3) Do you stand by quietly while men around you say or do sexist things, instead of challenging them — even when women aren't around?

No! I challenge them by saying the even more outlandish things that they have thought about feminists all along but have been too reluctant to say. I do this especially when feminists are within earshot. We do not fear your reprisals anymore.

4) Do you interrupt women when…

No! Shut the fuck up.

Actually, when a woman is making a fool of herself and looks with a plea in her eyes for me to come to her rescue in some social situation, I let her continue to flail about like a fish without a bicycle. My interrupting her to save her from further embarrassment would be wrong.

5) Do you offer women advice without being asked for it?

No! The spinach on her teeth, the preying mantis crawling on her shoulder pads, the toilet paper stuck to the ultra heel of her thousand-dollar Saint Laurants, and the bus about to run her down are none of my business – besides, she is a competitor now. Let her suffer the fruit of her ignorance.

6) If you think a woman needs help, do you assume you know what's best for her instead of asking what kind of support she might find useful?

No! No matter how stupid she appears, as a slave, I have no business speaking to her at all – that would be catcalling, and feminists hate that.

7) Do you think rules that apply to other people don't apply to you because you're special?

No! I think that you are projecting your own attitude.

8) Do you take up as much space as you want in public, without thinking about the impact on those around you?

No! When I manspread I am well aware that women around me find manspreading men more attractive.

9) Do you think women who don't put effort into their appearance are unattractive?

No! Because I am a tender, empathic soul, I think they are depressed, lazy man-haters with drug and borderline personality disorders. Such women are very attractive to men who hate themselves.

10) Do you think women who put too much effort into their appearance are shallow or superficial?

No! I am far too mentally engaged with sexual thoughts to care about their depth of comprehension or spiritual attainment.

11) Do you stare at women you find attractive, instead of considering how threatening this feels to most women?

No! I stare at attractive women in addition to noting how terrified other women are of them.

12) Do you offer women your opinion about our appearances without being asked, instead of realizing that we aren't contestants in a beauty pageant you've been asked to judge?

No! I assume that all women know they are being judged on their looks all the time by both women and men. There is no reason for me to acknowledge this, or women, at all. As a slave, this is not my purview.

13) If you share a household with a woman, do you expect her to handle most of the domestic responsibilities or to make sure you're pulling your weight, instead of actively looking for ways to do your fair share?

No! I always do 100% of the housework to humiliate her with her knowledge of her own uselessness – this keeps her thinking she is in charge when in reality it keeps her soft and me getting stronger.

14) Do you think there are circumstances in which a woman is responsible for being sexually assaulted or beaten by a man?

No! Women are too weak and too useless to be held responsible for anything. They are a lot like toddlers their entire lives. I recognize that there are "50 Shades of Grey" chicks who foolishly think that women can be responsible adults and make rough sexual choices. I find them adorable and give them lollies.

15) Do you think sexual assault is something women can avoid by changing our behaviour or clothing?

No! The best way for a woman to avoid sexual assault is to get married if she can find a man she can bamboozle into it. This will be hard since men are learning that they gain nothing by marrying women.

16) Do you watch pornography or go to strip clubs or burlesque shows even though they objectify women and contribute to the male sexual entitlement that fuels sexual assault?

No! I watch porn and go to gentlemen's clubs because there is a strong correlation between the spread of porn and the decline of sexual assault.

> Despite the widespread and increasing availability of sexually explicit materials, according to national FBI Department of Justice statistics, the incidence of rape declined markedly from 1975 to 1995. This was particularly seen in the age categories 20–24 and 25–34, the people most likely to use the Internet. The best known of these national studies are those of Berl Kutchinsky, who studied Denmark, Sweden, West Germany, and the United States in the 1970s and 1980s. He showed that for the years from approximately 1964 to 1984, as the amount of pornography increasingly became available, the rate of rapes in these countries either decreased or remained relatively level. Later research has shown parallel findings in every other country examined, including Japan, Croatia, China, Poland, Finland, and the Czech Republic.

17) Do you buy sex or believe men are entitled to buy sex?

No! As a MGTOW I avoid relationships with women. I think that men are required to pay for the company of women one way or another, just as slaves are required to labor without recompense. Slaves are not entitled.

18) Do you think a woman you're in a sexual relationship with should have sex with you even if she doesn't want to?

No! If a woman wants to show her worth to her man and "take one for the team" then one cannot truthfully claim that she didn't want to on some level.

19) Do you pout or try to convince her if she doesn't?

No! I pout if she relents and agrees! I wasn't really in the mood either – I was just trying to make her feel wanted and attractive. Jeez.

20) Have you ever said "not all men" in a discussion about sexism?

No! I prefer to say "no men" to emphasize the point that all supposed "sexism" is a fantastical socially constructed boogeyman by feminists to manipulate men in coercive, non-consensual ways.

21) If a woman points out that you did or said something sexist, do you deny it and defend yourself instead of setting aside your ego and listening?

No! I am more than happy to acknowledge that I am impervious to her whining and then pick it apart once she finally runs out of steam.

22) Do you try to speak to women as an authority on women's issues?

No! There is no "try" – I know more about both men's and women's issues than feminists will ever grasp.

23) Do you continue to associate with men who behave in misogynistic ways?

No! There are no misogynistic men in my life, only men that feminists try to shame with spurious claims of misogyny.

24) Do you think it's women's responsibility to make sure you understand sexism?

No! Women are far too irresponsible to be trusted with such important work.

25) Do you expect to be rewarded or praised for not being sexist?

No! First, women have nothing to offer me that I would see as a reward. Second, praise from women is the master teasing the slave. Third, since feminists think everything is sexist, I think they will never stop using bogus charges of sexism as a tool of emotional abuse against men.

Oh, dear God, that was great! Let's do it again soon, feminists, while you still can.

Please send Studio Brulé to London!

AVFM · 8 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

You can donate to the effort to bring Steve to London here.

https://fundanything.com/en/campaigns/icmi-2016-london

Steve is one of the greatest assets we have as a documentarian. I hope that MHRAs will help support his wish to document events around the conference. PE

Circumcision or Freedom – You Can’t Have Both!

Gary Costanza · 8 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Human rights activist Brother K (The Bloodstained Men & Their Friends) describes events at the protest of the 2015 American Academy of Pediatrics Conference in Washington DC, and states, “You can choose circumcision or you can choose freedom, but you can’t have both.”

Joy of masculinity

J T · 9 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Sometime, about thirty years ago, the media portrayed college guys like us as drug- and sex-obsessed frat boys in some animal house; and people believed it. That movie made guys lose their way just when college access was expanding beyond the grasp of the rich. During the college expansion years, we created women's centers to help the female students, but no men's centers to help the first generation guy.

You know how we had the GI Bill? That was established to help the men from World War II acclimate to peace. We should have recognized the need for something like that on a systemic level for men as we transitioned to a world of equality. Money was spent to help women transition to equality, but nothing for men; and masculinity was hung out to dry and straight and gay men lost a common community.

Today, the only men's centers we have are run by women's centers geared, not at teaching about the goodness of men or helping our sons, but at defining masculinity for feminists, by feminists—deconstructing it. I don't want to hear what it means to be a man, from a woman—that would be 'splaining and women don't like that when it's done to them. I want to see what it means to be a man, from men and the history of our accomplishments.

Masculinity flows in time—gay, straight, gentle, strong, aggressive, artistic, or ascetic. It is the flow from its vigor to its loss of energy—that as the power of the erection wanes, a man must accept the loss of virility while still being a man (and try not to sit on his balls).

I love doing what men do; like being able to write my name in the snow with yellow ink. I can pee in a Coke bottle, and I get to stand without taking my pants off, in those blue portable urinals at public festivals. I can masturbate to orgasm in ninety seconds, wait ten minutes and do it again and again and again and again. I carry two testosterone engines with me in a sack I hold closely. My gender is external to my body: it is an object, and I like objectifying—objectifying is a normal thing for guys and there is nothing evil in it, except as thinking makes it so.

And I can do it again.

I can grow a beard and shave. When I'm older, I may have a bald head, and that's cool. I love working out and flexing my biceps until they burn, and unrolling my arm and fingers to stroke a flower's petal or a paintbrush or orchestral baton or a pen to write poetry. I like getting lost and finding my own way home. I don't cry I public—I leave that to a private room I share with my partner. I play in the mud. I focus on math. I love my cock; only my gay brothers love cocks more—and that's cool. My phallus is the axis on which the earth rotates. I ejaculate like a volcano. I am a tree, a mountain, and the sky; my sperm is as white as a nova's light and is the color of the Milky Way when I spray.

I can enter another body—female or male—with my body and leave my energy there, as only a man can do.

And do it again.

Men civilized the world. The history of masculinity is the history of painting, music, sculpture, literature, poetry, math, philosophy, physics, computers, astronomy, biology, medicine, chemistry, architecture and engineering.

Masculinity can slice a diamond with logic and anneal steel with compassion; it manifests the focus and the empathy. Men constructed cities and leveled them in anger. We built bridges to span the great rivers and then blew them up. We built ships, sailed them over the seas, and sank them from pirate ships. We built the towers that scraped the sky and tore them down in boredom. We built the museums and the whorehouses. We plowed the fields, dug for gold, mined for coal and drilled for oil. We engineered the automobiles and smashed them in a drunken rage. We launched airplanes and shot them down. We created penicillin to cure us and alcohol to sicken us. We spied on enemies and created astronomy. We tried to better ourselves and created alchemy and then chemistry after that. We wrote sonnets in our love; and murdered in rage. We wrote almost all the novels, the plays and the poems, the symphonies, and the operas. We started the wars and wrote the peace treaties. We wrote the constitutions and defended them in our aspiration for a better life.

Men did the good and the bad—the bad is the down stroke of the engine's piston; the good, the upstroke; together, the past's machine. Today we need a new machine with just the upstroke, but it's hard to build it because of how the media depicts our fathers and damages our sons. Credit for the good is diluted and deconstructed, and masculinity is termed toxic. The only reason men did all the good, they say, was that sexism denied women. Then men are assigned exclusive "credit" for the bad—which are shards of the toxic masculinity they created when they deconstructed it in jealousy, and the consequence is that our boys have lost the model of the good.

I will have none of it. Testosterone put a man on the moon and brought him safely home; testosterone fuels the engine that drives our civilization. And that machine had two pistons—the good and the bad—and we can only move beyond good and evil—set aside the bad—when we accept they are facets of one.

Not all men will rise to reveal the light of Einstein, the passion of Mozart, or the murderous rage of Dostoevsky. But we should teach our sons to aspire to be like those first creators, and we should remind our sons that those creators were almost all men. We must teach our sons that brotherhood tames the bad and builds the new machine—the drive chain of masculinity; the engine of civilization is male.

I get what they say about women's oppression, and I will ensure my children know what women have done and what happened in the past. I respect their desire to hear her story, but that is another story which does not alter this story, and these facts shine like a sun—men should never be ashamed of his story, and we should shout it loudly.

After years of deconstructing, reconstructing and maligning masculinity as toxic, we need to tell our sons that they can now lay down the sword and shield. You did good, soldier, you built these cities so Confucius, Aristotle, and Kant could think as they did. You, the average guy, gave birth to creativity—and it was masculine; say it loudly, say it proudly. The force of your muscle, your courage, your sweat tamed the world and enabled Newton to invent the calculus, Beethoven to write the ninth and da Vinci to paint the Mona Lisa. Now come off the battlefield, soldier. Come back to land from your river journeys, sailor. Anchor your sailing ship, your canoe, your Mississippi raft. Come down from the mountain. Emerge from the forests and deserts. Lay down the sword and shield. Come home, and pick up the pen, the baton, the keyboard, the trumpet once again and focus with a strength that is masculine.

This is the history of masculinity and its astounding achievements that changed the world—two storms: two bodies and two stories.

How to train a woman like a dog

AVfM Video Source · 9 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

You can (and should) sub to An Ear for Men Youtube here.

@RS Benedict of LGBT publication @unicornbooty caught lying

AVfM Video Source · 9 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

SPLC Hate Watch has picked up an article from Unicorn Booty proclaiming "men's rights activists (MRAs) seek an alliance with the white supremacist movement," and using it to justify attacking MRAs. The author picks something from Davis Aurini and uses it to attack the entirety of the manosphere:

> Disclaimer: I will not distinguish between the different flavors of men's rights activist (MRA): pick-up artists (PUAs), Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs), Red Pillers, etc. Saying, "That guy's not an MRA! He's a PUA!" is the same as saying, "My shirt's not pink! It's salmon!" I don't care which subspecies of douche each individual calls himself. Here is how I'm defining MRA: a terrible goober who claims that men are oppressed because women can choose their sexual partners. Just be grateful I didn't use Marc Maron's term: "unfuckable hate nerds".

The even go so far as to Cherry Pick Jack Barns as defending the KKK. Here is a response video by Jack taking out the garbage.

Jack Barnes MRA
Jack Barns article on Matt Forney http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/ladie…

A scrape on campus: holes in the Stanford rape conviction

August Løvenskiolds · 11 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

After years of faking campus rape cases (Columbia University, University of Virginia, Ohio University, Duke University, Occidental University, and so on) feminists finally found a supposedly legitimate case of campus rape and pushed it to a conviction in the Stanford rape trial of jejune Freshman Brock Turner. The judge sentenced Brock to a scanty six-month term of imprisonment, which has angered people across the political spectrum and calls and petitions are demanding the judge's removal.

What could have motivated an otherwise law-and-order judge to issue such a light sentence, when he could have sent the first-time offender away for up to 14 years? I believe that a close reading of the victim's own impact statement, delivered by her aloud in court after the guilty verdict, offers clues that tend to undermine the prosecution's case and support Brock's claims that "Updie" had consented to their ill-fated sexual encounter as a part of a scam to further push both her own enrichment and the feminist agenda.

You can read Updie's statement here. It is long and harrowing so you may have to read it twice to see how badly she screwed up her case. Unfortunately, because of rape shield laws, the information she revealed was not used at trial – victim impact statements are not probative in trials because they are only given at sentencing and normally they only cover the aftermath of a crime. Updie, however, led the court through the entire evening of the alleged rape and in doing so wound up saying way too much.

The judge, who would have been keenly attuned to the many subtle admissions Updie let slip out, had to feel a growing horror as he realized his court had been subverted from a place of legal justice to a tool of the Social Justice vengeance against men. Updie is lucky that Brock got any more jail time at all – the judge could have let him off with time served.

Here are some of the howlers Updie revealed in her statement. Updie's words are indicated with italics. My analysis follows each section.

Your Honor, if it is all right, for the majority of this statement I would like to address the defendant directly.*

Slighting the judge to lambaste the accused directly was not a wise start. The judge wanted to hear items related to sentencing, not her vengeful verbal assault on the scared boy sitting at the defendant's table. The judge's ears had to be burning – what details and slip-ups was she going to give to self-sabotage her own case?

On January 17th, 2015, it was a quiet Saturday night at home. My dad made some dinner and I sat at the table with my younger sister who was visiting for the weekend. I was working full time and it was approaching my bed time. I planned to stay at home by myself, watch some TV and read, while she went to a party with her friends. Then, I decided it was my only night with her, I had nothing better to do, so why not, there's a dumb party ten minutes from my house, I would go, dance like a fool, and embarrass my younger sister.

The virtue-signalling in her introduction is not only annoying, it hints at a guilty mind already spinning a fantastical account of an innocent encounter. Then, out of the blue, we get the first damning admission:

On the way there, I joked that undergrad guys would have braces. My sister teased me for wearing a beige cardigan to a frat party like a librarian. I called myself "big mama", because I knew I'd be the oldest one there.

A man who fantasized about "big papa" partying with little girls in braces would be dealt with harshly. I see no reason to go easy on a female pedophile, either. The judge had to be paying full attention now. In fact, Updie was 22 and a college graduate at the time of the party. Brock was a freshman.

I made silly faces, let my guard down, and drank liquor too fast not factoring in that my tolerance had significantly lowered since college. The next thing I remember I was on a gurney in a hallway.

Updie admits she is an experienced hard-partier – she surely knew what the implications of over-drinking at a hookup frat party were. Notice also that her memory of the party and its aftermath was supposedly nil so that any other detail she gives about the experience is either concocted, or in direct contradiction to her own statement, or perhaps both.

I knew no one at this party.

Um, her sister was there, and Updie admitted to speaking to her sister earlier that same evening.

My boyfriend did not know what happened, but called that day and said, "I was really worried about you last night, you scared me, did you make it home okay?" I was horrified. That's when I learned I had called him that night in my blackout, left an incomprehensible voicemail, that we had also spoken on the phone, but I was slurring so heavily he was scared for me, that he repeatedly told me to go find [my sister]. Again, he asked me, "What happened last night? Did you make it home okay?" I said yes, and hung up to cry.

Updie lies to her boyfriend about being okay at the party. One motivation for a woman faking a rape is to cover up infidelity in an established relationship. Updie had been caught by her boyfriend partying with a bunch of younger men. Suddenly the defense would've had a new avenue to explore – was the rape claim a ruse to get Updie off the hook for straying? – but this revelation came too late to be used at trial. The judge had to be cringing inside at this.

One day, I was at work, scrolling through the news on my phone, and came across an article. In it, I read and learned for the first time about how I was found unconscious, with my hair disheveled, long necklace wrapped around my neck, bra pulled out of my dress, dress pulled off over my shoulders and pulled up above my waist, that I was butt naked all the way down to my boots, legs spread apart, and had been penetrated by a foreign object by someone I did not recognize. This was how I learned what happened to me, sitting at my desk reading the news at work. I learned what happened to me the same time everyone else in the world learned what happened to me.

Up until this point Updie had no clue about what had happened to her, nor who had done it. The idea that she just stumbled onto her own anonymous case and recognized it as her own strains credulity. Her name has never been revealed, as far as I can tell. She had no memory of what happened – supposedly – yet now she just magically happened to remember that this was her? Oops. Even Updie admits this is miraculous:

When I read about me like this, I said, this can't be me, this can't be me. I could not digest or accept any of this information.

Perhaps that is because it is all confabulation? I have searched for the article she described without success.

The night after it happened, he said he didn't know my name, said he wouldn't be able to identify my face in a lineup, didn't mention any dialogue between us, no words, only dancing and kissing…When the detective asked how we ended up behind the dumpster, he said he didn't know. He admitted to kissing other girls at that party, one of whom was my own sister who pushed him away.

How does Updie know that Brock kissed Updie's sister? Updie had claimed she didn't remember anything and Brock had no way of guessing sororal relationships in a dark, drunken frat house. Perhaps in her haste to demonize Brock for hitting on her sister, Updie has accidentally shown that she was more functional than her other statements allow for.

He admitted to wanting to hook up with someone. I was the wounded antelope of the herd, completely alone and vulnerable, physically unable to fend for myself, and he chose me.

Updie was not alone, her sister was right there, making kissy-face with Brock. Jealousy is another reason women fake rape claims.

Sometimes I think, if I hadn't gone, then this never would've happened. But then I realized, it would have happened, just to somebody else.

This is standard feminist boilerplate to excuse their own risky behaviors by claiming they were saving some other girl – another girl who might have been happy to hook up with a noted athlete. This is the third reason women fake rape claims – to further the feminist agenda that all men are bad. A judge hearing this might well realize that Brock was being used as a pawn in a feminist game.

The night after it happened, he said he thought I liked it because I rubbed his back. A back rub. Never mentioned me voicing consent, never mentioned us even speaking, a back rub.

More of the feminist agenda – although nonverbal clues are 80% or more of communication, feminists know they can artificially inflate rape rates by insisting on a verbal consent standard that no one actually uses during sex because there are better things do to with one's mouth.

One more time, in public news, I learned that my ass and vagina were completely exposed outside, my breasts had been groped, fingers had been jabbed inside me along with pine needles and debris, my bare skin and head had been rubbing against the ground behind a dumpster, while an erect freshman was humping my half naked, unconscious body. But I don't remember, so how do I prove I didn't like it.

Do they really put details like that into public news about rape cases without contacting the victim? Again, credulity is strained.

I thought there's no way this is going to trial; there were witnesses, there was dirt in my body, he ran but was caught. He's going to settle, formally apologize, and we will both move on.

Settle? While one might well settle a civil case, "settling" a criminal case doesn't really work in this context. Updie seems to be talking about some sort of civil case with monetary damages instead of a criminal trial. This is the fourth reason women fake rape claims: money. But, surprising Updie, Brock decides to fight the charges.

It is the saddest type of confusion to be told I was assaulted and nearly raped, blatantly out in the open, but we don't know if it counts as assault yet.

Nearly raped? Doesn't "nearly raped mean "not raped"?

When I was told to be prepared in case we didn't win, I said, I can't prepare for that. He was guilty the minute I woke up. No one can talk me out of the hurt he caused me.

More feminist agenda: get rid of due process of law, he is automatically guilty, and no counter-evidence could ever matter even if it proved him innocent. You, dear reader, can imagine why a fair-minded judge might rankle at this.

Was your phone on silent when your sister called? Do you remember silencing it? Really because on page 53 I'd like to point out that you said it was set to ring.

Rather helpfully, Updie reads one of her own contradictions into the victim impact statement, in essence reminding the judge that she had lied to them all, and yet they had convicted Brock despite her lies.

I was pummeled with narrowed, pointed questions that dissected my personal life, love life, past life, family life, inane questions, accumulating trivial details to try and find an excuse for this guy who had me half naked before even bothering to ask for my name.

She remembers being asked for her name after her clothing was removed, contradicting her claims about not remembering anything.

Then he asked if he could finger me and I said yes. Most guys don't ask, can I finger you? Usually there's a natural progression of things, unfolding consensually, not a Q and A. But apparently I granted full permission.

Even Updie thinks the feminist consent standard is ludicrous, and she blames Brock for following it!

Your attorney has repeatedly pointed out, well we don't know exactly when she became unconscious. And you're right, maybe I was still fluttering my eyes and wasn't completely limp yet. That was never the point. I was too drunk to speak English, too drunk to consent way before I was on the ground. I should have never been touched in the first place.

Oops, now Updie is back to plugging the feminist verbal consent standard again. Could you please pick a standard and stick with it, maybe? Because your nonverbal YES is sounding more and more like a calculated feminist trap.

To sit under oath and inform all of us, that yes I wanted it, yes I permitted it, and that you are the true victim attacked by Swedes for reasons unknown to you is appalling, is demented, is selfish, is damaging. It is enough to be suffering. It is another thing to have someone ruthlessly working to diminish the gravity of validity of this suffering.

Yes, under feminism, men are not allowed to defend themselves. Dump due process of law.

The victim statement went on and on like this, full of unlikely details, political posturing and imagined suffering at something the supposed victim cannot remember. Explaining why the judge gave such a modest sentence should be clearer now – Updie should be glad she wasn't laughed out of court.

For young men, the message should be clear – do not date or hook up with women on campus. Brock's life is ruined: no college degree. No Olympic games. A lifetime as a registered sex offender.

Perhaps other young men can learn from his example.

Editor's note: Scrape, Noun, informal. An embarrassing or difficult predicament caused by one's own unwise behavior.

Here comes Mykeru

AVfM Video Source · 11 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The gender of domestic violence

AVfM Video Source · 11 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

> This is an excerpt from the TVNZ series “why am i” from 23-05-16
>
> It is of concern that many women think it’s OK for them to be violent, but IMO the most concerning aspect is that the results of such a comprehensive study have been disregarded and kept from the public.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HfMvI_kSMpA&ab_channel=AngelicaPerduta

In the Dunedin study (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dunedin…), both men and women were shown to perpetrate domestic violence equally.

This is fair use of a small fragment of the production for the purpose of critique and discussion.

Angelica Perduta

The future battle on campus: Men vs. Males

Tim Patten · 12 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Education bewilderment begins in preschool, where boys are systematically devalued by institutionalized gender inequality. The gender bias against males continues through colleges where young men will be faced with two similarly named programs, young adults entering college can easily become confused. College level program choices might seem merely a matter of semantics; there is a distinct difference between men's and a newly evolving male studies. The former curriculum is framed by feminist theory and serves to advance conflict between the sexes. In contrast, the latter has been formulated by humanists, scientists, and doctors, and is premised on empirical science and genuine masculinity.

In theory, these programs are aimed at addressing needs that have often been ignored, but the feminist-inspired men's studies programs are having an unintended and harmful effect. One result is that colleges that have favored women's or feminist studies programs have seen the numbers of male attendees, already in the minority at around 40% nationwide, continue to fall as they transfer elsewhere or give up on attending altogether.

The same is not true at colleges that are expected to adopt the emergent male studies approach, or at the least, which offer students a choice between the two. These institutions will be helping to reverse a biased mindset and radical feminist-defined framework that has been heavily stacked against masculine ideals. Thankfully, by advocating for male studies we all contribute to propelling the culture of boys and men forward, like a pendulum that reverses course after a long swing backward.

The Warring Organizations

To better understand the differences between men's and the evolving male studies programs, it helps to know who the key proponents are. In the case of the former, it has been the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA), founded by gender studies professors and defined by the catchphrase "advancing the critical study of men and masculinity." Overseen by President Ms. Daphne C. Watkins, Ph.D., AMSA's curriculum is an outgrowth of feminist and women's studies on men and masculinity; it is also intended as additional coursework for gender studies teachers seeking to broaden their purview. Broadly speaking, the focus is on how dominant social structures intersect with the oppressed classes, including women; people of color; and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual and queer (LGBTQ) individuals.

The primary force behind the latter initiatives has been the Foundation for Male Studies (FMS), founded by Edward M. Stephens, MD. The FMS curriculum explores the struggles and triumphs of men, though without contextualizing those ideas as one-half of the male-female binary. In other words, it is not an offshoot of feminist theory. The FMS efforts focus on the biological, scientific and behavioral differences between men and women that are not being addressed, as detailed in an article at Inside Higher Ed, and the New York Times article The Study of Man (or Males).

Dueling Curriculum Outline

Beyond those broader missions, a more granular assessment reveals distinct differences between the two camps, regarding approaches, perspectives and the intellectual and organizational leadership engaging in research and setting the agenda. As illustrated in the table below, they have little in common despite the fact that both are supposed to be addressing the same issue:

Dueling Curriculum Outline

AMSA American Men's Studies Association	FMS Foundation for Male Studies
Intended for Students: All culture's, gender identities and orientations	Intended for Students: All culture's, gender identities and orientations

AMSA Board's Academic Background: Humanities, Feminism, Women's and Gender Studies, Sociology, Psychology	FMS Board's Academic Background: Psychology, Philosophy, Sociology, Biomedical, Child Development
Board's Geographic Latitude: America, Latin America, Canada	Board's Geographic Latitude: America, United Kingdom, New Zealand, Italy, Canada, Australia, Sweden, South Africa
Professors: Most are professors with doctorates in women's and gender studies	Professors: Most are professors with doctorates in biology, science and psychology
Foundation of Theory: Feminism and Women's and Social Studies	Foundation of Theory: Biology, Psychology, Sociology, and Philosophy
Worldview: Patriarchal, oppressive males dominate groups deemed as second- and third-class	Worldview: Individuals are responsible for themselves and society
Philosophy: Breakdown the societal and institutional sexism and racism	Philosophy: Improve society for all through respectable practices
Approach to violence: Tear down the patriarchy and teach men a lesson	Approach to violence: Prefer personal transformation and accountability
Educational Approach: Men Intersect with Society and Gender	Education Approach: Science, Social, and Phycology of Men
Gender Approach: Gender is a Social Construct	Gender Approach: Gender is biologically-based, with social influences
Advocacy: Equality and justice for women, people of color and LGBTQ individuals	Advocacy: Authenticity, integrity, equality and justice for all
Political leaning: Left	Political Leaning: None
Social Critical Lens: Women and LGBTQ individuals face oppression from heterosexual men	Social Critical Lens: Everyone faces oppression and obstacles from society and individuals
Masculinity Ideology: 1. A social construct 2. Must comply with what women want from men 3. Must be oriented toward supporting equality 4. Heterosexual men are a dominant and unstable category of humans	Masculinity Ideology: 1. Biological framework burdened by societal, social and family expectations 2. Must comply with what men request of themselves 3. Males of all orientations are resourceful and capable of contributing to society
Publications of Note: Purchase at Amazon (Click Here). Mairtin Mac an Ghaill, Chris Haywood	Publications of Note: Free online at (Click Here). Dr. Miles Groth, Ph.D., Professor of Psychology
Students are empowered to become: • A Students become social justice warriors, advocating equality • Students become social workers, educator, therapists, and more	Students are empowered to become: • Students become balanced soldiers, advocating justice • Students seek careers in science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM), law and justice, and more
Musical Theme: Beyoncés: Girls Run The World	Musical Theme: Survivor's: Eye of the Tiger
WEBSITE: (AMSA's Web Site Click Here) Donations Welcome	WEBSITE: (FMS Web Site Click Here) Donations Welcome

Conclusion

About five million college graduates will set out on their career journeys this year, hopefully living the sort of life that they truly desire. In some cases, they will find their way into research efforts and industries that are working to pull humanity back from the brink of looming social, climate, and natural resource disasters. Our survival demands that each of us is able to unleash our unique capabilities and make whatever contribution we can to sustain our civilization.

Because of this, our society hungers for males with clear minds and hearts. While men must be aware of the fear and inherent vulnerabilities, they must also be capable of discovering and nurturing their authentic selves, as well as the virile assets and the male virtues that will inspire and support our future. While all men, young or old, should be so lucky, it is likely that most of us probably knows someone, perhaps a young boy, who has looked up into our eyes in search of hope and the kind of guidance that male children, teenage boys and young men need. It is in our interests to open our hearts and hands to these individuals (and others) to help them follow the right path.

We must advocate for male studies and help to propel the culture of boys and men forward.

This means–especially now–the move toward equal treatment and respect for all people, whether male or female, is underway. In a sense, this is finally a home run for the boys. A beacon shines into decades of blackness; there is renewed optimism for genuine equality.

The most critical reference for Dr. Edward M. Stephen's science of the male is presented by preeminent scholars talking to each other in an uninterrupted dialogue that goes to the heart of the matter. (Click here to read.)

Blue pill love story

AVfM Video Source · 12 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

MGTOW Hybrid Experiments is a new channel. I was subscriber number 50. It should be 50k. Sub here. PE https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=I6EAYTk87Ig&feature=youtu.be

Dear Meghan MacKay...

AVfM Video Source · 13 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Here's all of my rage about the Ghomeshi trial in one convenient 3-minute rant! Enjoy! Megan MacKay.

Here's Karen Straughan calling BS like only she can!

Karen Straughan

Orlando: Facing west from California's shores

J T · 14 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As Amanda Marcotte recognizes in her most recent essay, the Orlando gunman was male Planned Parenthood joined the fray and also noticed the gunman was male.

Amanda Marcotte writes: "Every time feminists talk about toxic masculinity, there is a chorus of whiny dudes who will immediately assume — or pretend to assume — that feminists are condemning all masculinity, even though the modifier "toxic" inherently suggests that there are forms of masculinity that are not toxic."

In light of this, consider why the president and Hillary Clinton refuse to say "Radical Islam."

> The president has sought to make a clear distinction between Islam as a religion built on peaceful precepts and the acts of terrorism carried out by extremists who adhere to radical interpretations of the religion.

Allow me to modify this view to flush out the toxicity of the feminist movement:

> The president has sought to make a clear distinction between masculinity as a gender built on peaceful precepts and the acts of terrorism carried out by extremists who adhere to radical interpretations of masculinity.

That, right there, should be enough to censure the phrase "toxic masculinity." The mere presence of the modifier "toxic" inherently implies a separation that would not be tolerated with regard to religion, race or orientation. Would Marcotte call our president a "whiny dude" because he abhors the phrase "Radical Islam?"

Setting aside her feminist sexism, there is one more point about Marcotte's diatribe: she proposes absolutely nothing. What is the purpose of an analysis that makes sexist comments, yet proposes absolutely no solution? What is the point of Amanda Marcotte?

So, let's assume that this is a masculine issue. (We would not be far from the mark, for all advances and retreats of society have been by men, while women have historically sat on the sidelines and only embrace feminism when good men have removed life's risks.)

How can we view these events? Walt Whitman wrote:
FACING west, from California's shores,
Inquiring, tireless, seeking what is yet unfound,
I, a child, very old, over waves, towards the house of maternity, the land of migrations, look afar,
Look off the shores of my Western Sea–the circle almost circled;
For, starting westward from Hindustan, from the vales of Kashmere,
From Asia–from the north–from the God, the sage, and the hero,
From the south–from the flowery peninsulas, and the spice islands;
Long having wander'd since–round the earth having wander'd,
Now I face home again–very pleas'd and joyous;
(But where is what I started for, so long ago?
And why is it yet unfound?)

Today, we can only stand on California's shores after we scale the roadblocks put in place by gated communities designed to protect women. One can hardly get to the shore in many cases.

There is no place left to run, today.

There is no place left for men to start anew.

Men have always explored—it is in our nature (if feminists would stop laughing at men who refuse to ask for directions, they would learn something). It is no wonder that San Francisco became a gay male mecca: it was a city overpopulated by men fleeing Midwest conformity, seeking a new life during the Gold Rush.

Today, there are no rugged terrains from which a man can build a new life. Men—gay and straight— did not flock to "The Revenant," due to its "toxic masculinity"(that would be a feminist interpretation). We liked it because if gave an eye-view of a world that was unchartered: a place to run; a place to release the same energy that created The David and The Ninth.

When the beauty of masculinity's energetic flow is thwarted, a malignancy occurs. This does imply a crisis in masculinity, but it does demand a compassionate response; certainly not Marcotte's ingratitude.

Thomas Mann, in his epic novel "The Magic Mountain," wrote:

> A man lives not only his personal life, as an individual, but also, consciously or unconsciously, the life of his epoch and his contemporaries. He may regard the general, impersonal foundations of his existence as definitely settled and taken for granted, and [may be far] from assuming a critical attitude towards them; yet it is quite conceivable that he may none the less be vaguely conscious of the deficiencies of his epoch and find them prejudicial to his own moral well-being. All sorts of personal aims, hopes, ends, prospects, hover before the eyes of the individual, and out of these he derives the impulse to ambition and achievement.
>
> Now, if the life about him, if his own time seems, however outwardly stimulating, to be at bottom empty of such food for his aspirations; if he privately recognizes it to be hopeless, viewless, helpless, opposing only a hollow silence to all the questions man puts, consciously or unconsciously, yet somehow puts, as to the final, absolute, and abstract meaning in all his efforts and activities; then, in such a case, a certain laming of the personality is bound to occur, the more inevitably the more upright the character in question; a sort of palsy, as it were, which may extend from his spiritual and moral over into his physical and organic part. In an age that affords no satisfying answer to the eternal question of 'Why?' 'To what end?' a man who is capable of achievement over and above the expected modicum must be equipped with a moral remoteness and single-mindedness which is rare indeed and of heroic mold, or else with an exceptionally robust vitality.

In our contemporary age, those men who manifest a moral remoteness or robust vitality are held in disdain by the media. Men are encouraged to let go of their stoicism and weep openly on Oprah. Men are ridiculed by social justice warriors who suffer emotional *diarrhea. G*ood men will never cry in public—we do it alone with our loved ones and leave the theatrics to feminists who seek an uncivilized common denominator for human behavior.

Thus, it is inevitable that there is now a "certain laming of the personality" which Amanda designates as toxic.

If we wish to stem the tide of violence, we must show as much respect for men, as men—those on the Titanic, those who defended our Constitution, or the two Swedes who got off their bicycles at Stanford—have shown for women. We must recognize the consequences of the unending vilification of masculinity by the Marcotte's of this world who offer no solution. So allow me.

There are two pistons to masculinity: one that creates and one that destroys—civilization's machine. Testosterone builds civilizations; and when it falters, it destroys civilizations. If we wish to address events like in Orlando, we must address the nature of these acts in the context of the challenge facing men and boys.

We must now focus on the boys in our schools as we focus on girls. For every state-funded after-school SMET program for girls, we must offer reading classes for boys. Perhaps it is time to value athletic play in the schools, or teach the two genders separately, or delay by one year the entrance of boys into the schools, or train the teachers in how to teach boys or stop the vilification of men and the deconstruction of masculinity, or teach boys that men created civilization and that men are basically good.

There, Amanda: is it so hard to offer suggestions? I gave you five or six right there. Could you not have offered just one solution in your essay? Casting aspersions at masculinity without offering a solution is cowardly and will only make the problem worse and make you look mean. When the focus is on condemning masculinity by surreptitious use of a modifier that even our president would abhor, then that feminism's focus precludes a solution and invites misandry. Despite all the twitter feeds on toxic masculinity, not one has proposed a solution beyond the dysfunctional toxic feminist re-education camps now confronting young men on campuses.

The juxtaposition of the words "toxic" and "masculinity" "affords no satisfying answer to the eternal question of 'Why?" It merely satiates the hunger of a toxic feminism that has long since lost its purpose and is now hell-bent on bashing men.

If we do not focus constructive attention on our boys, they may indeed grow into men without an education, without jobs, with no future, and with access to automatic assault rifles. Is that what feminism wants?

Immunity from marital shaming: checkmate

August Løvenskiolds · 14 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A woman named Alexis tried to shame me Friday evening. I laughed at her.

I was sitting at a bar in Deep Ellum, chessboard at the ready, waiting for my opponent to arrive. An old friend, Daniel, introduced me to Lexi, a woman psychologist I would describe as a lovely 20-ish blonde were it not for her facial piercings and side-shaved head. Despite her damaged looks, Lexi was delightful to speak to and has full nerd credentials – she speaks both Star Trek and Lord of the Rings, upping her market value on the Fan Expo (formerly Comic Con) circuit.

After a couple of hours of beer and talk (chess buddy was running very late) Lexi invited me to a concert performed by a local woman vocalist. I declined (the booming, ear-splitting levels of all live music do not appeal to me) but Lexi was having none of that – she is charming and attractive enough that I'm not sure any man has ever refused her anything. I continued to decline until finally in frustration she told me to stop being "a pussy."

That is when I laughed at her, identified myself as a men's rights advocate, and explained that her attempts to shame me into doing something were futile and that emotional coercion was impossible on someone like me. Lexi looked stricken and immediately denied that her wheedling was coercive, but her efforts to ask me to the concert came to an end.

A few minutes later she departed and my chess pal, a dark-haired beauty I'll call Judith, arrived. After a lively game, Judith was in checkmate, and I was headed home for some nachos.

Getting shamed by women used to hurt me like a chainsaw singing on a sultry summer's day, but as I've grown in power and understanding through MGTOW and MRA work, I find I have also grown immune from being shamed for my choices as a man. This is a remarkably liberating feeling and the confidence one gets from it is superb. There is nothing like being able to make choices based on principles and understanding and not fear.

And speaking of jilted lovers, W. Bradford Wilcox, the dark character behind the infamous Prager U film Be a Man Get Married is back, doubling down on his dangerous and abusive assertion that men only become men when they sacrifice their freedom by marrying a woman – and that those who don't are woman-haters.

Perhaps Brad fancies himself a patriot for his efforts at shackling men to harridans. Perhaps he is virtue signaling his white knightedness. The desperation in his writing seems to me to show a man too eager to redeem his own disastrous life choices:

> Some of this, it seems, is about a kind of Peter Pan syndrome, where guys don't want to grow up and settle down. Some of it is about a kind of individualistic hedonism, where guys don't want to forego the opportunity to set their own work hours, hang out with their friends on their own terms, and score as much with the ladies as they can.

Oh, please.

It is about not playing a rigged game in a poisoned system where a gold-digger can break your heart, steal your kids, and rape your wallet for the rest of your life.

Brad even acknowledges that no-fault divorce and the corrupt family court system are largely responsible for destroying marriage, but he still wants men to line up for this rancid meat grinder anyway. The shaming attempts are thick and rich: marriage skeptics hold "misogynistic views." They are "Peter Pans." They have "a complete lack of faith."

We're probably cruel to puppies, too. Or whatever.

Brad was wheedling men much like Lexi was wheedling me: to try to coerce us into doing something we know we're not interested in.

Slowly and painfully, Brad will come to realize that being a bitch devoid of compassion is not the way to sell the poison that is today's marriage.

Once you've repealed no-fault divorce, obliterated family courts and grown out your side-shave, Bradford, maybe then and only then can you start building your case for marital slavery. Again.

Checkmate, loser.

Mansplaining

J T · 15 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In a four-pack of Crayons, the colors are red, yellow, blue and green. Four large Lego bricks are on display at the entrance to Legoland: they are red, yellow, blue and green.

Why green?

I get the red, yellow and blue: those are primary colors. Green is a secondary color but so are orange and purple. So why do we rarely see red, yellow, blue and orange in a box of Crayons? Why do we not see red, yellow, blue and purple at the entrance to Legoland? Why is green always the fourth color?

I suppose green is soothing or pleasing to the eye.

But why?

Perhaps because we have a preponderance of green receptors lining our retina.

But why?

Perhaps when man's ancestors descended from the trees they needed to be on the lookout for threats in the grass. Those without green receptors could not tell that there was a lion in hiding in the tall green grass. Plants are green because chlorophyll reflects back the green light—it is not used for energy extraction.

But why?

Perhaps because as the sun rises, the available light shifts to the blue end of the spectrum and when it sets, it shifts to the red end; and green light is always in the middle. So plants evolved to reject the middle green and extract from the ends of the spectrum to ensure they obtained more energy. I think. I don't know. I could be wrong. If you think I'm wrong, post it.

***

Feminists are upset—they are angry and bitter. When are they not? They say that students give higher teaching evaluations to male professors. Reviews of male professors, they say, are more likely to include the words "brilliant," "intelligent" or "smart," and far more likely to contain the word "genius." Meanwhile, women are more likely to be described as "mean," "harsh," "unfair," or "strict," and a lot more likely to be called "annoying."

Is it possible that men like to repeat what they have learned, but reconstructed in their mind to ensure clarity?

Is it possible that our ability to recapitulate—to teach—is sharpened by our constant desire to explain and re-explain?

Yes, men refuse to ask for directions. We want to figure it out ourselves; and when we do, we explain it. Approach a group of men on the street and ask for directions. Brace yourself: they will all explain at once and gesticulate in all directions, offering all sorts of improvements and considerations: rejoice in that masculine moment.

***

Why are our testicles outside of our bodies? The literature says it is because they need to be at a lower temperature in order to function.

But why?

How can any explanation be so simple? There must be more to this.

Well, when we age, gravity pulls down on our organs, compressing them within our abdominal cavity. Nature's designer realized that it would be safer if the testicles were free from compression, so the body forced them outside to protect them from the pressure induced by the intestines. As a result, testicles now function at a lower temperature.

The temperature issue is not a cause: it is a consequence.

It is important to ask questions, to try to answer, to try to explain to oneself, to try to state the answer in newer ways, to try to question and re-explain; and to do it aloud. If someone objects, incorporate their objection—make it your own. If they are angry and accuse you of patronizing, smile; and try to incorporate some humor next time to soften your explanation.

***

Mansplaining is combining of the words man and explaining, defined as "to explain something to someone, in a manner regarded as condescending or patronizing." Lily Rothman of The Atlantic defines it as "explaining without regard to the fact that the explainee knows more than the explainer, often done by a man to a woman. The feminist author and essayist Rebecca Solnit ascribes the phenomenon to a combination of "overconfidence and cluelessness," Blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah.
Lately, even the NY Times has gotten into the fray, legitimizing the word and its negative view of masculinity.

http://www.nytimes.com/2016/04/21/opinion/how-to-explain-mansplaining.html?_r=0

***

As I go about my day-to-day business, I explain things. I explain things to myself and to imagined listeners. Even if I don't know the final answer, I like talking about the question. Sometimes I cannot distinguish if I am talking aloud or to myself. (Yeah, alright: I talk to myself.) Sometimes, I make a fool out of myself when I talk. I mean, who wants to hear this endless splatter of questions and possible answers? So when someone tells me to stop, I learn where the line is.

***

So why is blue the color for boys and pink for girls?

Red used to be the color for boys.

But why?

In primitive times, we sat around the fire and marveled at the red flame, convincing ourselves about red energy. Our language has more words for red than for blue. But then it changed.

But why?

Around 1905, Einstein proposed the Doppler Effect for light. He proposed the red shift wherein the leading edge of our expanding galaxy leans to the blue edge of the spectrum, but the receding edge shifts to the red. Blue is a much more energetic color: it has a higher frequency, blue stars are hotter, and if you study the base of a candle flame, the blue is the hottest. Then, around 1920, the fix was in: blue became the color for boys.

Is there a relationship? I have no idea. There's also Picasso's red and blue period. But I have no idea if the issues are related. I have never seen anything in the literature, but I like talking about this issue. If I keep talking about it, maybe someone will explain it better.

***

Feminism is a perplexing neurosis. On the one hand, feminists bash men. On the other hand, they bash men. In between bashing men, they say they don't bash men and then they bash men; and they forever want to understand why men do well.

Can you imagine how much better our boys would be doing if feminists would stop bashing men? Can you imagine how much better our girls would be doing if feminists learned something from men?

They bash us for mansplaining and bash us for getting higher teacher evaluations.

***

"Hello, my name is JT. I admit I am powerless over mansplaining. It has been one day since my last mansplaining. I did it three times in this essay, and I will do it again."

***

Consider this astounding new research: A new study co-authored by academics out of Paris and UC Berkeley has found that students tend to rate male professors higher than their female counterparts.

https://www.insidehighered.com/news/2016/01/11/new-analysis-offers-more-evidence-against-student-evaluations-teaching

The author's name was Annie Boring. Need I say more?

I mean, I don't get it. Feminists say the reason for male professor evaluations is sexism; but there are more female students in university: the male students are a minority on campus. Despite fewer male students, male professors still get higher teaching evaluations. Despite the female majority on campus, men get blamed when female students give higher evaluations to men.

Why do men get such good evaluations?

When men explain things repetitively (even to people who already understand), we are organizing our thoughts, shifting them around, reformulating causality, searching for flaws in our comprehension, fixing our understanding, fleshing out connections, trying to dominate the subject matter (that's a good thing—we're not doing it to women; we're doing it to the subject matter), looking for ways to rise above it.

Yes, men are mansplainers. Yes, men do get better teaching evaluations. Do you think feminists will ever show enough modesty to get off the pedestal and realize that sexism does not explain this link? Do you think feminists might ever see a connection here?

***

I love mansplaining, and my students appreciate it—they tell me so in my evaluations. My children love it. When my daughter was six, we carried her "But why?" down to the subatomic level. What impressed her more than the answers (what she remembers, she tells me), was the fact that we kept going, inducing her to keep asking "But why? But why? But why? But why? But why?" Today, at fourteen, she talks and talks and talks and talks and talks and talks and I can barely get a word in edgewise—she has an opinion on everything, and she states it like and adult—with confidence and tranquility.

I mansplain to my wife, but my wife loves me and I love her. She says I talk in my sleep.

***

I hired a female plumber once—for equity's sake. She was very good but she would not mansplain a thing. I wish women would mansplain more. I'd gladly excuse the ostensible condescension and interpret it as passion—because that's what men would do: we're kind. Why can't feminists extend this courtesy to men? They're so mean.

So I went back to hiring male plumbers. They mansplain. Even if I understand what they are mansplaining (and I rarely do), I love the look in their eyes when they mansplain their craft and their love for what they know—it's almost like they're little boys explaining the first time they jacked off. I like hearing men talk.

The same holds for male auto-mechanics, male electricians, and male-carpenters. I love hearing them mansplain their work and their love for it. It brings out the boy in me; and considering I am approaching sixty, I like knowing the young man is still in me. You know what happens when men approach that age, right?

***

I have saggy balls.

But why?

Newton's Law of gravitation states:

$$F_{attraction} = G\frac{m_{testicles}M_{earth}}{R_{earth}^2}$$

Now, we take this force, divide it by the hoop area of the scrotum, apply the visco-plastic properties of human skin and GOOD GOD they'll be scraping the ground if I make it to 70!

But I love my saggy balls. I love my penis: it's no longer as stiff as a Crayon, but that's cool. I love the blue edge of the spectrum—and the little blue pill. I love being a man. I love my masculinity.

I'm a mansplainer.

Castration culture revealed in Hesiod's Theogony

Douglas Galbi · 15 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Students wondering how university officials today can support policies that viciously disparage and persecute men's sexuality should study Hesiod's Theogony. That influential work, written in Greek nearly 2700 years ago, depicts the earth goddess Gaia plotting to castrate Uranus, the sky god, who was both her son and her husband. Gaia's unjust and vicious hostility toward male genitals indicates castration culture's ancient, bloody grip on western Eurasian gynocentric societies.

The sky god Uranus covered the earth goddess, Gaia. She then gave birth to three strong sons. Hostility to male sexuality made those births problematic. Greek theogony distinctively celebrates goddesses creating a child on their own, without men — reproducing by parthenogenesis.[1] Many government policies now support effectively similar reproduction among humans. Unlike ancient Greek gods, men today are vastly disproportionately forced to make enormous "child support" payments to women holding privileged custody of children. That's the cultural construction of parthenogenesis.

After she had children with Uranus, Gaia with vague and unsubstantiated charges incited his castration. Gaia said to the children she had with Uranus:

> Children of mine and of a wicked father, obey me, if you wish: we would avenge your father's evil outrage. For he was the first to devise unseemly deeds. [2]

Consensual heterosexual activity isn't unseemly, nor should it be blamed on men. In ancient Greek theogony, Gaia was the original exponent of parental alienation. Cronus, son of Gaia and Uranus, responded like a well-programmed zombie to her work of parental alienation:

> Mother, I would promise and perform this deed, since I do not care at all about our evil-named father. For he was the first to devise unseemly deeds.

Gaia rejoiced at her son's willingness to commit horrible violence at her behest. She arranged for an ambush:

> She placed him in an ambush, concealing him from sight, and put into his hands the jagged-toothed sickle, and she explained the whole trick to him. And great Sky came, bringing night with him; and spreading himself out around Earth in his desire for love, he lay outstretched in all directions. Then his son reached out from his ambush with his left hand, and with his right hand he grasped the monstrous sickle, long and jagged-toothed, and eagerly he reaped the genitals from his dear father and threw them behind him to be borne away. [3]

Fathers understand Hesiod's Theogony in a deeply personal, deeply painful way. College students not yet fathers are beginning to recognize castration culture.

When Bernardus Silvestris wrote a new cosmogony in twelfth-century France, he confronted the castration culture that Hesiod's Theogony described. As Roman culture developed with awareness of the earlier Greek culture, the Roman god Saturn assimilated the Greek god Cronus. Bernardus described Saturn as:

> an ancient to be most strongly condemned, cruel and detestable in his wickedness, savagely inclined to harsh and bloody acts.
> {accusatissimus veteranus, crudelioris quidem et detestandae malitiae, dirisque ac cruentis actibus efferatus.} [4]

Writing under gynocentrism, Bernardus didn't dare attack long-established castration culture directly. He challenged it figuratively with a new poetic description of Saturn's violence:

> he {Saturn} mowed down with a blow of his sickle whatever was beautiful, whatever was flourishing. Just as he would not accept childbirth, so he forbade roses, lilies, and the other kinds of sweet-scented flowers to flourish.
> {insumpto falcis acumine, quicquid pulchrum, quicquid florigerum demetebat. Rosas et lilia et cetera olerum genera, sicut nasci non sustinet, non sustinet et florere.}

Destroying gardens is a poetic metaphor for castration. Bernardus sought to create a new, more humane cosmos. His Cosmographia ends with creating man's penis and celebrating the importance of the penis's skillful work.

Penetrating castration culture to implant the seeds of a new imaginative world requires gleaning discarded resources in literary history. For example, classical Latin Priapus poems exposed the brutalizing and commodifying stereotypes of men's person. Asinus aureus recounted a woman's delight in a large male member. The medieval French knight Geoffrey de La Tour Landry taught his daughters concern for violence against men. Unlike Hesiod's Theogony, the medieval Latin Cosmographia of Bernardus Silverstris excludes castration culture. All just, merciful, and loving persons should be striving to create such a world.

Notes:

[1] Relative to other western Eurasian creation myths, female parthenogenesis is far more important and marked in Hesiod's Theogony. Park (2014) pp. 265-9. Scholars today tend to see female parthenogenesis as part of the primordial Golden Age:

> The mythic form his {Zeus's} act of creation assumes completes the trend of the Theogony that began with Earth's natural parthenogenetic capacity and ends with the male's imitation of her. The seal is set on the finality of the transition from female dominance to male dominance by conscious male usurpation of her procreative functions, the basic source of her mystery and power.

Zeitlin (1996) p. 108. Students are now thoroughly indoctrinated with these threadbare clichés of anti-meninism:

> Evidently, Hesiod merely reflected the opinions of his society onto his story of the gods' creation of the universe, creating a justification for the philosophical opinions of the society in which he lived.
>
> Could myths like the Theogony have been used to reinforce the patriarchy as it operated in ancient Greek society? It seems likely.

Pelos (2016). Of course, it seems likely when you live in a Soviet-style indoctrination camp. See the praise for the good little apparatchik.

[2] Hesiod, Theogony ll. 164-6, from Greek trans. Most (2007) p. 17. Subsequent quotes are from id. ll. 170-2, 174-82. The earlier Loeb edition of Hesiod's Theogony, translated by Hugh G. Evelyn-White (1914), is available online.

[3] Reflecting the fantastic imagination that now drives totalitarian sex tribunals at American universities, Vernant declares:

> Ouranos {Uranus} sprawls over Gaia, covering her permanently, and discharges into her without stopping, imposing on her an incessant copulation—at least, at night (Theog. 176). There is neither spatial separation nor temporal interlude between them, in this union without pause.

Vernant (1990) p. 466. This contempt for Uranus isn't warranted. Without Uranus's work, ordinary life would be impossible. Uranus provides relief that helps persons begin a new day.

Echoing tenets of today's dominant castration culture, Park declares:

> The emasculation of Uranus is key to progress: it ends his sexual relationship with Gaea and explains in symbolic terms the separation between earth and sky.

Park (2014) p. 271. Castration also occurs in the earlier Hurrian-Hittite Kumarbi Cycle (Song of Kumarbi). In the Hittite version of that theogony (from the fourteenth or thirteenth century BGC), Kumarbi overthrows king Anu by biting off his genitals. For an English translation, Bachvarova (2013). Long-established castration culture has broad bite today in the broad criminalization of men's sexuality.

While he presented castration culture, Hesiod himself seems not to have been an anti-meninist. Hesiod sought to provide men with prudent counsel in the work of their ordinary days:

> Do not let a fancy-assed woman deceive your mind > by guilefully cajoling while she pokes into your granary:
> whoever trusts a woman, trust swindlers.

Hesiod, Works and Days ll. 373-5, from Greek trans. Most (2007) pp. 117, 119.

[4] Bernardus Silvestris, Cosmographia, Microcosmus 5.5, from Latin trans. Wetherbee (2015) pp. 101. The subsequent quote is similarly from Microcosmus 5.6, id. pp. 101, 103.

Underscoring his condemnation of Saturn / Cronus for promoting castration culture, Bernardus describes "the barren and frozen wastes of Saturn {infecunda Saturni frigora}" as a place:

> where the peace of the sky had been broken and shivered with chill and icy harshness. {ubi gelidis et pruinosis rigoribus demutata caeli tranquillitas inhorrescit.}

Microcosmus 5.7, id. p. 103. I suspect that the Latin gelidus shares a common origin with the Old Norse term gelda ("geld, castrate").

[image] Cronus castrates his father Uranus at his mother Gaia's urging. Oil on panel. Giorgio Vasari and Cristofano Gherardi, 16th century Florence.

References:

Bachvarova, Mary. 2013. Translation of the Kumarbi Cycle, with Song of Hedammu separated into two different versions." Pp. 139-63 in López-Ruiz, Carolina. Gods, heroes, and monsters: a sourcebook of Greek, Roman, and Near Eastern myths in translation. New York: Oxford University Press.

Most, Glenn W., trans. 2007. Hesiod. Theogony. Works and Days. Testimonia. Loeb Classical Library 57. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Park, Arum. 2014. "Parthenogenesis in Hesiod's Theogony." Preternature: Critical and Historical Studies on the Preternatural 3.2: 261-283.

Pelos, Andy. The Asexual Revolution: Parthenogenesis in Hesiod's Theogony (Revised)." A Classic(s) Dilemma. May 12, 2016.

Vernant, Jean-Pierre. 1990. "One…Two…Three: Eros." Ch. 14 (pp. 465-78) in Halperin, David M., John J. Winkler, and Froma I. Zeitlin, eds. Before sexuality: the construction of erotic experience in the ancient Greek world. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Wetherbee, Winthrop, trans. 2015. Poetic works: Bernardus Silvestris. Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 38. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press.

Zeitlin, Froma I. 1996. Playing the other: gender and society in classical Greek literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Rosie Batty and Danny Blay Speak about MRA's (Family Violence)

AVfM Video Source · 15 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Rosie Batty and Danny Blay speak at a family violence election forum at the National Press Club.

> I realize this video is going to make people's blood boil, but please don't shoot the messenger. Just for the record Rosie is incorrect about her stats on women's deaths at least when it concerns family violence, currently, as it stands one woman every 7 days and one man every 10 days dies due to family violence in Australia (ABS stats & 1 in 3 campaign)
>
> WSU Sceptics Society

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qJrDWat8suw&ab_channel=WSUScepticsSociety

WSU Sceptics Society

ICMI talk with Paul Elam, Janice Fiamengo, Janet Bloomfield, and Karen Straughan

AVfM Video Source · 17 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The militant enthusiasm syndrome

Doug Mortimer · 18 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

> There are few things in the world so thoroughly despicable and deserving of immediate destruction as the fiction of an ideal cause artificially set up to elicit enthusiasm in the service of the contriver's aims.
>
> Konrad Lorenz

Imagine a band of arrogant, hyper-emotional college students taking over the dean's office. They have an agenda and refuse to leave until their demands are met. One of them latches onto a bullhorn and reads off the demands one by one. They include:

(1) The establishment of an administration-supported, fully-funded men's rights group.
(2) That the college divest itself of any holdings in corporations that discriminate against men or promote feminism.

(3) That the college immediately undertake a male recruitment program until the student body is 50/50 men/women.

(4) A safe space for all men who identify as MGTOW.

MRA social justice warriors? Impossible? Ridiculous? Well, let's take a closer look.

The explanations for the rise of the social justice warriors are numerous; they've been coddled and indulged, they're spoiled, they're cult members, they're mentally ill, they're narcissists… or whatever.

Consider the possibility that they are merely doing what comes naturally to the young: that is, displaying militant enthusiasm.

Militant enthusiasm is a phrase coined by Konrad Lorenz, author of On Aggression, a controversial book published in 1963 and translated into English in 1966 , thus coinciding with the Vietnam war, civil unrest, and graphic violence in movies. Controversy was assured.

Born in Vienna in 1903, Lorenz had a front-row seat for militant enthusiasm, as he had witnessed the rise of his fellow Austrian, Adolf Hiltler. Given the times, Lorenz's own political background was suspect, but he held an M.D. and a Ph.D. (in zoology). Also, he had won the 1973 Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine, and is often regarded as one of the founding fathers of the discipline of ethology. So if anyone was qualified to comment on the dark side of human nature, it was Lorenz.

Lorenz took a nuanced approach to human aggression, but his book was tarred with the brush of biological determinism because it didn't cleave to the tabula rasa narrative. In exploring the topic, he posited that militant enthusiasm was a form of aggression characteristic of late adolescence and early adulthood.

Since college students are mostly in their late teens and early 20s, it's no wonder that the campus is the ideal greenhouse for militant enthusiasm. The phenomenon, however, is not restricted to leftist/progressive politics. Given the right circumstances, it could manifest itself in the Young Republicans club, Young Americans for Freedom, or libertarianism.

And militant enthusiasm is not restricted to politics. There's a reason politics and religion are both out of bounds in polite conversation. They are not disciplines but systems of belief. Ideologies are not susceptible to logic, reason, or evidence but they can be animated by the peculiarly adolescent emotion of militant enthusiasm.

When militant enthusiasm is behind a religious awakening, it usually involves a religion different from that of one's upbringing. For example, it is often observed that Catholic converts tend to be more zealous than cradle Catholics. This should be no surprise, as it is a choice consciously made at a period when a young person is actively shopping for new beliefs.

According to Lorenz, a sharp break with one's background is a key feature of militant enthusiasm:

> During and shortly after puberty human beings have an indubitable tendency to loosen their traditional allegiance to all rites and social norms of their culture, allowing conceptual thought to cast doubt on their value and to look around for new and perhaps more worthy ideals. There probably is, at that time of life, a definite sensitive period for a new object-fixation, much as in the case of the object-fixation found in animals and called imprinting.

Once one grasps the concept of militant enthusiasm, one readily sees how it manifests itself, not just in college but in other institutions. For example, the army has always known here is a narrow window of time for molding men into soldiers. Even if you can still mold their bodies at, say, age 28, you can't mold their minds as well as you can at age 18. The gung-ho factor dwindles as men mature.

It's also on display in corporations. Young employees are more susceptible to the inculcation of corporate culture. Middle-aged employees, no matter how skilled, no matter how competent, no matter how reliable, are less likely to embrace a new corporate culture. In fact, they may even resist it. "When I was with Smith, Jones & Brown, we used to do things this way" is not what management wants to hear.

As for the institution of marriage, nubile women have always known that their influence is strongest when men are youngest. Long before the MGTOW movement came along, women knew that the more a man is "set in his ways," the more sales resistance he has, and the less interest he has in pair-bonding. Whether it's declining testosterone levels, life experience, or just less plasticity of the brain, the older the bachelor the more confirmed he is. Whatever his feelings towards women, militant enthusiasm is not among them.

The alternative objection-fixation search is facilitated in college, which offers a veritable buffet of options. Like pedophiles scouting for and grooming the most vulnerable children, progressive teachers of all stripes are always on the lookout for more foot soldiers.

Since most college students come from middle class backgrounds, extreme left politics is something new and revolutionary in their lives. Before you know it, they are transformed into social justice warriors delivering sanctimonious lectures to their parents during semester breaks.

Every warrior needs a tribe, and the same is true of social justice warriors. Regardless of which tribe a college student joins, it is essential be part of a team. A key part of militant enthusiasm is figuring out which tribe is the best fit.

Lorenz identified four conditions conducive to militant enthusiasm:

1. A social unit with which the subject identifies himself must appear to be threatened by some danger from outside;

2. The presence of a hated enemy from whom the threat emanates;

3. An inspiring leader figure; and

4. The presence of many other individuals, all agitated by the same emotion.

Dubbing the fourth condition as possibly the most important, Lorenz acknowledges that militant enthusiasm could be employed in any number of productive activities, but it is a double-edged sword:

> At the postpubertal age some human beings seem to be driven by an overpowering urge to espouse a cause and failing to find a worthy one may become fixated on astonishingly inferior substitutes. (emphasis mine)

Well, think about it. Of all the battles the SJWs could fight, what are they concerned about? How women are depicted in video games and comic books; whether men take up too much space on public transportation; the low sexual market value of obese women; whether gender blenders have a place to piss in peace.

But getting back to our original question: could militant enthusiasm be employed in the service of MRA issues? Could it be employed to take on gynocentrism with the same ferocity that feminist SJWs take on the patriarchy? Is there a place for MRAs in the self-righteous, victimhood one-upmanship sweepstakes?

We know that obnoxiousness does not equate with righteousness, so employing the natural militant enthusiasm of young men comes with a curse. Can you behave as badly as your opponents and still maintain your self-respect? Deep down, we know it just isn't manly for a man to play the victim. It might work for some, but if you're an able-bodied, white, heterosexual male, you're fighting an uphill battle.

Fortunately, militant enthusiasm isn't the only form of aggression. Humor, for example, can be wielded like a weapon. In fact, Lorenz has a lot to say about the superiority of humor to enthusiasm:

Laughter never makes us uncritical, while enthusiasm abolishes all thought of rational self-control.

> [W]hile laughter, even in the form of the most outrageous and scornful ridicule, always remains obedient to reason, enthusiasm is always threatening to get out of hand and turn on its master.

So rather than adopt the grim, mirthless demeanor of the social justice warrior, perhaps it would be better to play the trickster, to employ ridicule as a double-barreled weapon (1) to attack the enemy and (2) to create a bond with one's fellow attackers.

Certainly the SJWs are an easy mark when it comes to humor. There are any number of blogs, web sites, or YouTube videos out there that make fun of them. But watching such videos in isolation is not a bonding experience. So perhaps meet-up groups making fun of SJWs is the answer. Stand-up comics could appear at local comedy clubs during open mic nights. Aspiring comedy writers could come up with SNL-type skits lampooning SJWs.

Then there is audience participation. Many years ago, a bar in Dallas had a much-publicized contest involving Howard Cosell, a controversial network sportscaster. The bar held a raffle in which the winner got to throw a brick through the screen of an old TV during one of Cosell's telecasts.

Think of the possibilities of such contests as fund-raisers. One could easily obtain an old monitor and play a video of Gloria Steinem or some other ogress, and have at it. Or how about a piñata party with an effigy of Trigglypuff? Or putting an Anita Sarkeesian look-alike (all eyebrows and earrings!) in a dunking booth?

Maybe one day mainstream humor will take on the SJWs, and they will become regular fodder for the monologues of late-night TV hosts. In the meantime, what are you waiting for? To my way of thinking, there's no such thing as too much mockery, and the SJWs are all walking around with targets on their backs.

As Lorenz puts it, acting against reason is not only immoral but . . . it is very often extremely funny!

> Humor is the best of lie-detectors.

Hey, how can it be hate speech if everyone's laughing?

Destroying the feminist Kafka Trap

August Løvenskiolds · 21 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Did you know that feminists think zero reported rapes mean there is a tremendous amount of rape on campus? Or that low rates of military rape prove racism? Why do feminists think in such a bizarre, illogical and even juvenile fashion? Why do they even seem to cultivate and promote such lunacy? Can anything be done to stop the cancerous spread of their inanity?

In this article, I'll open by reducing you to a child-like state of confusion and dependence. I will then use nonsequitur in the form of accusations to convince you that you are guilty of something you are innocent of. As you flail against your false anagnorisis, I will then offer you the tiniest sliver of hope, available only as long as you adhere to my poorly specified guidelines for your salvation.

Sounds like fun, right? Welcome to feminism 101. Welcome to the Kafka trap.

You can read more about feminist Kafka-trapping here and here. Because you are a sexist, I know you will want to read more about it. That is what sexists do. That is what you will do.

Oh, amusing – you think you are not guilty of sexism. The very fact that you deny your sexism is proof that you are a sexist. Why don't you just admit it? Why can't you check your privilege? Eliminate your toxic masculinity? What kind of a monster are you?

The patriarchy created a culture of rape used to oppress women, and all men benefit from this at the expense of women as a class. If you disagree with this, you are violent. I'm not going to say that "you are a part of it" and "you suck" because I want you to draw this conclusion for yourself. Internalize it. Surrender yourself to my loving forgiveness and instruction, if only you are man enough to admit it.

We don't hate men despite all the horrible things we claim they have done to us. We just need men to teach themselves and each other how to be better men, better allies to feminism. You know, good little slaves to our every whim.

Almost every article you will read by feminists writing to men follows that same script. They are trying to break you down so that they can build you up again in their image. This is a plan taken from the perversion of the growth of normal human intelligence.

Human social growth is marked by transitions and recapitulation of various ways of understanding the world. Like children in a new, confusing world we learn to seek and trust the love and instruction of parents. As we grow, we start to seek the approval of our peers. Eventually, men become more individualistic, seeking to distinguish themselves from others through achievement. At each new stage, we rebel a little or a lot at the authorities – parents, peers, etc. – from the earlier stages.

With each new life experience, we regress a bit to reiterate these steps to build new understandings of the new experience. The first few days of one's experience in, say, a new school are marked by awe and confusion as we seek approval and our place in a new world. Once we become familiar and then comfortable in our new digs, we rebuild our base of peer support or reassert our individuality.

Feminists are aware of the natural human cycle of using a child's perspective as a base to build understanding. They maliciously exploit it to spread and regulate their ideology. Ironically, they are caught in this trap, a trap constructed carefully and maintained by their ideological peers.

That is why they cannot tolerate challenges to their claims. Santa Claus must live forever, and the walls of the crib must not be breached.

Rather than empowering women, feminists keep them in child-like confusion with both their fear of men and their "safe spaces" designed to enforce immature mental states of weakness. For example, after Milo Yiannopoulos tried to speak at DePaul University, feminists scrambled to build a safe space to rebuild their damaged mental crib. While censorship and safe spaces seem like bizarre ways to show the empowerment of women, they make perfect sense for a flimsy cult that is trying to box out competing viewpoints that have objective facts on their side.

Almost every facet of today's feminism can be explained by the Kafka trap:

- "Privilege checking" is a way to keep one in a state of shame, which disables your ability to protest that you are innocent of their false accusations.
- "Mansplaining" and "manspreading" are terms designed to make you feel guilty about imaginary slights against women.
- Like "political correctness", the term "microaggression" is intended to keep you wary, if not paranoid, about everything you might do. Walking on the sidewalk toward a woman is a microaggression – you are colonizing her space. Avoiding walking on the sidewalk toward a woman is also a microaggression – you are implying she is too unclean for you to be around.
- "Sexism" is a crime so broad and poorly defined that everything can be called sexist except when a woman does it – even though this is not the dictionary definition of sexism.

Destroying the Kafka trap

Prevention in the best way to thwart the trap. Articles like this one serve as a sort of inoculation – if you know about the Kafka trap and can recognize when someone is using it on you, you are naturally less vulnerable to it. Regular booster shots of both reason and invective against feminism are necessary to keep one's guard up, which is why I write no many articles engaging feminism's foibles.

Even though I support legal gender equality, I successfully resisted the Kafka trap by repeatedly denying the accusation that I was sexist. When they shouted that my denial was proof of my sexism, I then denied that I was a butterfly, and asked if that made me a butterfly. This made my feminist accusers increasingly furious to the point of their becoming physically abusive. I remained unmoved. I was finally cast out from their midst – a recalcitrant man who supported equality was too big a threat to their paradigm.

The presidential campaign of Donald Trump shows another way to destroy the trap – when someone tries to shame him by accusing him of some malign misogyny, he lashes out with double the vigor of his attackers, often in ways that are even more bizarre than the attacks against him. The crowds cheer – they've felt the tendrils of the trap and are impressed at the power of a man who fights back with such violent skill. THAT is the man I want for my President, they think.

Can a feminist caught in the Kafka trap ever escape? It is rare, but it does happen. Childbirth, particularly the birth of a son, can give a feminist a new perspective that makes her former hatred of men ring hollow. (This is why feminists are so keen on abortion, and even celebrating abortions – killing babies defends and rebuilds the walls of the trap.)

Can a counter-trap to the Kafka trap be created? I'm not sure, but I imagine it is possible. We already know that a feminist is vulnerable to bizarre, circular, non-falsifiable arguments. Pushing such arguments even further down the absurdity black hole into highly emotional territory could, I think, shatter them.

For example, last fall the Twitter hashtag #ShoutYourAbortion gave feminists the chance to crow about killing their kids. Celebrating such a horrible decision is crazy enough, so imagine a man trying to convince a female feminist that they should have sex so that she can shout her abortion, too. If she declines, he turns on the Kafka trap and asks her to check her privilege. Is she really a feminist? She has the chance to become a rape victim and a first person abortion booster. What real feminist could resist that chance to champion women's issues?

It is absurd, of course, and that is the point: the hope is that at some point the feminist's willful suspension of disbelief will collapse, and he or she will experience anagnorisis – sometimes called a "red pill moment" – all on their own.

Macrobius's Saturnalia reveals constraints on men's behavior

Douglas Galbi · 21 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Rome about the year 431, the Right Honorable and Illustrious Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius wrote a series of books for his son. With these books, father offered son "a fund of knowledge {scientiae supellex}," an "accumulation of things worth knowing" {noscendorum congerium pollicetur}." Macrobius didn't merely heap together bits of ancient knowledge. He subtly ordered them, blended them, and digested them so that they would provide zest in learning and harmony of understanding.[1] Such transmission of knowledge was vitally important for men in fifth-century Rome, just as it is for men today.

For dessert after a banquet of knowledge, Macrobius arranged a series of jests. Macrobius's concern for verecundia (modesty, discretion, and decorum) prevented him from discussing directly important aspects of gender under gynocentric society.[2] Jests provide an opportunity for communicating aspects of reality not otherwise discussable.

> A man visiting Rome from a province attracted crowds because he appeared as if he were Caesar Augustus's brother. Caesar summoned him and asked, "Was your mother ever in Rome?" The man answered, "No, but my father was many times."[3]

The bite of this resemblance jest comes from underlying gynocentric reality. If Caesar's father had an illegitimate child with a provincial woman, that would matter little to Caesar. But if Caesar's mother had an illegitimate child with a provincial man, that would make Caesar's father a fool or a cuckold. That "edged barb {iocus asper}" became notorious. Caesar Augustus's indulgence of it was widely discussed with amazement. The purity of matrilineal descent was crucial for social status. What women did mattered much more than what men did.

Nonetheless, women in ancient Rome were less subject to social control than men were. Julia, the daughter of Caesar Augustus, wore extravagant and provocative clothes. She was known for licentiousness. Caesar himself behaved more modestly. When asked why she didn't behave soberly as her father did, Julia saucily replied, "He forgets that he is Caesar, but I remember that I am Caesar's daughter."[4] Julia ignored her political responsibility to model normative behavior. Unlike Caesar, she acted as her privilege allowed. From the most privileged to the least privileged groups of men and women, men are more constrained in the exercise of privilege.

The cultural construction of gender forces men to struggle to be virtuous and to be recognized as men. Men are commonly disparaged as pigs, or accused of behaving like dogs. Macrobius recorded for his son a jest that Julia made:

> When people aware of her outrageous behavior expressed surprise that her sons looked just like Agrippa {her husband}, though she had been so free in letting others enjoy her charms, she said, "I take on a passenger only when the ship's hold is full." [5]

The point of this jest isn't merely Julia's shrewd and heartless technique of birth control. The narrator immediately instructs the reader:

> Compare the mot of Marcus Popillius' daughter: when someone wondered why other animals sought a mate of the species only when they wished to become pregnant, she replied, "Because they're animals."

Women being sexually promiscuous is celebrated in elite culture. In authoritative media today, slut walks signify that women are strong, independent human beings.

Immediately following the women's jests about being promiscuous while pregnant, Macrobius placed a jest about public contempt for a man. Vatinus was stoned for not offering the public a sufficiently entertaining gladiatorial show. Roman officials subsequently issued a decree that only fruit could be thrown in the arena. When an official was asked if a pine cone was a fruit, he ruled:

> If a person is going to throw it at Vatinus, it's a fruit.

Throwing stones at men, or at boys, like joking about men getting raped, doesn't violate decorum in gynocentric society. Publicly criticizing women, in contrast, is extremely dangerous.

Men's subordinate social status generates tighter constraints on men's sexuality than on women's. The dessert discussion session ends with an uninvited guest, the aristocratic, bullying Evangelus, urging the men to "act like men":

> As in battle, then, we have to square up to the enemy — pleasures and indulgence in wine — and fight them at close quarters, so that we fortify ourselves against them not by flight or evasion, but by relying on mental exertion, unswerving resolution, and moderate indulgence to preserve our balance and self-restraint.

Unlike women, men must respect norms to be socially recognized as different from animals:

> We understand that the two pleasures of taste and touch — that is, food and sex — are the only ones that human beings share with the beasts, and that's why anyone wholly in the grip of these pleasures is counted among the animals of the fields and the wilds; all other pleasures, which derive from the three remaining senses, are peculiar to human beings. … Will anyone with a shred of human decency, then, exult in these two pleasures, of sexual intercourse and gluttony, which human beings share with swine and asses? [6]

Women can and do exult in those pleasures. Julia and another elite woman were examples that Macrobius recounted under the cover of jests. Men, in contrast, face more social pressure to uphold verecundia and the gynocentric construction of virtue. Macrobius's son probably would have understood the lesson better than most modern readers have.

Today, men's sexuality is broadly criminalized, men have no reproductive rights, and cuckolding of men is institutionalized in official paternity establishment procedures. Today, with freedom of expression more constrained in Western countries than it was in the early Islamic caliphates or in medieval Europe, few dare to discuss men's significant social and political disadvantages. Macrobius points to the importance of men getting together in men-only environments and jesting.

Notes:

[1] Saturnalia, Preface, pp. 3-9. The quotes are from p. 5. The discussion reportedly offered "plenty of applications for the conduct of life." Saturnalia 1.2.8, p. 17. The dating of the Saturnalia to 431 GC is based on the work of Alan Cameron. For discussion, id. pp. xiv-xvii.

[2] On concern for verecundia in Macrobius's Saturnalia, Kaster (1980) and Long (2000).

[2] I've lightly paraphrased the jest from Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.4.19-20, from Latin trans. Kaster (2011) p. 353. All subsequent page references to the Saturnalia are in id. Bill Thayer has commendably made the Latin text of the Saturnalia available online.

A similar resemblance jest is recorded in Valerius Maximus, Memorable Deeds and Sayings 9.14.3. Valerius wrote that work about 30 GC. The jest, with minor variations, has occurred in a variety of contexts through to the present.

In Macrobius's Saturnalia, resemblance subsequently frames Augustus's misunderstanding about his daughter Julia:

> when he saw his crowd of grandchildren and their resemblance to Agrippa {Julia's husband}, he was ashamed > of doubting his daughter's fidelity. And so Augustus deluded himself with the thought that his daughter's high spirits gave the appearance of license but were innocent in fact Saturnalia 2.5.3-4, p. 363.

[4] Saturnalia 2.5.8, p. 365. Subsequent quotes are from 2.5.9, 2.5.10, p. 365 (When people aware…, Compare the mot…); 2.6.1, p. 367 (If a person…), 2.8.9 (As in battle…), 2.8.12, 2.8.15 (We understand…). Macrobius's account of after-dinner jesting (Book 2) ends at 2.8.16 with sexual intercourse being compared to the effects of disease.

[5] Julia had five children with Agrippa. Id. p. 362, n. 73. The recounting of Julia's jests is subtly set up:

> he began to speak about Julia in these terms: 'She was thirty-seven, a point in life when — if you have any sense left — you know you're no longer young, but she was abusing her standing as fortune's darling, and her father's.

Saturnalia 2.5.1-2, p. 361. When Julia was thirty-seven, Augustus exiled her for adultery. He ultimately refused to allow her to be buried with him in his Mausoleum. Long (2000) pp. 348-9. Saturnalia never mentions Julia's exile, but surely Macrobius was aware of it. Macrobius's point was women's license, not the unusual punishment of Julia.

Modern scholarship confirms Macrobius's point about women's license. Mary Beard, probably one of the most powerful figures in classical scholarship today, laments:

> One thing that we almost entirely miss in Rome is the tradition of subversive female laughter — what we call giggling — that is a distinctive strand in modern Western culture and can be glimpsed as far back as Geoffrey Chaucer. … this form of laughter, including its cultural and literary construction, is almost exclusively associated with women and "girls"; in its strongest form, it is, in Angela Carter's words, "the innocent glee with which women humiliate men."

Beard (2014) p. 157. Many men don't even understand what's going on. In a move characteristic of domestic violence scholarship, Beard defines giggling to exclude men:

> I am referring here not just to moments when a woman laughs (or women laugh) at a man (or men) but when she laughs, in a gendered role, as a woman, at a man (which is what, in its powerful and positive valuation, the giggle signifies).

Id. p. 259, p. 5. Men should weep that such work stands on the commanding heights of intellectual life today.

[6] Long observes:

> Women had a kind of license to admit sexuality. Julia and Populia joke acknowledging desire, whereas Avienus {a man banqueter in Macrobius's Saturnalia} is squashed for an ambiguous hint about after-dinner music.

Long (2000) p. 354.

[image] Opening page of twelfth-century manuscript of Macrobius, Saturnalia. Manuscript preserved in Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana – Firenze; item IT-FI0100; Segnatura: Plut.51.08. Thanks to Internet Culturale: Cataloghi e Collezioni Digitali delle Biblioteche Italiane.

References:

Beard, Mary. 2014. Laughter in ancient Rome: on joking, tickling, and cracking up. Sather classical lectures, v. 71.

Berkeley: University of California Press.

Kaster, Robert. 1980. “Macrobius and Servius: Verecundia and the Grammarian’s Function.” Harvard Studies in Classical Philology. 84: 219-262.

Kaster, Robert A. trans. 2011. Macrobius. Saturnalia, Books 1-2. Vol. I, Loeb Classical Library 510. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Long, Jacqueline. 2000. “Julia-jokes at Macrobius’s Saturnalia: Subversive decorum in late antique reception of Augustan political humor.” International Journal of the Classical Tradition. 6 (3): 337-355.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Cost of Gender Studies – TFF Episode 34

AVfM Video Source · 21 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Fiamengo File, weekly on Studio Brulé.

In Episode 34 Professor Fiamengo details the high cost of Women's Studies programs in Canada and suggests that this wasted money could be better spent on something useful.

Petition by Sargon of Akkad to suspend Social Justice courses: https://www.change.org/p/universities…

StudioBrule

Support An Ear for Men

AVfM Video Source · 21 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

► Patreon page
► One time donation

Mens' Rights vs Feminist Rape Culture explained using Puzzle Pieces

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 24 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Subscribe to Alison Tieman's YouTube channel here

The lonely single men of MGTOW

Tim Patten · 25 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Around the world, a large and growing contingent of males are sounding a clarion call about the dark side of marriage. In doing so, they are drawing scorn and being contemptuously regarded as "lonely hearts," "loners," "losers," "women-haters" and "recluses." But nothing could be further from the truth. They have made an informed and rational choice based on modern day realities and a keen understanding of what is important. What follows is an exploration of the world of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and the lives that these individuals choose to lead.

Since no-fault divorce laws were enacted in 1970, over 50 million American men have endured oppressive divorces initiated by their wives. Ironically, if not for the fact that females roundly criticize males who avoid the marriage commitment, it is the wives who are choosing to break their vows to more than one million men each year. These women are massacring families, instigating frantic disarray among loved ones, and derailing the expectations of innocent children, creating panic and a fear of the unknown.

Despite the fact that these women are to blame, few seem to criticize them for the heartbreak they are causing, or for using the power of the government to take money, assets and fees from spouses and, as is usually the case, to gain custody of the children. In the end, most husbands are left dumbfounded–without a home, support system or reasons to work and keep going. Their souls are ripped apart. They have been used up and tossed aside while ex-wives ease into government welfare and support programs that provide incentives and a motivation for women to divorce. In a fair and reasonable world, those who advocate equality would maintain that such blatant bias warrants protests and legal action.

Most Americans seem to think that marriage is a state of heavenly happiness. Unfortunately, those who seek such a blissful existence are unaware of or blind to the large numbers of divorced males who suffer in obscurity, staving off depression, anger, alcohol and substance abuse. Sadly, many have ended up homeless and committed suicide. The National Institute for Healthcare has found that divorce ranks as the number one factor associated with suicide rates in major U.S. cities. In the 1980s, a coroner linked the high rate in his locale with men's inability to cope with divorce.

Things are different on the other side of the gender fence. In contrast to the shameful way in which ex-husbands are treated–seemingly discarded like yesterday's trash–society protects, supports and advises ex-wives. In fact, it is astounding that divorced males can even remain healthy as they struggle to cope and emerge from the post-divorce darkness. For the luckier ones, they find their way to the brotherhood of MGTOW, wrongly declared as a hate group by the Southern Poverty Law Center after radical women's organizations made false and malicious claims about misogyny in its ranks.

In truth, the so-called bad apples are anything but. What follows is a compilation of selected anonymous statements from various MGTOW participants, edited, condensed and grouped by topic, that shows what this progressive movement is really all about:

Contrasting their MGTOW life with their previous married life

Everyone knows that married men are not allowed to maintain all their pre-marriage friends and hobbies. The married guys in my world are the loneliest and most miserable people of anyone I know.

"Lonely" is some guy in suburbia, whose wife has just exploded into an emotional rage and kicked him out of his own home. I'm not sure any of the women I've been with appreciate solitude like I do; they've always stirred up drama with me and my friends, and hostility between my extended family members.

I, like most men, have been shamed into being with and married to someone because that is what society wants. Am I lonely now because I am alone? Nope. In fact, since leaving the "jealousy in marriage plantation," I feel more alive and free to do and pursue anything I want to so long as it is within the confines of the law.

Talking about friends and relationships and being alone

I am single and have enjoyed the benefits of that for too long now to willingly give it up. However, that doesn't mean being sexless; it is now my choice as to whom, when and how. Why? My body, my choice.

The idea of living alone frightens most people, and MGTOW is often criticized for advocating a life of loneliness. But these are stereotypes. Bachelors in modern society often have the most active and wholesome romantic relationships available.

I have a very diverse network of friends–almost too many, really–so I'm hardly ever lonely. I have a lot of hobbies and, since I live alone, there is always work to be done on the house and vehicles. Nothing can be delegated. I'm so busy running my business.

Discussing their financial freedom

Financially, I am in control. I choose what to do with my money, where it sits–whether in cash or assets–how much is saved, and how much I am happy to spend. If I want to buy something–anything–and I can afford it, I do, because I don't have to seek permission nor beg forgiveness. My money, my choice.

Now I am 50, fit and happier than I have ever been in my life. I have a six-figure income, two properties, bikes and a truck, money in the bank, investments and more. As Barbarossa says, men are the prize in any male and female relationship. I would not risk my assets or waste my time with a woman to alleviate a perceived loneliness, or succumb to gynocentric shaming–that would be insane.

Sharing their philosophical outlook

Which is worse? To be alone, or to be trapped in a relationship with someone who is using you for your ability to provide security but won't return your love and respect.

Hedging against loneliness by getting married is like hedging against a toothache by playing Russian roulette–and you live next door to a dentist.

It's not men who are failing to live up to their end of the marriage contract; it is the social, financial and legal consequences of divorce that have been the real nail in the coffin.

Being unmarried gives me (near) complete control over my own destiny.

Any loneliness evaporates during the reconstruction of your mind and a reconstruction of the self, minus the gynocentric focus; instead, the focus is on self-awareness.

Talking about their lifestyles

Me, personally, I am a volunteer firefighter, so I'm always at the fire department, or I go to the gym and get my workout in. I participate in local political meetings and have become a mentor for the Boys & Girls Clubs. I volunteer at a homeless shelter and help people in need. Loneliness should not be a factor in any of this. I go camping, hunting, and fishing with friends. I put some aftermarket parts on my ride and take it to a car show and meet other people who are doing the same.

When I get home, I not only want to be alone, I most definitely NEED to be alone. I have a nice home, an awesome piece of land, views of the wilderness for miles, and animals, and no one is passing judgment or telling me how to live, how to look, how to spend my time or what intellectual interests or hobbies to pursue. I am far happier and more at ease in my own mind and space than I ever have been. When I lived with a woman or was going steady, I suffered their constant interference in my activities.

Conclusion

Unfortunately, the thoughts of tens of thousands of divorced men who have died from suicide, the millions who are homeless, or the countless others who are lost in a hurricane of booze or drug addiction, are missing. Without their words, all that remains are the courageous survivors of institutionalized abuse who have chosen to speak in their place. MGTOW individuals have earned doctorates in dodging bullets, surviving the underworld, and tunneling through the razor wire of divorce. They are ordinary men who have overcome extraordinary odds and have earned the right to speak above those who seek to shame, deny and distort.

For myriad reasons, the institution of marriage has failed and will continue to do so, leaving communities of ex-husbands in need of safety nets that should be as widely and as effortlessly available as those that exist for ex-wives. One day, your son, brother or uncle will be confronted with the darkness of divorce and in need of emotional guidance and assistance. If he connects with MGTOW, he can find help from those who have suffered through more social and institutional oppression than most women will ever know.

A bold and enlightened way of thinking is unfolding in the “manosphere.” Caring and knowledgeable males are opening their hearts and offering assistance to divorced dads and ex-husbands. It is MGTOW that has defined the right sort of survival strategies; they are worthy of being designated as the enduring safety net for the male casualties of marriage. Their trailblazing efforts to raise awareness of marriage and its impact on men is not only honorable but represents an ethical awakening and a vision for redeeming those who might in future suffer a similar fate.

*****

Article originally published by NCFM Member Tim Patten, The Lonely Single Men of MGTOW … (n.d.). Retrieved from http://ncfm.org/2016/06/news/mgtow/ncfm-member-tim-patten-the-lonely-single-men-

There is hope...

AVfM Video Source · 25 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dirtpatchheaven has these live shows where she does whatever and talks about whatever; and when she has guests, she calls these shows, “Braid Girls.” Today’s Braid Girls was a surprising topic about how to raise boys into men. Assuming they aren’t Advocates of Men’s Rights, they hit on many of the MRA talking points, and how women differ from men in regards to dealing with youth, and how men are treated.

Dirtpatcheaven

An Open letter to David Penberthy

Mark Dent · 27 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

> For those who do not live in Australia, here is a brief synopsis of the events referred to in the article to which I have responded.
>
> On a day in which a number of media figures and celebrities gathered at the biggest Football Stadium in Australia (the MCG) to raise money for research into Motor Neurone Disease, there was some on-air banter between a few football commentators.
>
> All of the celebrities were going to hop on a slide and plunge into an icy cold pool of water. There is a well-known female journalist by the name of Caroline Wilson. She has made many enemies with her nasty, take no prisoners style of journalism and a couple of those enemies joked bout the idea that next year Wilson could be the celebrity chosen to slide into the icy water. One commentator said he'd pay even more if she stayed under the water and another said he'd hop in and hold her under.
>
> These comments have led to apoplectic outrage from our politicians, social justice warriors, domestic violence advocates and feminists. Eddie McGuire was the main target of this vitriol. He was accused of inciting violence against women, and there was even talk of an official investigation of Triple M (his radio station) by the media watchdog. McGuire was literally placed into a re-education class with two of the most bitter gender bigots in our country-Rosie Batty and Phil Cleary.
>
> McGuire emerged ashen-faced*, chastened and deeply ashamed of his ignorant utterances. He now understood the error of his ways and would even donate a large sum to the White Ribbon Organisation.*
>
> The fact that an almost identical interaction about holding Wilson under the water took place in the 3AW box at the ground raised eyebrows. Wilson had laughed along when her friends at 3AW said they would push her in and hold her under. When questioned about the apparent double standard, Caroline Wilson said it was different, because she was present and could see the warmth in her friends' eyes as they said it.
>
> Melbourne has been drowning in an ocean of self-righteous accusations of men and their incitement of violence against women through their casual jokes and remarks.

*****

Hi David,

I am writing in the forlorn hope that you will respond to my genuine questions about your article titled, 'There can be a fine line between humour and menace in blokes' banter which appeared in the Sunday Herald Sun (26/6/16).

I am often left flabbergasted by the countless articles written by both female and male journalists who betray a profound contempt for the male gender. Your article today is a perfect example.

You begin by writing about a tragic case where a woman was drugged and raped on a ship cruise. You relate how the all-male staff on duty in your newsroom that day the story came to light, decided it was too confronting to be presented on page one of the newspaper as you thought female readers would be upset. So you placed it on page seven.

Apparently, the female journalists who were absent when this decision was made, opened your eyes to the fact that this was an act of unmitigated stupidity. The female journalists expressed the view the following day that the story should have been on the front page in order to shame the men and demand an end to such behaviour. You wrote:

> That day at work illustrated a great truth. Organisations are usually at their stupidest when women are shunted to one side. All male organisations are almost always incapable of making informed decisions and often behave like > ratty boys in a schoolyard.

There is just so much to unpack in this one stupefying paragraph.

May I ask first of all, why you would call what was clearly a sensitive, compassionate decision by a group of men, motivated by their concern about the impact such a terrible story would have on female readers, stupid?

Secondly, why do you immediately make the assumption that the opinion of a handful of female journalists was the correct one and one which spoke for all women, any more than decisions by a handful of male journalists would be taken as representing the views of all men? Do you automatically give way to any suggestions or ideas a female colleague may raise simply on the basis of her gender? Why is their view in any way more valid than the one held by the men? I am sure some female readers would have been offended or disturbed by the front page story.

By the way, David, would those same female journalists who made you realise just how stupid you and your mates were without their insightful wisdom to call upon, demand that the story about the mum who hacked eight children to death with a kitchen knife in Cairns, be on the front page of the newspaper too? Did they hope to shame all mums who have abused their kids or had the potential to kill them? Perhaps this shaming tactic is only meant to be applied to men. If the female journalists had decided the murdering mother story was too confronting for a front page would they have altered their view after conferring with male staff who had children?

Then there is another more disturbing tone to the paragraph. It is the fact that you happily write a couple of nasty generalisations about men and the way they operate as a group which you would never, even if offered the most substantial bribe, even think about writing about the female gender. You called men stupid, incapable of making informed decisions without the help of women and often guilty of ratty behaviour.

If you had made such observations about women, Muslims, refugees, gays or any other group of people you care to name, this article would now be the centre of a firestorm and your very job may be under threat.

This alone should underline the very sad state of our society. The fact that at a time where the dominant voices in our media, government and entertainment industry are very much orientated to the left in a political sense and very happy to preach tolerance, acceptance, and equality. We have a situation where an entire gender can be mocked, sneered at, ignored and belittled without a word of protest being raised by anyone but sad individuals like myself.

The very fact that you conceded that the comments about Caroline Wilson have received more column inches than the moon landing only underlines the absolutely ridiculous obsession our society has with women and anything perceived to be critical of them. Mark Latham recently dared to criticise Rosie Batty. Rather than being given a reasoned, well argued response from Batty; a Twitter and a Facebook-driven firestorm erupted, demanding he never works in the media again. If he had made the same comments about a male domestic violence advocate, there would have been no outcry.

McGuire makes a silly joke about someone he doesn't like, suggesting he'd pay more to see her stay under the water, and he has been torn to shreds and accused of inciting violence against women. If it wasn't so sickeningly bigoted and sad, you could view it as so absurd as to be hilarious. We now have a possible investigation by the media watchdog over comments made by Sam Newman on the Footy Show and Triple M. It is truly frightening.

We are forever told that women are the equal of men in every way. They are as tough, resilient, clever, capable, and innovative as any man and equipped with the leadership skills to match any man. This is certainly true in the case of some women. If so, why do we have such hysterical reactions every time a powerful woman is criticised, mocked or opposed? Men are routinely eviscerated by the media and general population without this ever being seen sexist, uncalled for or unfair. The attacks on men are usually greeted with jocularity and affirmation, regardless of how personal and nasty they are. Why the double standards?

Miranda Devine says it so succinctly in this brief exchange with a feminist known as Karl Stefanovic.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PMocgFDcAtM&ab_channel=Anti-FeminismAustralia

This reaction is, in fact, demeaning to women who claim to be able to stand in the kitchen with men and handle the heat. You then make the astonishing claim that accusations of political correctness gone mad are rubbish:

> You can say almost anything you like, really.

Really, David? Why not prove the truth of your statement. I personally think it's a load of tripe. You are confused. What you meant to say is that you can say anything you like about a man or the male gender without fear it will cause any negative repercussions and a strong chance you will be applauded and acclaimed.

But, David-you cannot say anything construed to be a putdown of women without expecting a huge backlash. Remember the scientist who said he couldn't work with women because he fell in love with them? He got sacked for this off the cuff joke. What about the men making jokes at a tech conference? They got sacked too. The jokes were told to one another and overheard by a woman. I'll even give you a man hating feminist perspective on the event.

Perhaps you recall the deliriously excited scientist reporting the news that the Rosetta Project had accomplished one of the most impressive scientific feats in our lifetime. They essentially moved a clunky machine from one speeding bullet onto another, by remote control, from 310 million miles away

But Matt Taylor was wearing a shirt covered in scantily clad comic book females holding guns. The shirt, by the way, was designed by a female friend.

All hell broke loose. Long story short-Matt Taylor breaks down and sobs at a hastily convened press conference and does his mea culpa for the outraged and offended feminists. Similar, I suppose to the countless apologies so many men have been forced to give even when there was nothing to apologise for.

There are countless examples of men making remarks about women which have caused outrage and demands for them to lose their job (which has happened) or give grovelling apologies. We have witnessed a number of those this week.

Do you want to understand the true irony of this Eddie and Caroline debacle, David? Here it is. Eddie did in fact, a little over three months ago, make a series of jokes about an actual victim of domestic violence. He and the other members of his Triple M morning crew laughed about the fact that a man had been stabbed in his testicle by an angry girlfriend. You will find the details in this open letter.

There was not one word of protest raised by any of the self-righteous, sanctimonious family violence advocates who are so willing to climb on their soapbox even when someone makes a silly joke about a woman. Here was a case of real violence inflicted upon a young man and no-one gave a stuff. As you pointed out, Eddie's joke about Wilson filled more inches than the moon landing. Where was the perpetually outraged Phil Cleary? Why wasn't Rosie Batty called upon to remind us of the horrors of domestic abuse?

Isn't there a sickness in the heart of our society? This is a sickness that seems to be invisible to all but the most observant. Sweet Lord, can you imagine what would have happened to Eddie and his mates had they joked about a woman who had had her genitals mutilated by an angry boyfriend? And you, David, say we can say almost anything we like. We can, when it comes to speaking about men. But what can we say about the female gender?

I have a challenge for you, David Penberthy. In your next article, I want you to write about women in the workplace. This is what I would like you to write:

> That day at work I discovered a great truth. Organizations are usually at their stupidest when men are shunted to one side. All female organizations are almost always incapable of making fully informed decisions and often behave like a bunch of bitchy girls in a schoolyard.

There can be no disclaimer or revelation that it was all just a joke or dare, just present it as you did today's bigoted piece. Let's see what flows from such a comment, my friend. You have nothing to lose, David, because you have assured us all that we can say almost anything.

You can demonstrate just how ill informed are those who say, the wowsers and the feminists will up you for the rent

Prove it.

Dr. Fred R. Kogen of CA, USA, “Traveling Mutilator to the Stars’ (Children)”

Gary Costanza · 28 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Fred R. Kogen of California has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the New York Times 12/96 “Mohel of the Moment:”

“He has done his thing at the Four Seasons Hotel, private tennis courts and Wilshire Boulevard penthouses and even appeared on the old “Joan Rivers Show.” His clients have included top Hollywood agents, directors, producers, Jake (Body by Jake) Steinfeld and Michelle Pfeiffer, a non-Jew who wanted “a nice little secular” circumcision for her son.”

From Dr. Kogen’s website ebris.com:

“About Dr. Kogen:

University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign – B.S. Biology and Psychology 1980 Phi Beta Kappa; University of Chicago Pritzker School of Medicine – M.D. 1984

Featured Speaker – Southern California Perinatal Educators Association

Thousands of Bris ceremonies and circumcisions performed since 1985

Stopped practicing as a general practitioner in 1992 to begin career as a full-time professional mohel. Has performed Bris ceremonies throughout Arizona, California, Idaho, Illinois, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, and Texas. Internationally in Beijing, Gibraltar and Hong Kong.”

So, the doctor quit his GP and now exclusively mutilates baby boys and gives lectures on perinatal education – kind of like a pedophile who gives speeches about how best to care for children. Except we pay him to do it using horrible cutting weapons.

Under “Goals and Philosophy:”

> I have a vision of what the ideal bris should be. The ceremony should have beauty, meaning and should leave everyone present with the sense they had been a part of something special. To attain this goal, it is my belief is that the ceremony should be as medically safe and non-traumatic to the baby as possible, spiritually uplifting and educationally enlightening. It should be inclusive of family members and friends; both Jews and non-Jews, > men and women. Whoever is important to my families is important to me.

>
> I encourage the introduction of elements which lend beauty and uniqueness to each ceremony. The ceremonial table should be covered with a lovely tablecloth, perhaps even the wedding chuppah. Flower petals scattered about the edge of the table and a simple short flower arrangement lend additional elegance. Any important family kiddush cups should be included along with heirloom items such as candle sticks or special talit. A few family photos in addition to mementos from the person whom the baby is named is another great idea. Finally, a letter to the baby composed by the parents and grandparents brings lasting thoughts to an otherwise short-lived but memorable occasion. These passages can be read to the baby at other significant moments in his life such as his Bar Mitzvah, wedding or bris of his own son.
>
> A properly conducted bris can be one of the most unforgettable moments of one's life and should always be a powerful and wonderful experience. It should reconnect us to our heritage as Jews and you as a family to those beloved departed, all of whom had a bris upon their eighth day of life.

If the doctor actually means it when he says "the ceremony should be as medically safe and non-traumatic to the baby as possible" he wouldn't cut, crush and amputate the baby boy's genitals, anymore than he would cut a baby girl's genitals. And as for the doctor's oath to "First, do no harm," I wonder why he would think it's no harm to a boy, but a great harm to a girl – why? Hatred of baby boys, or ignorance?

Read on to see how some in Hollywood embrace all the prenatal health concerns for mom and baby – no alcohol, no smoking, take vitamins – but allow someone to fondle and amputate part of his functioning genitals at great risk to him while violating his human and constitutional rights.

Under "Press Releases," from an article in the Los Angeles Magazine, Best of L.A., 7/99 "Expert Cutter"

> No, we don't mean hair. Dr Fred Kogen has helped soothe the nerves of hundreds of parents, both Jews and non-Jews, who opt for a circumcision at home. He is the only mohel in town to be named Cosmopolitan's Bachelor of the Month, and his mix of traditional techniques, age-old ceremony, modern anesthetics and pleasant bedside manner has made him a natural choice for such discriminating parents as Michelle Pfeiffer and Jason Alexander. "Dr. Kogen is very sure of himself," says one local pediatrician. "You want that in a mohel." And, no, he doesn't charge by the inch.

I think Cosmo would have named Kogen something else "of the Month" had he been proud of circumcising little girls.

And the article is correct about those "discriminating parents;" they protect their baby girls, yet happily cut their baby boys.

From an article in the New York Times, 12/96, "Mohel of the Moment:"

> He has done his thing at the Four Seasons Hotel, private tennis courts and Wilshire Boulevard penthouses and even appeared on the old "Joan Rivers Show." His clients have included top Hollywood agents, directors, producers, Jake (Body by Jake) Steinfeld and Michelle Pfeiffer, a non-Jew who wanted "a nice little secular" circumcision for her son.
>
> He is Dr. Fred R. Kogen (pictured below), and he is the most popular non-rabbinic mohel (pronounced moyle) in Los Angeles – meaning, for the untutored, that he is an M.D. who performs the bris, the natural circumcision of 8-day-old Jewish boys. Kogen, 37, works all of California but concentrates on Los Angeles, where there's a high demand for an attractive, surgically competent mohel. "I'm the alternative," he says, "to the guy who shows up dressed like a Hasid and should not be holding a scalpel." Kogen,who in his 12-year career has also performed brises for Hell's Angels in the Mojave Desert, says the celebrity event is a particular challenge. "At any bris, there's anxiety," he says.

> "People are holding their breath, watching you. But in L.A., Brandon Tartikoff is watching you, or whoever. I did the bris for the producers Wendy Finerman and Mark Canton, and, after, I'm outside and this guy comes over and says: 'A lot of that sounded pretty real. It was authentic.' And I realize, this guy is critiquing my performance. On, basically, a circumcision."
>
> For his part, Kogen respects, understands and, as it were, caters to his clientele. He wears a "not quite Armani" Italian suit, has call waiting on his cell phone and drives a Lexus. ("If the car's too junky, they think, How serious can he be?") He also takes the work very seriously and encourages his clients to do the same. "For everyone, movie stars included, it's a question of, How can I make this meaningful? So they try to make everyone feel involved – the relatives, people serving, the guy making the video, the industry connections."
>
> And, of course, the mohel. "I always get an excellent parking space," he says with satisfaction.

I hope the unfortunate boys circumcised by this overpaid genital mutilator one day use that Hollywood money and sue the doctor for numerous breaches of ethics and the law.

It really is scary how something such as circumcision could be so veiled in secrecy and ignorance as to become almost chic, no doubt because an infant can't fight back, ward off the attack, or sue.

From an article in Medical Economics, 6/92, "Hell's Angel Brit"

> "Brukheem Ha-ba-eem b'sheym adonai. Blessed are you who come in the name of God. " On a small wooden table in the living room, I had placed my instruments, two candies, and four glasses of wine.
> "The rite of circumcision has been enjoined upon us as a sign of our covenant with God, " I read.
> I introduced the godmother, godfather, and the sandek, who is usually the baby's grandfather, but who, in this case, was an older friend of the family. He was a strapping man with a dark bearded face, which began to grow gentler, I thought, as my words filtered through the room.
>
> 'Blessed is the Lord our God, Ruler of the universe, by whose Mitzvot we are hallowed. "
> The child was passed from godmother to sandek to me, and the room fell silent as I prepared for the critical moment. I gently placed the child in a restraint and asked his father to stroke his head. I looked up. Two enormous men, who probably see more blood in the local bar every Friday night, were breathing heavily and seemed absolutely white with anxiety. It's a common reaction, but the queasiness would soon disappear.
> Working quickly, I placed the small stainless steel clamp on the baby's penis between the foreskin and the glans and shut it tight. Then with one precise surgical stroke, I removed the foreskin. From the room, I detected an audible gasp. I removed the clamp. A tiny drop of blood, which is normal for the procedure, appeared. I dressed the cut with sterile gauze.
>
> Young Andrew didn't even cry.
> "Mazel Tov!" I cried.
> "Mazel Tov!" yelled the group.
> "O God, we give thanks to You for the gift of our child, who has entered into the covenant of Abraham. Keep him from all harm, and grant that he may be a source of joy to us and all his dear ones, " I continued. "Be with us, and give us health and length of days. Teach us to rear our child with care and affection, with wisdom and under- standing, that he may be a faithful child of our people and a blessing to the world. We give thanks to You, 0 Lord, the Source of Life. Amen. "
>
> When the ceremony had concluded, it was time, as usual, for the seudat mitzvah, the religious feast. The Talmud says it is a commandment to celebrate with a meal. What, I wondered, would be served?
> Within seconds, caps were being popped off more tall bottles of Bud, and someone passed around a tray of sandwiches. I took one, peeled back the white bread and found inside a slice of ham.
> "Just a little joke, Doc!" someone shouted. Then the room erupted into laughter.
>
> On the long ride back to Los Angeles, I thought to myself how the Brit Milah which I'd just performed is > God's promise that the Jewish people will continue to exist. Even out in the Mojave Desert, it was important to keep the lineage intact. With so many mixed marriages, a dwindling Jewish population, families feeling isolated from their community, it is imperative that the message not be lost. I imagined little Andrew all grown up. If he's lucky, I thought, he'll appreciate his faith. I had a funny notion of a young biker, screaming across the desert on his Harley chopper, dressed in black leather. And a beanie.

It's obvious this is a religious ritual and not medically needed surgery. As such, and in agreement with the AAP's recent warning about surgery on newborns, no person should be allowed to perform this risky surgery on unconsenting infants.

For another view from a reluctant sandek (person who holds the baby), watch this amazing guy tell you about his journey.

Under "Concepts: Circumcisions in General:"

> In contrast to many of my professional colleagues whom are mohalim/ot, I am NOT a strong proponent of routine non-ritual newborn circumcision. In fact, I have what I believe to be a "balanced" opinion regarding the benefits versus detriments of the procedure. For families who seek newborn circumcision for religious, cultural or traditional reasons, I see no reason to dissuade their decision to circumcise. But for others, their decision may be based on criteria I believe to be unfounded such as the desire to have the baby look just like his father or the belief that being circumcised is "cleaner". I feel that it is ultimately the parent's decision as to what is the best course of action for their children and I try to guide them to the best of my ability. I recognize that there are some medical and cultural benefits that can be obtained through the judicious use of circumcision but these benefits are not so great as to represent a compelling reason to circumcise all newborns as a matter of routine.
>
> There are risks too, most prominently excessive bleeding immediately after the circumcision, as is the case with any operative procedure. Other risks include poor healing, infection or damage to the penis, although these complications are extraordinarily rare especially when the circumcision is performed by a competent individual.

Sorry, doc, it's just not ethical to subject infants to permanent amputation of part of the penis "for religious, cultural or traditional reasons." What the doctor gets right is many who circumcise base their decision on criteria he believes "to be unfounded such as the desire to have the baby look just like his father or the belief that being circumcised is "cleaner."

But his colossal blunder is his lack of understanding that in the law there is a universal human right that every infant or adult, girl or boy, has to bodily integrity and protection from harm. That's why if he attempted to circumcise me he would go to jail.

Why do we ignore the rights and screams of these abused babies? Because an infant is no match for an "adult" wielding a knife. Dr. Kogen, pick on someone your own size.

And then "Young Children at a Bris:"

> I have always been uncomfortable about expressing my opinion regarding young children as guests to a Bris. I suggest but do not insist that young children not attend. I have been afraid of being accused of not liking young children… which is absolutely not true. I do however believe that a Bris is not an appropriate venue for children under the age of four. First, they have a limited attention span, nowhere near the range of 30 minutes necessary for the duration of the ceremony. Second, when they begin to fidget, play, speak, fall and sometimes cry, my concentration as a "surgeon" is affected. Third, it is probably not a good idea to have the newborn baby undergoing the ceremony exposed so early in its life to so many young children.
>
> Most parents would not think of bringing their 18-month-old child to a wedding, Bar Mitzvah or funeral. I am > equally sure they would never allow their children in the operating room while another member of their family was undergoing surgery. They would want the surgeon to be able to concentrate no matter how fast the procedure. Finally the dynamic of the ceremony is completely changed when there are several young children in the room. When a guest child speaks out or cries, all the guests turn their heads and focus their attention on the speaking or crying child and not on the family and honored baby where it belongs. As a result, the intimacy, spirituality and powerful engagement of the ceremony is disrupted.

>
> If there were several youngsters in the group, perhaps having someone watch over them in another room while the ceremony is conducted would be a good option. That way they could join everyone once the Bris was concluded.

Who ever accused the doctor of not liking young children – why would anyone think that?

Maybe years of cutting babies have gotten to the doctor in this odd concern he has for the ears (and not the genitals) of babies when he says "it is probably not a good idea to have the newborn baby undergoing the ceremony exposed so early in its life to so many young children."

Funny, all of a sudden it's "surgery" in an "operating room" instead of someone's living room ill-equipped for surgery. An "operating room" doesn't allow any relatives so let's not confuse this traveling surgeon's gig-in-a-bag with a sterile operating room. The risks of these house-call surgeries are unknown, as there is no data kept about fatalities due to circumcision, yet we suspect it is hundreds that needlessly die each year.

Under "Services," we see:

> Bris Bat
>
> On occasion I am asked to perform a naming ceremony for a newborn girl. This ceremony is referred to as a Bris Bat or Covenant of Daughters. The ceremony is embraced by Jewish families who affiliate with either the Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist movements, and is of equivalent relevance to the Bris Mila ceremony for boys… minus the circumcision of course! There is no active (positive) requirement (i.e. Mitzvah) to perform a naming or Bris Bat ceremony mentioned in the Torah as there is for the Bris Mila, but there is no prohibition against it. Therefore, in the interest of gender equivalency and active recognition of baby girls, the Bris Bat ceremony was developed concurrently in various congregations throughout the United States. Prior to the development of the Bris Bat, a simple naming ceremony was performed in the community synagogue one week after the daughter's birth during a Friday night (Shabbat) service. The baby girl would be brought up to the bimah after her father's Aliyah (or father and mother's Aliyah, depending on affiliation) and the Rabbi would bless and name the baby in front of all the congregational members.

Why is the girl's ceremony "minus the circumcision of course!" is there some hatred of boys that goes on here? Hatred of the foreskin? Why do they care, it's not their foreskin!

Under "Questions to Ask a Mohel" we read:

> What technique is used to perform the circumcision?
> Mogen Clamp Technique
>
> This instrument allows the fastest procedure time and is least traumatic to the baby, in my opinion. It is also a "kosher" method of circumcision, important if the family is observant or if an observant observer will be present at the Bris.
>
> Circumcision and Device Illustrations
>
> Does the mohel/et perform a "prep" on the baby? If so, exactly what does the prep entail?
> I do not "prep" the baby in any way, except for the topical application of ELAMAX anesthetic cream.
>
> The "prep" usually entails strapping the baby on a restraining board, cutting and clamping using the Gomco > clamp, then bringing the baby out for the ceremony, strapped and clamped, covered by a blanket so that the device is not visible to the guests. A final cut, necessary with the use of the Gomco Clamp, occurs later during the ceremony.

> top
> Is the baby restrained on a board at any time during the ceremony?
> No restraining board…
> unless the parents insist on its use. I feel that the use of a pillow is more traditional, less traumatic to the baby, works equally well and it allows the baby to be held in the comforting arms of loved ones rather than restrained by velcro straps while laying on a cold, hard board. Additionally, the board is inherently abhorrent to many of the guests and family members who watch the procedure being conducted. It scares them to see the baby restrained on a board.

So, you do use the restraining board, and you prefer the parents not see the mutilation started under the blanket; why not let them see this "powerful and wonderful experience?"

Under "Potential Complications" we read:

> Newborn circumcision is very safe in experienced hands. It is performed daily across the United States on thousands of newborn boys with rare complication.
>
> There are, however, potential complications with circumcision as with any surgery and parents should be aware of this remote possibility.
>
> Most common complications are:
>
> Bleeding immediately after the procedure.
> Bleeding several hours after the procedure.
> Poor healing.
> Adhesion formation.
> Infection.
> Extremely rare complications:
>
> Damage to the penis. This includes inadvertent laceration, abrasion, amputation, crushing or other trauma.
> Damage to surrounding area. This includes inadvertent laceration, abrasion, blunt trauma or other unforeseen complication.
> Uncontrollable profuse bleeding.
> (I want to emphasize that rare complications of circumcision occur once in several millions of procedures and is the type of risk that is analogous to the risk of being struck by lightning)
>
> What does this all mean to me?
>
> Complications are not necessarily the "fault" of the practitioner or mohel. Most times, a complication is a random event and easily dealt with. A well-trained mohel or physician should be capable of contending with most common complications. If a mohel tells you they have never had a complication in their career, they are either brand new at the profession and have limited experience as a mohel, or they are telling you an untruth. Given enough ceremonies a complication is to be occasionally expected. What one does not want to learn is that a particular mohel has a consistent history of complication with their circumcisions. Your best bet is to strive to hire a mohel, be the mohel a physician or non-physician, who has a lot of experience and a universally good reputation.

Complications are the fault of the practitioners and parents involved in this unnecessary surgery, and 100% of circumcisions result in varying degrees of scarring and loss of sensation. There are many other possible complications, including death.

Under “Instructions” we see:

> A. Purchase the following medical supplies for wound aftercare:
>
> Vaseline or pure white petroleum jelly in a tube – 2 tubes of at least 3.0 oz.
> Neosporin Plus Pain Relief Ointment or Mycitracin-Plus ointment – 2 tubes of at least 1.0 oz.
> 3×3″ or 4×4″ Sterile surgical gauzes (2 boxes or approx. 50 total gauzes)
> Infant Tylenol
>
> B. Preparations for the baby:
>
> Feed the baby until the ceremony begins. Dress the baby as you wish… just no snapped one-piece suits.
> Administer the Tylenol drops (Apap) 30 min. prior to the ceremony.
> Dosage: 0.4 ml = (1/3 eye dropper).
>
> C. Have a parking space for the Mohel (I keep emergency supplies in the car)
>
> D. Room Preparation:
>
> Large open room — Preferably dining or living room. Ceremony should be held inside.
> Because guests remain standing during a Bris, be sure to clear the room of coffee tables, chairs, etc. Please remember to raise the chandelier… if it is suspended low! Also, make sure that there is good lighting.
> Large table — sturdy, large, waist-high table (dining or breakfast table preferable, minimum. 4x4ft.), placed 3-4 feet away from a wall. Any shape, will do… No flimsy card or diaper changing tables please!
> Excellent light source and also… two tall tapered candles with holders. Please supply two red roses in place of candles, if the Bris falls on a Saturday. Please make sure there is plenty of light in the room and over the ceremonial table. I really need good light to facilitate a safe and successful circumcision.
>
> One chair for each Sandek. The Sandek sits during much of the ceremony.

In other words, try to transform your living room into a makeshift operating room while the doctor pretends it’s ethical and legal. Make sure he has that parking spot for emergencies/a clean getaway.

Then we see “Ideas to Enhance the Ceremony” which include “Sample Poems” and “Sample Letters.”

Let me add my two cents to the “Sample Letters” idea:

> I’m sorry I couldn’t stop the mutilation of my two step-grandsons; I did try, I voiced my concern.
>
> If my only daughter has any sons, I will be there to inform her, maybe ask her doctor to get informed and stop it.
>
> I will do what I can for those who are unprotected from unrestricted cutting and abuse.

Since Dr. Kogen has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Kogen’s practice information follows:

Phone: (800) 644-4479

Email: kogen@ebris.com

> Dr. Fred R. Kogen of CA, USA, “Traveling Mutilator to the Stars’ (Children)” https://t.co/S9pFNCYPd7 @AndreaHardie pic.twitter.com/S4qZm06THu
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) June 28, 2016

The birth of modern gynocentrism

AVfM Video Source · 28 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wUBzl-0UZyU&ab_channel=AnEarforMen

If you enjoyed this video and would like to see more, please subscribe to An Ear for Men

Patreon
https://www.patreon.com/anearformen?ty=h

Paul Elam Interviews Theryn Meyer

Peter Wright · 29 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Title IX and College Rape: A Series of Injustice

Jessica Denis · 30 June 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Title IX has been brought to the spotlight due to sexual assault survivors stepping up to tell their horror stories of not only rape but also a secondary rape of sorts. Many of these victims have to face their rapists every day due to the failing of universities and their complete inability to adjudicate these rape cases properly. How is it possible that this amount of life altering power has been handed to untrained university administrators?

The stories from college rape victims are absolutely heart-wrenching, and they are stories we all need to hear. However, there is another side to complaints that you may not have heard of. The other side is rarely spoken about because it implies that a woman may have lied about being raped.

According to some, just the mention of these cases causes victim shaming. The other side of facts can be a double-edged sword that could silence the next victim from coming forward to report the attack. The other side of facts and evidence will actually show you that sometimes the wrong person is accused, incidents can be filed without the knowledge of either party involved, sometimes complaints are filed out of vengeance, some are filed because "all drunk sex is rape," and occasionally, a false report is made.

When any injustice occurs, a victim is created. This series will tell you stories you may not have heard about, or may not have known that these victims even existed. Please keep in mind, that is not the basis for this series. This series is intended to show readers how incredibly inept colleges and universities are when it comes to rape complaints on their campuses. Also, hopefully sharing these stories will bring enough light to the severity of the issue, that a change might be inspired.

Title IX and Rape. I am sure there are some people reading this who had no idea it was even an issue. I mean Title IX is supposed to ensure that sexual discrimination is prohibited in any federally funded education program or activity, right? Why is the word rape even associated with Title IV? In 2011, The Office for Civil Rights put into place a "Dear Colleague Letter" which explains that discrimination includes the following, "Sexual harassment of students, which includes acts of sexual violence, is a form of sex discrimination prohibited by Title IX." The letter also states:

> Police investigations may be useful for fact-gathering; but because the standards for criminal investigations are different, police investigations or reports are not determinative of whether sexual harassment or violence violates Title IX. Conduct may constitute unlawful sexual harassment under Title IX even if the police do not have sufficient evidence of a criminal violation. In addition, a criminal investigation into allegations of sexual violence does not relieve the school of its duty under Title IX to resolve complaints promptly and equitably. A school should notify a complainant of the right to file a criminal complaint, and should not dissuade a victim from doing so either during or after the school's internal Title IX investigation. For instance, if a complainant wants to file a police report, the school should not tell the complainant that it is working toward a solution and instruct, or ask, the complainant to wait to file the report. Schools should not wait for the conclusion of a criminal investigation or criminal proceeding to begin their own Title IX investigation and, if needed, must take immediate steps to protect the student in the educational setting.

What this says in short form is that non-campus police don't matter to the university. Non-campus police evidence or lack thereof is irrelevant to a college or university because the standard of proof of guilt is not "beyond a reasonable doubt" instead by a "preponderance of truth." The standard of proof is lower because they aren't finding individuals guilty or not guilty of rape with criminal consequences. Due Process is a thing of the past thanks to the "Dear Colleague" letter. The university has a lower standard of proof because what they are adjudicating isn't actually impeding on anyone's actual freedom. That is what we are told. Until you dig deeper.

Take for instance the Title IX case of John Doe v. Boston College. The incident is described and documented in a Complaint filed in Massachusetts District Court. The Title IX case came to fruition after Boston College students were on a casino boat event for the school in 2012. According to the complaint, security guards on the boat detained him until they got to the pier. At that time, state police arrested him on the spot and placed him in handcuffs with bags on hands to preserve any evidence. He was arrested and put in jail for the weekend, and later released on bail. He was charged with indecent assault and battery and pleaded not guilty. A female student on the boat accused him of walking by and lifting her skirt, and putting two fingers in her anus.

His parents hired an attorney and a private investigator. It was forensically proven through both surveillance and DNA, as well as a polygraph, that he was innocent. (It was allegedly another man who was walking directly in front of him). All charges criminally were dropped against John Doe and also erased from his record.

However, at the school level, he was immediately suspended and kicked off campus. According to the complaint, no real investigation was done. No one was allowed to testify on his behalf, the school would not take his statement, allow the private investigator or attorney to speak or introduce the evidence. He had been suspended from school pending the outcome at the same time his due process rights were stripped. He had no way to prove his innocence without the facts of the case being presented.

The school found him responsible for sexual misconduct. He appealed and was denied. He was suspended from school for TWO years. His official transcript stated “Suspended for Sexual Misconduct,” he had no option but to wait out the imposed sanctions, as no other school would admit him with the branded record.

He went back to Boston College and graduated after serving his sanctions. At graduation, his father spoke with college officials, (also noted in the complaint) who stated they would do a re-examination of the case. That promise was not held up, and John Doe was branded a sexual predator, which every possible employer sees when they ask for his transcripts.

His life has forever been altered because of the inability of the college to follow through effectively or accurately. While technically he still has his “freedom,” his reputation and future employability are absolutely tarnished with a sexual misconduct brand; when according to actual evidence, he did nothing wrong.

Let me state again, I found 140 cases like the one above. The accused had his or her life ripped apart and destroyed by college administrators due to their mandate that has proven to be a complete sham. There are cases and cases of wrongful sexual misconduct brands on accused individuals that will follow them for life printed on their college transcripts, “Suspended for sexual misconduct” or “Expelled for Sexual Assault.”

One Title IX Complaint filed says that after the accuser admitted to filing a false incident report because she was “pissed off” when she realized that John Doe had rebuffed her, and because she thought John Doe was “just another douchey frat dude.” The school continued to prosecute John Doe. He was suspended for three terms for sexual misconduct and had to sue to the school under Title IX to attain any sort of fair resolve. His case was eventually settled out of court.

Lawsuit after lawsuit shows that women’s rape allegations are rarely actually investigated by colleges. Lawsuit after lawsuit also shows that when they are investigated, more harm is done than good. The harm of course first is to the victims. The majority of reporting statistics show that universities only pursue 1 in 12 cases of rape allegations. The victim’s cases that aren’t pursued are beyond appalling. However, that data isn’t readily available, because either the incidents aren’t reported to the university or the university drops the ball completely.

One experienced attorney stated to me, “Title IX needs to be repealed in its entirety because the Department of Education had twisted its reach far beyond its limited legislative intent. In the meantime, these due-process cases need to be pursued.”

This blog is part one in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication and clear lack thereof. These stories are very important to clarifying the extreme injustices happening on our college campuses. I hope you will continue to read the series.

If you have a story to add or input you would like included, please feel free to contact me.

Follow Jessica Denis on Twitter: www.twitter.com/jessicadenis10

Where Exactly is the Army Hiding Major General Mark Stammer?

Paul Elam · 1 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

If you have been following the stories of the persecution and wrongful conviction of U.S. Army Major Christian "Kit" Martin, you are most familiar with the name, Major General Mark Stammer; the architect of the recent PERSECUTION of Major Martin at Fort Campbell Kentucky.

It seems of late, Mr. Stammer cannot be found?

MG Mark Stammer – On his way out?

It has been rumored but we have been unable to confirm that BG Stammer has grown a mustache, entered the entertainment industry, and was recently cast as the lead in "Paul Blart, Mall Cop, Part II." Any confirmations or sightings would be greatly appreciated.

As several advocacy organizations have investigated and reported, including AVFM, National Coalition for Men (NCFM), Save Our Heroes, Military Corruption dot-com, and Investigative Reporter Bob McCarty; General Stammer has been identified as the architect behind Major Martin's false allegation circus of a courts-martial, and one of the primary individuals at the center of a Department of Defense, Office of Inspector General investigation, as a result of his retaliatory actions by orchestrating the courts-martial of Major Martin.

Recently, however, it seems as though Mr. Stammer is missing. Where did he go? Is it possible the heat in the kitchen is getting too hot, and the Army decided to hide him away someplace until the heat in the kitchen cools down?

Well not so fast, U.S. Army; there's an army of advocates out there calling for the head of MG Stammer; calling their congressmen, their senators, even their local animal catchers if it means holding Mr. Stammer accountable for his egregious miscarriage of justice.

Everything that everyone has been saying that is wrong with the military's current "witch hunt" of male service members is present in the case of Major Martin; which was directed by MG Stammer then enforced by his lackey goons in the Fort Campbell JAG Corps; primarily corrupt prosecutors Major Jacob Bashore, and Major James Garrett and peripherally involving Captain Shawn Atkins, Major Rebecca Farrell, Major Jenny Schlack White, and Captain James Banti.

With all of this heat in the kitchen, where exactly is the Army hiding MG Stammer? Is the Pentagon storing him away someplace to keep him out of the spotlight? Have the hundreds or perhaps thousands of those who have complained to their Congressmen or Senators, given Pentagon leaders a moment of pause and concern?

According to a Department of Defense Press Release No: NR-036-16, dated January 29, 2016[i], MG Stammer, who had been the Commander of the Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa since January 2015[ii], Operation Enduring Freedom, Djibouti, was to be appointed as the deputy commanding general, XVIII Airborne Corps and Fort Bragg, at Fort Bragg, North Carolina; but that did not happen.

According to a March 19, 2016 article[iii] in the Fayetteville Observer; based in Fayetteville, North Carolina, just outside of Fort Bragg, he was a last minute scratch.

Why?

In a sudden twist and according to a Department of Defense Press Release No: NR-088-16 dated March 15, 2016[iv], MG Stammer will now be assigned as the deputy commanding general of I Corps, based at Joint Base Lewis-McChord, in Washington state.

According to the I Corps website[v] they are a Joint Task Force that fully integrate other service components to conduct unified operations for the U.S. Pacific Command; however, neither Major General Stammer's name nor photo, or any information about him, appears on their website. Even a search for his name on their website comes up goose eggs; no press release, no bulletins, no nothing.

Could it be that this 'alleged" assignment is in name only? Could it be that the pressure of the DoD IG investigation and the overwhelming evidence of guilt has forced the Army to hide him away out of the spotlight until this all blows over?

We cannot read the minds of the powers that be in the Pentagon, but when you see a picture of elephant dung, it would be pretty safe to say that it stinks.

Elephant dung, no real resemblance to MG Mark Stammer, we think?

So where is MG Mark Stammer; exactly?

Perhaps those interested could email the Public Affairs Officer as Joint Base Lewis-McChord (JBLM) at usarmy.jblm.i-corps.mbx.i-corps-pao@mail.mil and ask that question; or a bunch of questions, or make a statement; politely of course. Aren't taxpayers entitled to know what exactly MG Stammer's 200K+ salary is being used for?

Is Stammer actually providing a service and doing a job for the U.S. Military, or is he being kept out of the spotlight, collecting a hefty salary while Major Martin languishes in a military correctional facility; deprived of his freedom, his family, and his dignity for crimes he did not commit?

Will Mr. Stammer be held accountable by the DoD, or will this be another example of sweeping this kind of misconduct under the rug?

Is this another example in a miles-long list of examples where the abusers, the liars, the actual criminals, and those who abuse their authority are rewarded; and those they persecute; the falsely accused are punished?

Isn't it supposed to be the other way around?

Those are valid questions.

Perhaps the readers may want to ask their congressmen or senators those questions? Maybe your elected representatives can get back to you with answers.

The military's sexual assault "witch hunt" is gaining momentum; meaning that the momentum is in the form of advocacy and the calls for the end of this nonsense is going viral. Too many witch hunts, too many examples, too many corrupt military commanders, prosecutors and investigators, too many Salem Witch Trials, too much suppression of the truth, too many destroyed servicemen, and too many devastated families, friends, co-workers and those concerned in the military are taking their toll.

Advocacy groups are doing their part, but the loudest voices are coming from those who are disgusted with the travesty of justice, and they are making sure their elected leaders are hearing them as well.

Advocacy isn't just the responsibility of AVFM and other groups; it is the responsibility of us all.

As an individual under whose watch a good majority of this is happening once said; "I have a pen and a phone, and I intend to use them." Well then; use them.

*****

i http://www.defense.gov/News/News-Releases/News-Release-View/Article/646918/general-officer-assignments

ii http://www.armytimes.com/story/military/careers/army/officer/2015/01/09/new-general-assignments/21521755/

iii http://www.fayobserver.com/military/general-officer-assignments-lacamera-set-to-return-to-fort-bragg/article_434cf9c2-5042-5f0f-95a8-0007a5b3c7f1.html

iv http://www.defense.gov/News/News-Releases/News-Release-View/Article/694035/general-officer-assignments

v http://www.lewis-mcchord.army.mil/icorps/

Canadian media uses AVFM for yet another threat narrative

AVfM Video Source · 1 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Can anyone tell us why the hell they bothered blurring out Big Red's face?

In case there is anyone left who doesn't know what this professional victim looks like.

Teach feminism to toddlers

August Løvenskiolds · 4 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

During summer days when most college students are away from campus, feminists take a break from faking rapes so that they can go hawking their books. After reading another literally depressing review of Jessica Valenti's humbragging Sex Object: A Memoir I was pleasantly surprised to happen upon author Bea Appleby's delightful article Why our 7-year-olds desperately need to learn about feminism. Bea, of course, is shilling for her own book, What is Feminism? Why do we need it? And Other Big Questions.

The world is full of evil and teaching the shortie/bambino set about incredible levels of self-serving hate in feminism is a sobering but important step in rearing children to appreciate the ways that feminists exploit both genders. In order to help Miss Appleby share her toxic fruit, I've prepared a syllabus of course materials suitable for all ages in order build a greater understanding of feminism in today's fully equal, multicultural education milieu.

Section One: Be grateful you are alive.

In this section, we will cover how feminists wanted to kill you even before you were born, and how they celebrate killing children like you by "Shouting their abortion" like Lindy West does. Students will be expected to demonstrate an understanding of why they are such burdens on their mothers, and how their very existence is ruining their mom's personal and professional life. This outcome can be considered remedial since many children learn all they need to know about feminism as they are scraped out of their mom's wombs.

Section Two. Why mommy got rid of your daddy.

In this section, we will cover how feminists destroyed fathers' rights in marriage and how it is now completely legal and okay for mommy to bring home a series of strange men rather than living stably with a loving, involved father. Female students will be expected to master hypergamy exercises where they learn to trade in one boy to try to get a better boy. Boys will be expected to tolerate all of this with good grace by working harder and harder to try to please the girls. All students will be expected to accept paternal alienation efforts by their "mothers" played by volunteer FOUS (feminists of unusual size).

Section Three. How mommy uses government to get money from daddy.

In this section, we will divide the class by gender, and have a "police officer" take lunch money away from the boys, then use some of it to buy candy for the girls. Any boy with no lunch money, or who refuses to surrender it, will be taken to a timeout "jail" for the rest of the semester. Boys will be expected to sacrifice their lunch money and watch while the girls eat the candy right in front of them. Any girl who refuses the candy, or tries to share it with a boy, will be punished for "fat shaming", "internalized misogyny," and "betraying the sisterhood."

Section Four: Why girls should dress like a little slut.

In this section, we will cover dress codes and feminist "slut walk" culture and how boys are not supposed to notice or even look at girls regardless of how the girls decide to dress. Although boys will be subject to strict dress and behavioral codes, for the first time boys will be allowed to volunteer to serve as "feminist allies" where they can hold the roll of duct tape as the girls prepare for their first junior slut walk through the halls of the school, or playground, weather permitting. Participation trophies, ice cream, and cake will be given to all the girls who comply. Girls who dress more traditionally will be given broccoli. Boys get nothing.

Section Five: How to fake that a boy has hurt you.

In this section, we will introduce "believe the victim" and reinforce chivalry in boys by having them sacrifice their well-being for a girl's whim. Girls will be expected to learn to lie convincingly and quote feminist phrases when being interviewed by authorities. Boys will learn to "man up" and apologize even when they are innocent. Girls will learn further to use boys' apologies as evidence against them.

Section Seven. How to master feminist mathematics.

In this section, we skip Section Six so students will learn how to parrot numbers without investigating the source of those numbers. Students will be expected to master a series of chants such as “One in four!” and “Seventy-seven cents!” We will also introduce the concept of “privilege mathematics” where we show how girls are always better than boys because boys are privileged. A fun “victim Olympics” will conclude the semester where students will learn the power of whining about imagined slights known as “microaggressions.”

Section Eight. Boys are stupid. Throw rocks at them.

In this section, we will teach girls that boys are violence sponges that can be punched or kicked to get them to behave or really, whenever a girl feels like doing it. Boys, of course, are punished severely if they hit back, run away, or report the abuse to a teacher As the author of the book explains, “Girls, here it is—everything you need to know about boys: 1. Boys come from the Stupid Factory. 2. Boys are pretty much smelly and useless. 3. It is possible to have fun with boys, however….. 4. If you decide to keep a boyfriend, he will need to be housebroken.”

As you can see, feminism needs to be taught to even the youngest of students so that they grow up understanding that when a feminist talks about “gender equality,” she is nothing but a goddamn poopy pants.

Feminist exposed on television

AVfM Video Source · 4 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I thought I recognized her voice.. yep.. It's her guys. Big Red is back!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2sE-uPu8dRA

Rekt Feminist Videos

Title IX and College Rape: A Series Of Injustice Part 2

Jessica Denis · 6 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The number of victims on campus continues to rise as not much is actually done about it. There is a pool of knowledge around the topic of Title IX and campus rape, but no one is really providing any actions. Victims of sexual assault are courageously speaking up; the Vice President has provided verbal support for one particular rape victim, yet no one is moving closer to action. No one is even discussing reforming the power to prosecute or not prosecute given to college administrators. The consequences are sexual predators remaining on college campuses, and lives of those who haven't done anything wrong absolutely destroyed.

Please keep in mind, this series is not to showcase "his word against hers," this series is not about rape victims, nor is it about other people who pay the price when colleges fail. This series is intended to bring light to a different fact base. Colleges are ruining the futures of young adults through their mandated responsibility, but a total lack of ability to adjudicate campus sexual assault cases.

In Part One of this series, I told you about a case from Boston College. A young man's life was ripped apart, even after being proven 100% without a doubt innocent, because campuses simply do not have the capability to do what the "Dear Colleague Letter" mandates them to do. Part two of this series takes us to a case atThe University of Kentucky.

From Court Documents:

> "Student A was never the complainant in the administrative proceeding with the University. In fact, after the incident in question, Mr. Doe and Student A continued to socialize, and she subsequently invited him to spend another night with her. Weeks later, an unidentified third party unilaterally reported the matter, and the University began to investigate."

Let that sink in.

Weeks later, someone anonymously filed a sexual assault complaint. Student A never considered what happened to be sexual misconduct. John Doe never considered the events to be sexual misconduct. They both admitted to drinking and they both engaged in sexual intercourse. Someone else decided that all drunken sex is rape, therefore it must be reported. The school decided regardless of what the two college students thought, and regardless of them both engaging in the same activities, John Doe needed to be punished.

John Doe was immediately suspended from campus pending the conclusion of this case. He lost his scholarship, and all pre-paid tuition, and his college transcripts are branded with the black mark of "Suspended for Sexual Misconduct" which will likely disallow him from enrolling in another school.

TWO YEARS of litigation. The University has conducted hearings, and John Doe has appealed. It was taken to federal court, and the University of Kentucky attempted to schedule another hearing on the matter. John Doe's attorneys filed legal action to stop them from having additional hearings. Student A filed her own Title IX complaint with the OCR against the University for the way it mishandled this case. This case still has not concluded; neither party has resolve, and no one can move forward completely.

Two lives ruined directly, families hurt, friendships burdened because someone else decided Student A was raped. At that moment, the person filing the complaint changed other people's life courses to serve their agendas and beliefs over those of the two individuals involved.

In a case against University of California San Diego, Jane Roe accused John Doe of sexual misconduct. In this case, she admitted that she did not object in any way to the sexual contact, and continued a sexual relationship with John Doe later in the same evening. A San Diego County Superior Court Judge found that the University conducted a hearing that violated the due process rights of John Doe. With those violations, the university missed vital evidence of Mr. Doe's innocence. It was determined that "that substantial evidence does not support the finding of non-consensual sexual activity," as well as "What the evidence does show is Ms. Roe's personal regret for engaging in sexual activity beyond her boundaries."

> "The Court finds the university abused its discretion in increasing sanctions after appeal without explanation. Petitioner's initial sanctions were the following: "(1) suspension for one quarter, (2) permanent no contact order, due to the potential for ongoing harm to the complaining witness, (3) a two hour sex offense/sexual harassment training with OPHD, and (4) counseling assessment with CAPS. When Petitioner appealed the decision of the Panel, Dean increased Petitioner's suspension time to one year, which would cause Petitioner to reapply to the University to be readmitted, placed Petitioner on non-academic probation, required Petitioner to attend ethics workshops, all in addition to the original sanctions given. Nowhere in Dean Mallory's email to Petitioner does she indicate the reasoning behind the increased sanctions. Petitioner then appealed to the Council of Provosts, who affirmed the decision made by Dean Mallory and the Panel. The Council of Provosts also increased Petitioner's suspension time to one year and a quarter, allowing Petitioner to return to the University in the Spring of 2016. The Council of Provosts also did not provide any reasoning behind the increased sanctions. Given the lack of rationale by both Dean Mallory and the Council of Provosts for the increased sanctions, it appears the increased sanctions are punitive towards Petitioner for appealing the decision of the Panel."

Further, the Court Ordered:

> "The Court finds that the hearing was unfair and that evidence did not support the findings. The Court GRANTS the Petition for Writ of Mandamus and orders Respondent to set aside its findings and sanctions issued against petitioner."

I asked attorney Michael J. Cox what changes we could begin to make for this situation to get better. His response was, "Nothing in the case law prohibits the (public) schools from granting full due-process rights to the accused, including particularly the right to cross-examination, but as I have observed in a brief, the colleges simply decide they are better off stiffing the accused than facing the potential wrath of the Office of Civil Rights by not finding the "correct" way." He also suggested if Kentucky State Universities were to apply KRS Chapter 13B(Kentucky's Administrators Procedures Law) with regards to the rules for administrate hearings, he believes due-process would remain intact.

I have heard numbers of 150 to well over 300 cases like these. Once the accused has been formally disciplined, yet prior to a hearing, the schools have a vested interested in finding that person "guilty" or as most put it "responsible" for the accused crime. The universities are mandated to take immediate steps to ensure the safety of the reporting individual. According to my own research, I've found the vast majority put the accused on immediate suspension pending the investigation and hearing. It is at that point that all hell breaks loose. These are not trained investigators. These are not judges or attorneys, and most schools limit attorney involvement to just simply being present. They are not allowed to have meaningful representation. At a minimum, suspension causes loss of tuition, missing classes, and branded with being a sexual predator; all before anything is investigated by anyone with true authority.

It is time to make a change. It is time to put all students on the same level. That is what Title IX is all about. It is time to start establishing a fair and impartial way to discern between rape victims and regret or drunken activities. The pendulum went from one far side to the other extreme far side, and now is the time to bring it back to center.

This blog is part two in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication and clear lack thereof. These stories are very important to clarifying the extreme injustices happening on our college campuses. I hope you will continue to read the series.

If you have a story to add or input you would like included, please feel free to contact me.

Follow Jessica Denis on Twitter: www.twitter.com/jessicadenis10

This article was originally published in the Western Jurnal and republished here with the author's consent.

The Gender Equity Boondoggle – TFF Episode 36

AVfM Video Source · 6 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 36 Professor Fiamengo discusses the Gender Equity Boondoggle that is burning money at Universities.

StudioBrule

Uncut Woman Who Cuts Baby Boys: “Bris Doctor” Dorothy F. Greenbaum of LI, NY, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 8 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“Mohelet” (like “toilet”) Dr. Dorothy F. Greenbaum has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

How do I know she’s uncut? Well, as a Jewish female her religion doesn’t target her for circumcision, plus it’s illegal in the U.S. And since most modern religions and governments actually enforce the law against neonatal cutting – for girls anyway – the doctor is most assuredly intact.

Although anyone who genitally mutilates an unconsenting infant is committing an unethical and unlawful act, people who do it to another while they themselves are intact are particularly heinous, especially if they’re the opposite sex. Most doctors in western countries that circumcise are themselves circumcised, so at least the circumciser has had a taste of his own medicine, but women who were protected from mutilation and enjoy intact genitalia because they were female and then have the nerve to promote and perform this amputation exclusively on boys are clearly misandric. Not only is she a genital mutilator, she’s a bigoted genital mutilator. In her mind, her private parts were made perfect, unlike those boys’ parts.

This is important because mothers – who are women – usually have the final say whether her baby gets circumcised. In non-circumcising countries the moms are doing their job, protecting the little ones, in circumcising countries, not so much. In these circumcising countries ignorance about male sexuality and genitalia continue to cause otherwise caring mothers to go along with this surgical “benefit.” Do some women, unfamiliar with a normal penis, think it icky when they see one? Are men insecure about their sexuality? Will some men do whatever some women want? Does that make some men think their son’s (or theirs) normal penis is faulty and needs fixing? In many ways women have the power to stop MGM. Here’s an excellent video of one of many who are making a difference.

From her Dr. Greenbaum’s website brisdoctor.com under “Welcome:”

> My Philosophy
>
> Your son’s bris should not be something you are afraid of and it should not be something you and your family do not understand. Everything that I say in Hebrew, I completely translate into English. Everyone present, whether Jewish or of any other background, will understand what is going on. Hopefully everyone will feel moved. The only one I don’t want feeling anything is your son — consequently I make the bris as painfree as possible!

To any sane, ethical person, all genital mutilators of unconsenting children are heinous individuals. But to be one of these monsters who then refuse to undergo the surgery themselves is the height of hypocrisy, bigotry, and discrimination. I'm talking about women who think it fine to mutilate baby boys who then – and rightly so – call it a crime when done to baby girls.

Reading on, we see:

> What is a bris?
>
> A bris is a meaningful Jewish religious ceremony, of which the medical procedure of circumcision is an important, but not the only, part. A bris takes your baby boy and and bonds him to thousands of years of tradition in the presence of family and friends. A bris can be a catered affair in a restaurant or hotel room, or a private ceremony with just parents and child. Regardless of its location, it is always a gathering with important loved ones at your side to participate in this commandment.
>
> Berit milah (circumcision) is traditionally done on the baby's eighth day of life. It can be done after the eighth day, but never before. A bris incorporates your baby boy into the covenant between God and the Jewish people. It is a symbol of God's covenant with Abraham and with all of us. It is a pledge of faith and continuity.

This is obviously a religious ritual, like a bloody sacrifice – but without the killing – and as such has no medical benefit, cures no disease, and treats no abnormality, making it unnecessary and illegal. All elective surgery for adults require written permission before any work is done, yet we totally allow this assault on baby boys. Why? As I've said before, it's mostly because an infant can't fight back, block the scalpel, or sue.

Next we read:

> Who should perform a bris?
>
> Someone very experienced in performing circumcision, who is certified by a Jewish Berit Milah Board. My personal feeling is it is a tremendous advantage for me to be a pediatrician and a mother, because of the importance of fast and gentle surgery.
>
> As a physician, I have the medical training that facilitates a fast and gentle circumcision. As a mother, I am motivated by my passion for a baby's comfort and safety.
>
> Is there anything wrong with a female mohel (a mohelet)? No! There is no passage in scripture decreeing that mohelets are illegitimate.

If this mother really was "motivated by my passion for a baby's comfort and safety," she wouldn't allow this harmful and risky surgery for no medical reason.

> Why did I become a mohelet?
>
> My particular passion for this ritual comes as both a pediatrician and a mother. I am the mother of a girl and a boy, so I have gone through this experience myself some years back and I learned from my own son's bris how to improve the experience for young families. (I was not a Mohelet yet when my baby boy was born.) It is my goal to make the bris as painfree and gentle for the baby as modern medicine can safely provide and yet maintain the meaning and feeling for all of us adults.

I don't get how anything like genital mutilation could inspire passion (maybe against it) in an informed, caring, ethical person. At best most parents think it a necessary evil that doctors say is the right thing. Well now the doctors are mostly saying it's not right.

And I'd like to remind the doctor that the infant with the genitals to be cut most likely would not agree to this at this time or ever, despite all the "meaning and feeling for all of us adults."

Further on:

> What are my qualifications?
>
> I am a Medical Doctor – a Board certified Pediatrician, a Fellow of the American Academy of Pediatrics, and have been a practicing pediatrician for 18 years. More importantly for you, I am a certified Mohel. I am certified by the UAHC (Union of American Hebrew Congregations) and the Central Conference of American Rabbis. I am also Vice President of NOAM (National Organization of American Mohelim/ot) and have been since 1993.
>
> All of us who are certified by the Reform movement must be doctors or midwives. The Reform movement will not certify anyone unless his or her medical credentials are unquestioned. It is our plan to bring the best of what modern medicine has to offer to our people in the twenty-first century as well as to preserve the meaning of our traditions.
>
> I have been a practicing mohel for five years, and have performed many hundreds of brisses, while still maintaining my pediatric practice in New York.

As a doctor you took an oath to "First, do no harm" and yet you continue to harm unconsenting infants for ritualistic or cosmetic reasons. As most of the world has figured out, infant genital mutilation of infants is wrong and it's only a matter of time when infant boys get the same protection as baby girls.

We read on:

> What are the medical benefits?
>
> Circumcision is medically beneficial. The recent AAP (American Academy of Pediatrics) statement reiterates the medical benefits of circumcision, which include: a marked decrease in urinary tract infection in circumcised male babies; a decrease in sexually transmitted diseases in circumcised adult males; and a decrease in penile cancer in men who were circumcised in infancy.

No medical society recommends routine circumcision of infants, and the AAP, to which the doctor belongs, has recently warned the medical community against performing surgery such as circumcision on infants. The medical benefits listed are either so rare (cancer) or easily cured (UTI) that routine surgery of all newborns is wildly unfounded and unethical. And to mutilate a baby boy to supposedly prevent some future imaginary STD is just ridiculous.

More from the doctor's website:

> What makes my bris special?
>
> When my son had his bris many years ago, I was excluded from the ceremony because I was a woman. I was also not fluent in Hebrew, nor were many of the guests. I was an outsider at this important occasion and had no idea what was going on!
>
> Now that I am a mohelet, I provide my families with a very different experience.
>
> I make sure that my ceremony is inclusive of all family members and friends present. I take particular care to explain and translate all of the prayers, and I explain all of my actions. I take steps to include family members of different religions and cultures when the bris is performed for an interfaith family. This should be a bonding experience.

I'm glad the doctor understands that many traditional beliefs and practices were wrong and should not continue. Like not allowing women to observe with the men. Like ritual sacrifice of an infant's foreskin.

And finally we see:

> What else do I do?
>
> When your bris is completed, I will present you with a handsome bris certificate for you to keep.
>
> Sometimes, families would like me to perform a traditional naming ceremony for their daughters after their son's bris. I am fully qualified by the UAHC to do this, and it is my pleasure to do so. I will give you a lovely naming certificate for your daughter at the close of the ceremony.

Is that certificate made of the baby's foreskin? Gruesome, yes. Exactly my point.

More importantly, the Brit Shalom naming ceremony for boys – minus the genital mutilation – is an ethical alternative. Read about a mom who did the research and left her son intact.

Since Dr. Greenbaum has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

The doctor has a Facebook page, and in a post there read about another uncut woman from the AAP promoting MGM. See me and members of Intaction protest at this doctor's home.

The doctor's practice information follows:

Pager: (800) 600-3022

email: mohelet@brisdoctor.com.

> Uncut Woman Who Cuts Baby Boys: Dr. Dorothy F. Greenbaum of NY, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/FJiJPKGzNR pic.twitter.com/c5JaLYejcp
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) July 8, 2016

Interview of Swain O'Pie, founding member of Father's 4 Justice

AVfM Video Source · 8 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Swain O'Pie is one of the founding members of Father's 4 Justice, a group of men who did stunts in Britain dressed as Super Heroes.

StudioBrule

Paul Elam in London at ICMI

AVfM Video Source · 8 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam and Steve Brule meet up on the eve of ICMI 2016 in London, UK. In the days ahead AVfM will provide updates and photos from the conference.

Damseling, chivalry and courtly love (part one)

Peter Wright · 9 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article is the first of a two-part series looking at the roots of damseling, chivalry and courtly love as fundamentals in the gynocentric tradition. Part two will look at damseling, chivalry and courtly love as it appears in contemporary feminism. – PW

GYNOCENTRISM

The dominant features of gender relations today come from old Europe in the forms of damseling, chivalry and courtly-love. Together they form the customs, in fact the essence, of modern gynocentric culture.

This holy trinity was crafted into a system of deportment by 12th century French and German aristocrats, setting a trend that spread to all the aristocratic courts of Europe. From those lofty parlors it filtered into popular culture, being transported eventually to the new world on the wings of colonial expansion.

The principle modes of transmission were expositions from upper class men and women; troubadour performances; plays; and notably a new genre of literature referred to as romance literature in which knights were celebrated for saving damsels in distress, and male lovers endured tortuous and trial-ridden tests in an attempt to secure a love bond with a beloved lady.

Nine hundred years later and romance novels remain the largest selling literature genre in the world, and we equally see the obsession with damseling and chivalry which dominate our politics, our societies, and our conversations over the dinner table.

In what follows, each of these gynocentric pillars and their historical roots will be summarized, along with references to the biological imperatives that give them their internal drive. Lastly (in part 2) an argument will be made that feminism today is nothing more, and nothing less, than a perpetuation of this medieval triad.

Let's take a closer look at these three elements.

Damseling

Damseling is a popular shorthand for women's projection of themselves as damsels in distress, regardless of whether the distress and the reasons for it are real or manufactured.

An excellent overview of damseling and its history was posted on Reddit in 2014 by author LemonMcAlister:

> We hear a lot about the "Damsel in Distress" trope and how it is both uncreative and damaging to women as a whole. The idea that a woman needs to be rescued by a valiant hero is held up as a sexist concept created by men who view women merely as a prize to be won.
>
> Would you be surprised if I told you this trope actually has a heavily feminist origin?
>
> In order to explain this, we'll need to go back in time about 1,000 years. In Medieval Europe, this was a time of rampant violence and wars with no other goal than material gain. Even long before the First Crusade, popular fiction took the form of heroic songs and epic poems much like Beowulf. They were sung in great halls and appealed mainly to a very masculine audience.
>
> One thing many people are surprised to hear is that early legends and stories of King Arthur are exceedingly violent, gory, and action packed. Knights routinely have their head split to the shoulders, warriors are killed on almost every page, and there is even a giant who has his testicles sliced off in a fight.
>
> The common understanding of Arthurian legend, however, is one of chivalry and courtly love. Knights fight for their ladies and for God. Love and romance is considered by most people to be a major part of the Arthurian stories.

The truth, however, is that this emphasis on love and romance, the idea that knights would fight to rescue a lady from a villain, is a later addition and was promoted by someone who can undeniably be called a feminist.

Eleanor of Aquitaine, born somewhere around 1123, was, as Wikipedia calls her, “one of the wealthiest and most powerful women in western Europe during the High Middle Ages”. She is well known for doing many “unlady-like” things such as taking up the cross for the second crusade, recruiting women from her court to accompany her, and personally leading her own army as a feudal lord.

What’s important here is that she is also responsible for the major and dramatic shift in the themes of popular fiction. Chrétien de Troyes, a poet of the late 12th century, is probably the most well-known writer dealing with this new type of Arthurian story. Some of these stories, in fact, were written for Eleanor’s daughter, Marie de Champagne.

