli strike on Iran – which I suspect is simply a bluff, because the IDF does not have the capability, short of resorting to thermonuclear penetrator warheads, to significantly damage hardened infrastructure – followed by another, similar article that goes a step further and presents an argument for a preemptive tactical nuclear strike on Iran. We've heard all this before, and not all that long ago, and all we got out of it was a couple lousy, expensive wars from which we still haven't extracted ourselves, so forgive me if I'm not all that impressed by the efforts of Jeffrey Goldberg or Robert Kaplan.

This being The Spearhead, I'm not going to get too involved in arguments over Middle East policy, but before I bring up the comment in The Atlantic that caught my eye and motivated me to write this post, I wanted to point out the transparent jingoism of the magazine. It might seem to be an odd mix, the warmongers and feminists being printed side by side, but maybe it isn't all that surprising when you get down to it. Power is meant to be used, and I don't see why feminists, having secured some power, would have any more scruples about sending people to their doom than the assortment of chickenhawks who served as cheerleaders for our wasteful adventure in Iraq.

Now, on to the "What's Your Problem" section, handled by Jeff Goldberg himself, which contained a letter from a reader who was offended by the misandry on display in The Atlantic, and asked how Mr. Goldberg can defend his manhood while working at the magazine.

The letter reads as follows:

> I've noticed that The Atlantic has become very anti-male lately. My proof lies in recent articles by Sandra Tsing Loh, Caitlin Flanagan, and of course Hanna Rosin, whose July/August cover story, "The End of Men," argued that men will no longer be necessary as our economy changes. How do you protect your manhood while working at a magazine that is so hostile to men?

Goldberg's answer, predictably, is full of hipster snark, and taunts the letter's author for asking a perfectly reasonable question:

> I take active countermeasures to protect myself against the rampant feminization of The Atlantic. For instance, I eat only what I kill, except for sandwiches from from Potbelly, which are killed by someone else.
> Other prophylactic measures I employ include hiring Chuck Norris as a guest blogger, and then firing him, by fax, for being insufficiently manly…
> etc.

Maybe this is typical of Goldberg, but the sassy, irreverent style is exactly what I see writergrrls around the country doing their best to imitate; it certainly doesn't strike me as all that manly.

So, P.W., if you are reading The Spearhead, you may have your answer right there:

Jeffrey Goldberg has not defended his manhood while working at The Atlantic. In fact, if he has any manhood at all,

I’m sure he carefully hides it away before writing anything for the magazine so that he has no need to defend or protect it.

Two Conversations.

For those wondering, I've been on vacation. The beach was good and all, but there's some things that I can't get out of my head.

First one, with a friend from college:

Me: So, you have a girlfriend?

Friend: Yes, she's lovely and beautiful. The issue is with her mother.

Me: Her mother?

Friend: Yeah, she tells her to get money from me for her stuff. She's a mess.

Me: How do you know that?

Friend: She (the mother) told me. In my face.

Me: That doesn't sound too good.

Friend: But I love her.

Me: ….

Second one, with a cab driver:

Cab driver: Music these days are all about sex and stuff.

Me: And I've seen teenage girls all over it.

Cab driver: Hah. Listen, I have several girlfriends, the oldest is 18 and the youngest is 15. And let me tell you, those "little girls" know damn well what they are doing.

Me: I know. laughs But how do you shake off the feeling that they are just using you as a prop to show off to her friends?

(The sad destiny of many naturals that get beta-ized in a LTR. I have seen it. Gives me the shudders).

Cab driver: Ah. For that, you need to give them a good fuck so they get some respect!

Me: That's it?

Cab driver: That's it. Don't be like all those guys acting all lovely and warm and fuzzy.

Me: Hah. They only get blue balls. Don't worry, I know that story really well.

It makes you think, if only because it feels good when reality confirms your beliefs.

Obama as Imperial Overlord

Welmer · 18 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Obama was in Seattle yesterday, and in the afternoon, while sitting at my desk, there were a couple violent thuds that sounded and felt as though someone hit my house's foundation with a sledgehammer. Coincidentally, my cat was trying to get in the house by jumping at the door and making noise right when the shock wave struck, and my first thought was "what the hell's wrong with that cat?" Of course, it didn't take long for me to realize that my cat doesn't have the mass to shake the house like that, so I thought it might be the neighbor's workers banging a pipe or something. But no, there were no workers outside.

At this point I was a bit worried, and thought someone might have set off a bomb in the vicinity. I checked the TV and radio, and no alerts, so it wasn't that, and eventually I just accepted that it must be some mystery, or possibly a large meteor.

Well, it's no longer a mystery. Evidently, some tour plane was tooling around in our precious president's airspace, and they scrambled a couple of supersonic jets to Boeing Field, which is less than two miles from my place as the crow flies. They must have really been cooking, because the sonic booms were quite violent.

I wasn't the only one bothered by the blasts:

> Residents in Seattle, Washington, were shaken Tuesday afternoon by what sounded like explosions after two F-15s were dispatched in response to a report of a small plane that entered restricted airspace where President Barack Obama was campaigning for Sen. Patty Murray.
> The rumblings — caused by sonic booms from the jets — rattled buildings, windows and nerves in the Puget Sound region, according to CNN affiliate KIRO. Viewers of the affiliate from as far away as Tacoma — about 40 miles south of Seattle — reported hearing the booms.
> Dozens of residents called the city's 911 system, causing it to shut down in some areas for about an hour due to the flood of calls, Ed Troyer, a spokesman for the Pierce County Sheriff's Department told KIRO.

When I lived in Beijing, Clinton visited at one point, and the security was both overwhelming and offensive. Chinese military squads were stationed along the route home, because I lived close to the Airport Expressway. I had the rather unpleasant experience of having to travel around PLA grenadier squads on the way back to my humble abode.

Our leaders now make visits as though we are in a state of war, and I resent that. If they are so beloved, why do they need to make such a show of overwhelming force wherever they go? Nothing says "Imperial" like a Presidential entourage that includes a full military component and makes its subjects feel as though they are at war when the "great leader" deigns to pay us a visit.

I know this is a bit off-topic, but I'd feel better if our President were traveling from town to town by Cessna than the current situation, where we are subjected to war exercises of the Imperial Fleet. Frankly, I could give a damn about politicians, and if Obama wants to blast my town with his entourage, I'd like to humbly request that he doesn't visit again.

Patty Murray Facing Serious Challenge

Welmer · 18 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I hope readers can excuse my recent focus on local events, but the Washington State senate election is actually pretty significant for American men in general. Senator Patty Murray is one of the most hardcore feminists in Congress, on par with Barbara Boxer of California. Before Patty Murray was elected, replacing Brock Adams (he had to quit because he'd been accused of drugging and raping an intern) back in '92, Gloria Steinem paid her a visit on her birthday, which should tell us pretty much all we need to know. Murray was also one of the primary sponsors of VAWA, IMBRA, and now supports SAFE, which is a bill that would force employers to pay female employees for time spent building a case against their husband in divorce (so long as they claim "abuse" is involved). Other notable Patty Murray achievements include being voted the dumbest senator of all by DC staffers for seven years in a row, and praising Osama bin Laden for running daycare centers.

I'm no fan of Republicans – in fact, I despise both parties – but Republican Dino Rossi cannot possibly be as bad for men as Patty Murray, so I'm going to have to hold my nose and give him my support. It might help if men in Washington took the time to call Dino Rossi's campaign headquarters to tell staffers that he will get their vote if he at least takes a pro-father stance. For American men, politicians like Patty Murray have been a nightmare, so if there's a chance to put her out of power it's worth some effort.

As a Seattlite, I'm a bit cynical, because Washington has been solidly Democratic since the early '90s, but that doesn't mean I've given up entirely on the idea of ejecting Patty Murray from the senate, and it really does look a bit grim for her lately.

Admittedly, Glenn Sacks is more in tune with the political stuff than I am, so I hope he takes some time to focus on this race.

Why They Used to Burn Witches

Welmer · 18 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A grandmother from Kent, Washington (a Seattle suburb) has been arrested for forcing children in her care to drink urine and engage in sexual acts with their siblings. Rose Marie Johnson, according to several children and witnesses, has been putting little kids through hell for years. She first came to the attention of social services when a boy accused her of improprieties in 2008, but investigators did not take him seriously.

When we hear about witch burnings in the bad old days, they are usually presented in the context of innocent women irrationally accused by superstitious Christians. If the behavior of women today is any indication, they are capable of doing awful things to people, including children, and were probably all the more likely to get away with it when there was less communication and people had a greater ability to avoid state intrusion.

So when one hears about persecution of innocent women in pre-modern Europe, it should be kept in mind that although some certainly didn't deserve their fate and were set up for one reason or the other (e.g. Jean d'Arc), a lot of them probably had it coming. In fact, today they get away with this stuff with little more than a slap on the wrist, because their victims are just children, after all, and women are higher value human beings in our feminist regime.

Domestic Violence Now Grounds for Asylum

Welmer · 19 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A Mexican schoolteacher, who claims to have been a victim of abuse at the hands of her husband, has been granted asylum by the Obama administration in a precedent-setting case that supposedly sets “high standards” for those who wish to obtain asylum on those grounds.

According to the NY Times, “the man repeatedly raped her at the point of guns and machetes, and once tried to burn her alive,” yet Mexican police and judges refused to get involved. She could well have been a victim of abuse, but there’s always the possibility that she’s exaggerating and simply wanted to get out of Mexico. A Canadian embassy worker in China once told me that 95% of visa applications were fraudulent, so suspicion is always warranted, and it would be negligence on the part of the US government if her statements were taken at face value.

However, the issue isn’t so much whether or not she was a victim, but what constitutes grounds for asylum. Lots of bad things happen to people all over the world. In this woman’s home country of Mexico, for example, the murder rate is sky-high, and there are thousands – if not millions – of people who live in fear for their lives due to drug gangs and social chaos. Should they all be eligible for asylum, too? Is it any worse to be a victim of domestic violence than to face execution and dismemberment at the hands of narcoterrorists?

Asylum used to be reserved for political refugees and those who had done the US a favor. It was very much a political tool, and used to further the goals and governing philosophy of the United States. People who were victims of crime or unfortunate in some other manner were not typically eligible for asylum.

However, perhaps this case demonstrates that asylum is still a political tool, and reveals what America’s political priorities are. No longer are we committed to religious freedom, fighting totalitarian Communism or free speech, but rather to the feminist agenda of a worldwide effort to dismantle the traditional family.

It should be no surprise, then, that as feminism has come to be a top priority for the US, it is what our government chooses to support worldwide with the highly symbolic tool of asylum.

Feminists on the Defensive as Eat Pray Love Widely Panned by Critics

Welmer · 20 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Of course I haven't seen the movie Eat Pray Love, and probably never will, but in the last few days I've seen a whole lot of reviews and opinions about it. Although some of the reviews have been positive (all the positive ones were written by women), the film has taken almost as much of a critical beating as the recent Sex and The City sequel.

Eat Pray Love was adapted from a book of the same name; a memoir written by Elizabeth Gilbert, who, upon securing an advance for a book, dumped her husband and traveled around the world, sleeping with a succession of men as she did so.

Oprah gave the book her imprimatur, and it went on to sell some 9 million copies. According to an acquaintance who works at Amazon it was a "runaway hit," and millions of American women ate it up. In fact, it had such a profound influence on Julia Roberts, the movie's starring actress, that she converted to Hinduism while filming the movie in India and Bali.

However, as popular as the book, and presumably the movie, is with many American women, every single review I've read that was written by a man has expressed some level of disgust with the film — it's boring, nothing happens, the character is excessively self-absorbed, etc. However, the men are avoiding the one issue that sticks out the most to me: this woman victimized an innocent man who loved her. Not only that, she apparently has no real remorse, and celebrates this very nasty thing she did with a trip around the world and multiple lovers. In his gut, any normal man would be deeply offended by the message, but to me it looks like men are afraid to be honest about how they feel about these things. Shame must be so deeply ingrained in American men that they can't even admit there's anything seriously wrong with what Ms. Gilbert did, maybe for fear that they would be branded "weak" for concerning themselves with some trifle like being abandoned by a spouse, which would have no effect on a "real" man.

Whether they admit it or not, it's obvious that they noticed the obvious, and feminists know they noticed. In an article in HuffPo, Kate Fridkis defends Ms. Gilbert by suggesting that critics are being mean, and then states that there couldn't possibly be any grounds for criticism on the basis of morality:

> It's unfair to imply a kind of emotional laziness that enables Liz to slip out of her marriage without a satisfactory explanation for her readers and now viewers. She takes on the project of acquiring a home for a divorced Balinese woman with no resources of her own. She agonizes over her decisions, and she acts with almost shocking sensitivity towards the people she encounters. The fact that this sensitivity is not directed at her ex-husband leaves some critics huffing with indignation, but to get offended over Liz leaving her husband is both to miss the point and to apply an unhealthy dose of moralism to one's evaluation of the story.

Get that? It would be "unhealthy" to evaluate the story – a story with strong religious overtones – from a moral point of view. Now, if Ms. Gilbert had sought spiritual solace in an act of penitence for doing something wrong, it would be one thing, but instead she flies straight out of the yoga ashram into another affair in Bali. Morally speaking, the story is atrocious. Is it unsophisticated to point out the obvious here?

Ms. Fridkis might think so in this case, but what if we reversed the gender of the main character?

Say a movie came out about a man who was bored and annoyed by his loving, but progressively less-attractive wife. He's a young, but promising manager, and gets an offer to head up a project in Phuket. He knows his wife won't want to go, and he'd rather not be there with her anyway, so he keeps it a secret, sets up a foreign bank account, and then suddenly tells his wife it's over. "Sorry, honey, but, you know, I feel like I need to find myself. When I wake up in the morning, I feel nothing, so, like, it's over." She's devastated, and he takes advantage of her confusion and distress to hide as much money as possible in his exotic account, then throws a few thousand into a legal trust and jets off to Thailand.

