On the second day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, two tongued dives…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. As I noted in my last article, feminists found Nicki Minaj's rapetastic demand that men give her orgasms "inspiring." Forcing men to perform sex acts against their wills is the perfect feminist holiday fantasy. Original: "two turtle doves."

On the third day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, free wench cans, two tongued dives…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. Feminists have fraught arguments about prostitution: some support a woman's choice to do it, and others hate the idea that men enjoy women who sell sex openly. What better Christmas gift than no-cost wench ass to kick feminist outrage into high gear? Milo suggested a beta male should take the feminist to Three Israel protests. On Christmas? Good luck with that. Original: "three french hens.".

On the fourth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, four balling beards, free wench cans, two tongued dives…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. The UVA gang-bang rape hoax story in Rolling Stone provoked an orgy of feminist outrage without any actual gang-bang. Four bearded campus rapists hitting one fainted feminist clam would give them decades of delicious outrage Milo chose Four sympathetic Buzzfeed listicles. Hmmmm. Not really one for the meter, our Milo. Original: "four calling birds."

On the fifth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, five golden wangs*…four balling beards, free wench cans, two tongued dives…*and a parted ridge below her paired teats. To piss off a feminist queenlet, try suggesting, however accurately, that the wealth of their rape-hoax target figures into which man gets falsely accused of passing out hot Cosby's. Milo suggested Five Patreon donations. Original: "five golden rings."

On the sixth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, sex queefs allaying, five golden wangs*…*and a parted ridge below her paired teats. Quelling the vagina fart is the literal slippery slope to ending sloppy feminist free bleeding. So sorry, feminists. Milo chose Six Tumblr reblogs. Oooooh-kay. Original: "six geese a-laying."

On the seventh day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, seven swine a-swarming, sex queefs allaying, five golden wangs…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. Pissing off Islamists with pork to terrify feminists with gang-rape triggers is the outrage trifecta for SJWs. Best…holiday…EVER. Milo: Seven facial piercings. But, with what? Original: "seven swans a-swimming."

On the eighth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, eights cocks a-milking …and a parted ridge below her paired teats. Few things agitate feminists more than men having orgasms. Rapey bastards. Milo: Eight fake harassments. Original: "eight maids a-milking."

On the ninth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, nine daddies glancing,…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. For the daddy-issues cohort, the toxic male gaze is an old feminist trope ("gaze" being a homophone for "gays") – the slaves are not permitted such disrespectful look-aggressions. Oh, the hysteria! Milo: Nine transracial genderfluid otherkins swaying gently in the breeze. Whatevs. Original: "nine ladies dancing."

On the tenth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, ten lardy lesbos…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. What an outrage treat! Yes, fat-shaming is wrong, but pleasing feminists by sating their hunger for outrage is a noble yuletide gift. Milo: Ten leaps of logic. What use do feminists have for logic – even leaps of it? Original: "ten lords a-leaping."

On the eleventh day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, eleven pipes a-plunging…and a parted ridge below her paired teats. Everyone has pipes, so maybe plunging them isn't that bad? Unless men enjoy it, I guess. Milo: Eleven feminists singing. He's tiring. So am I. This was almost as horrible as sitting through Jimmy Volmer stuttering through the whole song on Southpark. Original: "eleven pipers piping.".

On the twelfth day of Christmas, feministas gave to me… Milo suggested twelve student loan payments. But the original text, forcing feminists into a men's drum circle, has to be the best fate of outrage ever. Merry Christmas, ladies, and hey, Milo? You can actually sing my version.

> Twelve drummers drumming, Eleven pipes a-plunging, Ten lardy lesbos, Nine daddies glancing, Eights cocks a-milking, Seven swine a-swarming, Sex queefs allaying, ...Five golden wangs....., Four balling beards, Free wench cans, Two tongued dives, and a parted ridge below her paired teats.

Dr. Milton Sales of NSW, Australia placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 24 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Sales' homepage at circumcisions.com.au we are afforded the pleasure of seeing the "tools" the doctor uses to amputate the babies foreskin:

The Plastibell –

and The Circumplast-

Under "Ring Circumcision" we get this information:

"Dr Sales and Dr Jackel perform circumcisions at Newcastle Private Hospital.

Dr Jackel uses the Plastibell and Dr Sales uses the Circumplast method.

The operation is performed in an operating theatre under local anaesthetic.

Babies need to be at least 28 days old and under 8 weeks for the procedure.

A combination of oral paracetamol, EMLA anaesthetic cream and injected lignocaine is used for pain control.

You will need to view the presentation images prior to attending the consultation. All babies are checked in our rooms at 324 Brunker Road Adamstown prior to surgery to assess suitability for operation and to look for heart murmurs. Babies with a heart murmur may need further evaluation by echocardiogram prior to surgery."

Glad to see the doctors are making sure the infant can handle the stress and risk of this surgery. More important, why are these doctors subjecting ANY infant to these risks with this medically unnecessary surgery.

Also on the homepage is this wildly pro-circumcision brochure produced by controversial Dr. Brian Morris that at least diagrams the goodies circumcised males are missing.

Under "Circumcision Information" we see an incomplete listing of risks:

> The risks of the procedure include:
> •infection – 1 in 60 operations may require antibiotics
> •bleeding – 1 in 2,000 requiring ring removal to stop bleeding
> •bruising which resolves without treatment
> •ring slipping back – 1 in 200 requiring ring removal
> •medication reaction – very rare
> •blood transfusion – 1 in 30,000 operations
> •restriction of urethra by scarring later in life – rare

Under "Pros and Cons of Circumcision" there are other complications listed, but missing is 'death.' Then a short summary surprisingly concludes that there are "Insufficient benefits to warrant circumcising all newborn males." All the benefits listed have been debunked and some of them are actually caused by circumcision – see that here.

Under "Circ Blog" more pro-circumcision propaganda, "It's official: Circumcision DOESN'T affect sexual pleasure, according to biggest ever study of the issue."

Brian Morris

> and his co-researcher John Krieger looked at 36 studies totalling 40,473 men – half of were circumcised and half were not. Each of the studies was graded in terms of quality, according to official guidelines.
>
> The professors found that the very high quality studies reported circumcision 'had no overall adverse effect on penile sensitivity, sexual arousal, sexual sensation, erectile function, premature ejaculation, duration of intercourse, orgasm difficulties, sexual satisfaction, pleasure, or pain during penetration.'

No sources are given, so all the claims in the article are dubious, but no surprise that he may not have seen a difference in the reporting because the circumcised men did not know what they were missing.

Then there was this with the caption:

“Don’t worry if the ring is dangling”

Watch this Circumplast circumcision video, if you can stomach it.

And here’s Dr. Sales genitally mutilating a baby with the Plastibell. Horrible – bring a barf bag.

And of course under “Patient Information” there’s a link to Brian Morris’ pro-circumcision website circinfo.net.

Since the doctors’ website lack complete information about risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Sales’ practice information follows:

Phone:
+61 2 49523700

Address:
Brunker Road General Practice
324 Brunker Road Adamstown, NSW, 2289, Australia

Surviving school with a breaking spirit

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 24 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

BBC Parliament broadcasts the Women's Equality Party's policy document launch

Mike Buchanan · 25 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The BBC continues to give a great deal of unchallenged exposure on prime time programmes to the Women's Equality Party, this particular piece lasts over 23 minutes. J4MB was launched in February 2013 – more than two years before the launch of WEP – yet has had no exposure on BBC Parliament, and virtually none on BBC prime time programmes.

Mike Buchanan publicly challenged Sophie Walker, leader of WEP, over the content of her party's policy document – here. She didn't respond, and duly won our Lying Feminist of the Month award.

William Collins's critique of Sophie Walker's speech is here.

Feature image: en.wikipedia.org 1024 × 685 Sandi Toksvig in 2009.jpg (modified)
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sandi_Toksvig

Dr. Adam Jackel of NSW, Australia placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 25 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Jackel's homepage at circumcisions.com.au we are afforded the pleasure of seeing the "tools" the doctor uses to amputate the babies foreskin:

The Plastibell –

and The Circumplast-

Under "Ring Circumcision" we get this information:

"Dr Jackel and Dr Sales perform circumcisions at Newcastle Private Hospital.

Dr Jackel uses the Plastibell and Dr Sales uses the Circumplast method.

The operation is performed in an operating theatre under local anaesthetic.

Babies need to be at least 28 days old and under 8 weeks for the procedure.

A combination of oral paracetamol, EMLA anaesthetic cream and injected lignocaine is used for pain control.

You will need to view the presentation images prior to attending the consultation. All babies are checked in our rooms at 324 Brunker Road Adamstown prior to surgery to assess suitability for operation and to look for heart murmurs. Babies with a heart murmur may need further evaluation by echocardiogram prior to surgery."

Glad to see the doctors are making sure the infant can handle the stress and risk of this surgery. More important, why are these doctors subjecting ANY infant to these risks with this medically unnecessary surgery.

Also on the homepage is this wildly pro-circumcision brochure produced by controversial Dr. Brian Morris that at least diagrams the goodies circumcised males are missing.

Under "Circumcision Information" we see an incomplete listing of risks:

> The risks of the procedure include:
> •infection – 1 in 60 operations may require antibiotics
> •bleeding – 1 in 2,000 requiring ring removal to stop bleeding
> •bruising which resolves without treatment

> •ring slipping back – 1 in 200 requiring ring removal
> •medication reaction – very rare
> •blood transfusion – 1 in 30,000 operations
> •restriction of urethra by scarring later in life – rare

Under "Pros and Cons of Circumcision" there are other complications listed, but missing is 'death.' Then a short summary surprisingly concludes that there are "Insufficient benefits to warrant circumcising all newborn males." All the benefits listed have been debunked and some of them are actually caused by circumcision – see that here.

Under "Circ Blog" more pro-circumcision propaganda, "It's official: Circumcision DOESN'T affect sexual pleasure, according to biggest ever study of the issue."

Brian Morris

> and his co-researcher John Krieger looked at 36 studies totalling 40,473 men – half of were circumcised and half were not. Each of the studies was graded in terms of quality, according to official guidelines.
>
> The professors found that the very high quality studies reported circumcision 'had no overall adverse effect on penile sensitivity, sexual arousal, sexual sensation, erectile function, premature ejaculation, duration of intercourse, orgasm difficulties, sexual satisfaction, pleasure, or pain during penetration.'

No sources are given, so all the claims in the article are dubious, but no surprise that he may not have seen a difference in the reporting because the circumcised men did not know what they were missing.

Watch this Circumplast circumcision video, if you can stomach it.

And here's Dr. Sales genitally mutilating a baby with the Plastibell. Horrible – bring a barf bag.

And of course under "Patient Information" there's a link to Brian Morris' pro-circumcision website circinfo.net.

Since the doctors' website lack complete information about risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Jackel's practice information follows:

Phone:
+61 2 49523700

Address:
Brunker Road General Practice
324 Brunker Road Adamstown, NSW, 2289, Australia

adam.jackel@newcastle.edu.au

AVFM Membership Drive

Paul Elam · 27 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oIDawJ5WhAs&feature=youtu.be http://voices.avoiceformen.com/membership-center/memberships/

SCRIPT

Hello everyone.

It is time for AVFM's quarterly appeal for readers to join the ranks of our subscribers.

It's only appropriate that I give you some sound reasons for contributing to an operation that provides its content for free.

First, I urge you to consider AVFM's role in doing exactly what it says in the tagline under our logo.

Changing the cultural narrative.

I don't think anyone can dispute that the narrative is indeed changing. The free pass for feminists has been revoked. Many Major websites that continue to run misandric bullshit now often have two words in common at the end of their hateful posts.

Comments Closed. That is now a common reaction of the feminist media in the wake of average people clobbering them with dissent and ridicule.

The proliferation of a stridently anti-feminist narrative has been awe inspiring.

I can say with certainty and pride that it was AVFM that kicked the door in on all of it. We took the daggers thrown at us by mainstream media across the western world and pushed back defiantly. In surviving we emboldened others to speak the truth.

Now, there is a wide range of people with popular appeal who are saying the same things, often in the same tone, that we have said here for nearly seven years.

When an award-winning filmmaker decided to dedicate three years to making a movie about the men's movement, she came to AVFM as the source. There is a good reason for that. AVFM's story is the story of the modern men's rights movement. The two are inseparable.

We do not want, nor can we afford, to rest on the idea that a conversation about men and boys has finally started.

We expect 2016 to be a year of opportunities to be seized. The Red Pill Movie will be released. The International Conference on Men's Issues will be held in London. I anticipate the very real possibility of legal threats to AVFM as we become increasingly aggressive in our dealings with those who welcome infant boys into life with the blade of a knife.

And we will continue to bring you work from the very best of modern thinkers on the issues of men and boys.

I would say that is providing a good bit considering no one on AVFM staff, including myself, has made any personal income since we switched to a membership model early this year.

More than ever, this site, and the activism we further, depend on you. Click on the link below this video and you will find very flexible options to support our work. You can subscribe for as little as $5 a month, or make a more generous monthly gift if you can afford it.

And you can still make a one-time donation if that suits you.

With that I will say thank you to current subscribers for being there for AVFM and thanks in advance to those who choose to join us during this drive.

Wishing you all a very happy holidays.

http://voices.avoiceformen.com/membership-center/memberships/

Dear Daddy Response

AVfM Video Source · 28 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

An excellent must view response to Care Norway's #deardaddy video.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7TFLttjRm_c&feature=youtu.be

If you enjoyed Dear Dad, from a boy (#deardaddy response) please subscribe here.

Dissecting the new American Racist

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 28 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Being racist is like being drunk: Your judgement is impaired, you overreact to things that don't matter, and you probably shouldn't be in politics.

In light of upticks in police brutality and #BlackLivesMatter activists doing everything from dissing cops in Dunkin' Donuts to blocking off entire highways [1][2], racial tension once again electrifies the air. Since many think in terms of black and white and not shades of brown, race activists need to once again think about what it means to reach across the aisle.

Let me address a language barrier before going much further. I use the terms "black" and "white" to refer to conventional divides that color inspired, but not necessarily the colors themselves—Such as when Caucasians mock one another for "acting black" or vice-versa. In reality the words oversimplify things greatly, so I consider them more illustrative than descriptive. Don't get too hung up on the semantics, because I know that the racist relationships I'm about to describe are readily observable despite the convenience and brevity of the nomenclature.

We know the popular image of racism. If you go up to McCaysville, Georgia and float down the nearby river as I did during my family's Labor Day cookouts, you will see on the bank a porch with a statue of a black boy holding a Confederate flag. McCaysville is the place where you will find conservative stereotypes. They sell drugs and guns in the same store, just in case you needed Xanax and a Desert Eagle for a few nights of Budweiser-sponsored fag drags in a 1946 Chevrolet Clunkbucket.

You think I'm kidding.

We know about the old white pot-bellied snaggletooth wearing Confederate flag undies and nothing else. He grins toothlessly—24oz Yuengling held aloft—from his tobacco-stained lawn chair as you gape at his moldy trailer from a Cracker Barrel rocking chair.

But there is a new white racist in town. He doesn't hate blacks, he just pretends to love them. He's the guy who wears shirts that say "So Sorry" while acting as surrogates in slavery vengeance fantasies.

A photo from the Lifeline Expedition's March of the Abolitionists

To the new white racist, having a black friend is not about friendship, it's about status. He assures you that he's not racist because he wants to look open-minded, but he doesn't give one damn about translating his sentiments into real work. He coddles black people, and even monologues about how he is better than black people because he "saw his privilege:"

Manipulators use the word "privilege" to rehash a Christian original sin narrative in the sense that it prescribes guilt by ancestry. The original sins are the nightmares wrought by white colonists in their mad rush for profit. Privilege alternatively refers to one not having to worry about problems by virtue of his demographics. It's easy to sell a crumbling cracker on white privilege when you restrict all historical context to stories where whites hold power. Plantation slavery is a go-to recollection, but using our conception of race as a color—which is a recent development—there existed white slaves who were treated in ways comparable to blacks:

> Failing to find the expected mineral riches along the eastern seaboard, [England] turned to farming, hoping to make gold from tobacco. They needed a compliant, subservient, preferably free labour force and since the indigenous peoples of America were difficult to enslave they turned to their own homeland to provide. […] This book tracks the evolution of the system in which tens of thousands of whites were held as chattels, marketed like cattle, punished brutally and in some cases literally worked to death. For decades, this underclass was treated just as savagely as black slaves and, indeed, toiled, suffered and rebelled alongside them.
>
> — White Cargo: The Forgotten History of Britian's White Slaves in America

> When someone removes the cataracts of whiteness from our eyes, and when we look with unclouded vision on the bloody shadows of the American past, we will recognize for the first time that the Afro-American, who was so often second in freedom, was also second in slavery.
>
> — Lerone Bennett Jr. (Black World/Negro Digest Oct 1970)

These facts are not to downplay the racism and the abuse wrought by the southern antebellum, but I hope those reading this do not make the mistake of dismissing the suffering of others because they do not feel it is as bad. If, hypothetically, 100 women and 10 men were shot dead by a single terrorist group, I would ask those who don't feel men suffered "as badly" to talk to the victim's families and see if they agree that their sons' lives weren't worth considering equally.

Blacks and whites had and have more in common than many want to admit. Sadly, racially-motivated conflict is oddly addictive to the anti-racist activist. Popular belief appears to be that whites live in a white world, and blacks experience both a black and white world. In keeping with the flattery and lunacy of standpoint theories, many suppose that black knows best because black knows both. So long as racism is a color and a dysfunctional white privilege narrative continues, whites will feel responsible for blacks and blacks will resent whites.

Privilege suggests that empathy requires experience in the sense that a man can't empathize with a woman's labor pains because he can't feel them. The underprivileged, starved for understanding, demand compassion for the ignorance of others. But if white privilege says that whites cannot understand, why even ask them to be more sensitive? If one uses the word "privilege" to shame whites into submission, that means knowing that whites could empathize. If whites were blind to the black community's suffering then they wouldn't respond with a hint of compassion.

Racism is an equal opportunity insecurity, not a power game where the system always wins. When I hear a black person say that (s)he can't be racist because there is no systemic backing for black bigotry, then I take that as seriously as a drunk saying they can't actually be drunk until they get in a car. Drunks are still far more dangerous once they get behind the wheel, but to say that you can't be drunk unless you are behind the wheel?

"I can't be drunk unless I have a car!"
The words "white privilege" have always been about manipulating white people into feeling sorry for black racists trying to profit from the suffering of their own community. Nothing else makes sense.

Even if victimized blacks no longer had to endure broken law enforcement, false incarcerations and hurtful everyday gestures—such as white people locking car doors or crossing the street after seeing a black person—the requirements for a racism-free society shift to more inane standards so long as people want to take things personally. This is why an adult with food, water, an Internet connection, educational attainment, a supportive family and gainful employment can complain about Instagram filters lightening skin tone. At this point the anti-racist activist has problems that activism can't solve.

To avoid dysfunction of this nature, remember that you don't need to experience hardship to prefer that people not suffer it. A father can wish that delivering a baby didn't have to hurt the mother. A white man can see a black man as his brother when the black man is dragged into a corrupt court system hell-bent on putting innocent people in jail. A woman can feel the frustration and rage of a man who lost his home, family and children to what turned out to be an abusive partner. When empathizing, take care around those who want to leech off of your sensitivity at the expense of others.

The anti-racist activist, either black or white, is a selfish, racist creature that wants your attention for the sake of their ego.

Even worse, that hateful word "privilege" denies the beautiful, unifying effect of empathy in nature. "Privilege" is accusatory. Even though talking heads assure us that the word "privilege" is not meant as a personal insult, it does say you cannot possibly relate because you are tainted by the sin of your skin. If someone says you have white privilege, they are saying that you can't empathize with non-whites because you are the wrong color. But that's not racist because drunks need cars to be drunk.

The black community suffers, but an entitled few use Eric Garner, Brian Banks, Marvin Anderson, Trayvon Martin and Michael Brown (at least!) to justify a new Helter Skelter. You can't be white and have sympathy unless you are willing to pay an arbitrary price dictated by loud, domineering, racist black and white people drunk on revenge, not reconciliation. It's gotten to the point where an anti-racist protest leader at Kean University faked threats against black people so that she can make herself look like a hero. Meanwhile, white men join their sons in a bondage fantasy so that black racists can masturbate more furiously over hardships they've probably never experienced in the name of "coming together."—Pun metaphorically intended.

Not-so-fun fact: British juvenile boys were among the first people chosen for free labor in the New World. The royalty promised the boys a new life in exchange for indentured servitude, but many of the boys were literally worked to death and thrown away to decay in rubble (White Cargo). Makes you wonder if someone will apologize to that boy someday.

We're in a troubled time where kind, noble and innocent men and women in the black community become fodder for obsequious whites and black prigs who both want to be popular. If you are a victim of hate, how would you feel about activists who support you online only because it makes them look better? If it were me, I'd rather be openly hated than used as a subject of fleeting, superficial love that ends the moment my supporters realize that they can get more attention rallying around someone else.

The new racist, regardless of color, is the kind of person who would take self-aggrandizing selfies with homeless people after giving away food. What makes the new racist sick is not just hate, but his or her willingness to bastardize love and compassion to excuse that hate. The new racist professes love and togetherness while stripping agency from the people they promise to help. The new racist treats civil disagreement as a reason to harass, bully and abuse others under inexplicable double standards.

When you grow up listening to people tell you that resenting white colonialism makes you a caring egalitarian, you become hesitant to take an objective look at how different cultures interact.

Racism is everywhere and I don't know how to stop it, but neither does #BlackLivesMatter and its army of supposedly anti-racist sycophants. The seasoned activist understands that prejudice motivates you to fight for you, not necessarily against others. In fact, civil rights movement leaders based their successes more on assertiveness and less on aggression. You could directly combat racists in a Malcolm X or Black Panther blitzkrieg, but that only revives a blood feud for another generation. Civil rights leaders knew that nothing gets under a racist's skin more than loving yourself and living as if their violent actions and character judgements won't break you. The black civil rights leaders and their white supporters knew how society would change when empathetic white people noticed white racists bullying blacks while they got up and kept on marching. Mastering oneself and staying calm in the storm helps render bigotry impotent because it means you can better evade oppressive forces when they inevitably come for you.

The most successful civil rights legends had faith in people's ability to see each other as people. The activists today openly deny empathy and replace it with a story. A story that says there exists this taint called privilege, which prevents understanding and blinds those who have it into feeling nothing for others. The new racist calls other people racist to make themselves seem less racist. You aren't allowed to relate to people of another color by people claiming that you should.

A long list of black victims demonstrate both flaws in due process and the trigger-happy nature of a corrupt police force. As clueless as I might be about what a silver bullet solution looks like, I know it won't involve storming into a library screaming "Fuck you, you filthy white fuck!" to complete strangers until they break down crying. It doesn't involve reducing black families to fuel in a social media flame war designed to inflate the egos of corrupted activists and justify censorship and violence.

The new racists' bitterness prohibit whites or blacks from any demonstration of vulnerability, self-satisfaction or love. Biracial activist Amity Paye talks about white mothers as if they bring white supremacist influences into mixed families. White Minneapolis shooters gunned down five #BlackLivesMatter protesters, which only further incubates toxic divides as people come together in apparent solidarity. Anti-racist activists are going to become more of a threat to each other as the magnetic attraction of hate crimes further disrupts their moral compasses.

A happy white is an oppressive white, and a happy black is an internally-oppressed black. Whites are not allowed to live a happy life because that's a symptom of an unbalanced system, and blacks aren't allowed to be at peace so long as any one black person is treated with injustice. The sympathy does not go the other way because whites are seen as the problem. It was never about imperialistic conquest by the rich and ruthless, it was always about hating white people while using either a fake or distorted love for black people as an excuse.

In the world of the anti-racist activist, a black and a white person actually being friends is an increasingly foreign concept, even though that love has always been within their reach.

Every hate crime and racist remark targeting blacks makes the news, incites political action, and pushes countless white people into the sights of Larry Wilmore, John Oliver, Trevor Noah, Bill Maher, Stephen Colbert and other politicians calling themselves comedians. People do care about racism, but so long as empathy mixes with narcissism, that old joke asking what is white, black and red all over will eventually refer to a stunned community coated in blood that their hashtags couldn't keep inside the people they swore to help.

This isn't progress. It's sick.

> Man must evolve for all human conflict a method which rejects revenge, aggression and retaliation. The foundation of such a method is love.
>
> —Martin Luther King, Jr.

Hypergamy Culture is Destroying Black America

Kris Kamina · 28 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by rharrison on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

With recent events and tumults, black America has again come to the forefront of societal discourse in America. Certainly, no other demographic faces worse prospects — liberal hipster fostered gentrification, endemic crime and poverty, mass incarceration, abortions outpacing live births, etc.— despite six years with the first black president.

But it should come as no surprise to those who have made the moral decision to take the red pill that black America's plight is to a significant degree internally undergirded by the ubiquitous female imperative of "hypergamy." This refers to the tendency to seek mates of higher social status, attendant resources, and its trappings. It is the often unstated and ineluctable principle governing sexual politics. With women as sexual selectors in any courtship ritual, male behavior is significantly determined by visceral female dating preferences. Indeed, the alpha male persona given apotheosis within the PUA community is a reflection of subconscious female choices. In the dysfunctional social structure they find themselves in — where, as anywhere else, reproduction is paramount — black men act as they do under a framework determined by their women (including via decidedly matriarchal households).

Contemporary rap music is a microcosm of this dynamic. At its core, the hyper-pseudo-masculine bad boy persona it has engendered is a meretricious response to innate female demand for alpha characteristics.

In a typically solipsistic feminist article, Straight Outta Rape Culture, appearing in the Huffington Post, Sikivi Hutchinson censures NWA's fostering of a supposed "rape culture ." But here's the elephant in the room: Mention of the daily fratricidal meat-grinder black males are subjected to — and NWA's relation to it — is conspicuously omitted from the narrative. This is true with both Hutchinson and the larger ongoing debate. This is why the discourse and rancor vis-a-vis police brutality and murder is disingenuous.

Hutchinson's myopic approach is from the prism of female plight while ignoring the palpable and fratricidal killing fields black males are impelled into. More so than "yoking rape culture and rap misogyny," as she argues, there is a litany of dysfunctional and socially destructive views NWA and its successors have fostered. More to the point, if "girls have grown up with the pervasive message that violence against black women and girls is normal, natural, and justifiable," then black men have grown up with the message that violence against their black brothers is not just "normal" and "justifiable," but it is indeed glorious. The results of this inculcated sanguine treatment of murdering black men by other black men are manifest.

A warzone.

The leading cause of death for black males 15-34 is murder. Numbers fluctuate, but approximately 8,000-9,000 blacks are murdered each year; usually by a member of their own race. This is astronomical. To quantify, in one year more blacks can be expected to be killed than total US deaths in the Iraq or Afghanistan wars combined. Thus, for an epicenter of violence such as Chicago the nickname "Chiraq" is apt. Looking at the data for combat deaths in America's main 20th-21st century wars is also telling. It is conjecture because no complete study exists, but extrapolating the data sample we can surmise in a period of eight years more blacks were killed in the streets than American deaths in the entire Vietnam War. Over 100,000 blacks were killed during a comparable time period among the Vietnam, Afghanistan, and Iraq wars. It's safer for a black male to enlist in the armed forces than participate in their default milieu.

This is not an internecine social dispute between a group of people: Blacks are at war with themselves. Indeed, "No one is safer in [American] communities of color than white folks," one commentator informs us. While it is true even between whites that most murder is by members of the same race, the scale of carnage between blacks outpaces all others. The prerequisite self-hatred for such carnage has been fostered by the NWA just as much, if not more, than for any "rape culture." To be sure, some of this doubtless precedes NWA, but so does any violence against women.

Which cultural meme fostered by NWA is more socially destructive? This is the reductio ad absurdum. Murder — especially fratricide — is an ultimate crime. It takes a characteristically feminist solipsism to only lament that "brutalized bodies of black women will be lost in the predictable stampede of media accolades [for the new NWA film]," while the bodies — all male — pile up ad nauseam in places such as Chicago and Washington D.C filling up morgues. (Growing up in one of the most dangerous cities in the northeast, I have seen it firsthand.)

This is not to offer apologia for one crime by severity of another; rather, an exhortation to recognize a spectrum whereby punishment and our attendant indignation for each crime is proportional to its severity: an iPhone thief should not be censured in the same degree a murderer is and vice versa.

In the unstated sexual politics, hypergamy governs all. Because women are typically sexual selectors in a courtship ritual, male behavior is to a significant degree dictated by visceral female dating preferences. The common unexamined proclivity (undergirded by an archaic chivalrous impulse) is to deny women any agency. In his out of print work, Anatomy of Female Power, Nigerian critic Chinwezu makes a cogent argument that man may rule the world, but women rule the men who rule the world. (Perhaps, there is an elementary wisdom in Beyoncé.) "The male may be the head, but the female the neck. " The dominant feminist narrative of patriarchy relies on the disingenuous assumption that political power is the only form of social influence. (To carry this erroneous assumption into the sphere of black America is even more untenable because black households are decidedly matriarchal.) The political may be a male dominion, but the power of the womb is hers. To secure any progeny, legacy, family of his own, and therefore meaningful social fulfillment, the male is left little recourse than to be supplicant and filtered through female selectivity.

The evolutionary theory of parental investment, as it relates to sexual selection, predicts the sex investing the most and facing the bigger cost (female) will be more selective resulting in the opposite sex (male) being more competitive and aggressive pursuing it. Reproduction is more costly for a female than a male, impelling her to be the more selective partner. The corollary of female selectivity, and relative male sexual weakness, undergirds all sexual politics — even in the black ghetto, as we shall see.

Men and women have an opposite role. Males must always initiate while females filter. In the familiar ubiquitous trope, the male must slay the dragon or villain and thereby prove himself worthy of the distressed damsel. In contrast, for the female to have sexual partners, they must simply exist; for the male, it's entirely conditional. This is why geneticists can show us 80% of our female ancestors reproduced, while only 40% of our male ones did.

The principle applied to the black ghetto is no different. Female selectivity continues to manifest in the visceral imperative of "hypergamy." Women seek men with high social status, resources, and its trappings; what in tribal configuration was exhibited by the "alpha male." Although in a modern civilization selecting an alpha male does not guarantee her access to resources, innately women still overwhelmingly filter for breadwinners. With some of the characteristics of a failed state, (lawlessness) it is unsurprising black ghetto female selection filtering is not all that different from demonstrating the confidence, courage, physical strength, and social prowess of primacy in a hierarchy of competitive males we would have experienced in a retrograde primal society.

Thus, to avoid sexual invisibility black men are relegated to fulfilling one of two roles for sexual access: That of an alpha 'bad boy' asshole or beta high-earning provider. Consequently, they must cultivate a personality of alpha virility or overwhelmingly subordinate professional decisions to pecuniary concerns. In the context of the ghetto, the former is paramount while the latter often shunned (more on that later). The easy choice (conventional) of dealing drugs, joining a criminal gang, or other nefarious behavior — which as a corollary engenders a certain social capital within their own milieu — compared to the highest unemployment rate and endemic job discrimination is not inexplicable.

Indeed, from their perch as sexual selectors, black women in the ghetto have given an apotheosis to 'bad boy' culture. It's hypergamy run amok. Black women place tremendous cultural emphasis on men for the possession of traits matching that of urban alpha male masculine culture of the variety originally propelled by NWA. This is called "swag." It is demonstrating aggression, social dominance, and an edgy appearance. Men do not necessarily want to adopt this disposition, but their women demand it of them.

Consequently, academically inclined males and attendant intellectualism are marginalized and often held in opprobrium. Going this route is well-nigh a guarantee of sexual invisibility. The charge of "acting white" and the ostracism it entails is very real (never mind the intellectual parlance of a Frederick Douglas or MLK or even a superficial amore propre in President Obama). Indeed, as Athlone McGinnis offered in these pages, "You think the sexual market value of the average white or Asian nerd is low? Try being their black equivalent and having your entire culture essentially disown you."

Moreover, if you have the aplomb to make it to the other side of the academic route, you will often face onerous employment circumstances. You may be counted among the 56% of blacks underemployed with degrees making $8.50 at Barnes and Noble. This is coupled with endemic discrimination, typified by the likes of "liberal" Facebook where you can almost count on your fingers the number of blacks hired, contrasting with a 36% Asian staff. This is besides the onus of an astronomical debt burden (arguably the most encumbering in American history). These factors all vitiate your potential as breadwinner.

Hobson's choice writ large.

This by no means, answers all the underlying, social, sexual, economic, or political factors on this issue or the plight of black America as a whole. We obviously cannot ascribe everything solely to hypergamy. Nevertheless, in the circumscribed ideological paradigm of mainstream discourse — dominated by the mendacious and outright idiotic feminist narrative — it goes a long way in explaining such observed phenomena.

We cannot play the blame game. We need to take responsibility. We need to recognize women have just as much, if not more agency as men within black society.

If N.W.A is "straight outta rape culture," they are straight outta hypergamy culture. As sexual selectors, female sexual predilections will continue to determine how males behave. Rejecting determinism means first attaining knowledge, and its corollary of belief, to change a given arrangement. Calling attention to women's own sexual choices can but lead us to amelioration.

Dr. Graham Lohlun of Edmonton, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 29 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Lohlun has been placed on the genital mutilators directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Lohlun's website circumcisionedmonton.ca:

"Dr. Graham Lohlun is a well-known and respected physician in Edmonton with over 14 years of practice in emergency medicine, obstetrics and anaesthetics. He has made infant circumcision a major focus of his practice.

After conducting extensive research of the various surgical approaches and anaesthetic (pain control) protocols available today, Dr. Lohlun found one physician in Canada who had dedicated most of his professional career to focus on finding and researching what he considers the quickest, safest and least uncomfortable circumcision for infants. He found that doctor and decided to study his methods carefully and bring that method to Edmonton. The technique and methodology is called the "Pollock Technique" developed by Dr. Neil Pollock in Vancouver who has demonstrated the safety of this method and has come as close to anyone in perfecting a virtually painless 30-second technique over the course of him doing 35,000 circumcisions over 20 years. Dr. Lohlun came across Dr. Pollock's techniques and went to Vancouver and entered his course where he worked intensively with Dr. Pollock under his careful supervision first working on doing hundreds of surgeries on models and then graduating to work on patients and now has brought this 30-second, virtually painless technique to Edmonton."

Dr. Lohlun's website is nearly identical to Dr. Neil Pollock's, whom Lohlun consider's his mentor. We've listed Dr. Pollock previously, which you can see here. You can compare the information given by both, but unfortunately, the information about risks is incomplete, so you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Lohlun's practice information follows:

Meadowlark Place Prof Centre
#108, 8708-155 St
Edmonton, AB
T5R 1W2
TEL: (780) 469-5299
FAX: (780) 469-0806

drlohlun@circumcisionedmonton.ca

Servitude to women: don't be that man

Douglas Galbi · 30 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In Frauendienst (Service of Ladies), written in German about 1250, the knight Ulrich von Liechtenstein describes mis-education, delusion, and suffering. Poets and wise men, the teachers of that time, urged Ulrich to subordinate himself to a woman. Ulrich recalled:

> This I heard the wise men say:
> none can be happy, none can stay > contented in this world but he > who loves and with such loyalty > a noble woman that he'd die > if it would save her from a sigh.
> For thus all men have loved who gain > the honor others can't obtain. [1]

Men's lives are thus valued lower than a woman's sigh. Only a very brave man would dare to reject that honor. Ulrich sought it:

> "I'll give my body, all my mind > and life itself to womankind > and serve them all the best I can.
> And when I grow to be a man
> I'll always be their loyal thane:
> though I succeed or serve in vain
> I'll not despair and never part > from them," thus spoke my childish heart.
> …
> Whoever spoke of women's praise
> I followed, just to hear each phrase, > for it would make my heart so light > and fill me with true delight.
> I heard from many a learned tongue > their excellence and honor sung; > they praised one here and praised one there,
> they praised the ladies everywhere. [2]

This is the sort of literature that gave rise to Hitler. If children were to read Theophrastus's Golden Book rather than Dr. Theophrastus Seuss's One Fish, Two Fish, Red Fish, Blue Fish, they would recognize that praise of ladies is a funny thing.[3] Or at least they would develop a sense of humor lacking today.

Ulrich pledged servitude to a lady. He engaged his aunt to plead his love suit. The lady replied to the aunt:

> That he excels I'll take your word > (although it's more than I have heard) > in every virtue, every skill, > yet for a woman it must still > prevent a close relationship > to see his most unsightly lip.

> You must forgive my saying so:
> it isn't pretty, as you know. [4]

The lady rejected Ulrich for his cleft lip. Oblivious to the lady's cruelty, he underwent a painful operation to have his cleft lip joined. Critical post-structuralists and ananavelist scholars have determined that the lady's rejection of Ulrich on the grounds of his cleft lip figures and problematizes the prevalence of male genital mutilation in medieval European Christian culture. More to the point, Ulrich served a heartless lady.

Ulrich enacted his loving devotion to his lady in various ridiculous ways. In one joust, he damaged a finger. After his lady expressed doubt about the seriousness of his wound, he had his finger cut off. He sent the cut-off finger to his lady along with a poem praising her. She responded to his messenger with a message of scorn:

> Go back and tell him my regret;
> he'd serve the ladies better yet, > were it not that his hand is shy > a finger. Tell him too that I > shall always keep the finger near, > buried in my dresser here,
> that I shall see it every day, > and that I mean just what I say.
>
> Tell him from me now, courtly youth:
> I'll keep the finger — not, in truth, > because my heart at last is moved > so that his prospects are improved > by a single hair. Make sure he hears > this: should he serve a thousand years, > the service I would always scorn.
> By my constancy I've sworn.

Ulrich was delighted. He thought that his lady continually viewing his amputated appendage was a sign that she loved him. But women preoccupied with amputation of men's appendages do not truly love men.[5]

Ulrich sought to please his lady by pretending to be a woman. He dressed himself as a woman, called himself Lady Venus, and traveled around Europe participating in dangerous jousting tournaments. He was wounded in the chest and took at least one lance blow to the head. While Ulrich was in a bathtub bathing a wound, an admirer showered him in rose petals.[6] Bodily wounds to men aren't socially understood to bleed real blood.

One day, Ulrich's lady summoned him to appear before her in secret. She told him to appear in rags like a leper. Ulrich raced to his lady to fulfill her summons. He donned rags and ate with lepers outside his lady's castle. His lady forced him to sleep outside the castle overnight in the rough, in the rain. The next morning he was instructed to wait until the evening. That evening, as instructed, he laid in hiding outside the castle. The castle warden making rounds took a long piss on him. After more misadventures, he was finally pulled up with a bedsheet onto the castle balcony.[7] Ulrich then declared to his lady:

> Lady, grant me grace.
> …
> Lady, you're my chief delight, > may I be favored in your sight, > may your compassion take my part.
> Consider the longing of my heart > which constant love for you inspired.

> Consider that I have not desired > a thing more beautiful than you, > a lovelier I never knew.
>
> You're dearer far than all that I > have ever seen. If I could lie > with you tonight then I'd possess > all that I've dreamed of happiness.
> My life will gain by your assent > a lofty spirit and content > more and more until it ends.
> It's you on whom my joy depends.

That's a courtly speech by a man drenched in piss. Ulrich obviously hadn't learned from Ovid. His lady refused to lie with him.

Exploiting Ulrich's inferiority in guile, his lady got rid of him with deceptive hand-holding. She explained that she would do his will if he would re-enact his entrance and give her the opportunity to greet him as a lover. That meant for him to get on the bedsheet and be lowered down slightly, and then brought up again. Ulrich rightly was suspicious that she would let him down and never pull him up again. She offered to hold his hand as a good-faith guarantee. Ulrich agreed:

> Though worried, I then took my seat > inside the tightly knotted sheet.
> They let me down a little ways > to where they were supposed to raise > me up. My sweet continued slyly,
> "God knows, I never thought so highly > of any noble in the land > as of the knight that holds my hand.
>
> "My friend," she spoke, "be welcome so.
> We both are freed from care and woe > and I can now invite you in."
> While speaking thus, she raised my chin > and said, "Dear one, give me a kiss."
> I was so overjoyed with this
> I let her hand go free and I > quite soon had cause to grieve thereby.

They dropped Ulrich down and pulled the sheet back up over the wall. Ulrich was in deep despair. If not for his comrade's intervention, he would have drowned himself in a dark lake.

Ulrich von Liechtenstein's Service of Ladies is far more than a playful game. Like the thirteenth-century Old French nouvelle The Three Knights and the Chainse, Service of Ladies represents the social construction of male disposability. Men will not achieve gender equality until men reject a life of service to ladies.[8]

Notes:

[1] Ulrich von Liechtenstein, Frauendienst (Service of Ladies) s. 9, trans. Thomas (1969) p. 52. Ulrich's book is now commonly recognized to be fictional rather than autobiographical. Ulrich von Liechtenstein was historically a knight in thirteenth-century Germanic lands.

[2] Id. ss. 11, 13.

[3] Dr. Theophrastus Seuss's One Fish, Two Fish, Red Fish, Blue Fish declares, "From there to here, from here to there, funny things are everywhere."

[4] Frauendienst, s. 80, trans. Thomas (1969). Subsequent quotes are from id. ss. 453-4, {1198, 1205-6}, 1267-8. The aunt acts as the old woman go-between common in medieval Iberian literature.

[5] On pre-occupation with castration, see the discussion of the serranas stories in Libro de buen amor, note [8] and comparative criticism of the Old French works, Fisherman of Pont-sur-Seine and Lecheor.

[6] Frauendienst, ss. 733-5.

[7] Stories of Virgil and Hippocrates being suspended in a basket from a women's window are part of the literature of men's sexed protests. The summons for the secret meeting is ss. 1114-5; sleeping in the rain, 1168-70; getting pissed on, s. 1189.

[8] Classen (2004) emphasizes the theatrical, ludic element of Frauendienst. But Frauendienst, like Pamphilus, has significance extending all the way to scholarly life today. For example, a recent scholarly analysis of Frauendienst centered on the pleasures of ridiculing masculinity:

> Ulrich's lady openly mocks her male suitor, ridiculing his masculinity. What pleasures does such mockery offer to male and female audiences?

Perfetti (2003) p. 129. As scholarly work, id. could be regarded as a joke. But it's wide-ranging effects are apparent.

[image] Ulrich von Liechenstein, painting on folio 237r, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, Große Heidelberger Liederhandschrift (Codex Manesse). Zürich, ca. 1300 bis ca. 1340,

References:

Classen, Albrecht. 2004. "Moriz, Tristan, and Ulrich as Master Disguise Artists: Deconstruction and Reenactment of Courtliness in Moriz von Craûn, Tristan als Mönch, and Ulrich von Liechtenstein's Frauendienst." The Journal of English and Germanic Philology. 103 (4): 475-504.

Perfetti, Lisa. 2003. "'With them she had her playful game' The Performance of Gender and Genre in Ulrich von Lichtenstein's Frauendienst." Ch. 4 in Women & laughter in medieval comic literature. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Thomas, J. W., trans. 1969. Ulrich von Liechtenstein's Service of ladies. Translated in condensed form into English verse with an introduction to the poet and the work. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Rabbi J Abraham of London, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 31 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Rabbi J Abraham of London has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org. From Rabbi Abraham's website london-baby-circumcisions.co.uk:

"London Baby Circumcisions

Rabbi J Abraham – Member of the Initiation Society"

Congratulations on the birth of your son!
Baby circumcisions by an expert surgeon, in the comfort of your own home.
Professional, caring & personal service
No travelling to clinics
Very quick and pain free
Years of experience"

"Initiation Society?" Let me guess – the infant has no choice but to be 'initiated?'

And "very quick" is . . . good? For whom?

"Pain free" – again, for whom?

More "About Rabbi J. Abraham:"

> Rabbi J. Abraham is an expert circumcision specialist with years of experience. He trained under top circumcision specialists in the U.K. and is a current member of The Initiation Society. He has travelled abroad numerous times to countries including Norway, Spain & Gibraltar, to perform circumcisions.
>
> He is married with 8 children, and a respected member of the community. He performed his own sons' circumcisions, among many other satisfied customers. He is highly recommended by GP's, Paediatricians and midwives, who have used his services for their own children as well, and of course by many satisfied parents!

We have no idea what medical training, if any, that Abraham has, and we get no information about the Rabbi's personal complication rate. And the fact that this is surgery done in the home with no emergency facilities present add up to potential disaster.

If he has any daughters they are the lucky ones; intact, and not sexually abused and mutilated by their father.

Then there's this greeting:

> CONGRATULATIONS AND WELCOME!
>
> Here at London Baby Circumcisions, we offer you a personal, caring and fully professional circumcision service, inclusive of full aftercare support. Rabbi Abraham has years of experience in baby circumcision and is a registered and certified member of The Initiation Society so you know your baby is in reliable hands.
>
> I do home visits for baby circumcision in and around London including almost any area. North, East, South & West London are covered, as well as neighbourhoods in the Greater London area like Hayes, Northwood, Pinner, Watford, Borehamwood, Barnet, Potters Bar, Romford, Dagenham, Erith & Dartford.
>
> As an experienced circumcision specialist, I believe that your home is the safest environment in which to perform the circumcision. In a clinic, the newborn baby may be exposed to germs and viruses from other patients there. At home this is obviously not a concern.
>
> In addition, the home is the most convenient and comfortable place for baby and parents. You have the luxury of privacy, and all your creature comforts. It is not the best thing to travel around with a very young baby, especially post circumcision. You stay at home – I do the travelling!
>
> Furthermore, the best time to circumcise your baby, is within the first few weeks since he feels less then and the healing is much faster. With home visits, the circumcision can be done sooner.

He says "the best time to circumcise your baby is within the first few weeks since he feels less then and the healing is much faster." Feeling 'less' isn't a good thing; studies have shown because the infant's neurological system is still forming this trauma interferes with it's development and results in elevated sensitivity to pain FOR THE REST OF HIS LIFE.

Some of the material on his site is shocking. From the FAQs:

> What are the benefits of circumcision?
>
> Besides being a most fundamental religious requirement for Muslims, Jews & some Christians, circumcision also has huge health benefits.
>
> • Circumcised men are much less susceptible to cancer of the penis.
>
> • Females with circumcised partners are at a reduced risk of contracting cancer of the cervix of the womb than females with uncircumcised partners.
>
> • Circumcision improves the hygiene and cleanliness of the penis.
>
> • Circumcision reduces the risk of getting balanopothitis & balanitis (inflammation of foreskin & glans).
>
> • Circumcision decreases the risk of HIV (AIDs) in men.
>
> • Circumcision eliminates the risks of phimosis (the inability to retract the foreskin during an erection) and paraphimosis (the inability to relax the foreskin after an erection).
>
> • Circumcision reduces the risk of urinary tract infections.

These so-called 'benefits' have been debunked – see that here. More "FAQs:"

> Why is it important that I only use a circumcision specialist who is a member of "The Initiation Society"?
>
> The Initiation Society was set up in 1745 to train, qualify and monitor its members in the field of circumcision. It is the only body of its kind in the whole of Europe. Choosing a circumcision specialist who is a member of The Initiation Society gives you peace of mind & assurance that your baby is in good hands. Please note that > even if you get a doctor to do the circumcision, you have no way of knowing that they specialise in circumcision, since circumcision is not part of a doctor's training.

' . . . assurance that your baby is in good hands' – the hands of a mutilator that has no idea if the baby – and future adult – wants this mutilation performed on them? It continues:

> Why shouldn't I just go to my doctor to get it done?
>
> Circumcision is a specialist area which doctors are not trained for. In fact, doctors & paediatricians use our services for their own children!
>
> The following is a quote from the The Memoirs of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone, "A Sparrow's Flight", (written by Quintin Hogg, Baron, Published by London William Collins & Sons Ltd 1990) Chapter 1:
>
> My mother, who had strong views on certain subjects, saw to it that I was immediately circumcised by a doctor. One would think that, even then, this was a fairly simple operation, but for some reason it was not completely or immediately successful. It had to be done again when I was nearly ready for my private school. I was not told that it was going to be done; no anaesthetic was administered; I was just laid across the doctor's knees and recircumcised (if there is such a word). I still remember the pain, the blood, and my sense of total betrayal by the adult world. My younger brother, Neil, benefited by my misfortune. Deciding in future to trust only specialists in the matter, my mother engaged the services of a Rabbi to do the job on him, and this functionary, whatever his description, was entirely successful.

By definition, this mutilation isn't "a fairly simple operation" and all of the above horror was totally avoidable by not cutting in the first place. More FAQs:

> Can I go to the hospital to get it done?
>
> Unfortunately, this service is not routinely provided on the NHS.
>
> There are a few private hospitals which offer the service but expect to pay in excess of £700! As an example, check out the price in The Portland Hospital here: http://www.theportlandhospital.com/uploads/children/the-baby-circumcision-clinic.pdf and HCA hospitals here: http://www.hcahospitals.co.uk/mobile/patient-information/pricing/circumcision-newborn-babies/. London Baby Circumcisions will provide the service in the comfort of your own home, at a fraction of the cost.

Not covered by the government because it is risky, not medically necessary, and may be illegal. The Brits have done the right thing by not funding genital mutilation; next they have to enforce human rights law and forbid infant mutilations for both girls AND boys. More from the website:

> Why shouldn't I go to a circumcision clinic to get it done?
>
> Firstly, it is much more convenient to have it done in the comfort & privacy of your own home – no travelling, no waiting around and privacy to nurse your baby before & after the circumcision. Secondly, a clinic is visited by many babies & their families, each bringing with them their own germs & viruses. It is a known fact that many viruses are contracted in hospitals & clinics. The safest place for a healthy baby is in his own home where he is already acclimatized to his surroundings. Thirdly, by and large, the circumcision clinics all use the Plastibell method – which is not recommended; see "Why should I avoid doing a circumcision using the Plastibell/ring method" question.

So "the safest place for a healthy baby is in his own home?" In this case, only if the "healthy baby" is a girl. I cringe when I think about the trauma of living in the same space where the sexual assault and mutilation took place.

This non-doctor claims to be safe, yet has no information about his safety record.

Rabbi Abraham answers the question "What are the risks involved in a circumcision?" with:

> When done professionally by a qualified & experienced specialist, complications are very rare, so circumcision poses no significant risk at all.

That is the totality of his information about the risks of circumcision, so here is some information about that.

More under "FAQs:"

> Why should I avoid doing a circumcision using the Plastibell/ring method?
>
> The procedure for the Plastibell method is as follows: First one has to inject A FEW TIMES into the base of the penis. A probe & a haemostat are then used to detach the foreskin from the glans. Once that is done, using a scissors one makes a dorsal cut straight down the foreskin all the way to the base of the glans. The Plastibell ring is then forced down, in between the foreskin and the glans. After pulling the foreskin back up, a ligature (a type of string) is tied VERY TIGHTLY on the outer side of the foreskin, CRUSHING it in between the ring & the ligature and blocking any further blood circulation. Once the ring is tightly in place, using a scissors the foreskin is cut slowly all the way round just above the ring. Finally the handle of the ring is broken off leaving the baby with the ring around his penis, tied very tightly by the ligature. You can watch the whole procedure here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ra5t0OsmWf0&sns=em
>
> This procedure requires painful injections, takes approximately 15 minutes (!) and it leaves the baby with a plastic ring tied TIGHTLY on his penis, normally for a week or more!
>
> So why is the Plastibell method not recommended?
>
> • It requires painful injections.
>
> • The procedure takes around 15 minutes as opposed to a minute or two.
>
> • Since the area goes through a lot of trauma and a ligature remains in place crushing the foreskin, once the anaesthetic wears off, the baby can be in a lot of pain.
>
> • The baby is left with a plastic ring & ligature firmly attached to his penis, often for as long as a week or more, which can be uncomfortable & could be an invitation to infection.
>
> • The ring doesn't always fall off on its own and further surgery could be required to remove it.
>
> • Once the ring eventually falls off, the foreskin sometimes grows back on to the glans (above the corona) meaning that further surgery could be required to re-expose the glans.

I'm glad the Rabbi described the torture and mutilation of an unconsenting baby's genitals in a way that makes his method seem . . . less torturous? Here's his method and the Barzel tool he uses:

> What exactly is the procedure?

First the baby is weighed to ensure that he is fit to undergo a circumcision. He is then given a measured dose of paracetamol, orally. A topical anaesthetic is applied to numb the area. Using a special shield, the foreskin is isolated from the glans and in one second the foreskin is removed using a single-use sterile scalpel. A coagulating dressing is applied for only a few minutes, after which it is removed and no further dressings need to be used, leaving the circumcised penis free of any uncomfortable bandages, rings or ligatures.

For more information about the risks of circumcision see research at neonatalcutting.org.

His ‘practice’ information follows:

Call or SMS on:
07961 898 444

Fwd: FAO Dr Zuhair Zarifa

Mike Buchanan · 31 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr Zarifa, good afternoon.

I lead the only political party in the English-speaking world campaigning for the human rights of men and boys, and our #1 campaigning issue is male circumcision, Male Genital Mutilation. The procedure you are performing is a crime in the UK. The proof that it is a crime – albeit not one that the criminal justice system prosecutes for, yet – is here:

https://j4mb.files.wordpress.com/2015/04/150727-j4mb-notes-of-james-chegwiddens-2013-keele-uni-presentation.pdf

MGM is a barbaric assault on an the human rights of male minors. It contravenes United Nations and European Union conventions on human rights, and it can cause a wide variety of medical complications. You cannot possibly be unaware of this. Scroll down to the long section on 'Male Genital Mutilation' to learn more:

https://j4mb.wordpress.com/key-posts/

Two weeks ago you were placed on the genital mutilators directory by A Voice for Men, the most influential and most-visited website in the world advocating for the human rights of men and boys. The piece they've published on you:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/dr-zuhair-zarifa-of-london-england-placed-on-genital-mutilators-directory/

The directory:

http://neonatalcutting.org/listings/

I am fully supportive of their action, and I have linked to their piece on our website:

https://j4mb.wordpress.com/2015/12/22/dr-zuhair-zarifa-placed-on-the-genital-mutilators-directory/

If you google your name, you'll see that the AVfM piece appears (currently #8). Our link soon be showing up, probably among the top three.

I should be happy to meet with you in London to explain the ethical, legal, and medical grounds on which you should cease performing this procedure forthwith. In the meantime I wish you a Happy Holiday, and I hope you don't perform this procedure ever again.

Best wishes,

Mike Buchanan

Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them)

Video and transcript of my speech at the 2014 Detroit Conference on Men's Issues

Campaign for Merit in Business
Anti-Feminism League
Alternative sexism project

Facebook

YouTube

Twitter

Mobile: 07967 026163

Justice for Men & Boys, Kemp House, 152 City Road, London EC1V 2NX

Men's Rights, the Southern Poverty Law Center, and Hate

Dr. Douglas W. Texter · 1 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by StretchyBill on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-SA 2.0).

What if, as a liberal, you woke up one morning, and discovered, as I did, that you write about masculinity and men's issues occasionally for what the Southern Poverty Law Center contributor Arthur Goldwag has called a part of "a hard-line fringe" of the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) he terms hateful; A Voice for Men?

I've written for a "hateful" group?

I feel embarrassed.

Embarrassed to be a liberal, that is.

In this essay, I'm going to discuss my personal experience with a Senior Fellow at the Southern Poverty Law Center, Mark Potok, whom I personally met many, many years ago. I'm going to argue that while I have deep respect for Mark Potok as a person who built a good career, the SPLC's denunciation of a Voice for Men, which he no doubt was involved with, speaks volumes about the ills of the American left since the end of the Cold War. In a nutshell, as many writers, such as Russell Jacoby and, more recently, Adolph Reed, in Harper's, have said, the left as a force for economic justice has basically ceased to exist in this country. What remains is, for the most part, a strained coalition of upper-middle-class identity-based movements, concerned with posturing and dividing up along identity-based lines a rapidly shrinking American pie.

Before the SPLC, Mark Potok, and Morris Dees denounce me as a member of the John Birch Society, a Neo-Nazi, or a just plain sexist pig, I feel compelled to present my own liberal résumé. I am most certainly not a right-winger. Really.

In college, I served as a canvasser for the Public Interest Research Groups and fairly recently wrote the entry on the group for the Encyclopedia of American Reformist Movements. I also served as a field manager for Greenpeace USA. During my time at Greenpeace, I not only protested nuclear weapons testing at the French consulate in Philadelphia, I also accompanied many members of the office staff to a hard-hat/hippie demonstration at DuPont, the maker of many nasty weapons, and saw Jesse Jackson back when the Rainbow Coalition still suggested that a pot of social-justice gold existed for all. In graduate school, where I was writing a dissertation on utopias and dystopias and read a lot of Marxism, I worked part-time at Citizen Action Membership Center calling on behalf of Democratic Socialists of America, Clean Water Action, and Working America, a project of the AFL-CIO. If you've read Barbara Ehrenriech's Nickel and Dimed, you'll recall a section in which she describes staying at the apartment of a Minnesota activist who owned a parrot. That activist was my boss at Citizen Action Membership Center. These days, I teach English literature. I volunteer as an alumni interviewer for my undergraduate institution and serve as the secretary of Amnesty International Chapter 519 in Orlando. I helped to co-ordinate our birthday cards to death-row inmates project in which we send cards to every inmate on Florida's death row in a show of solidarity with human beings, mostly men, often considered by the public as moral garbage. And in a show of solidarity with one of my fellow activists, I attended her ordination as the first female Catholic priest in Orlando.

Surprise!

I write for A Voice for Men, and I am on the left, what remains of it. I voted for Nader (who founded the groups I worked for in college) both times, and I'm probably going to vote for Bernie Sanders, if I have the opportunity to do so.

But the left isn't with me or people like me. This state of affairs did not always obtain.
During my final years in college in Philadelphia, I became a friend of Potok's half-sister, who ran a coffee house in West Philly. Indeed, my friend served as my bus captain on a trip to Washington, DC, in January of 1991, to protest the first Persian Gulf War. Right before Desert Shield transformed into Desert Storm, I got tear gassed in front of the White House trying to halt what turned out to be the first of what I see as a series of disastrous U.S. interventions in the Middle East.

It was shortly after my fiasco in Lafayette Park that I met Mark Potok, who is the son of a poet, Andy Potok, whom I also met. I believe that Mark Potok is also a distant relative of Chaim Potok, the celebrated writer. I attended the funeral of Mark Potok's mother in Cambridge, MA. Having a very impressive family pedigree, this Potok is an interesting person, and he's fairly typical of what the left in this country has become since the end of the Cold War and the fall of the Berlin Wall, not a grass roots-movement in which people take back control of their own lives, but a confluence of not-that-liberal elites condemning anybody they don't like. When, in Damariscotta, Maine, I met Potok at a wedding at the house of his late stepfather—who had fought in the Algerian Civil War (I believe on the wrong side) and who was an archeologist and a bit Indiana Jones-like—and we talked briefly. Potok had been reporting for USA Today and had made a documentary about the Abraham Lincoln Brigade fighting during the Spanish Civil War.

I've always had a great deal of respect for the idealistic American men who fought for the doomed Republic and got black-listed by the U.S. military for their troubles when they returned to America. But perhaps Potok's work on the Spanish Civil War symbolizes the major problem with today's left: they're fighting the social-justice battles of the last century, not this one. The real problems today break down along two lines: economics and a very murky identity mosaic. While the SPLC, acting as the quintessential white knight, tries to slay the beast of Men's Rights, capital, as Thomas Piketty has noted, concentrates in the hands of fewer and fewer people. Pensions have largely disappeared while the mutual-fund industry reaps a harvest of profits from Ma and Pa Kent's 401k. Skilled jobs are fleeing the country on a wave of globalization, to which the left of today seems all too closely related.

Where's the real hate here in the men's rights movement?

In talking about how second- and third-wave feminism has, like it or not, really done a number on the U.S. social fabric, probably tearing it beyond repair (and the African-American community has been hardest hit by this)?

In talking about how fathers have become largely the targets of charges of buffoonery and die slow deaths when they lose custody of their children?

In talking about how men's suicide rates sky rocket after divorce and break ups?

In talking about how (and as a college teacher, I know this fact all too well) men, especially poor men and men of color, are departing from higher education at rates that are profoundly disturbing?

In talking about the rise of false allegations against men, allegations for which absolutely no burden of proof is needed?

In talking about the rise of female narcissism and borderline personality disorder, which, as any male who has been with somebody with these conditions (and I have) can tell you, lay waste to relationships and dreams?

This is hate?

No, the real hate here is what the left, symbolized by SPLC, has been doing for twenty-five years: engaging in white-knight Baby Boomer-style battles that largely don't matter anymore while ignoring those that really do concern justice, especially for the poor of all colors. The moneyed left, which both Potok and Morris Dees belong to, has become allied with the international jet-set crowd promoting globalization, which has destroyed what used to be the middle class and has really had a negative impact on the lives of men and women and their children.

The left hasn't effectively opposed the destruction of the middle and lower-middle classes. I don't recall SPLC on the stage when the Clinton Administration killed the Glass-Steagall Act and set the stage for the melt-down of 2008, which harmed a lot of people, more people than have ever been harmed by the KKK or the Sons of the Confederate Veterans (whoever they are). Instead of fighting for economic rights for everyone, the left simultaneously guts the economic infrastructure of this country and gives us so-called tolerance-issues masquerading as social justice.

Can someone say “bread and circuses,” only without the bread?

When I was at his family’s house in Damariscotta, Maine, Potok wasn’t the only soon-to-be powerful and famous person standing on the front lawn that day. While attending a wedding, I also met Fareed Zakaria, who would become Potok’s brother in law in a few years. Back in those days, Zakaria, now the host of CNN’s GPS and the son of an Indian politician and champion of globalization, had just finished his Ph.D. at Harvard and was in the process of becoming the editor of Foreign Affairs, a journal I read and liked as an undergraduate. In this role, Zakaria would host dinner parties with the likes of Henry Kissinger in attendance.

There are two reasons why I’ve told this story. Let me be very clear. I’m not here to bash either Potok or Zakaria. Of course, as an English teacher, I’m rather irked that Zakaria landed himself in hot water for allegedly copying from the historian Jill Lapore, but this difficulty with plagiarism not withstanding, I have no personal problem with either of these men. Our hellos were pleasant. I wish both men well in their careers.

But, despite my good wishes, these very powerful brothers in law symbolize almost perfectly the marriage of the tattered remains of the left with the forces of globalization. Neither of these forces cares very much about the self-destructing lower middle classes, especially the male members of these classes.

While the SPLC, which uses its “hate group” branding as a fundraising tool, craps all over the Men’s Rights movement and a Voice for Men, the issues addressed by this movement affect men (and women and children), who, for the most part, live in worlds that Potok and Zakaria barely know exist. In preparing this essay, I took a look at the SPLC’s website. One bit of the language suggested one of the problems here. The SPLC fights on “behalf of”—and not alongside–the poor and minorities. The phrase “on behalf of” smacks of liberal noblesse oblige and betrays the older Left’s ideas of solidarity. We have here the guilty conscience of real elites trying to make themselves feel better: “We’ll continue to dismantle the economy, but to make up for it we’ll chase around guys who dress up in civil war uniforms or who utter the word ‘mangina.’” Go to any liberal gathering space (and I’ve been in many of them) and count the number of times the word “Nazi” is used to describe people (including former presidents) who are even slightly right of center.

I’m not impressed, and I think a lot of people, including liberals, really aren’t impressed, either.

Back in the sixties, the days of the Port Huron Statement, Martin Luther King fought for himself and people like him. Gandhi did the same thing. So did the Wobblies, and so have union members. Why can’t men stand up against the very real social forces arrayed against them today? Ironically many men who have fought for the left now find themselves in a position similar to the one faced by members of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade: betrayed by a movement they once felt proud to be a part of and have seen hijacked by quasi-Stalinists on the one side and very wealthy forces of globalization on the other.

So, SPLC, quit the white-knight posturing against men’s rights, which does nobody but you any good and actually inflicts a lot of damage on men trying to change their own lives and those of, to steal a term that the SPLC would be familiar with, their fellow travelers. Instead, go fight real battles for the poor and oppressed, some of whom might just turn out to be men.

And, maybe, just maybe, if you do, I’ll stop being embarrassed to be a liberal.

Christopher Schreier, ARNP of Gainesville, FL placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 2 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Christopher Schreier, ARNP has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.com

From Christopher Schreier's webpage at the University of Florida's Health Center ufhealth.org/christopher-schreier:

"Education

ARNP Certification
University of Florida

Biography

Chris is a Gator at heart! He received both his undergraduate and graduate degrees from UF. Chris worked as a pediatric nurse for 8 years at UF Health Shands Children's Hospital before becoming an ARNP. He is board certified in General Pediatrics and Primary Care, and cares for children from birth through age 21. He strives to make his patients and families feel important during their visit to clinic, and encourages questions from parents. Chris has two children and loves spending time with his family, playing golf and cheering for the Gator football team.

Specialty Pediatrics

Clinical Interests
Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder
Circumcision
Healthy living
Normal growth and development
Well-child visits"

Mr. Schreier is a Registered Nurse with a specialty in Pediatrics. Under "Clinical Interests" above, what doesn't belong?

Shockingly, it appears that non-doctors are allowed to perform surgery – male circumcision – on unconsenting infants without religious exemption. See this from the National Institute of Health:

"An Advanced Registered Nurse Practitioner (ARNP) is a Registered Nurse (RN) qualified to function independently. May perform physical examinations and diagnostic tests, develop and carry out treatment programs, or counsel patients. May prescribe medications noted in formulary. Specialty areas include: Adult Care; Pediatric Care; Anesthesia; and Nurse Midwifery."

Bad enough that Rabbis and other non-surgeons – including obstetricians – are allowed to perform this surgery, but now non-doctors are 'cutting' baby boys too. Just look at what they can do: perform exams and tests, carry out treatment programs, etc. – somehow SURGICAL AMPUTATION seems out of place in that list of non-surgical items.

Under "Circumcision – Overview:"

> Definition
> Circumcision is the surgical removal of the foreskin of the penis.

> Description
> The health care provider will most often numb the penis with local anesthesia before the procedure starts. The numbing medicine may be injected at the base of the penis, in the shaft, or applied as a cream.
>
> There are several ways to perform a circumcision. Most commonly, the foreskin is pushed from the head of the penis and clamped with a metal or plastic ring-like device.
>
> If the ring is metal, the foreskin is cut off and the metal device is removed. The wound heals in 5-7 days.
>
> If the ring is plastic, a piece of suture is tied tightly around the foreskin. This pushes the tissue into a groove in the plastic over the head of the penis. Within 5-7 days, the plastic covering the penis falls free, leaving a completely healed circumcision.
>
> The baby may be given a sweetened pacifier during the procedure. Tylenol (acetaminophen) may be given afterward.
>
> In older and adolescent boys, circumcision is most often done under general anesthesia so the boy is asleep and pain free. The foreskin is removed and stitched onto the remaining skin of the penis. Stitches that dissolve are used to close the wound. They will be absorbed by the body within 7-10 days. The wound may take up to 3 weeks to heal.
>
> Why the Procedure Is Performed
> Circumcision is often performed in healthy boys for cultural or religious reasons. In the United States, a newborn boy is often circumcised before he leaves the hospital. Jewish boys, however, are circumcised when they are 8 days old.
>
> In other parts of the world, including Europe, Asia, and South and Central America, circumcision is rare in the general population.
>
> The merits of circumcision have been debated. Opinions about the need for circumcision in healthy boys vary among health care providers. Some believe there is great value to having an intact foreskin, such as allowing for a more natural sexual response during adulthood.
>
> In 2012 a task force of the American Academy of Pediatrics reviewed current research and found that the health benefits of newborn male circumcision outweigh the risks. They recommended that there should be access to this procedure for those families that choose it. Families should weigh the health benefits and risks in light of their own personal and cultural preferences. The medical benefits alone may not outweigh those other considerations.

Glad to see acknowledgment of differing opinions about circumcision, but unanswered in any meaningful way is the question "Why the Procedure Is Performed." Obviously there is no medical necessity for this surgery, just religious and supposed 'health benefits' that have been debunked.

More important is the cavalier way in which a baby boy's human right to genital integrity – same as a girl's – is casually dismissed. It's the opinion of some that infant circumcision is a human rights violation and may be illegal in many countries.

Under "Risks related to circumcision" we see:

> Bleeding > Infection
> Redness around the surgery site
> Injury to the penis
>
> Some research has suggested that uncircumcised male infants have an increased risk of certain conditions, including:
>
> Cancer of the penis
> Certain sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV
> Infections of the penis
> Phimosis (tightness of the foreskin that prevents it from retracting)
> Urinary tract infections
> The overall increased risk for these conditions is thought to be relatively small.
>
> Proper hygiene of the penis and safe sexual practices can help prevent many of these conditions. Proper hygiene is especially important for uncircumcised males.
>
> Outlook (Prognosis)
> Circumcision is considered a very safe procedure for both newborns and older children.

"Proper hygiene of the penis and safe sexual practices can help prevent many of these conditions" – EXACTLY! – you don't cut off body parts because they get dirty! You don't cut off body parts that get diseased BEFORE THEY GET DISEASED!

The risks listed are far from complete, most notably missing is death; for more information see here.

ALERT MGM 101 – Watch the classic documentary "Whose Body, Whose Rights" at neonatalcutting.org.

Christopher Schreier's practice information follows:
UF Health Pediatrics – Tower Square
352-733-1770
7046 SW Archer Rd
Gainesville, FL 32608

Men's Rights Convention of 1851

Peter Wright · 2 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In 1851 the following article was penned by Chericot in Godey's Lady's Book, an American magazine for women published in Philadelphia. The article entitled Men's Rights Convention was designed to mock proceedings of men's rights conference held at Independence Hall. Did the conference really take place? My bet is that it did, and the article was an attempt to distort proceedings and dissuade MHRA's from holding future conferences. – PW

MEN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION – SEPTEMBER 20th 1851

EXTRAORDINARY PROCEEDINGS, EXCITING SCENES, AND CURIOUS SPEECHES .
FROM OUR OWN REPORTER, CHERICOT.

Yesterday, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, an immense mass meeting of gentlemen from all parts of the country was held at Independence Hall. It was convened upon notices to that effect, which were issued directly after the late extraordinary and treasonable Female Convention at Massachusetts, and which, being distributed among the principal cities in the Union, had resulted in the collection of an enthusiastic crowd of gentlemen of all grades, trades, and politics, one common danger uniting them, in the effort to repel the proposed feminine aggression of their rights.

On taking- a survey of the meeting, one thing struck us very forcibly—the uneasy and restless anxiety that characterized the demeanor of most of the men; the slightest noise caused a general sensation; and, in one instance, the shrill cry of a fishwoman threw a gentleman into hysterics, which he explained, on his recovery, to have resulted from his mistaking it for the voice of his wife.

When the excitement had, in some measure, subsided, the meeting was called to order by Mr. Wumenheyter, of New York, who said, the first business being the choice of a president, he moved that Mr. H. P. Husband, of Maryland, be appointed.

Brass Blackstone, of Philadelphia, seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

After the vice presidents and secretaries were duly chosen, and a business committee appointed to draw up resolutions expressive of the sense-of tho meeting, the president addressed the convention as follows:—

"The object which has called this great assemblage together is one which not only concerns mankind in general, but Americans in particular. This is emphatically a land of liberty — liberty which, achieved by the exertions of our forefathers, has commanded the respect of the tyrannical governments of the Old World, and resisted all unhallowed attempts to subvert it. This liberty, gentlemen, is threatened with destruction: by the establishment, within the very bounds of this republic, of a despotism that has no parallel in ancient or modern history. Yes, there is a conspiracy afoot in the very midst of us, which, should it succeed in it aspiring aims, will annihilate us as men, and convert us into mere household appendages to that rebellious sex who, after having for years shown a disposition to encroach on some of our rights and privileges, now boldly assert a claim to all. Patience; gentlemen, is no longer a virtue; stem determination and resolute action alone can put down this ambitious usurpation and re-establish our authority on its legitimate basis.

“These firebrands on our domestic hearths must be extinguished, or the sparks, lighting into a flame, will consume us.”

Here the sensation produced by Mr. Husband’s fiery eloquence was so intense that groans and sobs resounded from all parts of the building, and the gentleman was so overcome by his own flights of fancy that it was some time before he could proceed.

“I have, in the relations of husband, son, and brother, stood aloof. I have borne, with dignity and Spartan fortitude, the assumption, by my female relatives, of those garments which, from time immemorial, have been our rightful badge, trusting that the breach into which they were throwing themselves would prove of such an ‘imminent and deadly’ nature as to deprive them of any desire to go further. But late events have opened my eyes to the treasonable nature of their designs, and to the danger of the mine on which we have been heedlessly treading; and, regardless alike of family ties and possible consequences, I have boldly sounded the alarm which has brought us together this day. This terrible danger I discovered by chance, having picked up —in my own room, gentlemen— a letter addressed to my wife by a female friend. I will, gentlemen, read a passage from this incendiary production, premising that the preceding paragraphs, after giving an account of the late meeting at Worcester, refer to the female millennium about to commence:—

> “Now then, my dear,
> We’ll smoke and cheer and drink our lager beer;
> We’ll have our latch-keys, stay out late at nights;
> And boldly we’ll assert our female rights;
> While conquered men, our erewhile tyrant foes,
> Shall stay at home and wear our cast-off clothes,
> Nurse babies, scold the servants, get our dinners;
> ‘Tis all that they are fit for, wretched sinners!”

“Imagine my feelings on finding treason a t work in my domestic sanctuary — at detecting the wife of my bosom in a plot against my peace!”

Here Mr. Husband was so overpowered by his emotions that he was compelled to pause for a few moments, ere he recovered his voice. Deep sympathy was manifested by the audience.

“I would now repeat the necessity of prompt action, for which I doubt not the wisdom and intelligence of this assembly will be found sufficient. Our business now is to find a remedy for the evil. Let us therefore, in a bold and uncompromising manner, address ourselves to the duties before us.”

While awaiting the action of the business committee, the following letters were read from distinguished gentlemen who had been invited to attend the meeting:—

Mr. Webster stated that the onerous nature of his diplomatic duties prevented his accepting the invitation extended to him. Had it, however, been in his power to do so, he should still have declined it, as the handsome manner in which the ladies had defended him in his native State obliged him to remain neuter in the conflict between the great contending parties. He would remark, in conclusion, that, devoted as he was to the Union, faithful as he had ever been in maintaining the Constitution, he had no sympathy with anything tending to infringe the conditions of the matrimonial compact, and therefore solemnly recommended that both parties should meet and conclude a treaty of peace.

Mr. Clay regretted his necessary attendance on Congress precluded his presence at this important meeting; for, faithful to his great principle, he should have endeavored to suggest such a compromise as should reconcile all parties. But he trusted that an amiable spirit would pervade their proceedings, and unity and concord be the result.

Mr. Horace Mann repeated Jus determination of not siding with either party. He referred again to the book he was writing, which he thought would satisfy both sides.

Mr. Buckeye, of Ohio, wrote to excuse his attendance, as the duties of the pork-killing season required his attention; and Mrs. Buckeye's absence at a Socialist meeting, in the interior of the State, prevented his leaving home.

Mr. Wumenheyter, chairman of the committee, now rose to say that their report was ready. He then read the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That a crisis has arrived in our domestic relations that admits of no temporizing measures, but requires us openly to insist on those rights so boldly and outrageously assailed by that weaker portion of humanity, whose duty it is to be satisfied with the inferior position assigned them by nature, and to yield in all things to man.

Resolved, That an unblushing claim has not only been made on our clothes, but on all our masculine privileges; and as this evil has resulted, in the first place, from the impunity with which the women have put their hands in our pockets, and as it will end only in the usurpation of our business, and of our sole right to the ballot-box, it becomes necessary for us to impress upon this rebellious sex our united determination to resist their aggressions.

Resolved, That this effort becomes imperatively necessary when we consider the treacherous nature of women, and remember that, should they succeed in their attempt, we shall meet no mercy at their hands. Universal decapitation of the men, and an Amazonian form of government will undoubtedly be the result.

Resolved, That, while we shall use our lawful and united authority to put down this revolt, we will show clemency to the culprits, and, tempering justice with mercy, render their punishment as light as may be consistent with our own safety.

These resolutions were ordered to be laid on the table for discussion.

Mr. Wumenheyter said he wished particularly for the attention of the audience while he offered a few remarks on these resolutions. " He was," he said "proud to call himself a New Yorker. His city was the greatest in the world. It had a great canal, a great line, of steamships, a great many railroads, a great many bankB, and"——

Here a voice from the crowd exclaimed, " And a great many other humbugs!" Mr. W. was, for a moment, disconcerted; but, resuming his remarks, he said—

"I do not regard this rude interruption. I shall still assert the superiority of my State to all others; and, at the same time, acknowledge that, with all our talents and business enterprise, we cannot manage the women. I confess that, in our great State, the attempt on our privileges was first made ; but I can also assure this convention that we shall be the first to defend those privileges. I have been so unhappy as to have had three wives, but, fortunately, have buried them all; and I can assert, from personal experience, that

> 'Woman, woman, whether lean or fat, is
> In face an angel, and in soul a cat!'

A spirit of philanthropy urges me to warn you against the female snares which my fatal destiny has inflicted on me, and from which I am therefore desirous to save others, as my several wives were so many different forms of evil, and I suffered intensely in consequence. I hope my misery will deter others from such experiments. If I rescue one wretch from the horrors of matrimony, my purpose will be answered, and my past sufferings forgotten."

Mr. W. urged the adoption of immediate and relentless measures, and trusted that some available remedy might be suggested for the evil that was in their midst.

Cotte Bettie, Esq., from Delaware, said, "I fully agree with the gentleman from New York in his views on this terrible crisis. I am as proud of my State as he can be of his. I am not ashamed to call myself one of the Blue Hen's Chickens.' Delawarians are true blue — they always were, and always will be blue. They were the first to rally at freedom's call, and would not now be found wanting. While he thus obeyed his instructions in proffering their aid, he must at the same time, assure this assembly that it was very advisable for them to keep their proceedings as secret as possible, lest a premature disclosure should put the women on their guard."

C. Colesworth Pinokney, from South Carolina, remarked, "Had any one told him ft few months since that he should be meeting in amity with his northern brethren, he should have indignantly denied the possibility of such an act. He did not intend now, however, to allude to the difference of opinion that prevailed between the South and North; the several States of Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and South Carolina, that had appointed him a delegate to this convention, having empowered him to bury all sectional causes of discord in oblivion, and to unite energetically with the representatives of other States in putting down, this terrible conspiracy. He had come prepared, then, to assure them of the cordial co-operation of the Southern States in any action that might be taken in the crusade against women. He would only remark that there should be no delay either in their resolves or execution—'if 'twere done, 'twere well 'twere done quickly.' With this end in view, he recommended bringing before the present Session of Congress a fugitive women bill, by which every man might be empowered to reclaim and punish a runaway or rebellious wife."

Mr. Jonathan Whittle, from Massachusetts, "Guessed that there needn't be much talk about the matter. Wimmen's place was tu hum, and it was man's business to keep em there. Pritty much all they was fit for was to dry innions, make squash pies, and get a fellow a good dinner on Thanks-givin'. He calkerlated that if each indiwiddiwel present had the spunk he orter havo, he could manage his wimmen himself, without anybody to help him. Yankees knew a leetle somethin' besides makin' wooden nutmegs, mushmellion, and cowcumber seeds, and they didn't want anybody to come there and tell 'em how to do: they'd better stay tu hum, and take care of their own affairs;"

Here Mr. Whittle was called to order from all parts of the house, and sat down in a state of high indignation, wiping his face with a blue cotton handkerchief.

George Washington Patrick Henry John Randolph Powhatan, Esq., from Virginia, said, "I regret the irritable state of feeling which seems to sway the gentleman from New England. I wonder at his assertion of our Yankee brethren's ability to manage their women, when the fact is notorious that Mr. Whittle*s native State was the scene chosen for the outbreak of the rebellion. Belonging, as I do, to one of the first families in Virginia, descended in a direct line from Pocahontas on one side, and Richard Coeur de Lion on tho other, collaterally related to the Virgin Queen and a far-off connection of the present British sovereign, I know nothing of those menial duties which Mr. Whittle thinks properly distinguish the female sphere. I cannot, nor can any one associated with me, be supposed to know anything of such menial avocations. In Virginia, nothing is required of the fair sex but to give orders to their servants, and that sufficiently occupies their time. I feel proud to assert my belief that no lady from that State is mixed up in this sad affair; but, knowing the danger of bad- example, I cannot answer for the future, and am therefore ready to give my counsel both to prevention and cure. I know the female character well enough to assure this meeting that opposition will but add fuel to the flame. In short, my advice is—

> 'Let them alone and they'll come home,
> And leave their whims behind them.' "

Dr. Singleman, a middle-aged gentleman, from Vermont, thought the gentleman from Virginia mistaken in his opinion that the let-alone system was the best treatment for the epidemic raging among them. Acute diseases required active remedies. When the pulse of the domestic frame was disordered, every member of the body suffered, and depiction should be freely resorted to, and the constitution restored to a healthy state, or he would not answer for tho consequences. His idea — which he advanced with some hesitation, for, being a bachelor, he knew little of the sex — was that every man should try the effect of the three popular systems of medicine on his female relatives, and he would venture to promise the revolt would noon be quelled. A course of bleeding, leeching, and cupping, with blisters to their heads, and sinapisms on their feet, aided by hydropathic douche and plunge baths, and accompanied with homoeopathic quantities of nourishment, would tame the greatest shrew that ever lived."

Mr. Easyled, of Tennessee, said, " There is an old provorb about bachelors' wives being well managed—

> 'As for my wife,
> I would you had her spirit in such another:
> Were the third of the world yours, with a snaffle
> You may pace easy, bu t not such a wife.'

The measures that the learned physician proposes are easily suggested; but, I would ask, where is the man in this assembly who would have tho nerve to try them ? There is another old proverb that says, when you sup with a certain personage you should use a long apron; and, in this case, that precaution is very necessary. It was best to let the ladies have their own way. To quote the immortal bard again—

> 'Should all despair
> That have revolted wives, tho tenth of mankind
> Would hang themselves.'

He would inform all present, from his own sad experience, that

> 'He's a fool who thinks, by force or skill,
> To turn the current of a woman's will;
> For when she will, she will, you may depend on't,
> And when she won't, she won't, and there's an end on't.'"

Mr. Hoosier, from Indiana, u Didn't want to 'front nobody, but he.reckoned Mr. Whittle had said about the only sensible things he'd heerd that day, and them was his sentiments exactly. There was plenty for wimmen to do in the cabin, with mindin' the children and keepin' the pot a bilin', and out of it with takin care of the cattle and the farm, while the men was hard at work shootin' and fishin'. Corn-dodgers and cracklins was wimmen's business, and just about as much, he reckoned, as they'd sense for. He, for one, didn't feel afeerd of any of 'em."

General Boanerges Bluster, from Kentucky, said, "He disagreed very much with Mr. Hoosier. He once heerd a Methodist minister tell what Heaven was like, and, after talkin' a great deal about it, he said, 'In short, brethren, it's a Kentucky of a place!' He reckoned, when he said that, he forgot the wimmen. In their State, where females was three-quarters bacon, and t'other quarter hominy, they was dangerous critters. General, as he was, of the milishy, and holdin' a great many offices under government, he had to mind his wife, who was big enough to lick three of him. Last 'lection he was candidate for Congress; and, just as he was makin' a stump speech to his constichents, and was tollin' 'em what a great soldier he was, and how he'd fou't the Ingins under Harrison, and would be sure to stand up for their rights, 'cause he wa'n't afeerd of nothin', his woman walked up to him right cool, and, takin' him off the platform, said to the people, This man's a fool. I know it, 'cause I'm his wife. Ho an't fit for nothin' but to mind the house and take care of the children, while I go visitin'. I can't spare him; and you must 'lect the other candidate.' He expected he felt about as mean as dog-pie, and sneaked off as soon as ho could; and everybody hurrahed for Mrs. Bluster, and said she should go to Congress. And, ever since, she'd done nothin' but snub him, and had gone off to the wimmen's meetin' in spite of him; and 'twas her that said woman was better than man, 'cause he was made out of the raw materi'l, and she was made out of the manerfected;' and he only hoped she wouldn't find out where he was, or there'd be an orful time of it."

Mr. Sucker, from Illinois, remarked, " That it wa'n't with his own will he was at this here meetin'; but, bein" lected, he had to come; and, as it was the season for shootin' prairie hens, he wanted to be off agin. He didn't want to make words himself, and hoped that other people would be short and sweet in what they had to say. As to Mrs. Sucker, she hadn't the spirit of a mouse now, and, if she ever had, which he didn't know, the fever and ager had shuck it all out of her. He reckoned about the best way he could tell 'em of, was to send all the wimmen where they'd catch it, and, if it didn't end 'em, it would mend 'em."

Captain Salt, of Nantucket, a veteran tar in a blue roundabout and glazed hat, rose, coolly took his quid out of his month, and, depositing it in his pocket, made the following short and pithy remarks: I an't a reg'lar delergate to this here meetin', soe-in' as I'm pretty nearly all the time afloat; but, bein' as I'm ashore just now, I thought I'd come and see how things was a purceedin'. I know all about whales, and have a pretty good notion of a vessel, but I don't know nothin' about a woman. Hows'ever, I've heerd them as did say she was like a ship, 'cause her riggin' cost more than her hull. If so be that's the case, why she's easy manoovered. Keep a tight lookout for squalls, and, when you soe'em cornin', reef your sails, scud before the storm, and, if she 's bent on goin' down, take to the boats and leave her."

Captain Salt sat down amid shouts of applause, with a very red face after his unwonted exertions, and an earnest request for a glass of grog; but, none being At hand, he contented himself with his quid.

Patrick O'Dougherty, of St. Louis, got up and said, "Jontlemen, this is my first appearance before the public since I left off being an Irishman, and became a native of this country, and I hope yees will excuse all blunders. I needn't tell this enlightened meetin' that, both as an Irishman and 'Merikin, I love the purty cratures of wimmen, and, faith, I'm sorry they've got themselves in such a mess. St. Pathrick knows that, 'with my friend and pitcher,' my little Cruiskeen Lawn, and my Molly Astore, I could live all alone in a desert by myself, without any trouble; and sure never a one of me knows why ye can't manage yeer wives. Trate 'em like an Irish pig : drive 'em the way you don't want 'em to go, and they'll take the right track in spite of you."

Here Mr. O'Dougherty was interrupted by a considerable bustle in the hall. There was a great disturbance, and many gentlemen looked pale and anxious; but the excitement was allayed by the appearance of an Indian chief in his war paint, who stalked solemnly up to the platform, and spoke as follows:—

"My nation was once a great nation in the lands near the setting sun. It is now a poor, small tribe, that has sold its hunting-grounds to the Great Father, at Washington, for blankets and corn, and have sent me to have a talk with him. Waw-tu-nobow-te-ma-tu is a brave; his white brothers call him Big Bulldog, and know that he has many wives. While he smoked the calumet of peace with his Father, in the Grand Lodge at Washington, a little bird sung in his ear that bis white brothers had trouble in the wigwam with their squaws, and he has come to help them, for his heart feels heavy for them. Let my white brothers keep their women at work, hoeing corn, pounding hominy, drying venison, and minding papooses, and let them have but little to eat, and they will give them no more trouble. If they do, let my brothers take their scalps. I have said." And, whirling his tomahawk over his head, Waw-tu-no-bow-te-ma-tu gave a shrill war-whoop, and, bounding off the platform, disappeared in the crowd.

Brass Blackstone, from the city of Brotherly Love, remarked, that he had listened with attention to the proceedings, and had heard with delight the eloquent speeches delivered on this interesting occasion. It was with the modest timidity so characteristic of a Philadelphia lawyer, that he should offer a few remarks on the subject that occupied them; and he hoped it would not be considered presumptuous in him if his views should differ from those hitherto advanced in the assemblage of talent and influence, with whom it was his high privilege this day to be associated. He had deeply sympathized with all the orators it had been his good fortune to hear on this exciting subject: he had, in turn, been thrilled with the surpassing eloquence of Mr. Husband, the resolute determination of Mr. Wumenheyter, the patriotism of Pinckney, the easy indifference of Mr. Whittle, the dignified hautour of Mr.

Powhatan, the professional talent of Dr. Single-man, the commendable meekness of Mr. Easyled, the heroic submission of General Bluster, the laconic sense of Mr. Sucker, the maritime beauty of Captain Salt's similes, the enthusiasm of Mr. O'Dougherty, and the sententious wisdom of Big Bulldog. For himself, he had always been, and should ever continue to be, an ardent admirer of the fair sex. He was proud to say that his mother was a woman—that his native city was distinguished for its devotion to the fairer part of creation. Now York might boast of its canals, its railroads, its banks, and its steamships, but Philadelphia gloried in its women. He could lay his band on his heart, and proudly assert that even this rebellion had not estranged his feelings—

> 'Woman, with all thy faults, I love thee still!'

lie could even say, with the Irish bard—

> 'Sweet book, unlike the books of art,
> Whose errors are thy fairest part:
> In thee, the dear errata column
> Is the best page in all the volume.'

With these feelings, he was present on this occasion to interpose his humble abilities between them and danger. He acknowledged that his clients bad not evinced their usual sagacity in risking their quiet, but powerful influence over man, by endeavoring to grasp 'what would not enrich themselves, but make us poor indeed. Why they had done so, was a question more easily asked than answered, and he should therefore not attempt to solve the enigma. It was his business to implore that nothing should be rashly attempted on this delicate occasion which might result in wounding the feelings of his fair clients. He would assure them a little skillful management would be more effectual than open demonstrations of hostility; and, should the suggestion he was about to offer prove successful, he asked no better reward, as a man and a lawyer, than the friendship of the sex. In his opinion,

> 'Fee simple and a simple fee,
> And all the fees in tall,
> Are nothing when compared to the«v
> Thou best of fees-—fe-male.'

Not to detain them longer in suspense, he advised that the gentlemen should fill their houses with looking-glasses, and give the ladies time for reflection"

Mr. Blackstone received much applause for his suggestion; and Mr. Bowieknife, of Texas, who succeeded him, said, "I so fully agree with the gentleman from Philadelphia in his love for the sex, and in all the sentiments he has advanced, that I will only add, should the measure he has recommended fail to make peace, I hope all the ladies will come to Texas. We have hearts and arms for all of them.

> 'If all other States reject 'em,
> Ours will freely, gladly take 'em.' "

Mr. Placer, from California, remarked, "That he was for no half-way measures. It was his opinion that all the women ought to be seized and sent to California; it was a new country, and the minors wanted wives. When they were once there, he thought they could be managed. Judge Lynch was an active man. Show them that there was only the difference of a letter between altar and halter, and, if they would not marry, why let them hang!"

Mr. J. P. Husband said, "He had listened with astonishment to the proceedings of the day. He really thought that, for all the good that had been done or suggested, gentlemen might as well have staid at home. He had a few words still to offer on the subject, which he hoped they would hear with patience. Among other things, he had prepared a list of all the bad women who had ever existed." Hero Mr. Wumenheyter remarked, "That he must remind the gentleman time was precious; and, as all women who had ever existed were bad, Mr. Husband had better mention only the worst of them, among whom he must not forget his (Mr. W.'s) throe wives."

Mr. Husband was so disconcerted at this interruption, that he forgot what he had to say, and could only remember that his list begun with Eve, and ended with the present generation. "I see clearly, gentlemen," continued he, "that no one enters so warmly into this subject as myself. Well, be it so. I am ready to fall a martyr in such a cause; and I here solemnly declare that no obstacle shall induce me to swerve from the path that duty marks out for me to follow. I will make every endeavor to extirpate this vile heresy among the women. I will immolate myself on the altar of my country. I will sacrifice my domestic affections on its shrine —Mrs. Husband herself"——

"Here I am, my dear" said a sharp voice, and a small, thin, vinegar-faced lady entered the room, and walked up to the platform, at the head of a numerous procession of females. "My love," continued she, "it is late; I am afraid you will take cold. Hadn't you better come home?"

"If you think so, my dear, certainly," replied Mr. Husband, turning pale, and trembling so he could scarcely stand, perceiving which, his wife affectionately offered him her arm. Mr. Easyled meekly obeyed an imperative gesture from Mrs. Easyled, and Mrs. Bluster picked up the general, who had fainted, and carried him out in her arms.

Exeunt omnes, in wild confusion.

Feature image of Independence Hall from Wikipedia Commons.

Women's and Men's Rights

Peter Wright · 3 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following short article, entitled Women's and Men's Rights, appeared in the 1875 volume Historic and literary miscellany, by G.M.D. Bloss. – PW

* * *

THERE have recently been Women's Rights conventions in New York and Boston. The general drift of the proceedings was to show the wrongs of woman under the laws of society at present constituted. There were plenty of facts to show that in many instances women, at the present time, were ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-sheltered ; that their employment was not remunerative in many cases, and that under their afflictions they were driven often to live a life of vice and crime.

All this will be freely admitted and universally regretted. But, and the question may be asked with emphasis, are these wrongs peculiar to women? Do they alone suffer them? Is there a discrimination against the sex? We unhesitatingly answer in the negative. Would man–yea, would man, who is endowed with that wonderful right of suffrage, which in the eyes of these reformers is the great cure for all the grievances of the sex, not be enabled to find as serious cause of complaint as those made by his female associate?

How many men of ability and intelligence, willing to work, are trodden down in the battle of life? How many are scantily fed, miserably clad, and barely sheltered, who labor with assiduity from the rising to the setting sun? To the ill requital of man's labor, in hundreds and thousands of instances, may be attributed woman's calamities.

For one woman who is driven by destitution to sin and shame, there are probably ten men. If one sex more than the other has the right to be restive under society as it is now constituted, it is the male. He makes the laws, it is true, but who derive the greatest benefit from them? In cases at law and equity, where the two sexes are antagonistic, who is generally the loser? Women are seldom convicted of criminal offenses, where men would be certain to suffer the penalty. They always, or nearly always, succeed before a jury of men, in civil cases.

In most of the States they can hold property in their own name, and while in the position of a fem-covert– their property is exempt from execution, even upon their own contracts. They are exempt from all military and jury duty, and from many other labors of serious import, which fall upon the males alone. They receive all the courtesies of society. They are the first at the feasts, and all the reserved seats everywhere are for them.

The state in which we live is very far from being perfection; men and women are joint sufferers by a false and ill-regulated condition of society. There is no antagonism between them, and they are enemies of both man and woman who desire to create the impression that either sex is enjoying rights at the other's expense, or suffer infliction for the other's benefit. They are our partners in the great trials and misfortunes which an All-wise Creator has imposed upon all the sons and daughters of Adam, and from which there is no escape by either this side of the grave.

Whatever improvements and reforms of modern society are demanded, should be in the name of both, and for both, instead of one. "A Men's Rights Convention," to redress the wrongs of the men alone, leaving the females alone where they are, would be selfish and ungrateful. Scarcely less so are those of the strong-minded woman, who has no eye and no compassion for the sufferings of any but her own sex.
Feature image of Adam and Eve by Michael Coghlan

Unlaced

AVfM Video Source · 4 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Today we feature a moving short film from film maker Patrick Ortman.

More from Patrick Ortman.

Feminism Appeals to Female Losers the Same Way that PUA Appeals to Male Losers

Rachael Lefler · 4 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

When “Better Call Pauls” covered the topic of pick-up artists, I thought they were spot-on by saying that these people are scam artists taking advantage of the fact that men/boys of my generation were raised with poor social skills. And not only that, but being raised in a feminist environment by single mothers and mostly female teachers means often times, boys have grown up feeling ashamed of themselves just for being male. They tend to grow up being made to feel that masculine and dominant behavior is yucky and rapey, and so any urge to be authentically male is stifled in them, until all that energy bursts like one of their zits. So young men feel like if they can’t live up to the feminists’ standards for male docility, they must instead overcompensate by swinging the other way, becoming total misogynists, and then wondering why their obvious attempts to “score” women as if they were some kind of video game currency usually fail. It’s a nightmare, and the ease of getting laid for women is one reason I’m glad to be one.

But, while it’s easy to get laid if you’re a woman, women are hard wired to screen potential mates and select only high-quality ones, which leads many of them to be just as sexually frustrated as a man who can’t get any. And when this happens, feminism steps in to tell these lonely, depressed women, look honey, it’s not you. It’s not that he can smell dick on your breath from another guy on the first date. It’s not that you dress with nothing left up to the imagination and, being on public display like a Christmas tree, makes you easy to get and therefore not worth pursuing. It’s not that you look like a misshapen cross between a particularly ugly termite queen and an Oompa Loompa and make no effort to lose weight, smell good, or otherwise improve your appearance. It’s not that you offer nothing he needs that he can’t get for cheaper chatting with a stranger online than he can get after blowing $40 or more on you for a dinner date. It’s not that while on said dinner date you’re lousy company because you can’t keep up a basic fucking conversation for 5 minutes without staring at your phone. It’s not because you don’t give a damn about him or any other guy and only ever use them for sex and occasional favors and free drinks/meals. It’s not because you don’t have any genuine interests or hobbies or contributions to society that make you noteworthy. It’s not that you lack skills and talents that go beyond speed-texting and walking in really high heels.

Nope, it’s that damn patriarchy. See honey, because you’re not a Barbie and therefore not living up to the impossible standards the patriarchy places on women (you know in case having like 50 advanced degrees while still looking 24 didn’t tip you off to the fact that Barbie isn’t anyone’s “standard” of what they expect a real woman to be), that and only that is the reason why your dream guy won’t call you after a one-night stand. See, while the cultural message to the male who fails at getting laid is “work harder and improve yourself”, the cultural message to the female who fails at landing her dream guy, even if he’s way out of her league and she has nothing to offer him, is always “it’s everyone’s fault except yours”.

Feminism perpetuates this idea. Dieting for your New Year’s resolution or to get a beach body by summer? The thing on display won’t just be your toned abs, but also your sad, pathetic case of internalized misogyny and fat-shaming, your desperation to conform to patriarchal perfectionism. Plucking those eyebrows or waxing that cooter? You’re just conforming to “the patriarchy’s” expectation that you look like a child as an adult, because all men are pedophiles and that’s why they prefer a smooth body to a hairy one. (Can’t have anything to do with the fact that smooth skin shows signs of estrogen and femininity as well as youth which signifies fertility, no it’s all about how men are evil for having certain aesthetic preferences.)

Basically, what we’re being told as young women is that every guy we could possibly want should be grateful that we want him, and therefore not reciprocating our feelings for him makes him the bad guy. The onus is not on women to make themselves more attractive or more presentable or even more quality company in general, it’s solely on men to force themselves to gracefully accept even the most unwanted of “gifts” in this regard. That is why we still have a culture that for the most part believes that boys and men cannot be victims of rape if the perpetrator is a woman. It's her job to decide if she wants to or not, it's his job to go along with whatever she wants, whether she says yes or no. We live in a society that is so invested in protecting women's feelings that it barely even gives men the basic right to sexual consent or refusal; when a woman decides to say "yes", his "yes" is implied and expected.

Women, we need to stop expecting this. We need to stop blaming others for our own singleness and loneliness. We need to stop seeing relationships with guys as a "what can I get out of him" deal and start seeing them in a healthier way. Start looking in the mirror and assessing, both inwardly and outwardly, about yourself needs to change. And then commit yourself to making those changes. The feminists want to tell you a seductive lie; that you don't need to change yourself at all, because you're already perfect. Do they know you at all? No? So why are they saying that? They're saying that because sexually frustrated single women are their biggest target for recruitment.

I'll make no secret out of it, I was at my most feminist when I was also at my most hopelessly single. I was alone, I was miserable, I had come almost to the verge of rape to get what I wanted. Reading and sharing feminist memes and literature became a crutch for my wounded ego. I was too socially retarded to talk to men in real life, but I had no problem projecting my baggage onto them so that I would feel less inadequate. Feminism rests entirely on this belief in omnipotent, omnibenevolent, omniscient femaleness. If you are biologically female (or sometimes, psychologically female), you are a powerful, wise, and sexy goddess no matter what nasty boys say about you. Everything to the contrary is a patriarchal, capitalist lie designed to make you feel like crap about yourself to buy more concealer and hairspray. They protect every bad, or simply unfortunate, woman out there in an ego-cushioning cocoon of compliments to their sex and disparagements to the other sex. But that kind of thing actually does more harm than good, because it's really just learning self-mastery and self-improvement that helps someone in the dating realm, not false hope from phony feel-good memes and slogans.

In my experience, it has always been the worst people who are the least open to criticism and judgments from others. It's like they can smell "their own shit on their knees", as Marilyn Manson penned, but their egos are too fragile for them to acknowledge this, so anyone who smells it and gags at them is reckoned in their brains as a malicious bully, a liar who is just making bad things up about them just to hurt their feelings. That is why feminists, generally speaking, are so closed off when it comes to allowing open, honest feedback from people who don't agree with their beliefs. They don't want comments on any of their posts from non-feminists, and this should point to the one thing you should understand about contemporary feminism; it's all about padding their own sensitive egos. It's about sheltering themselves mentally from any and all feedback, because they know that they suck somewhere, deep down, but are forever bent on refusing to acknowledge that they have a problem and seek help for it. I hope they have fun continuing to strike down every child who can see that the empress is naked. But I don't need that kind of lying bullshit in my life anymore.

The other consent

Dennis Michaels · 5 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by AndyaDontStop on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

DISCLAIMER:
I am not a lawyer. If I was one, I would've written a long and boring paragraph stating that nothing in this article constitutes legal advice. Since I am not a lawyer, this will suffice.

Let's talk about consent. No, not THAT consent. This article is not about the virtues of affirmative, explicit, unambiguous, verbal, continuous, ongoing and post-coital, enthusiastic, mutual, insert-adjective-here consent. Nor is this article a condemnation of unnecessarily broad and ambiguous policies that, if implemented, would deem every man who ever had sex a rapist. Yes, even you[i], Mr. Futrelle (unless, of course… yeah, that would explain a lot.) No, this article is about a completely different topic. An activity that I firmly believe absolutely must not require consent of all parties involved.

I remember just 10 years ago people complaining about the ubiquity of the CCTV cameras and how people feel they are invaded and their privacy is violated. But the cultural landscape had shifted rather quickly. Today almost everybody has a smartphone capable of recording, and we very quickly caught on to how useful that is. Today, there are people who are free who would've been in jail without the ever-present recording devices. Conversely, there are people who would've gotten away with their crimes if they weren't caught on camera. Police especially enjoys the privilege of being automatically believed in my word against theirs scenario. The evidence seems to show that privilege is undeserved[ii]. Most people seem to have moved on and accepted the radical idea that privacy is for the things you do in private. There is no such thing as privacy in public space. Well, there's Melissa Clickbait and #mizzou special snowflakes, but that's a story for another day and only tangential to AVFM's mission.

So let's get some terminology straight. All party consent laws require permission of all parties in a conversation before it can be recorded. Single party consent laws require consent of only one party to a conversation, and if you are a part of that conversation, it is assumed you have your own consent. If you don't have your own consent, that is a completely different issue and is best addressed by a psychiatrist.

I live in a country that has one party consent through all jurisdictions. Long ago I adopted the policy of not saying anything I don't want on the record. Even if I absolutely knew for a fact I am not being recorded, I would continue with that policy. What is the practical difference between being recorded and not being recorded? The opportunity to lie about it later. Hence, I think of all party consent laws as "the right to commit perjury" laws. I'm an honest man. I have no use for that opportunity. I don't want that "right". Heck, I don't even want that temptation. Of course, disingenuous people can quote mine the recording or edit it in a dishonest manner. But note the right to have that recording is not the right to do anything you want with it. What is the best way to counter a maliciously edited recording, but to have you own, with full context in all its glory.

'But so what?' some of you may say. Is this a men's rights issue? The right to commit perjury may be unjust and unfair, but it is unjust and unfair in a gender neutral way. MHRM already has its plate full. Let someone else fight that battle. I only need three letters to counter that argument: ABR.

There is a reason why Always Be Recording mantra emerged from the manosphere and not some feminist-run hate blogs. The feminist track record speaks for itself. They don't want the right to collect evidence; they want the privilege of being believed without evidence. Some of them even openly admit to it. This insanity goes all the way up to the presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

Slow down for a minute and think about what is being said here. It is not simply the right to be heard. It is not the right to be taken seriously. It is not the right to have your allegation thoroughly investigated. It is the right to be believed. Of course, she temporarily suspended the right to be believed when her own husband was accused of sexual assault. Honesty and integrity is not the strong suit for politicians, doubly so for Clintons.

I can think of very few things more monstrous then being presumed guilty until proven innocent. But being presumed guilty after proven innocent makes that a very short list. Look back at the Hofstra rape hoax. What saved the lives of the innocent men falsely accused? It is not simply the recording of the consensual sexual encounter. It is the combination of that recording and single party consent. What if exactly the same situation transpired in Montana instead of New York? Perhaps it did, and we have no way of knowing that.

It fascinates me how often the same people who think women have the right to be believed also think that a man is a creep for religiously practicing ABR. The right to commit perjury is not inherently sexist, but it does give the extra sting to the misandrist denial of due process. Many American states have mandatory arrest of the man laws and women good, men bad primary aggressor laws. I cross-referenced that with the right to commit perjury states and found an ounce of good news in the pile of shit. This particular Vienne diagram does not have the zone where all three overlap. I have neither time nor desire to research all laws around the world. If there is a place where all three laws exist, I would strongly advise any man to move out immediately. Such a jurisdiction should only be populated by lesbians and celibate monks. The butch lesbians should consider leaving as well. Even two of these laws overlapping are too much. If you are reading this from Washington, stop reading now. Turn off the computer and start packing.

Of course, single party consent does not eliminate all problems of misandrist laws and due process denial. Imagine that Beyonce is performing on stage with that huge feminist sign behind her. A male fan bypasses security and begins to grind against her on stage. Beyonce responds with a surprisingly powerful punch to the face. Do you think she would be arrested for assault, or hailed as a hero and feminist icon, while the man is hauled off to be prosecuted for sexual assault? Now gender-flip that and Google 'Afroman punches fan'. (TRIGGER WARNING: If you are really stupid, you may not realize that search results will contain scenes of violence.)

Why was Ray Rice arrested and Solange Knowles wasn't? Why was De'Andre Johnson arrested and the woman who punched him in the face wasn't? Why did Jorge Pena spend four nights in jail for the crime of self-defence? We still live in a society where male-on-female violence is seen as inherently wrong, no ifs and buts, while female-on-male violence requires a nuanced analysis of ifs and buts (Who wants to take bets on feminist bloggers quote mining that sentence?) Just kidding, no nuanced analysis is required. Women only use violence in self-defence. But even in the face of that injustice, there is some good news. MRAs are not simply asking these questions, but asking with the fingers pointed at the surveillance footage. And yes, I know, surveillance footage without sound is not covered by the same laws as the recording of a conversation. But my bigger point still stands; the importance of the right to ABR.

The right to ABR should be a part of MHRM mission just as much genital integrity and binding prenups. I hereby solemnly swear to avoid like the plague the right to commit perjury jurisdictions. Paul Elam, take note when scouting the location for the next ICMI.

Now, onto some good news: We have the once-in-a-lifetime chance of co-opting the Social Justice Warriors to do our bidding for us. The right to commit perjury is not just for women and the right to ABR is not just for men. Anyone who does not live under the rock is aware that minorities end up on the receiving end of police abuse more often than privileged crackers like me. It has long been observed that black men are the canary in the mine for men in general. While police unions and BLM are fighting over mandatory body cams, let's slip into the list of demands elimination of the right to commit perjury laws.

Intersectionality FTW.

---

[i] https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/volokh-conspiracy/wp/2014/06/23/you-are-a-rapist-yes-you

[ii]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3029597/Cop-charged-black-man-s-murder-opening-fire-eight-times-shooting-ran-away-saying-did-felt-threatened.html

The Feminist Problem

AVfM Video Source · 6 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A host of people, some you may know, express their own positions on feminism.

More great content from Men's Rights Edmonton can be found here.

Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai of Luton, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 6 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Murtaza Khanbhai

Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Circumcision Centre website circumcisioncentre.co.uk:

"Private Medical Clinic – Circumcision Services in the UK

Our services cover all age ranges – from infants (under a year old), through younger boys (under 8), to older boys and adult men. We choose the best possible circumcision procedure for every patient and have both pre and post-operative care and consultation to ensure that every patient and their family get the best possible treatment.

You can also purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren for Eid, Christmas or any other festival. Please contact us for further information.

We specialise in male circumcision, so not only are you assured of the best possible care, but will also be treated by doctors with many years of experience in circumcisions.

All our Doctors are specially trained in best practice to circumcise men of all ages. Our doctors are either Urologists or G.P.s and are all registered with the GMC."

So, you can "purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren" if . . . your grandchild is a boy, and you wish to force partial genital amputation on him as a gift for Christmas.

Then there's this ironic bit of marketing:

> Book Early for Holidays
> We are now taking bookings for the summer holidays. Please book early to avoid disappointment.

From their other website thornhillclinic.co.uk we find the names of the doctors at the Circumcision Centre, as well as the manager:

> Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai MBChB MRCGP MRCS DPD, Dr. M Ruhul Amin BSc (Hons) MBChB, Mr. Darrel Gregory MInstLM Dip.RSA – manager, Mr. Farooq Ali Khan BSc. (Hons) MBBS (Distinction) FRCS (Urol), Mr. M Asad Saleemi MBBS, MSc (Urol), FRCS (Urol)

The other website advertises it's General Practice for mostly adult men – while doing great business as circumcision experts – yet the only training they have or service they perform on infants is circumcision.

It's encouraging to see that the clinic helps men and their health (see Movember photos here), but it's greatly at odds with performing genital mutilation on unconsenting baby boys.

Under "Our Procedures:"

> Circumcision Procedures and Recommended Methods
>
> PlastiBell ® or the new Circumplast® – Both Perfect for Younger Boys
> The doctors in The Circumcision Centre are vastly experienced and use the patented PlastiBell® device (made by Hollister Incorporated) and the new Circumplast® (made in Australia) for circumcising young boys and babies. This procedure, developed in the USA, is quick, straightforward and virtually pain-free for your son.

There's no way of knowing if this procedure is "virtually pain-free."

See these graphic photos of circumcisions using different 'devices' including the Plastibell – scary to think people invent and USE instruments such as these.

Under "Circumcision Information" we read graphic explanations of different circumcision methods and a glossary of terms related to this surgery and male genitals, but NO INFORMATION ABOUT RISKS AND COMPLICATIONS. You can read that info here at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "Our Services" we see:

> Prime Service
> Every patient has access to the best possible treatment.
>
> Priority Service
> For those who want more privacy and personal attention.
>
> Ceremonial Service
> For those who see circumcision as a family or religious celebration.

Unless you pay extra, you and your baby won't have a private room, no pre- or post-operative consultation, and no souvenir program. Sounds to me like the human equivalent of a "puppy mill," a "cutting mill" with baby boys crowded into rooms on an (dis)assembly line of genital mutilation.

A "souvenir program," really?

Under "About Us:"

> Information for Doctors Interested in Working With The Circumcision Centre
> The Circumcision Centre is actively searching for GPs and surgeons to meet the growing number of enquiries and patients.
>
> We believe that performing circumcisions is a great way to add some surgery into your weekly schedule whilst at the same time serving your practice better.
>
> All existing Circumcision Centre affiliated Doctors testify enthusiastically to the benefits of working with us.
>
> If you would like to find out more about how to be affiliated with The Circumcision Centre, then please contact us. All we need is your name, GMC number and email address. We are in need of qualified, trained and enthusiastic Doctors to serve our patients today!

So, "add some surgery into your weekly schedule," ruin someone's sex life, and take away their human rights as well.

> Looking to Run Your Own Clinic?
> We need surgeons with a minimum FRCS (Paediatric Urology) to head up new private clinics proposed in London, Birmingham & Manchester.
>
> These will become whole day Saturday clinics, first operation 9.00 AM and the last operation commencing at 4.00 PM. This is a fantastic opportunity for a self-starter looking to run their own practice. Please contact us today for further information.

Horrifyingly, this is big business that is expanding by spreading lies and misinformation, and governments failing to protect baby boys the same as baby girls.

Here's an article about the clinic from 2011.

ALERT MGM 101: Video of "The Doctors" TV show about circumcision – can you guess who is on what side?

Dr. Khanbhai's practice information follows:

Thornhill clinic
1-3 Thornhill Rd, Luton, Bedford LU4 8EY, United Kingdom
Phone:+44 1582 561999
circumcisioncentre.co.uk

info@thornhillclinic.co.uk
https://twitter.com/AVoiceforMen/status/684861935821701121

The Fiamengo File Episode 19

Steve Brulé · 6 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Fiamengo discusses the feminist inability to understand and avoid the logical fallacies while promoting hatred of men at Simon Fraser University (SFU).

Open Letter
https://gswssucgc.wordpress.com/

The forgotten men: sexual abuse of males in Cambodia

David Hutt · 6 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Huge numbers of males are raped in Cambodia. So why do these horrific crimes remain largely ignored by rights organisations and the media?

The attack took place more than a decade ago. A young, long-haired man was at a dancing ceremony in a small Cambodian village when five men forced him into a nearby field. Beaten and bloodied, he was then violently gang-raped. When they finished, they inserted a Coca-Cola bottle into his anus and then ripped it out. It tore his rectum. They left the young man to bleed to death.

It is a warm Monday evening in Phnom Penh and, sat in a small French restaurant, Alastair Hilton shakes his head as he recounts the story.

In 2008, Hilton, who was working as a social work consultant at the time, wrote a groundbreaking report, titled I Thought It Could Never Happen To Boys. It was the first piece of research to focus solely on male victims of sexual abuse in Cambodia. The fatal gang-rape was just one incident it documented. There were others: young boys made to masturbate by monks in pagodas; motorbike drivers paying 1,000 riel ($0.25) for oral sex; street-living boys violently beaten until they submitted to anal sex. Sometimes the perpetrators were foreign; mostly they were Cambodian.

Gathering these stories wasn't easy. Hilton explains that the sexual abuse of males in Cambodia remains largely ignored, disbelieved by many and denied by both perpetrator and victim, for whom there is much to lose by speaking out.

When such stories are discovered, Hilton says, typical reactions often range from: 'That's about homosexuality, not abuse,' and 'You're gay if you allow that to happen,' to 'He must have wanted it to happen because he didn't defend himself.'

Furthermore, the victim's family might abandon him; teachers, family and friends might ridicule him; and parents might not want their daughters to marry him. He also might have caught HIV. Without support, many will go on to suffer mental health issues, turn to drugs as a way of coping or see violence as a means of expressing their pain. For some, life might just be too agonising to continue with.

"In patriarchal societies, such as Cambodia, males are essentially defined by their resilience and females by their vulnerability… For males, if you ask for help, it's a sign of weakness; you're less than a man," says Jarrett Davis, an independent research consultant who has studied the sexual abuse of males in Cambodia, Thailand and the Philippines.

Despite such stigma, in recent years many courageous boys and men have come forward. At a conference in May, Samleang Seila, the director of Action Pour Les Enfants (APLE), said that of the 650 cases of sexual abuse the local child's rights NGO had dealt with, 53% of the victims were males, aged between seven and 17. In 2013, a nationwide survey carried out by Unicef and the Cambodian government found that 5.6% of males aged between 18 and 24 said they had experienced sexual abuse prior to becoming 18 years old, compared to 4.4% of females.

Despite such evidence, Hilton says that only a handful of NGOs in the country are doing enough for male victims: Hagar International, M'lop Tapang, APLE, Friends International and First Step Cambodia, where Hilton works as a technical advisor. He says that other NGOs, including the UN programmes, overlook and rarely speak about male victims of sexual abuse, instead focusing their efforts on females. "If you stacked up all the research about female victims of sexual abuse in Cambodia it would reach the ceiling, but about male victims there'd be a few pieces of paper scattered on the floor," he says.

Among those scattered pieces of paper would be the seven studies written by Davis. In one, More Than Gender, about the lives of transgender persons in Phnom Penh, one interviewee spoke about being raped more than 50 times, and another to being gang-raped by 15 men.

“Particularly with the UN, it’s incredibly difficult to get them to pay attention to the needs of males,” Davis says. “For them, vulnerability is about females. And when they describe research and other initiatives for the protection of ‘women and children’, in practice, they often mean women and girls… Those with the most influence to impact the conversation on vulnerability are often the ones least willing to change.”

A case in point is the 2013 UN report titled Why Do Some Men Use Violence Against Women and How Can We Prevent It? The multi-country study in Asia-Pacific found that one in five interviewed Cambodian men admitted to sexually abusing a female. However, just 229 words of the 107-page report mentioned men abusing other males, with 3% of Cambodian respondents admitting to this. The issue of women sexually abusing males was not mentioned.

Hilton recalls an incident three years ago at a Unicef-organised conference. After hearing reports of the high prevalence of male sexual abuse globally, a UN expert from Washington announced: “Maybe it’s just boys messing around.” At another event, an attendee exclaimed: “Don’t expect me to feel sorry for men.” And then there’s the former NGO worker who told him that she had to “fight” to get male victims included in a report. “The level of ignorance is shocking at times,” Hilton says.

What Hilton and Davis believe has happened is that a troubling narrative has been developed and accepted. It says that males are ‘perpetrators’ and females are ‘victims’, that females are more likely to be abused than males and that even when males are abused it is less serious and they can probably cope better than females.

“The media accepts and reflects this,” Hilton says. “Photos of vulnerable-looking, brown-skinned girls sitting in a corner are much better for the media than boys”, whose reaction to abuse might be different, manifesting itself as aggression or awkwardness.

A look through the archives of the Phnom Penh Post, Cambodia Daily and Southeast Asia Globe reveals a clear tendency to report on female victims more than males. The exception to the rule, Hilton says, is when foreigners are the perpetrators.

Donors and society at large are no doubt affected by such depictions, but when these concerns were put to a handful of international and local NGOs they were denied.

“Unicef is guided by the Convention on the Rights of the Child, where boys and girls should be fairly treated… Unicef ensures non-discrimination of its assistance and support to all children, boys and girls,” reads a written statement provided by Bruce Grant, chief of the child protection unit at Unicef Cambodia.

Likewise, Sokunthea Chhan, head of the women’s and children’s rights section at the Cambodian Human Rights and Development Association (Adhoc), says that her organisation provides equal services to both genders. She adds that all of the 201 cases Adhoc assisted with last year involved females as the abused party.

“Adhoc recognises that there is a strong focus on female victims of sexual abuse in Cambodia – our view is that this emphasis is justified,” she says. “It logically follows that because women and children represent the overwhelming majority of victims of sexual abuse, a concerted effort should be made to ensure that special services and considerations are in place for them. We do not believe that special consideration for the needs of women victims… detracts from the support services that male victims deserve and receive.”

Savann Oeurm, regional communication officer at Oxfam America in Cambodia, said he wasn’t sure if the organisation was working with such an issue.

But Mike Nowlin, the deputy country director of Hagar Cambodia, said that some NGOs are “not yet” doing enough to help male victims.

Hilton suspects that money may be a reason. The logic goes like this: the international community sees information about abused males as a threat to their existing financial resources as it will take their already overstretched funds away from females. This was denied by the NGOs contacted by Southeast Asia Globe.

“The truth is,” Hilton says, “services and resources for females are also not adequate, but what’s needed is more resources for all.”

He adds that finding funding for NGOs that focus on male victims is “almost impossible”. When working for a similar organisation in the UK, he says they were funded by a trust for ‘unpopular causes’, meaning male sexual abuse was classified alongside leprosy.

There may be another reason for the accepted narrative. Hilton leans forward and stresses that he strongly supports women’s rights and that support for males should not be interpreted as being less supportive of women. “But,” he says, “the politics of feminism and the way it is interpreted often steers people away from understanding boys and men as anything but perpetrators… Gender politics of the 1970s, ’80s and ’90s has morphed into social welfare policies that exclude half the population and has become the dominant narrative.”

Theresa de Langis disagrees. She is a specialist on women’s human rights in armed conflict and post-conflict settings and lead researcher at the Cambodian Women’s Oral History Project.

She contends that feminist advocacy helped to broaden the International Criminal Court’s definition of sexual violence to include women and men, girls and boys. She adds that women’s rights advocates have pushed for decades to help make the issue of sexual abuse a global conversation.

“It’s only recently that attention has broadened to include men as victims of sexual violation,” she says. “I absolutely empathise with any movement that is trying to raise awareness for victims… [but] it’s important to remember that, whether committed against men or women, sexual violence must be linked to power and gender relations in society.”

She adds that, even when males are the victims, most often it’s men who are the perpetrators. “So it’s still within the framework of gendered power relations and violent masculinities with the aim to disempower, or ‘feminise’, the victim.”

“What about when the perpetrator is female?” I ask. In Davis’ 2014 study on the sexual exploitation of street children in Sihanoukville, I Want To Be Brave, one boy said his first sexual experience was at the age of three and, as with many of the cases, that first experience was with an adult woman.

“When a female is the perpetrator,” De Langis says, “she is often trying to assume ‘masculine’ cultural roles within a patriarchal society. It’s important to understand that sexualised violence against women and men have distinct causes and impacts.”

Hilton counters that De Langis’ statement essentially means that “women cannot be abusers in their own right”. He also emails a link to an opinion piece in the Independent written in response to a 21-year-old woman being spared a prison sentence by a UK court after being found guilty of having sex with an 11-year-old boy. The judge claimed the boy was “mature” for his age, and the woman “immature”.

“When men are sexually assaulted by women, we often fail to take the victims seriously because of gender stereotyping about power dynamics,” the piece reads.

This is not dissimilar to a comment by Lara Stemple, director of the Health and Human Rights Law Project at the University of California, who was quoted in an influential 2011 Guardian article, saying: “Ignoring male [sexual abuse] not only neglects men, it also harms women by reinforcing a viewpoint that equates ‘female’ with ‘victim’, thus hampering our ability to see women as strong and empowered. In the same way, silence about male victims reinforces unhealthy expectations about men and their supposed invulnerability.”

For Hilton, incremental changes are taking place in Cambodia. First Step Cambodia works in several provinces and trains an increasing number of local staff from other NGOs. In May the South-South Institute, an organisation that focuses on the issue of male sexual abuse, held a week-long conference in Phnom Penh, the first of its kind in Asia.

“When you have to listen every day to accounts of men and boys being raped, you just wish people would take the issue more seriously, more quickly,” Hilton says. “Perhaps, in the future, sexual abuse victims will be seen as human beings and individuals, not just identified by their gender.”

■ Article published with permission of Southeast Asia Globe.
■ Feature image by ND Strupler

Andy Bob exposes feminist hatred of gay men in new book

Paul Elam · 7 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Some of you may recall Andy Bob's seminal series of articles on Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism. If you did read it, you won't need the reminder.

Our friend, Andy Bob (Matthew Lye), not satisfied with simply writing an epic indictment of feminism from the perspective of a man who happens to be gay, also gave his agreement to help our mission by letting us turn that series into a book. With an introduction by yours truly and a foreword by David Palmer, the book is now available on Amazon Kindle. As ebook sales allow, we will also take on the expense of having it formatted for print on demand and eventually on audio book in Matthew's voice.

The book, The New Gay Liberation: Escaping the Fag End of Feminism, is a scorching indictment of feminist hatred of all things male, meticulously documented and unassailably cogent. It is instant classic material and will forever answer the question: What do you give a gay man who already has feminism?

I'd like to take the opportunity to encourage all MHRAs, male feminists and fence sitters, gay, straight or transgender, to purchase this book. At $4.99 it is a great way to support the mission here and to acknowledge Matthew's unique and critically important contributions to the discussion of sexual politics in the modern age.

And if you would, please share this on your social media pages as well as with friends and family. The long coopted voice of gay men now has another, better platform. We need to make sure it is heard in as many places as possible.

BUY IT HERE.

It's a wonderful life...or is it?

Doug Mortimer · 7 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It never fails to amaze me how ingesting the red pill alters one's perceptions, not just of the present but of the past. A case in point is the classic holiday movie, It's a Wonderful Life, sometimes referred to as director Frank Capra's masterpiece.

Just in case there are a few readers who haven't seen this 1946 film, let's start with a brief synopsis of what has sometimes been called the American counterpart of Dickens' Christmas Carol. In short, the film swaps out Christmas Past, Present, and Future for Christmas What If…. This time around, however, the Scrooge figure is the antagonist, and the protagonist is reminiscent of Bob Cratchit .

Like the Dickens tale, the story takes place entirely on Christmas Eve with flashbacks and flash forwards. The protagonist, George Bailey (James Stewart), has spent his entire life in Bedford Falls, a small town in upstate New York. After a lifetime of being a good citizen and family man, he is at his wit's end and contemplating suicide.

George's plight is brought to the attention of higher forces who assign a guardian angel, Clarence Oddbody, to prevent George from killing himself. Clarence is a second-class angel on a mission to earn his wings and thus become a first-class angel. "Every time a bell rings, an angel gets his wings" is a repeated line in the film – and perhaps the most quoted line even today.

Clarence succeeds in preventing George's suicide, but when George tells him he wishes he'd never been born, Clarence takes him on a "what if" journey and shows him what a dump Bedford Falls would have been if he'd never existed. "Strange, isn't it?" observes Clarence. "Each man's life touches so many other lives. When he isn't around he leaves an awful hole, doesn't he?" George gets it, gets a new lease on life, and comes to the realization that…it's a wonderful life!

I realize the above paragraph makes Santa Claus Conquers the Martians sound like hard-boiled realism. In truth, Frank Capra's movies were sometimes referred to as Capra Corn. Nevertheless, if one has never seen It's a Wonderful Life, trust me, it taps a very deep well in human experience and is so well crafted it would be difficult for the most hardened cynic not to respond to it at some level.

But this time around – my first red-pill viewing – I had a new perspective. When George wishes he'd never been born, it is tantamount to wishing he'd gone MGTOW.

In the flashbacks, George is a young man of promise. "He is an intelligent, smart and ambitious young man," observes Mr. Potter (Lionel Barrymore), George's skinflint nemesis. "A young man who's been dying to get out on his own ever since he was born…the smartest one in the crowd…a young man who has to sit by and watch his friends go places because he's trapped."

George himself had said, "I'm shakin' the dust of this crummy little town off my feet and I'm gonna see the world….And then I'm gonna build things. I'm gonna build airfields. I'm gonna build skyscrapers a hundred stories high, I'm gonna build bridges a mile long!"

Unfortunately, circumstances conspire to keep George mired in Bedford Falls. Michael Corleone's famous Godfather III declaration, "Just when I thought I was out…they pull me back in," could just as easily have been uttered by George Bailey.

What really cements George's fate is marriage. He succumbs to Mary Hatch, a girl who has had designs on him since they were children. Here the casting of Donna Reed to play the mature version of Mary is spot on. If any actress was ever capable of responding to male mother need, it was Donna Reed, who exudes wamrth and understanding in every scene. Seven years later, she won the Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress as a tender chippie who comforts the troubled Montgomery Clift in From Here to Eternity. Shifting to television, she played the wise, warm materfamilias on The Donna Reed Show from 1958 to 1966. If that was before your time, suffice to say it was another of those tradcon sitcoms that feminists are still denigrating.

I'm tempted to classify Donna Reed as a NAWALT, but then I remind myself…it's only a movie…it's only a movie…it's only a movie.

Predictably, Mary reels in George, even though he has asserted "I don't want to get married…ever – to anyone! You understand that? I want to do what I want to do." After he utters those words, you know his fate is sealed.

So George gets married, but at least he has a whirlwind honeymoon to look forward to…until an economic crisis forces him to postpone it…forever. Then come the children…one, two, three, four (most famously, daughter ZuZu, played by Karolyn Grimes). Everything comes to a head when George's drunken uncle, who works for the family business, misplaces some funds, a whoopsy which could bring down the business and land George in jail. Hence his Christmas Eve despair.

Now let's look at the above from the MGTOW point of view. George gave up his dreams in favor of a wife, a family, a mortgage, and a dreary job in a dull little town. George is a classic blue-pill man. In effect, he downs the red pill on Christmas Eve and looks back on his life as one big boondoggle. Then along comes his guardian angel to force-feed him a blue pill and jerk him back to the plantation – but the plantation welcomes him back!

As tradcon-biased as this ending sounds, one must remember that the film came out in 1946, just after World War II, when it was hard to ignore the huge sacrifices men had made for their respective countries (George, by the way, was 4F, thanks to a childhood injury he suffered while saving his brother's life). The first step in coaxing the mustered-out GI to take on the post-war tradcon role was to recognize him for his military service.

While Mary Hatch may have thwarted George's ambitions, at least she shows appreciation for his sacrifices. Interesting to note that when George encounters Mary in his red-pill what-if fantasy, she is an old maid, as though that was the worst fate that could befall a young woman in Bedford Falls. Still, listening to the lamentations of contemporary women who hit the wall before landing a husband…maybe, things haven't changed that much. (Apparently, there was a cock carousel in Bedford Falls, as Mary's friend Violet Bick, played by Gloria Grahame, has graduated from boy-crazy to man-crazy.)

Also, the town of Bedford Falls may have hobbled George, but at least at the end of the movie, the people of the town, realizing what he's done for them over the years, come together to bail him out of his troubles. "Remember, George, no man is a failure who has friends," asserts Clarence at the end of the movie when a bell rings and he gets his wings.

The one friendless man in the movie is Mr. Potter, the tightwad banker, who says, "Most people hate me. But I don't like them either so that makes it all even." Spoken like a true MGTOW! While not a sympathetic individual, he never gets his comeuppance at the end of the film. That truly goes against the standard Hollywood narrative.

In a sense, It's a Wonderful Life is a protracted infomercial promoting the joys of collectivism over individualism. As is the case with most screenplays authored during the golden age of Hollywood studios, the shooting script had more fingerprints on it than Madonnna's ass.

It started out as a short story called "The Greatest Gift" by Philip Van Doren Stern. The first draft of the screenplay was done by Dalton Trumbo (he of the current biopic). Of the subsequent writers (Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett credited; Jo Swerling, Michael Wilson, and Dorothy Parker uncredited), a majority were persons of interest during the subsequent blacklist era. So I think it's fair to say their politics skewed to the left.

Frank Capra, who also received screenplay credit, knew you couldn't sell collectivism to the American public unless you cloaked it in populism. Consequently, the end result is closer to Norman Rockwell than Karl Marx. Even so, the film was not a hit on its release, though it was certainly an "A" picture. The film did get five Oscar nominations (best picture, best actor, best director, best editing, best sound recording) but won none.

Ah, but how would George Bailey fare in 2015?

In 1946 or 2015, we could say that the blue-pill man's value is totally based on his utility to the collective, whether the microcosm (his family) or the macrocosm (his community, his country). Put another way, his value is based on the money he earns and the taxes he pays. And from time to time, he may draw the black bean and be called upon to make the ultimate sacrifice.

But what about the blue-pill man's own needs and wants? Well, that would be another movie entirely. So what would a MGTOW version of It's a Wonderful Life be like?

My guess is Mary, though typically hypergamous, settles for George, knowing that she can always dump him if a better catch comes along. If not, she can divorce him anyway and saddle him with alimony and child support payments, even though the increased expenditures would likely bankrupt him and the family business. Today, if Clarence is truly a guardian angel, he would steer George away from Mary in the first place. George would get to travel the world, build his airfields, skyscrapers and bridges – and play video games in his spare time.

I can just hear it now: "Every time a bell rings, a MGTOW gets his freedom."

That'll be the day.

Dr. M. Ruhul Amin of Luton, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 7 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. M Ruhul Amin has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Circumcision Centre website circumcisioncentre.co.uk:

"Private Medical Clinic – Circumcision Services in the UK

Our services cover all age ranges – from infants (under a year old), through younger boys (under 8), to older boys and adult men. We choose the best possible circumcision procedure for every patient and have both pre and post-operative care and consultation to ensure that every patient and their family get the best possible treatment.

You can also purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren for Eid, Christmas or any other festival. Please contact us for further information.

We specialise in male circumcision, so not only are you assured of the best possible care, but will also be treated by doctors with many years of experience in circumcisions.

All our Doctors are specially trained in best practice to circumcise men of all ages. Our doctors are either Urologists or G.P.s and are all registered with the GMC."

So, you can "purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren" if . . . your grandchild is a boy, and you wish to force partial genital amputation on him as a gift for Christmas.

Then there's this ironic bit of marketing:

> Book Early for Holidays
> We are now taking bookings for the summer holidays. Please book early to avoid disappointment.

From their other website thornhillclinic.co.uk we find the names of the doctors at the Circumcision Centre, as well as the manager:

> Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai MBChB MRCGP MRCS DPD, Dr. M Ruhul Amin BSc (Hons) MBChB, Mr. Darrel Gregory MInstLM Dip.RSA – manager, Mr. Farooq Ali Khan BSc. (Hons) MBBS (Distinction) FRCS (Urol), Mr. M Asad Saleemi MBBS, MSc (Urol), FRCS (Urol)

The other website advertises it's General Practice for mostly adult men – while doing great business as circumcision experts – yet the only training they have or service they perform on infants is circumcision.

It's encouraging to see that the clinic helps men and their health (see Movember photos here), but it's greatly at odds with performing genital mutilation on unconsenting baby boys.

Under "Our Procedures:"

> Circumcision Procedures and Recommended Methods
>
> PlastiBell ® or the new Circumplast® – Both Perfect for Younger Boys
> The doctors in The Circumcision Centre are vastly experienced and use the patented PlastiBell® device (made by Hollister Incorporated) and the new Circumplast® (made in Australia) for circumcising young boys and babies. This procedure, developed in the USA, is quick, straightforward and virtually pain-free for your son.

There's no way of knowing if this procedure is "virtually pain-free."

See these graphic photos of circumcisions using different 'devices' including the Plastibell – scary to think people invent and USE instruments such as these.

Under "Circumcision Information" we read graphic explanations of different circumcision methods and a glossary of terms related to this surgery and male genitals, but NO INFORMATION ABOUT RISKS AND COMPLICATIONS. You can read that info here at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "Our Services" we see:

> Prime Service
> Every patient has access to the best possible treatment.
>
> Priority Service
> For those who want more privacy and personal attention.
>
> Ceremonial Service
> For those who see circumcision as a family or religious celebration.

Unless you pay extra, you and your baby won't have a private room, no pre- or post-operative consultation, and no souvenir program. Sounds to me like the human equivalent of a "puppy mill," a "cutting mill" with baby boys crowded into rooms on an (dis)assembly line of genital mutilation.

A "souvenir program," really?

Under "About Us:"

> Information for Doctors Interested in Working With The Circumcision Centre
> The Circumcision Centre is actively searching for GPs and surgeons to meet the growing number of enquiries and patients.
>
> We believe that performing circumcisions is a great way to add some surgery into your weekly schedule whilst at the same time serving your practice better.
>
> All existing Circumcision Centre affiliated Doctors testify enthusiastically to the benefits of working with us.
>
> If you would like to find out more about how to be affiliated with The Circumcision Centre, then please contact us. All we need is your name, GMC number and email address. We are in need of qualified, trained and enthusiastic Doctors to serve our patients today!

So, "add some surgery into your weekly schedule," ruin someone's sex life, and take away their human rights as well.

> Looking to Run Your Own Clinic?
> We need surgeons with a minimum FRCS (Paediatric Urology) to head up new private clinics proposed in London, Birmingham & Manchester.
>
> These will become whole day Saturday clinics, first operation 9.00 AM and the last operation commencing at 4.00 PM. This is a fantastic opportunity for a self-starter looking to run their own practice. Please contact us today for further information.

Horrifyingly, this is big business that is expanding by spreading lies and misinformation, and governments failing to protect baby boys the same as baby girls.

Here's an article about the clinic from 2011.

ALERT MGM 101: Video of "The Doctors" TV show about circumcision – can you guess who is on what side?

Dr. Amin's practice information follows:

Thornhill clinic
1-3 Thornhill Rd, Luton, Bedford LU4 8EY, United Kingdom
Phone:+44 1582 561999
circumcisioncentre.co.uk

info@thornhillclinic.co.uk

> Dr. M. Ruhul Amin of Luton, UK placed on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/4JRFqcN1cb #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/5imrkycIO9
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 10, 2016

Outstanding response to rosie-batty article

Editorial Staff · 7 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following is an articulate and thoughtful testimonial from of one of our readers in the comments section of an AVFM article An open letter To Rosie Batty. With her permission we are republishing it here. AVFM Editorial Staff.

*****

I recently listened to Rosie Batty's address to the National Press Club on Domestic Violence against women and children, and I have to say that as a mother of two wonderful sons and married to an incredible man (of 25 years), I am saddened Rosie's ideology is so misguided and one sided that domestic violence is gender based. This dangerous belief system only further highlights the need for proper education in our homes, schools, workplace and local communities that men are also at risk of domestic violence, at the hands of their female partners. Our men need a strong and powerful voice and advocate because too many of them are suffering in silence and are tarnished with the same brush, by those who abuse their partners.

I could not believe how Rosie's passion was so invested in advocating for increased funding for ONLY women and children to receive "front line" help and support, both legally and economically. Yet there is very little to nothing out there for men who are abused, both mentally and physically by their female partners, not to mention the children who are abused, neglected and murdered by their biological mothers. In fact the general consensus for men is to suck it up, as it were or leave. Violation of their rights, particularly as fathers does not even come into the equation.

We all know there is zero tolerance for domestic violence, and rightly so. But I do believe a lot of women take advantage of this particularly those in dysfunctional relationships and who are looking for a way out, even at the expense of their children and partners. I know I might be striking a few raw cords but I have seen first hand at how innocent men are treated like criminals both by the police and courts systems, simply because these women shed a few crocodile tears and cried abuse.

My husband's first wife was a classic. She threw their daughter in a pram, about 6 feet from where she stood because she was hanging out for a bong! My husband's crime was he back handed her, a natural reaction for seeing their daughter being thrown, not to mention the wife even blew marijuana smoke in their daughter's face so she would sleep! This woman abused their infant child in so many ways but my husband was forced to hand his daughter over to his wife, when the local CPS attended their home. She and the child were accommodated, received the best legal representation and supported with funding for her and their baby. My husband went through 10 years of fighting a loosing battle with the family law courts to see his daughter. It ended up being a wasted battle because the daughter was that polluted with her mother's poison that she stopped seeing her father. This battle almost destroyed my husband, but it is worse today for a lot of innocent fathers and their children. There are a lot of lesbian support workers and workers who have experienced, in their own personal lives domestic violence. They hate men and their agenda is to only support the women and children, not reunite the family unit.

When I listen to Rosie Batty, I hear a broken and bitter woman who see all men as a potential threat and danger like her husband was to her and their son. I'd be interested to learn what Rosie put her husband through. It would be a hard task for her to see another way given the horrific way her son was taken from her. But if we are to make a positive change, we need to look at the WHOLE PICTURE and provide funding and support in those areas. Rosie's dangerous, misguided and sexist comments need to change.

Domestic violence is not gender based. Men and women are equally at risk of being abused by their partners. Children are being neglected, abused and murdered mostly by their mothers. Children are abusing their parents. This is not a numbers game. It is what it is and it is a serious epidemic that warrant immediate action and intervention.

Rosie is also behind the creation of an app, of course for girls, “I matter”. An app that handles 3000 questions per week from women’s health, bullying and relationships. Why isn’t there an app for boys, who incidentally are at a higher risk of self harm and suicide? Don’t our boys matter, Rosie? So sad, but true, in this present society. In fact the only time we hear about men or boys on TV is in a derogatory way. Stereotyping him as the murderer, the idiot, awkward, stupid and the list goes on. And yes, the electronic program guide are written by women. I guess if our men didn’t feel such low self worth maybe the crime rate and particularly the suicide rate wouldn’t be so high. Food for thought!

Furthermore, I would not hold the view that Rosie Batty is sexist if she didn’t end her speech by mentioning Jeff Hunt, the man who murdered his wife Kim and their three children, Fletcher, Phoebe and Mia, in rural NSW. He then committed suicide. Why didn’t also she mention about the Cairns mother accused of murdering eight children and charged with eight counts of murder in January 2015, or the Wyndham Vale Lake crash where a mother was charged with the murder of her three young children or what about Donna Fitchett who drugged, smothered and strangled her 11 and 9 year old sons of which she called the murder of her sons her “greatest act of love’! And as I write this, it was reported that a Sydney court denied a 34 year old woman bail for stabbing her husband in the chest. He is in a critical condition, fighting for life. Interesting enough, a senior police official made a statement in relation to this incident and stated that they “would need to investigate why this woman armed herself”, (in other words protected herself, from her partner).

The Australian police force, particularly the female officers should remove their blinkers and stop protecting woman and start listening and acting on men’s complaints about their female partner’s abuse, as well. Recently on A Current Affair, a female stabbed her partner and caused some life threatening injuries but previous to this occurrence, this poor guy had reported her abuse to a female police member who advised him, “to man up”, as she is smaller than him. We don’t need police members like this. Maybe they should be working down on the farm!!!! Two years on, the murder of Jill Meagher is still mentioned numerous times on TV but very little mention was made about those 8 murdered children in Cairns and the 3 murdered children in Wyndham Vale.

There is no doubt that we live in a sick world that will only get sicker until we acknowledge there is a serious issue of violence in the home by BOTH SEXES. The media play a pivotal role in not addressing this cancerous issue that is festering in most homes today, but they need to stop blaming or worse isolating the problem and denying the whole picture.

Our men, women and most importantly our precious children, the future of our society need the unconditional support and guidance to overcome the issues that lead us down this path of destruction. There can be no progress until we stop the blame game.

If anyone is worthy of the title, Australian of the Year, it would have to be Mark Dent for having the fortitude and strength to speak the real truth on Domestic Violence. You have my support and utmost respect, Mark. Continue with your website because disillusioned people like Rosie Batty need to see it for what it really is.

Life is valuable for men as well. So all you female perpetrators need help and stop blaming our men!!!

Once again, keep up the work, Mark Dent as you see it how it is!!!

Jennifer

Interview with Margaret McLennan

Lee Turner · 8 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Margaret Maclennan is a Canadian belly-dancer and Youtube commentator, whose videos on social justice, #gamergate and the exploits of Anita Sarkeesian have attracted the attention of this writer. To wit; in her pong is sexist video, she muses over the beauty of sharing a ping-pong ball being subverted by a "white phallic symbol trampling over black background." such…triggering words, she uttered, that I felt compelled to contact her for comment. Margaret has kindly agreed to converse on subjects as diverse as feminism, disability and conservative politics and I present our thoughts here.

She self-identifies as a catholic, conservative cripple. A few years ago, Margaret has been diagnosed with auto-immune disease, requiring the removal of her large intestine and forcing her to live with a stoma. In the time she was required to take off to recuperate, she delved into Anita Sarkeesian's feminist frequency videos, and came up with a surprising proposition.

Her video Anita – it's time to stop, Margaret underscores the fading relevance of the tropes vs women series, even in its context of a feminist media critique, by pointing out that among other problems, only 6 games released after 2014 have been covered. She then proposes that she will complete Sarkeesian's project by cataloguing and examining the several hundred games mentioned in the series and publishing the results online. At the time of writing, this video has 224,000 views and Margaret's subscriber base is growing.

We contemplate what might be achieved by stock-taking the games mentioned in feminist frequency videos. Margaret elaborates:

"With enough data Femfreq will be able to be replaced by a formula so you can plug in the year, console, name, designer, dev studio and genre and get an answer as to whether it'll be sexist or not. Femfreq doesn't use this approach. Analyzing game-by-game is insane. There are thousands of new games every year, and now we need a feminist to crawl through each one of them? Femfreq doesn't provide a rubric for feminist-approval, and even with games include a female character, Femfreq will still rip her up because as Anita says — everything is sexist."

Indeed, if Sarkeesian's speech on how to be a feminist, uttered at the Sydney opera house early in 2015 is to be taken at face value, what is even the point of a feminist critique of games, if they are all innately sexist? Can there be the feminist equivalent of a dietician's approval tick for products and services? However, the purpose of the project is broader than a mere sexism detector;

"I'm at over 250 games and over 40 columns worth of breakdown listing consoles, designers, release dates, countries of origin — I'll release the whole thing and let the internet do with it as it pleases. It'll be a lot easier to rip on Sarkeesian when everyone and anyone can pull up a free-to-edit spreadsheet and point out that she, for example, has historically hated on Ubisoft Montreal until her recent turnaround to appreciate assassin's creed: syndicate with a day 1 review…the faster I finish the spreadsheet the faster other bloggers and commentators can join in on the well-structured fun."

But enough of Sarkeesian, who is indeed passé, let us move on. Margaret reflects on her interactions with #gamergate et al;

"I'm attracted to social justice because it's repugnant — hey, wanna see a dead body?
I've been a conservative for years. I realized that conservatives – or conservatives in Canada — were the good guys when the liberal media's threats that the sky would fall should the right honourable Stephen harper win the election in 2006. Nothing happened, and I liked the direction he and his party took. So I stopped consuming the media that lied to me and found out that reality is conservative and that if someone warns you that something is evil that you're better off finding out for yourself.

I've been watching #gamergate since it started. I've been going to sci-fi conventions for a few years and noticed that social justice and safe spaces and leftist pushes against dissenting opinions had already taken hold. I'm a bigger star trek nerd than a video game nerd and i'm right to assume that without a massive pushback against sjws now then the next trek series in 2017 will be a pile of leftist politically correct trash. Tng and tos were preachy but creatively so, but at this rate there's no telling how awful the show will be if it has to conform to tumblrisms."

On the matter of feminists responding to her work, Margaret muses that;

"Feminists and SJWs will respond to my tweets and arguments but simultaneously ignore the fact that I exist. They'll talk about me as if I'm not real, because I can't possibly be real."

In contrast;

"For a bunch of evil misogynists, I get a lot more respect (and YT channel traffic) from atheist white men despite me being a right-wing catholic disabled female, because those evil misogynists aren't getting wrapped up in my personal list of attributes, only my arguments against feminism."

This sounds all good and well, but my innate sense of devil's advocacy can never allow me not to ask, "what is the problem with political correctness to begin with?

"Political correctness is a slippery slope. Political correctness is like being polite at a party, except the whole world is watching you…[but] you can't live your whole life being polite to everyone with varying levels of sensitivity. And what's polite in one society is not in another…every society has different standards for being polite, and being politically correct means adhering to dozens and dozens of different standards which effectively retards communication."

I would have to agree, that socialist government can be likened to a cocktail party in the sense that no-one's counting the money paying for the booze and snacks.

"The left believe that the government knows better how to regulate an individual's money and behaviour. They're hosting a party, but it's for literally everyone and it's for your entire life. When someone at the party pipes up and starts offending the others, the solution is more government. Install another hostess by that guest to threaten to take away their canapes privilege unless they start regulating their behaviour. In real life, it's lefties who abandon ideals like free speech before right wingers."

The inevitable question effervesces to the surface, "What do you think about the 2015 Canadian election?"

"Trudeau's party won because the NDP lost. The ndp lost sight of their target and the conservative heavyweights bailed when they saw the writing on the wall. Our finance minister Flaherty died recently. Peter Mckay retired to be with his family and Baird left to work privately. The prime minister's office lost touch with reality. They kept hiring people with family connections and degrees in political science and it really showed. The ads were lame, they ignored social media. Lots of my friends who would normally volunteer on campaigns (myself included) didn't want to get involved for one reason or another. Maybe we just ran out of steam.

I'm looking forward to seeing the spring cleaning after getting our butts handed to us. Whoever is in charge of hiring needs to burn every resume on file and stop hiring people who only want to move to Ottawa for the cocktail parties."

The elephant in the room – Trudeau's feminist cabinet, remains untouched, which I feel is an interesting way to go about it as the real issue is much deeper;

"Frankly all I ever wanted out of the conservative party was for them to shut down the liberal's media wing, the cbc. It would've been political poison to kill it, but they lost this election anyway."

Would that not be, gasp, censorship? No, it would not, as Margaret asserts;

"Cutting off funding to the cbc isn't censorship. They get 1.1 billion in taxpayer dollars every year and trudeau sweetened them up with the promise of an extra $150 million. Despite this, we don't even know how much their main players and big name anchors are paid every year. The crtc (the canadian censorship racket who doles out radio and tv signals) are our quasi-governmental censors and we don't get to vote for their head, just like we can't vote for the head of cbc. The cbc has contracts with big newspapers like the globe and mail and the national post to share content. With money like that pouring in from the government and to the major media outlets, it's not censorship to stem that unearned tide. The big media names are literally incestuous — americans can look up the name "andrew coyne" to see among other highlights that his cousin Deborah Coyne (who very nearly broke up Canada during the Meech Lake accord) is the mother of prime minister Justin Trudeau's half-sister."

Can a parallel between social justice and the religious right in the realms of prohibition and censorship be a better comparison? Again, margaret begs to differ;

"I'm not sure it exists. I only ever hear of the religious right when someone is accusing another of being a part of it, or when a conservative is claiming that they aren't a part of the religious right."

But tipper gore, pmrc, they wanted to sensor songs…

"tipper gore is a leftist. She's not religious right, she's a leftist who had too much free time and too big of a megaphone in her media-beloved husband. Without incredibly strict government control (and hiring hundreds of censors) there are no laws to ban heavy metal and you'd sink millions into regulating it."

Indeed, the time has now passed where censorship was advocated on the grounds of offence to religion. Those of us from the 80's may remember this, but the 80's have been over ever since guns n roses broke up in 1995…

"it's lefties who want censorship. They aren't liberal. The left hates reality. It's lefties who run the hate mobs on campuses. It's lefties who threaten violence. Lefties are communists: they hate their country, they hate the natural world.

Gather up all the main perpetrators of hate against men and gamers and take stock of their political background. John macintosh supports Bernie Sanders. The current thugs at mizzou are led by a student, peyton head, who met obama in 2011 and may have interned with Rahm Emmanuel. The only people who have consistently supported #gamergate is the conservative-friendly breitbart.

The right wing have been smeared unfairly for decades. The left states our opinions for us and gets them wrong on purpose to try to make us look evil. They've never read our books and they won't read our sources. They heard from buzzfeed and cracked that we're monsters and that's all they need to know."

I could muse on the left-right divide at length, or the questionable use of "right-wing" and "conservativism" interchangeably, but instead I ask a more direct question, "why do you think conservativism is unappealing to young people?"

"the media never shows young conservatives without branding them as such. On tv, it's not "here's Jimmy, your new classmate!" it's "here's James JR the 3rd" and he's wearing a suit and being an asshole. The media puts all conservatives into the cigar-chomping suit wearing old businessman box. It's conservativeface and I find it very triggering."

And here it is again – media portrayal. It would seem that many of the world's problems can be mitigated by switching off the tv (as I have done more than a decade ago and would encourage you to do the same also). Media portrayals are not evidence, they are at best, thinly-veiled propaganda. It has been discussed on this site at length before, that the propagation of feminist ideology though the media is one part of the problem with perception of men's issues as opposed to men themselves being the issue, feminism for its own part not being evidence-based and at best wishful thinking, utopian apartheid at worst, but those are my thoughts. As for Margaret's, I pose the question, as to what she thinks of feminism's basis in reality, she answers;

"modern feminism is not evidence based. It stopped being evidence based ten years ago when they realized it was effectively finished. Feminism has a point in other countries. After WW2 the western world lost confidence in itself and we stopped trying to bring western civilization to 3rd world countries. So now it's up to those countries themselves to author their own revolutions. Unfortunately, without a document like that one signed in 1215 it will continue to be a difficult slog for them."

Reflecting on her own physical condition, Margaret writes;

"I'm a part of the disabled community and I'm realizing just how many terms and demands modern feminists have stolen from the cripples. "listen and believe" is a useful term for someone like me with a very specific diet and bathroom needs — yes, I could explain to you why I can't eat this, but it'll take 10 minutes.

Thing is, I can actually explain to you why I can't eat spinach or whole wheat. Feminist can't explain why they need — wait, what do feminists actually want?

The pay gap is especially cantankerous. Having an ostomy bag takes a few extra grand out of my wallet every year for medical care, a special diet and even a wardrobe that will fit me without compressing my midsection. #giveyourmoneytocripples, because unlike women we really do have challenges that keep us from certain occupations. And this is from a low-level cripple! People with more severe mobility problems are fantastic sources of rants against feminists and their moaning.

Feminists want to be seen on the same level of victimhood as the disabled but without the daily trouble. I have a disease and condition twenty-four hours a day. Feminists are oppressed only when there's a man around. One thing feminists haven't adopted from the cripples: the sense of humour you need to survive."

Why does she think feminism is so humourless?

"Humour is humiliation. Feminists can't take a joke because you have to make them look ridiculous. Unless someone is being ridiculed (including yourself) it's not funny. Feminists have ruined "that's not funny" and they now judge jokes on whether it's making fun of things they love or hate. The only funny jokes are ones that mock things they hate."

With the personal being the political, humour gets uncomfortably self-denigrating for most people that way inclined. But that's the bed they made for themselves, no-one else…

Ultimately, life moves on and margaret has been able to resume dancing;

"I danced my first gig back 7 months after my surgery. With my ostomy I can dance on my own but planning for classes or gigs can be difficult. Finding costuming that covers my ostomy has been a challenge. I made a black and leopard print costume a few months ago that's been workable, at least. Custom costumes made in the middle east that would work with my ostomy are expensive, at least $800 with shipping for plain ones."

She continues to publish Youtube videos, the most recent highlight for me being her commentary on Anita Sarkeesian appearing uninvited at the housewarming party for Minecraft creator notch. The Sarkeesian games spreadsheet project is nearing completion also with a few more instalments to follow accompanying videos.

With that, I'd like to thank margaret for taking the time to talk to me and wish her the best of luck in the future. I would encourage the reader to view her work here.

How feminism succeeded in destroying family relationships

Erin Pizzey · 8 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The first refuge in the world devoted to the care and rehabilitation of violence-prone families was opened in Chiswick in London in 1971. In the early months a small house that we christened Chiswick Women's aid was opened as a community centre to serve as a local meeting place for women locally and their children so that we could all pool our talents and work within our community.

I had been expelled from the newly emerging Women's Liberation Movement as, from the beginning, I denounced it as fraudulent for deluding desperate women across the country into parting with three pounds and ten shillings (a significant amount of money in those days) to join a movement which promised to devote itself to the betterment of women everywhere.

My quarrel with the movement was that from the very beginning a hard core of middle aged Marxist women, many of whom were deeply embedded into the education system, Universities, Civil Service and the media were lying to women everywhere. They were not concerned with the day to day life of women at home with their children. Their main ambition was to re-educate women into believing that the family was a dangerous place for women and children and that in this new dawn the family would be defined as women with their children and men's roles as protectors and providers would be dispensed with. The bait was that feminism was about seeking equality with men and most women and some men were fooled.

My father, mother and brother were captured by the Communists in Tien Sien in 1948 they were held under house arrest for the next three years. I was well aware of the Communist movement that was now sweeping across the Western world funded largely with Russian money and ideological brain washing from Maoists. In the sixties left wing intellectuals were out in force defending the atrocities perpetrated by Mao in China and Stalin in Russia. In the huge collectives we were advised that we should form ourselves into groups across the country, meet in each other's houses, and 'raise our consciousness.' Each group was visited by a 'comrade' who told us that our source of discomfort was the fact that we were 'oppressed' by our partners and that as we continued to work and understand our oppression we would as a body throw off our chains, throw out the fathers of our children and 'liberate' ourselves.

In 1971 liberals, the media, universities and an ill-assorted band of left wing journalists were all leaping to the barricades to fight in the coming revolution against capitalism. What the men had not understood was that their female partners were now dissenting from fighting side by side with their brothers but and were actively rearranging the goal posts. No longer as far as the new feminists were concerned was capitalism the enemy but it was replaced by 'patriarchy.'

Their battle cry was that men had from time immemorial abused and oppressed women, and this new emerging movement would release all women from marriage and servitude. In its place the women's revolution would deliver a life free from male domination and servitude. The feminist movement would ensure twenty-four hour nurseries and women, who could now file for a 'no fault divorce,' could look forward to staying in the matrimonial home funded by their partners. A woman now could go out to work and compete with men.

As our tiny refuge in Belmont Terrace continued to take in desperate women and children it was beginning to come to the attention of the local newspapers. My main concern was that the reporting in the media of the antics of the feminist movement were fading away. I was also aware as that while the public began to read about the struggle we had to keep the door open in the refuge, it meant that we were receiving money almost daily in the post. Our safety lay in the total support that we had across the country, and Hounslow were forced to stay their hand from shutting us down.

I was very aware that, of the first hundred women who came into the refuge, 62 of them were more violent than the men they left. I knew the entire histories of the families that came into my care. I also saw any of the men who wanted my help and I tried to open a men's refuge because I recognised that the roots of domestic violence lay in intergenerational family violence. My concern was to create a therapeutic community to help my violence prone women and their children who needed time to learn different strategies for survival other than violence. Women who were innocent victims of their partner's violence didn't need therapy but they did need a safe place to stay with their children until they could move on into the community.

In 1974 we decided to hold a small conference in our church hall to invite emerging groups who were trying to open refuges in their own areas. We were all unaware that radical feminists were now opening refuges as they realised that their funding was now dwindling away as normal women left the movement in disgust. Not only would they be funded but they could use the refuges (shelters in America) to brainwash women into believing that 'all women were victims of male violence.' At our pathetic little conference in the church hall women started to pour in and we sat bewildered. It became very obvious that there had been several meetings before any of these groups of women came to join us.

'In 1974, twenty-seven groups from as far afield as Dublin and the north of Scotland gathered at a national conference organized by Chiswick Women's Aid……

> She (Pizzey) saw wife-battering essentially as a psychological problem and claimed that certain kinds of women were 'violence prone' and invited assault. To feminists this was dangerous nonsense: they saw domestic violence as an expression of the power that men wielded over women, in a society where female dependence was built into the structure of everyday life. From their own extensive experience of working in refuges they concluded that wife-battering was not the practice of a deviant few, but something which could emerge in the 'normal' course of marital relations.' [Excerpt from Sweet Freedom, published by Blackwell in 1987 ISBN 0-631-14957-0.' The authors Anna Coot and Beatrix Campbell activists in the feminist movement].

I went home devastated that what I had dreaded ever since I opened my refuge had happened. These women had no interest in the fate of very desperate women and children, still less would they ever consider men as victims. From that conference the militant groups quickly formed themselves in the Women's Aid Federation and documented their explicit feminist objectives. No men could work in the refuges, no boys over twelve could come in with their families – the mothers of teenage boys would have to make other arrangements. The position in 1974 across the western world was that this fast growing political empire could now flourish funded by the refuge/shelters on the backs of women and their children.

With unlimited funding in place other groups who wished to open refuges were not able to affiliate with the National Federation if they did not swear allegiance to the feminist movement. All groups were to pay a yearly fee to the Federation and the Federation was under no obligation to fund refuges, and all monies from tax payers and grants would go to furthering the aims of the feminist revolution everywhere. Conferences were called regularly and the feminists were in a powerful position to promote their ideology to all attendees. Women in academia brainwashed their female students and began courses in 'women's studies' from which men were excluded. Very quickly these Women's Studies grew, like a malignant cancer, across the academic world and young women were encouraged to see themselves as helpless victims. They were taught to believe that male students could not be trusted to refrain from drugging, raping and abusing female students and before long the university campus became hostile to young men.

The feminist movement also moved into the field of training the Judiciary the police, social workers and all family agencies. Many women were advised by lawyers to obtain a quick divorce by claiming that they were victims of domestic violence. In Canada when a father came home from work and found his house empty of his partner and children it was called 'hoovering.' If he called to police to say his family were missing he was not told where they were — all that the police would say that she and the children were safe. If he did not submit to his wife's demands she could then claim (this is called the 'silver bullet') that he had molested his children and he could never see them again.

The courts became uniformly hostile to men and fathers. A punitive programme called the 'Duluth Model' was introduced in 2006 it was called a perpetrator's programme and Judges were advised by family agencies that fathers should complete to programme even if they had been found innocent of all allegations against them made by their partners. There was no therapeutic intent behind this model, its main concern was to shame and bully men desperate to see their children that they had to begin by apologising for their male privileges and they also had to confess that they were guilty of abusing women by virtue of being men. If a man refused he would not be allowed to see his children.

Internationally feminist influences and thought were taken up by women believing that they were supporting a movement that reached out to other women to fight for equality with men. Over the next forty five years women in all walks of life were moving into positions of power and equal opportunities opened up employment choices for all women. Moves were made to insist that there should be quotas for women to shoe-horn them into jobs. Where a man and a woman had equal qualifications the woman must be offered the job.

Women were also moving into powerful positions in the education system and in universities, civil service and international organisation like the United Nations. What no one seemed to notice is that feminists were quietly appointing other feminists to jobs and slowly men were being pushed out of many spheres in the job markets.

A rising number of broken men began to surface on the internet telling of how false accusations meant that they were dragged from their homes by partners who no longer had to offer any evidence to back up their allegations. In Western democracies everyone has the right to be considered innocent until proved guilty. Men lost that right and they were deemed guilty and had to prove their innocence. Men lost their children when vicious women decided that they would abort any attempt to let a father see his children and the courts did nothing about it.

As the years went by the suicide rates for men began to rise and far outstrip the rate for women and nothing was done. I was alone for many years trying to get my voice heard. It was a lonely place to be because it was impossible to get people to understand what I could see was happening. People tended to write me off as paranoid. Nothing I wrote could be published because editors tended to appoint women journalists to interview me with the result that I was silenced. There was an equal censorship in publishing houses. The editors wanted novels about women victims and brutal men.

The feminists running refuges/shelters falsified research figures. Time and time again figures for women who were brutalised were given but no mentioned was made for men who were also victims. Figures for women who were murdered were also given to the press but there was no mention of men dying in the hands of their female partners. None of the feminist research figures stand up to scrutiny. International evidenced-based research has been with us for many years and the results always argued that in intimate partner violence both men and women are equally guilty but this information fell on deaf ears and no government was interested.

No attempt has been made to stem the tide of demonising men and boys. Because the education system has for so long discriminated against boys, and the way that boys learn, we have generations of young men who have been educationally failed by successive governments. A huge number of boys live without fathers and move through the education system without any male role models. Men have been driven out of teaching because of the undercurrent that taints them with suggestions that they may be paedophiles. Gangs have grown out of the fatherless boys looking for male roles and a sense of masculinity. Over two decades men have been made to feel ashamed of being made. Young boys have been marginalised and any masculine behaviour such as rough and tumble play is punished in schools. Men in an effort to be accepted by feminist women have created groups such as 'white ribbon campaign.'

'White ribbon is helping create tools, strategies and models that challenge negative, outdated concepts of manhood…' In other words the white ribbon campaign is seeking to feminise men starting with young boys in schools where they are most vulnerable. Thus from an early age men are now being brainwashed to be ashamed of the normal behaviour and to submit their lives to a feminized version of they are led to think they really ought to be.

Certainly very violent men and women who abuse each other and their children (mothers are far more likely to abuse children than fathers) should be subject to criminal procedures, however the war against men and boys has taken us into an unknown historical journey. Condemnation and shaming of men reached epic proportions and reaction is now forming where many men are refusing to marry and in many cases even to live with women. Looking at this phenomenon dispassionately I have to agree with them. Why would you risk losing your home, your children and your income when your partner knows she can oust you from her life, bar you from your children when your partner can pick up the phone and with no evidence you find yourself guilty of a criminal offence?

Many men live in fear these days. High profile men can be accused (again without any evidence) and publically put on trial by the media by women making allegations that sometimes span forty years. Even if the Crown Prosecution decides not to prosecute after a month of the allegations hanging over the man and his family, they will say that the case won't go to trial 'for lack of evidence.' They do not admit that they yet again have tried to destroy the man and should apologise and declare him to be innocent. The accuser is not held responsible for destroying an innocent man. According to the Crown Prosecution in England 'All women claiming sexual abuse and rape MUST be believed' and I believe it to be the rule everywhere else. How can it be that the CPS has the power to take away a man's right to be innocent until proven guilty?

Some men simply quietly stay away from relationships with women, and some, bitter and burnt, scorch the internet with their anger, others gather under the heading 'Men going their own way' a loose organisation of like-minded men. A Voice for Men is an internet platform where men can meet and share their experiences and help and advise each other. Their first international conference was held in Detroit a couple of years ago. They were hounded out of the hotel they had chosen for their conference by local feminists but they went ahead and I attended that conference and was overwhelmed by the men and women I saw gathered together to work towards ending violence towards everyone. Before this can happen we have to move away from the false claim that it is men who are abusers and women victims.

I find it totally condescending that women believe they can tell other women that they are so weak and so helpless that they cannot be trusted to take responsibility for their choices of relationships or their part in the violence. We have established that the roots of violence lie in intergenerational family violence. Now we have to expose the lies and the fraudulent appropriation of tax payer's money to fund an evil empire.

We need to move swiftly because our children are being harmed in our education system. Our relationships with each other are being destroyed by this monstrous regiment of women. Above all though, in this present climate of all-out war waged against men children, are the main victims. I have always believed that the family is the corner stone of any civilization it is within those kind loving arms of both parents can nurture and grow their children to be warm loving members of our communities. I think in fifty years' time people will look back in amazement that people were so blinded by feminism that they ignored the Trojan horse in their midst.

Equality for all is a worthy goal but creating a hate movement against half the human race is what has happened. We need to expose feminism for what it is: exploitation of all of us for power and control and funding.

Votes For Women – The Fiamengo File, Episode 3

Janice Fiamengo · 9 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Does free speech offend you?

AVfM Video Source · 11 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Fathers as wallets: legal history of child support

Douglas Galbi · 11 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In U.S. law, fatherhood outside of marriage implies the obligation to make substantial, recurring payments to the mother ("child support"). These payments are based on the father's income, not the child's need. Unmarried fathers' obligation to pay money to mothers hasn't been associated with the father receiving any custody rights. In 1877, the Supreme Court of Minnesota in Olson v. Johnson made clear that unmarried fathers essentially have the legal status of wallets.

The story of Olson v. Johnson is shocking. In Minnesota in 1871, Olson was legally declared to be the father of a child for which Johnson had the natural status of mother. Under that legal determination, Olson was ordered to pay Johnson "for the support and maintenance of the child":

> certain sums, varying from $1 to $1.50 per week, to be paid semi-annually, and he was also adjudged to give a bond to the county commissioners of said county, in the sum of $800, conditioned for the faithful performance of the judgment. [1]

Olson fulfilled these legal obligations of fathers as wallets.

In 1875, Johnson married another man in Iowa. She immediately abandoned the child she had with Olson. Olson then petitioned the court for custody of the child, return of his bond, and termination of his weekly payments to Johnson. Olson offered to make a new bond securing his support of his child. The court refused all three of these requests. It declared that Olson had no interest in ensuring that his payments went to support his child. It declared that Olson, legally established as the child's father, had no more legal right to custody of the child than had anyone else. These weren't subtle aspects of the court's judgment. In its brief opinion, the Supreme Court of Minnesota forthrightly declared:

> The judgment in the bastardy proceedings, not having been appealed from, is conclusive. One effect of the judgment is to compel the plaintiff to pay to the mother a specified allowance for the support and maintenance > of the child, to the custody of which she, as mother, is in law entitled. If she neglects to support and maintain the child, this is no reason why the plaintiff should be relieved from the payment of the allowance, nor from the obligation of his bond; and as for any proposition to substitute something else in the place of the allowance and his bond, there is no authority whatever for entertaining it. … As respects such remedies, the plaintiff would not be the real party in interest. As father of the child he has, in law, no better title to its custody, and no more right to act for it, than any other person. [2]

This court's judgment wasn't aberrational. Child custody decisions in Britain and the U.S. have for centuries been justified on the basis of "the best interests of the child." That abstract justification has enabled family law in action to be based on deeply entrenched gender stereotypes. A fundamental gender stereotype is that, compared to women, men are less important to children's lives.

Family law is profoundly biased against men. A thinker who has extensively studied Massachusetts family courts has suggested, with detailed analysis, that men are better off not presenting their side to family court. That's a travesty of justice. Marriage equality should extend to gender equality under family law. If that can't be recognized as a matter of justice, it should at least be recognized as vital to men's incentives and the long-run economic future of the U.S.

* * * * *

Read more:

- gender discrimination in child custody prevalent historically
- Real World Divorce: the most under-appreciated macroeconomic issue
- America Solved: Alan Cohen's cry for family-law reform

Notes:

[1] Tron Olson v. Mathea Johnson, Feb. 2, 1877, 23 Minn. 301, decided by the Supreme Court of Minnesota. The previous quote "for the support and maintenance of the child" is given in id. and apparently is from the district court's judgment.

[2] Id. I've omitted the within-text citation "Tyler on Infancy, § 189."

[image] Boy with bike in southern New Jersey in 1937. Photo courtesy of Elmer Galbi.

Life lessons from a literary lion

Doug Mortimer · 11 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If a man has been his mother's undisputed darling he retains throughout his life the triumphant feeling, the confidence in success, which not seldom brings actual success along with it.

SIGMUND FREUD

A Childhood Recollection

Norman Mailer has been dead since 2008 but his life was an object lesson for all men, even those who have never read a word of his work.

As the above quotation indicates, Norman Mailer, born in 1923, was a precocious child who became his mother's darling. Not only that, he had a coterie of aunts who stroked his ego. That environment, combined with his 165 I.Q. and his academic record at Boys' High School in Brooklyn, resulted in admission to Harvard at age 16.

Mailer's high school sex life was normal, in other words, lots of talk and limited experience. His first intercourse was with a prostitute and his first serious relationship occurred in college, resulting in his first marriage. So in the early going, his sex life was pretty much in keeping with the men of his generation.

Mailer's service in the Philippines during World War II resulted in his first novel, The Naked and the Dead, published in 1948 when he was just 25. This best-seller (62 weeks on the New York Times best-seller list) vaulted him to literary prominence at a time when other writers are just starting to accumulate rejection slips. Unlike aspiring writers who must come to grips with earning a living while writing, Mailer enjoyed a continuous income stream from his literary efforts. After finishing college, the only non-literary job he ever had was as a soldier.

Though Mailer brought a lot to the table and had been groomed for success, he must have been astonished at how quickly and easily it came to him. Absent this early success, his sex life likely would have been much less complicated.

Mailer was married six times (producing nine children), had various mistresses (some for decades) and assorted affairs and one-night stands. He seems to have moved almost seamlessly from woman to woman, never spending any time on his own. Oftentimes, he would take his new woman to bed as soon as he met her! One suspects that in cultures where polygamy is permitted, he would have been an ardent practitioner, and if he came of age today, he would be temperamentally unfit to be a MGTOW.

As a consequence of his sex life, his financial needs were enormous. His earnings were ample but never enough to keep up with the needs of his women and his brood.

One would think that such a solitary pursuit as writing would be better accomplished without so much domestic turmoil. His youthful experience of having his ego stroked by women might have hooked him for life. Enjoying success in his mid-20s only fueled the fire, as more and more women were drawn to his youthful celebrity status. Mailer was certainly not attracting women with his physical appearance, as he was short and stocky (increasingly so as he got older) with big ears.

In fact, the female response to Mailer's alpha male status is highly instructive. The amoral nature of hypergamy was never more in evidence. Despite the number of times he had been married, his reputation as a womanizer, and the fact that he had stabbed (and almost murdered) his second wife, women continued to flock to him. He was dead set against birth control, but women didn't find that a deal-killer. In fact, they might have relished the idea of bearing the great man's children. When an alpha male is involved, any moral or feminist considerations go out the window.

Consider what Mailer could offer a woman. He was not only a famous writer, he was also a well-known personality on the talk show circuit. He was a leading light in New York political and intellectual circles. Any woman who accompanied him would not only bask in reflected glory but would surely lead a more interesting life.

Mailer could be derided as a pathetic example of a man obsessed with female validation. But in his heyday, feminists (of the second wave) considered him public enemy number one. His macho lifestyle, well-documented in the media, was anathema to feminist sensibilities. His 1964 novel, An American Dream, was particularly offensive, as it involved a man who murdered his wife and anally raped her maid.

In June 1970, Mailer appeared with Orson Welles on The Mike Douglas Show, a popular syndicated talk show in the 1960s and 1970s. The topic turned to women, and Mailer thought Welles was overplaying the role of white knight (despite the fact that Welles was once quoted as saying, "There are three intolerable things in life – cold coffee, lukewarm champagne, and overexcited women").

Mailer responded by asserting "Women are sloppy beasts that should be kept in cages." When responding to the charge that he hated women, he responded, "No, I said they should be kept in cages. We respect the lions in the zoo, but we want them kept in cages, don't we?"

Well, then as now, such remarks invite no end of rejoinders. This was at a time when feminist authors such as Kate Millett (Sexual Politics) and Germaine Greer (The Female Eunuch) were taking up residence in the zeitgeist. In particular, Millett's book had zeroed in on Mailer and other writers who supposedly promoted male dominance.

There was some doubt as to whether Mailer was joking or just stirring the pot. Either way, his status as public enemy number one among the women's libbers was assured.

On March 31, 1971, Mailer was the "moderator" at a panel discussion on women's liberation at Town Hall in New York. Mailer, known for his confrontational attitude, reflected in his numerous fistfights, drunken brawls, and head-butting incidents, was not one to back down when his antagonists were female. He debated feminists without apologies and without kid gloves. The resulting circus was a big media event in New York.

Mailer was as much a publicity hound as a pussy hound, so no matter how the evening went, he couldn't help but profit from it. The March 1971 issue of Harper's magazine had devoted an entire issue to his lengthy essay, The Prisoner of Sex, which was later published as a stand-alone book. So the evening couldn't help but promote his work, which makes for interesting reading even after 44 years. As Mailer observes, "No thought was so painful as the idea that sex had meaning: for give meaning to sex and one was the prisoner of sex."

In his previous thoughts on sex, he seemed to acknowledge hypergamy and evolutionary psychology when he decreed, "The prime responsibility of a woman probably is to be on earth long enough to find the best mate possible for herself, and conceive children who will improve the species." In fact, Mailer had an almost biblical aversion to masturbation, and did not consider it an adequate substitute for sex.

In writing The Prisoner of Sex, Mailer found himself in a curious situation: One of the nation's best known subversives, he was taking on a movement that had the potential to overthrow western civilization. While he appeared to have personally benefited from the sexual revolution, he does not wholeheartedly endorse it. In some ways, his thoughts could almost be those of Phyllis Schlafly:

It was the measure of the liberal technologist and the Left Totalitarian that they exhibited the social lust to make units of people.

Sex is the search for pleasure by any pit or hole, and love is your coffin when a family is founded on it.

The end game of the absurd is coitus-free conception monitored by the state.

Something of a Luddite in matters of sex, he did not like to see technology intrude on intimacy and reproduction. In this respect, he would not be like the numerous MGTOWs who look forward to a world of men hiring women for surrogate mothers and robots for sex.

Mailer had as much contempt for Planned Parenthood as any contemporary Republican legislator. As noted above, he did not believe in birth control, but his concerns were more cosmic than earthly: “When you make love, whatever is good in you or bad in you, goes out into someone else. I mean this literally.”

In more pithy language, he asserts, “Good fucks make good babies.” Going back to his statement about women’s need to “conceive children who will improve the species,” we can only conclude that good fucks speed up human evolution. Better living through fucking!

In so many words, Mailer pretty much endorses a yin-yang view of the universe. This split between active and passive cosmic principles is reflected in his observation that the human male must work to be a man, but the human female merely has to agree to be a woman. Not too far from Warren Farrell’s more recent observation that men are human doings and women are human beings.

So the life and work of Norman Mailer offer life lessons for all men. Maybe your mother never lavished you with praise, maybe you’re not a Harvard man with a genius-level I.Q., maybe you’re not world-famous, maybe you haven’t the right stuff to be an alpha male, maybe you’re not a babe magnet.

Maybe you should count your blessings.

Male Victims Are Funny?

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism in psychology corrupting public education; “feminism directly produces the atmosphere that discounts male victims by perpetuating a female victim story-line.”

Mr. Farooq Ali Khan of Luton, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 12 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Mr. Farooq Ali Khan has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Circumcision Centre website circumcisioncentre.co.uk:

"Private Medical Clinic – Circumcision Services in the UK

Our services cover all age ranges – from infants (under a year old), through younger boys (under 8), to older boys and adult men. We choose the best possible circumcision procedure for every patient and have both pre and post-operative care and consultation to ensure that every patient and their family get the best possible treatment.

You can also purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren for Eid, Christmas or any other festival. Please contact us for further information.

We specialise in male circumcision, so not only are you assured of the best possible care, but will also be treated by doctors with many years of experience in circumcisions.

All our Doctors are specially trained in best practice to circumcise men of all ages. Our doctors are either Urologists or G.P.s and are all registered with the GMC."

So, you can "purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren" if . . . your grandchild is a boy, and you wish to force partial genital amputation on him as a gift for Christmas.

Then there's this ironic bit of marketing:

> Book Early for Holidays
> We are now taking bookings for the summer holidays. Please book early to avoid disappointment.

From their other website thornhillclinic.co.uk we find the names of the doctors at the Circumcision Centre, as well as the manager:

> Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai MBChB MRCGP MRCS DPD, Dr. M Ruhul Amin BSc (Hons) MBChB, Mr. Darrel Gregory MInstLM Dip.RSA – manager, Mr. Farooq Ali Khan BSc. (Hons) MBBS (Distinction) FRCS (Urol), Mr. M Asad Saleemi MBBS, MSc (Urol), FRCS (Urol)

The other website advertises it's General Practice for mostly adult men – while doing great business as circumcision experts – yet the only training they have or service they perform on infants is circumcision.

It's encouraging to see that the clinic helps men and their health (see Movember photos here), but it's greatly at odds with performing genital mutilation on unconsenting baby boys.

Under "Our Procedures:"

> Circumcision Procedures and Recommended Methods
>
> PlastiBell ® or the new Circumplast® – Both Perfect for Younger Boys
> The doctors in The Circumcision Centre are vastly experienced and use the patented PlastiBell® device (made by Hollister Incorporated) and the new Circumplast® (made in Australia) for circumcising young boys and babies. This procedure, developed in the USA, is quick, straightforward and virtually pain-free for your son.

There's no way of knowing if this procedure is "virtually pain-free."

See these graphic photos of circumcisions using different 'devices' including the Plastibell – scary to think people invent and USE instruments such as these.

Under "Circumcision Information" we read graphic explanations of different circumcision methods and a glossary of terms related to this surgery and male genitals, but NO INFORMATION ABOUT RISKS AND COMPLICATIONS. You can read that info here at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "Our Services" we see:

> Prime Service
> Every patient has access to the best possible treatment.
>
> Priority Service
> For those who want more privacy and personal attention.
>
> Ceremonial Service
> For those who see circumcision as a family or religious celebration.

Unless you pay extra, you and your baby won't have a private room, no pre- or post-operative consultation, and no souvenir program. Sounds to me like the human equivalent of a "puppy mill," a "cutting mill" with baby boys crowded into rooms on an (dis)assembly line of genital mutilation.

A "souvenir program," really?

Under "About Us:"

> Information for Doctors Interested in Working With The Circumcision Centre
> The Circumcision Centre is actively searching for GPs and surgeons to meet the growing number of enquiries and patients.
>
> We believe that performing circumcisions is a great way to add some surgery into your weekly schedule whilst at the same time serving your practice better.
>
> All existing Circumcision Centre affiliated Doctors testify enthusiastically to the benefits of working with us.
>
> If you would like to find out more about how to be affiliated with The Circumcision Centre, then please contact us. All we need is your name, GMC number and email address. We are in need of qualified, trained and enthusiastic Doctors to serve our patients today!

So, "add some surgery into your weekly schedule," ruin someone's sex life, and take away their human rights as well.

> Looking to Run Your Own Clinic?

> We need surgeons with a minimum FRCS (Paediatric Urology) to head up new private clinics proposed in London, Birmingham & Manchester.
>
> These will become whole day Saturday clinics, first operation 9.00 AM and the last operation commencing at 4.00 PM. This is a fantastic opportunity for a self-starter looking to run their own practice. Please contact us today for further information.

Horrifyingly, this is big business that is expanding by spreading lies and misinformation, and governments failing to protect baby boys the same as baby girls.

Here's an article about the clinic from 2011.

ALERT MGM 101: Video of "The Doctors" TV show about circumcision – can you guess who is on what side?

Mr. Khan's practice information follows:

Thornhill clinic
1-3 Thornhill Rd, Luton, Bedford LU4 8EY, United Kingdom
Phone:+44 1582 561999
circumcisioncentre.co.uk

info@thornhillclinic.co.uk

> Mr. Farooq Ali Khan of Luton, UK placed on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/MqDDCyMdla #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/uOPzQBHt4K
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 14, 2016

Boats for Women

Mark Dent · 12 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I still recall the vague sense of unease I felt as a young boy when I watched scenes from the movie, A Night to Remember many years ago.

The fact that the huge, hulking bulk of the Titanic could be rendered helpless and immobile by a large chunk of ice was unsettling enough, but the cries of "women and children to the lifeboats" …caused a stab of fear to cut through my young heart.

I was a child back then, but I was also a boy. I knew I would one day be a man. I thought of the inky black water rising up to greet me and the horror of the cold seeping into my bones, rendering me paralysed before the slow process of drowning followed.

I remember my father speaking about his most feared death. He said,

> Imagine you are on a huge ocean liner and you wander up on deck for some fresh air or to simply be alone. As you lean on the rail, it snaps and you fall as if in a dream until you hit the cold water and as you struggle to stay afloat, you watch as the liner continues on without you…oblivious to your predicament. The lights grow dim and distant, the cold bites, your arms are growing weary and the darkness envelopes you as the only light in that black night came from the ship which is now on the horizon.

You are alone. No-one in the universe knows that you are facing your last moments on earth. Can you imagine the loneliness? Dad would ask.

The men in the Titanic went to their deaths with the screams of other people in their ears, but ultimately each man had been facing the stark reality of his impending exit from this world for one and a half hours as they watched women and children scramble aboard the available lifeboats. Women drowned too, as did some children, but this were as a result of inadequate preparation for a possible catastrophe at sea. There were not enough lifeboats. The class system also meant some women and children were trapped below deck and didn't get to the boats in time.

The men were denied a place on the boats simply because they were men, even when there was room and they were only a few feet away. They were threatened with death if they dared give in to their primal urge to avoid a ghastly death in the icy black ocean. Some still snuck aboard, swallowing their shame and preparing to face the scorn and hatred they would encounter for daring to live when women and children had not survived. Others were required in order to man the large lifeboats and look after the passengers lucky enough to be on them.

I try hard to place myself in the shoes of one of the many men upon the Titanic that night. I understand that this was a different time and place, and that most men as well as women, believed that it was only right and proper for men to sacrifice themselves for women and children- as they do to this very day. But the reality of your imminent extinction must send all of your evolutionary instincts into overdrive. These men, many very young or in the prime of their lives had everything to live for. They had children, loved partners, stimulating jobs. Many of these men were extraordinarily wealthy and powerful-yet more women from third class survived than men from first class.

Many (not all) of these men faced their death with extraordinary composure and dignity. We have all heard the stories of the musicians who continued to play in order to calm the panicking passengers as the boat slowly listed and the end drew near.

How longingly they must have gazed at the lifeboats which promised another dawn, fresh opportunities, comfort……and life….life.

It was however, an eye opening experience to read comments made by female survivors of that unforgettable tragedy in a book I recently read called, Shadow of the Titanic by Andrew Wilson. This book presents a number of stories, all of which focused upon the lives of survivors and examined how the disaster impacted their lives in the years that followed.

It is one thing to humbly and gratefully acknowledge the loving sacrifice made by so many men on that night, but to read the comments made by female survivors about both the men who died and those who survived gives new meaning to the words entitlement and privilege.

Writing in 1955, Marjorie Dutton who travelled aboard the Titanic as an eight year old second class girl-described how her life was somehow blighted or cursed.

> My father was drowned taking our worldly wealth with him, as in those days people were not as bank- minded as they are now,' she said. ' Since that time I have been blessed with bad luck and often wonder if it will ever give me a break, but it just seems to be my lot…

Perhaps Marjorie has expressed grief over the loss of her father in other interviews or in private conversations, but if I were discussing the loss of my father I don't believe my focus would be on the money that went to the bottom of the ocean with him. Such bad luck for Marjorie.

Renee Harris, knew her husband was dead (although it had not been confirmed) and said she would rather that than live with the knowledge that he had taken the place of one of the women in the lifeboats.

When Doctor Henry William Frauenthal, the doctor on the Titanic came into Renee's cabin to tend to her broken arm and see if he could help her in any way, Renee let him know what she thought of a man who had leapt into a lifeboat and landed on top of a woman, breaking her ribs.

> I wouldn't have my husband back at the cost of a woman's life!" she told him "and he made such a hasty exit I didn't see him again on the Carpathia (the rescue ship) or ever after.

Despite her apparent hard line attitude toward men who dared to live when women had drowned, Renee Harris was tormented by the fact that she survived and her husband was dead. Had she done the right thing in leaving her husband on the ship to die? Harris posed this very question in an article for the American Weekly.

She wrote of the final moments of that terrible night. She recalled one man saying to the officers that he was going to help his wife into one of the lifeboats. He had evidently sneaked into a lifeboat as the next time Renee saw him he was on board the Carpathia. Harris branded this behaviour cowardly and said that her husband's sense of right and wrong was too strong for him to behave in such a manner.

She describes how her husband helped her into her life jacket (she had broken her arm earlier that day). "It was the most awful moment I had ever known." Harry lifted her into the collapsible boat and told the crew member of her injury. "For years after, my heart was numb with grief. And always one question haunted me. Should I have remained aboard the Titanic and died at sea with Harry?"

She relates a true story she read in a newspaper report.

A husband and wife were on their way to the movies near Chicago when the women got her foot caught in a railway track. Although the man tried to free his wife's trapped foot, it wouldn't move. Then they heard the whistle of a train, quickly followed by a rumble. Within seconds the train was approaching. Frantically, the man-who had three children at home-pulled at his wife's foot, but still it did not move. As the train thundered toward them, he had to make a decision-whether to stay with his wife or save himself. His choice? "To remain with his wife beneath the wheels of the train."

"Was he right? I have never known what to think." said Harris.

I think Renee knew full well what kind of response she would receive in that time of stiff upper lips and men standing whenever a woman entered a room. I am sure she wanted a flood of reassuring words and support, and that of course is exactly what she got.

“To have stayed on the Titanic,” said a man from New Jersey “would have been suicide on your part.” I wonder if this man considered the deaths of the hundreds of men who remained to be suicides.

What fascinates me is the fact that this woman was fully aware of the privileged position her gender gave her in the moment of life or death and of the horrible end she had avoided and yet she could find no compassion or understanding for those men, who, like her, chose life.

We must remember that the sinking of the Titanic occurred at the very time the suffragettes were demanding the vote for women (those of the privileged classes). This did not escape the attention of the press back then and they indeed pointed out the hypocrisy of these women who demanded equality yet happily accepted the protection and sacrifice offered by their men when the grim reaper was lurking close by.

In fact a poem was written by Clark Adams which identified this glaring double standard with a razor sharp wit.

“Votes for women!”
Was the cry,
Reaching upward to the Sky.
Crashing glass
And flashing eye-
“Votes for Women!”
Was the cry.

“Boats for women!”
Was the Cry.
When the brave
Were come to die.
When the end
Was drawing nigh-
“Boats for women!”
Was the cry.

Life has many Little jests Insignificant
as tests.
Doubt and bitterness assail
But “Boats for women” tells the tale.

The responses from some suffragettes to those who dared to denounce their “cake and eat it” attitudes provided lines that sit very comfortably alongside Hilary Clinton’s infamous:

> Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat.

One woman said:

> Women, though saved by the noble sacrifice of men, were in the equally hard position of having to see the ship go down.

Another replied:

She did not want to minimise in any way the gallantry displayed, but it must be borne in mind that it was the universal rule in times of shipwreck that women and children should be saved first and the instance of the Titanic was not the only one in which this was carried out. It was merely a matter of rule. There was no special chivalry attached to it. (Sylvia Pankhurst)

Entitlement was deeply entrenched in many women, much as it is today. These women who scorned and accused the men who survived would perhaps have been just as willing to hand out white feathers to teenage boys in 1914, two years after the Titanic sank to the bottom of the Atlantic.

One female survivor, Lady Duff Gordon, made this observation.

> Even in that terrible moment I was filled with amazement as nearly all of the American wives who were leaving their husbands without a word of protest or regret, scarce of farewell. They have brought the cult of chivalry to such a pitch in the States that it comes as second nature to their men to sacrifice themselves and to their women to let them do it.

Perhaps today, these same women would mock any man's attempt to express his pain or fear and happily proclaim their fondness for bathing in male tears. They would assuredly regard any suggestion that the abuse or murder of a man by a woman was in any way worthy of the attention or compassion given to female victims of male violence as an outrageous idea.

The fact of the matter is most men, and that includes the writers and readers of AVFM would instinctively still place the needs of the females around them before their own in any dangerous scenario. This is not the issue. It is the fact that some women would not only expect but demand such a response that causes the bile to rise in one's throat.

Feminist attitudes today mirror the expectations of the women of the past. They demand "equality' but know full well that is the last thing they want. To truly want equality means living with the same obligations and responsibilities every man is assigned from the moment he is born. It means you must "pay the piper" when your turn comes and not suddenly cry poor.
It is accepting the fact that every right men appear to have has been earned and paid for, often with blood, sweat and tears. The suggestion that women be conscripted in Norway brought a heated outcry in 2015 from leading feminists who said under the title Misconceived Equality
"The Norwegian Association for Women's Rights (NKF) considers female conscription as a misunderstanding of the concept of gender equality and the intentions of the Law on Equality. Gender equality implies first and foremost that women and men should have the same human rights and fundamental freedoms. Women should be valued and allocated power and resources on equal terms with men. But women and men do not have to be alike or do the same things to be equal.
To ensure gender equality it is important in many cases that women and men are treated equally. But they should not necessarily be treated equally in all situation"

Do pigs and farms come to mind?

Nothing has changed in the past century.

References

Shadow of the Titanic, Andrew Wilson, Published by Simon and Schuster 2011

https://wizzley.com/titanic-suffragettes/

http://www.telegraph.co.uk/men/thinking-man/11509811/Why-has-everyone-forgotten-about-male-suffrage.html?fb_ref=Default

http://womenalliance.org/no-to-female-conscription

Dr. Balvinder Mehat accused of cutting without consent, placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 12 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Balvinder Mehat has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Mehat's website bakersfieldmedicalcentre.nhs.uk:

"Welcome to Bakersfield Medical Centre

With patients' needs at the heart of everything we do, our website has been designed to make it easy for you to gain instant access to the information you need. As well as specific practice details such as opening hours and how to register, you'll find a wealth of useful pages covering a wide range of health issues along with links to other relevant medical organisations.

OUR MISSION
• To treat our patients promptly, courteously, with dignity and respect and in complete confidence.

• To give equal access to all regardless of gender, gender identity, marital status, sexual orientation, race, colour, nationality, religion, age, disability, HIV positivity, working pattern, caring responsibilities, trade union activity or political beliefs – or any other grounds."

All nice sounding words, but the infants that get genitally mutilated at this practice aren't treated with dignity or respect, unless you consider being strapped down and having your genitals surgically altered to be respectful.

Dr. Mehat has been accused of performing a circumcision on a three month old without the mother's consent, as the law requires. There is a story in the Daily Mail about the incident and the angry mother who's seeking punishment of Dr. Mehat. She's also started a petition at change.org to prevent Dr. Mehat from performing circumcisions.