Emphasis was no longer placed on Arthur nor did these stories focus on a thoroughly manly knight’s ability to split skulls. Arthur himself is used as a bit of a background decoration and is essentially a kindly old king that rules over his kingdom but doesn’t take much of an active part in the stories.

The focus of the stories was on love, romance, and the concept that chivalry should emphasize a knight’s utter devotion to his lady. Women also became more powerful. Far from being a prize to be won, they often helped their knights in one very important way or another.

In these stories, which are vastly different from earlier popular fiction, the love of a lady was the highest prize a knight could win, short of divine favor.

As society continued to change and we emerged from the dark ages, the stories remained immensely popular. There was no longer a need for savage and brutal warriors who could slaughter legions of people. Society’s focus was on cultural ideals such as courtly love, romance, and the chivalric service of ladies.

My point here is that the original Arthurian stories, and essentially all popular fiction of the time, treated women as nothing more than a means to social, economic, and political advancement. The stories hardly ever included women and those that were present never played a significant role in the narrative.

It wasn’t until Eleanor’s reign, and the influence she had on popular fiction, that we see the development of the “Damsel in Distress” trope. This trope, however, was created because it appealed to women. It was an effort to include women in the enjoyment of popular fiction and marked a major change in society’s values.

No longer were women merely an object, they were the entire motivation. No longer were they seen as merely a means to an end, they were the very focus of the story itself.

The “Damsel in Distress” trope is far from a misogynistic effort to treat women as prizes and is actually a result of the increased power and influence women were gaining during Eleanor’s reign. It has continued to remain a popular story telling device because it appeals to both sexes by presenting an idealized view, both of society and what a hero’s motivation should be.

The hero rescues the woman, placing himself in mortal danger, for love and love alone. Had we remained with the male dominated form of story-telling, the hero would rescue the damsel because marrying her would allow him to muster a larger army with which he could violently murder his chosen enemies. The woman’s desire to be married to the hero would not factor into the equation at all.

Damsels are in distress because there is an extremely high value placed on them and they are, in many ways, the entire motivation for the hero and the story itself. The hero rescues the damsel because he is motivated by love, not by a desire to possess a prize.

The trials he goes through are tests not of his strength and masculinity but of his overpowering love for the damsel.

The damsel is, in other words, far more important than the hero.

As indicated in that summary, the chief goal of damseling is to evoke chivalric behaviors in men. The biological drive underpinning it is our urge to protect and provide for children, behavior which is triggered by juvenile characteristics such as a rounded forehead, large eyes, and most importantly helplessness.

As elaborated in a previous article, women have been taught from generation to generation to mimic juvenile characteristics via the use of makeup and vocal tonations, along with a feigning of distress typical of children — which collectively works to extract utility from men. While women are capable of solving most of their own problems and providing for their own needs and wants, many have cultivated a posture of helplessness, damseling their way out of doing the dirty, dangerous or stressful work required to achieve those goals.

Why exert yourself when men can be manipulated to do it for you?

Chivalry

Different definitions have been attached to the word chivalry throughout history. To make matters more confusing, encyclopedic overviews tend to blend those different meanings into an ungainly synthesis, making the job of teasing out distinctive meanings more difficult.

While there are differing definitions, the most common use of the term today is the one we need to describe. That job is made easy by modern dictionaries in which chivalry is given two separate and radically different definitions – a contemporary definition and an archaic, largely obsolete one:

> ► 1. very polite, honorable, and generous behaviour, especially by men towards women
> ► 2. the system of behaviour followed by knights in the medieval period of history, that put a high value on honour, knightly skill, and martial valor.[1]

The first is the definition we are concerned with here. To be sure, chivalry has been a woman-centered enterprise for close to a millennium, and early accounts such as that by Walter Scott in the year 1818 render the meaning clear:

> "The main ingredient in the spirit of Chivalry, second in force only to the religious zeal of its professors, and frequently predominating over it, was a devotion to the female sex, and particularly to her whom each knight selected as the chief object of his affection, of a nature so extravagant and unbounded as to approach to a sort of idolatry.
>
> "Amid the various duties of knighthood, that of protecting the female sex, respecting their persons, and redressing their wrongs, becoming the champion of their cause, and the chastiser of those by whom they were injured, was represented as one of the principal objects of the institution. Their oath bound the new-made knights to defend the cause of all women without exception ; and the most pressing way of conjuring them to grant a boon was to implore it in the name of God and the ladies. The cause of a distressed lady was, in many instances, preferable to that even of the country to which the knight belonged.
>
> "The defence of the female sex in general, the regard due to their honour, the subservience paid to their commands, the reverent awe and courtesy, which, in their presence, forbear all unseemly words and actions, were so blended with the institution of Chivalry as to form its very essence. But it was not enough that the "very perfect, gentle knight," should reverence the fair sex in general. It was essential to his character that he should select, as his proper choice, "a lady and a love," to be the polar star of his thoughts, the mistress of his affections, and the directress of his actions. In her service, he was to observe the duties of loyalty, faith, secrecy, and reverence. Without such an empress of his heart, a knight, in the phrase of the times, was a ship without a rudder, a horse without a bridle, a sword without a hilt ; a being, in short, devoid of that ruling guidance and intelligence, which ought to inspire his bravery, and direct his actions.

Note the references to protecting the female sex and of redressing their wrongs as hallmarks of chivalry, with men going even so far as to believe the cause of a distressed lady is preferable to that of the nation to which he belonged.

But that protection, provision and adoration is only one half the story — the other half being fulfilled by the damsel in distress. The damsel represents the vulnerable and needy child who pulls on parental heartstrings, behavior provoking the parental brain state referred to by neurobiologists. Chivalry is shorthand for the parental brain state by which men are moved to protect, provide for and adore an adult disguised as a child.

Courtly love

Courtly love, which was later called romantic love, is the program of cultivating deference of men toward women. It was born as a twofold movement beginning with a social shaming of men for bad behaviors, followed by a proposal that men could atone for bad behavior by worship of women through a new code of love.

The idea was launched by powerful women of the medieval aristocracy who cited the worst behaviors of the most unruly males and extrapolated those behaviors to the entire gender. Knights were particularly singled out – much like today's sporting heroes who display some kind of faux pas – and used as examples of distasteful male behavior requiring the remedy of sweeping cultural reform.

During that time of (supposedly) unruly males, uneducated squires were said to ride mangy horses into mess halls, and rude young men diverted eyes from psalters in the very midst of mass. Among the knights and in the atmosphere of tournaments occasional brawls with grisly incidents occurred – a cracked skull, a gouged eye – as the betting progressed and the dice flew. Male attention to clothing and fashion was said to be appalling, with men happy to go about in sheep and fox skins instead of clothes fashioned of rich and precious stuffs, in colours to better suit them in the company of ladies. And perhaps worst of all were their lack of refinement and manners toward women which was considered reprehensible.

The solutions to the 'male problem' was posed by the French Countess Marie, daughter of Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine. Historian Amy Kelly tells;

> "Marie organized the rabble of soldiers, fighting-cocks, jousters, springers, riding masters, troubadours, Poitevin nobles and debutantes, young chatelaines, adolescent princes, and infant princesses in the great hall of Poitiers. Of this pandemonium the countess fashioned a seemly and elegant society, the fame of which spread to the world. Here was a woman's assize to draw men from the excitements of the tilt and the hunt, from dice and games, to feminine society, an assize to outlaw boorishness and compel the tribute of adulation to female majesty."[2]

Marie was among the first of a long line of reformers to usher in a gynocentrism whose aim was to convince men of their shared flaws and to prescribe romantic love and concomitant worship of females as the remedy. The remedy was referred to as love service.

Love service involved the positioning of women as men's superiors along with a series of prescribed behaviors for demonstrating the sexual hierarchy in male-female interactions. The meta-rules for those interactions can be found in troubadour poetry and in the book The Art of Courtly Love by Andreas Capellanus, who wrote it under direction from Marie in 1188 AD.

The love service at the core of courtly love replicates feudal relations between vassals or serfs and their overlords. The feudal template was transferred wholesale into love relationships whereby each women came to be approached as a quasi 'lord' in each male-female relationship.

Sandra Alfonsi elaborated the feudalistic elements of courtly love in her book Masculine Submission in Troubadour Lyric:

> The troubadours lived and functioned within a society based on feudalism. Certain ones were themselves feudal lords; others were liegemen dependent on such lords for their sustinence. The troubadours who were > members of the clergy were also actively involved in this feudal society. It is only natural that their literature reflect some traits of the age in which it was created. Scholars soon saw striking parallels between feudalistic practices and certain tenets of Courtly Love. The comparisons lie in certain resemblances shared by vassalage and the courtly "love service." Fundamental to both was the concept of obedience. As a vassal, the liegeman swore obedience to his lord. As a courtly lover, the poet chose a lady to whom he was required to swear obedience. Humility and obedience were two concepts familiar to medieval man, active components of his Weltanschauung. Critics, such as Erich Kohler, have found them exhibited in both the life and literature of that time.

>
> The entire concept of love-service was patterned after the vassal's oath to serve his lord with loyalty, tenacity, and courage. These same virtues were demanded of the poet. Like the liegeman vis-a-vis his sovereign, the poet approached his lady with fear and respect. Submitted to her, obedient to her will, he awaited a fief or honor as did the vassal. His compensation took many forms: the pleasure of his lady's company in her chamber or in the garden; an avowal of her love; a secret meeting; a kiss or even le surplus, complete unity. Like the lord, the woman who was venerated and served was expected to reward her faithful and humble servant.
>
> The similarities between courtly service and vassalage are indeed striking. Although of a more refined character than an ordinary vassal, the poet-lover is portrayed as his lady's liegeman, involved in the ceremony of homage and pictured at the moment of the immixtio manuum. His reward for faithful service will doubtlessly include the osculum.
>
> The influence of feudalism upon courtly love was, in my opinion, twofold: it provided the poets with a well-organized system of service after which they might pattern their own; it furnished them with a highly developed vocabulary centered around the service owed by a vassal to a lord. Feudalistic vocabulary was comprised of certain basic terminology indicative of the ties which legally bound a man to his lord in times of peace and war.[3]

Evolutionary Psychologist Don A. Monson paints a similar picture

> This configuration of unequal power is the central feature of the poet-lover's positioning of himself with regard to the love object. Drawing on the stratification and class-consciousness of medieval society, the canso describes primarily in terms of social hierarchy the woman's psycho-sexual power to determine the outcome of the relationship. Thus the troubadour's lady is regularly portrayed in terms denoting aristocracy, such as "noble" rica, franca or "high born" de bon aire, de aut paratge, whereas the poet stresses his own subordination, describing himself as "humble" umil, umelian, "submissive" aclin, and "obedient" obedien. The culmination of this tendency is one of the most pervasive images of troubadour poetry, the "feudal metaphor," which compares the relationship of the lover and his lady to that which obtains between a vassal and his lord.
>
> The poet-lover presents himself to his lady in an attitude of feudal homage omenatge, "kneeling" a/degenolhos with "hands clasped" mans jonchas. He declares himself to be his lady's "man" ome or "liege man" ome lige and refers to the lady as his "lord" senhor, midons. He asks her to "retain" retener him as her "servant" ser, servidor or to take him into her "service" servizi. According to a military variant of the feudal metaphor, the lover "surrenders" se rendre to the lady, declaring himself "vanquished" vencut or "conquered" conques, and asks for her "mercy" merce.[4]

As described by Alfonsi and Monson, the demands of courtly love bespeak unbalanced power relationships, ones that engender vulnerability in the male supplicant along with an experience of a fragile pair-bonding that hovers in the realm of tantalizing.

In terms of our biological drives, courtly love captures the imperative for a strong, reliable pair-bonding experience, albeit one that remains maddeningly difficult to gain and maintain in the face of the convoluted conventions of courtly love.

The biological and cultural complexity covered above can be summarised in a few short lines;

Damseling is the cultural codification of neoteny.
Chivalry a cultural codification of the parental brain.
Courtly love is the codification of tantalizing pairbonds.

Part two of this series will look at how this holy trinity reappears in feminist ideology and activism.

References:

[1] Combination of Cambridge and Miriam-Webster dictionary definitions.
[2] Amy Kelly, Eleanor of Aquitaine and Her Courts of Love, Source: Speculum, Vol. 12, No. 1
[3] Sandra Alfonsi, Masculine Submission in Troubadour Lyric, 1986
[4] Don A. Monson, Why is la Belle Dame sans Merci?, Neophilologus 2011; 95: 523.

Public money wasted on domestic violence organisations

Bettina Arndt · 9 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

For years now, all the key players in our well-orchestrated domestic violence sector have been singing from the same page, happily accepting government money to promote the idea that domestic violence is all about dangerous men terrorizing their partners. Malcolm Turnbull is on record boasting that the government is spending "hundreds of millions" of dollars on domestic violence – a tribute to the grip this powerful lobby group has on this country.

But now a few cracks are appearing. Recently an extraordinary article was published in The Daily Telegraph, written by Nina Funnell who has built her career on being a domestic violence "survivor."

In her article entitled: "Why you should never give a cent to White Ribbon," Funnell took issue with the suggestion that Eddie McGuire should be required to donate $50,000 to White Ribbon as penance for his remarks about Caroline Wilson. Funnell said that she and many other survivors won't give a cent to White Ribbon which is just a "fundraising club that made some blokes and a whole lot of politicians feel good."

It's just a redemption industry, suggests Funnell. "The reality is that much of White Ribbon's $3.7 million revenue is spent on self-congratulatory feel-good talk-fests and various other empty virtue signalling initiatives."

Very little of the White Ribbon's "sorry money" is spent on services like domestic violence shelters says Funnell who has served on the boards of organizations supporting the shelters.

Given that such shelters continue to cry poor, it's about time someone asked where all Turnbull's hundreds of millions are going. The answer is not just White Ribbon but the multitude of government-funded domestic violence organizations like OurWatch, DV Connect, ANROWS, Domestic Violence Victoria. The list is endless. What started out as a sensible campaign to raise money for an important cause – providing support for battered women – has morphed into a huge propaganda industry determined to promote a simplistic male-blaming perspective on this complex social issue.

Support for the shelters gets remarkably little attention from the powerful female bureaucrats running these thriving organizations which downplay statistics demonstrating women's role in family violence and promote the myth that the only way to tackle domestic violence is through teaching misogynist men (and boys) to behave themselves. Never mind that this flies in the face of the huge body of research showing most family violence involves aggression from both partners and that sexist attitudes are not a major risk factor for DV in Western countries like Australia.

The femocrats face a herculean task denying the reality we see all about us about the real issues which underpin domestic violence in this country – including alcohol, mental illness and poverty. "Violence against women does not discriminate, regardless of ethnicity, social status and geography," pronounced Natasha Stott Despoja, Chair of OurWatch, a lobby group receiving up to two million annually in government grants.

Oh yes it does, Natasha. Just look at the neat little map produced by the NSW Bureau of Crimes Statistics showing prevalence of DV offences across the state. The rate of domestic violence offences in Dubbo and Bourke is 60 times higher than Sydney's North Shore or Eastern suburbs. (http://bit.ly/1KxZQ9X)

DV Assault Rates – 2015

The lobby groups keep themselves busy preparing fudged statistics and cherry-picked research findings to counter evidence produced by the few brave experts who still dare speak out about the damage being caused by this narrow perspective. Like Professor Jim Ogloff, a world-renowned researcher on violence who's now in charge of research at the Victorian Institute of Forensic Mental Health. Ogloff warned the Victorian Royal Commission that the message being conveyed to the public is too simplistic, that it is misleading to suggest DV is caused by patriarchal attitudes, that at least a third of family violence cases involve violent women, that the literature on family violence shows high levels of violence in both male and female partners and that the message should be that all violence in relationships is unacceptable, irrespective of gender.

Ogloff explained that the Victorian family violence sector feared that recognising other potential causes of violence could "cause a shift in funding away from programmes directed at gender inequity," but he stressed it was wrong to focus exclusively on one aspect of abuse "when family violence involves a complex array of behaviours." Ogloff's sensible words were drowned out by the flood of propaganda from the industry and naturally sank without a trace in the final report.

There's been an amusing post-script to the Nina Funnell article with CEO of White Ribbon Libby Davies leaping into print to say White Ribbon is more than a feel-good boys' club. On the contrary White Ribbon is in the business of prevention, of "stopping violence before it occurs," said Davies. And she spelt that out very clearly: "Our remit is to stop the violence at the source and the source is men." That led to a fiery exchange with Tom Elliot on 3AW where he called her out on her "shameless, offensive lie" that the problem is all men.

That's not the only lie, of course. White Ribbon is notorious for fudging statistics. I wrote last year about the blatant misrepresentation of research by the group's head of research and policy Michael Flood, in particular the claim that 1 per cent of boys thought it was ok to hit a girl. In fact that is the proportion who believe it is a big deal when a girl hits a guy – almost all young men say males hitting females is unacceptable, as Flood later acknowledged.

Nina Funnell's objection to White Ribbon is that it does nothing to help survivors and allows dangerous men to make amends and excuse their own behavior. The real concern should be that so many good men have been hoodwinked into supporting a male-bashing organization which shows no interest in addressing the real causes of this worrying social issue.

Source: Article first published in The Australian on July 9, 2016.

Sage Gerard on the Eve of ICMI 2016, London, UK

AVfM Video Source · 9 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I met with Sage Gerard on the eve of ICMI 2016 at the Excel Conference center in London, UK

StudioBrule

Paul’s ICMI’16 Speech on Gynocentrism

AVfM Video Source · 10 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Image credit CC 2.0 Gavin Whitner https://www.flickr.com/photos/156466858@N02/31265224167/

An Ear for Men

Janet Bloomfield Arrives in London for ICMI 2016

AVfM Video Source · 10 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Anil Kumar on the eve of ICMI 2016

AVfM Video Source · 10 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Anil Kumar from India arrives at ICMI 2016 in London, UK

Doctor Radomercam on the eve of ICMI 2016

AVfM Video Source · 10 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Steve Brule interviews Mike Stephenson, aka Doctor Randomercam, on the eve of ICMI 2016, London

Post-Red Pill Flashback: 1953

Doug Mortimer · 11 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I recently attended a screening of How to Marry a Millionaire, a 1953 movie in which three of the era's renowned screen sirens, Marilyn Monroe, Betty Grable, and Lauren Bacall, go on the prowl for rich husbands. It's arguably the most straightforward depiction of gold-digging in cinema history. Yet during the pre- and post-film Q and A, no one made any objections (granted, it was an older crowd) to the film's merciless portrayal of mercenary females or even mentioned it. Though central to the film's plot and theme, hypergamy was not worthy of comment. Apparently, the concept is as entrenched in the modern cultural woodwork as it was in 1953. Well, what can you say except the more things change, the more they stay the same.

Well, times have certainly changed since 1953 (duh!), but How to Marry a Millionaire got me thinking. I pulled out some movie history books and took a look back at some other films that were released that year. What might appear to be a random assortment of good, bad, and mediocre films to a contemporary blue-pill man is a treasure trove of revelations to a red-pill man.

Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, for example, has a lot in common with How to Marry a Millionaire. Once again, Marilyn Monroe is out to snag a rich husband, but this time, she has just one partner in crime, Jane Russell (film critic Andrew Sarris characterized Monroe and Russell as "pagan goddesses of protuberance, fore and aft"). In one of the movie's most famous scenes, Monroe croons the hypergamous "Diamonds Are a Girl's Best Friend." This was an appropriate time for Monroe to dig that gold because she turned 27 in 1953, and "Men grow cold as girls grow old," according to the song lyrics. Russell prefers a different sort of alpha male, the buff, square-jawed type (a case of art imitating life, as she was married to Los Angeles Rams quarterback Bob Waterfield). Her big musical number is "Ain't Anyone Here for Love?" a bizarre set-piece in which she slinks her way among a group of scantily clad Olympic athletes working out and totally oblivious to her presence. I wouldn't be surprised if this scene didn't enjoy some sort of cult reputation in homosexual circles.

Speaking of musical numbers, 1953 also offered Kiss Me Kate, a musical version of The Taming of the Shrew. I've got to believe this movie could never be made today. You might as well try to fund a remake of Birth of a Nation.

So women behaving badly was much in evidence on screens in 1953. Curiously, MGTOW, a key post-red-pill response was also front and center in three prominent movies that year, though the acronym was decades away from being coined. The most honored film (eight Academy Awards, including Best Picture) was From Here to Eternity. It has a lot to say about male disposability, male mother need, physical courage, and MGTOW. "If a man don't go his own way, he is nothing," declares dogface Robert E. Lee Prewitt (Montgomery Clift). Well, said, Private MGTOW…but the U.S. Army probably isn't the ideal arena for carrying out that plan.

Another film with military ambiance was Stalag 17. As difficult as life was for Montgomery Clift, it was no easier for William Holden (Oscar for Best Actor) as a MGTOW hemmed in by Allied POWs in a Nazi prison camp. As a black marketeer dealing with both his captors and his fellow POWS, he becomes the likely suspect when it becomes obvious that someone in the barracks is a spy for the Nazis. As with Montgomery Clift, he is not in the best environment to activate a MGTOW lifestyle, but he does have the last laugh.

One of the most prominent MGTOW movies ever, Shane is often described as a classic, albeit self-consciously so. Shane is a former gunfighter, the perfect profession (indeed, almost the perfect metaphor) for a man going his own way. Nevertheless, he parks his pistol and goes to work as a hired hand for a pioneer family, only to return to his lethal ways to defend them, and by extension, the community. Realizing he can never fit into the tight-knit pioneer community, he rides away and makes a U-turn towards MGTOWism. The message is that a MGTOW can sometimes be quite useful to the collective. If he's willing to do the dirty work for the group, he won't be shamed. You can almost imagine a gunman holding up a sign saying "MGTOW for hire…will kill for food."

Compare and contrast Shane to Hondo. According to film historian William K. Everson, Hondo is "the best John Wayne vehicle not made by John Ford." This time around the MGTOW comes to the aid of a single mother, albeit a pioneer woman with considerably more life skills than her modern counterpart. Unlike Shane, however, Hondo "mans up" and doesn't ride away. Since he's the killer of the woman's husband (admittedly, not a credit to his gender), he can't just shrug and ride away. Not that he's pussy-whipped. After all, this is a 1950s John Wayne movie, so traditional masculine virtues are front and center.

If you're into a man's-gotta-do-what-a-man's-gotta-do movies, then The Wages of Fear, the only foreign film in this survey, is for you. This French film deals with four desperate men doing dangerous – very dangerous – work, namely driving trucks laden with nitroglycerine over rough roads in a remote region of South America. Full-frontal male disposability is the theme here. Unlike Ghostbusters, this film will never be re-made with an all-female cast. There are some jobs women just won't do, and even the most progressive movie producer wouldn't throw money away trying to prove otherwise.

One of the all-time testosterone-heavy movie stars was Lee Marvin ("More male than anyone I ever acted with," said French actress Jeanne Moreau; "Probably the most pure man I have ever known in my entire life," said his mistress Michele Triola), whose singular talents were on display in The Big Heat, a police thriller dealing with civic corruption. In those days, violence against women in the cinema was a dramatic, not a political, act. In this film, for example, Marvin puts out a cigar in Carolyn Jones's hand and throws a pot of scalding coffee in Gloria Grahame's face. This scene horrified audiences in 1953, so today it would likely require a trigger warning in ultra-bold capital letters.

The Wild One also featured Marvin in a memorable supporting role, but the film is largely remembered today as the first biker movie, as well as for Marlon Brando's brooding performance as an enigmatic rebel. Famously, when asked what he's rebelling against, Brando replies, "What have you got?" He was literally a rebel without a cause two years before James Dean in Rebel Without a Cause. Today such behavior in young men would be described as toxic masculinity. Back then it was called juvenile delinquency – a term that seems to have fallen into disuse.

While Brando was solidifying his image as a mumbling male sex symbol, more traditional men were still on the screen. Mogambo was a remake of Red Dust, a 1932 movie about a love triangle on a rubber plantation in Indochina. Notably, both films starred Clark Gable. In Mogambo, even at age 52, he was still superb at projecting virility on screen and was just as popular with men as with women. You can see why he was called the King before Elvis Presley came along.

While traditional men had not gone out of fashion, believe it or not, gender fluidity was also onscreen n 1953. Glen or Glenda is one of the best-known works of legendary low-budget schlockmeister Ed Wood. The film came out one year after Christine Jorgensen, the world's first transsexual, hit the headlines. Since Ed Wood himself was a transvestite (yet another obsolete term these days), he was likely a sympathizer. Notably, Wood not only directs but stars as Glen/Glenda, with an angora fetish sweater, which he had in real life (a 1994 video biography of Wood was called Look Back in Angora).

Another B-movie worthy of attention today is Cat-Women of the Moon. The eponymous protatgonistas are contending with a deteriorating atmosphere on the moon and want to migrate to earth. Fortunately, there is a spaceship on its way to the moon. The cat women (all with black leotards, heavy eyebrows, and widow's peaks – but no tails) employ all the manipulative techniques in their bag of tricks to obtain a pussy pass good for a one-way voyage from the moon to earth. According to the advertising campaign, "They're fiery…fearless…ferocious." Don't know why they left out "feline" and "female." Also, don't know why the MST3000 guys passed on this one.

Speaking of lunar cinema, The Moon Is Blue received a great deal of attention after the Catholic Legion of Decency gave it a Condemned rating, the only one dished out in 1953. The highly influential Francis Cardinal Spellman also condemned it. The film was released without the Production Code seal of approval, which was pretty much a given for every major feature in those days. So what were the film's infractions? The dialogue actually had words like "seduction" and "virgin." Thanks to changing times, the film got its Production Code seal eight years later. Today the film's raciness wouldn't rise to the level of a PG romcom. The movie was directed by Otto Preminger, who played the prison camp commandant in Stalag 17.

Also doing double duty in 1953 was Jean Negulesco, who directed not only How to Marry a Millionaire but also Titanic. The latter bears comparison to the overblown 1997 movie by director James Cameron, who always seems to go overboard (pun intended) when it comes to female empowerment. That isn't a meme in the 1953 film, but there is a memorable scene where one of the passengers dresses up as a woman to gain access to a lifeboat and is duly shamed. Unlike Glen or Glenda, this film was not so sympathetic to gender fluidity.

Finally, we must bring Walt Disney into the mix. Peter Pan deserves mention because the title character gave birth to a syndrome synonymous with protracted adolescence in contemporary young men. Even though the original play (full name: Peter Pan, or The Boy Who Wouldn't Grow Up) by J.M. Barrie dates back to 1904, the Disney cartoon character is still the image in the public's mind.

All movies, not just the ones mentioned above, are products of their times, but some manage to linger in the collective consciousness, and not just as curiosity pieces. The aforementioned movies speak to us just as they spoke to audiences in 1953, but the messages and meanings have been filtered by the passage of time.

After two-thirds of a century, marrying for money, as in How to Marry a Millionaire, is as popular as it ever was. But after a couple of waves of feminism, no red-pill man would view it as the lighthearted romp it was intended to be in 1953.

Responding to a dumb Feminist comment

AVfM Video Source · 13 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I wouldn't normally make a video about a single comment, but since I haven't uploaded anything in a while, I decided to take this opportunity to address the "feminism is about equality" argument.

This comment was posted on my video 36 STUPID FEMINIST QUESTIONS ANSWERED:https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=8M7KG…

Dr Shaym

Patriarchy and Lesbian Feminist Scholars

Tim Patten · 14 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy and Lesbian Feminist Scholars

Lesbian feminist author Maria Mies once wrote, “If patriarchy had a specific beginning in history, it can certainly have an end.” As with other feminist scholars, a group dominated by mostly white lesbians who share a perversely narrow-minded perspective, Mies is convinced that patriarchy–as well as the male sex–is oppressive and malevolent to women. Ostensibly, they advocate for female equality, but their lengthy lectures say otherwise. Their words detail a horrendously aggressive fraternity of privileged white men who pay women pennies on the dollar as they socially and institutionally oppress, dominate, discriminate against, and abuse them.

In fact, the feminists’ words and actions have little to do with righting a wrong, but are instead founded on a theoretical framework, crafted by a lesbian elite, that maintains males are disgusting and immoral by nature. These experts promote no remedies other than the destruction of patriarchy. In some ways, they are like society’s scolding mothers, warning little boys that masturbating will make them blind. They project a worldview based on a myopically gendered lens that has been characterized as a hate crime by Canada’s Studio Brule and a social disease by Milo Yiannoulos. At their most extreme, their theories have morphed into cancers of annihilation, marked by such derisive memes as StopPatriarchy, KillAllWhiteMen, AllMenAreRapists and KillAllMen.

History of Patriarchy

Patriarchy first appeared in Africa about 200,000 years ago, inspired by a natural order of human needs and talents. In virtually all known histories of our ancient ancestors, the role of the male was that of provider and protector; his strength and daring were deemed critical to the survival of the tribe. The best of the lot were (and are) referred to as “alpha males,” idolized for their contributions. There’s little doubt that the rise of the alpha male was inevitable and necessary, enabling mankind to blaze a trail through dangerous and unfamiliar terrain. (That does not mean they were the only ones. Lesbians or gender-fluid tribe members might also have been hunter-gatherers alongside them.)

Over time, the alpha males became the secular and spiritual leaders, kings, pharaohs and emperors, expanding their wealth, influence, and power over others. They launched and drove unrelenting efforts to build great monuments, palaces, and religious shrines; some spent the whole of their lives creating the many wonders of the world. From the great Pyramids of Egypt to the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, to the Statue of Zeus in Greece–the lowliest toiled and slaved for these leaders in their efforts to leave enduring marks on the world.

And yet, while many undoubtedly suffered under the oppressive will of these powerful individuals, it is apparent across all civilizations that patriarchy helped to harness and improve a harsh and often violent world, spurring the development and implementation of innovative technologies and breathtaking infrastructure, including electricity and lighting networks, water supply and sewage treatment facilities, railroads, highways, bridges and other features of modern transportation systems, and the construction of homes, schools, hospitals and other structures. A male-dominated social order was responsible for any number of developments, including the Internet, which have benefited countless individuals of varying means. In many respects, patriarchy is everything, and there is little else.

Women in Patriarchy

That said, not all of the history’s movers and shakers have been male. There have been queens and wives with substantial privilege and power. Eleanor of Aquitaine, born in 1122, was one of the wealthiest and most powerful women in Europe and the world during the High Middle Ages. Egyptian leader Hatshepsut, who lived from 1508 BC to 1458 BC, has been regarded as one of the most influential females in the ancient world. Empress Wu Zetian, who was born in 625 AD and lived for 80 years during the Tang Dynasty, is considered to be the most dominant in Chinese history. There was even a queen of Spain who commanded men to risk their lives sailing three ships into a dangerous unknown in a search for spices; they accidentally discovered the Americas.

While the gender imbalance has not been wholly addressed, it is apparent that our world has a richer and far more diverse social fabric than feminist scholars acknowledge. These self-appointed arbiters of society's alleged failings have defined a naïve model of what the problem is and how it can be fixed. This, in turn, has promulgated propaganda that frightens and disturbs people, especially students, with offensive distinctions and discriminatory labels. While some feminists might have good intentions, all are guilty of using broad strokes and detestable stereotypes regarding males. Equality aside, there must be a reason for this defilement, other than hatred.

Lesbian Culture

We often hear gender studies professors declare that gender, femininity, and masculinity are social constructs, though oddly enough, many will also argue that gay and lesbian people are born that way. In truth, social structures in the gay community of San Francisco–where, one might say, birds of a feather flock together–indicate that gender preferences and perspectives, even in the "gay mecca," naturally diverge. On any given night, one might see men wearing David Bowie, four-inch, come-fuck-me platform shoes, poised to dance the night away at high-tech nightclubs. In contrast, one might find women who have sequestered themselves inside murky sports bars, discussing such topics as sliding-scale entry fees for the poor and marginalized.

Certainly, some lesbians dislike, even hate men. The ladies at a gay bar can often be heard sharing envious jabs emasculating privileged white males, while the Alix Dobkin song, A Woman's Love, echoes from rickety speakers amid clacking pool balls. Lesbian bars, in contrast to gay-oriented counterparts, are often located in the dank and dangerous parts of town. Inside, it is not uncommon to see heavy-set bullies, terrifying to the eye, interacting with boys who look like hooligan girls, while lipstick-lesbians at the bar swear like sailors, waiting, it seems, for the "right" individual. Some patrons are defensive and aggressive; most are manlier than the real thing. The atmosphere reeks of toxic masculinity, feline jealousy and, sadly, lesbian-on-lesbian sexual assault.

If a man happens to walk through the door, he will invariably be faced with behavior that leaves him cringing and with the urge to back off and head in the other direction. In many ways, lesbian culture seems to be a parody of college-level feminist courses, but without the textbooks, note taking, and tuition fees. In this self-designed utopia, these individuals have created a female-only social hierarchy–a paradise without patriarchy. Evidently, they want society, more broadly speaking, to be the same.

The Lesbian War on Men

Advocates of this alternative reality have found another great watering hole in college-level humanities departments. Their influence has been growing since the 1960s when lesbians came out in droves as the women's and gay rights movements gained pace. An example of how such thinking has distorted our worldview can be seen in a 1970s BBC documentary, Angry Wimmin. In the film, which explores the origins of the women's movement, angry lesbians describe patriarchy as "a war on men." They denigrate male sexuality and spout forth on theories that feminist scholars use to prove that all men are violent, oppressive and potential rapists.

Through endless repetition, as well as the unthinking acquiescence and misguided support of the media and the political hierarchy, this view has become the basis for seemingly acceptable slurs that denigrate men as evil and dangerous–which, needless to say, are having a harmful influence on those individuals, especially the young and impressionable, who hear such messages. Unfortunately, such distorted notions are not helping to make society more equal or just. Rather, they are spawning an endless cycle of disgust and distrust that is having a debilitating and far-reaching effect, especially on young boys.

Our Modern Patriarchy

As noted earlier, patriarchy is widespread, impossible–and unnecessary–to dismantle. That said, it is becoming increasingly inclusive, with females such as France's Liliane Bettencourt, the richest woman in the world, and Alice Walton, the second richest with $32.3 billion to her name, near the top of the pyramid. In fact, reports suggest that 10% of the world's most powerful people are women, while 1% are people of color. Diverse and ever changing, this social framework is protecting women and providing financial and other benefits to many of those who have been disenfranchised.

Unfortunately, the lesbian scholars who exert such a powerful influence on college-level humanities, women's and gender studies programs, and whose careers have been built on warped theories, disagree. But their influence is diminishing. Rational and clear-thinking people recognize that all genders, races, and nationalities must surmount any number of obstacles to become socially mobile and financially buoyant.

As a result, they are seeing the feminist mantra for what it is: fringe-nutcase conspiracy theories that rely on hyperbolic narrow-mindedness to justify a collective aversion toward men. The pseudo-scholars have built a rickety latticework on propaganda and half-truths. They have spent considerable time slaying invisible dragons and poisoning minds. Instead of helping people to become more productive and happy, they have inspired anger and anarchy.

Conclusion

Even so, there is no reason to try to rid the world of these lost souls or disrupt their livelihoods. If they choose to escape from what they imagine patriarchy to be by congregating in closed (and closed-minded) communities, socializing in lesbian bars, and proselyting in the women's and gender studies departments of institutions of higher learning across the country, so be it. They have made their choices freely, and they have the same right as any of us has to live lives and embark on careers that we believe are best for us.

But that does not mean we should do nothing. We should try to benefit from their mistakes. We should take pains to understand their gendered lens and choose to inclusively move forward, ignoring the false credo of male domination. We must also come to terms with the secret of happiness: accepting what is. For all its faults, patriarchy has, since time immemorial, helped to solve a great many of mankind's problems and protected us from harm. We should modify and enhance it for the benefit of all. By embracing how things actually work, we can build our own power, wealth, and freedom, and can draw others toward us that we can love and appreciate.

Questions white men have for SJWs!

AVfM Video Source · 14 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A big thank you to all of the channels that took the time to participate in this little project. Please check out their work.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=O4lFSq_Efzk&ab_channel=TheAmazingAtheist

The Amazing Atheist

Here's your chance to reclaim free speech

Paul Elam · 15 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As many of you know, we just had a magnificent conference on men's issues in London, England. It was a brilliant event that went off without a hitch. Thanks to the work of Mike Buchanan it was a full house, wall to wall with amazing people.

The only downer of the entire event was that I had to make the announcement during my speech that the A Voice for Men Facebook page was deleted by the management there. Also, at this point I can say that my appeal to have the page reinstated has gone ignored. 35,000 followers dismissed by Facebook for not towing the feminist, politically correct line.

This is part of a now quite familiar trend of social media platforms, which are essentially the modern equivalent of what we used to call telecommunications companies, controlling the expression and even the ideas of their customers.

Every time one of these events happens on Twitter, (and again) Facebook or other popular outlet, we see people in the comments lamenting the dogmatic discrimination and suggesting that "someone" needs to create an alternative platform.

They're right. Someone needs to create alternatives that respect free speech and the open arena of ideas. So we did. It's now located at socfreespeech.com.

Using Reddit open source software, we have created a platform where current events and self-published ideas can be discussed without the interference of political correctness.

As you will see in the terms of service, there is a very narrow range of postings not permitted. They are as follows:

- No doxing nor any content that in any way infringes upon the privacy of private individuals. Though our parent organization is based in the US, the stricter standards of EU privacy law are probably a good guideline about what is and is not okay.
- No violence, advocacy nor incitement to violence.
- No porn.
- No spam.
- No piracy or other intellectual property theft (whether software, music or movies etc), though we regard the US principles of Fair Use in high esteem, particularly where content relates to criticism and commentary.
- Nothing that is illegal in the United States (and the State of Nevada in particular).

That's the list. Nothing else is disallowed. Users can create subreddits for men's issues, feminism, atheism, religion, liberalism, conservatism or anything else you can imagine within the terms of service.

There will never be interference from management on any matter that does not violate the TOS as outlined above.

We don't even care if you want to create r/avfmsucks. AVFM owns the property, but we don't care what the tenants have to say about anything. AVFM staff has strict instructions not to interfere with anything that is not a violation of TOS.

The idea here is to create a web platform where free speech (at least the kind that does not get us into legal troubles) is the one and only rule of the day. We have lost touch with that throughout our society and it is time that someone actually sets an example by offering an alternative.

The new platform, while quite functional and operationally sound, is still a work in progress. It likely always will be. There will be bugs to iron out. This will be a community project in the truest sense.

Any experts in Reddit open source software that are willing to share their expertise are welcome to contact us, and we have created a subreddit for bug reports here.

With that, and on behalf of the entire AVFM staff, we welcome you to SFS! Anticipating that there will be those who ask how they can help, the best thing you can possibly do is go there now and register. Vote and comment on threads. Start your own subreddit to cover an area of interest in your life and promote it on social media.

You are also invited to hold our feet to the fire on our word. If you see anything that hints of suppression of speech that is not a violation of our TOS, please come directly to the comments of the most recent AVFM article and go off-topic to let us know about it. This won't work without everyone staying honest and above board.

If you are sick and tired of ideologues invading public forums and fitting everyone for gags, as they have in so much of the online world, here is your chance to be a part of something they will never have a hope of co-opting. All you have to do is help us make it happen.

Will Your Son Say “Thanks Mom and Dad” or “WTF?”

Gary Costanza · 15 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Watch Georganne Chapin of IntactAmerica tell her story of intactivism and why male genital mutilation is so wrong.

Dick Heart and the crazy cat lady

Paul Elam · 16 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Subscribe to An Ear for Men on YouTube

Support An Ear for Men on Patreon

Damseling, chivalry and courtly love (part two)

Peter Wright · 17 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The following article is the second of a two-part series. Part one looked at the roots of damseling, chivalry and courtly love in the gynocentric tradition. In part two we look at damseling, chivalry and courtly love as it appears in the feminist tradition. – PW

FEMINISM

Before being given the name feminism, the obsession with women's status was referred to as the Querelle des Femmes or quarrel about women. The querelle consisted of a perpetual social movement that used damseling to call for more chivalry and more courtly love, which ultimately afforded women more power.

The three elements of gynocentrism first born in medieval Europe – damseling, chivalry and courtly love – continue to act as the basis of modern feminism. Indeed feminism today is little more, and little less, than a perpetuation of this medieval triad, giving feminism its internal drive even as feminists disavow these essentials with rhetorical obfuscations.

With this charge in mind let's revisit the holy trinity above with a focus on behaviors central to modern feminism.

Damseling as "victim feminism"

Most observers today, including feminist observers like Christina Hoff-Sommers, Camille Paglia, Rene Denfeld, Katie Roiphe and others agree that feminism comes close, if not all the way, to being a cult of victimhood.

The phenomenon has variously been referred to as grievance feminism, victim feminism, safe space feminism, and even fainting-couch feminism – with Christina Hoff-Sommers portraying its mythos as "a battle between fragile maidens and evil predators." [1]

Feminist icon Naomi Wolf tells that victim feminism evolved out of "old habits of ladylike behavior that were cloaked in the guise of radicalism," [2] and laments that a substantial segment of modern feminism is devoted to its cause.

Denfeld writes that current feminists "promote a new status for women: that of the victim," and adds:

> "This is victim mythology. From rape redefinitions to feminist theory on the "patriarchy," victimization has become the subtext of the movement, the moral to be found in every feminist story. Together these stories form a feminist mythology in which a singular female subject is created: woman as a helpless, violated, and oppressed victim. Victim mythology says that men will always be predators and women will always be their prey. It is a small place to live, a place that tells women that there is really no way out.
>
> "Like other mythologies, victim mythology reduces the complexity of human interaction to grossly oversimplified mythical tales, a one-note song, where the message of the story becomes so important that fiction not only triumphs over fact but the realities of women's experiences are dismissed and derided when they conflict with the accepted female image.[3]

While Denfeld does a good job of describing feminism's victim mentality, she labors under a myth of her own by characterizing it as a "new" fetish among feminists. Anyone reading through the history of feminist literature can see it appealed to by literally every feminist writer. Even a century ago Ernest Belfort Bax was able to say that feminists "do their best to bluff their dupes by posing as the victims of a non-existent male oppression."[4]

> Feminists well know that the most grotesquely far-fetched cry about the injustice of man to woman will meet > with a ready ear. They well know that they get here fond and foolish man on his soft side. Looking at the matter impartially, it is quite evident that man's treatment of woman is the least vulnerable point in his moral record. Woman, as such, he has always treated with comparative generosity. But it is, of course, to the interests of the abettors of female domination to pretend the contrary. Accordingly everything has been done to excite prejudice in favour of woman as the innocent and guileless victim of man's tyranny, and the maudlin Feminist sentiment of the "brute" man has been carefully exploited to this end.[5]

In all of these accounts the behavior being described is damseling, a practice feminists have been at the forefront of preserving from the medieval canon. Evoked in conjunction with claims of male brutality, rapiness, depravity and insensitivity, the ultimate purpose of damseling is to draw chivalric responses from men, a routine Wolf makes clear in her remark that "victim feminism casts women as sexually pure and mystically nurturing, and stresses the evil done to these 'good' women as a way to petition for their rights." [6]

A famous example of feminist damseling, both literal and figurative, is Anita Sarkeesian. Sarkeesian is known for raising concerns that video-games are misogynistic – like most everything else found in the feminist worldview. Her primary concern was that female game characters are often portrayed as damsels-in-distress saved by male heroes, which promotes, she says, sexual objectification and a range of other problems. To address that issue in video games she moved to launch a study project to raise awareness.

Sarkeesian established a fundraiser for $6,000.00 for her project, but after receiving some initial trolling by trolls on social media she damseled herself to potential donors by saying she was under grave threat, swooning with such finesse that she was showered with 158K in donations from fellow feminists and white knights. Over a thousand people donated after hearing of her "plight."

With that financial success, Sarkeesian subsequently replayed the scenario over and again particularly in the context of further fundraising efforts and public speaking; swooning about online attacks directed against her or over female gamers enduring abject sexism, female video-game characters being cast in degrading and/or humiliating roles, and about young impressionable girls being robbed of agency after being subjected to the damsel trope in games.

Sarkeesian's case is particularly poignant because, from the many subjects she could have highlighted to damsel herself for attention, she chose to damsel herself over the very existence of damsels. This demonstrates that even when disavowing the medieval pageant of damsels in distress, feminists continue to enact it even while obfuscating their complicity in the tradition.

Feminism would have died out long ago if it were not for the power of this ancient ruse, and while damseling continues to draw rewards from a public primed to cater to it, the planet will increasingly come to resemble a tower full of imprisoned, vulnerable Disney Princesses.

Chivalry – from husband Sam to Uncle Sam

Equity feminist Christina Hoff-Sommers states that men need to be civilized with chivalric manners, a belief outlined in an interview with Emily Esfahani Smith, where she said, "Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes," and adding a warning, "If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone." [7]

While feminists like Hoff-Sommers admit their reliance on a sexist version of chivalry, others are less candid about it, going even so far as pretending they don't need chivalry despite their demonstrable appeal to it in most of their activism. Many observers however can see through the anti-chivalry posturing.

Feminism draws its power from chivalric support, but instead of soliciting it from men in the traditional, interpersonal manner it has learned how to get it solely from the government – holding the government to ransom ever since the suffragettes damsaled the vote for women. Since that time politicians have only been too willing to furnish demands by feminists in exchange for voting the candidate into power and allowing him to retain office – and conversely politicians who fail to uphold the chivalric contract are promptly voted out.

The results of this compact are obvious to anyone who looks at political decisions with impartiality.

Instead of men giving up seats in buses, government now provides seats in legislative assemblies and boardrooms via quotas. Instead of men opening car doors for women, government opens doors into universities and workforces via affirmative action. Instead of men being the sole protectors of women from violence, government now protects them with an army of police specially trained to service women's accusations (over and above more serious crimes). Instead of men providing living expenses, governments now provide it as social welfare and compensation for the wage-gap. Government as substitute husband.

The appeal to chivalry is not confined to government institutions alone. The appeal also goes out to sporting clubs, business owners, CEOs and private institutions who respond to the damsel's call with women-only busses, women-only safe spaces, pink car parking spaces with extra lighting and security with male escorts and chaperones, or with feminist adverts at sports venues, sportsmen wearing pink to raise money for all manner of feminist projects, and that on top of monies already heaped at their feet by politicians eager to please.

This is not a recent development; it can be witnessed in mirror image as far back as a century ago. Back then, Bax was able to tie feminism so definitively with the act of chivalry-seeking that he actually labeled the women's liberation movement "chivalry feminism." Moreover, Bax saw through the superficial disavowals;

> "The justification for the whole movement of Modern Feminism in one of its main practical aspects – namely, the placing of the female sex in the position of privilege, advantage and immunity – is concentrated in the current conception of "chivalry."
>
> It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward…
>
> Such is "chivalry" as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men.[8]

Chivalry feminism today, same as it ever was, relying on men's generosity to perpetuate its creed of power.

Courtly love as 'Respectful Relationships'

The phrase 'Respectful Relationships' is shorthand for a range of conventions promoted by feminists to govern interactions between men and women, particularly in the context of romantic interactions. The conventions detail acceptable speech and actions in the contexts of socializing, friendship, flirting and sex, emphasizing a man's duty to respect women's emotional comfort, self-esteem, and dignity.

Portrayed overtly as a method of reducing men's abusiveness, the program maintains that even men and boys who do not display abusive behaviors should be enculturated in its protocols as a prophylactic, and concomitantly to afford dignity and self-esteem to women. This is where the respectful relationships program moves past the overt goal of reducing violence and into the covert goal of maintaining and increasing the power of women.

As we begin to look at the detail of Respectful Relationship we could almost mistake it for Andreas Capellanus' work The Art of Courtly Love where the medieval rules of romance were codified in meticulous prescriptions for male deference, homage, and courtesy toward women. Considering this parallel, the feminist movement appears to have provided a new language for a very old set of sexual customs, essentially reiterating that which has been with us all along.

As mentioned in Part one, central to the art of courtly love was the expectation that men practice love service toward women based on a model of vassals or serfs in relation to a feudal lord. That relationship model of serf-to-Lord was adopted wholesale to regulate love relationships whereby women were literally approached as the lord (midons) in each male-female encounter. As Medievalist Sandra Alfonsi explains;

> Scholars soon saw striking parallels between feudalistic practices and certain tenets of Courtly Love. The comparisons lie in certain resemblances shared by vassalage and the courtly "love service." Fundamental to both was the concept of obedience. As a vassal, the liegeman swore obedience to his lord. As a courtly lover, the poet chose a lady to whom he was required to swear obedience. Humility and obedience were two concepts familiar to medieval man, active components of his Weltanschauung…
>
> The entire concept of love-service was patterned after the vassal's oath to serve his lord with loyalty, tenacity, and courage. These same virtues were demanded of the poet. Like the liegeman vis-a-vis his sovereign, the poet approached his lady with fear and respect. Submitted to her, obedient to her will, he awaited a fief or honor as did the vassal. His compensation took many forms: the pleasure of his lady's company in her chamber or in the garden; an avowal of her love; a secret meeting; a kiss or even le surplus, complete unity. Like the lord, the woman who was venerated and served was expected to reward her faithful and humble servant.[9]

The idea behind love service was that men should demonstrate the quality of their commitment to women; was it merely lust or obedient and sacrificial love? If the woman decided it was "love" then she might decide to engage more intimately with him, as Joseph Campbell explains:

> "The woman is looking for authenticity in a relationship, so she delays merci until she is guaranteed that this man who is proposing himself to her is one of a gentle heart… And, the women were in control, that's all there is to it. The man is the one who is advancing, the one performing the acts of guarding bridges, or whatever bit of foolishness she puts on him, but, she's in control. And her problem is to live in a relationship that is authentic of love, and the only way she can do it is by testing the one who offers himself. She isn't offering herself, he's offering himself. But, she's in control of what happens then with step two.[10]
>
> "The technical term for a woman's granting of herself was merci; the woman grants her merci. Now, that might consist in her permission for the man to kiss her on the back of the neck once every Whitsuntide, you know, something like that – or it may be a full giving in love. That would depend upon her estimation of the character of the candidate. The essential idea was to test this man to make sure that he would suffer things for love, and that this was not just lust.
>
> The tests that were given then by women involved, for example, sending a chap out to guard a bridge. The traffic in the Middle Ages was somewhat encumbered by these youths guarding bridges. But also the tests included going into battle. A woman who was too ruthless in asking her lover to risk a real death before she would acquiesce in anything was considered sauvage or "savage". Also, the woman who gave herself without the testing was "savage". There was a very nice psychological estimation game going on here.[11]

Today that psychological estimation game (as Campbell puts it) might involve asking consent to sit with a woman, appealing politely for a date, waiting patiently for her to call or sweep right, keeping his knees together to avoid manspreading, or asking for permission to speak in order to prove he is not talking over her or mansplaining. Such demonstrations show the feminist woman that he has a gentle heart, and that he is willing to suffer things for love.

That psychological testing also encompasses public activities which demonstrate a man's commitment to serving womankind as a whole. Examples would be a man walking a mile in her shoes, or joining White Ribbon Campaigns that require men, as was required of the medieval knights, to pledge oaths to "Never to condone, or remain silent about violence towards women and girls" and especially to intervene when learning of any male behaving offensively toward a woman.

Today's White Ribbon "oath" bears a striking resemblance to the 14th century enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady (Emprise de l'Escu vert à la Dame Blanche) in which men committed themselves for the duration of five years to serving women. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honor, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies. It was an undertaking that earned the praise of protofeminist Christine de Pizan. The continuity of chivalry and courtly love from the medieval knightly oath to the modern feminist-inspired oath is remarkable in its consistency.

In line with most women who expect men to follow medieval rules of love concerning male courtesy, the feminist movement is geared toward enforcing the same goal. Feminism however postures itself as disavowing that goal even while they are at the forefront of institutionalizing it in our families, our schools, our political structures and laws.

Each of the psychological tests mentioned above are evidence of a love service called for by feminist activists. Or worded differently, they are sanctified methods by which men are called to demonstrate obedience and a 'gentle heart' in contrast to the brutality, rapiness and exploitativeness of the savage heart; the default feminist conception of men.

I will close here with the words of an academic feminist, one not so coy about identifying courtly love with the project of feminism. Elizabeth Reid Boyd of the School of Psychology and Social Science at Edith Cowan University, and Director of the Centre for Research for Women in Western Australia with more than a decade as a feminist researcher and teacher of women's studies tells:

> In this article I muse upon arguments that romance is a form of feminism. Going back to its history in the Middle Ages and its invention by noblewomen who created the notion of courtly love, examining its contemporary popular explosion and the concurrent rise of popular romance studies in the academy that has emerged in the wake of women's studies, and positing an empowering female future for the genre, I propose that reading and writing romantic fiction is not only personal escapism, but also political activism.
>
> Romance has a feminist past that belies its ostensible frivolity. Romance, as most true romantics know, began in medieval times. The word originally referred to the language romanz, linked to the French, Italian and Spanish languages in which love stories, songs and ballads were written. Stories, poems and songs written in this language were called romances to separate them from more serious literature – a distinction we still have today. Romances were popular and fashionable. Love songs and stories, like those of Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, were soon on the lips of troubadours and minstrels all over Europe. Romance spread rapidly. It has been called the first form of feminism (Putnam 1970).[12]

Reid Boyd finishes her paper by waxing poetic about the many joys of romantic love, and of its increasing popularity in academe.

Same as it ever was, the project of modern feminism can be summarized as championing victimhood (damseling), soliciting favors from men and governments (chivalry), and promoting "respectful" relationships by men-toward-women (courtly love).

References:

[1] Christina Hoff-Sommers, How fainting couch feminism threatens freedom, American Enterprise Institute 2015
[2] Naomi Wolf, Fire With Fire: New Female Power, 1993
[3] Rene Denfeld, The New Victorians: A Young Woman's Challenge to the Old Feminist Order, 1995
[4] Ernest B. Bax, Feminism and Female Suffrage, 1910
[5] Ernest B. Bax, Mr. Belfort Bax Replies to his Feminist Critics, 1908
[6] Naomi Wolf, Fire With Fire: New Female Power, 1993
[7] Emily Esfahani Smith, Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance, The Atlantic, Dec 10 2012
[8] Ernest B. Bax, Chapter-5 'The Chivalry Fake' in The Fraud of Feminism, 1913
[9] Sandra Alfonsi, Masculine Submission in Troubadour Lyric, 1986
[10] Joseph Campbell, Parzival, the Graal, and Grail Legends, talk at the Ojai Foundation, 1987

[11] Joseph Campbell, The Power of Myth, interview with Bill Moyers, 1988
[12] Elizabeth Reid Boyd, Romancing Feminism: From Women's Studies to Women's Fiction, 2014

White Ribbon Australia bullies a legend

AVfM Video Source · 18 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Wikipedia
https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/White_ribbon

Why You Should Never Give a Cent to White Ribbon (Daily Telegraph)
http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/rendezview/why-you-should-never-give-a-cent-to-white-ribbon/news-story/036feed14ddf8ef60691e7ba22494e77

Why You Should Never Give a Cent to White Ribbon (Bettina Arndt)
http://www.bettinaarndt.com.au/news/never-give-cent-white-ribbon/

Libbie Davies Jumps the Cash Cow – Includes White Ribbon Australia's Financials http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/domestic-violence-industry/white-ribbon-ceo-libby-davies-jumps-the-cash-cow/

Former Gulag prisoner speaks out

AVfM Video Source · 19 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The history of Soviet oppression is one that is still insufficiently explored and known.

Here's an interview made by Lucian Vâlsan with Ivan Mamchyur, a survivor of the Kengir uprising.

One thing is certain though: the Soviets were quite egalitarian. They had no qualms in literally driving the tank over unarmed political prisoners – be they men or women.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Apathy – The Real Enemy

Editorial Staff · 20 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The blog post was presented on the AVFM forums by Deidre. Republished here with the authors permission. EDs

Apathy is defined as having no concern, interest, or enthusiasm for a given matter. When we look at the various violent shootings that have unfolded in the news over the past forty-five days, we find many people holding candlelight vigils and protests, while Facebook blows up with all kinds of seemingly meaningful status changes and quotes. It gives the impression that we honestly care about what's going on in the world around us. But, interestingly, many people seem to be already finished talking about that horrible nightclub shooting in Orlando, and soon enough, the recent shootings of two African American men by police officers will all be a distant memory, as well. It does make for a catchy hashtag phrase, though "#blacklivesmatter" and "gaylivesmatter." But, it's easy to pay lip service to horrific events, it's not so easy to take action and speak out against such atrocities.

Apathy paves the way for many 'isms.' Feminism is one such 'ism' that didn't arrive at its destination overnight, nor merely by a group of zealous feminists. No, it takes a lot of doing nothing, to make something happen. It takes a lot of passive onlookers to bring about something negative. Feminism, in theory, can appear like a good thing for our culture, after all, it preaches about equality. How can wanting equality for everyone be a bad thing? But, when we pull the layers apart of feminism, at its core NOW, is a group of women (who probably are not the majority, actually) who hate men, and want other women to hate men. And by hate, I mean that they want women to view men as needing to pay the price for the supposed decades of patriarchal damage that has been done to women. Keep removing the layers of the onion, and you will find a rotten core, and when we put the onion back together again or try to, that infected centerpiece seeps out to the rest of the onion, and we have what we have today…modern feminism. Feminism is what one could easily call 'a wolf in sheep's clothing.'

But, I'm not so sure that we should be angry at solely feminists for why feminism has spread like cancer into all aspects of everyday life. No, rather we should look at the fact that it has taken a lot of apathetic individuals, men and women alike, to pave the way for feminism to march down the streets of westernized society. Apathy is a powerful force, and it seems inevitable that we will continue to see more mass shootings, more ill effects of feminism, and more inequality because as a society, we simply don't care. We don't care about anything, unless it personally disrupts our lives, or causes us to lose our Facebook statuses, sadly. People are buried in their phones, obsessed with how many "likes" they received that day on a given selfie, unaware even of what is going on around them. They find out about current events, through a narrow margin of talking heads scattered on social media outlets. But, usually, those talking heads are not giving facts, but rather are spewing mere opinions. We blurt out 'Oh my gosh, that is horrible! How disgusting that in this day and age, we still have racism!" And then, we go about doing whatever it is we were doing before we were rudely interrupted by that news alert.

The Men's Rights Movement isn't even making mainstream news, which should disturb us all. I was once a feminist, and now, I'd consider myself way more than merely sympathetic to the injustices that have befallen men, due to the evils of feminism. It's important for us all, in our small corners of the world, to speak out against feminism, and how it's negatively affecting our lives. The glaring truth of it is, it adversely affects feminists' lives, too, but they are too blinded by their selfish agendas to see it really for what it is. You will never be victorious by lying about your opposition, or creating an opposition that doesn't exist. Of course, there are historical incidents that point to women being treated as less than equal to their male counterparts. But, that's honestly a long time ago, and the feminism of today seems to want to pretend that women are still being treated by the law, as second class citizens. There will always be sexism, racism, and hate groups that pop up in small pockets, everywhere, but feminism wants people to believe that without it, women would not have equality with men. That is a lie. Among many of its lies, feminism likes to create illusions of truths, and if you're an apathetic drone that follows along with the rest of society's herd, you will be duped into believing its lies.

So, how can we combat apathy? Well, for starters…we ourselves have to stop being apathetic towards feminism. It's easy to look at feminism and think there is no end in sight, no light at the end of the tunnel. But, there is if we build the tunnel, and create the light. This is how Martin Luther King, Jr. brought about the civil rights movement. He was tired of the status quo and felt that if anything was ever going to change, he had to get people to stop accepting things as they were. Change is very hard; apathy is much easier. But, in the long run, apathy will catch up to us all, and we will be forced to change. I've been reading about single dads who have formed groups to combat the injustices done to them through the divorce court system. Small changes will eventually lead to large outcomes. But, we can't stay silent, or apathetic. If you want to see the tide turn against feminism, you have to be willing to at least board the ship. You might not be a leader type, but your voice matters. Every voice matters. Women's voices matter in the MRM, especially since many feminists don't "listen" to men, in general.

It's not an easy route to take, but the road less traveled is usually the right road.

"All it takes for evil to triumph, is for good men to do nothing." – Edmund Burke

Technology site endorses automated troll filters

David King · 24 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the Leslie Jones fiasco which resulted in Twitter banning Milo Yiannopoulos, technology news site Mashable posted an OpEd "Twitter, it's time to take down the trolls with tech" by Lance Ulanoff in which he advocated for automated troll filters for Twitter.

Given Ulanoff's long history in tech journalism, I'm moderately surprised that he apparently fails to understand the technical implications of what he's asking for, never mind the political and social ramifications of the idea.

Ulanoff's article doesn't seem to have gotten much of airing, so here is a slightly edited version of the critique that I posted in the comments. The subject is particularly relevant when, in the last month, we have seen Milo ousted from Twitter and AVfM's own Facebook page being removed (apparently deleted, mysteriously to reappear a week later).

Ulanoff asks some important questions. I'm a computer scientist and am also active in politics, so let me share my perspectives.

Why Twitter probably can't do what Ulanoff asks

In short, I think automated anti-abuse is a terrible idea, however well-intentioned its motivation. I trust computers to do repetitive, same-y things automatically, but I don't trust them to make executive decisions (in the cognitive sense) or take control away from humans (which is why I think driverless cars and pilotless planes are a terrible idea also).

There's no particular technological reason that I can think of why an automatic filter couldn't be implemented although, depending on Twitter's architecture, it could be expensive and given Twitter's commercial disposition, they may not be in a position to wear such costs. That may be why Twitter offers its "quality filter" only to its top tier, verified users (of which Leslie is one, so I guess Leslie didn't have it turned on).

There are a variety of techniques including relatively simple Bayesian statistical methods, Machine Learning (which is not precisely AI, but rather a way of training a machine to recognise certain patterns) and Natural Language Processing that can, to some extent, understand the semantic meaning of tweets (though both might be frustrated by the abbreviations and general mangling necessitated by the 140 character limit). All are likely to be computationally expensive relative to the volume of tweets because they must consider not only each individual tweet but hold a great deal of state about past tweets.

[Just to put some numbers on this, if Twitter sees a peak volume of 350k tweets/minute (as claimed by Ulanoff), the algorithm has just 170 microseconds (millionths of a second), to process each tweet. For comparison, it takes about twenty times longer to retrieve a single bit of information from even the fastest hard disc. Note that the quoted figure is more likely to be an average volume; any automatic system would have to be able to cope with the peak volume that may be in the millions of tweets per minute (or more) during significant world events. With enough parallelism, it's still possible — but it gets very complex very quickly.]

Keyword searches aren't likely to be effective (and are trivially circumvented anyway in a sort of arms race with trolls; c.f. the "Scunthorpe Problem" (named after a town in North Lincolnshire, England) for a trivial example of why).

Ironically, Mashable's comment system itself suffers from the Scunthorpe Problem: I had to bowdlerise the spelling of the name with spaces in order to get it past the 'naughty word' filter, which nicely exemplifies why automatic systems aren't the silver bullet that Ulanoff seems to think.

The double irony is that this takes place in a discussion about whether false positives matter.

Counting tweets probably wouldn't do anything useful. If you count tweets received (regardless of where from), then all you can do is alert the recipient and ask them what they want to do. I don't see how that would stop abuse at its source. If you count tweets sent, you'll (potentially) catch spammers and individuals targeting an individual, but that won't help dogpiling in general (because the tweets are coming from multiple sources) nor in the Milo/Leslie case specifically. Dogpiling is analogous to distributed denial of service attacks, a scourge to which the best minds still have not found a comprehensive, robust and automatic solution.

But the biggest problem is the subjectivity of what constitutes abuse: if there can be significant disagreement between any given pair of humans as to whether a given instance is abusive, what chance has a computer to figure it out automatically? Of course, whether a given pair of humans agree or disagree is likely to follow political persuasion, but even controlling for that there will still be a lot of disagreement. Just look at reactions within conservative circles to Milo's ban for an example.

So the reason Twitter doesn't automate identification of hateful and abusive speech is probably because it can't, not with much reliability. The best they can do is rely on reporting mechanisms.

But reporting mechanisms can be abused, too. Reddit is plagued with brigading attacks (where a bunch of people collude to influence voting one way or the other) and both Twitter and Facebook's reporting mechanisms are regularly abused in much the same way which is probably why Facebook, in particular, are under fire for 'censorship'.

Prevention impersonation by theft of names and/or avatars

A lot of the time, unicode characters are used to simulate a few characters from the target's name that look similar to the target's name. To the human eye, they look nearly identical; to a computer, they are quite different. If Twitter dropped unicode support (its developers may celebrate because unicode is horrible to work with!), say goodbye to languages that use non-Latin alphabets and many diacritics in those that do. So preventing a bad-faith user from using their target's name is rather harder than Ulanoff might think.

Image comparison is harder still because there can be a lot of binary differences between two images that otherwise look identical (or very close to). Comparison algorithms can be frustrated by various techniques including sharpening, blurring or noise There is even a branch of cryptography called steganography that exploits this fact in which a message is encoded in noise that will probably look just like grain (à la film) or texture. Example: YouTube use an algorithm to detect pirated content, but it can't intercept pirated videos in realtime, and the algorithm can be confounded by various distortions which, while they reduce the quality of the pirated video, are still perfectly watchable.

Twitter's [allegedly] slow handling of abuse reports

Twitter's reporting mechanism must certainly be automated, so the slow response to reported tweets is probably a reflection of the way their algorithm works: it probably needs to receive sufficiently many complaints within a certain timeframe before it will act.

Twitter's definition of "hate speech"

Ulanoff's million dollar question is this:

> What's the real benchmark for abuse that runs afoul of your rules. How does Twitter define hate speech?

Lots of other people would like an answer to this, too, because whatever it is, Twitter doesn't seem to apply it very even-handedly. Cynically, there is some anecdotal evidence to suggest that they are, in fact, quite partisan in the way they apply their 'hate speech' standards. Case in point combining both the questions of consistency and technology: on the face of it, it would appear that Leslie has tweeted some moderately racist stuff herself.

It also appears that there are some fake tweets running around purportedly by Leslie, and there is absolutely nothing Twitter can do about that because anybody can screen-shot a doctored web page or else modify a screenshot of a real tweet with Photoshop.

Both are very Not Cool. The fake tweets aren't Leslie's fault, but the fact that she (apparently) sent similarly hateful tweets in the past makes it very difficult to discern between fake and real tweets, which means she doubtless is getting a lot more hate based on things she didn't say from those taken in by the fake tweets — including Milo. If he tweeted fake tweets, did he know they were fake? If not, why does he deserve to be punished for tweeting them?

> How long can they hide behind free speech?

This is the rub. Either offensive speech is tolerated by Twitter, or it is not. (And note that freedom of speech is meaningless where the speech is inoffensive and uncontroversial. The real test is what happens when you have to deal with points of view with which one disagrees). As has been pointed out elsewhere, Twitter is a privately-owned platform (and no, being a PLC does not make it any less privately owned) and can, therefore, set whatever policies it likes.

However, it must a) be open, transparent and explicit about what their policies are, and b) enforce those policies consistently and without favouring any demographic or philosophy over another unless required to by their openly-stated policy.

I think Jack Dorsey (CEO) is a bit confused about this. On February 9th, he tweeted in reply to Twitter's rather Orwellian-sounding "Truth and Safety Council":

> Twitter stands for freedom of expression, speaking truth to power, and empowering dialogue. That starts with safety.

Platitudes like 'speaking truth to power' and 'empowering dialogue' are all very well, but dialogue means a two-way conversation, which means the "power" (if that it be) has to have the opportunity to answer back whether or not Ulanoff (or Twitter) likes what it has to say.

And there is a fundamental contradiction between "safety" (however that is defined) and freedom of expression: some ideas and opinions aren't "safe". Some individuals will be upset by a tweet that doesn't bother others (even controlling for political affiliation). Case in point from the OP:

> Yiannopoulos' actions revealed Twitter's darkest, most disturbing and racist impulses.

That's a perfectly legitimate point of view, one with which many will agree, but it should be pointed out that calling somebody a racist is a pretty serious accusation (assuming Ulanoff meant it with the seriousness that the term used to/ought to have). What, objectively speaking, is the difference between calling Milo unpleasant names and calling Leslie unpleasant names? ("Because I'm right"? Careful, now…)

Others interpret Milo's attitudes (towards Muslims, for example) in a different light and can see his point even if they don't agree with him because they understand where he's coming from. And yet others still may disagree with them, whether or not they see where they're coming from.

Humans are messy and complicated creatures, and nothing involving them is so simple that it can be reduced down to an algorithm.

The choice that Twitter must make is whether it is truly committed to "freedom of expression" (as opposed to "expression that Twitter agrees with") and take the bad with the good, or whether it wishes to become a "safe space" in which there is no place for any sort of freedom of expression. There is very little, if any, middle ground.

> Will this result in false positives? Absolutely. Is it worth it to clean Twitter the hell up while still allowing for free speech?

Is it? It depends on what you value and on your political disposition, I guess.

Stereotypes, which frequently lead to discrimination, are a kind of heuristic or algorithm which humans use to reach conclusions about a specific individual drawn from generalisations, which is pretty much exactly what the heuristics and algorithms Ulanoff proposes would do and, like those algorithms, stereotypes throw up many false positives.

Ask the victims of stereotyped discrimination how they feel about being a false positive.

Wendy McElroy – Rape Culture Hysteria

AVfM Video Source · 24 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Wendy McElroy clarifies the issues and philosophy surrounding a toxic brand of politically correct nitwittery that is prevailing on many college campuses and beginning to bleed into mainstream culture.

http://www.LibertyPen.com

‘Regular’ Person David Fleischmann of Far Rockaway, NY, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 26 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

‘Regular’ person David Fleischmann has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting. org, highlighting the fact that it’s open season on baby boys. Read on and I’ll explain.

From his website babysmohel.com:

“Welcome, please meet Rabbi David Fleischmann, your baby’s expert mohel.

Known for his amiable and friendly personality, Rabbi Fleischmann is sought after by those who appreciate a professional, skilled mohel who can provide a touch of personal and individual attention.

Recommended by leading pediatricians in the Far Rockaway-Five Towns community, Rabbi Fleischmann performs circumcisions throughout the tri-state area.

As a Rabbi in the High School of Yeshiva Darchei Torah of Far Rockaway, Rabbi Fleischmann is sure to infuse your son’s Bris ceremony with a sense of tradition, care and expert skill.”

It’s open season on baby boys because it appears that the law and the medical profession have abandoned all standards of safety and ethics by allowing doctors to violate criminal law and their own oath, as well as allowing any Joe or Jane Blow with a self-proclaimed religious title to sexually assault and mutilate infants at any time and place.

I will not refer to these people as Rabbi or Cantor or any other title that infers respect and authority that is irrelevant to the mutilations they perform. Respect is earned and simply tacking on a title to anyone’s name who’s religion proclaims ‘holy’ does not make them qualified to perform delicate, painful, and risky surgery on anyone. They may or may not have been ‘trained’ by other “mohels,” but that does not give them a medical degree, something last I heard was needed to practice medicine.

In my book, non doctors should be barred from cutting infants, and doctors who do circumcise should have a medical reason for doing so. I will never confer any religious title of respect to anyone who abuses baby boys that hides behind that title for immunity from the law. If they can do it, why can’t a follower of “The Flying Spaghetti Monster” fondle and cut baby boys genitals, or any other organs for that matter.

That is what’s happening here. ‘Regular’ people are allowed to mutilate baby boys any time or place, under cover of a religious title, under no scrutiny of the government or the medical profession. You too can sexually abuse and mutilate baby boys – just say it's being done for 'religious' reasons.

Then we read more about Mr. Fleischmann:

> Rabbi Fleischmann grew up in the Midwood neighborhood of Brooklyn. He attended the Mirrer Yeshiva throughout his primary school years as well as throughout high school. He continued in the Beis Medrash, the after high school program, where he formed a strong relationship with the Rosh Yeshiva, Rabbi Shmuel Birnbaum Ztz"l. He also studied under Rabbi Elya Brudny Shlita, with whom he retains a deep connection to this day.
>
> Rabbi Fleischmann continued his studies in Jerusalem, Israel for seven years in the "The Brisker Kolel". During that time, he watched and observed the many skilled mohels that abound in that metropolis. He gleaned from their technique and expertise and ultimately received an ordination to practice from Rabbi Yehudah Gehat.
>
> Eventually moving back to the USA, Rabbi Fleischmann joined the faculty at Yeshiva Darchei Torah where he teaches high school boys, sharing his knowledge and study methodology with the younger generation.
>
> Rabbi Fleischmann resides in Far Rockaway with his wife and children. He is an active mohel using his proficiency and talent, coupled by his friendly demeanor to practice the skill passed on throughout the generations with finesse, deftness and sensitivity.

Since Mr. Fleischmann has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Fleischmann's 'practice' information follows:

511 Jarvis Ave
Far Rockaway, NY 11691

babysmohel@gmail.com
516 314 3236

> 'Regular' Person David Fleischmann of Far Rockaway, NY, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/u8ZVvdnxUK #MGM pic.twitter.com/VOQ3F6PSiA
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) July 26, 2016

The Stanford Rape Case – TFF Special Edition

AVfM Video Source · 27 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On this special edition of The Fiamengo File, Professor Fiamengo discusses the injustice of holding male students to a higher standard than female students. Fiamengo argues that Turner was also drunk and it cannot be determined whether the victim in this case blacked out before or after giving consent. This is especially important given that the victim claims not to remember the incident, and more importantly, the standard for criminal conviction is supposed to be “beyond any reasonable doubt.” Fiamengo argues that the jury, in fact, used the condition of “preponderance of evidence” due to decades of feminist insistence on believing the “victim.”

StudioBrule

Facts to piss off a feminist: Family Violence

AVfM Video Source · 27 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"Just the facts, ma'am" Joe Friday

Dr Shaym

How to ignore sexual assault

J T · 27 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I'm a grower, not a shower.

When it grows, its length is average.

But before it grows, it looks so damn tiny.

When I shower in the gym, after a workout, it is barely visible. I am embarrassed, and I'm not embarrassed to admit I'm embarrassed. I know what people will say: "it's not the length; it's what you do with it. Length—erect or flaccid—should not matter." I get it. But it still embarrasses me.

I don't like this.

I'm not trying to turn on the guy in the next shower, but I just don't like seeing these hoses dangling—they are majestic, don't get me wrong—when I have what looks like a stub. So I stretch it out before getting in the shower. I never enter the sauna, anymore, if there are other men there. I am embarrassed.

This is all because someone decided they knew better about my body.

You see, I'm circumcised, and that's why I feel it always looks so tiny. I feel my penis is desperately trying to retract to a safe space—to crawl back into a protective layer of skin that is no longer there. Some research seems to indicate that circumcised penises are smaller. But I don't think they're smaller; I think they retract and look tiny when they are not erect because the tissue has a visco-elastic memory of a safe space and is pulling back to find it.

My son is not circumcised. He is only twelve years old, but his penis actually looks longer than mine. It dangles like the penis of a horse; mine retracts, and all that's visible is a calcified mushroom head.

I have also noticed that as I get older, my penis tries to retract even when I am sitting in an office meeting. It makes me physically uncomfortable—it really is an uncomfortable feeling—and I try to pull it out. On a few occasions, it is so irritating, that I leave the meeting, go to the bathroom and pull it out. I don't think I would have to do this if there was skin around my best bud.

I don't like this at all.

Sometimes, when I am in the sauna alone, and there is too much heat-conductive moisture in the air, the heat burns the glans of my penis. It hurts for a few hours, afterward.

I don't like being circumcised. But what I dislike even more is being told not to worry about the appearance of my length, or being told genital mutilation is worse for women.

I don't like it when feminists mock men who are concerned about the appearance of their penis when they themselves flock to the Vagina Monologues every year and rejoice in their sex organ. My penis is my most prized possession: a dearest friend, a loving partner with a mind of its own, a fire hydrant shooting into the sky, or a nozzle during winter nights when I've had too much beer and need to let whizz and can only find a quiet place in a dark alley. And someone cut my penis without asking me.

I don't like being circumcised; I don't like it at all.

It does not matter to me if genital mutilation is worse for women or men: mutilation is evil when done to both boys and girls. It was done to me. Why do feminists who abhor female genital mutilation either ignore or turn a passive eye to what we do to baby boys? Why is it that whenever I post on male genital mutilation during an article on female genital mutilation, I am told it is worse for women? Why do feminists point out that other men (who do not know what they are missing) approve of circumcision—as if that was justification? Why do feminists ignore the voice of men?

Feminists will say: “Men must learn that a woman’s body is her own.” But how can they expect any man to realize that a woman owns her own body when we teach boys they do not own theirs? Every time we cut a baby boy’s penis we teach men: “your body is not yours, and a woman’s body is not hers, either.” Every time we suggest that mutilation is worse for women, we turn a deaf ear to the screams of a baby boy and calcify the feelings of the man he becomes.

For the past seventeen years, I have been monogamous with my wife. Before then, I had been having sex with women and men. I noticed that those men who were uncircumcised were more sensitive—I gathered the data from direct experience. Also, it was easier for them to masturbate. But there is another issue.

There is something majestic about the appearance of the moist pink glans from the foreskin after the erection is in full bloom: a kind of emergent recapitulation of male pride; an erection, followed by another revelation of pink power and sensitivity—an echo; an opening of the rose to release the fragrance of masculinity.

I have seen this, but I will never know what it feels like.

I don’t like this, at all.

In those earlier years, I enjoyed my time with men. When the moment of orgasm is shared with another man, there is a comfortable reaffirmation of masculinity—an echo from a primitive cave dwelling, layered with images from the hunt, autographed by masculinity’s hand. With women, with my wife, that moment luxuriates in the beauty of women as my chest presses against life supporting breasts; it is an exciting sharing of difference and unification as a new one is born from each of us, and vaginas feel great and look beautiful—also a rose by any other name.

It’s now been over seventeen years since I have been with a man. When I am not with my wife, but playing with myself, sometimes, at the moment of orgasm, a thought enters my head that I am making love with masculinity—that my penis is every penis. At that singular moment, I know what every man feels. My orgasms are shared with masculinity’s orgasms—a bond autographed and ejaculated with masculinity’s hand. It is not a desire for an individual; it is a desire for masculinity. But my orgasms are not as sensitive as I age: the scraping of underwear calcifies the glans.

Anything that diminishes the power of even one male orgasm diminishes masculinity’s orgasm. All individual male orgasms increase the strength of masculinity’s orgasm—if you listen at night, you can hear the thunder of masculinity’s orgasm. When one man comes, masculinity comes.

Circumcision is not just a reduction of an individual man’s pleasure. Male genital mutilation diminishes the shared orgasm of masculinity, and as such, it is a sexual assault on masculinity.

I am angry about this.

Eve Ensler wrote a play—The Vagina Monologues—in which an old woman plowed a young girl with alcohol and raped her. In the same play, she compared male and female genital mutilation. She writes:

> In a man [genital mutilation] would range from amputation of most of the penis, to “removal of all the penis, its roots of soft tissue and part of the scrotal skin.

She compared mutilations. She actually compared the mutilation of babies. What did she do—did she bring an acoustical device into a surgical ward to compare the decibels of the screams of baby boys and baby girls to assess who screamed louder? Tell us, Eve—you seem to be good at this—who screamed louder: the victims of the African American holocaust of slavery or the victims of the Shoah? Whose pain was greater Eve, the slave lynched from a magnolia, or the people in the gas chambers? Who screams louder Eve: the baby boy being cut, or the baby girl?

She decided that the mutilation of baby boys could be used as leverage—as an exploitive tool; a platform—to condemn female genital mutilation, alone; she uses male genital mutilation for an objective purpose. This is the iconic sexual assault.

And here is how she ignores it. In “The Vagina Monologues,” she brags that “there are 8,000 nerve endings in the clitoris—twice as many as there are in the penis”, she says. But she ignores that there were 20,000 nerve endings in the foreskin. First, she turns a deaf ear to the screams of baby boys, and then after most of the nerves are removed from the male baby, she brags that the clitoris has more nerve endings. Eve Ensler is not justifying the rape of an individual man, mind you. Through comparison, trivializing and disdain, she is justifying a sexual assault on masculinity.

Today she serves on the board of directors of the Center for Men and Masculinities at Stony Brook. It is such stunning appointment that one cannot even get angry—seriously, you cannot get angry: one has to see the humor in this—you can only laugh. One can only laugh at the Center for Men and Masculinities at Stony Brook, and anyone who emerges from that cesspool. Eve Ensler claims to improve masculinity while ignoring the screams of baby boys while she writes plays that trivialize collective masculinity’s anguish

I don’t like this.

She must step down from this position. But, like a feminist, she won’t.

Michael Kimmel must remove her. But like a feminist, he won’t.

Or, just like she removed the female on female rape scene from the play, Eve must remove the comparison of genital mutilation and the bragging on nerve endings. But she won’t do that either. She is a feminist.

The bizarre feminist response to Islamic terror in Orlando

August Løvenskiolds · 27 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A gay but Islāmic man has to be a deeply conflicted man. He is expected to marry and sire children, hate homosexuality to the point of bringing a "compassionate death to gay men," and deny his most basic sexual nature. When he cannot deny it any longer, he acts on it but this just worsens his internal conflict. Eventually he may snap, and kill as many gay infidels as he can before dying himself.

This is the only narrative of the gay nightclub massacre in Orlando that makes any sense. Several sources, including his ex-wife, are confirming that Omar Mateen was gay and a frequent guest at the gay bar he eventually savaged. His immigrant Afghan parents and community would've pushed on him traditional Muslim models of heteronormativity with a fervor we can only imagine. The resulting self-loathing son was a time bomb with only one logical outcome.

Feminists, however, had a number of bizarre, man-hating, pro-terrorist reactions to the tragedy.

Ignoring the conflict between his gayness and his faith, my forever frisky cuddle-skunk Amanda Marcotte opined at Salon that it was his "toxic masculinity" that drove a gay man to kill gay men. In any other context, the suggestion that the problem with gay men is that they are just too darn masculine would be hilarious. Ironically, Marcotte describes men who challenge her repugnant theory as "whiny dudes," tipping us off to the source of men's masculine posturing: judgmental women who reject men they consider less than masculine. Like her, for example:

> Every time feminists talk about toxic masculinity, there is a chorus of whiny dudes who will immediately assume — or pretend to assume — that feminists are condemning all masculinity, even though the modifier "toxic" inherently suggests that there are forms of masculinity that are not toxic.

While Marcotte and other feminists would choke on the phrase "radical Islam" because she would see "radical" as an demeaning intensifier rather than a qualifier, she nevertheless defends the demeaning construction "toxic masculinity" as if men should have no feelings about her savaging of men – and yet again she seeks to shame men with the very thing she despises.

Like all gaslighting feminists, my poof-baby Marcotte loves to create the men she would destroy. "Toxic masculinity," if it exists, would end tomorrow if women more desirable than Marcotte started rejecting and discouraging masculinity in men – men are slavishly in tune to women's perceptions of maleness and would quickly adjust to softer, less aggressive lifestyles if the sexual marketplace demanded them.

Furthermore, Marcotte would have us believe that nothing would stop an Islamic terrorist faster than a feminist wagging her finger at the men protecting her sorry self. Sort of like Hillary stopped Bill from philandering, perhaps?

At least as bizarre as Marcotte was the response of Mariella Mosthof, who used her female privilege to warn people like me not to write about Orlando at all:

> If you are a cisgender, heterosexual, white person, please do not write about the largest mass shooting in American history, which took place this Sunday at a gay club called Pulse in Orlando during the venue's Latino night.

After brutally rejecting the perspective of an entire class of people, this kooky lesbian goes on to explain why rejecting people (like she just did) is a bad thing:

> The worst part of an event like this for someone like me is that it "justifies" my mother's rejection of me. She was fearful that something very much like this would happen to me if I chose to live queerly, and her response > was to try and crush it out of me in any way she could. When she couldn't accomplish that, she simply withdrew from me to mitigate her own risk of loss and suffering as a parent. Of course, that only drove me to seek out my chosen queer family with even greater urgency.

I can only respect the true spirit of her words by telling her, respectfully, to fuck off and die: I am not your slave, and I will never respect you nor any other feminist position associated with you ever again.

The nerve of that entitled twit is astonishing and indeed, inspiring – she knows how destructive rejection is, she has felt it herself, and yet she flings it about with a cavalier disregard worthy of a sow flinging slop.

Perhaps I shouldn't be so harsh – the incredible level of domestic violence in lesbian relationships like hers (up to 45%) is answer enough.

The primary identity killed in the Orlando massacre was not feminist twerps – it was MEN – 43 of the 49 victims by my count. Men like Cory Connell, a straight, cisgender, white boy whose masculinity was so toxic he saved his girlfriend's life at the cost of his own. Cory was 21 years old.

It is the voices of men we should be listening to, not the voices of man-hating feminists dancing their jig of sorrow.

Janet Bloomfield Speech at ICMI16 London

AVfM Video Source · 30 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

How Feminism Infantilizes Women

Paul Elam

Yes, we cry

Tim Patten · 30 July 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Many Americans celebrated the June 9, 2016 report concluding that Hillary Clinton would be the first female nominee for the most powerful office on Earth. Meanwhile, the National Organization for Women, having declared satisfaction with the level of equality in America, has focused attentions on a "love your body" campaign. These and other developments would seem to indicate that the long-running and frequently hyperbolic "debate" on gender and relations between the sexes has evolved into something more thoughtful and constructive.

Unfortunately, not everyone has gotten the message. Academic feminists, for instance, continue to press for adoption of Men's and Masculinity Studies programs on college campuses. This curriculum maintains, among other things, that a social framework where boys are told, "Don't cry, son," as well as overexposure to hyper-masculinized representations of heroic stoicism, has caused males to suppress their emotions, leaving most of us expressively "underdeveloped." As a result, we are often confronted by frustrated women who ask, "Can't you just share your feelings?" Others take a more assertive tack–"Show some emotion!" they say. If we don't cry, it means there is something wrong with us.

Are Men Dispassionate?

My first pet, Princess, was a beagle who taught me a lot about love and loyalty. When I was eight-years old, she went mad, as some dogs do, and bit my best friend, Tommy Mitchell. Consequently, the first love of my life had to be put down. At dusk on a rainy day, my dad led me into the Wisconsin woods, where he did the deed with a .22-caliber pistol. A shot rang out against the dampened tree limbs. Princess's head slumped back and she collapsed. Suddenly, she lay very still. I looked away, stunned. I sniffled, and then cried deeply.

"Boys don't cry. It's a dog," my father muttered.

I sat in the car while Dad buried Princess. I cried and hugged myself tightly, trying to will things back to the way they were only a day before. I went home and watched a movie, featuring rugged John Wayne, on TV.

I have never forgotten that evening when Princess left us. But there have also been other moments and experiences through the years, some good and some bad, that have remained with me, even as I enjoy my retirement from the work force. I have been passionate and emotional about many things throughout my life, but I'm sure the same could be said about others. Contrary to what we men are told, almost all of us have cried and experienced deep and powerful feelings.

Underneath Our Sleeves

And yet, many believe otherwise, largely because we do not wear our emotions on our sleeves. No small number of us prefer to cry in private or, perhaps out of embarrassment, we shed tears more quietly than women do. Societal expectations have likely played a role, but so, too, has our past. Researchers who have evaluated the differences from an evolutionary perspective have concluded that our ancient male ancestors needed to suppress sentiment when they were protecting the village, killing enemies, or hunting for food; over time it was natural for us to keep doing so. As designated protectors, we often mute expressiveness in an effort to better assess circumstances in case we need to leap into action.

Many females, in contrast, are sensitive and quick to show their feelings, imploring us to comfort them and assuage their anxieties in return. We are expected to attend to their emotional needs and grievances, many of which seem endless. Such a dynamic makes it difficult for female partners who might naturally assume the same holds true when things are reversed. But that is not the case: men and women are different and deal with emotions and circumstances in differing ways. Our reactions are typically not like theirs; in many cases, we do not seek their emotional support.

In fact, when we experience fear, it often stirs up empathy so deep that we feel compelled to run to the rescue and save lives. This heroic response seems to come naturally, an instinct at least some of us are born with. Most people, male or female, would probably jump out of their skin if confronted by someone in immediate and grave danger. But men often become extraordinary heroes at such moments. In the aftermath of a house fire or similar tragedy, it is not all that odd to hear a man say, “I saw women stand around crying in hysterics while valuable minutes were slipping away. Another guy and I ran in and did what we had to help those who were in trouble.”

Flawed, or Simply Different?

In family and more relaxed settings, it’s not difficult to see men and women communicating and emoting at different levels, vibrations and methods. In fact, it has become something of a cliché: men complain that their spouses talk too much, while women complain that their husbands only grunt. But this does not necessarily indicate a failing: more often than not, it stems from physiological differences. Scientists who have studied brain function have determined, for example, that nerve signals can follow alternate neuropathways in men and women. By analyzing brain scans, researchers have concluded that the two sexes process feelings by way of different behaviors and patterns, and at dissimilar times and circumstances.

Even then, associating the divergence with obvious physical differences may not tell the whole story. There are those who believe that transsexual and gender-fluid individuals can have much in common with individuals of the opposite sex, or the gender of those they closely identify with. Regardless, an assessment of the binary male brain points to a results-oriented focus, geared towards action and problem-solving. We seek to crack puzzles, ponder universal meanings and explore new horizons. When faced with danger, our minds move into overdrive in a quest for answers and actions to take.

The female brain, in contrast, seems to work in a more process-oriented way. Most are quick to connect, sharing emotions and explaining behavior, delving into various illuminations after networking with others. Girls and women favor social interaction and arrangements where people can come together, either in person or indirectly by telephone, text or email, to communicate and address whatever issues may be at hand. To solve problems, they will often seek to assemble task forces to share ideas, see how others feel, and reach a consensus that takes a great many perspectives into account.

Arguably, the differences between the two sexes can be summed up by an old joke: “When a couple are in a foreign city and get lost, the man looks at the map, while the woman askes someone for directions.”

More than Physiology

Still, while an understanding of gender-based factors is helpful in grasping the differences, physiology isn’t the only factor that influences the way women and men see, evaluate and connect with the world. Career choices, job requirements and other pressures can also influence how individual minds and emotional mechanisms work. Needless to say, understanding this fact can provide useful clues about how best to communicate and work with someone we may care about deeply.

Among those whose careers require them to process emotional imagery and interact with others on a regular basis are health care workers, teachers, social workers, therapists, and counselors. In contrast, those who fall into the problem-solving camp, which can include both men and women who are task-oriented and focused on results and solutions, are manual laborers, electricians, technical workers, engineers and those in jobs that involve high physical risk.

Sometimes, Words Say it All

Whether or not an individual fits with the above, there are other ways of assessing where they might fall on the process-action-oriented scale. Simple as it sounds, this includes listening to what they say and how they describe the everyday realities of home, work and life, as illustrated in the table of examples below:

PROCESS-ORIENTED

> I saw your mother and she didn't say "hi"?
>
> How are you feeling?
>
> Do you still love me?
>
> Did you do that to intentionally hurt me?
>
> I saw Carol and Dave today.
>
> Why didn't you call me back?
>
> How was your day?
>
> I love you more every day.

RESULTS/ACTION-ORIENTED

> Did you make any progress at work today?
>
> Are the deadlines close?
>
> Did you solve anything today?
>
> I'm trying to repair my credit–any ideas?
>
> What are you trying to work out?
>
> Is it more complicated than you expected?
>
> After finishing the project, let's party.
>
> Did you hear we found water on Mars?

Conclusion

The fact that individuals may fall into one camp or another, whether driven by physiology or other factors, means we must not bow down to broad-brush stereotypes, promoted largely by feminist advocates of women's, gender and masculinities studies curricula, that men, masculinity and gender are social constructs. Such programs are mere propaganda, designed to promote a political agenda and nothing more. Rather than accepting their unscientific assertions that men need to be changed, we should be working to improve how all of us–men and women–exchange ideas and communicate with one another.

For those of us who find themselves in relationships and settings were others don't respect and understand our differences, and can't stop labeling men as having stunted emotional maturity, the answer is simple: separate ourselves from these toxic individuals. Instead, choose an extraordinary escape hatch from women's and society's misunderstandings–the men of MGTOW. Once you reach out and communicate with our genuine masculine souls, you'll find friends forever.

There is no doubt that men are resourceful and embody the profound passions that have helped to build the greatest civilization on Earth. In the exciting world that we see ahead, things can only get better.

Erin Pizzey legal defense fundraiser

Paul Elam · 1 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As promised, the fundraiser has begun. Please help us reach and exceed our goal in this very vital matter. PE http://fundanything.com/en/campaigns/whiteribbon-org-legal-defense-campaign

The irrefutable proof is in: DV is not gendered (except when it is, which is most of the time)

David King · 2 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Update August 3rd: Added Corrine's latest article which was initially behind a pay wall but is now not.

The subject of DV seems to be heating up in Australia of late, particularly in the RendezView section of the Australian Daily Telegraph:

- June 22, 2016: Why you should never give a cent to White Ribbon by Nina Funnell
- June 27, 2016: We stop violence at the source. And the source is men by Libby Davies, CEO of White Ribbon Australia (in response to Funnell)
- July 21, 2016: 'Hysterical feminism' isn't helping our fight against domestic violence by Corrine Barraclough
- July 26, 2016: Domestic violence: don't put up with disrespect [from men] by Lauren Novak
- July 28, 2016: Stop the man bashing. It's time to fight back against feminism by Corrine Barraclough
- August 2, 2016: The irrefutable facts of domestic violence in Australia by Jane Gilmore
- (New) August 2, 2016: Feminism or victimism? Bashing men is not the answer
  by Corrine Barraclough

… with promises of more to come.

I posted a comment to Jane Gilmore's article, which may serve as a combination summary and critique. This is a slightly augmented version of that comment.

Feminist journalist Jane Gilmore's article is really quite artfully written: it gives the impression of balance and acknowledgement of male DV victims while driving the focus back to female victims using "irrefutable" data.

Well, let's see about that.

There are several problems with the thesis of Gilmore's piece.

First, provocation is an excuse that works both ways. If women can excuse their violence in terms of the man's provocations (abusive or otherwise), then so can men. That gets us nowhere.

Second, Gilmore plays down the significance of psychological abuse. I experienced a great deal of bullying as a kid and as a teen. A little of it was physical, but by far the majority of it was verbal — and girls did it just as much as the boys. I'm here to tell you that psychological abuse can be utterly devastating.

It's not good enough, in fact, it's inexcusable to say that emotional and psychological abuse "can be terribly damaging on its own" and then dismiss that damage by saying that the combination with physical violence is "exponentially worse". That's straight out of intersectional feminism: those who suffer the confluence (or intersection) of different types of abuse (or oppression) have it worse than those who experience only one form of abuse or oppression, creating a hierarchy of oppression.

Third, there is an implicit argument that infrequent events (eg unprovoked violence by a wife toward her husband) deserve less attention. Taken to its logical conclusion and given that DV is still rare in absolute terms (12-month prevalence < 2% for both sexes [ABS PSS 2012 Table 3], which is still more common than it should be), no DV would be tackled at all. It is a contradiction, therefore, to say that one rare event should be addressed while an even rarer event should not on the grounds of how rare it is. It begs the question of where the empathy threshold lies, and why.

Fourth, anybody who objectively researches the subject (ie without ideological presuppositions) will discover that there are no DV services for men [in Australia] that don't assume that the man is in some way responsible for the violence he experiences.

Part of the reason for that is that the presumption of male guilt is codified into [Australian] government guidelines which providers are then coerced into adopting if they want to continue to get government funding. Look at Family Violence Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework published by VIC state government. Page 40 says:

> The research evidence and experience of family violence professionals demonstrate that relatively few men in heterosexual relationships are solely victims of intimate partner violence.
>
> As discussed on page 41, men are much more likely than their female partners to be using a number of repeated, patterned forms of violence to dominate and control over time.
>
> A man who is the principal (or sole) user of family violence can present as a victim or the victim of the violence.

Page 41 continues:

> Men who admit to using violence often try to justify or minimise their violence, or to blame their partner—perhaps for 'provoking' an attack or giving him 'no way out'. They might refer to their partner as being over- sensitive, irrational, hysterical, a danger to themselves, or even mentally ill when trying to minimise their own behaviour to others. These characterisations of women can be reinforced by social norms that do not support equitable relations between women and men.
>
> For these reasons, in all circumstances where a man is initially assessed as or claiming to be a victim of family violence in the context of a heterosexual relationship, you should refer him to a men's family violence service for comprehensive assessment or to the Victims of Crime Helpline. His female (ex)partner must always be referred to a women's family violence service for assessment, irrespective of whether she is thought to be the victim or aggressor.

If women lash out less frequently than men, then it may be because they have services they can go to before things get so bad that they can't contain their frustration any longer. If men have no equivalent services that won't treat them as presumptive criminals, then it should come as no surprise that they lash out when they can bear it no longer.

It should come as no surprise that men find it difficult to ask for help if they are presumed to be batterers without self-awareness, or else trying to head off at the pass complaints about their own violence.

Articles like Gilmore's reinforce the perception that DV is gendered, which reinforces and encourages governments and providers alike to adopt the gendered approach — and, just as DV is generational, the cycle perpetuates until it becomes a cultural axiom or assumption that DV is gendered. Oops, we're already there.

Fifth, crime data reflect complaints, not the true incidence of DV. If men aren't believed — or worse, if they fear that they'll be arrested rather than their batterer — they won't come forward to the police and so the violence they suffer goes unrecorded. Gilmore even acknowledges this!

To say that homicide data are the only reliable indicator is absurd. DV is still DV even when nobody dies; homicide represents only the most extreme end of DV. It is also disingenuous, because nobody is suggesting that only DV that results in homicide is worthy of attention.

That's why survey data are so important. Yes, they're samples of the population, but not even court data actually purport to report 100% of actual crime committed. Court data may be a larger sample, but they are still a sample nevertheless.

Two examples of relevant surveys include the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey which is quoted in 1-in-3's infographic and UK Home Office Report 191 (which is based on the British Crime Survey) page 18 of which reports, "Of the BCS sample that were, or had been married, 18% of women and 13% of men said they had been assaulted by a current or ex-spouse at some time" Since gay marriage wasn't legalised in the UK until 2013 and these data relate to 1996, it can be said with certainty that the 13% of men were assaulted by women; therefore, of those married respondents who reported some experience of DV, 42% were men. Between them, the rate of male victimisation appears to be somewhere in the vicinity of 2 in 5 and 2 in 6 (of all DV victims).

Finally, nobody's including suicide (especially by men, despite suicide rates being much higher in men) in their analysis because there's no consistent way to develop data on the causes of suicides, and the victims aren't talking.

Men, lacking any form of public support, are left to grin and bear it. To man up. When they can no longer tolerate their suffering, they end up in either the DV perpetrator or suicide statistics.

The whole industry is rotten to the core and desperately needs a shake up. The saddest thing is that, as ingrained as the sexism exhibited in Gilmore's article is, reform wouldn't be all that difficult to achieve. All that'd be required is for government agencies to mandate non-gendered policies of themselves and make funding conditional on the provision of services and publicity thereof for men.

Professors in Love – TFF Episode 37

AVfM Video Source · 4 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 37 Professor Fiamengo discusses vilification of male professors who become romantically involved with a female student.

StudioBrule

Women: misogyny 2.0 is heading straight at you

Paul Elam · 4 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In the most recent fit of moral panic over unruly men, the Daily Mail's Cindy Tran reports that an Australia based private Facebook group, Bloke's Advice, some 200,000 members strong, is a white hot cauldron of hatred of women.

Armed with a collection of screen shots and bushels of righteous indignation, Tran both reports on and makes personal commentary about what she calls sickening, extreme, misogynistic, degrading and vile displays of advocacy for rape, revenge porn and domestic violence.

After draining herself of adjectives to describe how awful the group of blokes really is, she mentions another Facebook page, Red Hearts Campaign, another one of Australia's seemingly endless stream of women only advocacy groups.

Red Hearts Campaign, possibly an aspiring version of the very lucrative White Ribbon Campaign, infiltrated Blokes Advice and launched a name and shame campaign on the members, ultimately getting the group shut down.

I am sure that will do a lot of good. None of those guys will ever be able to talk on the internet again, unless it is some place like socfreespeech.com, which won't be closed down due to lack of spine in the management.

At any rate. I read the complete article by Tran, which took all of four minutes because I am a slow reader. After doing so, it leaves me with two things I need to say.

One, yeah, there is some rank shit there. Definitely not the kind of conversations you would have in the presence of polite company.

My uncles favourite saying was "if trees had c[redacted] you'd never speak to women" and I can see why. Your all [redacted] in the head.
Like · 4 minutes ago

I'm defending the page...
Like · 3 minutes ago

Ironic [redacted] is referring to a SAFE space; a SAFE space where men can talk about their dangerous, anti-social, sexist, disgusting agendas.
Unlike · 1 · 3 minutes ago

Exactly. It's what men do! We talk [redacted] And it's not a "safe" space. We just don't wanna hear people whinging about what we talk about.
Like · 1 minute ago

That is about all the indignation I can muster for this group and the men in it, which brings me to the second thing I have to say about it, to Cindy Tran, to Red Hearts Campaign and to the dozens of hand-wringing commenters who flooded in to crow in disgust about Bloke's Advice.

NewsGirl1, London, 1 week ago

This makes me feel sick. I was out last night at a hen party and was not drinking. I literally had a guy grab my neck and pull me towards him in an aggressive manner and moan at me cos I wasn't being "cooperative" and having a dance with him. Yuck!!

Click to rate 2474 136

Soundofthunderracer, London, United Kingdom, 1 week ago

Sadly, it is a result of the lack of proper parenting. I was brought up by my grandparents who taught me respect for women, my elders, the police etc.....

Click to rate 2001 74

UKTK, Reading, United Kingdom, 1 week ago

I wonder if these men think the same about their Mothers, Sisters, Grandmothers etc. I'm confused over how a man can hate a woman just for being a woman!

Click to rate 2187 53

So I ask, to the lot of outraged idiots, what did you expect?

I mean, seriously. What on earth did you ever expect?

50 years of non-stop male bashing, demonizing men from cradle to grave, pushing them out of higher education and the workforce, then calling them underachieving losers, attacking their hobbies and interests, like video gaming, just because you can, smearing them all as potential rapists and treating false rape allegations like a joke, ignoring the gender suicide gap, moving fathers out of the family home like they were defective pieces of furniture and raising two generations of women who look down their noses at men like we were the great unwashed, and you are now what, shocked that there is a growing number of men who don't think much of women?

Well, boo-fucking-hoo.

Just what is it that Tran is expecting men to do? Get on the outrage wagon? Send themselves to the guilty corner to wear a dunce cap? Seek out the members of Blokes Advice and tell them to quit hating on women and start acting like "real" men?

I have a better idea. How about as men we just shine it on and tell Ms. Pantiesinatwist to quit boring us with her petty first-world bellyaching?

You know, I'll tell you what really is shocking. It is shocking that Tran, The Red Hearts Campaign and anyone else poised on high to clutch pearls and shriek like b-movie damsels, didn't see it coming a long time ago.

Abused, fatherless men end up in a lot worse places than a private Facebook group raging about women. The Facebook group is actually a pretty mild thing compared to what could be happening, like gangs and prison.

I know, that doesn't sit very well with the terminally entitled princesses (and their male sycophants) of our modern media who are perfectly willing to send moles into private groups to find things that offend and scare them. Not that I give a rat's ass what offends and scares women on the big bad internet, anymore.

If it wasn't Bloke's Advice, they would just find something else to wax victim about because that is what they do.

They'd rather tilt at windmills than figure out that if you put a dog in a corner long enough and kick it, it will eventually come out biting. If you disenfranchise and denigrate human beings, strip them of their role models and savage their dignity, they eventually turn mean. You can set your watch by it. Well, unless you are too stupid to tell time. In that case, you can write for the Daily Mail.

What is really ironic is that those screeching the loudest about the man threat are generally in the same camp as those who claim to have the solution. It almost always involves the idea that masculinity is defective and that the worship of women, aka feminism, is the answer.

But take a look at the Red Hearts Facebook page. I went through a few of their posts earlier and stopped when they started moaning and pissing about Jessica Valenti quitting Twitter because her poor little feelings meter was spiking.

First of all, good riddance, Jessica. Second, if I were a young man, confused, fatherless, looking for something better in life and I stumbled on the Red Hearts Campaign page, I'd head to the nearest revenge porn site on the double and post away, figuring my odds would be better.

That is the sad result when all young men have left to them is to either bow and scrape in self-deprication, or find refuge in hostile resistance to the same. The former is the most common choice. The latter is infinitely healthier.

And yes, if it sounds like I am saying it is better for men's mental health to tell women to bugger off than it is to condemn men for misogyny, then you are reading me right.

That is why, even though I don't agree with what I saw posted from Blokes Advice, that I don't have any sneering condescension or lofty judgements to make.

Call me crazy, but if your society is producing groups of men that hate women numbering in the hundreds of thousands, you might want to take a much more nuanced and sophisticated look at why that is happening than standing on some simpleton notion like "men is bad."

This is just one more pitiful saga that serves as a telling example of how misogynists are made: not from having power and privilege, but from having those very things lorded over them in a social climate that deems mistreatment of men perfectly acceptable.

Feminists are now reaping what they have sown, and true to their interminably stupid style, they are blaming the crop they planted for springing leaves and bearing fruit. As they powerlessly wail into the increasingly expansive intellectual vacuum of the mainstream audience, it will do them little good.

The only slight bit of discomfort that I have about the growing backlash is that it will be visited on quite a few women who don't deserve it. Collateral damage isn't just a bitch, it is also caused by them.

One can only hope that decent women take it as reason to stand against the true source of the problem, instead of lining up for tickets to the feminist Whine Festival.

Feminists are going to be forced to lay in the bed they made. They may be able to close down a Facebook group, but they can't do a thing about the fact that the backlash is here.

Of course, being so painfully stupid, feminists will try to pin the rising tide of true misogyny on the Men's Human Rights Movement. They are too dense and too stubborn to know that we have always been the potential solution.

They probably won't even catch on to the reality of it after this stuff moves offline and into their day to day lives in the real world. Not even as it causes a real lack of safety vs the penny ante version of that now contained to the internet.

As for me, it could not be easier to say how little I care.

Masculinity deconstructed, liberated and unchained

Tim Patten · 4 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A recent episode of HBO's Real Time with Bill Maher featured an interview with Rebecca Traister, feminist and author of All the Single Ladies, who sang praises for the book's themes of the rise of independent women and gender equality. Among other things, she noted that more than 50 million unmarried women are now working, escaping male oppression. That total has been rising fast, with females now representing about half of the U.S. labor force. Indeed, the progress seen so far has inspired the National Organization for Women (NOW) to lessen its emphasis on workplace equality and focus instead on helping females to "appreciate their bodies."

One fact that Ms. Traister failed to mention, however, was that this evolving landscape has also liberated us men from the deeply ingrained and longstanding belief that women should have unfettered access to our wallets, resources, capabilities, and vitality. While she and others with a narrow-minded lens focus almost exclusively on how women are benefitting from gender equality, we men have been liberated, empowered and enabled to express our masculinity more freely and become unshackled from traditional marital penitentiaries and financial oppression.

Masculinity Unchained

For the first time in our history, perhaps, a large and growing number of us men can pull our shoulders back, thrust chests out, stand tall and inhale deep, satisfying breaths of fresh air. We are free from the never-ending harangues imploring us to "Be a man!" "Get a better job!" "Grow up!" and "Man up!" Seemingly overnight, masculinity has been deconstructed from the patriarchal ideal that men have one role and nothing else. We are no longer just protectors and providers. We can transgress arbitrary constraints and pursue unconstrained endeavors, such as being our genuine selves.

In sum, men can finally move beyond archaic and outdated notions that our role in society is to endure years of hard labor to support and ensure the survival of others. We no longer need to adhere to the socially-constructed stereotype of masculinity; we are free to define it for ourselves and celebrate it in any way we choose. "Being a man" no longer means we must act in uncomfortable or unfamiliar ways or engage in behavior that is at odds with the essence of our gender identity. It means we can be what we want or were meant to be.

Prophecies of Japan's Herbivore Men and MGTOW

Over 50 million of us who are single have the option of reclaiming our virility, which has been subsumed by a long history of matriarchal oppression and the claustrophobic bondage of familial burdens. Fortunately, the path forward has already been illuminated by the social prophets of Japan's Herbivore Men and the global movement, Men Going their Own Way (MGTOW), who long ago prophesied immense changes in the relationship between the sexes. Their prescience has helped forge a new masculinity and given rise to myriad choices for men regarding their sexual relationships.

In the modern, post-patriarchal age, men are no longer obligated to be the family wage earner; we can be free of a life of labor that is not of our own choosing. We no longer have to put others' needs ahead of all else, where we must work long and grueling hours with little opportunity to spend time with those, such as our children, who we are supporting. Manhood is now being defined as we see it, not as others do. Our manly dreams, aspirations and personal goals no longer come last. With both sexes having equal opportunity, acquiescence to an obsolete social framework is no longer men's only option.

Houses of Detention

I rued the day my male friends decided to wed. After they had married, things changed almost immediately. Suddenly, they had no time for the passionate pursuits, entertainment, and hobbies they had enjoyed with others and me when they were single. They were pushed into household-ish activities like shopping with the wife. Before long, the spouse would control every moment of his day, occupying his time and attention with doing and fixing things for her, their family and their home. Over time, marriage sucked the life and soul out of my male friends.

In fact, legally tying the knot has often walled men into a kind of prison, where wives are the wardens who supervise all relationships, appointments, activities, gatherings, and goings-on. In the past, men have, more often than not, grudgingly gone along–humbled, contained, subdued and restricted by the domestic goddess. Over time, this fostered widespread emasculation, leaving many males embarrassed and sometimes even relishing a wife escape to the endless hours of drudgery at work they were forced to endure.

Sadly, even these efforts have been deemed not enough. Many wives have lofty and usually costly expectations about what they want or need. They press husbands to work harder, by putting in extra time or getting a second or third job, to ensure they can satisfy their biological destiny of being a mother. If men complain about their treatment or the unfairness of it all, they are punished by a lifetime of bickering and drama. “Happy wife, happy life” has become their motto of survival.

Freedom of Choice

Thankfully, feminism’s goal of gender equality has accelerated a long-overdue revolution that they probably did not anticipate. We men now have the option of jettisoning nightmarish and one-sided relationships for meaningful, self-actualized lives of self-determination and happiness. We can choose to be single, with or without children. If we decide to start a family with someone we love, we can first ascertain that partners are willing and able to pay their fair share. If we marry, we can ensure that prenuptial agreements are in place, protecting what we have if or when she decides to call it quits.

We can finally free ourselves of the shackles of marital suppression, ending the backbreaking burden of being responsible for others until the day we die from overwork or exhaustion. It is now up to us whether we choose to be in a relationship or the single life, which in its modern incarnation has become quite amazing. We are re-engineering masculinity in our own image and for ourselves. Women can no longer objectify us and seek to capitalize on our status, career, and financial or other resources.

Closing the Pay Gap

Gloria Steinman once said, “We believe that men and women should have equal rights.” The radical lesbian feminist leaders of the late-1970s women’s movement, in declaring a war on men, stated, “Women want everything that men have.” Nowadays, females do, in fact, have access to a broad and diverse range of jobs and vocations, with little holding them back. If they keep pushing themselves to the limit–as they have long pressured us to do–they can achieve a level of independence that they might once have only imagined.

By the same token, the advances they have made–and will likely continue to make–mean that the bar is being raised ever higher in regards to the contributions they must make to provide for themselves and their families. Ironically, we can help them go one step further. We can use what we learned from our role as obligatory breadwinners and implore them to “Get a better paying job!” and “Woman up!” We have the expertise and awareness of what it takes; in fact, no one understands this idea better than we do.

Indeed, we can help women by pressuring them in the way they pushed us: “Suck it up! Do what men have done for millennia! Close the pay gap by choosing extremely high paying occupations.” We should stand behind their desire for equality and encourage them to take good-paying jobs as roofers, street-sweepers, power-line installers, and refuse workers. We should support their efforts to become pilots, engineers, mechanics and deep-sea fishermen (or fisherwomen). We should discourage them from working in childcare, social work, administrative and food services, and other traditionally low-paying careers.

If women are as loyal to their families as they always insisted we be, they will undoubtedly seek out and consider occupations that pay high wages but demand substantial effort and involve a great deal of risk. As they expected of us, they shouldn’t hesitate to do whatever is necessary to bring home the bacon. They should be reassured that being under pressure, feeling constantly tired and frustrated, and relegating their individual needs and wants to the background is necessary in an equal opportunity world.

By then, women will truly understand what it means to be the breadwinner.

The Coriolis Effect: a book review

Paul Elam · 7 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

JT has published some very well received articles on men and masculinity for this website. For those who have not read them, I invite you to enjoy them now at the links below. PE

On Masculinity

How to Ignore Sexual Assault

Mansplaining

Orlando: Facing West From California's Shores

Joy of Masculinity

Take Back the Light

The Coriolis Effect, by JT, will sweep you through its 310 pages with the force of a nor'easter howling through the concrete canyons of New York City. That in itself is an impressive accomplishment given the complexity of the story. It's a crime novel that includes all the crucial elements – sinister characters, betrayal, avarice, gruesome, exquisitely explicit violence and in the end a justice of sorts.

The heart of the story, though, the core around which the vortex of carnage and criminality swirl, is the infinitely more labyrinthine connection between a father and son stranded at the edge of estrangement. JT paints this world of missed opportunities, of grief and the brutal weight of silence, with deftness and courage. And he does so with the understanding that only a man can possess.

Available in Paperback and Kindle

Even more to his credit, the author injects, sometimes forcefully, an unflinching examination of what most great novelists will never touch: feminism's corrosive effect on men and masculinity.

For some, this may feel awkward at times. Those uninitiated in the politics of gender might even conclude that an agenda has been forced into the narrative, like a Shakespearian soliloquy laced with passages about global warming.

The fault for that, if there is one to be found, lies with the reader and the culture that shaped him, not with the novelist. For in the end, this is a story about masculinity as much or more than anything else. It is about a pursuit of manhood that can be as elusive as a father's approval or a son's forgiveness.

JT simply puts to page that which dwells in the minds and hearts of all men, fathers and sons, and what most of them dare not say aloud. Even to themselves. It is not that these things are forced on the reader. The author instead puts readers in front of a mirror that reflects everything, even the shadows of their unspoken fears.

From the first few pages, The Coriolis Effect will draw you into a crime story that stands on its own merits against the backdrop of an approaching storm. But soon, like its namesake, the world will shift around you as you stand in place. The storm and the crime will be revealed for what they are: metaphors in the inner world of men and their fathers.

On a personal note, I have waited for years for this novel to be written. Perhaps I have waited for my whole life. I am pleased to say it was worth the wait. And I dare say, worth the weight.

If you have been frustrated reading otherwise good novels that are stained with ideas you left behind for a better way of thinking, reading The Coriolis Effect will make you feel right at home.

Buzzfeed's 50 shards of feminism

August Løvenskiolds · 7 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

What makes one a feminist, or proves the depths of one's commitment to feminism? Let's take a look.

Does one's knowledge of feminism make one a feminist? I know several anti-feminists like Karen Straughan and Janet Bloomfield who are anti-feminist in large part because of their deep understanding of feminism. Even a neutral non-feminist might have a lot of information about feminism and not adhere to that philosophy, just as one can cite scripture and not be Christian.

So how about one's feelings of sympathy for and about women – do feelings make one a feminist? Again, the answer is no: many traditional gynocentrists care deeply about the welfare of women and reject feminism out of skepticism over feminists' treatment of women as a sort of deficient mini-man who just needs to develop a more manly lifestyle to be as valued as a man is valued.

By what standard of action or belief does one become a feminist? Most feminists point to the dictionary definition of feminism and relentlessly insult and otherwise shame women and men who reject the label "feminist." Yet, many people who say they favor women's legal and social equality still reject the feminist label. One can know a lot about cancer without being afflicted with it, and one can covet immortality without making the connection that cancer cells are immortal.

Feminists almost universally deviate from the dictionary definition to support women-only privileges like protection from genital mutilation, protection from hostile speech, abortion rights for women only, infant surrender rights for women only, child custody defaulting to the mother, women-only safe spaces, and so on. Identification with these non-equality issues is a better marker of feminism than anything other than perhaps self-identification as a feminist.

How Much Of A Feminist Are You? is the title of a recent post on Buzzfeed, a test/listicle survey that purports to test one's knowledge of, and adherence to, feminism and common feminist beliefs. If, of course, feminism had any well-defined beliefs beyond their nebulous dictionary abortion. The Honeybadgers, with help from TL;DR, ripped it here, but they only seemed to cover a few of the 50 questions over the course of their two and a half hour video. Shoe0nHead tackled the test here. Margaret MacLennan engaged the test here, but the sound drops out in parts of her video.

The author of the test makes some mistakes that derail the test from measuring one's level of feminism. Several of the questions push not feminism but rather paternalism or benevolent sexism – the idea that women are innately weak and need to be guided or pushed into men's roles in ways that men find naturally. Some questions are clearly classist rather than dictionary feminist – they either expose the Marxist roots of feminism or, conversely and bizarrely, they emphasize the implicitly privileged nature of feminists, something that is apostasy to core feminist values. Some of the questions appeal to virtue-signaling, a public relations ploy in response to social pressure to appear noble or chivalrous or feministic, rather than address a feminist principle or goal. A virtue signal item is not a test of feminism so much as it is a fly-by advert and apology for feminism.

Let's go through all 50 of the questions to evaluate them regarding their accuracy in delineating the extent of one's feminism. And, of course, have a spot of fun along the way. In the end, I will also suggest some further questions that would have improved the accuracy of the test.

1. I would be willing to give up some of my salary if I had to so that equal pay in my workplace could be a reality. This question addresses classism and virtue signaling but not feminism – generally, it is employers who set salaries, not employees. One could be a feminist and still not wish to subsidize slacker employees, particularly if one thought the underpaid men were the ones slacking.

---

2. I believe that men and women should be equal. Sort of the dictionary feminist ideal, I suppose, but one can recognize fundamental differences in the sexes and still favor, say, the dictionary feminist goal of legal gender equality. In this way, the question gives a false negative to bona fide feminists and a false positive to non-feminists who support gender equality despite feminism.

3. I can't help but be bothered when a song includes misogynistic lyrics, even when I otherwise like the song. This question would give a false positive (count as feminist) to traditional gynocentrists who use benevolent sexism to want to protect delicate women from harsh lyrics. It would give a false negative to intersectional feminists who tolerate misogyny from minority-produced music as a rejection of, say, haughty white women with higher privilege.

4. I know who Bell Hooks is. I know enough to know that intersectional radical feminist "bell hooks" spells her name without capital letters, so this question gives me a false positive as being feminist when I am not. One can pick criminals out of a mug book without supporting their crime sprees. A feminist, like the author of this test, would get a false negative for failure to get hooks' name right.

5. I can define intersectional feminism. Anyone can define intersectional feminism as "butterflies and rainbows." Whether this is an accurate definition shared by feminists is another matter.

6. I don't use the phrase "hey guys" when referring to a group of people that includes men and women. In the South, "hey ya'll" is common and "hey guys" is comparatively rare. This does not mean that the South is festooned with feminists.

7. I have taken a women's and/or gender studies class. This question screams that feminists are a privileged class fortunate enough to study dilettante courses in college. Many people who take these classes become so disillusioned with feminism they swear off of it forever (false positive). Self-radicalized feminists are also eliminated by this question (false negatives).

8. I think it's important to encourage girls to pursue science and math as a career. My God, how paternalistic can one get? Yes, the test implies women are so pathetic we must help them along in life in ways that are unnecessary for boys, and this misogynistic opinion of women is a test of one's feminism?

9. Women should be allowed to apply for a job if they fulfill 60% of the job requirements. More gynocentrism and paternalism – and since when are women forbidden from applying for any job they fancy, regardless of their level of qualifications? Applying for a job and getting a job are different things. Jeez.

10. I think we should change women's bathroom symbols to not include traditionally "feminine" clothing (skirts, dresses, etc.). If women are so fragile that conventional signage makes them wet their dungarees, then, by all means, let's pamper them. With Pampers. Real diapers. Just don't try to pass off this trivialization as a real feminist issue. Wow.

11. I believe trans people should be able to use whichever bathroom they identify with. In addition to this question being ableist, there are plenty of feminists around who are TERFs (trans-exclusive radical feminists) who either don't care or are hostile to any "born male" incursion in women's spaces like restrooms.

12. I believe it's important to encourage women to negotiate. Right, because women are fragile and stupid compared to men, and we need to take care of them like the idiots they are. Such benevolent sexism has obvious problems.

13. I believe Jennifer Lawrence should earn as much as her male costars. But what if she makes more? One could be feminist, I think, and not want to penalize Lawrence for her career success.

14. I do not think a movie should be released unless it passes the Bechdel test. The Bechdel test started as a feminist joke, and one could well be a serious feminist and realize how silly it is: to pass, a movie must have two named female characters who talk about something besides men. Like maybe shoes.

15. I believe all genders are entitled to the same social and political rights. Given that both egalitarians and MRAs agree with this, it is hardly a unique marker of feminism. So, lots of false positions. Also, many radical feminists reject equal rights for men or trans folks, so lots of false negatives as well.

16. I can explain why "78 cents to the dollar" is not a fully accurate description of the gender wage gap. While intersectional feminists reject that statement of the wage gap for racial reasons, non-feminists reject it because it is a distortion of the reality where life choices and hours worked affect earnings, making those with non-feminist objections count as false positives. Many commonplace feminists know little beyond parroting the basic wage gap line, making them false negatives.

17. I believe that women who possess certain types of privilege are responsible for advocating for women who don't have their level of privilege. So much wrong! Making women responsible for anything is anathema to the victim narrative of feminism. Treating some women as guardians for entire classes of weaker women is about as paternalistic, racist and classist as one can get. This point of feminist internal conflict is lethal to the item as a meaningful test of one's feminism.

18. If I had a daughter, I would encourage her to be anything she wanted to be. Virtue signaling and quite literally paternalistic – but Dad, I'm 32 now!. Note that other items on this test encourage caregivers to channel women into traditional male disciplines rather than tolerating women who choose, free from coercion, their paths in life.

19. I would make it clear to my daughter from an early age that her identity should never be defined by her relationship status. Finally, an actual feminist statement: stomping on the dreams of women who want marriage and family, and teaching young girls that they should abandon their dreams of family harmony to fuck around all they want on their husbands, and show no hint of loyalty to their commitments. This is as pure a statement of feminism as I can imagine. You go, girl, and kiss your domestic bliss goodbye.

20. I believe it's important to compliment a woman's intelligence over her looks. So much idiocy! Wow – your smarts makes up for your butterface. Feminists have always been hostile to compliments on the street (catcalling) and at work (sexual harassment, hostile environment). The social ineptness of this item becomes clear when one remembers that "she has a great personality" is code for a woman who is overweight or otherwise deficient in the looks department. The classist, elitist nature of compliments about one's intelligence is a minefield. So, no, such compliments are not important whether feminist or not.

21. I believe that a woman has the right to choose what happens to her body. Badly phrased – a feminist might well feel that a woman should have such rights but is denied them because, say, tampons are not free, and government issued (except in New York City). Such a feminist would say instead that "a woman should have" such rights, not that she "has" them.

22. In an instance of sexual assault against a female, I am inclined to believe the assaulted person is telling the truth until proven otherwise. In other words, one must overturn due process of law when the victim is a woman but not a man – another women-only privilege supported by feminists in open defiance of legal gender equality. I would like to think that one can support both gender equality and legal integrity, but perhaps we need the benevolent sexism instead? The gender bias of this item is staggering.

23. I can explain Marlene Dietrich's influence on women's fashion. She dressed like a dude. While fashion trivia does influence the lives of billions of women, does this make it a distinct, substantive feminist issue, or does it indicate feminism in someone who knows about Dietrich? Again, knowing historical points is not a reliable indicator of feminism.

24. I know what a "Bad Feminist" is. Roxanne Gay's book "Bad Feminist" argued that women who imperfectly follow feminism's edicts on, say, rejecting femininity and family choices can still be worthy feminists. This is in direct contradiction to collectivist feminists like Anita Sarkeesian, who argue that compliance with feminist orthodoxy is critical to feminism's success in destroying patriarchy and then, civilization. Very few feminists are aware of the nuances of these issues but would falsely check this item "yes" out of their ignorance.

25. I believe that women should be able to dress however they want without it dictating how they are treated by society. Another woman-only privilege claimed by feminism that has nothing to do with gender equality – men are judged on their clothing, or lack thereof, all the time by society.

26. I have never said that a woman "asked for it." But what if she did actually ask for it? Does recognizing women's agency in making requests mean that one is not a feminist? Wow.

27. I am offended by catcalling. Is feminism reducible to one's emotional response to social interactions? There are many non-feminist women who are discomfited by catcalls. On the other hand, uber-feminist writer Jessica Valenti feigned offense at catcalling but now she is discomfited that she has grown so unattractive that she no longer catches men's attention at all. Feigning offense at getting attention might well be a marker for feminist virtue signaling, but that is not the same as actually being a feminist.

28. I don't think women should get VIP treatment at nightclubs and bars, just for being women. Finally, a question that takes on benevolent sexism head-on. The problem is that many nominal and even serious feminists have a deeply hypocritical doublethink when it comes to cases where sexism works in their favor.

29. I think police brutality and its correlation with race is a feminist issue. While fighting racial discrimination is an excellent virtue-signal, does that make it a marker of feminism? Even the terrorist organization ISIS discourages terror attacks on non-white people because such attacks are bad publicity for Islam and their terror groups. ISIS is not well known for their ties to feminism, although perhaps they should be.

30. I think we should stop promoting models as the ideal female body type. While I agree that plus-size models are terrible, unhealthy role models for girls to aspire to, one's taste in female body type is naturally defined by some sort of theoretical model reified by actual living human models. In other words, attacking attractive women for finding employment as attractive women has nothing to do with gender equality. This makes the question nonsensical and not probative.

31. I think we should stop photoshopping women's bodies in the media. The thing is, "we" don't photoshop for "the media". The media does that to satisfy their estimation of market demand for their product. A feminist might well think this is a benign practice, and a nonfeminist might find "natural" bodies sexier via their seeming more attainable. Making things sexier, or not, is not exactly a feminist value.

32. I have never called a woman bossy. Feminist writer, comic and actress Tina Fey entitled her autobiography Bossypants. This illustrates the principle that one may call a woman "bossy" as a figure of ironic speech and still be feminist. A nonfeminist might well avoid the term "bossy: to avoid gratuitous or even job-threatening repercussions from feminist hostiles.

33. I think companies should offer more child-friendly time and programs to women who are having children. More special women-only privileges. This is not feminism, but it might well be seen as gynocentric, especially since men are implicitly excluded.

34. I believe that a woman should be offered the same opportunities for promotion as her male co-workers. Feminists are well-known for advocating for "affirmative action" and "rigging elections" in ways that discriminate in women's favor over men. This item is a virtue signal that distorts feminism's actual practices when it comes to "equal" job opportunity.

35. I believe that if a woman wants to pay on a date, her date should let her. Although no-strings hookups have replaced the buggy whip practice of "dating," as it was known, *n*ote the implicit privilege of this question – women can pay, or not, as they wish. This privilege alone would justify legalizing the wage gap so that men could afford the company of skinflint women.

36. I believe that women should have easy access to birth control. More special privileges for women but not for men. That equality idea got flushed faster than a fetus in the toilet. Gynocentrism has taken its place.

37. I believe that in a relationship the domestic duties should be shared. Well, I suppose that after a hookup a man should redon his clothing before he departs, but expecting him to toss her clothing into the hamper seems sort of creepy to me. Consent to sex is not consenting to yard work – men should be able to say no to all domestic duties if they so please.

38. I think that a couple should have equal responsibility over the aesthetic and cleanliness of their home. Not really impressed with the grammar of this item – I might have written it as "people in a committed domestic relationship" rather than "couple" – but there is a deeper issue of feminism generally resisting placing any responsibilities on women at all for things like women's personal safety, clothing choices, salary negotiation, career choices, fidelity, tipsy sexual exploits – but now women have to share responsibility for housework? I guess that is a start when, and if, feminism decides that women are adult enough to make binding commitments.

39. I believe that men should be encouraged to be involved and make choices in the wedding planning process. And prisoners should be allowed to pick their method of execution. Now, feminists have been fighting against marriage since forever, so why not put a stop to marriage by stopping that precursor to marriage known as the wedding? I guess even a feminist girl needs to have "her special day" and purport to get her fiancé to pretend like he is getting a loyal wife instead of a man-hating fraud who is baiting him into child support, asset division, and alimony. For a feminist, the chief benefit of marriage is the divorce.

40. I believe that men and women have the same emotional strength. If so, why do we need to guide and encourage women more so than men? Since when has inborn emotional equality been a feminist issue? And what is "emotional strength," anyway? It could be (1) the ability to feel emotions, (2) the willingness to express emotions openly, (3) resistance or resilience to the debilitating effects of strong emotions, (4) suppression and control over one's emotions, or (5-50) something else entirely.

41. I do not think that it is the responsibility of a man to protect a woman physically. This is just ludicrous – countless feminists complain how they feel threatened around men and rely on men to protect them in every conceivable or contraceptive way.

42. I believe that men and women should be equally encouraged to express their emotions. Those of us who identify as MRAs know that the chief shaming tactic feminists use against our advocacy is that we are whiners – we express our feelings about our human rights openly and without apology. While feminists might SAY they want men to be able to express feelings, it is a trap so they can then flip and blast the men for having feelings and expressing them.

43. I have never asked a woman why she does not have children. This is a virtue signal – implying that feminists are never rude nor pry into one's personal business – even when they encourage women to "Shout your abortion" or go on slutwalks. As it happens, "couth" is not a feminist virtue – indeed, they often say "Well-behaved women seldom make history."

44. I would be equally excited to have a son or a daughter. More virtue signaling – in 2015 feminists were stung by the story of "Lana", a feminist who supposedly aborted her son because he was a boy. Of course, feminists favor killing their children for all sorts of reasons – just not gender, it seems.

45. I think American workplace culture is often not structured in a way that is helpful or encouraging to women succeeding. Lots of recent stories have suggested that feminism has retarded or ruined the opportunity for women to find experienced male mentors – men have learned that helping women is an open invitation to be charged with sexual harassment or some other imaginary misdeed. Still, special workplace coddling of women is not equality.

46. I think women have a responsibility to help and encourage other women to pursue their goals. Virtue signal. Feminism always seeks to strip women of responsibility even to each other. Indeed, feminists trashing each other is one blood sport they seem to relish over all others.

47. I think women are equally capable to men to be the President of the United States. Virtue signal. In any case, U.S. Presidents are hardly paragons of virtue or effectiveness.

48. I believe that women have no responsibility to make a conscious effort always to be friendly and polite. Given feminists' universal status as Mean Girls even to each other, this is one of the few questions in this test that is right on the money. Of course, feminists always demand that men be accommodating to women's feelings in social situations, creating yet another unequal standard backed by feminism.

49. I have never criticized a woman for not wearing makeup or wearing too much makeup. Virtue signaling. Feminists criticize women for their makeup choices all the time – women who care about their appearance are said to suffer from "internalized misogyny" – they even make wildly popular videos of parody feminist makeup.

50. I believe a woman is a woman if that is what she calls herself, regardless of her physical attributes and makeup. Virtue signaling. There is a whole branch of feminism known as trans-exclusive radical feminism or TERFs dedicated to the rejection of trans women as women. Those feminists would be shocked to learn that they are not feminists.

After the bare handful of questions in the original test that were even halfway effective at identifying feminists, one might well ask, what questions can one ask about the amorphous mass that is both feminist orthodoxy and practice to do a better job of weeding them out? Here are some of my suggestions based on my experiences with feminists:

- It is okay to pull fire alarms spuriously and make fake sexual harassment claims at gatherings of men's rights activists.
- I believe MRAs should be publicly shamed as whiners who need to man up.
- I believe MRAs should become feminist allies instead of advocating for men.
- I believe in "patriarchy theory" – the idea that men as a class oppress women as a class throughout history.
- I believe it is acceptable to say "kill all men" because that is just ironic humor but saying "kill all women" would be horrible misogyny.

- I believe a woman hitting a man is not a big issue because men are stronger than women, whereas a man hitting back in self-defense is misogyny.
- I believe a woman hitting a man is not a big issue because such women are “punching up” against oppression, whereas a man hitting back in self-defense is enforcing patriarchy.
- I believe it is more important to stop female genital mutilation than male genital mutilation.
- I react with glee when I hear a man sustained a genital injury, especially if a woman did it deliberately.
- I rock a side-shave, problem glasses, and/or neon hair.
- I am under 32 and think that slutwalks are an awesome way to fight rape culture and the patriarchy, OR I am over 32 and feel strongly that slutwalks send the wrong message and damage the feminist brand.
- It is not my job to educate you on feminism even though that is the job description of feminism advocates. Educate yourself.

THAT is what a test for feminism looks like.

The Therapy Racket: why men don't seek help and what to do about it.

Paul Elam · 8 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

You know, it's no secret that men are far less likely to seek professional help than women. That doesn't just apply to mental health services. Medically speaking, men are far less likely to pay attention to and seek help for physical problems.

This isn't just an urban myth. It is backed up by pretty solid research. When I Googled the term "Why men don't seek help," the very first return I got was for an article in the American Psychological Association that cited a study published in 1993 by Psychologist Dr. John Vessey. He reviewed several epidemiological studies concluding that women constituted fully two-thirds of mental health outpatient clients.

This holds true even though men have a drastically higher suicide rate than women, and are affected as much or more often by problems like substance abuse and stress-related disorders.

In the area of physical health, the numbers are similar. The second Google return I got was a 1999 study from the Department of Family Medicine at the State University of New York Health Science Center. It was conducted, and I quote, "to report the family physician's perspective on why men do not access the health care system for medical problems."

The study's conclusions were unsurprising. Three key themes were identified, which I paraphrase as follows:

(1) Support: Men appear to get most of their support for health concerns from their female partners, little from their male friends.

(2) Help Seeking: Perceived vulnerability, fear, and denial are important influences on whether men seek help.

(3) The researchers concluded that men were hindered by traditional social role characteristics: a sense of immunity and immortality; difficulty relinquishing control and a belief that seeking help is unacceptable.

Men also reported that the time it took to tend to medical issues was a barrier. Generally speaking, it appears they felt more obligation to professional life than to their own health.

Finally, the number three link I got back from Google on my search was from everydayhealth.com in the form of a medically reviewed article on why men don't seek help, specifically with depression.

The usual culprits were identified in this article, with the National Alliance on Mental Health being cited as saying that a complicating factor is that men who are depressed often suppress their feelings rather than showing sadness and crying.

Also quoted is Dean F. MacKinnon, MD, an associate professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine in Baltimore who says that men may see their symptoms as a sign of weakness, likening the situation to the idea that men don't like asking for directions.

"Men don't ask for direction," he says, "because it makes them seem weak, but also they are afraid they won't get the right information."

The raggedly cliché stereotype of men offered by McKinnon is a common theme throughout all three of the first Google returns on the question of why men don't seek help.

The American Psychological Association article asks us to imagine the Marlboro Man and how unlikely the image is of him asking for help, and of course, goes on to infer something inherently flawed about masculinity being at the root of the problem.

The article even quotes the notoriously misguided American Psychology Association president, Ronald F. Levant, whose theoretical approach is deeply rooted in patriarchy theory.

Levant is also the primary author of something called the "Normative Male Alexithymia Scale," which assumes a default lack of emotional acumen in the human male stemming from the fact that we are all (except for him and his peers, I suppose) the product of toxic, socialized masculine values.

It's a simple picture, repeated throughout the mental health professions and even to an extent in the medical profession. Men are out of touch with their own needs and stubbornly refuse to get help for their problems out of a misguided bravado that masks a childish fear of being seen as less than invincible and herculean. According to Levant, and most of his professional contemporaries, men literally die because they are trying to prove their manliness.

As you dig into their rationale, you will see them blithely attribute this to social messaging. We say to young males: big boys don't cry. Man up. Be a man. Be tough. Don't be a pussy or a fag, and they internalize this message to the point that they ignore pain radiating down their left arm or coughing up blood.

They become so dissociated from their own emotional condition that they don't notice feelings of depression till they put the barrel of a gun in their mouth.

Like all universally bad ideas, there is perhaps a kernel of truth in this. Certainly, there is merit to the idea of making more room for the emotional lives of boys. But are we really to assume that this social messaging alone, born from millions of years of masculine evolution, is the culprit? Is this merely a problem of socialization that we can solve by instilling feminine values in our male children? Can we socially engineer men to be more psychologically and physically healthy?

Well, there is no shortage of people trying. Even my cursory examination of Google returns put that front and center. But maybe we are leaving something out here. Maybe there is another factor that might shine more light on this important subject. Maybe, there is something more powerful at play than a barrage of social messages from parents and peers about what takes to be a man.

Perhaps examining another area of human life as seen through the lens of research will help us out. To do so, I am going to acquaint you with a term you will likely not be familiar with. The term is pathogen disgust. And yes, it is a thing. Pathogen disgust is a measurement in women for their level of distaste for men who present as possibly unhealthy. According to the interpretation of the study involved, unhealthy, unmasculine and unattractive are all interchangeable.

According to clinical psychologist Dr. Vinita Mehta in Psychology Today, when it comes to sexual selection in women, pathogen disgust plays a huge role. The study in her article asserted that, "Pathogen disgust predicts women's preferences for masculinity in men's voices, faces, and bodies." Jones and Benedict, et al, confirmed that attractive masculinity and peak physical health were synonymous terms as they apply to sexual selection.

Even more interesting, the study also examined the areas of moral disgust (the man's general sense of values and trustworthiness) and sexual disgust (defined by Dr. Erin Ben-Zeev as being illustrated by "disgust at certain types of taboo sexual behavior, such as pornography, incest, or pedophilia -and even, among certain sectors of the population, sexual infidelity, homosexuality or sexual experimentation."

The results were clear. Moral and sexual disgust were in no way predictive of how masculine women perceived men to be and therefore did not factor into whether they were sexually selected.

Pathogen disgust, however, is a deal breaker across the board.

And so we are very clear on this matter. Men seeking help, medically, emotionally, psychologically, perhaps even in asking for directions, is a trigger for pathogen disgust in women. and therefore being rejected by them.

Ronald Levant says,"Many boys learn from their parents and from other children that they are not supposed to express vulnerability or caring." I take note that he did not mention women in this equation, nor would any feminist academician if they wanted to maintain good standing with the sisterhood. So, Levant omits the most powerful influence for men in order to remain safe with his peers.

Men do learn the things Levant mentions, and they learn them well, from the women who will view them as losers if they demonstrate any evidence at all of pathogen. This leaves men to be trained to accept a normative standard of women who sexually coerce men out of self-caring behaviors.

A mental health professional claiming to recognize toxic messages to men, yet missing this bombastic, poisonous reality, is so flawed that one has to wonder what drugs they must be taking.

If I weigh sexual rejection, isolation and the inherent sense of unworthiness that comes with it against the alleged impact of my high school football coach telling me to man up and take the pain, I am pretty goddam sure which one is potentially more detrimental to my emotional well-being.

It is not the messages of childhood, the media, and social circles about manhood that leads men to silence about their pain. It is the guarantee that they will be condemned to a sexual and emotional void when they speak.

We shame men for not expressing their emotions in the same way women do. The bitter irony is that when men do put themselves in an emotionally vulnerable place with the world, we shame them even more.

Why on earth should men trust mental health professionals who aren't even wise to that?

Of course, they shouldn't and not just for that reason. What we see across the board from mental health professionals, in their own aversion of pathogen disgust, is an attempt to mold all men into their personal and political worldviews. Rather than create therapeutic models to address the particular needs of men, their solution is to coerce men into meeting the ideological needs of therapists — which are shaped and molded by their predominately female clientele.

James Mahalik, Ph.D., of Boston College, and co-author Michael Addis, Ph.D. published in the American Psychologist. They outlined some of the factors underlying men's reluctance to seek help. Chief among their items, they say, is masculine role socialization. "To benefit from counseling," they say, "a man must admit that he needs help, must rely on the counselor and must openly discuss and express emotion. These requirements conflict with traditional ideals of what it means to be male: toughness, independence, and emotional control."

What they appear to be saying is that manhood itself is an obstacle to psychotherapy. At the very least, they see masculine strength and masculine values as antithetical to good mental health.

Let's see a mental health professional try that kind of bigotry on women and see what happens to their career.

Their point, as unlikely and incredible as it may seem, is that men must learn to articulate feelings in a more feminine way and present them on demand for an hourly fee for the convenience of the therapist in his or her office. This is madness and an abusive form of it.

In the Everyday Health article, Dr. Amit Anand notes, "that it can be difficult to convince some men to try talk therapy." I speculate that the reason for this is that men are not stupid. Talk therapy, as most commonly practiced, is a hard sell to men in the same way it is hard to sell them on astrology and the power of crystals.

The shame here is that while most of these supposed professionals demonstrate a lot of expertise on the political and ideological definition of men, they know little to nothing about real life, living and breathing men as they actually are.

This deficit in understanding is likely the main cause for the thinly veiled condescension that permeates their perspective. They are just talk about, not to, a population that does not trust them, and for good reason.

There will be much more on this, and some practicable solutions, in the not too distant future. I have begun a book that will almost certainly be published under the same title as this article. I hope to have it completed and out in advance of the next International Conference on Men's Issues in Gold Coast, Australia next June.

♦♦♦

Also, I am ending this with an announcement and in invitation for you to join An Ear for Men Forums.

The forum is designed to give men, all men and only men, a place to gather and talk about the issues they face in life. It is for single men, married men, estranged fathers and fathers who are raising their children. It is also for men in the dating scene and for those who have sworn off women altogether.

Unlike A Voice for Men, it is not an activist site. It is not about men's rights at all, but about men's well-being. Like all forums, it will start slow. So, if you are interested in helping us build a community where men can talk about issues, in whatever way they want to talk about them, please visit, register and introduce yourself to the group that is already there.

MRAs: Colorado is calling you. Better pick up the phone

Paul Elam · 8 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Important update: If you want to attend this event, email me at paul@avoiceformen.com so I can put you on a mail list. We are capping attendance at 20 people and 10 have already signed on.

Also, here is a good read on purchasing airline tickets that may be helpful.

In March of 2017 AVFM is planning a retreat for MRAs in the mountains west of Denver. This will be a relatively small group, 15-20 tops, to meet in a lodge or group of cabins within an hour of the Denver airport, starting EDIT: Thursday, April 27, and ending Sunday, April 30.

We will conduct the event largely as we did the retreat last October in North Carolina. We will be securing a group rate to keep it affordable for everyone. A $50 buy in per person for food for the duration will be required (we ate well in North Carolina) on that budget. Totally BYO on party materials.

Everyone is expected to provide their own transportation from the airport to the event and back, but like last time there will be several who drive in or rent cars at the airport, so if you want to make arrangements with another group member to share car expenses that is fine.

Only one rule at the retreat. No activism. There will be food galore, beautiful scenery, great fellowship, lots of good conversation, but NO WORK.

Things we learned from last time. The mountain lodge was fantastic, but it was a complete bitch to get to on the mountain roads. We will be choosing something with easier access this time. But we still want to keep it fairly isolated.

We have not nailed down a location yet, but we intend to keep it comfortable and reasonable. Your lodging for the whole event should not be any more than a couple of hundred dollars, plus the food budget.

Other than check in and check out, there will be no timetable of events. Most of us will be cooking, chewing the fat and talking shit around a camp fire at night. But this is Colorado after all. Plenty to go see and do for those who want to.

All AVFMers, AEFMers and MGTOW are invited, provided that WE KNOW YOU. No, Clementine, you are not invited. This one is open to men and women alike.

If you are interested in coming, please email me at paul@avoiceformen.com to claim your spot. I will put you on a mail list for the retreat. When we nail down the location, we will send you a link to it so you know what to expect, and provide you a deadline for payment.

It will also be helpful to you if you are on Skype, as we will be forming a Skype retreat group for more open communication.

Oh, and I promise not to take video of you shouting obscenities at Jessica Valenti. Well, unless of course you want me to.

We had an amazing time at the last retreat, and we are due for another one.

Another, in a long line of false military sexual assault cases

Michael Conzachi · 9 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On June 28th, the Daily Caller published my Editorial; "A Travesty of Justice: Collateral Charges in Military Sexual Assault Cases ."

I described the routine practice; as Defense Secretary Ash Carter proudly proclaimed, of charging those, facing allegations of sexual misconduct with "collateral" offenses, to ensure and guarantee a conviction of some minor offense, in the event, the accused is acquitted of any sexual misconduct charge.

As has been the practice for some years now, it is no secret that a serviceman who is merely accused of some type of sexual misconduct will face a court-martial. It doesn't matter if the allegation is true or not, and any and all military law enforcement investigative effort is made with the sole purpose of building a case for prosecution. Absent is the concept of determining the truth. No effort, nor expense will be spared to find that "dirt" on the accused, or in some cases, manufacturing that "dirt."

I routinely hear horror stories of military law enforcement agents going back into an accused's background, 20 years or more, contacting any and all persons that the accused may have had some relationship with, to see if incriminating evidence can be found to assist in the prosecution effort. In many cases, false and misleading information is intentionally presented to these individuals to get them to provide potentially damning information. If the person provides information supportive of the accused, either the interview is not documented, or the information is glossed over and paraphrased, giving it little to no significance.

Routinely, these military L.E. agents will tell these persons; "So and so has been charged with rape and we need your help getting a rapist off the street." They will "inform" the individual of the transitional compensation program available to them that is usually in the amount of approximately $250,000 doled out for about four years. If the person is a current or former service member, in addition to the transitional compensation program, they further "inform" the potential victim of obtaining Veteran's Administration benefits for a claim of PTSD due to "Military Sexual Trauma (MST)." Claim benefits range from 50 to 100% and in most cases, result in monthly payments that hover around $3,000 – $4,000 per month for life or more, plus lifetime medical and psychological treatment.

No proof of an actual assault is required to obtain VA PTSD benefits due to MST. A simple life disruption, such as anxiety, depression, marital problems, or a divorce is all that is needed to file a claim. Although a few claims are denied and challenged; for the most part, they are almost always approved. The VA websites contain all necessary information to petition for and receive these benefits, and can be found with the click of a mouse.

Consequently, there is and has been a great financial incentive for making false allegations of sexual misconduct.

Financial incentives, divorce, personality disorders, revenge, regret, and covering for one's own misconduct are the usual garden variety reasons for filing false sexual misconduct allegations. Although there have been a handful of scenarios where sanctions were imposed for making false claims and committing perjury, there is little chance that an accuser; even if their fabrications are exposed, that they will not face any punishment whatsoever.

As a result of my Daily Caller article, the number of emails I have received have been staggering, most with a common request; "please help us." Surprisingly, most have been from women; wives, girlfriends, mothers, and sisters of falsely accused male service members.

In a growing number of cases, there appears to be another motive for the filing of false allegations against male service members. I will share a recent email that I received from the wife of a falsely accused male service member. The individuals wish to remain anonymous as there are still legal issues to pursue, and I have reviewed official reports, records and transcripts to authenticate the claim. I have redacted certain information to protect their identity and to prevent any compromise of future legal actions.

> Subject: Regarding your article: “A Wednesday, July 20, 2016″
>
> Dear Mr. Conzachi,
>
> I hope this email is finding you well. I am writing to you in regard to your opinion article “A Travesty of Justice: Collateral Charges in Military Sexual Assault Cases.” This article has hit very close to home. Everything you have written has been exactly what my family has been going through for the last 2 years.
>
> This was a quote in your article that nailed everything. “In case after case, we are seeing collateral charges being “stacked” on top of sexual misconduct charges to ensure that the accused is found guilty of “something.” The attitude seems to be, “if we can’t get you for rape, we’ll get you for not turning in that old pair of boots six years ago.”
>
> This is EXACTLY what is happening to my husband who has been serving in the [redacted]for 17 years. He was falsely accused of sexual assault and was found guilty in the court martial setting. The accusations were coming from a [redacted] service member who prefers the same gender. She at the time, wanted to be placed with her wife. In order to do so, she accused my husband of sexual assault in hopes to be removed from the base and placed with her wife. In the meantime, she herself was being investigated with [redacted] for falsifying government documents and adultery.

This seems to be an ever-growing motivational trend for the filing of false sexual assault allegations; the objective was to be reunited with same-sex partners in a preferable duty station or assignment. To get to the duty station you want, or to be reunited with a same-sex partner; simply accuse a male of sexual assault. Problem solved.

> As a result, my husband was charged without legitimate evidence with assault [redacted]. He lost his rank from an [redacted], they took money out of his pay check (along with the rank change), he does not hold the same title, ordered to be restricted on base for 2 months, and now they are trying to go through the separation board process. The woman was found guilty for falsifying government documents; she received extra duty with hard labor.

To clarify; the accused initially faced allegations of sexual assault however when the evidence became overwhelming that all sexual misconduct allegations were false, the court-martial proceeded forward, and the accused was eventually found guilty of simple assault, and other minor infractions.

This another example, wherein the false accuser was not sanctioned for the filing of false allegations of sexual assault, and only when overwhelming evidence of falsifying official government documents which had been provided to civilians, to avoid a civilian financial obligation, and those civilians provided the documents to military authorities. Was the false accuser held accountable for her actions involving the fraud, but not for falsely accusing a male service member?

> Sorry for the rant, however, I just wanted to say that this is so unfortunate for our service members. My family has served in the [redacted] and my husband and his family have been members of the [redacted]. It is so sad and such a shame these issues are happening to our hard working service members without a blink of an eye or even consideration by anyone.
>
> I just wanted to say thank you for acknowledging this issue and if you have any suggestions to help make this process easier for my family I would be forever grateful.
>
> Sincerely,
> [redacted]

Phone messages to the specific duty station where this occurred have not been returned.

Just as the number of wrongful prosecutions in the military has increased exponentially, the reasons, motivations, and financial incentives have also increased.

Currently, it can be safe to say; that on allegations of sexual misconduct, the military is in a state of “prosecutorial frenzy.” It appears the mere hint or utterance of the word “rape,” in the military, “triggers” quivering commanders who have soiled themselves and an armada of zombie-like self-centered prosecutors, ethically void military law enforcement agents, and a host of others with titles beginning with the word “special,” all simultaneously chanting in monotones:

CONVICT! CONVICT! CONVICT! CONVICT! ARRRRRRRRR!

Just as the kangaroo courts of college campuses have made a mockery of legitimacy and logic, combined with the mandated codified evisceration of due process and constitutional rights, the same has been going on for some time in the U.S. military.

Just as the kangaroo courts of college campuses, the military sexual assault investigation, and prosecution process has metastasized into something resembling a B horror movie, where the uninfected person, running for their survival is unable to escape the blood-thirsty apocalyptic chanting mob, and finally, succumbs. Life altering events; prison, personal and financial ruin, personal reputations and friendships destroyed, a career loss or in shatters, and the loss of children are always the end result.

The actions to address this current miscarriage of military justice and the human right’s abuses that routinely occur would mirror Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn’s 1973 Samizdat book The Gulag Archipelago. His book laid out the history of the Soviet Gulag between 1918 and 1956 and described the constant oppression that the authorities engaged in to eliminate debate and political opposition.

Haven’t we already seen similar Gulag style tactics in these kinds of cases in our own U.S. military, and amongst some of our Pentagon and political leaders?

In today’s military, those who are falsely accused of sexual misconduct, no longer have hope or faith in the process but are in despair. The knowledge and hopelessness that by a mere accusation, their lives, as they know it, are over.

No one; neither I nor any other men’s human rights advocate; man or woman, is going to deny that actual sexual assaults occur, and when they do and are fairly investigated and prosecuted, then those violators should and must be punished in accordance with applicable laws.

But’s that’s not what is happening. The false and misleading political narrative of the “epidemic” of sexual assault in the military must be reinforced at any and all costs and by any means necessary. To satisfy the blood-lusts of the hysteric sexual assault cottage industry; convictions; heads on a platter; is THEE ultimate goal; again, at any and all costs and by any means necessary.

The case example described in the above email is just a drop in the barrel.