Having successfully disposed of his wife, our hero settles into life in Thailand where he enjoys the food, has a laid-back job, and gets involved in a Buddhist surfing cult, gaining great spiritual insight as he rides the waves that roll in toward the tropical paradise. In the evenings, he consorts with beautiful local girls and European tourists, often bringing them home to his luxury cabana near the beach. In the meanwhile, his unfortunate wife is long gone, and he feels not a trace of remorse or regret, because his own life is just fine and dandy. In fact, dumping her worked out so well for him that the ultimate message of the movie is that it's a good thing after all, because although she may not have come out in such great shape, all the wonderful things that he gained from getting rid of her made it all positive on the balance.

Can anyone imagine a feminist suggesting that criticism of that message would be an "unhealthy dose of moralism?" No, they'd be screaming for new, international laws that would allow direct seizure of all money men like that make while abroad, and they'd be doing so on a "moral" basis.

The men and women criticizing Eat Pray Love (a lot of female critics disliked it as well) know that the most offensive thing about the film is its morally repugnant message, but because it comes from a female they won't come out and say it.

Eat Pray Love may be a bad movie by the other, conventional measures, but we ought to be honest about the worst thing about it, and I think it's pretty clear what that is: the "heroine" is a selfish, trashy woman. As for the feminists, let them continue to defend the indefensible. It will only help open a few more eyes.

Shipload of Women Headed to Gaza

Welmer · 20 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The “Mariam,” a Bolivian-flagged freighter packed full of women, among them a Lebanese singer, American nuns, and various professionals and interfaith types, has shoved off from Algeria on a mission to deliver supplies to Gaza. But first the ship will stop in Cyprus, where it will need permission from Cypriots to continue.

According to an article in Haaretz, Algerian mullahs and businessmen came up with the idea, perhaps thinking that if Israelis seize a ship full of women they will be strongly condemned by the West. However, there have been other all-female ships around for some years now, namely the abortion ships, which until recently sailed around the world to terminate pregnancies on the high seas. When people in countries targeted by the abortion fleet caught wind of what was going on, the operation was shut down under threat of seizure and arrest, so clearly ships full of women do not have any special exemptions in maritime law.

The Cypriot ambassador has already told the women that they will not be granted permission to continue on to Gaza, so ultimately Israel may not need to deal with them at all, but the ship’s “organizer” (this is apparently what women call a captain) is reportedly adamant about sailing directly to Gaza.

Although the women on the Mariam may be engaged in what they see as a fashionable cause, I wonder why we haven’t seen a group of women suggesting an all-female caravan into southern Afghanistan. As more and more women have been demanding we stay in Afghanistan “for the women,” it seems like the logical place to go. Isn’t it kind of pointless to waste all this feminist political capital on Gaza, which has little relevance to feminism?

Perhaps the feminists involved in the trip – I am fairly certain that most of the Western women on board, including the nuns, are feminists – are convinced that contemporary Western leftist ideology and feminism are inextricably linked, and Gaza has become a leftist cause in recent years.

Eat Pray Love Author's Ex-Husband Has a Book of His Own

Welmer · 21 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some of us are probably wondering what became of Michael Cooper, Eat Pray Love author Elizabeth Gilbert's ex-husband, following the release of her paean to adultery, gluttony and prideful piety. Fortunately, Danielle Friedman, writing for The Daily Beast, took the time to contact him and find out. It turns out he's written a book detailing his side of the story, and had plans to publish it when the film came out, but the deal fell through due to disagreements with the publisher.

Some commenters remarked that he's lucky to have the woman out of his life, and given that he's successfully moved on that's probably the truth, but he still describes the experience as "devastating." This is normal. Divorce is very often devastating for men, especially when children are involved. Mr. Cooper was fortunate in that they were not, but it takes a toll all the same. Fortunately, men can and do move on and find a life again.

I've noticed that some writers have recently been suggesting that if a man is hurt by betrayal and abandonment he's somehow less of a man. The implication is that if you can be hurt by that, you're insufficiently alpha, and any real man would immediately move on and start sleeping with any woman he can game into his bed. The suggestion is that love and loyalty is feminine, and a real man is a stone-cold screwing machine who just doesn't care, because caring is what pussies do. The problem with this reasoning is that most normal men simply aren't wired that way (although it may be more common amongst sociopathic types, such as con-men and many of those doing hard time for violent crime).

In fact, divorce stats paint a clear picture to the contrary. In marriage, it is women who go stone-cold at the drop of a hat, turn off their empathy with no effort, and do extraordinarily cruel things to a spouse without a trace of remorse. Sure, men sometimes screw around, but they are usually conflicted and sorry when they do so. In my entire life, I have never – not even once – heard a woman express regret or contrition for betraying her husband or boyfriend, but I have heard many men do so.

As Friedman points out in the article, not only did Elizabeth Gilbert brutally betray her husband, she profited enormously from doing so in a very public and humiliating manner:

> Yet in keeping with the tale's theme of cosmic balance, as we watch Gilbert (embodied by Julia Roberts) reach a realm of happiness in which she's "smiling in her liver," we watch her husband-turned-ex (played by Billy Crudup) come undone on screen. And this was before she became a gazillionaire.
> It sounds like the nightmare of every jilted lover: your ex not only soars to wealth and fame but on the back of your own failed marriage. And, um, very publicly.

I'd like to add that in keeping with "cosmic balance," if one believes in Hinduism or Buddhism, Gilbert will likely be reincarnated as some kind of worm that dwells in tidal mud flats and feeds on shellfish excrement, but it may be that American women have internalized the philosophy that in order to have a fulfilling, happy life, one has to make damn sure that at least one other person is absolutely miserable. It's a sort of twisted notion of karma, where one's happiness is contingent upon another's sorrow. Such a philosophy would certainly explain a lot of contemporary female behavior.

Perhaps it's also a sobering commentary on American life in general — if one has no moral scruples our system can work very much to one's advantage (provided IQ is above a certain threshold). In fact, it seems at times, despite the frequent admonitions against "legislating morality," that morality itself has been legislated out of existence, especially where family law is concerned. Our law and popular culture have become so relativist that the concepts of right and wrong have been reduced to whether an act causes a pleasurable physical sensation or sense of satisfaction at any particular moment.

Illustrating this trend perfectly, when Michael Cooper agreed to write a book about his experience, the publisher pressed him to include salacious details about his marriage and divorce. He was asked to do something that he personally felt was wrong to receive a reward, and being a fundamentally decent person he declined. It's pretty amazing that after being cuckolded in front of the entire nation, Mr. Cooper maintained his dignity and stuck by his guns, refusing on principle to sully his message, which publisher Hyperion plainly didn't think would interest fans of Eat Love Pray, the target demographic they must have been hoping to cash in on.

Cooper chose to name his book Displaced, a double entendre that describes both his divorce and his work as a humanitarian aid worker in various conflict zones, but Hyperion chose the title The Husband: One Man's Story of Moving In, Moving Out, and Moving On, further insulting him by reducing him to a bit part in the glamorous life of his ex-wife.

So what was his book about? According to the blurb that's still up on Hyperion's site (which still contains the original title), it's about how he recovered through service to others:

> Michael thought his marriage with Liz was rock solid. When it suddenly crumbled, his life was set adrift. In Displaced, he offers an intimate look at the end of the marriage and at his personal struggle to recover. Through more than a decade of human rights and humanitarian aid work with communities upended by poverty, disaster, and conflict, Michael witnessed time and again the incredible resilience of the human spirit—in Kosovo, Mongolia, Iran, Iraq, and elsewhere.

While Elizabeth Gilbert was slutting around in luxurious locales, dedicating herself to vapid, hedonistic pursuits, Michael Cooper was working hard to provide comfort to the afflicted peoples of the less fortunate parts of the world. Think about that: despite his own sorrow he dedicated his time and effort to easing the burdens of others. I can hardly think of a more arresting contrast.

Although it's too bad his book won't be coming out immediately, I'm actually glad Hyperion won't get to publish it. If they tried to ruin the story by introducing cheap gossip and dirty laundry, they don't deserve the rights. According to an article in the NY Post, Cooper cancelled the deal himself:

> Cooper told Page Six he finished the manuscript, but parted ways because of Hyperion's "eleventh-hour demands" to make it more racy. "I set out to write about how, in the wake of a devastating and unexpected divorce, I slowly rebuilt my life by redoubling my already decades-long commitment to humanitarian relief and human rights work. In the end, it seemed to me that Hyperion hoped to push the book in a more controversial direction — something I was unwilling to do. I am exploring options with other publishers." Hyperion confirmed the cancellation but declined to comment further.

Good for him. The book will eventually come out, and we will definitely review it here at The Spearhead.

As awful as the movie Eat Love Pray is, I'm glad it came out. I'm glad for Sex and The City 2 as well, and all the other abominations that are crawling out of the swamp of contemporary culture. The flower of feminism is gone, and now we have its rotten fruit. When enough people have tasted it and retched as a result, it won't be an easy sell any longer.

As for Michael Cooper, his recovery is essentially complete. He is currently married to a Canadian diplomat, has two young sons, and is studying public interest law at Georgetown.

Comment From a Feminist Attorney

Welmer · 22 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Most readers have probably heard the popular example of a loaded question, which goes like this:

“Do you still beat your wife?”

Whether you answer yes or no, you admit to being a wife-beater. Yesterday, one of the people whose names I put up as open oppressors of men, a feminist lawyer, left what could be called a loaded comment on The Spearhead. Because new comments have to be approved, I considered trashing it, but then I thought I’d use it as an example of how these people operate.

The comment, posted by Kris Miccio (I can’t absolutely verify the identity of the sender, but I’m going to assume that’s who it is), reads as follows:

> I’d lke to thank you for including me on your list here. I was unaware of this blog. Perhaps there will come a time when invective is put aside and accountability replaces it–and those who batter their wives, their girlfriends come to terms with the violence of their actions; not just for those they physically harm but for the people who love them.

The suggestion is that those of us writing for The Spearhead are batterers who physically harm people and need to be held accountable. It is written in such a way as to insinuate rather than outright accuse, so one could call it a form of legal slander. It’s a common courtroom trick that less talented attorneys use in an attempt to portray people in a negative light.

It might seem kind of ridiculous, and not worth taking seriously, but it shows quite clearly that these people simply don’t believe in the concept of “innocent until proven guilty.” And, unfortunately, they are quite often entirely in charge of “batterers’ programs,” DV diversion, etc.

There is probably no system in the United States that is a better example of how totalitarian governments operate than family law. The people behind the system – mainly ardent feminists – have an ideological agenda, and they need not only victims, but scapegoats as well. It’s actually quite similar to the Maoist program of class struggle, except the classes in this case are replaced by gender. In their frame, all men are guilty, because they have been socialized by a patriarchal culture, so men are either batterers or potential batterers, and nothing else.

Conceptually, this is far, far away from our traditional practice of law, in which the burden of proof falls on the accuser. In the case of domestic violence and family law, it is the opposite; a man is essentially considered guilty before he’s even been accused, and must go through a process of self-criticism to purge himself of his guilt, which is added on top of any criminal penalties (if he was convicted of anything — a conviction is not necessary to trigger coercion into DV programs). It’s a strange recapitulation of the idea of original sin.

For any man who lives with a woman, or would like to at some point, this is serious business. Relationships don’t always last, and when they fall apart women can do some pretty vicious things to gain an advantage — ask any divorce lawyer if you have any doubts about how common this is.

In the meanwhile, we have to keep an eye on the people who are behind this system so that we can both personally avoid them and politically oppose them. The easier it is to look people like Kris Miccio up on Google and find their feminist credentials, the more effective we will be in both endeavors.

Woman Fakes Pregnancy, Rips Man Off For $3,500 of Child Support

Welmer · 23 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Carmen Lynn Johnsen, a Federal Way Washington woman, hatched a scheme to steal from a man she was dating, telling him late last year that she was pregnant with his child. Ms. Johnsen was well aware that she wasn't pregnant, but told the man that she had a history of high risk pregnancies and needed bed rest to play it safe. The man believed her, and started giving her $700 per month. Later, she claimed she had miscarried, going so far as to have a fake obituary printed and asking a pastor to hold a service for the nonexistent dead child.

After she thought she'd done a sufficient job of fooling everyone, Johnsen proceeded to demand almost $10,000 from the man who'd been paying her child support, saying she needed it for hospital bills. Suspicious, he called the police, who checked out the story. When police asked Johnsen what was going on, she showed them forged documents in an effort to fool them as well, which was probably the most important mistake she made. Cops don't generally care if a man is fooled by a woman, and will call it a "civil case," but if she tries to fool them they will not take it so well.

Johnsen has been charged with first degree theft and first degree forgery – both felonies – but has not been taken into custody.

Is Game in Marriage Always Worth It?

Welmer · 24 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Chateau/Roissy, Hawaiian Libertarian and others have written a lot of good stuff about how important Game can be in marriage. They're right — a woman who perceives her husband as in charge and on top of things is a lot more likely to stick around than one who sees him as a pathetic beta provider. So it's pretty obvious that putting some effort into maintaining one's confidence, self-assuredness and wit is important to keeping a marriage alive. Guys who neglect this are at least halfway down the path of divorce.

However, one thing I don't see all that often is a discussion of the unsatisfied, unhappy married man. In our gynocentric culture, we have scores of films, songs, books and TV shows that that detail the dissatisfaction of wives with inadequate husbands, but it appears to be taboo to bring up the fact that plenty of men aren't all that happy with their wives. Whether it's taboo or not, it's a very real phenomenon that is, unfortunately, an exceedingly common problem.

Several of my friends/acquaintances are guys who remain in marriages because they don't have a viable alternative. One's a lawyer, one's a cop, and another's a corporate manager. What they all have in common is that they feel stuck with their wives. Often, they unload their frustrations while talking to me. My cop friend is totally "alpha" as far as the term is understood in the manosphere. He doesn't take any crap from his wife, stands his ground, and buries shit tests immediately. However, he is far from happy in his marriage. His wife, although she complains at times, is devoted to him, but he just isn't all that interested. He told me this evening that he's sick of sex with her, is at his wits' end about her irresponsible spending, and would rather be spending more time with his kids than working 12 hours a day to pay off credit card debts that she runs up.