We wholly concur with the mother in this excerpt from the petition:

> Please sign our petition to remove this Doctor from practicing on innocent children as he is clearly not following the correct guidelines and conducting his surgery appropriately!!!
>
> Circumcision is a barbaric, torturous ritual that takes place on innocent boys without their consent. It has been perceived as God's wish for many years but in actual fact evidence strongly suggests other wise. Not a single medical organization in the world recommends routine infant circumcision its both painful and harmful. Risks include excessive bleeding, skin bridges, infection, loss of the glands or entire penis and even death. Although illegal it is very rarely punished less then 1% of circumcised males make the decision themselves to be chopped. I find it utterly disgusting that after I've made the decision that I want my son to have the choice himself it was snatched away from him illegally and yet 2 years on no body has been punished!!!

As the boy's mother said, the bigger issue is that 'consent' by definition involves the person the action involves, in this case the infant. The 'consent' that a parent or parents give is ethically meaningless because it's elective surgery (only patients can 'elect') that is risky, painful, mutilates and amputates part of the penis. There are hundreds, maybe thousands of boys who die of this surgery every year. These deaths are rarely attributed to the circumcision, so we don't have records to look at. We think it's very convenient that we have no data for circumcision deaths while all other surgeries have that data. See this video of a pediatrician who tried to get answers.

Rather than merely offering circumcisions, many circumcision doctors and clinics lie and mislead about benefits vs. risks and actively promote the unethical practice of routine infant circumcision.

Since the doctor's website gives no information about risks and complications of circumcision, you can read the research here at neonatalcutting.org.

BONUS – MGM 101 VIDEO: Pediatrician – Becoming Aware of Genital Mutilation

Dr. Mehat's practice information follows:

Bakersfield Medical Centre
141 Oakdale Road
Bakersfield
Nottingham, NG3 7EJ
Tel: 0115 9401007

> Dr Balvinder Mehat said to cut w/o consent, on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/PCgCz6ugdU #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/qDaCknKZa1
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 12, 2016

Is feminism a religion?

Theryn Meyer · 13 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist Religion – Theryn Meyer

Epistemology is the study of how we come to know what we know, especially with regards to its limits and validity. Throughout history there have been two leading, often competing and conflicting, epistemologies – science (based on the scientific method) and religion (based on faith).

The Scientific Method describes the principles and procedures for the systematic pursuit of knowledge involving the recognition and formulation of a problem, the collection of data through empirical observation and experiment, the formulation and testing of hypotheses, the construction of theories, and the improvement of said theories based on new information obtained through the iteration of said principles and procedures.

Faith, on the other hand, can be described as the unwavering belief in a hypothesis or set of hypotheses that either fails the test of logic or the scientific method, is currently untestable via any available scientific means, or is by nature completely untestable.

Religion is therefore a personal set or institutionalized system of attitudes, beliefs, and practices based on unchanging and stationary dictums that are held or adopted by subjects based on the faith that such attitudes, beliefs, practices, and dictums upon which they are based, have been ordained by one god, multiple gods, or some higher power or authority.

From my observations, feminism operates inordinately more closely to a religion than it does to a science.

I have discussed in the past the religiosity of my childhood milieu. I grew up in a small, traditionalist Christian town in South Africa, where I had 30 minutes of Bible Study before class daily since elementary school, knelt in prayer with my brother and father before bed every night, and attended Sunday school every week. In my environment, faith in Christ was assumed without question. Like driving on the left-hand side of the road, it was a rule that everybody just seemed to agree upon, whether by choice or by pressure.

Around the age of 12, I suffered an intense period of depression that disillusioned me from my faith in God. I started questioning and scrutinizing the Christian ideological monopoly that was so pervasive in my daily life, and soon faced the repercussions of apostatizing myself from the overwhelming religious orthodoxy.

When I immigrated to Canada at age 17, I soon realized that I had relocated from an environment that was dominated by Christian beliefs, to an environment where one's own and others belief in feminist claims was assumed without question. The reality was (and is) that everybody in Canada and most of the western world, with the exception of a small minority, are unquestioning feminists. Most people aren't unquestioning feminists in the sense that they necessarily call themselves feminists without question, but rather in the sense that they hold many feminist assertions as obviously true, without question:

Women have been historically oppressed
Women have been historically oppressed by men
Men have been historically privileged Men face no real problems today
Women are the primary victims of society, from domestic violence to physical violence

The experiences of living in environments dominated by a Christian and a feminist hegemony respectively, and having apostatized from both Christianity as a religion and feminism as an ideology, have given me great insight into the stark and often eerie parallels between religion and feminism.

The first correlate that struck me was the authoritative epistemological approach that feminism seemed to have borrowed from religious dogma:

Why is homosexuality a sin? Because god said so.
Why is sexual consent defined as an affirmative 'yes' after every sexual progression? Because feminists decided it to be so.

How do I know that committing adultery is an abomination? Because it says so in the Bible.
How do I know that there is a wage gap that is due to sexism? Because the professor proclaimed it in my Gender Studies class when she asked loaded questions like "How does the wage gap negatively affect women?", rather than "Is there a wage gap to start with?"

Clearly these dictums have not come to be known through a procedure that pursues knowledge through a scientific method. Instead they have been ordained by an authority figure – an ordainment that does not invite challenge or scrutiny. Sure, sectarian disagreement on subsequent conclusions from such dictums may be tolerated, whether it be a radical feminist in dispute with an ecofeminist, or a Presbyterian Christian in disagreement with an Evangelical Christian.

However, the underlying axioms – that there is a God or that we live in a patriarchy; that non-marital sex is sinful or that women are an oppressed class – all remain assumed dogmatically, immune to scrutiny, and eternally stationary. In fact, dissent to a dictum or set of dictums, whether they be feminist or religious, are met with identical tactics of moral shaming and a power play of ethics. That is to say that one's opinion that there isn't a god, or that we don't live in a rape culture, isn't incorrect because it fails the test of reason, evidence, or the scientific method, but rather because holding such an opinion makes one an immoral person – a sinner destined for hell or a misogynist rape-apologist deserved of public shaming.

But the crowning glory of all parallels between feminism and religion, however, is the good old unfalsifiability fallacy, which is when a theory or hypothesis is devised such that it cannot be contradicted by the scientific method. LogicallyFallacious.com gives a witty example as follows:

I have tiny, invisible unicorns living in my anus. Unfortunately, these cannot be detected by any kind of scientific equipment.

Typical unfalsifiable sophistry from some religious folks may manifest itself as follows:

Non-Religious Person: I have never seen, felt, or experienced God or the consequences of God's actions on my life. Everything I've seen, felt, or experienced can better be explained through reason, logic, and the scientific method.

Religious Person: Well that must be because you haven't accepted God into your heart.

However, the only way of measuring whether one has accepted God into one's heart is if one sees, feels, or experiences God or the consequences of God's actions in one's life in the first place. Not only is this logic circular, but it cannot be proven wrong in any way.

Feminists seems once again to borrow such tactics from religious folks in the following way:

Non-Feminist Woman: I have never seen, felt, or experienced the Patriarchy or its consequences in my life. Nothing I've seen, felt, or experienced denotes to me that I am part of an oppressed class.

Feminists: Well either you have unconsciously assimilated your oppression and suffer from internalized misogyny, or you haven't been properly trained to spot the patriarchy.

In this way, feminists cover their asses and ensure the unfalsifiability of patriarchy theory by stating that every exception to their rule of patriarchy is just an instance of internalized misogyny, and therefore just another instance of patriarchy at work!

The parallels between religion and feminism must not be identified in order to denigrate people of faith. Personally, I don't see any problem with holding personal beliefs that fail the scientific method, lack evidence, or simply cannot by their nature be proven or disproven, so long as it remains exactly that – personal. Epistemology – that is, how we come to know what we know – is a complicated matter, and the scientific method is far from perfect. However, it is the best method we have.

Most of western civilization has, quite successfully, established a clear separation of church and state. This separation ensures that beliefs which either fail the test of logic or the scientific method, are currently untestable through available scientific means, or are by nature completely untestable, aren't universalized and enforced upon others. Unfortunately, there is no such separation protecting us from the religion of feminism.

Are men at fault for childless women?

AVfM Video Source · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Daily Mail is forwarding the narrative in its ”Femail” section that it is somehow the fault of men that some women end up being childless while women just get to that state through no fault of their own.

Lucian Vâlsan is not convinced. Watch a harsh response even by some non-feminists’ standards.

You can subscribe to Lucian’s Freedom Alternative, here.

Questioning the rape narrative in Cologne, Germany.

James Schultz · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Last weekend we were treated to "news" on social media that a thousand Muslim men had descended upon Cologne Germany and, while shooting fireworks in their faces to disfigure them, raped 100 women. The tale was somewhat confirmed by Breitbart and other sources, but amazingly, many of the reports of even "sexual assault" turn out to be unconfirmed and in many cases to have been attempts at harassment and intimidation, but are certainly not rape or severe sexual assault. Leaving us to wonder, what will be remembered about this event? D.E.

I've always wanted to go to the tomato festival in Pamplona, Spain to partake in the running of the Bulls. My better judgment however has concerns that focus on whether or not I am quick enough on my feet to avoid going viral on Youtube by outmaneuvering a herd of 1500 pound raging bulls. However, a new and far more exciting travel destination has come of interest as of late. Cologne, Germany. A week and a half ago saw the inaugural New Years Eve Running of the Rapists or so one might conclude if they believed everything they read in headlines that suggest that up to 100 women were raped, sexually assaulted and the targets of a coordinated attack by as many 1000 Arab and North African Men. 100 women did not get raped on New Years eve in Cologne by 1000 Arab and North African men.

What I find most troubling isn't the fact that 100 women were allegedly sexually assaulted, it is the fact that the media recognizes that the smartest person stupid enough to believe this sits atop a segment of the population large enough to be profitable.

This was an easy story to publish for many media outlets. It feeds directly into the current fears many westerners already have about the huge influx of Syrian migrants into Europe and North America. Feminists have not done too much with this story. If anyone would recognize a sensationalized crisis, it would be those who make a living off of them. I would have thought for sure Jessica Valenti would have tweeted about this during her first morning shit of 2016. Amanda Marcotte who tweets more than twice as often as Jessica but has less than half the followers made no mention of this either. On Twitter David Futrelle was openly challenged in one post as to why he was sharing AVFM memes about men taking their girlfriends to MacDonald's as an example of misogyny rather than discussing the Cologne rape crisis.

David hasn't replied. The reports coming out of Cologne steeped in the sort of moral panic and hysteria seen numerous times throughout history were reminiscent in some ways of the magnitude of crisis that unfolded in Paris two months ago. CNN reported that there were 379 criminal acts on New Years Eve, 150 or so being investigated for sexual assault. The Independent claims there were 90 criminal reports with one alleged rape. CBC reported that 121 women were robbed, threatened or sexually molested by gangs of men. The Wall Street journal claimed that 121 reports were recieved by German authorities with three quarters being related to sexual assault. The Rebel called it a "Civil War" as if describing an army of Muslims storming the train station under Muhammad E Lee screaming Allahu Akbar.

Other outlets, including Breitbart called it a "Rapefest" like it was something you could buy tickets from Groupon online and linked video footage as if to provide definitive proof of mass rape that showed nothing of the sort except fireworks going off in a jubilant, if rowdy crowd. I've seen worse mobs having good clean fun torching police cruisers, overturning vehicles and making out in the middle of chaos in downtown Vancouver after the Canucks lost to the Boston Bruins in the Stanley Cup finals back in 2011.

As a measure of how useless the video footage was, Kirby Dick and Amy Ziering couldn't even use it in their next documentary. Perhaps the best quote from the media so far is the BBC's suggestion that > …the attacks appear to have been organised. Around 1,000 young men arrived in large groups, seemingly with the specific intention of carrying out attacks on women.

I could be wrong of course and maybe two full battalions of similar size to what Australia committed to the US led invasion of Iraq in 2003 did in fact orchestrate a coordinated attack on women at the strategically vital and lucrative Cologne train station while intoxicated but we need to calm the fuck down here and approach this with a more critical eye. We can all agree something happened here, but highly unlikely to be worth the hysteria that currently exists.

As mentioned, CNN reported that there were 379 reports made to police and Breitbart now reports that there have been 379 arrests. What luck. Despite the mass panic and hysteria only two rapes have been reported thus far. Right about now I'll have to preemptively dodge a few straw-men being thrown my way, as some will ask "Why does it matter? – two is two too many." That part is correct, but for the media who know that the degree of hysteria they create is related to the revenue and political capital to be gained, two is no where near enough. If it doesn't matter that two rapes were reported as 100; than it was never about the rape to begin with. That is why these stories are presented in the manner they are – that leaves a lasting impression that a predatory culture that we were warned would do something like this has now conveniently materialized and is now stalking the streets of Germany in great hordes like it was the dawn of the zombie apocalypse.

Often the voices worth paying attention to are the ones countering the narrative and saying the things that few want to hear. Enter Marcia Adair, an expat Canadian journalist living in Cologne, who managed to piss off Islamophobes for daring to describe these men without reference to their religion and coffee shop feminists for her internalized misogyny that refused to bare false witness against anything that happened that night. Her article in the National Post is unique for a variety of reasons. It is the only one I can find in a major news source that provides an alternative viewpoint to what happened in Cologne on New Years Eve, and the second relatively unique and interesting thing is that she was actually there.

> I was at the main station, alone after midnight, as I often am, happy to have had a lovely night watching fireworks at the Rhine. Imagine my surprise, six days later, to discover I had been within 100 metres of a roving gang of rapists without noticing that anything was amiss.

Bystanders today are now generally encouraged to intervene and speak out against those they witness committing rape marking a dramatic shift from what we would have done previously, which was apparently to sit by like a bunch of perverts and do nothing without it ever occurring to us that someone was being harmed. Apparently rape is an act of public exhibitionism that has been happening in plain site all around me for most of my life. It is amazing that she wouldn't notice a "Rapefest" happening right under her nose in 2015 when we are taught that everything is rape.

Thankfully the First Canadian Couch Commando Regiment from 3000 miles away weren't buying it and deployed to the echo chamber of a comment section (the National Post being a Canadian publication) of her article to correct her about what she really saw. In one comment thread alleging that Adair was whitewashing what happened that night, one commenter quipped,

> I think her feeling would be different if she were a victim which is a strange thing to assume for someone who was at the scene of the alleged crime and clearly states she will,

> …still walk the city centre as I have always done and not think twice about it.

One commenter posted a Rebel article as the source of his faith in the reports coming out of Germany without any sense of irony in the fact that this article pointed out the German government "… writes false press releases [and]… sits on the news." Apparently government censorship and dishonesty surrounding Cologne could only apply to the occurrence of mass rapes, rather than the lack thereof. Consider for a moment that this is the same media who have convinced many people that something similar is happening on our college and university campuses.

We have all the reason in the world to be skeptical about the extent and level being reported. The Western world has been accepting Muslim refugees and migrants for decades and specifically from the Syrian crisis since 2011. Canada's Muslim population is over 1,000,000 and no roving hordes of rape gangs. As of 2010 the US had roughly 2,500,000 Muslims and no roving hordes of rape gangs. Syria according to some statistics had a very low rape rate before statistics became difficult to find since the start of their civil war at .06 rapes per 100,000 people. Even if we accept the most generous of non-reporting figures and cultural differences regarding definitions of rape it is still quite low. According to the Local, a German English media outlet,

> Less than 1 percent of the total crimes committed by refugees are sex crimes, going against rumours spread on social media that these have become more common with the arrival of hundreds of thousands of refugees.

What changed New Years Eve and how did Marcia Adair walk right through the middle of it and not notice? How has North America so successfully screened out rapists? Clearly there were some incidents, but to the degree stated in most news outlets? Let us not forget that the media has successfully convinced legislators that 25% of female students are raped in university so it should not be seen as a big surprise that so many people believe what is being reported now.

Speaking out against rape does not make you racist and does not conflict with positive or negative feelings regarding the migrant situation in Europe which makes it strange as to why many high profile feminists have chosen not to provide any coverage of this situation at all when so many of those feminists are not only happy to believe a non credible story, but a story exposed as false, such as the case of UVA. This should not in and of itself be surprising. Feminist advocacy has always been very selective about the character and nature of their victim and perpetrator narratives. I very well could be wrong, but I am not going to go superimposing the German flag on top of my Facebook profile picture just yet.

My Lady Lump

Tim Patten · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I was at home when I found the lump. I had just woken up to another bright and sunny morning in my beloved San Francisco, that peculiar city teeming with tech wizards, trailblazing culture warriors, and individuals of every race, color and creed, which God had created in Her own beautiful image.

The lump hurt. It was on my right breast, smaller than the size of a penny. I couldn't remember if it had been there the night before. For a while, I simply sat and stared at this unwelcome, frightening stranger. I prodded it with a finger and the pain rippled through my chest.

I groaned and swiveled my feet to the floor. The movement brought questions flooding into my head. Was the lump new? How long had it been there? And then, the big one: Was it cancer?

My heart raced as I thought of my father and grandmother. Both had succumbed to the hateful disease, and the memory of their deaths–long, painful affairs–made me shudder as if I was cold. I sat on the end of the mattress, hunched over, a twisted "Why me?" expression on my face, and a belly full of fear.

I had been here before. Last year. I had battled lymph node cancer through eight wretched months of intense treatments. I had won. But the experience left me with physical and emotional scars. And now this lump. Had the beast returned to wage war against my organs again?

I spent the next few days anxiously scrutinizing the lump, hoping against hope that it was only a temporary visitor. Perhaps it was a reaction to something I'd eaten or a strained muscle from too much exercise?

I'm retired now, and I couldn't stop thinking about the mystery bug inside me, creeping insidiously, targeting vulnerabilities and searching for a host to latch on to and overwhelm.

I became obsessed with the environment around me, frightening myself with imagined contaminants in the food I ate, the water I drank, and even the air I was breathing. The lump was driving me insane. It had to go. I had to get the poison out of me!

Eventually, I drew up the courage and went to my doctor, exactly one week after I had made that first, awful discovery. The lump had grown, or so I thought, and the pain had increased.

The speed with which my doctor reacted added to my sense of panic. I was immediately referred to the Breast Center for a mammogram. That's when I knew I was in trouble. My worst fears were confirmed: the big "C" had returned.

As soon as I arrived home, I rushed to my desk and switched on the PC, fingers trembling. Eight months of angst-filled chemo sessions, torturous radiation treatments and heart stopping doctor's exams flashed through my mind. I was overcome with feelings of utter helplessness. Would I have to go through all of that again? I could see the long, dark corridors of time; I felt the torment of unanswered questions. A familiar fear gripped my heart.

An Internet search revealed that between two and three thousand American men are diagnosed with breast cancer every year; around 500 die. I felt hot tears fill my eyes and my throat was as dry as sand. I didn't want this. I did not want return to a place I vowed never to visit again.

My hand shook as I dialed the number for the Breast Center.

"I'd like to schedule a mammogram." I said, struggling to maintain my composure.

"Pardon me?" She sounded almost amused.

I repeated my request and sat listening to the seconds of silence on the other end of the line.

"Have you seen a doctor?" She spoke slowly, as if she were addressing a child.

I took a deep breath. “Yes. Doctor Wilson sent a requisition.”

“Huh.” She thought it was a prank. I could hear it in her voice. I fought back the vague sensation of disgust. It’s not her fault, I told myself. She probably gets many prank calls. I mean, men and breast cancer–come on!

She spoke again: “Name and D.O.B., please?”

I gave her the information and listened as her fingers tapped the keyboard. I sat quietly, my clothes moist with sweat. Her animosity seemed strange–maybe she was also having a difficult day. Ten minutes later, I was in a taxi, on the way to my first appointment.

We drove past the Painted Ladies, my eyes drifting over the familiar Victorian houses set against a backdrop of downtown skyscrapers. I hardly noticed the Golden Gate Bridge. It seemed like only seconds, but there I was, standing in the lobby of the Breast Center as the clerk wrote my name on the anonymous registration list. Suddenly my legs did not seem strong enough. I nearly collapsed into the chair, my chest gripped like it was in a vise.

There were five other women in the waiting area. A few were reading magazines. The rest looked down, staring at the generic, blue-gray carpet. I was the only man. My stomach lurched as I heard my name called.

“Ms. Patten?”

The women turned their heads towards me as I pull myself up and out of the chair. I headed towards the registrar’s desk. She was in her late-thirties, I think, her hair tied back in a no-nonsense pony tail. Her eyes widened when she looked up to greet me.

“Oh! I’m sorry….”

I smiled her apologies away and waited while she recorded my details. Slowly, it dawned on me that I was embarrassed to be there. I was a man–a man with suspected breast cancer. The irony would be hilarious if such a prognosis wasn’t so deadly. My face felt hot and I shifted my weight from foot to foot, a nervous schoolboy waiting to be scolded.

I’ve had my fair share of such visits. I’ve always felt comfortable and safe in clinics, hospitals, even emergency rooms. But this place seemed cold; I didn’t feel like I should even be there. The clerk handed me a wristband and asked for my signature.

“Take the elevator to the second floor,” she said, smiling and pointing down the hall. I fought the urge to simply turn and leave, scurrying away amid feelings of dread and embarrassment.

The elevator doors opened and I was greeted by two nurses lodged behind a needlessly imposing reception counter. I nodded “hello” and showed them my wristband. The one with ‘Beth’ written on her name tag pointed to a waiting area off to my right.

“Have a seat and we’ll call you shortly,” she said. Her voice was functional and seemingly devoid of empathy. I found a chair and sat among about a dozen women. Almost instantly, the one nearest to me moved her purse away and gripped it tightly against her belly. The others stared, but turned away when my eyes met theirs.

I remembered something that had happened a while back. One morning, my friend Jamal–tall and black, an ex-Broadway dancer–and I were on our way to an AA meeting. We had turned a corner and were walking side-by-side down Market Street when a woman glanced at my friend, startled, and used both her arms to brace her purse against her body. Jamal smiled, but I could see the disappointment in his eyes.

Now, in a room full of white women, I felt just like my friend. I was an interloper here; they did not trust me. Did they really think that I was going to steal their purses? I nearly laughed out loud at the ridiculousness of that thought.

A nurse approached. “Ms. Johnson,” she called.

The dark-haired woman across from me slowly closed her magazine and stood up. I saw sideways glances in my direction. I crossed my legs and acted like I wasn't bothered, but I only wanted to crawl somewhere and hide. I buried my face in the pages of Self, engrossed in a two-page spread of the world's best-dressed women, nicely posed on a bright red carpet.

Soon, I catch myself looking around, staring at the faces of those who were around me. I was still getting the curious glances and I couldn't help but think that I was not welcome here. I was a trespasser, a male in a female place.

I noticed that none of the nurses wore make-up. They all looked freshly scrubbed, with tossed hair and clothes that hung loosely. It struck me that I was in a women-only zone; there was no pressure to be pretty. That's totally cool, I thought, because after all, isn't that exactly what we do? Straight guys don't spiff themselves up for others like them, so why should these women?

I realized then that I was being stared at by a girl with tattoos and a boy's crew cut. She had a badly disguised sneer and eyes full of suspicion. I felt uncomfortable and looked away. Why do they doubt my intentions, or even my character? Suddenly I felt like a pervert, hanging around for a glimpse of a boob. WTF, I thought, I don't even date women. Glimpsing a naked breast was the last thing on my mind. I had become a knuckle-dragging caveman, a predator, who had invaded their space. I wanted to leave.

A fortyish woman, dressed in scrubs, appeared at the reception desk and leaned down to Beth. I could hear them whispering and then they both laughed quietly to themselves. The nurse looked up and called my name.

"Tim Patten?"

She led me to an examination room where it soon becomes obvious that the procedure has not been designed with men in mind. I stood, stripped to the waist with perspiration oozing from my pores, as the nurse tried to squeeze me toward the machine. It was awkward. The little breasts I have didn't quite fit. I couldn't say who was more embarrassed, the nurse or me.

When it was over, I returned to my chair in the waiting area and sat quietly, my heart beating crazily. A woman with a small child emerged from the elevator and she was greeted with smiles. I assumed she was a staff member, coming in on her day off to show off her boy.

"Hi!"

"Good to see you and the little one!"

"Great to see you!"

The welcome committee was boisterous and enthusiastic, the girly-greetings sickly sweet. It brought back memories of empty high school cheerleader chit-chat–the sweet young girls who turned into backstabbing witches the moment one left their midst.

And then suddenly, I was that skinny little kid in the junior high lunchroom, surrounded by designer-clad girls with rich dads from the best neighborhoods. They were discussing boys, as usual, and competing for the attention of the captain of the football team.

"Oh! He's cute!"

"Handsome!"

"So goofy!"

I despised it when I was young and hated it now. I had escaped from that painful reality, but now it was if I had been thrown right back in. I sank into my seat. I remembered that this was a woman's world, and tried to be as inconspicuous as I could.

But then, something inside of me began to rebel. I sat up straight, stretched out my legs and spread them wide. Yeah, I thought with a smile, “Look at me. I’m a man airing his balls. Why don’t you arrest me like they do on some big city subways, because women’s groups had convinced lawmakers that it was illegal for a man to move his legs more than x inches apart?

The hens down the hall were still pecking when I grabbed another magazine to block them out. It was Pregnancy Magazine, which is apparently the authority on wombs and birthing. I sighed and uttered the “F” word under my breath. It was a uterus/breast celebration of things that made my stomach twist.

Out of nowhere, I had the urgent need to pee.

“Through the exit doors and on the right,” Beth instructed.

I walked down the corridor past the exit to the men’s room. It looked as if it had been put outside the clinic as an afterthought. The entire clinic, I realized as I zipped back up and washed my hands, was a vulva cave. I simply couldn’t wait to get the hell out of that thoroughly feminized space.

“Your ultrasound is this way,” she said curtly when I returned. “Follow me, please.”

She led me to a room where I laid down on a bed and waited for another woman to perform the test.

“The doctor will be in soon to explain your results,” she told me.

I had nothing to say. Fifteen minutes later, the doctor breezed in.

“Good news: you’re negative,” she said.

My head started to spin and I exhaled deeply. I was shaking while I waited outside for a taxi. I knew the emotional shock would hit me as soon as I got home. I climbed into the back of the cab as if it was a getaway car and I had just robbed a bank.

As we drove through the city, my still-reeling mind thought about all those liberal moms, obsessed with raising children without gender labels. The so-called ‘forward thinking’ females who desperately avoid the binary of blue for boys and pink for girls like it is some kind of medieval dogma that is too silly to comprehend.

They probably would not even be aware, let alone acknowledge, of what I went through, the deep and painful humiliation I experienced as a male inside the Breast Center. I had been trapped inside a blatantly sexist environment for hours on end, but because I was a man, I simply had to live with it. Had women’s idea of gender equality really devolved into female superiority and hostility toward men? It seemed so.

When I opened my door, I was completely exhausted. I fell into bed and slept for sixteen hours straight. My last thought as I drifted into blessed, healing sleep was that mammograms for men, well, they’re truly fked up.

Dr. Raymond Lackore of Virginia Beach, VA placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Raymond Lackore has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Lacklore's website vbgyn.com:

"I insist on treating patients as human beings and not numbers, seeing one patient at a time and trying to be honestly helpful. Our entire staff strives to live out the mission of Art And Science Of Obstetrics and Gynecology PC: to Treat You With the Best Possible Balance of Compassionate Caring (Art) and Technology (Science)

I have practiced Obstetrics and Gynecology in Virginia Beach, Virginia since 1984.

Education:
BS Chemistry, Univ. Fla (1974) with Honors
MD Univ. S. Fla. College of Medicine (1977)
Ob-Gyn Residency Mayo Clinic (1981)
Board Certified Ob-Gyn (1983)
Fellow of American College of Ob-Gyn (1985)

Personal: I am a committed husband, father and grandfather. I have been with my beautiful wife Cindy since 1973. She is a successful flameworkglass artist who can usually be seen at the Virginia Beach, Boardwalk Art Show. My oldest daughter, Jayme, works for Google in Boston, Ma. My youngest, Melinda, is a practicing Physician Assistant just outside Charlotte N.C. My life revolves around my practice of medicine, my family, personal fitness, acoustic guitar and my Bengal and Abyssinian cats.

Professional Memberships:
American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists
American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology
North American Menopause Society
American Institute of Ultrasound in Medicine
American Association of Gynecologic Laparoscopists
Virginia Beach Medical Society."

So, this Obstetrician/Gynecologist – who is a specialist in female anatomy – also takes on certain male patients (infants) and circumcises them. He has no pediatric training, no training about the function of the foreskin, and yet performs the extraordinary act of amputating part of a newborn's penis.

To say nothing of the risks, this is unethical and a human rights violation: no one but the patient, in this case the infant, can consent to permanent genital mutilation – no parent, no doctor.

Not under "Surgery" but under "Obstetrics" we see "Circumcision" and then the usual list of supposed benefits, debunked here. Then we see "Myths and Lies about Circumcision," a masterpiece itself of lies and pro-circumcision misinformation; here's a few listings, remember, these are supposed MYTHS:

> Parents have no right to inflict circumcision on their sons.
>
> An infant cannot make his own decision to be circumcised (just as he cannot make his own decisions about immunisation, religious upbringing, choice of schooling, etc). Parents have a right and duty to make, on behalf of a child, those decisions which he cannot make for himself. It is thus up to the parents to make the decision based on what they see as the benefits and risks. They make many other far-reaching decisions for their children every day, so why not this one too? Furthermore, in a number of cultures the religious or social norm is for boys to be circumcised. Boys not circumcised in accordance with these norms will not fit in with their cultural heritage and will grow up regretting their parents' inaction.
>
> Circumcision removes Taylor's ridged band.
>
> Taylor 'discovered' this 'ridged band' at the tip of the foreskin by studying less than a dozen dead bodies! This was by no means a scientific study. On the basis of these few observations he postulates (ie. guesses) that there is a band of tissue at the tip of the foreskin with an erotic purpose. He fails to recognise that these men might, like so many uncircumcised men, have been suffering from phimosis or that rigor mortis, which would have already set in, might itself be the explanation. In practice the small ring of muscle there is simply to hold the tip lightly closed to prevent dirt entering.
>
> The foreskin contains specialized nerve endings.
>
> All nerves are specialized. There is nothing more or less special about those in the foreskin compared with those elsewhere in the body. The glans, rather than the foreskin, contains the majority of the sexually sensitive nerves – which don't usually get fully stimulated when sex is experienced through the foreskin.

"Immunisation, religious upbringing, choice of schooling" are mostly good things that we use to improve our children's lives, nonsurgically; comparing that with medically unnecessary genital mutilation is ridiculous. Denying the existence of the ridged band and special nerve endings of the foreskin should make anyone suspicious about the motives behind this pro-circumcision stance.

More from the website:

> COMPLICATIONS: rate of 1.5% for newborns – Greater when the procedure is performed by an inexperienced operator, in unsterile conditions, or when the child is at an older age.
> Bleeding: usually stop with simple pressure – rarely requires sutures.
> Infection: between 1 and 100 and 1 and 1000 cases, most treated with antibiotic ointments.
> Serious spreading infections: occur in perhaps 1 in 4000 cases.
> Removal of either too much or too little foreskin – actually the most common complaint of parents.
> Require plastic surgery: 1: 15,000.
> Circumcision does not appear to have a negative impact on sexual function.
>
> TECHNIQUE: Devices such as the Gomco and Mogen clamps are commonly used in the USA. The amount of foreskin to be removed is estimated (an imperfect process). The foreskin is separated from the tip of the penis. The circumcision device is placed and finally – the foreskin is removed.
>
> PAIN MANAGEMENT: Unmedicated circumcision causes pain so the use of pain medicine is strongly > recommended. First the infant is distracted with a pacifier and sugar water. Then local anesthesia gently injected with an incredibly tiny 30 guage needle providing a "ring block" – the most effective technique and more effective that EMLA cream. A quicker procedure reduces duration of any pain; therefore use of the Mogen clamp has been found to result in less pain than the use of the Gomco clamp or Plastibell. Some online sources suggest that if the procedure is done "rapidly" then no xylocaine is needed – I respectfully but profoundly disagree. I can easily do the procedure well (with excellent anatomic outcome) in 60-90 seconds – if I ignore the infant's screaming – I believe this is unacceptable – I stopped doing this over a decade ago. It takes no more than 12-15 minutes to dramatically (a day and night difference) reduce the infant's discomfort.

>
> MAJOR MEDICAL ORGANIZATIONS: No major medical organization recommends or bans circumcision. Ethical and legal questions have been raised over neonatal circumcision.
>
> SEXUALITY: Circumcision does not appear to decrease the sensitivity of the penis, harm sexual function or reduce sexual satisfaction. The Royal Dutch Medical Association's 2010 Viewpoint mentions that "complications in the area of sexuality" have been reported. Circumcision opponents emphasize anecdotal testimonials as evidence.

Chilling descriptions of complications, procedures, and screaming infants is bad enough, and then lying about no loss of sexual satisfaction. The list of risks and complications is incomplete – which includes death; you can see that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Watch this 'touching' video where Lackore gently describes how he and his all female staff help with "women's health conditions" – apparently one way they help is providing women with a surgical solution to that stubborn infant foreskin problem.

Under "Gynecology" we see "Domestic Violence" and I'm not kidding, it says – this from a circumciser – "ARE YOU BEING ABUSED?"

ALERT MGM 101 Video – "An Elephant in the Hospital" A classic video and a must see for anyone considering circumcision.

Dr. Lackore's practice information follows:

Virginia Beach Address:
1101 First Colonial Road Suite 100
Virginia Beach, Virginia 23454
Phone: 757-481-3366
After Hours: 757-455-3584
Fax: 757-496-3889

> Dr. Raymond Lackore of Virginia placed on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/C21CpZ1xzE #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/QzOXQIzUxv
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 14, 2016

Prisoners of Presentism

Doug Mortimer · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Not to know what has been transacted in former times is to be always a child.

– Cicero

When I first came across the word "presentism" in a magazine article, I thought it was a newly coined word and wondered if it would catch on in the media. Well, it didn't become a buzz word, but it is a bona fide word.

According to the Oxford Dictionaries web site, "presentism" is defined as "uncritical adherence to present-day attitudes, especially the tendency to interpret past events in terms of modern values and concepts."

Much to my surprise, I also discovered that presentism is not a neologism. Historians have been using it for at least a century. The Oxford English Dictionary traces it back to at least 1916 and possibly the 1870's. So why hasn't the word escaped from the history department?

After all, the suffix "ism" has been liberally attached to any number of words. Racism gave birth to sexism, heterosexism, ageism, heightism, weightism, ad nauseam. All these terms are pejorative, as they connote prejudice. Presentism also implies prejudice, but it does not fit into the current cultural narrative of feminism, misandry, and gender equity. In fact, it has the potential to subvert all of them.

When people take a detailed objective look at the past, they inevitably compare it with the present. When that is done, there is always the danger that people might find our brave new world wanting. Best to leave people ignorant of the past lest they figure that the status quo ain't what it used to be, and need not be what it is today.

Progressives exhort us to shrug off "the dead hand of the past" (great name for a horror movie, eh?) in favor of whatever form of social engineering they propose. As George Orwell said, "Who controls the past controls the future. Who controls the present controls the past." Hence we have the endless re-writing of history, not in light of new artifacts or documents being unearthed, but because of contemporary politics.

Consider a women's studies major offering a feminist interpretation of gender roles in, say, 13th Century France. Such a study would be historically pointless because the concept of feminism was unknown in that era. But the real point of presentism is to use the past to promote "social justice" today, so in that sense, such a study would serve its purpose.

But we don't have to go back eight centuries to learn lessons from history. Old-timers, for example, typically refer to the way things were in the good old days when they were young. Indulging in nostalgia is largely a private reverie, but it also serves to remind the young whippersnappers that the world as they know it has not been around that long; in a sense, the past is an alternative lifestyle, and not necessarily an ancient one.

The drawback to nostalgia is that no matter how old you are, the world – your world – began when you came into it. That is your baseline. As you age, you notice changes from that baseline; unless you study history, you will not be aware of the changes that preceded – and resulted in – your baseline.

For example, my grandfather was born in 1895, so to him female emancipation was linked with suffragettes and flappers drinking and smoking. I was born in 1950, so for me, what we now call tradcon was normal. Female enfranchisement was a given. Cigarettes and booze for women was not an issue, though overindulgence in the latter might raise eyebrows.

In late adolescence, when I first became of what is now known as the second wave of feminism, it seemed abnormal to me. Someone who was born a generation after me (say 1980) would have grown up in a world where the tenets of that stage of feminism had been assimilated by mainstream culture. But such a person would perceive the third wave of feminism as abnormal. The new normal is always touted as though we have no choice but to shrug and accept it. Can't turn back the clock, you know. You some kind of reactionary or what?

Well, in a sense you can turn back the clock by reading history, but only if it is real history – in other words untainted by presentism, which uses contemporary tropes to describe the past.

Presentists (if that's not a word, I just made it one) smugly roll their eyes at the benighted sods and clods of ages past and wonder, "What were they thinking?" We never consider the humbling likelihood that people in the future will look back at us with the same attitude.

In fact, it could work the other way around. Imagine a time machine filled with men from before the industrial revolution. If they were brought to our world and disembarked here, they would look around and wonder, "You let your women rule you? What are you thinking?"

I cite the industrial revolution as the dividing line because the seeds of female emancipation were planted during that era. The first manifesto of feminism is often considered to be A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, written in 1792 by Mary Wollstonecraft. It's probably no accident that she was British, as the industrial revolution began in Great Britain.

At the same time, the American and French Revolutions, right behind the Age of Enlightenment, were pushing democracy and egalitarianism, which were more likely to be conducive to inchoate feminist urges. It was only a matter of time before someone looked at The Rights of Man, and said, hey, what about the rights of women?

When one speaks of equality, it's important to specify which two entities are being compared. Feminists, of course, compare their lot to men, now and in the past. But what happens when men turn away from presentism and compare themselves to the men who came before them?

In considering the plight of contemporary men, you might compare yourself to your father and realize that you have to put up with more crap from women than he did; you might look at your grandfather and realize that he had to put up with even less crap from women than your father did. Is that fair? Is that equitable? Depends on who's being compared to whom.

Go back far enough and you find a time when the subject of women's rights never came up. Men didn't worry about what women wanted. If that attitude predominated in days of old, there is no reason why men couldn't adopt that attitude today. If they did, what could women do about it? Judging by the early returns of the MGTOW movement, not much.

The upshot of all this is that we are not stuck in the present. Reading history enables us to imagine a world very different from the world we live in. We are imagining not what might be but what has already been. That makes a big difference. It's not blue sky, utopian thinking. In other words, we are dealing not with ideals but reality. If you want to know what humans are capable of, it's not a bad idea to start by taking an objective look at what they've already done.

Presentism is a form of ignorance. Technological progress deludes us into thinking that social progress is an inevitable concomitant and that our society is superior to past societies. This is not to say they got it all right in the past any more than we do today. We're not talking golden age mythology here. But maybe folks got some things right in the past and we get some things wrong today.

Maybe we can't turn back the clock, but we can stop the clock. We can just unplug it or stop winding it by turning our backs on contemporary society. We can actively fight the status quo, or simply do the MGTOW thing and minimize involvement with it. It may not be possible to effect change to make society better for men, but it may be possible to reboot society after it collapses. I can see the bumper stickers now: "Society has been canceled due to lack of interest."

We know civilization can exist without feminism. History offers us thousands of years of proof. But the powers that be don't want men to ponder this point because they might conclude that the present civilization and future civilizations can exist without it. History must be filtered through presentism to (1) maintain the status quo, or (2) enable progressive social engineering.

We know men are no strangers to visions of the future, as science fiction has been overwhelmingly male since Jules Verne was a young buck. Envisioning the past also requires imagination, and it's more likely to shed light on the present. Also, we are on firmer footing when we study history. Going in the other direction is just educated guesswork.

The concept of presentism is worth passing on. When appropriate, try to introduce the word in conversation. Explain to people that it is a form of (gasp) prejudice. And it applies not just to feminism but to other contemporary social toxins.

Spread the word.

Roosh, let's talk

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 14 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Hi Roosh,

My name is Sage. My internet persona is Victor Zen. I'm a men's rights activist of about 4 years, and my resumé includes lobbying congress, starting a national incubator for men's rights student organizations, hosting a conference, formally debating a feminist-atheist leader, and travelling the world to rallies and events. My battle scars feature police reports brandishing false allegations and mainstream media hit pieces.

I have a brief answer to your request for civility in "Is It Time To Make A Truce With Men's Rights Activists?"

We agree on the importance of self-improvement as a means to adapt, and on the importance of having no shame in being a heterosexual man. I commend your ability to draw a crowd and make a living with words, but we differ strongly on love, sex, and gays—to name a few things. When it comes to game, I think your articles are to seduction what Cosmopolitan's are to dieting. My thinking this way doesn't mean that I hate you, I just don't take most of what you say seriously.

This sentence from your article is one of the few exceptions:

> [MRAs] have been the first to shame game tactics as "manipulation" while I repeatedly criticized them for being more focused on begging authority figures for rights and benefits instead of adjusting to modern-day realities by taking on the path of self-improvement.

An open-minded visit to Google rebuts your characterization of MRAs well-enough, but I will still add that you can't paint MRAs as amenable and aggressive at the same time. I'm either a sniveling little shit beta that sobs "pretty please don't take my rights" into the lower fabric of a judge's gown or I'm the next cross-eyed emotional shame-monger browbeating your motives. Neither describe me or most MRAs I know, but if you are going to make a jab, use one fist. Your defense drops otherwise.

To be clear, I'm neither asking or appealing to your humanity when I say that you must willingly hear a MRA's position on its merits if you want the same treatment. Me disagreeing with you or criticizing your words is not meant as personal hostility or hatred, but if you put character speculations and apparently mature appeals to civility in the same article then you can expect to once again see the word "manipulation."

I'd like to invite you to a hangout discussion by appointment because I enjoy speaking with people outside of my comfort zone. Although I do not anticipate agreeing with you about much, I can at least promise to not treat you with unwarranted hostility and give what you say a fair and thorough hearing in the name of setting an example we'd both appreciate.

Feminist Scream Singing

AVfM Video Source · 16 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A bit of a distraction for your entertainment, here are the Feminist Sirens from Belgium.

Mr. M. Asad Saleemi of the Thornhill Clinic, Luton, UK placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 16 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Mr. M. Asad Saleemi has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Circumcision Centre (also known as the Thornhill Clinic) website circumcisioncentre.co.uk:

"Private Medical Clinic – Circumcision Services in the UK

Our services cover all age ranges – from infants (under a year old), through younger boys (under 8), to older boys and adult men. We choose the best possible circumcision procedure for every patient and have both pre and post-operative care and consultation to ensure that every patient and their family get the best possible treatment.

You can also purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren for Eid, Christmas or any other festival. Please contact us for further information.

We specialise in male circumcision, so not only are you assured of the best possible care, but will also be treated by doctors with many years of experience in circumcisions.

All our Doctors are specially trained in best practice to circumcise men of all ages. Our doctors are either Urologists or G.P.s and are all registered with the GMC."

So, you can "purchase this service as a gift for your grandchildren" if . . . your grandchild is a boy, and you wish to force partial genital amputation on him as a gift for Christmas.

Then there's this ironic bit of marketing:

> Book Early for Holidays
> We are now taking bookings for the summer holidays. Please book early to avoid disappointment.

From their other website thornhillclinic.co.uk we find the names of the doctors at the Circumcision Centre, as well as the manager:

> Dr. Murtaza Khanbhai MBChB MRCGP MRCS DPD, Dr. M Ruhul Amin BSc (Hons) MBChB, Mr. Darrel Gregory MInstLM Dip.RSA – manager, Mr. Farooq Ali Khan BSc. (Hons) MBBS (Distinction) FRCS (Urol), Mr. M Asad Saleemi MBBS, MSc (Urol), FRCS (Urol)

The other website advertises it's General Practice for mostly adult men – while doing great business as circumcision experts – yet the only training they have or service they perform on infants is circumcision.

It's encouraging to see that the clinic helps men and their health (see Movember photos here), but it's greatly at odds with performing genital mutilation on unconsenting baby boys.

Under "Our Procedures:"

> Circumcision Procedures and Recommended Methods
>
> PlastiBell ® or the new Circumplast® – Both Perfect for Younger Boys
> The doctors in The Circumcision Centre are vastly experienced and use the patented PlastiBell® device (made by Hollister Incorporated) and the new Circumplast® (made in Australia) for circumcising young boys and babies. This procedure, developed in the USA, is quick, straightforward and virtually pain-free for your son.

There's no way of knowing if this procedure is "virtually pain-free."

See these graphic photos of circumcisions using different 'devices' including the Plastibell – scary to think people invent and USE instruments such as these.

Under "Circumcision Information" we read graphic explanations of different circumcision methods and a glossary of terms related to this surgery and male genitals, but NO INFORMATION ABOUT RISKS AND COMPLICATIONS. You can read that info here at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "Our Services" we see:

> Prime Service
> Every patient has access to the best possible treatment.
>
> Priority Service
> For those who want more privacy and personal attention.
>
> Ceremonial Service
> For those who see circumcision as a family or religious celebration.

Unless you pay extra, you and your baby won't have a private room, no pre- or post-operative consultation, and no souvenir program. Sounds to me like the human equivalent of a "puppy mill," a "cutting mill" with baby boys crowded into rooms on an (dis)assembly line of genital mutilation.

A "souvenir program," really?

Under "About Us:"

> Information for Doctors Interested in Working With The Circumcision Centre
> The Circumcision Centre is actively searching for GPs and surgeons to meet the growing number of enquiries and patients.
>
> We believe that performing circumcisions is a great way to add some surgery into your weekly schedule whilst at the same time serving your practice better.
>
> All existing Circumcision Centre affiliated Doctors testify enthusiastically to the benefits of working with us.
>
> If you would like to find out more about how to be affiliated with The Circumcision Centre, then please contact us. All we need is your name, GMC number and email address. We are in need of qualified, trained and enthusiastic Doctors to serve our patients today!

So, "add some surgery into your weekly schedule," ruin someone's sex life, and take away their human rights as well.

> Looking to Run Your Own Clinic?
> We need surgeons with a minimum FRCS (Paediatric Urology) to head up new private clinics proposed in > London, Birmingham & Manchester.

>
> These will become whole day Saturday clinics, first operation 9.00 AM and the last operation commencing at 4.00 PM. This is a fantastic opportunity for a self-starter looking to run their own practice. Please contact us today for further information.

Horrifyingly, this is big business that is expanding by spreading lies and misinformation, and governments failing to protect baby boys the same as baby girls.

Here's an article about the clinic from 2011.

ALERT MGM 101: Video of "The Doctors" TV show about circumcision – can you guess who is on what side?

Mr. Saleemi's practice information follows:

Thornhill clinic
1-3 Thornhill Rd, Luton, Bedford LU4 8EY, United Kingdom
Phone:+44 1582 561999
circumcisioncentre.co.uk

info@thornhillclinic.co.uk

> Mr. M. Asad Saleemi of the Thornhill Clinic placed on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/ZIExl33kHH pic.twitter.com/a21WnpwDYn
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 16, 2016

The prison of marriage: lovers' foolishness, jailors' diligence

Douglas Galbi · 16 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

When men marry, they often think little of possible unhappy consequences. Divorce has dire financial consequences for men under U.S. family law today. But most men refuse to consider such consequences. They believe that they are different from men reamed in divorce proceedings. Every man is different from men transformed from fathers into wallets. Every man is different from men working under the threat of imprisonment to provide money to their ex-wives and their ex-wives' boyfriends. Every man who enters the prison of marriage is a fool, except for you. That's what every one of you and me believes. [1]

Men's irrationality in entering the prison of marriage has long been recognized in literature of men's sexed protest. In 1509, Wynkyn de Worde printed an English verse adaptation of the French prose work Les Quinze Joyes de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage). [2] This French source was written early in the fifteenth century. It's a comic work of men's sexed protest. The English translation, entitled The Fyftene Joyes of Maryage, is more solemn. Its introduction describes a man foolishly entering the prison of marriage:

As thus when men in youth courageous
With free will endowed and lustiness
Of their desire and mind outrageous
Without need, but of their foolishness,
Convey themselves from all their liberty
Nothing content with their felicity.

For whereas they may freely ride or go
And at their choice disport themselves over all,
I you ensure these young men will not so
When they least expect, then suddenly they fall
And unconstrained make their bodies thrall,
Like to a person that into prison deep
Without cause all hastily does creep.

So do they often for lack of kindly wit
And when they be within this prison strait
The jailor comes and fast the door shuts
Which is of iron strong, and in waiting he lies often for dread that through defeat
By night or day some should escape out,
Right busily he pries all about.

He bars the door and makes sure all the locks,
The strong bolts, the fetters, and the chain,
He searches well the holes and the stocks
That woe be they that lie there in pain,
And out from there they shall not go again
But ever endure in weeping care and sorrow,
For good no prayer shall they ever borrow.

And especially men may call him besotted,
Far from reason, of wisdom desolate,
That thus his time misused has and doubted,
When he had heard such prisoners but late
Weeping, wailing, and with themselves debate,

Lying in prison as he has passed by,
And put himself therein so foolishly. [3]

The verses "suddenly they fall / and unconstrained make their bodies thrall / Like to a person that into prison deep" connects through simile imprisonment in lust to actual imprisonment and figuratively to the prison of marriage. Paul of Tarsus counseled Christians that it is better to marry than to burn with lust. The Fyftene Joyes of Maryage emphatically rejects Paul's counsel. It figures imprisonment in marriage to be worse than imprisonment in lust. [4]

The Fyftene Joyes of Maryage contrasts the lover's foolishness with the jailor's diligence. Within their personal lives, men enter into marriage without careful examination of the circumstances. Men are not, however, essentially fools. Men at work thoroughly consider risks, seek to mitigate them, and diligently work to advance their employers' objectives. Men make good jailors. Men predominate today among guards working in prisons that highly disproportionately imprison men. Men should guard more diligently their personal lives.

Notes:

[1] For women and persons entering homosexual marriages, the acute anti-men bias of family law doesn't directly cause harm. But unjust justice is generally dangerous. Family law applied to people who have entered homosexual marriages isn't likely to be fair and rational. Women dedicated to demanding careers and high earnings, and who allow their husbands the economic freedom that similarly motivated men have often allowed their wives, face to a lesser degree the risks and injustices that such men face.

Men and women have significantly different positions with respect to legal regulation of reproduction. Women have reproductive rights. Men have no reproductive rights whatsoever. Married men thus face paternity risk that married women don't.

[2] Scholars have attributed the anonymous Les Quinze Joyes de mariage to Antoine de La Sale, born perhaps in 1388. The anonymous English translation The Fyftene Joyes of Maryage has been attributed to Robert Copland, who flourished from 1508 to 1547.

[3] The fyftene joyes of maryage, "prohemye of the auctour," ll. 101-35, available from the Early English Books, Text Creation Partnership. The "Prologue" and "Prohemye" of The fyftene joyes of maryage are also printed in Coldiron (2009), Appendix 2.

Wynkyn de Worde printed the first edition of The fyftene joyes of maryage in 1509. He also printed The Payne and Sorrowe of Euyll maryage (ca. 1530), an English translation of De Coniuge non ducenda (Don't Be Drawn into Marriage). That English translation is commonly attributed to John Lydgate, but without good reason. Boffey (1999) p. 237. Wynkyn de Worde seems to have appreciated literature of men's sexed protest. He also printed Complaynte of them that been to late maryed and Complaynt of them that be to soone maryed. Id. p. 244. For discussion of these marriage complaints from a gynocentric perspective, Coldiron (2009) Ch. 5. Id., Appendix 3, provides the texts. For related medieval English poems, see Against Hasty Marriage (I) and Against Hasty Marriage (II) in Salisbury (2002).

[4] For Paul's counsel on marriage, 1 Corinthians 7:8-9. The allusion to the Pauline counsel on marriage was added to the English translation of Les Quinze Joyes de mariage. Coldiron (2009), p. 129, suggests that these verses support the Pauline counsel. That seems to me to be a misreading. Today, a further challenge to the Pauline counsel is sexless marriages.

[image] Caged dog. Public Domain image by amayaeguizabal on pixabay.

References:

Boffey, Julia. 1999. "Wynkyn de Worde and Misogyny in Print." Pp. 236-51 in Blake, N. F., and Geoffrey Lester. 1999. Chaucer in perspective Middle English essays in honour of Norman Blake. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Coldiron, Anne E. B. 2009. English printing, verse translation, and the battle of the sexes, 1476-1557. Farnham, England: Ashgate.

Salisbury, Eve. 2002. The trials and joys of marriage. Kalamazoo, Mich: Published for TEAMS in association with the University of Rochester by Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

You RAGE you LOSE: Migrant RAPE

AVfM Video Source · 17 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Cologne, another view.

"Feminists only care about rape when white men are doing it. Their lack of reaction to this migrant rape epidemic is evidence of a systematic moral blindness that afflicts social justice warriors: They set the rules, they can break them, and they can ignore them when politically convenient."

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ocOrptMBYvo

If you like this commentator his YT channel can be found here.

Disclaimer: The views and opinions expressed in this video are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the official policy or position of AVFM or its staff.

How to get laid

AVfM Video Source · 18 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

How to get laid Part II

Paul Elam · 18 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The second International Conference on Men's Issues is ON!

Mike Buchanan · 18 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I bring some great news. We've booked an outstanding venue for the second International Conference on Men's Issues, London, for the dates we originally planned, 8-10 July. We need to sort out some minor administrative details, and our current estimate is that will take around a week, maybe a little longer. As soon as it's possible, details of the venue (and so much more) will be posted simultaneously on the websites of J4MB and A Voice for Men. Please wait for the formal announcement before ordering tickets, or making commitments to travel and accommodation.

ICMI16 will be a truly international event. The list of countries from which we shall have speakers and/or delegates is growing by the week, and is currently:

- Australia
- Canada
- France
- Germany
- India
- Ireland
- Italy
- Netherlands
- Norway
- Romania
- Spain
- Sweden
- United Kingdom
- United States

One final thing. The conference hall has a maximum capacity of 200 people. We confidently predict that once tickets go on sale to the general public – late January, or early February – fewer than 50 tickets will be available, given the number of pre-registrations.

ICMI16 is going to be a memorable event. We look forward to seeing you there.

Is Kerri Sackville a slut?

Jack Barnes · 18 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Many of you may be familiar with Sackville and her war against men who express non-feminist or anti-feminist opinions. For those of you that aren't up to speed on the antics Sackville and her confederates go here and here.

We will get back to Sackville and her sycophants, and what you and I need to do about them later. But first let's take a closer look at just what kind of person we are dealing with.

A few days ago Kerri had a life altering experience. This experience affected her to the point that she felt the need to tell the whole world by writing an article for a mainstream media publication.

What was this horrific experience? Well…

"TO THE man driving the red Jag in Sydney yesterday, I find you fascinating. I find you fascinating because you stopped your car in the road without indicating or pulling over to the side. And when I tooted my horn briefly, thinking perhaps you were looking at your phone or were unaware of the build-up of traffic behind you, you became enraged. "You fing slut!" you yelled out the window, once I managed to maneuver my car past. I was shocked, of course. "Did you just call me a slut?" I asked. "Yes!" you shouted. "Because you are one!" I was stunned. I sat there, unmoving, as cars waited behind me. You called me a slut? Really? Because I tooted you when you stopped in the middle of the road? It perplexed me. You perplex me."

So, some jerk stops in the middle of the road, Kerri blows her horn then proceeds to go around the asshole. No big deal until he does the worst thing any man can do to a woman like Kerri. He says something she doesn't like. This causes Kerri to do the same thing that the fucktard in the red car did. She stops and blocks traffic. Bet Kerri didn't think about that. But I digress. He called her a slut. He didn't threaten her. He didn't attack her. He called her a name. Oh the horror! She probably needs to do a fundraiser to pay for the medical bills and petition the government for disability payments. I honestly don't know how she can function after experiencing this horror. Yeah. OK. That's a little over the top. But I wouldn't be surprised if she actually did something like that.

As a trucker I literally cannot count how many times I've been given the one finger salute or cursed or called names and even threatened. I usually smile really big and wave. That just pisses them off more which makes me laugh more. They want you to be offended by what they say. Don't give them what they want. It deflates them and sends them on their way. But I'm an adult which is the biggest difference between Kerri and myself.

Let's continue.

"For a start, I don't really understand the term 'slut'. I mean, I know it refers to a woman with numerous sexual partners, but why is this actually an insult? We don't have a name for men with many sexual partners, except perhaps 'stud' or 'Lothario', neither of which you are likely to shout out a car window."

Yes we do Kerri. Men who sleep with many woman are called "players." They are shamed for not "growing up" and choosing one woman to worship and provide for. Most of the people who shame men for being "players" are the same as the people who shame women for being "sluts." That would be women, Kerri. Most men like sluts. Women hate sluts cause sluts lower women sexual marketplace value. How can a woman get a guy to give her everything he has and everything he ever will have for the rest of his life, if the girl next door is giving it away for free? Don't like the fact that most women prostitute themselves? Well Kerri, all I've got to say is look in the mirror. Don't blame men for playing the game that women set up to benefit themselves. Oh and those women who don't prostitutes themselves? Women call them sluts. Don't shoot the messenger, Kerri. Just take a long look in the mirror and at the state of modern women. Then do some reflecting.

Moving on.

"A man might be called an 'ahole' or 'dhead', but a woman is called a slut or a whore. And this reflects a deep, ingrained sexism within our society."

No Kerri. Someone calling you a slut as a slur reflects exactly jack shit about our society. People call other people a lot of things meant to be slurs. I've been called white, straight, cis, Christian, male etc. by your fellow feminist/SJWs as a slur. Does that mean that our society has a "deep, ingrained" prejudice against white, straight, cis, Christian, male persons?

"Can you imagine if I was a man, and had tooted my horn in exactly the same way? If my name was Ken, and not Kerri, and I had a beard and ripped pecs? "You have sex with heaps of women!" you would not have yelled in a million years, or "You're shockingly promiscuous!" you wouldn't have cried. No, you might have given me the finger, or sworn out the window, but you would never have cast aspersions on my sexual proclivities."

Yeah. Somebody would never call a guy a "faggot" or "cocksucker" when they lose their cool in traffic. Sure Kerri, that never happens.

"What makes me angry is that you reduced me to your perception of my sexual worth, something you would never dare to do to a man."

We covered this a moment ago. Men are shamed sexually and have sexual slurs hurled at them. Women are NOT special victims Kerri, despite how much you would like them to be. Oh, and how in the hell do you pretend to know what he would say and do to a man? Seems like your emotional need to be a special victim is warping your perceptions of reality. You honestly think you can predict what a guy you don't know will do? Seriously?

"What makes me angry is that you judge women on our (perceived) promiscuity, and that you use the word 'slut' as if it was the most despicable slur in the world……. Before I sign off, let me ask you one question. Do you have a mother? A sister? A girlfriend? A granny? Because when you reduce one woman to a sexual stereotype, you demean us all. Today you demeaned every woman you love. Think about that next time you get in your car."

Psst. Hey Kerri. Your cray cray is showing. He called YOU a slut, not all women. You are not women. Women are not you. You are an individual Kerri, not a group. Women are a group of individuals. You don't represent women. You don't speak for all or even most women. You sure as hell don't speak for any woman I know. What that guy said to you, HE SAID TO YOU!

Is Kerri Sackville a slut? Maybe. Maybe not. But she is a cunt. She is crazy. She is a misogynist. She is a misandrist. Judging by her behavior of late, the word "cunt" is a good description. Believing that Mr. Jerk calling her a slut is demeaning to all women is about a 9.5 on the "prepare the padded room" scale. She is a misogynist because she projects her own own weakness and fragility onto all women. In her mind all women are as pathetic as she is. Nothing could be further from the truth. She is a a misandrist by holding men in such low regard that she believes that there are some opinions that men shouldn't be allowed to express. Not only because of her article on the guy in the red Jag but because her earlier behavior. That earlier behavior is what we need to take action against. See, she isn't the only feminist that thinks blasting someones picture and personal information all over the internet because he said something that the feminist doesn't like. This is a growing problem. You say "feminists suck" or even "this feminist sucks" and they will post your name, images of your family, your social media account, your place of employment and more all over the internet. They have done this before. Not just to me but to others. On a side note, their "fight against the oppression of women" by calling out everyone that says something that one person doesn't like seems to only be targeted against men. Women who speak out against feminism seem to be ignored by those who want to police online and real world speech. So much for feminist equality.

Now to the point of this article. What should you and I do about this? First, take a look at yourself and your own situation. Can you afford to have these people contact your employer? Can you and your family handle being exposed to everyone of these mentally unstable gender bigots? If the answer is yes then proceed as normal with your FTSU. Scratch that. Dial up your FTSU to the "oh shit" level. It's no secret that we have our hands on the throat of feminism. This isn't the time to ease up. This is the time to squeeze harder.

If the answer to your the above questions is “no,” then take appropriate action to protect yourself. After that, dial your FTSU up until you hear feminism scream then dial it up some more.

OK, now what do we do about Sackville and her fellow feminazis? Yes, I just used that word. I used that word because the tactics Sackville & Co. use are very similar to that of the German SS. You say the wrong thing and they will seriously fuck with your life and the lives of your family and friends. Here is what we do. We make it hurt. If they want to continue to do this then we make them regret it. They need to learn that there are consequences for doing this. They need to learn that we will extract a pound of flesh, figuratively speaking. They need to learn to fear retribution from us. Now to all those who are salivating over the chance to say that Jack Barnes and MHRAs are threatening feminists with violence. Go ahead. I really don’t care what you people say about me and MHRAs. The fact is that MHRAs can do everything I said without using violence. Remember, feminists are bullies. Bullies are cowards. We won’t use violence. We don’t need to use violence. How do we make these feminists think twice before going all Gestapo on any guy who has the balls to call out feminism or individual feminists on their FemKKK behavior? Well I can’t tell you that right now. Let’s just say a plan is in place and being brought into fruition as we speak. Expect it to be revealed before the end of February provided that everything goes according to plan. Let me also say that soon we will have online tools at our disposal to strike fear in the hearts of feminists. Be ready for it.

Finally I have a message to the proponents of the “high ground” and to Sackville and the other leaders of feminism.

To the MHRAs wringing their hand over us stooping to their level, “take the high road” and other nonsense. I’ve been an MHRA for about five years. In all that time I as well as the leaders of the MHRM have known full well that the day would come when feminism would would eventually die. But that before it did feminists would behave like any other animal sensing the end. As feminism dies feminists will become increasingly more vicious. This is just the beginning. This will get far worse before they get better. MHRAs with lives ruined, imprisoned and dead is not outside the realm of possibility. This is not tinfoil hat thinking. This is a prediction based on the death of other regimes throughout history. If you are an MHRA make peace with these possibilities and think about what you are willing to lose for what you believe. Also you should make peace with this basic fact: There is no moral high ground! This isn’t a boxing match with rules. This is a street fight and feminists just pulled out the brass knuckles. If feminists use a low tactic and it works they will continue to use it. If feminists use a low tactic and we push back then they will stop using it. Sure, we all should be aware of public opinion and that we should be seen as better than our opponent. But if we allow feminist to get away with these low blows and not fight back because of some mythical moral high ground, we lose. We will either be afraid to call them out and feminists will walk all over us and society, or they will become afraid of us and we will continue to call them out and expose them. There is no third option. So yeah this fight is about to get dirty. Deal with it.

To the followers of Sackville and other feminist public figures, consider this your first and last warning. For years the battle between the proponents of hate and those who stand against feminism has raged, but raged with rules. Rules like “you don’t screw with peoples lives because they said something you disagree with.” As you continue to lose in desperation you all are breaking these rules one by one. This will not be allowed to continue without consequences. You all get a pass on what you have done so far. But soon you won’t. Remember, someone is always watching.

To Sackville and other public faces of feminism. You don’t get a warning. You all have engaged in this despicable behavior. You will receive consequences. Go ahead and whine and cry about the horrible MRAs threatening you. We don’t care. This isn’t a threat. This is a statement of fact. We will not use violence. But we will make you hesitate to ever do these things again. We will make sure that the negative consequences of screwing with peoples lives for simply saying something you don’t like, far outweigh the positive.

Sackville, as I was writing this I learned that your friend and cohort Clementine Ford has engaged yet another bit of this horrible behavior. Ford eavesdropped on a conversation and heard a word she didn’t like. She went off on the guy. His friend countered. Fine. She should have kept her mentally impaired mouth shut but she is entitled to express her opinions as well as anyone else. Ironic that her opinion is that certain things should not be spoken, but what she did next is the problem. She took a picture of the guy and posted it on her Facebook. She then wrote a lengthy Facebook post outing the guy for saying something she disagreed with. That's where she crossed the line, a line you and your friends have crossed many times before. The post isn't the problem. Posting an image of the guy is the problem. Thankfully the photo of the guy has since been removed. Since the post has been removed is Clementine going to get a pass on what she has done? Nope. Not even in the slightest. You having willingly become the public face of feminism and willing promoted this behavior, and are not going to get a pass either. I noticed that during your twitter campaign to name and shame people who had spoken out against Ford you didn't do much. You just wound up your mindless minions and set them off to do your dirty work while you sat back and watched. This will not shield you. We will not be coming after your followers, at least not to start with. We will call out the person behind their behavior. That would be you Kerri Sackville.

Oh, and one last thing Kerri, Happy New Year.

A Supportive Message to Boogie2988

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This very considered video response goes back a couple of layers. Turd Flinging Monkey is providing support to a man(boogie2988) who is having an emotional moment while telling his story on childhood abuse in response to another You Tuber Matthew Santoro. We start here because it encompasses all that is wrong on this subject and TFM has a talent to bring it all together.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Umy-KIuCYHI

Sage Gerard named new COO for AVfM Education, LLC

Paul Elam · 19 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It is with great pleasure that I get to announce a promotion from within AVFM that will actually constitute part of the new foundation for our future, as well as for the future of the MHRM.

Sage Gerard, founder of Zen Men and the Director of Collegiate Activism for A Voice for men has an incredibly impressive track record of making things happen and doing so against formidable odds.

Despite vicious attacks from the faculty of the Interdisciplinary Studies Department he successfully hosted the Male Students in Peril Conference at Kennesaw State University. He was not deterred by the filing of false police reports, false allegations of representing a threat to female students and multiple attempts to paint him as a misogynist with harmful intent.

Indeed, during this campaign of university sponsored harassment, Sage started programs to feed and clothe the homeless and do outreach to students in trouble.

During AVFM events in the past, Sage was present and working, always willing to help wherever it was needed, and he continues to do so today being appointed as the new Chief Operations Officer for AVfM Education, LLC.

As I explained earlier to management staff, this is not a façade position. Sage now begins the arduous task of revolving through all AVFM departments, including editing, forums, server management, business operations, AVFM Radio, the Neonatal Cutting Project, comment moderation and the final task, managing a group of brilliant, tenacious people who won't be managed by anyone they don't respect and trust.

We are putting Sage through this gauntlet because he is not just taking a position with letters after his name on a letterhead. He is going to learn how to manage and grow AVFM because he is an integral part of the future of this website and of the modern men's movement.

I have asked all AVFM staff as I ask you now, our faithful readers and supporters, to help Sage move through this tough process knowing he is supported.

It is time for us to bring more youth into the leadership of this operation. The process of accomplishing that will be slow and difficult but we know that Sage is up to the job.

I am looking forward to the day when Sage's vision becomes the driving force of AVFM. Just as I expect his freshness and intelligent youth will help us reach into a younger, more robust audience. It is time for the young men we serve to start manning the helm.

We are quite some time from that happening but the process officially begins today.

Please join me in welcoming in Sage Gerard, COO of AVfM Education, LLC — one of the future leaders of this movement.

As a part of this announcement I need to point out that a new director of Zen Men will be needed. Sage can't long take on the new responsibilities here and do justice to that position. So, any of you college students who want to roll up your sleeves and carry on Sage's fine work there, please let us know.

It is a good day to be an MHRA. Personally, I think we are lucky to have Sage step up to the plate for this role.

Dr. Hafiz U. Rehman of Good Sam, W. Islip, NY hospital that was target of lawsuit placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 20 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Hafiz U. Rehman has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Rehman's profile at healthgrades.com:

"Dr. Hafiz Rehman is a pediatrician in Bay Shore, New York and is affiliated with multiple hospitals in the area, including Good Samaritan Regional Medical Center and Southside Hospital. He received his medical degree from King Edward Medical University and has been in practice for 43 years. Dr. Rehman accepts several types of health insurance, listed below. He is one of 86 doctors at Good Samaritan Regional Medical Center and one of 48 at Southside Hospital who specialize in Pediatrics. He also speaks multiple languages, including Urdu, Bengali, Hindi, Swahili and Punjabi.

Procedures Dr. Rehman Performs Allergy Shots
Allergy Testing
Allergy Treatment
Audiometry
Circumcision, Infant
Eye Examination
Immunization
Infant Care
Neonatal Care
Newborn Care
Physical Examination Vaccination
Well Baby Care"

Here is an 'infant circumciser' that practices at Good Samaritan, a hospital that was the target of a lawsuit and also the place where the author was circumcised.

From Good Samaritan Hospital's website goodsamaritan.chsli.org:

> Mission
>
> Catholic Health Services of Long Island (CHS), as a ministry of the Catholic Church, continues Christ's healing mission, promotes excellence in care and commits itself to those in need.
>
> CHS affirms the sanctity of life, advocates for the poor and underserved, and serves the common good. It conducts its health care practice, business, education and innovation with justice, integrity and respect for the dignity of each person.

If it truly conducted its health care practice "with justice, integrity and respect for the dignity of each person" it would not mutilate infants' genitals without their consent.

> About Good Samaritan Hospital Medical Center
>
> Good Samaritan Hospital Medical Center, a member of Catholic Health Services of Long Island, is a 537-bed (including 100 nursing home beds), not-for-profit hospital serving the communities on the south shore of Long Island in West Islip, New York. Good Samaritan's high-quality medical services extend across the continuum of care to all disciplines, both for inpatients and outpatients.
>
> Additionally, services for women are available in obstetrics, gynecology and maternal/child care as well as diagnostic imaging for cancer screening and treatment. Pediatric patients are treated in the Pediatric Emergency Department and, if necessary, admitted to the Pediatric Unit or the Pediatric Intensive Care Unit. Pediatric sub-specialists are available around the clock to support these medical services.

Good Samaritan Hospital* is infamous in intactivist circles as one of the earliest targets of a lawsuit when William Stowell sued based on a lack of meaningful consent from Stowell's mother. I also have skin in this game, as there is where I was also mutilated as a baby.

See this video of Stowell on ABC's GMA who "Sues after Forced Circumcision:" https://goo.gl/dZBwCf

We learn the doctor's name, Frank P. Cariello (no longer practicing), from this article excerpted here:

> David Llewellyn became involved in "penile law" when he brought a lawsuit for wrongful circumcision.
>
> William Stowell lay flat on his back, naked from the waist down. He had been strapped to a board, his arms and legs stretched apart. A man hovered over the infant, took hold of Stowell's penis, lifted part of its glans and sliced the piece off. Stowell must have been in excruciating pain; he'd been given no anesthetic. His heart rate surged and his cortisol level rose to such a degree it equaled that of someone being tortured.
>
> Now, 19 years later, Stowell wants the man who did this to pay.
>
> Is this a scene from an NC-17 horror flick? Would you be surprised to find out that procedures like this occur regularly in countless hospitals and homes throughout the United States? They're called circumcisions.
>
> "Oh," you might be saying now. "Then what's the big deal?" Well, to a growing number of men (and women) it is a big deal. It certainly is to Stowell, who, upon turning 18 in December of last year, filed a lawsuit in New York for damages in excess of $75,000 against Frank P. Cariello, the obstetrician who circumcised him, and against Good Samaritan Hospital in West Islip, New York, where the procedure took place. Stowell is not suing for medical malpractice. No one claims that the physician negligently performed the circumcision. The suit is for battery, defined as an "offensive touching" under the law, for performing the procedure that was not medically necessary, and for fraud, claiming that the surgery was done without proper consent. Stowell's mother signed the consent form, but, she says she did so while under the influence of Demerol and other drugs administered to help ease her pain after delivering her son by Caesarian section.

From another story at MensNewsDaily:

> Doctor and Hospital Settle Circumcision Lawsuit
>
> Stage Set for Men to Sue for Being Circumcised as Infants
>
> SUFFOLK COUNTY, New York – After a two-and-a-half year legal battle with Plaintiff William G. Stowell, the doctor and hospital have settled the landmark circumcision case brought against them. The terms of the settlements have not been publicly disclosed. Twenty-one-year old Stowell filed suit December 19, 2000, in the U. S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, against the hospital where he was circumcised and the physician who circumcised him as a newborn.

> Stowell, born on December 22, 1981, in West Islip, NY, was circumcised the following day by his mother's obstetrician. This case presented the issue of the legal validity of consent for circumcision obtained by a nurse from a mother who was debilitated by the effects of a Caesarian section and painkillers. It also questioned whether a physician could legally and ethically remove healthy, normal tissue from a non-consenting minor for non-therapeutic reasons.
>
> David J. Llewellyn, one of Plaintiff Stowell's attorneys, said, "William and I are very happy that we were able to resolve this case with both the hospital and the doctor. While a settlement is never an admission of liability, I believe it shows that our allegations were taken seriously. Never again can someone say that a young man who is dissatisfied with his circumcision as an infant is being frivolous when he objects to his mutilation and brings suit to obtain justice. This case should send a message to doctors that they run the risk of a lawsuit each time they circumcise an infant for non-therapeutic reasons, particularly when they rely on the hospital to obtain consent the day after birth. Social or cosmetic concerns provide no justification for harmful surgery. I would expect that this is just the first of many cases that will be brought by angry circumcised young men against their circumcisers."
>
> The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) first acknowledged that there was no medical justification for routine circumcision in 1971. In 1999, the AAP reaffirmed that it does not recommend routine circumcision. The American Medical Association concurred in 2000, calling routine circumcision "non-therapeutic." No national or international medical organization recommends routine circumcision.

Since the hospital and Dr. Rehman provide no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

ALERT – MGM 101 Video – "Circumcision – Your Legal Rights" a must see that features David J. Llewellyn, the attorney named above.

Dr. Hafiz U. Rehman's practice information follows:

Office Location & Contact
375 E Main St
Suite 7
Bay Shore, NY 11706

Phone: (631) 666-6780
Fax: (631) 666-4663

Good Samaritan Hospital Medical Center
1000 Montauk Hwy, West Islip, NY 11795

 Verified lawsuit settlement

> Dr. Hafiz Rehman of Bay Shore, NY placed on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/zdGdZRlGNX #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/9MXmn8rCjq
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 20, 2016

Ode to an unsung hero

Mark Dent · 20 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Kheel Center on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

For as long as I can remember, feminists have portrayed the working life of men as a privilege. Work was a gift to be sought after. Men escaped the drudgery that confronted the housebound wife. Work was freedom.

Some of what feminists said about work was true. Some, perhaps many men, preferred to march off to their job each day rather than stay at home. It would certainly, in some instances, have been more stimulating and engaging than changing dirty nappies (diapers). Of course the unrivaled joy of bonding with your flesh and blood, watching first steps and hearing first words is never mentioned by feminists. I remember my mum playing her weekly games of badminton and going to other classes with her best friends, our neighbors, while their hubbies worked. Mum worked hard at home, but she also socialized, laughed, drank tea and ate cake in the company of people she called friends, hardly hell on earth.

Would some women have longed for something more in their lives? Yes, of course. So what?

How many men who were breaking their backs digging ditches at 7:00am on a frosty morning and longed for something more?

Some men would have felt enormous pride and satisfaction at the end of their work day, having accomplished tasks that were challenging. They built and created with their hands and their work gave them a sense of purpose and identity. But many would have felt nothing but loathing for the physical grind or monotony of their jobs which they confronted year after year with retirement a distant light at the end of a long, dark tunnel.

The first question a man is asked when introduced to a stranger is “What do you do for a living?”

Decades ago, if any man responded with “nothing” or “I stay at home and look after the kids,” his social standing would be at ground zero.

Feminists would quickly point out the fact that today it is more acceptable for a man (though still rare) to be a house husband and claim credit for changing this public perception.

Of course, the only way any man can be a househusband is if his wife chooses to allow him that role. She will also decide the length of time the man stays in that role. In reality, men’s choices when it comes to their working life are as limited as they have always been.

This is the crux of the matter; choice. But it isn’t just the lack of choice young men have as their lives stretch out before them which is the raw wound. For me, it is the total absence of any kind of recognition, validation or acknowledgement of this fact. The subsequent silent sacrifice most men make from the commencement of their working life till the day they retire is never publicly acknowledged.

Men, as they always have, are still digging ditches, laying tiles, working the late shift and missing magical moments with their family.

Women are lauded regardless of what they do. Most women have choices men can only dream about. Despite the occasional catty comments a working woman may make about a stay at home mum, the overwhelming consensus in the opinion of those who matter; our mass media and government, is that simply being a mum is a vitally important job, the most important job you can do.

We call women super mums. We praise their multi tasking skills, their nurturing “instincts.” We are told repeatedly that there is no love to match a mother’s love. Motherhood is continually referred to as the “toughest job in the world” by the likes of Oprah and others in positions of influence.

The comedian Bill Burr had some insightful things to say about women's remarkable capacity for self congratulation.

The irony of those Oprah shows was never lost on me. Her audience was packed with glamorous looking women, done up to the nines, out for a day on the town and a seat in the Oprah audience while simultaneously whining and moaning about how hard their lives were. Where were their husbands and partners? They were at work, experiencing that joy and freedom so obviously lacking in the lives of their wives.

Show me any equivalent statements about men and the role they play in providing for their wife and family. When did you last read an editorial or article in mainstream newspaper recognizing the commitment and work ethic of so many men who often grind away in jobs they detest for the simple but powerful fact that they love their family.

No, even this loving sacrifice is presented as some kind of privilege.

Like so many aspects of the male experience, it is invisible and entirely taken for granted.

The total invisibility of this sacrifice has been repeatedly thrust in my face during the decades I have been a teacher.

I am close to many of the women I work with and over the years many of them have confided in me. I recall one woman speaking to me by the photocopier. She had recently divorced her husband and she was distraught.

"I never envisaged working full time for the next 20 years," she said with genuine shock and self pity. I loved this woman and one part of me was empathetic and yet another stronger voice was screaming "But you were quite happy to have your husband do just that so you could pursue your passions and explore new horizons!"

Would she ever have even considered asking him what his dreams for the future were?

I never raised this point and never have on the many occasions women have cried on my shoulder. It wasn't appropriate given their emotional state and the fact that they were talking to me as a friend not the local MRA representative. But I've often wondered about the possible responses these women could have given if I had. Here they were, tormented by the terrible sense of being trapped, chained and bound to a job they found exhausting and overwhelming, yet they lacked the ability to step back and look at their male colleagues or partners and wonder how they might feel.

How many young women throughout my teaching career have announced they are resigning or going part time because they are stressed or not coping? The response is always the same: "You go girl!" "Follow your dreams!" "I hope you find what you are looking for!"

I quietly wonder at their sense of entitlement and the unspoken assumption that hubby will pick up the slack so she can pursue something more to her taste.

I have had female colleagues tell me about the depression their husbands were experiencing due to work pressure and dissatisfaction. They have talked about their husband's disillusionment. Many of these women were working one or two days a week and I wanted to ask if they would be willing to pick up some extra work to help their husbands though their difficult time, even if only temporarily. One or two must have read my mind or expression because they openly and unashamedly said: "There's no way I'm going full time!"

Others proudly boasted that what they earned was theirs and what hubby earned belonged to both of them. Laughter always seemed to ensue.

The other aspect to the constant harping about the hardships faced by stay at home mums which always riles me is the fact that children grow and they start attending school for a large portion of the day. So there is a period of intense exhaustion and child/baby care, and after four or five years they attend kindergarten and school. Mum has time on her hands. I see these mums in the cafes and nail salons that abound in Melbourne's shopping centers. These places are overwhelmingly occupied by women (of all ages). Where are the men? They are at work. The intensity of motherhood eases dramatically in a few short years. Backbreaking work does not become any easier as the years pass, in fact it gets harder.

I was struck down by a serious illness a couple of decades ago. I had a leg amputated and while I was recovering the phone would ring. My friends would ask:

“What are you doing?” and I would spiral into a garbled, panicky self justification of my existence.

“When are you going back to work?” sent spasms of guilt coursing through me. Are they accusing me of being a slacker?

Of course they weren’t, but the man within me felt enormous guilt over the fact that his wife (my precious Maggie) was working fulltime to provide for her family. Would a woman recovering from illness feel that same unspoken pressure? I doubt it.

Maggie. Not once in our lives together has she ever suggested or even inferred that I should do anything because I am a man. When I was incapable of working, she happily took over and did it all with the grace and loving goodwill only the purest of beings possess. She still insists on taking out the heavy wheelie bins each week and collecting them the following day. On the rare occasions I remember it’s bin night and make a move to put them out she says, “Don’t be silly, it’s much easier for me!”

She has worked for most of our time together, despite a number of debilitating health issues and her own encounter with cancer. I am saddened when I read of the terrible experiences so many of the men associated with the AVFM family have endured in their relationships.

I understand how blessed I am. I see how wonderful all of our lives would be if within each relationship we cared for and supported each other as two friends do. When one is down, the other steps in to ease their burden, be it physical or emotional. To be gender blind and simply see the humanity in our partner is not too great a task for those who claim to love each other…is it? Sadly, for many men this seems to be a Pollyanna Pipe dream.

So today, much has changed for those women who may wish to be more than a ‘stay at home’ mum. Those who desire nothing more than to nurture their children and tend to home may do it if their financial well being allows. Some perhaps like to get out of the house but the idea of a full time job with all of its obligations and demands understandably horrifies them, so part time work appeals. Many women are doing just that and achieving a lovely balance in their lives. In my profession, if they choose to have a baby their job is waiting for them to come back to a few years down the track. Others may choose to pursue a full time career and they too can do so.

For men, nothing has changed. As Warren Farrell put it, men have three choices; they can work, work or work. Privileged indeed.

Twenty years ago, my passion about the invisibility of male love and sacrifice was burning as brightly then as it does now. This is one of many poems I wrote on the subject.

*****

The Train of Broken Dreams

As evening looms
At a long days end
Sitting in a slightly dazed stupor
Gazing out of dusty windows
Or reading the news of the day
Are the grey, faceless men
You pass by
And forget a moment later

Stop
Look more closely

There across the aisle,

Paper lying limply across his lap
He was once a small boy
With fire in his eyes
And a mop of wild blonde hair
No brush or comb could tame

He attacked each new day
With the frightening
Exhilarating energy
Only the soul of a boy could possess

Climbed trees and wrestled his dog Climbed Everest and Hunted werewolves in the moonlight

As he grew, he dreamed
He would see the world
Find his true love
Leave his mark upon this earth
How?
Did it matter?
He would find a way

Time was his dearest friend

Somehow time betrayed the boy
The world demanded more from him
Than his dreams

He took a job
As all men must
A temporary stopover
On the way to his destiny

That was long ago
Now the day's end
Is what he longs for A good dinner
Television to numb the mind
Better not to think…or remember

Most heroes are rewarded
Acknowledged and lauded-
Not this quiet soldier
He will live and die
Almost anonymously

He will be on the train
Again tomorrow morning
He is the most courageous of people

See him

The Culture of MGM is Changing

AVfM Video Source · 21 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Independent filmmaker Eliyahu Ungar-Sargon discusses the experiences that informed his film, Cut: Slicing Through the Myths of Circumcision.

See the film's website:

http://www.cutthefilm.com/

Patriarchy Tales: What makes a purple heart beat?

AVfM Video Source · 21 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Resolution Productions on Wikimedia Commons , used under license (Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 4.0 International (CC BY-SA 4.0).

Stacy King has been running an unusual experiment: since people frequently refuse to listen or take it seriously when men tell their own tales, what if a woman reads their words for them?

You may want to subscribe to not just Stacy's YouTube channel, but Terrence Popp's as well.

Jay's story

Mike Buchanan · 21 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In the UK, as in many other developed countries, the state's neglect of men's health is a long-running scandal. As many men die of prostate cancer as women die of breast cancer in the UK, yet there is no national screening program for any male-specific cancers. £250 million p.a. is spent by the National Health Service on national screening programs for breast and cervical cancers.

Today I received an email from a young man, 'Jay,' not his real name, concerning his suffering with chronic prostatitis. The Wikipedia entry on the problem is here. Jay kindly agreed to us publishing his story, and it takes up the remainder of this piece.

*****

"I have a male specific illness called chronic prostatitis, often referred to as chronic pelvic pain syndrome (CPPS). The symptoms of this disease are embarrassing and can be debilitating, they can stop a young man from being able to have relations with his partner, stop him being able to run, lift weights and affect his ability to work because of the pain the condition causes.

When I initially came down with this illness (after an acute urinary tract infection which seemingly ascended to my prostate) I was neglected by doctors and told that I had nothing wrong with me, I was refused a referral to a specialist. I was told by a female doctor that the horrible pain I was feeling was 'normal,' she shouted at me and turned me away without help for the pain. When I eventually saw a specialist, he insisted nothing was wrong with me and told me that it would go away when I got a girlfriend (implying the symptoms were psychosomatic and a result of my anxieties about relationships). At this point (at the age of 21) I had been suffering for months with horrible pain and required diagnostic tests which I was refused. I was eventually offered them when I returned, by which point I had been suffering for several months. Letters from these urologists to my GP always indicated I was anxious and that my anxiety was causing my illness, not that the illness was causing my anxiety.

Because of the pain I couldn't attend my university classes and was thrown out of university. This of course, devastated me. When I attempted to get medical evidence from my doctor he refused to give it to me because I hadn't yet been diagnosed with an illness. I told him that the pain had caused me to become very depressed but he refused to recognize I'd been suffering with depression, saying I didn't 'look depressed.' When I took my mother with me for back up, she told him how I'd been suicidal, to which he callously replied 'well would you blame me if he committed suicide?' As if he just didn't care. It took me nearly a full year to get a diagnosis and get back into university with medical evidence. I've now had this disease for four years and have seen other specialists, most of which have treated me like a pest, a hypochondriac and a waste of medical funds.

The disease is confusing for many doctors and is often referred to as a 'wastebasket of clinical ignorance.' The go-to drug for this disease is a dangerous antibiotic called ciprofloxacin which is now being flagged by the FDA in America for causing disability. When I refused to take this drug as a prophylactic it was taken as further evidence of my anxieties and status as a 'hypochondriac.' The disease lacks funding and research, many men have it all their lives. It ruins young and old men's lives alike; physically I'm a shadow of my former self because of it. When I asked my urologist why the disease is so neglected he said it didn't have enough funding for research, when I asked him if he'd help me talk to my local MP about getting more funding to deal with the illness, he stared at me blankly. Many urologists don't take the disease seriously because they deal mainly with prostate cancer, but moderate prostatitis will seriously affect a young man's ability to live his life and makes many men suicidal. It seems many doctors assume that your sexual health is some kind of privilege. Ironically these doctors seem to work in sexual health clinics and urologists' offices, part of the very system supposedly set up to ensure that you will at least get treatment for problems with your sexual health. People need to know that they may be unfortunate enough have their sexual health destroyed by a simple urinary tract infection and when that does happen there's a good chance the medical establishment won't give you much help, possibly even none at a time when you need it most. At the very least it is in the interest of governments globally to address this illness because of the drain it has on health systems and a man's ability to work, but morally there should be more of an impetus to help sufferers instead of neglecting them. I've spoken to many prostatitis sufferers across the globe (mainly the UK, US and Canada) and nearly all have been neglected to some degree by the medical system, nearly all of them have been drastically let down.

This disease seems to mostly affect younger men (generally because of our naivety in regards to safe sex, although you can get prostatitis from any kind of urinary tract infection, even from regularly riding a bike, or for no apparent reason at all) and yet physicians don't seem to believe that a young man in front of them could possibly have problems with his prostate. There's real double think going on with this illness and going to the medical system for help with this has been like stepping into the twilight zone. Prostatitis sufferers are met with this kind of uniform neglect globally and very little is being done to solve it. Treatments have barely evolved over the past half a century. There is a special type of physiotherapy for CPPS but I know of few people who've had access to this treatment through their healthcare systems. Because of this many sufferers are forced to learn physiotherapy techniques and practice them on themselves, a few have had full or partial recoveries because of this, but it is unacceptable that a disease should be so neglected that sufferers are treating themselves when specialists should be doing so.

I think as an anti-feminist this story has some implications for the feminist narrative, feminists insist that men don't reach out enough and ask for help. During my time with this disease I've been flatly refused help on many occasions (especially in the first year of suffering when I needed help most), even when I told my GP I'd been suicidal he wouldn't give me a diagnosis of depression, but when you have chronic pain in your genitals, quite naturally it tends to spark a deep depression. I am also a compassionate man and as an Egalitarian. I'm all for dealing with genuine issues women face (genuine being the key word there) as well as men's issues, but it's easy to see why a man in my position would be totally appalled by the 'ironic' male tears fad that's become so popular among feminists, a group of people who claim to fight for equality and justice. I've debated with many feminists and I've often been told that as a 'disadvantaged group,' resources should be devoted mainly (sometimes even only) to women's issues. So at a time when women's reproductive health is such a hot topic among feminists, men like me should sit back, fight for women or else shut up? This disease is ruining too many men's lives for me to be a whipping boy for a movement that cares so little about my wellbeing. This disease has ruined what should be the best years of my life and I'm not willing to pretend that men's issues aren't important when other men's lives are being ruined too.

Luckily I've found a fairly caring (and highly qualified) specialist who is willing to help me, but I had to go private to see him. This individual writes papers on the disease and other urological illnesses. When I saw him he told me how I hadn't had one of the most basic tests to determine the cause of the disease and that I shouldn't have been discharged and told to just live with the pain. I'm a student and I had to pay over £200 out of my own pocket to see this man, luckily he referred me to see him on the NHS, but it's a 6 month wait to have the procedure/tests I need. Again this is unacceptable that I have to pay out of my own pocket to get basic healthcare in a country where basic healthcare is free.

Any man can come down with this disease, you just have to be unlucky enough – it's in every man's interests to deal with prostatitis. The disease needs research and attention, sufferers deserve help."

Female White Knights – The Fiamengo File Episode 21

Janice Fiamengo · 22 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In this first episode of Season 2, Professor Fiamengo discusses the significance, and the importance, of the Female White Knight.

Coverture, domestic violence & criminalization of men

Douglas Galbi · 23 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In a poem that a judge living in Georgia wrote in 1837, a judge heard a criminal domestic violence case. Henry Day, "a mild-looking man with a youthful face," was accused of having beaten his large strong wife, Julia Sweet. Day pleaded to the court:

> I don't deny I beat my wife;
> And for that part where you aver
> That Satan did my spirit stir —
> 'Tis true; for I was moved by her.
> The dying sinner's wildest groans
> Are music to her gentlest tones;
> And for her blows! alas, my bones!
> Well, let it pass; perhaps 't was wrong;
> But I had borne her curses long,
> And I am weak, and she is strong;
> Let that, too, pass. I've done my best;
> My counsel there must say the rest. [1]

Day's counsel might have invoked for him a claim to self-defense or a claim to be a battered spouse. Such legal strategies in actual domestic violence cases work almost exclusively for women defendants. With sound legal judgment of likely outcomes, Day's counsel turned instead to a ludicrous defense based on the common-law concept of coverture.

Coverture was the idea that husband and wife are one under law. More specifically, coverture assigned to the husband responsibility and punishment under law for his wife's criminal acts. Coverture also protected women from mass imprisonment for debt in early modern England. In this case, Day's counsel claimed that, according to coverture, a husband had an equal right to beat his wife as he did to beat himself. The prosecutor countered that if a husband killed his wife, he would be charged with murder, not suicide. The presiding judge summarized the law of coverture to the sitting jury.

> If any ill the wife hath done,
> The man is fined; for they are one:
> If any crime the man doth do,
> Still he is fined; for they are two.
> The rule is hard, it is confessed:
> It can't be helped, lex ita est. [2]

Coverture was among a range of institutions and ideas that generated highly disproportionate imprisonment of men. Legal history conventionally interprets coverture as a legal concept oppressing women. [3] Coverture oppressed women in the same way that men-only Selective Service registration oppresses women today.

Coverture has been badly misunderstood in legal history. Coverture assigned to husbands responsibility for their wives' criminal acts and their wives' debts. Coverture increased the criminalization of men. Coverture didn't give husbands the legal right to beat their wives. Men have long been punished for committing domestic violence, as well as punished for having domestic violence committed against them. Legal historians have stressed wife-beating and largely ignored husbands getting attacked by their wives. [4] Law and policy similarly treats domestic violence with anti-men bias today. Anti-men bias in invoking coverture is a general rhetorical pattern built upon deep structures of gynocentrism.

* * * * *

Read more:

- domestic violence in medieval fabliau and farce
- criminalizing seduction: the crime of men seducing women
- gender discrimination in child custody prevalent historically

Notes:

[1] Robert M. Charlton, "The State vs. Henry Day," in Charlton & Charlton (1839) pp. 92-104. The quotes above are from id. pp. 96, 97. In 1834, Charlton became Judge of the Supreme Court of the Eastern District of Georgia. From 1853-53, he served as a U.S. Senator for Georgia. See Robert Milledge Charlton biography. The poem is dated 1837. Charlton & Charlton (1839) p. 99. A long, final footnote added:

> Note to the Note.
>
> As the prose note to this poetical report has gone the rounds of the papers, headed "The way they do things in Georgia," perhaps it would be as well for the author to acknowledge that it is a highly exaggerated statement of the existing state of affairs in Georgia, and ought not to be received as evidence against the firmness and wisdom of the bench and bar of this State. The author was a member of the judiciary of Georgia at the time "the State vs. Henry Day" was composed, and therefore very little inclined to attack that branch of the government.

Id. pp. 103-4. "The State vs. Henry Day" appeared with the author's initials "R.M.C." in The American Jurist, vol. 20 (Oct. 1838) pp. 237-43. The poem there is dated May, 1837. Id. p. 237.

[2] Lex ita est is Latin for "thus is the law." After citing the verses in which the judge declared men's double criminal responsibility, Hartog (2000) p. 104 observed:

> The poem was a plausible fiction, coherent with the contemporary law.

As if unequal justice under law for men doesn't matter, Hartog moved from the poetic declaration of men's double criminal responsibility to the conventional one-sided, false understanding of the incidence of domestic violence. Coverture was a legal fiction rarely determinative of legal results. Id. p. 106. The legal fiction of coverture, however, supported general gynocentric bias towarddisproportionate punishment of men.

[3] Wikipedia, which has struggled with the problem of feminist bias, features considerable anti-men bias in its entry on coverture.

[4] E.g. Hartog (2000) pp. 104-110, with includes poorly informed discussion of the "rule of thumb." The myth that a husband could legally beat his wife with a stick no thicker than his thumb (the mythic "rule of thumb") is prevalent in scholarly family history. For a thorough review of formal law, Kelly (1994). Commenting on a court's declaration that it wouldn't interfere in minor incidents of violence at home or in the schoolyard, Kelly mythologizes law in action and endorses conventional gender stereotyping of domestic violence:

> the court would have made the same judgment {not all minor violence belongs in criminal court} if the wife had done the beating. One cannot conclude, therefore, that husbands were allowed a special latitude in chastising their wives, except, of course, in the sense that husbands were much more prone to such misconduct than wives and would more readily benefit from the court's conclusion.

Id. p. 346, n. 25. Especially if domestic violence is defined to encompass minor violence, e.g. slapping, women almost surely would be found to be more prone to domestic violence than are men. Almost all minor violence isn't in fact taken into criminal court and could not feasibly be policed in a non-totalitarian state. Charlton & Charlton (1839), p. 104, writing from judicial experience, frankly points to the legal difficulty of fairly judging domestic violence. Judges today would hardly dare to make that common-sense observation. More generally, Kelly (1994) falls to recognize the gynocentric structures supporting the "rule of thumb" myth and their implications for the criminalization of men.

[image] Princess. Thanks to Clipartcottage for making the image available under a Creative Commons Attribution license.

References:

Charlton, Robert M., and Thomas Jackson Charlton. 1839. Poems. Boston: C.C. Little and J. Brown. (2nd ed., 1842)

Hartog, Hendrik. 2000. Man and wife in America: a history. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Kelly, Henry Ansgar. 1994. "'Rule of Thumb' and the Folklaw of the Husband's Stick." Journal of Legal Education. 44 (3): 341-65.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

An anonymous response to dangerous FOSS Codes of Conduct

No Code of Conduct Club · 24 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original Yesterday, an anonymous web developer posted a single web page on /r/KotakuInAction containing some thoughts on the state of open source software. The post quickly went viral, attracting other developers and geeks that knew something was dreadfully wrong with the way Social Justice Warriors contribute to software projects. We reached out to the author and got permission to reprint the piece in full. Even if you are not a developer you should read this to learn more about the effect SJWs have on hard-working people who mean no harm. –Eds

---

Hello. I'm a professional web developer, but you can't verify that by looking at this page. I'm afraid to post this content under my real name because I'm around people who would try to get me fired from a job I love, or worse. Still, I need to get something off my chest in a space I control.

I've been in web development for nearly seven of the ten years that I've been barking orders at silicon, and the undisciplined chaos in the web development community is enough to make me question my career choice. It's not code that bothers me, its people who confuse innovation with fashion, and opinions with infrastructure.

Religious wars in software used to be about a fat bearded man named He-macs wrestling a pencil-neck named Vimmy over what text editor to use, but now FOSS (Free and Open Source Software) devs are concerned about making sure marginalized human beings feel "welcome," as if someone was trying to physically block newcomers. That opens the door to social justice and other buzzwords that prigs use to feel better about themselves, and utopian visions documented in "Codes of Conduct," or CoC.

The sentiment behind a CoC is that there is no excuse for being an ass, which sounds great until you realize that only a select few people get to decide who's an ass. So when open source leaders want to stop you from doing free work they can pretend that its your fault for violating their code instead of admitting they never really wanted to include just anybody. They've managed to make exclusivity look inclusive, and it makes me crazy that so few people see that.

Let's look first at Geek Feminism's CoC, which acts as a source of inspiration for other CoC's like ToDo Group's Open Code of Conduct. ToDo Group's CoC is in turn used or supported by Twitter, Box, Yahoo, Facebook and GitHub at the time of this writing, so we cannot underestimate the influence the following writing has in disciplinary response teams.

Any boldfaced words or omissions made for brevity using "[…]" are my doing.

> Harassment includes:
>
> - Unwelcome comments regarding a person's lifestyle choices and practices, including those related to food, health, parenting, drugs, and employment. […]
> - Physical contact and simulated physical contact (eg, textual descriptions like "__hug__" or "backrub") without consent or after a request to stop. […]
>
> […]
>
> The Geek Feminism community prioritizes marginalized people's safety over privileged people's comfort. The Geek Feminism Anti-Abuse Team will not act on complaints regarding:
>
> - 'Reverse' -isms, including 'reverse racism,' 'reverse sexism,' and 'cisphobia' (because these things don't exist)
> - Reasonable communication of boundaries, such as "leave me alone," "go away," or "I'm not discussing > this with you."

> - Refusal to explain or debate social justice concepts
> - Communicating in a 'tone' you don't find congenial
> - Criticizing racist, sexist, cissexist, or otherwise oppressive behavior or assumptions

Telling a cokehead female developer "It's important to admit you have a problem. I am here for you! (hugs)" is harassment. Criticizing someone's horrible coding habits to explain why they can't hold down a job is also harassment. You being a victim of racism, sexism or discrimination does not matter if you are seen as privileged, and no one has to explain the social justice concepts used to ignore your voice. That ties quite cleanly into the "I'm not discussing this with you" part of "reasonable boundaries."

Here are my favorite bits:

> [Harassment includes deliberate] "outing" of any aspect of a person's identity without their consent except as necessary to protect other GF members or other vulnerable people from intentional abuse.
>
> […]
>
> This includes harassment outside our spaces and harassment that took place at any point in time.The abuse team reserves the right to exclude people from the GF community based on their past behavior, including behavior outside GF spaces and behavior towards people who are not in the GF community.
>
> […]
>
> At our discretion, we may publicly name a person about whom we've received harassment complaints, or privately warn third parties about them, if we believe that doing so will increase the safety of GF members or the general public.

Geek Feminism bluntly declares that they alone decide what they believe is harassment, that they will not listen to or explain their justification, and that even if you are not in their space they will hunt you down and publish you as a subject of a harassment complaint.

They exempt themselves from their own standards and announce their willingness to proxy dox anyone if persuaded to do so on subjective grounds. There is no privacy for you: If you look privileged and someone makes up a story about you, you might get a concerned email from HR about something making the rounds on Twitter and causing a PR nightmare for your employer. Whether or not you actually did anything wrong won't matter.

Hacker Eric S. Raymond noticed the manipulation at work and indicated that women at tech conferences were targeting male open source leaders with false allegations. Accusations have power, and the 2013 PyCon incident with Adria Richards proved that beyond a shadow of a doubt.

We need to acknowledge the problem. If you are not considered worthy of protection by ideological CoCs, then there are people out there that want you to at the very least lose your job. If they see you demonstrating even the most innocuous affection or humor, they will likely assume malice and retaliate, especially if you are the wrong color or sex. These are the same people who humiliated a scientist for landing on a comet because of a shirt he wore.

Open Source Vigilantism has invaded software, and it has to stop. We need a CoC that does not assume that you can create a space free from assholes because life does not work that way. We don't choose our colleagues, and we can't expect the community to cater to each of our own individual vulnerabilities.

There is something I can say to the political ideologues scaring the shit out of me. They won't read it, and if they do, they won't care. But I'm going to write it here anyway because I already hate myself for not saying it out loud.

I resent that I've actually been scared into hiding who I am just so I can speak my mind. I feel like I am not allowed to enjoy writing code anymore because communities want to tell me everything from how to think about problems to how to address women. I feel used and controlled. I hate it, and I don't understand why you are doing this to me. I know I'm not alone in what I think, but I sure do feel alone because none of my colleagues at my day job are going to risk their careers getting up and challenging you. I don't know who or where they are because they are just as freaked out about speaking up as I am. I want to stand up and say something, and right now this is the only way I know how where I get to keep my job.

Assholes and disagreement are part of life and our community will make no effort to shield you from that experience. It is not your place to say what someone else should think or feel, and in what vicinity. All that you can control is your own response to hostility.

We encourage you to report any ongoing, deliberate attempts by anyone to harm you to the proper authorities, but if the occasional off comment makes you feel "unwelcome" then that is no one's problem but your own. Attempting to hold other people responsible for your feelings, choices and actions may result in a partial or complete loss of credibility in our community.

I don't care if you are a man, woman or something in between that actually exists or was made up on Tumblr.

I don't care if you are white, black, brown, polka dot, or if your daddy was a Sherwin William's palette.

I don't care if you are a chemo patient that faces cancer with bravery, or an Olympian athlete that can hit a dust mite's tit with a javelin at 300 yards.

You just aren't special.

If you act like something other than relevant skill entitles you to anything from us, then please, I beg you, leave me alone.

You are not entitled to a change of perspective in somebody else. Compilers don't care about your mortal squabbles over racism or sexism.

I want diversity, but hope open source communities are NOT inclusive.

Fresh perspectives are the only diversity that matters in software, and that comes from people who practice development. Your crotch and melanin content do absolutely nothing to aid your development knowledge, so don't bring it up. I. Just. Don't. Care. If you try to make me care, then I don't want to deal with you.

It's rude and disrespectful to treat a developer with years of experience as if he or she is equal to a novice who wants attention in a corrupted form of "diversity." If you are not skilled, then you are not equal to the skilled. There's a reason why racers don't cross the finish line at the same time, and why video games have high scores. Some people are just plain better than you, and that's okay. Healthy people see inequality of merit as motivation. Learning from others is infinitely better than getting upset over feeling "unwelcome" or "excluded."

Developers aren't born into knowledge like some spoiled brats are born into wealth. We all started as beginners, and we all have all the access we will ever need to tutorials and tools on cheap laptops that you can find with the help of friends, public libraries, and thrift stores. Computers are dirt cheap compared to just a few decades ago, so unless you are literally incapable of reading this article, you can learn to code.

Cyberbullying? I understand that is difficult because I've had people call me names and give me a really hard time when I got started, but I did okay because I learned what bullies said didn't matter in the end. That is, of course, unless the bullies have the power to get me fired over lies like you do.

You've taken harassment and bullying, which are real problems, and turned them into buzzwords used to shame and hurt people. You call people victims who aren't victims and bury the ones who actually need help right now.

I'm telling you from experience that if you have a functioning brain it's your own damn fault if you don't like where you are. As a developer, you are in one of the most open and accessible industries ever created. I will appreciate you for your passion, your craft and your generous willingness to do something, but I just don't have the energy to care about the dystopian fiction playing in your head.

Privilege has absolutely nothing to do with keeping anyone down in software. Do not tell me that you are facing some sort of obstacle to learning or finding opportunity when you have an Internet connection. If you are in computer science you are lucky enough to have more opportunities than you can even fathom. Instead of counting your blessings and taking on the challenges facing you, you squander your own intellect trying to bully people who disagree with you.

I like sentimental promises of fairness for all as much as anyone else, but I will not pretend to support a fully open and inclusive community. I don't want that. I don't want everyone to be my equal. I want some people to be smarter than me because it tells me what I could be. I want to be around people who like to learn, grow and help others with a healthy sense of personal accountability. When did this become too much to ask?

You do not need a CoC's permission to blaze your own path and meet like-minded people along the way.

If you want to be right and make something of yourself, then do the work.

—A concerned developer

International Conference on Men's Issues

Mike Buchanan · 24 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We are pleased to announce that the second International Conference on Men's Issues – ICMI16 – will be held over 8-10 July, 2016, at ExCeL London, the capital's largest and most prestigious conference and events venue. It's located in the revitalised Docklands area of East London, and has outstanding facilities for speakers and delegates.

We've set up a dedicated website for the conference, here.

Our conference room can accommodate up to 200 people. It has floor-to-ceiling glass panels on the side which overlooks the Royal Victoria Dock, and air conditioning is available, if required. We're sure ICMI16 will be an excellent event which will place men's issues high on the international agenda.

Speakers and/or delegates will be coming from at least 14 countries:

- Australia
- Canada
- France
- Germany
- India
- Ireland
- Italy
- Netherlands
- Norway
- Romania
- Spain
- Sweden
- United Kingdom
- United States

While J4MB is solely responsible for the financial aspects of the conference, it is being run in association with A Voice for Men, and we look forward to welcoming some of their key people, a number of whom are well known to people familiar with their website. All of the 20 speakers – and the Master of Ceremonies – are well-known advocates for men's human rights, and every one of them accepted our invitation without hesitation. Their names, and the provisional titles of their talks, can be found by clicking on the 'Speakers' tab at the top of the new website. The conference will be a rare opportunity for you to listen to, and meet, many of the figures you may until now have only seen online.

People who've pre-registered for the conference have until 12:00 GMT, 7 February, to order their tickets, after which they'll be made available to the general public.

We anticipate that fewer than 50 tickets will remain available to order when they go on sale to the general public. We don't expect tickets to remain available for long, so we strongly urge you to order your ticket as soon as possible, to avoid disappointment. Please click on the tabs at the top of the website to check out ticket booking, accommodation, travel directions, and more.

We are really looking forward to meeting you all at the conference, seeing old friends from across the world, and making new ones.

There is accommodation available near the venue from as little as £20 per night, and a large range of hotels. Click on the website tab for a guide to accommodation.

Why not combine the event with a longer trip to London? Maybe a long weekend if you're travelling locally, or a wonderful holiday in the UK – or possibly beyond – if you're travelling from further afield. Click on the website tab for a visitor's guide to London.

July is the best month of the year for warm, dry weather in the UK, and you can be sure of a warm welcome at the conference. We look forward to meeting you and, together, taking the next decisive step forward for the human rights of men and boys (and the women who love them).

Mike Buchanan

Party Leader

Justice for Men & Boys

(and the women who love them)

Guy runs into Feminist festival in his underwear

AVfM Video Source · 25 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The video is what it says on the box. If you have the balls to do something like this then you have to show them off at some point, right?

You can subscribe to Steven Crowder on YouTube.

When Men Beat Women

Tim Patten · 25 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Woman Hospitalized after Boyfriend Beats Her!

Twelve million Americans between the ages of 18 and 32 are affected by domestic violence every year.

Jack Robinson was from Milwaukee. He was a 21-year old auto mechanic who had spent most of his adult life chasing and idolizing women. He enjoyed playing video games, joking with coworkers and hanging out with friends. One day, he hoped to meet that special someone.

Jack Meets Shelly

Unfortunately, Jack hadn't had much success with women. For reasons he couldn't understand, they usually didn't approach him. Hoping to change this, he had adopted an almost larger-than-life persona that he believed they would find hard to resist–or so he thought.

Jack knew that modern-day mating rituals require stamina and hard work. Before his cotton-candy dreams could come true, his pedigree, zip code and medical history would be scrutinized and compared to those of others. He made sure he was prepared.

Fearful of rejection and unsure about what would work best, Jack convinced himself that he should be seen as a hybrid–a girlish Taylor Lautner and a swaggering Chris Pratt. It was a tall order, but he tempered his anxiety by reminding himself that, should he fail to close the deal or get a phone number, he could salvage his ego with a beer and a visit to the nearest girlie bar.

Jack lived in a mega-universe of horny studs, all competing for the same thing. With average looks and a lack of confidence, he knew he was not exactly Zac Efron, perched atop the dating food chain.

Still, when he met one of the most beautiful women he had ever seen, he decided it was time for a change. He resisted feelings of hopelessness and assumed a casual stance, ignoring his racing heart and the sweat trickling down his sides. Forcing a confident grin, he walked up to her and said, "Hello, my name is Jack."

The woman stared back, but he didn't flinch. He worried that she might see through his cocksure veneer.

She smiled. "My name is Shelly."

"Hi, Shelly. Can I buy you a drink?"

"Why not?"

The tension inside abated. Jack steered her toward the bar and she ordered a cocktail. As they talked, warmth radiated from her. He learned her name was Shelly Peterson, and that she was a patient care assistant at the local hospital.

As minutes turned to hours, he leaned in, absorbing each word and gesture. When her glass was half-empty, he bought another round. His heart felt flush, but he kept the conversation light; he steered clear of controversial subjects and deeply personal questions. Soon, he was hyperaware of his physical self. He planted his feet apart, propped a casual elbow on the bar, and raised an eyebrow.

Shelly's body language said she was open and relaxed. Jack's mind raced and he savored thoughts of what might happen next. Would they have sex? It didn't matter, he decided. They were having a lot of fun. Besides, he already had her number.

Dating

The connection was instant: their two beating hearts sprouted wings with every flattering word, each pleasurable touch. Spirits soared wildly, free of the twisted wreckage of half-forgotten lovers.

Jack had much to learn about his new-found companion. She was an enigma, a cache of unexpected delights. He worked hard to behave just right on every date. He kept the conversation light–no religion, no politics. After sharing their innermost selves, they shared their flesh, wrapped up in each other's pleasure. In the months that followed, they got to know each other well, inside and out.

Eventually, the relationship became serious. One night at the chic Stanford Restaurant, Shelly's eyes met Jack's. "Men have hurt me in the past."

Jack swallowed a mouthful of steak and his eyebrows arched. "Oh?"

"I once caught an ex cheating on me. It made me feel so worthless." Shelly's eyes welled up as her shoulders curved forward.

Jack's protectiveness was instinctive and immediate. "I would never do that to you." He reached across the table, taking her hand.

"He really hurt me. I don't ever want to go through that again." Shelly wiped her eyes with a napkin and tried to smile. Her fingers trembled.

Jack was overwhelmed by the desire to hold her and keep her safe. "I'll see to it that you don't," he said softly, squeezing her hand.

Shelly stared into his face for a few moments. "Are you sure?" Her tone bore more than a hint of accusation.

"You can trust me. I'm not like those other guys."

Her demeanor softened. "Thank you," she said, demurely picking up her fork and returning to her salad.

In that moment, Jack vowed to give her all the comfort and attention she would ever need. The decision made him feel good. It made him feel strong.

The Next Level

Ten months later, Shelly told Jack, "I think I'm falling in love with you."

A buzzing noise slowly spiraled in his head. "Me, too," he proudly declared. He kissed her warmly.

"I think we should take our relationship to the next level," Shelly said.

Jack adored Shelly, so he readily agreed. "Sure! Why not?"

"We should be exclusive."

Jack hesitated. "Exclusive…of course."

"Jack, you could be the one for me. We could have what my parents and grandparents had."

"Thank you." He blushed.

And just like that, the trajectory of his life changed. Jack's every move was now aligned with Shelly and her goals. A fresh and exciting future awaited them.

Monogamy: First Month

They celebrated their one-month anniversary at her favorite restaurant. Halfway through, Shelly asked, "Where do you think is the best place to raise children?"

With his fork frozen halfway between the plate and his mouth, Jack blinked. He had never considered kids and didn't know what to say. Thinking about her question, Jack's eyes mindlessly followed the denim-clad bottom of an attractive woman who walked through the door.

Shelly kicked him under the table. "Why are you looking at her?"

Jack flinched. He lowered his head and his stomach sank. “Don’t you ever look at other guys?” he asked quietly.

“Never!” she said, a wounded look in her eyes.

“No?” Jack didn’t believe her. He felt chastised and small. He never thought that merely looking at someone would cause any harm, especially to Shelly, the love of his life. He wanted to ask her why she felt like this, but he did not want to do so when she seemed so upset. He was on eggshells until they finished.

On the way home, he decided it was probably best to smooth things over rather than risk upsetting her again. He promised he would try not to ogle other women in future.

When they arrived back home, Shelly turned suddenly and asked, “Do you think she’s prettier than me?”

Jack felt like he was being scolded by his mother. His throat constricted and he rubbed the back of his neck. “Of course not.”

Shelly flared her nostrils. “This isn’t the first time I’ve noticed you checking out other women.”

“But sweetheart, that stuff doesn’t mean anything. I’m with you, aren’t I?”

“I’m watching you.” Shelly’s eyes narrowed to menacing slits.

“I’m sorry, baby. I won’t do it again.” He tried to kiss her.

She turned her face and brushed him away. “If you want me to stay with you, you’ll have to treat me right.”

Jack’s heart sank. “Okay,” he mumbled, fumbling with the key.

He opened the front door and skulked into the house. He headed straight for the bathroom, slamming the door shut and flipping the latch. He could hear her whining morosely in the hallway, “You promised you’d never hurt me.”

Monogamy: Fifth Month

As days and weeks passed, Jack floated through a dreamy wonderland of love and intimacy. Every morning, birds chirped and the coffee perked while the couple lay nestled in each other’s arms. Whenever they argued, make-up sex always brought him back into line with her views.

Then one Friday morning, Shelly asked, “Are you going out with the guys tonight?”

Jack was already halfway out the door. He paused midstride. “Of course. Just like every Friday.”

“When are you going to get tired of that?” she asked, suddenly annoyed.

“Umm…never? What do you mean?”

She put her hands on her hips. “I always thought you’d grow out of it.”

“Out of what? Having a blast?” Jack felt a rush of adrenaline course through his veins. “I’m twenty-two. It’s practically my job to have a good time.”

“Are other women there?” Her face looked pinched and strange.

Jack’s heart skipped a beat. “It’s a bar. Of course there are women there.”

Shelly pressed her lips into a line. “You know that makes me uncomfortable. Do you talk to them?” Her eyes were blazing.

Jack suppressed a groan. He shook his head and gulped. “Come on, baby. I don’t go there to meet women. I just like hanging out with the guys.”

She lifted her chin, indignant. “I don’t believe you.”

Jack’s skin began to crawl. He could feel a flush spreading across his face.

“Are you seeing someone else?” she asked, as she jabbed a finger near his face.

“No! Of course not. I love you, Shelly.”

She squared her shoulders and turned to him. They stood toe-to-toe. “Do you hit on other women?”

Jack’s stomach was doing somersaults. The others were all single and spoke openly about women. Sometimes he played along just to get a laugh, but that was all. He felt guilty, but he wasn’t sure why, since he hadn’t done anything wrong.

“Tonight you’re coming straight home after work.” Shelly folded her arms across her chest.

“What? But the guys—we’ve been doing this for years!”

“It’s either them or me,” she said. “The choice is yours.”

Jack felt as if he’d been kicked in the gut. “Leaving?”

“I’m your girlfriend. You should be spending all your time with me.”

Jack stood there. His mouth tasted bitter and his stomach coiled into a knot. He thought about the many wonderful Friday nights he had spent laughing and backslapping with his friends. His eyes lost some of their shine.

“You said you loved me!”

“I do.” Jack pulled himself to his full height. He sincerely wanted to see her happy.

“You do what?”

“I do love you,” he sighed, feeling frustrated.

Shelly shifted her weight and crossed her arms over her breasts. A smug smile played on her lips. “Well, then,” she said, “I’ll see you here right after work.”

Jack’s mind began to sift through a million memories at once. Could he go without her love, their intimacy? After a moment, his mind cleared. Lifting his head, he beamed. “I love you to death,” he said.

“Then from now on, you’ll spend Friday nights with me.”

“Of course, honey.”

Jack had surrendered. Those boys’ nights of drinking, cajoling and child-like foolishness were over. At work, some of his co-workers began to act a little frosty. He told himself it didn’t matter. He wanted to make Shelly happy, whatever the cost.

Monogamy: Eighth Month

Jack tried his best, but Shelly wasn’t satisfied. She kept telling him to treat her right. Perhaps they had different notions of what that meant, he thought. Jack Googled those words and found dozens of detailed items; all required one change or another on his part. He began to tremble.

Jack worked his way down the list, putting in extra time and effort. He lowered the toilet seat after each use, picked up after himself, puts his shoes away, stopped passing gas outside the bathroom, and remembered to take out the trash. He did anything he could think of.

Soon, though, Jack began to forget who he was. He became a virtual servant to Shelly and her needs. His soul became empty and dark as his identity faded. He drank a few beers each night because they dulled his inner thoughts. He returned to his favorite porn sites and masturbated a lot. It was the only excitement he had left in his life.

The door opened. Shelly came in and her eyes widened. “You’re watching porn,” she shrieked.

Jack almost jumped out of his skin. He hid his face and waited for her to leave.

“Is this love?” she shouted.

“Hey, Shelly. I’m only jacking off. What’s the big deal?”

His irate girlfriend paced the room like a bullfighter. She turned to him and said, “Give me your Facebook password.”

Jack’s muscles tensed. He eased his shorts back over his knees. “Can’t I have some privacy?” he complained.

“I thought we agreed that couples shouldn’t have secrets from each other.”

When Shelly reached for Jack’s smartphone, he nudged her hand away. He grabbed the handset and held it tight against his chest. Sweat appeared on his brow. He raised his chin and gave her a defiant gaze. “I don’t have to prove anything to you,” he said quietly.

“You’re a liar and a cheat,” she screamed in his face. “Give me your phone!”

Jack sighed. He was weary of her aggressive demands and groundless distrust. He tightened his grip. After giving in and changing so much since their relationship began, he needed one part of his life to be just his own. “Get away from me.” he asked, pleading.

Shelly’s eyes darkened as the back of her hand slammed his face. “Give it to me!” she shouted. The rage in her voice was palpable and frightening.

Terrified, Jack let go of the phone. It snapped back with her hand, bashing her in the mouth.

“I’m sorry,” he said.

Shelly touched her bloody lips. “You bastard,” she moaned. Tears streamed down her face. She dialed 911.

When the police arrived, Shelly’s injury was still visible, while the red mark on Jack’s face had already faded. After taking just minutes to hear his side, Jack was arrested, a domestic battery charge on his record. Shelly was sent to the emergency room, where she found comfort in the hands of hospital colleagues.

Lessons Learned by Jack Robinson

• He will not be responsible for a girlfriend’s past emotional injuries or allow her to hold him emotionally hostage.

• He will ensure that boundaries are immediately set if a girlfriend attempts to treat him disrespectfully, because potential sex is not worth actual humiliation.

• When a girlfriend complains about his wandering eyes, he will encourage her to watch the following YouTube video and engage her in a conversation about male nature.

• If a girlfriend is distrustful and suspicious about everything he does, he will break things off forever and eliminate the toxic relationship.

• He will not tolerate slapping and other violent acts by a girlfriend. He will contact authorities, leave her immediately, and never have physical or other relations with her again.

• He understands that the legal system is often biased against men and will be sure to keep evidence on hand if there might be any doubts about his innocence.

The Men's Movement — why there is so much to gain from "the left."

Andy Thomas · 26 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

There's a certain acrimonious streak running through the men's movement against what is perceived as being "the political left". This is understandable, given that feminism is widely held as a left-wing invention [1].

Throughout much of my life, I was essentially non-political because I failed to see how culture and the forces operating though it affected me. The moment I began reading and engaging in the men's human rights movement was the moment I became "political" in the sense that I understood for the first time that in order to have a voice, I would have to fight for it.

I've been on a rather an interesting journey ever since — one that has taken me to places that I once could never have imagined I would go. Instead of staying clear of "the left," that's where I decided to go and what follows is, in part, a personal account of this. In the concluding section, I explain why I think it's so worthwhile to engage in the territory of the left, and so important not alienate ourselves from it. Everyone is free to make of this what they will (there's a comment section below).

Now, the origin of the terms "left" and "right" lie in the French Revolution of 1789, where the National Assembly was divided into two, with the aristocracy sitting on the right of the house, and those representing everyone else on the left. Western politics is generally polarised between "left" and "right". This is especially true of the US I think, but also of the UK, albeit a little less so perhaps.

I'd like to argue, however, that the very notion of a political binary, as represented by a "left" and "right", presents us with a false dichotomy when the real world is so much more complex. Human politics is, in reality, a rich tapestry of overlapping perceptions, ideas and social values that cannot meaningfully be distilled down to two opposing world views. This is why I deliberately wrap the term "left" in quotes — it is an artificial social construct like "patriarchy" — there is no such thing in the widely used sense of the word.

Moreover, I believe it a mistake and a handicap for those in the men's movement to reject all that is perceived as being on the "left" when, not only is there is so much to be learned, but so many to alienate.

I'm not about to suggest to anyone that they should look favourably at the Labour and Democratic parties. In any case, the so-called left-wing mainstream parties have proven themselves to be vehicles for the Tony Blairs and Hillary Clintons of this world to rise to power. Rather, I'm going to draw largely from my own experience of non-mainstream groups.

I find it a little ironic that I should write an article such as this when I consider that once, as a product of Thatcher's Britain, I would have said that I was, if anything, a "conservative," at least one with a small "c". My father, however, had worked in a factory all his life and had been involved in unions and, at times, industrial action. As a teen, I recall him relating his experience of a picket line in the 1980s, where soldiers dressed in police uniforms had charged them with batons. At the time, I couldn't identify with any this, however.

As a youth, my focus was on science, computers and technology. This I saw as the future. In any case, I was interested in working hard, getting ahead and owning things. This is what "the right" appeared to represent, whereas "the left" was all about joining dole queues and men in donkey jackets who proclaimed, "This is the winter of our discontent!" [2]

In truth, however, it seemed that politics didn't really affect me because it made very little difference which of the two main political parties was in government.

My introduction to left-wing politics came many years later in the form of a brief and stormy love affair with a woman I would have described, in a somewhat condescending tone, as being "a bit of a leftie". I would describe her now as a bit of psychopath, and I'll touch on that in a moment.

At the time, having consciously decided to disengage from a society I felt little connection with or place in (I'm sure many male readers can identify here), I had gone my own way and was living a rather remote existence on the east coast of England. Ruby (not her real name) lived in Newcastle, which was the nearest city to me. It's with a tinge of regret that, to date, she represents the one and only intellectually based romance I've ever had.

Things started with a chess game with moves communicated remotely by text message. I began my opening without much consideration, using a text book gambit, and remember quite distinctly the moment I realised that I was going to lose badly unless I seriously upped my game. The next few days were a period of intense concentration, during which we fought each other to a stalemate.

Ruby possessed a sharp intellect and was highly aware both politically and socially. In these areas, I really was no match for her at all.

I recall, a little uncomfortably now, the time I tried to engage her in a political discussion. As she spoke fluently of capitalism, the markets, robber barons and dialectic materialism, I felt a certain sense of powerlessness as the seabed yawned away beneath my feet, and it occurred to me that I was out of my depth.

The truth was, assuming that there wasn't a great deal to know, I had never really thought about capitalism. Sure there was some technical stuff about finance and the economy I didn't know a great deal about, but in essence, I felt that my world view had things sufficiently covered — capitalism was about money, and money was a necessary incentive not to be poor. It would nice if no one were poor, of course, but things just couldn't work that way.

As a side, I use the term "a bit of a psychopath" in my description of her quite deliberately to refer to the fact that she exhibited a number of, what I now understand to be, psychopathic traits. That doesn't mean that I found her malevolent, however. In fact, she could be quite altruistic — if she chose to be. I wonder now, however, just how much she regarded altruism an academic exercise in successful relational strategy, rather than some profound axiom of being. Charming, educated and incredibly intelligent, it was a bizarre enigma to me that she seemed to lack any ambition whatsoever.

I refer to the relationship with "love affair" and "romance", but to be accurate, these terms describe my relationship to her, rather than her relationship to me. The reality was that I was hooked on the promise of her affection, which was never quite fulfilled in earnest. Instead, I only ever won a charming smile which allured to kindness and warmth but was little more than a veneer for her detachment and amused indifference.

I would describe my experience of her as akin to sucking on an ultra-light cigarette in desperate need of satisfaction that was never quite forthcoming. In the end, this proved too confusing and distressing for me.

While she was an expert in holding things back, she never once engaged in overt deception. If anything, she was nothing if not disconcertingly honest with me. She told me several times that she was incapable of guilt or remorse, to which I failed utterly to relate, and so dismissed. Lacking insight into a mindset radically different from my own, my problem was that I was unable and unwilling to believe her. Instead, I had her on a pedestal.

I think she found it rather fascinating to explore the contrast between herself and emotionally vulnerable souls like myself, as she recounted an early childhood drama to me — one in which she had burned down her father's house. After setting light to the curtains and watching the flames rise to the ceiling and then engulf the room, she sensed the danger and left by the front door, stopping to take her little brother with her as an afterthought.

When her father later returned home to a smouldering ruin, he assumed that the fire had been accidental and that Ruby had bravely saved her younger brother. She was duly showered with praise and adoration, and she described how much she thoroughly enjoyed the whole experience. She had never felt the need tell anyone the truth behind the fire, and never did at the time.

Why is any of this relevant? Well, it isn't really, except that for me she represented a catalyst — an emotional taproot that would later give rise to a paradigm shift in my understanding of human beings and the human condition.

In terms of life-changing experiences, she was, in fact, one of the most useful people I have ever met.

Later, I would read up on "dialectic materialism" and find myself more than a little surprised to be intrigued and drawn to the subject than I would have expected.

A number of months down the line, I was living in London, when a friend of mine, who fits the stereotype of a ranch-owning Texan with a love of guns, sent me an email bemoaning the very existence of a certain left-wing book. This book, he lamented bitterly, was the primary cause of all that was wrong in the world, having been used so effectively by "leftie" agitators ever since it was first written in the 1970s. Naturally, I thought this would serve as a great introduction to the virulent politics of the left, so decided that I would read the damn thing.

The book was, of course, Rules for Radicals by Saul Alinsky. I also purchased a copy of Rules for Conservatives, a conservative counter text, which I planned to read as well. I find it rather amusing now that I still regarded myself a small-c conservative, one of the good guys, and thought that the second text would serve as a healthy counterweight to the propaganda I was about to dangerously expose myself to in the first place.

And who knows? Perhaps I was right! For having first been thoroughly corrupted by Alinsky, I never wanted to read Rules for Conservatives. Maybe I should, and perhaps one day I might. For than moment, at least, the second book sits pristinely on my shelf, having never been opened.

Rules for Radicals is a readily amenable instruction book for how the "Have-Nots" in society may take power from the "Haves", i.e. those with disproportionate power, undeserving privilege and ill-gotten wealth. Now the thing was this — I found profound identification with Alinksy's description of society's "Have-Nots," both in terms of being a member of the current human subgroup targeted for prejudice, and for my working class background.

No subgroup in western society today is so routinely and so openly denigrated, disadvantaged, excluded and exploited as the blue collar, low status, working class male.

I think some in the MRM, angry with what they see as the cultural Marxism of the "left" [3], quite naturally look to the political right for a morsel of sympathy or understanding.

They will, of course, be disappointed.

Here, David Cameron, the British Conservative Prime Minister writing in the Sunday Telegraph not too long ago, shares his own view of low-status males from the balcony of his ivory tower:

> "I also think we need to make Britain a genuinely hostile place for fathers who go AWOL. It's high time runaway dads were stigmatised, and the full force of shame was heaped upon them. They should be looked at like drink drivers, people who are beyond the pale. They need the message rammed home to them, from every part of our culture, that what they're doing is wrong – that leaving single mothers, who do a heroic job against all odds, to fend for themselves simply isn't acceptable." – David Cameron [4]

So, in his view, what young men need, having grown up in social deprivation without fathers or positive male role models, is yet more hostility and shame because they haven't had enough already.

I'm also minded here to recount a particular conversation I had with a former friend of mine a few years ago. Although retired, he had previously been a senior executive in a major oil company with the rather imperial title of "northern hemisphere manager." We were discussing homeless men, and I had just outlined my belief that what frequently lay behind all the accepted causes of homelessness — such as addiction, family breakdown, mental illness, lack of a family network and domestic violence — was early childhood abuse and trauma. This I concluded, was at the root of the problem, and that it was generational in nature.

My own personal experience of dealing with those on the street confirmed this. Overwhelmingly, those I met were adults who had been battered, abused and neglected as children and, as a result, could not form healthy and stable relationships and, significantly, could not integrate and function successfully within society.

I'll always remember his response, which came in the form of a lecture on early childhood development delivered down to me with the supreme confidence that only those in ivory towers can manage.

And here it is:

"What happens is this," he said (I'm quoting from memory here, but his words stuck with me so they should be pretty close). "By the time a child reaches ten years old, he has enough wherewithal about him to conduct a survey of his life. He analyses his relationships with others and his place in the world. He then uses this information to form a decision on what he's going to do with his life. Those who chose to get ahead do well, while those who choose to live off the backs of others don't."

"So," I asked incredulously, "those living on the street choose to be that way?"

"Yes," he said. "They choose to beg because they can't bother to make an effort in life."

That was the last time I saw him.

To be fair, his own childhood had been one of financial shortage. But what he had had, that so many do not, was a loving mother who had both nurtured and educated him. This was invisible in his mind, and so was prone to projecting his own psychology onto those who had known nothing but brutality and rejection from the moment of leaving the womb. He had never known his own father and had taken on the role of family provider and protector from an early age. As such, he was minded to view emotionally crippled males, not as human beings with problems, but as the problem.

But coming back to the point, apart from the fact that the perspective of those on the right is often one of the ivory tower, the right represents the interests of those who want to conserve the status quo in order to hold onto what they have.

This is what it means to be a conservative.

For the Haves, change is rather disconcerting. For the Have-Nots, who have little to lose, change is rather more appealing.

Looking at things this way, why on earth did I ever support conservatism?

Well, I guess if I'm honest here, it was because I once felt that I would be able to "get ahead," save for the future and climb the ladder of ownership in some way. Clearly, I no longer feel this is as worthy a goal as I once did. Perhaps watching my father work in a factory until he was 67, having saved into a pension scheme where his labours could be creamed off, has had something to do with my change of heart.

Capitalism is an infinite growth model which, in order to conserve the way things are for those who control wealth, power and status, forever needs to find continued economic growth in order to survive. Here are a few rather illuminating quotes from a 2015 report of the UK Government's Women's Business Council which extols the economic need to get more women into the workplace [5]:

> "Between 2008-2014, the number of women who were in work but wanted to work more hours than their current job provided, increased from 1.1 million to 1.55 million — a rise of 41%.
>
> "If each of these women worked one more hour per week, this would translate into an extra 1.55 million hours a week or 80 million extra hours worked each year.
>
> "This is equivalent to more than 36,000 full-time workers."

More workers equal more taxation, more consumer spending and the continuation of profit.

The report concludes:

> "Equalising women's productivity and employment to that of men's levels has the potential for increased gross > domestic product of 35% in the UK."

Now, forty years ago, the cost of a family home was limited by a single working wage. Have you ever wondered why, today, it is defined by two working wages?

I advocate no return to traditionalism, or to a time when economic production was carried largely on the back of male physical labour. However, many middle-aged women are now waking up to what "equalising women's productivity and employment" really means for them — and it's not always the freedom and happiness they were promised.

The cultural Marxists of the Frankfurt School have indeed served as a catalyst for the advancement of feminism, which has, in turn, provided a convenient cover for the breakdown of family life needed to put women to work.

As second-wave feminist, Linda Gordon put things:

> "Whatever its ultimate meaning, the break-up of families now is an objectively revolutionary process … Families will be finally destroyed only when a revolutionary social and economic organization permits people's needs for love and security to be met in ways that do not impose divisions of labor, or any external roles, at all." – Linda Gordon [6]

It would seem that Gordon failed to grasp just how adaptable capitalism really is. It's rather ironic, I think, to reflect on how the primary beneficiary of Gordon's dream has not been women as a group, but capitalism itself!

Erin Pizzey, on the other hand, the family care activist and founder of the early domestic violence refuges, puts rather more human value on family life than the likes of Gordon. Pizzey was instrumental in the women's liberation movement of the late 1960s and early 70s herself and, in a recent article on her WhiteRibbon.org website, she is quite clear that the men on the left were betrayed by a subgroup of hardcore women who had their own personal agenda:

> "In 1971 liberals, the media, universities and an ill-assorted band of left wing journalists were all leaping to the barricades to fight in the coming revolution against capitalism. What the men had not understood was that their female partners were now dissenting from fighting side by side with their brothers but and were actively rearranging the goal posts. No longer as far as the new feminists were concerned was capitalism the enemy but it was replaced by 'patriarchy.'" – Erin Pizzey [7]

Now, if there is any political faction which has steadfastly upheld a literal interpretation of Marxist ideology, it is Trotskyism. Trotskyists tend to reject feminism as identity politics which has divided the working classes. In fact, the International Committee of the Forth International (a faction of the organisation founded Trotsky himself) has written extensively on the Frankfurt School, which it regards as anti-Marxist and a foundation for "petty-bourgeois pseudo-left" political movements [8].

Given so many well-connected feminists come from middle-to-upper class backgrounds, I find their description of feminism as a "petty-bourgeois pseudo-left political movement" quite fitting.

Rather than viewing "the left" as a definable pole of a political binary, I prefer to think in terms of a cultural melting pot of inhomogeneous groups, interests, struggles and ideologies. The only thing they necessarily have in common is that its proponents see themselves as the Have-Nots seeking change, rather than the Haves resisting it. The very idea of a homogeneous political "left," is a gross oversimplification.

By indulging our anger, and uselessly railing against all that is seen as "the left," we are not only alienating a huge number of desperate men and potential supporters, we are cutting ourselves off from political and social groups from whom we could learn so much, even if we do not always share their perspectives. What's more, we leave ourselves with little option but to appeal to the right, in other words, the Haves of this world, for salvation.

Feminism is nothing other than a parasitic ideology originating from a subgroup of emotionally damaged women who have exploited existing political and social networks. Feminists are entryists — who once established, seek control in order to make every issue about themselves. What has allowed them to do this successfully is, of course, male chivalry. The political left of the past was simply its host, and the men on the left were betrayed and discarded. Chivalry rendered them blind and impotent against their betrayers.

Feminism is now an integral part of the Establishment and men, particularly working class blue collar men, are among the Have-Nots. In Cassie Jaye's trailer for the upcoming Red Pill documentary [9], watch how the eye rolling feminist from "Feminist Majority Foundation" sits in her executive office claiming oppression while the working class men are generally the ones speaking from the street.

It is useful, I believe, to look at the social and political struggles of the past because there is much there to learn. I happen to believe that, as a product of their time, Marx and Engels were inspired. In the final analysis, however, they failed utterly to take into account human nature, believing that the chaos and complexity of nature, of which we are a part, could be supplanted with scientific order. I think ideology is a great thing — except, of course, that in order to get people to follow your blueprint for a better world, you must first crush them.

The term "left-wing," can be taken to mean a whole range of political and ideological views, many of which I do not share. For one thing, I do not believe that everything about capitalism is necessarily bad, especially when any blueprint for something better would be subject to the law of unintended consequences as history has shown us. I'm no fan of labels, but prefer to declare myself on the side of the Have-Nots, and against the entrenched elitist power of the Haves. I oppose hereditary privilege, class systems, oppressive social orders and gynocentrism. If I am to be defined as "left-wing," let it be in the sense that I'm interested in and advocate the politics of change.

I recognise, like so many outside the political mainstream, that the traditional parties of the left have long been usurped and are little more than a front for the interests of big business and powerful interest groups. As Owen Jones explains in his book, The Establishment: And how they get away with it, there is a revolving door between the offices of the political elite and the boardrooms of megacorporations. The British Labour Party, for example, betrayed its founding principles when Tony Blair tore up Clause IV to path the way for continued privatisation [10] and to ingratiate himself with Rupert Murdoch.

To be presented with a "this" or "that" choice between Labour and Conservative, between Democrat and Republican, when in fact both options often represent the same thing essentially, is no choice at all.

Here in the UK, Jeremy Corbyn appears as a welcome aberration from this. However, with his idea for women-only train carriages [11], he has tragically demonstrated that he suffers from "The One Good Man" syndrome, as poetically described by Alison Tieman in her article of the same name [12]. I could not help but find it somewhat pitiful to read how the feminist MP, Jess Phillips, who had laughed openly at the idea of men having their own "issues" during a Westminster backbench debate [13], and who Corbyn had just appointed to a Parliamentary Private Secretary post, gave an interview to Owen Jones in which she boasted of telling the Labour leader how she intends to knife him, not "in the back", but "in the front".

> "The day that you [Corbyn] are hurting us more than you are helping us, I won't knife you in the back, I'll knife you in the front." – Jess Phillips [14]

As an example of unguarded egotism and sheer unprofessionalism, this takes some beating. Here is a woman who is unaccustomed to having her views challenged.

In any case, this is a digression. What I'm building up to, and the purpose behind this article is to say this:

When I first became involved in the men's movement, I knew nothing of how to campaign or how to organise. Like so many men, especially those in distress, I was isolated behind a keyboard. The feeling of powerlessness was overwhelming and disheartening.

However, by forcing myself out of my cave, swallowing a few initial prejudices, and getting involved in political groups at the street level, I developed a new perspective and a new purpose. While listening to a speech by Owen Jones at the People's Assembly in London in 2013, I had the revelation that, "My God! These people know how to organise!"

There are a myriad of social justice and political groups who are experienced at organising and campaigning effectively, many of whom represent issues I could easily relate to and support.

Later, I moved into the fight against homelessness in Manchester, a scourge on society predominantly, but not exclusively, afflicting men. I gleaned insights into how to take a squat, something Erin Pizzey was proficient at during the 1970s and was present in 2015 when activists occupied the Bank of England building in Liverpool, turning it into a shelter for rough sleepers, see video below [15].

At the street level, there an overwhelming number of disaffected men who have been screwed over by the child support agencies, the courts, abusive ex-wives, the army and the state. I have also met many female campaigners who care deeply about homeless men, who are aware of the empathy gap, and who are often willing to face hardship, arrest and incarceration in order to help. Ideologically minded feminists, I noticed, are sporadic, however. The odd one I encountered, I simply side-stepped.

I had gone into things fearing that I would be excluded and pilloried if I dared express my beliefs but, to my surprise, I found this not to be the case.

Feminism is now the Establishment, and feminists walk the corridors of power in government, NGOs and academia. As you go up the political "food-chain" to where funding becomes available, the more feminists and radical feminist dogma you will find. At the grass roots level, however, feminists are hardly present at all.

Now, here's the thing: They can be pushed out!

I have come to believe that engaging with and joining existing activist and campaign groups at the grass roots level is a worthwhile activity both politically and personally. Sure, it is necessary to choose causes judiciously and, sure, there is no shortage of dubious ideas and individuals out there (it goes with the territory and it's the same within the MRM itself). Often it will be necessary to back out of a group on realising that it's not what it first seemed. None of this, however, is a reason not to engage. Instead, we should embrace the messiness that is the political struggle and learn from it.

If we were to reach out and engage at the local and grass roots level in numbers, refuse to be excluded and refuse to back down, feminism can be pushed out from the ground up.

On a personal level, it is also an opportunity to network, make friends, and to put our own beliefs to the test and challenge our prejudices (we all have them). It is an opportunity for personal growth and development.

If, however, we continue to foster a predisposition against left-leaning groups and ideas, we rule all this out. Instead, we condemn ourselves to political isolation and powerlessness.

1. Paul Elam. Spank a leftist http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/gather-round-good-people-time-to-spankaleftist/

2. Winter of discontent
   http://www.conservapedia.com/Winter_of_Discontent

3. Angry Harry. Cultural Marxism and feminism http://www.angryharry.com/esCulturalMarxismAndFeminism.htm

4. David Cameron writing in the Telegraph http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/politics/david-cameron/8584238/David-Cameron-Dads-gift-to-me-was-his-optimism.html

5. Maximising women's contribution to future economic growth, 2015 http://womensbusinesscouncil.dcms.gov.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/08/DfE-WBC-Two-years-on-report_update_AW_CC.pdf

6. Linda Gordon. "Functions of the Family," Women: A Journal of Liberation (Fall 1969).

7. Erin Pizzey. How feminism succeeded in destroying family relationships http://whiteribbon.org/mega-featured/how-feminism-succeeded-in-destroying-family-relationships/

8. David North. The Frankfurt School, Postmodernism and the Politics of the Pseudo-Left: A Marxist Critique
https://www.wsws.org/en/articles/2015/07/21/dnbo-j21.html

9. Cassie Jaye. "The Red Pill" documentary extended sneak preview
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HK7n_XA40V8

10. The Guardian. Clause IV: a brief history http://www.theguardian.com/politics/2015/aug/09/clause-iv-of-labour-party-constitution-what-is-all-the-fuss-about-reinstating-it

11. The Guardian. Jeremy Corbyn raises possibility of women-only train carriages http://www.theguardian.com/politics/2015/aug/26/women-only-train-carriages-a-possibility-under-jeremy-corbyn

12. Alison Tieman. The One Good Man http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/the-one-good-man/

13. MP Jess Phillips laughs at men's rights debate request
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KMlhKhpQWtY

14. Knife Jeremy Corbyn in the front, not the back https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1TcLhDTUxVs

15. Andy Man. Inside the Bank of England
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Nir8reb6Fy0

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YTgtmPlqYJo?rel=0&w=560&h=315]

Dr. Kent Lee of Memphis clinic that botched circumcision placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 27 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Kent Lee has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Lee's profile at vitals.com:

"Family Practice

Education
Medical School
Medical Anthropology, University of Memphis, Tennessee Appointments
University of Tennessee College of Medicine (2008 – Present)
Assistant Professor of Family Medicine Associations
American Board of Family Medicine

Hospital Affiliations
Methodist University Hospital
1265 Union Ave, Memphis, TN 38104
St Francis Hospital"

Dr. Lee works at Christ Community Health Services, the clinic where a 3 month old baby boy's penis was amputated during a circumcision.

From "About Us" at the Christ Community Health Services website:

> Everyone who enters our centers is treated with dignity and respect. We offer each patient spiritual healing and the opportunity to share in prayer. We believe that Jesus Christ is the true healer and with his guidance and comfort we can provide physical and spiritual healing.

Treating your patients with "dignity and respect" assumes that the patient wants the surgery, so when you genitally mutilate an infant- the patient – who's unable to consent, you are committing an assault on a child.

This genital mutilation is unethical and potentially deadly, resulting in permanent disfigurement in varying degrees.

Here's an excerpt of the story from WMC-TV:

> Maggie Rhodes' son Ashton was three months old when she had him circumcised at a local low-cost clinic.
>
> "When he was in the room, he was screaming like life and death like, like there wasn't no tomorrow," she said. "When she pulled back the cloth, like the thing was like gone. She cut up instead of down, instead of cutting > around the top of the penis."

>
> Rhodes says her son now screams when he urinates. He will need reconstruction work to correct what she considers a botched procedure.
>
> Ob/Gyn Doctor Kent Lee did not perform Ashton's circumcision nor has he ever met Ashton or his mom. Lee says most circumcisions are safe, but he says mistakes do happen.
>
> "I've been doing this for 20 years, and I have never ever seen anybody with everything completely cut off," said Ob/Gyn Dr. Kent Lee. "Actual penectomy is extraordinarily rare."

So, Dr. Lee says most circumcisions are "safe" and that loss of the penis is "rare." Well, I don't know what he bases that on as records are not kept about those incidents, including death. I suspect he uses made up safety 'stats' to alleviate feelings of guilt or remorse.

Yes, "mistakes do happen," but the 'mistake' is allowing people such as Dr. Lee to disfigure infants with potentially deadly surgery. The 'mistake' is magnified when 'educated' people such as Lee don't realize the surgery itself is the mistake.

Well, Dr. Lee can't say he's "never ever seen anybody with everything completely cut off" anymore. At this rate, he'll see another penis removal in the next 20 years – maybe he'll cause it.

Or maybe he'll see the light and show actual "dignity and respect" to those defenseless baby boys by not mutilating them without their consent.

Let's place blame for 'botched circumcisions' where it belongs, on mutilating doctors who are performing risky surgery that is medically unnecessary.

Here's an excerpt of the story about the incident from opposingviews.com:

> A three-month-old infant has been left mutilated after doctors cut off his penis during what was supposed to be a 20-minute circumcision procedure.
>
> Memphis, Tenn. mother Maggie Rhodes is now regretting taking her son Ashton to the Christ Community Health Center in August to get circumcised.
>
> "After I went home and I discovered that my son's penis was not there, I immediately froze, like, oh my God," Rhode told My Fox Memphis.
>
> Rhodes said she was told the procedure would only take 20 minutes but was left waiting for hours as she heard her baby scream throughout the entire procedure.
>
> "It took them about three hours to do the circumcision and so my baby screamed the whole three hours, like the whole process," Rhodes said. "Then even when she gave him back to us, he was still screaming."
>
> Rhodes said she was not notified of the botched procedure, instead she and her sister made the shocking discovery at home when Ashton was still screaming and they saw his diaper filled with blood.
>
> "When she pulled back the cloth, like the thing was like, gone. She cut up instead of down, instead of cutting around the top of the penis," Rhodes said.
>
> All that was left was a partial penis and his testicles. Rhodes said Ashton urinates through a hole in his penis and screams in agony.

The mother plans to sue the doctor and clinic – you can read about that here. I hope more people realize that the 'mistake' was raising a scalpel in the first place.

See Ashton's mom (now a 'regret mom') interviewed and Dr. Lee admit he's been cutting penises for 20 years here.

Since there is no risk and complication information given by Christ Community Health Services or Dr. Lee, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Bonus video: See William Stowell talk about his intactivism and how he sued his circumcisers and won.

Dr. Lee's practice information follows:

2400 Poplar Ave
Memphis, TN 38112

> Dr. Kent Lee of Memphis clinic that botched circumcision on genital mutilators directory https://t.co/Gc6xPEHOhM pic.twitter.com/3Udi3tsu1T
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 28, 2016

Feminism vs. Egalitarianism: How can we cultivate a safer society?

Andrew Nuttall · 27 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Violence has its roots, and so does suffering. Both feminists and egalitarians have suggested ways to cultivate a safer society. Some people are surprised to learn that the practice of distributing compassion equally is an important way in which egalitarianism differs from feminism. This difference is tragically striking when it comes to the issue of child abuse.

Unlike egalitarian reasoning, feminist ideological assumptions lead to diminished compassion for the suffering of non-women, including men and children, because of how ideology subconsciously affects judgment. For example, egalitarianism seeks to overcome this problem while leading media feminists such as Jessica Valenti to insist on calling certain civil rights advocates "whiny" for challenging her on how she distributes compassion.

If one looks carefully at her stereotype of Men's Rights Activists, the parallels with psychological profiles of adult victims of child abuse are uncanny. Moreover, the delight she takes in using sardonic feminist in-jokes reveals an entrenched boundary in her compassion.

Egalitarians find her patently feminist outlook toxically inhumane. What about the value of those lives burdened by child abuse? Would we not cultivate a safer society if we ensured that abused children's developmental needs were better met? When victims of abuse get mad at feminists for denying their voices, look at who treats their points of view as worthless.

It is not surprising that Men's Rights Activists get angry at feminists for making ideological assumptions. Feminist media icons commonly exhibit an in-group mentality that leads to social injustices. And yes, some feminists are not into that way of thinking. But nevertheless, young feminists in the education system today are increasingly opposed to moderates in their movement for sometimes applying egalitarian, rather than feminist principles.

Many (not all) feminists agree that we should bring an end to child abuse. Feminists like Jessica Valenti intentionally write articles for the sake of antagonizing members of a movement with a disproportionately large number of adult victims of child abuse in it.

Like a bully, she hides behind the claim that she is just "joking." This is patently not-egalitarian behavior. From an egalitarian perspective, everyone's journeys in life are equally legitimate. Imagine being one of those abuse victims getting attacked publicly by feminists who share her ideologically-driven opinions. Fixing the problem of child abuse necessarily involves acknowledging how feminist ideology is part of the problem.

On the surface, most (not all) feminists do not find child abuse any more acceptable than egalitarians. However, when it comes to responsibility and accountability in actual cases of child abuse, feminists and egalitarians differ substantially. Egalitarians distribute compassion evenly, unlike feminists.

Both groups recognize that child abuse is the root of numerous social problems, but egalitarians are more interested in cultivating safety for abused children. The outcomes of all parties affected by child abuse are important to egalitarians, so they find the feminist notion of "patriarchy" grossly inappropriate as a framework for understanding the problem.

The most common form of child abuse is Parental Alienation Syndrome. It burdens children and future adults with a lifetime of shame and self-hatred. It's connected to a myriad of personality and health disorders. For people who suffer in this way, shaming tactics are disgustingly inappropriate.

In North America, over 35% of children live in single-parent homes. 83% of parental alienation is committed by the parent who has the majority of custody hours, and women in Canada are typically awarded 75% or more of custody hours by family courts.

Mathematically, it is an inescapable conclusion that single mothers abuse children more than anyone else and researchers have repeatedly measured this effect: “Approximately 40 percent of child victims were maltreated by their mothers acting alone; another 18.3 percent were maltreated by their fathers acting alone; 17.3 percent were abused by both parents.” (source)

I once brought up this information in a debate with a professor of Women’s Studies and her prefabricated ideological response was to start by defending single mothers. She organized her argument in such a way as to downplay or trivialize mothers’ responsibility for causing harm.

She spoke of how hard it is for women to raise kids on their own. She pointed out how children sometimes push buttons and concluded that hitting them is sometimes inevitable when a single mother is overwhelmed by stress.

To summarize her argument, she blamed that stress on “systematic oppression by the patriarchy” and cited an example of gynocentric reasoning as evidence for her conclusion. She then closed by bluntly asserting that fathers are less of a problem when they accept greater responsibility for taking care of kids and gave two examples of “dead-beat dads.”

Is the father-child bond any less meaningful to a person’s life than the mother-child bond? The distinguished professor never expressed any concern or compassion whatsoever for men who protect their children from abusive mothers, a job made more difficult by the lack of shelters for male victims of domestic abuse.

She conveniently left out how often vindictive mothers interfere with divorced fathers’ rights to access their children. She ignored the fact that men have formed organizations so that they can be involved in their children’s lives and she completely ignored the questionable ethics of the family maintenance system.

What about children’s biologically-driven identification with their fathers? An undeniable suffering arises when that bond is denied to a child. Rather than distributing compassion evenly, feminist ideologues are notorious for making excuses on behalf of child-abusing mothers as if children are somehow less important. This one concluded that male-dominance is to blame for women who abuse children.

She displayed a boundary in compassion by using feminism as a shield for abusive mothers. An egalitarian would consider the suffering of children and fathers in these tragic situations as equally central. Like most feminist ideologues, this professor did not.

Would a feminist make excuses for rapists? I imagine this Women’s Studies professor would give a failing grade to any student who did. Like rape, the consequences of child abuse are frequently severe and enduring. So why did she aggressively focus on making excuses for child abusers? Why do so many feminists support abusive mothers ahead of the children and their fathers, while others engage in publicly scorning activists who are trying to address ideologically-driven problems related to that abuse?

Feminist ideology presupposes that women are unfairly disadvantaged, (Patriarchy Theory) and, therefore, deserve top priority when it comes to getting social and material support. People who hold this horrible misconception of social power have a track-record for overlooking existential threats to children who live in abusive homes.

From an authentically egalitarian perspective, this is a kind of denialism that lingers like an elephant in the room. If feminism were a movement for equality, would it not start by distributing compassion evenly between the interconnected people in such grievous conditions?

With just a few fortunate exceptions, children raised by single mothers are less successful in life compared to kids raised in families with fathers. While informed feminists and egalitarians agree that the most likely people in society to abuse children are women who have also been abused themselves, egalitarians disagree with any presupposition or assumption whatsoever that women possess innate moral superiority or any instinctively greater competence around parenting. [1]

Moreover, egalitarians are far more likely to acknowledge the importance of ensuring fathers have a right, as well as a responsibility to be in their children’s lives. The fact is involved fathers help prevent child abuse and produce healthier, more successful adults. But do they have the right to do that? Society would best be served by facilitating men's healing journeys and interconnections with children, not by accusing Men's Rights Activists of being a bunch of "whiny" losers from the class of oppressors.

Egalitarians have no time for attempts to abdicate responsibility in cases of child-abuse and consider primary care-givers to have the most significant impact on the lifetime well-being of human offspring. Child abuse is well-understood to have downstream social impacts.

An egalitarian solution involves steadfastly supporting fathers' rights while placing long-term priority on the welfare of children rather than framing the issue in terms of "Patriarchy." Egalitarianism involves acknowledging all of the facts and the feelings at the roots of social problems. Consequently, egalitarians consider feminist ideological presuppositions to be dangerously imbalanced and harmfully dysfunctional to the process of cultivating safety.

Violence has its roots, so does suffering. Some of those roots are ideological. The issue of child abuse illustrates some of the differences between egalitarianism and feminism. The failure to equally distribute compassion impairs the cultivation of safety as demonstrated by the way feminists address the issue of child abuse and treat its victims.

Egalitarians consider this distribution functionally and centrally important to resolving the problem. As the case of child abuse and the long-term cultivation of safety illustrates, feminists distribute compassion based on the assumption that women are oppressed and publish textbooks in which they claim females cannot be sexist despite obvious examples to the contrary.

This post originally appeared on Ultimatemanbuilder.com. Dating advice and men's personal development. Written by Andrew Nuttall

Notes:

[1] Link to (http://www.united-academics.org/magazine/mind-brain/do-womens-brains-make-them-better-parents) is now 403 forbidden.

Feminists don’t know jack about feminism. Janet Bloomfield helps out.

AVfM Video Source · 28 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nRndoqbWLTg

See her youtube channel: https://www.youtube.com/user/JudgyBitch1

Human evolution and culture

Douglas Galbi · 28 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Culture has made human beings who they are. Leading human evolutionary biologist Joseph Henrich compellingly makes that point in his recent book, The Secret of Our Success: How Culture is Driving Human Evolution, Domesticating Our Species, and Making Us Smarter.

The answer to why humans are different is that we crossed the Rubicon. Cultural evolution became cumulative, and then both this accumulating body of information and its cultural products, like fire and food-sharing norms, developed as the central driving forces in human genetic evolution. … Having crossed the Rubicon, we can't go back. The impact of this transition is underlined by the fact that, despite our long evolutionary history as foragers, we generally can't survive by hunting and gathering when we have been stripped of that relevant culturally acquired knowledge. … So, yes, we are smart, but not because we stand on the shoulders of giants or are giants ourselves. We stand on the shoulders of a very large pyramid of hobbits. The hobbits do get a bit taller as the pyramid ascends, but it's still the number of hobbits, not the height of particular hobbits, that's allowing us to see farther. [1]

Henrich's explanation draws upon an ancient Roman rhetorical figure involving Julius Caesar, J. R. R. Tolkien's influential fictional creation of hobbits, a reference from a twelfth-century Latin text of Bernard of Chartres, and perhaps an allusion to the Great Pyramid of Giza—a monument for bureaucracy. No other organism creates such linguistic figures. Yet that reality differs subtly from the claim that culture is domesticating us and making us smarter. Human cultural evolution doesn't support a master narrative of inevitable progressive enlightenment. Cultural evolution can make humans more brutal and more stupid.

In Henrich's view, humans hasten both evolutionary and development time through social learning. Human toddlers outperform chimpanzees and orangutans, not in cognitive tests about space, quantities, and causality, but only in social learning. [2] Social learning depends on making sense of a presence of another like oneself. Long duration, broad bandwidth, synchronous, ephemeral communication, e.g. in-person communication among associates, supports a sense of presence and social learning more than does short, narrow bandwidth, asynchronous, stored communication, e.g. short text messaging. Cultural evolution in which communication time shifts to the latter makes persons dumber.

Henrich associates greater population size and greater interconnectedness of people with greater cultural development. Those mechanisms suggest that concentrating persons in factories and in cities in spurring the industrial revolutions of the past two centuries were notably important. However, England and Wales (and probably other European countries as well) over the past two centuries experienced significant cultural change: a massive flattening of the given name distribution. In contrast, symbolic markets in which increasingly more people can communicate with each other more cheaply and more quickly tend to promote blockbuster economics. Blockbuster economics involves social success that undermines the objective justification for status and exacerbates wealth inequalities. Blockbuster economics also favors cultural homogenization and concentration of symbolic power. Masses who are more easily manipulated are less likely to advance collective intelligence. If the secret to our success is acting like sheep, crossing the Rubicon points to how charismatic leaders like Julius Caesar or Hitler can greatly change human societies.

A good case study of cultural evolution is twelfth-century Europe. That century experienced elite promotion of men's subservience to women in love ("courtly love"). Some scholars have even interpreted knights brutalizing other knights in service to idealized women as a means of civilizing and domesticating men. That cultural development remains influential in competition for prestige. Thus, a best-selling author recently credited feminization of civilization for contributing to the long-run historical decline in violence. That author approvingly proclaimed an astonishing cultural development:

At the top, a consensus has formed within the international {elite} community that violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world. [3]

In the U.S. today, four times more men than women die from violence. Around the world, violence overwhelmingly occurs against men. Elite consensus that violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem in the world today shows that social learning can powerfully promote stupidity.

For social learning to develop a humane, rational collective mind, human societies need intellectual counterbalances to gynocentrism. Henrich promotes ideals of elite intellectual culture:

It's the willingness and ability of large numbers of individuals at the knowledge frontier to freely interact, exchange views, disagree, learn from each other, build collaborations, trust strangers, and be wrong. [4]

As the recent persecution of Nobel-prize-winning scientist Tim Hunt has made clear, any deviation from the narrow path of social propriety in speaking about women can today cause anyone enormous harm. Men's biological inferiority to women in social communication has been well-established in scholarly literature. Cultural cognition and the structure of current academic prestige competition has produced comically tendentious experiments, mind-numbing academic "scientific" rhetoric, and wide-spread dissemination of grotesque, highly damaging falsehoods about men.

Preventing the collective mind from going insane requires supporting recalcitrant masculine voices like those in medieval Latin literature. In medieval Europe, men writing in Latin freely expressed outrageous views about wives, the church, and women in general. Latin provided a language for views that couldn't be expressed in commonly spoken languages. Medieval Latin literature addressed violence against men in ways far more intelligent than currently fashionable anti-men bigotry (talk of "toxic masculinity"). Medieval Latin literature played a crucial role in limiting the damage to the collective mind from vernacular gynocentrism.

With U.S. universities leading efforts, within existing conditions of mass incarceration, to criminalize men for ordinary sexual interactions, the future of the collective mind looks grim. But the die is not cast. Joseph Henrich's new book The Secret of Our Success underscores the importance of culture. From an economic and political perspective, the most important cultural issue today is understanding women and men in relationship to each other.[5] Under particular human biological predispositions, the twelfth-century European cultural inheritance, imperatives of collegiality in an academic competition for prestige, overwhelming mass media patronage of women, and particular national-political circumstances, cultural evolution is making us less humane and less intelligent. To become more humane and more intelligent, our culture must embrace medieval Latin literature of men's sexed protest and similar recalcitrant masculine voices.

Notes:

[1] Henrich (2015) pp. 317, 323.

[2] Id. pp. 13-5.

[3] Pinker (2011) p. 414. For related claims, see note [2] in my post on violence and enlightenment.

[4] Henrich (2015) p. 325. Underscoring his emphasis on techno-elite culture, Henrich further states:

It bears emphasizing that once the body of know-how becomes sufficiently complex, cultural evolution will often favor an increasingly complex division of labor (really, a division of information). In this new world, the size of the collective brain will be influenced by the size and interconnectedness of people at the knowledge frontier {emphasis in the original}, the place at which individuals know enough to have any chance of making improvements on existing forms.

Id. Persons in their teens have written highly successful mobile phone apps. Persons who dropped out of college have founded and led enormously powerful high-tech corporations. The most important and most difficult aspects of culture concern human relations. Life experience and broad literary study contribute greatly to thinking about the most important aspects of culture.

Henrich briefly recognizes that cultural poetic sophistication is more important than factual knowledge:

The framing of the message and the messenger are crucial, but the mini causal models (the "facts") are merely secondary — only necessary to support any acquired practices or social norms.

Id. p. 328.

[5] Marsupials, once a gregarious species, are now solitary mammals. The significance of that development shouldn't be minimized. Human pair bonding is being challenged by a social promotion of female promiscuity (celebrating slut walks) and men's opportunistic response to that development. In addition, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is one of the most significant social movements of our time.

References:

Henrich, Joseph. 2015. The secret of our success: how culture is driving human evolution, domesticating our species, and making us smarter. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Pinker, Steven. 2011. The better angels of our nature: why violence has declined. New York: Viking.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Shivers is free but Perrette is on the prowl

Paul Elam · 28 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

After serving 4 ½ months of a 9-month sentence for violating a restraining order, Francis "Coyote" Shivers is out of jail.

His freedom does not appear to sit well with his ex-wife, NCIS star Pauley Perrette, who by all appearances looks to be inserting herself into the thick of his work and social life despite a restraining order that she has maintained for years.

AVFM regulars will be familiar with the Shivers's story from the lengthy coverage it has received here. The short version, according to our investigations, goes as follows.

Shivers and NCIS star Pauley Perrette went through a conflicted marriage and an acrimonious divorce. Discovery in the divorce proves that Perrette gave contradictory testimony and testimony that was largely inconsistent with the facts in evidence.

There was also the matter of a script that Perrette wrote about a family court savvy psychopath who used the restraining order system as an instrument of revenge and personal terror. Shivers alleges that Perrette threatened upon their breakup that the script, "Star Crazy," painted a picture of what would be happening to him if he resisted her will in the divorce.

Shivers did, in fact, stand his ground and fight back. He was later jailed for walking into a restaurant where he was a long-time patron — but where Perrette had already arrived.[4]

Now that Shivers is out of jail, he is back to work as a DJ in the Los Angeles area. He works most frequently in an area known locally as the "Cahuenga Strip." Shivers is a local celebrity in the area. Through both his work and his after-work socializing he has been referred to by locals as "The Mayor."

And this is precisely the area that Perrette has chosen to insert her own social activities. Perrette showed up at an establishment, "St. Felix" last Friday night with a group of friends. A source informs AVFM that had Shivers not received an impromptu movie invitation that, "he very predictably would have walked into St Felix" that night.

Perrette, second from right at St. Felix, 01/27/2015
St. Felix is located across the street from where Shivers does a great deal of his work as a DJ.

Regulars on The Strip appear to be aware of the ongoing drama, with another source stating, “Everybody knows what is going on. If she wanted to avoid Mr. Shivers, this is the last place on earth she’d show up. It’s just so obvious she can’t just move on and accept he’s happily remarried.”

When contacted, Shivers declined to comment, stating only, “I see no reason to comment. The facts speak for themselves.”

There will undoubtedly be more to this story in the future. Perrette appears obsessed with punishing Shivers, as well as constitutionally incapable of ending her crusade to ruin his life. Shivers has been out less than a week and she is already showing up where he will inevitably cross her path, thus violating the restraining order that put him behind bars to begin with.

Either that or she just has the horrible luck to stumble repeatedly into her “abusive” ex-husband, a man who allegedly represents a threat to her.

Los Angeles is 503 square miles.

What are the odds, eh?

See the Patriarchy Fall

AVfM Video Source · 30 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A short humorous animated clip. Enjoy.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EcSK9qOBtGk

For more from Uncuck The Right.

The Ouroboros of Feminism's Psychology

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 30 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Today, let's talk about two very important things that you need to understand about feminism if you want to take feminism down. These two things are called feminist triumphalism and feminist subjectivism. They are closely related mental operations, and together they form a set of brackets or bookends which hold the entire feminist psychology together.

Feminist triumphalism:

Feminist triumphalism is the idea that feminism is absolute, categorically and objectively "right" beyond all further discussion, for all time. Hence, feminism is triumphant and trumps any possible alternative standpoint. Feminist triumphalism is the moral bedrock from which all feminist thinking operates because the feminists are adamant that feminism has achieved an objective moral victory absolved from all further discussion. They will suggest that if you oppose feminism in any way, you are on the wrong side of history. Feminist triumphalism is their dogma, their fixed idea and the pivot point which their moral universe revolves around.

In their mind, you are morally bound to agree that feminism is RIGHT! It just IS. Feminism is right because it's right and that settles it. And because feminism is right you must support it, and if you don't, you are WRONG. You just ARE! Not just intellectually wrong, but morally and metaphysically wrong through every last fiber of your being. In other words, you are a wrong person altogether, on every imaginable level, and I don't think wrongness gets more wrong than that!

So what's the trick? How do they get to this state of mind and more to the point, how do they stay there? Why is it virtually impossible to dislodge them from their way of thinking?

The trick is that feminism controls the language, and this control starts by controlling the word "feminism" itself; just the word. In other words, feminism is what they say it is because the WORD feminism means what THEY say it means and not what YOU say it means; according to them.

Feminist subjectivism:

Feminist subjectivism is the feminist notion that non-feminist people don't know what feminism really is. Feminist subjectivism assumes that feminism has one correct universal definition, that feminists have an exclusive right to formulate that definition and that a feminist frame of reference is assumed within any conversational setting. In the end, feminist subjectivism fails to consider that non-feminist reasons for rejecting feminism might compose some portion of the truth about feminism.

We've all seen feminist subjectivism in action. Every time a feminist quotes the dictionary definition of feminism for your benefit . . . There it is!

Beyond that, feminist subjectivism is the default state of mind for any feminist at any time. For a feminist, all people, ideas and situations are processed and evaluated through the lens of feminist understanding and this understanding grows from the unquestioned assumption that the word "feminism" has a meaning which only a feminist may authoritatively pronounce.

A feminist will set the value of the word "feminism" at X, with X being something irreproachable, something that will brook no moral opposition, in other words, something morally triumphant.

And that brings us back to feminist triumphalism again:

In the end, the whole charade runs like this: Feminism is X, X is irreproachable, therefore, feminism is irreproachable, therefore feminism is eternally right, therefore feminism is triumphant, therefore you are eternally wrong if you oppose feminism, and if you don't believe that return to "feminism is X" and start the game over.

Feminist triumphalism and feminist subjectivism are like the chicken and the egg; it is pointless to wonder which comes first.

Feminist triumphalism and feminist subjectivism:

Feminist subjectivism is the mental filter through which feminist triumphalism controls the language and reconstructs reality. In the end, feminism operates as the self-appointed gatekeeper of moral truth.

However, what nearly every feminist fails to understand is that non-feminist people view feminism in a very different light than feminist people do. Non-feminist people either does not agree that “feminism is X” or else insist on deconstructing the entire formulation as such because they find something radically problematic about it.

There you have it. By taking control of what the word “feminism” means, we can drive a wedge between feminist triumphalism and feminist subjectivism. Hence, we can regain control of the language, ownership of our thoughts and feelings and ultimately mastery of our lives. We can also commence disestablishing the feminist worldview and dismantling the entire power structure built upon that worldview one step at a time.

Finally, we establish non-feminist as a broad political identity, through our revolutionary act of reclaiming the language. Controlling the definition of “feminism” is our necessary first move in reclaiming the language, with thousands of moves to follow. In this manner, we build non-feminist identity step by step.

Feminism IS what we say it is:

We say it, and we will make it stick. Let no feminist tell us that we “can’t do that” since we have clearly done it already. Furthermore, we are curious to know how they intend to stop us.

Feminist triumphalism and feminist subjectivism are two key terms that you will find useful, and you would do well to make them a part of your lexicon.

Vladek Filler wins again!

Robert Franklin · 31 January 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Vladek Filler has been embroiled in a legal battle that is now nine years long. It began with his divorce and child custody case in which his wife leveled charges of rape and sexual battery against him in an effort to gain custody of their children. The ploy failed. Filler was given primary custody by the family court that found his ex's allegations to be untrue and made for the purpose of gaining an advantage in the custody litigation.

Undeterred by that finding by the family court, Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett and ADA Paul Cavanaugh proceeded with criminal charges against Filler who eventually prevailed on those as well, with the exception of one misdemeanor charge. In doing so, Kellett violated numerous rules regarding discovery in criminal cases and still other articles of prosecutorial ethics. Filler complained to the state bar association and Kellett became the first ADA in the history of the state to be sanctioned for prosecutorial misconduct.

But Filler wasn't done. He filed suit alleging civil rights violations by Kellett, Cavanaugh, various police officers involved in his criminal case and others. Kellett and Cavanaugh filed motions to dismiss his complaints and, on January 27th of this year, Federal Judge John Woodcock denied those motions, with minor exceptions.

The bottom line is this: the denial of a motion to dismiss in federal court means, for all practical purposes, that the case has enough merit to go to a jury. Anyone who knows the details of Mr. Filler's case knows that, if a jury hears the facts, Kellett, Cavanaugh and others are very likely to be found liable in damages to him. Put simply, they appear to have knowingly and intentionally violated his constitutional rights, various rules of discovery and evidence and possibly criminal laws in order to try to railroad him into prison. I can't see a jury liking that.

So Vladek Filler will finally have his day in court. He'll get the opportunity to make public the behavior of the Hancock County prosecutors when plainly false allegations of sexual assault are made in the course of divorce and child custody proceedings. The people of the State of Maine will be the beneficiaries of Filler's dauntless efforts to gain justice in both family and criminal courts.

Here is a copy of the decision issued by the court:

http://www.leagle.com/decision/In%20FDCO%2020160128E12/Filler%20v.%20Hancock%20County?utm_source=attorney_email&utm_medium=email&utm_term=ekst0Wdlit9UIBm7&utm_content=attid%3DjmVuxCeU2QJwAida&utm_campaign=attorney_email_M20160129&attn=TIMOTHY%20ZERILLO

The Empathy Gap – Fiamengo File Episode 4

AVfM Video Source · 1 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Janice Fiamengo discusses how cultures and the mainstream media value women radically more than men.

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

“Will you keep your son intact?”

Gary Costanza · 1 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is how to approach expecting parents about circumcision:

Obviously manipulated surveys are obvious

Greg Santos · 1 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I recently received a message on a Facebook page I administrate (hint, hint) that reeked of foul play.

The post linked to a post from "TheStranger," a site I had never heard of prior and therefor cannot make a judgement off of their website's past performance in the field of impartiality. The article, written by "Paul Constant", states

> Stephanie Zvan noticed that the Men's Rights subreddit is surveying themselves. The results are…well, they're exactly what you think Men's Rights "activists" would be

Confirmation bias: Check

Impartiality: X

The post linked to a survey of /r/mensrights, a left-libertarian leaning MRA subreddit. The article went on to claim that the 3,000 responses the survey received were indicative of MRAs being overwhelmingly (98%) Caucasian, aged 17-20, and 83% hardcore conservatives. It also claimed that MRAs are highly supportive of marijuana legalization (yes, because "hardcore conservatives" are well known for supporting legalized pot), and highly opposed to LGBT rights, abortion rights, and minimum wage increase.

Riight.

MRAs have always been largely active in South Asian countries, particularly India. One could make a solid argument that the majority of MRAs in the world are from India, and without a doubt represent more than a measly 2% of MRAs. That is, of course, not even accounting for black, mestizo (Latino), east asian, or middle eastern MRAs, who also make up a large portion of Men's Rights activists. While it is likely that whites make up the majority of the MRM, this shouldn't be surprising, considering much of the MRM is based in the USA, Canada, and Europe, predominately white regions.

Also, while I mean no disrespect towards the conservative leaning sections of the MRM, to say that they represent any majority of MRAs is a ridiculous claim. It seems that MRAs in general, much less the predominately left-leaning /r/mensrights/ aren't heavily socially conservative. However, this is all based off of anecdotal evidence, right? It doesn't debunk the survey, does it?

While the anecdotes may not debunk the survey, it seems that when the original list of respondants is viewed, manipulation of the survey becomes painfully obvious. Take for example, the hundreds of responses that entered the exact same information within seconds of eachother.

For this screenshot, I marked every response that was an exact clone of one posted within a few seconds of the last with a red check, and every non-clone response with a green X

As if it wasn't suspicious enough that 16 people who agreed with each other on every topic but one commented within a few seconds, it had to be followed up with an additional 12 people who agreed with each other on every single topic but one. However, this time the totally real individuals responding to the survey responded a little bit faster, taking under just one minute to cast their votes.

While I am limited to how many I can show at once, I remind you that you can go look at the results yourself here. If you need to be convinced.

As if the clearly visible poll rigging isn't bad enough, the article goes on to state:

> Speaking as someone who was once that age, no white man between the ages of 17 and 20 has ever said anything of value. (Comedian Rob Delaney put it best: "A male in their 20s? Run in the opposite direction. Nothing he says matters; his fears, his hopes his dreams are garbage. Men in their 20s are the worst thing happening on our planet.")

Self hating misandry: Check

The article closes on a very ironic note, accusing MRAs of being sociopaths who can't understand reality.

> The only shame of it is that we'll never get to see the moment when they realize that they spent the first few years of their adult lives building ornate castles out of bullshit. But those castles always fall; they simply can't withstand reality.

Am I in a Star Wars-Wizard of Oz crossover? Because I seem to be surrounded by projections and strawmen.

While accusing someone of not understanding reality, it's probably best to make sure the survey you used as a source is real.

Laird Wilcox and hate hoaxing part 1

Franc Hoggle · 1 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image "Pavilion VIII at the Lawn UVa 2010" by Karen Blaha on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-SA).

"Whenever an abstract ideal acquires the moral urgency that racial equality or opposition to "bigotry" has today, it's only a matter of time until we find individuals for whom the noble end justifies the questionable means. The militant, moralizing fanatic — quick to compromise important principles in order to enjoy the flush of righteousness — is the stumbling block which any reasonable resolution of racial/ethnic problems must overcome." — Laird Wilcox, Crying Wolf: Hate Crime Hoaxes in America

I really don't see how people like Kurds, Bahá'í orRohingya have the gall to whine so much about persecution in comparison to those who really suffer – the pudgy pink middle-class trust fund brat social justice warriors. Direct threats of physical violence, rape, murder, and even harsh language, have run into the hundreds of thousands, are a daily occurrence so common that bleeding keyboard fingers are no longer capable of blogging about them – and law enforcement's callous indifference, as usual, does NOTHING to assist the survivors… You only need to ask reputable serial victims like Brianna Wu.

Or so the SJW narrative goes – and gets mindlessly amplified by the fear and outrage dependent yellow journalism that passes for mainstream media. The sad result of this dereliction of responsibility by the Fourth Estate[1] is that most of the people out there who have not seen their communities undermined and corrupted by identity politic crusaders, or been directly attacked themselves, won't know any better without some serious effort and applied critical thought.

All of this (the free rein is given to SJWs to spout gibberish with impunity, free from all skepticism, scrutiny or responsibility and dogpiling and attack of any who dare to try, is what has brought about the present toxic environment,) one that is ripe for exploitation by intellectually and morally destitute narcissists that are leading the charge of the SJW brigade.

I only recently stumbled across the writings of LairdWilcox via fakehatecrimes.org where the full text of Crying Wolf is available for download and to be honest, am very surprised he is not better known. He identified the pox of the toxic culture warrior long before any of the commentators in the current resurgence of SJW stupidity[2]. To carry on directly from the opening quote at the start of this post –I'm going into full Oafy "CTRL-C / CTRL-V" Benson now. As Wilcox's writing is available for download at above link, "fair use" seems moot, and I will be quoting large chunks.

Further, in my experience, this uncompromising behavior is often a way of compensating for a hidden inner ambivalence. The social psychologist Harold D. Lasswell has written that "dogma is a defensive reaction in the mind of the theorist, but doubt of which he is unaware."

This unconscious ambivalence appears to explain the willingness of many so-called "anti-racists" to justify and practice a kind of reverse racism or "counter-bigotry." This manifests itself in the "good" discrimination of affirmative action and race-preferential policies, as well as in rationalizing prejudicial and stereotyping statements about white people.

Twenty years ago one couldn't have said this, but today discrimination in schools, housing, jobs and government is minimal. Institutional racism is virtually gone. In its place, a series of preferential policies are firmly established.

In recent years "anti-racists" have proclaimed that virtually every behavior and institution in our society is covertly racist. Anti-racism has become a small industry in the United States. Entire career fields are built around defining and combatting "racism" in one form or another. As individual problems are solved and offensive behaviors disappear, the definition of racism is broadened again and again to include more and more behaviors, hence we have the problem of "increasing" bigotry and intolerance. I suspect the last thing many professional anti-racists want is a truly race-neutral society. They have developed a vested interest in the continuation of the problem, a kind of "co-dependency" relationship if you will.

It's no great surprise that a bright, socially-conscious individual would realize quite on his or her own that there's nothing like some racist graffiti or some other "hate crime" to invigorate the militants, and what the hell, it's for a good cause – right? Americans are not known for their ability to defer gratification for long. Hence, the racist or anti-Semitic hoax. It's as easy as apple pie.

Consider a college campus boiling with racial and gender sensitivity, with courses in victimization, organizations for victims, a constant barrage of victimization propaganda — but no immediate and palpable victims. "Anti-racist" vigilantes with no racists (or misogynists and homophobes) to hang had better get busy and make some, and as we see, they often do.

What I see happening with hoaxes is a kind of "market" process: the frequency of hoaxes increases with their utility in accomplishing desired ends. When the "market" or payoff for victimization goes up, the temptation to create victimization where none exists is very strong, and the temptation of exaggerating minor cases of alleged victimization is even stronger.

This was written over 20 years ago, yet it is so eerily "now."

The conventional SJW response to a researcher such as Wilcox would be to brand him a [insert whatever is convenient]-ist. However, reality, as always, conspires to challenge such nonsense.

Wilcox has quite a résumé. His life's work is The Wilcox Collection Of Contemporary Political Movements which has turned 50 and is housed at the University of Kansas library. It is widely considered to be one of the greatest resources for the craziness that is modern American politicals. Beyond that, he has a long list of human rights, journalism, and free speech awards, and has been a card-carrying ACLU and Amnesty International for over 40 years.

In other words, Wilcox is an achiever – he does things humbly and quietly without the need for applause or Patreon parasitism, for the benefit of any that may have the need, contra the SJW drama queens for whom stepping out from behind a keyboard is just too much hard work. To brand Wilcox as anything less than a champion of civil liberties and egalitarian society would reek of the same worthless resentment that human failure peezee myers has for his infinite betters, Dawkins, and Hitch.

What follows below is taken from the same source and is pretty much Wilcox's check-list of red flags for the scenarios of the alleged "threats" (or attention seeking stunts) claimed to be received by the well-poisoners that have created a lucrative business model smearing and vilifying the subcultures of atheism, skepticism, gaming, tech, sci-fi, comics et al. with vulgar accusations of misogyny, rape culture, white male supremacism and worse without providing any kind of evidence of an acceptable standard – and silencing all criticism and scrutiny with equally evidence-free claims of harassment, threat and a plethora of other insinuations of criminality against those that may pose awkward questions.

TRAITS THAT SUGGEST THE COMMISSION OF A HOAX

What, if anything, distinguishes hoaxes and fabrications from real racist and anti-Semitic incidents? Police, federal, state and local agencies and college officials have observed certain "patterns" that tend to suggest a hoax might be afoot.

1. An incident that can't be corroborated by reasonable evidence or disinterested witnesses, or is accompanied by an account which contains inconsistencies, or when the alleged victim suddenly refuses to talk to police.

Often, alleged hate crimes are insufficiently supported by evidence or reliable witnesses. Upon examination, the statements of the victim may contain inconsistent or contradictory elements. When confronted with a lack of proof to support their claims, or with problems with their story, the victim may become angry or frightened and cease cooperating with authorities.

2. An incident that occurs just when it's "needed" to promote awareness or sensitivity to racism or anti-Semitism, to disarm critics and make them reluctant to "talk back."

Be particularly alert for hoaxes during appropriate holidays, birthdays, or on anniversaries of important events. Hoaxes may also occur following speeches by minority spokespersons, or at times when the issue of prejudice and discrimination is in the news. Also, hoaxes are more likely when claims by minorities are being questioned, as in controversies concerning black slavery or holocaust revisionism. The conveniently occurring incident should be carefully investigated.

3. Repeat incidents, especially with "difficult," resentful and easily offended individuals who frequently complain of disrespect, slights, insults or harassment.

Incidents directed at specific individuals are unusual. In some cases, hoaxers have been "followed" from one place or residence to another by hate crime perpetrators. Disturbed persons or attention seekers are frequently found among hoaxers. Bear in mind, however, that these individuals often create a "self-fulfilling prophecy" with their behavior and actually antagonize others to the point where they will retaliate in some manner.

4. An incident that is particularly skillfully exploited by the alleged victim to attain victim status, manipulates institutions, obtains concessions, special privileges, or money.

When the victims response to a hate crime is particularly skillful and articulate, or when supporters seem very well-organized and appear on the scene very quickly, it suggests some planning was afoot. Bona fide hate crimes are sometimes not reported for days after they occur. Hoaxes are almost always reported immediately.

Because of the possibility of civil damages in hate crime cases, it is likely that hoaxes of this nature will be increasing. Be alert in the event

5. Incidents which occur in improbable circumstances, such as racist graffiti in a mostly black dormitory or neighborhood, assaults that occurred in normally crowded areas with no witnesses, graffiti or vandalism in a room occupied only by the victim, and so on. Some hoaxes are surprisingly poorly planned. In several cases hoaxers had failed to dispose of incriminating evidence. The highly improbable case, where an actual hate crime would have been very difficult to pull off, is usually a hoax.
6. In the case of graffiti, carefully drawn symbols or slurs suggest that the author really wants to get a point across — precisely what is meant and the repulsive character of the persons behind it and this suggests a hoax.

Most bona fide incidents represent impulsive striking out, not careful planning. Generally speaking, the more elaborate the circumstances, the greater likelihood of a hoax. Cases where the damage is deliberate, meticulous and extensive should be cause for suspicion.

7. Another trait that suggests a hoax surfaced in several of the cases mentioned here. Here authorities suspect a hoax and this fact becomes known, the likelihood is enhanced somewhat when local antiracist and radical special interest groups defame and vilify doubters.

In fact, they may suspect it themselves.

Often the perpetrator will confide in others or even brag about the hoax. Persistent rumors of a hoax are often initially ignored because of "sensitivity" concerns, or because the principle players downplay the issue with threats and pleading.

8. Finally, several hoaxers have reported marking or symbols painted on their bodies by their alleged assailants. This rarely occurs in bona fide cases.

For reasons that are not clear, body markings on the victim by the alleged perpetrators are apparently a cause for suspicion. One theory is that the markings are intended to represent wounds. Another is that hoaxers are often self-absorbed individuals and the markings are narcissistic attention-getting devices.

9. Copycat hoaxes are likely to occur after an earlier, perhaps bona fide, incident has taken place that has aroused great publicity. A large number of similar incidents in a relatively short time very likely include some hoaxes. Often, some of the same people will be involved and the same symbols used for cases where the issue of lawsuits and damage amounts emerge early.

End of part 1. In part 2 of this article, the author will address the following question: how many of the above traits can be applied to our SJW victim frequent flyers?

Notes:

[1] – First real effort to remedy this malfeasance – SPJAirplay

[2] – Lest anyone think that what we are witnessing is somehow new, it's not. This idiocy is something that has always been here – it never fully goes away, only volume just varies. Previously, we've had the date rape crisis of the '80s (which was also the birth of the "1 in 4" codswallop), the feminist porn wars a decade earlier (the 2nd / 3rd wave schism) and, if we go way back, The Prohibition – a morality crusade to prevent vulnerable ladies from blossoming into loose women via the demon drink, driven by the much-glorified Suffragettes of the first wave who were also, surprise!, the core of The Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

[3] – ::cough:: In fact 20 years later, it is as though universities looked at Wilcox's advice, then threw together a think tank to work out whatever could possibly be done in diametric opposition and implement it.

This article was originally published under the title "TRAITS THAT SUGGEST THE COMMISSION OF A HOAX" – Laird Wilcox, 'Crying Wolf' (1994)" on grey lining.

West Point Cadet Acquitted of Sex Assault

Michael Conzachi · 3 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On Saturday, January 23, 2016, West Point Cadet Lukas Saul was acquitted of sexually assaulting a fellow cadet, with whom he had been in a dating relationship since their Plebe (1st) year at West Point. According to news reports, the incident(s) happened in 2012.

Lieutenant Colonel Chris Kasker, West Point's director of public affairs, said in a statement released following the verdict. "West Point takes all allegations very seriously, in this particular case, a court-martial was held to find the truth, and the panel has determined Cadet Saul is innocent of all charges. All the facts were presented in a full and open hearing and the issue was resolved in a manner consistent with military law and due process requirements." [1]

Saul had been on administrative leave since last August and did not graduate with his class last year while his accuser was allowed to graduate and has since been commissioned as a Second Lieutenant.

According to various news reports, Cadet Saul had been in a dating relationship with the accuser for approximately 17 months, and these incidents happened during the relationship.

Apparently, the accuser was upset as Cadet Saul began engaging in oral sex with her while they had been sleeping together, and she had told him to stop. Major Jenny Schlack, for the prosecution, described Saul as a Jekyll and Hyde type, with a darker side he showed behind closed doors.

We all remember Major Jenny Schlack. She was the former Fort Campbell JAG Defense Attorney, then turned prosecutor who was involved in the case of Major Christian "Kit" Martin. On July 13, 2015, Paul Elam gave an update on Major Martin's case including the efforts of the National Coalition for Men on his behalf. In a confidential manner and as a co-worker, Major Martin discussed his case with her. However, Major Jenny seemingly forgot to tell him that she was now a prosecutor. Correct me if I am wrong, but I think that is called; FRAUD.

In that post, a screenshot of a Facebook post by Major Jenny Schlack was captured and is contained in the article. Essentially Major Jenny took it upon herself to send a Facebook message to Senator Kristin Gillibrand; by far one of the most dangerous individuals for military males since Usama Bin Laden, where she complained about the railroading of military males for sexual assault.

facebook

Re: Gillibrand

I am in the army where arguably this stuff happens "all of the time."
But it isn't just women who endure comments about their bodies, etc. While I don't deny that gender inequality rears it's ugly head now and then, people say things that they shouldn't in a professional environment. Women aren't the victims. Hey- look at the bond comment below on this feed! Women want a "sexy bond" not an "old one!" God forbid a man say he prefers x type of female over y type. Wouldn't he just be a sexist jerk!!

Senator Gillibrand and her "efforts to give women a voice" in the military especially with regards to the sexual assault "problem" in the military has single handedly caused more gender divisiveness in the military than I have ever experienced in over 11 yrs of service. Men won't have professional discussions with me behind closed doors anymore. What!?!? That's, right Senator Gillibrand. Hear this...because of politicians like you...it is harder for me to do my job! Within the last 2 yrs have I felt , for the first time, different because I am a woman. Guess what...that isn't a man's fault. It is the fault of self-promoting, self interested, pretentious women like you. How about you be a real role model and stand up to men who do say offensive things to you. Instead you giggle like a school girl, shirk away and wrote a book? You are a coward.

And....what in the heck are your "efforts" doing to due process with regards to the accused in sexual assault cases? Someone please take an alternate position to this woman! She is an idiot.

I wish she'd just find another platform to pimp herself for a future presidential election. She represents everything hard-working women dislike about some of their female counterparts which is essentially framing their gender as a disability and then using it for their own benefit. It's disgusting.

As far as we know, Major Jenny has never been disciplined for this disrespectful message to a sitting U.S. Senator. Apparently, she is now a Special Victim Prosecutor at Fort Drum New York. On one hand she complains about the current witch hunt culture, on the other hand, she continues to push forward with the witch hunt.

Under cross-examination, Saul's Defense Attorney Gil Spencer got the accuser to admit; with a straight face, that she and Saul were in bed one night, having consensual sex. She said that they both fell asleep, and she woke in the night to find Saul was performing oral sex on her, and she asked him to stop. Apparently he didn't tap her on the shoulder to ask for permission first, and thus she concluded that he was guilty of "inappropriate" behavior. [2]

An attorney familiar with the case who wished to remain anonymous stated that the "word on the street" was that Saul's accuser made the allegations after he dumped her.

Saul testified in his defense and claimed that he was not in his accuser's hometown during the time that she made the allegation. He admitted to having oral sex with her but said it occurred a month earlier. One of Saul's defense attorneys; Larry Gwaltney sought to use social media messages exchanged by the two toward the end of that 69-day period to show she still appeared to be in love with Saul at that point. Prosecutors objected, saying it was hearsay evidence. [3]

Can you imagine that? Text messages proving, or, at least, showing that the accuser was still in love with Saul during the time the allegations, and the prosecution attempting to exclude those from evidence? Social media posts that prove innocence and the prosecution wants them suppressed??? WTF???

That little stunt flies in the face of West Point Spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Chris Kasker said in his carefully worded statement that the court-martial was convened to find the truth. There was no attempt to find the truth; the only thing that was done was to do everything and anything possible to convict.

Another thing. Why was it necessary for the defense attorney to introduce text message evidence? Shouldn't that have been done before the case went to court-martial? Why didn't the CID obtain that evidence as part of their investigative effort?

I'll tell you why. Because in today's day and age, the military has no desire to find the truth when it comes to allegations of sexual assault. Any investigation is done for the sole purpose to convict. Cadet Saul's case is not the first case where text messages proved his innocence and not the first case where the prosecution never attempted to get them in the first place. Why, because it is evidence of his innocence. The military is not interested in evidence of innocence; conviction heads on a platter is the mission.

Former Army JAG Attorney Kyle Fischer; now in private practice in Columbus Georgia discussed the issue of evidence in military sexual assault cases on the caaflog.com; in essence, the attempts by military prosecutors to prevent the truth from being brought forward in a court-martial.

"Another paradigm shift is that the Defense is more likely to be the one fighting to admit relevant evidence for the panel to see and hear, and the Government is now more likely to be fighting to keep it out. It is a complete role reversal in the search for the truth." [4]

Former Army JAG Special Victims Prosecutor Jocelyn Stewart; now in private practice in the State of Washington, who now specializes in defending military sexual assault cases, states that one of the reasons she left the service was due to the fact that she could see where this sexual assault issue was headed and stated that current climate; "scares me."