Anyone with the cognitive quotient of three above plant life is able to distinguish and identify the difference between a valid complaint of sexual misconduct, and one that on its obvious face is wrought with fraud and motivated by personal vendettas. Having said that, then logic would presume that most of those who are making these decisions to prosecute fraudulent cases, do in fact have the cognitive quotient of three above plant life.

Either that or they are part of the same fraud.

Philip L. Sherman of NY, “Known Genital Mutilator,” Plus Dr. Money’s Epic Failure

Gary Costanza · 9 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Circumcisor Philip L. Sherman has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From Mr. Sherman’s website emoil.com:

“Biography – Cantor Philip L. Sherman, Certified Mohel
Cantor Philip L. Sherman was trained by Rabbi Yosef Halperin in 1977 in Jerusalem, Israel and is certified by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel and the Brith Milah Board of New York. He is familiar with both Ashkenazic and Sephardic customs and traditions.
Cantor Sherman has been invited to Japan, Singapore and Hong Kong to perform brisses and he is available throughout the tri-state area including New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Westchester, Rockland and Long Island. Cantor Sherman is a member of the Cantorial Council of America and the Screen Actor’s Guild.”

Yes, Mr. Sherman is a Cantor, a title which means: “an official who sings liturgical music and leads prayer in a synagogue,” and which also has nothing to do with surgical abilities or knowledge. As such I will not promote religious titles or designations, as I afford everyone the respect they deserve by actions, not titles.

Mr. Sherman was asked under “Faqs:”

> Do you have to be rabbi to be a Mohel?
>
> No. I happen to be a cantor and there are many rabbis who are also mohels. One doesn’t have to be a rabbi or a cantor to be a mohel.

Wow, anyone can be a mohel!

But what does it take to be a mohel? Some amount of training to get “certified,” neither of which the law seems eager to regulate or enforce.

So, for non-doctors to perform circumcisions they just have to be a Jewish (or Muslim) man or woman with two good arms – enough to cut with!

And I bet you thought it illegal to practice medicine without a license.

It is.

But does it really matter? Would Female Genital Mutilation (FGM) be any better if done by doctors in hospitals instead of behind closed doors? No, it’s the principle of the thing. Then why, you may ask, do I bring it up?

Let’s ask some questions:

- Does the law seek out people who perform medicine without a license? Yes, all the time.
- Does the law check the credentials of circumcisors? No, there is no one who checks if non-doctors have the skills or training to perform surgery on infants.
- Can anyone perform infant circumcisions? Appallingly, yes. Though technically illegal (as if human rights were a technicality) anyone with (or without!) a religious affiliation, training, or title are cutting infant boys.
- Can anyone perform FGM? No one, not even doctors.
- Can anyone perform any other surgery on infants? No, only licensed doctors are allowed to perform medically necessary surgery on infants.

What can we conclude? That there is no patriarchy, and that this gynocentric society singularly ignores the sexual abuse and genital mutilation (circumcision) done to infant boys by anyone who wants to do it!

Intactivists and MHRAs are actively fighting this, as opposed to feminists, who, as their name implies and despite their claims, care nothing about equality or stopping routine circumcision of baby boys.

Dr. Money's Epic Failure

Before I continue with Mr. Sherman's KGM listing, I'd like to briefly share the tragic story of David Reimer, one of twin brothers who accidentally lost his penis during a circumcision and was then raised as a girl. Always doubting his sex was female, at age 14 he reclaimed his maleness and changed his name to David. His case famously disproved the theory that gender is a social construct, the same theory that feminists still hold on to. His doctor, Dr. Money, pioneered the use of surgery to 'fix' intersexed babies (making them M or F, then raising them accordingly), then concluded that any baby can be raised boy or girl. He was the first to use the term "gender identity." David had a troubled life and sadly committed suicide at the age of 38.

Here are some excerpt's from the book (highly recommended) "As Nature Made Him – The Boy Who Was Raised As A Girl" by John Colapinto:

> …shortly after the twins were seven months old, Janet noticed that they seemed to be in distress when they urinated. At first she thought it was just the wet diapers that made them cry; then she noticed that even after a diaper change they would scream and complain. She examined their penises and noticed that their foreskins seemed to be sealing up at the tip and making it difficult for the boys to pass water. She took the babies to see her pediatrician, who explained that they were suffering from a condition called phimosis. It was not rare, he said, and was easily remedied by circumcision. After talking about it with Ron, Janet agreed to have the children circumcised at St. Boniface Hospital.
>
> …Ordinarily, pediatricians experienced in circumcisions performed the procedure at St. Boniface Hospital, but on the morning of April 27, 1966 the usual attending physician, for reasons lost to history, was not available when the Reimer twins were scheduled for their operation. The duty fell to Dr. Jean-Marie Huot, a forty-six-year-old general practitioner.
>
> …Regardless of which clamp was used, it is not in doubt that Dr. Huot elected to use not a scalpel to cut away Bruce's foreskin, but a Bovie cautery machine. This device employs a generator to deliver an electric current to a sharp, needlelike cutting instrument, which burns the edges of an incision as it is made, sealing the blood vessels to prevent bleeding – a quite superfluous consideration if Huot had indeed used a Gomco clamp, and a dangerous one, since it would bring perilously close to the penis a current that could be conducted by the metal bell encasing the organ. If, at the same time, the current to the needle were to be turned up almost to the maximum, the results could be cataclysmic.
>
> According to the later testimony of operating room personnel, the electrocautery machine was turned on, and the hemostat dial, which controlled the amount of heat in the needle, was set at the minimum. Dr. Huot lowered the needle and touched it to Bruce's foreskin. Subsequent testing of the machine revealed it was in proper working order. Whether through temporary mechanical malfunction, user error, or some combination if the two the needle failed to sever the flesh on the first pass. The hemostat control was turned up. Once again the instrument was applied to the foreskin; again it failed to cut. The cautery machine's current was increased. The needle was once again brought into contact with the foreskin.

I heard a sound," recalls Dr. Cham, "just like steak being seared."

A wisp of smoke curled up from the baby's groin. An aroma as of cooking meat filled the air.

A urologist was quickly summoned. On duty that morning was Dr. Earl K. Vann. He cleared the instruments and inspected the organ. It appeared oddly blanched in color. He felt the penis with his gloved hand and noticed that it had an unusual firmness. Vann took a probe and attempted to pass it through the urinary meatus – the hole at the end of the penis. The probe would not pass through. Vann told the operating room personnel that he would have to perform an emergency suprapubic cystotomy to place a catheter and thus enable the baby to pass urine. He made an incision below Bruce's belly button, then threaded a length of tubing into the incision, through the muscle wall, and into the bladder. This was sewn into place. A bag to catch the child's urine was affixed to the free end of the catheter. The baby was then wheeled out to the burn ward.

It was decided not to attempt to circumcise his twin brother.

…In a businesslike voice he told the Reimers that there had been an accident while circumcising baby Bruce.

"What do you mean, an accident?" Janet said.

Dr. Huot said that Bruce's penis had been burned.

"I sort of froze," Janet recalls. "I didn't cry. It was just like I turned to stone." When she finally gathered her wits enough to speak, Janet found herself asking if they had also burned her other child.

"No," Dr. Huot replied. "We didn't touch Brian."

Ron and Janet asked to see their injured baby right away. The doctor said that Bruce was recovering from a surgical procedure to install a catheter. The Reimers were told not to worry, that they could see the child tomorrow. They collected their uninjured son, Brian, and drove home through the steadily falling snowl

The next day Ron and Janet returned to the hospital. Dr. Vann took them to see the baby. Janet's first glimpse of her son is a memory that even three decades later causes her face to drain of blood. Standing over Bruce's bassinet in the burn unit, she looked at his penis – or what was left of it.

"It was blackened, and it was sort of like a little string. And it was right up to the base, up to his body." To Ron the penis looked "like a piece of charcoal. I knew it wasn't going to come back to life after that."

Nevertheless, Janet asked the urologist, "Will it still grow, and he'll just have a little penis?"

The doctor shook his head. "I don't think so. That's not the way it works."

Over the next few days, baby Bruce's penis dried and broke away in pieces. It was not very long before all vestiges of the organ were gone completely.

…It only added to the young couple's misery that Brian's phimosis had long since cleared up by itself, his healthy penis a constant reminder that the disastrous circumcision on Bruce had been utterly unnecessary in the first place.

Textbooks in medicine and the social sciences were rewritten to include the case, and a precedent for infant > sex reassignment as standard treatment in cases of newborns with injured or irregular genitals was established. The case also became a touchstone for the feminist movement in the 1970s. when it was widely cited as proof that the gender gap was purely a result of cultural conditioning , not biology. For Dr. John Money, the medical psychologist who was the architect of the experiment, the so-called "twins case" became the most publicly celebrated triumph of a forty-year career that in 1997 earned him the accolade " one of the greatest sex researchers of the century."

>
> But…the experiment was a failure – a fact not publicly revealed until that spring [of 1997], in the medical journal Archives of Pediatrics and Adolescent Medicine. There, authors Dr. Milton Diamond and Dr. Keith Sigmundson had documented how David had struggled against his imposed girlhood from the start and how, at age fourteen, he had reverted to the sex written in his genes and chromosomes. The paper had set off shock waves in medical circles around the wold, generating furious debate about the ongoing practice of infant sex reassignment (a procedure mere common than a layperson might think). The paper also raised troubling questions about the way the case had been reported in the first place, why it had taken almost twenty years for a follow-up to reveal the actual outcome, and why that follow-up was conducted not by Dr. Money or Johns Hopkins, but by outside researchers. The answers to these questions, fascinating for what they suggest about the mysteries of sexual identity, also brought to light a thirty-year rivalry between eminent sex researchers, a rivalry whose very bitterness not only dictated how this most unsettling of medical tragedies was exposed, but also may have been the impetus behind experiment in the first place.

This could happen to your son.

What have we learned from the above?

- Don't circumcise your infants
- Feminists were wrong

Click here for more information about phimosis and the care of the foreskin.

Mr. Sherman links to some articles, including one thought-provoking piece from "The Atlantic" that profiles him and touches on some important legal and medical issues discussed above. He gets criticized for cutting non-Jewish (funny, right?) infants, and reveals he has a website for non-Jews that's actually called – get this – "Holistic Circumcision," sort of like 'military intelligence.'

From that website:

> A comparison between Holistic and Hospital Circumcisions:
> Hospital/Doctor Circumcision:
> 1. Ten to forty minutes
> 2. Baby strapped down
> 3. Injection/topical creams
> 4. See one, do one, teach one
> 5. Clinical and cold
> 6. In the hospital
>
> Holistic Circumcision:
> 1. 20 -30 seconds
> 2. Baby held by warm, loving hands
> 3. No drugs, injections or creams.
> 4. Almost 30 years; more than 17,000
> 5. Spiritual and meaningful
> 6. At home

Boy, I'm sold. Gentle and loving genital mutilation. And quick!

Under "Stories" we read:

> The Head Nurse
> The Head Nurse of a major New Jersey hospital called me. A friend of hers had attended a bris and relayed to her that the baby hardly cried at all during the procedure. The nurse was writing a paper to present to the doctors about pain relief during circumcision. She asked what I used on the infant to minimize the pain. I told her that I hadn't used anything. She thought I was kidding, but I told her I thought she needed to ask different questions. The questions she should be asking are: who is performing the circumcision, how much experience do they have and what technique are they using. If it is a doctor with very limited experience using a technique that takes twenty to forty minutes with the baby strapped down to a molded, plastic body board, then they will have a baby in great pain and distress. I explained that as a mohel, I have performed thousands of circumcisions and my technique takes twenty to thirty seconds while the baby rests comfortably on a pillow held by the warm, loving hands of the grandfather. I told her that if a new operating technique were discovered that took one-tenth the time and the recovery was minutes instead of hours or days, there would be seminars and symposia held all over the country touting this new technique and every hospital would have a mohel (read: holistic circumciser) on their staff.

The point is not how efficient, or gentle, or quick we can cut a child, it's that we are doing it at all. Routine amputation of a nonconsenting infant's body part is unethical and illegal. Watch this disgraceful Channel Thirteen profile video of Mr. Sherman talking about his career ~~cutting infants' penises~~ as a mohel. Think about it – would we admire someone who mutilates little girls' vaginas?

Then we read "AIDS and Circumcision:"

> If there was ever a more persuasive reason to circumcise, it is the recent discovery that circumcision is a simple and possibly potent weapon against new AIDS infections. Circumcision protects women and reduces the spread of AIDS. The article ("Circumcision Studied in Africa as AIDS Preventive") appeared in the New York Times on Friday, April 28, 2006. An excerpt:
> "Perhaps the most compelling evidence came last year from a study financed by the French government of 3,274 men outside Johannesburg. Half of them underwent circumcision; the others were uncircumcised. After 17 months, 49 of the uncircumcised men became infected with H.I.V., while only 20 of the circumcised men caught the virus. The study was called to halt in March 2005 when a review board decided that it would be unethical to withhold circumcision from the control group. Researchers estimated that the procedure reduced the risk of contracting H.I.V. by roughly two-thirds."

This AIDS argument has been debunked and really makes no practical or moral sense. Are they telling men to forgo condoms in favor of mass circumcisions? Won't they think they're then immune to AIDS? If they wear a condom, what does it matter? What does this have to do with violating the rights of children who may never be at risk of AIDS?

Under "FAQs:"

> How do I explain to my three-year-old what a circumcision is?
>
> I don't think very young children need to have the surgical aspects of a circumcision explained. In general, I also recommend that children under the age of ten or twelve not be permitted to watch the circumcision.

I agree that we should explain certain things such as this at an appropriate age, but however and whenever you do explain it, it's still the horrific thing that any three year old would see as wrong. Apparently this barbaric ritual is profitable and promoted by some in the medical establishment, allowing grown-ups to deny what is obvious to any three-year-old.

Here Mr. Sherman reveals his “foreskin count” and his record for one days cutting (11).

Since Mr. Sherman has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Intactivism Update: I received the following email regarding a paper by the Attorneys for the Rights of the Child that was part of a debate with the AAP, called the CDC guidelines into question, and finally published in a major medial journal.

“In July 2016, the Journal of Law, Medicine and Ethics finally published the paper by ARC Executive Director Steven Svoboda, ARC Legal Advisor Peter Adler, and Bob Van Howe from the Twentieth Annual Thomas A. Pitts Lectureship in Medical Ethics, held at the Medical University of South Carolina in October 2013 pursuant to a conference titled, “Ethical and Legal Issues in Pediatrics.” This is the longest and most comprehensive general article Steven has ever published and we are very happy to finally see it in print.

Steven was the only non-physician invited, and debated the American Academy of Pediatrics’ (AAP’s) Dr. Michael Brady in a talk entitled, “Newborn Male Circumcision–Is It Ethical; Is It Legal?” Steven also appeared in a “Seminar on Pediatric Controversies” opposite Brady and Douglas Diekema, also an AAP Circumcision Task Force member. Peter participated in the audience discussions and preparation of our talks. As Bob Van Howe predicted, we proved we know the science far better than the Task Force and Brady found himself unable after hearing Steven’s five-minute presentation in the seminar to rebut a single one of our arguments. As they both personally told Steven, two (!) of the five physician presenters who are not AAP Task Force members were completely convinced by our arguments and went from being pretty strongly pro-circumcision prior to the event to coming to oppose the procedure based on our arguments. This was a true team victory, with Peter, Aubrey Taylor, and Angel Alonso Terron providing awesome support and asking some hard questions the AAP Task Force members simply could not answer.”

Click here to read that compelling and comprehensive paper, “Circumcision Is Unethical and Unlawful.”

Mr. Sherman’s contact information follows:

Cantor Philip L. Sherman
Mohel

Phone: 212.595.0132

Fax: 212.579.3220
Voicemail: 917.448.BRIS (2747)
E-mail: cantorsherman@gmail.com
Mail: PO Box 52, White Plains, NY 10602.

> Philip L. Sherman of NY, “Known Genital Mutilator,” + Dr. Money’s Epic Failure https://t.co/HKsKSzYfw5 @andreaHardie pic.twitter.com/0FbofGPvzF
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) August 9, 2016

Facebook whores

Paul Elam · 10 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I have about 4,500 friends on Facebook. Most days, the only question I have is how many of them are whores. I am serious. I guess I average about three to five friend requests a day, sometimes more. My policy has always been to just automatically approve them. I mean, what the fuck, except for a handful of people that actually are my friends on there, I don't know most of these people from Adam. Or apparently Eve. So I just ok them as friends, then cull out the whores when they start to send me private messages. Lemme show you some of the recent ones. Sara Diane Cole, who just wrote me to say hi.

Sara Diane Cole

I mean, I get it, ok? After all, hey, just look at me. Hot chicks like this just can't help themselves. And not only is there my devilish handsomeness, I am sure that they can tell from reading all my posts that I am a real ladies man. Number one hombre material.

And speaking of hombre material, there is Carla Cepedo, who wrote me to say, "Hola! Buenos noches. Como esta?

And so being the polite kind of guy I am, I answer.

Es fantastico, puta! Adios!

Beverly Cobah Baskins just writes to say, "Hello, how are you dear?"

Well, I'm fine, dear. How's business?

Carla Cepeda

Finally, we have Laura Hill, who wrote to say hi and to ask how I am doing, cause, you know, she is concerned about how a 59-year-old guy on Facebook that she never saw before is doing. I didn't answer because I feared that someone as compassionate and giving as Laura was probably really busy spreading all that love around to a lot of guys on Facebook. Must be one hell of a burden being that good to so many people.

You know, I said, "Finally, we have Laura Hill." I have to admit that is a lie. There is nothing final about these women. They send me friend requests every day. And not a day goes by that I don't unfriend one or two of them who write to strike up a conversation and get to know me cause I am just the kind of man they have always dreamed of.

And like I said, I really do get it, because you know, women that look like this are all over me everywhere I go. I mean, I can't even go to the grocery store without some woman who looks like Sara Diane Cole hitting on me while I am picking up a bottle of prostate supplements off the shelf in the drug section.

Beverly Cobbah Baskins

Now I felt the need to tell you guys about this because I'm sure that I'm one of only a very few men that this happens to. I mean, otherwise, if this were happening to a lot of guys, it might lead one to think that these smoldering hot babes (or whatever greasy, acne ridden dude is actually behind the account) are just leading men on to bilk a few dollars, or maybe a lot of dollars, playing off their hopes and their frustrations because they don't do well with women.

And there is one thing that makes that more probable than not. If you happen to purely by accident find yourself looking at any of the images of these social media harlots, take a look at the likes and comments to their photos. When you do, you will find the only version of toxic masculinity that I have ever seen. Hundreds of likes for a pic of a woman posing like a two-dollar hooker with a string of comments from some of the greatest silver-tongued devils you will ever see in a man's world. Sheer poetry, like, "OMG, you're so hot!" "Wow, you're smokin' babe!" and the ever original, "You so fine, I could get wif you!"

I have to tell you how sick this makes me. I spend every day of my life in one way or another defending men. Men on the other hand, for the most part, spend every day of their lives proving what gullible, brain-dead, fuck-knuckles they really are.

I know, someone out there right now is saying, "Hey, man, that is shaming language. Not cool." Well, sorry, but fuck that. This is behavior men should be ashamed of. How do you think we ended up with a society of women with a picture of themselves or a picture of what they wished they looked like or even dudes with a picture of a woman who can turn a "hello, how ya doing" on Facebook into a fucking cottage industry?

In fact, I bet you anything some blue pill blokes stumble in here, read this article, look at the pics, and their first and only thought will be, "OMG, she is HAWT!"

And let's face it. This shit is everywhere for a reason. Because it works! I bet the line, "Oh yeah, baby, I'd love to come fuck you but I need money for a plane ticket" makes its own black market economy. Why? Because men are that fucking dumb, and that fucking weak.

Bitch at me if you want to, you know it's true. And it isn't just on Facebook. I get this shit on Twitter these days, too. Thank god I am not on Instagram or Snapchat.

And what is even funnier is that if I were to make a meme about this and put it on Facebook, Facebook would take it down and ban me for at least a few days.

So, Facebook whores, if they have any sense of subtlety, are just fine. Pointing out the Facebook whores is probably a violation of Facebook's notoriously psychotic community standards. We can thank men for that shit, too. Facebook isn't run by Margaret Zuckerberg.

I didn't just say this stuff because I felt like ragging on men today. I actually said it because all of this reminds me of how grateful I am for the red pill community. We are a small group. A comparative drop in the bucket compared to the masses of trained seals clapping their flippers together in hopes to be tossed a piece of stinky herring, even as they insist that they are strong, independent men.

There is a bitter part of me that hopes every last one of the dumb fucks gets taken for a ride. At the very least, at some point, they may be useful for their war stories and tales of caution.

—

You can experience more of Paul's work at the following locations:
An Ear for Men Patreon
An Ear for Men Forums
An Ear for Men YouTube Channel
An Ear for Men Website
An Ear for Men Facebook
An Ear for Men Twitter

Philip Davies MP speech at ICMI16 London

AVfM Video Source · 11 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Stop what you are doing and look at this

Paul Elam · 12 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

When someone said a picture is worth a thousand words, this is what they were talking about.

Get Tickets

Opens in Los Angeles October 14, 2016

#redpillmovie

Worldwide search underway for Pokémon campus rapist

August Løvenskiolds · 13 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Students packing in anticipation of a return to campus for the fall semester are breathing sighs of relief today as the mysterious "1 in 4" campus rapist, also nicknamed "Invisibeau" and "Haven Monahan", has been positively identified as "Charmander", a virtual character in the Pokéman universe. Known for his fiery tail and vulnerability to water-themed characters, a worldwide search is underway to capture Charmander as well as his alleged Pokémon co-conspirators: over 15 million volunteers are assisting in the search in the US alone.

For more than a decade, the stealthy Charmander has been raping millions of coeds in ways so devious and confusing that 99.9% of those rapes went completely unreported and unnoticed, and the rare report of these rapes was often dismissed by authorities due to the unlikely and even fantastical descriptions and details provided by the rape victims.

While the nefarious, penis-related and even demonic aspects of Pokémon characters are well known, rape only entered the picture when The Daily Mail reported on a brave Moscow woman, Ekatrina Lysalot (not her real name), who came forward with her harrowing story of being sexually assaulted in her bed after a consensual "play session" with the cellphone application known as Pokémon GO.

> [Lysalot] says the Pokemon disappeared when she jumped out of bed – but says the Pokemon GO app on her phone could still detect the same virtual character's presence on her bed.
>
> She woke up her husband to tell her [sic] what had happened who told police officers that he did not believe her and told her to see a psychiatrist.
>
> Russian news website Bloknot reports that the police did not believe her either and that the woman then went to see a psychic who was unable to help her.

Feminists and their organizations in the US were quick to criticize Moscow police for their failure to "listen and believe" the poor victim. The National Organization of Woman (NOW) is believed to be planning to give Ekatrina a "Woman of Courage" award, the same award they gave performance artist, porn star and former coed Emma "Mattress Girl" Sulkowicz earlier this year.

The identification of the Pokémon rapist offers a surprising solution to the so-called "Dumb Girl" paradox: feminists from President Obama on down have long claimed that 1 in 4 college women are raped but paradoxically less than one in 6000 actually reports an assault. The natural conclusion – that 99.9% of college women are too stupid and/or too craven to report being raped – is known as the "Dumb Girl" paradox since the mismatch in purported rape rates and actual rape reports had no other logical explanation.

However, virtual characters like those tracked by Pokémon GO can go on massive crime sprees due to their ubiquity and their ephemeral, transitory nature in both cyber and meatspace. Virtual copies of Charmander and his gang rape crew can appear anywhere at any time, disconcerting their stunned victims and frustrating the efforts of law enforcement and anti-rape activists to bring this violent scourge to an end.

Compounding the problem is that in the new Pokémon GO, the Pokémon characters are immortal and are thus unstoppable by any known means: they can be stunned in battle (the same way they faint or stun their rape victims) but ultimately the characters can be revived to rape again. The misogynistic rape apologist site Bustle gleefully notes that:

> Thankfully, it appears that the Pokemon in "Pokemon Go" are immune to the Grim Reaper! It may seem cruel to pit the creatures against each other in a gym battle for your team's pride, but Pokemon actually like to fight. They enjoy challenging themselves and displaying their prowess. A Pokemon never dies (hooray!), instead it is "KO'ed" and returns to its ball. Just use a little "Revive" spray and it'll be ready for another fight!

Of course, “fight” is a code-term in Bustle for rape.

In response to the revelations and facing huge Cliff and Huxtable-level lawsuits, Pokémon GO’s embattled parent Niantic doubled down, claiming that all Pokémon/coed relationships are both consensual and committed, and that any coed caught cheating on her Pokémon will be permanently banned.

Given the contentious and unstable nature of the search for Charmander and the wild rape claims and counter-claims, A Voice For Men recommends that college men exercise caution, restraint and minimization in their dealings with coeds, and seek companionship, if necessary, from off-campus, non-college partners.

The Power of Divorce...

AVfM Video Source · 16 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Wranglerstar is a homesteader on the prepper spectrum, and a he's religious trad-con but doesn't feel the need to press the issue, as far as I've seen. He has some interesting videos where he builds things from scratch and shares his "warbags". He's not an MRA, as far as anything he's put out, so seeing the following video, there wasn't much more that he could say, other than to offer empathetic support. However, it got me to thinking, just where do the majority of divorced sons go to learn skills they're expected just to know?

Jesse, came across Wranglerstar, a prepper, a homesteader.

MRA's have a habit of telling broken men to look up MGTOW. But what if these broken men need something more substantial? There are experimental schools out there that provide kids "hands on the world" education, and their boys are succeeding and surpassing public school expectations. Just another option to think about.

Dr. Richard Roberts of LI, NY, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 16 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Richard Roberts has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website theroyalmohel.com:

“About Dr. Roberts

I’m a board certified Obstetrician-Gynecologist located on Long Island, licensed in the State of NY and successfully performed circumcisions for over 20 years. I’m also a certified mohel and completed the Berit Milah Program for physician Mohalim.
This comprehensive program is sponsored by: The Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR); The Hebrew Union College- Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JR); and the Union for Reform Judiasm (URJ).”

Under “FAQs” we read:

> What happens to the foreskin?
> Traditionally, the foreskin is buried after the Bris — covered in dirt or sand. This custom may relate back to the Jews wandering in the desert for forty years. Others believe that the soul of the individual who your son is named after will be brought back to this earth with the burial of the foreskin. Another tradition, is that the mohel gives the foreskin to the parents (after the ceremony in a sealed pouch) and they plant the foreskin in their yard under a new plant or new tree; thus symbolizing a new life that has been brought to this earth.

Nice custom; fully functioning genital tissue is cut off and left to rot in the ground or a pouch, all for some superstitious belief. I’m sure the boy has more use for it.

More “FAQs:”

> How do I explain the Bris to his older sibling(s)?
> I would suggest that you say that this is a ceremony where “your brother will meet with his Jewish family and relatives. All Jewish boys have a Bris on the 8th day of life.” There is also a wonderful book entitled “Rosie and the Mole. The Story of a Bris.” It explains the Bris ceremony in words and pictures that children from ages 2 to 15 should enjoy. It is available through Amazon.com. The authors are Judy Silverman and Katherine Janus Kahn.

Attempting to sugar-coat the act of infant genital mutilation doesn’t negate the violation of that infant’s human rights, something that the child will one day know.

Under “Basics” we read:

> The circumcision itself is not the core element of the service. It is the blessings and intention to bring the child into what is also known as “the covenant of Abraham” that gives the ritual its religious significance. A Jewish male who has not been circumcised is still Jewish-he is considered simply a Jew in need of a “bris.” Likewise, a Jewish male who was circumcised without Jewish rites is considered in need of a symbolic, “ceremonial bris.”
>
> Circumcision itself has been deemed safe by the American Academy of Pediatrics. A circumcision performed in the home, rather in the hospital, is also very safe and may be better tolerated by the baby. Although he does feel some pain, the baby’s discomfort will be brief (the procedure takes only a few minutes), and can be easily soothed following the procedure.

If the ceremony isn’t about the circumcision, why do it at all? The bloodless naming ceremony is fine for the girls, why not for the boys?

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Roberts’ practice information follows:

Cell: 516.455.2374 | Office: 516.466.4128 | Email: RR@TheRoyalMohel.com

Intactivism Update: I received this email from Steven Svoboda of NCFM and ARC regarding progress in the intactivist movement against the pro-circumcision establishment:

> Subject: ARC’s Peter Adler Publishes CDC Article
>
> ARC is proud to annnounce that our Legal Advisor, Peter Adler, has published his article critiquing the December 2014 draft circumcision regulatons from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), “The Draft CDC Circumcision Recommendations: Medical, Ethical, Legal, and Procedural Concerns,” in the Spring 2016 issue of the International Journal of Children’s Rights (IJCR).
>
> Surprisingly, the IJCR violated accepted ethical standards for journals by also publishing in the same issue a response to Peter’s article that is actually longer than Peter’s article without informing him the reply was coming and without giving him an opportunity to respond to it. The response is titled, “Critical Evaluation of Adler’s Challenge to the CDC’s Male Circumcision Recommendations,” and is authored by Beth E. Rivin, Douglas S. Diekema, Anna C. Mastroianni, John N. Krieger, Jeffrey D. Klaussner, and Brian J. Morris. Morris is of course the Australian author who is notorious for self-citation and for bullying journals and authors with whom he disagrees. Diekema is the ethicist associated with the American Academy of Pediatrics who was an unofficial second opponent of Steven’s at the 2013 pediatric ethics debate in Charleston, South Carolina, the paper from which (written by Steven, Peter, and Bob Van Howe) was published in July 2016 by the Journal of Law, Medicine, and Ethics. Both Peter’s paper and the Rivin reply can be found at http://arclaw.org/announcements/arcs-peter-adler-publishes-article-cdc-guidelines.

> Dr. Richard Roberts of LI, NY, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/yjSNicIgSE @AndreaHardie #nocirc #MGM pic.twitter.com/1lf9DhNud2
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) August 16, 2016

Narrative therapy with men

Peter Wright · 17 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As men, we are born into the storybook world of brave knights saving damsels, stoic acts in the face of pain and suffering, and glorious deeds of male heroics. All these things constitute the psychological diet on which boys are raised.

Whether Sir Lancelot, Superman, a great athlete or firefighter, these archetypes silently shape our identity and direct our behaviors, often for the better and often at great cost. They are the living templates men use to map their world, to construct their sense of self, and to direct their behaviors in relationships with others.

Therapy with men, then, must involve a significant and compassionate understanding of the narratives that guide them, and must work within those narratives to carve out a path toward meaningful change.

To that end we will tentatively title a male-friendly approach to working with men, a Narrative Therapy With Men.

Before we get into the nuts and bolts of narrative therapy, we need first to examine the place where therapy, coaching and counseling happens, which is more often than not an environment tailored to suit female sensibilities.

The Therapeutic Setting

Many therapy rooms have pretty decor, flowers, artwork, an essential-oil diffuser, and of course face-to-face seating positioned to honor the typical female preference for eye-to-eye contact and sharing.

You will find tissues placed conveniently on a side table in a decorative box, conveying the silent expectation of tears, shared feelings, and emotional catharsis.

In a way the therapy office mimics an hour at the cafe sipping lattes, for which women might prepare by thinking about what clothing to wear and what juicy bits of personal drama they might like to share. Then to round it off with all the sincerity of here's your bill and have-a-nice-day.

So much for the male friendly therapy environment.

Imagine instead a therapy office in the boiler room of a ship, in a workshop, a park, a building site, mechanics shed or a sports locker room, with seating arrangements that allowed men to sit at 45 degree angles or side by side — engaged in some kind of task if they wished.

Imagine too if we were to engage in some kind of typical male play or industry – not just Jungian sandplay or water-color art therapies as suits the more effeminate sensibilities of women, but hands on therapy – while driving a truck, fixing the engine of a car or building a piece of furniture.

Or, if you prefer, something recreational. Standing on a pier fishing, hiking up the side of a hill or sitting beside a campfire.

When it comes to communication, men like a medium, something through which to channel their energy.

Lea Winerman, a staff writer for the American Psychological Association asks us to "imagine the Marlboro man in therapy."

"The image just doesn't compute, does it?" she half-asks, half-declares. Then she adds with obligatory condescension, "The Marlboro man wouldn't admit to needing help."

We can agree with Winerman that it is impractical to expect the Marlboro Man to sit in a feminized office, with a feminist-trained female counselor and gush his emotions on demand. But perhaps he would be more open to discussing his issues while riding a horse, stacking bales of hay or enjoying a beer?

As with boys, who are more engaged when kinetic learning is applied to the school curriculum, men too are generally more inclined to thrive outside of the prettified and sedentary counselor's office — in the world where real life takes place.

For most men the average counseling office is not only in poor taste, it is at once anesthetizing and pressurized. It is an environment where the senses are dulled and that urges male participants to do something that is already likely a problem in their lives – the expectation to perform for the benefit of a woman.

This is a critical point to make. As we examine the narratives of men, as we look at their stories, what we find with great redundancy is the expectation for them to perform for women. From the mandate to please mothers, to protection and provision for women, to heroic sacrifice and even down to the basic assumed responsibility for the female orgasm, we see men in a role to satisfy through performance.

What then can possibly be happening in the minds of men sitting in female dominated space, box of tissue at their side, with a woman saying "tell me how you feel" about this or that? Even worse, asking such probing questions with the implication that he is an empty emotional vessel in need of her redemption.

There is little there for most men. Indeed, if we honestly and compassionately examine the narrative of men's lives, we have to agree with Ms. Winerman again. There is no reason to imagine why the Marlboro man, or any other man, would have much to say to her at all, and the ones who do are likely just caving to the pressure to perform.

Without some kind of activity or medium to engage in other than naked personal drama and emoting, men tend to disengage. Feminist inspired therapy would have us believe that this is because men are emotionally stunted and ill-equipped to articulate feelings.

In reality, the only thing men are ill-equipped at is being women, which is why standard talk-therapy is such a poor option for most of them.

Like boys, men are more likely to connect with the therapist and be willing to table his issues (vs share his feelings) when they are engaged in something meaningful.

Rather than shaming men as recalcitrant therapy clients, we must take a different approach and offer them a greater variety of places in which to speak to their issues. Therapy can still take place in the traditional face to face manner in an office, but it can also take place in any of the environments mentioned before, providing the therapist is willing to step out of his or her chair and begin walking, literally, while the therapy takes place.

Alternatively, if the logistics of getting together with the therapist are restrictive, digital mediums like Skype can provide the platform, again with special consideration to sitting postures: men might prefer to sit at an angle to the camera and have the therapist do the same, or he might prefer the vision switched to off altogether. For the tech-savvy therapist male-friendly backgrounds for his digital office might be employed on request – a bar, a mechanics shed, a kitchen… you name it.

And yes, unless a client has issues with alcohol, a beer during the session may not be out of the question.

That proposition will seem scandalous to some practitioners. However, we estimate the knee-jerk hostility to such ideas is rooted firmly in an academically acquired ignorance of men and their needs. It is consistent with trying to put them into the female emotional mold.

Finally, the language of the therapeutic session might need to undergo a similar revolution, depending on the client's imagination, with less emphasis on unquantifiable metaphors like personal growth and empowerment, or on feelings, and more on metaphors of manual-activity to describe emotional processes; men speak in terms of wrestling with challenges, hammering problems out, trying to understand the mechanics of depression, and when considering objectives, they might hope to score a goal: to nail it, as it were.

To summarize, a new therapy for men might consider utilizing new settings for conducting consultations, including the use of a wider range of manual activities – occupations and crafts – as therapeutic mediums.

Having briefly sketched out the 'where' of therapy, we can now move onto the 'what' of the therapy.

The Practice of Therapy

Narrative Therapy with Men assumes the following principles as axiomatic:

- Rejects misguided concepts like patriarchy theory and toxic masculinity.
- By definition it is tailored exclusively to men's experiences, men's ways of thinking and behaving.
- Does not hinge on demonizing or problematizing men
- Sees learned detachment as essential to problem solving
- Recognizes the unique emotional and psychological acumen of men
- Sees the therapist as more of a coach or mentor than an emotional conduit.
- Seeks to use men's kinetic inclination as an asset, rather than treat it as an impediment to progress
- Narratives, the building-blocks of our worldview become the focal point around which the therapy hinges, and include the following objectives:

1. Identifying the current narrative

The way we tell our story is the way we form our therapy,[1] so the first task for each man is to narrate his story about himself and his world. These initial narratives form the primary datum which sets the future direction of the therapy, a direction completely unknown until the stories are verbalized.

As stories are shared, likenesses between them and popular cultural stories can be discussed – such as classical myths, fairy tales, biographies of the famous or from movies, to bring the material alive. The comparison stories act as bass chords that animate the material under discussion, and to help depersonalize the content so that it no longer seems unique and isolating – ie. such stories belong to our collective cultural history and are thus very far from personal.

2. Externalizing the narrative

Carl Jung was famed for saying "We don't have complexes, the complexes have us." The same can be said of narratives, including our personal ones. The stories and archetypes that drive our lives underscore the importance of gaining cognitive and emotional distance from them if we no longer wish to be held under their spell.

This is a radical departure from where most therapies in the modern mold take men. In standard practice the agenda of the therapist is usually to drive the client toward reliving trauma or loss and articulating the feelings that surround those things.

While practitioners with men need to have the skills to comfortably handle emotional upheaval when it happens, the objective is to help the client gain more distance from the inner turmoil, affording them an opportunity for practical, rational solutions.

How else, for instance, can a man stop acting sacrificially with women, until he rejects the sacrificial role? And to reject that role, he must be able to see it from a more objective distance, in practical terms. Men rarely need assistance to realize they are in emotional hell with a woman. They often stay silently immersed in it, entangled hopelessly in trying to find solutions that are not forthcoming.

While an exploration of childhood trauma, abusive parenting and unresolved grief may provide more insight into current life troubles, it will not provide what the client needs most. A path out.

Externalizing a narrative, depersonalizing it, helps us to see it as separate from our own self-image, perhaps for the first time. By abstracting the story and dissociating from it we can more easily edit its details and gain mastery: the narrative no longer has us – we have it.

The therapeutic practice of externalizing narratives has a long history beginning with Freud's talking cure, Carl Jung's 'active imagination' to James Hillman's practice of 'seeing through narratives', and on to newer practices such as Narrative psychology and Narrative therapy.

None of the aforementioned, however, have actively applied the technique to the stories men live by – a shameful oversight for therapies claiming to plumb the depths of human experience.

The life of men has heretofore been shrouded in a cloud of repression, amnesia and denial, ironically aided and abetted by the very psychologists called to lift the lid on that repression.

While some have claimed to help men raise consciousness, what in most instances has happened is therapists adding yet more layers of faulty text to an already burdensome set of male narratives. Narrative Therapy with Men aims to reverse the tradition of neglect.

3. Problematizing the narrative

A core tenet of Narrative Therapy with Men is that Men are not the problem, the narrative is the problem.

We view this approach to be corrective on its face. Men are universally saddled with the artifacts of a faulty narrative. Whether that is driven by a failure to be heroic or successful enough to fulfill historic male expectations, or whether it is the more modernized narrative of toxic masculinity, or both, men typically see themselves as the source of the problem.

Continually failing to fix themselves, which their narrative does not allow them to do, aggravates the situation all the more.

Portions of a given narrative may be destructive and other parts may not, which a joint, detached exploration can discover. It can lead to a discarding of the dysfunctional parts and a retention of those parts retaining value and importance to individual men.

It is as simple as keeping what works and tossing out what doesn't, which is easier said than done. We view the main obstacle to that, though, as a lack of detachment.

For instance, shame can be a huge impediment. A man can see a problem, but without detachment, his experience of shame can drive him to deny, minimize and avoid the problem. Until, of course, the problem rears its head, causes pain, and the cycle starts all over again.

The only way, we argue, to interrupt that, is through healthy detachment.

An Ear for Men has detailed numerous examples of destructive narratives for men, such as the belief that men are inherently flawed, that they belong to and benefit from Patriarchy, that they must ignore their health to be worthy of relationships, or that their role in life is to serve women in one capacity or another while denying their own needs and value.

To these the new therapy for men applies the razor, surgically removing criticisms of men and replacing them with narratives of self-worth. And, importantly, it allows men the use of their logic and reason to guide the surgery, not their emotional reaction to the problem.

4. Exploring potential new narratives

Life does not tolerate a void. That is why isolating problem narratives and the work of deleting them runs concurrent with a process of re-narration. In this a therapist and client can be imagined as co-authors working on a novel, where therapist co-writes or ghost-writes a new narrative, running a red pen though all the toxic text.

The new text can be literally anything the client dreams up. The practitioner consults with the client, offers observations, but otherwise gets out of the way and allows the client to have the lead role in the creative aspects of the process.

Narratives men adopt to break free from limiting expectations need not be reduced to reactions against the original problem-riddled narrative, which places the response into a narrow formula of thesis and antithesis. An example of that approach is seen in the tendency of some men to replace misandric narratives with misogynistic narratives. Or, perhaps, men who have been sexually rejected who seek to correct with sexual conquests.

An example of narratives structured along the lines of antithetical reactions vs. more liberating and proactive possibilities was elaborated in an earlier article at An Ear for Men, titled Values-based approach to gynocentrism for men. There we are given the example of three narratives:

1. A gynocentric narrative in need of deletion
2. An anti-gynocentric reactive narrative, and
3. A proactive narrative which transcends the for-and-against-gynocentrism binary

5. Nailing down a narrative

The goal of the new narrative is to serve as a values-centered approach to dealing with self and world.

This part can be somewhat tricky. Values, or what we consider good and bad, right and wrong, purposeful or meaningless, are by necessity a product of our narrative. And they can be as destructive as the narrative itself.

For instance, you can ask a man to tell you about his values. He might tell you that among them are honesty and integrity. So far, so good. But he may also follow that up by saying his values drive him to sacrifice for the benefit of a woman, that a real man takes care of women and shields them from hardship.

The problem with that, as may be apparent, is that millions of men have led themselves to misery, ruin, and even to death, with precisely these values. It is not that their intent is flawed but that they have allowed values for which they have no conscious etiology to put them behind the wheel with a blindfold on, mindless of any values that might have addressed their self-preservation.

Again, a detached review of values, and how they stem from personal narrative is a necessity.

A values-centered ideology is established and articulated by the client at some time during the process of consultations. He may already have his core values clarified and will want to proceed with a narrative that honors them. Alternatively, he may feel his values have been implanted from without or inherited without consent, foreign objects that have brought harm to his health and wellbeing and so seeks to construct a new set of values and an accompanying life script that will do them justice. This can all be done with a practitioner, or simply on a man's own volition, or with a trusted friend.

That, then is a brief outline of Narrative Therapy with Men. It is not intended to be complete, and is indeed still a nascent approach to working with men. The psychological disciplines, as mentioned earlier, have hinted at this approach, have skirted the ideas contained here but without breaching the sacred wall of feminized psychology.

Now we set about the work of expanding on these ideas and calling on others to do the same.

References:

[1] "The way we tell our story is the way we form our therapy" is a quote from Patricia Berry's essay 'An Approach To The Dream,' Spring Journal of Archetype and Culture (1974).

See also:

The psychology of hate
A new psychology for men
Authoring your own life
Playing your own role in life

A values-centered approach for men

The real expendables, falsely accused military men

US Army Major Christian "Kit" Martin · 18 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As first reported by the National Coalition for Men, U.S. Army Major Kit Martin, recently released from custody shares his thoughts from behind bars. -Eds

Joint Regional Correctional Facility (JRCF) Fort Leavenworth, Kansas

After two and a half months in confinement, county and federal, I have to ask the question "what is the purpose of prison?" Is it to punish? Is it to correct? How are those supposed to occur by locking someone up away from their family, friends, and community? How is this supposed to help their family by taking away the human and financial support from spouses and children? Are we not just creating more of a welfare state? The U.S. has 5% of the world's population, but 25% of the world's prisoners. We are now the new Soviet Union, locking people away in "gulags."

This is especially heinous when you look at what is being done to U.S. veterans. Looking at the confinement reports and other FOIA requests you can see that Court Martials are up 550% since 2007. Convictions are similarly growing exponentially. Army prisoners are up from 119 in 2010 to 593 in 2014. This is due primarily to the false sexual assault "epidemic." This is a politically motivated narrative, almost identical to what is happening in our universities.

This is ironic since a review of Americas crime statistics (disastercenter.com) shows nationwide rape and sexual assault is at a 24 year low. Despite this the Sexual Assault Witch-hunt in the military has sexual assault convictions up from 2010 to 2015 from 24 to 427. This includes a threefold increase in 2015. Currently women make up over 15% of military, but amazingly 2015 was the first year a female (at least in the recent past) committed a crime worthy of prison. There was one female prisoner in 2015 compared to 802 military men. A fair and balanced system? I don't think so.

U.S. Veteran men are now the new political prisoners of the world, the real expendables. After years of putting their lives on the line for their country, and sacrificing irreplaceable family time, their country is now railroading them into prison. Their families that also sacrificed so much are being left alone again, but now without any income and security. That money is being given to reward false accusers. This is all being done so that military leaders can show politicians that they are tough on sexual crimes and deserve to keep their convening authority power. This is legal power few of them even understand. It is the ultimate betrayal.

One day these men were considered heroes, the next day they are zeros. They are labeled for life as sex offenders and felons, usually based off of a single false allegation by an ex-spouse, girlfriend, or even a neighbor. When things are bad and a service member is having a hard time, you can always count on the military to make them worse. After years of working to earn rank and respect these combat veterans are now being treated like children, and guarded by children too. Most guards are teenage privates straight out of high school and basic training.

When I was a teenage private I would have been too humbled to even speak to a real veteran such as my current brothers I am confined with now. I was in awe of real Soldiers that had actually fought in a war. Men who were Paratroopers, Rangers, pilots, etc. they were like gods to me. After 30 years and several deployments I am all of those things, what I always wanted to be. I am one of them and proud to be so. My military family is proud of me too. In fact, they couldn't be prouder if I had won the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Yet here I sit, in a small cold cell. But I would rather be here with my brothers than having to associate with REMFs such as crooked JAG lawyers, CID investigators, and self-serving gutless "leaders." If Americans only knew what was going on would they take the time to do something? Would they contact their representatives and complain and demand change, or would they just watch another funny pet video online instead?

What will happen to our country as our military is transformed to appease misandric politicians? It is no longer a defense against foreign aggression, the last resort, it is now a bastion of elitist feminism. Who will take responsibility for its future epic failure in the next real war? Success has many (sorry) mothers, failure has none.

My brothers are labeled rapists and abusers. After a "thank you for your service" welcome home (something Vietnam veterans like my dad never got) they have been locked away without the same constitutional rights they risked all to defend. They served and protected the rights of those that wouldn't or couldn't serve themselves. These veterans are so dangerous that 45 of us often sit around guarded by a single teenage female private, all 4'9" and 90-pounds of her.

Most of these men are fathers of teenage daughters themselves and the funny thing is they would give their lives without a moment's hesitation to protect these same guards. When we must be escorted it is again by these teenage "Soldiers" that have never seen combat or have any idea what the real army was like. Their army is one of stress cards, sexual assault training, and political correctness.

Many of them are good people doing the best they can, but they are not real Soldiers and their "leaders" know better. They know the truth of what is happening to our veterans and yet they do nothing. Privately they will admit it to you, but publicly they hide from it, serving evil and corrupt masters. Like most of the inmates they think they can retire or get out before they are victimized. Many have cheating or abusive spouses, but they know they can do nothing. They must endure the humiliation because just like the Soviet Union or Nazi Germany, it only takes one phone call and the machine will turn on them. The machine spares no one except the very powerful, like presidential candidates or famous generals. The hypocrisy does not choke the machine; it grinds on looking for easier pickings. The young Soldier, the poor Soldier, the less educated Soldier. They are the true expendables.

When you have an "epidemic" you most show your solution is working. When you are spending $257 million yearly to convict veterans and building $95 million prisons you have a lot of hammers. You must find thousands of nails to justify those hammers. It is easy to find false accusers when you have that much money to pay them off. Everyone has an enemy somewhere. The military will find them. If they can't find a victim they can make some, especially if they are in the military, too. If they won't take the carrot of benefits, then they will use the stick of interrogations and threatened charges.

It is the same for the accused. Isolated, interrogated, and threatened until "investigators" hear what they need. So what if they passed that polygraph? It isn't admissible in court. The JAG Corps knows how to suppress evidence and hide the truth. They mentor their young to cut their teeth as TDS defense lawyers.

If they are compliant and push those plea deals they might get to become prosecutors. If they really "play ball" and do what is necessary to win they will get to play in the big leagues. Here they will get the special training and support of Special Victim Prosecutors. For the truly corrupt and unethical the bright road of being a colonel and judge will be granted. The JAG has no real oversight; it needs unethical judges to cover up the mess of their young.

So now that we have fast tracked our vets into prison, stolen their honor, left their families to cope alone, what do we do? Oh wait, we must label them as sex offenders and felons. Even when they have served their time we must make sure they have no possible future. "Thank you for your service!"

Since most of these inmates have done nothing wrong, there is nothing to correct. We will not counsel them or give them hope. What to do? What to do? We will give them drugs! Drugs will keep them compliant and dependent. COL "Skittles" here at the JRCF will give you anything you want so he can use vets as lab rats for his drug studies. The army has a long history of doing this like the syphilis experiments of the Tuskegee airmen in WWII or the nuke "training" of the 1950s. The military will always find new younglings to sacrifice. Those vets that actually did do something to get in here were being prescribed these same drugs that clouded their thought processes and caused bad judgement or anger to flare up in frustration. Does all this seem too much? Maybe that is why 22 vets a day take their own lives, almost one an hour.

Well at least you are safe while I'm in prison. I'm safer too since my deployment days are over. I hope your daughters enjoy fighting the next war. I need to go the bathroom now. I don't mind the young female guard staring at me through the door as I go. I wonder if there are male guards watching female prisoners? Oh wait, that's not a problem is it…

Canadian man awarded daughter's full guardianship

Tim Patten · 18 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Jakob Letkemann faced the biggest challenge of his–or maybe anyone's–life: The battle for custody of his three-year-old daughter, Darian. He struggled through exhausting and heartrending court battles, during which time the 40-year old resident of Salt Spring Island, located off the west coast of British Columbia, found himself on an emotional roller-coaster ride, falsely accused of various abuses as he sought to prevail against a system biased against fathers.

But none of this mattered after the verdict came in. Jakob fell to his knees, victorious when the female judge announced she was granting his request for custody of Darian. Initially unaware of just how stacked the deck was against dads in such situations, as well as the fact that they were notorious for bringing out the worst in others, his eyes welled up. He was grateful it was over and happy he had overcome the feelings of betrayal and rage that had enveloped him amid false allegations by his ex-girlfriend and her relatives. His heart was bursting as he savored the moment.

In Canada, it is uncommon for courts to find in favor of fathers. In fact, statistics indicate that mothers are awarded custody more than three times as often as men. For the most part, this appears to reflect an institutional bias against men, though there are those who would argue otherwise. Regardless, while Jakob comes from a family of women's right's supporters, his eyes have been opened up to a new reality. He witnessed first-hand the lopsided skirmishes between the sexes that occur when the lives of children are involved.

But he also understood why so many men feel compelled to crawl through the barbwire-laden battleground of Canadian family court proceedings. He was shocked to see how men are shortchanged, lacking the sorts of protections that women have long argued for. "I've had more sleepless nights than a bee searching for nectar," he said. "I was subjugated to daily events of discrimination 'cause of my gender, and I became ill and got ulcers. So I studied and learned and showed the court that the allegations her family made against me were false, and I won. I've learned how to fight and present my case," he added.

Nowadays, Jakob has become a fervent supporter of equal rights–for all. He understands that there is much to be done for men regarding social and legal issues. His lengthy experience dealing with the courts and custody advisors has earned him a degree in navigating paperwork, stumbling blocks and frustrations that seem to have been purposely put in place to stymie fathers. "I never thought men would need to have their privileges protected until I sat across from a committee of six women–I was the only guy–and watched their unmoving and pensive demeanor and expressions. My gut wrenched," he said.

The sad reality is that after decades of indoctrination by women's and gender studies propagandists, Canadian society has a thoroughly distorted image of males. Subconsciously, at least, men are viewed as violent and aggressive, perpetrators of domestic abuse. That said, some are beginning to reject such stereotypes; among other things, questions are being raised about the Canadian family court system's bias against males. A growing consensus believes that the gender-biased lens is like a one-way looking glass, identifying any man in its sights as a perpetrator of violence against women.

Making matters worse for struggling fathers is that any sign of frustration or anger on their part apparently confirms the stereotype, convincing even those who might be a bit more open-minded to take a harder line. Few take the time to understand why biased and seemingly perfunctory proceedings could push even the most passive of individuals into a state of despair. And then, all of a sudden, those who are in the position to pass judgment are no longer interested in what the man has to say.

Fortunately, advisors cautioned Jakob about this relatively early on, spurring him to take whatever steps were necessary to avoid being on the wrong side of others preconceived beliefs. Jakob explained, "My hurt feelings turned into searching on the Internet. I took an anger management course and the times I was in court I was able to be calm. I was strong and believed in the truth–and it worked!"

Others have not been so lucky. Many fathers endure accusations of the most hideous kind from spouses and in-laws who escalate charges without any real sense of moral limits. In a great many custody cases, husbands face accusations of domestic violence, often inflated to charges of daily battering and relentless emotional abuse. Naturally, the words paint an ugly picture of someone who is unfit to be a parent. If the "accused" flinches, perspires or bursts out under pressure, he can only lose.

In Jakob's case, he couldn't believe his ears when he heard the preposterous charges being leveled against him. "They made claims of how I hurt my family, but I wasn't prepared for the accusation that I was too close to my own little girl–essentially, they said we fear a sexual relationship will evolve. God, that destroyed me. It twisted my gut. It felt like my insides were ripped out. I ached and was defeated, cried a lot and didn't think I could continue. I wanted to end it all."

But his case is not the exception; others have shared a similar fate. There have been numerous reports about court sessions and private negotiations, comprised of individuals with unconcerned faces who simply ignore what the husbands and fathers say, leading to a deep sense of having been defeated before the hearings actually begin. While it is only natural for people to feel like lashing out in such circumstances, Jakob quickly learned what was necessary to avoid getting caught in a trap.

In fact, his recurring struggles with the Canadian family court system eventually inspired a perseverance in him that he regularly shares with other men in the throes of divorce to assist them in their efforts to gain rightful access to their children. Among his recommendations:

- Prepare for the emotional battle, read up on the court process, and take any course, such as one oriented towards anger management, that can help you control your emotions.
- Take Parenting and Parenting after Separation classes.
- Remember that people will slander you with the worst things that can be said. NEVER get angry or aggressive, or respond in what is considered to be a distinctly masculine fashion.
- Always be on time for everything. Never miss a class, meeting, or court appointment.
- If you can talk to people involved in the process, do it. Communication is how you win!
- Make sure you have people supporting you. Jakob had his dad and mom and others by his side all the time. They talked, discussed and strategized. They went with him to any and every meeting.

The Next Phase

Now that he has succeeded in gaining custody of Darian, Jakob feels energized and motivated to take additional action on behalf of himself and others. He has collected thousands of items of evidence and is seeking justice against an anti-male regime. "I love my life with my daughter. I'm grateful, so I've decided to sue key governmental agencies for false removal and gender bias to ensure more justice for males. I want to share my experiences with as many people as possible. I am dedicated to changing the system."

Jakob intends to file suit against ten parties in all, ranging from social welfare agencies to hospital and health nurses to counselors from the Island Woman Against Violence (IWAV). He hopes to level the field by winning landmark cases that become roadmaps or legal footprints for others to follow, helping to reduce baseless, false reporting, harassment, and threats. If he succeeds in winning any damages, he will support efforts that assist low-income families, including the development of parent school centers with support training programs.

In doing what he thought was best for his family, Jakob has also been waging a larger fight against the war on single fathers. He has been burned by legal advisers who line their pockets at struggling families' expense; like the millions who have also battled through custody proceedings, he has found himself financially depleted. Sadly, many so-called experts seem more interested in bleeding desperate fathers who are angry and frustrated than in helping them get the justice they deserve.

But that is not right. As Jakob explained, “My family and I are fully involved, and we are reaching out for help. I’m asking for the smallest donation at my GoFundMe page. Follow my updates and me so we can all work to reduce or eliminate the biases in the Canadian system.”

On behalf of the innumerable men who have experienced the subjugation of divorce and the custody courts, it is time to change this narrative–to join forces and assist him in his quest. In fact, as someone who believes in advocating for other men, I have made a donation and urge others to follow suit by visiting https://www.gofundme.com/5gnn2b6c and giving as little as $5 for the benefit of Jakob Letkemann’s very worthy cause.

By coming together in this way, we can not only wish him the best, but we can help transform a system distorted by sexism, systematic oppression, and discrimination against men.

Why I'm an MRA

AVfM Video Source · 19 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

My reasons for being an MRA. This was a hard one. Please excuse any choppiness in this video, I'm using a new video editing software and I'm not used to it.

Shannon

Liberal Lunacy

A league that will not take no for an answer

James Krandall · 19 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By TonyTheTiger – Own work, CC BY-SA 3.0,

The Lies, Failures, and Insults That Are the WNBA

The WNBA has been going all out this year to get you to "Watch Me Work". Commercial after commercial and a social media barrage the likes of which have not been seen since the league's inception back in 1997. Quite fitting for the 20th anniversary of the most successful Women's Professional Sports League in US history. It couldn't have come at a better time too. The whole country was riveted by this year's intense action in the NBA playoffs. The NBA Finals gathered ratings the likes of which it hasn't seen since the Jordan era. The Rio Olympics this summer would enhance exposure of the league and help showcase the talents of the WNBA to the entire country. The timing couldn't be better.

Unfortunately for the WNBA the Public is still saying a resounding "no thank you very much." But the WNBA and its pushers can't seem to take no for an answer. Despite the massive publicity campaign and the Public's renewed interest in professional basketball interest in the league remains tepid at best. And that is putting it politely. The WNBA season started while the NBA playoffs were still going on in order to help promote the league and their commercials ran nonstop. Newspapers and other sports publications and web sites were overrun with great news about the WNBA and all the amazing things happening there. The WNBA and its new President Lisa Borders ranted and raved about the sky-high ratings, higher traffic on their Social Media sites and a large increase in the number of subscribers to WNBA's League Pass streaming service (for 16.99 for the entire season price is not a concern). The WNBA refuses to release any data on merchandising so one can only speculate in those regards.

However, the opening night game gathered an amazing .3 rating of around 500,000 viewers. Hardly anything to write home about; considering the fact that this game was between two of the League's Perennial Powerhouses Phoenix and Minnesota. In fact, the ratings on the ESPN networks have only averaged around 234,000 viewers, up from 202,000 in 2015 (the lowest in the history of the league). If one removes the two statistical outliers from the equation (top and bottom rating) then that number becomes 206,000; almost exactly the same as 2015[1]. The WNBA claimed a large increase in subscribers to the League Pass but steadfastly refuses to release ANY hard figures and data. The one thing Borders was not bragging about was attendance.

The WNBA knows no shame and limits in regards to out and out lying about its attendance records. However, it seems that lying for the sake of social justice is completely acceptable. According to League "official figures, " attendance for all games between May 14th and June 12th (inclusive) was 7060 per game[2]. This was even less than 2015 when the league had its smallest draw ever. A better comparison would be the 2014 season rather than 2015 (one team was playing in an alternate location (San Antonio and another announced it would move following the season (Tulsa); both which hurt attendance. The 2014 average was 7587. This means a drop of seven percent. Hardly a harbinger of success. So the League and its teams decided to distort and out and out falsify their numbers even more. As of the Olympic Break, the WNBA's average attendance (for 2016) now stands at a whopping 7318 per game.

None of this means that the players and the coaches of the WNBA don't have talent and don't work very hard to be great at what they do. It simply isn't a product that catches the attention of very many people. Exactly like snowshoes being sold in Hawaii. Cricket matches get poor ratings in the United States (even though it is the second most popular sport in the world). The MLS gets poor ratings as well. Many sports do. All of the people involved in the sports I'm sure to give it their all. However, the demand for such sports is simply not there. No amount of marketing or airtime or political pressure can make that happen. It is the same for the WNBA and no, it is not my fault.

The WNBA and its teams are blatantly lying about their popularity, success and attendance. It almost reaches Orwellian levels. Take for example the Phoenix Mercury. They, as do most of the teams that play in an NBA stadium (Talking Stick Arena in Phoenix) close off the upper levels of their stadiums and sell tickets for the lower portion of their arena. The Mercury have one of the highest average attendance levels in the League. For example, on June 12th the Chicago Sky came to Phoenix and a large crowd of 9,055 per official count came to see the action. A careful count of seating for Mercury games on Ticketmaster show a seating capacity of around 9,350 or so in the lower level of the stadium; including courtside seating (this is a high estimate). There are also around 106 executive suites available which seat around twenty each. Please see the attached video of the game here. Many of the skyboxes are unoccupied. Even if every skybox were occupied to capacity, it would mean that 7,000 fans packed the lower bowl of Talking Stick that night. That would mean that at least seventy-five percent of the lower level would have been full. We can let our readers decide the truth of this statement.

The inability of the WNBA officials and teams to count gets worse. On July 10th the LA Sparks reported an attendance of 19,076. The capacity of the Staples Center (per Wikipedia) for Laker games is 18,997. If one checks the short videos available on the WNBA website (No, I will not personally pay a penny to view the whole game on their website. It would only encourage them.) one can see many empty seats even in the lower rows. The cameras never pan to the top level (The Sparks are probably the worst offenders in regards to inflating their attendance numbers). The Washington Mystics reported an opening night crowd of 11579 on May 14th. Check the video out on the WNBA website. One sees far more empty seats than occupied seats (especially at either end of the court) and this on opening night. It is certainly far better than the Mystics usually draw. I could go on and on, but there is no need to. The proof is available on the WNBA's website and is available for just about every team.

Even these ridiculously low numbers and lies are padded by mass ticket giveaways. Take the Chicago Sky (who have one of the premier players in Elena Delle Donne as their main attraction) and their numbers. According to their official count, they have an average of 7,494 fans per game. However, two of their games this year (6/29 and 7/13) were Camp Days (The Sparks had a camp day on July 10th); where large numbers of children and their handlers were given free tickets in hopes of enticing them to come back again. Attendance on these two days was 11,892 and 16,444 respectively. If one takes these games out of the equation, their reported attendance drops to 6,011. Which is still far off from reality (their lower level seats around 7,000 and Sky boxes do not provide any real revenue according to their Communications Dept). According to the Communications Dept of the Chicago Sky, they have a paltry 517 season ticket holders. In the third largest metropolitan area of the country that is all, they can get? Teams are even forced to give away thousands of tickets to playoff games and even Finals and still generally cannot come close to filling their arenas (there have been a couple of exceptions here and there).

Price is also not an issue in regards to attendance. Take a look at these Craigslist and what people are offering. No one is taking them. Take a look at the prices on the team websites. I was offered Chicago Sky courtside seats starting at 32 dollars. Some teams even try to sweeten the pot by including all you can eat disgusting stadium trash masquerading as food (check out the Mercury website here) while you attempt to enjoy this unwholesome product. I tried speaking with several teams in regards to ticket giveaways and how many people pay for their seats on any given night and the accuracy of numbers in regards to attendance. None were willing to delve into these topics, and so I thanked them for their time. After all, they are private entities and do not owe me or anyone else an explanation; except for any investor stupid enough to buy into the team.

As marketing gimmick after marketing gimmick has failed over the years to improve attendance the WNBA has become desperate. They have taken to embracing their GLBT fan base and welcoming them en masse so that many WNBA games now seem like Gay Pride Parades. This in and of itself makes a mockery of the WNBA's claim to be a business and not a cause. Not that embracing the GLBT community is necessarily a bad thing. However, a professional sports league is supposed to deliver entertainment, not a social message. Part of this marketing strategy is due to their failure to attract a more mainstream audience. They simply cannot even give away their product. Their attempts to get more people to watch their games have become offensive and as their product continues to languish they find a way to blame men. I remember years ago when I was almost finished with University, and I was offered free tickets to the local WNBA team at an outreach they were attempting. Having seen the product on TV and not being impressed, I politely declined the young lady trying to give me the tickets. She persisted: telling me how good the seats were, how much fun the entertainment and game was and that most of all they were absolutely free. I then stated politely but firmly once more "Save them for someone who will go to the game" and walked away. She glared at me as if I was Lucifer himself. Heaven forbid I simply don't have an interest.

That attitude now seems to be prevalent in the WNBA. The league is languishing because men are pigs and women who don't support them are weak. The Phoenix Mercury launched an insulting "Man Up Challenge" where they offered free tickets to men who had no interest in the game; claiming they would help "cure the cooties together." Given the average price of a ticket to a WNBA game you would think that the Mercury would realize that the majority of people weren't interested in their product and neither desired nor needed their charity and had better things to do with their time. Very few people took them up on their offer, and they still trumpeted it as a success (attendance remained flat). Insulting me is certainly not going to get me to come to your games.

If you have to give away your product it is basically an admittance on your part that your product is not worth paying for. When you give away playoff tickets and even thousands of finals tickets (link) it is evident that your product is not competitive. Especially if you continue to have to give away tickets twenty years into a brand.

The WNBA now claims a majority of the teams and the league itself make a profit. Other people and I have long doubted this. There is almost no data available or forthcoming from the WNBA or the individual teams in regards to their finances. However their large TV deal (25 million a year according to some sources and corporate sponsorships are all shoehorned into any deals involving the NBA by the NBA itself. Originally ESPN had no plans to show an opening night game this past May. When confronted with this fact the head of negotiations brushed it off as an "oversight" that would be corrected. That is a standard corporate world cop out. No matter what the amount of additional revenue these deals bring they do not add any value to the franchises themselves. These deals are the definition of corporate charity and represent a hidden transfer from the NBA to the WNBA (The Soviet Union did this during the 70's as their economy tanked but their oil revenues increased).

One of the biggest arguments that apologists and SJWs use to garner sympathy and guilt people into spending money on the WNBA is the focus on the "Fundamentals of Basketball" rather than the flash and athleticism we have come to expect in an NBA game. In other words, women play smarter basketball than men, and they play it the way it was meant to be played. Nothing could be further from the truth. An easy five minutes of research on the official websites of both the WNBA and the NBA put that myth to rest. NBA teams have a higher shooting percentage for both regular and three-point baskets (+1.03 and + 1.42 to be precise), commit fewer turnovers per 48 minutes played (-2.46) and have more assists on average (+1.12). The only category in which the WNBA bested the men was in free throw shooting (+4.3%). Bear in mind too that the WNBA uses a significantly smaller ball that makes the probability of an uncontested shot going in significantly higher. The reliance upon the WNBA model is forced because the athletes simply do not possess the individual athleticism and speed that we have come to expect from our NBA (and even NCAA) players. The idea that the women of the WNBA are somehow providing a superior product to the men of the NBA is a lie that the Apologists and supporters of the WNBA are desperately clinging to as if it were a life raft. The raw numbers prove that point. But then again it seems that the WNBA has never troubled itself over raw numbers and data.

Another argument the WNBA desperately uses is the comparison to the NBA after twenty years in existence. It is flawed in many ways. There were only three channels back when the NBA was in its infancy, people had nowhere near the disposable income they do now, travel was far more difficult and expensive, and most importantly the NBA had absolutely no one forcing its brand down the throats of consumers on an hourly basis.

The WNBA likes to portray itself as wholesome, affordable fun for the entire family and full of fine, upstanding individuals. That sounds quite refreshing; given the scandalous behavior of other professional athletes over the years. Nothing could be further from the truth. The people of the WNBA are just as flawed and fragile (if nowhere near as wealthy) as any other sporting figures. The hypocrisy of the WNBA regarding this behavior is reprehensible.

Apparently, it is okay with the WNBA if one of their star players abuses their spouse; so long as it is a lesbian committing the abuse against another lesbian. Britney Griner's slap on the wrist for her brutality to her significant other is quite contrary to Ray Rice's punishment for his misdeeds. When one of their star players sexually assaults another player on the court, it is cause for excitement among their fanbase, rather than a criminal act (so much for a wholesome environment for children). WNBA players (and coaches) have been accused of other depravities and shocking violence that are quickly covered up or not even picked up by the mainstream media because despite the best efforts of a few SJW and GLBTQ Activists almost no one cares. One of the few times the mainstream media cared was when some players of the Minnesota Lynx staged a partial media boycott in regards to certain social issues. It wasn't very inspiring. Are these really the type of role models we want for children?

The WNBA and its players and its small core of fans also don't seem to realize that there is no Title IX after college (which is devastating men's collegiate athletics across the country). You cannot force people to watch your games; despite your best efforts over the years and the backing of fabulously wealthy people and a full court press (pun intended) from the NBA itself. NBC, ABC, ESPN and the Lifetime channel have all carried WNBA games for extended periods of time and all with a similar lack of any success. The League Office, its players and all of its SJW cohorts all lament the lack of mainstream coverage and the league's condemnation to the bottom of the barrel regarding priority and blames that for their lack of success. The fact remains that the WNBA has been aggressively marketed for many years and found to be a black hole for ratings. The Nielsen ratings are available online. Go check out the programs that air against WNBA games and compare their numbers. That's a free market economy for you.

I have mentioned the word product several times here. The WNBA is selling a product. That product is sports entertainment. There are so many options for excitement in the summer that even for those of us who have large amounts of disposable income time becomes a factor. I can think of at least a dozen fun things I could do every night rather than go to a WNBA game. Many other people feel the same, and we are not evil because of it.

There is certainly a sense of self-entitlement creeping into the WNBA as it continues to flounder. Perhaps it is a natural consequence of the Title IX protections many of their players enjoyed during their amateur careers. If one reads a piece penned by the Lynx's own Maya Moore here, it is plain to see. She laments her relatively low salary, the lack of sponsorship opportunities and low interest in the WNBA and blames it all on sexism and corporate America. She claims the WNBA have a "great product to offer" and is being shafted by sexism (coded language for men) and Corporate America. The fact is that the WNBA is not a great product nor is it profitable (no matter how much you fudge the numbers). If it were a great investment, then the corporate sponsors would be fighting each other for the opportunity to sponsor you. It is barely a niche product for a small segment of the population of the country. Make yourself into that superstar and hero that everyone wants to idolize. Until then dream on. Is it not enough for you that you are living and playing on the charity (both voluntarily and involuntarily given) of others and have been for many years? Yes, I said it. The WNBA is a charity case just like Title IX is. And people wonder why the costs associated with going to University continue to skyrocket (although there are many reasons behind that).

We live in a free market economy and as such, the demand for entertainment is up to the consumer; not the supplier. We the public as a whole have sampled the WNBA product and decided that it simply isn't a product that interests us. The WNBA has its fans and its supporters and all in all, does not do harm to anyone. The losses it operates at are a small drop in the bucket compared to the NBA's revenue and it can continue for a long time if the NBA has the money to burn (which they most certainly do right now) in this endeavor. I am one of those people who thinks that the world is more interesting with different types of people who enjoy doing different things. I hope the WNBA continues to entertain its fans and provide a decent living for its players and support staff. But the WNBA is not a major sports league and probably never will be. So please WNBA players, fans, and supporters stop bothering those of us who don't care for your product and more importantly stop vilifying us. It is not going to get us to go to your games, buy your merchandise or come and meet you in public. Please take no for an answer.

*****

[1] http://tvbythenumbers.zap2it.com/

[2] All attendance and Team statistics are courtesy of the www.wnba.com unless otherwise noted.

The future of men’s rights

AVfM Video Source · 21 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Please watch this, and support the HBB Patreon. PE

Always Beating Up On Men

Bettina Arndt · 21 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The University of Queensland's Kim Halford suggests that perhaps three-quarters of a million children witness both parents engaged in domestic violence.

Eva Solberg is a Swedish politician, a proud feminist who holds an important post as chairwoman of the party Moderate Women. Last year she was presented with her government's latest strategy for combating domestic violence. Like similar reports across the world, this strategy assumes the only way to tackle domestic violence is through teaching misogynist men (and boys) to behave themselves.

The Swedish politician spat the dummy. Writing on the news site Nyheter24, Solberg took issue with her government's "tired gendered analysis", which argued that eradicating sexism was the solution to the problem of domestic violence. She explained her reasoning: "We know through extensive practice and experience that attempts to solve the issue through this kind of analysis have failed. And they failed precisely because violence is not and never has been a gender issue."

Solberg challenged the government report's assumption that there was a guilty sex and an innocent one. "Thanks to extensive research in the field, both at the national and international level, we now know with great certainty that this breakdown by sex is simply not true."

She made reference to the world's largest research database on intimate partner violence, the Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project, which summarises more than 1700 scientific papers on the topic.

She concluded that her government's report was based on misinformation about family violence and that, contrary to the report's one-sided view of men as the only perpetrators, many children were experiencing a very different reality: "We must recognise the fact that domestic violence, in at least half of its occurrence, is carried out by female perpetrators."

One of the key patterns that emerged from PASK, Solberg said, was that violence in the family was an inherited problem and children learned from watching the violence of both their parents. "To know this and then continue to ignore the damage done to the children who are today subjected to violence is a huge social betrayal," she concluded. "The road to a solution for this social problem is hardly to stubbornly continue to feed the patient with more of the same medicine that has already been tried for decades."

There's a certain irony that this happened in Sweden, the utopia for gender equality and the last place you would expect misogyny to be blamed for a major social evil. But despite Scandinavian countries being world leaders in gender equality (as shown by the 2014 World Economic Forum's global gender gap index), Nordic women experience the worst physical or sexual violence in the EU. Given this inconvenient truth it seems extraordinary that for decades the gendered analysis of domestic violence has retained its grip on Sweden — as it has in other Western countries, including Australia.

No one would deny that it was a great achievement to have men's violence against women fully acknowledged and to take critical steps to protect vulnerable women and ensure their safety.

But it has been shocking to watch this morph into a worldwide domestic violence industry determined to ignore evidence showing the complexities of violence in the home and avoid prevention strategies that would tackle the real risk factors underpinning this vital social issue.

Here, too, we are witnessing Solberg's "huge social betrayal" by denying the reality of the violence being witnessed by many Australian children.

Just look at the bizarre $30 million television campaign the federal government ran a few months ago, which started with a little boy slamming a door in a little girl's face. A series of vignettes followed, all about innocent females cowering from nasty males.

The whole thing is based on the erroneous notion that domestic violence is caused by disrespect for women, precisely the type of "tired gender analysis" that Solberg has so thoroughly discredited.

Yet our government spent at least $700,000 in funding for research and production of this campaign — just one example of the shocking misuse of the hundreds of millions of dollars that Malcolm Turnbull boasts our government is spending on domestic violence.

The 'Stop it at the start' campaign was based on the notion that domestic violence is caused by disrespect for women.

Our key organisations all sing from the same songbook, regularly distorting statistics to present only one part of this complex story.

There is a history of this in Australia. "Up to one quarter of young people in Australia have witnessed an incident of physical or domestic violence against their mother or stepmother," Adam Graycar, a former director of the Australian Institute of Criminology, wrote in an introduction to a 2001 paper, Young Australians and Domestic Violence, a brief overview of the much larger Young People and Domestic Violence study.

Somehow Graycar failed to mention that while 23 per cent of young people were aware of domestic violence against their mothers or stepmothers, an almost identical proportion (22 per cent) of young people were aware of domestic violence against their fathers or stepfathers by their mothers or stepmothers — as shown in the same study.

This type of omission is everywhere today, with most of our bureaucracies downplaying statistics that demonstrate the role of women in family violence and beating up evidence of male aggression.

How often have we been told we face an epidemic of domestic violence? It's simply not true. Most Australian women are lucky enough to live in a peaceful society where the men in their lives treat them well.

The official data from the Australian Bureau of Statistics shows violence against women has decreased across the 20-year period it has been studied, with the proportion of adult women experiencing physical violence from their male partner in the preceding year down from 2.6 per cent in 1996 to 0.8 per cent in 2012. (Violence from ex-partners dropped from 3.3 per cent to 0.7 per cent.)

"There's no evidence that we're in the middle of an epidemic of domestic violence," says Don Weatherburn, the respected director of the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research, confirming that these figures from national surveys carried out by the ABS provide the best data on domestic violence in the country.

He adds that in NSW “serious forms of domestic assault, such as assault inflicting grievous bodily harm, have actually come down by 11 per cent over the last 10 years”.

The most recent statistics from the ABS Personal Safety Survey show 1.06 per cent of women are physically assaulted by their partner or ex-partner each year in Australia. This figure is derived from the 2012 PSS and published in its Horizons report by Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety, available at http://bit.ly/1ZYSyEj. The rate is obtained by dividing cell B9 in Table 19 (93,400) by the total female residential population aged 18 and older (8,735,400).

One in 100 women experiencing this physical violence from their partners is obviously a matter of great concern. But this percentage is very different from the usual figures being trotted out. You’ll never find the figure of 1.06 per cent mentioned by any of the domestic violence organisations in this country. Their goal is to fuel the flames, to promote an alarmist reaction with the hope of attracting ever greater funding for the cause.

What we hear from them is that one in three women are victims of violence. But that’s utterly misleading because it doesn’t just refer to domestic violence. These statistics are also taken from the Personal Safety Survey but refer to the proportion of adult women who have experienced any type of physical violence at all (or threat of violence.) So we’re not just talking about violence by a partner or violence in the home but any aggressive incident, even involving a perfect stranger — such as an altercation with an aggressive shopping trolley driver or an incident of road rage.

That’s partly how the figure inflates to one in three, but it also doesn’t even refer to what’s happening now because these figures include lifetime incidents for adult women — so with our 70-year-olds the violence could have taken place more than 50 years ago. And the equivalent figure for men is worse — one in two.

As for the most horrific crimes, where domestic violence ends in homicide, we are constantly told that domestic violence kills one woman every week. That’s roughly true.

According to AIC figures, one woman is killed by an intimate partner or ex-partner every nine days. One man is killed by his partner about every 30 days. So it is important to acknowledge that male violence is likelier to result in injury or death than female violence towards a partner.

The fact remains that almost a quarter (23.1 per cent) of victims of intimate partner homicide are male — and we hardly ever hear about these deaths.

It is not serving our society well to downplay the fact female violence can also be lethal, towards men and towards children: women account for more than half of all murders of children (52 per cent).

These are all still alarming statistics but here, too, there is good news. Domestic homicides are de creasing. The number of victims of intimate partner homicide drop ped by almost a third (28 per cent) between 1989-90 and 2010-12, according to data supplied by the AIC (http://bit.ly/2bxn1GO).

Chris Lloyd is one of a growing number of Australian academics concerned at the misrepresentation of domestic violence statistics in this country. An expert in statistics and data management at the Melbourne Business School, Lloyd confirms our best source of data, the ABS's Personal Safety Survey, clearly demonstrates domestic violence is decreasing.

He, too, says it's wrong to suggest there's an epidemic of domestic violence in this country. "Many of the quoted statistics around domestic violence are exaggerated or incorrect," says Lloyd. "Contrary to popular belief and commentary, rates of intimate partner violence are not increasing." He adds that while he understands the emotional reaction people have to this crime, "emotion is no basis for public policy".

He's concerned that Australian media so often publishes misinformation — such as a recent editorial in The Age that repeated the falsehood that domestic violence was the leading cause of death or illness for adult women in Victoria.

As I explained in my Inquirer article "Silent victims" last year (http://bit.ly/29CV5zD), it doesn't even make the list of the top 10 such causes. The Age ignored Lloyd's efforts to correct its mistake, ditto his concern about erroneous media reports that inflated domestic violence figures by using police crime statistics — a notoriously unreliable source.

As Weatherburn points out, it's very difficult to determine whether swelling numbers of incidents reported to police reflects an increase in actual crime. "It may simply be a tribute to the excellent job that has been done to raise awareness of DV, encouraging women to report, and efforts to get the police to respond properly," he points out.

Weatherburn believes that the slight (5.7 per cent) increase in reports of domestic assault in NSW during the past 10 years could be due to an increase in victims' willingness to report domestic assault; he points to the 11 per cent drop across that time in serious forms of domestic assault, such as assault inflicting grievous bodily harm, as a more reliable picture of the trend in domestic violence.

Weatherburn adds that valid comparisons of state police figures on assault are impossible because each police force has a different approach to recording assault. But in many states the goalposts have also shifted.

The explosion in police records is due in part to recent expansions in the definition of family violence to include not just physical abuse but also threats of violence, psychological, emotional, economic and social abuse. Look at Western Australia, where this changed definition was introduced in 2004. That year West Australian police recorded 17,000 incidents of violence, but by 2012 this had almost tripled to 45,000.

Other states report similar trends because of these expanded definitions.

“If a woman turns up to a police station claiming her man has yelled at her, the chances are that she’ll end up with a police report and well on her way to obtaining an apprehended violence order, which puts her in a very powerful position,” says Augusto Zimmermann, a commissioner with the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, who explains that AVOs can be used to force men to leave their homes and deny them contact with their children.

Often men are caught in police proceedings and evicted from their homes by orders that are issued without any evidence of legal wrongdoing. “It is a frightening reality that here in Australia a perfectly innocent citizen stands to lose his home, his family, his reputation, as a result of unfounded allegations. This is happening to men every day (as a consequence) of domestic violence laws which fail to require the normal standards of proof and presumptions of innocence,” Zimmermann says, adding that he’s not talking about genuine cases of violent men who seriously abuse their wives and children but “law-abiding people who have lost their parental and property rights without the most basic requirements of the rule of law”.

The growing trend for AVOs to be used for tactical purposes in family law disputes is also pushing up police records of domestic violence. “Rather than being motivated by legitimate concerns about feeling safe, a woman can make an application to AVO simply because she was advised by lawyers to look for any reason to apply for such an order when facing a family law dispute,” says Zimmermann, who served on a recent government inquiry into legal issues and domestic violence.

How often have we been told we face an epidemic of domestic violence? It’s simply not true

A survey of NSW magistrates found 90 per cent agreed that AVOs were being used as a divorce tactic. Research by family law professor Patrick Parkinson and colleagues from the University of Sydney revealed that lawyers were suggesting that clients obtain AVOs, explaining to them that verbal and emotional abuse were enough to do the trick

The bottom line is that police reports tell us little and the ABS Personal Safety Survey remains our best source of data, showing the true picture of domestic violence. But there’s one more vital fact revealed by that survey that rarely surfaces: men account for one in three victims of partner violence.

You’ll never find this figure mentioned on Our Watch, one of our leading domestic violence organisations, annually attracting government grants of up to $2 million. In May, when Lucy Turnbull became an ambassador for Our Watch, she was welcomed by its chief executive, Mary Barry, who thanked the ambassadors for “engaging Australians to call out disrespect and violence towards women and advocating for gender equality”, which was “exactly what the evidence says is needed to end the epidemic”.

Our Watch staff spend their time writing policy documents and running conferences all firmly locked into the gender equity framework. The site’s facts-and-figures pages include lists of cherry-picked statistics about violence against women but male victims are dismissed by simply stating that the “overwhelming majority of acts of domestic violence are perpetrated by men against women”.

There’s an interesting parallel here. As it happens, this one-in-three ratio is similar to the proportions of suicides among men and women. Among males, 2.8 per cent of all deaths in 2014 were attributed to suicide, while the rate for females was 0.9 per cent. Imagine the public outcry if the smaller number of female suicides were used to justify committing the entire suicide prevention budget to men. So why is it that all our government organisations are getting away with doing just that with the hundreds of millions being spent on domestic violence?

According to one of Australia's leading experts on couple relationships, Kim Halford, a professor of clinical psychology at the University of Queensland, most family violence does not fit the picture most of us have when we imagine domestic violence — a violent man severely beating up his partner to control her. Such violence makes up less than 1 per cent of family violence.

Most family violence is two-way aggression, with international research showing about a third of couples have a go at each other — pushing, slapping, shoving or worse. Given the shame and stigma associated with being a male victim of family violence it is not surprising that men downplay these experiences in victim surveys such as Australia's Personal Safety Survey. It's only when men and women are asked about perpetrating violence that the two-way violence emerges, with women readily admitting to researchers that they are very actively involved and often instigate this type of "couple violence".

"Thirty years of international research consistently shows that women and men are violent towards each other at about the same rate," Halford tells Inquirer.

As one example, two major meta-analysis studies conducted by psychology professor John Archer from Britain's University of Central Lancashire in 2000 and 2002 found that women were likelier than men to report acts such as pushing, slapping or throwing something at their partner. Archer pointed out that women were likelier to be injured as a result of the couple violence, although there was still a substantial minority of injured male victims.

This two-way violence wasn't what most researchers expected to find, admits a leading researcher in this area, Terrie Moffitt from Duke University in the US. "We asked the girls questions like, 'Have you hit your partner?' 'Have you thrown your partner across the room?' 'Have you used a knife on your partner?' I thought we were wasting our time asking these questions but they said yes, and they said yes in just the same numbers as the boys did." Moffitt's work with young people was part of the world- renowned Dunedin longitudinal study back in the 1990s that recently featured on the SBS series Predict My Future (http://bit.ly/29NEDwQ).

It is telling that Australia has not conducted any of the large-scale surveys focusing on perpetrating violence likely to reveal the two-way pattern shown elsewhere. But gender symmetry did emerge in violence studies published in 2010-11 by Halford that focused on couples at the start of their relationships, newlywed couples and couples expecting a child together. Even with these early relationships, about a quarter of the women admit they have been violent towards their partners — just as many as the men.

Halford suggests that perhaps three-quarters of a million children every year in Australia are witnessing both parents engaged in domestic violence. Only small numbers see the severe violence we hear so much about, what the feminists call "intimate terrorism", where a perpetrator uses violence in combination with a variety of other coercive tactics to take control over their partner, but as Halford points out, even less severe couple violence is not trivial.

"Children witnessing any form of family violence, including couple violence, suffer high rates of mental health problems and the children are more likely to be violent themselves. Couple violence is also a very strong predictor of relationship break-up, which has profound effects on adults and their children," he says.

The 2001 Young People and Domestic Violence study mentioned earlier was based on national research involving 5000 young Australians aged 12 to 20. This found ample evidence that children were witnessing this two-way parental couple violence, with 14.4 per cent witnessing "couple violence", 9 per cent witnessing male to female violence only and 7.8 per cent witnessing female to male violence only — which means about one in four young Australians have this detrimental start to their lives. The report found the most damage to children occurred when they witnessed both parents involved in violence.

It is often claimed that women hit only in self-defence, but Halford points out the evidence shows this is not true. "In fact, one of the strongest risk factors for a woman being hit by a male partner is her hitting that male partner. It's absolutely critical that we tackle couple violence if we really want to stop this escalation into levels of violence which cause women serious injury," he says. Of course, the impact on children is the other important reason to make couple violence a significant focus.

Naturally, none of this rates a mention in the section on “what drives violence against women” in the official government framework (http://bit.ly/2a3sVOQ) promoted by all our key domestic violence bodies. Nor is there any proper attention paid to other proven, evidence-based risk factors such as alcohol and drug abuse, poverty and mental illness.

The only officially sanctioned risk factor for domestic violence in this country is gender inequality. “Other factors interact with or reinforce gender inequality to contribute to increased frequency and severity of violence against women, but do not drive violence in and of themselves” is the only grudging acknowledgment in the framework that other factors may be at play.

At the recent hearings of Victoria’s Royal Commission into Family Violence, experts in alcohol abuse and mental illness spoke out about this blatant disregard of the 40 years of research that addresses these complexities. “It is simplistic and misleading to say that domestic violence is caused by patriarchal attitudes,” said James Ogloff, a world-renowned mental health expert.

“A sole focus on the gendered nature of family violence, which labels men as the perpetrators and women as the victims and which identifies gender inequity as the principal cause of family violence, is problematic on a number of levels,” said Peter Miller, principal research fellow and co-director of the violence prevention group at Deakin University.

Miller was involved in a comprehensive recent review of longitudinal studies involving pre dictors of family violence that identified childhood experiences with abuse and violence, particularly in families with problem alcohol use, as key predictors of adult involvement in domestic violence. He has encountered obstruction in conducting and pub lishing research into the role of drugs and alcohol in family violence.

The evidence is there about the complexities of domestic violence, but on an official level no one is listening. The reason is simple. The deliberate distortion of this important social issue is all about feminists refusing to give up hard-won turf. Ogloff spelled this out to the royal commission when he explained that the Victorian family violence sector feared that “recognising other potential causes of violence could cause a shift in funding away from programs directed at gender inequity”.

Forty years ago an important feminist figure was invited to Australia to visit our newly established women’s refuges. Erin Pizzey was the founder of Britain’s first refuge, a woman praised around the world for her pioneering work helping women escape from violence. On the way to Australia Pizzey travelled to New Zealand, where she spoke out about her changing views. She had learned through dealing with violent women in her refuge that violence was not a gender issue and that it was important to tackle the complexities of violence to properly address the issue.

Pizzey quickly attracted the wrath of the women’s movement in Britain, attracting death threats that forced her for a time to leave the country. She tells Inquirer from London: “The feminists seized upon domestic violence as the cause they needed to attract more money and supporters at a time when the first flush of enthusiasm for their movement was starting to wane. Domestic violence was perfect for them — the just cause that no one dared challenge. It led to a worldwide million-dollar industry, a huge cash cow supporting legions of bureaucrats and policymakers.”

In Pizzey’s New Zealand press interviews she challenged the gender inequality view of violence, suggesting tackling violence in the home required dealing with the real roots of violence, such as intergenerational exposure to male and female aggression.

News travelled fast. By the time Pizzey was set to leave for the Australian leg of the trip she was persona non grata with the feminists running our refuges. Her visit to this country was cancelled.

That was 1976. Since then the gendered view of domestic violence has held sway, dissenters are silenced and evidence about the true issues underlying this complex issue is ignored. And the huge cash cow supporting our blinkered domestic violence industry becomes ever more bloated.

Bettina Arndt is a Sydney-based social commentator.

bettinaarndt.com.au

Send Paul to Los Angeles for the Red Pill Movie Debut

AVFM · 22 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

You can help by donating here: https://www.gofundme.com/sendpaultola

Erin Pizzey speaks at ICMI16 July 8, 2016

AVfM Video Source · 25 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Erin Pizzey delivers the keynote address at the second International Conference on Men's Issues in London.

Paul Elam

Another example of corruption in the military's sexual assault program

Michael Conzachi · 25 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Just as federal grants issued under the Violence Against Woman Act is rife with corruption and waste, the same applies to the U.S. Military.

Just last month, the Department of Defense, Office of Inspector General released a report [1] of an investigation involving the appointed director of the Navy's Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office; Jill Vines Loftus [2].

Jill Vines Loftus

Loftus serves as Secretary Mabus' principal point of accountability for all sexual-assault policy matters and as the primary resource for expert sexual-assault prevention and response assessment, program support and oversight.

The report determined that Ms. Loftus received over 7K in various reimbursements that she was not entitled to.

A snippet of the report:

> We substantiated the allegation. We conclude that Ms. Loftus did not conduct TDY travel in accordance with the JTR and other Government standards. As a result, we conclude from a sample of 11 trips we reviewed that Ms. Loftus received $7,213.43 in reimbursements from the Government to which she was not entitled.

The investigation only covered a random sample of 11 out of 26 trips Loftus and her staff made between 28 February 2013 and 22 November 2014, and concluded that it would be necessary to investigate all of her travel to determine if further money is owed to the government by her and her staff.

Upon obtaining the position, Loftus began extensive travel around the world, booking more expensive air travel which she then transferred accumulated air miles to her personal account. She also went above and beyond in booking hotels and rental cars, than the Defense Travel System allows.

During the investigation; INCREDULOUSLY; Loftus suggested to investigators that a complaint was filed against her in retaliation for the work that she does. Loftus told investigators their initial findings were "inflammatory, insulting, condescending and disingenuous."

She further stated, "Am I being targeted due to the sensitive nature of my mission? Have I angered someone because… I am trying to hold accountable sexual predators in an organization that is predominately male?"

Did you noticed that she used the term "SEXUAL PREDATORS?" Ooooooh, such a scary word. A typical manufactured triggering talking point from those who will fight to the death of keeping alive, the myth of the sexual assault "epidemic" in the military.

No Ms. Loftus, you are going above and beyond holding sexual predators accountable, you and the rest of the military are persecuting and convicting any and all males upon a mere allegation; utilizing corrupt lawyers [3] like these;

MILITARYCORRUPTION'S
HALL OF SHAME
MAJ JACOB BASHORE, ARMY JAG

© 2016 MilitaryCorruption.com

In the sixteen years we have been exposing corruption in the U.S. military, we've seen and reported on some very odious people. "Horrible Holly Graf" and retired Army COL Mike "NO COMBAT" Colpo (the chairborne ranger) are just two.

She got away with throttling two male officers and running a warship (destroyer) aground. A man-hating "sea witch" Graf was widely known as "the female Capt. Bligh." Our apologies to the HMS Bounty's cruel skipper, for associating his name with such a monster as her.

Colpo was the West Point ring-knocker (Class of 1978) and Infantry officer who managed to avoid not only combat in his 30 years on the Federal tit, but ANY duty at all overseas. For that, he was known as "NO COMBAT Colpo." It was an utter disgrace when this politician became chief of staff at USMA, while many more colonels, all holding the esteemed CIB, and most with at least one Purple Heart award, were passed over for him.

But now, we have a much worse individual to deal with. He is an Army JAG, MAJ Jacob Bashore, and his near-sociopathic conduct during the recent court-martial of MAJ Chris "Kit" Martin at Fort Campbell, Ky. - see Related Stories Box below for details - was so reprehensible, we can't recall seeing such an evil thing during the entire time MilitaryCorruption.com has been "fighting for the truth and exposing the corrupt."

THE PROSECUTOR WAS A "PERSECUTOR"

Now, I will not say that they're not real sexual predators out there, but the reality is that the numbers of actual sexual predators in the military are quite small. The bulk of these cases involves allegations from a vindictive divorcing spouse, a break-up with a girlfriend, a cheating spouse or girlfriend looking for an excuse for an affair, or alcohol fueled one-night stand. And sniveling commanders, by any means necessary to appease the hysterics.

The term, "sexual predator" triggers images of men like this [4].

The term “sexual predator” NEVER triggers images of women such as this [5].

But, they all are.

Yeah; that’s right Ms. Loftus; the military is filled with sexual predators, which forced you to gallivant around the globe in first class, five-star style to promote your message on the tax-payer dime. Oh yeah, you criminally defrauded the American taxpayer. I think I already said that, but let it sink in again.

Mind you, the results of the DoD IG report resulted in only a review of less than half of her travel [6]. There is no information, whether the Department of the Navy has actually reviewed all of her travel. There is also no information whether or not Ms. Loftus has been sanctioned or is facing criminal charges for her fraud and theft. You can bet your ass and the bottom dollar, that if this theft and fraud were committed by someone much lower on the ranking totem pole, they would be making little rocks out of big rocks, while attired in a bright orange jumpsuit.

Since this sexual assault witch hunt has been in effect; a majority of it since 2011, it has been a cataclysmic disaster for the falsely accused. Lately, I have been bombarded with information and case examples from some of the wrongly convicted, still languishing in military correctional facilities and their families. Initial estimates suggest that approximately 90% of military males who are serving time are there due to wrongful convictions, based on false allegations.

Harrowing stories are being told of servicemen committing suicide, including one Air Force Staff Sergeant who hung [7] himself in his jail cell, leaving a note which simply stated, "I'm innocent." Another serviceman wrongfully convicted of sexual assault, lost his all of his benefits, including medical coverage. His wife is now dying of cancer. Another wrongfully convicted and incarcerated serviceman had to leave his young biological daughter in the custody of his falsely accusing ex-wife; the girl's stepmother, who has been investigated twice by authorities for child neglect.

As more information is developed on these tragic stories, you can rest assured that I will bring them here.

One thing that needs to be remembered; for each of these examples of wrongful convictions, there are families; wives, fiancé's, children, parents, and others who have been gravely affected.

We have the director of the Navy's SAPRO program; who cheated and stole from the taxpayers, gallivanting around the globe and continuing as if nothing has happened, using that most despicable and triggering term, "sexual predators." And she is still in her job. Ho-Hum, nothing to see here, move along…

If any of you are angered about this, then call and write your elected representatives. Ask them why the corrupt and guilty Navy SAPRO Director; Jill Vines Loftus walks free while the wrongly convicted languish in custody while they and their families suffer.

I sometimes use the euphuism that the pendulum has swung completely to the other side. That euphuism is not sufficient in describing what has been happening to our falsely accused and wrongfully convicted military men and their families. The pendulum has spun around a hundred times, broken off, and the flying debris has left a Katrina-like disaster in its wake.

The U.S. Military's sexual assault witch hunt, a Katrina-like disaster

*****

[1] http://www.dodig.mil/FOIA/err/Loftus%20ROI%20(Redacted).pdf

[2] http://www.secnav.navy.mil/donhr/About/Senior-Executives/Biographies/Loftus,%20J.pdf

[3] http://militarycorruption.com/HOS-bashore.htm

[4] https://www.google.com/search?q=sexual+predator&biw=1360&bih=643&source=lnms&tbm=isch&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwicp-OGlKnOAhWE6IMKHYC6CbAQ_AUIBygC#imgrc=_

[5] https://www.google.com/search?q=sexual+predator&biw=1360&bih=643&source=lnms&tbm=isch&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwicp-OGlKnOAhWE6IMKHYC6CbAQ_AUIBygC#tbm=isch&q=female+sexual+predators&imgrc=_

[6] http://www.military.com/daily-news/2016/04/06/dod-navy-sexual-assault-office-director-repeatedly-violated.html

[7] https://www.facebook.com/SaveOurHeroesProject/

The future of society at large

David King · 27 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Alison Tieman of the Honey Badger Brigade published this powerful appeal to generate enough support for the Badger Cave:

There's a lot in what Alison says, but I'd say that there's one glimmer of hope on the horizon she didn't mention — though it won't flourish into anything without something akin to what Alison described.

2016 marked a probable watershed in the way the public at large reacts to the narratives pushed on them by special interests. It's most obvious on the political stage:

- Britons rejected the message of fear pushed on them by both political parties and voted to leave the EU, against the elite's wishes and even if it meant short term pain;
- Democrats nearly nominated a socialist (in a country that hates socialism with a passion) for their presidential candidate; and
- Republicans completely lost their shit and, in the chaos, did nominate a man who if, per Nate Silver's commentary on the book, The Party Decides, should never have gotten even close to winning against the Party's preferred candidate (suggesting either that the premise of the book is wrong or the power of the Party and its ability to influence the public is greatly diminished).

Something big is happening in the polity and social culture. I don't know if the parties have even figured out that there's a problem yet or, if they have, whether they're aware of what it is — but if they don't figure it out and adapt soon, they're going to be out on their arses because sooner or later…

Actually, that movie, The Network, seems a pretty good analogy for what's going on now.

The thing is, there aren't currently any viable alternatives to Alison's "machine" on the table. We know communism doesn't work. Capitalism and democracy are good in theory, and while they work better than communism, they're faltering. We'll hang on to them because we need something to regulate trade, even if it isn't perfect, but sooner or later, 21st Century capitalism is going to have to undergo drastic reform.

The reasons for this are complex, but the super-short, over-simplified version goes like this:

Globalisation has been great for the developing world and the very richest of the developed world, but terrible for the percentiles that represent the developed world's middle classes. That Western middle class has been the driver of global demand, consumption, and consequent growth, but that same middle class is rapidly disappearing which means that globalism itself is in for crisis within the next few decades, and it will have to reform, one way or the other, sooner or later. The question is, when, and by whose instigation?

The phenomenon is nicely illustrated in this graph:

and a more complete explanation is given by The Atlantic's The Story of Globalization in 1 Graph and, in a bit more detail still, in the Centre for Economic Policy Research's The greatest reshuffle of individual incomes since the Industrial Revolution.

Your reaction to that graph and its analysis by VoxEU and The Atlantic will depend on your personal politics, but two things can be said about it regardless:

1. The "social contract" by which the rich get richer provided the poor gain in some way has been broken, so badly that the middle classes of the West are shrinking at an alarming rate which means that…
2. national consumption and demand (and therefore GDP) are under threat because most of it came from the middle classes (because the poor didn't have any discretionary cash anyway and the rich simply don't spend, by proportion, as much as the middle classes do).

The middle to long term business prospects are shaky if something doesn't change. It's hard to know what would fix this except a return to protectionist/isolationist trade policies, but they'd reduce everybody's standard of living and, anyway, we had those during the '60s and '70s and world macroeconomics were no picnic then either.

The implications of all of this should be enough to worry even the most hardcore anarcho-capitalists.

How does all of this relate to men? Because it has primarily been men's labour that paid for all this growth. Squeezing men harder than ever before is easier than fundamentally re-engineering society, so expect more of Alison's machine until it runs out of fodder.

People get this, which is why we see a change in attitude, both toward men and to political and economic issues as reflected in the improbable Brexit and US primary results.

If you have a few hours to burn and have any curiosity about why our economies are so broken, economist Mark Blyth is well worth a watch. Here's a fairly accessible lecture he delivered to at Glasgow University about austerity economics and how the 2009 Euro crisis was mainly about bailing out banks, not balancing budgets:

For those with a background in economics, here's a slightly more technical version of the same lecture delivered at

Google:

Blyth is well worth looking up on YouTube if you want to understand some of the machinery that drives our societies.

Senator Pauline Hanson claims women make frivolous DV complaints

AVfM Video Source · 28 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zeAbcxwjI0k

Casting out the rightwing dysfunction #MGTOW

AVfM Video Source · 28 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Alexander MGTOW has given his thoughts on some of the ideological factionism that has dogged the MGTOWsphere in recent years, in particular on what he views as the more extreme elements of right-wing ideology that have dominated conversations. While AVfM takes no position in that dogfight, we think it's an important debate to follow for those interested in the evolution of MGTOW thought.

Editor's note: This video provides a response and an alternative perspective to those of Turd Flinging Monkey previously posted on AVfM.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EVdl1CrW_sk&ab_channel=AlexanderMGTOW

Alexander MGTOW

Boys and Girls: Our Future STEM-Soldiers

Tim Patten · 29 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Our world is witnessing dramatic change: While civilization is advancing at lightning speed, we are also on the razor's edge of a catastrophe caused by shortages of natural resources, food, commodities, and water. Unless we tap the knowledge, abilities, and energy inside each of us, especially those who represent our next and future generations, the very existence of the human race may be at risk.

To address this threat and ensure the right steps are taken, our approach must be inclusive. Indeed, some are already responding to the challenge by making sure that young females are being educated and trained in areas that will prove critical in future–namely, the sciences, technology, engineering, and math, or STEM. Among others, the American Office of Science and Technology Policy, in collaboration with the White House Council on Women and Girls, have pushed hard for funding, programs, and facilities that will ensure female participation.

But women aren't the only ones at risk of being unprepared. In fact, while many might believe that males, especially young boys, don't need this kind of support, it is just not true. It is imperative that they also get prepared to do their part. Unfortunately, this is not happening to the extent it should–and must. Groups like the Foundation for Male Studies (FMS) are pressing for a level of backing that can make a real difference, but they are in a minority and looking for support from you.

The fact is that for humanity to tackle the threats that put every one of us at risk, it is necessary that our children, both boys, and girls, have the opportunity to become what might be described as STEM-soldiers, who can develop innovative and sustainable solutions to our most pressing challenges. We are facing a war of subsistence that politicians, the media, and globalism elites rarely discuss or even acknowledge, but the innovative ideas that the STEM fields can bring to existence are our only hope for keeping us alive.

Clean Water Scarcities and STEM

Of critical importance are our nation's fresh water resources, notably underground aquifers, which supply 97% of rural populations and which are being drawn down at unsustainable rates. Rivers and lakes are also running dry: the mighty Colorado River seems a shadow of its former self, while at Lake Meade, fed by the Colorado, water levels are lower than they have been in over 40 years.

Meanwhile, increasingly sparse spring rivers originating from winter thaws in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota are full of turbidity–muddy substances that lengthen and increase the cost of purification. Combine this with inadequate and broken distribution systems, including the one in Flint, Michigan, where corroded pipes are leaching poisonous heavy metals into drinking water supplies, and you get one thing: "Houston, we have a problem."

Indeed, America's future depends on environmental and infrastructure improvements that can ensure every citizen has access to this precious commodity. Beyond our borders, the issue is even direr: 85% of the world population lives in the driest half of the planet, leaving 783 million people who do not have access to this life-giving elixir. According to UNICEF, the deaths of 1,800 children each day are linked to inadequate water, sanitation and hygiene facilities.

Short of a miracle, science is the only thing that can address such challenges.

Food Shortages and STEM

There are plenty of other causes for concern. Right now, for instance, one in seven Americans struggles to get enough food to eat. If water shortages become more persistent, leading to rationing and other such measures, our nation's agricultural industry will be adversely affected, making it increasingly difficult to satisfy our needs at a time when we have little choice but to keep producing more.

Again, things are even worse in other locales. The horrifying truth is that, across the world, approximately 21,000 infants die in their mother's arms each day because of starvation. According to the United Nations' Food and Agricultural Organization, 9.5 billion people will inhabit our planet by 2050, which means food output will have to increase 40% by 2025 just to keep up. Given that, brilliant young (and old) minds will need to be more creative and consider how science and technology can improve crop and other yields, enhance packaging, and ensure that what is produced gets to where it is needed.

Pollution and Rare Earth Mineral Shortages

Not all the problems we face involve the essentials. In some cases, we face shortages of resources such as rare earth minerals, which are frequently the key ingredients in powerful new technologies, especially those considered "green." In contrast, the ever-growing number of gasoline-powered cars on the road is affecting the air we breathe and leading to an increase in pollution-related health woes that contribute to 30,000 premature deaths every year.

Other parts of our ecosystem have also not been spared. According to a report from the Ellen MacArthur Foundation, discarded plastic is set to outweigh fish in the world's oceans by 2050. A recent report noted that thirteen sperm whale carcasses washed up on Germany's North Sea coastline with stomachs full of discarded plastic and human trash. While subsequent research pinned the blame for the deaths on other factors, it is clear that something has to change.

Even the skies above us are not immune to the issues that threaten our very existence. After fifty-four years of space exploration, Earth has been left with millions of pieces of space junk cluttering its lower orbit, creating hazardous conditions that could impede exploration missions and the kind of innovative research that may help solve the problems we face here on the ground.

From the sky to the oceans and everywhere in between, our planet has suffered a great deal of harm that will require intelligent and novel approaches to turn things around. These, in turn, will require the effort of knowledgeable and talented scientists, researchers and others who have the knowledge and the training to figure out what needs to be done and how–before it is too late.

The Importance of STEM

The U.S.–and the rest of the world, for that matter–must be prepared for all the challenges by ensuring that the STEM curriculum and related aspects are available and accessible to as many as possible. While not all will have the abilities and skill sets to take advantage, such an approach will help ensure there are sufficient numbers of smart individuals creating a tidal wave of scientific and technical advances that will help us survive and thrive.

Moreover, if we don't take these steps right away, we may find that others will move past us, unconcerned about whether we are keeping up. China, for example, is expected to push 200 million students through higher education and provide three years of pre-school to 40 million children, or 70% of the overall total, by 2020. To ensure that others can take advantage, we must guarantee that we target the very same areas –science, technology engineering, and mathematics–that competitors have set their sights on.

Help Build an Army of Young STEM experts

There's no doubt that at least some efforts are being made to ensure this happens. As noted earlier, hundreds of millions of dollars are directed toward boosting the numbers of young women who graduate from college with degrees in math and science, ready for a STEM-dependent world.

But this is an equal opportunity mission: boys and men are an important part of the equation. To this end, Dr. Edward Stephens and the Foundation for Male Studies (FMS) is seeking financial support through a run for boys initiative that will help fund the first literacy-based charter school for boys, with a goal of introducing science to this group at the age of five. (In fact, those who can are encouraged to come and run in the race and help underwrite a very worthy cause).

Announcing the Foundation for Male Studies Charter School for Boys

With such efforts, we can unleash the scientific inspiration of as many children as possible. Sadly, while countries such as Canada, China, Australia, and the United Kingdom have launched taxpayer-funded efforts to augment and enhance the educational achievements of boys, U.S. federal and state governments have no such programs–or plans for them. This is unacceptable–and one reason why the FMS is taking the initiative.

FMS is seeking to increase the level of literacy, as well as numeracy–the mastery of mathematics and spatial relationships–beginning with those in kindergarten though grade 2, with another grade level added to that range each year. In some respects, the timing has been driven by Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) data, which has revealed, among other things, growing gaps between male and female literacy.

As FMS envisages it, boys who enroll in these specialized charter schools can take part in pioneering approaches to learning the core disciplines of our future, free of the restrictions imposed on traditional schools. One reason for starting so young with STEM skills is the learning gap grows larger as children grow older. While barely noticeable in kindergarten, the divergence expands significantly by grade 4 and jumps more than 50 percent by grade 12. At that point, many boys either drop out or turn off completely.

To play a part in ensuring tragedies like this don't occur, we all need to consider supporting an effort designed to ensure the next generation, more broadly speaking, has the opportunity to learn about and make use of what our future depends on. By signing up to the Foundation for Male Studies mailing list and supporting their efforts in any way we can, we can ensure our children's future–and ours. Go ahead: be a part of the next wave of scientific exploration for human survival.

Climate of fear – TFF episode 38

AVfM Video Source · 30 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 38 Professor Fiamengo discusses the climate of fear created by the culture of suspicion of male students and presumption of guilt on university campuses

StudioBrule

Feminist idiot's attempt to bully explodes in her face

Paul Elam · 30 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Meet Annaliese Nielsen, an aggressively stupid feminist who also happens to work with Barak Obama and Hillary Clinton's personal DJ. When not standing around and watching someone else spin records, she apparently likes to list her pastime as strong arming cab drivers who sport the universally triggering and trauma inducing hula-girl dash doll.

Every bit the idiot she looks like.
Apparently, we need a movement now to create Safe Space™ in Lyft and Uber cabs.

Seriously, just when you think they can't parody themselves any better than they already have, here they come again, inflicting yet more gunshot wounds to their feet. This particular Big Red style moment is gaining traction throughout the interwebz and beyond.

Warning: Do not attempt to ingest liquids near your computer while watching this video.

UPDATE!!

> Was just contacted by the Annaliese Lyft driver, he was in fact fired for a few days until she sent the video to Lyft which exonerated him.
>
> — Lauren Southern (@Lauren_Southern) August 30, 2016

Gynocentrism 2.0, compassion, and choice: The underlying root of men's issues

Tom Golden · 31 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I have long held that compassion and choice are two issues that play a part in nearly every men's issue. But why? What do compassion and choice have to do with male suicide or male victims of domestic violence or just about any other men's issue? Quite a bit actually. Let's take a look at why compassion and choice are limited for men and then see how compassion and choice are essential ingredients to the issues.

The origins of the lack of compassion and choice for men is gynocentrism. When you start to understand gynocentrism you will start to better understand the plight of men and boys. Gynocentrism at its most basic, is the mandate that women and children be kept safe and provided for at the expense of men. In other words, men are designated to insure the safety and provisions for women and children on an individual level, the family level, community level and on a macro level. This is not a totally bad thing. It has been what has created and maintained many cultures for millennia. As Stefan Molyneux says, "Eggs are scarce and sperm is plentiful." This means we have needed to sacrifice our sperm in order to insure the safety of our eggs. Without women the culture dies a quick death. Women must be protected. Gynocentrism protects those who carry the eggs and does this at the expense of its men. This has been a very important element to our cultural success but it does come at a price.

One consequence of protecting the women is that the men will need to at times face danger. The women need to be kept safe and the men will protect the boundary and sometimes die in that process. Our human history of gynocentrism is longer and deeper than most assume. We think of the hunter gatherers as serene and bucolic but that was sometimes far from the truth and gynocentrism predominated. Research shows that some South American hunter gatherer groups faced huge numbers of deaths of their men protecting the women and children.[1] One group averaged the death of nearly 60% of its males in protecting the women from inter tribal attacks that were among other things, designed to steal the other group's women! (the average for the groups studied was near 30% male deaths as a result of raids, ambush or larger scale conflicts) He who had the most women wins and these groups made a huge sacrifice of their males to insure they kept their women and children safe.

In its most obvious we can see how gynocentrism plays out when we note that men automatically and without question are the ones facing danger in our culture. Our war dead are nearly 100% male. Our deaths in dangerous occupations are 93% men. Our trashmen and sewage workers are nearly all male. The dirtiest and most dangerous jobs are jobs for men. No one questions this. It just seems right. This is the hidden power of gynocentrism. No one questions and no one notices. Hell, if women actually got equality to the above it would be a huge step down for them.

But gynocentrism runs much deeper than simply being about protecting the borders and doing the dangerous work. It has its tendrils into just about everything, silently and without fanfare. What happens when a woman has a flat tire? How many people have seen the help she will usually garner from men? Now think about what happens if a man has a flat tire. Does he get a similar treatment? Probably not. This is gynocentrism. When there are problems we jump to help women but expect the men to handle it themselves even in today's atmosphere of "equality".

What happens when a woman is upset and falls into a sea of tears? Pretty much the same thing as the flat tire. People hover to offer support and see what might be wrong and what they can do. But what happens when men fall into a similar sea? People ignore him and avoid him. It is almost as if a woman's pain is a call to action while a man's pain is taboo. Compassion offered to men is a fraction of the compassion offered to women.

There are a number of youtube videos that employ actors to portray men beating women in public. The women are shown to get immediate support and help from male onlookers who see the violence. They quickly jump to her aid not knowing it is an arranged scene. These same videos then reverse the roles and show the women beating men in a similar manner and no one lifts a finger, in fact, they laugh. This is gynocentrism. We expect to help the women and expect the men to help themselves. Note also that we allow women to be dependent but do not allow the same for men.

On an even simpler level think of a man and a woman at work who need to move some boxes from one location to another. Some are heavy, some are light. Who will be moving the heavy ones? It is a foregone conclusion that the man will most often move the largest boxes and will protect her from having to do hard labor. This is gynocentrism.

And then there is the question of attractiveness. When a woman is attractive she gets special perks simply due to her appearance. No man can come close to having a similar response. This is gynocentrism. The eggs are protected and the attractive eggs get very special treatment.

[image]Think of that attractive woman being tied to the railroad tracks. What does that do to the hearts and minds of most people? Most of us have an inborn reaction that says DO SOMETHING to help her. But what about a man tied to the tracks? Is your reaction the same or different? Yes, you likely want to see him helped but is it the same gut wrenching sensation? The plots of many movies and novels are fueled by this gynocentric scenario. We all want the woman tied to the tracks safely released even if it means the death of numerous men in the process. A woman's needs are a call to action while a man's needs are often just ignored. He needs to save her!

Just think for a minute what would happen to a man in the military who started complaining that we needed to have more female war deaths in order to make things equal for everyone. How would he be received? All hell would break loose at this questioning of the gynocentric norm and disregard for the safety of women. We see something similar when the opposite happens and men voice their desires for equal opportunities for services for men in things like domestic violence. Those who stand up for the needs of men in our gynocentric culture are seen as misogynistic, that is, they are routinely accused of hating women simply for pointing out the needs of men. Can you see how the fuel for this is gynocentrism?

Another example of extreme gynocentrism is boot camp in the army. What is done? The recruit is taught that he is nothing. He is now not an individual, he is a part of a fighting group. His personal identity is deleted and he is taught to fight for the group, for a cause. He no longer exists. There is no compassion for his personal feelings and needs. Those are a distant second. He also has zero choice. He does what he is told. That is the extreme gynocentric model that plays out to one degree or another in our everyday life.

Do we care about the feelings of the woman tied to the tracks? Oh yes. Do we care about the feelings of the hero who rescues her? No. We care about his actions. His emotions are not important unless his feelings are about HER. Do we care about the emotions of the boot camp recruit? Nope. We care about his actions and what he does. His feelings need to be kept to himself. In the same way, under the gynocentric default we tend to care about the emotions of women but will be averse to the emotions of men. Our interest moves more towards his actions. Think about the last time you saw a woman cry in public. What was your reaction? Most of us want to help, want to offer support. We are drawn to her neediness. Now think about a man crying under the same circumstances you saw the woman. Are you as open to his tears as the woman? Most of us say no, we are not. We are repulsed by his neediness. The man is not expected to be needy, he is expected to have agency. If he is seen as needy he is judged harshly. This is gynocentrism.

These sorts of advantages for women have been going on for many years. In the 19th century men would strive to do the best job of keeping women safe and provided for. Just read their diaries and the diaries of their wives. These men put women on a pedestal. They thought of them as angelic and would try their best to not have them sully themselves with the grime of daily life outside the home. They worked hard to have them stay away from “dirty”things like the workplace or money. They did this because they saw women as worthy of protection (gynocentrism) and were happy to take on the extra burden in order to keep her safe. Then along comes feminism which makes the incredibly noxious and inaccurate claim that women were not held in high esteem at all, they were being oppressed. They took the protections that women had benefited from for centuries and spun them into being oppression. In my opinion this is the biggest lie of the 20th century and it has left a wake of chaos and vitriol. Women now actually believe themselves to be victims and that they have been shortchanged and oppressed. These are the same women who didn’t have to go to war, didn’t have to do the dirty work of building or maintaining the culture, were held in high esteem and basically worshiped (as American as Mom and Apple Pie) now see this as oppression. Houdini could not have done a more impressive magic trick.

So what do you think happened? It could be easily predicted that gynocentrsim would insure that when women appear to be in danger or need that men will jump and meet those needs as best they can. That’s the way both men and women are programmed. And that is just what happened. The feminists claimed to be tied to the tracks and rode, and continue to ride the gynocentric wave of men keeping women safe. Their unfounded claims that women were oppressed and held back have been taken seriously by well meaning highly gynocentric males, including male legislators. These claims of women being tied to the tracks and needing government intervention were welcomed by our gynocentric legislators who wanted to bend over backwards to help women. Over the years women have been given more and more while simultaneously continuing to enjoy the same gynocentric advantages they have been getting for hundreds of years. Our legislators have backed themselves into a corner and are now afraid to say no.

They know that they have been hijacked but don't have the courage to say no to saving a damsel in distress. Saying no would insure a loss in the next election.

This was the beginning of what I like to call Gynocentrism 2.0. The cultural imperative of caring for women continues and is now amplified by false claims of women having been oppressed. Simultaneously Gynocentrism 2.0 showed not only increased focus on the needs and desires of women, it also made a dramatic switch. Men in gynocentrism 1.0 were held in high esteem when they followed through with their role. They were both respected and admired and this was fuel for the masculine. Both sexes were held in high esteem. Now that fuel for men has run out as the admiration and respect has been gaudily replaced with disdain and blame. Incredibly, now men are seen as the problem and held accountable for social problems as if they were the cause. It is all the men's fault. Much is said about men not doing very well these days but very few people note this important shift. When you don't put fuel in the engine it ain't goin too far.

In Gynocentrism 2.0 entire bureaucracies are built to serve women and cater to their difficulties but there are rarely any such bureaucracies built for men. The women are left with a choice of whether to seek help at a government funded facility (payed for with mostly male tax dollars) built for them while the men are left with no choices.

One of the best examples of this is the issue of domestic violence where we have known for decades that men are a sizable portion (likely nearing 50%) of the victims of domestic violence but all of the laws and services are built for women. We spend nearly a billion dollars a year for the Violence Against WOMEN Act (VAWA) that marginalizes the 50% of male victims. Recent research exposed the sad fact that when men who are the victims of domestic violence go to these government funded services for help they are treated very poorly. Often when the men are victims of domestic violence and they turn to the government funded services they are told that they are not victims of domestic violence, they are accused of being the perpetrators! They then send him to treatment for perpetrators! Researchers are calling this third party abuse, when the government bureaucracy as a third party, participates in the continued abuse of a victim. This is gynocentrism 2.0 which leaves no compassion for men and far fewer choices in seeking help.

I was involved in lobbying for male victims of domestic violence during the reauthorization of the VAWA in both 2005 and 2012. Our group was well received by then Senator Biden. He and his staff listened to our data and stories about male victims in several meetings at his Senate office. He assured us we would be a part of the hearings. When the hearing came not one of our group was allowed to speak. I couldn't believe it. Biden was totally aware of the problem of male victims and intentionally sabotaged our efforts to find support for men. It was then that I realized how deeply our system is biased and non-functional. Gynocentrism 2.0.

It's important to point out that our government has been pushing a gynocentric agenda for some time. In the 1960's President Johnson set in motion the War on Poverty which proceeded to demand the removal of black fathers from their families in order for mom to get welfare. Now our family courts are doing something similar as they remove fathers from the home through no fault on the fathers part. The woman's needs come first, father's a distant second.

My state of Maryland created a Commission for Men's Health a number of years ago. I was fortunate to serve as the vice chair of that commission and wrote three of the four reports that were to be sent to the governor. The reports I wrote were what I call "male friendly." That is, they voiced and considered the needs of men without bowing to the prevailing political correctness. The chairman of the commission wrote the other report which was a bit more what the Health Department, our host agency, was anticipating. All four reports were unanimously approved by the full commission. When the commission's work was done and it came time to file the reports to the governor and a host of other Maryland politicians and get them into the Maryland State Library the Health Department only filed the report that was written by the Chairman. They were confronted with this and said, "ooops, we will file it now." But they didn't. It took a year to track down the files and finally get them into the Maryland system. The full story of this event will be told in a chapter in Janice Fiamengo's upcoming book. It couldn't be more clear that when the needs of men were given voice, the status quo balked. It seems that our mid level bureaucrcrats are filled with gynocentrism 2.0.

I think you can see now how women's complaints and our legislators zealous rush to help them have turned things topsy turvy. Rape shield laws have been written to protect the rape victims and this is a good thing. But those same laws failed to protect the accused man. His name can be released to the media prior to any conviction. Her name is permanently protected while his name is plastered all over the media and he has his life ruined simply due to an accusation which may or may not be proven false . Gynocentrism 2.0.

Another example is the issue of suicide where males are 80% of all completed suicides. Incredibly this 80% fact is rarely mentioned in the media leaving most people unaware that the biggest risk factor in suicide is being male. It is not surprising that females get the majority of attention around suicide both clinically and in research. This even though men are the vast majority of those needing help. In 2009 the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) did some research on suicide. I was shocked to see it was a study on girls! I wrote to then NASW Director Elizabeth Clark and asked why the research focused on girls when it was men and boys who were the vast majority of suicides. She wrote me back and said that the funder for the research had specified to only study girls. Just imagine for a moment someone who funded research for Sickle Cell Disease but stipulated the research had to be on whites. Can you imagine the outrage? Blacks are 60-80% of those with Sickle Cell disease and to study only whites would be seen as totally racist but somehow studying only girls and suicide is okay. That is gynocentrism.

Our gynocentric legislators have outlawed any form of genital mutilation of females but have failed to do the same for our baby boys. Boys routinely undergo a surgical removal of part of their penis without anesthesia. Of course the baby boys scream during and after this mutilation. Some nurses say they have seen baby boys scream for days after. Many are thinking today that this trauma creates PTSD for those males who have been circumcised and presently about four out of every 5 males in the United States has suffered this mutilation. Research is showing that psychological impact of circumcision on boys is similar to the psychological impact for girls who have undergone genital mutilation. This procedure is damaging our boys while most people think it is simple little snip. Wrong. We care about our little girls but fail in mustering enough compassion for boys to shelter them from such barbaric treatment and we give them no choice. Gynocentrism.

In healthcare we have seen our legislators create seven national commissions for women's health but none for men. We have official government web sites for womenshealth.gov and girlshealth.gov but just look at what happens when you go to menshealth.gov or boyshealth.gov. Nothing. You find a 404 page not found error. It does not exist. Get the picture? When anyone starts looking critically at our world it becomes clear that gynocentrism is at its core. We constantly hear criticism of men not going to the doctor etc but look at the concern for their health above by not even having a web site. Women in need get the help and men just need to take care of themselves. Just like the flat tire we talked about above. And no one is even aware this is going on.

Warren Farrell put together a group of clinicians, academics, researchers, authors and other experts on men and boys who wrote a proposal for a White House Council on Boys and Men. I was happy to be included as one of those who put the proposal together. President Obama had created a council for women and girls as soon as he got into office. Now he was being asked to do the same for boys and men. One of our group members, a man named Willie Isles was an executive with the Boy Scouts and had a meeting scheduled with the President. The plan was for Willie to have two Boy Scouts introduce the idea of the White House Council on Boys and Men to the President. Just before that meeting was to take place the discussion of a council for boys and men was struck from the agenda. It was forbidden to even be discussed. Gynocentrism anyone?

There is an anti-male bias in mental health research. One study on teen relationship violence found that boys and girls are suffering from this problem at similar rate. But once the research is translated into news articles it only focuses on the hardships the girls face. Worse yet, once the study is translated by legislators into an action plan to help the teen violence problem the only ones offered assistance are the girls while the boys are blamed. Yes, boys are abused but they simply don't get compassion. Gynocentrism

432 American Journal of Preventive Medicine, Volume 28, Number 5

Table 2. Prevalence (%) and characteristics of childhood sexual abuse by gender

	Men (n=7970) %	Women (n=9367) %
Type of sexual abuse
Touched in a sexual way	13.2	22.5
Forced to touch an adult	8.1	7.9
Attempted sexual intercourse	7.3	8.6
Completed sexual intercourse	6.7	5.6
Any type of childhood sexual abuse	16.0	24.7
Severity of sexual abuse[a]	(n=1276)	(n=2310)
No intercourse	58.2	77.1
Intercourse	41.8	22.9
Sex of perpetrator[a]
Male only	51.0	91.9
Female only	20.8	2.1
Both male and female	18.3	3.6
Not specified	9.9	2.4

[a]Frequencies calculated only for those who met the definition of

In one study about childhood rape the researchers found that boys were more often the victims of actual childhood rapes than the girls. Then in writing up their research failed to specifically include this information about boys as victims of rape. Furthermore, when they went to the media they also failed to mention the fact that they have found that boys were raped more often than girls. Gynocentrism.

Title IX — Has been a great help to girls and athletics but has dismantled over 1000 men's college teams. We focus on helping women but ignore the pain of men.

We have all heard of the racial sentencing bias where blacks tend to get stiffer sentences than whites for the same crime. But the research is telling us that there is a bias that is six times as large as the racial bias that sentences men to longer sentences than women. Yet, we hear nothing of this in the media and no one seems to care. Clearly the judges have less compassion for men and offer them far less choice.

I have seen a number of men in therapy who came to me when their wives wanted an abortion and they (the men) wanted to keep the child. The men were powerless to do anything. Can you see how these men had no choice in the matter? His wife said, "My body, my choice" and he said "My child, your choice, I have none." He had no choice and if he had said something I feel sure he would have heard some variation of big boys don't cry. Know what I mean? Can you see how no one really cares or offers them compassion for their plight? Compassion and Choice.

Look at men's clubs and men's spaces that have been traditional places for men to gather. Gone. They have been opened to women and not replaced with anything that would give men a safe place to simply gather with other men. Men gathering became the enemy with the accusation of secret deals that would keep women out of business dealings. At the same time all women's clubs have soared. Women only gyms, women only parking places, women only subway cars, women only everything….but no comparable opportunities for men. There are even groups that keep track of all of the groups for women. One is The National Association of Commissions for Women which keeps track of the literally hundreds of commissions for women. That is gynocentrism 2.0 on steroids.

Instead of thinking of choice for men, the majority of our gynocentric culture are thinking instead the word "should." Men should do this, men should do that and if they don't, they are not really men. Most men are caught in this drama that researchers are calling "precarious manhood" where men are forced to prove their worth repeatedly in order to be called men. Women do not face a similar situation.

Professions are not immune to Gynocentrism. The profession of social work is a prime example. This group is focused on women and ignores the needs and the hardships of men. Their educational system offers classes on just about every possible client to work with including women, gays, handicapped, children but fails to teach their charges even the first thing about men and boys. This even though men and boys make up a good portion of the clientele they will be working with.

Our focus has been on a larger scale or macro level and it is very easy to see the imbalance in so many spheres. The point here is not that the services that have been created were not a good thing or were undeserved. Many of the services offered have been very helpful to women and girls. The point here is that it has been a very one sided ride with nearly all the services going to women and girls and the men and boys basically ignored. Men and boys have simply not gotten compassion and choice. Gynocentrism 2.0.

But let's take a quick look at the impact of gynocentrism on a micro level. We have seen so far that the public has very little interest in men's emotions. While that is surely true on a macro level it is also the case on the micro. What is the tired and hackneyed message that the some women offer her man? Oh, they say "You are not dealing with your feelings." I hope you can see now that this sort of shaming is really an excuse to NOT deal with his emotions. Much has been written by gynocentric types about men's not emoting in public, or men not emoting like women, while maintaining the underlying assumption that there must be something wrong with them. But almost nothing has been written about the brick wall men face when they do emote. When men have emotions people disappear. No one wants to hear it.

What I have seen repeatedly is that men have very different ways to process emotions. Ways that are invisible to most. They have likely developed these different ways due to the prevalence of gynocentrism and are happy with their paths to work with their own emotions and gladly take care of things on their own without fanfare and "help." The saddest part of this is that most women simply do not see his different ways and assume he is "doing it wrong" since it isn't like what she does.

Conclusion

Gynocentrism creates a cultural default both on a micro and macro level where women's distress is a call to action and a man's distress is seen at best as a distraction and at worst a taboo. This leaves men being offered considerably less compassion and fewer choices. In the past 50 years the original gynocentric defaults have morphed into gynocentrism 2.0 which has seen a huge increase in both the lop-sided services favoring women and the disdain and blame focused on men.

Very few people are conscious of this habitual default, they simply assume it is just the way the world works.

Becoming more and more aware of gynocentrism makes it easier to see why men are 80% of the completed suicides but are basically ignored. It makes sense now that men are nearly 50% of the victims of domestic violence but are routinely disregarded. It makes sense now why boys genital mutilation is the fourth most popular surgical procedure in the U.S. even though it is unnecessary and highly damaging. The world is geared to have compassion for women's needs but not as much for the needs of men. We could go on and on about each of the many men's issues and see how the lack of compassion and choice plays a part in their dilemma.

The unconscious nature of gynocentrism may be its most ruinous aspect. People are simply unaware of the great differences in the way men and women are treated. It is in some ways reminiscent of the racism I remember in the mid 20th century. People were simply unaware of their treatment of blacks. There were surely outright bigots at the time but the majority of people were basically asleep to the impact of their attitudes and behaviors and went along with the status quo that treated blacks and whites in significantly different ways. The general public was duped by a media that portrayed blacks as inferior and an educational system and even academic research that did the same. With gynocentrism 2.0 we are seeing something very similar but instead of the blacks it is now our men. Today's gynocentrism is made up primarily of people who are basically unaware of the impact of their behaviors and are simply going along with the gynocentric status quo.

It's time to wake up.

Knowing these things and taking the red pill makes it important for us to start offering men and boys greater compassion and choice.

And let's not forget. Men Are Good!

The fault, dear feminists, lies not within your stars…

August Løvenskiolds · 31 August 2016 · Archived copy · Original

…but in your lies about the names of stars.

A recent man-hating article in The Atlantic by one Leila McNeill impugned the reputations of astronomers and cosmologists throughout the ages for the names given to stars, planets, or other objects associated with observations of the universe.

The Washington Examiner summarized her article well:

> Leila McNeill wrote in an article republished in The Atlantic magazine on Tuesday that the skies are "still filtered through this tradition of mythic misogyny." She said many constellations "named after men tell stories of heroism and conquest," while women are more frequently portrayed as "either monsters or domestic nurturers."
>
> She said ancient Roman and Greek mythology is "deeply misogynistic" because male deities "rein [sic] with unlimited power while their female counterparts suffer violence and humiliation." McNeill also claimed modern-day astronomers who draw on this tradition to name celestial bodies and spacecraft contribute to a "scientific culture that diminishes the achievements of women."

Now, normally when feminists enter into the science of astronomy it is to criticize the fashion choices of male astrophysicists or, alternatively, create more exploitable, friend-zoned beta orbiters with vacuous promises of sexual access for "nice guys." However, months after I had theorized that a new feminist zodiac would be needed to appease feminists making hysterically bogus attacks on men for everything, I was a bit disappointed to see that Leila had purloined my idea wholesale without even a whisper of credit coming my way.

Of course, Leila's charges of sexism and misogyny are ludicrous on their face – her objection that women constellations portray women as "either monsters or domestic nurturers" literally means that, in dramatic stories, characters are either good, or bad. Of course they are – that is how stories work. Portraying all women as monsters is misogyny but saying a woman is a monster is not misogyny – she is just a woman who happens to be bad news for others.

Likewise, portraying all women as nurturers is misogyny because some women are feminists who couldn't nurture a rock, but depicting one woman-as-nurturer is actually sort of wistfully bittersweet, harkening back to a mythic time when women were supposedly capable of caring for others.

So, if bad women are not feminist, and good women are not feminist, we have to ask, is it possible for any mythic woman to have feminist credentials? A neutral, lukewarm, emotionally restricted professional nerd woman like a doctor or an architect, stuck in a bland job for 70-100 hours a week without a family or even a pet to come home to, might make a fine feminist icon but is a lousy subject for drama or naming inspiration, either now or in the myths of the past.

Leila then accidentally destroys her own argument when she claims that "the constellations named after men tell stories of heroism and conquest, not submission and subjugation." But the essence of feminism is complaining about the mythical submission and subjugation of women, which means that, for feminism, the constellations should be perfectly named.

Indeed, before the matriarchy gave way to the spinsterarchy, less than 1% of observable stars were named for men! The largest group of stars observable without a telescope is called the Milky Way, a collection of billions of stars in what we now call the Milky Way Galaxy:

> This name is also quite ancient. It is translation from the Latin "Via Lactea", which in turn was translated from > the Greek for Galaxias, referring to the pale band of light formed by stars in the galactic plane as seen from Earth.

Had the evil patriarchy been naming these stars, it might be called “The Road of Semen” or something like that. Instead, it was named for a distinctly female product: milk. Both the Milky Way and the other billions of galaxies are named for something from women. Naming something after women can hardly be characterized as misogynistic.

This alone is enough to smash Leila’s dubious thesis to bits, but why stop there?

The nearest major galaxy to the Milky Way is known as the galaxy of Andromeda, also named after a constellation linked to a mythic heroic woman. Andromeda was condemned to death because of the effects of her looks, which makes her the perfect foil for feminist talk about objectification 2000 years before anyone thought feminism might be a thing. After she was rescued during a slut walk by feminist ally Perseus, Andromeda did become a mother later in life but this “domestic nurturing” is just a “happily ever after” to her story of liberation from the chains of men, which ends with her being immortalized in the stars. (Yea, you go, girl.)

Billions and billions of stars. More stars than there are women. Do you see now, Leila? THAT is how you should be interpreting myths, you hopeless idea thief.

When Cassiopeia bragged on her daughter Andromeda’s beauty, bad things happened to Andromeda in response to the hubris of Cassiopeia. Seems the gods hated objectification of attractive women as much as feminists do, or perhaps they were just jealous, too.

In a few billion years the Andromeda Galaxy will smash into our Milky Way Galaxy in an orgy of lesbian scissoring that I’m sure feminists of that era will find dozens of consent issues to whine about. The resulting Andromilk galaxy will be as problematic as all hell, I’m sure.

Credit for image:

NASA, ESA, and the Hubble Heritage Team (STScI/AURA)
Acknowledgement: William Blair (Johns Hopkins University)

Dr. Hershel Goldman of Melbourne, AU, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 2 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Hershel Goldman has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

This is from his website circumcisioncentre.com.au:

“Congratulations On Your New Baby Boy!

Parents are faced with many important decisions throughout their child’s life on how best to establish the building blocks of optimum health, self-esteem and quality of life. A decision that is best considered early on in your son’s life is whether or not to circumcise.

As parents have the legal right to authorise circumcision, this website has been designed as a first step in helping you make an informed decision in understanding the benefits and risks of circumcision, and choosing the best option for your son.

Dr Hershel Goldman is the principle Doctor who runs the Melbourne Circumcision Centre and performs the circumcisions. He is a fully qualified General Practitioner with more than 30 years experience in performing neonatal circumcisions for both medical and ritual reasons.

Dr Goldman does not perform circumcisions on adults or children over 4 months. If you wish arrange circumcision for older children or adults, we advise you contact your regular Doctor, and ask for his/her assistance. If he/she cannot assist, you are welcome to come for an appointment, and Dr Goldman can advise and arrange an appropriate referral.”

Why does the doctor perform this abuse on baby boys only? Because he can. It’s rightfully illegal for girls, and at any other age would necessitate general anesthesia because the pain – and no obvious need for it – would cause a violent confrontation. Babies can only cry out, which these mutilators ignore.

Under “What is Circumcision?” we read:

> A simple surgical procedure that removes the foreskin. The foreskin is the sleeve of skin that covers the tip of the penis.
>
> Why Circumcise?
> The foreskin traps bacteria, infectious agents and malodorous smegma. Therefore, its removal ensures greater genital hygiene and reduces the risk of infections or diseases for the male and his future sexual partners.
>
> Is Circumcision a Common Procedure?
> Research indicates that 69% of Australian-born men are circumcised (Richters et al 2006). Routine circumcision in Australia decreased in the 1970s – 1980s (Wirth 1986) due to inconclusive myths such as alleged differences in sexual satisfaction and psychological impact. Today, it is a popular procedure amongst well-informed parents, and backed by positive research results.

There are other body parts that trap “bacteria, infectious agents and malodorous smegma,” namely, parts of the vagina, yet we don’t routinely amputate them because truly “well-informed parents” have heard of – and use – soap to clean those parts. As a doctor, Goldman should know that smegma lubricates the skin, keeps it waterproof, and protects against microbial invaders. He should have also learned in Biology 101 that anything “malodorous” comes from dying bacteria that simply hasn’t been cleaned with the aforementioned soap. To routinely amputate functional tissue from unconsenting infants, male or female, is a human rights violation that no person – except the patient – can consent to.

Under “What are the Benefits” we see:

> Eliminated Risk of Foreskin Infections
> Balanitis is an inflammation of the skin covering the head of the penis. A similar condition, Balanoposthitis refers to inflammation of the head and the foreskin. Both cause swelling, rash, pain and foul-smelling discharge.
>
> Eliminated Scarring of the Foreskin
> Phimosis is a condition involving a tight foreskin that cannot be completely pulled back. This makes cleaning under the skin and passing urine difficult.
>
> Decreased Risk of Thrush & STDs
> The use of condoms is essential for good sexual health regardless of circumcision. It is worth noting however, that the risk of many STDs from HIV to genital warts is reduced by the genital hygiene effects of circumcision.
>
> Decreased Risk of Cervical Cancer in Female Partners
> Because any infectious bacteria or viruses living under a foreskin is transferred into the female during sexual contact, circumcision reduces the transmission of diseases like Chlamydia and the associated HPV virus which causes cervical cancer.
>
> Decreased Risk of HIV
> Reduce the risk of HIV by up to 60%. Recent rise in incidence of HIV infection among hetrosexual Australians has led to a call by some physicians for the reintroduction of routine circumcision in infants as a preventative measure.
>
> Decreased risk of Penile Cancer
> Penile Cancer is a rare but serious disease which rarely occurs in circumcised males.
>
> Decreased risk of Urinary Tract Infections
> Urinary tract infections are particularly dangerous in infancy and in 40% of cases can lead to kidney inflammation and disease.
>
> Decreased risk of Prostate Cancer
> Prostate Cancer is a malignant tumour, and one of the most common types of cancer in men. It usually grows very slowly.

I guess the doctor is technically correct about “eliminating scarring of the foreskin” because he amputates it and it gets tossed in the trash (or made into face cream). The complication rate of scarring of the penis is 100%. All these other stated “benefits” are false, and some of these risks are actually caused (infection) by circumcision. Death is one risk the doctor neglects to mention.

Under “What are the Risks of Circumcision?” we read:

> Pain
> As with any medical procedure, localised pain during and for a short time after the procedure may occur. Local anaesthetic is used, and this will be discussed with you in detail prior to the procedure. Oral painkillers can be administered for comfort after the circumcision. Pain and discomfort after the procedure is significantly reduced when the procedure is completed at the youngest possible age.
>
> Bleeding
> Minor bleeding may occur which can be easily contained by applying pressure, or less commonly a few stitches.
>
> Complications
> Serious complications requiring hospitalisation are rare (approximately 1 in 5000). Serious complications are virtually unheard of when performed by an experienced medical practitioner. Nevertheless, you will be provided with an emergency phone number after the circumcision. The need for repeat surgery is not common at less than 1 in 1000.

> Infections
> Generalised infections requiring antibiotics resulting from circumcision are extremely rare at less that 1 in 4000.
>
> Myths
> Common mis-information about circumcision includes differences in penile sensitivity and negative psychological impacts. We encourage you to discuss these and any other concerns you may have with Dr Goldman.

The doctor himself is giving out misinformation regarding psychological impacts of this traumatic surgery on infants as there have been no studies on it's impact, and as far as penile sensitivity it doesn't take a Phd. to realize that removing sensitive tissue removes sensitivity.

I found this disturbing article about Dr. Goldman and his views on circumcision. A sample of the doctor's attitude toward genital mutilation:

> There's a very old joke about a guy who's walking down the street and he sees a shop with clocks in the window. He goes into the shop and says: "I'd like to buy a clock please." The shopkeeper says: "Sorry, I don't sell clocks, I'm a circumciser." The guy says: "So why do you have clocks in your window?" The shopkeeper says: "Well, what do you want me to put in my window?"
>
> ---
>
> Next we got on to a very interesting subject – the ethical debate about circumcision and how it's looked upon as being politically incorrect. These days, if you even think about circumcising your son, you can expect Greenpeace activists to abseil into the room and handcuff themselves to your kid's willy. Hershel agreed that circumcision was unfashionable, but he sensed things were starting to turn around.
>
> ---
>
> It was getting late, so I thanked Hershel. He said: "Before you go, do you want to see my equipment?" I said: "Ummm, I'm sure it's very nice but I don't think that will be necessary." He said: "No, I'm talking about the equipment I use in my circumcisions." I said: "Oh, right. OK then." So he went and got his knives and scalpels and a little metal shield called a "mogan". He described how he cut, which bit he cut, and I said: "So what do you do with the foreskin after you've removed it." He said: "Let me tell you – I take the foreskin and I make it into a little wallet. And it's really amazing – when I rub the thing, it turns into a suitcase!"

Imagine the doctor joking about female genital mutilation – he wouldn't be laughing for long after feminists get hold of him. No sexual assault or mutilation such as MGM or FGM is funny – and both are actually illegal.

You would think feminists – who supposedly champion equal rights – are opponents of MGM as well as FGM. Think again. This 'progressive' group aligned with Amnesty International, Oxford Against Cutting, flatly admits that male lives don't matter, and that the "cutting" they abhor concerns females only. Watch this video by TL;DR who examines this group and the hypocrisy of feminism, showing how feminism does not 'help men too.'

Since Dr. Goldman has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Here's Dr. Goldman's practice information:

Melbourne Circumcision Centre

Chandler Road Medical Centre

127 Chandler Road, Noble Park

Telephone: 03 9791 1122

Camberwell Road Medical Practice

124-126 Camberwell Rd, Hawthorn East

Telephone: 03 9834 7600

E-Mail
info@circumcisioncentre.com.au

A/H Contact: (03) 9387-1000

Intactivism Update – We're slowly cracking the mainstream media's wall of silence; see this article in Fusion.

> Dr. Hershel Goldman of Melbourne, AU, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/LjOQN3OcQc #MGM @AndreHardie #nocirc pic.twitter.com/QIVcZJeIsi
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) September 2, 2016

Oxford doesn’t understand genital mutilation

Gary Costanza · 2 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Wow – just wow.

I’ll let TL;DR explain this important video:

“Cutting someone else’s genitals without consent is not a good idea outside of reasons of valid medical intervention. It is not a women’s issue, it is not a men’s issue, it is a people issue and must be approached as such. Stop gendering ungendered problems and stop spreading misinformation and relying on knee jerk emotional propaganda to manipulate people into ignoring the real issue.”

> Oxford Doesn't Understand Genital Mutilation https://t.co/9rQegDcLpg #nocirc #mgm @andreahardie pic.twitter.com/3SsJQg3AyS
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) September 2, 2016

Not enough hate in the world for New Statesman's @suzanne_moore

Paul Elam · 6 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It's no secret that New Statesman is an unbalanced publication. Their content, almost always slovenly, conjures up the image of Rosie O'Donnell at a carnival, shoving uncounted numbers of fried Twinkies in her face with one hand while dutifully holding a Diet Coke in the other. Everything I have ever read by them leaves me with that uneasy, "what's wrong with this picture?" feeling.

This is especially true with their "coverage" of the men's rights movement. From their sloppy conflation of PUAs (pickup artists) with MRAs (Men's Rights Advocates) to the "Oh ya, men haz some problems, too, uh, we guess," motif that permeates media from TIME to Tumblr.

Apparently, even a condescending acknowledgment of men's issues is too much for mainstream feminists like New Statesman's Suzanne Moore. She feels like her sisters made a mistake with their laughably insincere backpedaling after being called out on their bigotry.

She yearns for a return to class hatred ala Robin Morgan (without, of course, noticing it never ended), and makes a sincere but lame stab at the verbal gymnastics required to explain to readers how hating men as a class actually doesn't make her anything like the despicable bigot she is.

She highlights her passion for gender equity with such ideological brio.

> Men. You can't live with them. You can't shoot them. Well, you can, but this is the New Statesman.
>
> You can't hate them [abused boys] individually, can you? You know what? I can.
>
> I want to see this class [men] broken. There can't be even basic equality for women without taking away the power of men – and by that I don't mean feeling sorry for them because they have no friends or suggesting that they have small genitals. I mean the removal of their power.

There is a lot more hate in the article. Basically every line in it except for the ones dedicated to convincing you that she is not a hater. Here is one example:

"The more I hate men (#YesAllMen), the more I don't mind individual ones," she says, following her declaration that she is cognizant enough of her emotions to know the difference between personal hurt and politically motivated class hatred. Like most feminists, she is not cognizant enough of basic human psychology to know that there is no difference between the two and never has been.

Her attempt to proffer this delusional distinction is the can of Diet Coke in her hand as she inhales mouthful after mouthful of fried sugar and simple carbohydrates. It is the imagined proof that there is a resilient shred of human decency in someone whose humanity likely vanished before it ever had a chance to take shape.

Perhaps it started with fatherlessness. An American-British hybrid, Moore was a product of a divorce in her childhood, after which she was shipped off to an all girl's school — out of the home at 16. Seems a good enough start on the road to Daddy Issues.

Later in life she went to school, attempting to major in psychology but was later swayed into "cultural studies." Surely no man-hating there. Nothing at all that would channel her Daddy Issues into an ideologically bitter worldview, right?

One has to wonder if the recent attempts by her feminist sisters to rebrand and resell themselves as something other than ~~Daddy~~, uh, man hating harridans bent on the destruction of men has caused a bit of panic in Moore.

She really has nothing to worry about. After all, here she is today using a platform like the New Statesman, waxing apoplectic in a way that if done by a man about women would have Mark Potok of the SPLC gearing up for another round of Pin the Publication on the Hate Map.

Don't worry, Suzanne, there is still plenty of bigotry and hatred in the world for you to wallow in. If all else fails, go back to school and finish your doctorate.

I have always found feminists of Moore's ilk (read: all of them) standout failing is their lack of recognition of, or appreciation for, irony. I mean, here she is, writing on a computer that was made easy enough for her to operate without understanding, by men; enjoying a career in a civilization that men built well enough to allow people – even those who can build nothing — to earn a living by tapping keys on a laptop; and whining about all of it through a worldwide technology that would not exist save for the men she hates so much.

All that is left I suppose is for some man to figure out how to make people move on from childhood and start living like adults. Once that is accomplished, perhaps even people like Suzanne Moore will start giving men a little slack.

Just enough, I am hoping, that they can use it to hang her with.

Of course, I mean that figuratively. After all, this is not the New Statesman.

Title IX and college rape: a series of injustice part 3

Jessica Denis · 6 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is Part 3 in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication of sexual assault cases, the clear lack of due process as well as discrimination and civil rights issues. In Part 1, a wrongfully accused man proved his innocence, yet the college imposed sanctions that damaged his life anyway. In Part 2, a young dating couple's lives were disrupted for more than two years after someone else decided that she was raped and the university continued to harass them even after she filed her own Title IX action.

Betrayed by a school and crushed by the experience, John Doe is now living back at home trying to put together pieces of his life. He should be with his friends at San Diego State University, but after the unthinkable happened, that's just not the reality he is living in today.

During his freshman year, John Doe became close with a young woman on campus. According to court documents, in the spring of 2015 Jane Roe filed a complaint with the campus Title IX coordinator alleging that John Doe sexually assaulted her. She claimed she was too incapacitated to give consent after consuming edible marijuana. Four months went past between the date of the alleged incident and the date John Doe received a notice imposing his immediate suspension. At that time, just like established patterns in other cases described in the first two parts of this series, due process took a back seat. He was barred from campus, which included housing, and he lost all credit for courses as well as prepaid tuition. Jane Roe was never given any punishment for (also according to court documents) bringing her own marijuana to John Doe's room.

John Doe was notified about his disciplinary hearing, to determine if he sexually assaulted a woman, 14 days prior to the hearing. The hearing was grossly biased, and testimony that proved John Doe's innocence was tarnished by "severely prejudicial conduct," further described as:

> "Dr. Rovner presented a report from Petitioner's polygraph examination, revealing that Petitioner answered relevant questions truthfully, that Ms. Roe never said she needed a break from sex, and she never said she needed to pause or wanted to stop. Mr. Britt testified that the edible marijuana ingested by Ms. Roe could not begin to even take effect until 30 to 45 minutes after ingested, undermining her claim that she was incapacitated. During the hearing, however, Dr. [Lee] Mintz [director of the Center for Student Rights and Responsibilities at SDSU, who served as investigator and prosecutor] engaged in severely prejudicial conduct; she spent several minutes accusing Petitioner of impropriety, violating FERPA, and re-victimizing Ms. Roe — all before the hearing officer. Petitioner advised SDSU's counsel of Dr. Mintz's misbehavior and inappropriate conduct; however, it is unclear whether SDSU undertook any ameliorative actions."

John Doe was found "responsible" with no information on how to appeal or what his options were, only to find out later that "only a complainant has the right to an appeal." He was not only permanently expelled, but also banned from any California state school.

He has since filed to have the expulsion removed from his record so that he can attend another school, hoping to move forward.

Edward was one of the "lucky" ones. He explained to me his experience after a young woman he had been dating felt that he may have cheated on her. She accused him of harassment and sexual assault.

Neither the police nor the school found any preponderance of guilt or responsibility, but that didn't change the fact that a drawn-out three-month process took place. "It was the darkest time in my life," he told me, saying the entire campus knew about the allegations. He said the looks he received from other students were devastating. He filed a complaint with the school against the woman for filing a false complaint, but instead of the school investigating, it told him he needed to just worry about graduating and put this all behind him. In 2014, he filed a Title IX complaint against the school. His complaint has been accepted by the Office for Civil Rights and he is still waiting for a determination from them. He has since graduated and is thinking about going to law school. He also lobbies Congress for change. He believes the 2011 "Dear Colleague" letter should be rescinded.

I also spoke with one mother who described to me the hell her son was put through after being another one of the "lucky" ones found not responsible. Post-traumatic stress disorder, anxiety, depression, and a 20-month wait on the OCR to respond to the complaint. Once the OCR finally did respond, the answer was "you are too late."

On July 1, a letter was sent by 31 senators to the Department of Education and the Department of Justice describing the absolute fundamental breakdown of follow-through on behalf of colleges. The letter states that out of nearly 11,600 colleges nationwide, in 2014 only 9 percent reported any occurrences of sexual assault. How can 91 percent colleges claim that zero instances of sexual assault happened when we see every single day the number of Title IX complaints with an originating incident of sexual assault going up? To further that, how many actual Title IX lawsuits have been filed due to the absolute failing of the system? Due process has been stripped, unfair sanctions have been imposed that alter people's lives, and many people are living with the side effects of the colleges' misguided actions.

Who knows where the numbers actually are. How are we supposed to decipher the information through all of the bureaucracy dressed up as concern for our kids? As the senators wrote:

> "These directly conflict with the DOJ and CDC data on sexual assault, and strongly suggest that schools are either not taking the reporting obligation seriously or are not creating an environment where students feel comfortable coming forward to report and are vastly underreporting these crimes."