My attorney friend is not even close to satisfied with his wife, who is most interested in the suburban status game. He feels like a caged animal, and lives with the sense that his life could be a lot better if he'd never married his wife in the first place.

The corporate manager is divorced, but then remarried for some reason or the other. I've only seen him with his wife once; the rest of the time he's been with other women, and his wife with other men.

There are millions of men out there who are stuck in similar situations, but they tend to stay with their families because they think it's the right thing for the kids, and also because they know that they'd be absolutely ruined if they pursued divorce.

So what do we have to offer these men? Sure, we criticize women for leaving because they are merely "unhappy," but shouldn't we take into account that men are sometimes unhappy in their marriages as well?

It seems to me that blaming marriage breakups on men's lack of Game is another one of those examples of unfairly placing all the responsibility on men. In fact, what's most telling to me is that, for all the feminist criticism of the manosphere and Game, I've never seen a woman suggest that there's anything wrong with gaming one's wife. It may be true that marriages break up when a man stops being the kind of husband that a woman wants, but we ought to keep in mind that this often follows the wife's failure to live up to some minimum standard that would keep a husband satisfied. This may not always be her fault, but often it really is.

A wife who blows cash like there's no tomorrow, who lets herself go physically, who is a nag or who makes no allowances for the husband's normal recreational pursuits isn't exactly inspiring a man to be confident and masculine in her presence. If anything, he's resentful, tired of her, and on the defensive — all of which are antithetical to Game.

Sure, a case could be made that tight Game will bring a woman around and get her to start working out, cooking, saving and acting like a good wife, but sometimes it's a pretty tall order, and it's pretty hard to motivate oneself to put all that effort into a wife who's already become an unattractive harridan. What do guys do in this case? From what I've seen, they simply go through the motions, and often things subsequently fall apart and the guys take the blame.

It seems to me that if men are expected to maintain some level of alpha behavior around women, they need a woman who's worth it. Therefore, making a marriage work is not only on the shoulders of the man — it's up to wives as well. If family law didn't automatically punish men and reward women for annihilating families, women might actually take that seriously.

In short, Game cannot be a panacea without some balance in family law. Without a return to equity, women have no incentive to make themselves worthy of their husbands' devoted efforts.

Convicted Rapist Lives it up with Female Admirers in Sex Predator Commitment Center

Welmer · 25 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Lawrence Williams, a man convicted of multiple counts of violent rape, created a good life for himself in the special sexual predator commitment center, smoking crack, shooting porn flicks and maintaining a harem, all with the enthusiastic help of female nurses and corrections personnel.

Williams has a history of sexual assault that goes back to his teens, but he was extremely popular with the ladies, who risked their jobs and freedom to smuggle crack and film pornography with him. A shameless hustler, he even called state welfare to demand that his bitches get paid by the state. So far, it is not known whether state welfare followed his orders, but I wouldn't be surprised…

The prosecutor is trying to paint him as a master manipulator, but the defense is claiming, with some merit I would add, that it's a lot harder to "cheat an honest man." Of course, the problem with the P.T. Barnum quote the defense came up with is that it doesn't make allowances for women.

One method Williams used to run his stable from behind bars was to white knight for his ladies. In one email, he wrote: "No matter what is the issues in your life … you have a friend. I am sorry that I am not out. I would protect you from some of your man issues … oh yeah I would."

Strangely, that quote makes him sound remarkably like a contemporary family law judge or court commissioner. Is there really all that much difference between a convicted rapist and a family law judge, philosophically speaking? Anecdotal evidence suggests that judges – both lesbians and straight men – sometimes abuse the bench to engage in sexual relations with litigants. It's all about wrecking families and illegitimate sex, so morally speaking there's no clear line between the two.

Lawrence Williams is simply playing the game in the exact same manner that so many involved in the system do. Is it any wonder he's had so much success in securing drugs, pornography and the devoted support of women?

Rape Shield Laws and False Convictions

Welmer · 26 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Rape shield laws take on a couple of different forms, including limiting the ability of defense lawyers to cross-examine accusers and hiding the identity of accusers. In the United States, trials and court records are a matter of public record, guaranteed under the First and Fourteenth amendments of the Constitution, so identifying accusers is perfectly legal, despite the best efforts of some states to impose penalties on those who do so. However, in Britain those who accuse people of rape are guaranteed anonymity, although the accused are not, which creates a double standard — the accuser enjoys greater rights than the accused prior to conviction, which is a recipe for abuse.

The justification for the rape shield trend is often based on people's prejudices, and in the Anglosphere there has long been an assumption that women's reputations are worth a great deal, an idea that is based on Victorian ideas about female purity and moral superiority. Recently, as these outdated attitudes have crumbled under the evidence of widespread female promiscuity, sexual license and dishonesty, the argument has switched a bit, and now the laws and policies purport to defend women from "bullying" cross-examinations by the accused or his attorney. It is now argued that cross examination creates additional trauma for victims of rape, but this seems a bit out of keeping with our legal tradition, because without a conviction victimhood has not been established. However, there is still enough sympathy for women in the general population (although it appears to be fading fast) to allow for the unwarranted credibility given to female accusers; unwarranted because rape is the most falsely reported of all serious crimes. Additionally, there are, among the feminists, plenty of those who want to tip the balance in favor of accusers and deny constitutional rights to a fair trial.

In the UK, there is no constitutional amendment that requires government business to be conducted in the open, so those who accuse people of rape – whether genuine victims or not – do not have to reveal themselves. If the only concern were the trauma caused by public exposure or the fear women might feel about coming forward if exposed as an accuser, then one might think that a recent proposal to provide anonymity to those who have been accused of rape shouldn't be an issue, because providing anonymity to the accused does nothing to expose the accuser, and may actually further protect her identity. However, just such a proposal was recently denounced in Britain by feminist MPs, so it's obvious that something besides the feelings of the accuser is motivating them. In fact, if one ignores the spin and takes an objective look at the partisan nature of the debate, it's patently obvious that feminists want to stack the deck in favor of the accuser, and don't really care about a fair trial.

Allowing people to make anonymous accusations is a very touchy thing. It was very common in totalitarian regimes, where you could be hauled into court without any idea who had said what about you, or whether anyone had said anything at all. It's really quite difficult to defend oneself from a shadow, which is why we have the constitutional right in the United States to confront those who would accuse us. This, unfortunately, is the right under assault in American rape shield laws.

Alan Dershowitz, the famously pugnacious law professor and defense attorney, has been arguing against American rape shield laws for years. In the early 90s he wrote a couple articles for the Boston Herald, including one titled "Rape: guilty until proven innocent," and another: "When women cry rape and lie." Although I couldn't find the text from the first article, I did manage to find an excerpt from the latter:

> The tragic reality that rape is the most underreported of crimes must not blind us to the equally important reality that rape is also the most falsely reported of crimes. Moreover, "acquaintance" or "date" rape is an area in which differing perceptions may produce inadvertently false testimony about actions that may well fall into the gray area between aggressive seduction and criminal sexual assault. When it comes to sexual encounters, both men and women often "remember" differently from what a videotape would show. The truth-testing mechanisms of our criminal justice system must not be compromised in the service of some "politically correct" nonsense that when it comes to rape only women always tell the truth.

Dershowitz, an experienced trial lawyer, knew very well what the implications of the relatively new rape shield laws were. In fact, he argued that, in all likelihood, Mike Tyson was falsely accused of rape by a woman who had a history of making false rape accusations. What really bothered him about that case was that a rape shield law prevented Tyson's counsel from introducing evidence of prior false accusations, which could have demonstrated to the jury that the woman had a history of lying about sexual encounters.

When rape shield laws were first put in place, they were ostensibly to prevent defense attorneys from portraying victims as sluts and suggesting that it probably wasn't rape if the woman had a history of extramarital sex. As awful as that assumption may sound to modern ears, that was actually how most people felt before the advent of birth control and the sexual revolution. And there was a reason for that: women who had sex outside of marriage were generally prostitutes or otherwise of very poor character according to the social mores of the time, so it was perfectly fair to question whether a woman who had been sleeping around was really raped. However, as we all know, behavior changed rather radically from the 1950s to the 1970s, and it was decided that new laws were needed to prevent attorneys from playing to old-fashioned notions about sexual behavior.

However, if that were the sole reason, the fix would only be of temporary value, because at the present day only the senile and delusional still believe women are generally chaste outside of marriage. Now that Americans, young and old, have a more "progressive" understanding of what constitutes normal sexual behavior, there should be no further reason to shield jurors from the facts, which is exactly what these shield laws are intended to do.

If a professor who also identifies as a "feminist" (yes, Alan Dershowitz has called himself a feminist, unfortunately) is squarely opposed to rape shield laws, American men ought to be very worried about them. They must so cripple defense that even a man who is deeply sympathetic to feminism finds them objectionable, which suggests that an unscrupulous woman could easily use them as a weapon or a way out of a mess of her own making. In this sense, they may well be encouraging crime — false accusation in particular.

Unfortunately, a lot of young men are unaware that this is a real menace to them, personally. Normal young men have a revulsion toward rape, and can't imagine themselves ever being accused of something so heinous. Conceptually, they have a difficult time sympathizing with someone who has been accused of something so awful, as do most people, so the very real possibility of false convictions tends to go ignored.

Regardless, the truth has to come out, and it is, although slowly. One organization that has done a great deal of good work exposing the tragedy of false convictions is the Innocence Project. I invite readers with a little time on their hands to browse the cases, and take a look at what the men were convicted of. The majority of them were convicted of rape, and then exonerated at some later date by DNA analysis. In most cases, it appears that these men were convicted due to "eyewitness misidentification." While many real victims probably did in fact make a mistake, it would be disingenuous to suggest that not one of these men was the victim of a false accusation, fingered by a malicious woman who was making an excuse for something or other or trying to get out of a sticky situation. A number of these men were on death row. Some of them for over 20 years. Their lives were ruined, their families plunged into despair, parents in mourning and all the rest.

I recently watched the film Life After Innocence, a documentary about the men exonerated by DNA evidence and produced by the Innocence Project, and it was almost painfully touching to see these grown, middle-aged men coming home to parents who had lost their boys so many years before. They'd walk into the homes many of them had barely left prior to conviction, look around, and embrace their mothers and fathers after decades behind bars. As a father myself, I can barely imagine what it would feel like to lose my child in that manner. Seeing the old parents still there for their sons, waiting all those years, highlights human beings' amazing ability to endure pain and disappointment and still hold onto hope.

These stories – this reality – is what needs to be taken into account in every single discussion of laws that limit the rights of the accused to defend himself. If rape shield laws are putting innocent men in prison, as Alan Dershowitz believes they are, we have to stand up to those who advocate them and hold them accountable for the destruction of innocent lives. If feminists are too morally deficient to understand why this is a very grave problem, the obvious question we should be asking is why they are in any positions of authority at all.

From Liberation to Chattel

Welmer · 27 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The radical reinterpretation of marriage that has been underway in the West for the past century or so, which began in earnest with universal suffrage, has put men in a tight spot. Comparisons to chattel slavery are entirely apt, given the legal regime surrounding marriage, which can put a man into lifelong indentured servitude, restrict his movement, and imprison him for failing to follow the state mandate to pay his ex-wife or children's mother. At this point, men are on the ropes. Women control most of the wealth in the United States and probably a number of other Western countries, men's traditional entitlements as fathers and husbands have been entirely stripped away and replaced with obligations (the opposite of entitlements), and politicians – conservative and liberal alike – are gunning for more of the same.

However, the ultimate consequences of radical policies are not always what folks intended them to be. It is common for people to become virtually enslaved by their entitlements, as men were in the 20th century, when the meaning of being "head of the family" switched from lord and master of the home to dutiful wage slave. As many men have remarked, having a man as "head of household" became a better deal for the wife than the husband following the Industrial Revolution. What benefit is it to be head of household when one spends little time at home, and is unconscious for the better part of that time anyway?

Now that the tables have turned, and men have incurred legal obligations to remunerate women for drawing breath, women's role in society is undergoing a change that, although subtle, is readily evident from one decade to the next.

As an example, billionaire Donald Bren, a Los Angeles real-estate tycoon, has recently been in the news over a child support lawsuit pursued by his adult children at the behest of their mother, Jennifer McKay Gold. The appropriately named Ms. Gold had a 13-year "affair" with Mr. Bren and bore two illegitimate children by him, who are now 18 and 22 years old. Bren came to an agreement with Ms. Gold about child support, paying her some $3.5 million over 24 years and spending considerably more exclusively on the children. Toward the end of that period, Ms. Gold was receiving $216,000 per year of untaxed income — a tidy sum for taking her clothes off and providing entertainment from time to time. There's no doubt that she was the envy of all her girlfriends, lived in a nice house, drove a nice car, and had a closet full of expensive clothes and shoes — all the trappings that fulfill life's purpose for your typical California female.

But that wasn't enough for her. No, she wanted to bequeath a fortune to her illegitimate children, doubtless purely out of altruism and motherly concern. So she urged them to sue their father for no less than $134 million (if there was ever any doubt that she was the driving force behind the lawsuit, Gold eliminates it by repeatedly speaking for her children and using the pronoun "we" when making statements to the press). Unfortunately for Ms. Gold and her children, they had to make the case to a jury that was likely comprised mainly of people who had never made as much on a monthly basis as she collected in child support. Her attorney, Hillel Chodos, unintentionally injected some humor into the pathetic situation by arguing as follows:

> They are not here because they didn't have enough to live on, they are here because they were deprived by Donald Bren of their birthright. They had the right to share in his standard of living.

Now I don't know Mr. Chodos personally, and he may have been having a bad day, but that line of argument – especially in front of a jury – makes him come off as a second-rate attorney at best.

What's so ridiculous about the argument is that the children were the result of an "affair," and therefore appeals to old-fashioned notions such as "birthright" are entirely out of place — opposing counsel might as well have countered with the legal rights of bastards, which in English law stipulated that there was no birthright (i.e. inheritance).