Former Air Force JAG Attorney Katie Cherkasky who was selected to be the first Air Force Special Victims' Counsel, now in private practice stated:

"In this position, I learned exactly the extent to which the military will go to destroy a person accused of sexual assault and protect at all costs the accusers, no matter how weak or obnoxious the facts of the case." [5]

Still not to be outdone, some military commanders have ordered accused soldiers NOT to conduct an investigation into their defense which extended to their attorneys, investigators and any others doing an investigative work or effort on their behalf.

Recently retired Army Lieutenant Colonel Jay Morse, a JAG attorney and head of the Special Victim Counsel program was accused of groping a female lawyer while attending a conference for Special Victim attorneys. The only problem was that she levied the accusation nearly three years after the incident.

When he learned of the accusation, LTC Morse retained legal counsel who then began an immediate investigation. He was called in before his commander and handed a "Cease and Desist" order preventing him and his legal team from conducting an investigation.

That issue was immediately brought before the Army Court of Appeals and in a swift, three-day turnaround, the appeals court ruled in his favor and ordered the illegal order invalid. Go to the link for the PDF document.

The website, Military Corruption dot com, who has "snitches" or insiders at virtually all military bases in the world, and has the ability to obtain information that few military blogs can get, eviscerated the accuser calling her "a fraudster" and "a lying bitch." They have called for the accuser to be court-martialed for violations of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to include, Article 107, Making a False Official Statement and Article 131, Perjury.

Apparently the accuser's lies were so blatant that even the uber-politically correct Army had to find Saul not guilty.

Let's hope the Army does the right thing and commissions Cadet Saul as a Second Lieutenant with all back pay and allowances, and allow him to proceed with his career. Even if that does happen, his career will forever be negatively affected; he will probably be released from the Army after serving his six-year obligation, and will forever have that stigma around his neck wherever he goes.

For military males; they are working in the most hostile work environment in the country. Not only do they have to worry about deployments, getting killed in a combat zone, they also risk being court-martialed, and spending 20-30 years in Leavenworth for dumping a vengeful girlfriend or asking for a divorce from an unfaithful wife.

The reality is that once a military male is accused, there is no attempt by investigators and prosecutors to find the truth. Once the accusation is levied, that is all that is needed to launch an all-out effort to get a conviction by any means necessary. Coaching accusers to lie is the norm and suppression of evidence of innocence is the norm.

These travesties of military justice are primarily at the hands of Senators Gillibrand, Ayotte, and McCaskill. I hope these senators and others who facilitate such travesties are happy. These senators and others in Congress have turned the military justice system involving allegations of sexual assault into a "kangaroo" court, just like we have seen on our college campuses with the Department of Education's "Dear Colleague" letter.

Look what a fantastic success that has been. NOT!!!

In the case of Cadet Lukas Saul, the unquenchable thirst for conviction blood has terrified another innocent young man, cost him tens of thousands of dollars, and put a label around his neck forever. If he ever does receive his commission, he will be stigmatized, be given bad evaluation reports, will be denied training assignments and duty stations, and likely will never be able to retire due to the cutbacks. And he was ACQUITTED!

I would ask that these senators; if that is what you would call them, would take the suggestion of what Military Corruption dot com is asking for, and demand an investigation and court-martial of Cadet Saul's lying accuser, kick her out of the Army, and make her reimburse Cadet Saul and the taxpayers for this waste.

Yeah right. That will happen as soon as monkeys start flying out of my ass.

I highly recommend that military males reading this post, go to the links and see that there are some exceptional attorneys out there, and many are just as exasperated as many others, at the level of lunacy in the U.S. Military, and their handling of sexual assault cases. Military males need to educate themselves about the dangers they face, and the cold hard reality that if they are accused, their lives and their family and friend's lives will forever be affected. It is a virtual certainty that if a military male is accused, facts and truth be damned, he is going to court-martial.

What are we doing to our military? The cutbacks, the weakening, the social engineering, the evisceration of morale, the absurd rules of engagement that are getting our troops killed, the lowering of standards to force women into combat positions, the VA scandal, and the lunacy of sexual assault persecutions when they are not warranted.

Where are our elected leaders on this issue? They need to read this post and have their staffers conduct some research on the reality of what is going on at our military bases. Our elected leaders can no longer turn their backs on this issue for fear of being labeled anti-woman. Our elected leaders need to crawl out from under their desks on this issue and grow a pair. Our cowardly compliant military commanders who facilitate this false narrative need to leave. The military prosecutors pushing for convictions when the facts are absent need to surrender their law licenses, and the general public and especially our military males; and yes, some females need to educate themselves.

This should be a NATIONAL OUTRAGE!

References/Links:

[1] West Point cadet acquitted of sexual assault | ucmjdefense.com (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.ucmjdefense.com/west-point-cadet-acquitted-of-sexual-assault.html

[2] MIRACLE ON THE HUDSON | militarycorruption.com (n.d.) Retrieved from http://www.militarycorruption.com/lukassaul.htm

[3] Cadet denies sex assault claims – News – recordonline.com … (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.recordonline.com/article/20160121/NEWS/160129835/101029/NEWS">http://www.recordonline.com/article/20160121/NEWS/160129835/101029/NEWS

[4] CAAFlog » Military justice provisions in the draft FY16 NDAA. (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.caaflog.com/2015/06/30/military-justice-provisions-in-the-draft-fy16-ndaa/

[5] Katie Cherkasky Biography | Your Best Military Defense Lawyer. (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.bestmilitarydefense.com/biographies/katie-cherkasky-biography/

http://www.mercurynews.com/ci_29410391/accuser-says-she-told-west-point-cadet-sex

http://www.mercurynews.com/ci_29410391/accuser-says-she-told-west-point-cadet-sex

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/update-u-s-army-major-kit-martin-case-ncfm-efforts

-prompt-dod-investigation/http://www.ucmj-defender.com/

http://ncfm.org/2015/12/news/politicians-federal/ncfm-asks-dod-inspector-general-for-referral-to-u-s-attorney-general-for-criminal-probe-of-jag-prosecutors-in-the-case-of-u-s-army-major-christian-kit-martin-then-theres-the-tri/http://bobmccarty.com/category/military-justice/major-kit-martin/

http://www.caaflog.com/wp-content/uploads/LTC-Morse-v.-LTC-Biehl-and-COL-Agar-writ-of-prohibition.pdf

Dean Esmay interview on 4 Men in crisis

AVfM Video Source · 3 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

With 4 Men To Hell And Back: Dean Esmay on MHRM Activism That Touched Real Lives.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CYi1S1hivv8&feature=youtu.be

For more videos like this please subscribe to Mankind Global Media Network

Laird Wilcox and hate hoaxing part 2

Franc Hoggle · 3 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is part two of a two-part series. If you have not read the first part it can be found (here).

Now the question that needs to be asked – particularly by those with sympathetic ears, Pollyanna naiveté and wallets that are readily siphoned via Patreon – is how many of the above traits can be applied to our SJW victim frequent flyers? To the worst of the worst? Rebecca Watson, Anita Sarkeesian, Chelsea Van Valkenburg (aka Zoe Quinn), John Flynt (aka Brianna Wu), Emma "mattress girl" Sulkowicz, Jackie Coakley / Sabrina Erdely, Melody "PTSD" Hensleyand a never ending list of others. Ask yourselves – for once with a clear and fiercely enquiring mind.

The blunt reality is that the "threats" barfed up by these charlatans rarely, if ever, are anything more than opportunistic, juvenile drive-by trolls that any grown-up with a functional intellect would spot, and dismiss, in a second. And if you go through Wilcox's checklist, rarely, if ever, do any have corroboration beyond hearsay or friend-of-a-friend anecdote; their timing is often questionable, particularly with Sarkeesian where they tend to coincide with a video release or public engagement; there are never any "one off" events, all turn serial; all are exploited for either self-promotion or e-begging…

And then there's the really curly question. What of the response, or lack thereof, from law enforcement to the mass of reports that these social justice warriors claim to keep making?

The targets of anti-Semites and racists from the era of Wilcox's original study would have had to resort to making complaints the old fashioned analogue way: face-to-face and with a fully documented, hand written physical paper trail. Similarly, communicating these police reports to the greater public was also constrained by the analogue process, reliant entirely on gaining the attention of journalists once reports were made, the journalists recording statements or hand writing notes and then conveying news of the reports to print, radio or televised media – publicising the hate act is, after all, the name of the game. A slow, manual process – but one that is pretty difficult to falsify. Whether the report is based on fact or imagination doesn't matter – the existence of the report, assuming it was made, is not something that can be concealed with any degree of ease.

Contrast that with the environment of today's SJW – a world of social media and instant gratification. Hate acts can go from the instant they are perpetrated / conceived to a broadcast audience of potentially millions in a matter of seconds – entirely bypassing all the interim steps and hurdles that the oppressed in the dismal analogue world had to go through. A process only limited by fibre optics and router switching speed. Fast, automated – and one where verification is not only close to an impossibility, but dismissed as entirely unnecessary, or even damaging to the originator of the complaint. Just listen and believe…

So, the situation is this – after nearly a decade of psychodramatics from the current generation of SJWs there are supposedly thousands of reports made to law enforcement about what are, again supposedly, "genuine" threats. How many have actually been verified and followed up?

That's right – zero. Nil. Nada. Zilch. There is one partially plausible case, that of Brazilian click-bait blogger Mateus Prado Sousa who tweeted a bunch of threating tweets to Anita Sarkeesian – but the irony here is delicious. He was not exposed by law enforcement or any of Sarkeesian's hordes of online white knights. He was actually tracked down by the unwashed, neck-bearded basement dwellers of #gamergate… Of course you won't find any SJWs crowing about that success story.

Conversely, the false reporting and law enforcement blaming by SJWs is more clear cut, most blatantly by the loudest and most deranged of their shrieking harpies, Brianna Wu –

The office of Ron O'Brien, prosecuting attorney for Columbus, Ohio, was deluged with emails and phonecalls that "wasted time and resources" following an online campaign whipped up by Brianna Wu, a controversial video game developer.

Wu published a widely-shared article on The Mary Sue, a feminist news source, attacking the attorney for not taking her concerns about online death threats seriously. But in a tersely-worded email seen byBreitbart, the Attorney's office said that Wu failed to file a report with their office before publishing her article.

After receiving a threatening, anonymous phone call, Wu took to the pages of The Mary Sue to complain that despite 'meticulously documenting threats for law enforcement', the Ohio attorney had yet to take any action. She also confirmed to Ars Technica that she had been in contact with both the attorneys office and the FBI, complaining that it was 'radio silence from them'. Cory Doctorow, editor of the online blog Boing Boing, also claimed that Wu was trying to 'shame' the attorney into action after 'furnish[ing] the authorities with the graphic death threats she received'.

http://www.breitbart.com/london/2015/05/23/ohio-attorney-brianna-wu-wasted-time-and-resources-over-gamergate/

Again, of course, you won't find any SJWs ruminating about what was a clear display of neurotic, attention seeking irresponsibility and an epic fail. Nor any of the mainstream media outlets that time and time again gave Wu print space and airplay to hyperventilate from its deluded little fantasy bubble. As always, anything that shows the reality of exactly how fucked up SJW land is gets quietly dropped and swept under the rug.

But otherwise, as far as law enforcement response to "hate" acts goes there are only two real explanations –

The first is that law enforcement is actually derelict in its duty of care to protect the community they are charged with responsibility for. If that is genuinely the case, then it is an issue at least as important as the alleged "hate" acts themselves. If law enforcement is not investigating and prosecuting these cases, then publicising that fact and getting remedial action from government bodies responsible for the justice system should be elevated to the status of absolute highest priority. Why has there not been a single peep on this subject from anywhere in planet SJW? I mean the reports are real aren't they? The people claiming there has been no response to the hate complaints are telling the truth aren't they? Aren't they?

Or… if that's not the case, then the only other option is that the SJWs are lying through their fucking teeth, if not outright fabricating alleged "hate crimes" purely for the tawdry headline seeking narcissism of what has been the greatest attention whoring exercise on earth.

The tide is slowly turning. The SJWs and the media outlets may believe in their own bullshit, but the general public is slowly waking up and seeing reality for what it is. They are like the sea eroding a cliff face. The process is slow, almost imperceptible. But it is not reversible. Each person that finally realises the counterfeit reality they've been fed will never be quite as trusting ever again. They are lost forever.

I'll let Laird Wilcox offer his own conclusions –

CONCLUSION

The information I have pulled together in this report is, in my opinion, merely the tip of the iceberg. The hoaxes I have recounted are, with a few exceptions, publicly discovered and publicly reported hoaxes. Countless more hoaxes, undiscovered and unreported, have undoubtedly also occurred.

I see no hard evidence of an organized conspiracy to commit racial and anti-Semitic hoaxes. Everything points to individuals, or small groups of individuals, as the perpetrators of hoaxes. The usefulness of hoaxes is so obvious to potential hoaxers that a conspiracy is not required to explain the large number of hoaxes or their similarities.

On the other hand, there appears to be an effort to discourage media attention to hoaxes, although this is often not successful. It appears that some hoaxes are "spiked" at the outset and others are soft-peddled once their nature is established.

Why do people commit hoaxes? There are three main reasons. The first has to do with the personal payoff for victimization, i.e., attention, sympathy, a sense of importance, feeding persecution fantasies, and material payoffs. The second has to do with advancing a political or social agenda, as in the case of hoaxes intending to create support for regulations or legislation, or to help create a, climate sympathetic to specific interest groups. The third has to do with insurance fraud, with the racial or anti-Semitic element almost an afterthought. Most hoaxes are combinations of the first two types.

Carefully done, the risk of discovery of a hoax is minimal. Most hoaxes simply remain "unsolved" hate crimes. Those that are discovered may not result in criminal action against the hoaxers. When criminal charges are filed they can have wide ranging consequences, from long prison terms in some cases to a slap on the wrist on others, with most cases tending toward the latter.

What can be done about hoaxes? Probably very little as long as victimization claims are so uncritically accepted, and the payoff for alleged victimization is sufficiently tempting and rewarding. "Hate crime" legislation, although well-intentioned, has created a powerful market for the side benefits of alleged hate crimes. When these crimes are not naturally occurring, or are not occurring in sufficient numbers, a motive to commit hoaxes is created. Provisions in hate crime legislation for civil damages also creates a powerful motive to commit hoaxes.

Vigilance in discovering hoaxes and appropriate publicity may discourage some potential hoaxers. Punishment for hoaxes equal to bona fide hate crimes, including sentence enhancement, would probably have a greater deterrent effect, but would also perpetuate the injustices inherent in the hate crime concept itself.

Probably the most effective thing would be for universities, police agencies and the media to entertain a healthy skepticism about hate crime claims, and to establish a category of "not proven" in cases where no perpetrator is identified and charged[3]. Any unsolved case may be a hoax, including those intuitively thought to be bonas fide.

Finally, on a personal note, I think it's important to bear in mind that human beings are fallible creatures who make mistakes, often not realizing the consequences of their actions. The older I get the more forgiving I become, and the more aware I am of the harm done by "righteous indignation," fanaticism and vengefulness in the pursuit of "justice." A little slack and a little forgiveness all the way around wouldn't hurt, either. It's going to take that if we're all going to get along in this world together.

— Laird Wilcox, July 1994

[1] – First real effort to remedy this malfeasance – SPJAirplay

[2] – Lest anyone think that what we are witnessing is somehow new, it's not. This idiocy is something that has always been here – it never fully goes away, only volume just varies. Previously, we've had the date rape crisis of the '80s (which was also the birth of the "1 in 4" codswallop), the feminist porn wars a decade earlier (the 2nd / 3rd wave schism) and, if we go way back, The Prohibition – a morality crusade to prevent vulnerable ladies from blossoming into loose women via the demon drink, driven by the much glorified Suffragettes of the first wave who were also, surprise!, the core of The Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

[3] – ::cough:: In fact 20 years later, it is as though universities looked at Wilcox's advice, then threw together a thinktank to work out whatever could possibly be done in diametric opposition and implement it.

This article was originally published under the title "TRAITS THAT SUGGEST THE COMMISSION OF A HOAX" – Laird Wilcox, 'Crying Wolf' (1994)" on grey lining.

Media creates phony narrative to dub RooshV an “MRA” #GamerGate #ReturnOfKings #MRA #MRAs

Dean Esmay · 4 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Those who remember the #GamerGate hashtag will remember how the media clearly, and undeniably, colluded to craft a narrative that “Gamers are dead” about video game players. A consumer revolt fought back, and proved that this was a corrupt, phony narrative created to protect powerful people.

If you think this only happens in games media, you’re mistaken. Games media was just one little corner of the media universe where corrupt, colluding journalists craft lies about other people. It’s not just Men’s Rights Activists (MRAs) to which they do this, but they’ve certainly been doing it for years to us. We have never, however, seen quite such a coordinated media push in so many outlets to do this all at once.

The media has decided that confessed rapist RooshV is an MRA. He is not. He is a snake oil salesman peddling bad advice to confused men to pollute their bodies with dangerous barely-legal hormones and other dodgy supplements, along with equally bad advice on health, exercise, and women. He is not an MRA.

Con artist RooshV and his bizarre cult of followers call their pseudoscientific advice “NeoMasculinty” and, most important of all, they hate and ridicule MRAs. That’s right, RooshV is an anti-MRA. He often even claims MRAs are “attacking” him when they aren’t, although these days it’s probably best that MRAs pretty much do attack him and his sycophantic deluded cult followers whenever possible.

For a while there was a quiet peace between MRAs and the Return of Kings rape fetishists, however, recently RooshV began not only dishonestly attacking MRAs, but has pulled the unintended trick of *becoming a media darling as an MRA.

No kidding. Even though he denies being an MRA, even though he and his lowlife fans hate MRAs, and even though MRAs have made it clear they we are nothing alike (we do not “distance ourselves” from him, we utterly reject any notion he was ever an MRA) the media wants the world to believe he is an MRA.

To be clear, every MRA I know does actually support RooshV’s right to speak and be heard. And every MRA I know views him as a crackpot, a loon, a con artist and snake oil salesman, and a self-serving liar and weasel who likely lies about most of the rape fantasy sexcapade books he sells, which appear to be little but bad “50 Shades for Dudes” slash fiction.

MRAs, in general, do not object to Roosh’s freedom of speech. We support the free speech of communists, fascists, feminists and other criminals too. We just don’t accept him as one of our own–and that’s something he decided as much as any of us did.

But the media wants you to believe he’s a typical MRA. Now, why is that do you suppose?

Here is the current list of MSM publications TV stations and radio stations who’ve lied to their readers and dubbed Rooshv an MRA. IF you have time you might want to let the general public know that these publications lie, and run phony, planted, obviously coordinated stories to suit their own political agenda and not just Roosh’s (although we know the slimeball is laughing all the way to the bank):

Roosh:

http://chicagoist.com/2016/02/02/mens_rights_activists_will_meet_fur.php http://chicagoist.com/2016/02/04/mens_rights_meetups_cancelled_in_ch.php http://www.snopes.com/roosh-v-43-countries/

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3427647/The-seedy-code-followers-pro-rape-pick-artist-Daryush-Valizadeh-known-Roosh-V-use-accepted-Australian-meetings.html http://wgnradio.com/2016/02/03/pro-rape-mens-rights-group-to-meet-in-rogers-park/http://www.tennessean.com/story/news/local/wilson/mt-juliet/2016/02/03/mt-juliet-police-prepare-return-kings-rally/79784050/http://kutv.com/news/local/pro-rape-group-holds-international-private-meetup-with-two-locations-in-utah http://www.foxcarolina.com/story/31133971/meeting-at-upstate-park-has-police-on-alert http://theminaretonline.com/2016/02/03/pro-rape-group-to-hold-meeting-in-curtis-hixon-park/http://m.news8000.com/prorape-blogger-organizes-meetings-for-followers-including-la-crosse-location/37802940

http://www.thegatewaypundit.com/2016/02/334627/

http://www.her.ie/life/notorious-mens-rights-group-to-hold-a-meeting-in-ireland-this-weekend/276997

http://theunaustralian.net/2016/02/03/mens-rights-activist-threatens-to-enter-australia-against-its-consent/https://leftfootforward.org/2016/02/what-roosh-v-advocates-is-nothing-to-do-with-mens-rights/

http://m.newsok.com/article/5476584

http://m.winnipegsun.com/2016/02/02/mayor-denounces-neomasculinity-group-set-to-meet-in-winnipeg https://thetab.com/us/michigan/2016/02/03/return-kings-international-meetup-day-include-ann-arbor-793 http://www.thefrisky.com/2016-02-01/legal-rape-promoting-misogynists-to-hold-worldwide-meet-ups-this-saturday/http://www.complex.com/life/2016/02/trash-man-roosh-v-legalize-rape-blogger-hosting-international-meetups http://dallas.suntimes.com/dal-entertainment/7/75/226766/womens-rights-advocate-greg-abbott-comes-out-against-mens-rights-rally https://bangordailynews.com/2016/02/03/news/bangor/mens-group-condemned-as-hateful-cancels-bangor-meetup/

http://www.kcrg.com/content/news/Pro-Rape-Advocate-Cancels-Planned-Meeting-in-Cedar-Rapids-367603651.html

http://weldbham.com/blog/2016/02/03/pro-rape-organization-to-hold-meeting-in-homewood/http://www.pennlive.com/news/2016/02/no_theres_a_not_a_make_rape_le.html

http://m.brisbanetimes.com.au/queensland/neomasculinity-supporters-to-gather-in-brisbane-20160201-gmiyer.html

http://m.chicagoreader.com/Bleader/archives/2016/02/03/mens-rights-activists-plan-controversial-rally-in-rogers-park-tv-shows-and-movies-keep-flocking-to-chicago-and-other-chicago-news

http://m.businessinsider.in/Parliament-just-debated-whether-to-ban-Roosh-V-the-Return-of-Kings-founder-who-suggested-rape-should-be-made-legal-on-private-property-from-entering-the-country/articleshow/50853518.cms http://m.huffpost.com/ca/entry/9158506

http://www.dailydot.com/lifestyle/roosh-mens-rights-activsts-meetups/

https://www.dnainfo.com/chicago/20160203/rogers-park/update-pro-rape-mens-rights-group-cancels-chicago-meetup http://canmua.net/world/roosh-vreturn-of-kings-parliament-debate-384273.html http://www.salon.com/topic/return_of_kings/http://www.wftv.com/news/national-content/roosh-v-cancels-socalled-mens-rights-events-after-rape-concerns-emer ge/61048498

http://guidetravel.biz/canada/mens-rights-activist-cancels-global-meetups-cites-safety-concerns-104580.html

http://www.kvue.com/story/news/crime/2016/02/03/mens-rights-group-cancels-austin-meet-up/79800724/http://www.secondcity.com/network/snag-a-mens-rights-activist-bae-if-i-dont-snatch-them-all-up-first/https://www.slantnews.com/story/2016-02-03-this-pro-rape-blog-return-of-kings-is-trying-to-organize-a-rally http://reportca.net/2016/02/mens-rights-activist-cancels-global-meetups-cites-safety-concerns/

http://www.democraticunderground.com/10027584689

http://www.forensic-news.com/legal-rape-advocates-cancel-pro-men-meet-ups-for-fear-of-their-safety/http://www.khou.com/story/news/local/2016/02/04/controversial-mens-rights-activists-meetings-cancelled/79802626/

http://www.buzzfeed.com/robstott/these-legal-rape-advocates-cancelled-their-plans-because-the#.uhZKPBRX2

http://www.wsmv.com/story/31133762/mens-rights-group-cancels-rallies-in-nashville-mt-juliet http://m.koco.com/news/prorape-blogger-plans-gatherings-across-us-including-okc/37803554 http://www.actionnewsjax.com/news/national-content/roosh-v-cancels-socalled-mens-rights-events-after-rape-concerns-emerge/61050315

http://www.desmoinesregister.com/story/news/2016/02/04/neomasculinity-meetups-canceled-after-police-warnings/79766030/

http://wwmt.com/news/nation-world/rallies-for-neo-masculinist-movement-canceled http://www.lasvegasnow.com/news/bloggers-legalize-rape-rally-canceled

http://m.wisn.com/news/controversial-bloggers-meetup-event-canceled/37810394 http://www.konbini.com/us/lifestyle/legal-rape-advocate-roosh-canceled-worldwide-meet-up/http://www.dailycamera.com/news/boulder/ci_29471589/police-mens-rights-meetup-planned-boulder-park-may http://patch.com/california/studiocity/pro-rape-mens-groups-plans-meeting-los-angeles http://m.myinforms.com/en/a/23470003-controversial-rogers-park-meetup-canceled/http://loyolastudentdispatch.com/2016/02/04/mens-right-movement-meeting-cancelled/http://pureanarchy.net/these-legal-rape-advocates-canceled-their-plans-because-they-didnt-feel-safe/

http://www.readingeagle.com/ap/article/group-with-pro-rape-postings-cancels-meetups-after-condemnations&template=mobileart

False allegations – the issue that cuts through camps

Lucian Vâlsan · 5 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As the migration crisis in Europe unfolds, every sector of the society has something to say. Some of them make some sense, others make no sense whatsoever.

There are however two disrupting factors in this: government censorship and false allegations. And the two pretty much create each other.

When you are at a point when your house can be raided by the police for the crime of expressing politically incorrect opinions online, it becomes an act of bravery to express even more politically incorrect opinions, whether they're right or wrong.

It's part of the human nature: What's forbidden tends to usually become attractive in the minds of many (perhaps most) people. We didn't listen to Radio Free Europe back in Communism because we absolutely loved their programme. In fact, half of it was actually quite bad. But because it was forbidden, we wanted to listen more of it.

When talking about an issue becomes forbidden, it creates the right amount of incentives for downright mythology to emerge. And the current crisis unfolding in Europe (particularly in Germany) is no exception to this rule.

Case in point is the case of the 13 year old Russian girl who told everyone that she was kidnapped at a subway station in Berlin and taken to a house where she was gang-raped by three men "from southern countries" and then released her after 30 hours in captivity.

The only problem is that the three men don't seem to exist. Nor is there any evidence whatsoever that "Lisa F." (as the 13 year old was referred to in the German media) was physically abused in any way (sexually or otherwise).

There is however ample evidence that she was in trouble at school and, fearing disciplinary measures from her family, she ran away from home, lived at a friend's house for a couple of days and then needed a convincing story to make up for the time she had been missing.

These facts didn't stop the Moscow authorities to accuse Germany, through the voice of Russia's Minister for External Affairs, Sergei Lavrov, of nothing less than a politically motivated cover-up.

"It's clear that the girl did not disappear voluntarily for 30 hours," sounded the cry from Moscow, in spite of the fact that it is indeed very clear that the girl did in fact disappear voluntarily for 30 hours.

This is not the first, nor the last such case during this crisis. In fact, considering the level of inflammation of the public opinion these days, more such cases are to be expected. All the incentives are in place to encourage more of this, for both camps succumb to emotionally-driven lines of thought.

Those of the unconstrained vision[1] will keep on insisting that no crime whatsoever, not even the very obvious increases in crime rates, have anything to do with the recent migration wave.

Those of a more constrained persuasion[2] will take this obliviousness of the former to forward the case that most (if not all) of the increases in crime rates have everything to do with the recent migration wave.

False allegations cut right through both types of persuasions as they compel those with an unconstrained vision to re-think their position that maybe, just maybe, reality is a bit more complicated and that human beings aren't exactly perfect.

False allegations also compel those of a more constrained persuasion to re-think their position and understand that maybe, just maybe, the dichotomy victim-perpetrator plays out in a slightly more complex manner in real world and it's not always the migrant that is the perpetrator of appalling violence against the nice little young girls. Sometimes it's old women sexually exploiting young migrant boys.

Sadly, vast segments of the non-feminist sector have been disappointing, rushing to score political points against the feminist sector on the “rape culture” topic.

As fun as it may be to point out the disdainful utter hypocrisy of the feminist sector when it comes to real sexual crimes against women whose perpetrators just happen to break the racist narrative of mainstream feminism, one should resist doing so for the simple reason that forwarding a gynocentric worldview is still undesirable, even if it makes feminism look bad. This would be in addition to the reason stated in the title: by succumbing to the “look – here’s a real rape culture” narrative, one risks enabling the punishment of innocents and incentivizing more false accusers.

In other words, everyone loses.

False accusations matter. And they matter even when certain situations may put one in the position of appearing to defend the position of the “other”.

False accusations are wrong as a matter of principle. And if principles don’t matter, then we should all just pack up and go home – for it is pointless to continue to talk from an unprincipled standpoint.

References:

[1] The term is used in reference to Thomas Sowell’s characterization in the book A conflict of visions. Those subscribing to the unconstrained vision of mankind tend to believe that man is perfect and that all issues emerge from the institutions. In other words, the unconstrained vision insists that if only we get the right people in the right institutions, progress and even utopia would emerge.

[2] Conversely, the constrained vision purports that man is fundamentally flawed and, as a consequence, the question is how to erect institutions in such a way that the flaws are kept in check or channeled in ways that don’t harm others while maintaining the maximum amount of freedom.

Video of Dr. Kevin M. Windisch mutilating an unconsenting infant

Gary Costanza · 5 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Kevin M. Windisch of Sparks, Nevada has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Here's a sample of comments about Dr. Windisch and what he does:

"I called this doctor's office after viewing this video and was told that the doctor did this circumcision on his own son. I told them that he should be put in jail for the sexual assault of his child, and that he was no different from the people in Africa who genitally mutilate their daughters.

He doesn't know the harm he did to this baby, because this was probably was done to him and he doesn't know what the foreskin is for. Those who were sexually abused as children are at increased risk of becoming sexual abusers. It's true in his case.

For all the degrees he earned, he failed to get a degree in compassion, love for his child, and basic common decency and respect for the rights of children. And this man is a pediatrician! God help us all with doctors like this."

-Anonymous, from drmomma.org

Doctor Windisch, someone who is entrusted to help and heal, is shown here circumcising "Ben" with all the ethics and compassion of an axe-murderer. Caution, those with humanity may consider this brutal and horrific:

https://youtu.be/bXVFFI76ff0

From Dr. Windisch's website sparkspeds.com:

> Dr. Windisch is a Board Certified General Pediatrician. He has been practicing in the Northern Nevada Area since 1999. He is an Adjunct Professor of Pediatrics at the University of Nevada School of Medicine, UNR School of Nursing, UNLV School of Nursing, Samuel Merrit University and Graceland University. Dr. Windisch is also a certified CPR instructor.
>
> Areas of professional interest include the management of Autism, the management of Cerebral Palsy and Adolescent Medicine.
>
> Dr. Windisch enjoys photography, water skiing, snow skiing and is a certified SCUBA instructor.

It seems that people that do horrible things also do things that are harmless to others. What doesn't fit:

photography, managing diseases, mutilating an infant without consent?

Maybe I was wrong in comparing Dr. Windisch to an axe-murderer. Like other circumcisers, he doesn't seek to kill his victims (although some do die) he just wants to kill:

- the human right to genital integrity
- the human right to a natural sex life
- the human right to refuse unnecessary surgery
- the human right to refuse sexual abuse

Also, axe-murderers don't:

- require payment from their victims
- sell the resulting body parts

Let's call them molesting-scalpel-mutilators who shake down their victims and sell their organs.

Check out Dr. Windisch's video library where you can see various videos from hypnosis to circumcision.

Despite his website and all his videos, Dr. Windisch provides no risk and complication information about circumcision. You can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Windisch's practice information follows:

975 Roberta Lane #101B
Sparks NV 89431

Phone Number: (775) 359-7111
Fax (775) 359-7114

> Video of Dr. Kevin M. Windisch mutilating an unconsenting infant https://t.co/BtNswRiLjw #nocirc #intactivism #MGM pic.twitter.com/1uQil7MmPZ
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 8, 2016

Rabid feminist thoughtcrime police assault the Oxford English Dictionary

August Løvenskiolds · 5 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Buoyed by their utterly failed quest to get people to stop calling them bossy, feminists have identified a new verbal microaggression – the word rabid, as in rabid feminist. Feminists took their rabid campaign to the citadels of the Oxford English Dictionary, where, after brief volley of illogic and butthurt, the lexicographers surrendered, as if English were somehow French.

The Washington Post, in their confused and slanted article on this tempest, implied actress Meryl Streep was a feminist (she identifies as a humanist and not feminist) and asserted that "rabid" gives "feminist" a negative connotation when in fact it is "feminist" that denigrates "rabid."

Huffpo Canada noted that the OED eventually caved on the issue.

In fairness, the rabies vaccination I received in 1994 allows me to view these terms more objectively than any jejune WaPo or HuffPo reporter.

Youtuber Teal Deer (TL;DR) had a nice video summarizing the imbroglio but a rabid hater had it taken down. After some tweaks, TL;DR uploaded a more thorough version.

Feminists, of course, have an abusive and tortured record with dictionaries: they use the literal definition of feminism to abusively coerce opponents to buy into the misandry of "#KillAllMen," and they torture the definition of sexism so that they can act as sexist as they please without letting that particular word be used to characterize their man-hating behaviors.

The chatty lexicographers in the once fictional novel 1984 were responsible not for documenting language, but rather, razing it: they laboriously tracked down problematic ideas and terms and merged them into the catchall "thoughtcrime" – they had the disagreeable task to take the language they loved, and slowly destroy it to further the hegemony of the state over even a person's most private ruminations. As a result, those fictional lexicographers met a mysterious and horrific demise.

In an identical way, their contemporary counterparts are taking the first faltering steps to the precipice: they were once the Counts of Dictionaries, and soon they will be remembered as the collaborators of feminist cunts and dicks.

However, if these beleaguered scriveners can rediscover a Churchillian defiance to the feminist thought police, that juggernaut can still be trumped. To that end, you febrile Clarks, I offer you the chance to augment your venerable tome with some neologisms designed to encapsulate the nuances of the feminist hordes into a useful taxonomy, vexing them so they can fret over it for decades.

In other words, I'm going to note or create some new words to describe feminists to expose their lies and piss them off.

Choice feminism – a branch of feminism concerned with affirmatively sanctioning all decisions a woman might make, especially those that contravene feminist theory by reinforcing gender stereotypes such as motherhood, hearth, or childcare. Choice feminists generally reject the idea that certain things like movies can be feminist in nature since such a characterization might inadvertently dissuade some women's life choices.

Prime feminism – a branch of feminism concerned with dissuading or forbidding women from certain life choices that reflect traditionally feminine pursuits. For example, a feminist who asserts that a female character is acting in distinctly feminist ways is a prime feminist. Prime feminists may variously oppose shaving below the neck, childbirth, nursing, beautification regimes, compassion for men and children, and so on. Prime feminists, like prime beef, are more highly marbled than other grades.

Select feminism – an inferior branch of feminism that waffles between choice feminism and prime feminism, is trashed by both, and yet manages to emulate neither.

Feminist leader – a nearly extinct or mythical creature, often nominally human, who would, in theory, advance feminism in a coherent and effective way. According to a new feminist poll reported by the Washington Post:

> While there was never much question as to who were the prominent faces of the Second Wave — Friedan and Gloria Steinem among them — the new feminism is largely leaderless and faceless. Asked to name a figure who represents feminism, for example, 58 percent of participants in last summer's Post-Kaiser poll chose "no one" or offered no opinion. Only Hillary Clinton, named by 22 percent of the public, was cited by more than 3 percent of those taking the poll.

That people see Mrs. Clinton as the brightest anodyne star of feminism does not bode well for the future of that movement.

Faux feminism – the branch of feminism that departs from gender equality in favor of supporting special women's privileges up to and including female superiority. Feminists who support abortion rights for women only, default child custody for women, mandatory child support for men, circumcision for men, male-only mandatory Selective Service, and so on, are faux feminists.

Coulrohirsute feminism – literally, "clown-hair feminism," a branch of feminism concerned with destroying women's physical attractiveness in order to "subvert the male gaze" (remove, perhaps inadvertently, women's sexual power and influence over men.) Outlandish, repulsive hair treatment regimes are emblematic of this cult, reified by the feminist archetype known as "Big Red."

Rapine feminism – the branch of feminism that uses rape, fear of rape, and false rape allegations, usually cynically, as tools to further their political and ideological agendas. The Roe v Wade court decision, which began as a rape hoax, and the Rolling Stone article on the (falsely alleged) gang rape at the University of Virginia are both examples of rapine feminism.

That's enough to get you started, I think. Just remember, every time you apologize to a feminist, they get angrier, and every time you kowtow, they only demand more.

“It’s your son’s body, perfect as it is”

Gary Costanza · 6 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Lots of information about the foreskin in this short but entertaining talk entitled “What is an Intactivist?”

Wish my parents had it to watch.

Now you can watch it.

Feminists prefer sugar daddies to pantsuits

August Løvenskiolds · 6 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: AVFM is a nonpartisan website, meaning we take no official political position, left nor right, nor do we advocate for political candidates or parties. We do occasionally print articles that offer commentary on political races from different perspectives. In these cases, the views are those of the author only and not necessarily AVFM.

Imagine, as a brief thought experiment, you're a young feminist woman entering a lonely diner miles away from anything. You haven't eaten in a bit, and your resources are exhausted. You face an uncertain future; you are disquieted about these feelings. The diner is deserted except for a well-kempt older lady in a pantsuit and a kindly but more casual looking older gentleman. You realize you can only ask one person for help with a meal, for surely the other person will feel slighted for not being asked first. Whom do you ask to buy you a meal?

> In Iowa this week, women 29 and younger voted for Clinton's challenger, Sen. Bernie Sanders, by a stunning margin of roughly 6 to 1, much as young men did, according to the poll of voters arriving at precinct caucuses conducted for the television networks and the Associated Press. – LA Times.

This "lonely diner" is the scenario that played out in the Iowa Democratic Presidential Caucuses held on February 1st, 2016, and by a margin of 6 to 1, younger feminist Democratic women sided with the older gentleman – Senator Bernie Sanders – than with feminist icon and thundercunt Hillary Rodham Clinton. Although in the overall vote Hillary came out slightly ahead in a near 50-50 split, what should have been Hillary's core constituents – young feminist women – broke severely in favor of patriarchal provider Santa Claus Bernie.

Political journalists and analysts are tying themselves into knots trying to grasp how such an affront to feminism is possible. Bernie is a nice old guy, but he didn't exactly put the cock into Caucus. Some claim that these young, feminist women are sexist against women, or not real feminists, or are rebelling against Hillary's perceived authority or…the list goes on. Hell, maybe these young women see men in their seventies like gay men – more trustworthy for friendship than other women.

Let's be clear here on the idea of feminist leadership, and if such a thing even exists. In a Washington Post / Kaiser poll conducted last year, people were asked to name a feminist leader. 20% of people came up with the name Hillary Clinton, and no one else got even 3% of the vote. Since leadership implies that people know you are a leader, this means that there is only one person who comes close to being a leader of Feminism – Hillary – and all other wannabe feminist leaders are nonentities to 97% of Americans.

Hillary is a leader both elected and appointed, and she says she's a feminist, but she is not a "feminist leader" in any formal, titular way. Even so, it is a fair question to ask if even a purported feminist leader that 80% of people don't recognize as a feminist leader is any sort of leader at all. At 20% in a field of near zeroes, Hillary is the very best that feminism can offer, leadership-wise.

In our hypothetical diner, the young feminist pinched her cheeks, popped open a button on her blouse, and decided she could more likely manipulate the older man into buying her a meal than she could the pantsuit lady. In the Caucuses, 6 of 7 young women did the same – they conjured that a man as President could be manipulated by women after the election much more productively than a pantsuit lady pandering for their votes. By offering to have the government give them a free college education, Bernie signaled his willingness to play the sugar daddy for all these famished girls. Despite appearances to the contrary, feminist outrage doesn't fill the stomach in the way that feminists have grown accustomed to.

Voting is the one-night hookup of politics, the one chance for glory that is gone the next morning once your partner is out the door. These women voters made the cynical calculation that Bernie would be back for more sugar and that Hillary would lose interest in their concerns during the walk of shame post-election. Or, post-erection. Whatever.

This is why no woman will ever be elected President of the United States – women are the majority of voters, and once the election ends they know they can manipulate a pandering man more than they can an empowered woman. The snub of Hillary proves that a woman candidate who plays the power game like a man will alienate 84% of even women voters who are ideologically in tune with her. If you want to see a woman President, vote for a woman for Vice President and hope that the President falls from office.

It is all your fault, ladies. Get over it, and enjoy your dessert.

Feminism, sex-differences and chivalry

Peter Wright · 7 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On which side should the men's movement focus its activism — on the similarities or differences between the sexes?

The thinkers among us will stay abreast of both sides of the argument, however in the realm of activism most will take up a position one way or the other to make their point.

Arguments for sameness or difference rest on a more fundamental dyad, the biological and cultural – topics that have been tackled extensively in manosphere discussion circles, though I'm not sure we have gained good mileage from them in the fight against gynocentrism.

Regardless of whether we fixate on biological imperatives, or on the biology-shaping power of culture, the gender war rages on unchecked.

So just for a moment, let's partition-out the hard scientific discussions of biology vs. culture, and pay more attention to the rhetorical leverage points of sexual politics – to those emotive generalizations about sameness/difference. All feminist reasoning, all female privilege, and all misandry start from there.

Departing from the usual MRA emphasis on differences, real and significant biological ones, this article will make a case for focusing on the similarities, on the things men and women have in common as the most effective basis for defeating gynocentrism. Emphasizing only differences between the sexes, as old-school MRAs and new MGTOW like to do, will not reach the goal of defeating feminist propaganda and the anti-male culture created by same. Let's look at some rationale for this move.

Difference Feminism as the order of the day

> I am here going to chart three changes within socialist feminism over the last fifteen years. It has, I argue, moved in large part from androgyny to gender difference, and from Marxism or revolutionary socialism towards an accommodation with, if reform of, the political and social system we know now. [Socialist Feminism: From Androgyny to Gynocentrism, Equality to Difference – 1995]

In this quote, feminist Judith Evans makes an observation many are familiar with; that today's feminism is more concerned with promoting sexual differences than androgyny. While obvious to astute observers, I will argue that feminist ideology and feminist activism has not traveled in a linear fashion from androgyny to gynocentrism as Evans suggests, but more accurately has always enjoyed it both ways.

Ernest B. Bax observed this fact well over a century ago:

> Modern Feminism would fain achieve the feat of eating its cake and having it too. When political and economic rights are in question, such as involve gain and social standing, the assumption of inferiority magically disappears before the strident assertion of the dogma of the equality of woman with man – her mental and moral equality certainly! When, however, the question is of a different character – for example, for the relieving of some vile female criminal of the penalty of her misdeeds-then Sentimental Feminism comes into play, then the whole plaidoyer is based on the chivalric sentiment of deference and consideration for poor, weak woman." [Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake, in The Fraud of Feminism 1913]
>
> Feminists only claim equality with men in so far as it has agreeable consequences for women. And this applies all along the line… I would advise woman's-righters to choose the one side or the other. If they stick to the weakness of woman physically as ground for woman's privileges and immunities, let them give up prating of equality otherwise. If they contend for equality let it at least be an even equality all round. ['Female Suffrage' – in Social Democrat, Vol.8, no.9, pp.533-545 1904].

> The bulk of the advocates of woman's rights are simply working, not for equality, but for female ascendency. It is all very well to say they repudiate chivalry. They are ready enough to invoke it politically when they want to get a law passed in their favour – while socially, to my certain knowledge, many of them claim it as a right every whit as much as ordinary women. ['No Misogyny But True Equality' – in To-day, pp.115-121 1887]

Reading through Bax's articles it's clear that feminists argued in both directions, especially enjoying the difference narrative, proving that sentimental appeals to sex-difference were the approach that gained women the most. Why?

Because differences, especially those implying weakness and vulnerability, evoke chivalry.

And chivalry brings goodies!

Meme juxtaposes equalist vs difference arguments: indicates difference is the stronger social power

MRAs need to catch up with this fact and realize that whenever we promote difference, be it biological or cultural in origin, we play into feminist word-games and provide them with the basis for arguing chivalric treatment for women.

Commentaries on men and women's different natures and the corollary of why men and women should be treated differently (read special treatments for women) appear throughout history. The claims are that men and women are different due to cultural training (e.g. men are trained in patriarchy and violence; women in softness and subservience), or they are biologically different (e.g. men are testosterone poisoned, and women give birth and need special help), thus, we must discriminate to better serve those differences, say feminists.

Whenever old school MRAs thrash their swords around yelling "WE ARE BIOLOGICALLY DIFFERENT!!" they play right into the rhetoric and remedies of feminists. In fact, many of the more prominent stars in the MRM specialize in promoting difference, arguing for biological differences over culturally implanted ones, and not realizing that they end up with a conclusion of difference that gets exploited equally by feminists – it matters not whether the difference is of cultural or biological origin.

Conversely, when we discuss that men and women have a massive overlapping area of shared humanity – the discussion changes to one of equal value, concern and empathy for men.

Males and females, for example, are both among the homeless, both are among the mentally ill, both can be poor or disabled. Men and women equally experience all emotions- jealousy, pride, elation, fear, anxiety, depression, or joy, and they equally suffer heart attacks, diabetes, strokes, broken bones, malaria or the common cold. Both suffer the impact of environmental degradation and pollution, and so on.

Despite that massive area of overlap, you can already read the "difference" argument being exploited by protofeminist Modesta Pozzo in the year 1590;

> Don't we see that men's rightful task is to go out to work and wear themselves out trying to accumulate wealth, as though they were our factors or stewards, so that we can remain at home like the lady of the house directing their work and enjoying the profit of their labors? That, if you like, is the reason why men are naturally stronger and more robust than us — they need to be, so they can put up with the hard labor they must endure in our service." [The Worth of Women: their Nobility and Superiority to Men – 1590]

And it doesn't stop with Pozzo. The same language can be seen by virtually all feminist writers from her day to the present, including revered feminist philosophers like Julia Kristeva or Iris M. Young, through to the "difference feminists" of today. The historical lineup, all milking difference, is unbroken.

Take for instance the language of popular "equity" feminist Christina Hoff-Sommers who, while helpfully deconstructing many feminist myths, is happy to promote sex-differences as a basis for seeking chivalry for women:

Sommers demonstrates the sex-differences perspective in an interview with Emily Esfahani Smith. "Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes," explains Sommers, "and given that most men are physically stronger than most women, men can overpower women at any time to get what they want." "If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone," says Sommers, and "If boys can get away with being boorish, they will, happily. Women will pay the price."[1]

The historical benefit to women of the difference argument has far outweighed the sameness argument because difference enlists the traditions of damselling, white knighting, and romantic chivalry. The sameness argument fails to tap into those medieval powers and thus affords far less reach for gynocentric tentacles.

* * *

Feminists are among the most rigid enforcers of gender stereotypes on the planet – all while championing "varieties of masculinities/femininities" which "don't fit the binary." However, those varieties are something they tend to spout for window dressing, in passing, before going on to enforce strict gender stereotypes in most everything they say.

Some MRAs miss the fact that most feminists today are difference feminists or cultural feminists – feminists who believe first and foremost in reinforcing real or perceived differences between men and women. Many of us labor under the assumption that feminists promote a polymorphous perverse (androgynous) identity — which they never did with any consistency.

And for feminists it doesn't matter if the differences are of biological origin (many feminists subscribe to Evolutionary psychology) or the result of cultural conditioning – selling any differences of sexed behavior allows them to argue for special treatments for women and harsh treatment for men, regardless of whether the differences are congenital or cultural.

As men's rights activists, we would do well to emphasize the biological/behavioral overlap between the sexes – that we all feel emotions, all think, fall in love, catch a common cold, and seek intimate human bonds – and with that we can defeat calls for preferential treatments of women arising from differences. Let's move on from the task of defeating 'feminist androgyny,' which appears to be an activism dead-end.

This article contends that some MRAs place the focus on differences between men and women and that that approach is an activism cul-de-sac. But before adopting the alternative strategy of highlighting male and female behavioral similarities, we need first to observe how feminists have used the difference narrative to their advantage; only then will we see the urgency.

So next time you see an argument for difference or sameness, stop and ask yourself who stands the greatest chance of benefiting from it. And if you are advocating for difference, ask yourself if you are helping to promote men's human rights or instead promoting a return to the good-ol-days of strictly demarcated gender roles.

Notes:

[1] Emily Esfahani Smith, 'Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance' The Atlantic, Dec 10 2012
For more on Hoff-Sommers' views on chivalry, see "The Acculturated Podcast: Ladies and Gentlemen"

Further reading: Feminism's love affair with gender differences

Feature image by Steven Lilley

London rape liar exposed

AVfM Video Source · 7 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://s3.amazonaws.com/anonymous.news/index.html

RooshV and Return of Kings sells chemical and ideological poison. Time to take out the trash.

Dean Esmay · 8 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Let's get this out of the way to start: Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh, aka "RooshV" wants you dead even more than feminists do. Please keep that in mind any time you encounter him or his deranged groupies from the Return of Kings cult.

Whether it's chemical or ideological poison they want to sell you, following RooshV and Return of Kings advice can land you in jail or dead. If you're lucky, you may just wind up with multiple Sexually Transmitted Diseases, a dick that no longer works, womanly breasts, and a lonely broken life. But it's worse than that for Return of Kings fans: following Rooshly advice might get you jailed for false (or real!!) allegations. It may also get you physically attacked by those damaged, dysfunctional women they stupidly advise you to share a bed with.

After all, psychotic women are the only type you'll ever meet if you follow the "NeoMasculinity" path, which should be obvious to an intelligent and mature man, I would have thought.

More on the Return of Kings chemical poison market in a bit. But first:

People should know that I have spoken to unfortunate Return of Kings fans who told me their secret stories of being beaten and abused and even jailed by the type of women the RoK cultists encouraged them to seek out. They'd be savagely mocked by their fellow Return of Kings "NeoMasculinity" fans if they told anyone, and they full well knew it. As part of the bizarre "NeoMasculinity" ideology, men who are physically, sexually, psychologically abused and falsely-imprisoned are just "manginas" to Roosh, after all. Never mind if they were stabbed in their sleep, set on fire, or arrested after a false accusation. Or if they stupidly got drunk and followed Roosh's advice and raped a drunk girl who then legitimately had them jailed.

All I can do when talking to the poor fools who took Return of Kings/RooshV advice was shake my head and give them the same advice I give to so many other abused men facing physical and emotional scars and legal trouble.

I used to try to refrain from bluntly telling these poor unfortunates that they were fools to follow the bizarre Return Of Kings cult, that they got suckered and swindled by a cult leader named Roosh, but it seemed rude: after being so completely humiliated, physically damaged, and rendered impotent after following Return of Kings's advice, shouldn't it be obvious to them?

But I was wrong. Someone needs to tell them. So listen up, you fools in the RooshV circle: there is nothing but misery and death down the Return of Kings path. You have to be a complete idiot to follow any advice the RoK cultists give you. If Roosh or other Return of Kings writers tell you that the sky is blue, triple check it–they're just that insane.

The Men's Human Rights Movement has a long and strained relationship with so-called "red pill" sleazy sex gurus like Return of Kings publisher RooshV. Roosh and Return of Kings have never, ever been MRA as every honest person who's done 5 minutes of due diligence knows. But Men's Rights Activists have always believed that men, even sleazy ones, deserve freedom of speech.

Many of us also long believed that giving young men blunt advice from differing perspectives, even bizarre hedonist perspectives from the likes of Roosh, was better than the endless string of man-shaming that the education system and the mainstream media pump out. At least advising men on how to be confident in their own sexuality, how to dismiss the worst in sex-shaming of men, and how to identify dysfunctional female behavior, was a worthwhile endeavor. A lot of us figured even if some of the advice was daffy, smart men would figure it out on their own. Most men can think for themselves, after all.

In short, even if much of the Return of Kings advice was and is trash, a lot of us hoped they'd all grow up and grow out of it as the forces of intolerance and censorship closed around everybody who questioned the feminist narrative. I even once had a civil chat with one of his assistant editors, who was a nice if callow chap, and once exchanged email with Roosh in which we agreed that there was no point in fighting each other when the common enemy, ideological feminism, and the Social Justice cult, were a much bigger threat to everybody. Ideological Feminists and the "Social Justice" cultists are a threat to everybody on the planet, not just men after all.

In short, we were trying to be charitable–too charitable–to the sociopaths who rule the Return of Kings universe.

But as recent events have shown, expecting Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh to become thoughtful is like expecting feminists to get rational. RooshV is a sociopath who has never changed, who will say or do anything no matter who it hurts.

So here's the truth: Daryush "Roosh" Valizade has written for years about his past supposed adventures traveling the world to have one night stands with the psychologically dysfunctional, neurotic women he picks up in sleazy meat markets around the world. In many of his books, you find what are undeniably confessions of Roosh raping multiple women. In fact, the words "serial rapist" are not too harsh to describe Roosh, at least if his own published, public writings are to be believed. As with Roosh's friend Matt Forney, also a confessed rapist by any sane standard, it's often been unclear whether what they're writing is just the poorly-written rape fantasy porn, or if it's the real thing.

However, recent evidence has come to my attention on the matter to leave me convinced that there's no reason to believe any of this is fiction, that all of it is real. You'll probably be reading about it in the coming weeks if certain things I hope come to pass, including my hope that a few of their victims will step forward and we can get some of these sleazebags put away by legal authorities.

Furthermore, it's clear the Return of Kings crowd, the cultists who are part of Roosh's circle, don't care that they're making heroes out of pathetic men who define their "NeoMasculinity" by how many sleazy women they can fuck and how many drunk and drugged up chicks they can rape. Which means Return of Kings is rightly described as a den for rapists and rapist-wannabe groupies with a thing for neurotic, narcissistic, alcoholic women. And that appears to be all Return of Kings ever will be.

And so be warned young men and old: following RooshV is a good way to become a disease-ridden fool stuck in jail on a false rape charge.

Furthermore, if you want your dick to shrink and your mantits to grow to a shapely C-cup, and to become an opiate addict who lands in a hospital from liver failure and intestinal rupture from bowel obstruction, keep following the Return of Kings advice on "nutritional" supplements and "testosterone." Most of what they want to sell gullible fools who read their site are really hazardous poisons that no sane man should ever allow near his body, let alone in it.

I had never had the time to really peruse the Return of Kings site–even when I tepidly defended the site on "free speech" grounds I never really did more than skim it. But I recently fixed that, and with help began examining the Return of Kings cult site in great detail. Now that I've really looked, it is clear that they make much of their profit from selling chemicals unfit for human consumption and dangerous, barely-legal drugs.

This means that following Return of Kings advice isn't just a good way to put lethal women in your life. It's a good way to put lethal chemicals in your body. These chemicals they want "manly men" like you to take cause permanent and irreversible damage, especially if combined with alcohol and commonly prescribed drugs (benzodiazapines, barbiturates, etc.).

Seriously man, did you want your dick to fall off and massive tits to sprout on your chest while you lie in a hospital bed shuddering from withdrawal symptoms and liver and kidney damage that you may never be able to undo while your dick rots off? Stay with the Return of Kings cult.

The following are just a few of the chemical poisons the Return of Kings cultists want you to put in your body:

Kratom, ketamine, phenibut, “Super Mandro,” and testosterone. Spend some time on the internet examining what these things can and will do to you, frequently even if you are “careful” as the RoK cultists tell you to be.

The have to tell you to be careful. That way if you wind up crippled or dead, they can claim it was your fault — not theirs.

Just one example? Kratom, the Return of Kings miracle drug and lethal poison:

http://www.returnofkings.com/?s=kratom

No really, kratom is potentially lethal.

These aren’t the only dangerous chemicals they profit from. Return of Kings and RooshV apparently have straw deals and/or sponsorship agreements with people who sell dangerous poisons like ketamine, phenibut, kava, and testosterone. Kratom even contains atypical opioids, not as potent as pure opium but are still addictive mu-opioid agonists.

Furthermore, Return of Kings-recommended supplements are frequently sold in forms where purity is in no way guaranteed and thus may also contain additional chemicals they don’t even have to tell you about. Have fun with that while both your biceps and your juicy new tits get bigger.

Do companies like “Happy Hippo Herbals” and “Herbal Samurai” know they are doing business with confessed rapists like RooshV and Matt Forney? These business associates of Return of Kings certainly must know that many of the chemicals Return of Kings suggests you take are unfit for human consumption. Are those business associates aware that Return of Kings actually advises men to consume these chemicals they sell?

Are state and national government officials aware of these shady deals to sell poison to unwary men? Are state and national authorities also aware of the multiple confessed rapes of Matt Forney and Muslim-born Daryush “Roosh” Valizadeh of Return of Kings?

Also by the way, do you want some real irony? After looking at all the toxic drugs and dangerous chemicals unfit for human consumption that Return of Kings suggests you put in your body, they actually had the audacity to publish this:

http://www.returnofkings.com/76872/never-date-a-woman-who-takes-one-of-these-prescription-drug

I am not accusing Roosh of “advocating” rape. I am accusing him of confessing to rape, rape that is rape by any sane person’s standards. And I am accusing him of selling chemical poisons that’ll help you grow tits, have a smaller dick, and die of liver failure while you shudder from opiate withdrawals and the AIDS symptoms you got from the crazy bitch who stuck a knife in your ribs before she falsely accused you of rape. Good luck with that.

One final note: If you’ve been sexually assaulted, abused, or otherwise criminally harmed by Matt Forney or Daryush “Roosh” Valizadeh, please contact me on Twitter. I promise to help you seek legal remedy, including putting these slimeballs behind bars where they can never hurt anyone again if I can.

Thanks to Tomás Allende Conte, my #GaysAgainstFeminism homey, for his invaluable assistance in this article.

Roosh Rage

Bryan Scandrett · 8 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

To those saddened by the rift between Roosh, the PUAs and the MHRM, get used to it. The Greatest Rape Hoax Ever cemented the diametric opposition for all time.

Once upon a time, I didn't care much about the PUAs or Roosh. A lazy analysis based on what do they think horny young men are going to do? Boys will be boys and girls will buy it. Smeh.

The day I found AVfM just over 4 years ago, my jaw hit the floor.

A Voice for Men.

A flash of genius if ever I saw one, instantly relating to my own lack of a voice in the face of a lifetime of lived experience of the self-serving feminist narrative control through tone policing, false allegations, shame and proxy violence. From that moment forward I was only interested in the MHRM and MGTOW.

My personal direction is and most likely always will be helping to change the idiotic outdated cultural narrative I have been subjected to my entire life and alter the future possibilities for young men coming through behind me. The more I can do in concert with others, the more justice, equity and fairness their life experience might contain.

The day my ex demanded a divorce, I knew I'd never lay affectionate hands on another woman again. PUA was never an option. I didn't want sex with lots of women, I only ever wanted the mother of my children and now neither of us wanted each other. Consequently, I have never paid Roosh or PUAs that much attention, other than to understand the basics, content to lazily watch the debate from the side lines.

That changed last week.

The MSM Global Rape Hoax was never about Roosh or PUAs or even the legalizing of rape allegation. That was simply the excuse to call for proxy violence against men. While PUAs did receive some Discussion within the articles, without exception to my reading, not once did they miss calling him an MRA. Their real target.

Dean Esmay reports rumours of corrections since, to be expected given the wall of push back in the comments saying, "Roosh IS NOT an MRA." It is simply an attack on men, to silence their voices, to vilify and demonize Men's Human Rights Activists with a false allegation of rape advocates.

A call for torches and pitchforks.

It was about reasserting Mummies' procreative abilities as the central and only thing of critical importance in our global human culture. The woman on the pedestal is a mother. The issue of her uterus is what gives her absolute protection and absolution from all crimes, her carte blanche. She has parlayed this privileged position over the centuries into power and speshul snowflake privileges. You are all attached, at a primal level, to your mothers, with few exceptions. A primary attachment. Even those who didn't for various reasons, likely pined for her warm stereotypical comforts.

Null gravida women assume the same authority by virtue of being potential mothers. Sugar and spice becomes 'I have the pussy, I make the rules.'

You want the sugar, you bend the knee.

Without the survival mechanism of protecting women and the reproductive bottleneck, the uterus, at all and every cost, any civilization perished. Even at the cost of every single male from 6 to 60, the population can be back to full strength in a single generation by mating with old men and young boys as they hit puberty.

Men are wired for this and women are wired to expect your total sacrifice, in general. However, 2016, with 3.5 billion + uteri and counting, we aren't about to run out of fertile women any time soon.

Male disposability has out lived its practicality.

And it is only the rise of the modern Men's Human Rights Movement on the back of the establishment loss of control over the conversation and information that has ever, in the history of humanity, mounted a credible threat to that position of power. And that is what the Great MSM Rape Hoax is all about.

Shutting down that challenge. Silencing the male voice.

Feminism is a false allegation. The only two tools I have ever witnessed them employ are shame and lies. So it comes as no surprise to see them slam the false allegation throttle to Full Ahead as they did in this desperate, unprecedented, global, highly co-ordinated example of Brown Shirting by the MSM, designed solely to shut down the male voice, leaving feminism as the controlling ideology.

As Dean Esmay noted in the early hours of the tsunami of propaganda breaking over us, "Are they stupid or dishonest?"

The gynarchy couldn't give a flying toss about PUA's. Or even any actual attempt to legalize rape should a single human in the history of humanity be stupid enough to try it. The more the boys get between the girls legs, the more babies get born and child support gets paid, the more future economic growth and taxpayers we can expect and the more money gets released to the US states.

Drunk or sober, they couldn't give a rats. So long as the livestock keeps breeding, the Great Human Ant Colony will thrive. Roosh is stupid enough to play with fire and other people's lives. The moment I came across his 'thought experiment', I reacted with a "WTF? That's going to follow you to the grave mate."

Wrong answer! That drivel is going to follow us all for decades.

The lying sexist feminist pigs are going to use that as a club for as long as they draw breath. What Roosh and his cronies are too thick to get thru their tiny minds, is we that need to change the cultural narrative when it comes to compassion for men across billions of people. We need to end the culture of male disposability, not reinforce it by arming the armies of propaganda pushing, fearmongering, rape culturists terrifying women and angering white knights with false allegations about legal rape.

This guy Roosh is under the delusion he is new leader material for the MHRM. He believes the current 'leadership' (read Paul Elam) has lost its way. He fails to understand Paul isn't THE leader of the MHRM but a part of a group of people, some of whom have been investing skin into the game longer than he has. While he's inarguably a central figure within that group, he operates with the co-operation and support of some very influential and intelligent people.

His high visibility is down to the effectiveness of the tactics and strategies developed within that group and his role as hands on management at AVfM, a highly prominent position. Not to mention his inimitable style.
We even had a recent commenter on AVfM make the rash prediction Roosh would be leading the MHRM within 15 years. Sunshine, if we haven't managed a sleeper hold on this rubbish inside of 15 years, we failed. Go home and bend the knee. Wish I could find it to link here but it's a thousand comments in now.

Sorry Roosh, you've been weighed and measured and found wanting on a multitude of fronts. Your grasp of the game is entirely lacking, your lack of comprehension of the most basic of premises from which we operate is a joke. The selfish paradigm that boys getting their end away as central and paramount is idiotic in the face of the ocean of male suffering we confront daily.

Your experience in male issues beyond your zipper is virtually non-existent by my read. To imagine you can hold your own with the likes of Pizzey, Golden, Farrell, Elam, Straughan and Tieman to drop just a few names, is conceit beyond credibility. Makes you a joke IMO. What's more, the long-time stalwarts of men's rights I'm privileged to talk to have little to no respect for you in the main. The only support forthcoming from them is based in their support for free speech.

My read is you have the status of a flag burner in a pickup truck full of Patriot vet rednecks. Best of luck working without their good will. For a self-styled 'king', you seem to know squat about Barons. These MRHM people have a paradigm of doing something about the body count of men, women and children that feminism leaves in its wake. You have a paradigm of counting notches on your bedpost and making money. And now you want to settle down and marry one of these 'whores,' as you call them.

Any Admin with a MHRA fb page can recount stories of men and women contacting them for help in desperate straits and no-where to go. And you've helped to tar us all with the false allegation of rapist at a global level of perception.

Thanks 'brother.'

Ever stop to think that might just shut a door of perception to a victim of DV? Ever occur to you that just might cost someone their life, or someone their parent? Ever think about much other than what you want? Or how to make a quick buck out of the human sex drive? Anyone with a modicum of introspection can pick up on the stark contrast between self-centeredness and other-centeredness.

A founding principle of civilization.

MHRM leadership material, my arse. Your stupid ill-advised 'thought experiment' has resulted in nothing more than lining your own pockets, peddling false dreams of power and sex to horny men and setting our efforts for narrative change backwards at a global level. In short, a return to Seneca Falls. "Sit at the back and keep your mouths shut boys. The girls are talking."

The sooner this idiot disappears, the sooner the rest of us can get back to something other than selfish base gratifications and false allegations. That Roosh Rage is better out than in.

About consent

Torrey Garcia · 9 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We constantly hear talk about consent, usually about YES means YES. As most of you reading this probably know, YES means YES is a terrible standard for consent. And we are just in our criticism of it. But if we are to effect positive change concerning rape & sexual assault we should discuss consent and the different standards of consent. Even if it is just to develop better sex ed classes and raise awareness of what adequate consent standards are and by proxy define when sexual assault has and has not occurred. This is too important not to have our voices heard on the matter, and merely saying that the feminists are wrong, and leaving it there, is a bad move.

In this set, of what will likely be three articles, I hope to go over different standards of consent, their application and real world use, as well as establish whether or not an individual has consented or not in a given situation. In part one of what will likely be a three-part series, I will give a brief overview of the three standards of consent and then break down the first of the three standards along with any problems it might have. This article series will mostly be descriptive, with brief excursions taken to point out potential flaws within each standard.

The legal standard of consent & rape and No means No:

Rape as defined by the FBI:

"Penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim. Attempts or assaults to commit rape are also included; however, statutory rape and incest are excluded."

Consent was far hard definition to track down especially in the context of sex and sexual assault. But the Criminal Justice department at Cornell has the most detailed definition I have been able to find:

(8)Consent.—

(A) The term "consent" means a freely given agreement to the conduct at issue by a competent person. An expression of lack of consent through words or conduct means there is no consent. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission resulting from the use of force, threat of force, or placing another person in fear does not constitute consent. A current or previous dating or social or sexual relationship by itself or the manner of dress of the person involved with the accused in the conduct at issue shall not constitute consent.

(B) A sleeping, unconscious, or incompetent person cannot consent. A person cannot consent to force causing or likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm or to being rendered unconscious. A person cannot consent while under threat or in fear or under the circumstances described in subparagraph (C) or (D) of subsection (b)(1).

(C) Lack of consent may be inferred based on the circumstances of the offense. All the surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether a person gave consent, or whether a person did not resist or ceased to resist only because of another person's actions.

Now I cannot emphasize enough how difficult it was to find a concrete definition of consent within a decent amount of detail. If it takes me 20 minutes to find a workable definition of consent with access to Google how can we expect people to have a functional understanding of it when it comes to real life scenarios where googling for 20 minutes is going to seem rather odd. A lot the links I found had very wishy-washy definitions of consent and not something I could run with to write this piece.

Most people who are reading this will know the criticism of rape as defined by the FBI. But as a brief overview, the FBI definition excludes male and female victims of female perpetrators from law and data reporting. I do not have any criticism of consent as defined by Cornell but worry that getting a concrete definition is rather difficult to find even with google, and I worry about determining consent when alcohol is involved. Please provide your feedback below.

Generally speaking, this standard of consent should be pretty obvious when you have it or not, provided you are paying attention to your partner. Of course, alcohol & drugs muddy the waters a bit. But for your average vanilla sexual encounter this standard is fine, and common sense

Negotiated Consent standard:

The negotiated standard of consent is very similar to informed consent. It is a higher standard than what we just discussed above. I will speak more in detail about this standard in the next article, but I will give a brief overview from my experience in the (BDSM and Poly) scene(s). I will also provide a link to a wiki article for those that are curious, here.

Negotiated consent works like contract negotiation, you:

- Determine the duration of the 'contract' or, in this case, scene or relationship.
- You determine what type of play is acceptable.
- You establish safewords.
- Ascertain any medical information which could impact the scene.
- Ascertain what each party wants out of the scene.

I should note all this takes place before the scene taking place. Regarding kink negotiating a scene mid-scene is considered bad form though sometimes needed. Also, I should note that generally speaking the first negotiation is the longest, and subsequent ones are usually shorter to the point where prior play partners may not even negotiate at all if they know each other well enough or only do so when incorporating something new into the scene. Also this standard views both the top and the bottom as responsible, the top (the giver, active partner) is responsible in regards to making sure the bottom is alright, and the bottom (the receiver) is responsible to communicate whether by word or action (when speaking isn't always possible for myriad of reasons) their state of consent. In fact, the usual thing most bottoms are told when they first enter the scene is tops do not consent to violate your consent; or in other words speak up or show signs of your state of consent you top isn't a mind reader.

In Poly, this standard or, at least, the principles of this standard are used to discuss the boundaries and roles of a relationship. Unlike in Mono relationships there is zero tolerance for wishy-washy communication in Poly, so this standard or the principles of this standard are used to make sure everyone is on the same page, and no miscommunication is to be had.

YES Means YES / Affirmative Consent:

Yes means yes is the bastardization of the above standard of consent by feminists. Negotiated consent is effectively a no means no standard. In other words, it does not assume malintent from the get go. Yes means yes on the other hand does. Getting an affirmative for every plank unit of a sexual encounter is cumbersome and assumes people have zero ability to read other people and that the bottom has no ability to articulate desires. Basically Yes mean yes says that every step along the sexual encounter each participant must ask whether a given action is alright. On top of that, this is done during the act instead of before the act as with negotiated consent. This means both the fluidity of the sexual act is broken up (which most people find unsexy). Also, what defines consent in a given sexual context is fluid under Yes means Yes and can change at whim. This is effectively the moving of goal post of sexual consent. It also implies the bottom has no obligation to communicate that their level of consent has changed, and it assumes the in the time it takes to get a shirt of and take off a bra somehow consent disappeared. It also takes the responsibility off of one or both partners to make know when something isn't working for them and puts it on the other partner to figure it out. Keep in mind that Yes mean Yes isn't being lobbied for the kink community but for the larger vanilla community as well. In the case of which vanilla sex is simpler and safer and more straightforward than kinky sex.

What can we criticize about the legal standard of consent? I want your opinion, but I will leave mine here:

Personally, my main issues are the difficulty in actually finding the definition in the first place. It is too important to than to have to spend 20 minutes searching the web for a concrete non-wishy-washy definition. The other issues are a lack of practical guidance when alcohol is involved. Unless you are going to argue for the insane position that any amount of alcohol is rape the legal standard needs to come up with something more concrete. But for general use for mundane sexual activities, it's fine standard, and I don't see a reason to go above for vanilla sexual activity.

You can find me on Reddit at /u/wazzup987 twitter @mr_switchy or on disqus as Tag

Article originally published at: Consent, part 1 – Honey Badger Brigade | Nerds bite back! (n.d.). Retrieved from http://honeybadgerbrigade.com/2015/12/07/consent-part-1/

Dr. Murray Katz of Montreal, Canada – “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 9 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Murray Katz has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org

From his website drmurraykatz.com:

“TRUSTED FOR OVER 25 YEARS WITH MORE THAN 40,000 CIRCUMCISIONS PERFORMED.
Dr. Murray Katz MDCM is a graduate of the Faculty of Medicine, McGill University. He has practiced pediatric medicine for the past 35 years. For 13 years he was the Medical Director of the Tiny Tots Medical centre in Dollard Des Ormeaux.

He is a certified Mohel (religious circumcision official) and often works at synagogues alongside a Rabbi. He has taught circumcision procedures to over 25 other physicians, including certified pediatric urologists.”

So, with 40,000 circumcisions performed, there was no disease cured, no ailment healed, yet how much pain and suffering inflicted is unknown. We do know, however, that 100% of those 40,000 infants were permanently disfigured.

Below “Understanding Circumcisions” we see:

> BENEFITS AND CARE
> Circumcision is a big decision for parents, and there is a lot of contradicting information available online. We put this information together to help you make an informed decision on whether circumcision is the right choice for your child.
>
> Helping prevent recurrence of urinary tract infections
>
> Of all the medical benefits of circumcision, helping prevent another urinary tract infection is at the top of the list. There is good evidence that over 90% of all urinary tract infections in male infants in the first three months of life are in those not circumcised. A recent summary from the American Academy of Paediatrics found that circumcision is the only clear preventive procedure against urinary tract infections.
>
> Helping prevent a first urinary tract infection from occurring
>
> There is also good evidence that preventing a urinary tract infection from happening in the first place is a major benefit of circumcision.

These supposed benefits have been debunked and continue to be listed as a reason to mutilate baby boys.

It's common knowledge that UTIs are preventable – in both boys and girls – by practicing good hygiene.

> Circumcision complications
> The most important complication is bleeding. A very few number of babies will have a small infection. In very rare cases, there can be some injury to the head of the penis.

This is incomplete and misleading, as the most important complication is death. There is no evidence that injury to the head of the penis is rare, as no data is kept regarding these complications.

Then under "Frequent Questions" we see:

> Is your circumcision procedure a bloodLess procedure?
> During the administration of the analgesia by an injection there may be some bleeding at the place where the injection is done. This is almost very minimal and never really needs any special means to control. A small bruise however may be produced.
>
> It is important to recognize that the penile area is very vascular with a lot of blood supply so concern about too much bleeding is very important.

So, "the penile area is very vascular with a lot of blood supply" – then why take any unnecessary chances, especially when it isn't your life to risk!

> What is the true function of the prepuce?
> There are many claims made about the function of the prepuce. Some feel it is part of our immune system. Some feel it somehow protects the glans. Protection of the glans against a condition called meatal stenosis where the opening of the urethra on the glans can become too tiny is probably true. This complication is more common in circumcised boys than those not circumcised. Meatal stenosis if severe can need a minor surgical repair needing to be done.

"Some feel" the prepuce does this and "some feel" the prepuce does that. If you don't know the function of the organ you are amputating, how can you justify a risky procedure that removes it?

> BEST EVIDENCE AS TO THE FUNCTION OF THE PREPUCE
>
> The best evidence is that the function of the prepuce is to stimulate rapid ejaculation. Some men develop too rapid an ejaculation and seek a circumcision to help with this. The evidence also suggests that the pleasure from an ejaculation is the same in men who have been circumcised compared to those who have not.

There is no evidence whatsoever that "the function of the prepuce is to stimulate rapid ejaculation" and much evidence that the foreskin has many important functions. This is a bald-faced lie designed to scare the public into thinking circumcision is good for men's sex lives.

> I read that circumcisions are dangerous. Is it true?
> There is a great deal of information on the Internet that is confusing and unreliable. On one side there are those who oppose circumcision and consider it to be a "mutilation" and a violation of the rights of the newborn. They offer all types of non-scientific claims and report horror stories of cases where the procedure did go wrong as if this was what happens in most cases.
>
> On the other hand there are those who claim medical benefits for circumcision that are not proven and so rare that they should not be a factor in the decision of the parent. They claim the procedure is "painless" and that bleeding almost never happens. We do not agree with this.
>
> Our aim is to provide you with reliable scientific information about the circumcision procedure we do in our > office. We are neither for nor against circumcision. We will explain what benefits appear to be proven and which are not proven.

Those that "consider it a mutilation and a violation of the rights of the newborn" are 100% correct, and there is no way to deny this: the baby is held captive and forced to undergo genital mutilation (unnecessary surgery).

Since Dr. Katz provides almost no information about the risks and complications of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Katz's practice information follows:

Tiny Tots Medical Centre
3400 Rue du Marché
Dollard des Ormeaux, QC
H9B 2Y1
Phone:(514) 685-0933

> Dr. Murray Katz "Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/6ROpAHXV3R https://t.co/APaaWgJ9m8 #nocirc #intactivism #MGM pic.twitter.com/4v3ekAVDet
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 10, 2016

Selective service for women? Maybe

AVfM Video Source · 10 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The proposal to have women register for the draft alongside with men has drawn plenty of reactions from every corner of the society. Lucian Vâlsan thinks most of them are hypocritical one way or the other.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Progressives fumble over why young women detest Hillary

August Løvenskiolds · 11 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: AVFM is a nonpartisan website, meaning we take no official political position, left nor right, nor do we advocate for political candidates or parties. We do occasionally print articles that offer commentary on political races from different perspectives. In these cases, the views are those of the author only and not necessarily AVFM.

In a previous article, I hypothesized why 6 of 7 young Democratic women under 30 vote for sugar daddy Bernie Sanders instead of feminist Hillary Clinton: I reasoned that these women realized that electing Sanders would give them more influence over his Presidency than they would enjoy under Clinton because they could both shame and sexually manipulate Sanders in ways that Clinton would be immune to.

One commenter, Gyor, took strong exception to my hypothesis, claiming among other things that I had "an extreme ignorance about those of us on the left and the diversity of perpectives [sic] and what goes on the left."

Of course, I had heard a lot of progressive explanations about how and why these women were rebelling in such drastic numbers against a female feminist candidate – I even noted a few of the more credible ones even as I dismissed them as rationalizations at best, and outright manipulations at worst. Still, Gyor's white knight braying got me curious that perhaps I had missed something – perhaps these children of flower had a more serious and coherent explanation than my estimation that those women had intuitively assessed their long-term potential influence under both candidates and had voted accordingly.

So, let's check a few of these progressive apologists to see if their explanations hold water, or perhaps, bile.

Samantha Bee. In promos for her new late night comedy TV series creatively named Full Frontal on TBS starting Monday, February 8th, the former Daily Show stalwart claimed that the voter shortfall was because Hillary had placed unwarranted faith in the powers of a witch to whom Hillary had promised her daughter Chelsea, in some sort of infernal deal for political power.

Now, while some might be tempted to see Bee's theory as some sort of satire, feminists don't typically joke about the human trafficking of young women, and the feminist reaction to the recent Roosh imbroglio shows clearly that feminists have no sense of satire at all.

Madeline Albright, former US Secretary of State, also invoked a supernatural explanation for those younger women's recalcitrant voting habits, noting that "There's a special place in hell for women who don't help other women." Some may see this as a metaphorical appeal to the power of the female collective own group preference and/or shaming language directed at women, but this seems to me more like some diabolical witchery had afflicted these poor women, deflecting them from the divinely ordained Clinton vaginal monologue camp into the more penile side of the Iowa Cock-us.

Taking the magic penis theory one step further was feminist micro-icon Gloria Steinem, who remarked on Bill Maher's show that instead of voting their long-term interests as I had so generously hypothesized, young women are boy crazy and the 84% percent who support Sanders think such votes would ingratiate themselves to hipster dick. According to TNR, > Maher then joked that he wouldn't be allowed to say such a thing, lest Steinem slap him, because chalking young women's politics up to their desire to meet boys actually is a profoundly sexist thing to do.

Now, the depletion of educated, attractive men, a declared wrought by feminism, may well have turned these young women into desperate non-housewives hungry for hookups at any cost and if indeed this is driving their voting preferences, the fault lies clearly with feminism for creating such an open latrine in the middle of their own bivouac. Steinem tried to backtrack on her statement, but that just seems to have made matters worse.

Even more bizarre and unflattering are the arguments that young feminists cleave to Bernie because Hillary cleaves to Bill Clinton: they want Hillary to be a more independent woman, and so, the voters show this by depending on a man themselves.

These progressive arguments are both bizarre and unsavory. The insults to these young women voters both reek of the sort of slut-shaming these young feminists detest, and the implicit man-hate that is emblematic of feminism despite feminists' half-hearted denials of same. These individualistic, rebellious women voters cannot help but be further alienated from feminism because of them.

Will this alienation be from all feminism, or just the collectivist, misandrous strains of feminism that control the feminist narrative? I believe young women, like most people, will cling to the ideal of an individualistic gender equality but they will also wake up to the realization that feminism in practice is the enemy of this ideal. These post-feminists are already exploring the joys of objectification and cat-calling, for example.

Kicking the dead-weight feminism out of socialism might well turn out to be the best thing that ever happened to socialism – or even, the only noteworthy thing it ever accomplishes, other than proving to everyone that men make the best feminists of all.

LAPD Cop Arrested

Michael Conzachi · 11 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Two days ago, on January 28th, Los Angeles television and print media reported that 17-year Los Angeles Police Detective Christine Wycoff was arrested and charged with dissuading a witness and false imprisonment.

According to widespread LA news reports, Wycoff met a man online in June of 2014, began a sexual relationship that lasted for several months, and then it deteriorated. It was at that time that Wycoff began threatening the man, who became concerned and reported the threats to the LAPD.

LAPD Internal Affairs initiated an investigation, and once Wycoff learned of the inquiry, she continued threatening the man and told him that if he cooperated with the police investigation, she would accuse him of domestic violence. Court records reflect that she sought a temporary restraining order against the man in October of 2014, but that request was denied.

She later went to the Torrance Police Department; a suburb of Los Angeles, and filed a report that the man had sexually assaulted her. The man was arrested but was quickly released.

Wycoff was arrested and released on a bond of $150,000. She has been assigned to home duty with pay. If convicted, she could face four years and eight months behind bars. She is scheduled to be arraigned on February 22nd in downtown Los Angeles, at the Foltz Criminal Justice Center, Department 30, Case # BA443216. Deputy District Attorney Ann Marie Wise with the Justice System Integrity Division is prosecuting the case.

The false imprisonment charge comes as a result of her filing a false report of a sexual assault and causing the man to be arrested.

Phone calls and messages left at the LAPD's Pacific Division Detective Bureau where Wycoff worked were not returned. It is unknown what types of crimes she was responsible for investigating.

Sadly, once again, we have a public official intrinsically involved in terrorizing a man under the auspices of false restraining orders, and false allegations domestic violence and sexual assault. The investigation should not stop with just this arrest. One must wonder what other damage she has done in the past, and if she had been assigned to work family crimes, the list of additional victims could be vast.

The news reports indicate that Wycoff could face up to four years and eight months in the slammer. Of course, we have to let the legal system take its course, and as much as we can all draw conclusions and presume guilt, like it or not she is afforded all rights by law. If she is found guilty, let's hope she serves every second of that sentence.

http://www.latimes.com/local/lanow/la-me-ln-lapd-detective-threats-ex-boyfriend-20160128-story.html

http://ysktoday.com/orange-county/lapd-cop-arrested-for-allegedly-threatening-ex-boyfriend-filing-false-police-report/http://losangeles.cbslocal.com/2016/01/28/lapd-cop-arrested-for-allegedly-threatening-ex-boyfriend-filing-false-police-report/

http://canmua.net/california/lapd-detective-is-accused-of-intimidating-and-361384.html

Video – “Circumcision? Make the informed decision” featuring Dr. Dean Edell, Penn & Teller, and Marilyn Milos of nocirc.org

Gary Costanza · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I discovered the show “Bullshit” by Penn and Teller when I heard about an episode they did about circumcision – boy was I excited. They called “BULLSHIT” on circumcision!

This classic anti-MGM video stars Penn & Teller, the respected Dr. Dean Edell, and nocirc.org founder and nurse Marilyn Milos.

https://youtu.be/iYyJeKtFlK4

> Video -“Circumcision? Make the informed decision” Penn & Teller https://t.co/RgsjdMnAhD #MGM #nocirc #intactivism pic.twitter.com/5phMTcsfcP
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 13, 2016

Star crazy star Pauley Perrette accuses yet another homeless man of attacking her

Suzanne McCarley · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently desperate for more headlines, NCIS actress and serial false accuser Pauley Perrette has added another notch to her belt. According to TMZ.com, Perrette claims to have had another dramatic and dangerous encounter with a homeless man.

The crazy train is running full steam.

> Perrette says the guy then grabbed her wrist and stuck his head into her car demanding to know the time. She says her immediate reaction was to yell "I rebuke you satan in the name of Jesus Christ!" And then she told him the time … 5:37 PM.

Fortunately, this time, she didn't have a known neighborhood homeless guy in mind to describe to her avenging angel friends, so nobody was arrested.

Perhaps skulking around the neighborhood where her ex-husband Coyote Shivers works didn't generate the drama she craved, leaving her no choice but to invent a random attack. Or perhaps she's setting the stage for a carefully choreographed Mental Breakdown, in hopes that it will eventually absolve her of all responsibility for the lives she has tried so hard to destroy. Whatever the reason, this little episode will likely be quite useful for the defense when David Merck goes to trial to take the rap for Pauley being seen by a passerby, disheveled and disoriented, sprawled on the sidewalk near her home.

The good news is that Our Dear Pauley's audience is finally beginning to see behind the mask that continues to slip. The comments on the TMZ article are priceless! Grab some popcorn.

"Yeah, this makes me question the first time."

"Hmmmmmmm something is just a lil [sic] but off with this chicky."

"Sounds like she is seeking attention…..2 homeless men attacking her, sounds too conquencidental [sic] to me."

"I think she really needs testing. Something not quite right with her."

"Drugs a second time too."

"She must not live near a Walgreen's. She needs a perscription [sic] refill- stat!!"

"TMZ should title this thread, "The C-list actress who cried wolf." Obviously, she has "issues," first she was attacked by her boyfriend, and then she was attacked by her ex-husband, and then an attack by a homeless person and now another claim of being attacked. Hmmm… I wonder what she'll be calling TMZ about next week. It wouldn't be another "attack" would it?"

"Pauley, if you would just stay out of drug neighborhoods trying to score you wouldn't have these problems. Doesn't NCIS pay you enough for you to afford one of those "Concierge: drug services?"

"What is this crazy bish doing to cause all this wilding-up of the hobos? She looks like a swirling vortex of insanity."

"Is Pauley off her meds again ?"

"oh chr!st. this girl thinks she's on the path of righteousness. she's actually on the path to institutionalization."

I hope this trend continues; it's been a long time coming.

Rate My Family Court

Ruth Nichols · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Family Court Experience: Ratings by Parents

Family Court is convened to hear matters involving children and families.

What happens when Family Court makes rulings that parents deem are not in the best interest of their child?

This is an opportunity to participate in a survey on parental experiences in Family Court.

To see change, a voice must be heard and that voice must have meaning.

For many parents in the Family Court system, they have no voice!

Would you like to have a voice in the Family Court system? We want to know more about how the courts handled your child custody and child support issues. Here is a place to share your experience in the Family Court system! Go to: www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com is an on-line survey examining how parents experience the Family Court system.

Rate My Family Court ~Ignore the Parents NO MORE!

There are 2 ways to Rate My Family Court:

1. A 15-item questionnaire: www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-15qu
2. 250 word description: www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-Describe

Family Court

Navigating the Family Court system is an experience that affects countless individual parents and families, profoundly. Family Court can be confusing, daunting and extremely stressful.

Divorce is an emotionally charged event with life altering consequences. For some parents, the court rulings that are handed down result in emotional devastation and financial ruin. Notably, the logistics of the decisions of the courts ultimately contribute to the breakdown of the parent/child relationship. In severe cases, the child's relationship with the alienated parent is forever ruined.

The families in Family Court have become a topic of vulnerability.

Children are growing up in the midst of parental conflict. One parents' attempt to place restrictions on the relationship of the child with the other parent are successful. Court orders for visitation are ignored, with no repercussions.

Families are at risk!

How does this happen?

A brief overview of Family Court shows that Family Court is designed to provide court services in a fair, economical, individualized and timely manner. The intent of Family Court is to 'help' children and families. While many parents may agree with the premise of this intention, the reality is that, many decisions made by Family Court fall short of the intent.

Furthermore, experiences of emotional and financial destruction are not country specific. The judicial system that deals with family matters in other countries presents similar experiences for the parents and families. Sadly, parent/child relationships across the globe are negatively impacted due to the rulings of the Family Court system.

10 Things to Know About Both Surveys

1. Why create a survey to evaluate the Family Court?

This is an opportunity to share your experience in the Family Court System!

By taking this survey, parents have a voice! There is strength in numbers! There are many states that still need to address the issue of Family Court reform. The presumption of 50/50 custody needs be the basis for court rulings in all states.

2. How much time do I need to complete this survey?

Survey 1: Three minutes. Two, if you read fast.

Survey 2: One to five minutes. Parents who have spent time in Family Court typically, can readily recall the details.

3. Do I need to provide my name?

No names are requested. Any names will be deleted.

4. Do I need to state my country of residence?

No. First, results will be calculated based on all surveys that are submitted. A second analysis will be done by each country. If the country is provided.

5. Can I state my co-parent name and place of residence?

No. The objective of this survey is to obtain information about the Family Court system. Any identifying information will be deleted.

6. Do I need to answer all questions?

Survey 1: No. Each parent can answer as many or as few questions as they like. Each question is analyzed individually. Statistical analysis is based on the questions that ARE answered. If there is no response for a specific question, the statistics will reflect the total number of responses that were provided. Each question is an opportunity to provide meaningful data.

Survey 2: There is only 1 question that requests a description. If you do not want to respond to the question there is no need to take this survey.

7. If I change my mind about participating can I have my survey results deleted?

Yes, IF you have the date and time (hour and minutes) the survey was completed. Results for Survey Monkey are posted by date and time. If you have the date and time your survey was completed we can locate your survey and delete the results, per your request.

8. What happens with the results from this survey?

Survey 1: Responses from this survey will be analyzed and submitted to a journal with an audience of judges, attorneys, mediators, family court members and mental health professionals.

Survey 2: Responses from this survey will be analyzed from a qualitative analysis perspective. We are looking for common themes, issues and emotional experiences. Results will be will be submitted to a journal with an audience of judges, attorneys, mediators, family court members and mental health professionals.

Results from both surveys may also be posted in a summary format in an article or at www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

Survey 2 offers the option for your comments to be displayed in summary format only.

Note: We are sensitive to the nature of the information. Any specifics provided will not be shared to protect you, your child/family.

9. What if I have questions about the study?

Forward questions or concerns to: http://MyConfession@SharedParentingConfessional.com

Send private message to: www.Facebook.com/RateMYFamilyCourt

Mail to: 2506 East Chapman Avenue, #182 Orange, California 92869

10. How long will this survey be available to complete?

Survey is available now! No time like the present! Survey may be changed, deleted or extended depending on the response from co-parents and statistical analysis.

w ww.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

15 questions: www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-15questions

250 word description: www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-Describe

.

Coast Guard Petty Officer acquitted of rape

Michael Conzachi · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Another politically motivated military rape case; this time in the U.S. Coast Guard, results in acquittal. Another innocent U.S. Serviceman put through the false rape meat grinder.

U.S. Coast Guard Petty Officer Greg Cooper was court-martialed last week at the Coast Guard District headquarters in New Orleans, Louisiana. The Coast Guard charged him with sexual assault, abusive sexual conduct, adultery, indecent conduct, making a false official statement, violating a lawful order and dereliction of duty of incidents in 2011 and 2012. [1]

Cooper was cleared of all charges except one fraternization count, which resulted in him being reduced in rank one stripe.

His attorney, retired Navy Commander John Wells of Slidell Louisiana, said his client was convicted of violating a policy barring fraternization, because of a "consensual relationship." [1]

Mr. Wells, who is the executive director of Military-Veterans Advocacy Inc., said the rape allegations involved two women who asserted they were assaulted in 2011 and 2012. He said the charges against Cooper stem from a, [1]

"Witch hunt atmosphere" within the armed services that pushes military commanders "into pursuing every sexual assault case no matter how questionable."

Wells further lashed out in a press release,

"This case is a wanton example of political correctness gone amok; it has to stop if we are going to have an effective military. The military has been plagued by political correctness, a liberal social agenda and a lack of leadership for too long. There is a place for women in the military, and they can play an important role. But like everyone else, they must be held accountable for their actions. In this case, no action will be taken against the two women who brought the charges." [1]

Mr. Wells stated,

"Early on, we discovered credibility issues with the complaining witnesses. We (the defense team) were disappointed that the Coast Guard Investigative Service (CGIS) did not conduct even a basic investigation. The charges did not make sense. In one case, the outcry came after Petty Officer Cooper broke up with the complainant after living with her for six months. The other allegations were made after the newly-married woman found out that a one-time liaison had come to light." [2]

Let's see; a break-up with a former live-in girlfriend and a one-night stand with a married woman; and when she learns her affair has been aired, she alleges rape which results in a court-martial.

Let's see, an incompetent, biased and politically motivated investigation by a military law enforcement agency?

Let's see, a cowardly military commander ignoring evidence of innocence and sending a case to court-martial to placate the likes of a Gillibrand or McCaskill, and their cohorts in the false rape cottage industry. I wonder if he soiled himself at the Gillibrand-McCaskill altar of the non-existent military sexual assault epidemic, or got aroused at the thought of getting some brownie points for throwing one of his own under the bus.

Are we beginning to see a pattern here, or is it just me?

How many times have we seen this kind of travesty of military justice, yet the usual gaggle of rape hysterics and their delusional shrills to which the majority of military commanders now capitulate to, have put a military man through the meat grinder of the non-existent military sexual assault epidemic?

Petty Officer Cooper has been acquitted of all but one weak fraternization count for a consensual encounter; I guess they had to find him guilty of something, but for all intents and purposes, his military career is over. His military record has already been flagged and eventually, depending on his current enlistment contract, he soon will be driven from the ranks.

A military man's career is in shambles and is probably over; he is probably in debt to such an extent that it will take many years to recover, if at all, perhaps a million dollars or more have been wasted, and the ones who created this disaster, the two false accusers, the incompetent and buffoonish Barney Fife Coast Guard investigators, his spineless and cowardly commander, and the corrupt prosecutors who put forth this case will all wake up tomorrow as if nothing has happened.

I wonder if Senators Gillibrand and McCaskill initially got that warm and fuzzy feeling upon hearing about another bullshit rape court-martial, but are now wallowing in their tears that another false rape case fell apart. They were probably looking for additional shrunken heads to decorate their offices.

Does this bother anyone?

---

[1] Coast Guard petty officer acquitted of rape charges, guilty … (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.nola.com/military/index.ssf/2015/09/coast_guard_petty_officer_acqu.html

[2] Coast Guard Petty Officer Greg Cooper – MilitaryCorruption.com. (n.d.). Retrieved from http://www.militarycorruption.com/gregcooper.htm

http://www.johnwellslaw.com/

http://www.fox10tv.com/story/29952170/court-martial-clears-coast-guard-petty-officer-of-rape-charges

Marc Rudov on Valentine's Day

AVfM Video Source · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

With Valentine's Day upon us we thought it would be good to run Marc Rudov's classic advice to men about the occasion: that Valentine's Day is a gynocentric farce that no self-respecting man should endorse.

featured

* · 12 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Valentine's Day for dummies

Peter Wright · 13 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As part of Valentines Day observations this year we are republishing some older articles, including this by Peter Wright in 2014 – Eds.

With Valentine's Day upon us once again, it's a good time to recount the history of the occasion and highlight the gynocentric farce that it appears to have become… or more accurately that it has always been.

Let's start with a primer about what Valentine's Day means for men, or rather what it should mean for men, according to advice columnist and relationship expert Brooke Miller. Here she addresses we men directly:

> First lesson: Valentine's Day matters. This really isn't debatable my darlings, just trust me on this one. Second lesson: Valentine's Day matters because… Because it's not really about Valentine's Day…it's a metaphor. Really? Yes, really.Valentine's Day is a metaphor for every other moment throughout the entire duration of your relationship when the woman in your life needs and wants and hopes you are able to joyfully and proudly step out of your way, and make it about her.
>
> Valentine's Day is a holiday decorated with girly-pink-sparkly-chocolate-flowery-hearts…and and and. February 14th could not be less stereotypically masculine if it tried. Although this holiday may not be about you, it is in fact, for you. It gifts you the opportunity to demonstrate the kind of guy you can be when put in a situation that is not about you. It shows that beautiful human being you're lucky to be with that you, you amazing man, are able to show up selflessly to any occasion.
>
> "Women know very well that Valentine's Day doesn't particularly matter to you, but making it matter to you, simply and solely for her… now that's a guy worth being with."
>
> Valentine's Day gives your crush or girlfriend or fiancé or wife, either a taste or a reminder (women love being reminded) of your ability to care about things not because you care about them, but because you care about her… and she cares about things. Get it?
>
> Women know very well that Valentine's Day doesn't particularly matter to you, but making it matter to you, simply and solely for her… now that's a guy worth being with.
>
> An acknowledgment of the day, a card, flowers, or even a romantic gift like a massage or spa treatment (hint hint) shows your capacity to put yourself aside even if she doesn't ask you to–especially if she doesn't ask you to… and put her first.[1]

So there you have it gents – on Valentine's Day step the fuck out of your own way and make it all about her, and while you are at it get rid of those preconceived notions that say love is meant to be bi-directional. And if you end up marrying one of the many narcissistic princesses who expect this kind of treatment make sure to remember that the day of your marriage, too, is "her day." In fact why beat around the bush – marriage to her will mean every single day of the rest of your life will probably be "her days" too.

But getting back to Valentine's Day, lets take a little look at the background of this gynocentric event.

Antique Valentine's Day card

Valentine's Day, the celebration of romantic love, first became popular in the High Middle Ages when the traditions of courtly love arose, and has been celebrated as a holiday ever since. However the precise origins of the concept are somewhat unclear, and the situation is made more complicated by the fact that there are no less than three Saint Valentines in the historical folklore.

The first written Valentine note was believed to be by Charles the Duke of Orleans who in 1415 AD, while imprisoned in the Tower of London, sent a love letter to his wife. An excerpt from that letter still exists in the British Library's collection and reads "I am already sick from love, My very gentle Valentine."

The date became further associated with romantic and courtly love when Geoffrey Chaucer incorporated St. Valentine's Day into his love poem "The Parliament of Foules." Chaucer, who wrote the love poem to commemorate the engagement of Richard II and Anne of Bohemia, linked the royal engagement with the pairing of birds and Valentine's Day. The holiday was also mentioned in Shakespeare's Hamlet, as well as by the poet John Donne, and has since evolved into what most would now consider the most romantic day of the year. Perhaps the most famous Valentine's poem is this one published in Gammer Gurton's Garland, a 1784 collection of English rhymes:

The rose is red, the violet's blue,
The honey's sweet, and so are you.
Thou are my love and I am thine;
I drew thee to my Valentine:
The lot was cast and then I drew,
And Fortune said it shou'd be you.

Card – boy on one knee

The tradition of exchanging gifts and tokens was established during the height of romantic love when people began to select their own Valentine's mates, and the tradition began to appear frequently in love poetry. The elaborate exchanges of poetry, cards, and gifts cemented it as a holiday for the celebration of love in European popular culture. Valentine's Day has since spread all over the world, and most nations still celebrate it on the 14th of February with flowers, gifts, and cards.

The soil in which the celebration bloomed celebrated love as illicit, passionate, morally elevating, transcendent, if at times painful and humiliating: the perfect recipe for an affair. Participants adopted the language of feudalism with chivalric men declaring themselves "love servants" who pledged themselves in submission, obedience, and utility to ladies whom they worshipped as both their overlord and moral superior. This feudalisation of love -so called by C.S. Lewis- was popularized by troubadours in poems and songs, providing both the model and the spirit we continue to express on Valentine's Day.

> Valentine's Day gives your crush or girlfriend or fiancé or wife, either a taste or a reminder of your ability to care about things not because you care about them, but because you care about her… and she cares about things. [Brooke Miller[1]]

By the 18th century it had become a widespread custom for men in all social classes to exchange small tokens of affection or handwritten notes on February 14. In the Victorian era, printed cards replaced written letters as a way to express emotions, encouraged both by improvements in printing technology and cheaper postage rates. In the 1840s, Esther A. Howland began to sell the first mass-produced valentines in America. This practice was extended in the 20th century to all manners of gifts, especially in the United States. With the advent of consumerism in post-war America, Valentine's Day became a day of gift-giving, from roses and chocolates to diamonds, and the immense popularity of the event tells us that the spirit of chivalry and courtly love is far indeed from being over.

While some couples might equally indulge each other on this auspicious occasion, more often than not it will be a day on which the man will worship a woman as his true overlord, with himself playing the role of gift-giving serf. Perhaps Valentine's Day will one day be worth celebrating if it becomes a reciprocal event, but until then the best advice for men on Vagina Day Valentine's Day will be to reframe the event as Go Your Own Way Day.

[1] Brooke on Boys: Why Valentine's Day Matters, Primer Magazine: A Guy's Post-College Guide to Growing Up.

Source: Valentine's Day: gynocentrism's most holy event

The Monstrous Male Gaze – Fiamengo File Episode 6

AVfM Video Source · 13 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Men have eyes! The horror!

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

London conference tickets – special offers end next Sunday, 21 February

Mike Buchanan · 15 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If you haven't already ordered your London conference ticket(s), you have only a few days remaining to do so, to take advantage of the Early Bird Discount or staged payments options. The deadline is 12:00 GMT, Sunday, 21 February. The first option will save you £40.00 on your conference ticket (£265.00 reduced to £225.00), while the second option will enable you to spread your payment of the full ticket price of £265.00 over three months, without paying a premium. You can order your ticket(s) here.

It is anticipated that tickets will not be available to order after 12:00 GMT, Sunday, 5 June, and they will not be available to purchase at the conference.

We now have 20 speakers scheduled for the conference – details here – and we anticipate a highly successful event. Journalists from major media organizations are already applying to cover it.

Please contact me (mike@j4mb.org.uk) if you have any queries about booking tickets, or any other matters relating to the conference. Thank you.

Life, liberty, and the pursuit of hirsutism

Doug Mortimer · 15 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sooner or later every male high school student has to come to grips with his facial hair or lack of same. For every overachiever who has a five o'clock shadow in 9th grade, there is a smooth-cheeked guy in 12th grade who wonders if he got shortchanged in the hormone department.

I see local high school boys waiting for the school bus every morning. I never see one with facial hair, so I'm sure high school dress codes still prohibit it. Of course, it is always fun to push the envelope. In my day, I did this by gradually extending my sideburns further and further down my ears. Eventually, the powers that be would take notice and say something, so I cut them back…then let them creep down again.

In my mid-20s I grew a full beard and had only shaved it off once, in the late 1970s, when I was between jobs and temporarily working as a movie extra. As soon as the production is wrapped, I let the beard grow back and since then have occasionally trimmed it but not shaved it.

Beards were so rare 40 years ago that little kids used to stare at me in public. Not anymore; today there's a good chance their fathers, uncles, and grandfathers have beards. Even so, I am amazed by the contemporary fashion of men with beards that cascade down their chests. Today it's not hard to find men looking like cavemen, like Old Testament prophets, like barbarians, like the Smith Brothers, like Gilded Age Presidents, like two-thirds of ZZ Top…like patriarchs! There, I said it!

Well, no good trend goes unpunished. J.A. Oldmeadow and B.J. Dixson, a couple of Australian psychologists, have studied the attitudes of bearded versus clean-shaven men in "The Association Between Men's Sexist Attitudes and Facial Hair" in the Archives of Sexual Behavior website.

If you're not familiar with this site, rest assured that these folks know what they're talking about. That's to be expected from an online journal that contains such insightful articles as "Changes in Sexual Behavior and Attitudes Across Generations and Gender Among a Population-Based Probability Sample From an Urbanizing Province in Thailand" and "Concordance of Demographic Characteristics, Sexual Behaviors, and Relationship Attributes Among Sex Dyads of Black and White Men Who Have Sex With Men." If those topics are too convoluted, you can always read "Penile Strangulation Caused by a Seal Ring."

According to the authors of the facial hair article, the results are classic good news/bad news. The good news is that men with facial hair did not score higher on "benevolent sexism;" the bad news is that men with facial hair scored higher on measures of "hostile sexism."

Well, that sounds pretty serious until you note that the authors define hostile sexism as strongly agreeing with statements like "Once a woman gets a man to commit to her, she usually tries to put him on a tight leash," or "Women seek to gain power by getting control over men."

This is hostile sexism? Not terribly flattering to the fair sex, but hostile sexism? Well, count me in. And probably the regular visitors to this website. And more than likely, men who have never even heard of this site or MRA or MGTOW.

The authors decided that a hostile sexist grows a beard "because it maximizes sexual dimorphism and augments perceived dominance." They then note that men with facial hair are perceived as "more masculine, mature, dominant, and aggressive."

Gee, considering how much money some men spend on gym memberships, power ties, and tailored suits to appear more masculine, mature, dominant, and aggressive, I wonder why anyone would resort to such an easy, inexpensive way to achieve the same thing? Growing a beard is a totally passive experience. It's probably the most yin thing a yang man can do.

Ah, but what about the women? After all, what they think about beards is far more important than what men think about them, right? Well, another Australian study by R. C. Brooks and B. J. Dixson (there's that man again) enlightens us on that score.

In "The Role of Facial hair in Women's Perceptions of Men's Attractiveness, Health, Attractiveness and Parenting Abilities," they discovered that women gave bearded men higher masculinity ratings, but the highest attractiveness ratings were reserved for clean-shaven or stubbly men. The ideal for the latter is ten days of growth. Exactly how one measures this length and maintains it is a mystery. If you remember when stubble was the province of hoboes or men on extended fishing trips, you're showing your age.

While women may not like full beards, there is one compelling reason for a man to grow one. It's a direct affront to the feminist chant that women can do anything men can do. Oh, I know some old crones in training have mustaches, but that's a long way from a full beard.

Well, pardon me, ladies, if I don't apologize to you for my beard, even though it reminds you of your inability to grow one and perhaps by extension your other inadequacies. And when you look around and note that men everywhere are sprouting beards, gee, it sucks to be you.

Unfortunately, if it comes down to choosing between celibacy and facial hair, most men would likely shave their beards. Even so, I suspect a full-bearded man with a penthouse, a Porsche, a yacht, and a closet full of Armani suits would not have to face that dilemma.

So what would happen if the beard craze spread to the point where all men had one? If women wanted male attention, they would have to learn to like or, at least, overlook beards. But I suppose that would be just another manifestation of internalized misogyny.

The jury appears to be out on shaved heads. Women's hair may be thin, but they don't go bald, and they don't shave their heads, so a bald man may be considered masculine by default. Admittedly, times have changed since the Book of Judges was written, but remember where Samson got his strength. Also, the military buzz cut has always symbolized a young man's initiation into collectivism.

There may be good reasons to shave one's head or beard (say, if you're a fireman), but doing so just to please women is not one of them. Even worse is manscaping, the removal of body hair. Oh, I suppose it reduces drag for competitive bicyclists and swimmers…but that's a tiny minority of men. The main reasons for doing so are cosmetic.

Apparently, this fad of removing body hair extends down to high school boys. This is a truly mind-boggling development. In days of old, a young man could hardly wait for puberty to arrive. The late-blooming boy who had to shower in public before sprouting pubic hair was a pathetic figure. No one wants to be the anchor man, but some poor schmo will get stuck with that status until his hormones finally kick in and he can announce to the world, "Today I am a man." It's kind of like a physiological bar mitzvah.

As with beards, the opinion of women is of paramount importance, and manscaping appears to be more to their liking. But why at this point in time would women be expressing this desire? It could be equality rearing its ugly head, the old goose vs. gander thing…hey, I shave my pubes, so you need to shave yours too. Unlike beards, pubic hair is a unisex post-puberty phenomenon.

I suspect the female pubic depilation fad likely started because scanty panties, bikini bottoms, and thongs made it necessary. Strippers, of course, have always paid close attention to groin grooming, since the sight of a tarantula attempting to escape from a G-string would spoil the aesthetics of their performances.

Female removal of pubic hair is an intriguing topic, but this article is about men, and I don't want to get sidetracked by the wooly monkey's endangered status. A man may have some preference for the appearance of a potential partner's mons veneris, but I suspect that once the squirrel cover comes off, he's not going to recoil in horror no matter what it looks like.

For both sexes, removal of body hair simulates neoteny, the persistence of childhood characteristics into adulthood. To increase sexual marketplace value, women want to appear as youthful as possible at all ages; a man may be able to exploit boyishness and cuteness up to a point, but eventually it won't wash anymore. At some point, a man's got to look like a man's got to look and to shave his body goes against the grain. His body is just as smooth as it was before puberty, just bigger. There are women who prefer that look, but why? Is it because the idea of dealing with a boy is less intimidating than dealing with a man? Or is it a cougar/maternal thing? A mother's control over her son is much greater before puberty than after.

There are even worse implications. A man without body hair resembles a neutered man. Surgical castration removes testosterone from the body, which eliminates the growth of body hair. For obvious reasons, eunuchs were sought after to guard harems. Another form of employment was in store for the castrati of Italy. These were boys who were castrated before puberty to preserve their soprano voices. No need for a wax job for eunuchs or castrati…there was nothing to wax. In fact, in Sex in History, author Reay Tannahill substitutes the adjective "shaved" for "castrated."

A hairless little boy will one day grow up to be a man; a castrated man has an incurable case of arrested development. The more hair you remove, the more domesticated – i.e., submissive – you are. A man who removes his body hair is symbolically emasculating himself.

Of course, if that describes you and you believe in truth in advertising, then go ahead and shout it out.

Personally, I wouldn't brag about being a thoroughly modern mangina.

Triumph the Insult Comic Dog Talks to Young Voters

AVfM Video Source · 15 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM is a nonpartisan organization and does not support any specific candidate. This video is posted for your entertainment only. AVFM Editorial staff.

Triumph discusses gender identity, microaggressions and trigger warnings with young college voters as part of Triumph's Election Special 2016. (NSFW)

If you like this video, please subscribe to Hulu.

Uncompromising Positions

andybob · 16 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) has been subject to all manner of criticism over the years, much of it libellous mischaracterizations intended to demonize its adherents as rape apologists who are reacting to the loss of unearned male privileges by attempting to silence women and make the world less safe for them. These critics are completely unfazed by the fact that none of them can offer any valid examples of MHRAs doing any such thing. This is because feminists regard lying to protect their precious narratives as acts of ideological heroism – necessary and commendable – and when the lies begin to founder, shame, shame and shame again. Being honest never seems to occur to them.

However, a good deal of the criticism aimed at the MHRM comes from well-intentioned voices within the movement, as well as from sympathetic views close to it. This criticism is often concerned with the uncompromising positions of 'A Voice for Men' (AVfM) and how it may be misunderstood or misinterpreted by the public as a whole, particularly those popularly described as 'fence-sitters', as being too harsh, accusatory and confrontational.

This criticism is often accompanied by calls to keep in mind that most people outside the MHRM are blithely ignorant of many of our ideas and concepts and that uncompromising positions appear to hold such people accountable for their ignorance. This elicits resentful and defensive responses which undermine attempts to raise these people from ignorance to awareness. In other words, people are going to be angry enough about the nature of your message, so you had better deliver it as gently as possible.

To this, I would point out that maintaining an uncompromising position and delivering it in an uncompromising manner is usually what it takes to shake people's misandric assumptions to their very core. By uncompromising, I don't mean stubbornly refusing to budge on issues when credible contradictory evidence is presented – compromising one's intellectual integrity is morally unacceptable. I mean allowing people to weasel out of acknowledging that their opinions are based on assumptions which denigrate men and promote the bigoted notion that their rights and welfare matter less than everyone else's.

Being uncompromising is not allowing feminists to claim that their radical elements dwell exclusively, or even largely, on the fringes of their movement – and speaking up the moment someone follows, "men do have some valid issues" with the word, 'but'. Being uncompromising is calling out misandry the moment you see it and not accepting ignorance as an excuse. It is refusing to allow anyone, man or woman, to define an individual man's masculinity for him. It is rejecting the concerns of tone-policing hand-wringers worried that adopting uncompromising positions might upset people – and writing these hand-wringers off as obstacles to achieving the goals of the MHRM.

Mainstream media pundits like to label AVfM as radical. The idea that men are human beings with an intrinsic value whose rights and welfare should be addressed and respected may be a radical concept for some people. It isn't to me, and it shouldn't be for anyone who lays claim to egalitarian principles, which the overwhelming majority of online bloggers like to do. Reading through the comments sections of news websites reveals that most people's egalitarian principles rarely extend to include men and boys, exposing these alleged principles as nothing more than shams. To the uncompromising MHRA, the question of whether someone's gynocentric worldview is ideologically driven or borne of ignorance is ultimately irrelevant.

For example, the comments following a recently published article on 'Daily Mail's' online site about Yazidi women joining a battalion known as the 'Force of the Sun Ladies' to fight ISIS is riddled with complacent acceptance of male disposability as well as the assumption of the moral superiority of women.

Here are but a few of the 1300+ comments:

> The women do the fighting while the cowardly men run off to Europe."
>
> They only need to fight because their men folk are weak, useless cowards."
>
> And the husbands, fathers, brothers and neighbors ran off to the EU and left their wives, sisters and daughters to be kidnapped, raped and killed and to fight for their country. Round all the men up and ship them back to fight."
>
> Here come the girls!!……well-done ladies I applaud your bravery. Just wish the sad excuses for men currently lying around Europe were anywhere near as brave in fighting ISIS."

Aren't women wonderful? Fortunately, there was a lone voice amidst the 'you go girl' hysteria (yes, 'you go girl' was actually one of the comments) and the chorus of man-up shaming willing to enlighten these ignorant people about the reality of recent Yazidi history in which the men suffered at least as much as the women – a point which the 'you go girl' brigade was more than happy to overlook:

> People are quite rightly applauding these women. But you do a disservice when criticizing the men. Most were massacred as the women were captured. These brave women soldiers are bearing both the trauma of enslavement by ISIS and the deaths of their beloved family members, most of whom were male – including brothers, fathers, husbands and sons."

A few attempted to challenge this lone voice:

> Where are the men [who are] supposed to be fighting for their country. Are they all hiding?!"

She responded:

> Do you mean the Yazidi men? They were rounded up and massacred while their womenfolk were held captive."

One tried the old 'women as chattel' routine:

> As tragic as all this killing is, this may be the one chance women in this region will have to assert their proper place as equals not chattel."

The lone voice wasn't having any of it.

> "In the main, the Kurdish men and women are equal (and the Yazidis are part of the Kurdish community). In fact, it's the Kurdish culture for men and women to fight side by side in the military."

A lone voice belonging to someone who refused to allow their intellectual integrity to be compromised smashed the narrative to dust, and all she (I know it was a 'she' because she happens to be a good friend of mine) had to do was stick to the truth, reject the women good/men bad paradigm and refuse to accept the idea that men are disposable utilities.

Another article on 'Daily Mail's' online site tells of the ordeal of Mark Pearson, who was acquitted of a "sexual assault by penetration' which CCTV footage proved did not occur – in fact, it could not possibly have ever happened.

AVfM's Editor at large, Erin Pizzey, had no trouble identifying Mark Pearson as the real victim in this case, and knew exactly who to blame: The false accuser who is above the law and the feminist-run criminal system which put her there. This is Erin Pizzey's comment:

> The CPS have recently been wrongly targeting men and it has got to stop,' she said. 'The CPS had no business going after him [Mr Pearson] because there wasn't a case there from the very beginning. At the moment, women seem above the law. They can do it in domestic violence cases – simply pick up the phone, no evidence required, and have a man removed from his family and his children – and they can do it with rape, too."

Don't expect much sympathy for Mark Pearson in the comments that follow. Someone called Cheryl blamed Pearson for speaking "to the police against the advice of his solicitor enabling the police to build a case against him. He paid a high price for his ignorance of the legal system and for ignoring professional legal advice."

LondonGal suggested that "someone else touched her up, but she thought it was him because he made eye contact with her." A White Knight rode in to defend the false accuser by suggesting that she "suffers from a mental illness and may well believe what she said." He blamed "the police and doctors" because they "should have seen that." Many cited the waste of public money as the main reason this case angered them.

Predictably, the majority of the commenters identify women as the 'real victims' in all this:

> As a woman, this sort of thing really annoys me. She has done no favours to real victims of sexual assaults."

> It is vexatious and spurious claims like this make it harder for genuine victims to come forward."

> The fact that there are women out there who are willing to have a man prosecuted on false claims only makes it harder for women who have genuinely been assaulted to successfully win their cases."

> She is a disgrace to women, and creatures like her actually make it more difficult for women to go through with genuine cases of sexual assault, as they take away the credibility of real sufferers."

Women may not be believed? Are they kidding? This woman came forward with an allegation of sexual assault which video footage proved beyond any doubt to be a total fabrication, and the police and the prosecutors still believed her. An uncompromising MHRA doesn't dismiss the claim that publicly exposing false sexual assault allegations may result in future claimants not being believed because they are misogynists who don't take rape seriously – they do it because it is so obviously and demonstrably untrue. They also admonish those who fail to recognize that the real victim of any false rape allegation is the man who is falsely accused. Those who fail to understand this as implicitly as Erin Pizzey does have no right to refer to themselves as egalitarian – they are misandric bigots.

Fortunately, there are some women who are waking up to the fact that what happened to Mark Pearson does not bode well for the men in their lives, and are not willing to compromise the rights and welfare of these loved ones for anyone or anything:

> This is terrifying. As the mother of a 14-year-old, I worry so much for him – it seems women can claim pretty much anything, and even when it's proved that she lied, it's still the man that suffers. She needs to be named, and charged with false accusation!"

One of the topics that many would like some MHRAs to adopt a less uncompromising position towards is feminism. As one of those MHRAs who refuse to compromise either with feminists, or about feminism, allow me to use the following example to illustrate why I regard this ideology as nothing more than a totalitarian hate-movement full of rabid ideologues who pose a clear and present danger to men and boys – and those inconveniently independent-minded women of integrity who refuse to toe their line.

Recently, a disabled student veteran studying at the Texas Christian University was asked by a feminist professor, Dr. Melita Garza, to write a blog post about feminism.

In his blog post, he made the remark that women today were "the freest and most liberated in human history." For this feminist heresy, Garza called the police and told them that the student's comment was "dark, offensive and inappropriate" and accused him of "bullying." She also reported him to the department chair stating that she was frightened by his references to women, which she found "degrading." She went on to say that she "was concerned about the safety of other students in the course, most of whom were women." As a direct result of her complaint, the student lost his military education benefits. It hardly needs to be added that she awarded him an F.

Just in case, anyone is in any doubt that radical feminists are running the show, the Dean issued a no-contact order to the student and barred him from the university community. This outrage occurred simply because a student dared to offer an opinion which dissented from a feminist narrative. It wouldn't have helped that he was a man – especially a disabled war veteran. So much for TCU's demonstration guidelines which state that "TCU firmly supports the rights of all members of the University community to express their views." Feminist-approved views that is.

Suggest to me that radical extremists dwell on the fringes of the feminist movement at your peril, because I can cite countless examples of radical feminists with real power doing real damage to real people. These examples are everywhere, which is why there is no excuse for people to be ignorant about the true nature and purpose of feminism – least of all anyone who identifies as a feminist. They can save their hollow rhetoric about equality for the 'Daily Mail' commenters who are more concerned about future rape claimants and public money than they are about a man whose life has been forever changed as a direct result of radical feminists in his country tampering with the due process rights of men and boys.

Like my fellow uncompromising MHRA, Janet Bloomfield, I am confounded by feminists, especially the 'why can't we all just get along?' variety, who don't seem to know anything about their own ideology.

Like Ms Bloomfield, I am more than happy to fill these morons in on the theories of Vanguard feminists whose seminal works are required reading in Women's Studies courses throughout the world because, like Ms Bloomfield, I've actually read them. They are nothing but the bilious bigotry of man-hating psychopaths masquerading as scholarship which anti-intellectual totalitarians, like Dr. Melita Garza, gobbled down like manna from heaven at some point in her formative years. Claiming ignorance of this is either an outright lie or evidence that a vast number of feminist students don't bother doing their required course reading – shame on them, either way.

Contrary to popular belief, the MHRM consists of a variety of people with a variety of approaches to challenging the narratives. I offer those who prefer the softly, softly approach my best wishes, as I would any fellow traveller. There is a place for them – it's just that, in my opinion, that place may as well be at the feet of feminists who may want to adopt them as a special project for proving to the world that they really do care about men. The narrative can never be effectively challenged at the heels of feminists. It can only be challenged by standing up to feminists and debunking their gynocentric narratives with intellectual integrity, pristine logic and a refusal to compromise. The rights and welfare of men and boys are non-negotiable, something which some of our opponents are slowly beginning to comprehend.

The day Suzanne McCarley first showed up in the comments at A Voice for Men was the only day I have ever jumped from my keyboard and punched the air – I'm usually above that sort of thing. 'Driver Suz' was here! I was already very familiar with this woman's intellectual honesty, eloquence, authentic commitment to men's rights and her profound ability to make bigots weep without getting a single hair out of place. Her presence here could only be a monumental asset to AVfM. I knew that it would take Paul Elam about two seconds to recognize this fact, and it did.

Like all of the MHRAs whom I respect the most, Suzanne McCarley refuses to compromise her intellectual integrity for anyone. This refusal to compromise is the key to her effectiveness, as well as to Paul Elam's leadership strategy, Karen Straughan's widespread appeal and Luigi Logan's (Fidelbogen) razor-sharp rhetorical discipline which was so essential in guiding me through the ordeal of debating feminists. The MHRM owes a great deal to MHRAs, who refuse to compromise. I'm referring to people like Kimski, who shows up everywhere to poke holes in feminist narratives. If a feminist is somewhere talking rubbish, Kimski is on it in seconds, persuading countless onlookers that feminism can and should be debunked – this man must never sleep.

Only recently, AVfM was accused of failing to offer public support to the hapless Roosh, an anti-MHRA Pick Up Artist (PUA) who admits to raping women. MHRAs, Dean Esmay and Bryan Scandrett, posted articles clarifying why they were flatly refusing to compromise their principles on the issue of supporting Roosh. Predictably, PUAs didn't get it, preferring to label these articles, and the supportive comments that followed, as betrayals of a fellow man by a bunch of 'betas' coerced into submission by the mean ban-hammer lady – which is how PUAs have always characterized Suzanne McCarley and her role at AVfM.

All of the MHRAs who matter the most pointed to the PUA response to AVfM's position on Roosh as one of the reasons why it has always been a mistake to compromise with PUAs. They have never liked or supported the MHRM, which is why PUAs have never lost any sleep over the extent to which they undermine its goals.

As more and more cracks appear in the gynocentric narratives so ruthlessly exploited by feminists, there will be more urgent calls for sites like AVfM to switch to a more diplomatic approach to promoting its goals. This would be a mistake. No compromises should ever be considered until feminists, like Dr. Melita Garza, have absolutely no power whatsoever to inflict the slightest harm on disabled student veterans, or anyone else, for voicing dissenting opinions. That, I regret to say, is going to take a while – and an approach that refuses to compromise with either man-hating bigots or those too ignorant to notice them and the damage they cause.

Mainstream feminism is radical

AVfM Video Source · 16 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Six Minutes discusses how feminists do not concern themselves with men and picks apart an Elizabeth Broderick interview.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HSvgXbwYiQs&feature=youtu.be

You can subscribe to Six Minutes on YouTube.

Feminism And The Manufacture Of A Modern Misogynist

Paul Milana · 17 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As a gay man and a haute couturier, I had always loved to be surrounded by the most beautiful of women and revelled in making them gorgeous creations which made them feel confident and powerful. As a nightclub doorman, I have learned to despise women and fear their proximity for fear of physical attack or false allegations of sexual assault. I am a modern misogynist, and the females of my species made me this way. This is my story:

All though I grew up in a family mostly comprised of domineering women, It all started in 2001 when I first opened my design studio and atelier. It was here where I created the most gorgeous gowns for the socialites of Brighton in the UK. My customers were amazing! The nicest of women who would be so humbled that I was going to make them the gowns of their dreams for their most special occasions. I was absolutely outrageous and lovely with them all, and they were all fabulous right back.

As a new designer, funds were tight, and an extra income would have come in handy. On the advice of a female friend, I acquired my door supervisors licence and began working as a doorman in nightclubs. Suddenly, by the same class of woman who had been celebrating my skill and talent as a fashion designer, I was being treated like some dumb heterosexual club bouncer who was too stupid to get a decent job and who was there to be manipulated and seduced if possible. Having never had issues with women whatsoever beforehand, I found myself being physically assaulted by condescending and arrogant women. Granted, the physical assaults didn't happen immediately. Only once their feminine wiles ceased to sway me in my decision on eviction did they get violent. I have been attacked by groups of women on several occasions because one of the group was disruptive and was being dealt with. I have been reported to and interviewed by police countless times (three of them being for false allegations of sexual assault) and have heard women repeatedly lie about me knowing that they can rely on their hetero-femme privilege to have police turn a blind eye to their sexist behaviour.

I have had one woman take me to court for having broken her arm while evicting her from a nightclub. Fortunately, security footage shown in court clearly showed myself forcibly removing the unruly woman from the bar and place her on the pavement outside of the venue, only to show her taking a running drop kick at me once I had returned to my position. Next frame shows me stepping out of her way and the woman smashing into the wall and breaking her arm. Had it not been for security footage, I would have had my life ruined by a hideous, deceitful woman who in her words said to me 'I'm not having a man do this to me! I'm going to ruin your life.'

These are some of the dangers men like myself face on a daily basis from the modern feminist woman. In reality, it's not just the modern woman who behaves in such a manner and exhibits little respect for men. Last year I was assaulted by a woman after hours in a bar I was providing security for. The woman in question was denied permission to go out for a cigarette after the bar was closed and people were finishing drinks. This woman punched me in the face full on and knocked me to the ground permanently damaging my kneecap. Again, police refused to charge her with assaulting me for fear of giving the woman a criminal record.

I later had a video chat with my mother and recounted the assault to her. Thank god I saw her face when she began to laugh about what I had told her. I asked her why she was laughing? She replied 'well, it is kind of funny don't you think?' I certainly gave my mother a dressing down! I explained to her exactly what hetero-femme privilege was. I explained to her that as a gay man, I do not play a part in the hetero male/female power battle of the sexes. As a gay male, I have never played any part in the alleged oppression of women, and I see no reason I should ever have to be assaulted because feminists refuse to take direction from men in a position of authority. These twisted views on male/female power struggle are passed down from generation to generation. My mother now knows to think carefully before she decides to force her female privilege onto a gay man who couldn't care less about the perceived female power struggle.

I mentioned earlier that I have been reported to the police for sexual assault against women. The reality is that rape and unprovoked assault against women by men is a rarity in society. Just recently here where I live, a local gay bar had a list of complaints to the police published in the local paper:

2014
February 20: Woman reports waking in toilets to find male sexually assaulting her.
June 8: Woman reports she was assaulted by door staff. Police find she was lawfully ejected.
September 28: Woman claims to have been assaulted by door staff – she was lawfully ejected.
October 16: Woman smashes glass panel.
November 5: Woman physically threatens drinker.

2015
January 19: Woman reports waking in bed with a man after consuming alcohol and an illegal drug at the pub.
February 8: Woman claims she was assaulted by door supervisor. She was lawfully ejected.
March 10: Woman falls down steps and claims to have been sexually assaulted. She later said there was no sexual contact.
March 29: Woman claims she was approached by a man in the pub before being sexually assaulted.
April 8: Woman claims her drink was spiked.
April 28: Woman claims she was sexually assaulted after meeting a man in the pub.
May 22: Woman claims she was threatened with a knife. Later found she started the confrontation and no weapon was involved.
July 25: Man assaulted a woman in The Old Steine after having been in the pub.

This clearly illustrates the reality of the dangers men face daily with dishonest and vindictive women. These false allegations of assault waste the time of the men accused and spent tax dollars through wasted police time. All women who lie about men to the police need to receive equal punishment to the sentence the man would have received. Women would think twice about lying about a man assaulting her if there were going to be an equally heavy penalty to pay if she is caught lying, I believe. The argument that fear of retribution would frighten women off reporting actual assaults doesn't bear any weight against men being unjustly dragged before the courts senselessly.

Females lie about physical and sexual assault committed by men regularly. This is illustrated by police statistics showing that only 5.7% of all rape cases result in a conviction. As a gay man working in the security industry, of the extensive list of accusations of physical and sexual assault women, have made to the police about myself, 100% of the allegations women have made against me have been false. I mean really, I would be more likely to fix a woman's hair and make-up than to assault sexually her while I am at work in a nightclub! Mine has certainly not been an isolated case. I have seen male friends lives destroyed by random women who have lied to police upon removal of a venue for the reason of being aggressive to others. Hetero-femme privilege allows women to destroy men without fear of punishment. Alcohol consumption is used as a valid reason as to why a woman should be excused for her bad choices and a male equally under the influence should finish in jail for a woman's bad choice.

The television series Quantico (series 1 episode 10) contains a prime example of the rampant Hetero-femme privilege seen on television. A female cadet recruit claims she was in an abusive relationship that made her feel afraid while admitting that her ex never physically hurt her. Because she wanted to ensure her ex could not see their child, she put on a fake scar behind her ear and lied about her ex hurting her physically to a judge in order for the cadet to manipulate a verdict in her favour. She gained custody and then abandoned her child to attend the Quantico recruit programme. The team instructor for Quantico exonerated the woman of her actions. How can a woman lying to the court about a physically abusive partner ever be condoned as acceptable and honourable behaviour? This is a mainstream television show telling girls it's OK to lie to police about men physically hurting them if it is a means to get what they want.

We are bombarded with images of female violence with women slapping and punching men in ads and video. Female against male violence has become the norm. The recent Irish documentary 'The Rise Of Female Violence' informs us just how violent female behaviour has become. Females refuse to accept responsibility for male retaliation to humiliation, degradation and violent attacks that females heap upon them. Why in the world do women believe that a man should never hit back? Fortunately, we gays have our unwritten code: If a woman hits a gay man, she gets hit right back till she stops.

I watched a documentary about the women left behind in the life of Gary Ridgway, the Green River Killer. At a certain point in the film, the women in his life were shown a video of Gary Ridgway talking about his motivation for killing women. Obviously, he was not all there from the start, but he did reveal that his hatred for women began as a young boy due to all of the domineering women in his life. He even confessed to leaving a family Christmas briefly to go out and kill a hooker to help him alleviate the irritation of the constant nagging from the women in attendance. I sat dumbfounded watching as all the women could comment on was that Gary Ridgway showed no remorse for what he had done. Not one of the women at all showed any remorse themselves by saying 'Oh my God!!! What did we do to him to make him do those things?' Or 'Had we not nagged him continuously that Xmas, maybe that poor women went out to kill would still be alive.' The utter refusal to accept even a temporary role even when told so by the criminal himself was incredulous! I was just shocked by the female refusal to own that their nagging and domineering behaviour fed into his twisted perversion.

Even female sex comic Amy Schumer understands everybody is tired of listening to women. 'I think people hate women," she said. "I don't think they want to hear a woman talk for too long.' (huff post-Amy Schumer: 'I Think People Hate Women' May 27, 2015 | Updated May 28, 2015).

It's time women like Senator Claire McCaskill kindly 'Shut The Hell Up!' and stop nagging the men of the world. We don't care what she has to say. Instead of her worrying about men telling women what to do with their bodies, the women in question should behave responsibly with their bodies and stop murdering viable babies because they are too young or lazy to raise them! Almost 1,360, 000,000 abortions have been performed globally since 1980. That's one billion, 360 million viable human lives snuffed out because 'the timing was wrong.' That figure equates to almost one-quarter of the planet's population now!!! I would much rather see the lives of a few careless women be inconvenienced for a few years of child rearing than a billion dead babies in a heap. I'm sure I have a billion lost souls who would agree wholeheartedly with me.

You would never guess that I was once a huge supporter of women. This is what feminism has done to me =(

Lancelot and men's love servitude

Douglas Galbi · 17 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In twelfth-century Europe, did men unquestioningly accept love servitude to women? Today, many men don't protest men being deprived of all reproductive rights whatsoever. Men say little about acute anti-men gender discrimination in family courts and child custody decisions. Men maintain stoic indifference to being smeared as rapists and being targeted on college campuses for absurd sex regulations. Perhaps men enjoy love servitude to women, relish working as slaves, and cherish being imprisoned. Yet Chrétien de Troyes's late-twelfth-century Arthurian romance Lancelot hints at a different answer. Men apparently resisted love servitude to women with the same tactics subordinate workers resist orders around the world today.

In Lancelot, a girl rescued the knight Lancelot from his imprisonment atop a tall tower. In popular romance, usually the white knight in shining armor rescues the damsel in distress from imprisonment atop a tall tower. The white knight Lancelot, however, was a manlet. That helps to explain some subsequent events. After the girl had rescued Lancelot from the tower, she took him to her favorite retreat, a country house, safe, secluded, and well stocked with provisions. There, servants removed Lancelot's clothes, which were filthy from his languishing in prison. Then:

the girl put him to sleep
In a tall, magnificent bed,
And later gave him a bath
And such wonderful care that I couldn't Tell you half if I tried:
She treated him as sweetly
As if he'd been her father.
She brought him back to life,
Completely renewed and restored. [1]

An earlier Latin romance, Apollonius King of Tyre, presented a much different account of a young man-doctor reviving a beautiful young woman. If the girl in Lancelot was receptive and not ugly, a manly knight might have expressed his gratitude to her in a more exciting way. Perhaps she noticed something lacking extension. That would explain why she gave him a bath and treated him as if he were her father.

Urging the girl to rescue him, the manlet Lancelot swore to be her obedient servant. He implicitly promised to be not like other men in servitude to women. Lancelot declared:

I swear I'll be yours to command
For all the rest of my life
…
there'll never be a day
When I won't do what you ask.
Whatever you ask, if it's in My power, will be done — and done as quickly as I can do it. [2]

Most women who order their man-servant (husband, boyfriend, etc.) to do something resent the response "not today." Lancelot swore that there would never be such a day. Another standard man-servant response is "later." Lancelot swore that he would obey the woman's orders "as quickly as I can." Lancelot, of course, hedged and qualified with words about his potency. Those reservations about potency probably were relevant when the girl gave him a bath.

From the commanding heights of culture, influential institutions and voices teach men to be subordinate to women. But boys aren't stupid, and men aren't stupid, either. Overpowered in social communication, men resort to passive resistance. Such passive resistance, however, isn't sufficient to advance men's liberation.

Notes:

[1] Chrétien de Troyes, Lancelot ll. 6670-8, from Old French trans. Raffel (1997) p. 210.

[2] Lancelot ll. 6597-8, 6001-5. The ideal of men's love servitude to women has come to be widely celebrated as courtly love (amour courtois).

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Feature image by Spencer Wright

Reference:

Raffel, Burton, trans. 1997. Chrétien de Troyes. Lancelot, the knight of the cart. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Eddy Baller interviews Dean Esmay – Part 2

AVfM Video Source · 17 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is part two of a two-part interview conducted this past summer. If you have not seen part one, it can be found "here." Editorial team.

Dean and Eddy talk about the nature of sexual abuse and assault, violent women, provocation, the generational nature of sexual violence, and more:

Eddy Baller is a Vancouver Dating Coach who focuses on personal development for men. You may also want to check out Eddy Baller's YT channel.

UK Police moving away from “Listen and Believe”, meanwhile in Canada...

AVfM Video Source · 17 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

While police in the UK want to move away from “listen and believe”, in Canada there are groups pushing for a separate court system (no doubt similar to the star chambers being used on college campuses, based on “listen and believe) for sexual offenses….

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n6YxPiDA980

Women: Where are all the good men?

Tim Patten · 18 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Right now, all over the world, millions of women are searching for a "good man." Even after decades of effort on the part of the women's liberation movement to empower women with the mantra, "I do not need a man," they continue on this seemingly endless quest.

The process to find a good man begins early by assuring little girls that they'll "meet a good partner one day". Indeed, they seem to intuitively understand that someone, someday, will take care of them for the rest of their lives. They are told, "When you're married, you'll be happy," as they bask in dreams of a fancy wedding and a life with a perfect soul mate. He'll be masculine, he'll work hard and he'll earn enough money to care for his woman and for her children. He will be strong, intelligent, healthy and courageous – all the while being by her side for protection and support.

For men, however, it is a different story. We don't ask for much. We like our women to be attractive. We like them to enjoy sex, and we like them to provide us with companionship. What we don't want is for them to try to change us.

It is these dichotic extremes that lie at the root of the modern global gender liberation phenomenon. A dichotomy where women are driving good men away.

Women and Society

The fact is that women and society at large have systematically stacked mountains of needs, obstacles and expectations in front of us men, challenging us to measure up to impossible standards of masculinity at every stage of our lives. Boys fend off schoolyard bullies, teenage males strut their stuff, and men feel compelled to protect females from even the slightest random belligerence. We are like cub scouts consigned to, among other things, helping little old ladies cross the street to earn our "real man" badge.

For the most part, women's studies, gender studies and society at large skirt around male suicide and other related issues. But this must stop. It is time to zero in on who – and what – is corralling men into the destructive confines of hegemonic masculinity.

One obvious question is this: Where is the relentless demand for the "good man" coming from? In truth, this gender "policing" abomination is perpetrated by everyone, whether they are aware of it or not. It reflects a gynocentric society rife with the crumbling artifacts of institutionalized patriarchy. But that is not the whole story. Most of the time, those we love most – especially the women many of us spend our lives chasing – place this straightjacket of idealized masculinity on us. They are a favorite object of love and desire and in return, they expect stereotypical masculine perfection. Many hold dear those things that will elevate partners to "good man" status. Our girlfriends, wives and significant others wield this power over us like a sword, or they leave us with hurdle after hurdle to jump over.

Relationships Between Men and Women

One day every young girl grows up and finds her true love, a good man, and an exclusive relationship ensues. The couple becomes entangled and sometimes will marry. Suddenly the man's responsibilities and demands skyrocket. Some men undoubtedly love the challenges of manhood and they experience a certain male pride when they assume responsibility for looking after a woman for the rest of her life. But for others, the burden of living up to an idealized version of manhood often leads to great stress and intense feelings of shame, anxiety, depression, and in extreme cases, suicide. These marital burdens have created an escape phenomena for many men.

Women often try to control their man by slapping, hitting, and throwing him out of their homes. Oddly, society and even many men seem to approve of this abuse. In fact, some of us do not seem to care if loving a woman is dangerous. It seems that for many females, the fear of male domination echoes incessantly inside their heads. To dodge male authority, women go on the offensive and begin subjugating and manipulating men to ensure that they won't be oppressed.

They also try to hammer us into submission with their words. They'll say things like, "He's a little boy who needs to grow up and act like a man." They make us feel guilty and shame us with ridicule. Another common refrain is, "If you were a real man, you'd…", along with other self-serving diatribes like, "If you love me you'd man-up, earn more and help me at home".

The woman's weapon of choice is a sharp tongue. While the things they say might smack of moral authority and loving concern, they often cut deeper than physical violence. The intent is to strike at our inherent male core. Many women are experts at inflicting pain through words alone while others rely on tactics like bickering and nagging to stoke our insecurity even more. This has the potential to force even the most independent and self-assured of us to cower—or worse. As an example of how critical this issue has become, a 2014 study found that verbal abuse was often a catalyst for husband suicides.

Male Fear

Our worst fear is being seen as something other than male. We can be humiliated and devastated by any suggestion that, because of passivity or effeminacy, we might be like a woman. We live in perpetual anxiety about being considered weak, gay, unfit or "unmanly"; it is our Achilles' heel. When women demand that we be a "real man," our adrenaline spikes; when they shout, "Man-up!" we become agitated. When they undermine our masculinity, our pride is destroyed.

And yet, women are the ones who are often afraid. They are so frightened by our powerful maleness that they command us to submit. But many women don't seem to grasp the emasculating impact that their abuse can have. Lacking our biology, they cannot understand our emotions at their most primal level. They only see that we react and comply. They have no real understanding of the damage their reckless behavior can cause.

The Role of the Women's Movement

We should not have to succumb to the shackles placed on us by the women's rights and social justice movements either. In theory, these hugely successful campaigns were intended to level the playing field between men and women. In reality however, many have been hijacked by extremists and then misinformed for nefarious purposes. While these hardline activists try to make their mission sound noble, their words often betray then, as evidenced by the popular media battle cries below:

"R.E.S.P.E.C.T."…"I am woman"…"Hear me roar"…"Ladies first"…"This is a woman's world"…"Nobody can hold us down"…"She dominates all access"… "You don't own me"…"We run this mutha"… "If you like it, put a ring on it"…"Who runs the world? GIRLS!"

Over time, the drive for equality has been transformed into a crusade for female advantage and a strategy for imposing their worldview on men. Women have been given special rights and they've signed misguided legislation into law – legislation that benefits them at our male expense. Many of these so-called women's movements have devolved into full-fledged man-hating struggles for gender supremacy, inspiring a significant backlash.

The Role of Sex

Unfortunately, our biological imperatives make things complicated and difficult. Even when women's demands are entirely unreasonable, most of us will comply because we are motivated by powerful and instinctual urges, most notable of which is our male sex drive. It is still not clear why society views this as an acceptable form of coercion and something used for the purpose of harnessing masculinity's unruly nature.

Once our male sexual appetite is triggered, we kowtow into submission, potentially sacrificing our long-term health and financial wellbeing by clinging to the false belief that physical intimacy is our reward for being "good." We are not just compelled to 'save the women and children first'. In many respects, we have become "vagina beggars". Like lemmings, we follow a dangerous and potentially disastrous course. We have become imprisoned, and women hold the key.

Liberation and Discovering Happiness

As Bob Dylan once wrote, the times they are a-changin'. Years of submission to abusive treatment and acquiescing to unrealistic expectations have taken their toll, and many of us are starting to ask some very pointed questions. Do we deserve to be treated like workhorses? Are we supposed to sit back and become totally marginalized, similar to how males in certain matriarchal African villages were relegated by the female leadership to the lowest rungs of the social ladder? Will we become nothing more than "manginas," capriciously and carelessly manipulated at the whims of our female overlords?

For millions of us, the answer to those questions is a resounding "no!" Good men around the world have decided to go their own way, and like us, they understand that there is nothing wrong with men or masculinity. They understand that they do not need to be schooled by women nor do they need to be enslaved to the family with little reward. A tsunami of male sovereignty is sweeping across our planet and we are grabbing the sword of opportunity to enlighten ourselves.

This growing movement of masculine awareness goes by many names – MGTOW, the Red Pill and Herbivore men. This new paradigm is helping us to understand our true selves, our unique assets and the techniques we can employ to end our toxic entanglements with women. We're learning how to liberate ourselves from a primitive and self-destructive social order. We're speaking out and helping to empower others to break free from the bonds of the biased relationship expectations of love, marriage and myopic monogamy – expectations that are enforced with female violence.

A New World

Gloria Steinman recently asked on Real Time with Bill Maher, "What's wrong with people using their talents and doing what they want?" As men, we want that liberation as well. For many of us, this is a new and exciting environment, and it's quickly changing for the better. It is a world where we can finally do what we want and work at the things that we love.

It doesn't matter whether we enjoy tinkering with automobiles, flying kites, dancing in a ballet, playing sports or prepping ourselves so that we may, by choice rather than compulsion, become leaders, inventors and creators. We seek to express and enjoy our innermost interests and talents, rather than toil endlessly in the pursuit of a life of inequality and lopsided relationships. We are realizing our right to define who we are, and we are choosing our higher purpose.

As men, we are amazing; we have the qualities and drive to change the world. Only now, it is our own decision to make. No longer condemned to live a life dictated by women and their obsolete restrictions, we can shed the debilitating confines of social expectation and truly relish the fruits of our labors. It is time to unleash the full potential of men in our society. A life of freedom and happiness awaits us!

Drafting Miss Daisy

Doug Mortimer · 18 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

When I was in college (Class of 1971) I had occasional dates with a small-town girl who was a senior in high school. She was an aspiring journalist, so she was up on current events. Inevitably, the topic of women's lib came up. I remember her narrowing her eyes and proclaiming in a lilting Tidewater Virginia accent, "It's not the kind of thing you want to take too far." I'm sure that in her mind conscription would have constituted a bridge too far.

As I write these words (February 2, 2016), the Selective Service System web site has a headline that shouts: "REGISTER: It's What a Man's Got to Do." It accompanies a picture of a young man with a backpack gazing into a mountain panorama (ironically, it evokes a feeling of freedom). If women are forced to register for the draft, that headline will have to be reworked. Maybe the guy in the backpack will get a photoshopped female companion.

However it shakes out in the future, registration has been a longstanding fact of life for American men. The Selective Service System we know today was originally set up in 1917 to provide manpower for World War I. It went away after the war only to return in 1940, and remained in place not only through World War II, but also the Korean War, the Cold War, and Vietnam. Registration actually went away in 1975, only to return in 1980. This was the result of a presidential proclamation from Jimmy Carter in response to the Russian invasion of Afghanistan.

And so it remains today: All men from 18-25 must register with the draft…if they have any hope of ever getting a student loan, government employment, job training, or are hoping to convert from resident status to citizenship. So if women are required to register, they will have to do so if they want continued access to government goodies – and you know how they don't wish to kick that habit.

So if the feds declare that females must register, that will surely be a landmark in the history of equal rights, right? Well, don't pop the cork on that champagne bottle just yet. Registering for the draft is one thing, getting drafted is something else, and getting sent into combat is something altogether different. Miss Daisy ain't laser cannon fodder just yet.

First of all, if females are forced to register, that doesn't mean the draft is coming back after more than four decades' absence. Even if a serious shooting war starts, the draft is resurrected, and females are called up for physicals, that doesn't necessarily mean they will have to serve on the front lines, or that they will have to serve at all. There are ways around it all, with or without a pussy pass.

The secret society known as your local draft board will have a lot to say about it. The composition of that board – e.g., how many women and how many manginas – will play a big part.

I was in the second semester of my freshman year in college when I visited my draft board to register. It was truly a rite of passage, but not one I looked forward to. Predictably, VFW and American Legion types exhorted the youngsters to do their duty, but there were no White Feather Girls out there shaming young men to sign up.

Activists against the war and the draft were legion. Some were out-and-out pacifists and some were specifically against the Vietnam War. I don't know anyone who burned his draft card, but the mass media dwelled on it.

The social justice warriors griped that poor and black young men were disproportionately drafted and killed. That egalitarian argument, however, did not extend to the absence of female draftees. The subject never came up. The second wave of feminism was cresting at that time, but it was quite choosy about which issues it washed over. That selectivity did not include the Selective Service System.

Conscription avoidance was a popular topic at bull sessions at men's dorms and frat houses nationwide. The college deferment was tried and true. So long as you remained a full-time undergraduate, you were safe.

I thought I was home free. Surely, that Vietnam nonsense would be over before I graduated. After all, America's involvement in World War II – the Big One! – lasted less than four years. Not only that, Richard Nixon said he had a secret plan to win the war!

Nevertheless, the rumble in the jungle dragged on and on. There was a distinct possibility that the war would still be going on when I graduated. So as reliable as the college deferment was, it was only a stay of execution.

Today, given the preponderance of women at colleges, the student deferment would be claimed en masse if a unisex draft were instituted. Come to think of it, bringing back the draft would probably do more than anything else to get more men to enroll in colleges. Having to put up with gender studies requirements and burdensome student loans would be a snap compared to combat in some Middle Eastern hellhole. Even a non-marketable major could serve a purpose, namely, keeping you alive.

Come to think of it, an increased demand for student deferments would likely prevent a lot of marginal institutions from going under – not necessarily a good thing. During the Vietnam era, Parsons College was a legend, but not in a positive way. Located in Fairfield, Iowa, Parsons was sometimes referred to as "Flunk Out U," since they would take anyone who could draw breath. At this point in time, It would be difficult to separate fact from fiction regarding this peculiar institution, which went bankrupt in 1973…coincidentally, the same year the military announced it was going to an all-volunteer system.

Four years before that, one of the singular events for young men of my generation occurred: The draft lottery. In the fall of 1969, every TV in the men's dorm was tuned to General Lewis Hershey, Director of the Selective Service System, picking 366 dates (1970 was a leap year) from a fish bowl and posting them in order. It was widely rumored that if your birth date was in the second half (183 or above), you were probably home free. The lower your number, the better your chances of getting drafted after graduation.

According to the Selective Service System web site, if the draft comes back, so does the lottery. So, young ladies, be prepared that one day the head of the Secret Service System may be (as in the lyrics of "Secret Agent Man") "giving you a number and taking away your name." Believe me, you won't feel special.

I must admit I did feel semi-special in 1969 when my draft number was close to 300; I was safe unless World War III broke out or Viet Cong saboteurs took out Disneyland. Highly unlikely, so on to graduate school! I cannot underestimate the feeling of relief that washed over me when I found out that my life would remain my own.

My roommate was not so lucky. His number was so low that getting drafted was a virtual certainty. Or was it? Next thing I knew, he was making regular visits to a cardiologist to make sure his cardiovascular "problems" were on the record. Funny thing…I'd been living with this guy for four semesters and he'd never said anything to me about health problems.

If young women are subject to the draft post-college, they can be expected to visit doctors in an attempt to get themselves classified as 4-F. Of course, the best medical excuse for a woman is pregnancy. I can easily see a female vulnerable to the draft doing everything possible – sperm bank included – to get pregnant before that induction physical. As soon as she is rejected, she can make a beeline to the abortion clinic and then resume her precious careeeeeer.

Ah, but there are other options besides pregnancy. Women can always play the conscientious objector card. Given the female penchant for deception, I think they could pull it off. In the meantime, better soft-pedal any professions of atheism.

Another option is obesity. In that regard, today's young women definitely have an advantage over the young women of my youth.

Of course, being a mental case will also exempt you. Again, advantage contemporary women, especially the ones with green hair. Raging misandry would be duly noted, since young women would be required to work with men. Horror of horrors, they might even have to take orders from male officers! So if the draft comes back, look for social media to be flooded with extreme expressions of misandry so draft-eligible females have a longstanding record of same.

In the old days, homosexuality was enough to get you off the hook. I don't think a profession of lesbianism would work today, however. Hell, a diesel dyke might prove useful in the motor pool.

As I recall, other methods of avoiding the draft were the stuff of urban legends. One was over-consumption of protein. Supposedly, over-dosing on eggs would do the trick. Another was going without sleep for several days.

Then there was the simple refusal to step forward. Supposedly, if the recruits who passed the physical stepped forward after being ordered to do so, that was tantamount to "volunteering" to join the military, thus avoiding the constitutional prohibition against involuntary servitude. Stand your ground and you cannot be inducted. If you get a chance, try it and let me know how it works out.

Probably the best known method of draft dodging during Vietnam was migrating to Canada. I could see a lot of women doing that if need be. There are plenty of jobs in Toronto and Montreal (and a good opportunity to practice your high school French), and Vancouver is scenic with a relatively mild climate. Anywhere in Canada would be a great venue for showing off winter fashions, so pack your Ugg Boots. Prime Minister Trudeau, arguably the biggest pussy sniffer of any contemporary head of state, will surely welcome American women as refugees.

At any rate, don't conclude that dead damsels will one day be coming home from foreign wars in Gucci body bags. It's one thing to sing the praises of female Army Rangers, Navy Seals, or fighter pilots before war breaks out. If it comes down to a life-or-death shooting match, I think the females, even if drafted, will be in the rear echelon. That would hardly constitute equality, but nubile, neotenous women at the peak of fertility being tortured, riddled with bullets, or blasted to smithereens would hardly boost morale on the home front.

Clearly, such a policy would be discriminatory, but there is an upside for men. Whining about male privilege will likely be suppressed by the mute button.

CALM DOWN!! Restoring Common Sense to Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 18 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Minnesota Republic is pleased to host Milo Yiannopoulos and Christina Hoff Sommers as they interview each other about the awful topic of contemporary Feminism.

Video provided by The Minnesota Republic

No more slapping

AVfM Video Source · 18 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Natalia is a young woman who has realised the negative influence the media can have on our relationships. No more slapping!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pyJXAallsyY

Also available in Portugese.

Learn more about Natalia's thoughts on the subject here.

Kampus Kangaroo Kourt – The Fiamengo File Episode 9

AVfM Video Source · 18 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

University of Ottawa's Dr. Janice Fiamengo asks "Is your son safe on college campus?" From the looks of due process rights, we'd say they are not.

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

Sabrina Rubin Erdely shows the other Catholic sex abuse scandal: Falsely Accused Priests

Dean Esmay · 19 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Remember Rolling Stone reporter Sabrina Rubin Erdely, who gave us the phony U-Va rape scandal, the one that nearly destroyed so many innocent fraternities? Well, it looks like Sabrina Erdely has a habit of putting fake rape stories in the news, and it wasn't just a one-off. She has been subjected to a blistering expose in Newsweek showing that she published an obviously false case that ruined the lives of two innocent Priests as well as a teacher.

Men's Rights Activists will be unsurprised she's gotten away with this before, and we should rightly wonder if there are other men rotting in jail or dead because of disgusting trash reporters like Sabrina Rubin Ederly. We might also wonder why we think every joke about Catholic priests and child abuse is all that funny, because as we know, with every rape allegation there is a victim 100% of the time: either a person was raped or a person was falsely accused.

Catholic Priests and Bishops are all men of course. Which also means every Priest you ever heard abused a kid was a man. And thus, so was every falsely accused Priest. And those falsely accused men have been the other side of the "Catholic Sex Abuse Scandal" that no one talks about: men who did no wrong, or far less wrong than they were accused of.

Those of us who've followed the Catholic Church's Sex Abuse scandal going all the way back to the 1980s or so know there's always been another side of this. Throughout the years, as you would read about cases, any number of them seemed dicey. Not all of them by any means; many in the Church did a whole lot wrong and many families never really saw justice. On the other hand, an independent study by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice commissioned by the US College of Catholic Bishops uncovered in breathtaking detail and thorough depth how much had been hidden from public view going back as far as 1950–but also found a significant number of reports with no credible basis. As others have documented, there's reason to believe that some of the reports deemed "credible" were never proven and hardly unquestionable. In some cases, the accused men never even had a chance to defend themselves before dying.

No, they weren't all innocent of course. But again, were they all guilty?

There is a tendency to smirk, or become outraged, and say that every report deemed credible by authorities simply must have been true. But with what we know of the criminal justice system, who wants to take that bet? As we all should know by now, every time there's a rape allegation there's always a victim: either the accuser or the accused.

And we know for a fact that in some cases, perhaps more than people want to believe, there were completely innocent men whose lives were destroyed because people thought they saw a soft target in a Priest.

Take for example the case of Father Charles J. Murphy, whose life was turned upside down when someone accused him of raping a little girl 25 years earlier. How good could the evidence have been after 25 years? Not very. He was eventually vindicated, and the allegations deemed without merit. Then a second allegation came, this from 40 years previous, with the flimsiest of evidence and an accuser with zero credibility. But all who knew him agreed: the allegations and the prison time eventually took their toll, and he died of a broken heart.

This is not the only case like this. There have been many other cases where Catholic priests were falsely accused or where the cases were highly questionable. Not just in the distant past, but quite recently. Once you see how fast society is to presume men guilty, and you recognize that culturally everybody seems to think it's OK to bag on Catholic Priests as child molesters, you have to ask yourself: how many other innocent man were accused, or still do get accused, solely because someone sees a way to get a fast insurance settlement?

This question does not just go to Catholic priests of course. Men have been declining as a percentage of teachers for decades with little end in sight, and it's hard not to think that part of that is that these days they'll be treated like a sex predator if they're around young children.

But for many years it has been shown that Catholic priests are no more likely to abuse sexually than Protestant ministers (despite what you may have heard, the real scandal was the apparent coverup attempts) and in recent years it's been shown that Catholic Priests and Protestant Ministers are both less likely to sexually abuse than the average man. Meaning that these days, if you pick on Catholic priests, you're probably picking on men who have been repeatedly shown to be less likely to molest a child than you are.

In fact, some of us begin to wonder, as the press now begins telling stories of how Protestant ministers have a sex abuse scandal to deal with if we won't at some point have to write an article about how Protestant ministers were persecuted and hounded by people who presumed them guilty–even though we already know these men are less likely to offend than the average male population.

In the meantime, do you know what the biggest sex scandals are? The ones no one talks about: public school teachers are wildly more likely to rape kids than Priests or ministers. So are female prison guards.

But still, we live in an era where "listen and believe" are the words that can destroy any man's life on a whim.

And we have to wonder how many other victims, religious or non-, Sabrina Rubin Erdely has yet to account for in her journalism. And how many other Sabrina Rubin Erdelys are currently working in the press that we don't even know about. Whether it's religious men or not that they're accusing.

Jewish Imam bitchslapped by Hitchens for circumcision joke.

Gary Costanza · 19 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sorry to say, religion isn't the only reason we circumcise babies. There is profit, tradition, "it's cleaner," female preference, male preference, ignorance, misandry, "looks like dad," "doesn't look like dad," etc. . . . all dictated by everyone but the infant.

Here's a classic Christopher Hitchens video where he takes the opportunity to FTSU – literally – for the children.

https://youtu.be/L4yS08N0xeU

> Jewish Imam bitchslapped by Hitchens for circumcision joke. https://t.co/7Kv6eSODr4 #nocirc #intactivism #MGM pic.twitter.com/VI5pWef0iq
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 20, 2016

To Kill A Mockingbird: All men are Tom Robinson now

Dean Esmay · 19 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Ed. note: Harper Lee, author of To Kill a Mockingbird, passed away today. In remembrance, we are reposting Dean Esmay's MHRM classic review of that story.

I was asked recently by someone still learning about the Men's Human Rights Movement if there were any books, movies, or other media that are generally popular with or illustrative of what the movement is all about. He was really surprised when I mentioned Harper Lee's 1960 masterpiece, To Kill a Mockingbird. To me that's funny; I think Harper Lee's masterpiece more relevant today than ever.

Perhaps one of the great tragedies of forcing kids to read "the classics" while they're in school–and To Kill a Mockingbird is assigned reading in schools all over North America–is that they don't learn to love books like this, they learn to view them as a chore. So they move as quickly through them as they can, and then forget them. On the other hand, maybe it's a hidden blessing, as an article like this one might suddenly prompt them to remember it, and look at it anew as adults.

What most people dimly remember about Mockingbird is that it's a movie about racism in America's Old South. And while racism is an undeniable component of the story, a deeper examination shows that it is about far more, and if the only lesson we are to draw from it is "racism is bad," we've missed almost everything important about the book. Indeed, while Harper Lee is notoriously averse to speaking to the press or talking about her own work, according to multiple sources, in 1962 she did say this to the Birmingham Post-Herald:

> My book has a universal theme, it's not a 'racial' novel. It portrays an aspect of civilization. I tried to show the conflict of the human soul—reduced to its simplest terms. It's a novel of man's conscience . . . universal in the sense that it could happen to anybody, anywhere people live together…

By happy circumstance, if you lack the time or patience for reading novels (even though I've written a novel myself, I rarely have the energy for books anymore), the 1962 film adaptation is a masterpiece in its own right, widely available, and manages to be one of those few cases where a film is faithful to both the substance and spirit of the book.

If you've either forgotten or never read the book or seen the film, I'll give a short synopsis here, shamelessly cribbed from Sparknotes and a few other online sources. And yes, "spoiler alert," I'm giving away the whole story here:

Set during the Great Depression, a young pre-teen girl named Jean Louise Finch, who insists on being called by her nickname Scout, lives with her brother Jeremy ("Jem") and their widower father, Atticus. Atticus Finch is a lawyer and despite the terrible economy the Finches are reasonably well off and well-educated compared to most of society.

The children become fascinated by a spooky old nearby house called "the Radley Place," where a white recluse named Arthur "Boo" Radley has lived for many years. The children make up stories and games about the strange, obviously mentally ill Boo Radley, but when Atticus discovers this he lectures the children about not making judgements about people you don't know and trying to see life from another person's perspective before drawing conclusions. A series of strange events happen around the town, and in some mysterious way it looks like Boo Radley may somehow be involved.

Then the town is set in an uproar when a white woman named Mayella Ewell says she's been beaten and raped, and accuses a black man named Tom Robinson of being the culprit. Atticus agrees to defend Tom Robinson, and because most of the town assumes Robinson's guilt, Scout and her brother are subjected to abuse from other children as well as townsfolk, while Atticus himself also faces harassment:

While Robinson sits in jail awaiting trial, a mob gathers to confront and possibly lynch him. Atticus faces them down, and is apparently saved in part by the children themselves:

In the background of the story, the mysterious Boo Radley seems to still be lurking, and at times it seems he may be the guilty party, or somehow involved. On the other hand, there's reason to speculate that maybe no rape ever even happened. Still, as we read, it seems that there was an attack, and maybe the strange recluse Boo was involved somehow. But he's a white man the legal authorities and the town residents may be ignoring because he's, well, white. It's all very mysterious.

At the trial Atticus provides compelling evidence that Tom Robinson could not possibly have raped Mayella Ewell and, indeed, shows there's no evidence anyone was even raped, but only assaulted. Mayella, the daughter of a poor man and quite poor herself, uses shaming and histrionics to attempt to shut down Atticus' questioning of her rape story:

There is a clear lack of evidence of Robinson's guilt, and strong exculpatory evidence suggesting he was not even physically capable of either the alleged rape or the physical assault. Atticus even brings forth evidence that the real culprit who attacked Mayella is likely her father, who beat her to punish her for kissing a black man, and that her real motivation for lying is to avoid being shamed in his eyes and the eyes of the townsfolk. Atticus's closing arguments in defense of his client are seemingly impossible to dismiss:

And yet, in the end, based on no evidence but the emotional woman's word, the all-white jury convicts Tom Robinson. The young, lame, semi-literate, very poor Tom Robinson then attempts to escape prison, and is killed in the attempt.

Despite the guilty verdict, Mayella Ewell's father, Bob, feels that Atticus Finch dishonored him with the evidence that he'd beaten his daughter. He harasses Robinson's widow, tries to break into the judge's house, and finally even attacks Jem and Scout as they are walking home alone at night–only to be suddenly and unexpectedly stopped by the strange recluse Boo Radley, who accidentally kills Bob Ewell with a knife as he attempts to defend the children. Boo Radley was a decent man all along, and had only ever been guilty of being strange.

In the end, Scout realizes her father was right about putting yourself in other people's shoes, and that prejudice isn't just something other people suffer from, but is something all human beings, including herself, need to be aware of.

And by the way, if you get through the story and the words "Hey Boo!" toward the end don't melt your heart, your heart's made of stone–and you really haven't understood the book at all.

Certainly, To Kill A Mockingbird portrays racism. But at a much deeper level, as Harper Lee herself said, the story isn't about race. No, it's about prejudice. And while this probably wasn't her intent, the book also illustrates the fact that for centuries, the best way to get people irrationally angry and defensive is to accuse "the bad man" of hurting a woman.

As Alison Tieman put it in her rather extraordinary Threat Narrative series, in the chapter Son of Threat Narrative: The Ugly Tropes:

> A nation, an ethnicity, a class's vulnerabilities are always embodied by its women. Because of this, the most powerful threat narrative tropes revolve around one simple concept: "They're gonna hurt our women."
>
> This one is pretty self-explanatory, but I'd just like to note a particular progression in these threat narratives: they're correctly identified as classist, racist, and anti-semitic when they're directed against black men, Chinese men, Jewish men, Irish men, but when they're directed against black men, chinese men, jewish men, irish men, and every other group of men [AS MEN], they somehow morph into being "progressive social justice."

To Kill A Mockingbird's central plot line is about a man falsely accused of rape, and an entire community that presumes he's guilty and presumes that anyone who defends him is scum, while we are sometimes led–mostly by our own prejudices–to believe that another innocent man is guilty (of something or other) because he's just plain strange: "strange" means "different" and "different" means "dangerous" don't ya know?

I have said many times that we as men are all Tom Robinson now. I have had people scratch their heads in confusion over that, or become outright angry with me, suggesting that this story is about Racisim In The Old South–even though in one of the few interviews she ever gave about her own work, Harper Lee states unequivocally that the book isn't really about racism at all.

What Harper Lee wanted us to think about, besides her really good story, is prejudice, and the lack of empathy we develop when we don't try to understand other people as people like ourselves–the empathy that comes from putting yourself in other people's shoes.

What most of today's Men's Human Rights Activists notice is that, since To Kill A Mockingbird came out, instead of becoming a more enlightened society that thinks a black man deserves the basic rights of due process and presumption of innocence that are supposed to be the birthright of all free people, we've become more "enlightened" by putting the presumption of guilt on all men.

Furthermore, consider the context in which Harper Lee wrote her masterpiece: there was nothing shocking about suggesting a woman might lie about rape; 1960s American audiences were shocked at the interracial nature of the relationship, but not at the idea that a woman might lie about a nonexistent rape. Even the young children in the book, far from being "triggered" or traumatized by the idea that sexual assaults occur, discuss the idea rationally and spend time wondering themselves whether Tom Robinson raped her or if she was ever raped at all.

Indeed, while it has become a taboo subject to discuss in academia, back as the 1990s heretic researcher Eugene Kanin found that in studying why women in particular lie about rape, the most common reasons were "…to serve three major functions for the complainants: providing an alibi, seeking revenge, and obtaining sympathy and attention. False rape allegations are not the consequence of a gender-linked aberration, as frequently claimed, but reflect impulsive and desperate efforts to cope with personal and social stress situations."

Which, by the way, is exactly what Harper Lee shows us in her 1960 masterpiece, as the story makes it absolutely clear that Mayella Ewell was lying to protect her family and to cover up the public humiliation of having kissed a black man–a black man who had spurned her advances and tried to run away from her at that.

Fast forward to today, and it infuriates people to suggest that false allegations happen with any meaningful frequency, and we are told that even if a woman does lie, it doesn't really matter because most rapes go unreported anyway–which, as Angry Harry has so eloquently explained, is not a meaningful statement because there's no link between false allegations and allegations that go unreported.

Moreover, even if false rape allegations are very rare, the fact is that the consequences of one are frequently worse than an actual rape: a falsely accused man may have his life ruined, he may have his family destroyed, he may be raped himself in prison, or, as in Tom Robinson's case, he may ultimately wind up dead, which continues to happen to this day.

Leading Men's Human Rights Advocates ask a simple question: Do we care just about women, or do we care about justice for all?

Some may want to call it "progress" or "social justice" that we treat all accused men as badly as Tom Robinson was treated in Harper Lee's classic book, but I think that's setting the bar a little low. How about treating all men BETTER than Tom Robinson was treated?

I've said it before and I'll say it again, and I don't care who it offends, because the truth is offensive. When accused, all men are now presumed Guilty Until Proven Innocent. In other words:

We are all Tom Robinson now.

PostScript: While researching for this article, I discovered a claim on the (ideologically contaminated and always-unreliable Wikipedia) that no one has ever attempted to do a PhD thesis on To Kill A Mockingbird, which, if true, should not surprise. While this is one of the most acclaimed novels of the 20th Century, winning not just popularity but an endless number of awards and translated into countless languages, it's impossible to do anything more than a superficial review of this book without addressing the fact that its most central and dominant plot point is a woman who has lied about being raped.

Possibly during the 1960s someone could have written an academic thesis on this masterpiece, but it would have seemed too early when the book was less than a decade old. By the 1970s, feminist indoctrination became standard in academia, and despite the fact that this book was written by a woman, and is indisputably one of the greatest novels of the last 100 years, no one would dare: feminists would brand them rape apologists, and any actual feminist who tried analyzing the book herself would likely have an ideological meltdown trying to talk about it without disrespecting its author–and since the author is a woman, that would be unthinkable.

Why Black Men Need the MHRM, and Not Feminism

Walter Preysler · 19 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The mythic Neckbeard and Why Black Men need the Men's Rights Movement

The crux of intersectional feminism is largely, the co-opting of other social justice movements and putting them under the ideological umbrella that they are in control of. Feminists, particularly armchair academics and web pundits, have cast themselves as the champions of gay rights, black/minority rights and most recently, transgender rights.

This monopoly over advocacy for civil equality is a great disservice to men of disadvantaged groups, particularly Black men.

Feminist-styled theories of privilege, oppression and all their related narratives and neologisms are neatly adapted and applied to other movements. In the prevalent feminist narrative, the ultimate adversary is the white, straight, cisgender male, and it follows that all things antithetical to feminism have this mythic image imposed on them.

This is a fallacy, very much perpetuated by the fact that MRAs are still a very distant and silent to the average person, leaving them ready to believe any description of MRAs, no matter how disingenuous because they have no real-life reference to compare them to. MRAs are seen as characteristically white, and therefore racist, characteristically heterosexual, and therefore anti-gay.

This mythic image of the Men's Rights Movement, alongside the artificial monopoly over social justice movements created by feminist academia, has created a strange cultural perception, in which a woman's movement carries more popular credibility on the topic of the struggles of gay males or black men than does the men's movement.

Let's talk numbers. Police shootings are a very hot topic right now in the social activism community, a community that thanks to its monopolization by feminism is largely influenced and commanded by feminists. 95% of victims of officer-involved shootings are males. In a social climate where we are so willing to speak out against police violence (and rightfully so) are we so unwilling to frame this as a Men's Rights Issue?

Unarmed black male victims are the center of public discourse on the subject of abusive violence by American police, and rightfully so. While white men are not exempt from being the subjects of unjustified police shootings, such as 17-year-old Devin Guilford, who was white and unarmed when he was fatally shot by a Police Officer, Black men are more than twice as likely to be fatally shot by a police officer compared to the national average.

In fact, many Men's Rights concerns are more starkly visible when applied to Black men; under-representation in colleges and Universities disproportionally affects black men compared to black women by a huge margin.

Social men's issues, such as culturally prevalent ideas of being seen as inherently violent or dangerous, being seen as uncontrollably and animally sexual, being subject to challenging and burdensome masculine gender roles, and being depicted as inherently inadequate parents are four of the strongest examples of how men's issues are particularly visible in Black America.

Rape is considered a feminist issue, and this is fairly reasonable considering that (outside of prisons) the majority of rape victims are female. Acid attacks in the Middle East are considered a feminist issue, this too is reasonable as the majority of acid attack victims are female.

However, when 95% of officer-involved shootings involve male victims, and nearly 100% of slave laborers in Qatar are men, we are not allowed to frame this as a men's rights issue, instead we are expected to allow feminists, the proprietors of all social justice, to speak on their behalf, because the dominant feminist rhetoric that depicts privilege as a one-dimensional zero-sum game, and rationalizes all injustice as a creation of an institutional monolith (The Patriarchy), there is no room to discuss or describe any of these issues as being exactly what they are: MRA concerns.

It's time for men to speak for themselves. The Men's Rights Movement does not contain in its central dogma an adversarial narrative of a "Matriarchy." There is no need for the MRM to erase women's issues to support its beliefs. Feminism, however, mercilessly and consistently erases men's issues.

Being built on a foundation of false dichotomies and a social narrative that is child-like in simplicity, with even undeniably true men's rights issues being casually dismissed as "the patriarchy backfiring" and going unaddressed. Such a movement cannot be trusted to hold authority or credibility over Men's issues of any kind, and that their pundits are at the forefront of issues that disproportionally affect men cannot be allowed to continue.

The primary victim of “equality” is not your daughter

Hannah Wallen · 20 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image “Iraq” by The U.S. Army on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-SA).

In December of 2015 Defense Secretary Ashton Carter made the decision to integrate women into every area of military services. This has resulted in a variety of responses, including a bill by two representatives intended to force debate on Capital Hill over women’s role in the military. The bill, titled “Draft America’s Daughters,” would extend to women the requirement for Selective Service registration which currently mandates that men age 18-26 register for a potential draft.

Some have touted this as a step toward equality. Many, however, seem outraged at the idea of imposing mandatory military service on women during wartime, and in a more visceral way than folks are outraged when it is imposed on men.

The Blaze: I Will Not Allow My Daughter To Be A Victim Of Gender Equality

Blaze writer Matt Walsh, in his objection to imposing selective service registration on women, stated complaints which aren’t any less valid when applied to drafting men from the general population.

Yes, the Marine study Walsh mentioned found that on average, women lack in areas which would make them less capable soldiers, and a draft would not differentiate between weaker women and those who are strong, efficient, and tough. Well, guess what: Selective service does no different than that when drafting men.

There’s no algorithm added to the draft to weed out all men but the strongest, most efficient, and toughest. Oh, some men can be declared unfit for military service, but this generally entails an actual medical condition, not a lover’s loophole or poet’s prerogative. Standards for fitness for enrollment in the military often end up being relative to the military’s need for warm bodies. During a draft, they’re more likely to be relaxed. During the Vietnam war, young men who never in their lives could have been truly prepared for battle were sent overseas to die, some by a military that wouldn’t have accepted their enrollment had they volunteered a year prior.

This is not to say that forced military service is right; only that if women forced into it can be considered victims, the same applies to men.

When men are drafted, there’s no concern or consideration for whether their lifestyle has disposed them toward capable military service. They don’t get to decide they cannot handle the requirements of the job. They are expected to man up as they’re whipped into shape by a training regimen designed to fast track them from day one at boot camp to active duty. In fact, their lives depend on both their ability to do this and the ability of their fellow draftees to do the same. Their superiors are not gentle or tactful about making that clear because failure to understand and act on that knowledge can be deadly. It’s anticipated that men faced with such a situation will rise to the occasion, not because all men are physically equal, but because that’s just what men do.

Though Walsh’s generalization may be unfair, he has one point: The women he describes as “egregiously unfit recruits culled from sorority houses and Justin Bieber concerts” certainly don’t appear to meet that standard. The question is, why? If he were merely describing women as weak, he wouldn’t have had to mention sororities or concerts. He’d have used a more physical description. After all, frat boys and fanboys would be among male draftees, and nobody thinks that should exempt men from the expectations involved in military service.

What Mr. Walsh was referring to is society’s indulgence of the whims and interests of women and girls. Between the lines of that paragraph is the unwritten admission that among the general female population there is a disproportionate number of entitled princesses whose lives have left them emotionally unequipped to handle the rigors of military training. More than that, many young American women are accustomed to never having to put anyone else’s interests before their own. They’re used to always being entitled to choose whether or not to meet a challenge, always entitled to recourse when affronted, to remedy when they're hurt, and to refuse that to which they're averse.

What happens when someone historically so entitled to focus on herself and her own interests gets force-fitted into a job that depends on toughness and teamwork? What happens, not just to her, but to her team? Who does it affect when she can't or won't do the whole job?

The military is a more strict example of an expectation of men that exists in other physically demanding professions. Men can be disqualified from taking certain high risk or labor-intensive jobs, such as firefighter jobs, for failing to meet physical criteria such as lifting and carrying capacity, the speed at covering distance, and the ability to endure sustained physical stress.

Thanks to feminism, the same is not necessarily true for women.

FDNY drops physical test requirement amid low female hiring rate

Feminists call it discrimination when a woman is not given a gender-based exemption from a standard that has been used to determine men's eligibility for a job. Nothing is said about the many men who may have been disqualified from the position for failing to meet the same standard; it's only a problem when women can't get what they want.

Sometimes, it's also a problem when they do.

FDNY recruit failed her way into $81,000 desk job

Firefighter who flunked physical injured ten days into job

Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder received preferential treatment as part of an initiative to hire more women into the New York City fire department. She didn't just get preferential consideration. She was exempted from physical requirements she could not meet and given a desk job while attempting to train for and pass her specially nerfed physical after her previous failures.

Then, she suffered an on-the-job injury which indicates a failure to be mindful of her environment.

Fortunately for the New York public and her fellow firefighters, the special snowflake was not injured during an actual emergency. She lost her footing during a routine equipment check and fractured her foot. Had such an injury occurred inside a burning structure while attempting to rescue residents, it could have had deadly consequences.

Some might think that the military is not at risk for incidents like this. Certainly, feminists would have less success in influencing military regulations than they have at influencing standards for civil service positions. There's a huge difference between military administration and the administrations of other professions, right? Toughness is an integral part of the job, right?

The groundwork for change is already being laid. Prior to integration, fitness standards for men and women differed. Arguments are being made to keep it that way.

Gender equality? A double standard for women in the military

Pressure grows on Marines to consider lowering combat standards for women

Once again, standards which have affected men's military careers for years have suddenly become a problem because they're affecting women's careers. No concern is being expressed over the men whose career prospects were determined by which standards they could meet. No group is proposing to re-enlist men disqualified from service because they could not lift or carry enough weight, run fast enough or far enough, or endure rough enough conditions. Only women merit such consideration, even when they're striving to qualify for elite positions.

What does this say about the value of male soldiers, who are still subject and whose careers are still vulnerable to those standards? Are they less worthy of an effort to foster their careers than women are? Why is the double standard not considered discrimination against them? And if it's not, how do proponents of it expect it to affect their morale or their perception of their female colleagues?

This is also extremely dangerous, not just to the women being integrated into combat positions, but also to the men with whom they'll be training and, if activated, fighting. Relaxed standards for women could not only leave them less capable of handling themselves in conflict, but also less capable of fulfilling their duties as part of their team. They could become their comrades' worst vulnerability. If combat integration and an integrated draft are combined with unequal fitness standards, at the very least, male soldiers will be forced to pick up female soldiers' slack. For instance, would female draftees unable to fulfill the more demanding roles in the military, be granted safer, easier jobs? If so, wouldn't they be pushing men out of those jobs? And if, as opponents of including women in the draft argue, women are less capable, wouldn't this be a significantly impacting factor on the outcome of a man's experience of being drafted, making him more likely to be forced into a more dangerous, more physically demanding job? At worst, combining integration with lower standards for women will place them in combat positions with stronger, more qualified men. Those men will be forced to depend on support from, or even compelled to protect less competent allies.

Under such a circumstance, a male draftee sent to the front lines would not only be a victim of forced service, but also a victim of forced reliance on a comrade in arms who won't have his back. Why does a push by a minority among women merit thrusting unwilling men into this position?

Feminists and progressives are trying to have it both ways. The push to open all areas of the military to women is based on the assertion that women's capability is equal to that of men; the claim that anything men can do, women can also do. However, the push for lower standards for women directly contradicts that, especially when the claim is made that equal physical standards discriminate against female soldiers. It's an admission that men can do things women can't.

The two assertions are not compatible. Either women are as physically capable as men, can meet the same physical standards, and should be equally subject to them, or they're not, and the riskier and physically demanding areas of military service should be segregated. Subjecting men to a double standard is discrimination. To do so while demanding they serve with the beneficiaries of that double standard is worse; a slap in the face to men judged by those standards, and a continual risk to those who live up to them.

Patriarchy Confirmed

Greg Santos · 20 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The logic presented here is impeccable, or something.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=RK5eJQmSaXY

You can find more from SeñorMiniBagel here.

Contrasting perspectives on abortion (part 1)

David King · 22 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Abortion is a subject about which there are few dispassionate opinions. Nearly everybody who has any opinion at all (and who cares to express it), stoutly cleaves to that opinion, and it's very rare that somebody else's opinion is ever changed by it (so I am under no illusions in that regard, and it is not my purpose to persuade anybody of anything in this piece).

For that reason (amongst others), the subject pretty much always generates far more heat than illumination and is therefore usually off-limits here. In fact, the only time this publication has ever directly addressed the matter was a piece written by Paul Elam just over six years ago, in which he articulated much the same sentiments as those in these first two paragraphs.

Paul has recently broken his silence on the matter by publishing part one of what will probably be a ten-part series of videos. Evidently, I don't yet know the substance of his forthcoming arguments but, suffice to say, I take a different point of view from the thesis he has promised to prove so I offer this piece in partial rebuttal to Paul's series and to demonstrate that AVfM, itself, does not take a view one way or the other on the subject.

I want to underscore that one more time: the ideas expressed in this article are expressly not endorsed by AVfM in any respect. At most, this is my opinion in my personal capacity — and even then, you should not assume that I personally espouse any of the following ideas (unless I explicitly state that I do).

You never know, it's just possible that by the time Paul has finished, he'll have changed my thinking. But, for now, I'm going to argue that it is impossible to arrive at any objective conclusions, that any conclusion you personally arrive at incorporates an ineffable aspect derived from your own personal beliefs and that, therefore, you cannot expect others to concur with your conclusions.

In other words, it seems that there is no one right answer on the subject and, therefore, views that dissent with either or both of Paul's and mine may well be as valid as either of ours.

This is part one of what a four-part series, each of which is divided into sections considering the subject from a different perspective. Each section proposes at least one argument arising from that perspective, but I'll reserve drawing any conclusions until my final part, which I will write and publish shortly after Paul has finished his series.

One thing that may be conspicuous by its absence from parts one and two is the moral angle. It's not that I think abortion is not a moral issue; on the contrary, it very much is — but morality is not (in my opinion) the objective matter that some religious traditions hold it to be. I can give argument in support of that thesis, but I think we've got enough controversy on our hands already. If there can be different moral codes, then an argument from morality is going to fall flat for anybody who does not share that moral code, therefore I'm going to avoid the matter as much as possible until the end of part two.

The termination of pregnancy always involves three parties: the mother, the father and the … oh dear, in trouble already. Any word I could legitimately use is loaded with emotive baggage identified with one or other side of the debate. I'm going to punt for "foetus", because I've an interest in medicine and the medical perspective is what I will describe first. In the interests of consistency and technical correctness, I'm going to stick with 'foetus' before birth and 'child' or 'baby' after birth. Nothing should be inferred from my choice of words beyond whether the foetus-baby has been born yet.

The medical perspective

First, a bit of basic biology: Everybody knows how an ovum gets fertilised. What most people don't realise is how many things can go wrong from that point forth, or how many fertilised ova result in spontaneous miscarriage — somewhere between a quarter or a third of them (Wilcox et al, 1999; Wang et al, 2003) and anything up to 70% of them (Obstetrics: Normal and Problem Pregnancies (5 ed.), Annas and Elias, 2007). In the majority of cases, the mother is never even aware that she would have been pregnant.

TL;DR of what is supposed to happen:

1. The fertilised ovum (a zygote) begins to divide into a clump of cells known as a morula. These are undifferentiated cells, any one of which has the potential to develop into an independent embryo. (Sometimes the morula breaks apart; each fragment that survives develops into an identical twin.)
2. By about 5 days, the morula has developed internal structure and is composed of somewhat differentiated cells and is known as a blastocyst. This then implants on the uterine wall, in which the placenta, umbilical cord and amniotic sac will eventually develop.
3. This then develops into an embryo, where the foundational structures that will eventually develop into the major internal structures, amongst them the brain, spinal cord, vertebrae, heart, gastrointestinal tract and the Müllerian ducts (the precursor to the reproductive system), will develop.
4. Around week 9, give or take, the embryo is developed enough to be regarded as a foetus, by which point the brain and heart are already (minimally) functional, and the foetus begins to show signs of twitch-like movement. That movement is a sign of the developing musculature and central nervous system; nothing more should be read into it for reasons the details of which are either too gruesome or boring (except to neurologists) to go into, and I decline to tempt Dunning-Kruger any more than I have.

In order to get to foetal stage, an awful lot of things have to go right. The biggest single culprit for miscarriage is trisomy, where one or more of the nuclear chromosomes come in triplets instead of the normal pair. Most trisomies are fatal to the zygote/embryo, but a few are viable albeit with various (and serious) developmental problems (e.g. Down's Syndrome, aka Trisomy-21). Other causes include uterine defects, drugs (medicinal or otherwise, many of which are teratogens, i.e. cause major developmental abnormalities, including the anti-seizure drug sodium valproate and, infamously, the morning-sickness drug thalidomide), illness of the mother, hormone imbalances and physical trauma.

Medicine, as a science and as distinct from the subject of medical ethics, does not itself take a view on abortion so why does any of this matter? Because it establishes that pregnancies fail for many reasons other than (and more frequently than) by artificially-induced means.

From that, one could argue that, at least during embryonic development, if more than half of zygotes naturally fail to reach second trimester, and since terminations represent a minority of pregnancies that do, it follows that many more zygotes die by natural causes than by artificial and therefore there is nothing (yet) all that special about a given embryo and artificial termination (during first trimester) isn't all that different to what Mother Nature does much more frequently than her creation does artificially.

The mother and father's perspective

I'm treating these together because both cases have similar interests, one way or the other. The majority of people want children at some point in their lives so both mothers and fathers can have an interest in a healthy baby brought to term.

And, conversely, parenthood is a massive undertaking for which both parents need to be ready, or they won't sacrifice as is required to do the job properly. (Becoming a parent suddenly means you can't put yourself first anymore — and the arrival of an infant means that suddenly, there's somebody capable of nearly the full gamut of human emotion who is utterly dependent on you. Few can afford to maintain their previous lives while discharging such responsibilities diligently.)

The conflict arises when one parent is ready when the other is not. I'll deal with this from a legal perspective in part three. Beyond that, the only thing left to say (with respect to the parents) is that the playing field is not level even though in every other respect, equality is de jure. A father cannot oblige a mother to terminate, nor avoid financial responsibility if she won't, nor does he have any right to play an active role in his child's life if he wants to. A mother can choose to terminate, give up for adoption or raise the child herself. If she chooses to raise the child, she can oblige him where he cannot oblige her.

This much could be fixed by changes in law, but it is an unalterable fact of mammalian biology — it is the insurmountable sexual inequality — that the female of the species carries the developing foetus in utero for the duration of gestation.

I hope you'll pardon the coarseness of the analogy but, biologically speaking and to the extent that a foetus is a genetically distinct organism that grows inside its host's body until it is ready for its next phase of life, it is nearly indistinguishable from a parasite (I'll address why it isn't in part two) and it is unsurprising that, in some cases, the host wants rid of it.

Yes, I know I'm talking about human offspring here, but my remarkably tasteless turn of phrase was intended to give some sense of what it must be like to be forced to bear a child you do not want, particularly when pregnancy still poses a serious risk to life (also addressed in part two) and, in any case, can have a profound effect on health.

Though one does not own the rights to one's own body (Moore v. Regents U. CA), few would argue that one should not possess sole prerogative with regard to one's own body. Certainly, every person of competent mind possesses sole prerogative with respect to their medical care. Taken together, after all, those form the basis for opposition to infant circumcision; an infant cannot give any sort of consent (never mind meaningful consent) in respect of such cosmetic surgery, and elective surgery done without consent in any other situation is considered assault.

If agency, autonomy, self-determination and liberty mean anything, then it ought to include the right to determine what or who has the use of one's own body — yes, just as those things mean a man ought to have the right to determine who has the use of his body (and his wallet). Therefore, regardless of the basis upon which US Supreme Court cases Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton were decided, there seems to be a fair argument, from a woman's point of view, that she and only she has dominion over her body and, therefore, the decision whether to terminate rests solely with her.

Put in other words, the question in respect of a woman's body has moved on from privacy (which always struck me as being curious logic, but then legal theories frequently are) to a question of the right to exercise agency and self-determination. Again, I'll address these legal aspects in part three.

If that were the end of the story, then there probably wouldn't be much controversy. But it's not, because there are other considerations (even aside from moral ones), not least the interests of the developing foetus which, in potentia, shall become a human child, who has his or her own interests that directly compete and conflict with those of the mother.

In part two: The foetus' perspective (including term limits, viability, unavoidable terminations, and the value of the human condition). In part three: The perspective of the law and the question of the moral argument.

I invite and encourage civil debate in the comments section below, but please keep in mind that there's more to come and, regardless, such a complex topic would not cover every aspect in dozens of articles of this size. I'd also suggest that, because Paul and I are restricting ourselves to secular arguments, religious points of view are probably best avoided.

Pro-life and secular

Paul Elam · 22 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This video and others will run concurrently with some response pieces by David King.

The truth about Christina Hoff Sommers

AVfM Video Source · 22 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Video on the social contract

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=medVCq8eWPk

Atlantic Interview “Let’s Give Chivalry Another Chance”

http://www.theatlantic.com/sexes/archive/2012/12/lets-give-chivalry-another-chance/266085/

Hateful feminist quotes

http://thoughtcatalog.com/jake-fillis/2014/05/23-quotes-from-feminists-that-will-make-you-rethink-feminism/

Sommers Book Review

“Being a Man”

http://www.weeklystandard.com/being-a-man/article/13182

One woman's thoughts on "equity" feminism

Donna White · 23 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

After Paul's controversial video on Christina Hoff Sommers, some of the predictable dissents were quite hostile. One AVFM commenter, William Baker, is now insisting that Paul should step down and surrender control to activists who would view Sommers as an ally. His screed inspired the following response by new AVFM contributor, Donna White. Eds.

Imagine telling Paul Elam (founder of A Voice for Men), a man who has dedicated his fucking life to the rights of men and boys to "step down" from his podium because he has the balls to go against the ever so popular "Based Mom," Christina Hoff Sommers and her "equity feminism."

Will men ever learn? What the fuck is the point in me and other women standing in solidarity with men if they are foolish enough to keep falling hook line and sinker for the charms of some women?

Let me explain exactly what equity feminism is. Equity feminism is a less obvious "toned down" form of radical feminism. It doesn't address and has no desire to truly recognize the extent of men's issues.

Christina Hoff Sommers has rightly identified some of the problems with third wave feminism and has also brilliantly exposed where feminism got it wrong but she isn't exposing or critiquing feminism for the benefit of men, she's doing it for the benefit of women.

She's telling women to "tone down" their feminism and be less radical about it. She knows and has known for years that feminism is dying because it's becoming less and less popular among both women and men, so she wants to introduce equity feminism. A fresh new perspective on how to "once again" fool men into drinking the kool-aid.

Sommers believes in the old traditional value of chivalry. She knows that today's men are growing more and more frustrated with women because the efforts of those men are being continually trampled on and taken for granted. She knows women have become more and more entitled, showing less and less appreciation for anything men do for them.

Her brand of feminism is a call for women to tone down their rhetoric and mimic her more "equitable" approach. Equity to her does not involve addressing men's issues, rather it's a plea for women to start appreciating men a little bit more. That is not for the benefit of men but for the benefit of women. She knows that if things continue going as is, more men will be less willing to perform their "role" of provider and protector.

So equity feminism is basically a call for women to say:

'We're sorry men, will you continue to play second fiddle to us if only we'll agree to be less obvious about our hatred and contempt for you? If we pretend to be more appreciative of the sacrifices you make for us in exchange for the continued privilege of putting us on a pedestal?'

And men are falling for it once again.

Men everywhere have been blasted for decades, criticised for their treatment of women, stereotyped as violent and oppressive rapists, had their children separated from them and literally had all of their issues brushed under the carpet.

It must have softened them to the point that when a new and less obvious form of hatred arose it felt like a breath of fresh air. In reality, men are just being conned into accepting a less obvious form of the same evil.

Equity feminism is nothing more than gynocentrism behind a prettier facade. Superficially, it seems like a better deal for men because everyone is acclimated to feminism in the more familiar form of contempt and goodies for women.

Guys, no matter what form of feminism is introduced, it's still feminism at heart and that means men will remain secondary to women. You're basically being asked to continue playing second fiddle and continue to place women on a pedestal in exchange for some extra pats on the head.

Men are so used to being treated like shit for their efforts that these "equity" feminists think a little appreciation is all it takes for men to willingly accept a subservient role.

Are they right? Is that how low the bar is set here, guys?

I personally think more of men. I can't even begin to imagine that after all the years of hard work and dedication in establishing a men's movement that actually seeks to address men's issues, that men would give all that up and blindly walk into yet again another cunning trap.

Equity feminism is suited to tear apart the men's movement and again ensure that feminism, no matter what kind of feminism it is, is the only established voice of equality or "equity" between women and men.

Contrasting perspectives on abortion (part 2)

David King · 23 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is part two of my four part series on the quagmire that is the abortion debate. If you've not read part one, I'd encourage you to do so or this won't make a lot of sense.

As stated in part one, AVfM itself does not take a view one way or the other on the subject and the ideas expressed in this article are expressly not endorsed by AVfM in any respect. At most, this is my opinion in my personal capacity — and even then, you should not assume that I personally espouse any of the following ideas (unless I explicitly state that I do).

In part one, I covered the medical perspective and the mother's and father's perspectives. Now the hard work begins.

The foetus' perspective

Human foetuses are quite evidently not parasites as I glibly suggested in part one because no other parasite grows into anything like an approximation of its host and no other parasite has anything like the neural complexity that most mammals do.