Who do the colleges think they are fooling by reporting zero incidents of sexual assault when the legal documents exist? The reports have been made to the OCR and lawsuits have been filed. The president and vice president say they "won't visit any school who isn't reporting properly." So what? Instead, they might cut federal funding for such schools. That would get their attention.

Allowing colleges to adjudicate these cases — without any formal process that ensures everyone's rights, or procedures to make sure due process is left intact — makes no sense. Colleges should be stopped from inflicting so much pain on students and their families.

Why do people hate feminism #10 – #feminism is a supremacy movement

AVfM Video Source · 7 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"If feminists weren't also supremacists, they'd be best friends with men's rights activists." An excellent breakdown of why Feminism is a supremacist movement.

Sargon of Akkad

Want to bump the birth rate in the West? Pay men.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 8 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

According to The Week, America's birth rate is 'now a national emergency' – at 59.6 births per 1000 women, it's the lowest ever recorded. The Week identifies a reduction in teen pregnancy as one of the drivers, as well as people choosing to marry later and have fewer children, but it leaves out just the general aging of the population. A significant percentage of the female population is past menopause, which will also clearly skew the numbers.

The low birth rate exacerbates tensions between the young and old, particularly when it comes to paying for entitlements, with some potentially devastating consequences:

> The fewer young, productive people you have to pay for entitlements for old, unproductive people, the steeper the bill for the entire society becomes. This basic problem is strangling Europe's economies. And while the United States is among the least bad of the bunch, it is still headed in the wrong direction.

Here's the part I find fascinating, from a PEW survey, which generally tend to be pretty reliable:

> Some 52% of American women (who gave numerical responses) said their ideal is two children, and an additional 44% said that three or more children is their ideal. (While 86% of women gave numerical responses to this question, 14% reported that the ideal family size was "as many as [someone] wants.") But 40% of U.S. women nearing the end of their childbearing years have fewer children than their ideal.

Women are having fewer children than they actually want. What about men?

> Some 87% of EU men who had a preference also reported that their own ideal family would include two or more children.

It's likely quite reasonable to suspect American men have similar preferences, but neither EU nor American families are having the number of children they want. Why is that?

> Among others things, delays in childbearing, which may be caused by increases in educational attainment, or by the lack of a suitable partner, may play a role. Starting childbearing at a later age means that there are fewer years for a woman to meet her fertility ideals, plus it increases the risk of age-related infertility.
>
> Then there are direct economic factors, which are enough to give any potential parent pause. While many European countries offer more financial assistance via parental leave and other subsidies for parents than in the U.S., it's still the case that raising kids is expensive. In both places, birth rates appear linked to economic well-being, with higher fertility in economic good times, and lower fertility in recessions.

Let's take these one at a time. Delays in child-bearing caused by educational attainment. That would be mostly women, acquiring university degrees in useless subjects that leave them saddled with debt and no real prospects of employment outside of government feminist projects, which generally involve sorting things alphabetically and answering the phone. Robert Stacey McCain observes that increasing the educational opportunities for women lowers birth rates universally, and this is obviously not a bad thing, in and of itself.

> What drops the birthrate universally is raising the status of women. Very specifically, the action with the greatest impact is teaching a girl to read. When women and girls have even that tiny bit of power over their lives, they choose to have fewer children. . . .

McCain is quoting an eco-feminist, so these are not his words. I dislike the way the argument is framed here as if powerless women are breeding machines bravely resisting the mean men treating them like animals. In all likelihood, women choose to have fewer children because that increases the odds of those children surviving to adulthood. Women don't hate or resent children. On the contrary, they love children and wish with their entire souls for their children to survive, as do men.

Feminists? Not so much.

"Only when we recognize that 'manhood' and 'womanhood' are made-up categories, invented to control human beings and violently imposed, can we truly understand the nature of sexism. . . .
"Questioning gender . . . is an essential part of the feminism that has sustained me through two decades of personal and political struggle."
— Laurie Penny, "How to Be a Genderqueer Feminist."

"I don't particularly like babies. They are loud and smelly and, above all other things, demanding . . . time-sucking monsters with their constant neediness. . . . Nothing will make me want a baby. . . . This is why, if my birth control fails, I am totally having an abortion."
— Amanda Marcotte, March 2014

Women delaying child-bearing to get an education is not necessarily a problem, but it can be, if women buy into the feminist idea that babies are horrible, and children aren't necessary.

Let's consider 'lack of a suitable partner.' It's unclear who can't find the suitable partners here: men or women? For many men, women have become toxic, and men are rejecting them en masse. For many women, it's impossible to find the alpha male rich dude with the beta male compliance she thinks she wants (she doesn't want it), and women are simply miserable.

I think we can rest that one squarely at the feet of feminism. No one has done more to harm gender relations than feminism. It's just pure poison.

The next claim is that the costs of raising children are high, and this reduces fertility. Maybe, although countries with huge entitlements for parents, including free health care, day care, and preschool don't have fertility rates any higher than the US. Indeed, many of them are lower than the US.

So what is the real reason the birth rates are so low?

Women.

The payouts for women are directed towards having a small number of children; indeed, a smaller number of children than either men or women consider ideal.

The best way to permanently secure access to a man's resources, regardless of the quality of the relationship with that man, is to have his child. If the woman is not married to the man, then she has an incentive to make certain the man in question is the biological father of the child. If a woman is legally married to the man whose resources she wishes to acquire, whether he fathers the child biologically is increasingly irrelevant. In some countries, it is illegal to test for paternity, and many medical researchers consider it unethical to inform men if they are raising children to whom they are not biologically related.

Having one child secures access to resources. Having more than one only marginally increases the resources to which a woman is entitled through family law, but increases her expenses in the event of relationship failure. She gets the house no matter how many children she has. Two children are obviously more expensive to feed and raise and support than one – having that second child reduces the amount of money she has available for her own use, so the incentives align to make certain women keep their fertility under 2.0.

Which is exactly what has happened in countries where family law discriminates against men. Which would be every single country in the West.

How to change the incentives?

Pay men.

Pay men to have children, and that money remains their money no matter what. This proposal has been floated for women, and in Canada, child tax benefits and subsidies are always paid to mothers no matter who has custody of the children or is the primary caregiver.

Reverse that.

Pay men.

Think about how that changes incentives. Let's say the government paid a sum, say $1000 for the birth of one child. That's hardly a huge sum. Gold diggers are still incentivized to have one child. Increase the amount for the second child to $5 000. Still not earth-shattering, but invested at Standard & Poor 500 compound rates (8.5%), by the time the child reaches 18, that $5000 is worth almost $22 000. Pay $10 000 for the 3rd child and $25 000 for the 4th.

Pay that sum to the fathers, and protect that money from mothers. They cannot have it.

Now all of a sudden ideal fertility for both and women aligns with stable, lasting marriages. Women are not incentivized to fleece men of resources related to children because they can't. And children are protected from having the family wealth destroyed by mothers who divorce for frivolous, spurious reasons. The incentives for women are to remain married to the fathers of their children to best serve the needs of the children, which is what most women will do if alternatives are taken off the table. Reforming family courts with corrupt judges and lawyers who have every incentive to make divorce and custody disputes as contentious as possible is going to take a significant amount of time and effort.

Switching all state benefits to fathers, and creating new benefits to encourage men to have children, while incentivizing lasting marriages?

That seems like an easy fix.

Pay men to do a job; you will generally get a job well done.

Lots of love,

JB

Research finds that as a group, only men pay tax

Nicolas Kilsdonk · 8 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Legions of feminists will ferociously type smash the patriarchy! at their Internet rallies, calling out for the end of the male supremacy in all spheres of life. Yet, few of them acknowledge the fact that one of these spheres, the government (the institution granting them rights), is entirely funded by male taxpayers. Economically, women cost more to the state than they benefit. The government is literally paying women to be alive. As such, strong independent women are only that way because the state is transferring money from men to them. Feminists are not seriously against being dependent on men, they are just against men having the full control over their money.

Let's explore a fiscal research report in New Zealand.

The real gender gap: the tax gap

While the 77¢ for a dollar wage gap has been under the spotlight for the past years, the 200¢ for a dollar tax gap has, to my knowledge never been mentioned, at least not by our supreme feminist leaders Barack Obama and Justin Trudeau. A quick glimpse at the data reveals a massive difference in taxes paid by men and women.

The first thing that comes to mind is that half of women might be at home raising kids. However, the workforce participation rate gap between men and women doesn't seem to exceed 10% in either age group. (see figure 4 in source)

The second thing that may come to mind as a confounding factor is that women spend more for children in education and health. Nope. No support for that either. Men and women spend approximately the same amount in both education and health (see figure 10 and 11 of the source).

In nearly all age groups, women receive more tax than they give

With the exception of the age group between 45-59 (a 15 year span) years old, women cost more to the state than the tax they provide. In contrast, men generate more tax revenue than they cost between 23 and 65 (a 43 year span). In the brief period in which women generate more or as much tax money than they consume, men outscore them by at least 3 times.

By the end of her life, the average woman will have a negative fiscal impact of $150,000

By large, the cumulative tax money given to women outweighs the tax money generated by women. The short period of positive impact of women between 45 and 59 is countered by 65 other years in which their allocated tax expenditure is more than what they supply the state.

Figure 17: Cumulative net fiscal impact per capita by gender & age group – 2010

> Men, on the other hand, appear to have a positive cumulative net fiscal impact from approximately 40 until 80 years of age. For these particular taxes and public expenditures, the net fiscal incidence on men is approximately zero when cumulated over all ages. (p. 22)

Overall, the research suggests that male taxpayers are the only ones to ever have a positive contribution in taxes. Based on Figure 17, the closest that the average woman will come to having a positive fiscal incidence is when she is at minus $50,000 around 55 years of age. While feminists are demonizing men for benefiting from all liberties and rights they have constructed, they have oddly remained silent over the fact that anonymous male tax payers are paying women to exist. Read that sentence again.

The fact that feminists want a stronger government is not a coincidence. While historically, women had to choose a wealthy husband for resources, they can now stay single, be lesbians, marry a poor man, or use the sperm bank, and the state will still transfer male taxes to them. Interestingly, within 10 years of women's suffrage, the government doubled their tax revenue and expenditure in the USA.

These findings show just how simplistic the notion of privilege is. While men make more on average, it allows women to have access to education, health, and services. The patriarchy is pretty generous after all.

The cover image depicts Pieter Brueghel the Younger's painting The tax collector's office, 1640.

White food is evil

Paul Elam · 9 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Glycemic Index Explained
Diet Docter: Get Started on Low Carb

The great profile

Doug Mortimer · 12 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As a star of stage, screen, and radio, John Barrymore, born on February 15, 1882, was one of the most famous men in America. During the 1920s his name recognition was right up there with Babe Ruth, Charles Lindbergh, and Al Capone.

Starting off on the stage, he was a prominent leading man, arguably America's foremost Shakespearean actor. Beginning in 1914, silent movies spread his image far and wide. In the 20's, he portrayed Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Sherlock Holmes, Don Juan, Captain Ahab, Francois Villon, and Beau Brummell. His superb stage voice enabled him to make a seamless transition from silents to talkies. His leading man persona shone as brightly on screen as it did on the stage. His nickname was the Great Profile.

Given his heredity and environment (theatrical families on both sides), it is not surprising that he would take to the stage. His sister Ethel and his brother Lionel were also thespians with long careers. Since Ethel was more involved with theater than movies, she is pretty much forgotten today. Lionel, essentially a character actor, occupies a unique niche in popular culture thanks to his role as the parsimonious Mr. Potter in It's a Wonderful Life. Regarding sheer star power, however, John was clearly the pick of the litter. This is not to say his life was free of speed bumps.

If you like tales of profligate, self-destructive artists, the life of John Barrymore is for you. He drank too much, to put it mildly, but he also got married too much. He tied and untied the knot four times – too arty women with varying levels of talent. We can't chalk it up to youthful indiscretion, as he was 28 at the time of his first marriage. He was certainly old enough to know what he was getting into.

His first wife (from 1910 to 1917) was Katherine Corri Harris, a debutante and minor silent movie actress who appeared in a few of Barrymore's films. The marriage got off to a rocky start when her father refused to attend the wedding. Barrymore later referred to his first marriage as a "bus accident." Nevertheless, he was at her side when she died of pneumonia ten years after their divorce. By that time she was on her third husband.

His second wife (from 1920 to 1925), Blanche Oelrichs, was also a socialite. Born into a prominent family in Newport, Rhode Island, she mingled with the Astors and the Vanderbilts while growing up. At the time Barrymore met her, she was a divorced mother of two, a suffragette, and a stage who wrote under the pen name Michael Strange. She was an early member of the Lucy Stone League, an organization devoted to women retaining their maiden names after marriage.

Clearly, this woman's background had more red flags than a May Day Parade in the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, Barrymore had knocked her up, so perhaps he felt obligated to her.

After Oelrichs had divorced Barrymore, she married for a third time before divorcing and settling into a lengthy lesbian relationship with an authoress of children's books, one Margaret Wise Brown, who was 20 years younger. Not a surprising outcome for someone with Oelrichs' background, but one wonders what Barrymore thought about it.

Dolores Costello, Barrymore's third wife (from 1928 to 1934), should have been a kindred spirit, as she was born into a theatrical family and fashioned a respectable career as a silent movie actress (in 1926 she co-starred with Barrymore in The Sea Beast, a very loose adaptation of Moby Dick). Her career dwindled after the coming of talkies and motherhood, but she had one last memorable role in her next to last film, The Magnificent Ambersons, Orson Welles' next directorial effort after Citizen Kane.

Costello's father had been a leading man during the cinema's infancy so that she might have caught a glimpse of daddy in Barrymore. Daddy, by the way, did not approve of the match and did not show up for the wedding. In fact, he and his wife disagreed so vehemently that they divorced over the subject. At any rate, Dolores Costello bore Barrymore another daughter and a son, John Drew Barrymore, who had a modest career acting in TV and movies. In turn, he fathered Drew Barrymore.

John Barrymore's fourth wife (from 1936 to 1941) was Elaine Barrie, a wannabe actress who was something of a groupie. In fact, she had changed her last name from Jacobs to Barrie as a tribute to Barrymore. At age 19, she visited him a hospital where he was being treated for alcoholism and somehow managed to finagle him into marrying her a couple of years later. Unlike her three predecessors, she did not bring much to the table. The main event of her life was marrying Barrymore (divorced at age 26, she never remarried). In 1964, she published All My Sins Remembered; the Story of My Life With John Barrymore. Basking in reflected glory was her sole claim to fame. Of his three surviving ex-wives, she was the only one to attend his funeral.

Had he lived longer, Barrymore might have gotten married again. "Now I'm free to resume my search for the perfect mate," he declared after his fourth divorce. "I am thinking of taking a fifth wife. Why not? Solomon had a thousand wives, and he is a synonym for wisdom."

Clearly, neoteny was a factor in Barrymore's behavior, as he had a yen for younger women. His first wife was only 17, eleven years his junior. His second wife, 29 at the time of marriage, was closest to him in age (8 years difference), but wife number 3 was 25 when he was 46, and his last mate was only 21 when he was 54.

The huge age gap in his final marriage may have been an attempt to recapture his youth. At the time he met Elaine Barrie, his health and his career were both on borrowed time. He had started out the 1930s in A-list movies, but as the decade passed, his career declined. He was still a working actor, but now he was relegated to B movies, such as Hold That Co-Ed, The Invisible Woman, and Bulldog Drummond potboilers

Actors earn their paychecks by interpreting the words of playwrights or screenwriters, but Barrymore was also something of a wit, suggesting that he could have written some snappy dialogue and could have had a career as a writer if he wanted. His comments on women strongly suggest that he was ahead of his time, MGTOW-wise:

> Love is the delightful interval between meeting a beautiful girl and discovering that she looks like a haddock.
>
> In Genesis, it says that it is not good for a man to be alone; but sometimes it is a great relief.
>
> When archaeologists discover the missing arms of Venus de Milo, they will find she was wearing boxing gloves.
>
> My wife was too beautiful for words, but not for arguments.
>
> Sex; the thing that takes up the least amount of time and causes the most amount of trouble.
>
> You never realize how short a month is until you pay alimony.
>
> Paper napkins never return from a laundry – nor love from a trip to the law courts.

And my personal favorite:

> The way to fight a woman is with your hat – grab it and run.

The question one must ask is why didn't Barrymore take his own advice? Given his fame, intelligence, wit, charm, and good looks, he never had any trouble attracting females – indeed he was as notorious for his womanizing as for his drinking. What did he think he would gain by making it legal…again…and again…and again? Since actors are frequently accused of being a little light in the leotards, were his marriages attempts to prevent any such rumors from starting? He seems to have had little interest in being a family man.

Serial polygamy has always been a common practice with movie stars. In the old days, studios encouraged their contract stars to be as domestic as possible. Divorce was acceptable, but remaining single was highly suspect. Today marriage per se may not be obligatory, but pair-bonding at some level is expected. MGTOW is suspect. Showing up stag for an awards ceremony simply isn't done.

Speaking of stag, in Barrymore's leisure time, he was a member in good standing of the Bundy Drive Boys, so called after a street in the Brentwood section of Los Angeles. Much like a clubhouse for Our Gang or the Little Rascals, a cabin on Bundy Street was the HQ for Barrymore and his drinking buddies (actors Errol Flynn, W.C. Fields, Anthony Quinn, John Carradine, Vincent Price, and Thomas Mitchell, as well as director Raoul Walsh and screenwriter/journalist Gene Fowler, among others). Fowler, who documented the Bundy Drive Boys in his book Minutes of the Last Meeting, wrote "These men lived intensely, as do children and poets and Jaguars." Understandably, the wives of the married members of the Bundy Drive Boys did not approve.

Barrymore's boozing eventually led to edema, kidney failure, and cirrhosis. After his death, the medical examiner estimated that Barrymore must have consumed 3,200 gallons of alcohol in his lifetime. If that estimate is anywhere close to the truth, it is a medical miracle that Barrymore lasted till age 60.

Clearly, Barrymore's undoing was his own doing. Habitual self-destructive behavior should be a tip-off that a man is not a good marriage prospect, but Barrymore's charisma blinded women to his failings (his starring role in Svengali, a 1931 talkie, may have been type-casting). He seemed to be following a dictum of "If your first marriage doesn't succeed, try, try again," even though settling down was the furthest thing from his mind. In some human endeavors, persistence might be an admirable trait. Re-marriage is not one of them.

If the personal life of John Barrymore means anything (other than the fact that overindulgence is not conducive to longevity), it at least points out that matrimony is not for everyone. To set it up as the gold standard for all men is to court trouble. A lot of men – perhaps a majority – would be spared a lot of anguish if they would simply realize that they are not cut out for marriage, shaming and social pressure notwithstanding.

In a backhanded way, bachelorhood can be an expression of gynocentrism: had Barrymore remained single, he would have spared his ex-wives a lot of grief. Today a MGTOW may have no interest in rescuing a damsel in distress, but at least he's not distressing her by marrying her.

White Ribbon Australia finds favor at WIPO

AVFM · 13 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM just received the news that WIPO (World Intellectual Property Organization) has ruled against Erin Pizzey and in favor of White Ribbon Australia in the dispute over the whiteribbon.org domain.

In their ruling, the three-member panel unanimously ruled that Erin Pizzey, pioneer and founder of the modern domestic violence shelter movement did not have a legitimate interest in the use of the “White Ribbon” name for domestic violence advocacy.

The panel also concluded that, “The Respondent’s use of the Complainant’s WHITE RIBBON trade mark in the Disputed Domain Name was due to its trade mark value and was intended to confuse users into believing that the Disputed Domain Name is associated with the Complainant.”

That ruling was made despite the fact that while White Ribbon Australia did have some specific Australian trademarks that included the “White Ribbon” name, they did not file for a trademark for “White Ribbon” with no appendages till after Pizzey owned, invested in and launched whiteribbon.org.

The panel treated White Ribbon Australia’s trademark with retroactive, worldwide recognition, for which they cited precedent.

AVFM CEO Paul Elam stated that, “WIPO’s panel investigated this case the same way the FBI investigated Hillary Clinton,” and added, “White Ribbon Australia are bullies with deep pockets beating an old woman in a wheelchair into submission and silence so they can continue a corrupt enterprise without dissent.”

White Ribbon Australia has been under increasing scrutiny as an organization that raises millions of dollars annually, the lion’s share of which goes to lavish salaries and travel, with no money going to domestic violence victims.

Their fundraising approach is strictly gendered, dismissing male victims and female perpetrators, an ideological model that Pizzey has harshly criticized at the whiteribbon.org website.

WIPO conducts its business under administrative law. Their decision is subject to injunctive relief amongst other remedies.

When contacted for comment, Pizzey said she was considering her legal options and viewed the ruling as a temporary setback. “I am not going to stop,” she told AVFM. “I have dedicated over 50 years of my life to educating people about family violence and I won’t be stopped now by these hoodlums.”

Are millennial men useless?

AVfM Video Source · 15 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In a previous video Hiding in the Man Cave, one of Paul Elam's viewers made a response excoriating Millenials. Paul sets the record straight in a style and delivery that he has a gift for.

An Ear for Men

Women overvalue themselves – TFF episode 39

AVfM Video Source · 16 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 39 Professor Fiamengo wonders whether women are right to undervalue themselves since they are accustomed to men doing most of the hard work.

StudioBrule

UN official lapses into the 19th century, says condoms “not the answer,” advocates cutting

Gary Costanza · 16 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Tell that to all the circumcised American men – and their partners – who suffer from HIV despite the world’s highest circumcision rate. Tell that to all the women and girls you just spoke about having “unwanted pregnancies” that prevent them from the education you say they need to raise them from poverty. The United Nations should be embarrassed by the latest lecture by Phumzile Mlambo-Ngcuka of UN Women advocating gender equality for women and girls by ignoring science, common sense, and the rights of men and boys. See the video below.

Yes, you read that right. Here’s a prominent 21st century feminist who advocates genital mutilation to prevent STDs; not everyone, just males done by doctors. When Ms. Ngcuka endorsed surgery over condoms to prevent STDs, I felt I was transported to the 19th century where circumcision was thought to cure everything from epilepsy to masturbation.

I attended the lecture as part of Stony Brook’s Presidential Lecture series where Ms. Ngcuka was invited to speak about gender equality and the UN’s HeForShe initiative. Feminists throw the word ‘equality’ around without actually thinking about what it means – that “gender equality” must be in the context of comparing one gender’s freedoms with the other gender’s freedoms, not some nebulous ‘equality’ that ignores the freedoms – or lack thereof – of the other gender, men in this case.

Lucky for me, they allowed questions following the lecture. My question pointed out that equality is a two-way street, that men don’t have the same reproductive rights that women have, and that baby boys aren’t protected from genital mutilation as girls are, with daily violations across the street at Stony Brook Hospital. In her answer she admitted she knew little about the laws regarding genital mutilation in the U.S., but said that FGM is illegal – but not MGM – in her country of South Africa, and she actually promoted the use of MGM for her own sons and the prevention of HIV infection. This from an official of the world’s largest (supposedly) human rights organization. I rebutted her answer by pointing out the obvious hypocrisy and ignorance of these human rights violations just a stones throw away.

There is no evidence that circumcision prevents HIV, but we do know that wearing condoms prevents STDs, making the presence of the foreskin (or clitoral hood) irrelevant.

Before the lecture video, I give my feedback about the day I had, including my visit to a Guerrilla Girls exhibit in the same building and my contribution to it. Enjoy.

Title IX and college rape: a series of injustice, part 4

Jessica Denis · 16 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is Part 4 in a series outlining the effects of college adjudication of alleged sexual assault cases. In Part 1, a wrongfully accused man proved his innocence, yet the college imposed sanctions that damaged his life anyway. In Part 2, a young dating couple's lives were disrupted for more than two years after someone else decided that she was raped. Part 3 featured a young man who has had to sue his school to remove the "responsible" mark on his transcripts after "severely prejudicial conduct" by the school's investigator.

Some may feel as though talking about this systematic failure leads to the shaming of those who have been raped. This series is not about that. One rape is too many. These stories are only meant to bring to light the lives that have been turned upside-down when a college campus adjudicates an allegation of sexual assault.

Imagine you were blackout drunk. Not just incapacitated and unable to clearly give affirmative consent, but intoxicated to the point of absolutely no memory. Envision yourself then hearing about what happened the night before via text messages and campus chatter, and discovering that oral sex was performed on you while you were blacked out. Then imagine, two years later, being expelled from school with a giant black mark on your future.

Wait, what? Why would the victim of sexual assault be expelled?

Because being impaired is "never an excuse." Because the "victim" of the sexual assault was a young man who later became the accused.

John Doe was a student at Amherst College in Massachusetts. After a night of drinking, a female student named as Sandra Jones helped Doe back to his room. Once they arrived, she proceeded to perform oral sex on him and left when she was done. According to court documents, nearly two years later, at the urging of an on-campus victims advocate, Jones filed her sexual misconduct complaint with the school.

Missing evidence, false statements, and a faulty investigation produced the result of Doe being found responsible for violating the sexual misconduct policy at the pseudo hearing at Amherst. The decision indicated that the hearing board found it "credible" that Doe was "blacked out" but that "[b]eing intoxicated or impaired by drugs or alcohol is never an excuse for sexual misconduct and does not excuse one from the responsibility to obtain consent." What about his right to give consent? In court documents (Page 18), Jones describes an entirely different account of what happened in text messages to a friend:

> "Sandra Jones: Ohmygod I just did something so f—ig stupid
>
> DR: What did you do
>
> Sandra Jones: F—ed [John Doe]. . . . F—
>
> DR: No you didn't . . . .
>
> Sandra Jones: official story is he puked and I took care of him but yes. Yes I did. F—
>
> DR: [Sandra] what are you doing????????
>
> Sandra Jones: Oh and apparently [another student] is coming over so nothing happened everything's fine …"

None of those texts was allowed in the "hearing" the college conducted. Doe was held responsible based solely on a story that was made up and refuted by evidence that was never allowed to be presented. He was kicked off campus, and an email was sent to the entire student body stating he was found responsible and not allowed on campus. While the email did not state his name, it was very clear by campus chatter who he was. He was stripped of his rights with no recourse.

"Control the Controllables." That is what Grant Neal's grandmother tells him on the days he is not strong enough to keep going. A very strong support system that fills in the gaps is the inspiration for him to not give up the fight. He is trying to get back to college after a bold black mark was placed on his transcripts. That black mark? Title IX disciplinary action.

Grant Neal's case is one that you may have heard of and is now poised to be a landmark case as he is the first to take on the Office for Civil Rights, the Department of Education and the Obama administration.

Neal's case is different. There is no grey area. He took a young woman out on a date. They proceeded to have intercourse. The next day someone noticed a hickey on the woman's neck and reported a violent rape occurred. According to court documents, the presumption of rape was made by a third party due to Neal's "status as a high profile football player."

After a faulty process, accusations of conflict of interest on the part of Colorado State University, Pueblo, and changes in testimony — and despite the fact that Jane Doe has since day one insisted she was not raped — Neal was found responsible. He was removed from campus, he lost his football and wrestling scholarships, and no other college will admit him with the black mark on his transcripts.

During my conversation with Neal, he said, "I am not afraid to stand up and fight for this issue. There are so many who either don't have the ability or the strength to go through this process. I will fight for them too."

Before this, Neal had a 3.67 GPA and was pursuing a pre-med degree. He was excelling in all of his classes and handling the twists and turns of college life exceptionally.

Now he has a job and is doing what he can while he waits for the call that the wheels of justice have finally gotten out of the mud and decided to turn. Neal is keeping himself in shape in the hopes that he will be able to rejoin his teammates playing the sports he loves

*****

As I start to conclude this series, I feel as though I should address some feedback I have received.

The most commonly asked question is, "Why are you doing this? Do you have a son or someone personally affected?" The answer is no. I actually have two daughters, ages 20 and 15.

I decided to write this series after reading 160 case files of situations like those mentioned in each part of the series. I spoke with these young men and their attorneys, much more than I could ever write about in this forum. The pain that they have been through is real. Depression, suicide, PTSD, anxiety — these are the result of being put through the process, and no one person's pain is less or more than another's. We should not be silent about this. It is clearly a systematic failure on the part of colleges because they simply are not equipped to deal with this much power over young people's lives. As I have stated before, while they might not hold students' actual freedom in their hands, they do hold their futures in their hands.

In some colleges, the Title IX coordinator has only eight hours of training. I was contacted by a student at the University of Minnesota with his concerns that these cases on his campus will be adjudicated by a panel of three students. This is not a mock trial. This is real life. Students and officials trained for eight hours do not have the capacity to collect evidence, conduct investigations and cross-examine. I would bet that the majority have never even read the Constitution in its entirety. How can they be the ones determining these young people's futures?

This article was originally published in the Western Journal and republished here with the author's permission.

Mothers can help stop violence against men

Douglas Galbi · 17 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Mothers bear a share of responsibility for violence against men being much more prevalent than violence against women.

Throughout history, women have incited men to violence against men. In the ancient world, Spartan mothers were particularly renowned for urging their sons to either succeed in killing other men, or be killed.

Ancient epigrams preserved in both Greek and Latin show Spartan mothers instructing their sons in violence against men. Writing about 100 GC in Greek, an author from the Roman elite recorded:

> Another {Spartan mother}, as she handed her son his fighting shield, exhorted him, saying, "Either {return with} this or upon this."
>
> Another, as her son was going forth to war, said as she gave the shield into his hands, "This shield your father kept always safe for you; you, therefore, keep it safe, or cease to live.[1]

These heartless instructions were interpreted as being admirable. About 250 years later, an elite author writing in Latin echoed the first of those epigrams:

> A Spartan mother, arming her son with his shield, said, "Come back either with this, or in it.[2]

Gynocentric society treats men as instruments to provide for and protect women and children. The radical proposition that men's lives are no less valuable than women's lives remains nearly inconceivable today amid absurdly false elite orthodoxy about violence against women and farces like the news reporting of the Costa Concordia sinking.

Gynocentric ideology, rather than social necessity, drives violence against men. Ancient Greek epigrams highlight mothers' key role in enforcing gynocentric ideology:

> Demetrius, when your mother received you after your flight from the battle, having lost all your fine armaments, she herself immediately drove the death-dealing spear through your sturdy side and said "Die and let Sparta bear no blame. It was no fault of hers that my milk reared cowards." [3]

The mother killing her own son for fleeing from battle indicates a grotesque, gynocentric ideal of courage. Another epigram constructs men as being born to fight and die for their society:

> Another, when her sons had run away from battle and come to her, said, "Where have you come now in your cowardly flight, vile scoundrels? Do you intend to slink in here from where you came forth?" And with these words she pulled up her garment and showed them {her vagina}. [4]

Societies continue to expect men naturally to fight and die for societies while gynocentric ideology ever more broadly treats men with contempt and denies to them equal rights to those of women. Another epigram displays the grim humor of this folly:

> One woman, observing her son coming towards her, inquired, "How fares our country?" And when he said, "All {the soldiers} have perished," she took up a tile and, hurling it at him, killed him, saying, "And so they sent you to bear the bad news to us!"

The largest section of the sayings of the Spartan women are recorded under the title "Other Spartan Women to Fame Unknown." The phrase "to fame unknown" includes the modern editor's inserted admiration for the Spartan mothers' commands to their sons.[5] That editor was editing and translating about a decade after the horrendous violence against men of World War I. The phrase "to shame unknown" aptly summarizes the dominant social orientation to violence against men.

The beatings will continue until morale improves. When a country perishes, mothers ultimately will perish with it. Men's equal human dignity should be respected as a matter of human rights. If that is inconceivable amid socially constructed ignorance and anti-men bigotry, women out of their own narrow self-interest should use men more compassionately if they want to preserve their own lives.

Notes:

[1] Plutarch, Moralia, Lacaenarum Apophthegmata (Sayings of Spartan Women), "Other Spartan Women to Fame Unknown" 16-7, from ancient Greek trans. Babbitt (1931) pp. 464-5, adapted non-substantially. Here's the ancient Greek text. Babbitt observes:

> Plutarch was an admirer of the old Spartan virtues, and it seems altogether probable that the collection of sayings of Spartans was made by him as literary material for use in his writing, as he tells us was his custom (Moralia, 457d and 464 f), and many of the sayings are actually found incorporated in his other works. That he did not use all the material which he had accumulated is no more than is to be expected from a discriminating author. … The ms. tradition of these Spartan sayings is in sad confusion. The Spartans spoke in the Doric dialect, yet according to the ms. tradition of Plutarch they spoke sometimes Doric, more often Attic, and occasionally used Aeolic forms! … The explanation probably is that Plutarch copied these anecdotes as he found them in the books from which he made his excerpts. Xenophon, for example, or Thucydides seldom uses Doric, but represents the Spartans as speaking Attic, as frankly as Herodotus or Aeschylus represents the Persians as speaking Greek.

Id. pp. 240-1.

[2] Ausonius, Epigrams, from Latin trans. Kay (2001) p. 129 (epigram 25). Id. p. 46 provides the Latin text. The Latin text and a similar English translation is available in Eveyln-White (1919) vol. 2, pp. 182-3 (epigram 54). Ausonius knew Greek and included Greek phrases in some of his epigrams. A superscription to the above Latin epigram explicitly states, "translated from the Greek." The superscription also declares, "On a brave mother." Id. p. 182. A mother heartlessly sending her son into violence against men isn't brave.

[3] Greek Anthology 7.230, from ancient Greek trans. Paton (1920) vol. 2, p. 131. On the theme of mothers enforcing on their sons violence against men, see also Greek Anthology 7.433, 7.531, 9.61, 9.397, and 9.447. These citations are from Kay (2001) p. 130.

[4] Plutarch, Sayings of Spartan Women, "Other Spartan Women to Fame Unknown" 4, trans. Babbitt (1931) pp. 460-1. The subsequent quote is saying 5, from id.

[5] The Greek text entitles the section only Λακαινών άδηλος (unknown Spartan women). According to Harvard University Press, "Frank Cole Babbitt (1867–1935) was the Hobart Professor of Greek Language and Literature at Trinity College, Hartford."

[image] Dead British men soldiers being searched by British men prisoners while a German man guard takes notes. Second Battle of the Marne, 15 July-6 August 1918. Imperial War Museum (Britain), Catalogue number Q23941. Used under the Imperial War Museum Non-Commerical License.

References:

Babbitt, Frank Cole, trans. 1931. Plutarch. Moralia. Vol. 3. Sayings of Kings and Commanders. Sayings of Romans. Sayings of Spartans. The Ancient Customs of the Spartans. Sayings of Spartan Women. Bravery of Women. Loeb

Classical Library 245. London: W. Heinemann.

Evelyn-White, Hugh G., trans. 1919. Decimus Magnus Ausonius. Ausonius. Loeb Classical Library 115. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard Univ. Press.

Kay, N. M., trans. 2001. Decimus Magnus Ausonius. Ausonius, epigrams: text with introduction and commentary. London: Duckworth.

Paton, W.R. 1920. The Greek Anthology with an English Translation. London: William Heinemann (vol. I, bks. 1-6; vol. II, bks. 7-8; vol. III, bk. 9; vol IV, bks. 10-12; vol. V, bks. 13-16).

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

NCFM files complaint with State Bar Associations' and USDOJ, Civil Rights Division regarding Major Martin and false accusations

NCFM · 19 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The National Coalition for Men has taken a bold and dramatic step in the wrongful prosecution and manufactured court-martial case of Army Major 'Kit' Martin. For additional details, please go the NCFM link.

NCFM has filed state bar complaints in the states of Tennessee, Texas, and Kansas involving JAG prosecutors, Bashore, Garrett, and Atkins respectively.

The exceptionally egregious nature of the prosecutorial misconduct of the JAG prosecutors prompted forwarding the complaints to the USDOJ, Criminal Section, Civil Rights Division.

Save Our Heroes' and the Center for Prosecutor Integrity also participated and provided letters of support.

Besides the various state bar professional rules of conduct violations, the NCFM complaint alleges the following potential federal criminal law violations on the part of the prosecutors.

> Title 18, U.S. Code, § 242 – Deprivation of Rights under Color of Law
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code, Chapter 73 – Obstruction of Justice
>
> Title 18 U.S. Code § 1512 – Tampering with a Witness/Evidence
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code, § 371 – Conspiracy to Commit Offense
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code § 1621 – Perjury
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code, § 1001 – False Statements
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code, § 1385 – Violation of the Posse Comitatus Act of 1878
>
> Title 5, U.S. Code § 552a – Violation of the Privacy Act of 1974
>
> Title 18, U.S. Code § 1346 – Honest Services Fraud
>
> Title 10, U.S. Code, § 933 – Conduct Unbecoming an Officer and Gentleman

The big question then becomes whether or not the state bar associations, the USDOJ or the Army JAG command will conduct a fair and impartial inquiry if any of them do conduct an investigation. Let's see if an inquiry, if done, will be done with the same level of vigor and ferocity in which the persecution of Major Martin was done.

Each of the three complaints contains more than five dozen pages, complete with witness affidavits. One of the witnesses providing an affidavit stated;

> "I am not only appalled by what has occurred, but embarrassed that such a travesty of justice could actually happen in the United States of America. In my profession, if I had engaged in a small percentage of the misconduct that is evident in this case, I would have lost my license [redacted] and would have been criminally prosecuted for my acts."

That is a very powerful statement, and it makes one wonder, just how corrupted the military justice system has metastasized into a malignant cancer, that unless dramatic measures are taken immediately, the system will be crushed under the weight of persecution.

There is one thing that is certain, and that is that NCFM and the various advocates who have been working on this case for more than a year and a half; are not, and will not stop in their efforts to obtain justice in this gross manipulation of the military justice system, all done in the name of appeasement and pleasure of the small but exceptionally vocal rape hysteria cottage industry, and their military and civilian enablers.

Just remember this. In ALL; ALL cases involving false allegations of sexual misconduct in the military, there will be some level of investigative and/or prosecutorial misconduct if the cases are referred to an Article 32 (preliminary hearing), and court-martial, even if the falsely accused is acquitted at the court-martial. There simply is no other way for this level of injustice to thrive, unless there is the presence of some level of misconduct or illegal conduct.

As the NCFM article reveals, it is estimated that there may be as many as 500 servicemen languishing away in military correctional facilities who have been wrongfully convicted of some type of sexual misconduct, or who were acquitted but convicted of 'stacked' or collateral charges.

It is up to the falsely accused, wrongfully convicted and their families to review their records, determine what violations may be involved in the malicious prosecution and file the appropriate complaint with the licensing state bar association. As the NCFM article reveals, the Army JAG command, and presumably all branches of the service have no desire or interest in reigning in rogue prosecutors, even when overwhelming evidence has been brought to their attention of serious prosecutorial misconduct; even criminal conduct on the part of military investigators or prosecutors.

What is needed is for those negatively affected and their families to flood that respective state bar associations with complaints of military prosecutor misconduct to draw attention to this injustice.

The end justifies the means. Convictions; for any type of sexual misconduct violation is the ultimate goal, and the military is willing to do whatever is necessary to achieve that goal. One simple unverified allegation or one anonymous phone call is all that is needed to open the proverbial floodgates in the race to convict.

If this same type of witch hunt and persecution were occurring to any particular racial or religious group, the cable and mainstream media news feed would be 24/7. Political leaders, pundits and talking heads would be demanding that something is done; that major reform and corrective legislative actions be enacted immediately.

It truly is a national injustice; a national disgrace.

Ogres, onions and men’s issues advocacy

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 20 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

How many genders are there?

AVfM Video Source · 20 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Shoe0nHead explores the question of how many genders there are. After much soul-searching she arrives at the answer of…. 2.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qlSCfBwMSG0

Feature image by Pablo Gutiérrez Cepeda

UK Domestic Violence Charities' Finances

AVFM · 20 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

UK Domestic Violence Charities' Finances, 2015

The data presented below was collated between June and December 2015. The post is long and detailed, having not been intended to form a blog post initially. So I start with a simple summary…

Summary

What is the overall level of public funding to UK Domestic Violence (DV) charities? The answer is not widely known (is it known at all outside the closed doors of the sector itself?). The financing of the DV sector is obscure partly because of the many hundreds of different charities in the sector.

The analysis presented here derives an estimate of total funding to the UK DV charities of £295M p.a. of which at least 68% is public money provided by the taxpayer. Of the total income, 64% is expended on staff costs and only an estimated 11% on the non-staff costs of running refuges. The total number of women supported in refuges by Woman's Aid federated charities or Refuge in 2014/15 was about 12,650. This compares with an estimated number of staff employed in DV charities of 7,700 (not all full-time).

Averaged over the sector as a whole the cost of refuge accommodation is £77,000 per woman-year, noting that this includes an average of roughly one child per woman and also incorporates the cost of "other services" not just refuge accommodation. The size of this figure illustrates that the bulk of the funding to the DV sector is not expended on refuge accommodation, contrary to what the public might expect.

What are these "other services"? Given the vast scale of the public funding involved, this raises questions about accountability and value-for-money. In particular, is the political lobbying carried out by the DV sector consistent with the Charity Commission's requirements? Are we in sock-puppetry land here?

The author emphasises that these questions are not motivated by any wish to reduce the level of service to victimised women and children. The issue is the cost efficiency of the service. Another issue is the validity of the activities of the DV sector in respect of the obligation for charities to be philanthropic rather than political. In this respect, the guiding influence of the DV sector in formulating new laws is significant, as is the direct funding of the sector by the Home Office, the Ministry of Justice and local authorities.

Contents

1. Charities, Public Money and Sock-Puppetry
2. Scope
3. Women's Aid Charities
4. Central Government Funding
5. Support Services for Male Victims and Female Perpetrators
6. Data Sources
7. Basic Company Financial Data.
8. Salient Findings from Key Financial Data
9. Cuts? What Cuts?
10. Public Income
11. Rental Income
12. Explicit Public Sources of Funding
13. Non-Staff Refuge Costs
14. Costs Per Capita for Women Supported in Refuges
15. Dissolved DV Charities
16. Other DV Charities
17. What Do DV Charities Do With The Rest Of The Money?
18. Conclusion

1. Charities, Public Money and Sock-Puppetry

The charity Kids Company recently collapsed amid great controversy. With the wisdom of hindsight, it is clear that the company had been badly mismanaged, both financially and in terms of the efficiency of its services. Questions had been asked even before Kids Company's demise about its value for money. Questions now arise regarding accountability. Criticisms are being aired about permitting public money to be spent with little or no critical overview of the company's activities or finances. According to the last submitted accounts (December 2013), Kids Company received about £6M in public funding in 2013. The company received £46M in public funding over its whole existence, and £37M of that over its last ten years (2005 – 2015).

What is the relevance of these observations to domestic violence (DV) charities?

To quote Henry Hill, writing in conservativehome, "One of the main stories to emerge from the collapse of Kids Company, the superstar charity beloved of politicians and rock stars alike, was how little scrutiny there is of how charities disburse public money. Some charities now depend on public money for more than 80 per cent of their funding, at which point they are de facto agencies of the state. Yet the moral cachet attached to charities serves to shield them from critical scrutiny by the public, and their de jure distance from the Government means that they remain, as private organisations, immune from Freedom of Information requests".

Another example is Voluntary Sector Gateway West Lothian, a charity which has received over £1.2M in public funding in recent years and whose entire Board has resigned in disgrace following concerns over how it is run.

For some charities, in addition to the issue of value-for-money, there may be concerns over sock-puppetry – the practice whereby public funding is used by the recipients to lobby the government. The practice becomes particularly egregious if the charity uses such lobbying as a means of securing further funding. It becomes even more so if the donating department shares ideological ground with the charity.

Is the domestic violence charity sector suffering from sock-puppetry?

If so, it differs from other examples primarily in respect of being so much vaster in scale. Several hundreds of different charities are involved, and, as will be shown here, public funding is in the order of hundreds of millions of pounds annually.

Questions are already beginning to orbit around the DV sector. Vera Baird, the Police and Crime Commissioner for Northumbria, was initially to be investigated earlier this year (2015) for using her position to donate £500,000 to a DV charity, "Victims First Northumbria," of which she is a Director. We were assured that "A Ministry of Justice spokesman confirmed it would investigate the circumstances to conclude whether any conflict of interest rules had been broken." Days later, minds were changed. Perhaps an investigation by the MoJ might have been less than fully reassuring given that there is another similar charity, "Advocacy After Fatal Domestic Abuse", of which Vera Baird is a Patron which is funded by….wait for it….the Ministry of Justice – as well as the Home Office and Thames Valley Police.

In the context of these concerns, an analysis is presented here of the finances of the DV charitable sector. Are those responsible aware of the full extent of the public funding to this sector? The totality of such funding is effectively obscured by being divided over many hundreds of smaller charities, and also due to originating mostly from local authorities.

The analysis below estimates that women's refuge and domestic abuse charities (typically affiliated to the Women's Aid Federation) have an income of about £295 million per year. Over a ten year period, this would be nearly £3 billion of which at least 68% is public money. And yet are the overview and accountability issues raised by this vast public expenditure any better for these DV support charities than for Kids Company? And the concern over the latter relates to a public expenditure over ten years of a 'mere' £37M, less than 2% of the public funding of the DV support industry.

In both cases the desirability of their services, as regards support to disadvantaged or victimised women or children, is beyond question. However, the public has a right to expect value for money even for indisputably worthy causes.

There are parallels between Kids Company and the DV sector. In both cases it is possible to question staffing levels, a matter relating directly to efficiency, value for money and accountability. The review below shows that staff costs absorb two-thirds of the DV charities' income. In both cases, it is possible to question the activities in which the staff engages and their effectiveness in achieving the stated objectives. The review shows that housing victims of domestic violence account for only a small proportion of the DV charities' expenditure, non-staff refuge costs being around 11% of total DV sector income. Many DV charities do not run refuges at all. The bulk of DV sector expenditure funds 'other things'. Is the nature of these 'other things' being subject to a level of accountability commensurate with the huge public cost?

This review analyses the finances of the DV charities with a view to examining whether there is cause for concern over such issues.

A third potential parallel between Kids Company and the DV sector relates to company dissolution. The Kids Company debacle came to general notice only upon the company's demise. Attention is drawn here to the extraordinarily high rate at which DV charities are dissolved, at least 10 per year on average. This does not appear to relate to an overall diminishing in the income of the whole family of such charities.

2. Scope

Any UK charity whose primary purpose is stated to be the provision of facilities or other support to victims of domestic abuse is within the present scope. It is likely that most, but not necessarily all, the charities reviewed here are affiliated to the Women's Aid Federation (WAF).

3. Women's Aid Charities

Women's Aid is not one Company but a Federation of many. The Federation is divided into four, one for each of the four nations of the UK. It is not easy to compile a definitive list of Women's Aid Federation (WAF) affiliated charities, nor even their number. There is a website called uk refuge online which might be helpful in this respect but it is intended for industry members only and the current author has no access. (In passing I note that the maintenance of this central registry alone was granted an additional £131,000 by the government in July 2015).

Sources differ as to how many WAF-affiliated Charities there are, but an estimate based on various web sites indicates the following numbers,

- Women's Aid Federation of England is the sole national coordinating body for the England-wide network of over 370 local domestic violence organisations, providing over 500 refuges, outreach, advocacy and children's support services.
- Scottish Women's Aid site lists 46 federated WAF charities in Scotland
- Welsh Women's Aid site lists 26 federated WAF charities in Wales
- Women's Aid Federation Northern Ireland lists nine separate area charities.

This leads to an estimate of 451 WAF affiliated Charities in the UK. This will not include other DV support organisations which are not directly WAF affiliated. Hence the total number of DV charities in the UK may exceed 451, possibly markedly. However, for the present purposes, it will be assumed that 451 is a reasonable working estimate for the number of UK DV charities.

4. Central Government Funding

In July 2015 the Budget announced a £3.2 million funding boost to, "support victims of domestic abuse and ensure offenders are prosecuted." This announcement built on the £10 million funding for refuges announced in March 2015. It is worth noting that this latter press release was entitled, "£10 million support for women facing the threat of domestic violence", and the text referred to "marking International Women's Day." Polly Neate, Chief Executive at Women's Aid, reacted to this announcement saying, "We warmly welcome the news that specialist domestic violence refuges in 148 local areas will receive additional funding. Women and their children across the country will benefit from this."

The July press release also stated that this builds on "steps taken by the government to end domestic violence, support victims and ensure offenders are prosecuted. These include: £40 million for Violence Against Women and Girls support services and specialist helplines."

Despite these being large sums of money, we will see below that the total public funding of DV charities is far greater, mostly coming from local authorities.

5. Support Services for Male Victims and Female Perpetrators

It is not the primary purpose of this review to discuss the gendered nature of the existing DV support arrangements. However, it is pertinent in passing to make the following brief observations.

Despite the proud claim of the July 2015 announcement that the budget funding would "ensure no victim of domestic abuse is turned away from help," the foremost English helpline for male victims of domestic abuse, Mankind Initiative, receives none of the above government funding. Indeed it receives no public funding of any kind. Thus far it has operated on a shoestring and private charitable donations alone. It requires a mere £45,000 per year to maintain its operation at current levels. We will see below that this is loose change compared with the vast expenditure by the women's DV support services.

(There are those who claim that male victimisation is so rare as to not warrant support. This spurious claim is contradicted by a vast academic and survey literature which indicate that, in the UK, at least one-in-three victims of DV are male and worldwide more like half of the victims are male. In 2012/13, CPS data give the number of women convicted of domestic violence as 3,735, hardly a trivial number. And, despite men's well-known reluctance to report domestic abuse to the police, nevertheless across the country in 2014 an average of 20% of reports of domestic abuse to the police were from men – more than this in many counties..)

6. Data Sources

Financial data have been taken either from the Charity Commission website or a free web service provided by Company House, https://companycheck.co.uk/. In both cases, the data were derived from the formally submitted company accounts. Data was collected between June 2015 and December 2015. Many cross-checks were carried out which confirmed the two sites to be consistent. Both sites provide links to the submitted accounts (though not in every case). The raw data is available on a spreadsheet here.

7. Basic Company Financial Data

High-level company financial data were sought and recorded as follows,

- latest cash-in-bank;
- latest net worth;
- net worth four years previously;
- latest turnover;
- turnover four years previously;
- latest annual staff costs (salaries and pensions);
- the number of employees (latest figure).

The word "latest" refers to the last year for which data were available on either of the two sites when the search was carried out. The searches were conducted between June 2015 and December 2015, so in many cases, the "latest" data recorded here refers to either the 2014 accounts or the 2015 accounts, or, in a few cases, the 2013 accounts.

In the context of these DV charities, the term "turnover" is essentially synonymous with "total income."

"Net worth" is just that – the total assets of the Company, including cash, minus total liabilities. It is the money that would be realised by winding up the business.

The following keywords were used to search for relevant charities on the Charity Commission site: "women's aid," "women's aid," "domestic violence," "domestic abuse" and "refuge." Hits were purged of cases which did not relate to DV charities. To these were added the first ten pages of hits resulting from a search on the CompanyCheck site using keyword "women's aid." After deleting charities which were no longer in operation, or for which no data were available on these sites, a database of 211 extant UK charities was obtained for which at least some of the above items of data were obtained. This master list is given in the accompanying Excel Sheet "top." Note that this is not a complete list of relevant charities. A definitive list of extant charities has not been identified. Moreover, financial data were not found for many known, extant, charities.

Estimates of the data for the whole complement of 451 charities are made below by simple linear scaling. For this purpose the company "Refuge" is treated as an outlier, its annual income being particularly large (£10M to £11M) and hence is excluded from the extrapolation (though added to the extrapolation to give the final figure).

8. Salient Findings from the Key Financial Data

The UK DV sector is assumed, for the purposes of the estimations which follow, to consist of 451 charities. Key numerical results are summarised in Tables 1 to 3 and Figures 1 to 5 below. The bullet points following the Figures pull out the salient features of the data.

Table 1: Latest Data for Sampled Charities

	Latest £millions	Number of charities sampled	Excel Sheet name

Cash	57.5	205	cash
Net worth	81.9	203	NW now
Turnover (Income)	140.3	205	TO now
Staff costs	86.1	190	Staff £
Number of Staff	3,550	186	staff

Table 2: Latest Data cf Data Four Years Earlier

	Latest data£millions	4 years earlier data £millions	Number of charities	Excel Sheet
Net worth	78.6	64.1	186	NW both
Turnover (Income)	136.7	121.8	201	TO both

Table 3: Data Scaled to Whole DV Sector (451 Charities Assumed)

	Latest data£millions	4 years earlier data£millions
Cash	121	–
Net worth	183	153
Turnover (Income)	295	261
Staff costs	189	–
Number of Staff	7,700	–

Figure 1: Percentage of Charities with Cash Reserves in the Indicated Ranges (click to enlarge)

Figure 2: Percentage of Charities with Net Worth in the Indicated Ranges (click to enlarge)

Figure 3: Percentage of Charities with Income in the Indicated Ranges

Figure 4: Percentage of Charities with Staff Costs as a Percentage of Income in the Indicated Ranges (label = top end of range)

Figure 5: Percentage of Charities with Number of Staff in the Indicated Ranges

Salient features of the data,

- The current total cash held in bank accounts by the 205 charities for which these data were obtained was £57.5M.
- Scaling yields an estimate of the cash held by the whole DV sector, £121M.
- The total current net worth of the 203 charities for which these data were obtained was £81.9M.
- For the 186 charities for which both the latest net worth data and the net worth data four years earlier were obtained, the total net worth has increased by £14.5M.

- Of the charities identified, those with the greatest current net worth are Refuge (£4.8M), Belfast & Lisburn (£4.1M), North-East Lincolnshire (£2.4M) and Birmingham & Solihull (£2.1M). The four "Federation" level Women's Aid charities, one for each Nation, have a combined net worth of £3.3M
- Scaling yields an estimate of the current net worth of the entire DV sector of £183M, an increase over four years of £30M.
- The total income in the latest year for the 205 charities for which data were obtained was £140M.
- For the 201 charities for which both the latest income data and that four years earlier were obtained, the total annual income has increased by £15M.
- Scaling yields an estimate of the annual income of the entire DV sector of £295M, an increase over four years of £34M.
- Of the 205 charities for which data were obtained, 9 had an income in the last year in excess of £2M, namely BAWSO (Cardiff, £2.9M), Belfast & Lisburn (£2.2M), Birmingham & Solihull (£3.6M), Harbour (Hartlepool, £2.3M), Refuge (£10.1M), Safelives (N.Ireland & Scotland, £2.7M), Safer Places (Essex, £3.0M), Solace (London, £6.5M) and the Women's Aid Federation of England (£2.6M). A further 28 charities had income in the range £1M to £2M.
- Over the 190 charities for which data were obtained the total staff costs were £86.1M (annual).
- Over the 190 charities for which data were obtained, staff costs were on average 64% of total income.
- The average staff cost per capita was £24,250. However, this includes part-time workers in most cases and so the meaning of this figure is not clear.
- The accounts for Refuge indicated that one person received between £190,000 and £200,000 in 2014 (£170,000 to £180,000 in 2015). One presumes this must be the CEO, Sandra Horley, though this is not stated explicitly. However, it is stated explicitly that the charity contributed to the CEO's personal pension to the tune of £54,884 in 2014 and £37,484 in 2015.
- Refuge is exceptional. Most charities' accounts contain statements like, "No employee received more than £60,000 during the year" or "one person received in the range £70,001 to £80,000".
- Scaling yields an estimate of the total annual staff costs across the whole DV sector, namely 64% of £295M = £189M.
- Over the 186 charities for which data were obtained, the total number of staff was 3,550, or an average of 19.1 people per company.
- Of the charities identified, those with the largest numbers of staff were Refuge (156), BAWSO (Cardiff, 91), Birmingham & Solihull (98), Solace (London, 102), and the combined Federation level charities for the four Nations, totalling 124 staff.
- The above 186 charities had a combined income of £136M. Scaling based on income suggests the total number of staff involved in the DV support industry is about (295/136)*3,550 = 7,700.

9. Cuts? What Cuts?

Representatives of the women's refuge industry have repeatedly bemoaned funding cuts (i.e., cuts in public funding). For example, in Refuge's Annual Report and Financial Statement 2014-15, CEO Sandra Horley wrote, "The last year has been particularly challenging for Refuge. Austerity measures have put a squeeze on local authority funding and, as a result, we are frequently being asked to provide more for less". There have been many reports in the press along these lines over the last couple of years. For example,

(1) "Domestic violence refuges all over Britain are being stripped of funding, or closed completely. Polly Neate, chief executive of Women's Aid, warns that we're on the brink of causing devastating and irreparable damage to this vital service."

(2) "Thirty-three safe havens have been axed by local authority funding cuts since 2010. Women's Aid said 6,337 of 20,736 women looking for help at a refuge were turned away last year."

(3) "Scottish Women's Aid (SWA) has warned thousands of women and children are to lose specialist domestic abuse support. The two Women's Aid groups in West Dunbartonshire have already lost their support funding."

In contrast to these claims the identified financial data show that,

- Of the 201 charities for which income data have been found both 'now' and four years earlier, 128 (64%) have increased their income.
- Of the 186 charities for which net worth data have been found both 'now' and four years earlier, 123 (66%) have increased their net worth.
- The above estimates suggest an increase in net worth of the whole Federation over five years of ~£30M and an increase in income of ~£34M.

However, these figures do not definitively establish that the DV sector is wealthier than five years ago. The reason is that many charities have ceased to exist over this time. The value of these charities has therefore been lost. The effect of this on the sector's total wealth is unknown to the author. However, the issue of the (very frequent) dissolution of refuge charities is taken up in Section 15. Here we note only that the rate of dissolutions appears to be a "steady state" process which is no worse now than historically (i.e., as far back as 1990).

Despite the uncertainty over the implications of dissolved charities, it seems unlikely that the DV sector as a whole could be experiencing reducing fortunes (regarding income or net worth). Evidence for this assertion is provided by Women's Aid's last two annual statements. In 2013/14 the Annual Statement estimated that 9,500 women, plus their children, stayed in a refuge that year, while in the 2014/15 Annual Statement the estimate for the number of women supported in this way was 11,900. This substantial increase in the number of people helped does not suggest a diminishing, or fund-strapped, service. Similarly, the Refuge annual accounts for 2013/14 stated that they supported 703 women and 738 children in refuges in that year, while the 2014/15 Refuge accounts state that "over 1500" women and children were supported in refuges, i.e., an increased level of service.

10. Public Income

What proportion of the DV charities' income is from public sources? To determine the origin of their income requires delving into their accounts. This is a laborious business and has not been done for the whole dataset but just for a sample of 33 charities. This sample was chosen at random except for the deliberate inclusion of the nine charities with the greatest income, namely BAWSO (Cardiff), Belfast & Lisburn, Birmingham & Solihull, Harbour (Hartlepool), Refuge, Safelives (N.Ireland & Scotland), Safer Places (Essex), Solace (London) and the Women's Aid Federation of England. Of the remaining, randomly sampled, 24 charities, 15 had incomes less than £0.5M. The complete list is given in the Excel file, Sheet "accts." Of the 33 charities, the accounts for 32 charities provided some information on the extent of public funding.

The degree of detail given in the accounts varies. It is not always unambiguous whether a source of funding is 'public' or not. However, all income from charitable donations, or transfers from other charitable organisations, are taken to be 'private,' as is any investment income or income from the selling of services. Initially, any income from rent or the national lottery was counted as 'private,' not public, money.

However, it was notable that where charities had a lower percentage of public funding the balance was often dominated by rent or lottery grants. Lottery money might be regarded as a form of public money (because the Lottery is obliged to spend a certain proportion of its earnings on charitable endeavours). In as far as rent relates to the ownership of property, and if said property was acquired via earlier public funding, this rental income may be regarded as indirect public funding. Moreover, in many cases, a large part of the rents accrued are reclaimed on behalf of the clients as Housing Benefit and hence is public money. In some cases, the accounts make this explicit. However, even where this is not explicit, it is likely that much of rental income is actually Housing Benefit. One of the services the charities provide is assistance to clients in making claims for benefits.

The histogram of Figure 6 shows the percentage of income which is publicly funded, both excluding and including rent and lottery income (derived from the 32 sampled charities).On average 68% of income is public money if rent and lottery funding is not included. If rent and lottery funding is included this increases to 84%.

The case of Refuge bears particular consideration because of its size. Total "social housing" income was £3.66M (2014/15 accounts). However, £2.14M of this was eligible for Housing Benefit and hence is actually public money. This leaves £1.52M as non-refunded rental income or 15%. The Refuge accounts identify 21% of income as "voluntary." Assuming "voluntary" income is all non-public money makes a total non-public income of 36%, or 64% of income is public. Making allowance for a proportion of grant income being privately sourced (lottery) reduces this to 60% public funding. Including all rental income, and lottery funding, increases this to 76% public funding.

Figure 6

11. Rental Income

As explained above, a large part of rental income may be obtained via Housing Benefit. However, irrespective of that it is of interest to examine what part rents play in the charities' incomes. Of the 33 company accounts examined, rental income was explicitly mentioned in 18, amounting to a total of £9.9M. Of these 18 charities, non-staff refuge costs were also identified in 16 cases. It is striking that rental income exceeds the non-staff refuge costs in 13 of these 16 cases. Summed over the 16 charities, there was thus an operating profit on the refuges of £3.3M before allowance for staff costs. One might reasonably ask why other public funding is required?

12. Explicit Public Sources of Funding

The bulk of public funding is via local authorities. However, the Home Office and the Ministry of Justice both provide large sums of money directly to many of the DV charities.

Of the 33 sampled charities, 12 were provided with funds directly by the Home Office, to a total of £1.7M. The 33 sampled charities had a combined income of £51.2M. Scaling on the basis that the whole sector of 451 charities has an estimated income of £295M suggests total direct Home Office funding of approaching £10M. This funding is likely to be provided in most cases under the aegis of IDVA and MARAC programmes (Independent Domestic Violence Advocacy and Multi Agency Risk Assessment Conference).

Of the 33 sampled charities, 11 were provided with funds directly by the Ministry of Justice, to a total of £0.76M. Scaling on same the basis as above suggests that the whole sector of 451 charities has a total direct Ministry of Justice funding of around £4.4M. Perhaps these funds are provided under the aegis of Witness Protection programmes? However, it seems most peculiar to a lay person that organisations which openly provide advocacy assistance to one side in court cases, while these cases are in progress, should be funded directly by the Ministry of Justice. Does this not raise questions about the impartiality of the justice process?

For one of the 33 sampled charities (Solace) funding was also provided by the Equalities and Human Rights Commission.

Of the 33 sampled charities, 12 were provided with funds by the Lottery, to a total of £1.3M. Scaling on the same basis as above suggests that the whole sector of 451 charities is provided with lottery funding to the tune of about £7.5M.

13. Non-Staff Refuge Costs

Excluding staff costs, how much of the charities' funds were expended on running refuges?

Of the 33 charities whose accounts were examined, nine did not actually run refuges. For three charities which do run refuges, no data which permitted refuge running costs to be identified were found in the accounts. Data on refuge costs were found in 21 of the 33 sampled accounts. However, the accounts were often unclear about which costs could be attributed to the refuges (as opposed, for example, to office running costs). The words in the accounts which have been taken to indicate refuge costs are specified for each such company in the Excel file, Sheet "accts2". These indicative words include,

Rent, rates, insurance, premises, repairs, renewals, maintenance, housing charges, cleaning, refurbishment, heat and light, fuel costs, building running costs, refuge service costs, establishment costs, operating leases, refuge provision, equipment & soft furnishings, replacement furniture, social housing operating costs

The non-staff refuge costs as a percentage of income (and as a percentage of staff costs) are shown in histogram form in Figure 7. Generally, the non-staff refuge costs account for only a small proportion of the charities' expenditure. This is inevitable since it has already been noted that typically two-thirds of expenditure is on staff salaries and pensions (see Figure 4). Averaging over the 21 charities for which data were examined suggests that non-staff refuge costs account for 14% of income. But if all 33 sampled charities are included in the averaging this falls to less than 11%.

Figure 7

14. Costs Per Capita for Women Supported in Refuges

The Women's Aid Annual Statement for 2013/14 estimated that 9,500 women (with an average of very slightly more than one child) stayed in a refuge that year, while in the 2014/15 Annual Statement the estimate for the number of women supported in this way was 11,900. Similarly, the Refuge annual accounts for 2013/14 stated that they supported 703 women and 738 children in refuges in that year, while the 2014/15 Refuge accounts state that "over 1500" women and children were supported in refuges. Since the financial data identified here relate variously to 2014 or 2015, an estimate of the corresponding number of women supported in refuges is (9,500 + 11,900)/2 + (703 + 750)/2 = 11,427. Set against the total income of £295M, and assuming this equates roughly to expenditure, yields an average cost per woman supported in a refuge of £25,700.

Of course, this is not the real cost of refuge accommodation because the support charities are engaged in a wide range of services in addition to providing refuge accommodation (see Section 17). However, indexing costs to the number of women accommodated in refuges provide a means of gauging cost-benefit, bearing in mind the other services provided.

The average cost per women of £25,700 does not, of course, relate to a full year in a refuge. The average stay is a fraction of a year. Firm data on the average length of stay in a refuge are hard to obtain. However, some sources are as follows.

- The 2014 accounts for Fife WA explicitly state an average stay of 22 weeks.
- The website for Stirling WA states an average length of stay of six months.
- The website for Glasgow WA states, "In general there is no average length of stay although women can be with us from 3 months to over a year in some cases."
- The 2011 annual accounts for Saoirse Women's Refuge gives an explicit average length of stay of 35 days.
- The website for Newcastle WA states an average stay of 3 to 5 months.
- The website for Causeway WA indicates an average stay of 3 months.

So, perhaps an average stay of about four months is a reasonable figure, though with considerable uncertainty. This suggests that the average cost of refuge accommodation is around 3 x £25,700 = £77,000 per woman-year, this being inclusive of an average of about one child per woman plus the other services provided by the DV charities.

As a health check on this estimate consider Birmingham & Solihull WA with refuge places for up to 47 women at one time. This company's income of £3,579,366 thus corresponds to a refuge cost of £76,157 per woman-year, very close to the above average figure. (The number of spaces available for children exceeds that for women and hence is not constraining).

Similarly, consider Refuge with space for 268 women and their children. Assuming this implies about 130 women may be housed, the company's income of £10,148,011 implies refuge costs of about £78,000 per woman-year – again very close to the above average figure.

However, smaller charities, which may provide proportionately fewer other services, may have lower refuge costs. Thus, for example, Fife WA housed 109 women for an average of 22 weeks (hence 46 woman-years) in 2014. The company's income of £1,601,958 thus corresponds to a refuge cost of £34,800 per woman-year, far lower than the sector average. Similarly, Sheffield WA has space for 16 women and 22 children at one time. Assuming the refuge is always full, the company's income of £448,322 suggests a refuge cost of £28,020 per woman-year – again far lower than the sector average. However, we have seen that many of the DV support charities do not run refuge services at all, and this will increase the sector average.

15. Dissolved DV Charities

No attempt has been made to identify all dissolved DV charities since the search would be rather open-ended. A large sample of dissolved charities has been obtained using the Charities Commission website by searching on "Women's Aid" or "Women's Aid" or "Refuge" or "Domestic Violence" or "Domestic Abuse." Spurious hits were first removed (e.g., charities relating to animal welfare or religious retreats resulting from the search on "refuge"). Then all extant charities were removed. Finally, in many cases, charities which had ceased to exist had merely been re-registered under a slightly different name (e.g., Thiscity Women's Aid becoming Thiscity Women's Refuge). These cases were also removed to leave only charities which appeared to be genuinely defunct.

246 dissolved charities were identified in this manner (listed in the Excel file on Sheet "dissolved"). With just four exceptions the year at which these charities failed was 1991 or later (probably because electronic records do not extend to earlier dates). The percentage of the 246 charities failing per year from 1991 onwards is shown in Figure 8.

DV charities have been failing at a rate of at least 10 per year on average over the last 25 years. The actual failure rate may be greater because only a subset of dissolved charities has been identified.

The Charity Commission site labels such charities using four 'codes,'

- ceased to exist (C)

- does not operate (DNO)
- funds transferred (T)
- amalgamated (A)

The last two categories suggest that the function of the company may have passed to another company by amalgamation, in which case it might be misleading to regard these charities as failed. By removing charities coded T or A, 163 dissolved charities remained (i.e., coded C or DNO). The percentage of these 163 charities failing per year is also shown in Figure 8. Accounting for possible amalgamations is seen to make little difference to the overall pattern of dissolutions.

It is notable that more charities failed in years 2008, 2009 and 2010, the year of the financial crisis and the two following years. It is reasonable to suppose this is not a coincidence. More pertinently for our present purposes, however, is that – these three years apart – there is no great difference in failure rate between recent years (2011 to 2015) and historical years prior to 2008. This reinforces the tentative view expressed in Section 9 that the extent of services has not diminished in recent years (in fact it has probably increased).

Figure 8

16. Other DV Charities

Sheet “others” in the Excel file lists 173 other DV charities which are believed to exist or to have existed previously, but whose status has not been explored nor data found for this review. The totality of DV charities mentioned by name within the Excel file is thus 211 (extant) plus 246 (dissolved) plus 173 (status unknown), making 630 charities in all. However, even this is unlikely to be a complete list. There could be more than 100 further extant charities not identified.

17. What Do DV Charities Do With The Rest Of The Money?

This is rather the question.

However, it is not the intention of this review to discuss issues of politics or gender politics. This presents a problem in clarifying what activities are funded by the bulk of DV charity income because these activities are irreducibly gender-political. The activities of the WAF charities are overtly gender-skewed. That they are also political in nature is clear from reading, for example, the Women’s Aid annual statement 2015. The leading pages are dominated by political campaigning and lobbying, much of which can be associated with protecting and extending funding streams. Some of this is direct, some indirect. The mechanism for the latter is to lobby for law changes to bring an ever expanding set of behaviours under their remit, and thus ultimately motivate funding increases.

In other words: sock-puppetry.

More specifically, the activities of the WAF affiliated charities generally involves advocacy services in areas which are most succinctly described as any battles, especially legal battles, which a woman is having against a man. These include, for example, assistance with court appearances and solicitor appointments in connection with divorce proceedings, children's hearings, child contact issues, and securing the conviction of an alleged perpetrator of abuse. The extreme gender bias of the WAF is such that it is unlikely that the latter often, if ever, involves assisting in the prosecution of female abusers of male victims.

18. Conclusion

The implication of this review is that the bulk of domestic violence charity sector funding is actually being expended on these 'other,' overtly political, areas. This observation, together with the sheer magnitude of public funding, raises questions of accountability and probity.

References

[1] Collapsed charity Kids Company given £46m in public cash, BBC News, 29 October 2015 http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-34661273

[2] Kids Company: '£3m donation withdrawn amid police probe', BBC News, 6 August 2015 http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-33798285

[3] The state-charity relationship needs more transparency still, Henry Hill, 27 December 2015, conservativehome

[4] Entire Board resigns from crisis hit charity following governance concerns, Daniel Sanderson, heraldscotland, 16 December 2015http://www.heraldscotland.com/news/14147336.Entire_board_resigns_from_crisis_hit_charity_following_governance_concerns/?ref=ar

[5] Crime tsar facing probe after awarding more than £500,000 of taxpayers' money to the charity she runs with force police chief, Jennifer Smith, Mail Online, 16 April 2015.http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3041410/Crime-tsar-facing-probe-awarding-500-000-taxpayers-money-charity-runs-force-police-chief.html#ixzz3vMKuxwTt

[6] Northumbria PCC: victims' charity is best for region, policing TODAY, 20 April 2015.https://www.policingtoday.co.uk/northumbria_pcc_victims39_charity_is_best_for_region_25769822627.aspx

[7] uk refuges online https://www.ukrefugesonline.org/Login.aspx

[8] Gov.uk Press release, £3.2 million funding to help victims of domestic violence and abuse. https://www.gov.uk/government/news/32-million-funding-to-help-victims-of-domestic-violence-and-abuse

[9] Women's Aid Federation of Englandhttps://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Women%27s_Aid_Federation_of_England

[10] Scottish Women's Aid, http://www.scottishwomensaid.org.uk/

[11] Welsh Women's Aid, http://www.welshwomensaid.org.uk/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=99&Itemid=104

[12] Women's Aid Federation Northern Ireland, http://www.womensaidni.org/get-help-domestic-sexual-violence/local-groups/

[13] Gov UK Press release, £3.2 million funding to help victims of domestic violence and abuse, 9 July 2015, https://www.gov.uk/government/news/32-million-funding-to-help-victims-of-domestic-violence-and-abuse

[14] Gov uk, Press release, 10 million support for women facing the threat of domestic violence, https://www.gov.uk/government/news/10-million-support-for-women-facing-the-threat-of-domestic-violence

[15] Office for National Statistics, Crime Statistics, Focus on Violent Crime and Sexual Offences, 2013/14 Release, Chapter 4: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences – Intimate Personal Violence and Serious Sexual Assault,

http://www.ons.gov.uk/ons/rel/crime-stats/crime-statistics/focus-on-violent-crime-and-sexual-offences–2013-14/rpt-chapter-4.html

[16] Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project (PASK),http://domesticviolenceresearch.org/

[17] Mankind Initiative, Crown Prosecution Service data on prosecutions for domestic abuse by gender (England & Wales), http://voteprint.co.uk/mankind/wp-content/uploads/2015/05/Convictions-200405-to-201314.pdf

[18] Mankind Initiative, data on reports of domestic abuse to the police, broken down by gender, resulting from Freedom of Information enquiries,http://voteprint.co.uk/mankind/wp-content/uploads/2015/05/FOI-01-Jan-20102-to-30-June-2014-A3-final-percentage.pdf

[19] Charity Commission web sitehttps://www.gov.uk/government/organisations/charity-commission

[20] Company Check Ltd, https://companycheck.co.uk/dashboard

[21] Closing domestic violence refuges is the most dangerous thing of all for women, Polly Neate, The Telegraph, 5 August 2014, http://www.telegraph.co.uk/women/womens-life/11013739/UK-domestic-violence-refuge-closures-the-most-dangerous-thing-of-all-for-women.html

[22] Women's refuges turned away THOUSANDS of victims last year – thanks to funding cuts, Nicola Fifield, Mirror, 12 April 2015, http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/uk-news/womens-refuges-turned-away-thousands-5503694

[23] Scottish Women's Aid warns over abuse care cuts, Lucy Adams, BBC News Scotland, 27 January 2015, http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-scotland-30996444

[24] Stirling & District Women's Aidhttp://www.stirlingwomensaid.co.uk/accommodation.htm

[25] Glasgow Women's Aid http://www.glasgowwomensaid.org.uk/life-in-refuge.html

[26] Newcastle Women's Aid https://localgiving.com/charity/newcastlewomensaid

[27] Causeway Women's Aid http://www.homelessuk.org/details.asp?id=HO1008642

Article by: 'mra-uk: challenging public incredulity on men's human rights'.

Article originally published at honest-ribbon.org on September 17, 2016, By mra-uk. Republished here with permision from author.

Angryharry.com now hosted by AVFM

Paul Elam · 21 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This is a bittersweet announcement. After a considerable amount of red tape and a noteworthy investment of time and effort by our own David King, angryharry.com is now owned and hosted by AVfM Education, LLC.

On behalf of the entire AVFM staff and I am sure many grateful readers I want to extend our deepest thanks to Harry's widow, Lesley, for allowing us to take possession of the domain. Angryharry.com is an iconic landmark in the men's human rights movement, rich with thought provoking, cutting edge work from what can only be called a great man.

Many in this movement got here because Harry was the portal. We are grateful for the opportunity to preserve his legacy and keep it available to the world in the years ahead.

RIP Angry Harry.

You really want to know why there are fewer women CEOs?

AVfM Video Source · 22 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=v-azKoJ64Mw

This Is Feminist Justice – TFF Episode 44

AVfM Video Source · 23 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 44 Professor Fiamengo analyzes Justice Marvin Zuker's verdict in the Mandi Gray Rape Case in which a graduate student Mandi Gray invited Mustafa Ururyar for drinks followed by "hot sex" and later charged him with rape.

StudioBrule

Jody Allard is an admitted child abuser

AVfM Video Source · 23 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Jody Allard – a writer for Washington Post and Huffington Post is openly admitting to pushing one of her sons to suicide through feminist blackmail and bullying. All one has to do to notice that is to simply read her work. Lucian Vâlsan has done just that and the picture is terrifying.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Hating men is mainstream

James Jackson · 23 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I remember a stand-up comedian from twenty-five years ago whose routine commented on the word "nymphomaniac." (I'm sorry, I do not recall his name.) He wondered why there was a term for a woman who wanted sex all of the time, but there was no such term for a man who wanted sex all of the time.

He came to the conclusion that we do not have such a term for men since all men want sex all the time. It is implied in the word "man." He joked that we don't need a special term for a male nymphomaniac because it would be redundant. (Actually, there is such a term—satyr—but few know it.)

This reminded me of a semantic analogy that I had heard concerning the word "misogyny." It was noted that "misogyny" was a term for hatred of women, usually by men, but that there was no such term for hatred of men, usually by women. It was concluded that we did not need such a word since all women hate men. It is implied in the word "woman." It would be redundant to have a special term for women who hate men. (Of course, I later learned that there is such a term—misandry—but few know it.)

This notion that all women hate men to some degree has only gotten stronger for me over the last twenty-five years. In fact, women hating men is mainstream and prevalent and normal.

Here are a few recent examples.

Once again, a man with an assault rifle killed many people, this time in Orlando. Even though most of these attacks seem to be sparked by mental illness, the motivation for this attack appears to be terrorism. Once again, feminists tried to blame the attack by Omar Mateen on misogyny, ignoring that he killed six men for every woman (42 men and seven women were killed.)[1] Here are a few quotes.

> "He (Mateen) is the outcome of the United States' political culture…" of "men controlling women…."

> "This dominance is exercised in part through violence including systematic rape and the threat of rape…."

> "domestic violence can be seen as a psychological training ground for someone like Mr. Mateen to commit a mass attack."[2]

> "Homophobia, misogyny, toxic masculinity, and religious fundamentalism are all tied together in a noxious knot that feminists call 'patriarchy'…."[3]

As J.T. has pointed out, blaming the attack on toxic masculinity—on all men—is like blaming the attack on all of Islam.[4] We have been admonished from doing that. But it appears to be okay to blame all men. This is the kind of hatefulness against men that is in the mainstream media now.

It seems as if all problems in the world can be traced by feminists back to misogyny. I wonder if they can blame misogyny for the potato blight, blackheads, anal fissures, unpleasant aftertastes, offsides, bed bugs, seasickness, the 7-year itch, losing Pluto as a planet, bank failures, chiggers, and athlete's foot. I bet they'll try.

And like other mass shootings, the media focused on the female victims of the Orlando shooting for sympathy and personal stories, probably giving the seven female victims more media time and sympathy than the 42 men. Even when the media talked about the male victims, it usually concerned the pain of female relatives.

Donald Trump has been criticized for not denouncing and not condemning his racist supporters. He played ignorant when confronted with support from David Duke and the Ku Klux Klan. Yet, Hillary Clinton has received no criticism for actually praising a hate website. Clinton was a fan of the now-defunct humor website, The Toast, which has been described as the center of “cheerful misandry.”[5] Even though Clinton is known for avoiding the press, she volunteered to write a glowing farewell address for the website.[6] It is no surprise to me that Clinton enjoyed a website spouting misandry. She has certainly hinted at her misandry with her constant focus on women throughout her political career.

Do we want a President who blatantly hates half of the population? She even hired two former writers from the website for her campaign. And her closing command in her screed was “keep giving them hell.” Misandry is mainstream and running for President.

In a monumental example of feminist illogic and hypocrisy, feminists do not think men accused of sexual violations should be given the basic right of “innocent until proven guilty.” Try to follow this. Feminists have long demanded that sexual assault victims (i.e., women) should receive special treatment from the legal system and society. This special treatment includes such things as accusers being called “survivors,” not releasing accusers’ names while identifying the accused, providing special counselors to walk accusers through the legal system, providing mental health and medical care to accusers, and imposing severe restrictions on the accused before final adjudications.

Legal scholars have complained that special treatment like this concerning sexual assault and sexual harassment strongly implies that the accused are guilty and that they, therefore, must prove their innocence. Also, in University sexual abuse tribunals, the accused must prove that they did not sexual abuse the accusers. In other words, due process for the accused is reversed to “guilty until proven innocent.”

Feminists have tried to nullify this argument that men are unfairly presumed “guilty until proven innocent” with the strange declaration that pointing it out will discourage victims from coming forward.[7] Uhhhh!?!? What woman, who has just been raped, thinks to herself that she wants to go to the police, but decides that she can’t because the man will be considered “guilty until proven innocent?” No one would think like that. It is absurd. But it shows just how far feminists will go in their hatred of men to try to sabotage jurisprudence and deny due process to men.

I see this as one more example of feminists’ hatred of men, and feminists’ continual effort to make men and male sexuality illegal. According to the Department of Education’s Office of Civil Rights, examples of punishable unwelcome sexual conduct in universities include: “making sexual propositions or pressuring students for sexual favors; touching of a sexual nature; writing graffiti of a sexual nature; displaying or distributing sexually explicit drawings, pictures, or written materials; performing sexual gestures or touching oneself sexually in front of others; telling sexual or dirty jokes; spreading sexual rumors or rating other students as to sexual activity or performance; or circulating or showing e-mails or Web sites of a sexual nature.”[8]

Obviously, these are sexual behaviors that men are more likely to exhibit. Traditional female sexual behaviors are oddly missing from this list. This is so sexist. Under this policy, women can punish men for sexual jokes, sexual drawings, or just about anything men are likely to do of a sexual nature. Discussions of sexuality in literature or psychology classes could also be risky. This is so ridiculous.

The ridiculousness of the situation is multiplied by orders of magnitude when affirmative consent is added into the mix. Under affirmative consent policies, men now must ask permission for every sexual move. If a request should happen to be “unwelcome” to the woman, he could be in big trouble just for asking. So feminists require that men request permission for every sexual move, and at the same time, feminists have made that request potentially illegal. Men are damned no matter what.

All of these policies to protect women have resulted in imposing outrageous risks on men. I understand that we generally try to keep sexuality away from small children who cannot handle it. But this should not extend to college women, who are supposedly adults. Supposedly. Are women so weak and vulnerable that we must protect them from all male sexuality? Meanwhile, women are free to express all of the female sexuality that they want—skin exposure, tight clothing, cosmetics, perfumes, flirting, vocal frying, etc. The hypocrisy is deafening.

To see just how ridiculously one-sided this whole debate has become, consider Jessica Valenti, author of the book,

Sex Object. In an interview, she stated that sexual objectification of women leads to men seeing women as objects and not full people.[9] Women are dehumanized. And this leads to sexual violence against women since it is easier to be violent against an object than a person.

When asked by the interviewer to explain the difference between sexual objectification and sexual attraction or appreciation, Valenti said that the difference is men seeing women as full human beings and "not a collection of body parts." Again, Valenti puts all of the blame on men. There is no discussion of women portraying themselves as collections of sexual body parts in order to gain power over men: Women wearing push-up bras, women wearing breast enhancements, women exposing their breasts, women wearing clothing that is so tight that outlines of nipples, butt cleavage, or genitalia are clearly visible, women wearing see-thru clothing, women exposing excessive skin, women wearing make-up which imitates sexual arousal.

Once again, the feminist perspective is that women can do whatever they want, but men can't. The discussion is always a one-sided, hypocritical, sexist blaming of men for everything. Also, there is no discussion of women dehumanizing men as financial and romance objects. Also, if sexual objectification leads to violence against women, then how does Valenti explain that men are victims of violence far more often than women are?

Consider that even our First Lady is a hater.[10] In her recent "United State of Women Summit" at the White House, she was interviewed by Oprah Winfrey and was asked what men can do. Ms. Obama's answer: "Be better." To paraphrase her rant: Men need to be better at everything—be better fathers and love their daughters. Be better husbands, don't abuse. Do the dishes. Don't just babysit their children. Be better employers. Invite women into all-male groups.

This rant was accompanied by roars of laughter and approval from Oprah and the audience. Here is the First Lady, who is supposed to be the nation's ambassador of sweetness and kindness, just eviscerating a group of Americans. She accused the vast majority of men of being abusers, incompetent, lazy, sexist, and bad fathers. She doesn't think much of men.

Can you even imagine what would happen if a prominent male government official bashed women like this in front of a crowd of cheering men? He would soon be without a job. While Oprah and the crowd were shrieking and howling with delight, Obama even said that although she has never been abused herself, that not being abused is rare.

This criticism of men is outrageous. No other group receives this kind of treatment. Blacks, Hispanics, women, Jews, Muslims—only men are abused like this. And it apparently is acceptable. And funny. And by the First Lady of the United States! Ironically, the First Lady was praised for her anti-hate stand relating to race in her Democratic Convention speech but was also applauded for her hate speech concerning men just a few weeks earlier. It is hate. It is outrageous. I try not to bring invectives into my writing, but you can imagine what I am shouting at the First Lady right now.

Misandry is everywhere. But few can see it, and fewer want to do anything about it.

Read the complete article at http://hydrarch15.wix.com/selfindulgence

Notes

[1] In keeping with the media exploiting female victimization, whenever more women are victimized in a situation like this, the media constantly tell us that more women were victimized. For example, most every news report on the Charleston church murders noted that six of the nine victims were women. But when more men are victimized, the media suddenly cannot count. I could not find one article or news item giving the numbers of men and women killed in Orlando. I had to find a list of those killed and count them myself.

[2] http://www.nytimes.com/2016/06/16/world/americas/control-and-fear-what-mass-killings-and-domestic-violence-have-in-common.html?_r=0

[3] http://www.salon.com/2016/06/12/orlando_mass_shooting_bigotry_is_bigotry_no_matter_what_religion_you_use_to_justify_it/

[4] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/facing-west-from-californias-shores/

[5] https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/the-fix/wp/2016/07/01/taking-a-page-out-of-obamas-book-hillary-clinton-says-farewell-to-the-toast/

[6] http://the-toast.net/2016/07/01/a-note-on-the-toast/

[7] http://freebeacon.com/issues/presumption-of-innocence-silences-rape-survivors/

[8] http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/ocr/docs/ocrshpam.pdf

[9] http://www.wbur.org/onpoint/2016/06/08/sexual-assault-stanford-jessica-valenti At about minute 25

[10] http://hotair.com/archives/2016/06/15/video-sorry-men-michelle-obama-just-doesnt-think-youre-good-enough/

Male Masochism and Culture (1936)

Peter Wright · 24 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Do males in the Western world display clinical levels of masochism? Is chivalry a thinly veiled expression of masochism?

According to the following excerpt from his 1936 essay Male Masochism and Culture, psychoanalyst Arnold Herman Kamiat fingers masochism as a very real problem among men. With modern academic researchers unable to get past the traditionalist mythology of women as masochistic and men as sadistic, and reluctant to look at the concept of male masochism, we will take Kamiat's essay as a first examination of the topic and a prefiguration of contemporary gynocentrism theory. – PW

SOCIAL MASOCHISM

The masochism that has hitherto occupied the attention of psychologists is individual masochism. This is the masochism of particular individuals in their subordinate relation, fancied or real, to particular members of the opposite sex.

But there appears to be a social masochism. This involves the subordinate relation, fancied or real, of a number of individuals of the same sex (taken collectively) to a number of individuals of the opposite sex (taken collectively). Social masochism has, strangely enough, received little or no attention.

This essay is, in part, an attempt to establish the reality of this kind of masochism. The masochistic aspiration often takes the form of a vision of an ideal society — ideal from a masochistic viewpoint of course. This is significant for the interpretation of such myths and religious cults as have already been referred to, and the structure of certain primitive and contemporary societies.

It is an interesting speculation whether any of the gynarchies and goddess-cults were conceived, brought into being, and sustained by masochistic men — or sadistic women. The Egyptian gynocracy is said to have been established by a man — King Sesostris. Was he a masochist?

Frazer attributes the primitive gynarchies to the perception of the importance of woman for the continuance of life. But did not androcratic societies have this same perception? Then why were they not gynarchic? At any rate, whatever may have been the origin of gynocracy, the latter must have operated as a breeder of masochism. If male masochism was not the cause of gynarchy, it may very well have been a consequence thereof.

A gynarchy is probably a large-scale producer of male masochism. Once generated, the latter will in its turn serve to sustain the gynarchy (as female masochism probably bred by androcracy serves to maintain the latter). Certain it is that gynarchies have in fact exhibited phenomena calculated to enter into full accord with the aspirations of male masochists. Some of these phenomena have been recorded by the Vaertings in their book, The Dominant Sex.

This book, like practically all writings on sex conflicts and sex dominance, takes no account whatsoever of the fact and the psychology of sado-masochism — an index of that strange inability so many writers on social topics reveal to give due attention to psychological factors. But the book does contain a store of valuable information, and some of the phenomena it describes certainly lend themselves to interpretation via the masochistic hypothesis.

The marital relation lends itself to masochistic uses under any scheme of social organization, including an androcratic one. No one knows how often a dominant wife is really the creation and the instrument of a masochistic husband — it is not at all unlikely that such is often the case. On the other hand, the wish being 'father to the thought,' a masochistic man will often ascribe a dominant position to his or someone else's wife, lover or mistress, when the true position is really one of equipollence or subordination. Rumor, gossip and report are often species of phantasy.

MASOCHISTIC MYTHS OF TODAY

It has been seen that in the ancient world individual masochistic phantasies became generalized into socially shared ideas. They entered into, and became part of the mythos of a race or nation. The mythologies of the ancient world have in large part gone, but masochism has persisted, and masochism must have its mythos, social as well as individual.

Krafft-Ebing and other writers on the subject stress the individual mythos. It is contended here that masochists also have their socially shared mythology. The world today is not without its stock of socially shared masochistic myths — phantasies held by male masochists everywhere, and by those who come under their influence. Indeed, the mythology in question has become a source of revenue, and with all educational agencies utilized by the myth-peddlers, the myths are becoming the property of both masochists and non-masochists, men and women.

The myths masquerade as philosophy, psychology, sociology, biology, educational theory, and schemes of social reform. Their most common characteristics are an imaginary magnification of feminine power, a correlative imaginary depreciation of masculine power, an imaginative depiction of woman as the savior of mankind (Goethe's "The Woman-Soul leadeth us upward and on;" see also E. A. Robinson's Merlin and Auguste Comte's System of Positive Polity), and an aspiration toward some kind of gynarchic social order or way of life.

At times the phantasies take on a distinctly paranoid character, with women being envisaged as designing, conspiring, invincible Vivians, Circes and Delilahs. All this mythopoesis issues in certain familiar pictures of "reality," "life," and "love." In these pictures an omnipotent womanhood carries on all kinds of transactions with a powerless manhood.

The phraseology is familiar — woman is the seat of power; the source of life; the conserver of life; the keeper of all ideals, all wisdom, all morality, all practicality, all culture; she is the fount and origin of all that is good; she is the one great constructive force; her practically infallible instincts and intuitions facilitate an instant grasp of the greatest truths of life, truths that men laboriously strive to attain, truths some of which are utterly beyond masculine ken; woman's function is to govern, man's but to obey; she is anyhow the ruler, androcracy being but a delusion; she is the center of the home and its ruler; outside of the home her power is equally great, men of importance being merely the instruments of their wives, mothers, daughters, sisters, mistresses, private secretaries, office assistants, or wise and inspiring feminine friends; the greatest revolution of all time is at hand: women will soon take matters in hand and transform life in all its departments; and so on, and so on, ad infinitum, ad nauseam.

It is not asserted that all this is manufactured solely by male masochists. Plenty of it flows out of feminine minds, and a good deal out of male minds that are either neurotic, or ignorant, or adolescent, or afflicted with a particularly morbid form of gyneolatry. There is a tendency, present in its most virulent form in neurotics of both sexes, toward the imaginative magnification of the power of the opposite sex. The idea of feminine, or masculine power, becomes emotionally charged. It thereupon looms larger and larger in consciousness until all perspective is lost and a rational comparative evaluation of the relative power and influence of the sexes becomes well-nigh impossible.

A reporter who must have been something of a psychoanalyst, while interviewing a male prophet of the "coming" feminine revolution, inquired of him concerning his childhood relation to his mother. In answer, the prophet, who has turned his gynophilia into a source of income, described his mother as exercising an unusual dominance over him as a child.

Masochism may enter into the makeup of a certain type of male, often of mystic temperament, with an adolescent notion of women as in some sense divine, exuding love and possessed of infallible intuitions, revealing "truths" greater and more profound than any mediated by mere science and philosophy, and who can solve all his problems for man, if he will only submit to her rule. This kind of male, for all his babble about the gynarchic future, in reality lives in the past, the gynarchic past. It is the gynarchy he wants to restore, albeit in a refined form.

Gynocracy of one sort or another has had and still has its pseudo – philosophical and pseudo-scientific defenders. Perhaps the best known of these is Auguste Comte, whose brief in the fourth chapter of his System of Positive Polity is one of the most curious and adolescent pieces of writing in the history of philosophy. The names of some living men would be in place here. The reader, if he will keep a sharp lookout on books, newspapers, magazines, and lecture announcements, can supply these names himself.

See also: Male Masochism and Gynocentrism in Victorian women's literature

Mike Buchanan on The Victoria Derbyshire Show – misogyny treated as a hate crime

AVfM Video Source · 28 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

At the behest of feminists, Nottinghamshire Police started treating misogyny as a hate crime some months ago, and the initiative is being considered for implementation by other police forces in England. Our blog post on the matter is here.

The studio discussion starts at 4:23, but we suggest it's worth watching the preceding footage to get a sense of what the BBC considers relevant background material.

Steve Brulé: Red Pill Movie Funder

Steve Brulé · 28 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill, a documentary by filmmaker Cassie Jaye, will open in both New York and LA in October and I need your help to attend and document these events. CLICK HERE To Donate Using PayPal

Please watch the above appeal for funds in which I explain this campaign. In the past I have used FundAnything for these campaigns but it seems that the site will be down indefinitely. I will get a Go Fund Me site going shortly, but the NYC premiere is in two weeks so please help get this started. The Premieres are:

New York City Sunday October 9, 2016
Los Angeles Friday October 14, 2016

CLICK HERE To Donate Using PayPal

Here is the rest of the text from from video above:

My purpose is not only to see, but to capture the public response to The Red Pill and to interview the film's subjects like Warren Farrell, Paul Elam, Harry Crouch, and Richard Cassalata, as well as director Cassie Jay and many others.

As an aside, although I don't know how much has been included, I have provided quite a lot of my footage to the film's director Cassie Jay, so of course I am very interested in seeing how it turns out.

I have been documenting the rise of the Men's Rights movement since filming the Warren Farrell protest in Toronto in 2012, and the release of The Red Pill may be a significant milestone in this movement, so I think it's very important to capture the public response to film, including any protests.

I'd also like to announce at this time that about a year ago I started working on a biographical film with the working title "Who Is Paul Elam?" This will be the first, and possibly only, in-depth exploration of how Paul Elam became one of the leading and most controversial figures in the men's rights movement. I can say right now that it is a fascinating story that most of you will want to see. Though you might think you know Paul, I guarantee you don't know the whole story. I think that footage of Paul's attendance and his immediate response to the release of The Red Pill is important to my film, "Who Is Paul Elam?"

Interviewing Cassie Jay is also important given that the film community reacted very negatively to her as soon as they learned that The Red Pill would cast the men's movement in a positive light. Cassie reports that she changed and grew quite a lot while making The Red Pill … and even more so after she wrapped the film. Your donation can help me bring more of this story to you when I interview her in LA, and I'd be happy to entertain any questions that supporters might have for Cassie.

If you have enjoyed the content on Studio Brulé, like the Warren Farrell protest, The Fiamengo File, Institutions of Higher Indoctrination, The Persecution at KSU, the Interviews at the International Conference on Men's Issues in both Detroit 2014 and London England 2016, and so much more, please donate to help me attend and document the world premieres of The Red Pill, which many are saying will be a game changer for the men's rights movement.

CLICK HERE To Donate Using PayPal

Goal = $3500
Donated = $1995

Please Note: Any funds in excess of the cost of attending and documenting the premieres will be used in to support the productions at Studio Brulé.

Title IX and college rape: A series of injustice, the conclusion

Jessica Denis · 28 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This series started in an effort to bring awareness to the issue of colleges attempting to adjudicate accusations of sexual assault on their campuses. Part 1 discussed two separate cases: Both men were clearly not responsible for what they were accused of; however, both had life-altering consequences. Part 2 discussed a case in which both the male and the female said it was not rape, and both parties filed their own Title IX lawsuits after the school refused to drop the case. Part 3 not only outlined an additional innocent man, but also brought the effects of a few of the "lucky" young men who were accused and found not responsible and the lingering effects of the accusation. In Part 4, a young man who was actually a victim of sexual assault was later held responsible regardless of the facts presented.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is one of the resources available to those who find themselves accused. SAVE recently released a detailed report on this topic. The 261 lawsuits reviewed included 207 separate universities. If that is not considered a systematic failure, I don't know what is.

One judge involved in the case of Dez Wells v. Xavier University said:

> "Moreover, it appears to the Court that the [University Conduct Board] here, a body well-equipped to adjudicate questions of cheating, may have been in over its head with relation to an alleged false accusation of sexual assault. Such conclusion is strongly bolstered by the fact that the County Prosecutor allegedly investigated, found nothing, and encouraged Defendant Father [Michael] Graham to drop the matter."

Another judge, this one involved in John Doe v. Brandeis, said on page 12 of his ruling:

> "Whether someone is a 'victim' is a conclusion to be reached at the end of a fair process, not an assumption to be made at the beginning. Each case must be decided on its own merits, according to its own facts."

Case after case in this analysis shows the repeated lack of due process, shifted burdens of proof, a presumption of guilt, negligence, breach of contract and erroneous outcomes that cause major damage to people's lives. These cases continue to be filed, not only by the accused but many times by the accusers because their cases were mishandled so badly.

So how do we change it? I have written story after story in this series that has now gone on for nearly two months, along with hundreds of hours of research before I started writing. What good is describing a problem if you don't also propose a solution?

I am not involved in politics and can only offer my suggested changes that extend across the board.

First and foremost is dismantling the "one in five" theory — the oft-repeated claim that one in five women on college campuses has been sexually assaulted. President Obama and other politicians have repeated this statistic, which has been thoroughly debunked.

Having your butt grabbed on the dance floor is unwanted sexual contact. It is NOT the same thing as sexual assault or rape. There is a difference. By denying that fact, all we are doing is lessening the value of respect given to an actual rape victim. There is a difference between someone who had their butt grabbed at a party and someone who was thrown to the grown, held down and penetrated against her will. While the black and white definition of such shows that both are sexual assault, we all know it is simply not the same thing. Having someone yell "Hey sexy thing" is not equivalent to sexual assault or rape.National standardized definitions need to be put in place that clarifies where the lines are crossed from sexual harassment to sexual assault to rape. By lumping "any unwanted sexual contact" into the same group, yes, one in five women will have experienced something under that broad definition. That does not mean one in five women was raped. Standardized definitions are needed so that punishments can fit the crime in a similar fashion to how criminal homicide is handled, with Murder 1, Murder 2, Manslaughter, Involuntary Manslaughter, etc.

One of the first things I did in this process was email a survey to more than 50 attorneys who have been named in Title IX cases that originate from sexual assault. Twenty of them responded that they agreed 100 percent with national standard definitions, along with a new study to be done based on those definitions to determine exactly how many women are truly raped on campus.

The other thing I found interesting is that 20 attorneys also told me these cases should NOT all be turned over to local police. Many rape victims will not go to local police, and forcing legal and criminal action would deter many victims from stepping forward.

I trust their opinions. They are the ones in the trenches dealing with this every day. My suggestion would be if these cases have to be adjudicated at the college level, there needs to be someone who specializes in law overseeing them. If a legal and criminal justice department is available on campus, that would be the first place to go — attorneys, retired investigators, etc., not the dean of students, who has no idea how to handle an accusation of rape.

There should be a national standard of practice imposed in addition to the "Dear Colleague" letter outlining what the procedure will be, based on the definitions as stated above. This outline should also outline what acceptable investigation is, as well as require that all of these investigations and administrative hearings be reported from start to finish. All students' constitutional and due process rights should be upheld. There should not be an allowance for any student to be punished prior to the determination at the end hearing. If any student feels threatened by any other student, he or she should look into a restraining order or a no contact order. An accused student should never be punished or have temporary sanctions simply for being accused. If any of these are not followed, the college should be sanctioned immediately. Someone needs to hold universities accountable, and if that requires a specific department within the government, then it needs to happen.

I also spoke with Dr. Warren Farrell, the author of The Myth of Male Power and formerly on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York. I asked what his solution would be for college students falsely accused of rape. His response:

> First, since the university's primary role is to educate, its first step should be to sponsor confidential communication counseling to help the young man and woman hear each other's perspectives. Only if that fails should the University then hand it over to the non-university police with their guarantee of due process. Why? The university has too much of an incentive to support only the girl as victim, and deny due process to the boy, for fear of undermining public relations, angering donors, and being punished by the federal government.
>
> In the meantime, the best the young man can do is:
>
> - Do everything possible to hear the woman's perspective ASAP by doing nine things: listen, listen, listen; empathize, empathize, empathize; and apologize, apologize, apologize. Once he's empathized and taken responsibility, he can let her know his best intent without subtracting from his empathy and apology. His attitude: he must care about her, not just about saving his ass. His goal: for him and her to both be on the same team.
> - If he cannot access the woman, get to the university president. Explain that the most important way of reducing the girl's psychological damage is for her to be empathized with and apologized to. Ask the president to sponsor a private, confidential meeting, with the best interests of the girl in mind.The system makes these efforts very challenging, which is why the system needs changing. In the meantime, the best defense is an alliance.

I would like to add that if you are a male or female who has been wrongly accused of sexual assault, you are not alone. I cannot say that enough. There are resources available to you and hundreds of people who have stood where you are standing. Here are a few resources you might not know are available:

Families Advocating for Campus Equality
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments
Foundation for Individual Rights in Education

I want to thank all of the John Does and their families who were willing to talk to me, their attorneys for putting me in contact and FACE for helping to spread the word about this series.

The second-most-common question I have been asked is, “Why are they John Doe?” The answer to that is simple. They or their family members asked me not to publish their names. In many cases, the simple accusation means automatic guilt. Moving forward becomes difficult when your name has been dragged through the mud over and over again, especially in our world of social media. They just wanted to tell their stories. I gladly let them have their anonymity.

This article was originally published in the Western Journal and republished here with the author’s permission.

The Red Pill: stimulating masculinity

Peter Wright · 29 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

With the anticipated release of the The Red Pill documentary, it's a good time to reflect on the early days of this website and to cast some light on what the Red Pill phrase meant – and still means – to a growing audience of people concerned with the welfare of men and boys.

AVFM employed 'Take The Red Pill' as its first logo tagline in 2009, and continued using it as a subtitle for AVFM Radio in 2011. The red pill has since become a leitmotif throughout the genre of men's human rights advocacy. Before looking at how the phrase spread and took on alternative meanings, let's begin with a trip down memory lane with a few early mentions at AVfM, starting with this by Paul Elam in April 2010:

> Underlying the platforms and politics of the Men's Rights Movement is an unspoken mission to serve as a lifeline to this lost generation of our brothers. More than anything else, it is the job of men who understand, who have taken the red pill and seen through the Matrix, to push a meaningful archetype of manhood into the collective consciousness; to push it past the feminist censors and their obsequious male henchmen; to be willing, in fact, to roll over them in the process.
>
> The only real question is what that manhood should look like. And that, just as with the lost men of this generation, brings us to a crossroads as well.
>
> I have written recently about what it means to be an MRA; how we must abandon reflexive chivalry and blind reverence for traditionalism; how we should dispense with party politics and move past internal divisions to further the cause of men and boys. That task, as important as it is, is just a preamble to this one. Because the real point of all of this is not what we do so much as activists, but that in doing so we define and exemplify what we aspire to as men.[1]

In this pithy excerpt much of the men's rights movement's conceptualization of 'taking the red pill' is laid out. Here, and in the longer article from which it came, we see the rejection of traditionalist models of so-called manhood – of chivalric knights saving damsels, and of suffocating categories like 'Alpha' and 'Beta' – and a concern that men enjoy the freedom to go their own way, ideally with the blessing of a society that no longer strives to hold them to constrictive roles.

In a 2011 article Elam added that the red pill included freedom from traditional notions of gaining sexual approval, or sexual conquest in the spirit of antique pick-up artists like Casanova who seek sexual validation from as many women as possible:

> if you can even imagine the possibility that you are worth more than investing your life, your money and your heart in begging for pussy, then stay right here at A Voice for Men. Take the red pill and start learning about > life outside the bonds of tying up everything you are in female approval.[2]

Ironically, a subreddit page championing precisely that pick-up artistry and seduction strategy appeared in late 2013 and took to itself the title The Red Pill – a site whose goals most in the men's rights movement have rejected as retrograde gynocentrism. Needless to say the subreddit's use of the red pill metaphor is unrelated to the way we use it here, and pickup artistry is not the focus of the upcoming Red Pill documentary about the men's human rights movement.

For the record, the red pill metaphor was occasionally used prior to its appearance at A Voice for Men, including at the Men's Rights site The Spearhead, as well as in non-MRA contexts. It is currently used in a variety of unrelated settings, from politics, to religion, sport, finance, knowledge, and yes pick-up artistry.

Wikipedia clarifies that the red pill and its opposite, the blue pill, are popular culture symbols representing the choice between embracing the sometimes painful truth of reality (red pill) and the blissful ignorance of illusion (blue pill).

The terms are derived from the 1999 film The Matrix. In the film, the main character Neo is offered the choice between a red pill and a blue pill. The blue pill would allow him to remain in the fabricated reality of the Matrix, therefore living the "ignorance of illusion", while the red pill would lead to living the "truth of reality" even though it is a harsher, more difficult life.[3]

While not the first to use the term, AVfM is a place where it first got legs in reference to understanding men's issues – ie. we "take the red pill" when we reject negative press about the male sex and take a closer, more empathetic and honest look at men's experiences. It involves an awakening of compassion, and an awakening to non-gynocentric forms of masculinity, ones based on a greater and better range of choices.[4]

That, in a nutshell, is the essence of the red pill: fostering greater compassion, and non-gynocentric life options for men and boys. For readers wanting to explore these topics further, the following selection of websites offer high quality 'redpill' content.

- A Voice for Men

- Honey Badger Brigade
- An Ear for Men
- Gynocentrism and its Cultural Origins
- Men Are Good
- Warren Farrell: The Myth of Male Power

References:

[1] Paul Elam, On Killing the Alpha Male (April 3, 2010)
[2] Paul Elam, Pussy Begging International (March 21, 2011)
[3] Wikipedia, Red pill and blue pill (2016)
[4] Peter Wright, A Voice for Choice (May 24, 2014)

A letter to a new student leader

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 29 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Greg Krikorian, a student from U of Maryland, reached out to share his upcoming activism project, and I had to share. It's important that everyone interested in equitable Title IX activism support him in his efforts as much as they did mine, if not more so.*

> Dear Sage,
>
> Hope all is well. My name is Greg Krikorian and I am a freshman at the University of Maryland. I really admire the work you have done and continue to do for boys and men. Some friends and I have started a group called Students Advocating for Students, and our goal is to fight against unfair and biased Title IX procedures as well as other civil liberties for students. Rather than having individual groups at campuses, we intend to be a movement encompassing thousands of students across the country. We are currently in the process of drafting letters to school administration at Tufts University (my friends college) and University of Maryland. In these letters we highlight everything wrong the disciplinary system biased against young men. We are not demanding change, but requesting opportunity to meet with the administration so there can be a more open dialogue on the subject and hopefully a more fair system can be enacted in the long run. I was wondering if you had any advice to offer regarding dealing with administration and building a large following of people. Our website is http://www.sa4s.org/ if you have any interest in checking it out. Any help would be greatly appreciated, I was personally affected by this unjust system and want to do as much as I can so others don't have the same fate.
>
> Best,
>
> Greg Krikorian

Hi Greg,

Thank you for your patience, and I'm proud to hear that you are leading an effort to help students know their rights. I am confident that your effort will go far!

You asked for advice regarding speaking with administrators and building a large following of people.

I'll start with the latter since there's a shorter answer: Follow Anil Kumar's example by building a positive, low-pressure community with a focus on mentoring, building friendships and advocating for personal growth. If you care about your members, they will want to be around you. Anil observed that passionate activism, while necessary in many cases, is exhausting. Protests and other organized efforts are valuable, but in his words, a community needs to "bide its time," striking only at key moments.

I point to Anil because you are targeting a national audience. My experience targeted a small area, so I had different tactics for building a following. Since students are under pressure to graduate and move on, I adopted a more aggressive model that won't suit a broader vision, but may help your ground troops assigned to a campus should they emerge.

As for talking to decision makers: Accept now that no one has to listen to you.

Every problem you point out is work. No one wants to do work.

Any letter, email or voicemail you send is one among literally hundreds, if not thousands of grievances, commendations, and ramblings that altogether make up someone's day. Even if a provost or president actually hears your plea in the noise, administrators don't have the powers of intervention that students often assume that they do.

I had to learn this the hard way when challenging a self-defense course at Kennesaw State U. Months of ignored emails led me to escalate my dispute to the University Relations office. I learned there that the course director was simply waiting for me to graduate or finish the semester. And why not? Just because I know the right thing to do doesn't mean someone has to do it.

Put yourself in the shoes of a dean of students, which is a possible contact for you: You sit down and open your inbox. 395 messages since you clocked out yesterday. What goes through your mind? Okay, fire drill reminder for the Fark N. Moosedick science building. Oh, right. Gotta speak at that thing. Shit, budget advisory committee meeting at 1. Where was that agenda? Knock at the door. No, Jess, you need to make an appointment to see me. No, I can't adjust your schedule, see your adviser. Mary is trying to seduce Dr. Hooknose for that 'A' again. Yeesh. And, of course. The DOE has more hoops for us, so round table for us at 6 PM. Figures. Wait, Neil Tyson is guest speaking and they need me to ask prescribed questions?!

And so it goes.

Out of that whirlwind, how would you respond to someone coming up complaining about how the university affects fifty percent of the student population? Even if it were said in the nicest way possible, you would gleefully grin and say in the most politically prudent, liability-dodging way that you will roll up your sleeves, take a deep breath, and jump right on letting this not be your problem thank you very much.

But there is hope. You are just faced with the challenge of making the issue bigger than yourself, and getting students passionately invested in the welfare of men and boys. The more students are willing to come to your events and voice their concerns with you, the more pressure they can place as a community on student government, unions, department heads and so on. Once you have that passion, you can leverage voices into building a better community. You get people to stand with you by giving a shit about them and being generally awesome company. That's more than what the system offers anyway, right?

The way you get that to decision makers? Most administrators are trained to be neutral and cannot take a political position without risking serious trouble. Give them an "out" from the work and the controversy while making all the good stuff (and ONLY the good stuff) sound like their idea. It might not make them do much, but it will make them want to nurture your passion and growth using their limited power. More often than not, being approachable and understanding a la Columbo causes them to fill you in on valuable information about the workings of a school that gives you an idea of your next moves.

Stick to the most non-controversial presentation of your subject matter. Study negotiation, sales, and rhetoric. Know your rights, policies, and perks of your position. Remember that most people think emotionally, and speak to the value you bring more than the wrongs wrought by others. Say you want to help the suicidal find better counseling or flesh out local food pantries. Ask them where to find people and if they are willing to make a statement to a better community. But most importantly, make sure YOU are in charge of those efforts, and when you execute them, make sure men benefit as much as women do. Offer the equitable services that no one really finds. Prove your way is better, document the ever-loving shit out of everything, and then work your way up to a VP or Provost to talk about starting programs in collaboration with a student organization or non-profit that you control or influence. Find the Title IX coordinators, ombudsmen, university counsels and all the other little worker bees that control parts of policy and keep them accountable to their jobs.

Eventually, things will start looking better. Even if only a little bit. Even if only in one place.

A better system comes from constant work that brings incremental changes. Revolutions don't happen overnight. Learn to work with defective systems, the lazy and the hopeless, because that is the hallmark of a skilled activist and leader.

I hope that this helps you, and I am excited to hear more about your ventures. Keep me posted.

 Name reprinted with written permission.*

Robert Wasnick MD, of Stony Brook Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 5 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Robert Wasnick MD of Stony Brook (NY) Children's Hospital has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He's part of the supposedly illustrious and cutting-edge (pun intended) medical establishment at Stony Brook Medicine, which is affiliated with Stony Brook University where the HeForShe UN Women's director recently lapsed into the 19th century, saying condoms are "not the answer," advocating circumcision to combat HIV. Dr. Wasnick is listed as a specialist at the Department of Pediatric Urology at the Stony Brook Children's Hospital website.

From the website:

"Overview

Part of Stony Brook's renowned Department of Urology, the Department of Pediatric Urology at Stony Brook Children's Hospital provides highly specialized care for children with acquired and congenital urologic conditions. As a regional leader, Stony Brook is the only hospital in Suffolk County to offer advanced pediatric urologic procedures such as hypospadias repair surgery, complex reconstructivesurgery, and minimally invasive robotic surgery. It also provides treatment and management for more common urologic conditions including enuresis (bedwetting), voiding dysfunction, hernias, circumcision and undescended testes."

What doesn't belong in the first paragraph above? After "repair" and "reconstructivesurgery," we read about "treatment and management" for "urologic conditions" that include "bedwetting, voiding dysfunction, hernias, undescended testes," and "circumcision." How is the foreskin of a normal, healthy baby any more a condition to be fixed anymore than a baby girls genitals?

Further on we read:

> Our Team
>
> The Pediatric Urology team includes fellowship-trained pediatric urology subspecialists, Robert Wasnick, MD, Chief of Pediatric Urology, and Ezekiel Young, MD. Dr. Wasnick has been named a Best Doctor in New York by Castle Connolly for many years. He was the first board-certified pediatric urologist in Suffolk County and, now along with Dr. Young, they continue to be the only pediatric urologists in Suffolk County.
>
> Robert Wasnick, MD
> Ezekiel Young, MD

Clicking on Dr. Wasnick's name links us to his personal information, which follows:

> Specialty:
> Urology-Pediatric
> Board Certification(s):
> Urology
> Urology (CSQ: Pediatric)
>
> Personal Statement:
> The very idea of an infant undergoing surgery may represent an intimidating prospect for any parent, be the surgery simple or complex. It is especially gratifying to be the recipient of their trust and the beneficiary of their appreciation. The well being of their children is our highest priority.
>
> Medical Conditions / Treatments:
> Accept Children
> Bedwetting
> Circumcision
> Enuresis
> Hernia
> Hydronephrosis
> Hypospadias
> Pediatric Surgery
> Pediatric Urology
> Undescended Testicle – Surgery
> Urology
> Vesico – Ureteral
>
> Education:
> Medical School, Jefferson Medical College
> Residency, Kings County Hospital Center, Urology
> Residency, St. Vincent's Hosp. Med. Ctr. of NY, Surgery > Fellowship, Alder Hey Childrens Hospital, Pediatric Urology

As the doctor states, surgery on an infant is intimidating for a parent because it comes with special risks. Any loss of blood is more serious than with adults as the infant has little to lose, sometimes resulting in death. The intricate nature of surgery on a tiny penis is also risky as many have too much or too little removed (needing further surgery), as well as entire organs being amputated. All these risks borne by an unconsenting infant for unnecessary surgery – but authorized by others – is illegal and immoral, especially for medical professionals whose motto is to "First, do no harm." It's obvious the well being of children is NOT his "highest priority."

More from the website:

> Surgery
>
> Whenever possible, Stony Brook Children's uses the most minimally invasive surgical techniques available, which help to promote faster recovery, shorter length of stay, and less trauma to the affected area. Some of the urologic surgical procedures available at Stony Brook include:
>
> Hypospadias repair. A reconstructive outpatient surgery typically performed on infants at six months to one year to correct a congenital abnormality of the penile opening. Stony Brook Children's is the only hospital in Suffolk County to perform this highly specialized procedure, with volumes as high as 40 to 50 a year.
> Robot-assisted surgery. This state-of-the-art minimally invasive treatment can address obstructed kidneys or obstructive uropathy. It also can be used in procedures such as robotic pyeloplasty and robotic ureteral reimplantation.
> Highly specialized emergency procedures such as surgery for acute torsion of the spermatic cord (twisted > testicles).

> Repair of hydroceles, a common condition in male infants in which a fluid filled sac surrounds the testicles causes scrotal swelling.
> Hernia repair.
> Circumcision or circumcision revision, in particular in infants or newly adopted children.
> Repair of antenatal congenital fetal abnormalities (obstructive uropathy), such as congenital uretero-pelvic junction obstruction, primary obstructive megaloureter, vesicoureteral reflux, and posterior urethral valves.
> Repair of complex genitourinary anomalies.

Despite the claim, this hospital chooses to use risky, unnecessary and invasive surgery on infants unable to consent. This is most likely illegal, despite it's widespread practice in the U.S.

As mentioned before, the glaring inconsistency of the above listing of surgeries performed is the inclusion of circumcision which doesn't cure any disease or treat any condition.

> Patient Resources Coming soon.

No information about the risks or necessity of any of these surgeries? Why not?

> Advances and Recognitions
>
> The Department of Pediatric Urology is fully accredited. Its chief, Dr. Robert Wasnick, is the first physician in Suffolk County to be board-certified in Pediatric Urology. He has also been named a Best Doctor in New York by Castle Connolly.

Too bad supposedly good medical professionals don't recognize how unethical routine circumcision is; they should ask themselves if female genital mutilation is wrong and why that is.

See me confront the UN Women's Director at Stony Brook University about the genital mutilation done by these Stony Brook University Affiliates.

Since Dr. Wasnick has NO information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Intactivism Bonus: Walden's Pond interview w/Georganne Chapin on WBAI Radio – May 3, 2009

Dr. Wasnick's practice information follows:

Stony Brook Life Care Center
225 West Montauk Highway
Hampton Bays NY 11946
P: (631) 723-5000
F: (631) 723-5010

Stony Brook Primary Care Ctr.
450 Waverly Ave
Patchogue NY 11772
P: (631) 444-6300
F: (631) 444-6327

Stony Brook Technology Park
24 Research Way, Suite 500
East Setauket NY 11733
P: (631) 444-6270

F: (631) 444-7620

> Robert Wasnick MD, of Stony Brook Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/BxwWpF11DX #MGM #circumcision @andreahardie pic.twitter.com/CyR0nmyhfi
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) October 5, 2016

Feminism and the disposable male

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 6 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to those of you new to what we do here. Although most in the Men's Human Rights Movement believe that feminism alone is not responsible for all the problems men and boys face in our society, of you want a good starting point on understanding why feminism is frequently criticized, this classic essay will help explain it to you. It's one of AVfM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan's most famous works. –Eds.

This article is also available in Romanian.

Not too long ago I had it out with a feminist who had come into a male-safe space from a feminist blog just to scoff at the idea of male disposability. She basically said that the entire concept was a myth, that men's lived experiences were completely wrong, and that they were just a bunch of whiners who were complaining over nothing.

That got me thinking about the concept of male disposability and how that interacts with the feminist movement. Male disposability has been around since the dawn of time, and it's based on one very very straightforward dynamic: when it comes to the well-being of others, women come first, men come last. This is just the way it has always been. Seats in lifeboats, being rescued from burning buildings, who gets to eat: really, society places men dead last every time, and, society expects men to place themselves dead last every time.

Humans have always had a dynamic of "women and children first" and that has not changed at all. The 93% workplace death gap has to be evidence of this, if only because there's nobody with any kind of importance or power who's interested in changing it at all. In fact I remember reading an article in a British Columbia paper not long ago that described the increasing proportion of female injuries on the job as a huge problem, and the insane thing was the change reflected a decrease in male injuries rather than an increase in female ones. Men's injuries on the job had gone down because the economic downturn had put so many men out of work in the resource sector that there just weren't as many trees or pieces of heavy equipment falling on men as there had been before. And yet, this was framed as a huge problem for women that required immediate action to solve. It's like if men aren't dying at work that 20 times the rate that women are, we must be doing something wrong as a society.

Back when we were still living in caves that attitude was necessary for human survival. Nature is a really harsh mistress, especially when you think of all the animals that never get to die of old age. Things were a lot different for humans through most of our history on this planet than they are now. Life was dangerous, human settlements were small, isolated from each other, and one big disaster that took out a lot of women pretty much meant the end of the entire shebang for that group of people. So really, the level of importance that a human settlement placed on the well-being of women and children reflected almost always how successful that settlement was. And that can be expanded to encompass entire societies.

I keep hearing from the feminist camp that femaleness has always been undervalued by society and that maleness is preferred. But I've always contended that it's the exact opposite: the feminine is intrinsically and individually valuable, simply because females are the limited factor in reproduction. When it comes to producing babies, every woman counts, whereas biologically one very happy man could probably do the work of hundreds in that regard. So the level of instinctive importance we humans place on the safety and provisioning of women and their children is one of the main reasons why we've been able to be so successful that we've come to dominate this planet.

While I will concede that this drive to keep women safe from all harm has often resulted in extreme limits being placed on women's mobility, their agency, their power of decision to direct their own lives, all through history and many cultures, and in many cultures even today, I think it's telling that those cultures tend to be the most backward. When you consider the restrictions placed on women in places like Afghanistan, and then you consider that if we "bombed them into the stone age" it might be progress, I think you could conclude that the most successful societies had a good balance between allowing women freedom and the ability to choose and direct their own paths in life, and the need to protect them and provide for them.

However, feminists will insist that these kinds of restrictions being placed on women in those kinds of societies are the ultimate form of objectification. You lock up your possessions to make sure they will never be lost or stolen or harmed. Honestly, if I were a guy on a battlefield I might appreciate being objectified in that way. I think if I was going to be an object, I'd rather be a sexual one or somebody's prized possession than an object that can simply be thrown in the trash or smashed into pieces in the service of somebody else's purpose.

Feminists also have a very simplistic idea that our willingness to absolve women of their crimes, slap them on the wrist, spare them punishment, comes from a deep disrespect society has for women's person-hood—not seeing them as full human beings capable of looking after themselves, that we see them as children who don't know any better. And while there are parallels there in our desire to protect both women and children from not only their own poor decisions but the full consequences of their shitty behavior, it's really not as simple as they try to make it out to be.

Seriously, even today—even today in 2011!–we fully expect that if it comes down to a man and a woman in a burning building and you can only save one, the expectation is that you choose the woman every single time. So honestly, whose humanity are we placing above whose here? We're not talking about going to work, we're not talking about getting an education, we're not talking about freedom to decide what you want to be in life. We're not talking about getting to take Tae Kwon Do. We're talking seats in lifeboats here. The person in the lifeboat is going to survive, no matter how capable or incapable they are of managing their own life, and the person going down with the ship is going to die, no mater how independent, self-sufficient and awesome he is. That's the equation: one life, more valuable than another, and the woman wins every time.

So honestly, is there any argument, anywhere, that women's humanity has always been held in higher regard by society than men's? To be important to society, a woman merely has to be; a man has to do in order for his life to have any meaning to anyone other than himself. I think it was ManWomanMyth who said our society reduces men from human beings to human doings. I really think that's an apt analogy. We measure a man's worthiness to wear the title of "man" and therefore the title of "human," through how useful he is, either to society or to women, and one of the most useful things a man can do even now in the eyes of society is to put women and children before himself.

While I think there is plenty of argument that this attitude is at least partly innate—the way most survival traits are, even collective ones—if it starts in the chromosomes we really do everything we can as a society to reinforce this dynamic. Studies have shown that even though baby boys tend to cry and fuss more than baby girls, parents are quicker to attend to or console a baby girl than they are a baby boy. Even just the level of acceptance of infant male circumcision in our culture, when female genital mutilation was banned pretty much the first afternoon we all heard it existed, really says a lot about the differing expectations we have for males and females. Speaking as a mother, the last thing I would ever have wanted was to hear my child cry, especially when they're at an age when they're completely helpless, completely at the mercy of outside forces, and utterly dependent on the adults in their lives for every last thing, and yet even knowing how painful that cut is, we expect baby boys only days old to just suck that up.

Just think about what these very first interactions and experiences, these differences in how we nurture our babies depending on what gender they are, what this teaches them: What do we teach baby girls when we attend to their crying so quickly? We teach them to ask for help because their needs are important. We teach them to let us know when they're afraid or in pain because it's important for us to know when they're sick or in danger or hurt, so we can do something about it. We teach them that when they're sad or lonely to summon comfort and comfort will be there. We teach them that they're important. Their needs and well-being, both emotional and physical, are important just because.

And what are we teaching baby boys when we leave them to cry? We teach them that there's not much point in seeking help because it will be grudgingly given if at all We teach them that they should become self-contained in their ability to deal with emotions like fear, helplessness, loneliness, sadness, pain, distress: we teach them stoicism.

We teach them to suck it up. We teach them that their fear and their pain are things that are best ignored. We teach them that their emotional and physical well-being are just not as important as other things.

Given all that, is it any wonder it's like pulling teeth to get a man to go to the doctor when he's sick?

What we're teaching that baby boy is all the things a man needs to know and feel and believe about himself if he's going to stand in front of a cabin with a rifle while his wife and kids hide inside. We're preparing him for the day he has to fix a bayonet to a rifle and charge a hill under enemy fire, and we're preparing him to make a decision to resign himself to an icy fate while women and children escape in the lifeboats. We are teaching him to internalize his own disposability.

And baby girls? By attending to her crying so quickly, by letting her know that she's inherently important to us, we're preparing her for the day she has to think of her own safety first, even if it means the man she loves is left standing alone with a rifle in front of a cabin. We're preparing her to take that seat in the lifeboat. We're training her to not allow guilt or empathy or acknowledgment of a man's humanity, or any sense that he might deserve it more, to convince her give her seat to him. Because for millenia, the human species absolutely depended on her feeling 100% entitled to that seat.

And that brings me to feminism. You know, the patriarchy smashers? Those righteous avengers of equality? Dogged dismantlers of every single gender role? What exactly is feminism doing to dismantle this traditional role of the disposable male?

Feminism's greatest victories have only reinforced in everyone that society still owes women provision, protection, help and support just because they're women. In its collective dismissal and abandonment of male victims of domestic violence, it only reinforces in men that it's pointless to ask for help, because men's needs are of no relevance, and their fear and pain don't mean anything to anyone. Feminism teaches us to put women's need at the forefront of every single issue, political or social. Whether that issue is domestic violence law, sexual assault law, institutional sexism, social safety net, education funding, homeless shelters, government funding for shovel-ready jobs—jobs that didn't stay shovel-ready once women got wind of them.

Everywhere you look—everywhere you look!–there are feminists pushing their way to the front of the line demanding women's "fair share" of all of the goodies, the good stuff, the loot, the booty, the cookies. Even if women don't need it. Even if women don't deserve it. And even if somebody else needs it and deserves it more.

And they get it, because we give it to them.

Feminism has done nothing but exploit this dynamic of the expectation on men to put everybody else before themselves. Especially women. Women's safety and support, women's well-being, and women's emotional needs, always come first. This is the most stunning piece of society-wide manipulative psychology I think I have ever come across. Feminism has been down with old-school chivalry right from the start. They might seem like strange bedfellows, but they're not. Because both concepts are built on a firm foundation of female self-interest.

We made our way as humans through a really harsh history and we became the dominant force on this planet. One of the reasons we were so successful is because we have consistently put women's basic needs first. Their need for safety, support, and provision. It was in humanity's best interest for women to be essentially self-interested, and for men to be essentially self-sacrificing. But we don't need that dynamic anymore. Our species is in no danger of extinction. We're 7 billion people clogging up the works here!

What's the worst that could happen if we all just collectively decided that men were no more disposable than women, and women were no more valuable than men? In fact the greatest danger I see to us right now is that in our desperation to bend over and give women everything they want and everything they say they need, we've unbalanced society to the point where we're in danger of seriously toppling over.

And really? The only difference I see between the traditional role and the new one for men with respect to disposability is that maleness, manhood: it used to be celebrated, it used to be admired, and it used to be rewarded, because it was really necessary, and because the personal cost of it to individual men was so incredibly high.

But now? Now, we still expect men to put women first, and we still expect society to put women first, and we still expect men to not complain about coming in dead last every damn time. But men don't even get our admiration anymore. All they get in return is to hear about what assholes they are. Is there any wonder why they're starting to get pissed off?

–Karen (AKA Girl Writes What)

An Introduction to the Men's Rights Movement

Robert Brockway · 6 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: No doubt the material in this article is familiar to most readers here. MRAs and those friendly to the MRM are encouraged to publicise this article as a straight forward explanation of our movement to counter so many lies told about us. Even if people don't want to believe the truth, they can't claim we didn't try to put our case in plain terms. The featured image shows Indian MRAs photographed in 2013.

This articles is also available in Spanish.

The Men's Rights Movement (MRM) also sometimes known as the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is a pluralistic movement of men and women who have identified certain problems facing men and boys. It is comprised of many organisations and individuals that are loosely affiliated. Despite this, participants within the MRM maintain a largely consistent position on men's rights. The movement accepts robust and frank internal discussions, which are generally conducted in public. Individuals within the MRM are sometimes known as Men's Rights Activists or Men's Rights Advocates (MRAs). While the MRM has existed for a long time, it is only in recent years that it has been growing rapidly and receiving significant media attention.

The movement started to significantly increase in membership around 2010. The MRM has many detractors. Some who want to discredit the MRM claim it is a violent movement. This could not be further from the truth. The MRM goes out of its way to be non-violent. The most popular online sites within the movement such as A Voice for Men and the MensRights sub on Reddit actively censure and ban people who make threats of violence or advocate violence.

The MRM is a movement concerned about problems facing men and boys and focuses on bringing attention to the problems in the wider community as well as discussing ways to alleviate and resolve these problems. This article mainly focuses on western countries, where the MRM has its roots, but we want to help men and boys all around the world. Many of the issues we advocate for, such as father's rights, have organisations focussed on that issue only. We advocate on a variety of issues and support certain societal changes.

Despite what many outside of the movement think this is not just a movement for men and is ethnically and culturally diverse. Many women participate in the MRM and often seem to be among the movement's most active contributors. The movement is pluralistic and inclusive. The MRM includes many gay and transgender men and women.

Participants in the movement come from across the political spectrum. They are united in their recognition of the problems facing men and boys and agree that these problems need to be addressed. Anyone who broadly agrees with the aims of the movement is welcome to participate.

We reject many of the claims espoused by leaders in the modern feminist movement, such as that women cannot be sexist to men, a belief that men have systematically oppressed women for thousands of years through the use of violence or that domestic violence impacts women far more than men.

The MRM and its participants are routinely subjected to vitriolic attacks and derision by feminists and others. Feminists routinely try to shut down public talks held on MRM topics. Sometimes they have succeeded as a result of local authorities declining to enforce the law in the face of feminist aggression. The MRM rejects such attempts at silencing others. While we may disagree with, and even object to, much of feminist ideology we would never seek to silence feminists. We acknowledge that women and girls face gender-specific issues. This is particularly true for women and girls who live in the developing world.

Many of the men who have entered the movement until now have been personally affected by one or more of these problems. They might be, for example, men who have been dealt with unjustly by the family law courts in their country. After experiencing this they may become aware that their treatment by the courts was common and from there became aware of the broader MRM. Young men may experience discrimination in their high school or university on the basis of their gender and from this may become aware of the broader movement. Increasingly people who have not been personally affected by these problems are recognising a broader problem in society and are stepping up to make a difference.

The movement is notable for being task focused and not subscribing to an ideology or dogma. Although there is no one definitive list of the issues that the MRM is addressing there is broad agreement on a core set of issues. Most activists within the movement have certain areas that they focus on.

Many people look at the top of society, to leaders in politics, business and the military and see men. They conclude, erroneously, that men rule the world. While some men dominate society it is not true that men generally dominate society. This is an example of the apex fallacy – looking at the most successful members of a group and judging the group by that standard. What these people miss is that men also "dominate" at the bottom of society: men are the majority of the homeless and those who do the dirty, dangerous and difficult jobs that society relies upon.

The MRM is often associated, incorrectly, with other movements. Sometimes this would be a genuine mistake but sometimes this is done to attempt to discredit the MRM. Many people have agreed on the problems facing men and boys but have disagreed on the way to respond to these problems. Various movements with names like Redpillers and Pick Up Artists (PUA) have appeared. The name of the former movement occurs because when a person recognises the problems facing men and boys, regardless of their subsequent response to that, they are sometimes said to have taken the red pill. The name of the latter movement should be obvious and generally revolves around young men manipulating the situation to their own benefit rather than attempting to fix the underlying problems. Participants in these movements do not generally call themselves men's rights activists as they understand what the MRM is and they do not agree with our attempts to address the problems facing men and boys. They can even be quite hostile to the MRM. It is interesting that many of the worst allegations made against the MRM are actually a result of things attributed to the MRM that are said by people who do not identify with the MRM.

One movement, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), involves men who disengage to varying degrees from a society that is hostile to them. In general, MGTOWs avoid marriage and conventional relationships with women due to the significant financial and legal risks this entails for men today. MGTOWs often work only as much as they need to to survive, thus legally reducing the tax they pay and reducing the support they provide to a system that is hostile to them. MGTOW is the only other movement that has significant overlap with the MRM. Some MGTOWs will simultaneously disengage from society but will still work to fix the problems in society. It is notable that Japan has had a similar movement for decades with heterosexual Japanese men (known in Japan as herbivore men) explicitly deciding to avoid romantic or sexual relationships with women due to the high social and economic costs. This is one of the major contributors to the plummeting birth rate in Japan.

While it may be true that men's rights advocacy was perhaps initially more popular among the socially or politically conservative this has long since ceased to be the case. The MRM has participants from across the political spectrum and is in itself an apolitical movement. MRAs are not traditionalists. We are not advocating for a return to the gender roles seen in the past. We want everyone to have a fair playing field on which they live their lives free from traditional gendered obligations.

A selection of issues important to the MRM are presented here.

Bodily Autonomy

Female genital mutilation is now illegal in many countries, and international organisations work to reduce this practice. These same societies often refuse to grant boys the same bodily autonomy that they grant girls – the right to be protected from unnecessary medical procedures. The men's rights movement objects to male genital mutilation (also known as circumcision) on the same grounds as female genital mutilation. Both violate the human rights of the person being mutilated and both should be illegal. In many countries today all people have protection from unnecessary medical procedures except for infant boys. That the foreskin is removed in most cases without anaesthetic exacerbates the problem.

Many do not know that the foreskins of infant boys are not destroyed as medical waste but are rather put to a variety of uses. While it is true a few are used for medical research the majority go to cosmetic companies. In some countries the sale of foreskin by hospitals is a lucrative business.

Disposability

All societies consider men to be disposable. Men face conscription into the military and can be forced into combat against their will. Men overwhelmingly take on the dangerous jobs in society. In general men are expected to be prepared to give up their lives for the good of the community and, specifically, to protect the lives of women. This is so ingrained that few people, men or women, recognise it. Fewer still object to it.

The MRM rejects male disposability in the modern world. While it may have made sense for a society in the past to be prepared to sacrifice it's men for the survival of the society, the MRM holds that this is no longer necessary. With a population exceeding seven billion that might reach 10 or 11 billion in a few decades, we no longer need the ability to quickly recover numbers and so the original reasons for male disposability no longer apply.

Domestic Violence

Men constitute between one-third and one-half of all victims of domestic violence. A similar proportion of domestic violence aggressors are women. In about half of all cases each partner is both a perpetrator and a victim of domestic violence. The notion that domestic violence is a gendered issue is simply not supported by the evidence. We object to all domestic violence regardless of the genders of the people involved. While women's shelters receive government funding in many countries, very few men's shelters exist.

Unnecessary Medication

Children, and boys in particular, are being diagnosed with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) and drugged at an alarming rate. This rate has been increasing rapidly in recent years, which is prompting an increase in the sales of drugs to treat the condition. In the United States, for example, sales of ADHD drugs have increased by 89% in four years. This should be of great concern to parents who have received a diagnoses for ADHD for their child and a recommendation to medicate. The long-term consequences of ADHD medication on a forming brain are not yet known.

The MRM is concerned that the normal behaviour of many young boys is being considered abnormal and thus, unnecessarily medicated.

This is not to say that all diagnosis for this condition are invalid, but when the diagnosis rate is changing as rapidly as is currently occurring more needs to be done than simply prescribing more drugs.

Education

The performance of boys in education systems has been declining for decades. Up until the mid 1980's boys tended to consistently perform better in primary and high school than girls. Educators set out to change this and improve the results for girls. The problem is that this was achieved at the expense of boys and continued well after it was clear that boys were falling significantly behind, not only in comparison to their female peers but even in comparison to male students of the past.

For example, education research clearly shows that boys tend to do better in exam assessment and girls tend to do better in in-class assessment. Relative performance in male and female students can be tracked with changing assessment. There has been a clear move away from exams and towards in-class assessment in the last few decades. One notable exception was a recent reversal of this trend in the UK. As expected the performance of boys in the UK improved with the increase in exam assessment.

Increasingly students have less and less time to burn off energy and are expected to sit quietly in the classroom for hours at a time. This is sometimes characterised as the incredible shrinking lunchtime. While this is probably affecting many students negatively the evidence suggests this is generally more of a problem for boys. It is interesting that this should be happening at a time when office workers are entreated to stand and move around more for their long-term health.

Alarmingly, research shows that in recent years teachers have been academically marking down students with alleged behavioural problems and this has overwhelmingly impacted boys.

The MRM objects to significant gender biases in primary and high school education systems and seeks to reform the system in to one in which both boys and girls can benefit.

The problems don't end there. Men have been abandoning the dream of a university education in droves, partly because many university campuses have become very hostile for men.

In many US universities, if a man is accused of sexual assault against a woman:

- He is not allowed legal counsel,
- He is not allowed to know the details of the allegation,
- He is not allowed to know the name of his accuser,
- He has the burden of proof placed on him,
- His opportunity to mount a defense is restricted,
- His right to due process of law is curtailed.

It is not surprising that the bulk of such accusations result in the male student being expelled or banned from campus, which generally results in his failing courses even when there was little evidence against him and he is subsequently cleared by the criminal justice system.

In most western countries men now constitute less than 40% of university enrolments. While increasing the female participation rates in certain STEM fields is actively promoted there is little interest in addressing the falling university participation rates among men.

Father's Rights

The family court system in many countries is heavily biased in favour of mothers. In many countries courts still show a strong preference for granting custody to mothers over fathers. Non-custodial fathers often find themselves with very limited access to their children and routinely find that breaches of court orders by mothers (such as not allowing visits in accordance with court orders) are ignored or receive only a token response from authorities. Many men fight in court for years to get reasonable access to their children, only to give up in despair when they are unable to continue funding court battles and they realise the system has failed them.

Health

Males have higher mortality rates at every age. The difference in life expectancy for men and women actually widened during most of the 20th century, peaking in the 1990s. One significant contributor to this is the far greater amount spent on women's health than men's health. In fact most countries spend several times as much money on women's health as they do on men's health.

State Discrimination

Even when the evidence against men and women and prior criminal histories are the same men are more likely to be arrested for an offence, more likely to be charged with an offence, more likely to be convicted of an offence, more likely to receive a custodial sentence, and the sentence will on average be significantly longer. Some states openly advocate on this basis. A UK government commission recently advocated the abolition of all women's prisons. One of the advantages, they argued, was that these prisons could then be used to incarcerate more men.

Laws that are written in a gender neutral way are often not applied that way, and this is most often is to the detriment of men.

In Canada there is a special statute for a woman who kills her own newborn, and this statute limits the sentence to five years imprisonment. A major children's charity in Canada opposes this, arguing that Canadian law already has sufficient provisions to deal with mental illness and a newborn should have the same right to protection from violence as any other member of the community.

Reproductive Rights

Today men actually lack reproductive rights. Unlike women, in many western countries, men cannot choose not to be a father. In the United States there have been many cases in which a boy has been raped by an adult woman. The boy was not legally able to consent to the sexual activity and yet when the woman became pregnant the boy was required to pay child support (including back payments) on reaching the age of 18.

Many men have been ordered by courts to continue supporting a child that is not theirs, even after they present conclusive evidence (such as the results of a DNA test) showing that they are not the biological father of the child, and in some cases had no relationship with the child at all.

Suicide

Men and boys have suicide rates several times higher than women and girls. Male suicide rates have grown at a far faster rate than female suicide rates over the last century. While the high rates of suicide among men has gained recognition within the last few years there is still a long way to go in addressing this serious problem.

Vilification

We live in a society that routinely vilifies masculinity. The TV formula so often seen in sitcoms of a stupid or inept (but often well-meaning) man married to a super-woman who can solve all of his problems for him by the end of the episode is so common it is a cliché. The mass media is full of negative portrayals of men. The news media is constantly telling us about negative aspects of masculinity. This has led to a general perception of men as people to be feared and suspected.

This had led many airlines to maintain a policy of never seating unaccompanied minors next to men. The implicit assumption here seems to be that the men cannot be trusted next to a child. Many men report feeling uneasy around children, fearful that they will be accused of some terrible act. This is a major cause of men avoiding certain industries, such as childcare and teaching.

A series of t-shirts and other products produced in the United States a few years ago suggested Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them. The manufacturers took no regard for the impact their products would have on young minds.

A very concerning problem relates to the distribution of food following disasters. Many relief agencies believe that if food is given to men they will keep it for themselves rather than provide food to their relatives and children. The world's largest humanitarian organisation, the World Food Programme, which is part of the United Nations, excludes men from food distribution centres on the basis of gender alone. Many other organisations that distribute food following disasters do this also. Men and boys may not enter the food distribution centres. Women are permitted to enter and are then expected to distribute the food to their relatives. These organisations claim that special provision is made for families with no female members but they are light on details. It seems unlikely that in the hectic environment of a food distribution centre that the staff would have time to properly investigate the claims of men and boys that they have no women in their family. There is anecdotal evidence to suggest these men and boys are simply excluded from the food distribution.

Violence

Men experience high levels of violence in society and there is very little recognition of this. Men are close to twice as likely to experience violence as women, even though it is women (we are so often told) who need to be fearful walking alone at night. Despite popular perception, men are raped almost as often as women. In the US more men are raped in prison then all women in society.

Female-on-male violence is an often ignored problem. Some women, having been taught that violence is gendered, simultaneously object to violence against women but feel that violence against men is inconsequential. One often repeated myth is that a woman cannot physically harm a man. The many men injured and killed by women are a testament to the erroneous nature of this belief.

Society and the government both ignore and marginalise male victims of violence.

Men’s lives vs. feminist narratives explained using magnets

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 6 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Every era has had its mythology of women’s weakness and men’s strength. Ours is no different and it’s not progressive. How easy is it for you to see Jill as a victim? How hard is it for you to see Jack as vulnerable?

Full Text of video
Sources

The psychology of hate

Paul Elam · 7 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Years back, in another life, I presented at seminars and conferences that provided continuing education units for professional re-certification. In one particular module, I used a portable grease board in a room in front of my waiting audience. Without introducing myself or saying anything else, I used a grease pen to write the words "Men are…" at the top of the board, and then silently invited the audience to finish the sentence.

Almost invariably, "pigs" or "dogs" was the first offering, accompanied by a room full of good-natured chuckles. I would nod my head and write it down on the board and return to the audience, still silent, for more.

"Controlling," says one. "Afraid of commitment," says another. "Aggressive." "Macho" "Afraid of intimacy." "Violent." "Sexist," and "Power hungry." More of the pejoratives, and almost only pejoratives, would come from the audience till the board was full.

I then flipped the board to the other side. "Women are…" was the cue, and the answers were even more rapid fire than they were with men. "Strong." "Capable" "Empowered" "Sensitive." "Nurturing," and the like would fly from the audience to the grease board like a barrage of arrows, till that side too was full.

"What do you imagine," I would ask, taking a strategic pause for a sip of water, "that these answers tell us about the real nature of sexism in the way we view men and women?"

Asking them a question with actual spoken words must of thrown them for a loop, because the stock response to that question was almost invariably a room full of nonplussed, cognitively dissonant faces. And that confusion usually gave way to irritation, clearly at me, though every answer on both sides of that board had come from them. And by the way, the participants in the crowd? They weren't accountants or nurses or teachers or financial advisors.

They were mental health professionals.

They were counselors, psychotherapists, social workers and the like; the very people we love to imagine possess the objectivity to rise above the mindset of bigotry and sexism. And the people, despite our want of faith in their work, least likely to actually do it.

I wanted a little more pressure so I asked more questions. "How could this affect our therapeutic alliance with clients?- Could it make our relationships with females enabling?- Punitive with men?" And always, the final question I asked was "Do we carry sexism, against men, unconscious or conscious, into our work with each and every client?" With that question the anger usually intensified.

In one talk, a female participant, a social worker, jumped out of her chair and threw her papers everywhere.

"You're the sexist!" she hissed at me, and stormed out of the room. She later wrote letters of complaint both about my topic and the fact I would not sign off on her attendance.

Welcome to the wacky world of mental health.

It is a telling study in the psychology of hate. Indeed, as we peel back the layers of fantasy from the profession, we are forced into a most disturbing conclusion. Psychology is hate. At least as it is practiced in western culture.

It's most evident in the junk psychology market. Since the mid-eighties, get-rich-quick psychology gurus have often made their way to bestseller lists. Books like Robin Norwood's Women Who Love Too Much, Susan Forward's, Men Who Hate Women and the Women Who Love Them and others have been runaway hits, all predicated on rigid stereotypes of men who hate and women who love; all just more additions to the already crowded grease board.

Some time ago Karen Salmansohn appeared in a Fox News segment on women executives. She was given a nice plug for her new book, Bounce Back. They could have, and probably should have in the interest of balance, given her credit for her previous publication, How to Make Your Man Behave in 21 Days or Less Using the Secrets of Professional Dog Trainers. I don't make this stuff up. Unfortunately, I don't have to.

Currently, male bashing monarch Phil McGraw reigns in the ratings, and it won't be long before another emerges, fighting to be top dog in dogging men. All you need is a warped worldview and a nod from Oprah. And these are just the media hucksters. At least we can say that the men and women who embrace their misandry-for-profit schemes are just another dumbed-down group in a dumbed-down media culture.

The more culpable and dangerous are the ones with the air of legitimacy. These folks don't write, or don't just write. They teach, do research, and most dreadfully, hang out their shingles and help infect the world, one gullible client at a time.

The world of psychology in academics and practice has become a weapon in the realm of gender politics. Almost all pretense to objectivity and academic integrity has been forced aside by ideologues with an ax to grind against men and who are using the loathsome disguise of helping professionals to further their agenda. If you think that is extreme, read on.

Allaboutcounseling.com is purportedly an information and referral resource for people seeking mental health services. What it is in reality is a portal, a conduit that induces women into the mentality that it is the vile scourge of manhood at the root of their problems. And they offer feminism as the solution before the first session is booked.

Some tidbits from their site include some detailed hype about the fundamentals of feminism and some reassurances that not all feminists are lesbians. I suppose they figure heterosexual women need such basics. And it's good pre-sell to overcome objections before they are raised. Ask any used car salesman.

They even have a nifty section promoting a new masculinity. These people have the key to re-engineering men for the better, with the implication, of course, that the way men are now is defective and in need of an overhaul.

Part of that overhaul is a gag. This is just one of the standouts, as it appears word for word on the site.

Openness– To others (especially to women) criticism of our behaviors and attitudes, listen, listen some more, and only speak if the critic wants feedback.

This isn't even speak when spoken to. It is shut up and take it. Speak with permission only, from whichever woman is attacking you at the moment. Ah, the finer aspects of mental health.

They have much more there. Enough bogus stats on domestic violence, rape and sexual abuse for a N.O.W. convention, and staunch defenses of feminism tied in directly with the counseling message. Their ultimate point is clearly that sound mental health for women depends on embracing feminism, and with it the hatred for men. Sound advice for those seeking love and intimacy if I ever saw it.

At this point, the grease board is showing more grease than board.

I wish I could say that this was the bottom of the pit; that the infection stopped there, but we are still dealing more with the symptoms than the actual disease.

Enter the American Psychological Association, and it's Division 51 group The Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity. (SPSMM)

Here are two of the bullet points from their Mission Statement:

- Endeavors to erode constraining definitions of masculinity which have historically inhibited men's development, their capacity to form meaningful relationships, and have contributed to the oppression of other people.
- Acknowledges its historical debt to feminist-inspired scholarship, and commits itself to support groups such as women, gays, lesbians and people of color that have been uniquely oppressed by the gender/class/race system.

Aye, there's the rub, and with it goes the last remaining bit of room on the grease board. Men are defective, pernicious banes to civilized society, incapable even of healthy love and connection. Feminism, of course, the ideology that so maligns them, is the answer.

Even our most revered experts in human nature are saying as much.

And this is how it worked in the old Soviet Union. It is wise to consider that in the Solzhenitsyn era of gulags and iron fisted reaction to political dissent, that most of the dissidents were imprisoned in "mental health facilities," the logic being that if you disagreed with the state, there must be something wrong with your mind.

It was also a strategy of, and yes, I will say it without reservation, the Hitler regime, to poison the minds of the populace with disinformation about Jews, prepping the people to look the other way while they were dispatched in the name of a master race.

The plans for men may be less extreme and of longer duration, but it is happening nonetheless. Men are being marginalized year after year. Their numbers in college graduating classes are waning. 42% at last count. They have lost over 80% of the jobs in the current recession. They are dying by suicide and all other manners of death at rates that make women's lives look like vacations in Fiji.

It's hell having all this power. It is a wonder how we find time to oppress the world with it, much less twirl our moustaches and snicker while we do it.

But the anti-male hate machine keeps grinding away. SPSSM and others would no doubt classify the men's movement as a mass shared psychosis, and men's human rights activists individually as detrimental to society. In fact, it is already happening.

I used to remember that social worker who threw the tantrum in my class with a smile. It was a funny image. But that was some years ago. At the time, I knew the sexism was there, but it was not entrenched as deeply as it is today. And I naively thought it would go away.

I am not smiling about it any more.

See also:

- A New Psychology For Men
- Narrative Therapy with Men

A new psychology for men

Peter Wright · 7 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

First published in June 2015. – Eds.

Psychology clings to a universal model – that men are incorrigibly flawed and require a dismantling of their identities, habits, and preferences before being reconstructed according to a feminist model of masculinity. All modern therapies have this basic premise in common.

For example, one of the more popular models of men and masculinity to emerge in the last 20 years, promoted as A New Psychology of Men, is described in the following terms by one of its founders:

> The new psychology of men has emerged over the past 15 years within the larger fields of men's studies and gender studies. Informed by the academic breakthroughs of feminist scholarship, the new psychology of men examines masculinity not as a normative referent, but rather as a problematic construct. In so doing, it provides a framework for a psychological approach to men and masculinity that questions traditional norms of the male role and views some male problems as unfortunate byproducts of the male gender role socialization process.[1]

Since it's inception this "new" psychology of men has restated traditional gender stereotypes about men; that they are flawed, violent, emotional primitives in need of reconstruction. This supposedly "new" model has also been developed into a training course teaching therapists how to effectively work with men.

The course, designed by former American Psychological Association President Ronald Levant, is based on two principles held almost universally by therapists working with men; a) that patriarchy theory represents the real world, and b) that males are stunted in their emotional processing abilities. Let's look at these two pillars of therapy.

Patriarchy theory

As with most psychologists and therapists today, Levant is informed by feminist-inspired patriarchy theory which posits that all men have power over all women and that such power is enforced by men's violence. The theoretical vision, trumpets Levant, provides a "new" way of looking at men:

> What scholars in the area of men's psychology have attempted is nothing less than a reconstruction of masculinity. It starts from the recognition that there is a problem, and locates the roots of that problem in the male gender role… The new psychology of men strives to address the feminist critique of patriarchy while remaining empathetic to men.[2]

As many readers will know there is nothing "new" in this characterization of men, which we can summarize with the phrase, 'Women have problems, and men are the problem.' As Levant stresses, the primary approach to therapy with men is first to problematize them; "It starts from the recognition that there is a problem."

In this model men are viewed as being problems before they even meet the therapist, who ignores the possibility that men's problems may lie outside themselves in a world of grief they did nothing to deserve.

In other words, whatever the presenting complaints of the client they are immediately dismissed by the practitioner in order to coerce the client into an ideological mold of manhood. The practitioner, depending on their degree of indoctrination, may actually believe this will address the client's issues but even a cursory examination of the "masculinity as identified problem" approach reveals numerous, deep flaws. In fact, this approach proves to be abusive in any reasonable interpretation of the word.