But if you really want to be technical about it, Ms. Gold was a de facto concubine, and that's why the jury rejected Chodos's argument.

Concubinage was common in many civilized societies throughout the world for thousands of years, but widespread legal reforms based on Westernization or Communism essentially eliminated the practice in all but a few places. In the West, concubinage (at least the legally recognized variety) was snuffed out by Christianity, which imposed harsh penalties to limit the practice, including stigmas against bastards, religious sanction against those who practiced some form of it (churchmen such as bishops were frequent offenders) and strong social pressure. Without an ideology or religion to counter concubinage, it appears to be something that occurs naturally in human society. It is a social contract whereby the big man who hoards more than his share of women is expected to maintain the females and their offspring at some minimum level of comfort, which usually turns out to be greater than that enjoyed by your typical peasant or tribesman.

In general, the biggest difference between wives and concubines was that wives were much more difficult to put away due to property arrangements (e.g. dowries, land consolidation), and wives' children were considered legitimate heirs. Of course, there were exceptions, but as a rule the status of a wife was significantly higher than that of a concubine.

If one takes a close look at contemporary American society, it appears that concubinage is gradually reasserting itself in Western culture and law. This is an inevitable result of the idea that men have an obligation to financially support illegitimate children; an idea that was rejected by Christians because it fatally weakens the incentives for women without significant property to engage in monogamous marriage. In fact, Islam prohibits concubinage as well, and dictates that although a man may have up to four wives, each one will have the same status under the law. Abuses have always occurred, but the contrast between European and East Asian society (Chinese in particular) was stark up until modernization in Asia. Rich Chinese men often had a "first wife" and varying numbers of concubines, the Emperor would have hundreds of them, and lots of ordinary Chinese men had to make do sharing prostitutes or going entirely without a woman.

For young women, a life as a concubine is often preferable to being married to a poor man, and increasingly that option is open to them in the US. For the lucky few women – usually the exceptionally attractive and mercenary – a sexual relationship with a wealthy businessman, athlete or politician can guarantee decades of support if she manages to get pregnant. Rielle Hunter, John Edwards' adulterous lover, is an example of a woman who pulled it off. Scores of women manage to hit the jackpot with young, unsophisticated athletes; thousands upon thousands of others we've never heard of take advantage of relatively wealthy men. In these cases, where child support will be enough to live on, the arrangement is concubinage in all but name. The only argument against equivalency is that sexual exclusivity is not guaranteed, as it usually was in ancient forms of concubinage, but given that sexual exclusivity is neither guaranteed nor enforced in marriage any longer and concubinage has always been held to be a lesser alternative to full marriage, it is fulfilling the exact same role the institution did in ancient times.

What is ironic about all this is that the endless demands women make for financial entitlements are slowly creating a legal basis for women's status as chattel. Culturally, the effect will likely be similar, as it is difficult to counter the sense that what is paid for is owned. Despite the endless complaints from feminists about women being objectified and treated as chattel, now that women have secured the right to do as they please they are busy lobbying themselves into a position where it would be difficult to treat them in any other manner.

For years, feminists have relied on the idea that a patriarchal conspiracy has been responsible for the nearly universal tendency to treat women as something in between an enfranchised individual and property. However, if one takes a closer look at the behavior and demands of women themselves, including and especially those who have been "liberated" since birth, the reality that presents itself is that this is exactly the role that they want.

The Little Things Men Do

About a week ago, a girl fell off a cliff into the Skokomish River, which flows out of the Olympic Mountains into Hood Canal in Washington State's Olympic Peninsula. Much of Western Washington is pretty rough country, and lots of people drown every year, often because they are weakened by hypothermia. The waters remain cold year round, so it's actually very common for people to die as a result of hypothermia in the summer, when they are less cautious around rivers and lakes.

In this incident, the girl broke a few bones in the fall, and was showing signs of hypothermia, so she had to be extracted from the canyon she had fallen into fairly quickly. However, hauling her out on foot wouldn't have been practical given the fractures, and might have taken too long given the hypothermia, so a Nighthawk helicopter from Whidbey Island Naval Air Station flew in to lift her out. Hospital Corpsman Second Class Richmond Roy rappelled a couple hundred feet to secure the girl and lift her to safety.

The rescue was carried out in a narrow canyon, under a bridge and in significant wind (you can hear the wind at the beginning of the clip while the cameraman is walking along the bridge). The video below gives an idea of how tight it was, and what nerve it must have taken for the chopper pilot and the corpsman who pulled up the basket. Near the end of the clip, you can see the basket swinging around in the wind as it nears the chopper, which remains motionless in midair. Amazing.

For all the bashing women give men, when you get right down to it, these extraordinary feats are simply beyond the capabilities of women. That image of capable, dutiful men placing themselves at considerable risk to lift a helpless girl out of a perilous place is a perfect metaphor for civilization itself. It puts feminism, women's lib and notions of gender equality in their proper perspective.

When you are married, you might as well wake up every morning, go look at yourself in the mirror and say, "Fuck you. Fuck your dreams, your ambitions and anything else that is important to you. It's all about her."
-Chris Rock

In our efforts to understand and quantify women's power, we are hobbled by the fact that our culture has very, very limited ways to articulate the nature of that power. In fact, we live largely in denial of the massive amount of muscle and sway inherent to being female, and are under any number of cultural pressures, reinforced by massive societal denial, to act as though that power does not exist.

What would seem to be a minor example of this at work can be seen every time your spell check redlines the word misandry. Though this is actually not so minor. A culture that refuses to acknowledge that a perfectly legitimate word exists on paper, is in effect denying its existence to the collective consciousness. And when such prejudicial elimination of ideas runs unchecked, it not only has the power to skew attitudes and perspectives, but also to shape law and policy, education and public awareness. Misandry runs rampant because misandry does not exist.

Women need empowerment, and always will, because women's power itself does not exist.

We do have one exception to this. It is the "I am woman, hear me roar," exception. We are bound as members of this society to proclaim women to be powerful, capable equals to men, even as we are also shackled to the opinion that women are the subjugated victims of oppression by the men who they are supposedly equal to. In its own ironic and completely contradictory way, the "I am woman," exception is just a publicly mandated, schmaltzy affirmation of the Stuart Smalley variety. We are all compulsory grrl power cheer leaders, chanting therapeutic mantras at women about a kind of power they do not, and never, have had.

And it only serves to lead us further astray from the very real power that they do possess.

We don't have common expressions like "female dominance," or "matriarchal oppression," and despite their absolute legitimacy, as sure as we use them 98% of the public will roll their eyes in summary dismissal, thus demonstrating another aspect of overarching female power that bears no name, and therefore does not exist.

It is like trying to describe a cloud without being able to use the word itself- to a world that does not believe in clouds. We are limited to talking around the subject; we present our meanings in metaphors and similes and anecdotes. We may describe how the power of accusation from women often ruins innocent men, or how men go in to family court at a complete disadvantage by virtue of having a penis, rather not having a vagina, but we really have precious little language to address all this directly. As a result, much of what we say is dismissed as hyperbolic and overly reactionary.

It's the female advantage to have power that is at once overbearing and invisible; everywhere and nowhere.

But this is beginning to change, thanks to the MRM. Growing numbers of men and women are now aware of misandry, despite their spell checks continued ignorance of it. And with the furtherance of the use of that word, we are not only pushing another addition to the lexicon, but some very key ideas that go with it.

- Women can, and do, irrationally hate every bit as much as men.
- Women can be sexist, and many are.
- Men can be self hating, and many are.

That is the power of a single word, and the more it is forced into mainstream use, the more, albeit slowly, that attitudes begin to change. We are not there yet, but the day is coming that misandry will take its place alongside misogyny in the collective consciousness, and people will have a hard time thinking of one without a cognizance of the other. Language is the locus of social change.

In that spirit, I am continuing the Zeta Game series with a focus on not only reversing the polarity of the power flow between men and women, but on attempting to infuse some more meaning and clarity into the language we use when doing it. And I can best start by taking a word that has been popping up in the Game dialog for some time now.

Hypergamy.

The word is literally defined as the custom of women marrying up, or marrying men who have a higher socioeconomic status than women possess on their own. Gamesters have already expanded on it to describe women's natural inclination to be sexually stimulated in the presence of powerful men. I read a recent comment in another forum saying that even the most committed of married women will get the 'gina tingle in the presence of such men, even when ugly ass Henry Kissinger walks into a room.

I have no doubt it is true.

But there is much more to hypergamy, and at the very least it serves the purpose of men well to revise and expand upon our understanding of it, and include that into our common language.

First we should consider that the literal definition of hypergamy and the Game definition both point to the same outcome- women with access to, and use of, the power generated by men.

That power can come in many different forms, and will be pursued differently by different women, especially at different points in their lives.

A younger woman may be attracted to the immediate presence of personal power via thug attraction, while an older, more sophisticated woman will be turned on by a successful man of means. There is, in the biological sense, not one iota of difference between the two women. Both get hot and bothered by what they hope to eventually have control over.

So whether the 'gina tingle is sparked by a guy on a Harley or a guy with a Harley factory, they are tingling over essentially the same thing.

Both women will enter the relationship in honeymoon phase, but will eventually use the tried and tested methods of sexual manipulation and/or emotional blackmail to put the man on a leash and start assuming ownership of everything he produces, including money, home and personal time.

The average woman will become increasingly demanding and insistent that the energy all revolve around her, and the standard response is for the man to acquiesce. And as I wrote about in my essay, "A Prayer for Joe Bob," this is where we also see the man lose more and more of himself to her wishes and whims.

Women don't just marry up. They are on constant alert to better deal themselves, even within, especially within, their current relationships. They enter relationships with the intent to eventually exert total control over them. I saw a woman wearing a T-shirt once that said it as succinctly as I have ever seen it.

More me. Less you.

To illustrate the point further I am reminded of one of the questions I used to ask in the men's groups I facilitated.

"How many of you," I would ask, "have ever had the feeling that you wanted to pull all of your hair out by the roots and scream bloody murder because no matter what you did, she was not happy with it and wanted more?"

The roughly 5% of men who answered this question in the negative were all gay.

Even men that claimed to be happily married were able to relate to this frustration, and indeed many of those men attributed their "happy marriage" to the fact that they gave their wives whatever they wanted with no questions.

I call this hypergamy in action, and it is a form of exercised power that is unequaled in it's ability to control a man's life- and it is all but universal to the male experience.

For men who desire the ability to avoid that trap, giving hypergamy an expanded definition (and yes, I can do that if I want to) is in order.

Hypergamy is the innate tendency in women to reduce men to mere utilitarian value, to extract as much personal use from men as possible. And to continue to do so until the man is used up.

In short, hypergamy is the universal drive in women to turn men into appliances, and whether that appliance is a dildo or an ATM or both, makes little difference.

And the hell with NAWALT, in one way or another ALL heterosexual women practice hypergamy, and my money is on the idea that most lesbians do as well. It is biological programming, not conscious choice, so hating women for it is about as useful as hating men for liking tits and ass.

And besides, one need not hate women to understand and counteract hypergamy. Indeed, it is quite possible to force any woman you are connected to into more or less chasing her tail in circles with her hypergamous tendencies, leaving her to experience the frustration that she usually is the one to inflict. And it does not require scheming, manipulation, dishonesty or any of the other less savory aspects of non Zeta Game.

In fact, it demands that you do just the opposite of those things and operate only in honest, direct ways that scream self assurance and self awareness.

I will cross that bridge in the next article, Hypergamy Crossroads.

Men's News Daily, a popular online men's magazine, is closing down after nine years of reporting on men's issues, politics and the general insanity that has come to characterize gender relations in the United States. Staunchly anti-feminist and unapologetically pro-male, the site has helped create and inform a community of men and supportive women who have gone on to spread the word and offer important resources to those who are coming in from the cold reality of state-sponsored misandry. Publisher Mike LaSalle, a California native, has established himself as a pioneer in online activism for men, bringing us the work of many insightful writers, editors and professionals who have exposed Governance Feminism for the harmful, unnatural and intrusive regime it has become.

Although I was only dimly aware of MND when I started The Spearhead along with other contributors, I soon found that the old guard of online men's activism was already well established there, and we were fortunate enough to benefit from some cross-pollination of ideas and writing from men who had previously contributed to MND, including Spearhead contributors Paul Elam and Zed.

Mike LaSalle is shifting his efforts to Hawaii, where he will focus on Hawaiian politics and news with the site Hawai'i News Daily.

Although I don't know Mike personally, I'd like to wish him success with HND and give him a hand for running a popular, influential site for most of the last decade. His efforts deserve both praise and respect, and will be remembered as a great example of how a man can make a difference through determination and professionalism.

Aloha, Mike.

Teachers Consider Relaxing Restrictive Policies Toward Boys, But Still Don't Get It

Welmer · 29 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For more than a generation now, one of the main battlegrounds in the war on men has been the schoolyard, and the principal target is little boys. The theory that differences between the sexes is the result of socialization by a patriarchal conspiracy has been largely discredited, but the damage to an entire generation of boys has already been done. I distinctly remember teachers banning our war games and forcing us to sit down and play like girls. It went so far that we were even banned from playing pickup football, because the girls were left out and it was too "violent." Some teachers – including some men – openly favored girls, telling us that "life isn't fair" when we boys complained about having to get in the back of the line and receive goodies last simply because we were boys. Of course, there were good teachers as well, both men and women, and I was fortunate to be in a high-quality elementary school, so I can only imagine how bad it might have been without the level of quality control my school employed.

Feminists believed that sexism began in childood, so they worked hard to enact abusive policies to "fix" boys. One of the main tenets of feminism, still held to be gospel by disgusting, totalitarian organizations such as NOMAS and sleazy academic hustlers like Michael Kimmel, is that there's something wrong with men and they need to be "fixed." So for years boys were forced to go through reprogramming to purify them of their patriarchal stain. They were encouraged to play with dolls, be passive and adopt a sexually ambiguous demeanor, while the natural expressions of masculinity that characterize boys everywhere were ruthlessly suppressed by frowning matrons.