As such, this is where things get really difficult because, unlike each of the parents, the foetus (later, child) is incapable of forming an opinion, nor articulate it if it could, nor consent in respect of a termination. It's not even clear that any of those things are meaningful in respect of a foetus because they all require a level of cognition of which even a newborn is incapable; indeed, theory of mind doesn't develop until the age of three or four years. Since we can't ask even a newborn for their opinion on the subject, we'll have to take a different approach.

Term limits, viability and when terminations are unavoidable

One way to do that is to consider how term limits are (or should be) bounded. At one extreme, willful, deliberate killing of a newborn is unambiguously murder. Since the difference between that newborn and a foetus a day or two before birth is vanishingly small, the difference between termination late in the third trimester and murder must likewise be vanishingly small.

At the other, given the number of zygotes that fail to reach second trimester (which, even at the lower bound of 25%, is still pretty common), the difference between natural miscarriage and artificially induced miscarriage seems likewise negligible. Moreover (and many people may not be aware of this), the antiprogestogen class of 'morning after' pills (emergency contraceptives, including mifepristone, aka RU-486) — the only class proven effective post ovulation — are, in fact, abortifacients, the same drugs used for early-term abortions. Between these two factors, it seems that there is no rational argument against first trimester terminations, only moral arguments (which, as I hinted at in part one, are not universal and are legitimately diverse).

Apparently, it's okay before the second trimester but not okay by some point during the third trimester (or late second trimester). So where is that point?

One common test is whether the foetus is "viable", i.e. can live outside the mother's body (however much medical intervention is required). It used to be thought that that point was at about 24 weeks, which is why the term limit is set there in many countries. Modern medicine has sometimes been able to sustain even a 22-week old foetus (now baby) ex utero, which is why there has been some debate (with good arguments on both sides) as to whether to reduce the term limit from 24 weeks to 20.

The Telegraph reported that though "later abortions were always distressing, […] early scans could miss abnormalities that became evident only later" and that a "BMA briefing document says that 22 weeks is the earliest that babies have survived a premature birth. But only one per cent born so prematurely survive and the chances of disability are high".

Another test is whether the life of the mother is at risk. Most jurisdictions permit abortions in order to save the mother's life (even in the Republic of Ireland). Make no mistake, pregnancy can kill: ectopic pregnancies (incidence 1–4%; maternal mortality 0.1–10% when treated [though at the cost of the foetus], invariably fatal to the mother if left untreated) and pre-eclampsia (incidence 2–8%, mortality 10–25% making it one of the most frequent causes of maternal deaths) to name but two common causes of maternal death. Term limits aren't really a question here because where indicated, the baby will be delivered by Caesarian-section and otherwise an abortifacient will be used. If the baby dies after delivery, then no blame attaches to the clinicians who saved the mother's life.

Why does any of that matter? It establishes that abortion is not okay after 24 weeks at the very latest, and also one circumstance where premature delivery/abortion is, regardless of the stage of gestation.

That concentrates the question in dispute to a window of weeks 12–20, with weeks 20–24 being a grey (or thoroughly muddy) area. That's an 8 week window in 40, or just 20% of total duration of pregnancy. Of course, there will be plenty who think that termination in the first trimester is equally unacceptable but, as explored in part one, there seems little basis to forbid first trimester terminations except on moral grounds.

We'll have to wait to see what Paul has to say about the developmental state of the foetus during that window so, for now, I'll contemplate a few questions and their implications — and I'm looking forward to seeing your perspectives in the comments section.

The value of the human condition

Is a foetus human?

Genetically, yes. Beyond that, I'm not sure how to answer that question except to say that the answer is a matter of definition and degree. An embryo, for example, doesn't much resemble either a child or an adult (which misled Haeckel into his now-discredited theory), and has few of the characteristics usually connoted by the word. The closer a foetus gets to term, the more human characteristics it acquires, although mainly only in appearance.

The question also invites the reply, "what if it is?" Well, what if it is? Let's see where we get with this next approach:

What makes a 12–20 week-old foetus so special that it is set apart from and warrants special status over any other animal (born or not)?

If the answer was "nothing significant", then abortion wouldn't be any more controversial than destroying a farmed animal for food or any animal to end suffering where there is no hope of recovery. Since it is more controversial, clearly there must be something special about human foetuses. But what?

Anybody who's owned or lived with cats or dogs will tell you that they each certainly have their own personalities, so it's not personality. Even though identical twins are genetically identical and have nearly identical life experiences, they can have quite distinct identities and personalities — and anyway, nearly all gametes (sperm and ova) are wasted, so it's not purely genetics qua human genetic material, either.

Nor is it the human body itself, because brain-dead people can still be "alive" in the biological respiratory sense, yet can't be murdered (because clinically, they're already dead and you can't kill something that is already dead); indeed, they can be harvested for organs, where doing that to somebody not clinically dead is a rather extraordinary form of assault (and, unfortunately, not one unknown to happen in some parts of the world).

Is it cognition or sentience, then? No, again, cats and dogs are certainly capable of feeling emotions and problem solving (indeed, as well as some quite extraordinary feats of comprehension and action) — and if they were the only criteria, then we'd have to reconsider public policy in respect of many animals because nearly all of those upon which we rely for food can feel fear and pain, etc.

Is it the potential of what a child could become? Ah, now we're probably getting warmer, but that's not enough on its own. To begin with, each gamete is potentially a person, given the right conditions and yet, as I've already said, a zygote isn't guaranteed to become a person, and nobody cares about wasted gametes (not even hard-core Catholics, who only seem to care about interfering with the union of gametes, and then only after the sperm has left the man's body; the contradiction lies in the fact that spermatogenesis is an ongoing process, with 200–300 million sperm produced daily, and unused sperm are eventually destroyed and reabsorbed by the body. In contrast, a woman is born with all the ova she will ever have, although she loses one (sometimes more) roughly every 4-8 weeks.)

In the event that a termination (or premature Caesarian-section) is the only way to save a mother's life, the mother wins out. Shall we infer that the mother is more valuable than the foetus, or else that the mother's only value is to care for babies and that, if by terminating this time, perhaps she may live to have another baby?

Neither are appealing alternatives but, if there is a third, I can't think what it is just now. This may tip the scales, though:

If being a living human is the only characteristic relevant to personhood (and associated rights and protection under law), then on what basis do we restrict the rights of children (say, to vote, drive or have sex)? The fact that we do (and that nobody sees any objection that we do) says that children are qualitatively different from adults and that, in some circumstances, it's proper to make decisions based on level of development. That doesn't mean children have less value than adults, but when it comes to the rights of children versus the rights of adults, apparently the rights of adults win.

As applied to a foetus, there is an argument that because even a 20 week-old foetus' level development is so low (not even viable ex utero) compared with even that of a newborn (and the moreso with a four year-old, apropos theory of mind), there is some justification for treating a 12-20 week-old foetus differently in terms of rights from those of a newborn.

How is human life valued? I don't know if there is any sensible secular answer, but it looks like it rather depends on personal perspective. I do know that in many areas of practice and law, it doesn't seem valued very much because all the evidence suggests that the right to life seems more highly prized than quality of life. If the BMA is correct about the prognosis for 22 week-old premature babies, what quality of life can such premature babies ever hope to have even if they do survive? For my part, I value quality of life above life itself (particularly with respect to end-of-life care issues, which is an entirely separate debate) because there seems no point in living if living means enduring an earthly hell (by way of example, tormented by one's dying, terminally-ill body). For the avoidance of doubt, nobody but the person in question has the right to decide whether to endure or not because of the same reasons of autonomy and self-determination I outlined in part one.

If I have any criticism for the pro-life perspective, it is that it does not go anything like far enough. If a human life is worth fighting for before birth, then it is worth fighting for the sufficiency of the necessities of life (adequate nourishment, housing, health care and an education until the child is old enough to fend for his- or herself) also — yet few who argue that the state should prohibit abortion seem inclined to argue, in the context of the abortion debate, that the state should also provide for the child should the parents be unable (or unwilling).

To the extent that where life exists it seeks to thrive, it is quite reasonable to assume that a foetus "wants" to survive (but, by that argument, so do bacteria and insects) and that therefore, termination deprives life of its goal to thrive.

The question is, does a foetus have any positive right to oblige another in order for it to thrive? In the secular context, only civil law can answer that, which I shall address in part three.

Other grounds for termination

No treatment of the subject can be complete without considering two special cases: pregnancy from rape and pregnancies in which the child would have serious congenital abnormalities that will lead to poor quality of life.

It seems too much to ask of a woman, who has already been violated once, to endure the pregnancy she never consented to (in any sense). I cannot see how that can be regarded as anything other than a second violation, in which case there is a strong argument in favour of permitting the termination pregnancies resulting from rape. That said, making an exception in the case of rape is, while compassionate, inconsistent with any philosophy, perspective or conclusion that would otherwise prohibit it. If it's not okay to terminate for other reasons, then it ought not be okay to terminate on this basis (however compassionate the motivation).

The question of serious congenital abnormalities is unanswerable in the general case without resorting to moral argument. I know how I feel about it, but I also acknowledge that those feelings are based on my own personal values that may change were I ever actually faced with that situation, so I don't expect or require anybody else to agree with me. This class, I think, is one of those where only the couple involved can decide.

In part three: The perspective of the law and the question of the moral argument.

I invite and encourage civil debate in the comments section below, but please keep in mind that there's more to come and, regardless, such a complex topic would not cover every aspect in dozens of articles of this size. I'd also suggest that, because Paul and I are restricting ourselves to secular arguments, religious points of view are probably best avoided.

Dr. Lissette Molina of Miami, FL botched circumcision, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 23 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Lissette Molina has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the “Women’s Health of South Miami” website we learn about Dr. Lissette Molina:

“Lissette Molina, M.D.

Dr. Molina received her Bachelor’s degree from the University of Miami and then received her Master’s degree in Physical Therapy from Nova Southwestern University. She then continued her education at Ross University School of Medicine where she received her Medical Doctor degree. She then completed residency in Obstetrics and Gynecology at Lutheran Medical Center in Brooklyn, NY.

Since completing residency, she has been in private practice and on South Miami Hospital’s medical staff since 2008. She is certified by the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology.”

There is however, more to this doctor’s story. Four years ago Dr. Molina was sued for botching a circumcision that resulted in unsightly permanent disfigurement that even further surgery could not correct. Read the story here.

Dr. Molina’s website doesn’t mention if she does circumcisions anymore, although I’m sure the practice she’s with continues to circumcise infants. I wouldn’t be surprised if she gave it up, and I would applaud her if she did, but since we don’t know we can’t say one way or the other. But we do know that she performed at least one circumcision and that’s why she’s a “Known Genital Mutilator.”

See the legal documents in the case here.

Under “Obstetrics” we see every nuance of care for the unborn baby and mother, from concerns about the immune system and consuming seafood, to the harm of smoking and drinking alcohol. Part of good nutrition includes proper vitamin intake which is very important to the mother’s and baby’s health.

After all this concern for the baby’s physical and emotional well-being, it seems ridiculous that we would then take only male infants and traumatically sever part of his penis for no reason and without his consent – like an animal being ‘fixed.’ Yet this is what happens thousands of times a day, mostly hidden from the sight of loving but uninformed and misled parents and family.

Read the latest statement from the American Academy of Pediatrics where they warn against procedures like circumcision for infants.

Since there is no risk or complication information about circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Molina’s practice information follows:

(305) 667-4511
6141 Sunset Drive, Suite 401
Miami, FL 33143

> Dr. Lissette Molina of Miami, botched circumcision, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/exAKh50egC #nocirc #MGM pic.twitter.com/EyPaWm2Ay4
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 23, 2016

Draft feminists, not beer

August Løvenskiolds · 23 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As a kid with a professor dad, I grew up on a college campus during the Vietnam war. My daycare from age 4 was spent in Physical Chemistry classes with my father, answering questions he had carefully coached me on once his students were stumped. My other memories of that time were the pervasive anxieties of the students over the military draft. Draft day was a nightmare even for a kid like me seeing the terrible stress those of draft age were going through. Draft beer, not people was a popular t-shirt of that time. Today, however, beer is a part of rape culture, so we need so find someone new to draft.

Do you remember the case about three years ago wherein a feminist lawyer's son was falsely accused of rape? Millions of young women are about to be just as verklempt as mommy Judith Grossman, Esq., was when the next consequence of feminism hits home like an AK-47 on full auto: conscription – the military draft – may be coming for the clown hairs cowering in their safe spaces.

Two current and one former GOP presidential candidate (Rubio, Bush, and Christie, respectively) have already endorsed Selective Service for women, and full combat roles for women become operational on April Fools' Day, appropriately. I believe the female draft and front line combat will transform both women and society in profound ways that will make people treat feminists in the same way that ISIS treats infidels.

As a Men's Rights Advocate and egalitarian I believe that women and men should have the same rights and responsibilities. It is this insistence on responsibilities that distinguishes MRAs the most from feminists who want all the perks of men but none of the pain. As things stand today, men must register for the draft to earn the right to vote, get government services, and avoid jail. Women get these privileges for free. The feminine insistence on a level of safety and privilege that men do not enjoy is about to come to a brutal end, and it is about fucking time women learn in the most violent possible ways what being a man is really like.

It's not like a microaggression at all.

Already feminists are recoiling in shock from a flavor of gender equality that reeks with all the savor of the piss bucket on a crab boat. No one should be drafted! They moan, and even, please don't protect us from rapists!

They would actually rather be fucked than fight nonconsensually. The horror of rape has finally been exceeded.

Conservative gynocentrists are also horrified:

- In Only a Barbaric Nation Drafts Its Mothers and Daughters into Combat, the White Knights on the Right at the National Review mewled [s]uch a policy inverts natural law and the rules that have grounded our civilization for thousands of years. Sounds like smashing the patriarchy doesn't work for them.

- In Threats Of Drafting Women Reveal The Lies Of Equality author D.C. McAllister at The Federalist, after giving a nice history of previous attempts to draft women, conflated legal gender equality with political correctness. She went on to wonder "What will be the societal impact of sending our daughters into harm's way, along with our sons, having them return home with missing limbs, debilitating head injuries, and broken spirits?" That's easy to answer, D.C.: feminism will die in the public eye, or in combat – take your pick.

Can drafted women soldiers function in combat?

Although each combat soldier might have eight or more soldiers behind her in command and support roles, those positions are usually filled by career soldiers; drafted personnel historically go disproportionately into combat roles for their limited service terms. Whether women and especially privileged American women, can be effective in combat is a controversial question.

As of 2013, eight nations formally allowed or forced conscripted women into combat roles with varying degrees of success. Of course, none of those nations have the female obesity or feminist “fat acceptance” movements to the level of the US, so our basic training regimens will need some heavy retooling.

Likewise, in the short term, drafting feminists will bring a bumper crop of rape and harassment hoaxers into the service, which is already suffering losses of morale and seasoned male personnel as a result of those false and feminizing tropes.

The solution to this is obvious: instead of sensitivity training for innocent men, the military should enforce temporary gender segregation during both training and new deployment until women soldiers harden and mature enough to accept adult responsibilities like those expected of men. After, say, three to six months of front line combat in all-female units, surviving, seasoned female troops, if any, should be toughened to the point where integration with their male counterparts can be explored.

This gender integration would be conditional on operational efficiency as well as male soldiers maintaining discipline and avoiding chivalrous protection of female soldiers, as well as female soldiers rejecting pregnancies and other bellyaching that undermine unit cohesiveness. Female troops can be instructed to regulate each others’ sexual continence and complaints the way women naturally “slut shame” each other in civilian life: a cadre of undisciplined women soldiers would lose the right to serve in integrated combat units once their fertility exceeded certain norms, making this sort of discipline contagious throughout the female ranks.

Society transformed

The first female conscripts should come from women’s studies classes as well as hair coloring services that support neon shades. Feminist women, true to their insistence on gender equality and closets festooned with combat boots, should make excellent and compliant candidates for front line duty.

Over time, with the series of future wars the US is facing over dwindling resources, hostile ideologies, religions, and Canadian queefing, parents will increase their insistence on fitness in all their children, girls included, or face the prospect of societal disapprobation as well as the slaughter of daughters. American education will have to swing back to the boisterous boy (plus girl, now) model of the draft-heavy 1960’s rather than the drug-addled ADHD model of feminized childhood we see today.

The ideals of a modified gallantry as a precursor to military discipline instilled in boys will necessarily have to be spread to girls:

- Self-control
- Stoicism
- Reason over feelings
- Competition, teamwork, and sportsmanship
- Glorious self-sacrifice for others
- The rejection of the weak and frivolous
- The priority of conformity over excessive individuality

Girls, who feminists tell us are equal, and even superior to boys should have no trouble picking this up. This is the feminist Lean In on both a diet and testosterone: society will teach our children to become gender neutral in a whole new way. Childhood traits we now see as masculine will become universal traits, and those we see as feminine will go extinct for those at or below military age, and perhaps beyond. The safe space will become the sparing chamber. Dollhouses will be forts. Princess tea parties will give way to war games.

Unicorns: weaponized. Sparkles: thermite.

Move over, Spartans. The Amazons are coming.

Of course, society could tilt the opposite way, embrace both the masculine and the feminine, and drive feminists back into the oblivion they so richly deserve.

We thank you for your service, ladies.

Combat payback

Doug Mortimer · 24 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I rub elbows with neighborhood hipsters, so I often encounter young women wearing combat boots. I don't understand how footwear designed for rugged, muddy terrain became fashionable with the Urban Outfitters crowd. Then again, I never understood the popularity of army surplus attire with college kids during the Vietnam War.

I'm sure that a young woman donning combat boots isn't indicating a yearning to be under fire in distant lands any more than a young woman wearing cowboy boots is a likely candidate for barrel racing. Still, given the possibility of female conscription, wearing combat boots could serve the same purpose as training wheels.

On the surface, the government sending women into combat abroad while ranting against violence towards women at home is more than a tad ironic. Granted, the opportunity to kill men in combat might appeal to a certain segment of feminists. But how would a distant soldier react when confronted with her opposite number on the battlefield? Would they engage in hand-to-hand combat or cast aside their weapons and unite against the patriarchy?

If female conscription becomes a fact, whatever year it is instituted, I don't think we'll ever see the President, the Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, or any of the other high sheriffs advocating that all combat troops be 50% female. Imagine a future President justifying such a policy by channeling Justin Trudeau and saying, "Because it's 2016…2017…2018…."

Actually, that analogy isn't entirely apt. Remember, Trudeau's kudos were a result of his avowal of gender equity at the highest levels of his administration. The American military equivalent would be promoting gender equity for officers but not for grunts. But just for kicks, let's explore the possibility that gender equity will be the wave of the future for combat troops.

The best argument against women in combat is the sociobiological one. Killing off young women at the peak of fertility could be interpreted as a cultural death wish, based on the fact that woman is the repository of those rare and precious eggs and man is a spermapalooza, plus the fact that gestation lasts nine months and ejaculation a matter of seconds. It's like the difference between War and Peace and a sound bite.

Then again, women in combat could be the culmination of a social death wish that began with female emancipation. Given the shrunken birth rates of today, however, one could say that if fertile women are not reproducing, they might as well be sent to the front where they'll be more useful.

The other biological objection to women in combat is sexual attraction. How preposterous to assume that just because men and women are comrades in arms that they are destined to become…comrades in arms! After all, men and women have been working together in offices, fields, and factories for years, and sexual sparks never fly in those venues, right? Right? Anyone? Anyone?

According to popular belief, women find a man in uniform attractive. And remember those tests that show how women are aroused by the smell of male sweat? Understandably, a heterosexual woman might find the military a happy hunting ground. (Feel free to write your own joke here vis-à-vis foxholes…or you can make some sort of play on words regarding hors de combat and whores de combat.)

On the other hand, women in uniform are far removed from women in lingerie. Whenever I see a female cop ("Dickless Tracy" is a phrase coined in 1963, according to the Urban Dictionary) or soldier, sexual arousal is the farthest thing from my mind. On the other hand, I would probably salute a uniformed top-of-the-line sexpot sexbot (the Jayne Mansfield 36D model, please) sitting on my lap. Come to think of it, Jayne Mansfield would have been a natural for combat, as she was always toting the big guns!

As you may have guessed by my reference to Jayne Mansfield (decapitated in a 1967 car wreck just weeks after I finished high school), my testosterone levels peaked 50 years ago, but I concede that a horny man in his late teens or early 20s could be sexually attracted to a woman in uniform. After all, those are the years when a man's ability to mentally address women is at its strongest.

Back when uniformed female police officers first became fashionable, a veteran cop opined: “Put a man and a woman in a squad care and all they want to do is fuck; put two women in a squad car, and all they want to do is fight.”

Well, I’ve already discussed the first half of that quote, but what about the second? Can women direct their aggressions towards an enemy instead of towards each other? There are numerous examples of the collective viciousness of feminism in the face of opposition, real or imagined. But if one of their number even hints about escaping from the feminist stalag they are more than willing to sacrifice the renegade to maintain solidarity.

Well, if the women don’t get along, it’ll be up to the men to break up any cat fights. That brings up another objection to women in combat: Men’s chivalric impulses will swell up if they see a woman in trouble, they’ll get sidetracked, and the mission will be jeopardized. That may be true at first, but over time, that sort of behavior may be extinguished.

Initially, the sight of female corpses strewn across a battlefield might be horrifying. But people will get used to it. As Cole Porter put it:

> In olden days a glimpse of stockings
> Was looked on as something shocking
> Now heaven knows
> Anything goes

Well, if we can get used to the sight of live female legs, we can surely get used to the sight of dead female bodies.

I’ve never forgotten a conversation I had with a World War II combat veteran, the father of a friend of mine. The conversation occurred around 25 years ago, yet I never forgot what he said.

According to him, combat grief evolved according to how much you saw:

> Stage 1: Oh, no! Joe was my best buddy! We went through basic training together! A minute ago he was standing next to me and now he’s a puddle of goo! Oh, God!
>
> Stage 2: Poor Joe. He was a good guy. Too bad.
>
> Stage 3: Whew! Glad it wasn’t me.

I suspect the same would hold true for dead G.I. Janes as well as dead G.I. Joes. After all, first responders see dead women all the time, and they get used to it.

Same goes for disabled women. We’ve all seen men with prosthetic limbs, so we can probably get used to the sight of women with same. In fact, those artificial gams might be even more shapely than the ones they were born with. Yes, with careful camouflage, such women can still inspire cat-calling. That downward dog asana might be a little more challenging, however.

Sad to say, but there are worse fates than losing one’s bodily integrity. A piece of shrapnel in a woman’s brain won’t necessitate amputations, but it could be a one-way ticket to Helen Kellerville.

Arguably, the worst-case scenario is the male protagonist of Johnny Got His Gun, a 1938 novel (filmed in 1971) by Dalton Trumbo. The first-person narrator is Johnny, a faceless (literally and figuratively) post-combat quadruple amputee who has lost everything but his consciousness. Sounds like a fate worse than death to me.

Also unenviable is the male soldier whose private parts are damaged so he will never again experience intercourse or fatherhood, or even the simple pleasure of waking up with a boner. The literary prototype for that situation was Jake Barnes in Hemingway’s The Sun Also Rises, published in 1926. A man with the inability to pass on his genes

(i.e., to regenerate) was the perfect symbol for the Lost Generation.

Now, what about a young woman who gets a battlefield clitorectomy? Well, if her vagina remains intact, I guess she'll be in a position to test those theories about the vaginal orgasm. (Required reading: "The Myth of the Vaginal Orgasm" by Anne Koedt.)

Ah, but what about the ultimate female disability: a blast to the crotch that leaves her with a useless uterus? At first, this might seem like a tragedy, but in another sense, it gives a young woman a head start. She won't have to wait till she hits the wall to mourn her childlessness.

Of course, in the future, once they work out the kinks in that artificial womb technology, maybe they can implant one in a sterile woman so she can still experience pregnancy. Given enough women in combat, one-day prosthetic wombs may be as common as prosthetic limbs!

While there may be some inevitable differences in combat-related mutilation, perfect equality is assured in other outcomes. After all, a female body can stop a bullet just as well as a male body. If that's not equality, I don't know what is. Instead of complaining about being under the thumb of dead white males, women can join them in military cemeteries – burials provided absolutely free of cost by the nanny state. After all cradle-to-grave security is the ideal, right?

When women are the property of the state (remember, G.I. stands for Government Issue), they too can partake of the erstwhile all-male privilege of putting their lives in harm's way. In this man's/woman's army, your life is not your own.So here's a suggested mantra for all future soldierettes:

So here's a suggested mantra for all future soldierettes:

> Not my body,
>
> Not my choice.

Great choice for a tattoo, eh?

The Man-Shaming Project – The Fiamengo File Episode 11

AVfM Video Source · 24 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Men, are you tired of being treated like an oversexed dullard who can't figure out how to function? Dr. Janice Fiamengo understands why this happens.

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

Evolutionary psychology of women and misandry

Douglas Galbi · 25 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Much evidence indicates that women are biologically superior to men in social communication. Consider, for example, a leading female professor of evolutionary psychology at Britain's Durham University. In 2002, her book, A mind of her own: the evolutionary psychology of women, was published by the prestigious Oxford University Press. Oxford produced a second edition of her book, with only minor changes, in 2012. Here's her scholarly analysis of the fundamental value of men:

> we should bear in mind that they {men} are essentially freeloading on women's effort. Consider this: if we knew our planet was about to be struck by a meteor and only 100 people could be saved in an underground bunker, what proportion of men and women would you put down there? My suggestion would be about 10 men and 90 women. Ten should be able to do an adequate job of impregnating all the women and the fewer the men, the fewer the calories they would consume and the lower the competition between them would be. … The fact is that the majority of men are, biologically speaking, dispensable but when the number of women drops too far, our future looks bleak. [1]

Who built those bunkers? Who would be digging dirt and pouring concrete to maintain them? Who would be collecting the trash? Who would be maintaining the information technology controlling life-support systems for the bunkers? With any appreciation for the history of humanity, one can confidently state that the majority of men are dispensable only if humanity is willing to dispense with civilization. This book fundamentally misunderstands the implications of anisogamy. Its analysis of sexual selection is laughably inferior to that of uncredentialed field reports. That a prestigious university press would publish this book, and republish it, is telling documentation of women's superiority in social communication. Superiority in social communication can transform misandristic nonsense into credentialed scientific scholarship.

The social problem is far worse that just one book worth ignoring. At the fundamental level of evolutionary psychology, women predominately compete among women in social relations and social communication to gain sexual access to high-status men. Men predominately compete among men to earn or fake high status (money, power, and org titles) to gain sexual access to beautiful, young women.[2] In this sex structure of competition, high-status, ugly, old women get sexually frustrated and bitter. They naturally turn to the social demonization of men's sexuality and spreading misandry.[3]

Spreading misandry is intellectually easy because public discourse provides little constraint on misandry. Many ordinary men apparently think misandry doesn't matter. Many ordinary women apparently think misandry serves their interests. Spreading misandry has developed into a key strategy for both women and men leaders.

Notes:

[1] Campbell (2002) p. 62. In the 2012 edition, this passage occurs with insubstantial changes on p. 75.

[2] Resources and reproductive opportunities are typically much more differentiated intersexually than intrasexually. With respect to survival resources, men and woman often pursue different patterns of resource acquisition (hunting versus gathering). With respect to reproductive opportunities, competition for an opposite sex reproductive partner is typically much more intense than competition for same-sex reproductive helpers. The charm of specific individuals can of course transcend these general forces of evolutionary psychology. Old women can be sexually alluring to men.

[3] This problem has become particularly acute at universities. That's not surprising. The incongruity between status achievement and mating interests is starkly apparent at universities.

[image] Snarling chihuahua. Thanks to David Shankbone and Wikipedia.

Reference:

Campbell, Anne. 2002. A mind of her own: the evolutionary psychology of women. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The siege of Weinsberg

Aine Hee von Sax · 26 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image "Pavilion VIII at the Lawn UVa 2010" by Rosenzweig on Wikimedia Commons, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-SA).

I wish to share a story based on true events, for which we need to travel back a bit in time, to the month of December 1140, to be correct.

The fortress of Weinsberg was probably built in the early 11th century; it lay and still does lie on top of a hill in Germany. In the weeks leading up to the event I wish to share, the fortress ended besieged due to a power struggle between the royal houses of Welfen and Staufern. The Weinsberg castle belonged to the Welfen, and King Konrad III was eager to carry away a victory and claim the fortress.

On the 21st of December that year, this victory finally arrived after an open field battle was won by King Konrad's army against the troops of Welf VI, who had arrived to help the desperate folk in the castle. Alas, his defeat doomed all hope for those within the fortress walls, and capitulation was decided to be the last option.

King Konrad accepted and graciously granted that the women were to be given free passage to escape from further harm, yet he also made it clear that all the men remaining in the fortress would face execution. The women were given the right to carry with them whatever possessions they could fit on their backs, and so it came to be that King Konrad and his men were to witness a highly unusual sight.

The gates of the fortress of Weinsberg on that cold winter's day 1140 swung open to let the womenfolk begin their march down the hill, burdened so heavily that they could hardly put one foot in front of the other. Weighed down by their most prized possessions, they began their march down the hill. Their most prized possessions being their men.

A touching true story without a doubt but why did I choose to retell it? Did I choose it to show how amazing women are, how daring and caring? Or did I choose it for its sentimental value, to depict a time where the relationship between men and women seems to have still been one of worth and love?

Certainly both questions I can answer with a bit of a yes, for women can be amazing when they put their heart and soul into it, as do I feel sentimental while revisiting this event, which appears to show there has been a better time once, without gender warfare, yet the true answer is still a very different one.

In fact, I chose this story to in a rather graphic way depict what it looks like when one sex carries the other on its back, as we indeed have seen one sex doing for most of human history, even if not in such a graphic manner. One sex, which assured the survival of the other sex, as the other by nature had most of the odds stacked against it. In opposition to the events of that cold day in December 1140 however, most of human history have seen men carrying this burden to assure women's survival, women usually being the physically weaker. This reaches from throwing themselves in front of women and children to fend off dangerous animals, working under health consuming conditions, and to sacrificing themselves on battlefields. Still today this is what men are expected to do, and many are willing to do, as their superior physical strength has created them to be the carrier of this burden.

Same time though, we are being told that men's physical strength is responsible for some of the greatest terrors womenfolk have had to endure through out the ages. We are being made afraid of this strength and those who have carried us to safety over and over again, and we came to swallow lies as well as to accept injustices done to men, without question and hesitation. Where the women of Weinsberg became known for their loyalty and devotion, men of past and present have come to be labelled oppressors and rapists; a danger to us, which we have to keep tight control over to remain safe.

Surely no one would expect that the men of Weinsberg turned on their women after having been carried by them out of harm's way (for the King stood true to his word that the women were allowed to take with them their most prized possession, and it is recorded he smiled at what he had witnessed). It would drive us to a righteous outcry if history would tell us these men showed no gratitude to their wives but instead came to mistreat them for it.

Yet, is this not exactly what many women of today are doing, by buying into the lies of the feminist movement, spreading those lies further, and supporting and exploiting laws of great injustice to men? I personally do not know one single woman who has been driven into poverty through a divorce, while still having to pay for her husband, but I do know plenty of men personally who are facing this now or have had to start all over after being bled dry. I can not recall having read about one single woman accused of raping a man while he was drunk and unable to give his consent to sex, but accounts to the opposite I see plastered on the walls everywhere…

If the men of Weinsberg would have shown such contempt and cruel ignorance to their wives, I doubt their womenfolk would have picked them as their most prized possession to carry down that hill, and we need to ask ourselves – why then should the men of today choose women as their burden, to drag out of harm's way?

And indeed, more and more men are beginning to ask themselves exactly this question, and the answer they arrive with is that they do not wish to carry this burden any longer. No more sacrificing, but instead, men are beginning to go their own way, and looking at what all their willingness of the past has brought them, I do not think anyone can possibly blame them. What men have come to endure in our modern times, unchallenged by women, or in many cases even supported by women, has awakened them to the fact that they throughout the ages have put women and children first, a choice they made to secure the survival of this species, but which gradually has ended with their being seen as not really worth much themselves. Taken for granted, used and even besmeared by hate campaigns, more and more men are deciding this is not worth their time, their strength, their dedication.

Feminism sought to emphasize the importance of women beyond the importance women held already, as the only ones who can bear offspring, and decided to fight for 'rights' to secure independence for women from their evil oppressors of the past.

Good for them, for women will have to work hard in the future to survive: no free turns anymore, and when the building burns, they will find themselves pushed out of the way, or left to find their own exit. No more being carried to safety, no more special treatment – women wished to be equal, and a time is rising where they will feel what it means to be an equal to a man, and will come to struggle hard to pull even remotely close to this, as quite frankly, they are not men…

The siege of Weinsberg and its following events are not taught to us in our history or social classes but instead, among many other heroic feats, have come to be forgotten. I guess women carrying men on their backs to safety does not quite fit in with the feminist climate and agenda, due to the 'prized possession' part and women actually showing a willingness to put men over goods. For those of us who still like to research and find truths among all the lies, this story, carried to us on the winds of times gone by, does not just prove that women can not have been as oppressed and enslaved by the evil brutes, as we have been told, but also shows us very graphically the meaning of struggling under a burden. While we imagine the unusual sight of women battling to make it down the hill with their husbands on their backs, undoubtedly most of us will feel that this picture is very odd, because we are only used to seeing the opposite. Men carrying women and the burden of their safety, that's what we are used to and have come to take for granted.

But there is one more thing still the events of Weinsberg can teach us, and this is that in times where our menfolk are in danger, we have to come through for them. One can argue that the women of Weinsberg only carried their husbands past harm as they did not wish to lose their providers. This very well may have played a role, yet for us women today, and, after all our shouting and declaring of how important freedom is for us; we should find ourselves able also to understand that men have this right to freedom, too. They are not the toys of our whims, nor are they obliged to treat us well if we do not treat them well in return. They do not need to look after us just because we feel entitled to special treatment, a special treatment we feel entitled to claim, solely because men have given us so much for so long.

If you know of a woman who is divorcing and trying to press as much as she can out of her husband – speak to her and ask her why she feels she deserves any fruits of his future labor when feminism claims it fought so hard for our right to earn our own living. Or if you are a woman in such a situation, put forth this question to your own self, and try explain how it comes that, if you are that strongly empowered a woman, you still feel it is okay to ask a man to share his resources with you. His doing the giving – while you have stopped giving him anything in return.

And if you see yet another article posted about some rape accusation, go and research without blindly accepting it all to be true. Rape DOES happen, of course it does, but much what we are presented with today as evidence for a 'rape culture', is indeed based on false and twisted information, as even some in the feminist movement are beginning to admit.

King Konrad smiled when he saw those women rise to the task of helping their men but any woman rising today in defense of men will not be greeted with a smile from her opposition. Instead, she will face insults and even a risk to her well-being, but.. rise anyway… Ignorance and silence can be considered equal to if those women of Weinsberg would have just left the fortress with their dresses and knickknacks, leaving the men to their suffering. Men deserve a life free from fear and harm, just as women do, but in our climate no man is safe, and this includes even those men who choose to believe criticizing women is a sign of misogyny. I am a woman myself, and I most certainly do not hate my own gender. I love being a woman, but I hate what I have come to observe as a society which favors women who know no shame, but will lie and exploit, and help to spread the myth that women are victims, and men the victimize of past and present.

And so in closing I shall return a last time to the siege of Weinsberg and call out to my fellow womenfolk, to rise and show the world that we are not just compulsive consumers, selfish and only obsessed with our own well-being, but that we understand a man's right to live free and unharmed is just as much a human right as it is ours.

No one is asking us to carry men down a hill. All we are asked is to end our ignorance and raise our voices in defense of those who for the longest time have shared their gained resources with us, and kept us safe, even at the expense of their own lives.

Help end this human injustice.

A commentary on the shared parenting myth

Ruth Nichols · 27 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, New Jersey Family Law Attorney Santo Artusa authored a Lexis-Nexis article, arguing against shared parenting. Certified Family Life Educator Ruth Nichols obliterates that myth and schools Mr. Artusa. This is from his article and argument against shared parenting:

> There continues to be a growing trend toward shared parenting time arrangements throughout the United States, and New Jersey is no different. The theory behind shared parenting is that the children benefit from the ongoing, consistent contact with both parents. Sounds good. However, depending on the age of the children, this is very hard to implement and very hard to manage. Even in traditional homes where two parents live together with their children, keeping the house rules clear and what the household expectations are is very hard. Imagine this in two different homes, where the parents are often at complete odds with each other. Who sets the rules? What if the rules are not followed? How confusing is it for the child?
>
> Aside from the rules, let's talk logistics. While everyone is entitled to their own opinion, I do not see how shuttling a child back and forth from one home to the next every other day or every other week makes sense. Children need consistency. They need guidance; they need to know what is expected of them every day and for the rules to be clear. In two homes, with potentially four "parents", what is a child to do? While I am not advocating only weekend and holiday time, I am advocating that a child should know where their home really is. Where their room really is, which should be in one house. They need to know, which parent makes the key everyday decisions, manages their schooling, their activities without constant fighting and friction.
>
> While my view may be "conservative", it is certainly practical and straightforward. Before you seek or agree to shared parenting time, take a step back and really think how your child will handle it. Think how your life may have been if you were forced into a shared parenting situation. In some cases, it may have been great, but it is my belief as a father and a family law attorney that the majority of situations benefit from a more traditional and simple parenting schedule.

* * *

Seemingly, Mr. Artusa, the convenience issue is paramount to equal time with both parents and the healthy development of children.

My commentary is directed to Mr. Artusa:

Dear Mr. Artusa,

With all due respect, The Shared Parenting Myth is somewhat remiss. Shared Parenting is not the problem in divorce and separation; Shared Parenting is the Solution!

In three paragraphs you have misrepresented the concept of Shared Parenting. The comments regarding a child transitioning between homes obliterate the idea of the involvement of BOTH parents in a child's life.

Divorce has a tendency to bring out the worst in people. Divorce can be a wicked event! Herein lies the dilemma. I am going to go out on a limb here and say that very few if any parents have said to their child "Mommy and daddy love you very much, and this is why we are going to get a divorce. We want you to go back and forth between our homes."

The idea of Shared Parenting is because one or both parents have chosen divorce. In many cases, the separation is one sided. Numerous parents would remain in the marriage to provide a family for their child, and many do even when the marriage is intolerable. The concept of Shared Parenting is BECAUSE of divorce! Shared Parenting offers the opportunity for BOTH parents to parent!

Sadly, there are many parents (disproportionately, fathers) who have sacrificed everything for a mere attempt to go before a judge and ask for 'time' with their child. There are too many cases where parents have depleted their savings, retirement funds, sold what they did have, and borrowed from family/friends to pay legal fees to beg for more time with their kids. Child support rulings are unfair and unjust. A key point to make is that even paying child support does not ensure they can 'see' their child. As we all know and the statistics prove, that unfairness disproportionately affects fathers.

RESEARCH IS CONSISTENT! Research over the years reveals that a child who has no father/strong male figure in their life is MORE likely to engage in alcohol and drug use, sex and delinquent behaviors. The child is MORE likely to have physical and emotional health issues, experience social and academic problems. The Recent research assesses and is overwhelming in favor of the value of having two parents in the child's life.

Parents do NOT want to withdraw from their child's life. External factors drive them out! This is one reason Family Court reform is needed. I created a survey for parents to evaluate their experience in the Family Court system. www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

One question asks "Use three words to describe your experience in the Family Court system." To illustrate the point of the utter frustration experienced by the parents, here are the top ten descriptions:

Traumatic. Shock. Dumbfounded.
Horrible. Hell. Frustrating.
Horrifying. Traumatizing. Life-altering.
Truth doesn't matter.
Frustrating. Voiceless. Unfair.
Unjust. Devastating. Traumatic.
Futile. Ignorant. Careless.
Trauma. Destroying. Waste.
Unfair. Waste of time. Money grabber.
I stand alone.

If you are still not convinced that Shared Parenting is not the problem, go to www.SharedParentingConfessional.com

This Shared Parenting Confessional outlines the experience of parents, adult children of divorce and children of divorce. There is a common theme showing that Shared Parenting would alleviate some of the betrayals.

This Shared Parenting Confessional outlines the experience of parents, adult children of divorce and children of divorce. There is a common theme showing that Shared Parenting would alleviate some of the betrayal, grief, and heartache experienced by too many family members.

Shared Parenting means that BOTH parents are participating in their children's lives. BOTH parents are working TOGETHER, as a team, ensuring that their child is receiving the tools necessary to progress in life as a happy, emotionally healthy, physically healthy individual who can make age appropriate and progressive decisions. Sometimes that means two homes.

Perhaps, a better idea is for the parents to work together, and the best case scenario involves the child will go between two homes. Allow the child to be a child and let the parents deal with the logistics!

I would like to dignify the myth in Shared Parenting that you claim does exist. The myth represents very real issues in the Family Court system. Furthermore, your arguments seem to lack scientific support. In fact, many of your 'myths' are contrary to current research. And, stating that your myth does exist, is insulting to co-parents across the globe.

While I will not begrudge you your thoughts, please reevaluate your position. Notably, the statements made in Shared Parenting Myth are clearly heartfelt and reveal strong emotions. Perhaps, the comments to transitioning between homes is your situation or vicarious experiences with a close friend or relative. Regardless, divorce is different for everyone. Many parents and professionals in the divorce arena would agree that divorce is destructive!

Divorce is between the parents-About the Child! For many children, parents and families Shared Parenting offer a resolution to the horrific problems created by divorce!

I welcome your response. Please feel free to contact me at MyConfession@SharedParentingConfessional.com

Ruth A.S. Nichols, M.A., M.A., CFLE p (Certified Family Life Educator, provisional)
LIKE at www.Facebook.com/SharedParentingConfessional

Contact at: MyConfession@SharedParentingConfessional.com

Shared Parenting Confessional. A place for co-parents to confess feelings of betrayal, fear, heartache or humiliation experienced in divorce or co-parenting situation. www.SharedParentingConfessional.com

Rate My Family Court. A Co-Parents' Experience with the Family Court system.
www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-15questions www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

References:

Fabricius, W. V. & Luecken, L.J. (2007). Post-divorce living arrangements, parent conflict, and long-term physical health correlates for children of divorce. Journal of Family Psychology, 21 195-205.

Rate My Family Court, A Co-Parents' Experience with the Family Court system.
www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-15questions www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

Shared Parenting Confessional. A place for co-parents to confess feelings of betrayal, fear, heartache or humiliation experienced in divorce or co-parenting situation.
www.SharedParentingConfessional.com

The Shared Parenting Myth, written by Santo Artusa, posted on 2/16/16, Lexisnexis.com.
http://www.lexisnexis.com/lextalk/practice-insights/f/13/t/2849.aspx

About the Author: Ruth A.S. Nichols, M.A., M.A., CFLE p (Certified Family Life Educator, provisional)

Is circumcision legal? Does it matter?

Gary Costanza · 27 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Does the law protect the right of every adult, child, or infant to bodily integrity?

There is mounting evidence that this is so, has been argued by Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys, and now also by Peter Adler's "Is Circumcision Legal?"

To answer the question, I'll discuss Adler's work and also discuss aspects of the well-known Chase Heronimus lawsuit to prevent the forced circumcision of 4 yr. old Chase against his mother's will.

First, an excerpt from "Is Circumcision Legal?," italics mine:

> Origins of circumcision
>
> Almost all mammals have foreskins. The male and female genitalia, which are identical in early gestation, have evolved to function together during sexual intercourse over sixty-five to one hundred million years. Male and female circumcisions have been practiced for thousands of years, usually for religious, cultural, and personal reasons. Male circumcision has been performed as a religious ritual, a painful obligatory rite of passage, to mark or brand slaves and members of religious or tribal groups, and to suppress sexuality. American physicians introduced the practice in the late 1800s in an unsuccessful effort to prevent masturbation. For the following century, American physicians claimed that circumcision prevented or cured a long list of diseases such as epilepsy, paralysis, hip-joint disease, bad digestion, inflammation of the bladder, and tuberculosis; in fact, an uncircumcised penis was "seen as the cause of most human diseases and socially unacceptable behaviours."
>
> Legal Issues
>
> The fact that circumcision is commonplace, asserted by proponents of circumcision in legal briefs, is not in and of itself a valid legal argument. Slavery was once commonplace, as was drilling holes in the brain to cure epilepsy and mental disorders, the use of leeches to remove blood, and the use of unsterile instruments in surgery. In addition, even if circumcision has potential or actual medical benefits (which is debated), it does not necessarily follow that it is a legal practice. Removing any body part, if removed to prevent it from becoming diseased, would be medically beneficial, yet this would not justify amputating a leg, for example, to prevent an infection that could be treated with antibiotics. Physicians do not routinely remove healthy body parts from children other than the male foreskin. The fact that there is legislation against cutting girls' genitals but not boys' genitals also does not resolve whether or not male circumcision is legal.
>
> Circumcision raises one principal issue for its opponents: do boys, like girls, have a right to genital integrity, and, if so, where is the right found? The surgery raises many troublesome legal issues for proponents. Is invasive surgery on boys' genitals legal when cutting girls' genitals is a federal crime? How can it be legal to remove boys' foreskins to reduce the risk of penile cancer, but not girls' breasts, which are many times more likely to become cancerous? Can physicians lawfully endanger and harm boys without benefiting most of them? Do physicians have the right > to operate on healthy boys, against their own recommendation, at the request of parents for reasons having nothing to do with medicine, usually without fully informing parents of the risks? Is it lawful to circumcise healthy boys when intact men rarely choose it for themselves? Do parents have the right to make the circumcision decision for religious reasons or any reason?

Wow. Here we get to the heart of the matter:

> Do Boys Have a Right to Genital Integrity?
>
> The question should be stated more broadly: does every American citizen – whether young or old, male or female – have a right to personal security or bodily integrity and hence to genital integrity? If boys do not, adults and girls do not, either. Congress stated in banning non-therapeutic female genital cutting that it "infringes upon the guarantees of rights secured by Federal and State law, both statutory and constitutional."
>
> What are those laws?
>
> The Common Law
>
> In 1791, the United States passed a constitutional amendment that adopted British common law. The first chapter of Blackstone's Commentaries, "Of the Absolute Rights of Persons," states that the rights of the people are to be preserved inviolate.
>
> a. The Right to Personal Security
>
> The principal purpose of the law, Blackstone wrote, is to protect the right of all people to personal security:
>
> 1. The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health… 2. [Man's rights] include a prohibition not only of killing, and maiming, but also of torturing… and… no man shall be forejudged of life or limb contrary to… the law of the land…. 3. [A man's] person or body is also entitled, by the same natural right, to security from the corporal insults of menaces, assaults, beating, and wounding; though such insults amount not to destruction of life or member. 4. The preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it."

From "Constitutional Law:"

> The Bill of Rights to the United States Constitution was adopted to protect individuals. As the Supreme Court has stated, "[c]onstitutional rights do not mature and come into being magically only when one attains the state-defined age of majority. Minors, as well as adults, are protected by the Constitution and possess constitutional rights." Constitutional rights are "fundamental" and "may not be submitted to vote." Accordingly, legislation that violates constitutional rights is legally invalid. Since Congress found non-therapeutic female genital cutting to violate girls' federal and state constitutional rights, what are the rights to which the Supreme Court was referring? It should be asked first, though, whether boys have a right to the same > protection against genital cutting as girls?

Which brings us to "The Right to Equal Protection:"

> Shea Lita Bond addressed this issue in her 1999 article, State Laws Criminalizing Female Circumcision: A Violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Congress and sixteen states have banned female genital cutting except when medically necessary. The American Academy of Pediatrics briefly recommended that its physicians perform a ritual pinprick of a girl's genitals if that might prevent more harmful genital cutting, even though this would have violated federal law. This ignited a storm of protest, and the policy was quickly retired. Thus, even a pinprick of girls' genitals is a federal crime. Physicians likewise cannot cut adults' genitals without their consent (an adult subjected to this could use force in self-defense, call the police, or successfully bring suit).
> The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution prohibits states from enforcing laws that "deny to any person… equal protection of the laws". State constitutions also contain equal protection clauses.
> Bond concluded in her article that state statutes protecting females but not males from genital cutting violate the constitutional guarantee that similarly situated males and females should be treated equally before the law

The essence of these legal protections, whether in the Constitution or Common Law, is that by law, the state protects bodily integrity from involuntary injury by others such as stabbing, shooting, assault, or amputation, and if those rights are granted to infant girls, they must also be granted to infant boys.

Go to "Is Circumcision Legal?" to get the legal analysis of these other insightful topics:

> The Right to Privacy
>
> The Right to Life, Liberty, Property, and the Pursuit of Happiness
>
> The Right to Freedom of Religion
>
> The Child Abuse Statutes
>
> Criminal Assault
>
> Human Rights law
>
> Do Physicians Have the Legal Right to Circumcise Healthy Boys?
>
> Physicians Cannot Discriminate Against Boys
>
> Physicians Cannot Lawfully Operate on Healthy Boys
>
> Healthy Boys Are Not Patients
>
> Circumcision Is Not Within the Scope of Medicine
>
> Unnecessary Surgery on Children Is Unlawful
>
> Physicians Cannot Endanger or Harm Boys Unnecessarily
>
> A Physician's Legal Duty Is to the Patient
>
> Circumcision Violates the Best Interests Rule
>
> Is Circumcision a Fraud and an Unfair and Deceptive Act and Practice?

Do Parents Have the Right to Make the Circumcision Decision?

Boys' Rights to Genital Integrity Supersede Their Parents' Rights

Parents Have a Legal Duty to Protect Their Children From Harm

Parents Have No Religious or Other Right to Order Circumcision

Parents Can Only Consent to Medical Care
Just as physicians cannot perform unnecessary surgery on children, parents cannot consent to it. In 1979, a Texas appeals court considered whether parents could consent to remove and transplant a kidney from a daughter to a son to save his life, and held that they could not.

Is It Lawful to Use Medicaid to Pay For Circumcision?

Is It Lawful For Companies to Buy and Sell Boys' Foreskins?

So, what can be done, and what are our goals? Under "Remedies", we see:

Rights

As shown, circumcision violates the rules of medical ethics and numerous provisions of law. Boys and men are entitled to full redress. First, as the American Medical Association has stated, regulatory agencies are required to take allegations of unethical conduct very seriously. Unnecessary surgery on children is a serious ethical violation. Physicians who circumcise should lose their licenses to practice medicine. Second, the federal and state child abuse statutes protecting children from harm and the criminal assault laws must be enforced. The penalty for violating these laws is imprisonment. Third, the federal and state statutes protecting girls from non-therapeutic circumcision must be extended to boys.

Reality
The reality is that regulatory, criminal, administrative, and legislative remedies have not been forthcoming for properly performed circumcision. Newborn boys cannot speak or vote, while physicians' associations and religious organizations can (and do) lobby legislators, contribute to campaigns, and put pressure on Medicaid officials.

CONCLUSION
This article has addressed whether circumcision is legal, and has shown that it is not. To summarize the law, boys, like girls and adults, have absolute rights under the common law to personal security and bodily integrity, and to freedom or the autonomy to make important and irreversible decisions about their bodies that can be delayed, like circumcision, for themselves. It is unconstitutional to protect girls from unnecessary genital cutting without extending equal protection of the law to boys. In addition, boys and girls are protected from circumcision by the criminal child abuse statutes, tort law, and human rights law.
One therefore does not reach the argument that physicians have the right to circumcise boys for religious, cultural, or personal reason, but if one did, it does not pass the blush test. A physician's legal duty is to provide competent medical care to pediatric patients independent of their parents' > desires. Thus, physicians cannot take orders from parents to operate on > children for reasons having nothing to do with medicine.

A famous case of forced circumcision involved 4 yr. old Chase Hironimus whose father sought to have him circumcised against the wishes of his mother and himself. Tragically, he was eventually circumcised by a foreign doctor.

The lawsuit to prevent this forced circumcision highlights all the human rights that are involved and how they apply to baby boys. I've included portions of the lawsuit to show how the case was built to protect Chase and other infants like him. These excerpts are rich in legal, physical, and ethical reasons not to circumcise:

> 10. C.R.N.H. was born on October 31, 2010 and is now approximately 4 ½ years old.
> 12. C.R.N.H. expressed that he does not want circumcision.
> 13. C.R.N.H. expressed that he is afraid of circumcision.
> 14. C.R.N.H. is in constant fear of circumcision being forced upon him pursuant to > the court's order.
> 15. C.R.N.H. does not have any medical condition that would make circumcision > medically necessary.
> 16. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is not medically necessary.
> 17. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is non-therapeutic, elective, > cosmetic surgery.
> 18. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is invasive, irreversible, > painful, and will cause C.R.N.H physical and psychological harm.
> 19. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision results in permanent physical > alteration of one of C.R.N.H.'s most private body parts at an age when C.R.N.H. is aware of > what his body looks like and will be traumatized by it.
> 20. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age results in the loss and/or disfigurement of a > normal, healthy, functional, valuable body part.
> 21. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age will result in severe and permanent psychological > damage.
> 22. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age does not provide medical benefits.
>
> 26. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is not "medical treatment" > because there is no diagnosis of any condition which would make it medically necessary.
>
> 34. There is no compelling, important, or legitimate reason why the procedure cannot be postponed until
> C.R.N.H. reaches the age of 18 and can seek to have it performed upon himself if he so desires at that time.
>
> 38. The American Academy of Pediatrics' Bioethics Committee has declared that a > minor's input into surgical decisions must be heard and considered.
>
> 43. Under the circumstances of this case, forcing circumcision on C.R.N.H. > constitutes assault, aggravated assault, battery, aggravated battery, and/or child abuse under > Florida law.
>
> 56. Title 42 of the United States Code provides:
> Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, > custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, > or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within > the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities > secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an > action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress…
>
> 59. Defendants' application of Florida law to impose unnecessary, elective, cosmetic > circumcision upon C.R.N.H. at the age of 4 ½ years old for no religious reason violates C.R.N.H.'s fundamental right to privacy and bodily integrity secured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

>
> 60. Defendants' application of Florida law to impose unnecessary, elective, cosmetic circumcision upon C.R.N.H. at the age of 4 ½ years old for no religious reason violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, in that it sets out impermissible classifications. First, Title 18 United States Code section 116 prohibits female circumcision and C.R.N.H. has been impermissibly denied equal protection under this law because of his age and gender.
>
> 63. Defendants have conspired to deprive C.R.N.H. of equal protection of the laws and equal privileges and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States by force, intimidation and threats.

As thorough and legally sound as this is, this lawsuit failed, as do many seemingly open-and-shut cases of obvious human rights violations. Why?

Some things are slow to change because they are so ingrained in us and the law that they have powerful opponents, like abortion, legalizing pot, men's reproductive rights, circumcision, and drafting women. "No-brainers" such as civil rights and anti-FGM were more easily won.

As in the tale "The Emperor's New Clothes," it seems that we ultimately say and do what others are doing without regard for the law, ethics, or common sense. Just as "The Milgram Experiment" found, people generally go along with what authority or those with 'white coats' do and say.

You may say 'so what if it's illegal, no one seems to care,' and you'd be right.

Unless a precedent-setting legal case makes clear that circumcision is illegal, it doesn't seem to matter to doctors, hospitals and anyone else what the Constitution and human rights law say about it – this still goes on.

So, if the law won't stop it, it's up to intactivists and the public to talk about the elephant in the room.

Join an intactivist group and protest.

Tell friends and family about the human right to genital integrity and ask if they'd have a baby girl cut.

Phrase questions to expectant parents something like "will you keep your son intact?"

Sorry, but politeness and avoiding uncomfortable conversation is trumped by protecting the life and human rights of vulnerable infants.

In closing, here's part of Adler's conclusion that sums up our dilemma:

> Circumcision, one of the most common surgeries in American hospitals, will continue until public opinion has turned completely against it, or until courts rule, as in Germany, that circumcision is unlawful. The constitutional right of access to the courts guarantees every American speedy, adequate, effective, and meaningful judicial remedies. Judges are sworn to uphold the Constitution and to grant those remedies. The 2012 German decision, this article, and those it cites, provide a blueprint for courts to hold physicians, hospitals, and parents liable to men for properly performed circumcisions.

> Is Circumcision Legal? Does it Matter? https://t.co/3oWJ1omUws #nocirc #intactivism #circumcision #MGM pic.twitter.com/8H4m0oC1Qk
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 28, 2016

The special place in feminist hell, discovered

August Løvenskiolds · 28 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I've written before about the parallels between feminist-speak and religious language, so feminist Madeline Albright's declaration that there is "a special place in Hell" for women who do not support other women" (as in, women who don't vote for Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton) was not a shock to me in that sense, but I was flummoxed by the début of this new class of mortal sin: the sin of self-gender betrayal. Sure, Jesus seemed to prefer male apostles in his inner circle but in my extensive study of scripture and Hell this particular sin had somehow escaped my notice.

Loyalty to God, humanity, the faithful, and kin are all familiar to me but loyalty to one's gender as a divine decree? Not even in the darkest passages of the 3,237 cantos of Patriarchy (hot chicks be upon them) does one find such an edict for men to stay loyal to men as a class – as teammates, sure, but there are dudes on the other team we owe no gender-specific allegiance to beyond sportsmanship.

My harrowing of feminists knows no limits, not even the harrowing of hell, so to investigate this revelation, on late Friday afternoon I descended into hell for a quick day and a half refresher tour, and now that I've risen at Sunday morning daybreak, I can report with astonishment that, since the time of Dante, feminists have completely rearranged the furniture in the Inferno.

1: Not All Brimstone Lakes Are Like That

Preparing for Feminist Hell took some forethought. I guzzled a jug of holy water, checked my privilege, and donned a rainbow burka to hit all the intersectional boxes on the Feminist Hell Tourism application. I'd visited Hell 1.1 (the post-Christ version) in 1990 during a near death experience, so I was excited to see how feminism had changed things. Feminists trash each other a lot, and because the afterlife is bound by decisions made on Earth, I expected to see lots of feminist issues and foibles being flogged in a quite literal sense. I was not disappointed.

Hell is still composed of 9 circles as it was in Dante's era but I hardly recognized the place. Feminists had been nagging demon engineers for decades for a whole new "safe space" design to both smash the satantriarchy and equalize the 77 lashes that women get for every 100 a man receives, and those clever devils delivered in ways that make Hell 1.1 look like the Super Bowl Halftime Show – the new Feminist Hell is still overly long, but caters to the ladies like never before.

The first circle, formerly called "Limbo" for the comfortable repose of Virtuous Pagans, is now known as the "Friendzone." It is overrun with a variety of cucks, male allies, and wealthy female pop singers and actresses who claimed to be feminists but never really "got it" since they had made patriarchy work for themselves at the cost of other women. Denizens of the friendzone lead comfortable but sexless lives, forever searching for the love of their haughty and aloof feminist masters, who remain just beyond their grasp.

As I toured the Hellywood subdivision I asked Emma "HeForShe" Watson if this was the "special place" Albright has alluded to, and Emma seemed puzzled but admitted that her knowledge of Feminist Hell didn't extend much beyond the dictionary, which in Hell has only those definitions approved by feminists (6 words are defined in all).

As I resumed my journey down, one after another of the friendzoned asked me for blowjobs, and when I demurred, they asked if I knew where they could get blowjobs. They wiggled their micropeens plaintively, so all I could do was mansplain that in Dante's time, the second circle of Hell was for the lustful, and so perhaps they could get lucky there.

This was a bit of a mistake on my part – as a MGTOW, I'd forgotten how crazy and determined sex-starved pussy beggars can be. The friendzoned rushed the 69 foot wall surrounding the second level, crashing against it and piling up bodies to build a human mountain of broken flesh and bone in a bid for access to release in more ways than just fun. It was just like in the porno knockoff of the movie World War Z entitled Whirled Whore Zoe.

As the mêlée grew, I slipped away to the immigration center to formally continue my trip. The password I had used last time didn't work, but my extensive knowledge of feminist theory saved me – after a few guesses, the phrase "not all feminists are like that" caused the annulus to dilate, giving me easy access to the second circle of Feminist Hell: the Objectifiers.

2: Yin and Poontang

The Second Level of Hell is divided into two safe spaces: Yin, for the sex-negative feminists, and Poontang, for the sex-positive. All the feminists had been fitted with vaginae for mouths: those of the sex-negative were continuously dripping menstrual blood, while those of the sex-positive seemed to disgorge cottage cheese, along with the occasional mangled fetus or loaf of sourdough. The two groups were locked in an eternal battle, girl-throwing dead D-cell batteries and dildos back and forth. One of the flying dildos smacked me in the chest, and it melted away into chocolate pudding: in Feminist Hell, it seems, all the dicks are limp, even the ones in intersectional colors like dead fig green.

Caught between the two groups I found the shade of Laci Green – time is eternal in hell, twisting around on itself in ways that make even living feminists permanent residents. She was too sexually titillating to join the sex-negatives but too hateful of penis to join the positives. Her mouth was an anus and shit came gushing out with every word she spoke. Her gelatinous limbs had been broken into impossible angles and I paused to speak to her during a cease-fire in the battle: the loudspeakers announced in feminist scream-song a shoe sale at the local DSW. (It turns out all the shoes were amazing but mismatched in both color and heel size.)

Laci was whimpering softly to herself but seemed grateful that someone was paying attention to her. I didn't know…I didn't know she gurgled out, then brightened up like the Laci of her old MTV/YouTube days. I like men but they need to stop objectifying me! she managed between perky sobs as she adjusted her glasses and cleavage. She did manage to say that the "special place" was nowhere nearby, so I tried to take my leave. Laci grabbed me for a kiss but I slapped her cum-stained lips away: sorry, Laci – no means no.

Shoes, she moaned as I walked away. Bring me shoooooooes!

As I reached the maw that served as the gate to the old third circle (Gluttony), I glanced back at Laci. Smoky-eyed clown-haired feminists both positive and negative were romping all over her body in the raunchiest stripper gear. The carnal lust of old, in feminist hands, had become a grass hut of pain.

3: The Feast of Ashes

The icy rain and slush of the old circle of Gluttony was now a burnt-out wasteland – the new name, "Fat Acceptance," had caused this level to be so overrun by the obese that it had spontaneously combusted when someone dropped a joint of skankweed to chow down on Taco Bell. The air smelled of BBQ and pork rinds and the ashes were slowly knitting themselves back into bodies in one of the weirdest and dullest CGI scenes you can imagine. The greasy ground seemed to crawl like a mass of fire ants. I made my way to the platinum vault door to the fourth level, the old Greed, when I happened on the half-burned shade of Roxanne Gay. I've been a Bad Feminist, she wailed, and I need to be punished. After I took pity on her by spitting into her mouth, she seemed certain that the "special place" was lower down still.

It was only then that I remembered that all feminists are liars and they were most likely trying to trap me in an even more wretched level of Hell – the special place might have easily been in circle one. Still, the only way out of old Hell 1.1 was at the center, so my itinerary could only take me deeper.

As I passed into the old Greed circle, I heard and felt the ground shaking – Roxanne had lifted herself out of the ashes, fully restored. My prophylactic drink of holy water must have transferred some Goodness in my spittal! Great, now she would be chasing me out of hell. My leisurely tour suddenly became urgent.

4: Lean in to hell

The hoarders and prodigals of the old circle of Greed have been replaced by naked feminist office workers and Patreon users. Air conditioning blasts at arctic levels in their faces and asses, and they vajazzle their pubic and anal pleasure portals with razor-sharp jewels of every rainbow hue. Their lower bodies have grown so ponderous with gemstones they can barely carry their mattresses from office to office to continue to try to climb the corporate ladder.

At the very bottom, covered in shit-encrusted diamonds, I found the shade of the original "mattress girl" herself, Emma Sulkowicz. She texted me "luff you berry much – I need some Auggie time in my butthole" but I told her to put down the cellphone and tell me what she knew about the "special place." No luck, so I passed on as she started screeching "RAPE" over and over again.

5: The Models of Duluth

Unlike the old Anger, the entrance to the new fifth circle of hell was well hidden. Feminist women seemed to be entering it with ease, and once on the other side they tossed gold coins and jewels in massive amounts back into Lean In but still the entrance to level five was obscured for me. As I walked along the wall, the flow of money seemed to diminish from a torrent to a trickle, and finally ceased completely. Only once the money completely stopped did I see it – the tiny men's entrance to the Domestic Violence Shelter of Hell, the new circle 5.

The few gay men inside were very helpful despite the constant booming sound coming through the walls – the massive feminist shelter on the other side. These ultra-violent women were doomed to slam into each other for all eternity. I paused to put my ear to the wall, curious for some clue if this was the special place but the guys pulled me away – the impact of the crashing bodies would've shattered my skull, and that takes eons to heal in hell. Milo Yiannopoulus personally led me to the entrance to the old circle six, Heresy, which was now guarded by two enormously muscled demons wearing "Black Lives Matter" t-shirts. Milo distracted the guards long enough to allow me to slip by, as Milo giggled "oh, Jesus Christ!" in the distance behind me. The door had just closed when I heard Roxanne frantically pounding on it. She had almost caught me.

6: Infernalized Misogyny

I barely remember the mad, confused dash through the sparsely populated sixth circle of hell, the old "Heresy," now renamed "Internalized Misogyny" or "Infernalize Misogyny" – the signs were inconsistent, like both hell and feminism alike. Heretical feminists like Camille Paglia and Christina Hoff Sommers waved as I ran by. Reams of fact-checked research were being continually cranked out at one side of this level, and burned away on the other. A small town of Libertarian iFeminists marked the passage to the old level 7, Violence. Cathy Young, dressed as a microaggression, guarded the door, and I barely had time ask about the special place. She checked my privilege with her forked tongue, pointed through the door, and started screaming "fuck off, MRA scum."

7: Abhor-town

The lower trimester of feminist hell, the 7th, 8th and 9th circles, are almost too disturbing to describe. Every dumpster from every abortion provider winds up here in the old level 7, formerly "Violence," now called "Planned Parenthood." The smell of powder, diapers and rotting flesh is overpowering. With every step I had to try to avoid treading on the crushed face of a stillborn kid. I will speak no more of this except to note that the shade of Andy Warhol found be weeping in a fetal position. Without a word, he helped me to my feet and, his arm around my shoulder, he led me to the Veteran Administration's doors that marked the entrance to the old 8th circle, Fraud.

8: Gender Studies

The old level 8, formerly Fraud, is now "Gender Studies." A loud, unending scream of "Guilty" follows every man who goes there. At this point I lost all hope of succeeding in my quest, abandoning the idea that I could find the special place. If suicide were possible in Hell, I would have hung myself, but even the sweet temptation of death was denied me. Only Andy, still half-carrying me, kept me going through the 10 Annexes of gender until we reached the bullet hole that marks the passage into the lowest level of Feminist Hell.

"I can go no farther." Andy mouthed over the screams. I gave him a quizzical look, and he smiled. "Maybe someday

I will. You will understand why soon enough." I gave him one final hug; he turned away and headed back the way we had come as I passed into the area formerly known as Treachery.

9: Hypergamy

In the old Hell 1.1 there were 4 Rounds of Treachery. In Feminist Hell they are CPS (an amalgam of Child Protective Services and the Crown Prosecution Service), Family Court, Child Support, and Alimony. In the distance, I could see the towering figure of Lucifer at the center of hell. As MGTOW I could avoid the 4 Rounds completely, and I thought that I would have it pretty easy until the mists started to clear and the demon I formerly knew as Lucifer came into focus.

It was her, the shade of the feminist once known as Valerie Solanas, who tried to murder Andy Warhol. Oh, Andy, I thought. No one deserves this.

I continued walking toward Solanas. I had no real choice – in Dante's time the way out of hell was to climb down the fur on Satan's legs into Purgatory – and I had had quite enough of feminism for one research trip.

As I grew closer. I saw what I first thought were tiny spiders crawling all over her naked body. As I got closer I saw the spiders were not insects at all – they were women. Human women. Human women voters! I had found the special place in hell. It was real, and the most sexist ending for women imaginable – they had to work a dirty, dangerous, and pointless job in service to a woman, just like all men do.

The voters were terrified. They used frayed, rusty climbing gear to scamper all over Solanas, carefully using machetes to hack away all traces of Solanas's body hair. Every few minutes a woman would fall to her ruin, her body broken on the rocks below, to wait an eon to be healthy enough to resume her depilating duties.

I approached Solanas, dodging the falling bodies. Her legs were smooth as glass – a harlot's legs. There was no hair to climb down, and no way out. I sank to my knees, defeated. In the background I could hear the maniacal laughter of Chanty Binx and Gloria Steinem, and the tyrannosaurus footfalls of Roxanne Gay closing the distance.

After what seemed like forever, a voice boomed out a question: "What will you tell them? The men – what will you tell them?"

I could barely muster a whisper. "I will tell them the truth."

Screams came at me from all sides. Roxanne was close. "There is no place in Feminist Hell for the truth! Leave us!"

The ground around me started to shake as the legs of Solanas, once clamped shut, began to spread slightly. A long string to a tampon emerged from her vulva. I grabbed the string and rappelled down her thigh gap. The warm, pine smell of Purgatory engulfed me as I passed by her cankles.

The tampon fell out as my feet reached the forest floor and her thighs slapped shut. The size of an Airbus, the tampon missed me by less than 10 meters when it landed with a sploosh. Looking up, I could barely see Roxanne's body was crushed between Solanas's thighs.

I was out. I was done with feminism.

The author gratefully acknowledges the inspiration of both Dante and the team of Larry Niven and Jerry Pournelle for their books entitled Inferno.

Men's pervasive burden of performance

Douglas Galbi · 28 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The massive market for "erectile dysfunction" drugs indicates the crushing burden of performance that keeps men down. While diligently securing affirmative consent at each level and appropriate time interval of romantic engagement, men fear that if they can't perform like a virile donkey, they will be ridiculed as a feeble ass. Of course, donkeys don't have to worry about bizarre prosecutions for rape. But that's not the only way that men are put in a worse position than donkeys. Even for basic bodily functions such as farting, men are pressured to perform.[1]

Consider the case of Roland the Farter. He lived in early twelfth-century England. In exchange for the right to hold roughly a hundred acres of land, Roland the Farter had to perform for the king.[2] A record of feudal landholding in Suffolk in 1250 states:

> The serjeanty, which formerly was held of Roland the Farter in Hemingston in the country of Suffolk, for which he was obliged to perform every year on the birthday of our Lord {Christmas} before his master the king, one jump, a whistle, and one fart, was alienated in accordance with these specific requirements.[3]

Imagine facing eviction if you couldn't produce a fart at a specific time and place. That's even more dire than disappointing a lover. The pressure of performance that Roland the Farter felt must have been enormous.

Medieval literature offered men conflicting wisdom on farting performance. In the highly learned, politically transgressive Latin work Solomon and Marcolf, Marcolf states:

> Relax the asshole to fart, and it will shake itself!
> {Laxa culum pedere, et ipse concuciet se!} [4]

A medieval French text, by contrast, warns:

> One shits when one holds too tightly.
> {Trop estraindre fet chiier.} [5]

The meaning of the second aphorism echoes the wisdom "Clutching a thing too tightly makes you drop it."[6] What is a man to do when his land tenure depends on dropping a fart? One could easily make a stinking mess of the situation.

Men's natural bodily functions depend on their mental and emotional states. While men have similarities with dogs, most men are more mentally and emotionally complex than dogs. Subtle and sometimes even unconscious fears and anxieties can thwart men's physical performances. Demanding performance at a particular time and with specific requirements creates a burden of performance. Those who seek to enjoy men's wonderful physical capabilities should offer broad latitude for performance with ongoing consent and receptivity.

Notes:

[1] Of course women as well as men fart. Doubly transgressing gynocentric norms of discourse, Marcolf observed:

> A fat and large woman is more lavish in producing farts.
> {Mulier pinguis et grossa est largior in dando iussa.}

Solomon and Marcolf 14b, from Latin trans Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 56-7. The burden of performance, however, is characteristically much greater for men than women.

[2] Roland the Farter appears in the Latin manuscripts as Rollandus, le Pettus, Rollandus le Pettour, and Rollandus le Pettur. Those variants include a mixture of Latin, French, and Anglicized word forms. The English Calendar of the Close Rolls records for 1234 Walterus Fartere (Walter the Farter). The Leicestershire Lay Subsidy Roll records for 1327 Johannes le Fartere (John the Farter). Those names similarly mix forms across languages. Allen (2007) pp. 129, 178-9.

Men have performed as farters for millennia. Early in the fifth century GC, Augustine of Hippo noted:

> Some have such command of their bowels, that they can break wind continuously at pleasure, so as to produce the effect of singing.

Augustine, City of God 14.24. An eighth-century Irish document refers to remuneration for professional farters. A Japanese scroll from the Kamakura period (1185-1333) depicts professional farters. Documents from sixteenth-century Europe also refer to men skilled in fart performance. Allen (2007) pp. 163-5. In late nineteenth-century France, Joseph Pujol ("Le Pétomane") rose to national prominence for farting. Purjol performed farting at the newly established Moulin Rouge theatre in Paris in the early 1890s.

[3] Liber Feodorum ("Book of Fees") 2:1174, from Latin trans. Allen (2007) p. 18 (similarly p. 171, with one minor mistake). The Latin for "one jump, a whistle, and one fart" is unum saltum et siffletum et unum bumbulum. The performance context suggests that all three acts were probably required to be performed simultaneously.

The word bumbulum for farting is unusual but probably not new. Bumbulum referred to a musical instrument in pseudo-Jerome, Epistle 23 (to the prefect Dardanus), entitled De Diversis generibus musicorum (available in Patrologia Latina 30:214A-B). That text is from the early ninth century. A medieval manuscript written before the fourteenth century has an illustration of a bumbulum. See Bavarian State Library MS shelfmark Clm 14523, image 109. Solomon and Marcolf 31b has bombi for farts. Some manuscripts of that work deploy bumbisare for fart as a verb at l. 116b. Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 58, 139, 178-9. In describing Roland the Farter's performance, Liber Feodorum also uses the more common word pettum for fart (unum saltum, siffletum, et pettum). Allen (2007) p. 171.

[4] Solomon and Marcolf 90b, from Latin trans. Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 66-7. The Latin word used for fart is pedere:

> Although recorded only once in the fart-filled S&M {Solomon and Marcolf}, it was the principal word for expressing farting in Classical Latin and endured in Romance languages

Id. p. 167. This unusual farting diction within Solomon and Marcolf suggests a linguistic allusion in l. 90b for "shake itself": crepitus ventris ("shaking of the bowels"). In medieval Latin, ventre can be translated as "stomach," "bowels," or "intestines." Id. p. 147. In classical Latin texts, crepitus ventris is attested as a phrase for farting:

> He is even said to have thought of an edict allowing the privilege of breaking wind quietly or noisily at table, having learned of a man who ran some risk by restraining himself through modesty.
>
> dicitur etiam meditatus edictum, quo veniam daret flatum crepitumque ventris in convivio emittendi, cum periclitatum quendam prae pudore ex continentia repperisset.

Suetonius, Life of Claudius 32, trans. J.C. Rolfe, via a learned and instructive presentation at Laudator Temporis Acti.

[5] Rutebeuf, Le Pet au Vilain (The Peasant's Fart) l. 50, from Old French trans. Dubin (2013) p. 465, where for chiiet I've replaced "lets loose" with "shit." That's the translation given in id. p. 964 (note).

[6] The fifteenth-century French poet François Villon recorded the proverb Tant embrasse on que chiet la prise ("Clutching a thing too tightly makes you drop it.") Villon, *Ballade de Proverb*s, 23, text and trans. from Dubin (2013) pp. 963-4 (note), citing NRCF. A related Middle French proverb is Qui plus haut monte qu'il ne doit, de plus haut chet qu'il ne voidroit ("He who rises higher than he should, will fall farther than he would like." Hassell (1982) p. 167, M176 (English translation is mine).

A medieval Latin proverb highlights the challenge of performance in farting. Qui pedit dum vult, pedit dum pedere non vult ("He who farts when he wishes, farts when he does not wish to fart.") Ziolkowski (2008) p. 165, citing to Walther 4:235, no. 24465 and noting that this proverb is "a heavily spondaic (and presumably therefore comically onomatopoeic) hexameter."

[images] (1) Skateboard stunt at Venice Beach and Boardwalk, Los Angeles, US. Cropped version of photo by Matteo Paganelli. (2) Man looking out between rocks at Matterhorn, Zermatt, Switzerland. Cropped version of photo by Joshua Earle. Both available via Creative Commons Zero license at unsplash.com

References:

Allen, Valerie. 2007. On farting: language and laughter in the Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. (Danuta Shanzer's review)

Dubin, Nathaniel. 2013. The fabliaux. New York: Liveright.

Hassell, James Woodrow. 1982. Middle French proverbs, sentences and proverbial phrases. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Ziolkowski, Jan M. 2008. Solomon and Marcolf. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Great Men Under Siege – The Fiamengo File Episode 14

AVfM Video Source · 28 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Why do famous men find themselves in the crosshairs of gender ideologues? Janice Fiamengo reports.

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

Julia Tourianski and the MRM

AVfM Video Source · 28 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A rebuttal to Julia Tourianski's (Brave the World) criticism of the Men's Rights Movement.

If you enjoyed this video please encourage more by subscribing to Semprini.

Birth of a new feminist threat to men

August Løvenskiolds · 29 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists rarely give birth to new ideas, but one is budding in their wombs in a way that cries out for abortion.

Should men in STEM fields (Science, Technology, Engineering, Math) be encouraging their women peers with vacuous praise? An emerging feminist trope is attempting to goad men into giving college women science students unexpected and possibly unwanted "attaboy" (attagirl?) acknowledgements in order, it is supposed, to stem the flow of women out of STEM classes. This nascent effort is laden with traps designed by feminists specifically to destroy men's lives with false accusations of creating hostile environments for women.

College men need to hold their tongues and ignore this damseling dudgeon.

The new trope, which doesn't even have a name yet, comes from a study by Dan Grunspan at the University of Washington about the gendered differences between how male and female students estimate each other's competence and achievements. The results of this study were recounted in a badly written blog post in the WaPo by a man-hater named Danielle Paquette.

I'm going to dub the new problem "mangrading" and the proposed solution "vagboosting." But first, some background on the purported problem.

In the study, women predicted within a tight margin the grades of other students, while men tended to estimate the grades of their male peers as being higher than the actual grades. One might term this as either overestimation or under-grading, depending on the source of the differential, but Paquette describes this situation as variously sexist:

- Male students assumed their male classmates knew more about course material than female students — even if the young women earned better grades. Of course, Paquette is lying by implication – there is no sign that the men knew anything about the grades of their female cohort, who tended to be silent and passive in class as if completely overwhelmed by the material being studied. Through the lens of her man-hate, Paquette is accusing men of not being able to read the women's minds to assess their competence, or perhaps, not being able to realize that their sexist professor was boosting coeds' grades, or maybe depressing mens', as a sort of diversity chick bonus.

- So, Grunspan and his colleagues at the University of Washington and elsewhere decided to quantify the degree of this gender bias in the classroom. Paquette begs the question – assuming gender bias as the conclusion and not proving the men held such attitudes. A professor artificially tinkering with the grades of students is a more parsimonious explanation of the results than a gender-wide conspiracy theory like patriarchal down-thinking about women classmates.

- Men over-ranked their [male] peers by three-quarters of a GPA point, according to the study, published this month in the journal PLOS ONE. In other words, if Johnny and Susie both had A's, they'd receive equal applause from female students — but Susie would register as a B student in the eyes of her male peers, and Johnny would look like a rock star. Note the wild misstatement here – even if we accept that men over-ranked men, this doesn't mean that they down-ranked women in an absolute sense, yet this is exactly what man-hater Paquette wants us to believe. Again, the effect noted in the study could easily be due to the professor depressing men's grades or boosting women's in collusion with, or coercion from, feminists pushing diversity goals like "more vagina in STEM."

The blaming and shaming language goes on but eventually gives way to the proposed solution: the attagirl catcall:

> College women in STEM programs ditch their majors earlier and more often than male students. That's one reason STEM fields remain male-dominated.

> Grunspan said reinforcement from faculty members and peers is enormously important to a young person's education and career development. A simple "You can do this," for both men and women, could mean the difference between pushing through adversity or giving up.
>
> If a female student's talent is ignored or unnoticed in other classes, "it adds up," Grunspan said. "What does that mean for the entire collegiate experience for women in STEM?"

Feminists created this chilly environment all the way back in the first feminist conference in 1848 Seneca Falls when men were told to sit in the back and shut up – at least in the presence of women. Feminists STILL freak out when men greet them on the street, finding any sort of interaction with men misogynistic. A YouTube video about this has over 42 million views.

And yet, the proposed solution to this non-existent problem is for men students to catcall women students about their grades?

Hey baby, love that new GPA on you! Wanna join my study group?

Of course, the hollow praise could be stated neutrally and still set off feminist alarm bells. We know how women react to naïve "nice guys" giving them unsolicited compliments – unless the guy is as rich as Christian "50 Shades of" Grey – they react with both annoyance and suspicions of ulterior motives. Repeated "encouragement" like this will inevitably lead to sexual harassment and hostile environment charges being filed against both hapless men and universities workers who were doing nothing more than making good-natured efforts to follow a new set of feminist demands that run afoul of the existing set of feminist demands.

This flim-flam reminds me of other progressive-regressive traps:

- Do you avoid ethnic food? Then, you are racist! / Do you eat ethnic food? Then, you are appropriating their culture for your own benefit!
- Do you hate sluts? That's slut-shaming! Do you like sluts? You're objectifying them!
- Do you put women last in a speaking queue? You're de-prioritizing their voices! Do you put women first in a speaking queue? You're reserving the prime spots for men once the crowd is warmed up!

In addition to the obvious sexual harassment / hostile environment issues, the new vagboosting has its own flim-flam: if you fail to vagboost, you are making it harder for women in STEM, but if you do vagboost, you are saying to women that they are too weak emotionally to succeed in STEM without a man's blessing and generous help.

Neither mangrading nor vagboosting may be on the way to the feminist big time like manspreading or sexist air conditioning, but I find it an illustrative case study of the mechanics of how feminists are ever exploring ways to expand their brutal treatment of men.

Men are becoming wise to this as the slow and grinding process of destroying gynocentric philosophies proceeds. The chill deep in the bones of feminists feels like a brisk Spring morning to me.

ICMI’16 just around the corner

Paul Elam · 29 February 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Book now.

https://icmi16.wordpress.com/book-here/

I am here to help AVFM — Here's why

Mr.Jacques · 1 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I recently contacted AVFM to offer my services as a volunteer.

I'm a British high school student who is a bit of a nerd and have, rather recently, discovered the feminist movement and the mythical oppression of women. This happened in the debate club that I belong to at my school.

We recently had a debate about whether or not men and women would ever be equal, a topic of which I am rather fond. However, upon getting into this debate I raised a point about men in prison serving more time than women for the same crime.*

For this simple declaration of fact, I have earned the title of "sexist pig."

I was attacked even though I was arguing that both sexes should be equal. My argument was countered with the irrelevant (and I think highly questionable) pay gap feminists love so much to lay claim to. Naturally, they failed to cite any evidence, which is not surprising given they were working harder at derailment than debate.

Later that evening I decided to research more into the discrimination that both men and women face. Upon researching into many feminist talking points I discovered that a startling number were complete and utter nonsense.

This includes the holy grail of women overwhelmingly being the victims of more abuse than men. Statistics are varied. Although some showed that women were victims of domestic violence slightly more often, men were clearly the victim of more violence, generally speaking. 2.3% of men had been the victim of "any type" of violence in comparison to 1.3% of women

This, along with being attacked for honestly engaging in an important debate, led me to look for a group which supported my point of view. In this search, I stumbled across few groups but, eventually, came across AVFM.

After reading the mission statement I knew I had found a group of like-minded people, so I decided to offer my aid to the cause.

I am glad to be here and look forward to helping in the days ahead.

*https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/380301/infographic-women-and-the-criminal-justice-system.pdf

https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/380094/victims-tables-3.xls

The argument for a principled approach

James Huff · 1 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By Jacques-Louis David – http://www.metmuseum.org/collection/the-collection-online/search/436105, Public Domain, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=28552

Article originally publish at AVFM on Feb 15, 2013. ED

There are some questions that lie ahead of us that may seem easy to answer at first, but we need to understand the implications of everything we have done so far and what it has already spelled out for our future. Turning this behemoth of misandrist culture around is not going to be easy, I dare say not even possible without the type of wanton destruction it will cause itself as it collapses under its own weight. The fact of the matter is that every culture in every time has depended on the idea of male disposability for the "greater good"… and that "greater good" has often destroyed itself in the process of demanding too much from the individual to sustain the greater whole. It is a cyclical event, and the rise and fall of nation-states, or, at least, the bloody and horrific revolutions that occasionally visit them happen with such regularity that we barely bat an eyelid anymore.

The fact that these cyclical events can be evidenced over a period of 5000 years of human history does not mean that our futures have to remain so however. Within the Men's Right's Movement, I recognize the seeds of something far greater than anything that has come previously. I see a New Renaissance, a revitalization of individual freedoms and liberties, an unshackling of the chains of the destructive cycles of humanity, and the movement of humans toward a New Age.

Do not take the above paragraph for the idea that I envision some Utopian world. I see something far from it. Our struggles define who we are, but the question remains whether or not we should be struggling with ourselves, or with new innovations and becoming masters of the universe around us. I see all the wasted effort of hundreds of millions of lives in a struggle to control groups of humans, most of whom simply want peaceful lives for their loved ones. I am talking about changing the scope of our struggle from the predominantly Human Vs. the human paradigm we now have to a new one: Human vs. Environment.

"James, you are jumping the gun on this!"… and yes, I know that I am, and have done so with a purpose. The artist unveils the painting before explaining the creative process that brought him to it and the meaning behind it. It is the "What the fuck is that?" moment when looking at the canvas that unlocks something in the human psyche, and the artist can then explain the meaning as clear as fresh air.

Now pay attention to this next part.

Most humans are blinded by all the extraneous thought placed within political group-think. The moral questions of the day are framed in simple matters of right and wrong when dealing with the individual but seem ever so complicated when applied to the needs of a group of people, or how one group of people interact with another group of people. We get bogged down in old prejudice, financial matters, and resource allocation and everyone wants a slice of whatever is being served up next from their political masters.

Group W supports Politician X because they get Product D, never mind that Group M was forced at the point of a gun to give up their Product D by Politician X. Besides, that Group M has plenty of Product D, and not sharing it – never mind they were actually robbed of it – would be morally reprehensible. This type of thing happens every day, all day, seven days a week, 365 days a year.

Meanwhile, all those from Group M see that all their Product D is being "liberated" – I mean taken– from them so they naturally say "Why the fuck should we produce any more Product D if the guys holding all the guns are just going to take it from us and give it to a Group W, who can get it themselves. If they want it that bad, then they should get it on their own merit." This inevitably leads to bad feelings all around as Group W feels slighted because they have just been called lazy and have heard for years that having as much Product D as they want is a Right. Of course, they heard that from Politician X, who promises them as much Product D as they need – I mean want – as long as they support him.

Eventually some people in Group M feel as if they should be in Group W, and stop producing Product D. Some people in Group M don't want to be in Group W because they don't want to be seen as the lazy layabouts they think Group W is, so they form a new group called Group A and decide to produce Product R, which is intentionally of no value to Group W. This new product serves Group A's and Group M's purposes just fine. This pisses off Group W, who now get less Product D because there are not enough people making it, and they demand from Politician X that Group A be disbanded because the production of product R threatens their free access to Product D.

Meanwhile, those remaining in Group M feel disenfranchised by the whole affair and decrease the production of Product D even further to the point where they can only sustain themselves, keeping Group W from getting hardly any Product D at all! Some of Group W decide to get some Product D for themselves by working for it, but the majority of Group W have been told it is their Right to have Product D on demand so they stay within the group and threaten Politician X that if more Product D is not forthcoming, that Politician X will quickly find votes against him in favor of Politician B – who promises to not only make sure plenty of Product D is forthcoming but a New and Improved Product D+ as well!

Politician X, not wanting to sign books on the failure of his policies for the rest of his life forces Group A to disband on the threat of imprisonment or death and eventually tells everyone in Group M that if they do not begin producing Product D in surplus at once, and make some new and improved Product D+ as well, that he will be forced to bring people with guns to make sure they do it. The story is old… timeless even. We have the current atmosphere, or blank canvas if you will, and a couple of colors of paint to choose from. We can make new colors from those we have, but we have to think outside the palette.

As we can see, the simplified problem above can contain ever so much more complexity, and the arguments can even be turned on their heads entirely (just turn the canvas upside down). Maybe Group M really is full of mean spirited asses that put Politician X in power to create a dependent Group W just to keep their economic power. Maybe Group W has become lazy layabouts because the idea of Rights as espoused by Politician X was hopelessly flawed and Politician X was just looking for easy votes – or, at least, a stifling of revolutionaries by controlling Group W with empty promises. Maybe…just maybe….Group A really did say "fuck-it-all," we are going to make everyone suffer from an overproduction of Product R, which could supply Groups A and M but would totally screw over all those ass-hats in Group W and make them crawl on their knees and beg for the production of Product D again. "That would teach Group W to think so high and mighty of themselves!"

This simply proves the point of how hopeless political ideologies are today, and so too the base individuals that drive those ideologies off the cliff of human reason and straight into bloody conflicts, ruined lives, suffering children, and inter-species relationships between cats and dogs. Those cat-dogs are the true abominations most politicians tell us.

We need to regulate how cats and dogs love each other because the children of those unions are actually the cause of all those bloody conflicts, ruined lives, and suffering children. Never mind the fact we hold guns to peoples' heads to enact our failed policies to begin with.

Obfuscation of the real reasons as to why the State continually fails on every level is the order of the day….I mean of the decade….I mean of the century….fuck it. What I really mean to say is the phrase "Throughout All of the History of Every State."

Now we can add our paint to this canvas we have been provided. That paint takes the form, not of a new political ideology or religion, or anything most people are familiar with. That paint is a moral philosophy called First Principles, and its practice and application to every human being (Universality) is known as Universally Preferred Behavior. This is not a totalitarian approach from some top-down power but an approach from the individual to the outside world.

The Five Principles:
1) Personal Accountability
2) Personal Responsibility
3) Characterization by Merit
4) Non-Aggression, Non-Violence
5) Respect for Personal Property

These are the colors we want to work with. There are several reasons why.

Almost all of the social issues we deal with every day can be broken down by using the First Principles Approach. Affirmative Action fails Number One and Number Three. Alimony fails Number Four and Number Five from the perspective of the courts, and Numbers One and Two from the perspective of the ex-"insert spousal type" receiving the alimony. Quotas for boardrooms fail Numbers One, Two, and Three from the perspective of the company, and Numbers Four and Five from the perspective of the government enforcement of these laws. These are just a few ideas of how we can break these issues down and argue them. This is how we attack misandry no matter where it is in our society. Any refutation of a single portion of the five principles also results in the entirety of the First Principles collapsing.

1) Personal Accountability – An internal measurement of Merit. This is defined through self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion, and the willingness to face natural consequences for your decisions. It is primarily used as an honest form of self-assessment. It keeps unrealistic expectations and narcissism in check.

2) Personal Responsibility – The measure of external actions that can also be seen and judged by others. This one has a twofold process, one of which is redundant to personal accountability, but creates a tie between the self and the world outside of the self. This is the physical manifestation of personal accountability as judged by others in both deed and word, and the barometer of basic relationships with other people.

3) Characterization by Merit–The ability to judge others based upon their personal responsibility. This means other people should be judged by whether or not they are moving toward self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion and whether they demonstrate a measure of personal accountability by facing the natural consequences of their actions. This is true regardless of external features of the individual being judged.

4) Non-Aggression/Non-Violence – Simply put…… Thou shalt not enforce thy will upon others through the use of threat of the loss of life or liberty, or by injury, or through the threat of loss of personal property (or by making good on said threats and simply taking what you want). This can be altered only in the scope of upholding contractual law in which consequences for breaking the contract are fully understood between both parties, or in defense of personal property rights.

5) Respect for Personal Property Rights – By which the fruits of all time and labor by an individual gained through self-sufficiency in any environment, or property gained through contractual agreements with other individuals is solely the possession of that individual and is not to be removed by any form of force or coercion. Another way to put it is the actual body of the individual, and anything created by the body (the tool of consciousness) is the exclusive property of that individual unless contractual agreements are signed between parties for the exchange of goods and services.

The key to understanding how to deconstruct all of our issues rests upon these five principles. It nullifies the idea of a social (socialized and statist) contract because contracts must be recognized and entered into by individuals, creates Universality of expectations of behavior between individuals, destroys cronyism in all its forms by creating a meritocracy, creates competition based on true supply and demand, generally allows self-interest and personal liberties to be followed without infringing upon the life and property of others, removes violence and coercion from a society that teaches these principles to their youngest, and increases the level of volunteerism in society to correct problems that cannot be solved through contractual agreements.

Apply these principles to individuals, and allow the influence of those principles to be seen in society, and you have a powerful force that is capable of pointing out misandry, true inequality of opportunity, and actual infringements upon individual rights no matter where it rests. This also becomes our most powerful tool on positing solutions to the myriad problems that boys and men face in today's society. No doubt these principles can be carried into every sphere of human interaction. My hope is that these ideas – these principles – are adopted by individuals in the MRM in order to paint a brighter future for you.

We are not all feminists

AVfM Video Source · 1 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The word misogyny

AVfM Video Source · 1 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Tartarian offers his thoughts on a term we hear all too often.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YA8HqsxuSO8&feature=youtu.be

Traditionalism vs. traditionalism

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 2 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The topic of gynocentrism is a perpetual undercurrent in the realm of red pill philosophy. It came up again recently, in a critique of a largely popular, critical commentator on third-wave feminism. That touched a nerve in the MHRM, and sparked some spirited, even acrimonious debate.

That nerve, we think, is connected directly to faultline, to a zone of demarcation within the nonfeminist sector that manages to surface regularly in the new narrative.

If history is any indication, we will see this friction revisited with greater intensity in the months and years ahead. That heat will increase with the commensurate increase in the popularity of nonfeminism. It warrants a good faith attempt to identify and explain what is happening. We may even head off some problems.

Traditionalism vs. modernism

Ostensibly, it appears that we have a long-running conflict between traditionalists and those who would make a clean break from any and all social constructs that govern identity and expectation based on sex.

Yet the debate about traditionalism is clearly more complex than a disagreement between people who want traditional vs. non-traditional relationships, a fact that becomes more evident with each flare-up of controversy and dissent.

Yes, we are going to say it. NATALT (Not All Traditionalists Are Like That). Not everyone who embraces some aspects of traditional relationships embraces chivalry or male disposability.

In the small but extant groupthink of the MHRM we have tended to tow some pretty rigid lines about what we perceive to be traditional relationships. If she works in the home and he works outside, and/or she primarily tends to children and he mows grass and does the home repairs, then we tend to lump it all into the same category, often in an unflattering way.

We've even developed a pejorative language, e.g. "tradcon" to identify those who have decided to pursue married and family life.

This division is not insignificant and has been the source of factions and splits within the greater movement for years.

Gynocentric traditionalist vs non-gynocentric traditionalist

There, we reckon, is the clearest definitive difference. This, much more so than traditionalist vs nontraditionalist, identifies those who are legitimately following a path which supports the restoration of human worth to men and boys.

The faultline can equally be discerned between two kinds of relationship agreements. ie. between gynocentric traditionalist and the non-gynocentric traditionalist. However both of them may choose to be married and have a family. We simply argue that one of those two different kinds of families has a great chance of producing more well-rounded children, individuals with agency and accountability.

The faultline, which rightly deserves to be there, is between those who follow the tenants of chivalry and romantic love, and those who don't.

Non-gynocentric traditionalism might still be based on a role division as long as it's an equitable one in terms of labor exertion and associated risks to health. That means role divisions can't be based on chivalry or any other kind of male servitude. No amount of labor division can reciprocate or compensate for a man dying on the job for less in return.

For example, this by Modesta Pozzo in 1590 speaks of an unequal labor division, thus gynocentric tradition:

> "Don't we see that men's rightful task is to go out to work and wear themselves out trying to accumulate wealth, as though they were our factors or stewards, so that we can remain at home like the lady of the house directing their work and enjoying the profit of their labors? That, if you like, is the reason why men are naturally stronger and more robust than us—they need to be, so they can put up with the hard labor they must endure in our service."[1]

The description of traditional gynocentric roles put forward by Pozzo is no mere theory, as proven in the words of one of her contemporaries, Lucrezia Marinella (c.1571-1653), who described the situation between men and women as follows;

> "It is a marvelous sight in our city to see the wife of a shoemaker or butcher or even a porter all dressed up with gold chains round her neck, with pearls and valuable rings on her fingers, accompanied by a pair of women on either side to assist her and give her a hand, and then, by contrast, to see her husband cutting up meat all soiled with ox's blood and down at heel, or loaded up like a beast of burden dressed in rough cloth, as porters are. At first it may seem an astonishing anomaly to see the wife dressed like a lady and the husband so basely that he often appears to be her servant or butler, but if we consider the matter properly, we find it reasonable because it is necessary for a woman, even if she is humble and low, to be ornamented in this way because of her natural dignity and excellence, and for the man to be less so, like a servant or beast born to serve her."[2]

The chivalry and romantic love in this account, one that promotes a gynocentric sexual contract between men and women, is the part that can easily be dropped while still embracing traditional standards that foster family bonds and the raising of functional, adjusted children.

What remains after gynocentrism is excised are benign aspects of traditional relationships such as a balanced labor division (where men and women both cut up meat and are covered in ox's blood) or labor balanced into different areas – she scrubs bathroom tiles while he mows grass. Women's willingness to labor was common in times past where they regularly worked as butchers, bakers and candlestick-makers alongside their male counterparts.

In that cooperative atmosphere of mutual contribution, men and women were more attracted to marriage and belonging to a large extended family – with all members of the family looking out for the safety, and health of the family network.

Other aspects of traditionalism, too, deserve a mention, such as those of benefit to men. These include more father-son time, and an assumption of being able to enjoy male spaces such as male-only drinking saloons, sporting teams, pool halls, and fraternal organizations; Elks, Masons, Golden Fleece, and many others.[3]

The question today is where the hell can any man find a traditional relationship with a women who eschews chivalry and romantic love – aka gynocentrism? It's like looking for a needle in a haystack, which is why going your own way, or rather away from gynocentric traditionalism, is the most sensible thing a man can do.

The low odds for success are why modern men are rejecting traditional relationships with women, even the non-gynocentric ones, in favor of novel new ideas – because they don't believe women today are willing to reciprocate while the hand of gynocentrism keeps on giving. Usually, they are right.

Men's Human Rights Advocates wishing to promote benign or valuable aspects of tradition need to be more active in denouncing the toxic gynocentrism of same, otherwise the baby will continue to be thrown out with the bathwater, sans ceremony, by men who are unwilling to play Russian roulette with a world of Disney Princesses.

Even so the question remains of whether the valuable aspects of traditionalism can be separated in lived life, for this baby has been drinking the bathwater for centuries.

The answer to that question is probably in the affirmative for the small number of men with the insight, intelligence and determination to create such relationships.

What remains certain, though, is that those men and others will not benefit from a veneer of men's advocacy that peels back to reveal gynocentric obedience and male disposability.

Simply put, antifeminism is not enough. Antagonizing social justice warriors is an entertaining pastime but on its own becomes a hollow ally for men concerned with misandry and male disposability.

If you are concerned with the humanity of men, with their access to compassion and choice, you would be ill-advised to consider anyone your ally that says in one breath that feminism is harmful, and out of the next that we need men to learn how to treat women according to a chivalrous code.

It was that code that morphed into the ideologically polluted waves of feminism to begin with.

References:

[1] The Worth of Women: their Nobility and Superiority to Men (1590)
[2] The Nobility and Excellence of Women and the Defects and Vices of Men (1600)
[3] Edward Ward, The Secret History of Clubs, (published 1709). [This is one of hundreds of titles detailing traditional male clubs, guilds, and fraternities. The examples given show that the clubs were riotous places of laughter, male bonding, drinking, inventing and collaborating on various projects, and above all were places to enjoy a little self-chosen freedom. Married and bachelor men alike participated, and in the majority of clubs no women were allowed to set foot].
[4] E. Belfort Bax, 'Chivalry Feminism' in The Fraud of Feminism (1913)

Sweden’s Gender War (Könskriget) Part 1 of 2

AVfM Video Source · 2 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Today we’re presenting the first half of an interesting documentary from Sweden. To watch the first half of the documentary just watch each video below in the order presented. English subtitles should be on by default but they can be toggled with the “CC” button overlaying the videos.

The second half of the documentary will be presented tomorrow.

PART 1 SERIES

Malcolms, Martins and Uncompromising Positions

Wesley Pryce · 3 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On February 16 , the inimitable Andybob wrote an impassioned article on the need for 'fence sitters' who self-identify as MHRAs to stop tone policing the de facto leaders of the movement. It's the latest in a recent spate of articles on this topic. This is a subject that hits close to home for me, and on which I've been of two minds in the past.

Temperamentally, I'm very much a peacemaker; I always do my best to empathize with those on all sides of an issue, and I enjoy explaining to the myopic what they're failing to see in their opponents. I don't respond well to aggression and absolutism, and generally avoid employing them in my own communication. I'd be lying if I said I've always liked the manner in which AVfM makes some points, and probably have even said so in a comment or two. Given all this, the message I've been internalizing lately is "fuck off – the movement is better off without you."

Understandably, this doesn't sit well with me. I like to think I do a non-negligible part for the cause, both temporally and fiscally. But I feel like I know where the frustration against moderates is coming from; I've only been involved in the MHRM for a couple of years, so I have no idea of the callouses that one has to grow in order to soldier on for so long in the face of such brutal opposition. I get it.

But, like most "irreconcilable" differences between people who fundamentally agree on most things, this growing divide is largely based on confused premises and false dichotomies. So let's just reconcile these two camps (piece of cake).

Rectangles and Squares

Before I get into the meat of the reconciliation, a fundamental principle of argumentation needs to be identified and embraced: universal affirmatives are non-reversable. A simple illustration of this principle is in the following:

- Universal affirmative (true): All squares are rectangles.
- Reversal (false): All rectangles are squares.

Simple enough in theory.

Why do I bring this up? At the heart of this MHRM civil strife is a subtext; it isn't something that Andybob explicitly wrote, but it is foundational to the rift. The subtext is the conflation of "persistence" with "aggression," of "being accusatory" with "being inflammatory," of "being confrontational" with "being rude." I'm not saying the latter set is morally bad, but the two sets of terms are hardly synonymous, and it's not doing any favors to anyone to claim that a person pointing out this conflation is somehow ignorant. In short, one can be inflammatory in their uncompromising pursuit, but not all uncompromising pursuits are inflammatory.

What Andybob says is:

"By uncompromising… I mean [not] allowing people to weasel out of acknowledging that their opinions are based on assumptions which denigrate men and promote the bigoted notion that their rights and welfare matter less than everyone else's.

"…It can only be challenged by standing up to feminists and debunking their gynocentric narratives with intellectual integrity, pristine logic and a refusal to compromise."

I one-hundred percent agree with this assertion. Visualized, it looks something like this:

Diagram 1

However, as far as I understand the conflict, the issue is not whether the above is true (it clearly is), it is whether one of these is true:

Diagram 2 Diagram 3

Those what seem to assert that Diagram 2 is the case often retreat to the motte of Diagram 1 when challenged. And, frankly, those who favor Diagram 3 don't have a motte to which they can retreat. I think that this is where the rift begins.

But, you know the best part about the above? It doesn't matter![1] Here's why.

Malcolms and Martins

Successful social movements generally have (and, more importantly, need) two types of leaders: Malcolms and Martins.

Malcolms[2] are those who are intentionally inflammatory in their uncompromising pursuit of social change. After all, most people are lazy and have plenty of problems to deal with throughout the course of everyday life. Unless a problem either is (1) made personal for them or (2) made impossible to ignore, it will be ignored. Malcolms are good at both tactics (and at #2 in particular).

The thing about Malcolms is this: they tend to be very threatening, not only in principle but in tone. By definition, change is going against an existing power structure. The thing about the powerful is that, unless they have incentive to do otherwise, standard operating procedure is to violently squash threats.

That's where Martins[3] come in. They provide the disincentive for the powers that be to ruthlessly quash the movement – the second part of the one-two punch. First, the Malcolms spark rage and fear by bombastic means. This is generally necessary but incomplete, as it puts people on the defensive and short-circuits their capacity to access empathy for anyone outside of their tribe. The Martins, though, are able to kindle that empathy while still keeping alive the flame of attention that the Malcolms work to fan. As Gandhi said:

"The goal of nonviolence is not the humiliation or defeat of the opponent but the winning of the enemy's friendship and understanding."[4]

The conscience of your enemy becomes your ally – you overcome their defensive tribalism by expanding their tribe to include you.

Let us be clear: both approaches are generally necessary in a non-bloody revolution. If police were to brutally put down an advancing column of armed Black Panthers (i.e. – Malcolms), it would be disturbing to onlookers but would not have produced a groundswell of support for the fallen. However, when police savage an advancing column of unarmed civilians who refuse to raise a hand to defend themselves (i.e. – Martins), that's when you get busloads of white people driving south to join the marches. Conversely, nobody gives a shit about a frail old brown man on a hunger strike unless it's in the context of massive sectarian riots in Kohat. One draws the gaze, the other humanizes it.

Knowing that both approaches are necessary, I doubt it's a good thing for social movements when their leaders insist on only one approach and belittle the other breed of leaders. For example, even though Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. had heated debates over the tenor of the civil rights movement, Malcolm still said:

"The goal has always been the same, with the approaches to it as different as mine and Dr. Martin Luther King's non-violent marching, that dramatizes the brutality and the evil of the white man against defenseless blacks. And in the racial climate of this country today, it is anybody's guess which of the 'extremes' in approach to the black man's problems might personally meet a fatal catastrophe first — 'non-violent' Dr. King, or so-called 'violent' me."

This seems much more wise than if he had said something along the lines of, oh I don't know, this:

"I offer those who prefer the softly, softly approach my best wishes, as I would any fellow traveler. There is a place for them – it's just that, in my opinion, that place may as well be at the feet of [the white man] who may want to adopt them as a special project for proving to the world that they really do care about [the black man]."

Synthesis

It is a mark of maturity to recognize that a difference of temperament is generally not a difference of character. Teenagers think that any music other than their preferred genre "sucks," while adults think that music that they don't prefer is just that – music that they don't prefer. A teenager who has an aggressive approach to leadership thinks that those who lead from behind are "pussies," while an adult understands that both types of leadership have their place, their weaknesses, and (yes) their strengths.

This is how I've made peace with the whole dichotomy. When I hear "lead, follow, or get out of the way," I translate it to this:

Lead. Lead in your own way, and get out of the way of other leaders.

And that's my plan.

*****

[1] In the context of strategic philosophy. It very much matters in increasing our ability to empathize with one another which, I think we can all agree, is a practice that MHRAs (specifically) and men (generally) should take seriously.

[2] Named after Malcolm X, but also exemplified in characters like Muhammad Ali Jinnah and Harvey Milk.

[3] Named after Martin Luther King Jr. See also: Mohandas Gandhi, Jonathan Larson, and Socrates.

[4] Keep in mind that the enemies here are not activated feminists, who are largely an implacable 10% of the population. The "enemy" whose approbation must be won is the apathetic, the disengaged – the other 90%. After all, even King said, "If your opponent has a conscience, then follow Gandhi. But if your enemy has no conscience, like Hitler, then follow Bonhoeffer."

The six eye-watering reasons why you should NEVER allow your son to be circumcised (NSFW)

Peter Lloyd · 3 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

- Last month, Dr Paul Turek espoused the benefits of circumcision
- He claimed it reduces the risk of HIV and STD infection, but Peter Lloyd, author of Stand by Your Manhood, slams the advice as preposterous
- Like an eyelid, he says the foreskin has many functions – and its removal causes the head of the penis to harden and desensitise, like a callus
- He also calls out feminist double-standards on the issue, claiming the frequent violation of boys is 'systematically ignored'
- But health experts argue the procedure reduces the prevents the spread of viral STDs, including HIV, Herpes and HPV – and also penile cancer

By Peter Lloyd for MailOnline

Published: 06:21 EST, 2 March 2016 | Updated: 07:27 EST, 2 March 2016

Most people would consider the bodies of men and women equally valuable.

But, when it comes to circumcision, that clearly isn't true – which is odd considering the procedure removes functional tissue, causes extreme pain, permanently disfigures and forever damages sexual response, regardless of gender.

Oh, and in most cultures where female circumcision is routinely performed, the male equivalent is also done with equally dirty, blunt apparatus.

Meaning it's less a competition of suffering and more a universal issue of genital integrity.

So, you can imagine my disdain when Dr Paul Turek, a private doctor from California, recently claimed that clamping a boy's foreskin and cutting it off with a scalpel is meritorious (although, with a lucrative clinic that charges handsome fees, he would say that…)

Fortunately, as someone with 30 years experience of having a penis, I'm more than qualified to explain why it's not OK to modify a person's body without consent.

The first circumcision is thought to have happened in Egypt centuries ago and, since then, has been performed for religious reasons across the Middle East – but it only became popular in the West during the nineteenth century when Victorian kill-joys wanted to discourage people from masturbating.

Not to put you off your breakfast, but one of the biggest advocates was Michigan physician Dr John Harvey Kellogg – yep, the man behind your corn flakes.

A medical practitioner and businessman, he also doubled as a sex prude.

Not content with his own monastic life, he also wanted to discourage everybody else from pleasure too, so suggested young girls receive a dab of carbolic acid to the clitoris while boys have the hoods of their foreskins cut off.

Both methods were designed with one specific, leg-crossing aim: to tame lust in the young.

Fortunately, the former didn't catch on – but the latter did…and has now become a multi-million-pound industry shrouded in misinformation, monetary gain and foreskin folklore.

So, to combat this here's a definitive, six-point reality-check on circumcision:

1) THE BODY HAS FORESKIN FOR A REASON

IntactAmerica – a leading voice of the rising 'intactivist' movement – note that 'the foreskin is a normal, sensitive, and useful body part.

In infant boys, it serves a protective function, and throughout a man's life, it keeps the glans moist, shields it from injury, and enhances sexual pleasure.

'By crushing and severing the foreskin, you damage the healthy penis, cause unnecessary pain and bleeding, create a risk of infection and complications, and permanently remove viable erogenous tissue.'

In fact, the foreskin has a whopping 16 functions. These include:

- Providing bacteriostatic action around the head (inhibits bacterial growth)
- Protecting the nerves to keep the penis sensitive during sex (where the foreskin also acts as a rolling device – otherwise thrusting would hurt more and feel a bit pinched),
- Distributing natural lubricants
- Storing pheromones for releases on arousal – making us more attractive to our other halves on a chemical level –
- Acting as a sleeping bag for the shaft, keeping it safe and warm

Besides, if we didn't need it, evolution would've got rid by now.

Oh, and no professional medical association in the world recommends routine circumcision, so there.

2) CIRCUMCISION CAN CAUSE PERMANENT INJURY AND INFANT DEATH

More worryingly, boys who have their foreskin removed often suffer complications – some of which are not revealed until the victim is sexually mature.

Sadly, an additional 117 babies are estimated to die from botched procedures in the US alone, each year.

In September 2012, a two-week-old infant died at a Brooklyn hospital after contracting herpes through a circumcision ritual called metzitzah b'peh, which involves the bleeding foreskin coming into contact with the mouth of the mohel, who sucks it dry.

In November 2012, Manchester Crown Court heard how a four-week-old boy bled to death after a DIY home circumcision went wrong. Nurse Grace Adeleye was paid £100 to carry out the procedure, using only scissors, forceps and olive oil, at the family home in Chadderton. Adeleye was later found guilty of manslaughter by gross negligence.

Likewise, Californian baby Brayden Tyler Frazier died in 2013. The newborn child, who was only a few days old, suffered serious complications as a result of the procedure and died from his injuries on 8 March. Ironically, his death coincided with International Women's Day.

3) IT'S SEXIST TO DIFFERENTIATE BETWEEN FGM & MGM

One look in the comments section of Dr Turek's article shows a huge empathy gap – and utter contempt for anyone who tries to align the issues.

Laws across the West rightly prohibit girls from undergoing FGM, but the same protection isn't extended to boys.

Even the NSPCC, Save the Children and Barnado's have no initiative to protect boys. Of course, gender warriors justify this by claiming one is about hygiene and the other the oppression of women, but is there actually a link between male circumcision and FGM?

'Oh, there's absolutely a comparison,' says Rebecca Wald, creator of Jewish campaign group Beyond The Bris, which advocates against boy-cutting.

'There's a continuum of FGM [female genital mutilation] and the equivalent of male circumcision is definitely on there, whether people like it or not. Some forms of FGM are just a pin-prick, which is obviously still bad, but it's nowhere near as terrible as complete foreskin removal. The whole thing has become political.

'As a mother, I'm amazed that there are people dedicated to saving girls' genital integrity who couldn't care less about boys'. It's definitely a men's rights issue. One hundred per cent.'

Interestingly, she also sees it as a woman's issue.

'Most of my audience are women,' she adds. 'Which is interesting, because it's a son's mother who hands him over to be operated on in the first place. Her boy is taken with her full consent, when – like a lioness – she should be opposing it. But where are the feminists?'

Jonathon Conte, a Californian campaigner who's also part of a radical new generation of anti-cutting activists across the USA, agrees.

'Regardless of the sex of the victim, a healthy individual being restrained without their consent and having their genitals removed is a violation.

In its purest form the removal of the prepuce, which is the same structure anatomically in men and women, it's entirely an analogous procedure.

Besides, we shouldn't be arguing about what's better or worse. It shouldn't be a competition of suffering, everybody has the right to grow up with their whole body.

'As an adult if you want to have a body modification – a tattoo, a piercing, cosmetic surgery or circumcision – great, go for it, but children aren't property.'

4) UNCIRCUMCISED MEN ARE NOT DIRTY

Perhaps one reason for the on-going tolerance of male circumcision is the hygiene excuse.

The World Health Organization says circumcised boys help reduce the risk of heterosexually-acquired HIV infection by 60 per cent. But, last time I checked, baby boys weren't having sex.

And, anyway, when that time eventually does come there's always a condom.

Besides, if circumcision prevented HIV so much, why is America still a nation with high transmission rates? In 2011, 49,273 people were diagnosed with HIV in the United States. In that same year, more than 32,000 people had full-blown AIDS.

More importantly, let me reiterate what any sane person already knows: rolling a foreskin back in the shower is not rocket science. Mother Nature is smart and knows exactly what she's doing.

And while Dr Turak asserts that circumcision can help prevent penile cancer, a simpler solution is surely to offer all young men the HPV vaccine – something that's currently only given to women.

Job done.

5) BOY-CUTTING OFTEN CAUSES PSYCHOLOGICAL DAMAGE

The appropriately named Catherine Hood, a counsellor from the Institute of Psychosexual Medicine, knows about the mental scarring, too.

She sees many men who are angry about having been circumcised as a boy – and explains that they experience feelings of invasion, self-loathing and shame.

'The issues that men are angry about are very individual,' she says from her clinic in LA.

'But often they are angry with the fact they've had the procedure and this can lead to a sense of loss or of being different to the other men.

'This can cause a drop in sexual confidence, avoidance of relationships, or I have seen one man who felt he had reduced sensation and so didn't enjoy sex as much as a result.

'Obviously, parents make the decision to get their children circumcised, and the child doesn't have a say. If the child then grows up with any grievance against their parent, then this is an obvious focus.'

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=waksQaas854

6) THE CIRCUMCISION INDUSTRY THRIVES BECAUSE IT GENERATES MILLIONS

In addition to the fee for private procedures (of which there are more than a million US cases each year), there are the people who make money off the tools used – the clamps, the boards used to strap down the children, the cutting utensils and the anaesthetic.

On top of that, there's the tissue-harvesting industry, where a number of companies make a profit on neonatal foreskin. The tissue, after amputation, is sold to biotech companies and it's used for skin grafts, burn victims, diabetic patients, scientific research and anti-wrinkle cream.

‘It’s a huge multi-million-dollar industry, so there’s a lot of financial incentive to keep the circumcision train rolling,’ adds Jonathan Conte.

‘There are many people who are making a lot of money when it happens, who would make no money if it didn’t. Forget human rights, it’s all about the mighty dollar.’

Which begs the question: is there a hidden financial reason why we’re encouraged to cut our sons? Is this just a cash-generator – straight from his pants? The answer, with the exception of medically-correcting phimosis in consenting adults, is always yes.

Meaning practitioners and parents should cut it out, not off.

Source:
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/health/article-3471852/Six-reasons-NEVER-allow-son-circumcised.html?ITO=1490&ns_mchannel=rss&ns_campaign=1490

Sweden’s Gender War (Könskriget) Part 2 of 2

AVfM Video Source · 3 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Today we’re presenting the second half of the documentary from Sweden started yesterday. If you haven’t already done so please start by watching the first half of the documentary.

To watch the second half of the documentary just watch each video below in the order presented. English subtitles should be on by default but they can be toggled with the “CC” button overlaying the videos.

PART 2 SERIES

Feminist Terminology 1: Gender – The Fiamengo File Episode 22

AVfM Video Source · 3 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Fiamengo discusses the first of five pernicious feminist terms: Gender

Please encourage future videos by subscribing to StudioBrule.

Prepping for the wrong cataclysm...

Clint Carpentier · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Every once in a while, I find myself detouring in my absorption of worldly concerns. It's not always on purpose, but shit happens, and the result can sometimes be interesting. I bought the game, "The Last of Us," fell in love, surfed the AMV's, and wound up tumbling through a jungle gym of the Youtube Prepping Community. Well… Shit…

The good news is, this new age bundle of preppers doesn't have the conspiracy theorist paranoia bend I've come to expect from preppers. I'm a paranoid schizo on a good day, I don't need help dreaming shit up, I have the government, that's plenty enough nightmares.

So, I've found a considerable number of preppers who don't bother with the end of the world. PreparedMind101, for instance, is currently redesigning his motif on his 95-5 principle; that is 95% normal life 5% camping, 95% business as usual 5% emergency, etc.; mostly everyday preparedness. Many others talk about the necessities of a 72-hour bag, or conversely, the bug-out-bags (BOB), or as we in the manosphere know them, the grab-and-go (GAG); these intrigued me for a lot of reasons which you can probably guess.

Many preppers like Canadian Prepper and Ethical Preparedness deal with the psychology in the aftermath. Ok, when I first saw "Canadian Prepper" I had a mental image of this guy. While their theory is sound, regardless of what collapse anyone dreams up, they (like so many of their ilk) neglects to talk about the biggest threat to those who intend to survive; that threat being women.

Speaking of women – like most "take action" jobs and/or hobbies – very few women are preppers, and most of them, are married to preppers. My best guess on this gender disparity is the prepper's need for basic physical fitness, coupled with the ugly reality of what a woman is actually good for (both of which, modern women are desperately trying to ignore and make excuses for). Those few women who make their own prepping videos, often center around what you would typically expect of women to prepare for; medical, gardens, cooking, crafting, child amusement, hygiene, etc. And yet still, I haven't discovered much in the way of sex trade; I'll have to blame this discrepancy on the fact that most female preppers are, conservative married religious women who live mostly in rural communities. Even the Patriot Nurse, who has a good head on her shoulders, talked about sex as something to do, but as far as I've found, she hasn't talked about sex as a commodity to take or trade. Survival Lilly is refreshingly grunge in her rough-it videos.

But the preppers I find most interesting, from a facepalm perspective, are those preparing for some form of a catastrophic event which will cripple civilization. Putting aside the dumbasses (asteroids, solar flares, climate change, EMPs, nuclear holocaust, terrorism, etc.), the ones I keep thinking about are those worried about an economic meltdown, a Wall Street crash, a virus in the banking system. Anyone who follows my shit will know my views on money, so I'll do my best to keep this civil and boring.

There's a running joke among preppers – those orbiting the fringes in related areas – and that's the zombie apocalypse. Those of us who take it seriously, more often than not, don't understand the true zombie threat. Instead, we think in terms of classic zombie nomenclature. The zombie threat is very real and they are all around us; devouring brains, and creating more zombies as fast as their dead-eyed drooling strutting gait will allow them to. We don't know these zombies among us for what they are because it is politically incorrect to call them zombies, but they are every bit as dangerous as Hollywood makes them out to be; we can, however, call them liberal progressives, feminists, and social-justice warriors, mind their pronouns, shit-lord.

The promise of "freeing" women from the bondage of housewifery (now that's a kinky mental image), has sent the national debts of western countries spiraling around the crapper. Feminists demanded their governments create jobs for them, and their governments did just that. I wager half the female population is at the public feeding trough in one form or another, from welfare to inane ministries. This means that women aren't producing revenue.

Add to the mix that there's been a decades-long campaign called "work smart, not hard" in which production labor (which creates revenue) has been stigmatized in favor of higher education. And with that, a glut of garbage degrees which make both men and women useless in the real world. And the vile handling of our boys in school has lead to decreased literacy, increased incarceration, and a generally crappy labor pool to keep this joke of an economy looking like it means something. Someone had the gall to tell me it doesn't matter because we're moving into a service industry; well who the fuck sustains the service industry?

Men generate revenue, and married men generate most of that. However, with the sadistic legal climate of family courts sucking the life blood out of men for having a dissatisfied wife, men are avoiding marriage like the plague. And with the legal climate around sexual harassment and rape, young men are avoiding young women, like the plague. Over 70% of marriageable men in Japan have no intention of getting in a relationship; they are working minimum wage jobs, staying under the tax bracket, earning just enough to live on and feed their hobbies; the Japanese government is panicking, stripper poles are being installed in apartments to encourage sexual activity. Here in North America, the same culture is growing, about 60% of marriageable men have thrown up their hands and said, and I quote, "FUCK THIS SHIT!!!"

The economic collapse is upon us, groaning under the weight of gynocentric policies, and the growing phenomenon of retaliatory apathy called MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way). Pardon me while a giggle discreetly…

Look, I've shit in a hole and a bucket, and a wide array of other contraptions, and I've wiped my ass with moss, and some (I don't know) rolled up emery-cloth posing as toilet paper; I'm rather partial to soft paper and a flush mechanism. You can call me a pansy ass if it makes you feel better, I don't care; but if you think that's something, just wait until your wife/gf/daughter has to start reusing her crotch pads. Legal reform starts looking easy.

So let's entertain the idea that the economic meltdown (keyword, meltdown) happens in some manner that people start thinking it's actually happening. Well, you're fucked. After you've realized just how fucked you are, you need to take stock of your home, this is very important; if you can sell it for a loaf of bread, it has value. Yeah, go ahead and cry over your wife's China cabinet stuffed with glass figurines, you are so fucked. You remember that floor your wife said you needed, that Saxony carpet; yeah it's got no resale value, it was destined for landfill the moment it was made, just imagine how many fires you could have started with that cash. Your wife/gf is filling your home up with junk which can only be appreciated by people who care about showing off wasted wealth.

I hope you weren't dumb enough to store emergency gear in some rented storage facility because it's now owned by enterprising gangs. Oh, they may let you in without even letting you know they're there; letting you back out with anything that may be viewed as valuable, is a different story.

No, don't sell anything for cash. And don't look like you're not hard up.

Oh yeah, the women. They're gonna getcha killed, whether they mean to or not, they are gonna blindside you, because you have testicles, and your Captain-save-a-hoe alter ego is gonna go into full fucking stupid retard mode; cuzz dick + wet = life's good (it's genetic survival, one can only hope that your lazy-assed frontal lobe can tackle your lizard brain in time). Your wife/gf/daughter will be your biggest danger, as you are already invested in them; you better find out what their priorities are, because that's why you're going to die for them (she's pissed because you didn't get her a dozen long-stem roses and a day-spa for valentine's? And you're still with her why?). The neighbor lady who needs milk for her baby; no, because she will force you and yours into early starvation, she made her bed while life was good, had she kept her man, she wouldn't be knocking on your door. Legal reform starts looking easy.

Now, do I think that the aforementioned type of meltdown will occur? No, I think it will be an actual meltdown, much more like Rome, hobbling along for a few more generations, desperately holding onto glory long forgotten. Did you hear about those Hun refugees? Those poor poor destitute Huns, we need to take them under our wing and nurture them. Violent heathen criminals you say? Nonsense, you racist shit-lord.

In either case, one is left wondering, what will be needed to rebuild civilization. Turd Flinging Monkey thought he would answer this, and he came reasonably close with his hypocritical video Redeeming Social Darwinism. In it, he alludes to controlling female reproductive choice, referencing Jewish tradition of breeding mind over body. I'm not aghast at the thought, even having three daughters, I know the truth of this. Every time a society has fallen, a religion (new or old) has stepped in and asserted dominance over women. Coupled with statistics bearing out that women are on average more religious than men, it's little wonder women believe ludicrous ideas. Why does Feminist law look increasingly like Islamic law?

Do western men have what it takes to rebuild after the pending disaster? Are we too humane? Will our women step up and bitch-slap their sisters' stupidity? Preppers are generally blind to this problem. MGTOW's don't have an answer (nor would I expect them to), but when pressed they tend to gaslight and strawman the issue; I've been assumed to be a Nazi, and global population blah blah (like the West has a serious population problem, I think the reverse is true).

Look, I have three daughters, and if my advocacy of the MRM holds any sway, they'll never get married, and hopefully never end up in a long-term relationship. Admittedly that's a cruel punishment for – currently – innocent bystanders, but it's a sacrifice I have to deal with. But I can't look at the above problem and in good conscience think, "they'll be fine." I am their father, and when push comes to shove, this problem will land back on my table. Meaning that I will have to make some hypocritical choices and in certain perspectives, inhumane choices. One thing I will guarantee is my daughters will survive; their level of happiness… debatable.

Preppers… will your sons be ready for them? Legal reform starts looking easy.

As a side note, I showed the wife a picture of a "Hello Kitty" .45 pistol. She asked me, "are you getting me one?" with that expectant grin of hers, like her tiny child hands can even grasp a .45. I'm neither a prepper, nor a gun geek, but the wife's enthusiasm over Hello Kitty may well be my in. Almighty patriarchal penis help me, I live in Canada.

@SkepticFeminist

Men's Rights Edmonton · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Skeptic Feminist* is pissed off at MensRights Edmonton. Demands a "second wave" of the Men's Rights Movement.

Rabbi A. “Romi” Cohn of NYC, New York “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

 Rabbi Avrohom “Romi” Cohn has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the website American Board of Ritual Circumcision we see that Rabbi Cohn is “Executive Chairman of the American Board of Certified Mohelim.”

“As one of world Jewry’s most experienced mohelim, Avrohom “Romi” Cohn has performed more than 25000 circumcisions, on babies and adults in New York City, nationally and internationally. With his vast knowledge and experience, Cohn has trained dozens of mohelim and serves as the director of the American Board of Ritual Circumcision.”

As society slowly evolves toward sanity, Rabbi Cohn and people like him are increasingly facing opposition. He’s in the news for defending the sometimes deadly practice of sucking the blood from the infant’s mutilated penis. See the story here.

From the homepage:

> Making sure your child’s in the best of hands.
>
> The American Board of Ritual Circumcision is an organization devoted to the oversight of ritual circumcision and ensuring they are performed without compromising of halachic, medical, and safety measures. Our organization only approves ritual mohelim who are qualified experts in circumcision who have met the rigorous standards of halacha (Jewish law) and have demonstrated expertise and competence while serving an internship under a senior mohel. A number of leading pediatric urologists and physicians oversees our list of mohelim. Your child is too precious. He deserves to be circumcised by only the best.

Being in the hands of a circumciser is not the “best” treatment for a child. Why don’t we allow the child to decide for himself if genital mutilation is “best” for him?

“The American Board of Ritual Circumcision” admits this risky, unethical surgery is ritual with no medical necessity. Actually, it’s illegal to cut unconsenting infants for no medical reason. It’s sickening to see statements such as “Your child is too precious. He deserves to be circumcised by only the best.” That’s like ‘he deserves to be assaulted and maimed by the “best.”‘ Cohn’s barbaric and sometimes deadly practice of Brit Milah, the act of cutting then sucking the blood is obviously not medically necessary and is not even needed to satisfy Jewish tradition. A naming ceremony called Brit Shalom can be done without risky surgery, and as a matter of fact any baby born to a Jewish woman is Jewish.

Here’s some of the “Objects and Purposes” of “The American Board of Ritual Circumcision:”

> Mindful that the sanctity of life is a peremptory norm of Jewish life and the body of halachah, being the system of ethic-legal principles, rules, practices and usages which governs every aspect of its conduct;

> Reaffirming that the practice of Bris Milah takes place within the framework of the peremptory Jewish norm of the sanctity of life;
>
> Realizing that this requires the exercise of extreme caution in matters relating to or impinging upon the health and well-being of infants upon whom Bris Milah is performed;

By any stretch of the imagination, there are no "ethic-legal principles" involved in anyone who mutilates infants without consent.

"Sanctity of life" is used twice, as if the repetition will make it so. Actions speak louder than words, and leaving infants intact seems more respectful to life and human rights. The true "exercise of extreme caution" would forbid mutilating an infant and then risking further injury by mouth-to-penis infection.

Under "Bris Facts" these circumcisers link to articles attempting to answer the question "Bris Milah, Beautiful or Barbaric?" using ancient religious teachings such as this:

> Personal Commitment
> The secret to Jewish continuity lies in the Brit Milah, which strengthens one's personal commitment to God. Once this is achieved, the communal commitment will emerge on its own.

"Barbarism" is also ancient as "Brit Milah," and "personal commitment" refers to the person getting circumcised WHO IS NOT COMMITTED TO ANY RELIGION, AND CERTAINLY NOT TO PERMANENT, PAINFUL AND RISKY GENITAL SURGERY.

Since Rabbi Cohn has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Rabbi Cohn's contact info follows:

Boro Park, Brooklyn, NY
718-871-8888

> Rabbi A. "Romi" Cohn of NYC, New York "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/SysudxSZTB #nocirc #intactivism #MGM pic.twitter.com/lCbxzCUbz2
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 4, 2016

Jealousy and Toxic Femininity

Tim Patten · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We men are the most remarkable and resourceful beings on Earth. Civilization depends on us. Indeed, consider what we have accomplished: We've harnessed fire and electricity; built the Seven Wonders of the World, and even explored the depths of the oceans and nether reaches of our universe. Our world–from plants to animals to humans–is critically dependent on our ability to hydrate, nourish and energize all manner of living things. Increasingly, precious resources, including fresh water, the elixir of life, are becoming harder to find. Because of this, each generation relies ever more strongly on us men, especially the youngest among us, as defenders of our future.

When we are born, we inherit the DNA of ancient man's accomplishments. Over time, our inner strengths and inherent cultural virtues must be allowed to develop and mature, so that everyone can enjoy extraordinary lives of freedom, love and success. However, this evolution is often stopped dead in its tracks. One reason is that many of us are no closer to understanding the depths of a woman's heart, nor the complexity of the female mind, than our fathers, and their fathers, were.

In truth, our biological imperative is repeatedly hijacked or misdirected because of female jealousy and toxic femininity. Often, this happens remarkably quickly, at a time when our fellow humans need us more than ever to help them realize their full potential. Most often, it is because we fall prey to love and instinctual desires that lead us down the path to failed dreams and lost visions.

Young Men and Dating

Imagine you are a 17-year old high school senior who has just retired a dusty old chemistry set to focus on the chemistry of women, instead. You might enjoy joking and messing around with guy friends while looking at magazines–Playboy or Sports Illustrated, perhaps. You visit beaches or parks and glimpse at girls in modest attire. You dream about naked women, masturbate and search online for porn. Like millions of men, you're completely normal, looking forward to savoring the delights and attractions of women and their flesh.

After a while, you meet a girl. You are anxious to act on the powerful urges that have been welling inside of you. Her beauty spins your "love dial" higher. The most potent drug in the universe is coursing through your veins; you are in a state of blissful paradise. After months of flirting and intense courtship, you're going steady and have become part of an exclusive "item." She is a hypnotic mystery, one you can't take your eyes off. She makes you feel like someone with extraordinary powers. Your balls swell, and friends see you as "The Man," the one with the smashing beauty. You are flying higher than you ever have before. It's the most fantastic experience of all–love, and you don't want it to stop.

Jealousy Enters the Relationship

Then, all of sudden, things change–like the day when you almost set fire to your bedroom with that chemistry set. She hits you and yells, "Why are you looking at other women?" and "Respect me!" She releases a list of demands: "You can't talk to other girls–delete them from your digital devices and social media profiles." She becomes increasingly suspicious, even going so far as to monitor your car mileage. She micromanages every aspect of your life and demands to know who you've been speaking with and seeing throughout the day. She questions the time you spend with family and friends or on hobbies or anything else she is not a part of. She becomes extremely emotional and cries regularly.

Your heart drops to the ground. "What the hell happened?" you wonder. Your first instinct is to kowtow and beg for forgiveness. You feel like a jerk and begin to regret not sticking with the single-guy routine of simply jerking off. You've seen other girls get mad at their boyfriends, but you assumed they deserved what they got. You haven't done anything wrong, or have you?

Sadly, like millions of other young men, you have been preyed upon by female jealousy and suspicion, toxic femininity. Unless you can escape, endless drama and repeated confrontations will take center stage in your once-loving relationship. You are at a crossroads. If you make the wrong move, it may well destroy every hope and dream that you ever had.

The fact is, you need to prepare. You need to learn about the opposite sex and the nature of women, including the jealousy that comes with dating them. You need to learn all of this–fast!

The Origin of Feminine Jealousy

Jealousy reflects insecurity, fear, anger and intense anxiety over an anticipated loss of human connection. Each of us experiences it; however, not all of us wield it like a weapon that can manipulate and destroy others. This is, in fact, what women do, earning them the hallowed "Golden Asshole Award" for cruelty and recklessness.

Females have been conditioned by social constructs since time immemorial to believe that they must be thin, beautiful and accommodating, and must strike a nearly impossible balance between being virginal and fuckable, to ensnare and keep men. These primitive behaviors were necessary because women depended on men for survival, protection, and food. If females could not maintain their grip, they would starve.

Eventually, they evolved feelings of jealousy that alerted them when meal tickets might be lured away. They would then be driven by an animal-like vengeance to fight for what was theirs, breeding a unique kind of violence. If the battle was lost, they were left vulnerable, exposed to an array of threats.

Like much of the instinctual behavior we inherited from our Neanderthal ancestors, jealousy was useful before we progressed into modern societies. In a civilized world, those living in huge metropolises need to get along. This antiquated emotion is no longer desirable; at the very least, it needs to be better managed. We live in a world of gender equality, where the survival mechanisms of the ancients are no longer beneficial. Instead, they are seriously damaging.

Sadly, many of the women's movements that have arisen over the past century have failed to address this destructive and obsolete legacy of our primitive past. Toxic jealousy remains in the frontal lobes of many women, spurring them to intimidate, damage and oppress their men, often without realizing it. In reaction to this, men will suppress the brain's learning centers in favor of survival responses, even if it is only to cope with the drama of a jealous girlfriend. This tragic situation inevitably leads to hopelessness. It is truly a tragedy that such a negative force has held back so many of us, especially those who are young, from achieving our deserved ambitions.

Today's Relationship Realities

All of us must come to grips with today's relationship realities, most of which are not adequately addressed or discussed. Contrary to popular opinion, women are often more aggressive, dominant and controlling than men. This puts undue stress on us; we face the dizzying conundrum of how to manage interactions that are ostensibly loving but painfully oppressive. Often, we suffer our lover's violent rages because they falsely suspect us of infidelity or of coveting other women. Based on gut feelings alone, women will often lash out and destroy property. They will create lies. They will poison our relationships with friends and, in some cases, completely ruin our lives. Sadly, society and most men simply laugh this off. It's a gesture that reflects outdated perspectives of a time when only men did the fighting.

But the fallout from feminine jealousy is not just a tragedy; it's also a waste. When we could be doing something positive for the future of a relationship, we are undermined and trampled on, instead. We are held back even as we struggle to prove the depth and strength of our "true love." If women don't trust us, they will pester, nag and question us. Passionate discussions invariably turn into heated arguments.

Such outcomes are the catalyst for many incidents of domestic violence. However, no matter who might initiate the bickering that leads to pushing or hitting, men are usually singled out as the women-beaters—and are often jailed for it. There are entrenched social and law enforcement biases that assume males are at fault when, in reality, women's jealousy and aggression facilitates millions of violent acts every year. Disturbingly, this behavior is also responsible for the murder of over 1,200 Americans annually.

Managing Jealousy

It can't be said enough: jealousy has outlived its usefulness. Most of us will carry on into our eighties, and we will have several lovers; life is too short to be constantly hit with this negative, destructive emotion. But it can be managed if we, both men and women, face it head on, overcoming the feelings that stir inside of us. Unfortunately, people who have not mastered their jealousies are not fit for dating. But that doesn't mean that they or any of us who are caught in their grip can't move forward. Whether we engage in introspection or learn from others, it is possible to emancipate ourselves. Articles like "How to Break Free," "Five Techniques to Break from Jealousy," or "Overcome Jealousy and Be Happy" can show us how.

Young Men's Education

Gloria Steinem once told her millions of loyal female minions, "The surest way to be alone is to be married." In reality, Ms. Steinem should have said that this message was for us men as well. Perhaps she should have added, "Monogamy and marriage are not only lonely but they're an emotional hell for many men." For no small number of us, the phrase, "till death do us part," might be our blessed relief.

Where can we learn about female nature, marriage, and divorce? Sadly, the educational system and the mainstream media are not reliable sources, but–and this is the good news–there are alternatives! Thousands of men are pouring their hearts and souls into online videos, spilling their guts and sharing their experiences for one and all. If we search for "MGTOW" on YouTube, we can find a connection or a compatriot, or perhaps someone to mentor us. Among those worth listening to are Sandman, Barbarossa, Thinking Ape, Turd Flinging Monkey, CS MGTOW, Jay De Black and many others. There is someone out there for all of us, regardless of our age or background.

These and other efforts can help to facilitate our awareness of the misguided and emotionally harmful ways that women interact with men. Without this knowledge, many of us can easily find ourselves confused, manipulated and trapped by sex and love.
Choose your Destiny

There's little doubt that toxic femininity's tentacles of jealousy can suffocate dreams and desires. Being free from these envious constraints allows us to choose a far more liberating and enlightened future. Some of us may well be destined for fatherhood, raising America's future leaders alongside a quality partner. But others might decide that they would rather seek a cure for Alzheimer's disease, colonize Mars, or mine space minerals on an asteroid. Grab hold of the emotional levers and dials and put every ounce of passion into achieving your true, and incredibly awesome, potential.

*****

[i] http://blogs.discovermagazine.com/80beats/2011/03/15/scientist-smackdown-when-did-europeans-first-harness-fire/#.Vsu6HuaAnfc

[ii] http://www.universetoday.com/82402/who-discovered-electricity/

[iii] http://world.new7wonders.com/?n7w-page=new7wonders-of-the-world

[iv] http://www.globalchange.umich.edu/globalchange2/current/lectures/freshwater_supply/freshwater.html

Feedom Alternative Interviews Hannah Wallen of the Honey Badger Brigade

AVfM Video Source · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Hannah Wallen is an amazing force for men's rights, a staunch supporter of AVFM in addition to her excellent work with the Honey Badger Brigade.

Hannah has appeared on the radar under a pseudonym at first on Breaking the Glasses blog –http://breakingtheglasses.blogspot.com/. Her YouTube channel is here.

Please support Valsan Lucian's YouTube channel Freedom Alternative.

Some C*ntsplaining from “The Establishment”

AVfM Video Source · 4 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Read all about it!

“Men’s Rights Activists Hijacked The Circumcision Debate”

“The extremist intactivist movement is full of anti-feminist hate.”

Get your copy here.

Brontë Schmit — feminist friend or foe?

David King · 5 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, Brontë Schmit posted a piece on the Daily Orange decrying the "complacency" of millennial college students for failing to stand up to that dreadful monster, Milo Yiannopoulos, and the consequential sustenance of his loathsome anti-feminist tour of the US.

Or did she pull the wool over everybody's eyes? Might Ms Schmit, in fact, be every bit as anti-feminist as Milo? I felt inspired to speculate in a comment posted there, which I reproduce here.

So, let me see if I get this ~~straight~~ correctly:

Milo has no journalistic credibility whatsoever despite writing for the moderately high-profile, alternative news outlet Breitbart London and, against all the odds (being a gay man), managing to become rather popular amongst its conservative audience.

He clearly suffers from a bad case of internalised homophobia and worse, he's not very good at it given that he persistently cherishes and celebrates his sexuality, wearing 'gay' like a badge of honour. How ungrateful he is, not to acknowledge that his ability to prosper in 21st Century Western culture was made possible only by his feminist and LGBT would-be comrades and how grievous that he misunderstands their selfless struggles. Sharper than a serpent's tooth is the ingratitude of an ungrateful gay who doesn't know his place.

He is such a monster, in fact, that he frightens intelligent, young adults so badly that they need a safe space by reason of exposure to challenging (not to say alien and unnatural) ideas in a university setting, so much so that they are far too intimidated to actually confront his hate which overflows inward and outward. One presumes he must have laser eyes, or can, quite literally, physically cut them down with but a word. If so, then I quite sympathise with these hapless scholars.

Meanwhile, Milo's been going around challenging political correctness — calling it out for the catastrophic damage to freedom of speech Brontë agrees it does and which, according to Brontë, is solely responsible for socially conscious millennials' silence and failure to challenge said hate — and the source of political correctness, feminism.

Is that about it?

Oh, dear. Brontë, try walking a mile in Milo's oh-so fashionable shoes: you might just find that it's a great deal harder to say unpopular things than you think because in the deafening silence created by PC culture, there are always those who, in the background, seek to sabotage and tear down that soapbox which you covet so.

What has university come to, when unpopular, counter-orthodox ideas are considered so "frigtening" and dangerous that they must be shut down at all costs? As others have pointed out [in the comments section there], there are no safe spaces in the workforce and I really don't know how these students will survive even a PhD viva, much less outside the bubble-wrapped college cloisters.

What's striking about Brontë's excuse for "journalism" is the stark lack of introspection, either into the origins of PC culture, who its greatest proponents are or that her views are not so much minority as establishment (in universities, anyway). Equally striking is her clarion call for opposition to both Milo and PCness, without apparent irony.

As for misunderstanding feminism: a thing may be defined by words, but it is rather better defined by what it does — in which case, Milo (and the 60–80% of American women who reject feminism) haven't misunderstood a thing. And as for "immoralistic" (good grief), evidently the shoe is on the other foot for feminists' reaction to dispensation of moral standards of dress was directly the incarnation of "slut walks". Apparently they can dish it (morality), but can't take it.

Or perhaps I really have misunderstood Brontë: perhaps she's as much anti-feminist as Milo and this is really a piece of grand satire, designed precisely to prove Milo's thesis. If so, then that may explain the incoherent and self-contradictory thinking along with the liberal linking to pieces that, with a critical eye, may just support Milo's perspective.

Brava, Brontë, brava! You've certainly outfoxed us all.

On the other hand, sometimes a cigar is just a cigar.

SJW fascist attacks Lauren Southern with urine

AVfM Video Source · 5 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists. All feminists, are pigs. PE

A Classic: Warren Farrell on the Oprah Winfrey show

AVfM Video Source · 5 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“If we want men to express their emotions, then you ask the question and create the answers, and make an accusation like; you should go to counselling before you get an answer. That’s the type of person, who themselves need counselling.”

Warren Farrell

To support Dr Warren Farrell, please subscribe to his YouTube channel.

Down with the new Ghostbusters movie!

Paul Elam · 6 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

There is a new Ghostbusters movie coming out. Normally that would be good news, but in this case, I am hesitant to even use the name Ghostbusters in association with this feminist piece of crap.

To begin with, don't look for Bill Murray, Dan Akroyd or Harold Ramis anywhere near this big wad of celluloid fail. Instead, there are three women taking the lead roles. That's right, you heard me. WOMEN. And no, I don't mean women who are Sigourney Weaver hot. Far from it.

That is it. Mad Max was bad enough (oh, how they fawned over that bit of feminist agitprop at the Oscars). I am calling for a men's rights activist boycott. We will ruin this movie. We will destroy the careers of all those "actresses," and we will make Sony Pictures lose millions of dollars. Millions I tell you!

Oh, wait. I'm sorry. I was confused for a moment. I thought this was Return of Kings. Feel free to copy the first three paragraphs of this article and paste it into the comments over there when they get around to saying something stupid about this movie. For those interested, here is the trailer. Please note the down votes.

Sure enough, the claim of misogyny being at the root of the poor reaction is already being peddled by some low rent pundits, to wit:

I read through about a hundred of the comments. Most of the negative reactions were because the movie looks dumb, top heavy with CGI and too much of a departure from the franchise standard. That departure probably includes a predominately female cast, which feminists will undoubtedly attribute to misogyny, but there is no shortage of women in the comments panning the trailer.

So here we go with quite possibly the next big event in feminist activism, with actresses now being the targets of roving, misogynistic movie trailer down voters. If we are lucky, and if anyone at Return of Kings knows when to shut up, we won't see that followed up with a half dozen mainstream articles pointing back to AVFM and the MHRM as the widely known secret source of all the terror.

I'd like to tell you I am waiting for the movie to come out before I pass judgment. I'm not. The preview promised an inane, let's call it ditzy two hours that I might be persuaded to watch at 3:00 AM when plagued with insomnia and desperate for something to encourage sleep. And only then if I did not have to pay for it.

I don't care how people interpret that. I have been called a misogynist for far less.

On the other hand, I am waiting patiently for the new Mad Max to come to Netflix or Amazon. From what I have heard, I will probably like it even though there's a, you know, woman in a lead role.

Evolutionary analysis devalues men relative to women

Douglas Galbi · 6 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Misunderstanding of anisogamy and anti-men bigotry in evolutionary psychology support the devaluation of men's lives relative to women's lives. The psychology of devaluing men's lives doesn't depend on failures in modern evolutionary thought. The medieval evolutionary analysis also devalued men.

Consider a widely disseminated medieval story of a king and his wife. They discovered under the wall of their castle two snakes, one female and one male. The king interrogated his wise men about the significance of those snakes. The wise men declared that if the male snake were killed, a man would die. If the female snake were killed, a woman would die. The king then displayed his false consciousness about men's subordinate class status:

> "If this is so," said the king, "kill the male snake, and let the female snake live. A man ought to be more willing to die himself than to permit the death of his wife." He gave the reason for this: "If my wife lives, she may bring forth many sons who may succeed to my throne. But if she should die, the kingdom would lack an heir."

That's faulty reasoning. If the king died, a new ruler would be promptly selected. That wouldn't necessarily be the king's widow. If another man were named king, children that the king's widow had with another man probably wouldn't have a good claim to the throne. If on the other hand, the king's wife died, the king could just remarry. Sons that the king had with another wife would be heirs to the throne. The king's decision and reason reflect the rule and rationalization of gynocentrism.

From reporting on the Costa Concordia's sinking to the United Nations' biased index of gender equality in expected lifespans, men's lives are devalued relative to women's lives. Efforts over the past four decades to promote gender equality have largely promoted lies and anti-men gender bigotry. Let's get serious about valuing equally women's and men's lives.

*** * * * ***

Notes:

The above quote is from Gesta Romanorum, Tale 92, from Latin trans. Swan & Hooper (1876) p. 165. The tale's application explains:

> My beloved, the King is Christ, and the wife, our human nature, for which He gave himself to death.

That application summarizes one-half of Ephesians 5:22-9.

[image] Intertwined snakes medical symbol, cropped. Thanks to Pixabay for Public Domain image.

Reference:

Swan, Charles, and Wynnard Hooper, trans. 1876. Gesta romanorum: entertaining moral stories. New York: Dover Publications Inc. (reprint edition of 1969).

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Pro-Choice Anti-Feminist

Dennis Michaels · 7 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

I was planning something else for my next AVFM article, but then I stumbled upon this article retweeted by Paul Elam. Cliffs Notes: A woman uses drugs during pregnancy, gives birth to a drug-addicted baby. Prosecutor decides that something must be done about this atrocity and responds by charging the father. Even for someone who has heard of gynocentrism before this story seems unbelievable. That is until I found the court documents. So I decided to complete an article I had on the back burner for a while.

Contrary to the fiction circulated by feminists, not all MRAs are vehemently opposed to abortion. Pardon me for being so jaded, but I think most MRAs would be just fine with feminists reproducing as little as possible. The one thing MRAs do have in common on this topic is the demand for equal reproductive rights in the form of legal paternal surrender.

Until I stumbled upon the MHRM, I felt I was the only person in the world who is strongly pro-choice but doesn't see it as women's rights issue. In fact, I think framing abortion as woman's right to choose is counterproductive and rather disingenuous.

If abortion is nothing more than a manifestation of a woman's right to choose what happens inside her body, then consider the following thought experiment. New technology is developed, an artificial womb. Where a woman previously could perform an abortion, instead the fetus would be transferred to the artificial womb and carried to term there. Upon completing the gestation period, the 'newborn' baby is delivered to the overjoyed father, while the mother is saddled with the financial responsibility for the child she didn't want. Would feminists find this an acceptable compromise? Well, at the current rate of technological progress we won't have to wait long to call their bluff.

Reality check – abortions do not spontaneously happen in happy, healthy families that are looking forward to the child and are well capable of providing the child with a happy and fulfilling life[i]. I subscribe to the theory – apparently rejected by most feminists – that rights and responsibilities are two sides of the same coin. I believe that anyone who brings a child into this world has an obligation to provide for that child. Abortion is the flipside of that responsibility. When parents can provide for the child little more than a life of perpetual misery and abuse, abortion does seem like the lesser of two evils.

Abortion is not the woman's right to choose what happens to her body for nine months. It is the woman's right to choose what happens for many years after that; the right currently denied to men. And when I say it is denied to men, I don't just mean after the fact of pregnancy. Even reproductive coercion against men is not a defense against responsibility for the unwanted child.

While feminists are harping on about reproductive coercion against women, the Center for Disease Control reports that it is perpetrated more often against men. I don't know why this profound observation even required a study. It is not difficult to figure out that supply of men eager to sign up for 18 years of financial slavery is much smaller than demand. The law offers no protection for the men. In Canada, a man can be convicted of sexual assault for using a sabotaged condom with the intention of impregnating his wife. I am yet to hear of a single woman convicted of sexual assault for lying that she is taking oral contraceptives.

Even abstaining from coitus altogether will not protect a man from the responsibilities of fatherhood. In the UK, a woman can forge paperwork to fraudulently obtain a man's deposit from the sperm bank and perform IVF. Not only is she not prosecuted for fraud, but she also gets to collect child support payments from her victim. In a similar story, it turns out the famed tennis player Boris Becker is not only a great athlete himself. Apparently, his sperm is so potent he can impregnate a woman through a blowjob.

Meanwhile, framing abortion as women's rights issue is a major obstacle to the recognition of fetal rights. Some recognition of fetal rights is not inherently contradictory to abortion rights. In many jurisdictions, unborn children can be named as inheritors on a will or beneficiaries of the insurance policy. The fetus does not have the right to a mother that cares about the child's health. Feminist organizations routinely oppose any recognition of fetal rights on the ground that it will be used to undermine Roe v. Wade. American Civil Liberties Union is not far behind in denying civil liberties of an unborn child.

In Canada or UK, a child has no right to redress prenatal injuries caused by an irresponsible mother. I reiterate, I do not view such rights as contradictory to abortion. On the contrary, I see the mother as responsible for the damages she causes to the child she chooses to have, and abortion is what gives her a choice.

Fetal rights and men's rights are locked in a zero-sum game against the feminist lobby. For as long as abortion is seen as a women's issue there will be no recognition of male reproductive rights or fetal rights. This conflict can be resolved by viewing parenthood not as a right, but as a responsibility that should not be taken lightly and abortion rights as the flipside of that responsibility. This concept is not far-fetched, seeing how fatherhood is already regarded as a responsibility that comes with a heavy burden. Now we just need feminists to see motherhood the same way. That should be easy; they are big proponents of gender equality, right?

Bibliography:

Black, M. B. (2010). The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS). Atlanta, GA: National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

CP v. CICA, C3/2014/0775 (Royal Courts of Justice, Strand, London December 04, 2014).

Fernandez, C. (2011, May 30). 'Father' ordered to pay £100k for children he never knew he had after ex-wife tricked IVF clinic into using his frozen sperm. Retrieved March 02, 2016, from The Daily Mail: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1392045/Man-ordered-pay-100-000-children-ex-wife-tricks-clinic-using-frozen-sperm.html

Punishing Women for Their Behaviour During Pregnancy. (2000, September). Retrieved March 03, 2016, from Center for Reproductive Rights:http://www.reproductiverights.org/sites/default/files/documents/pub_bp_punishingwomen.pdf

R. v. Hutchinson, [2014] 1 SCR 346, 2014 SCC 19 (CanLII).

The Accidental Dads. (2008, May 9). Retrieved March 02, 2016, fromhttp://blogs.theage.com.au/lifestyle/whosyourdaddy/archives/2008/05/the_accidental.html

What's Wrong with Fetal Rights. (n.d.). Retrieved March 02, 2016, from American Civil Liberties Union: https://www.aclu.org/whats-wrong-fetal-rights

Wintermans, C. D. (2005, November 25). The Issue of Fetal Rights in Canada. Retrieved March 02, 2016, from Canadian Children's Rights Council:http://canadiancrc.com/newspaper_articles/Issue_Fetal_Rights_Canada_Wintermans_25NOV05.aspx

[i] On second thought, spontaneous abortion is another term for miscarriage, but you damn well know this is not what I was talking about.

Mike Buchanan debates MGM with a Jewish proponent on BBC radio

Mike Buchanan · 7 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Jonathan Vernon-Smith is a highly-regarded presenter on my local BBC radio station, BBC 3 Counties Radio, based in Dunstable.

Milah UK is an organization set up to promote and protect the right of the Jewish community to mutilate the genitals of male babies, in accordance with religious tradition. In July 2015, I had an exchange of letters with the two Co-Chairmen of Milah UK, one of whom is Dr Simon Hochhauser. Details here.

Two days ago I had a 20-minute-long discussion with Dr Hochhauser on Jonathan Vernon-Smith's show, here. Before the discussion, the station played some extracts from a video recorded during an anti-MGM protest in Parliament Square last International Men's Day, when we supported Men Do Complain.

The second 20-minute-long section of the audio file consists of Jonathan engaging with callers, a large proportion of whom were Jewish men and women.

Incredibly, Dr Hochhauser maintained that MGM is legal in the UK. The proof that it's illegal is contained in a presentation given by James Chegwidden, a barrister, in 2013. Our notes of the presentation are here. The first bullet point is, 'The default position of the criminal law is that circumcision is a crime, and it requires a parliamentary override to stop it being a crime'. No such parliamentary override exists.

Implausibly, Dr Hochhauser claimed to be unaware that the purpose of MGM is to reduce the sexual pleasure experienced by adult males. We frequently recommend people read William Collins's article on MGM. He cites what Moses Maimonides, a leading Jewish intellectual and physician, wrote in 1135:

> With regard to circumcision, one of the reasons for it is, in my opinion, the wish to bring about a decrease in sexual intercourse and a weakening of the organ in question, so that this activity be diminished and the organ be in as quiet a state as possible. It has been thought that circumcision perfects what is defective congenitally…
>
> How can natural things be defective so that they need to be perfected from the outside, all the more because we know how useful the foreskin is to that member? In fact this commandment has not been prescribed with a view to perfecting what is defective congenitally, but to perfecting what is defective morally.
>
> The bodily pain caused to that member is the real purpose of circumcision. None of the activities necessary for the preservation of the individual is harmed thereby, nor is procreation rendered impossible, but violent concupiscence and lust that goes beyond what is needed are diminished.
>
> The fact that circumcision weakens the faculty of sexual excitement and sometimes perhaps diminishes the pleasure is indubitable. For if at birth this member has been made to bleed and has had its covering taken away from it, it must indubitably be weakened. In my opinion, this is the strongest of the reasons for circumcision.
>
> Jewish men, sexually subdued and readily controlled by their wives, don't stray into mischief. The power of his member has been diminished so that he has no strength to lie with many lewd women.

I made the point in the discussion that men who'd been circumcised as young as eight days old, in line with Jewish tradition, could not know what they'd lost in the area of sexual pleasure. To understand what men have lost, we need to turn to those who've been circumcised as adults. In our YouTube library, we have a video interview with a man who was circumcised at 18.

When people ask for materials outlining why MGM should be made specifically illegal, in line with FGM, we often refer them in the first instance to two videos. The first is titled, Child Circumcision: An Elephant in the Hospital, the second is a presentation by Tim Hammond, an American researcher, The Global Survey of Circumcision Harm. Tim will be giving a presentation at the second International Conference on Men's Issues, in London, July 8-10, 2016.

This wasn't my first appearance on Jonathan Vernon-Smith's show. My previous appearance was in June 2013, discussing the topic of women in the workplace. The audio file is here. Caroline Criado-Perez called into the show, claiming she knew of longitudinal studies showing a causal link between increasing female representation on corporate boards and enhanced financial performance, and duly won the first of her three Lying Feminist of the Month awards.

The Feminist Problem

AVfM Video Source · 7 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Non-Feminists are not a minority.

Please support MensRights Edmonton

My journey to recovery after rape

Mark Charles (Mr. C) · 8 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I am not the only man who has been raped. There are countless thousands of us. Fear, guilt and shame prevent us from disclosing our experiences.

I do not seek to change this nor do I want to change the world. By providing this account I seek only to offer hope to others.

I was a not a child when I was raped. I was in my early twenties and had no idea that such things happen to men. This story is a common one, and it begins in a dingy nightclub.

The club was a dive. The floor was sticky with spilled beer. The smell of sweat and dry ice permeated the air. I was out celebrating the birthday of an acquaintance when it happened. I don`t pretend that my actions had no influence on the events that followed. We had been out drinking for a considerable time, and I could only be described as being a little worse for wear. Following a huge fight with my then girlfriend, I had gone out with the sole intention of drinking heavily and was happily engaged in this endeavour when another barfly struck up a conversation with me. All too soon my glass was empty and how grateful I was when he offered to refill it.

My drink tasted slightly strange. With hindsight, I blame myself for accepting it but at the time all I could think was that the establishment must have been watering down their beer. This was, after all, a dive. But a free beer was still a free beer. Until I had finished my drink, this had been an entirely normal interaction.

Suddenly I felt a hand on my thigh. This stranger was trying to kiss me. He pushed his tongue into my mouth as his fingers reached for my groin. I pushed him away and explained that I was flattered, but that I was not gay. His response was to say that he was straight; however he attempted to kiss me several more times over the following minutes. My head was swimming as he put his hands down my trousers. I pushed him off me, stated again that I was not interested and walked back to the group of friends with whom I had arrived.

The room was spinning as I rejoined my friends on the dancefloor. I felt a disconnect with my surroundings. I had gone out trying to get drunk but this was something else. It was difficult to think. Colours started slowly blurring into each other. My speech was so incomprehensibly slurred that conversation was beyond me. Even standing upright required concentration. All in all, I felt that I must be having a good time.

Eventually, I went to use the facilities. As I stumbled into the toilet, I felt hands on my shoulders, pushing me into the sole cubical. When I saw that it was the same guy from earlier I was struck still with dread. He pushed me up against the tiled wall and pawed at my penis, but I was able to knock his hand away. Again, I slurred the word “No”.

I felt as though I had lost control of myself. It was as though I was given an anaesthetic. My head was swimming, and my body felt numb. I was frozen with terror. I couldn`t think clearly; it was as though I was watching it happen to someone else. All it took was a little pressure, and I had collapsed onto the floor. He held my head as he forced his penis into my mouth.

The most shameful thing was that the only thought that entered my head was that if I could manage to make him cum that he wouldn’t anally rape me. I couldn’t. He pulled me to my feet and pushed me up against the cubical wall, crushing my face into the tiles as he pulled my trousers down.

I wish I could say that I’d fought, back but I was frozen. I was unable to think, let alone act. The drink and the drugs had flooded my system, and my consciousness was reduced to little more than emotion, with no real cognitive facility. I was aware of what was happening to my body but I can`t say that I felt it. There was a knock on the toilet door. He thrust at me harder, trying to climax. There was a louder, more forceful knock, this time accompanied by a voice I thought I recognised.

“Guys, I don`t care if you’re doing coke in there, I really need the f*cking loo.”

He was off me in a flash. Suddenly the door was open and he had run out of the toilet. I had collapsed onto the floor, my jeans pulled down to my knees and I stank of fear and guilt and shame. I saw a face that I knew. A friend of the friend whose birthday we had been celebrating. His face showed nothing but concern. He helped me to my feet. I pulled my trousers up. He asked if I was ok, but I couldn't answer. I stumbled to the sink and retched. I washed the sweat from my face and stumbled back to my group of friends. I don't recall much of the rest of the evening. I have no recollection of how I got home at all.

The physical sensation afterwards was more than intense. I felt as though there were insects crawling around under my skin. This lasted a couple of days. I felt complete disgust at myself, my body, my being. I felt weak. I felt less than a man. I felt less than human.

For the next few days, I felt numb. I could not believe that I of all people could, or would, be sexually assaulted, let alone raped. My family had raised me to respect women. I was aware that rape existed, but I had never thought that it could happen to men before it happened to me. I questioned my sexuality. Did I do something to lead him on? Did I want to have sex with another man? I felt that I was to blame for what had happened.

If only I had been stronger, if only I had fought him off; if only I hadn`t accepted a drink from him. There seemed to be so many things that I could have done differently. In the cold light of sobriety I could, and most likely would have acted very differently that night.

I did not understand what was happening to me. It felt disgusting to inhabit my body. The person that I had been before the rape was dead. The things that I derived joy from seemed to mean nothing to me anymore. I was experiencing pain on a molecular level. Everything that I was, everything I had believed about myself had been destroyed. I was not strong. I was not capable. I was not able to protect myself.

Overnight, the world had very quickly become a very scary place. Every social interaction suddenly seemed like a threat.

I was desperate to understand what had happened and how I should be dealing with it. I sought help from every institution I could think of, but this only compounded the problem. I had always understood that the definition of rape is someone forcing someone else to have sex with them against their will. No matter how much I tried, I couldn`t frame my experience in any way that did not fall into that definition.

Consequently, I went reported what I believed to be a crime to the police. I asked to speak to a specialist rape officer. I was shown to a room where I recounted my experience to two female officers.

Their response astonished me. I cannot stress enough that my experience happened a long time ago and that there have been numerous initiatives by the police since that time to deal with victims of sexual crimes differently. At that time, however, I was informed by the police that it was not a crime to rape a man. The law then stated that rape was a crime that men commit against women.

I am given to believe that the law in the UK at least, is now taken to mean the penetration of a mouth, vagina or anus without consent. At the time that I reported my experience, however, I was instructed by the police that if I should request to formally report this as a crime that I would be prosecuted for wasting police time as no illegal action had taken place. They informed me that I should consider myself lucky as the law had previously stated that sodomy was illegal, and I would have been prosecuted as I had given what they felt to be a confession.

I felt betrayed. I had bought into the idea that as a citizen there were certain behaviours expected of me, and certain protections that society offered. I thought that I had a right to life, a right to a family life, and a right to not fear persecution or assault. It would seem that I did not have a right to those things after all. My safety was a matter for me and me alone. I didn`t understand what was happening to me. I was desperate to feel something else. A matter of weeks previously I had been enjoying my existence. Now, though, every waking moment hurt.

I thought that as a rape victim I should be able to seek support from a rape crisis centre. As soon as I walked through the door I was approached by a very well-meaning woman who stated that it was a safe space for women only and as such I couldn`t be there. My presence as a male would be intimidating for the rape victims who were there for support. I asked to speak to a support officer, in a private room if necessary. The answer was no.

I quickly explained my situation and stated that I was not there to cause distress to anyone; that I just needed help. She told me that some of the women at the centre believed that all men (one assumes that included me) are rapists and as such my continued presence would be highly upsetting for their clientele. The lady very politely informed me that she would call the police if I refused to leave.

As I walked away, my mind was reeling. Not only was I unable to protect myself from assault, not only did this not count as a crime but now I was the guilty party by virtue of my sex. I felt as though I was not a part of society, but just a commodity. I was something to be used and abused, by anyone at any time. I did not have the protection of the law. I was outside of civilised society despite living within it. I felt as though I had no value as a human being.

. . .

When I was initially raped, more than a decade ago now, my world collapsed. The one thing that I was desperate for was to talk to someone or to read something that confirmed that someone else had experienced what I had experienced and had recovered from it. Before the rape, I had always been in control of myself. Afterwards, I was ruled by emotions I didn`t understand. I wanted desperately to know how other guys had dealt with these issues. I wanted to know how I should handle it, what I needed to do to feel normal again.

I don’t know what it’s like to be raped if you’re a woman. But I do know that there exists a range of helplines, books, survivors groups, charitable organisations and shelters to assist and support you, as there should rightly be.

If you’re a man, there is not that support. There are few books. In most areas there are no groups, no shelters, no government sponsored initiatives. I had to work through it on my own. After the initial rape, I wanted something, anything, that would reassure me that I was not alone in this, that it did not mean that I was less of a man, that life does, in fact, get better. Ideally, I wanted someone to explain, either in person or print, how they had gotten over it.

I decided that to more speedily facilitate my recovery that I should write the thing that I had wanted to read. If I simply outlined to myself which understandings helped and which thought processes didn`t, then hopefully I would stop punishing myself for someone else’s actions.

If these musings ever help another human being then so much the better.

Source: The above is an excerpt from the Kindle eBook Unspoken: One man`s journey to recovery after rape, by Mark Charles, which documents his road to emotional recovery after rape.

Lies men are fed

Editorial Staff · 8 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following Blog entry was posted on AVFM forums by one of its members, Maxx. It is edited and republished here with his permission. ED

Comforting lies are essential to keeping men compliant, ignorant and productive within any gynocentric system. Keeping men ignorant and productive is something that progressive (secular western) and traditionalist (Islamic middle eastern) cultures are equally invested in doing. Different cultures hold men compliant and productive by promoting different sets of lies. Detailed below are a handful of truisms that have become increasingly popular in our secular progressive western cultures in recent years. But how 'true' are they?

"Never judge a book by its cover."

External appearances, more often than not reflect internal states. A 27-year-old girl with Botox lips and fake tits in a forty thousand dollar Gucci dress stepping out of a limo while someone else holds the door open might not be a vapid, materialistic gold digger, but she probably will be. A girl with half her head shaved and the remaining half colored blue 'might' not be a secular progressive abortion-loving feminist social justice warrior, but she probably will be.

Most of the time, in fact, external appearances are valid and viable indicators of personal virtue, qualities, and states. Making snap judgments off the back of them and tailoring responses and reactions accordingly can in practice save a lot of time and energy. The occasional cases where external appearances are misleading are the exceptions rather than the norm. In no place is this truer than in the realm of physical fitness.

Roy Nelson is one of the top heavyweight mixed martial arts fighters in the world. Straight up one of the baddest men alive. Not that you could tell by looking at him, but he's the sort capable of dispatching much larger men:

Most top MMA heavyweights look like the herculean Adonis hitting the dirt, not the short fat man cleaning his clock. As we advance through life both observing and interacting with various people, we can effectively build a pretty reliable set of possible correlations that will permit us to effectively size-up and evaluate everything around us; people we interact with, are confronted by and determine how to respond most effectively to them. There might be a pro-life Christian girl who's a registered Republican and yet has a half-shaved bald, half-painted blue haircut going on, but I wouldn't bet my ass on being able to find her in a hurry.

Always judge a book by its cover. Proactively accumulate data on the people you interact with to dramatically improve your ability to draw snap judgments by observing general patterns. Do that and you can look forward to a future where you are usually right about most people and only occasionally pleasantly surprised.

"There is no 'I' in team"

This aphorism is used to promote selflessness and sacrifice in the common interest. Those that typically end up sacrificing the most are men. It is a false platitude exactly because every member of a team isn't equally useful, ever.

Are the men that bring in all the new business at a large multi-national corporation as valuable as the women in the HR and compliance departments processing trumped up sexual harassment cases and making sure everyone has their top button done up? Are all the men that bring in new business equal? Of course not; there are star performers there are grunts, and there is dead wood.

Was Zlatan Ibrahimovic, the soccer star scoring that goal in the gif to the right as valuable as the other ten members of his team were on the day he scored that goal? Are star players as valuable as the scrubs on ANY day? The more indispensable a given performer is to a team that surrounds him the less the rules that apply to the collective will apply to him. Star performers must reach out to one another and build effective alliances within wider teams. They must recognize and remain cognizant of the positive value they add as individuals and demand compensation according to their skill. They don't need to be signing up to unions which permit the weakest members of a given collective to demand and petition for a cut of whatever spoils secured as a result of the guts, determination, hard-work and or vision and creativity of a handful of star performers.

There is no 'I' in team, but there is an 'I' in 'winner'.

"Just be yourself."

Nothing will stunt a man's growth more than internalizing this toxic little mantra you'll find plastered across the social media feeds of narcissistic young women and girls everywhere.

At a basic level, it's used to evoke the idea that it's better to be yourself than to attempt to adhere to anyone else's rules or expectations. At face value, it sounds true and simple enough. But most of the time it's awful advice that has prepped an entire generation to fail and to adopt a tendency of externalizing accountability for their shortcomings when they do. The truth is everyone has an immediate natural response to a given situation or challenge.

The "natural" reaction to a punch in the face is to turtle up. At the very least it's to flinch and turn away from the strike. It's certainly not to slip and then counter. You are never going to win a fist fight "being yourself." You have to interrogate your natural response, and if it proves ineffective in yielding your desired result, you need systematically attack and overcome it proactively.

To achieve the success you must "be yourself," right? But that doesn't mean stubbornly refusing to adapt when Plan A doesn't survive the first contact with reality. If the first time someone throws a punch your way you flinch, cower and eat a punch in the mouth accordingly, try not just to do what comes naturally next time. Attempt to do something else.

What comes most 'naturally' will seldom be the most effective strategy. Most children, when confronted with adversity, cry and ask someone to remove whatever is the source of their antagonism. "Just be yourself" is the mantra of a generation conditioned to continue processing the world around them like infants, long into adulthood. From entitled feminist women bitching about man-spreading to every entitled 'nice guy' nerd complaining about the how the universe just isn't 'fair' because swimsuit models aren't lining up to see his lightsaber collection. "Just being yourself" must go hand in hand with a commitment to be ruthlessly interrogating who you are and thinking proactively about exactly who you want to be going forward.

"Never give up."

While determination in the face of adversity is commendable, it goes hand in hand with the ability to intelligently "give up" effectively and know when it's appropriate and wise. In fact, any ineffective strategy must be discarded to achieve growth and forward progress. All too often masculine vigor is channeled into dead ends by evoking this hollow mantra.

There is a time and a place for giving up entirely, just as there is a time and a place for giving up ends by evoking this hollow mantra. A masculine determination can be exploited by those evoking this platitude to keep men chained to an apple cart forever chasing a carrot on the end of a stick that's somehow forever just a whisker out of reach.

Sometimes it's good to give up. If you are hitting your head against a wall, abandon that approach. Of course you should never give up on striving for an alternative in the face of failure, but that's not the same thing as "never give up." Don't allow those who demonized giving up to stunt your growth as a man. When something isn't working, absolutely give up on it.

There are also times you need to give up on people. Life is too short for you to carry deadwood or to retain friendships and relationships with individuals who suck on your vitality, who find it easier to mock you because of the journey you are on than growing the balls to embark on their journey. Giving up on people who simply don't get it is the least of two evils. You can take horses to water and leave them to figure out how to drink on their own.

The successful man, the capable man, is a man that has given up on a thousand and one failed approaches and strategies for success and advancement. The unsuccessful man is the man that refuses to give up on an unsuccessful approach because someone once told him to "never give up," he took it the wrong way and never looked back. Being bull-headed is a double edged sword and all men must be mindful of the dual nature of this quality.

I'm reminded of some of the greatest fighters that ever laced up a pair of gloves. The rugged masculine bull-headedness that drove them to take stubbornly on and believe they could topple champions who stood tall atop piles of vanquished foes, was for them the same virtue that in their twilight years drove them to ruin. The same drive that makes a man a champion fuels him into combat, again and again, each time with significantly diminished skills against hungry young lions in search of that elusive final vindication that might only come at a long-term cost if it even comes at all.

The same quality that makes a man great can eventually leave him a carcass stripped bare by vultures and hyenas.

There is a time and a place for giving up entirely, just as there is a time and a place for giving up on one thing and attempting another with the same objective. The smart play is to know the difference.

RANT about new Ghostbuster film!!! Grrrr!

AVfM Video Source · 8 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"GAH…. just had to vent about this! Dear feminists…. IF YOU DELIVERED THE GOODS…. no one would care. Reality is, you complain about everything and deliver nothing. You are parasites on other people creativity!"

@thunderf00t

Subscribe to Thunderf00t.

Women celebrate being truly empowered on International Women's Day

AVfM Video Source · 8 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A group of Indian women have a special message for the women (and men) of the world on International Women's Day. It's inspiring!

No seriously, watch it. Then subscribe.

Top Three Lies of Feminism: Milo Yiannopoulos

AVfM Video Source · 8 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"The Internet's most fabulous supervillain, Milo Yiannopoulos takes on radical feminism with one hand tied behind his back."

Support Milo at http://yiannopoulos.net/ Original audio – http://tomwoods.com/576/

Encourage Matthew Drake to make more videos like this by subscribing to his YT channel.

The difficulty of defending military members accused of sexual misconduct

Michael Conzachi · 9 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM Contributor Michael Conzachi further enlightens us to the difficulty of defending military members accused of sexual assault.

Army Judge Advocate Major Mason S. Weiss authors a brutally honest paper on the extreme difficulty that military members have who face false allegations of sexual misconduct.

His draft paper that can be found here will most likely NOT be published in the next edition of the Army Lawyer Magazine.

In his draft, Major Weiss; an Army military justice instructor at Fort Leonard Wood Missouri, accurately depicts the frustration and extreme difficulty of defending service members against false allegations of sexual assault.

Major Weiss describes a hypothetical case of a soldier falsely accused of sexual assault, who comes to the realization that it truly is the UNITED STATES versus him. Read how there is a small army of advocates and prosecutors assigned to the alleged victim and prosecution, and virtually nothing and no one to the accused.

Since 2008, Congress; along with the sexual assault grievance industry, led by the likes of Senators Kristen Gillibrand, Claire McCaskill, and a handful of others, has chipped away; piece by piece, to virtually eliminate the constitutional protections and due process rights of service members accused of sexual misconduct. And have exponentially expanded what is considered sexual misconduct.

In addition to the expansion of definitions and the decimation of constitutional protections, post-conviction remedies are being eliminated.

In any military conviction involving sex offenses, it is a virtual certainty that clemency petitions following conviction will be denied. Plainly said; there is virtually no military commander on the planet who will risk his or her career, granting clemency in any sexual assault case, post-conviction.

A leader who grants a clemency petition will automatically result in the referral to the Judge Advocate Command and Secretary of that Branch. Many commanders display bravery on the battlefield, but just one clemency petition approved may end his or her career and draw the delusional wrath of the Gillibrand's, McCaskill's and the usual array of hysterics.

It is highly unlikely that his article draft will be published in any forum as it defies the politically correct narrative of the mythical and non-existent sexual assault epidemic in the U.S. Military.

Major Weiss should be commended for his honest commentary and his article should be read in its entirety by every member of the Senate and House Armed Services Committee, but it won't.

With the vast array of published articles on AVFM and other sites of the draconian sexual assault witch hunt mentality of the U.S. military, it is explicitly clear that the United States Military is now the most dangerous and hostile work environment for males. Never in the history of this great nation have the genders been pitted against one another as they have for the past 7+ years.

Never in the history of this great nation, the vast overwhelming majority of military leaders, commanders, and political office holders have been cowed and browbeaten into submission by the hysterics of the sexual assault grievance industry.

The blowback of the sexual assault grievance industry and the opening of combat jobs to women has already had an effect on retention and recruitment, especially in the combat arms arenas. Many military males are now refusing to be in any position with military females that would risk being falsely accused. Some females who are not of the falsely accusing type are already complaining about being unable to do their jobs, simply because males are refusing to be in the same room or situation with them alone or without protection against false accusations.

Regardless of what one's opinion is on serving in the military; many in the country see it as a noble and honorable profession, and it is.

Unless the pendulum, that has swung, almost into oblivion in the depths of lunacy and constitutional obliteration, I would not recommend military service to any male any longer.

Until political leaders such as Gillibrand, McCaskill, Ayotte and others can be voted out of office and politicians of both parties who serve on the Senate and House Armed Services Committees, realize that service members vote, and have families and friends that vote. And understand that this path is decimating the military, will they finally wake up and smell what is being shoveled.

There will most likely be some comments to this post, and as long as they follow the comments policy of AVFM, they are most welcome. I would ask that those who comment, or those who will read this post also contact their elected representatives and voice their concerns.

In the past 7+ years, the sexual assault hysteria cottage industry, the social experimentation, the soon to be forcing of women in combat roles, the radical and hostile elimination of Christian religious preferences, and the Veteran's Assistance Administration scandals are destroying the military from within.

It is hoped that there is an administration change in November if there is any hope of bringing a sense of sanity, normalcy, and fairness back into this process. Even then, it may take years to undo the damage.

It's no longer just a sexual assault witch hunt problem; it's a national security issue.

*****

References/Links

http://www.cotwa.info/2016/03/law-review-article-shows-how-difficult.html http://www.bestmilitarydefense.com/sexual-assault-defense-military-ndaa/https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8cdwVJKvuyo

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=XyXy3hLqt48

http://cmrlink.org/content/article/34498/SEX,%20LIES,%20AND%20RAPE

Law Office of Jocelyn C Stewart UCMJ court martial defense attorney

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Showcase video of the Law Office of Jocelyn C Stewart, run by former Army JAG, UCMJ court-martial attorney who specializes in defense of allegations of sexual assault for all branches of the military worldwide. This video features commentary on the military’s current campaign against what it and many in Congress and society at large view as an epidemic of sexual assault in the ranks. Three former clients provide insight into their experiences and attest to the results I achieved for them.”

The Safe Space Ploy – Fiamengo File Episode 5

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Janice Fiamengo from the University of Ottawa discusses the meaning of “Safe Spaces” on university campuses.

To keep the videos coming please support StudioBrule.

Thought Police and Political Correctness in Modern Academia | Dr. Gad Saad

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Narration by Dr. Gad Saad, Concordia University Research Chair in Evolutionary Behavioral Sciences and Darwinian Consumption.

The full lecture is available to watch at https://youtu.be/G5-oG0L6ZnU

Laura Kipness "Sexual Paranoia Strikes Academe."

Please support Matthew Drake and sign up to his YT channel.

Three basic human rights men gain from “legal abortion”

Alice Smith · 10 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Recently the youth wing of Sweden’s Liberal Party has put forward an interesting proposition: that men should be granted the right to opt out of paternity via a “legal abortion”. However extreme and peculiar some of their other stances are, I cannot help but see the good this particular act would do if it made its way through international legal systems. How this would work is that men would be permitted to opt out of parenthood fully up to the eighteenth week of pregnancy, by current Swedish physical abortion laws. The man then severs all ties to the child, as though it were dead to him. (1) Cold and cruel? Maybe, but so is the physical act of killing an unborn child. Sometimes people have no ability to raise a child and, where the opt-out is present for one sex, it is an injustice not to offer an equal option to the other. This proposal would give men and women almost equal grounds on which to decide parenthood and would open the way for men to regain three core human rights that they can be denied.

Right 1: The right to choose parenthood.

The Cairo Programme of Action states that:

> Reproductive health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity, in all matters relating to the reproductive system and its functions and processes. Reproductive health therefore implies that people are able to have a satisfying and safe sex life and that they have the capability to reproduce and the freedom to decide if, when and how often to do so. Implicit in this last condition are the right of men and women to be informed [about] and to have access to safe, effective, affordable and acceptable methods of family planning of their choice, as well as other methods for regulation of fertility which are not against the law, and the right of access to appropriate health-care services that will enable women to go safely through pregnancy and childbirth and provide couples with the best chance of having a healthy infant [para. 72]. (2) [Emphasis added.]

Here it is quite clear that it is considered a human right to choose when, if and how often we reproduce. If a couple becomes pregnant, it is the woman who can make the sole and final decision regarding whether to carry the child to term. This means that no woman can be forced to carry a child to term she does not want, but every man can potentially be forced into parenthood. At a time when women are allowed to escape unplanned parenthood, men are still forced into it under the archaic refrain: “If you don’t want a baby, don’t have sex.”

Right 2: The right to be free from slavery.

Article 4 of the Human Rights Act states that:

> 1. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
>
> 2. No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
>
> 3. For the purpose of this Article the term “forced or compulsory labour” shall not include:
>
> a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed according to the provisions of Article 5 of this Convention or during conditional release from such detention;
>
> b) any service of a military character or, in case of conscientious objectors in countries where they are recognised, service exacted instead of compulsory military service;
>
> c) any service exacted in case of an emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community;
>
> d) any work or service which forms part of normal civic obligations.” (3) [Emphasis added.]

Under this act, working to pay child support is neither work under detention, military work, emergency work or part of the normal civic obligations of any man or woman. Whereas cases where parents agree to have children and then separate, resulting in child support, are grayer, the case of unwanted children is pretty black and white. If a woman cannot afford to have a child, she and only she can choose to abort it. If a man cannot afford to have a child, he cannot choose to opt out of supporting the child financially. In some parts of the world, this results in imprisonment for child support payments he could not afford, and the demands and debt do not cease after prison. (4) This results in men working longer hours and taking up more jobs only to lose the money to a child they did not want and had no say in bringing into the world. Does a couple, or a woman, who puts a child up for adoption pay child support? Men forced into paternity are held financially liable for eighteen years, a grave impact on their choice of work, financial status and available resources.

Right 3: The right not to be forced into marriage.

Article 12.2 of the Human Rights Act states that:

> 2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses. (5)

Rights of Women describes consent as:

> Consent means you have made a free choice to get married and it is your own decision. Even if you say you agree to marry, this does not always mean you have consented. You must have the freedom to choose whether or not to enter the marriage. [Emphasis added.]

The same organisation describes force thus:

> The definition of force used by the Government includes physical, psychological, sexual, financial and emotional pressure as well as emotional and psychological abuse or harassment. Forced marriage involves situations where you feel pressured to the point where you agree, but only because you feel you did not have the choice to say no, and you would not have consented had the pressure not been placed on you. Women and girls often describe a 'feeling' or just 'knowing' that they could not say no to a marriage, and that if they did, there would be some kind of consequence if they tried to resist being married e.g. ostracisation, being told they have brought shame on the family, and even being physically harmed. [Emphasis added.]

It is not difficult to see the parallel between these descriptions and the implications for a man with a pregnant partner. Due to the social and financial pressures resulting from the lack as mentioned above of a right to determine paternity and of a right to work for oneself, many men feel compelled to marry a pregnant partner. Some women even use pregnancy as a tactic to lock down a partner who would otherwise not be interested in her anymore. Through financial and social coercion, men are placed in a position where the most reasonable thing they can do, faced with pregnancy, is marry the woman, regardless of their interests and life goals.

If a global law were enacted that enabled men to terminate their parental status within the time frame women are granted for abortion, these essential human rights would be given to men once more.

*****

Notes:

(1) https://www.rt.com/news/334720-legal-male-abortion-sweden/

(2) Rebecca J. Cook and Mahmoud F. Fathalla International Family Planning Perspectives Vol. 22, No. 3 (Sep., 1996), pp. 115-121

(3) https://www.liberty-human-rights.org.uk/human-rights/what-are-human-rights/humanrights-act/article-4-no-slavery

-or-forced-labour

(4) https://www.themarshallproject.org/2015/10/18/for-men-in-prison-child-support-becomes-acrushing-debt

(5) https://www.liberty-human-rights.org.uk/human-rights/what-are-human-rights/humanrights-act/article-12-right-marry

(6) http://rightsofwomen.org.uk/get-information/family-law/forced-marriage-law/#Protection%20under%20the%20law%20in%20England%20and%20Wales

The US needs to restore impartiality in dealing with sexual assault allegations

Christine Damon · 10 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In a February 10, 2016, Guardian article by Metropolitan Police Commissioner Bernard Hogan-Howe entitled Suspected Sex Offenders Have Rights That The Police Must Respect he acknowledges that the police have been acting on the presumption that all sexual assault and abuse allegations are truthful, and therefore, all accused are guilty until proven innocent. This practice has led to high-profile rape cases that ended up being false accusations, done tremendous damage to both the falsely accused and the confidence in the Metropolitan police force.

Hogan-Howe re-evaluating this approach offers "a good investigator would test the accuracy of the allegations and the evidence with an open mind, supporting the complainant through the process. This is a more neutral way to begin than saying we should believe victims, and better describes our impartial mindset." Scotland Yard is now conducting an inquiry into how to better handle abuse allegations. One can only hope that the US will start to re-evaluate its approach to sexual assault allegations.

The You Have Options program started in Ashland, OR, is the Metropolitan police force's approach on steroids. This program is "victim-centered" and gives the accuser unprecedented control over the process. Designed to increase reporting and minimize trauma to the accuser it assumes the accuser is being honest, allows them to decide how much, if any, of an investigation is conducted, and whether the accused or any potential witnesses are interviewed or informed of the allegations. In its first year, it was responsible for the incarceration of two innocent men and the prosecution of zero actual rapists.

Not only does it treat the accused as guilty until proven innocent, but it also blocks the accused's ability to prove their innocence. In the first case, there was never a question of whether it was consensual or non-consensual sex. There had never been any sex to begin with, nor was there any evidence that there was. All they had was the accuser's accusation. The date that she claimed it happened was easy to prove that she was not in the state. Presented with the fact that what she claimed was impossible, the police claimed that she "could have been mistaken about the date and it could be two years one way or the other." This prevents any man accused of ever having an alibi. Therefore, under the You Have Options program, you are guilty until you can show your innocence, and then you are still considered guilty.

The discrepancy in her story should have been a huge red flag to the police that they needed to do further investigating. The alleged victim also claimed that she had been victimized by the accused for years and that it was all documented in her psychiatric records. The police did not wait for this "evidence," nor did they visit the alleged crime scene, or interview any of the alleged witnesses. Secure in the belief that women do not lie about rape they turned it over to the Jackson County District Attorney.

Deputy DA David Hoppe, working on the same "listen and believe" narrative did not wait for this evidence either and went directly to a secret grand jury, where the accused is not present or informed that it is taking place. Oregon has hearsay exception laws that allow for an indictment and conviction on just the accuser's testimony unless there is a reason to question that testimony. Apparently, he did not feel that the fact that it could not have happened on the date the accuser alleges was not reason enough. The DA is then able to inform the grand jury that they do not need any evidence to indict. Knowing that this may be violating an innocent man's due process rights and destroying his life, the DA got the grand jury to grant the state immunity to protect them from any lawsuits.

Deputy DA David Hoppe got the indictment, and the falsely accused victim was incarcerated on a $1 million dollar bond. Since he already had the indictment, he was able to ignore the accuser's daughter who claimed that her mother made these accusations regularly and had falsely accused her father when she was a child. He also ignored the letter from the accuser's friend stating that the accuser told her she was going to destroy her soon to be ex-husband's life by accusing his son if she did not get "the house, the dogs and the boat" in the divorce.

Finally, 53 days into the incarceration the DA received his only piece of evidence, the psychiatric report that was going to seal the case for him and it barely mentioned the accused and did not implicate him in any way. Why didn't he wait for this evidence before going to the grand jury? Why didn't the Ashland Police Department wait for this evidence before handing it over to the District Attorney? They were all working on the assumption that women do not lie about rape and that all accusers should be believed. He dismissed the case "in the interest of justice" but not until after the extreme financial, and psychological trauma was inflicted on the falsely accused victim.

The Ashland Police Department claims that they did nothing wrong. Apparently, this is how the You Have Options program works. Probably the most disturbing thing about this is that it was after the indictment, incarceration and revelation that the accuser was lying that the Ashland Police Department started promoting the program nationally as a solution to the "rape crisis." The program was submitted and recognized as a finalist for the Webber Seavey Award for Quality in Law Enforcement. They testified in front of Congress; numerous articles were written. Ashland P.D started training other police departments in the program. There was a 20/20 episode celebrating it, and it is the model for Senator Kirsten Gillibrand's Campus Accountability & Safety Act (CASA), which affords the accused even fewer protections than the state of Oregon.

Victims of false accusation suffer severe psychological trauma, are often financially devastated and have their reputations forever called into question. What both CASA and the You Have Options programs are severely lacking is any accountability to their innocent victims, the falsely accused. Instead, these innocent men are treated as acceptable collateral damage in their war on rape. For a police department, a city, a state and a country that is so obsessed with the trauma victims of rape suffer, they are profoundly irresponsible and disturbingly apathetic to the trauma and injustice that they are unleashing on the falsely accused. Their message to the victims of false accusations is clear, the trauma and destruction they suffer is not only irrelevant but acceptable. Their lives do not matter.

Six months after the first case was dismissed, the You Have Options program claimed its second victim. An impartial approach would have dismissed these cases as unfounded or without enough evidence to proceed. Instead of finding a solution to the "rape crisis" Ashland Police seem to be exposing how common false rape accusations are. And, by failing to take responsibility, both the police and the state show their complicity and their willingness to do it again to other innocent men.

A system that assumes all accusers are truthful makes it easier to catch the rapists but also makes it easier to destroy the innocent in the process. This, in turn, destroys the public's confidence in the system and willingness to believe actual rape victims. It's often said that false accusers make it more difficult for actual victims to get justice. They can't do it alone, though. It takes police and prosecutors who blindly believe them to do the most damage. An Ashland woman recently said "It's sad, now when I hear of a man who has been arrested for rape, I automatically think, "Poor guy! What are they putting him through?"". In spite of the claims that women do not lie about rape, the assumption has become that the police and courts are railroading innocent men.

This serves no one. Programs like Ashland, Oregon's You Have Options are damaging to both the falsely accused and victims of rape. Feminists claim that false accusations of rape are rare, but 100% false accusations in a town of 20 thousand in one year are anything but rare.

To restore confidence and protect all victims we need a policy that approaches accusations of rape with impartiality and holds police and the courts accountable to both the victims of rape and victims of false accusations. We will need someone with the conscience and integrity that Commissioner Hogan-Howe is exhibiting in the UK. Hopefully, that person will show up soon. In January 2016, co-sponsor Senator Kirsten Gillibrand said she and Senator McCaskill would attempt to attach the CASA bill to the re-authorization of the Higher Education Act. How many more innocent men need to be destroyed before they will realize that sacrificing innocent men to make it easier to catch rapists is not only immoral but counterproductive?

Free Yoga, And Other Crimes – The Fiamengo File Episode 16

AVfM Video Source · 10 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Ever got so mad over getting a free yoga class because it was culturally insensitive? Janice Fiamengo tackles the insane people who always feel the need to stay angry.

Subscribe to Studio Brule for more episodes.

Ohhhh... you mean SYSTEMIC sexism... my bad

AVfM Video Source · 10 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Oh ya! karen straughan takes down a Feminist on systemic discrimination.

The persecution of Sage Gerard at Kennesaw State University (KSU)

AVfM Video Source · 11 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Fiamengo discusses the modus operandi used by feminists to silence or destroy their critics. The example of Sage Gerard, who endured years of organized persecution at the hands of the faculty at Kennesaw State University in Georgia, is used as a case study.