As I explain below there are other approaches to working with men that don't presume they are flawed and need fixing. That approach begins with asking men what they experience in life, and what they might want to achieve in therapy, and actually listening to their answers. Therapists may be interested to hear men speak of a range of experiences and goals wholly unrelated to patriarchal domination of women and children.

Men as emotionally dumb

Referring to men as dumb has the double-meaning of both lacking in intelligence and being mute. This forms the basis of Levant's theory that men possess little emotional awareness about themselves or others, that they are lacking in emotional intelligence, and that even were they to discover some emotional awareness they would not know how to express it in words, such is the depth of male lacuna. He refers to this problem in men as alexithymia – a Greek term meaning no words for emotions, insisting that most North American males suffer from this syndrome.

Levant states that "it is so very widespread among men that I have called it normative male alexithymia,"[3] a syndrome that by definition only men and boys can be labelled with. There even exists a Normative Male Alexithymia Scale used to assess the depth of men's need for therapeutic correction. Levant states,

> One of the most far-reaching consequences of male gender-role socialization is the high incidence among men of… the inability to identify and describe one's feelings in words… men are often genuinely unaware of their emotions. Lacking this emotional awareness, when asked to identify their feelings, they tend to rely on their cognition to try to logically deduce how they should feel. They cannot do what is automatic for most women - simply sense inwardly, feel the feeling, and let the verbal description come to mind.[4]

This claim, that men are "unaware of their emotions," an assumption so typical of psychology's view of men, has been a cornerstone of the therapeutic world for the last 40 years. And it is demonstrably wrong.

According to the vast majority of studies on emotional processing, men and boys are able to identify emotional arousal in themselves and others equally to women, emotions like jealousy, love, anger, sadness, anxiety, etc. But men and boys choose to regulate that emotional arousal not by verbalizing it so much (women's preferred method) but by taking intelligent action. A woman for example might talk with her melancholic friend about what is worrying her in order to cheer her up; the man may invite the same melancholic friend to the movies; both responses -talking, or acting- serve to intelligently modulate emotions.

What Levant has failed to discriminate are 1. recognizing emotions, and 2. verbalizing them. He, and so many psychologists who came before and after him, assume that by not verbalizing emotion males must also have failed to recognize emotions. Countless studies however show this to be a false conclusion.[5] Men, like women, can sense the full range of emotions – but they may choose to respond to that knowledge in a different manner to women.

Breaking with the past – starting afresh

Repackaging patriarchy theory is a move we no longer wish to make – at least not if we wish to genuinely help men. Increasing numbers of men are tired of waiting for the psychotherapeutic industry to drag its collective ass out of gynocentrism-land to develop a genuine new model for tackling male psychology.

To attain that model there has to occur a break with patriarchy theory and assumptions that men and boys are emotional dummies. As in a court of law we begin the new therapy with an assumption that men are not only innocent until proven guilty, but that 'men are good' to use Tom Golden's iconic phrase.

Nor will work with men be savvy until it admits the realities of cultural misandry, gynocentrism and their undeniably crushing effects on modern males. The daily assaults on men and boys from advertizing, mental health services, media, family courts, pharmaceutical companies, education from grade school to grad school, anti-male bigots and ideologically driven governance must be included in the picture.

These are problems which are deleterious to all aspects of men's lives, including mental health. The mental health industry is a huge part of that problem, not a part of the solution.

A sane alternative to all this must disabuse men, women and society of the following myths:

- men belong to a patriarchy and take that model as their life script;
- men are emotionally inept;
- men are default potential sexual predators;
- men are violent and uncaring;
- men are not necessary as parents;
- men are unable to commit;

- men are emotionally unavailable;
- men are not as human or deserving as women.

The things we do want to include in a new mental health model are:

- enhanced understanding of misandry, gynocentrism and their consequences;
- recognizing and honoring men's emotional acumen;
- recognizing and combating misandry and gynocentrism in the mental health industry;
- professional understanding of the ways men differ from women in how they cope with life;
- a prohibition on the practice of expecting men to emulate women's emotional processes;
- an allowance of men's legitimate anger without infecting them with ideological shame;
- the steadfast belief that men's issues, pain and needs are as important as anyone else's.

These points alone are sufficient to create a revolution in the way we work with men. As a truly new approach to men's welfare and psychological health, An Ear For Men has been launched and the coming Men's Mental Health Network will be promoting these principles and providing a range of specialized services from professionals who have been thoroughly vetted in their knowledge of men's issues, and in their compassion for the same.

References:

[1] Ronald F. Levant, 'The new psychology of men,' in Professional Psychology: Research and Practice, Vol 27(3), Jun 1996, 259-265
[2] Ronald F. Levant, Men and Emotions: A psychoeducational approach – course material, Newbridge Publications, p.4, 1997
[3] Ronald F. Levant, Men and Emotions: A psychoeducational approach – course material, Newbridge Publications, p.9, 1997
[4] Ronald F. Levant, William S Pollack, A New Psychology of Men, pp.238-239, 1995
[5] For example, this Finnish study shows that while women were more proficient at verbalizing feelings, men and women were equally proficient at identifying feelings: Salminen, J. K. 'Prevalence of alexithymia and its association with sociodemographic variables in the general population of Finland,' Journal of psychosomatic research, vol. 46, no1, pp. 75-82, 1999

See also: Narrative Therapy with Men by Paul Elam and Peter Wright

Paul reviews The Red Pill Movie

AVfM Video Source · 9 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Red carpet moments at “The Red Pill” premiere, NYC 10/7/2016

Gary Costanza · 10 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I’m still riding high on the euphoria of “The Red Pill” premiere, meeting the director, producers, and others who made this hard-hitting movie, as well as some of it’s subjects and stars. I was interviewed by the press, met Cathy Young, and spoke with Fred Hayward at length about his journey in the MRM. The Q and A allowed MHRAs to have their say unfettered, politely calling on the carpet feminists who up til now have dominated the narrative, claiming that they are helping men and boys. Until the Q and A video comes out, and this gem of a movie, whet your appetite on the various reviews and this short video that puts you on the red carpet of “The Red Pill.”

Analysis: The Red Pill Movie Q & A

Paul Elam · 12 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Last Friday, after the red carpet showing of the The Red Pill Movie, there was a Q & A for the audience. I was involved, along with Director Cassie Jaye, Karen Straughan, several other men's advocates and none other than Professor Feminism himself, Michael Kimmel.

It was a brief affair, and pretty intense at points. For me personally, it was also a bit comical, and, well, fun.

As you know by now, Cassie Jaye's movie, The Red Pill, has already created a watershed moment in the history of advocacy for men's and boy's issues.

As I promised earlier, I would provide an analysis of what happened at the question and answer session after the movie, and in particular for me, why I found it so damned funny.

To get this, I want to start with the end, when Michael Kimmel grabbed a taxi and left the area so fast you'd think he was running through a gauntlet of cameras with a raincoat over his head to hide his face.

It's hard to blame him. First, part of the film had the audience laughing at him – while he was in the theater with them. Ya know, not really what you want to see on red carpet night. Or rather, not really who you want to be.

It didn't end there. Not satisfied with the movie directly exposing his uniquely disingenuous form of buffoonery, he had to pour salt in his own wounds during the Q & A.

I didn't take notes or record, so I can't quote him verbatim, but the event was filmed by Jayebird Productions and as I understand it, it will be online in the days ahead.

To paraphrase the events, Michael, true to form, engaged in some mild filibustering to make his case for himself. Now, I have to issue a warning here. If you have food in your mouth, or are sipping on a drink please swallow them before you continue reading.

Are you ready? Good. Michael's case, in a nutshell, was that he was on our side. He cares deeply about the issues facing men and boys. And of course while he delivered that message with the shopworn bit of "patriarchy hurts men, too" bullshit, he was literally gushing about how aware he was that men got a raw deal in family courts.

And yes, he was saying all this to an audience who had just witnessed him comparing men's advocates to the white nationalist movement.

At this point I could not resist. I asked him about the National Organization of Men Against Sexism, or NOMAS, for which Michael Kimmel's Wiki page lists him as a spokesperson.

NOMAS has called father's rights groups nothing more than an abuser's lobby, claiming that the only reason that men wanted more access to their children was so that they could abuse them.

That comes directly from an article by disbarred attorney Barry Goldstein on the NOMAS site. Goldstein lost his law license for, in part, fabricating evidence and lying to a court in a domestic violence case, but I digress.

Anyway, Kimmel's response to my challenge to him to clean up his own house was, and I am quoting him here, "That's not my house."

Well, yes, it is Michael Kimmel's house. He was just lying. While I don't find him on the membership board now, he certainly was when Goldstein's attempt to assassinate the character of grieving fathers was first published. And he was silent about it.

After all, these are his peers. They always have been, and they have worked actively to undermine alienated fathers for decades. Just as Kimmel and crew have worked to demonize any academic efforts to study men and boys that do not fall in line with the same hateful feminist agenda that attacks fathers and all other men.

As I recall, the next memorable part of the Q & A was Karen Straughan, who was just fantastic in the movie, trying to get Kimmel to answer the question, “What does toxic masculinity mean to an 8-year-old?”

It was one of the few times that the mendacious Kimmel, this time wisely, opted for silence.

He eventually pivoted, then tried to turn his crowing into a commercial for the movie he helped produce, a piece of agitprop call The Mask You Live In, touting it as good film making that demonstrated his brand of compassion for men and boys.

That was, at least possibly, the second lie. The only thing that may be more redeemable about this one though is that there is a possibility, however remote, that Kimmel actually believes what he is saying. He may actually believe that shaming masculinity, teaching boys to emulate girls, glorifying what he erroneously thinks are feminine values over masculine values and making men out to be a class of default rapists and abusers is helping men and boys.

Take that back. He was just lying again, just as he has throughout his entire, disgusting career.

I have seen The Mask You Live In, and apparently some of the Red Pill Movie audience had, too. They were audibly groaning during his spiel about how a hateful and bigoted feminist movie could possibly be an asset to millions of men and boys who are the targets of feminist abuses.

Kimmel also, with lameness fitting a Dickens novel, offered up the claim that one of the chapters he wrote in his book, Angry White Men, angered his feminist contemporaries because it offered some compassion for unjustly treated fathers.

There were two little tidbits that must have slipped his mind, though. One was that the objective of Angry White Men, which attacks the men’s movement, including AVFM, was to postulate the notion that much male violence, including mass shootings, was a result of white males aggrieved at their loss of privilege. No psychosis, criminality or other problem at the root, just a bunch of uppity crackers, pissed off that they don’t run the world (which they never actually ran).

And two, it made me wonder, though I did not want to dominate the Q & A with more questions for Kimmel, what does it say that Kimmel’s feminist peers were so offended that he might have offered some passing sympathy for abused men in one of his otherwise misandric books?

Perhaps someone can ask him that on another day.

Finally, after about 30 minutes of being cornered into mounting lies about his anti-male bias, Kimmel went completely off the gender grid.

The “real” problem was white people, he told the audience. The problem, apparently, is that white folk, male and female, have too much privilege.

He actually started talking as though he were at a Black Lives Matter rally, not a film on feminism and the men’s movement, the latter of which has no stake in race at all.

I think the audience was too busy rolling their eyes to know what to say.

Now, I have heard from more than one source that at the very least they gave Kimmel credit for being willing to take the stage and face the audience after the movie was shown. Sort of like Anthony Weiner going back on Twitter after, well, you know.

I indulged that for a second. As I recall, when that was brought up during the Q & A, I even offered some mild applause after someone recognized him for that.

I wish I hadn’t. On reflection, it was hardly courage methinks that brought Kimmel onto that stage. It was hubris, and an absolute disregard for the intelligence of the audience. Or, if I am being generous, proof of how steadfastly deluded the man really is.

Kimmel took the stage completely oblivious to the fact that, finally, he could not grease up and wiggle his way out of the truth staring him in the face like a loaded shotgun.

Kimmel comes from a world of Belfort Bax's mock heroics, where fear and mob thinking assure he will be supported and that anyone who dissents will be demonized and silenced.

He lives in a world where articles of faith cannot be challenged, where his will and his word are regarded as sacrosanct. He is so complacent and insulated that he does not even notice the absurdity of staffing a board on the study of men with Jane Fonda, Carol Gilligan, Eve Enslar and Gloria Steinem.

It's like populating a parole board with Klan members but Michael Kimmel does it with a straight face and a great deal of pride.

Well, for a brief, glorious couple of hours on Friday, October 7, 2016, the shoe was finally, painfully on the other foot for Michael Kimmel. The egg was dripping from his face, from which all smugness had been completely wiped away.

One had to wonder just how much that shoe was making him hurt as he made his mad dash for the cab.

Finally, and as a footnote here, I have noted the huge number of requests for information on DVD releases and other information on the Red Pill Movie. Sorry to say, I don't have any of that. Naturally, I really want the DVD or download myself, but I don't know when it will be available.

The Red Pill Movie Facebook page and website are your best bet for what you are looking for.

Also, here is another link to the National Coalition for Men page, organizing a meet and greet prior to the Los Angeles screening, this Friday, the 14th of October in North Hollywood.

There will be a Q & A there, as well, though I doubt seriously that Michael Kimmel will take the stage again.

At your disposal, General

Doug Mortimer · 14 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

> Theirs not to reason why,
>
> Theirs but to do & die
>
> "The Charge of the Light Brigade"
>
> Alfred Lord Tennyson

The implements of war have changed over the centuries, but the military, in some form or fashion, goes back as far as history's earliest records of collective aggression and/or collective defense.

The hierarchical nature of the military allows for upward movement through the chain of command, but for those who remain at the bottom of the heap; disability is taken for granted. In fact, the military could not function without it.

For those not content to remain bottom feeders, status upgrades, in the form of promotions and medals, have always been available. As added motivation, chicks supposedly dig men in uniform and poets have oft been inspired by gallantry (in truth, a synonym for male disposability), as Tennyson was, even though the Charge of the Light Brigade (which took place during the Crimean War) was widely acknowledged to be a blunder.

Many men tacitly accept their disposability; indeed, they may look at putting their lives on the line as part and parcel of manhood. Having accepted one's own disposability, it is not much of a stretch to look upon one's fellow men as equally disposable. In the military, the higher one is in the chain of command, the more men at one's disposal. Consequently, a general has almost godlike powers over his charges.

General Smedley Darlington Butler was one such god who eventually grew tired of being a deity. He came to the conclusion that wars were fought and funded by the masses for the benefit of the few. Soldiers, in a sense, were caught in the crossfire:

[V]isit the American cemeteries on the battlefields abroad. Or visit any of the veteran's hospitals in the United States. On a tour of the country, in the midst of which I am at the time of this writing [1935], I have visited 18 government hospitals for veterans. In them are a total of about 50,000 destroyed men – men who were the pick of the nation 18 years ago. The very able chief surgeon at the government hospital in Milwaukee, where there are 3,800 of the living dead, told me that mortality among veterans is three times as great as among those who stayed at home.

Such bleeding heart sentiments are unusual for a military man, but Butler was an unusual fellow.

Born on July 30, 1881, Butler grew up in a Pennsylvania Quaker family whose presence in America dated back to the 17th Century. He left high school early to enlist in the Marine Corps during the Spanish-American War. By the time he retired in 1931, he was a Major General with experience in the Boxer Rebellion, various banana republic dustups, the Mexican Revolution, and World War I. He received not one but two Congressional Medals of Honor. Yet "Old Gimlet Eye" apparently had a change of heart after he retired in 1931. As he put it, "My mental faculties remained in suspended animation while I obeyed the orders of the higher-ups. This is typical with everyone in the military." Hence the jokes about military intelligence.

In 1935, Butler published a short book entitled War Is a Racket, in which he discussed how big business worked hand-in-glove with the military to further commercial interests. This allegation is hardly breaking news today, and even in Butler's day, it was not new. During World War I, you could be damned as a socialist and charged with sedition for uttering such sentiments. By 1935, however, a highly decorated general like Butler was beyond suspicion. At that time, the U.S. was more concerned with battling the Depression than foreign dictators.

Concurrently with the publication of his book, Butler went on a lecture tour in which he dealt with war profiteering, imperialism, and creeping fascism at home. His outstanding military career gave him a credibility that other speakers might have lacked. Perhaps “the fighting Quaker” was trying to reconcile his upbringing with his experience:

There are only two things we should fight for. One is the defense of our homes, and the other is the Bill of Rights. War for any other reason is simply a racket.

Butler was not a strict pacifist, as he acknowledged that a military was necessary for “home defense purposes,” but the army “should never leave the territorial limits of our nation.” As he said in 1933, “I believe in adequate defense at the coastline and nothing else.” He drew a 200-mile limit for the Navy and a 500-mile limit for air reconnaissance. Granted, this was long before long-distance weapons and push-button warfare.

Nevertheless, someone who has experienced combat has more credibility than the armchair warrior rattling his virtual saber:

How many of these war millionaires shouldered a rifle? How many of them dug a trench? How many of them knew what it meant to go hungry in a rat-infested dug-out? How many of them spent sleepless, frightened nights, ducking shells and shrapnel and machine gun bullets? How many of them parried the bayonet thrust of an enemy? How many of them were wounded or killed in battle?

No less a personage than Henry Kissinger once opined, “Military men are just dumb, stupid animals to be used as pawns in foreign policy.” One suspects that he was not the only Secretary of State to hold such a view, just the only one to express it.

In the United States, the Constitution places the military under the control of the executive and legislative branches. Theoretically, this puts the military under civilian control, as the President and members of Congress are elected officials. Unfortunately, these elected officials continue to put troops in harm’s way for dubious reasons.

In today’s era of the all-volunteer military waging “perpetual war for perpetual peace” (a phrase coined by historian Charles A. Beard in 1947), it has become commonplace to thank members of the military for their service. Military discounts are ubiquitous and soldiers often show up and take a bow in cammies at sporting events. The P.A. announcer may ask active military personnel and veterans to stand up and be recognized. While this acknowledges the military, past and present, it also exposes those men who have never “served.” The stigma is unspoken yet undeniable.

During World War II the stigma was overt. Being classified 4-F was an act of emasculation, a real drop in class, though not the ultimate mucky bottom occupied by the draft dodgers. Since the draft did not go away after the end of the war, military service became a rite of passage for all able-bodied young men. If Elvis Presley could be drafted, no one was safe.

Serving your country didn’t necessarily have to be onerous. If you did your tour of duty during peacetime in Hawaii, you could truthfully say you had served, you could call yourself a veteran, and your manhood would not be called into question.

During wartime, however, the strategic use of shaming played a big part in recruiting. While the famed White Feather Girls were doing their thing in England during World War I, America took a different tack after entering the war. As General Butler put it:

> In the World War [I], we used propaganda to make the boys accept conscription. They were made to feel ashamed if they didn’t join the Army.

So vicious was this war propaganda that even God was brought into it. With few exceptions, our clergymen joined in the clamor to kill, kill, kill.

The nation's graphic artists responded to the call with colorful posters. This was when the oft-reproduced poster of Uncle Sam pointing at the viewer and saying "I Want You for U.S. Army," was introduced. My favorite is the one with a girl in a sailor suit with the caption, "Gee!! I wish I were a man. I'd join the navy." Below that is the punchline: "Be a man and do it." Subtext: if you don't do it, you're not a man. As Butler saw it:

Boys with a normal viewpoint were taken out of the fields and offices and factories and classrooms and put into the ranks. There they were remolded; they were made over; they were made to "about face"; to regard murder as the order of the day. They were put shoulder to shoulder and, through mass psychology, they were entirely changed. We used them for a couple of years and trained them to think nothing at all of killing or of being killed.

The surviving veteran presents more problems than the dead soldier. The post-World War I disorientation Butler witnessed is disturbingly contemporary:

Then suddenly, we discharged them and told them to make another "about face"! This time, they had to do their own readjustment, sans mass psychology, sans officers' aid and advice, sans nationwide propaganda. We didn't need them anymore; Many, too many of these fine young boys are eventually destroyed, mentally, because they could not make that final "about face" alone.

For many young people today, enlisting in the military is a last resort in a time of economic decline. For someone who grew up in a military family, it may be an inevitability. Deep down some young men may realize they need external discipline or may want to challenge themselves physically.

When I was young, it was not unusual to hear someone opine that "the army will make a man out of you." Given the increasing female presence in the military, such wording is no longer appropriate, but recruitment posters and public service announcements still convey this concept. Nevertheless, underlying it all is General Butler's pronouncement:

> War is a racket. It always has been. It is possibly the oldest, easily the most profitable, surely the most vicious.

Unfortunately, it is one racket that will never be prosecuted under the RICO law.

The secret inspiration for The Red Pill

AVfM Video Source · 14 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

An interview with Cassie Jaye, creator of The Red Pill documentary on men's rights, with questions by Alison Tieman.

The Red Pill Movie coming to Edmonton

AVFM · 16 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dis gone be good. PE

VENUE: Shaw Theatre: NAIT, X-wing, closest building N(slightly E) of the LRT station

11762 106 Street
Edmonton, AB T5G 2R1

Date: Thursday October 27/ 2016

Time: Admission at 6PM
Showing at 7 PM

Special post-showing Q & A featuring Karen Straughan, Brian Martinez and Mike Stephenson (AKA DoctorRandomercam) to follow

Tickets are free, but we ask that people RSVP by emailing AcerSaccharum@protonmail.com and we do encourage people to donate at the door. Tickets are first come, first serve, until allocation is exhausted, limit 2 tickets per e-mail/person, extra tickets available at the door.

Bettina Arndt: Telling the truth about domestic violence

Peter Wright · 16 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Telling the truth about domestic violence – Bettina Arndt with Beattie & Reith

“5 Things Women Know that Men Don’t”

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 17 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Passive-aggressive articles about men’s alleged ignorance are nothing new. You could even say they are a kind of tradition. Scott Barthelmes, founder of the Relevant Man and contributor to The Good Men Project is more than happy to carry on this tradition with his piece 5 Things Women Know that Men Don’t.

> Before we get started let’s just say up front that there are exceptions to every rule. So, all of you haters just need to simmer down and know that these “5 Things Women Know That Men Don’t” are based on personal observances and experiences. But then, all of you women readers already knew that … didn’t you? See what I mean?

Scott, if this opener is any indication of your experience, there’s going to be a lot of things women know that you don’t—penis notwithstanding.

> Most women know at least one hour before the man does if and when there will be sexual relations, and to what degree. That’s right guys. […] She will know at least one hour before you do: if there will be sex; when the sex will take place; and what sexual acts will be performed.
>
> The guy might be able to determine the place for said acts based on her state of arousal and a great deal of planning on his part. He might even think that he “slipped one past the goalie” from time to time. But, don’t be fooled. She knew what was coming before he had a clue. If it happened, she knew it was going to happen first.

What a weird way to start an article. Out of all the ways to express stereotypes against men, recasting positive sexual encounters as something the woman foreseeing before the guy is a bit contrived.

It’s also a bit of a gimme: You are basically saying that a company knows if it will hire someone before the applicant does. The moment you turn this story around where a woman is interested in a man, your entire first paragraph makes no sense unless you are describing a rapist.

I picture a deranged, sexless goblin named Charlene eyeing Scott from the stormy outdoors through a bar window. Flashes of lightning light up Charlene’s pickled warts and quake her porridge-like complexion. She mutters with a hint of desperation and determination to the voices in her head that she knows where and when she will tie Scott to a streetlamp and get his rectum into the Guinness Book of World Records.

If only Scott knew.

> Many women know how to share their feelings with one another.
>
> OK, I can see you rolling your eyes from here. I know that almost every guy out there is saying “Why would I want to share my feelings with another guy?” Why indeed?

Doesn’t that question and the eye roll convey feeling? Don’t you know how feelings work, Scott?

> Well for one thing; it would provide a sounding board to bounce things off of in advance of you doing something stupid. You know you’ve been there. You’ve done something that later proved itself to be heartless, selfish, boorish, or short-sighted. […] Something that you might have reconsidered had you had someone to talk with about it before you said, did, or wrote anything. […] But, it’s pretty rare for guys to talk about intimate stuff like emotional relationships, the latest men’s fashions, or how someone made you feel. Guess what. Women do that shit all of the time.

As your sounding board acting after the fact, please reflect on the bold text and links added by me.

> Most women know men's insecurities — even ones that the guy doesn't know himself. Guys, do you ever feel like maybe you're being played by the fairer sex? That's because you are. It's like a sixth sense that drives their two minute drill offense. They see your weak spots. They gather the information. They wait until the closing minutes, then they throw the deep pattern that you never saw coming. Boom!

Is this passage supposed to make me admire women? I don't know about you Scott, but I wouldn't associate with people who feel the need to use reconnaissance and emotional conflict in daily life.

To be fair, there have been times a woman has said immensely hurtful things to me that made me upset, and left me sputtering for words. It's not that I couldn't express what was wrong; I always know exactly what's wrong the moment I heard an evil statement! The problem is that I am to this day surprised when someone goes out of their way to hurt me. it leaves me speechless, angry and hurt. Why? Why do that? Why would someone I thought was close to me put energy into making me feel worse about myself?

I think I agree with you on this one, Scott. With the exception of the abusive few, men do not make a point to analyze a woman's insecurities for future leverage. It never even occurs to them, because men are good people. Hurtful words—NOT banter!—are something I've only experienced coming from women, including women who love me. I think all women should be deeply ashamed of themselves when they knowingly hurt someone's feelings, because that is not how civilized people should behave.

Thanks for bringing this issue to our attention, Scott. And thank you for letting me share my feelings on this situation.

> Many women know what sort of birth control they're using (or not using) at all times.

Your deadline must have been like an hour after you wrote this.

> Most women know about skin care and hair care products that most men never even knew existed.

Men look good enough as it is without needing to know, but again, Google is your friend.

> BTW: in case you were wondering … there is a list of things that men know, and that women don't know too. But that's a list for another day.

And I will be writing that list.

Thank you for your experience, Scott.

Rachel Boykan MD, of Stony Brook (NY) Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 19 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Rachel Boykan MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Stony Brook Medicine website we see SBU's President Stanley lauding the hospital's latest efforts to further medical excellence. Stanley poses with others to promote it's flu-shot program, efforts against muscular dystrophy, breast cancer, the Zika virus, and finally it's mindfulness and diversity program. But President Stanley, Dr. Boykan, and others at this hospital are not "mindful" that genital mutilations forced on unconsenting baby boys is a human rights violation, unethical, and illegal.

How sad that supposed civilized and modern medical professionals don't make the connection between female genital mutilation and male genital mutilation and realize that these procedures are medically unnecessary, risky, and unethical. While strides are being made in some areas of medicine, the hideous reality is that doctors like Boykan are sexually, physically, and mentally abusing infants under the same roof.

Under "Hospitalists, Our Team" we read about Dr. Boykan's education and specialties:

> Education:
>
> Medical School, SUNY @ Stony Brook, School of Medicine > Residency, SUNY @ Stony Brook, Pediatrics
>
> Medical Conditions/Treatments:
>
> Circumcision
> Complex Chronic Care
> Diaper Rash
> Flu
> Flu Vaccination
> General Pediatrics
> Genital Warts
> Immunizations
> Otitis Externa
> Otitis Media
> Pediatric Hospitalist
> Pharyngitis (Sore Throat)
> Pneumococcal Diseases
> Pneumonia
> Well Check/Health Supervision

The conditions listed above need treatment, while the "treatment" called circumcision treats no condition and cures no disease.

Under "Pediatric Hospitalists, Services," we read:

> Stony Brook's pediatric hospitalists provide care for children from infancy through adolescence with diagnoses ranging from gastroenteritis to meningitis to respiratory illnesses. The hospitalists also treat patients whose illness is complicated by an underlying medical condition such as a previous brain injury or genetic disorder.
>
> Their clinical interests include complex chronic care, inpatient hospital medicine, inpatient newborn care, and medically complex children. They also perform newborn circumcisions.

Wow, you'd think all those diagnoses, illnesses, medical conditions, injuries, and disorders would keep them busy and righteous, but they also "treat" non-conditions, like 'penis with foreskin' with risky surgery for no medical reason, making them unethical medical practitioners.

Under "Research and Education," Dr. Boykan's:

> research interests include the ongoing project: GUIDES – A template to educate and enhance the assessment of risk factors for childhood injury, an IRB- approved 6-month pilot study with Leslie Quinn, MD, Stony Brook University Hospital Department of Pediatrics.

Dr. Boykan, girl babies have nothing to fear from you, but "risk factors for childhood injury" for baby boys include doctors like you!

Since Dr. Boykan has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Boykan's practice information follows:

Stony Brook University Hospital
101 Nicolls Road
Level 11-020
Stony Brook NY 11794
P: (631) 444-7884
F: (631) 444-7865

Intactivism Bonuses:

A short read by Jason Dale about the foreskin and activist tactics.

Mike Buchanan discusses MGM with the public at a protest on Parliament Square.

> Rachel Boykan MD, of Stony Brook Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator" > https://t.co/YX5oMtOmi5 #nocirc #circumcision #intactivism pic.twitter.com/Hp1IazrzFp
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) October 19, 2016

The secret inspiration for The Red Pill – Part 2

Gary Costanza · 21 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

An interview with Cassie Jaye, creator of The Red Pill documentary on men's rights, with questions by Alison Tieman.

“The Rubin Report” interviews Cassie Jaye on feminism and men’s rights activists (Part 1 of 2)

Gary Costanza · 24 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

“The Red Pill” director Cassie Jaye tells the world on “The Rubin Report” about feminism and the men’s rights movement. Hold on world, here is your wake-up call.

Janice Fiamengo SJW Tribunal Legal Fund

Gary Costanza · 25 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

A former student has accused Janice Fiamengo of a human rights violation which will go to trial before the Social Justice Tribunal of Ontario. The University of Ottawa is a co-defendant in this case and is of course represented by their own lawyer, but the accuser is demanding that the university punish Fiamengo.

Please click here to donate.

Don’t Let Censorship Win! The Red Pill Movie will be shown in Melbourne!

AVFM · 27 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As many will know by now Palace Cinemas cancelled the Australian premiere of The Red Pill only 11 days before the screening date. The organisers have found a new venue but they need our help. The new venue is bigger and security is being arranged. Please consider donating. Donations over A$35 include a ticket to the event.

Click here to go to the fundraiser

Climate of Fear

Bettina Arndt · 27 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Washington Post's headline was grim: "Hundreds of colleges had zero rape reports and that could be worrisome."

That was in 2014 when the hysteria over "the rape culture" in American colleges was just starting to take hold. Madness ensued. College and university presidents, embarrassed by zero rape reports, scrambled to explain why their campuses made the newspaper's list. "We always operate under the assumption that zero does not really mean zero," said a California State University spokesman defensively. "Under-reporting will happen."

Two years on and this is the new norm on American campuses while the hysteria over sex risks grows ever more strident. What's frightening is just how little time it took for one of the world's leading education systems to be captured by a gender-based culture war.

Given that Australia is so clearly heading in the same direction it is instructive to see how this all happened. In the US it started with a 2007 Campus Sexual Assault Study commissioned by the US Department of Justice. The study claimed 1 in 5 college students were sexual assault victims. Although the respondents to the web-based study were self-selected and the definitions of sexual assault that were used were dubious, most media sources dutifully reported this astonishing claim.

Within a few years, universities across America were introducing "yes means yes" regulations that require students to give "enthusiastic" consent every step of the way in sexual activity.

Campus disciplinary tribunals are now adjudicating accusations of sexual misconduct based on these regulations which effectively shift the burden of proof to the (usually male) student accused of such charges. The changes, in some cases tied to federal funding, have led to a spate of allegations.

"The list of falsely accused young men subjected to kangaroo court justice is growing apace," wrote Christina Hoff Sommers, a former philosophy professor and American Institute scholar in Time magazine in 2014. She mentioned one young male, Caleb Warner who was found guilty of sexually assaulting a fellow student by a campus tribunal and expelled from college, only to have the local police determine he was innocent and that the alleged victim had deliberately falsified her charges. "Presumed guilty is the new legal principle where sex is concerned," Hoff Sommers concluded.

In Australia we are slipping and sliding down the same slope. Similarly unconvincing research has been published – here it was a National Union of Students survey that found 73 per cent of students had experienced sexual harassment or unwelcome sexual behaviour.

Most of these experiences involved staring or unwelcome comments or jokes. When the unwanted behaviour included assault (which could be an undesired touch) or attempted rape, most of the experiences didn't involve fellow students and the majority appear to have taken place off campus.

Of course, it is extremely important that such attacks receive proper investigation and every effort should be made to encourage victims to report rape or assault.

But there's no good evidence to suggest there is a rape culture in Australian universities. In spite of this, our Human Rights and Equal Opportunities Commission leapt into action. "This is an issue that needs focus and attention," said then sex discrimination commissioner Elizabeth Broderick, announcing 39 universities would collect data on this alarming problem. Universities Australia has committed $1 million to support the project.

Meanwhile, so-called documentary The Hunting Ground, which has toured American universities ramping up anxiety with false claims of a rape epidemic on campus, has now been shown on most Australian campuses. It's strong stuff showing frightened young American female college students apparently being preyed upon by serial rapists. But the film has been thoroughly discredited. Investigative producer for the project, Amy Herdy, has admitted publically that makers of the movie “do not operate in the same way as journalists — this is a film project that is very much in the corner of advocacy for victims, so there would be no insensitive questions or need to get the perpetrator’s side”.

Nineteen Harvard Law professors have denounced the film for misrepresenting key issues in the case of a law student who was ultimately cleared of sexual assault charges by a grand jury.

And the central thesis regarding the plague of serial rapists on campus stems from flawed research by psychologist David Lisak. The alleged serial rapists turned out not to be college students, nor were the rapes committed on campuses.

The statistics used in the film resulted from highly unusual research methods used in a Center for Disease Control and Prevention survey. As one example, respondents were told, “Please remember that even if someone uses alcohol or drugs what happens to them is not their fault.” Then they were asked the question, “When you were drunk, high, drugged or passed out and unable to consent, how many people ever had vaginal sex with you?” The CDC counted all such incidents as rape — hence the inflated statistics.

What’s crazy about all this alarmist talk about rape on campus is these privileged young women are far less likely to experience unpleasant sexual experiences than their less educated contemporaries. “Young women who don’t go to college are more likely to be raped,” wrote Callie Marie Rennison in The New York Times that year. Rennison, co-director of the Criminology and Criminal Justice Research Initiative at the University of Colorado, cited research showing young women who don’t attend college are victims of sexual violence at a rate of about 30 per cent greater than their more-educated counterparts.

Other EU research suggests universities are a safer place to be than many of the home environments of these women — most incidents of serious violence involving students took place outside the university.

Similar demographics no doubt apply in Australia yet the scene is now set for exaggerated claims of sexual violence on our campuses. What’s next? “Trigger warnings” protecting victims of violence from being exposed to traumatic content in university courses, limitations on what can be caught in university syllabuses?

Perhaps we saw the seeds of this alarmist culture in 1992 when a group of students objected to rape cases used in a tutorial by former PNG Crown Prosecutor Peter Waight. Among other concerns, the students took issue with a legal example, based on known cases, that Waight had used in his teaching for more than a decade. It involved a young woman who claimed to be the victim of a sexual assault committed by her uncle, but who changed her story in court and said no assault had taken place.

The irony was the students claimed the question was objectionable because it “promoted the offensive myth that women and girls often make up allegations of rape for the fun of it”. But the students had it totally wrong — the essence of the case was that the niece had really been raped and family pressure had been brought to bear on her to change her story so her uncle did not go to jail.

Under the threat of a law suit by Waight, some of the students apologised, but the legal process took years to resolve and Waight chose to retire from the university despite receiving support from nearly all of his students, many local lawyers and colleagues.

There’s a growing push for trigger warnings across Australia, with the National Union of students suggesting warnings for university courses mentioning rape or sexual assault. The call for trigger warnings also applies to abuse, suicide, eating disorders, slurs, shaming, and racism. The most bizarre list comes from La Trobe where their student union suggests warnings for an astonishing 68 items including blood, vomit, fat shaming, gore, snakes, spiders, Islamophobia, corpses, needles, slimy things, insects, scarification, pregnancy, queerphobia, transphobia and Nazi paraphernalia.

It is logical to assume activity on Australian campuses is setting the scene for further changes in our legal system.

What's the bet the Human Rights Commission's survey will produce sufficiently alarming statistics to justify a push for "yes means yes" regulations on Australian campuses? Loraine Finlay, a former DPP prosecutor and a lecturer in law at Murdoch University, points out the so-called "random sampling" being used actually invites students to self-select to do the survey. "This seems highly likely to skew the results towards students who have experienced some form of assault or harassment who will be more motivated to take the survey," she says.

"We should be extremely cautious about moving down the path of changing our laws to adopt an 'enthusiastic consent' standard," Finlay says. Her time as a prosecutor showed her that while sexual assault offences are extremely difficult to prosecute because victim and alleged offender often provide different versions of events, she believes that "the current approach to consent is fair and reasonable".

The reality is that enthusiastic consent laws can undermine the right to a fair trial for students accused of sexual offences. Last year, a Tennessee judge, Carol McCoy, ruled in a case involving a student who later claimed she hadn't consented to the drunken sex with a fellow student called Corey Mock. McCoy's judgment stated that the university regulations "improperly shifted the burden of proof and imposed an untenable standard upon Mr Mock to disprove the accusation." She suggested it runs afoul of "the fundamental requirement of due process".

Recently, Australian gender warrior and journalist Jane Gilmore appeared on the ABC's The Drum discussing sexual assaults on campus and promoting the need for enthusiastic consent laws. Regulations on campus are just the beginning. The broader aim is strengthened rape and sexual assault laws, increasing sentences for such crimes and further eroding traditional legal protections against false allegations.

Just this week California expanded its definition of rape and added new mandatory-minimum sentences for sexual assaults, five months after a judge's lenient sentence for former Stanford University swimmer Brock Turner sparked outrage on social media. When Turner was released from prison, his family home was surrounded by armed protestors waving signs like "Shoot the local rapist".

New draconian laws, armed vigilante groups — arguably an inflamed reaction inspired, at least in part, by the frenzy over the rape culture on American campuses. So what's next for Australia?

Feminists are choking on The Red Pill Movie

AVfM Video Source · 27 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Maribeth Chitkara MD, of Stony Brook (NY) Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 28 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Maribeth Chitkara MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Stony Brook Medicine website we see SBU's President Stanley lauding the hospital's latest efforts to further medical excellence. Stanley poses with others to promote it's flu-shot program, efforts against muscular dystrophy, breast cancer, the Zika virus, and finally it's mindfulness and diversity program. But President Stanley, Dr. Chitkara, and others at this hospital are not "mindful" that genital mutilations forced on unconsenting baby boys is a human rights violation, unethical, and illegal.

How sad that supposed civilized and modern medical professionals don't make the connection between female genital mutilation and male genital mutilation and realize that these procedures are medically unnecessary, risky, and unethical. While strides are being made in some areas of medicine, the hideous reality is that doctors like Chitkara are sexually, physically, and mentally abusing infants under the same roof.

Under "Hospitalists, Our Team" we read about Dr. Chitkara's education and specialties:

> Education:
>
> Medical School, Georgetown University School of Medicine
> Residency, Children's Natl. Medical Ctr., Pediatrics > Fellowship, Montefiore Medical Center, Pediatric Infectious Disease
>
> Medical Conditions/Treatments:
>
> Circumcision
> Hospitalist
> Inpatient Hospital Medicine

The "treatment" called circumcision treats no condition and cures no disease.

Under "Pediatric Hospitalists, Services," we read:

> Stony Brook's pediatric hospitalists provide care for children from infancy through adolescence with diagnoses ranging from gastroenteritis to meningitis to respiratory illnesses. The hospitalists also treat patients whose illness is complicated by an underlying medical condition such as a previous brain injury or genetic disorder.
>
> Their clinical interests include complex chronic care, inpatient hospital medicine, inpatient newborn care, and medically complex children. They also perform newborn circumcisions.

Wow, you'd think all those diagnoses, illnesses, medical conditions, injuries, and disorders would keep them busy and righteous, but they also "treat" non-conditions, like 'penis with foreskin' with risky surgery for no medical reason, making them unethical medical practitioners.

Since Dr. Chitkara has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Chitkara's practice information follows:

Stony Brook University Hospital
101 Nicolls Road
Hsc Level 11-020
Stony Brook NY 11794
P: (631) 444-2710
F: (631) 444-7865

Intactivism Bonuses:

A short read by Jason Dale about the foreskin and activist tactics.

Mike Buchanan discusses MGM with the public at a protest on Parliament Square.

> Maribeth Chitkara MD, of Stony Brook (NY) Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/pwlPvWAEX3 #intactivism #MGM #nocirc pic.twitter.com/seM1OcIcnc
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) October 28, 2016

The Fiamengo File: Academic Totalitarianism

Janice Fiamengo · 28 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 49 Professor Fiamengo from the University of Ottawa discusses the emergence of totalitarianism in academia.

The Earth Is Moving For Me

Bryan Scandrett · 29 October 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Earth Is Moving For Me In Public

This article developed from a comment I nearly wrote to this piece by Emma Clarke Gratton. Inspired by motherly concern for her sons, she unwittingly begins the painful process of choking down a big red one. Naïvely clinging to her cliffs of feminist prejudice, she imagines Paul Elam has nothing good to say because, shock, horror, he dared criticise women.

Is she really a concerned mother? Does she truly love her sons? Or is she simply scared by the thought of what she well knows gynocentrism is going to do to them? Is she fearful of the pain their selfish suicide will cause her?

Am I, the nasty MRA, being too hard on a mother? Or do I bloody well know better how a woman's mind works?

This is the raw naked power of the alternate narrative, the magic spell of the story being woven by MRAs. Everyone now must choose which story to believe.

Wow! This is it right here, the ground shifting under our feet. Feminists in the process of choking down a big fat red one, in the public square! She wants to hurt men for their masculinity but knows that will hurt her sons and therefore herself. And yet, she is not quite able to come to grips with the original human narrative that we are really the same. That we are one. Men and women are people.

Still regurgitating the feminist party lies that TRP is MRA funded, it is not, and that the kick starter contributors had any editorial control what so ever. It's a matter of historical record the free speech advocates got that kick starter over the line when MRAs had little commitment to it.

She wants to join the ethical conversation but can't throw out the gynocentric lies in order to put ethics, and her sons, before gender. Being a victim is still too cosy a place which puts her feelz ahead of her children.

"Technically this is not censorship – Palace is entitled to rent their cinemas to whomever they like and to make a commercial decision that they don't wish to upset many patrons is valid"

The gymnastics required to ignore the censorious feminists brigading the Palace to force the decision to deplatform, with the same lies Emma uses, is impressive.

Score; 0.01

Here is some more.

"I don't agree with the way that men's rights groups use concerns over male mental health as an excuse for their anti-women agenda. "

Immediately followed by;

"Certainly male mental health is a huge concern in this country. I have two young sons, and the stats on male suicide are terrifying: men are three times more likely than women to commit suicide. The suicide rate is the highest it has been in ten years, with one person ending their life every three hours. Suicide causes more deaths than breast cancer, skin cancer and road accidents: all causes which receive huge amount of funding and awareness campaigns."

Take heart dearie, that when a mothers son suicides, he isn't mourned by many. If at all.

Most people can only grieve the mothers pain, and will register his death as an act of selfishness.

"If only he knew what pain he would cause his mother, he wouldn't have been so selfish."

Compassion for men isn't allowed in our culture, no matter that his pain was powerful enough for him to take his own life, it just doesn't count for as much as a womans broken nail.

MRA anger at this soulless value system not to mention gynocentrism's determination to enforce an utter fascist silence on the subject, is what you refer to as 'anti-woman.'

Given you are protesting the silencing of the film, you aren't about to deny that feminism is silencing the male conversation are you? After all, we are discussing the feminist silencing of a documentary that discusses the feminist silencing of the male conversation.

Yes Emma, we are angry with women shutting down the conversation on the preventable deaths of 40 some men per week in Australia.
2000+ men per year.

Some 20,000 odd per decade. A vicious meat grinder with no off switch.

And you want to complain that it's Aussie male machismo that doesn't want to talk about it.

You're too stupid to tell just how stupid that position is aren't you?

We don't hate these stupid conniving bitches for what's between their legs, but because they are stupid and conniving.

But who cares? Right? These boys, your sons, they aren't women are they? And it's not technically censorship is it?

Or is that just some more stupid connivance?

You bitch.

Now sit up straight, face the front, stop swishing and pay attention.

I DID NOT just hate on you. This is NOT woman hating.

I called you out. I held you accountable for your behaviour as a responsible adult, a big strong independent woman like the ones I'm supposed to be scared of.
Let me tell you just how close you are to TRP by telling you something about the stereotypical masculine Aussie bloke – dry-eyed and unemotional.

He is the man you have been shaming for millennia to serve your needs, to be disposable in that service, to put women and children first in all cases.

Even when it hurts.

Even when it will cost him his life.

You have always demanded he stand the slippery sloping deck and the burning building while you went to safety first. You demand he doesn't cry but go to his death proudly, like a 'real man,' with nary a tear for his painful fate.

He is the man you gave white feathers to in times of war. And now you demand he recite the 'white ribbon pledge' to never hurt a woman. While you engineer and then ignore his pain, followed by blame and shame for his pain tolerance.

And when he wants to discuss his plight, your feminism silences him. Every damn time. Yet, you remain, proudly, a feminist. And mother to the very same boys this insanity will destroy.

His masculinity has never been for his health.

Only yours.

He is your son.

Sophie's Choice in the real world is this.

Does she burn and brand her own child as a rapist misogynist pig?

Or does she put to the sword her selfish grasping gynocentric self for the truth and become the mother she should?

That would be a woman willing to share the sacrifices of parenthood as a full partner with the father of her children, for the genuine benefit of those children.

Truth is, equality is a step down for many women. Too bad. So sad. Tough luck.

MRAs, here to stay.

We’re here, we love beer, get used to it.

True equality will only happen when women get down from their pedestal and men from their white horse.

Keep swallowing Emma, I know TRP hurts and is a bitter pill. Salty.

It’s a long hard job gagging it down and it doesn’t come back up.

You are about to truly see your sons for the first time. You are about to see the world through male eyes. It will be OK though, they are beautiful.

That scary feeling you will be confused by, that’s ordinary compassion.

Thing is, you’ve never had it for men before.

It’s OK to cry.

Cathy Young screws the pooch — again

AVfM Video Source · 1 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Genders and Freedom of Speech: Jordan Peterson and Theryn Meyer

A Voice for Men · 2 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill Movie – Post-Viewing Q&A with Cassie Jaye and cast in LA

Gary Costanza · 3 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=p6K61c8Q_KE&t=777s

Press release on Kellett case

Paul Elam · 4 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Christopher Perry
Telephone: 301-801-0608
Email: cperry@prosecutorintegrity.org

ACLU, Defense Attorneys File Brief Challenging Immunity Protections for Investigative Misconduct by Former Prosecutor

WASHINGTON / November 4, 2016 – Three criminal justice organizations have filed an Amicus Curiae Brief with the First Circuit Court of Appeals opposing the claim of a former prosecutor that she should enjoy absolute immunity for her misconduct that included tampering with exculpatory evidence in a sexual assault case. The American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU of Maine Foundation, and the Maine Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers filed the Brief on October 5, 2016.

The case revolves around the actions of former prosecutor Mary Kellett during a 2007 trial of Vladek Filler, wrongfully accused of sexually assaulting his wife in the midst of a child custody dispute. Filler was eventually cleared or exonerated on all charges (1). He later sued Kellett alleging defamation and malicious prosecution.

Kellett advised three law enforcement officers to disregard subpoenas to disclose evidence to the defense attorney. More troubling, complainant Ligia Filler had admitted on tape that her rape allegations were her way of "fighting for the children." This portion of the tape was edited out before it was handed over to the defense. Kellett "engaged in or supported and approved of, the tampering of evidence by selectively editing a videotaped interview and redacting the exculpatory portions of the recording that were given to the defense," according to the Brief.

Ex-prosecutor Kellett previously admitted to these actions and was professionally sanctioned (2). The question now before the court is whether these unethical actions should be protected by the doctrine of absolute immunity.

Kellett's actions are consistent with an investigative approach often referred to as "victim-centered." This method instructs investigators to "start by believing" the accuser's statements (3); to hand "control of the process back to the victim" and allow the complainant "to request certain investigative steps not be conducted"(4); and to assume that "all sexual assault cases are valid unless established otherwise by investigative findings." (5)

A hearing on the case will be held this coming Monday, November 7, 2016 in Boston. The Brief is available online (6). The case has attracted national media attention (7).

Citations:

1. https://www.law.umich.edu/special/exoneration/Pages/casedetail.aspx?caseid=4694
2. http://bangordailynews.com/2013/07/17/news/hancock/judge-orders-legal-remediation-training-for-hancock-county-prosecutor/
3. http://www.startbybelieving.org/CanIReallySayThat.aspx
4. http://ric-zai-inc.com/ric.php?page=detail&id=COPS-W0796 , pages 9 and 13.
5. https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/improvingSAInvest_0.pdf, page 23.
6. https://www.aclumaine.org/sites/default/files/filler_amicus.pdf
7. http://www.washingtonexaminer.com/this-former-prosecutor-is-being-sued-for-misconduct/article/2606180

Mary Kellett claims absolute immunity for prosecutors

Robert Franklin · 5 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Vladek Filler continues (Bangor Daily News, 10/31/16). It is the story of how one man stood up to the combined forces of his local police department and district attorney's office and won. And won. And won again. With any luck, it will be, in the end, the story of how one man's dogged determination to prove his innocence and a prosecutor's guilt not only resulted in his compensation for the many harms inflicted on him, but made new law to prevent other prosecutors from doing what Mary Kellett so flagrantly and wrongfully did.

All the way back in 2008, Filler's wife decided to use local law enforcement agencies to help her gain child custody from him. She did that due to her well-founded belief that her own behavior had been so questionable, so abusive and arguably so unhinged, that she might lose custody of their children to him. So she cried 'rape' to the police and, despite plentiful evidence of Filler's innocence and his wife's mendacity, ADA Mary Kellett plunged ahead with charges and a trial.

She did so in part because she had a long record of taking to trial any and all allegations of sexual assault regardless of how true or false. She was able to take Filler's case to court because she was willing to hide exculpating evidence from the defense and even alter videotapes that, in their unaltered form, strongly suggested that his wife was lying and had been coached to do so.

Due to Kellett's flagrant wrongdoing, Filler was at first convicted of assault, but that conviction was overturned on appeal because of Kellett's unethical behavior during trial. His sexual assault charge was dismissed, but he was once again convicted of misdemeanor assault for allegedly splashing his ex with water. That too was overturned and he now has a clean record.

At that point, most people would have breathed a huge sigh of relief and moved on with their lives, content to have avoided prison. Not Vladek Filler. He wasn't finished, not by a long shot. Exonerated, he turned on Kellett and the police department that had so obviously violated the rules of criminal procedure and the ethical precepts under which prosecutors are supposed to act.

Filler filed a complaint with the Maine State Bar asking it to punish Kellett for her many violations of the state's canon of ethics for prosecutors. He won there too. Thanks to him, Mary Kellett achieved the dubious distinction of becoming the only prosecutor in the history of the state to be sanctioned by the Bar. Kellett, up till then a career prosecutor, resigned to enter private practice.

But Filler still wasn't done. He filed a suit in federal court alleging, under U.S. Code Title 28, section 1983, that Kellett, the police and others had violated his civil rights. Earlier this year, he won round one of that suit when Federal Judge John Woodcock ruled against the defendants' Motion to Dismiss, effectively allowing the suit to go forward.

Kellett appealed that decision, and her appeal is still pending. In the meantime, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Maine Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers have supported Filler by jointly filing a brief amicus curiae opposing Kellett's appeal (ACLU, 10/18/16).

And well they might. After all, Kellett is asserting the broadest possible claim of immunity from civil liability. She is claiming absolute immunity, i.e. the ability by any prosecutor anywhere to violate any law, rule or ethical requirement without fear of being required to answer in civil damages to their victims. It is a claim that finds no support anywhere in American jurisprudence.

Generally speaking, government actors are considered to be immune from civil liability for their actions as long as they didn't know or, in the exercise of reasonable care, couldn't have known, that what they did was illegal. Needless to say, Mary Kellett's actions fall far, far outside the ambit of that immunity law. Here's the way the ACLU describes what she did in Filler's case.

> In 2009, Kellett, then an Assistant District Attorney in Hancock County, prosecuted Filler for assault against his then-wife, Ligia Arguetta. At the time, a police officer interviewed Arguetta about her claims in a videotaped interview; at one point, the officer left the room and Arguetta was captured on tape admitting to a friend that she made up the claims in order to win custody of the couple's children. Kellett submitted the video as evidence against Filler; however, she first authorized the editing of the tape to remove Arguetta's admission.
>
> Additionally, on three separate occassions, Kellett advised police officers not to comply with subpoenas from Filler's attorneys seeking police records of interviews and interactions with Arguetta as well as 911 calls from Arguetta.

Keep in mind that prosecutors, as representatives of the state, are required, not merely to zealously represent their client, but to ensure that justice is done. That is, they may not pursue convictions of criminal defendants at any cost. They must analyze every case and refuse to prosecute defendants they deem reasonably likely to be innocent. Plus, if they do seek a conviction, they're required to turn over all evidence in their possession to the defendant, whether exculpatory or not.

Kellett of course violated all those rules that supposedly govern prosecutorial behavior. But now she's going far beyond merely violating the law. She's claiming the right to do so free of any consequence. She's claiming that intentionally altering a videotape showing a complaining witness admitting to lying and acceding to coaching should go unpunished. That's a claim of sovereign power that would have made King John blush.

Unquestionably, Mary Kellett will lose her appeal. My guess is that she doesn't expect to win it. I believe that her sole purpose in filing the appeal was to waste time.

But whatever the case, by now I suspect she's come to understand that the man she chose to target for her illegal and unethical behavior isn't just some schmo she can push around. The man's got some hefty push-back in him, and we should all be glad. We should be glad because Vladek Filler isn't just his own best champion, he's ours as well. Mary Kellett seeks to establish as a rule of law that any prosecutor anywhere can abuse the defendants she charges, violate the law and rules of ethics and get away with it. Should she prevail, we'd all be victims. In that case, we'll all face the possibility of, somewhere, sometime having to defend ourselves against state power that literally knows no bounds.

The Red Pill Berkeley Q&A – Pure gold!

Gary Costanza · 5 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=10prbbGYcsE
This is really good. J. Steven Svoboda (from NCFM and arclaw.org), Warren Farrell, and director Cassie Jaye discuss “The Red Pill” and take questions.

Svoboda talks about his intactivist contribution to the movie, and Farrell finally has his moment in the sun after being buried by the feminist media for decades.

Farrell defends AVFM’s tactics by relating a conversation with Paul Elam wherein he admitted that after years of brilliant writing and research, nobody listened.

Cassie talks about her struggles to finish the movie and how it has changed her personally and politically.

Some really interesting audience members speak their mind and tell their stories.

Enjoy!

Paul's Mancast Episode One

AVfM Video Source · 6 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In my work at An Ear for Men, I have started a weekly podcast that is provided to all my Patreon supporters. This is the first installment, which I posted on YouTube to provide an example of what is coming in the days ahead.

It goes into the history of the online men's movement and some of my personal experience in it. For AVFM old timers it will be a trip down memory lane, and for newcomers it will be a bit of a history lesson. I hope you enjoy, and if you'd like to get these talks once a week, any level of support on my Patreon will do the trick. Thanks. PE

Press release on male DV victims in Australia

AVFM · 7 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Media release – for immediate release – Tuesday November 8th 2016

Campaigners working to raise the profile of male victims of family violence have described the New South Wales government's appointment of a feminist organisation to assist male victims "a curious choice."

Yesterday, the Men's Referral Service was appointed by the NSW government to run a pilot service to connect male victims of family violence with specialist, local support worth $13M over 4 years. Mr Greg Andresen, a spokesman for the One in Three Campaign, which advocates for male family violence victims, said the appointment raised a lot of questions which needed answers.

"Males make up roughly one third of victims of family violence, and they need services that are going to understand their unique needs and give them appropriate assistance. Appointing a feminist organisation as the frontline provider without an open tender process, is a curious choice that needs explanation," Mr Andresen said.

Mr Andresen pointed out that the Men's Referral Service, an arm of No To Violence, was established to work with male perpetrators of family violence, not male victims. An examination of the group's website (mrs.org.au) shows their lack of experience in dealing appropriately with male victims.

For example, their website says:

The Men's Referral Service (MRS) provides free, anonymous, and confidential telephone counselling, information, and referrals to men to assist them to take action to stop using violent and controlling behaviour. No To Violence (NTV) is the Victorian state-wide peak body of organisations and individuals working with men to end their violence and abuse against family members.

Mr Andresen pointed out the information the MRS provides "for men" is predicated on men being perpetrators of domestic violence. NTV is on the public record as stating "the need to be cautious in automatically assuming that a man assessed by police or another referring agent as a victim of domestic violence truly is the victim".

Mr Andresen said this was at odds with the 2012 NSW Legislative Council Inquiry that found there was a need for the provision of appropriate services to male family violence victims, which led to the contract in the first place.

"The Inquiry found there was a lack of support for male victims, but we are puzzled how appointing a feminist organisation with no track record of providing appropriate support would be better than appointing one of the male health organisations with considerable expertise in the area.

"A male victim seeking support who reads on a website that he needs to take responsibility for his 'violent and controlling behaviour' is probably not going to have a lot of confidence in ringing that service and asking for help. And if he does call and is assumed responsible for the violence, he may not reach out for help again," Mr Andresen said.

Mr Andresen said he was worried about the epidemic of male suicide in Australia, which was partly a consequence of men being placed in untenable family situations, with little or no support.

"With so many men taking their own lives, the government has an obligation to find them the help they need, especially when family violence is concerned.

"Minister Goward's heart seems to be in the right place, but maybe the government's dollars are not," Mr Andresen said.

ENDS

For queries, please contact Mr Greg Andresen on 0403 813 925 or email info@oneinthree.com.au.Download a

PDF version of this media release

Houston, we have a Red Pill screening

AVfM Video Source · 7 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

BUY TICKETS HERE

https://www.eventbrite.com/e/the-red-pill-movie-tickets-29236716807

DONATE HERE

http://anearformen.com/donate/

New documentary “American Circumcision” Kickstarter funds needed

Gary Costanza · 10 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Meet Brendon Marotta, director of the new documentary “American Circumcision.” If you’re familiar with “The Red Pill” movie you may think it presumptuous of me to say he’s the next Cassie Jaye, but the similarities are striking. If there is any subject that compares to the MRM, it’s the equally taboo subject of circumcision. I’ll let him tell it (from brendonmarotta.com):

“How I Knew Trump Would Win in 2015

In October 2015, I wrote that I thought Trump would win the US Presidential election.

Let’s back-up for a moment:

In 2015, there were sixteen – sixteen – Republican candidates. Jeb Bush was assumed to be the front runner. People thought this election was going to be a re-run – Bush v. Clinton. Democrats were just starting to “feel the Bern.”

Then this Trump guy declared his candidacy and everyone assumed it was a joke. No mainstream media covered it. The Huffington Post said they’d put it in their entertainment section, because it wasn’t real news. Trump was totally written off as a clown by everyone.

Everyone except Scott Adams.

In August 2015, Scott predicted that not only would Trump become President of the United States – but we would win in a landslide.

People laughed. “Stick to cartooning.” (Scott Adams is the creator of Dilbert.) Was this a joke? A gimmick for blog traffic?

When I read his piece, I knew he was right.

It took me a while to publish anything saying that. I debated the decision for a few weeks. Writing on Trump had an ever bigger stigma then than it does now. But at the end of October, I wrote a short piece saying that based on what I knew about storytelling, Trump is the most likely candidate to win.

Scott shared it on his blog. People liked it. Then the real fun began.

How Did We Know?

Scott predicted Trumps win through the lens of persuasion. His basic thesis is that people are not rational. If you want to persuade people, reason is not effective, because all important decisions are not made rationally – they are made based on identity.

What Donald Trump says may not be factually accurate, but he uses weapons grade persuasion. Every time the media would say Trump was “done” after some outrageous statement, trained persuaders would say, no – what you thought was clown behavior was actually skilled persuasion. He meant to do that.

So how did I know this identity level persuasion theory was true?

Circumcision.

I’m serious.

For the past couple years, I’ve been working on a documentary called American Circumcision on the modern circumcision debate. When I began working on the film, I thought “I’ll just share new information with people, and then they’ll change their mind.”

Wrong. Working on this documentary taught me that no amount of reason, facts, or logic can change an identity level belief. You can't use reason against what isn't reasonable. If you want a masters class in persuasion, study what convinces people to cut body parts off their children.

When Scott said "people are not reasonable" that perfectly paced 100 hours of documentary interviews I'd filmed. While every candidate was autistically explaining their policy positions, Trump was doing the only thing that actually mattered – persuading. Creating images, telling stories, getting attention."

—

Now I'm writing this to get attention for this movie because baby boys need YOU, Brendon Marotta, and "American Circumcision."

2016 is turning out to be a watershed year for the MHRA, saving male lives both young and old. First came ICMI'16 and "The Red Pill" movie, drawing attention to men's and boy's issues, one of which is suicide. And now comes "American Circumcision" a documentary by Brendon Marotta that is sure to follow TRP into the history books, potentially saving baby boy's lives and their foreskins, joining girls in securing their right to bodily integrity.

Enough talk, watch the trailer:

Brendon Marotta is the Cassie Jaye of the intactivist movement. And, just like the MRM, this subject is taboo, so we must throw open the curtains on the dirty little secret of circumcision because the law isn't doing it.

Please give and share this "American Circumcision" Kickstarter as this project will only be funded if at least $50,000 is pledged by Wed, Nov 23 2016 11:01 PM EST.

What The Kickstarter Money Is For

Meet the movie's first associate producer, Alexandre Rotta.

Quoting Marotta: "Alexandre Rotta is exactly the kind of person we want involved with this film, and we are extremely proud and grateful to have him as our associate producer."

Northwood United Synagogue's mohels – are THEY the mutilators OR YOU?

Gary Costanza · 10 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

"Registered Mohelim Situated In London:

Rabbi E. Aschkenasy, Rabbi J. Baumgarten, Mr. I. Beider, Mr. L. Braun, Mr. H. Brown, Rabbi M. Cohen, Dayan H. Ehrentreu, Mr U. Ellinson, Dr. D. Ezra, Mr. I. Gluck, Mr. S.G. Gluck, Dr. M. Harris, Mr. Y.M. Landau, Mr. J. Leigh, Dr. A. Levy, Dr. L. Lovat, Dr. Y. Opat, Rabbi. M. Perry, Rabbi J. Schischa, Mr. G. Schleider, Mr. Y. Schleider, Dr. B. Schreiber, Rabbi E. Schwartz, Dr. M. Sifman, Rabbi. Y. Simon, Rabbi Dr. L. Solomon, Dr. J. Spitzer, Mr. E. Spern, Rabbi. L. Sudak, Dayan. P. Toledano, Rabbi R.B. Weisz, Mr. M. Zimmer" (click here for contact info)

The preceding have been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org and are taken from the Northwood United Synagogue's website.

Thinking they're helping parents, Northwood United Synagogue lists 32 practitioners of MGM on their website, and thinking they're helping their sons, those parents pay those mutilators to cut their foreskin off.

The reason? In religious terms, from the Northwood website:

> The commandment was first given to Abraham in Genesis 17, where he was told, "every male among you shall be circumcised…and it shall be a sign of a covenant"

In other words, modern religion is still taking orders from cherry picked sections of ancient texts, while ignoring others deemed too horrific to continue.

Other reasons seem to be made up. Further on at the website:

> Essentially, the brit milah is an outward physical sign of the everlasting connection between God and the Jewish people. Of course, this begs the question of why God did not simply create man already circumcised. The answer encapsulates a lesson that might serve us all well for life – circumcision teaches us that just as a human being has the power to perfect the physical aspects of his body, so too is it within human ability to perfect the soul through spiritual correction.

So now we assume the male body is imperfect because it comes uncircumcised – WHAT? We have a joke in the intactivist movement about how boys are also born unlobotomized, yet we see no problem there.

But is one very important name missing from the above list of mutilators – YOURS?

As much as intactivists target the people who cut little baby's genitals, WHO is handing those defenseless infants over to them? Until the law protects little boys the same as little girls, it's on YOU to stop Male Genital Mutilation.

Since the synagogue has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Contact information:

Northwood Synagogue office:
Tel: 01923 820004
Fax: 01923 820020
Email: admin@northwoodus.org

Address:
21-23 Murray Road
Northwood
London
HA6 2YP

Intactivism Bonus Information:

- Video – Intact America Press Conference @ AAP Conference, San Francisco, CA – October 22, 2016
- "American Circumcision" the documentary – donate and watch the trailer.
- The Children's Health & Human Rights Partnership (CHHRP) has launched a harm documentation survey focused on males of any age who were circumcised in Canada. CHHRP is Canada's only non-profit association of doctors, nurses, lawyers, ethicists, human rights campaigners and concerned members of the general public who advocate respect for the rights of all children to bodily integrity and genital autonomy. The survey is open until April 30, 2017. Details can be found at: http://chhrp.org/index.php/news/ which contains a direct link to the survey.

> Northwood United Synagogue's mohels – are THEY the mutilators OR YOU? https://t.co/ftKGoJBKC2 #nocirc #MGM #intactivism #circumcision pic.twitter.com/VmjVQQWd9O
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) November 10, 2016

Can't We All Just Get Along?

Tom Voltz · 11 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Authors Note: This article started as a post in the comment section of an article named "Why I Changed My Mind on International Men's Day" on a UK pro-feminist blog called "InsideMAN". For those who would prefer the TL;DR version, the premise of the article was that, although the author used to oppose IMD (because, hey, every day is men's day, right?), he now thinks it's important for feminists to consider that it may have some limited value. How very kind of him. He describes this in typical gender studies word-salad style…
"…critical studies of men and masculinities continually demands the acknowledgement of differing and nuanced masculine experiences, yet does not do a great job of acknowledging such difference and nuance among those groups—such as IMD—it identifies as regressive."
Or, put into plain English, Not All MRAs Are Like That.
He went on to express the opinion that Feminists and MRAs should work together in a "Big Tent" approach rather than oppose each other. It was not the specifics of his article that got me thinking though. What struck me was that I realised that, over the past couple of months, this had to be at least the 7th or 8th time I had seen an article written by a Feminist that asked the question, "Can't we all just get along?". After some thought, I penned the following response and left it as a comment which, in true Feminist style, he deleted shortly before closing all comments. Coward.

You know what? I've noticed something…

For decades, between about 1970 and 2005, MRAs asked feminists politely and respectfully to help us address men's issues and waited patiently for them to get around to it. Where did this get us? It got us 45 years of zero action on men's problems while feminism dealt with the really big issues like microagressions and manspreading.

Then, around 2008, something happened. That something was Paul Elam and his web site, A Voice for Men. MRAs had gotten sick of waiting for action that would never come and started to fight for men's issues on their own using an evidence-based approach outside of the narrow lens of ideological feminism and, just as importantly, completely regardless of the way that feminists felt about it. Of course feminists opposed that (because feminism is all about equality, right? Totally not a dogmatic cult) and what was their response? "There's no need for the MRM because Feminism is taking care of it".

When MRAs pointed out that in the past 40 years of feminist activism they had done exactly NOTHING for men and had actually made things worse by introducing discriminatory policies like the Duluth model, Title IX, The "Dear Colleague" letter, and VAWA (to name just a few) that actively harm men, Feminists replied derisively, "MRAs don't care about men, they are just angry men who hate women. If they really cared about men they'd forget about trying to stop men killing themselves at wholesale rates and lobbying for men's DV shelters and help Feminism rid the world of Patriarchy instead because that's the real cause of all their so-called 'problems'" (even though Patriarchy is supposedly a system that assists men).

It was clear to MRAs that Feminism had no interest in helping men, none whatsoever. Feminism was never about equality, it was always about gaining advantages for women without limit and with no end point in sight. It was also clear that they would not tolerate any approach to gender issues except feminism. It was their way or the highway and 40 years of walking alongside the feminism float in the gender parade had proven that their way was a dead end for men (and literally death for many men).

So the highway it was, and the sensibilities of Feminists be damned.

It was then, and only then, that things finally started to change. Over the next 5 to 6 years, awareness of men's issues rose incredibly fast. The media finally started to take notice (although they still viewed gender issues through the myopic lens of feminism and were rarely complimentary), people started speaking out more often, and more and more people were becoming aware of the issues that men face and the largely ignored ways in which society discriminates against them. Men's Rights Advocacy exploded online.

At the same time, the more that feminists resisted this progress, the more opportunities we were given to shine the spotlight of public attention on them and their violent, bigoted, childish, and censorious tactics and to counter their misinformation with well-referenced data and peer-reviewed studies. The public at large started to make it quite clear that it was not impressed with what feminism had become.

Feminists sure didn't like that. As I have seen others say, "The truth is not hate but, oh, how it is hated!".

At around this point feminists realised that the rise of the MRM meant that their stranglehold on the gender narrative (and more importantly the government funding that goes with it) was at risk and, whereas before they were content to ignore and ridicule us, it now became all out war. MRAs were evil, violent, racist, homophobic, rape supporting, misogynist, kitten-eating, 2-headed monsters from outer-space, and must be stopped at all costs! But that attitude only made their tactics even more desperate and extreme, even more dishonest and censorious. We simply weathered their abuse (which is/was harder than it sounds) while doing little more than continuing to shine the spotlight of public attention on them. Again, this worked beautifully and the world saw just how crazy and mendacious feminists can be. Even greater support for the MRM followed.

Fast forward another 5 years to the present…

Feminism is now on the back foot and is being forced to make concessions. We have politicians in the US, UK, and Australia who are starting to oppose the more blatantly sexist Feminist policies and the media is not only taking regular notice of us but is even, increasingly, giving us a fair shake. There has even been a hollywood-quality feature length documentary (The Red Pill) made about the MRM by award-winning film maker Cassie Jaye, and its not even a hit piece! (not that feminists didn't try to make it one by threatening to block her funding unless they got creative control).

The number of people who identify as feminists is now at an all time low (18% in the US, 7% in the UK) and feminism is widely (and rightly) seen as a ridiculous self-contradictory set of hateful dogma without any intellectual merit, generated by bigoted man-hating crazies.

Feminism does still have significant political and academic power but these institutions are downstream from culture and will change when the attitude of the population has shifted sufficiently. That point is not very far away.

So, what exactly was it that I have noticed?

I've noticed that, when Feminism had a vice-grip on the whip they couldn't give a toss about men. They had to give men's issues lip-service in order to maintain the façade of being about equality but they never had the slightest intention of addressing any of men's issues and in fact took every opportunity to ridicule, belittle, and shame into silence, the few men and women that dared to raise them. Worse, if men were harmed in the service of gaining more rights and privileges for women then that was just fine by them, many even preferred it.

However, now that the MRM has managed to pry Feminism's fingers from the neck of the gender narrative and Feminists can see the writing on the wall, they are scared witless and well they should be! Not because they face retribution from the MRM and not because the MRM wants to oppress women. No, they are scared because the rise of the MRM means the loss of their stranglehold on the narrative and will likely mean the loss of the political and academic power, and most of all the funding, that they have enjoyed (and exploited) for so long.

So NOW, after 30+ years of ignoring men's issues, NOW after an additional 15 years of ridiculing, dismissing, demonising and lying about men, NOW that their monopoly on the narrative and stranglehold on the cashflow is no longer secure, NOW they want to kiss and make up? NOW they want a "Big Tent" approach? NOW they are interested in addressing men's issues (this time for sure!)?

Yeah? Well I very much doubt it.

But maybe they really mean it this time. Maybe they have seen the error of their ways and really do want to help men, maybe they are sincere… Yeah, and maybe pigs will start their own airline.

It's too little, too late. Charlie Brown is sick of Lucy pulling the football away at the last second and he's not falling for that ever again.

Perhaps if Feminists had shown a little bit of integrity and made some genuine overtures of co-operation before they were grabbed by the scruff of the neck and forced to the table by the MRM they would have a bit more credibility but in my view the only thing they are sorry about is that they can no longer get away with ignoring the issues facing men with impunity and that this "olive branch" is nothing but damage control in the fight to retain control of the narrative.

Once again, as always, Feminists are thinking only of themselves, not men.

Feminists have made their filthy, sticky, flea-ridden bed and this time they are going to have to lie in it. Lucky for them, lying is what they do best.

It boils down to this, Feminism now has 2 simple options:

1) Get out of our way

OR

2) Be utterly destroyed

Choose!

New: In depth interview with Cassie Jaye in Los Angeles

Gary Costanza · 13 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Cassie Jaye responds to criticism of “The Red Pill” and comments on the LA premiere. Brilliant and insightful, as usual.

Please help us towards funding Tom, the ICMI16 video cameraman, to video record ICMI17 in Australia

Mike Buchanan · 14 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The London conference was only possible financially because some amazing people offered their time and expertise at no charge. Top of the list was Tom, who filmed all the presentations, about which we've had excellent feedback. He worked crazy hours during the conference, and crazy hours in the following weeks, editing the video and audio files. Everyone found him a pleasure to work with.

One reason he was able to work without charging us in London was that he lives nearby. The same will obviously not be true for the next conference, in Australia, in June 2017. So Tom has started a crowdfunder for contributions towards his travel and accommodation costs in Australia, and we've donated £100.00. Please join us in supporting him, his crowdfunder is here. Thank you.

Why Trump won

AVFM · 14 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM is a non-partisan publication, but recently politics has come to focus on gender and social justice issues more frankly. With this development we encourage those who wish to publish works of a partisan nature to submit your articles for consideration. We ask that they be relevant to the continuing discussion of men's Rights and the politics affecting them. The following is a blog post by AVFM forum member Maxx, republished here with his permission. – EDs.

As the progressive media scrambles to lick its wounds and process the stunning 2016 election results a number of manifestly false narratives are already emerging to explain away what happened:

> Evil white people did it!
>
> It was because of racism and sexism!
>
> It was because not enough people are educated enough to vote the way we tell them to!
>
> The old screwed the young!

None of these narratives stand up in the face of the evidence at hand, none of them stand up to the slightest bit of scrutiny. Fewer women voted for Clinton than did Obama. Of the 19% of Millennials that turned out at all, 40% turned out for Trump. Trump's win would have been impossible without MILLIONS of female votes. Impossible without MILLIONS of minority votes. Impossible without MILLIONS of gay votes.

So let's get real people.

Let's talk about the real reasons why Donald J Trump stands before the American people today, against all possible odds, as the President-elect.

Hope and change 2.0

Eight years ago Obama ran on the platform of hope and change. He ran on promises made to the little people. He spoke to the dreams of the aspirational and the idealists, who wanted Guantanamo shut down, who wanted US troops out of Iraq. Wanted their government to help them in their hour of need. It didn't happen. None of it happened. There are drones everywhere. Guantanamo is going strong as ever. Ordinary families are being crushed by skyrocketing premiums. The economy is in bad shape. The Obama dream turned into a nightmare.

And that's why the same people who voted for the first President of color, eight years later showed his heir apparent (in Clinton) to the exit in such dramatic and unceremonious fashion.

People of all colors and creeds across the greatest republic in the free world sure as heck weren't racists when they voted in their great countries' first African American President.

And they sure as heck didn't become racists overnight when they pulled the plug on his disastrous legacy and put their faith in an outsider to turn their country back round.

Globalism vs. Nationalism

Comparisons to Brexit have abounded in the wake of the stunning election result. There are parallels just not the ones the mainstream media would like to have the public believe. Brexit wasn't the victory for the unwashed, uneducated masses that liberals have dressed it up to be. But it was a stunning blow that busted open the nose of the Globalist cabal intent on turning the entire world into an exploitative protection racket that serves to line the pockets of them and their affiliates.

With Brexit the ordinary people of the UK landed a clean shot, they bloodied the nose of the machine.

And ordinary citizens in the USA and across the world took note – 'IF IT BLEEDS WE CAN KILL IT!'

If Brexit landed cleanly on the machine, Trump's election victory scored a stunning knock down that put the monster down for the 8-count. Prepare to reap the whirlwind gentlemen. The battle for America has just begun.

His message was inclusive

Contrary to the desperate thrashings of a media machine that was losing control of the narrative Trump wasn't the candidate with the divisive message. Never let anyone convince you of that lie. While Trump spoke of a better American for all the forgotten Americans, his opponents scrambled to divide the country into 'haves' and 'have-nots' into black lives that matter and against blue lives that don't. Into the LGBTQ rainbow and assorted self-identification set against the silent majority of ordinary middle American traditional families that we were supposed to regard as the passive agents of silent oppression, merely because they dared to exist at all. Into sexist men who were going to vote for the 'pussy grabber' Trump and empowered progressive women who were gonna break the last ceiling for their gal' Clinton.

And the divisive identity politics FAILED. The forgotten ordinary people of the country spoke with a single voice.

Trump struck a cord with so many across every possible divide imaginable because he was talking about what it means to be American. He spoke to the core values that UNITE, not the individual identities and differences that DIVIDE.

That's why he won more of the Latino vote than Romney did.

While he spoke of the REAL documented rape threat posed to REAL women by mass unchecked illegal immigration, his opponents instead focused on his offensive use of language.

As he spoke to real women about their real concerns, his opponents attempted to bury his bid for the White House in a wave of feminist hysteria orchestrated by a small minority of special snowflakes living lives so protected and sheltered that they seemingly didn't realize the difference between an 'offensive' 'sexist' remark and an actual infringement on the integrity of an innocent woman's body.

It's the economy stupid

While his rival promised more of the same disastrous oppressive economic policies, that drowned small businesses and suffocated the entrepreneurial dreams, aspirations, and plans of the aspiring job creators of the future, the host of the apprentice fittingly enough, promised something else.

He promised deregulation. He pledged to get the King Kong-sized monkey of oppressive government off the backs of businesses in their infancy crumbling under the weight of progressive policies written to line the pockets of people who disingenuously PRETENDED to have the best interests of all the hard-working little American dreamers at heart.

While the left had promised and delivered eight years of oppressive legislated equality, Trump ran on the promise of legislated opportunity. Of an administration, that would step back and allow fair competition to unfold.

Trump ran (and won) on the promise that he would liberate ordinary Americans from the shared misery of progressive economic policy and all the bureaucracy and bullshit that goes with it.

Whether he can deliver on his promises or not remains to be seen.

Clinton wasn't the lesser of two evils

While Donald Trump spoke to the hopes and dreams of ordinary Americans (while acknowledging the policies and ideas that had caused so many of their lives to devolve into nightmares), the Clinton camp buttoned down on the most negative possible party line:

#NeverTrump

While they accused Trump of dishonestly exaggerated fear-mongering in one breath, they tried to convince the electorate that he was Satan incarnate in the next.

When progressives start calling you the next Hitler it's a sure fire sign that they are running out of ammunition and getting desperate.

It's evidence that you are winning. It was for President-elect Trump.

While he spoke of making America great again with free trade, strong borders and a renewed sense of national pride based on shared aspirational values, the Clinton campaign dug up Howard Stern interviews from several decades ago. They dug up every dumb comment the guy had made over the course of almost 40 years of public life, and they presented them to the American people as evidence that he was the sexist, racist monster they claimed. That he was the next Hitler.

You could almost hear them say – "There. Now go vote for her you stupid deplorable cunts."

Clinton's camp lost all but the dumbest of America's youth when they screwed their idealistic candidate of choice out of a fair shake at running for office. And then there's 'those emails' and the horrific things they conclusively prove.

The real basket of 'deplorables' it turns out, where her and her pirate crew of profiteers and the nefarious network of foreign Batman villains pumping money into her slush funds in exchange for everything from arms to the opportunity to dictate foreign policy.

In years to come people will wonder how anyone ever underestimated the collective intelligence of the American people enough to think such an absurd narrative could possibly convince them to vote themselves into a spiral of terminal economic decline, into social and cultural collapse and into mortal conflict with the ENEMIES of ISIS (in Iran and Russia).

Sorry George Soros. We, the people, saw your snake in the grass. And we whacked that motherfucker off Capitol Hill.

Featured Image: By Krassotkin (derivative), Gage Skidmore (Donald Trump), Gage Skidmore (Hillary Clinton), CC BY-SA 3.0, http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0, via Wikimedia Commons

Helping feminists win the Presidency

August Løvenskiolds · 15 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It has been suggested from time to time that Men's Rights Advocates (MRAs) should ally with feminists to work toward gender equality. There are some problems with this – such as, any man who speaks in the presence of any feminist is automatically dismissed as a mansplainer – but after feasting on a billion feminist tears from the stinging defeat of Hillary Clinton, in my sobering glee I have decided that allying myself with feminists is the right thing to do in a good faith effort to bring a small measure of healing to this wound that can never stop bleeding.

From my lived experience, my feels and thoroughly checked privilege have inspired me to share some words of positivity, support and inclusion with the hirsute sisterhood in the hope that a future election will smash the patriarchy to create an America worthy of the first woman President.

My humble recommendation is this: don't change a thing. Here are some woke examples that will illuminate what I mean by this.

1. Keep breaking your promises. Many feminists who promised to move to Canada if Trump won have already reneged on their word. I think Hillary surrogates Lena Dunham, Amy Schumer and Al Sharpton have already flaked out on their promise of expatriation, and this is a good thing – the last thing Americans want is a President who keeps his or her promises, and by breaking your solemn vows you reassure us all that all feminists are flakes. Men find this "Manic Pixie Dream Girl" unpredictability motif to be especially charming as it reassures us that women will not be ready for real power any time soon, if ever, and this is the precise stereotype of women that will help female candidates in the future to work their charming kookiness on voters.
2. Keep avoiding any form of self-reflection. Why blame your own failings when blaming everyone else is more fun? While many losers wind up second-guessing and retooling themselves in the hope of improving themselves and their outcomes, this is a feature of the patriarchy that advances civilization and so you should continue to eschew it. Keep telling yourselves that "Losers do not need to change; winners do." Let men handle the hard intellectual work of improving things – you need to show that women's job is to complain, not lead. Besides, math is difficult and a part of rape culture. Yucky.
3. Keep absurdly characterizing your opponents as fascists, KKK members, or whatever. By denigrating your opponents unabashedly you will naturally shame voters into falling in line behind you. This worked well at the opinion polls where millions of Americans hid their actual candidate preference (Trump) to seem politically correct to pollsters. If you keep this up you will never have to talk about tedious stuff like public policy on immigration or military readiness. Boring! Forcing voters deeper underground might eventually stop them from being energized to vote against your preferred lady hopefuls.
4. Keep demanding free stuff from the government. Nothing is more adorable than a child having a meltdown in the checkout line as she cries for candy, and a great way for you to enforce the brand of neediness in women is keep up the frantic begging. Free tuition? Sure! Free tampons and birth control? Why not? Why should child support stop at age 18? As long as a woman believes she needs free stuff she should get free stuff. You don't even have to earn votes – you should get those for free, too. It is only fair, right? Right?
5. Keep fabricating rape and abuse cases. In addition to further bolstering your ditzy, flaky charm, fake rape cases that turn men into felons remove one more man from the ranks of voters who might vote against you. Undermining the credibility of true victims of rape is a small price to pay for the catharsis of letting your hateful flake flag flutter.
6. Keep rioting and calling for the deaths of men and police officers. Nothing shows the real leadership character of women like civil disorder, burning down your own neighborhood, and androcide. That is the sort of woman we need in the Oval Office and I don't mean underneath the desk. Although most white women voted for Trump, I am sure they can be terrified and whipped into a frenzy if you just keep attacking their sons, brothers, fathers, husbands, and other trusted male friends as well as removing the willingness of the police to rescue them.

7. Keep whining about small annoyances as if they are crumbling the world. So what if Muslims want to behead every GLBTQ person they can find? Ignore that as usual! Sexist air conditioning is despoiling the office! Manspreading is transit torture! Did I mention the crying need for free tampons? By acting as if all women are petty complainers who can never be satisfied or express gratitude, you make femininity in candidates seem like a prefect idea for the most powerful office in the world. Yes you do. You do!
8. Keep retreating to your safe spaces. It takes a lot of courage to hide in a closet coloring in a book when a crisis comes along. This is what Americans demand in their leaders – complete impotence in the face of the tiniest microaggression. You must show America that women are strong enough to color the sky pink and purple as the terrorists are blowing things up. Pretty! You color so well!
9. Keep attacking any woman who dares to disagree with you. Remember that special place in hell for women who don't support other women! Vaginal solidarity is the best antidote for internalized misogyny, and women will quickly fall into line if you just abuse and insult them enough. You can throw your vagina at men but women need a vicious, more passive-aggressive touch.
10. Keep trusting the news media. They told you whatever they thought would ease your minds, and there is no reason to let reality interrupt your faith in them. They didn't bother with the truth about the election and you should not either.
11. BONUS! Keep attacking/ignoring MRAs. This worked wonderfully in this past election and there is no reason for you to treat men as equals. It is enough for you to pretend to support equality in order to beard your real agenda of female supremacy. No one will ever see through your ruse, I promise.

Resistance to International Men's Day

Jason Thompson · 15 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: First published in 2012 at AVfM, we bring you this historical article again on the eve of IMD. This article is also available in Portuguese.

This article is about how one gutsy MRA started International Men's Day despite attempts to shut him down. His name was Thomas Oaster.

Thomas Oaster was an articulate and passionate men's rights advocate. He was prolific in his work with men's groups, men's issues, and political advocacy both on and off campus where he taught. He had many fine MRAs around him, men and women who helped to improve the lot of males, but what of the man himself? Who was he really, and what is the unknown story of how he inaugurated the first International Men's Day? The following will be about Thomas Oaster and how he put IMD on the map for all who choose to celebrate the event into the distant future.

In the early 1990's Oaster's growing interest in advocating for men (and gynocentric resistance to that advocacy) led him to the idea of creating a globally celebrated International Men's Day. His goal was to create a platform where the stories of men could be told in their own words rather than being interpreted by others.

In a moment of nostalgia about this dream he mused:

> "You don't get points in men's groups for flexing your ego, but I'd like it to be known that Kansas City has become the hometown of International Men's Day because a hometown boy got that thing rolling."[1]

As you will read in what follows Thomas Oaster, and Kansas City, can indeed now take credit for being the epicenter of a global movement.

The first IMD event took place in 1992 when small groups of MRAs scattered through 4 continents simultaneously celebrated with Oaster in the first celebration. Today, thanks to his vision, there are millions of people in more than 60 countries celebrating IMD. This achievement is remarkable when we consider it took place 30 years ago at a time when advocacy for men and boys was considered unthinkable.

Thomas Oaster was the Director of the Missouri Center for Men's Studies and employed as Associate Professor at the University of Missouri, Kansas City where he taught classes on men's issues. That's right, classes on real men's issues. He told of how he first became attracted to the men's movement by an intellectual interest, but quickly came to feel persecuted for his association with this politically incorrect subject. "I got beat up, slammed" reports Oaster, "People said, 'What – do you hate women?' The more I got beat up, the more I got drawn in. My Teutonic background took over." [1].

During February 1991, Oaster wondered if a global recognition of men and their issues might be framed as a men's strike day, a kind of protest against misandry, which could be observed under the moniker 'Men's Day Off.' He later softened his approach, re-framing the proposed event as an educational exchange on men's issues, thus was born the idea of International Men's Day.

The first IMD event was organized and launched by Oaster on February 7, 1992 for the purpose of what he said was "drawing positive attention to important [men's] issues." [2] The event was successful both in 1992 and again in 1993 and 1994.[3] People in four continents celebrated and guests at the various events came along to hear speakers talk on topics ranging from the "silent tragedy of men's health" to "man bashing" and to share, talk, wine and dine.

It was a miraculous occasion. For the first time in history people gathered at the same time on four continents to actually speak of such things. On that day, February 7, men and women rejoiced in the company of like-minded souls as they shared intimate stories that ears had never before heard. Oaster spoke at his hometown Kansas event, reminding attendees that discussion of men's health and wellbeing deserved to be heard though the cacophony of misandry;

> "We want the bashing to stop. It's not a request. It's a statement. We want it to stop! To give you an example, a woman walked through here and saw the material and said, 'You've got to be kidding. You're not seriously going to have a men's day, are you?'"[4]

Oaster hoped that the day could become a means of education and consciousness raising where the positive cultural accomplishments of men could be celebrated and men might be faced with a better variety of choices about how they wanted to live their lives;

"Women and men should both have options" wrote Oaster, and "International Men's Day is an opportunity to draw attention to the issue of options."[5]

Oaster proposed six core objectives for a men's day, and they were to: celebrate men's positive traits and contributions, improve gender relations, focus attention on men's health and wellbeing, remove misandry, increase life options for men and boys, and to develop a humanitarian-style approach to all men's issues. These six objectives were the foundations that would later be reaffirmed and ratified by a new generation of IMD celebrants, but not before a group of 'anti-Oaster' University women had played their final hand.

After the popular success of the first International Men's Day event in 1992, feminists at his campus became increasingly vindictive. During his planning for the 1994 and 1995 IMD events, a bomb was suddenly dropped by at least 6 former and current female 'graduate students' who collectively complained that Oaster had sexually harassed them and was "hostile" in the classroom. The two most serious allegations put forward by the troupe were that Thomas Oaster had touched the forearm of one student with what she perceived was a "brief stroking motion", and that he had advised another student to dye her hair blonde in response to her question about what she could do improve her poor grade. To drive the nail deeper another student said he had referred to her as "Blondie" at least twice. The curators at the university entertained these shallow and dubious allegations and were quick to respond by imposing restrictions on Oaster's movements and work. [6]

Despite these distractions the next two IMD events went extremely well with several hundred individuals in attendance. However the fourth year of IMD heralded a change in the weather when his antagonists decided to double-down in their efforts to shut him down.

In 1995 Oaster had planned to orchestrate his fourth and biggest IMD event when he increasingly became the target of workplace bullying. He decided to sue the Curators of the University for Infringement of his civil rights as a tenured professor, claiming that he was being denied freedom of speech, salary increases, graduate teaching assistants and the use of university facilities.[6] Naturally the court proceedings took up much of his time and energy and this taxed his ability to effectively organize or advertise the upcoming IMD event.

Due to these circumstances the next IMD event was a flop with few people turning up. After this failure, and feeling drained by a complex court case, Oaster decided to defer future IMD plans and take a well-deserved rest.

With precision, Thomas Oaster had been persecuted for his role in the men's rights movement. [6] Late in 1995 Oaster won his court case against the UMKC and the University was forced to pay him $74,000 plus $15,000 for legal fees. After settlement Oaster resigned from his job as he felt he would no longer have the respect of his students, and he shelved plans to continue celebrating IMD. [6]

General interest in the event waned until 1999 when Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh, a History Professor at the University of the West Indies revived the event and shifted the date to November 19 – the date of his father's birthday.

Jerome Teelucksingh continued Oaster's emphasis on highlighting positive aspects and accomplishments of men. In a 2009 interview Teelucksingh also gave a nod to the work of Oaster when he stated this;

> "I could be considered the founder of this version of IMD on 19 November but we need to also acknowledge the pioneering efforts of persons and groups before 1999… They are the ones to be honoured." [3]

In 2009 an international IMD committee was formed with Jerome Teelucksingh as chairman. The group came together to increase awareness about the event and to foster its growth into more nations.

Taking note of the foundational IMD objectives introduced by both Oaster and Teelucksingh, the committee encapsulated the objectives of International Men's Day in six guiding principles that would serve to protect the core values of the day and offer a reliable reference point for future IMD celebrants.[3] The 'Six Pillars,' which are suitably loose and open to interpretation, are now used as a guide by IMD celebrants around the world:

- To promote positive male role models; not just movie stars and sports men but everyday, working class men who are living decent, honest lives.
- To celebrate men's positive contributions to society, community, family, marriage, child care, and to the environment.
- To focus on men's health and wellbeing; social, emotional, physical and spiritual.
- To highlight discrimination against males; in areas of social services, social attitudes and expectations, and law.
- To improve gender relations and promote gender equality.
- To create a safer, better world; where people can live free from harm and grow to reach their full potential

It's my belief that the spirit of Oaster's original vision and that of A Voice for Men have much in common. Both movements aim to create an inclusive international voice for men as free as possible from sectarian distractions. Moreover, both IMD and AVfM reject the notion of a unified men's movement, encouraging instead a diversity of men's voices on a variety of humanitarian issues:

Thomas Oaster said this:

> [T]here is no such thing as a unified men's movement, the phenomena involved comprise a variety of sub-movements, even after analogies to other issues concerning which there are far left, far right, and middle-of-the-road orientations, there is yet another more fundamental point which can be made about the value of respect for all men as human beings. A day of respect should go beyond the current social activities referred to as Men's movements. This is true because the men's movement itself goes beyond the Men's movements. The men's movement, more fundamentally, is a turning of the human psyche and the articulation of this turning through the male voice.[5]

Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com said:

> [C]ontinuing to buy into the false unity of a non-existent entity will only slow us down. I have always taken care, and still do, to point out that AVfM is not synonymous with the men's movement. And after mulling this over one more time of thousands, I am really glad that I have taken this approach. I don't know what the men's movement is, in all honesty. I don't even know that it exists.[7]

While the similarities in the two movements are obvious, there are some important differences. For instance in Thomas Oaster's day there was no internet, whereas today it is a vital medium for all activism, including here at AVfM. Another difference is that IMD focuses the year-long work of activists into one big day of publicity, whereas other activists strive to make ‘every day’ a men’s day via regular online publicity.

. . .

International Men’s Day is a grassroots movement with no official management. It does not belong to any government nor is it owned by the United Nations or any of its agencies. We might say that nobody owns the event, or better yet everybody owns it. Any person can self-nominate as an IMD coordinator for a specific region or event and, if desired can form alliances with an international network of individuals working to promote the day. Any current and future coordinators are merely hitch-hikers catching a ride on an international platform that nobody owns.

Nobody needs to gain permission to mark the day. All one need do is be mindful of the spirit of the occasion as laid out in the six pillars which ask us to remain true to the lives of men and boys without allowing that message to be diminished by negative or irrelevant concerns.

In recent years IMD has spread into new regions and attracted some mainstream attention. With this new attention it is perhaps time to remind newcomers that the originators of the event were fighting for liberty and freedom, and that we still have a very long way to go on this front.

With this in mind let us finish with words of Abraham Lincoln’s Gettysburg address, itself delivered on November 19- the date of International Men’s Day. The words of his address speak equally to the purpose of International Men’s Day today and of the great sacrifices made by Oaster and other men and women who fought on the battlefield of cultural misandry;

> ‘Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure… The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated [the ground], far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced.’ [Lincoln]

Despite the resistance, the tradition of IMD lives on. In Oaster’s name let’s dream it forward.

Sources:

[1] George Gurley, ‘Finally, men get their day’ (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)

[2] Fred Wickman, ‘about Town’ (Kansas City Star: Jan 27, 1992)

[3] Jason Thompson, ‘International Men’s Day; the making of a movement’ (Soul Books, 2010)

[4] James Fussell, ‘Men have their say at weekend forum’ (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)

[5] Thomas Oaster, ‘International Men’s Day: RSVP’ (Cummings and Hathaway, 1992)

[6] Cheryl Thompson, ‘Complaints surface about UMKC professor’ (Kansas City Star: Mar 10, 2003)

[7] Paul Elam, ‘Adios, c-ya, good-bye man-o-sphere’ (A Voice for Men. retrieved October 2012)

D’oh Canada!

AVfM Video Source · 15 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Evil Pete Scamardo meets his maker

Gary Costanza · 16 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Chris Mackney

From Michael Volpe's article about the demise of Peter Scamardo, one of Chris Mackney's primary bullies:

"WASHINGTON, March 20, 2016 – A notorious real estate mogul responsible for the deaths of at least two fathers to six children, forty five years apart, is dead himself."

To many of us here at AVFM and around the world, all we have to say is rot in hell you piece of garbage.

AVFM championed the story of Chris Mackney and bravely published many articles relating his tragic story and attempted cover-ups by his ex-wife and other corrupt parties, one of which was Peter Scamardo.

I'll catch you up on this tale by quoting the book description at Amazon.com "Bullied to Death: Chris Mackney's Kafkaesque Divorce" by Michael Volpe:

"On December 29, 2013, Chris Mackney sat alone in his parked car, put a shot gun underneath his chin and blew his head off. It was the tragic end to a near six year custody battle which saw him penniless, homeless, jobless, with no access to his children, and taunted and threatened with jail: all at the behest of his ex-wife and her father. This all started when Mackney discovered that his father-in-law was a murderer and the man who got away with one murder engineered a suicide to hide it. "Murder by suicide" Mackney called it. The legal bullying didn't stop with his suicide. His ex-wife followed him into the grave and attempted to copyright his suicide note. When that blew up, Mackney became a martyr and symbol for all that's wrong with family courts. His suicide note has been read by millions, but now the whole unbelievable story is told."

AVFM published quite a few pieces over the years to support Chris's case and legacy after his death, up to the point where his ex-wife tried to erase all evidence of their divorce and the circumstances of his suicide.

Read or watch them here:

Paul Elam interviews Michael Volpe here and here.

Bullied to Death: Chris Mackney's Kafka-esque Divorce Chapter 5 Preview (from Volpe's book)

Chris Mackney: Reaching out for help (Chris's blog)

I am Chris Mackney, and I have something to say from the grave (Chris's blog)

Chris Mackney: suicide note (read by Judgy Bitch)

The Suicide Note Dina Mackney Did Not Want You To Read (read by Gary Costanza)

American family courts, the First Amendment, and violations of free speech: Part II

The Murder of Sam Degelia Jr. (one of two murders by p.o.s. Peter Scamardo)

Here come the lawyers to AVFM, yet again

Again, read this last article from Volpe about Chris Mackney and his tormentors Dina Mackney, Peter Scamardo, and the family court.

Please consider buying Volpe's courageous book, and by no means consider buying anything from this other piece of garbage.

The Secret War

Kit Martin · 17 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Whenever any service member is accused of any type of domestic violence, sexual harassment, or sexual assault; service members are strongly encouraged to keep in mind the following unwritten "rules." There are a lot of excellent papers covering this topic with great references; this is not one of them. I am not going to try and duplicate those efforts. I want to give you a quick and easy synopsis of what you are facing and what you need to do. When you have time, you will need to read the papers referenced in this article. This will give you a deeper understanding of the history of this issue and how the system and its cronies are now stacked against you. Due process and fundamental fairness have been replaced by political expediency.

The Secret War, you are now in it.

There is a secret war being waged in the military. You need to understand that what you are facing now is a direct result of the Department of Defense trying to appease certain female politicians in order to maintain its own power. Due process and service member rights have been sacrificed in order streamline the process. This includes changes to the UCMJ, special "victim" programs, and a reward system for false accusers. If you have been accused, the full weight of the U.S. government is now coming down on you. The ultimate goal is to get you to admit guilt. This will make their statistics look better. They will do this by pushing plea deals and only offering you counseling for parole if you first accept guilt, the game is stacked.

Once accused, you are GUILTY until proven guilty!

Once on the "radar" of commanders and prosecutors, collateral charges will continue to be added in order to get you for something.[1] This is especially true for current politically sensitive cases such as domestic violence, sexual harassment, and sexual assault.[2] Systems in the past such as an Article 32 Hearing (Preliminary Hearing) that used to serve as "sanity checks" are now only speed bumps to a Court Martial.[3]

CYA. Cover Your A$$!

Covering their butts is the primary concern of virtually all "leaders" and judges in the military today. This is especially true for generals that can, and will, have their promotions blocked by politicians.[4]

Military Sexual Harassment/Assault Response and Prevention (SHARP) Training is a farce.

The current political and media narrative is that there is a rape "epidemic" in our military. SHARP training has made all members of the military biased in their perceptions of what sexual assault really is and women are told they can reinterpret any sexual encounter they have ever had at any time with no statute of limitations. Not only that, but the military will pay them for it! Can you design a system more likely to be abused?

Any relationship is a potential liability.

Every person you have a relationship with is a potential liability and future "victim." At work, never put yourself in a position of vulnerability such as meeting/counseling a member of the opposite sex alone. Be careful in your relationships with women that have children, it will be you versus them.

As a man, if you are the one to call the police or MPs in any scenario, you are probably going to get arrested.

This applies even if they have to pry that frying pan or ax out of your head that your spouse or girlfriend hit you with. Law enforcement views you as a threat, a potential Rambo.

EPOs are easy, expect to be served!

Your spouse, or almost anyone; girlfriend; the woman you met at the bar the night before; a female military member who you walked by in the hallway; (check your state's laws), can make an accusation and file an EPO

(Emergency Protective Order) against you at any time.[5] If they live with you, all that you leave behind is now theirs. Keep a copy of critical defense information with a trusted family member or friend. Just to pile it on, as the military loves to do, your commander will also give you an MPO, or military protection order, restricting your freedom and rights (CYA!). EPOs usually last for two weeks so that your "victim" has plenty of time to strip your house of all you own. Be sure to grab your laptop, titles, passport, etc. on your way out. If you have pets, don't leave them behind, they will starve. Have a contingency plan in preparation for being accused. Practice it, know it; rehearse.

The Military Family Advocacy Program (FAP) is a farce.

If there is a report of domestic abuse or violence a referral to FAP is mandatory by commanders (CYA!). Why wouldn't your accuser want to go all out against you? This is particularly the case of that ex that just lost all her government benefits. FAP needs to get you in their program, and they will hold a secret meeting to determine if you should be there. Oh, by the way, you can't attend and speak for yourself and provide evidence and witnesses, neither can your attorney. They won't tell you, but your assigned counselor that's "there for you" is also your accusers and they have probably already heard and bought into their version of events first.

Hire a competent civilian defense lawyer specializing in military courts-martial.

This is the single most important thing you can do! Do not trust military defense council! Yes, they are free, and yes, you get what you pay for. JAG lawyers are all friends and coworkers that share information whether it is intentional or not. New JAGs, junior captains, are usually the ones assigned as defense counsel. Their job is to push plea deals on unsuspecting clients. They also advise them to go judge alone instead of a panel ("jury"). Having a seasoned civilian attorney that knows how the military system works and knows how the key JAG "players" at your base operate is a deciding factor on what your sentence will be.[6]

You need to act as your own lawyer too. Document everything and keep a timeline.

This is the second best thing you can do. No one knows your case better than you. Be proactive and organized. Keep a daily log of events and documents to back them up. If your case is complicated, you will need a lawyer with a support staff. This can be crucial! Gather any other evidence that may be relevant to your case. Make a list of anyone that can serve as a witness for you. Nothing will isolate you more than being labeled a rapist or child molester. If you or your family and friends receive or discover something that may help you, make sure you take a snapshot and make a hard copy right away.[7]

"Victim" centered investigations by biased law enforcement are the new standard.

Like SHARP, "Victim" centered investigations (the victim must be believed) is so indoctrinated that many investigators don't think twice about their biased perspective.[8] Do not talk or make statements to them! Ever!! They get "results" through intimidation, coercion, and offering rewards. Do not submit to any testing without your attorney's approval and coordination. This means polygraphs too.[9]

REMEMBER: They are NOT there for the purposes of determining the truth. Once accused the primary purpose is to CONVICT someone, at any and all costs.[10]

The military is making "Victims" and Witnesses through bribery or coercion.

Military investigators and JAGs will usually look for only negative information and consult only witnesses that will help their case against you. They will start by telling your friends and associates that you are a rapist or child molester, and they need to help put you away to protect others (again, guilty until proven guilty). The second thing they will say is that there is a "victim" compensation program that pays thousands of dollars a month. Then they will ask "Did he ever sexually assault you? Are you a victim too?

The UCMJ process is held as being fair and impartial, but it's not, especially with recent changes.[11]

The military can keep you flagged and in an indeterminate status for as long as they want, just like Guantanamo. If you decide to opt for a Court Martial over an Article 15 (minor non-judicial punishment), the military has the option (and they will take it) to add additional collateral charges to your case so that something will stick and justify their witch hunt. They will also stack the same charge over and over again to increase the potential sentence and get you to take a plea deal (which means admitting guilt).

Military Prosecutors hold all the cards.

The military (il)legal process is a battle between lawyers and judges over rules and procedures, not a battle of determining the truth. The same is true for your courts-martial. Witnesses, evidence, and any information of your innocence will be fought, blocked, and argued to prevent it from becoming part of the proceedings. This will be kept from the panel.[12]

Expect devious tactics, lies, and other acts of investigative and prosecutorial misconduct to be part of the process. Everything is filtered through the prosecutors. They control everything! They can and will deny you the resources and witnesses you need to prove your innocence. The requests also telegraph your defense strategy. They will also try to block information that shows their accusers lies and past history. It's usually not admissible anyway. Prosecutors will elevate an Article 15 to a court-martial in order to eliminate evidence of innocence like contradictory statements, polygraph examinations, and prior criminal acts or acts of lying on the part of accusers. Prosecutors will instigate new charges from false accusers and provide them protection and benefits.

UCI, (Unlawful Command Influence) is alive and well.

Once you are on the "radar" of a self-serving commander, you are toast. This means if your commander's pet project for his next OER (evaluation) is, for example, reducing drug use, and that's what you're accused of, look out! You're getting both barrels. There is no standard of punishment per crime, only minimum, and maximum sentences, and every rule can be waived. This is another major flaw in the UCMJ.

Congressional Requests are double edged swords.

If you are being treated unfairly, you may request a Congressional Inquiry through your Congressman. I have seen this work well for some Soldiers and their families, but if you do, be prepared for possible backlash including additional charges.

A Courts Martial is a narrative, and your story cannot be told.

This is hard to understand, but my lawyer finally got it through my head. A court-martial is the prosecution telling your accusers story, often a story the prosecutors instigated. You do not get to tell your story. Military Rules of Evidence (MRE) prevent that, and the judge will make sure it doesn't happen. Your lawyers can only try to "poke" holes in the accuser's story. In other words, prove you didn't do something. How do you prove a negative? You raped me ten years ago, prove you didn't do it.

Courts-Martial Panels are not like a civilian jury; they are stacked against you.

This is not a civilian jury of 12 of your peers that must make a unanimous decision of guilt. This is a military panel of your superiors, sometimes as few as five. Only two-thirds majority is required for a felony conviction! Court members (panel members) will be selected based on their perceived loyalty to the convening authority. The courts-martial process is scary in how powerless you are. Your fate is in someone else's hands and you will be surprised out how little of your story (the truth) is allowed in. This is by design.

The worst part. There is no retribution against false accusers.

That's right; there is NO PUNISHMENT for false accusers, but there are rewards! Reasons for lying can be varied. They may want to avoid the consequences of adultery or punish their spouse for suspected adultery. Maybe there is a child custody dispute or maybe it's just the $$. Either way, the military loves getting into your bedroom and examining your life to show how bad you are. A senior female attorney specializing in campus sexual assault allegations stated at a conference I attended that- "90% of the time false rape and sexual assault allegations are done to either gain the sympathy of an ex, or punish “the one that got away.”[13]

The final rule- You can never really win!

Remember it’s the U.S. government versus you. You versus 20 Mike Tysons. The bottom line and the reality is that once you are accused; that’s it. Your career, and quite possibly your freedom, is over. Not all cases are like this of course, but this is the general rule of thumb. There are still some military leaders and commanders out there that utilize common sense and have spines, but they are being weeded out quickly.[14]

Ultimately nothing is going to change until the American people are made aware of what is happening and force their politicians to correct it. This can be done by-

1. Documenting and humanizing cases of wrongly accused veterans.
2. Documenting the unethical conduct of commanders, prosecutors, and investigators.
3. Showing the impact it has on military families and military readiness.

Conclusion

American Veterans and Service Members should have the same rights as the citizens they defend, a fair and impartial legal process. The military has shown it is not capable of being trusted to do this and is politically and internally biased. Specific changes need to be made:

1. Remove the military from all investigations and prosecutions expect those involving military and war specific crimes such as spying and desertion.
2. Give Service Members the same rights as citizens- innocent until proven guilty, jury trial by 12 peers, a unanimous verdict required. Sexual Assault investigations and trials should occur in the civilian county of where they allegedly occurred.
3. There should be a time limit on any allegation.
4. Stop rewarding accusers and giving them “special victim status” based only on an accusation.
5. Give all proven false accusers the max punishment their victims would have received.
6. Conduct a Department of Justice (DoJ) run 100% review in the cases of all veterans charged or convicted of sex crimes since the recent UCMJ changes and political UCI came into effect, approximately 2011.
7. Prosecute all commanders, JAG officers, and investigators that committed unethical and illegal actions.
8. Change EPO Laws to require a hearing of both parties first. Sanctuaries and other protections exist for emergency situations. Track all EPOs in a national public database to stop abusers and con-artists.
9. Dissolve all SHARP and FAP programs. Use unbiased private civilian agencies and real professionals.
10. Completely reform or disband the JAG Corps and military investigation agencies (and MRE), they have no oversight and have proven they cannot be trusted.

I know all of this hard to hear, but I hope this helps you and your family understand at least what you are facing and what needs to be done. Please pass this on to any and all military members and add your story or lessons.

For additional support, I would contact Save Our Heroes. They are networking with many other groups such as NCFM and CPI and have access to key leaders in this fight such as Michael Conzachi. “Saint” Michael is and has been, THE point man in this fight. As a veteran himself and former high profile detective and investigator, Mike can smell a rat, and he has been a tireless advocate for the falsely accused. I literally owe him and others my life.

If you are in the military and not yet accused, I advise you to GET OUT NOW!

If you have family or friends that are thinking about joining, have them read this first and do a little research, that should end any consideration they had of joining this cannibalistic organization.

Kit Martin

*****

[1] http://ncfm.org/2016/08/news/mens-health/ncfm-adviser-michael-conzachi-another-in-a-long-line-of-false-military-sexual-assault-cases/

[2] http://www.ucmj-defender.com/military-define-sexual-assault/

[3] JAG Lawyer MAJ Mason Weiss “Defending the Indefensible” http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2740061

[4] http://thehill.com/policy/defense/304283-mccaskill-blocks-generals-nomination-over-sex-assault-case

[5] http://www.legalmatch.com/law-library/article/emergency-protective-orders.html

[6] http://www.saveourheroesproject.com/

https://www.facebook.com/SaveOurHeroesProject/

[7] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/uknews/crime/10160029/Cab-driver-falsely-accused-of-rape-saved-by-his-phone-app.html

[8] http://www.helixongroup.com/always-believe-victim-meets-false-allegations-accused-suffers/

[9] http://www.ucmj-defender.com/confession-may-good-soul-bad-career/

[10] http://saveourheroesproject.org/legal-myths-sagapolice-are-objective-in-their-investigations/

[11] http://www.prosecutorintegrity.org/sa/mjp/

[12] http://www.ucmj-defender.com/military-justice-living-state-denial/

[13] NCFM College False Accusation Conference, 1 AUG, 2016 Charlotte, NC

[14] https://www.google.com/#q=200+military+leaders+fired

Jordan Peterson and Freedom of Speech – TFF Episode 52

AVfM Video Source · 18 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 52 Professor Fiamengo from the University of Ottawa argues that we are on the brink of losing Freedom of Speech in Canada and that all Canadians need to stand in support of University of Toronto professor Jordan B. Peterson.

A forum will be held on Saturday, November 19 at 9:30 AM at the U of T Campus. The composition of the forum is worth examining: three feminist women, two panelists and the moderator, and one man who clearly stands for Freedom of Speech.

It will be Live Cast on Jordan B Peterson's YouTube channel.

StudioBrule

The fox now guards the hen house

Bettina Arndt · 19 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

What a welcome surprise. In June this year, the NSW government announced a pilot programme for male victims of domestic violence. Finally, politicians were acknowledging that women aren't the only victims of family violence. A third of victims are male, said Pru Goward as she promised $13 million over four years for the pilot.

That's chickenfeed compared to the hundreds of millions that Malcolm Turnbull boasts are being spent on domestic violence across the country, all promoting an ideologically-driven agenda which pretends the problem is all about men and ignores 40 years of international research showing most family violence is two-way, involving women as well as men.

What a blow to discover last week that the government has awarded the contract for this vital new service to Men's Referral Service, an organization driven by feminist ideology and long known for shunning male victims. In the past, MRS was on the record for refusing to acknowledge the existence of male victims. More recently the organisation's position shifted to arguing male victims don't experience abuse in the same way as women and hence don't deserve support.

MRS has only ever worked with male perpetrators and is notorious for "red flagging" men who claim to be victims, attempting to prove they are in fact, perpetrators.

What is really astonishing is that the NSW government boasts that this was the reason MRS was chosen for the job. In response to my questions, the Attorney General's Department proudly proclaimed MRS was selected because of the organization's expertise in "how to identify a genuine victim."

"Victims will be referred to local support services in NSW while aggressors will be encouraged to take part in Men's Behaviour Change programmes."

There are currently no local services for male victims, but the government claims to be sleuthing out "holistic support" as "referral points" in 46 locations – heaven knows from where, given that almost all DV services currently refuse to help men.

But now the Fox is to be in charge of the hen house. Men victims, who are notoriously reluctant to seek help, are to be put through a dubious screening process run by an organization with a long history of decrying their very existence.

The AG's department claims the decision to use MRS is based on an evidence-based approach successfully trialed in the UK by Respect, a domestic violence organization. Yet there has been huge controversy in Britain over the Respect approach which many see as placing unnecessary barriers in the way of men who need help. Louise Dixon, a psychology professor formerly at the University of Birmingham but now in New Zealand, sums up the criticism of Respect's work: "the ethos that informs their practice is unsupported by the evidence and is ideologically-based." Many alternate domestic violence programmes have been established, particularly in Scotland, which are male-friendly and genuinely dedicated to helping victims in need.

Imagine the outcry if domestic violence services for women assumed most alleged victims were, in fact, perpetrators. The whole domestic violence movement is based on the premise that "we believe women" yet our first government-funded programme for male victims is to operate on the assumption that we shouldn't believe men.

It's hardly surprising that men working with victims around the country are up in arms. Yet this move by the NSW government is entirely in keeping with national domestic violence policy.

At a suicide prevention seminar last year one of the speakers was the manager of a male telephone helpline. He spoke about men who ring up saying they are suicidal as a result of being abused, physically and emotionally by their partners.

To the astonishment of the audience, the manager then revealed that when they receive a call from such a male victim they contact the police who track down the man's personal details by tracing the call. Assuming the male may be a perpetrator, the police then contact the man's partner to check out her side of the story.

Many in the audience were incredulous at this breach of confidentiality and failure of the duty of care to the potentially suicidal client. During questioning the manager revealed government policy determined his organization would lose government funding if they didn't assume all male victims were most likely perpetrators.

He's right. The official document spelling out Victorian government policy on DV (Family Violence – Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework) assumes men who present as victims of violence will often falsely blame their partners for their own aggression and advises such men plus their partners must be referred for comprehensive assessment.

So it is official government policy – not just in Victoria but under the national DV framework – to breach a male victim's privacy, contact the perpetrator of the violence and believe her side of the story at the expense of his. This could never happen in reverse, with our government hunting down the partners of female victims and choosing only to believe their version of events. The fact that our authorities are getting away with treating men this way shows the grip the anti-male DV lobby group has over this country.

I wrote recently about a Swedish politician, Eva Solberg, who denounced her government's anti-male strategy for combating domestic violence as a "tired gendered analysis" which has comprehensively failed – her country has one of the highest rates of domestic violence in the EU. She quoted the 1700 peer-reviewed papers showing most children growing up in violent homes witness violence from both their parents. "To know this and then continue to ignore the damage done to the children who are today subjected to violence is a huge social betrayal," said Solberg.

Since then I have heard from people across the country reporting men being abused by their partners, people who grew up with violent mothers, professionals every day confronting violence by women as well as men – social workers, policemen, psychologists, lawyers. They all report they are too afraid to speak out about what they know. The result is our governments get away with denying the complexities of this important social issue and the huge social betrayal just rolls on.

My Blog can be found here where I have included all the correspondence with the Justice Department. What is extraordinary is they finally admitted that this contract was awarded without an open tender process – unfortunately, this news came through this morning which was too late for my article. They awarded a contract on male victims of DV, to a feminist org that has a history of denying that such a thing exists. BA

This article was originally published in Spectator Australia. EDs

Rape and frightened women

Tim Patten · 20 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The editors of Parenting.com recommend that parents discuss private body parts and the subject of inappropriate touching with children when they are about three years old. The B-Inspired Mama blog suggests a more straightforward tack:

> We have got to put aside our differences as parents, and talk more about this terrible topic. I began telling my children at about 18 months that they own their bodies ("your body is all yours") and that no one has a right to touch them unless it's okay with them.

Nowadays, few of us have not heard about the ongoing threat of sexual assault, especially that which involves young girls. Parents, generally mothers, are deluged with advice on what to do. They are told to raise the topic in an honest and age-appropriate way, which usually gets translated into "Don't let anyone touch you down there."

While mothers may offer these warnings in a quiet and compassionate manner, they often convey a dark underlying message as their faces turn ashen and their lips tremble. In spite of their age, young children can be perceptive, and they are quick to absorb unspoken words. In fact, a mother's inner fears can become contagious; it doesn't take long before the indelible fear is etched onto her daughter's brain. Parents are socially constructing fear.

Like a growing number of young female children before her, she has been taught about the constant and pervasive threat of unwanted sex and rape–by men. Over time, her apprehension is compounded by repeated admonitions from parents reminding their daughters, maybe even pleading with them, to "Tell me if he touches you!" It isn't long before the dreaded anxiety about being raped becomes the social construct forever guiding another girl's life.

Indeed, according to various surveys, almost all women are worried about sexual abuse. A recent BuzzFeed article listed 29 everyday activities that ordinary women avoid because they are frozen and apprehensive about being attacked or abused by a male. Among the things, they are frightened of meeting the cable guy, traveling alone, couch surfing, and going out at night. Some are even anxious about wearing heels or a ponytail because it might be harder to flee from an attacker.

While many women readily agree, as a Vanity Fair poll found, with F.D.R.'s assessment that we have nothing to fear but fear itself, a majority also says that they are afraid of "walking alone at night," apparently alluding to concerns about being attacked, almost certainly by a man. Writer Anonymous Jane probably sums it up best when she says, "I'm smaller than most men and afraid of being beaten. I'm afraid of being raped, I'm afraid about being taken advantage of, I'm afraid of letting myself fall into an abusive relationship."

But Jane is not alone. Many women have repeated her words and others like them. For the most part, it seems that women are terrified of certain masculine traits, such as aggression, anger, and violence, for no other reason than that some men have exhibited them in ways that have hurt some women. Many readily accept that this is what men are like. Recent studies have found that up to two-thirds of women have had fantasies about being forced into sex, yet it is something they continued to be petrified of.

Women are taught to be Terrorized

In fact, according to Patricia D. Rozee, author of "Fear of Rape," an entry in the Women's Studies Encyclopedia, they fear this kind of attack more than any other violent offense. Her studies show that this phobia, common among a significant majority of girls and women, develops in the early years, generally between the ages of two and 12.

In many cases, those studied claim they remember hearing warnings from parents about stranger-danger at a very young age, although there was no explicit reference to sexual assault. But as they grew in age and maturity, their parents added increasingly explicit warnings that were probably thought to be age-appropriate. However, what might have begun as an earnest attempt at responsible parenting led to a circumstance where girls and women fear and distrust the opposite sex.

Discovering Boys

Against that backdrop, it is not surprising that when a girl who is somewhere between the ages of five and nine sees boys her age acting unruly and rambunctious, jesting or jousting, or engaging in rough-and-tumble sports-like play, she experiences rising anxiety. She may feel aghast as boys take chances and break the rules, triggering recollections of parental warnings about the things that men do. Before long, she may be thinking that she must protect her private parts, worrying that her deepest fears may become a reality.

When Girls Discover Romance

When they grow older and become "tweens," certain biological and social urges take over, and girls begin to develop new life goals, where romance is often a key aspiration. Some may be unsure about whether of not they are genuinely interested in pursuing romantic relationships, or if such feelings stem from peer pressure. Regardless, many find themselves embracing socially constructed messages about love and happiness, like those in the movies and romance novels.

This can spur mixed and complicated feelings; suddenly, they must look beyond, or even ignore, the ugly stereotypes about men that lurk in their minds. In many cases, they resolve the conflict by placing faith in the notion that love conquers all–even the threat of potential abuse. Unfortunately, this is an ignorant expectation that usually falls short. Humans express varying degrees of love, happiness, anger, joy and violent emotions at separate times. They are not static.

Feminist Ideology Reinforces Fear

As they approach adulthood, women quickly find themselves bombarded with popular feminist ideologies, including White Male Privilege, Patriarchy Theory, and Rape Culture Theory, which portray one-sided views of where women rank in the world. Through the narrow feminist lens, they generalize seeing women as being oppressed by a white male patriarchy of powerful and privileged men, and pegged as second-class citizens–relentlessly objectified, violated and raped.

These distorted and self-serving dogmas have played a major role in stereotyping males as aggressive, dangerous and toxic. Instead of boosting females' self-esteem and expanding their career options, modern feminism has helped to convert many women into angry, assertive male-hating anarchists, as Tom Martin writes, describing his experiences, in a Guardian commentary, "You Can't Deny it. Gender Studies Is Full of Male-Blaming Bias."

The feminists' misguided ideas have also polluted the system to such a degree that acquiring a genuine understanding about gender issues has become very difficult, if not impossible. Someone who reads through a copy of a book like Women's Voices, Feminist Visions: Classic and Contemporary Readings will experience a lens that points in one direction: the dark side of gendered violence, defined as male intimidation; emotional, verbal and physical abuse; sexual assault; rape; and murder.

Through this gendered lens of misinformation, we are repeatedly told that "men are violent," leaving gullible or impressionable readers with the belief that only women suffer from male abuse, stirring sympathy for their gender. But in reality, this is neither correct nor fair. A survey of abused men found that up to 95% of them had suffered systematic violence, rape, and coercion into unwanted sex at the hands of men and women.

In truth, individuals of both genders have been victimized in this way and yet men rarely go through life with the fear of being sexually assaulted. Admittedly, the masculine characteristics that many women seem to revile and fear, including strong emotional armor and a resilient reaction to aggression, provide them with a measure of protection. Men are socially constructed to manage violent situations, conflict and danger, and that is not, as the feminist propagandists would argue, a bad thing.

Conclusion

It would help, of course, if the nation's system of higher learning did its part in helping people to become genuinely enlightened. It would be better for all concerned, for example, if colleges taught women and men alike about the wonders of authentic masculinity, so as to ensure a healthy respect for the natural male and to counteract the false stereotypes that have been relentlessly reinforced.

Ironically, women have often tapped certain into masculine traits for their own agendas, but that is not the case in regard to rape fear. Women should be thinking about the role they played in creating an environment where males have been blamed for any number of society's ills. Instead of continuing the heritage of mothers telling girls about how bad men are, it is time for women to deconstruct these emotionally dangerous hypotheses–and prevent themselves and other females from living in misery. Mothers can educate children while not instilling paralyzing fear.

Efforts should be focused on developing programs to curb and work through fear and other unhealthy emotions, assuaging the tension that is holding everyone back. Millions of women can stand tall, shoulders relaxed, and live free of apprehension and anxiety based on a critical misunderstanding and misguided philosophies. Yes, there are men who do bad things, but the focus should be on figuring out how to stop these individuals, rather than denigrating the male gender as a whole.

Of course, the feminists must also do their part. They must put an end to so-called rape culture mantra that perpetuates an unwarranted fear of men raping women. Women's organizations have an obligation to stop promoting social constructs that make girls and women feel frightened and victimized. Instead of being unaccountable for stirring up such feelings, feminists should take responsibility for helping their sisters to live free from these anxieties, winning the prize of self-determination in the process. At that point, they can move forward with their lives, achieving their goals without experiencing fear and terror in every step.

Jordan Peterson – Forum on Bill C-16 and OHRC at U of T

AVfM Video Source · 20 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Jordan Peterson defends Freedom of Speech at the University of Toronto. Commentary by Steve Brulé.

Full live streamed forum.

Bill C-16.

U of T letter asks Jordan Peterson to respect pronouns, stop making statements.

CUPE 3902 Queer Caucus.

StudioBrule

Dr. Luke Bookallil of New South Wales, Australia "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 21 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Luke Bookallil of Armidale, NSW, Australia has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website drluke.biz:

"He has a number of special interests and has undertaken further training in these areas.
Dr Luke performs circumcisions, treats tongue ties, performs skin checks and treats skin cancers, as well as consulting in sports medicine."

Under "About" we see:

> MBBS (Syd), MSpMed (UNSW), DCH, DIP SKIN CANCER MED/SURG, FARGP, FRACGP
>
> Dr Luke Bookallil has worked as a GP in Armidale, NSW, since 2000. Dr Luke's major interests are skin cancer medicine, circumcision, tongue tie and sports medicine.
>
> Awarded Diplomas – Obstetrics and Gynaecology 1999 / Child Health 2000

His diplomas in Obstetrics and Gynaecology do not give him the knowledge or expertise to understand the function of the foreskin and why it is as unethical to routinely remove it as it is to perform female genital mutilation.

The doctor should read this information that concludes that routine circumcision is discouraged his own governing medical organization.

Then we read under "Circumcision:"

> Dr Bookallil performs circumcision in boys up to 4 months of age although the younger the better. He has been performing circumcisions with the Plastibell and analgesia since 2004.
>
> How many has Dr Luke performed?
>
> Over 2,000
>
> What is it?
>
> Circumcision is the removal of a simple fold of skin (foreskin) that covers the head (glans) of the un-erect penis.
>
> Why do it?
>
> Circumcision has a number or proven medical benefits with many related to the ease of maintaining adequate > penile hygiene. It is much easier to keep clean after the circumcision and throughout life. The benefits include a reduction in urinary tract infection by 10 fold throughout life, a decrease in penile and foreskin (removed) infections, avoidance of potential requirement for an older boy to undergo circumcision due to recurrent infections or phimosis, decrease in HIV (60%), herpes, syphilis and chlamydia (commonest STD in Australia), prevention of cancer of the penis and a significant decrease in cervical cancer secondary to less Human Papilloma Virus transmission. There may also be religious, cultural and social reasons to circumcise your baby boy.

>
> Method and Analgesia
>
> Dr Luke uses the Plastibell which was developed by Hollister Inc from the USA in 1950. The Plastibell, having been placed correctly over the head of the penis, determines the amount of skin removed. Thus, it should produce a good result, taking enough and leaving enough skin. The procedure takes about 15 minutes.

"Adequate penile hygiene" is maintained through the use of soap and water, as is vaginal hygiene and the hygiene of all other body parts, without the need to amputate any of them.

The glorious benefits mentioned above are either untrue or have cures that don't require permanent amputation of functional body parts. No doubt the doctor gets this misinformation from these discredited and wildly pro-circumcision individuals listed on his website under "Links:"

Dr. Edgar J. Schoen at medicirc.org.

Professor Brian J. Morris at circinfo.net.

This brochure from The Paediatrics & Child Health Division of The Royal Australasian College of Physicians believes that newborn baby boys and young infants do not need to be circumcised, unless there is a medical reason.

Since the doctor has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Bookallil's practice information follows:

Dr. Luke Bookallil

211 Rusden St, Armidale NSW 2350

Phone: 02 67722291
Email : info@drluke.biz

> Dr. Luke Bookallil of NSW, Australia "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/2IZmcslHDx #nocirc #intactivism #circumcision pic.twitter.com/uVpvxPi1jS
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) November 21, 2016

Susan Morris swallowed The Red Pill

Susan Morris · 21 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Saturday 19 November 2016 was International Men's Day. As reported in the (UK) Daily Telegraph, IMD is > the annual international campaign to raise awareness for men's issues – from health concerns and domestic violence, to paternity rights and educational attainment levels.

The Telegraph reported on five organisations/charities, the work that they do and how they desperately need donations.

In July, one of the speakers at ICMI '16 was Philip Davies, a Conservative Member of Parliament, who spoke on the subject of the 'Justice Gender Gap'.

Philip Davies sits on the Commons Justice Committee and so knows something of what he speaks. Indeed, he used official government statistics to prove his case, including that "it is a fact that, in this country, men are more likely to be victims of violent crime than women". And that, between 2006/07 and 2012/13, men accounted for 70% of homicide victims.

And yet, he said, whilst men and boys are by far the more likely to be victims of violence and murder than women and girls, the debates and the strategies drawn up have all been about females.

Davies had the temerity to tell the audience at ICMI '16 that women benefited from equality but only when it suits their agenda.

Oh dear! Cue shock and horror from the feminists and The Guardian newspaper. (No surprise there!)

Viewed as being "deeply sexist", his comments were said to have "provoked outrage across the political spectrum".

The Guardian reported that

> Philip Davies has faced widespread criticism after it emerged that he told a conference hosted by an anti-feminist group that Britain's justice system was skewed in favour of women.

A female MP, Angela Rayner, said that > [Philip Davies] has open contempt for women, and that his views are so out-dated they are prehistoric…… There is no place for these views in modern Britain. He has a track record for misogyny having consistently voted against legislation that will make our society more gender equal.

She called for Davies to be suspended from the Conservative party, a view endorsed by the leader of the Labour party.

Angela Rayner was the Labour party's Shadow Equalities Secretary. One might think that she also knew of what she spoke but this is a feminist MP who, according to HEqual, attended a Labour party gender segregated rally and was elected a constituency candidate via an all-women shortlist.

[Note: that gender segregated rally was widely criticised and I hope the Labour party will never do such a thing again, no matter the circumstances.]

Having survived the furore after ICMI '16 and, evidently undeterred by it, Philip Davies called for a debate to be held in the House of Commons to mark International Men's Day.

Held on 17 November, according to Glen Poole of the Men And Boys Coalition, writing in The Telegraph, > the event saw vital issues such as suicide rates and education levels discussed [and] get a fair hearing in parliament, and celebrated the contribution of IMD in campaigning for many overlooked areas of inequality in society.

>
> There were, of course, the usual dissenting voices. SNP [Scottish National Party] member Tasmina Ahmed-Sheikh sighed that, effectively, every day was set aside for men – a common complaint, but one that misses the point of what we do. Others quibbled with the details of some of Davies' broader arguments, or seemed entirely dismissive of the day's function in a society that contains so many other inequalities.

Hansard, the official and verbatim report of proceedings in parliament, reported the full debate, including Philip Davies's reply:

> I am sorry that the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Ms Ahmed-Sheikh) rather trivialised today's debate by talking about women instead of men. I am sure the fact that she thinks international men's day is every day is very little comfort to the 134,554 men who have committed suicide over the last 30 years. I found that regrettable.

Regrettable? I applaud his English restraint but there is a convention on the type of language which can be used in Parliament. Had I been there and voiced my feelings on what she said, I'd have probably been ejected from the Commons chamber.

Two days after the debate, Philip Davies published an article in the International Business Times with the headline "Some issues affect men more than women – why is that hard to accept?" He concluded,

> When you think about it, in so many ways, considering men and women separately – as if they live in complete isolation to each other – is actually ridiculous. Neither group is isolated. Both sexes have mothers and fathers, sisters and brothers, sons and daughters, husbands and wives, so for every woman there are related male parties and therefore a vested interest in men's issues. It is an unavoidable fact.
>
> The fact is, there are some issues which affect men solely or more than women and vice-versa, but both men AND women have an interest in those issues in reality, and working together to solve them must be the best way forward.
>
> International Men's Day at least means for one day of the year these issues get the publicity they deserve.

I totally agree with Philip Davies. We, men and women, need to work together to get out of the deplorable state we find ourselves in and to improve the lives of all.

What better day to attend the London premiere of The Red Pill Movie than International Men's Day?

And so on Saturday, AVfM's David King and I boarded the train to take us into London.

I was both looking forward to viewing the long awaited film and apprehensive as to what we might experience along the way.

I had warned my brother that there might be demonstrations and asked if he would come and bail me out if I found myself faced with feminist protesters though, in truth, as I am not a battle hardened activist or protester, I wondered how I might face such people. However, I am a very stubborn woman and nobody tells me what film I can or cannot see or where I can or cannot go.

So I was psyched up for trouble and I'm not sure whether I was relieved or not to find no demonstrators at all and that our access to the venue was unimpeded. However, it was good as we had missed our intended train and arrived there with just minutes to spare.

With no time to chose where to sit and with David following, I headed for the nearest two empty seats. As I sat down I noticed that the next seat was occupied by a woman, one whose face I seemed to recognise.

She turned to me, introduced herself as Linda Kelsey, freelance journalist for the Daily Mail and, as it was quite evident that I, by age if not gender, did not fit the profile of most of the audience, asked my name and what had brought me there. [I am a baby boomer, even older than Paul Elam, with grey hair and a fashionable but unfortunately natural white streak in it.]

My thoughts were: I am about to engage with a journalist (whose work I had read and often admired) at the London premier of The Red Pill movie. Surreal or what?

I introduced myself as Susan Morris, an MRA, associated with AVfM, and previously its conference manager. Linda seemed not to know either the term MRA or what the initials AVfM stand for and so I had to explain both. I told her that she would see it referred to in the film.

She wanted to know how I had become involved and I explained that it was through my partner. As he had learnt of the issues affecting men, so had I. She questioned that I was not directly affected and I replied that as I learnt about the issues, so I could see where people I knew had been affected. That it was like a jigsaw puzzle, with many pieces coming together.

There was no more time to talk before the film began and I sat back to watch it whilst Linda was watching and busy making notes.

Of course I've read many of the reviews, both positive and negative. But, in all honesty, I don't know quite what I expected. Whatever it was, the reality of the film far surpassed any expectations I may have had.

I knew much of the content, such as the terrible statistics, the references to domestic violence experienced by men, the suicide rates, the dangerous and sometimes fatal occupations undertaken by men and paternity issues to name but a few. However, the impact of seeing it all together was quite breathtaking. I didn't so much watch but experience the film.

Frankly, I don't know how anybody new to the content can possibly review it if they've only seen it once. I would need to see it twice, first to gather the sense of it and then again to make notes, including the statistics.

During the interval before the Q&A, I chatted with the journalist some more. I explained that I believed in equality and would prefer not to call myself an MRA but that until equality was achieved, there seemed no other title. Yes, I am an egalitarian but it doesn't quite sound right.

I offered to introduce her to Erin Pizzey but she had known her some years ago and they chatted. I introduced Linda to David King, as one of AVfM's senior management. I left them to talk.

We resumed our seats and the Q&A session began. Erin was her usual indomitable self. For fifty years she has been fighting against the idea that domestic violence only happens to women and attempting to get the people who matter to realise that men are also victims of domestic violence and to devote resources to helping them.

There was much talk of a gender war and also of the need for a title to bring people together, a new 'ism. The word egalitarianism was mentioned and also humanism.

The journalist had already told the promoter that she couldn't stay for all of the Q&A. As she left, I said that I looked forward to reading her piece and that I hoped it would be…. I searched for the word. "Favourable?" she asked. "No", I replied, "balanced".

Linda Kelsey is four years younger than me. She was editor of Cosmopolitan and She magazines before becoming a freelance journalist. With a background on those magazines, I have no doubt that she has some feminist leanings but I hope she is of an age to have escaped the wild feminism of recent years.

Unfortunately, I think many women of similar age, who would describe themselves as feminists, who wanted only to right the wrongs which women undoubtedly suffered, in the home, the work place, in social life, do not realise what is being said and done in the name of feminism today.

And I am heartened by the reports I've read of young women today refusing to call themselves feminists.

Indeed, I met a very pleasant young lady named Lucy. I didn't tell her but secretly I quite admired her long green hair. She has already found herself at odds with friends who object to her refusing to sign up to the feminist cause, and to her attending The Red Pill movie. I wished her well.

As I waited to say goodbye to Erin, a young man, probably quite surprised to see a woman of mature age present, asked me what I thought of the film. I explained that I was associated with AVfM and that I knew most of the content of the film but that seeing it all together… it was emotionally breathtaking. I felt winded, as if I'd been punched in the stomach… But in a good way!

I would have liked to have a coffee with him and his friends, to discuss their experiences but, as with all such events, there were a lot of people milling around and nowhere quiet to go. And we had a train to catch.

I have absolutely no doubt that Cassie Jaye's journey as she researched the Men's Rights Movement and found herself further and further away from her feminist beginnings and ideals was both hard and heart-wrenching. To question our fundamental beliefs is to question ourselves, our identities.

As I write, it is forty eight hours since I experienced the film. I've spent many of those hours examining my own journey over the years.

Perhaps I am fortunate that, even though I experienced sexist discrimination in my early career, I have never assumed the role, identity or title of feminist; that I never joined the sisterhood. Indeed, I would probably have been outlawed years ago for my independent thought.

I have never been a member of any political party, whether with a capital or a small 'p' but it seems I am a member of the Men's Rights Movement. I hope the day will come when I can say that I am a member of the society for equality for all, regardless of gender.

When I trained as a therapist, it was in the field of Humanistic Psychology as described in the Huffington Post article by Dana McKenna, who was but is no longer a feminist. And so, I can say, with her, that I am a Humanist.

Some advice for young men in the UK

AVFM · 22 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN
TECHNIQUES TO SURVIVE THERESA MAY AND ALISON SAUNDERS' FEMINIST REIGN OF TERROR

Did you know that in the United Kingdom today?

- Women's claims of abuse and victimization at the hands of men are always assumed true by the police.
- Men can be arrested and held in custody for 24 hours without being told why.
- Women's statements alone can deny a man the right to see his children.
- There are no definitive civil rights guarantees for men based on family courts' right to determine what is considered to be a threat to a woman or the family.
- The CPS has a de-facto policy of prosecuting all allegations made by women against men.

This gives women the ability to make false claims and exert extreme leverage over men, for any number of reasons, that can literally ruin men's lives before they have had a chance to prove their innocence. We have all seen the news stories about the actions and policies of the Home Office, the Police and the Crown Prosecution Service since 2010, when Theresa May and Alison Saunders took over and applied radical feminist policies. Absurdities in which men's lives are ruined by women making public accusations, many of which have later been proven to be false or exaggerated beyond recognition.

Feminism isn't about equal rights for women. It's about criminalising, humiliating and emasculating men. It is about taking their homes, privacy and families away from them at any opportunity. Protect yourself.

We are living in a time of Central Government Failure

The world has changed. State policy and state bodies have become the number one enemy of families and men. There is a state failure to invest in physical infrastructure such as road and trains. There is a state failure to invest in social infrastructure such as health care and schools. The state is now re-directing funding from these core functions that create prosperity to destructive agencies such as the CPS, the Police and Social Services to attack the human rights of men and families and decimate our quality of life. The result will be further societal breakdown as the family, the fundamental building block of society, is further destroyed by Theresa May, Alison Saunders and other feminists.

What to expect under Theresa May's tenure as PM – Five-Point Summary

- Increased Assault on Human Rights for Men – She wants to repeal the Human Rights Act, which provides human rights for all, but retain the Equality Act 2010, which de-facto defends human rights for women and protected minorities. Net result: only men lose their human rights.
- Surveillance of Men – She is sponsoring the Investigatory Powers Act, which retains 12 months of your website data and makes it available to local police forces and social services without a warrant.

- Doublespeak – A prime example is Violence Against Women and Girls (VAWG), which is a set of male-hate policies using the front of domestic abuse for criminalising men and putting hundreds of millions of pounds annually into the pockets of feminists.
- Politicised Justice – Appointed feminist Liz Truss as Justice Secretary despite her complete lack of legal experience.
- Gender War through Lies & Statistics – She manipulates facts, e.g. she defines the gender pay gap as the difference between the median salary of men vs the median salary of women without adjusting for line of work, seniority, experience, education, hours worked, performance, time spent away from home, risky working environment, etc.. No economist takes this fabricated gender wage gap seriously.

HOW TO BECOME INFORMED ABOUT MEN'S ISSUES & GENDER POLITICS

- Justice for Men & Boys (J4MB). J4MB is a British political party campaigning for the human rights of men and boys, the only such party in the English-speaking world. Those rights have been assaulted by the state's actions and inactions for 40+ years, usually to advantage women and girls. The party's manifesto sets out 20 key areas where the human rights of men and boys are assaulted by the actions and inactions of the state.

(j4mb.wordpress.com and youtube.com/channel/UCKhX1c3ow6BrzdzP3ydpeZQ/videos)

- The Western cultural narrative is based on falsified research, confused thinking, and a lack of compassion for men and boys. Network4Men offers a more truthful narrative and invites you to meet with other men who have reached similar conclusions. (network4men.org)
- William Collins. In the opinion of many, William Collins is the most insightful blogger on men's issues in the world today. He has truthfully examined a considerable number of men's issues. (mra-uk.co.uk)
- Herbert Purdy. Herbert Purdy is an important writer on feminism and was the author of the book Their Angry Creed: The shocking history of feminism and how it is destroying our way of life. (com).
- A Voice for Men An American organization which has run the most influential website in the world advocating for men's and boys' human rights. (com).

SURVIVAL TECHNIQUES FOR MEN TO protect themselves AGAINST FEMINISM

1. Recognise that Women have become weaponised. The world has changed. Since 2010, new laws, amended laws and new application of old laws have radically widened the definitions of domestic abuse, sexual assault, discrimination, harassment, stalking, and hate crime to such an extent that just about anything a man does can now be classed as a crime. Subjective interpretation is a key enabling feature. Under Home Office guidance, the police must now accept everything a woman says, believe everything a woman says and check very little. All female complainants are referred to as "victims." Under the 2014 Positive Action Policy of the police YOU WILL be arrested. Under the Zero Tolerance policies of the Home Office and Alison Saunders at the Crown Prosecution Service YOU WILL be prosecuted. YOU WILL be treated as guilty until proven innocent and YOU WILL have to prove your innocence. Women have not been empowered. They have become unwittingly weaponised by feminists to destroy men and families. They want women to hate the ones they love. Feminists and vindictive psychos like to pull the trigger.

2. SHUN Feminists and VINDICTIVE Psychos. Avoid feminists, whether or not they're married. A false or exaggerated claim can be made by any woman against any man and feminists are far more likely than non-feminists to do this. Avoid women who have degrees in gender studies, use the word "victim," or think the solution to their problems is to report pettiness to the police (or anyone for that matter). Assume all women are feminists until proven to be anti-feminists. Vindictive psychos are more difficult to avoid – you never know until it's too late. Men have always had to deal with psychos, usually by gently walking away, but these days they can come back with a vengeance with false claims and with the police and CPS by their side. Try screening them out by only proceeding with dating if they sign a statutory declaration under penalty of perjury that they have never made an allegation of rape, harassment, stalking, domestic abuse, bullying or trolling. You can both sign one to be fair about it. Never have sex with them if they've had more than two drinks – they lack legal capacity to consent and they or their feminist friend can later accuse you of rape (but they will still be held legally responsible if they drive drunk).

3. Insure yourself against feminisT ACCUSATIONS. If you are a man and falsely accused and charged by the police or the CPS you will need money to defend yourself. Check your home insurance, which may cover legal defence. Alternatively, keep £20,000 in a bank account as a legal defence fund. This account cannot be a joint account and your partner must be unaware of its existence. The British justice system de-facto presumes men are guilty until proven innocent and innocence may be expensive to prove.

4. Protect Yourself with Technology. Theresa May is pushing through the Investigatory Powers Bill, which compels all ISPs to log every website you and your family have visited over the past 12 months and make this information available to local police and social workers. She claims this is to fight terrorism but she will re-purpose it to fight men. Fight back. Encrypt all of your hard drives. Use VPNs for your internet connection. Do not register your Oyster card. Send messages only on encrypted platforms such as WhatsApp and iMessage. Keep every message and email a woman has ever sent to you and record any sexual activity. You will need this in court to prove your innocence.

5. Stick together as a family. Family breakdown in the UK is now the highest in Europe thanks to state policy and the court system. You, your wife and your children are the best defence against a male-hating, family-hating state. Be united in your defence of your children, your property, your religion and your family values against the state's attack on families. Spend time with your family building love and trust with each other. Stick up for one another.

6. Distrust Police and Civil Servants. Meet them with a wall of silence. Teach your children NEVER to speak to these people without you or a solicitor present. This is especially true for your teenage or older boys. Don't be naïve – NHS staff and state school teachers are now social services informants. 20% of all children in the UK under the age of five have been reported to social services. Don't engage in conversation – tell them the minimum information needed to conclude whatever transaction it is you have with them. Do not cooperate with the police, especially the Community Service Unit (the relationship police). They will lie, twist and exaggerate to create a case against you. Video or voice record every conversation or encounter you have with the police, social services, parking wardens, NHS staff or any other state worker. Your iPhone is your best weapon and your best defence.

7. Embrace Women with Strong Father Figures and Common Sense. If you are single, seek out women who admire their fathers and brothers. Find those who have experienced real life, who have known hardship, who grew up in well-adjusted social households with fathers and brothers. Seek women who know life is filled with ups and downs. Do not date women who demonstrate a sense of entitlement, victimization or extreme emotional instability. Be particularly aware of women who threaten you when jealous or make up or exaggerate stories about other men they have dated. Reduce your risk by vetting all women you date with a background check, searches on their social media websites such as Facebook, questions about previous relationships and how they ended. If necessary, hire a private detective to ensure they don't have a record of making false or petty allegations against previous partners.

8. Avoid non-committal Northern European, British and American women. Two-thirds of divorces in the US and UK are now initiated by women, not men. Domestic violence allegations are their weapon of choice in getting custody of your children and your money. Don't be conned by these feminist-inspired women. Date family-orientated women. Sign prenuptial agreements with a view to keeping your wife honest through sickness and in health, but be aware that British courts are not currently legally bound by these agreements.

9. Minimise your taxes. 75% of income tax in the UK is paid by men. This is in addition to spousal support and child support payments paid by men, many of whom are blocked by state bodies such as CAFCASS or the family courts from seeing their children. Taxes paid by men are then used against them by a feminist-controlled state to fund its war against men and families. Tax is theft. Practice legal tax avoidance and stop funding the state's war on men.

10. Stay out of the system. State schools are failing boys. Boys now make up only 40% of university students. The heavily feminised state education system is hostile to boys and teaches feminism and political correctness, not critical thinking. Normal boy behaviour is no longer tolerated and is often classed as ADHD. So is Dad Deficit Disorder. Ritalin and Concerta prescriptions for boys are at an all-time high. Send your children to private school if you can.

11. Ditch your TV License and stop funding the BBC. Broadcast television media, most notably the BBC, have become rabidly anti-male. Men are depicted as bumbling idiots and worse. There are almost no male news presenters anymore. Witness Woman's Hour (Woman Sour) on BBC radio. Declare you do not watch live TV and stop paying your TV Licence. You can still stream Netflix and watch DVDs. Your mental health will improve tenfold.

12. Be resilient. Suicide is now the leading cause of death of males aged between 15-49 in the UK. Men are killing themselves at a rate more than three times higher than women. When a man loses his children, his family and his rights in a system stacked against him it is easy to lose all hope. Be resilient.

13. Be Great at what you do. Don't let the feminists drag you down. Be great at your sport, your business, your intellectual pursuits, or whatever it is you choose to do. Men have a unique ability to compartmentalise and focus without distraction on achieving success. Don't let feminists stop you.

14. STAY Human. Don't turn into a politically-correct male automaton. Don't shut down your emotions, your masculinity or your sex drive. Simply find safe locations and trusted friends to express your humanity. Exercise every day. Men especially need it. Feel the testosterone and endorphins. Be physically alive.

15. Fight back and defend your rights. Most men in the UK are unaware of how their rights have been assaulted by the state's actions and changed over the past years. Get informed and stay informed. Know your rights under the European Convention on Human Rights. Exercise and stand up for your rights and family values. Recognise the laws are wrong, Police and CPS application of the law is wrong and the justice system has become politicised. Engage in non-violent civil disobedience. Rational debate and free speech no longer exist. Be prepared to risk getting arrested.

Post courtesy of J4MB

#Imwithher – Saluting Kellyanne Conway

AVFM · 23 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image By Gage Skidmore on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-SA).

This article was originally posted on the AVFM forums by Maxx. It is republished here with his permission. EDs

————-

Feminists should be rejoicing. A woman DID win the White House this week.

The most stunning and audacious election campaign in the history of democracy was orchestrated by Kellyanne Conway. Behind every great man is a good woman, so the saying goes. So let's talk about the woman currently standing behind the president-elect.

Like many women and girls, Kellyanne wasn't the first choice. She had to wait in line. Only after a couple of dudes tried and failed to make Donald J Trump look presidential and electable did she inherit a ship that most outside observers were convinced couldn't be saved from sinking. Only Kellyanne wasn't here to be another deckhand on the Titanic; no this woman was there to wear the captain's hat and against all the odds turn the entire franchise around.

Her boss didn't make it easy for her at times.

Trump was hot off a nomination debate in which he and his Republican rivals had come off like a bunch of frat boys cracking wise about each other's junk on national television. Liberals were celebrating what looked like the very public and dramatic disintegration of the entire Republican party.

"Boys will be boys" she must have thought as she watched the Donald alongside the likes of Cruz, Rubio, and Jeb Bush drag the Republican debates into disrepute. The tone and rhetoric might have played well with drunken Ted Nugent fans, but Kellyanne knew there weren't enough of those to put her man in the White House. Things needed to change. And they needed to change fast.

Her boss was already in trouble with women (so the media intently hammered home) for rising too often to the bait of various female agitators in the media and online. And in his innocence was falling into the trap of not treating them with kid gloves just because they were women. Pretty egalitarian right? Unfortunately, the public wasn't seeing it that way. And when it comes to political campaigns perception is everything.

Kellyanne was initially brought on because of her expertise in helping clients engage female consumers in the private sector. Her expertise, her opponents would soon to find out, extended way beyond the realm of 'girl stuff.'

Her boss had enthusiasm for the job and vision but by his own admission lacked experience and tact. Their rival had experience on her side, but Kellyanne expertly ensured the public was repeatedly reminded of exactly what Hilary Clinton had experience in doing. More than 30+ years of engaging special interests, selling off policy for profit, lying, stealing and cheating the American people at the behest of her globalist sponsors. All under the guise of divisive neo-liberal gender and identity politics.

When Kellyanne took over as Campaign Manager, Trump's bid was in freefall. Even Trump's most ardent supporters can't have enjoyed watching him getting into ill-advised public spats with the families of dead American servicemen. There's no way of sugar coating the fact that it wasn't a good look. All this played into the hands of those that argued Trump was an impulsive hot-headed jerk who simply wasn't ready or suited for the demands and challenges of public office.

Where the media smelt blood, Kellyanne saw an opportunity. And slowly but surely the bullish Trump that won the Republican nomination (to the delight of liberals and the dismay of many life-long conservatives) gave way to an actual human being.

While other politicians hid their flaws of character and judgment on private servers, Kellyanne gave us a candidate that held his hand up and owned his. Suddenly the stars started to align, the man, that fittingly enough, was running on the promise of giving America a second chance, was afforded a second chance of his own.

Slowly and systematically each and every one of the big old bear's potential weaknesses were transformed into strength.

While his detractors tried to paint him as a billionaire very literally living in a high tower, Kellyanne flipped the script. And suddenly he was a guy who was so rich he couldn't be bought, who wasn't running because he needed the money or craved the fame. He was running because it was the right thing to do.

Suddenly he was a guy who didn't need us as much as we (the people) needed him. Suddenly he didn't look like the bully anymore; he looked like the reluctant and imperfect people's champion taking on the bullies from all sides, on behalf of the little people no one else was willing or able to fight for.

Under Kellyanne's guidance, her client transformed in the public consciousness into the embodiment of the American dream that he was all along. A man that spoke to the aspirations of the ordinary people all over the country who just want a system that gives them a fighting chance and a fair shake. Even his reality tv past transformed from a subject a shame and ridicule into an asset. He wasn't a reality star like Kim Kardashian famous for taking selfies of his naked ass (thank the lord). No, he was the host of a tv show that championed the entrepreneurial spirit. Why's that bad? What's more American than that?

Kellyanne recognized her client's enthusiasm and passion and knew that if she could keep him on message; on – free trade, immigration and anti-corruption, and away from Twitter spats unbecoming of a president, he'd look a lot less like a reality tv ego manic and a lot more like the champion of a movement of people that don't want their destiny or the destiny of their great nation written for them.

She sent the big old bear out to pick fights that they said he couldn't possibly win. In places like Michigan, Wisconsin, and New Hampshire. But she sent him out armed with the tools to ensure victory.