Although this effort was far from a resounding success, the effects have been profound. Among men of my generation (roughly genXers), there is a dysfunctional sense of masculinity that manifests itself in passive aggressive social behavior and an identification with the politics and culture of self-hatred. If older men want to know why young men often don't behave like "proper men," well, it's because too many older men dropped the ball and left little boys in the hands of bitter, sadistic, man-hating feminists. I am convinced that the aversion to being forthright and honest, which manifests itself in popular culture through snark and hipster irony and in politics through PC doublethink, is a result of so many men having spent many of their formative years being punished simply for being boys.

Fortunately, some voices are being raised against this practice, which is essentially child abuse, and the informal ban on challenging feminist orthodoxy in the schoolroom appears to be faltering.

In an article in Live Science titled "Battling the Boys: Educators Grapple with Violent Play," psychologist Michael Thompson, co-author of "Raising Cain: Protecting the Emotional Life of Boys," dismisses the idea that boys' play is even violent at all, and makes the obvious but often overlooked point that when people are not actually getting hurt by play it's absurd to call it violent, saying:

> There is no such thing as violent play. Violence and aggression are intended to hurt somebody. Play is not intended to hurt somebody. Play, rougher in its themes and rougher physically, is a feature of boyhood in every society on Earth.

Some teachers are beginning to listen to people like Thompson, and are rolling back restrictions on the games boys naturally come up with. But it's difficult to fight old prejudices against male behavior, in large part because kindergarten and preschool teachers are overwhelmingly female, with a paltry 2.2% being male, and feminism tends to be a dominant ideology in such environments.

Unfortunately, a lot of the female teachers have a difficult time understanding that the games boys make up are nothing more than normal play, and try to get boys to "create compromises" and "listen to each other" as an alternative. It's hard to imagine a less effective approach to boys' education than this effort, which amounts to encouraging them to be little girls.

Boys like to play games in which there are "bad guys," such as cops and robbers, cowboys and Indians, etc. For some reason, female teachers seem constitutionally unable to understand that this is an entirely natural expression of the male competitive/problem-solving instinct, and they often insist on squelching "bad guy" games. One teacher betrays her severely limited comprehension of the masculine mind by attempting to explain bad guy play as a sort of inner struggle, saying "These bad guys give them a way to externalize that part of them that they are trying to conquer."

I don't think she could be any more wrong. "Bad guys" are simply representative of an external challenge and the masculine method for dealing with it. As adult males, our "bad guys" with which we do battle are the challenges and struggles of life and work. For me the "bad guy" might be a buggy bit of code that is crashing a website. For an engineer, it might be a particularly troublesome engine component. For a firefighter it's a tenacious blaze. One could go on and on, but the point is that it's healthy and good for boys to engage in this kind of play, because it is an exercise in the masculine form of problem solving, which has turned out to be very, very effective.

When you think about how clueless these female teachers are around boys, it's pretty sobering. Some of them have been teaching boys for decades and still don't get it. Although it's nice to see that some people are questioning the conventional feminist wisdom as it pertains to education, I'm not sure significant progress can be made as long as women have such overwhelming authority over boys. It may be that an overabundance of mothering and minding of boys by females is the biggest threat to boys of all. But if that's the case, men have to take some responsibility and step up to the plate themselves: if we turn a blind eye while feminists meddle with our boys, it's as much our fault as anyone's if they come out with a warped sense of masculinity.

Comment Rating

A couple commenters suggested I install a comment rating system, so now we have one. It might take a bit of tweaking to figure out where to set the cutoffs and such, so I'll keep an eye on how it's working out for a few days. This is something I've been considering for a while, because it allows readers to help out with moderation, which I definitely would welcome. This might actually allow me to entirely turn off moderation on the main site, but I don't want to jump the gun so let's consider this a testing period.

I had to rejigger the code a bit to make it work, but it's a surprisingly simple program, and seems to be pretty fast. WordPress definitely has its advantages. However, it seems there might be a bit of an issue with anonymous posting, and if that's the case I might have to require people to post with a name/handle.

TechCrunch: Tech Companies Can't Do Enough to Promote Women

Welmer · 30 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for TechCrunch, senior editor Michael Arrington exposes just what lengths tech companies go to in an effort to promote women, and how it's never enough for critics. Mediaite editor Rachel Sklar was recently quoted in the Wall Street Journal slamming TechCrunch for its "overwhelming maleness," and that proved to be the last straw for Arrington, who wrote, in exasperation, that it's time to stop blaming men for the dearth of women in tech.

Arrington's article is scandalous, not so much for its repudiation of another annoying feminist "editor," but because it is so brutally honest about the favoritism women get in the tech world. He admits that he's never been honest about how he feels before, and that he would dodge uncomfortable questions concerning the real reason there are so few women in tech startups.

> For the most part I've sat on the sidelines over the years during the endless debates about how we need to do more to encourage more women to start companies. What I mean by "sat on the sidelines" is this – until today I haven't really said what I felt.
> Every damn time we have a conference we fret over how we can find women to fill speaking slots. We ask our friends and contacts for suggestions. We beg women to come and speak. Where do we end up? With about 10% of our speakers as women.
> I'm going to tell it like it is. And what it is is this: statistically speaking women have a huge advantage as entrepreneurs, because the press is dying to write about them, and venture capitalists are dying to fund them. Just so no one will point the accusing finger of discrimination at them.
> That WSJ article also criticizes Y Combinator for having just 14 female founders out of their 208 startups to date. But I know that Y Combinator wants – really, really wants – female founders and that there just aren't very many of them. I know this because Y Combinator cofounder Jessica Livingston has told me how excited they are to get applications from women, and that they want to do everything they can to get more female applicants. What they probably won't admit, but I suspect is true anyway, is that the rate of acceptance for female applicants is far higher than for male applicants.
> The problem isn't that Silicon Valley is keeping women down, or not doing enough to encourage female entrepreneurs. The opposite is true. No, the problem is that not enough women want to become entrepreneurs.

So there you have it. Women are given huge incentives and support, favored, celebrated and praised to high heaven for any efforts in tech, but it still isn't enough to address the disparity. Men, who are overwhelmingly the innovators and drivers of technology, are second-class citizens when it comes to venture capital funding and press coverage because "diversity" has become almost as important as profit.

This must introduce a great deal of inefficiency to venture capital. How many bombs were funded only because they were proposed by women? How many men with good ideas were passed over so that an investor could pad their diversity cred with females?

The contemporary reality in tech and other fields that are traditionally male is that women are treated like rock stars simply for being competent. Men fall over themselves to promote women, treating men as less-than-ideal in the process. A mediocre female is worth more than a talented, but not outstanding male. And still women – who have it much, much easier than men – endlessly complain, even blaming the very men who go to such great lengths to promote them.

It’s good to see a man finally speak out, but Arrington’s frustration comes more from being offended over having his sincere, strenuous efforts to promote women ignored and his publication trashed by a spoiled, bratty feminist. He’s upset for the same reason Jon Stewart was after being called sexist by Jezebel: he’s appalled by the ingratitude despite his best efforts. Well, fellas, get used to it, because American women, particularly of the feminist variety, are not known for gratitude. Their theme song might as well be “What have you done for me lately?” repeated over and over ad nauseum.

Salon: Abuse of Boys in Afghanistan a Feminist Issue

Welmer · 31 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a deeply cynical ploy by feminist Tracy Clark-Flory, the endemic abuse of boys and use of male prostitutes in Afghanistan is being portrayed as a result of women's oppression in this recent Salon piece. Although it is doubtless that Islam may play some role – in the context of Afghan culture – in the practice of "bacha-baz," the idea that feminism is the solution to the abusive treatment of boys is either the result of deeply held ignorance or deliberate dishonesty. Male prostitution and pederasty have been a problem in the area for at least a couple hundred years, and probably far longer. Famed 19th century British explorer and secret agent Richard Francis Burton was tasked with investigating a male brothel in what is now Pakistan at one point, and wrote extensively about the practice, which led to spurious accusations that he was an avid participant himself.

Back in those days radical Islam was not a feature of the region, and female prostitution abounded as well. Ironically, in the 19th century the West was sexually far more "repressive" than many Islamic countries, in which all sorts of prostitution and debauchery flourished virtually in plain view. The fundamentalist Wahhabis – who went on to conquer Saudi Arabia and reintroduce militant Islam – were a very new movement at the time, and stood in stark contrast to most other Islamic societies, which were in full civilizational decay, much as the West is now.

In this context, one could easily purchase a boy, a girl, or possibly even livestock for sexual purposes. Virtually nothing was sacred, and male-on-male rape was considered a sport and made light of, as it is in our contemporary culture, where people think it clever to make jokes about prison rape.

Since that time much has changed, but Afghanistan is notoriously backward and resistant to change, so the practice has persisted despite reforms in the Islamic world. However – and this is very important where Clark-Flory's article is concerned – the fundamentalist Muslim Taliban have made it a priority to stamp out bacha baz. It is not in the strictly fundamentalist parts of Afghanistan where the women are veiled and kept out of school that bacha-baz is practiced; it is found primarily in the north where the ethnic groups who are allied with NATO have control. Fundamentalist Islam is not so much a characteristic of Afghan culture as tribalism, but it has made inroads thanks to Arab fanatics filled with a missionary zeal and a desire to fight what they see as the godless "North," which includes Russia along with what we call "The West."

Furthermore, if we are to take an example closer to home, we could shine a light on the problem of pederasty in the Roman Catholic Church in the late 20th century — during which time liberal ideologies, including feminism, gained the upper hand in seminaries and parishes across the US, and then even Europe itself. The relaxation of tradition and the rise of feminist ideology in the Catholic Church occurred at the exact same time that the epidemic of pederasty did, which suggests a correlation between the two. So no, it is not "the patriarchy" that is raping boys. In fact, many of the rapist priests were notoriously "progressive" in their views and feted by wealthy liberals, some of whom doubtless were aware of their proclivities.

Unfortunately, most people are not all that well-informed, and may be susceptible to appeals to human decency. This is how feminism has gained so much ground: by usurping moral issues and proposing feminist policies as the solution. Even conservatives have fallen for these tactics, passing hardcore feminist legislation and enabling feminist radicals because they never took the time to study and get to the root of problems, preferring instead to blindly react to social problems with heavy-handed, ill-considered measures.

It is important that we keep an eye on feminist arguments to prevent them from making appeals to our sense of decency in an effort to fool us into giving them even more power and influence than they already have. As we know well, the situation has not improved for boys since the advent of feminism, and eliminating abuses such as pederasty are best achieved not by giving women more privileges, but by caring about the humanity of boys, which is not even remotely part of the feminist agenda.

The Raters Have Spoken, and the Winner is... “Anonymous”

W.F. Price · 31 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The new comment rating system has given me an idea. I’d like to feature the most highly rated comment per week. Had I not agreed with yesterday’s results, I’m not so sure I’d be quite so enthusiastic about the idea, but readers picked out a real gem — and, quite surprisingly, one written by a woman. I might even be tempted to feature a “worst comment of the week” as well, but unfortunately the bad ones tend to be lacking not only in terms of logic and ideas, but readability as well. However, if I find one that could provide some entertainment, I’ll include a “worst comment” along with the Comment of the Week.

I know that a fair number of readers – probably a majority – do not actually see the comments, reading most of the articles on RSS, so I think it’s a good idea to bring the outstanding ones to their attention from time to time. And the following comment is certainly a good one. It is funny, honest and impassioned, and I thought it would be perfect for kicking off the new feature.

So The Spearhead presents the first in what we hope will be a long tradition:

Comment of the Week, by “Anonymous”

The reason that there are so few good women in tech is that women are not wired to be technical: everything needs to relate to emotions, intuition, creative arts, etc. In addition, the average woman is not committed to a career; rather, she is committed to “self-fullfillment,” which is a selfish, rather than a group or technical goal.

Harvard President Dr. Lawrence Summers summed it up much more cogently than I can: “It is a fact about our society that [there] is a level of commitment [to a scientific career] that a much higher fraction of married men have been historically prepared to make than of married women.” His remarks about the difference in technical intelligence have been widely discussed, so I will not quote them here.

So the women that feminatzis continue to describe as “smart, independent, and feisty,” are neither smart enough, independent enough, nor feisty enough to make it in a technical/scientific career. Those that try are so committed to special treatment that their contribution to the group is less than zero, as considerable resources are wasted trying to bring them up to speed and covering their asses when they fail. And they do fail. And HR, typically a rats’ nets of women, will let me know that “You’re not trying hard enough to promote women.” Ironic, since I am a woman that came up before the entitlement process began.

I have had some half dozen very good women engineers who reported to me over that past 20 years. They were ALL from the pre-entitlement era. The post-entitlement twits were all worthless – ALL WORTHLESS. It will be a cold day in hell that I hire another woman for my group. If I am forced by the harpies in HR to take on a woman engineer, I am old enough to be able to say “I quit” and go semi-retired to do my own thing.

(ps: No, I’m not a dyke. I have been together with a very fine manly-man for over 30 years.)

Rape Accusation Used to Silence Wikileaks?

W.F. Price · 1 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Wikileaks founder Julian Assange, an Australian national, was recently accused of rape by a couple of Swedish women after he met them following a seminar in Stockholm on August 14th. The women accused him jointly, six days after the event. It is not clear whether they are alleging that he raped both of them at once, or raped one after the other in quick succession.

Assange is an eccentric autodidact who has studied a broad range of scientific subjects and been involved in hacking and programming since his teens. Raised in a chaotic environment by a single mother who kidnapped him and his half-brother, taking them into hiding to avoid her ex-husbands, he left home at 16 and soon began making a living programming.

Wikileaks, which was founded in 2006, has released enormous amounts of classified data from various government agencies, which has made some people very angry. Recently, classified US military reports and videos, including the graphic video of a couple Apache helicopters blowing a Reuters camera crew to bits with 30mm chain guns, were sent to Wikileaks by private Bradley Manning, an intelligence analyst based in Iraq, causing a major uproar and leading to Manning's arrest. Since the fallout from that, Assange has avoided setting foot in the US and applied for residence in Sweden, where he would like Wikileaks to receive legal protection from the Swedish government.