Please subscribe to StudioBrule.

The consuming instinct | Gad Saad | TEDxConcordia

AVfM Video Source · 11 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

OK, so what does all this have to do with men's rights? "Consuming instinct," what the heck?

Nature vs. Nurture. In the ongoing discussion between men and women this is the ultimate question, are we born this way or are we influenced by society. Feminists ideology spends an inordinate time on Social influence aka Social Constructs. But is that the entire story? Gad Saad thinks not. A humorous look at the differences between men and women.

Porn, Patriarchy, Hypergamy he hits it all.

To support Gad Saad, please subscribe to his YT channel.

NCFM letter to Governor Rick Scott re: SB 688 – alimony and shared parenting

NCFM · 11 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Governor Scott,

We at the National Coalition for Men most strongly urge you to sign SB 668 which would help to bring Florida into the 21st Century with Alimony Reform and post-divorce equal shared parenting.

Florida's current Alimony Laws are archaic and more closely resemble the family and economic structures of the 1950's than the realities of the many family forms of 2016. SB 668 will bring economic justice and equal opportunity to divorcing husbands and wives as well as enhancing harmony in the post-divorce family by attenuating conflicts over money.

SB 668 also moves Family Law in the direction of post-divorce equal shared parenting. We at the National Coalition for Men believe that Family Law should follow family research. One of the most consistently and strongly replicated findings in family social science research is that the children of divorce fare best in family forms that maximize the involvement of both parents in the child's life. The worst developmental outcomes come from single mother families which are supported by current Family Law.

We strongly encourage our members and others who believe in the necessity of such reforms to contact Governor Scott immediately at:

http://www.flgov.com/contact-gov-scott/email-the-governor/ and/or Rick.scott@eog.myflorida.com , and/or 850-717-9337

Respectfully,

Harry Crouch

President, National Coalition for Men

A copy of the printed letter sent to Governor Scott is here: http://ncfm.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/03/160311-Open-ltr-to-FL-gov-Scott-re-alimony-SB-668.pdf

George Carlin – Political Correctness is fascism pretending to be Manners

AVfM Video Source · 12 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

George Carlin educating us on political correctness, a brilliant man with a way of words which resonates over time.

George Carlin (1937 – 2008). R.I.P. George.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=hkhUivqzWv0

Dr. Michael S. Green of Ventura, California "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 12 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Michael S. Green has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website drmsg.com:

"Dr. Michael S. Green is board certified in both Family Medicine and Obstetrics and Gynecology. He is currently providing primarily Obstetrics and Gynecology services in his role as Chief of Obstetrics and Gynecology at the Centers for Family Health in Ventura County California.

Dr. Green loves to camp with his family. He enjoys fishing, hiking and on-line gaming with his boys. He also enjoys boogie boarding, skiing, cooking, and entertaining."

As a women's doctor, and probably circumcised at that, he knows nothing about the foreskin, and is obviously ignorant of the human rights violation he brings on his unwilling – and unconsenting – patients.

On his other website, medtwice.com, he stars in two videos about circumcision, this first one "Overview," in which he concludes:

> My personal advice is to make the child look like other males in his family and peer group. Life may be easier for the child if he looks like the other male members of the family and his community. Ultimately this is a choice for the parents to decide. There are reasonable arguments on both sides of the debate. The choice becomes a balance of medical as well as social issues.

On what planet does Green's personal advice matter when it comes to risky and unnecessary surgery of an unconsenting infant? The same planet that allows said infant's parents to 'consent' to this permanent amputation, a planet that needs a wake-up call when they allow doctors to modify an infant's genitals because they or the parents want them to look 'right.'

I don't recall any ritual where men or women compare their genitals, and when it happens accidentally, GET REAL – don't avoid the elephant in the room, explain that some boys were mutilated against their will and the intact and uncircumcised penis is the normal version, not the other way around.

From Dr. Green's "Procedure" video:

> Complications from circumcision are very rare. Bleeding can occur but is usually easily controlled at the time of the procedure. Infection is possible but surprising a rare event. Injury to the penis itself is incredibly unusual. The local anesthetic, the cream or the injection, work very well. It is my opinion that in most cases circumcision is more difficult for the parent than it is for the baby.

Complications are not rare, and actually 100% of these babies will have deformed and scarred penises and some level of trauma and nervous system damage. Injury to the penis is also 100%, and we have no way of knowing if the mutilation is "more difficult for the parent than it is for the baby."

Since Dr. Green has incomplete information about risks and complications of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Green's practice information follows:

120 N. Ashwood Ave.

Ventura, CA (805) 658-5800

Centers for Family Health

2361 Vinyard Ave
Oxnard, CA 93030

Phone: 805-981-3770

> Dr. Michael S Green "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/k7cLJ8X5YJ #nocirc #intactivism @AndreaHardie pic.twitter.com/vrFKbosnvK
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 12, 2016

Online Dating

Editorial Staff · 12 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following Blog entry was posted on AVFM forums by one of its members, Maxx. It is edited and republished here with his permission. ED

Online dating is a very passive and limited means of attracting and interacting with women. A man has no positive means of proactively influencing his success. It's like putting some bait on a fish hook and waiting. You might be waiting a while.

Whatever bait you put on it's going to attract some forms of fish and repulse others.

For example, put pictures of yourself in a suit looking 'corporate' and standing next to your new sports car and you'll set off the spidey sense of every gold digger in sight. At the same time as putting off young fun loving girls that think you look like a wealthy older douche who is trying to 'buy' them. Put pictures that show off your abs and muscles and you put off chicks that think you are a poser and chicks that believe that you are only after sex. Put a handful of neutral, boring non-threatening images of you standing next to your Xmas tree holding your pet dog and you look like a 'boring guy.' Put very zany ones where you share dangling upside down off something high or in fancy dress, and you seem like a freak. You'll Scare off the meek sheltered girls and attract the S & M freaks that want you to butt fuck them while they scream 'no daddy it's too big' at the top of their lungs, prompting your neighbors to alert the police.

You can write whatever you like in the profile but the more you write, the easier it's going to be for a prospective chick to find something in your profile that pisses her off and uses it as an excuse to dismiss you or ignore your efforts to initiate interaction.

The less info you provide, the more she can project her preferred qualities into the gaps (it isn't your fault if she makes assumptions that are unfounded and decides to see you on the basis of them is it?).

Once you do get messages flowing back and forth your flake rate is going to be unbelievably high, women are fickle creatures at the best of times. That goes tenfold for 'online'. At least, in a bar you can ask a girl who turns away from you while she's doing that suddenly in the middle of a conversation between you. Online all she has to do is click a button and your ability to communicate with her vanishes instantly. Attempt to circumvent that and you'll get banned from the site for 'harassment'.

The short answer is that this is a pretty bullshit way to go about meeting women. If you want casual hookups, post a couple of pictures of yourself including at least one that shows you are in decent shape. Post a short non-specific message about how you are interested in meeting different kinds of people and seeing where this journey is going to take you. Post jokes. Mock the whole dating process and the website itself. You want to stand out as a rebel and an adventurer so communicate that.

It's a numbers game. Hit up a bunch of chicks with your profile. Ask them a dumb question for example about some item in the background of one of their profile pictures (IGNORE their looks and NEVER comment on them…that's what EVERY other chump is already doing).

Once they fire back, scan through their profile get a handle on their values and personality quirks and reflect them back to her in conversation. This is actually about the only thing that's EASIER online than in real life because you don't even have to ask leading question to illicit the info; it's all already there. And that's because most women these days are narcissists prone to massively OVER-SHARING on social media (including dating site profiles). The blueprint for exactly what you need to say and do to get her to engage you is usually right there in her profile preferences and bio.

Arrange a date. On the date steer conversation away from the nuts and bolts 'what do you do what do I do' job interview dynamic and onto the grounds of primal fears, childhood memories and general observations about people around you. Sprinkle the conversation with subtle references and nods to all the shit she already told the universe floats her boat in her long rambling self-indulgent profile. Steer the conversation the long way round until it's about sex one and sexual preferences one way or another. Then get her back to yours, fuck the shit out of her and only call her back the next day if she's any good.

ON THE OTHER HAND…

If you are looking for a serious long-term relationship, forget this online bullshit totally. Instead, embrace a hobby or interest that you've meant to get into. If you are a man of faith look for a hobby or interest based around that or operating out of your local church. Use this as an opportunity to meet and interact with new people (male and female) who share your interests and broadly speaking your spiritual outlook.

Don't force it but allow things to develop organically. If you like the look of a girl and get along invite her for coffee afterward. Get her number and rinse and repeat. Eventually, you talk about family and babies and raising children in this crazy mixed up world of ours and figure out if she's on the same page. That's the best advice I can give.

Online dating isn't a short cut to pussy, rewarding long term relationships or marriage and family for men that haven't invested time in learning both about themselves and about women and female nature. It's subject to most of the same 'rules' as the real world dating/mating game only with a couple of the main variations that aren't really in any man's favor when you stop to think about it.

Volume- a double edged a sword. Because it's easy and effortless to hit up women online, men who have confidence issues in relation to this in the real world can sit in front of a computer and spam 'Hi, my name is John…' to about 160 women a day. The flip side of this is that because it's easy EVERYONE is doing it. The sheer 'noise' coming from every thirsty chump in the universe is something a skilled player has to cut through to even get a woman to respond to him online.

Meanwhile, In the real world, you can cut through all the noise and get a girl's attention simply by puffing out your chest and raising your voice. Because of the different dynamics at play women on online dating sites are very pissed off with the volume of constant hits they get and tend to be very impatient and unforgiving.

Their bitch shields are on high alert. It means you need MORE game to get through it and get her to relax and open up online than you do in the 'real world.' Not less.

Ask a beautiful girl in a park about the book she's reading. It's a lot smarter than firing lame one-liners at dating profiles on the internet.

If they want to bail on you or flake on you online, they can. It takes a button click. And they don't even have to let you down gently.

Misrepresentation – it's a lot easier for fat/ugly chicks to change the aspect ratio of their pictures to make themselves look thin or for trannies to hide their stubble by photoshopping their pics etc.

So for all the effort it takes to do all this online shit you don't even really know if the person you are talking to really is who they say they are. You might be talking to a 240lbs bouncer in Poland looking to get an autistic IT nerd to send him money via pay pal using his hot nieces modeling pictures. Not to mention you are competing with dudes bullshitting women left and right as well. It's just a whole lotta twats wasting each others time for the most part.

Get a hobby. Offer hot chicks that share it a coffee after class (or whatever).

Spot a girl in the park;

> Hey, is that book any good? Only I read the last book by the same chick, and I didn't think it was her best…?'

Rinse and repeat until you get somewhere you want to be.

Gregory Alan Elliott interviewed by Karen Straughan

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Gregory Alan Elliott was charged with criminal harassment of three #Feminist activists in Toronto Canada. His crime, just disagreeing with them on Twitter. After three years of his life lost, he finally won his court case. Listen here to Karen Straughan's interview.

If you like this video, please subscribe to Honey Badger Cinema.

The media says The Honey Badgers are a bunch of haters (which sounds like our kind of folks). Consider donating: http://www.feedthebadger.com/projects.

News: A.W.A.L.T. Syrian Refugee Edition

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The opinions expressed in this video are those of the author and do not necessarily represent the opinions and views of AVFM or its affiliates. ED

Welcome to freedom! Have some no-fault divorce with a side of child support. What? You're broke, well it's off to jail or deportation for you. Why are you so angry? It must be your religion or something. (MGTOW)

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nVODWZBf3O8

If you like this video please subscribe to Turd Flinging Monkey.

The Bound – when blue shifts to red...

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Rebel Media interviews a young man who is crowdsourcing funding for a short movie, with aspirations of making a larger one. The premise is the effects of feminism on masculinity. The plot involves a crusading knight questioning the righteousness of his ideology.

To find out more, visit the Indiegogo page here,

Hillary Rodham Clinton determined to push 28 million circumcisions

Robert O'Hara · 13 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In the following 2012 article by Robert O'Hara we learned of Hilliary Rodham Clinton's attitude toward male circumcision. We bring it to you again as a refresher on her views toward genital integrity as she runs for office – Eds. [Trigger warning: may cause castration anxiety].

Secretary of State's Africa tour to promote male genital mutilation; U.S. news media is silent (AVFM News Sunday August 19, Washington D.C.) – On Wednesday, August 15th,at 11:00am U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton met with USAID Administrator Rajiv Shah, Counselor Sheryl Mills, United States Global AIDS Coordinator Ambassador Eric Goosby, and Director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) Thomas Frieden, at the Department of State. The meeting was closed to the press and the assortment of individuals representing this combination of agencies is unusual for a State Department hearing as the CDC normally does not concern itself with international political affairs. However, given the recent activities of the Secretary Clinton in the past several weeks opponents of Male Genital Mutilation would have reason to be concerned with developments that could result from this meeting.

Last Friday, August 10th, Secretary Clinton wrapped up a tour of Sub Saharan Africa in Ghana which began on the 31st of last month in Senegal traveling through South Sudan, Uganda, Kenya, South Africa and Malawi. The State Departments Press release only mentioned U.S. efforts to deal with the AIDS epidemic in Africa once and never mentioned Male Circumcision. The trip was not extensively covered by the national media with the Washington Post releasing only one article outlining her journey and providing whimsical reports of dancing with native women, dodging swarms of bees and braving a deadly outbreak of Ebola. As in the State departments press release, male circumcision as a means to stop the spread of AIDS was never once mentioned.

Indeed, not one major U.S. news source has covered what is perhaps the biggest initiative ever to halt the spread of HIV AIDS; an initiative being spearheaded by the World Health Organization, the U.N. and the U.S. government.

As reported previously by AVFM News (see previous articles listed below) the W.H.O. in concert with the U.N., the World Bank, the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) and several other very well funded and influential N.G.Os are funding, supporting and administering a multinational effort to circumcise over 28 million men in Sub Saharan Africa by 2015. This initiative has gained the overwhelming support of the State Department as well as the U.N. in spite of mounting evidence that the RCTs (randomized controlled trials) performed in 2005 in Africa, which concluded that men who underwent circumcision were 60% less likely to contract HIV, were seriously flawed and administered largely by unqualified individuals with both financial and ideological conflicts of interest.

Since AVFM last reported on this topic there has been even more outrage coming not only from anti circumcision activists but from the medical community at large. In a recent opinion piece in Open Salon penned by Judy Mandelbaum entitled "Africa's male circumcision crusade: Boon or boondoggle?" an interview with a Dr. Ronald Goldman of the Circumcision Resource Center in Boston was featured giving a critique of the campaign currently underway in Africa.

Excerpt:

> Mandelbaum: Dr. Goldman, a number of sub-Saharan African nations have begun a crash adult circumcision program aimed at drastically reducing the incidence of HIV/AIDS among their populations. Their leaders, encouraged by foreign governments and NGOs, have apparently convinced themselves that a circumcised penis is practically immune to the virus. What effect do you think the mass circumcision of African men will actually have on suppressing the illness?

> Dr. Goldman: Many professionals have questioned the reliability and validity of studies claiming that circumcision reduces HIV transmission. African national population surveys in eight countries found a higher rate of HIV infection among circumcised men compared to men who were not circumcised. There are at least 17 observational studies that have not found any benefit from male circumcision in reducing HIV transmission. Therefore, I do not expect a reduction in HIV transmission. It's even possible that the incidence of HIV transmission will increase because the mistaken belief of protection from circumcision will result in more risk-taking sexual behavior.

The article also provides links to two studies from Pandos Eastern Africa, an NGO operating in the region promoting various forms of development, and the Australian Journal of Law and Medicine questioning not only the effectiveness of circumcision as a tool to prevent the spread of HIV but also warning that compensatory behavior by circumcised men would be a matter of grave concern. "In the Ugandan male-to-female trial, there appears to have been a 61% relative increase in HIV infection among female partners of HIV-positive circumcised men. Since male circumcision diverts resources from known preventive measures and increases risk-taking behaviors, any long-term benefit in reducing HIV transmission remains uncertain." the authors concluded. Also featured in Open Salon article are the Ugandan male circumcision promotional posters showing an attractive woman locked in an astonished downward gaze clasping her face in her palms with the title "You mean your not circumcised!" and subtitle: "Stand proud get circumcised."

While news outlets in the U.S. have been eerily quiet concerning both the circumcision drive in and Secretary Clinton's recent visit news sources in Africa have been afire with increasingly strong criticism along with macabre tales of forced circumcision conducted by angry street mobs.

On July 8th Peter Nyoni of Zimdiaspora, a news source in Zimbabwe, reported that HIV infections were up among circumcised participants of the ZHDS (Zimbabwe Health Demographic Survey) and strongly implied that the current drive for male circumcision was a factor.

Excerpt:

> "The HIV prevalence rate among circumcised males between the ages of 15 and 49 in Zimbabwe is higher than that of the uncircumcised males owing to the misconception that circumcision completely shields people from HIV infection.
>
> According to the latest Zimbabwe Health Demographic Survey (ZHDS 2010/2011), the prevalence rate among the circumcised is 14 percent while that of the uncircumcised is 12 percent.
>
> The circumcision status of participants was established during pre-test counseling.
>
> However, the country's overall prevalence rate for the same age group declined to 15 from 18 percent, according to the same survey.
>
> National Aids Council (Nac) public health officer Dr Blessing Mutede said authorities were concerned about the high rate of infection among the circumcised.
>
> He said it was largely a result of "risk compensation behaviors".
>
> Most men, after circumcision, harbor the false impression that they have been equipped with an invisible condom, he added.
>
> "It is a worrying development that at a time when we are promoting male circumcision as a preventive measure to combat HIV, we are recording a high prevalence rate amongst the group that has been circumcised largely due to uninformed risky compensation behaviors," he said."

Just a six weeks earlier in Zimeye, a publication much more critical of the W.H.O.'s circumcision and Zimbabwe's acceptance of it, published an article named "Zimbabwe still falsely claiming that circumcision defeats HIV/AIDS" by an unnamed correspondent.

Excerpt:

> "Zimbabwe is still falsely claiming that the surgical circumcision operation defeats the deadly HIV/AIDS virus.
>
> This comes after more than 5 months of media coverage exposing the method's weakness as a competent measure.
>
> Several US medical practitioners have in the past few months warned third world countries upon whom the United Nations suggested the method, that they should not have their citizens deceive on circumcision and its supposed benefits.
>
> The ministry of health is deceiving people by announcing to them that once they are circumcised, they become immune to HIV/AIDS effectively encouraging them to engage in promiscuity. Instead of reducing the risk, circumcision has been tested through behavior change to actually be a protagonist of HIV transmission, critics state.
>
> One recent randomized controlled trial carried out in South Africa into male-to-female transmission actually demonstrated a 54% higher rate in the group where the men had been circumcised."

The article does not cite the source of the "recent study" , however, there is a clear suggestion that empirical evidence shows the program to circumcise a large proportion of men in Sub Saharan Africa has already resulted in the unnecessary infection of HIV in circumcised individuals.

Most disturbing are reports from Uganda where hysterical mobs are performing crude circumcisions upon unwilling random men in the streets in order to quell fears of HIV infection among their womenfolk. On June 20, The Africa Report published an article by Godfrey Olukya titled "Storm Brews over Forced Circumcision in Uganda" which documented an incident in which an angry group of men chased down a man in order to forcibly remove his foreskin simply because he was suspected of having sex with a female member of their tribe.

Excerpt:

> "The Ugandan town of Mbale was brought to a standstill on Tuesday afternoon, as a naked man ran through the streets, with more than 50 men in pursuit. He was fleeing a forced circumcision.
>
> Only identified as Deo, the man sought sanctuary from the Resident District Administrator, as the men and a local scalpel-wielding surgeon gave chase.
>
> Deo survived the forced circumcision after guards at the administrator's office were able to disperse his assailants, but that was not before other men had fallen victim to the enforced surgical operation.
>
> More than 40 men of various ages have been subjected to the cut in the last two days, as the town goes through a general circumcision programme, but this has faced widespread protests."

Even more disturbing is a June 20 report by Paul Watala from News Vision, claimed to be Uganda's leading news daily news source, which describes scenes of police having to use teargas in order to disperse angry mobs who are carrying out forced circumcisions. A photograph in the article shows a man undergoing such a procedure being videotaped by a participant in the mutilation.

Excerpt:

> "Police in Mbale have fired teargas and deployed heavily to disperse hooligans forcefully circumcising people on > the streets including non-Bamasaba.

>
> The District Police Commander, Michael Angucia Wednesday vowed to crack down the hooligans who are causing insecurity in the town.
>
> "I am not trying to fight the culture of the Bamasaba but the way the practice is handled may cause tribal conflicts. Several people have fled the town, property robbed and business is being paralyzed," Angucia said.
>
> "We have deployed on the streets to arrest the hooligans," Angucia added.
>
> He said that several groups of such people have taken advantage of the cultural festival of the Bamasaba to force whoever they suspect to have not been circumcised.
>
> Angucia said that due to public outcry from the people and local leaders, police had no alternative but to provide security on the streets to restore serenity in town, adding that some people have fled town and abandoned business in Mbale main garage.
>
> It is estimated that a total number of about 220 people have been circumcised from the time the exercise began date."

As mentioned above not one major U.S news source has bothered to mention the growing criticism of circumcision as a tool to prevent the spread of HIV or the State Department's gusto in supporting such efforts. The only U.S. based news organization that covered Secretary Clinton's efforts to support the drive for Male Genital Mutilation in Africa was All Africa, a Washington D.C. news source that covers African news exclusively.

A July 25 article by Roselyne Sachiti (published shortly before her African trip) entitled "Clinton Hails Legislators' Circumcision" covers Clinton's speech at the 19th annual international AIDS Conference held in Washington with 20,000 attending. In the speech she praised 40 parliamentarians in Zibabwe who underwent circumcision in order to promote the WHO.'s circumcision drive.

Excerpt:

> "She described the team as true leaders who should be applauded for their role in the HIV and Aids fight.
>
> Addressing 20 000 delegates gathered here for the XIX International Aids Conference, Mrs. Clinton said Zimbabwean lawmakers were a good example of political leadership's commitment in the HIV and Aids management.
>
> She said they supported more than 400 000 male circumcision procedures since last December alone and hoped to do more through different grants.
>
> ". . .We want the world to know that this procedure reduces the risk of female-to-male transmission by more than 60 percent and for the rest of the man's life, so the impact can be phenomenal.
>
> "In Zimbabwe, some male lawmakers wanted to show their constituents how safe and virtually painless the procedure is, so they went to a mobile clinic and got circumcised.
>
> "That's the kind of leadership we welcome. And we are also seeing the development of new tools that would allow people to perform the procedure with less training and equipment than they need today without compromising safety," he said.
>
> Mrs. Clinton challenged other countries to support the Global Fund in the fight against HIV and Aids, TB and malaria. She announced an additional US$80 million to support innovative approaches that ensure HIV positive pregnant women get treatment they need to protect themselves, their babies and partners.
>
> "An additional US$15 million for implementation research to identify the specific interventions that are most effective for key populations, US$20 million to launch a challenge fund that will support country-led plans to expand services for their key populations and US$2 million investment in the Robert Carr Society Service Network

> Funds to bolster the efforts of civil society groups in addressing key populations," she said."

The money that Secretary Clinton has pledged is in addition to the already estimated half billion that the WHO and other organizations have already dedicated to the circumcision drive.

A man is forcibly circumcised in Mbale, Uganda Photo by Paul Watala

On a stop to Uganda during her African trip the Independent, another Ugandan News source, covered an August 3 stop to Reach Out Mbuya Parish HIV/AIDS Initiative (ROM), a center for AIDS outreach in that country in an article entitled "Tackling HIV diferently". Her apearence followed a visit with President Yoweri Museveni in which she presented the UPDF Special Forces with 12 Raven unmanned aircraft for use in Somalia where Uganda is participating in an effort to pacify that country. The article describes a crowd of people waiting to listen to Clinton address the clinic where she talked about retro-viral therapy and other methods to stop the spread of AIDS . Also waiting in line were a group of young men who were there to undergo circumcision.

Excerpt:

> "Another client, Jasper Magezi, had come for something else. Magezi had been told that circumcision could save him from contracting HIV. On the day of Clinton's visit, he was among those lined up for circumcision. During the pre-circumcision counseling session, Magezi said, he was told that in case he were to be exposed to HIV during sex after circumcision, he stood chances of escaping getting infecting. He was also told, however, that he would still need to continue using condoms and stick to one sexual partner. But one thing kept nagging him; was the pain he was about to suffer worth it?"

A ROM official identified only as "Talisuna" spoke of a program funded by the CDC named the "Discordant Couples Intervention." A program mentioned by recipients of circumcision funding all over Africa which encourages the circumcision of married men in order to curb the spread of HIV and bring men into a so called clinical setting so they can be "educated" about domestic violence. The rational behind the program ties the prevalence of HIV to male perpetrated domestic violence and the supposed out of control infidelity of African men. No scientific studies have been conducted to support such an association between male perpetrated domestic violence and HIV infection and there are no studies that quantify the supposed infidelity of African husbands.

AVFM will be covering developments at the State Department and the CDC in regards to any developments concerning circumcision as a means to prevent the spread of HIV both in Africa and the U.S.

Sources:

http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/appt/2012/08/196467.htm

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Rajiv_Shah

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cheryl_Mills

http://www.pepfar.gov/press/125262.htm

http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/appt/2012/08/195635.htm

http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2012/07/195785.htm

http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/africa/hillary-clintons-africa-trip-dodges-disease-bees-even-features-a-bit-of-snow-and-dancing/2012/08/10/d7017ce0-e317-11e1-89f7-76e23a982d06_story.html http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/politics-money-and-ideology-whos-circumcision-plan/http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/28000000-african-men-to-be-coerced-by-u-n-to-make-the-cut/http://open.salon.com/blog/judy_mandelbaum/2012/07/27/africas_male_circumcision_crusade_boon_or_boondoggle http://www.panosea.org/index.php?page=article&type=news&i=25

http://www.salem-news.com/fms/pdf/2011-12_JLM-Boyle-Hill.pdf

http://www.zimdiaspora.com/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=8811%3Ahiv-infection-rate-higher-on-circumcised-men&catid=38%3Atravel-tips&Itemid=18

http://www.zimeye.org/?p=53896

http://www.theafricareport.com/index.php/20120620501813944/east-horn-africa/storm-brews-over-forced-circumcision-in-uganda-501813944.html http://www.newvision.co.ug/news/632168-forceful-circumcision-in-mbale-police-fire-teargas.html

http://allafrica.com/stories/201207250538.html

http://www.independent.co.ug/news/news-analysis/6258-tackling-hiv-differently

The Alamo: a case study in male disposability

Doug Mortimer · 13 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By Larry D. Moore, CC BY-SA 3.0, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=654737

> There are those who do not understand the story of the Alamo; but they do not understand the nature, and sometime valor, of men.
>
> T.R. Fehrenbach, Texas Historian

2016 marks the 180th anniversary of the battle of the Alamo, an incident that has been chronicled and debated ever since in history books and historical novels. 15 movies have dealt with the incident, starting with The Immortal Alamo in 1911, and the Alamo in downtown San Antonio remains the most popular tourist site in Texas. To my knowledge, no one has ever discussed the event as an outstanding (or, if you prefer, egregious) example of male disposability – on both sides.

First of all, the Alamo need not have happened. The rebels captured it on December 10, 1835, but on January 17, 1836, Sam Houston, commander-in-chief, sent a message to the troops and ordered them to abandon the Alamo, blow it up, and remove the artillery to other environs.

William Barret Travis, commander of the Texians (the term Texans did not become popular till Texas was admitted to the Union) ensconced in the Alamo, had some rather melodramatic ideas about achieving glory via death. In his famous plea for assistance on February 24, 1836 (the day after Santa Anna and the Mexican army arrived in San Antonio), he wrote; "I am determined to sustain my post as long as possible & die like a soldier who never forgets what is due his honor & that of his country – Victory or Death." Even with reinforcements, the former was unlikely, and the latter was all but assured. Actually, there was a third option, though Travis didn't offer it to his troops till the day before the final battle.

Holding out until March 5, just three days after the Texas Declaration of Independence was ratified, Travis realized that the Alamo defenders were in an untenable situation. They were hopelessly outnumbered and could not withstand an all-out assault by thousands of Mexican troops. Surrendering was no better than a fight to the finish, as Santa Anna had already indicated no quarter would be given. So Travis gave the men of the Alamo a choice.

According to legend, Travis drew a line in the sand and invited those who wanted to stay with him to cross the line and come over to his side. Historians doubt that Travis literally drew a line in the sand, but he did indeed inform his men that they could retire from the fray if they chose.

While there is some debate about the exact number of men inside the Alamo, only one defender, Louis Moses Rose, an elderly (by the standards of his day…he was 50 years old) decided to evacuate and managed to escape the night before the final battle. A former soldier in service to Napoleon, Rose decided to call it quits in the battle against the Napoleon of the West, as Santa Anna fancied himself.

Now whether or not Travis actually drew a line in the sand is unimportant, though it is a powerful metaphor. He offered more than 180 men a chance at life, and only one took him up on it. What was Louis Moses Rose thinking? Was it the old discretion-being-the-better-part-of-valor thing, or living to fight another day? Or did he realize – correctly – that his death could achieve nothing?

Abandoning the Alamo on the eve of the final siege might have been more beneficial for the Texians' cause. After all, they had delayed the Mexican army's advance for 12 days. Remarkably, they had suffered no deaths during the siege, but now they were short of ammunition and gunpowder. If it were a matter of male utility, wouldn't it have been more efficient for the Alamo defenders to attempt to escape? After all, couriers had been coming and going all through the siege. Some of the men escaping would not have made it, but the ones who succeeded would thus be available to fight in future battles.

Speaking of male disposability, let's not forget Santa Anna, tucked away in his command center 500 yards from the Alamo, and his squandering of Mexican soldiers. Mexican body counts vary widely. Texas A&M University has come up with a chart compiling all estimates of the body counts for both sides and come up with a range of 311-2000 Mexican. No matter the final body count, overrunning the Alamo was a costly enterprise.

I think it's safe to say that most of those Mexican soldiers were not particularly enthusiastic about taking part in the siege, as most of them were conscripts (a lot of them had been sprung from jails) gathered up by Santa Anna as he marched north from Zacatecas, where he had put down another rebellion. The tyranny of the central government in Mexico City had inspired many rebellions. Four years after the Alamo, another secession movement broke out in the state of Tamaulipas. Santa Anna was hardly the people's choice.

The nice thing about vastly outnumbering your opponent is you can just keep sending men into the breach until they finally win. The disposability of men is a function of their abundance. Much like an oversupply of cheap labor obviates the development of labor-saving devices, an oversupply of soldiers allows leaders to simply keep feeding them into the meat-grinder until victory is achieved, rather than put on their thinking caps to devise some sort of strategy that might accomplish the goal with fewer casualties.

From a military standpoint, wouldn't it have made more sense for Santa Anna to bypass the Alamo and head east after Sam Houston and his army? Well, Santa Anna was more of an egotist than a strategist. He had taken the Texians' occupation of the Alamo as a personal insult. When the Texians captured the Alamo in December of 1835, General Martin Perfecto de Cos – Santa Anna's brother-in-law – had surrendered to them.

Even so, if Santa Anna was determined to assault the Alamo, wouldn't it have made more sense for him to wait until his heavy artillery (bogged down in mud on the northward march) arrived so that he could breach the walls and his men wouldn't have had to resort to scaling ladders?

It is worth pausing to note that chivalry was not dead, as Santa Anna spared the non-combatants, including Susanna Dickinson (the wife of defender Almaron Dickinson) and her daughter, some Mexican women, and children, as well as two slaves. In other words, on March 6, 1836, white male privilege was nowhere in evidence.

Though there was no counterpart of a Trojan horse, the "Texian Iliad," as it was referred to just a few years after the battle, captured the public imagination. As a last stand against overwhelming odds, the Alamo was sometimes called "The Thermopylae of Texas," hearkening back to 300 Greeks holding off hordes of Persians in 480 B.C. Looking to the future, the battle of Wake Island (initiated by the Japanese just hours after Pearl Harbor) is sometimes referred to as the Alamo of the Pacific, as it was another siege involving a vast army besieging an entrenched but much smaller opponent. Rooting for the home team is always a favorite pursuit, and when the home team is the underdog, it inspires, even more passion in the fans/citizens.

What makes the Alamo unique is the men had a choice. If you want to leave, do so, good luck, and no questions asked. You've done your duty, now save your skin. But peer pressure was a factor in 1836, even though the phrase probably wasn't in currency back then.

The men surely realized they were signing their own death warrants by staying there. They might have rationalized that decision by acknowledging that their deaths would buy a few more hours for Sam Houston, who was recruiting more and more men while his army was retreating towards the east. As it turned out, the news of the Alamo defenders being wiped out, as well as mass executions of rebels at the town of Goliad on Palm Sunday, did inspire more men to volunteer.

The families of the Alamo defenders were not in immediate danger. Many had joined the "runaway scrape" headed for safety in Louisiana. Others were already hundreds of miles away, as a good number of the men in the Alamo were adventurers from outside of Texas. So the men were not laying down their lives in defense of their families, and there were no women to shame them.

So why didn't the men try to escape? Did they believe that every Mexican soldier they killed was one less Mexican soldier who could fight Sam Houston? Or were they like modern men committing suicide because they perceived there was no way out? What was the motivation for the big three: Colonel Travis, Jim Bowie, and Davy Crockett?

The once-vigorous Jim Bowie was a broken man, suffering from typhoid and still mourning the death of his wife and children due to a cholera epidemic. He was doomed. Might as well take a few Mexican soldiers with him.

Davy Crockett was 49 years old – older than the U.S. Constitution. Having been voted out of the House of Representatives by his constituents in Tennessee, he uttered the famous words, "You all can go to hell. I'm going to Texas." In the last letter he wrote, to his daughter and son-in-law, on January 9, 1836, he penned, "I am in hopes of making a fortune." It's tough to get rich when you're dead. So why did he stay? Already a living legend, did he want to assure his legendary status forever? Had he invested in coonskin cap futures?

Travis was the youngest of the big three, just 26 years old. Despite his domestic troubles (supposedly he killed a man who had cuckolded him) back in South Carolina, he might have had a bright future. But he was willing to exchange his life for glory. If Travis's ambition was to go down in history, he certainly achieved it. This concept of glory-by-death was still in evidence as late as 1958 when Lon Tinkle authored 13 Days to Glory, a popular Alamo history that is still widely available.

On the other side, why did the Mexican soldiers allow themselves to be sacrificed? The march across the desert of northern Mexico in winter wasn't as bad as the Bataan death march, but it was no leisurely stroll. Given their numbers, they could have mutinied, fragged Santa Anna and his officers, burned the bodies, and deserted. Unfortunately, the typical Mexican peasant was trained to obey authority no matter what. Ironically, the Mexican government looked down on the American institution of slavery while the lot of the Mexican campesino was arguably worse.

There may have been a touch of racism in Santa Anna's cavalier treatment of his troops. Technically, slavery did not exist in Mexico, but there was a caste system. At the top of the heap were the gachupines or peninsulares, i.e., Spaniards who had emigrated from the Iberian Peninsula. Criollos (or Creoles) were the new world offspring of those Spaniards. Next came the mestizos, those of mixed Spanish and Indian blood (since the majority of Spanish emigrants were male, this blending was inevitable), and finally the Indians or indios, who were a conquered people.

Aside from the officer corps, the Mexican army was largely composed of the two lower castes. So Santa Anna might have figured there were plenty more where they came from, so why hold them back? They were as disposable as Kleenex. On the other hand, history is rife with examples of commanders who did not hesitate to sacrifice lower class men of their own race to achieve their goals, so it may be more a matter of class than of race.

It's also possible that the ambitious Santa Anna may have been frustrated because an accident of birth prevented him from ever ascending to the highest caste. For that reason, he may have been something of an overachiever; if he could never be a gachupin, he could be the ultimate Creole alpha male…and if thousands of lower caste men had to die to propel him to the top…well, sacrifices must be made.

If I were defending or assaulting the Alamo, I don't know what I would have done – but I don't consider myself expendable. Faced with certain death, I'd have to make damn sure it was worth the sacrifice. Otherwise, hasta la vista, baby. Then again, the Alamo fell 180 years ago, and male consciousness has changed.

T.R. Fehrenbach, author of the opening comment, noted of the Alamo defenders "There was a core of barbarian hardihood, and barbarian warlikeness, in each of these men, different as they were."

So these men were more formidable than contemporary video game warriors. The likes of Anita Sarkeesian would not faze them.

I've always felt there's a little of the barbarian in all of us boys (some parents, schoolteachers, and feminists would likely agree). The Alamo defenders surely had more of it than contemporary men and likely more than their peers.

The phrase "Remember the Alamo" is still in common currency, but perhaps we should add, "Get in touch with your inner barbarian.”

That would look good on a T-shirt or bumper sticker!

Why Feminists Hate Men: What They Won't Tell You!

AVfM Video Source · 15 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Question: "It seems to me that misandry presently represents a significant threat to western civilization. If accurate, why are so many people incapable of, or unwilling to, recognize it? Would you be able to suggest some effective means of educating people in the commission of putting an end to it?"

Freedomain Radio is 100% funded by viewers like you. Please support the show by signing up for a monthly subscription or making a one-time donation at http://www.freedomainradio.com/donate

Get more from Stefan Molyneux and Freedomain Radio including books, podcasts and other info at http://www.freedomainradio.com

YT Channel: Stefan Molyneux

Is feminism really dying?

AVfM Video Source · 15 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan on the decreasing political power of feminism–and the ongoing issue of gynocentrism:

If you like this video, please support Karen Straughan's YT channel.

Just A Minute

Robert Brockway · 15 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Manspreading is defined by the Oxford Dictionary as:

> The practice whereby a man, especially one travelling on public transport, adopts a sitting position with his legs wide apart, in such a way as to encroach on an adjacent seat or seats.

The earliest known reference to the term is apparently from an October 2014 article in AM New York which referred to man spread. The term would later be popularised as man spreading. Prior to the development of the term significant discussion occurred online following the launch of the Tumbler blogs Men Taking Up Too Much Space, One Bro Two Seats and Saving Room For Cats.

Mainstream news sites such as New York Magazine have described manspreading as a microagression. The Telegraph, the Globe and Mail and many other sources suggest this is a mainstream idea within feminism.

The term manspreading is an attempt to shame men for being men. The Independent in the UK recognises this, as does the New York Post.

As Breitbart indicates men have been arrested for manspreading in the last couple of years.

Baby mutilators want to expand, but stealthily

Gary Costanza · 15 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Treating baby boys no better than animals to be "fixed," circumcisers such as those at the Circumcision Centre have had to increasingly fend off criticism of their practice by some who consider Male Genital Mutilation (MGM) and FGM to be human rights violations. Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys have recently been notified by the Circumcision Centre that it didn't appreciate that he and AVFM called them genital mutilators and printed their pictures in their listing of "Known Genital Mutilators" at neonatalcutting.org. On a recent appearance, Mike made on a radio program, the BBC – with prodding by the clinic – warned him not to mention the clinic by name. Read Mike's account of the whole saga here.

From their website they boast they are "the UK's largest private male circumcision clinic" and hope to expand their 'services' to other cities. Private circumcisions are all that's available as the British government refuses to pay for and condone infant genital mutilation, to their credit. But they still refuse to protect baby boys as they do baby girls, so it's up to intactivists and the public to get the word out and stop this bloody madness right here in Luton.

Thornhill complained that my interpretation of extracts of their website are "misleading and factually incorrect." As Mike has said, Thornhill should provide details as to which "interpretation" they refer. Maybe they didn't like me calling them a "cutting mill" which I admit is blunt, but accurate. Since a private room is extra, I picture a room with several baby boys strapped down and mutilated assembly-line style while strangers stand around and watch.

They also didn't like us using their pictures without consent. Somehow that sounds familiar. . . imagine that being a body part.

Thornhill is of the opinion that putting them on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory is defamation of character. There's nothing "misleading" here. Circumcision is a genital mutilation, and people that do it are genital mutilators – and practitioners of this on infants are the worst kind. Any "defamation of character" stems from their unethical actions – we just report it.

They conclude by asking Mike to remove their names and photos from his website to which he refuses, and in his reply gives them notice of his plan to protest outside the clinic as he has done recently in Parliament Square. As Mike has no direct connection with neonatalcutting.org, he has no control over what is published there, and as of now Mike is the only one that has been contacted by any Thornhill associate.

On March 22, Justice for Men and Boys and Men Do Complain plan to protest in front of the Thornhill's Circumcision Centre to inform the public, the government, and the medical establishment about the horrors being done to infant boys. At the protest, perhaps the Thornhill circumcisers can come out and explain how what they do isn't harmful and unethical, especially in light of recent findings by the AAP that procedures such as circumcision should not be done on infants.

Stay tuned here and at j4mb.wordpress.com for info about upcoming protests and Thornhill's attempts to defend and expand their backwards and barbaric practices using blood money from thousands of mutilations. And there's nothing "misleading or factually incorrect" about that.

Update: local media in Luton has picked up the story on the heels of the protest on March 22:

http://www.lutontoday.co.uk/news/health/health-news/private-clinic-facing-protest-over-circumcision-row-1-7264622

Yvain & Gawain: men fighting for women should talk with each other

Douglas Galbi · 15 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Chrétien de Troyes's late-twelfth-century Arthurian romance Yvain: The Knight with the Lion, two sisters disputed their inheritance. The older sister sought to keep everything from their deceased father. To settle their dispute, the sisters induced Yvain and Gawain to fight each other in deadly combat. Yvain and Gawain had no stake whatsoever in the sisters' conflict. They were merely benighted knights serving women. Underscoring the folly of their combat, Yvain and Gawain seriously injured each other physically and then recognized each other as dear friends. They subsequently shifted to verbal combat, each seeking to declare himself defeated. The underlying cause of the debacle was men not talking with each other before fighting for women.

Just as did Lucretia at the founding of the Roman Republic and the choleric lover in the account of the Archpriest of Talavera, the older sister easily enlisted Gawain to fight for her. The older sister outraced the younger sister to King Arthur's court. The sisters' race to court emphasizes that the facts of the case, as in filing for ex parte domestic violence restraining orders, matters less than who shows up at court first. At King Arthur's court, the older sister argued her case to the eminent knight Gawain. He apparently didn't question or investigate her claims. He merely "bound himself to do as she wished." In short, Gawain acted like the manlet Lancelot.

Yvain, on the other hand, agreed to fight for the younger sister in response to a pretty messenger-girl's masterfully rhetorical speech. The girl rode for no more than a week on her quest to find Yvain for her lady. When she found him, she amalgamated her lady's searching with her searching in her address to him:

> My lord! I've sought you
> All over. The fame you've earned
> Has led me to hunt you, all wearily,
> Over many, many countries.
> I've sought you so long that, God
> Be thanked, I've finally found you. [1]

A celebrity probably wouldn't thank God for some crazed fan finally catching up with him. The messenger-girl told Yvain:

> I come to you from a woman

> Better than myself, nobler
> And braver. And if you fail her,
> It will be your fame that betrayed her,
> For she has no one else to help.

The messenger-girl constructed an obligation upon Yvain merely from his fame. Yvain was likewise obliged to help all women. That's an enormous burden that some men today imagine that they carry. The messenger-girl further elaborated:

> This lady, deprived of her entire > Inheritance by her sister, hopes
> To win her suit through you.

Her hopes imply Yvain's responsibilities. To make that relation more palatable, the messenger-girl emphasized that Yvain is special:

> You're the only one she wants.
> Nothing could ever persuade her
> That anyone else could help.

The messenger-girl, a heartfelt friend to the lady, made a strong case for her:

> You'll win the love of this friendless,
> Cheated woman, and vastly > Increase your renown, if you win her > Back what is rightfully hers!
> …
> Now tell me, please, if you dare
> To come as she asks, or if > You'll choose to say no and do nothing.

Given that appeal to fame and justice, with backing references to cowardice and laziness, what man wouldn't respond favorably to a pretty girl that he didn't know? To the girl's guile, Yvain responded with ironic no's and the earnest straightforwardness of a woman serving man:

> "No," he answered, "saying
> No wins no man fame.
> No more will I say no,
> But follow you, sweet friend!
> Gladly, wherever you please.
> And if she for whom you've sought me
> Truly needs me, have > No fear. Anything I'm able > To do for her, I'll do."

More enlightened knights would tell women to fight their own battles. They would simply say, "No."

King Arthur did nothing stop Yvain and Gawain from brutally assaulting each other. Arthur was formally king of both women and men. He judged that "justice and right" favored the younger sister. Yet he merely begged the older sister to let her younger sister have what was rightfully hers.[2] After stating that Yvain agreed to fight for her because he pitied her and felt sorry for her, the younger sister declared:

> "Surely," she said, "it saddens me
> That two knights the likes of these > Should fight because of us,
> And because of so slight a quarrel.
> But I can't give up my rights;
> My need is far too great.

She didn't know Yvain. She didn't even know his name.[3] She didn't pity him enough not to have him fight for her.

> And now they went at it for real.
> …
> And they hacked so hard at the other's > Neck, and nose-guard, and forehead,
> And cheeks, that both were purple
> And discolored, there under
> The skin where the blood had clotted.
> And their long coats of mail were torn,
> And their shields so broken up
> That both of them were wounded.
> And they fought so hard, and so fiercely,
> That both were panting and short
> Of breath, as the battle went on.
> Every jewel set
> In their helmets was crushed to powder,
> Smashed to bits, as the blows
> Crashed on their heads, both of them > Stunned, their brains nearly beaten > out.

Yvain and Gawain were like two fighting dogs on whom the sisters had placed bets and set at each other. Amid the brutal violence between the two men, the crowd exclaimed:

> This is no game.
> These two are fighting in earnest.
> But how could they ever be paid
> What they're worth, and what they deserve?

A start would be to respect men's human dignity and not treat men as tools for women. Courtiers vainly sought to arrange peace between the two sisters, the principals of the fight:

> the older sister wanted
> No part of any peace.
> The younger one said she'd leave it
> To the king, and accept his judgment,
> Not quibbling whatever he decided,
> But the older was so malicious
> That even Queen Guinevere

> And all the knights and the king
> And the ladies and all the townsfolk
> Began to favor the younger,
> And went to the king, and begged him
> To give her at least a third
> Or a fourth of their father's estate,
> In spite of the older one's claim,
> And asked him to part the two knights,
> Who had shown such wonderful courage.
> What a shame it would be, they declared,
> If either were seriously hurt
> Or deprived of any honor.
> But the king said that peace
> Was not for him to establish;
> The older sister spurned it,
> For her spirit was mean.

Men rule societies with contempt for men's lives and on behalf of women's narrow interests.

The brutal violence ended through Yvain speaking to Gawain. With blood boiling out of their many wounds and running down their mail-coats, the Knights separated to rest for awhile. Yvain spoke in a hoarse and feeble voice to the other knight:

> Night approaches.
> No one, I think, will blame
> Or reproach us if darkness keeps us
> Apart. And I will admit
> That I fear and value you immensely.
> Never in all my life
> Have I fought so painful a battle,
> Nor have I ever seen
> A knight I so much wanted
> To know. You know how to strike
> Your blows, and you use them well.
> No knight I've ever known
> Can fight so punishingly. I had no > Desire to spend this day
> Experiencing the blows you've given me.
> You've half addled my head.

Gawain responded:

> You're no more exhausted and stunned
> Than I am, and perhaps even less.
> And if I knew you, knight,
> I hope you'd not be displeased.
> And indeed, if I've given you anything
> You've paid me back in full,
> Principal and interest too.
> You were readier to pay me in kind

> Than I was anxious to receive it.
> But let that be as it will.
> And since you've asked me to tell you
> The name I go by, I'll not > Keep it hidden. My name
> Is Gawain, son of King Lot.

Yvain had said that he wanted to know the other knight. The other Knight, in turn, spoke only his name. That was enough. Yvain knew Gawain well:

> Wild with rage, he threw > his blood-covered sword to the ground,
> And then his cracked and shattered
> Shield after it, and dismounted
> From his horse, and approaching on foot
> He cried: "Dear God! What bad luck!
> What kind of stupid mistake
> Brought on this battle, neither
> Of us knowing the other.
> Had I known who you were, nothing
> Could have made me fight with you.

If men know each other, they are much less likely to fight with each other. Or at least, less likely to fight with each other in seriously damaging ways. After they had stopped mortally fighting, Yvain and Gawain began verbally jousting about who would claim defeat and give honor to the other. Finally showing some administrative skills, King Arthur then settled the sisters' dispute by guile — "fairly and also in good faith."[4]

Yvain and Gawain engaging in mortal combat to settle the sisters' dispute indicates social devaluation of men's lives. Earlier in the romance, a father agonized over choosing between his daughter being continually raped or four of his sons being killed.[5] Losing four persons' lives is obviously worse than losing one person's life. Agency — making the choice that causes terrible harm — complicates the choice. Gender is also relevant. In the U.S. today, about four men are killed through violence for every woman so killed. The U.S. has special, billion-dollar programs addressing violence against women while the much greater violence against men passes with scarcely any public notice.[6] Men need to talk with each other about violence against men. If men lack the courage to say no to fighting for women, they should just fight verbally to see which man can prevail in claiming self-defeat.

Notes:

[1] Chrétien de Troyes, Yvain: The Knight with the Lion, ll. 5059-64, from Old French trans. Raffel (1987) p. 151. All subsequent quotes from Yvain are from id. cited by line number. The sisters' father was Lord of Blackthorn. l. 4705.

The younger sister "traveled through many countries" in search of Yvain. ll. 4821-3. Then the younger sister became ill and "another young woman" (also referred to as a girl, e.g. l. 5813) carried on her quest. The account of the girl's travel suggests that she spent two days riding to find Yvain. ll. 4832-5040. The return trip apparently took seven days. l. 5814.

Here's an Old French text of Yvain. W.W. Comfort's English translation (1914) is available online here and here. Jocelin of Furness's twelfth-century Life of Kentigern is thought to have been a source for Chrétien's Yvain.

Subsequent quotes above are from ll. 5072-6 (I come to you…), ll. 5077-9 (This lady…), ll. 5080-2 (You're the only one…), ll. 5083-6, 5092-4 (You'll win the love…), ll. 5095-103 ("No," he answered…), ll. 5968-73 ("Surely," she said…), ll. 6117, 6125-42 (And now they…), ll 6162-5 (This is no game…), ll. 6170-92 (The older sister…), ll. 6238-52 (Night approaches…), ll. 6253-67 (You're no more exhausted…), ll. 6270-80 (Wild with rage…).

[2] Speaking of King Arthur, the narrator declares:

> for he held
> Her side {the younger sister's side} of the quarrel, because > He respected justice and right.

ll. 5928-30. That wasn't a difficult judgment. Before Yvain and Gawain fought, the younger sister stated that she sought nothing that was rightfully the older sister's. The older sister responded:

> "And I," said the other, "want nothing
> That's yours, for that's what you have
> And will have. No preaching will do it,
> For preaching will get you nothing.
> May your sadness dry you to dust.

ll. 5960-6. The older sister subsequently declared:

> "Anyone
> Who listened to you would be stupid.
> May I burn in the fires of hell
> If I give you anything for your comfort!
> The banks of the Seine will come > Together, and morning will be noon,
> If I don't make you do battle."

ll. 5976-5982. Of course, she was making Yvain and Gawain do battle. On King Arthur begging the older sister, ll. 4787-9.

[3] The younger sister described Yvain as he:

> Who for charity and noble generosity
> Has put himself at my service,
> Though he does not know me and I > Know neither his name nor him.

ll. 6987-90. Scholars have described Yvain's action as "courtly." Courtliness was a horrendous ideology that devalued and oppressed men.

[4] With appreciation for the value of guile:

> The king said he'd settle the quarrel
> Fairly and also in good faith.

ll. 6382-3. King Arthur craftily induced the older sister to admit that she:

> forcefully drove her sister
> From her lands, and disinherited her

> By force and evil intent

ll. 6385-7. Arthur then with a tactical ploy coerced the older sister to give back her younger sister's inheritance. ll. 6405-46. Men are typically inferior to women in guile. The older sister was unusually obtuse.

Like King Arthur in this particular instance, the lion who became Yvain's loyal friend acted with practical savvy to help Yvain. The story of a man winning the friendship of a lion by helping the lion was well known. Early versions were the story of Androcles in Aulus Gellius, Noctes Atticae 5.14 and Aesop's fable, "The lion and the shepherd." Stories of this type are classified as Aarne-Thompson-Uther type 156. In Jerome's Life of Paul, a lion helped to dig the grave for Paul.

[5] ll 3851-76. Harpin of the Mountain is the monster that offers the father the horrible choice. The father gives no indication of what his choice would be.

[6] Considering violence in Yvain, Ovens ignored gender and concluded:

> Violence, in either its presence or its absence, is not the primary phenomenological category in Yvain, and neither (perhaps) is it in medieval literature in general. Violence – physical violence – functions instead as a representation, the sign of a deeper conflict between virtue and vice, the righteous and the repugnant, the divine and the devilish.

Ovens (2015) p. 76. Violence against men caused medieval men to have a much shorter life expectancy than medieval women's life expectancy.

[image] Violent combat between Herr Walther von Klingen (f. 1240s–1280s) and another knight. Illustration from Codex Manesse, Zurich, made between 1305 and 1315. UB Heidelberg, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, fol. 52r. Thanks to University of Heidelberg and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Ovens, Michael. 2015. "Violence and Transgression in Chrétien de Troyes's Yvain, le Chevalier au Lion." Parergon. 32 (1): 53-76.

Raffel, Burton, trans. 1987. Chrétien de Troyes. Yvain, the Knight of the Lion. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Heroism and Gender

Tim Patten · 16 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

When a young woman is brutally gang-raped on a college campus, many men feel compelled toward bravery. Emboldened by courage, they will often challenge the perpetrators head-on, seeking justice for someone who may be a complete stranger. Such a response is called heroism, deeply valued across cultures.

More broadly, when men are confronted with dangerous situations, they will consider strategic and heroic actions aimed at creating desirable outcomes. It helps that most receive training early on–through sports, play fighting and teasing from peers–about how to think and act courageously, which serves to refine and strengthen their natural instincts. They learn to quickly calculate alternatives and solutions and act on that information to survive.

Still, not everyone responds this way, which raises the question of why some make the choice. History suggests that few of us wake up with the intention of being heroic; usually, things unfold spontaneously, a spur-of-the-moment decision. According to the dictionary, heroism is an instantaneous desire to help someone without expecting any financial or moral reward in return. It is a gift given unselfishly; its value is even greater when people place themselves in grave danger, risking their lives, regardless of the cost.[i]

Masculinity to the Rescue

Men have saved innumerable lives throughout history, perhaps from the very beginning of time. Following the sinking of the infamous Titanic, for example, reports indicate that only 19% of the men aboard survived, largely because hundreds of engineers and other males sacrificed their lives for the benefit of women and children passengers.[ii] For a great many men, such heroism comes automatically; it is an instinct they are born with.

There are numerous examples of just how brave and altruistic men can be. Recently, a sixty-one-year-old Brazilian homeless man, a victim of poverty and social oppression, rushed to save a woman he didn't know, sacrificing his own life in the process.[iii] Last year, a South Dakota firefighter overcame dangerous conditions to rescue a woman and her cat from a burning house.[iv] Before that, Carlos Arana, a firefighter from Valencia, Spain, performed mouth-to-mouth resuscitation on a two-month-old Yorkshire terrier,[v] causing eyes to water (and tugging at our heartstrings). In 2005, California Highway Patrolman Kevin Briggs stopped a distraught 22-year old father of a newborn child from jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge.[vi] In Afghanistan, two brave soldiers confronted suicide bombers and saved colleagues' lives.[vii]

These and countless other episodes make it clear that most men are born with empathy and a deep-rooted concern for others that repeatedly facilitates their transformation into everyday superheroes, where they perform life-saving miracles for no other reason than that it is the right thing to do.

Sadly, the fact that so many will readily step in and help those who are being victimized is often overshadowed by reckless claims that males, generally speaking, are responsible for violence around the globe. Many college-level women's studies devotees maintain that masculinity is violent and oppressive by definition. In contrast to what numerous female academics say, masculinity has proven, time and again, to be an incredible gift to society.

Women and Heroinism

It is ironic that women, many of whom seem to lack the life-saving trait, are often quick to manipulate men into heroic behavior. Certainly, there are vast numbers of females who have saved the lives of children, often driven by maternal instincts. There are also accounts of women–doctors and nurses–who went beyond the call of duty to help others. But for most females, dangerous situations and loud noises–and men–are unsettling and immobilizing. They might respond with words, but they often go running for safer spaces.

In the aftermath of a house fire or similar tragedy, for example, it is not all that odd to hear a man say, "I saw women stand around crying in hysterics while valuable minutes were slipping away. Another guy and I ran in and did what we had to help those who were in trouble."

Not surprisingly, most people believe that the feeling of “terror” is more common in women than men,[viii] and that many females have the “poor princess syndrome,” where they anxiously wait for a knight in shining armor to rescue them.[ix]

It’s been said that if a woman who has been sexually assaulted comes forward and tells her story, she is heroic. But in reality, this act can really only be considered brave or courageous. In fairness, the difference between the concepts is probably misunderstood by most people. It’s not heroic, for instance, for someone to witness a car accident and dial 911 for help. That’s just good citizenship. But to crawl into a crumpled, burning car and pull someone out, at considerable risk to life and limb? That’s heroism.

Male Disposability

There are other areas of life where the distortions of gender-twisted thinking are rampant. If the U.S. homeless population was entirely female, it is unlikely that there would be a “homelessness” problem. Rather, those unfortunate feminine souls would have access to incredible shelters, much like those set up for battered women. Aside from providing clean, decent housing, those facilities feed, counsel and educate the clients they exclusively serve.

But that is not what we see in a downtrodden part of society that is, unfortunately, dominated by men. In a sexist world, masculinity is unworthy of such humane and caring treatment. In fact, male lives often seem to have little value. Over the next 20 years, for example, a team of 8,000 men will be exposed to deadly radiation as they work to disarm and remove melted fuel from Japan’s Fukushima power plant, which suffered a triple meltdown following the 2011 tsunami. How many will become diseased or die as a result?

Cynically, some might say that if the Catholic Church had been protecting and covering up for priests that had actually molested ten thousand little girls, instead of boys, on an almost daily basis, the organization would be thoroughly destroyed by now, its pedophiles and other members imprisoned or dead.

Boys and Men Are Stereotyped

Boys and men are stigmatized, marginalized and penalized by for being born male. They are also held to a double standard. Society seems happy to take advantage of them, capitalizing on their eagerness to help others or throw themselves at a challenge. When men grow up, they are relegated to risky and often deadly occupations; they dominate the front lines of societal conflict and war. Some might deny that our world rests on the premise of “women and children first,” but a cold, hard look at reality quickly refutes this idea.

The truth is, women almost always assume that men will save them and bear what may be a hefty cost. They use males to do the heavy lifting and then dispose of them when they are satisfied. Where are the calls for equality when human life and survival are at stake? Nowhere, it seems. Males are disposable, and women are indispensable. There is no equality: women are on a pedestal, coddled from birth to death.

Toxic Femininity Exploiting Heroism

When a woman seeks to exploit a man she smiles, flicks her hair, or gives him a peck on the cheek. Most men respond accordingly: they want to buy her gifts, shower her with attention, and take care of her for the rest of her life. Such feelings are, however, obsolete relics of our hunter-gatherer past, harkening back to a time when men were, by nature, designed for protection. And yet, modern women continue to deploy these manipulative tactics on a regular basis. In fact, it isn’t only them who take advantage in this way; businesses also use females to tap into the male wallet.

This toxic femininity, where women manipulate men with charm and sexuality, permeates our world. Female infants and girls learn to manipulate fathers, uncles, and men from early on.[x] If she cries for help, daddy comes to the rescue. If she gives dad an ultimatum, he quickly succumbs. From the day girls are born, they embrace the tenets of male subjugation and abuse. As they grow up, most become learned master-manipulators, withholding what men desire most and giving in only when there is an exchange they deem worthy. For the majority of women, life with men is a simple repertoire of basic manipulations.

Arguably, some are fairly harmless. Few people will likely find fault with requests for help in fixing a leaky toilet or avoiding the abusive words of a barroom troublemaker. But when it comes to the sorts of manipulations that lead to male violence and death, or which contribute to the pain that males suffer from domestic violence or in other settings, such enticements are undoubtedly wrong. Moreover, while many women are quick to allege–and college-level women's and gender studies programs are narrowly focused on–violence against women, they ignore equally disturbing concerns about male suicide and rape, and violence against men.

A Male Revolution

Now, though, men realize that a rigged and biased game is afoot.[xi] They are stepping off treadmills and pulling noses from grindstones, and taking a serious look at the ugly gender politics that is all around them. A hurricane of awareness is circling the planet, helping men to recognize manipulation and resist heroics based on exploitation. Whether they are coal miners, office workers, artists, fathers or students, they are embracing the modern–and amazing–masculinity.

Using the power of the Internet, a growing number of young men are sharing and collaborating with millions of like-minded individuals to readjust the trajectory of their lives. Brimming with pride, the enlightened among them are channeling their innate heroism to raise awareness and empower others to free themselves like they have and become the most remarkable and resourceful beings on Earth.

Gloria Steinem once said to her female minions, "Without leaps of imagination, or dreaming, we lose the excitement of possibilities. Dreaming, after all, is a form of planning." [xii] But her statement seems especially relevant to today's male. Around the globe, men are taking these thoughts to heart, casting off behaviors that have outlived their usefulness and freeing themselves from abusive patriarchy. Many are seeking to understand their self-defeating motivations and behaviors and are dreaming of a time when they cut through the shroud of exploitation and focus on their own goals and happiness.

Everywhere one looks, a wave of consciousness is washing ashore: men are going their own way (MGTOW), discovering online communities and growth. Among them, Warren Farrell's White House Council on Boys and Men[xiii] is making significant political headway (sign the petition here), while the academic New Men's Studies[xiv] is playing an energetic role in leading boys and men out of the darkness.

*****

Citations:

[i] http://psychology.about.com/od/socialpsychology/a/the-psychology-of-heroism.htm

[ii] http://news.nationalpost.com/news/titanic-anniversary-is-a-man-brave-or-condescending-if-he-lets-women-and-children-go-first

[iii] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/entry/homeless-man-saving-hostage-victim_us_55f06cdbe4b093be51bd1940

[iv] http://abcnews.go.com/US/body-camera-shows-police-saving-woman-cat-house/story?id=32031418

[v] http://sfglobe.com/?id=18667

[vi] http://www.cracked.com/article_20680_6-unassuming-people-who-casually-saved-hundreds-lives.html

[vii] https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/checkpoint/wp/2015/11/13/two-men-confront-suicide-bombers-and-save-lives-only-one-gets-a-medal-of-honor/

[viii] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/snow-white-doesnt-live-here-anymore/201109/womens-fears-vs-mens-fear s-part-2

[ix] http://www.phrases.org.uk/meanings/knight-in-shining-armour.html

[x] http://thoughtcatalog.com/michele-danno/2014/02/dont-date-a-girl-with-daddy-issues/

[xi] http://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/evolutionary-analysis-devalues-men-relative-to-women/

[xii] http://www.brainyquote.com/quotes/authors/g/gloria_steinem.html

[xiii] http://www.warrenfarrell.name/

[xiv] http://www.newmalestudies.com/OJS/index.php/nms/about/editorialTeam

My beloved friend has died, but his spirit lives on

Aine Hee von Sax · 16 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Someone I have come to dearly love has passed away from this world, this morning, the morning of me sitting here and typing this down. The pain is unbearable, but another friend suggested to me to write about him, to share my grief, as it is not just a personal loss, but also reaches out and touches the wider issues we these days face as humanity together.

When I moved here, it was once again a new country for me, a new environment, new people. Despite this being a very slim populated area, still there are other humans around, and I was scared of what reception I would receive, whether I would be accepted or rejected and whether I would be able to cope with everything ahead of me, the practical as well as the emotional. It was a time of a great turmoil and many worries for me, as new beginnings tend to be, even though I had chosen it just this way.

The first time I met my neighbour, he puttered up the dirt road with his old worn and beaten little tractor, and I was worried, as usually not many find their way up to where I live, and I feared it may be someone not happy with a stranger having moved into the area. I walked over to the tractor, after it had pulled into my yard, and found a thin man with a truly weathered face at its wheel, white hair and a straw hat. He told me his name, then began almost to batter me with warnings, most of which I could not even understand, as he spoke fast and with a thick and to me back then still alien accent. I was quite taken aback, as I didn't know this man at all, and he seemed very forceful and opinionated. I was also groaning inside, as I thought I had ended in some neighbour's war or what not, not fully able to make sense of everything he spoke to me in that frightful insistence of his.

When he finally decided to leave, I felt relief and just hoped I'd never meet him again. Not able to judge what he was about, mainly having felt quite intimidated. Of course, he was a neighbour, and even if being neighbours here can mean more distance than in a city or town, it was clear and inevitable that I would meet him again, many more times in fact, and what a blessing for my life, what a gift, that I did!

Many an evening since that scary first encounter, he and I came to laugh about my first impression of him. During those evenings where we would sit next to his roaring fireplace, in his old traditional cottage, where the bare stones were showing on the wall and all those many little ornaments he had collected and loved so much, were listening to our ramblings. There wasn't a free space anywhere on the shelves, even the ceiling held hooks from which cups and ornaments hang, and he always had a pot of stew brewing, next by that fire, and everyone walking into his home would be offered a meal, and many of us walked in and out of his home, because it was a warm and welcoming place. That frightening man had in fact grown to become one of the best friends of my life.

My neighbour had not known a good marriage; he and his ex-wife had parted on very bad terms, and I also still remember those evenings when he told me about all the things which had hurt him, silent tears running over his weathered cheeks, which he defiantly tried to wipe away. He was no angel, he had his flaws, sometimes he was moody, often stubborn, and I am sure he had not always been easy to live with either, but he was overall a wonderful human being, and I would reach for his hand and hold it gently. Usually, he'd come to finish with saying that it was no use to look back, but rather to focus on the present and future, and on the wonderful friends he had, and I felt honoured beyond measure that life had allowed me to be one of them. His main saying was 'giving is living, and grabbing is dying'. I can not count how often he spoke it, but he also loved to say 'oh bollocks,' or 'what a shite', and when I close my eyes, I see his smirk and his wink. He was always full of mischief, but also smart and full of stories about his childhood and life overall.

Christmas before last (Christmas gone, he was already in the hospital), he wanted to know what I would like him to buy me. I told him I did not wish anything bought, but that I'd much prefer for him to make me something, and this he came to do, he made me a hiking stick. From cutting the wood to cleaning it, carving and polishing it, it was all his work, but he felt embarrassed that it was not posh, not fanciful, had not cost any money.. until I told him I thought it was one of the most amazing gifts I had ever received, and he saw the truth of this in how my eyes and my face had lit up, while holding his precious gift tight and close. We both felt the greatest joy, and that stick remains with me, and shall do so for as long as I shall still live in this world.

My workshop is still not set up, it is in the planning as lots of other stuff had priority, so I could not make him what I had wanted to make for him, but whenever I was out and about, and I saw something I knew would make him smile, I bought it for him. Little things, not expensive stuff, just little tiny things that can say 'I have thought of you, and I love you'.

Now death has taken this wonderful beloved friend from me and others. A man who had worked hard all his life (he was in his late sixties) who could build a house from scratch, always knew a solution to a problem, never shied wind nor rain, and whose honesty and integrity have been a shining light in this often so sad and insane world. As individuals, he and his wife had been ill suited to each other, from all I could gather, and much hurt had come from it, as it can happen among humans, but the man I came to know, enriched my life beyond all measures. He was male, very much a so, sometimes a giggling boy, sometimes a philosopher, sometimes a man who could grunt and swear, but never a rapist and never an oppressor, instead always worth knowing, even at his worst.

There are those out there, who will reject others purely due to whether they were born a male or a female, and those who have lost all ability to meet and greet another human being with respect, warmth and care. They try to teach us to see gender and based on this to determine another's worth or another's inner nature. But even those who are not that extreme, often these days find their lives ruled by misgivings, only ever considering their own hurt, their own point of view. Many certainly in this world do not seem able any more to understand that giving indeed means living a life full of joy, where we see lit up eyes and faces, while grabbing kills warmth and kindness, and leads us to live in a cold empty world, filled with things that stand for nothing beyond their price tag, while leaving us bereft of all which truly matters.

On my friend's behalf, I wish to remind everyone that life is not endless. We are only given a certain amount of time, and once the seconds have ticked away, it is too late to go back. I doubt his wife ever understood how much hurt she had truly caused him. I am certain he did cause her hurts too. Human interactions can be like that, but because men usually do not show their pains as open, because they do not cry out loud as women do, instead battling to hold it in until they can no longer hold it, and it comes to flow as silent tears from their eyes during an evening by the fireplace.. we often don't think they can hurt as deeply as women do. It is this misunderstanding of men's endurance, an endurance they get taught early by our societies, which leaves them so vulnerable to abuse, as no one cares, as no one sees their pains in the open.

My friend's former wife came to his bedside in these last days; I was told that she did, and I can only hope that she held his hand and stroked it gently, after more than two decades where they had clung to their hurts and resulting hate. I hope she remembered all that he had given to her, from the house I know he had built for her with his own hands (and whose kitchen she felt he had made too small) to the money he had brought home so they could eat and heat.

While he was lying there, battling for the little bit of life he had left, I hope she realized he needed love and warmth from her, not more accusations and lists of where he could have done better, and I truly hope she found ways to show him that needed love and caring warmth.

While I sit here crying, struggling to type, blinded by my own tears, looking ahead and knowing I will miss him so very much. I also think of how time truly knows equality, as it is ticking away for men and women indiscriminately, and it does not wait for us to learn our lessons before it is too late.

Giving is living while still alive, and grabbing is dying long before our last breath. We know what hurt can do to us, and thus we should not ever carelessly bring hurt to others, as well as that we need to realize women don't suffer more, just because they often find it easier to show suffering, but that men deserve hands reaching for theirs just the same, while scared and in agony. Just because men are taught to be strong for us, should never mean that we forget that deep inside they feel just as we do.

My friend enriched the lives of those of us here beyond what I could ever press into words, and his passing lets us all feel the deepest of loss, but I hope his story can still help others out there, to learn before it is too late.

I know he'd love that, to still give to others, even after his leaving this world. He was just that special, that beautiful, that precious a human and a man, who had shelves full of little ornaments, right next to his chainsaws and tools, and while he knew how to dust the ornaments with greatest of caution and care, he also knew how to wield those tools with the utmost strength and life-long experience.

A place in our midst has been left empty, and the world as a whole is poorer for it, because of you my friend, having left it…

KSU Student Carlynn Sharpe, Co-president of YESbody!

AVfM Video Source · 17 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This interview brings up questions on how we can cross the divide with these young College Feminists and Men's Rights Advocates. What are your thoughts? EDs

Kennesaw State University student Carlynn Sharpe, co-president of YESbody! discusses her view of the Kennesaw State University Men (KSUM, now known as Zen Men) at the conference "Male Students in Peril" on November 1, 2014.

If you enjoy these videos please subscribe to StudioBrule's YouTube channel.

Adopting can be the smart choice for fathers

Hopeland Cash · 17 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Not everyone has strong parental aspirations. For some, children are a must to have the life they want. For others, children are a bland or even frightening idea. If you do want children, though, the drive to have a family can be extremely strong, but for men fatherhood can be a risky undertaking. Fulfilling, absolutely, but at the same time very difficult to control.

Men's parental rights stand in stark contrast to those of women. Radically unequal custody, staggering rates of fatherlessness, and the mental anguish of child and fathers separated from each other all attest to the fact that fathers are not respected as a member of the family by modern society. This unbalanced and gynocentric approach to the family has been legally codified on some level at least since the early 19th-century and has only been worsened by growing cultural misandry. Fathers are deemed superfluous and interchangeable, one man being as good a "father figure" as any other.

What, then, is a man dreaming of fatherhood to do? There are no "single fathers by choice" except via surrogacy. To father a child, a man needs the mother's ongoing and enthusiastic consent because from conception through to birth; mothers are given every opportunity to opt-out while father's options are limited to condoms, vasectomies, and vows of chastity. Add no-fault divorce, pro-mother court bias and unenforceable visitation, and father's rights are left up to the child's mother.

That isn't to say men should never reproduce conventionally. Most children—if only by a disturbingly slim margin—have a healthy, active relationship with their father, at least on a national average; in some communities, especially African-American, a man is betting against the house if he hopes to live with his children. I'll leave it at calling the prospect chancy and let individual men decide if they want to take that risk.

What I really want to address in this article is the topic of single men adopting children to raise by themselves. The preamble above was to set the backdrop against which men have to make the decision of how to become fathers, and why adoption can be a controversial but smart option.

When thinking of adoption, many people picture a man and a woman—often older or sterile—taking in a child when they can't have one of their own. Single individuals adopting doesn't tend to fit the mold, and even more so when it's a man. When I propose the idea, most people react with confusion, wondering why a single man wouldn't just find a nice girl to settle down with and have a family. Single motherhood by choice—a woman intentionally becoming pregnant without the involvement of the father—is becoming more culturally acceptable. Many people nod in understanding at such a decision, sympathizing with "how hard it is to find a good man" and with the woman's biological drive to have a family.

Men, though, lack the biological capacity to have a child alone (post-conception). Why, then, has adoption by single men not seen a rise in acceptance matching that of single mothers? It comes down to a lack of empathy: the public has consumed the message of the challenges faced by single mothers and is willing to accept that a woman might need to go it alone in order to do it at all. Fathers, however, are held to a much higher standard. The barriers to parenthood faced by men are overlooked, ignored, and sometimes actively reinforced by wider society. If a man wants a family he needs a woman, and that means meeting her every demand—when it comes to children, the buck stops at Mom. For most people there is no scenario in which a man is justified in intentionally becoming a single parent. The usual assumption is that if he can't get a woman he must be a loser. Inversely and symmetrically, a woman who becomes a single mother can't find any man who isn't a loser.

Luckily, the tide is shifting. More and more people are aware of the injustices faced by fathers, but change can't come soon enough. For many men—young, middle-aged and older—fatherhood is a core life goal, but a domestic partnership is risky enough to make them stop and think. This is where adoption becomes a good option; if a man has the necessary funds and residence he can adopt a child to raise on his own. Is it in the best interests of the child?

Children raised by single parents suffer on many metrics of life happiness and success, but they still fare much better than in foster homes or orphanages; and the very act of choosing to adopt means the father has made a conscious choice to undertake parenting, hopefully demonstrating good responsibility.

There are more children in need of adoption than there are adoptive parents, so I fully support any fit adult choosing to adopt. There aren't any legal barriers to a single man adopting though I'm sure some men go up against personal biases in the vetting process. As with any non-traditional life style choice, the lack of social acceptance can be off-putting to adoptive fathers. Why, though, do so few people understand why a man might want to forgo traditional family in favor of adopting? The willful ignorance surrounding father's rights is staggering, but the topic of adoption offers a prime opportunity to illustrate the plight of fathers and why some men want to go it alone. There is a stark contrast between the rights of men in mother-father pairs and those who adopt alone, and a brief thought experiment inverting them can show the difference:

Let's imagine a different kind of adoption process. For the sake of this exercise, only men can apply. When one does, he has to select an "adoption overseer". There are lots of overseers, millions in fact, and he can approach any overseer he likes. It's up to the overseer, though, whether or not to take on the man as a client. This overseer has complete discretion to decide if the man will be allowed to adopt. She sets her own criteria and can turn him away at any point, no refund provided. Of course, the man can try as often as he wants.

Once a man finds a friendly overseer and wins her over, he gets to adopt. Presto, he's a father! He has a son or daughter to raise and love, to give everything to and do everything for. The overseer's still there, though. In a sense the child isn't even the father's; Junior is really just loaned to the father because the overseer can revoke the adoption at any point. Based on a whim, on new-found dislike for the father, on thinking another man would be more fit, the overseer can cancel the adoption and take the child away. No proof required, no show of unfitness. The man can appeal—if he has the money—but the odds aren't good. He's got no guarantee of maintaining contact and the judges almost always side with the adoption overseer. Even if he does win some partial retention of parental rights, there's no enforcement of them or punishment for thwarting them.

If adoptions were like that, if an adoptive parent were at the near-total mercy of the personal feelings of one individual overseer with no accountability, how many people would go through with it? How many men would say "That shit's crazy" and just walk away?

The reality of father's rights is even worse, though. Extending the thought experiment, imagine if, after opening negotiations with an adoption overseer, she could force the man to adopt even if he changes his mind? It goes on and on, beyond what anyone would believe in a thought experiment. The reality of fathers' lack of rights is far stranger than any piece of fiction can express.

Yeah, that shit's crazy, and that's why fewer and fewer men are willing to marry. A lot of them, though, still want to be fathers and adoption will become an increasingly appealing option. If you manage to adopt, you only have to answer to adoption agencies and Child Protective Services, and at least, they have some accountability and regulation. Are CPS agencies without fault? Absolutely not. In some states, they're coming under investigation for misconduct, and they can and do abuse parents' rights. But are they better than betting your family on the Russian roulette of family courts? I say absolutely. Men need to be able to be parents on their terms, to embrace their own, personal brand of fathering with confidence. No one's child should be able to be taken away based on another person's feelings, but that's exactly what family law does. No need for demonstration of unfitness, no enforcement of rights.

The sad truth is that a father is only considered a real parent if he's the only parent.

Author's Note: This article is not meant to provide legal advice or information on the adoption process. Each state, province, and country has its own laws regarding adoption, and a would-be parent should always research the requirements in their region before deciding whether or not to pursue adoption.

IQ studies, faulty research and MSM bias

Koba Lashki · 17 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In 2012, there was a short media furor surrounding the scientifically dubious pronouncement that women had, for the first time, 'overtaken men on IQ tests'. Not only did this claim defy mainstream orthodoxy in the literature, it actually significantly misrepresented the results of the study that it purported to reference. The study in question was one by the controversial psychometrician Jim Flynn, who stated that rather than women having surpassed men on 'IQ tests,' they roughly matched them on a single test known as 'Raven's Progressive Matrices.' Something else that the (largely US) media neglected to mention was that the tests were taken in four countries other than the US or Canada. Specifically, they were conducted in Australia, New Zealand, White South Africa, Estonia, and Argentina[1 2]. This study was actually something of an outlier among the contemporary psychometric pattern of results: in the words of Dr. Satoshi Kanazawa of the London School of Economics[3], an esteemed iconoclast,

> Studies with large representative national samples from Spain, Denmark, and the United States, as well as meta-analyses of a large number of published studies throughout the world, all conclude that men on average are slightly but significantly more intelligent than women, by about 3–5 IQ points. So this has now become the new (albeit tentative) consensus in intelligence research.

Indeed, recent studies routinely support this conclusion, which was brought to light by Professor Richard Lynn of Ulster University. He has stated that he was compelled to investigate the matter once discovering research proving that males have a larger brain-to-body ratio[4]. It was already firmly established that this ratio correlates highly with intelligence, so Lynn was left with a dilemma to solve. After poring over the relevant literature for some months, he came to the conclusion that males don't score any higher on intelligence tests until roughly the age of 16, at which point they gain an advantage of 4 points or so. The vast majority of studies have since confirmed this or have even shown a male advantage in not just adulthood, but also childhood and early adolescence. Lynn laid out his original findings in a 1994 study[5]. After that, he encountered this same result multiple times, in many different countries[6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16]. Since Lynn's finding, many other researchers have bolstered his evidence with subsequent papers[17 18 19 20 21 22]. Indeed, more again have been produced since 2010, reflecting studies from a variety of countries[23 24 25 26 27]. What more does one need to say after having been presented with 23 recent, high-quality research papers? Funnily enough, none of these have had much media coverage, unlike those mentioned above, grossly misrepresented Flynn study. Go figure.

The jury is still out on the question of why males consistently score higher on intelligence tests. Explanations tend to delve into inferences from evolutionary psychology, such as the proposition from Professor Lynn himself that the higher male ability derives from adaptations to the more historically demanding role of hunting and ensuring the safety of a tribe[28]. Other suggestions have been made by academics such as Dr. Kanazawa, who actually lays out several potential reasons in a single research thesis[29]. His ideas are related to the consistent psychometric finding that taller individuals are more intelligent than those less tall; of course, this would have collective ramifications upon men and women. His given causes for the intelligence disparity are as follows:

> (1) assortative mating of intelligent men and beautiful women, (2) assortative mating of tall men and beautiful women, (3) an extrinsic correlation between height and intelligence produced by Mechanisms 1 and 2, and (4) a higher-than-expected offspring sex ratio (more sons) among tall (and hence intelligent) parents.

So far, no consensus on why the higher male intelligence exists has been reached in the cognitive literature.

Regardless of the reasons for the sexual disparity, the fact remains that it definitely exists and has remained under the radar of the public eye, due to it having been determinedly neglected by the popular press. A common perception among the layman has been that IQ tests demonstrate a rough equality between the sexes, whereas in reality males have shown a superiority on swathes of tests for decades (as shown above). Sure, very occasionally a study will suggest a contrary result, typically found via poor samplings, such as those containing males below 16; for example, the Flynn as mentioned earlier study (lapped up by the media) utilized a selection of males aged 14-18. As Professor Richard Lynn and others have consistently demonstrated, however, a male advantage definitely emerges from the point of 16 by the latest and has persisted regardless of the efforts of idealogue researchers and journalists to obfuscate the issue. Furthermore, even large organizations involved with psychometrics admit that many IQ tests have been structured in such a way that there will be minimal differences between the sexes[30]. In spite of this partisan sabotage, however, the truth shines through on both heavily 'sex-normalized' tests (such as Raven's Progressive Matrices) and the few that also allow dimorphic functionality (such as the Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale), men outperform women. The doctrine of intellectual equality was, in the words of Dr. Kanazawa, 'manufactured out of political expediency (emphasis his)[3].'

To those of us who have studied psychometrics in depth, the above data are well known. Why then are single outlier studies chosen for public dissemination via the mainstream media? One cannot deny the selectivity of media reporting without being naïve or willfully disingenuous; you will never see, for example, such positivity from the media towards a study demonstrating the intellectual inferiority of a racial minority. If a single, small study showed results marginally in favor of blacks over whites, however? You can bet the media would have a jubilant field day with such 'evidence'.

As a group similarly perceived as being highly privileged, men are open season for all kinds of disparagement in the press, all ostensibly in the name of furthering an egalitarian agenda. Indeed, all feminist rhetoric carries with it implications of male inferiority in some form or another, usually moral but often intellectual and emotional. It is unclear whether the individuals responsible for such biased proclamations genuinely believe that they are somehow aiding female empowerment, or are simply venting their spleen against their 'hated oppressors.' What is clear, however, is that this inaccurate, degrading narrative from the MSM is an issue worth caring about. Men and boys are increasingly subject to demeaning, chauvinistic messages in their daily lives, which (through stereotype threat) have already impacted upon their studying, and can only worsen their mental health and, therefore, their already high suicide rates.

To a large degree, cultural narratives shape the society around them. Let us not let this bullshit narrative infect and, therefore, shape the society of tomorrow. And take it from me: it IS bullshit.

Citations:

1.https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/beautiful-minds/201207/men-women-and-iq-setting-the-record-straigh

2.https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PQNFOP8Uajw

3.https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/the-scientific-fundamentalist/200901/why-men-are-more-intelligent-women

4.http://www.amren.com/features/2016/02/interview-with-a-pioneer/

5.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/0191886994900302

6.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0191886997800219 (Japan)

7.https://www.researchgate.net/publication/242788102_Sex_differences_in_intelligence_and_brain_size_A_developmental_theory

8.https://www.researchgate.net/profile/Olev_Must2/publication/222565556_Sex_differences_in_brain_size_stature_and_intelligence_in_children_and_adolescents_Some_evidence_from_Estonia/links/00b7d5148515ec9b50000000.pdf (Estonia)

9.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0191886901001842 (South Africa)

10.http://journals.cambridge.org/action/displayAbstract?fromPage=online&aid=135605 (Hong Kong)

11.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0191886903000539

12.http://personal.lse.ac.uk/kanazawa/pdfs/PAID2011.pdf

13.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0191886903003593 (College students)

14.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289604000510 (Estonia)

15.http://www.uam.es/personal_pdi/psicologia/pei/download/Lynn2004.pdf

16.http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/16248939 (University students)

17.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S019188690400385X

18.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289609001160

19.https://www.researchgate.net/publication/257045466_Sex_differences_in_fluid_intelligence_Some_findings_from_Bosnia_and_Herzegovina(Bosnia and Herzegovina)

20.http://citeseerx.ist.psu.edu/viewdoc/download?doi=10.1.1.650.8324&rep=rep1&type=pdf

21.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289606001115

22.https://kclpure.kcl.ac.uk/portal/en/publications/sex-differences-in-variance-of-intelligence-across-childhood%28a815d2f0–6641–42f3-be36-f1a12e1ba4da%29.html

23.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0191886911002212 This was conducted in 2011, and uses a very carefully chosen standardization sample (stratified by demographic) of the US population.

24.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289612001274 Brazil, 2012

25.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289612001225?np=y Portugal, 2012

26.http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0160289615000185 Sudan, 2015

27.https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/25506114 China, 2015

28.http://www.dailymail.co.uk/debate/article-1274952/Men-ARE-brainy-women-says-scientist-Professor-Richard-Lynn.html

29.http://personal.lse.ac.uk/kanazawa/pdfs/ajp2009.pdf

30.https://www.mensa.ch/sites/default/files/Intelligence_Neisser1996.pdf

Fatherless families bring chaos

AVfM Video Source · 18 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Since 1965 fatherlessness has increased dramatically. As of 2010 black families were 53% fatherless, Hispanic 31% and whites 20%. When the Moynihan report was written in 1965, it was predicted that 25% fatherlessness in the black community would decimate their families. Now our national average is 33%.

Please subscribe to Men Are Good!

Feminism is about equality

AVfM Video Source · 20 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

WHY WOULD YOU BE AGAINST EQUALITY AND EQUAL REPRESENTATION IN IRRELEVANT IPHONE EMOTICONS???

Please support Shoe0nHead's YT Channel.

Just A Minute

Robert Brockway · 20 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Forced Labour Convention, dating from 1930, is one of the fundamental conventions of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) which is now a UN agency. The convention has been ratified by the bulk of the world's nations (although notably, not by The United States). The convention does an admirable job of limiting the use of forced or compulsory labour and how those forced to work against their will are to be treated. There is, however, one glaring flaw in the convention. Article 11 of the Convention states:

> Only adult able-bodied males who are of an apparent age of not less than 18 and not more than 45 years may be called upon for forced or compulsory labour.

The international community regards as acceptable the imposition of forced or compulsory labour on able-bodied adult men while excluding women from the same treatment. Although this was only intended to be a transitional phase before the complete abolition of forced or compulsory labour, it is still true today.

Article 10 and Article 14 allow for some forms of forced or compulsory labour to require payment in cash, but others do not. Thus, some forms of permitted forced or compulsory labour are in fact slavery. The convention allows a competent authority the right to use men for labour against their will without violating the principal international convention intended to suppress this very practice.

It's time for this gendered convention to be revised so that men are given the same right to protection from forced or compulsory labour that women are given.

Adultery punishments were gender-biased against men

Douglas Galbi · 20 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Everyone knows that a gender double standard in punishment for adultery has existed throughout history. For the same reason as for that gender double standard, almost everyone believes the double standard went against women. It didn't. With astonishing boldness in our era of Soviet-quality intellectual life, a recent scholarly study of early modern France declared:

> Whether a husband committed adultery or his wife did, the blame lay with the husband. … We usually think of premodern European adultery laws and the courts that applied these laws as intended to punish women's illicit sex while condoning men's illicit sex. This is not how late medieval courts operated. Instead, courts punished men for adultery, particularly husbands, while punishing only a fraction of female offenders. [1]

Research on punishment practices centuries ago is much more difficult than studying what's going on right now. The evidence for gender bias against men in criminal justice today is as overwhelming as the vastly disproportionate imprisonment of men. Compiling examples of grotesquely unequal justice under law by gender requires a wry sense of humor. Earnest scholars might ponder how modern scholars have misrepresented Blackstone's figure of coverture and ignored mass imprisonment of men for debt in early modern England.[2] Ordinary folk might just consider a story from medieval Latin literature.

A wise and powerful king had a beautiful daughter. He was very fond of her. Exploiting the socially devalued lives of ordinary men, the king ordered five men (soldiers) to protect her:

> he charged them, under the heaviest penalties, to preserve her from every possible injury. The soldiers were on guard night and day. Before the door of her bed-chamber they suspended a burning lamp so that the approach of an intruder might be more easily detected. They similarly kept a dog, whose bark was loud and piercing, to rouse them from sleep. [3]

Putting aside her father's loving concern for her safety, the young lady sought the pleasures of the world. Her chance came when a Duke passing by noticed her beauty. He amorously proposed to her. She readily agreed. She killed the guard dog, put out the watch lamp, and at night escaped with the Duke. She was a strong, independent woman who undoubtedly played well the game of seduction.

Punishment of the runaway woman and man differed characteristically by gender. A white knight like Lancelot and today's benighted manlets hunted down the fugitives:

> A battle speedily ensued, in which the champion triumphed, and decapitated the seducer on the spot. The lady he conveyed back to the palace

In an adulterous affair, the man gets castrated or killed. The woman gets forgiven. So it was in this story. The woman married a powerful nobleman. She received many gifts and pious advice from her father and others. She lived out the rest of her days in peace as a married woman. Occasionally she surely recalled her few pleasurable nights fondly with her duke-lover who had been decapitated for his sexual offense with her.[4]

The most important challenge isn't to understand the historical truth. It's to change present injustice.

Notes:

[1] McDougall (2014) pp. 208, 225.

[2] Imprisonment of men for debt (inability to pay "child support" arrears) still exists in the U.S. today. However, most persons now in prisons and jails are being held for criminal offenses.

[3] Gesta Romanorum, Tale1 ("Of Love"), from Latin trans. Swan & Hooper (1876) pp. 1-3. I've made non-substantial changes in the translation for more fluent reading. The subsequent quote is from id. p. 2.

[4] The woman who committed adultery was significantly punished in some instances. For example, in the Latin Arthurian romance Arthur and Gorlagon, the adulterous woman was required to kiss the bloody, decapitated head of her lover. In Gesta Romanorum, Tale 56, the head of a woman's decapitated lover similarly served as an instrument of her punishment. Trans. id. pp. 93-5. The gender bias in punishment (who is killed) is clear in both stories.

[image] Salome with the Head of John the Baptist. Caravaggio, 1607. Held in National Gallery, London. Thanks to Web Gallery of Art and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

McDougall, Sara. 2014. “The Opposite of the Double Standard: Gender, Marriage, and Adultery Prosecution in Late Medieval France.” Journal of the History of Sexuality. 23 (2): 206-225.

Swan, Charles, and Wynnard Hooper, trans. 1876. Gesta romanorum: entertaining moral stories. New York: Dover Publications Inc. (reprint edition of 1969).

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Say my name...

AVfM Video Source · 21 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Straughan takes on Cenk Uygur and Ana Kasparian hosts of The Young Turks in their post-International Women's Day man hating diatribe.

Please support Karen Straughan's YT channel.

Passive activism: The feminist default

Doug Mortimer · 21 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Last December I was pleasantly surprised when I received my annual tax bill from Dallas County. Wondering how much they wanted to charge me for the privilege of living in my own home in 2015, I opened the envelope and discovered that my tax bill had shrunk to almost zero. My new senior citizen exemption, when added to my standard homestead exemption for my modest residence, all but zeroed out my tax liability; my tax bill dropped from $1,600 to $70.

Well, the senior citizen exemption was apparently designed to protect retired people living on reduced incomes. No one wants to see old folks evicted from their homes because they can't afford to pay their taxes. So the policy makes sense.

But I'm still working full-time. In truth, I can afford to pay my tax bill this year as easily as I did last year or the year before, or every year going all the way back to when I first bought the house. So in the interest of fairness and social justice, I wrote a check for $1,600 to Dallas County anyway.

Yeah, right.

I relate this personal anecdote as an introduction to the topic of passive or default feminism. It's human nature to go along with what benefits you. For almost all people at all times in history, life is hard, so anything that ameliorates the human condition – or more to the point, your human condition – is desirable. If you don't watch out for your own self-interest, by definition, nobody else can.

In my case, Dallas County didn't respond to my pleas for tax relief because I didn't make any. If the powers that be want to assume I am underprivileged because of my age, I'll not argue with them. Clearly, I will be in a privileged situation till I choose to retire. In the meantime, don't expect me to check my privilege. It wouldn't be in my self-interest.

By extension, in the realm of identity politics, it's unrealistic to expect any identifiable group to advocate anything that goes against its own interests. But it's considered bad form for a "privileged" group to promote a policy that enhances its own self-interest. Tribes that are classified as victimized or protected classes are given more leeway.

Of course, which groups are privileged and which are underprivileged is a matter of perception, opinion, or habit. Groups and individuals who complain the most are not necessarily the ones who have the most to complain about. The squeaky wheels get all the grease, at least up to the point the wheels slide off and everything grinds to a halt.

For so-called oppressed groups, it's good public relations to have outliers advocating for your tribe, so your advocacy doesn't appear too self-serving. Denying your self-interest is the ultimate form of virtue signaling. That's one reason the presence of manginas is so important to feminism. On the other hand, the presence of female MRAs is a big PR boost to the manosphere, accusations of internalized misogyny notwithstanding.

While it is helpful to have outsiders playing an auxiliary role in identity politics, it is even more important to wrap some social justice justification around a group's advocacy policies. You know the drill, feminism will benefit men as well as women. Not just in our society, but globally! It's a win-win situation! So how can you be against it?

Well, one of the tenets of realpolitik is that there are no laws or policies that are good for everyone. Some individuals and groups will always benefit more than others. So whenever a politician or spokesman asserts that a new law or policy is good for all of us, beware.

The overwhelming majority of people are not activists, political junkies, or policy wonks. They are too busy living their lives and would prefer to be left alone. As Thomas Jefferson put it in The Declaration of Independence, "mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed." In other words, inertia is the default.

Sometimes, however, those evils grow to be insufferable because the minority of people who are activists, political junkies, or policy wonks get their way and gain power over the masses, thus prodding them to push back.

The case of feminism is a curious one, since half of humanity is female, yet only a small minority of women identify as feminists. The majority of women don't stage violent demonstrations, propagate agitprop, or engage in guerilla theater, but they don't oppose any of the policies those activities promote. After all, those female-only scholarships or affirmative action policies or quotas might have helped them, or might help them some day. So a young woman will passively support feminism by doing nothing because it just might help her and couldn't possibly harm her, or could it? Remember, there is no social policy that benefits every group across the board, or every individual in an "official" oppressed group.

For example, imagine a young married woman hoping to start a family. Her husband is up for a big promotion but the big shots at his corporation have a – pardon the expression – gentleman's agreement that the job opening will be earmarked for a woman. So the hoped-for bump in family income doesn't happen, and the young married woman has to postpone that bundle of joy.

Or consider a woman married to a man falsely accused of sexual harassment in the workplace. He loses his job, immediately throwing family finances into chaos, perhaps long-term, depending on how long it takes him to find a comparable job.

Particularly instructive is the famous case of Judith Grossman, a New York lawyer whose college student son was accused of rape and denied due process. She came to the aid of her son but didn't stop there. Along with Allison Strange, Jean Barish, and Sherry Warner-Seefeld, she founded FACE (Families Advocating for Campus Equality). These three women also had sons who had fallen victim to the tyranny of feminism.

The tyrant's old excuse is "If you want to make an omelet, you have to break some eggs." Most women will respond to this Stalinist dictum with, "Not with my eggs!" In other words, not with my offspring. Feminism hurt the FACE founders individually by going after their eggs that had been fertilized and developed into young adult males. These women had a vested interest in the welfare of their sons, and maintaining (or enhancing) a vested interest is a powerful motivator.

A false accusation can get a beloved son kicked out of college and ruin his future job prospects, thus diminishing his ability to support a family. Even if a young man is vindicated, he will likely be wary of further involvement with women. Either way, the chances of his ever siring children will take a nosedive. Most mothers want to make the transition to grandmothers, and feminism is no help to them in this regard.

Also, the rah-rah women atmosphere at colleges has resulted in a majority of female students, which has hampered their campus social lives just when their sexual marketplace value is peaking. In a society obsessed with credentials, women who acquire the desired academic credentials will obtain more high-paying jobs, thus leaving fewer high-paying jobs for men.

To a great extent, family feasibility depends on a husband with resources or, at least, prospects of same. It's always been this way. For men, their income plays a significant role in their sexual market value; for women, their earnings is a minor (if not negative) aspect of their SMV. So as the prospects for women's professional lives soar, their prospects for a family life plummet. Older women desirous of grandchildren might want to rethink all that institutional feminism. The more men with good-paying jobs, the most potential husbands for their daughters, and the better their chances for grandchildren.

So how many individual women harmed by feminism does it take to cancel out the benefits they derive from being part of the collective? Feminism is far more helpful to well-connected, well-to-do, single, never-married, career women than to women wanting to get married and start families. I don't see any groundswell of young girls seeking to roll back feminism. Eventually, there may be a tipping point, say, a critical mass of unmarried, childless women who have discovered that working for a living isn't nearly as rewarding as they thought it would be. But for now, passive feminism rules.

And that brings us back to the issue of my privileged status regarding property taxes. My virtual removal from the property tax rolls for a year or two or three doesn't make much difference in local tax revenues since there are more than 2.5 million people in Dallas County. My contribution isn't even a drop in the bucket; it's more like a molecule. The future of Dallas County is not endangered.

But suppose half the taxpayers in the county enjoyed my privileged situation. Then the county is in trouble. And when society gives special privileges to half its members, i.e., females, then society is in trouble. Once granted, privileges are difficult to rescind, from groups or individuals.

For sure, I wouldn't be happy if Dallas County took away my privileged tax status. I guess I should feel guilty because I no longer pay my fair share to support the local public school system. Now my fellow taxpayers have to make up for my shortfall, and those social studies textbooks riddled with SJW propaganda aren't cheap.

Maybe that's why I don't feel guilty.

March 8 is a Soviet Bolshevik holiday

AVfM Video Source · 22 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

There is no connection whatsoever between the March 8 holiday and women in general. None. "International" Women's Day wasn't even that international when it was first adopted – but rather a local Bolshevik holiday for the USSR.

Lucian Vâlsan explores.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative here.

The Myth Of Sexual Harassment – The Fiamengo File Episode 17

AVfM Video Source · 22 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Janice Fiamengo addresses the sexual harassment hysteria plaguing the lives of civilized, level-headed people.

You can subscribe to Studio Brule for more Fiamengo File episodes.

Racism, Misogyny, Misandry and Lindsey Middlecamp

Jack Barnes · 22 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Is Lindsey Middlecamp, a Minneapolis lawyer and founder of Cards Against Harassment, a misogynist, misandrist, and racist? Well, to start with, she is a feminist. That should be enough evidence on its own to answer yes to the above questions. Feminism has a long history of prejudice against people based on race, sex, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity, etc. One doesn't have to look very hard to find feminists berating, silencing or practicing bigotry against any number of groups outside the affluent, white, female collective. But let's dig a little further just to be sure. Let's discover who Lindsey is. She's a board member of Stop Street Harassment, an organization that claims to fight the abuse of women and oppressive behavior of men. Things like men telling women they are pretty. And men sitting comfortably on a subway or city bus.

Right now women in America can't walk down to the local Starbucks for a latte without the chance that a man might tell her she has a nice ass. We've got women cowering in their homes, afraid to go outside, because a man might tell her she's hot. That's real oppression, right there. Yeah, I was flippant and hyperbolic, But not by much.

From Stop Street Harassment's website:

> Lindsey Middlecamp is a Minneapolis-based attorney who brings trained advocacy to the courtroom and wider activism throughout her community."

Not only does Lindsey push her ideological beliefs on her neighbors she allows it to influence her practice of law. OK, then, another activist attorney. A dime a dozen, but let's look further.

> When she isn't litigating complex disputes or haranguing harassers, Lindsey enjoys taking cases that allow her to address structural inequalities related to poverty, housing, and discrimination…"

"Haranguing harassers"? Fine by me, as long as haranguers don't mind harassment. More on this in a bit.

Lindsey is also scheduled to speak and the Minnesota Chapter of the National Organization of Women's yearly conference. Remember, the National Organization for Women is the largest feminist group in the US. It has repeatedly worked to stop equal parenting legislation designed to give children equal access to their fathers after divorce.

The national level organization selected Eve Ensler as the keynote speaker for its national conference in 2012. Ensler wrote the "Vagina Monologues," a play involving the rape of a 13-year-old girl by a 24-year-old woman. Ensler described this as a "good rape." That isn't to necessarily equate Middlecamp with the pro-rape Ensler. Still, the company we keep.

From Minnesota NOW website.

> LINDSEY MIDDLECAMP is an attorney practicing in Minneapolis, Minnesota and a board member of Stop Street Harassment, an organization based in Washington, DC dedicated to ending gender-based street harassment worldwide."

"[G]ender-based Street Harassment," the subtext being, men telling women they look good, or saying something abusive, like, "good morning."

> Ms. Middlecamp graduated magna cum laude from St. Olaf College and received her J.D. and concurrent Masters in Bioethics from the University of Pennsylvania, both of which degrees honed her passion for critical argument and advocacy on issues of equity, with a particular focus on gender inequality, as well as racial and > poverty-based barriers to justice. "

>
> Middlecamp's personal advocacy against institutional sexism and rape culture first reached a broader audience following her viral Craigslist Missed Connection written to a catcaller in September 2013. In June of 2014, she began filming street harassment in the Twin Cities and launched Cards Against Harassment…"

Lindsey, who hands out cards berating (mostly black) men for telling women they are attractive, is advocating against "institutionalized sexism?"

I must have missed the government funded PSA encouraging men to tell women they are beautiful. But setting that aside, what about men "street harassing" men? What about women "street harassing" other women? Women "street harassing" men? Is all that sexism?

It seems that Lindsey and her fellow feminists only have a problem with "street harassment" when men are doing it. Isn't that sexist?

And did they seriously just mention "rape culture" as if it's a real thing?

It seems Lindsey believes in "rape culture" even when RAINN, the largest sexual assault prevention and victims advocacy group in the US, has said rape culture no realz. Who needs reality, stats, evidence and the opinions of experts when the mythologies of feminism inform you that all men are potential rapists who created a culture by and for men, and only men, for the purpose of oppressing women?

> In addition to a robust commercial litigation practice, Middlecamp also represents tenants facing gender, sexual, and racial harassment or discrimination in housing. Middlecamp enjoys speaking and leading workshops on campus violence, rape culture, street harassment, and gender bias…"

Once again we will get to Lindsey's advocacy regarding gender, sex, and racial discrimination in a moment.

Now that we have a good idea of just who Lindsey is let's look at what she does.

Middlecamp, after long steeping in the ideology of feminism (patriarchy theory, rape culture, etc.) was triggered by seeing men free to express themselves as heterosexuals in public. Outraged, she decided to do something about it.

"Hey baby, nice legs" became men being entitled to oppress women in broad daylight. Sorry, did I say broad? I'll need to work on that because in her mind this sort if behavior leads to rape, or worse, dating. Middlecamp took this threat seriously, so she started a website straight from the hellish backchannels of Tumblr. It contains a series of cards designed to belittle men for expressing themselves in public. Then she created a YouTube channel to display herself using the cards — and her sharp lawyer's tongue — to deliver comeuppance to the evil, masculine (mostly black) brigands she encountered on the mean streets of Minneapolis.

When she uploaded the videos of her encounters to her YouTube channel, she made lackluster effort to hide the identity of her victims. And yes, I said “victims.” In every single case, the men in her videos did absolutely nothing wrong. That did not stop Middlecamp from berating, belittling and labeling men with things like misogynist, abusers, harassers and rapists in waiting. All of them, to a man, were “contributing to rape culture.” One of her videos tallied up over three-quarters of a million views. What did these men do to deserve Lindsey’s wrath?

What did these men do to earn Lindsey’s wrath? Here is a list of a few things that men said to her that she deemed to be sexist and oppressive to women.

“Love the dress.”
“Minnesota chicks are hot.”
“You are pretty.”
“You are beautiful.”
“Hey, Beautiful.”
“Beautiful chalky white skin.”
“Baby.”
“Gorgeous.”
“He’s a lucky guy.”
“You’d Be beautiful if you’d smile.”
“Damn that ass.”
“I hope we get off at the same stop.”
“I’m a dog. You’re a bone.”
“Bitch”

In some cases, it’s not what they said but what they did that set her off. One guy staggered out of a bar drunk and allegedly tried to touch her. In the video, since removed, we only see her reaction and his reaction to her going off on him. He appears to be one of those happy drunks smiling and laughing. There didn’t appear to be any maliciousness…in the guy. How or where or if he touched her isn’t revealed.

Another man bowed to her and said he was bowing to her beauty. The bow didn’t go over well with Lindsey.

On another occasion, two men sitting on a wall were looking at her. That’s it. They didn’t utter a word to her. They didn’t walk past her. They didn’t touch her. They just looked at her. That was enough to incur the wrath of the Middlecamp. Fortunately, that video is still on her youtube channel, for now. I will not link to that video because I won’t be a party to further victimizing these men who did absolutely nothing wrong.

In one case she asked for her victim’s phone number which she failed to bleep out or mute before uploading. In all of her videos, she blurs the faces of her victims. However in most of her videos, the blur doesn’t follow the men’s faces as they or the camera moved. It’s easy to identify the faces of most of the men in her videos. These men are victims of Lindsey Middlecamp’s ideologically warped mind and lust for celebrity status within feminism. This status she has more or less gained.

Fortunately, Lindsey has removed most, but not all, of her videos. Why’s that, you ask?

Well, there was understandable pushback. Her videos are sexist, bigoted and just plain idiotic. There was also pushback over her latest Twitter campaign. Earlier this year Lindsey started #ShirtlessShamers2016 , a hashtag created for the purpose of shaming men who posted shirtless selfies with the idea that that shaming these men would fight slut-shaming of women. You read that right. She believes that promoting sexism against men fights sexism against women.

Then again, I already told you she’s a feminist.

Remember how Lindsey, a lawyer, was praised for her “critical argument” skills? Many men and women on Twitter took umbrage to her hashtag. It wasn’t long until people were digging into her past. To the surprise of no one, Lindsey was targeting working-class, minority males. Remember the praise for Middlecamp’s advocacy discrimination based on gender, race, and poverty by Stop Street Harassment and the Minnesota Chapter of NOW?

Well, here is a collage of her “advocacy.”

Perhaps this explains Lindsey’s efforts over the years to keep her last name private. Even when publishing her work in some online publishing juggernauts, she only used her first name. She hid behind anonymity while she disseminated her videos and shirtless images for hundreds of thousands of people to see. She protected herself from the same kind of public scrutiny to which she was subjecting innocent victims.

Several MHRAs and anti-feminists didn’t intend to allow Lindsey this hypocritical luxury. We made our intentions clear. At which time Lindsey went “full damsel,” rolling out her portable fainting couch and announcing she was in distress mode.

Lindsey
@CardsAgstHrsmt

Apparently men's rights movement is about threatening to dox feminists on a hate site to "take them down a notch".

Lindsey @CardsAgstHrsmt 11h

I'll say this: if your punitive "hit piece" requires that you print info about them they actively keep private, own what you're doing & why.

Lindsey
@CardsAgstHrsmt

@Jackbarnesmra if you can't write a thinkpiece without doxing someone, that suggests you should think about something else maybe?

I am Stacy McCain @Jackbarn... 16h
Not going to doxx you. I'm sure your last name is published on the internet somewhere. @CardsAgstHrsmt

@CardsAgstHrsmt

@Jackbarnesmra I've kept my name anonymous for safety reasons. If it's online it's not on here. If you find it to "take me down"= doxing

3:07pm - 21 Feb 16

Lindsey @CardsAgstHrsmt 16h
@Jackbarnesmra if it weren't intended to direct fear or harassment you wouldn't be eager to publish it. Don't pretend that's not doxing.

And I WILL NOT publish your address phone# names of family or employer like your friends have done to me and my family @CardsAgstHrsmt

Lindsey
@CardsAgstHrsmt

@Jackbarnesmra tell yourself what you want. I have set a privacy/anon boundary and you want to reveal it in retaliation. That's doxing.

Lindsey

@Jackbarnesmra buzzfeed, huffpo, GMA, and others have all respected this boundary. If you don't, that is doxing. pic.twitter.com/MgyupghvCn

Contact Me

Please don't hesitate to contact me if you have any questions about why you were given a card, or about the project. I can be reached at: admin@cardsagainstharassment.com.

Inappropriate or threatening emails may be republished so send at your own risk. Or, preferably, don't send at all.

I am happy to answer any inquiries from media or individuals, however, if you share this project with others I would appreciate being identified by first name only so I can keep my professional work and advocacy work separate.

View a PDF catalog of screenshots taken from Lindsey's Twitter account. Screenshots of Lindsey Middlecamp.

That's right. She labeled us doxxers and abusers who are putting her at risk for seeking her last name while she knew full well that her last name, along with a photo of herself and a description of her "advocacy" was on multiple feminist websites. How's that for strong, independent and honest woman for you?

The call went out for Lindsey's last name. In a matter of hours, an individual answered, "Her last name is Middlecamp. [It] took me all of ten minutes to find it." This person, to which I'm personally thankful, added links to the Stop Street Harassment and MNNOW websites. I then posted announcing that we had her last name, but I didn't include her last name in the tweet.

Lindsey then set her Twitter profile to private. Once again Lindsey Middlecamp displays cowardice at facing the same kind of scrutiny she gladly forced on her victims.

Lindsey has shown that she believes women are so weak, helpless and pathetic that words and gestures, matters considered appropriate and respectful — even during the height of Victorian era gynocentrism, oppress women. Is Lindsey Middlecamp a misogynist?

Lindsey has displayed her contempt for normal and healthy male heterosexuality. She has labeled men engaging in what can only be considered normal behavior as dangerous subhumans and rapists in waiting. Is Lindsey Middlecamp a misandrist?

Lindsey has shown that she has a particular dislike for the way that non-white men — and the cultures these men live in — go about mating and courtship. At the very least these men displayed behavior that is considered normal by the men and women in their culture. Is Lindsey Middlecamp a racist?

I'll leave that to you to decide.

One thing is for sure. Men and women are growing tired of the behavior of Lindsey Middlecamp and her ilk. Lindsey, I hate to tell you this princess, but your backward and regressive ways of thinking are outdated. You are not a high school kid anymore. Berating someone you are not sexually attracted to for showing sexual interest in you may have been acceptable back then, but you are an adult now, allegedly. You need to consider growing up and joining the rest of society in the 21st century.

And if you can't do either of those things, you should well consider the fact that you won't be able to use public platforms this way under a cloak of cowardice.

Channeling Eric Hoffer

Doug Mortimer · 22 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Unlike a lot of his ivory-tower brethren, philosopher Eric Hoffer led a life that was anything but cloistered. Born in the Bronx in 1898 (another source says 1902) to Alsatian immigrant parents, he went blind at age 7 but became an inveterate reader when his eyesight returned at age 15.

Hoffer worked sporadically while living on skid row in Los Angeles in the 1920s. During the Depression, he was a migrant farm worker and prospector. Famously, he worked as a longshoreman from World War II till he retired from the docks in 1967. His "hard knocks" life was reflected in his philosophy, which was definitely more a posteriori than a priori. "My train of thought grew out of my life just the way a leaf or a branch grows out of a tree," he once said.

A regular visitor to public libraries wherever he happened to be working, he read widely and educated himself in philosophy. Though he had no academic credentials, he published his first book, The True Believer: Thoughts on the Nature of Mass Movements in 1951. An insightful study of fanatics and misfits, it identified the core elements common to mass movements of all types…right wing and left wing, religious and secular, communist and fascist, racialist and rainbow coalition…take your pick.

Though he published a number of books over the next three decades, The True Believer remains his best-known work. He received some income from his literary efforts and even achieved a measure of fame, yet he continued to live in a one-room apartment with no phone.

Feminism was probably not on Hoffer's radar screen when he first started publishing. Considering he was a lifelong bachelor, it would have been interesting to hear what he had to say on the topic, but he died in 1983, long before the third wave of feminism arose.

A lot of Hoffer's open-ended observations, however, apply to today's social justice warriors. So I herewith present an interview with Eric Hoffer from beyond the grave. The questions are mine, but the answers are all quotations from Eric Hoffer.

*****

Q. Mr. Hoffer, as laughably loony as feminism is these days, it has permeated every nook and cranny of Western society. Why do so many people not only accept but embrace the principles of feminism?

A. We run fastest and farthest when we run from ourselves.

Q. It seems the more the social justice warriors lie, the louder they shout. Why do you think that is?

A. We lie loudest when we lie to ourselves.

Q. Why are the social justice warriors so spiteful? Couldn't they get their points across without being so obnoxious?

A. Passionate hatred can give meaning and purpose to an empty life. Thus, people haunted by the purposelessness of their lives try to find a new content not only by dedicating themselves to a holy cause but also by nursing a fanatical grievance. A mass movement offers them unlimited opportunities for both.

Q. It seems that the more absurd the demands of the social justice warriors, the angrier they get.

A. Vehemence is the expression of a blind effort to support and uphold something that can never stand on its own.

Q. But the sheer nastiness of social justice warriors is astounding. Couldn't they get their point across in a more civilized manner?

A. It is remarkable by how much a pinch of malice enhances the penetrating power of an idea or an opinion.

Q. The more detached from reality feminist dogma gets, the more spiteful if not downright hateful it gets. How do you account for that?

A. A doctrine insulates the devout not only against the realities around them but also against their own selves. The fanatical believer is not conscious of his envy, malice, pettiness and dishonesty.

Q. I don't disagree with all the positions taken by social justice warriors, but I have to wonder about their tactics. I hate to sound like Miss Manners, but why must they all act like spoiled children?

A. Rudeness is a weak imitation of strength.

Q. Even though they're in the minority, the social justice warriors have nothing but contempt for people who don't agree with their progressive platform. How can they be so arrogant when they're seeking support? Wouldn't you think they would dial it down a notch or two when they're trying to win hearts and minds?

A. A dissenting minority feels free only when it can impose its will on the majority: what it abominates most is the dissent of the majority.

Q. White women in western civilization are arguably the most privileged people on the planet – ever. So why do they have such a sense of entitlement? Why are they so demanding?

A. Our frustration is greater when we have much and want more than when we have nothing and want some.

Q. Why do social justice warriors ignore facts in favor of ideology?

A. Facts are counterrevolutionary.

Q. But how can social justice warriors remain steadfast in their convictions based solely on ideology and brush off all data and scientific evidence to the contrary?

A. We can be absolutely certain only about things we do not understand.

Q. But we're not talking rocket science here. Feminists are certainly capable of comprehending the truth. I think they just refuse to acknowledge it. What do you think? Are they deluding themselves?

A. The refusal to see ourselves as we are develops a distaste for facts and cold logic.

Q. I can't help but notice that working and middle-class women with families are much less likely to identify as feminists. Being unmarried and/or well-to-do almost seem to be prerequisites for being a feminist. Too much time on their hands or what?

A. The boredom of spinsters and of women who can no longer find joy and fulfillment in marriage stems from an awareness of a barren, spoiled life. By embracing a holy cause and dedicating their energies and substance to its advancement, they find a new life full of purpose and meaning.

Q. Feminists are notorious for lacking a sense of humor, and social justice warriors seem to suffer from anhedonia – the inability to enjoy themselves. Sounds like a hopelessly dreary existence! How can they stand it?

A. Not only does a mass movement depict the present as mean and miserable – it deliberately makes it so….It views ordinary enjoyment as trivial and even discreditable and presents the pursuit of personal happiness as immoral. To enjoy oneself is to have truck with the enemy – the present.

Q. Social justice warriors identify even mild, reasoned criticism as hate speech. Yet judging by their tirades, the SJWs are the ones consumed with hatred. Why can't they make their case without the overheated rhetoric?

A. Hatred is the most accessible and comprehensive of all unifying agents.

Q. So much of that hatred seems to be fixated on white heterosexual males and the so-called patriarchy. Why are they so obsessed with these bogeymen straw men?

A. Mass movements can rise and spread without belief in a God, but never without belief in a devil.

Q. Feminists often ask not to be judged by the most radical elements in their ranks. Is it right to judge all feminists by the actions of the extremists?

A. There is a tendency to judge a race, a nation or any distinct group by its least worthy members. Though manifestly unfair, this tendency has some justification. The character and destiny of a group are often determined by its inferior elements.

Q. Judging by their actions and appearance, it seems that radical feminists are part of the lunatic fringe – and proud of it. Why have there been so many gynocentric goon squads in the history of the women's movement?

A. The game of history is usually played by the best and the worst over the heads of the majority in the middle.

Q. Social justice warriors are constantly sticking their noses into matters, some of them ridiculously trivial, that are none of their concern. Why can't they just mind their own business?

A. A man is likely to mind his own business when it is worth minding. When it is not, he takes his mind off his own meaningless affairs by minding other people's business.

Q. Do you think the slew of progressive propaganda in the mainstream media is fooling anyone?

A. Propaganda does not deceive people; it merely helps them to deceive themselves.

Q. Why are so many women with little or no sexual marketplace value attracted to feminism? Is it nothing more than the revenge of the omega women?

A. It is by its promise of a sense of power that evil often attracts the weak.

Q. How do you account for the young white men who hang their heads and plead mea culpa to so-called white male hetero privilege?

A. When cowardice is made respectable, its followers are without number both from among the weak and the strong; it easily becomes a fashion.

Q. Whenever I try to reason with social justice warriors, they respond not with logic or a reasoned argument but with sloganeering. Why do they always respond with empty-headed rhetoric?

A. An empty head is not really empty; it is stuffed with rubbish. Hence the difficulty of forcing anything into an empty head.

Q. Radical feminist leaders assert that masculinity per se is evil and the only way to render men suitable for contemporary society is to emasculate them and make them more like females. Do you think that severing men from their masculinity will make the world a better place?

A. The savior who wants to turn men into angels is as much a hater of human nature as the totalitarian despot who wants to turn them into puppets.

Q. Supposedly, the women's movement was about freeing women from the domination of men, but institutionalized feminism promotes the domination of women over men. Can't the feminists see that they're promoting tyranny, not freedom?

A. I doubt if the oppressed ever fight for freedom. They fight for pride and power – power to oppress others. The oppressed want above all to imitate their oppressors; they want to retaliate.

Q. Anita Sarkeesian is one of the most famous feminist leaders of our time, yet she's a shameless huckster. Why can't her followers see through her?

A. Charlatanism of some degree is indispensable to effective leadership.

Q. The more ridiculous her assertions, the more moral posturing she indulges in, the more money pours in. How do you account for this?

A. Every great cause begins as a movement, becomes a business, and eventually degenerates into a racket.

Q. No matter how many barriers to advancement are removed, many feminists and minorities still complain the deck is stacked against them. With more opportunities than ever before, why do they spend so much time bitching and moaning?

A. There are many who find a good alibi far more attractive than an achievement…when we have a valid alibi for not achieving anything we are fixed, so to speak, for life.

Q. Why do so many social justice warriors suffer from OCD when it comes to equality?

A. The passion for equality is partly a passion for anonymity… No one can then point us out, measure us against others and expose our inferiority.

Q. Do you think the social justice warriors will ever be satisfied? It seems like the more concessions you make to them, the more demands they make, and the more they resent you.

A. The resentment of the weak does not spring from any injustice done to them but from their sense of inadequacy and impotence. We cannot win the weak by sharing our wealth with them. They feel our generosity as oppression.

Q In every society, the welfare of women and children is at the top of the agenda. The welfare of men appears near the bottom, if it appears on the list at all.

A. The misery of a child is interesting to a mother, the misery of a young man is interesting to a young woman, the misery of an old man is interesting to nobody.

Q. Every time I try to offer someone a red pill, I get rebuffed. Why won't people at least listen to what I have to say?

A. Far more crucial than what we know or do not know is what we do not want to know.

Q. After a half-century or so of feminism we've sacrificed two generations of men with no turnaround in sight. Do feminists really believe this is in the best interests of civilization?

A. Those who would sacrifice a generation to realize an ideal are the enemies of mankind.

Q. Feminists seem more intent on breaking down men rather than winning them over to their cause. Would you agree?

A. Our sense of power is more vivid when we break a man's spirit than when we win his heart.

Q. When I listen to the progressive politicians and academics, I can't help but wonder if they really believe what they say. I know they're not stupid, but how can people in high places act so stupidly? Are they clueless dupes or what?

A. Naivete in grownups is often charming, but when coupled with vanity it is indistinguishable from stupidity.

Q. Social justice warriors are always petitioning governments, universities, and other institutions for every slight, demanding redress for every conceivable misfortune of women, minorities, and other protected classes.

A. We all have private ails. The troublemakers are they who need public cures for their private ails.

Q. Social justice warriors have nothing to offer but grievances. Don't they have a purpose in life?

A. To have a grievance is to have a purpose in life.

Q. You do realize that according to social justice orthodoxy, your views are anathema, and you would be considered a problematic, prejudice-ridden mossback.

A. I hang onto my prejudices, they are the testicles of my mind.

Q. Thank you, sir. Rest assured, if there is ever a MGTOW Hall of Fame, you will be one of the first inductees.

Story Time with Cenk

AVfM Video Source · 23 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Cenk Uygur’s grand papi was da one good man who gave women da vote.”

Subscribe to Karen Straughan.

Angry Lesbians

Tim Patten · 23 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Not all angry lesbians are like Valerie Jean Solanas, who authored SCUM Manifesto and attempted to murder artist Andy Warhol.[i] Her 1967 book argued that men have ruined the world and that it is up to women to fix this problem by aborting all male babies.

That said, there are many who appear to share her feelings. In recent times, women, mostly radicalized angry lesbians, have launched genocidal social media campaigns, labeled with monikers such as "#killallmen," "Control All Men,"[ii] "StraightWhiteMemes,"[iii] and "Kill All White Men."[iv] These memes–which, like the SCUM Manifesto, are guised as satire and connect with millions of females who resent our place in society. They fanaticize about harming and wielding power over us, going so far as to make killing males seem artistically relevant.[v]

Amid such anger and resentment, it seems doubtful that any of the so-called women's movements, populated with adherents who despise us, can help resolve the many important issues we men grapple with, including a pandemic of male suicides. Rather, they seem largely oriented toward our demise.

We Love Lesbians

I've met, worked with, and partied with hundreds of gay women. Most were incredible people, frequently struggling to find themselves in a heterocentric world. The truth is, while lesbians might not prefer us as sexual partners, they don't want to hurt us. Indeed, lesbians came out in droves during the 1980s to aid and comfort the tens of thousands of gay men who were dying of AIDS. They helped create San Francisco's volunteer health support systems, which has since been replicated worldwide.

Violent Lesbians in my Midst

I was twenty-two years old when I settled in San Francisco in 1973. It's a peculiar but vibrant city, teeming with tech wizards, trailblazing culture warriors, and every beautiful color, race, and creed ever created by God Herself. On Friday nights, friends and I would go to the large dance clubs–Bo Jangles, Dreamland[vi] and Oil Can Harry's[vii]–where San Francisco's diversity was on brilliant display. At these venues, straight, gay and lesbian couples danced with abandon, immersed in thundering rhythms and eruptions of joy.

During one such outing, around closing time, two lesbians got into a fist fight over a third female, who was apparently interfering in their relationship. Another time, rumors spread like wildfire that a butch, defending her companion, had bashed an interloper over the head with a beer bottle. Over the years, there were assorted outbreaks of fisticuffs; once, a lesbian even pulled a gun on a woman who had tried to arrange a date with her girl. These and other goings-on demonstrated that you don't need a dick to act like one.

In mixed, gay-oriented clubs across America, when hostilities break out, lesbians are often involved. According to some, these women are acting out the masculine gender binary extreme through aggression, anger and physical violence.

But such views seem misguided, at best. In reality, lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) individuals, more broadly speaking, suffer from more mental health concerns and disorders,[viii] often stemming from prejudice and stigma,[ix] than the rest of society. LGBT females sometimes exhibit certain issues including body image disorders[x] and hostility towards men.

The Male and Female Gender Binary

Within LGBT communities, the most violent seem to be the lesbians.[xi] Drag entertainer Rue Paul[xii] might occasionally throw down a high-heeled gauntlet, but drag queens and trans-woman such as Caitlyn Jenner[xiii] tend to represent the feminine extreme of the gender binary. Butch lesbians, in contrast, often embody the masculine counterpart.[xiv] Some might say that the masculine and feminine stereotypes conceptualized in women's and gender studies are being acted out within the LGBT culture.

Modern Lesbian Relationship and Domestic Violence

The LGBT community has been whitewashing certain truths for decades amid their struggle for rights and acceptance.[xv] In reality, it has always known about lesbian-related violence.[xvi] [xvii] [xviii] In 2014, The Advocate highlighted domestic violence surveys that revealed astounding results in this regard among gender studies advocates.

The CDC's 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey,[xix] released in 2013, revealed that for targeted incidents of rape, physical violence or stalking, 43.8 percent involved lesbian couples, 26 percent gay male couples, and 29 percent heterosexual couples.[xx] Other data indicates that lesbians demonstrate the extreme male binary attributes of aggression, control and violence at a rate that is actually 10% higher than for straight men. An August 2012 commentary by Olivia Quinn offers vivid insights into the realities of a violent lesbian relationship.[xxi]

Influential Radical Angry Lesbians

In the 1960s, feminist leader Gloria Steinman inspired millions of women to become assertive and aggressive, including angry lesbians, many of whom often favor some form of anarchy. Recently, we've seen disturbing images of naked females ejecting paint-filled eggs from their vaginas,[xxii] inserting religious crosses up their backsides,[xxiii] and parading across campuses carrying mattresses[xxiv] upon which, they say, they were raped. One group has even engaged in acts of "performance art," where they publically menstruate through their clothing.[xxv]

In their view, such actions are courageous, helping to resist an evil and oppressive male patriarchy, as well as a church that is ungodly, in their eyes, because of its apparent favoritism towards men. Many of these narrow-minded individuals are angry lesbians, blaming white men, in general, for their problems. They seek to frighten us with loud voices and aggressive behavior, and an appearance that is violent and ostracizing so that we might succumb to their dangerous bullying.

Angry Revolutionary Lesbians in the United Kingdom

Examples of just how distorted and misguided many of these women are can be seen in a 1970s BBC documentary, Angry Wimmin (watch on YouTube), which offers insights into the origins of the women's movement. The title refers to a phrase that angry lesbians use to describe themselves: they are so resentful that they refuse to properly spell the word "women," preferring instead to use what they consider to be an unbiased alternative.

In the film, we meet Sheila Jeffreys, an influential activist, who speaks frankly about the movement's mission as a "dedicated war" on men (patriarchy) and pornography. She discusses the self-described "Revolutionary Feminists," a wave of lesbians, many scholars, who engage in protests aimed at eliminating makeup, hair coloring and high heels because they are oppressive symbols of male patriarchy, causing severe pain to women.

In addition, Ms. Jeffreys represents herself as an advocate of eliminating men from intimate relationships: "We do think… that all feminists can and should be lesbians," she has written. Such perspectives were prevalent in an era where straight females were experimenting with lesbianism in an effort to become more closely aligned with the goals of the women's movement. [xxvi]

Angry Wimmin also features Julie Bindle, who is angry with us men and the tyranny of male oppression, arguing that we are all aggressive and violent by nature. Today, Ms. Bindle is a privileged journalist, author of over 30 books, broadcaster, and researcher who advocates that men should be put in concentration camps.[xxvii] She is an active global campaigner against male-on-female violence[xxviii] and is paid to consult with women being prosecuted for killing partners, often falsely suggesting that the men were entirely to blame.

At the time and since then, these and other angry lesbians have flooded the media and society with their damaging propaganda; their documents, poetry and books embracing a sexist war on men have been disseminated widely.

The Image of Societies Domestic Violence

With the support of well-meaning but misguided individuals, it didn't take long for such distortions to influence our collective consciousness. Whenever domestic violence is mentioned, many ordinary people now see the image of an angry, drunk man punching a defenseless woman. Radicalized lesbians have poisoned our belief system with a lopsided and frighteningly wrong perspective of what this phrase means.

The truth is, Sheila Jeffreys, Julie Bindle and millions of others like them continue to practice and advocate a perverted form of justice, constantly invoking stereotypes of angry, perverse and abusive men. Unfortunately, their words and actions have serious consequences. In many divorce and custody proceedings, for example, they are used as weapons against us; it is not uncommon to see divorce-seeking women being encouraged to lie to gain custody of children and increase judicial empathy.

Textbooks for College Studies

Radicalized lesbians have written the books and curricula that are taught, exchanged and referred to in college level women's, feminism and gender studies across the West.[xxix] They have also contributed to resources that a great many rely on as sources of information. In 2014, for example, about 600 women from feminist collectives added hundreds of articles about women to Wikipedia. The number of such contributors grew by a third in 2015.[xxx] Some of these contributions are biased against males, demonizing us as aggressive, oppressive and violent. Such ideas only serve to widen an already growing gap between the sexes and direct social resentment and anger toward men.

Lesbian radical Janice Raymond, the author of The Transsexual Empire, maintains that transsexualism is based on a "patriarchal myth" and "rapes" women's bodies. Again, the word (rape) is used as a sword or bludgeon, intended to frighten people away from opinions, individuals and groups that might be more measured or simply at odds with such extremist notions.

Around the world, colleges and universities, under cover of academic paternalism, indoctrinate students into an ideology of scholarly dislike for men. Every year, this dangerous mechanism churns out radicalized and angry graduates who have swallowed the Kool-Aid of misandry, who are often quick to use violence against anyone or anything that might be even remotely associated with maleness. Certainly, there have been some who have been violated who have good reason for their prejudice, but the angry lesbian framework is, for the most part, built on fantasies and lies.

Warrior Diversity Standing up to Bullies

But the times they are a-changin'. A hurricane of awareness is raging across the globe, undermining the gender-biased way of thinking that has damaged lives and corrupted our society. Increasingly, movements like Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and Japan's Herbivore Men are redressing the many imbalances that have been created over time. Millions of newly emboldened male warriors are reacting, blogging and video logging, helping others to understand what has gone wrong and how to reclaim their lives.

At the same time, women's groups in Australia[xxxi] and the United Kingdom are also speaking out, defending boys and men from the radicalized bullies. University of Ottowa professor and feminist Janice Fiamengo has caused angry activists' jaws to drop when she offers up alternative perspectives at speaking engagements.[xxxii] Transsexual Theryn Meyer (watch on YouTube) and her tranny team have demurely shamed the sexist women's movement with their commentaries. And Miss Milo Yiannopolos has slashed and trashed lesbian asses off their power pedestal with his 2016 Dangerous Faggot college tour.[xxxiii]

Indeed, a diverse set of fighters and Internet vigilantes are working to rescue boys and men from the narrow-minded and self-serving hatred of women's studies' directives. Some might even say that the international theatrical success of the Kinky Boots show-stopping song, "The Sex is in the Heels," written by Cyndi Lauper, has played a role, because it has made it okay for women to wear spike-high heeled shoes. Meanwhile, Hollywood power lesbian Ellen DeGeneres' role as spokesperson for Cover Girl suggests that wearing makeup is not such a bad thing after all.

Taken together, these troopers for "true" equality, along with MGTOW and other movements, are helping to change our world. They are rolling back the tide of biased and dangerous thinking promulgated by angry radicalized lesbians, and helping men like us to be the wonderful individuals that we are–and deserve to be.

*****

References

[i] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Valerie_Solanas

[ii] http://www.smartgirlpolitics.com/taxpayer-funded-professor-advocated-for-men-control/

[iii] https://www.tumblr.com/tagged/kill-all-men

[iv] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3262281/University-equality-officer-allegedly-tweeted-kill-white-men-charged-sending-threatening-message.html

[v] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/SCUM_Manifesto

[vi] http://www.discomusic.com/clubs-more/2754_0_6_0_C/

[vii] http://www.discomusic.com/clubs-more/4058_0_6_0_C/

[viii] http://www.apa.org/monitor/feb02/newdata.aspx

[ix] https://www.nami.org/Find-Support/LGBTQ

[x] https://www.psychologytoday.com/basics/body-image

[xi] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3160781/I-totally-walked-away-Former-FSU-football-star-caught-camera-punching-woman-bar-says-sorry-ashamed-interview-brawl.html

[xii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/RuPaul

[xiii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Caitlyn_Jenner

[xiv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Butch_and_femme#Butch

[xv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Domestic_violence_in_lesbian_relationships

[xvi] http://ordinary-gentlemen.com/2014/01/21/lessons-from-bar-fight-litigation/

[xvii] http://www.nicaragua.com/videos/id-363198/lesbian+bar+fight%3A+managua,+nicaragua/

[xviii] http://articles.latimes.com/2014/feb/05/local/la-me-ln-soap-star-assault-20140205

[xix] http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/overview/index.html

[xx] http://www.advocate.com/crime/2014/09/04/2-studies-prove-domestic-violence-lgbt-issue

[xxi] http://thehairpin.com/2012/08/run-anyway/

[xxii] http://jezebel.com/heres-a-woman-plopping-paint-eggs-out-of-her-vagina-1566693939

[xxiii] http://killthegoat.com/ugly-women-protest-god-by-shoving-crosses-up-their-asses/

[xxiv] http://www.nationalreview.com/article/418686/mattress-girl-perfect-icon-feminist-left-ian-tuttle

[xxv]

http://www.18karatreggae.com/2015/08/10/women-menstruating-in-public-without-protection-nasty-or-liberating/

[xxvi] http://www.starobserver.com.au/news/local-news/leading-feminist-launches-bizarre-racist-attack-on-trans-community/118883

[xxvii] https://hequal.wordpress.com/2015/09/05/hateful-guardian-writer-julie-bindel-proposes-feminazi-concentration-camps-for-all-men/

[xxviii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Julie_Bindel

[xxix] http://rense.com/general81/vdt.htm

[xxx] http://www.artnews.com/2015/03/10/artfeminisms-2015-wikipedia-edit-a-thon-adds-334-articles-on-female-artists/

[xxxi] http://relatingtomen.com/gender-politics/toxic-femininity-heroism/

[xxxii] https://arts.uottawa.ca/english/people/fiamengo-janice [xxxiii] http://yiannopoulos.net/tour/

The Big Business of Male Genital Mutilation

AVfM Video Source · 24 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

An interesting discussion on the ritual of circumcision (male genital mutilation) and how medical corporations are making money off male foreskins on the stock market.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=a-y3vvawVWc&feature=youtu.be

Why should we fight?

Editorial Staff · 24 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following Blog entry was posted on AVFM forums by one of its members, Maxx. It is edited and republished here with his permission. ED

Not so long ago the party line from the cultural left was this;

And anyone raising any sort of concern or calling for caution was shouted down for being a racist or bigot.

Now in the wake of the wave of alleged sex attacks perpetrated on white western women by members of immigrant Muslim gangs across Germany during NYE celebrations, white western males are once again being called (and shamed) into action.

It's on 'us' apparently to defend 'our' women from the unwanted attention of these unwashed savages. Or so the mainstream gynocentric (suddenly conservative-led) narrative goes, anyway.

Let's consider a couple of key questions in relation to this unfolding story…

1) CAN the average western male effectively defend 'his' women?

2) SHOULD the average western male risk his life to defend the average western woman, regardless of his ability to effectively do so (or lack thereof)?

3)And who exactly should he consider to be 'his' women worthy or 'his' protection anyway?

Those who share his race? Those who share his wider culture? Or those that qualify for that honor on merit?

I'll attempt to offer my own answers these questions below…

The short answer to question 1 (as far as the average western male is concerned) is 'no' he probably can't.

Muslim gangs KNOW the average western male is in all probability not remotely willing and/or able to defend the honor of 'his' women anyway.

And in truth why would or should he be anything else…?

Let's look at the evidence…

Outta the blocks he's probably raised by a single mom after feminist law makers gave his vindictive mother free reign to extract his father from his life totally.

As a boy his 'rough and tumble play' and practical 'hands on' learning style will have been diagnosed as ADHD and medicated outta him, leaving his brain a mess of unconnected spaghetti strands. If he's not wearing a dress and demanding everyone call him Daisy he's doing well enough as it is.

As a youth, he'll have been labeled as a 'creep' and a 'jerk' for daring to even offer to buy girls he likes a coffee or plucking up the courage to tell one of them that their hair looks nice today.

As a young office worker he'll have been threatened with redundancy for laughing too loud at his desk, or speaking in an aggressive manner that his female co-workers found 'threatening' and 'triggering' when he was tirelessly attempting to close deals over the phone and make his company money.

He'll have had his wrist slapped like a school boy more times than he can remember simply for 'being a man', in trouble with HR departments at work for things like sending nude images of hot chicks and crude joke memes to male co workers on the work servers, he'll have been reprimanded for eating a beef stew at his desk because a vegan female co-worker didn't like the smell of it. Encouraged (Read; bullied and coerced) to convert to vegetarianism by women in his office who didn't think it was 'appropriate' or 'considerate' for him to be eating meat in their presence on his lunch breaks.

And you expect THIS man, THIS man….that you have systematically reduced to a timid vegan mouse afraid of his own shadow, this man that you have beaten into submission at every turn throughout his life……to suddenly ride into battle pitch fork in hand on behalf of 'his' women?

As if he's some kinda alpha werewolf that was cross-bred with a Spartan?

Ain't gonna happen.

And Muslim gang bangers across Europe are clearly smart enough to have figured it out already.

Any man that even actually IS a fucking man in the western world today has arrived there IN SPITE of the toxic secular progressive culture that has surrounded him since his birth….not because of it.

He very probably doesn't feel he owes the average western woman jack shit. And nor should he.

He certainly doesn't owe her a duty of care that he's obligated to place his life at risk to honor.

He grew up on Buffy the Vampire slayer remember.

It taught him that women didn't need or want physical protection from men and that it was offensive for him to even dare suggest otherwise.

Guuuuuurrrrlll power, right?

Besides the obligation of men to protect women goes hand in hand with an obligation on the part of said women to dress and act responsibly.

And western women opted outta that obligation long ago.

And assuming (for argument's sake) that a given western male CAN effectively protect 'his' women, because he trains in martial arts, lifts weights, is handy with a gun, blessed with great size or strength or is otherwise for some reason or another 'useful' in some sort of protective capacity.

Whom should he consider to be 'his' women worthy of 'his' protection anyway?

Personally speaking 'my' women are already protected by me.

The group of women I deem worthy of risking my life to protect is a limited and VERY exclusive group.

I'm not a gladiator, nobody owns me. There isn't a sign around my neck that says 'will fight and die for anyone with a vagina'.

I ain't anyone's guard dog. I don't 'bite' on command.

I don't need to place my life at risk for female approval or validation.

'My women' isn't a group limited to women belonging to 'my' race. My own racial profile is 'complicated' to say the least.

I wouldn't really know which side I'm supposed to go into bat for anyway.

And as for women that share that same (western) culture I do? Hell the majority have treated me like their enemy and attempted to stamp out the very masculine qualities I happen to have that they are now apparently suggesting I should be calling upon in their defense.

They were the ones constantly telling me I was a monster for being 'too masculine'…now all of a sudden they wanna claim I'm a coward and a pussy for not being masculine enough to jump to their defense and risk my life without question because certain members of immigrant Muslim communities from war torn hellholes didn't turn out to be the cuddly secular progressive teddy bears those liberal textbooks and media said they were?

'My' women is a small private members club…Applications have gotta be approved. And are often summarily revoked without prospect of appeal.

-My girlfriend, date*, lover or wife.

And even as far a my 'date' goes I'm only gonna throw down to 'defend' a woman I've already fucked. And sometimes not even then.

I ain't gonna rise to the chump bait on a first date or within minutes of meeting a chick I'm hitting on of getting aggressive with another dude in order to assert my 'claim' over her. Been there done that. It's embarrassing behavior. The lowest form of pussy-begging there is.

Guys that are tripping over to fight each other over women they've just met are a fucking disgrace and ought to be ashamed of themselves.

Who else is in this exclusive club called 'my' women then?

-My mom
-My daughters
-My sisters
-My close female friends (Not that I have many strictly platonic ones)
-My female relations and direct blood relatives (and not unconditionally, I'm related to plenty of female douches and feminists)
-The wives or long term girlfriends of my close friends or my male relations (with same qualifier as above)
-Any female child I know and/or am related to.

If anyone wants to fuck with any of these women they damn well better make sure I ain't around to see it because we are certainly gonna have a problem.

I will not risk my life for the (distant) prospect of a BJ by fighting to 'prove myself' to women I met five seconds ago in a bar. Fuck that.

I will not risk my life for female approval or a pat on the back or because anyone is gonna try to shame me for not wanting to dive into mortal combat with a 16-man Syrian gang in defense of some club rat skank I don't know and have never met and who's drank so much that her eyes are pointing in different directions and she's walking in zig-zags.

I'm not Spartacus, I'm not Batman. This ain't a fucking movie.

This is my life and my health we are talking about.

Forgive me for being a little discerning about who I'm willing risk those things for at the drop of a hat.

I will not assist a group people (random western women) when even in actually assisting them I place myself at risk of being falsely charged with a serious crime (like attempted rape or attempted abduction) or indeed attacked myself by an individual or group of white knights that have misread the situation.

I will not run the risk of misreading the situation myself, for example rushing in to protect a woman that's playing the damsel but is in fact part of gang (serving as the 'bait' to lure good men with expensive wrist watches into a beat down/robbery or worse).

I will not swing punches at a man who's beating on his own girl in public and run the risk of having her turn and attack ME on HIS behalf.

She picked him.

I'm not responsible for her life choices or the negative repercussions that might arise from them.

I'm not a dog.

I won't bite and growl and fight and die to protect an 'owner' that has systemically abused me for longer than I can remember.

Feminist Rot at Ryerson University – Fiamengo File Special Edition

AVfM Video Source · 25 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is a special edition of The Fiamengo File in which professor Fiamengo discusses the bizarre rationale used by feminists at Ryerson University in order to silence men on campus while claiming that men attempt to silence women, a classic case of projection. Fiamengo is deeply concerned about the growing power that feminists exercise is silencing others at North American universities.

For more videos like this, please support StudioBrule.

Dr. Martin Harris of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 25 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Martin Harris of London, England has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

His website is circumcisionlondon.co.uk.

I have good news and bad news about Dr. Harris’ website. The good news is that his website is rife with bad punctuation and grammar – good because no infants are harmed by bad punctuation. The bad news is what he does to unconsenting infants: risky and unnecessary surgery and sexual assault.

More bad news – he does this in people’s homes as well!

Under the heading “Circumcision Continuity” Dr. Harris lists what he thinks were historic opponents of circumcision – Greece, Rome, Soviets, Nazis – I guess implying that current intactivists are like Nazis.

Dr. Harris says complications of circumcisions are rare, but that is false. All circumcisions result in scarring and deformation of the penis, with many other possible complications, including death.

Because Dr. Harris has incomplete risk information about circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Harris’ practice information follows:

Temple Fortune Health Centre
23 Temple Fortune Ln.
London NW11 7TE
Tel: 020 8209 2401

> Dr. Martin Harris "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/9FNN4gJ4CI @AndreaHardie #nocirc #intactivism #circumcision pic.twitter.com/iuCDgtXpxM
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 25, 2016

Special law for women bails them out of depraved acts of evil

AVfM Video Source · 26 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sheila Gunn Reid reports on a Supreme Court ruling that has found a woman who killed two babies not guilty of second-degree murder but guilty of the lesser charge of infanticide. As a result of this ruling, Sheila looks into the privileged treatment women receive under our laws and asks, where's that male privilege we keep hearing about.

Rebel Media

Mini-Myth Episode 2 – All Men Are Rapists

AVfM Video Source · 26 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

GOD THAT WAS EASY, debunked in under 2 mins with room to spare!!!

If you'd like to encourage this new YT videographer, please encourage him by subscribing to his channel and giving some video ideas: FemMyth Buster

British NUS: Gay men don’t face oppression

AVfM Video Source · 26 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

There you have it. Student Societies (Feminists) working to stratify further oppressed groups by removing the G from LGTB+ who they deem is not oppressed. What’s next, removing the T? Hell, I think they are already doing that. B is next? ED

The National Union of Students who won’t condemn ISIS because that would be Islamophobic now has decided that gay men don’t face any sort of oppression. Being the highest exposed demographic to HIV, physical violence and direct hatred is irrelevant because… potato.

Freedom Alternative YT Channel.

The Liberty of the Non-feminist Sector: Free Because it's Yours!

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 26 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If you are a non-feminist man or woman, feminism has stolen plenty of things from you. Among these are non-feminist life, non-feminist liberty, and the non-feminist pursuit of non-feminist happiness. Why they will even steal your non-feminist soul if you let them get away with it!

Please understand that you owe feminism no answers. That is a deep concept, probably deeper than you realize. It is your inalienable right under any condition to say "I am not a feminist," then turn around and walk away. And it is their eternal responsibility to say "okay", and leave you the hell alone to Go Your Own Way in peace. Eternally.

All right, so you are a non-feminist man or woman, and that is good. However, you are something even more important: you are an INDIVIDUAL. Yes, a non-feminist individual, but an individual first and foremost, a unique and precious snowflake unlike any other. Yes, I said it.

My friend, if you are not a feminist, then in relation to feminism you are a special snowflake indeed! They had better get that in their head. They had better get with the program and accept that reality with good grace.

The liberty of the non-feminist sector is FREE. And why? Because it's YOURS.

One more time: the liberty of the non-feminist sector is free because it's yours. It's stolen property, and you have only to claim it. You have only to stand up and declare "I am not a feminist." Say this loudly if you wish, but if loud is not your style that's okay, say it quietly. The important thing is to say it. Just say it. Say it in a number of ways, explicitly or implicitly, like your style dictates. And don't just say it to yourself: tell it so that others can hear it, or see it, or know it. If they too are not feminist, it will make them understand that they are not alone.

And if they are feminist? Well all right, they too, in a different way, will know that they are not alone. They will be aware that WE are with them always, everywhere and that they needn't ever languish for want of our excellent company. They will know that they are surrounded – and what a comfortable, supportive feeling this will be for them. . . Yes?

It will inspire them to their best behavior, will it not? As for us, it will instruct us in the wise maxim to keep our friends close and other people closer.

When they know that they are surrounded, when they know that they are not the only game in town and not the only sentient life form on the planet, it will make them think twice about pulling any funny business with you or your friends. They will slowly back off, and as they do, you and your friends will expand, and stretch, and breathe – occupying social space more freely, and more freely voicing what is in your non-feminist minds.

More and more, you will do this, and the feminist people will give you no grief for it. Not if they are wise.

The post-feminist world will be a kind of post-colonial world once the colonizing aggressor (feminism) has been expelled. The revolution will progress by stages, as more and more people awaken to the enormity of what feminism has done, and start getting frank about it.

When you claim the liberty of the non-feminist sector (your stolen property!), you repudiate ANY form of feminist governance over your life – moral, spiritual, psychological, existential, intellectual. You name it!

By claiming your non-feminist liberty, you claim your non-feminist identity. Those claims are indistinguishable, and by those claims you make known to the world that feminism does not define you. Granted, feminists can and will attempt to define you, but unfortunately, for them, they lack the moral legitimacy to do this. Feminism's moral license to govern or define anything at all (let alone YOU) has been revoked – or more accurately, declared to have been invalid all along.

Feminism's purported legitimacy was never put to a plebiscite. Feminism arrived in our world and lodged itself into place with never so much as a “by-your-leave”. It was and is built upon sheer presumption. Nothing better than presumption – followed by a never-ending river of lies which (like any river) grows bigger the further downstream it travels.

The worst of all feminist presumptions is that feminist theorization about the world trumps every other analysis. Feminist theorization – regarding patriarchy, rape culture, male privilege, male violence, gender roles and the human condition in general – has become the default paradigm for the greater cultural discourse, with institutional support and legal backing.

Feminism has usurped, by presumption, the power to morally adjudicate nearly every aspect of the human situation. Never at any point did feminism and its ideologues receive any Divine mandate for this. They simply took it. It wasn’t theirs to take, but that didn’t stop them. They screamed, they bullied, they slandered, they spread lies. Then they came back and did it again. They have done this for years, and believe me; they will never stop. Ever. Not unless a non-feminist force intervenes to make them stop.

So, to morally adjudicate the human situation means to subject ALL moral phenomena to the critical apparatus of a particular ideology. In this case, we are talking about the critical apparatus of feminist ideology in particular.

The feminists seem to think that we non-feminist men and women are morally incompetent to adjudicate matters for ourselves, in a non-feminist way. They want to be moral dictators, in charge of everybody’s rights and wrongs, and they unceasingly act like it. It’s just another way to make their power hegemonic and put themselves in control of the greater cultural discourse.

We must intervene and put a stop to that. The feminists are free to view the world through their ideological lens – after all, it’s their brain, their choice. But if they want to put the power of the state behind this and make their view the foundation of law and public policy, then we will rudely tell them where to get off. In fact, we are doing that already, so let’s build the momentum, okay?

Here’s a final thought which I don’t want to omit. Feminism, in common with the authoritarian Left, makes heavy use of collective guilt (or “guilt by association”) as a moral bullying instrument. Well here’s the good news: when you claim the liberty of the non-feminist sector, you liberate yourself, by implication, from guilt by association.

Any time a feminist postulates a group or category and tries to shove you into it to implicate you in a pattern of collective guilt said feminist has committed an act of FEMINIST AGGRESSION. As a non-feminist man or woman, you are an individual, and can only be judged as an individual — according to a non-feminist system of moral adjudication.

Think for a minute: “Lack of feminism” is not a group, not a movement, not an ideology. In principle, lack of feminism is nothing more than “the world minus feminism”, and among other things that means the world minus all forms of feminist moral adjudication.

Again: the world minus all forms of feminist moral adjudication.

Let that sink in.

The non-feminist sector is nothing less that a cross-section of human nature. It is a full moral spectrum. A “non-feminist” can be almost any kind of person imaginable. Some non-feminists are wonderful people, and other non-feminists are terrible people. What matters is that they are individuals.

Or more to the point, non-feminist individuals.

And whatever transgressions non-feminist men or women might commit, they commit them as individuals. Their crimes will be adjudicated individually, in a non-feminist way, independently of feminist moral authority, feminist oversight, or feminist theorization of any kind.

The non-feminist sector, as a cultural space, must become self-aware and must assert the power to TALK BACK to feminism on non-feminist terms. Under this system, all feminist claims and theories, starting with the definition of feminism itself, are radically open to question. ALL of them – bar none.

Non-feminist alterity and non-feminist autonomy shall become the order of the day in every domain, with feminism thrown permanently on the defensive. The non-feminist analysis shall be a guiding force, along with a non-feminist culture of critique and a non-feminist intellectual audit of every last thing pertaining to feminism, leading toward an ultimate deconstruction of the entire feminist worldview.

Friends claim the liberty of the non-feminist sector. Do it now. Do it today. What are you waiting for?

Claim the liberty of the non-feminist sector. Take back your stolen property.

It's free. . Because it's yours.

Karen, Sage, Hannah and that Judgy Bitch have a request

AVFM · 27 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Donate here, with thanks from all the MHRAs speaking and attending. PE

MGTOW – Creating a League of Your Own

Editorial Staff · 27 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article was taken from a AVFM forum blog post written by Deidre*. She's been inactive for a month or so and does not know we are publishing here but I think she'd approve. Keep in mind she is a woman of faith and her faith comes out in this article. What is more important is her message on MGTOW and from her view expanding/encouraging MGTOW to take a larger perspective on what it means to be a man going his own way. The freedom to do great things. ED*

As a woman who lives in a strong feminist culture, I've been intrigued by the movement, 'MGTOW.'

What does MGTOW really stand for, and how might 'men going their own way,' impact the world around them? Well, first, most movements have a central mission statement, if you will…something that sets the movement apart from other movements, congruent thoughts coming together and finding acceptance as part of a group, if you will. MGTOW is unique because it tells men that they no longer need to compromise their values to please the feminist agendas, and can finally feel that pursuing their own quest in life won't label them selfish assholes. The irony with feminism is that it instructs women to 'go their own way,' but get their men to follow their ways, too. Not all feminists, but many (most?) find satisfaction in controlling men, they think that is a victory for humankind, and sadly, that has become its mission statement of sorts. Because for many (most?) feminists, they believe that feminism was necessary to enlighten everyone to the oppressive, Patriarchal regime that had been in place, throughout history.

Perception is everything, as they say.

The challenge that MGTOW have, however, is to be mindful not to mirror the mistakes of the feminist movement. The biggest mistake of the feminist movement is that it promised women that they would be free, by staying focused on themselves. At first, that idea is very appealing to MGTOW's when you have been tossed around like a rag doll in a culture who views you as a utility. Going one's own way at that point is often designed to free you from being hurt again. Protecting and guarding your heart (and assets) at all costs, becomes a necessity, not just a desire. But, there have been studies done that the most 'free' people of all, those who truly have gone their own way are those who help pave the way for others to go their own ways. In other words, no man is an island, and we need one another, and we need to help one another, to be genuinely free.

With that said, three remarkable men have come to mind, all who could be classified as MGTOW – Jesus, Gandhi, and Martin Luther King, Jr. These men truly 'went their own way,' and changed the world.

If one believes the Jesus story of the New Testament, he sees a man who was very humble and reserved, at first. The stories are sparse with information, but the reader gains an understanding that Jesus was interested in making people love God, and love others. Jesus ate dinner with prostitutes, and tax collectors, and spent a lot of time sharing his Gospel with women, something that was quite taboo back then. He eventually was captured for his beliefs, going against the temple, and threatening the status quo. Dying on a cross so that his enemies could receive the promise of eternal life, was a 'man going his own way' extraordinaire. He was single all of his life, and while the details of those years are very vague, there is enough to the story to get the sense that this man's idea of going his own way, was to influence those around him to take up their personal crosses, and follow him. (And following him would not be easy.) 'The world will hate you, for it hated me first.' – John 15:18

Gandhi was another MGTOW. He led the movement that eventually brought India its independence, and faced brutality due to the religious conflicts occurring in the surrounding regions at the time. He often visited affected areas to bring about peace and justice and was known to fast to bring about religious harmony. Gandhi wasn't concerned with who was for or against him; he was still willing to surrender his very life if he had to, even if it meant changing the hearts and minds of even just a few.

And finally, Martin Luther King, Jr. Talk about a man who not only went his own way but blazed a trail that people still follow today. Responsible for leading the African-American civil rights movement, his goal was to strive for equal rights for all people, through non-violent, civil disobedience. There had to be tremendously difficult days during those times for him and those that supported his vision. “Going his own way” became about helping all men and women to go their own ways. The focus of going his own way was never solely about him.

Those men were powerful social influencers, and their work still affects our very lives, today. The central point of highlighting them as MGTOW is that it’s incredibly crucial not to allow the movement to pigeon-hole men into believing that it stands for only looking out for the best interests of themselves. Equally important is for men to take the anger over the corruption and horrors of a feminist culture, and use it to energize a new vision. Not everyone has a destiny like Jesus, Gandhi or Martin Luther King, Jr., but MGTOW is at a prime time in today’s feminazi culture, to show how the movement is about giving men the tools to live their lives with deeper meaning, purpose, and direction. It’s about telling men that they are not relegated to the status quo of society, but they are destined for great things if they just believe it. Going one’s own way and helping others to find theirs. The two need to go hand in hand if the world is ever going to change for the better.

“The time is always right, to do what is right.” – Martin Luther King, Jr.

“Be the change you want to see in the world.” – Mahatma Gandhi

“Love your enemies. Do good to those who hate you. Bless those who curse you. Pray for those who persecute you.” – Matthew 6:44

Storytime with Cenk, part two

AVfM Video Source · 28 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Cenk Uyger’s daddy was da one good man who freed women from womb slavery.”

Subscribe to Karen Straughan.

Feminist Terminology 2: Lived Experience – TFF Episode 23

AVfM Video Source · 29 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 23 Professor Fiamengo discusses the second of five pernicious feminist terms: “Lived Experience.”

StudioBrule‘s YouTube channel.

Paul on how to teach women accountability in 5 steps

AVfM Video Source · 29 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Dangers of Modern Feminism

Jessie Jay · 29 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

That's it. I've reached the boiling point. I do not care how many friends I lose, or how many feathers I ruffle over this, but I am making it one of my sole missions in life to illustrate exactly what modern day feminism has become, and to learn and do everything I can to prevent its infection of the intelligent minds of my generation and beyond. What was originally a just and noble cause has slowly, venomously turned into an ideology that at its core is hell bent on systematically destroying the reality of a free and open society.

First of all, feminism prescribes to the belief that male-hood and masculinity in general, is some kind of problem that must be eradicated. Men are oppressors of women, now and throughout history, and that is the so-called Patriarchy. I encourage you to think long and hard about what this means. Not with your feelings, or perceived victim-hood, but with your rational thinking mind. What is this doing to the public perception of men? How is this changing the dynamic of healthy discussion and daily dialog? And what could the ultimate goal be?

I witnessed a friend the other day absolutely ostracized by several of his peers on social media because he had the audacity to criticize the perceived motives behind a disagreement that was presumptuously based on gender. Simply because he did not prescribe to the exact belief system of feminism in it's entirety, (that men are inherently oppressive) he was insulted and ganged up on with no opportunity for reasonable discussion on the matter. Intelligent dialog was stifled, criticism impossible, and rational thinking made irrelevant. He was a man, therefore, he was wrong, it was that simple. Importantly, however, it was not only the opposition that he was met with which was disturbing to me but the fervor and intensity with which the opposition attacked him that was particularly noteworthy. It was violent, highly emotional and very ugly. This kind of behavior and the justification of it can be seen all over college and university campuses today.

And herein I believe, lies the real danger with modern feminism; it seems as an ideology, to be absolutely immune to criticism and can, therefore, operate even aggressively if necessary, with impunity, under any circumstance.

The feminist movement and its allies can do this and act this way because who could possibly oppose gender equality? That's what feminism is all about! Only a monster could oppose such a positive thing, and it's ok to kill monsters right? I'm being extreme, but the point is valid. If you oppose feminism in any way, you can be vilified, publicly shamed, silenced, called a misogynist, insulted, and slandered; all in the name of standing up for equal rights.

Clearly though now, feminism is no longer about equal rights. It has swung so far the other way that it can be credited with the strategic demonization and demasculinization of men. See here, where the frequently used term 'toxic masculinity' proves the immoral motives of the movement that I asked you to think about before.

The feminist belief that men are flawed and inherently bad simply because of their maleness is obviously false and illogical, but it's just one small aspect of the debilitating and damaging effects the ideology is having on a forward moving, creative and free society. There are many other suffocating social causes that it has gone on to take under its eternal justice war-wing: trigger warnings, safe spaces (where should they end?), cultural appropriation, political correctness, privilege, word-banning, and microaggressions. These seemingly well-intentioned gestures of social policy are in fact slowly and carefully destroying the very fabric of society in which cultural progress, intelligent discussion and free speech should not be only possible, but absolutely encouraged.

I urge you to continue to think further for yourselves on this matter. Continue to question everything presented to you about it, including what I'm telling you, and please do not just fall prey to every emotional whimsy thrown at you by the latest viral video #deardaddy or celebrity allegiance (I'm looking at you Beyonce) #banbossy.

To remain a vigilant, critical thinker in this complicated and convoluted world is the single most socially responsible and important thing that we can do to stop the dangerous force of modern feminism and its destructive effect on our educational institutions and society as a whole. To be an ally of rational thought, evidence-based arguments, and truth should be our just and noble cause. It should be a movement for open, uninhibited education, truth seeking, free-thinking and discussion, as well as the evolution of emotion-based belief systems into rational discourse. Before we succumb completely to the perceptions of victimization and oppression that feminism so eagerly wants to impose on the men and women of this world, we must first stand up for being able and capable human beings, with the capacity to maintain a free and equal society, the one that feminism originally aspired to create.

I welcome any discussion here forth on the matter, because to me, it is the most important one of our time.

Why circumcision is the same as FGM

AVfM Video Source · 30 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sub to Peter's YouTube channel here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Kf7_eD-aZ7g&feature=youtu.be Mechanics of manspreading

AVfM Video Source · 30 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In a world of industrial design that clearly doesn't respect a Gentleman's physiology, Man-spreading should be seen for what it really is, the body-struggle for life and death. It's a personal, yet very public battle for survival in a world that wasn't built with humble lumberjack-warrior-poet in mind. Man-spreading isn't just some trendy symptom of male obliviousness. It's not some Orwellian conspiracy to take over a man's resting Junk habitus. On the contrary, Man-spreading is an emergent, almost miraculous solution to the dystopia of public transportation seating. We should celebrate Man-Spreading and teach it to our children, and our children's children. Man-spreading is the body's calling card of everyday Heroes. It's the people's posture, and it's here to stay.

Subscribe to Kelly Starrett here

Distracted purpose

Clint Carpentier · 30 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We call them entertainment, we call them passions, we call them bad habits, we call them addictions. What we don't call them, are distractions. I've had many arguments regarding them, but I've never pointed the finger at the cause of the problem. But what IS, the problem?

First, I want to make it clear that I'm not attempting to silver bullet anything.

I've spent a large part of my life trying to reduce stress in my life; I can't stand the shit. I'd gotten so far as to conclude, that stress and money are intimately entwined, increasing one always meant a reduction of the other; nothing else mattered outside of that paradigm. For this, I developed a deep-seated hatred for money. People like to throw around the cliche, "money can't buy you happiness," but what is happiness? Happiness is nothing more than a lack of misery, which translates to a lack of stress. By that reasoning, you could say that I hate happiness. You'd be right, but for the wrong reasons.

I am a coward, and I am a pacifist, and for this, I've never been competitive. I am also extremely introverted, so I've never purposely been the center of attention; my boogeyman is an embarrassment. Finally, I've spent my life surrounded by impoverished people, leaving me with a dim view of whiny poor people; own your poverty for fuck sake. To be blunt, I've spent my decades people watching.

People truly hate being categorized, no matter how perfect the fit of the box you put them in. Yes, you are an individual, just like the cogs of a clock. Civilization is a machine, and all machines require cogs to function. This is where we develop cognitive dissonance. Sadly, we are sentient creatures, self-reflective, wondering what our purpose is. Religion tends to fill the void with a non-answer, for those who don't want to think about it. "You are part of god's plan." It's an empty answer. Science has explained it more fully, but it is not nearly as feel good. "Sperm meets egg, nothing else matters." In either case, the purpose is purposely not answered.

Unfortunately, no one can tell you what your purpose is, but in the meantime, bills need to be paid. Until you figure that out, you could say, your purpose is to pay bills. The more you think about this, the deeper the spiraling void of nihilism exposes itself.

Those of us who can't determine our purpose, tend to fall victim to my original statement, entertainment, passions, bad habits, and addictions. How can we fall victim to entertainment or passions? Well… money.

Entertainers and athletes contribute nothing to society. But they'll bitch and moan to get another million bucks to show up at an event. And you will pay it, out of the meager cash you earned keeping civilization tottering along, you will pay it. You will pay it because they will distract you from your reality. That distraction means more to you than you do.

I've made mention in comments that movies are getting too flashy for me to enjoy properly. It's white noise, for the sake of noise. How much shit can we throw at the wall before people quit paying to see it? What is a professional athlete, but a multi-million dollar child at play? Women find more meaning in media stars private lives than they do in their own lives, and the same goes for men and athletes. As much as it sickens me, it's still the cheapest form of distraction.

Passions are expensive. Whether it's family, hobbies, or activism; this distraction doesn't come cheap. That's not to say it will fail; you stand a reasonably good chance of discovering your purpose in doing these. This assumes you can find contentment in how you go about paying the bills. If per chance you can pay your bills, and somehow finance your passions, you are a person with purpose clarified.

Bad habits are expensively cheap, for this reason, most of us avoid them. It's no joke that prison is for the poor. People are inherently doers, and we will find things to do, whether legal or not, lest we let our minds take us down the spiral of hell. Men generally get nihilistic and self-destructive when they have nothing to do; women generally get narcissistic, but the end is the same, self-destruction. Crime in and of itself isn't A problem, so much as it's a venting of the frontal lobe trying to fulfill a purpose, which no living creature has. Crime can be prevented, through work; people will live and raise families in poverty, and even be content to do so, if they have something to do.

I've put a lot of thought to why we do this to ourselves, and still it baffles me.

Let's look at addictions, sex, drugs, alcohol, etc. For the most part, what we deem as "addictions" aren't even problematic, until something else comes into play. Take, for example, alcoholism. People can go their whole lives addicted to alcohol, and feeding their addiction, and it is never a problem. But add into that an unforeseen event (say a financial problem), which competes with the addiction; well now the addiction is THE problem, even if it didn't cause the problem in the first place. Let me give an anecdote:

My uncle and aunt are both alcoholics. Traditional marriage, he commuted to work gone for weeks at a time, and she stayed at home raising the kids. He drove off-road logging trucks in some of the most dangerous logging roads in the world, to provide for a combative wife (and just for posterity, my aunt is the blood relation). One day he comes home, and she tells him they're gonna need welfare; I'm sure you can imagine the scene of that. One thing leads to another, and he decided that if he needs aid, he just won't work anymore, so he quit his job. This lead to a divorce, which I was too young to know the details of; but what's remembered by anyone, is that they're both alcoholics who struggle to make ends meet. You'll be glad to know, that their three kids managed to survive the fiasco, and grow up to be adults of relatively good standing; the "what if's" don't bear mentioning.

Look at Jian Ghomeshi; one could say he's addicted to aggressive sex. As long as everything is consensual, I don't have an issue with his kinks. And his life went on rather smoothly until something else decided to compete with that, call it hypergamy.

Addictions are little more than distracted purpose.

So what is purpose? Purpose is the reason we tolerate the pain we go through. When you've gone through the gamete of reasoning out why you're going through all your pain and suffering, and there's nothing left to distract you from it, and there's no purpose to be found, and the non-answers are no longer satisfying, suicide looms large in the mind.

Earl Silverman committed suicide on 26 April 2013; he had a great passion, and he made it his purpose to fulfill that desire. Gynocentrism came into competition with his addiction to male suffering, and drove him to the ultimate sacrifice, and still, what do we remember?

I have enough empathy to ball my eyes out whenever I think about it; but sadly, I don't have the compassion, patience, and balls, to take up the torch and run. I am a coward, pure and simple; do you have the balls to say that much? I want to hear you say it, "I am a coward." I will hold no judgment on you for saying it. Naturally, if you're in the process of slaying dragons, I will forgive you for not admitting your cowardice. The following is for those of us cowards who may need purpose still.

Ye who wearith thy cog costume…

I recognize your impact on civilization. I appreciate your contribution to MY comfort. Be ye a trucker, farmer, plumber, electrician or ass-wipe measurer. I care about you because you have impacted my life in some measure, which I will figure out if given time to think about it, you matter to me. Please don't add to the skeletal hands which haunt me, that hold up the comforts I so enjoy.

‘Angry Lesbians’

andybob · 30 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Tim Patten has written a sharp rebuke to those radicalized lesbian feminists (RLFs) who have continued to infect the discourse on gender politics with, what are essentially, manifestations of their vitriolic self-loathing and rationalizations for their own dangerously maladjusted psyches. He has done so without generalizing about lesbians or drawing rash conclusions about them and their place in the world. That is quite an achievement.

In many ways, RLFs have been protected by the deranged extremism of their actions and words. It ‘s hard to take anyone who parades their genitalia as a form of politicized performance art seriously. Sometimes I wonder if choral scream-singing lamentations about God only knows what is just a clever ruse to misguide bemused onlookers into thinking that RLFs are nothing more than a bunch of shrill but harmless crazies who couldn’t possibly organize themselves into a well-connected entity that wields any real power and influence.

That’s certainly what their NAFALT enablers want people to think, but they know better – and so do MHRAs. AVfM readers are already very familiar with the bilious anti-male bigotry of Bindle and Jeffreys and have long been aware of the immense power and influence they wield. Jeffreys was a consultant on Australia’s DV laws, which should send a chill down the spine of anyone who demands that such laws be gender-neutral. But, no, they’re just a pair of nutters that MHRAs are foolish to pay any heed – real feminists are all about equality stupid.

An LGBT activist group has decided that gay men aren’t oppressed enough to deserve representation (see the sidebar) and have demanded that all gay men be removed from their positions within the movement. There is no doubt that RLFs were responsible for this and probably justified it with their ideological belief that cis homosexual shitlords benefited from too much unearned male privilege. Many were surprised by this, but those of us who have long been aware of the RLF hijack of LGBT understand that the takeover has simply moved on to its logical conclusion.

This should be the wake-up call that many gay men need that RLFs are not, and have never been, their friends or allies. For God’s sake, what do RLFs have to do before the penny finally drops among gay men that they are men, which, according to feminist ideology, makes them the enemy? RLFs actively opposed the repeal of sodomy statutes because they feared that this would make gay men the legal equals of straight men, thus swelling the ranks of the Patriarchy. RLFs never resented gay men just because they represented serious competition on the victim market; they loathed gay men for their own sake – because they were men. It’s time for gay men to realize that they are, indeed, men, and be damn proud of it.

It is profoundly revealing to watch lesbians attempt to mimic what they imagine being typical male behaviour. It is invariably violent, insensitive and humourless. Question any of their aggressive antics and you will be met with either angry denials or told, “So its OK when men do it, but not women.” Um, no. It’s not OK when men do it, and what made you believe that I would think that it was? Because I’m a man? They don’t have a clue about men or how to be one.

Ironically, it is my observation that many lesbians engage in DV because of their innately female love of drama, with all of the attendant backbiting, escalation, disrespect for boundaries and clique mentality – it’s all there. Lesbians do DV in a uniquely female way, which is why it’s usually so drawn-out, involves a lot more talking than necessary and is so shockingly vicious. They can fight it all they want, but they’re stuck with being women, and there’s nothing they can do about it.

There’s a very good reason gay men are so intimidated by RLFs: we’ve seen them up close and personal more than most people and know that they are very dangerous, unpredictable and anti-social individuals who inhabit a toxic world that reflects their angry and disaffected selves – the source of the anarchical perspectives they’d like to impose on the world around them. They are the antithesis of gay men. To put it mildly, RLFs are never interested in having a good time unless it somehow involves hurting someone they hate – which is practically everybody, including themselves.

The challenge in dealing with RLFs is convincing people that they need to regard them as more than a free-bleeding carnival act with a fetish for eugenics and concentration camps. They are politically influential and have wrought tremendous destruction within our institutions and will continue to do so unless stopped. No group is more responsible for failing to stop them than the kind of feminists who lie through their teeth when they tell you that RLFs are harmless, closely followed by gay men, who have known about the true nature of RLFs longer than anyone else.

An Ear for Men hits 1,000 subs on YouTube

AVfM Video Source · 31 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

And Paul announces a change in his priorities. You can sub to his AEFM channel here.

Dr. Said Bakir of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 31 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Said Bakir of London has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website circumcision-london.co.uk:

“Welcome to the IMC Circumcision Clinic London
The IMC Circumcision Clinic London has performed over 10,000 safe, pain-free circumcisions on males of all ages. Our award-winning centre performs circumcision in London using the most modern and safe methods paying close attention to achieving a good cosmetic outcome and minimising discomfort.

We serve a large community of London Muslims, a large adult community from across the UK, a local Jewish community, families of various cultural backgrounds and private patients for therapeutic circumcision. Whatever the reason is – we welcome all to use our services.”

There is no way of knowing if any of those poor mutilated infants had a “pain-free ” circumcision, and as far as “minimising discomfort,” the doctor should refrain from this surgery on infants, as recently recommended by the AAP.

Under the heading “Reasons why people choose IMC – the leading Circumcision Clinic in London for children and adults” we read:

> Any age at one place: We offer circumcision to male infants, babies, children, young men and adults.
>
> Circumcision leaders: Being the leading innovative centre in London, we were one of the early adopters of the Plastibell® ring method for boys, which has since become a widely used method for babies and children. Clinic director and expert in Plastibell®, Dr. Said Bakir MD MSc, has used this method since the late 1980s and has trained many of the circumcision practitioners in London in the use of this method, which helps to reduce bleeding and improves the cosmetic outcome, making it one of the most popular circumcision procedures today.
>
> Home visits: For babies and young children, you can choose to either come to our clinic or have the circumcision carried out in the comfort of your own home across most of North London, West London, South London and East London.

You say “any age,” but not any sex. Actually, both male and intersexed infants are snipped willy-nilly, with just females enjoying the human rights and genital integrity that should be afforded all infants in a civilized society.

These “Circumcision leaders” you speak of are leading the lemmings of ignorance that result in the sexual mutilation and abuse of baby boys. Glad to know you are leaders in the courageous battle to remove that dirty, horrible little piece of skin that seems to bother everyone but the infant.

As if this surgery isn’t risky enough, we allow this in people’s homes? Are there no standards of medicine when it regards infant boys?

See Dr. Bakir and the IMC Circumcision Clinic promote genital mutilation in this video that seeks to destroy little boys’ foreskin that may one day become a cave that’s “warm, wet, and dark.” Don’t let the soft music fool you, this is a genital mutilation that is most likely illegal and is unethical to perform on an unconsenting infant.

Under "News and Articles" we see Dr. Bakir posing with the inventor of the Shang Ring, an adult circumcision device that the Gates Foundation helped develop and wants to use on 20 million African men. That's why Dr. Bakir includes a video of Bill Gates – a supposed humanitarian – promoting a barbaric torture device that is unproven and unneeded.

Under "Benefits," we see:

> And the benefits extend to your partner too. Why?
> Because a circumcised penis is much easier to keep clean and almost odour-free.

So, rather than clean that body part, we should CUT IT OFF?

Doesn't really make sense, does it?

Since Dr. Bakir's website has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Bakir's practice information follows:

IMC Circumcision Clinic London
130 Llanover Road
Wembley
HA9 7LT
Email: reception@integralmedical.co.uk

> Dr. Said Bakir of London, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/hMDgMxD0Xl @AndreaHardie #nocirc #intactivism #mgm pic.twitter.com/hrYnUDjWck
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 1, 2016

Superman

andybob · 31 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then we publish a few comments from the inimitable Andybob. The following is a snapshot of his thoughts on the subject of female entitlement. – Eds

According to that 'Dear Daddy' video, men are even responsible when their daughters are victims of male violence because they failed to speak up in response to that sexist joke someone told in some locker room when they were fifteen years old.

Feminist dogma insists that men are responsible for everything that happens in the world because, apparently, we run it. Therefore, if men wanted rape to stop, then we would make it stop because the Patriarchy, to which we all belong, has the power to do that kind of thing.

This is the central tenet of feminist ideology and explains why it is a cult of female victimhood. What isn't so easily explained is why so many women buy into a concept that is so obviously absurd.

* * *

All men are assumed to be Supermen: all-seeing, all-knowing, all-powerful entities who exert control over everything. This is how most women, at least sub-consciously, perceive men. It is where the contempt for vulnerable men comes from. "What's wrong with you? You're supposed to be Superman like every other man." It also explains their glee when they see one of these alleged superheroes come a cropper.

One of the reasons why PUA philosophy is so toxic is that it promotes the idea that men should try to fulfil some kind of man-as-Superman ideal. Vulnerability is not allowed, only masculine prowess, fitness, success and the unrelenting maintenance of 'frame'. Depressed about not being able to see your kids? Get over it dude and stop being such a loser.

Throughout PUA criticism of the MHRM is the accusation that we somehow celebrate male vulnerability, which makes us all a bunch of whiners. They completely fail to understand that MHRAs want our culture to recognize male vulnerability and take it seriously enough to offer just and viable solutions to whatever has made them vulnerable. This is completely different from celebrating it.

MHRAs want the humanity of men to be acknowledged and respected, whereas PUAs just want to perpetuate the man-as-Superman myth – the foundation of gynocentrism – that prevents this from happening. In other words, PUAs insist that men should try to be the invulnerable superheroes that most women want them to be, whereas MHRAs encourage men to be who they really are and to ignore those who attempt to shame them for them for it.

The MHRM presents the revolutionary idea that men are neither superheroes or failed superheroes: we're just people. This is something that many women, and quite a few men – the kind who have bought into the idea that women have a monopoly on being people – just don't want to hear.

* * *

That's where it begins: little girls expecting Daddy to be their Superman who can right all the wrongs in their little worlds and is responsible for everything. Feminist embitterment stems from their belief that Daddy preferred being Clarke Kent instead of using his superpowers to make the world perfect for his little princess – the lazy, uncaring bastard.

Just A Minute

Robert Brockway · 31 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The World Food Program (WFP) is a branch of the United Nations. It ostensibly exists to distribute food to those in need to address hunger and food security. Their mandate would suggest that they would be compelled by the UN and the world community to distribute food in a non-discriminatory way – but this is not so. The WFP routinely discriminates in the manner in which it distributes food. The WFP is so proud of this they announce it its website. Even many MRAs may be shocked to discover that the WFP only distributes food to women:

> "It is our methodology to distribute only to women to ensure that food gets to women and children in Haiti," she said. "Every time we have not had adequate security escorts, we have had riots at food sites."

The news article headline on the WFP website proudly announces that they prioritize food distribution to women, but the text of the article makes it clear that only women will have food distributed to them. The kindest possible interpretation of the headline is that staff at the WFP don't understand the meaning of the world 'prioritize' since this is clearly not consistent with the text of the news article.

The expectation is that these women would then distribute the food to their entire family – even the men and boys. There are unfortunately several issues with this approach.

Distributing food only to women would seem to leave families without women (such as those that had lost female family members during natural disasters) out in the cold, and hungry. The WFP has previously claimed that special provision is made for families that do not include women. It seems difficult to believe that in the chaotic environment that the WFP would generally need to operate in (following natural disasters for example) that their staff would have the resources to safely investigate the claims of men that they have no women in their family.

We can see similar policies from the American Red Cross. Advocates for the LGBT community have specifically raised this as a risk that gay men face following disasters:

> However, these men still needed a woman in order to actually benefit from distribution, because the Red Cross policy only allowed women to stand in line and present the ration cards for aid.

This is not theoretical as various organizations advocating for the LGBT community have provided case studies in which families consisting only of men and boys were excluded from food distribution in Haiti following the 2010 Haiti Earthquake and went hungry as a result.

Distributing food only to women opens up the possibility that hungry men, denied food because of their gender alone, may simply take food from women after they leave the distribution centers. This is called robbery and the policies of the WFP, and the American Red Cross are encouraging it. This policy would, in fact, seem to increase the chances of violence against women.

The United Nations itself has explicit prohibitions regarding discrimination against women but apparently refuses to take any action when it comes to discrimination against men. We can see this policy applied through UN and non-UN agencies alike.

Some Cultures Are Better Than Others

AVfM Video Source · 1 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Raping Boys is bad, Sucking baby’s penises is bad!”

Paul Joseph Watson

Unpacking comments on my Jian Ghomeshi video | Part 1

AVfM Video Source · 1 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Karen is doing her work on SJW/Feminist responses to Gomeshi video and some announcements.

Screenshot of the comment, for anyone who wants to read along: http://imgur.com/mX4RYoJ

Info on sexual assault of men by women: http://www.apa.org/news/press/release…
http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/17…
http://time.com/3393442/cdc-rape-numb…

Anyone with an employment lead for Nick Reading, please email him here: mensrightsedmonton@gmail.com

Tim Goldich in Canada: http://ncfm.org/2016/03/news/event/ev…

The success of #Brexit may help men

Lucian Vâlsan · 1 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

#Brexit is the campaign to persuade the British electorate to vote to get the United Kingdom out from the European Union on June 23, 2016, on the scheduled in-out referendum.

The issue of #Brexit has been "traditionally" associated with the political Right since, in the last 15 or so years, it was mostly the UK Independence Party campaigning for it. But the issue itself is not really Rightist in nature (and not really Leftist in nature, either). Back in the days of Margaret Thatcher, it was the traditional constituency of the Left arguing against EEC/EU membership – and even today there is a growing movement within the political Left that puts out the Left-Wing case for #Brexit.

Just like the cause of Men's Rights, the cause of #Brexit transcends partisan political divides and there are at least two big reasons for which individuals who care about men's rights should consider backing the #Brexit campaign.

1. Feminist and politically correct influence

While it is indeed true that there is a seemingly never-ending stream of local ideologues in positions of power that do wreck absolute havoc for men in Britain (just think of Jess Phillips as an example) – it is also true that part of the problems that men face today in Britain and the other 27 members of the Bruxellian Block are inflicted by the remote, unaccountable and barely visible bureaucracy in the Belgian capital city.

A couple of examples are in order.

The EU controls several areas of the economy – and one of these areas is fishing, through the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP) which, at least in theory, is supposed to set quotas for which Member States are allowed to catch what amounts of each type of fish, as well as encouraging the fishing industry through various market interventions.

That's the theory. In practice, the CFP is everything the bureaucracy wants it to be and, these days, it wants the CFP to be a tool for feminist activism through the committee's "concern" over the role of women in fisheries[PDF]. For now, the goal to compel all businesses (including small family businesses) to have 40 or 50% female employees (which would amount to forcing a family business to employ another female and take the wife on the boat) has been rejected by the Council of the EU (or the Council of Ministers as it's colloquially known).

However, the Juncker Commission made it clear since its installation in mid 2014 that they will "step up for gender equality" – which, translated into normal English, means that the Commission will attempt to turn this into a directive and thus subvert even the tiny amount of democratic pretense that exists in the Council of Ministers.

For those unfamiliar – a directive is a decision imposed by the college of commissioners (28 of them) that is to be enacted by all 28 countries without any appeal. The commissioners are not accountable to anyone, and the electorate has no way of removing them.

Even if the Commission doesn't act, in 2017 and 2018 will gradually enter into force the new provisions of the CAP (the Common Agricultural Policy) which will see small businesses (not just in fisheries, but all agriculture-related sectors) being compelled to fill out forms to explain to Brussels why they don't have "gender equality" in their tiny farms.

This kind of insanity hits straight into the poorest men in the rural areas who are trying to make an honest living on their own land.

Another example is the (in)famous European Framework for Promotion of Tolerance (EFPT), covered here back in 2013. It's still on the table. Following a massive backlash, the Barroso Commission swept it under the rug, but, with the current Commission's "commitment to gender equality" (read: commitment to feminist agitprop), it would be quite surprising if this monstrosity won't be attempted again by 2018.

For those unfamiliar with the EFPT, one of its provisions is that 14-year-olds who express an anti-feminist position in school are to be considered absolute bigots to be sent to "undergo a rehabilitation programme designed to instill in them a culture of tolerance" (Section 7b, EFPT). Now combine that with the already existing policies meant to "prevent radicalization" which see 15-year-olds questioned by the police for the crime of looking at legal and legitimate political parties websites.

So, while the EU is not the only source of misandric garbage in law and policies, it certainly is a relevant factor, and the success of #Brexit will remove that. Not having some of your laws written by the Swedish feminists of the United Nordic Green Left is, quite simply, a good thing in and of itself.

2. Local control

There are quite a sizeable amount of men's issues that either cannot be addressed at all or can barely be addressed as long as the EU is as it is now, namely heavily skewed towards believing any Feminist claptrap.

For instance, even if MRAs were to hold a majority in the Parliament and seize control of the budget of the United Kingdom and would choose to no longer fund misandric "research" – this still would not stop the leak of taxpayer funds (mostly paid by men) into such agitprop research.

The reason is the fact that a significant chunk of these activities are not decided in the United Kingdom – but in Brussels.

Take for instance the "Agile Nation 2" project currently going on in Wales, which is 80% Brussels-funded and is aimed exclusively to create disloyal competition in the market favoring women to the detriment of men.

The European Social Fund is an entire instrument that is disproportionately focused on favoring women over men using mostly Brussels-commended funds and, of course, UK tax pounds (again, disproportionately paid by men).

We could go on like this for another 20 thousand words, and we would barely scratch the surface. There are thousands upon thousands of such initiatives whose primary purpose is to create employment for feminist ideologues and secondary purpose to help women over men.

The EU shows no signs of attempting to steer away from such a focus. As a result, as long as Britain is part of the EU, some of these things cannot get better – even if Mike Buchanan were to become Prime Minister tomorrow and J4MB were to have 400 seats in the House of Commons.

#Brexit presents a very good opportunity to start making some of these things better.

Why this matter for non-British individuals

The outcome of this referendum is of relevant importance in many regards, both for the other 27 countries inside the EU, but also for the world at large.

But, strictly from a men's rights perspective, a potential win of the #Brexit campaign can have positive ripple effects across the continent.

If the #Brexit campaign wins this referendum, there's already signs that this will incentivise similar campaigns (e.g. Czexit). Now, that doesn't mean that similar campaigns necessarily have to be successful. But it does mean that the emergence of similar campaigns would put additional pressure on Brussels to reform itself. Once that happens, it's open season for demands that are now politically unassailable.

For instance, MRAs could individually team-up with various groups to get the EU completely out from the curricula of our children – which is currently being stealthily shaped into a feminist-minded form that is already rubbing feathers the wrong way with parents in France, Italy, Poland, Hungary or Spain.

Once a demand like "reform or disintegrate" can indeed carry some weight (and it could, should the #Brexit campaign win), non-feminists across the remaining 27-countries block could start pushing back with a lot bigger success rate.

Also, let's not forget the countries that are not in the EU but are inextricably related to the EU – especially Serbia, Norway, and Switzerland, except the latter has its own system of referenda for anything and can thus push back far easier when EU-influenced ideologues try nasty things (as has recently happened). These countries and others that are sort of culturally-dependent on the EU could also be positively affected if the calls for reform generated by a success of the #Brexit campaign would lead to a shift in the mentality and the worldview projected by Brussels.

If one tries hard enough, additional reasons could be found, but even for these two reasons, alone British non-feminists should consider backing the #Brexit effort and everyone else should consider speaking to a British friend about the benefits of #Brexit.

A success of the #British campaign can indeed strike a serious blow into what we colloquially refer to as "the feminist establishment". Just think of the feminists at the BBC (currently paid by the EU to broadcast biased information about the referendum). Some of them could lose their jobs or their credentials with a success of #Brexit.

Just saying.

I love my female privilege

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 2 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I love being a woman! The shit I can get away with! Tee hee!
https://youtu.be/kkCQvuWw2HI

‘Alpha’ ain’t born…

Editorial Staff · 2 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following Blog entry was posted on AVFM forums by one of its members, Maxx. It is edited and republished here with his permission. ED

People within the MRM and beyond like to toss around the terms Alpha and Beta. I think the ways in which these terms get typically thrown around are misguided and potentially harmful and deterministic. Anything ‘manly’ from fighting to sex with women to making money to building muscle to learning to be a good husband and father, whatever ‘alpha’ means to you it can be achieved through hard-work. Don’t let anyone tell you different. Nothing is a birthright, for anyone. It’s ALL LEARNED and LEARNABLE.

The great myth of the universe is the idea that it isn’t; that you are assigned the role of a ‘winner’ (alpha) or the role of a ‘loser’ (beta) at birth.

The majority of professional combat sports champions the world over were victims of bullying at some point during their formative years. Many of them (like Mike Tyson) are patrons of anti-bullying charities and organizations exactly because of that. Let that idea swirl around in your head for a moment. How does that reality sit alongside the idea that our place in the pecking order and our status as a man is ‘fixed’ rather than mobile and something we can proactively assert agency of and decisive influence over? The only ONLY thing any man is stuck with is his height. Everything else can be changed through an assertive, proactive application. Also known as “taking the bull by the horns:”

> A poor guy can work smart and get richer.
> A weak guy can lift weights and eat right and get stronger.
> A push over can train martial arts and learn to fight.
> A fat guy can run to lose weight.
> A slob can dress right.
> A bad husband can be better tomorrow than he was today.
> A guy who’s a sap around women can apply himself and up his game.

The great lie is that you can’t because you haven’t been dealt the right hand. It’s an excuse weak men cling to justify giving up before they even have to start. The terms as they are typically used these days imply a sense of determinism about a given man’s ‘lot’ in life that’s well wide of the mark. When people talk about ‘beta’ they are really referring to a negative way of behaving and thinking, a set of behaviors and responses that are not only LEARNT, but that can (and should) be UN-LEARNT too.

When people evoke ‘beta’, they are typically talking about a set of ideas and behaviors that males within feminist cultures and societies are conditioned into believing and adopting. Not a state into which individual men are merely ‘born’.

The only difference between the 'alpha' and the 'beta' going strictly by the most common definitions of the terms (as different modes of thinking and acting about women) is the ability to adapt. The alpha, according to THIS definition, is merely the guy who adapts in the face of failure and adversity, and the beta is the one the keeps doing the same things over and over expecting the universe to gift him a different outcome 'this time.' If every time a man makes a mistake he makes an effort to learn from that mistake and to avoid repeating; eventually he'll become 'alpha' in relation to whatever field he's applied himself to in this manner. It's as simple as that. But in evolutionary terms, the terms alpha and beta refer to something very different than their current usages (based on popularized PUA and Red Pill definitions of these terms).

Strictly speaking (dialing the terms back to their evolutionary psychology roots) EVERY alpha starts as a beta. That's literally speaking what a 'real' beta IS. An aspiring alpha. Because 'alpha' is learnt. Alpha ain't born. At some point, the pain of staying where you are has to outweigh the fear of taking a proactive step forward into the unknown. A lot of men never reach that tipping point. Happy to coast along in relative comfort and relative misery. The guys that end up looking 'alpha' to others are merely the guys that couldn't stand the situation they were in so badly that they got it together and figured out a way to get out of it and advance proactively in a way that elevated their status relative to those around them.

When it comes to mating and dating most guys we refer to as 'beta' in Red Pill and PUA circles aren't really beta…in the real (evolutionary) sense of the word. Most average joes (typically referred to as 'beta') are more like Gamma and Delta males. They never attempt to assert any proactive agency over their romantic or sexual lives. They let the chips fall where they may; they aren't tactical in their approaches and interactions with women. They don't adapt in the face of adversity. They aren't systematic. They're just coast along. They want a wife and two kids, and they are happy to pull her apple cart to get it. But they don't realize that without game and proactive relationship management today's divorce laws and family court system will leave them pulling the apple cart forever without the wife and kids to show for it.

Another set of guys who are often mislabeled as 'beta' is basement dwelling nerdy types who are male virgins and have opted out of the dating and mating game entirely and are wasting their time waiting for someone to invent a convincing sex doll that they can buy to dump their loads. These guys aren't really 'beta' at all. They are more like Omega males. Some of them like to call themselves MGTOW and claim they are on some kinda 'dick strike' in the hope that those mean old nasty-ass women will 'change their ways'. Most of these poor guys don't realize that for as long as they pay the government via the tax system they ain't gonna 'change' jack shit besides their own stained bed sheets.

A TRUE beta is a guy who's merely trying to be better today than he was yesterday. At whatever he's applied himself to. A guy putting one foot in front of the other and trying to advance. A guy willing and able to do this in relation specifically to the dating and mating game quickly starts to look 'alpha' from the point of view of average joes. They don't even process that there is even a game being played at all so when they watch him playing it well, it's just witchcraft to their untrained eye. He just looks to them like a wizard instead of what he really actually is which is simply a player.

To the clueless average Joe, he's one of those guys that 'gets all the luck', or so they tell themselves as an excuse for not even attempting to proactively LEARN to play the game as effectively as he has in the first place.

[image]

It's easier to pretend there's no game at all.