Like many women trying to achieve remarkable things in a 'man's world,' she was met with mockery. Time and time again prominent men (and women) in the media invited her onto their shows so that their audience could laugh at her and mock her and compel her to drop the act and just admit that she and her candidate were kidding all along. She didn't rise to it, and she didn't take her ball and go home bitching about 'the government' the way feminists on the left do. She stayed calm; she stayed on point. And the people that mattered saw through all the jabs and snarky bullshit to the truth of her message. By the time Florida was called for Trump, no one was laughing at Kellyanne Conway anymore.

The path in front of Kellyanne throughout this election campaign wasn't the kind she could comfortably walk on in heels or barefoot. It wasn't 'girl-friendly.' Heck, it wasn't much friendly at all. It was a path laden with every obstacle imaginable and showered in shattered glass. But Kellyanne didn't stand behind the start line bitching and moaning that the path in front was too rough and it wasn't fair because she's 'just a girl.'

She didn't standby waiting for the men around to clear her an easy path. She blazed the trail.

And when she was trying to quarterback a client that was constantly getting fouled by his opponents and even by the referees (hello- Anderson Cooper) she took that as an opportunity to show the public that his detractors weren't the kind of people who believe in fair play. They were the kind of individuals who jump a guy 3-on-1 during a live debate. A siege mentality took hold among the Trump faithful. Suddenly the truth became increasingly apparent, and Trump was the underdog, and he (and her) had the kind of fighting guts America is built on.

Kellyanne wasn't an affirmative action hire. She wasn't the first choice. She wasn't appointed campaign manager to fulfill a quota. She's the first woman to manage a Republican Presidential campaign. And she's just managed the best one yet.

That's not evidence that we need 'more women' managing presidential campaigns. It's evidence that anyone that wants to win the White House against all the odds, with every single tentacle of the vast nefarious machine pulling against them better have an ace in the hole.

They better have Kellyanne Conway.

And they better be ready willing and able to outbid President-elect Donald J Trump for her services.

Little girls need role models. The progressives on the cultural left are damn right about that part.

So the choice is yours, ladies and gentleman, you can tell the little girls you love about Beyonce. The so-called 'feminist' who once shook her bootie for money at Colonel Gaddafi's birthday party and endorsed for president a 'feminist' criminal sponsored by barbaric regimes that trade women and girls like cattle.

Or you can tell them about Kellyanne Conway.

Who ran the single greatest political campaign in the history of democracy.

We see you, Mrs. Conway. And we thank you.

Cassie Jaye on “The Bolt Report”

Gary Costanza · 25 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Cassie discusses “The Red Pill” movie with Andrew Bolt and tells the world about gender equality.

A message from Skep Torr about The Red Pill Movie – Israel

AVFM · 28 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The MHRM is a worldwide movement that is just beginning to come of age. In the days ahead, The Red Pill Movie will be an increasingly useful tool in furthering our message. That makes it important to support all screening efforts, even ones, perhaps especially ones that you cannot personally attend.

I hope as many people as possible get behind the important effort now underway in Israel. PE

From Skep Torr's YouTube Channel:

We have started a campaign to get the film to premier in Israel, and raise awareness to men's issues.

Please share, like and forward to anyone you know. Please consider donating!

The donation page:

https://www.headstart.co.il/project.aspx?id=21493&isactive=true&lan=en-US

Donation page in Hebrew:

https://www.headstart.co.il/project.aspx?id=21493&isactive=true&lan=he-IL

By Your Side:

https://translate.google.co.il/translate?sl=iw&tl=en&js=y&prev=_t&hl=en&ie=UTF-8&u=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.byourside.org%2F&edit-text=

What Do You Deserve?

Adam Glasier · 28 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It's been an exceptionally stifling August. According to NASA, 2016 could go down on record as the hottest year in recorded history. It might also follow that, as the heat rises, people — women, we must especially note — are wearing less than any other time in history.

Fine female specimens are strolling, running, basking and hoola-hooping under the sweltering sun, figures clenched tightly in bikinis, yoga pants, dresses and skirts. Whether they notice it or not, whether they like it or not, they are entangled by invisible webs of lustful eyeball trajectories of men. Many of us are repelled from advancing on them by social etiquette and sheer terror. But some virile, young bucks simply do not heed this message, and it's causing the ire of many a woman to reach its boiling point.

Here we have Erin Bailey, a Boston-based fitness instructor, a prolific blogger and an extraordinary-looking young dame. She recently posted this article on her website: What Do We Deserve? Don't be fooled. It is, in a few words, a vociferous manifesto targeted against every male who has ever wounded her feminine royal dignity with their sexual solicitations. Take a look. I can't quite blame these fellows.

Why hello there, Erin. It's nice to meet you.

Woops, excuse me. You probably don't take too kindly to my little bit of flirtation shenanigans, do you? You'd probably hunt me down, slice off my testicles with a bowie knife and stuff them in my mouth like a roast pig (Andrea Dworkin would be honored.) Yes, I've personally heard women — probably the kind who would lap up your rhetorical filth like koolaid at a Jim Jones cult gathering — mutter death threats under their breath for receiving calls and compliments from males. There's no debate over toxic femininity.

Miss Bailey, let's have a little chat, shall we? I really hope you stumble upon this article one day. Perhaps even read it, if you're not so caught up in your feminist zealotry to comprehend any deviating viewpoint as something other than an attack against every vagina-wielder on Earth. Because it's evident that, in your noble declaration to purge what you deem to be sexual oppression, you've demonstrated insufferable narcissism and an inability — no, a blatant unwillingness — to understand some of the men you're probably condemning. You are responsible for fear-mongering and paranoia among women, as well as demoralizing men to the level of "hormone puppets," whether you are honest with yourself enough to even realize it — or not.

What do you deserve?

You deserve the truth, naked and bare.

You begin your post acknowledging that, yes, you are a rare and attractive female specimen, the elusive wetdream of many a lonely gas station cashier, and that you have gone to great lengths to cultivate your health and ravishing figure. You demonstrate this point lavishly with an entire gallery of alluring selfies taken at the park and gym. Yes, yes, Miss Bailey — Oh, we know you're very pretty. You can stop tantalizing us now.

Alas, your hard-won physique has a dark side — it draws unwanted attention from Boston's bottom feeders like bees to a hive. Or, if we're going to be honest, like flies to roadkill.

A man stalks you in the park. Another man at a parking garage yells out to you with the savory of Fat Bastard with his hands on a chili dog. Yet another man sat on a bench and waited for you to come out of an ice cream shop. These sexual solicitations make you feel, in your own words, "like he wanted to do me," or else "like a piece of steak." They strike fear into your heart. They humiliate you. They torment you. They all but ruin your entire life. Very, very tragic indeed.

So you list a series of grievances. You demand that we leave you alone. You demand that we never act on our desire for you. You all but demand that men exist in a relationship of fealty to women — do not speak to a woman, unless she has spoken to you. It might do you well to consider what Karen Straughan, female men's rights activists, said in that regard.

I am not female. I cannot speak on your behalf. But I'd like to hypothesize that, if a woman crossed paths with Brad Pitt at the gym, or a male specimen of equally outrageous sexual value, and that man whispered in her ear that she had the finest derierre he had ever seen, she might be more inclined to flattery than fury. Who knows? She might start wearing that extra-tight bra and pants to the gym, in the hopes that he might show up again.

It might not be the sexual advances of men that has incensed women such as yourself. It is their manner, of which is boorish and clumsily expressed. There's nothing intrinsically humiliating about attracting men. It is that you are attracting the wrong type of men.

This bittersweet curse posed by your profound sexual magnetism follows you wherever you go. Even in — of all the damnedest places — the nightlife at the downtown bars.

> "What about the nights I'm out with my friends and just because I have heels on and am at a bar it gives anyone the right to hiss, yell or even grab me or my friends."

Yoga-pants and sneakers are attire designed for one purpose — to be comfortable during locomotion. Advances are understandably a breach in social etiquette while they are worn. On the other hand, high heels and a dress are tailored for another purpose — not to be comfortable, as you know better than I do, but to enhance the glamour of your physique. Particularly under the "male gaze."

Being the unfortunate recipient of a groping is one matter. That's indefensible, though even that depends on the context of social escalation. But you lack nuance. Lingering eyeballs? An offer for a drink? Can men even speak to you without your permission? I'm sorry, Miss Bailey — no, I'm actually not sorry — but my sympathy for your cat-calling crusade cuts short at the swinging door of the saloon.

> "Or what about the gym. Or what I like to think is my safe zone. The one place I feel men should respect me most because there I feel like we're on the same playing field."

The bar and the gym are two entirely different social contexts. Some women, you may be shocked to learn, are so lascivious and sexually liberated (by who else but feminists? Damn them!) that they go to bars in order to bask in the gazes and gropes of men and perhaps even rendezvous with them for sex. How exactly many of them engage in this slavish behavior, no Pew Research Poll shall ever reveal, but it must be enough to make the energy expended and social ostracism looking for them worth it to men. Articles like this suggest that women are having gigatons of casual sex.

Sex is actually a large motivation for people to attend bars in the first place, so isn't it a fairly reasonable mistake on the part of these males, to figure you might be looking for it? After all, we're thinking, there must be at least one lusty barfly in that establishment that is craving the attention that you are repelling. To the man, your rejection costs him nothing. He will simply wander off with the dim hope of finding a willing partner.

> "Don't ask me what I was wearing. That's not the question."

Ironic you'd mention that, because you know it matters.

> "I am careful. I don't go to dangerous places alone. I don't run in dodgy areas by myself. I carry keys on me, and soon pepper spray to put my Moms mind at ease. But that's not the point."

Truth is, men are overwhelmingly the victims of homicide and robbery, not women. Yet despite this fact, women have been socialized to be a victim class.

Might I also mention that, for the vast litany of sexual solicitations you have received, none of them have been followed by an assault or rape? It could also be reasoned that, as obnoxious and annoying as these gestures may be to you, a call-call on the street rarely leads to a rape. According to RAINN statistics, most rape is perpetrated by someone known to the victim. Your fear of being raped in a dark alley or a lonely forest road might largely come from fear-mongering perpetuated by the feminist-favoring media.

> "We deserve to speak out without the threat of you lingering on our minds."

Erin — I'm demoting you to a first-name basis — has it occurred to you yet that you have published a viral blog post, linked and shared on numerous other websites, that does nothing but condemn the entire male gender for the philandering of a few, and you are subsequently an internet celebrity for it? Please open your eyes from the shadows of your victimhood mentality and take a good, hard look at reality. I have not silenced you. I have not threatened you. I am simply critiquing you.

> "We deserve to feel sexy in our own skin without feeling like we're here to bait you."

What a naive contradiction, a degree of doublethink capable only by a fresh, young female gender studies student. One cannot be "sexy" in their own skin, because to be sexy is to be fashioning one's appearance to appeal to the other sex. The standards of what is "sexy" is based on nothing but it's intrinsic ability to attract your opposite sex. To be sexy is, essentially, to become bait.

Didn't you say that you felt dirty and humiliated when you thought a man might "want to do" you? Doesn't sexual attraction rub against your ego the wrong way? Or perhaps you're just not being entirely honest with yourself about what it is that you want? What glaring hypocrisy.

> "We deserve to run outside."

Nobody's stopping you.

> "We deserve to be judged on our merits, not our outfits."

If you were more concerned with being judged by your merits rather than your genitalia, you would be calling for the repeal of programs that provide women a free pass in order to fulfill a "gender quota."

If sexual objectification is oppressive, then I suggest you also direct criticism at the pornography industry, where women are voluntarily participating in every conceivable act of sexual objectification. Are you also opposed to sex work? Underwear models? Or what about the feminist activists who actually lament about not receiving cat-calls from men? Surely there are also women, not exclusively men, who are contributing to your problem.

Ah, of course! You and all the women you believe you stand for are just little angels — innocent, perfect, and incapable of moral agency. You are the true chauvinist here, Erin. Not I.

What's the point? You will probably continue to drive away men in this Crusade against Cat-Calling. So go ahead. Shame me as a predator, an rape apologist, a privileged misogynist. Cage my sexuality inside of a prison that only you, a pure, asexual woman, have the key to unlock. You have your internet soapbox. I will respect your right to make whatever commands and accusations you wish of men. So try to understand my end, and respect my right to speech – no matter how offended it makes you feel.

That, Erin Bailey, is what you deserve.

Further boosting feminists' presidential hopes

August Løvenskiolds · 29 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The day before Hillary's stunning defeat, the New York Slimes ran a triumphalist article celebrating her putative victory and denigrating loser white men as being "unevolved." Jill Filipovic authored this condign hubris, a lawyer (via affirmative action?) who is writing a book entitled, I kid you not, The H Spot: The Feminist Pursuit of Happiness as if feminism-n-happiness could ever be a thing when feminists exist in a permanent state of rage.

The disastrously blind article concluded thus:

> Every feminist I know will tell you that men bring much more to the table than physical strength or a paycheck, and that we would love a world in which men were free to be resilient and tender, ambitious and nurturing, expressive and emotional.
>
> Donald Trump may not agree. But women make up half the country, and since we aren't going back in time, the same men who have long been hostile to feminism should consider coming along with us. I suspect for a lot of men, a more equal America — one with fewer cultural rules about how a man should be, and more avenues to identity and respect — would be a pretty great America to live in.

So, for men, the choice was a "pretty great" land filled with corpulent, angry feminist hags and girly men or an actually great land with the daughters of Melania and Ivanka as well as men who preferred to achieve and not cultivate Zinnia.

Still, as feminists continue to grapple with a President-elect who has declared their political correctness to be "a waste or time," I feel it is important of me, as a man, to continue to support feminist efforts unquestioningly as I did in my last article, Helping feminists win the Presidency.

First off, as with any feminist article, I must talk about myself before I get into my arguments. This is a hallmark of "identity politics" that values skin color and genitalia over facts and reason.

I now identify not as a male feminist ally but rather as a "feminist booster." A feminist booster's job is to support without reservation the voices and strategies of feminists. This is in contrast with a "male feminist ally," whose job is to advocate for feminism in the desperate hope of getting laid or, at least, surviving longer when feminists begin their "extinction of men" plans.

Note the suffix "ster" on "booster." In medieval times, the children of single professional women (you know, the women feminists don't think existed) were named with this suffix: a single woman baker's sons were dubbed Baxters. An unmarried woman weaver birthed Websters. An unmarried brewer of beer had Brewsters. In modern times, the bastards of hippy women are known as "hipsters."

And I am a Booster. After my boozy mother, maybe?

For those concerned, I am still an MRA and a MGTOW: I both advocate for men's human rights and I eschew social/romantic relationships with women. My feminist boosterism is a natural adjunct to these positions: by raising the self-esteem of feminists to ever more titanic levels, I believe I can help them duplicate and perpetuate their electoral success of United States elections of 2016. You go, grrrls.

Now, I felt some regret over my last article because, even though I boosted 11 distinct areas of feminist concern, I was not inclusive enough in that I overlooked other feminist gambits that also deserve equal waxing.

So, relax, my dear dude-bros, as I wake you to the lived experiences of real world feminists and why boosting them will make your life better. Or, perhaps, your wake a bit drunker.

Items 1 – 11 in the original article can be found here.

- Rather than changing women, keep telling men THEY are the ones who need to change. Even though women demand their male sexual partners be strong and flush with resources, men can be taught to ignore what hot women want if only feminists nag them hard enough. Jill's article belittling unevolved men is a great example of how evolution works – instead of reproducing sexually, men would rather hook up with feminists. Somehow this is supposed to work.
- Keep reclaiming your girly roots. According to the New York Crimes, restrictive, sexy garments like the corset are the future of feminism. This, and high heels worn in the kitchen and nursery will help those you call "breeder women" forget about your unfortunate history of abortions and shaming men for their natural sexual desires.
- Keep trusting celebrities to spread your message. A recent analysis of 6,000 people outlined the corrosive effect of celebrities using feminism as a brand enhancement. This study, however, used math, a tool of the patriarchy, and so you should reject it. Leave educational outreach to the pretty people – your time is precious and that ice cream in the freezer is not going to eat itself.
- Keep embracing a dual sexual standard: demonize men for their sexual aggression, and celebrate women for theirs. While women voters for Trump dismissed his sexual peccadilloes, the idea that socially enforced male purity and female licentiousness will carry feminists to victory is a sure way to smash the patriarchy. Women just love men who reject them sexually – you can tell by the red faces, epithets and rape hoaxes a scorned woman tosses about that male purity is a winner.
- Keep forcing faulty policies into law. Sweden's failed experiment with feminist snow-plowing proved that even the silliest feminist legislation can hurt the patriarchy by damaging the society that men built. By destroying patriarchal society you can achieve the paradise of mud huts and starvation where all genders can suffer equally in squalor.
- Keep hiding feminist books. Emma "#HeForShe" Watson has taken to hiding feminist books in the subways of London, and everyday feminists can empower themselves by hiding their own feminist books in sewers, culverts, furnaces, construction sites, family courts, battlefields, and homeless shelters where forgotten men can learn about their privilege and how wretched they are for it.
- Keep calling attractive women "pseudo-feminists" and insisting that real feminists are hefty. Ivanka's site is festooned with pictures of size 0 Caucasian Manhattan women, holding signs that say "Women Who Work…never give up!" and "Women who work Multitask!". There are, obviously, no signs by women with size 16 hips, living in remote Louisiana saying "Women who work need abortion!" or "Women who work need to be not threatened with deportation" – from here. Dividing women into hostile camps based on sexual attractiveness cannot help but bring the true message of feminism into clear focus.

As time goes on, I hope to continue my feminist boosterism until everyone can see the truth about this delightful ideology. My apologies if I failed to include your own deserving branch of feminism – I will not rest until all of you know what it feels like to be boosted.

It feels great to serve as their booster chair.

House of Commons debate on International Men's Day

Mike Buchanan · 29 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Last Thursday, along with a number of supporters, I had the pleasure of watching Philip Davies's debate in recognition of International Men's Day, from the public gallery of the House of Commons. Our thanks to a supporter for preparing this file (video, 1:22:43) of the proceedings. I've put some background under it, including a link to a commentary I've prepared, with timings – here.

Two of the most compelling contributions to the debate were from a couple of hatchet-faced feminists, Tasmina Ahmed-Sheikh (SNP, Ochil and South Perthshire) and Paula Sherriff (L, Dewsbury). A couple of SNP manginas debased themselves, in a pathetic but surely futile attempt to curry favor with Mistress – Nicola Sturgeon – whose first act as First Minister of Scotland was to appoint a gender-balanced cabinet.

We look forward to next year's debate.

Mike Buchanan

Improving race relations, by being racist...

Clint Carpentier · 30 November 2016 · Archived copy · Original

This article is Satire and does not reflect the opinions or positions of AVFM or its staff. EDs

My iPod crapped out a while back, so I've been listening to the radio. Usually, it's CFNR, which is gynocentric and native-centric, but fairly innocuous in its approach, as they focus mostly on music. Well the job I've been tackling is in a location that gets crappy CFNR reception, so scanning the channels, what could go wrong?

… … … CBC … fuck.

Were they this bad before? It's a trip through neenooneenoo duntDAH the twilight zone!!!

It's a good thing they have a working washroom in this camp house, as the number of times I nearly shit myself doesn't bare mentioning… forget I said that. I got to hear Lindy West talking about how comedians are sexist, to which she followed up by gloating about how she personifies the stereotypes the comedian's joke about, more. Lindy, you have a winning combo there, two thumbs waaaayyyyyy up.

Later on, I got a good scare when Candy talked about how two couples were sharing a mortgage in Toronto. I was vaguely paying attention so I missed some pertinent details up until the girls blurted, "we were roommates on campus and shared everything, so it just seemed natural to share other things too." And the first thing that came to mind was, what, like husbands? Yeah, I was wrong. I was soon corrected, and discovered that it was a lesbian couple, and a hetero couple, and they all came from Dalhousie University; wait, what, yup, they are of the same age group as Facebook misogyny problem. Yeah, that can't possibly go sideways for the husband, no way in the seven hells, nope.

So how about them Blue Jays eh? Wait, what??? Racist tenors? You shittin me!? The Canadian Anthem has been changed, and one of the Tenors added his personal flavor, which included #AllLivesMatter. What a racist git! Doesn't he know just how triggering that phrase is??? His continuance as a Tenor is now in question. Bravo, good for him, stand your ground chap. BlackLivesMatter has ZERO business in Canada; this was the final destination of the Underground Railroad for fuck sakes, FUCK OFF!!!

But hey, Vancouver has the answer. By targeting primary school age children using a method similar to what that teacher did to her students with eye color. Remember that?

Look, I'm all for teaching kids about the contributions to civilization made by members other races. But when you start talking about making kids feel the other shoe, history is a hard shell for kids to chew. When I went to school, normal history class filled me with what is now called "White Guilt" and I'm a halfbreed.

My mama raised me a city injun, so I had little contact with reserve injuns until high school. You see, reserves don't have high schools or colleges or universities, and here's why, they're fucking assholes. Sorry, I didn't mean to use so much sugar, but it's a hard swallow. The reserves send their high school aged students to white communities because high schools don't last long on the reserve, and high school teachers won't live on the reserve, cuz they're fucking assholes. I could spend the rest of this article referring them like that, and it won't come near close enough to encompassing what they really are. So when I got to high school, and discovered these "natives," it didn't take long to shed my white guilt and see these shits for what they were. The best thing for them, is to abolish the Indian Act, and let them sink or swim.

I got my white guilt through unbiased, unvarnished history, "Europeans came, did x y and z, blah de blah de blarg, what do you think." Fuck man, that's some shit sammich right there yo. Now you wanna ret-con that method, by fucking with our kids' emotions through indoctrination and abuse? Fuck you… FAAAHHH QUE!!! Home schooling looks better every day.

I had myself a breather and a giggle as Candy interviewed some author regarding the lived experiences of tits. It went about as good as one would expect, girls have tits, and that's a problem for girls… and men, "why are men afraid to talk about boobs?" Uh… cuz social justice geeks take things outta context and blah de blah de blarg. I could tell you about your tits, your tits have one use, attracting men; all other mammals have teats, that is all that's needed to feed babies; and you show off your cleavage for one purpose, to announce to all that you are female, by boldly showing your lack of chest-hair. Pack up your tits and go home.

And then this idea that we should rename places to their original titles. I can't wait to see the scores of students lining up to get into the new Hock-a-luggy University. Why not the province of Hack-tchew. Bless you… wait, weren't you conquered? Shut up, Canada is the biggest damn village in the world, be grateful for that much.

But wait, there's more:

The first native poet laureate Rebecca Thomas (if that ain't a ridiculous mouthful) writes an inspiring poem about imperfection and does an impressive dance as she beats around the bush. Ok, I hear you, Edward Cornwallis was shit, get to the point. Well, there is no point. Here's what I gather about this issue; they don't want anything to change, not really, they just want a constant reminder of what a shit he was. Why does that sound familiar?

Ok, so he paid for scalps… and? He wasn't paying for the scalps; he wanted the scalps as evidence that one was killed. And on THAT FUCKING NOTE!!! Europeans didn't invent scalping! Natives were scalping each other before Europeans arrived; damn it CBC, this was in one of the books you reviewed last year. Were you not taught about the gauntlet? Maybe you should run one; it wasn't European either. Iroquois? Shit, I can't remember.

But hey, there's this kid in BC from Haiti who was adopted into a native family, and he can't compete in the All Native Basketball League. Well cry me a fucking river, did you not read the title, it says it all. Did he forget to become a blood brother? Kids these days, no respect fer nuffin.

Go Trump!!! Pocahontas knew mountains out of molehills were meaningless wastes of effort.

Finally, on a side note. This fucker here wants to change Canadian law to suit his Sharia feelz. Go back to Sharia land. This here is a secular cuntree.

For shits and giggles, here I am, chatting with a buddy of mine who carves totem poles. We've spent hours solving the problems of the universe. One day I threw at him, "you know what you should do, carve a 'white mans' totem pole." He looked at me funny, so I proceeded to expound the thought. The bottom figure would be a farmer, and the figures would spiral up, depicting the stages of civilization (like miner, faller, iron worker), until it got to the top which would depict an astronaut pointing to the stars. The idea would be a monument of aspiration, not a statue venerating mythology. He thought it was a cool idea, but it would have to be a private investment cuzz, "you know the government won't fund that idea."

I grinned at him and said, "of course not, it would be racist… WORSE," and I gave him the OMG face, "it would be cultural appropriation!!!" When we quit laughing, I asked him how much it would be… oh about $3000… per lineal foot of pole. Fifty-foot pole, do the math; yeah it won't be getting done. Pity.

The acceptable bigotry of Michelle Obama

Mark Dent · 1 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Michelle Obama is considered a role model for the women and girls of America. Michelle Obama is praised in the most gushing, fawning manner in the mainstream media.

Michelle Obama is also an astonishing bigot.

There have been some occasions when I have felt she was undoubtedly a supporter of feminism and a believer in so many of the mythical notions feminists have about the way in which the world oppresses women. But it wasn't until I read the transcripts of her interview with Oprah Winfrey in June of this year that I was introduced to her hateful, patronizing view of the entire male gender.

During the interview which naturally took place in front of an all-female audience, Michelle made the following observations about men.

> Men should simply be better if they want to help women achieve gender equality. Be better at everything. Be better fathers. Good lord, just being good fathers who love your daughters and are providing a solid example of what it means to be a good man in the world, showing them what it feels like to be loved.

A woman with a powerful voice and a very public platform decides it is her right to sit in judgment upon the male gender and tell them how they can be better men and better fathers. She even feels the need to tell fathers to love their daughters. It is breathtakingly arrogant and deeply offensive. I know that the "flip the genders" test is by now old hat, but it remains the single best way to make people reflect upon the incredibly different way in which the public responds to what men and women have to say about each other.

Imagine if you will, that Donald Trump held a rally or did an interview with a male journalist who was so enamored with him that he would be willing to lick his boots should he ask him to do so. Imagine this interview is taking place in front of an all-male audience.

The interviewer asks Trump if he has any advice for the women of America.

Trump responds: "Be better mothers. Good lord, just being good mothers who love your sons and are providing a solid example of what it means to be a woman in the world."

Of course, these words are spoken to the accompanying applause and cheers of the all-male audience.

There is nothing in Michelle Obama's words that one could call hateful (not yet.) But the sheer arrogance and prejudice are clearly evident to any objective observer. Now, if Mr. Trump has spoken the words I just quoted the media would crucify him. Even people in his camp would have thrown their hands up in dismay at his stupidity and chauvinism.

Can you believe it? This buffoon has the effrontery to lecture the women of America and tell them how to be better women-him, a man! What a fat, sexist pig! He has cost himself the women's vote if indeed he had any to begin with. How can this woman hating pig even be running for President? There would be street marches and breathless, orgasmic editorials by the salivating left and head shaking condemnation from the right.

Here we have the First Lady, on stage with the most famous, influential and richest female in America and the only reaction to these words were positive. I am yet to hear one word of condemnation.

The words became far more poisonous as the interview continued, but the audience and Oprah remained as enthusiastic and supportive as ever.

Obama told Winfrey that it's sad that her experience of never being physically abused by a man is a "rare reality."

Just pause and read those words again. Can you believe it? The First Lady just said that the vast majority of men in America physically abuse their wives and partners. This is the only inference one can make when she states it is a "rare reality" for a woman never to experience physical abuse in a relationship with a man.

Public condemnation, criticism, raised eyebrows- zero. Again, not even a mild rebuke from a conservative journalist or politician. Nothing.

Let's flip it again.

Trump says to his all-male audience. "I am fortunate enough to have been in a relationship where I have never been nagged or been used as an ATM, but this is a rare reality for men in America."

The campaign would end there. There is every possibility his very life could be in danger. The media would eviscerate him, and his friends would apologize on his behalf and beg forgiveness from the women of America.

And surely being called nag is preferable to being branded a woman basher.

Nevertheless, as much as Trump has trampled on many politically correct conventions, if he attacked the whole female gender he would be finished. As it is, if he calls one nasty, abusive, obese woman a "pig" this apparently can be taken to mean he hates all women.

Michelle Obama not only makes these hateful, bigoted statements about the entire male gender without any negative consequences; she is hailed as an inspiration to all woman at the conclusion of the interview!

She hasn't finished yet.

> Stopping violence against women is something men can be better at.
>
> Men can be better husbands, which is-be a part of your families life. Do the dishes. Don't babysit your children. You don't babysit your own children. Be engaged. Don't just think going to work and coming home makes you a man.
>
> Be a better employer. When you are sitting at a seat of power at a table of any kind and you look around and it's just you and a bunch of men around the table, on a golf course, making deals, and you allow that to happen, and you're okay with that-be better.

Just imagine, yeah I know, you get it. Use your imaginations and see how a man in public office would fare speaking these words about women.

And how does this interview end?

- An interview loaded with vile stereotyping of one group of people in our society.
- An interview in which Obama branded one group in our society violent, abusive thugs.
- An interview in which she felt the need to lecture one group of people on how they can be a better parent and better employer.

Well the Queen of American television said:

> The way you've handled this office reminds me of a line that Maya used to say-it's actually in the beginning of one of her books-she says "You make me proud to spell my name W-O-M-A-N. Michelle Obama.

Cue standing ovation

Michelle has also publicly declared that "women are smarter than men" and of course how could any one forget her heartbreaking photo which went viral? The one in which with a suitable sad, puppy dog face she holds up a sign saying "Bring back our girls" in response to the Boko Haram terrorists kidnapping of 200 schoolgirls. Of course, no such sign was held up by Michelle or Barack when approximately 2000 boys and young men were massacred by the very same terrorist group. In fact, I don't believe the Obamas have mentioned those males to this very day.

The gender bigotry in our western society is a shameful reality; men are invariably viewed as blustering buffoons or dangerous predators unless of course, they sing from the feminist hymn book.

Hillary is able to call Trump a sexist, racist, homophobe to his face and Trump knows that if he responds with the same slurs (even with ample factual evidence to support him), the public would condemn him and call him a bully and misogynist. How liberating is it to be a female politician debating a male in 2016, knowing your opponent fights you with both hands tied behind his back and his tongue tethered? Is it any wonder Hillary smirked so smugly throughout the first debate?

What disturbs me the most is the fact that even Hillary and Michelle Obama's conservative opponents refuse to call them out when they demonstrate their contempt for men. Hillary can speak to female-only audiences and regularly talk about championing women's rights. She used the mythical gender wage gap as proof of our oppression of women in the first debate and was not called out by her opponent. No male politician in a position of power and influence has ever declared his intention to focus on men's issues as his most pressing priority despite the fact that this could be justified far more easily than the need to fight for women's issues. It would be catastrophic come election day. Female politicians who are meant to represent the entire population can openly declare their intention to place women's needs ahead of men's and win applause and admiration when they do.

I live for the day when a male politician or journalist looks a female politician in the eye and tells her to cut the bigotry and do what she is meant to do- work and care for all the people she represents men, women, and children.

I won't hold my breath.

*****

https://twitter.com/flotus/status/464148654354628608

http://www.huffingtonpost.com.au/entry/michelle-obama-to-men-be-better_us_57615d20e4b05e4be8604663

http://www.mediaite.com/online/why-did-kidnapping-girls-but-not-burning-boys-alive-wake-media-up-to-boko-haram/

The article was originally published on Relating to Men.

Don’t believe the movies girls

Casey Jones · 2 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We’ve heard it our whole lives. Women can do anything men can do. And movies and popular culture seem to back it up. With big production movies always having to script in the tough chick, who can fight, shoot, and physically perform alongside the men.

Normally the industry will go that one step further and have the hard chick with the heavy eyeliner, dykish haircut, and generally crappy anti-social attitude, actually outperform the men. Often with a scene where a man will point out the obvious concerns about having a female on the team, and the stereotypical tough girl responding by assaulting the man in some impressive fashion, and making a wise-crack as she walks off victorious. The man put firmly in his place.

Movies like GI Jane, Aliens, and anything featuring Michele Rodriguez are perfect examples of this formula. And the formula has worked. The belief that this is somehow based in something factual has permeated our society. Spurred on by 2nd and 3rd wave feminism. Rebel fists pumping into the air and chants of “Anything a man can do, a woman can do better!” And it’s taken hold to the point where militaries across the feminist ruled, post-industrial, matriarchal world are being forced (against their will) to introduce women into the combat parts of the armed forces.

But what about outside scripted movies with carefully choreographed fight scenes?

You know… Reality?

Well, reality paints a far bleaker picture for the fairer sex.

The cream of the crop for those looking to make a female foothold in various Infantry Corps have all been dismal failures. Supreme female athletes, hand picked to prove the feminist agenda have failed to pass the lowest entry level training requirements of Infantry. The same tests that scrawny, pimply 17-year-old boys are getting through with relative ease.

“How can this be?” Exclaim feminists everywhere. We see women doing extraordinary physical things all the time. Ronda Rousey dominating her opposition in the UFC Octagon. Women climbing mountains, women sailing around the world, women winning gold at the Olympics.

But here’s the thing. None of these things are done in competition with men. They are either done as acts in isolation, or in competition with other women. Every Olympic sports bar Equestrian is divided by gender, and this is done in the interest of good sports. The same reason boxing has weight categories. In the same way that we would never get to see the talents of amazing boxers in the lighter divisions if we didn’t protect them from being mauled by the heavyweights. If we didn’t divide sport by gender, then millions of young girls would never get to pursue their passion.

This is why we don’t, and shouldn’t see women competing in the NRL or NFL besides men. They would be destroyed. And any team who made the ill fated decision to field women on their team would be guaranteed a wooden spoon spot at the conclusion of the season.

But this isn’t just restricted to combat or contact sports. For example; the fastest female tennis serve in the world doesn’t even make it into the top 200 fastest male tennis serves. There are literally, washed up nobodies who no one will have ever heard of, who could absolutely destroy the best female tennis stars in the world. If you don’t believe me, look it up. I just did.

Recently in Australia we saw a perfect example of this.

The Matildas are the Australian women’s soccer team. They represent our countries best chance of an Olympic medal in soccer and are currently ranked 5th in the world by FIFA. These women are supreme athletes. They have played and competed their entire lives to work their way to the elite level they are currently on. They are paid well for what they do, and can literally eat, sleep, and breath soccer. They benefit from some of the best coaches, trainers, sports physicians, sports psychologists and physiotherapist in the world, particularly when some have attended programs like the personal trainer course from Discovery, and have therefore honed their skills and techniques.

In May, in preparation for an upcoming international friendly against Greece, they were pitched against a team of 15 and 14-year-old boys. This wasn't a 15 and below national side, nor was it a stateside. This was a small local team from Newcastle, of kids barely old enough to have hairs on their balls. Pardon, the pun.

The result: A resounding 7-0 defeat of the Matildas.

This isn't isolated. It's the second time in a row that this highly ranked international team of female athletes have failed to beat a bunch of school boys looking to waste some time on a day away from preparing for year nine modern history assignments.

This is not even meant as a slight against the Matildas or any other female athlete. I enjoy watching and supporting women's sport.

It's just that men just are physically better in every measurable way. They have higher muscle density, higher bone density, faster twitch muscle fibers, quicker reflexes, greater lung capacity, better hand-eye coordination, lower body fat percentiles, better spacial awareness, greater endurance, and faster recovery times. They also cope better in high-stress environments and are more likely to respond rationally rather than emotionally when confronted with stressing stimuli.

All life forms are all products of evolution. And men are the products of the last 11 million years, dealing with the rigors and threats that exist outside the cave, while women are the products of the last 11 million years sheltering inside the cave. It's not patriarchy; it's biology.

So if we all know what would happen to the one NRL or NFL team that decided to field an equal amount of men and women, against an all male team. If we know what would happen to a female boxer or MMA athlete forced to compete against a male field, what do you think will happen to your wives, sisters, and daughters on a modern battlefield?

They will be slaughtered. And not just them: a chain is only as strong as it's weakest link. The entire team that they are a part of will be slaughtered. Every military expert in the world knows this to be true. But we all look away and pretend the experts are wrong. Because what matters most in our societally warped understanding of equality in the name of social justice, is to be more concerned with being politically correct than morally right.

We are once again placing some people's desires above other people's lives.

Fuck this feels good society.

*****

The opinions expressed in this article represent those of the Author. They do not necessarily represent the opinions of AVFM or its staff. EDs

Sons of Feminism – TFF Episode 40

AVfM Video Source · 2 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 40 Professor Fiamengo discusses the pain, humiliation, and suffering inflicted upon men by two decades of feminism. Dr. Fiamengo will be publishing a collection of essays, entitled “Sons of Feminism,” detailing some of these stories.

StudioBrule

MRA 101: Why don't MRAs work with feminists?

August Løvenskiolds · 4 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I am covering a lot of bases on this one. Hold on, and I will likely get to you.

Thinking about attending ICMI 17 on the Gold Coast of Oz, but unsure or uneasy about the issues on the minds of the women and men who will be there? This article should fill in some gaps, but there is more.

This article is also directed at newcomers to Men's Human Rights Advocacy who may have misunderstandings about a facet of the movement. There is not much new here but I also hope even experienced MRAs can mine this article for concise talking points when engaging those outside our ranks, be they feminists or neutral observers.

From time to time I hope to add other MRA 101 articles, but for now, let's jump right into the meat of how feminists treat men's equality issues.

- In the 1970's Erin Pizzey, the founder of domestic violence refuges in England was ejected from both feminism and the refuges she started after she insisted that domestic violence refuges should work with victims of both genders.
- In the 1980's, Karen DeCrow, President of NOW, was ejected from feminism for advocating that men deserved reproductive rights the same as women.
- In 2014-2016+, feminists tried and mostly failed to block the production and screening of a film about Men's Rights Advocacy entitled "The Red Pill," made by a now former feminist named Cassie Jaye, who is being savaged by feminists worldwide.

And yet, people still insist that MRAs are somehow at fault for not wanting to work with feminists. MRAs reject feminists for the same reason that you don't go to couples counseling with a lunatic who tossed you out like trash.

Both MRAs and feminists claim to be working for gender equality. Hearing this, newcomers to the gender wars will naturally ask, why don't MRAs become feminists, or work as feminist allies, or otherwise try to get along with feminists? The animosity between MRAs and feminists can seem puzzling and gratuitous given the stated goals of each group.

But in the case of feminists, what they claim they do is not the same as what they actually do.

The answer I have heard most often is that MRAs tried to work with feminists for many decades but while women saw changes in the laws that seemed to favor women, men's issues were either ignored or given short shrift by feminists. The latest example of this is the bogus "#HeForShe" U.N. campaign by Emma Watson, who used a classic bait-and-switch scam to get men to pledge to support women's rights only. Watson pretended to support men's concerns right up to the point where vows were made.

Eventually, men's rights advocates became disillusioned with the loping feminists and struck out on their own. Those pathetic men who remained in feminism must endure endless abuse, from being called patronizing "mansplainers" when they attempt to contribute to a feminist discussion, to being suspected of being sexual predators hot after that all hairy landwhale feminist booty.

Concisely: after 40 plus years of frustration, rejection and abuse from feminists, MRAs decided feminists are useless at promoting equality for anyone.

In fact, when one looks at the record from the standpoint of gender equality, feminists are terrible at it – they promote women-only privileges under the guise of equality at the cost of men's rights and even their lives.

Some example of areas where feminists reject gender equality and favor women over men are as follows:

1. Legal protection from involuntary genital mutilation.
2. Forced parenthood after conception.

3. Child custody.
4. Domestic violence shelters.
5. Obligatory Selective Service (military draft) registration.
6. Anonymity and due process of law during cases of alleged sexual assault
7. Prison sentencing.
8. Platforms for men's issue discussion.

Although this is by no means an exhaustive list, these issues alone make feminism's definition as "a movement for gender equality" highly suspect, and indeed, defining feminism as a movement for female supremacy, NOT gender equality, would better reflect actual feminist practices and policies.

Let's go over the eight items I've noted above so that we can enjoy in rich detail the supremacist antics of feminists.

1. Legal protection from involuntary genital mutilation. Female genital mutilation is illegal just about everywhere, but the involuntary genital mutilation of infant boys is routine, and male circumcision is even promoted by feminist leaders like Hillary Clinton. To feminists, bodily integrity is for women only.
2. Forced parenthood after conception. Whether through abortion, adoption or even just abandoning an infant into a hole in the wall, feminists champion a rasher of options whereby a new mother can reject parental obligations after conception. No notable feminist since Karen DeCrow, noted above, supports men having equal options to forego parenthood. (I did find one rogue feminist who does support a limited form of "financial abortion" that requires men to register in advance of a pregnancy, meaning her proposal is still not gender equal.) Whether one agrees with these options or not, one must logically concede that it is not gender equal to give parenthood rejection options to one sex and not the other.
3. Child custody. In cases of disputed child custody, to be gender equal, the legal default should be 50/50 shared custody. The legal presumption that women are naturally better caregivers, used as a determining factor in the decision of child custody, is rooted in 19th century feminist activism…Over the years, this doctrine, originally intended to prevent divorce from keeping women from their children, has been pushed and twisted into an every case imperative, making maternal custody the default in divorce cases. Feminists jealously guard this special legal privilege of women, rejecting gender equality via shared parenting.
4. Domestic violence shelters. Less than 1 in 100 DV shelters are willing to admit battered men, and under the feminist-inspired Duluth Model that drives laws around the world, when a woman beats up a man, it is the man who is arrested. Such men are the ideological prisoners of feminism.
5. Obligatory Selective Service (military draft) registration. In the US, all men ages 18-26 must register for military service. Women are exempt, and feminists howl every time efforts are made to make draft registration gender equal.
6. Anonymity and due process of law during cases of alleged sexual assault. Under feminist legal machinations the identity and sexual history of an accuser are protected, even if she/he has made false accusations in the past. She said/he said cases should at a minimum provide anonymity to both sides. That would be gender equality. Alternatively and in the interest of accurate justice, the entire identification and intimate history of each party should be fair game. That would also be equality. Favoring one side over the other? Not so much. Feminist-inspired special protections for alleged victims of sexual assault compromise legitimate defense measures. For example, if a woman has a history of lying about rape, this fact cannot be used in court by the next hapless man she accuses. Equal protection under the law should apply to everyone.
7. Prison sentencing. Feminists are mostly mute on the lighter prison sentences given to women, except for the nutty UK feminists who want to close women's prisons completely. And, of course, the idea of loosing murderesses on your kids has already jumped the pond. Your prison sentence should not hinge on your gender. That is not gender equality.
8. Platforms for men's issue discussion. Almost any attempt to discuss men's issues is met with violent feminist > protests, including the pulling of fire alarms and physical assaults on peaceful attendees. Venues are pressured into cancelling men's rights events, often at the last minute so that alternate venues are difficult to find in a timely fashion. Feminists just cannot stand the idea that men have an equal right to speak for our rights.

There are many more issues in areas like education, child care, and so on where feminists fall short of advocating gender equality, but one thing is clear: in each case where we win gender equality in the future, the only place for feminists will be standing out in the cold, protesting it.

This is why, for equal rights advocates like me, the absolute destruction of feminism is the critical first step in securing equal rights for everyone.

Why boys need great male role models

Andrew Donovan · 4 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Here are some facts:

1. In the USA, 25% of all children are in a single-parent household.
2. 72% of all black children are raised in single-parent households.
3. Of single-parent families, 83% of children live with their mother and 17% live with their father.
4. 49% of single mothers have never married.

And here is my working thesis:

Our boys are in trouble due to the lack of positive male leadership they have in their lives.

It's only after a conversation with a friend about how far we've progressed in our manhood that I realized how lucky I am to be where I am in life.

I was a delinquent teenager. For years I couldn't stand my father. I loved booze and girls and getting into fights, and I had a weapon drawn on me on more than one occasion despite living in one of the nation's safest towns. I was heading down a bad path.

I had an intact family. On paper. A mom and a dad that cared about a sister that I perpetually fought with and me. We had nice family portraits and the like but no real adhesive that bonded us all together.

Things have changed since then. My parents split, and my sister and I have moved out and made something of ourselves and, ironically, we're all closer than we ever have been. But I know now just how different my present could look if I didn't become so set on becoming a man in my own right.

"Boys are more likely to achieve if they have emotionally healthy achieving men to look up to. Dads are the best role models, as long as they give their sons healthy messages and take the time to be with them," writes Sylvia Rimm, an American psychologist specializing in parenting, child development, and learning.

"When good dads aren't around, moms and teachers need to search elsewhere…mothers can also be effective role models and mentors to boys, but they are likely to be more acceptable to boys if men in the environment validate them. That happens because boys seem to have a need to reassure themselves of their own masculinity."

Bingo. Boys and men absolutely have a need to reassure ourselves of our masculinity. For some of us, the reassurance comes through intellect, for others, physicality. The bottom line is men thrive when competing against one another. It's why we landed on the moon and broke the four-minute mile.

This leads us to our current state of cultural and societal disarray. We're in a world where youth sports leagues are slowly doing away with keeping score, where all physicality is being banned from schoolyards, where male aggression is being medicated and where roughly 85% of elementary school teachers are women. Where and when is a boy supposed to explore his masculinity? Satiate his craving for competition?

As I said, I was one of the lucky ones. I had the benefit of being an excellent athlete and I captained my high school's baseball and football team in my senior year. I also had teachers, specifically two male teachers, who cared. They saw I had a penchant for writing and forced me to succeed. I highly doubt I'd have ever gone to university had those two not made themselves an important part of my high school education.

But I look around and can't help but feel that many boys growing up in 2016 won't have the same luck I did.

As I write this, a five-year-old boy and his twin sister – they're my neighbors – are outside riding their bikes, playing in the dirt and picking up toads in the garden. They're great kids, and I've gotten to know them and their mother quite well over the past few months.

Their father is more or less non-existent. He's in and out of jail. He promises them he's going to pick them up from school and then never shows. When he does show, he's distant. I've never seen him give his kids a proper hug.

Knowing that they don't play any organized sports and that they attend an average Canadian public school, which is dominated by female teachers, these kids have very little in the way of positive male role models in their lives. This is going to affect both of them negatively, but the young boy will feel the brunt of not having a father-figure around because males are far more likely to fall into drugs, gangs, and homelessness than females.

So I go outside and play catch with them and talk with them and help their mom set up a hammock in the front yard. And in return, they bring me snacks, smiles, hugs and a sense of gratitude that's so unique to children.

I don't know how to fix the lack of great male role models. Maybe we need to encourage more young men to get into teaching or starting after school programs. Maybe it's just a matter of getting to know your neighbors. Or maybe I am approaching a 21st-century problem from a 20th-century angle. Perhaps the next great male role models are already out there on YouTube and Facebook. After all, that's where I found many of my role models.

Regardless, parents and educators need to take a look at the numbers and the facts: kids – particularly young boys – need good men in their life and those men have to challenge them, and they have to be dependent. If we raise good boys, we raise good fathers and if that should happen, then maybe then we can start remedying the dysfunctional mess that is the modern family.

False Accusation and Wrongful Conviction Case of Army Major "Kit" Martin

Paul Elam · 5 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

NCFM has an update in the case of Army Major Kit Martin about the November 2015 unsolved triple homicide in Pembroke, Kentucky. One of the murder victims was Calvin Phillips, a married man involved in an extramarital sexual affair with Major Martin's dangerous, bigamist, convicted felon, lying and conniving ex-wife; Joan Harmon-Guerra.

Followers of the Major Christian "Kit" Martin saga may recall Harmon-Guerra accused him of child abuse, sexual assault, even international spying. Because of politically correct pressure to end sexual assaults in the military, Major Martin suffered undue command influence, albeit a General more concerned with his career than standing tall for his soldiers. After thorough investigations, civilian authorities cleared him of Harmon-Guerra's accusations. Then, the Army piled on even more charges a year and a half later. Fortunately, in this case, truth prevailed. At courts-martial, Major Martin was acquitted of hateful Harmon-Guerra's false, malicious and ruinous accusations.Regardless, Army prosecutors had to save face, and Major Martin fell to two minor trumped-up misdemeanors. He then spent several weeks incarcerated at Ft. Leavenworth, forfeited pay and benefits, and was dismissed from the Army (dishonorably discharged).

Phillips became a key defense witness in Major Martin's courts-martial, but was murdered before the courts-martial began. Police found him dead by gunshot wounds, at home, in his basement, directly across the street from Major Martin's house.

Also found dead were Phillip's wife Pam and their neighbor, Ed Dansereau. Both discovered shot dead in Pam's torched Nissan so badly burned initial identification was impossible.

Soon after the discovery of Phillips body, Army agents from the Criminal Investigations Division (CID) Fort Campbell were at the scene. How or why the CID knew about the homicides and became involved so quickly or who ordered their involvement is still a mystery.

A little over 24 hours after the discovery of the three bodies, local authorities and a SWAT team raided Major Martin's home with much fanfare, television news crews in tow. Army CID agents joined in the search, which is prohibited by the Posse Comitatus Act. Witnesses observed, and a home surveillance system caught the CID agents entering the house.

Police knew Major Martin was at work on base. They knew his only family member at home was his fiancé. They even confirmed her children were at school before breaking into the house. Unless Army personnel duped the police, local authorities had no reason to raid with a SWAT team. A simple knock on the door should have sufficed, unless, of course, they argue that they believed Major Martin's fiancé would frantically run around destroying incriminating evidence between the time they knocked on the door and gained entry, which is absurd given the circumstances.

Had they done so, just knocked, much of the trauma experienced by Major Martin's fiancé would have been avoided. Instead, they stormed the house with a heavily armed SWAT team, did serious damage to the house and terrified her. Police embarrassed her in front of her curious — if not shocked — friends and neighbors, hauled her off barefoot to the police station, and continued to intimidate her. She was cooperative but refused to make a statement without her attorney. The police released her in Hopkinsville several miles from her home without identification, money or even a cell phone. Eventually, a friend helped her to reunite with her children, who she could not get because the police confiscated her car along with Major Martin's Toyota pickup.

Just before the raid on his home, CID agents detained Major Martin at gunpoint. They confiscated Major Martin's late model Nissan-Infiniti and personal items inside, including his briefcase and laptop computer, the latter two of which contained critical and protected attorney-client relationship materials along with evidence for his defense. None of his confiscated property has been returned even though his attorneys petitioned for its release. Consequently, critical materials at courts-martial were denied Major Martin for his defense.

We believe CID agents or JAG prosecutors reviewed and made copies of the briefcase contents and computer hard-drive, allowing them direct insight as to his defense strategy and evidence. Major Martin has never received a list of the property taken or chain of custody reports. Consequently, it is reasonable to believe the property and evidence has been reworked, corrupted or even destroyed to bolster dishonest investigative and prosecutorial efforts against Major Martin.

This is serious business ill-suited for Keystone Cop machinations. Given the circumstances, it is conceivable the civilian law and military law enforcement may be setting up Major Martin for false arrest, bodily harm or even some sort of accidental death in a jail cell, police car, or elsewhere for a contrived escape or resisting arrest.

On August 16, 2016, about ten months later after the first raid on Major Martin's home, authorities again searched and trashed the same house, even though it was unoccupied. The Martin family had not lived there or in Kentucky for several weeks. Witnesses told Major Martin that Kentucky State Police (KSP) officers and CID agents conducted the search.

Why or who provided information that led to the issuance of the warrant is unknown. Moreover, why the mid-night raid instead of daylight? Could it be the authorities tried to avoid the witnesses this time around?

SEARCH WARRANT

The house is for sale. The damage done devalued the property significantly. Both of which the police and Army investigators knew or should have known, especially since there was a realtor lockbox on the backdoor the authorities destroyed to gain access. Insurance adjusters concluded the damage was 'catastrophic' estimating repairs to be in the tens of thousands of dollars. Walls torn out, wooden floors gouged, plumbing pipes ripped from walls, and near priceless imported antique furniture demolished. From the damage, it seems the authorities partied hard in the Martin house and went the extra mile to cause as much damage and destruction as they could.

Since no one lived in the house for ten months, all kinds of people were in and out of the building including the police, CID agents, forensic teams, technicians, movers, real estate agents and even their clients. Maybe the house was even accessed surreptitiously by Major Martin's bigamist ex-wife Joan Harmon-Guerra, someone in her household, one of her boyfriend(s), or even the police or Army investigators. Neighbors reported seeing a uniformed deputy walking around the property two days before the latest raid. Who was that? What was the deputy doing there? The police, Army personnel, Harmon-Guerra, one of her boyfriends, or someone else she knows could have easily planted evidence against Major Martin in the house.

Such excessive force is unnerving, perhaps illegal, if not psychotic. Civilian and military authorities must know Major Martin is not the murderer. They have his laptop computer, all of his defense documents including attorney-client protected information, and an audio recording of an interview of Phillips with private investigators. Consequently, they knew and know Phillips tired of Harmon-Guerra dangerous manipulations, turned against her, and became Major Martin's most powerful courts-martial witness.

Authorities also have Major Martin's surveillance system video showing him at home at the time of the murders. The video may mysteriously become unusable, corrupted, or indiscernible. Obviously, Major Martin had every reason to want Phillips alive and no reason to want Pam or Dansereau dead.

So who does? Who wanted Phillips dead and may have had a reason to murder his wife and friend Dansereau? Army prosecutors wanted Phillips gone since he became a star witness for Major Martin instead of the prosecution. Phillips testimony would have assured lying convicted felon and bigamist Joan Harmon-Guerra would lose hundreds of thousands of dollars in victim compensation payola from the government if Major Martin were not convicted of her salacious sexual assault accusations.

Moreover, Army prosecutors knew she habitually lied, and lied BIG, often! For example, she told Army investigators (and many others) that before his birth, her first son's father was decapitated in a logging accident. Without backup from Phillips, prosecutors could not allow Joan-Harmon to testify; she simply was not credible.

As an aside, Major Martin's investigators located her son's father, head still attached. Additionally, he explained Harmon-Guerra, abandoned the relationship and kidnapped their son. Investigators arranged a recorded telephone interview with him and Army Special Victim Prosecutor, Major Jacob Bashore. In that conversation, he told of Harmon-Guerra's history of lies, violence, and drug use. At the end of the interview, Bashore asked the man if he had anything further to add and his response was, "what can I tell you, she's the devil." Regardless, Bashore continued his relentless prosecution of Major Martin.

Adding insult to serious injury, Harmon-Guerra recently petitioned for child support from the man in two states. We suspect she forgot to tell child support authorities about his missing head, or that she illegally absconded with their baby boy. We also suspect one or both of the states will grant her request and again abuse the father of her first son, retroactively no less to the tune of tens of thousands of dollars including penalty and interest. At least the she-devil lost her victim compensation payola pot of gold.

During the last week of August 2016, a KSP officer called Major Martin's family members trying to find him. Family members told Major Martin, who in turn told one of his defense attorneys. The attorney called the KSP and learned they wanted to know where Major Martin was so they could serve another search warrant for some sort of biological evidence. The attorney asked the investigator to send him the warrant, which he committed to deliver to Major Martin. Thus far, there has been no response from the KSP nor have follow-up calls from Major Martin's investigators been returned.

Local police claiming they have 'another' search warrant for biological evidence is beyond odd. Major Martin's DNA is on file with the national registry and assessable. Moreover, Major Martin gave DNA three separate times after Harmon-Guerra's false accusations. Where is his DNA, is it being planted somewhere?

So why the third search warrant, if there is one? Is the KSP just harassing Major Martin and his family members? The KSP knows or should know he's not a murderer. Have they been duped, manipulated or coerced by Army authorities? Are they scurrying around trying to save face after bungling a triple homicide investigation? Is it possible one or more law enforcement officers have a direct or indirect relationship with Harmon-Guerra?

What here hides under the color of law? It certainly appears a pattern of harassment and intimidation exists, which in practice is clearly illegal and unconstitutional, as applicable.

Kentucky State Police officers recently interviewed neighbors of Major Martin and Phillips, a full eight months after the triple homicide. Can you imagine taking that long to interview witnesses of any violent crime, let alone a triple murder? It is inconceivable! Keystone Cops, or is something provincially sinister and corrupt working against Major Martin?

Major Martin's former lead defense counsel, William Summers, with 46 years' experience in criminal law, when he learned of the latest 'raid' on Major Martin's house, said:

> Anyone who has watched more than three episodes of CSI Miami would know that anything found during that search would be totally inadmissible. If they claim that evidence of the crime was found, it would have had to been planted; without question.

A veteran major city retired homicide detective familiar with the case quipped:

> This kind of police work is embarrassing. I thought this level of incompetence and buffoonery had been corrected in the 60's, and it is clear that the local cops are being led by the nose by Army CID agents from Fort Campbell, who seem to have taken Major Martin's case personally and are hell bent to make his life miserable, anyway they can, because they can. Of course, they are reaching for straws, and this is a clear example of the collusion between Army CID agents, JAG prosecutors, and their civilian counterparts, in effect to terrorize and harass Major Martin and his family. What's next, are they trying to set him up to kill him?

A former JAG officer now in private practice added:

> The Army is pissed that they didn't get Major Martin for the manufactured and trumped up sexual assault charges and they are hell-bent on making his life miserable because they can."

Another former military officer familiar with the case commented:

> "It would not surprise me that someone higher up in the Army food chain had Calvin Phillips killed. His testimony could have brought down the military's entire sexual assault witch hunt. With so many people in the witch hunt industry and hundreds of millions of dollars at stake, a manufactured case like this would have turned the whole military sexual assault epidemic and its witch hunt on its ear. The narrative has to be protected at all costs, even murder."

Yet another prominent legal professional knowledgeable of the case said:

> With all of the scandalous things that have happened in that county; a recent cold case of cops committing murder and cops in Christian County covering it up, and the seemingly outlandish incompetence of sheriff's personnel, it would seem likely that a federal agency that goes by certain letters of the alphabet would already have the Christian County Sheriff's Department on the radar.

In sum, highly regarded, awarded, competent, well liked, and decorated, Major Martin was wrongfully convicted of two trumped-up misdemeanors so the Army could save its politically correct face and one General could protect his career. Major Martin spent over two months in confinement, lost pay and benefits, his retirement, and dishonorably discharged (dismissed). Disrespected, damaged, and destroyed, were his family, home, and property, respectively. He was given no property receipt or chain of custody report. Major Martin's fiancé even had to quit her prestigious teaching position at a local university. Authorities constantly monitor Major Martin and his family at social, sporting, and other events. Major Martin' and his family's reputations are scared irrevocably. Moreover, he is financially ruined. Now, authorities are hounding him for murders he did not commit. All caused by the false accusations of one Joan Harmon-Guerra.

The evil abuse, chaos, corruption, danger, deaths, devastation, destruction, financial ruin, havoc, malfeasance, terror and violence caused by liar Joan Harmon-Guerra and her Kentucky law enforcement and Army enablers is inescapable, incalculable and otherwise unconscionable; yet, she escapes unscathed, free to abuse again leaving a trail of shattered lives in her path. The abandoned father of the child she kidnapped said it best, "she's the devil."

For perspective, let's take a closer look at law enforcement corruption in Christian County and Kentucky.

Soon after Joan Harmon-Guerra ended her extra-marital sexual affair with Calvin Phillips, she took up and moved in with a local truck driver, William Stokes, along with her three kids.

Stokes has or had some interesting connections with the sheriff's department and prosecutor's office, meaning so did Harmon-Guerra, directly or indirectly. The screenshot above shows one of his friends is Lynn Pryor, Commonwealth Attorney, and Christian County Chief Prosecutor.

Another screenshot of Lynn Pryor's Facebook page (below) shows she is friends with William Stokes.

We don't know how friendly of "friends" they are, but isn't it odd that Stokes, is or was living with the one person on the planet with a lengthy list of reasons to want Phillips dead, and that he's also a Facebook friend with the chief law enforcement officer in the county?

The CCSD employs Detective Lieutenant Ed Stokes, presumably homicide unit supervisor, which implies he is in charge of investigating the triple homicide.

Isn't it even more odd that Detective Stokes is the brother of Harmon-Guerra's boyfriend William Stokes? Close relationships, which show clear, blatant and incestuous conflicts of interest, suggesting illicit collusion?

Then there's the earlier graveyard theft and destruction debacle. New owners of a local cemetery allegedly removed brass placards from graves and sold them for scrap. Below is a screen shot from Commonwealth Attorney and Chief Prosecutor Lynn Pryor's Newsletter.

LYNN PRYOR
COMMONWEALTH'S ATTORNEY
THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT/CHRISTIAN COUNTY, KY

July-August 2014 Newsletter Volume 45

JURY TRIALS:

COMMONWEALTH VS. JASON STRADER
COMMONWEALTH VS. TAUNYA STRADER

Judge: Andrew Self
Prosecutor: Lynn Pryor
Agency: Christian Co. Sherriff's Office

On August 4, 2014, Commonwealth's Attorney Lynn Pryor tried the case of Commonwealth vs. Jason Strader and Commonwealth v. Tauyna Strader. The Straders were each charged with 46 Counts of Violating Graves and Theft by Deception over $500, 2 Counts, and Theft by Unlawful Taking over $10,000.

After two hours of deliberation, the jury found both Not Guilty on all counts.

Defense attorneys Thomas Osborne and Rick Boling knew Deputy Stokes had a pending lawsuit against their clients, Jason and Taunya Straker, because Deputy Stokes' mothers' brass placard was missing from her grave marker and ostensibly sold. Deputy Stokes was the investigating officer in the case. Osborne insinuated Deputy Stokes and prosecutor Pryor were romantically involved, and that she fast-tracked the prosecution to favor Deputy Stokes.

Clearly, a conflict since Stokes could financially gain from his pending lawsuit, as well as his relationship with Pryor. The latter of which may help explain fast-tracking the case and 46 counts of Violating Graves, the latter of which could be viewed as "over-charging" or "heaping." Apparently, according to Osborne, Deputy Stokes even intimidated the Straders at their place of business. The Straders were acquitted.

Attorney Osborne reportedly said Stokes was,

"uniquely situated not to be fair or impartial" as the lead investigator in the case… He would march up and down in front of the (cemetery's) office like a bull, snorted, and he would ask (the Straders) if they knew who he was? Did they know what job he had…"

Pictured at left, Detective Stokes & prosecutor Lynn Pryor in white. Photo by Kentucky New Era

Never should Deputy Stokes been assigned the graveyard case, assuming the Sherriff knew of Stokes' pending civil suit against the accused. Regardless, Deputy Stokes should have distanced himself from the investigation.

Chief prosecutor Lynn Pryor should have recused herself because of her romantic relationship with Deputy Stokes, real or perceived. Is it possible Pryor's relationship with Deputy Stokes as well as their relationship(s) with Ft. Campbell and KSP personnel caused the harassing tunnel vision focus on Major Martin for the murders? To our knowledge and inconceivably, Harmon-Guerra is not even a suspect!

Local media spotlighted Major Martin without any finger-pointing at Harmon-Guerra, which is mind-blowing considering national media often devotes considerable time to just one salacious homicide. Remember, we are talking about three related murders, a triple-homicide, surrounded by false accusations of sexual assault, child abuse, and international spying involving a highly decorated Army officer in good standing. Yet there has been little or no interest from the likes of 60 Minutes, Dateline, the New York Times, major networks, not even Kentucky's' major newspapers. Is not that curious?

Here, under the color of law, provincialism seems to rain a deadly pattern and practice of close-knit corruption reaching high and wide. Is there some type of nefarious good old boys' and girls' network in Christian County, between local cops, prosecutors and their U.S. Army counterparts at Fort Campbell? How far does it go? Aside from the above, convicted of cocaine distribution and other crimes was a former Christian County Sheriff. Two former Kentucky police officers are awaiting trial in a case involving extortion and the murders of two prostitutes. Another police chief in the local area and a subordinate relieved of duty while under investigation for drug-related crimes. Yet, even another local police chief was charged with cocaine distribution.

Harvard University's Center for Ethics conducted a study in 2014 and determined that Kentucky was one of the most corrupt states in the U.S. In July 2015, the Louisville FBI Field Office issued a press release and launched the "End Corruption Now" campaign, asking the public to help root out corruption in Kentucky.

BI Louisville Seeks the Public's Assistance in Identifying ublic Corruption within the Commonwealth of Kentucky ecial Agent in Charge Howard S. Marshall of the FBI's Louisville Division, joined by John E. Kuhn, Jr. Unite tes Attorney for the Western District of Kentucky, and Kerry B. Harvey, United States Attorney for the Easte trict of Kentucky, announced today a new initiative designed to solicit the public's help in identifying public ruption within our community. The initiative includes the launch of a new, toll-free tip line (844) KYNOPC1 6-6721), a billboard campaign, and a dedicated e-mail address: Kentucky_PC_Complaints@ic.fbi.gov.

One of two United States Attorneys for Kentucky; Mr. John E. Kuhn Jr. was quoted as saying:

"I can promise you this; if public corruption is reported, it will be investigated. If the investigation reveals evidence of a federal crime, it will be prosecuted."

We hope that is true. The examples of government abuse, excess, and overreach; both military and civilian, in the case of Major Martin are stunningly frightening. Whatever justifications civilian and military authorities give, if any, about how they handled Major Martin's case, they cannot prove their actions were honest, objective, reasonable, or ethical, under any circumstance. So, what do you think? Are Kentucky Keystone Cops and corrupt Army agents trying to kill Major Martin, or just harassing and terrorizing him? Regardless, their behavior is disgustingly wrongheaded.

We will bring your more information as it develops.

Article originally published September 9, 2016*, By NCFM. EDs*

*****

References

http://www.foxnews.com/us/2013/11/20/2-cops-indicted-in-4-ky-brothel-killings.html http://www.cnn.com/2013/11/21/justice/kentucky-prostitute-murders-cold-case/http://www.kentuckynewera.com/news/courts/article_4352a88a-1c44-11e4-bfea-0019bb2963f4.html

http://wkms.org/post/hopkinsville-cemetery-owners-indicted-stealing-tomb-markers#stream/0 http://www.christiancountyso.com/about/staff/

http://www.lynnpryor.com/

https://www.fbi.gov/contact-us/field-offices/louisville/news/press-releases/fbi-louisville-seeks-the-publics-assistance-in-identifying-public-corruption-within-the-commonwealth-of-kentucky http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2015/jul/31/fbi-enlisting-public-help-to-uncover-corruption-in/

https://www.fbi.gov/contact-us/field-offices/louisville/news/press-releases/lynch-kentucky-chief-of-police-arrested-on-drug-and-weapon-charges http://openjurist.org/960/f2d/587/united-states-v-sivils http://clarksvillenow.com/local/oak-grove-police-chief-fired-following-ksp-investigation/

https://static1.squarespace.com/static/54219053e4b02b592c410c3d/t/5421b29be4b0c6a70bc305bb/1411494555004/Volume+45.pdf

Is Hrithik Roshan now a Voice for Men?

Vivek · 6 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Ajai Gautam/Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY-20).

Who doesn't love gossips? That too, when a gossip is about a celebrity, it is received with a great craving. What once started as such a gossip in the Bollywood has now transformed into a major social discourse, with common people taking sides and forming opinions about it.

The (Long) Short Story

If you do not know the story yet, let me explain it to you, in short. Bollywood actor Hrithik Roshan found himself in the center of a controversy when Kangna Ranaut, an actress, implied him as her 'silly ex' in an interview. This was in response to a question about whether Hrithik was the reason for her exclusion from the movie Aashiqui 3. All hell broke loose as the fans who were waiting for the next gossip to munch on, got something from the horse's mouth.

In response to Kangna's comment, Hrithik tweeted this:

> Ther r more chances of me having had an affair with d Pope dan any of d (Im sure wonderful)women d media hs ben naming.Thanks but no thanks.
>
> — Hrithik Roshan (@iHrithik) January 28, 2016

Also, Hrithik sent a legal notice to Kangna, demanding a public apology. But, Kangna went on to retain her version of the story that Hrithik had an affair with her and even proposed to her in Paris. In the series of events that followed, Hrithik came out with the claim that Kangna was 'imagining' the relationship.

Hrithik explained that before Kangna got his real email address, she was communicating with an impostor using a fake email id. Later, he went on to explain that, after Hrithik gave his real email address to Kangna on knowing this, it was she who sent thousands of intimate emails to Hrithik's real email address, to which he did not even respond. Some time back, some of those alleged emails were leaked to the media and did rounds in the public.

Amidst all this controversy, another actor Adhyayan Suman, Kangna's former lover, went on to support Hrithik's version and exposed Kangna as a cruel woman, who was physically abusive.

Will Hrithik Roshan Fight Against Misandry?

Now that you know the (long) short story, let's get into the actual subject matter – the news about Hrithik Roshan's 'prep' for the legal battle against Kangna. Deccan Chronicle published a news article about this matter which might come out as a pleasant surprise to many of the distressed men in India.

A very close friend of Hrithik is reported to have said, "Hrithik's own plight has made him realize what happens to hundreds and thousands of men who are falsely implicated in molestation and dowry cases by vengeful women. Hrithik feels like one of them."

Also, it is reported that Hrithik is no longer fighting for himself and that Hrithik's war is against gender prejudice that's prevalent in modern societies the world over.

> Hrithik intends to not only expose the lie about the alleged liaison; he also wants to open a debate on all cases where women accuse men of crimes. All a woman has to do is say that a man has wronged her and the man is in jail regardless of his innocence or culpability. It is this legal and moral ideology that Hrithik wants to fight now.

What made Hrithik do this?

No one except Adhyayan Suman from the Bollywood supported him regarding this issue. His own industry, which gave him a lot of awards has let him down because he is a man. Could it have been the same if a famous woman like Priyanka Chopra or Deepika Padukone is in his position? Certainly not. Somehow, it is not in line with the philosophy of Bollywood, and even society at large, to stand along with a wronged man.

In fact, Adhyayan Suman too supported because of his prior experience, not as a matter of policy. Kangna received the support of a lot of media channels and feminists just on the ground that she was a woman. Isn't this discrimination?

What took him so long?

I wonder how is it that a personal experience of misandry has always been necessary to get into the fight against misandry whereas, without any personal experience of oppression of women, masses get into the feminist movement (and become leaders too) and spew hate against men. This makes me realize that 'misandry' is the default state of mind and you need to grow yourself out of it by conscious action.

From the perspective that I see Hrithik, he has proven himself to be a mature human being who is not 'stuck' by just thinking only about his own issues. Many men get stuck in their own issues because they lack a broader world view. Very few men understand that they will not get relief until they see their struggle as a social phenomenon instead of seeing it as an issue of their bad in-laws or exes.

If Bollywood's Dreamboy could be ostracized by the public because of provocation by a woman, what could happen to a common man, who does not know anything except his family and his job? It is high time for people like Hrithik to act as the Voice for Men to counter the misandry in the society.

Will Hrithik remain as a Voice for Men India? Let's wait and watch!

The Anti-Feminazi Nazi?

Doug Mortimer · 7 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Bundesarchiv, Bild 146-1988-106-29, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution CC-BY-SA 3.0).

When the topic of great female filmmakers arises (admittedly not often), the short list always includes Leni Riefenstahl. That her best-known work was done in the service of Adolf Hitler necessitated trigger warnings long before disclaimers were referred to as such.

Riefenstahl's personal involvement with the Third Reich has long been the subject of debate. Clearly, Hitler, Goebbels, and other members of the Nazi Party were big fans. They admired her work and did all they could to facilitate it. Was she just an artist for hire or was she a player? Was she down with the Nazi agenda, or was she just going along because the party bosses controlled the purse strings?

Hitler notwithstanding, Riefenstahl's work presents big problems for contemporary feminists. So let's furl the swastika banners, stifle the Nazi salutes, park Hitler's Mercedes-Benz touring car, and take a look at the woman behind the camera.

Helene Bertha Amalie "Leni" Riefenstahl was born in Berlin on August 22, 1902. As old photographs evince, she grew into a strikingly attractive young woman. Athletically as well as artistically inclined, her interests encompassed poetry, painting, swimming, gymnastics, and dancing, which was her first profession.

After 70 performances across Europe, her dancing career was derailed by a knee injury. Since she was 24 years old in 1926, she could still capitalize on her sexual market value, so she transitioned to film acting.

Her specialty was in a defunct genre called Alpine films. As the name implies, such films were shot on location at high altitudes and featured skiing and mountaineering. Director Arnold Fanck, a former geologist who specialized in these films, offered them as a great-outdoors alternative to the cloistered world of studio-made movies. As the star of such movies, Riefenstahl was, in a sense, a breath of fresh air.

In 1932 Riefenstahl produced, directed, and starred in Das Blaue Licht ("The Blue Light"), a fantasy about a mystical nature girl, full moons, and magic crystals in the Dolomites. The film won the Silver Medal at the Venice Film Festival (Mussolini's brainchild) and came to the attention of Adolf Hilter, who became Chancellor of Germany in 1933.

Perhaps because Nazism had an undercurrent of mysticism, Hitler was Impressed with Riefenstahl's work. He hired her to film Der Sieg des Glaubens ("The Victory of Faith"), a documentary propaganda film about the Nazi Party's 1933 rally at Nuremberg. This was her first documentary, but it received limited release because it had extensive footage of Ernst Röhm and Gregor Strasser, prominent Nazis who were executed during the famed Nazi purge known as the Night of the Long Knives (actually a three-night event from June 30 to July 2, 1934). Röhm and Strasser went down the memory hole, so prints of the movie had to follow suit. But a remake of sorts was just around the corner.

Another National Socialist rally was held in Nuremberg from September 4 through 10, 1934 and this time the cinematic results were long-lasting. The film of the event, known as Triumph des Willens ("Triumph of the Will") was an immediate sensation, and not just in Germany. It has been in circulation ever since.

The film can be seen in its entirety on YouTube, so I won't attempt to describe it except to say that it was much more than the mere documentation of an event. Riefenstahl worked with Albert Speer, Hitler's chief architect, to design and stage the rally for maximum cinematic effect. Overseeing a staff of 120 (30 cameras were employed), Riefenstahl had a lot to deal with logistically as well as aesthetically.

Given the contemporary icky-poo reaction to all things Nazi, it is a testament to Leni Riefenstahl's skills that her film transcends politics. Even left-leaning academics grudgingly admit that Triumph of the Will is a masterpiece of world cinema – but with an asterisk!.

Riefenstahl crafted an alluring, sweeping cinematic experience that weaves a spell over viewers and pulls them into the pageantry. Political beliefs become superficial if not irrelevant. Hey, who doesn't love a parade? In fact, by the end of the film, the viewer might feel the urge to peruse eBay in search of a good deal on a pair of jackboots. One wonders if Mel Brooks screened the movie before writing the lyrics "Don't be stupid, be a smarty, come and join the Nazi party" for one of the musical numbers in The Producers.

National Socialism, however, is not why feminists, who often express admiration for totalitarianism, would object to the film. The film is problematic not because it glorifies National Socialism, but because it glorifies men, en masse and individually.

Watch the film and notice that almost all the footage is devoted to men. Women are occasionally seen cheering the men on or peering out windows, but they are relegated to the sidelines. The subject of this film is men, whether übermenschen like the Nazi leaders, or the seemingly endless parade of troops and workers, beta males as disposable as they are indispensable. Occasionally, the proceedings are punctuated by close-ups of men in the crowd.

So why did Riefenstahl focus almost exclusively on men? Well, the Nazi Party was a boys' club, but there's more to it than that.

Before the Great War, Germany was the strongest, most prosperous nation on the European mainland. By the early 1930s, the consequences of the Treaty of Versailles, the Weimar Republic, and the Depression had taken their toll, and the German people were thoroughly demoralized.

Unlike contemporary feminists, Riefenstahl understood that Germany would not be revitalized if men were not revitalized. Male ennui furthered national decline; male energy would have to be channeled to turn the country around. In that sense, Triumph of the Will is almost a recruitment film for nation-building (or re-building). And women don't build (or re-build) nations. They just live in them.

Riefenstahl, however, doesn't go full tradcon. She doesn't roll out the old kinder, küche, kirche (children, kitchen, church) prescription for women; she simply ignores her Teutonic sisters. The film emphasizes that the Third Reich is a man's world. After all, didn't Germans refer to their country as the fatherland (vaterland)? By promoting Nazism, Riefenstahl was simultaneously pushing patriarchy! Even without armbands, the latter is just as sinister as the former, at least in modern feminist circles.

Riefenstahl's next project was much less political and patriarchal, but it too offers cold comfort to contemporary feminists. An ambitious two-part documentary (also available on YouTube) called Olympia, it chronicles the XI Olympiad held in Berlin in August 1936. Obviously, this event was another opportunity for pageantry, and Riefenstahl employed her $7 million budget to great effect. So why would Olympia be offensive to feminists?

To be sure, the film shows the opening ceremonies, the lighting of the Olympic flame (the 1936 Olympics were the first modern games to feature the torch relay starting from Athens), and plenty of footage of athletic competition. To a large degree, the film set the standard for the visuals we take for granted on Olympic telecasts today.

So how could any of this be offensive? Well, let's begin at the beginning.

The film starts out with what one might call a visual overture, a series of tracking shots of mist-shrouded statutes of athletes in ancient Greece. Once the games begin, we get to see, in effect, statues come to life, and the ideal becomes real.

Olympia is a glorification of human bodies, male and female, trim, coordinated, and at the peak of their youthful powers. In other words, no obesity, no ugliness, no disabilities, no degeneration. It is straightforward objectification, as well as a backhanded sort of body-shaming since only a minuscule percentage of the audience could match the celluloid specimens flashing across the big screen in front of them.

Undeniably, based on what we see on the screen (no CGI in those days), some people are better-looking than others. Some are better-proportioned than others. Some are better coordinated than others. Some are faster than others. Some are stronger than others. These are the best of the best, and their feats are not just recorded newsreel-style but are frequently portrayed with elaborate camera movements and slow motion. Undeniably, some of the shots are staged – not to deceive the viewer but to enhance the aesthetic experience of watching the body beautiful in motion.

Olympia premiered in 1938 and was widely distributed and praised. Riefenstahl was feted around the world, but she became persona non grata on September 1, 1939, when Hitler kicked off World War II by invading Poland. From then on, her artistic life was largely one of projects that did not come to fruition. Germany during World War II was not a good place to secure funding for movies and foreign investment was out of the question.

The Allied occupation forces kept an eye on Riefenstahl after the war, but she didn't do any serious time. Arguably, if she had been a man, she might have been in the dock with Göring, Hess, Ribbentrop, and the rest of the boys at the Nuremberg trials.

If Riefenstahl did get a pussy pass after the war, it might have been due to her sex appeal. During her heyday, Riefenstahl had a very active sex life – a heterosexual sex life, one hastens to add. She had affairs with any number of influential men (no, not Hitler), as well as assorted beta males who were in a position to help her. Even when she was well into middle age, men who met her commented on her sexual magnetism.

Men liked her because she liked men. She did not play the feminist card. She did play the victim card. Why would she have complained about the patriarchy when men had aided her career every step of the way? Women were largely irrelevant in her work and to her work. Of course, that would be another reason for feminists to hate her. She didn't use her talents to promote the narrative. One suspects that had she been in the employ of Stalin, she would have been the darling of the intelligentsia during the 1930s.

After the war, Riefenstahl could have succumbed to self-pity and retired to obscurity. Instead, she reinvented herself, developed an interest in still photography and published a book of ethnographic photographs of the Nuba people of the Sudan.

At age 72, she was certified as a scuba diver. She was still practicing sub-aquatic photography in her 90s, and led an active life almost to the end. She died on September 8, 2003 at the age of 101.

As is the case with most remarkable people, she was difficult to classify. She's in with Hitler, but does that means she was a fascist? She was about as emancipated as any woman in history, but does that mean she was a feminist?

For all the reasons outlined above, I certainly can't put Riefenstahl in the feminist column, which doesn't mean she belongs in the anti-feminist column. In truth, that duality is irrelevant to her work. Of course, in the feminist ideology, if you're not with them, you're against them.

The need to classify individuals according to an artificial dichotomy tells us more about the limitations of the human mind – and particularly the feminist mind – than it does about the person under consideration.

Limitations were definitely not part of Leni Riefenstahl's mindset.

Michael Hsieh, MD of Children's National Health System, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 7 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Micheal Hsieh, MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He is listed as a Urologist at the Children's National Health System, and following these menus we find that he performs circumcision as the "treatment" of the "condition" known as "foreskin:"

Choose Children's -> Conditions and Treatments -> Urology -> Circumcision

From the "Children's Team" we find Dr. Hsieh, and his "Biography:"

"Michael Hsieh, MD, PhD, is a urologist at Children's National Health System. Dr. Hsieh has experience in laparoscopic and robotic surgery for urologic conditions, and specializes in bladder diseases affecting children and young adults. He is board certified in urology and holds the certificate of added qualification in pediatric urology.

Dr. Hsieh was recruited to Children's National and the George Washington University to serve as Director of Transitional Urology. This joint venture is the East Coast's first clinical program dedicated to the care of adolescents and young adults with congenital urologic disorders. Many of these patients have chronic cystitis and are at increased risk of bladder cancer, diseases which dovetail with Dr. Hsieh's research interests. Dr. Hsieh also is the Stirewalt Endowed Director of the Biomedical Research Institute near Children's National's satellite facilities in Rockville, Md, where he runs a bladder biology research group and is developing a broader microbiology research program across multiple laboratories.

Dr. Hsieh has been a Recognized Doctor on the Healthgrades Honor Roll and Best Doctors in America. He has been featured several times in the New York Times for his work in robotic surgery and bladder inflammation."

It really is a shame that such an obviously talented and caring person would sully himself – and bloody his hands and reputation – by genitally mutilating babies without their consent, many times causing the problems that require further surgeries to fix, to say nothing of permanently ruining a baby boy's ability to have a natural and normal sex life.

Again, in this list of specialties, the doctor is able to help with all these terrible problems, EXCEPT THE ONE HE CAUSES:

> Specialties
>
> Circumcision
> Congenital Ureteropelvic Junction Obstruction
> Ectopic Ureter

> Exstrophy of the Bladder and Epispadias
> Horseshoe Kidney
> Hydrocele
> Hypospadias
> Inguinal Hernia
> Megaureter
> Micropenis
> Phimosis and Paraphimosis
> Posterior Urethral Valve
> Prune Belly Syndrome
> Testicular Torsion
> Undescended Testis
> Ureterocele
> Urinary Incontinence or Enuresis (bedwetting)
> Urinary Stone Program
> Urinary Tract Infection (UTI)
> Vesicoureteral Reflux

And of course, that problem ITSELF is CIRCUMCISION.

Further on at the website:

> What is circumcision?
>
> Circumcision is a surgical procedure to remove the skin covering the end of the penis, called the foreskin. In many cultures, circumcision is a religious rite or a ceremonial tradition. It is most common in Jewish and Islamic faiths. In the United States, newborn circumcision is an elective procedure. An estimated 55 to 80 percent of newborn boys undergo circumcision. However, this number varies among socioeconomic, racial, and ethnic groups.
>
> Do pediatricians support circumcision?
>
> The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) issued a policy statement in 1999 on the use of circumcision. This policy was most recently updated in 2012. The AAP recognizes the following information from studies of both circumcised and uncircumcised males:
>
> Problems with the penis, such as irritation, can occur with or without circumcision.
> There is no difference in hygiene, as long as proper care is followed.
> There may or may not be any difference in sexual sensation or practices in adult men.
> There is an increased risk of urinary tract infection in uncircumcised males, especially in babies younger than 1 year of age. However, the risk for urinary tract infections in all boys is less than 1 percent.
> Newborn circumcision does provide some protection from cancer of the penis. However, the overall risk of penis cancer is very low in developed countries, such as the United States.
> There is a decreased risk of certain sexually transmitted diseases (including HIV) in circumcised males.
> The most current AAP report found that the health benefits to circumcision outweigh the risks. However, these benefits are not significant enough to recommend that all newborn baby boys be circumcised. The AAP recommends that parents should be given information on the benefits and risks of newborn circumcision and that parents should decide what is best for their baby.

So, in a roundabout way, the AAP DOES NOT SUPPORT ROUTINE CIRCUMCISION OF INFANTS. As a matter of fact the most recent findings by the AAP warn AGAINST surgery such as circumcision on infants because of their immature nervous system.

> What care is needed after a circumcision?
>
> Circumcisions performed by a qualified doctor rarely have complications. Problems that occur are usually not serious. The most common complications are bleeding and infection. Proper care after circumcision helps reduce the chances of problems.

"Usually not serious," but why take the unnecessary chance that your baby will bleed to death or have a lifetime of pain and suffering?

> What care is needed for an uncircumcised penis?
>
> A newborn boy normally has foreskin tightly fitted over the head of the penis. As long as the baby is able to pass urine through the opening, this is not a problem. It is not necessary to clean inside the foreskin, only the outside, as part of a normal bath.
>
> As the baby grows, the foreskin becomes looser and is able to be retracted (moved back). This may take many months to years. Your baby's doctor will check this as part of your baby's checkups and will show you how to retract the foreskin. This allows cleansing of the area. As a boy grows, he should be taught how to retract the foreskin and clean himself. The foreskin should never be retracted forcibly. Do not allow the foreskin to stay retracted for long periods as this may shut off the blood supply causing pain and possible injury. Sometimes the foreskin becomes stuck in the retracted position and cannot be pulled back down. This is called paraphimosis and is a medical emergency.
>
> In some children, the foreskin cannot be retracted because of a restricted opening, causing a condition called phimosis. This condition may require circumcision later in childhood if it doesn't respond to medical treatment.

This is sound advice – no need to mutilate an infant; leave him intact, free of trauma, to enjoy what he was born with.

Unbelievably and ironically, the Children's National Health System has a new campaign to "Grow Up Stronger" with this glowing image of pure goodness, with nary an image of babies being strapped down for sexual abuse and mutilation:

Check out the campaign here, where I tried to get my own message published about what "Stronger is…" I said "Stronger is… leaving baby boys intact," leaving my real name and my department as urology. At least if I was a urologist I wouldn't on one hand help little boys, while disfiguring them with the other. Whether or not my message is posted – it appears they check email addresses – someone has read my message so I FTSU. I may leave a link to this article as my next message. Or maybe "Stronger is… the adult that straps down a baby in order to sexually abuse and genitally mutilate him."

Dr. Hsieh, you don't have to circumcise these babies, so why do it? Refuse to do it – it's a human rights violation according to the law and the United Nations. If all cutters refused to cut, this horrible practice would die out much sooner. Obviously Children's Health makes money on this practice, hence it's continuation. But that's BLOOD MONEY.

Since Dr. Hsieh has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Hsieh's practice information follows:

Children's National Health System

Locations
Main Hospital
Washington, District of Columbia 20010
1-888-884-BEAR (2327)
Montgomery County Outpatient Center
Rockville, Maryland 20850
301-765-5400 or 800-787-0243

> @childrenshealth Stronger is… the adult that straps down a baby and sexually abuses and genitally mutilates him. https://t.co/xGgrsOyvtY pic.twitter.com/iyH3jDDNma
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) December 7, 2016

Kimmel doubles down on doublespeak

Gary Costanza · 9 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Both men and women have made it possible for women to have choice: no man or government can force a woman into motherhood.

But Michael Kimmel would have you believe that most men would take that choice away if they could, which is an obvious lie. From his own mouth he admits it has overwhelmingly been men on the Supreme Court, in Congress, and the judiciary that have stood along with the vast majority of men and women who believe in a woman's right to choose.

Which brings me to Kimmel's latest attempt to double down on his doublespeak: to help men we must help women. Huh?

As part of the cast, Kimmel attended the première of "The Red Pill" movie in NYC, a documentary by a feminist that explores the men's rights movement and the issues that concern them. The movie has garnered rave reviews by many, but has been panned by feminists and ideologues who refuse to consider that their narrative of victim-hood and patriarchy is faulty, most of whom haven't seen the movie yet, as it's had limited screenings.

But not for long. Cassie Jaye, the director of "The Red Pill" has made a blockbuster of a documentary that is on track to take the world by storm, stunning many in the feminist world with its unassailable evidence that men and boys have issues that people like Kimmel have denied and dismissed. I suspect he was not happy how he comes off in the movie, along with the other feminists that blame men for their own problems, trying to make the movement into a group of angry white men. Oh, he already tried selling that.

When TRP gets wide distribution the world will see that the MHRM is a grassroots movement of men and women of all colors and backgrounds seeking true equality for men and women, including the choice when to procreate.

Kimmel's rhetoric about how men will benefit by supporting feminist causes like "HeForShe" and protecting women's right to choose doesn't fly to any sane person.

For men to be able to choose when to parent men must have the equivalent reproductive rights that women have.

Men know only too well that women's reproductive rights give none of the same rights to them, and Kimmel lies when he says women's reproductive rights "offer almost as much freedom to us as they do to women." How so, Michael? Using your examples, with women having unilateral reproductive power to force men into fatherhood, I give its possible outcome:

- Fathers who already have three children, and fear they can't afford a fourth (if Mom wants the child, he's forced)
- Guys who only "hooked up" with her last night, and have no interest in a relationship, let alone a baby (if she wants the child, he's forced)
- Men whose careers are just starting and don't want a baby now (if she wants the child, he's forced)
- Compassionate partners who foresee lives of pain for babies who would be born with serious birth defects (if she wants the child, he's forced)
- The friends, partners and husbands of those who have been sexually assaulted (if she wants the child, he's forced)

Oh, I see Michael, men have to hope she agrees with him, but if not he's forced into parenthood, and if he doesn't pay child support, he will be jailed. That's what feminism has brought to men. No rights, only responsibilities for her choice.

If feminists want true equality – and that means reproductive rights for all – women and men should have the right to opt out of parenthood, not just women.

Kimmel thinks he supports reproductive rights for women, but let's call it what it is – reproductive privilege for women.

And in the highly unlikely event that *Roe vs. Wad*e is overturned and some rogue states remove the option of abortion available to women, that would give women the same reproductive choices as men, which is to say none.*

And let me correct your quote, Michael: "Stated most simply, men are stakeholders in the debate about ~~women's~~ people's reproductive rights.

Not quite, as women could still give babies up for adoption, as well as the freeing option of "safe-baby surrender."

Feminist Mass Hysteria – TFF Episode 42

AVfM Video Source · 9 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 42 Professor Fiamengo argues that feminism, and the claim that we live in a “rape culture” in particular, is an instance of mass hysteria.

StudioBrule

Save Our Heroes Project Files Complaint with Tennessee Bar & USDOJ

Michael Conzachi · 11 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

On October 25th, Save Our Heroes' Project filed a formal complaint with the Tennessee State Bar and the U.S. Department of Justice, Criminal Section, Civil Rights Division, involving the actions of Army JAG judge and former prosecutor, Lieutenant Colonel Jacob Bashore.

Bashore was previously a Special Victims Prosecutor at Fort Campbell Kentucky and was recently promoted to Lieutenant Colonel and appointed as a judge at Fort Hood Texas.

This complaint stems from Bashore's wrongful prosecution and conviction of Sergeant Mario Jeffers of Fort Campbell, for sexual assault in November of 2015.

An investigation conducted by Save Our Heroes' as well as documents obtained in the case reveal that Sergeant Mario Jeffers had been convicted in a Court-Martial at Fort Campbell Kentucky in a one-day, military judge only trial, to six years of confinement and a dishonorable discharge.

Documents obtained, which include a police report from the Clarksville Tennessee Police Department reveal that the alleged victim, made a videotaped admission that the sex she had with Sgt. Jeffers was consensual, and that the alleged sexual assault was unfounded and the matter was closed in late summer of 2014.

Page 1 of 1

Agency: CITY OF CLARKSVILLE
Officer ID/Name: 1496 \ Dennis Honholt
Date: 8/4/2014 3:50:00AM

Case Management
Incident Number: W2014-14413
Case Number: W2014-14413

Narrative Title:

I conducted interviews with suspect Mario Jeffers, victim Jacita Upshaw and the suspects girlfriend, Anna Shemwell. During my interview with Jeffers, he admitted to having sexual intercourse with Upshaw, but gave a detailed account of the incident and stated that it was voluntary.

On 08/04/2014, I interviewed Upshaw for a second time at district three CI in the presence of a CID agent. During the interview, I confronted Upshaw with the facts of the case I was aware of. Ms. Upshaw agreed that she did voluntarily kiss Jeffers when he got into bed with her and that she did have sex with him. Ms. Upshaw was crying and I made it clear to her that the fact that she voluntarily participated in the act excludes it from being a rape.

I am requesting this case be unfounded.

The facts of the investigation reveal that the alleged victim had been having disciplinary problems and was about to be deployed, so approximately a year after the closure of the case by Clarksville PD, she made the same allegations with officials at Fort Campbell, Kentucky.

An Article 32 Hearing (preliminary hearing) convened and the Article 32 Hearing Officer; Captain Patrick Sweeny concluded that there was insufficient probable cause that Sgt. Jeffers committed any offense, as depicted in the screenshot of the Article 32 report below.

IMSE-CAM-JA-CAL
SUBJECT: Findings of UCMJ Article 32(b) Preliminary Hearing, United States v. SGT Mario I. Jeffers

31 July 2014 and no statement from the CID interview can be admitted in a court-martial.

8. Conclusion. The evidence does not support a finding of probable cause to believe that the accused committed the charged offense.

9. The point of contact for this memorandum is the undersigned at (270) 798-0727 or patrick.f.sweeney8.mil@mail.mil.

PATRICK F. SWEENEY
CPT, JA
Preliminary Hearing Officer

Encls
1. Government Exhibits
2. Defense Exhibits
3. Summarized Transcript
4. Emails re: Report Deadline

Despite these facts of innocence, Special Victim Prosecutor Major (now LTC) Jacob Bashore prosecuted and subsequently convicted Sgt. Jeffers of sexual assault.

U.S. v SGT Jeffers, Mario

Case Details

Trial

Docket Entries

This is now the THIRD state bar complaint involving Bashore. One was filed by defense counsel in the case of Major Kit Martin, and another was filed in the cases of Major Kit Martin and Sergeant First Class Kelly Stewart by the National Coalition for Men.

The wrongful prosecution and conviction of SFC Kelly Stewart by Bashore was chronicled in a bestselling book 'Three Days in August' by Investigative Reporter Bob McCarty.

Besides the applicable Tennessee State Bar Professional Rules of Conduct violations, the NCFM complaint involving Bashore, previously filed, also alleges possible violations of federal law to include;

It is explicitly clear that Army JAG prosecutor, Jacob Bashore, now a judge, is completely void of ethics or conscience; knowingly prosecuting innocent soldiers for sex crimes that never happened. Bashore has a significant history, and pattern and practice of prosecuting innocent soldiers, to the extent that he has been placed on the "Hall of Shame" of the website, Military Corruption dot com; one of only a handful of corrupt military personnel ever bestowed such a despicable title by MCC.

These alleged violations by Bashore are not mistakes or inadvertent errors in judgment. They are intentional, malicious, CRIMINAL, and are a stunning revelation of the pattern and practice of the routine railroading of service members for alleged sexual assault allegations, and in this case, even when no crime has been committed.

This is another example of an out of control military judicial system with no accountability or oversight; that is willing to sacrifice falsely accused military men, on the altar of political correctness and to appease the conglomerate of rape hysterics.

Feel free to go to the website for Save Our Heroes' Project and read of some of the tremendous work they are doing for the military falsely accused and wrongfully convicted, and donate if you can.

The Mandi Gray Rape Case – TFF Episode 43

AVfM Video Source · 11 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 43 Professor Fiamengo analyzes the Mandi Gray Rape Case in which a graduate student Mandi Gray invited Mustafa Ururyar for drinks followed by “hot sex” and later charged him with rape. Ururyar was convicted in a controversial case in which he claims Gray was angry because he wanted to terminate the relationship. It appears to be a he-said, she-said case in which Judge Marvin Zuker appeared to be biased against the defendant.

StudioBrule

Cassie Jaye interviewed by BBC feminist presenter

AVfM Video Source · 13 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to John for pointing us to this piece. He writes:

"It's worth noting Barnett's background; her Twitter feed is just a stream of feminist nonsense. Most telling is her comment after the interview, at 11:49, about the idea of increasing male life expectancy, something she finds both baffling and amusing. She's amazingly misandrous without even trying to be, or realizing she is."

More men die of prostate cancer than women die of breast cancer. There is no national screening program for prostate cancer, while there IS one for breast cancer, and it's been going for many years (likewise the national screening program for cervical cancer.)

A question for Ms. Barnett: If there was a national screening program for prostate cancer, do you think men's average life expectancy would increase? Might it be worth spending money on that, if only because men collectively pay almost three times as much income tax as women in the UK?

Mike Buchanan

If everyone who watched this video gave us just £1 – or even better, £1 monthly – we could change the world. Click here to make a difference. Thanks.

Cubs of the Caliphate Slaughtered

Mark Dent · 14 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Back in the sixties, there was a television series called The Invaders starring a character played by actor Roy Thinnes. As a little boy, I loved the show. The basic premise of the series was that earth had already been invaded and the aliens were living among us, plotting and preparing for their eventual takeover of our planet.

Roy Thinnes' character became aware of this invasion when he got lost driving through the unfamiliar countryside and came across an alien spacecraft deep in the woods. As the series progresses, David Vincent (the character played by Thinnes) is able to identify the aliens among us by looking at the little finger on their left hand. It is slightly deformed as a result of a mistake when they took human form.

Each week, David Vincent tried to convince skeptical government officials, law enforcement officers or anyone who would listen that the invasion was real and that the aliens walked among us. You can imagine the reaction such claims drew from those he warned.

I tell my Maggie (my gorgeous wife) that I often feel like David Vincent when I am attempting to explain my stance on men's rights to a friend or acquaintance.

They look at me with a wary, cynical expression on their face even as I present irrefutable facts about the issues confronting men. What to me seems to be simply stating the "bleeding obvious" appears to be entirely hidden or nonexistent in the eyes of many of my friends.

The notion of the disposable male is one of those invisible aliens which I see so clearly every day. Today my eyes fell upon a headline, Cubs of the Caliphate Slaughtered in the Hundreds.

I continued to read.

> More than three hundred Islamic State child soldiers-dubbed the "cubs of the caliphate"-have been slaughtered in Mosul after they were sent into battle by the terrorist group, a human rights group reports.

It goes on.

> In a desperate last act, reminiscent of the final days of the Nazis, they have deployed their brigade of child soldiers.

There is a photo of row upon row of young boys standing before an adult commander. The caption reads:

> The terrorist group has brainwashed, trained and armed hundreds of children to fight for it.

And more:

> According to the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, hundreds of them have been killed as Iraqi government forces close in, backed by US warplanes and drones.
>
> The UK-based watchdog said: This will raise the death toll to at least 400 Syrian fighters killed in the ranks of the Islamic State since the start of the battle in Mosul. Among them, more than 300 child soldiers from the "lion cubs of the Caliphate."

I have read hundreds of words on this horrific massacre and yet not once has the word "boys" appeared anywhere in the article. It is quite clearly a very deliberate choice, implemented on a regular basis by the media throughout the western world.

I read on, hoping for at least one reference to the gender of these dead boys:

> The slaughter of the child soldiers came as Iraqi, and Kurdish forces fought their way to the eastern outskirts of Mosul after a two-week offensive.
>
> As well as the killing of child soldiers, human rights groups accused government sanctioned tribal Sunni militia of carrying out revenge attacks against men and boys in areas recently recaptured from the militants.

So, eleven paragraphs into the story we finally discover that as well as the slaughter of the boy soldiers (whose gender is never identified throughout the article) other boys and men were butchered.

You can read the remaining horrific details if you wish by clicking the link at the end of my article.

I find this journalism unfathomable. I am trying to understand how anyone could write about a subject like this and at no stage identify the gender of the hundreds of slaughtered children. When a child drowns in their backyard pool, we are alerted to their gender as soon as the facts are available. Whenever these gender-based crimes are committed against men or boys their gender is either never referred to or can be found three-quarters of the way through the article. This would not be so disturbing and suspicious if the very same approach were taken when girls or women are the victims of a massacre or some act of oppression or brutality. As we all know, the gender of female victims is always the major focus of any such story.

We all recall the meltdown when 200 girls were kidnapped by the Islamic Terrorist Group Boko Haram. Can you imagine the media taking the same approach to the kidnapping of those girls as they did to the slaughter of more than 300 boys?

Here's a brief extract from a recent article:

> Humanitarian group Human Rights Watch released findings on Monday showing police officers and military service members at seven government camps in the Borno State capital of Maiduguri sexually abused 41 women and girls who had fled Boko Haram.
>
> It is bad enough that these women and girls are not getting much-needed support for the horrific trauma they suffered at the hands of Boko Haram," said Mausi Segun, senior Nigeria researcher at Human Rights Watch said in a statement. "It is disgraceful and outrageous that people who should protect these women and girls are attacking and abusing them.

Why not simply refer to children and people? Why the sudden urgent need to reveal the gender of those being harmed and abused?

This approach was used a few months ago in a story on our rising suicide rates.

The Project presented a story on our shocking suicide rates. It would appear to be almost impossible for a ten-minute segment on suicide in Australia not to use the word men or boys once in the entire presentation, but this is exactly what the compassionate, caring hosts of The Project managed to do.

Not only did they fail to refer to the male gender, they focused on an increase in the number of female suicides which included graphics and was followed up by an interview with a woman who had attempted suicide. Three out of four suicides result in the death of a male, yet this story focused entirely on females and the only graphics displayed related to females.

Can you imagine a ten-minute segment on domestic violence in Australia failing to mention women or girls or focusing exclusively on the male victims? Of course, you can't because it would never happen. If such shocking approach was used you can be assured heads would roll and there would be a tsunami of outraged voices asking how this could happen when women make up the majority of those killed in DV incidents.

The Project segment resulted in zero protests (other than my comment on their Facebook page.) This is when the character of David Vincent comes to mind. I feel as if I am baying at the moon when I express my disgust at this bigotry which is almost a daily occurrence in our media. Sometimes I am so overwhelmed by the number of newspaper articles containing outright misandry or distorted figures used to perpetuate the myth of female oppression I simply omit a deep sigh and turn the page.

Another online article from the ABC on suicide begins by stating the fact that of the 3027 people who killed themselves in 2015, 2 292 were men and 735 were women. A promising beginning, isn't it? Sadly, it is all downhill from there.

The figures show that deaths from self-harm are three times more common for males than females, however, the number of women who end their lives is going up.

The chief executive of Suicide Prevention Australia, Sue Murray, told ABC News this trend was concerning:

> We have seen a 26 percent increase in the suicide rates among women and the numbers of suicides among women (rise) over the last five year period.

Ms Murray:

> We don't know why this is occurring, so we really need to see the government come on board with investment in research, so we can really understand what it is that is bringing about this increase and the way in which [women] are choosing to take their own lives. The ABS statistics also reveal that the number of teenage girls who die by suicide has risen.
>
> In 2015, 56 girls between the ages of 15 and 19 ended their lives, up from 38 in 2014. The numbers are not large but certainly the fact that it is a 45 per cent increase in a one-year period certainly needs good investigation. I think we need to be looking very carefully at the type of suicide prevention programs we're delivering.

Apparently, Ms. Murray is not disturbed by the fact that three out of four suicides are committed by men. She makes no reference to this statistic and expresses no concern about why there is such a huge gender gap and what may be its cause.

But when she identifies the fact that there has been a slight increase in female teenagers' suicide she demands more investment in research and an analysis of the way in which women are choosing to take their lives. She even questions the suicide prevention program they are delivering.

Of course , two women feature in the articles on suicide which follow.

I find this incomprehensible and often feel as if I am walking through an alien landscape. How can this type of horrendous bigotry go unchallenged? Is there no-one with power and influence who gives a damn about boys and men?

The excellent documentary, The Red Pill has a particularly harrowing segment on the media coverage of the Boko Haram Islamic Terrorist Group. It presents heartbreaking footage of massacred men and boys while the newsreader refers to "villagers" and "people". This isn't a rare slip or mistake. The documentary gives numerous examples of this deliberate camouflaging of the truth when it comes to the oppression or killing of males. There is simply no way a story on the massacre of 200 girls would be presented in gender neutral language. Well it didn't happen when girls were kidnapped so you can be assured a massacre of females would have gender as the major focus of the story.

I am yet to hear any journalist confronted with this damning evidence and being asked to justify this sickening approach to news reporting.

So, like David Vincent, I will continue to alert my fellow humans to the presence of this hateful, damaging agenda being played out before our very eyes each day. Sadly, like David, I feel my quest to open their eyes to reality is doomed to fail. Only a very small number of us will ever truly see the deformed little finger on the aliens among us.

*****

The Invaders Trailer:
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uOLGrXOtuwQ&feature=youtu.be&ab_channel=jimmyredproductions http://www.news.com.au/world/cubs-of-the-caliphate-slaughtered-in-their-hundreds-in-the-battle-for-mosul-says-watchdog/news-story/f551c8fa6209bebb18d162e4384cc4d8

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3803123/Jihadi-video-shows-Cubs-Caliphate-brainwashed-fighting-ISIS.html

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2016-09-28/australian-suicide-deaths-more-than-3000-rising-women-teens-abs/7885970

The Red Pill – Take Two and Call Me In The Morning

Lucy Brown · 15 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Lucy Brown, used with her permission. Erin Pizzey p>

This November I was lucky enough to attend the screening of The Red Pill at the swanky Soho Hotel in London, England. The film is a documentary focusing on the world of Men's Rights Activists directed by Cassie Jaye – a young feminist who had initially set out to make a film about Rape Culture. Cassie's personal journey and creative integrity instead led her to produce an entirely different movie than she had originally intended, but the results were fortuitous, and the final product is a cultural game-changer, in my opinion.

The film gained some notoriety across the web when a screening in Australia was pulled from the cinema, thanks to a petition created by feminist Susan Smith. Smith was concerned that it could be 'potentially damaging to our credibility' before labeling it as 'misogynistic propaganda' – that's before having watched it herself, by the way. The petition gained over 2,300 signatures and resulted in the Kino Cinema in Melbourne canceling the screening.

This event is how the film first came to my attention. A YouTuber I watch regularly named 'Computing Forever' posted a video concerning the petition, and I was outraged to think that it had been removed not because of what it was, but because of what people thought it might be. I signed and shared the counter-petition before checking out the official website, learning that a London Screening was imminent (I later found it took eight attempts to find a venue to agree to host it). I got in touch with one of the organizers and managed to get myself a ticket to the event. I was ecstatic.

When posting about this on my Facebook page, I was challenged by a couple of my friends, who were worried that I was unwittingly claiming my support for misogynistic rape apologists. They seemed to feel that it was their job to enlighten me on my blunder, which I found both considerate and patronizing at the same time. I kept this in mind as I found my seat at the screening, and was curious to overhear members of the audience discussing the friends they were also losing over differences of opinions. I also kept a close ear on a Daily Mail reporter, who I noticed was conducting an interview with a man behind me. I heard her ask him in an accusatory tone, 'so you think feminism is to blame for men's problems?'. My blood ran cold.

While I had originally intended to write a review of the film, I would rather just tell you that the proof is in the pudding with this one. It's such a poignant and self-explanatory piece that I don't think I could do it justice. Instead, I wanted to share my personal experience of moving towards, and then away from the feminism label this year.

I also feel it's important to mention first and foremost that when I say 'feminist,' I mean third-wave western feminism. I know that all over the world girls are being subjected to female genital mutilation, married off as child brides, stoned to death for the crime of being raped and living with inadequate access to education and contraception, among countless other problems. But where I agree that there is still a lot to be done, I feel that a lot of our efforts are being wasted over here doing things like marching through the streets with no pants on, trying to combat causes such as the wage gap and rape culture. Which to my mind are intellectually disingenuous, the claims of which warrant more research and a broader perspective for me to be annoyed about just yet (i.e., my pants are staying on).

Something which increasingly frightens me is the way that some women are using feminism to excuse their own sexist, racist and hate-fuelled behavior. I believe that it's part of my duty as a member of the 'sisterhood' to make a stand against it – because those people do not talk for all women, and they certainly don't represent me.

The funny thing is, to the untrained eye, I'm every bit as feminist as the girls you see portrayed in the film. I have green hair, hand drawn tattoos, a degree in Photography and I've been told that I 'look vegan.' I was raised in an environment in which being a liberal was a natural choice. To me, it seemed ludicrous that nobody else had come to the same conclusions as I had about the way the world should operate. But as Winston Churchill put it, if you're not liberal at 20 you have no heart – but if you're not conservative by 40, then you have no brain. This year, in particular, I finally took to the streets with my outrage over the police shootings in America, and have been actively trying to involve myself in political groups ever since. This quest has led me through some interesting experiences. One of the most relevant of which is when I joined a feminist activist group.

I was privy to meetings that were being held with a group of women from all walks of life. Some working in prisons, some domestic abuse survivors, some who just wanted to help in any way they could. While I can't fault the efforts of the individual members, I found a couple of things didn't sit quite right with me on the whole, but I wasn't sure why. To start with, I didn't know why we had to state our pronouns after our names. I was new to all of this, so the concept of pronouns was alien to me. But I obliged. We also had to say how we were feeling too. "Hi, I'm Lucy, She/Her, Feeling Happy," that sort of thing. It was sort of cute at first, along with flapping our hands in the air instead of clapping, which I thought was some sort of quirky group handshake. I later learned that it was because clapping was 'triggering' to some members.

There was also a seemingly endless discussion of everyone's feelings, as well as new speech rules being regularly applied, to protect the ethnic minority 'sisters'. I felt like a lot of time was spent on these topics, time which I considered as being wasted when we should have been focussing on more practical matters. This code of conduct also led to an overall tense atmosphere at times. One meeting comes to mind, where a 'person of color' (I'm still on the fence about that phrase) wanted to talk about the problems that she faced in the feminist community because of her race. Nobody dared speak, lest we are deemed to talk over her, but we eventually managed a very stilted conversation in which everyone present agreed that they didn't want to be insensitive by giving any sort of opinion.

The final thing that tipped me over was when a really, really lovely girl I knew was shamed for the crime of uploading a link to an article about the group which had been featured in a well-known news publication, accompanied by image of shock horror three white girls standing in a row at a protest. I watched a couple of other ethnic minority 'sisters' jump in and condemn her for not noticing how racist this was, stating it was 'typical' that she didn't understand, what with her being white. No matter how much she apologized and tried to explain herself and promise to be more respectful in the future, she was not excused. That was my Deborah Meaden 'I'm out' moment.

I broke rank and put myself through an arduous process of 'unlearning.' I stopped reading fashion magazines and articles, stopped following the celebrity scandals, and stopped watching TV. It took a while, but slowly I found that the answers I was seeking came from alternative media sources who were able to explain why some things are a nice idea, but structurally unstable when put into practice.

The primary example is this ridiculous notion that men are almost always the perpetrators of violence while women are innocent victims. Under this ideology I've seen countless girls calling for a full on male genocide – some even going so far as to suggest rounding them up and putting them in camps. Watching this behavior go unchallenged and, more shockingly, encouraged by the media – I felt a deep anger rising. Only this anger is not shared by my friends and colleagues. It's not a popular anger. The sad fact is that Men's Rights Activists don't have punchy Dazed and Confused articles and fun slogan t-shirts worn by Cara Delevingne to promote their cause, it's not 'on trend' – so when you do attempt to open up a dialogue, expect confrontation. I'm now in a position where I don't feel comfortable sharing my opinions at work, among friends, or in my home, to keep the peace. Indeed, there are times when I wonder to myself 'why oh why didn't I take the blue pill?'

That being said, while some things seem slightly harder, my overall journey is becoming more intellectually enlightening by the day. I am connecting with content creators who inspire me. I am lucky enough to be able to hear different points of view thanks to the alternative media (which is currently in a battle against disturbing censorship laws). And am also able to learn about History, Socio-Economics, Language, Religion, Philosophy, all in real time and thanks to people who care enough about humanity and the planet to share their findings online and give people like me the opportunity to see other perspectives than what we are spoonfed through Facebook and the like.

As the film started, I must say it felt surreal seeing what I now consider to be my 'world' projected onto a cinema screen. Up until then my learning experience involved sitting alone in a dimly lit room, tapping away at a keyboard into the wee hours. This felt like a collaborative effort, an end-of-year presentation if you will. Especially knowing how much effort Milo Yiannopoulos (who I used to despise) had put into helping to raise funds even to be able to get it finished and out the door. As I watched Alice tumbling down the rabbit hole during the opening credits, I felt overcome with a sense of hope.

Cassie Jaye comes across as an intelligent and inquisitive young women, a real role model. She explains how she came to produce the film, starting from her career as an actress, showing us how often she was typecast as 'female victim' or 'kidnapped girl' in horror B-movies. She starts by questioning the status quo of being a woman, particularly in the acting world, and decides to leave it behind, pick up a camera and become a documentary filmmaker instead. She studied feminist, and LGBT issues before the phrase 'Rape Culture' piqued her curiosity. Cassie starts her adventure by simply typing the phrase 'Rape Culture' into Google and finding the website 'A Voice For Men' on the front page. Thinking she had hit the jackpot, she got in touch with them – and before long was given access to interviews with some of their longstanding members. During the time spent with these activists, she comes to realize that they are nothing like what she thought they would be – and in fact, they make a lot of sense.

To put it mildly, the film did justice to my expectations, and then some. The points raised about the lack of empathy for men's rights are unwittingly and sometimes comically confirmed by the response of feminists and gender studies teachers alike, who scoff at the thought. I was also morbidly fascinated to see the infamous 'Big Red' being interviewed, who gave the charming response of 'cry me a river!' when asked what she thought of men's rights.

While the audience and myself chuckled at moments like this, I heard the wonderful Susan Morris behind me whisper to herself 'why is this funny'? Well, Susan, I think it's funny on the surface level because she's an offensive cartoon character with bright red hair and an 'I want to talk to your manager' snarl. It's not funny because she probably has thousands of followers, and for every 'Big Red' out there, there's a guy on a school campus treated like a rapist, or losing his job for the crime of 'wrong think.' I know some old friends of mine who tentatively message me on Facebook, telling me that they don't dare share their opinion online anymore for fear of being doxxed, but that they're secretly grateful for me doing so.

In fact during the Q&A afterward, one of the members of the audience stated that trying to get feminists to help Men's Rights Activists was like the Jews seeking to ask the Nazis for help. Someone quickly pointed out that comments like that will not help us bring people together (as demonstrated by two smug girls in the audience giggling to themselves) but I do understand his metaphor, and I can't help but agree with his point to some extent. But now, thank God, at least we have this film to try and present the argument in a way that's easier to digest for those who are still on the fence themselves.

We watch Cassie struggle through her intellectual transition in her personal video journals, where she explains how hesitant she is to believe what she is being told. Sometimes she wonders if she is being lied to. Sometimes she hangs her head in her hands, seemingly at war with her perception of reality. It's compelling to watch, having been through it just a few months ago myself. I found myself rooting for her, as well as admiring the effort she had put in to challenging the world around her, to always seek the truth and speak the truth. She displayed all of what I believe to be the best traits a woman can have – strength, grace and, among all else, compassion for others. THAT is what feminism should be about. THAT is the future I want to see.

And to end on a positive note, the YouTuber I mentioned earlier – Computing Forever – said in one of his videos 'taking the Red Pill is pretty much a one-way street.' Once you see the world through these eyes, there's no going back.

How discrimination against short men is perpetuated by women

Adam Glasier · 15 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

I've had so many conversations with girls that go something like this:

"Get real! Guys have it SO-O-O easy. They don't have to spend two hours in front of the mirror putting on makeup, just to be considered sexually attractive. Why do you have to judge us based on the way a girl looks? Why do you want us only for SEX? I'm more than just my body!"

So it would seem that women once again find a new way to set themselves as the victim class, thus earn the precious pity that purchases for them their power. Feminism seeks to absolve women of the act of sexual objectification and retain women as the pure, righteous judges of a man's character rather than base animal lust. It is the popular notion that, while a man will fall for the woman with the best body, women will fall for the man who treats them the best — a nice guy, her best friend, someone who drapes his coat over every puddle so she can walk without getting her feet wet.

HA.

Oh. That's a good one.

Women are just as capable — perhaps even more so — of objectifying men.

It is true that women of girth are hampered from romantic pursuits. However, there are fat fetishes and a fat-acceptance movement that is building up steam, and these are reversing that trend. There are even online communities such as Fantasy Feeder, where people get their sexual kicks out of either gorging someone else or being fattened up themselves. It's a sight you cannot unsee.

But there is a pervasive form of discrimination faced predominantly by men. It is called heightism — the hatred of short men.

In fact, there is a Twitter account exclusively devoted to exposing the scathing, homicidal contempt women hold against short men:

Notice how many of these hateful posts are made … by women?

I'll get to that in a second …

An obese woman can (often) work off her weight while a disfigured woman can pepper some makeup on her face. But a man has no ability to change his height. And, so far as I have researched, there is no fetish for short men to save them. Meanwhile, women can find themselves sexually attractive no matter their height — there are men who love petite women, and men who love long-legged statuesque Russian wonders. But a short man — unless he has compensated for his lack of height by obtaining a great job, a lot of money, an expensive car, a charismatic personality, or simply greater musculature — has virtually no hope of finding a lover.

Clocking in at 5′ 10", I think barely escape the "short man" threshold, though I still face much more lonely existence than my 6-foot tall brothers, whose lives are saturated and enriched by plenty of sexual encounters.

But then there's my friend — he's 5'7" and 22 years old. For the sake of his future public image, he will remain the Anonymous Short Man.

The Anonymous Short Man has never had a girlfriend, only ever kissed his mother, and he's had more than his fair share of debilitating rejection than I. He is entreated with the same old, trite advice from women: "Be her friend!" or "Just wait and the right one will find you! Trust and believe!"

People ask this Anonymous Short Man if he is old enough to smoke. People talk down to him, condescend him at job interviews. Twelve-year-olds flirt with him, while the gazes of older women just pass over him. Literally.

When a grown man is treated like a boy, it is humiliating. When a grown woman is treated like a girl, it is romantic.

Short men are obviously discriminated. Contrary to what every Feminist will claim — that a system of "hegemonic masculinity" means men are the causes of their own problems — it is women, not other men, who are setting upon us the height standard.

Women wish to be dwarfed. It hearkens back to our biological ancestry. Women want to be protected by men. They might view a small man — not a tall man — as a threat to their femininity since his subordinate status competes like a quasi-femininity. This peer-reviewed study from the UK among 12,000 couples reveals that, for 92.5 percent of couples, the man was 5.6 inches taller than the woman. One might question this, since men are after all typically taller than women, and perhaps women are pressured by a patriarchal culture to select taller men. But a joint study out of Rice University and the University of Texas concluded that of all the relevant factors, 49 percent of women only wanted to date men taller than themselves, whereas only 13.5 percent of men only wanted to date women shorter than they were. Women have much stronger height preferences than men.

Despite Feminists claiming that women want to be equal with their partners, these studies prove consistently that women don't want equality — they want to be paired with their betters, including according to height, even if that looks very similar to patriarchy.

Here comes the Feminist lynch mob…

In evolutionary terms, of course it makes sense that females prefer tall men. Height indicates strength, authority, and virility more often than not. Tallness means the male has more access to limited resources. This means that, when the biological cards of the mating game are dealt, the Anonymous Short Man is getting the short end of the stick.

It's not that women are unreasonable or even cruel for preferring taller men. We are all entitled to our choices, no matter how shallow or stupid our criteria may seem. We deserve to hold standards — but, likewise, we will also be held to others' standards. It's when young men are kept in the dark, perhaps even deceived about a woman's standards, that his lot in life can be declared one of cultural oppression.

Why do (many) women lie about, or lack the ability to express their preferences? Perhaps they are trying to preserve the image of virtue society sets upon women — an image that is ironically more chauvinistic than Feminist. Like men, who are shamed by women and the media as predators for expressing sexual interest, women are "slut-shamed" by other women for taking advantage of their sexual powers too often. Dealing with the pressure that women set upon each other, women will naturally tell men "slanted" advice to save face on their reputation.

This hidden double standard women hold against men is a legitimate problem for society. The issue goes beyond height. The media, academia, and popular culture tells one message to young men. That they will be loved by women if they follow one set of criteria: If they are nice, if they become a woman's friend, if they just "wait for the right one," and if they persistently defend the rights of women by becoming a white-knight Feminist. Tactics that never work, of course.

Young men then apply these tactics in their real life relationships with women, but they remain single — they are relegated to the Friend Zone, ignored, or even mocked by the very women they love. It is men of height, facial hair, and the "bad boy" personality that are winning women away. They are tired of seeing the very men that Feminism decries as "toxically masculine," are the only ones who are permitted to have sex.

Now we are seeing a rising generation of angry short men who are devolving into outspoken "misogynists." But Feminism is not solving this problem. Feminism creates it.

The suffering and loneliness many millions of short males is either ignored or worse, mocked and degraded as a lowly form of misogyny by the very people — Feminists — who claim to stand for their sexual rights and equality. It proves that they do not care about the issues of men, they do not care about equality, only the appearance of equality.

Challenging this problem doesn't require a glorious revolution. Women, and the Feminists who supposedly speak on their behalf, simply need to take a deeper look at themselves. Do not spread one message out to men in the light, and leave them to find the truth in the darkness.

Superficial qualities such as height aren't everything for men — but it means much more to women and society than they ever dare admit.

This article is originally published at The Odyssey Online and republished here with authors permission.

The War Against Men | Tom Golden and Stefan Molyneux

Gary Costanza · 16 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

From Stefan Molyneux:

“While being derided by claims of male privilege and patriarchy, the already negative treatment of men in society keeps getting worse. Tom Golden joins Stefan Molyneux to discuss the state of masculinity in the United States and the most important issues men face today.

Tom Golden, LCSW is a speaker, psychotherapist and the author of “Helping Mothers be Closer to Their Sons: Understanding the Unique World of Boys,” “The Way Men Heal” and “Swallowed by a Snake: The Gift of the Masculine Side of Healing.”

J4MB confront Dr. Joseph Spitzer of Stamford Hill, London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 17 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Joseph Spitzer has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) recently visited the doctor at his “practice,” who became violent and then speechless when informed that his “practice” of mutilating baby boys was illegal and that Buchanan intends to protest his “practice” in the near future.

Here’s how it went down:

Click here to read Mike’s reporting of the incident and his opinion of Dr. Spitzer.

From the doctor’s website, Cranwich Road Surgery, we see lots of information about the need to immunize children against disease, as well as other treatments and conditions that modern medicine has proven effective against.

But nowhere is there mention of any disease or condition related to ‘infant with foreskin.’

That’s because there is no medical reason to amputate the foreskin, and if you read the NHS literature the doctor has listed, you’ll see that the foreskin is not something diseased or in need of treatment, and therefore isn’t covered by NHS.

But appallingly, as Mike points out, Dr. Spitzer admits he mutilates baby boys only for the sake of the parent’s religious beliefs.

Although he attempts to tack on unfounded and unconvincing medical reasons for circumcision, he details the religious reasons in this paper he wrote for The Initiation Society.

He is wrong even here, as there is a Jewish ritual called Brit Shalom that has the same significance without the blood, mutilation and deadly risk. To say nothing about how no religion or tradition should ever trump the law or anyone’s basic human rights.

After watching the video above and reading this article, where he relishes the idea of genitally mutilating the royal baby, he does sound like an out of control madman. Mentioned is that Princess Diana supposedly discontinued the tradition — to the rumoured anger of Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip.

Doctor Spitzer, are you worried about the planned protests? How about this… STOP CIRCUMCISING, so when confronted, you could clear your conscience, do the right thing, and say “I’ve given it up;” many have!

You say your religion – God – requires it – don’t you think your God’s creations are perfect – not faulty? Brit Shalom is a humane, ethical, and LEGAL alternative to what you do – why not change?

Appealing to these circumcisers may be useless, but not to the gatekeepers of these baby’s lives – you, the mothers and fathers. Only you can prevent this mutilation!

You don’t drink alcohol, you eat right, you take prenatal vitamins, you don’t take harmful drugs or painkillers…but soon after your baby is born you cut, crush, and amputate with excruciating pain and trauma part of your baby's genitals for no medical reason and with no knowledge of its risk and long-term physical and emotional effects ?

If you're not chilled to the bone yet, here's a piece I found that is so macabre that I almost doubt it's for real. Here are some quotes from "My Son at the Cutting Edge:"

> The best-selling guide to childcare, Your Baby and Child by Penelope Leach, claims that some babies go into shock during circumcision, and that the procedure leaves some men with a life-long sense of being deformed. She says: "There is no possible good to balance out the probable harm."
>
> I decided to disregard this advice and go ahead with a circumcision – not just because I'm an unfeeling brute, but because we're Jewish and that's what Jews do. And also because – to be honest – I think uncircumcised penises look funny, and I don't really want my son to look different from me.
>
> ---
>
> The older rabbi was called Rabbi Ashkenasy – it seemed an impertinence to ask his first name. My wife asked whether the baby would suffer any pain. The rabbi dismissed this suggestion contemptuously. He seemed to imply that there was nothing a Jewish boy liked better than to have the end of his penis hacked with a blade.
>
> He said the only problem was that the mothers often became agitated, and this could communicate itself to the child. "I tell you this," he said, "When I hand him back, he will be completely happy and peaceful."
>
> ---
>
> The rabbi asked me what name I'd chosen for the baby. I told him we were calling him Nathan, which in Hebrew means "given". And then the rabbi called for hush and started chanting. As the rabbi recited the prayers, he grasped a clip from among the tools on the card-table and put it over the baby's foreskin, pulled it forward and, with a yank of his knife, the foreskin came off in one clean movement. The baby cried, blood flowed on to his penis and – as the rabbi had predicted – Graham did not faint. The rabbi then bent over the baby and sucked the wound.
>
> I know this sounds awful, but it is part of the Jewish tradition. It's supposed to help the healing. He then gave the baby a few drops of kosher wine as a primitive anaesthetic.
>
> The rabbi had lied to us. The baby was not at all happy and peaceful after the operation. He was in a horrible mood and whined intermittently for the next day or so. It was tricky changing his nappy – we used two nappies at a time to ensure that the wound wasn't disturbed. After a week, we were allowed to bathe the baby and the dressing floated off. His penis looked rather as one might have expected: a bloody mess. Over the next few days, the bruising went down and the penis began to look like a purple acorn.
>
> Do I have any regrets? None at all. Nathan is a happy, lively boy. And his penis? It's delightful – just like his dad's.

Since the doctor's website has NO INFORMATION AT ALL about circumcision and it's risks, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Doctor Spitzer's practice information follows:

tel: 020 8802 2002
Cranwich Road Surgery
62 Cranwich Road
London N16 5JF

> J4MB confront Dr. Joseph Spitzer of Stamford Hill, London, "Known Genital Mutilator" > https://t.co/NGTvHTJzJg #mgm… https://t.co/llR1tkECJc

> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) December 17, 2016

Crazy academic feminist thinks carbon fibers are misogynistic

Rachael Lefler · 18 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Because when you've talked about everything from movies and video games to glaciers and fluid dynamics, what left is there that hasn't been declared sexist? Academic feminism is the rotten, deluded root from which all the "leaves," your average young feminist college girls, get their ideas. The sad thing about it is how influential it is. University professors are rarely censored or fired for teaching ideas that are so crazy and unfounded in logic and common sense. This is the kind of thing our tax dollars are funding, apparently:

CARBON FIBRE MASCULINITY

The TL;DR version: Carbon fiber technology is anti-woman. I know. I couldn't even get through the abstract to this article without laughing the hardest I've laughed so far this year (and it's late September). I mean, it's astonishing to me how just absurd their ideas are. But amid the laughter I got from reading this stupid article, I also noticed a lot of misandry and anti-male biases in the language the author uses that I think is worth pointing out. I mean, while in an art history course on museum studies, I had to read something called "Teddy Bear Patriarchy" that claimed that museums and collections of objects, in general, were rooted in some kind of masculine psychological dominance drive, I shouldn't be too surprised by all this. Feminist academics not only hate men, and blame all problems great and small on masculinity, but they're quick to boldly write "sexist" (by which they mean misogynist, because women cannot be sexist against men, as we all know!) over literally everything with their proud menstrual-blood-red Sharpies.

So what is this dark patriarchal sorcery known as carbon fiber technology? Well the no-doubt misogynistic website Dragon Plate says:

> Carbon fiber is composed of carbon atoms bonded together to form a long chain. The fibers are extremely stiff, strong, and light, and are used in many processes to create excellent building materials. Carbon fiber material comes in a variety of "raw" building-blocks, including yarns, uni-directional, weaves, braids, and several others, which are in turn used to create composite parts.

That's all it is. There are many applications and uses for carbon fiber materials. They are often combined with other materials for numerous different purposes. Some of them are listed here. Recently, efforts are being made to make these fibers using renewable energy sources. Carbon fiber technology is probably going to be an important component of the future of materials science. But not if feminists have any say, apparently!

Back to that HILARIOUS article.

Her first point is that because carbon fibers are used in prosthetic devices to help people overcome disabilities, this is somehow a bad thing. Because as we all know, "disability is culturally coded as "feminine," and remarkably, she actually has a citation for this. Attesting to the fact that Anna is not a lone wolf but in fact part of a sizeable pack of insane, terrible, dogmatic feminist academics who think everything and anything constitutes the oppression of women at the hands of men. She seems particularly irate over the fact that carbon fiber prosthetic legs helped a man, Oscar Pistorius, known by the sci-fi nickname "Blade Runner," to compete in the Olympics (and indeed worked too well, to the point where he was considered to have an unfair advantage because of them). How FUCKING dare men use innovative technology to help people overcome disabilities? Also, do gynoids dream of electric whales?

She uses the term "hegemonic masculinity" more often than Oprah's used pictures of herself as magazine covers. I think basically that she is using the term "hegemonic" to describe what feminists usually dub "patriarchal." Here's how she defines the term:

> Hegemonic masculinity is a type of body and personhood, a quality of men's power relations with others: a way of effecting subordination. Hegemonic men subordinate others through their capacity to perform intellectually and physically, a capacity to perform that carbon fibre has become famous for enhancing.

Yeah, so, basically, she's jealous of both men and carbon fibers, because, like men, carbon fibers are valued for physical performance at certain tasks. They accomplish things. They are strong. I think she must be projecting her own insecurity here. She calls objects that have no gender "masculine" and ascribes all these patriarchal traits to inanimate things. The only basis she seems to have for the concept that carbon fibers are "masculine" is that they are good at what they do, they perform well. They help people achieve more than could be achieved with other materials in certain situations. They help disabled people become less physically challenged by their disabilities. In short, they're wonderful. And she can't stand it. Feminism, stemming from Marxism, has a clear prejudicial hatred of innovation, technology, and capitalism. So anything good coming from a system of economic freedom given to men to innovate must have some underlying evil behind it. Nothing made by the patriarchy can be considered good, well, maybe except for the computer she wrote and "researched" this article with. And you know, basically, everything else she probably owns and uses on a daily basis. Because I looked her up, and I don't see her wearing too many grass skirts and animal bone accessories. Hm. That capitalism thing is working out pretty good for her it seems.

Impossibly, she then goes on to talk about how the great carbon fiber conspiracy also oppresses homosexuals. I'm not making this up! A term she often uses to make this point is "homosociality." This is basically "male bonding" which translates in the bizarre, alien feminist language as "rape/female dominance plotting." She defines homosociality as "… a form of intimacy between men that disavows the possibility of homosexual desire through feminized conduits such as shared sexual partners, cars, bikes, or other carbon fibre objects." So wow. Not only are bikes and cars "carbon fibre objects" now, but apparently, men are lining up to share sexual partners? I thought men usually hated that kind of threesome. She goes on to say that "… carbon fibre surfaces mediate homosocial intimacy in ways framed by heterosexual hierarchies." This part reveals the fevered feminist paranoia surrounding male intimacy and male friendship. In their mind, men who bond with other men are psychologically twisted, homosexuals repressing their homoerotic desires. Does she even realize how homophobic it sounds that she's essentially saying, after the feminist revolution, men will be free to do the nasty with each other, as long as they don't do anything suspicious, like speak or make eye contact? Although they pretend to have always been buddy-buddy, the truth is that feminists have a history of prejudice and exclusion for gay and transgender individuals, particularly men. Their suspicion and hostility towards men as a group means that they can't truly accept males, even if they're homosexual or transgender. History repeats itself on this issue over and over again.

She goes on to talk about how women are in an "erotic rivalry" with cars, bikes, and prostheses, and it makes zero sense. This reveals that feminists hate anything men tend to be interested in, for no other reason than that it turns the male focus away from women, robbing women of the sexual power they want to have over men. We see this with feminist attacks on video games, pornography, anime, basically any form of entertainment that tends to please men or cater to male desires. They're afraid that the one thing women have that they can manipulate men using, male sexual desire, is being replaced by technology. And it is. They can't handle the reality of it. What we have here is a traditionally privileged class, so used to getting special treatment because of their attractiveness, that now that this special status is threatened, many of them are livid. Bottom line; if men do something that takes their attention away from women, it is sexist. It must be done as a malicious attack against all women.

What makes homosociality, she says is competition. That male competitiveness that sent people to the moon is apparently not good at all. She goes on to discuss an absolutely innocuous image, a basic ad for a bicycle helmet. But oh no, it's not innocuous at all; the bike represents a penis. No no, it gets better. See, the bike is situated between the man's legs, which you make know is also the traditional resting place of the dreaded phallusaurus, Biggus Dickus. She argues that the bike represents a phallus and an object by which a man can "dominate other men", i.e., in the pictured bicycle race, and that this concept is being used to sell the product, the bike helmet. I had to stop and facepalm pretty hard there for a second.

Anyway, this is feminist cherry-picking at its best. Similar ads selling female bicycle helmets probably show women in the same pose, in the same moment of triumph, i.e., winning a bike race. All athletic equipment is in fact sold primarily with the idea that using that brand of equipment will make you a winner. That's why top athletes are paid big bucks to sell sporting goods. Most normal, not brain-damaged adults understand this. What she's using here is a Freudian way of looking at images. This is a shockingly common tool feminists use, even though Freudian psychology has long since been discredited. They like to look at images in a Freudian way, to interpret everything with a sexual lens, even images having nothing whatsoever to do with sex, and then use these Freudian interpretations to back up their misandry and male conspiracy theories.

Both men and women like winning. Winning feels good. Winning is good. But if you're a feminist, the desire to win, to be best at something, to improve, is seen as a male desire. This kind of thinking is crippling to women. First, she associates femaleness with disability and then claims that desire for actual achievement is masculine. Think about what this kind of thinking could do to girls! It's telling them that patriarchy or "homogenous masculinity" makes them weak and that their femininity holds them back from achieving anything of value in a man's world. This is bound to become a self-fulfilling prophecy. Not to mention the untold harm this kind of thinking could do to boys. Basically what I'm saying is, people like this should NOT be teaching college!

And this is exactly what Sargon of Akkad of YouTube anti-SJW fame meant by creating this petition. Freedom of speech does not mean you are entitled to be paid, at taxpayer expense, to teach young adults your anti-logical bullcrap.

I mean, unless you want a student's assigned reading to have to contain sentences like, "Carbon fibre is a masculinized surface that is sexualized in the sense it redistributes libidinal intensities across competitive scapes of frontier masculinity."

I'll be back, just as soon as I'm done banging my head against some kind of nice, hard, masculine surface.

The ten immutable laws of men and women

AVfM Video Source · 19 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Disabling moral crypsis by collapsing feminism's fuzzy borders

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 21 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

We say that feminism has fuzzy borders. By this, we mean that it is unclear where feminism ends and the rest of the world begins. Feminism makes its presence known in a confused and varied way and appears unbounded by consistent rules or reasonings. This makes it hard to inscribe a boundary around either the theory of feminism or the practice of it.

The influence of feminist ideology spreads like a corona, well beyond the community of certifiable feminists, and feminism itself becomes so thickly camouflaged that meaningful conversation about it becomes nearly impossible. A generally muddled use of terminology further complicates the picture. It is small wonder that people entertain confused and varied ideas upon this topic.

That is why the essential difficulty takes the form of a question: What is (or isn't) "feminism"?

Not everybody agrees on the answer. Feminists do not always agree with other feminists, and non-feminists do not always agree with other non-feminists. I could add that feminists and non-feminists do not always agree, but that is to be expected.

If feminists themselves cannot agree on what feminism is, then no self-declared feminist holds any mandate to tell the rest of the world what feminism is. That is a critically important realization. Their writ does not bind us, and we've as good a license as they do to take a shot at this question. Granted that they are free to tell us what they wish us to accept, we are not bound to go along.

Many feminists will insist that all feminists do agree on the dictionary definition of feminism, which features the popular buzzword "equality." But their claim is problematic because the agreement in question is rhetorical rather than substantive; because overall feminist behavior hints powerfully at motives other than making things "equal" between the sexes. Furthermore, I have never heard any feminist speak to the question of "equality" between the feminist sector and the non- feminist sector.

More to the point, their claim is problematic because the dictionary definition is intellectually vacuous. It needs a wealth of explanation to render it meaningful or useful, but in the course of this, its meaninglessness and uselessness soon become evident.

At the same time, different feminists interpret the dictionary definition in a variety of ways, which spawns different feminisms in both theory and practice. Therefore we stand by our statement that feminists do not always agree on what feminism is.

However, even if they did agree, we would still not be bound to limit our study of feminism to the pathways of feminist-guided understanding. Our prerogative as free non-feminist men and women is to study feminism by any lateral epistemology or hermeneutic of suspicion we please, and to frame our conclusions accordingly. Feminism, as we say, is an object of the world's gaze.

That is true on its own account, under the liberty of the non-feminist sector. Our path of knowledge is not the path of feminist subjectivism, for the right to reject feminism is meaningless without the right to think independently of it.

When a feminist says that feminism is XYZ, it does not necessarily follow that feminism is XYZ. We must first examine the evidence. Since the feminists have a number of feminisms on offer, we must array these under a strong light and look for the operative principle that would bind them together as a SET. This would form the nucleus for a working definition that non-feminist truth-seekers could generally roll with.

Counter-feminist operations will be politically inefficient if we lack such understanding. We mustn't talk past each other. We must concur upon the answer to "what is feminism" because we must concur upon a target of operations.

We have a name for this: target consensus.

The pop phrase “no right or wrong answers” does not belong here. There is a right answer to the question “what is feminism?”, and it runs as follows:

“Feminism is the project to increase the power of women with no clear endpoint uniformly stipulated.”[1]

Increasing the power of women is the operative principle that binds together all feminisms as a set. The rest is details. Our deceptively simple saying is the focal point for ALL target consensus, and the essential truth about feminism is rolled up inside of it. It accounts for the range of feminist operations, including the apparent contradiction that feminism does not empower anti-feminist women against feminism.

Any account of feminism which does not flow from this axiomatic sentence, or walk in step with it, is simply wrong. The sentence should be central to your thinking. You should memorize it, and spread it through speech and writing any way you can.

Think of target consensus as a convergence of understanding. In the course of building such consensus, we sweep the fuzz away. We blow the radar chaff out of the sky. We clarify how feminist mystification operates in the service of feminist power, and we transmit this politically efficient realization to more and more people. Finally, we arrive on the same page, and we understand why we have got to be on that particular page and not some other page.

Owing to the fuzzy border effect, the approach to feminism is uneven and rife with ambiguity. It is hard to pinpoint exactly where (in theory or practice) feminism begins, so it is hard to know where to begin attacking it. Attacks, when they occur, will fall wide of the mark and do limited damage. This partly explains why feminism appears to be “bulletproof.”

The fuzzy border effect lends a misleading impression that feminism is incoherent, but that is the whole point: to mislead. It might look incoherent on the surface, but once you penetrate the atmospheric shroud of cognitive fragmentation you land on something solid. Feminism becomes intelligible, and though it is still tainted by what you might call design flaws, there is no longer any mystery about it.

All feminist operations converge toward a central purpose, and these operations are of two classes: direct operations and distraction operations.

Direct operations serve the purpose directly: by maximizing female advantage directly or by advocating such.

Distraction operations serve the purpose indirectly: by sidetracking critical attention from the questionable morality of what is being done.

Both classes of operation make it possible for the feminist project to continue in effect – hence, you would say, those operations converge.

For example, when feminist activists implemented the Duluth Model years ago, it was a direct operation. More recently, when some feminist told you that not all feminists support the Duluth Model, it was a distraction operation. Yet the Duluth Model, as a central, salient fact, continues in effect by the convergent benefit of those operations. Furthermore, feminism’s defining guilt (in this case, the creation of the Duluth Model) has been shunted out of the conversation.

Feminism’s fuzzy perimeter is a system of interlaced distraction operations that keep your mind wandering from one distraction to another. As you scan for the convergent truth, these operations deflect your attention into an erratic orbital path AROUND that truth. You never get to grips with feminism’s core, which goes undetected and continues in effect.

To say that all feminist operations converge toward a central purpose is to say that they all converge toward feminism’s essence.

That essence, simply put, is female supremacism and the drive to maximize female advantage. We have described feminism as the project to increase female power with no concisely understood goal, and what mindset but female supremacism would such a project ultimately comport with? Where but female supremacy could such a project ultimately terminate? These are some of the stubbornly persistent questions that all feminists must ultimately answer.

Consciously or not, feminism gravitates toward female supremacy as a logical endpoint. If left to its devices, that is where feminist operation would ultimately take us, and it would do this as naturally as water running downhill.

This natural process has a simple name: moral confluence.

Moral confluence holds no greater mystery than when like-minded people act in concert – we see this every day. So while I don't doubt that various feminists do sometimes meet and conspire (especially the academic ones), let none call me a "conspiracy theorist," since I believe that moral confluence (which happens spontaneously) accounts for most of the action. Does water "conspire" to run downhill?

Until a concise political endpoint for the feminist project has been uniformly stipulated by the feminists themselves, we may assume that feminism is gravitating toward its evident logical endpoint and that this logical endpoint is identical with a political endpoint even if the latter is left unstated. In other words, we may treat feminism and female supremacism as interchangeable terms.

Feminism's goalposts are on a rubber time horizon that stretches and stretches. No future female advancement will ever be quite good enough, for the simple reason, that life for women will never be quite perfect. The feminists will always interpret said imperfection as "inequality," and make this a pretext to maximize female advantage just a little bit more.

Feminism's claim to support "equality" is Orwellian manipulation of language. Call this Femspeak. It is not inherently clear what "equality" means in the first place; we know only that this is a halo word with a primitive emotional appeal or, simply put, a fetish. It "sounds beautiful," and for a simpleton that is good enough. However, feminist behavior bears witness to what "equality" might look like when it finally gets instituted in feminist style.

In this, as with all things feminist, non-feminist men and women are entitled to harbor suspicions. You cannot know the core truth about feminism if you don't know the moral truth about it, and that moral truth is not pretty. It is a truth which feminism, understandably, must hide: from you, and even from itself. After all, female supremacism has ugly implications even if you dress it up as something benevolent.

So feminism needs deniability, and the fuzzy border effect provides this. The trick is contained in such expressions as "feminism is not monolithic," or "X is not really feminism," or the hardy perennial "not all feminists are like that" (abbreviated as NAFALT). All such talk partakes either of the "no true Scotsman" fallacy or the "good cop/bad cop" gambit, and we should recognize these distraction operations for what they are.

It doesn't matter if all feminists are "like that" or not. It matters only that a critical number are, that this critical number is pulling the world in a certain direction, and that the innocent "who. . me?" feminists are doing diddly to stop them.

All feminists are morally confluent with all each other, which effectively makes feminism a social organism. However, you are not to know this. All who oppose feminism and seek the truth about it, are to be kept wandering in a cloud of muddled distraction and false understanding…..

Different feminisms, with different rules, different principles and different points of focus, are bombarding you from all directions. It seems unclear which of them is the "real" feminism, yet the answer is simple: they are ALL the real feminism. I mean, they are all real…are they not?

More to the point, they all contribute to feminism's ultimate purpose in the way that all parts of an organism contribute to the organism's ultimate purpose.

The different feminisms sometimes contradict each other, but this paradoxically makes feminism stronger. It means that feminism as a whole can keep different rule sets in play, shifting from one to another as conditions require: when the chess game goes against you, switch to basketball or backgammon! Or simply knock the game board over.

On a scale of years, feminism as a whole can shift from one rule set to another. On a scale of minutes, a single feminist can do the same thing within a single conversation.

What's more subtle, is that there are potentially as many feminisms as there are feminists. The major schools of feminism are continually shedding a detritus of words and ideas into the cultural ideosphere. These fragments, broken loose from their origins, are available on a mix-and-match basis to anybody who happens upon them.

The fruit of such recombinant intellectual DNA will be idiosyncratic at the very least, not to say solipsistic. (Think of Tumblr feminism.) All the same, feminism propagates enormously in this way and becomes enormously more fuzzy.

Feminism seems incoherent only if you assume that it is basically honorable or respectable. This assumption sets a mental filter upon your understanding, but you cannot know this until the filter gets lifted. However, once you wake up to the fact there is nothing honorable or respectable about feminism (apart from its fine-sounding rhetoric), the incoherence (the fuzzy border) vanishes and the truth emerges with stark clarity.

In the end, feminism has effectively NO rules apart from the meta-rules of taking advantage and gaining the upper hand – and this smacks of nothing honorable or respectable. Feminism has many conditional rules, but these are incoherent because they are forever shifting to maximize female advantage under shifting conditions. However, the meta-rules, which govern how the shifting operates, are quite unvarying: always maximize female advantage.

To the politically naive, that might not be apparent. "Obviously," they might say, "not all feminists are like that." By way of example, they will point to certain sayers of fine-sounding things which make our eyes glaze over.

Those fine-sounding ones are the moderate feminists, the liberal feminists, the friendly feminists. They are the ones with "good intentions," but we all know which broad highway is paved with such intentions.

Such feminists are not the real movers and shapers. You could as well call them political zeros, or less politely, useful idiots. They serve two main purposes. The first: to float around in the fuzzy border zone sounding honorable and respectable, so that feminism will sound honorable and respectable. The second: to sow confusion and create a distraction – hence, the more you listen to these distraction operators with an uncritical ear, the less you will understand the true state of the feminist project or the true state of the political game at large.

There is more in this vein. For example, we all know that feminism obtains perks and goodies for women. Well, that sounds sort of nice until you realize that such activity works effectively as a system of moral bribery – there's one point to bear in mind. Another point is that politically naive people (men and women both) will conclude from this that feminism is honorable and respectable, and "speak no evil" about it. Such people, though otherwise well-intentioned, may be described as patsies, enablers, or passive supporters.

Consider the hackneyed statement that "feminism got women the vote!" One could dispute whether "feminism" per se did this, although it is safe to say that "a certain combination of people and forces" did this.

But that is a separate discussion. Our point here is that women's enfranchisement verily boosted the feminist project by boosting female power in general and that this has tended to extort the gratitude of women in general.

Furthermore, since people normally agree that women's suffrage was an honorable and respectable cause and since "feminism" is normally given credit for it, anybody who challenges feminism is drawn up short here. So it is moral bribery, moral intimidation and moral camouflage all rolled into one.

To summarize: imagine that a crook or bully has allegedly performed some noble service in the past and demands gratitude forever after, come what may. Crudely but accurately, that is how feminism operates.

Once again, there is nothing honorable or respectable about feminism: at the core of the feminist project lies something which is very simply…rotten. A heart of darkness. How else can we put it? As said earlier, you cannot know the truth about feminism if you don't know the moral truth about it. And the majority of feminists are in moral confluence both to advance the feminist project and to hide the moral truth about feminism.

Moral confluence belongs to an apparatus of mystification which lets feminism operate generally undetected. This apparatus ought to have a special name so that we can reference it quickly in conversation.

Turning to the language of zoology we find, ready-made, the word "Crypsis." Crypsis means anything which an animal in the wild might do to escape observation. Feminism has a similar need to escape observation, but here it is MORAL observation that must be avoided. Such observation, after all, could lead to a disruption of the feminist project by non-feminist observers who find that project morally objectionable.

You would say that feminism needs a kind of "moral crypsis," and we shall add this expedient term to our lexicon.

Moral crypsis, simply put, is how feminism veils its true nature through a multitude of distraction operations. It is a component of moral confluence. We have already sketched the process pretty fully but will add that distraction in its many forms weaves moral crypsis as a camouflage net. Beneath this net, feminism's core truth lies sequestered in its morally unambiguous glory. One must only pull aside the net to gain a view of this.

We all know that hating men is the main show for feminism. If the anti-male hate engine were not perpetually chugging away below the floorboards, feminism as a movement would lack the motive force to keep moving. However, man-hating must be denied and concealed for the sake of public image, and that is where moral crypsis slips in.

It is true that the most radical of feminists will openly flaunt their hatred of men, but others have got to be more circumspect. That is why they will hide their misandry even from themselves if necessary. That is why all feminists are either man-haters or to some degree morally confluent with man-hating.

The moderate feminists are the worst because they occupy the front line of moral crypsis. They are the facade, and without their endlessly iterated mantra that "not all feminists are like that" (NAFALT!), feminism's ugly core couldn't stay under wraps for long.

So the extreme radicals are the only truthful feminists since they are the only ones who will frankly endorse the outcome which feminism's core logic dictates. In other words, they are willing to throw off moral crypsis. They are the most respectable of feminists because they have the goodness to be clear, and for this, we can thank them.

Moral crypsis conceals feminism's morally criminal nature. Feminist apologists (typically the academic sort) must "talk around" this criminal nature in order to rationalize feminism's existence, and they do so by concocting ever more elaborate skeins of theory – basically, as a stalling tactic to throw the anti-feminist hounds off the scent. (Some feminist, reading this right now, is mentally composing such strategems already.)

All of this belongs to the fuzzy border mechanism, but we, constraining the conversation within clearly defined parameters, make such maneuvering impossible.

Our effort is to COLLAPSE feminism's fuzzy borders, to constrain the indeterminacy of those borders by an act of moral observation, to flatten them into an abrupt line that will mark feminism's actual perimeter.

People must be made to "think through" feminism's implications in the light of target consensus. As this progresses, the fog will dissipate, and feminism's true boundary will emerge. The sight of it will not be pretty, and for individual feminists, this will entail an existential crisis with life-changing consequences.

We must force the question "are you feminist or non-feminist?", And make this the meta-frame of reference for the entire cultural discourse. The meaning of "feminist" and "non-feminist" will not be directly clear to everybody (or not at first), but the counter-feminist project is to make this clear, bit by bit, by forcing the question and building the conversation around it.

By reason of the question being forced, the politically naive fence-sitters will need to re-evaluate any position (or lack of such) which they had previously held. Having done so, they might decide that they are in the feminist camp after all, and migrate to the feminist side of the field.

That is FINE. If they cannot be staunch in their standpoint, we are happy to see them travel. For this, they have our blessing. It is imperative that we prune the deadwood, and we urge such people to go, by all means, and join the feminists. Otherwise, they will unhappily find themselves in the political crossfire, and we would rather see them avoid that.

In the end, the world will become politically polarized along the line of feminist v. non-feminist. This polarization will be strongly marked. The correct understanding of feminism, as target consensus, will become decisively clear and embedded in the language. There will be no more fuzzy borders. There will be no longer any question where feminism ends, and the rest of the world begins.

That is what we mean by "collapsing feminism's fuzzy borders." In this manner, we disable the mechanism of moral crypsis and make it impossible for feminism to hide.

As for the feminists themselves, they have no brakes. They are ideological robots who lack the common humanity or common moral instinct to know when they'd best not push a given envelope any further. Since they haven't got brakes, they cannot stop themselves – and that is why somebody else must do the job for them.

In conclusion: the task of seeing through feminist mystification, and the task of helping others to see through it, are plagued by the identical difficulty. To see through it is a battle. To explain it to others is the same battle again, time after time.

A full account of these things could occupy an entire book, but the present article is hardly that. We aim only to lay out the critical points, and by so doing, motivate others to think further and write their own books if the spirit moves them.

Source:

[1] Paraphrase of Adam Kostakis' sentence: "Feminism is the project for increasing the power of women." Source: Lecture 4, Pig Latin, Gynocentrism Theory Lectures, (2011)

Boosting Lena Dunham with her abortion

August Løvenskiolds · 22 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

As an MRA, MGTOW and feminist booster, I read with dismay that, even as feminists are ejecting white women from their midst, actress and Hillary shill Lena Dunham has expressed regret that, unlike her mother and friends, feminist Lena herself has never had the pleasure of abortion.

Even as one might wish that Lena's mother had been more consistent in procuring abortions for herself, as a feminist booster I feel compelled to do everything I can to aid Lena in achieving the nirvana of baby killing.

Lena, since you are coming from a feminist framework, I will try to relate the requirements and processes of obtaining an abortion in terms you are familiar with.