If his accusers are telling the truth, the skinny, 39-year-old Australian computer nerd decided to rape two women at once while seeking something akin to asylum from Sweden.

However, recent reports of Swedish women accusing men of rape for money have been popping up in the news. Rape shield laws make it all the easier for women to falsely accuse men of rape without any repercussions, because their identities become a state secret, which is highly ironic considering Wikileaks' mission to expose government secrets. The shield laws severely limit any investigation of accusers, which suggests that it would be a safe and simple matter to pay women to make such an accusation. Add to that the fact that women are almost never prosecuted for making false rape accusations, and this is a recipe for abuse.

This is a murky case, and the details are still very sketchy. Something about it stinks, and if the accusations are spurious, perhaps Wikileaks will be motivated to expose government documents pertaining to ripping off non-custodial fathers, deals to coerce men into signing away custody of their children through false allegations, and other abuses introduced by feminist law.

The Problem With Gay Rights

Paul Elam · 1 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

From A Voice For Men

If you have spent any real amount of time reading the articles, and in particular the comments in men's movement forums, then you are aware of an often anti-homosexual attitude that has been prevalent for quite some time.

On a political level, some of the resentment is understandable. Gay activists have aligned themselves with feminists, and, while marching in misandric lockstep, have draped themselves in victim couture and made their grab for special government considerations. The resultant draconian intrusions and bullying on behalf of gays and other special interest groups is a core issue in the men's movement, and for good reason.

Heterosexual males are the societal default for the role of perpetrator and are subsequently the identified enemy for whatever victims du jour have the stage at the moment. Just more misandry in a culture that seems to run on it these days.

But while the politics of this may have helped structure a façade of improvement for gay men, it has actually revealed something about their political agenda that becomes more apparent with each public campaign.

They have no idea who their real enemies are. No, not a freaking clue. And that ignorance sets up them up to lose more rights than they could ever hope to gain.

Allow me to digress for a moment to make a statement about gay men in general.

Gay men have invented new technology, built cities, researched cures for disease, made profound contributions to the arts, literature and philosophy, excelled at athletics and participated wholly in every aspect of the development of civilization as we know it.

But of course, they did not do these things because they were gay. They did these things because they were men. Solving problems and making advances is what men do, and there is no evidence to suggest that gay men are any less proficient at it than straight men.

And therein, in my opinion, lies the problem. We live in a culture that doesn't regard gay men as men. So, it would stand to reason that a movement of social awareness and enlightenment, proffering that men who are gay are no less men than men who are straight, would have been in order. And it would have served a purpose not dissimilar from what we see in the men's movement today- to wit, that holding men to standards and expectations based on sex, while relieving women of their corresponding expectations, has led directly to their systematic, conscripted misuse as human beings.

By embracing feminist ideology and misandry, gay men only buy into the myth that they are not, and shouldn't be, men. And by allowing themselves to be co opted by a group of ideologues that hate men to the core, they have only further undermined solutions to their very real problems.

And this leaves us with what we see in the "gay rights" movement today- a dissonant ideology that is designed to attack the very nature of who they are. For in the end, whether you are an avowed deconstructionist of traditional masculinity, or an equally fervent traditionalist that thinks real men sit tall in the saddle and lay their coats in the mud for women to walk on, gay men will remain what they are- men. And to whatever extent they seek to include themselves in the "rights" of men in the modern Zeitgeist, they will invariably suffer the consequences for that pursuit.

The two current hot spot examples of this are gay marriage and military service. Roughly speaking, the activism that seeks to include gay men in these realms is, in reality, placing them directly in the crosshairs of corrupt family courts, and on the battlefield, where they can join straight men in being used as the cannon fodder of choice for hegemonic corporatism.

Let's dig a little deeper into both of these gay "causes" and try to understand what they really mean.

To be sure, gays have been targeted for exclusion from legally sanctioned matrimony. And with that has come exclusions from some of the legal advantages we place on marriage. There are will and property considerations, hospital visitation, tax breaks and a number of other things largely bestowed on legally married couples. By refusing gays the right to get married, we are also refusing them many other rights taken for granted by the rest of the population.

Were things that simple, this would be a no brainer. But, as we often see when it comes to the law, things are not near that simple. And the more we examine the realities on the ground we find that a legal marriage is not a pathway to expanded rights, but a direct route to allowing state functionaries to eviscerate personal freedoms.

Also, and I don't think this can be understated, pushing for legal recognition of gay marriage is a de facto endorsement of statist culture; a capitulation to recognizing the state, not the individual, as the ultimate authority over human relationships.

Depending on the government to legitimize your commitments is the same thing, literally, as giving the government control over them. And when the honeymoon is over -and over it will be- no one will be saved from family court by their politics, or their sexual orientation.

When newspaper stories cover gay weddings, they always run them with accompanying pictures of the happy couple(s), and some not so thinly disguised commentary about people finally realizing dreams, of being included in "normal" society. What those newspapers won't do is run follow up stories, complete with pictures of dueling attorneys, confiscated property, false allegations, ex parte restraining orders, garnished wages and jail cells for those that don't comply.

These are the results of the state sanctioned marriages in which gays are fighting so hard to be included.

I don't fault anyone for demanding their fair share of misery, but as long as we are talking rights, we should also include those that are lost to this "sacred" institution.

It would seem sensible that since marriage, at least in western culture, is a religious institution, that men -all men- push for taking it out of the hands of government completely. Religious institutions would be able to marry whomever they please, which would ensure the rights of almost anyone to marry- and to suffer for it down the road.

But much better that suffering be a simple artifact of broken dreams than the for-profit destruction of lives routinely inflicted by family courts.

Family courts are a war zone, but they are nothing compared to the real thing.

In the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the total count for American dead and wounded is 43,459. This number does not include the 16+ war veterans who kill themselves each and every day. 98%+ of these dead and wounded are men, by design.

Selective service is a boys club. Straight or gay, you are required to register or face time in jail. It is only women who are exempt. And if there were ever a draft again, it would be men and only men conscripted, with or without their consent.

We do have a draft of sorts, by the way. It is conveniently called "stop loss," and forcibly extends the time on active duty when fresh meat is needed on the battlefield. In fairness, female soldiers too are subject to stop loss measures, but they still enjoy the militaries strenuous efforts to keep them out of harms way at the expense of the men. By the sex distribution of combat deaths, they are incredibly successful at it.

And for what? Oil profits? Imperialism? If we have ever had a war in defense of this country, rather than just a defense of our corporate interests, it has not been in a long, long time. Likely not in the average man's lifetime.

All these wars are waged by an extreme minority of wealthy men, and paid for with the en masse suffering and death of much poorer ones.

Should gay men be allowed to serve in the military? Sure, and of course many do, if not openly. But again, as a political objective that purports to move a class of human beings toward more equal treatment under the law, the whole idea is a total fail.

In war, the discrimination is against men, from the induction center to Flanders Field. Seeking inclusion in it may well be a human right, but it will ultimately be at the expense of the same. Such is often revealed when taking more than a cursory glance at complicated matters.

This reminds me of a story I read some years ago that ran in The Houston Press, a local political and entertainment rag for the Houston Area. The story was about a gay man who was being repeatedly beaten by his boyfriend. He tried at several local agencies to get help, but was more or less laughed out of all of them. The Press wrote the story with the angle that he was discriminated against because he was gay. Having worked in a field that often referred victims of domestic abuse to support organizations, I knew better. I wrote The Press and informed them that the man was discriminated against because he was male, not because he was gay. There were simply no services for men, but plenty for women, including lesbians, who received help regularly.

They never published the letter.

It's abundantly clear that they didn't want to acknowledge the truth, even if the truth meant that men like the one in their story would eventually find some help when needing it.

Once again, gender politics took precedence over all, and the real reasons for this persons, this man's struggle, were hidden from public view.

And this is where the men's movement, if it heads in the right direction (my opinion of course), will make a decided difference. And when I look at the emerging mentality of the movement, I feel like we will get there.

The men's movement, or at least a growing part of it, is about casting off all sense of expectation and obligation based solely on our sex. It is a fitting and appropriate response in a world where women are taught they are bound by nothing and can rightly choose whatever path they want in life. And it seems perfectly consistent that the unshackling of those expectations would include sexual orientation as much as it would anything else.

Coincidentally, I see growth in two areas familiar to this particular article. Men are learning to say no to marriage and to being designated bullet catchers for a small group of avaricious bastards. We are learning to tell the world around us that no one will be allowed to shame us as men, nor will they be allowed to instruct us on what a man is.

And when we learn this lesson well enough, it will provide fertile ground to allow us to see the real resentments that fester against gay men- which boil down to one inescapable fact:

Gay men are and always have been resented because they provide no utility to women. They are literally born free of the constraining and egregiously burdensome expectations that heterosexual men are still raised to fulfill.

They are, in fact, the natural recipients of what many men in the men's movement clamor for every day- freedom from the control of women and from the control of the state on women's behalf.

It is my hope that this movement comes to invite and include gay men within the ranks, not as gays, but as men. But I fear that this will take some real time; time for the very few within our ranks that actually hate gays for being gay to either wise up or leave, and time for many gays to wake up and understand that ideologies, like feminism, based on hating men, will only produce self hatred, and worse.

Right now the agenda for feminists includes sending men to the altar, and ultimately family courts, and to the combat zone.

Men should work together to avoid both.

Young Women Now Paid More than Young Men, Feminists Cheer Wage Supremacy

Welmer · 1 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Belinda Luscomb, writing for feminist mouthpiece Time Magazine, exposes the fact that young women make more than young men in virtually all big cities in the United States.

The triumphalism so clearly on display in the article shows the feminist claim that all they want is “equality” for the bald-faced lie that it is. No, they want supremacy, and they have demonstrated time and again that they will use the state to achieve it. In fact, it is through government interference that young women have gained the upper hand over men. Not only do public schools favor female learning styles, guaranteeing that there will be more women in college than men, affirmative action and mandated “equality” grants and government contracting rules ensure that women are well-represented in highly-paid jobs that were previously majority male. In the meanwhile, predominantly male jobs that women do not care for are eliminated or have seen wages depressed by an influx of illegal labor, aided and abetted by government negligence. Additionally, private sector pay has declined or stagnated while public sector pay has gone on to all-time highs as women come to dominate the taxpayer-funded jobs.

Essentially, the US has a two-tier system of socialism for female employees and unregulated capitalism for men, putting male employees at a huge disadvantage. The question this raises is where will the money to keep this system operating come from as men are squeezed into poverty and can no longer afford the onerous tax burden that places women in a position of supremacy?

Lesbian Battering: The Sisterhood Turns on Itself

Featured Guest · 2 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

A series of high-profile cases of lesbian-perpetrated domestic violence has sent shock-waves through Massachusetts communities in recent months:

1. On February 16, a Suffolk Superior Court jury convicted Nicole Chuminski on two counts of second-degree murder, following a fire that killed the two daughters of her lover Anna Reisopoulos. During a heated argument between the two, Chuminski reportedly fell into a fit of rage. A few hours later Chuminski returned to her partner's apartment and hurled an acetone-laden firebomb into the front door.

Sophia and Acia, ages 2 and 14, were burned beyond recognition, so dental records were needed for positive identification.

2. On March 29 Annamarie Rintala of Granby, Mass. was found dead by strangulation in the basement of the house she shared with her domestic partner Cara. Cara had been previously charged with domestic violence after she struck Annamarie in the back of the head with a closed fist.

3. Eunice Field of Brockton, Mass. found herself on the losing end of a bitter ménage à trois. So on August 9 she marched to the apartment of Lorraine Wachsman. There she grabbed a serrated knife and stabbed Wachsman in the back and neck. Dispelling any doubt about her intentions, she then penned a note admitting she had killed Waschsman "for taking away the love of my life."

Ms. Field is now being held without bail pending a September 3 court appearance.

Experts on lesbian domestic violence were shocked, but honestly not surprised by these incidents. Last November a report by the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs reported a 125% increase in domestic violence fatalities in lesbian and gay couples around the country during the prior year. According to Beth Leventhal of The Network/La Red of Boston, "partner abuse in LGBT communities can be just as lethal as that in heterosexual communities."

Ms. Leventhal's commentary actually understates the extent of the problem. Earlier this year the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research published the results of a survey of over 51,000 California adults:http://www.healthpolicy.ucla.edu/pubs/files/IPV_PB_031810.pdf . The UCLA study found 28% of persons in lesbian/gay relationships had experienced intimate partner violence, compared to 17% of persons in heterosexual relationships.

It's also believed that lesbians are more likely to engage in partner violence than gay men. According to the Boston Gay Men's Domestic Violence Project, one in three homosexual women experience partner aggression, compared to only one in four homosexual men. Kaitlin Nichols of The Network/La Red notes, "The myth of women's communities as safe communities has prevented many women from reaching out for support. If they have shared what is happening, they are met with disbelief from their community."

And why are lesbians more likely to abuse?

According to Nomi Porat, an abuse-prevention expert, the reason is poor limit-setting: "An issue common to women, particularly battered women, is the fear of demanding physical and emotional boundaries. In part, battered lesbians are afraid their lovers will leave or become more violent if any limitations are set in the relationship."

A nearly impenetrable double wall serves to keep lesbian battering tucked away in the proverbial closet. The first wall is the stigmatization invoked by lesbians themselves who believe in a sort of same-sex utopia, the feminist belief that maintains female-female relationships are inherently more peaceful, gentle, and "pure," compared to male-female relationships.

In Naming the Violence: Speaking out About Lesbian Battering, Barbara Hart maintains that female batterers should be subjected to a form of shunning by the lesbian community: “one of the consequences of [female batterers’] violence is that they may have to limit any contact with the person they assaulted/abused. This may mean that the batterer cannot attend public gatherings or movement meetings.”

The second wall is the broader domestic violence industry that maintains a cult-like belief in the notion of patriarchal sexism, the theory that men abuse their wives due to an innate and irrepressible urge to oppress women. So every time a woman pummels, rapes, or otherwise abuses her female partner, the patriarchal dominance theory takes a body-blow.