And then there is the Sigma. This is a lone wolf. Not a pussy like an Omega. And not part of the overall wider social structures like the Gammas the Deltas and the Betas. Sigma is more like what a true MGTOW might be like. Living on his own terms. By his own means. EVERYTHING can be learned. Including active progression within these social structures and hierarchies. Including successful rewarding self-sufficient living outside them.

Another thing about this alpha/beta stuff that creates a lot of confusion is that these terms (in their most common definitions) are too restrictive. They suggest if a guy is alpha is one aspect of his life he must be alpha in all of them. Like a man just 'is' or 'is not' 'alpha'… This is seldom how it works in reality. The guys that tend to get divorce raped the hardest tend to be 'alpha' when it comes to business and taking on and competing with other men over capital but very much 'beta' and clueless when it comes to women. That combination is what every golddigger's wet dreams are made of.

Meanwhile, on the flip side there are plenty of petty criminals and bums and junkies who are fairly useless at even managing to club together a basic living and stay clean and sober long enough to hold down a job, but they are 'alpha' enough to be able to seduce countless women, into not just bedding them, but also often funding their drug habits or binges or otherwise generally enabling their dysfunctional lifestyles as well.

So is the travelling homeless junkie musician 'beta' because he can't even afford a sandwich or water to wash dirt from under his fingernails with? Or 'alpha' because he sleeps in a different beautiful young woman's bed every night? Young women, he's more than willing and able to manipulate into paying for his heroin? Is the 27-year-old self-made multi-millionaire investment banker 'alpha' because he's made more money than anyone else his age ever has in his massive multi-billion dollar companies history? OR is he 'beta' because he can't get a girl to even tell him her name without paying her to?

It's all really a lot more complex than this simplistic alpha/beta distinction suggests. But the crux of it is that everything worth knowing, being and doing can be LEARNED. And any man telling you any different is a loser trying to drag you down to their level because it's easier than figuring out how to stand tall for himself.

#CallItRape: Social Media Campaign to raise awareness of male victims for Sexual Assault Awareness Month

Malcolm Yatson · 2 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Let's look at a hypothetical scenario: Joe, a man, walks into a bedroom and finds Sarah, a woman, lying unconscious. He begins having sex with her. She wakes up and starts screaming at him to stop, but he continues. Is this rape? Obviously, it is, I don't know anybody who would not call this rape. But now let's imagine the same scenario, but with the genders reversed: Joe is unconscious, and it is Sarah who walks in and begins having sex with him (for those asking, yes, men can get erections while unconscious). Here, I would still call it rape… but many people would disagree with me, instead claiming that men can only be "raped" if they are forcefully sodomized.

Unfortunately, it's not just a handful of regressives in our society that support this outdated view. Academics, government agencies, and even sexual violence organizations believe that a man can only be raped if he is sodomized. Two of the most commonly cited studies on rape statistics in the US are the NISVS from the CDC and the NCVS from the Bureau of Justice Statistics. These studies are also used by RAINN, the largest organization in the US advocating for victims of sexual violence. The definition of "rape" from the NCVS includes only "vaginal, anal, or oral penetration by the offender." Under this definition, it is only rape if the victim is penetrated by the rapist; a man who is forcefully sodomized has been raped, but a man who was forced to have sex with a woman has not been raped. The NISVS uses a similar definition of rape.

Academics in the field of sexual violence overwhelmingly support this "penetration by the offender" definition as well. In 1985, Mary P. Koss, with support from the Ms. Foundation and sponsored by the National Institute of Health, began work on the first rape study conducted in the US. Published in 1987, the results of her study yielded the now-infamous figure that 1 in 4 college women had been a victim of rape. Dr. Koss, a professor at the University of Arizona, remains one of the most influential figures in the field of sexual violence research, having published almost 300 works on violence against women as well as serving as an advisor to the CDC.

In a paper discussing the definition of "rape" used in rape studies, Koss writes that "it is important to restrict the term rape to instances where male victims were penetrated by offenders. It is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman." She does not give any reason for why this definition should be used, simply that it is important to use this definition.

Other academics have largely followed Dr. Koss's lead. For example, the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy contains numerous articles written by leading academic feminists. One of which, titled "Feminist Perspectives on Rape," defines rape in the opening sentence, stating that "rape is generally understood to involve sexual penetration of a person by force and/or without that person's consent." It is rare to find an academic who openly disagrees with this definition of rape.

As troubling as it is for prominent sexual violence researchers and federal agencies to support such a backward definition of rape, perhaps most alarming is the fact that even sexual abuse organizations have adopted this view. RAINN, for example, uses figures derived from this definition. On their site, RAINN states that 1 in 33 men have been raped and that 9 in 10 rape victims is female. Yet RAINN makes no attempt to specify that these figures only include men who were forcefully sodomized, as the organization apparently does not believe that a man who has been forced to have sex with a woman has been raped. Unfortunately, most people who see these statistics are unaware of the definition of them. As a result, the general public severely underestimates the actual number of male rape victims and female perpetrators, giving us a skewed and overly gendered view of rape and further marginalizing male rape victims.

The number of male victims being erased with these definitions is by no means insignificant. As other MRAs such as Karen Straughan have pointed out, the NISVS does have a separate category for men 'made to penetrate' their offender. An analysis of these figures shows that if the CDC counted it as a "rape" when a woman forced a man to have sex, men would be approximately as likely as women to be the victim of a completed and attempted rape in a given year. These victims are buried and forgotten by the CDC's deceptive definition of rape, and you will never see discussions of these figures by RAINN or other mainstream sexual violence organizations.

Arguably the most significant obstacle faced by males who have been raped by women is the simple fact that society often refuses to acknowledge their existence. This cannot change until the CDC, BJS, RAINN, and others driving our discussions of rape statistics to stop erasing male victims of rape through deceptive definitions. The issue of the exclusive definition of rape has been raised with these parties before, but previous attempts at addressing this issue have been, for the most part, unsuccessful. When questioned about their definition of rape, the CDC gives a rather tautological response: "Made to penetrate are incidents where the victim is forced to penetrate their perpetrator, so does not meet the definition of rape."

Unlike the CDC and BJS, RAINN has at least shown some concern for gender-neutrality. Shortly after a 2014 email campaign by MRAs, RAINN did change their "What can men do [to stop rape]?" page to a gender-neutral "What can bystanders do?" However the larger goal of the campaign, which was to convince RAINN to support a more progressive definition of rape, was not successful. RAINN gave a response which was initially encouraging but ultimately amounted to naught. Although RAINN indicated that they would look into the definitions of rape used on their website, they ultimately only made minor changes and continue to promote misleading rape statistics and endorse biased sexual violence studies.

Instead of continuing to rely on private communications such as e-mail, which are repeatedly ignored and brushed aside, this Sexual Assault Awareness Month I encourage everybody who cares about male victims of rape to voice their concerns on social media through the hashtag #CallItRape. Sexual Assault Awareness Month should not, as it often has in the past, focus almost entirely on female victims while giving only token acknowledgment, if any, of male victims. It is time to stop using deceptive definitions of rape to erase female perpetrators and male victims, and time to start having a more inclusive conversation about rape.

Below are the Twitter accounts for RAINN, the CDC, and the Bureau of Justice Statistics. Please Tweet these organizations using the hashtag #CallItRape to demand that they use a modern definition of rape and give male victims the same attention and support afforded to female victims. Unlike the CDC and the BJS, RAINN does not conduct their own rape studies, but their continued promotion of these misleading rape figures is inexcusable.

RAINN @RAINN01

CDC (publishers of the NISVS) @CDCgov

BJS (publishers of the NCVS) @BJSgov

Daddy and daughter trying to survive family court Episode 1: Corey Janzen @mrdragonbeard

AVfM Video Source · 3 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Corey Janzen, like millions of other men, is facing jail time and losing his daughter for money he doesn't have. Dean Esmay, Paul Elam of A Voice for Men, Mike of Mykeru Media, and Hannah Wallen of The HoneyBadger Brigade will be talking to him about his case and what can be done to help not just him but others in his situation. If you want to help Corey financially go here: https://www.gofundme.com/btvetg5s

Feminist Terminology 3: Privilege – TFF Episode 24

AVfM Video Source · 3 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 24 Professor Fiamengo discusses the third of five pernicious feminist terms: Privilege

StudioBrule

The Marine Corps prepares for women in combat roles with mandatory “unconscious bias” training

Michael Conzachi · 3 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Several news sources[1] are reporting that the Marine Corps will soon start “unconscious bias” training of all Marines, to challenge their unconscious prejudices and presuppositions as women begin transitioning as grunts for the first time. The goal, allegedly, is to allow for a smooth transition and head off any cultural resistance.

The code for “unconscious bias” training essentially means Twilight Zone style brainwashing and re-programing. Warning: Don’t watch the following video if you are under a doctor’s care or taking any kind of psychotropic medication.

I knew the women in combat issue had already been decided, but when I saw this new mandatory training requirement my first reaction was…… (silence, long exasperated exhaling of breath with eyes closed and head tiled down), more silence while staring at a blank wall for about five minutes; you get the picture.

By Brandon Grasley on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution cc-by-2.0).
Despite that the majority of Marines, both male and female are opposed to this politically correct social engineering experiment, the tiny percentage of effeminate and neutered Pentagon leaders are terrified of that cold hard stare from the uber-feminists.

A survey conducted in 2012 by The Center for Naval Analyses[2] found two-thirds of male Marines disapproved of integrating women, and a third of female Marines also opposed the idea. However, this survey was not considered when the decision to allow women combat roles was made. This same survey revealed that 80% of male infantry members were concerned about false allegations of sexual assault.

The conservative website, Truth Revolt[3] quipped, > this administration has turned the greatest fighting force on the planet into a social engineering petri dish.

Retired Army Lieutenant Colonel Ralph Peters, who is also a military analyst for the Fox News Channel, railed against the military's quest to be politically correct, stating,

> If I could make one change to improve our combat effectiveness in the military – it would be turning all those equal opportunity and sensitivity trainers and counselors into combat rifleman," he said. "We need more rifles. We don't need any more sensitivity.

Colonel Peters has also opined in the past that the primary purpose of the military is to blow shit up and kill people.

The massive social engineering, political correctness, and the demonization of male service members as rapists just waiting to strike, are taking their toll on the military, with recruitment numbers significantly down.[4]

I wonder if those making these ignorant decisions will be tooting that same horn when the female grunts start piling up in body bags, and what everyone in the Corps realizes, more male grunts in body bags as well.

The Marine Corps was the only service to request an exemption to keep some combat roles male-only. Defense Secretary Ash Carter denied the exemption request, saying he wanted to keep standards consistent across all services. The Marine Corps study determined that male-only units vastly outperformed mixed gender units on combat-related tasks, and Navy Secretary Ray Mabus bashed the Marine leaders who ran the study, saying they biased the results.

Rank and file Marines no longer trust Mabus, and neither does Marine General John Kelly. At his final Pentagon briefing before recently retiring, Kelly said there will be incredible pressure to collapse standards because of "agenda-driven" officials bent on seeing more women enter combat positions.

Speaking of Ray Maybus:

Here are just a few of the several thousand comments that have appeared on the various sites that have reported about the integration of women in the infantry and this training.

Ruzi; "As a retired female Marine, I predict an increase in false allegations of rape and sexual harassment, malingering, high fertility rates (especially before deployments), and a decrease in physical fitness standards and morale."

Jeffrey Gee; "Leave no man behind" unless you are a 100lb woman trying to carry a 200lb man off the field.

dygene; "There are no points for political correctness in combat, this insanity will get Marines killed both male and female."

0331; "Great, another round of useless touchy-feely indoctrination sessions, much like all Marines are rapists, and we have to be trained like circus monkeys not to rape brainwashing sessions. I'm glad I only have a few months to go before I'm out."

In July 2012, Marine Corps Captain Katie Petronio authored an article; "Get Over It. We Are Not All Created Equal,"[5] and since has been resoundingly criticized. She opines that combat roles ARE NOT for women and describes some of the physical problems she had just a few months into her deployment as a Combat Engineer.

> I had muscle atrophy in my thighs that was causing me to constantly trip and my legs to buckle with the slightest grade change. My agility during firefights and mobility on and off vehicles and perimeter walls was seriously hindering my response time and overall capability. It was evident that stress and muscular deterioration was affecting everyone regardless of gender; however, the rate of my deterioration was noticeably faster than that of male Marines and further compounded by gender-specific medical conditions.
>
> I can say with 100 percent assurance that despite my accomplishments, there is no way I could endure the physical demands of the infantrymen whom I worked beside as their combat load and constant deployment cycle would leave me facing medical separation long before the option of retirement.

Captain Petronio also provided a 20-minute interview on YouTube where she furthers describes the limitations of women.

I don't believe there is any unconscious bias on opening up combat roles to women; I think is completely conscious. I don't understand how every conceivable study, experiment, pure genetics, biology, lowering of standards, common sense and the wishes of the majority of the Marine Corps flat-out states that women are ill-equipped for combat roles.

The forcing of women into combat roles and now this so-called unconscious bias training instead of budget reductions means less money for bullets and combat training and ultimately a less effective and more gender divisive military.

Yet, another fail…….

Deep breath, deep breath, breeeeethe……..

*****

[1] http://www.military.com/daily-news/2016/03/18/all-marines-unconscious-bias-training-women-join-infantry.html

[2] http://www.cmrlink.org/content/home/36504/survey_of_marines_fails_to_show_support_for_women_in_direct_ground_combat_units

[3] http://www.truthrevolt.org/news/report-marines-brace-mandatory-sensitivity-training

[4] http://www.onenewsnow.com/national-security/2015/08/05/boykin-obama-policies-shortage-of-military-recruits

[5] https://www.mca-marines.org/gazette/blog/2012/07/05/get-over-it-we-are-not-all-created-equal Intersectional Feminism: What is it?

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If you have wondered why there are so many millennials on campus telling people to check their privilege, demanding trigger warnings, calling people out for microaggressions, and retreating to safe spaces, the Factual Feminist has the answer: Intersectional feminism.

American Enterprise Institute

Dr. Hammad Milak of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 4 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Hammad Malik has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Malik runs Circumcision London; this from his website:

“Circumcision London Appointments: 07958 335 204

Dr Malik has a private practice based in Harley Street, London.

The circumcision surgery is offered as a visiting service in London and Greater London for children from 7 days to 4 years of age.

Having a surgical background, I noticed that this much needed service was often not being undertaken in a safe or sterile manner. Also having personally circumcised our 3 boys at home and subsequently many of my colleagues and friends boys I could fully empathise with their anxieties over this very important phase in their child’s life.”

Wow. Genital mutilation being visited on baby boys in their own home, making that home a constant reminder of this traumatic event.

Here’s a terrifying video of Dr. Malik mutilating an infant, making permanent amputation seem like nothing more than a tooth extraction.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Malik’s practice information follows:

Tel: 0207 060 6789
10 Harley Street
London
W1G 9PF
Email: info@harleystreetgp.com
Mobile:07958 335 204 or 07951 726 844
No new enquiries after 9pm please.
Email Dr Malik: hammadmalik10@gmail.com

> Dr Hammad Milak of London, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/7OF3jcoLay @AndreaHardie #nocirc #intactivism #MGM pic.twitter.com/XasxWd9J6a
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 5, 2016

Feminism, immigration and war

Cedric Maxwell · 4 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It should be clear now that Feminism created the political 'bandwidth' that fostered mass North African Immigration into mainland Europe. No one will easily be able to shake themselves free from the sight of groups of the politically correct along with assorted feminists and SJWs standing waving placards screaming "WELCOME", only to be sexually assaulted by the same people just a few short weeks later. It is a defining image of our time. People are rightfully outraged. But who are they outraged at?

For one thing, there seems to be very little mainstream press backlash against the feminist movement, which is now teetering on extinction in the mass mind (but not on the government ledger, heaven forbid!). Feminists, being the upstanding, take responsibility, own your shit (thank you Karen) type of people, have stood up and admitted they were wrong… right? Ummmm, no. Not right. Like a 13-year-old in a huff, they have disappeared into the bathroom, and won't come out, until everyone promises them that they won't be mean to them and that they are still the special little angel they've always been. They've hurt their own feelings by fucking up on the immigration issue… and that, of course, has to be someone else's fault. They're stewing… desperately trying to figure out how men, and specifically, white heterosexual men, are to blame for their fuck up.

That could be a long wait. Make no mistake, feminism got stomped in Cologne. Stomped by its own juvenile naivete. Cologne could even turn out to be fatal for feminism. But what everyone seems to be missing, is that while feminism has done what it does best and messed things up, it has also done exactly what it was supposed to do at this point and time.

First, feminism has been at the forefront of helping corporates to lower wages in the western world, through its support of mass, cheap labor importation. And with that task done, its unrestrained imbecility has now been used to perform a stunning volte face and help stir the public against that self-same multicultural world. Only in feminism, eh? But, that's why it's such a perfect, all-purpose tool. Exactly because it's such an ephemeral phenomenon…laced with terms like "equality" and "empowerment", it does not matter how many self-contradictory gyrations it turns itself in… women especially will follow its whimsy as directed. Feminism is a fantastic political vehicle precisely because it defies all laws of nature, spinning one way and then another, and all the while claiming coherence.

It may be worth noting that during these recent years mass immigration, the one that is threatening civil war in Europe, women have held several positions of high authority in matters concerning immigration. So when the standard feminist diatribe screams out, "Name one war! ONE WAR! That a woman has started," you can safely reply, 'the current war that we are in;' the burgeoning European civil war… and the name of the person who started it is Merkel. It might also be noticed that our present era of mass immigration has seen the top State Department (people who issue passports, and set immigration policy, ya know) job held by a woman (Clinton), and the similar role in the UK also held by a woman (Theresa May, Home Office). (please note: the UK foreign office doesn't handle immigration, it's the home office.) If this is the "patriarchy" making all these important decisions on mass immigration… it has sure got a lot of women in it.

Feminism and its twisted sibling political correctness have exhibited a wild and open naivete. That was both the driving force behind the Cologne attacks, and also, the critical component now rousing the mass mind in virile hatred against the entire Arab/Islamic world. Nobody in the west is going to parse the Arab world with any seriousness. Nobody is going to bother to discriminate a Syrian for a North African. The press tells us, regularly, that it is Syrian immigrants rampaging. People on the ground know it's largely North Africans. But that crude fluidity should serve us well in the near future. WW III is about to kick off in the Middle East. Hezbollah is established well established in Syria, and now Saudi Arabia, reeling from 30 dollars a barrel oil, has plans to send 150,000 troops. Riyadh, truly, needs a war. So, the geopolitical road for that war is being paved, and feminism and Cologne are just doing their part. People are raging against Islam. They are seething with contempt for the entire Muslim world. They are ready for blood. Maybe, just maybe, they are ready for war. Perhaps that was the plan all along.

Article originally published on itsthepatriarchy.wordpress.com, Feminism Immigration and War, February 10, 2016

> It should be clear now that Feminism created the political ‘bandwidth’ that fostered mass North African Immigration into mainland Europe. No one will easily be able to shake themselves …

Consent, Affirmative or Otherwise

AVfM Video Source · 5 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are pushing for Affirmative Consent, or “Yes Means Yes” laws. Time to straighten out their nonsense. Again.

To support Semprini, subscribe to his YT channel.

A values-based approach to gynocentrism for men

Paul Elam · 5 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

For the values centered model, I assume three states of being most typical to modern western men. Those are:

Gynocentric

Gynocentric Reactive

Gynocentric Proactive

Gynocentric refers to the average man. He usually, but not always, operates with women unconsciously, just following whatever scripts he has adopted from early life. He seeks women's acceptance without an intact set of values that are designed to protect him. In fact, it is his values that put him at risk. Many men value only being accepted sexually and romantically, by any woman they are attracted to, regardless of her moral character and any possible risk she represents.

The gynocentric man is the one with a piece of paper that says kick me taped to his back. We can mock him if we want, but we are well to remember that we have all been this man at one point or another in our lives.

The next state of being, Gynocentric Reactive, is a much more complicated affair. Here we see men who are infinitely more conscious than gynocentric men. They are aware of relationship pitfalls, may even be quite familiar with concepts like gynocentrism, hypergamy and male disposability.

It is their reaction to that information that may foment troubles. These men can be perpetually fulminating and overtly hostile to anything female. It's the "all women are bitches and hoes" crowd, and the ever present resentments they carry can cause emotional and psychological atrophy. They may have a diminished capacity for reason and defensively take refuge in an ideology that shields them from examining their anger productively.

Another manifestation of the gynocentric reactive man is one who hides inside emotional armor, simply reducing women to their sexual utility, doing their best to get sex then get out. Unfortunately, it is a form of self-protection that may well heighten risk with repeated sexual contact with women who have not been assessed for anything other than physical attraction.

Finally, there are still other gynocentric reactive men who are just frustrated by the realities of lived experience with women. They find themselves caught in a web of confusion and consternation. They tend to be understandably mistrustful of women, and sometimes vacillate between being indifferent to them and being attracted. They feel stuck and outgunned. Chronic loneliness is often part of their lot. For this reason, many of them may be attracted to the other forms of reaction-based mindsets that don't leave them feeling so vulnerable.

Gynocentric Reactive men get call misogynists a lot. They're not. Setting aside judgements about the efficacy of their state of being, they are just men rationally demonstrating the will to self-protect. Regardless of how tiring the perpetual anger may be, they are much more functional and conscious than the gynocentrist.

Finally, there is the Gynocentric Proactive man. He routinely operates consciously with women. He has a clearly identified, personally chosen set of values that trump his sexual instincts and significantly temper his need for female approval.

Whether he includes women in his life or not, he is not burdened by fear of, or resentment toward, them.

He does not tolerate abuse, doesn't take unnecessary financial risks or commit thoughtlessly. He can be available for a relationship if he chooses. He is also willing and able to let a relationship go that threatens his well-being. And he can do it without undue emotional distress.

Importantly, he is willing, indeed insistent, on evaluating any woman on his radar for risk and maintenance concerns.

It is important to reiterate here that none of these states of being can be called wrong. They are simply ways of coping in the modern sexual milieu. Even the gynocentric male is trying to cope in his way.

I will point out, however, that when I see men belittling and shaming other men for not walking in lockstep with them, it usually comes from gynocentric and gynocentric reactive men. Those are also the two states of being where, exceptions notwithstanding, I have observed the least happiness and the least reasonable points of view.

So, obviously, the intent here is to suggest that there is much more benefit to men in a Gynocentric Proactive state of being. The benefits are certainly there for emotional health.

Painting the Park Pink

Doug Mortimer · 5 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Pensacola Bayfront Stadium, home of the minor league Pensacola Blue Wahoos, has one feature that sets it apart from every other ballpark in the country. The foul poles are pink – rubine red, to be exact. I guess you could say it's a more manly pink than a girly pink, but it's a far cry from traditional foul-pole yellow.

Well, rubine red is a secondary color on the team's uniforms, but breast cancer awareness is the major motivation for this architectural oddity. So what do foul poles have in common with breasts, other than the fact that they usually appear in pairs? Not much, but baseball is becoming increasingly gynocentric.

Now I don't want to appear insensitive to anyone who has lost a mother, sister, aunt, wife, daughter, grandmother, niece, cousin, second cousin, neighbor, classmate, workmate, roommate, great aunt, great grandmother, or friend (just trying to be inclusive) to breast cancer. Admittedly, a few teams have made efforts on Father's Day regarding prostate cancer awareness. But why stop there? Why not a day to fight all forms of cancer? Other than gynocentrism, is there any reason to single out breast cancer for special treatment? At a women's tennis or golf tournament maybe…but at a professional baseball game?

Well, the Pensacola Blue Wahoos have plenty of company. In recent years, you might have seen highlight videos of ballplayers swinging pink bats in Mother's Day games. This might seem trivial, but keep in mind that the rules of baseball strictly prohibit colored bats. You can stain it black if you want, but that's about it. When it comes to good old mom, however, throw out the rule book. For Mother's Day, all 30 major league teams are not only allowed but encouraged to wield pink bats.

A number of minor league teams have related promotions. For example:

In Buffalo, the Bisons had a Turn the Park Pink promotion, encouraging people to wear pink and offering free admission to breast cancer survivors. (No info on how the survivors proved up their status.)

In Richmond, Virginia, the Flying Squirrels featured caps with a pink and gray design. Even more unusual, pink bases adorned the infield.

In Charlotte, they handed out pink logo baseballs to the first 2,500 ladies. It is more than appropriate that the Charlotte team's nickname is the Knights. For sure, Charlotte Knights sounds better than Charlotte Manginas.

In State College, Pennsylvania, the Spikes handed out pink camouflage (sounds like a contradiction to me) jerseys.

In Jacksonville, the Suns are auctioning off pink military jerseys – as part of Military Appreciation Night! Tell it to the Marines…they would probably stare at you in disbelief.

Baby, you've come a long way, baseball-wise. If you don't believe it, just pick up any of a number of coffee table books that are devoted to old ballparks. The pictures therein reveal that, with few exceptions, the fans sitting in the stands are men. For all practical purposes, the ballpark was an outdoor saloon. You can almost smell the spilled beer and cigar smoke. Gambling was rife in the bleachers despite "NO BETTING" signs. It was indeed a safe space, free from the baleful influence of suffragettes and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Though men formed the overwhelming majority of the fans, team owners figured out a long time ago that adding more females to the fan base was a reliable way to increase the revenue stream. The New York Gothams (later better known as the Giants) of the National League held the first Ladies' Day in 1883.

Like any other free sample, free admission to the ballgame for ladies was designed to turn them into paying customers. It obviously worked to some degree, as, "Katie Casey was baseball mad, Had the fever and had it bad." Those are the opening lines of the first verse of "Take Me Out to the Ballgame," which dates back to 1908. If all you've ever heard is the verse sung during the seventh inning stretch, you may not know that the song is about a woman begging her beau to take her to the ballpark (and presumably pay for her ticket).

The Ladies' Day concept spread throughout organized baseball. Left unaddressed is the number of men who stayed away on Ladies Day because their estrogen detectors were in the red zone.

Female interest in the game itself, its history and its welter of statistics, is rare. I suspect that most female fans are interested not so much in the game itself as in individual ballplayers.

A case in point is pitcher Win Mercer, the subject of the Ladies' Day Riot at a Washington Senators game on September 13, 1897. The casus belli was an argument between umpire Bill Carpenter and Mercer in which the former threw the latter out of the game.

Only 23 years old, Mercer was enjoying his second straight 20-win season in 1897. Described as "young and handsome with piercing dark eyes, and an outgoing personality," Mercer was particularly popular with local fem fans. One can imagine his appeal to hypergamous young women, not to mention middle-aged women who might perceive him as the son they never had (or a big upgrade on the sons they did have; in other words, the old "Why can't you be more like…" syndrome). In fact, he was so popular with the ladies that the Senators tried to arrange his starts on Tuesday and Friday home games when Ladies' Day was in effect.

After Mercer was ejected from the game, the women protested vehemently. Exactly how vehemently they protested is a matter of some dispute. According to legend, the women came pouring out of the stands, surrounded the umpire, knocked him to the ground and tore at his clothing until D.C.'s finest broke it up.

A contemporaneous newspaper account, however, avers that the women's response was somewhat less violent. According to The Washington Times, the umpire was assailed with upraised fans and parasols and a punch in the gut as he left the field. To his credit, "The umpire was too manly to turn upon the women, and made rapid strides for the office." So the response was unladylike but hardly a riot, and not enough to induce the Senators to scrub Ladies Day from the schedule. (An interesting P.S. to this story is that Mercer committed suicide at age 29. His motive is still the subject of speculation.)

Well, Ladies' Day is no longer featured on team schedules, so far as I can determine. Female fans are in abundance, so there is no need to give them free tickets anymore to introduce them to the national pastime.

One noticeable difference in recent years is the merchandise offered at team shops, If your team is offering a Turn the Park Pink night, they will be happy to sell you what you need to fit in: pink T-shirts, sweatshirts, shorts, caps, and other forms of female-oriented attire are now commonplace. And if that's not sufficiently female-friendly, you can even get officially licensed Hello Kitty merchandise with your favorite major league logo.

Of course, female-friendly merchandise creates more revenue, and baseball is big business, so it is hard to fault teams for trying to make a buck. But there are other examples of feminization that have nothing to do with revenue.

A perusal of the employee listings of major league teams shows a sprinkling of female "executives," and "vice presidents," typically in human resources, financial operations, or the usual administrative jobs one might find in any organization.

The heart and soul of the front office is Baseball Operations, which is directly responsible for putting together the team on the field, through scouting and signing players, assigning them to the rosters of minor league affiliates, and trades. Only three women (Elaine Weddington-Steward of the Red Sox, Jean Afterman of the Yankees, and Kim Ng of the Dodgers and Yankees) have risen as high as Assistant General Manager in Baseball Operations. Rest assured that if a woman ever gets promoted to General Manager, it will be headline news and she will become a feminist icon, even among people who never heard of the infield fly rule.

A female fixture on most teams' telecasts is the hottie correspondent who handles pre-game or post-game shows or roams the stands in search of human-interest sidebars. More distinctive, the Giants have a female public address announcer (Renel Brooks-Moon), and the Yankees have a female color commentator (Suzyn Waldman) on their radio broadcasts. At the national level, Jessica Mendoza, a former member of the U.S. national women's softball team, is an analyst on ESPN baseball broadcasts.

From what I've seen and heard on broadcasts, these women are certainly competent, but I'm sure there are platoons of men who could do the job just as well but cannot be offered up as poster children when the time comes for diversity virtue signaling. This is hardly a problem on the field, where rosters are more cosmopolitan than ever. What makes baseball unique is that the 25 "employees" on the active roster are the true elite, not the "managers" on the organizational chart. So pro-female diversity efforts necessarily involve behind-the-scenes personnel.

Every now and then, there is some softball standout or Little League tomboy (most recently, Mo'ne Davis in the 2014 Little League World Series) who excites speculation as to whether there will ever be a female major leaguer. I say no.

Since women mature faster than men, there will always be an occasional female who can excel in a youth league. There may be one who can hold her on in high school, college, or low minor league ball. But now that the talent pool for major league ball is global, the chance of a woman reaching the big leagues is less likely than ever. A female player would surely be a gate attraction, but no team is going to waste a precious roster spot on her because winning is still the name of the game. So this particular glass ceiling is shatter-proof.

I have no idea how many feminists consider themselves baseball fans, but I have to feel sorry for them, considering all the micro-aggressions they endure every time they witness an all-male team taking the field, not to mention the sexist language of the P.A. announcer every time he says first base*man*, second base*man*, or third base*man*.

Even pink foul poles can't compensate for that level of mental anguish.

A man’s guide to women

AVfM Video Source · 6 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The title is self-explanatory…Satire.

https://youtu.be/TjZIPClPR6I

Why US Marines Are Being Encouraged to Disobey

AVfM Video Source · 7 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Probably few organizations value self-motivation like the U.S. Marine Corps, so when their recruits began showing deficiencies, officers dug into the latest psychologist research. Here's what they found…

Big Think

Personal values and the pussy pass

Paul Elam · 7 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Talking about values can be a tricky affair. After all, who's to say what values can we say anyone else has to live? There are certainly times when we do get to answer this for everyone. For instance, our collective value for the sanctity of human life demands punishment for murder in all modern cultures.

At the same time, our value for life collectively takes a nosedive when it comes to humans who cannot speak for themselves, such as we find in abortion.

In countries where we render swift and decisive punishment for killing a baby two weeks after it is born, we will look the other way, citing the rights of the mother, when killing it two weeks before it is born.

More disparity is found in other places. Canada, for instance, passed an infanticide law in 1948 that reclassified the taking of an infant's life by its mother. From that point on, the crime was no longer considered murder. It is instead infanticide, a significantly less serious crime that usually carries a maximum of a year in jail with most mothers who kill serving no time at all. Instead, they get referrals to counseling and other support services.

We see even more evidence of this in systems of western jurisprudence where it concerns women who murder their husbands. The so-called "battered wife syndrome" is used to acquit women of murder and other charges who claim they have been the victims of abuse. That includes women who could have simply left the home but instead chose in a premeditated fashion to kill their husbands while they slept.

In the United Kingdom, women have beaten murder charges, and many of them have had murder charges reduced to manslaughter using premenstrual syndrome as a defense.

In a society that supposedly has the value of equal and fair treatment under the law, we see the undermining of due process in alleged sexual assault cases on college campuses. The same thing happens in the criminal justice system with rape shield laws and men convicted of sexual crimes in the absence of any forensic evidence.

We are increasingly seeing the emergence of women only train cars, parking spaces and even time at commercial gymnasiums being reserved exclusively for one sex over the other.

The list goes on, from VAWA to child custody decisions to the way child support laws are so unevenly levied and enforced in the favor of women. It even extends to which sex we sexually mutilate at birth.

What does this say about our values as a culture?

The answer is simple. Gynocentrism is a cultural value that has a tendency to trump all other values. It trumps the sanctity of human life. It trumps our constitutional rights. It even trumps our basic sense of human decency. And however goes the culture, so goes our lives as individual men. The greatest threat to a modern man's personal values is not the temptation of greed. It is not the allure of success or the pressure to perform among other men.

The greatest threat to the modern man's personal values is the modern woman. And that is a threat which men have historically failed to face — to their peril.

How many men, do you suppose, have allowed themselves to sacrifice good and trusted friendships because the women in their lives were jealous of the time and loyalty required by those friendships? How many beloved hobbies and interests have men abandoned because their women wanted them to occupy their time with things that were geared to produce for her? How many Steve Shives' are in the world without YouTube Channels?

For those of you who don't know who Steve Shives is, please view this video by Sargon of Akkad, in which he dissects a conversation between Steve, a radical feminist, and his wife, also a radical feminist. In the video, they both conclude that Steve is, at least, a latent sexist because he prefers the TV show Angel over the TV show Buffy the Vampire Slayer. And because his music collection is apparently male-dominated.

Aside from the fact that both Angel and Buffy were TV fare for kids and the intellectually unemployed, the lack of self-assurance and rote deference to his wife are plastered all over Shive's face. Do You want to take bets on whether his friends have to pass her litmus test before he can associate with them?

Sargon nails it with the conclusion that this can't possibly be a healthy relationship, and perhaps correctly lays this at the feet of feminist ideology but it goes much further than this.

This isn't just feminism at work. In fact, in interpersonal relationships, feminism isn't anything more than a guise for the more fundamental reality that in almost all relationships it is her values, her desires, and her beliefs that constantly pressure conformance in the man. Relationships based on romantic chivalry are a graveyard, not only for men's desires and dreams but their values, their sense of right and wrong. All of it is co-opted by the force of gynocentrism.

That is not to give men a pass. The last thing men can afford is to hide behind the protective shield of victimhood. To put it in its most fundamental terms, most men will pair bond. And unless they are hopeless gynocentrists, they better figure out that relationships are first and foremost, a battlefield. If men are not prepared to fight, and to have lines in the sand that will trigger the nuclear option, they are doomed to fail.

To help with the fine tuning, it is better to understand that long term relationships are a bloody fight even without gynocentrism. You have two individuals, from two different family backgrounds, with two different sets of rules and two different ways of viewing the world.

After the honeymoon period, when couples have sex every time the door is closed, when they only see the best in each other, when neither of them can imagine that the other's shit actually stinks, reality sets in. That is when the two very different worlds collide, and the battle begins to see whose rules are going to dominate.

It involves things as simple as whether you open presents on Christmas Day or Christmas Eve to whether you deal directly and honestly with problems or just bully each other till someone cries uncle.

It is a process involving countless complexities, and one that lasts many, many times longer than the honeymoon, often stretching into decades depending on the relative mental health of the people involved.

I have heard, and I totally believe it, that it may take twenty years or more for a couple to reach a healthy, mature love for each other. All of this happens without considering the gynocentrism involved.

Relationships are difficult because infatuation is transient, and because blending lives, which essentially means two people are having to live by an altered, unfamiliar narrative, is difficult on its own.

The problem in modern culture, especially with relationships that start on a foundation of romantic chivalry, is that gynocentrism is a trump card that constantly puts the man at a disadvantage. Like I said, if we can issue a pussy pass for murder, what are the chances for your fishing trips to survive? How about your Saturday night poker games or your video games?

And this is where men die. They die in spirit. They die in individuality, as does their ownership of their lives and happiness.

To be blunter, those things aren't murdered. They are the victims of suicide. They are killed by the male's gynocentrism and his weakness in the face of a woman's demands. The pussy pass is issued by men, most often by the guy who has it played against him.

For every woman who walks on a murder charge, there are a million men who obsequiously bow and scrape like Steve Shives.

The solution to this is tough, and it isn't for everyone. Some men are just not strong enough to allow their values and a woman live under the same roof. So they check out, often hiding behind bitterness and resentment. They convince themselves that all women, and not their failure to be strong, is the problem. They don't trust themselves and don't have the aptitude to develop skills to weed out problem women and to shut women down when they become irrational and unreasonably demanding. Their shame drives them to resent men who have those strengths and aptitudes and prevents them taking on the task of change.

My father once told me, and I quote, “If you can leave your values at the door, you never really had them to begin with.”

Of course, at 16 or 17, that did not elicit much more than a yawn from me. I guess my old man, like many fathers, got a lot smarter as I aged because today his words ring rich with wisdom.

I never saw a man who got destroyed in a relationship who steadfastly clung to his values from day one. And I am in a position to say that I have talked to a lot more men who were destroyed in relationships than the average person. The good news is that where it concerns values, men have the advantage. Most men are wired for accountability, honesty and integrity. Men, as a rule, have the capacity own their shit.

They are perhaps less consistent at it where it concerns women, but they have that capacity to overcome that unless they buy into an ideology that tells them not to.

So that is the thrust here. Do you have values? Keep them.

A simple example. Is loyalty to friends a value of yours? Then don’t blame a woman if you give it up. Be willing to look her in the eye and tell her that if she is unprincipled enough to force you to make the unnecessary choice between her and your friend, that you will side, not with your friend, but with your values. Hint: that is not good news for the woman-child giving you the ultimatum. But it is fantastic news for you.

Another example. Do you value yourself? And by that I mean are your interests in life, your hobbies, and pastimes important enough that you will make time and money for them? Well, if you do value those things, you won’t give them up because she tries to emotionally or sexually blackmail you to the point that you surrender them. There are no victims, just volunteers.

My Pops was right. If your values are disposable, for anything, so is your dignity.

Blaming anyone for that but yourself is a mistake that will likely cost you a lot more than a round of golf or an afternoon at your favorite fishing hole. Your values, whatever they are, define you. So the next time you hear some heartbroken man saying “I gave up everything for her, and she still screwed me over,” take a moment reword that statement in your head. “I gave up everything for her, leaving her no reason to respect me, and me no reason to respect myself. So, of course, I got screwed over.”

For those of you who think I am too hard on men who get shafted in relationships, I understand. Still, until men quit entering relationships in a bent over position, this will keep happening.

Women are raping boys and young men

Tim Patten · 7 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The word "rape" conjures up an image of a helpless young woman being held down and forcefully penetrated, a brutal act that provokes widespread empathy for the victim. Not all sexual assaults fit this description, however; by definition, they can involve any type of sexual contact or behavior that occurs without the explicit consent of the recipient, including unwelcome kissing or touching. That said, the meaning of rape in those instances where women are on the receiving end has gradually expanded to include the latter acts and a wide range of inappropriate behavior.

Unfortunately, what hasn't changed is the perception that women are the only victims. In fact, the past decade has seen a dramatic increase in the number of incidents of women raping and sexually assaulting boys and men. On May 2014, Jezebel reported a study, where a large portion of teen boys and young men have been forced or coerced into sexual activity by a peer. The study, published in the journal Psychology of Men and Masculinity, 43% of high school boys and young college men reported they had an unwanted sexual experience, and 95% reported that a female acquaintance was the aggressor.[i] Other statistics confirm that men are not the only perpetrators. According to a 2010 National Crime Victimization Survey, which queried 40,000 households about rape and sexual violence, 38% of reported incidents involved women targeting boys and men.[ii]

Unfortunately, the stereotype about rape has had damaging and far-reaching consequences. Commentators such as Mike Lew, author of Victims No Longer, and Mike Hunter, author of Abused Boys, have noted that because there are no prevention programs aimed at thwarting such assaults and so many go unreported, school administrators, police and society at large have the false impression that boys and men are not at risk. That ignorance has allowed the problem to fester. While WND's list of hundreds of female teachers who were caught raping teenage male students seems long, it likely pales in comparison to the actual number of women who have gotten away scot-free.[iii]

Societal attitudes about female assaults on males

Certainly, attitudes about masculinity and sexual abuse vary greatly. However, western country prejudices generally mean that little boys are shown little or no empathy or their concerns are quickly dismissed if they say that they have been sexually assaulted by a female. For the most part, they are essentially told to…"man up." While stories about women being raped are widely reported and debated, garnering headlines and grabbing the attention of police, legal and other officials across the country, incidents where men are the victims are rarely covered, if at all.

But the fact is that crimes, where men are the victims, cause considerable harm. While it is no secret that males enjoy sex, that doesn't mean unwanted, and aggressive coercion is right or appropriate. There is overwhelming evidence that when boys and men are sexually assaulted, they suffer post-traumatic stress, guilt, fear, powerlessness, shame, distrust, betrayal, anger, self-harm, flashbacks, and depression. Like their female counterparts, they often experience painful and long-lasting issues.[iv]

Unfortunately, these facts don't seem to matter to those in authority. Generally speaking, school administrators, police, prosecutors, judges, and juries view and treat the issue of male sexual assault less seriously than those cases where woman are the victims. In fact, the notion of female-on-male assault is often dismissed as a joke, helping to sustain the myth that men cannot be raped, and that females who attack males are less severe and less harmful than those who commit "real" rape.

It doesn't help that those who have been victimized, especially younger males, don't have an appropriate frame of reference or sufficient knowledge to understand the criminality of the event or series of events. For one thing, governments have not regulated or educated young boys and society on this phenomenon. Now, though, the time is right to draw male rape out from the shadows, shine a light all over it, and bring renewed clarity, equality and hope to solve this serious problem.

The Problem and Statistics

Even when there is no criminality involved, or the facts are murky, evidence suggests that women are not the innocents that society seems to think they are, especially where alcohol is involved. In various surveys, men have reported being unwillingly accosted, groped, teased, clutched or massaged on the crotch. Women have shoved tongues down men's throats or flicked behinds without consent. They joke around and sit on guys knees or laps without asking, wiggling sexually. Some boys and men have even been blackmailed: the female victimizers say that if he doesn't have sex with them, they will tell others that the boy or man is gay.

The fact is, millions of boys and men have been coerced or forced into unwanted sexual situations that might not fit the strictest definition of what constitutes an illegal act. According to *The National Post,[v] "38.3% college men reported being pressured by women into a range of sexual activity, from kissing and cuddling to intercourse and oral sex. Another survey from the Guardian[vi] found that more men (62.7%) than women (46.3%) had experienced unwanted intercourse. It is not uncommon for male victims to have some association with their offenders; they are often friends, students or teachers.

The damaging emotional fallout from male rape can be seen in brief videos posted by those who have been victimized, including Jerry Liu, who, as a seventh-grader, was assaulted by older and bigger girls (watch video here), and Will, who was raped by a female teacher (watch video here). And lastly here is a 30-minute compilation of news clips titled: Why are So Many Women Raping Boys, offering a variety of disturbing insights about these crimes (watch video here).

Victim Underreporting and the College Double Trauma

As noted earlier, public awareness of this epidemic is virtually absent, leaving victims, many of them youths, lost and unaware. In truth, there are NO or a few clearly defined methods or established locations for those who have been assaulted to report what happened. Schools have little in the way of resources, counseling or policies that are exclusively intended to educate or enlighten. Moreover, most young victims tend to keep quiet about such incidents, partly because they feel intimidated by peers who make homophobic or other disparaging remarks.

Once abused boys and men grow older they may enter higher education, and when those who were sexually coerced in their early years reach college, they quickly discover that male-related post-traumatic stress disorder issues and other male-related concerns are generally ignored, overlooked or boycotted. Worse still, campuses are swirling with consent and rape-culture demonstrations that highlight only men as perpetrators who are raping females on campuses all across the country. Those male college students who were victimized in middle or high school end up reliving the nightmare again, overwhelmed by flashbacks and the same traumatic emotions and distress they experienced when the assaults occurred.

Reducing Rape Incidents

By definition, rape is an act of power over another person. Psychologists theorize that such urges develop in some men and women[vii] in childhood, stemming in large measure from misplaced rage.[viii] That said, sexual assault is not a women's or men's issue, nor is it a liberal or conservative issue. Rape is a human issue.

Now more than ever, those in positions of authority across the country, especially college administrators, should be taking pains to understand what is leading individuals to commit such heinous acts, and then work to inform everyone concerned and prevent them from happening at all. Boys and young men need education and protective measures that are publically available at all levels, ages, and schools. Victims should be encouraged to free themselves from the darkness and report such incidents at appropriate locations.

Like women, boys and men need safe places where they can get help. On college campuses, male studies facilities and programs should be a requisite feature, while in secondary schools, there should be clear policies and programs aimed at ensuring that students, teachers, security, and administrators are fully aware of the problem and that counseling and other resources are readily available—not to mention an understanding of the responses that are appropriate in such situations. Only then we can work together to reduce sexual assaults and alleviate the widespread damage it is causing.

Consider petitioning Congress by adding your name to Dr. Warren Farrell's White House Council on Boys and Men[ix] (sign the petition here).

*****

[i] http://powderroom.jezebel.com/almost-half-of-teen-boys-and-young-men-have-been-sexual-1556730508

[ii] http://www.slate.com/articles/double_x/doublex/2014/04/male_rape_in_america_a_new_study_reveals_that_men_are_sexually_assaulted.html

[iii] http://www.wnd.com/2014/08/39783/

[iv] http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/law-order/female-sex-offenders-trigger-similar-trauma-in-victims-as-male-sex-attackers/story-fni0ffnk-1226626040689

[v] http://www.nationalpost.com/news/story.html?id=f926b44a-39c9-4c7d-bc44-24001f40c213

[vi] http://guardianlv.com/2014/04/rape-happens-almost-just-as-often-to-men/

[vii] http://www.wnd.com/2014/08/39783/

[viii] http://www.lifeissues.net/writers/air/air_vol25no2_2013.html

[ix] http://www.warrenfarrell.name/

A feminist nursing critique of circumcision (euphemism for sexual mutilation)

AVfM Video Source · 8 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This post isn't an endorsement of feminism, but an affirmation that when feminists act like their sacred dictionary definition, it should be recognized. PE

Thank you AVFM subscribers!

Paul Elam · 8 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Just a quick note to readers.

Today I purchased my plane ticket for ICMI'16 in London this July. I was able to do that because of the deeply appreciated support of AVFM readers. The trip would not have been possible without you.

As I look ahead to the conference and think about this incredible, international kaleidoscope of thought leadership in men's issues, I just wanted to say thank you.

AVFM has not paid a dime in personal revenue to anyone since February of last year. Without subscribers to help pay operational costs, we don't go to this crucial event — we don't even publish counter-theory. You have kept us afloat.

Thank you again for supporting us with a subscription and to those who support us in the future (nudge, nudge, wink, wink, the buttons are top right).

Oh yeah, there is room for you. Get your tickets here.

Paul

Female sailor’s false rape allegation, plot fails

Michael Conzachi · 8 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Twenty years ago a most bizarre false rape allegation case in the U.S. Navy resulted in the murder of the accuser; but not in the manner you would think.

On May 14, 1996, 31-year-old U.S. Navy Petty Officer Third Class Elise Makdessi, an air traffic controller at Oceana Naval Air Station in Virginia Beach met her demise, in a bizarre and unusual twist involving false allegations of rape and sexual harassment at the hands of her co-workers and supervisors. On one occasion she alleged that she had been raped by three co-workers who all took turns.

Petty Officer Third Class Elise Makdessi

About a month, before she was murdered, Elise Makdessi took to making a 20-minute videotape on the couch of her home where she claimed that she had been subjected to acts of rape and sexual harassment, but never named her assailants. She revealed that she had kept their names in a safe deposit box in case anything happened to her or her husband. No safe deposit box or names were ever found.

She is seen on the tape, trembling and occasionally wiping away tears. She alleged that the Navy was protecting her assailants and that superiors told her to keep her mouth shut or risk a demotion.

There’s only one problem. None of it was true.

In a bizarre, elaborate, and deadly plan, her Lebanese husband; Adibeddie Ramez Makdessi, who goes by the name of Eddie, murdered his wife and one of her co-workers, 37-year-old Petty Officer First Class Quincy Brown.

Petty Officer First Class Quincy Brown

Eddie and Elise concocted an elaborate plan for her to make false allegations of rape and sexual harassment at the hands of her Navy co-workers, including Brown. Along with her rape allegations, she also alleged that her complaints to her chain of command fell on deaf ears. To prove it, she took to making the videotape with her husband directing it. Their elaborate plan; at least what Elise thought, was that she would make these allegations, then sue the U.S. Navy for allowing her to be raped and sexually harassed and that her reports to Navy higher-ups were ignored, and hopefully, cash in for some big bucks.

Eddie however, had a different plan.

Eddie Makdessi

Then, on the night of May 14, 1996, prosecutors claim that Elise and Eddie lured fellow sailor Quincy Brown to her home to have sex, and Elise allowed Quincy to tie her to the bedposts. Prosecutors allege that her husband Eddie was hiding in the home, perhaps in a closet while the two engaged in sex and Quincy had ejaculated inside of her, thereby proving that sexual activity had occurred.

When Quincy went to leave, Eddie Makdessi then suddenly appeared and shot him several times in the chest; once directly in the heart, killing him instantly. Prosecutors allege that Eddie then went over to the tied up Elise on the bed and stabbed her to death in the stomach and throat; cleaned the knife, then planted it in Quincy's hand.

Eddie Makdessi claims that when he and his wife Elise came home from dinner that night, someone hit him from behind; knocking him out and tying him up. When he came to, he claims that Quincy Brown was stabbing his wife, and he went for a gun in a nearby nightstand drawer and shot Quincy in self-defense.

He claims that he was too late to save the life of his wife, who died of multiple stab wounds.

When police arrived, they were suspicious of the circumstances but did not have enough to charge Eddie.

More facts would emerge however in the 10-plus-year investigation as it was learned that a month before Elise was murdered, Eddie had taken out a half-million-dollar life insurance policy on her. Eddie soon collected the half mil as well as Elise's 200K Navy life insurance policy. So he cashed in with 700K and fled the country. With his money, he traveled the world and re-married and had a daughter. Prosecutors allege that the motive was the insurance money.

The crime scene photographs were later given to a nationally renowned crime scene forensic analyst who; through comprehensive testing determined that Eddie's version of the story did not match the blood splatter analysis on the crime scene photos.

Additionally, Elise's female friends and co-workers were interviewed by investigators and all stated that Elise never mentioned to them that she had ever been raped or sexually harassed; EVER.

In 2001, Eddie Makdessi was indicted for the murder, but he was re-married and living in Russia. He was tricked into coming back to the U.S. by a reporter who had been in contact with him, where he would claim that he had evidence; the videotapes where Elise made her allegations would clear him of the murders, and place the blame back on the Navy. He was taken into custody immediately upon disembarking from an airplane. In March of 2006, he was convicted of two counts of murder and sentenced to life in prison. He was also fined 200K.

In this case, the desire to profit from making false allegations backfired and Elise Makdessi paid for it with her life, as well as fellow sailor Quincy Brown; who by all accounts was probably guilty of bad judgment and adultery, but was not a rapist.

Eddie Makdessi's elaborate get rich plan, using false allegations of rape and sexual assault off the backs of Navy sailors and the U.S. government, and using his wife and then killing her and an innocent man all came tumbling down.

One can only imagine if their original elaborate plan had gone through? Just how many Navy men would have been caught up in the dragnet to rid this Navy unit of the awful, terrible, violent rapists in their midst; repeatedly raping poor-poor Elise; the brave, courageous survivor of violent sexual assault?

Yeah maybe if it was true, but NOPE,,,, IT WAS ALL A LIE!!!

What also came out during this ten-year investigation was the fact that Elise had flunked out of air traffic control school, and Eddie had a history of various insurance scams.

False allegations are nothing new; especially those made to profit from them.

This occurred in 1996, and even back then, well before this recent hysteria of the sexual assault witch hunt began, female service members, and some men, were conjuring up ways to profit from making false allegations of rape and sexual harassment.

A culture in the military existed back in 1996 and has been exacerbated since; and this culture makes it profitable to be a rape victim, regardless if a rape happened.

I understand that there are legitimate sexual assaults in the military, but with the explosion of false allegations, and the current witch hunt in which any allegation equals obtaining a conviction by any means necessary, it seems as though the psychiatric patients are running the asylum.

The pendulum has swung so far into the depths of lunacy and into the Twilight Zone, one wonders if it can ever be brought back.

This one looney plan, however; backfired.

*****

References/Links

http://pilotonline.com/news/local/crime/jury-recommends-life-sentence-for-makdessi/article_58428d2a-9d73-54ed-b966-3360e34b6708.html

http://pilotonline.com/news/local/crime/man-accused-of-killing-wife-her-lover-a-decade-ago/article_5fef48ae-5ffb-565a-abf3-116b0687b0cc.html

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=thRgrRUc93Q

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pHOCHKX7GPs

The Revolutionary Stupid Movement – TFF Episode 25

AVfM Video Source · 9 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 25 Professor Fiamengo discusses the absurd behavior of The Revolutionary Student Movement.

StudioBrule

Liquored enough to mentally lick'r...

Clint Carpentier · 9 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Three stiff ones later… she's still got one up on me…

Ok, Bree Olson. If you don't know her, fuck off! Have you any idea how much toilet paper I've… ahem. She's a porn star of very high caliber. Her career was short but packed, uhh… ahem. She's short, well built, and has nice feet; gawd… no, I CAN finish this…

She's put out a video recently, to tug at our heart strings. Her complaint is, that now that she's retired from porn she can't find a job because of moral reasons. Complete with no professional make-up on. Well it worked, Angry Foreigner, a Swede who has put out many respectable videos about feminism and the Muslim takeover of Sweden, has jumped into the Moral Morass, mmmm more ass… he thinks this woman should be respected. He thinks porn stars should be respected; and to THAT, I will agree with him, porn stardom is a service, it's a comfort I enjoy… liberally… enthusiastically… shamelessly. Angry Foreigner spent 12 minutes raging morally about how this woman was wronged, and how the comments to her video are wrong.

Angry Foreigner… and any other fucking geek with a knee-jerk hard-on… you are wrong!

Bree Olson is not broke, she's not desperate for work, and she is not yet past her prime. She is worth more than $5 million; she will get royalties for the rest of her life because she was more than a porn star, she was the idyllic porn star, petite plump juicy and wantonly energetic. And she is still desirable enough to stay in the business.

Though I'll grant that her prime is waning fast now.

She is a woman with a mission, an ideological mission. She is trying to get the business destroyed. Why? Well, not because of anything to do with the business itself, but because of how society morally treats porn stars.

Ahem… her grandparents were Ukranian concentration camp survivors; however, she's a Texan. Quadruple facepalm. The one state where both oral and anal sex is FUCKING ILLEGAL!!! Oh, mah Gawd…

Butt… let's put that aside for a moment. Given the current legal climate of her-ass-meant laws, she's a walking lawsuit looking for a place to happen. That alone compels me to agree with the supposed employers she's apparently been rebuffed by. There's no man in North America who doesn't know who she is, and this creates an automatic sexual tension; whether willful or not, it's there.

Is she a feminist? Don't know, don't care.

I'm more interested in whether the jobs she's supposedly applying for, are in the private sector, or the public sector. If those jobs are in the public sector, then she has a case, and can go through legal means to receive justice. However, I think she may be dealing with private jobs, in which case she's shit out of luck. Private business' are not obligated to view potential employees through the lens of equality; nor should they be. Public jobs, however, are bound to uphold the constitution. Seen in this context, her video is meaningless babble.

Put bluntly; she is just another Anita Sarkesian.

To compound matters, she is a college drop-out. She claims that she had meant to stay in college during her career. However, when her grades started dropping, as women are wont to do, she fucking QUIT!!! She has NOTHING!!! She IS nothing. And she's wanking about what??? SHE… wants respect for her shitty choices. She could have been a doctor.

There are countless porn stars out there, who got into the business for specific reasons, who planned their retirement, who retired on schedule, and don't wank on about how their life is fucked.

Do NOT fall for her emotional plea. She is not hurting, not yet. And as much as it pains me, I won't be oogling her anymore. I still got Mandy Dee.

The badass feminist coloring book

AVfM Video Source · 10 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Shoe0nHead brings us the latest feminist gift to world culture

What Men Fear the Most

AVfM Video Source · 11 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Paul discusses primary fear men have.

Please subscribe to An Ear for Men.

Won’t somebody think of the feminists?!

AVfM Video Source · 11 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Meet Shannon – a (feminist leaning) media arts student who is going to tell us plebs about how YouTube is a sexist, misogynistic misery factory that tramples any woman that even thinks about getting involved.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DXecKZCkDco&ab_channel=Bearing Bearing‘s YT channel.

FaceBook removes AVFM's page

Paul Elam · 11 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The A Voice for Men FaceBook page was unpublished by FaceBook today. No reason was given other than a generic inference that we were in violation of their community standards. I find no reason to believe that this means anything but the fact that we were in violation of their feminist based rules for speech.

This is a shame for the great team of people who worked hard producing material on a regular basis and for the 33,000 fans who had seen fit to like the page.

Their appeals process seems to be a sham as well. There is a single button to click for an appeal. They afford you no opportunity to ask questions or to get clarification on how a page is actually in violation of Facebook standards (which I am certain we were not in actuality).

So, in the short version, this appears to be the work of censorious feminist ideologues working in a modern Facebook environment that favors their agenda.

Love sick (part 1)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 11 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following is Part 1 of a three-part extract from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. The book takes a good look at romantic love, or more accurately the sickness of it – a fact underlined by many writers at AVfM who have exposed the bankruptcy of romantic chivalry. Dr. Tallis' extensive clinical experience confirms just how sick-making these practices are for all who indulge them. – Eds.

Incurable Romantics

> Love, love, love – all the wretched cant of it, masking egotism, lust, masochism, fantasy under a mythology of sentimental postures, a welter of self-induced miseries and joys, blinding and masking the essential personalities in the frozen gestures of courtship, in the kissing and the dating and the desire, the compliments and the quarrels which vivify its barrenness.
>
> The Female Eunuch, Germaine Greer

Romantic love has been described by the Jungian psychoanalyst Robert Johnson as `the single greatest energy system in the Western psyche'. Although this sounds like a wildly extravagant claim, it is almost certainly true. Love – and in particular romantic love – is our great preoccupation. Almost every aspect of our life is affected, in some way, by the concept of romantic love.

The word 'romantic' is troubled by a long history. It is like an overworked canvas, the composition and brushwork of which cannot conceal the suggestion of earlier drafts. English dictionaries distinguish 'romantic' with several definitions, but in reality, such tidy divisions are misleading. When we use the word, these different meanings ings bleed into each other. To be romantically involved is an admission that carries a host of implications: passion, folly, obsession, anguish, recklessness, intrigue, and adventure; archetypes rise from varying depths and jostle with each other for recognition and influence.

As with any native tongue, we first speak the language of romantic love without being able to explain its grammar. The assumptions on which romantic love is predicated are buried in the unconscious mind, where they exert a powerful influence on our beliefs, attitudes, and expectations. We never pause to question their legitimacy. When a romantic hero decides he will sacrifice everything for love, no one will ask 'Is she really worth it?' or 'Can't he find someone else?' Romantic love has its own obscure logic which we all tacitly accept.

The roots of romantic love run deep. Indeed, the fundamental mental conventions of romantic love were consolidated on the ancestral plains of Africa, where evolutionary pressures determined that men should court women, that women should be coy, that relationships should be exclusive, and that love should storm the mind like a form of madness. However, since the rise of civilisation, these features have been increasingly complicated by ideological factors. The roots of romantic love are profoundly deep, but, now, they are also hopelessly tangled.

To understand fully the concept of romantic love requires an examination of its cultural history (in addition to its evolutionary history)…

* * *

The Islamic courtly tradition was introduced into Western culture by the troubadours, whose poetry preserved many features of Arab mysticism – particularly, a quasi-religious praise of female beauty. However, as this theme was reworked, it also began to change. Spiritual inaccessibility gradually evolved into alluring aloofness, which in turn became regal disdain. Thus, a recurring figure in troubadour poetry was the cold, cruel mistress.

The theme of inaccessibility was also explored in another way: the introduction of a female character, immensely desirable, but unavailable through marriage.

Even at this very early stage, the authenticity of love was being judged according to its difficulty (with respect to obstacles and impediments) and its irrationality. In troubadour poetry, we can recognise the cultural ancestry of modern concepts such as Lee's mania or Tennov's limerence: love that does not need liking – love that may even thrive in response to rejection or contempt. The troubadour's cruel mistress reappears again and again in literature in different guises: the enchantress, the femme fatale, the Belle Dame sans Merci. Long before psychologists began to study love in a systematic way, literature required a particular female type who would represent unhappy love.

The doctrine of romantic love (also known as courtezia or amour courtois) would have spread across Europe irrespective of royal patronage; however, the process was certainly accelerated by events at the court of Poitiers, where William IX is reputed to have been 'the first troubadour' (on account of having written the earliest surviving examples of coutly verse in the Provencal language). It was also at Poitiers that William's granddaughter, Eleanor of Aquitaine, and her daughter, Marie de Champagne, encouraged celebrated poets such as Bernard de Ventadour and Chretien de Troyes to compose works that exemplified courtly ideals. A narrative vehicle that was popular among the poets of Poitiers was Arthurian legend, which delivered a cast of characters whose relationships could be fully exploited to dramatise the frustrating dynamics of romantic love. Thus, Guinevere's beauty is beyond compare, and Lancelot – Arthur's most loyal servant – must fall hopelessly in love with the queen. (English readers are more familiar with this dynamic through Sir Thomas Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur.) In the poetry of Chretien de Troyes, love – always complicated, but even more complicated by courtly conventions – is once again described as an illness: 'My illness is what I want. And my pain is my health… I suffer agreeably… I am sick with delight.'

One of the most extraordinary developments at Poitiers was the creation of an inner court – the Court of Love – where noblewomen would meet to pose questions about love and the proper conduct of lovers. Questions would then be disputed, juried and judged, according to the increasingly dogmatic principles of courtezia. Perhaps, in an effort to make the task of this inner court easier, Marie instructed a cleric, Andrew Capelanus (also known as Andrew the Chaplain), to write a formal book of statutes: a kind of lovers' charter.

Andrew began his task by consulting a classical authority – the Ars Amatoria (or Art of Love) by Ovid. It is difficult to imagine a more inappropriate work on which to base a 'respectable' canon. As with much to do with romantic love, history reveals cross-purposes, because for Ovid adoration is only a means to an end. Ovid adores, not because he can't help himself, but because by feigning adoration he is more likely to succeed in seduction. He is a cunning and manipulative strategist, who advises on everything from good 'chat up' lines to how physical defects can be concealed by adopting special positions during intercourse. In an age of political correctness, he is still able to offend modern sensibilities. He recommends pretending to cry, making false promises, writing flattering verses (however insincere) and even coercion: `Some force is permissible – women are often pleased by force.'

Ovid also advises the aspirant libertine to affect the symptoms of love sickness: 'All lovers should be pallid, it's chic to be pale;/ Only fools deny it, pale skins rarely fail.' Moreover, he observes that loss of appetite and worry 'make the young lover as thin as a rake'. Therefore, if wishing to attract the attention of women, one should: `Look lean – it suggests passion.'

When Andrew Capelanus came to write his own work – The Art of Courtly Love – he did so by borrowing from Ovid. Thus, Ovid's cynical observations were used to shore up the romantic ideal. Love sickness – merely another weapon in Ovid's armamentarium – became fully established as a crucial sign of love's authenticity.

Capelanus described love as `a certain inborn suffering' and suggested thirty-one rules of love. They include the following:

Rule 2 He who is not jealous cannot love.
Rule 9 No one can love unless he is impelled by the persuasion of love (also translated as: No one can love who is not driven to do so by the power of love).

Rule 13 When made public love rarely endures.
Rule 14 The easy attainment of love makes it of little value; difficulty of attainment makes it prized.
Rule 15 Every lover regularly turns pale in the presence of his beloved.
Rule 16 When a lover suddenly catches sight of his beloved his heart palpitates.
Rule 20 A man in love is always apprehensive (also translated as: A lover is always fearful).
Rule 21 Real jealousy always increases the feeling of love.
Rule 22 Jealousy, and therefore love, are increased when one suspects his beloved.
Rule 30 A true lover is constantly and without intermission possessed by the thought of his beloved (Also translated as: The true lover is continuously obsessed with the image of his beloved.

Love and mental illness were closely linked according to the principles of Hippocratic medicine; however, Capelanus's principles seem to do much the same thing. At Poitiers it was decided that love – if true – must be disturbed and slightly perverse; it must be obsessive, compulsive, agitated, anxious, jealous, suspicious, clandestine, and frustrating.

There is still some debate concerning to what extent Capelanus meant his rules to be taken seriously. It is possible that The Art of Courtly Love was meant to be satirical – but if so, its satirical content was lost on contemporary and subsequent generations. The Art of Courtly Love was never viewed as a critique. It was always viewed as a manifesto.

Romantic love became an increasingly important feature of literature in the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The Lais of Marie de France and de Lorris's Romance of the Rose are significant examples; however, the quintessential courtly romance of the middle ages must be Tristan – now more widely encountered in the opera house as Wagner's Tristan and Isolde.

Although Tristan does not feature King Arthur, it is an 'Arthurian' romance set in a landscape of castles, quests and dragons. An authenticated 'original' does not exist, but five versions have been handed down – the most famous being those of Beroul, Gottfried von Strassburg and Thomas.

Tristan is raised by his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall, and it falls upon him to escort King Mark's bride-to-be, the beautiful Princess Isolde, from her home in Ireland to the king's castle. While crossing the Irish Sea, they both mistakenly drink a love potion, and subsequently fall in love. The love potion – a potent symbol of love's madness – neatly excuses Tristan's betrayal of his uncle.

In Gottfried's version, the bemused Tristan complains: `I do not know what has come over poor Isolde and me, but we have both of us gone mad in the briefest space of time, with unimaginable torment – we are dying of love …'

Tristan and Isolde (against their better judgement) become clandestine lovers and, in doing so, stir the gods of tragedy. Much of the ensuing drama concerns their attempts to avoid discovery, and eventually they must separate. Tristan is wounded by a poisoned spear and, as his life ebbs away, he calls for Isolde. She rushes to be with him, but arrives too late and can do nothing to save him. Clasping his dead body, she gives up her spirit and dies.

During the middle ages, romantic narrative's landscape of kings and queens, knights and ladies, heroism, bravery, destiny and magic became established in the Western imagination, and is familiar to children, appearing in numerous story-books. The idea of romantic love has penetrated so deep into our culture, that few people escape its influence before leaving the nursery. Unfortunately, a consequence of this is that many grow up assuming they will find fairy-tale happiness in the real world – an expectation that is rarely fulfilled. Moreover, it is curious that the main exemplars of courtly romance (which in a sense foster our fairy-tale aspirations) rarely end with a `happy ever after', but with torment, tears and death.

Continued in part-2…..

Patriarchy and Toxic Relationships

Tim Patten · 11 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Those of us who are intent on meeting a mate, pair-bonding with a partner, or marrying the love of our lives will face numerous obstacles in our efforts to find happiness in this way.

For one thing, many of us will be forced to abandon hope of having an equal relationship, particularly in a time when, as Gloria Steinem noted, "society…encourages women to be victims every way."[i] Notions like this, including descriptions of women as chattel, are actively promoted by the media and on college campuses, strongly influenced by women's and gender studies programs that characterize our primordial patriarchy as an institutionalized and socially acceptable framework for male domination over women.[ii] Men are, in essence, encouraged to debase women with objectification, power, and authority.

Under the circumstances, it is not hard to see why many women develop anger, resentment and contempt towards men, which can provoke desires and fantasies—as well as acts–of revenge. The relationship between the sexes has become a power play, where interactions are viewed in a harsh, zero-sum light. If women beat men by a wide margin on the playing field, the response is not "great job!" Instead, there are hostile taunts, such as "girls rule and boys drool!" Female empowerment has metamorphosed into an ugly vision of females overpowering males. Talk of "girl power" simply means pushing back against male authority.

Authority Figures

To be sure, people have butted heads with those in positions of authority throughout history. Indeed, author J.K. Rowling once remarked, "authority figures attract trouble,"[iii] while businessman Vivek Wadhwa noted that a "k*ey ingredient to innovation is the ability to challenge authority and break rules.*"[iv] Not surprisingly, the assertion that men are patriarchal overlords has nourished thoughts of retaliation among women, fostering a mentality where males and females are combatants rather than comrades. Scarier still, it has inspired violent imagery of women dominating their men. For many of us, the playing field of love and marriage has been transformed into a cage match of gendered adversaries, where equality is rare.

Hell Hath No Fury

Admittedly, there are some who believe that patriarchy is an illusion; others, meanwhile, have no doubt that the widespread oppression of women is evidence of its existence. The fact that those on the very upper reaches of the economic ladder own or control the vast majority of the world's assets, businesses and employees suggests there is no place or part in society that is not subordinate in some way to this particular structure—aside from a few matriarchal villages in Africa, perhaps, everything is patriarchy.

Whether accurate or not, something has clearly played havoc with the relationship between the sexes. While some women have embraced our differences and are incredible mates, others have established fulcrums of male antipathy, moving them freely along a continuum that begins with caution and distrust, passes through resentment, and ends at hatred. Indeed, those of us who are in love can easily find ourselves in danger; we must develop a gendered lens so we can objectively evaluate current and future companions. We must also be careful about our own actions. If we are controlling, aggressive or violent toward women, we must find ways to calm down and understand the source of our anger.

Truth

Still, even if we manage to keep matters in check, the question of whether this will result in a win-win situation remains open. The truth is, the patriarchal system–or, perhaps, the belief in it–has likely damaged many prospective partners, who may view us, consciously or subconsciously, with distrust, disgust or begrudging hate. Hopefully, we notice the signs of a problematic partner early on: she crosses her arms over her chest and prevents us from gaining the conversational upper hand; she demands the last word in an argument; or she waves our ideas away, spins around in a huff, and stomps up the stairs.

If such behavior occurs, that doesn't mean we should respond in kind. While choosing the wrong partner–or at the least, someone who is unwilling to alter their destructive behavior–can destroy our lives and futures, it is worth bearing in mind that there are alternatives to simply lashing out. By acknowledging the role that primordial patriarchy may have played in fostering resentment and antipathy within our significant other, we are in the driver's seat: we decide whether and how to deal with her wrath.

Men Have Options

Among the paths we might choose are:

A negotiated relationship. Even though divorce rates are sky-high at 40-50%,[v] and four out of every ten couples who stay married say they are unhappy,[vi] there are some who manage to work through their gender-power issues. Premarital counseling can be a perfect solution for those who are serious about and intent on having a wonderful future together.

The wealth solution. The resources that billionaires have at their disposal can keep wives comfortably ensconced in a life of luxury while business, social and other demands can mean that the two partners don't see enough of each other to wage endless conflict. Sadly, this option is not available to most of us.

Succumb to her will: If we breach one of the thousands of bulwarks against male oppression that have built up inside of her, we will receive an angry tongue-lashing–or worse. Some of us willingly give in, never fighting back as we try hard to be respectful, considerate, and responsive to her every need. We accept endless bickering and nagging. We walk on eggshells, allowing her to continually test our love. We ensure that we tell her she is pretty, has beautiful hair, is not fat and smells good. Unfortunately, studies show that suppressing our needs and wants and sustaining years of such negativity can cause mental and physical health illnesses.[vii]

Stand up for ourselves. Every time we talk over her or otherwise try to gain the upper hand, her sliding scale of mistrust moves closer to hatred. Like many women, she may actively count the times we wounded her and, at some point, retaliate. Soon, we will find ourselves destined for vengeance that only a woman can unleash. The divorce will likely be a living hell—one that has led to depression and suicide in no small number of men.[viii]

Go our own way. Perhaps the only real answer is to join an ever-growing movement that believes the modern world can and will be incredible for us men. A hurricane of men's liberation awareness–MGTOW, Red Pill and Herbivore Men–is circling the planet, and it is unleashing freedom and empowering us to define and follow our own unique, and uniquely masculine, paths.

The Modern Men's Liberation Movement

It is a new day for men: knowledge and freedom are at our fingertips. We now have the opportunity to design the kind of passionate life that we might once have only dreamed about. The first step, of course, is to move beyond patriarchal expectations regarding relationships and marriage and forge a life of purpose designed with ourselves, our community and those we love most in mind. When we go our own way, we will discover who we truly are and wish to be, and realize the satisfying life that we were destined for.

*****

[i] http://www.brainyquote.com/quotes/quotes/g/gloriastei690605.html

[ii] http://www.socialistalternative.org/it-doesnt-have-to-be-like-this/have-women-always-been-oppressed/

[iii] http://likesuccess.com/763866

[iv] http://www.brainyquote.com/quotes/quotes/v/vivekwadhw614557.html?src=t_authority

[v] http://www.apa.org/topics/divorce/

[vi] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/12/15/why-people-stay-in-unhappy-marriages_n_6330292.html

[vii] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/health/article-2623873/You-really-nagged-death-Excessive-demands-partners-double-risk-dying-middle-age.html

[viii] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/health/article-2440005/Divorce-mans-health-Separation-increases-risk-death-substance-abuse-suicide-depression.html

MRA – Label Detox

AVfM Video Source · 12 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Realraven2000's thought's and replies to Sargon's suggestion of dropping "the label." imho, MRA is not lost.

If you like this video, please support Realraven2000's YT channel.

Dr. Samir Al-Ali of London, “Known Plastic Surgeon / Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 12 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Does your doctor have a dark side?

Is he or she a seemingly normal doctor by all other accounts who mutilates babies as a sideline? I give you Dr. Samir Al-Ali, a plastic surgeon who also circumcises male infants at his clinic “Circumcision in London.”

Dr. Samir Al-ali has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Al-Ali practices plastic surgery at the same location as his circumcisions, but uses a different website, beverleyclinic.co.uk, which brings up something I’ve been thinking about.

Does your doctor have a dark side?

Would you knowingly support someone who sexually abuses children? How about someone who performs Female Genital Mutilation (FGM)? You wouldn’t? Then why support anyone who practices MGM, because that’s exactly what circumcisers do.

We can help stop these heinous acts by voting with our feet and avoiding these ‘doctors’ for all services that they provide, giving them the message that genital mutilation of infants is immoral and most likely illegal.

From Dr. Al-Ali’s website circumcisioninlondon.co.uk:

“Welcome to our Circumcision Clinic in London, offering you professional services in circumcision for all ages. The circumcision will be pain free since our very own Plastic Surgeon has worked in the medical profession for more than 30 years and has competently carried out major life saving surgeries in the UK and overseas. His excellent work and contribution has seen his work published in the newspaper and on international TV.

Pain-free Circumcision

The circumcision is pain-free during and after the procedure. Dr Al-Ali has had 30 years experience in giving local anaesthetic. Before starting the circumcision, Dr Al-Ali will test the patient making sure that the circumcision is completely pain-free.”

There’s no way of knowing the level of pain endured by the infant, but we know that it is not painless, and the AAP recently declared that this procedure is not safe for infants.

Under “Feedback” we see:

> Paul Davey – 56 years old
>
> First, briefly the reason why: Unlike my 5 brothers who were all circumcised shortly as infants, for some reason I was left intact, despite our mother being a trained nurse and a history of phimosis known to be > common in our family. At my own request, after years of putting up with the usual problems of a tight, restrictive foreskin, I was finally circumcised under the NHS in my late teens. It was then a very painful experience, but I accepted it had to be done and was grateful for the help. I'm sure they did their best. That said, I was never happy with the result, my circumcision scar was noticeably uneven, and only extended about half-way down my glans when flaccid, or even partially erect. I still had some discomfort and pinching pressure when my penis naturally retracted into my body, such as when sitting for long periods of time, as in a theatre, or a long car journey, but to be fair this was generally mild, and in the end I just got used to it. A few months ago, having met the lady who was to become my wife, she made it clear at the start that for health reasons, she only ever had sexual relationships with circumcised men, and although she accepted that I had indeed been circumcised, she found the condition of my penis off-putting and she asked me to have a fuller, proper circumcision done at some stage soon after our marriage. I had never heard of recircumcision before but I agreed. We researched this subject on the internet, and this fiinally led us to Dr Al-Ali.

>
> I left the surgery about 2PM, having arrived at midday. The journey back to South London took about 2 hours, not at all bad. I took the pain-killers about an hour later, about 5PM, as instructed. I changed into a tee shirt and light weight jogging bottoms, but kept 2 pairs of underpants on, again as instructed. My wife arrived home about 7pm as usual, and immediately asked for a visual inspection! At this point I noticed that the dressing had come off. Dr. Al-Ali had warned me that in my own case, this would probably happen as my penis retracts into my body rather more than most, a condition known as "hidden" or "buried" penis. However, when I stand up, my penis comes back out by itself, so it never been a real problem. I should perhaps research this a bit more, but then again, the saying "if it's not broken, don't fix it" comes to mind. I could tell by her expression that she was delighted with the result, then she said that this was exactly how she had imagined how it would look, and I showed her how to replace the dressing, which she did extremely well. We spent a very quiet evening together, she called her parents to tell them the news. As always, they were happy to hear their daughter's excited voice. "Like a dog with a new bone" I heard her father laughing. They are great people, really.
>
> Time passed, my pubic hair began to grow back and the stitches began to gradually dissolve. The feeling of my glans rubbing against the material of my underpants felt strange at first, but I quickly got used to it, as I suppose all newly circumcised men must!
>
> My wife is so much more relaxed now she knows the operation is over, we got exactly the result we imagined and was a real success. There really is no down side. I will conclude with a big thank you from my wife and I to Dr.Al-Ali, Mohammed and the rest of his staff for the job they did for us. The whole experience was professional, friendly and very efficient. This has brought my wife and closer together, she was right all along [as usual.]

I don't know if he needed that circumcision in his teens, but it sure disfigured his penis beyond having a "tight foreskin," and remember, the patient above consented to his surgery, a right that Dr. Al-Ali doesn't afford to the infants he disfigures.

"Like a dog with a new bone." Really?

Let's be frank – the medical profession has done a shitty job protecting baby boys from this unethical practice and it continues due to ignorance and greed. Medicine must learn about the function and care of the foreskin rather than treating it as a disease to be amputated. The man above should have had an option to fix his tight foreskin and not remove it.

Under "Benefits of Circumcision:"

> Benefits of Circumcision:
>
> 1.Circumcision improves the hygiene and cleanliness of the penis
>
> 2.It reduces the risks of balanitis and balanopothitis (Inflammation of glans and the foreskin)

> 3. Circumcision decreases the risk of HIV in men (BMJ 2000;320(7249):1592 (10 June). For further readings, please visit http://www.bmj.com/cgi/content/full/320/7249/1592
>
> 4. Females with circumcised partners are at a reduced risk of contracting cancer of the cervix of the womb than females with uncircumcised partners. If you would like to find out more then please visit http://www.bmj.com/cgi/content/full/320/7249/1592
>
> 5. Circumcision eliminates the risks of phimosis (inability to retract the foreskin during erection) and paraphimosis (inability to relax the foreskin after erection).
>
> 6. Circumcised men are much less susceptible to cancer of the penis
>
> 7. Circumcision also reduced the risk of urinary tract infections

All these supposed "benefits" have been debunked, and are just the latest attempts to justify this practice.

Don't support genital mutilation by supporting the careers of plastic surgeons, Ob/Gyns, or pediatricians that also cut babies. See "Known Genital Mutilators" or do a search of the doctor + "circumcision."

Since Dr. Al-Ali has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Al-Ali's practice information follows:

Tel: 020 8951 3794
Mob: 0788 6779958

Circumcision in London
78 Beverley Drive
HA8 5NE

info@CircumcisionInLondon.co.uk

> Does Your Doctor Have a Dark Side? Dr. Samir Al-Ali of London, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/ROf04RS9hm pic.twitter.com/zwIrMsCW5w
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 12, 2016

Love sick (part 2)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 12 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following is Part 2 of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Dr. Tallis uncovers the cultural roots of men's tendency toward idealizing women and placing them on pedestals. – Eds.

Incurable Romantics

The romantic themes of idealisation and forbidden (or non-consummated) love were taken to new extremes in Renaissance Italy. Poets such as Dante and Petrarch placed their muses on absurdly elevated pedestals. Dante's Beatrice, and Petrarch's Laura, are portrayed as models of perfection and purity. Moreover, the fact that both women died prematurely and then reappear in poetic visions, emphasises their divinity. There is some debate concerning the identity of Petrarch's Laura. She may have been Laure de Noves of Avignon (a married woman with children), or she may never have existed at all (being merely a poetic invention). Dante's Beatrice, on the other hand, was definitely a real person.
The extreme idealisation of Beatrice and Laura is partly attributable to Marianism. During the thirteenth century, Mary became increasingly important as a mediator between human beings and God. It was to Mary that the majority prayed for divine intercession. She was more `human', and therefore approachable, than all three personifications of the Holy Trinity. Moreover, her curious (and paradoxical) position as the mother of God gave her considerable authority. For some time, the river of romantic literature was swollen by the tributary of Marianism. Women were worshipped with religious fervour, and sexual desire was wholly sublimated.

The story of Dante and Beatrice is principally recorded in Dante's The New Life (a hybrid of autobiography and literary treatise). They met for the first time as children, when the poet accompanied his father to the house of Folco Portinari (Beatrice's father). Dante immediately fell in love with Beatrice and remained devoted to her (more or less) for the rest of his life. She was married to a banker from an early age, and so – in true courtly style – Dante was forced to admire her from a distance. He appropriated the Arthurian role of Lancelot, and championed his `mistress', not with arms, but with poetry.

The Marian nature of Dante's love for Beatrice did not exempt him from the commonplace symptoms of love sickness. He complained of all the usual problems: expansive moods and depression, lightheadedness, obsession, anorexia, sleeplessness, paleness, trepidation and anguish. And Beatrice occupied such an elevated position in his universe that even the slightest suspicion of her disapproval was crushing. When she failed to return his greeting, Dante became extremely distressed:

> … I was overcome by such sorrow that I left my fellow men and went to a secluded place, where I could bathe the earth with my bitter tears. Then, when my weeping was almost exhausted, I took myself to my room, where I could lament without being overheard. There, while calling for mercy from the lady of courtesy, and crying `Love, help your servant!', I fell asleep like a little child crying after it has been beaten.

If anything, the spiritual nature of Dante's love for Beatrice seemed to exaggerate the usual psychopathological resonances. Even his moments of rapture were tainted with the uncomfortable, manic energy of a religious fanatic. His eyes shine, and we question his sanity; we are not very far away from shaking fists, prophecy and revelation.

Perhaps the most compelling example of this arose during a period of sickness, when it suddenly occurred to Dante that Beatrice was mortal and might one day die: 'At this I was overcome by such delirium that I shut my eyes and started to thrash about like a fever patient.' He then entered a world of lurid hallucination: 'Then I saw the sun darken and the stars changed to such a colour that I thought they wept; birds dropped dead while flying through the air, and there were vast earthquakes.' We are reminded of the darkness that fell on the earth at the time of the crucifixion. For Dante, a presentiment of separation was not painful – it was the apocalypse.

At the age of twenty-four Beatrice did die, and predictably Dante was thrown into deep despair – even though, by then, he too was married. While grieving, he became temporarily infatuated with another woman; however, these feelings were completely expunged when Beatrice appeared to him in a heavenly vision. Dante was reminded of Beatrice's incomparable beauty and he subsequently committed himself to a life of continued adoration. He became, in effect, a votary.

Love is predicated on togetherness in a world where things must exist separately, and total separation – because of death – is an inevitable and unbearable truth that few lovers can keep from contemplating. In the history of romantic story telling, love and death are old companions. Great love stories are made all the more poignant by our certain knowledge that the couple are cavorting on the lip of an open grave.

In his scholarly treatise, Love in the Western World, the Swiss philosopher Denis de Rougemont wrote:

> Romance only comes into existence when love is fatal, frowned upon and doomed by life itself. What stirs lyrical poets to their finest flights is neither the delight of the senses nor the fruitful contentment of the settled couple; not the satisfaction of love, but its passion. And passion means suffering.

To live up to the romantic ideal, love must be fated. It must be passionate, painful and ultimately doomed. It must culminate in death and, if we are lucky, transfiguration.

But why?

Although death appears in love stories prior to the middle ages, it does so in the service of tragedy. After the middle ages, however, death is almost wholly in the service of love. The outcome of a fated love story might still be tragic, but death's function has changed. Essentially, it offers unlimited possibilities for idealisation.

The most extraordinary feature of Dante's The New Life is the degree to which he idealises Beatrice. Until Dante, almost all love poetry – however heady – recognised that beauty fades. In the end, time must ruin even the loveliest of faces. Yet, when it comes to Beatrice, Dante simply refuses to concede any ground to time. Of course, Beatrice conveniently obliged him by dying young, and in the reliquary of Dante's imagination, Beatrice's incorruptible body parts were preserved like those of a medieval saint.

The romantic tradition has always demanded that the beloved be, in some sense, beyond reach. Yearning, without out satisfaction or release, was presumed to be ennobling. Because romantic love is never supposed to be consummated, it never weakens, and continues to dignify the lover. When the beloved dies, she exchanges an earthly marriage for a numinous marriage. In death, she becomes completely unattainable, and the yearning must then go on for ever.

Islamic mysticism, courtezia and Renaissance literature have all added registers of meaning to the word `romantic'; however, it has also been enriched by association with a more recent, but nevertheless highly important, cultural development – the rise of Romanticism.

Strictly speaking, Romanticism is only tenuously connected with `romantic love'. The Romantic movement began in Germany towards the end of the eighteenth century, and continued to be influential, by varying degrees, until the end of the nineteenth. It began as a reaction against the values and preoccupations of the Enlightenment. The great thinkers of the Enlightenment venerated reason, lived in cities, and were keen to instigate political change. Romantics, on the other hand were fascinated by emotions, revered nature, and were far more interested in personal psychology than social reform.

The concerns of the Romantic movement were much wider than those of the troubadours or the Court of Love at Poitiers. Even so, in matters of love, there are several continuities that link the idea of romance with Romanticism. Indeed, the work which launched the Romantic movement was a love story which preserves many courtly themes.

This was Goethe's 1774 novel, The Sorrows of Young Werther.

Werther, an artistic young man, falls in love with the beautiful Lotte. Unfortunately, she is already engaged to Albert, a gentleman renowned for his honesty and good character. While waiting for Albert to announce the wedding day, Werther learns that Lotte and Albert have already been married. Werther tries to divert himself, and for a while wanders aimlessly, but his yearning for Lotte does not diminish and he feels compelled to return.

Werther is consumed with jealousy: 'At times I cannot grasp that she can love another man, that she dare love another man, when I love her alone with such passion and devotion, and neither know nor have anything but her!' He sinks into black despair: 'Ah, have ever men before me been so miserable?'

While out walking on a wet, dreary day, he meets a madman 'scrabbling about the rocks' picking flowers for his 'sweetheart'. The madman's mother appears, and explains to Werther that her son has only recently been released from a madhouse, where he has been restrained in chains for a whole year. The following day, Werther discovers that the madman was previously a clerk employed by Lotte's father. He, too, had fallen in love with Lotte, and the revelation of his love had cost him first his position and then his sanity.

The encounter with the madman is a presentiment of Werther's own fate. He becomes progressively more disturbed, agitated and has hallucinatory dreams of making love to Lotte: 'My senses are confused, for a full week I have been unable to think straight, my eyes are full of tears.' His misery becomes intolerable – even to the solicitous Lotte – who perceptively suggests: 'I fear, I very much fear that what makes the desire to possess me so attractive is its very impossibility.'

Werther cannot be reasoned with. He desires an eternal connection with Lotte, and he begins to see how this might be achieved. He leaves instructions for his body to be buried in clothes that are 'sacred' (because Lotte has touched them), and places a pink ribbon – a gift from Lotte – in his pocket. While experiencing a kind of spiritual reprieve from mental anguish ('All around me is so silent, and my soul is calm') Werther shoots himself, and dies.

A romantic love triangle, an idealised woman, an episode of wandering, and a young man who edges towards his doom. The old courtly themes are very much in evidence; however, it is Werther's demise that seems to resonate most strongly with the mystical origins of romantic idealism. Ultimately, courtly love is about realising spiritual objectives: beauty is back-lit by a sun that sets in paradise.

The spiritual sub-text of Werther's love for Lotte surfaces several times before his death. For example, at one point, he says of Lotte: 'She is sacred to me. All my desires are stilled in her presence. I never know what I am about when I am with her; it is as if my soul were throbbing in every nerve.' In another section, the possibility of a spiritual reunion is innocently raised by Lotte herself, when she discusses her religious convictions: 'There will be a life for us after death, Werther! . . . but will we find each other again? And know each other? What do you suppose? What do you say?'

The Romantics had a highly developed sense of the numinous. They believed in a universal soul – a mysterious `fundament' behind visible nature. Moreover, they believed that an understanding of this deeper truth might be achieved through communion with nature, or the experience of altered states of consciousness, such as powerful emotions, dreams or madness.

In this sense, Romanticism returns romantic love to its cultural source. It returns us to the desert, where Islamic sages sought truth in beauty. We are again in the company of Majnun, whose love is so intense, so powerful, it punctures the celestial dome and fenestrates heaven.

Romanticism is the closest thing we have to a religious faith in a predominantly secular society. This is probably because love is frequently associated with intense experiences of rapture and ecstasy. When love's madness enters its manic phase, consciousness is raised. If love is consummated, sexual activity can intensify the experience even further – evoking what psychologists have called 'oceanic feelings'.

Love's rapture and transcendent states have much in common. Both achieve a sense of escape from the limitations of human identity by union with another being (either lover or God). The desired outcome is a kind of self-annihilation, in which personality, ordinarily overburdened with worldly concerns, is lost in a moment of pure, unadulterated bliss.

Almost all religions have a pseudo-erotic mystical tradition. Hindus practise sexual Tantra and Sufi poetry is fundamentally love poetry. Even Christianity has – to the considerable embarrassment of the Church itself – been unable to resist linking sex and spirituality. St Teresa of Avila, for example, evokes the female genitalia by describing a 'wound of love', and famously wrote about a vision in which she was penetrated by an angel carrying a golden spear with 'a point of fire'. For St Teresa, spiritual enlightenment is a process that begins when the soul falls in love with God, and ends with 'spiritual marriage'.

In Revelations of Divine Love, another medieval Christian mystic, Julian of Norwich, described oddly pornographic visions of Jesus Christ's bleeding body. The sensuous language she employs knowingly emphasises the carnal aspects of carnage. Thus, her 'revelation' is 'horrifying and dreadful, sweet and lovely'. Moreover, when Jesus speaks, he speaks in the person of a lover: 'It is I whom you love; it is I whom you delight in … it is I whom you long for, whom you desire.'

The division that exists between reason and emotion has created a curious predicament for Western humanity. We find it hard to believe in God, but at the same time, we still have the capacity to look at the natural world and feel something thing close to reverence and awe. Although we suspect that there is no God, we feel that there should be. We are still dissatisfied with the limitations of personal identity. This is evidenced by the continuing popularity of recreational drugs. In the absence of an alternative, many settle for a chemical Nirvana.

In the East, where spirituality is still very much a part of everyday life, less is expected of love between human beings. The spiritual instinct is satisfied by religious observances, meditation or scripture. In the West, however, where religion plays no real part in the lives of most people, we have replaced religion with love. We have become passionate pilgrims, seeking the transport and meanings of spiritual ecstasy in the religion of romance and the sacrament of sex.

Even if we have little knowledge of the cultural history of romance, we all – to a greater or lesser extent – subscribe to a broad set of 'romantic' expectations. The notion of romance has inveigled itself into every aspect of courtship, sex and love. We seek to create a 'romantic atmosphere' on a dinner date, we allow ourselves the indulgence of a 'holiday romance', or attempt to revive passion with a long-term partner by taking a 'romantic weekend break'.

The cultural history of 'romance' and various meanings of the word 'romantic' make it extremely difficult to define 'romantic love'. Academic psychology – usually quite pedantic about its terminology – has been unable to establish a consensus. Some psychologists use the term in accordance with its courtly origins, whereas others use it interchangeably with 'passionate love'. As a culture, we seem to have settled on the latter usage, viewing 'romantic love' and 'falling in love' as much the same thing.

It has already been argued that the fundamental features of romantic love are evolutionary in origin. Thus, courtship gives women time to evaluate the fitness of suitors; heroic acts are a form of male resource display; and an exclusive (or idealised) relationship is necessary for the formation of a strong pair-bond. Most contemporary evolutionary theorists would agree with Capelanus when he points out that the ease with which love can be won is inversely related to its value. In any social hierarchy, the more beautiful a woman is, the more difficult it will be for a man to win her affection. Beauty advertises good genes which, being at a premium, can be withheld for longer. A beautiful woman is never short of suitors. The inaccessibility of fairy-tale queens is perhaps the logical extension of this principle.

That we should find traces of evolutionary theory in story telling is unremarkable. Art has always served as an instrument of self-enquiry and self-definition. Therefore, it was inevitable that certain fundamental features of human behaviour should appear as conventions in romantic literature. The problem with the courtly tradition, however, is that during the course of its development, the romantic ideal became increasingly rigid and extreme; the imposition of arbitrary codes of conduct offered unlimited scope for self-contradiction contradiction and confusion.

The idea that psychopathology is related to conflict is an old one, and it is an explanatory principle that appears and reappears in the writings of numerous psychologists. Thus, individuals whose theories of psychopathology are extremely different – for example, Sigmund Freud and Ivan Pavlov – still have this much in common.

In the 195os, Gregory Bateson and colleagues developed a new conflict-based theory of psychopathology which made use of a pivotal concept known as the 'double bind'. Essentially, Bateson suggested that severe psychological problems might be caused by 'mixed messages' – as, for example, when a mother repeatedly tells her son that she loves him, while turning her head away in disgust. The term double bind has also been used to describe 'catch-22' situations, where whatever choice is made, the outcome is undesirable.

The doctrine of romantic love has a double bind at its heart. It confuses the carnal and the spiritual. What started off as allegorical literature eventually became a code of conduct – and a completely impractical one at that. Arab mystical literature explored the correspondences between sexual desire and spiritual desire. However, as these threads were carried over the Pyrenees they became inextricably entangled – and much follows from this. The ever present tension between the carnal and spiritual produces a dynamic which generates layer upon layer of self-contradiction.

We expect another human being to make us feel complete, or fulfilled, yet these profound feelings of completion are usually only vouchsafed to the spiritually enlightened. We expect passionate love to last for ever – and even increase in intensity – but it is transitory; it almost always diminishes or turns into companionate love. We expect beauty to be resistant to the depredations of time, but all beauty fades. We like to think that we are being inexorably guided by supernatural forces towards one true love, but the most important factor in the formation of relationships (whether we like it or not) is chance, and in reality we fall in love promiscuously.

Worse still, the fabric of romance comes apart under the forces generated by its own contradictions. Women are worshipped as paradigms of purity, personifications of Marian virtue, but the foundations of adoration sink into a quagmire of lust and desire. Men make women into Madonnas, but cannot deny their sexual needs. Thus, they inevitably despoil paradise. In the later versions of 'Arthurian' legend (including those concerning Tristan), this is recognised by the introduction of a fatally adulterous relationship: Lancelot sleeps with Guinevere; Tristan sleeps with Isolde. As the courtly tradition evolved, more and more writers became preoccupied with adultery, rather than ennobling abstinence.

The impossible demands of romantic love have left a deep impression on Western literature. As Denis de Rougemont has astutely observed: 'To judge by literature, adultery would seem to be one of the most remarkable of occupations in both Europe and America. Few are the novels that fail to allude to it … Without adultery, what would happen to imaginative writing?'

The fairy-tale, 'Once-upon-a-time' world of romantic love promises that we will live 'happy ever after', but romantic narrative is pure tragedy. Heroes vacillate between euphoria and melancholy, and then subside into states of morbid obsession. The name Tristan means child of sadness, and few romances end without first taking casualties. The confusion of the carnal and spiritual invites death into the bedroom and, ultimately, we join our voices with a vast choir and sing that great anthem of self-contradiction, the liebestod, the love death. Procreation and extinction accidentally join hands in the conceptual fog of romantic idealism, with devastating consequences.

Our romantic legacy is predicated on a Batesonian double bind, and its mixed messages incline us towards emotional instability. If evolutionary pressures have determined that love should drive us mad, then cultural pressures have created ideal conditions for its incubation.

Continued in part-3….

Philip Davies MP and Mark Pearson to speak at ICMI16

Mike Buchanan · 12 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This announcement is, we think, a bit special. We already had 20 impressive speakers scheduled for the London conference, and I'm delighted to announce two more. The following is drawn from the 'Speakers' tab on the conference website, just updated:

Philip Davies MP – 'The Justice Gender Gap'

Philip has been the Conservative MP for Shipley since 2005. He's a highly regarded advocate for men's rights, the only such MP in the House of Commons. Examples of his work include revealing startling gender differences in prison sentencing, in 2012 – video here. On International Men's Day (2015) he introduced the first parliamentary debate on men's issues – video here.

Mark Pearson – 'Facing my Waterloo'

Mark is an award-winning contemporary artist, trained at the Royal College of Art. He recently became the focus of an international news story, when he was falsely accused of sexually assaulting an actress when walking past her in Waterloo Station. He advocates an end to the institutional misandry in the Crown Prosecution Service.

The head of the Crown Prosecution Service is Alison Saunders, a recent Toxic Feminist of the Month.

We have a strict limit of 200 people in the conference room at ICMI16. Not many tickets are left now, so if you're thinking of attending, now is the time to order your ticket(s). Please don't contact me after they've run out, expecting me to perform a miracle and make a ticket available. That simply won't be possible. You can order your ticket(s) here.

Appropriate this!

AVfM Video Source · 13 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Social Justice Warriors — the first warriors to faint at the sight of a penknife — have a new weapon to show off their unearned moral superiority: CULTURAL APPROPRIATION, where mainstream culture steals from minorities without being “authentic.” Surprisingly Bill Whittle agrees with this and has a list of grievances all his own.

TruthRevoltOriginals

Love sick (part 3)

Dr. Frank Tallis · 13 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following is the final of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Tallis looks at the division between Asian and Western approaches to love. – Eds.

Incurable Romantics

In the early 1990's, a group of social scientists undertook a large cross-cultural study, in which they interviewed students from the USA, Italy, and the People's Republic of China about a variety of emotional experiences, including happiness, fear, anger, sadness and love. When the study was completed, it was found that there was remarkable agreement concerning all of the emotions, but with one exception – love. American and European subjects rated love very positively, and equated it with other positive experiences like joy and happiness. The Chinese subjects, however, were much more doubtful. In the Chinese language there are very few ideographs that correspond with the more positive love-related related words found in English and Italian. Instead, love tends to be associated with more negative emotional states. For example, the Chinese subjects linked passionate love with ideographs which translate as 'infatuation', 'unrequited love', 'nostalgia' and 'sorrow'. When told of Western ideas about love, the Chinese subjects thought they were inaccurate and unrealistic.

These findings raise some interesting questions. Has the Western romantic tradition made us blind to love's madness? China has no equivalent tradition. In fact, during the Cultural Revolution, 'romantic love' was outlawed – considered by the communist elite to be a 'bourgeois' indulgence. Given this context, is it possible that the Chinese are better equipped to evaluate the pitfalls of passionate love? It would seem that for many Chinese students, they would as much want to fall in love as develop a psychiatric illness.

The ancient Greeks were troubled by passion – seeing it as a force that could easily overthrow reason and disturb the mind's equilibrium. In many respects, this view has been preserved in several Asian and Oriental cultures. To be romantic is to play with fire – the volatile, inner fire of Hippocratic and Islamic medicine. Although passion can be exciting, it is extremely unreliable – so unreliable, that Asian and Oriental cultures have rejected passion as the basis of marriage, subscribing instead to the more rational processes of 'arrangement'. The formation of a new family unit is considered to be of such great importance – not only to the bride, groom, their progeny and immediate family, but to the entire local community and wider society – that it cannot be based on love alone. There must be a deeper level of compatibility, embracing factors such as background, education and temperament, to ensure that the relationship will last.

The Chinese anthropologist Francis Hsu has suggested that Western and Eastern cultures differ with respect to social awareness and obligation. In the West, the individual – his or her personal identity – is considered to be much more important than his or her social role. In the East, however, this is entirely reversed. The individual's personal identity is considered less important than their ability to be a good son, daughter, husband or mother. Therefore, a successful marriage is more likely to arise from a pairing that takes the full social and cultural credentials of both parties into account.

The romantic tradition represents the antithesis of this kind of thinking – and reaches its most extreme expression in elopement. From a Western perspective, the instinctive response to elopement is positive. Yet, the eloping couple are usually in the throes of love's madness, and remove themselves entirely from their social context. In doing so, they immediately lose the benefits of an existing support network (friends and family) and incur the costs of geographical displacement. They become disconnected, two mutually absorbed individuals who have relinquished social obligations and can no longer properly occupy a defined social role. Needless to say, a relationship that takes place in a social vacuum has fewer external forces holding it together.

It is interesting that this disregard for social context was always a feature of romantic writing. For example, the figure of the Majnun, being mad, is by necessity a social outcast, but in the romantic tradition, losing or risking everything for love, including one's mind, is almost expected. In the Lais of Marie de France (a collection of courtly tales written in the late twelfth century) the disconnection of lovers from their social context is even more conspicuous. French literature scholars Glynn Burgess and Keith Busby point out that:

> Marie concentrates on the individuality of her characters and is not very concerned with their integration into society. If society does not appreciate the lovers, then the lovers die or abandon society, and society is the poorer for it.

Perhaps as a consequence of this disenfranchisement, Marie's images of love are almost always painful. Again, Burgess and Busby write:

> If we take the Lais as a whole work, compared with other works of medieval literature, the characteristic of Marie's view of love seems to be an almost inevitable association with suffering.

The theme of the lover – or lovers – standing outside society, re-emerges intermittently throughout the entire history of romantic writing, and ultimately we find ourselves in the frozen wastes of Romantic poetry, where young men set off on winter journeys, meaning either never to return or to die. This represents yet another paradox. One of the main aims of the courtly tradition was to socialise love, to make it genteel and polite. Yet ultimately, romance is an anti-social phenomenon. It weakens social cohesion.

The Asian and Eastern belief that all of society has a stake in the success of love was curiously echoed by Erich Fromm in The Art of Loving. Fromm insisted that the principal problem of Western society is alienation. When we love, however, we should feel connected – and this sense of connection extends beyond the family to the social whole. Socially aware love – love that acknowledges its social context – is essential to the well-being of everyone.

For most people raised in the West, the concept of an arranged marriage – or policing love – seems distasteful, even repugnant. Yet, arranged marriage is practised by 60 per cent of the world's population – and approximately half of these couples claim that they stay together because of love (not romantic love, maybe, but something far more durable). In Britain and the US, where people still uphold the romantic ideal, nearly half of first marriages end in divorce, while those marriages that survive are often characterised by deep levels of dissatisfaction – particularly among women. The divorce rate for second and third marriages is even higher.

Love's madness usually strikes with the onset of adolescence. Subsequently, there is a high risk of pregnancy, impetuous marriage, or both. Statistics show that teenage marriages are very fragile, and a high percentage break down within only a few years. Teenage pregnancy (compared with pregnancy in early adulthood) is associated with premature birth, low birth weight, and death during childbirth. Teenage pregnancy also has social consequences. It will interrupt, or even terminate, a young woman's education, and the children of most teenage families are financially disadvantaged. The idea of risking everything for love is portrayed in the West as a noble undertaking, but subscribing to this doctrine frequently results in loneliness, hardship and poverty.

In stark contrast, the tradition of arranged marriage has a number of pragmatic advantages, rarely appreciated by dyed-in-the-wool romantics. The arranged marriage system is strongly associated with the idea of coercion, yet, in reality, Asian and Oriental cultures almost always allow the prospective bride and groom to exercise some choice, albeit limited. In India, the 'girl-seeing' ceremony has evolved specifically for this purpose. Typically, the young man's family will visit the young woman's family, and the young man is given a special seat. The young woman then enters the room, kneels, bows and leaves. Both are then in a position to decide whether they find each other attractive and wish to proceed further.

Although arranged marriages are treated with suspicion in the West, they represent a preference for many who have been raised in Asian and Eastern cultures. It is assumed that a 'good marriage' can only be achieved if couples are carefully matched, and then supported by their families. To base a marriage on passion is simply irresponsible, and likely to result in unhappiness. Surprisingly – for incurable romantics at least – contemporary research does not contradict this view.

Psychologists Paul Yelsma and Kuriakose Athappilly have studied relationship satisfaction levels of couples who married for love and those who married by arrangement. Those whose marriages were arranged show much higher levels of satisfaction than those who married for love. Other studies have produced a similar pattern of results.

Almost instinctively, the Occidental sensibility finds such results difficult to believe, but why shouldn't arranged marriages be superior to those that are based on a temporary madness? A long-term relationship – if it is to be happy – must be based on more than the tortured logic and inflated expectations of romantic idealism.

The Dalai Lama, examining romantic love from the cool, rational vantage of Buddhism, does not hesitate to identify it as a form of madness:

> When a couple has just met, seen each other on just a few occasions, they may be madly in love and very happy, but any decision about marriage made at that instant would be very shaky. Just as one can become, in some sense, insane from the power of intense anger or hatred, it is also possible for an individual to become in some sense insane by the power of passion and lust.

Romantic love springs from absurdities such as 'love at first sight'. It is preoccupied with superficial (and transient) characteristics such as physical beauty, and usually ends in confusion and frustration.

> … sometimes you might even find situations where an individual could feel, `Oh, my boyfriend or girlfriend is not really a good person, not a kind person, but still I feel attracted to him or her.'

According to the Dalai Lama, meaningful, satisfying and lasting relationships are not based on romantic idealism, but on mutual understanding, respect and compassion. True love is not instant. Love that strikes like a bolt of lightning is almost certainly suspect, as are the whirlwind romances that are the staple of romantic fiction. In essence, the Dalai Lama suggests that a commitment based on deep friendship is more likely to outlast a commitment based on desire. In contrast to the storm-tossed seas of romanticism, he offers an attractive alternative of still waters and lotus flowers – the relationship as sanctuary, a retreat from madness, rather than a manifestation of madness.

Perhaps, after more than a thousand years of disappointment, we can see the first signs of disaffection in the West – cultural trends that tacitly acknowledge the commonsense sense virtues of Asian and Oriental attitudes to love and marriage. Over the last fifty years, dating agencies have become increasingly popular, operating on similar principles to those that govern arranged marriages. The only fundamental difference is that the initial matching takes place in a computer, rather than a group of human brains. Even seemingly esoteric rituals, like the 'girl-seeing' ceremony, have equivalents – for instance, the provision of a photograph or video.

Dating agencies are distinctly unromantic. They militate against all the basic assumptions of romantic love. Yet, they are responsible for bringing a large number of people together in relationships that seem to be very successful.

The idea of arrangement does not preclude falling in love. Indeed, in Asian and other Eastern societies, it is assumed that a couple will fall in love and become passionate – but after the marriage has taken place. Thus, couples can experience love's madness safely, but know that when it passes, they will still have a robust and healthy relationship. Dating agencies seem to offer the same kind of security; couples can engage in the dangerous high-wire act of falling in love, comfortable in the knowledge that there is a safety net in place.

Disaffection with the failure of romantic love was dramatically demonstrated recently by American psychologist Robert Epstein, who, in addition to holding several academic posts, is also the editor-in-chief of Psychology Today. Having considered the merits of arranged marriages, Epstein wondered whether it would be possible to rehabilitate the concept for Western consumption. Consequently, in the June 2002 issue, he argued against romantic assumptions, and suggested that it might be possible to learn to love any suitable partner. He proposed a programme to test his hypothesis: the signing of a six-month exclusivity contract (to obviate the problem of parallel dating); commitment to intensive joint-counselling sessions; frequent 'getaways'; and participation in exercises designed to foster mutual love. Epstein suggested that such a programme – credible to Westerners – might achieve the same result as the arranged marriage system: reliable, meaningful and enduring love. More daringly, Epstein volunteered to be the first subject in his own experiment.

He expected the article to have little impact; however, the subsequent response was overwhelming. It aroused enormous media interest, and Epstein received hundreds of letters, e-mails and telephone calls from women eager to sign his contract.

It would seem that romantic love – which promises heaven on earth – has ultimately delivered something closer to despair.

Reply to /u/transamination/ about what men don't understand about women

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 13 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In response to the AskReddit question "What aspects of a woman's life are most men unaware of?" /u/transamination/ writes the following:

> You know that Louis CK bit about sexual perversion? Women get to be perverted, but men have to be? Women get the flip side of that. Men might want to be appreciated more for their appearance: I don't get a choice in the matter. You're a tourist in objectification while I fucking live there. You think a catcall sounds like a compliment while to me it's the sound of incoming artillery.
> Also, you hate having to initiate with women: I hate that I have to emotionally manage all of my relationships with men. If you fall for me, I'm a bitch for rejecting you or a tease for leading you on. If you're my friend, I'm supposed to know that you're only my friend because you want to fuck me, or that you're secretly in love with me, and I'm supposed to tell you to move on but also not just assume you're into me because that would make me a conceited bitch. Everything I do near a dude, I'm accountable for, and if someone gets the wrong idea they get to call me a name and blame me for it.
> ETA: Thank you for the name-calling and the death threats. You're truly doing God's work.

This comment caught my attention, and I wanted to share my response:

If the comment went unrewarded, I'd ignore it. But since it's the top comment I'd like all of you to hear an alternative view.

> Men might want to be appreciated more for their appearance: I don't get a choice in the matter. You're a tourist in objectification while I fucking live there. You think a catcall sounds like a compliment while to me it's the sound of incoming artillery.

Would you say this to a veteran who lost a limb to artillery? If I were you, I'd be worried about sounding like a tourist, or an ass that doesn't care about anyone but herself. I can't think of anyone who would feel more disposable than someone getting shot at, so I'm a little pissed you'd compare yourself to one in the first place. But let's move on for the sake of brevity, even though trudging through all of your loaded language makes brevity impossible.

Objectification? I call bullshit. I'm so sick of that word because it's a lie. If men were so simple that sexually gratifying objects and images were enough for them, they'd bang microwaved cantaloupes and never bother doing the work of reducing human beings—who can fight and talk back—to fuck toys in the first place. Even if objectification was this horrid, livable experience, don't you dare suggest men are excluded when dildos exist. If a man's genitals can be replicated in plastic and sold as a disembodied substitute for an entire man in bed, then you don't get to pretend that men's sex appeal is any less personal (or impersonal, depending on who you ask).

There are much easier ways to get off, and in extreme cases where a man has both the cash and the good sense to travel where they are legal, there's always brothels. But most men go through more trouble to bend you over a desk. Why? Why would someone risk a negative response from you in hopes of forming any connection, whether you consider it intrusive, gross, or even sweet?

I think it's because you are not being objectified, you are being subjectified. If you get cat-called, it's because how you look makes you special in addition to what men know about you at the time, even if they know nothing at the start.

You have a first world problem of unwanted attention that you could block, ignore or leverage. Instead, you choose to take men's reaction to your appearance so seriously that you equate sexually-charged attention to being shot at.

> Also, you hate having to initiate with women: I hate that I have to emotionally manage all of my relationships with men.

Show me one relationship with a modicum of sexual tension that requires zero emotional maintenance. I'd bring up brothels again, but we're talking about relationships. Are you really so disconnected from reality that you think relationships are supposed to be magically at their most convenient for you?

> If you fall for me, I'm a bitch for rejecting you or a tease for leading you on.

If you saw a man tell a woman that he loved her, but he didn't mean it, you would be crawling up his ass and tearing him apart for lying to her and causing her future distress. Don't pretend that you wouldn't.

If a guy is calling you names because you are not falling all over him for no reason, then you'd be right to say that not only you bear no responsibility for his feelings, you feel uncomfortable being subjected to them in the first place. But even then, you can't sit there and act like you are dealing with some completely insensitive horn dog. You are dealing with a human being who is inexperienced, vulnerable, or maybe is under pressure to experience sex because he's scared of feeling unattractive or undesirable. Yes, we do feel these things.

If you actually lead a man on, then I would only feel a need to express some level of contempt for you if you paint yourself as the one and only damaged party in a mutually challenging interaction. Which you did, so I'm not a fan of you right now.

When a guy first starts noticing women, he starts experiencing feelings he initially does not understand. Those feelings don't come with a manual, and many men don't even come up with a vocabulary to describe the visceral reaction they get when seeing an attractive woman. Engaging women suddenly becomes like learning to sing: You engage different parts of your brain, and hitting the wrong note can ruin the experience for everyone. All of this, compounded with learning who you are, and trying to beat the dreaded feeling of loneliness that comes with being a guy pressured to perform? No wonder guys end up stuttering, lashing out, calling names, beating around the bush or going for a vulgar request for a hookup! When you reject a guy trying to figure himself out, he hits an instant existential crisis, and he sees you as the reason he had it. That doesn't excuse him lashing out at you, but neither does any man lashing out excuse you from making, at least, a little effort to acknowledge and consider his vulnerability should you decide to reject him.

So yeah, pardon me for suggesting that you take some responsibility by showing the sensitivity you want from others. If you don't consider other people's feelings then don't act like you are entitled to civility. From what I'm seeing, you aren't even half of what you are asking for!

> Everything I do near a dude, I'm accountable for, and if someone gets the wrong idea they get to call me a name and blame me for it.

Welcome to having a social life. Watch how people respond to my post. If it gets downvoted to hell, then you can't pretend that men are somehow exempt from accountability because people are trying to punish me for how I spoke to a woman. If it gets upvoted to paradise or even ignored, that won't change the fact that my actions and words towards you had consequences.

Of course you are accountable for what you do! The alternative is that you are NOT responsible for what you do, and I think you wouldn't want people calling you irresponsible, would you? Because that's what it means.

You are, presumably, grown. In case you haven't already figured it out, part of being a grown-up is understanding that your words and actions reflect who you are.

What I see is a reflection of an entitled, self-absorbed woman who won't have the courage to admit that she is as flawed and scared of being truly connected as the individual men she resents. I also suspect this post was a waste of time because you have the support of people who won't objectively evaluate this conversation because you are a woman, and I am a man. Therefore, you must surely be the only credible source.

I'm extremely disappointed that people decided actually to reward you with attention and praise for such an insensitive, sexist and ignorant post. I just needed to get this off my chest, even if it accomplished nothing.

Are 1 in 5 Women Raped at College?

AVfM Video Source · 14 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Is it true that 1 in 5 women are raped on America's college campuses? If so, what does that say about our universities and the people who run them? If not, how did that statistic get into the mainstream? Caroline Kitchens, a Senior Research Associate at the American Enterprise Institute, looks at the data and explains the very significant results.

PragerU

Angry Harry passes away

Paul Elam · 14 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Online activism legend Angry Harry has passed away at the age of 64. According to family sources, he passed away suddenly and unexpectedly on February 24, 2016. He died of natural causes.

Harry was the undisputed father of using the internet to further a better reasoned and compassionate view of the issues faced by men and boys, and in challenging the inconsistencies and falsehoods of the feminist narrative.

He founded the website angryharry.com and worked single-handedly, inspiring so many others to find their courage to speak to the same issues.

On a personal note, I had many, many conversations with Harry in the formative years of AVFM. He had a strong and influential hand in shaping the message here. I sought and made use of his counsel on more times than I could remember. He was also a regular financial supporter of our projects, which he did quietly, with no desire to call attention to himself.

Harry had a doctorate in child development and also dedicated his life to improving the education of children.

For all those who feel thankful that there is now a growing men's movement, even those who never heard of Angry Harry, they have him to thank for possessing the genius and tenacity to get the ball rolling.

Just like so many other people getting this news, I am deeply saddened. Harry was taken from his family – from all of us — far too soon.

I am asking senior editorial staff to withhold publishing for 24 hours after this post is made as a period of respect for this great man.

On behalf of the entire staff and readership of A Voice for Men, I extend our deepest sympathies to Harry's family. He truly was a voice for men and will be sorely missed.

Why are married women leaving their men?

Editorial Staff · 14 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article appeared as a blog post on AVFM forums by Deidre. It is edited and republished here with her permission. Deidre shares her perspective from a Christian point of view, but the principles and challenges are universal. EDs

A recent Washington Post article, "Women are more likely to initiate divorce," discusses the problem of modern day marriage, and how women initiate divorce 70% of the time. That is an alarming stat, and contrary to what many people may think when it comes to divorce these days. Nearly 55% of all marriages end in divorce, and if you do the math, it would seem that any way we slice it, women are the leading causes of why marriages are on the decline, and why divorce has become such a popular past time.

But, why are women initiating divorce 70% of the time? The article paints a very grim picture of what marriage is supposed to 'look like' for the average American couple. Look at the first sentence, it basically sets the stage for how women have such high expectations, and that we deserve to have everything we want in a mate – from a best friend to a sensational lover, to a guy that has an awesome job, to someone who will be sensitive and listen to us when we're blue. Of course, this isn't entirely unreasonable, I'm engaged, and I'd like to think that I've found quite a catch. But, my fiancé is not the sum total of biceps and a bank account, in fact, those things are not what I've fallen in love with, at all. He is a true leader and isn't afraid to lead me. Because we are both Christians, we embrace 'servant leadership,' which is somewhat along the lines of how Jesus led His followers – by serving them, first.

In my humble opinion, THAT is why women are initiating divorce…they simply don't respect their men for who they are as men, anymore – and they have allowed themselves to listen to the ever-changing voices of a feminist narrative, that drones on and on about 'how happiness has nothing to do with men.' The voices that a woman hears on a daily basis, come from the news, family, social media, her social circle, and her work or college campus environment. Many feminists of today are lost and confused, but they find themselves hanging onto their feminist ideals, hoping that it will all pay off in the end. They have decided to view marriage as a way to control men and their money, and sadly, this is empowering to them. So, some of them marry, and as they call the shots in their relationships, the man's role dwindles into a sort of puppet, the wife being the pseudo-puppeteer.

A friend of mine is going through a divorce right now; she is in her late 20's, and she can't put her finger on what it is that has made her so "unhappy." I've asked her to reconsider her decision many times, but she is determined to forge ahead, convinced that she picked the wrong man, that he doesn't listen enough, doesn't desire her enough, doesn't find her interesting enough, etc. There are days it's painful to listen to, because her husband is a pretty awesome guy, and he is devastated over his wife's decision to leave him. A few things come to mind with my friend, and why she is losing her marriage. First, she has some serious 'daddy issues,' and I can relate. If a woman has issues from her childhood due to a possibly overbearing or potentially abusive type of father, she will carry those problems in an invisible suitcase, to every relationship she has, after that. When I came back to faith last year, the desire to get right with my father was of paramount importance to me. But, even if one is an atheist, you have to dig deep into yourself and figure out why you are unhappy and admit that your unhappiness is negatively affecting your ability to trust, and love others, namely your partner. Your unhappiness isn't your partner's job to 'fix.'

So, there's that aspect of things with my friend. But, apart from her unwillingness to reconcile with her father, is her desire to emasculate her husband. Perhaps, she doesn't even realize she is doing it on a conscious level, but she is doing it. I've been around them both at times, and her scolding sounds like a mother reprimanding her young son for stealing a cookie from the jar before dinner. It's embarrassing for her, and marriage, in general. Now, everyone has a bad day, we all are perfectly imperfect… but, her henpecking is consistent, and it eroded her husband's masculinity, over time. They've only been married a few years, but he has grown complacent, silent, and afraid to upset the apple cart. The more he tries to 'please her,' by letting her have her way all the time, the less she respects him. The more pampering he does for her, the less she respects him. The more giving her "time out with her friends" while he sits home alone, the less she respects him. The more she ignores his sexual advances, the less he initiates…and, the less, she respects him, the more she expects him to do the very things she won't do in return, and he obliges…the less she respects him. What a tragedy when she realizes that she was the catalyst as to why she lost respect for her own husband.

Respect.

Men desire respect. They also desire love, of course…but respect is something that when a man knows his partner isn't offering to him, he will lose interest in her. This is my hypothesis as to what has transpired in their marriage. She lost respect because she wants to lead her man, and is failing at it…and he lost that loving feeling, because he wants to lead her, and she won't permit it. He is devastated just the same, but in the long run, he will be better off without such a toxic marriage. I love my friend, but she is a lost soul, and just another causality caught up in the feminist system, that tells women they can do as they wish, married or not, and to hell with anyone who tells them otherwise.

In Christianity, the idea of submission in marriage is discussed in the New Testament.

Ephesians 5:22-33
Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands as you do to the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church, his body, of which he is the Savior. Now as the church submits to Christ, so also wives should submit to their husbands in everything.

Part of the reason marriages are failing these days, is that men are being stripped of their authentic masculinity by the feminist movement. Many men marry feminists, thinking everything will be fine, but if you are a traditionalist man, your marriage will be a hotbed of a constant struggle if you marry a feminist. The main reason for that is that feminists don't respect men. That message is loud and clear in mainstream media, social media, and in film and television programming. They claim that they are for equality of both genders, but they're not. Women are often shown in commercials these days with no man present, children in the background, and she is managing to cook dinner, talk to a client on her cell phone, and help with her kids' homework, creating this idea that men are not needed, and women can 'do it all.' She is her own hero, booyah! Meanwhile, I can't help but think the woman in the advertisement must be extraordinarily exhausted.

So, you have this power struggle in relationships, women wanting to lead men because feminism tells them that they can, and men acquiescing to their wives because the thought of losing their bank accounts and children in a divorce, sounds worse than the hell they're presently in.

And what do women want, exactly? On a very primal level, women need to be loved, and men need to be respected. The two go hand in hand, and when one lacks, the other follows.

There needs to be a gradual getting back to traditional lifestyles, but this doesn't mean that either side becomes something that they're not. Many feminists think that if they submit to their husband's leadership, they will somehow be viewed as weaklings, unable to think for themselves. Sigh, that is such a distorted view of that Biblical concept. Rather, submission to men in marriage means trusting them enough to do the right thing. Respecting them enough, to make awesome decisions. And men not abusing their authority in the household, as they lead.

It would stand to reason, that if you love someone, you want to be their greatest supporter. But, many women compete for the leadership role in their relationships, and many men are permitting themselves to be led by their wives. It's proving disastrous for all parties involved, including children who are lost in the labyrinth of it all.

So, down the road, I can't help but wonder, what will come of my friend, long after she is divorced? Will she still be unhappy? Will she still be a staunch feminist? Or will she have come to the realization, that her emptiness comes from a place that had nothing to do with her husband, and everything to do with her indoctrination into feminism, and how badly it has led her astray?

Pain is a very good teacher, and in some ways, I hope she feels a tremendous sting from her divorce because that pain will propel her to change. Hopefully, it will enable her to see the value of men, and how honest; good men are hard to find.

And how we as women, need to respect them.

On Angry Harry

AVfM Video Source · 15 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dating in the Double-Bind

Editorial Staff · 16 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following Blog entry was posted on AVFM forums by one of its members, jolierouge*. ED*

The most potent form of female coercive power is by exploiting the essential biological drive of a man and placing him, often implicitly, into a double bind. He is compelled by both biology, and to some degree social conditioning, to seek validation and completion from women. Women then sit like a spider in the center of a web and wait for a man to approach. However women in general both implicitly and explicitly make any man who approaches an unknown woman out to be a harasser, or seducer (both negative stereotypes, and explicitly undesirable, but implicitly desirable in undefined contexts). Furthermore, any person who seeks must be in a negative power relation to the individual who is sought. To approach women, a man should "be himself" so long as "himself" is not any of the negative attributes that women recoil from. He can't be needy, desperate, creepy, weird, too confident, too weak and so on.

A man is supposed to approach a woman, to get to know her, to ask her out, but she is never alone, or at least very rarely alone. She goes out with friends to protect her from the approach. If a man approaches her, he is likely to be required to not only seduce her but her friends. He is just as likely to be labeled a street harasser.

A man is supposed to approach a woman, but not at work (that's sexual harassment), not on the street (that's street harassment), he can't realistically approach when she's at a bar with her friends, or at a night club, unless of course he is very skilled or very attractive, and very willing to play a numbers game. Even the best PUAs don't do as well as one would hope. A man shouldn't approach when she's not in the mood to be approached, if she's busy, or feeling down. Now some feminists even go so far as to claim a man shouldn't approach a woman unless he has her permission, but one wonders how he is supposed to get permission.

If and when he does make the approach he is told he should possess and display a laundry list of behaviors (sensitive, kind, funny) that are meaningless as he really will have to demonstrate other attributes (indifferent, flippant, excitement seeking) not stated by women, but demonstrably proven to be essential.

The point being that a man who approaches a woman gives her the power of rejection; therefore, he can never be what she wants (powerful, indifferent), and since women almost never approach men, he is caught in a double bind. He doesn't know what to be because women and society tell him he should be soft, sensitive, affable and kind, but experience teaches him, women, actually only respond to men who are indifferent, self-interested, vain and glib.

He is supposed not to be needy, but generally, he needs sex. Both wanting and craving it, and needs the validation that will come from it. So he is like a hungry man who is made to pretend he doesn't want to eat to get maybe a meal one time out of 200 tries. If he works on Game and personal excellence, he can trim that down to maybe 1 in 20 if he's decently good looking. If he's a fatty or just congenitally ugly: tough fucking luck.

Women delight in the paradoxes they present men with, with casual cruelty they giggle about how difficult they are and how that's just the way it is. It's just the way they make it. They are exploiting biology to their benefit, and that is indeed cruel. The argument that men let them do it is only half true. That's like saying that people let McDonald's ruin their health as if fast food restaurants have no moral responsibility.

News video of a woman who falsely accused an officer of sexual assault

AVfM Video Source · 17 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — An Albuquerque police officer's body camera was activated during the arrest of a woman suspected of driving while intoxicated – capturing the moment the woman attempted to frame him.

According to KOB, APD Officer Jared Frazier stopped 23-year-old Deanna Griego in early October for a DWI and conducted a field sobriety test.

Griego can be seen on camera trying to explain her behavior by telling the officer she had a speech impairment. She also told Frazier she was going to school to become a police officer.

After failing the sobriety test, Griego was taken into the station for DWI. A breathalyzer detected a .13 blood alcohol level.

Griego then asked the officer if she could use the restroom.

Officer Frazier then heard Griego speaking with someone while in the bathroom, asking, "How can I get this officer in trouble?"

Frazier then remembered Griego had slipped her cell phone into her bra at the beginning of the traffic stop, according to the report.

When Frazier ordered Griego to step out of the restroom, she began accusing him of sexual misconduct.

"[You were] inappropriately touching me while I was waiting in the car," Griego can be heard saying in the video.

Frazier informed Griego that the entire stop had been recorded. Officers with the sex crimes division of the Department later conducted a full investigation and cleared Frazier of any wrongdoing.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vCidpHYLmtE&ab_channel=hopegoodman hope goodman

Feminism, A Victim Mentality Disorder – TFF Episode 29

AVfM Video Source · 17 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 29 Professor Fiamengo discusses how feminists display the signs and symptoms of the mental disorder "Victim Mentality."

StudioBrule

Genealogy of a Left-wing Anti-Feminist

Fred Neecher · 17 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I don't actually want to be an anti-feminist. I'm uncomfortable being against things. I'd rather share and share alike, live and let live. Besides, I have always liked women and even sympathised with them over some of the difficulties they have, such as period pains and childbirth, and having to put up with guys pursuing them when they want to be left alone. Now I find of have lost that sympathy. It's not a pleasant state to be in. I'd prefer to be well-disposed toward people.

Of course, it isn't the people; it's the movement, right? I could dismiss the drivellings of female journalists moaning about things like how women are expected to wear high heels that damage the feet because "society is still sexist" as just another middle-class peeve. We all like a good moan now and then. I used to moan about having to travel every day in the rush hour, getting shoved about like cattle and catching everybody else's colds.

But then along came Charlotte Proudman. I caught the story a day before it went front-page. They quoted her silly response to a senior colleague's attempt at flattery in full, and very silly it was, too. And then a female cyber-friend asked me if I was a feminist and told me about the wage gap, which in my innocence I hadn't actually heard about. So I looked it up. And went on looking. I found Sargon of Akkad and Thunderf00t, and one thing led to another and all of a sudden I was falling down the rabbit hole and there I was, swallowing the "eat me" cake, signing up to fight feminism because I'd finally understood what was really going on.

But I came with baggage. I'm a baby boomer, now half-retired. I spent some of my life being academic, some of it being a left-wing activist, and some of it just doing my own stuff. I come from a family of Labour Party supporters, a working-class family of origin, whose members benefited from the National Health Service and the welfare state which the Labour Party had brought in after the war. My grandfather suffered badly from unemployment and low paid, temporary work; his father was a labourer in a timber yard and died young, as did others in my family. Being left-wing was just a natural consequence of who you were.

So I was put out to find that all the anti-feminist sites I came across blamed the Left for feminism. How could that be? Was I not a leftie? Was I not against feminism? Reading further into this material I found straw men and false assertions, but also uncomfortable truths that needed to be faced. Most of all, though, I found a silence where the voice of the anti-feminist Left should be. So here it is, as far as I can make it. One man's story of how an old Leftie joined the resistance.

Human, way too human

I once spent a year living in an all-male compound in the Middle East. Away from women for a whole year, we had to develop our own way of working together, as men. We were a disparate bunch: from left-leaning Brits to ex-military Americans and South African racists, New York Jewish academics to semi-educated car salesmen from Colorado, born-again Christians to out-and-out atheists. We had our arguments, for sure, but we mostly talked, discussed, shared ideas. We occasionally got heated but we were never outright rude, and at no time was there any threat of violence. Quite the contrary, we developed noticeably domestic behaviours and opened up to one another in ways men rarely do when there are women about.

But for all that, there were two things I noticed that remained constant across the board: no one ever talked about their families, and everyone had their 'intellectual territory', their one area of supposed world knowledge or expertise which they defended as if their very selves depended on it. So men are: not quite anchored in family, not quite complete without something they can identify with beyond themselves. Or so it seemed to me.

Daybreak

So this is my territory, and I'd better lay out my stall. My first political recollections are of my father, busy with an election campaign, helping to bring out the Labour vote on the big day. My mother was an observer, checking that all the votes were correctly counted. They were both 'war recruits', those who joined the Labour Party at the end of the war and who helped it to power and the new social policies into effect.

Soon after that, my older brother got into more radical campaigns. He was now rubbing shoulders with bearded university students who talked earnestly about Civil Rights, Apartheid and nuclear disarmament, and who championed the new national independence movements in Africa. This new breed looked down on the remnants of the 'Old Guard', the Communists, still making their excuses for the failure of the USSR, as relics from the past. The Soviet Union was a joke. A revolution in the wrong place, where barely any industrial working-class existed. No real democracy, only military force and the lies of Pravda.

I went to university in the 70s. "We are all socialists now," remarked one of the history students, meaning everyone now had access to housing, jobs, health care and so on. 'Women's Lib' came on the scene. The Labour Party developed its 'socialist feminist' groups, which met separately to discuss policy matters without, they said, the men dominating and expecting them just to bring the sandwiches, which, from my observations, was an accurate assessment. My father left the Labour Party. My mother stayed for the friendships she'd made. I withdrew into academia, thinking cleverness, rather than politics, would solve the world's problems. The young women at university proved themselves just as clever as the men and were regarded as equals. 'Women's Lib' seemed to fade away in favour of gay liberation.

Thus Spake Marx, Morris and Fenner Brockway

I moved on to post-grad level in the 80s. It was a busy time for politics. Margaret Thatcher was closing industries in the UK and President Reagan was placing cruise missile sites in the English countryside. I sympathised with the steel workers and the coal miners who were losing their jobs and communities. I was against cruise missiles, but then nobody likes nuclear weapons. Mainly, though, I concentrated on my research.

I was in the library one day looking for a book that wasn't there when I pulled a random volume off the shelf because the subject intrigued me: William Morris. I had always pegged him as a 'wallpaper socialist', a rich man who designed arty interior décor and who wanted to 'prettify' the drab lives of working people with nice furniture and fancy patterns. So it was a shock to find that he spent the last thirteen years of his life preaching socialist revolution from every soapbox in the country on the grounds that capitalism separated the worker from his work, destroying his soul and producing soulless work: 'mere' commodities. Why did they never tell us this about him, I thought. And what else don't they want us to know?

Students in the 80s were into 'revolution' and protestations of radicalism, but there was also a resurgence of Marxist-inspired political activity. You couldn't avoid it. It came knocking on my door one day when I was asked for my skills in promoting a campaign for public access to publically owned land.

So I went to the source and read Marx. I found that Capital was a reworking of the classical economics of Smith and Ricardo, but placing the human being in the centre. It was densely argued but in places shone with righteous indignation at the sufferings of wage-earners obliged to work over twelve hours a day, while factory owners opposed the Factory Acts that would limit the hours children could be employed. It struck me as a very humane work. Marx's idea of "from each according to his ability to each according to his need" seemed a fair, moral principle, affirming everybody's worth while acknowledging natural inequalities, but a remote ideal. In any case, did we not have our Enlightenment values? Did not English socialism already have its roots in Christian morality? Marx seemed superfluous.

Soon after this, Fenner Brockway came to give a talk to the Student Union, and I went along to hear what the old left-winger had to say. Here was a man I had heard about and admired. He had been a member of the Independent Labour Party, the first parliamentary party dedicated to representing working people, founded at a time when around one-third of working men did not even have the vote. Brockway opposed conscription in World War One and went to prison for his convictions. When a member of the audience asked him what he meant by 'socialism', he replied, "Democracy, democracy, democracy – not just for Parliament every five years, but democracy at all levels of society". This chimed with my family roots and with my sense of fairness. I was on the Left, and if this was socialism, then I was a socialist.

Twilight of an icon

You can't escape the Soviet Union. Not just from the inside: from the outside, too. Even the libertarian Left lived under its shadow. A common left-wing meme from the early 60s was, "Hitler killed 6 million but Stalin killed 8 million. So who was worse?" How could a movement that was essentially about democracy and freedom from poverty have been so wrong?

It should never have happened in Russia in the first place. The war and Tsarist repression had brought about the 1917 revolutions, and Lenin's Bolshevik Party fed off them. But without a significant industrial working class, how could his Marxist ideals be realised? Simple. Lenin created the 'vanguard party,' a body of professional revolutionaries who would do what the working classes would have done had they existed. Most of the European Marxists opposed this "opportunism", as can be seen in the so-called Lenin-Kautsky debates of 1917-18. But it was a fait accompli, and the USSR became the only example of 'socialism' in reality. An icon was born.

But then famously (on the left), the Red Army betrayed the International Brigade in the Spanish Civil War. In 1939, Stalin surprised everyone by forming an alliance with Germany after dithering for years over signing up to an alliance with Britain and France. The Left was shocked but made excuses (as did the Conservatives, who were ready to welcome the USSR into an anti-German pact) to the effect that he needed to buy time.

Then in 1948, a duplicated book was circulated under the title of The Nature of Stalinist Russia, by a Marxist by the name of Tony Cliff, and eventually published in 1955. It was a devastating attack on the Soviet Union, with copious facts and figures that revealed an appalling situation: gross departures from founding principles, the (presumed) annihilation of whole peoples (the secrecy was so great it was almost impossible to tell), and virtual dictatorship by a bloated bureaucratic class. This book, as much as the invasion of Hungary in 1956, put an end to the British Left's – my Left's – love affair with the USSR.

Beyond Left and Right

My Left is the Left of liberation: of freedom from colonial rule and escape from poverty, of openness, debate and the value of individuals no matter what level of society they are from. But above all, of democracy. I do not recognise this either in today's PC/feminist movement nor the political Right's characterization of it. My Left has become invisible.

I noticed it first in the 80s. Suddenly, there were all these feminists around, out of place amongst the old 'socialist feminists' and at odds with our old Left activism. Suddenly it was all gendered pronouns and men failing to acknowledge that they were oppressors. 'New Labour' arrived and was all about "minorities" (which bizarrely included women), "equality" (which seemed to have no measure), and lots of "rights", which appeared to mean whatever a designated minority or the ever-oppressed women happened to want. The old concerns about social welfare were either swept out of sight (the 'private sector' would apparently now accommodate) or were twisted into this new landscape of minority and women's "rights", which now assumed the aspect of something incontestable. The debate was no longer an option.

I don't believe that this new kind of Left has anything of my old politics about it. Neither am I convinced that it is a re-emergence of Marxist-Leninism in a new guise. I have heard the arguments, read the feminist biographies, seen the "down with capitalism and the patriarchy" posters carried by students. But what I see is a deliberate appropriation of those political forms, borrowed from their European context, emptied of Marxist content, and filled instead with the new feminist 'group' ideology. The structure looks similar, maybe acts in a similar way, but it isn't what I understand by Marxism. There again, perhaps it doesn't matter what it is: power is power, whatever rationale it espouses.

The Anti-Feminist

Milo Yiannopoulos has suggested that the left-right distinction is becoming obsolete and that what matters now is the libertarian-authoritarian dimension. I agree. The libertarian socialists who took issue with Lenin are still around, as are the old Leftists who care about social welfare, housing, jobs, and so on, especially for the poorer end of society. But the nature of politics has changed. Instead of the old Left, we now have powerful, government-backed 'campaigns' to enforce what a self-appointed clique of activists consider acceptable. By any measure, this is a thoroughly authoritarian way of doing things.

I want to make this quite clear: all of this is utterly against anything the old Left stood for. Feminists oppose equality of opportunity; they seek to deny individuals their democratic right to stand for election on the ground of their sex; they conduct overtly discriminatory campaigns, they reject rational argument and care nothing for working families. More than anything, they want special privileges for themselves and themselves alone.

Understandably, the Right have been the first to recognise the danger of a state-backed feminist movement, but I believe there are many on the Left – the old Left, my Left – who would join the anti-feminist cause but who see their politics derided alongside that of the feminists whom they detest. I believe there is no conflict between anti-feminism and the values of that Left of which I am a part. Indeed, there is something of the social conservative about those values – we believe in strong families and a healthy, well-ordered society. Just as in past times when son expected to follow father into the steel yards and whole communities thrived, so today the forgotten Left remains proud of its heritage of a sober work ethic, self-reliance and insistence on social responsibility.

We have moved beyond the old Left-Right politics. We who believe in individual freedom must accept past differences and recognise the new situation. We cannot usefully be chained to the old politics however much it may appeal to some because it is no longer the key issue. We face a power bloc that threatens all our freedoms, and unless all those on the side of freedom stand together the anti-feminist/PC movement will remain fatally vulnerable to the divide and rule of that old politics. To misquote an old German, we have nothing to win by chaining ourselves to the past; we have the world to lose.

What Men Fear Most

Paul Elam · 17 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We make heroes of men who conspicuously face and overcome fear for a good cause. But there is one fear that we not only want men to run from; we punish them if they show any bravery at all. That is the subject of today's talk on An Ear For Men.

There is one fear, above all others, that unites men in what we have come to regard as modern masculinity. It's a fear that affects almost all men, whether they are meek and timid by nature or the kind men who walk into burning buildings to save people's lives.

It includes professional boxers, commercial fishermen, inner city police officers, government whistleblowers and law enforcement agents who infiltrate organized crime.

It is not a fear of death that cripples them, nor of torture or personal ruin. But it is a fear so great their refusal to face it has driven them at worst to kill themselves and others, at best to trade in personal dignity and self-respect for life as a servant and court jester.

The set up for this is both complicated and almost indescribably powerful. There is a solution to it for many men that requires an understanding of how we get set up for this fatal weakness. That understanding itself requires courage to face. So much so that most men never will.

That fear is the fear of losing a woman's love and approval. It is a fear so deep and so pernicious that men will go to insane lengths to preserve it, even when being bitch slapped with the fact that the love and approval aren't there and never were.

Let's look at some anecdotes that form a rather uncomfortable picture.

Why it is that so many soldiers who lay dying on the field of battle call for their mothers, or whose last words when fallen are "tell my wife I love her."

Why do so many men work so hard on salvaging relationships with women who are beyond salvage; women who have proven not only that they don't love those men but in many cases that they feel deep hatred for them?

Why do so many men never develop the skills to defend themselves from abusive women, men who volunteer to become financial marks, throwing their hard earned cash away to impress women who could not be less interested in them?

Why do men continue to volunteer labor and personal resources to women, even after they have been wiped out by them in a divorce? Speaking of divorce, why is the tendency toward suicide so overwhelmingly dominated by men during a divorce or breakup?

Why do men seem so incapable of change when it comes to how they approach getting involved with women? In short, most men's criteria for taking an emotionally, psychologically and financially invested leap with a woman hinges solely on whether she returns his physical attraction.

Why don't we, as a rule, ever talk to our son's about this? Why do we conspire, men and women together, to keep them in the dark and to keep them so vulnerable to women?

We are pummeled with the answers to these questions every day of our lives. They slap us in the face and scream in our ears. They grab us by the lapels and shake us violently, trying to get our attention, and yet most men, nearly all of them, invest everything they have in not seeing, not hearing and not feeling any of it.

That too goes back to the fear of loss.

I talked to a young man once who came to me for advice. He had saved up to buy his girlfriend a birthday present. It wasn't something expensive. He was 21 and just starting out in work life. His girlfriend scoffed at the present and told him she had hoped for something a little nicer.

My advice, of course, was to get a better girlfriend or to do without till he learned to land one who was a bit less of a whore, but he was unable to hear any of that. He just kept circling back to his dilemma that he wanted to please her but could not afford to do so. He even asked questions about career paths, with the inference being that he did not ever want to feel so inadequate again.

When I tried to pin him down on what terrified him so about her rejection, he opted to seek advice elsewhere. He exited the conversation in a bit of a huff, telling me that he wasn't, by God, afraid of anything.

It is easy to write this off to the naivety of youth, but it is now about 15 years later and from what I hear he still lives the same way, in an endless cycle of trying and failing to make a woman happy enough to keep him around. Even though he is now married and with a child, he still allows her to keep him running on the performance treadmill, constantly sweating and pushing for crumbs of occasional, transient approval.

I am pretty sure he has no idea what is about to come, now that there is a child, and he has pretty much maxed out on his income potential. When the other shoe drops, and it will, he will be devastated. When and if he recovers, he will set about finding a woman much in the same way he found his wife, by overextending his means and offering it up on a silver platter to anything pretty, hoping for another crumb of approval.

How did this level of irrational, destructive fear ever become the default setting for men? Well, I think my theory on it has some weight.

The critical, formative years of every child's existence is dominated by the female presence and the female will, which is often self-serving, unhealthy and for boys, emotionally incestuous. Fathers, whether absent or present, contribute to the problem.

Where there is no male influence, the mother often runs amok. She teaches her boys that they better please her or she will punish them with rejection, physical pain and often psychological humiliation. For boys that have already lost one parent, this is a soul-killing, developmental nightmare and you can bet that their minds adjust with compliance.

Where the father is still present, he is often the enforcer of the same sick agenda. The term "you just wait till your father gets home," is the young male child's first experience with proxy violence, instigated by the woman who will shape his view of all women for life, enforced by the man will shape his view of himself and all men.

At some point, he enters the female dominated primary education system, where his coercion into satisfying the will of women is institutionalized. By the time he reaches middle school, his preparation for how to handle his budding attraction to girls is fixed in cement.

And there is yet another key factor that puts the icing on this misandric cake. Romantic chivalry.

For every man's entire life he is inundated with the message of sacrificial, unconditional male love and dedication in exchange for the appearance of approval. In fact, his willingness to place himself on the altar of female acceptance is tied directly to his ability to feel worthy as a man.

As we know, an unworthy man is just about the lowest thing you can be in this culture.

The mantras of "Happy wife, happy life," and "When mamma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy," or their sentimental equivalents have been drilled into his consciousness from the time he is old enough to understand what "big boys don't cry" means.

Once you sweep away all the false pieties of "good man" and "a man who knows how to treat a woman," what you have left is the groveling servant produced by romantic chivalry.

You see, and it is very important to get this, Chivalry was once a military ethic. It was a code that demanded sacrifice for the unprotected. It was an honorable warrior's code. It was embraced as a romantic model in the 12th century by the aristocracy, then later emulated by the masses.

The mindless, servile action of men with women was just a social trend that stuck around for a long time. Men weren't born fools and puppets; it was social pressure that caused it. The human being's innate tendency for gynocentrism made it all the easier.

And it continues to this day.

I recall another event from decades ago, but it will be something very familiar to you, right now.

I lived in a duplex. The man who lived above me was a huge sports fan, especially baseball. I could often hear the games through the thin floor of the building. One day his girlfriend was there. They were arguing because he was, according to her, watching too much baseball. I heard her clearly say, "You care more about baseball than me!"

The next thing I heard was the door slamming and her footsteps going down the stairs. A few seconds later he was coming down the stairs, screaming "Stephanie! Please wait!"

At that moment, his baseball game was still coming through the TV in his living room, unwatched. He was on the street at this point. I could see him through the window, pleading with her to stay. Just a few moments later they left together after he went back into his flat and turned off the game.

And that is how they get you, guys. Doesn't everyone know that her threat to abandon him was her ace in the hole? Don't most or all women know this? Don't they play that card like a boss?

Stephanie's threatening to leave wasn't just a minor manipulation. She was triggering every ingrained fear he ever had, from the time he was old enough to talk. Her rejection was his mother's rejection, his teacher's disapproval and somewhere in his mind there unconsciously lurked a proxy agent to punish him for his failure at romantic chivalry.

Of course, he wasn't consciously aware of any of this. All he knew is the thought of her abandoning him left a hole in his gut big enough to swallow him up.

She may not have been totally conscious of her actions, but you can bet she knew enough to know that in walking away she was ripping him to pieces.

When she left, she was taking his manhood with him. Just as the young woman who sneered at a less expensive present from a lovelorn young man had turned his masculinity into a cruel punchline. The only way either of these men could redeem themselves was to lose themselves. Their only path to love was self-hatred.

And that is the moral lesson of today's talk. Romantic chivalry isn't love. Often, it is the opposite. It makes narcissists and children of women, and hapless pawns of men, who on close inspection do not resemble anything of what we have ever really honored about men.

In my way of thinking, the only way men can overcome this is by walking into the heart of their fears and rebuilding their self-image on their values instead of on their willingness to sacrifice them. In a way, it requires rewriting the narrative of your life. It is harder to do that for most men than to face a hail of bullets or to walk into a burning building when everyone else is walking out.

The good news is that you can start doing this anytime you make the choice.

*****

Paul Elam's Video "What Men Fear Most."

Dr. Howard Cohen of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 18 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Howard Cohen of London has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Cohen’s website, mohel-circumcision.co.uk

“Dear Parents

Thank you for your enquiry regarding circumcision.

Congratulations (Mazel Tov) on the birth (or the expected arrival) of your son. I am a full time GP and a mohel (ritual circumciser) for the London and South East UK Progressive Jewish community. I have been performing circumcisions since 1991 and I usually perform three or four a week.
Your son’s Brit Milah circumcision will usually be performed at my surgery, home visits may be possible depending on my schedule.

Yours sincerely,

Dr Howard Cohen”

So, Dr. Cohen is a General Practitioner who heals wounds and cures diseases, but also as a sideline practices genital mutilation on unwilling baby boys, which neither cures nor heals any disease.

Dr. Cohen and others like him should ask themselves if what they do violates their Hippocratic Oath, “First, Do No Harm.”

Under “About the Brit Milah Ceremony:”

> Brit Mila (Covenant of the Word), is a key life cycle observance for a Jewish Family. By performing the circumcision we are celebrating and remembering G-d’s covenant with Abraham and his people.
>
> The Ceremony
>
> The Mohel (the ritual circumciser) will gather everyone together and explain the significance of the Brit. The baby will then be carried in to the room by his Kvaterin (or Godmother) and handed to his Kvater (or Godfather), whilst the opening prayers are said. The baby is then passed to the Sandek, who will hold him on his lap whilst the circumcision is performed.
>
> Usually the Sandek has a pillow on his lap, covered by a towel and will sit opposite to the Mohel on two dinning room chairs (without arms). A small table next to the chairs for the Mohel’s instruments and the Kiddush wine would be useful.
>
> The circumcision usually takes two or three minutes only, including the time to put a small dressing on.
>
> After the circumcision, further prayers are said, including a blessing over wine and the naming of the baby.

Regardless of tradition and religious ritual, circumcision is barbaric and unethical. Watch this video of a reluctant Sandek (see above) who is horrified by what took place.

Also, under "Pros and Cons of Neonatal Circumcision:"

> Before undertaking your son's circumcision I will require both parents to sign a simple consent form. To help you do this I have summarised the available information of potential complications and indicated their likelihood. The figures are taken from a continuing audit of all circumcisions undertaken by members of the Reform & Liberal Association of Mohalim, these figures are updated annually.
> I would like to emphasis that circumcision is a straightforward operation undertaken using a well proven and established method. Complication rates are low when compared to other surgical procedures and when they do occur can be sorted out promptly with minimal distress to the child or his parents.
>
> Cosmetic outcome
>
> Circumcision is a cosmetic procedure. Occasionally the final appearance of the penis may give rise to concern. In our audit 1.4% (13 in 933) were felt to be a cause of concern by the participating doctors. Usually these improve over time but occasionally will need to be re-done at a later date, 9 such re-dos out of 933 circumcisions were reported in the audit.

Parents cannot consent for an infant regarding permanent amputation of body parts, making it unethical and illegal.

Now we see that circumcision is a cosmetic procedure. So, it's a religious and a cosmetic procedure, two things that should be decided by the person concerned, no matter the age or sex.

Then we see "Circumcision and Pain Relief:"

> Traditionally religious circumcision of newborn boys has been performed without any form of painkillers or anaesthetics. Although the baby will experience pain during the procedure, a straightforward circumcision takes less than a minute and the baby usually settles down quickly afterwards. I am prepared however to use a combination of techniques to reduce the trauma of the procedure if the parents wish.

Now that the AAP deems it harmful to circumcise infants due to pain affecting an undeveloped nervous system, Dr. Cohen would be wise to end this "trauma" by ending this surgery.

Since Dr. Cohen has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Cohen's practice information follows:

E-mail: email@drhowardcohen.com

Mobile tel: 07710 372973

Surgery tel: 01883 625262

Surgery address:

Elizabeth House Practice
515 Limpsfield Road
Warlingham
Surrey
CR6 9LF

Anti-MGM Activism Alert: Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys has more anti-MGM protests planned in the London area prior to the ICMI 2016 in July. You may want to join the protest – literally – 'for the children.'

> Dr. Howard Cohen of London "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/T4uTF6oTHI @AndreaHardie #nocirc #MGM #intactivism pic.twitter.com/KCmfltQVUI
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 18, 2016

Changing her emotional diapers – Part 1

Paul Elam · 18 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Standard NAWALT disclaimer. That issued, let's proceed to discuss the women way too many men have to deal with. PE

Are women purely emotional, irrational human beings who cannot help but be confounded by logic? Or is there a secret wisdom in their emotions from which men can learn?

We are going to start looking at that today in the first of a two-part series on woman and emotionalism.

Women are emotional creatures compared to men. It's not PC to say that, along with a lot of other truths that people would prefer we all pretend were just inaccurate stereotypes.

I've had some men tell me that they thought that it wasn't true. These are almost always the same men who rail against the gender wage gap, rape culture, and male privilege. I have had female feminists, too, tell me that it wasn't true, but then again they usually had spit flying out of their mouths and were pounding a desk when they were saying it, so there's that.

Most women are, in fact, dominated by feelings over intellect. They are often, and especially while in relationship conflict, irrational, residing in an emotional carnival, either riding the moody-go-round or standing in line to get on.

During interpersonal struggles, they have an unfortunate tendency to take issue with reality. They get offended by common sense and fight pointless battles against reason on their haphazard way to solving problems by creating more of them.

This presents a fundamental problem for men. How do you resolve problems with someone who is making your problems have puppies every time they open their mouth? How do you reason with the unreasonable?

There is an abundance of advice out there, allegedly instructing men on the most constructive way to handle the emotive side of their female partners. Nearly all of it is bad.

Consider what most pundits have to say about your problems with emotionally labile women. The number one suggestion, generally, is that you have to listen to your wife's or girlfriend's feelings. I am sure that is very cutting edge. I am just positive that you have never heard anyone tell you that you need to listen to and validate a woman's feelings.

We see this time and time again. We are hammered with the idea that there is some secret to happiness hidden in standing ready to be the captive audience for a woman's feelings, regardless of the circumstances and regardless of what she is saying.

Here's the problem. None of this bullshit gets to the heart of things. These gurus aren't here to tell you how to deal with women's emotional orientation; they are just telling you different ways and reasons to put up with it in a way that keeps her, and only her, at the very center of the relationship universe. All of it, every last bit, is about making her feelings the alpha and omega of the relationship focus.

In short, they are advising you to be an active participant in her infantilization, and to prevent your self-respect from creating any pressure on her to woman up and be able to handle life without hugging a stuffed animal while you gently rub her back and say, "I feel your pain."

The popular idea of how to deal with emotional women is to kowtow to them.

That idea, sadly the gold standard for most modern relationship advice, is driven by the mediocrity of low expectation and the assumption that your female counterpart is emotionally retarded. Personally, I can't think of anything more insulting to me or my partner.

The only antidote to this system, which I call an idiocracy, requires a rethinking of some very faulty but common assumptions.

Dwelling on feelings, especially the irrational kind that tend to get worse when you point to the irrationality, are not a healthy emotional catharsis for women. They are not a viable communication tool that just needs your loving, patient, attentive ears to work.

What they are in reality is partially digested, petty life disappointments, which she vomits on the living room floor so that you will have to be extremely careful where you step.

Emotional reasoning is not just a woman's shortcoming. It is a woman's weapon to gain the upper hand in almost any relationship. By rolling in a train car full of irrational anger, concocted offense or spurious suspicions about your character or your actions, she is assured of putting you on the defensive and having her emotional state take primacy in everything going on between you.

She also uses this tactic to paint a target directly on your back.

She gains 10 pounds, and suddenly she has a lot of feelings about whether you are faithful. She overspends then gets feelings about whether you should be making more money. She has a shit day at work, then suddenly remembers something you may or may not have said or done three years earlier and decides that she is just now getting around to expressing her displeasure with you.

That is what most men end up dealing with, and that is the dirty little secret that most people giving so-called relationship advice won't bring up when they are wagging fingers and telling men they need to listen to their women's feelings, without judging, criticizing or trying to fix them.

Being a crazy woman works because being a normal man, you are likely to turn somersaults trying to restore her sanity. If helping her regain her sanity is one of your priorities, it may help you to notice that her sanity usually returns when you take blame for whatever she wants you to, or as soon as she gets her way about whatever it was she wanted.

The advice to sit there like a chump and say "tell me more about your feelings" translates to nothing less than "Please smash me on the head with that hammer a few more times. My head is not bloody enough."

If you want a life as a pincushion and emotional doormat, then by all means, deify your woman's emotions and trust there is some grand wisdom in them, even when she is acting like a four-year-old pissed off because the candy jar is out of reach.

After all, it is your life, and no one has a gun to your head.

Now, am I saying don't listen to a woman's feelings? Of course not. I am saying, however, that if you have a single clue about what is good for you, you will put a limit on it.

When men have a bad day at work, what you will likely to hear is something like, "My day sucked. Sometimes I want to strangle my boss." And then it is over. Time to crack open a beer and unwind, usually talking about nothing at all, but certainly not talking about their shitty boss.

When women have a bad day, what you are likely to hear is two hours of her droning like bagpipes about how Wanda in accounting is a bitch. You have heard the same bellowing a dozen times before. It is starting to sound like fingernails on a chalkboard, but alas, women's feelings are sacred, and it is your by god job, as a real man, to indulge her because she can't grow up and quit obsessing on people she doesn't like.

With this in mind, what they say about women not wanting you to fix their problems is usually bullshit but is sometimes true. When the problem, at least in her mind, is you, which it almost always is when dealing with her feelings, you can bet your ass she wants you to fix it, even if it kills you in the process, and even if the problem is really her.

When the problem is not you, which is admittedly rare, she does not want you to fix it for her.

She doesn't want you to fix it because then she would have to shut up or find something else to talk about. What she wants is for you to set aside everything (including any attempts you are making to decompress from your day) and listen to her gush out her feelings du jour until she wears herself out talking.

If you make the mistake of getting tired of that, then you are a bad partner. Then she will need to talk about her feelings about you.

In short, it is all about control. It is all about the world revolving around her. Her day, her feelings, her issues. Your job is to treat her like an emotional toddler and sponge that crap up till she is satisfied that the moon and stars once again revolve around her.

It's a shit way to live for any man who possesses an ounce of self-respect. But of course, most men specialize in living shit lives with a highly negotiable policy on self-respect.

Those men interested in something else, however, have options.

The best thing for life problems like this is almost always preventative medicine. I estimate, in ways that are embarrassingly unscientific, that there is about 20% of the female population who process emotions in a more masculine way.

Perhaps it has something to do with in utero testosterone flooding. Maybe it is just the luck of the draw, but there is a population of women who don't need a feelings marathon every time the grocery store clerk is rude to them, or because Wanda in accounting managed to hook some guy in senior management who drives a Porsche.

Or because, God forbid, you're not perfect and sometimes prove it.

And yes, by the way, I am saying that at least 80% of women are emotional reasoners, and in their raw state are unfit for intimacy, consistent communication, problem-solving or being anything other than a life sucking pain in the ass — especially given the modern social climate.

Self-obsession and the insatiable need for an emotional repository in Levis is an obvious trait in those afflicted. It even shows itself in the honeymoon period, during which almost all women will bring you some crises, then time how long you remain transfixed on "being present," which is another way of saying being glued to her emotional story as though it was an episode of Game of Thrones.

If she's not wearing the t-shirt that says "less you, more me," it's probably because she's worn it out. But it may be because she does not fit the standard female mold in emotional terms.

If you don't want that emotional toddler a year into a relationship, don't start out by getting involved with one.

There are ways, however, to reduce the chronicity and severity of some of the remaining 80% of women. It's a little bloody and a little brutal, but it is doable except for those at the Mia Farrow end of the emotionally whacko spectrum.

I will be talking about that in part 2.

“Low IQ Cop Slams Woman On The Floor & Knocks Her Unconscious”

AVfM Video Source · 19 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Gynocentrism at its best. In this video we see an out of control woman attacking a man, two cops show up and throws the aggressor to the ground. Watch the white knights come out. What is your take on this? ED

“This revenue agent knocks out the woman flat on her ass and then accuses her of faking it. LAND OF THE FREE?”

UrbanWarfareChannel

Changing her emotional diapers — Part 2

Paul Elam · 19 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In part one of this series, I talked about women and emotionalism. Part of the focus of that piece was the minority of women who thankfully process emotions in a more masculine way. But what of the majority of women, the ones whose lack of emotional acumen can have you stepping on a mine before you even know you are in a minefield? What do you do if you are already involved with this kind of woman?

The answers to that are fairly simple, but we need to get something straight from the outset. Previously, I used some quick examples from YouTube of what passes for advice on relationships. I also pointed out that it was all bullshit. I didn't just do that to have some fun at the expense of others.

The fact is, and by fact I mean my opinion, the entire relationship coaching and advice culture is one big, gynocentric load of crap. Pick any popular book or video series on salvaging relationships and what you will find under the misleading cover is advice on how men can keep women happy. That is it.

From start to finish, those books are written to profit from the message of pleasing women. That is why almost only women buy them. Their advice has nothing to do with healthy relationships and everything to do with assuring women that men are supposed to be comfortable in a role as a chivalric vassal.

The biggest problem with that, aside from the lopsided agenda to infantilize women and make servants of men, is that it is a woman's job to attend to her happiness. Most relationship advice undermines her ability to do that; a fact conveniently ignored because personal accountability makes the average woman close her purse faster than a man without a job.

So we are left with a glut of advice on how to give women what they want, the subtext being how to make sure they keep an interest in you; how to make sure they will still have you.

The fact that I am going to be a lot more honest than that means two things. One, a much smaller audience for me, and two, you get to hear something other than a string of lies.

The first bit of truth is probably the most brutal. There is no how-to formula for any of this. There is no set of behaviors, no Game, no techniques that will make an emotional reasoner somehow find rationality and maturity.

When dealing with a destructive, emotional reasoner, there is no chance at all of improving things that do not come with a significant chance of ending the relationship. If you can't handle that, you might as well stop reading now.

In fact, if your goal is to fix her and in fixing her, keep her, then you are definitely on the wrong path.

The only objective I can recommend is to learn how to build a psychological and emotional wall between yourself and her craziness. And you do that through two key absolutes. The first is your willingness to detach and immediately invest in something other than her when she refuses to reason. The second is your uncompromising willingness to let her go if she can't handle that. And yes, for those of you who brought it up, this can be any female family member, not just your wife or girlfriend.

For a refresher on that, please review my video "What Men Fear the Most."

If you are like most men, you are ultimately looking for little more than a relationship that does not destroy your peace of mind. You are not looking for a happily ever after fairytale, or life in La La Land with your princess. You'd simply like to have a decent, peaceful and God forbid harmonious coexistence with your wife or girlfriend.

You don't want drama over infantile bullshit, and you don't want to spend time on the perpetual hamster wheel of seeking her approval.

If she happens to be an emotional reasoner, a destroyer of the peace, then your only viable recourse is to deliberately face your fear of loss, then quietly and resolutely draw a line in the sand.

If you balk when she threatens to leave, all you have done is increase her sense of power over you.

Make no mistake about it. Even though you are not saying the words directly, you are issuing an ultimatum. If she wants any kind of relationship, communication or support from you, the crazy shit has to pack its bags and head for the airport.

Not to belabor the point, because this is a point you can't belabor, you cannot motivate change in a woman's behavior unless you are willing to kick her to the curb. If you want to hear something more comfortable than that, then Dr. Phil, John Gray, and a thousand other gynocentric clones will be happy to have you buy their books.

I know this is pretty rough stuff, but pretty rough stuff is the only thing I know that will have the slightest possibility of helping you find peace with or without a woman. So, if you need sugar coated, get a donut.

I promised a commenter who queried me in Part 1 that I would get into specifics on what you should do when dealing with this type of woman, and I am going to follow through with that for the remainder of this article.

I just want to start with a reminder that this is not about changing her. The point is to change you, which is the only thing you can change.

She may well change if you follow these suggestions, or she may hit the highway. In fact, I am betting if you follow my suggestions closely, one of those two things will happen. But the fact is that it takes two to salvage a relationship. The only thing you can salvage on your own is you. Remembering that every day will make this a lot easier.

You can start this, and by starting I mean starting to change you, with what I call the Terminator Move. When there is conflict, the moment you realize you are not dealing with a person who is willing to reason, quietly inform her you will be ready to listen when she can be reasonable and mature, then go put Arnold in the DVD player and watch it.

If you had any plans with her, cancel them, unless it is something you have to do, like a medical appointment or a funeral. Whatever you do, whatever she says or does, you must ignore her and find something else to do.

If you are like many men, this is easier said than done. Some men will be angry and find it difficult to resist the fight. Others will be yearning for a sense of balance that can only come from resolving the conflict. For most, concentrating on the movie will be difficult.

Of course, the movie is just a metaphor. The point is that you must withdraw from the conflict with the clear message that you don't do irrational bickering. Spend some time invested in anything but her.

That time is best spent examining and questioning your state of mind and your feelings. Challenge yourself on your desire to fix things with the very person who is making that impossible. Ask yourself why you continue to seek solutions with someone who shoots down every rational option you offer.

Allow yourself time for your intellect to override your emotions, which prevents you from trying to make her see reason. She won't. And time for you to quit obsessing on the possibility that she may leave, which might actually happen.

Remain detached until and only until she demonstrates the willingness to be reasonable.

By reasonable, I don't mean until she agrees with you. All of these suggestions presuppose that you are rational and fair with her. If you are not, you have a whole other set of problems that I cannot address in the scope of this article.

Now, some men will say that they can't get away from her. They don't have a man cave or a place in the home where she won't follow them, continuing the conflict. If that is the case, get out of the house for a while. Go to a movie. Go to dinner. Visit a friend if she hasn't run all of them off. Take a long walk.

Freaking FIND a way to escape. Don't make excuses. Take the responsibility to make a pathway to get her out of your hair, and to send yourself the message that you don't do crazy so many times that it starts to sink in that you don't do crazy.

Once again, that is the point. The repeated, proven message that you won't participate in irrational, stupid, emotionalized arguments with a child posing as an adult will certainly put her at a crossroads, but the onus to learn is still on you. If she is smart enough, she will begin to realize that the only path to possible satisfaction about her complaints is through acting like an adult about them.

You get what you tolerate is not just some catchy cliché that looks good on an internet meme. It's a fact of life you are much better off facing.

The Terminator Move is not for her benefit, but for yours. The ability to detach and take care of yourself, and to practice the good value of not arguing with a capricious child can save your sanity. It is your willingness to be alone, and to pay whatever price you need to pay for hanging on to your values that allow you to set limits and maintain your dignity for the rest of your life.

And that is it on this front, amigos. There is nothing else to it. The tough part for most men is that they are so conditioned to ultimately yield to a woman's desires, no matter how capricious or childish, that they end up miserable. Sometimes, all too often actually, they end up suicidal.

It also contributes to problems with drinking, drug abuse, affairs and even violence out of the frustration. All of that can be eased, even cured, once you expect nothing more of yourself that to be a fair and willing partner, vs. being tethered to her whims like an unpaid butler.

To beat the dead horse one last time, all of this is up to you. The responsibility for all of it is yours. You can make her change her own emotional diapers or find someone else who will if you are not the one standing there with a handful of baby wipes every time she makes a mess.

AVFM imposters: Joe Bennett and Jack Day

Paul Elam · 19 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It is unfortunate that sometimes a welcome announcement has to be marred with negativity, but such is the case today. On the positive side, Bryan Scandrett, a well established and dedicated mainsite moderator has agreed to act as the administrator for our FaceBook page.

This appointment could not have come at a better time. Bryan is a strong, natural leader and our presence on FaceBook is now under regular attack. The work that the unsung Meme Team has done to secure over 33,000 fans is under threat from feminist fascists who have a strong foothold on that social media website.

Several memes have been recently removed, and I am more or less continually blocked from using the page personally.

To make things worse, an individual former Meme Team member going by Joe Bennett (aka MRA Phoenix) has been forming his own FaceBook groups, stealing the AVFM IP of our logo and publicly calling himself "managing editor of AVFM."

It is also interesting that all the memes recently removed by Facebook for "violation of community standards" were created and posted by Bennett. While I don't buy that they were actually in violation of Facebook policy, they were crossing the line of Godwin's Law, which we don't want to see as a staple on that page.

Despite several attempts to talk sense to Bennett, he appears unwilling to stop the misuse of our IP.

He is not the only case. MRA Jack Day has started a Facebook group using AVFM in the title. He became indignant and self-righteous when approached about it.

They say the best form of flattery is imitation. That of course, is true, only when the imitation is obvious. Without that factor, it is just dishonesty.

It concerns me that both Joe Bennett and Jack Day won't display the decency, or the originality for that matter, to create their own product, but there is little I can do about it short of legal action. And by my experience with both of these people, I think we are dealing more with mental instability than avarice.

So, welcome to the fray, Bryan. And to the ongoing drama.

For the benefit of readers. AVFM has only one Facebook page, located here, AVFM Romania, and AVFM Italy. If you see our logo or name anywhere else on Facebook, it's a fraud.

False allegations in Family Court: Who is to blame?

Ruth Nichols · 19 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By Cm0rris0n. CC-BY-SA-3.0 (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0)

False allegations in Family Court are nothing new. Certified Family Life Educator Ruth A. S. Nichols likens this to the boy who cried wolf.

In family court, a subset of parents has the reputation for crying wolf: indicating a cry of urgency. In Aesop's fable, of "The Boy Who Cried Wolf", there were severe consequences for crying wolf; in Family Court, not so much.

In the fable, a shepherd boy repeatedly tricks the village people into believing a wolf is attacking his flock of sheep. Eventually, when a real wolf comes, the villagers do not believe him and fail to come to his aid; the boy suffers the ramifications of his actions and is eaten by the wolf.

Consequences for parents who 'cry wolf' in Family Court is less clear.

Who is to blame in Family Court?

Do we blame the judge for believing a parent who uses the tools of the justice system? Judges possess the power to make the ultimate call. A judge can sign off on a restraining order resulting in the physical dismissal of one parent. Family Court judges may overlook signs of abuse or not believe a parent because of previous court interactions. Or, the judge may reject information not presented accurately choosing to delay the matter until something else happens.

Rulings may be based on well-meaning intentions leading to responses that are based on a policy of 'play it safe', or 'err on the side of caution'. Judges have the ability to ignore traditional due process all together and make rulings that are for or against a parent's claim of abuse. Regardless, judges are in control of the process.

The reality is that sometimes the case presented to the judge is an untruth. Facts are confabulated for the sole intent of harming their co-parent. In essence, one parent presents a total lie in a court of law under the auspice of 'a parent protecting their child'.

Often this becomes a he said-she said argument and the judge's ruling leads to the domino effect of utter annihilation for one parent (disproportionately males). With one fraudulent allegation, a divorce partner can completely destroy their divorce opponents' life. With a stroke of the pen, the accuser gains immediate advantages. Full custody granted, and a "no contact" order to remove one parent from the child's life.

Adding further to the problem are the ingrained institutional biases that seem to be systematic in family court judges. In a 1994 judicial conference which was published in the New England Journal of Law, a New Jersey municipal court judge; Richard Russell was recorded, actually urging his colleagues to violate basic constitutional protections and due process when he stated;

> Your job is not to become concerned about the constitutional rights of the man that you're violating as you grant a restraining order, throw him out on the street, give him the clothes on his back and tell him, see ya around….. we don't have to worry about the rights.

As Judge Russell made it plainly clear, the "err on the side of caution" has been replaced with protecting one's own career.

Just like that:

Parent/child relationship? Negatively impacted and potentially, ruined.

Reputation in the family? Destroyed.

Financial devastation? In process of destruction

Employment? Possibly, disrupted. At the very least difficult given the legal issues.

Public humiliation? Done.

False allegations of sexual abuse in divorce have become prevalent to the point, that a name has been given: the S.A.I.D. Syndrome – Sexual Allegations in Divorce.

In fact, with child custody disputes, some research indicates that up to 70% of the domestic violence allegations are considered false. Literature purports that the prevalence of false allegations is up to 84% and approximately 85% of those are issued against men. Even if we go with the lower figure of 70%, this means that over two-thirds of the accusations are fabricated. The travesty in this number is that this represents individual parents. This means that numerous parents are wrongly accused and erroneously experience unadulterated devastation and destruction due to a blatant misrepresentation of the facts by their ex (soon-to-be). The misuse of restraining orders is an unfortunate trend. The power of false allegations of abuse in Family Court is undeniable.

In a majority of cases, the use of false allegations stems from the high conflict personality and other personality disorders of the accusing parent.

Sadly, regardless of reconciling with family and re-establishing jobs and friendships, the damage becomes a part of their life. The targeted parents' life is forever broken down into two time frames; before the wretched event and after the event.

Before answering the blame question, perhaps, we should ask, "How do court officials extrapolate the 'true' allegations of abuse from the numerous cases they see each week?" Every day, Family Court officials wrestle with the daunting task of reckoning which parent is telling the truth. Efforts are made to ascertain the existence of a valid reason to issue a restraining order to curtail visitation.

Further complicating the problem is the fact that many family court judges; through mandatory training that is based on the "Duluth" model, are predisposed with a bias that only men commit interpersonal violence, and only women are victims. In sexual misconduct allegations, the mantra has been, "believe the victim," and "women don't lie about being raped." Well; we all know how well that worked out at Duke, UVA, and Columbia; don't we?

The sad fact is that some men and a lot of women do in fact lie in family court, and lie a lot. The family court arena allows for those lies; and even when proven false, the lies go unpunished. In one California case, however, sanctions were imposed in a civil suit for false allegations. Mr. Darryl Ginyard obtained an $852,000 judgment due to his ex-wife's false allegations of sexual abuse to their daughters. The damage done to him personally, financially, emotionally and with his daughters is immeasurable.

Family Court officials need to assess if the child is at risk and gauge the intent of the parent. Appraising accusations as legitimate or determining the request of a restraining order is unfounded can be a laborious process.

In some cases, the truth is difficult to establish.

Do we blame the 'system' that is an abstract construct that does not exist? The 'system' that is actually a conglomerate of officials that are frequently intertwined in their efforts of professional involvement.

Do we blame a system that is inherently predisposed to bias, based on years of misinformation, indoctrination and for lack of a better word; brainwashing?

Do we attempt to blame the individual family court officials? Family Court members, that are assumed to be well-intentioned and unbiased in their efforts to wrestle with the daunting if not impossible task of reckoning which parent is telling the truth and actually have a valid reason to curtail visitation?

Are those Family Court members actually well-intentioned and unbiased?

Do we blame the immoral and unethical parents who have presented their co-parent as abusive, incompetent and unqualified to parent? Keep in mind that the accused parents were deemed competent before the filing of divorce. (A baffling concept at best.)

Who is to blame when Family Court is inundated with false allegations?

Parents in Family Court lie. They lie to hurt others. They lie to better their position, all while hurting the very people they claim to defend.

Perjury in Family Court regardless of the reason is dishonest, immoral and shameful. For most people, destroying another person for personal gain is disgusting. Using lies and playing games to complete the process is despicable, and rarely, if ever are family court lies ever sanctioned. Considering, that the lies are told against the very person they took vows with and chose to create a child with, is ghastly.

If the little boy who cried wolf knew the consequences for his wrongful behaviors, he may have focused on tending his sheep rather than playing games for attention. Similarly, ramifications for engaging in the egregious act of telling untruths in Family Court may curtail the frightful behaviors.

Undeniably, the Family Court system is flawed and biased. With that being said, unwarranted grievances and a co-parent's inability to engage in Shared Parenting practices exacerbates the problem participating in the abominable and horrific acts that occur in Family Court.

Most likely, the villagers would not mind running to the aid of the boy for legitimate wolf attacks. Likewise, truthful testimony in Family Court IS the issue. For the court's credibility, any testimony or evidence must come with an air of validity, and reasonable efforts must be made to establish that credibility. Anything less results in a miscarriage of justice.

Herein lies the dilemma.

Who is to blame? The boy who cried wolf or the villagers who refused to come to his aid?

*****

Please feel free to contact me at: MyConfession@SharedParentingConfessional.com

Ruth A.S. Nichols, M.A., M.A., CFLE p (Certified Family Life Educator, provisional)

Contact at: MyConfession@SharedParentingConfessional.com

LIKE at: www.Facebook.com/SharedParentingConfessional

Sites:

Shared Parenting Confessional. A place for co-parents to confess feelings of betrayal, fear, heartache or humiliation experienced in divorce or co-parenting situation. www.SharedParentingConfessional.com

Rate My Family Court. A Co-Parents' Experience with the Family Court system. www.surveymonkey.com/r/RateMYFamilyCourt-15questions www.RateMYFamilyCourt.com

New Site! Shared Parenting Info: Research and info offered to enhance the parent-child relationship. http://SharedParentingInfo.com

References:

No Restraint on Restraining Orders by Stephen Baskerville, Ph.D. http://www.ejfi.org/DV/dv-23.htm

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, False Accusations of Domestic Violence, By the Numbers:

http://www.saveservices.org/camp/faam-2011/false-accusations-of-domestic-violence-by-the-numbers/http://www.huffingtonpost.com/joseph-e-cordell/false-allegations-of-abus_b_8578086.html

https://sosen.org/blog/2014/04/18/false-accusations.html

Men's Rights: Are There Laws to Protect A Man From An Ex-Wife's False Report?
http://mensrights.com/are-there-laws-to-protect-a-man-from-an-ex-wifes-false-report/

The man’s quandary

AVfM Video Source · 21 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It’s a story of a boyfriend who loves his girlfriend immensely, but one incident in his friend’s life makes him insecure, and he takes a drastic step that is against his ethics and moral.

Traveling Cinema Shorts is produced and curated by Traveling Cinema Productions.

Cyber-bullying, harassment, Quinn, Harper and Owens — a SocialAutopsy

David King · 21 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Update 2 (April 26): The Ralph Retort yesterday published a second interview with Candace Owens. Having listened to two such interviews, I would say that Owens is a good person promoting a terrible idea without realising the harm it could do, even though that harm has been repeatedly pointed out to her.

In that interview, Owens said "I'm not naïve anymore". Though the scales may have fallen from her eyes in respect of the general state of decrepitude of the journalistic profession, I have to say that it is naïve to believe that there would be no harassment absent anonymity — especially in light of what Harper, Quinn, Singal, Dewey and Futrelle have done openly in their (presumably) legal names. I don't think she appreciates that without anonymity, the welfare and livelihoods of some would be under grave threat.

I also think that the fact that nobody she spoke to had heard the word 'dox' before she went public indicates that those organisations don't have sufficiently broad expertise in the matter of Internet harassment, not that it's not a problem.

Update (April 22): Candace Owens "is removing comments critical of her." and for not doing basic research. What a surprise. I guess that we won't be hearing from Ms Owens any time soon. —DK

Note to Ms Owens: The first half of this article is background for the benefit of others. The part directly addressed to you appears in the second half of this article.

Over the past week, a brouhaha has been rapidly escalating over a new counter-cyberbullying and counter-harassment initiative by Degree 180 foundress Candace Owens. By now, this is not precisely news and has been reported on elsewhere in a variety of venues — and though it isn't precisely a men's issues-related topic, I think it's something of which MHRAs (indeed, all Internet users who, for perfectly legitimate reasons, require some degree of anonymity) should be aware if they are not already.

The TL;DR-

Owens was, as a high-school pupil, viciously bullied (including by the son of the then-mayor of Stamford, CT) gaining some media attention at the time. By all accounts, Owens went on to develop a successful career in business and finance (mentioned in her interview with The Ralf Retort), but the scars of her youth still burned (unsurprisingly, because I know first-hand how bullying can have profound, long-term effects).

Owens went on to found web publication Degree180.com in June, 2015, and then, Wednesday week ago, launched a (now defunct) Kickstarter for SocialAutopsy.com (which is frequently down given recent attention) which proposes to be a radical new tool to "wave goodbye to cyberbullies and trolls" and promises to "break the Internet. Literally."

Essentially, this is to be a registry of bullies and trolls (though by whose definition or by what criteria are unstated) built by anonymous submissions that would link instances of harassment and bullying with their alleged perpetrators' social media profiles and other information up to and including their legal names, their workplace and possibly even their home address (if already a matter of public record) etc, ostensibly as a background check service for friends, family, and prospective dates and employers. Despite Owens' prevarications to the contrary, it smells very much more like a doxing service (or something like it) to me and many others besides. Owens has made it clear that she thinks that minors should be eligible for listings but that some of her partners strongly disagree. For now, she says, there are no minors and no intentions to list minors, but that may change.

What could possibly go wrong? After all, if you've done nothing wrong, you've got nothing to hide, amirite?

Then the Internet exploded and, by Friday, her kickstarter was suspended. The storm started on Twitter hashtag

#SocialAutopsy and was soon picked up first by Cathy Young (see also her update), Chris Steaton of Mimesis Law and Tracy Clark-Flory and Jacob Steinblatt of Vocativ. Over the weekend, The Ralph Retort managed to score an interview with Owens, and there has been additional coverage by William Hicks of HeatStreet and also a rather profoundly biased but fairly complete piece by Jesse Singal of New York Magazine. Not, I think, quite what Owens had in mind when she wrote "we're about to break the Internet".

Owens, in response, posted her account of the whole saga on Sunday in which she admitted her lack of preparation and knowledge of some fairly important concepts, events and personalities in the field of internet harassment.

Enter GamerGate...

…or rather, their chief antagonists.

You knew this was coming, didn't you but, unless you already know the story, the twist will surprise you. Chief anti-harassment campaigners and GamerGate antagonists Zoë Quinn and Randi Lee Harper soon joined the fray — indeed, added much fuel to the fire — only to oppose and denounce SocialAutopsy.com.

According to Owens in her interview with The Ralf Retort and also her response article, Quinn contacted Owens requesting a phone call with a stated view to persuade Owens to abandon the project. In prospect, this did not go down well with Owens but she agreed to speak with Quinn anyway. In Owens' account, Quinn tried various tactics (including invoking those über-boogiemen, GamerGaters) and, when all else failed, broke down in tears claiming that "this will ruin everything" should SocialAutopsy.com go live and ended with Quinn hanging up on Owens.

Owens went public with this on Twitter prompting Randi Lee Harper to write an open letter in which she lambasted Owens for making public Quinn's clandestine attempted manipulations and threats to herself and her project, claimed responsibility for the suspension of Owens' Kickstarter campaign and enumerated a list of why Owens' idea was such a "goddamn trainwreck".

I have to say that, in the main (and especially in technical content) and however disagreeable I find Harper personally and in her "professional" conduct, I agree with most of what Harper had to say. I never imagined I'd have reason to write those words but SocialAutopsy.com is that bad an idea, for all the reasons Harper, Young and others mentioned and more, that for the first (and likely last) time, I have to acknowledge that she's right.

Owens concluded that the only possible reason Quinn and Harper could have for opposing her project is that they, themselves, stood to lose too much (especially by way of being added to the database) should SocialAutopsy go live.

She also concluded that the harassment that began within the hour after speaking with Quinn (and which mysteriously stopped when it was announced that Owens was to appear on The Ralph Retort) came from none other than Quinn, Harper and their associates — in no small part because (she claims) 1) such abuse arrived at an email address known to Quinn but not otherwise generally known on the Internet (not knowing what that email address is, I, of course, cannot confirm that claim) and 2) accusations that SocialAutopsy.com is a doxing service only began after the fateful phone call with Quinn and because she had never heard the term 'dox' prior to that call.

Again taking to Twitter, she loudly and clearly articulated these theories, taunting both for the harassment she attributed to them and swearing that SocialAutopsy.com would go ahead, no matter what.

Meanwhile, a bemused /r/KotakuInAction watched on as the conflagration raged on.

There's much detail I've omitted from my account of this saga, in part because I can't remember it all and in part because it would take too long to recount.

Unanswered questions for Ms Owens

In the unlikely event that Candace Owens reads this post, the rest of it is directly addressed to her.

First, I'm a computer scientist. I'm the systems administrator of this site (amongst others). I know a fair bit about technology and the Internet in particular. I've also experienced bullying and prolonged harassment as a minor, so I know a bit about that, too. None of that should matter because what follows should stand on its own merits, however you seem to grant extra credibility to those who've experienced bullying in the past and perhaps my professional background will give you some reason to think that I'm not merely shooting from the hip.

Second, and for the record (though I should not have to state this explicitly), I oppose bullying in all its forms, I oppose harassment by any and all means, I utterly condemn those (including MHRAs) who engage in such behaviour — but I am unwilling to put innocent people at risk in the effort to combat those behaviours, or even risk the risk. Those innocent people may be mistakenly or maliciously identified as perpetrators, or be related to actual perpetrators (especially their dependent children).

As awful as perpetrators of harassment are, I don't agree that harming their employment prospects is justified. An eye for an eye makes the world go blind and nobody, Ms Owens, not even yourself, hasn't ever said something that someone somewhere and at some time has considered hurtful or harassing. If you don't believe me and want an example, it is commonplace for certain kinds of feminists (such as Harper et al. to whom we therefore are politically opposed) to consider anything disagreeable to them to be harassment, even when the speaker is a woman.

If there were some way to guarantee that the wrong people weren't harmed, I'd have little reason to oppose it (even if I think that anonymity can be a good in its own right and therefore not necessarily support the project).

Third, I respect the spine and fortitude you've shown in the past week in the face of such relentless negative exposure and harassment (which, I'm quite confident, is genuine and plausibly originated from Quinn and Harper). For reasons which should now be evident, I admire what you're trying to do but, as has been repeatedly pointed out by any number of people by now, your cure is worse than the disease.

Yet, you are determined and won't be dissuaded, so I shan't try. I will, however, challenge you with the following points. If you'd like to talk privately, you'll find my email address on the masthead, and there's always the comments section below.

Credibility and competence

You are an accomplished and successful woman, but your competence in other business sectors doesn't automatically translate to competence in the subject area of Internet harassment. Likewise, the harassment you experienced as a teen is not representative of the whole gamut of different types of harassment and, while it makes you motivated and readily able to empathise with victims of harassment, it does not (of itself) make you enough of an authority on the subject to judge either the social or technological merits and risks of an idea like SocialAutopsy. The Dunning-Kruger effect and its corollaries are directly applicable and, if you aren't already familiar with that, then you should be.

Everybody, from counter-cyberbullying, information security and privacy specialists to potential subjects to victims to legislators and law enforcement has a legitimate interest in questioning whether you are competent and responsible enough to undertake an endeavour of such gravity and with such far-reaching implications.

It was your job to do enough research before going public so that you could demonstrate to interested parties that you were competent enough in the field in which you proposed to participate to be entrusted with the job.

You have not done that and it shows — in abundance — and it is inexcusable. Saying (in reference to Gamergate and Zoë Quinn) that "people aren't involved in certain industries and don't have an interest in it" isn't remotely good enough. In academia, we expect authors to be aware of related work. In business, we expect executives to have done market research and perform risk-threat analyses before committing substantial resources to an idea. Why should people trust you with the responsibility of a project of the likes of SocialAutopsy when you are so self-evidently ill-prepared?

The word 'dox' is widespread enough on the Internet and is of great concern, especially to those with a legitimate interest in maintaining their privacy such as those who fear for their physical or emotional welfare as well as their livelihoods because they hold unpopular political views (such as feminists and Men's Human Rights Activists alike). When a person is doxed, it is not only that person at risk, but also their friends and family, some of whom may be children whose only fault is to be related to somebody who upset somebody else on the Internet.

Though Gamergate, its actors and its politics themselves may be niche, the story of it is not. It takes just two clicks to find out about GamerGate after Googling the unadorned phrase, "internet harassment", to find mentions of it (even from a clean-cookie session), and each of Forbes, Fortune, Wall Street Journal, Associated Press, NPR, Breitbart and the UK Daily Telegraph amongst many others have written about it — so you really have no excuse not to know about the subject.

On the technical front and according to both Cathy Young and Randi Lee Harper, your proof-of-concept "not-live" test site was populated with data about real people and yet the developer failed to prevent Google from indexing it. Clearly it was live, since it was accessible to anybody on the Internet in possession of the correct URL (which wasn't even one that indicated a staging site, such as test.socialautopsy.com or dev.socialautopsy.com) or, indeed, just Google. It matters not that it was only a test site, or that you didn't intend for outsiders to see it — the point is they did because of carelessness for which you, as Chief Exec, are responsible regardless of whose fault it was. I trust I don't have to explain why.

On the legal front, it has already been explained to you how SocialAutopsy.com could constitute a "false light" invasion of privacy, and others have pointed out that though the United States may have weak privacy laws, most of Europe has stringent laws following the 1995 Data Protection Directive. These laws created difficulties for multinational companies with presences in both the US and EU, enough that the US Department of Commerce and the EU negotiated the so-called International Safe Harbor Principles and subsequent EU-US Privacy Shield. Ms Owens, the Internet transcends legistlative borders and you must inevitably face the legal ramifications in connection with such privacy law if you are to be seen to be dealing with the subject in a responsible manner.

When challenged on this point, you very unfortunately signalled that you have no interest in compliance with such laws by asserting that you are a US company and bound only by US law. Setting aside the questions of whether minors appear on SocialAutopsy and attendant COPPA considerations (it doesn't follow that it is lawful for you to store information about minors solely because Facebook et al. are so authorized) and whether you can meaningfully drop anybody from your database once added, you may (or may not) be correct — but it also shows reckless disregard for responsible handling of personal data about third parties as well as astounding arrogance that US law is the only relevant benchmark by which all Internet users (regardless of citizenship or location) ought hold you accountable.

It would appear that you are accountable to no-one but yourself for the activities of SocialAutopsy.com. The standards and criteria for what constitutes harassment — and we have plenty of experience to indicate that harassment is very much in the eye of the beholder — aren't open to debate, and I have not seen any mention of an appeals process or other means by which a subject may challenge their involuntary listing. I remind you that accountability is about more than just what is legal, it's also about what is ethical.

Speaking of ethics, how do you reconcile the profit motive with the social interest of counter-harassment activities? What possible revenue sources could you generate from this endeavour to pay for the technology, never mind the considerable staff required to vet the expected volume of submissions with sufficient care and attention? Your Kickstarter campaign promised to $1000 backers the ability to "Follow any person or company on our database, free of charge for 1 year" implying that you'll charge for certain kinds of access to the database, yet I'm sure I read somewhere that you promised that SocialAutopsy.com would remain free for the foreseeable future (which makes sense if it is to have any significant impact at all). Having amassed these data, what guarantees can you offer that they won't be abused (and how can anybody verify)? Will you accept money to remove somebody from the database? Everybody has their price, Ms Owens, particularly for-profit businesses, and surely you have yours. The only question is what it is.

The confidentiality of your business model — and I sincerely hope you developed one sufficiently to determine how it will pay for itself before proceeding — is, of course, your prerogative, but so, too, it is the public's prerogative to question how your business model will affect the way you do business, with whom and how it affects your decisions on who is listed and who is not. You've said that you shan't list people on ideological grounds but, without transparency, how can anybody be sure that you'll keep your word? For that matter, how aware are you of your own ideological leanings and how they might affect your decisions? You undeniably have some (as do most of us) as articulated in the project itself, the question is whether there is anybody whom you would not list justified by some unarticulated aspect of the ideology that underpins the project.

The onus remains on you

Frankly, you have an enormous credibility problem in each of knowledge of the field, technical competence, legal compliance, ethics and accountability as enumerated above and by others — a problem that is entirely of your own making and not, as you assert, because of smears (although there is no question that you have been smeared as well) — and all your work is ahead of you to establish that you are a trustworthy steward of the kind of information you propose to collect.

As I said, I don't like Harper one bit. And as you've discovered, she's a bully of the first order and has done some truly terrible things but I must acknowledge when she is correct — as she was in most respects in her open letter — and it's a pity that you "haven't even read [Randi's] full post" because you could learn a lot from it.

In your Ralph Retort interview, you said that you had "talked to a lot of [unnamed] anti-bullying organisations", none of whom had any problem with what you were doing and that (because of Quinn and Harper's actions) "the biggest technology computer forensics company is going to help [you] with this database".

Well, we'll have to take your word on both of those. If, as you say, you have nothing to hide, who were those "15 well-known" anti-bullying organisations and with which technology forensics company are you collaborating? Since you challenged Quinn to name the organisations with whom she claimed to work, it's only fair to ask the same of you. And neither of those points ought to be commercially sensitive, and none of those organisations should have any reason to be uncomfortable with a public association with you if everything you're doing is above board and those organisations are comfortable with your activities.

As Chief Executive, the ball is in your court. How do you propose to persuade the world that you have any credibility or are capable of acting responsibly in respect of this project, or that the good of SocialAutopsy.com outweighs the bad, or that the collateral damage it undoubtedly will inflict is justified (and that there is any justice for those so harmed)?

Never forget: Feminism is on trial

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 21 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In the beginning was the world. Then, feminism emerged from the womb of history. What matters is the order of appearance: we were here first, and feminism showed up later. That is a fact of key importance, and one should bear it in mind continually.