First off, Lena, even though, to feminists, gender is an arbitrary "social construct" – "human systems of social interaction organised around shared ideas" – it turns out that this is not really true when it comes to abortions. The choice to end parenthood via abortion is an unchecked privilege given to women only, and denied to men. When it comes to abortion, being born a girl and growing up to be a person with a vagina and uterus is not optional. No womb, no abortion. For the sake of brevity, from this point forward I will refer to these womb-havers as being "women" or "a woman".

The next step in having an abortion is that you have to be a "fertile" woman. Trigger warning: fertility is age-ist. Only women of a certain age – between menarche and menopause – are eligible for abortions. As a spinster of age 30 your chances of having an abortion are sharply declining each day, and you have already wasted most of your fertile years, but not all hope is gone if you move quickly and follow the advice in this article closely. Think of it like a magical quest to take your cervical ring to Mount Doom. More on mounting later.

As your next step, you are going to have to find your fertile days. These are some of those days when you are not free-bleeding or raping yourself with tampons. Using a fertility test is one way to gauge your potential for abortion readiness.

Fertility can also be impaired by too much, or too little body fat. You may need to take on some fat-shaming to get that pre-abortion transvaginal ultrasound going. In fact, a lot of fat-shaming might be the best plan for you.

Once you have reached your most fertile time, you will need to take steps to inseminate yourself. This is sort of like the feminist "spirit cooking" popular among your Democrat friends except in this case you will need to put the semen into your vagina instead. Remember when you stuffed rocks into your toddler sister's vagina? Same thing, but again, with semen, not rocks, and to you, not her. Although you might get lucky on the first try, you may need to inseminate yourself for months or even years to qualify for an abortion.

Now, securing a regular supply of semen can be daunting for a rape-averse feminist, especially one with your unfortunate tattoos and your habit of dressing like a dude. Men, you see, must be sexually aroused to produce semen for you, and your efforts to desexualize yourself will not serve you well in your sacred abortion quest. If you are to storm the gates of Mount Doom, your best bet might be to hang around the discharge gates of a men's prison on release day.

Trolling through truck stop trash cans for used rubbers might also work out for you.

When and if you miss your monthly free-bleeding, there is a chance you have become abortion-qualified! You may wish to take something called a "pregnancy test" to confirm this. Avoid the temptation to buy a positive test online – these are for girls trolling for cash and marriage, and as a feminist seeking abortion you want nothing to do with that unless you can pinpoint a wealthy baby-daddy and in your case, let's face it, this is problematic.

Once you are "pregnant" (abortion-ready) you need to make an appointment at a relaxing abortion spa sort of like the retreat you took in the horrible aftermath of the Trump election. You are going to want to invite the media to the event to show how joyous you are that at last you are a fully qualified white feminist, even though by the time this happens there will be no white feminists left as the intersectionalists purge them from feminist ranks like so many forgotten men on the battlefield.

In conclusion, dear Lena, the hardest part about getting a feminist abortion is all the hard work you have to put in to get one – hard work that men should be doing instead. In your case, it might be easier just to make up a story about some imagination Canadian back-alley abortion with shady, impossible to verify characters.

You know, like a feminist campus rape hoax. You are supposed to be an actress, Lena. Prove it.

A conflict of visions

D.D.Harper · 22 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

> To this guy for whom we kicked down the door – 'You're welcome!'
>
> Suz McCarley

Every once in a while something comes along and catches my attention. You know that thing where men and women in the MHRM and MGTOW communities can find common ground, yet seem to talk over each other without an inkling of understanding of the nuance each group within the manosphere holds.

Recently, Heartbern, a MGTOW Youtube commentator, uploaded a video titled The Problem With Men (Especially MRA's) | MGTOW which illustrates this point. And within the spirit of his preamble: "always a good thing for men to check each other. That's male culture. We don't have enough of that anymore." here we go.

Heartbern starts out in his commentary calling all men out, particularly men in his comment section who sees themselves as powerless, victims of circumstance who in his opinion do not see themselves as men and taking personal responsibility. He then goes on to talk about the fall of Alpha males in society and the emergence of Beta males with a RoK…esk flair.

Even though there are many elements of truth in his commentary, he goes on at around 7:40 in the video to call out AVFM (Paul Elam specifically) and the MHRM with a complete abandonment of knowledge or understanding of what exactly we do or why we do it.

His issue is that the "men's movement is trying to call attention to their pain, they are trying to call attention to the unfairness they, men, boys, fathers, etc. that they experience in culture and in our legal system." Or method of change and reform as he states it. Claiming "the MRM is essentially limiting themselves to the same level of power women used to get the pendulum to swing in their direction…".

Without belaboring more of what can be viewed in the video, I think I can provide some illumination to the differences in "Style" when it comes to the MRM and other elements of the manosphere from my personal experience and AVFMs Mission Statement:

The MRM, specifically AVFM and its readers are a diverse group of men and women who come together to hear all aspects of men's concerns and share experiences. Each member has their own personal vision about the problems and possible solutions men face in today's society, and AVFM is a place these folks can come together, be they MRAs or otherwise and hash those things out.

There is plenty of ground to talk about different approaches to the common problem and to critique them to see what works best for each as they see fit. The key here is how someone approaches their solutions is up to each, their interests, skills and proclivities.

From my perspective as a former military guy, I certainly am of the ability to simply tell folks what it is and what they can do to improve their lot as Mr. Heartbern does in his video. This approach has its advantages in that it can be a shortcut towards a common goal if everyone is working from the same "Red Pill" maturity level, knowledge, and understanding of the problem; The fact is we do not.

I'm in agreement and as part of my personal mission here to empower men with knowledge and tools to go out into our Social Zeitgeist and feel confident in their "manhood" and personal empowerment. But I'm not naive enough to dismiss the personal, social or economic risks in doing so. It's not a simple matter of exercising one's masculinity or dominance or play the "Alpha Male" role. Men need to be smart about it.

Let's take a little time to discuss this Alpha and Beta Male leadership concept. First, all leadership is situational. There is both intrinsic and extrinsic leadership, and despite what some may think, neither are inherent. They both take training and practice and can be very limited to the environment and skill set required. Granted, some leaders can adapt more quickly from one situation to another, but the reality is most if not all had spent a lot of time in preparation before those attributes appeared in the first place. I've seen the "Halo" effect placed on leaders who excelled in certain situations, only to turn around and utterly fail at others. The Alpha Beta dichotomy is false and does damage to men by limiting them and their outlook. Another approach is to teach men they all can be leaders within their sphere of influence, and work to expand that sphere; we as a group can help to develop these leaders; with the understanding that it takes time, education and effort on their part.

AVFM spends a lot of effort directly challenging the lies put out in society by Feminist, and sharing men's challenges. Some can view this as playing the victim, mirroring Feminism or whatnot. The fact is it does not come without some thought or measure of effectiveness.

Peter Wright made a brilliant observation in a recent discussion on the differences in approach between AVFM, the MRM, and the one alluded to in the video:

> I've thought a lot about this over the years – the strategies of showing men's vulnerabilities to improve thier cultural and legal value, vs. showing strength, confidence to get same. Obviously we need a mixture of both, but no matter how I look at it the showing of vulnerability, even through anger, has far greater impact on the social narratives.
>
> Comes back to Alison Tieman's 'threat narrative' videos about men being perceived as having agency, therefore not vulnerable and in need of help, vs. women having a lack of same and needing – and getting – all the cultural and legal rights they want.
>
> These two approaches have a psychological impact on observers that goes very deep…. I actually think humans are hardwired to respond to protect vulnerable children (and by extension adults who show similar vulnerability) and this instinct aces the respect for strength and stoicism.
>
> Not how I want it to be at all, but we can see everything I've described in action.

Peter's point highlights the fact that we can all be Alpha/Masculine men, beat our chests and demand our rightful place in the hierarchy, but it is all for naught because we'd have to exercise force at every turn and watch our back at every step when we get there. Something, not a few dictatorial leaders discovered to their demise. The alternative he presents provides us with a more symbiotic and eclectic approach to winning hearts and minds and taking a leadership role in doing so. Showing our vulnerability shows our humanity, it makes us human. And I'd venture men would live longer and healthier lives.

Some don't like our "style?" Are we not "Alpha" enough? Having been in frontline combat units for nearly 30 years and in various leadership roles, I've worked with and played the "Alpha Male." All I can say is it takes a lot of energy to sustain and most men rotate in and out of those roles to survive. Often, when I see those words invoked on people I know who are working hard and taking on leadership, it is usually coming from someone who only talks about being an "Alpha Male" but is actually, only a "Beta male" who has never experience the "Responsibility" of leadership. Let me restate this for emphasis: Leadership = Responsibility.

Does this responsibility require specific roles? Real Men and Losers as implied by the Alpha Beta pigeonholing? Or Men whose lives progress as opposed to men whose lives stagnate or regress? What is meant by unapologetic expression of masculinity, does it mean putting on a façade of domineering hyper-masculinity, or does it mean being an emotionally mature adult male? If it's the later, I see plenty of it here.

On a parting note, here is Paul Elam's latest video. There are some similarities in the topic matter if you pay attention, but a big difference in message, delivery, and style. Notice he is educating men as a group of their shortcomings and responsibilities without thumping his fat finger on their chests and telling them to man up. I call that combat Effective. Even a tad bit "Alpha Male." But fuck if I'll give him a swollen head about it.

Paul Elam's The ten immutable laws of men and women

Man As Sperm Factory – TFF Episode 45

AVfM Video Source · 22 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

In Episode 45 Professor Fiamengo discusses the issue of allowing a woman to take the sperm of her dead boyfriend in order to impregnate herself. This case arose in Australia.

StudioBrule

J4MB confront Rabbi Daniel Berkowitz of London, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 23 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Rabbi Daniel Berkowitz has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Recently confronted by Mike Buchanan of J4MB at his “practice,” Berkowitz is speechless when told mutilating baby boys is criminal:

From his website circumcisionsmohel.co.uk:

“Mazal Tov
on the birth of your son!

Looking for a professional Jewish Mohel for Brit Milah/ Circumcision in North London,South London or elsewhere in the UK, Europe and beyond?
Welcome to the site of Rabbi Daniel Berkowitz, the north London Senior Mohel. To arrange for a Brit Milah/circumcision appointment (all clients welcome) either at your own home or at our private clinic – please give us a call. We offer competitive rates. The service is caring, personal and professional, with full support, pain control and aftercare. All designed to deliver the guaranteed satisfaction that you are looking for. We are situated in north London on the boarder of Hackney & Haringey in Stamford Hill. So why not join our thousands of satisfied clients and give us a call today.

Don’t be too sure that thousands of your actual “clients” are “satisfied.” Few victims of genital mutilation are.

Further on at the website:

> About Rabbi Daniel Berkowitz:
>
> I am a Certified and registered Senior Mohel and have been practicing Bris Milah-Jewish circumcision for more than 25 years. I am a member of The Initiation Society, approved by the London Beth Din and The Union of Hebrew Congregations. My Rabbinical studies were in Israel and after graduation I continued further Rabbinical and Medical studies here in the U.K.
>
> I have been practising Bris milah and Circumcision and training students for more than 25 years and have performed thousands of circumcisions, for all age groups. Today my work still involves babies, infants, teens and adults.
>
> I perform circumcision both in this country and abroad, including Israel, Europe, USA, Hong Kong, Former Soviet Union and more. I was very much involved with circumcision in the Former Soviet Union, where I performed many adult circumcisions together with Rabbi Yisroel Dovid Wienberger, Dr Morris Sifman OB”M and Reb Yisroel Stern (Brudi) OB”M.
>
> Personally I have trained a generation of new Mohalim, who are now successfully in practice themselves here in the UK and also in Israel, Europe, Canada and the USA.
>
> Working to precision is my pride and I demand a very high standard of myself in both surgery and hygiene. In my work, the results show little scarring and the healing time is reduced to its minimum. My approach delivers aesthetic results that are most desirable and pleasing – a result of many years of practice.”

You may have a "high standard of surgery and hygiene," but no standard of ethics or human rights. These infants that you circumcise are not consenting to potentially deadly unnecessary surgery.

From "Circumcisions Service" we have:

> The circumcision is done using the most up to date and most advanced traditional method. There is hardly any bleeding and the dressing is small and light and removes itself, making it much easier for you. The circumcision is virtually painless, this is achieved by using a topical and non-invasive anesthesia application. The traditional method is also the fastest and most hassle free method, being quick, safe and with virtually no pain. It has the best safety record unlike the ring, cap or any of the other methods and is the shortest in time by far.
>
> The Circumcision is extremely safe and complications are negligible. The method used coupled with the many years of experience and our complication free record, makes us the best choice for circumcising your son.
>
> During the circumcision the baby lies comfortably on a specially designed and modern circumstraint, removing any need for outside assistance. Thus also shortening the time of the procedure to a minimum, only a couple of minutes.

There is no way of knowing if "circumcision is virtually painless" and I'm not so sure that the "fastest and most hassle-free" method of this mutilation is a good thing.

Actually, scarring results in 100% of circumcisions, so complications are not "negligible."

Under "Brit Milah" we see:

> Rabbi Daniel will take you through the service giving a running commentary so that you will feel in touch with the significance of what's taking place. From the Godparents, inviting Prophet Elijah and to the Naming ceremony, its all done in a most moving atmosphere both touching and rewarding, connecting one's soul to the child's soul, to the Jewish nation and to God.

Brit Milah involves potentially deadly mouth-to-penis contact, apart from an obvious textbook definition of sexual abuse.

If you want to hear an actual commentary of this horrific, barbaric, and criminal act, click here.

Since the Rabbi has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Rabbi Berkowitz' practice information follows:

96 Hillside Rd.

Stamford Hill,

London N15 6NB.

Tel: 020 8800 4724
Mobile: 07956 55 37 64
E-mail: rabbidaniel@circumcisionsmohel.co.uk

> Rabbi Daniel Berkowitz of London, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/wqQm8Hg5lZ @AndreaHardie #nocirc pic.twitter.com/0yRMsxJ5R8
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 21, 2016

A very special Red Pill Movie screening in Norwich, UK

Paul Elam · 24 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Mike Buchanan has referred to Barry Wright as a “remarkable man.” I must agree. Mr. Wright has arranged a screening of The Red Pill Movie in Norwich, UK for January 18, 2017.

Not only has he taken on the expense of hosting the event, he has also underwritten the travel expenses and accommodations for myself, Erin Pizzey, Cassie Jaye, Mike Buchanan and (hopefully) Dr. Randomercam so that we can appear in person and participate in the Q & A following the movie on January 18, 2017.

I don’t know what the total price tag is for the event but based on the shocking sticker price for my air fare alone I know it is considerable. Barry has gone out of pocket for the entire tab to ensure that all of it happens.

He’s not an affluent man, just someone who recognizes the game changing potential in this movie and who has committed at great expense to helping it find a wider audience.

To help defray the costs, he has launched a crowdfunder with a target of £7,500.

With my hearty Christmas and Chanukah wishes for AVFM readers and supporters, I ask you to consider supporting Barry in his most generous effort to do his part for advancing free speech and the uncensored expression of ideas.

You can support his crowdfunder here.

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

Paul

“The Red Pill” (documentary) world premiere Q&A – Oct 7, 2016

Gary Costanza · 31 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

It’s finally been released! The long awaited Q & A from the NYC world premiere of “The Red Pill” featuring Cassie Jaye, Alison Tieman, Karen Straughan, Paul Elam, Michael Kimmel, Fred Hayward, and Tim Goldich.

Check out the latest information about TRP screenings, the Academy Award nomination, and everything else related to Cassie Jaye’s documentary.

Highlights from 2016 by Studio Brulé

Steve Brulé · 31 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Steve Brulé brings highlights of 2016 in the fight for sanity and human rights.

Gender roles

Guy · 31 December 2016 · Archived copy · Original

Gender roles have played an integral role in humans successfully becoming the dominant species on the planet, populating the planet and in creating modern civilization. They have become less and less useful as society has evolved, now the vast majority of western society believe we have no use for them.

Feminism would have you believe that gender roles are an entirely learned behavior foisted upon us by our parents, media, and society in general. Feminists will say that they are a part of patriarchy and part of the subjugation of women.

This is a very convenient explanation as it absolves women of any responsibility in the creation of gender roles and of any responsibility to change them. This is patently absurd, for the vast majority of human history gender roles have been of great benefit to women, and they were complicit in creating and propagating them. There are however some grains of truth in their assertions.

There are two clear ways gender roles are enforced by society. In family court and through the paternity/maternity leave gap. The latter plays a larger part as women have already carried the baby for nine months are full of hormones and their natural instincts are telling them they want to be their child's primary caregiver. When you add on top that women are entitled to up to a year off, and it's no small wonder, they end up being their child's primary caregiver in the majority of cases.

For the record, I strongly believe that families should be able to choose which parent gets to take paid maternity/paternity leave.

Media plays a role in both reinforcing gender roles as it tends to depict society as it is and in breaking them as there are many independent, powerful female characters in books, movies, video games and television and many strong role models in sports and media in general. I would say overall it's a wash.

Now to the people we love to blame for our shortcomings, our parents. The majority of parents will encourage their daughters to do whatever makes them happy and tell them they can be whatever they want so no problems there. The only way I can see that parents enforce gender roles is that children like to imitate their parents and will tend to identify with the parent of their own gender.

When young girls see their mothers doing their makeup, cooking and taking care of children they mimic this behavior, they ask for easy bake ovens and dolls and makeup sets. Again I would say parents influence in enforcing gender roles is pretty close to a wash.

This leaves the final part of the puzzle that feminists like to ignore, the part I have already touched on in this article and the driving factor behind gender roles, biological imperatives. Men are driven to attain resources and power as that is what makes them attractive to women and will give them the widest choice of mating options.

If a man wants a good chance of passing on his genes, he must at the very least, be capable of supporting a family. As has always been the case it is what women want or need that drives men to fulfill the roles they do in society. Men don't care what women do for a living, they don't care how much money their potential mating partner makes, they simply want a woman who is nice to them, and that displays outward signs of good health (good complexion, healthy weight and other signs of genetic health and strong genes).

Women have all the choices available to them as nothing is expected of them, and when all those choices are available, they tend to follow their biological instincts. They choose a healthy work/leisure balance, choose careers that are fulfilling rather than lucrative, take more holidays, work part time and choose to be the primary caregivers for their family more often than men. The IQ distribution of the sexes is also a factor in career choice as men occupy the majority of the highest IQ bracket they will be more successful in the hard sciences, mathematics and other careers that require extraordinary brainpower.

It is clear to me that biology is the major driving factor behind gender roles, so now to the key question, do we need them?

Until women decide to become risk takers, get their hands dirty and do physically demanding jobs such as construction, waste management or car mechanic then yes we most certainly do. The way forward is plainly obvious to me; we educate both genders about their biological drives and instincts so if they so choose they can override them.

The earlier in their development they are taught about these drives and instincts the better as children and young adults' drives and instincts are still developing, and the sooner they learn about them, the sooner they can recognize them. Trying to force society to abandon gender roles, making people go against drives and instincts that for the most part, they don't fully understand, a sure-fire way to create a confused, unhappy and less productive society and is most certainly not the wisest course of action.

New year message from Australian journalist Bettina Arndt

Bettina Arndt · 2 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I wish I had a dollar for every letter I have received from an Australian man congratulating me for daring to write about what's happening to men in this country. I've written about issue after issue where men are being done over: the denial of women's role in domestic violence; the beat-up over sexual harassment; the increasingly anti-male rape laws; the scandal over shonky research being used to deny fathers overnight care of young children after marital separation. The list goes on.

My correspondents claim they wouldn't dare speak out about these issues for fear they will be howled down. That's the great irony. The men who are claimed to still rule our world are too frightened to stand up for themselves. Well, now there are things you can do to help change the debate in this country.

This year an important international conference on men's issues will be held in Gold Coast on June 9-11. See more information here. Some of the great international speakers coming to that event are bound to shake things up – I'll write more about them in the future but they include Erin Pizzey and Karen Straughan. It's important we get people to sign up soon to ensure the conference is a success. So please spread the word.

But there's another issue where we need you all to get on board. Last October I wrote in The Australian about a documentary called The Red Pill which was to have been screened by Palace Cinemas that month in Melbourne. Unfortunately the Palace owner caved into pressure from an anti-male lobby group and ended up cancelling the screening – the only place in the world where this happened. See my blog.

The Red Pill was made by a well-known feminist filmmaker, Cassie Jaye, who took a good look at some of the men's issues – thinking she was going to send up men's rights groups – and ended up concluding there are serious issues that are impacting on men and that feminists are behaving badly in shutting down proper debate on these topics. The Melbourne screening ended up taking place as a result of crowdfunding, which attracted a huge response from people offended by the idea that in a free country like Australia it is possible for such a small lobby group to determine what the rest of us are allowed to see.

See Cassie Jaye's interview with Andrew Bolt on Sky News.

Since then the lobby groups have managed to stop another viewing in Sydney.

Now a new one is planned for Brisbane on January 14.

But lobby groups are working hard to close that down too. See here, a typical article which misrepresents the contents of the movie, falsely attributing misogynist quotes to the men's rights activists interviewed in the movie.

We have to stop this happening. Just think about it – here's a movie about the unfairness of feminist activists stopping public discussion over important issues in men's lives and we are allowing them to get away with preventing Australian audiences even seeing the documentary.

You can help stop this madness by exposing what is going on here. We need you all to ensure this Brisbane screening of The Red Pill is a success by making sure people book in and come along to see it.

Can you please post information about what is happening here everywhere you can think to do so – on Facebook, Twitter, send messages to your email contacts, ring up radio stations, write letters to newspapers, post comments online. The reason the activists are getting away with closing down these events is people aren't aware of what is going on.

Let's make 2017 the year we stopped complaining about anti-male treatment and actually did something about it. Promoting The Red Pill is a great place to start. And don't forget to book in for the men's issues conference in June.

The Red Pill screening Brisbane, Australia

Robert Brockway · 4 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill will be screened in Brisbane, Australia on January 14, 2017. The first attempt at the Australian premiere of The Red Pill in Melbourne was cancelled by the venue, The Palace Cinemas, only 11 days before the intended screening. The organisers went above and beyond to find a new venue. The planned Sydney screening was cancelled by the venue Western Sydney University, only eight days before the intended screening.

To prevent the same in Brisbane the organisers will not be releasing information about the venue until the day before the screening. An inner city meeting point will be advised on the Men's Rights Brisbane facebook page after close of business on January 13 (UTC+10) to save our host venue from harassment. A Facebook event page has been set up here.

Let's make Brisbane the first Australian city to screen The Red Pill without having a screening cancelled first. Brisbane is just north of the Gold Coast, where ICMI17 will be held later in the year.

Tickets can be purchased here.

Itinerary:
2:30 pm – Depart from meeting point
3:00 pm – Film commences
5:00 pm – Q & A with Paul Elam and Tom Golden (video skype)
6:00 pm – Event conclusion

Feminists are encouraged to attend as long as the rights of others to watch the film in peace are respected. Indeed, the presence of feminists at the Q&A is sure to make it a lively affair.

This documentary is taken from a feminist's perspective and challenges common perceptions promoted by feminism in gender politics. Whether you're feminist, non-feminist or agnostic this film is profoundly thought-provoking and is bound to challenge the beliefs, perspectives and assumptions of many viewers.

Follow the Men's Rights Brisbane facebook page for event updates. Patrons with mobility issues should advise us upon booking as the venue is a walk away from the meeting point and alternative arrangements will be made. Please be at the rally point at 2:30pm sharp to allow time to reach the venue and find your seat.

This film is unclassified. We have been advised by Australian Classification Board that the documentary does not require a classification for this screening. It is our assessment that it would likely attain a rating of MA15+ (Mature Accompanied). It contains strong language, adult themes and is not recommended for younger viewers. Children under 15 will not be admitted unless accompanied by an adult guardian who has paid for their ticket.

An extended sneak peak can be found here.

Presented by Men's Rights Brisbane.

In association with A Voice for Men and Men Are Good.

ICMI'17 Gold Coast, Australia Tickets on Sale Now

Paul Elam · 4 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

BUY TICKETS HERE: http://icmi.info/shop/

Update 2: technical problems tentatively resolved; please post in the comments if you experience any further issues.

Update 1: SORRY FOLKS, THERE HAS BEEN A TECHNICAL GLITCH AT THE POINT OF SALE. WE EXPECT TO HAVE THIS RESOLVED IN 12-24 HOURS. OUR APOLOGIES, AND WE WILL POST A VIDEO ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE CORRECTION WHEN IT HAPPENS. THANK YOU.

New Zealand Style Hangi
http://www.genuinemaoricuisine.com/Folders/Hangi.html

Harry Rushton Jr., MD of Children's National Health System, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 4 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: Apparently the doctors performing circumcision at the Children's National Health System are ashamed of their actions and have removed any reference to those mutilations on their website. My listing of Dr. Hsieh clearly shows "circumcision" as one of his specialties, which has since been removed from the website, as has happened here under Dr. Rushton's specialties. I can only hope the stigma of mutilating infants becomes so great as to actually stop it.

Harry Rushton Jr., MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He is listed as a Urologist at the Children's National Health System, and following these menus we find that he performs circumcision as the "treatment" of the "condition" known as "foreskin:"

Choose Children's -> Conditions and Treatments -> Urology -> Circumcision

From the "Children's Team" we find Dr. Rushton, and his "Biography:"

"H. Gil Rushton, MD, is the Chief of Urology at Children's National Health System and has practiced in the Washington, DC, area for 22 years. His subspecialty interests include: vesicoureteral reflux and urinary tract infections, perinatal hydronephrosis, undescended testes, and reconstruction of hypospadias and ambiguous genitalia."

It really is a shame that such an obviously talented and caring person would sully himself – and bloody his hands and reputation – by genitally mutilating babies without their consent, many times causing the problems that require further surgeries to fix, to say nothing of permanently ruining a baby boy's ability to have a natural and normal sex life.

The doctor also does reconstruction of "ambiguous genitalia," something most intactivists oppose as strongly as genital mutilation, which it is. Any surgery on the genitals of an infant that's not medically necessary is unethical and unproven, and is both psychologically and physically damaging. Intersex people live normal lives and should be left intact unless they themselves choose surgery as an adult.

Again, in this list of specialties, the doctor is able to help with all these terrible problems, EXCEPT THE ONE HE CAUSES:

> Specialties
>
> Congenital Ureteropelvic Junction Obstruction
> Ectopic Ureter
> Exstrophy of the Bladder and Epispadias
> Horseshoe Kidney
> Hydrocele

> Hypospadias
> Inguinal Hernia
> Megaureter
> Micropenis
> Phimosis and Paraphimosis
> Posterior Urethral Valve
> Prune Belly Syndrome
> Testicular Torsion
> Undescended Testis
> Ureterocele
> Urinary Incontinence or Enuresis (bedwetting)
> Urinary Stone Program
> Urinary Tract Infection (UTI)
> Vesicoureteral Reflux

And of course, that problem ITSELF is CIRCUMCISION.

Further on at the website:

> What is circumcision?
>
> Circumcision is a surgical procedure to remove the skin covering the end of the penis, called the foreskin. In many cultures, circumcision is a religious rite or a ceremonial tradition. It is most common in Jewish and Islamic faiths. In the United States, newborn circumcision is an elective procedure. An estimated 55 to 80 percent of newborn boys undergo circumcision. However, this number varies among socioeconomic, racial, and ethnic groups.
>
> Do pediatricians support circumcision?
>
> The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) issued a policy statement in 1999 on the use of circumcision. This policy was most recently updated in 2012. The AAP recognizes the following information from studies of both circumcised and uncircumcised males:
>
> Problems with the penis, such as irritation, can occur with or without circumcision.
> There is no difference in hygiene, as long as proper care is followed.
> There may or may not be any difference in sexual sensation or practices in adult men.
> There is an increased risk of urinary tract infection in uncircumcised males, especially in babies younger than 1 year of age. However, the risk for urinary tract infections in all boys is less than 1 percent.
> Newborn circumcision does provide some protection from cancer of the penis. However, the overall risk of penis cancer is very low in developed countries, such as the United States.
> There is a decreased risk of certain sexually transmitted diseases (including HIV) in circumcised males.
> The most current AAP report found that the health benefits to circumcision outweigh the risks. However, these benefits are not significant enough to recommend that all newborn baby boys be circumcised. The AAP recommends that parents should be given information on the benefits and risks of newborn circumcision and that parents should decide what is best for their baby.

So, in a roundabout way, the AAP DOES NOT SUPPORT ROUTINE CIRCUMCISION OF INFANTS. As a matter of fact the most recent findings by the AAP warn AGAINST surgery such as circumcision on infants because of their immature nervous system.

> What care is needed after a circumcision?
>
> Circumcisions performed by a qualified doctor rarely have complications. Problems that occur are usually not > serious. The most common complications are bleeding and infection. Proper care after circumcision helps reduce the chances of problems.

"Usually not serious," but why take the unnecessary chance that your baby will bleed to death or have a lifetime of pain and suffering?

> What care is needed for an uncircumcised penis?
>
> A newborn boy normally has foreskin tightly fitted over the head of the penis. As long as the baby is able to pass urine through the opening, this is not a problem. It is not necessary to clean inside the foreskin, only the outside, as part of a normal bath.
>
> As the baby grows, the foreskin becomes looser and is able to be retracted (moved back). This may take many months to years. Your baby's doctor will check this as part of your baby's checkups and will show you how to retract the foreskin. This allows cleansing of the area. As a boy grows, he should be taught how to retract the foreskin and clean himself. The foreskin should never be retracted forcibly. Do not allow the foreskin to stay retracted for long periods as this may shut off the blood supply causing pain and possible injury. Sometimes the foreskin becomes stuck in the retracted position and cannot be pulled back down. This is called paraphimosis and is a medical emergency.
>
> In some children, the foreskin cannot be retracted because of a restricted opening, causing a condition called phimosis. This condition may require circumcision later in childhood if it doesn't respond to medical treatment.

This is sound advice – no need to mutilate an infant; leave him intact, free of trauma, to enjoy what he was born with.

Unbelievably and ironically, the Children's National Health System has a new campaign to "Grow Up Stronger" with this glowing image of pure goodness, with nary an image of babies being strapped down for sexual abuse and mutilation:

Check out the campaign here, where I tried to get my own message published about what "Stronger is…" I said "Stronger is… leaving baby boys intact," leaving my real name and my department as urology. At least if I was a urologist I wouldn't on one hand help little boys, while disfiguring them with the other. Whether or not my message is posted – it appears they check email addresses – someone has read my message so I FTSU. I may leave a link to this article as my next message. Or maybe "Stronger is… the adult that straps down a baby in order to sexually abuse and genitally mutilate him."

Dr. Rushton, you don't have to circumcise these babies, so why do it? Refuse to do it – it's a human rights violation according to the law and the United Nations. If all cutters refused to cut, this horrible practice would die out much sooner. Obviously Children's Health makes money on this practice, hence it's continuation. But that's BLOOD

MONEY.

Since Dr. Rushton has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can read that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Rushton's practice information follows:

Children's National Health System

Locations
Main Hospital
Washington, District of Columbia 20010
1-888-884-BEAR (2327)
Montgomery County Outpatient Center
Rockville, Maryland 20850
301-765-5400 or 800-787-0243

> Harry Rushton Jr., MD of Children's National Health System, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/DXXlK1WJUt #mgm pic.twitter.com/nsOfh0LtKN
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 4, 2017

Are the Cards Stacked Against Men? Censored Filmmaker Speaks Out

AVfM Video Source · 5 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Are men and fathers losing their way in our society? Jesse Lee Peterson sits down with filmmaker Cassie Jaye to discuss her eye-opening documentary, “The Red Pill,” which examines the impact of feminism on men. Do fathers get a fair shot at raising their kids? Does our society set men up for success or failure? Are Western women experiencing major disadvantages compared to Western men? Jesse and Cassie tackle this and much more on this episode of TheFallenState TV.

Camille Paglia on feminism, male creativity & generation snowflake –

AVfM Video Source · 9 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Author, art professor, feminist, and cultural critic Camille Paglia offers a scathing critique of feminism, praises male creativity, and laments Generation Snowflake.

Hog bladder blues

Doug Mortimer · 10 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A friend of mine used to tell a story about an experience he had at his small town high school in the Texas Panhandle. An avid tennis player, he went to the powers that be at his school and asked if he could form a tennis club. Sure, go ahead. Why not?

At first, things went well. Membership in the tennis club grew steadily. Then things went too well. Football players were dropping out in favor of the tennis club. So the powers that be changed their minds, and the tennis club was deep-sixed.

It is a curious paradox. In academic environments, where toxic masculinity is routinely excoriated, why is football, the ultimate contact sport – and arguably the most "toxic" sport – sacrosanct?

Well, the short answer is that it brings in more revenue than other sports, but there's more to it than that.

Consider the town of McKinney, a fast-growing suburb north of Dallas. Taxpayers there just coughed up $70 million for a 12,000-seat stadium for the local high school football team. Apparently the town came down with a bad case of stadium envy after the neighboring suburb of Allen spent $60 million for their stadium a few years ago.

These communities, though affluent, would never undertake such a building program if they couldn't count on a critical mass of adolescent males going out for football year after year. So the ultimate question is why are so many young men so eager to participate in this sport?

There are a number of reasons why tennis is preferable to football. For one thing, you don't have to don all that gladiatorial armor. For another, tennis is a sport you can play, at some level, for the rest of your life. It's not terribly unusual to see graybeards running around on a tennis court. As for football…no sport for old men.

Then there's the injury thing. Oh, if you spend too much time wielding a racquet, you might get tennis elbow, but you don't have to worry about brain damage or ending up in a wheelchair for the rest of your life.

And if you play tennis, you probably won't have to deal with a hypertensive coach channeling R. Lee Ermey. At many high schools, the football coach occupies an exalted status, which may explain why so many young men are willing to abase themselves in his presence.

For example, in Texas we used to have a tradition in August when one or more high school football players would drop dead from dehydration or heat exhaustion during pre-season practice. Some coaches felt that if you took a break to get a drink of water it was a sign of weakness. Had these players been POWs, the Geneva Convention would have been invoked. "Walk it off, son, walk it off," is no defense.

Going out for football is almost like volunteering to be a crash test dummy. Normally, if you engage in self-mutilation, you will be sent to a shrink; if you play football, you will be applauded and cheered, especially if they carry you off the field on a stretcher. What better way for a young man to demonstrate male disposability!

Tennis, however, has one big disadvantage. It is not a team sport! You can't teach a young man teamwork if he's not on a team. You know about teamwork, don't you? That's when some other guy gets the glory while you labor in obscurity. But you're both wearing the same uniform so you must be on the same team, right? Well, a scrub team grunt and the starting quarterback might be on the same team, but they are in different leagues.

You say you're not athletically inclined? The consolation prize is you can always join the school band. Yeah, I know, they let girls play in the band too, so it's not quite as big a deal. But you get to parade on the field at halftime and you get to wear a uniform, so you're on the team too…kinda…sorta. And you don't even have to be much of a musician.

While football assigns a young man a cubicle in the collective, it also teaches him to accept the inevitability of authority. The head coach is the dictator, the assistant coaches are the commissars. If they assign you to one position and you would rather play another, too bad. If you are tired of sitting on the bench and want to get out there and play, too bad. You may not be happy about the decisions made by those in authority but there's nothing you can do about it. Is that superb preparation for modern society or what?

Football is perhaps the ultimate collective sport. If not for the numbers on their backs, young men covered from head to toe in helmets, pads, and uniforms would be as difficult to recognize as women in burkas. Even parents are hard-pressed to recognize their sons on the sidelines.

Of course, high schools just don't have enough room on the football rosters to accommodate every male student. But they can play other sports, can't they? Well, they can, but it's not the same thing.

What makes football different from other team sports is the old "it will make a man out of you" theme. In days of old, one could come right out and say that; today it's sub rosa. Other team sports, such as soccer, basketball, or baseball, are OK, but no one asserts they will make a man out of you. After all, even girls play soccer, basketball, and baseball (well, softball). But girls don't play football!

Athletic competition goes back at least as far as the ancient Greeks, but organized sports leagues are a relatively new phenomenon in civilization. The sociobiological take on them is they provide an arena for a ritualized form of aggression. Think of tribal warfare without spears.

So how did boys become men before football was invented? Playing games was a leisure activity at best. You could go your entire life without ever playing any kind of sport and no one would question your manhood.

Of course, the military was usually the go-to institution for that making-a- man-out-of-you thing. But high school football works pretty good for the under-18 set. It's not a bad warm-up for anyone planning to enlist after graduation.

That's why we can't allow our young men to waste time on tennis. Sure, it's a highly skilled athletic pursuit but it won't teach you to accept your place in the collective. On the tennis court, you're on your own. No one is going to sub for you. You alone are competing, you are not part of a team. You don't get to wear a uniform! You won't be assigned a number! You will never be asked to take one for the team!

To some degree, the word is out about concussions, and some boys (and parents) are having second thoughts about playing football. Yet filling out rosters hasn't been a problem so far. How can that be?

Well, there is one important factor at work we have yet to mention. Yes, once again, gynocentrism rears its ugly head. And this time it's wearing a football helmet.

Consider the following song, written in 1933:

> You got to be a football hero
>
> To get along with the beautiful girls
>
> You got to be a touchdown-getter, you bet
>
> If you want to get somebody to pet
>
>
> The fact that you are rich or handsome
>
> Won't get you anything in curls
>
> You got to be a football hero
>
> To get along with the beautiful
>
> Along with the beautiful
>
> Along with the beautiful

> Along with the beautiful girls

Yeah, guys, you could get a perfect score on the SAT, a blue ribbon at the science fair, or a full scholarship to Stanford, but that won't enable you to sleep with "the beautiful girls." You have to be a football hero to ensure that your genes will mingle with good stock.

Certainly if the MGTOW movement ever catches on in high schools, the football programs will be endangered. If we ever get to the point where those roster spots can't be filled and those expensive football stadiums have too many empty seats, rest assured that shaming will make a comeback. Boys who shun football may even inspire the return of the once- popular refrain:

"You're not a fag, are you?"

Bigotry is on the rise on college campuses

Tim Patten · 10 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Many would agree that sexism and racism remain serious and, in some cases a growing concern. However, those being discriminated against are not the ones that feminists and other alleged advocates for equal rights have traditionally focused their attentions and efforts on. Instead, the group being victimized is straight white men.

There is plenty of evidence to suggest that males are being mistreated—and yet, for some strange reason, many seem to find this totally acceptable. Ironically, one such example includes a ban on straight white men at the United Kingdom's equality conference of the University and College Union, reported by the Daily Mail in June 2016. But this was not an isolated event. Reports suggest that such developments are commonplace, for instance, on college campuses in the U.K., U.S. and elsewhere.

Simply put, white heterosexual men are blameworthy and deserve to be excluded.

Indeed, a flagrant hatred of men has been flourishing, aided by corrosive and self-serving narratives that are now sanctioned by governments, big businesses and the educational establishment. One early example includes a development caught on video on November 16, 2012 by the Canadian Association for Equality. Violent feminists disrupted a gathering of men at the University of Toronto who had come together to discuss male suicide and other issues. The protestors clashed with attendees, spitting and hurling vitriol at them for no apparent reason. A repeat of social justice warrior bigotry was on display on September 16, 2015 at a Milo Yiannopoulos event at Texas Technical Institute caught on video.

While other similar developments have not been memorialized in the same way, they all have something in common: they reflect a cancerous malady of ignorance and abhorrence that is becoming increasingly widespread. An intolerant alt-left now feels free and is openly encouraged to hurl hate speech at and commit acts of gender discrimination against white heterosexual men. It is a campaign aimed at dehumanizing an entire cross-section of people who happen to have one thing in common.

Disgust toward men has been a strong undercurrent in women's studies programs, but its tone and intensity began to escalate after the 2012 killing of Trayvon Martin and the subsequent shootings of unarmed young black men by white police. Third-wave feminists and Black Lives Matter activists tossed their misguided notions about patriarchy and male privilege into a bowl and mixed them with incendiary half-truths about white privilege from African American studies programs. They created a concoction of racial division, provoking a surge in the lines of hatred against white males.

In some ways, this radical blend resembles the final solution of Nazi Germany's Adolph Hitler, though in this case the group that is supposed to get annihilated is not the Jews but white heterosexual men. Instead of working to create the progressive world they claim to espouse, the alt-left is looking more and more like the next generation of right-wing oppressors and dictators. Their minions are encouraged to go forth and spew blatant disrespect, telling white men to "Check your privilege!"

Sadly, this unfortunate turn of events, while originally grounded on the principle of equality and justice for all, has been transformed into a roadmap of rage, retribution and revenge, without any basis in fact.

Women's studies and white privilege

The extent to which things have gone awry can be seen in a popular anthology about racial bias. In White Privilege, women's studies author and Senior Fellow at the City University of New York's Murphy Institute, Paula S. Rotenberg maintains that this imbalance is manufactured and socially invisible but that its consequences are lethal. She argues that whiteness is a social construct and scolds whites for refusing to acknowledge that they benefit from a form of racism. She suggests they can't see their privilege because they are accustomed to it, like fish that are unaware they live in water.

In her view, white men must give up their unfair advantages as reparations; whatever benefits their whiteness has afforded them must be sacrificed for the sake of social justice. Citing the example of a white and a black worker exerting the same amount of time and effort doing the same job, but where the latter is paid less, Rotenberg says that racial inequality is intolerable on its face because it leads to serious economic and other harm.

But as with many of her ilk, Paula S. Rotenberg falls into a trap in regard to cause and effect. Is it possible that this "discrimination" does not stem from racial differences, but from something else? Even though racism clearly exists, doesn't success depend on personal choices and how people manage their lives? Is race the reason why some succeed and others don't, or might it also have something to do with other factors, including attitude, intelligence–or even luck?

The greatest civilizations of all time

The same holds true when it comes to other physical differences. Most feminist scholars seem unable to broaden the lens through which they view the world. When they focus their attentions, they see only a black-and-white hierarchy, so to speak, based on gender, skin color or social caste. And yet, if they took pains to look at things less myopically, they might learn some interesting truths about race and opportunity–truths revealed through an assessment of the greatest civilizations of all time.

In particular, they would discover that ancient Egypt; the Chola Dynasty; and the Roman, Persian, Chinese, Mayan, Mongol, Inca and Ottoman empires were not only dominated by (mostly male) people of color, but that within each race individuals with lighter skin tones accounted for a disproportionate share of those at the top. All this occurred before the emergence of the British Empire, suggesting that biological preferences, rather than European-originated social constructs, drive the disparity.

In fact, if history is any guide, men of color are born with a natural ability to succeed and move society forward. The incredible Pyramids of Egypt were engineered and constructed by a dark skinned race and majestically awe any sober observer to this day. Once African Americans are freed from the suffocating constraints of victim narratives, they can unleash the kind of energy and drive that inspires communities of all races and colors from within. Thankfully, there are proven ways of ensuring that such individuals can reach their full potential and improve everyone's lives.

Our builders and inventors

Stepping back, it's worth reiterating that misconceptions about physical differences aren't confined to race. Feminists, for instance, conveniently ignore the fact that the engineers and builders of civilizations, kingdoms and nations have been men. They forget that males have harnessed fire, developed water distribution and sewage systems, and have created a vast array of innovative products, services, facilities and technologies that have served us well.

Male leadership, management and labor have helped to forge and sustain a world aimed at lifting people up, rather than keeping them down. Their accomplishments haven't just served selfish purposes. Instead, they appear to have been done out of a deep instinctual respect for tribes, cities and nations. Why, then, are feminists so focused on dismantling a framework that has benefited them–and everyone else?

A genuine alternative to the feminist way

It would be foolish to maintain that sexism, or racism, or any other form of discrimination doesn't exist, of course, or that some groups are not treated worse than others because of physical differences alone. Although progress has been made over several decades, the remnants of past errors and abuses remain. Bigotry, inequality in career opportunities, inner-city poverty, and the fact that blacks are the biggest victims by far of the rise of the incarceration culture would seem to be evidence of that.

Still, most Caucasians are aware there is a deep divide between blacks and whites, arguably stemming from the inhumanity of slavery, one of the deepest social injuries and regrets from our nation's past. In many cases, whites are imbued with “white guilt,” which manifests itself as an urge to reach out and try to redress the imbalance. But that doesn’t justify taking a radical line. Those who have suffered don’t need victimhood to demoralize them or the self-destructive anarchy and violence that third-wave feminists advocate.

Addressing and repairing these problems is a better way to go, though it will no doubt take time and people willing to make the effort together. Sadly, the journey will likely be more arduous and prolonged so long as it is centered on impugning the state, patriarchy, and the propagandists’ favorite object of disgust: white heterosexual men.

One key, of course, is to introduce programs designed to succeed. In inner city communities, this can be done through local churches, organizing and promoting specialized charter schools that serve the needs of boys in grades kindergarten through 12. These schools can foster self-esteem and encourage the youngest members of society to be productive and strong. Single-sex schools, with appropriately tailored learning environments and curricula, offer the best hope of improving achievement and the lives of inner city boys.

It requires organization, schedules and vision to reconstitute neighborhoods. The churches, schools and community leaders should invite a diversity of volunteers and contractors of other races to assist rebuilding neighborhoods and seize on black men’s natural patriarchal and leadership skills. Integrated construction discussions and working together on the building efforts will reduce bigotry while neighborhoods can evolve upwards overtime. Educating the youngest boys in charter schools for boys with civic ideals in mind allows a community to create an army of enlightened individuals and leaders that can pave the way toward economic and structural reform. The secret is not to probe every nook and cranny for signs of racism, but to inspire one another with an intentional future vision of prosperity and peace. Communities should grab hold of the levers and dials that drive their destiny and engage the mechanisms that will lead to a bright and liberated future.

Wimpy men and sexism in birth control

Darren Schlangen · 11 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Recently a new study regarding birth control for men has made the social media rounds. In it, male participants experienced side effects that included depression, mood swings, acne, muscle pain, and increased libido. Due to these side effects, the production of a male birth control shot requires further testing.

The standard reaction making its way through feminist circles is that these side effects are very similar to the ones women already experience by the legally available birth control pill. It was even mocked in a recent Daily Show segment where the correspondent Michelle Wolf said, “Men are such little bitches,” and “You guys call that ‘side effects.’ I call that day four of a fairytale period,” and “Side effects are the only area where women earn more than men.”

Evidence of the patriarchy has presented itself in the form of a double standard for acceptable side effects of birth control. However, this is far from the whole story. A quick read of the press release put out by the researchers reveals that it isn’t so much the nature of the side effects that makes the shot “unsafe” but the frequency of those side effects. For the knee-jerk apples to apples comparison from feminists to be accurate, not only would both the shot and the pill have to cause mood swings and acne, but they would both have to cause them at relatively the same rate.

Overall, a study that compared the birth control patch with the pill found a serious adverse event rate of 2%. Meanwhile, according to an article by Vox, in the men’s shot study, “Nearly a quarter of participants experienced pain at the injection site, nearly half got acne, more than 20 percent had a mood disorder, 38 percent experienced an increased sexual drive, and 15 percent reported muscle pain. Other, rarer side effects included testicular pain, night sweats, and confusion.” All told, 20 men dropped out of the study because of these side effects. One participant even committed suicide, though researchers determined the birth control to be unrelated.

Taking acne as an example, the pill reduces it for 70% of women and the Mirena IUD has a rate of only 6.8% of acne. While, as Vox pointed out, 50% of men experienced acne with the shot. This disparity undercuts the simplistic comparison being made by feminists. If they looked soberly at the findings of this study and truly cared about equality of the sexes, they should feel excited about the progress being made towards a male birth control option while still wanting it to be as safe as reasonably possible before it’s publicly available.

Among the other reactions on social media, some have pointed out the unethical testing done to approve the female birth control pill 50 years ago. “I would just like to point out,” one poster wrote, “that the recent conversation surrounding the male birth control trials isn’t just ‘lol weak men can’t deal with side effects’ it’s the fact that when they were testing hormonal birth control for women in the 50s and 60s, the side effects were much worse, and the women who participated in them, mostly in Puerto Rico, were not told about the side effects or that the drug was experimental.”

They aren’t wrong about the history. In order to circumvent the illegality of contraceptives in much of the U.S. at the time, testing was done on subjects in Puerto Rico. These women – who were poor and illiterate – could barely communicate with the researchers. They weren’t told that the pills were part of a clinical trial or what the risks entailed. Being a high-dose version of the modern pill, the side effects were similar to those experienced today but more severe. Included among these were nausea, bloating, weight gain, depression, loss of libido, and severe mood changes. The most significant, however, was blood clotting which resulted in three deaths of test subjects. Deemed 100 percent effective, these serious side effects were ignored and the FDA approved the pill for severe menstrual disorders, not as a contraceptive.

A brief history allows for what is missing from the simplistic comparison being made online: context. As unethical as these tests may have been in the formation of the original female birth control pill, the standards of testing and ethics have surely changed over the course of a 50 year span. It is not fair to draw a comparison between the testing done at that time with the testing done today, which to feminists appears to have been done with kids gloves.

Ironically, the pill was fought for and championed by feminists of the time. Gregory Pincus, the scientist behind the pill, received $40,000 in research funding from the women's rights activist Katherine McCormick. The goal of feminists like McCormick and Margaret Sanger with her was to give women greater sexual liberation. Now, a woman could choose when, where, and with whom to have a child. After this controversial pill with its adverse side effects was approved, McCormick went to the doctor with a prescription for the pill at the age of 80. Not intending to use it, this was a symbolic moment of her accomplishment for women around the country.

This historic accomplishment, perhaps much to the dismay of their deceased forebears, is now shown as proof of patriarchal oppression by contemporary feminists. Most feminists take the new angle that access to birth control isn't liberating but rather a burden. The advent of male birth control isn't a time for men to finally have more control over when, where, and with whom they have a child but a time for them to bear the "burden" of uncomfortable side effects. Through the lens of the patriarchy, the pill was not created by and for women it was created by and for men. As the logic of the patriarchy becomes twisted, it falls back upon itself when it sees a feminist success as proof of systemic male domination.

Forged with good intentions, the original pill had a complicated and sometimes unethical history. Ultimately, however, women clamored for it. The demand was clearly there. If it is now a curse and not a blessing, women only have feminists to blame and not the patriarchy. 75% of men who were involved in this study wanted to continue receiving the shot in spite of the increased amount of side effects they faced.

The demand is there, too. For 50 years, men have not had a better option than the condom. For 50 years, men have had to rely on women to take the pill, trust in their consistent use of it for effectiveness, and believe them when they said they were on it. Men are now where women were 50 years ago, clamoring for a means of achieving confidence and sexual liberation through control of their reproductive choices in spite of any known side effects.

Maybe one day, when a future generation takes the male option for granted, we will hear men complaining of its burden just as women do now. We just haven't caught up yet. That is the real story.

Sources:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/entry/male-birth-control-rant-is-funniest-most-infuriating-thing-youll-see-today_us_5819c21ce4b00f11fc5cb655 http://www.vox.com/2016/11/2/13494126/male-birth-control-study http://www.pbs.org/wnet/need-to-know/health/a-brief-history-of-the-birth-control-pill/480/

http://www.conrad.org/news-pressreleases-121.html

http://www.npr.org/sections/health-shots/2014/10/07/354103536/the-great-bluff-that-lead-to-a-magical-pill-and-a-sexual-revolution

CNN: Women are better doctors

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

… but are they?
Our very own Lucian Vâlsan argues that that's hardly the case and the evidence is nowhere near as convincing as the press would make it.
And no, the fact that it comes from a "Harvard researcher" isn't particularly impressive in and of itself at all.

A thorough rebuttal of the latest Harvard "study" on the matter:

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative here.

Why I am not a feminist

Kalidasa Devadatta · 13 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I am genetically and socially male. I was raised almost exclusively by women. My biological father vanished from my life before I was old enough to remember him; the stepfather I acquired at age three had little to do with me, and was gone before I turned nine. Throughout my childhood, when I wasn't with my mother, I was with my grandmother or aunt. My only male role models were a very few male teachers, and so I saw the world largely through the feminine perspective of my family caretakers. As a result, I was acutely conscious of many of the ways male-dominated society oppressed women in latter twentieth century America; although, like that of my caretakers, my awareness of the manifold forms female oppression continued to grow, at an ever-accelerating pace, as I grew older.

I remember being resentful of many male behaviors: how a man would often lead a woman about by holding her elbow, for example, or make disparaging remarks about female drivers, as well as innumerable other offenses. I was resentful, too, of the obvious male assumption that men were in charge of everything. When I got a little older, and began to realize that I was eventually going to turn into a man, I became embarrassed for my sex, and even more resentful of the rotten behavior of men.

So I was very receptive to concepts of women's liberation and the need for a reform in gender relations when I became old enough to be aware of them. I watched my mother closely as her own consciousness of oppression and its remedies grew and matured, and mine did too in harmony with hers. I learned from her, a professional writer, techniques of non-sexist writing, and techniques of effective feminist social critique. I also learned critical thinking skills from her, and to despise phony revisionist theories of anything, that merely replace one set of errors with another.

Thus, as a teenager, I was all in favor of women's liberation, as we called it then. About the time I went to university I began to hear the word "feminism", used as a seemingly more mature, more scholarly, and more comprehensive term that covered both women's liberation and some vaguely defined worldview from an enlightened female perspective. I felt a twinge of discomfort as soon as I heard the term. "Women's liberation" seemed like a concept every reasonable, enlightened person could support; "feminism", though, had overtones of women going their own way, without regard or connection to the society that nurtured them. However, for the most part I set my doubts aside, supposing that this feminism was a natural extension and elaboration of what had come before, and that if it chose to assert its independence it had good reason to do so.

As time went by, though, I began to see troubling aspects to feminism. First was female consciousness-building, which explicitly excluded men and their voices, fulfilling the promise inherent in the name. It was all about developing and refining a purely female understanding of female experience. As such, it was hard to find fault with; but it was evident that this feminism was no longer a shared exercise to improve society by eliminating obnoxious gender discrimination; it was strictly a women's endeavor, as feminists clearly expressed.

Far more troubling was the tendency that feminists began to evince to appropriate the agendas of other movements opposed to various forms of oppression. In my college years I began to hear from my feminist friends statements like, "Feminism is opposed to racism too; if you're opposed to racism, you're a feminist too." Or, "Oppression of women hurts men too; if you have problems with the way society treats men, you're a feminist!" I paraphrase of course; but this is the gist of what I began to hear from feminists.

I found sentiments like these deeply problematic. First, in that they conflated sexual discrimination with other kinds of discrimination such as racism or economic class discrimination, despite the obvious and significant differences in the respective causative factors. Second, and even more important, they seemed designed to deny an independent voice to movements opposing these other forms of oppression, movements with a history and origin quite independent of feminism. It seemed that feminists wished to bring all liberation struggle narratives under the umbrella of feminism. (This early appropriative tendency has now matured into what we know as "intersectional feminism", a more self-conscious line of thought that, while capable of making useful and valid discoveries about the social structure of oppression, seems principally to function as a way to systematize an ever-expanding sense of victimhood.).

Somewhere around 1980, I began to hear the slogan "pornography is violence against women." At first I thought this was referring to pornography that depicts women as victims of abuse or in degrading roles. But I soon learned that any representation of sexual activity is to be regarded as degrading to women. This seemed repressive, and wrong, to me. I had never had common cause with people who try to leverage their own version of sexual morality to control the behavior of others, and I recognized this anti-sexual rhetoric as an example of the same kind of prudery espoused by fanatical religious zealots. There is of course a theoretical basis for these repressive attitudes to sexual expression (as there is for religious dogma), namely, objectification theory. While objectification theory does offer important insights into gender relations, it is surely a misapplication of the concept to use it as an instrument of sexual repression.

So, at this point, I found myself looking at feminism as a still progressive and needed movement for the empowerment of women, but with growing hegemonic, authoritarian, and sexually repressive tendencies, and notably lacking in the capacity for self-critique or acceptance of external criticism. But as time went on, I found feminists promoting ever more concepts that I regard as misguided, dangerous, false, or ethically reprehensible. So much so that now, when feminist concepts often dominate public policy discourse, and the stated goals of first-wave feminism have been largely achieved in western democracies, I see the present incarnation of the feminist movement as an agent more of harm than of good. Here, in an order roughly corresponding to the order in which they came to my attention, are some of the most important of the difficulties I have discovered in recent mainstream expressions of feminism.

Equality of outcome

In the matter of equality among individuals in respect to their activities and the results thereof, political philosophers have long recognized that equality of opportunity and equality of outcome are antithetical. Given equal opportunity for action, outcomes will necessarily differ among individuals, because people have different aptitudes, interests, and resources; while, if equality of outcome is observed on a wide scale, it necessarily implies restrictions on personal liberty. The loudest voices in the feminist movement speak clearly in favor of equality of outcome. To be fair, they speak mostly to equality of outcome for groups rather than individuals. I agree that, in the absence of some apparent other reason for a discrepancy of outcome between groups, one may suspect discrimination is at play, and this should be researched and corrected if appropriate. On this view, equality of outcome (or rather, its absence) is a tool for discovering discrimination. However, feminism by and large regards equality of outcome as desirable in its own right; a proposition which is both philosophically dubious and in practical terms, authoritarian.

Equality as identity

A related concept to equality of outcome is equality as identity: the proposition that equality must obtain in whatever scope one chooses to focus on. In this way of thinking, what we might call compensatory equality does not count as equality. By "compensatory equality" I mean a situation in which different groups are advantaged in different respects, but their respective advantages are seen as in balance overall (perhaps the simple term "equity" would serve better). This concept of compensatory equality does not receive a warm welcome among feminists. Rather, in whatever scope our examination falls, we must see parity: parity in numbers of corporate CEOs, for example, or parity of lifetime income. This requirement is deeply problematic, since men and women typically and necessarily have different life experiences, aspirations, and biological constraints that make such a rigid version of equality unachievable except through coercive social control.

Identity politics

In the past two or three decades, we have seen the rise of a sociopolitical dogma that defines personal identity primarily in terms of group membership. Mainstream feminism has embraced this dogma fully. The dogma has two problems: it undermines personal freedom and personal accountability; and it is socially divisive, and contributes to the perpetuation of the discriminatory practices and mindsets that it putatively opposes. Where it is applied to race, it is racist; where to gender, it is sexist. Identity politics is a vile perversion of the liberation movements from which it grew.

Victim blaming

Victim blaming has become a favorite theme of mainstream feminism in the past decade or so; it is utterly perverse. According to this sad and sick doctrine, anything that empowers women to address the vicissitudes of life is a moral affront. Women should not need to be empowered, because fairness and equality demand that society be recast in such a way that women do not face challenges. Of course no apologist for the victim blaming concept would put it in these terms, but these are the implications of the doctrine as it is stated. When efforts to teach women to defend themselves, to speak out for themselves, to negotiate equitable salaries, etc., are derided and suppressed on the grounds that they are “blaming the victim”, the implications are clear.

Victim culture

Victim culture is a natural outgrowth of the preceding. When women are taught that they should not try to improve themselves and their situation because it validates their status as victims, how are they not to believe they are victims in every case where things don’t go just as they wish? And how easy is it to extend this culture from women to people of color and to society as a whole? It is very easy; indeed, it is inevitable, and is well underway now.

Rape culture

The concept of rape culture, which supposes that rape is not only insufficiently discouraged in modern developed societies, but is actually celebrated and promoted, is not entirely incorrect, in my view. What I do find objectionable about “rape culture” is its association with “blank slate” theories of human development. It seems to reject out of hand evolutionary influences in gendered behavior. If such influences exist, as they surely do, this rejection inhibits our ability to find practical corrective measures to reduce the incidence of rape. This is a notable case of political dogma rejecting and suppressing science, to the disadvantage of its own stated political goals.

Rape apologists

Continuing the topic of rape, I have seen it become popular for feminists to deride anyone who does not enthusiastically support whatever is the currently most extreme feminist view on rape as a “rape apologist”, as if rape were not an issue about which people of good faith may have nuanced opinions. This zealotry is dishonest, in that it falsely ascribes abhorrent views to its targets, and is hurtful to efforts to reduce rape, in that it discourages open dialog on the topic. It would be easy to dismiss as extremist nonsense were it not such a mainstream tactic. I see no effort on the part of mainstream feminism to disassociate itself from bogus “rape apologist” accusations; rather, it seems to foster them.

Suppression of men’s voices

Feminism has become a powerful voice in conversations about policy; some say it is in fact the dominant voice. Feminists are to be congratulated on this achievement, so long a central goal of their movement. One might expect that, having achieved such a favored position, feminists might be open to a meaningful dialog with men aimed at promoting a society with true gender equality, moving beyond the one-sided notion of gender equality as “equality for women”. Nothing of the sort has occurred. Instead, feminists seem less inclined to listen to a male viewpoint than ever before. Everywhere, efforts by men to organize discussion groups to examine gender issues from a male point of view have been met with violent denunciation and protest by feminists. This, more than anything else, has convinced me that the vanguard of the feminist movement is not interested in gender equality at all, but rather in re-casting society in a feminist, that is to say, gynocentric, paradigm. This is, of course, the stated goal of many radical feminists; but it is clear it pervades the movement to such an extent that nearly every feminist who is willing to take a stand on this issue will stand in opposition to androcentric discourse about gender issues, dialog with male viewpoints about gender issues, and gender equality as assessed by any but exclusively feminist measures.

Patriarchy

That leads us to Patriarchy, or The Way Things Are. Patriarchy theory asserts, not to put too fine a point on it, that society as a whole is of men, by men, and for men. Suffice it to say that I disagree, and that I note the only evidence brought forth in support of Patriarchy theory consists of anecdotal examples of instances in which some women feel put upon, against which any number of similar examples of the plight of men can be adduced. Patriarchy theory is also self-contradictory, in that it asserts society is structured for male benefit, while at the same time claiming, “Patriarchy hurts men too,” as if men were not competent to determine for themselves what is hurting them.

Linguistic appropriation to stifle individual experience and dissent

Here I diverge slightly from the plan I have followed to this point, addressing only my personal experience of feminism, to speak of some objective concepts that underlie my perceptions. I have recently begun to see promoted a new definition, or rather definitional component, of sexism: sexism is said to be “discrimination plus power”, or “prejudice plus power”. (The identical formula is advanced for racism.) It is explained that “power” in this formula refers not to individual power but rather the systemic power of a group. Thus sexism is redefined as a particular instance of institutional sexism. An individual belonging to a group that is seen as sexist by this definitional formula is automatically seen as sexist too, irrespective of his or her attitudes, actions, or degree of personal power.

There can be no question that sexism, racism, and other forms of social discrimination and oppression take on a special character and force when they manifest themselves in institutionalized social norms. However, to restrict the meaning of a general term (e.g., sexism) to a specific, narrow instance of the concept (in this case, institutionalized sexism) is obfuscatory, and is generally not done unless there is some clear advantage to be acquired by doing so. In the present case, no intellectual advantage is visible; but political advantages are apparent, and appear to provide a sufficient motive for the definitional change. Although under this new definition sexism is regarded as a matrix of social structures whose objects and subjects are groups, the term “sexist” is still applied to members of putatively sexist groups, with all the stigma that should attach to individuals whose attitudes or actions are sexist. Conversely, members of non-sexist groups, (i.e., all women) are by definition not sexist, and no stigma attaches to attitudes or actions of those individuals that are discriminatory toward members of a sexist group (broadly, men). The problems with this paradigm are obvious, but I will point out one or two, since they also constitute the political advantages that appear to have motivated the redefinition. The paradigm excuses and validates any sexist behavior or belief on the part of women. It absolves them of personal responsibility in their actions toward men. It tells men that the only way they can be free of the stigma of sexism is by a radical reorganization of society that has feminist dogma as its central principle and that prioritizes the interests of women over other considerations. This restriction of the meaning of a useful general word, to serve the narrow sociopolitical interests of a radical group, is a crass power play. It is dishonest at its core, and seems far removed from genuine efforts to promote gender equality and foster peace between the sexes.

From this catalog of obvious and fairly superficial problems with feminism, I now return briefly to my own experience, taking a step backward in time to the inception of a train of thought that reveals a problem in feminism that is more fundamental, more important, and more dangerous than any I have described so far, although I alluded to it in the preceding paragraph.

.

Somewhere in the mid 1970s I became acquainted with the writings of John Norman, the pen name of a philosophy professor who made a very successful secondary career of writing salacious sci-fi/fantasy novels. I was both appalled and enchanted by Norman’s women-as-chattel vision of an alternative society. While I don’t believe Norman’s vision is in any sense practical or desirable, I mention him here because he did introduce me to a new concept, namely, that our present society is in fact female-dominated, superficial appearances to the contrary notwithstanding. The more I thought about this concept, the more sense it made to me. I began to ask myself, how would men behave if they were freed from the constraints and responsibilities that the presence of women places on them? From consideration of this question it was an easy step to the realization that nearly everything men do in our present society is fundamentally guided or inspired by the need to care for, protect, and please women.

From an evolutionary standpoint it is no surprise at all that this should be so, nor that this need is manifested in the often controlling and oppressive ways that it normally is. Throughout the animal kingdom, females occupy a place reproductive preeminence, since it is they alone that may bear young. The fundamental purpose, indeed the defining purpose, of life is to reproduce itself; the effective contribution to this purpose of any fertile female far exceeds that of any particular male. The fundamental task of the male, in a biological sense, is to provide seed; the species invests far more reproductive capital, so to speak, in the female that must bear the eggs until they are ready for expulsion from her body. Even when eggs are expelled before fertilization, as in certain maritime species, the rule holds true, since the production of eggs requires far more energy than the creation of sperm.

Since, in the vast majority of cases, fertilization occurs inside the female's body, and a great deal of reproductive energy is expended in providing for the development of the eggs, it is hardly surprising that females are also most often the primary nurturers of the young. The male has performed his primary function in providing sperm; he is only useful after that in a sort of evolutionary opportunism. The reproductive mechanism of mammals in particular makes primarily female nurturing of the young the overwhelming norm.

The evolutionary imperative of the male is to maximize the likelihood that his genes will be passed on to the next generation, as is also the case for the female. But especially in mammals, their situations differ. The female invests a tremendous amount of energy in the development of the young within her body; energy that is thus not available to her for other purposes, such as gathering sustenance, self-defense, staying warm, and so forth. It makes evolutionary sense for a male to supply this deficit of energy for females who carry his seed. And in those cases where this evolutionary path has been realized, females thus become a kind of commodity to males. What we must care for, to satisfy our own goals, we will surely also try to control, in an effort to protect our investment of effort. Through the operation of this principle, the human tendency of males to seek control of females necessarily arose.

Earlier I referred to the need to please women as a fundamental motivation for the actions of men. In the context I have just established, it can be seen that "pleasing women" is an adaptive technique for the control of women. Yet, at the same time, it can be seen that the focus of male activity is female; men try to control women because women are the most important factor in the propagation of their genes. Thus men become slaves to the control structures they have developed, and women become a commodity for men. Women, on the other hand, can and do use the male imperative to "please" as a method to mitigate the control men try to place on them. Through this interplay of control mechanisms and evolutionary purposes, women, always at the center of the motions of society, also exert influence that is seldom acknowledged by feminist theorists.

The "commodification" of women is thus an adaptive response to evolutionary pressures. Commodification implies objectification; feminist theorists do recognize this, and call attention to it. Thus it is not socialization alone that leads to the objectification of women, nor a biological propensity of either or both sexes to see women as the prey or property of men, but a complex of adaptive responses to differences in the biological energy budgets of the two sexes. To address this innate problem that leads inexorably to objectification of women, and thus a certain kind of inequality, feminists have attacked both the energy budget problem directly and also the adaptive responses to it.

The effort to expand women's control over their reproductive processes is the primary method used to address the energy budget problem. However, this method is not completely successful in its strategic goals, even where it enjoys tactical success in the sense of providing women access to contraception and enhanced legal reproductive rights. The female human body is disposed by evolution to invest a lot of energy in attributes that will favor the goal of reproductive success, even if the occupant of that body chooses to avoid or restrict the use those attributes. As a result, even athletic, childless females can rarely achieve the capacity for physical work of men of similar age, even of similar size, and habits. Thus equality, at least in the sense of equality of objectification across the sexes, cannot be achieved only by giving women the capacity to control the timing and quantity of their own reproductive activities. While some feminists may cherish some hope of hormonal or other biological innovations that radically reshape the character of human reproduction, a more immediately satisfying recourse is to attack the aforementioned adaptive responses to biological circumstance.

In so doing, feminists are attacking something that, while not strictly speaking a biological imperative, is far more fundamental than cultural mores: it is a set of ecological, adaptive responses that are woven deep into human nature. They attempt to replace the product of millennia of evolutionary change with a system created from the human imagination. We have seen, more than once in recent history, the dangers that attend this sort of exercise. History shows too that it is all too possible that they will succeed, at least in part and for a time. Indeed, they are beginning to succeed now, as we see more and more men divesting themselves of masculinity in some partial fashion, with bad consequences all around. Those who overtly give up masculine virtue become a scourge on society to women and men alike. Those who pretend to give up only masculine vice become ill; they give up much of their virtue as well, and it is as if a bad smell begins to emanate from their thoughts, resulting from the irreconcilable contradictions brewing in their heads. It is not to be expected that a complete success of the feminist program in this domain will produce any happier result; quite the opposite is likely.

In the beginning of this essay I wrote about my experience with discrimination against women by men, and my sympathy with efforts to correct this. The reader who has struggled through my turgid prose to this point may well wonder if any of that sympathy is now left to me, after what may well seem a fairly scathing indictment of everything feminist. The answer is that it remains to me in full. My attitudes toward women and equality of the sexes have not been altered by my gradual enlightenment regarding the chief societal movement to address these two subjects of discord.

My understanding of the objects of my attitudes has however deepened and expanded somewhat in the process. But still, by the notorious dictionary definition of feminist, I must be called a feminist, because I favor equality between the sexes. But I do not call myself a feminist. The dictionary definition of feminist is as useful in understanding the theoretical bases and practical implications of feminism as the definition of Christian as “someone who believes in God” is to an understanding of real-world Christianity; that is, hardly at all. Such definitions serve merely as starting points for research and contemplation, or as handy, imprecise descriptors for use in casual conversation. Many, perhaps most, of the self-proclaimed “feminists” in the world (and almost certainly most of the men) are only feminists in this naïve, thoughtless sense. They may reasonably use the adjective “feminist” to describe their general attitude toward women; but they would be well advised to avoid the noun when referring to themselves.

The Red Pill in Brisbane: a hero's journey

Peter Wright · 15 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill movie evoked a heroic spirit, not only for movie-goers who had to pay in advance to attend a venue they were not even privy to (to keep venue staff safe), and for risking violence (there were gun threats), but also for the organizers who had to skirt the snares and obstacles thrown in their path by a feminist movement that refuses to accept free speech. I will have more to say about the nature of the heroism in a moment but first a mention of the event itself.

It was incredible.

The Red Pill screening took place in Brisbane on a balmy Saturday afternoon, with a full house, and like everyone else who attended I enjoyed it immensely. In fact it was a smash hit with over 90 percent of the audience staying for the Q&A with Paul Elam and Tom Golden which was met with numerous rounds of applause throughout.

One of the more interesting moments at question time was when a feminist took the mic and described how her boyfriend had asked her to come along, one gathers reluctantly on her part, and indicated that while she took the movie and men's issues to heart she also felt the antifeminist tone of the MRM would turn women away from joining the cause. She asked Paul and Tom to speak to that concern.

While Paul and Tom could have eviscerated feminists and the feminist worldview, they instead treated her with a degree of gentleness and by doing so demonstrated the integrity of the MRM. No "angry" men's rights advocate in sight. Instead they welcomed her question, but underlined that feminists are more concerned with silencing men's voices than supporting them, as evidenced by the secrecy required to host the Brisbane screening in the first place, which negates the possibility of dialogue. Paul and Tom underlined the feminist movement's non-alignment with the dictionary definition of equality-seeking, with Paul adding, in contrast to the feminist position, that the theme of the upcoming ICMI17 is "Building bridges between men and women in the 21st Century."

That particular exchange brought a tear to my eye even though I have no sympathy for feminists….. guess you could say it set a conciliatory tone in the room, one that would have won several hearts in the audience.

Rather than go over the wonderful scenes in this movie, which have been covered by other reviewers, I'd like to spend the rest of this piece talking about Cassie's journey while making the Red Pill – a moment she describes in an interview with Steve Brule as having traversed a 'Hero's Journey' – referring to the cycle laid out by the late scholar of religion Joseph Campbell as in the chart below:

Campbell discovered this basic cycle underlying all narratives about the world's religious and mythological heroes : journeys of the Buddha, Moses, Indra, Mohamed, Zarathustra, King Arthur, etc, and he also saw the cycle at work in the lives of everyday men and women; in both the short ordeals we face in the passing weeks and months, and in the longer epic struggles that can take a lifetime to complete. Here is Cassie's account of her adventure:

> Something that really helped me through the editing process was, I was about two thirds of the way through editing and I was just hitting a brick wall, I just couldn't figure out how to make this film round out, and one of my close friends said to look into 'The Hero's Journey' by Joseph Campbell, and I hadn't been aware of Joseph Campbell, I wasn't aware of the hero's journey. And so I started researching it and I found out that my video diaries were the hero's journey. And I never knew about the hero's journey, my diaries are the rawest, real version of what happened on my journey and there was nothing scripted or foreseen about how I need this film to conclude or anything. It was my real, honest to God process that I went through.
>
> And so I went exactly through this process, so that was then my guide to complete the film: it was ok then, to complete the film I've shown where I was in my comfort/safety place, which was feminism; I embark on this journey that I get some advice from elders, you know giving you some sort of tool with which to embark on this journey, and I think maybe the person who led my on this journey was my maybe Warren Farrell – I met him pretty early on and he gave me some information about how to keep calm when you start learning this new information, and he also forewarned what he went through with being ostracized from his friends and family and colleagues within feminism.
>
> So then I embarked on this journey with all these trials and errors, and my trials and errors were meeting all the different interviews and learning the topics and being resistant to a lot of what i was hearing about domestic violence and fathers issues and false accusations and circumcision and, ynow, all these different trials I went through; and eventually now having to leave this kind of wonderland unknown men's rights movement I was researching and go back to where I started, which was going back to my friends and family trying to tell them what learned – the magical elixir from the hero's journey – and this is what I've learned, that we need to address men's issues, we need to be open about the big picture, what's really happening.
>
> And I also started to put a magnifying glass on my own ideological beliefs with feminism and wondering why are we so resistant to to addressing men's issues, where does the root of that problem come from, and i believe patriarchy theory is a big thing – believing women are oppressed by men is a major reason why people are resistant to talk about men's issues.
>
> So when I applied the hero's journey to my video diaries and to the footage I had, I realized that I actually did go on a hero's journey!

We can see from Cassie's journey that it does align with the heroic journey described by Campbell, a story of bravery of going into the unknown, not knowing what she would find, and staying true to the adventure.

Cassie's description clearly aligns with the hero cycle laid out in the diagram above. As much as the documentary is a story about the men's rights movement, it is equally her journey from feminism to humanism. The implications of Cassie's journey have implications for all of us; for many who go to see the film will go on a similar journey, from ignorance to understanding, and from bigotry to compassion. In the light of Cassie's journey Campbell has something to say to us from beyond the grave:

> Furthermore, we have not even to risk the adventure alone; for the heroes of all time have gone before us; the labyrinth is thoroughly known; we have only to follow the thread of the hero-path. And where we had thought to find an abomination, we shall find a god; where we had thought to slay another, we shall slay ourselves; where we had thought to travel outward, we shall come to the center of our own existence; and where we had thought to be alone, we shall be with all the world. [The Hero With A Thousand Faces]

With that I'd like to end by extending a big thank you to the organizers, to John Lambert, Bryan Scandrett, and Robert Brockway of Men's Rights Brisbane – heroes who endured more obstacles than most, including threats, many closed doors, lack of sleep, and risking their own money and skin to pull this off when there were no certainties of success. In light of their gutsy work I'd like to finish with one more quote from Joseph Campbell;

> The modern hero, the modern individual who dares to heed the call and seek the mansion of that presence with whom it is our whole destiny to be atoned, cannot, indeed must not, wait for his community to cast off its slough of pride, fear, rationalized avarice, and sanctified misunderstanding. 'Live,' Nietzsche says, 'as though the day were here.' It is not society that is to guide and save the creative hero, but precisely the reverse. And so every one of us shares the supreme ordeal—carries the cross of the redeemer—not in the bright moments of his tribe's great victories, but in the silences of his personal despair. [The Hero With A Thousand Faces]

For those who dare to hear the call to adventure, we'd love to see you at the International Conference on Men's Issues, coming soon to the Gold Coast in Australia.

Red Pill Movie Brisbane Q & A January 14 2017

Paul Elam · 16 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Intro to Men’s Issues

Tom Golden · 18 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This video was created 10 years ago. I have added an Epilogue that takes a brief look at the carnage left since this video was first created.- Tom Golden

Why feminism wants to dismantle the family

Nikita Coulombe · 19 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Like many isms before it (Communism, religions, cults), feminism seeks to dismantle the traditional family unit for its own gain. Why? To the ism, old loyalties are like bad habits interfering with an individual's ability to pledge unwavering allegiance. Isms want control, but families tend to put family members and their needs before the demands of the ism, reducing the ism's power and influence and therefore undermining its control.

Throughout history, the family has been "the ultimate and only consistently subversive organization… the enduring permanent enemy of all hierarchies, churches and ideologies," notes Ferdinand Mount, author of The Subversive Family.

Mount describes the sequence past isms have followed once they "have hardened into orthodoxies:"

First, hostility and propaganda to devalue family. The family is a source of trouble. It could distract apostles or potential apostles from following the new idea. The family is second-best, pedestrian, material, selfish. Alternative families are promoted—communes, party cadres, kibbutzes, monasteries.

Feminist icons have not tried to hide their antipathy for the family unit:

- Gloria Steinem described marriage as "an arrangement for one and a half people."
- Kate Millett wrote, "so long as every female, simply by virtue of her anatomy, is obliged, even forced, to be the sole or primary caretaker of childhood, she is prevented from being a free human being."
- Linda Gordon said, "the nuclear family must be destroyed… Whatever its ultimate meaning, the break-up of families now is an objectively revolutionary process."
- Robin Morgan said "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage."
- Mary Jo Bane said, "in order to raise children with equality, we must take them away from families and communally raise them."
- Vivian Gornick said, "being a housewife is an illegitimate profession… The choice to serve and be protected and plan towards being a family maker is a choice that shouldn't be. The heart of radical feminism is to change that."
- Helen Sullinger said, "We must work to destroy [marriage]… The end of the institution of marriage is a > necessary condition for the liberation of women. Therefore it is important for us to encourage women to leave their husbands and not to live individually with men… All of history must be rewritten in terms of oppression of women."

You'd think women seeking high-powered careers would be glad to enjoy less competition from other potential workers…

"Not if you understand the feminist ideology," say Suzanne Venker and the late Phyllis Schlafly, authors of The Flipside of Feminism, Feminists realize all too well that they can never achieve a level playing field in the marketplace as long as their male competitors have the advantage of homemaker wives… Women on the left know that in order to get ahead more easily, they must deprive men of their advantage in having stay-at-home wives. The desire to eliminate the full-time homemaker has been feminists' goal all along. The need for a second income was never the goal.

Feminism has made some "progress" over the last several decades. If you look at the poorest and least socially mobile areas in America, you will notice one variable consistently lacking: fathers. More specifically, mothers who are married to the father of their children. Over the last few decades, the birth rate for unmarried women in the US has risen steadily from 18 percent in 1980 to 41 percent in 2012.

Alarmingly, the majority of moms believe that absent or uninvolved dads can easily be replaced themselves or another man (see here and here) despite the evidence that stable marriages lead to happy, healthy, and motivated kids, which leads to stronger communities, more opportunities, and greater equality:

- Physical health: Compared with children in intact, married families, children in cohabiting households (one parent and their girlfriend or boyfriend) are more likely to have a physical or mental health condition and are three times more likely to suffer physical, sexual, or emotional abuse. Unhappy couples have depressed immune systems and their children have elevated stress Stress is regulated by social systems; the brain regions involved in social relationships are the same ones that control stress response. They develop together, and therefore development problems in the stress response can interfere with the development of social and emotional functioning and vice versa.
- Mental health: Children raised by single moms are more likely to be on ADHD medication and are more likely to need professional treatment for emotional or behavioral problems (see here and here). As adults, children who grew up with married parents are less likely to have mental health problems (especially true for daughters).
- Poverty: Both physical and mental health are influenced by socio-economic status. Children of single parents (4 out of 5 of which are women) are far more likely to grow up in poverty and have lower rates of upward mobility than children of married parents (see here, here, here). The current welfare system discourages single mothers from establishing a stable two-parent household despite a portion of welfare funds allocated to promote this kind of family structure. This is because women who marry or maintain a home with the biological father of their children can face the reduction or loss of their benefits. In turn, children who grow up on welfare are more likely to grow up and be on welfare themselves, continuing the cycle.
- Teen pregnancy and crime: Daughters of single mothers are more likely to engage in early sexual behavior and become teen moms, which, in turn, makes them more likely to rely on welfare and their children less likely to grow up with their fathers. The majority of inmates grew up without their fathers (see here and here).
- Drugs and alcohol: Children of single parents have significantly higher rates of drug use. Teens who have less than three family dinners a week are four times more likely to use tobacco, more than twice as likely to use alcohol, two-and-a-half times more likely to use marijuana, and nearly four times likelier to engage in future drug use.
- School: Children of married parents have fewer learning disabilities; score higher in reading, higher in verbal and problem-solving skills, better on most academic measures, and better on the majority of social competence measures. Children who grow up without fathers are less likely to attend college (especially true for sons).

- Future income: One of the longest running studies on adult development, the Harvard Grant Study, found that men that had warm childhoods—those who had close relationships with their parents (who were married) and at least one sibling—make 50 percent more money than their peers who grew up with separated parents or in hostile households.

Given the information above, it could be argued that if feminism actually cared about helping all women, it would advocate for father involvement, so no daughter would grow up disadvantaged and every son would be a strong and capable partner to those daughters. Yet, while feminism purports itself to be the movement for equality, it is at best silent when it comes to father's rights.

In fact, feminist organizations have opposed efforts for equal custody. For example, Marc Angelucci, an attorney and member of the National Coalition For Men told me:

In 2005 we introduced a joint custody bill [in California], but feminist groups opposed it and lobbied various other groups like the state bar to oppose it. Feminist groups like California National Organization for Women have fought us not only on joint custody but also on paternity fraud legislation, move away issues, and inclusion of male victims of domestic violence in state funded services.

Why would feminists try to prevent father involvement—the very thing that insulates against poverty and inequality? Because, they can profit from it! There would be no more need for the vast network of nonprofit organizations, not to mention life-long careers (and paychecks), which only exist because enough people bought into and continue to buy into the myth that women have it worse off than men (that myth debunked here).

Feminism needs gendered issues. Feminism doesn't want you to know that women are about as likely to abuse their partner as men (see here and here) or that boys are at least as likely to suffer sexual abuse as girls (see here, here and here) because it would impact their funding.

It is not in feminist institutions' best interest to solve anything. In order to maintain a steady flow of cash, they now seek to preserve their own existence by perpetuating myths and inventing problems where there are none to reassure their followers that there is still an "us" and a "them." Sexist pockets anyone?

Intact families, married mothers and especially stay-at-home-married-moms are feminism's number one enemy. Here are a few reasons why:

1. Whereas feminism minimizes the role of nature, telling us that the differences between the sexes comes down to social conditioning, mothers notice innate differences between boys and girls. Psychologist Steven Pinker may have said it best: "It is said that there is a technical term for people who believe that little boys and little girls are born indistinguishable and are molded into their natures by parental socialization. The term is 'childless.'"
2. Married women tend to vote conservative while unmarried women tend to vote liberal (see here and here). Liberal votes = more $ for feminism. And more feminism = more liberal votes. It's not a coincidence that former President Obama created a White House Council on Women and Girls but refused to create a White House Council on Men and Boys.

3. Married women are happier! A recent survey revealed that unmarried and working mothers are less happy than married and non-working mothers.

Over the past few decades, as technology liberated women, feminism told women, “you can have it all,” emphasizing equal rights while minimizing equal responsibilities. Of course, no one can have it all, but “trade offs” doesn’t sell as well. And women can’t hear what men don’t say; men didn’t tell women that work is often mind-numbing and unfulfilling. In order to dislodge homemaker wives from their families, feminism devalued their role (i.e. telling married women they’re half a person). Thinking men got the better deal, many stay-at-home moms were resentful, and divorce rates accelerated. Today, women ask for 7 out of 10 divorces (see here and here).

After divorce, these moms, while happy they had kids, express regret about their choices. They wish they had maintained a career so that when they separated they weren’t in such a tough position, having been out of the workforce for too many years to readily catch up with their peers. These moms then send inconsistent messages to their daughters; on the one hand they say they wouldn’t trade their kids for anything, but on the other hand they send the message that a career is more sustainable than having a family.

The deeper message that is passed on is guilt; when moms talk about how their lives would have been different (better) had they stayed in the workforce or communicate to their daughters that they do not want them to repeat “their mistakes,” they are indirectly telling their children that their existence is part of the mistakes, and has impeded the success they could have had. Thus the children must live according to her wishes as a form of payback.

Combined with the slew of celebrity mothers, such as Sofía Vergara, Gwyneth Paltrow and Heidi Klum, being toted as "superwomen" who do it all and have it all, and still look hot at 40 and 50 years old, feminism's messages implanted via Mom leaves ordinary young women feeling anxious and confused, and eventually leaves them feeling disappointed when they realize they won't have it all—and not even much of what they had imagined and told their lives would and should be.

The problem with these messages given to young children is that they erode the underlying beliefs necessary for a trusting and caring relationship to be built around. In short, it's divorce training.

Daughters who do not take on a full-time career can feel like they are betraying their mother's wishes. They don't want to be vulnerable with their partners and pull away when conflict arises, thinking about plan B. Sons observe their mothers and wonder if they'll ever be able to make a woman happy; how could they when Dad failed miserably in doing so?

On the other side of this sad ledger are all the dads who have watched their marriages disintegrate into a series of alimony and child-support payments. In one long-term study, just 10 to 15 percent of men won in custody battles. The ones who win are usually the ones who can afford lawyers. Even then, many men end up feeling like they are spending their lives working for people who have been turned against them. Some even go to prison for falling behind on child support payments—for example, in South Carolina, 1 out of 7 inmates is there for that very reason.

Obviously, this path we are headed down is unsustainable. If enough men opt out or get put in prison, we're all screwed. Men, like all people, respond to incentives. Why should they participate in and contribute to a system that doesn't reward them?

Self-marriage is where we're headed if these trends continue. This illustration might as well be called "Feminist Party 2025"

One could argue that feminism is now on the cusp between the first sequence Ferdinand Mount outlined and the second, which is:

Reluctant recognition of the strength of the family. Despite all official efforts to downgrade the family, to reduce its role and even to stamp it out, men and women obstinately continue not merely to mate and produce children but to insist on living in pairs together with their children, to develop strong affections for them and to place family concerns above other social obligations.

If feminism follows a similar path to the isms that came before it, it will die a slow death. Mount describes what usually happens next:

- Third, collapse of efforts to promote the alternative pseudo-families. Communes, crèches, kibbutzes, monasteries and nunneries lose the enthusiasm of their founders and decay. Either their numbers dwindle, or their members become cynical and corrupt, or both.
- Fourth, a one-sided peace treaty is signed. The Church or State accepts the enduring importance of the family and grants it a high place in the orthodox dogma or ideology. That does not mean the family is allowed to live its natural life. On the contrary, the Church or State still insists on defining what is good for the family and what makes a Good Family.
- Fifth, history is re-written to show that the Church or State always held this high conception of the family. The family is redefined as essentially Christian, or Communist, or Fascist or whatever—despite the fact that the earliest apostles are on record as having loathed and despised the family.
- Sixth, the family gradually manages to impose its own terms. The constricting, unnatural or impractical terms which were forced upon it gradually buckle under continuous social pressure—until the guardians of Church or State have no choice but to yield, while busily continuing to rewrite history and to maintain that the new concessions were always somehow implicit in the True Faith.

Interestingly, Mount's sequence resembles the five stages of grief, outlined by psychiatrist Elisabeth Kübler-Ross:

1. Denial (propaganda)

2. Anger (hostility)
3. Bargaining (treaties)
4. Depression (loss of enthusiasm)
5. Acceptance (family imposes its own terms, history is re-written)

At some point, when feminism alienates enough of its less radical members with its increasing irrationality and unsubstantiated claims, when the system can no longer support feminism's constant consumption without contribution, it will be forced to move from denial and anger into the "bargaining" stage.

Looking at feminism through this lens, one wonders what feminism is grieving. My sense is that feminism is grieving the fact that it does not control mother nature. The instances where feminism accepts biological differences as a factor in outcomes are instances where feminism can benefit. Otherwise, feminism refuses to acknowledge that female and male brains have differences and that our different hormones drive us to have different preferences and approaches. But by telling women they must live as men do and compete with men, feminism has set itself up to fail, because male biology is advantaged over female biology in a capitalistic system.

It's no wonder then, that feminism is a thinly veiled version of Marxism, blaming the "patriarchy" in place of capitalism. Perhaps it wouldn't be such a problem if women perceived there to be enough "good men" to go around. But reading men's forums, it now seems like there are no longer enough "good women" to go around, giving both sexes little incentive to compromise or improve themselves.

One wild card that has prolonged the denial and anger stages and will continue to prolong all the other stages are technological and medical advances such as the birth control pill. None of the other isms had that variable, or the prospect of artificial wombs.

Yet, even with "equalizing" technology that asserts control over mother nature, it is likely women and men will still want to have sex with each other and live together. Which makes me wonder who or what is really behind the movement, since the trajectory of feminism doesn't improve the dynamic between women and men in the long-run. I guess, the who or what probably doesn't really matter, because the result will be the same—a divided population that can be easily conquered.

If you wanted to divide a population for your own gain, a great way would be to tell one half that the other half is willfully oppressing them, and then make the former believe that they are inherently better people than the latter, that the latter is untrustworthy and doesn't deserve to be in charge. Another way would be to infiltrate the education system – in 1968 liberal professors outnumbered conservative professors at a ratio of about 3 to 1 on college campuses; today they outnumber conservative professors 12 to 1.

While feminism in the West may be approaching the bargaining stage, the denial and anger stages are being exported around the world. Because feminism divides men and women and keeps poor people poor, it is an ideal ideology to impose on developing nations in order to continue to exploit and control them, all under the guise of liberation and justice.

Michelle Obama says 62 million girls are not in school. Never mind investing anything in those girls' brothers and future husbands, because disenfranchised groups of men with nothing to lose has always ended well…

Feminism could also be a tool to push for open borders. As social trust decreases (see here, here and here), more men are choosing not to marry and are opting out of workforce. Currently 1 out of 6 young men is not employed or is incarcerated—a 45 percent increase over the last three decades. This decline justifies an increased need for more immigrants, especially as women's fertility levels stay below "replacement" rate.

So what are we to do? For men, first consider these statements:

Next, consider what D.H. Lawrence wrote in A Propos of Lady Chatterley's Lover:

It is marriage, perhaps, which has given man the best of his freedom, given him his little kingdom of his own within the big kingdom of the State, given him his foothold of independence on which to stand and resist an unjust State… Do we then want to break marriage? If we do break it, it means we all fall to a far greater extent under the direct sway of the State.

You have a choice to improve the system, or walk away from the system and perhaps get slightly less taken advantage of. You can mentor the younger generation, or let them flounder. The latter option will indirectly create more adherents to feminism, making life even more difficult for the next generation of men.

For women, it is my hope that those reading this will be open to considering whether or not feminism is truly serving their best interests and the greater good, whether compelling women to live like men is productive or damaging, whether creating a culture of victimhood is empowering or just a way to excuse personal responsibility and accountability (which I think actually build confidence in one's abilities). When everyone is a victim, who will pick up the tab?

I believe it is technology, not feminism, that has and will continue to do more to liberate women than anything else. The Internet in particular will continue to open up a multitude of opportunities and flexibility that only existed as some far off ream decades ago. I for one, hope we get our act together before we collapse under the weight of our short-term thinking and selfishness.

The Red Pill: Live from Norwich

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Humans: tournament or pair-bonding species?

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The question of whether humans are sexually dimorphic tournament pecies, or rather a pair-bonding species with less difference between the sexes is taken up here by biologist Robert Sapolsky. The question is relevant to MRAs, MGTOW and basically anyone with an interest in the big gender questions that plague our world today.

Instead of the old conundrum of nature vs. nurture, we have an altogether different one dogging debate – that between nature and nature; ie. between tournament and pairbonding explanations of human behavior.

Dr. Joel R. Kramer of Philadelphia, PA, “Known Genital Mutilator” and manipulator

Gary Costanza · 20 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Joel R. Kramer has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He became known to us as the mutilator of baby boys when a “regret mom” appeared in a video calling out Dr. Kramer as a promoter of circumcision who pressured her to consent without vital information about its risks, efficacy, and ethicacy.

Here’s the video:

I’ll ask the doctor the same questions as the mom above along with some of her quotes:

Why were you so concerned about her son’s penis?

Why were you so dead set on promoting circumcision, but with no information given? Why no info?

She said no to circumcision, why ask again?

“No conversation – ever – about circumcision.”

“I think they’re practicing their religion on my son”

“I was blindsided – it was coercion.”

‘I feel betrayed by the doctor, the nurses, the country, and other moms.’

“It was all about manipulation.” “How dare you fast talk me?” “I have to do something about this.”

She complained to the hospital and met face to face with the nursing supervisor; “I think I taught them something.”

“End this.” “Name the names.” “Make it public.”

“With what I know now, I wish I could go back and embarrass that doctor.”

Done and done.

From Dr. Kramer’s website, Kramer OB/GYN and Associates:

> When it comes to choosing an OB/GYN, you want a doctor who is not only well qualified, but also caring, dedicated and attentive to your needs. Kramer OB/GYN provides all that and more. Our full spectrum of exceptional care ranges from pre-pregnancy through post delivery, and covers gynecological care for every stage of your life. Advanced women’s care with the personal touch and one-on-one attention you want—combined with the level of care you deserve.
>
> Dr. Kramer is board certified in Obstetrics & Gynecology with an interest in cervical pathology. He earned his medical degree from Des Moines University College of Osteopathic Medicine and completed his internship > and residency at Albert Einstein Medical Center. Dr. Kramer loves golfing and attending Phillies games, where his daughter is a ball girl.

As the mother in the video above testified, Dr. Kramer was NOT "attentive" to her needs, but manipulated her into consenting to surgery that she knew nothing about, and as an OB/GYN he doesn't have the training to perform delicate surgery – albeit unnecessary – on baby boys.

From "Find a Physician" at Holyredeemer.com:

> As a Catholic healthcare provider, Holy Redeemer expects that all health care practitioners adhere to the Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services at health system locations. We are committed to maintaining the highest professional standards while promoting our commitment to human dignity and the common good.

Perhaps Dr. Kramer or Holy Redeemer can explain how an unnecessary amputation of part of a baby's genitals is an ethical Catholic directive that promotes "human dignity and the common good?"

'Regret mom' mentions the religious aspect of the push to circumcise, but none of it makes sense. For many years, only Muslims and Jews were 'marked' by circumcision for religious reasons, with Christians left intact, I guess also for religious reasons. Why Christians began circumcising and also claiming the high ground (above) is just beyond understanding.

Further on, we read "Our Mission:"

> OUR MISSION & VALUES
> As a Catholic Health System, rooted in the tradition of the Sisters of the Holy Redeemer, we Care, Comfort, and Heal following the example of Jesus, proclaiming the hope God offers in the midst of human struggle.
>
> OUR VISION
> Holy Redeemer is a community-based integrated health and social service delivery and financing system sponsored by The Sisters of the Holy Redeemer. In a caring and compassionate manner, we will create innovative programs and services to enable people to live their lives to the fullest, while exceeding the expectations of all we serve. This will be accomplished by excelling at partnering and using resources effectively.

How ironic that their mission and vision of "the hope God offers in the midst of human struggle" and "services to enable people to live their lives to the fullest" involves baby boys 'struggling' against adults with scalpels that prevent them from living "their lives to the fullest."

> OUR VALUES
>
> Respect — We revere all life as sacred and value each person as one created by God.
> Compassion — We practice empathy towards each other, creating a healing presence in times of pain and struggle.
> Hospitality — We welcome the stranger, guests and each other in a friendly and generous manner.
> Holistic Care — We are attentive and responsive to the needs of the whole person: physical, spiritual, emotional and social.
> Collaboration — We work jointly and cooperatively, networking within Holy Redeemer and with other systems and persons.
> Stewardship — We care for all of creation, human and material, that has been entrusted to us by God.
> Justice — We treat others at all times with fairness and honesty.

What a cruel joke – need I say more?

From Dr. Kramer's website "Our Practice:"

> OUR PRACTICE
>
> Our mission is to care, comfort, treat and heal. We provide the highest level of care to women through all phases of their lives while helping them understand how and why their bodies function as they do. You're more than just a patient, you're a member of our practice family.
>
> As a Holy Redeemer Physician Practice, Kramer OB/GYN and Associates has access to a full-service hospital with a maternity center that houses one of the area's most advanced neonatal intensive care units and nature-inspired, completely private delivery suites and postpartum rooms. One of the greatest experiences our physicians have is bringing a life into this world and seeing the joy that child brings to his/her family.

Again, Kramer is trained to care for women who don't own penises, yet he presumes the intact penis – that his God has made – is defective and in need of his correction. Circumcision neither treats a condition or heals any disease.

If Dr. Kramer's practice is "rooted in the tradition of the Sisters of the Holy Redeemer" it's ironic and tragic that the Sisters calling of "We are women called by the Spirit of God to … be a healing presence in a broken world" causes an infant's "broken world" through mutilation, not "healing."

Further on we read "Reverence for Creation:"

> Reverence for Creation
>
> We, the Sisters of the Holy Redeemer, embrace the call to be a healing presence in the world and to all God's creation. We respond to the challenge to live in partnership with the earth community, through our simply lifestyle and in our ministry to others, recognizing that our actions impact the earth and earth's people.
>
> In response to this call we strive to raise consciousness and awareness of the fragility of the earth's resources and seek out ways to better care for the earth and one another.

More hogwash, pretending they revere "all God's creation" when they clearly despise God's penises. On the contrary, it is intactivists who "strive to raise consciousness" and "seek out ways to better care for the earth and one another," not mutilators who bring pain, misery, and sometimes death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about circumcision and its risks, we've provided videos and research here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Kramer's practice information follows:

7901 Bustleton Avenue, Suite 100
Philadelphia , PA 19152
Phone: (215) 543-0060
Fax: (215) 543-0099

Holy Redeemer Healthcare
821 Huntingdon Pike, Suite 130 , Huntingdon Valley PA
Phone: (215) 543-0060
Fax: (215) 379-4319

> Dr. Joel R. Kramer of Philadelphia, PA, "Known Genital Mutilator" and manipulator > https://t.co/RkXGnQ2pL9… https://t.co/Cyc5yiW2jO
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 20, 2017

The military's non-existent sexual assault epidemic show's no bounds

Michael Conzachi · 20 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I have written on this site as well as other sites of some truly remarkable military court-martial cases, that in a reasonable common sense world would not even reach the front door of a civilian prosecutor's office. In fact, during my career, if I had the temerity to present a case like many of the military cases I routinely see, I would have been removed from my assignment and instead been placed in charge of parking tickets.

Every day in military courtrooms, servicemen are being tried, convicted and incarcerated for sexual assault cases that never happened. Let me say that again, tried, convicted and incarcerated for sexual assault cases that never fucking happened!

Now; while I will agree that sexual assaults in the military DO happen, a significantly high number of these allegations are brought about based on allegations from vindictive divorcing wives, vengeful ex-girlfriends who have just been dumped, or others who regret a consensual encounter, then weeks months or even years later decide that they have been sexually assaulted.

Let's also factor in the scores of military females who have filed false allegations in order to get a preferential duty assignment, to avoid a deployment, to cover-up an adulterous affair, to reunite with a lesbian lover, or to score big in the form of transitional compensation payments and VA benefits. The stories are out there and they are endless.

Literally, the Department of Defense has created a financially lucrative pot of gold that many are cashing in. All you have to do is make an allegation of sexual assault and you can immediately cash in for big bucks. Even if the allegations are proved to be false, there is little to no chance that a false accuser will ever be held accountable. In the meantime, scores of good and honorable servicemen have been convicted of military sex crimes, losing their families and friends, rendering them bankrupt with nothing left and many times incarcerated for decades with little to no hope of freedom. Some have even committed suicide.

I and many others have extensively documented the 'myth' of the sexual assault epidemic in the U.S. military. The data, articles and facts are staggering.

As I said, sexual assaults do happen in the military, but let's exercise a microgram of common sense here for a moment. Does anyone, in their right mind actually believe that the rate of sexual assault in the military is 40 times greater than in the City of Detroit; a city that has been run by Democrats for over 50 years; a city that is a decaying toilet mess and a place that if it were a separate country, would be the most violent country on this planet?

Really? Think about that for a moment. If you believe the delusional masses in the hysterical rape culture cottage industry, a woman has a greater chance of being raped in the military than if she walked around the City of Detroit; a city which has the highest per capita number of convicts and parolees, just above Oakland, naked, at 3 am holding a neon sign that said "Rape Me.'

Just as the documentary film, 'The Red Pill' so eloquently depicts, the conversation, policy and law are now being dictated by the small number of extreme radicals. Disingenuous and delusional politicians like senators Kirstin Gillibrand and Claire McCaskill see rapists in the military behind every tank, Humvee and in every foxhole.

It reminds me of that scene in the movie The Sixth Sense in which the young boy in the movie says, “I see dead people.”

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0YppxEYkqTU

I could on ad nausea about the Department of Defenses’ ‘brilliant’ surveys that cost millions in which they extrapolated the vast numbers of sexual assaults that include words, glances, whistles or regret. Almost anything right now can be construed as sexual assault.

Again, a simple Google search, taking no more than a few seconds will unveil the hypocrisy and lunacy of the military’s handling of accusations of sexual assault.

Exacerbating the problem are commanders who fail miserably in their duty and send virtually any and all allegations of sexual misconduct to court-martial, even in the most ridiculous of cases; cases of which on their face, are more akin to delusion and hallucination. Disingenuous and corrupt military prosecutors, looking for that next promotion, instantaneously jump on the bandwagon, intent, come hell or high water to convict by any means necessary.

The concept of actually conducting a fair and impartial military investigation into allegations of sexual misconduct are non-existent. Military law enforcement agents routinely use intimidation and threats to extract information from potential defense witnesses and the accused. In one instance, military prosecutors placed a defense witness of a serviceman accused of sexual assault on a no-fly list, to prevent that witness from entering the country to testify.

Irrelevant, invented, or manufactured additional charges are stacked like cordwood at a Bed and Breakfast on top of sexual misconduct allegations

Let’s be clear. Whenever a certain political party or special interest group wants to promote an agenda, they have to create an ‘epidemic’ or make claims that the problem is getting worse. In order to create an epidemic, they have to present a survey or study that supports their agenda. When the epidemic is supported by their handpicked, manufactured, or extrapolated study or survey, the epidemic must be eradicated using the most extreme and barbaric methods.

When some women were accused of witchcraft in Salem Massachusetts during the late 1600’s, kangaroo courts were convened and more than two dozen women were hung and others died while in prison.

In the mid 1980’s another panic struck the country with the McMartin Pre-School child abuse hysteria. In that scenario, a mother of a toddler who was later diagnosed as being a paranoid schizophrenic, accused McMartin employees of engaging in satanic rituals with children, torturing and sacrificing animals, and torturing and sometimes sacrificing young children.

The hysteria swept the country and thousands were swept up in the process; or should I say, the madness. The satanic child sacrificing cottage industry; self-proclaimed experts in child psychology, came crawling out from under their rocks to spread their delusions and to cash in with all of those taxpayer dollars to conduct their 'expert' analysis's. They made claims that more than 50,000 children a year were being kidnapped by strangers in the country and approximately 4,000 were systematically being sacrificed in various demonic and satanic rituals. There was only one problem. Department of Justice actual crime statistics revealed that only 60-70 children are actually kidnapped by strangers every year. Of course, one is unacceptable but it is a far cry from 50,000.

Just like senators' Gillibrand, McCaskill, Ayotte and many others in their camp who see sexual predators behind every military tank and in every college campus fraternity, the child satanic and sacrificial cottage industry self-proclaimed "experts in the mid-80's; their claims are in complete opposition of actual cases and are devoid of common sense.

Does any of this sound familiar yet

Let's not forget the 'Jim Crow' era in the South where, under the 'Black Codes,' scores of black males were arbitrarily lynched and hung based on nothing more than an accusation of rape by a white female.

With all of this hysteria surrounding the non-existent sexual assault epidemic in the military, draconian measures in the military justice system have been developed. Always believe the victim, victim centered investigations, and ignoring evidence of innocence is the norm. Prosecutorial and military law enforcement misconduct is the norm involving allegations of sexual misconduct.

Military prosecutors routinely block defense evidence and defense witnesses and employ circus style evidence, theories and expert witnesses like counter-intuitive behavioral specialists, whatever the hell that is.

If a similar pattern of justice was being directed at a specific group such as blacks, Hispanics, muslims, gays, or any group that is not white and male; or in this case just male, the mainstream media would be shrieking their collective progressive heads off and would be immediately screaming for 'reform.'

Military sexual assault and harassment training programs are constant, relentless, and never ending. One serviceman once sent me a picture of sexual assault and harassment brochures that were taped above each of the urinals in a men's restroom at one military base. In another scenario, an electronic billboard at one military base encouraged women to leave their abusive military husbands or boyfriends, implying that only men are abusers and only women are victims. Upon a written letter of protest from the National Coalition for Men, the sign was taken down.

All costs of these programs, training sessions, prosecutions, experts, and benefit packages in the DoD run into the hundreds of millions of dollars; perhaps into the billions.

I'm going to provide you with a couple of links to show; once again, of the sheer lunacy and waste of the Department of Defense's approach to the prevention of sexual assault and harassment. You have to remember that sometimes these things are hard to find or discover, and once they are brought to the attention of the general public, they are usually shut down, and getting honest information from the DoD is virtually impossible.

In 2015, the Pentagon paid some type of self-proclaimed expert $10,000 to provide the Air Force with….. now get this….. don't laugh….. "May I Kiss You Training." That's right, I did not make a typo and I'm not making this up. I consider myself an individual with above average intelligence, analytical skills and creativity, and I couldn't have even thought this shit up.

From what rape culture planet in the galaxy do they find these people? Maybe they got the idea from watching reruns of the 1996 movie 'Independence Day' where the long-haired Dr. Okun explains to the president that the aliens communicate with each via, non-verbal means; "telepathy perhaps?"

Apparently, this 'trainer' provided three 60-90-minute training sessions, so in short, he was paid about $2,500 an hour. Whiskey! Tango! Foxtrot! Over.

According to this trainer, and I'm not going to use his name so as not to give him any more publicity, but it's in the link, proclaimed that a husband must ask his wife for permission each and every time he wants to kiss her. If not, it's rape.

From what I can tell, it seems as though the 'May I Kiss You' training program has ended.

I told you not to laugh. Okay, okay, now pick yourself up off the floor. If you have spit out your coffee all over your keyboard or computer screen, take a few moments, clean it up, and I will not be responsible for any damage you cause to your computer, because it gets better.

Okay, now don't eat or drink anything when you read the following. Remember; you just spit out your coffee all over your computer, so this is a disclaimer. Don't have any open flames nearby like a candle or a fireplace, because the next one will cause you to throw something in the room.

In 2016, the Air Force forced Airman to attend a training session to properly learn how to put on a condom. I told you not to laugh again. I wonder if anyone complained or was offended by being forced to handle a rubber or plastic penis?

Imagine that, with Vets being denied medical services at the VA, with some dying, the rocket scientists and brain surgeons at the DoD can somehow find the funds to provide these training programs.

I, and I'm sure many those reading this post and many others I have penned, are of the opinion that the Department of Defense is in a state of lunacy in their approach to the whole sexual assault and harassment issue.

I have to admit; I was wrong. They are in a state of Schizophrenia.

Just as the torch carrying mobs of Salem; the rope carrying mobs of Jim Crow; the hundreds of McMartin parents protesting in the streets of Manhattan Beach, we now have the rape culture mobs of the 21st century at our college campuses and in our military.

OK folks, let's take the tin foil off our heads now. Let's all use that little organ in our heads called a brain. Let's interject a modicum of common sense here and help, assist, and provide services from those who have actually been sexually assaulted; both women and men. Let's filter through the lying vengeful ex-wives, dumped girlfriends, and the malignant narcissists wanting to get their introductions at 'take back the night rallies and to post their selfies' at rallies to the social media pages, with the trigger words of 'brave,' 'hero,' and 'survivor.' Those titles belong to actual victims rather than Jackie from UVA, mattress-girl from Columbia, the drunk crack-head stripper from Duke, or the pathological lying waitress from Fort Campbell.

On January 20th, 2017, a new administration will be sworn in and various cabinet positions will soon follow. Adults will be back in charge and there is hope that common sense and realism will factor in decision making, rather than delusion, hysteria, and name calling.

References/Links

http://freebeacon.com/issues/pentagon-deploys-may-i-kiss-you-training/

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1nFQ4WBAguQ

https://www.rt.com/usa/249241-pentagon-training-talk-kiss/

https://www.ucmjdefense.com/pentagon-pays-sex-expert-2222-per-hour-to-teach-kissing.html

https://www.jqpublicblog.com/photo-day-airmen-forced-attend-condom-class/http://www.slate.com/articles/health_and_science/medical_examiner/2014/01/fran_and_dan_keller_freed_two_of_the_last_victims_of_satanic_ritual_abuse.html

<

pre>http://law2.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/mcmartin/mcmartin.html

Feature image: A U.S. Soldier asks Chief of Staff of the Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., a question, during the 3rd Annual Sexual Harassment and Sexual Assault Prevention Summit, in Arlington, Va. Mar. 30, 2010 – Wikipedia Commons

Angry Wimmin: BBC documentary on radical feminism

AVfM Video Source · 20 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Published in 2015, Angry Wimmin: BBC documentary on Radical Feminism provides an eye opening insight into the radical and hateful roots of modern feminism.

Feature image: Radical feminists attending a slutwalk ‘speakout’ in 2016

Red Pill Movie in Norwich – A personal account

Andy Thomas · 21 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

As I write, I've literally just got off the train from Norwich where I saw the first British screening of The Red Pill. It was a chance to meet Paul Elam and Mike Buchanan for the first time, along with many others I had known only online.

After the movie, I was asked several times what I thought about it. Words failed me then and I only managed say that it was fantastic. But it was more than that.

It's rather like being asked, "So what are the issues in the men's movement?"

Words generally fail me then too — "well, it's everything," I tend to say, uselessly.

After the movie, there was a question and answer session with a panel which included three shape-shifting feminists. I say "shape-shifting" because they seemed eager to inform us that we had got it all wrong, and that feminism isn't primarily about gender at all, but class equality (hopefully there will be a video of this at some point).

My instinct was to pose a question, which I was regretting even as I asked as I belatedly realised that it would simply give them a platform they did not deserve. As one of them spoke down to us Neanderthals in the audience about the things she was going to say and do when she becomes a university lecturer, it seemed that it hadn't dawned on her that she wasn't the intended focus of the event.

Boys today are being crushed by the education system and being driven out of university. Few of them are going to be university lecturers.

The movie was about boys, not her.

My father worked full time in a manual job from the age of fourteen until sixty seven — fifty three years of unremitting drudgery and physical labour. He was loving, loyal and put his family before himself in all things. He took care of us. He spent his final two years taking care of my mother who had managed, at long last, to drink herself to death. Her death killed him too.

The movie was about loving fathers like my dad, not her.

A close friend of mine woke to the reality of his life after reading his wife's diary in which she described how she intended to drive him to suicide. He had to fight to see his children and later suffered a heart attack, followed by a stroke which left him unemployed, homeless and disabled. In hospital, he was visited by his then ex-wife who wanted to know when he would be back at work as he needed to pay for the holiday she was going on.

The movie was about my friend, and all those in such dire predicament, not her.

My grandfather suffered in later life with a skin condition, having stood for days up to his neck in diesel ladened waters at Dunkirk. My great grandfather could hear nothing, having been deafened as nineteen year old by the guns at the Somme. Indeed, whole generations of young men and teenage boys had their bones and blood ground into the dirt during the industrialised slaughter of the twentieth century while privileged rich women complained about their right to vote — a right my great grandfather never had.

The movie was about these young men, not her.

Several months ago I met a man in the streets of Manchester. He was homeless and crying. Speaking to him, I learned that as a child he had thrown a pint of boiling water into his father's face at his mother's behest. His father committed suicide a week later. Having been destroyed as a going human concern in childhood by his mother, he had spent his life homeless — a fierce human tragedy, the cause of which, seemingly invisible to everyone.

The movie was about broken souls like that man, those who we as a society would spit on rather than acknowledge.

It wasn't about her.

A rather poignant moment in The Red Pill, I felt, was when the well connected eye-rolling feminist, Katherine Spiller, pontificated about how advantaged men are — from her executive offices at the Feminist Majority Foundation.

Well, the movie was about all the thousands of us who, every year, chose suicide rather than the advantage afforded us by our privileged gender.

But what did I really think of it, the movie?

It was an acknowledgement, and a validation of sorts. It was a beginning and a wonderful one at that. After watching, I felt that at last someone was looking, that people might one day wake up and begin to see. In the morning, this morning, when I awoke I could have sobbed my heart out. I almost cried on the train home but managed not to because, well, men don't do that kind of thing you know. (Apparently, we need feminism to teach us how to be in touch with our emotions.)

Of Cassie Jaye, the ex-feminist who made the film, I would say this: when so many prefer the safety of delusion, her commitment to intellectual integrity is commendable. I'm grateful for it.

Thanks to Barry Wright, not just for hosting the movie, but for expertly dodging feminist protest. I hope the second screening went just as well.

Most of all, however, I'd like to thank someone who has, no doubt, received very little in the way of thanks and is featured strongly in the film. Without Paul Elam and A Voice for Men, God knows where I would be now. So Paul Elam, thank you!

I would still choose Red over Blue.

I hope to be at the screening in Manchester UK. I would urge anyone to go and see The Red Pill wherever you can.

Andy Thomas

Calling out the radical hate group dominating our education systems

Tim Patten · 21 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The Western world is home grown radical hate group has been infiltrating our education system with an insidious form of propaganda for decades but governments and the average person has been manipulated by the disguised label of EQUALITY and WOMEN'S RIGHTS has hijacked a worthy causes into a one sided lens that renders white heterosexual males as untrustworthy and violent. The leaders of this ideology are the radical feminist authors and professors instructing students across thousands of women's studies across Western society who orchestrate an angered social change. Most wield their power while hidden inside the unchallenged ivory towers of government sponsored colleges and university bureaucracies.

A Utopian Ideal of Equality, and Diversity

Human diversity and equality is the celebrated goal across most organizations and nations can best be encapsulated by Gene Rodenberry's science fiction story: Star Trek. This Original Series aired on Thursday, September 8, 1966 and continues to today as a relished long running entertainment franchise portraying the Starship Enterprise populace as a valued mixture of international cultures and characters including intelligently assorted beings from other planets. All traveling across galaxies exploring strange new worlds, to seek out new life and civilizations and to boldly go where no man has ever gone before; resonating deeply within us and warms the hearts of billions of worldwide enthusiasts. The adventures of Captain Kirk's team of men, women and aliens is one of our modern most honored movie and television franchise considered a celebrated epic and mega hit for over five decades. But for radical feminists Star Trek has a serious problem!

Radical feminists misappropriate the women's rights movement into an institutional threat towards man-hate like Valerie Solanas, Lena Dunham and millions of their followers who express their desire to kill all men, bring extinction to all straight white men or abort every male fetus before birth. Unchallenged as hate speech these scholars perpetuate a world without men; an idealistic planet without males, white heterosexual males specifically. Other Third Wave feminists, such as Rebecca Walker, bell hooks, Audre Lorde, Gloria E. Anzaldúa, and Cherríe Moraga are aligned with the elimination of men; their goals: falsely declare only men can rape, eliminate patriarchal father roles, blur society' idea of gender and scientific sex, implement oppressive education programs to convert the nature of boys and men into something else by implementing authoritarian measures of male control.

These radicals have weaponized well-meaning students turning them against males and justify the killing of men through farfetched conspiracy theories; patriarchy and white male privilege. They imagine the future Star Trek without male Captain Kirk, Spock, Leonard McCoy, Pavel Chekov, and Scotty! The radical extremist vision is to use social reengineering to remove men from society. The Southern Poverty Law Center should consider tracking this group as an alt-left hate group. By raising our voices and emailing the SPLC we should get some help.

How Feminism teaches Students and Society a Gendered Violence Lens

Radical feminists scholars invented a one sided view of gendered violence, like ISIS that perverted a religion, feminism has perverted the idea violence between genders. The women's studies professors use this manipulative half-truth called the feminist critical lens.

Gendered Violence is defined as: intimidation; emotional, verbal and physical abuse; sexual assault; rape; and murder.

What Students and Society are Taught:

The false feminist critical lens: 70% of all women will be victims of gendered violence. (One sided propaganda by omitting comparisons of violence against men and same sexed relationship violence.)

After this, the professors ask students to practice developing this lens, or one directional view of their own life experiences. This brainwashes the students to view a half-truth impression of violence; considered psychological abuse.

What Students and Society are not Taught:

A holistic worldview lens includes men in prison and street violence: 90% of all men will be victims of violence, raped, assaulted and murdered at much higher rates than women. Moreover, men suffer from a suicide epidemic. And, 44% of same sexed female relationships, 21% of male female relationships, 12% same sexed male relationships will be victims violence.

Feminism, women's, gender and feminist defined masculinities studies all repeat the false feminist critical lens of gendered violence over and over until everyone submits to the oppressive idea that only woman are victimized by dominant men. Scholars proselytize students turning them into victims, an unhealthy self-view that causes emotional problems when students should be taught to unchain themselves from victimization.

How Feminism Manipulates Society with Empathy

The entire Western World is sympathetic and is moved into action by empathy for women and children who are harmed or in danger. We hold close traditions such as women and children first in an ocean liner disaster. When anyone mentions the critical feminist lens of gendered violence against women it evokes deep emotions inside millions who are called to action or donate money. We are being manipulated at our most primal level, the heroism to save another human, to be chivalrous; cherish, protect and save women as its first priority.

This chivalry towards women develops a blind spot for the others in the holistic view of violence; society is blinded to understanding same sexed women and men's pain and support their issues.

Feminism's Social Justice Warriors Harboring Bigotry and Hate

Colleges have produced millions of women's studies graduates and some have become social justice warriors who advocate, write commercials, news stories and produce media that furthers the biased view of gendered violence is a male only problem thus propagating the stain of institutional and societal hatred. On February 2016, Buzz Feed hired writers but stated no white men should apply and The Atlantic announced the Democratic platform has nothing for white men or boys of any color. Some call this a politically correct view or a socially influenced interpretation. Western society has been changed with the end goal to remove the virtue of masculinity in humans and dismantle the mythical patriarchy of male power when the actual power lies with a wealth oligarchy devoid of race or gender. Then on November 9, 2017, Donald J. Trump was elected President of the United States, a white heterosexual alpha-male. Feminists and alt-left social justice warriors exploded and are filling the news and blogs with claims of racism and sexism and other delusions used to shut down rational thinking and debate. Millions are calling for women's studies undergo extreme reform.

Conclusion

The power-battle between the sexes has been here forever yet, the sexes have worked through the differences long enough to breed and reproduce the next generation. Men are the universes' ultimate survivors, beings who have risen great empires from mere wildernesses. Men want equality but will never be beat or killed by an ideology celebrating an equality that actually means eliminate white men.

But unfortunately for women, as Forbes Magazine reported, 53% of corporate entry-level jobs are held by women, but suffer from a "paradox of declining female happiness" as was pointed out by economists Betsey Stevenson and Justin Wolfers. Radical feminism is a failed-hate movement, causing emotional harm to men and women. While citizens are leaving the feminist movement by millions, society must rid itself of this radical, and spiteful moral supremacy that causes social and individual havoc.

Feature image: Star Trek crew members, Wikipedia Commons

Russia to legalize violence against women? Well, not really

AVfM Video Source · 22 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The media has been telling the story lately that Russia is on its way to legalize violence against women in the family.
Not only is the story quite old and with a complex background (that the media has failed to cover) but it's also not really about women.
Our own Lucian Vâlsan dug into the story and unveiled a complex web of lies, damn lies and statistics right beneath the headline-grabbing story.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Male feminist proves it again: feminists are scum

AVfM Video Source · 23 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

If I said what I was thinking when I watched this it would be quote mined by Man Titz and spread on the interwebz for the next ten years. PE

Accept it, women do lie about being raped

AVfM Video Source · 23 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-pfbiQHouOw

Slang: the original voice for men

Doug Mortimer · 24 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Women talk more than men. No one would dispute that. Their standardized verbal scores are higher than their math scores, they are more likely to major in English, and the realms of publishing and editing have become heavily tilted towards women. But when it comes to creative use of language, men need not take a back seat to women. In fact, when it comes to slang, they are definitely in the driver's seat.

As defined in the unabridged Webster's Universal Dictionary of the English Language in 1936, slang is "the cant expressions used by vagabonds, beggars and thieves." In this definition "cant" does not mean hypocritical or deceptive language but the specialized terminology of a particular subculture. Of course, vagabonds, beggars, and thieves were overwhelmingly male in 1936 and still are today.

Now let's flash forward a few decades and check out the Dictionary of American Slang, compiled and edited by Harold Wentworth and Stuart Berg Flexner in 1967:

Most American slang is created and used by males. Many types of slang words – including the taboo and strongly derogatory ones, those referring to sex, women work, money, whiskey, politics, transportation, sports, and the like – refer primarily to male endeavor and interest. The majority of entries in this dictionary could be labeled "primarily masculine use."

According to Flexner and Wentworth, slang emanates from the following sub-groups:

Hobos and tramps
Railroad workers
Baseball players and fans
Show-business workers
High-school students and general teenagers
College students
Financial district employees
Jazz musicians and fans
Narcotic addicts
Army
Underworld
Navy and Merchant Marine Immigrants

Most of these groups are heavily if not exclusively male; others (show-business workers, teenagers, high school students, college students, immigrants) are roughly half male, which does not necessarily mean that women have contributed to the slang of these groups in proportion to their numbers, though they may communicate with slang created by the men in their sub-group.

Today it would be difficult to find a linguist who would declare the superiority of men when it comes to creating slang (or anything else). But women have never been major contributors. In fact, in days of old, they were often against it. As D.W. Maurer states in the Encyclopedia Britannica entry on slang:

> Many women who aspired to gentility and refinement banished it [slang] from the home. It flourished underground, however, in such male sanctuaries as lodges, poolrooms, barbershops, and saloons.

Mrs. Grundy may disapprove of slang, but she does have a soft spot in her heart for poetry. Yet all those figures of speech (e.g., metaphor, metonymy, synecdoche) you learned about in your high school English class are as essential to slang as they are to poetry. Speaking of English class, let's see what some renowned writers had to say about slang.

In “A Defence of Slang,” British writer G.K. Chesterton said: The one stream of poetry which is continually flowing is slang.

All slang is metaphor, and all metaphor is poetry. If we paused for a moment to examine the cheapest cant phrases that pass our lips every day, we should find that they were as rich and suggestive as so many sonnets.

On this side of the pond, however, we have always had a much more relaxed attitude towards language. Take Walt Whitman, the bard of democracy. In “Slang in America,” he wrote:

> [Slang is] an attempt of common humanity to escape from bald literalism, and express itself illimitably, which in highest walks produced poets and poems, and doubtless in pre-historic times gave the start to, and perfected, the whole immense tangle of the old mythologies.
>
> Many of the oldest and solidest words we use, were originally generated from the daring and license of slang. In the processes of word-formation, myriads die, but here and there the attempt attracts super meanings, becomes valuable and indispensable, and lives forever.
>
> Then the wit – the rich flashes of humor and genius and poetry – darting out often from a gang of laborers, railroad-men, miners, drivers or boatmen!” [Note that those occupations were and still are overwhelmingly male.]

Since we’re talking 19th Century American authors, let’s not forget Samuel Clemens, whose pen name, Mark Twain, was a slang term (two fathoms deep, ergo navigable) from the subculture of steamboat men.

In the first half of the 20th Century, the hard-boiled school of fiction not only utilized slang, it introduced it to genteel readers who otherwise might not have encountered it. In fact, it is impossible to imagine the fiction of Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, and James M. Cain devoid of slang. Initially confined to the pulp fiction ghetto, slang eventually worked its way into respectable literature and elevated authors who used it to good effect.

In 1962, British writer Anthony Burgess, who was also a linguist, invented a number of slang terms for his novel, A Clockwork Orange. In fact, there were so many neologisms he had to include a glossary as an appendix. Aside from the book and movie, none, to my knowledge, achieved wider currency.

This points out the unpredictability of slang. You can make up all the slang terms you want and put them out there verbally, in print, or on the internet, but that doesn’t mean they will catch on. As clever as a term may be, it cannot be utilized in conversation until it goes viral. On the other hand, once a term goes dormant, it is equally difficult to employ.

Reading through a slang dictionary raises a number of questions about dormant slang. Some colorful turns of phrase have vanished while others remain. New slang tends to crowd out old slang, but there are other forces at work. For example, we rarely hear horse manure referred to as road apples or alley apples these days. Of course, we no longer rely on horses for transportation, so the waning popularity of those terms is understandable.

A telephone is no longer called an ameche, probably because The Story of Alexander Graham Bell, a biopic with Don Ameche in the title role, came out in 1939, and pop culture references typically have short shelf lives.

The employees drawing you an IPA at your local taproom may never have heard the term beer-jerkers, but in the 1930s, that’s what they were called. Given the increased popularity of craft beer, perhaps this one will make a comeback.

Despite the ravages of inflation, pennies are still in circulation, but no one refers to them as “brown Abes” any more. On the other hand, we can refer to our paper currency as “dead presidents”…at least until we become a totally cashless society, then we’ll have to come up with something else.

If we do get a slang term for digital money, it won't come from some nabob at the Department of the Treasury or a Federal Reserve bank. Slang is not a top-down phenomenon. It comes bubbling up from below. Professionals, such as doctors, lawyers, and engineers all use jargon, but rarely come up with slang terms that pass into society at large.

Typically, slang originates in subgroups that have relatively little clout in society at large. For example, a lot of slang comes from young people, who may be numerous but have relatively little in the way of wealth or assets.

Young people treasure their slang, much as they do their fashions and pop music, not because of its intrinsic value, but because it is theirs. The ongoing quest for new slang inevitably squeezes out most of the slang of older generations. Consequently, yesterday's hepcats are L7 today. (If you aren't familiar with L7, it is a slang term for square; it derives from the fact that if you jam the two characters together the result approximates a square; L7 could also be communicated via hand signals much like a gang sign.)

As is the case with conventional language, slang often serves a purpose above and beyond the surface message it conveys. A slang word is almost like a password. It separates friend from foe, just as it separates one generation from another. You're either in the tribe or you're not in the tribe. While slang may eventually achieve widespread currency, it starts out as exclusive terminology. According to Michael Adams in Slang: The People's Poetry:

Slang is not merely a lexical phenomenon, a type of word, but a linguistic practice rooted in social needs and behaviors, mostly the complementary needs to fit in and to stand out.

The need to simultaneously fit in and stand out could almost be a definition of male bonding. You want to be part of that hunting band but you don't want to be just another brick in the wall. You want to be accepted as an individual. After all, you can't stand out from the group if you don't belong to the group.

Given that slang originates in anti-establishment subgroups, it is hardly surprising that MGTOWs and MRAs rely on a number of slang terms, such as cucks, white knights, manginas, the cock carousel, and emotional tampon. Slang may become acceptable but it usually starts out as politically incorrect and subversive.

Feminism, on the other hand, has spawned plenty of terminology (e.g., benevolent sexism, internalized misogyny, toxic masculinity) but it tends to be prosaic. Feminism is an ideology, and ideologues are not noted for their sense of humor. Also, wit is a trait only rarely associated with women, though they do excel at making catty remarks (think Joan Rivers).

Slang, like wit, cannot be mandated. Like water, it springs forth in some places but not others, and seeks its own level. It may remain like a pond within a subculture or it may be channeled into mainstream discourse. The language police may patrol the media but they cannot control the flow of language. Words have a life of their own. They are born and they die. A chosen few are immortal.

In the beginning was the word. As it was in the beginning is now and ever shall be. Slang without end, amen.

Paul on Tom Wood's Show

AVfM Video Source · 24 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A rarity. A prominent, credible face gives the MRM objective treatment. PE

RIP, Intactivist

Kevin Patten · 25 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

> "Suicide was my biggest weapon. The thought of it gave me some peace; the thought that the cage was not entirely closed actually gave me some small strength to linger within the cage." – Charles Bukowski

Last year, our asinine American society lost a brave crusader. On May 9th, Jonathon Conte, a prominent Bay-area Intactivist, took his life. He was thirty-four. The tragic news was delivered by Marilyn Milos, the original conscious objector of circumcision, who posted on Facebook. Tributes poured out from the community.

They remembered his smile, infectious and without pretentiousness. The sincerity of his friendship, those who had the privilege of earning it. His dedication to the cause, the protests and the daily bike-rides he took through the city and the parks, always with his "info-cart" in tow. And the testimony he told of his own mutilation, that which no doubt led to this moment. Ever the meticulous planner, Conte acquired "pure helium" – supposedly hard to come by – and his death likely happened quickly; less pain than his infantile abuse.

In recordings and public statements, a crestfallen Mr. Conte recalled that at the age of fourteen he saw a video on the internet of an intact penis, leading to the swift realization that a piece of him "had been cut away." This was the beginning of a lifelong feeling of "incompleteness, both physically and sexually," admitting something that he likely knew far too few American men ever would: "I battled depression, particularly whenever I had to see my penis." For him, activism became a form of therapy, and he was soon one of the main signature-gatherers for the doomed 2012 San Francisco bill that attempted to ban the operation for anyone under 18. It's said that he also designed the "blood-stained" jumpsuit that now makes its appearance in cities across the land.

I met Jonathon once, during the San Francisco ACOG (The American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists) meeting, May 2015. He disappeared for a moment, and when he returned he had donned a menacing alter ego: a "blood"-splattered lab coat and rubber Zombie mask. "Cock cutters for sale!" he snarled at the exiting doctors. While demasked, Conte was known to "meet people where they are," intoning about the horror.

My well-received response to his suicide, said in Facebook groups, was that we should pushback against the inevitable: that his final act will be seen as martyrdom. But this was not preventable. Although Conte did not explicitly state his mutilation the cause for his final action (as far as I know, he made no suicide note), his mental state was clearly sullied by it. Blamelessly, one can't help to interpret his death as the inevitable outcome of what he had realized way back when.

The secondary group, with their mendacious eyes rolling along the online obituaries, had offended me much more – those that would say that Conte had other problems and rhetorically ask How anybody could kill themselves over such a silly thing. Any psychologist worth their salt can agree that a person's suicide is nearly impossible for another to grasp. As any Intactivist will testify, men who recognize unnecessary scars on their manhood can become obsessively troubled by them. And as Cesare Pavese pointed out, nobody who takes their own life lacks the ratiocination for doing so.

Here in America, the majority of males – at least up until the last couple decades – are born to an awaiting sharp tool. A few years later, almost everyone else is ushered into a brainwashing center, sometimes called "public schooling." If you're less fortunate, a religiously-inclined relative will inform that eternal damnation awaits if you reject certain ancient doctrines, showing even death to be an unviable escape hatch. Meanwhile, participation in such institutions is often reinforced via corporal punishment and psychotropic drugs. You'll then soon be told that working and giving up half your paycheck are life's only real choices, thereby making cocktails and sex and occasional vacations as the ventures that allows one to subsist. As it is, good justifications can be pinpointed – any combination of which could result in the next helium exit. Inflammatorily, plenty will ignore the appallingly high rates of suicide amongst the young and instead insist that these are but The Best Things.

And so why not place the late Mr. Conte – who attempted to end at least two of these six items (I'm sure he was opposed to corporal punishment as well; nearly all Intactivists are) – alongside Alexander Berkman and Aaron Swartz and however many more self-immolating Buddhists?

What cannot be honestly asserted is that we'd all be better off if we simply killed ourselves, for the cultures of violence would merely snicker and carry forth. What is not mistaken is observing how, subsequent of one setting themselves on fire, people seem to notice the severity of the crimes they were trying to bring attention to.

From this loss will arise observation, motivation, and determination.

Incidentally, a few months after Conte passed, another person died that was involved in this nonquestion – one Edgar Schoen, a pediatrician and longtime advocate for circumcision who was put in charge of the 1989 AAP "task force" meant to evaluate the subject. Two years prior, Schoen wrote an "Ode to the Circumcised Male," with the lines:

> "Don't rue that you suffered a rape of your phallus.
> Just hope that one day you can say with a smile
> That your glans ain't passe; it will rise up in style."

He then effectively reversed the AAP's 1975 position, which was that, quote: "a program of education to continuing good personal hygiene would offer all the advantages of routine circumcision without the attendant surgical risk. Therefore, circumcision of the male neonate cannot be considered an essential component of adequate total health care."

Dr. Schoen's report stated all the usual nonsense: prevention of phimosis, cancer, urinary tract infections, HPV. Now the procedure had "potential medical benefits and advantages as well as disadvantages and risks." Perceptively, unlike Conte, Edgar Schoen will always be remembered for being a malicious fraud.

The efforts of the late Jonathon Conte, and those of the entire Intactivist movement, can already be demonstrated: nearly every week an article appears decrying the dropping rates of MGM. As was once said of Women's Suffrage, "We have no choice but to win." The cause is so obviously just; it's the stubborn, prickly thorns of bigotry (oftentimes from females who needs their "pretty penises") and willful ignorance that makes it so frustrating.

Incurred from an act not of his choosing, this became Mr. Conte's calling in life; one might believe that he could hardly escape it. Perhaps the rest of us can take comfort in a slight modification of Desmond Morris' commentary: "The continuance of such practices in the twentieth century against a background of modern enlightenment is clearly going to puzzle historians of the distant future." He meant, not too distant. Then let us forego deathly nihilism, come together in what we believe and are willing to fight for, and thus finally force a smile upon the face of Sisyphus.

Feature Image: Jonathon Conte, Flickr

Hans Pohl, MD of Children's National Health System, "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 26 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: Apparently the doctors performing circumcision at the Children's National Health System are ashamed of their actions and have removed any reference to those mutilations on their website. My listing of Dr. Hsieh clearly shows "circumcision" as one of his specialties, which has since been removed from the website, as has happened here under Dr. Pohl's specialties. I can only hope the stigma of mutilating infants becomes so great as to actually stop it.

Hans Pohl, MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He is listed as a Urologist at the Children's National Health System, and following these menus we find that he performs circumcision as the "treatment" of the "condition" known as "foreskin:"

Choose Children's -> Conditions and Treatments -> Urology -> Circumcision

From the "Children's Team" we find Dr. Pohl, and his "Biography:"

"Hans Pohl, MD, was born in Los Angeles, and moved to Washington, DC, for medical school. During medical school, Dr. Pohl became interested in surgery, with a particular fascination for reconstructive procedures. He remained at GW in the Department of Surgery and Urology as a resident. During his rotation at Children's National Health System as a Urology resident, he found himself particularly drawn to Pediatric Urology and, more specifically, to understanding how best to treat patients with urinary tract infections and vesicoureteral reflux.

Dr. Pohl has experience in treating patients with spina bifida and bladder exstrophy, in addition to the other more common diagnoses, and in using laparoscopy to perform surgery through minimally invasive techniques."

It really is a shame that such an obviously talented and caring person would sully himself – and bloody his hands and reputation – by genitally mutilating babies without their consent, many times causing the problems that require further surgeries to fix, to say nothing of permanently ruining a baby boy's ability to have a natural and normal sex life.

The doctor also does reconstruction of "ambiguous genitalia," something most intactivists oppose as strongly as genital mutilation, which it is. Any surgery on the genitals of an infant that's not medically necessary is unethical and unproven, and is both psychologically and physically damaging. Intersex people live normal lives and should be left intact unless they themselves choose surgery as an adult.

Again, in this list of specialties, the doctor is able to help with all these terrible problems, except the one he causes:

> Specialties
>
> Ambiguous Genitalia
> Congenital Ureteropelvic Junction Obstruction
> Ectopic Ureter

> Exstrophy of the Bladder and Epispadias
> Horseshoe Kidney
> Hydrocele
> Hypospadias
> Inguinal Hernia
> Megaureter
> Micropenis
> Phimosis and Paraphimosis
> Posterior Urethral Valve
> Prune Belly Syndrome
> Testicular Torsion
> Undescended Testis
> Ureterocele
> Urinary Incontinence or Enuresis (bedwetting)
> Urinary Stone Program
> Urinary Tract Infection (UTI)
> Vesicoureteral Reflux

And of course, that problem itself is circumcision.

Further on at the website:

> What is circumcision?
>
> Circumcision is a surgical procedure to remove the skin covering the end of the penis, called the foreskin. In many cultures, circumcision is a religious rite or a ceremonial tradition. It is most common in Jewish and Islamic faiths. In the United States, newborn circumcision is an elective procedure. An estimated 55 to 80 percent of newborn boys undergo circumcision. However, this number varies among socioeconomic, racial, and ethnic groups.
>
> Do pediatricians support circumcision?
>
> The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) issued a policy statement in 1999 on the use of circumcision. This policy was most recently updated in 2012. The AAP recognizes the following information from studies of both circumcised and uncircumcised males:
>
> Problems with the penis, such as irritation, can occur with or without circumcision.
> There is no difference in hygiene, as long as proper care is followed.
> There may or may not be any difference in sexual sensation or practices in adult men.
> There is an increased risk of urinary tract infection in uncircumcised males, especially in babies younger than 1 year of age. However, the risk for urinary tract infections in all boys is less than 1 percent.
> Newborn circumcision does provide some protection from cancer of the penis. However, the overall risk of penis cancer is very low in developed countries, such as the United States.
> There is a decreased risk of certain sexually transmitted diseases (including HIV) in circumcised males.
> The most current AAP report found that the health benefits to circumcision outweigh the risks. However, these benefits are not significant enough to recommend that all newborn baby boys be circumcised. The AAP recommends that parents should be given information on the benefits and risks of newborn circumcision and that parents should decide what is best for their baby.

So, in a roundabout way, the AAP does not support routine circumcision of infants. As a matter of fact the most recent findings by the AAP warn against surgery such as circumcision on infants because of their immature nervous system.

> What care is needed after a circumcision?
>
> Circumcisions performed by a qualified doctor rarely have complications. Problems that occur are usually not serious. The most common complications are bleeding and infection. Proper care after circumcision helps reduce the chances of problems.

"Usually not serious," but why take the unnecessary chance that your baby will bleed to death or have a lifetime of pain and suffering?

> What care is needed for an uncircumcised penis?
>
> A newborn boy normally has foreskin tightly fitted over the head of the penis. As long as the baby is able to pass urine through the opening, this is not a problem. It is not necessary to clean inside the foreskin, only the outside, as part of a normal bath.
>
> As the baby grows, the foreskin becomes looser and is able to be retracted (moved back). This may take many months to years. Your baby's doctor will check this as part of your baby's checkups and will show you how to retract the foreskin. This allows cleansing of the area. As a boy grows, he should be taught how to retract the foreskin and clean himself. The foreskin should never be retracted forcibly. Do not allow the foreskin to stay retracted for long periods as this may shut off the blood supply causing pain and possible injury. Sometimes the foreskin becomes stuck in the retracted position and cannot be pulled back down. This is called paraphimosis and is a medical emergency.
>
> In some children, the foreskin cannot be retracted because of a restricted opening, causing a condition called phimosis. This condition may require circumcision later in childhood if it doesn't respond to medical treatment.

This is sound advice – no need to mutilate an infant; leave him intact, free of trauma, to enjoy what he was born with.

The horribly misguided doctor – among others – actually promotes this mutilation on the youngest of the young, newborns, the very age that the AAP says is damaging to the infant's health (see link above). I'm sure FGM is also easier and cheaper (yes, he actually mentions the price) to perform on newborn girls, but that doesn't make it right. Here's his barbaric promotion in Forbe's magazine – how ghoulishly appropriate:

"If You're Going To Circumcise, Cut Early, Study Suggests"

Unbelievably and ironically, the Children's National Health System has a new campaign to "Grow Up Stronger" with this glowing image of pure goodness, with nary an image of babies being strapped down for sexual abuse and mutilation:

Check out the campaign here, where I tried to get my own message published about what "Stronger is…" I said

"Stronger is… leaving baby boys intact," leaving my real name and my department as urology. At least if I was a urologist I wouldn't on one hand help little boys, while disfiguring them with the other. Whether or not my message is posted – it appears they check email addresses – someone has read my message so I FTSU. I may leave a link to this article as my next message. Or maybe "Stronger is… the adult that straps down a baby in order to sexually abuse and genitally mutilate him."

Dr. Pohl, you don't have to circumcise these babies, so why do it? Refuse to do it – it's a human rights violation according to the law and the United Nations. If all cutters refused to cut, this horrible practice would die out much sooner. Obviously Children's Health makes money on this practice, hence it's continuation. But that's blood money.

Since Dr. Pohl has incomplete information about the risks of circumcision, you can watch videos and research that information at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Pohl's practice information follows:

Children's National Health System

Locations
Main Hospital
Washington, District of Columbia 20010
1-888-884-BEAR (2327)
Montgomery County Outpatient Center
Rockville, Maryland 20850
301-765-5400 or 800-787-0243

> Hans Pohl, MD of Children's National Health System, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/c2iiJ4DKaG #MGM… https://t.co/u6eaFD2IMM
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 26, 2017

Man Love: Can men love each other on deeper levels?

Craig White · 26 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

We know that a man can truly love another man in a gay relationship and that this can be authentic and rich, for them. But, can a heterosexual man love another man truly, deeply, in a non-sexual way, without shame and fear? How would this affect society as a whole?

Lately, I have been thinking and feeling into this question a lot through my own coaching work, with reference to one-on-one male interactions and group sharings in the form of men's circles. I've been exploring deeper friendships with other men, showing more vulnerability, being more present with other men, and the potential in these relationships to help me evolve and love as a man is enormous.

If men could deeply love other men, if this was truly possible, why would another man want this, what would it look like, how would this feel, and more importantly, what would this mean to the life of men in general? And the life of women?

So as a man, I ask you:

If you had deeper meaningful connections and felt genuine love for more men in your life, how would this be for you? If you had male friends who you could openly talk to about anything in your life, and be heard unconditionally, without being judged, what would this mean in your own life?

How would this affect your interactions with men in general?
How would this affect your relationship to women?
How would this affect your relationship to yourself and self-acceptance?
How would this affect your relationship with your family members?
How would this affect your confidence levels?
How would this affect your relationship to the world in general?
How would this affect male suicides?
How would this affect domestic violence in the world?
How would this affect corruption in the world?
How would this affect how we treat the natural world?

I'm not talking about male friends who go for a beer together here or to the football match and spend most of the evening discussing life on a superficial level and projecting their fears on other people. No, I'm talking about deep and loving connections where there is inner trust, where anything and everything is welcome, the dark and the light, and were men can share their deepest truths.

It seems that in our society today men are not loving each other in deep and meaningful ways. This is a disaster for society as a whole.

As men most of us have been conditioned not to trust other men, conditioned to see other men through a lens of fear, as a threat, as competition. Also, due to the fact that many of us have been raised predominantly by women, we see men through the lens of our mother, not through the lens of our father and other male role models. Often the view of our mothers towards men has been negative.

For many of us our father wasn't around much. He was either missing or too busy with work to spend quality emotional bonding time with us. There were no role models around either for us to emulate. If we grew up without receiving deep loving connection from our fathers, grandfathers, and other male role models, how can anyone expect us to share this type of love with other men in our lives today?

"Our dads weren't there for us, so we were all raised by women, and we can't learn about manhood from women, so we have to learn about manhood from each other." Robert Bly (Author and Poet)

In my own life, the way I have attempted to deepen my relationships with other men is through men's circles. In fact, being involved in regular men's circles, listening to other men's stories with compassion, and sharing my own story, knowing that I am being heard is by far one of the most healing practices I have done in my life to date. The wisdom gained in these types of sharings is enormous. When I am actively involved in men's circles and deep one-to-one connections with men, I observe that every other aspect of my life benefits. All of my relationships are enhanced and my confidence to act in this world and follow my mission is increased significantly.

It is my observation perhaps that at no time in history have there been so many restless, questioning men riddled with confusion and indecision. Lots of men are stuck in no man's land with a belief that they have no one to talk to and that no one will understand them. To mask this suffering many men turn to addictions, such as drugs, alcohol, gambling, compulsive exercise, and pornography in an attempt to create deep feelings of love and compassion that perhaps were missing in their childhood. Unfortunately, this suffering can lead to the extreme of suicide. In most of the world suicide rates have more than doubled in the last 100 years and it is apparent that 70% of all these suicides happen to men.

"It is not uncommon for men to get stuck in this no man's land. It is a holy place but an exceedingly dangerous one. Suicide is common, and it is easy to slip into despair or the solace of madness. It is a high compliment that one should experience this existential anguish. The fact that our culture has lost most of its guidelines for people at this point of their evolution makes it all the more difficult." Robert Johnson (Psychologist)

So, as men I encourage you to explore your relationship with other men:

- Understand and accept your own fears towards deep and loving relationships with other men.
- Step through these fears.
- Look deeper into the eyes of other men.
- Be more compassionate to other men, understand them as men who share the same fears as you.
- Connect more with men in your life through a friendly glance, a smile, a conversation.
- Listen more compassionately without interrupting your close male friends.
- Share your deepest fears with other men you can trust.
- Form your own men's circles.

The Red Pill Norwich Q & A

AVfM Video Source · 26 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This is the Q and A following the first Norwich Screening of the Red Pill (January 18, 2017). The panel contained a mixture of view points and was aimed at being an open discussion about the movie and its contents.

Feature image: Wikipedia Commons

Children need both parents

AVfM Video Source · 27 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Did MRAs infiltrate “Riverdale”?

August Løvenskiolds · 28 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

There is a new TV show out where feminism is treated as a running joke and real men’s issues of rape, suicide, murder and the matriarchy are being explored in a serious, if campy, setting. Has Paul Elam’s goal of waking up the world to men’s issues found an ally in the writing grottoes of the CW network?

Spoilers ahead for Riverdale. MANY. You have been warned.

“Ladies, where’s the heat? Where’s the sizzle?”

So when the music teacher, Mrs. Grundy, seduced high school sophomore Archie, a ginger, in the run up to the fourth of July, the overnight fireworks were not just in the backseat of her VW Bug. During the conclusion of their reiterated post-coital tangle of limbs and naughty bits, a gunshot rang out across the lake. That sound and the morning light brought rapist Grundy back to the harsh reality of her passionate/predatory crime but Archie, confused and caught in the lusty miasma of his sexual awakening, saw his worldview shatter before him.

Archie, formerly a happy kid, becomes brooding and depressed. Adderall-addled Betty, his childhood sweetie-next-door, no longer holds his interest and so he tosses her into the friendzone. In desperation, Betty begins to adopt increasingly flirty and even slutty behaviors in the forlorn hope of recapturing Archie’s interest. Veronica, a former feminist tart fresh from being disgraced in New York, has returned to town and introduces Betty to the lipstick lesbian mating scam – the Rivervixen Cheerleaders.

Archie’s mental breakdown in revealed in a series of vignettes: he balks when promoted to the varsity football team. He loses interest in his career with his single dad’s struggling company. He sleepwalks through social and sexy interactions with his peers. His only interest is introspective songwriting (as a proxy for his first sexual encounter with the music teacher?) but his musical overtures to the now all-black chick school band “Josey and the Pussycats” are rebuffed on thinly veiled racist grounds.

Veronica, at the dance, speaking to her dates Archie and Betty: : “Guys, can’t we just liberate ourselves from the tired dichotomy of jocks / artists? Can’t we, in this post-James Franco world, be all things at once?”

Finally, to hold his mental issues – or lusts? – at bay, Archie extorts his rapist, the Cougar Grundy, with an ultimatum. Still distraught at her fraught response, he seeks out the tweeker Jughead, from whom he gets a small measure of solace since Jughead is even more messed up than he is.

[updated] Many decades ago I grew up reading Archie comic books that were never like this. The new CW series Riverdale [if this link does not work for you, try this. Thanks to menrppl2 in the comments] is set in a post-feminist-apocalyptic world of male suicide/murder, the rape of underage men, hyper-privileged women and girls, and straight men as pawns to be pushed around as the matriarchs, young and old, see fit. Some of you can watch the entire pilot episode at the first above link depending on your geolocation.

So far, Riverdale is devoid of both married couples and the tired second wave feminist stereotype of goofy husbands. Even the jocks, including Moose, are compassionate and/or gay curious.

This savage updating of the Archie universe and their new open contempt for all tired things politically correct, lesbian and feminist makes this the perfect show for both a blue pill Trump and red pill Elam world. I was laughing with delight and Schadenfreude as each blue pill/feminist trope was engaged and destroyed without quarter.

The first week of the Trump presidency has seen a frenzy of activity portending massive changes in American society and, it is to be hoped, the death of feminism.

For Archie and his forgotten cohort of men, the changes will be challenging and for many, harsh. But men are designed to adapt and change, while others seem content to whine, cry, and inevitably, bloat into irrelevance. In Riverdale, wonder of wonders, their real world is free of such pointless feminist angst.

Intimate partner homicide of men in Australia

Robert Brockway · 31 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This article discusses intimate partner homicide in Australia. While it would be primarily of interest to an Australian audience it is hoped that the information is useful to others for reference and to encourage similar articles to be written about other countries.

Increasingly a distinction is made between intimate partner violence (IPV) and domestic violence (DV). IPV is violence that occurs between people who are married, involved in a defacto relationship or consider themselves involved romantically. Domestic violence is broader and is generally taken to mean violence between family members that live together. Jurisdictions don't agree on the definitions and DV can sometimes include violence between family members that do not live together or people who are unrelated who do live together.

DV and IPV are very topical in Australia at the moment. The Australian federal government is running TV advertisements on domestic violence in which they tell us:

> "Violence against Women. Let's stop it at the start".

The message from the Australian federal government is clear. They keep telling us that DV is something that men do to women and that what we need to do is modify the behaviour of young impressionable boys to fix the problem.

The truth is rather different.

The report released by the Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC), entitled Domestic/family homicide in Australia shows that over a 10 year period 25% of intimate partner homicides in Australia were of men. This can be found in Table 3 of the linked report.

Most of the community is entirely unaware that such a high proportion of deaths resulting from IPV are men. If feminists know they normally respond by making one of the following two claims:

(1) The women killed the men in self defence and/or after a long period of torment at the hands of the men, also known as Battered Wife Syndrome(BWS)

Self defence involves a situation in which a person has to use force to save themselves from harm. In some cases the law excuses a person who has killed someone else as it was necessary to protect their own life.

BWS involves a woman killing her male intimate partner not when there is a need for self defence but later, often when he is asleep. Increasingly Australian courts have accepted BWS as a defence to a charge of murder or manslaughter of a woman's male intimate partner.

The National Homicide Monitoring Program which the above report draws its data from uses the definition of homicide presented here.

> In this report, the term homicide refers to a person killed (unlawfully); a homicide incident is an event in which one or more persons are killed at the same place and time. Homicide is defined by the criminal law of each Australian state and territory. As a result, varying definitions exist between states and territories in terms of its degree, culpability and intent. The definition of homicide in the NHMP reflects the operational definition used by police throughout Australia. As such, the NHMP collects data on the following incidents:
>
> * all cases resulting in a person or persons being charged with murder or manslaughter. This excludes driving-related fatalities, except those that immediately follow a criminal event such as armed robbery or motor vehicle theft; > * all murder–suicides classed as murder by police; and > * all other deaths classed by police as homicides (including infanticides), whether or not an offender has been > apprehended.

>
> Excluded from this definition is attempted murder and violent deaths, such as industrial accidents involving criminal negligence (unless a charge of manslaughter is laid). Lawful homicide, including that by police in the course of their duties, is also excluded.