These ideological blinders serve to justify shelter policies that turn away needy women. According to the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs, the problem of abuse shelters that discriminate on the basis of gender identity is widespread.

Intimate partner aggression is not a problem limited to any particular sex, or gender identity, or economic group. Indeed, research shows women are at least as likely as men to engage in partner abuse.

When the Sisterhood gets over its denial of the obvious truth, we’ll stop seeing so many women and men victimized by domestic violence.

There is No Sexual Double-Standard

Hawaiian Libertarian · 2 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A female reader was apparently looking through the Spearhead archives, and came across my book review for The Garbage Generation. She e-mailed me the following:

I have read part of the book and a lot of the book I agreed with. I just want this question answered by another man. Why is there a double standard? No matter what it takes two to tango.

If you agreed with a lot of the book, you really shouldn't be even asking this question, because one of the basic premises of Dr. Amnues' seminal work, is based on defining what comprised the original marriage contract between men and women. What men bring to the table and what women bring to the table in what we now refer to as the institution of Marriage 1.0, were two different assets to be exchanged for the mutual benefit of the children created by their union.

Men's primary marital asset was their resources and ability to labor to acquire more resources, to support the family. Men with lesser means or abilities to provide were (and usually still are) viewed as less desirable marriage material, regardless of his sexual history.

Women's primary martial asset was their guarantee to their husbands that children born of their union where his. Women with an openly promiscuous past are viewed as less desirable marriage material because of the greater chances of cuckoldry and infidelity, regardless of her ability to be a provider.

It's not that there is a double standard, it's just that there is two different standards: one for men, one for women – and the standards for each are simply based on what they each brought to the table by virtue of the formerly accepted and widely understood division of labor, which was based on gender. This was the essential paradigm of the institution we now refer to as marriage 1.0.

There cannot be this so-called sexual double-standard, because men's contribution to the nuclear family unit was his capacity to be a provider, not his sexual purity. A woman could find a willing virgin who has no provider capacity to marry her…but her own hypergamous instincts would cause her to view him as less than adequate in terms of marriage material, his sexual purity notwithstanding.

Women complaining about this mythical double-standard, would be the equivalent to men complaining that more marriages should have the women be the providers while the men stay home, keep house and raise the kids.

Granted, such arrangements do occur nowadays…but for the most part, men & women both tend to look down on the men as somewhat less than masculine for doing so — hence the phrase "kitchen bitches" — just as women nowadays are free to be as promiscuous as the alpha males they wish to emulate…it's just that most people will still regard them as sluts, no matter how bitterly they complain about this so-called "double-standard."

This "double-standard" really only exists in the brainwashed minds of feminists and manginas alike.

Women who are caught up in obsessing over this so-called sexual "double-standard" are simply falling for the lies and propaganda promoted by the feminist kultural kommisars of our Brave New World Order, and reinforcing the memes that have contributed to the travesty we now know of as marriage 2.0.

No, the real double-standard that actually exists today, is the entire family court/divorce industry that enforces a system for which women have the right to withdraw their reproductive capacity and their nurturing and care giving – but men are not allowed to withdraw their provider role. In fact, they are explicitly prevented from doing that by the power of the Government and threatened with fines, imprisonment, loss of passports, professional practice and driving licenses, a permanent criminal record, and other sanctions our feminist-run Government has put into place to legalize this very real double-standard.

In other words, the only real double-standard that is in effect today in our declining civilization, is the one in which Women have no obligation or social pressure to live up to their marital vows, while men are forced to, even when the marriage is over.

My inquiring e-mailer thought she was making some kind of irrefutable point with her quip, “No matter what, it takes two to tango.” She misses the real double-standard here: it takes two to get married, but only one — which is usually instigated by the woman – to get divorced.

Gloria Steinem and Friends Launch Shaming Campaign

W.F. Price · 3 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A new media pressure group called "Name It.Change It." has gone online with the mission to stomp out forms of speech that feminists disagree with. Sponsored by Gloria Steinem's Women's Media Center, the group features a large, interactive "Pyramid of Egregiousness" that categorizes sexist statements according to severity. The pyramid appears to be based on the USDA food guide pyramid, with the really juicy words, including "slut," "cougar," and "feminazi" being the chocolate mousse of sexism, less obvious words such as "PMS" and "nagging" the roast beef, and banal, potentially sexist words like "temperamental" and "high maintenance" the oatmeal version of misogyny.

Although I find the categorizations rather arbitrary, I tend to agree that one should use the heaviest, most larded words sparingly when referring to feminists, as overindulgence might lead to a red-faced, flabby, atherosclerotic rant as opposed to a lean, efficient refutation of feminist dogma.

However, in a "Statement on Equality," Steinem takes it a step farther, providing a proscriptive treatise aimed directly at those in media. Like a grade school teacher, or, more menacingly, a commissar, she lays out the correct manner in which to speak:

> The most workable definition of equality for journalists is reversibility. Don't mention her young children unless you would also mention his, or describe her clothes unless you would describe his, or say she's shrill or attractive unless the same adjectives would be applied to a man. Don't say she's had facial surgery unless you say he dyes his hair or has hair plugs. Don't say she's just out of graduate school but he's a rising star. Don't say she has no professional training but he worked his way up. Don't ask her if she's running as a women's candidate unless you ask him if he's running as a men's candidate; ask both about the gender gap, the women's vote.

Clearly media people had better listen; if they break the rules the equality police will come after them…

The group absurdly claims that the media is oppressing women, and cherry-picks a few statements made by political commentators to create a video, featured on the home page, in which a couple floppy-haired manginas and an equine feminist (see, Gloria, I used "reversibility") parody sexism in the media:

I wonder where they find these guys.

It remains to be seen whether these heavy handed and offensive tactics (e.g. graphically describing torrential menstruation) will have the desired effect, but if grassroots media is any indication NameIt.Change It. will be fighting an uphill battle. Widespread revulsion for feminism and what it has done is leading to more – not less – openness on the airwaves, and even on television. Although those at the very top of the media hierarchy will likely go along with the drive to censor speech, they are increasingly losing control of the national dialogue.

Domestic Violence Fairytales Threaten Constitutional Protections

Featured Guest · 4 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Kristin Ruggiero of New Hampshire figured it would be a slam-dunk. The gambit worked like a charm during the divorce hearing, now she would bring the case to criminal court.

Her husband Jeffrey, an officer in the U.S. Coast Guard, was an incorrigible batterer, at least that's what she led to the judge to believe. That got him convicted of criminal threatening, and she won custody of their 7-year-old daughter.

But Kristin Ruggiero wasn't finished.

So one day the woman bragged to her startled ex, "I took all your money, I took your daughter, and now I'm going to take your career." She went out and purchased a disposable cell phone and registered it in the name of Jeffrey. She then sent herself a passel of threatening text messages.

Apparently Kristin didn't realize that in criminal court, allegations are subjected to a higher standard of proof. And all of a sudden the nefarious scheme to frame her ex-husband came crashing down.

Last week Kristin Ruggiero was convicted on 12 counts of falsifying physical evidence and sentenced to 7-14 years in prison.

This tale is not so much about a distraught woman sorely in need of psychological help. Rather, it's a story of a police department, a prosecutor, and a judge that allowed themselves to be duped by a conniving perjurer. And it's about a criminal justice system that has all but abandoned due process in a frenzied attempt to curb domestic violence.

Like everything in the law, the problem begins with definitions. The Violence Against Women Act, passed during the first term of the Clinton Administration, includes a definition of domestic violence that is so wide you could drive a Mack truck through it.

States picked up on the loophole, and now most states include within their definitions of abuse, actions like making your partner "annoyed" or "distressed".

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control likewise followed suit. The CDC's Uniform Definitions and Recommended Data Elements declares that partner violence includes "Getting annoyed if the victim disagrees," "Withholding information from the victim," and even "Disregarding what the victim wants."

Note the CDC's repeated use of the word "victim." In VAWA-speak, a victim does not need to be a prostrate body lying in a pool of blood. Rather, a mere accusation elevates you to the status of victim. No proof of violence necessary. Recall the Queen of Hearts' disdainful remark, "Sentence first, verdict afterwards."

Fanciful definitions are just the beginning.

Favored with $1 billion in federal largesse each year, our nation's domestic violence industry has created an alternate-reality legal system that would confound even the likes of Alice.

Our Looking Glass criminal justice system features judges who have been educated to always "err on the side of caution;" victim advocates who coach putative victims how to embellish their claims; and free legal help to accusers (but not defendants).

And for readers with a well-honed sense of fairy-tale humor, mandatory prosecution policies epitomize a legal system run amok. Often the "victim" decides she has taught her boyfriend enough of a lesson and recants her story. But zealous prosecutors have taken to jailing these women until they agree to cooperate. That draconian practice allowed a California woman to secure a $125,000 false arrest award a few years ago.

Such strong-arm practices have not escaped the attention of civil rights groups. The Washington Civil Rights Council has described our current domestic violence system as creating the “biggest civil rights roll-back since the Jim Crow era.”

Last year the Connecticut chapter of the ACLU took on the case of Fernando A., a man who had been falsely accused of throwing his wife down a flight of stairs. When a judge then deprived him of the right to a hearing to decide whether to remove his children, the ACLU took the case to the state’s Supreme Court. Fernando A. won on a 5-2 decision.

Earlier this year Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, a Washington DC-based victim advocacy organization, released a report titled “How Domestic Violence Laws Curtail our Fundamental Freedoms” . The report concludes that each year, over two million Americans have their fundamental civil liberties over-ruled by the Violence Against Women Act.

Consider the Constitutional guarantees of due process, probable-cause for arrest, right to a fair trial, and equal treatment under the law – all are cast aside by get-tough-on-crime domestic violence laws.

The tall irony is that Vice President Joe Biden, who proudly championed VAWA when he was a senator in the early 1990s, is a former professor of constitutional law.

No, I Will Not Molest Your Kids

My uncle Sid turned 80 the other day. He's a pretty tough old guy, so it didn't surprise me that he made it such a good age (though I think it surprised him). Naturally, a celebration was in order, so his wife Betty organised a birthday bash for their extended family. Betty is actually my Grandad's sister, so although I knew a bunch of people at the party, there were a fair few I had never met before.

When you have a party with a large number of related people, you expect there to be a few kids present. People get married and have kids with a certain regularity so there always seem to be a few running around at these kinds of parties. This time was no exception. Among the guests were a few of my cousins (aged 11 and 12), my second cousins (aged 11, 14 and 15) and two younger children, Dylan and Maggie (aged 2 and 5 respectively). Since I'm the youngest legal adult in our extended family who actually shows up to these kinds of events, it's usually expected that I'll look after any of the kids who are present. It's kind of an unspoken agreement between my relatives and I. Some people might resent that, but I enjoy it because I love being around kids.

Ugh, who would want to be around other people's horrible snot-nosed brats all the time?

I would, actually. Part of it comes from the fact that I have a fairly unique problem; kids adore me. Seriously. I have no idea why, but usually no more than half an hour after meeting me, they're following me around like they've known me forever. My Mum sometimes jokes that "Solaris is doing his Pied Piper impression again", which she finds hilarious. I don't have any children of my own, but I really fail to understand how some people can dislike kids so much. I admit some behave like little horrors, but it's always seemed to me that they become much more agreeable if they know you won't put up with that kind of behaviour.

Anyway, on with the show. My poor cousins were looking bored out of their brains. I can't say I blame them. They really didn't have anyone else to talk to or anything to do, so I decided that I'd chat to them for a little while. I'd probably have stayed talking to them longer, but then lunch was served so everyone made a rush for the food. When I went to sit down with my lunch at the table my Father and I had claimed earlier, we had a new guest sitting with us. He was a shy two-year-old dressed in designer children's clothes called Dylan. He was sitting with my father's cousin Bruce, and he spent a lot of time trying to hide behind Bruce's jacket. Bruce tried his best to introduce him properly, but Dylan's only response was to smile and then push his face into Bruce's jacket again.

Doing silly things is always a good way to attract a child's attention. I started sticking the little plastic "80′s" that were scattered around the table on my face and acted like nothing was amiss. The look of amazement on Dylan's face was priceless. Everyone else at the table was chuckling. I was a hit! Dylan forgot his shyness and decided that if it worked for me, he'd give it a try. His attempts to stick little plastic table decorations on his face were so comical that everyone roared with laughter. Dylan grinned as he was now the centre of attention. I was secretly pleased with myself.

After a full lunch, Betty announced that we would have to wait for the cake to be served. It wasn't quite ready yet, so everyone started to mill around again. I spotted a little girl over in the corner of the yard who looked like she was desperately trying to entertain herself with a small inflateable beach ball. Emboldened by my success with Dylan, I walked up to her and snapped up the beach ball before she could react.

"Hey!"

"It's mine now", I grinned.

"I want it back!" she said, stamping her foot.

"Are you sure?" I asked slyly.

“Yes! Yes! Give it back!”

“OK.”

I bounced the beachball off her head. She stood there in open-mouthed astonishment.

“You were too slow! I gave it back to you and you didn’t even take it.”

“You cheated!” she said with an accusing tone.

I bounced the beachball of her head again and smiled mischeviously.

I saw a moment of confusion cross her face, and then a smile slowly appeared. “You can’t hit me again! I’m too fast!” she squealed, daring me to throw the beach ball at her again.

We spent the next few minutes trading taunts back and forth as the beach ball flew around the yard. Her little brother, obviously deciding he didn’t want to be left out, rushed to be part of the game. The little girl told me her name was Maggie, and that her little brother was Dylan (I already knew of course, but I didn’t want to spoil her proud introduction of him). Dylan laughed wildly every time the beach ball bounced off his head. Maggie was having a great time “hiding” from her younger brother every time he grabbed the ball. I was having fun too – who wouldn’t?

I mistimed a throw and managed to stumble. Feigning injury, I crumpled melodramatically.

“Ow! She got me!”

In a flash, Dylan was climbing on me, laughing himself silly. Maggie took full advantage of the situation to repeatedly bounce the beachball off my head. They stopped dead a moment later though.