Among other things, feminism is an ideology – meaning, a body of ideas which embrace a self-conception and a self-description. But it is more than ideology because it is more than self-conception or self-description.

Feminism is situated both within its own understanding and within the understanding of the world at large. This makes feminism a subject for itself, and an object for the world, which means that two separate dimensions of understanding must be considered: the feminist-subjective and the feminist objective.

To say that feminism is on trial means it is under the evaluative gaze of an "other," an outside intelligence which is expressly not feminist and views feminism in highly objective terms. We contend that feminism lacks a complete understanding of itself and that only non-feminist alterity can supply the needed information to remedy this lack.

We further contend that such understanding, if it should arrive, would spell the end of feminism altogether because the lack of self-awareness is a critical feminist feature. Therefore, it is not in the feminist interest to gain such understanding – because this would render feminism non-viable.

To sum up, feminism is not fit to judge itself because it will always rule in its own interest – and feminism's interest is to remain viable by preserving its own myth. For that reason, feminism must receive corrective input from beyond itself – the kind of input that would problematize feminism's mythically-based self-conception and give rise to a more inclusive and holistic state of knowledge.

Again, feminism is more than ideology. Yes, ideas are a part of it, but ideas exist only in the human imagination. What concerns us is the power of ideas to shape human conduct in the objective world – the extensional reality of ideas, to give it a name. This reality has objective consequences which chain-react into further consequences, and the ensemble of it is fraught with moral ramifications. So when we speak of feminism per se, and of feminism being on trial, we speak of all that.

Feminism's consequences are integral to feminism's being. Feminism is under discussion as malfeasant, and feminist malfeasance cannot be isolated from any idealistic notion of feminism's essence. No moral quarantining of what feminism is "supposed to be", from what it DOES, is feasible or worth considering.

In our summation of feminist phenomenology, we take both ideas and consequences into account. At the same time, we expose every aspect of feminism to an intellectual audit, with all feminist claims or theories (from the greatest to the smallest) being open to question. That is the plan from here on out, growing and spreading over the years.

Every time a feminist speaks, it should occur to us to wonder if that person is lying, or at least self-deceived. So even if a feminist says "the sky is blue," we are entitled, on principle, to greet that claim with skepticism.

It is hard to overstate just how radical and fundamental this counter-feminist culture of critique, from all quarters, has got to be. The awareness that lying is a foundational feminist behavior has got to be an instinctive, bedrock realization for everybody. It should be second nature, instilled in our marrow and etched into our neurons. "Lie like a feminist" should become a commonplace expression, taught to children at a young age.

So in the end, feminism is under both moral scrutiny for its transgressions and intellectual scrutiny for its ideas. The trial process aims to shine a light on every possible facet of the feminist problem, and non-feminist men and women of all classes are encouraged to participate in this project.

At its fullest reach, feminism is a densely connected cultural web that includes both ideas and objective circumstances. It is an extended social organism whose character is invasive. It occupies both public and private realms, and we who don't partake of it experience this as a hostile intrusion into the fabric of our lives. We were here first, and an uninvited guest barged in, and we naturally have a few things to say about that.

It is unseemly for any guest to abuse a host, but when an uninvited guest does this, it adds injury to insult. Feminists, as a rule, have comported themselves in exactly such a way: they abuse us, they treat us cavalierly, they twist our words, they misrepresent us, they invent stories about us, they exploit our good nature, and on it goes.

The worst of it is that they parade themselves under a banner of moral supremacy, acting like they own the world or like they ARE the world. We have a name for such behavior: feminist triumphalism, the attitude that feminism is right because it's right because it's right, that the case is settled for all time, and no further discussion should be tolerated.

Non-feminist men and women should no longer tolerate feminist triumphalism. The feminists must be put on notice and told to get off their high horse.

Feminism is not the world but only a part of it. For one thing, self-declared feminist people are a minority of the human race. For another, feminist theorizations don't stretch far enough to cover all of the world's complexities. Not only that, but these theorizations often fail consequentially – for as stated earlier, ideas have consequences. Non-feminist men and women (the rest of the world, mind you!) are forced to live with those feminist consequences, and for that reason alone they are entitled to speak their minds.

It bears repeating that ALL feminist claims and theories are open to question, starting with the most fundamental question of all: "What is feminism?" Any feminist definition of feminism constitutes a claim or theory open to question. Hence, from the standpoint of non-feminist alterity, we may define feminism in the light of our own observation and study.

The dictionary does not accurately reflect what many people mean by the word "feminism," so the dictionary must be revised. However, a lot of us aren't waiting for the lexicographers to get with it. Within our non-feminist speech communities, the word feminism will continue to mean what we say it means, despite what any feminist (or dictionary) might say to the contrary.

We take control of the language by an act of political will. Non-feminist reclamation of language is a revolutionary act, and feminists who don't understand this must educate themselves about the reality of the situation.

We have spoken of feminist triumphalism, but we should also mention feminist subjectivism, a mindset closely entangled with it. Feminist subjectivism (which resembles solipsism) may be summed up as the idea that no correct understanding of feminism can originate outside the realm of feminist discourse. In other words, that feminism can be nothing other than what a feminist says it is. Feminist subjectivism occurs not only when they insist upon the dictionary meaning of feminism, but when they impose feminist terms and categories upon the living reality of the non-feminist sector.

Putting it simply, the feminists theorize about the rest of the world on no authority but their own, and with sweeping generalizations. Hence, in the spirit of "turnabout is fair play", we are licensed to generalize feminism and feminists as sweepingly as it was done to us. In fact, we have been using that license for some time and will continue doing so. They started this, and if they want to stop the music, the onus is on them to make the first move. The aggressor owes the world a "mea culpa".

For them, the lesson is straightforward: don't start a cultural street fight if you can't finish it. And don't complain if people who are goaded beyond endurance finally turn your own tactics against you. What did you think a street fight was, anyway? Fair?

Right now, somebody might be saying "you have called this a trial, and you have called this a street fight. Which is it?"

Very simply, it is both, because it contains aspects of both. That feminism is on trial is not strictly "fair" since the trial is convened by a process which, on its face, does not look strictly fair either. Ironically, that process turns out to be “fair” after all when you consider that it plays by the very same unfair terms of engagement which feminism (the predominant aggressor) established in the first place.

What goes around comes around. The aggressor feminism has redefined “fair”, and we’re just playing along because the conventions of fairness, or any notion of “Queensberry rules”, went out the window when feminism made the opening moves. Those were unfair moves, aggressor moves – and the maxim is, that the aggressor sets the terms of engagement. It follows that the aggressor must lie in the bed which the aggressor has made. We, non-feminist men and women, are punching “up” while feminism is punching “down”. Accordingly, we do what we must, to equalize the game.

Strictly considered, we don’t need feminism whatsoever. That has been our conclusion for quite a while. If feminism went away, only two things could take its place: A.) more feminism or B.) nothing. You should bear this is mind the next time some feminist asks what you plan to “replace” feminism with. You should understand that this person is loading the talk with a feminist assumption: that feminism’s departure would leave humanity, somehow, in the lurch. But to ask what would replace feminism is pointless. The answer is that the waters of life would instantly close up to fill the space, as when a rock is lifted from a pool.

Whatever is good about feminism is not original, whatever is original is not good, and if we flung away the not-good parts it would leave us nothing that wasn’t ours originally. Feminism offers no special wisdom or guidance that regular people couldn’t light upon by their own lights, and if every form of feminism were to vanish in a puff of smoke, the general quality of life would take no dramatic nosedive – not for women, not for men, not for anybody.

As non-feminists, we are offended that feminists would deprecate our moral competence or suggest that we are incomplete for want of feminist indoctrination. Plenty of non-feminist men and women have got the relationship thing figured out just fine, thank you very much. They know how to treat each other right, and always have. Non-feminist men and women don’t want sanctimonious liars and busybodies mucking around and poisoning their world, so if the feminists won’t back off politely, these people can offer some rude encouragement.

The trial of feminism will go on for many years until feminism as a whole comes to a proper humility and a posture of atonement. The culture of critique and the intellectual audit will involve people from all walks of life exposing feminism to every imaginable deconstruction. Little by little, the upholders of feminism’s worldview will find their avenues of evasion sealed off and unavailable for further use.

The world will never be converted to feminism for the same reason that reality will never be converted to unreality. The feminists must eventually face up to this, and make terms accordingly. When that day arrives, it will usher in a radical transformation to their way of life. Feminism will confront the cultural limit of its expansion, and this will be an existential crisis on a par with confronting its own mortality.

If feminism wants to keep existing, it must keep up a continual development and expansion called “perpetual revolution.” That is how feminism rolls. If perpetual revolution fails, feminism fails and begins to die. That is why we can predict that feminism must die eventually because it simply cannot expand forever. Sooner or later, the rest of the world will either actively push back or passively refuse to budge. The implications are the same in either case: feminism confronts a terminus.

The vital and significant question is, “can feminism coexist?” The answer is no, feminism cannot coexist. To “co” exist means to accommodate the existence of an Other. For feminism to coexist, it would need to dwell eternally alongside something specifically not feminist – and the operative term is “eternally” since there would be no question of that non-feminist Other ever fading away.

This would raise existential questions that would strike at the root of feminist identity and feminist reality. It would proffer the spectacle of something self-sufficient which had no need of feminism whatsoever, and such a spectacle would knock the wind out of feminist triumphalism while putting feminist subjectivism on shaky ground.

Little wonder, therefore, that implacable hatred of the non-feminist sector simmers just below the surface of all feminist manifestations. The fact that non-feminist men and women simply exist, and that they PERSIST, confronts the feminist power like a kind of kryptonite. They hate us because they fear us – because they know that they can never assimilate us.

Granted, the feminists will tolerate our existence on condition that we act like we don't exist at all, but sooner or later the plain fact that we DO exist (silently or otherwise) will need to be reckoned with. It's a reckoning that cannot be put off forever.

So let us consider that feminism has effectively become the cultural default position which can impose a burden of proof on its challengers. It has obtained this status by presumption, imposition, and a "long march through the institutions". Oh, and a certain proclivity of the masses to bow to any fait accompli and believe any narrative that gets sufficiently signal-boosted.

The upshot of all this is that feminism, no matter what you think of it, has become The Establishment – and feminists themselves strut around with the cocky self-assurance that this is so.

However, there is a big difference between admitting that a bully has power, and believing that the bully is entitled to that power. The bully's power, you would say, is not legitimate – and so it is with our present bully, feminism. Feminism is the establishment only because it has established itself by usurpation, and its title is only as secure as it can gall people into believing. We who are not gullible are free to assess the value of feminism's title and make plans for feminism's future. That is why we say that feminism is on trial.

There is an edifice of moral and intellectual privilege now slated to collapse in a heap. This loss of feminist privilege will bear down hard upon the feminist psyche everywhere. We do believe that it will signal the end, not of feminists as individuals, but of feminism as a hegemonic cultural power.

In spite of all this, we do extend an olive branch, of sorts, to the feminists. Yes, when we say that "feminism cannot coexist," we are prepared to be wrong. Naturally, the burden of proof lies with the feminists. After all, they are so keen to negate the presumption of innocence in the criminal justice system that it is only fair they should now get a taste of it on their own account. Turnabout is fair play. The aggressor sets the terms of engagement. They made their bed, and now they lie in it.

But we do extend that olive branch. We do proffer a benefit of the doubt, which feminism can coexist with the world despite our theory to the contrary. However, the onus is on them to show this to our satisfaction – to approach us with downcast eyes, to address us in respectful tones, and to answer, with no hint of guile or deceit, such queries as we put to them.

And further, we hope to see a moral and intellectual perestroika of the entire feminist project, actively undertaken, along lines that non-feminist men and women will suggest. Surely, if coexistence is to be realized, something of this character is warranted.

Can feminism co-exist with the rest of the world? Non-feminist men and women are waiting for an answer.

Feminist Terminology 4: Structural Violence – TFF Episode 26

AVfM Video Source · 22 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 26 Professor Fiamengo discusses the fourth of five pernicious feminist terms: Structural Violence.

StudioBrule

Parental Alienation Syndrome

Editorial Staff · 22 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article appeared as a blog post on AVFM and Antimisandry.com by one of our forum members Deidre. It is edited and republished here with her permission. EDs

Have you ever felt like an outcast? Perhaps, looking back during your childhood, you were at times, the odd person out. It's a very uncomfortable feeling and most of the time, people who have been alienated from family members, friends, coworkers, etc. are left confused as to what they have done to have been banished from the fold. There is a type of alienation however, that is insanely dangerous and damaging, and that is parental alienation. And, it leads to what is commonly referred to as "parental alienation syndrome."

The root cause of the syndrome is when a custodial parent indirectly or deliberately thwarts the relationship between the non-custodial parent and his/her child, causing the child to wish no longer to spend much or any time with the non-custodial parent. This is done through a number of manipulative tactics by the custodial parent, usually as a form of revenge, to turn the child(ren) away from the non-custodial parent. The majority of alienated parents are fathers, which comes as no surprise since mothers are usually given greater legal custodial rights over their children, than fathers.

I know of a few men, online and offline, who are victims of being estranged from their children, due to the reprehensible behavior of the parent who has sole custody. When did the court system start viewing children as property? It seems that in divorces these days, kids are treated as bargaining chips in a vindictive battle, suffering alongside the alienated parent. I've been researching a bit about this epidemic and found some very insightful advice that is worth posting here, for those parents (namely fathers) who find themselves in despair, and have all but lost hope in ever having a close, consistent relationship with their children.

Parental alienation is categorized into three separate tiers of severity. Before a boxer gets into the ring to fight his opponent, he tends to know beforehand what he's up against. Likewise, these tiers of severity can help an alienated parent figure out what he is up against, as well.

The first type of severity falls under the phrase "naïve alienator." This type of alienator has a rather nonchalant view of parenting in general, and might say something to the effect of "I'm not made of money, when you see your father next, ask him to buy you a new cell phone." If said often enough, the child gets the sense that dad is a utility, and mom is fed up with having to take care of him/her. Eventually, the child will see his/her dad as little more than a money provider and errand boy – an image that evolved over time by the consistent drip of derogatory comments from the mother about the father.

The second type of severity is something counselors call the "active alienator." This type of alienation is harsher than the naïve alienator and usually comes out like this to a child "Don't tell your father I'm dating someone, he's a cheap jerk and will withhold money from you. You don't want that to happen do you?" Active alienators are typically angry, vengeful and could be categorized as narcissistic. Children who are victims of these types of tactics, quickly start seeing their dads as their mothers do – a possible enemy who is only looking out for himself.

The most dangerous and severe of the alienation types is what is known as the "obsessed alienator." This type of parent will stop at nothing to destroy the relationship between the non-custodial parent, and the child(ren). Obsessed alienators are dubbed this because they are ruthless in their behaviors against their exes and usually try to bankrupt them through incessant court battles. Most likely these types have narcissistic personality disorder, because they are unafraid of the court system, and will do virtually anything to keep the non-custodial parent away from their kids. The children of an obsessed alienator usually end up having great disdain for the alienated parent, because children simply can't process things as adults do, and are left feeling abandoned by the alienated parent. From what I've read, this type is the one that has the greatest capacity to do the most harm to a child, for once the child accepts what the custodial parent is saying about the other parent, it will be a long road to repairing that relationship, if possible at all.

So, what should a father do if he suspects that his ex is purposely turning his kids against him? What avenues of recourse can he find to help support him in helping his children to offset the damage that the alienating parent is doing? This is quite simply put, emotional child abuse at the hands of the custodial parent. Because emotional abuse, in general, is a harder thing to prove than physical abuse, and also because parental alienating syndrome is challenging to pin down with an actual diagnosis by a trained counselor/doctor – the custodial parent continues to get away with distancing the non-custodial parent, and increasing the harm being done to the child. Upon discussing this with an online friend who is going through a difficult custody battle with his ex, he shared that he is trying to get his attorney to insist that his children seek counseling, mandated by the courts. One would hope that in doing so, the children will open up in an honest way in a counseling situation, but it depends on how badly the children's opinion of their father, has been damaged. That said, it stands to reason that it is worth pushing forward in the court system, to see if judges finally start opening their eyes as to parent alienation being a form of child abuse. If it were me going through such a difficult situation, I'd look for an attorney who specializes in parental alienation syndrome cases, and see what their track record has been. Also, finding men's support groups to assist with support and encouragement on an emotional level, as dads go through their ordeals, will be very helpful, as well. It is incredibly disconcerting to be painted in a light that is not true, especially to one's children. Most fathers feel powerless in such dilemmas because the custodial parent has what can be deemed as control over their children, directing them on how to think of their fathers, and poisoning their minds as to why their fathers aren't going to be in their lives.

I've come to the conclusion in life, that there are no words at times to convey how inhumane some people can be to others. To use one's child to strike back or seek revenge on an ex-spouse is deplorable. Times may seem bleak, but there has to be a way to rise above these injustices, to give children a better life. Children need both of their parents, present and active in their lives, to foster a healthy upbringing. No child should have to endure parental alienation syndrome…not ever.

"Children seldom misquote their parents. In fact, they usually repeat word for word, what their parents shouldn't have said." – Unknown

A helpful link: http://www.fact.on.ca/Info/pas/gardnr98.htm

The real history of men — Part 1

Paul Elam · 22 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Everyone knows that men have a tendency to protect women. But why do we see men, often so magnificently strong with other men or when facing danger, suddenly become shadows of themselves against the will of a woman? Indeed, why is it so rare that you ever see anyone even questioning this apparent paradox?

Is it nature? Is it social conditioning? Or is it something else that makes so many men Sampson, primed to be in the clutches of Delilah?

That is the subject of this series, the Real History of Men on An Ear for Men.

I have to take a moment to give a tip of the fedora to Peter Wright. Without his splendid knowledge of gynocentrism, history and philosophy, this series would not be possible. The message here is a product of his generously sharing that knowledge and pointing me to invaluable resources.

Now that I have offered proper credit, let's start with the basic premise that all narratives hinge on a chronology. Each story, mythology or belief system contains a beginning, a history that defines the present, and a future goal or destination.

If you are religious in the Abrahamic sense, you have the moment of creation, the historical legends, and allegories that shape and define modern customs and beliefs, and the predictions of a future; a place in time where you or your people if you prefer, are going.

Buddhism, a non-religious philosophy, begins with enlightenment, historically shared by way of Dharma, or teachings, which set the individual free from life's inherent negativity, taking them to a better place. Failure at the lessons, as we see in Hinduism as well as Buddhism, condemns the person to be reborn into life's struggles until they get it right. But in getting it right, they have a destination in mind.

Even most atheists share the same basic psychological architecture as religious people. There is the big bang or some other theory of the beginning of the universe, long periods of formation and creation, including human evolution, and ultimately an end, or at the very least, a new beginning.

There are even narratives within narratives. The universe has one story, the earth has another, as it also has a beginning, middle and end. The USA is another example. The American Genesis was an exodus from England; its story was building the new world and a destination of freedom and opportunity. A kind of promised land. At least that is the internalized narrative of America for many in the world, even for some of those who hate it.

We are all, in one form or another, affected by this existential three-act play, and in that we have a natural inclination, a drive to script everything, from mythologies about national, state and local identity, to our laws and social customs. We create these archetypal stories and then emulate them, acting out uniquely human psychodramas in never ending cycles that shift with the changes in culture. If we are lucky in the midst of all this, we get to experience the belief that we know who and what we are.

In short, humans are story creatures. We need stories to orient ourselves in life. Those stories, the stories we unconsciously write about ourselves, and even stories that dwell in our unknown history, are always there, shaping what we think, feel and do.

For the purpose of this talk, I am going to apply this to the world of men, who are without a doubt in an ever increasing crisis of identity and confusion about their place in the world.

Depending on who you talk to, we have a pretty clear narrative of the human story, the story of mankind. There are certainly differences in what that story is from culture to culture and subculture to subculture, and no identified group will have near all the facts right, but anywhere you look there are people with a shared set of beliefs that form their core identity as human beings.

That certainty of identity starts to unravel when we replace the word human with the word man. While the story of mankind is, for the most part, uncomplicated, for men it is, especially in these times, muddled and rife with conflict.

It isn't because the story of men is convoluted or overly complex. It is because our story has been erased and rewritten with a faulty mythology. The first two acts of our play have been gutted and revised to the point that act three, our collective future, has evaporated.

It's impossible to underestimate the power of that internal narrative. Just as religious zealotry can foster wars and contagious hatred, other belief systems run amok can popularize bigotry and a host of other psychosocial maladies. To make myself clear that this is not a blanket condemnation of religion, and for the sake of honesty, I point out that atheists are no more exempt from this than anyone else, as history clearly demonstrates.

Right now the story of masculinity, and by that I mean the commonly internalized narrative, is as simple as it is toxic. In the beginning, there was the original sin of male dominance and power. The history that defines masculinity now is one of pernicious control and abuse, especially of women, that led to a coveted state of privilege, and the future is, must be, a prophetic destruction of privilege that does not exist and an end to masculinity as we once knew it.

It matters not that this is a false narrative, oblivious to reason and fact. It is still the prevailing narrative. The associated archetypes and mythologies formed in our minds and now permeate our consciousness. They already contain the power to shame and silence us with manufactured guilt. Those who see it and fight are few, but even in that fight, we acknowledge the presence and power of the narrative.

The masculine future is here. Hatred for men is institutionalized. Male suicide is surging, testosterone levels are plummeting, as is the presence of men in higher education and the workforce. Fathers are disappearing from the lives of their sons, resulting in gangs and prisons filling with men, and even more demonization.

And at the same time, male deference to women is at a staggering level, as is damseling by very powerful women who find no shortage of men of all stripes to fly on autopilot to their rescue. We are all but ignoring tumors in men to attend to hangnails in women.

In fact, I am here to argue that this deference to women, this insanely sacrificial servitude, is now an archetype of manhood. It is ingrained into what Plato called the anima mundi, the soul of the world, which now every man bears it like a cross.

The question here is how that lemming-like deference, that lack of self, was written into our story. I ventured into the shallow end of that pool in another article I wrote, titled Servant, Slave, and Scapegoat.

The short version of it is that our classic male archetypes — heroes, kings, warriors and the like — have been twisted and deformed by gender ideology.

You might think that the ideology came from gender feminism, whether the current third wave carnival or the second wave of the late 1960's or even the first wave of the mid-1800's but all those are comparatively minor events in this story. Act one of this three-part play has its beginning over 900 years ago in the mid 12th century.

Eleanor of Aquitaine was a remarkably wealthy and powerful woman. At different points of her life, she was the queen of both England and France. She was also a temperamental, rebellious woman by historical accounts. All indications are that she was a woman who lived in constant dissatisfaction with her lot in life.

In many ways, her life and that of her daughter Marie mirrored more modern feminists like Betty Friedan. They were women of serious means, bequeathed to them by men. They were women who used their privilege, free time and resources practice sexual politics.

Eleanor and Marie dedicated themselves fervently to promoting the standard of courtly love. They commissioned traveling troubadours to spread a redefinition of love and attachment according to the courtly standard. And, understand this, that story, that narrative, still dictates much of our lives today.

So what exactly is courtly love? The late Joseph Campbell, a highly regarded mythologist, writer, and lecturer shared his ideas on it after years of research.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=g9gqkTJjris

One of the stories commissioned by Marie, who also dictated the details, was that of Lancelot and Guinevere. At its core, it was a story of glorified adultery and betrayal. It was a message that courtly love was exalted notion of love and rose above the moral standards of the times, even above the power and importance of a king.

And so went the theme of all courtly love. The way knights, and ultimately all men fit in this story, was in blind service and dedication to women, abandoning themselves and their values for the privilege of being a vassal.

As we can see in this next segment by Campbell, blind obedience to that narrative is not quite as romantic as it sounds.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=t0X0WsRfxxc

I'm not saying that Eleanor of Aquitaine invented Courtly Love or Romantic Chivalry. Some scholars have reasonably concluded that the trend was making small waves in multiple cultures at the time. Myths like Helen of Troy and Sampson and Delilah far predated Eleanor and Marie. Our legends were already replete with cautionary tales about the devastation wrought from male surrender to the pull of infatuation.

Eleanor's work to change the healthy narrative, an expression of her lust for personal power, is the genesis of our story. And its' history is well documented. The message started with nobility and spread to all the principal courts of Europe. From there it disseminated to the masses and has been a powerful and destructive part of men's story ever since.

Looking back, Act One of this story is the first ever historical example of a social movement designed to manipulate the biological tendency toward gynocentrism, and to coerce men into a role of enhanced servitude to women. It was wildly successful, and it has affected human beings as much or more than religion and technology. Certainly more than psychology, which was emerging as a discipline about the same time as courtly love.

And as many know, there has been a deep and painful cost to men for it.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fDRydrY1VcI

That's worth thinking about.

Sargon of Akkad didn’t think his petition through

AVfM Video Source · 24 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sargon’s petition isn’t censorship but, if successful, will probably have the opposite effect. I don’t think he thought this through very well.

Jack Barnes MRA

HIV Remains an Epidemic Despite the Awareness

Maggie Martin · 24 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The world was thrown into panic 34 years ago after Luc Montagnier and Robert Gallo discovered a new virus strain that ended the innocence of youth altogether. The lentiviral family member was discovered to attack the human immune system shutting it down almost to a complete halt. This led to a rise of infections that brought down the victim fast and easy. The virus came to be known as the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV). This developed to an Acquired Immunodeficiency Syndrome that caused a major hysteria. Major organizations and nationwide based units have since dedicated vast amounts of resources to deal with the epidemic. Scientific journals, Awareness campaigns and ways to increase the human lifespan in the glaring reality of the disease have also been largely invested in.

AIDS attacks T-helper cells also known as the CD4 cells. The immune system cells degrade and diminish in number unable to fight any external damage. The body then succumbs to the pressure and gives in with time.

A lot still needs to be done to control the disease despite the major awareness campaigns running all over the world. Over 5% of Sub-Saharan Africa is living with the virus. Over 1.7 Billion dollars are dedicated by the local governments all over Africa to deal with the devastating effects of the condition. The only possibility left is the use of Antiretroviral to boost the immune system and help the body fight against common ailments that would otherwise be dealt with by the immune system. The drugs are a mix of steroids and pro-tease inhibitors. The bodies, however, keep piling.

AIDS is an advanced stage of HIV that can take 2 to 15 years to develop depending on how one handles their diet and drug intake during the period. There are people that have lived for years with HIV epidemic going about normal activities. It is said that more than 34 million people in the world are living with the virus. It is also estimated that more than 39 million have died from the disease all over the world. 70% of the infections are recorded in Africa while 12% are in Central, South America, and Mexico. 17% of the entire infected population do not know that they are living with the virus. This enhances the rapid spread.

Knowing the causes and how to prevent the condition is crucial. Knowledge on how to handle the virus after infection is also critical. HIV is contracted majorly through sexual intercourse with an infected partner. This is at least one of the fastest ways that the disease has spread all over the world. The virus is transferred through the exchange of body fluids be it saliva, blood, semen and any other excretions from an infected person to a healthy one.

The most affected individuals are bisexual and gay males from African and Hispanic communities. Pregnant women also risk passing the virus to their babies. It is estimated that over 220,000 children have been infected since 2014.

Major campaigns have been launched to create awareness on the effects and the need to get tested especially when sexually active. Responsible sexual behavior will keep one safe. The use of protective methods has also been advocated. It is estimated that the disease has reduced by 35% all over the world with the execution of these campaigns. Antiretroviral drugs have also been used to delay the progressive effect of the virus into full-blown AIDS.

*****

Sources:

http://www.avert.org/about-hiv-aids/what-hiv-aids
https://www.aids.gov/https://www.nlm.nih.gov/medlineplus/ency/article/000594.htm
https://www.aids.gov/hiv-aids-basics/hiv-aids-101/what-is-hiv-aids/

Support An Ear for Men

Paul Elam · 25 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

An Ear for Men promotes an alternative to the traditional lifestyle narrative that puts men and boys at risk. One way of making that alternative available is through consistent, cutting-edge content for men and boys that they will not find elsewhere. That content takes time, effort and expense to produce and distribute.

Your support is greatly appreciated.

Patreon and Paypal here.

Chivalry: A learned deathwish

Paul Elam · 25 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Just after midnight last Friday, April 22, 2016, and a scant 4 or 5 miles from where I am sitting, 19-year-old Jason Cisneros stopped by his best friend Ivania's apartment to see her. When he arrived, he heard a commotion near where he parked.

He sent a text to Ivania inside, saying, "'I'm outside. There's a lady honking, and this guy wants to hit her. He wants to kill her."

Jason then approached the woman's car to intervene. Just a moment later, he lay dying on the street, with two gunshot wounds.

The news coverage on this, what little it will get, will paint a simple picture. A brave young man heard a woman in distress — a woman he did not even know — and lost his life trying to protect her.

Of course, the real story is not nearly so simple. What made this young man walk into the line of fire? Was it heroics? Why didn't he just call the police? Why did he feel the pull toward intervening in the troubles of a female stranger?

Why have men like this, rushing in and dying to protect women they don't even know, become their own crime statistic?

This is a sad event that illustrates so much of what is wrong with men's story in the modern age.

With the narrative about men's place in the world casting them in the role of a protective vassal, we have developed the expectation that this is what men ought to be.

Undoubtedly the news coverage will play this out as a senseless tragedy. Accordingly, most will eventually take refuge in the fanciful idea that Jason Cisneros died a hero.

The members of society, by and large, who read this story and watch the news video, will end up on a similar trajectory, toward glorifying the self-sacrifice.

They will not conclude that this was a young man who was set up, duped into putting his neck on the chopping block by a history and force he never had a chance to grow up to understand.

His parents will take solace in the idea that their son died doing something noble. His friend will apply a similar salve to her grief. Few, if any, will question the wisdom of his choice or the factors that drove him to make it.

Fewer still will wonder about the character of the woman he was trying to save, even though it was evident that she was in a relationship with a murderous thug, that her chickens had come home to roost that night, and that she wanted someone to rescue her at any cost.

Jason Cisneros

Jason Cisneros died trying to protect a woman he did not know, who it turns out may have been no more worthy of protection than the man who killed him.

Our society will interpret his death as heroics, and thus teach more young men that this insanity is the model of manhood they should emulate.

We will deny our young men the truth. Jason's impulse to rescue the damsel in distress is a dysfunctional mandate passed down from generation to generation living by a narrative that sees his life as easily disposable.

Was Jason a good man? Most probably he was, though I am loathe to use that term lightly anymore. There is too much pointless sacrifice that comes with it.

The small amount of information that I have indicates that he came from a loving, supportive and close-knit family. And he was, after all, doing what he believed to be the right thing.

I can't even imagine the sense of loss his family feels right now. Parents burying a child instead of the reverse is a hugely painful deviation from the natural order.

But for the sake of preventing more funerals, it is important to push aside the misguided chivalry and false heroism of this event and recognize that Jason's death is one of countless, pointless sacrifices that never should have happened.

There is nothing to glorify here. Not the death of a beloved son. Not the ill-fated choices of young women who are sexually excited by criminality and violence.

And not the false code of male honor inflicted on young men from the shadows of a warped social consciousness.

There is a lesson here for parents and for anyone else who has a young man in their lives whom they love.

Please ask yourself, if your son or other loved one encountered the same situation as Jason, what would they do? Would they intervene? If they did, is that what you would want them to do?

Would it make you proud? If it would, are you willing to bury them for the sake of that pride?

If you would not want your son to die like Jason Cisneros died, have you told him? Have you made it clear to him that dying for a stranger is not your idea of manhood?

Have the lessons from your family been about protecting his loved ones, protecting himself, or about protecting anyone at his own expense?

You know, this stuff matters. Today's young men get copious amounts of messaging about manhood, most of it instructing them to accept their disposability by calling it a badge of honor.

Young men face a barrage of social messages to "man up" and be a "real man" and other shaming, exploitive instructions.

It even comes from the government. We see it in the "It's On Us" anti-sexual assault campaign, which includes President Obama and Vice-President Joe Biden, along with stars like Common, Mike Roe, and others, telling young men that it is on them to intervene.

Just like Jason Cisneros did.

Please watch the "It's On Us" video and think about the price Jason paid for making sure it was on him.

Doing that might make you stop to consider if you want to manipulate your son or another beloved man into playing unarmed and unpaid bodyguard, ever at the disposal of strangers.

And while you're at it, you might ask yourself something else. Do you have any reason to think Common would risk his life for a stranger?

Do you think Joe Biden cares about your son — or the women's vote?

When I look at what Jason's story turned into, all I see is a devastated family, a grieving friend, and a decent young man with a life cut short on behalf of someone who in no way warranted that kind of sacrifice – not that any stranger ever does.

Perhaps there is a better social message we can send all people, young and old. It's on you.

It's on you to forge the ability to protect yourself. It's on you to make sound decisions about people with whom you choose to get involved.

It is not the responsibility of strangers, and it is not a burden for another class of human beings to bear.

No one outside you, your family and the police have any obligation to take risks for your safety. If women don't know this, the parents of young men certainly should.

Milo Yiannopoulos, Steven Crowder and Christina Hoff Sommers at UMass

AVfM Video Source · 26 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Steven, Based Mom and I went out to UMass for The Triggering, a three-way talk about political correctness going too far. SJWs in the crowd spend the better part of an hour and a half proving us right. Probably my most outrageous show to date, thanks for having us out!

Milo Yiannopoulos

Game of Crones: Reign of the Drama Queens

Doug Mortimer · 26 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine you are a parent working two or three jobs to pay for your daughter's tuition and college expenses. When she announces she is not going to major in gender studies, you breathe a sigh of relief. Then she says she's decided to major in theater arts! Geez, why not just drop out and take a vow of poverty.

Well, four years from now all those unemployed or underemployed theater majors may get a break…assuming they are women or a reasonable facsimile thereof.

You see, the 2020-2021 American theater season has been proposed as a Jubilee year. As you may recall from Sunday school, the Jubilee is an old biblical term in which the slate is wiped clean, e.g., slaves are freed, and debts are forgiven. The theatrical Jubilee concept comes with a twist: it's about extinguishing men, not debt; purportedly it stands foursquare for the manumission of women, as well as other aggrieved groups.

For the record, here's the manifesto from Howl Round, a website which pertains to all things theatrical:

We can envision a near future in which all American Theatre seasons are overflowing with works written and directed by women.

We can conceive of the myriad outstanding plays by people of color and Native artists being produced nationwide.

We can foresee LBGTQIA creators hired to write, direct, and choreograph in every theater in the United States of America.

We can anticipate artists with disabilities in every role the theater has to offer, onstage and off.

We plan to celebrate this vision with a Jubilee year in 2020, in which every theater in the United States of America produces only works by women, people of color, artists of varied physical and cognitive ability, and/or LGBTQA artists.

Interesting to note that even these people are confused by the proliferation of gender identities, as they first say LBGTQIA, and then LGBTQA. Thanks to Urban Dictionary for bringing me up to date by defining "I" and "A" as "intersexual" and "asexual." "Intersexual" was a new one on me, but it seems to be a neologism meaning hermaphroditism. Nothing like old wine in new bottles for seeing through a glass darkly. Of course, by the time 2020 gets here, that LBGTQIA acronym will surely be larger. (Guinness, take note: the result should occur in the world's longest horizontal eye chart!)

This SJW-oriented Jubilee is the brainchild of Kirk Lynn, one of the artistic directors at the Rude Mechs theater group in Austin. He is if you're wondering, a heterosexual, middle-aged white male, so he is doing some pretty heavy virtue signaling/white knighting. According to the Rude Mechs website, the group's mission statement includes "fostering confidence and creativity in young women through the power of performance." Geez, are we ever going to get done with empowering these females? Whoops! Pardon me; I keep forgetting…we still have a long way to go.

Of course, leaning to the left is nothing new in the arts. During the 1930s proletarian and anti-fascist plays were fashionable, and in the late 1950s, kitchen-sink dramas were popular in England. Then there was the 1960s radical chic movement (so ably chronicled by Tom Wolfe) in which highbrow artsy types hobnobbed with leftists and espoused fashionably radical politics.

In a sense, the proposed theatrical Jubilee is just the culmination of longstanding progressive trends. Non-traditional or color-blind casting, for example, has been around for decades. The goal was to provide work for minority actors even when they were obviously not suitable for certain roles. For example, Victorian London was 99.99% white, but you wouldn't know it if you attended the annual productions of "A Christmas Carol" at the Dallas Theater Center and observed the multicultural roulette casting of Tiny Tim. The Jerry Lewis Labor Day telethon couldn't offer a broader rainbow coalition of juvenile gimps.

To be sure, the theater is still concerned about minorities (the Howl Round website also has an article on the pressing issue of lack of diversity in a deaf theater), but now women's issues have been moved to the front burner. Again, this is not a concept that just got off the boat but has been around for years. For example, in Los Angeles, there is a group called the Kilroys, a henhouse of female playwrights and producers who turn out an annual list of plays by women that otherwise might escape notice.

In New York, the Women's Project (interesting to note that the artistic director is Lisa McNulty, former "wife" of Norah Vincent, author of the renowned Self-Made Man), founded in 1978, has produced hundreds of plays by and about women.

Same goes for the Moxie Theater in San Diego. Men aren't entirely excluded, but the group provides "primarily female playwrights" and looks for plays that "defy female stereotypes."

Flyover country is not exempt either. For example, in Dallas, we have the EchoTheater, which has been producing nothing but plays by women for the last 15 years. Then there is the Bishop Arts Theater, which has been doing black-oriented material since day one, but recently genuflected to the gynocracy by hosting a festival of six one-act plays by women.

And this movement isn't restricted to North America. Across the pond, a movement called "Waking the Feminists" arose in Ireland in response to the productions of Dublin's famed Abbey Theater during a festival of plays in honor of the 100th anniversary of Irish independence. It seems of the ten plays performed, only one was written by a woman, and only three were directed by women! Such an outrage!

Well, the Abbey Theater got the message and formed a sub-committee on gender balance. Predictably, they pledged allegiance to gender equity without ever defining the term. The Abbey Theater may be world-famous, but it still depends on a government subsidy, so something resembling a quota system will probably result, even if the word quota is never uttered.

Now as the call for Jubilee jihad spreads to theater groups across America (indeed, "Waking the Feminists" has already spread to New York), you can guess how this will work out. The pressure to jump on the bandwagon will be enormous, and the moral posturing will be unending. Any theater manager's refusal, no matter how carefully thought out and sensibly worded, will be tantamount to wearing a "Trump for President" button.

I predict that the Jubilee season if it comes to pass, will not be a financial success. This is hardly going out on a limb, as theater in America doesn't come close to paying its own way. This is one reason the dreaded dead white male playwrights are so popular. Shakespeare gets no royalties, so it is cheaper to produce one of his plays as opposed to one written by a living, breathing playwright who is due royalties.

In days of old, theater troupes had to put butts in the seats in to survive. Today, without subsidies, most theater companies would be out of business, and they know it. Consequently, they are always begging for grants from wealthy donors, government arts funds, and foundations. In a bread-and-circuses society with an over-supply of leisure time activities, live theater (especially with progressive themes) just can't compete with sports, movies, TV, pornography, pop music, and video games. Oh, your local newspaper still dutifully reviews local productions, but if budget cutbacks eliminated the theater reviewer's position, it's doubtful if the readership would notice.

For sure the lively arts folks will be rattling their tin cups overtime to make the Jubilee happen. And if you're an individual, foundation, or corporation that usually donates to the arts, and you turn this one down, then it must be institutionalized misogyny or homophobia or pangender phobia or…well, as you can see, the Urban Dictionary will have to come up with some new words to cover all the contingencies.

The excuse for this all this trendy pro-female bias is that theater has traditionally muffled if not gagged women's voices. Unfortunately, that complaint doesn't hold up in theater any more than it does in society at large. In the world of the theater, the white heterosexual male has made major contributions, but he is not running the show. The majority of plays produced may well be written by white male playwrights, but, as shown above, women often run theater groups, direct plays, or are at least highly influential in selecting the plays that the group puts on.

In society at large, while men earn more money, women control the purse strings. To a large degree, the art world involves well-to-do ladies of leisure (usually blessed with rich husbands) raising money and deciding which artists, male or female, starving or otherwise, are awarded the booty.

Of course, booty may be what all this Jubilee stuff is really about. Go down any rabbit hole you want, but don't ignore the money trail. The Jubilee may be an attempt to corner the market and put more money into the hands of women. If people aren't going to see the female-friendly plays that the theater groups are offering now, then let's remove all the competition so theatergoers have nothing but female-friendly plays to choose from.

Women supporting their local theater groups makes perfect sense since women are born actresses (there is a movement afoot to turn "actor" into a gender-neutral term and to jettison the word "actress"). In the theater world, the vaginalized are hardly marginalized. Indeed, one might argue the opposite. According to Richard Burton, "An actor is something less than a man while an actress is something more than a woman." That may be one reason why homosexual males have made goddesses out of flamboyant, over-the-top actresses.

I think Richard Burton meant that acting is central to female identity; if a man wants to tread the boards, well and good, but if he wants to gain respect, he needs to perform in real life. He must be a "hero" in life; playing one on stage is not enough. Deep down, even a leading man harbors the suspicion that he's a humbug. I don't think leading ladies harbor such self-doubts.

Most feminists act as though nothing has changed since Shakespeare's day when roles for women were played by men. You'd think they'd be lionizing all those 17th Century actors and their gender fluidity, but no! Even all those cross-dressing roles in Shakespeare's comedies can't make up for that dastardly phallocratic Elizabethan stage. True, Lady Macbeth may be a strong woman, but ultimately she could be interpreted as a product of the author's misogyny. And don't even mention The Taming of the Shrew!

Truth to tell, I don't know how they kept women off the stage, since emoting, putting on makeup and playing dress-up is regularly exhibited by females of the tenderest years. For teenage girls, it is but a small step from drama queen to dramaturgy. That's why the drama club at your local high school is more than likely top-heavy with females. In fact, I recall reading more than a few biographies of actors who, when asked why they first took an interest in theater, replied that it was a good way to meet chicks.

At least that's what the heterosexuals said. Homosexual males have long been a staple of theater, from playwrights (e.g., Edward Albee, Noel Coward, Tennessee Williams, Terence McNally, Oscar Wilde) to actors (e.g., John Gielgud, Ralph Richardson, Ian McKellen), not to mention dancers and singers. Spot the Homo is hardly a challenging game when it comes to the world of theater. Those mentioned above, however, did not achieve prominence because of any affirmative action program for homosexuals; they were just good at what they did.

So methinks the marginalized doth protest too much. There is an insightful line In the Mel Brooks movie To Be or Not to Be (actually a remake of a 1940 Ernst Lubitsch comedy), in which he plays the manager of a Polish theatrical troupe that is putting on Hamlet in Warsaw during the Nazi occupation. When informed that the Nazis are putting Jews, homosexuals, and Gypsies in concentration camps, he laments "Without Jews, fags, and gypsies, there is no theater."

Well, if the Jubilee gets off the ground, there will be theater, but white heterosexual men will be relegated to the wings. As Shakespeare put it in As You Like It (Act II, Scene VII), "All the world's a stage, And all the men and women merely players; They have their exits and their entrances."

So, men, you can exit stage right, or you can stage left. Don't go away mad, just go away.

Until we need you.

TL;DR – Intellectual Rigour VS Pwnage

AVfM Video Source · 27 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In this video, I complain about doing what I do, like I don't do it, and pretend I'm not going to do it again even though I will totally do it again. #MustDoBetter

TL;DR

If you like this video please subscribe to TL;DR's YouTube Channel.

Entropy: The problem with evolution by dumb luck

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 27 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Maxx's (2016) article 'Alpha' ain't born… is an important interpretation that is consistent with the workings of human nature. But it is at odds with the mainstream's genocentric, Neo-Darwinian life-science paradigm. If we are to properly understand human motivations and psychology, then Darwinism, in all its manifestations, needs to be dumped in favour of a more realistic paradigm. The purpose of this article is to demonstrate that Darwinism's principle failure is at its foundations, and there is little point trying to fix it.

(Armchair theorists, as science-hobbyists who have no investment in real science beyond what they read in Sunday magazines or watch on television, will indignantly stamp their feet with their predictable "because Darwin" objections. This article is not directed at them. I suggest that they find a different hobby where they cannot hurt anyone… maybe a computer game or stamp-collecting.)

In accordance with Occam's razor, elegant simplicity is valued in science, and this is a good thing. An elegant, simple solution has to reflect reality, and in that spirit, Isaac Newton is king. Patterned on this Newtonian initiative, in the pursuit of elegant simplicity in science, follows the inspiration to regard Darwin in the same light. But Charles Darwin's formulation is simplistic, not simple. It is inelegant and clumsy because it falls apart in its simplistic reliance on its principle axiom, natural selection. Darwinism is a two-legged stool where its third leg – that which varies and is selected for – is clumsily accounted for. At best, natural selection can provide only a partial account of what takes place within any ecosystem.

My concern with the problems of Darwinism is not an idle one… it has implications that affect people's lives. The success of feminism, for example, in inserting itself into the cultural narrative and establishing its dominance in western secular liberalism, is attributable to the irreparably broken life-science paradigm that is Darwinism… especially in its contemporary manifestation as Neo-Darwinism.

But at least Darwin, in his acceptance of the theory of Jean-Baptiste Lamarck, provided a not wholly unreasonable account for the missing third leg. Things really start getting out of hand after Darwin's passing, when genetics enters the Darwinian narrative in order to factor in the source of variety. Thus was born Neo-Darwinism. In its assumptions grounded in genetic determinism, Neo-Darwinism has taken the role of choice and meaning out of the life-science equation, in favour of an infotech narrative that portrays behavioural characteristics as adaptive traits. It is accepted by the mainstream as the foundation upon which to reason a secular narrative, and the damage inflicted by Neo-Darwinism is less in reason than it is in the breakdown of reason itself. Reason that escapes rigorous scrutiny opens the floodgates to absence of reason, and it becomes permissible to give substance to narrative over evidence. Neo-Darwinism represents a breakdown of the scientific method and the jettisoning of rationality itself. This is nowhere better illustrated than in the failure of Neo-Darwinism to address the problem of entropy (the tendency to disorder).

Neo-Darwinism's willingness to turn a blind eye to entropy establishes a predisposition that tugs at every other inconvenient truth that is problematic for the scientific agenda. One disturbing manifestation of this is the breakdown of our peer-review process, which Richard Horgen (2015) laments in The Lancet:

> The case against science is straightforward: much of the scientific literature, perhaps half, may simply be untrue. Afflicted by studies with small sample sizes, tiny effects, invalid exploratory analyses, and flagrant conflicts of interest, together with an obsession for pursuing fashionable trends of dubious importance, science has taken a turn towards darkness. As one participant put it, "poor methods get results". The Academy of Medical Sciences, Medical Research Council, and Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council have now put their reputational weight behind an investigation into these questionable research practices. The apparent ende1micity of bad research behaviour is alarming.

The bottom line… it is not that Neo-Darwinism is just getting a few facts wrong. And it is not that it is broken beyond repair. It is that Neo-Darwinism is contaminating the whole of our life sciences itself with a broken, corrupt methodology that is anything but scientific. As Horton observes, "In their quest for telling a compelling story, scientists too often sculpt data to fit their preferred theory of the world." This is precisely what is taking place with Neo-Darwinism's failure to properly address entropy. The reality of entropy is inconvenient to the Neo-Darwinian narrative. And the solution is to do exactly what feminists do when confronting truths that are inconvenient to a cherished narrative… ignore them.

Does Life imitate art? Or is it Art that imitates Life? Or should that be Politics that imitates Broken Science? It is no accident that corrupt politics is imitating an irreparably bankrupt methodology that has more in common with faith than with science.

Let us now tackle Neo-Darwinism's Achilles' heel… the failure to properly address entropy.

THE NEED TO TAKE ENTROPY SERIOUSLY

There is no interpretation of Darwinism, Evo-psych or any other mainstream biology that will explain the goings-on in the video clip by MoreThinking (2013), on the Inner Life of the Cell. What is needed is a revised, interdisciplinary interpretation of the biological sciences, one that factors in the important considerations, such as entropy.

Throughout history, people have held an intuitive awareness that a universe by dumb luck is impossible. They may not have understood why, but their instinct connects with the law of entropy. The Muslim in this video clip (ThinkIslam, 2014), not a scientist, is expressing the same sentiment. He gets what Neo-Darwinian atheists refuse to get; he is expressing an intuitive albeit imperfect awareness that entropy… that is, ordered complexity by dumb luck… is nonsense.

Entropy is a concept from the second law of thermodynamics. It manifests in both the physical and the life sciences as the tendency to disorder. Biological structures are complex and, left to the physics of their surrounding environments, they are unstable and will be reconstituted into the surrounding dirt… that is unless they are alive. The key question then is, what is it about being alive that resists entropy?

The challenge for complexity is entropy. In an infinite universe across infinite time, remarkable accidents attributable to randomness will occasionally materialize to create complexity. But:

It is the persistence of complexity across time that is the deal-breaker.

It is because of entropy that the persistence of complexity across time needs to be taken seriously. Within an infinite universe across infinite time, a pile of rubble or a stream of molten lava might occasionally manifest as what looks, for all intents and purposes, like a wall built by a designer of some kind – or maybe, by the confluence of the freakiest of events, even a home designed by a stone-mason. Now a solid wall or house might be pretty robust when it comes to the forces of entropy, like erosion and such, but for how many centuries might it stand, all by itself, without renovation or rejuvenation? At the micro level that is relevant to life's processes, however, any complex structure that might manifest by chance is unlikely to persist beyond a few days, or maybe even hours or seconds, when subjected to the elements.

The infinite monkey theorem famously suggests that, given infinite time, teams of monkeys typing randomly will, at random, happen upon a draft of Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace. Said theory is problematic because of entropy. Typewriters break down and need to be maintained, paper rots with mould, rooms housing typewriters burn or get washed away by floods, and planets housing typing pools have to survive the endings of their suns' life-cycles. If we were to persist with this absurdly unrealistic thought experiment, the maintenance of said typing-pools requires intervention by minds to keep them maintained and to run.

And were our hypothetical draft of War and Peace even to make it through the entropy gauntlet, oh what a special and unique occurrence that would be… a unique, and fragile occurrence, less resilient to the effects of air and water than a feather in a hurricane.

There is no crossing the entropy Rubicon. There is no marvellously accidental complexity anywhere in the universe that will withstand the relentless onslaught of entropy from all quarters. It is the ability of complexity to persist across time that renders null-and-void any possibility of persistent complexity by dumb luck. Which brings us to the probable mutation effect.

Byles, R.H. (1972) (Limiting Conditions for the Operation of the Probable Mutation Effect) provides a competent coverage of the sorts of things that need to be addressed; like the conflicts between mutation rates (back-mutation, forward-mutation, etc.). These issues are non-trivial, for example:

Is the mutation rate volatile enough to enable change? Is it stable enough to maintain form and consistency?

How significant must a change be to impact on survival and thus, subject the organism to the influence of natural selection?

Are the required states "logically inconsistent" – that is, can there be a mutation rate that satisfies the mix of stability and volatility required for evolution by mutation?

Aren't the vast, overwhelming majority of mutations, as an expression of the inexorable march of entropy, detrimental to survival and prone to inefficient formlessness, rather than efficient, purposeful form?

Can evolution by micro-mutations occur if the changes aren't significant enough to be noticed by natural selection, bearing in mind the organism's very real capacity to adapt to minor limitations?

… and so on.

The idea of evolution by dumb luck is just a dumb idea. It is the worship of a golden calf entertained in ignorance of a compelling life-science based on a compelling axiomatic framework. Natural selection is a mechanism; it is not a principle that justifies being expressed in the context of an axiomatic framework.

There exists a solution to the entropy problem. Mind-stuff. To this end, imitation is particularly relevant.

IMITATION RESISTS ENTROPY

It is ironic that one of the most important possibilities for the mainstream biological sciences comes from über-atheist Richard Dawkins. It was Dawkins himself that introduced the narrative into biology, thus establishing imitation as an important principle at least for humans in culture. In the context of Dawkins' memetic narrative, imitation is how memes (loosely defined as units of imitation) spread throughout a culture. Of course, Dawkins failed to appreciate the full significance of this insight, and the opportunity to harness imitation as a fundamental principle for the life sciences was left to flounder. In its place, the Dawkins'selfish gene interpretation asserted its dominance, and the possibilities implied in the memetic narrative retired to the status of a footnote. We are thus left with an infotech narrative that renders imitation as an instinct and therefore a trait coded into the DNA, much like one's height, or the colour of one's eyes is an adaptive trait. The possibility that imitation might play a major role in informing living entities about the things that matter (pragmatism) thus fails to make an impact.

In contrast to The Establishment's infotech narrative, there exists a semiotic narrative (Charles Sanders Peirce) where imitation is more appropriately thought of as what mind-bodies do to decide on the things that matter (a term from semiotics – pragmatism). An organism's timely response is important in resisting entropy and increasing its odds of survival, and imitation fast-tracks its ability to learn the things that matter. Regarding human culture, imitation saves us from having to reinvent the wheel. Just do what everyone else is doing, and you optimize your chances of survival… and of course who you choose as a role model to imitate can impact on wealth and success or punishment and failure. The same line of thinking applies to any organism that has to make choices from its colony.

Why does imitation resist entropy? Because it reduces uncertainty and risk. Imitation implies conformity. At its most extreme, imitation is a tight, rigid and inflexible body of stubbornness that is impervious to the forces that try to deform it. Imitation is anti-entropy. Imitation accounts for the behavioural momentum that is integral to the ability for life to persist across time. It is how an organism knows how to be.

Imitation is calibrated differently for different organisms… and sexes. Indeed, imitation provides a basis for understanding gender roles that are impossible to achieve from a solely Darwinian perspective. For example, gender roles relate very specifically to how imitation plays out in human cultures. Female nature is predisposed to the cultural known while male nature is predisposed to the boundary between the cultural known and the unknown. Hence, the inclination of female nature to imitate priorities resonant with security and stability, and that of male nature to imitate priorities resonant with risk and uncertainty. Contrast this simple but significant insight with the trite "because genes" narrative on which Neo-Darwinism relies. Something like "women want to be provided for because they are programmed to in the genes" goes the narrative, and so women's priorities and motivations (e.g., hypergamy) don't enter easily into the discourse.

I do not wish to dwell much further here on the topic of imitation, as it comes with nuances that are beyond the purpose of this essay. Imitation is the visible surface of much deeper philosophical concerns, for example, as they relate to phenomenology, pragmatism, and epistemology… their direction of influence is principally from the bottom-up. In the interests of simplicity, we don't need to go there, because imitation's direction of influence is from the top-down… it is the system that informs us of the behaviours that are expected and therefore, to be imitated.

Before departing from this line of thought, though, we should satisfy ourselves that imitation is pretty fundamental to any colony of entities, be they humans, meerkats, ants, bees, neurons or bacteria. The topics of systems theory and neuroplasticity are especially relevant, and writers like Howard Bloom, Lynn Margulis, Francisco Varela and Humberto Maturana have extensively studied the parallels that exist between human colonies (culture), cellular colonies and insect colonies. More recently, McDonald (2015) reports that Biologists Discover Bacteria Communicate Like Neurons in the Brain. This is all still fairly new territory with new developments and opportunities cropping up all the time. There is simply no justification for the "because Darwin" gospel and its infotech narrative, and the sooner that this ball-and-chain is given the heave-ho, the better off that science and society will be.

A DIFFERENT PARADIGM FOR A DIFFERENT VIEW OF THE UNIVERSE

For the purpose of illustration, let us indulge in some untested conjecture, to get a handle on what opportunities might be being missed in this blind, unswerving devotion to Darwinian dogma.

There is an appreciation emerging, in some circles, that something analogous to imitation might play out in the quantum physics of atoms and molecules (e.g., David Bohm's implicate and explicate order). The remarkable complexity of a cell, with the interactions and interdependencies taking place within it, requires very precise and consistent properties in the atoms and molecules of which it is comprised. For example in the above-referenced video clip, Inner Life of the Cell, a motor protein fulfills a very precise and specific function. Proteins are molecules. So how might a motor protein "know" its properties and the conduct that is essential to a cell's survival? How might entanglement (nonlocality) factor into this? DNA entanglement is an idea that is increasingly making an appearance in some circles, based on the realization that the principles of quantum mechanics apply as much to molecules as they do to subatomic particles. And where do the elements, the atoms of which the molecules of life are comprised, come from? The astonishing complexity of a cell would be impossible without the very precise properties of the same "dumb dirt" that is likely to exist on other planets throughout the universe. There is "something" going on that needs to be properly addressed, and Neo-Darwinism is a dead weight that is restraining us from going there.

Getting our paradigm right has real implications not just for our lives, but also for how we view the universe itself. At one extreme is a sterile, lifeless universe of limited possibilities, and it is to the mechanics of dumb luck that we owe our very narrowly proscribed existence. We know the spiel… racism this, oppression that, because genes, Patriarchy bad. And at the opposite extreme is a dynamic, living universe of infinitely many possibilities that we can barely guess at, and our appearance is anything but accidental. How we interpret a cultural phenomenon and respond to it is contingent on where on this continuum our assumptions lie. What is the best way to contend with whatever cultural stupid might manifest? Do we take the stupid seriously, and respond to it on its terms? Or do we see it for what it is – as a cultural expression of, say, the Darwinian narrative – and try to change the narrative? One paradigm is distracted by symptoms while the other contends with cause.

CONCLUSION

Fundamentalist atheism, with its Neo-Darwinian foundations, is a religion. Atheism's "just lack of belief" is a belief because it requires faith not only in the Neo-Darwinism that it assumes to be "just reality" ("just lack of belief"), but it must deny the reality of entropy. Denial of reality requires false belief to justify denying it, hence the need to turn a blind eye to the reality of entropy.

Fundy atheism also requires the absence of rationality to justify constructing a behemoth of theory in the absence of an axiomatic framework. This translates to an absence of strategy. Strategic thinking is as relevant to good science as it is to successful business or formidable military, and cobbling together many facts that don't hang together does not a good science make. A bucket of arbitrary facts, as what atheism relies on, is like a bucket of engine parts… if you don't know how everything fits together, then all you have is a bucket of junk.

Natural selection (variation and selection) is a two-legged stool that is missing its third leg… that which varies and is selected for.

Neo-Darwinism is junk science that informs the junk culture to which feminism owes its existence. It is no accident that some of our most famous atheists (e.g., Richard Dawkins, Steven Pinker, Paul Zachary Myers), at least at this time of writing, consider themselves feminists. Before political correctness, it was sensible to judge people by the company they kept. May we revive and extend the same rationale to judge collectives, and the broken science that keeps company with delusional ideology.

*****

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Byles, R. H. (1972, March). Limiting Conditions for the Operation of the Probable Mutation Effect. Social Biology, 19:1 29-34. Retrieved April 10, 2016, from http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1080/19485565.1972.9987962?journalCode=hsbi19

Horton, R. (2015, April 11). Offline: What is medicine's 5 sigma? The Lancet, 385 (9976), 1380. Retrieved April 4, 2016, from http://www.thelancet.com/pdfs/journals/lancet/PIIS0140-6736(15)60696-1.pdf

Maxx. (2016, April 2). 'Alpha' ain't born… Retrieved April 7, 2016, from A Voice for Men: http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/mens-health/alpha-aint-born/

McDonald, K. (2015, October 21). Biologists Discover Bacteria Communicate Like Neurons in the Brain. UC San Diego News Center. Retrieved December 10, 2015, from http://ucsdnews.ucsd.edu/pressrelease/biologists_discover_bacteria_communicate_like_neurons_in_the_brain

MoreThinking (2013, January 9). Inner Life of the Cell (Full Version – Narrated). [YouTube – XVIVO for Harvard University]. Retrieved April 04, 2016, from https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FzcTgrxMzZk

ThinkIslam (2014, February 13). Atheism Explained in 45 Seconds. [YouTube – Silver Edge Media]. Retrieved April 05, 2016, from http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uwqPdWZvjAY

Online harassment- A female problem? #MoreThanMean

AVfM Video Source · 28 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Online harassment is a very real thing. Doxing, swatting, and a myriad of other genuinely dangerous things can be facilitated through the internet. That said, mean comments are just mean comments, and they are dealt to anyone with even a modicum of relevance in pop culture. So why is online harassment presented as a primarily female problem despite evidence that shows it happens to everyone more or less equally? I don't know, but I like Fleetwood Mac. And you do too.

If you enjoyed this video, please subscribe to Chris Ray Gun's YouTube channel.

The transgender red pill: Who cares?

August Løvenskiolds · 28 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Critics – rather dull, uneducated critics – of the men's human rights movement have expressed delight that the Wachowski brothers, who made the trilogy of Matrix films, are now the Wachowski sisters. You can find a couple of these critics' stunningly uninformed articles at Flavorwire and even the Guardian if you want a good shaking-my-head laugh at their poverty of understanding.

The Guardian author Noah Berlatsky claimed that "It's certainly satisfying to imagine the horror of MRAs discovering that their beloved Matrix was created by two transgender women."

The Flavorwire author Parker Molloy collapses the transgender sisters into one woman:

> It's with some amount of glee that I inform redpiller1985 and those like him that it's too late for MRAs to push back against the "infection" of "transsexualism." You see, The Matrix, holiest of men's rights literature, was co-created by a transgender woman.

Beyond the silly conflation of MRAs with other red pill groups, of course, the entire notion of a red pill that can make one return to reality/sanity comes from the movie Total Recall of 1990, not The Matrix that came out nine years later. The then Wachowski brothers "borrowed" this idea much as they "borrowed" Kung Fu movie fights scenes – shamelessly. In the feminist enclave of Hollywood, the safest way to be a man is to become a trans woman – a woman so much better than women-born-women that one trans woman won the woman of the year. Men, it seems, dominate everything, even being women.

For men's rights activists, "the red pill" is a metaphor, a useful one for sure, but in the end, it is just a metaphor – it is not holy writ nor an icon. The Matrix movies were about waking up to reality – the reality that understanding gender, male or female, cis or trans, is a lot more complicated than most people realize. That the Wachowskis have crossed over to the other side of the gender binary does little more than prove there is an irrefutable gender binary.

Metaphors, of course, can always be twisted by one's opponents. I've heard a Muslim posit that the focus on the Crucifixion means that Christians worship murder. Likewise, judging the entire men's movement by twisting the red pill metaphor is like judging the articles in the Guardian and the Flavorwire by the taste of their authors' toilets.

The authors Parker and Noah seem to think that transgender people like the now Wachowski sisters are some challenge to either masculinity or those who support men's rights. This is, of course, ludicrous. While feminists would tell the authors to "educate themselves" (feminists always prefer to be lazy and let men do all the hard work), I will take a moment to explain how "masculinity" works in the men's rights movement and the larger red pill world.

Masculinity is not toxic. Men built human society and almost everything you see around you. Did women help? Not if you believe feminists, who claim that women were too oppressed by patriarchy to do much of anything (except steal men's ideas for use in Matrix movies, perhaps). Lose masculinity on Monday and the world is dead before the weekend.

Masculinity in men is overwhelmingly demanded by straight women. Feminists, of course, go even further and seek to instill masculinity into women as well, urging other women into things like STEM fields and dirty construction jobs that most women avoid. Although heterosexual women might say disparaging things about men and masculinity, women's choices of mates say the most about what women want beyond what they claim they want.

Some men, like those pickup artists at Return of Kings, seek to pander to women's desires for masculine men. On the other hand, MRAs like me see requiring masculinity as superfluous – women and feminists do a great job of that already through sex, and there is no reason for men's rights activists to duplicate their efforts – what would be the point?

Rather than requiring masculinity, I choose to support men who are masculine as well as those who are not. Masculinity is not toxic. However, as a MGTOW, who avoids all relationships with women, I will go so far as to affect non-masculine traits to deflect attention I get from women. A sexually appealing man who rejects a woman's advances can expect a hostile response up to and including a false rape accusation (as in the UVA "Haven Monahan" and Columbia "mattress girl" cases). But a feminized man has a lessened chance of running afoul of women's feelings of entitlement to men's sexuality.

Both authors are too thick-headed to grasp the nuances of different groups within the men's movement, so I expect them to continue to lump us all together in ways that would horrify them if they were caught so lumping women together, this is their loss. Understanding the nuances of various men's groups as well as the horrible claims and expectations that all feminists place on men would give them great insight into everything from the Trump political campaign to the myriad failures in their own blue pill lives.

Too much of a pill to swallow, obviously, and for them, permanently. That is okay; I guess – not everyone is worthy.

Dr. Mohammad Hossain Howlader of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 28 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Mohammad Hossain Howlader has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website londonsurgicalcentre.com, “About Us:”

“About the London Surgical Centre

The London Surgical Centre (LSC) is a clinical services provider based in London. The LSC is a specialist provider in circumcisions for males, and also small surgical operations. We pride ourselves on providing safe surgical procedures for all our patients.

This service is led by a consultant surgeon Mr. (Dr.) Mohammad Hossain Howlader, he is often known simply as Dr Mohammad or Dr Mohammad Hossain or Dr Howlader etc.

Presently we mainly provide service at Maryam centre next door to London Muslim Centre (LMC) and East London Mosque (ELM) every Sunday and school holidays.

However, Mr Mohammad Howlader, as a consultant surgeon at a NHS Trust, also performs other surgery such as Hernia surgery, Gallbladder surgery, Weight loss surgery, other abdominal surgery and endoscopy etc in various private hospitals.”

Gee, why on Sundays and school holidays? So we can get those horrid little pieces of skin off of the penises of school children without missing any school. Why ruin a good education with a day of trauma that could last a lifetime?

The doctor says he provides “safe surgical procedures for all our patients,” namely hernia, gallbladder, and weight loss surgery. Despite the doctor’s claim, all surgery comes with risk, and the choice to have any surgery is balanced out by its benefits. These other “small operations” are done to correct or cure a disease or condition, and are all carried out on consenting adults who can weigh the risks vs. the benefits. Dr. Howlader, however, seems to think infant boys are not human, since he doesn’t afford them the human right to choose whether or not to amputate part of his penis because others think it may get dirty.

Under “What We Do” we see:

> Baby & Children Circumcisions
> The best time for a circumcision is when a child is still a baby. This ensures the best comfort possible.
>
> Home Visit Circumcisions
> The LSC provides are home visit service to carry out circumcisions for your ease and comfort.

The best time for a boy's circumcision is the same as for a girl – never.

And, assuming he means the infant's "best comfort possible," I would suggest the doctor put down the knife and leave the baby intact and unmolested.

A "home visit service" for "your ease and comfort." What next, home service lobotomys of family members that annoy you? Home service euthanasia of old family members who can't wash themselves? FGM for girls who stink 'down there?'

So, if you want to add a lifetime of trauma and resentment to a genital mutilation, risk of death, and sexual abuse, have your son circumcised against his will at his home where normally his family would look out for his welfare.

Under "Baby Circumcisions in London" we see:

> What is a circumcision?
> Circumcisions are common for baby boys in certain parts of the world, and it involves removing the foreskin covering the tip of the penis. Whether you are circumcising your baby boy for religious practices or for his general health and well-being, the London Surgical Centre is here to help you through the process. We carry out circumcisions for baby boys in a sterile and safe environment, from our clinics in London.
>
> When should you circumcise a baby?
> Most parents tend to arrange a circumcision for their child, when they are still a baby, if not a newborn. This makes it easier to manage and the least amount of pain or discomfort is caused to the little one, and they are unlikely to remember the procedure ever took place.
> It is crucial your baby is healthy and well, before any circumcision procedure should ever take place. This will help reduce any risks
>
> The Procedure
> The most common and surgical standard for carrying out a circumcision on a baby boy, is using the Plastibell Circumcision Device. This is a clear plastic ring that is used for the procedure during a small 10 minute surgery, to remove the foreskin.
> The surgery is carried out under local anaesthetic, which helps reduce the pain of the surgery and causes minimal pain.
> The plastic ring usually falls off after the surgical procedure within 3-7 days. Parents are usually advised to monitor the progress of their baby, and keep the general area clean.

Dr. Howlader apparently doesn't know that circumcision is also done on baby girls. From thefreedictionary.com we have this definition:

> cir·cum·cise (sûr′kəm-sīz′)
> 1. To remove the prepuce of (a male).
> 2. To remove all or part of the clitoris, prepuce, or labia of (a female).

Funny (not really) how we criminalize FGM practitioners in most of the world, yet we allow and actually pay for this mutilation when it's done to infant boys.

The doctor tries to minimise the seriousness of circumcision by saying it's a "small 10 minute surgery," but in truth it's a permanent amputation of part of a baby's penis that results in scarring, pain, bleeding, trauma, as well as many other complications, sometimes resulting in death.

Again, Dr. Howlader says this trauma is best done in infancy, and I think this is because an infant:

- is smaller, weaker and can't fight back
- can't hire a lawyer and sue
- can't refuse verbally
- can't stop the sexual assault being done

However, the American Academy of Pediatricians disagrees with the doctor and recommends that surgery like circumcision should not be done on infants due to the damage done to an immature nervous system.

Under "Benefits of Circumcision" there's this:

> Easier Hygiene
> Circumcisions can make it easier to wash and clean the penis. Bacteria and other germs can usually build up inside the foreskin on an uncircumcised penis.
>
> Decreased exposure to urinary tract infections
> Urinary tract infections are more common in males that are not circumcised, however the risk is generally lower for males that are circumcised. A urinary tract infection in early life can develop into kidney problems.
>
> Decreased risk of sexually transmitted infections
> Circumcisions lower the risk of sexually transmitted infections like HIV. However, safe sexual practises should still remain essential for one's own health.
>
> Prevention of penile problems
> Foreskin on a uncircumcised penis can be difficult or sometimes impossible to retract, which can lead to inflammation of the foreskin or head of the penis.

These supposed "benefits" have been debunked, besides the fact that elective surgery on a non-consenting person is unethical and violates the doctor's' hippocratic Oath "First, do no harm."

Under "Circumcision FAQs" we read:

> What are the possible complications?
> Complications are uncommon. However, bleeding, infection, stuck ring, urination difficulty, swelling, redness and cosmetic deformity etc can happen.

Most of these "possible" complications – bleeding, swelling, redness, and cosmetic deformity – happen 100% of the time.

Since Dr. Howlader has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org

Have a KGM (Known Genital Mutilator) you'd like to see featured here? Drop me an email (see masthead) with the circumciser's name and website – let's make them infamous for what they do.

Dr. Howlader's practice information follows:

The Maryam Centre, 45 Fieldgate Street, London E1 1DU 0208 586 0437, 07944 914 463, 07983 072 779 info@londonsurgicalcentre.com

> Dr. Mohammad Howlader of London, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/dmFeUuQeLd @AndreaHardie #nocirc #MGM pic.twitter.com/XpGHOnVJP1
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 28, 2016

Feminist Terminology 5: Microaggression – TFF Episode 27

AVfM Video Source · 29 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 27 Professor Fiamengo discusses the fifth of five pernicious feminist terms: Microaggression. Fiamengo also explains how feminists use the theory of microaggression, and the misandric claims that masculinity is toxic, in their strategy for power through the dehumanization of males.

StudioBrule

Feminism – why you don’t need it!

AVfM Video Source · 29 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A fresh perspective of activism and ideology from a young gaming YouTube commentator. Please check it out. EDs

> Today I wanted to talk a little bit about feminism, why it doesn’t own the concept of gender equality, and why it is an inherently flawed ideology. And while we’re at it, we’ll debunk the gender pay gap as well.

Please subscribe to Chris Ray Gun‘s YouTube channel and encourage him to do more videos like this.

Putting Pussies on the Podium

Doug Mortimer · 29 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If you live in a large city, you may have heard of the Tuba Christmas concert. As the name implies, the production involves Christmas carols played exclusively on Tubas, or related instruments, such as Sousaphones or Euphoniums. The first such concert was held in New York in 1974 and has spread to cities large and small across America.

While attending one such concert on Christmas Eve in Dallas, I noticed a huge gender imbalance in the musicians. Of the 200 or so players, not more than 1 to 2% were females.

Well, I'm sure there are perfectly good physiological reasons why women don't play the Tuba (it's heavy to lug around, it requires a lot of lung power), so it's not surprising that there are so few female Tuba players.

So why is there no push to encourage more women to play the Tuba? Where's the outrage? If 50% of the population is female, then shouldn't that be reflected in the demographics of Tuba players? Why are there no female-only programs for Tuba players so they can master the instrument free of any intimidating male influence?

Well, despite the sheer size of the Tuba, it is not a prominent instrument, such as the Violin or the Piano. Aside from beer-garden oompah bands, the Tuba is mostly relegated to the background. There are few, if any, options for Tuba soloists, and if there are any tuba concertos out there, I've never heard of them. Every orchestra needs someone to play the tuba, but it is a low-status instrument, so no one cares about gender parity. Let the men dominate.

The feminist strategy is to take the high ground. Literally and figuratively, the highest ground in the orchestra is the conductor's podium. And this is the current feminist objective. To be sure, there are enablers out there.

In 2015, the Dallas Opera announced a 20-year program to recruit and groom women conductors. The Program was the brainchild of one Keith Cerny, Ph.D., General Director, and CEO of the Dallas Opera. "I have observed in many different settings the challenges that women face in establishing themselves in traditionally male-dominated fields," he observed. Of course, the battlefields of achievement have long been littered with the dead or crippled bodies of male washouts, but there's plenty more where they came from, right?

"My mother and several of her friends were among the first women to be admitted to Ph.D. programs in physics and chemistry at the University of California at Berkeley," Cerny continued. "This experience gave me some important early exposure to the challenges facing women in academia at that time."

Naturally, Cerny can't do it all by himself. The Dallas Opera, like almost all arts programs, depends on subsidies. Even the famed La Scala Opera in Milan depends on government support.

So it's no surprise that the Dallas Opera also depends on more than ticket sales, and local nabobs play a big part. The formal name of the women-only program is the Linda and Mitch Hart Institute for Women Conductors. The Harts are a local power couple with lengthy resumes listing membership on various boards of local institutions.

Support for the program was also provided by the Richard and Enika Schultze Foundation (named after another local power couple). Baker Botts, LLP, a Houston-headquartered, international, silk-stocking law firm (725 attorneys, 14 offices) that specializes in antitrust, bankruptcy, mergers, taxation, and other corporate matters. The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, a tax-free NGO ($5-6 billion endowment) named after the Pittsburgh banker, industrialist, and former Secretary of the Treasury. And The Arts Community Alliance (TACA), which includes an artist-in-residence fund which currently underwrites the presence of one Nicole Paiement, the Dallas Opera's Principal Guest Conductor, and supposedly a role model for the female applicants in the conductor program.

So all this female-friendliness is not the result of sit-ins by obese, shrieking, baton-wielding, purple-haired prima donnas. It has the imprimatur of the establishment. Call it gender equity, gender parity, gender balance, or whatever; it is no longer a leftist pipedream. It is now an entrenched subset of the broader diversity fetish that is a routine component of corporatespeak. The social and managerial elites have clasped these concepts to their bosom! So any social climber who aspires to elite status would do well to join the amen corner.

Any way you slice it, a female-only program reeks of affirmative action, but that term has acquired a bit of a stigma in recent years, so it is only rarely mentioned, particularly by people who have benefitted from it.

Ironically, Opera is already a heavily gynocentric universe. Without breaking down all the roles in all the operas ever staged, I think it's safe to say that females are hardly under-represented on stage. Female-oriented themes are rife, as romance and passion are front and center in the most popular Operas. In a sense, Opera is a romance novel writ large with musical accompaniment, so there is no shortage of high-profile roles for divas. "Opera is when…a tenor and soprano want to make love but are prevented from doing so by a baritone." That quip comes from "Opera Plots in One Sentence" on the classical music forum brightcecilia.com.

So female vocalists have nothing to complain about, but the same applies to female musicians. The blind audition process, in which musicians are heard and not seen, has resulted in more female musicians in orchestras than ever, and if a 50/50 ratio is never reached, it would be disingenuous to find fault with the audition process.

Obviously, the blind audition process would never work for a conductor as the musicians have to see the conductor. So the auditioning conductor's sex cannot be concealed. Of course, when a no-men-allowed policy is instituted, there's no need to guess.

I'm not a musician or a musicologist, and I couldn't begin to judge the relative merits of a group of conducting candidates, male, female, or mixed. Even if I listened to the same piece of music played back-to-back by two different conductors, I don't know that I could make a judgment call. Indeed, I have listened to CDs and records of the same symphony and don't hear much difference.

Of course, one does not see the conductor while listening to recorded music. To a large degree, the conductor's role is symbolic. He stands on an elevated platform at the front and center of the stage. (This is less obvious in opera where the performers are on stage, and the orchestra and conductor are in a pit.)

So the push for women conductors is largely symbolic. There are plenty of female vocalists and musicians. There's no shortage of women behind the scenes doing administration, fund-raising, and other tasks. For good measure, the Dallas Opera has a Women's Board (I scoured the website to see if they had a Men's Board but couldn't find one…must have been an oversight).

But it is not enough to be in control; one must be seen to be in control. When the lights go down, the conductor is the most visible member of the orchestra. A lack of female conductors means a lack of visible female supervision. So women are put on the fast track and paraded around like show dogs.

The Dallas Opera is a 501(c) (i.e., tax-free) organization, and while I'm no tax lawyer, I believe such organizations are obliged to follow the law of the land, in other words, not to engage in sex discrimination. The "minority outreach" they mention in their tax return posted online may be acceptable, but I don't see how they can get away with a program that openly discriminates against half the population. Talk about institutionalized sexism!

It would be interesting to see what would happen if a group of aspiring male conductors applied to the program and were turned away. Sounds like a lawsuit waiting to happen. Did the lawyers at Baker Botts sign off on this program or what?

But I guess I shouldn't be too critical, seeing as "The Dallas Opera is committed to producing opera of uncompromising quality, enriching the life of the community, and embracing its diverse, cultural heritage." At least, that's how they describe themselves on their tax return. You can see how they might think they can do no wrong since they are so pure of heart.

Ultimately, the program is much ado about nothing. There aren't that many opera companies; consequently, there are few openings for opera conductors. So selecting six promising female conductors every year for 20 years isn't going to produce much bang for the buck. Ultimately, even if the conductors are capable, they may be stigmatized as quota queens and subject to more scrutiny than their male counterparts.

In the world of opera, the only program less likely to produce results would be a program to foster female composers. The ultimate big daddies of opera are the composers, and there aren't many mommies out there.

Oh, wait a minute…this just in.

The National Opera America Center has announced the results of its new Opera Grants for Female Composers program. Eight female composers have just been awarded $100,000 ($12,500 apiece)!

Another lawsuit waiting to be filed?

Feminists' Patriarchal Worldview Inspired MGTOW

Tim Patten · 29 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The roots of radical feminism, as well as women's and gender studies initiatives, can be seen in a 1970s BBC documentary, Angry Wimmin (watch on YouTube), which offers insights on the origins of the women's movement. Among those featured is Sheila Jeffreys, an influential lesbian activist,[i] who speaks frankly about the movement's mission as a "dedicated war" on men (Feminist Patriarchy Theory[ii]). Over time, the radicalism espoused by Jeffreys and others has had an insidious effect, promulgating widespread distrust of male virtues. Sweeping women's rights propaganda has also altered the social landscape, undermining relationships between the sexes and transforming the once timeless ideals of love and marriage into relics of the past. The feminist patriarchy theory only divides the sexes and is fueling the popular phenomenon MGTOW, (Men Going Their Own Way).[iii]

In fact, millions of men have been forced to abandon hope of establishing and maintaining a genuine partnership or marriage with a member of the opposite sex. Evidenced and conceptualized by the wealthy and powerful Gloria Steinem who noted, "Society…encourages women to be victims every way."[iv] Notions like this, including descriptions of women as "chattel," are actively promoted by rebel feminists, strongly influenced by burgeoning women's and gender studies programs that characterize a primordial patriarchy as an institutionalized and socially acceptable framework for male domination over women.[v]

The extreme to which many single-minded activists have gone is frightening. In recent times, radicalized feminists have launched genocidal social media campaigns, labeled with monikers such as "#killallmen," "Control All Men,"[vi] "StraightWhiteMemes,"[vii] and "Kill All White Men."[viii] Under the guise as satire, these memes connect with growing numbers of females who can't help but resent men's place in society. This is unrestrained hate speech, and such propaganda engenders disturbing visions about harming and wielding power over males, going so far as to make killing men seem artistically relevant.[ix] This blatant male hatred is a catalytic agent for Men to Go Their Own Way and other movements such as the Red Pill[x] and Japan's Herbivore Men[xi].

Recently feminist, Anita Sarkeesian said: "There's a toxicity within gaming culture, and also in tech culture, that drives this misogynist hatred." Anita says "Everything is sexist!" Under the circumstances, it is not hard to see why many women have developed anger, resentment and contempt towards men, which can provoke desires and fantasies—as well as acts—of revenge. The relationship between the sexes has become a power play, where interactions are viewed in a harsh, zero-sum light. If women beat men by a wide margin on the playing field, the response is not "great job!" Instead, there are hostile taunts, such as "girls rule and boys drool!" Female empowerment has metamorphosed into an ugly vision of females overpowering males. Talk of "girl power" simply means pushing back against men. In retaliation, men are not pushing back. Instead, millions of men are discovering a lifestyle of freedom and success, away from women's disgust of all things male.

Hell Hath No Fury

Not all women are feminists and admittedly, there are some who believe that patriarchy, a social system characterized by male authority, is an illusion; others, meanwhile, have no doubt that the widespread oppression of women is evidence of its existence. The fact that those on the very upper reaches of the economic ladder, men and women own or control the vast majority of the world's assets, businesses and employees suggests there is no place or part of society that is not subordinate in some way to this particular structure—aside from a few matriarchal villages in Africa, perhaps, everything is patriarchy.

Whether accurate or not, something has clearly played havoc with the relationship between the sexes, creating a situation where, for example, marriage is increasingly a one-sided arrangement. While some women have embraced gender differences and are incredible mates, others have established fulcrums of male antipathy, moving them freely along a continuum that begins with caution and distrust, passes through resentment, and ends at hatred. Once she is offended; Hell hath no fury, and her vindication is reinforced by lawful bias. Paternity fraud is rampant, and women are divorcing at alarming rates meaning, men who are in love can easily find themselves in danger; they must develop a gendered lens so they can objectively evaluate current and future companions. Feminist's male hostility has served to convince more men that bachelorhood is the appropriate alternative. Japan's unique Herbivore Men,[xii] and MGTOW[xiii] ranks are growing daily.

The Modern Men's Liberation Movement

Regardless, it seems doubtful that any of the women's movements, densely populated with advocates and adherents who openly despise males, can help resolve the many important issues that men grapple with, including a pandemic of male suicides. Feminists are less interested in equality than in creating a new world order, where women only come first. For a growing number of them, their focus has increasingly become oriented toward males' demise through social and legal manipulations.

Because of these and other distorted perspectives, masses of men have made the decision to opt out, leaving the pain and destructiveness behind. They are embracing movements and efforts such as Japan's Herbivore Men, where marriage apathy is endangering the global economy.[xiv] Feminist's lopsided societal framework has systematically stacked romantic relationships against boys and men; thus the outgrowth of Red Pill and MGTOW, forums aimed at helping men understand that the benefits for males of marital bliss are almost nil.

The fact that the ideals of radical feminism have become so pervasive and entrenched suggests the only way things can improve has been to join hands with others who believe the modern world's future can and will be incredible for men. Indeed, it is apparent that this perspective is gaining momentum. A hurricane of men's liberation awareness—MGTOW, Red Pill, and Japan's Herbivore Men—is circling the planet, unleashing freedom and empowering men to define and follow their unique, and uniquely masculine, paths. It is a new day for men: knowledge and freedom are at their fingertips partially due to feminism. They now have the opportunity to design the kind of passionate life that they might once have only dreamed about.

Please consider petitioning Congress by adding your name to Warren Farrell's White House Council on Boys and Men[xv] (sign the petition here).

*****

[i] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sheila_Jeffreys

[ii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Patriarchy

[iii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Men_Going_Their_Own_Way

[iv] http://www.brainyquote.com/quotes/quotes/g/gloriastei690605.html

[v] http://www.socialistalternative.org/it-doesnt-have-to-be-like-this/have-women-always-been-oppressed/

[vi] http://www.smartgirlpolitics.com/taxpayer-funded-professor-advocated-for-men-control/

[vii] https://www.tumblr.com/tagged/kill-all-men

[viii] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3262281/University-equality-officer-allegedly-tweeted-kill-white-men-charged-sending-threatening-message.html

[ix] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/SCUM_Manifesto

[x] https://www.reddit.com/r/TheRedPill/

[xi] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Herbivore_men

[xii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Herbivore_men

[xiii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Men_Going_Their_Own_Way

[xiv] https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/worldviews/wp/2013/10/22/japans-sexual-apathy-is-endangering-the-global-economy/

[xv] http://www.warrenfarrell.name/

Can you discern differences in the cries of babies?

AVfM Video Source · 2 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.facebook.com/stephanie.helpern/videos/1027108507319672/

Feature image by Sean Brady

The Regressive Left defined

AVfM Video Source · 2 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We hear the term “Regressive Left” used a lot these days. If you aren’t entirely sure what that means, don’t worry. Chris Ray is here to help.

Matthew Drake

Bachelorhood, men going their own way are saving lives

Tim Patten · 2 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Modern romance, notably love and marriage, is failing. Every year, millions of American couples see their relationships fall apart. For many males, however, the result is not something to get upset about. In fact, a growing number of divorced men are discovering their true purpose in life. They are moving themselves, friends and society toward something better, joining with large communities of men who've already rejected the glamorization of love and marriage. Bachelorhood and initiatives such as Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) are helping to rebuild esteem and save men's lives.

The truth is, women and society as a whole have been rallying support for eons behind the institution of marriage. Among other things, it's been claimed that unmarried men die earlier than their married counterparts, which has helped to glorify matrimonial sanctimony. The justifications haven't only been positive, however. Another, more harmful stereotype, which maintains that something is "wrong" or "a loser" with men who are not married, first emerged during Victorian times.

Sadly, many males have also drunk the relationship Kool-Aid. They have frightened and urged other men into marriage; wasting hard-earned dollars on a façade of happy nuptials. Together with a social history built on America's family-farming origins, men have felt compelled to rush headlong into coupling immediately after leaving high school or college.

But things have changed. A modern counterculture phenomenon is helping to reject old school values at the same time as millions are discovering the nuptial bomb that can explode when men and women become entangled. As a result, many men have decided enough is enough, and they are rejecting matrimony's unhealthy consequences. Movements such as MGTOW, Japan's Herbivore Men, and Red Pill awareness are offering the education that young men should know to be successful in today's world.

Men Are Being Saved

In fact, recent comments from those who are involved in such efforts have yielded interesting insights into the benefits of the new bachelorhood. One individual who monitors posts at a popular MGTOW website said, "in 2015, there [had] been six private emails from members sharing that MGTOW discovery saved their lives." A second moderator noted, "MGTOW saves thousands of lives. Thousands of them." Moreover, a commenter wrote, "First, I do not believe MGTOW saved my life. I would say it saved my sanity and for me, the sky has been the limit since. After finding out I am not alone, it has made me feel free."

How Do Men Discover MGTOW

Men often conduct Google searches about divorce in the hope of gaining a first-hand understanding from those who have experienced the pain of losing a wife, children, and property. In many cases, they stumble upon MGTOW forums and videos, where they find camaraderie, a compassionate ear, and helpful lessons centered on the tyranny of a divorced mate. In these forums, they can vent and repair wounds. They may also hear about a movie, Divorce Corporation, which explores the large-scale devastation that men have been confronted with. While MGTOW contributors are usually anonymous, they freely share their all-to-common experiences. Below are two examples:

Anonymous Share MGTOW 01

> At 51 years old and fresh out of a divorce. Divorce made me realize that I have never been in a reciprocal relationship. By that I mean that I have never been with anyone that treated me as well as I treated them. I was always telling them how much I loved them. And my reward for treating someone well was always either being lied to or cheated on. Most importantly, my energy was drained out of me.
>
> Now I view relationships as an exchange of energy. People with positive energy have a place in my life, people with negative energy, or people that steal other people's energy, are dismissed. My life is so much more > positive and rewarding since making this decision. MGTOW gave me the understanding that my life is just that, MY LIFE. Not being responsible for someone else's daily happiness gives me the freedom to focus on my own level of happiness and contentment. As a result I am a better father, better friend, and overall a better person.

Anonymous Share MGTOW 02

> The divorce law is corrupt and rules the land. When an institution of government turns "broken arrow", such as it did here by self-destruction, the only option is to take measures necessary (constitutional equivalent to GO YOUR OWN WAY). The future for men and marriage is much more grim than it is now as so many of the gynocentric laws haven't had time to ferment and fester, the ones we do see fermented and festering has caused a stampede of men fleeing women, marriage, and the gauntlet of gynocentric binding laws.

Some MGTOW Begin Self-Discovery

> For many men, the moment of truth can arrive suddenly, triggered, perhaps, by a relationship gone sour. They have an epiphany and discover the "Red Pill"—a phrase from the film, The Matrix, describing the awareness of a painful truth, bursting forth from blissful ignorance or an illusionary reality. Red Pill moments represent an awakening, of sorts, from the fantasies of love and marriage. For some, it can take decades; for those who are more visionary (or luckier), the realization occurs early on, as comments from other contributors will attest:

Anonymous Share MGTOW 03

> When I discovered MGTOW it was the slap in the face I needed to snap me out of my enforced Disney funded stupor. I was to be Prince Charming to my Cinderella, It was hard and I was very close to ending my life… very close. One day the sound of children laughing and playing in a school yard saved me for that day. MGTOW understanding gave me the rest of my 'bonus time' here on earth.

Anonymous Share MGTOW 04

> I'm a young guy, 23 years old, and I've had a red pill type of mindset for a while because I grew up around examples of how marriage isn't the wonderful experience it's proponents claim it is. I watched how my mom treated my dad (no respect and hypocrisy). My parents raised me in a church, where I got to watch a bunch of tired and pathetic looking husbands follow their wives around, almost lifeless. When I spoke to these men about my hobbies, they would get excited and I could tell that they miss the freedom of being single, the time when they were actually able to live their lives and pursue their happiness. To top it all off, the sermons in church were often about how the man needs to do better. In my extended family, my uncle never married and he has always been one of the more interesting and happiest guys I know. Despite being single, he doesn't fit the "loser" stereotype. He is a very hard worker, seems to have all the money he'd ever need, and gets to spend lots of time with his friends (those people the married guys aren't allowed to have).
>
> When I graduated, I have to admit, I was a little confused. Before finding the MGTOW community, I didn't really know what to think of myself. I never forgot my early memories, but the school system had me kind of confused. They put that "real man" garbage in my head and I started to doubt myself a little bit. Last summer, I finally found the manosphere and soon enough MGTOW. Things finally clicked. All the observations I made in the past made more sense; the pieces of the puzzle finally came together. Maybe MGTOW hasn't "saved my life" since I was skeptical of marriage early on, but it has definitely made it better. I don't have to doubt myself about this anymore.

Is MGTOW a Healthy Lifestyle?

Can a single life be healthy? Sayings such as “behind every good man, there’s a woman” and “the way to a man’s heart is through his stomach” suggest that men who don’t enjoy these so-called advantages invariably suffer for it. Nowadays, people laugh at these old wives tails, decrying them as sexist nonsense, pure and simple. Equality is the watchword in the modern world: women don’t need to be subservient to males, and men can readily navigate life’s journey without a wife as two other commentators point out:

Anonymous Share MGTOW 05

> Well, as for myself most of the positive aspects of being MGTOW have been a profound clarity with regards to women’s nature in general as well as in personal situations hence: easier decision making. I am better focused on my personal goals and career. I am generally harder to get bribed or entangled with bad people. I am more bullshit proof. At first I had red pill rage and that decreased in time as my own dignity increased. I have less stress/worries over rather inane issues. I have an easier life / more laid-back-style and more personal freedom. My life is completely different now since going MGTOW, I’m getting promoted again! I have ended hate towards everyone.

Anonymous Share MGTOW 06

> Going my own way is very enjoyable and I’m not willing to trade that for the supposedly wonderful experience of marriage. … I’m about to graduate with a degree in computer engineering from a prestigious university with absolutely no debt, my novel is almost done, my piano playing is getting nothing but better, I have my health, energy, a functioning body, and a functioning mind.

Conclusion

There are undoubtedly obstacles ahead for MGTOW, but history reveals that men are remarkable and the most resourceful beings on the planet. As they have done in the past, men will learn to overcome these and any other problems that may challenge the future survival of the bachelorhood lifestyle. At one time, single guys were stigmatized as losers—or worse—but not now. MGTOW are discovering independence, self-esteem, time and resources for personal interests and development, as well as the benefits of freeing themselves from outdated traditions and others’ expectations.

In sum, the Brotherhood of MGTOW continues to grow, evolve and define new lifestyles, and to inspire a greater appreciation for what men are good at solving problems, harnessing the world around us, and building communities. The difference this time, though, is that the brothers are doing it for themselves.

What does Men’s Rights do for women?

AVfM Video Source · 3 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Men’s Rights has absolutely empowered me as a woman. Here is why.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HA0On6n7kWA&feature=youtu.be&ab_channel=StefanieNicholas

Stefanie Nicholas

Parity Pledge Zombies

Doug Mortimer · 3 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The virus is spreading, and it's eating into everyone's brains, rendering human beings incapable of critical thought. The virus I speak of is the parity pledge, and it was loosed on the world on March 8, 2016. For now, the pledge is voluntary, albeit encouraged by various government entities, corporations, NGO's, and high-profile individuals. As the virus spreads, will it mutate into from voluntary to mandatory? Are we all doomed to be parity pledge zombies?

Just type "pledgeforparity" into your search engine and check out the results. I got about 343,000 hits. Start scrolling through the results and it quickly becomes apparent that the only type of parity they're talking about is gender parity. And not regarding draft registration.

The parity pledge was an integral part of the International Women's Day "celebration." This was hardly a seat-of-the-pants, spontaneous posting but a well-orchestrated and coordinated effort.

Supposedly, the pledge came about because of some number crunching by the World Economic Forum pertaining to the late 21st Century and the early 22nd Century. Well, I'm always skeptical of computer models anyway (you know, garbage in, garbage out), especially ones that make predictions about what the world will be like more than 100 years from now. Is anyone smart enough to write a program that takes into account every war, revolution, technological advance, demographic change, ecological disaster, political development, and sundry other events that might occur in the next ten decades?

At any rate, in 2014, the World Economic Forum predicted that "true global gender parity," whatever that means, wouldn't be achieved till 2095. Oh, poo! Most of us won't live to see it!

Then just one year later, the WEF re-crunched the numbers and announced that the egalitarian utopia wouldn't arrive till 2133! In other words, a baby girl born today will live in chains her whole life unless she lives to be 107.

If you put any stock in these predictions, you would likely conclude that the Feminist Express had lost a lot of steam from 2014 to 2015, and that should be no surprise. As polls show, more and more women are distancing themselves from the dreaded "f" word. But feminism is still an essential item on the elites' global goals agenda, and they refuse to let it die a natural death.

So how to give the women's movement a booster shot? By starting a pledge campaign!

If you want to do your part, you can go to the International Women's Day website and make a pledge to:

> Help women and girls achieve their ambitions

[because boys always operate under optimum conditions and never fail to achieve their ambitions]

> Challenge conscious and unconscious bias

[because lawyers, bureaucrats, politicians, talking heads, policy wonks, and "cultural critics" just don't have enough to keep them busy]

> Call for gender-balanced leadership

[because it's bulletproof virtue signaling]

> Value women and men's contributions equally

[regardless of how valuable or negligible those "contributions" may be]

> Create inclusively, flexible cultures

[because they are easier for globalist elitists to manipulate…not like those pesky Muslims]

The number of people and organizations who took the pledge is mind-boggling. All walks of life are represented to legitimize the concept of gender parity. Maybe you think gender parity is bunk or – horror of horrors – maybe you've never even heard of the concept. Well, you may be hidebound, but you're not hopeless. The remedy is simple. Just take the pledge and climb aboard.

There's no way I can convey the vastness of this parity pledge apocalypse, but let's look at a few representative samples.

Predictably, various celebs, such as Taylor Swift, Gal Gadot, and Gillian Anderson took the pledge. Somewhat lower on the showbiz food chain, there was a program called "Turn the Tables on Gender Gaps in Dance Music." To back up the pledge, the recommended action was for DJ's to feature only the work of female producers, musicians, and songwriters on International Women's Day.

One website, www.christiantoday.com, features an article by one Dr.Elaine Storkey, a sociologist and theologian, who assures us that the pledge for parity is compatible with Christianity. Well, I'm not a card-carrying theologian, but I've read through the New Testament a few times, and I don't recall the subject ever coming up. In fact, Christ's board of directors (a/k/a disciples) was all men!

Upping the ante from pledge to practice, the National Film Board of Canada proudly announced that henceforth half the films it finances will be directed by women. (Justin Trudeau strikes again?) Don't know whether or not you like chick flicks, hockey fans, but your tax dollars are going to subsidize them even if no one shows up to see them.

Believe it or not, a global warming website, climatesolutions.org, asserts that gender parity can fight global warming while admitting that women make 80% of the consumer choices that affect climate. So are they laying a guilt trip on women? Oh, no! You see, the solution is more women in leadership!

Predictably, lots of corporations (Virgin Air and Ericsson are two of the more recognizable) are represented. I've never heard of a lot of the companies, but they all seem to involve indoor jobs with no heavy lifting. I didn't see any companies where people got their hands dirty growing food, drilling for oil, manufacturing automobiles, making steel, pouring concrete, putting up buildings, grading highways, and doing other needful things.

Well, these days we hear a lot about public-private partnerships, and the parity pledge appears to be one such fusion. It's no surprise that various government spokesmen (sorry, spokes*persons*!) have taken the pledge. At the gov.uk website, for example, one Bharat Joshi, British Deputy High Commissioner "wholeheartedly" pledges his fealty to gender parity. Typically, he does the good news/bad news shuffle: "We have much to celebrate," but the "glacial pace of progress" is unacceptable.

In Australia, the City of Ryde, a suburb of Sydney, had a two-hour program at the civic center where people could take the pledge and share "experiences, expertise and contribute to the planning of a series of workshops that aim to empower Ryde women of all ages in achieving their ambitions." All that, plus morning tea!

One of the recurring buzz phrases is "Gender-balanced leadership." One day soon it may be as sacred as "diversity" or "sustainability." In other words, it is a concept that is absolutely, positively beyond reproach, and if anyone questions it…hmm, better keep an eye on that guy.

The word "balanced" is key. With few exceptions, balance has good connotations, while imbalance has bad connotations! As a result, "gender-balanced leadership" sounds warm and fuzzy, doesn't it? Not stark like "quotas" or mean-spirited like "affirmative action."

This global pledge of allegiance to gender balance (do you put your right hand over your genitals when you take the oath?) was probably inevitable. The United Nations charter, drafted in 1945, says it is "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." These sentiments may be global, but they are hardly earth-shaking.

Then mission creep rears its ugly head. Predictably, "fundamental freedoms" morphs into equality: "It is absolutely essential that gender equality is promoted and ensured through internationally agreed strategies, standards, programs and goals, such as the Sustainable Development Goal on gender equality."

Well, once you go from freedom to equality, the next stop is quotas and timetables. And the UN is now on board with that. They are currently promoting a program called "Planet 50-50 by 2030: Step it up for Gender Equality."

Sounds like an ambitious goal, but some people don't want to wait till 2030. One of the parity pledgers is Kevin Maggiacomo, CEO of Sperry Van Ness, a commercial real estate outfit. He was "a man on a mission to create gender-balanced leadership in all organizations worldwide by the year 2020," so he did a TEDx talk on same and started a movement (see 5050×2020.org).

In fact, Maggiacomo has a pledge of his own, and you can sign it at the website. This one says simply "I am in favor of creating a better world by achieving a healthy gender balance in leadership by 2020." Geez, that's only four years from now! Like Jerry Reed sings in Smokey and the Bandit, "We've got a long way to go and a short time to get there."

The pledge section of the website includes numerous comments (the usual platitudes and pablum) from people who have taken the pledge. Nothing to see here, folks…until you get to a telling comment made by some guy named John Macliver, who says:

Gender balance means leveraging 100% of the working population as opposed to half.

Think about that for a minute. Maybe that's what all this folderol is really about.

Remember, the number crunching that inspired the pledge came from the World Economic Forum, not the American Association of University Women, the National Organization for Women, Mary Sue, Jezebel, or any other women's group. No, it was a bunch of economists. Apparently tired of counting beans, they have turned to counting vaginas.

Well, practitioners of the dismal science are rarely characterized as bleeding hearts, so why the interest in gender parity? I have two words for you: (1) supply, and (2) demand.

Barring government intervention, wages will be subject to supply and demand. Inject large numbers of women into the workforce and it will depress wages. Since women are generally willing to work for less than men, the effect of their participation is even worse than injecting more men into the system. But keeping wages (i.e., costs) down is good for business, so it must be good for society, right? "The chief business of the American people is business." Calvin Coolidge's very words way back in 1925. That philosophy has since gone global.

All right, so business has an interest in getting more women into the workforce. But what about all those government entities? What's their motivation for taking the pledge, aside from virtue signaling? Well, more women doing paid work means not only more family income but more state and federal income tax revenue. And putting more women in the workforce means more disposable family income for non-essential goods and services, which means more sales tax revenue for the states.

The stay-at-home wife is a bad global citizen because no matter how much or how little work she does, none of it can be taxed!

The modern American wife cooking and taking care of her kids at home…bad! The modern American wife earning money to pay for child care workers and take-out food…good!

Third world women weaving and sewing at home…bad! Third world women sewing in sweatshops for low wages…good!

Also, keep in mind the increasing numbers of men, MGTOW or whatever, who are opting out of the rat race. If men work only enough to take care of their own needs and wants, then that represents a lot of lost taxable income. Bad for the state, but good for individual men. As the protagonist of Robert Heinlein's Starship Troopers (published in 1959) put it, "I had to prove to myself that I was a man. Not just a producing, consuming economic animal…but a man."

If women want to be reduced to producing, consuming animals, then have at it. Better you than us. Maybe one day you'll discover there's more to womanhood than being an economic animal.

Previous generations of men fell for it. Now it's the women's turn to be suckers. But, ladies, just because you're a worker doesn't mean you're consigned to a treadmill. You can rise through the ranks! See, here's living proof! Look at the makeup of our board!

Of course, the more women in the workforce, the lower the birthrate goes. I have read some conspiracy theorist claims that reducing the world's population is another key item on the elitist agenda. I don't know if it's on the agenda or not, but fewer people is the inevitable effect of more women working during their peak fertility years. On the bright side, fewer people means less social justice warriors.

One day soon "Parity Pledge" verbiage may join the mandatory "Equal Opportunity Employer" boilerplate on the company bulletin board. Given the wedding of government and commerce, is it too much to speculate that one day taking the pledge may be much like a loyalty oath during the McCarthy era? Refuse to take the pledge; then the job offer will be rescinded.

Even worse, your refusal may make you a person of interest to the government. You might end up on a no-fly list. You might get a visit from the FBI or Homeland Security. The definition of terrorist has proved to be remarkably elastic.

If I live long enough, maybe one day I'll be hauled off to a re-education center where I will be transformed from a dissident into an upstanding global citizen.

Then again, given my advanced years, they'll probably just burn me at the stake. If that's what it takes to keep me from turning into a gender-parity zombie, then so be it.

#AbleismExists! (No it doesn't)

AVfM Video Source · 4 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I'm sick of it. Only Social Justice could make disabled people simultaneously love their affliction and loathe themselves.

Shannon speaks out against SJWs and Feminism often from her perspective as a physically challenged person; please support her by subscribing to her YouTube Channel.

The Danger of Empathy

AVfM Video Source · 4 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Popular culture holds that women are more empathetic than men. Is that true?

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DjP-aetLZls&ab_channel=JanetBloomfield

Janet Bloomfield

How will Nominee Trump pander to women?

August Løvenskiolds · 4 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A few moments ago, Ohio Governor John Kasich dropped his Presidential bid, making Donald Trump the lone survivor and presumptive winner of the Republican nomination. News and political commentators across the board are wondering: how will Trump now pivot and "appeal" – in other words, pander – to the women voters who supposedly hold him in low regard?

Women are 52% of voters, and so technically women control the outcome of all elections in ways that men do not: should women desire it, no man could ever win elective office. Men cannot control elections in the same way because men as a class are not the majority of voters. That's right, feminists: your alleged "patriarchy" was created and maintained by the female electorate. Everything elected officials do is the responsibility of women as a class, not men. It is all YOUR fault, not men.

Now, calling The Donald an "unconventional candidate" understates the radical ways he has reshaped both campaigning and the Republican party but still, pundits claiming to spout conventional wisdom hold that Trump must increase his appeal to women voters if he is to have any chance of beating Hillary Clinton (or maybe Bernie Sanders) in November.

This is bullshit.

Hillary Clinton's own efforts to pander to women, and finally, coerce them with threats of hellfire, have backfired badly for her – the unlikely insurgent Sanders has captured the ballots of millions of Democratic women. If a feminist woman candidate cannot capture her own constituents, why should Trump try any of her failed tactics himself?

Should Trump pick a woman as his Vice Presidential running mate? This has been tried before, to poor effect, the latest case being Carly Fiorina's killing of Trump rival Ted Cruz's campaign in less than a week!

The most intriguing choice of female VP from the world of politics is New Mexico GOP Governor Susana Martinez, who would be a twofer: a double pander to both the Hispanic and Vaginal communities. New Mexico's electoral vote is small but a Hispanic name on the ticket might flip states like Florida and even California into the GOP column, or so Trump might hope.

The problem, of course, is that making a political choice – a VP from the world of politics – would openly contradict Trump's anti-politician brand and instincts. Politicians have made America weak in the world, he thinks, but businessmen can make the US great again. Still, Trump has suggested he will become more "Presidential" in bearing, and giving Trump's seeming unpredictability, a political choice will at least be considered for VP.

If he wishes to choose a woman from the world of business, there is, of course, Carly Fiorina, who has already been forced out of the campaign twice – perhaps the third time is a charm? Seducing Carly would certainly be a great "unity" gesture from Trump but unlikely, one would think – she is still befouled with Ted Cruz's funk and her record as a businesswoman is poor. This should be the true deal-breaker for Trump: as a pragmatic tactician he won't care about Carly's sordid political record but her sordid business chops will get her chopped from consideration.

A woman from the business world Trump might consider is Sheryl "Lean In" Sandberg, the billionaire COO of Facebook. She is a successful author and businessperson like Trump himself; Trump and the recently widowed Sandberg would make a formidable pair that would make progressives like TrigglyPuff fling her toddler arms so fiercely they would surely fly off her well-marbled torso.

Asking a recent widow to be his running mate would strike a chord of sympathy with women that would ring on for months. It would be a masterstroke worthy of The Donald.

Would this be “playing the Woman Card,” a tactic Trump has denounced? Trump could well argue that he chose Sandberg for her business experience. Sandberg also served as the Chief of Staff for Larry Summers, a Bill Clinton appointee who also ran afoul of feminists, so she has actual executive political experience, something Trump lacks, and since she is so wealthy, she fits the model of someone who cannot be purchased by special interests.

Would Sandberg cross over to the Republicans, and would Republicans accept her as VP? Both would be hard sells, but to say that such is beyond The Donald would be foolhardy.

But he won’t.

I don’t think Trump will play the woman card, or go out of his way to pander to women voters at all. It is not his style, and if he doesn’t know it yet, he will learn that pandering to women is a trap that destroys men and all their endeavors. The patriarchy that women voters created and maintain exists because that is how women want it – no female VP choice has ever helped a man to victory. Furthermore, women naturally colonize male spaces like Trump’s campaign and he needs to do nothing except keep on being Trump to benefit from this.

So pander not to women, Mr. Trump. Let them figure out on their own that Hillary and Bernie will be a nightmare for them.

Emotionally underdeveloped husbands

Tim Patten · 4 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Society has decided that males are terrible communicators who are not in touch with their emotions. In fact, psychologists often maintain that emotions frighten men, and many don't know what or how they are feeling.[i] The perception that males are emotionally "stunted" often leads females to be upset with them or to pressure them to be more open about what is on their mind. "He just won't talk," frustrated wives complain,[ii] while others take a more assertive tack— "Share yourself!" they say. If he doesn't come around, it means there is something wrong with him.[iii]

Experts point to the fact that little boys are discouraged from crying or opening up about their feelings as some sort of proof that men are toxic, emotionless and without passion. This theme is pervasive in the media and the arts, at colleges and in other educational settings, and in the discussions and interactions that punctuate daily life, but men have been wrongly stereotyped. The fact is that men and women both have feelings, but they exhibit and express them in different ways.

Men are not dispassionate and unloving; they love deeply and enjoy the tingling textures of the world around them. Internal emotions inform and navigate their behavioral decisions, choices, and rational judgments. Like women, they experience pain in relationships, joy, and everyday thrills, and can connect with other people on many levels. However, men do not process certain aspects and interactions, including intimate relationships, in the same way as women do. This primarily reflects social conditions and a framework embedded in 400,000 years of human DNA.[iv]

And yet, women can't help but complain about it. They want their male partners to emote or, perhaps, to cry more. Since many of them express their feelings in this way, they believe men should do so, too. But there is something fundamentally wrong with such assertions. Males are being evaluated based on a female-oriented sensitivity meter, which means the yardstick for emotional responsiveness is inherently biased. Because men are deemed inadequate according to this standard, they are assumed to be severely lacking.

But this is not fair or accurate. Men and women are not equal. There is a broad range of social and physiological differences between them. That doesn't only mean the obvious differences between males and females; research has shown that the brains of each sex are hard-wired in contrary neuro pathways. In other words, men and women process emotions by way of different behaviors, patterns, at different times and circumstances.[v] They also communicate emotions differently.[vi]

A Common Complaint about Husbands

It is not uncommon to hear a stay-at-home wife or mother complain about a husband who comes home from a long day at work, heaves a sigh of relief, flops his ass down, and zones out in front of a computer screen.[vii] Invariably, female insecurities bubble to the surface. She is disgusted by his escape into video games.[viii] Her inferiority complex kicks into high gear. She wonders if he has fallen out of love and begins to question their relationship. Because they—or she—expected marriage would make things better, they end up arguing—on average, seven times every day.[ix][x]

Why some men escape to the computer. Since the beginning of time, men have been conditioned to avoid causing emotional distress to women and to protect their feelings. At the same time, females have groomed males to lie whenever necessary. Regardless of how he might feel, a man must tell his woman that she is beautiful, pretty and skinny and that he loves her unconditionally. He must tell her lies each and every day, or else she will experience severe emotional pain.

If a man speaks the truth— "Life has exhausted me." "I hate my boss and job." "The pressure is too much." "I wish I could quit, but we need the paycheck." "Your bickering is damaging me further."—he understands that it will cause her serious emotional harm, leading to escalating arguments and the perception that she is unloved. If that happens, he knows the rest of his life will be hell. It is better to suppress what could be seen as an emotional assault on the woman he loves.

Wives Complain about Husbands

Although times have changed, many couples continue to see their relationship in traditional terms. For her part, a stay-at-home wife or mother will focus on maintaining the family's accommodations. She decorates and structures the living space to ensure no harm comes to the children. She also implements rules and regulations that tightly control the nest and all of those inside. Under the circumstances, if hubby comes home from work, reaches for a beer, sits in front of the TV and clams up, instead of doing what she asks, it isn't long before they enter the relationship battle zone.

Why some men escape with beer and TV. Profit-making enterprises invariably harness and monitor an employee's efforts and abilities by way of rules and the overarching threat that those who don't go along will not be employed long. Unless a man works for the government or a university, he is usually overseen and pressured by an owner, manager or director. Once at home, he needs time to breathe and allow the pressures from work to seep into the cosmic ether. He needs an escape.

What often happens, however, is that when he walks through the door, he is confronted by the expectations of the boss of the domestic empire. After succumbing to the demands of overseers at his job, he is pressured into taking on the duties and obligations imposed by his wife. To many men, this is simply more work. If a man is burdened on the job and at home, he will often escape through alcohol and other substance use.

Without freedom, men become hampered and suppress their genuine selves. Many cherish liberty and independence; once they leave work, they must refresh their souls with a drink of the tasty sovereignty juice. They savor it and let it quench their thirst, replenishing natural virtues. Not all men escape in the same way, of course. Some seek solace through fishing and hunting, reminding them of their place on our planet.

Academia's Attacks on Men

The pressures men face don't just come from home and work. Authors of women's and gender studies textbooks, for example, spend a tremendous amount of time blaming males for all sorts of problems. In Chapter 12, "How Men Silence Women in Marital Relationships,"[xi] of Language and Gender,[xii] which examines the differences in communication between the sexes, Victoria Leto DeFrancisco details a social experiment that "proved" husbands dominate wives through everyday conversations. Her research involved placing recorders inside married couples' homes and later analyzing what they said. Below is one such conversation, between "Clair" and "Bob":

> Clair: I went to Safeway food market today.
>
> Bob: Ah-ha.
>
> Clair: I ran into your mother.
>
> Bob: Ran into who?
>
> Clair: Your mother—she didn't recognize me or know who I was.
>
> Bob: Ahhh.
>
> Clair: She was at the meat counter and I looked right at her.
>
> Bob: I'll be right back, I need a cigarette.
>
> Clair: (When Bob returns.) So I followed her up an aisle. She never looked back.
>
> Bob: Well, my mom has tunnel vision.
>
> Clair: And I talked to Duane today, for my dental appointment.
>
> Bob: Let me go feed the dogs.

According to Dr. DeFrancisco, the wives she studied felt patronized and “put down,” and believed their husbands were “fake listening.” Her conclusion was that women try to talk but that men stubbornly dominate them with patronizing behavior and by ignoring what they say.

An alternative explanation for what happened between Clair and Bob. Family and social drama disturbs many men but seems to turn on no small number of women. Regardless, in the conversation detailed above, it is just as likely that something else was going on. Perhaps Bob didn’t enjoy discussing the fragile relationship between his mother and his wife. He knows there is friction and that there is no remedy to this particular situation. Since a man’s brain is hardwired to solve problems, he sees no point in confronting his mother. Over time, Bob has become acutely sensitive to his wife’s emotional issues with his mother and is tired of arguing about it.

In reality, it is unfair for Clair to expect Bob to straighten out his mother’s problems or to put up with endless family relationship drama. Unfortunately, while the latter can easily disgust many men, they can’t simply tell their wives to “shut up!” If they do, they will likely end up spending a week sleeping on the couch. In the end, they decide to keep quiet about the all-to-common drama involving a wife and other members of the extended families. Such struggles might be interesting fodder for television, but they can also lead men to snap.

Like many other women’s studies authors, Dr. DeFrancisco has cast unfair aspersions on all males. These so-called academics appear wholly ignorant of the biological differences between the sexes and the workings of the brain.

Conclusion

For the most part, wives, therapists, and academics continue to have a serious misunderstanding about men, masculinity, and the emotional male. Like the women at a coffee klatch who keep telling old wives tails about defective hubby failures, there are plenty of people who still don’t get how men communicate and operate. Little boys do cry and men are emotionally sensitive. When a man falls in love, the feeling is so overwhelming that he is often imbued with the urge to care for his lover forever. Men shouldn’t be faulted because they aren’t like women. Ignorant and damaging stereotypes should be disregarded, and men should be appreciated for who they are.

Throughout history, men have willingly sacrificed their lives for others, demonstrating deep loyalty, affection, and respect for their fellow humans—male or female. Men have built our civilizations and have passionately reached for the stars. Some men set their aspirations on mastering unsurmountable obstacles, seeking cures, and innovations that benefit all humankind. Others choose an alternative course. Regardless, for those who are seeking freedom from the entanglements of destructive relationships, there is an option worth considering: Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). Around the world, men are finding mentorship into a new lifestyle of single-man happiness that is financially and emotionally nourishing and amazing.

*****

References:

[i] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/emotional-fitness/201008/men-women-emotions-and-communication

[ii] http://www.uncommon-knowledge.co.uk/psychology_articles/men-women-emotions.html

[iii] http://www.cnn.com/2010/LIVING/11/15/tf.emotional.men/

[iv] http://www.ibtimes.com/oldest-human-dna-400000-years-old-why-do-scientists-call-discovery-irritating-1495796

[v] http://www.fitbrains.com/blog/women-men-brains/

[vi] https://www.natcom.org/CommCurrentsArticle.aspx?id=749

[vii] http://couplestherapyinc.com/emotional-distance-in-marriage/

[viii] https://realtruth.org/articles/346-vgaefr.html

[ix] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1389002/Fallout-Couples-argue-average-seven-times-day.html

[x] http://www.womenofspirit.com/?id=147

[xi] http://das.sagepub.com/content/2/4/413.abstract

[xii] http://www.amazon.com/Language-Gender-Reader-Jennifer-Coates/dp/1405191279/ref=sr_1_3?ie=UTF8&qid=1461271206&sr=8-3&keywords=language+and+gender

ME-TERNITY LEAVE?

AVfM Video Source · 5 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Ah, childbirth! Six weeks of quiet reflection! Author Meghann Foye thinks ALL women should be entitled to maternity leave. Who needs maternity to get maternity leave?

BillWhittleChannel

Swatting GamerGaters...

Clint Carpentier · 5 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Old news I know. However, there was a story on the radio the other day that hit a little close to home, and it got me thinking. Just what is the result the false callers are hoping? Do they even care about the ramifications of the actions they take?

I live up in the wholly wild northern half of British Columbia. I'm surrounded by native reserves and wealthy retirement communities… and resource extraction towns. It's not what I would call danger central. We have our ups and downs, and the occasional weird shit is going on, but hey, people are people, and life is fucked that way.

There's this out of the way retirement town which sports maybe 300 people in it. A family got swatted, a 75yo mother was shot dead, followed by her 39yo son. Here is what I can gather. The police were called, from a nearby town, for a case of hostile gunfire; this is a half hour drive for the cops, under normal driving speeds. They surrounded the house, and when she exited the house, she was shot for appearing threatening, and when her son came out he was shot. The father claims the son was mentally deficient. This is a town where if someone spits in your face, it's front page news; so what the ever living fuck???

I've been thinking about this over the weekend. I don't know if this has anything to do with #gamergate (GG), but let me take you down the rabbit hole of wonder I've been wrestling with.

The bulk of gamers are from my generation, about 30-45yo; I'm 39. I have vague memories of Atari, arcades; my first console was a Nintendo NES; nor am I the smartest person in the neighborhood. I'm not a gamer, so much as I have a handful of games which I enjoy, but I support #gamergate. Here's where things get ugly…

Several GG's have been swatted, have any been killed? I don't know; I'm not up to date on that. MundaneMatt took the initiative to cover his ass before he got swatted; thus, he was given the opportunity to cooperate before they tackled him. Even so… what steps have GG's, particularly the vocal GG's, taken to ensure we know something happened to them.

Was this swatting related to GG? We may never know. The police report says they are investigating, but blatantly state that they will not be releasing further details for the foreseeable future. You now know the total of what I know (minus location).

Let's entertain the idea that it is a GG swatting. Unless I'm much mistaken, there would be only one person who would know about it, and that would be the false caller. As for the rest of us, those up to date on GG that is, all we would know, is that someone (probably a ridiculous name like "shitfarter_69er") just vanished from the internet, just up and walked away from his activism, just suddenly quit arguing the cause. That one person may not even get to know what they caused, only that they silenced an opposition.

#GamerGate has won some real victories. But it's got no leadership. I have to ask this of GG big wigs. Has anyone kept a list of the vocal GG's? Are they all still vocal? Those who aren't, are they still around?

I think I'm being silly. Pessimistic precautions are always silly sounding.

If you are fighting the GG fight, SJW or Feminist critique whether a big wig or a keyboard warrior, you need to consider making an easily identifiable statement, at least in your room. Something like a construction paper poster (or your PC wallpaper or something) which says #GamerGate, along with the various names you use in the forums you frequently battle. I may be being overly optimistic in this, but I'm hoping that the police during their investigation (should they shoot someone again), will report that John Doe, a GamerGater alias "shitfarter_69er" on Tumbler was killed on X date blah blah. If you're brave enough to face this very real internet terrorism, do ME a favor, and secure your posthumous death knell; lest you join the ranks of unmarked graves lost to the winds of time.

You can spot a borderline from a mile away

AVfM Video Source · 6 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

…and you can sub to An Ear for Men here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-dXabMP5liQ

Cheaters

AVfM Video Source · 6 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

What would you do if you came home one day and found your wife or significant other having sex with another person? Shakaama has the best advice for anyone in that situation.

If you liked this video, please support shakaama's YouTube channel.

Dr. Jerome S. Pittman of Culver City, CA “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 6 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Are you or anyone you know being forced to undergo genital mutilation or “circumcision?” Are your parents making you do this for religious reasons or “your own good” but you don’t want to go through with it? Want to tell them “hands off?”

Enter “Circumcision for All Ages” from Dr. Jerome S. Pittman who has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website gentlecircumcision.com:

“Circumcision for All Ages

Gentle Circumcision is California’s only out-patient medical specialty practice exclusively devoted to performing circumcisions for all age groups. We schedule over 4000 cases annually and are proud to be California’s premier referral source for over 750 medical offices and facilities, including UCLA Healthcare, Cedars-Sinai, and many regional hospital medical centers.

Gentle Circumcision understands that considering circumcision for yourself, your baby, or child can be a stressful decision. That’s why we take the extra care to provide a warm and calm environment for you and your family. With circumcision specialists having more than 20 years of specialized circumcision experience, you can rest assured you or your child are in expert hands.”

“Gentle” circumcision, my ass.

Here in civilized society we generally don’t force surgery on people that don’t want it, so if you can read this, you can refuse unwanted surgery. Even toddlers should be told – as we do about ‘good’ and ‘bad’ touching – that anyone who tries to ‘bad’ touch or comes at them with a scalpel should be kicked in the crotch and the police called. That is a sexual assault of a minor who cannot consent to sex or elective surgery.

It’s very telling that under “FAQ – Teenage/Adult Circumcision” we see:

> Will my insurance cover the costs?
> No. Most insurance consider adult circumcision a cosmetic procedure and therefore will not reimburse.

So, a cosmetic procedure that is forced on infants simply because they:

- can’t speak up and say “No”
- can’t fight off the attacking doctors and nurses
- can’t hire a lawyer to sue
- can’t express his right to bodily integrity

But you as a thinking person with the human and civil right to bodily integrity and protection from assault with a scalpel can and should fight back against any such assault.

Under “Newborn” we read:

> Circumcision Technique
> The Plastibell circumcision device is a clear, lightweight plastic in the shape of a bell with an attached handle (see photograph). It comes in various sizes to fit newborns, infants, and toddlers. The bell portion is designed to cover the glans while the foreskin is pulled over it and secured with a string (ligature). The ligature sits in a groove at the top of the bell so that when tied, the ligature will compress the excess foreskin, cutting off its circulation. The unwanted foreskin can now be removed by cutting around the bell while it protects the glans from injury. The key is choosing the correct size device since too large a bell will cause excessive tension on the remaining foreskin and pull the bell over the glans onto the penile shaft. On the other hand, if the bell size chosen is too small, an inadequate amount of foreskin could be removed and/or excessive pressure on the glans could result in a visible deformity. An experienced provider will chose the appropriate size device and perform the procedure in 5-10 minutes. Healing time is approximately 10-14 days.
> >

The Plastibell Device must be the correct size, or serious risks are possible, including a lifetime of pain, further surgeries, and death. That’s what happened to Jayvas Carson, who was circumcised with the wrong size Plastibell, had massive bleeding, and ultimately died. How many babies die of this is not known as it isn’t blamed on circumcision, but the complication. But it happened ultimately because of the circumcision.

Under “FAQs for Adults / Teenagers:”

> How can the circumcision procedure be painless?
> This can be done by managing pain before it occurs. You are given an oral anti-anxiety medicine to allow muscle relaxation and remove any nervousness present before your surgery. The specialist then injects a local anesthetic designed to block pain sensation to the area. Once the anesthetic is effective, your circumcision begins and lasts > approximately 30 minutes. The anesthetic’s effect lasts 2-6 hours. BEFORE its wears > off, you are given a prescribed pain reliever. The remaining healing time is pain-free.
>
> Do I need to be put to sleep?
> Circumcision does not require general (sleep) anesthesia. The procedure has been > performed for decades in countries around the world (including the U.S. military) using > local anesthesia. It involves injecting an anesthetic medication around a nerve to control > pain in a specific area of the body. It is commonly used in dental offices to eliminate pain during dental procedures. Local anesthetics are also used with, or without, a sedative medication for pain control during circumcision. They work by blocking the pain pathways that connect the spinal cord to the brain. For this reason, pain sensation to the penis after local anesthesia is not recognized. It is a safe and effective option for those who do not desire general (sleep) anesthesia.

Say you're a teenager and somehow you got to this place where you'll have a "circumcision," probably because:

- your parents are forcing you
- girlfriend or peer pressure
- you believe it's beneficial

Before the procedure the doctor will give you "an oral anti-anxiety medicine to allow muscle relaxation and remove any nervousness." I could see how this is needed for the young ones who don't buy that the doctor's 'fixing something' that seems fine to him, plus the fear of 'bad' touching that is now forced on him.

But you can do research that shows the foreskin has important functions as part of the penis, and that circumcision is unneeded and has many risks and complications, including death.

No one can force you to have surgery against your will, and as a matter of fact, circumcision of unconsenting infants is most likely illegal, but obviously it's very easy to trample the civil rights of an infant.

And if you think you'll be odd if you stay intact, you'll be glad to know that most of the world's men are intact and that circumcision of male and female infants is going the way of slavery, lobotomy, and blood-letting.

Under "What's New in Pain Management" we see:

> At our practice, pain control is our first priority for all patients. According to the American Academy of Pediatrics' guidelines on circumcision, pain relief "is safe and effective in reducing the procedural pain associated with newborn circumcision; thus, adequate analgesia (pain relieving medications) should be provided whenever newborn circumcision is performed.

The AAP quote above about "safe" pain relief for circumcision is old news. The doctor should know that the latest findings of the AAP discourage routine surgery such as circumcision in infancy due to injury to an immature nervous system.

Under "Reviews" we see:

> Anonymous said:
>
> Brought my 2 boys (11 and 13) to be circumcised earlier this month. The day of the circumcision, you need to buy the medicines from the pharmacy on the ground floor before you go to the doctor's office. This way you go straight home after the procedure since your baby/kid will be cranky and groggy. Procedure went well. My boys had a little pain but we were able to manage it by following the after care plan given to us. They did not scream like what that other mom mentioned in earlier reviews. Dr. Pitman is great. Certainly knows what he is doing. Staff (Cindy, Anais, Claudia & Jessie) are all knowledgeable and explained everything that will happen during the procedure as well as aftercare treatment. It amazed me how quick the recovery was for my boys. If you want your child to be circumcised, this is the place to go.
>
> Anonymous said:
>
> I hope this review can help other moms and dads out there. My first visit to the office with my baby was draining,not because of the office,but because my baby boy was too chubby down there to have the procedure > done. We had to wait until after he turned one. In my mind at that moment I decided he would never get it done because it will be to traumatic. After my husband explained to me how embarrassing it will be for him in school to look so different,when he meets a girl, and just the personal hygiene, we decided it was best to have it done. So when he was almost 2 years old we took him it. The doctor explained the procedure and one nurse who I will never forget… Cindy. She is an angel, she made my little guy feel so safe when they took him from us. And when it was done she stayed in the room with us to explain after care and to just calm him down. The drive home was horrible,he was scared, a little loopy from the medicine,and just uncomfortable. When we made it home he was back to his happy self,playing outside with his brothers and sister. I know now in my heart we made the right decision,his parts look like the rest of the boys in the family. And with NO complications what can I be mad at.

>
> Brenda said:
> This place is incredible. The doctor has the absolute greatest bedside manner. He makes you feel extremely comfortable when having to leave your baby with him. My baby had his circumcision when he was born and they botched it. In any case, Dr. Pittman performed a revision surgery and had to clean up someone else's mess. He walks you through the whole process. He informs you of pros and cons. Full transparency. He did a fantastic job!! And the girls who work there are all wonderful, friendly, sweet and caring. As hard as it is to leave your baby, it is made easier knowing he is such great hands. I can see why they call this place "Gentle" Circumcision. Everyone has a calm and gentle demeanor. I highly recommend this place!! I wish I would have come here first. Their prices are unbeatable, their service unmatched, and their office is beautiful.
>
> Mary said:
> We went to see Dr. Pittman for a consultation. I did not want to circumcise our son and my husband was on the fence. He fit us in the same week i called. Spent all the time we needed. Performed a physical exam on our son to weed out the possibility that there was any possible medical abnormality necessitating a circumcision and answered a whole list of questions we had for him. We decided not to circumcise our son but if we ever do we will go to him. I saw a 17 year old boy walk out of his office showing no signs of pain after having just been circumcised. Hopefully my son will never want or need to be circumcised but if he does we know there is someone we can trust to perform the procedure. He was kind and knowledgeable.

If those two boys in the first case had done research or read this article, they would have known their rights and could have refused and/or if needed, kicked Dr. Pittman in the crotch.

Just imagine if these comments were about girls having their genitals mutilated – it would be horrific, just as these are for boys. What have we come to when "the girls who work there are all wonderful, friendly, sweet and caring" when what they help do is infant genital mutilation?

Glad to see Mary was smart enough to ask the doctor if "there was any possible medical abnormality necessitating a circumcision" to which the answer was NO.

Under "Travel" we read:

> Visiting From Out of State…
> Our fly-in program makes it possible for men of all ages and from across the globe to come into our beautiful Culver City outpatient facility to receive their circumcision procedures.
>
> The pediatric and adult circumcisions performed at Gentle Circumcision are conducted by highly experienced physicians who are devoted to making this a positive experience for all.
>
> While the idea of a fly-in program may seem like a foreign concept to many, the result is an expert process conducted in a facility that ONLY specializes in one area of medical practice – for all ages.
>
> With more than 20 years of experience in the field of male circumcision and a caseload in excess of 4,000 procedures every year, we have the experience to handle infants, boys and men of all ages.

4,000 circumcisions per year is about 12 per day and I'm sure 100% percent of those infant boys did not consent to this permanent disfigurement. Who knows how many died from complications, how many had a lifetime of discomfort and denial of a normal sex life with an intact penis. Why do we allow, even encourage this barbarism on boys yet recognize the horror when done to girls? Thankfully, many are coming to their senses and refusing to cut their baby boy, and there are many organizations spreading the "intactivism" word.

So, people of all ages and sexes, if anyone wants to touch your junk without permission (especially if holding a scalpel):

- run away
- kick he/she in the crotch
- call police

Since Dr. Pittman's website has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Have a KGM (Known Genital Mutilator) you'd like to see featured here? Drop me an email (see masthead) with the circumciser's name and website – let's make them infamous for what they do.

Dr. Pittman's practice information follows:

Brotman
Physicians Plaza

9808 Venice Blvd. Suite 602
Culver City, CA 90232

Phone: 310-559-8000
Fax: 310-559-8006
Email: info@gentlecircumcision.com

> Dr. Jerome S. Pittman of Culver City "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/pHkZkvekza @AndreaHardie #nocirc #MGM pic.twitter.com/wwfVGGUcWf
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 6, 2016

When will I get my institutional oppression?

Alice Smith · 6 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dear modern-day, first-world feminists: when will I get my institutional oppression?

If we're playing the game of victim cards, I almost have a full house. I am a millennial, raised under baby boomer expectations and almost dragged into the crippling debt that most millennials will suffer. I am from a poor, hippie background, living, among other places, here:

and here:

Yes, that last one is a campsite. Yes, I lived there. Not even in a caravan: in an actual tent. Not by choice.

Of course, not having much money to spare wasn't enough. See my parents originally actually had some cash. Our small issue was that one of them was a raging alcoholic, and the other was neglectful and absent as often as possible, so much for the happy nuclear family. And living across a continent from any of our relatives, we were pretty much on our own to work out how to live. Think not having an iPhone is exclusionary and miserable? Try not having Christmas, not getting new clothes or not having food because at-the-age-of-eight you and your little sisters are home alone with an empty fridge while mommy and daddy play drinking-the-bar-out-of-business.

Well at least I have my white privilege, or my education, or my mental health, right? No, not right at all. For starters, I grew up in a part of Spain that very much embraces the slender frames, tan skin and dark features of Mediterranean girls, which is pretty neat. But, you see, just because they love themselves doesn't mean they love you. Rather than be elevated or even treated equally because of my white skin, it was a permanent marker that I was ugly and foreign. Education. Where do you think education goes when you move house every six months, have virtually no friends and are bipolar with dyscalculia?

Oh, didn't I mention? I have a bipolar spectrum disorder and dyscalculia and have had since early childhood, probably since birth, if I could remember. Funny thing about abusive childhoods is they create permanently damaged memory paths to a point where your memory retention up until around the age of six is equal to that of a ten-month-old baby, and you can still suffer short term memory loss as an adult. Not having functional short-term memory completed the triple whammy of mental issues that interfere with a kid's ability to study and socialize. Not that anyone would notice, of course, with how little time I spent in any given school. No, I was just a bad kid, so I never got any help with my education.

And finally, most relevant to many modern feminists, I am a woman. Shock. Horror. Poor me!

So, in principle, I am one of the disenfranchised, those who get few to no opportunities by default, who can't buy our way into anything with loyalty, good grades or actual money. And then, at the age of sixteen with some help from the rest of my family, I moved away from my parents and started life anew, living on welfare and studying on my own.

Of course, I was put in shared housing, rejected from all schools due to huge gaps in my academic record, denied all but a living allowance at 86% of men's welfare. Forced to work minimum wage jobs at low hours to afford anything at all, assaulted by my caseworkers and flatmates, became enslaved to an angry gang leader so I could afford my bills. I eventually turned to a life of prostitution and crime when the police failed to recognize me as a victim, eventually dying of an overdose combined with that final battering about the face when I failed to pay my boyfriend/pimp.

Yeah, right. No. As a young woman stuck out there alone, I received the following:

1. Basic welfare, £8k/year. Not heaps, but, believe it or not, enough to cover all my expenses and allow me to have a few luxuries, all while saving £2k/year. Budgeting matters.

2. Housing support and my own flat when I mentioned my anxiety around certain men and people who had been drinking.

3. Admission to an all-girls academy where I was allowed to study for my A-levels despite my qualifications being hit and miss.

4. A case worker who helped me figure out the legal side of things and checked up on me whenever he was in the area.

5. Access to grants and other funds to continue my art education and pay for studying basic qualifications such as English language and mathematics.

6. Several University offers from great universities, and a narrowly missed opportunity to study at Oxford.

7. Respectful, kind, appropriate treatment from everyone I knew.

That's not to say the situation was ideal. But everyone did everything in their power to help me set my life back on track, enabling me to complete my education, gain independence, save some money, start a small business and do well for myself. Because people care about young women, who are helpless. There are organisations, government support groups and even individuals out there to lend a helping hand.

Meanwhile, for me to get this support, someone else had not to be getting it. Who do you think loses out when a single girl gets a flat to herself because she won't share with men or drinkers? Who do you think loses out when a school closes its doors to all boys? Who do you think loses out when I get girl-priority for mixed sex grants and interviews? In case, you hadn't guessed: the men. I knew many young men in my same situation through the organisation that supported me. They were forced into cramped shared accommodation, on lower incomes, mostly dropped out of school, with few to no opportunities in sight. Because when we're fighting for resources, the sixteen-year-old girl with a family history of abuse beats the eighteen-year-old homeless man with no education. As simple as that: whatever we girls got, the guys who shared our exact circumstances could not get. And that was an organisation that really worked hard to help everyone. It only gets worse for these guys once they're over the age of twenty-five and no longer eligible for youth services. At that point, they had better pray they qualify for a council house and welfare, because they will never finish their education, never have a proper job and no longer receive support to get them away from violence and substance abuse. Unfortunately for them, women seem to get into council houses far more easily than men do, so they're probably all homeless again by now.

This gender-based institutional oppression at worst is simply poor, and at best is institutional biased in our favour. You don't need to have a great life to be treated better as a woman. Going hungry because your parents are heaven knows where, staying up all night studying because you are sitting four years worth of seven or eight subjects in June, or being sexually assaulted because your parents bring dangerous people home are all pretty bad experiences and are hardly rarities in my life. But at no point have I been institutionally oppressed for being a woman. Discriminated against by individuals? Yes. Treated with a bit less tact than I would have liked? Everyone has. Made the victim of some nasty crimes? On several occasions. You see: bad things happen to everyone. And to some of us they happen far, far, far more than to others. Largely because we're dirt poor. But I'm still holding out for that mythical institutional oppression all women get.

From the moment I walked away from my parents, I was free to do with my life exactly as I pleased. And I did. Nobody told me I couldn't. Nobody stopped me. Nobody fined me, or gave me bad housing, or attacked me for being a woman doing her own thing. Nobody denied me services, or coerced me, or lied to me to keep me back. Nobody oppressed me. In fact, all the opposite happened: I was uplifted, helped and loved by everyone whose help I sought. Men and women alike.

So, feminists, when does it happen? When does this whole "woman" thing kick in? When will I be treated worse than every poor, blue-collar or welfare-dependent man I grew up around? When will I get my rape as onlookers watch passively, my eviction for being a girl doing her own thing, my domestic violence spat where my loving husband turns into a werewolf, my underpaid work as my male coworker rakes it in, my life of constant fear and debasement? When will I get my institutional oppression?

Women In Astronomy – TFF Episode 30

AVfM Video Source · 7 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 30 Professor Fiamengo discusses how feminism is creeping into the sciences with special emphasis on recent incidents in Astronomy.

Full text with links at Blog.StudioBrulé.com : http://blog.studiobrule.com/2016/03/w…

StudioBrule's YouTube Channel.

W.C. Fields: A MGTOW for all seasons

Doug Mortimer · 7 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured By Cine-Mundial 516 Fifth Avenue New York. This was a Spanish-language film magazine published in New York. – page 113 Cine-Mundial, Public Domain, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=38538341

> To be of the belief that Mr. Fields is no more than a funny man is to hold the opinion that Gulliver's Travels is a book for children.
>
> – Andre Sennwald, New York Times movie critic, January 13, 1935

> Thank God he's a comic. Had he been a statesman he'd have plunged the world into total war.
>
> – Will Rogers

W. C. Fields (born William Claude Dunkefield in 1880) died on Christmas Day in 1946, but a quarter of a century later he was something of an icon among college students. His image was included on the cover art of the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper album, his films were regularly shown at campus screenings, and his sour puss graced posters in head shops. Counter-cultural and anti-establishment types sensed a kindred soul. Indeed, Fields did go against the grain, not just in his own time, but in the late 1960s as well as today.

Today, however, his posthumous presence would no longer be welcome on campus. In his time, he was often described as a misanthrope. Since that includes men and women, by definition, he was guilty of both misandry and misogyny. That would seem to indicate perfect equality, but the former is still permissible while the latter is not. And that would render him persona non grata today.

With few exceptions, Fields always played himself in his movies. Of course, once he had established a strong public image, he had no economic incentive to tinker with it. Even at the peak of his fame, he was essentially a character actor with his name above the title. Unlike other character actors, however, he usually wrote his own material.

Did his public persona overlap his personality? Was he as churlish in real life as he appeared in movies? True, he could be petty and spiteful, but he could also be charitable and thoughtful. As disdainful of children as he was in films, he was the opposite in real life.

His on-screen boozing, however, was no act ("I drink, therefore I am"). As a young man, he was a teetotaler. His initial foray into show business was as a comic juggler in vaudeville (he is a member of the Juggling Hall of Fame), so steady hands were a must.

As he moved away from juggling and expanded his comic repertoire, he began to drink more and more, to the point where almost every room in his house had a fully-stocked bar. While he was almost always observed with a drink in his hand, no one ever saw him drunk.

Though far from athletic, his hand-eye coordination was extraordinary, as many an opponent in golf, tennis, or ping pong discovered. Allegedly, he once fell down the stairs with a martini in hand and didn't spill a drop, even though he broke his tail bone. He was sometimes observed playing tennis with a racket in one hand and a martini glass in the other.

Though his rotund, rubicund nose was his signature feature ("He referred to my proboscis as an adscititious excrescence," he fumed in The Bank Dick.), it was not the result of drinking but genetics and getting punched in the nose a few too many times as a child. Nevertheless, it was always assumed drinking was the cause. As a result, the medical condition of rhinophyma (i.e., red nose) is known as W.C. Fields Syndrome.

But what about his misogyny? One of his best-known quotes combined booze and women: "It was a woman who drove me to drink, and I never had the courtesy to thank her for it." Another of his better-known quotations was "Women are like elephants. I like to look at 'em, but I wouldn't want to own one."

But what about the NAWALT? Is there no such fabled creature? Not according to Fields. "No doubt exists that all women are crazy; it's only a question of degree," he asserted.

His views on marriage also bear repeating:

> Marry an outdoors woman. Then if you throw her out into the yard on a cold night, she can still survive.
>
> I believe in tying the marriage knot, as long as it's around the woman's neck.
>
> Never trust your wife behind your back, even if she claims she only wants to wash or scratch it.
>
> Marriage is better than leprosy because it's easier to get rid of.
>
> Getting married is like buying a new horse, or going into a strange saloon.
>
> An ideal start for matrimony would be to have a drunken rabbi perform a Catholic ceremony in an Episcopalian church. Then it could be declared illegal in the courts.

So what was Fields' private life like? Well, he was no monk, but women were not particularly important to him. As old pictures of him readily indicate, he was no Adonis, yet on occasion, he could attract a Venus.

In Fields' day, the idea of a stage-door Johnny wooing a ditzy, leggy showgirl was the stuff of farce. Though the situation rarely arose in real life, it became something of a pop culture stereotype. Even as late as the 1960s, when I was a teenager, my mom occasionally joked that one day I would probably "run off with a chorus girl."

Well, I never did that (chorus girls have been in short supply since the death of vaudeville), but Fields did. In fact, he was only 20 years old when he did so. His first wife, Harriet Hughes, was literally a chorus girl.

It did not go particularly well. Seven years later they separated but were never divorced. He never cut her off, however, and even sent her money on a regular basis. They had one son, W.C. Fields, Jr., from whom Fields was estranged, but they were reconciled in later years.

Bessie Poole, the next love of his life (he was 36 at the time) was also something of a babe. She was a Ziegfeld girl.

The Ziegfeld Follies was an annual Broadway Variety review (Fields was a regular performer in various comedy sketches) founded by Florenz Ziegfeld in 1907. Ziegfeld's shows were noted for their lavish displays of pulchritude, so a showgirl in one of his productions had a lot of sexual market value.

Consorting with Bessie Poole, however, was not a smart move on Fields' part, as she was an alcoholic. She bore Fields another son ("A night of pleasure can cause a swollen abdomen nine months later," he lamented) who was adopted out, as neither Fields nor Poole wanted to give up show biz for the trammels of domestic life. The relationship lasted till Fields was 47. Soon after the breakup, she died of complications from alcoholism.

Fields' best-known relationship was with Carlotta Monti, a small-time actress whose resume included bit parts in a number of well-known films (e.g., the silent versions of Ben-Hur and The Ten Commandments). Later she had bit parts in two of Fields' features, The Man on the Flying Trapeze and Never Give a Sucker an Even Break.

If you like cute romcom style introductions, you can hardly beat Fields and Monti's initial encounter on the Paramount lot in 1932. Observing that she was wearing a hula skirt, he immediately snuffed out his cigar, saying "I don't want to start a grass fire." When they met, he was 53, and she was 26. She remained his mistress till he died.

Their relationship is documented in Carlotta Monti's book, W.C. Fields and Me, published in 1971, and turned into a movie in 1976 with Rod Steiger as the former and Valerie Perrine as the latter.

While Fields hardly looked the part of the alpha male, he definitely was one regarding fame and fortune, having been a star of stage, screen, and radio. His persona provided fodder for countless cartoonists and impressionists. His circle of friends included a number of well-known actors, directors, and writers. So therein lay his appeal to Carlotta Monti.

One suspects that Fields was more than happy to enjoy the company of a Latin cutie half his age, but that he didn't go out of his way to make himself attractive to her. As he once said, "Never try to impress a woman, because if you do she'll expect you to keep up the standard for the rest of your life."

Fields, however, was not popular with females who did not have personal access to him or his assets. One of his drinking buddies, director Edward Sutherland, thought he would have been an even bigger star if women liked him. But his lack of gynocentrism was all too evident on screen. "A henpecked man gets surefire laughs," he observed, "but the cardinal rule is that he must triumph over the shrew he married or his harridan mother-in-law in the end."

While Fields often portrayed henpecked husbands in his films, he was anything but in real life. He particularly reviled "henpecking, literary, and pedantic" women. Film critic Pauline Kael said he was an acquired taste "like sour mash bourbon." He probably would have appreciated the analogy.

As querulous as he was bibulous, his pet peeves included doctors, lawyers, bankers, the internal revenue service, churchgoers, and Puritans. Though he had very little formal education, he dedicated his spare time to educating himself, and he had a voluminous library in his home. His quips regularly included arcane puns or esoteric references. A case in point is his pen name of Mahatma Kane Jeeves in the credits of The Bank Dick. The name derives from the saying, "My hat, my cane, Jeeves," supposedly a catchphrase from drawing room comedies.

So Fields was a MGTOW of the first order, but he was hardly a role model. And perhaps that is the ultimate lesson of his life or that of any other MGTOW. By definition, a MGTOW can never have a role model. Everyone's path in life is unique, and Fields was definitely sui generis.

This is not to say he was not capable of offering advice to budding MGTOWs. When an interviewer asked him how a young man could build wealth, he replied "When the little beggar is only ten years old, have him castrated and his taste buds destroyed. He'll grow up never needing a woman, a steak, or a cigarette. Think of the money saved."

Spoken like a true MGTOW!

Foreign Women Are Not the Answer (NAFWALT)

AVfM Video Source · 9 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Are foreign-born wives a panacea for what ails American men who want to marry. Paul discusses the pitfalls of this option.

An Ear for Men

This Week in Stupid- Social Justice is a Cult Edition!

AVfM Video Source · 9 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Social justice is a secular cult created and propagated by ideologues in academia. There are mechanisms in place to stop this.

Sargon of Akkad

The Misandry behind North Carolina's bathroom bill

Greg Santos · 9 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As a resident of North Carolina, I wasn't surprised when I first heard of "the bathroom bill" House Bill 2. Despite only 36% of the state supporting the bill, it passed easily in the state house and was quickly signed into law. Par for the course, I suppose, in a state where the supermajority party is facing -22 approval ratings. While the bill is (rightfully) perceived as an attack on the rights of transgendered people, I noticed an underlying theme of Gynocentric thinking in its supporters.

The controversial bill dictates that all public and privately owned buildings must meet a set of requirements regarding the gender divisions of multi-use restrooms, stating that all bathrooms must separate by gender, defining gender as the sex stated on the birth certificate.

The main, and practically only reason that anybody supports this bill is that of their opposition to "men in women's bathrooms." I'm not here to argue if gender is biological or psychological, or if Caitlyn is still Bruce. Personally, I think she is she, but that's not the point of the article. Nobody seems to bring it up, but House Bill 2 is a microcosm of misandry.

House Bill 2 wouldn't exist if the narrative of men as predators didn't exist. Examining arguments made by the bill's proponents, they all attempt to justify themselves through fear mongering about the very idea of "men" being within proximity to women. "You think trans people should use whatever bathroom they want?" They ask. "What about men in women's bathrooms, huh!? What about all the rape that men do? Can we trust them to be around little girls?!"

Interestingly, we seem to trust them around little boys. Are little girls more valuable, vulnerable, or just inherently of higher priority to protect?

The mere hypothetical presence of someone with a penis is enough to be considered a danger to others. Bathrooms are designed for one thing, you shit, you (hopefully) wash your hands, you leave. Peeping and sexual assault aren't a requirement for using the bathroom! The vast, vast majority of people understand this!

Bathrooms aren't the only public space divided by gender anymore. Gender segregation of trains and buses have been implemented in Japan, India, and Germany. These 'women only' trains were created as a response to sexual assault on public transit, an event that has never occurred in Japan or Germany, and only a few odd times in India, surprising when you consider how many people live in poverty zones in the country. Men around the world are punished for crimes that they didn't do, and for public transport rape epidemics that don't exist, with the United States becoming the most recent addition to the crowd with the introduction of House Bill 2.

This why we have stories of men not being able to pick up their children from school because they "look suspicious", men getting punished for crimes they didn't commit, and now transgenders being banned from their bathroom of choice just for the slight chance that they maybe might be a man. We don't accept this demonization of men from the political left, so we shouldn't accept it from the political right either.

How Feminism Destroyed Europe

AVfM Video Source · 10 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The massive feminization of culture has had a major impact on European politics and the decisions which have lead to the European Migrant Crisis. Iben Thranholm joins Stefan Molyneux to discuss the deficiency of masculinity in European culture, how feminism has programmed women to see men as the enemy and the future of western civilization.

"As the refugee crisis erupted and overwhelmed Europe, its political leaders – spearheaded by German Chancellor Angela Merkel – acted like timid mother hens, not as strong men responsible for guarding their country from an invasion." – Iben Thranholm Iben Thranholm is one of Denmark's most widely read columnists and is a former editor and radio host at the Danish Broadcasting Corporation. Thranholm has traveled extensively in the Middle East, Italy, the United States and Russia to carry out research and interviews. She has been awarded for her investigative research into Danish media coverage of religious issues.

Stefan Molyneux

Misogyny and Bachelorhood

Tim Patten · 10 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Misogyny and Bachelorhood

Early on during the 2016 Republican presidential primary campaign, Donald Trump took umbrage at aggressive questioning by Fox News moderator Megyn Kelly at one of the debates. In addition to characterizing her as "not very good or professional," Mr. Trump said, "You could see there was blood coming out of her eyes. Blood coming out of her wherever."[i] That latter remark triggered a firestorm, with the outspoken candidate being widely accused of misogyny—hating or disliking girls or women.[ii] [iii]

Unfortunately, as with many of the words and phrases that are being carelessly thrown around in these days, they are not necessarily being used to make a rational or coherent point. They are being deployed as weapons of gender manipulation and hate, coopted and maligned by radical feminists and other man-hating ideologues in a quest to undermine male influence and advance selfish agendas.

The notion of "misogyny" dates back to ancient times, when Hesiod, the Greek poet believed to be active between 750 and 650 BC, described women in largely unflattering terms. That said, the term actually had a different meaning back then. According to Hans Licht, author of History of Greek Life and Customs, the pejorative "woman hater" expression was applied mostly to gay men.[iv] Ironically, it is not uncommon for a modern gay male, which may be vagina-phobic or even disgusted by that part of the female anatomy, to view women as perfect friends.

Individuals Shriek Misogyny

Regardless, when the word misogynistic is used, it is typically uttered in a very disparaging manner. In essence, it is spat at men, mostly by women—often with a raised middle finger, a clenched jaw and exposed teeth—who scream out, "You're a misogynist!" To an outside observer, it appears as though these women are confronting child molesters, baby rapists or the lowest forms of life on Earth. For some, in fact, the term is viler than the N-word.[v]

Online, there are hordes of web warriors freely writing and repeating the term, anonymously assassinating one another in an attempt to upset, denigrate and injure. A 2006 study of Internet chatrooms[vi] found, for example, that accusations of pervasive online misogyny—amounting to, on average, 100 threatening or sexually abusive messages per user each day—came from accounts with feminine usernames and were directed at those with male usernames. It concluded that female cyber-bullying of men was far more common than the reverse.

In fact, anecdotal and other evidence makes it clear that men rarely use this term, while women say it regularly and repeatedly, almost like a machine gun, "killing" all males within their intended sights. More often than not, if a man writes something that offends a woman in even the slightest way, she'll quickly shoot back a response with one phrase: misogynist!

Institutionalized Misogyny

Not all of these diatribes target individual males. While women have penned missives against Trump and others, they have also organized attacks aimed at disparaging groups and gatherings of men. Like a nagging wife, significant numbers of women have convinced the Southern Poverty Law Center, for example, that "the manosphere,"[vii] a loose and informal network of blogs, websites and internet commentators that focus on issues related to men and masculinity, is comprised of "hate groups." Consequently, the SPLC has declared that men who advocate for male gender equality or against marrying American women, or anyone holding opinions that run counter to feminist dogma, are misogynists.

Even bachelors aligned with Men Going their Own Way (MGTOW) and pick-up artists, who probably wouldn't view themselves as anti-women at all, are deemed to be practicing misogyny. For the most part, men are classified as haters by definition; even those who have been falsely accused of rape are not immune from being characterized in this way. According to the SPLC, virtually any man associated with a male safe-space or group is automatically a misogynist who must be silenced or otherwise stopped.

Academic Identification of Misogyny

The notion that a large number of males—whether or not they say or do the "wrong" things—are women-haters is not limited to entities such as the SPLC. Academia has also imbued scholarly research and educational curricula with a wide range of gender-based distortions. For example, Psychology Today expert Dr. Berit Brogaard,[viii]author of 12 Ways to Spot a Misogynist, identified what he believes are telltale signs of when a man hates a woman:

- He approaches her for a date
- He makes a promise and does not keep it,
- He is late for a date
- He is self-centered
- He treats women differently than men
- His sexual etiquette lacks foreplay

Other academics, most notably those who are involved with women's and gender studies programs, seem more than willing to support the sort of dangerous thinking that Dr. Brogaard is promoting. Among other things, they are quick to label male students as potential rapists, fueled by misogyny.

And as has been the case for decades, the media and those in publishing and other creative industries are only too happy to provide a forum for those who espouse such views. Magazines such as the Feminist Current claim most men are part of a "culture of predatory misogynists,"[ix] while the Odyssey has said, "maybe all men are misogynists."[x] No one should be surprised, of course, that the alleged gender authorities are nearly all women, evaluating men's nature through the prism of the women's movement for equality.

Women Hate other Women

But what about their gender? Females who maintain that they know more about masculinity than men have little to say regarding women's issues. Unlike with men, for instance, evidence suggests that females often dislike other women for no logical reason at all.[xi] In fact, some commentators claim an internalized misogyny is the driver behind a hatred for themselves and other women. According to NAIJ.COM editor Nkem Ikeke, "women can't relate to other women, and they get along better with males."[xii]

Dr. Seth Myers, writing in Psychology Today, says that this inability extends much deeper when women are competitive: at that point, they will often exhibit snarky and bitchy conduct toward one another.[xiii] Another Psychology Today article theorizes that women are more sensitive to being social outcasts than men, which leads them to deploy backstabbing rumors as a weapon of choice.[xiv] In many workplaces, it is not rare to see women raising petty barbs against other females, mostly behind their backs. It seems they need to hurt other women to feel better about themselves.

Women's Violence against Women

While there is little doubt that what is on television is often fantasy, the fact that competitive contempt and cattiness toward other females is a staple feature of daytime programming suggests these attributes are more than a figment of somebody's imagination. During any four-hour watch-a-thon, for example, viewers might see women screaming, yelling, pulling hair, slapping and physically hitting each other. There are also unscripted talk shows where women call each other names or denigrate others' beauty, intelligence, dress, make-up, weight, personality and affluence. Women, not men, are the propagators of slut-shaming and similar broadsides aimed at lowering somebody's social standing.

Perhaps another reason why women are inherently more hateful than they claim men are stems from the disturbing fact that 80 percent of women in the U.S. are dissatisfied with their appearance while more than 10 million suffer from eating disorders.[xv] On the face of it, this would seem to indicate that women have major self-esteem issues and inferiority complexes of all types. While many women find it easy to label men as the haters, perhaps this perspective is merely a reflection of their feelings about themselves?

What is Love?

Sadly, the research and perspectives detailed above can easily leave one feeling cynical. If Dr. Brogaard is correct in the view that men hate women, and if women feel hatred toward themselves and other females, how can love intervene amid all the animosity? How can romance be planted into such a contaminated soil and be expected to grow?

Something is broken. Our modern society somehow misplaced the ancient cultural values that once made a marriage work. Collaboration has been replaced by gendered distrust and rivalry. Today, marriage is dangerous for men, in particular. It is physically and emotionally draining and, at worst, deadly. Instead of enjoying what should be an ongoing positive experience, married couples are required to work on their partnership every day,[xvi] as well as spend extra time on each other's priorities.[xvii]

But where does this leave them? In many instances, both sides are miserable. Research indicates that most married couples argue, on average, seven times a day, amounting to 2,455 arguments per year.[xviii] Almost 50% of marriages fail; in those instances where partners remain together, nearly 60% are unhappy.[xix] Every minute, 20 people who "are in love" injure one another through physical domestic violence.[xx] And quietly, married men are committing suicide from endless couples bickering.[xxi]

This is what Americans call "love, marriage, and happiness." Today, millions of unhappy couples are expending an inordinate amount of time and energy trying to keep things together. Their relationship is like another job, where they hang on in the hope of maintaining scarcely civilized households. Unfortunately, the fallout from these strains doesn't just affect them; their children and the generations that follow will be greatly harmed if things carry on as they are.

Conclusion

Clearly, society is ripe for innovative approaches that help people engage with and love each other in healthier ways. Meanwhile, there is a growing understanding that bachelorhood is not a matter of hate, but an escape hatch from endless rounds of conflict and societal pressures fueled mostly by women's movements. Men don't want a domestic relationship of violence. Instead, they see a beacon in the darkness, directing them to a more favorable option: living a single life. As bachelors, men can assemble and mold the best of all worldly delights, cherry-picking life, and social elements. Men are shaping an individually tailored and exceptional lifestyle, and experiencing uninhibited or unhindered freedom.

If Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is seen by some as a hate group, so be it. In reality, it is freeing men from socialized expectations that invariably lead to schisms and unhappiness, and while also saving them from future disasters. It is obvious why men enjoy spreading MGTOW stories and understandings of toxic relationships: they are the path to the world's oyster of independence, happiness, and personal pleasure.

*****

[i] http://nypost.com/2015/08/08/trump-megyn-kelly-had-blood-coming-out-of-her-wherever/

[ii] http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/politics/2016/03/donald_trump_has_one_core_philosophy_misogyny.html

[iii] http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2015/08/08/donald-trump-s-gross-history-of-misogyny-from-rosie-o-donnell-to-megyn-kelly.html

[iv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Misogyny

[v] ibid.

[vi] http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2014/09/04/men-are-harassed-more-than-women-online.html

[vii] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Manosphere

[viii] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/the-mysteries-love/201502/12-ways-spot-misogynist

[ix] http://www.feministcurrent.com/2014/11/05/it-is-all-men-our-culture-of-predatory-misogyny/

[x] http://theodysseyonline.com/creighton/maybe-all-men-misogynists/112205

[xii] https://www.naij.com/428639-true-talk-four-reasons-women-hate-each-other.html

[xiii] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/insight-is-2020/201309/women-who-hate-other-women-the-psychological-root-snarky

[xiv] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/insight-is-2020/201309/women-who-hate-other-women-the-psychological-root-snarky

[xv] http://psychcentral.com/blog/archives/2012/06/02/why-do-women-hate-their-bodies/

[xvi] http://sixseeds.patheos.com/davewillis/5-things-your-marriage-needs-every-day/

[xvii] http://www.aprioritizedmarriage.com/blog/make-your-spouse-a-priority-every-day

[xviii] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1389002/Fallout-Couples-argue-average-seven-times-day.html

[xix] http://www.womenshealthmag.com/sex-and-love/more-are-unhappy-in-their-marriage-than-ever-before

[xx] http://www.ncadv.org/learn/statistics

[xxi] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/health/article-2623873/You-really-nagged-death-Excessive-demands-partners-double-risk-dying-middle-age.html

Asian women aren't the answer

Paul Elam · 10 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I know the solution to dealing with modern women. I know how to end your woes going from one loser female to another, taking hits to your self-respect and your wallet as you go.

Just find a woman from the Philipines or Japan or some other Asian country. They make a lot better partners. Or so you'd think if you listened to a lot of guys talk about trading in the west for the east.

I've done lots of videos and articles on the pitfalls of women in modern culture. It seems like each time I do some guy shows up in the comments extolling the benefits of shopping in Asia or some other country for a woman.

I suppose the idea is that non-western women are a lot more reliable and trustworthy than Western women. After all, aren't they? Wouldn't all men be better off if they shed their American, Canadian, British or Australian ambitions and went for women we used to call Oriental till the PC police decided that, too, was an insult?

The way I hear it, Asian women will cook and clean all day for you. They will draw your bath and rub your shoulders after work. The will give you pedicures and a quick blowjob in the drive-through car wash just because they know you like it. They don't talk too much, eat too much or want too much.

Hell, they make better lovers, too!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nAY4-fVkdPc

OK, sorry, I could not resist that. Flame me all you want, but if you are shopping for a foreign bride, that is most likely what you are getting, especially if you are poking around for one on the internet. But I won't waste much time in this video trying to convince you of that.

If you think that a woman is going to meet a man online who lives in a different culture, speaks a different language, then leave her family and her entire life behind because she wants to spend her life loving you, then by all means, go for it.

I am sure you will make PT Barnum proud. Well, maybe not proud, but correct.

It also may benefit men who are considering shopping around Asia for a wife to consider that what you get is not a culture circa 1950s America. Asian culture may not be what you think it is.

Let's take China for an example. The Chinese tend to be suspicious, even dismissive of romantic love. Much like western culture used to be before the 12th century.

Infatuation in one Chinese dialect is Chi Qing (pronounced key ching), or, literally translated, "daft love." Unlike the West, Chinese, and most other Asian people recognize romantic love for the insanity that it is.

Let's take a look at an illustration from the book, When True Love Came to China, by Lynn Pan.

As you can see, there is a large circle on the left and a smaller one on the right. The large circle, the one with the dude on the bent knee, kissing a woman's hand, represents the greater quantity and more intense obsession with romantic love in the West.

The smaller circle on the right represents the simpler Chinese conception. The overlap represents sexual attraction, limerence, which means infatuation, and attachment. They are shared traits in both cultures, but the cultural view of those traits is vastly different.

One is culture romanticizes and idealizes limerance; the other sees it as a form of crazy that you hope to get over before it gets you in trouble. I will let you guess which culture is which.

Now, here's the deal. Even in China, like all other westernizing nations, the concept of romantic love is finding its way into the culture. Consequently, we can expect to see divorce, marital misery and MGTOW increase.

What does that mean to you if you are shopping for a Chinese bride? Well, for one, if you move there permanently, and you are in the over 40 market, you might just find a decent wife. Also, the laws there don't favor women so much.

The younger generation, as it is most everywhere else, is increasingly westernized. So if you are shopping for a woman willing to leave her homeland to marry a guy she met on the internet, remember that your options boil down to this:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vtrs3cxzXVI

It can also get you a slew of other kinds of women.

I am sure Catherine Becker's penisless ex-husband is overjoyed that he found an Asian bride.

Picking a woman based on ethnicity or culture alone is foolish. It's like buying a used car without checking under the hood because it has a racing stripe.

From my standpoint whether you are looking for a wife, girlfriend, friend with benefits or just a dependable booty call, thinking there is a cultural solution available is just another way to take the onus off of yourself to test and screen the women in your life before you get involved with them.

It is a lazy, hazardous way to say you don't trust yourself to choose more wisely.

It is your standards, and your willingness to enforce them, that can land you a better woman regardless of where you are. Taking responsibility for your life and your choices is a lot better than putting your future at the mercy of a pipe dream.

Solon, wisdom, and men's sexual welfare

Douglas Galbi · 11 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A humorous footnote of history with some whimsy and irony, Douglas Galbi shares this historically based story with some tongue and cheek. As he says on his Blog Purplemotes.net:

> May you perceive a bit of the divine and amusing amidst purple motes. And rubbish, too. I remind you, rubbish is part of life.

If you fail to see the humor. No, AVFM is not endorsing public brothels, this is for thought provoking entertainment. Enjoy! EDs

Solon reading a book

The ancient Athenian legislator Solon (no relation to Solomon) is famous for his wisdom. Solon broadened political representation in Athens, provided debt relief for the enslaved poor, and limited the political power of women's wailing.[1] Those are important democratic initiatives, particularly the third. But none of those initiatives are as important as addressing sexual inequality and promoting men's sexual welfare. The crown jewel in Solon's reputation for wisdom is his credit for founding public brothels serving all men at a fixed, affordable price.

Free sexual market competition produces enormous sexual welfare inequalities. An experiment on an online dating site showed that women received roughly a hundred times more messages than men did. Across five women and five men with profiles active for four months, the least attractive woman received about the same or more messages than all but one man. The two most attractive women each were sent roughly fifty times more messages than the most attractive man received.[2] Three men received in total only three messages from women across four months. In short, the free sexual market generates large sexual inequality, greatly disadvantages men relative to women, and leaves a large share of men sexually impoverished.

Solon reportedly was the first public official to establish publicly owned and operated brothels. A Greek poet writing probably early in the third-century BGC praised Solon's action:

> You invented something for the use of all men, Solon. Because they say you were the first person to see this — a thing democratic and salutary, Zeus is my witness. Yes, it is fitting that I should say this, Solon. Seeing our city full of young men, seeing too that they had urges that couldn't be controlled and that they they went their > erring way in a direction that they should not, you purchased and stationed women in various quarters, and got them ready and gave everyone access to them. [3]

Men's wrong direction was to impoverish themselves by giving private-enterprising women expensive gifts in the vain hope that the women would then have sex with them. One man in ancient Athens complained about Phryne:

> I fell in love with Phryne … and even through I spent enormous amounts, whenever I visited, her door was locked. [4]

Solon established affordable, tariffed rates for the public prostitutes: one obol per session. The public sex workers worked with the efficiency and dedication that characterizes many public servants:

> There isn't a bit of prudishness or nonsense, nor does she snatch herself away, but straight to it, as you wish and in whatever way you wish. [5]

Public provision of goods and services tends to be associated with lack of options and inconvenience. That, however, wasn't the case for prostitutes in ancient Athens:

> A man can pick whichever one he likes — > thin, fat, round, tall, withered up, > young, old, middle-aged, ancient — > without setting up a ladder and entering the house secretly, > or getting in through a peep-hole beneath the roof, > or being carried in sneakily in a heap of bran. [6]

Public sex services in Athens were more convenient than private alternatives. Honoring and celebrating the great benefits of the public prostitution service to Athens, Solon established a temple of Aphrodite Pandemos – the goddess of love belonging to all the people.[7]

Free sexual market competition generates large sexual welfare inequalities. Almost all men are sexually disadvantaged relative to women. Today's democracies should recognize the wisdom of the ancient Athenian legislator Solon by establishing public prostitution services. Sex is too important to be left to free market competition. Public provision of prostitution can ensure that sex is available to all equitably and affordably. In a truly just and democratic society, such policy would be a worthy complement to compensating men for their erection labor.[8]

Notes:

[1] Plutarch wrote a detailed biography of Solon about the year 100 GC. Here's a modern biography of Solon.

[2] The figures above refer to results after four months of activity. In computing the sex ratios, one must recognize that the top two women's figures are greatly under-reported:

> The two most attractive women probably would have received several thousand more if their inboxes hadn't have reached maximum capacity.

See Jon Millward's post. That suggests that the top two women were sent about four thousand messages in four months. The top man in the period received only 38 messages.

[3] Philemon, Brothers, fragment quoted in Athenaeus, The Learned Banqueters 13.569d, trans. From Greek adapted from Olson (2010) p. 301 and Rosenzweig (2004) p. 17. The original Greek text was in verse.

[4] Timocles, Neaera, quoted in Athenaeus 13.567e, trans. Olson (2010) pp. 289, 291. Anaxilas states in Neottis:

> And isn't Phryne behaving just like Charybdis, > by grabbing the ship-owner and gulping him down, boat and all?

Athenaeus 13.558c, trans. id. p. 239.

[5] Philemon, Brothers, fragment quoted in Athenaeus, 13.569d trans. Rosenzweig (2004) p. 17. The courtesan Clepsydra reportedly regulated her sessions meticulously:

> she had sex with a water-clock (klepsudra) running, and stopped once it was empty

Athenaeus 13.567d, citing Asclepiades, son of Areius, in On Demetrius of Phaleron. From Greek trans. Olson (2010) p. 289. Publicly provided brothels probably provided similarly well-regulated service.

[6] Xenarchus, The Pentathlete, quoted in Athenaeus, 13.569b, from Greek trans. Olson (2010) p. 299.

[7] Athenaeus 13.569d states that Nicander of Colophon in History of Colophon, Book 3, provides the information about Solon's founding of the temple of Aphrodite Pandemos.

[8] Lacking appreciation for law and comedy, a learned scholar declared in a scholarly article:

> May we finally declare Solon innocent of founding public brothels in Athens? This charge was stated as fact by a distinguished historian a quarter-century ago. The hoary old canard has just been repeated in a Greek history textbook written by the same author and three additional well-known scholars and therefore has the potential to mislead a whole generation of young students who consider Oxford University Press publications authoritative. In fact, almost the only reference to Solon and public brothels in all extant ancient literature is a passage in Philemon's Adelphoi. Philemon was a famous playwright of New Comedy. … He might indeed have died from laughing too hard had he known serious scholars were going to base a Solonian law on his play.

Frost (2002) p. 34. Frost argues against Solon founding public brothels with little more than an earnest claim of improbability:

> As improbable as laws regulating male sexual activity may be, so much more incredible would be Solonian laws about prostitutes in the early sixth century

Id. p. 41. Consider some factual, legal farces today: men are forced to pay "child support" to women who raped them and bore a child from that crime. Men's sexual activity is severely regulating and has long been severely regulated. Today men aren't permitted to have consensual sex of reproductive type for pleasure, free of ensuing legal obligations, even if they sign a contract to that effect. Men in U.S. colleges and universities today face draconian sex regulations far beyond anything Draco would have imagined. Based on a fact-based understanding of law and comedy, Solon founding public brothels is not improbable.

[image] Solon reading a book. Woodcut print from Liber Chronicarum (Book of Chronicles / Nuremberg Chronicles), printed in Nuremberg in 1493. Detail from folio 59r in University of Cambridge Library, classmark Inc.0.A.7.2[888]. Thanks to University of Cambridge Digital Library.

References:

Frost, Frank. 2002. "Solon Pornoboskos and Aphrodite Pandemos." Syllecta Classica. 13 (1): 34-46.

Olson, S. Douglas, ed. and trans. 2010. Athenaeus VI, the learned banqueters. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Rosenzweig, Rachel. 2004. Worshipping Aphrodite: art and cult in classical Athens. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Photo of Greek philosophers by mararie

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

6 Quick Tricks to Relieve Upper Back Pain

Maggie Martin · 11 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If the area between your shoulder blades feels like it's on fire at the end of the day, you are not alone. Stress, poor posture, and badly designed workstations all contribute to upper back and shoulder pain. Here are some simple tricks to release your shoulders and upper back from the grip of pain.

Understand your pain

Your first impulse may be to stretch your upper back because the muscles feel stiff. Stretching can provide short-term relief, and some useful stretches appear below. But your pain isn't really caused by tight upper back muscles. The tight muscles are in the front of your body, across your chest and neck. The muscles of your upper back ache from being overstretched, not overtightened. Stretching the upper back muscles feels good, but don't overdo it or you could make your problems worse. For long-term relief, you'll need to strengthen the upper back and stretch the chest.

Stretching and self-massage for pain relief

You've probably already discovered that rolling your shoulders feel good. Wrapping your arms in front of you and hugging yourself, with your elbows held high, gives a mild stretch to the area between your shoulder blades where the knots are. For a more powerful stretch, grip a doorframe with your hands at shoulder height and pull your body away from your hands. You can also reach across with your opposite hand to massage the area. Use your fingertips to explore the inner and upper edges of your shoulder blade, and the space between your spine and the top of the blade. When you find knots, rub them as if your fingertip was an eraser.

Self-test for shoulder alignment

Stand facing the full-length mirror and relax your arms at your sides. Which part of your hands faces the mirror? If it's the thumb side of the hand, your shoulders are properly aligned. If you see the backs of your hands in the mirror, then your shoulders are rotated forward. This is caused by tight muscles in the front of the upper body and overstretched upper back muscles. Imagine spreading your collarbones while you draw your shoulder blades firmly against your rib cage and watch your arms rotate into proper alignment in the mirror. You'll need to strengthen your upper back and stretch your chest muscles to bring your shoulders into the proper alignment. You'll find the following exercises very helpful.

Stretch your chest

To open up your chest and the fronts of your shoulders, stand facing the wall, with your toes and chest touching it. Extend your right arm to your side, at shoulder height, palm on the wall. Keeping your right arm and shoulder against the wall, turn your entire body to the left. Rotate your feet, hip, shoulder, and face to the left so you are looking down the wall away from your right hand. Hold this position for 30 seconds to a minute, while relaxing your right shoulder and letting it sink and soften. Then stretch your left side in the same way. Perform this stretch at least once a day.

Strengthen your upper back

Turn your back to the wall and stand with your hips, shoulders, and head against the wall. Bring your arms into a 'goal post' or 'robbery victim' position: elbows straight out from the shoulders, bent 90 degrees so your fingertips point to the ceiling. Try to keep your elbows and hands in contact with the wall as you slowly slide your hands up as far as you can and then return to the starting position. This is much harder than it sounds, and you probably won't be able to bring your arms straight up while keeping contact with the wall, but go as high as you can. 5-10 repetitions should leave you with the sensation of building strength in the upper back. Repeat once or twice daily.

A delicious passive stretch

Lie down on a mat or rug on the floor. Place a pillow, cushion, or folded blanket under your upper back, so the bulk of the padding is between your shoulder blades and supporting the center of your ribcage. The tops of your shoulders and your head should be on the floor. Lengthen the back of your neck so your jaw doesn't jut up toward the ceiling. If your lower back isn't comfortable, bend your knees and place your feet flat on the floor. Adjust your arms to they are comfortable but the stretch through your chest is strong and delicious. You can either spread your arms out to your sides, palms up, or bring them overhead and hook your index fingers together to hold them in place. Relax in this position for several minutes, breathing slowly and deeply.

Give your body time to respond

It will take a time to retrain your body into an alignment that doesn't strain your shoulders and upper back. Stay conscious of your posture, and when you feel your shoulders and head sliding forward, bring them back into alignment by lifting your front ribs and relaxing your shoulders downward. The stretches and exercises given here will help relieve your pain, and you will find yourself craving the opening and release. Some Chiropractors instruct their patients to do the wall exercise and stretching every time they go to the bathroom. That's a great way to remind yourself to do them several times each day!

The Ghomeshi Verdict – TFF Episode 35

AVfM Video Source · 11 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 35 Professor Fiamengo discusses the Ghomeshi Verdict, Critical Legal Theory and it impacts on the presumption of innocence.

StudioBrule

Dr. Kamrul Hasan of London, “Known Genital Mutilator” Admits MGM is Cultural, Not Medical

Gary Costanza · 12 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Kamrul Hasan has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website circumcision-clinic.com:

“Welcome to the London Circumcision Clinic

We are a London based circumcision clinic located in Leytonstone. Our qualified surgeons carry out circumcisions on all age groups of males, including cosmetic circumcisions for adult males.

We employ numerous methods to ensure the correct procedure is used and also that it is carried out in a safe and sterile environment. Our patient confidentiality is of the strictest practise and confidentiality is assured to the highest level.

Our “After-Care” service provides you that peace of mind, especially when young children are involved. Our surgeons are available through out the year and can do home visits at your request.”

The Plastibell device shown above is one tool used by Dr. Hasan to circumcise infant boys. As you can see there are six sizes, and crucial to minimize bleeding and complications the right size must be used. What if his size is in between those choices? What if he’s bigger or smaller than the biggest or the smallest? That’s what happened to Jayvas Carson, a baby boy who was circumcised with the wrong size Plastibell, had massive bleeding, and ultimately died.

Under “Circumcisions” we see:

> Benefits of Circumcision
>
> Hygiene above all is the most important reason to get circumcised. Those that are opposed to circumcisions may say that one does not need to get circumcised to keep the penis in a clean and hygienic state and that regular self hygiene is sufficient. This is like saying that you can allow your nails or hair (armpit, pubic hair) to grow as long as you want as long as you wash it regularly. Given the fact that a circumcision done by a fully trained professional is a safe and a relatively affordable procedure – it seems logical that the foreskin that serves no function is better removed.

Wow, just WOW. So, the foreskin grows like your fingernails? Wrong. Like your hair? Also wrong. Funny, I’ve never seen a man’s foreskin grow down to his knees like hair would. A valid comparison would be to say that pulling your nails off is better than having to do all that trimming.

And for him to also say the foreskin has no purpose just shows how ignorant Dr. Hasan is about the foreskin. The foreskin is a living organ that is part of the penis, not dead tissue like hair or nails, and has an important function in protecting the penis, giving sexual pleasure to it’s owner, and making intercourse easier and more enjoyable.

Under “Circumcision FAQs” we see:

> Is the procedure painful?
>
> Circumcision should be a pain free procedure, as long as the local anaesthetic has been administered correctly. We do get a few horror stories of procedures being done during which the child has felt the pain and the whole experience of both parents and child has been awful. You can rest assured that your child will not be in any form of pain during the procedure. The only thing to warn you would be that children in the age group 1 – 5 years of age can be difficult to circumcise, as they are at an age where they are weary of strangers and won't let anyone go near them. This age group of patients do pose a challenge for us – nevertheless, we do cater for them as well.
>
> What is the best age to get a child circumcised?
>
> The best time is when the child is born, soon after birth at the age 2-3 weeks. The advantages are that the procedure is easy to carry out using the Plastibell ring method and most importantly, the recovery is very quick.

Although the Dr. says "you can rest assured that your child will not be in any form of pain during the procedure," there is no way of knowing if this procedure is painless, and on the contrary, many babies wail away because of the pain and many times go into shock. The American Academy of Pediatricians recently made a recommendation that circumcision NOT be performed on infants because of damage done to an undeveloped nervous system.

And no, there is no "best age" to be genitally mutilated without your permission, and it would be safe to say 100% of infants strapped into the "Circumstraint" would agree.

Under "Circumcisions" we read "Medical Reasons:"

> What are the medical reasons for circumcision?
> Phimosis
>
> In babies, the foreskin and the glans develop as one, only separating during childhood. As a result the infant foreskin is frequently tight and inelastic. Some doctors may suggest circumcision in these circumstances. Others say that generally the foreskin loosens by the age of three and that true phimosis, which affects fewer than 1% of boys, is very rare before the age of five.
> If possible, watchful waiting is sensible in suspected phimosis because the vast majority of foreskins loosen themselves naturally. While only 4% of baby boys have a retractable foreskin, 98-99% of 18 year-olds do. The figures are from the British Medical Journal, 1993, the same article that revealed that many surgeons simply cannot tell the difference between an everyday tight foreskin and true phimosis.
>
> Balanitis
>
> In Balanitis the glans and/or the foreskin become inflamed. It can affect men of all ages including boys (most commonly around the age of three or four).
> Poor hygiene, a tight foreskin, skin disorders, allergy to products such as soap or washing powder or to the latex or spermicides in condoms can all damage the skin and, if this becomes infected, balanitis can develop. Balanitis is not transmitted sexually but bacteria called candida can cause it. Sex may also damage the skin. It is best avoided by keeping the penis clean, especially under the foreskin but in recurrent cases circumcision might be offered.
>
> Painful sex due to tight foreskin
>
> If an adult is finding sex increasingly painful as a result of non-retractile foreskin, having a circumcision can be one of the most satisfying treatments they can undergo that will result in painless and enjoyable sex. It has to be remembered that following a circumcision you do need to abstain from penetrative sex for about a month.
>
> Overwhelming evidence now exists for a role of circumcision in reducing the transmission of HIV
>
> One of the first randomised controlled trials (RCT) undertaken was at The University of Versailles, in South > Africa, in Orange Farm, a community with a low rate of circumcision and a high prevalence of HIV infection, showed that circumcision reduced the rate of HIV infection among heterosexual man by 60%.

These "medical reasons" have been debunked and some of these are actually caused by circumcision. Those HIV studies in Africa were never finished and were stopped because the results they were getting showed circumcision was ineffective in stopping HIV. Let's see, the U.S. has the highest rate of circumcision in the developed world, and also the highest AIDS rate, so it's obvious that circumcision is not preventing HIV. It's also obvious that those African men who get circumcised will think they are safe from getting and spreading HIV – as they were told – and will not need to wear a condom, resulting in millions of new AIDS cases as a result of thinking circumcision will prevent HIV.

Dr. Hasan is unclear as to whether or not circumcision is medically beneficial, citing some reasons above in favor, but also mentioning under "Circumcision to prevent future disease:"

> Prevention of disease is the second most commonly given reason for circumcision after religious reasons, although the evidence that it has any beneficial effect on future health is very poor. The practice is, more likely, rooted in cultural traditions, although western societies may find this an uncomfortable conclusion.

He goes on to say about "Penile Cancer:"

> Circumcised men are more at risk from penile warts than uncircumcised men, and the risk of developing penile cancer is now almost equal in the two groups. Therefore, routine circumcision cannot be recommended to prevent penile cancer.

"STDs:"

> Far more effective and reliable methods than circumcision exist to reduce the risk of contracting sexually transmitted diseases, such as the use of condoms and adoption of safer sexual practices. Thus circumcision cannot be recommended to prevent these infections.

"HIV Infection:"

> Circumcision may be appropriate as a routine preventive measure only in regions that have a high rate of HIV infection, such as sub-Saharan Africa. The existing evidence is inadequate to recommend circumcision as an HIV-preventive measure in the UK.

"Cervical Cancer:"

> A study in 1947 reported that Jewish women rarely developed cervical cancer and the author attributed this finding to the fact that their sexual partners were circumcised.
>
> Further studies over the past 50 years have had contradictory conclusions, with experts enthusiastically championing the case for and against circumcision. The evidence is inadequate to recommend it as a preventive measure against cervical cancer.

"Urinary tract infection (UTI):"

> Since 1987, several studies have suggested that uncircumcised male infants are up to 10 times more likely to contract a urinary tract infection (UTI). One in 100 uncircumcised infants will develop a UTI, compared with 1 in 1000 circumcised infants.

> A UTI is not usually a great risk to health, so it does not seem reasonable to perform a surgical procedure on 100 infants to reduce the risk of one developing UTI.

It seems Dr. Hasan admits he performs genital mutilations mainly for hygienic or religious reasons and not medical necessity, making routine circumcision of infants unethical and immoral.

Since Dr. Hasan has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Hasan's practice information follows:

London Circumcision Clinic
324 Cann Hall Road, Leytonstone
London
United Kingdom
E11 3NW

surgery@circumcision-clinic.com
0207 043 9747
07947464530

> Dr Kamrul Hasan "Known Genital Mutilator" Admits MGM Cultural Not Medical https://t.co/ukTYPiOmhR @AndreaHardie #MGM pic.twitter.com/epQcMElHXQ
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 12, 2016

Anti Circumcision Protest

AVfM Video Source · 12 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Circumcision is barbaric. One guy fighting for infant boys rights is Brother K from bloodstainedmen.com. In a chance meeting while I was at the Alamo on a recent US road trip these wonderful people (yes, women were there donning the bloodstained pants) showed the way by exercising their freedom of speech a powerful yet humane way. I left the encounter richer for many reasons. I hope that people that disagree with this protest, or believe that circumcision is a non-issue, still see the humanity that lies in their hearts. Bloodstains may be ooh aah controversial, but have you seen the torture tables that boys are strapped to, and heard their cries?

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_EXRk0QHqj8&feature=youtu.be&ab_channel=SixMinutes

Six Minutes

The ‘agony’ of being a 50/50 mother?

Peter Lloyd · 13 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article originally appeared on DailyMail.com and is republished here with the author’s permission. EDs

This article is also available in Italian.

Just when you think the modern gender debate can’t descend any further into toe-curling incredulity, something else emerges to surprise you.

So you can imagine my delight when I read yesterday’s article in FEMAIL about the ‘agony’ of women having to consider their children’s fathers as equal parents.

No doubt struggling to be heard over the swell of sympathy violins, three mothers all bemoaned the inconvenience of 50/50 access, implying that dads should be neither seen nor heard – except when coughing up child support, of course.

One summed it up when she said: ‘I know the girls have to see their dad, but at the end of the day I’m a mother who has to learn somehow to stop being a mother for half of my life.

‘I’m not sure I can ever come to terms with that. I don’t know many mothers who could.’

My response? BOO-HOO. Not just because their grievances were focused on themselves, rather than their own kids, but ‘cos men have been dealing with this crap for decades without any sympathy from the sisterhood.

Given that a child is produced by BOTH parents, meaning they are never just ‘hers’ – only ‘theirs’ – these mothers have no right to assume such entitlement.

Moreover, 50/50 access is basic equality. If these women don’t like it they should either A) not have children or B) only get pregnant with a willing sperm donor who has already relinquished his human rights in advance.

That may sound gauche, but it’s true. Besides, men have long suffered parental alienation at the hands of vindictive exes who become ‘pawn’ stars when separation strikes – using their children as a weapon to enact revenge for a broken heart.

Now, they’re getting a taste of their own medicine, and they don’t like it.

It’s not just ordinary people who are affected. In recent weeks alone we’ve seen Madonna embroiled in an ugly family spat while Kate Winslet also got into hot water for dissing equal dad involvement.

So, for all their declarations of girl power, it’s a bit rich that they’re moaning now.

When I wrote about this hypocrisy in my book, Stand by Your Manhood, I met countless fathers who were suicidal because of such behaviour, including James Blunt’s brother-in-law, Fathers4Justice campaigner Guy Harrison.

When the relationship with his first daughter’s mother soured, he gave her more than £125,000 in child maintenance but still wasn’t allowed any access to his little girl, Isabella.

To this day, he hasn’t seen her for 15 long years, despite spending an extra £50,000 on 38 court appearances, all of which were pointless because judges will not jail mothers who flout formal access orders. He became so depressed that he had a shotgun in his mouth – and very nearly pulled the trigger.

Sadly, this is the rule – not the exception, with fathers frequently left so desperate they resort to scaling buildings in protest.

So how on earth can these women be so selfish to think this behaviour is acceptable? Let me tell you: the answer is modern feminism.

Yep, what was once about basic equality of opportunity is now (and I quote yesterday’s article) pre-occupied with the ‘upper hand’.

Together, their approach is shamelessly Orwellian: ‘everybody’s equal, but some people are more equal than others’.

Don’t believe me? Look at the facts. 100 years ago, while women who were campaigning for the vote, large numbers of working class men couldn’t vote either – but the suffragettes only campaigned for women’s emancipation. Sadly, since then little has changed.

In the 50 years that feminism has become the social and political status quo, it has done nothing to tackle the countless big issues faced by today’s men – the soaring life expectancy gap fuelled by unequal NHS spending, the school system failing boys, the criminal sentencing gap, paternity fraud, circumcision, unfair divorce rulings, female-on-male domestic violence and false rape allegations.

Seriously, us blokes must be the worst oppressors in history.

But, because feminism teaches women they’re perennial victims and deserve whatever they desire, the bare-faced cheek of being selfish with a child’s parental relationship seems utterly acceptable.

When you add to this the fact that family breakdown annually costs us £44billion – yep, more than the defence budget – it’s complete madness. Which is precisely why these women need a wake-up call. Because, until their spoilt-brat belief system changes, there will be countless more unhappy children who suffer as a consequence.

‘The idea of equality seems to have come as a shock to some mothers,’ says Matt O’Connor, who founded Fathers4Justice in 2001 and, 15 years on, is still battling to get equal parenting for both parents enshrined in law.

‘Like pregnancy, you can’t have a little bit of equality. You either have it, or you don’t.

‘There are four million UK children living in fatherless homes. In some inner cities, up to 80 percent of families have no dad. According to our own figures, we estimate that 200 children lose contact with their dads every day in secret courts.

‘The agony of mums who surrender time for children to see their own dads is insignificant to the living bereavement that estranged fathers go through.

‘For most dads, 50/50 parenting is a distant dream as they live the nightmare of being separated from children they love and desperately miss. Just imagine the pain of waiting every two weeks just to see your child for a single night? And just imagine if the roles were reversed, the outcry there would be if mothers were treated the same way as fathers?

‘Women can’t have it both ways. If they believe in equality and responsible parenting, they have to support shared parenting’. Sadly, this also means that well-meaning men who support the Women’s Equality Party’s Sophie Walker in London’s mayoral race are turkeys voting for Christmas.
And, if they tolerate it, their children will be next.

As maddening as it was, yesterday’s article was a stark wake-up call for anyone who thinks feminism is truly about gender equity.

Until it evolves into something that also sets men free, it is just trade unionism for women.

Sorry ladies, but – when it comes to parenthood – it’s time to surrender your female privilege.

OMGerd! | Boning a dead meninist

AVfM Video Source · 13 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Paul [Elam] and Karen [Straughan] star in the blockbuster series, Bones. Feminists are up in arms, and everyone is shaking their heads. Full episode of The Murder of the Meninist can be seen here.

Karen Straughan

My long mistrust of the Christian Right, with apologies to Robert Stacey McCain

Dean Esmay · 15 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This essay is probably the first draft of something likely to be more refined for my book project, "God and Man in the 21st Century." It started with a social media exchange where I blew my stack at Robert Stacey McCain for this essay: The Myth of the Masculinity Crisis, which has some undeniably true things in it–but also things that were hard to jibe with with what I know of this Christian family man, who says things I hear too often from other self-described "conservatives." Regardless, Robert is also still wrongly censored on social media like Twitter by the corporate masters who control far too much of the Internet. He is a conservative and Rightist. I hope he and others in his circle read this and ponder.

What does Christian embrace of partisan politics do to Christians?
Christianity is often good for governments when they embrace it. It's often lousy for Christians though.

It is a myth that the United States was founded to be a 'Christian Nation." Indeed, if we look at the history of Western Civilization, the United States may have been the first country that was not an explicitly Christian Nation, although we were founded by a plenitude of mostly-Christians and what we might call "pious non-observants" steeped in broadly Christian and Platonic values.

Furthermore, Christians have been involved in politics, left wing and right wing and otherwise, since this country was founded. Which is as it should be, in a broad pluralist society. Or so I would think.

For about a century, you could reasonably predict how most Americans would vote based on what strain of Christian they were: "High Church" Episcopalians and Lutherans, Unitarians, Quakers, and some others trended toward Republicans, while working class and rural Baptists, Methodists and other "Evangelicals," along with Catholics, were usually Democrats.

Yes, though you wouldn't know it today, the Democratic Party was once a stronghold of Catholics and mostly-humble mainline Protestants. It was also strongly influenced by Evangelicals who hailed from farming and working class backgrounds, whose standard-bearers included the likes of William Jennings Bryan and James Earl Carter. It was only in the 1980s that conservative-minded Christian voters, especially Evangelicals, started voting overwhelmingly Republican, with various movements within that Christian "coalition" eventually melting into what we in the mid-2010s now call "Conservative Evangelical Voters." Meanwhile, two of the fastest-growing groups within Democratic ranks are self-described atheists and agnostics.

All this was I think good for the Republican Party but not so good for Christians. I especially think today's politically "Conservative" Christians of the United States, overwhelmingly dominated by "Evangelicals" but also including some from other denominations (including some Catholics like William Bennett), really need to stop and think just how far they have allowed themselves go in the last few decades in order to ally themselves with economic materialism and what is now an ill-defined mostly-secular ethos called "The Conservative Movement."