“That’s enough you two!”

Their mother, Sally, had appeared out of nowhere with a stern expression on her face. The children didn’t move an inch, and I could see that Maggie looked particularly upset. As I stood up and brushed myself off, Sally gathered the children behind her.

“Dylan likes to climb like that on his father”, she said as she looked at me suspiciously. She folded her arms, and I could see an unspoken accusation in her eyes.

“I’ll go and talk to my wife.”

Like most women, she just had to try and get in one last dig. “I think that would be best.”

I was faintly embarrassed by her behaviour. In the past I probably would have gotten angry, but I just couldn’t be bothered. I was here for Uncle Sid’s birthday, not to put some over-protective mother in her place. I knew the look she had given me, because I’d seen it before. I used to teach music, and it was the same look that myself and the other male teachers used to get on a depressingly regular basis. She had decided (using her “women’s intuition” no doubt) that I was going to molest her kids. There was no point in trying to talk to her any further, or worse, attempting to talk to her children as any further communication would be taken as further evidence that she was right.

I don’t blame people for being protective of their children, but enough is enough. How on earth was I going to molest her children in front of over 50 adults sitting not 5 yards away? I’m sick of the irrational fear of men that has developed over the last 10 years. It’s one of the reasons I quit teaching music, in fact. The risk was just too great that an accusation would be made. The young guy teaching to a class full of students in the room next to me was dragged through the mud by a hysterical mother who claimed he “touched her daughter” in front of a class of 20 students with a half-dozen parents looking on! Not one of the parents who were in the room were prepared to stand up and defend him, but all quietly acknowledged to the director of the school that nothing had happened. Frankly, he got lucky, because the next time that woman accused him, there were no parents watching the class. Fortunately, she had very little credibility left at that point. To say he was a nervous wreck after that would be an understatement though.

It isn't pleasant to viewed as a potential child molester. Those kids were having a great time, and I was no threat to them. If I had been a perfect stranger, I might have even been prepared to be understanding, but this was a family gathering. Granted, I hadn't met Sally before, but I had met her husband (who was nowhere to be seen, sadly). There's a lot I want to say, but it would sound more like an incoherent rant than anything else. Men, in the general sense, are not a threat to children. In fact I would suggest that men's increasing absence from childhood activities has caused tangible harm. Men have been gradually driven out of children's lives by a moral panic fed largely by the fears of mums like Sally, and I'm sick of it. Apparently it's even official policy for companies like British Airways to separate men and children now.

I sat down and quietly finished the piece of cake my father had grabbed for me. Ugh. Just what I need – more sugar. Now I was going to have to work it off. I looked over at my cousins Kyle and Mikey. I pulled myself to my feet and walked over to them. "Come on guys, let's go play some dodgeball at the park across the road."

My aunt looked at me with tangible relief. "Oh would you darl? That would be wonderful. The boys have been beside themselves with boredom."

"It's no problem. It'll be fun, and help me work off that cake I just ate."

Kyle and Mikey perked up right away and set about hunting for tennis balls and other things to take with them to the park. Sally stood there scowling at me the whole time. Just to make sure I knew not to try anything funny.

Sorry Sally, nobody is going to molest your kids today, so take your righteous indignation and find a better use for it.

Zeta Game — Hypergamy Crossroads

Paul Elam · 5 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

From Paul Elam's A Voice for Men

In the last part of the Zeta Game series, I covered the fundamental concept of hypergamy- the natural tendency in women to benefit from reducing men to a purely utilitarian role in their lives. I also touched on the notion that the innate programming in men to protect and provide (and thus compete for women's attention) plays directly into the hypergamous gambit, most often resulting in men participating in their own misuse and exploitation.

In short, the way men compete for a higher rank among women is to place their blood, sweat and assets, even their own bodies, at the woman's disposal- no matter how capricious or trivial her desires may be.

The fundamental problem with this arrangement is that hypergamy is not guided by any set of constraining ethical principles. It is, in fact, so utterly devoid of a moral compass that one of the major tools in the woman's hypergamous repertoire is to shame men into sacrificing for them- and to quietly laugh at them as they do it.

We have often seen this referred to in MRM literature as women's propensity for pathological self centeredness and to get what they want from men by any means necessary- up to and including the use of law enforcement and the judiciary. We have pointed to their "sense of entitlement," where it concerns their dealings with men, and noted what seems to be a compassionless disregard for the consequences of their selfish actions.

The evidence of this is clear for many men from the most mundane aspects of day to day life, where they are confronted with women who insist on making marriage and home, or even transient relationships, all about them- to family courts where so many women seem to revel in the sight of their families (and their own children) being ripped to shreds simply because it gives them a an opportunity for petty personal revenge- and financial gain.

It is always tempting, sometimes irresistible, to attribute this kind of toxic femininity to the efforts of feminism, consumerism and perhaps some other forms of social malady. But I would argue that those factors only aggravated already existing conditions, and that what we are dealing with here is as natural as rainfall in late spring.

Hypergamous behavior is a product of paleomammalian hard wiring, plain and simple. It stems from 3,000,000 years of successful human evolution, and it is present, to greater or lesser degrees, in the behavior of all women. You can complain about it, look down on it, judge it and hate it all you want, but it is not going to change by trying to reason with it. You might as well be trying to talk someone out of the urge to eat when they are hungry.

I think the truth of this has been such an ingrained part of male consciousness for so long that it has been buried in our unconscious, and we have slipped into the worst coping strategies possible for dealing with it. We ignore it and/or deny it. We even endear and defend it. But what very few of us ever do is confront and control it.

And as a result we are constantly getting fucked by it. Mind you, most of us end up that way by bending over and grabbing ankles without anyone so much as asking.

It may seem like things have been this way forever, but it has only reached really dangerous proportions in recent times.

As long as there were social constructs, e.g. at fault divorce, that required women to set practical limits on how far they could go, then it was a manageable problem. To this extent, we can fairly point to feminists as part of the problem because they were the ones who pushed so hard to uncork the bottle. But as we all know, the contents of Pandora's Box were all there before it was ever opened.

We could grow old studying and analyzing the socio-cultural aspects of how hypergamy run amok has created an oppressive sexual milieu for men in general, but it is more understandable and, more importantly, productive, to examine it as it plays out in the life of the individual.

It was Roissy, if I am not mistaken, that coined the term “shit test.” And it is an apt description for the first volley in the effort to cast the hypergamous net over a man’s life. By subjecting a man to an unfair or manipulative ploy, a woman measurers her ability to control him. If he reacts by acting like a trained seal, balancing a beach ball on his nose and clapping his flippers trying to please her out of a piece of fish, he is straight up beta material and good for a run at his wallet, even if she has to give up some sex, which she will also use control him.

If he has Game, and slams down effectively on the shit test with a ploy of his own, he is alpha and therefore breeding material. Though of course she will go after his money, too.

But here’s the catch. Either way, the shit tests will continue and be an active part of the relationship. It continues with the beta because he lives on his knees begging her to do it, and it continues with the Gaming pseudo alpha because he responds only with another game. No matter how much he thinks this empowers him with her, he is still dancing the hypergamy jig anytime she chooses. He will clearly do much better than the beta, but his methods of handling the problem will only serve to perpetuate it.

From what I have seen of how non Zeta Game is practiced by its proponents, it takes a real opportunity to intervene on and reverse the shit test- leaving a foul taste in her mouth for her efforts, and instead turns it into a game- with a little g. And it does so with the same lack of values inherent in hypergamy- all to keep the pussy available.

Don’t get me wrong. When confronted with such abject manipulation and scheming from a woman, I am not bashing anyone personally for however they choose to play it. But I am still going to call a spade a spade.

Lying and scheming to get anything is weak. Lying and scheming to get pussy, or approval or to manage a woman’s behavior is even weaker.

I am admittedly old school. I still subscribe to the antiquated notion that my values are the only thing I have that cannot be taken from me. And I also believe that if I give them up for anything, then I never had them to begin with.

So to me the purpose of Zeta Game becomes simple. It is to adopt a manner of interaction with women that unequivocally leaves my values intact. And I have found through personal experience that as long as I am one rigid bastard about that, then some other things fall into place as well. Like my sanity, peace of mind, and yes, my ability to get laid or have a relationship when and if I want to.

All it takes to start is approaching my relationships with women with conviction that they are all completely and totally expendable at any time.

The moment a man finally figures out that the foundation of maintaining his sanity with women hinges on his willingness to let them go, he cannot be manipulated, and cannot be forced to resort to manipulation or dishonesty to deal with them.

One of the best opportunities to challenge his resolve on this is at a moment that happens sometime around the first 90 days of a relationship. I call that moment the Hypergamy Crossroads.

The 90 day number isn’t fixed. It is a general estimate of how long a honeymoon period will last between two people that are new to each other. Most behavior during the honeymoon can’t be taken too seriously, as it’s all fueled by neurotransmitters gone wacko- that have us dancing around acting stupid and trying to do everything right all the time. We like to call it infatuation, but really it is a sort of temporary psychosis designed to cement pair bonding long enough to get a woman pregnant. After all, what is it that you do most during the honeymoon?

But there comes a moment in that relationship, and every man I know who is not totally wet behind the ears, already knows about it.

Things are going along just fine. She like you, you like her, you’re banging each other like rabbits on meth and having one hell of an uncomplicated, hedonistic time.

But then one day you get together and there is something different about her. She seems dark, distant, maybe sulky and morose, like there is something deeply wrong. You can think of absolutely no reason why this should be so, especially as it relates to the two of you, but nonetheless it is.

You have arrived at the hypergamy crossroads, the defining point for this relationship.

Whatever has happened before in the relationship, your decisions here are the first chance you have to set the course for whatever future you have with this woman. This is your first real shit test. And you will know it is a shit test because whatever she tells you is wrong, it amounts to exactly Jack Shit.

You may find that she is upset because you didn't call her the night before, and you always used to call on Thursdays. You may have mentioned an old girlfriend, even one she asked about, in a conversation a week ago, and now she has decided that is bothering her. Or maybe she wonders why you still want to play basketball with your friends on Tuesday nights, instead of being with her.

But whatever it is, the message will be clear. You are doing something wrong, and you need to fix it. Oh, and that crap about how women don't expect you to fix problems but just listen to them- shitcan it. Total myth.

She wants this stuff fixed, and just as importantly she wants to feel like she made you do it (control). And the fact that there is nothing that needs to be fixed will have never entered her mind. And unless you are on your toes, it won't enter your mind either. You will be too busy figuring out a way to make her happy and maintain her approval to notice that her complaint amounts to zilch.

If you miss that, you will miss that this is the genesis of her control over the relationship, and over you. And if you budge an inch, you lose.

Now in this situation, I believe Roissy's preferred intervention is called "agree and amplify."

For instance, if she says, "I deserve a man who will give up a stupid game of basketball to be with me," the response would be something like, "You are right, you do, (agreement) but I am not going to." (amplification).

It's a damned good response except for the dishonesty and lack of clarity about who you are. First, does she really deserve someone who will sacrifice an important routine in their lives to spend one more hour with her?

My answer is no. No one deserves that kind of expectation, except royalty, which she may mistakenly think she is. It also, by affirming (the agreement part) her elevated sense of worth, sends an entirely bogus message. If she is worth it, why would you consider saying no?

But more to the point, to agree and amplify is not making any attempt at all to curtail future attempts- or to weed her out of your life. Presuming you are interested in hanging out long enough to find out if she is manageable, I'd suggest a different approach.

My answer would be, "That kind of expectation is out of line. The answer is no, and I hope this doesn't mean that I will be facing more pressure to sacrifice my personal interests to you, because it is a deal breaker for me."

Now, these two different responses may similarly appear to shut down the shit test, and both do in their own way. But I prefer the honest and instructive approach. And I have some solid reasons for that preference.

One, with my way you have cut to the core of the problem. The pressure she tried to put on you with her little game of emotional blackmail is now on her. Rather than trying to figure out a way to change your "I won't" into an "I will," she now is having to make a choice on whether to pack her bags because the "I won't" is already settled.

If anyone is panicking at this moment it should be the her. If it is you, then you are struggling with your values. Stop the struggling and hang on to them. Better to let her ruin your day now than to ruin your whole life later on.

Do you want to keep a woman at the cost of her forcing you to sacrifice your own interests? Do you want to be with someone who manipulates and controls you with emotional blackmail?

It's up to you to put a stop to it, because she won't…she can't, on her own.

We attract what we advertise for in life, no doubt about it.

I have talked to many men who vigorously complained about the financial drain that their wives or girlfriends had become. But when I asked them if they set up the relationship by lavishing them with gifts, flowers, expensive dinners, etc., they would get quiet in a hurry.

They did not want to accept that they were paying the consequences for their own actions early in the relationship. They went shopping for a whore and then got pissed off because that is exactly what they ended up with.

And that is a big part of how I see Zeta Game. It is about attracting women only in the most fundamental aspects. All the rest is about screening them and culling out the voluminous amounts of dead weight.

But it does not require you to dream up bullshit retorts, pick-up lines or to toss negs. It requires you to know yourself, to know what you want and assert it with the certainty that if it sends her out the door it will call another, hopefully more worthy example of womanhood right back in.

They are out there, although in small numbers. But you will never find them unless you are willing to let the bad ones scurry out like cock roaches when the lights are turned on.

And those lights being turned on? Those are your values be asserted.

More of this will be explored in the next part of the Zeta Game Series: Zeta Game- Your Wallet, Her Purse.

Labor Day: Commemorating the Efforts of an Earlier Generation of Men

W.F. Price · 6 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the US, Labor Day marks the end of summer, children returning to school, the beginning of the football season and the increase in activity in the run up to the holidays. It comes right after the dog days, a time of economic (and often physical) sluggishness, and so portends a return to brisk business.

Americans often celebrate the holiday with an end-of-summer retreat, such as a final camping trip, a barbecue, or some other outdoor activity to take advantage of the fair weather while it lasts. Hotels are booked up and campgrounds full on Labor Day weekend, attesting to its popularity as a chance to get away one last time.