It's not always bad, since after all making money is indeed a good thing–among many other good things–and there really is a time and place for upbraiding someone who is complaining about a problem they can fix for themselves. But when the shibboleths and habits of worldly ideologies like Corporate Capitalism start to confuse in our minds with what is eternally true, always valid, and will never be owned by any political party or ideology, I think there's a serious problem.

In embracing a "conservatism" that has become obsessed and enthralled by things like "markets' and "competition" and "efficiency" and "winners and losers," many Christians appear to have abandoned, or at least forgotten, the part of us that cared about someone we used to call "the working man," or what Walter Russell Meade has beautifully described as flawed but loveable Jacksonian America.

If your focus is on the bull, you've got a problem. (Image via dailyprayer.us.)

Many Christians, including not just Catholics but many Protestants, were never entirely comfortable with this "Conservative" alliance with modern capitalism-obsessed Republicans, as they recognized we have greater responsibilities than making money and idolizing those who make lots of it. They realized it tended to also draw Christians toward a harsher, colder worldview, and toward worship of the almighty dollar–what Christians of all stripes used to call Worship of Mammon and all that goes with it, including pride and selfishness and hedonism and contempt.

I'm hoping to get the attention of those who think their faith is best expressed by voting "conservative" by reminding them of this.

I've been watching this trend since the 1980s, and now, it's 2016 and I have noticed that if you speak of compassion and obligation to your fellow man, or of the grave moral hazards and moral responsibilities of wealth, even to fellow Christians, you're looked at like you may just be a closet Bolshevik.

I'll tell you what that obsession with "market principles" and "competition" and "efficiency" and "winners and losers" often looks like from a Catholic perspective: idolatry. We Catholics get knocked for allowing statues in our Churches, which some tell us is idolatry, but we think that's nonsense; the issue in idolatry isn't the statue, it's what it represents. Those who pray before idols historically were always seen as worshiping what the idol represented: lovers of war gods worshiped conflict and competition, lovers of sex gods worshiped sex, lovers of mother gods worshiped motherhood, worshipers of luck worshiped money and power, and so on.

This guy was a Pagan and even he got it.

In their rough alliance with the Republican Party and economic thinkers like Ayn Rand, Murray Rothbard, and Friedrich Hayek–no doubt dazzled by their usually-correct critiques of Marxism–too many Christians in my view have come to unthinkingly speak of things like "competition" and "efficiency" and "winners and losers" in a very vaguely-defined "free market," as if these and other "capitalist" concepts are core Christian values.

On their way to opposing the International "Social Justice" Left, they don't seem to have noticed they have been moving toward the opposite evil: uncritical praise of capital acquisition and, worse, actually celebrating the dog-eat-dog mentality it too often leads to.

It also tends to lead to the evil of binary thinking: if left-wingers say something, they must be wrong. It's a reductionist effect that usually looks like this:

1) Socialists are wrong about many things and have caused much damage

2) Socialists advocate compassion and treating all people justly

3) Therefore, compassion and empathy and concern for mankind is Socialist

Call me a preachy moralist if you must, but I suggest you look carefully at the logical leap between 2 and 3 above.

I really would like someone to explain to me where they got the idea that God thinks Greed Is Good and Competition Is Holy, or how they can jibe dividing men into "winners vs losers," with anything Jesus said in the entire New Testament. Or where it says that the best message for someone begging for help from the side of a ditch is "man up and stop whining."

So, now it turns out the Secular Left has begun taking a somewhat more serious interest in issues faced by our sons and brothers, led by secular Social Justice ideologues like Michael Kimmel. Those of us who have been working for years at the thankless task of advocating for our sons and brothers and fathers are well aware of hateful, dishonest pseudointellectuals like Michael Kimmel. Indeed, I and others I work with have done battle with his ilk for years. So have people like Professor Miles Groth, who tried to get psychologists to study male psychology from a non-feminist, non-ideological lens, but had his program destroyed by feminists in Michael Kimmel's orbit.

But the funny thing is, feminists like Kimmel used to ignore men's and boy's issues almost entirely. Now, they at least acknowledge them–and now I read Conservative Christians brushing those issues off as nonexistent or trivial or whining?

After years of complaint by those who advocate for the rights of our sons and brothers, Kimmel and other feminists have begun grudgingly admitting some problems are real: as some Kimmel-feminists recently put it, young men have "much higher involvement in violent crime, as both perpetrators and victims; boys' higher likelihood of educational failure; untreated mental-health problems and, compared with women, vastly higher suicide rates."

They are right. Indeed, that's only a start on acknowledgment. There's a lot more I could list. For example, boys are the most frequently targeted for infanticide, and in fact are more likely to be murdered by their mothers than their mothers are to be murdered by their fathers. Boys are also more likely to be sexually abused than girls are. They're more likely to be thrown into foster homes than girls. They're more likely to be murdered at every single stage of life, at every age. Today, between the ages of 18 and 30, they are often actively discriminated against by programs to "equalize" the nonexistent "Wage Gap" and promote less-qualified women above them. They're more likely to be enslaved or made indentured servants. They're more likely to be falsely imprisoned. They're far more likely to be arrested for the "crime" of defending themselves from assault, too.

I could go on, because there's more, and plenty of objective nonpolitical references to back it up–but why should I bother if so-called 'conservative' Christians will brush it off and call it whining?

Have you had to console a father whose only son has killed himself? Have you had to look a hard-working, always-supported-himself black man and tell him he is now functionally an indentured servant to an ex- who blackmailed him and won't let him see his kid? A white man who's been tortured by police? A boy who's been raped by a woman who took him into foster care? Have you talked to a man who's been assaulted and then imprisoned by a false accuser? Have you talked to a homeless man with obvious mental illness who's walking the winter streets in sandles and sleeping on a grate for warmth? I've done all that in just the last two years.

I have also talked to men who said when they tried to speak of their woes to their fellows at Church, they were shunned and told to stop whining. And treated as if everything was their fault–no matter what happened, it's always the man's fault apparently.

By the way, none of these men were me. But they could have been. And they could have been your brother or your son.

Young men are streaming out of our Churches. Some of that may be what we've always known–many young people leave Church and come back when they get older. But the rate of exit today is higher than it's ever been, and many I've talked to are pissed at Christianity because all they ever get fed is shame sandwiches and "Man up" messages about how all responsibility in life falls on their heads, even in situations they have no control over at all–and please, let us dispense with childish "real men are always in control" nonsense: try telling that to me from a prison cell, or when you're told if you try to call your child on the phone the police will arrest you and you will never see your kids again.

If feminists are starting to sound like maybe someone actually gives a damn, what do you suppose young men, often from fatherless homes, think? Probably "Oh, feminists give a damn maybe."

Now think what happens when they then read conservatives refer to men desperately struggling as "whining" and "blaming failures on others," and calling them "losers" who want to "blame their own failures on society."

Now imagine what they think when they hear they should suck it up and expect no sympathy and no support from a Christian.

I usually think it's bad form to throw Bible verses at people, not only because it seems presumptuous but because it invites prooftexting and bickering. I'll hazard it this time, but I'll make it an exercise. This is from one of the Gospels. Instead of looking it up, I suggest you ask yourself if you remember it:

> "Then he will say to those on his left, 'Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. For I was hungry and you gave me nothing to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me nothing to drink, I was a stranger and you did not invite me in, I needed clothes and you did not clothe me, I was sick and in prison and you did not look after me.'
>
> "They also will answer, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry or thirsty or a stranger or needing clothes or sick or in prison, and did not help you?'

> “He will reply, ‘Truly I tell you, whatever you did not do for one of the least of these, you did not do for me.’

Christian Conservatives, can you read? No one said you have to agree with liberals on how to address these things, but shrugging them off with sneering contempt makes you worse than the feminists.

Some feminists are acknowledging some real, empirically demonstrable problems now. You apparently won’t even do that.

Will you one day to come hear the words “suck it up whiner, no one cares” repeated back to you?

Will your excuse be, “the world is like that?” Because yes it is. But you are in it, Christian, and you’re asked for more.

Why indeed are young men drawn to unGodly political ideologies while streaming out the doors of the Church? Might it be because they are fed conflicting messages, told their needs do not matter, when they are attacked it is their fault, when they have their possessions stripped they are mocked, when they lose their children they are sneered at, when they’re wrongfully accused, falsely imprisoned, abused by their mothers or wives while being helpless to stop it lest they lose their children, or just desperately crying from howling spiritual pain and wanting to die to make it stop–WHERE WERE YOU AND WHAT DID YOU SAY?

Then speak to me if you will of the God-given rights of men.

Here’s a secular British man I happen to know named Glenn Poole. As I recall, he’s also an atheist. Maybe you don’t like his secular approach or his commitment to an idea of “equality” that’s ill-defined and thus theologically dubious. But at least he’s speaking, and I can assure you that every word he says about the conditions young men, particularly fatherless men, face these days, is true:

The secularists are at least trying to do something. What are YOU doing, Christian?

What Does Feminism Mean?

AVfM Video Source · 15 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On Masculinity

Paul Elam · 16 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Note: Article also available in Portuguese.

Michael Kimmel is correct—masculinities are toxic.

A few months ago, I encountered one of these masculinities. A couple of teenage boys were checking out some girls. This was rape culture.

In the past two weeks, President Drew Gilpin-Faust informed students at Harvard that in response to another one of these toxic masculinities, she would penalize members to same-sex sororities and fraternities in an effort to destroy those organizations.

Just yesterday, I saw a third form of these toxic masculinities. It was a homeless veteran—dirty, drunk, stinking, yelling at passersby and begging for money: again, rape culture—(truly, this one).

Masculinities are toxic. They are as toxic as shattering glass: its shards lacerate.

These days, Women's Centers, bereft of problems and having to create their own, are deconstructing masculinity into masculinities. However, none of them ever defines "masculinities." They don't even define masculinity, for that matter. They deconstruct what they have not defined into subsets they have not defined—the feminist mind is a wondrous algebraic tool.

There are no masculinities.

There is masculinity, and one can only describe it, not define it. It is transparent—an elusive ideal. I see it in my mind. Its face—black, white, Asian, at once—is beautiful. Its body moves with the grace of Nureyev or Michael Jordan or a coal miner. Its mind focuses with the force of Newton or a construction worker. Its chest heaves with the muscle of a bodybuilder, vibrates with the resonance of Pavarotti, and ripples with the tearful laughter of Robin Williams. It reveals the treachery of Darth Vader through the wisdom of Luke Skywalker.

Men know masculinity—as men. I love it so much that my desire to emulate it borders on the sensual—and that's cool. The desire for something and desire to be something are in close proximity. I do not fear when desires cross.

I compete against the facets of the "one" masculinity; and always lose. However, the loss makes me compete again: work out more in the gym, care for my body by eating the right food, study longer, work harder, sleep more, laugh, sing, dance, play with my children and make love with my wife.

However, when that "one" is deconstructed, it no longer reveals itself as a facet of the "good" but as disintegrated shards; and then I find myself competing not with masculinity, but in urgency to sidestep broken glass, with my fellow men.

Kings and queens, both, constructed the code of chivalry to get men—often, boys—to die for them. Later, society usurped the code—made it about women. The construction of chivalry inevitably leads to the deconstruction of masculinity. The deconstructed facets of masculinity then become sharp weapons—to use, to abuse and to wage. Chivalry compels men not to compete with the form of the one ideal masculinity; rather, it drives men to compete with each other. It is a self-fulfilling prophecy that validates Michael Kimmel. Kimmel is correct but only because he lives amidst the shards and, like an effete knight on a fluffy unicorn, comes racing, bare-chested, to save men from the pain his very agency tries to inflict upon us.

How do Kimmel and the feminists justify this deconstruction? This is true womansplaining here: they expect men to respect masculinities the way they respect femininities. Feminists are so occupied womanalyzing pluralities they forget that men find truth and comfort in the quest for singularities.

In fact, Raewyn Connell, Kimmel's teacher, first validated the word masculinities. Shortly after declaring the existence of masculinities, she changed her sex—great for her—and then identified a shard that hurts women. She then described, but never really defined, several of these masculinities based on a shard. However, Raewyn was never a man. She was a transwoman—I am happy she figured out she was female—and this means she had the brain structure of a woman; she validated the same old pluralities and was biologically restricted from envisioning the beauty of a singular masculinity—I get it. Kimmel didn't. Even if, in some ivory tower, one could validate a plural, does it help our sons become men? No, it only builds Kimmel's CV: the more masculinities, the more research papers—yes, we know the game.

But let's check out a few femininities that are valued by feminists—for the fun of it.

Last year, feminists hailed Meghan Trainor's song "All about the bass" as a new anthem. The lyrics were a noble crusade of contemporary feminism. This singer is not bringing Jerusalem back—this soldier is ambitious—she is "bringing booty back." Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, befuddled by this hullabaloo, would lay down their swords and shields and genuflect before the altar of such divine inspiration.

Gloria Steinem clamored upon the altar to inform women that they need a man the way a fish needs a bicycle. In counterpoint, a man needs a woman the way Beethoven needed hearing—he didn't. Newton invented the Calculus, Michelangelo sculpted The David, Dostoevsky wrote "The Brothers Karamazov," truckers drive the rigs, and the United States landed men on the moon and brought them safely home—without women. Gloria Steinem is still a fish. Her protégé, Andrea Dworkin—that captious admirer of men, was still a whale. Gloria swims in an underworld that would be bereft of art and science if not for men, while she informs her sisters there is a special place in hell for them if they don't vote the way she demands. (Actually, it could have been Madeline Albright who said that—heck I don't remember which one said what. You know how it is: once these feminists get old they sound cantankerously alike.)

We also have the feminism of Beyonce, who, in the same release, sings "if he fuck me good, I take his ass to Red Lobster." Later, she takes a bat named "hot sauce" to smash car windows because the ass cheated on her. If this woman stopped excusing her sister for domestic violence she might be able to make peace with her ass. I appreciate the spirit of her songs, but her contradictions inform my compassion for my black brothers who are suffering the arrogance of her misinformation.

Then we have the feminism of the Women's National Soccer Team. They claim they bring in as much money as the men's soccer. The team is inspiring and deserving of accolades—President Obama called them bad asses, but they do not bring in the same money. Their argument is deceitful, if not laughable.

If feminists prefer the plural for femininity, who am I to argue?—but there is one masculinity.

Michelangelo's David

The form of the one masculinity does not hurt or damage men and boys. Men see the one—we perceive it in out mind's eye with both its virtues and vices. Just the other day I took my twelve-year-old son to see the new superhero movie. Unlike Michael Kimmel, my son knows this movie is silly—but my son is intelligent. When my son imagines having superpowers, he knows he is playing. I do not lecture him that his imagination disrespects women. I guide him to respect the ideal form of masculinity, revealed by superheroes: Newton, Beethoven, Michelangelo and Dostoevsky and the men who collect the trash from our homes. Just because feminists have only fish and whales to admire, does not mean I will shirk from admiring civilization-building masculine achievements. The positive accomplishments of masculinity empowers my son; its negatives keep him from the dark path; and he must see them both as one. We do not deconstruct men; we respect masculinity and its continuous flow into itself through light and dark. A boy's respect for women should follow his respect for masculinity, not precede it and never replace it. I teach my son that the singular form of masculinity is good and he should aspire to it and compete against it, but never deconstruct it or disrespect his fellow man.

Only when it is deconstructed do masculinities becomes toxic. If Michael Kimmel wants to deconstruct it and see a superhero as toxic, we can only laugh at him. Word on the street is that he is now calling for a Holy War: a crusade through the Barbie aisle in Toys R Us. In this sacred battle, I place my bet on Lady Barbie of the Long Legs.

In fact, more word on the street is that the Women's Centers of the country are now in collusion to eradicate toxic masculinities. They're rebooting a classic movie. The female lead (they're considering Gilpin-Faust for the role), facing the carnage of the country's war on women—a carnage leaving homeless women on the street, dirty, drunk, stinking, yelling at passersby and begging for money (truly fiction, this one)—will reissue the famous phrase de la terreur modified for the feminist agenda: "But Luke, darling, I am your mother."

—and Ghostbusters—

I also teach my son and daughter that women and men are strong, good, smart and beautiful and that feminism is a toxic movement of the bowels. Feminists, preoccupied with kicking ass, are growing hysterical. (Have you ever noticed that feminists are obsessed with girls who kick ass, taking asses to Red Lobster, bringing booty back and being badass athletes? What is it with feminists and the rectum?) In the face of war with no defined enemy, armed to the teeth, they are flushed with neurosis.

Men should continue to ignore the word "masculinities:" the word is artificial and ridiculous. There is one masculinity, and, to reclaim the chorus of the ninth, it is joy: "[And] all men will become brothers under [its] gentle wing." Gay and straight men must continue forging final fraternity in respect of masculinity. We should focus on its facets and never dare to define it, but revel in its singular conception; not fear it—aspire to become it and accept when we fail; encourage each other to climb again; turn our ear to a voice for men and the deaf one to feminism.

We are not Beethoven; but, like Beethoven, we are men.

This Week in Stupid (15/05/2016)

AVfM Video Source · 16 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sargon of Akkad gets it all right with respects to the MRM. Reference the last five minutes of his video. EDs

"I don't care how well-intentioned your racism is."

Sargon of Akkad

Dr. Terry Russell of Brisbane, AU "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 17 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Terry Russell of Russell Medical Centre in Brisbane, Australia has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website circumcision.net.au "About:"

"The principal of Circumcision Australia group of doctors is Dr Terry Russell OAM. Dr Russell was the first doctor in Queensland to use the Plastibell device, and he pioneered the use of anaesthetic cream in Australia for a safer, more comfortable circumcision. His research forms the basis for current best-practice.
Since starting the use of topical anaesthetic cream in 1993, the circumcision Australia group of doctors have performed over 38,000 circumcisions using topical anaesthetic cream and the Plastibell. Dr Terry Russell is the only doctor ever appointed a mentor of the R.A.C.G.P for the teaching of circumcision. He has four children and fourteen grand-children of whom he is very proud."

The Plastibell device comes in six sizes (see above) and must fit the boys penis to avoid extra complications, including death. It's terrible that devices like this are legally made to facilitate the illegal, immoral, and unethical practice of cutting and amputating part of an infant's genitals.

Under "Info" we see:

> Circumcision is a simple surgical procedure that removes the foreskin – a sleeve of skin covering the end of the penis. Parents in Australia have the legal right to authorise circumcision. In order to make an informed decision, you must carefully consider the benefits and risks.

It's not a "simple surgical procedure," it's a permanent amputation of an unconsenting infants body part that results in trauma that may affect the boy permanently. The AAP recommends against surgery such as circumcision on infants.

The doctor says "you must carefully consider the benefits and risks," except no one gave parents a right by proxy to force elective permanent surgery on an infant. It's like saying "he's a Democrat" or "he's a Republican" – stupid, right? Except here it's mutilation.

Dr. Russell is not just a provider of circumcisions, he's a big promoter and advocate for MGM. See some of his opinions in this news article at The Courier Mail, "Health officials no longer recommend it, but one doctor says all boys should be circumcised," and this video from 60 Minutes Australia:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oFMivM2beDA

Under "FAQs" we read:

> HOW MANY HAVE YOU DONE AND HAVE YOU HAD ANY COMPLICATIONS?
> Russell Medical centre was the first group of doctor in Australia to research the use of anaesthetic cream in combination with the Plastibell for childhood circumcisions. The results of the research were published in 1996.The circumcision Australia group of doctors have now performed over 38,000 circumcisions for boys of > all ages using topical anaesthetic and the Plastibell.

> Results after 38,000 (plus) circumcisions:
> There has never been a significant bleed
> There has never been a transfusion
> There has never been a systemic infection
> There has never been a major cosmetic problem
> There has been one minor anaesthetic problem, which resolved spontaneously overnight
> Minor bleeds (drops, not mls) affect about 0.5 % of all boys and are easily treated in house
> Minor infections (purely localised) affect less than 2% of all circumcisions and are always treated in-house and often don't need antibiotics

> WHAT ARE THE RISKS?
> The risks of any surgical procedure are:
> Risk of bleeding
> Risk of infection
> Surgical mishap
> Anaesthetic complications
> The Plastibell technique has proven effective at minimising all these problems.

Risk of bleeding and scarring is 100% and many mangled penises end up causing untold numbers of boys years of discomfort and further surgeries.

Since Dr. Russell has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Russell's practice information follows:

(07) 3349 6444
(07) 3349 7444
info@russellmedical.com.au
www.circumcision.net.au
620 Kessels Rd (via Benaud St), MacGregor QLD 4109

> Dr. Terry Russell of Brisbane, AU "Known Genital Mutilator"https://t.co/FIhghyK1mh @AndreaHardie #MGM #intactivism pic.twitter.com/9aHDvO5bbS
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 18, 2016

Do women really want equality?

Nikita Coulombe · 18 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"On second thought—you hunt, I'll gather."

Do women really want equality? It's a question I think every one of us needs to ask ourselves. Because frankly I don't think many of us do, not real equality anyways.

Feminists would have us believe that life is so much worse for women than men, that we are weak, and the "patriarchy" is against us, and therefore we deserve all sorts of programs and benefits just to be on a level playing field with men. But the plain fact is: here in the West, we have it pretty great. In many ways better than men. And if we really took a look at men's lives, we might realize that.

Most of us don't want to pay half the bill on dates, we don't want to work dirty and dangerous jobs, we don't want to be drafted if there was a war, we don't have to prove to a court that our children need us after divorce, and we don't want to serve as unpaid bodyguard or be the first one to go downstairs when we hear a strange noise… and luckily for us, we don't have to!

Because men do these things. Voluntarily. Every day. They don't ask for a "thank you" because it is so built-into them to give, to serve. And, although it may surprise some readers, men do these things because they love women. They are doing these things for us so we might love them back.

Should women get paid the same as men for doing the same work? Absolutely. But the supposed "pay gap" debate is full of misleading headlines and unfounded data. Men work longer hours than women do and choose specialties that require more responsibility. For example, more women are now attending medical school than men, but they gravitate towards areas such as pediatrics rather than cardiology and neurosurgery, which carry greater risks and responsibilities, have more demanding hours (see here and here), and as a consequence, pay more.

Institutions are trying to get more women to enter into these intense programs and are confused why they cannot raise their numbers. The reason is – women don't have to, so we don't! The gender divide is actually most pronounced in nations where women have the most freedom to pursue whatever profession they want. There is a greater percentage of female scientists in Russia or Turkey than in Canada or Germany, for example.

[image]

Long-term studies reveal that women prefer more meaningful and connected jobs, which enhance their emotional advantages but "conflict with making lots of money and rising through the ranks," as psychologist Susan Pinker discusses in The Sexual Paradox:

> Intrinsic goals such as making a difference, or belonging to a community, are often in direct opposition to extrinsic goals like seeking financial rewards or status… women, on average, are motivated by intrinsic rewards at work… One of [the] findings was that the sway of intrinsic rewards and autonomy on the job rises with a woman's level of education… highly educated women were also more interested in working part-time, thus fueling the opt-out phenomenon in two ways – through their search for inherent meaning at work, and via the amount of time they were willing to commit to their jobs.

And men take less time off from work after having kids – giving them more work experience and thus greater earning potential. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell talks about the three options a mother considers when she has a baby:

1. Work full-time
2. Home full-time
3. Combination of the two: work part-time

Men, on the other hand, consider these three options:

1. Work full-time
2. Work full-time
3. Work full-time [work overtime could be another option!]

In general, he says, men learn to love their families by being away from the love of their families while women love their families by being with the love of their families.

Women talk about whether or not to "lean in" or "lean out" while men have never had the option to "lean out." This gives men the financial advantage but cuts them off from giving and receiving love.

In Father and Child Reunion Farrell writes:

> Women provided an emotional womb, akin to love; men provided a financial womb, that took them away from their purpose – loving and supporting the family, in order to achieve their purpose – loving and supporting the > family. Men loved the family by being disconnected: women loved the family by being connected. Traditionally, women's role had the love advantage and the emotional advantage.

Would more women be willing to share their love advantages or share financial pressures with their husbands?

It is one consideration often missing from the pay gap debate – if it were acceptable for men not to have to work so intensely, women could choose jobs where they could make more money. However, that would only happen if women wanted real equality, because men would then have to be valued for more than just their wallets, just as women are.

Yet women largely still want to be with a man that makes more money than them, reinforcing the cycle where she must then take more time out of the workforce than him to care for their children.

In "Why Women Still Can't Have It All," Anne-Marie Slaughter suggested men don't have to make the kind of sacrifices and compromises women make, that the hypothesis that women can have high-powered careers if men are willing to share the parenting load equally "assumes that most women will feel as comfortable as men do about being away from their children, as long as their partner is home with them."

In her follow-up book, Unfinished Business, she explains, "women also face much more cultural responsibility to be caregivers, and perfect ones at that, than men do. Even in the twenty-first century, America looks askance at any woman who doesn't appear to put her children's care above her professional life."

But who is putting the pressure on whom?

What appears to be a man choosing work over family is more often a man sacrificing his wishes to be with his family for the benefit of his family.

Where a woman may feel she is selfish by spending time away from her children, a man may feel the opposite. Since he is expected to earn more, he feels it would be selfish for him to work fewer hours to spend more time with his kids because he would be taking away financial security from his family.

The average man makes more money than the average woman, but the average man works more hours and is willing to do so because he hopes to be rewarded with love when he picks up the tab.

Meanwhile, women are rewarded with love when they reduce their hours or drop out of the workforce after having children.

Affordable childcare would allow more women to stay in the workforce if they choose to, ensuring less of a pay gap due to work experience. But there is evidence this might not even be enough or the right solution. Even in Sweden, a country with some of the most generous parental leave benefits, women still choose to take four times as much time off from work as men, and some who initially thought they wanted the father to help raise their baby now find themselves "coveting more time at home."

Another concern is how the merging of more traditionally feminine and masculine roles in women and men will affect gender identity and relationship success. The question remains whether or not women would still find their stay-at-home partner as attractive than if he were their stay-at-work partner.

Thus far, it appears this kind of man, often referred to as a "beta male," turns women off. For example, psychologist Lori Gottlieb found the risk of divorce is lowest when the husband earns 60 percent of the income and the wife does 60 percent of the housework, and women report higher levels of sexual satisfaction when there is a more traditional division of chores.

In other words, equal opportunity does not necessarily produce equal results, and economic shifts and socially prescribed relationship changes towards "sameness" do not necessarily result in sexual attraction and relationship success, which cannot be forced.

Being a man and a stay-at-home partner is not seen as valuable and does not communicate alpha male behavior, which many women are attracted to. Indeed, even as women become more financially independent, they want an older and wealthier male partner.

The stakes have been raised, not equalized, by the women's movement, at least for men. And men will carry whatever currency women are accepting – meaning they will adapt to whatever system rewards them.

Children get these messages about reward and the value of a father's love in subtle ways. For example, in the Harry Potter book series, despite both James and Lily (Harry's parents) giving their life to save his, only his mother gets the credit.

When Harry is an infant, the evil wizard Lord Voldemort descends on the family's hiding place because of a prophecy that Harry will grow up to destroy him. James yells at Lily to take Harry and flee so that he can hold Voldemort off. He dies protecting them, and then Lily dies protecting Harry, but because of her love, Voldemort's killing curse backfires and irreparably damages him, leaving Harry with the famous lightening bolt shaped scar on his forehead.

The primary message is that love is stronger than hate. The secondary message is a mother's love is more powerful than a father's, and a mother's death more profound.

Nobody talks about the secondary message because it is so ingrained. What is surprising is given the popularity of the series, few readers took issue with the fact that James and Lily's actions had the same consequence yet her sacrifice was worth more. It is just one of many instances of a male's purpose being seen as secondary to the mother-child connection.

The message boys are still getting is that they must provide financially to remain relevant. On some level boys know that a man with little-earning potential is less likely to find a desirable partner and is more likely to get divorced; they know that a significant portion of their value and desirability is directly linked to their earnings potential (see here and here).

Boys also catch on to the stigma against stay-at-home fathers – a recent Pew Research survey revealed that 51 percent of people say children are better off if their mother stays at home while just 8 percent feel the same way about fathers.

That is probably why women comprise the majority of college graduates, yet men are still the majority of STEM majors.

Based on the proportions and differences in earnings, at first glance, it could look like discrimination against women, yet both sexes knew beforehand that going the STEM route would most likely lead to a higher income.

One reason why men and women differ in major choice is that they simply have different preferences. For example, men would rather work with inorganic materials while women prefer to work with living things and mathematically gifted women are more likely than mathematically gifted men to have strong verbal abilities, giving them a wider range of career choices.

Another reason men and women differ is that more often men have to pay their own way. The trend of parents spending more on their sons' education in the 1970s not only equalized in the 1990s but was reversed by the late 2000s; parents now spend about 25 percent more money on their daughter's education than their son's.

Also, there are plenty of scholarships offered to people of all sexes and ethnicities, but more scholarships – both academic and athletic – are offered exclusively to women than to men. For example, on scholarships.com – one of the most popular sites in which to find and apply for scholarships in the US – women's scholarships outnumbered men's four to one.

Women have other advantages when it comes to health and well-being. All around the world women outlive men. Slightly more men are diagnosed with prostate cancer than women are diagnosed with breast cancer, yet breast cancer research is supported by federal spending over prostate cancer at a ratio of nearly two to one (see here and here). Men die at higher rates from nearly all the top fifteen causes of death; the largest differences are in diseases of the heart, suicide and fatal injuries sustained from unintentional accidents. Men also outnumber women in dangerous jobs. Ninety-two percent of work fatalities in America were men. Construction accounted for the most deaths, with the majority of accidents occurring from falls and slips.

Women are more likely to have suicidal thoughts than men, but suicide is four times higher among men, representing four out of five in the US. In fact a half million male suicides could have been prevented in the last 15 years – about the same amount of people that have died in the US AIDS epidemic to date. And men account for both the majority of the sheltered and unsheltered homeless. This includes male veterans, who make up a sizeable portion US homeless population.

In other words, many men are invisible. When men are not actively contributing to the system, the system forgets about them. The "patriarchy" then, doesn't care about men either. As psychologist Roy Baumeister said, "What seems to have worked best for cultures is to play off the men against each other, competing for respect and other rewards that end up distributed very unequally." Whereas women get rewarded for "being" men get rewarded for "doing" – "Men have to prove themselves by producing things the society values… That basic social insecurity of manhood is stressful for men… but that insecurity is useful and productive for the culture, the system."

Women live in a much friendlier, much less cutthroat world. As a woman, when I walk down the street, I can smile at people and they will smile back. I can smile at children, and no one thinks I'm a pedophile. If I cry people will comfort me. If I feel discriminated against people will help me. If I get sexually assaulted people will believe me – unless evidence proves otherwise. Men cannot say the same thing.

You know what's worse than catcalling? No one ever asking you out. Never feeling desirable. Always having to take the initiative sexually and getting rejected most of the time. One of the luxuries of being a woman is that we don't have to ask for affirmative consent because we don't have to take the initiative and therefore are not held responsible or accountable for anything that happens. Sure I am smaller and more physically vulnerable, but at any point I can accuse any man of saying something sexist or touching me in an inappropriate way and he could lose his job and family. He is guilty until proven innocent. Even if he's found innocent, I would face no repercussions.

Ultimately, if we actually wanted equality we would be asking men what life is really like for them. Because as long as male roles are limited, female roles will be limited, too. If we actually wanted equality, we would be talking about equal responsibilities alongside equal rights; we would be having honest conversations around biological differences and attraction. Until we do these things, we will find ourselves in a continual gridlock, complaining about such trivial things as manspreading and wondering why we can't have it all while mistakenly believing men do.

All Aboard for Trans Central Station! – Paul Elam is Joined by Zander Keig, Theryn Myer and Blaire White

AVFM Hangouts · 20 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The news cycle has been alive lately with transgender issues. President Obama threatened to withhold funding from schools who don't allow people to use restrooms according to their gender identity. Almost immediately half of what passes for conservative America reacted by showing how much they hate and fear men.

Angst-ridden citizens from coast to coast are standing in line for their turn at the fainting couch, terrified that our decent womenfolk are at risk from encroaching biological males.

It's a sad and beautiful country.

Fortunately, we menfolk needn't worry. Or so it would seem by the lack of concern from politicians and pundits who are convinced that women are in grave danger.

This, and much, much more will be the topic of discussion on a special AVFM Hangout, with Paul Elam hosting a panel of three people who happen to be transgender.

Paul is joined by Zander Keig, Theryn Myer and Blaire White for an in-depth discussion of the emerging transgender political movement and how it impacts the dialogue about men and boys.

That happens on Saturday, May 21 at 5:00 PM Pacific, 7:00 Central and 8:00 Eastern, here on A Voice for Men.

Chasing the dragon

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 20 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Many students of sexual politics posit the "scientific" notion that our culture of extreme gynocentrism is a basic biological reality; that we should either get with the program and enjoy it or bow out in a nihilistic fashion.

An alternative explanation of gynocentrism suggests it is merely an exaggeration of human potential; one that leads to social and reproductive failure despite common beliefs.

The bioscience lexicon can be helpful in understanding this.

A superstimulus refers to the exaggeration of a normal stimulus to which there is an existing biological tendency to respond. An exaggerated response, or, if you will, superresponse, can be elicited by any number of superstimuli.

For example, when it comes to female birds, they will prefer to incubate larger, artificial eggs over their own natural ones.

Large, colorful eggs are a superstimulus. Leaving real eggs out to die is the superresponse.

Similarly, humans are easily exploited by junk food merchandisers. Humans are easily trained to choose products that cause heart disease, diabetes, and cancer over the nutritious food they evolved to eat and thrive on, simply by playing tricks on the taste buds and manipulating the starvation reflex.

Sugar and refined carbohydrates are superstimuli. Consuming toxic substances is the superresponse.

The idea is that healthy human behavior evolved in response to normal stimuli in our ancestor's natural environment. That includes our reproductive instincts. The same behavioral responses have now been hijacked by the supernormal stimulus.[1]

From this perspective, we see that a superstimulus acts like a potent drug, one every bit comparable to heroin or cocaine which imitate weaker chemicals like dopamine, oxytocin, and endorphins, all of which occur naturally in our bodies.

As with drug addictions, the effects of superstimuli account for a range of obsessions and failures plaguing modern man – from the epidemic of obesity and obsessions with territoriality to the destructive, violent and suicidal behaviors central to our modern cult of romantic love.

An interesting tidbit about superstimuli of manufactured narcotics is the phenomenon known as "chasing the dragon." It is a term that originated in the opium dens of China, and it refers to what happens the first time a person inhales opium vapor. The resulting euphoria is complete, even magical — the first time.

Subsequent to that, the user tries again and again, with ever-increasing amounts of the drug, to re-create that first blissful high. They can't do it. The brain is now familiar with the flood of manufactured opiates. The user gets high and very addicted, but the magic of the first experience is an elusive butterfly.

They pursue it, though, with all their might, chasing the dragon they rode in their first experience.

We see a similar phenomenon with men trying desperately in their relationships with women to be rewarded with redeeming love, sex and approval, through the use of romantic chivalry. It sends them, like an addict, traveling the path of a Mobius strip, going in circles, chasing the dragon.

There is little doubt in our minds how this happens.

Here are three examples of human superstimuli, and how they are used to elicit a destructive superresponse in the human male.

1. Artificially manufactured neoteny

Neoteny is the retention of juvenile characteristics in body, voice or facial features. In humans, neoteny activates what is known as the parental brain, or the state of brain activity that promotes nurturance and caretaking. The activation occurs through something called an innate releasing mechanism.

A classic example of an innate releasing mechanism is when seagull chicks peck at the parent's beak to get food.

Each adult seagull has a red spot on the underside of their beak, the sight of which instinctively triggers, or releases, the chicks to peck. It is the innate releasing mechanism.

This innate releasing mechanism, of course, is essential to the survival of seagulls, and there is something like it to be found in all birds and mammals — any creature that cares for its offspring. In mammals, juvenility is one of the innate releasing mechanisms that unconsciously determine our motivations to protect and provide, thus ensuring the survival of the species.

Juvenile characteristics in humans, however, can also be manipulated to garner attention and support that far exceeds the demands of survival.

In particular, neoteny is exploited by women to gain various advantages, a fact not lost on medical doctor and author Esther Vilar, who writes:

> Woman's greatest ideal is a life without work or responsibility – yet who leads such a life but a child? A child with appealing eyes, a funny little body with dimples and sweet layers of baby fat and clear, taut skin – that darling minature of an adult. It is a child that woman imitates – its easy laugh, its helplessness, its need for protection. A child must be cared for; it cannot look after itself. And what species does not, by natural instinct, look after its offspring? It must – or the species will die out.
>
> With the aid of skillfully applied cosmetics, designed to preserve that precious baby look; with the aid of helpless exclamations such as 'Ooh' and 'Ah' to denote astonishment, surprise, and admiration; with inane little bursts of conversation, women have preserved this 'baby look' for as long as possible so as to make the world > continue to believe in the darling, sweet little girl she once was, and she relies on the protective instinct in man to make him take care of her." [2]

Zoologist Konrad Lorenz discovered that images releasing parental reactions across a wide range of mammalian species were rounded heads and large eyes (left), compared with angular heads with proportionally smaller eyes that do not elicit such responses.

Compare Lorenz's images on the left with images of skilfully applied eye makeup above by the modern woman in search of romance. The many colored eyeshadows, eyeliners, and mascaras, not to mention the hours practiced in front of the mirror opening those eyes as wide as possible and fluttering – all designed to spur the viewer's paleo reflexes into action.

Neotenic female faces (large eyes, greater distance between eyes, and small noses) are found to be more attractive to men while less neotenic female faces are considered the least attractive, regardless of the females' actual age.[3] And of these features, large eyes are the most effective of the neonate cues[4] – a success formula utilized from Anime to Disney characters in which the eyes of adult women have been supersized and faces rendered childish.

2. Exaggeration of sexual qualities

Clothing and postures which exaggerate the hips, thighs, ass, breasts have been cultivated for millennia.

The cut, color, and drape of clothing; the underwear, corsets, lingerie and the shoes, hats, jewelry and other accessories make for a long study in the evolution of fashion – and in terms of sexuality they stand for nothing less than superstimuli designed to elicit an overload of sexual attraction in the viewer.

Perhaps more interesting on the enhancement front is the arrival of plastic surgery designed to transform the body into a theater of superstimuli, sometimes with grotesque, even fatal results. Such is the risk invited and embraced in the pursuit of enhanced sex-appeal.

Breast implants, butt implants, botox injections, nose jobs, tummy tucks, facelifts – all designed for enhanced sexuality, and even more importantly, enhanced power and control.

3. Artificially intensified pair-bonding drive

We have all heard the advice of the seasoned matron to younger women; “Don’t turn your love on like a tap or he will lose interest – withhold some affection and you’ll always have him begging for more.”

Same goes for his appetite for affection. Keep him in constant emotional hunger for you and he'll be more attentive and easier to control.

This message is now so widespread that animal-training techniques are being redeployed by women who wish to control their man’s attachment needs. In How to Make Your Man Behave in 21 Days or Less Using the Secrets of Professional Dog Trainers we read, > Consistently a dog is “nicest” when he wants to be fed. Then he becomes all wags and licks. A known trick for keeping a dog on his best behavior is to just fill his bowl halfway so he’s yearning for more.

>
> Same goes for his appetite for affection. Keep him in constant emotional hunger for you and he’ll be more attentive and easier to control.

As cruel as it sounds, withholding affection, sex, approval and love have become part of women’s repertoire of superstimuli used to coerce men into service. Perhaps there was a time when that service could have been considered an appropriate response to a survival oriented stimulus. Now, however, it has been replaced by superstimuli and male service has degenerated into a destructive superresponse.

Such dating advice for women abounds on the internet with the aim to intensify a man’s desire by turning a secure bond, a necessity for healthy relationships, into a brass ring. Only on the ride of romantic chivalry, like all carnival sideshows, the game is rigged. The brass ring remains ever just out of reach.

Men’s basic human need for love, acceptance, and security, is frustrated, leaving them in a perpetual cycle of deprivation.

Indeed, it is one of the core principles of romantic love to keep the bond in the realm of tantalizing denial, and men, therefore in constant readiness to be manipulated and used.

The word tantalizing comes from the Greek story of Tantalus. Tantalus, as the fable goes, offended the Gods. His punishment was to be placed in a river with the water up to his neck. A tree full of ripe, red apples leaned toward him.

The Gods afflicted him with a raging thirst and hunger. When he bent his head down to slake his thirst – the waters receded. Likewise, when he reached up to grab one of the apples, the branch recoiled higher and out of his reach.

Women are socialized to tantalize men with the possibility of pair-bonding, to keep fruit of love ever out of reach, and to further muddy the waters with the dictates of romantic chivalry.

If you want that pair-bond, which is to say if you want to be more tantalized, you had better greet her with flowers, hold the door open, and of course pick up the bill.

Be prepared to live that way for the rest of your life, exiled to the river with Tantalus, ever thirsty and hungry. In modern times, simple attachment is transformed into something complex – an impulse now guided by customs of a romantic chivalry, designed to tilt maximum power toward the woman.

Even when the pair-bond is supposedly attained, you may still experience the withdrawal of love, sex and approval as a method of control. It can even be worse once bonded than during the courtship process.

Such behavior from women is not a simple, innate reflex, but one in which they are culturally educated and socialized. Most girls become fluent in the game of inclusion and exclusion, in groups or among friends, well before the reach the age of 10 and the meta-rules learned there reappear again in popular dating advice – rules designed to meddle in the attachment security we social creatures would otherwise enjoy sans the manipulations.

The rules for women resonate shamelessly throughout an entire genre of literature:

- Keep an air of mystery
- Only put in 30 percent effort
- Make him come to you
- Never see him with less than 7 days notice
- Never call him unless returning a call
- Never return a call or text immediately
- Make him approach you
- Don’t call back immediately. You are a girl in demand.
- End call first after 15 minutes ALWAYS. (Even though it sucks. He will call you more.)
- Even if you are not busy, pretend like you are

Those items are the product of a cursory scan of just two internet dating sites with advice for women. They are not, however, an invention of the information age. They are the long codified expressions of what women have been taught, from generation to generation, since the advent of romantic chivalry.

They are obedience training basics for conditioning the romantically chivalrous man — superstimuli, powerfully effective in eliciting a superresponse. In this case, servile, blind sycophancy from weak, non-introspective men.

Romantic Love

Romantic love can be reconceptualized as a cluster of superstimuli, with each facet driving the human nervous system into over-excitement. That excitement tends to negatively impact men's long-term welfare. The damage is not contained there. Our social and familial world is disintegrating rapidly under the excesses and toxicity of romantic love. In a way, romantic love has become one of the most anti-human exploitations of human biology to ever grace our species.

To understand where this originated we need to take a brief look at the history of romantic love, previously called courtly love, to show that the same elements were already at work at its inception. As laid out in great detail by medieval forebears, the literature reveals the same exaggerated neoteny, enhancements of sexuality, and the same obsessions surrounding control of romantic attachment.

While the neoteny ploy has been in operation at least since ancient Egypt in the form of colored eyeshadow and eyeliners, the practice gained greater popularity after the Crusaders found eyelid-coloring cosmetics used in the Middle East and who spread the practice throughout Europe.[5] By the Middle Ages, European aristocrats were widely using cosmetics, with France and Italy becoming the chief centers of cosmetics manufacturing, including the use of stimulant compounds like Belladonna (Italian name meaning "beautiful woman") that would make the eyes appear larger.[6]

Thus neoteny, manufactured by artisan techniques, became the cultural inheritance of each successive generation of girls who were – and still are – taught the art of applying and then displaying makeup, especially to the eyes. Such practices probably encouraged praises of women's eyes in troubadour poetry, such as we read by the poet Ulrich von Liechtenstein in his autobiography titled In The Service of Ladies. There we read;

> The pure, sweet lady knows well how to laugh beautifully with her sparkling eyes. Therefore I wear the crown of lofty joys, as her eyes become full of dew from the ground of her pure heart, with her laughing. Immediately I am wounded by Minnie."

Translated from the French: "How extraordinary! This morning I tied a knot and this evening there is a bow."

Clothing too was always used to enhance sexuality, however fashions didn't change much over the course of millennia and their sexual utility was not fully realized. The beginnings of frequent change in clothing styles, along with recognition of their multitude ways of enhancing sexuality, began in Europe at a time that has been reliably dated by fashion historians James Laver and Fernand Braudel to the middle of the 14th century – a period when sexualised items like lingerie and corsets began their rise to fame.[7]

Jane Burns PhD adds further evidence of clothing's role of sexually empowering medieval women in her book Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture.[8]

As mentioned earlier, the most powerful of romantic love's tricks was the tantalizing of men with a promise of attachment, a goal that would remain largely out of reach. Stories of the troubadours attest to a hope-filled agony that plagued the male lover, with men dwelling in a strange kind of purgatory in waiting for a few "solaces" from the beloved.

The medieval love-game went into full swing when codes of romantic conduct encouraged a toying with the two extremes of acceptance and rejection. Compare the above list of dating rules with the following list from The Art of Courtly Love – a love manual widely disseminated in the 12th century:

- Love is a certain inborn suffering.
- Love cannot exist in the individual who cannot be jealous.
- Love constantly waxes and wanes.
- The value of love is commensurate with its difficulty of attainment.
- Apprehension is the constant companion of true love.
- Suspicion of the beloved generates jealousy and therefore intensifies love.
- Eating and sleeping diminish greatly when one is aggravated by love.
- The lover is always in fear that his love may not gain its desire.
- The greater the difficulty in exchanging solaces, and the more the desire for them, and love increases.
- Too many opportunities for seeing each other and talking will decrease love.[9]

Shakespeare's most romantic of plays tells the same story, with Juliet keeping her lover midway between coming and going, between stable pair-bonding and the single life. Here Juliet tells her obedient lover;

> 'Tis almost morning. I would have thee gone.
> And yet no further than a wanton's bird,
> That lets it hop a little from his hand
> Like a poor prisoner in his twisted gyves,
> And with a silken thread plucks it back again,
> So loving-jealous of his liberty.

To which Romeo replies, in accord with the expectations of romantic love;

> I would I were thy bird.

Following this little detour into history we now come to a final juncture of this article where we ask Aristotle's million dollar question – that for the sake of which. To what end are these superstimuli employed?

Many would offer the clichéd answer that such practices garner "reproductive success," that the woman employing them gains a quality mate and produces offspring to perpetuate the species. But this explanation is too simple. For starters, there are other aims of a human life than reproduction; such as garnering of food resources, securing wealth, attachment needs, or of securing narcissistic gratification for a woman who may never intend to have offspring – the resources garnered via her carefully orchestrated superstimuli can serve other ends.

Moreover, it appears not to have entered the minds of the reproduction enthusiasts that such strategies may, in fact, be deleterious to reproduction – all one has to do is look at the failing relationships everywhere, lowering birth rates, and decaying societies in the West that do not portend a future of success riding on the back of the superstimuli we've grown so fond of exploiting.

Narcissistic gratification is certainly one motive we've under-emphasized in our focus on reproduction, though it too is not the final motive. There can be nothing more gratifying to the narcissistic impulse than to wield power – as do most women – and to this end superstimuli places immense power in their hands.

Narcissistic indulgence may well be a heavily socialized trait in modern women, but it also proves to be a short-term windfall with not so gainly long-term results. Evidence shows that the misery index for women has risen sharply in the age when they "have it all."

To summarize all that we've said, the extreme gynocentrism we live with today is a freak, a Frankenstein that on some level should not be, or at least should not be any more than the super-sized Cuckoo chick that swells in the nest of a tiny finch. It's an event that our systems were not specifically designed for – yet we remain caught in the insoluble loop of desire that keeps it going.

We might think of it as a propaganda campaign every bit as strong as those used during the world wars to target our territorial reflexes, only this campaign has been in continual use and refinement for the last 900 years.

Whatever gynocentric impulse lies buried in our nervous system, it has now been supersized, and we continue to supersize it with ever more refinements of superstimuli. But if we regain our awareness we might, just might, kick this Cuckoo's egg out of our biological nest – that can begin by recognizing that we have been hypnotized and deciding that we no longer wish to indulge it.

It's as simple as choosing not to chase the dragon, but to slay it.

Sources:

[1] Wikpedia article for Superstimulus.
[2] Esther Vilar, The Manipulated Man, (1971).
[3] Jones, D., Sexual Selection, Physical Attractiveness and Facial Neoteny: Cross-Cultural Evidence and Implications, Current Anthropology, Vol. 36, No. 5 (1995), pp. 723-748.
[4] Cunningham, M.; Roberts, A.; Vu, C., "Their ideas of beauty are, on the whole, the same as ours": consistency and variability in the cross-cultural perception of female physical attractiveness". Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 68 (2): 261–79 (1995).
[5] John Toedt, Chemical Composition of Everyday Products, (2005).
[6] Linda D. Rhein, Mitchell Schlossman, Surfactants in Personal Care Products and Decorative Cosmetics, (2006)
[7] Laver, James., Abrams, H.N., The Concise History of Costume and Fashion, (1979).
Fernand Braudel, Civilization and Capitalism, 15th–18th Centuries, Vol 1: The Structures of Everyday Life", William

Collins & Sons, (1981)
[8] Jane Burns, Courtly Love Undressed: Reading Through Clothes in Medieval French Culture (2005)
[9] Andreas Capellanus: The Art of Courtly Love (republished 1990). Capellanus' love manual was written in 1185 at the request of Marie de Champagne, daughter of King Louis VII of France and of Eleanor of Aquitaine.

Cuckoo image by vladlen666 – Own work, CC0,

Major Christian “Kit” Martin is acquitted of child sex abuse

Paul Elam · 20 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

U.S. Army Major Christian “Kit” Martin is Acquitted of Child Sex Abuse Charges at Fort Campbell Court-Martial – Million Dollar Plus Persecution Effort by Corrupt JAG, Only Results in Misdemeanor Convictions. PE

In an update of a story we have brought to you here and extensively covered by the National Coalition for Men, Decorated U.S. Army Apache Helicopter Pilot, and Iraq combat veteran, Major Christian “Kit” Martin of the famed and historic 101st Airborne Division at Fort Campbell Kentucky has been acquitted of all invented and manufactured child abuse sex-related charges in court-martial that concluded on Friday, May 13, 2016.

Major Christian “Kit” Martin

The National Coalition for Men has recently reported that Major Martin was convicted of two counts of simple assault and two counts of mishandling classified information.

In the NCFM post, they reported on the extreme efforts that corrupt Fort Campbell JAG prosecutors, Major Jacob Bashore and Major James Garrett pulled every sneaky and sleazy legal trick and maneuver out of their “convict by any means necessary” playbook. They also posted a litany of facts and evidence that was kept from the eyes and ears of the courts-martial (jury) panel. Please go the NCFM post and related articles which contains a very detailed listing of things that were kept out of the proceedings.

Joan Harmon-Guerra

What is very telling, is that Bashore and Garrett in a last second effort to save their case pulled out a dirty little trick. Moments before the court-martial was to begin on Monday, May 9th; they dropped all sex-related charges pertaining to Major Martin's primary false accuser; his convicted felon, bigamist, sociopathic lying ex-wife; Joan Harmon-Guerra.

By dropping all charges pertaining to Harmon-Guerra, the JAG prosecutors tactically prevented the introduction of her vast three-decade-plus history of frauds, false allegations, abuse, coaching her kids to lie under oath, and assorted state and federal crimes.

So ferocious was the determination to convict Major Martin of "something," that corrupt prosecutors Bashore and Garrett made a spectacle of themselves in court; objecting to the majority of facts and evidence that Major Martin's civilian defense counsel; R. Tucker Richardson and James Phillips, attempted to introduce, and sought to mislead the panel, that court watchers reported that even some of the panel members turned their heads, and raised their eyebrows in disbelief. What was also very troubling, was the fact that the judge; Colonel Michael Hargis allowed the prosecutors to get away with it.

James Phillips

R. Tucker Richardson

Consequently, the jury only heard a smidgen of the history of Harmon-Guerra and her attempts to destroy Major Martin by inventing salacious sexual misconduct allegations including related allegations against her three kids from two different fathers.

The jury was not able to see a 2012 video from Christian County Court where Harmon-Guerra petitioned for a restraining order against Major Martin, where testimony was presented that when Harmon-Guerra; upon being told by Major Martin that he wanted a divorce, proclaimed;

"If you divorce me, I will ruin your life; I know how to do it."

To the many U.S. servicemen who visit this site, let those words sink in. This kind of fiasco; a million dollar plus tax payer funded persecution to any and all who are simply accused of domestic violence or sexual misconduct is awaiting you. This is evident in the last 7 ½ years where allegations of DV or sex assault in the military will result in a court-martial, regardless of truth or validity. Conviction is the goal, by any and all means, expense and effort will be employed to achieve that goal.

One allegation from a vindictive soon to be ex-wife being asked for a divorce, or one phone call from an angry girlfriend who gets dumped by a serviceman, is all that is needed to set in motion the full military machine; complete with a small army of lawyers, advocates, government paid hack experts who will employ all kinds of "counter-intuitive" slash, psycho-babble bullshit, hypnotists, tarot card readers and a host of others to ensure a conviction. What will the military try to squeeze in next; testimony from a VooDoo High Priestess to try to convict?

What the jury was also prevented from seeing in that video, was testimony from a Kentucky Legal Aid attorney who just happened to be in the hallway, just outside of that courtroom who was there on an unrelated matter. This legal-aid attorney overheard Joan Harmon-Guerra's kids in a nearby waiting room, discussing their testimony. That was substantiated by another witness who testified hearing the kids stating things such as "we have to get our stories straight," "this is what mom wants us to say," and various similar statements.

Christian County Family Court Judge Jason Fleming denied Harmon-Guerra's restraining order petition declaring that Harmon-Guerra was "not credible" and that she was guilty of witness tampering by coaching her kids to lie on the stand.

Here is one very good thing that should cause all readers to shout out a very loud,,,,,

"Ha… Ha-Ha… Ha. Ha. Ha!!!!!"

Since Major Martin WAS NOT convicted of any child sex offense, and corrupt rocket-scientist prosecutors Bashore and Garrett dropped all sex-related charges pertaining to sociopathic liar Harmon-Guerra, she lost out on over 250K in transitional compensation benefits over the next five years.

Harmon-Guerra's tax payer funded lottery ticket was just made null and void.

Let's all shout that out again so they can all hear it in Kentucky.

"Ha… Ha-Ha… Ha. Ha. Ha!!!!!"

Perhaps, this laugh would be more appropriate.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WofqmWpXJZ8&ab_channel=toper997

Despite being acquitted of any felony, Major Martin was sentenced to three months confinement, a loss of retirement benefits and a dishonorable discharge. As of now, that confinement will be at Leavenworth unless there is a last-minute change.

To show the callousness and vindictiveness of the corrupt prosecutor. Major Jacob Bashore, who by the way, was the same prosecutor who persecuted another innocent soldier, Army Special Forces Sergeant First Class Kelly Stewart and the subject of the book "Three Days in August," by investigative reporter Bob McCarty, slid lower than whale shit.

During the very contentious and argumentative sentencing hearing on Saturday, May 14th, the corrupt Bashore argued feverously for a sentence of five years in Leavenworth, even though under the provisions of the Uniform Military Code of Justice (UCMJ) only calls for a penalty of no more than 180 days in confinement. Major Martin only got 90 days, but it was a little different from what Bashore was initially seeking; 58 YEARS.

The despicable Bashore and the buffoonish Garrett were not yet finished demonstrating their reprehensible conduct. As things got heated and in a blistering and desperate insult, they blurted out some very private, personal and sensitive information concerning the family of Major Martin's fiancé, causing those in the courtroom to gasp in horror.

We have not heard from Major Martin's fiancé or family on this issue, but we would assume that the lawyers are lining up right now to sue the Army, and Majors Bashore and Garrett, personally for this intentional and outright violation of the Privacy Act of 1974. We hope that the result will be that Bashore and Garrett serve 58 years in Leavenworth and are left penniless, just as they tried to inflict on Major Martin.

The vindictiveness of Bashore was still not over after the sentencing hearing.

On a day which should have been a celebration, was a day of sadness for Major Martin's entire family. At the conclusion of the hearing, he was ordered into custody and was to be transferred to a local facility pending transfer to Leavenworth.

The celebration that the Martin family was supposed to enjoy was the wedding of Major Martin's daughter. At nearly the precise moment that his daughter was walking down the aisle, WITHOUT her father by her side; a once in a lifetime moment, Major Martin was probably riding in a jail van, dressed in a jumpsuit and on his way to a local lock-up.

YOU,,,, MAJOR BASHORE,,,, and we know you will be reading this, are the lowest form of despicable excrement in the Army, an embarrassment to all who serve proudly with courage and honor. You robbed Major Martin of his dignity, and freedom based on the delusional claims of a proven sociopathic liar and for you own self-serving interests, but you also robbed an innocent young woman of a once in a lifetime and touching moment. We would like to say shame on you, but do it in a most expletive-filled manner that we really can't put in print.

Question: Can you Identify Major Jacob Bashore?

If you answered, all of the above, you would be correct.

In a very rare move, retired Major Glenn McDonald, Editor of Military Corruption dot-com, in his coverage of Major Martin's story has placed Major Jacob Bashore on his infamous "Hall of Shame." Please feel free to go to the site and review the related articles.

It would seem as though Bashore's vindictive actions are most likely due to the fact that his name has been plastered all over the Internet from multiple sources and in books as the epitome and poster child of the self-serving, politically correct, black-hearted prosecutor who is fully willing and prepared to do the bidding of the rape hysterics. Truly a corrupt prosecutor who is void of ethics, conscience, and who is a disgrace to the military and legal profession.

So dear readers, after reading and absorbing all of the multiple and epic material concerning Major Bashore; where do you think he belongs?

1. A military courtroom, or
2. Disbarred and in solitary confinement at Leavenworth???

The non-profit, "Save our Heroes," has re-posted the latest NCFM article and in less than 18 hours, had over 8,000 views. Military Corruption dot-com, just with its last two articles about Major Martin's case has received over 300,000 views in just over 48 hours, including more than 50 from dot House IP addresses, so it would seem that folks are reading and are reaching out to their elected representatives.

Although this was a tremendous outcome for Major Martin and his family, he still was convicted of misdemeanors as the defense was hampered at every juncture.

His family is thankful that he is not spending the rest of his days behind bars for crimes that he did not commit. But are also very disappointed that a stellar and distinguished career has been left in shatters by a sociopathic lying ex, and a military IN-justice system that by design seeks out to convict any and all allegations of this nature, even in cases, such as this one, where it is known by everyone that the allegations are simply not true.

This is a purging of our male service members. Perhaps, we should all call on our elected representatives to purge the cowardly commanders who facilitate these injustices as well as their lackey JAG prosecutors who carry them out.

There is one thing that Bashore and Garrett were successful at. They are successful at igniting the fire in the bellies of supporters, advocates, families and others to use this case example as a catalyst for reform.

Although this a partial victory for Major Martin and a partial loss, it could have been much worse. The bigger picture and the bigger problem, and what one has to consider is that this kind of persecution is not unusual; in fact, it is the norm; it is standing operating procedure (SOP). That sort of abuse is so endemic and systematic; it appears to be viewed as normal.

The hysterical screeches, screams, and demands by the likes of the Gillibrands' and McCaskills' for more and more convictions, convictions, convictions, are missing the most important element and something that we will never hear from their mouths. How about we determine whether or not an actual crime has been committed first before we start pounding our shoes on the desk in a demand for more convictions? Yeah, I thought so. That little thing is absent from the polluted and diseased gray matter in their craniums.

Even though Major Martin had competent legal counsel in the form of Mr. Richardson and Mr. Phillips, the legal shenanigans and wrangling employed by JAG prosecutors left them little room to get the truth out, and to the eyes and ears of the jury.

One can only wonder of the injustices that are inflicted upon those male service members of lower rank who do not have the support mechanisms and financial resources to adequately defend themselves. If this is any example, our military correctional facilities must be brimming with the wrongly convicted.

Perhaps a Revolution against this witch hunt is in order?

Publishers note: Please help support Major Martin's family during this very difficult time. PE

Demographics: Divorce rape

AVfM Video Source · 20 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Those who purport to be concerned about the demographic trends of Europe should widen their horizons. Mass immigration is just one factor. Other issues that precede that are also relevant factors. And one such aspect is the issue of divorce rape – still widely practiced in most countries of Europe, even after 10 years since the European Court of Human Rights handed a binding decision to reform this aspect of law.

Lucian Vâlsan gets into this aspect with an unapologetic analysis.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Lucian will be speaking about ideology and the driving forces of bad policy at the upcoming International Conference on Men's Issues. You still have 16 days to get your own ticket.

Women's Studies Must Die – TFF Episode 31

AVfM Video Source · 20 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 31 Professor Fiamengo makes the bold claim that it is time to eliminate the Women's Studies department at every university. Academia is a place for academics and Women's Studies is an ideological movement, not a legitimate academic pursuit.

StudioBrule

Formulating the new Male Studies curriculum

Tim Patten · 23 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I recently submitted an article about women who sexually assault and rape boys and young men to Feminist Wire.[i] Naively, I expected the magazine would jump at the opportunity to address this growing threat by publishing what I had written. Instead, they rejected my work, offering up the following excuse:

> We recognize and agree that sexual violence against boys and men are an important and necessary feminist issue. However, we are concerned with the framing of this piece, which focuses on the "flip" ("women do it too") that doesn't account for the dominant power relationships and contexts of institutionalized sexual violence that affect women, men, and transgendered persons. In framing it as "women rape, too" without an engagement with the feminist work that talks about sexual violence as a structural white-hetero-patriarchal practice that affects everyone in different ways, it reads like a denial of women's experience with violence as a way to make visible men's and boys' experience.

Their rejection inspired me to revisit a subject that I've looked at previously. In essence, like the modern day scientists who are brainstorming new theories about modeling dark energy, I felt it was time to consider a fresh approach to the male studies curriculum

The critical gendered lens

When freshmen sign up for a college-level humanities course oriented toward feminism, women's or gender studies, they are urged to examine relationships between heterosexual and homosexual individuals through a "critical gendered lens."[ii] These classes, typically filled with women, LGBTQ individuals, and a few heterosexual men, are predicated on an examination of gender identification and how identity intersects within other social collectives of power and privilege.

From the outset, attendees are immersed in discussions about the dark side of gendered violence, which is defined as intimidation; emotional, verbal and physical abuse; sexual assault; rape; and the murder of women. Approved textbooks "confirm" the pervasiveness of this far-reaching problem, characterizing it as fact. Gender and Communications maintain, for example, that up to 70% of women will suffer from "systematic gendered violence.[iii][iv]

Faced with this manipulative barrage, it isn't long before the critical gendered lens of those taking the course is pointed in the desired direction: Women and queer people are socially marginalized and victims of white male power and violence.

To understand how this perspective is reinforced, it is helpful to visualize the mind's eye peering through a telescope, like those used by NASA scientists, to examine the vast universe of human interactions. When feminist intellectuals developed the notion of a filtered perspective, they determined that a socially marginalized lens was the preferred option, rather than, say, one defined by the most powerful women in history, the prominent lesbian and gay men of history, or women who broke gender barriers in professional sports.

Once the critical gendered lens is in place, students are urged to think about their experiences of being bullied, whether for being different, small or female. They are also encouraged to recall moments when they might have been abused, molested, scolded and disciplined by men. Over time, the association between their personal experiences and gendered inequality becomes ingrained, and many can't help but feel that systematic oppression is real, leaving some with anarchic leanings.

Over time, various subjects, including heteropatriarchy–oppressive male heterosexual dominance–the pay gap, white male privilege, neoliberal capitalism, rape culture, and toxic masculinity, are presented to the class. Although the discussions include a range of perspectives, the primary focus is on female and LBGTQ oppression. Not surprisingly, the plight of those who have been “disadvantaged” tugs at the students’ heartstrings, reinforcing the manipulated biases of their young minds. It also spurs a desire among many of them to seek social justice through disorder and activism.

Overall, such distortions define the rationale behind why one feminist publication, and likely others, are not interested in publishing my article about women who sexually assault and rape boys and young men. In short, my perspective is not consistent with the feminist gender-lensed narrative, actively promoted over many decades, those white heterosexual males are patriarchal rapists.

Feminism’s successes

By helping to liberate females from the kitchen and bring millions of them into the workplace, feminism has enabled America to make great strides forward. In fact, women’s roles have expanded dramatically; they are making important contributions to society, including in those areas long dominated by men. It has even led to women joining the ranks of those running for president.

The women’s equality moment has over the past half century also enabled the LGBTQ community to make significant inroads in many areas of society, regarding acceptance, tolerance and relationship equality. The inclusion of women and LGBTQ individuals in a wide range of sports, the military, government and major vocations has altered and significantly rebalanced the societal landscape, likely forever.

Arguably, the fastest social changes in history have been accomplished as a result of efforts to improve and expand the rights of women, gays and others who had felt maligned, ostracized or oppressed. I and others celebrate these achievements. The advances so far have been amazing, though there is certainly more work to be done. In truth, no one can really say that feminism has not been good for America.

But this cause is not the grassroots movement it might once have been (or claimed to be). It has become a force to be reckoned with, influencing the country’s largest voting block. Feminist groups and publications, rape crisis centers, and battered women’s shelters employ thousands of females; many women also reap direct and indirect personal benefits from the donations and institutional support that feminist organizations receive. Around the country, they are regularly organizing political and health events. They are helping to set the broader agenda.

Changing the narrative

Unfortunately, not all of Women’s Studies efforts are directed at helping those who have been oppressed. Increasingly, radical feminists have sought to gain at men’s expense. Spurred by a rabidly anti-male feminist agenda, colleges have been raising the “red flag” about the threat of toxic patriarchy. Humanities programs, especially those focused on women’s and gender equality, propagandize that men are responsible for an epidemic of rape and violence against females, asserting that only they know how to end it.

And yet, things have not improved; if anything, the situation has gotten worse. The New York Times in 2015 estimated that one out of four women will be assaulted during their time at college.[v] Every day, mothers are warned that their sons, who comprise only 40% of those attending U.S. institutions of higher learning, will be among the estimated one million males who will rape a like amount of their fellow students each year.

By the same token, feminist leaders and women’s studies programs have identified physical abuse as a serious problem requiring their solutions. Two million females are reportedly admitted to emergency rooms each year because of violence and mistreatment by male partners. Moreover, marriages are failing at an alarming rate, with almost one million couples divorcing annually. But again, all of this is happening against the backdrop of teachings and initiatives that feminists claimed would improve relations between the sexes.

In other words, despite their insistence that the feminist way is the best solution to a wide range of social and other ills, their claims have fallen short.

The next opportunity

Now more than ever, it is time to consider an alternative approach, one emanating from a masculine perspective and oriented towards helping men like us to end the violence and better serve ourselves and our communities. Males need a new standard of research, education and intervention. More than likely, this new paradigm will draw on the efforts already underway at New Male Studies, an international online interdisciplinary journal for research and discussion of issues facing boys and men worldwide.

Organizing a new male studies movement

There's little doubt that the approach that has been employed by women and LBGTQ people to improve their standing has had considerable success. But it has only been the first step in defining a society and social order relevant to our times. By creating a critical gendered lens that incorporates the issues and enlightened insights about masculinity being discussed in the "manosphere," for instance, the evolutionary process can now come full circle, creating a better life for all.

Indeed, while rejection inspired this article, it is not a rejection of the feminist approach. Rather, it advocates taking what has proven effective and melding it with the innovative ideas and research that others have been developing. It is an invitation to come up with a new narrative, aimed at promoting a conversation for growth and enabling boys and men to make healthier, higher-quality choices in lifestyles and relationships.

We must all play a role

Like all such initiatives, supporting the new male studies curriculum depends on the efforts and contributions of all involved. Using insights from MGTOW members and the power of the Internet, we can achieve extraordinary synergies and augment the exciting work being done at New Male Studies and elsewhere. Aside from uncovering ideas that lead to better choices, we men can learn to embrace our strengths and understand our weaknesses and biological differences, as well as factors that can help reduce violence and sexual assaults.

In the short run, here are some steps we can take to help further these ambitions:

- Get involved. Change occurs when ideas are aligned and combined with one voice, and that power is then marshaled into many with a common demand. Getting there is sometimes slow and requires each of us to become more directly involved. Recently, one man initiated an effort to find a political connection; to make it happen, he needs your vote. Please consider adding your name to Warren Farrell's petition for a White House Council on Boys and Men[vi] (sign the petition here).

- Resist campus madness. While it may instigate a conflict that few desire, the recent Social Justice Warrior bouts of hate towards Milo Yiannopoulos, Christina Hoff Sommers, and Steven Crowder has inspired a petition aimed at drawing attention to these dangerous tirades. The popular YouTuber, Sargon of Akkad, initiated this action. Please consider adding your name to the list of those voicing support (sign the petition here).

- Put your thinking cap on. All of us have the ability to brainstorm. By collaborating with great thinkers like Spinosauruskin, Dr. Miles Groth, Ph.D. John Ashfield, and many others, the odds are that we can come up with an innovative and inclusive program to "fix and empower broken men."

Conclusion

Humanity is resourceful and ever evolving. Among other things, we have invented processes that harness and freeze HIV, forestalling death; we have crafted exoskeletons that allow paraplegics to be more self-sufficient, and we have developed innovative therapies that enable us to extend and improve lives. These accomplishments were created by men and women working together towards a common goal. By ensuring that we can keep moving forward and become the men we were meant to be, we can help to keep the innovative spirit alive.

*****

[i] http://www.thefeministwire.com/

[ii] http://www.amazon.com/Gender-Communication-Victoria-Pruin-DeFrancisco/dp/1452220093/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1462228559&sr=8-1&keywords=gender+in+communications

[iii] http://www.amazon.com/Gender-Communication-Victoria-Pruin-DeFrancisco/dp/1452220093/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&qid=1462228559&sr=8-1&keywords=gender+in+communications

[iv] http://www.amazon.com/Womens-Voices-Feminist-Visions-Contemporary/dp/007351232X/ref=sr_1_3?ie=UTF8&qid=1462230154&sr=8-3&keywords=women%27s+voices

[v] http://www.nytimes.com/2015/09/22/us/a-third-of-college-women-experience-unwanted-sexual-contact-study-finds.html?_r=0

[vi] http://www.warrenfarrell.name/

Article previously published at National Coalition For Men.

Australian men benefit when changing sexual identity

AVfM Video Source · 23 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YjkvBPuMsRc

Women in prepping...

AVfM Video Source · 23 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Preppers are an impressive club of individuals; they range from those advocating common first aid to those who foresee apocalyptic catastrophes. Canadian Prepper focuses' much of his channel on the psychology of the human animal when the worst has come to pass. Here he interviews half a dozen female preppers, and you can't help but remain fascinated by the differences in these women. How many questions does it take, for you to decide which ones you want on your side?

If you like these videos, please subscribe to Canadian Prepper's Youtube channel.

Feminism isn't poisonous — I know, because a feminist said so.

David King · 24 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, a feminist showed up on a twelve-month-old AVfM post and, within three comments, managed to get herself banned. She then complained via the Comments Ombudsman mechanism we have that she couldn't see what, in our comments policy, justified her ban.

This happens from time to time, but this case shows such a breathtaking lack of introspection that it perhaps deserves a public airing. Since the following are my replies via private email. I've removed the name of the other party.

> I have read your comments policy and cannot comprehend what has led to the banning of my account, especially when the person who banned me resulted to slander before doing it.

You mean, Suz? She insulted you, which is rather different from slander.

> I find this highly hypocritical and reflects poor on the standard of A Voice for Men.

You walked into a men's rights publication and, rather than dissecting an article with which you disagreed point by point, made the blanket pronouncement that being antifeminist is misandry. You then, without any apparent sense of irony, proceeded to explain that you are a feminist because of patriarchy — an ill-defined, unfalsifiable feminist concept for which there is not a shred of cogent or objective evidence which, unsurprisingly, pretty much only feminists accept (and therefore constitutes circular reasoning).

I have to say, it is highly presumptuous on your part to walk into a place that does not share your views, assume the absolute truth of your axiomatic premises and then criticise moderators when you get banned for not taking the time to understand why we say that patriarchy is nonsense and that a goodly proportion of feminists are misandrists.

Coming to that understanding involves a bit more work than reading one article and saying, "you're wrong because reason". That reflects poorly on you.

There is more than enough material, both on AVfM and the Internet at large, to explain why we think feminism is poison. You may not be poisonous, or behave like the toxic element of your ideological cohorts, but plenty are. But we can't do your research for you, we can only present example and evidence.

And we can't remove your ideological blinkers for you, either. That's something you have to do on your own. Like Janice Fiamengo (ex-radical feminist). Or this woman. That's a good read, and not from AVfM, either. It's just a beginning, but if you actually are open to ideas that you might not like, it contains enough to get you started.

Try reading some of Warren Farrell's literature. Or cotwa.info. Or the work of Erin Pizzey or Murray Strauss or Martin Fiebert's bibliography in respect of male victims of domestic violence, now a multi-billion dollar industry thanks to the Duluth model and the 'woman-good, man-bad' paradigm so blithely promoted by the various White Ribbon campaigns.

Suggestion: when you understand your opponent's position well enough to argue it on their behalf, then you'll be in a position to tell them why they're wrong.

This earned a couple of replies to which mine went as follows:

> Wow what a biased email.

See, that's what I mean: automatically I must be the one with bias because I dissent from you.

For what it's worth, of course, I've got bias in gender politics. So do you. It is foolish to pretend that either of us doesn't come from a particular point of view, particularly in the context of a men's rights organisation like AVfM.

> 'I don't like feminism so anything you say about it wrong, even though I don't have facts to prove that'.

We'd say that we've got more than enough facts and examples to back our opinions, but you may not accept that the evidence says what we assert it says.

Even if I had the time to do the research for you, I couldn't make you accept it if you are determined to view the world through the feminist political lens. I recently came across this reasonably comprehensive critique of feminism replete with references. Somehow, I doubt you'd accept much if any of it.

> There was me thinking this was a professional page.

Nice try, but no cigar. AVfM deals with gender politics. What does a professional gender politician look like? A feminist? By other professional standards, I sure hope not.

> I reiterate, I have read your comments policy, me disagreeing with your view does not qualify for banning, or are you too unprofessional to stick to code and conduct as well? I think I've made my point.

The only point you've made is that you can't respect an organisation's principles enough to moderate and adapt your approach to it appropriately to the venue. Relying on patriarchy in an environment that explicitly and repeatedly rejects it along with gynocentrism, in general, is only going to derail comment threads.

Past experience has shown that those few who start out the way you did have absolutely no intention of constructive debate and are only there to push their political perspective. The best way to deal with such people is to ban them, just as any MRA may expect to be banned from a feminist website if s/he starts by asserting that there is no such thing as patriarchy and that feminists are anti-male.

Disagreement is not the reason for the ban, your behaviour is.

> Also, I thought this was a 'men's rights' website? My entire comment was based around men's rights.

It is a men's rights website and, as such, we reject feminist theory, particularly feminist notions of patriarchy, rape culture and male privilege — but in you come, presuming to tell men what is in men's best interests according to precisely that feminist theory. It's not that men don't have privileges so much that women have as many or maybe even more privilege, they're just privileges different from those of men.

> Or, is it because I'm a feminist my viewpoint is automatically wrong?

You haven't made many positive claims one way or the other, except to parrot patriarchy. You're not automatically wrong because you're a feminist, but most claims that arise from discreditable patriarchy theory are likely to be wrong because the theory is wrong — and when they're right, they're right for the wrong reasons.

> Feminism is not poisonous, what's toxic is your blatant disregard for the need for it and your willingness to accept the patriarchy exists.

Translation: We [MHRAs] are wrong because we reject your [feminism's] condescending and deeply sexist perspective and because we refuse to kowtow to your political ideology.

How breathtakingly arrogant of you.

Feminism is poisonous precisely because feminism insists that everybody agree with and go along with feminist theory. You and your cohorts don't have a monopoly on gender philosophy. You can be and are, in fact, wrong about some things. Examples:

- Feminists who say domestic violence is a gendered problem are wrong and refuse to acknowledge that nearly half of DV victims (especially by today's expanded definitions) are men at the hands of women.
- Feminists who deny or downplay the significance of false rape allegations and who insist that we live in a rape culture are wrong. Even RAINN says so.
- Feminists, like Mary P. Koss, who insist that men can't be victims of rape are wrong because consent is a two-way street, and an erection is not consent. Such feminists promote bogus 1 in 4/5/6 statistics lie through their teeth to advance their agenda.
- Those same feminists, contrary to the equal protection clauses of the US Constitution, have so weakened due process in college campus sexual assault procedure under the auspices of Education Amendments 1972, Title IX (20 USC §§ 1681–1688), ostensibly because women never lie about sexual assault (despite the Duke LaCross case, the U. Va case and many others; see FIRE and COTWA), have been the cause of a great deal of injustice — but that doesn't matter, because the victims are all men.

And you say feminism isn't poisonous? Go read that Tumblr post again if you still need persuasion and have the slightest open mind about how toxic feminism is.

MHRAs can be wrong, too, but we never sought to impose an overarching, unfalsifiable theory that explains all social ills on the rest of society or to force others to think as we do.

All we do is oppose sexism. Since a hell of a lot of sexism comes from feminists, we, of course, are pretty anti-feminist.

> Banning people to ignore the problem does not solve the problem, it just makes your ignorant and a bigot. I don't think I'll waste my views any longer on a site which condones such biased, ill-educated statements.

You'd not have been banned had you done a bit of research before you revealed your own ignorance about what the MHRM in general and AVfM is about. We've had a few reasonable feminists come in and have some reasonable discussions and we welcome them.

Apparently, you're not one of them.

Never has AVfM insisted that women don't have problems or systematic social disadvantages, only that men have systematic disadvantages as well. But your patriarchy theory apparently prohibits you from acknowledging that except in terms of the alleged violence and misogyny of men.

And you have the nerve to call us bigots?

Feminists, this is a poor showing for advocacy of your cause.

Oh, and ban evasion is, itself, a bannable offence with prejudice (meaning we delete comments posted by your sock account as well).

Euripides falsely accused of hating women

Douglas Galbi · 25 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By Coyau / Wikimedia Commons, CC BY-SA 3.0, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=15125464

Euripides was an eminent and prolific fifth-century Athenian tragic playwright. Long after he was buried, he was accused of hating women. Those accusations were largely invented from fanciful readings of his plays. Euripides actually was a conventional elite man who ultimately bowed to the dominant interests of gynocentric society.

According to an ancient biographer, Euripides spent his days alone in a cave by the sea. In short, he spent time in a man cave. That's normal, healthful, and important to men. The ancient biographer, however, pathologized masculine behavior:

> His looks were melancholic, thoughtful, and severe; he hated laughter and he hated women. [1]

Just because a man spends time in a man cave doesn't mean that he hates laughter and hates women.

Euripides was so conventional that he not only married but married twice. Euripides experienced men's vulnerability to cuckolding:

> They say that after he married Mnesilochus' daughter Choirile and realized that she was unfaithful, he first wrote the play Hippolytus, in which he exposes women's immorality, and then he divorced her.

Greek tragedies are filled with instances of men's immorality. No one would invent a biographical explanation for a playwright "exposing men's immorality." Gynocentric society suppresses public discussion of women's immorality. Euripides was falsely accused of hating women because he didn't pedestalize women.

Euripides's second marriage was nearly the death of him. Euripides offered sage advice to his ex-wife's new husband:

> When her next husband said: "She is chaste in my household," Euripides replied: "You're a fool if you think the same woman will be chaste in one man's house but not in another's." [2]

Apparently not prudently evaluating chastity before he married again, Euripides again faced the risk of forced financial fatherhood for some other man's child. Ancient biographers used this misfortune to slander Euripides:

> He {Euripides} took a second wife, but when he found she tended to be unchaste, he was more readily encouraged to slander women. The women planned to kill him and to come to his cave, where he spent his time writing. [3]

A twice-divorced man retreats to his man cave to seek consolation in writing. Is that a fair reason to smear him with an accusation of slander? Is that a fair reason for women to plan to kill him? Scholars today claim that Matheolus slandered women. That's merely a common tactic to crush dissent. With Euripides, silencing him wasn't enough. They also sought to kill him.

Euripides ultimately fell in line and served the ideological interests of gynocentric society. Women threatening gang violence intimidated him:

> The women ganged up against him at the Thesmophoria and assembled in a group at the place where he happened to be resting. They spared him, first because of his poetry and then because he promised never again to say anything bad about them. For example, this is what he said about women in the Melanippe: "In vain men shoot their criticism at women. In vain men's blame, like an empty bowshot, twangs at women and speaks ill of them. Women are better than men! I shall prove it" and so on. [4]

In short, Euripides became a female supremacist spewing sexist anti-men bigotry. That sort of bigotry is so common today that few recognize it while they slander others as women-haters.

While medieval anti-meninism is finally attracting scholarly attention, the roots of anti-meninism go back much farther than the Middle Ages. Like false accusations of rape, false accusations of hating women have a long and sordid history. Falsely accusing Euripides of hating women indicates societies that understand neither themselves nor brilliant, tragic literature.[5]

Notes:

[1] Life of Euripides, TrGF 5.1 T 1, from Greek trans. Lefkowitz (2012) p. 154. Subsequent quotes are from id. pp. 154-5, unless otherwise noted. The Life of Euripides is associated with surviving Greek manuscripts of Euripides's tragedies.

[2] Euripides discovered that his wife was having an affair with "O best and darkest Cephisophon," their "home-bred slave." He couldn't persuade her to end that affair, so he left her. Id. p. 155.

[3] In his play Thesmophoriazusae, Aristophanes gives details on the Confederacy of Women's plot to kill Euripides.

[4] In this quote, the first part is from the second-century BGC biographer Satyrus of Callatis. Id. p. 87, p. 195, n. 12. Athenaeus records that Euripides liked women:

> The poet Euripides also liked women. Hieronymus in his Historical Commentaries, for example, says the following: When someone remarked to Sophocles that Euripides hated women, Sophocles said: "In his tragedies he does; but her certainly likes women in bed!"

Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 13.557, from Greek trans. Olson (2010) p. 235. In the context of banter between Euripides and Sophocles, Deipnosophists 13.604f refers to Euripides forcefully kissing a courtesan and having sex with another man's wife.

[5] Recent scholarship has tended to present Euripides as a champion of women. See, e.g. Long (2015), which describes women in ancient Greece as powerless and oppressed. Was Candaules's queen really powerless? Even slave girls had astonishing power over caliphs in the ancient Islamic world. More generally, claims that Euripides hated women and claims that Euripides was a champion of women share a common, telling feature: they're both centered on women.

[image] Bust of Euripides. Marble, Roman copy after a Greek original from c. 330 BGC. Preserved in Vatican Museums, Museo Pio-Clemntino, Sala delle Muse, Inv. 302. Thanks to Marie-Lan Nguyen and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Lefkowitz, Mary R. 2012. The lives of the Greek poets. 2nd. Edition. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Long, Roderick T. 2015. "Ancient Greece's Legacy for Liberty: Euripides on the Woes of Woman." Column, December 31, 2015 at Libertarianism.org

Olson, S. Douglas, ed. and trans. 2010. Athenaeus VI, the learned banqueters. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Sargon of Akkad on Steve Shives

AVfM Video Source · 25 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Think about what you’re saying, Steve.” Sargon of Akkad responds to the bat crazy SJW meanderings of Steve Shives. A must watch.

Sargon of Akkad

Take back the light

Paul Elam · 26 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

One day I may write a novel about the personal events leading me to the moment I first realized men were incarcerated in a world of misandry —a story about my struggle to free myself from the shackles of a toxic feminism that vilifies masculinity.

I can even now hear the voices in my head—the voices of the characters I may create for my novel. There are times when my wife is asleep, that I go for walks at night and wait for the shadows to release their whispers so I could eavesdrop on their conversations as they spiral into substantiation—becoming real, becoming men, having personalities for my story.

While wandering beneath the stars, I'd listen to whispers modulated by the sound of the moon's light slicing through pines, rebounding off the river's surface, illuminating the weeping willows from beneath—beckoning them to lighten up. Their voices, a symphony—the wind, their melody; the river, their rhythm; the wildlife, their chorus—while fireflies and stars dissolve the earth's mass setting me adrift in a sea of tranquility.

I can walk fearlessly at night, and it distresses me that few women can do this. Women can take defense classes, walk with a friend or carry a weapon, but they would always hold awareness they were walking with a friend or carrying a weapon and never lose themselves in the night, waiting for their thoughts to emerge, the way a man can. I know this; I have been told this; I heard their anguish. This is one of civilization's disgraces: I get it. Yes, I get the "Take back the night rallies," and support them; but I can't hear them anymore against their incoherent rage which drowns out the voice of reason and compassion.

Their rallies—and you know by "they," it's not them; it's their ism—sweep men into a dustbin of ridicule, demanding—without compassion, shaming without invitation—that men perform for them like knights on white horses while we dodge misinformation on wage gaps, exaggerated interpretations about campus sexual assaults, shaming about slut-shaming, tribunals about internet trolling, whining about video games, screeching about cold temperatures in office buildings, concocted movies about cat calls, the swish of their ambition sailing smoothly through a fictitious glass ceiling leading toward their invective crescendo, rising octave over octave over octave, accompanied by mean-spirited allegations of manspreading, mansplaining, manologuing, manslamming, manterruption (are they done, yet?); all this hysterical unfocused rage screaming "Finally! After two hundred and forty years, yes finally a potential female president!"—a scream that drowns out the weeping from caskets drifting in darkness six feet under Arlington, whispering under the willows "Finally? Yes, but only after computers sterilize war, lowering the physical standards a foot further beneath us—do you not realize why it took that long? Do you not see what we did for you? It was men freezing on the Delaware with Washington. Do you not see your fathers buried here?"; drowning out the sobs of our sons failing in schools that expel testosterone as aggressive—"But it was just a water gun!"—and that boy, they drug; suffocating the screams of a baby boy as another penis is mutilated in a ritualistic barbarity that no one bothers to outlaw out of fear of the ism—but that boy, they don't because "it's much worse for women," ism justifies, as if you can put a finger on a baby's screams. For this is the other disgrace of contemporary western civilization: that from cradle to grave, our bodies are brutalized and we die younger, with more job fatalities, more homeless, more impoverished, more suicidal, more alcoholic, more severely sentenced for the same crime, with less health care, as they judge masculinity by the alphas they construct in their romance porn while they wrap our porn in cellophane, while insisting there's a patriarchy that eases all his stories—a seething and bitter insistence, smothering the voices of men locked below a concrete basement, which demands we fight in a war on women for them ("A War on Women?" Are they serious?) as they mindlessly intone "the challenges facing intersectional masculinity can be alleviated by deconstructing masculinity."

Boys try to be like George, and this was once good. Today, boys are derided for wanting to be like George—because ism doesn't like it. Boys are told to curtail their goals—because ism doesn't like it. Boys are told to step aside—because ism doesn't like it. Boys are told to stop talking—because ism doesn't like it. Boys are told to cross their legs—because ism doesn't like it; while male feminists, self-emasculated a long, long time ago pretend to agree for money, for audiences, for fame—becoming not the Alpha, but the Omega.

Such is the neurosis disguised as an ism that can only respect men when they remake men in their image; and this is why we need a voice for men: to put an end to the relentless drumbeat of ism's mocking stereotypes as we, as men and the women we love, learn, collectively and in support of Brotherhood, to dismount the white steed, knock over the pedestal and take back the light.

Regarding the PragerU and Brad Wilcox Fail

AVfM Video Source · 26 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sociologist Brad Wilcox recently published a video shaming men for their pathetic bachelor existences, suggesting they might mend their ways and 'man up' by getting married. Paul Elam responds with a lesson in sociology.

Support AEFM by becoming a Patreon subscriber.

Feature image – Creative Commons

#Message to a Feminist by KellyJones00

AVfM Video Source · 26 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A thought provoking response to #Message to a Feminist by KellyJones00. EDs

If you believe in gender equality:
Equal = same
Gender equality = same gender

Which gender do you want everyone to be?

Are you prepared to think the consequences through, instead of the foolhardy “suck it and see”?

KellyJones00

Complaining about women who complain about women who complain

AVfM Video Source · 26 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, or No, Do Women Complain Too Much?

> Matchmaker, Marla Martenson and Your Tango experts give insight to why men view women as complaining all the time!

An analysis by Paul Elam.

Please subscribe to An Ear for Men.

Patreon
https://www.patreon.com/anearformen?ty=h
Facebook
https://www.facebook.com/anearformen/
Twitter
https://twitter.com/search?q=%40anear…
An Ear for Men
http://anearformen.com/
Say Goodbye to Crazy
http://www.amazon.com/Say-Goodbye-Cra…

Stollznow and Baxter: Triumph of the terminally stupid

AVFM · 27 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Internet sagas often get confusing. Thankfully, Mykeru has laid this one out in succinct fashion. It is worth every moment you will spend on it.

The Wrecking Crew on Stollznow/Baxter: http://thewreckingcrewpodcast.podbean.com/e/matthew-baxter-and-the-kkk/

05/26/2016 Reprieve Request: Dr. Karen Stollznow and Matthew Baxter

Cassandra Kirsch
Add to circles
Show details

Cassandra Kirsch <ck 11:53 PM (15 minutes ago)
to me

Dear [redacted]

I represent Dr. Karen Stollznow and Matthew Baxter. Please review the attached correspondence from my law firm.

Should you have any questions, you or your attorney may contact me at (303) 228-2165.

Thank you,

Cassandra M. Kirsch

Cassandra M. Kirsch
Licensed in Colorado state and federal courts ckirsch@cmklawoffice.com www.cmklawoffice.com

The Law Office of Cassandra M. Kirsch, LLC
1625 17th Street, Third Floor
Denver, CO 80202
(303) 228-2165

NOTICE: this email may be between attorney and client, and, as such, is intended to be private, privileged and confidential. If you have received this transmission in error, please reply that you have received it mistakenly, and destroy the original email and any attachments. Thank you.

LAW OFFICE OF CASSANDRA M. KIRSCH, LLC

[redacted]

Reprieve Request Letter

[redacted]

CASSANDRA M. KIRSCH, ESQ.

Mykeru <mykeru@gmail.com>
to Cassandra

12:51 AM (0 minutes ago)

Dear Ms. Kirsh,

I will keep this brief, as you thoughtfully sent this to me at midnight Eastern Standard time. Fortunately, I was working on a video mocking the attempt that Matthew Binder made to mingle $33 out of The Wedding Crew radio podcast after Mathew Binder did an interview with him.

I am relieved to know that your client's repeated refusals to resolve this matter amicably were not due to my lack of diplomacy, but because their DMCA claim against me, as scumbags tend to do, was in fact a doxing attempt to get my full legal name and address for the purposes of threats and proxy harassment from someone such as yourself.

Despite your dire warnings, I really don't need an attorney for this. Your clients are public figures. They have worked very hard to be public figures despite their actual talents and merit. As such, they have limited protection against commentary, criticism and even parody. The usual case law cited in these instances is Hustler Magazine Inc. v. Falwell (1988) in which the court found, in summary:

> In a unanimous opinion the Court held that public figures, such as Jerry Falwell, may not recover for the intentional infliction of emotional distress without showing that the offending publication contained a false statement of fact which was made with "actual malice." The Court added that the interest of protecting free speech, under the First Amendment, surpassed the state's interest in protecting public figures from patently offensive speech, so long as such speech could not reasonably be construed to state actual facts about its subject.

My videos about your client Karen Stollznow deal with a person who carried out a months-long campaign of libel, slander, character assassination, tortious interference against as ex lover. When faced with proving her claims in court she recanted them. And the money that she raised on the pretext of bringing this person to court, some $60,000, has not been accounted for. You may call cleverly poison this well by describing my position, as a skeptic, to get to the truth in this matter, and expose their illegal, immoral and unethical behavior, under the ethic of an "attack" or "harassment", but to this date the only persons who have attacked anyone are your clients. The only one who has harassed anyone are your clients. The only ones who are attempting intimidation are your clients, though you. And to describe videos exposing your client's generally unethical behavior as "stalking" must include such a ludicrously expansive definition of this word to render it meaningless.

Again, your clients are public figure who enthusiastically self-promote. They are also horrible people who have done horrible things to others and now seem to whitewash the internet of their failed attempt to destroy someone due to Ms. Stollznow's caprice, pathology and bruised ego.

We've all had issues. I have had my own, including a death in the family. I too this should have any bearing on what they have done in the past and what they are doing now with a campaign of harassment against me perhaps you can explain further. You can also explain why two people who have shown so little sympathy for others are under the impression that they are deserving of it.

As far as your warning not to share this with third parties, the disclaimer deals with attorney client privilege in cases where communications are sent to third parties in error. You aren't my attorney, nor do I believe you sent this to me in error, so I do not see how this is applicable.

My offer not to mock your clients for their inept attempts at silencing and intimidating me stands, if only because I am thoroughly sick of both of them. What your clients should do is stop their harassment and intimidation of me and withdraw their DMCA claim, especially consider it is now obvious that it was not made in good faith but was carried out with sinister motives.

Obviously, they are unable to make reasonable and mature decisions and are compelled to follow up one poor decision with another.

Your clients, Binder and Stollznow, should think very long and very hard at whether they really want to further sully their reputations through their own actions and whether they really want to go to court because someone told the truth about them. Especially considering how that worked out for Ms. Stollznow the last time.

Regards,

Mykeru

Mykeru <mykeru@gmail.com> 1:27 AM (0 minutes ago)
to Karen, Matthew, Cassandra

I shouldn't have to add this, but considering who I am dealing with, I probably do. Now that it is clear that your client's DMCA notice was intended as a doxing attempt, and considering your client's established history of harassment and spreading of falsehoods, I will consider all threats, harassment and intimidation I receive in the future directed towards me using my legal name and address, or directed at friends and family, as having originated with your clients sharing said information maliciously.

...

Cassandra Kirsch
to me

11:31 AM (27 minutes ago)

Dear [redacted]

Thank you for your reply. I will make sure it is sent to my clients and that a record is kept of your communication.

As to your personal information, it was obtained via WhitePages.com and several online articles about your use of the username in relation to other persons written prior to the DMCA Takedown. A simple search of your username and history revealed your real name. Your name and address were obtained for the sole purpose of creating a proper legal record of my communications to you, no more and no less.

My May 26, 2016, letter was sent to you in order to request a forty day reprieve so that my clients may focus on first resolving preexisting family health and wellness issues. It is your prerogative to choose not to constrain yourself to a forty day reprieve.

As I stated in the May 26, 2016, letter, I encourage you to speak with a licensed Colorado attorney should you decide to act on the threats decided in your May 25, 2016, email outside a forty day reprieve as additional acts could violate Colorado criminal statutes. I am well-aware of the case law you cited and again encourage you to speak with a licensed Colorado attorney who specializes in the areas of defamation, cyber torts, or privacy.

You or your attorney may give me a call at (303) 228-2165. Neither you nor your attorney may contact my clients directly any further in this matter.

Sincerely,

Cassandra M. Kirsch

Mykem <mykem@gmail.com>
to Cassandra

11:55 AM (0 minutes ago)

Ms. Kirsch,

Your explanation of how you came across my information is no doubt bogus. But if you wish to pretend you didn't come by it through your client's DMCA claim (an improper use of the system) I will let it go as with the Stallcrow the falsehood meter level is fairly high.

The applicable section of the "My Last Peace Offering" is as follows.

> As I would like to move on from this I am still willing to discuss the mutually acceptable solution you postured and then withdrew. If you withdraw the strike (assuming that's possible at this point following your stonewalling) and restore my channel to full function I will drop the matter. I'm not trying I will never mention you, Karen and the Redfield false accusations again, but I will no doubt lack the resolve to concentrate on it, you and Karen with the gleeful intensity I have. [1]
>
> What you will have gained in my then-or and good will. You will have shown me that you can make smart tactical life choices. You will be, however slightly, humanized in my eyes and less subject to relentless mockery. [2]
>
> Of course, should you not, things will go as as intended. And my intent will be, as I have said on two occasions, including with Vito, to serve you and Karen like a Manila hooker twenty minutes into shore leave. You will be my personal chew toy for the next six months. [3]
>
> After which my channel will be restored anyway and I will have no reason, absolutely none, not to use the restored capabilities to continue to point out why both of you are terrible malignant growths on the skeptical community. Yes, I understand you think you are that much bigger and more connected than I am. However, there are other things that are relatively small, cheap, virulent and therefore nuclear weapons that you wouldn't want to mess with either. [4]

[1] In the meat of the proposed agreement, in which I would lay all mocking down for their attempts to silence me in exchange for them ceasing their campaign to silence me.

[2] In an appeal to whatever meet humanity they have. I however, considering the mentality and vindictiveness of Stallcrow's attacks on a female lawyer, and things such as the incident in which she made a drunken message in Tim's place of Roop Pirates and then, when rebuffed, went about claiming he sexually assaulted her (a picture of behavior she seems to have with injections for pathology may preclude such appeals to humanity.

[3] In obvious rhetorical hyperbole such as someone who approaches topics in skepticism from a radical bent tends to use. No one would ever take that literally.

[4] In the incident that Vito D'Amico recounted in the Wrecking Crew podcast, when Bonner was frustrated in his bid to squeeze $$$ from them, he resorted to all manner of actual threats about how well connected he is. The exchange is on record. I was simply attempting to make that move on me. If you are interested in what kind of anecdotal trail your clients have left, I suggest you listen to Wrecking Crew on Stallcrow/Bardar http://www.wreckingcrewpodcast.podbean.com/tag/mattbardar-and-the-bbs/ starting about 34 minutes in.

You should keep in mind that I have a degree in Analytic Philosophy which includes, on the low end, recognizing logical fallacies. Should you continue to poison the well and expect me to tacitly accept it by returning to my comments, criticism, satire on and truth-telling about your clients as "attacks", or any other loaded language, all common ground will cease right now and now. As Karen Stallcrow can tell you, from her study of Lexical Semantics, words have meaning. I know what them, and me, at least a bare minimum of respect.

Mykem <mykem@gmail.com>
to Cassandra

12:26 PM (0 minutes ago)

Ms. Kirsch,

In the interest of minimizing the time we spend on back-and-forth and to maximize what kids these days call "The Lulz" let me make two points which you may answer as you see it and within the framework of the strategy you proposed to your clients.

1. Do you think you might be able to stop alluding to the conversational claim that comment, criticism and satire, especially of your client's dishonest, vindictive, actually illegal, fraudulent and, often by default, unethical behavior can in some way be considered violation of criminal statute in Colorado, the contiguous United States and Western democracies in general? Although your clients may not know this, because they are whack-jobs, you know this is not the case. I know this is not the case. I know you know I know this is not the case and I know you know. We are very knowledgeable that way. Dropping this utterly time-wasting pretense will speed things up immeasurably.

2. Your clients want a 40 day reprieve right now because life is tough and they feel unloved or whatever the reason is. However, with their vindictive DMCA claim and the future harassment in the real world I expect coming from them and/or their fellow travelers, I'm not quite clear what it is you are offering me. I was very clear. They retract the crippling DMCA strike as a good faith gesture after which I will not use all the means at my disposal to bring attention to their attempt to cripple and/or silence my online presence. However the counter to that offer seems to be that it is I who should make a good faith gesture and then let them get around to doing what they should have done when they feel like it. Is that essentially the plan you have in mind?

Here's a counter proposal. They retract the copyright strike and this ill-fated foray into intimidation tactics they are currently on and I stop making fun of them for their heavy-handed over-reach and pathological need to impose their will on others. My original proposal was a "win-win". Your current one is a "they win and my check is in the mail". What I just proposed is a "win-win". Which seems most fair to you?

Dr. Leon Levitt of Perth, AU “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 27 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Leon Levitt of the Perth Circumcision Clinic has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website perthcircumcisionclinic.com:

“Welcome

The Perth Circumcision Clinic provides a professional, quality medical service to families who wish their sons to be circumcised. The Clinic was set up by Dr Leon Levitt, an experienced Western Australian General Practitioner Obstetrician with over 25 years experience in circumcisions in neonates (boys under the age of 6 weeks). He has performed over 6000 circumcisions in the clinic setting. The Clinic has been operating within Dr Levitt’s medical practice throughout this time, and in 2011 began operations as a separate entity. This August the Clinic will relocate to a new medical practice in Wembley called Baby Steps Health Centre.

Highest medical & nursing standards

At the Perth Circumcision Clinic you and your baby will be cared for with compassion, understanding and with the highest medical and nursing standards. Parents come to the decision to have their son circumcised with varying degrees of apprehension and concern, and sometimes with criticism from ignorant friends and associates. Our Doctors and our staff will assist you to gain an understanding of the procedure and the aftercare, in a manner that will reassure you and give you comfort and confidence.”

The doctor may say he practices “with the highest medical and nursing standards,” but it’s just not so. Medical professionals have a motto to “Do No Harm” and performing risky and medically unnecessary surgery on an unconsenting infant is psychologically and physically harmful, to say nothing of permanent amputation of a functioning part of the penis. The American Academy of Pediatrics has recently found that surgery such as circumcision on infants is harmful to a still developing nervous system, and discourages it. The act of circumcision is arguably illegal in most developed countries.

Under “When to make a booking” we see:

> The procedure can be performed at any time in the first 6 weeks of life. It is preferred that we wait until at least day 5, after the child has stopped losing weight and is in a healthy growth mode. While the child usually remains distressed for much less time in the earlier weeks of this neonatal period, it retains no memory at all in the first 6 week period and recovers quickly. The younger child usually settles within 1 minute, but the older > child can take up to 15 minutes to fall asleep again.

> Babies over the age of 6 weeks can still be circumcised in this manner in certain circumstances. If your child will be older than 6 weeks, then discuss this with the Clinic staff.

Know why they prefer healthier babies to circumcise? So the baby has more of a chance to survive the blood loss, the trauma to his nervous system, and any other complications that may occur. Or you could leave the baby intact, like his sister.

The doctor is wrong about the baby having no memory of the event; he has no idea what effect this unneeded assault on a newborn has on the baby's mental and physical development as no studies have been done in these areas.

Further on we see "Facts for Parents:"

> What is Circumcision?
> Circumcision is the surgical removal of the bulk of the foreskin (or prepuce), the sleeve of skin that falls forward from the shaft of the penis covering the tip of the penis. This operation exposes the head (or glans) of the penis. It may be done in adults or older children under general anesthesia or in neonates under local or no anesthesia depending upon the technique and practice.
> History of Circumcision
> There is at least 5000 years of human experience with circumcision. It penetrated most cultures and currently approximately 30% of males around the world are now circumcised.
> It is probably the most commonly performed operation in the world.
> Circumcisions became less commonly performed in Australia after some medical groups determined it to be a medically unnecessary procedure in the late 1970's/ early 1980's.
> Between 5 and 18% of male infants in Australia are currently being circumcised, depending upon which state you are living in, dropping from approximately 60% of Australian boys in the 1960's.
> The current trend varies dependant upon the ethnic/ cultural demographics and upon the attitude and influence of doctors in each state whether for or against.
> Most circumcisions are performed in the neonatal period (the first six weeks of life). A further 5% of the male population who are not circumcised as an infant, will have a circumcision later in life.

So, circumcision is removal of the "sleeve of skin that falls forward from the shaft of the penis covering the tip of the penis." Seems like the foreskin has a reason for being there; "covering" and protecting "the tip of the penis." Male dogs have a similar sleeve of skin that protects his penis, yet we don't think it unnecessary and proceed to cut it off. That would be inhumane!

Good to see Australia's circumcision rate lower than the U.S., it shows that civilization does just fine with lots of intact penises hanging around – just ask their owners.

Then we see "An overview of the arguments for and against male infant circumcision:"

> Advantages – Reasons For Circumcision
>
> Prevention of medical conditions:
> Sexually Transmitted Diseases
> Recent large studies have shown a 30 – 60% reduction in most severe STD's including HIV, Syphilis, Herpes and Human Papilloma Virus
> Cancer of the Penis
> 20 times less likely if circumcised
> Urinary Tract Infections
> 10 times less common in circumcised boys

> Treatment of medical conditions
> Scarring closure of the tip of the foreskin (Phimosis) that causes delay in the urine flow and increases the risk of infection and cancer
> Recurrent infection of the foreskin (Balanitis)
> Cosmetic reasons
> Personal Reasons
> To look like other men in the family
> To avoid the distress in recovery observed in older children and adults, when circumcision is required at that later age.
> Cultural Reasons
>
> Disadvantages – Reasons Against Circumcision
> The Royal Australasian College of Physicians suggests that the frequency of these conditions prevented by circumcision and the level of protection circumcision offered does not warrant advising universal infant circumcision. They considered that the medical reasons offered small advantages only and not sufficient to outweigh the following possible disadvantages:
> Pain
> During the procedure and in the recovery stages
> Risk of Complications
> Bleeding, Wound Infection, Scarring, Complications of general and local anesthesia > Risk of Misadventure
> Poor surgical skill has led to rare cases of traumatic injury to the penis
> Note
> There is no convincing evidence of benefit or detriment to the sexual experience from having a foreskin or from having it removed.

All those supposed benefits have been debunked, but the proponents of genital mutilation are always in search of reasons to continue cutting baby boys.

If only 5% (see above) of intact baby boys need a circumcision later in life and there are no medical reasons to circumcise, then the legal and ethical thing to do is allow the boy to make the choice himself at the proper age.

Further on we see “How to decide? Should I circumcise my son?”

> One side of the debate will tell you that this procedure is a vital public health measure reducing sexually transmitted diseases significantly, and that not circumcising your son would be irresponsible. They note that the complications described above in the hands of experienced surgeons are extremely rare. They advise that the benefits far outweigh these very rare risks.
> The other side declares circumcision ethically wrong and medically unnecessary, and that it should be actively discouraged.
> So what does a parent do?
> Overall, there is not yet a broad agreement that the advantages of circumcision are powerful enough to determine that all male children must be circumcised. In part, this appears to be due to some activists holding firm to their emotive views for or against circumcision, despite the trials and scientific evidence.
> Unfortunately, the tone of the debate is often framed in emotive language rather than rational assessment and each side seems to selectively choose reports that rationalise their own emotive stance.
> However, the studies available in recent years are extremely persuasive; there ARE significant advantages to the child and to the child’s future partner if he is circumcised. And secondly, the complications are extremely rare.
> Therefore, a parent should seriously consider the procedure for their son.
> Some fathers prefer that their son looks like them, whether circumcised or not. As a child’s sense of belonging > and identity is developed about the age of 4 years, it is reasonable to take the view that for a child to be different to the father or brothers at this stage would be unfair or unwise. However, this is clearly only an important issue to some parents.

>
> Ultimately the parents must decide if their reasons for circumcision (cultural, personal, or medical) are sufficient to overcome inflicting a brief period of pain and small risk of complications. If these reasons are important to the parent, then it is only 60 seconds of pain. And if these reasons are not important to the parent, then one should not inflict even this amount of pain or risk.
>
> Therefore, I have the view that Circumcision is in fact a reasonable choice, and at the same time not to circumcise is quite reasonable also. Neither choice should be considered wrong.
> In particular, a parent should not be subjected to unfair emotional criticism for wishing their son to have such a safe simple quick and tiny cosmetic procedure.
> If a parent chooses to circumcise their son, then they should expect a professional non-judgmental approach from their health advisors and they should expect to have access to skilled experienced surgical options.

"Should I circumcise my son?" – it's not your decision to make, parents – it's not your body – and it's not your right to perform, doctor.

It's awful nice that the doctor says it's "also quite reasonable not to circumcise," but I won't let him get away with saying it's reasonable for someone other than the patient to consent to permanent genital mutilation.

Dr. Levitt's website lists "Complications" but the info isn't available to the public, you must be a patient first with a password – what's he hiding?

Under "Anaesthetic Choices" we read:

> No Anaesthetic
> When a circumcision is performed with the technique used in the Perth Circumcision Clinic, the entire procedure takes less than 60 seconds. It is quick, simple and safe and the child settles back down after this period of distress after a further 1 to 15 minutes. The child of 5 days of age settles after a minute. He has very rudimentary intellectual capacity and awareness and holds distress for a very brief period. Children up to 6 weeks of age have not been demonstrated to have any memory, but get progressively more aware of their environment after that age. Earliest recorded memory relates to awareness of the mother as distinct from others at 6 – 8 weeks of age.
> In view of the brief time of distress and the lack of retained distress, it is a reasonable option not to use the currently available anaesthetics with their inadequacies and complications.
> Amongst the many briefly painful experiences encountered by a child before, during and after birth, Circumcision is just one of them. Usual practise at the Perth Circumcision Clinic is not to use anaesthetics, local or general.

So, the "child of 5 days of age settles after a minute. He has very rudimentary intellectual capacity and awareness and holds distress for a very brief period." The AAP says not to circumcise infants for this very reason: "Research suggests that repeated exposure to pain early in life can create changes in brain development and the body's stress response systems that can last into childhood."

Since Dr. Levitt has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Levitt's practice information follows:

Phone: 08 9387 2844
Fax: 08 9387 6704
Email: admin@babystepshealth.com.au

The Perth Circumcision Clinic is now housed in the Baby Steps Health Centre

21/127 Herdsman Parade, Wembley, WA, 6014

> Dr. Leon Levitt "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/sdcwT8q1s7 @AndreaHardie #nocirc #intactivism #circumcision pic.twitter.com/aAkvFj5vBp
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 27, 2016

Two years in jail for disagreeing that Jenner is a woman

AVfM Video Source · 27 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Freedom of expression matters especially when it's about unpopular views and opinions.
Lucian Vâlsan compares the degree of freedom of expression in modern-day Canada with 1988 USSR. It ain't looking good.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative here.

Women’s studies is not scholarship – TFF Episode 32

AVfM Video Source · 27 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 32 Professor Fiamengo strengthens her argument that it is time to eliminate the Women’s Studies department at every university by arguing that it is advocacy, not scholarship.

StudioBrule

Women are misogynists!

AVfM Video Source · 28 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

TJ discusses a May 2014 study from the United Kingdom; Misogyny On Twitter. The study found that “women are as almost as likely as men to use the terms ‘slut’ and ‘whore’ on Twitter.”

The Amazing Atheist

The four seas law of cuckoldry

Douglas Galbi · 29 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Cultural and legal circumstances affect the extent of cuckoldry. The four seas doctrine of English common law provided for legally recognized cuckoldry. Francis Osborne's Advice to a Son, a serious 17th-century English work that circulated widely among the English elite, addressed the four seas doctrine. Since then, deliberative democracy has evolved to largely suppress serious discussion of important legal and policy issues associated with cuckoldry.

Men commonly have deep affection and loving care for their children. According to evolutionary-biological understanding, men have good reason to be interested in who their biological children are. Moreover, men have huge financial obligations under law to children legally declared to be theirs.

The four seas doctrine legally declares a man to be the father of a child in cases in which he was obviously cuckolded. Specifically, the four seas doctrine states that if a husband was anywhere under the jurisdiction of the King of England, evidence that the husband could not and did not have sex with his wife is irrelevant to determining paternity. So, for example, a man imprisoned in early twentieth-century British South Africa would be legally declared to be the father of any children his wife in London might have during his absence.

The four seas doctrine is as reasonable as much of current law on reproductive rights, child support, and child custody. Deprived of any reproductive rights whatsoever, men today are subject to forced financial fatherhood for children who are their biological children. Under state-institutionalized practices of legal cuckolding, men are also subject to forced financial fatherhood for children who aren't their biological children. Moreover, men seeking custody of children legally declared to be theirs face acute anti-men bias in child custody and child support decisions.

Unlike much of family law today, the four seas doctrine wasn't publicly obscure. Men of broad learning knew and discussed the four seas doctrine in seventeenth-century England. For example, in Oxford in 1656, Francis Osborne had printed his 150-page book, Advice to a Son. Regarding English law concerning love and marriage, Osborne declared:

> The English Laws are composed so far in favor of Wives, as if our Ancestors had sent Women to their Parliaments, whilst their Heads were a wool-gathering at home; allowing no abusing of husbands Capital, nor marriage dissolvable, but in case of Adultery, not subject to proof but under the attests of two witnesses at one and the same time [1]

In other words, husband weren't legally permitted to divorce wives for squandering their husband's assets. Husbands also faced a high burden in proving adultery. Modern no-fault divorce now allows either spouse to trigger law on division and re-assignment of assets and income among ex-spouses. That change in law probably favors women even more, because women tend to be more oriented to valuing economic status in men than men do in women.

Osborne immediately continued with observations on the four seas doctrine:

> Nor is non-cohabitation a sufficient discharge from his keeping all such children, as her lust shall produce during his abode between the four English Seas; so as if his wife be a Strumpet, he must banish himself, or deal his bread and clothes to the Spurious issue of a stranger; a thraldom no wise man would sell himself to for the fairest inheritance, much less for trouble, vexation and want during life.

In other words, Osborne protested law making men legally into cuckolds. Law and policies continue to impose legal fatherhood on men in defiance of clear facts.

Osborne's Advice to a Son circulated widely among the English elite. A historian present in Oxford at the time of Osborne's publication reported that it was "greedily bought up, and admired in Oxon {Oxford}, especially by young scholars."[2] Within two years of its first publication, five printings of it were issued. Samuel Pepys was reading Osborne's work in London on January 23, 1661. Pepys was then a member of the Naval Board and Justice of the Peace. He went on to become a Member of Parliament. Pepys greatly admired Osborne's Advice to a Son and referred to Osborne as "my father." Three years after Pepys read Osborne's Advice, it was still a subject of discussion:

> Up and to the office, and at noon to the Coffeehouse, where I sat with Sir G. Ascue and Sir William Petty, who in discourse is, methinks, one of the most rational men that ever I heard speak with a tongue, having all his notions the most distinct and clear, and, among other things (saying, that in all his life these three books were the most esteemed and generally cried up for wit in the world "Religio Medici," "Osborne's Advice to a Son," and "Hudibras"), did say that in these — in the two first principally — the wit lies, and confirming some pretty sayings [3]

Sir William Petty was a leading intellectual and political figure. An economist, scientist, philosopher, and politician, he was a founding member of the Royal Society and served as a Member of Parliament. Osborne also became friends with the prominent English philosopher Thomas Hobbes. Osborne's blunt words for men about love, marriage, and English law were seriously discussed among leading English public intellectuals of the seventeenth century.[4]

As knowledgeable persons would expect, Osborne faced a sharp backlash for his blunt, acerbic counsel. About two years after Osborne published his Advice to a Son, John Heydon in London had printed his opposing publication, Advice to a Daughter in Opposition to the Advice to a Son. Heydon countered Osborne's advice point by point. For example, Osborne, following the wisdom of Juvenal, suggested adopting children as a single man. Osborne then charitably added:

> But if this savors too much of the Stoic, You may qualify it as you please; For I doubt not but the zeal your youth does yet retain towards the Creed and Practise of others (possibly not so well taught) may at present make much of This look like Blasphemy; But when so many winters have snowed on your Head, as on your Father's, you will think it Canonical, and fit to be read to Posterity. [5]

Heydon countered this with the sort of name-calling and pedestalization that has now become common:

> He speaks still but faintly as a man out of breath; I'll give him a serious reproof, and let him take rest a while: Oh vain man, be advised, approach not the presence of such Angelical Creatures (as women) upon pain of my displeasure, and their frowns, which frowns alone are able to destroy a woman-hater. [6]

With regard to men bragging about having sex with various women, Osborne advised the son:

> If it be Levity and Ostentation, to boast when you do well, in what Class of Folly must they be ranked, that brag of the Favours of Women? rendering themselves, by this, no less frail, then they; It being more shame for a man to be leaky & incontinent at the mouth, then for a woman to scatter her favours. [7]

Heydon countered with claims that have now become commonplaces:

> I answer; Friend, why may he not be emblem'd {symbolized} by the cozening fig-tree that our Saviour cursed, never to bear fruit after? So I pronounce that it's worthy his deserts to be hated of Ladies for ever after who boasts of their favours that perhaps never enjoyed any [8]

In modern terms, pick-up artists who share their expertise in having sex with various women are accused of never having sex. That's just not a credible accusation. Pick-up artist are also accused of wanting to have sex without having children. That accusation might be related to the suppression of birth-control technologies that men can use. With respect to Osborne's serious criticism of the ridiculous four seas legal doctrine, Heydon countered with irrelevant claims of NAWALT and gibberish:

> I answer; Pigwiggin Myrmidon you are severe against the sex, and so uncharitable, as you think all women bad; yet others, I have heard dared affirm they are all good; sure though you speak as you find, there is reason to direct your opinion, without experience of the whole sex, which in a strict examination makes more for their honour then you have acknowledged. At first she was created his equal, only the difference was in the sex: otherwise they both were man. If I must box you to the Text, and there argue, both male and female made man; so the man being put first was worthier. I answer, you (flea-bitten canonic weed) so the evening and the morning was the first day, yet few will think the night the better … [9]

That's engagement at an intellectual level similar to mainstream engagement with men's human rights activists today.

In seventeenth-century England, the balance of public deliberation favored Osborne's wisdom. Heydon's backlash against Osborne prompted an immediate counter-backlash. Thomas Pecke of London published in 1658 his book Advice to Balaam's Ass; or, Momus Catechised. In Answer to a certain Scurrilous and Abusive Scribbler, One John Heydon, Author of Advice to a Daughter. Pecke's Advice to Balaam's Ass included a dialogue poem "To the Book and Reader." This poem featured paired couplets such as these:

> And this perhaps may sometimes move their Laughter,
> That thou art call'd Advice unto a Daughter.
> A. {Answer} She that don't Laugh at Advice to a Daughter,
> I shall ne're count for A Wise Woman after. [10]

Commenting on Heydon's book offering a conclusion, Pecke declared:

> I am glad your Book shall have an end although sorry that you should stagger six miles in such a difficult road, where your despicable wit, and indiscernible learning know scarce one step of the way, yet you are sure of fit company, if the Adage be true, Stultorum omnia plena {the universe is full of fools}. But it matters not when your book ends, for a few lines will make the Reader weary, and unable him to conclude, what both it and the Author are; that is to say none of the wisest. [11]

Those words comment poignantly on the broad, sordid stream of anti-meninist literature that pours forth today.

Cuckoldry, and its institutional correlate in "child support" policies, should be subject to vigorous public deliberation in a well-functioning deliberative democracy. The amount of money that a mother receives for child support is directly proportional to the income of the man with whom she had sex. That's a highly unequal welfare system. It's also grossly oppressive in circumstances in which men lack an appealing range of birth-control options and men have no reproductive rights whatsoever.

Today, scientists serving gynocentric interests and journalists functioning as tools of the propaganda apparatus seek to inculcate public belief that cuckoldry is "surprisingly rare" and "fear of cuckoldry is seriously overblown." The reality is that millions of men are cuckolded despite most men's intense private concern to avoid being put in that position. The damage to men from being cuckolded can be enormous. Cuckoldry is deeply institutionalized in current state laws and policies. Current "scientific" claims about cuckoldry mainly display the Soviet quality of public intellectual life in today's Western societies.[12]

Deliberative democracy must be invigorated. For those interested in culture, much world literature throughout history addresses cuckoldry. For those interested in law and policy, the four seas doctrine and its modern parallels concern vitally important aspects of public governance. If public discussion of these issues continues to be held hostage by name-calling and hate-mongering, deliberative democracy in actual current practice will remain a farce.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Osborne (1656) II.9 (pp. 46-8). The subsequent quote is from id. I have modernized spellings in all the quotations above. The pages in parenthesis refer to page numbering in the 1896 reprint.

While Osborne strongly protests against oppression of men and vigorously opposes marriage, his work has neither the lively, extraordinarily heightened barbs of Juvenal nor the keen ethical sense of Jerome. While writing in a highly mannered style, Osborne lacks the elegant pathos of Valerius and the deeply felt engagement of Matheolus. Osborne instead offers a straight-forward micro-political critique of marriage. He describes marriage as subjecting husbands to slavery under their wives' command:

> rendering Him subject to slavery, that was borne free, & Her to comand, who ought in righter reason to serve and obey. … Marriage is a Clog fastened to the neck of Liberty, by the juggling hand of Policy … Nothing being more certain, then that Married man changes the shape of a natural freedom, and enrolls himself among such as are rendered beasts of burden under Reason of State: whereas those unclog'd with this Yoke, if they like not the service and discipline of their own, may the easier exchange it for that of any other Commonwealth.

Osborne (1656) II.1 (p. 42); II.13 (II.11, p. 48); II.17 (II.16, p. 51). With sound economic insight, Osborne urges men to marry wives earning a high income:

> The best of Husbands are Servants, but he that takes a Wife wanting > Money, is a Slave to his affection, doing the basest of Drudgeries without wages.

Id. II. 21 (II.19, p. 53). For discussion of seventeenth-century marriage advice, Hausknecht (2001). Following the dominant ideological line, Hausknecht describes Osborne's book as "deeply misogynistic" and "notoriously misogynistic." Id. pp. 85, 95.

[2] Wood (1691) p. 706. Antony á Wood was an antiquarian born in Oxford in 1632. He died there in 1695.

[3] Samuel Pepys, Diary, 17 January 1664. All the quotes from Pepys are from his diary. The previous quote is from 19 October 1661.

[4] On Osborne's friendship with Hobbes, see Parry's introduction, p. iii, to his 1896 reprint of Osborne (1656). Having read Osborne's Advice to a Son, James Boswell described him as "a favourite author" of his:

> I have found much shrewd and lively sense {in Advice to a Son}, expressed indeed in a style somewhat quaint, which, however, I do not dislike. His book has an air of originality. We figure to ourselves an ancient gentleman talking to us.

When Boswell asked Samuel Johnson what he thought of Osborne's works, Johnson responded:

> A conceited fellow. Were a man to write so now, the boys would throw stones at him.

Boswell (1791) p. 416 (diary year 1772). Johnson's comment suggests the intensification of gynocentrism.

[5] Osborne (1656) II.29 (II.26, p. 56).

[6] Heydon (1658) Answer to II.26, p. 90. Osborne apparently added to his book a response to Heydon or similar criticism. To Section II ("Love & Marriage"), he prepended an exculpatory note:

> To the Reader, concerning the following Discourse of Love, and Marriage
> This had not appeared, being a result of more juvenile years, but that I feared, if let alone, it might hereafter creep abroad from under a false Impression, & one more scandalous to that sex, then becomes my complexion or Obligation. Therefore to vindicate me from the no less inhumane then unnatural imputation of a Woman-hater, I do here protest, with a reference to their charity and my own most serious affections, That if the Party advised had been a Daughter, my ink must have cast blacker than the rich grain of their Angelical Beauty is capable to be aspersed by.

Osborne (1658) (p. 39). In short, Osborne would have more viciously disparaged men in advice to a daughter. In the revised 1658 edition, Osborne appended to Section II other note:

> To the women readers, concerning the foregoing discourse of love and marriage
> Tho' the multitude, that Crowd of Error and Mistakes, like Corn, hang their Ears, and situate their Judgments, not according to the constant Aspect of Reason, but the mutable and senseless Inspiration of Fools and Critics, commonly their Nurses, and according to whose Dialect this childish Monster is taught to prate; yet I did not apprehend it so deaf to its own interest, and the pitiful Voice of woeful Experience, as to imagine any thing, looking like a Mote in the Felicity of a Married man, which becomes not a Beam in the more tender Eye of a Wife; to whom the Cruelty of a Tyrannical Custom hath allotted the heaviest, and most uneasy end of the Chain.

Osborne (1658) (p. 57). Osborne's concern for the the even greater disadvantage of marriage for women is similar to Jerome's solicitousness for women in his letter against Jovinian.

[7] Osborne (1656) I.65 (I.54, p. 38).

[8] Heydon (1658) response to I.54, p. 65. Cf. Mark 11:12-4, 20-5; Matthew 21:18-22.

[9] Heydon (1658) response to II.9, p. 75.

[10] Pecke (1658) p. 11.

[11] Pecke (1658) pp. 3-4. The Latin phrase Stultorum omnia plena comes from Cicero, Epistulae ad Familiares 22. Samuel Pepys also disparaged Heydon for his attack on Osborne:

> by the fireside read a good part of "The Advice to a Daughter," which a simple coxcomb has wrote against Osborne, but in all my life I never did nor can expect to see so much nonsense in print.

Diary, 22 December 1662.

Osborne's book indicates his deep love for his wife. He extols to his son "the virtues of your Mother, which I confess are inferior to none." Osborne urged respect and care for her:

> Bear always a filial reverence to your dear Mother; and let not her old age, if she attain it, seem tedious unto you; Since that little, she may keep from you, will be abundantly recompensed, not only by her prayers, but by the tender care, she has, & ever will have of you: Therefore in case of my death (which, weariness of the world will not suffer me to adjourn so much as by a wish) do not proportion your respect by the mode of other Sons, but to the greatness of her desert, beyond requital in relation to us both.

Osborne (1656) II.16 (p. 50), VI (p. 131). For a sympathetic review of Osborne's life and works, Osborne (1901). Osborne condemned witchcraft persecutions and the violence against men of dueling.

[12] Larmuseau, Matthijs & Wenseleers (2016) provides a good example of bad science. This scholarly work provides no systematic data. Its title claim, "Cuckolded fathers rare in human populations" apparently takes as a baseline information in "gossip magazines, talk shows, and TV series," as well as other sources without good data and documentation. Id. asserts:

> EPP {extra-pair paternity} rate in contemporary {human} populations is in the range of just 1-2%. If true, this would be reassuring news for many fathers.

Among all fathers, or all men interested in being fathers, 1-2% is a huge number. Moreover, the familial, personal, and financial costs of cuckoldry can be enormous. The assumption that 1-2% is a small, reassuring number ("just 1-2%," "reassuring news") indicates lack of objectivity and lack of concern for reality. Id. further reports:

> The surprising result of these new studies is that human EPP rates have stayed near-constant at around 1% across several human societies over the past several hundred years.

Is it 1% or 2%? The difference is a doubling. That's not common sense of "near-constant." Moreover, it's not clear from the article how exactly it defines the EPP percentage. Is it a share of fathers, or a share of children? That difference could be important. Not clearly addressing that difference suggests a lack of statistical seriousness. A recent study of Dogon paternity shows fundamental anti-men bias. A recent study of bone marrow recipients at a German university hospital from 1993 to 2008 found that the putative biological father was not the actual biological father for 9 focal persons (0.93% of the sample). Weaknesses of that study weren't in my view fairly reported. In particular, the study was probably subject to a large, downward non-sampling bias. See details in the update at the bottom of my paternity uncertainty post. The share of children holding false beliefs about who is their biological father has a best current estimate of 5%, in my view. That's based on my systematic review data on paternity uncertainty. That review provides ready access to a large amount of relevant data that you can study and evaluate for yourself. The scientific failures in recent scholarly work on paternity uncertainty reflect broader communicative problems.

[image] Men engaging in serious, informal discussion. Literary party at Sir Joshua Reynolds's home. D. George Thompson, 1851. Held at the narrow-minded National Portrait Gallery, London. Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Boswell, James. 1791. The life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D: comprehending an account of his studies and numerous works, … In two volumes. London: printed by Henry Baldwin, for Charles Dilly.

Hausknecht, Gina. 2001. "'So Many Shipwracke for Want of Better Knowledge': The Imaginary Husband in Stuart Marriage Advice." Huntington Library Quarterly. 64 (1/2): 81-106.

Heydon, John. 1658. Advice to a daughter in opposition to the Advice to a sonne, or, Directions for your better conduct through the various and most important encounters of this life. London: Printed by J. Moxon for Francis Cossinet.

Larmuseau, Maarten, Koenraad Matthijs, and Tom Wenseleers. 2016. "Cuckolded fathers rare in human populations." Trends in Ecology & Evolution. TREE-D-16-00022R1 (2086, Article in Press).

Osborne, Charles C. 1901. "Francis Osborne, Author." Gentleman's Magazine 290: 351-362.

Osborne, Francis. 1656. Advice to a son, or, Directions for your better conduct through the various and most important encounters of this life. Oxford: Printed by H.H. for Tho. Robinson.(Judge Edward Abbott Parry's edition, London, 1896)

Pecke, Thomas. 1658. Advice to Balam's ass, or, Momus catechised in answer to a certaine scurrilous and abusive scribler, one John Heydon, author of Advice to a daughter. London: Printed by E.B. for Henry Marsh.

Wood, Anthony á. 1691. Athenæ Oxonienses: an exact history of all the writers and bishops who have had their education in the most ancient and famous University of Oxford, from the fifteenth year of King Henry the Seventh, Dom. 1500, to the end of the year 1690 representing the birth, fortune, preferment, and death of all those authors and prelates, the great accidents of their lives, and the fate and character of their writings: to which are added, the Fasti, or, Annals, of the said university, for the same time. London: Printed for Tho. Bennet.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Janice Fiamengo interviewed by Lucian Vâlsan

AVfM Video Source · 29 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Fiamengo has a new project in the making and needs your help with stories.

In addition to an extensive discussion about the project, Lucian Vâlsan and prof. Fiamengo goes into other politically incorrect topics including, but not limited to, the issue of transgender children, Donald Trump, privilege checking, and ideology.

Worth a watch as this is a discussion between two individuals who spend a tremendous amount of time studying the vanguard of our philosophical opponents.

You still have the chance to secure your seat to see both Professor Fiamengo and Lucian Vâlsan at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2016, in London, the United Kingdom.

There are still almost eight days until the ticket selling period closes, so make sure you buy your ticket here.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Prof. Fiamengo's luminary series – The Fiamengo File – is hosted by Studio Brulé, here.

Are all women gold-diggers?

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 30 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

From JW Productions comes a movie with a deliberately provocative question in the title… Are all men pedophiles? [1] This seems like an odd title, given that they acknowledge in the film the existence of female pedophiles. But if they want to take advantage of some dominant cultural narrative, well, we can play that game too… indeed, it might be quite fun.

JW Productions [2] provides a brief outline on their website:

> For the first time in history the tables have turned on men. In the past "Witch-Hunt" was associated with women but now it is associated with men.
> In an effort to protect our children society has started to isolate men. This documentary explores the pedophilia hysteria and how all men are viewed as potential pedophiles. How did society come to such a conclusion and what are the political and social consequences?

Witch-hunts serve little purpose in the course of reason, and focusing only on the perversions of men doesn't help anyone. The perversions of women also deserve scrutiny and, for balance, I'd like to ask… are all women gold-diggers?

Materialism as women's porn

E.L. James' novel Fifty Shades of Grey might pique women's curiosity, and they might fantasize about having nasty things done to them by a mysterious, powerful, rich dude that flies helicopters and owns lots of stuff, but their fantasies cannot be disengaged from the stuff that lies at the centre of women's being. It is no accident that the main protagonist in the novel, Christian Grey, is obscenely wealthy. That he is mysterious, powerful and eager to indulge is part of the context that revs women's engines, but these are not the first things that a woman will notice.

The key to understanding what makes women drool lies in their self-indulgence… their narcissism… the me-me-me of the female psyche. And a primary vector for their self-indulgence is their materialism… their obsession with owning stuff. In a nutshell, women identify with stuff; it is the source of their Raison d'etre. Women's indulgent materialism is the shallow extension of their hypergamy [3].

Women love stuff. Lots of stuff. They crave for stuff, the more, the better. Women fall over themselves in the rush to obtain stuff… stuff on sale, stuff at bargain-basement prices [4]. Women will stampede shopping centres [5] in the rush to acquire stuff. Women have special days on which they can celebrate and worship stuff… Christmas sales, stock clearance sales, new fashion sales, spring sales, summer sales, winter sales, autumn sales, because-you're-worth-it sales.

Women wallow in stuff; they celebrate men who provide them with stuff, and they divorce men quicker than they can say "alimony and child support," should they find someone who can provide them with even more stuff.

Stuff doesn't even have to be useful… an obscenely expensive diamond ring, about as useful as tits on a bull, will nonetheless have women oohing and ahhing, and swooning in either admiration or envy, depending on who it is that is wearing it.

A woman might know nothing of the precision engineering, the exquisite upholstery and amazing technology that's gone into the creation of a high-performance Lamborghini Diablo, and she might not even know how to drive. But as stuff in which to sit and show off her latest perm, with a rear-view mirror that she can look into to make sure she's looking her best, it can make the ideal birthday gift for the man who has everything.

Women judge each other according to the stuff they own… big, shiny, gleamy stuff that sparkles in the sun and that they proudly show off to friends. Women judge each other according to the stuff that they wear and the stuff that they lather on their faces to provide the masks that spell identity [6].

Imagine where women would be without stuff. Imagine them coping in a world without cosmetics, without texting or Facebook, without the internet for them to follow the latest fashions or without television to keep up with the latest celebrity gossip (incidentally, notice how all these things on which women depend are created by men! Just Sayin').

Where most men are content with four pairs of stuff: One for summer, one for winter, one for formal and one for casual, women want hundreds of pairs of stuff. Sometimes even thousands to match their lipstick, their mood, their dress, the occasion, the weather, the car, the furniture. So let us take this moment to spare a thought for poor Imelda Marcos after her tragic loss of thousands of pairs of stuff [7] and what she must have been going through.

Designer stuff

Unmasking Feminism [8] nails what women want:

> She may have everything she wants, but not everything she needs. She wants independence, the vote, her own income, etc., but she wants all these things like she wants a designer purse.

Precisely. Women want careers and self-determination like they want designer handbags, shoes 'n' stuff. Independence, the vote, and income are fun things to have that make you look good, they create a good impression, and your girlfriends will envy you. They have nothing to do with achievement, responsibility, what you stand for or what you believe in. That's men's stuff.

For women, the role of minister of defense is more a fashion statement than it is a responsibility. Consistent with Angela Merkel's stance on invaders refugees, the defense ministers of Norway, Sweden, Netherlands, and Germany [9] care less about protecting their countries from invaders than they do for maintaining appearances. You know the kinder, gentler, friendlier face of a liberal, progressive Europe that holds its doors open for anyone, regardless of how their cultural and religious values clash with those of their own people. Fashionable, trendy and popular, they'll show that boring, stodgy old-boy network of The Patriarchy how defense should really be conducted. Hennis-Plasschaert, defense minister of the Netherlands, told the Guardian:

> [The Dutch politician] Neelie Kroes once said to me that old boys' networks are the oldest form of cartels we have in Europe. She was right, but things are changing, and women can do similar things now.

And the Guardian gets right into the swing of it:

> Her tweet with the photograph soon went viral. To many, the image heralded a new era in which even the last bastions of male privilege were no longer closed to talented women. Sweden's foreign minister, Carl Bildt, retweeted it with the comment "True Power Girls" (and was widely criticised for the condescending tone).

Thank God for affirmative action, whether as formal policy or implied in the cultural narrative, without which these women would have had to compete against men on a level playing field. Without affirmative action, whether formal or implied, there is every likelihood that they might have opted for the safer, less stressful stay-at-home option. Minister of Defense is the ultimate designer label that a woman can flash around to all her friends. And relaxed in her self-assured superiority of her gender, she need not trouble herself with the boring details of her culture unravelling.

Visceral sense of unfairness that punches you in the gut

Women cannot understand that for men, work is not a hobby. They don't understand that for men, work is not something you do if you like, something you do if your fancy takes you. And so women have acquired a visceral sense of the profound unfairness that only men have been allowed to enjoy access to these goodies for centuries. It hits them in the gut like a pile-driver. But thanks to feminism, things are different now. For women steeped in the culture of feminism, they can now enjoy work as an option, an indulgence, something you do if it's convenient and fun and does not interfere with your quality of life. That's why women need affirmative action so that they can have the first choice at those jobs selfishly and insensitively being hogged by men who have families to support.

A woman's perspective may be narcissistic and self-indulgent, but it has very practical survival benefits and enables them to cope with the unfairness of thousands of millennia of oppression. Thanks to feminism, they have more options now. They can still prioritize being provided for and they continue to judge men on their ability to provide [10], classifying men as winners, losers, studs, and creeps, as they have for millennia in the tradition of hypergamy. But now thanks to affirmative action, they are at liberty to toss their provider should they get bored with him… they can even claim child support and alimony if they want… and then take away another man's livelihood as payback for all those millennia of oppression against women. And if any man should get too uppity about his rights, she has VAWA to protect her "rights" (privileges) while trashing his constitutional rights [11]. And she can contrive unsubstantiated allegations of rape or violence [12] to put him back in his place… and then expect to get away with it [13]. Indeed these days, she can even murder [14], and the worst that she might expect is a stern look from the judge with a slap on the wrist.

Practical implications

Women's hypergamy is inextricably entwined with their narcissistic materialism. While not all women are necessarily gold-diggers, the assumption that they all are is one that will stand a man in much better stead than any self-help theories, like (PUA) Game. We are reminded of Maslow's hierarchy of needs… because women control sexual supply, they set different priorities. They choose materialism as their first priority because they can, and because their sexual needs will be met by default subsequent to their first priority being met.

For men, appearances can help, but not in the same way that lookin' good helps women. It especially helps if you look rich… if you look like you own the Lamborghini on which you are leaning or the yacht on whose deck you are standing. Google the terms [gold digger prank] for some laughs. It is the size of a man's wallet, not his member, that makes all the difference. There is no mystery about women at all, this is the simple, unvarnished truth. The "cute versus rich" matrix explains this most succinctly, 6 minutes into the clip Hot Crazy Matrix – A Man's Guide to Women [15]. But I prefer to provide a slightly different slant.

I'd like to expand on the presenter's comment on the space to the left of the husband line, which is a little simplistic because it does not factor in the arbitrary manner in which women define "cute". It is more accurate to portray the region to the left of the vertical husband line as containing an enclosure – say, a small rectangle – to represent women's motivations. Beyond the rectangle is the no-go zone. This rectangle changes shape and shifts its position with a combination of cultural fashions and emotional states. In this way, we can better appreciate that a woman's choices in men are going to be contingent on many variables, from her mood on the day, to what her friends are telling her, to fashion or social proof. But the key point is that vertical husband line… regardless of what her ever-shifting motivations might be, regardless of how the rectangle morphs and shifts within the no-go zone, there is only one thing that really matters. Money whispers to women in a way that it does not to men.

Conclusion

Women certainly have primal sexual impulses that are no less than those of men, but these are typically sublimated in favour of materialistic priorities. This is why an appropriate response to the question "are all men pedophiles?" is, "are all women gold-diggers?" For the simple truth is, many of them are… and the assumption that all of them are is the safest, most reliable assumption that a man can count on… more reliable than Game or anything that any woman or feminists might tell him. The right assumption will predispose a man to the astutest of decisions, from the pleasures he indulges and the company he keeps, to defending his freedom and protecting his assets, to not wasting his time on spent women. Even the nicest, kindest, most marriageable women are not averse to being wooed… how can a man lose by sticking with that one assumption to govern all women?

*****

BIBLIOGRAPHY

[1] Breure, J. (Director). (2016, February 25). Are All Men Pedophiles? Documentary [Youtube – JW Productions]. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=243cGRVFrzA&ab_channel=JWDocumentaries

[2] JW Productions. Are All Men Pedophiles? Documentary. (n.d.). Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://areallmenpedophiles.com/

[3] Tomassi, R. (2016, May 6). Category Archives: Hypergamy. The Rational Male. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://therationalmale.com/category/hypergamy-2/

[4] Lunchboxcafe. (2013, November 28). Black Friday – 2013 Wal-Mart. [Youtube]. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://youtu.be/ucrM3TLLJRs

[5] Bailey, J. (2011, November 25). Black Friday Crowd Rushing into Urban Outfitters. [Youtube]. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://youtu.be/DigiWS1YhxI

[6] Kerry-Washington.us. (2009, April 18). L'Oreal – 'Because You're Worth It'. [Youtube]. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://youtu.be/84SUfl8Yv4k

[7] Oliver, A. (2012, September 23). Imelda Marcos' famous collection of 3,000 shoes partly destroyed by termites and floods after lying in storage in the Philippines for 26 years since she exiled. Daily Mail. Retrieved May 15,

2016, from
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2207353/Imelda-Marcos-legendary-3-000-plus-shoe-collection-destroyed-termites-floods-neglect.html

[8] Unmasking Feminism. Remove the Needs (Repost from 2010). Retrieved January 19, 2014, from http://unmaskingfeminism.wordpress.com/2013/11/22/remove-the-needs-repost-from-2010/

[9] Oltermann, P. (2014, February 2). Female defence ministers pledge to break Europe's old boys' network. The Guardian. Retrieved May 13, 2016, from http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/feb/02/female-defence-ministers-tweet-photograph

[10] Arndt, B. (2012, April 22). Why women lose the dating game. The Sydney Morning Herald. Retrieved May 16, 2016, from http://www.smh.com.au/lifestyle/life/why-women-lose-the-dating-game-20120421-1xdn0.html

[11] Wex Legal Dictionary. (n.d.). Equal Protection. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from https://www.law.cornell.edu/wex/equal_protection

[12] Kassam, A. (2016, March 26). Canada urged to rethink the approach to sexual assault after Ghomeshi acquittal. The Guardian. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://www.theguardian.com/world/2016/mar/26/canada-justice-system-ghomeshi-acquittal-sexual-assault-allegations-approach?utm_source=esp

[13] Franklin, R. (2014, January 21). Sara Ylen False Rape Claim Shows Ease With Which Innocent Men Convicted. A Voice for Men. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/sara-ylen-false-rape-claim-shows-ease-with-which-innocent-men-convicted/

[14] Davison, D., and J. Hembling. (2014, January 18). Canada: a first world country. A Voice for Men. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from http://www.avoiceformen.com/gynarchy/canada-a-first-world-cuntry/

[15] Erhan Ilter. (2014, December 10). Hot Crazy Matrix – A Man's Guide to Women. [Youtube]. Retrieved May 15, 2016, from https://youtu.be/TjZIPClPR6I?t=6m

Study: 50% of Twitter misogyny posted by women. UK MPs launch "Reclaim the Internet" campaign.

David King · 30 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The title says it all. Both the BBC and the Daily Wire report that think tank Demos undertook a three-week study and found that half of apparently misogynist posts were posted by women.

From the original report:

> - Women are as almost as likely as men to use the terms 'slut' and 'whore' on Twitter. Not only are women using these words, they are directing them at each other, both casually and offensively; women are increasingly more inclined to engage in discourses using the same language that has been, and continues to be, used as derogatory against them.
> - There was a high proportion of 'casual' misogyny. Approximately 29 per cent of the 'rape' tweets appeared to use the term in a casual or metaphorical way; while approximately 35 per cent of the 'slut' and 'whore' tweets appeared to use the term in a casual or metaphorical way.

In the same article, the BBC reported that a "2014 study from cosmetics firm Dove found that over five million negative tweets were posted about beauty and body image. Four out of five were sent by women." It should be noted that Dove's corporate policy is to use models of all shapes and sizes and have a generally more constructive attitude toward what constitutes 'beauty' than many cosmetics companies do, therefore 'negative' may not necessarily mean 'abusive' in that particular context.

Co-incidentally, or perhaps in response, British MPs Yvette Cooper, Maria Miller, Stella Creasy, Jo Swinson and Jess Philips (she who ridiculed MP Philip Davies' suggestion of holding a Parliamentary debate on men's issues to mark International Men's Day, just as Parliament regularly does women's issues on International Women's Day) launched their Reclaim the Internet Campaign.

They set up a forum in which to discuss how to combat hate speech. So, let's have a look. Logo: the radical feminist power fist inside the outline of a computer monitor in lieu of the symbol of Venus. Not a good start, prompting one to ask why. (No satisfactory answer is given, but at least the post remains. For now. In case it gets taken down, here is an archive of it.)

Their intro page states:

> This is a place to discuss the big ideas on how we 'Reclaim the Internet' for everyone.
>
> Here you'll find questions, discussion, personal testimony and ideas on how we can take a stand against online abuse, whether that's misogyny and sexism, racism, homophobia or violent intimidation.
>
> The internet must be a forum for freedom of speech. But that means that every voice should matter – and that includes on this forum.
>
> Debate is encouraged, but it must always be respectful. This must be a safe space where people can share ideas and personal experienced without fear of abuse.
>
> Our community works on the basis of trust – so the most engaged community members can assist in the governance of their community.

> But it's not up to users alone. We will remove content, disable accounts and we won't hesitate to refer something to the police if violent threats are made or hate crime is committed.
>
> If you want to know more – here's what the designers of this platform say

Sigh.

Okay, ladies, let me introduce you to the Greater Internet Fuckwad Theory [see history of same] Originally published on web comic Penny Arcade which states:

> Normal Person + Anonymity + Audience = Total Fuckwad

Simply put, Internet anonymity is impossible to squelch as the Internet is currently designed (although, in fact, it's a lot harder to remain truly anonymous on the Internet than many people commonly suppose), and the above is merely an observation of human psychology that no amount of legislation (especially with selective enforcement) will change.

Furthermore, one person's "hate speech" is another person's legitimate and constructive criticism.

Cooper asked the BBC, "What more should social media platforms be doing?" The BBC reports that the campaign was an opportunity for the public to "put forward their proposals and demands for the changes we want to see."

Nothing, Ms. Cooper. The solution — to the extent there is one — is very simple: don't go to the parts of the Internet that offend you, make liberal use of the block button on social media platforms and don't abuse their report button. Doing so just adds to their work and makes it less likely that legitimately hateful speech goes unattended or, worse, requires automatic suspension mechanisms that make a mockery of the values that liberals such as you once stood for.

The BBC itself asks the same question: "The bigger question is what can be done about it?"

Nothing, short of completely re-architecting the whole Internet to require cryptographically authenticated access certified by a trusted authority much in the way SSL certificates work before traffic is even routed (which is a much harder proposition than many may think), because the alternative, including initiatives like SocialAutopsy along with whatever foolery "Reclaim the Internet" might procure, can only do more harm than good.

The Internet is not, and never should be, a "safe space" (for who gets to define 'safe'?) Time to put on your big-girl and big-boy panties and take responsibility for your own safety online.

MRA Feminist Peg Tyre, Pulitzer Winner: a Boy's and Men's gendered lens

AVfM Video Source · 30 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Peg Tyre, Investigative Journalist, and Feminist discovers the daunting challenges men and boys face in education.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DDqZMcbFhuk&ab_channel=TimPatten

From the New Male Studies malestudies.org/ (not to be confused with Men's Studies, a feminist college program.)

Tim Patten

Dr. Nadeem Haider of Leeds, England “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 31 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Nadeem Haider of the Children’s Circumcision Service in Leeds has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Dr. Haider’s website circumcisionleeds.com:

“Welcome
Children’s Circumcision Service in Leeds provides religious and cultural circumcision for boys upto the age of sixteen years. The procedure is performed by experienced doctors. Two doctors in the consortium are consultant paediatric surgeons and the other two are experienced General practitioners with over twenty years experience in performing circumcisions.

We have set up this high standard, ethical service considering the need of the community in Leeds, Bradford and the surrounding areas. This is a private community based service. We are based at Rutland Lodge Medical Centre, an easily accessible location on Scott Hall Road Leeds, close to the city centre. The medical centre has a comfortable waiting lounge, a separate consultation room, a well equipped minor operating theatre, baby changing facilities, a pharmacy, and ample free on site car parking.

Currently, we provide this service on weekends only.”

So, we have four highly skilled surgeons that perform untold thousands of genital mutilations on unconsenting infants for religious and cultural reasons, and they consider this a “high standard, ethical service.” I call it a money grab that’s tainted with the blood and sacrifice of innocent children.

I assume the doctors do normal people healing during the week – cure disease, treat conditions, etc. – and only on weekends wreak permanent abuse on unconsenting infants.

Under “About Us:”

> This service is run by two Paediatric Surgeons (Mr Nadeem Haider and Mr Abid Qazi) and two very experienced General Practitioners (Dr. M Shafiq and Dr. Naseem Khan). This makes it a unique service in the community providing a high class, ethical circumcision service in UK. This was started due to lack of a good service in the community and the fact that that NHS does not fulfill the demand for religious and cultural circumcision in this area. Many parents run pillar to post to find a suitable service and at times end up traveling long distances to have this procedure done. The service is based in a modern, recently developed facility at Rutland Lodge Medical Centre, close to Leeds City Centre. The centre is easily accessible with ample parking facility. The procedures are performed in an operation theatre using sterile equipment.

Assaulting and sexually abusing an infant is not ethical no matter how many times you say it.

And the reason – to their credit – the NHS (National Health Service) doesn't perform circumcision is that they know it's not medically necessary.

Under "Procedures" we read:

> Parents requesting religious and cultural circumcision in the UK is quite common. The National Health Service has limited provision for religious and cultural circumcisions. This is insufficient to cater for all local needs. It is important for parents to ensure that they contact experienced medical personnel for this procedure.
>
> We use various techniques for circumcision depending upon age of the child.
>
> Plastibell Technique
>
> The plastibell technique, commonly known as the ring method,is a simple procedure. It can be safely performed by trained medical personnel with an acceptable (low) rate of complications. In this method a plastic ring is put on the tip of penis under the foreskin and a thread is tied tightly over the ring and foreskin. The thread gradually cuts the foreskin and the ring eventually falls off in seven to ten days duration. The most common risk is bleeding in first 24 hours, which can mostly be controlled without requiring any further surgical procedure.
>
> The ring method is also one of the most common techniques used for infant circumcision in the United States.

"Parents requesting religious and cultural circumcision in the UK is quite common," infants requesting circumcision, not so much.

Although the doctor says the Plastibell device has an "acceptable (low) rate of complications," it has been to blame for many injuries, including death.

Under "Your Questions" we see:

> Who will perform the circumcision?
>
> Our Surgeons Mr Abid Qazi and Mr Nadeem Haider, who are consultant Paediatric surgeons and Dr Mohammad Shafiq and Dr Naseem Khan, who are experienced General Practitioners will perform the procedure according to the current guidelines set by GMC and British Association of Paediatric Surgeons. All four doctors are highly experienced in performing circumcision procedures and have more than twenty year experience. Please inquire the name of doctor while booking for the procedure if you want to know who will perform the procedure.
>
> How long will the procedure take?
>
> A standard procedure does not take more than 40 minutes including explanation of the procedure, going through a process of informed consent and the actual procedure. Although you will have to stay at our centre for 2 to 3 hours.
>
> What are the common complications?
>
> We will discuss in detail the possible complications before performing the circumcision. As a legal requirement we will also ask you to sign a consent form. If the procedure is performed carefully and by fully trained clinicians, the rate of complications is very low.

The doctor should know that the American Academy of Pediatrics does not recommend surgery such as circumcision on infants because of damage to an immature nervous system.

The only valid consent form would be signed by the infantile patient, an impossibility. The unethical practice of allowing parents to consent for their infant boy to MGM is illegal and immoral, and something parents should think about.

Under “Feedback” we read:

> “We are writing to thank you for the wonderful service you provide. We were extremely happy with the manner in which the circumcision of our son was performed, it was professional and reassuring. We were especially pleased with the following up done and the concern shown for our son’s welfare.
>
> We would definitely recommend your service to our friends.”
>
> Brett & Vanessa Malila

Need I even comment on this?

Since Dr. Haider has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Haider’s practice information follows:

Rutland Lodge Medical Centre

Near Scott Hall sports centre

Scott Hall Way, Leeds

Post Code LS7 3RA

> Dr. Nadeem Haider of Leeds, England “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/lcahYTBrR1 @AndreaHardie #MGM #nocirc pic.twitter.com/3mkYH27lAO
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 31, 2016

Steve Brule wins the internet with his #messagetofeminists

AVfM Video Source · 31 May 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sub to Steve here or be unworthy.

Karma is a Bitch – Francis "Coyote" Shivers now an Elected Los Angeles City Official

Paul Elam · 1 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Karma just jumped up and bit sociopath Pauley Perrette right on her lying ass.

Ex-husband Francis "Coyote" Shivers; the man she has terrorized for over a decade with a litany of false, perjured, and criminally procured restraining orders, has just been elected to the Hollywood United Neighborhood Council and was sworn in May 16, 2016.

That's right. Mr. Shivers went from being a falsely accused inmate in L.A. County Jail to being a duly elected L.A. City Official in under four months! This should serve as an inspiration for many other falsely accused who feel they are powerless in a broken system. Shivers beat out four other candidates for the position of Unclassified Stakeholder.

The Honorable Councilman, Mr. Shivers, wished to thank his supporters and those who voted for him.

The Hollywood United Neighborhood Council is a branch of Los Angeles City government entrusted to assist and bridge gaps between Hollywood residents and business owners to city officials and city government offices.

It probably didn't take long for serial false accuser, liar, and sociopath, Perrette to get her dyed dander up and complain to the Board that since ex-husband, now a certified "City Official", would be conducting various civic, business, and government functions in Hollywood, she would not be able to also partake in these events; except, oh yeah, she never has taken part in any Hollywood United Neighborhood Council events, ever. Oops!

Since the various activities and functions of the Council are publicized, we'll see how long it takes for serial stalker, pathological liar and false accuser Perrette to show up at one of Coyote's official city functions, and claim that he is stalking her and in violation of her perpetual illegal decade plus pattern of restraining order terrorism.

If that does occur, and we're sure that it will, because Perrette; in her own disturbed mind, can't stop this charade that she has created, we hope that the Honorable Coyote Shivers will summon local police to have the rancid political dissident promptly arrested.

*****

References

https://www.facebook.com/HollywoodUnitedNeighborhoodCouncil/

Political Correctness on College Campuses (Jonathan Haidt Interview Part 1)

AVfM Video Source · 1 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Jonathan Haidt (Author and Professor, NYU-Stern) joins Dave Rubin, discussing political correctness and free speech on college campus, the role of government, and the rise of Donald Trump.

The Rubin Report

Understanding the new feminist zodiac killers

August Løvenskiolds · 2 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Communication between men's rights advocates (MRAs) and feminists is never easy – even when we speak the same language, the gaps in logic and reasonableness between our outposts seem impossible to colonize. MRAs speak with logic and facts; feminists speak with something called "emotional truth" (lies) about "social justice" (which is neither social nor just). This frustrating split seems destined to keep us apart forever, despite our stated mutual interest in gender equality.

Toward ending this divide and as a part of a kinder, gentler AVFM, I am exploring the use of emotional language, rather than facts and logic, to reach out to our nominally equal-rights-seeking sisters and, it is to be hoped, heal our many rifts.

Creating the feminist zodiac is the next step in my humble efforts to turn their vagina monologue into a dialogue. By using an idea of my own specious fabrication, I hope to engage those feminists for whom prevarication is both a life choice and sexual preference. I'm willing to meet you halfway, girls. Any takers?

Oh, and I should note: the feminist zodiac is not based on the day of one's birth – that would be too patriarchal and triggering – but rather, on the date of your last abortion. This gives you the right to change your sign when the curse of future motherhood afflicts your divine nethers.

Entitledus – January 20 to February 18: You deserve the best in life, and this makes you unique, the most special of special snowflakes. You deserve free money, education, food, protection, men, and whatever number of shoes makes you happy. No one can judge you. This is your age, and your age will never leave the toddler stage. You will die forgotten, never doing anything worthy of note and you are proud of that since achievement is a man thing.

Famous Entitlians include Anita Sarkeesian and #TrigglyPuff.

Fishius – February 19 – March 20: You are highly abstract and meta, the most special of special snowflakes. You have no use for men nor bicycles, and you are blessed that neither of them wants you back. You will lose power as you age, eventually dying from ineffective efforts to support you.

Famous Fishians include Gloria Steinem and Canadian ginger TERF Meghan Murphy.

Hairius – March 21 to April 19: From your side-shave to the tips of your furry hobbit toes, you are the most distinctive of special snowflakes. The most intersectional of all feminists, you see grooming as one more way that the patriarchy wants to rape you. You will perish from the sight of yourself in a mirrored safe space.

Famous Hairies include Madonna And Emma "Mattress Girl" Sulkowitz.

Bulcrapius – April 20 to May 20: You are the apex, the most special of special turd blossoms. Your shit literally does not stink as far as you know, even when it hits your many fans. Your paranoia about sex, consent, and human interaction brings you to bizarre places, including pegging and death by starvation.

Famous Bulcrapians include Shulamith Firestone and Laci Green.

Germinius – May 21 to June 20: Your personality is the most contagious, much like your vagina, which makes YOU the most special of special snowflakes. You will forever proclaim that as a feminist you do not hate men despite your irresistible use of hateful, misandric terms like "patriarchy", "toxic masculinity" and "male privilege". You will succumb to evaporation since everyone can see right through both you and your risible denials.

Famous Germies include Laurie Penny, Brooke Obie, and Claire Warner.

Cancerous – June 21 to July 22: You are the essence of feminism; indeed, one could say that feminism IS Cancerous, making you the most special of special snowflakes. In many ways, people want cancers like you even more than they want feminism. Cantankerous and canting don't even begin to describe you.

Famous cancers include Melissa Click and Hillary Clinton.

Kittenious – July 23 to August 22: You are the most reasonable of feminists, and that makes you the most special of all special snowflakes. Although other feminists hate you to the point of burning your books about men's issues, and men's advocates find your demand for more male gallantry grating, still you carry on trying to bring validation to the hate movement that is feminism. You will croak from frustration.

Famous kittens include Christina Hoff-Sommers and Cathy Young.

Slatterious – August 23 to September 22: Your sex-positive pretensions and rounded heels set you apart, making you the most special of all special snowflakes. The recent rise of "rape culture" and "toxic male gaze" as trendy feminist themes is making you feel your age as your last embattled ovum dissolves in a sea of intersectional semen.

Famous Slatterns include Amber Rose and Beyonce.

Librious – September 23 to October 22: For taking the "equi" out of "equilibrious," you literally tossed equality off the feminist train. You want women-only legal rights to abortion, rape, the military draft exemption, and parenthood. You flinch and deny whenever men's issues are mentioned. You will swing as a result of the feminist collaboration trials to be held in Seneca Falls by President Trump.

Famous Libriums include Amanda Marcotte and Jessica Valenti.

Scarfius – October 23 to November 21: Your fantastical appetite for social justice and cheeseburgers makes you the most widespread of feminists, the most special of special snowflake. No wedding cake is safe from your critique or maw. You will expire in a series of earth-shaking events.

Famous Scarfers include Andrea Dworkin and Roxanne "Bad Feminist" Gay.

Faghagitarius – November 22 to December 21: By pretending to support gay men while infiltrating and co-opting their movement, you are the most fabulous feminist, the most special of special snowflake. Secretly, you will never forgive gay men for their championing of marriage, a thing you openly despise and covertly would kill for. You will die at the hands of your wife.

Famous Faghags include Rose McGowan and every entitled twat who thinks it is cool to colonize gay bars and other men's spaces.

Captious – December 22 – January 19. By finding fault even where none exist, you are the pinnacle of feminism, the most special of special snowflake. From inventing problems with air conditioning, dress codes, mansplaining, and manspreading, there is no place you will not go to prove your obsession with finding things to hate about your male betters. You will die in combat training a few days after being drafted.

Famous Captors include Eva Braun, Hitler, and Lily "Mansplain" Rothman.

Well, that concludes the feminist zodiacal pantheon. I hope this will build a deeper emotional bond between MRAs and feminists.

I know I'm having a moment with it myself.

Interdisciplinarity, another word for emptiness – TFF Episode 33

AVfM Video Source · 2 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 33 Professor Fiamengo argues that the intent of interdisciplinarity has been so diluted in Women's Studies that it has become a hodgepodge of nonsense. A little knowledge is dangerous; even less is a trivial pursuit.

StudioBrule

Freedom Alternative: a conversation with Paul Elam

Paul Elam · 3 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

You can subscribe to Lucian Valsan's Freedom Alternative here.

Eloquent Rage: The Legacy of Angry Harry andybob · 3 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

And so it is that I suspect that if western women remain antagonistic toward their men, their days of empowerment are numbered."

(from "Men Have Bred Dogs And Cattle; Why Not Women Too?")

As the Men's Human Rights Movement [MHRM] continues to mourn the passing of Angry Harry in February 2016, many Men's Human Rights Activists [MHRAs] have found solace in celebrating his life by taking stock of his stupendous contributions to enriching our knowledge and understanding of key men's issues. It is clear that Angry Harry has had an uncommonly profound influence on many MHRAs, especially those in the initial stages of their journeys out of gynocentric ignorance. This explains why so many MHRAs took the news of his death so personally.

Angry Harry was a prolific writer who crafted his words to achieve maximum impact on his readers, without ever sacrificing the logic behind his arguments or the validity of his conclusions. The fact that he tackled such a vast range of issues with a wit that was at once savage and sophisticated, and never detracted from either his focus or purpose, is probably what makes Angry Harry's writing so universally readable among those whose concern for the rights and welfare of men and boys initially led them to the distinguished canon that represents such a significant component of his life's work. This is particularly remarkable because, despite its dazzling satirical edge, Angry Harry wrote some of the most starkly confronting articles that have ever been composed by an MHRA.

Angry Harry was not one to gently navigate novice MHRAs through the maze of men's human rights issues and the anti-male forces that have long impacted them. Rather, he yanked them along through one gynocentric chamber of horrors after another, forcing them to examine the exhibits in grizzly close-up, never hesitating to rub their noses in them if he felt it would do them some good. Angry Harry's writing was all about tough love.

The cumulative effect of this experience is to leave the reader in shock, not just at the sheer magnitude of their own ignorance, but by how many of their assumptions about the world have been forever blasted to dust. Angry Harry never pulled any punches, yet always managed to remain fair-minded, realistic and logical, which is why so many of his readers have come to trust and respect his perspectives. Angry Harry wore his moniker with pride. As a writer, he will forever remain a brutally frank Virgil who guides his bewildered students on educational journeys that frequently lead to comedy – both high and low – and can even touch on the Divine. This is what makes the often deeply disturbing nature of the Angry Harry experience as pleasurable as it is enlightening. Dante would have been impressed.

Perhaps Angry Harry's greatest gift to his readers is to encourage them to respect their anger enough to utilize it effectively and constructively rather than squander it nursing pointless and morally questionable fantasies, such as exacting retribution against women for their collective betrayal of men. I'm referring to those cringe-worthy rants by red pill blowhards who envision a Great Day of Reckoning in which women will be herded into compulsory workshops with titles like 'How to Respect Men' before demonstrating sufficient penance that would permit them back into the general population, much chastened from having 'learned a valuable lesson'.

Angry Harry would have scoffed at such nonsense, not because he didn't believe that the majority of Western women deserved it, but because he was a realist who knew that such a spectacle is never going to happen. What Angry Harry did believe would happen to women when men finally have enough of being demonized and abused by a corrupt system that panders so obsequiously to women in exchange for their collective betrayal is something we'll come to later. In "Men Have Bred Dogs And Cattle; Why Not Women Too?", Angry Harry begins by making it clear that he believed that such a point is inevitable and that the MHRM will be a major player in reaching it.

> Well, in general, if men begin to see women as their adversaries rather than as their comrades, and a battle > ensues, then the men will win hands down. The women will have no chance of succeeding.

>
> The only question of real interest is, therefore, will there be such a battle? And the answer to this is that it is probably already taking place. The Men's Movement is NOT a major power player in this battle, as yet, but it will be.

Angry Harry wrote this article more than five years ago, and it must have been deeply satisfying for him to have lived to see the "Men's Movement" – now widely referred to as the MHRM – become the major power player in this battle that he predicted it would be, and be recognized as such by the other major players. In fact, these other major players are now so threatened by the MHRM that they have formed coalitions which have conducted global smear campaigns in which they have libeled the MHRM as a hotbed of reactionary extremism teeming with rapists, mass murderers and, God forbid, straight, white men. Meanwhile, Angry Harry is neither surprised nor impressed that the vast majority of Western women have chosen to stand with feminism rather than the men to who have sacrificed so much on their behalf:

> Supporting feminism will probably turn out to be the biggest mistake that Western women have ever made. They have betrayed the very men who sacrificed much of their being and who worked and fought so hard in order to protect and care for them and themselves, and who have managed to provide the West with all the luxuries and benefits to which its peoples have grown so accustomed.
>
> Compared to Western men, Western women have contributed very little to the stunning progress achieved in their societies and, currently, by supporting feminism they seem to be doing their damnedest to destroy what their men have achieved.
>
> And if Western women continue to undermine their men by supporting agendas that discriminate against them, and that rob them of their homes, their children, their security, their dignity, and their heritage, then they will only have themselves to blame should men decide that they have had enough of all this 'equality'.

Angry Harry believed that women had already missed the boat when it came to standing up for their men. They have stood by and watched in silence for so long as radical feminists marched into Western institutions and infected them with their misandric ideology to such an extent, that women can no longer provide any meaningful opposition, even if they wanted to. In other words, it won't be women who put a halt to the systemic discrimination of men and boys. It will have to be done by men – men who are finally standing up for themselves and their sons, casting off the yoke of their enforced utility and demanding, not a return to the gynocentric system of old, but an entirely new deal with a non-negotiable range of conditions. Angry Harry explains:

> For example, one of the best ways to ensure that peace and harmony prevail is for men to be treated properly, particularly by other men. And a major cause of violence and disharmony, whether at the street level or between nations, is partly the result of men having failed to learn to deal sympathetically and non-aggressively with other men.
>
> And if men were brought up to treat each other with respect, the benefits for society would be huge. Instead, however, we have the complete opposite, with battalions of people in the government, the feminist media and the legal profession hell bent on creating as much disharmony as possible through the demonisation of men – particularly the white ones – in order to feather their own nests.
>
> This demonisation has been so successful and so widespread – and its effects are now so ingrained – that it would likely take very many years before it could be countered sufficiently – possibly decades – if one were to try to achieve this through polite discussion, gentle persuasion and voting for the right politicians; and even this is assuming that the opposition would not put up much of a fight, which is unlikely.

Like many newly-minted MHRAs who were influenced by Angry Harry, this author initially balked at the assertion that polite discussion, gentle persuasion and relying on politicians should be so summarily dismissed, but years of witnessing the sheer futility of these approaches has proven that Angry Harry was right all along: compromise is not an option – it is a capitulation that will change nothing. Angry Harry contended that a real gender war was "unstoppable", and that men would win it "hands down."

What exactly does Angry Harry believe will happen to women when men inevitably win the gender war? Let's just say that it is a fate far more dire than having to mumble some apologies or attend a couple of workshops:

> Another thing that men will also have learned by then is that women do not actually care that much for them…Western men will recognise that their women are a threat to them…and so they will disempower them.
>
> And so if Western women do not very quickly start supporting their men by helping them to destroy the outrageous discrimination and demonisation that they have continually to face but, instead, actually continue to collude with those very groups that promote such things, I cannot see any type of outcome that will, let's just say, allow western women to retain the high status to which they have grown so accustomed.

If 'empowerment' is Western women's Holy of Holies, then 'disempowerment' must surely represent their idea of a Descent into Hell. This is because feminists have promoted the idea that 'empowerment' is synonymous with 'women's rights,' rather than what it is: the "high status" conferred on them by men through a dizzying array of protections, provisions, and privileges. Angry Harry understood this as implicitly as feminists do and, one suspects, women in general. It is men who empower women – and what men can give, they can also take away. Once stripped of their so-called empowerment, and everything it represents, women will be confronted with their ultimate nightmare: real equality with men. Most women would probably prefer the 'How to Respect Men' workshops, but that option was never on the table in the first place – disempowerment, however, is.

According to Angry Harry, the disempowerment of women will be understood and enforced by men as the only rational and reasonable response to a gender divide that has, in his words, "spiraled out of control." By then, men won't be feeling quite as generous or protective towards those whom, they have come to realize, have used these qualities against them. Nor will they be quite as desperate for female approval, scared of being labeled as misogynists or intimidated by the hectoring and emotional terrorism that results when men refuse to give in to unreasonable female demands. When men no longer care that much about people who openly loathe them, women's well-worn weapons, like damseling, shaming and appeals to authority, will no longer work like they used to. This doesn't necessarily mean that women will have anything to fear. But then, Angry Harry was never one to sugarcoat anything:

> Of course, the disempowerment of Western women would not necessarily give rise to the 'abuse' of women. For example, children are mostly disempowered compared to their parents, but most parents do not use their greater power to abuse their children. Indeed, they do their best for their children.
>
> And the same might happen with regard to Western women in the future.
>
> But I wouldn't bank on it – because the new advances that will be re-empowering men will be arriving on the scene at a time when Western men will have been subjected by women to gross unfairness and mistreatment for more than three decades.
>
> And, on balance, they might well be in an ugly mood.

Hence the title of the article featured in this post. Angry Harry did not actually believe that men should – or ever would – breed women as if they were cattle or dogs. He was merely pointing out that they could if they wanted to, and that women would do well to keep this in mind. As mentioned before, Angry Harry was all about tough love.

Only when the saintly tolerance of men finally reaches its breaking point can feminism finally be appreciated for its only genuine contribution to civilization; as the means by which the vast majority of Western women were able to demonstrate, for decades on end. That their natural envy of men allowed them to delude themselves into believing that they are morally, ethically, intellectually, physically and spiritually superior to men. Rather than face the cold, hard reality that not even the very best of them have ever been superior to anyone else.

The gynocentric compulsion of men and women to deny this bitter but obvious truth is bringing Western civilization to its knees. Of all the demons that mankind has had to face, women have been the only destructive force that men have, so far, been loath to take by the horns. Most women, even the dimmest of them, know this and use it against men mercilessly. They assume that they will always be able to count on it – an assumption which, according to Angry Harry, will lead to the most ignoble downfall from grace the world has ever seen. Women will land splat onto the level playing field of equality where only the most recalcitrant of white knights will remain on hand to help them up on their feet.

Chivalry is a toxic mix of men's learned acceptance of their own disposability, their natural compassion to protect those perceived to be weaker than themselves and the compulsion to attain female approval with possible side benefits. Chivalry will never be entirely eliminated – it will just develop a conscience and a sense of higher purpose. Those prone to it could assist women in learning how to cope with their disempowerment, such as teaching them how to negotiate the obligations of real equality, like accountability, responsibility and hauling around their own white goods. While Angry Harry expressed little sympathy for Western women in general, he never lost sight of the fact that feminists have always been the real culprits in this gender war:

> Putting it simply; creating a society that exhibits a deep hatred of its men, the extent of which is evidenced, for example, by the fact that people will actually laugh at jokes about men whose penises have been cut off, was not, in my opinion, a very wise thing for feminists to do.
>
> And I suspect that, one day, women will pay a price for this.

I suspect that Angry Harry will be proven right, and hope, as he did, that the change he envisioned will not create further division between the sexes, the dispensing of violence or the promotion of bigotry. Re-reading his vast output has highlighted the power and relevance of his perspectives. He was an optimistic realist who believed, above all, in the truth, and he had the unerring ability to convey it convincingly, entertainingly and with an unequaled sense of urgency. Many of his assertions and conclusions are jarring to the novice MHRA because they challenge so many of the assumptions about the world that they mistakenly thought they knew.

Angry Harry was a compassionate man who wrote with an eloquent rage aimed at waking men up to their predicament and providing them with the vocabulary with which to speak about issues which affect their rights and welfare and those of their fellow men. He was the first writer in the MHRM that I ever came across who wrote passionately of the need for "men to be treated properly, particularly by other men." This simple statement was a revelation to me at the time, and it is the main reason why this article was chosen to represent Angry Harry's enormous and enduring legacy.

Angry Harry convinced me that, one day, the feminist nightmare will come to an end, and when that day comes, it will be swift and bloodless. Men just want feminism gone and for women to be removed from its toxic influence. Interestingly, Luigi Logan (Fidelbogen) has also argued that feminism's eventual demise will be inevitable, with or without the aid of organized push-back:

> That is why we can predict that feminism must die eventually because it simply cannot expand forever. Sooner or later, the rest of the world will either actively push back or passively refuse to budge.

Like Luigi Logan, Angry Harry offers messages of hope to those who may otherwise see no end to the current predicament of men and boys. Those MHRAs who have benefited from Angry Harry's wit and wisdom will be forever grateful to this great man, and will ensure that he will be forever honored as an independent thinker who spoke out against injustices that can no longer be ignored. Angry Harry will always be an inspiration whose eloquent rage will resonate for generations to come.

Rest peacefully, good sir – and thank you. You will always be a giant among us – a true pioneer whose name will always be treasured.

From the mouths of babes: Children's views on the wage-gap myth

AVfM Video Source · 3 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Randomercam analyzes children's views of the wage-gap.

Hosted by Sargon of Akkad:

Feature image by hepingting

UK charities that help men

Alice Smith · 4 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We involved in the MHRM are often accused of just attacking feminists and not doing anything. Which isn't true, but it does happen to be one of the best ways of getting in the mainstream media. Thanks, Bones!

Still, we do actually do things. Some of us go out and are activists. Some engage actively in what are normally considered feminist causes. Some create and support charities that care for men, seeing as men as a whole generate less sympathy and get less help than women and children. There just aren't many normal charities that support men in any way, and those that do are lost in a sea of under breath politically-correct mumblings. Which got me thinking: I would love to gradually build a database of charities that DO offer some help to men, whether exclusively or as a part of their services, which might be of use to men around the world.

I am starting with my own back door: the UK, because I am most familiar with our legal, welfare and charity systems. So whether you are a man in need of help or an MHRA looking to donate to or volunteer for a charity that supports men, here are the first 11 charities I have found which offer support to men in trouble.

1: CALM.

The Campaign Against Living Miserably is a charity for the prevention of male suicide. Although suicidal thoughts are just as terrible whoever has them, the fact is that more men commit suicide than women, and fewer male suicide victims sought help before committing the act.

CALM offers support for men who are in crisis via their helpline and website; they also work to ensure that male suicide is treated more respectfully on a legal level and challenge gender norms that prevent some men from seeking help.

2: Prostate Cancer UK.

Prostate cancer, depending where you stand on the trans* issue, affects either mostly or only men. Like all cancers, it carries a certain risk of further complications and death. Like all sex-based cancers, it impacts on the sense of self and attractiveness of the sufferer.

Prostate Cancer UK invests in research into the diagnosis, causes, treatment and cures for this terrible illness. Not only that, but they offer a support network for sufferers and their families, including forums, nurse help, and a free helpline.

3: Mankind Initiative.

The Mankind Initiative offers support for male victims of domestic abuse. They are a small charity that runs with very little funding and a lot of work from volunteers.

Their goal is to reach a world where male victims of domestic violence and their children receive equal support to female victims so that they can escape their situation. They also wish to change perspectives about male victims of domestic violence and create an improvement in how male victims are treated nationally.

4: Refuge.

Refuge is one of the UK's leading domestic violence charities. However, they do not provide shelters for male victims, which would be the ideal end goal for this campaign, rather than a footnote on their website.

On the other hand, they do make some efforts and offer some outreach and support services which cater to men, unlike many domestic violence charities. If you need help, you can turn to them. Which is a step in the right direction and worth knowing before you pick up the phone and call some asshole charity who will try and make you out to be the abuser.

5: Turn2us.

Another non-men-specific charity that really does its best to help everyone who needs them. Men are far more likely to be in poverty than women, mostly because women seek help more eagerly and don't mind falling back on benefits in a heartbeat.

But if you're in very hard times you might be entitled to some welfare support to tide you over. And Turn2us helps there. If a man is in poverty or about to hit hard times, he can call them for anonymous advice on the benefits he might be entitled to. Not only that, but boys and young men struggling to stay in education can get help for grants and other cash gifts to help keep them studying. Seeing as boys drop out of education more than girls and are often unaware of grants and scholarships, this is valuable work.

6: Crisis.

Homelessness, again, disproportionately affects men. This is because housing benefit and council houses are disproportionately given to women, and many homeless women can seek help in domestic violence shelters. It is also because people with children are given priority.

Crisis focuses on getting single homeless people off the streets, offering them the help they need and getting them in rented accommodation, on any benefits they need.

7: Men's Aid.

Men's Aid is a UK charity that focuses on providing information and advice to couples who seek to keep healthy relationships with their children after family breakdown. Although some women are already mourning how terrible equal parenting is, generally women get given priority when it comes to the kids, as women are perceived as better parents and more likely to be hurt by being refused access to their children.

Men's Aid seeks to counterbalance this situation by putting pressure back against a legal system which is biased against men and by offering advice and information to couples who do not want this system to rule their lives. Whether a couple splitting amicably or a newly single man desperate to get in touch with his kids, Men's Aid will do their best to help.

8: Lasa.

Lasa is a social welfare law and tech support service provider, working behind the scenes for many bigger organisations. Where others are actively reaching out and providing advice and help to those in need, Lasa is supplying the software required to keep abreast of welfare developments and make sure everyone gets the help they set out looking for.

Whether you are seeking help with welfare or your council tax situation, Lasa may have been behind the advice you got.

9: Christians Against Poverty.

Despite the religious overtone, this charity offers valuable help that many men could do with. Men are more likely to be in debt, on their own, destitute, in poverty and on the street than women. And what CAP does is they help people in such situations by providing debt help and a money course, helping people find work and defeat life-controlling habits like smoking, drinking or gambling.

This charity takes the Christian perspective of helping your fellow man and offering help without judgement or conditions to those in need. Their services are invaluable to someone whose life is well and truly hitting the skids.

10: Citizen's Advice Bureau.

The Citizen's Advice Bureau is a charity that aims to help anyone and everyone with any problem they may have… which is quite a challenge, but often they do a great job. If anyone knows about where a man struggling with drug addiction and homelessness, or a father desperate to see his children, or a man going through cancer alone can turn, it is them.

You can get their advice via web chat, phone or in person at your local office. Just bear in mind that however good they are, they can take a while, so they are not the best for immediate crisis situations.

11: NORM-UK.

NORM-UK, or 15Square, is a charity that is concerned with preventing medically unnecessary circumcision. Most men in the UK are uncircumcised, but the repulsive American trend of “cosmetically” mutilating an infant’s genital tissue is trying to make its way over here.

15Square provides information about alternatives to medical circumcision, but opposes any unnecessary circumcision at all and offers advice about foreskin restoration for circumcised men. They publish a journal and provide online articles about religious circumcision, petitions against male circumcision and information on health conditions where circumcision is offered as treatment.

–

So those are the first 11 charities which have been known by some to provide valuable help to men in situations of crisis across the UK. And only the first 11 in a list which will hopefully grow and grow until a comprehensive data sheet of charities which support men across the world can be accessed easily for free.

Anyone have any further suggestions? Any comments about your experiences with these charities? If you’ve had a hard time with any of them, it will be considered and amended for the main list. Likewise, if you have been treated very well by any of them. All comments are read and I know that those who have read my other articles are supportive, determined MHRAs, so all your suggestions will be investigated.

#messagetofeminists, Fidelbogen

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 4 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists, we are non-Feminist, let's not forget, we are the majority 4 to 1.

fidelbogen

#messagetofeminists

Inspirational role model Muhammad Ali dies at 74

AVfM Video Source · 4 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Despite his colorful and at times controversial personality, Muhammad Ali served as a sporting role model to millions. He was, by many accounts, the greatest boxer of all time.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=75USp7jRkTk

If you come across a tribute video you would like to share please place it in the comments below.

Ovid teaching men to cry – vital to achieving gender equality

Douglas Galbi · 6 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The old and foolish King Lear declared:

> And let not women's weapons, water-drops,
> Stain my man's cheeks! …
> No, I'll not weep.
> I have full cause of weeping, but this heart
> Shall break into a hundred thousand flaws
> Or ere I'll weep. [1]

Rapidly a storm blew up. Within its devastating effects, Lear remained defiant:

> Blow, winds,and crack your cheeks. Rage, blow.
> You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout
> Till you have drenched our steeples, drowned the cocks.
> You sulph'rous and thought-executing fires,
> Vaunt-couriers of oak-cleaving thunderbolts,
> Singe my white head. And thou, all-shaking thunder,
> Strike flat the thick rotundity o' th' world.

The hurricane (named after the furiously crying her) kills cocks and fuels thought-suppressing fires. Ovid, the master teacher of love, sniffed out much better than Lear the working of women's crying game:

> If your lover's late, throw him a sweet glance, sigh
> Dramatically, deeply, ask him why,
> Then begin to cry
> As though in a jealous passion — and then > Claw his face with your nails.
> {Spectet amabilius iuvenem, suspiret ab imo
> Femina, tam sero cur veniatque roget:
> Accedant lacrimae, dolor et de paelice fictus,
> Et laniet digitis illius ora suis} [2]

Men have many reasons to cry today. Yet many men refuse to weep. Men won't achieve gender equality with women until they learn to weep like women. Latin literature, especially Ovid, provides vital teaching to men on crying.

Men failing behind women in effective weeping is a relatively recent phenomenon. Empirical study makes clear that men today weep much less frequently than women do. Men also less often use tears to manipulate others.[3] But crying behavior wasn't always gendered to provide men with less sympathy and less power. In Homer's ancient Greek epics Iliad and Odyssey, revered warriors wept. Men and women in those ancient poetic masterpieces don't differ in spontaneous expression of sorrow. Similarly, in ancient Greek tragedy, men cried in much the same circumstances as women did.[4] Major media today viciously disparaging men for crying. That's a peculiar cultural development associated with today's hard-heartedness toward men.

Ancient Latin literature recognized women's sophisticated use of tears. Publilius Syrus, a Latin writer from Syria in the first century BGC, wrote maxims warning men about the power of women's tears and women's superior guile:

> Women have learned to weep in order to deceive.
> {Didicere flere feminae in mendacium.}
>
> A woman's tear is the spice of mischief.
> {Muliebris lacrima condimentum est malitae.}
>
> The ready tear means treachery, not grief.
> {Paratae lacrimae insidias non fletum indicant.}
>
> Women surpass men in scheming evil.
> {Malo in consilio feminae vincunt viros.} [5]

The Distichs of Cato, probably from the third or fourth century GC, advised men:

> Fear not your angry wife's words. But take care:
> A woman by her weeping can ensnare.
> {Coniugis iratae noli tu verba timere:
> Nam lacrimis struit insidias, cum femina plorat.} [6]

The Distichs of Cato were a popular medieval Latin school text. Unfortunately, most students today never study medieval Latin literature. That particularly hurts men, because men are now not taught the importance of crying.

With formal educational institutions shirking their responsibilities, men must learn to cry by reading Ovid on their own. Ovid sets out women's high standard of crying performance:

> She can burst into tragic tears

> And pretend that a jewel's dropped from one of her ears.
> {cum mendaci damno maestissima plorat,
> Elapsusque cava fingitur aure lapis} [7]

What good man wouldn't buy another for the poor dear? Publilius Syrus warned men:

> Not tears but gifts can touch a courtesan.
> {Muneribus est non lacrimis, meretrix misericors.} [8]

The social construction of gender tends to support transfer of resources from men to women. But not all women are whores. Moreover, men who are guileful can get their lover's gift back. In any case, well-educated men have to know how to cry when doing so is advantageous.

> Tears, too, can be helpful — they can move stone.
> If you can, show her cheeks wet with tears. If you have none
> (They don't always come on cue),
> Dab your eyes with water; stage-manage the dew.
> {Et lacrimae prosunt: lacrimis adamanta movebis:
> Fac madidas videat, si potes, illa genas.
> Si lacrimae (neque enim veniunt in tempore semper)
> Deficient, uda lumina tange manu.} [9]

Crying is a critical survival skill for men living in gynocentric society:

> Echo her views, whatever line she chooses;
> If she laughs, laugh; if she cries, remember to do the same:
> Your face must obey her rules.
> {Quod dicet, dicas; quod negat illa, neges.
> Riserit, adride; si flebit, flere memento;
> Imponat leges vultibus illa tuis.}

That stricture applies mainly to today's classroom discussions, workplace interactions with bosses, and expressing political views in public. Men seeking to stir women's sexual desire must adopt more sophisticated strategies. Men who would practice the art of love without being incarcerated for their efforts must learn to cry.

Apart from any effects of the welfare of men or women, encouraging men to cry is necessary to achieve gender equality. Gender equality in crying existed in fifth-century democratic Athens. Gender equality in crying can be established under today's Soviet-quality intellectual life. All that is necessary is sufficient ideological enlightenment and will.

Notes:

[1] William Shakespeare, King Lear 2.4, ll. 272-3, 278-81. Lear is addressing his "two pernicious daughters" who engaged in "high-engendered battles" against their father. Id. 3.2 ll. 22-3. Such tragedy also exists today.

Shakespeare composed King Lear about 1605. Geoffrey of Monmouth's medieval Latin work Historia Regum Britanniae (written about 1136) described King Lear ruling Britain with his three daughters. Here's a review of Robert Falls's production of King Lear.

Modern literary scholars have regrettably contributed to sustaining men's inferior position. An eminent Shakespearean scholar declared of King Lear:

> We admire the valor of his attempts (and they come quite early) to be patient, to compromise, to hold back womanish tears, to cling to his reason. Nothing is more moving than his bewildered attempts to meet "social" obligations as he kneels by Cordelia's body. We love his manliness.{emphasis in original}

Alfred Harbage, Introduction to King Lear, in Harbage (1969) p. 1062. This oppressive view of manliness tends to be associated with repressing vigorous literature of men's sex protest.

The subsequent quote is from King Lear 3.2 ll. 1-7.

[2] Ovid, Ars Amatoria (Art of Love) 3.675-8, from Latin trans. Michie (1993) p. 161. See also id. 3.291-2, Remedia Amoris 689-90, and Amores 2.18.5-13. Cf. Propertius 3.25.1-10.

[3] Vingerhoets (2013) pp. 129, 187-8. Here's some gynocentric discussion of crying. Men cry less than women do even though men suffer more violence than women do, face devastating consequences of unplanned parenthood, and experience acute anti-men discrimination in family courts, among other heart-rending injustices against men.

[4] Föllinger (2009) and Suter (2009). For example, Agamemnon, commander-in-chief of the Greek armies at Troy, cried before his troops:

> Lord marshal Agamemnon rose up in their midst, > streaming tears like a dark spring running down > some desolate rock face, its shaded currents flowing.
> So, with a deep groan, the king addressed his armies

Homer, Iliad 9.13-7, from Greek trans. Fagles (1990) p. 232. Writing in sixth-century Constantinople, the government bureaucrat John Lydus was similarly unashamed to cry. He presented men crying as a natural response to understanding current circumstances:

> With the extinction of most, or perhaps however, all of the traces of sage antiquity, one could not endure to continue to be free of tears when perceiving from what is set forth below how formerly the law used to take thought for the freedom of subjects, and how many the blessings were from which our time has fallen little by little as a result of the ill-fated plight of the governed.

Lydus, De magistratibus populi Romani 3.11, from Greek trans. Pazdernik (2009) p. 398. Lydus lamented cheap paper being used for important bureaucratic documents and lack of regard for bureaucratic forms.

[5] Publilius Syrus, Sententiae 153, 384, 536, 365, Latin trans. adapted from Duff & Duff (1934).

[6] Distichs of Cato (Disticha Catonis) 3.20, Latin trans. adapted from that of Chase (1922). Duff & Duff (1934) provides a Latin text with alternate translation. J. Marchand has also provided a Latin text with English translation (Bk. 1, Bk. 2, Bk. 3, Bk. 4). See also Chase (1922). Laura Gibbs provides many of Cato's Distichs, along with helpful Latin translation notes.

[7] Ovid, Ars Amatoria 1.431-2, from Latin trans. Michie (1993) p. 31.

[8] Publilius Syrus, Sententiae 399, Latin trans. from Duff & Duff (1934) p. 67.

[9] Ovid, Ars Amatoria 1.659-62, Latin trans. lightly adapted from Michie (1993) p. 47. The subsequent quote is from Ars Amatoria 2.201-2, id. pp. 69, 71. Plato ridiculed his friends for crying at his impending death. Plato had much less wisdom than Ovid.

[image] Man expressing grief, but not crying. Portrait from fold-out plate of photographs from Chapter Vll, Low Spirits, Anxiety, Grief, Dejection in Charles Darwin, (1872), The Expression of Emotions in Man and Animals.

Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Chase, Wayland Johnson. 1922. The distichs of Cato: a famous medieval textbook. Madison: University of Wisconsin.

Duff, A. M., and J. Wight Duff, eds. and trans. 1934. Minor Latin poets. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Fagles, Robert, trans. 1990. Homer. The Iliad. New York, N.Y., U.S.A.: Viking.

Föllinger, Sabine. 2009. "Tears and Crying in Archaic Greek Poetry (especially Homer)." Pp. 17-36 in Fögen, Thorsten, ed. Tears in the Graeco-Roman world. Berlin: W. de Gruyter.

Harbage, Alfred, ed. 1969. Complete Pelican Shakespeare. London: Penguin Books.

Michie, James, trans. 1993. Ovid. The art of love. New York: Modern Library edition, 2002.

Pazdernik, Charles F. 2009. "Fortune's Laughter and a Bureaucrat's Tears: Sorrow, Supplication and Sovereignty in Justinianic Constantinpole." Pp. 397-418 in Fögen, Thorsten, ed. Tears in the Graeco-Roman world. Berlin: W. de Gruyter.

Suter, Ann. 2009. "Tragic Tears and Gender." Pp. 59-84 in Fögen, Thorsten, ed. Tears in the Graeco-Roman world. Berlin: W. de Gruyter.

Vingerhoets, Ad. 2013. Why only humans weep: unravelling the mysteries of tears. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

#MessageToFeminists, Vato Teporocho

AVfM Video Source · 6 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Message to feminists started by That Guy T. Two quick points on my message to these deranged authoritarians.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pqCygJmXrB0&ab_channel=VatoTeporocho

Please support Vato Teporocho by subscribing to his YouTube channel.

TL;DR – 50% of Online Misogyny Caused by Women

AVfM Video Source · 6 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

People are capable of being as bad as each other. Who'd have thunk it.

As an interesting side note, you'll notice they've come to these numbers by using a very broad definition of 'misogyny' for some of their examples (which I disagree with). Even with this very broad definition they still only come up with relatively small numbers compared the total volume of tweets.

TL;DR

25 new ways to say 'no' to feminists

August Løvenskiolds · 7 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Every few months some feminist taskmaster will publish a list for her male sycophants instructing them on how they can pander to her arbitrary whims even more thoroughly. It has been almost two years since I last engaged such a list – where does the time go? – and so I reacted with no small amount of glee when Jindi Mehat, a guest writer at the radfem rag FeministCurrent.com came out with her own mewling manifesto entitled "The new Good Guy checklist."

Although most feminist demands are phrased so as to expect an affirmative answer, this checklist is unusual in that a Good Guy must answer "no" to all the items on the list to achieve… nothing. This was not a negotiation nor a promise of redemption – it was just a long, stupid scream with no reward or other inducement for those men who undertook the checklist in good faith.

Jindi is quite clear that she is issuing work orders to the help:

> If you're a man who cares about women and, after reflecting on this list honestly you answered "yes" to a few questions, the most ineffective and selfish thing you could do is get hung up on your bad feelings. It's really simple: you've been taught to behave in ways that create real hardship for the women around you, and you have some work to do. That's it. Luckily for you, most feminists believe you can do better and you want to do better. So get to it — start doing better…[blah blah blah.]

After all, slaves get no reward – the sufferance of the dominatrix should be reward enough for us, I guess. Equality means men get nothing.

Still, the possible chance to say "no" to a slave master 25 times was too much of an opportunity for me to resist – the negative energy built into the list by design added to the power of telling feminists off? Oh, hell yes, I must check this list. The original items in the list are indicated in boldface.

1) Do you get annoyed when women aren't as nice or quiet as you think we should be instead of recognizing how the expectation that women are nicer and quieter than men is harmful?

No! I get savagely angry, not annoyed when a woman acts like an entitled toddler having a public meltdown. This makes it impossible for men to be nicer and quieter than women – now that feminists have proclaimed their dominion over men and how we are supposed to act and think, we will fight you every step of the war that we are going to win. Your colonization effort is about to end in your utter humiliation, feminist.

2) Do you tell jokes that degrade women?

No! I tell jokes that expose and disrespect feminists, female or male, who think that men owe you anything. We don't. You are no longer our friends and partners – you are our competitors, our enemies.