(2) Other men killed the men in gay relationships.

The standard reports generated by the AIC don't provide a breakdown of the genders of spouses or the specific nature of their relationship in intimate partner homicides. A representative of the One in Three organisation arranged for a custom report to be generated by the AIC. The custom report does provide this information.

Table 9 in the custom report breaks down unlawful killings by gender and the nature of the relationship. Reviewing the information on men unlawfully killed as a result of IPV we find:

Woman unlawfully killed her husband: 8
Woman unlawfully killed her male defacto: 13
Woman unlawfully killed her boyfriend: 3
Woman unlawfully killed her male extramarital lover: 1
Woman unlawfully killed her ex-boyfriend: 1
Man unlawfully killed his boyfriend/male spouse: 1

In 26 of 27 cases the person who unlawfully killed the man was a woman.

The data is clear. 25% of intimate partner homicides in Australia are of men. In the overwhelming majority of cases the killer was a woman. While self-defence may be available to both men and women as a defence, BWS is apparently only available to women.

The federal and state governments in Australia can no longer ignore the reality of their own data. They must stop pushing a gendered narrative of DV and IPV.

The forces on men

AVfM Video Source · 31 January 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This video takes a look at the forces on men in our culture. It shows how the power of gynocentrism filters down to a wide variety of places, some unexpected, in order to negatively impact men and boys.

Drs. John Russell and Ivan Connell of Hillsborough, Auckland, NZ "Known Genital Mutilators"

Gary Costanza · 4 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Drs. John Russell and Ivan Connell of Hillsborough Medical Centre, Auckland, New Zealand have been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

The Hillsborough Medical Centre website claims that the doctors provide "high quality, comprehensive healthcare," but all they appear to do is mutilate infant boys' genitals, which is not necessary, comprehensive or caring. And far from "healthcare," circumcision is risky, unethical, and sometimes deadly.

From "About Circumcision:"

"Circumcision of infant boys has been practised for centuries for religious and cultural reasons. It involves the removal of the prepuce of the foreskin, which is the skin that covers the tip of the penis.
Some believe there are benefits such as cleanliness and reduced cancer risk. It also avoids the occasional need for it to be done when the child is older involving a general anaesthetic and significant postoperative discomfort.

Deciding whether to have your newborn son circumcised can be difficult. You will have to consider both the benefits and risks of circumcision. Other factors such as your culture, religion and personal preference will also affect your decision.

As parents you have the right to decide what is in the best interests of your child. The information contained in this pamphlet may help you make your decision. If you have any concerns or questions, talk to one of our doctors before making an appointment for this procedure."

Wrong, wrong, wrong. Circumcision in modern times was meant to diminish sexual pleasure in boys and therefore stop masturbation, totally devoid of ethics or any medical reasoning.

The "decision" really isn't difficult – you allow the boy to decide when he grows up; it's not the parent's body, so it's not the parent's decision. And mutilation for religious reasons is just as wrong for boys as for girls.

Reading on:

> Are there any benefits from circumcision?
>
> Studies have provided conflicting results. Most authorities say that the benefits of circumcision are not significant enough to recommend it as a routine procedure. Urine infection and some sexually transmitted infections are thought to be less common in circumcised boys. Cancer of the penis although rare is also less common in men circumcised as infants.

Correction: all medical authorities do not recommend it as a routine procedure, and the American Academy of Pediatrics warns that surgery of this type on infants is harmful to the immature nervous system of a baby.

We read further:

> How is circumcision done?
>
> There are many different methods used, but our research shows that the Plastibell device is one of the safest to use in infants under local anaesthetic. The Plastibell is a plastic ring that is fitted over the head of the penis under the foreskin. It is then firmly secured by a special tie so that no stitches or dressings are required. The remaining foreskin is then removed leaving a consistent length of foreskin. The Plastibell is designed so that the baby can urinate normally.

How barbaric, an invention made of plastic to maim, mutilate and disfigure healthy baby boys genitals. Hopefully the doctor picks the right size “Plastibell” or your child may suffer a lifetime of misery or even death.

Then we read:

> Are there any complications?
> Both Dr Connell and Dr Russell are highly experienced having done over 5000 operations. This method has a very low rate of complications. Parents should notify the doctor beforehand of any family history of bleeding problems or if your baby has not had the Vitamin K injection at delivery. Occasionally there can be minor infection or bleeding. The amount of foreskin removed can vary. Longer term there occasionally can be narrowing of the urinary outlet or anaesthetic complications.”

There’s one problem right there – many circumcision deaths have been caused by surgery on babies with bleeding disorders that were unknown till the baby bled to death.

Further on, they do offer links to The Royal Australasian College of Physicians website and their position on circumcision, which agrees with every other medical organization that they do not recommend routine circumcision of newborns.

Here’s an excerpt from that paper that touches on issues of ethics and autonomy and hints that circumcision may be illegal:

> LEGAL STATUS OF INFANT CIRCUMCISION
> Circumcision of males is legal in Australia, New Zealand, the UK, USA and Canada. However, routine neonatal circumcision has been declared unlawful in South Africa, Sweden (except on religious grounds) and Finland.
>
> New Zealand health practitioners who perform the procedure are covered by a number of laws and regulations. Circumcision is defined as a restricted activity under the Health Practitioners Competency Assurance Act (2003).[116] This means that the procedure is only to be performed by a medical practitioner. The legal acceptance in Australia & New Zealand is based on clearly established rights of parents to make decisions about medical treatment for their children. Society may however decide to place limitations on the scope of such parental choices if significant harm results from such choices.
>
> The British Medical Association’s statement on the Law and Ethics of Male Circumcision states that “if it was shown that circumcision where there is no clinical need is prejudicial to a child’s health and well being it is likely that a legal challenge on human rights ground would be successful. Indeed if damage to health was proven there may be obligations on the State to proscribe it”.
>
> ETHICAL CONSIDERATIONS OF NEONATAL CIRCUMCISION
> Circumcision of infant males is a medical procedure. The ethics of this medical procedure fall within the ethical framework which applies to all medical procedures performed on children. This framework has 3 main principles: (1) Focus on the child, and their needs and interests; (2) minimisation of harm to the child (including prevention of avoidable/unnecessary harm); (3) recognition of the child’s parents as the decisionmakers for the child (on the basis that this best promotes the child’s interests and wellbeing).
> The standard ethical position is that parents have the right and obligation to make medical decisions for their child – a right which can only be taken away from parents if their decision is significantly detrimental to the child. The standard ethical obligations of doctors are to act in the child’s best interests, not cause excessive or avoidable suffering to a child, and provide the child’s parents with information so that they are able to make a fully informed decision about their child's health care. A basic ethical requirement for performing a medical procedure on a child is that it can reasonably be expected to produce more benefits than burdens (in the long term) for the child.

Parental reasons for wanting infant male circumcision fall broadly into three categories: (1) health, (2) hygiene and appearance, and (3) religio-cultural reasons. Depending on their reasons, parents are aiming to secure different types of benefits for their child: physical health (medical) benefits, and/or psychosocial benefits of various kinds. The physical health benefits for a male of being circumcised (e.g. reduced risk of HIV infection) could largely be obtained by deferring circumcision to a much later age. The psychosocial benefits that parents seek, including full inclusion and participation in a religious or cultural community, or fitting in with family and social group norms, often cannot be obtained unless circumcision is done in the newborn period, as required by the religious or cultural customs.

Since circumcision involves physical risks which are undertaken for the sake of psychosocial benefits or debatable medical benefit to the child, the ethical question is whether it is ethically justifiable to allow parents to make this decision for their child – or is it a parental decision which ought to be overridden because it is detrimental to the interests of the child?

There are analogous situations where parents decide on medical procedures for a child that involve physical risk to the child, and where the intended benefits are primarily psychosocial. Cosmetic procedures are an obvious example – e.g. removal of skin lesions, pinning of ears, re-shaping of the skull. The psychosocial benefits (fitting in, not being subject to ridicule or exclusion) are often regarded as clearly worth the physical risks of the procedure. Obtaining bone marrow from one child for transplant to a sibling is another clear example of seeking psychosocial benefits (i.e. survival of a sibling) at the risk of physical distress and harm. Thus infant male circumcision is not ethically unique. Physical risk to children is sometimes tolerated for the sake of psychosocial benefit to them. For infant male circumcision, the issue is whether the risk/benefit ratio is within reasonable bounds, and hence able to be left to the discretion of parents.

Some of the risks of circumcision are low in frequency but high in impact (death, loss of penis); others are higher in frequency but much lower in impact (infection, which can be treated quickly and effectively, with no lasting ill-effects). Low impact risks, when they are readily correctable, do not carry great ethical significance. Evaluation of the significance of high-impact low-frequency risks is ethically contentious and variable between individuals. Some are more risk averse than others. However, a statistical risk of death is not generally regarded as an absolute barrier. Most patients and most people in general accept the very low probability of death as a risk they are willing to take in pursuit of medical benefits, lifestyle, recreation, employment, and so on. The benefits of circumcision (or disadvantages of non-circumcision) are not readily assessable by doctors (unless they happen to belong to the same religious or social community as the parents), as they depend upon the role of circumcision within that community.

This suggests that parents are in principle better placed than doctors to weigh up the risks and benefits of circumcision for male infants. It is ethically appropriate for the decision about infant male circumcision to be left in parents' hands, with the proviso that the decision may be overridden in individual cases where circumcision poses greater than average physical risks to the child (for example, because of concurrent morbidities). To deny parents the option to choose circumcision for their male infant would be to judge that > it is clearly detrimental to a child's overall well being and interests in all circumstances. Parents will need comprehensive, accurate information about the procedure (including options for how, when and by whom it might be performed), the risks, and how these could be minimised or managed if they occur. The information to be provided legitimately includes the opinion or recommendation of the doctor. Doctors who have a conscientious objection to performing infant male circumcision should make this known and refer parents to another doctor.

>
> The option of leaving circumcision until later, when the boy is old enough to make a decision for himself does need to be raised with parents and considered. This option has recently been recommended by the Royal Dutch Medical Association.[119] The ethical merit of this option is that it seeks to respect the child's physical integrity, and capacity for autonomy by leaving the options open for him to make his own autonomous choice in the future. However, deferring the decision may not always be the best option. As noted earlier, the psychosocial benefits of circumcision (e.g. full inclusion in a religious community) may only be obtained if circumcision is done in infancy. Waiting until the boy is twelve years old or more (i.e. old enough to make his own decision) may mean losing benefits that circumcision was intended to produce.
>
> Children may grow up to disagree with decisions that parents have made for them when they were young. This cannot always be prevented or avoided. Some decisions have to be made at the time. The later disagreement of the child does not show that the parents' decision at the time was unethical or wrong. Parents and doctors have to decide the basis of their own evaluations of benefits and burdens, being aware that they are making predictions and that nothing is guaranteed. A boy circumcised as an infant may deeply resent this when he grows older; he may want what he cannot have – not to have been circumcised. But it is also possible that a boy not circumcised as an infant (so that he can make his own decision later), may also deeply resent this. He may also want what he cannot now have – to have been circumcised as a baby.
>
> SUMMARY OF LEGAL & ETHICAL ISSUES
> In New Zealand and Australia at the present time, newborn and infant male circumcision is legal and generally considered an ethical procedure, if performed with informed parental consent and by a competent practitioner with provision of adequate analgesia. In the absence of evidence of risk of substantial harm, informed parental choice should be respected. Informed parental consent should include the possibility that the ethical principle of autonomy may be better fulfilled by deferring the circumcision to adolescence with the young man consenting on his own behalf.

Since the doctors have incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more by visiting the video and research pages at neonatalcutting.org.

Bonus Intactivist Video: "Unrepresented Voices in Circumcision." From the description: "The bioethics discourse around neonatal circumcision rarely includes the perspectives of the infant, parents with regret, adults who dissent, or conscientious objectors. Yet, these marginalized narratives are among the most telling and important to consider."

The doctors' practice information follows:

Dr Russell 027 481 5744
Dr Connell 021 313 030

Office phone 09 625 7010

165 Hillsborough Road, Hillsborough, Auckland,
New Zealand

> Drs. John Russell and Ivan Connell of Hillsborough, Auckland, NZ “Known Genital Mutilators” https://t.co/VLWsdlciKm #MGM #circumcision pic.twitter.com/azOqLwJFLW
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 4, 2017

Byzantine bride-shows: mothers dominate sons choice of wives

Douglas Galbi · 4 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A seldom-recognized historical antecedent to today's beauty pageants is bride-shows that occurred early in the Byzantine Empire. Byzantine bride-shows selected, from a wide-ranging search, the bride for the Emperor or the Emperor's heir. After becoming Empress, a woman sometimes went on to rule in her own right, thus the Byzantine bride-show provided a remarkably open opportunity for a woman to gain a place at the top of society.[1] In relation to ordinary person's lives, Byzantine bride-shows suggest risks in a mother dominating the choice of her son's wife even in a relatively tolerant society.

Men in pursuing intimate relationships are usually attracted to beautiful women. Today, that preference tends to be disparaged. For being attracted to a woman who was not fat, one young man recently was called bigoted and mean, and he was slapped. At a much higher level of social salience, the Harvard men's soccer team recently had their whole season canceled because some team members were privately rating the attractiveness of members of the women's soccer team. Simply stating that young, slender, warmly receptive women are much more sexually attractive than old, fat, bitterly men-hating women is well on its way to becoming a criminal offense in modern, democratic societies.

Compared to such societies, medieval Byzantine society was more tolerant and allowed greater personal freedom. In the fourteenth-century Byzantine romance Belthandros and Chrysantza, the King of Eros ordered Belthandros to select the most beautiful woman from among forty noble women. Belthandros told one that she had "flabby and superfluous flesh." After she stepped forward for his judgment and stepped back from his rejection, her body was "drenched with much perspiration." Belthandros rejected other women for having a frigid mind, red and bleary eyes, a unibrow, an improperly proportioned body, bad teeth and hairy hands. The woman Belthandros selected as the most beautiful he described as having fallen from the bosom of the moon:

> Her hair is the color of gold and matches her figure. Its thickness is like that of the grass of Paradise or of celery in a garden. All the graces of the world seem to sit upon her and make her their dwelling. Certainly, beyond any doubt, her forehead bears your {the King of Eros's} imprint of mottled gold. If a man casts a glance at her eyes, they immediately tear at the roots of his heart. In the depths of their lake tiny cupids swim, shoot their arrows and sport. Art created her jet-black eyebrows and with consummate skill made them bridges. The Graces forged the fair one's nose and to the Graces belong her mouth and her pearly teeth. Her cheeks are rose-red, her lips have the color of nature. Certainly, her mouth is perfumed. Her chin is round in shape, she is tall and her arms are white and delicate, her neck is as from a lathe. Her waist is slender and shows the great skill of the one who fashioned it like a thin reed. As for the angle of her neck and her litheness! Indeed, her body is so perfect in composition that the Graces seem to come from her. Her bosom is a paradise of love. The apples {of her breasts} shine even on a casual glance. Her look and gait are miraculous. When she walks with confidence and glances up and down, she ravishes your senses and tears at discretion. [2]

This description strangely omits the women's buttocks. Nonetheless, Belthandros and Chrysantza indicates that men in medieval Byzantium had considerable freedom of expression in judging women's beauty.

The marriage of Sophia of Montferrat and John VIII Palaiologos in Constantinople in 1421 underscores the importance to men of a bride's appearance. John agreed to marry Sophia, sight unseen, as part of a grand strategy to build a political alliance and gain military aid for Constantinople. However, aspects of Sophia's appearance turned out to be unpleasant:

> The young woman was extremely well-proportioned in body. Her neck was shapely, her hair blondish with braids flowing down to her ankles like glimmering golden streams. Her shoulders were broad and her arms, bosom, and hands well-proportioned. Her fingers were transparent. She was tall in stature and stood very > straight — but her face and and lips, the condition of her nose, and the arrangement of her eyes and eyebrows were extremely unpleasant. In general, she may be described in the words of the vulgar adage: "Lent from the front and Easter from behind." [3]

John never slept with his wife Sophia. After five years of sexless marriage, Sophia returned home and became a nun in the Dominican convent at Trino.

Byzantine mothers recognized men's interest in women's beauty. The Emperor's wife Eudocia in 882 arranged a bride-show for her son Leo. She selected twelve beautiful women from her own native city. She interviewed them and then narrowed the group to three for closer examination:

> All the rest she ordered to go home, after she had provided them with many presents and much money. Only these three she took with her to the Palace. Examining them in a bath and finding that the saint {Theophano} by far surpassed the other two in beauty, she dressed her in imperial garments, took her by the right hand and went in to see her husband the Emperor Basil. Throwing her at his feet, she proclaimed her a worthy bride for their son. [4]

At his wife's behest, the Emperor forced their son Leo to marry Theophano. While Theophano apparently was quite beautiful in the nude, Leo found her unattractive in other ways. He complained, "{I} did not marry her of my own free will, but out of fear of my father, and greatly distressed."[5] Soon after marrying Theophano, Leo took a mistress. About five years after their marriage, Theophano retired to a convent and lived as a nun. After she died, Leo promptly married his mistress.[6] Even if a mother makes a thorough inspection of a potential wives in a bride-show, her son's marital pleasure isn't ensured.

In Byzantine bride-shows, the royal mother dominated the selection of her son's wife. For example, the Byzantine Empress Irene in 788 organized a bride-show for her eighteen-year-old son Constantine VI. Under her orders, envoys searched across the full expanse of the Empire for suitably beautiful women. The envoys carried an imperial measure, an ideal portrait, and a shoe to evaluate women's height, facial appearance, and feet.[7] Thirteen promising candidates were brought to the Byzantine capital. Empress Irene and Stauracius, the head of government, reviewed the women. They judged Maria of Amnia to have the most beauty, intelligence, and grace.[8] Constantine VI, however, disliked the choice of Maria of Amnia for his wife. He soon came to hate her. He even claimed that she was trying to poison him. In 795, Constantine sent Maria and her daughters to live in convent. He then remarried in the following year.[9] In remarrying, he presumably chose his own wife.

Men deserve the right to choose freely a beautiful wife according to their own sense of beauty. In four out of the five historically documented Byzantine bride-shows, the mother of the groom organized the bride-show and either chose or effectively rigged what sort of woman became her son's wife. In the remaining bride-show, the mother couldn't dominate because she apparently was dead.[10] A leading historian of the Byzantine bride-shows observed:

> bride-shows generally served the imperial parents well, even if they served the imperial bride-grooms rather less well. … In most cases the wishes of the bridegrooms were ignored. [11]

Today, parents who understand the extent of anti-men discrimination in family courts might well encourage their sons not to marry. But if a man wants to get married, he should be able to have a bride-show, judge the participants as he considers appropriate, and make his own free choice.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] On the historicity of the bride-shows, Treadgold (2004). On women at the top of Byzantine society, see the highly regarded gynocentric scholarship of Judith Herrin, e.g. Herrin (2001) and Herrin (2013). Men's opportunities to ascend to the top of society are much more tightly circumscribed than women's are.

Today, beauty pageants privilege women who are already extraordinarily privileged in attractiveness. These beauty pageants are relatively insignificant gynocentric spectacles.

[2] Belthandros and Chrysantza, from Greek trans. Betts (1995) p. 18. The previous short quotes are from id., pp. 15-7. Belthandros went on to marry the woman he selected as most beautiful, but that marriage didn't follow directly from the beauty pageant.

[3] Doukas (fifteenth-century Byzantine historian), Fall of Constantinople, from Greek trans. Magoulias (1975), quoted and revised by Gilliland Wright (2013) p. 135. The vulgar adage, "Lent from the front and Easter from behind" suggests the frigidity of death and Boccaccio's sense of the resurrection of the flesh. A current, less cultured version of that adage is, "She's a butterface {but-her-face}."

[4] Life of Saint Theophano, excerpt, from Greek trans. Rydén (1985) p. 185. Treadgold (1979) p. 407 provides a similar translation. The Life of Saint Theophano was written after 900 GC, probably by Magister Slocacas, a relative of Theophano. Alexakis (1995).

The bride selection process described in Esther 2:2-18 involved the king sleeping with each candidate successively. That rather modern selection process goes further than having one's mother inspect naked wife-candidates. Both procedures help to lessen a concern expressed in Theophrastus's Golden Book on Marriage.

[5] Vita Euthymii, excerpt trans. Treadgold (1979) p. 408.

[6] Theophano died about 897. Leo VI's mistress and subsequent wife was Zoe Zaoutzaina. She died about 899. Leo then married Eudokia Baïana, who died in 901. Despite strong church opposition, Leo married a fourth time (to Zoe Karbonopsina).

All of Leo's wives were "immortalized by unofficial sainthood and by imperially sanctioned art." Gerstel (1997) p. 707. A contemporary commenter related the popular adoration of Theophano to Lucian's account of Alexander's attempt to deify his close friend Hephaestion:

> the same thing has also happened in our time and everybody is seized by a hysteria characteristic of women so as to proclaim the emperor's {late wife} Theophano a saint.

Scholiast, attributed to Magistros Slokakas, from Greek trans. Alexakis (1995) p. 47.

[7] The specific characteristics of the imperial measure (βασιλικόν μέτρον), the ideal portrait (λαυρᾶτον), and the shoe (τζαγγιον) aren't known. The original Greek terms are given in Rydén (1985) p. 175.

[8] Women in the bride-shows were not judged merely on beauty. Treadgold (1979) pp. 409-10. Cf. Vinson (2004) pp. 105, 119: "the winner was chosen solely on the basis of physical appearance"; Byzantine bride shows defined "beauty as the sole measure of a woman's worth." Vinson nonetheless declares:

> This heart-wrenching disparity between the fictionalised ideal of courtship and the lived reality of elite women should instill in us a healthy sense of caution as we approach the problem of Byzantine bride shows.

Id. p. 105.

[9] For the evidence on the bride-show for Constantine VI, see Treadgold (1979), pp. 397-400, and Rydén (1985), pp. 175-6. The account of this bride-show indicates the challenges of maintaining solidarity among women:

> The merciful man's granddaughter {Maria of Amnia} suggested to the others, "My sisters, let us make an agreement among ourselves of the kind called sisterhood by adoption that the one of us who becomes empress should take care of the others." But Gerontianos' daughter, who was very rich and good-looking, answered, full > of conceit, “I know for certain that I am the richest and noblest and best-looking and that the emperor will choose me.” Maria blushed and said no more.

From Nicetas of Amnia, Life of St. Philaretos the Merciful (dated 821/22), from Greek trans. Rydén (1985) p. 175. Rydén (2002) provides a full critical edition. Solidarity among women is more easily maintained in oppressing men.

[10] On Stauracius’s mother apparently being dead, Treadgold (1979) p. 409. In three of the five bride-shows, the father was dead. Here’s a table of the bride-show participants and parents. Two facts underscores mothers’ dominance in organizing and running the bride-shows: a mother (Irene) organized the first one, and a mother (Eudocia Ingerina) dominated the bride-show in which the father was also living. Vinson (1999) discusses how bride shows affirmed traditional gender roles.

Having the father run the bride-show, which was less consistent with traditional gender roles, also didn’t serve the son’s interests. Nicephorus I, Stauracius’s father, organized and ran the bride-show for Stauracius in 807. Nicephorus reportedly debauched two participants. He married his son to Theophano, a less beautiful participant. Moreover, Theophano had already been betrothed and had already had sex with her betrothed many times. Treadgold (1979) p. 401.

[11] Treadgold (1979) p. 413, Treadgold (2004) p. 50. Serving to buttress dominate ideology, Vinson declares:

> In creating the illusion of romance and equality, the accounts of the Byzantine bride shows conceal the darker truth that their focus on female beauty serves as a means of disempowering the bride and her family and placing the wife under the exclusive control of her husband. The marriages arranged in this manner can thus be seen as a reversion to a type of wedlock common in the old Roman republic …

Vinson (2004) p. 120. For nineteenth-century American context relevant to Vinson’s perspective, consider Sanger’s influential work on prostitution and the Crabtree case.

[images] (1) Choosing a Bride for the Grand Duke. Oil on canvas painting by Ilya Repin, 1884-87. Held in the Perm State Art Gallery, Russia. The Grand Duke is probably Grand Duke Nikolay Nikolayevich Romanov of Russia (the Elder, 1831-91). Thanks to Wikimedia Commons; (2) Jury for the 1973 Miss Amsterdam beauty pageant. Dutch National Archives, The Hague, Fotocollectie Algemeen Nederlands Persbureau (ANeFo), 1945-1989, Nummer toegang 2.24.01.05 Bestanddeelnummer 926-4364. Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Alexakis, Alexander. 1995. “Leo VI, Theophano, a ‘Magistros’ Called Slokakas, and the ‘Vita Theophano’ (BHG 1794).” Byzantinische Forschungen 21 (Stephanos Efthymiadis, Claudia Rapp, and Dimitris Tsougarakis, eds.

Bosphorus: Essays in the Honour of Cyril Mango): 45-56.

Betts, Gavin. 1995. Three medieval Greek romances. Garland Library of Medieval Literature, vol. 98. New York: Garland Pub.

Gerstel, Sharon E. J. 1997. "Saint Eudokia and the Imperial Household of Leo VI." The Art Bulletin. 79 (4): 699-707.

Gilliland Wright, Diana. 2013. "The Brides of 1420: Men Looking at Women's Bodies." Ch. 8 (pp. 133-52) in Neil, Bronwen, and Lynda Garland, eds. Questions of gender in Byzantine society. Farnham, Surrey, England: Ashgate, Herrin, Judith. 2001. Women in purple: rulers of Medieval Byzantium. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Herrin, Judith. 2013. Unrivalled influence: women and empire in Byzantium. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Magoulias, Harry J. trans. 1975. Doukas. Decline and fall of Byzantium to the Ottoman Turks. Detroit: Wayne State University Press.

Rydén, Lennart. 1985. "The bride-shows at the Byzantine court: history or fiction?" Eranos: Acta Philologica Suecana. 83(1-2): 175-191.

Rydén, Lennart. 2002. The life of St Philaretos the merciful written by his grandson Niketas: a critical edition with introduction, translation, notes, and indices. Uppsala: Uppsala University Library.

Treadgold, Warren T. 1979. "The Bride-Shows of the Byzantine Emperors." Byzantion: revue internationale des études byzantines (Brussels). 49*:* 395-413.

Treadgold, Warren. 2004. "The Historicity of Imperial Bride-Shows." Jahrbuch der Österreichischen Byzantinistik. 54: 39-52.

Vinson, Martha. 1999. "The life of Theodora and the rhetoric of the Byzantine bride show." Jahrbuch Der Österreichischen Byzantinistik. 49: 31-60.

Vinson, Martha. 2004. "Romance and reality in the Byzantine bride shows." Ch. 6 (pp. 102-20) in Brubaker, Leslie, and Julia M. H. Smith, eds. Gender in the early medieval world: East and West, 300-900. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

De-constructing sentiment 1: The Empathy Gap

Nat Godot · 6 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Many men blame feminists for the fact that they feel marooned in the tidal movement of social change. But this is misplaced blame. Because their problems started much earlier than the birth of feminism. After all, feminism is a relatively new phenomenon. So there has to be something else at work in the background that has been causing hurt to men.

Actually, the reason why so many feminist ideas have gained such prominence has less to do with logic and truth than it does with sentiment. There is after all a disparity of sentiment between the genders which overwhelms factual evidence and undermines logical argument. The problem is that feminists did not invent this disparity. As Prof. Janice Fiamengo says, "Feminism didn't create this asymmetrical concern out of nothing. It was already there in the DNA of our culture."[1] Feminists have certainly worked hard at amplifying it, and they have done so with the cooperation of important social agencies. But the truth is that it existed long before feminism.

Therefore the whole effort about men engaging in dialogue with feminists is flawed unless men understand the powers women possess, how they use those powers, and for what purpose. The dogmas of feminism are after all ultimately rooted in more general female attitudes that view relationships with males in terms of their value. This simple observable fact, coupled with the biological supremacy of females, normalises behaviours and attitudes towards men which would be considered farcical and unacceptable in any other context.

As far as the wider body of women goes though, they are getting a free ride. They may feign to keep their distance from the more extreme semantics of feminist rhetoric, and they may feign to excuse individual men. But they are complicit by their knowing silence, and they will continue that silence for so long as they see some material advantage in it. However, as soon as their expectations of material advantage start to be threatened, those women will be the ones to expose the self-interest and personal biases of their own presumptive leaders.

So it is a matter of the utmost importance to take a critical look at the disparity of sentiment between the genders. I have to start out though by first acknowledging the fundamental fact that babies are imprinted emotionally and psychologically through intimate contact with their mothers from the earliest moments of their lives, and throughout their most important formative experiences, with the presumption of female virtue and innocence. This presumption then becomes the bedrock for many of the illusions that benefit women exclusively. In particular, opening the door for what some writers describe as the 'empathy gap' between the genders.[2]

One of the ironies regarding this issue is that even though the myths engendered by the presumption of female innocence require constant feeding, its own continued existence depends on obscurity. Therefore it requires some practice to follow. Nonetheless, there are signs to read, and it is worth the effort.

Jane Austen offers us some insight in her book Pride and Prejudice.[3] This book is widely acclaimed by women as 'inspiring' literature, and we underestimate the coded meaning of such words at our peril. In fact there are very good reasons why so many women describe this work of romantic fiction in such a strange way. Because its whole narrative is about nothing more and nothing less than social climbing. In this context, Austen uses the hero (Darcy) to issue an important caution to women when he says,

> "..there is a meanness in all the arts which ladies sometimes condescend to employ for captivation. Whatever bears affinity to cunning is despicable."

By this warning therefore the author impresses on her readers how vital the appearance of innocence is to courtship. We can understand the necessity of this warning more clearly if we remember that the problems faced by rich people in Austen's time are perennial problems faced by rich people even today. And one of the biggest of these problems is for them to know which person to trust when so many want to be their friend. Therefore Austen's warning to women is that if you want to go up the social ladder, you have to maintain the appearance of sincerity. So this is the point about the presumption of innocence. It creates an atmosphere in which people can be easily manipulated and exploited.

The author further elaborates her point in the words of one of the sub-heroines. Her name is Charlotte, and it is this character who comments on the initial dislike of the main heroine Elizabeth, for the hero, Darcy. For the purposes of romantic and literary trickery Darcy must eventually win the approval of the heroine. But at the early stage of the story, Elizabeth is still not convinced. So Charlotte says, "…all her friend's dislike would vanish if she (Elizabeth) could suppose him to be in her power."[3]

This statement is one of those pivotal messages that explains a great deal about why this story is so admired by women. Because it suggests to its readers that a woman may forgive a man's faults if it is to her benefit, and for the same reason, create an impression that he needs to be forgiven, even when he does not. Besides that, it reveals how the presumption of innocence bestows power. Because Austen's heroine could not conceivably exercise power over the hero if he did not presume her to be innocent.

So by following the footsteps that Austen lays out for her like-minded readers, we can observe that this presumption of innocence lies at the heart of female power, and of female deception. In this context then, it becomes both natural and inevitable that so many women should work so hard to monopolise the perception of victim-hood.

By this stage now I imagine that some of you are looking for something to contradict. But please don't waste your time contradicting me. It would be better if you direct your energies instead to the BBC. Because in 2004 the BBC[4] arranged a survey of sorts to find out what books women found to be most inspiring. The Women's Hour programme invited listeners to find the "top 10 novels that have changed the way we see women." Programme listeners were asked to choose a life-changing book that "has spoken to you on a personal level – it may have changed the way you look at yourself or simply made you happy to be a woman." And the winner by many thousands of votes was Austen's book, Pride and Prejudice.

Doctor Lisa Jardine was chosen to lead this project, which was called Women's Watershed Fiction, and she explained during her promotional interview with The Sunday Times that "women think deeply and strategically about forming relationships, whereas men don't think about it much at all." And then she added helpfully that, "…men could learn a lot from the books."[5]

So there you have it, unintentionally one must presume, from a leading feminist historian. She said that, when it comes to relationships, women are strategic thinkers, and they are inspired by books like Pride and Prejudice. But what is it about this book, one should ask, or indeed any of the others that made the top 10 list that would make them appeal to the instincts of strategic thinkers? Well, the answer to that question becomes abundantly clear when we view Pride and Prejudice as a continuation of the princess stories. Think about it. What is the difference between Pride and Prejudice, and the earlier princess stories like Sleeping Beauty, Cinderella, Snow White, and Rapunzel? Actually, the answer is, not much. Because they all pursue a common theme of social climbing for girls.

There are of course some strategic differences. Because the earlier princess stories appeared, at least on the surface, to speak about the dreams of little girls. But Austen translated these childhood dreams in to the fantasies of adult women. She did away with the prince and his castle and kingdom. But she replaced them with a very wealthy aristocrat. She also disposed of the beautiful girl idea in favour of a grown up woman whose claim to attention and admiration rested on her wit. So from the point of view of strategic thinkers, Pride and Prejudice makes the justification and the rewards of the princess stories accessible to a wider range of women.

In fact this underlying trail of literary evidence begins at least from the medieval princess stories, then wends its way through the Georgian and Victorian parlour aspirations of writers like Austen and Bronte, and on in to some very modern tales of romance. So it is not a vague and accidental whim, nor even an astrological coincidence. However, it is demonstrably a very old strategy, and it is a strategy that depends entirely on the myth of female innocence for its efficacy.

This pattern of self-interest in the words and behaviour of women is revealing even when we allow it to stand alone, but it starts to acquire a more self-conscious complexion when we juxtapose it with the trail of story telling that has guided the footsteps of young boys throughout the same period. Because, in contrast to the succession of princess stories for little girls, little boys received their lessons in self awareness from stories like The Boy Who Cried Wolf, The Emperor with no Clothes, and The Adventures of Pinocchio.

By contrast with the princess stories, these stories offer no material reward to their heroes. Indeed, the experience of love enjoyed by the heroines of the princess stories is confirmed by the fact that they are freed forever from a life of poverty. But Pinocchio's experience of love is the love of his father, which he has to express by working hard so that he can take care of him in his old age. The purely adult interest that fosters this idea is made clear when the good fairy finally concedes to grant the wish of Pinocchio[6] to be a real boy. She says, "In reward for your kind heart, I forgive you for all your old mischief. Boys who love and take care of their parents when they are old and sick deserve praise even though they may not be held up as models of obedience and good behaviour."

Unlike the princess stories therefore, there is no sympathy, nor admiration, nor even material reward to be found here. Even at the final moment when young boys might anticipate a happy ending, their minds are drip fed with grudging praise that they realise when they get older is no praise at all. The modern film version of Pinocchio omitted some of the moral hectoring contained in the original. But it compensated for that by introducing the idea that Pinnochio's nose would grow longer when he told a lie, thereby including something from 'The Boy Who Cried Wolf.' It should hardly come as any kind of surprise therefore that the myth of female innocence, and its converse argument about males is so deeply entrenched in modern culture. Of course it does not explain everything about how these myths are propagated, but it gives a good indication of the driving forces behind them.

These stories collectively don't have any single origin or author, but they do collectively sort themselves in a pattern that conforms with female self-interest in a truly creepy way that is impossible to dismiss as coincidence. So this is where we find the motive that causes so many women to be so eager to denigrate men. It does have something to do with feminism, but it is in truth considerably older than the 'newspeak' of feminism.

It is therefore an inadequate response to address ourselves exclusively to the distortions of feminists, expecting that if only we could convince them to consider real evidence then we might somehow reach a common and logical understanding. The problem is that the behaviours which feminists exhibit are simply a modern iteration of an older and broader habit which will probably outlive feminism.

So it becomes obvious when we think about the princess stories that they play with our capacity for sympathy. That is not to say that they play with all of us equally, or in quite the same way. Because these stories heighten the capacity for sympathy in males, and heighten the expectation of sympathy in females.

The problem is, that when that sympathy is given, both males and females infer that justice is being done. But this perception of justice is not confined to feminists, nor is it limited to the larger constituency of women. Because it is also a perception indulged with just as much enthusiasm by an equal number of men. In other words, it uncovers a much wider existential problem that we could follow in to some very modern interpretations of justice. But I won't go there right now. Except to acknowledge how often it happens that even when people think they are talking about justice, in fact they are being influenced by sentiment.

As time has passed, generations of women have accumulated these expectations of sympathy, and generations of men have been anaesthetised to the pain its absence causes them. Eventually the agents of commercial propaganda got involved, and for the purposes of seducing women, they magnified this disparity, and turned sympathy in to a commodity. Men can therefore haggle as much as they like with feminists, but advertisers welcome these arguments as a distraction from their own strategies. So they can continue to whisper 'because you deserve it' in the ears of a much wider female population, knowing that many of their listeners will translate those words as meaning 'because he owes me.'

Another irony is that this propaganda is played out in the sly knowledge that men in general have an abundant capacity for the very thing that they are accused of lacking. Namely, sympathy. So it is a very narrow outlook to think only about the ascendancy of feminist semantics. Because one day it can be religion, and the day after that politics, and the day after that, as we have seen, it can be nouveau affections of social justice. The fact is that we are vulnerable to them all for so long as we fail to bring the manipulation of sentiment in to the light of day. This especially requires a new awakening in the consciousness of men, going beyond any consideration of their own presumptions about manliness.

In fact the manipulation of sentiment is a systemic problem in modern society. Which is not to say that it never happened before, but simply that the technologies that we have developed in the last century make it possible to mass produce and broadcast sentiment in ways that were never possible before now. This presents new challenges, because the manipulation of public sentiment is pertinent to the resolution of many critical issues, such as social equity, rational political governance, the volatility of stock markets, and so on.

The particular problem as far as men are concerned though is that the technologies and organisations that mass produce sentiment are under the influence of the propaganda agents of the consumer society, and those agents have established an exclusive alliance with women. The particular problem as far as women are concerned is that this alliance requires them to adopt behaviours that are costly to maintain and which are damaging to their well-being, and to the well-being of those around them.

I will discuss these issues in another post. But for the present, let me conclude by pointing out that sometime in the future men may have reason to look back on the historical ascendancy of feminism with some gratitude. Because it is attracting more realistic attention to the powers women exert through the use of sentiment, and how these same powers are used by other agencies.

References:

[1] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=MKJ8x9ut1hU
[2] Equality for Men by Glen Poole
[3] Pride and Prejudice by Jane Austen; 1813
[4] Orange Prize for Fiction: Women's Watershed Fiction Long list announced, 2004
[5] Joyless Sex? A Great Read for Women, The Sunday Times, John Elliott 2004
[6] The Adventures of Pinocchio by Carlo Collodi, 1883

Feature image from Pride and Prejudice by Apostolos Letov

Where have all the good men gone?

AVfM Video Source · 7 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Don’t monkey around, sub to the Gnostic Ape here.

College Professor Exposes Women's March on Washington: Feminism is Cancer to Western Nations

AVfM Video Source · 7 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Alison Tieman and Mike Stephenson review new Audi commercial

AVfM Video Source · 7 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's that Audi commercial.

The original Audi commercial can be viewed HERE

Therapy and the broken man

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed · 8 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Darryl was a difficult patient I had been treating for several years who illustrated the contemporary challenges of his ilk. A stocky man in his forties, he shuffled into each appointment with a walking stick. At first sight, the stick gave him a distinguished quality but then a trace of his bare belly beneath a T-shirt that never quite fit over his bulging gut became visible.

“How are you travelling, Darryl?” I’d ask.

“Yeah, alright,” he’d mumble. “Fucken insurance pissing me off as usual.”

Darryl was being funded through worker’s compensation after suffering a crush injury to his lower back while lifting crates in a factory. He underwent several operations of inserting plates to metal rods in his spine, to the point where scans of his spine resembled a construction site, but his pain and mobility showed few signs of improvement.

His employer kept him on performing light duties, which was essentially a euphemism for doing the most basic paperwork, but the factory shut down after the manufacturing shifted overseas. He was made redundant but continued to receive compensation payments while he looked for alternative work.

There is an important term in mental health therapy called transference, which refers to the reactions patients arouse in therapists. A good therapist is acutely aware and can counter and override such emotions but also consider them as information about how the patient might affect other people in his life.

My mix of mild disdain and sympathy was awoken each time Darryl visited. He was the epitome of the bogan, the kind of figure the middle classes were desperate not to be associated with, or have their own aspirations for Australian identity tarnished by.

Darryl often wore striped football shirts and a beanie to appointments, even during the height of summer. He said it was to cover an emerging bald spot. He was the only patient to give me a beer coaster as a Christmas present, which I treasure. He even had a name for his penis, which he not so imaginatively called Rod, a name that emerged in our sessions if sexual side effects were being discussed. It was one area of his life where he retained a sense of humour. His childhood memories involved his father taking him to the greyhound races. Darryl was able to give a vivid account of the trips, despite having few words for his emotions.

“The bookies were loud. They’d be screaming the odds before the bloody hare came out. I remember some dog called Leah Turd that won at odds of twenty to one. We won a motza and my dad bought me a massive tub of ice cream,” he said with a stealthy grin.

But Darryl’s father also suffered a work injury as a carpenter and turned to alcohol. He grew more violent and unable to suppress his rage, started beating his wife, Darryl’s mother, a resourceful woman who worked as an aged care nurse and eventually left her husband. Darryl and his younger sister lived with their mother.

Darryl had at least one good decade, when he was married with his first wife, had two young children and a traineeship leading to work with Telecom. He was proud of his time working with the company during the Sydney Olympics, but was made redundant soon after. The marriage ended and his children became more distant. He claimed he could never tell them that it was their mother who was unfaithful, instead unable to temper his anger through vengeful outbursts in the home. His mood only worsened when his factory job was also stymied, first through injury and then through outsourcing.

Now, in my rooms, he was a ball of suppressed rage, usually projected internally in the form of vague thoughts of harming himself, and made worse after he had consumed his evening round of five or six stubbies of beer. He once took an overdose of a prescribed tranquiliser after his new partner threatened to leave him, a prospect that was looking more imminent if he didn’t show some improvement.

“It helps me sleep,” he says, in reference to his drinking. “If I take more of those pain meds, I can’t shit no more.”

But despite his efforts to minimise his rage, it would surface at a range of inopportune times. He had been banned from his stepdaughter’s primary school for fighting with the teachers, once because he thought too many merit certificates were being handed out – “It makes the kids soft”– and another occasion for verbally abusing the middle-aged woman helping at the pedestrian crossing. “She should have let me cross,” he insisted. “There weren’t any fucken’ cars.”

When he drove, Darryl would regularly find himself in heated bouts of road rage, once limping out of his car to threaten another driver for tailing him too closely. He admitted to casually swerving in the direction of people he didn’t like the look of.

“I like to give ’em a scare, especially if they look a bit up themself.”

On the rare occasions he visited the local shops, he was livid at the demographic changes in the area, a place his extended family had resided in for several generations. So many black and Asian faces, too many fancy designer labels and too few people or organisations backing people like him.

“There’s outfits helping out refugees everywhere, on every bloody corner,” he railed. “They get extra money at school and everything.”

His sense of displacement was most tangibly felt through his regular tussles with the insurance company paying his benefits, attempting to have treatments approved and receive his regular allowance. His mental state was one of free-floating anger that latched to just about any aspect of his immediate environment and identified it as an enemy.

It is difficult not to see the fragmented rage of people like Darryl as being a fundamental factor in the rise of demigods such as Donald Trump, shock developments such as Brexit in Europe or the success and longevity of politicians like Pauline Hanson in Australia. They are the mirror image, the Newtonian reaction to the diffuse resentment of Islamic terrorism, full of dissatisfaction with the “system”, but without workable plans. They represent a pining for simpler, collective identities such as nationalism.

Despite the Left building its foundations on the valorisation of the working class throughout the twentieth century, it has now abandoned them to some degree, leaving them free to hold some of the most conservative social views of any group, particularly around race.

Debates around racism are an area where the nose-turning sneering at the working classes is most palpable. The representations of people attending patriotic protests are an obvious example. The protesters are depicted in tattooed, pierced splendour holding angry signs at racist rallies. An accusation of racism is often veiled class sneering using Muslims and other ethnic groups as cover, evidence of French philosopher Pascal Druckner’s observation that multiculturalism was sometimes the racism of the anti- racists.

What progressive groups sometimes fail to realise is that by their outward expressions of concern for ethnic groups, and thereby separating themselves from the crass and unsophisticated people who don’t express adequate sympathy, progressives are effectively clearing a space for themselves to enjoy the advantages of white privilege.

Patients like Darryl, while an isolated case study, illustrate that no collective group or organisation, other than perhaps the football leagues, is actively representing the white working class. Race-based politics have helped entrench the resentment, for it has given the working class permission to view themselves as an aggrieved, racial group left out in the cold.

Men like Darryl may present to me because they are also the group least likely to manage the gender transition that is necessary for all men in response to changing sexual norms. There is a much greater expectation for all men to be available emotionally to their partners and children not to mention undertake more housework.

Yet most feminist groups and even the psychiatric classification system don’t easily incorporate rage as a legitimate expression of emotional distress because there is a belief that it will diminish accountability, particularly in areas such a domestic violence. But as psychiatric patients presenting before the law demonstrate, a more nuanced view that incorporates both responsibility and therapy is possible.

As someone from a very different ethnic background to patients like Darryl, examining racial resentments is of particular interest. Those who express anti-immigration views will often express admiration and affection for authority figures of ethnicity in their lives, such as their family doctor for example, but simultaneously harbour anger to migrants in general.

After the shock of the Brexit outcome in Britain there was a swathe of studies attempting to make links to a wider worldview that supporters may have held, all in a desperate clamour to understand the seemingly inexplicable. A common overlap for supporters was broader authoritarian views, notably predicted by support for the death penalty.

As a psychiatrist, such a turn towards authoritarian certainty makes me think of the place of fathers in my patients' lives. I find it instructive that the handful of my patients with strong ties to anti-immigration groups inevitably had limited or ambivalent links with their father. Darryl did not have any organised links with racist groups but held similar views.

But another patient of mine, Drago, developed strong links to a group similar to Reclaim Australia, wanting to end Muslim immigration. He was a tall, lanky man raised by a devoted single mother. He pined for his Serbian father who lived interstate with a new partner. Drago was referred to me from a disability employment agency because he couldn't hold down a job due to his problems tolerating any kind of frustration. His frustration automatically spilled over into rage rendering him incapable of handling interactions with authority and negotiating with co- workers, a requirement of any workplace. His employment kept getting terminated.

When I asked Drago about hobbies and interests, I discovered he had formed a group with some local friends which they coined the "Slavic brotherhood". His friends and the other members of the group were all raised with little or no presence of a biological father. Did they not notice this overlap, I asked? Drago shrugged and agreed it was something that brought them together, but didn't think it was a big deal.

It is difficult not to see the rise of anti-elite, strongman political figures like Trump as a symbolic yearning for a generation of men derived from the highest proportion of fatherless households in modern history. Without a clear acknowledgement of this deficit or an appropriate channelling into alternative forms of collective identity, such groups will actively look to assert their group identity through outlets of resentment and authoritarian certainty such as anti-immigration organisations.

Conservative thinker Reihan Salam writes of an "asymmetrical multiculturalism" whereby minorities are actively encouraged to celebrate their identity and defend their interests while the majority are discouraged from doing it. Outward displays of Italian, Indian or Muslim pride are fine, but if the same occurs for Anglo-Saxons it's regarded as a definite no-no. When whites with many generations of ties wave the national flag or sing the anthem too spiritedly, the fear is that it de-legitimises or dilutes the Australian-ness of other groups.

Salam believes that due to the white majority being denied the option of celebrating their ethnic heritage, they're reduced to championing ideological causes like free speech and the rule of law, stripped of any cultural content. These are notably worthy goals, but as debates around the Racial Discrimination Act in Australia illustrate, they are also indicative of a suppressed nationalism without alternative outlets.

In his book Angry White Men, American sociologist Michael Kimmel coins the term "aggrieved entitlement" as a way of describing the losses felt by the white working class, particularly around their power as males in the household, the dilution of their political power in the face of demographic shifts towards ethnic groups and their economic disempowerment in the face of globalisation. He visits characters such as neo-Nazis, wife beaters and angry divorcees to make his point. Kimmel argues such men are failing to make the adjustment to a world where they must be equals instead of the stars of history's arc where they were placed upon a pedestal.

Kimmel's analysis applies one of the most common accusations leftists make of conservatives: that they lack empathy for disadvantaged groups. By continuing to view working or underclass men through the lens of gender or race and not through class or economic entity, it seems that resentments will only be further inflamed and the whittling away of the foundations of the historical Left will continue unabated.

Scottish novelist Andrew O'Hagan in a 2009 George Orwell lecture argued that the English working class is dead, its traditions and values replaced by sentimentality and the illusory promise of credit cards and celebrity. Unlike the Scots and the Irish, who were an innate community held together by songs and speeches about themselves, said O'Hagan, "the English were something else: a riot of individualism, with no sense of common purpose or collective volition as a tribe".

It is possible that Australians exist somewhere in between, with some overlaps with the Scots and Irish in developing a tribal, lighthearted oppositional identity to the English motherland but also exhibiting a greater individualism borne from a stronger cultural influence from America. But with the decline of unions and manufacturing across the Western world, it is difficult to see what traditions, habits and speech bind this amorphous group.

As economic entities the white working class have much in common with newly arrived immigrants, but it is rare that they have the same drive and desperation to rise up the social ladder. The working class is perhaps now a holding bay for those transitioning to the middle class, with a portion falling through the cracks to take their place in the entrenched, welfare-dependent underclass.

When supporters of Brexit in England were interviewed, along with views tending to the authoritarian, a common theme was they no longer felt they belonged in the communities they lived in. There were tinges of racism in these stories, with tales of walking to the shops and only hearing Polish or Romanian and no longer recognising others on the street or of shopkeepers calling them by their first name. There is a nostalgia for the past in such stories that borders on delusional, but they are nevertheless the lived experience of many.

Interviews with Londoners who supported Brexit conducted by the BBC illustrated how people celebrated the difference and enjoyed the vitality diversity and migration brought. And the same interviews showed these people were happy to co-exist in separate communities rather than pine for some kind of greater intermingling reminiscent of the past.

Patients like Darryl expressed similar views to the Brexit supporters. Darryl walked to the local shopping centre and became incensed that he felt like a member of a minority group in the place where he had lived for generations. He noticed signs and organisations advocating for newly arrived immigrant groups such as asylum seekers. Any sense of being part of a collective was limited to buying his Lotto ticket or watching his football team on the weekend. Given Darryl's considerable psychological frailties, he was not indicative of the majority. Most people are adapting, but his inner concerns were pointers to wider trends in dissatisfaction among his demographic group.

British sociologist Will Davies writes that the Brexit campaign slogan "Take Back Control" was ingenious at both a psychological and political level exactly because of the way people like Darryl felt. Their inner experience was one of what is known in psychology as "learned helplessness", where you felt like you were a rickety boat being thrown around in choppy waters. This diagnosis has traditionally been applied to survivors of trauma, particularly women subjected to long-term domestic violence. But in politics as used by Trump, the UK Leave campaign and to some extent Pauline Hanson, the slogan spoke directly to the feeling of inadequacy and embarrassment felt by the white, working class man, and magnified by the class sneering endemic among the inner-city bourgeois. As Davies writes, what such voters crave more than anything else is "the dignity of being self-sufficient, not necessarily in a neo-liberal sense, but certainly in a communal, familial and fraternal sense".

I used to have a view that attempting to engage with patients like Drago and Darryl with a strong psychological angle, attempting to help them gain insight into their coping deficits was doomed to failure, that they were not psychologically minded. But experience has taught me otherwise, that men of limited education, few words and diminished resources were in fact capable of engaging in individual analysis. This did not replace the wider dimension of their position. As American poet Adrienne Rich wrote, “the moment when a feeling enters the body is political”. Changes in political economy had affected the working man disproportionately, but the wider project of helping them gain a greater mastery of their emotions and, in turn, their lives, was a worthy social goal. They were reminiscent of the individual versus society being a more relevant struggle for most than that of labour versus capital.

Unfortunately I was not able to keep Drago in any kind of therapy, but the disability agency informed me that the addition of a medication that helped reduce his impulsivity and increase his tolerance towards frustration allowed him to hold down a job in a car wash. Sure, it wasn’t a dream job, but it gave him some structure and purpose. I doubt he took much notice of my interpretations around his fatherlessness, but I’m confident his anger towards racial groups was tempered once he was able to maintain some kind of employment.

Darryl on the other hand was a difficult but eventual success story. Instead of projecting his rage outwards he was able to see that his own failures of communication and regulating mood were major contributors to why his life had gone the way it had. The moral, individual dimension of his problems became more apparent, mediated through the secular process of therapy and psychiatric medications. He managed to keep his new partner, just, and he had initiated contact with his children after many years.

The narrative IS changing

Gary Costanza · 8 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This vintage radio clip from the ’90’s of Mel Feit of the National Center for Men vs. comedienne and feminist Joy Behar shows how far we’ve come, as you’ll notice Behar laughs off Mel and any notion of male discrimination. It’s taken years, but feminists are no longer laughing at the MHRM, who are making inroads to the mainstream media because of the activism of a new and growing wave of MRAs. Enjoy this early example of FTSU.

A Red Pill screening like no other

AVFM · 9 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original https://www.tugg.com/events/the-red-pill-q5rw

[image]

Chivalry feminism

Peter Wright · 10 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's easy to assume chivalry and feminism are unrelated, for don't feminists eschew chivalry as belittling to women? Well, yes and no.

Over a century ago Ernest B. Bax noticed feminist rhetoric has it both ways – feminists renounce chivalry as demeaning and even victimizing to women on the one hand, and on the other take it as something to be solicited from every layer of government, business and wider society by overtures about women's vulnerability. As most feminists continue to demonstrate, chivalry-seeking remains a core part of the business model, so much so that without it feminism might not exist.

Perhaps a shock to those among us who would do away with feminism in order to return to a 'traditional' model of sexual relations only to discover that the traditional woman is eerily similar to the new woman in that she too exploits and indeed expects male chivalry.

E.B. Bax describes first-wave feminists advocating male chivalry for the benefit of women. His assessment in the following quotes underscores how "chivalry feminists," as he called them, along with the masses of women influenced by their message, have tended to be duplicitous about their reliance on chivalry

Ernest B. Bax on 'Chivalry Feminism'

"THE justification for the whole movement of Modern Feminism in one of its main practical aspects – namely, the placing of the female sex in the position of privilege, advantage and immunity – is concentrated in the current conception of "chivalry." It behoves us, therefore, to devote some consideration to the meaning and implication of this notion. Now this word chivalry is the dernier ressort of those at a loss for a justification of the modern privileging of women.

[…]

"It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward.

[…]

"Every outrageous pretension of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, "manliness." It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of "manliness."

[…]

"Such is "chivalry" as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men.

[…]

But these considerations afford only one more illustration of the utter irrationality of the whole movement of Sentimental Feminism identified with the notion of "chivalry." For the rest, we may find illustrations of this galore. A very flagrant case is that infamous "rule of the sea" which came so much into prominence at the time of the Titanic disaster. According to this preposterous "chivalric" Feminism, in the case of a ship foundering, it is the unwritten law of the seas, not that the passengers shall leave the ship and be rescued in their order as they come, but that the whole female portion shall have the right of being rescued before any man is allowed to leave the ship. Now this abominable piece of sex favouritism, on the face of it, cries aloud in its irrational injustice.

Source: Chapter-5 'The Chivalry Fake' in The Fraud of Feminism, 1913

"Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of' "What! Hit a woman!"

Why not, if she molests you?

"Treat a woman in this way!" "Shame!" responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender."

[…]

"In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.

Source: The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement

Support GA House Bill 51 to secure due process in universities

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 10 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

If your child went to college and was expelled for something he or she didn't do, would you want the same to happen to other people's children? The question may be rhetorical, but it's a real one that citizens of Georgia will have to answer to determine the future of due process in higher education.

Georgia legislators are considering a bill (HB 51) that would add a layer of due process on university campuses that was once missing. HB 51's sponsors include Earl Erhart, Rich Golick, Regina Quick and Trey Kelley. The bill has passed a subcommittee hearing, and at the time of this writing is approaching the full Appropriations Committee. If this passes, the bill hits the floor and starts over with the senate.

You can read the current version of the bill here. In my probably oversimplified summary, the bill suggests that it is not up to post-secondary (i.e. university) staff to do a cop's job when faced with a criminal allegation. As it stands in many states today, if someone were to accuse you of a major crime, you may face disciplinary action leading all the way up to expulsion even if you were innocent. Some examples of concerning conduct happened at Brandeis, Duke and UND. Organizations such as FIRE or Title IX for All have sections of their websites dedicated to horror stories of innocent or innocuous students facing needlessly punitive action across the country. Brandeis in particular is an example of one action (a man kissing his partner awake) blowing up into a massive, questionable retaliation:

> Big update to our story nearly a year ago about a gay student expelled by Brandeis University based on sexual-assault allegations that included kissing his sleeping boyfriend, the accuser:
>
> A federal judge in Boston has put Brandeis on notice that its investigative procedure lacked "basic fairness" to such an extent that it might have affected the outcome.
>
> […]
>
> Brandeis must justify several of its practices, including the denial of cross-examination, the use of a single-investigator model, the refusal to provide the accused the specific allegations against him, and the suspicious use of the "more likely than not" evidence standard only in sexual-misconduct proceedings, whose results can have lifelong, severely negative consequences for the accused student.
>
> —Greg Piper, Associate Editor of the College Fix "Federal judge validates due-process lawsuit against Brandeis by student accused of rape"

While the scope of this bill applies only to Georgia, its important to set an example for due process and the presumption of innocence. If this does not happen, it is possible that you, as a student, may be expelled for an innocuous action, if there is any action at all.

The point of this bill is to help protect the presumption of innocence on post-secondary institutions, so that innocent students don't have a "kangaroo court" experience after a rival accused them of academic, sexual or other misconduct—either real or perceived. It starts tying a university's handling of criminal allegations to the police departments that have jurisdiction. That way professors, administrators and on-campus committees do not act as the judge, jury and executioner.

Just so you know my position, I'm a recent graduate of Kennesaw State University that desperately wished this bill was law when I was a student. Since my struggles on campus (that I don't wish to recount here), a gained a passion for helping plug leaks in the judicial system as it overlaps with higher education. I've previously spoken out against the Campus Accountability and Safety Act (S.590) for the consequences it would bring to campus cultures that are strongly divided on perceptions of gender—namely than a male student accused of sexual assault is doomed, even if he is innocent.

Today I went to visit the Georgia State Capitol with local attorney Charles Jones to speak to various representatives in support of the bill. We passed out key details on the benefits of due process and were delighted to see so many in favor of the bill within the house appropriations committee, although one informed us that the opponents of the bill send negative and sometimes downright threatening emails to their representatives. This isn't to speak poorly of the bill's opponents, but to share with you all the passion and anger that the representatives saw in the opposition.

The detractors of the bill appear to believe that adding additional due process makes it harder for victims to find justice. Their perception, as I understand it, is that by presuming innocence, you are presuming a victim making a report to the police is lying.

This could not be further from the truth.

The supporters of the bill I've encountered are perfectly aware of the pressing need to maintain an efficient line of communication between a victim and the authorities. Even if they wanted to curtail victims, they cannot contradict the Clery Act, which basically makes reporting a threat on campus much easier than before it was passed.

The point of this bill is to make sure that in the event a criminal allegations comes forward on campus, the victim will get justice by helping make sure the authorities capture the right person. If you have ever seen documentaries like Making a Murderer or West of Memphis, you know how bias and an impatient rush to convict can destroy entire families.

Support for HB 51 is not about making it harder for victims to find justice, it makes sure one person's justice is not another person's oppression. That being said, finding the truth and delivering justice takes often a frustrating amount of time for the victim, if it comes at all. I really do understand that frustration, but rushing to judgement only serves to gratify bias and impatience.

We've already allowed the impatient and the biased to adjudicate criminal allegations on campus, and it hasn't been working. Title IX for All now lists 170 lawsuits (login required) filed by students against those unqualified to handle criminal allegations.

We need to install due process to make sure that no more innocent people are hurt, and that a torch and pitchfork mob does not decide who deserves punishment. Otherwise, we risk innocent people facing wrongful conviction, wrongful discipline, and even turning around and responding with a lawsuit that rips taxpayer dollars out of the school to make things right while real culprits possibly still run free. In this situation, everyone loses.

Since I am not an attorney I cannot claim to interpret the bill or its implementation as well as its sponsors. My understanding is that post-secondary institutions can still evaluate the accused as a potential threat to campus and possibly color the reports sent to police departments as the bill mandates. But even then, that's probably not something you can legislate directly and this bill is better than what we have. The bill is still under consideration.

If you live in Georgia, look up your representatives and send them an email voicing your support of the bill. You may find more success in sending emails that have a strong positive, grateful or congratulatory tone, such as "Thank you so much for any support for HB 51."

An example email is below that you can use to contact your representative. Feel free to alter it as you see fit.

> Dear [Representative],
>
> I want to thank you so much for your consideration of HB 51 regarding the treatment of criminal allegations on post-secondary institutions. I understand you have faced a lot of opposition to the bill from those who feel they are doing the right thing by expediting justice, but I applaud your courage for any efforts you make to ensure due process where it is missing.
>
> If you have not already done so, please support HB 51 to establish a more consistent and functional judicial system as it reaches into universities and our students' futures.
>
> Best regards,

> [Your name]

Even if you are not a resident of Georgia, please at least prepare a nice note and contact a Georgia state representative to voice your support and congratulate them on making a courageous stand for principles consistent with the Constitution. It's not often we see much respect for that document, so reward every small revival of its spirit. To better manage the traffic coming into representatives' inboxes, I will not publish email addresses here (although they are public should you wish to look them up). However, I am maintaining a list of representatives to connect with constituents so please feel free to ping me on Facebook and I will connect you with public contact info.

This post was originally published on SageGerard.com and has been reprinted here with permission.

Time for a National Whore's Day or something

Paul Elam · 12 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The following August 2015 article about Valentine's Day and we are pleased to publish again – this time on the inauspicious occasion itself. – Eds.

We are about to embark on another manufactured binge of male shame-spending on women who claim to love them.

Consequently, it seems an auspicious time to prepare. That is, if you are blue pill you can go ahead and prepare to translate your hard-earned dollars into a reason that she won't leave you.

Red pill men can stock up on popcorn with plenty of time to prepare to watch blue pill men dash feverishly around town, looking for something expensive enough to keep their female "partners" from leaving them.

Hint: Popcorn is way cheaper, amigos.

There are many aspects to The Big Day financially. Candy, flowers, jewelry, fine dining, champagne, romantic getaways and a lot of other things that mandate men to empty their wallets. That's so the women in their lives can be reminded of their speshulness and maybe give a little poon in return.

It is fair and accurate to say that offering up the poon is about the only expectation of women on this day of "romance." Never mind that they like sex, too, and that most will offer it up on any other day. After all, it's the lack of thought that counts.

Indeed, there are so many goodies for women on Valentine's Day that I won't even try to cover them all. Instead I will focus on flowers. The approximate 196 million roses purchased are second only to candy in the 13+ billion dollars spent each Valentine's Day. [1]

Men purchase 73% of those roses. That is a stat low enough that it surprised me a little, till I saw that women purchase 14% of those coveted expressions of love…to give to themselves.

Clitoria. Yes, that is the name.
That's right. 14% (27,440,000 or 2,286,666 dozen) of Valentine's Day roses are purchased by women for themselves. I am betting that number drops when The Big Day falls on a weekend and no one is there to see them delivered in workplaces.

I am no math whiz, but without other factors being available it appears that women buy themselves more roses for Valentine's Day for than they do for men.

Women do, however, buy the great majority of Valentine's cards. Those numbers will likely change when Hallmark cards are $100 a dozen. Like I said, it is the lack of thought (and money) that counts.

The money (at least men's) is a very important matter given the fact that over half of women surveyed said they would end a relationship if they were not given something on Valentine's Day [1] – which is to say that 53% of the women surveyed are whores, and just like more garden variety whores, they will take a hike when they aren't being paid.

Ain't love grand?

I am not claiming moral superiority for men, mind you. Every hooker needs at least one John or they would not be in business.

It is the symbolism of cut flowers that I find most intriguing, as well as being analogous to relationships that depend on them as proof of "love." Many flowers resemble vaginas. Some are even named for them. They all have things in common other than appearance and names.

What happens to roses after you shell out some hard-earned cash so you can give them to a woman who will kick you to the curb if you don't cough up her petals? That's right, they look and smell good for a very short period of time. Then they become useless discards, like the majority of relationships and at least 53% of surveyed vaginas. You have to be blind to irony in order to not see that the women so bent on getting men to waste money on them also happen to be the same women who are as useless as month old cut roses – the kind you buy at the grocery store.

The poppy. First pleasure, then lots of pain.

If you insist on being sentimental, save the flower money and use it to buy a nice colorful arrangement. You can put them on the coffin where any illusions you had about not being with a whore will invariably be laid to rest.

Mind you, those flowers will die in short order, too. They will, however, at least match your dead dreams – and, hopefully, your dead relationship.

Not being one to just point out problems, I am compelled to offer some solutions. The most romantic gift you can give on Valentine's Day is a tiller, a garden trowel and a set of heavy-duty work gloves. Throw in a few YouTube videos on how tillers, trowels, gloves and, uh, work works, and you have a woman with the ability to perpetually produce flowers of all varieties.

As they say, give a man a fish and you feed him for a day; teach a man to fish and you feed him for a lifetime.

Women, our equals, should be no different.

In addition to teaching her the value of work and humility, you will be honoring her agency, her "I can do anything a man can do, and do it better and do it in heels," way of living life.

If you are so weak you don't have the stomach for that you can always use the garden tools to dig your own grave. You are doing that anyway so you might as well make it more efficient and speedy.

And that is the rub, amigos. If the woman who "loves" you hinges that love on whether you shower her with frivolous, wasteful presents; if she will leave you if she doesn't get them, then just stick a C-note in her whorish little bra, show her the door, and find yourself another whore who is a lot more honest about how she does business.

Or, god forbid, find yourself a woman with enough integrity and maturity that she can feel loved without help from your wallet. They are out there, and you can find them if you quit chasing every Main Street skeezer who crosses your path.

It would be a little more honest if we considered changing the name. Valentine's Day has its murky roots in both Christian and ancient Roman tradition. How it developed into flushing 13 Billion dollars down the toilet every year is unclear. All we know for sure is that it happened and that Hallmark, florists, jewelers and Godiva Chocolates knew a good thing when they saw it.

After pondering this for some time it may be that we need to do another poll. Personally, I am at a loss on what to call Valentines Day to make it more accurate. "Give Me Free Shit or I Will Leave You Day," is really clunky. And it is so long that it will present a problem for Hallmark.

"Whore's Day," is simple and concise, but I am concerned that it would be an insulting affront to prostitutes who are honest enough to tell you who and what they are.

Perhaps AVFM readers, who often prove to have great acumen with glibness and creativity can solve the problem here in the comments.

Me? I am stocking up on popcorn and butter. I have a feeling that Hillary's "War on Women," campaign rhetoric will be in full stride by February and that the advertising and conversations on V-Day will be quite interesting.

Who knows, with the vast numbers of mindless, obsequious Johns this culture has come to call men, we may hit 15+ billion in sales.

Fortunately, we finally live in an age where stock in popcorn will go up as well.

[1] http://www.statisticbrain.com/valentines-day-statistics/

Feature image by Torrage.us

The old man and the c word

Doug Mortimer · 12 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Although he has been dead since 1961, Ernest Hemingway remains a person of interest among students of American literature. As with any other celebrity, he was as famous for his private life as his professional life. Even in his day, his traditionally male pursuits (hunting, fishing, drinking, boxing) made him suspect in some circles. If the concept of toxic masculinity existed back then, rest assured it would have been applied to him.

Indeed, at times he often seems like a caricature of a macho man. There is an amusing story about writer Max Eastman, who described Death in the Afternoon, Hemingway's nonfiction work about bullfighting, as having "false hair on the chest." The next time Eastman met Hemingway, the latter bared his shirt to reveal his hairy chest, then ripped open Eastman's shirt to reveal a hairless chest. The two men then proceeded to brawl in their editor's office. A pissing contest would have been much less taxing.

A number of literary critics, not all of them feminists, have examined Hemingway's relationships with women. There is plenty of material, as he was married four times. As his son Gregory put it, "I was the third and youngest son, the product of one of my father's emotional catastrophes. That is, one of his four marriages."

The primary emotional catastrophe for Hemingway was his relationship with his mother. We tend to assume that maternal love and unconditional love are all but synonymous. Whatever you call it, Ernest Hemingway didn't get it from his mother. At least, he didn't think so.

Hemingway's mother was something of a diva, literally and figuratively. She was a talented enough contralto to be offered a contract from the Metropolitan Opera and was involved in artistic pursuits all her life. Nevertheless, she found time to bear six children. So there are compelling reasons why Hemingway did not get his mother's undivided attention.

Born in Oak Park, Illinois, a cloistered suburb (residents preferred to call it a village) of Chicago, Hemingway was the only boy in the family till brother Leicester (also a writer, also a suicide) arrived in 1915 when mom was 42 years old. Hemingway's literary talents emerged early and were encouraged by his parents.

Typically, when a family has an overbearing mother, a weak father is the complement. That was not the case with Hemingway's family. His father, a physician, was no pushover. Stern as Dr. Hemingway was, his son loved and admired him. By introducing his son to the joys of the great outdoors, his contribution to Hemingway's development was immeasurable. In his own way, Dr. Hemingway was as judgmental as his wife and exercised his paternal authority on numerous occasions.

For example, after laying down the reasonable law that a hunter should not shoot any animal he did not intend to eat, Dr. Hemingway discovered his son had shot and killed a porcupine. Consequently, Ernest Hemingway is one of a select few who utilized porcupine meat as source of protein, as his father insisted that he cook and eat the porcupine he had shot. The message took hold. In the years to come, whenever Hemingway pulled in a trophy-worthy marlin, he would share the meat with the locals.

When World War I came along, Hemingway's eyesight kept him out of the Army but he wouldn't let it end there. "I can't let a show like this go on without getting into it," he wrote in a letter.

So he entered the fray as an ambulance driver. This occupation was surprisingly popular with aspiring writers (Dashiell Hammett, John Dos Passos, and E.E. Cummings all logged time as drivers). The occupation was not as dangerous as combat but it wasn't without peril, as Hemingway discovered when his legs were riddled with shrapnel (estimates vary but even the most conservative estimate is more than 200 pieces), requiring a lengthy stay at a Red Cross hospital in Milan.

His nurse was an American girl named Agnes von Kurowsky. She was seven years older than Hemingway – in other words far more mature than girls his own age but still young enough to have sexual market value. It is not hard to imagine how a young man immobilized in a hospital might develop a crush on his caretaker if she was the least bit attractive and attentive. In this quasi-maternal role, she might have awakened his male mother need, perhaps convincing him he'd missed out on something fundamental in his youth.

If this situation sounds familiar, it's probably because it inspired Hemingway to write A Farewell to Arms, which may still be on required reading lists, though in some enlightened institutions it may have been displaced by GLBTQ fiction.

What was puppy love or infatuation for Hemingway was something altogether different for his nurse. Her biological clock was ticking, even if that phrase wasn't in use back then. Consequently, she was fond of him in a motherly or elder sister sort of way, but probably never seriously considered him as a life partner. He was hardly in a position to embark on married life. So after he returned to the United States, she wrote him a Dear John letter.

Following rejection from his beloved, Hemingway found his emotional wounds as debilitating as his physical wounds, and he entered a prolonged period of depression, only to receive a stinging letter from his mother accusing him of being a bum and a slacker. Apparently, her love was conditional, and it was based on his making something of himself.

Eventually, Hemingway got over his rejection. This was probably facilitated by the attention he received from other females. According to his son Gregory, he had "an attraction for women you wouldn't believe unless you saw it." They knew a budding alpha male when they saw one.

Inevitably, young Hemingway fell in love again – but once again, the old male mother need arose. At age 22, he married Hadley Richardson, who was eight years older.

At first all went well. Hemingway's parents approved of the match, thinking marriage would give their son a direction in life. The young couple enjoyed living in Paris and Hadley bore him a son. Apparently, Hemingway's male mother needs were being met by his wife, an unassuming woman who had led a quiet, sheltered life before marrying Hemingway.

But as the years passed, he apparently had a change of heart. Hadley might have been a nice enough girl, but she was not the ideal mate for an ambitious young man. He transferred his affections to their friend, Pauline Pfeiffer, who was only four years older than he was. So he was making progress.

Unlike Hadley, Pauline Pfeiffer was a career woman, an editor at Vogue; more importantly, she was an heiress. Hemingway was in the process of writing The Sun Also Rises, his first successful novel, when they met, so her money likely turned in handy.

Hemingway married Pfeiffer in 1927, but he could not rationalize what he had done and suffered guilt about the breakup of his first marriage for the rest of his life. Even so, his increasingly successful career and his second wife's money made for a comfortable life in Key West during the Great Depression.

Meanwhile, Hemingway's rift with his mother grew wide, as she had let him know that she disapproved of The Sun Also Rises, the Lost Generation tale of aimlessness and mindless pleasure-seeking:

> The critics seem to be full of praise for your style and ability to draw word pictures but the decent ones always regret that you should use such great gifts in perpetuating the lives and habits of so degraded a strata of humanity …. It is a doubtful honor to produce one of the filthiest books of the year …. What is the matter? Have you ceased to be interested in nobility, honor and fineness in life? …. Surely you have other words in your vocabulary than "damn" and "bitch"—Every page fills me with a sick loathing.

In later years, Hemingway would explain that he was a son of a bitch because his mother was "an all-American bitch." It certainly didn't help when she blamed her son for Dr. Hemingway's suicide in 1928.

She probably wasn't that crazy about her son's divorce either, but he was just getting started. After all, he was still maturing and his needs were changing over time. By 1936 he was a celebrated writer when he met journalist Martha Gellhorn in Key West. They were re-acquainted during the Spanish Civil War, when both were correspondents.

Hemingway's male mother need had apparently been met by his previous wives, or perhaps he just grew out of it, as Gellhorn was, to put it simply, a hottie – and she was nine years younger than Hemingway. Perhaps by this time he felt it was time to move on to a trophy wife, or whatever they called such a woman back then. Since Martha was young, attractive, intelligent and educated, she would certainly look good on his arm as his literary star rose and he pushed on into darkest middle age.

From here on, his nickname "Papa" became particularly appropriate, as he became something of a father figure to Gellhorn. They married in 1940 and moved to Cuba. He regretted that he never had any daughters so perhaps Gellhorn filled that need. One can imagine how favorably an ambitious young female writer might respond to a father figure/literary celebrity.

Hemingway's advice did help her professionally; indeed, she became one of the best known World War II correspondents and the Hemingways qualified as a power couple. Of course, that meant Martha wasn't always available for traditional wifely duties. Though his own celebrity status was hardly in danger, Papa was jealous of the success of his "daughter." Perhaps that was inevitable, as he was always measuring his success in relation to other writers.

The result? Exit wife number three, enter wife number four, Mary Welch. It appeared, however, that Hemingway had at least settled on a type, as wife number four was also a war correspondent, the same age as wife number three, and she willingly dyed her hair to match the color of her predecessor. Welch was no slouch in the serial marriage department herself, as Hemingway was her third spouse.

Don't know if Papa loved mambo while he lived in Cuba, but presumably he loved Welch, whom he married when he was 46 years old. She served as his wife in Cuba when he was working on The Old Man and the Sea, and remained with him for the rest of his life.

The Old Man and the Sea was certainly an all-world novel, winning the Pulitzer Prize in 1953 and clinching the Nobel Prize for Hemingway the following year. This fable was clean, uplifting, and noble. His mother would have been proud. Unfortunately, she died on June 21, 1951 while he was still working on the book.

Even though Hemingway had outgrown his male mother need, he never reconciled with his mother. He did not attend her funeral, though he certainly had the money to fly from Havana to Chicago for the services.

One wonders why Hemingway chose the serial polygamy route. As his second wife Pauline observed, "I don't mind Ernest falling in love but why does he always have to marry the girl when he does?" One would think that at some point it would have occurred to him that keeping a mistress or a series of mistresses would make more sense. Doubtless, mom would not have approved his taking that route, however.

In the last year of Hemingway's life, Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho was released. Given Hemingway's suicidal depression at that time, he likely never saw the movie. So he never heard Norman Bates (Anthony Perkins) declare that "a boy's best friend is his mother." Surely, Hemingway would have disagreed.

Of course, Norman Bates's dictum is rather ironic after we discover that he is his mother. Given Hemingway's egotism and artistic temperament, perhaps the same could be said of him.

Courtship, it's on you man

Peter Wright · 13 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Courtship is part of our everyday speech. We follow the rules of courtship, we enter into courtship, we follow the courtships of the rich and famous, and sometimes we end a courtship. While it may sound like a quaint antique of European language, the word still appears in our daily media headlines proving that the modern imagination remains in its thrall.

So what exactly is this thing we call courtship? To answer that we are going to have to dig into its history, and the best place to start is with the etymology itself:

[image]

The etymology starts with a reference to a courtier, whom Dictionary.com defines as "a person who seeks favor by flattery, charm, etc." Next we read that the paying of attentions is from a man to a woman "with the intention of marriage" – there is no explicit requirement for a woman to do something for a man. The scenario given here is clearly one-sided in terms of who must make the effort, and who will be the recipient of that effort. Courtship is, in a word, gynocentric.

But just in case we have narrowed the definition of courtship to an anachronistic conception of it, let's take a look at modern dictionaries to see whether they too paint a uni-directional picture of courting – ie. of men catering to women:

> The Free Dictionary by Farlex:
> Noun 1. Courting: a man's courting of a woman; seeking the affections of a woman (usually with the hope of marriage); "It was a brief but intense courtship."
>
> Vocabulary.com:
> Noun 1. Courting: a man's courting of a woman; seeking the affections of a woman (usually with the hope of marriage).

There we have two popular online dictionaries verifying the gendered expectation inherent to the term. Other dictionaries however have de-gendered the definition in line with the modern practice of denying gendered customs and behaviors, but this does little to change the phenomenal reality – practices which continue to be gendered despite the refusal to acknowledge them as such.

Studies of courtship have confirmed that men's habit of demonstrating various kinds of attentions toward women amount to a gynocentric contract. Drs. Timothy Perper[1] and Monica M. Moore[2] have independently discovered, contrary to popular beliefs, that courtship is normally triggered and controlled by women and driven mainly by non-verbal behaviours to which men respond. That gynocentric pattern of power is supported by other theorists who specialize in the study of body language.[3]

For those unsure as to whether courtship remains a gendered expectation, the following advice by columnist James Michael Sama provides a modern example.

> In many of my articles I refer to "courtship" or "courting women," when discussing chivalry and romance… and why do I think we should work to keep it alive? Here are five reasons:
>
> 1. You'll develop a stronger relationship.
>
> It is traditionally so that the man in a new relationship will be the one who is courting a woman. As men, we are the pursuers, both naturally and societally. I have often heard men ask "what's in it for me?" Well, first of all if you're performing acts of kindness for the sake of a reward (see #3 in the definition above) then it is not true kindness.

> Real kindness comes from the goodness of your heart without the want for reward but it should also be noted that courting a woman will bring two things into your life:
>
> The type of woman with the maturity and dignity to only accept advances from a man who treats her with respect. The ability to therefore grow a stronger and longer lasting relationship with the woman in question..
>
> 2. You become better in all areas of life.
>
> Courtship is (read: should be) a selfless act. It requires you to put in effort for another person's enjoyment, learn about them and learn about yourself in the process. When committing one's self to efforts such as these, one cannot help but to develop internally as well. We become more aware of the world around us, what people want and need in order to be happy, and how we can help give it to them.
>
> 3. You will gain her trust.
>
> One of the biggest factors in relationships failing these days is lack of trust. Either lack of trust during the beginning stages, or even after commitment has been established.
>
> If a man takes the time to court a woman, it requires him to build a foundation for the relationship. Relationships do not simply appear out of thin air. They take time, energy, and commitment to build, much like a house. But a relationship without this trust and friendship is like a house built on sand. It may look good from the outside, but it will have nothing to keep it standing when the weather gets rough.
>
> If a woman has a clear view that you're willing to build this foundation with her, it will limit her insecurities and help build her confidence in you.
>
> 4. You will intensify your intimacy.
>
> Through the process of courtship, men and women tend to develop a stronger emotional connection than if they had simply jumped into a relationship or a "friends with benefits" scenario. What many people don't realize is that a stronger emotional connection, especially for a woman, translates to a stronger physical connection.
>
> 5. You will find the right person for YOU.
>
> The right type of person will appreciate small details, the kindness you exude to those around you, and the effort you put in specifically for them. Through the courtship process we learn if a woman (or man) is going to be appreciative of what we do for them and how they will respond.
>
> If we jump into a relationship, as many do these days, we are left complaining about how they "changed" after a few months of being with them, and then breaking up. In reality, nobody changed at all – you simply learned who they truly are.
>
> If we take the time to practice courtship, we will eliminate these surprises down the road and truly learn who we are building a relationship with at the proper time to do so : in the beginning.
>
> Show someone your respect for yourself as well as for them, by keeping courtship alive.[4]

This example indicates that men are still expected to carry the lion's share of courting labour for the new couple. Clear too is that this is not a mere animal reflex as some would suggest, which clouds the idiosyncratic culture customs which gave it form. We tend to confuse cultural concepts of courting with biological mating impulses of animals, when they are logically distinct motivations with the one having its center of gravity biological reflexes, and the other in rituals, customs and taboos of a given society.

The blue wren never learned about chivalry and courtly love in order to know how to build a nest, does not rely on cultural customs to know nest design. Men and women on the other hand learn much of their repertoire of courtship, going down on one knee, or expecting chivalric deference from men, from the cultural mores that grew up around them. And unlike the blue wren, a serious study of cultural history can snap us out of our unconsciousness and open us up to potential new models for building relationships – like ones based on mutual effort and respect as opposed to the one-way street of courtship.

References:

[1] Perper, T. (1985) Sex Signals: The Biology Of Love, Philadelphia, ISI Press.
[2] Moore, N (1985). “Nonverbal courtship patterns in women: contact and consequences”. Ethology and Sociobiology. 6: 237–247.
[3] Pease, A. and Pease, B. (2004) The Definitive Book Of Body Language, London: Orion Books.
[4] 5 Brilliant Reasons Men Should Stop Playing Hard To Get If They Want The Woman Of Their Dreams

Further reading:

[Study] The allure of chivalry
[Study] Courtly Love Today: Romance and Socialization in Interpersonal Scripts

Do men really have all the power? Paul Elam on the men's movement

AVfM Video Source · 13 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Gerald Young of Auckland, NZ "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 14 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

Dr. Gerald Young of Auckland, New Zealand has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the CityMed website we read about the doctor:

"Dr Gerald Young
BHB, MBChB (Auckland), FRNZCGP

I have been a medical practitioner in the city since 1988. I have been working from CityMed since it was started in 2000. I am one of the directors of CityMed.

I have a special interest in surgical procedures done under local anaesthetic in our specially designed outpatient theatres in CityMed. This allows us to perform surgical procedures very cost effectively, for example a hernia can be repaired for under $2500 which is one of the cheapest rates for this procedure in New Zealand. Prior to my general practice training I was a surgical registrar for 3 years in the Auckland Surgical Training Programme.

Procedures offered include:
Skin lumps and skin cancer surgery
Ingrown Toenails
Vasectomy – no scalpel keyhole technique
Umbilical Hernia Mesh Repair
Inguinal Hernia Repair – Open Mesh technique
Circumcision
I am an approved examiner for Australian Immigration Medicals and New Zealand Immigration Medicals.

My interests outside of work are presently centred around trying to be a Dad to four children. When time allows I play a bit of tennis."

Too bad the doctor sullies himself by mutilating baby boys' genitals along with curing disease and treating harmful conditions.

Under "Circumcision" we find a list of supposed reasons for circumcision. Here's that list with my comment for each one:

"REASONS FOR CIRCUMCISION:"

"Hygiene"- soap and water cleans all body parts, no need to amputate

"Other infections"- whether or not there is a miniscule difference in infection rates for intact men, that's irrelevant when using a condom and practicing safe sex. I credit the doctor for this common sense information:

> Uncircumcised adults have an additional increase in the risk of foreskin infection, such as candida (thrush) especially if they also have diabetes.
>
> There have been studies that have shown that some sexually transmitted infections (STIs), particularly herpes, gonorrhea and syphilis, are less frequent in circumcised men. Other STIs such as – NSU and genital warts have similar rates in both groups, one recent study suggests NSU may be higher in circumcised men.
>
> Studies from Africa have shown that circumcised men are at less risk of becoming HIV infected than uncircumcised men however this is not reproduced in USA studies. The suggestion has been put forward that the reason for this is that there is a different HIV subtype in Africa than in developed countries, which may > account for the difference.

>
> However circumcision cannot be promoted as a protection from contracting any STI including HIV.

"Religious Reasons"- no religion gives anyone the right to harm anyone else without their consent, a violation of civil rights and the law.

"Cultural Reasons"- harmful traditions that violate an infant's bodily autonomy also violates the law.

"Medical Reasons"- there is no medical reason to amputate the foreskin in the absence of disease.

"Social/Sexual"- most of the world is intact; anyone who thinks what nature made is ugly is free to mutilate themselves only.

"Cancer Risk"- see "Medical Reasons" above.

Here's some information given by the doctor:

> CIRCUMCISION RISKS
>
> Complications of circumcision range from 2% to 10% The following are possible complications:
>
> Infection – this is easily treated with topical or oral antibiotic.
> Post operative persistent bleeding – this may need a suture or cautery to stop the bleeding.
> Meatal stenosis – where the opening of the urethra becomes narrowed which makes it hard to pass urine. This is rare and should not happen with good post-circumcision care.
> Excessive skin, skin bridging, stitch sinus are other rare problems that can occur and may need surgery to repair.
> Too much skin removed.This is caused by the procedure being performed by an inexperienced operator.
> Glanular ulceration. This can occur in association with post operative infection.
> Other inadvertent injury during surgery – to the urethra and to the penis.
> Anaesthetic complications; this is rare with local anaesthetic but there is a risk of allergy to local anaesthetic.
> Psychological trauma.
> Secondary phimosis if the foreskin grows back over the penis after circumcision. This is avoided by following the post circumcision cleaning instructions.
> Secondary chordee caused by scarring after circumcision.
>
> HOW DO I CARE FOR THE FORESKIN IF CIRCUMCISION IS NOT DONE?
>
> These are the cleaning instructions that I give to my patients. The foreskin should be cleaned each bath time, like any other part of the body, this should be done by gently pulling the foreskin back as far as it will go without any force (as this may cause the foreskin to tear) and any collection trapped in the foreskin gently cleaned. With time the foreskin will retract back further and further until completely free. Once the boy is old enough to wash himself he should be taught how to clean the foreskin daily himself. I also advise boys to get into the habit of pulling the foreskin back to urinate so that they do not urinate through the foreskin, as this helps to reduce foreskin irritation and infection, but they must remember to pull the foreskin forward again when finished.

Death is a possible outcome of circumcision, and bleeding is a complication in 100% of circumcisions.

All those complications for surgery that isn't needed and ruins a man's sex life – why?

The info on how to care for the foreskin is helpful – all parents should have this information.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about circumcision, you can watch related videos and do further research at neonatalcutting.org.

The doctors practice information follows:

Ground Level, Quay West Building, 8 Albert Street, Auckland City, 1010

Ph: 09 377 5525

> Dr. Gerald Young of Auckland, NZ "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/WkIgEn7XBX #circumcision #MGM pic.twitter.com/04pY2MHwSw
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) February 14, 2017

De-constructing Sentiment II: Female Power

Nat Godot · 14 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It is believed that a 19th century playwright was the first person to write that "the pen is mightier than the sword,"[1] and that adage is probably more relevant now than ever before. Because in this modern age of false words he could just as easily have said 'the pen is mightier than the truth.' The 'might' he makes reference to after all is the very real power wielded by people who succeed in owning the meaning and use of words.

So it is very pertinent to the way that feminists have usurped their own cause. Which means that when we take on the burden of contradicting the dogmas of modern feminism we need to take back the meaning of words, and one of those words is power.

Feminists like to talk about power, but only to say that men have power and women do not. Or to say that men abuse power and women do not. But they make little or no acknowledgement of the powers owned by women to imprint newly born minds with responses that will benefit themselves, to reinforce those responses throughout the most vulnerable years of that young life, and then to call on those responses when it is beneficial for them to do so. Although many men feel themselves to be immune from those requests, the truth is that many of them who feel that way still allow their resolve to crumble when faced with a woman exhibiting or feigning distress.

So there is a form of power granted by nature which is enjoyed exclusively by women, and we need to shine more light on it. In order to understand this a little better let's first look at a female power that is not human, and the peacock provides a good example. Although the word 'peacock' is sometimes used as a derogatory term to describe men who overdress, this is somewhat unfair. Because the extravagance of the peacock's plumage is not their own choice, it is determined solely by the preference of the females of the species. Therefore the day to day appearance masks the real power that shapes the relationship between them. And when we use that relationship as a model to understand gender power, we realise that the grand appearance of the peacock is not a demonstration of power, but evidence rather of powerlessness.

It is therefore a very significant anomaly of nature that in the human species it is the females that adopt extravagant plumage, and who suppress any inclination of males to compete with them. The actress and model Jacqueline Fernandez explains it like this. "Vanity is a women's prerogative, and it should stay that way."[2] Meaning that the pursuit of attention and admiration causes human females to reverse an established pattern of nature. Which is an anomaly that we take for granted, and a power we underestimate.

Popular scientific opinion/myth suggests that females only exercise their powers to benefit their children. But the plumage of the peacock demonstrates that feminine power is a force of nature, and that it can be eccentric and self-serving. We often hear men being lectured about expressing their feelings. But our society is no more willing to allow men to speak about their feelings than it would be to allow the peacock to contradict the peahen. Why is that you may well ask? It is because the peacock would say to the peahen, 'you are not doing this for the sake of the children'.

So the enforcement of female choice is indicative of a power that shapes our cultural perception of what is good and what is bad. This may sound obscure and inconsequential, but the distortions contained in such perceptions are intrinsic to our social discourse, and they have a calculated purpose which can be explained by understanding the relationship between sentiment and power.

We tend to underestimate the power of sentiment, but organisations that wield power do not. Governments and corporations and advertisers and broadcasters compete fiercely with each other to influence the sentiments of large groups of people. They employ the very best and most well trained experts and psychologists to help them for that purpose, and are prepared to spend vast sums of money to achieve their ends.

In this respect, the stakes have been raised by the ongoing efforts to globalise the consumer economy. Meaning that the manipulation of consumer sentiment has now become an industry. But this also creates an opportunity of sorts.

Because the illusions of sentiment depend a lot on obscurity, so there is a certain danger in repeating them too often. We may therefore even have something to be grateful for. Because the flood of contrived sentiment that pours out of modern media channels makes it possible to observe more clearly methods and patterns of behaviour that previously defied analysis.

Take sympathy for example. In the eyes of many people it would hardly appear significant, and yet when we open our eyes to it we discover that it saturates daily life. But even though there are times when we should show sympathy towards someone we love, there is never a time when we are obliged to love someone for whom we feel sympathy. So even though sympathy is less obvious a feeling than love, its reach is longer.

Therefore if our capacity for sympathy is addressed in the right way, we can be induced to do things for people that we don't even know. In what way this might be useful to others is not always obvious, and yet those organisations that broadcast news and entertainment, by whatever medium, compete vigorously to influence the sympathies of their audience. So even though it appears to be such an imprecise feeling, sympathy is measured with great accuracy by people who have learned the value of it.

In order to demonstrate that sympathy is no childish or accidental sentiment bear with me for a short review of Ryan's Daughter[3]. This is an Oscar winning film released in 1970 that was directed by David Lean. The story is essentially about two men and one woman. They live in a small town in the West of Ireland in the year 1916 when British military forces still occupied the country, and their relations with the local population were very tense. The heroine is a native of the small village and the daughter of one of its few prosperous citizens. She marries the local school teacher and shortly afterwards becomes bored with him. Then she meets the commanding officer of the nearby British military garrison and begins a sexual relationship with him, and the resulting sex scenes became a significant feature of what is commonly described as a 'tragic love story.'

The sympathy of the audience for the heroine is carefully preserved by meticulous adjustment of the two male characters with whom she is involved. For this purpose, her husband is portrayed as boring and insensitive to her need for passionate love (or sex), which appears to justify her later behaviour. Meanwhile her lover is afflicted with a severe limp, and he also suffers from psychological trauma, both of which were caused by his war experiences on mainland Europe. So on the one hand her husband is excluded from sympathy because of his insensitivity to her 'needs', and on the other, the sympathy we feel for the heroine is not tainted by any dislike of her lover. Nonetheless their affair is exposed in the end to the local community who have no tolerance for locals who consort with British soldiers. So the pair are forced apart, and the soldier lover commits suicide.

The question is then, what would happen to the sympathy of the audience if we reverse the roles? We would have a story about an unemployed man who married a hard working school teacher and became bored with her because she was no good in bed. So he then starts a sexual relationship with a woman who is physically crippled and suffering from psychological problems. When this lonely and vulnerable woman then commits suicide the damnation of our hero would be complete, and no interpretation of artistic licence would excuse the film maker from talk of malice, or lurking dangerous attitudes towards women. Certainly there would be no talk of Oscar prizes.

Therefore when we watch this film from one point of view it appears like romance, but when we turn the story around, it becomes a depressing tale that would surely be condemned. Which means that film makers are not free to express any new idea for the sake of art. Because it is the formula by which the value of sympathy is calculated that makes it possible for them to portray violence against women, but not criticism of them. Actually their survival as artists depends very much on their willingness to conform to the rules by which the social taboos and monopolies on sentiment are maintained.

Nor is the value of sentiment confined to junk romance. Indeed, experts tell us that the equity and financial markets are driven by sentiment. So if even the value of stocks can be influenced by sentiment, then it stands to reason that people who learn to estimate their relationships in terms of value will also naturally develop an acute awareness of sentiment. Becoming alert to words and deeds that may indicate any change in the state of sentiments they have taken some trouble to cultivate.

When we speak of 'value' in the context of human behaviour therefore, it is not money that is the currency, it is sentiment. Money and gold and property of various kinds have a value that can be counted, and they do exercise a powerful influence, but they must be earned, inherited, or stolen. On the other hand, sentiment can be minted, and when it is properly crafted, it can be used to obtain material value. In this context then, the strategy of making other people feel sympathetic or indebted becomes both a business enterprise, and an abuse of power.

Of course the misuse of any power comes at a price. Take for example the well known fact that the display of anxiety or fear attracts attention and sympathy. So people who discover that sympathy has value are also discovering incentives to be anxious. But judging by what we see in the public media, sympathy is as much a female prerogative as vanity. Therefore it becomes possible to predict an imbalance in the levels of anxiety between males and females that corresponds with that imbalance. And indeed, the incidence of phobia (an extreme form of anxiety) is known to be at least twice as high in females[4] as it is in males. But that ratio rises to 3/1 for individuals with multiple phobias and 4/1 for phobias relating to animals.

And yet, in spite of being bombarded by so much of it, we appear to be largely ignorant not only of how sentiment is manipulated, but even of what it is. Which should not be surprising, since nothing about sentiment is obvious, except for what we are encouraged to notice. Think about encouragement for instance. On the face of it this is not a sentiment. In fact we need encouragement as children and depend on it for our learning and development. But we are supposed to reduce our dependence on it as we mature. When we don't, our belated need for it prevents that maturity from reaching its full potential and reflects itself in the mirror of our personalities as a desire for attention and admiration. Which, as it happens, is magnified disproportionately in the affectations and sentimental behaviours of women.

No doubt many people will object that men have this need too, and that is certainly true. But all of these arguments are about degrees and proportions. So if we take the distribution of high street retail space as a barometer, then we have to conclude that women have this need more than men by a very significant factor. This observation is also supported by figures for credit card spending in the UK[5] which indicate that in the year 2016 the ratio of female vs male spending on personal items was 4.5/1 on the high street, and rose to 7/1 for online shopping.

These differences present a whole range of problems. But there is one in particular that has reached epidemic proportions. Because what comes naturally for the child becomes more complicated for the adult. Meaning that we give attention admiration and sympathy to children without any need for justification. But adults who want to keep these things with them after childhood must increasingly find ways to justify them, and this need can exercise a powerful influence on their behaviour and relationships. The problem is though that the dripping need for justification creates a tendency towards exaggerated feelings and complicated accusations. Thus we arrive at the modern epidemic of accusing behaviour driven disproportionately by women, and egged on by the agents of consumer propaganda who seek to manipulate women by flattering and indulging them.

Overall then, when we step back and observe the patterns of sentiment and behaviour, we can recognise how much the mechanisms of power depend on them. The fact that women in general appear to be so proficient in the use of these mechanisms is not however to be taken as proof that women have superior moral insight or emotional intelligence which men lack. It is rather that women have a material motive that men do not, and that they have at least three advantages. The first is their biological power to suppress anything that might be disadvantageous to them, a power that translates itself in the minds of men as fear. The second is their ability to imprint the minds of children with responses that are primarily advantageous to them. And the third is their close alliance with the agents who manipulate consumer sentiment. And I haven't even mentioned sex.

Actually the issues I have mentioned here are only part of a spectrum of powers available to women which deserve consideration. But space does not allow, so I will come back to them another time. Nonetheless, it should be obvious even from this cursory look at the close rapport between sentiment and power that the image of pristine vulnerability which feminists have built in to their vocabulary for and about women is false. It is not that men do not possess power, or that men do not abuse power. They do that indeed. But they are not alone.

Now bear with me one more time please for a short digression. I noticed from comments to my previous article that there was some concern as to whether I understood gynocentrism or not. So in order to save good people from wasting their precious time, let me clarify the point, yes I understand. But I am reasonably convinced that pushing back directly against the monster will be a monumental task that will probably take a long time, and will only succeed to the degree that a lot more people get involved. Likewise feminism is locked on to the same driving forces that give life to gynocentrism, so I suspect that the struggle against feminism will also be long and acrimonious.

In the meantime, I ask myself, is there something I can do that will help the cause to gain traction? And everybody has their own answer to that question. In my case I take an oblique approach to the problem. Think of it like this. How do you convince a burglar not to break in to your house? You can plead all you like, and the burglar can give whatever assurances you might want to hear. But in the end the police will tell you to take away the ladder the crowbar and the flash light. So for me this is a matter of personal interest rather than alternative paradigm. I want to remove the tools, or at least make them harder to use. I hope that approach will become more clear as I work my way forward, and that it will prove useful to some small degree. But it is not meant to distract from the great work already done.

References:

1. http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-30729480
2. http://www.bolegaindia.com/gossips/Jacqueline_Fernandez_shares_her_views_on_stereotypical_men-gid-11605-gc-6.html
3. http://www.imdb.com/title/tt0066319/?ref_=nv_sr_1
4. http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/0005796795000483
5. http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3753812/Women-spend-7billion-year-clothes-shoes.html

The importance of Georgia's House Bill 51

Hannah Wallen · 16 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

What is GA HB 51?

As described in Sage Gerard's recent article, Support GA House Bill 51 to secure due process in universities, this is a proposed law which would bar institutions of higher learning from substituting unbalanced on-campus hearings and penalties for the legal system in cases of alleged student sexual misconduct. This would apply to universities, technical colleges, or any other postsecondary educational institution which is eligible for state tuition equalization grants. The text of the bill is available here:

Georgia HB 51

This would require postsecondary institution employees who receive information leading them to believe that a felony has been committed against or by a student or on the institution's property would be required to forward that information to the appropriate authorities.

This is not an unusual or abnormal requirement for professionals in care-related industries such as education. Various laws exist requiring teachers, school administrators, and school counseling personnel to report to appropriate authorities any suspected abuse of their students. Health care workers at all professional levels are also required to report suspected abuse, neglect, exploitation, or misappropriation of patient property or resources, drug diversion, and violations of patients' medical or financial privacy. Childcare providers face similar requirements regarding abuse or neglect, as do care providers for the elderly and people with intellectual disabilities. Significant penalties can be leveled against professionals who violate these laws.

Due process protections within the bill dictate that it is up to law enforcement authorities to determine whether the allegation merits investigation and prosecution. It further requires that any investigation undertaken by postsecondary institutions' staff must be performed by "a campus law enforcement agency staffed by law enforcement officers who are certified peace officers by the Georgia Peace Officer Standards and Training Council."

Once again, it is not unusual for the law to mandate that a complex service with potentially serious outcomes be limited to the practice of qualified professionals. Licensing and other forms of certification are used to denote qualification in a wide variety of fields, including, law enforcement, private investigation, and legal practice. Uncertified or unlicensed individuals who recklessly or fraudulently dabble in practices within these domains with the potential for serious outcomes for their targets can also face significant penalty.

The right to the presumption of innocence is protected in the bill with language barring postsecondary institutions from penalizing students who have been accused of felony crimes but have not been convicted or entered a no contest plea, but does allow suspension during investigation "if the postsecondary institution finds, following a due process hearing, that allowing the student to continue at the postsecondary institution poses an immediate threat to the life, health, or safety of the student body." This applies to postsecondary institutions' treatment of students accused of felony crimes a standard that is similar to that which guides how criminal suspects are handled within the justice system with regard to the accused's freedom of movement during an investigation and trial.

To eliminate contradictions in law, the bill also contains a statement which would repeal existing Georgia state law which would be in conflict with HB 51.

Why is this needed?

Currently, postsecondary institutions' handling of student sexual misconduct allegations is guided by a 2011 memo from the U.S. Department of Education commonly referred to as the Dear Colleague letter. This letter was put into law as a section of the 2014 VAWA reauthorization act called the Campus Sexual Violence Elimination (SaVE) Act, a topic I've covered before, writing for A Voice For Men. Among the Campus SaVE act's requirements is a stipulation that higher education institutions to which Title IX apply must have sexual misconduct prevention policies which mandate using college disciplinary boards as substitutes for courtrooms, complete with campus penalty which could effectively end a student's academic career. The law's language indicates that guilt is to be presumed and mandates the use of a "preponderance of evidence" standard rather than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard which the justice system uses for accusations of felonious sexual assault. The accuser can even appeal if the initial hearing results in a not guilty decision, subjecting the accused to the campus equivalent of double jeopardy.

The law also increases the list of offenses that universities must report among statistics on campus crime. It is, in other words, a false-accuser support bill, with a built-in stat-counter to assist in the manufacture of evidence for its own support.

As a consequence of the requirements laid out in the Campus SaVE act, numerous students (mostly male) have been deprived of access to higher education following accusations of sexual misconduct, and many of them have sued their universities over discrimination and violation of their due process rights. Their stories have revealed that the system created on postsecondary institution campuses by federal law and policy has resulted in the facilitation of false accusations, leading to significant punishment of students whose conduct as indicated by evidence did not merit it.

In addition, by requiring that institution personnel handling misconduct allegations stress to students that they do not have to report criminal conduct to authorities, the bill encourages the substitution of the easier-to-win campus "justice" system in place of real police work and courts, potentially leading to actual perpetrators of violent, felonious sex crimes facing no jail time whatsoever.

If the Campus SaVE Act is federal law, what will GA HB 51 achieve?

The answer to that begins with what the bill will not do.

It will not prevent on-campus investigation of sexual misconduct allegations, nor will it prevent institutions from handling proven violations according to their written policies.

It merely requires that these investigations be handled by properly certified personnel, requires proper reporting of criminal allegations to the correct authorities, and protects the due process rights of the accused.

If passed, this bill could also become a template for other states' handling of this issue. It even has the potential to become a template for legal reform at the federal level. Given the current situation with a growing number of cases leading to lawsuits against institutions for their practical application of existing law, such reform is badly needed.

Why does GA HB 51 need my support?

This bill faces opposition from groups defending existing policy, and they are pressuring legislators to vote against reform. The bill's opponents are using false claims that the bill would protect perpetrators of sexual violence from facing any consequences to discourage representatives from supporting it. If this bill is defeated, the effort to enact reform at the state level will have to begin again with another bill, delaying any potential benefit to students by the time it takes to go through that process again.

What can I do?

Representatives need to hear from citizens who want to see this bill become law. Georgians can find out who represents your district on this page. If you're not sure how to explain your support for the bill, Sage Gerard's article includes a template you can use either verbatim or for inspiration.

Calling your representative's office is another good method of contact, one which can indicate to the representative that you are passionate about the issue. It is wise to write down the gist of what you plan to say before calling so that the points you want to make do not get lost in the course of discussion.

Because this bill would affect policy on educational institution campuses, it is also not necessary to be a resident of Georgia for your interest in seeing it pass to be worth consideration to legislators. It is of interest to legislators that a decision to reject the bill could result in potential rejection of the state's educational institutions by prospective students or their parents. U.S. citizens who are not Georgia residents could contact any representative on the above linked list for this purpose.

To communicate this, the template Sage created could be modified as follows:

Dear [Representative],

I want to thank you so much for your consideration of HB 51 regarding the treatment of criminal allegations on post-secondary institutions. I understand you have faced a lot of opposition to the bill from those who feel they are doing the right thing by expediting justice, but I applaud your courage for any efforts you make to ensure due process where it is missing. This is of particular interest of me as a [student or parent of a student] interested in pursuing postsecondary education following graduation from high school. Knowing whether [my or my child's] civil rights are protected is an important consideration when determining which institution [I or my child] should attend.

If you have not already done so, please support HB 51 to establish a more consistent and functional judicial system as it reaches into universities and our students' futures.

Best regards,
[Your name]

A parent could conceivably add the line "Under the current system, my child could potentially see his academic and future career prospects easily destroyed by a false accusation." It may also be worth noting to legislators that the current system may be leading to sexual predators escaping the authority of the justice system due to the substitution of campus courts. Legislators who do not care about the plight of the falsely accused may care very much about that.

This is an opportunity for significant activism in relation to a major men's rights issue, the steady creep of increasing infringement on due process rights by badly written legislation. It could lead not only to reform at the state level, but the creation of an example which activists can encourage other states and federal legislators to follow. We may never get a better opportunity for this than we have now, in the current political environment in which the authoritarian establishment has been challenged by the nation's voters.

Representatives are already hearing from opponents of the bill from all over the United States. It is vital, then, that they hear from us as well.

Harvesting the male gaze

Peter Wright · 17 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

We all know about the male gaze and the resultant sexualization of the female body that it creates. The standard accusation is that we men are scanning our environment for passive women to perv on, an act that reduces women from otherwise complex human beings to mere sex objects for our sexual pleasure. The following Oxford Reference Dictionary definition represents the usual view of the male gaze, or at least the one widely promoted by feminist analysis of the phenomenon:

> Male Gaze
>
> 1. A manner of treating women's bodies as objects to be surveyed, which is associated by feminists with hegemonic masculinity, both in everyday social interaction and in relation to their representation in visual media: [see also objectification].

What stands out in all definitions of the gaze is men's agency: men "treat" women's bodies, "survey" women's bodies, and enact "hegemony" over women's bodies. It's a travesty that deprives women of agency according to the feminist film critic credited with first coining "the male gaze."[1]

But is it so… are women always passive victims of rapey stares, or are they playing their part in eliciting it from men? Might it be – shock, horror – that they are agent provocateurs in a game they initiate and to a large extent control? I think most people, at least those not in denial, know the answer to that question is a big yes.

The hours and years spent trying on different clothing, and the rehearsing of postures, or gestures of the hands in front of the mirror; touching her face, placing her hands on her hips, or lightly above her breasts; or the practicing of facial gestures; and the smiles, pursed lips, head-tilts, hair flicks, and glances of the eyes, all designed to harvest the gaze from unsuspecting male targets.

Could it be that through that highly cultivated repertoire of gestures women possess enormous agency, and males serve as passive targets with little agency other than unprocessed reactivity?

Whatever the case we first need to rid ourselves of the myth that women are victims in this age-old game, to which end I will give a few gaze-harvesting techniques employed by women below, a list that can easily be expanded by adding your own observations of harvesting tricks.

Here are some of the techniques women habitually use to set a gaze reaction in motion, each of which involves a woman actively – and sometimes aggressively – placing herself within your sensory range with one of the following:

The Twisty Twirl

The best way to describe this is a gentle swaying or twisting the body from side to side, often with hands clasped at front, to impart a childish exuberance much like little girls do. While this might seem appropriate behavior of a 5 year old girl, the twisty-twirl is not something the gaze harvesting woman ever relinquishes – she employs it to interrupt men's field of vision with sudden movement, a gesture sufficient to gain his attention.

The Blockade

This happens when you are the target of a woman who wants to slow you down and make you absorb her presence. She will stand in the doorway, middle of the footpath, or in the shopping center aisle sometimes aided by a shopping trolley which she leaves strategically placed across the aisle. If done well, this forces an interaction: "Excuse me, I'll just move your trolley so I can get past," to which she replies "Oh, I'm so sorry," while flashing her most attractive features at you – her favorite dress, beautifully shampoo'd hair, or that smile she was famed for in high school.

The Color Assault

The practice of wearing eye-seizing colors is a favorite, with the unmistakable message being YOU WILL LOOK AT ME AND SEE ME! Gone are the soft pastel designs of yesteryear, and in are the garish fluoros or otherwise bold colors designed to snatch the attention of everyone who enters the room or walks the street. And not just the clothes – the practice extends to colored hair, hats, shawls and scarfs which have become equally loud, with the wearers settling for nothing less than complete molestation from every set of eyes in the immediate vicinity.

The Exclamation

The exclamation is timed just as the male target comes into earshot, and is often delivered in the form of a small shock or surprise; "Oh, I nearly fell over!" states the woman into the thin air, or "My goodness its so hot today" in the hopes a perfect stranger will begin gazing in the direction of the voice and, with luck, take up her topic of self-discussion.

The Exclamation can also appear as a muttering about something at just the right moment. This is a favorite and is normally delivered in the form of a question or statement in need of an answer, such as when she is in earshot of the right man in the shopping aisle and frustratedly mutters, supposedly to herself, "I can't find the cans of spaghetti I wonder if they've moved them?" or "I hope they are getting some fresh bread in today!" that the passing male might hear and feel compelled to respond.

Look At Me Strut:

Strutting gorgeously, exuding self-sufficiency with an I-don't-need-a-man look, the strutter has mastered the art of appearing disinterested in attention, while making a distracting physical display of swinging arms, loudly clopping heels, eye catching attire, and a chin-in-the-air look that begs a second glance from the target males. This routine is generally pulled in central business district where she assiduously scans shopfront windows to capture all those reflected male gazes that her empowered strutting dreams of capturing. Her skill at using shopfront windows to look at both herself and the reflected faces of those gazing at her rises up to an artform that allows her to look sideways and yet not trip over when having little focus on the road ahead.

Exhibit A.

The Volume Increase

This gaze-puller happens when you are walking toward a woman who happens to be with one or more of her girlfriends and, desiring your gaze to be directed on her like the lazer of a sniper, she suddenly turns up the volume of the conversation she is having, or laughs very loudly, often to the astonishment of her female companion who has not seen its purpose. As ridiculous as she may appear to her friend, she has nevertheless succeeded in attracting those dirty male eyes – even if by a guy simply wondering what that sudden blast of noise was about.

The Accessory

Women utilize accessories to draw attentions – a dog, a handbag, a child, or whatever else is handy. The handbag can be swung around or rummaged through in such a way as to capture the attention of the most sight impaired person in the room. Likewise children can be fawned over, or chastised, just as a target male walks by, where mother will say "Don't let that nice man see you eating candy" or "Don't get in the way of the nice man or you might get hurt." This is not to say that every woman and child who interacts with strangers is seeking the male gaze – many are simply engaging in polite public interaction. But a significant portion of them, perhaps especially single mothers, are soliciting further attentions.

Some women claim the best way to meet a man is to buy a dog and take it for a walk, where you'll meet a handsome man either walking his own dog, or perhaps just walking alone. If it's timed right, she knows her dog will follow the irresistible temptation to interact with the dog belonging to Mr. Handsome, and as a bonus the leashes might become entangled. In this scene she gains his eyes, and hopefully his conversation… will they get married?

Gesturing and Gesticulating

Women seem particularly adept at using physical movements to gain the male gaze. The many movements and postures of the arms, the hand placed strategically on chest, thigh, tummy, and the fingertips extended to touch various parts of the body or face – the chin, lips, cleavage. Or consider the tossing, sweeping, or twirling of the hair, and the flutters, glances or stares of the eyes, all designed to force an interaction from the harvestee.

The Lean In

What Sheryl Sandberg failed to admit was that women have been leaning in for millennia – with their cleavage. They do this for precisely the same reasons as Sandberg states – to get a rise, promotion, more money, status, and marriage. Perhaps that's what Sandberg unconsciously understood by that decidedly peculiar body-posture phrase Lean In – the old trick of bamboozaling with boobs. Why else would a woman need to "lean" "in"?

However it doesn't only happen in the board room or in the hiring room in front of the Human Resources officer. It happens equally at the bar, the gym, the music concert and the shopping center, places where women can get an equally good rise without even asking for one, at least not verbally. All she need to is lean in to get the attention she wants.

Did you notice something about these techniques? They are the same ones used by salespeople, like the ones you see selling wares in shopping malls who bounce a balloon up and down, twiddle a pen, or dance as the unsuspecting shopper walks in their direction only to be assaulted by a sideshow of color and movement. But rather than sell a product, the gaze-harvesting woman wants you to undress her with your eyes, a sign that her techniques have wielded power over you for her own narcissistic or material gain.

Next time you find yourself in one of these situations, try grasping some true agency by turning your eyes away from the female harvester, and enjoying the comedy when she becomes pissed at your refusal and 'ups the anti' – becoming louder, brighter, faster, and more obstructive as she attempts to salvage her failing effort.

You see, the real lack of agency appears when a man's senses are raped by an uninvited inrush of sensory stimuli, a bombardment arising from someone's selfish designs over where you should be gazing.

References:

[1] Laura Mulvey is credited with coining the phrase ‘The Male Gaze’ in her 1975 article Visual pleasure and narrative cinema.

See also: Chasing The Dragon

Israel joins the ranks of India and Sweden

AVfM Video Source · 23 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

And Israeli men do their part to enable all the insanity they can.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xNubAGCGo7U

Poor Prodromos: an abused husband in 12th-century Byzantium

Douglas Galbi · 24 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In twelfth-century Byzantium, the poet Theodore Prodromos appealed to the Emperor John II. Prodromos, a forerunner of oppressed husbands crying out in marital wilderness, implored:

> Although I seem, lord, to laugh and play at once,
> I am oppressed by endless grief and burdensome affliction, > by grave indisposition and suffering — what suffering!
> Hearing of suffering, don't suppose I have a rupture, > or any of your graver and less obvious troubles:
> it's no eyesores, plain to see, nor shivering fever either,
> it isn't heartburn, nor inflammation of the lung,
> no gut-knot shit-face, no dropsy, no bronchial troubles ..
> No, I have a nagging wife whose tongue wags on and on, > pugnaciously parading parapets and predictions, > redundantly recounting me the rightness of her cause. [1]

Men's keen sense of competition with other men makes them reluctant to complain about their wives. If husbands do complain, lack of compassion for men tends to compound their hurt. Prodromos, a highly sophisticated poet, found in a plea to the Byzantine Emperor a rare opportunity to make a pioneering first-personal literary account of a husband's suffering from his abusive wife.

Just as gender norms teach men not to cry, men learn to be afraid to express fear. Yet within the particular circumstances of his appeal, Prodromos openly expressed fear:

> I will make manifest this woman's spitefulness, > yet, lord, I fear those more brazen fellows, > lest they should hear me, and go to my home > and write reports about me unexpectedly.
> I would far rather, lord, they buried me alive, > and put me in the earth, and dug me into it, > than she should learn of what has just been written.
> For I fear her cackling and fury, I fear > her threats and invective. It would take little > for the idea to pop into her head, and here we go, > she orders her servants and her nurse to grab me, > put me out and throw me in the street and > bash me in the head in three places. Who > will avenge me and get rid of such a shrew? [2]

Prodromos's fear of his wife throwing him out of their house should be interpreted as realistic. Today men can be thrown out of their homes with a standard-form ex parte restraining order, or through gender-profiling men for domestic violence arrest. The same gynocentric social forces realistically would enable Prodromos's wife to have him thrown out into the street. At the same time, the Byzantine Emperor was imagined to be all-powerful. A plea for relief from gynocentric oppression was thus figuratively appropriate to direct to the Byzantine Emperor.[3]

Prodromos's wife complained about Prodromos in a way thoroughly realistic to men today. She complained:

> You sit in my house, but pay no heed to upkeep:

> the marbles are worn and faded, the floor has sagged,
> the tiles are dangling loose, the roof's completely rotten, > nothing is left of all the lettering, plaster, glass, > nor of marble cornices nor finely-wrought mosaics,
> the walls are tumbling down, the garden has run wild, > while the doors have all turned inside out from warping,
> the banisters are hanging loose from end to end,
> the outside parapets have fallen inward to the garden.
> You've never changed a door, there isn't a sound floorboard, > you've never changed a tile, nor yet repaired a wall;
> you haven't even called a builder in to fix it, > nor bought a single nail to knock into a floorboard! [4]

Men must do more than merely earn enough money to provide a woman with a luxurious house. Men must also maintain the house through completing home-maintenance tasks that their wives assign to them on a to-do list. Modern scholarly studies of gender-egalitarian marriage don't count such work as housework. With similar reasoning, Prodromos's wife complained that she did almost all the housework:

> As for me, I do your housework, direct > your servants, and take care of your children > better than would the best of nurses. I watch > over your business, I run around, get tired, > beat myself up, wearing a linen and cotton > dress made by my own hands. I am both your house > manager and your servant. I spin and weave > the wool, spin and work the linen, make shirts > and pants, and stitch together cotton. I serve > the church as deacon and sexton, head > of the chorus and notary, while like a chick, > you stay with open mouth for pecking and > pass your days waiting for when I will be able > to serve you well. [5]

Like Matheolus's wife Petra, Prodromos's wife complained that he didn't serve her well according to traditional standards of chivalry:

> That's why I wonder what I need from you > and what you do for me. If you don't > have the courage to stroke effectively, > it isn't necessary to throw yourself > into my wetness, but continue to lead your > little, placid, quiet and nonchalant life, > scratch your leprosy, and leave me in peace. [6]

Even though his wife disparaged him, Prodromos remained fond of her and meals. Like most fathers, Prodromos also deeply loved his children and especially enjoyed eating meals with them.

Just as family courts today regularly deprive men of contact with their children, so too did Prodromos's wife. Prodromos recounted one such occasion:

> My wife took the children, returned with them > into the apartment and locked the door.
> I could do nothing but go to bed alone, > without sexual or culinary comfort, > in darkness and despair. Awake early,
> I headed straight to her room and, hand > on the doorknob, I shouted to her: “I wish > you good morning, my wife,” and “Will you not > open for me, my sweetheart? Do you not want > to see me?” I exhaled three deep sighs, but > heard no echo, no response, not a word, > not a murmur. I went back to sit down > and cry. When mealtime came, Sire, I went > to bed and fell asleep. But, in my sleep, > smell of stew came over my eyelids.
> I jumped out of bed, and getting up hastily > and sniffing with more flair than a bloodhound,
> I saw stew in the middle of the room.
> The children were gathered and seated > for the meal, the table had been set and > covered with a tablecloth. Seeing this, your servant > could not contain his rejoicing, hoping that > he would be invited to sit down and share a meal.
> But time passed and I saw nothing for me. [7]

Such circumstances drive men to despair. Is it any wonder than four times more men than women commit suicide?

Despite being deprived of a meal and the company of his children and wife, Prodromos didn’t succumb to despair. He recognized the importance of drama in women’s lives and acted accordingly:

> I got up in haste, seized and put on my > mostly sleeveless jacket, wrapped myself in my > Tombritza nightgown, put on my head my wool > turban, grabbed my long stick and headed toward the room.
> There I found a closed door, and I stayed on > the threshold. Then I started shouting incessantly:
> “Hey, have mercy on me, my wife, do not leave > me outside!” My children, who weren’t informed > of anything, rushed forward, and immediately > armed themselves with cudgels, sticks, and stones, > and descended the stairs all four together.
> But their mother, who had understood everything, > shouted to them: “Let him in, this is without > a doubt a poor wretch, a beggar, a pilgrim.”
> Your servant was ecstatic because he was > hungry. The children returned to a better > disposition, and so I could climb the stairs > of my house along with them. I went in > and sat down without being asked, without > waiting for someone to invite me to the table.

> As soon as I saw before me a plate > full of soup, salted meat, and large pieces of food,
> I seized this dish with both hands, and this abundant > broth, these hearty dishes, warmed my heart.

Many husbands are no better than poor wretches and beggars in their own homes. Yet if they are willing to play along with their wives' need for drama, they can still get a good meal. A husband's stomach is more important to him than his heart.

Violence against men and social structures under which men are coerced into transferring resources to women are hazardous to discuss. Yet in his twelfth-century plea to the Byzantine Emperor, Prodromos addressed these issues forthrightly:

> Such misfortunes, o crown-bearing overlord, have I suffered > from a combative and thrice-roguish wife, > when she saw me returning empty-handed to our house.
> Should then your benevolence not reach me, o senior monarch, > and should you not satiate this insatiate woman with gifts and presents,
> I tremble, I am scared, I fear lest I should be murdered before my time, > and you shall be deprived of your Prodromos – the best pronouncer of your praises. [8]

Courtiers in Byzantium, like courtiers in the ancient Islamic world, competed with poetry for imperial favor. Courtiers commonly produced poems praising a ruler. Prodromos alluded to that practice, but produced a much more sophisticated and innovative poem.

Poor Prodromos's twelfth-century plea to the Byzantine Emperor is a literary pioneer of realism and the novel. Prodromos constructed a long, realistic but fictional poetic narrative of his mundane life. He positioned that narrative as having universal public significance. That's essentially the literary strategy of the prose novels that rapidly proliferated in late-eighteenth century Europe.[9]

Like the medieval Latin lamentations of Matheolulus, Prodromos's plea is an under-appreciated masterpiece of men's sexed protest. Matheolulus's work is more figurative, while Prodromos's plea is more novelistic. Both provide vital insight into men's social position. Both deserve more attention in socially conscious, critical literary studies that's also fun.[10]

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Ptochoprodromika I, "Prodromos, kyros Theodoros, to the Emperor Mavroiannes," ll. 15-25, from Greek trans. Alexiou (2002) p. 131. The Emperor Mavroiannes {John the Black} was John II Komnenos (reigned 1118-43), who came to be called Kaloiannes {John the Good}. Id. p. 129. For the translation of l. 22, based on Alexiou (2016b) p. 53, I've inserted "gut-knot" so that the translation for σκορδαψόν is "gut-knot shit-face." Id. notes:

> the ailment involved obstruction of the intestines, with the result that the patient may shoot projectile faeces from the mouth

The above post should not be interpreted to imply that I suffer from such an illness.

The poem survives only in one thirteenth-century manuscript, Manuscript Bibliotheque nationale de Paris, grec 396 (additional manuscript description and bibliography). An image of the manuscript is freely available online. The manuscript poses significant editing challenges, including physical damage to the manuscript and indications of interpolations. Hesseling & Pernot (1910) is a well-regarded edition freely available online. The currently leading edition is Eideneier (1991). The French translation from the edition of Miller & Legrand (1875) is available online. The most detailed discussion of the poem in English is Alexiou (1999) pp. 93-102.

The author of the poem is commonly referred to as Ptochoprodromos (poor Prodromos). The poem is associated in style and manuscript collocation with perhaps three other poems (poem counts vary based on treatment of pieces as proems). Those poems together are known as Ptochoprodromika. For a review of the poems, Banev (2008). Scholars dispute their attribution to Theodore Prodromos, a leading twelfth-century Byzantine literary writer. On Prodromos's life and works, Bazzani (2007) pp. 211-4. Prodromos was "one of the most inventive Komnenian poets." Zagklas (2016) p. 225. The treatment of men's domestic concerns in the poem is highly inventive in its realism. Alexiou (1986), pp. 332-5, Alexiou (2002), p. 128, and Agapitos (2015), pp. 23-33, support attributing the Ptochoprodromika to Prodromos.

The Ptochoprodromika are written in vernacular Greek in fifteen-syllable accentual verse called politikos stichos (political verse). For a review of use of that verse form, Jeffreys (1974). The Ptochoprodromika have been confidently dated to 1140-1170. Agapitos (2015) p. 4.

Leading Byzantinist Margaret Alexiou has been working on an English translation and commentary of the Ptochoprodromika with a terminus ad quem securely datable to the early 1980s. Alexiou (1986) p. 301 noted that her article:

> incorporates, inevitably, much of the collective work done during the course of the academic year 1983/4 by staff and postgraduate members of the Byzantine Text Seminar (Centre for Byzantine Studies, University of Birmingham), which is preparing for publication a translation, glossary and full commentary on the four poems. Work on the fourth is nearing completion.

Readers eagerly awaiting that edition read in 1999:

> This paper is based on research carried out for an edition of the Ptochoprodromic Poems, with Greek text and facing English translation, introduction, commentary,and glossary,to be completed in collaboration with Michael Hendy. … I am currently compiling a glossary for the bilingual edition under preparation by myself and Michael Hendy.

Alexiou (1999) p. 91, note; p. 108, n. 42. Ardent followers of Alexiou's work read in 2002:

> These questions {about the Ptochoprodromika} will be fully addressed in an edition I am currently preparing with Michael Hendy

In 2010, Alexiou was a Summer Research Fellow at the Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection. Her research project was "Ptochoprodromika: Edition, Translation, Commentary, with Introduction." She reported:

> This project aimed to bring as close to publication as possible the text, translation, and commentary of the Ptochoprodromika of Theodore Prodromos. A working text has been established for Poem I (MS G) (274 lines), Poem II (MS G) (117 lines) + (MS H) (150 lines), the so-called Maiuri Poem (65 lines), Poem III (MS H) (approximately 550 lines) + MSS CSA and g (approximately 200 lines), Poem IV (MS G) (167 lines), its Proem (MSS CSA) (56 lines), and the ending (MS g) (150 lines). Facing translation is now complete for all passages to be presented in the main section.

Dumbarton Oaks (2010) provides some additional translated sections of the Ptochoprodomika not available in other of Alexiou's publications. Despite a mysterious blog excerpt, the full text of all the Ptochoprodomika seems not to have yet appeared in English translation. Those who deeply respect and closely follow Alexiou's meticulous scholarship read in 2016 of "my forthcoming edition" and "my textual commentary (in draft)." Alexiou (2016a) p. 222; Alexiou (2016b) p. 53. Given the literary importance of the Ptochoprodomika, all men, women, and children should rally to Alexiou's aid and provide her with all the support and encouragement necessary for her to complete this important work after more than thirty years of effort.

[2] Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 26-32 (trans. Alexiou (1986) p. 336), ll. 33-9, my English translation from the French prose translation of Bouchet (2012) p. 12. I lineate my translation from the French for consistency. All quotations from id. appear similarly.

[3] Like scholars in many other fields, Byzantinists have failed to recognize gynocentric oppression. Instead, Byzantine scholars have engaged with patriarchal myths:

> In recent years some scholars have tended to imagine Byzantine women as living in a male-dominated environment, in a military society where men inevitably exercised power, under the oppression of "patriarchy."

Kazhdan (1998) p. 1. Scholars who don't recognize a wide range of injustices against men readily apparent today can hardly analyze credibly Byzantine history, society, or literature.

[4] Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 75-87, trans. Alexiou (2002) p. 136.

[5] Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 90-101, from Bouchet (2012) p. 14.

[6] Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 102-7, from Bouchet (2012) p. 14. Prodromos's wife further told him:

> If you wanted to play the fop, seduce > and marry a woman, you had only to choose > one of your condition, a tavern-keeper's > daughter, freckled, lame, ragged and penniless, > or better a saleswoman of shameful herbs coming > from her village of Maninéa. Why did > you turn the head of the poor orphan that I > was by showing me sweet eyes and an assiduous > courting, you surrounded by the procession > of your male friends?

Id. ll. 108-13. In context, "shameful herbs" suggests sexual stimulants.

[7] This and the subsquent quote are from Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 221-67, from Bouchet (2012) pp. 17-8.

[8] Ptochoprodromika I, ll. 268-74, trans. Agapitos (2015) p. 28. Alexiou (2002) p. 132 provides an alternate English translation.

[9] The prominent late-eighteenth-century English historian Edward Gibbon called the Byzantines a "degenerate people." Gibbon declared of Byzantine literature:

> Their prose is soaring to the vicious affectation of poetry; their poetry is sinking below the flatness and insipidity of prose. The tragic, epic, and lyric muses were silent and inglorious: the bards of Constantinople seldom rose above a riddle or epigram, a panegyric or tale; they forgot even the rules of prosody; and with the melody of Homer yet sounding in their ears, they confound all measure of feet and syllables in the impotent strains which had received the name of political or city verses.

Gibbon (1781/1841) vol. 4, p. 26. That's a failure of enlightenment, but not as culpable or damaging as failures of enlightenment today.

[10] A nineteenth-century Irish historian declared, "The history of the empire is a monotonous story of the intrigues of priests, eunuchs and women." Lecky (1869) p. 13. James (2010), p. 1, cites that quote and discusses it, but ignores the lack of attention to husbands. Id. p. 2, however, does acknowledge that Byzantine literature included fun.

More generally, it's necessary to "rewrite the history of Byzantine literature." Agapitos (2015) p. 41. More attention to men's sexed concerns and comparative analysis with medieval Latin literature will be vital to such rewriting. For those who consider such a direction to be subversive, Alexiou (2013) offers lessons in the art of subversion. For a comparison of twelfth-century Greek and Latin begging poems, Kulhánková (2010).

[image] A husband being verbally abused by his wife. Image from the Vinegar Valentine, Valentine Comics Series # 1, dated 1908. Images of husbands being physically abused by their wives were common in medieval Europe. Domestic violence against men continues not to be taken seriously today.

References:

Agapitos, Panagiotis A. 2015. "New genres in the twelfth century: the schedourgia of Theodore Prodromos." Medioevo Greco. 15(1): 1-41.

Alexiou, Margaret. 1986. "The Poverty of Écriture and the Craft of Writing: Towards a Reappraisal of the Prodromic Poems." Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies. 10 (1): 1-40. Reprinted, pp. 301-35, in Nagy, Gregory, ed. 2001. Greek literature. Vol. 9. Greek literature in the Byzantine period. New York: Routledge. I cite pages numbers from the Nagy reprint.

Alexiou, Margaret. 1999. "Ploys of Performance: Games and Play in the Ptochoprodromic Poems." Dumbarton Oaks Papers. 53: 91-109.

Alexiou, Margaret. 2002. After antiquity: Greek language, myth, and metaphor. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Alexiou, Margaret. 2013. "Literary subversion in Byzantium: A partial and personal perspective." Ch. 15 Afterword (pp. 281-8) in Dimiter Angelov and Michael Saxby, eds. Power and subversion in Byzantium: papers from the 43rd Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, Birmingham, March 2010. Farnham, Surrey: Ashgate Variorum.

Alexiou, Margaret. 2016a. "Of Longings and Loves: Seven Poems by Theodore Prodromos." Dumbarton Oaks Papers. 69: 209-24.

Alexiou, Margaret. 2016b. "On σκορδαψός: gut-knot or eyesore? A tribute to BMGS." Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies. 40 (01): 49-54.

Banev, Guentcho. 2008. "Ptochoprodromos." Encyclopaedia of the Hellenic World. World-wide web, from Constantinople.

Bazzani, Marina. 2007. "The Historical Poems of Theodore Prodromos, the Epic-Homeric Revival and the Crisis of the Intellectuals in the Twelfth Century." Byzantinoslavica. 65: 211-228.

Bouchet, René, trans. 2012. Satires et parodies du Moyen âge grec. La roue à livres, 63e. Paris: Les Belles Lettres. (review)

Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection. 2010. Textual basis for "Of Mice and Muses." Byzantine Theatron performance on 29 July 2010, featuring Dumbarton Oaks Byzantine Summer Fellows and colleagues as Muses, Slaves, and Chorus of Mice. Andrew White, Dramaturg.

Eideneier, Hans. 1991. Ptochoprodromos: Einführung, kritische Ausgabe, deutsche Übersetzung, Glossar. Köln: Romiosini.

Gibbon, Edward. 1781. The history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire: By Edward Gibbon, Esq; in six volumes. Dublin: Printed for William Hallhead.

Hesseling, D.-C. and H. Pernot, eds. 1910. Poèmes prodromiques en grec vulgaire. Amsterdam: Johannes Müller, 1910.

James, Liz. 2010. “Byzantium: A Very, Very Short Introduction.” Ch. 1 (pp. 1-8) in James, Liz, ed. A companion to Byzantium. Chichester, West Sussex, U.K.: Wiley-Blackwell.

Jeffreys, Michael J. 1974. “The nature and origins of the political verse.” Dumbarton Oaks Papers. 28: 141-95.

Kazhdan, Alexander P. 1998. “Women at Home.” Dumbarton Oaks Papers. 52: 1-17.

Kulhánková, Markéta. 2010. “Vaganten in Byzanz, Prodromoi im Westen. Parallellektüre von byzantinischer und lateinischer Betteldichtung des 12. Jahrhunderts.” Byzantinoslavica 68: 241-256.

Lecky, William Edward Hartpole. 1869. History of European morals from Augustus to Charlemagne. Vol. 2 Vol. 2. New York: D. Appleton and Co.

Miller, E. and Emile Legrand, ed. and trans. 1875. Trois poëmes vulgaires de Théodore Prodrome. Collection de monuments pour servir à l’étude de la langue néo-hellénique, no. 7. Paris: Maisonneuve et Cie.

Zagklas, Nikos. 2016. “Theodore Prodromos and the use of the poetic work of Gregory of Nazianzus: Appropriation in the service of self-representation.” Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies. 40 (02): 223-242.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

See also: The Henpecked Club: A Two-Hundred Year Fellowship of Abused Husbands

Janice Fiamengo Speaks at SheForHe in Ottawa, Canada

AVfM Video Source · 24 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Coercion and the politics of inclusion

Bettina Arndt · 25 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I've long been amazed by the willingness of the Australian media to buy into using the crazy terminology for the gay community, LGBTIQ or "alphabet soup" as some call it. It is nonsense to suggest the ever-growing Rainbow Coalition is a unified group, lobbying for cohesive, recognised goals. The reality is that the various factions are at each other's throats, as was painfully obvious at an Ethics Centre debate held last year.

I've just published an article in The Spectator Australia about the coercive politics of inclusion which underpins what's happening here. I'll include my article below, for those who can't access it online.

But I particularly want to draw attention to the excellent article by Dr John Whitehall, which I mention in my story. Whitehall, who is professor of paediatrics at the University of Western Sydney, is bravely speaking out about what he calls an "intrusion into the minds and bodies of children" which is leading to a "fashion in child surgical abuse." He draws attention to new laws currently being introduced in Victoria which discourage doctors from simply monitoring children to allow them to grow out of any gender confusion (which most would do, if left alone.) The new laws bully doctors into intervention – even though there is no good evidence that this is helpful with the majority of such children. Here's Whitehall's important article – which was published in Quadrant magazine.

And here is my article:

Last year the Scottish philosopher John Haldane took part in a Sydney Ethics Centre debate challenging the notion that "Society Must Recognise Trans People's Gender Identities". Facing a hostile audience filled with Mardi Gras visitors, his reasoned arguments took issue with the coercion implied in that "must". "We need toleration, a principled response to difference. But toleration is not endorsement, toleration is not approbation, toleration is not celebration," he said.

He added that with such complex issues we need to proceed respectfully, showing empathy and sensitivity but it is inappropriate that society be forced to recognise any group. "We need to hold back the forces of coercion," he added.

It's a lesson Hillary Clinton confronted through the ballot box, not that her followers nor the blinkered media have taken note. Her downfall was a clear sign that mainstream communities have had a gutful of those forces of coercion bullying them into accepting views which they find uncomfortable or inappropriate. We've had decades of this compulsory politics of inclusion, a highly selective process where the elite crowd decides who will be offended when left out of any debate or lobbying effort, whilst omitting whole sectors of communities when it suits them.

The most obvious example was very much in evident at the Ethics Centre debate, where the so-called "Rainbow Coalition" was out in force. What shone through the occasionally acrimonious debate was perilous state of this splintering coalition. How ironic that we have all being bullied into using the crazy terminology for the gay community, "LGBTIQ" or "alphabet soup" as some call it, when the various factions are at each other's throats.

Take British journalist and provocateur Milo Yiannoplouos' efforts to promote a "Drop the T" campaign, lobbying to have transsexuals turfed out of the coalition. Milo, who's been campaigning on US campuses on his self-described "Dangerous Faggot" tour, argues that the lobby for gay rights and freedoms is being undermined by transsexuals' crazy demands. He suggests that transgenderism is not an alternative sexuality at all but rather a psychiatric disorder: "Everyone's pretty much sold on gays and lesbians as a sexual orientation now. But you can't do the same with trannies who require hormone treatments and the services of a skilled butcher."

Feminists are becoming braver about explaining how the transgender lobby is riding roughshod over women's rights. They object to T campaigners branding them "Terfs." (trans exclusionary radical feminists) when they refuse to support all their pronouncements particularly about bathroom signage.

A fascinating example of the tension between these two groups emerged at a women's festival in Auckland last year which included a display of cupcakes shaped like vulvas (to encourage women to accept their own nether regions.) Transgender activists complained this created an "unsafe environment for them" and tried to shut down the event – inspiring the rage of the lesbian feminists.

And so it goes on. Gay men are grumbling about lesbians commandeering the Rainbow float, muscling in to head up the alphabet soup and promoting an anti-male hate movement hell-bent on undermining the rights and welfare of boys and men. An Australian blogger known as Andy Bob notes that back in the 1960s Betty Friedan was referring to lesbian feminists as the "Lavender Menace" and warning they were bad news. "Perhaps if G had paid closer attention to this warning it may be have been better prepared to handle the moment when L told G to check its privilege and remove its limp-wristed self from the front of the queue," he writes explaining that since then gay men have been brainwashed into accusing their straight brothers of being responsible for every problem and injustice the world has ever known.

And here's Milo: "Let's not forget, the majority of LGBT people, gay men, put in all the work to make gay rights happen. So stop taking us for granted and stop crapping on us just because we're not going along with your latest fad. The G in LGBT has been a load-bearing wall for the whole alphabet soup crew for decades, and we extraordinary gays, the best gays, are tired of pulling along every single alternative sexuality when they expect us to do the heavy lifting while they do the easy grifting."

The whole rotten LGBT edifice needs to come down, argues Milo. Recently in America the reputation of the coalition has been shaken by backlash to battles by the Ts over bathrooms, as state governments lined up to oppose Obama's decree that the 55 million American kids in 100,000 public schools can choose any bathroom which fits their perceived gender identity.

The bathroom issue is a tough one. The Sydney Festival was recently blessed by performances from Ivan Coyote, a superb storyteller who thrilled audiences with his/her moving tales of struggles with gender identity. Coyote was born female but confusingly uses the royal plural. So they take issue with women's complaints about being afraid of men in the women's washroom because of what might happen. "But I'm afraid of women in the women's washroom because of what happens to me all the time. …Who in the hell decides who gets to feel comfortable?" Coyote asks.

Much as I was won over by Coyote's powerful stories, I suspect compulsory unisex toilets are just not going to happen – at least not until we find some way of teaching drunken men not to pee on the floor.

It all comes back to John Haldan's plea for tolerance but not coercion and the T lobby, Coyote aside, shows no sign of getting that message. Late last year an article was published in Quadrant magazine by John Whitehall, Professor of Paediatrics at Western Sydney University which presents solid evidence that our society is being bullied into surgical abuse of so-called "transgender" children most of whom would have grown out of any gender confusion if they had been left to their own devices. Whitehall reveals how activists are grossly inflating figures to overestimate the prevalent of transgender children and describes alarming laws currently being introduced in Victoria which essentially prohibit professionals from sensible "wait and see" policies with children, demanding they intervene with puberty blockers, cross-sex-hormones and even surgery. "What astonishes me is the lack of evidence to support massive medical invention in the face of evidence that it is not necessary," writes Professor Whitehall.

But it is a brave professional who speaks out on this subject. Whitehall's article describes what has happened to Canadian transgender expert Ken Zucker, one of the world's most experienced and respected leaders in this field for over four decades. Zucker has been stood down and forced to close his clinic because he chose not to intrude on children's development in this way. "Children do not always know what is best for them and neither do we. It takes a long time for a child to know who he really is," Zucker explained in a recent BBC documentary.

Gay marriage is another example where for years our publicly funded ABC chose to fill news reports with stories proselytizing gay marriage or items belittling people who challenged their propaganda. This created a backlash where many who initially supported 'marriage equality' objected to the coercion. Polling on this issue suggests a Trump effect where the privacy of a plebiscite vote would have revealed the extent of rebellion in the broader community.

Some years ago I was conducting research recruiting couples to write diaries about how they negotiate difference in sexual desire. I toyed with the idea of including gay couples but decided that would only add to the huge complexity of describing how this vexed issue plays out in the majority of marriages or long-term heterosexual relationships. The intricacies of this negotiation are too dense to burden the discussion with talk of lesbian bed death or randy gay men and what gay agony uncle Dan Savage calls their “monogamish” deals. Such intriguing topics deserve their own research.

It just doesn’t make sense to risk alienating an audience and dilute important messages by inappropriately genuflecting to diversity. A classic example is Cyndi Darnell, a Melbourne-based sex therapist who has made a great series of videos about sexual anatomy, The Atlas of Erotic Anatomy and Arousal. But what’s completely daft about Darnell’s otherwise excellent presentation is her determination to not use expressions like “his penis” or “her vagina” because there are people with these organs who don’t identify as those genders. It makes no sense to alienate her big heterosexual audience by pandering to the tiny numbers who fall into this category.

But that’s par for the course in today’s bizarre politics of inclusion.The needs and sensitivities of mainstream Australia are rarely taken into account as issues are framed in terms that cater to the most miniscule minority groups. And any resistance from ordinary folk to these grovelling displays of tolerance is met with public shaming and abuse.

Given what’s happened in Canada to the eminent Dr Ken Zucker perhaps it’s time we dropped all talk of the rainbow coalition and its nonsensical alphabet soup. There must be a way of giving enthusiastic support for rightful claims for tolerance and understanding to minority groups without being bullied into absurd policies which subvert the needs, comfort and safety of the majority.

The most controversial conference in Australia: June 2017

Paul Elam · 28 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Buy Tickets for ICMI ’17

https://icmi.info/

Running of the bullst

AVfM Video Source · 28 February 2017 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=e3E5o7Og150

No Men Beyond This Point

AVFM · 1 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This article was originally published in a blog post on AVFM Forums by Diedre. It is republished here with her permission. EDs

Imagine a world where men are becoming extinct.

Imagine a world with no men.

Imagine a world where pregnancy no longer requires sperm.

I watched part of a movie recently titled "No Men Beyond This Point." It's an interesting, yet depressing and somewhat creepy look at what a world might look like if women no longer needed men. The movie is brilliant in the sense that it captures what feminism is doing to our global culture, especially in the west, while planting a seed in the viewer's mind of "could this really happen?"

The movie starts out mentioning the virgin birth of Jesus. For those who are not familiar with the Christian story of how Jesus was conceived, Mary, his mother – was impregnated without a human father. This is the story that is Bible based and has been passed down for centuries, by believers all over the world. The interesting part of this story is that before Jesus' time, it was a well-known belief that gods and humans were making babies (with each other) for a very long time. Whatever story you choose to believe, this is how the movie begins, taking its audience on a journey into what that might actually look like, if it were to happen in modern times. Imagine, if a woman could find herself pregnant, and no men were responsible for impregnating her?

The movie shifts to a family of sorts, two women who live together (I don't get the sense they are lesbians or lovers) with their kids. They hired a guy to live with them, who takes care of the gardening, goes to work and pays the bills, cooks for them, takes care of the kids, grocery shops, and a whole host of chores that are too long too name. He remarks that he is the youngest, living man at 37 years old. He seems content in his role, but the women treat him strictly as hired help. They are not sexually interested in him, they don't "hang out" with him, really. His "job" is literally to do everything a husband and father would be doing, without the actual labels of husband and father.

One of the women in the house starts to notice him. Starts to like him. She doesn't only see him as a utility, but she sees him as a man. She comments during an interview, that "he has a way about him that I just like." Could that "way" be that he is simply…masculine? She can't pinpoint what it is that she is so fascinated by, but she finds herself getting closer to him, which is "against the rules." There will be no getting close to the men who are only there to serve the women, as hired help!

So, you might be wondering…where are the male children? Well, the movie then continues down a path of interviewing some doctors (not real doctors lol) who convey that only females are born, into this new way of pregnancy. The only male under 40 years old that is left is the guy I mentioned above, and he is 37 years old, so if you do the math, there are no male children, teenagers, or young adults. Everyone being born is now female. It's quite creepy, but the film makers did a masterful job of making this all look so realistic and possible.

So, the movie shows women as running the government, legal system and schools.75% of the world is female. There are simply no men in positions of authority, they are all being replaced once they reach a certain age, by "capable" women. The storyline sort of weaves in and out of bringing science into the mix, illustrating that these changes are due to nature. That this is another level of evolution, and that no one should fight it. As one woman in the film puts it "if we came from apes, who's to say that we couldn't become one gender?" Their mantra "praise nature" comes from the belief that nature is driving men away in an evolutionary type of way, and that it's purposeful.

So what are the remaining men doing, who are over 37 years of age, you might wonder? They are protesting in the streets, they are being arrested and thrown into jails for not going along with the 'new world order.' They have taken to living in the woods, in tents…boycotting the "feminine regime." Some men are very angry, while others have resigned themselves to the fact that men are on their way to becoming extinct. If a woman doesn't need a man's sperm to become pregnant, she would no longer need him for anything, is the premise of the story.

The women who are being "interviewed" throughout the film, still long for romance, sex, companionship, and love. So, many women become lesbians. They take to turning to each other for what men once provided to them. They call intercourse with men "old sex," because it speaks of how humans beings once had sex, but since males aren't being born anymore, there are no men to have sex with. Remember, the youngest man alive is 37 years old, and no males are being born, thereafter.

But, there are women who are seething with anger, and they don't know why. They are frustrated, perhaps sexually, considering they're not having sex with men, anymore. (which is a biological desire) Feminists would have people believe that it's not a desire, that it's all in a woman's head…and she needs to change the way she sees men. Men are to be used, just like they have been using us, all of these centuries, is the mantra of the movie, basically.

Biology doesn't wait on anyone, though. Even though women were no longer getting pregnant by men, (because their egg would split and no longer accept sperm…which eventually it became unnecessary for sperm to fertilize the egg in order for conception – use your imagination lol it's a little out there) they still longed for men. Some would freely admit it, while others were trying to follow the herd, and didn't want to seem weak.

Needing men is not a weakness. Men and women both need one another. How frightening to think of a world without one or the other. The movie's plot most likely will never happen, but it shows how the venom of feminism has poisoned so many women's minds, that they probably feel men are extinct to them. Men, as individuals. Men, as feeling, loving human beings. Many women today treat men like utilities. They marry them, they have their kids, and then they screw the men over in divorce court, and these men are distraught and depressed, wondering what they did wrong. Not saying marriages never end due to men screwing things up, that happens a lot, too. But, the movie exploits feminism in a way that shows what it'd likely become…a new world order. In the film, there were no more churches, because women felt that believing in a god, meant that a male type of figure would be in their lives. The crosses within churches were replaced with the symbol for "female." Women would gather there and worship each other, and their new feminine ideals. Some yoga took place there, too.

I didn't finish the movie, as I had seen enough to determine that it makes a great case for what feminism could look like if it were to continue down its path. Women and men will always need one another for procreation, but many women are turning to sperm banks or adoption now…basically creating fatherless families for themselves, and their kids. Not unlike having a fatherless pregnancy, just a few steps away from it.

But the movie also offers another message, and that is that women are getting back at men, for being oppressed all of these years. There will be no more patriarchy, and the movie seemed to depict many of the women as seeking revenge against all men, angry with them…always barking orders and reprimands, at the ones who were still around. The men would apologize, and then walk away in shame. How close is this movie to reality? I think it's very close. Many men are treated like outcasts, while women are treated like special princesses. Many men are pushed out of jobs, while women are replacing them. Many men are being trampled upon in divorce court, while their women are the ones who destroyed their marriages.

Even the pregnancy thing might not be that farfetched, in a few decades. Science is making incredible advances on a number of fronts, who is to say that someday…men will not be needed to impregnate a woman? And, imagine if science could somehow trip a switch, and only females were being born?

What IS happening, however, is that men are marginalized at alarming numbers, every day. In the movie, a men's right group rises up, though and starts to speak out against the atrocities that are being done to them by the feminine regime. It's eerily similar to today…to us talking on here…to the kind of madness that feminism has left in its quake.

I wouldn't want to be part of a feminine world order, where men are becoming extinct. Where men would become the topic of folklore stories because they no longer exist. Women and men need one another, but feminism wants to divide us. It is dividing us. But, I will continue to speak out against it, because feminism is a lie. Men and women have intrinsic value and have survived this long because of one another, not despite it.

I recommend checking out this movie on Netflix and would be interested to know your thoughts. I give it a B-:

No Men Beyond This Point

The alpha male bandit and the beta male baker

Doug Mortimer · 3 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Note: Also available in Portuguese.

Leroy Leonard – don't be this guy! Wait a minute…Leroy who?

I'm pretty sure that nobody reading this has ever heard of Leroy Leonard, but more than likely you have heard of the man who cuckolded him. So let's begin with a brief bio of Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd.

Floyd was born in Adairsville, Georgia on February 3, 1904, and moved with his family to eastern Oklahoma when he was a boy. His upbringing was fairly typical of rural youths at that time. His family was hardly affluent but no one missed any meals. It could be described as hardscrabble light. For the Floyd family, as with many others in those days, producing moonshine was commonplace. Of course, if you want to make corn liquor, having a cornfield on your property gives you a head start.

Floyd progressed from making moonshine and petty larceny (his first brush with the law was literally penny ante: stealing a jar of pennies) to grand larceny, mostly bank robbing, which entailed occasional casualties and a number of confrontations with lawmen.

As was the case with many an outlaw in those days, Floyd's exploits were as much legend as fact. He was accused of far more crimes than he could have committed, and much like Jesse James, he was something of a hero to the locals.

Eastern Oklahoma was still relatively wild and wooly in Floyd's days (the 46th state in the union, Oklahoma did not achieve statehood till 1907). In its territorial days, it was something of a sanctuary for all sorts of bad hombres. Most of the gallows fodder put before Judge Isaac Parker (a/k/a the Hanging Judge, who served on the bench in Fort Smith, Arkansas from 1875 to 1896), was harvested from the IT (Indian Territory) by federal marshals. (The old Clint Eastwood movie, Hang 'Em High, is a pretty decent re-creation of the times). Pretty Boy Floyd's old stomping grounds were just a few miles west of Fort Smith.

Pretty Boy's legend was spread by many unfortunate people (the Great Depression started early in rural America) to whom he had given a helping hand. Most country folk admired Floyd and few were inclined to help the minions of the law. Doubtless many people experienced vicarious enjoyment from his exploits and admired his pluck. He life of crime was, in a sense, a success story. If crime is "a left-handed form of human endeavor" (according to the crooked lawyer in The Asphalt Jungle), then Pretty Boy Floyd was a left-handed version of Horatio Alger.

Before he became a serious criminal, Floyd made the acquaintance of one Ruby Hardgraves, a sharecropper's daughter; he was 19 and she was 17. Sparks flew and continued to fly. The two were inseparable and eventually married (she was pregnant at the time) on June 28, 1924 in Sallisaw, Oklahoma.

Soon after his son Dempsey (named after heavyweight champ Jack Dempsey) was born, Floyd got into armed robbery. After unwisely flaunting his ill-gotten gains, he attracted the attention of local authorities, who traced his boodle of cash back to a St. Louis payroll robbery. He was remanded to Missouri for trial, found guilty, and sent to the state pen in Jefferson City, Missouri. He was 25 years old when he was released on March 7, 1929.

Absence had not made Ruby's heart grow fonder. Rather than stand by her man, she divorced Pretty Boy while he was in stir. Here is where Leroy Leonard enters the picture.

Leroy Leonard wasn't as sharp as Pretty Boy Floyd, but he was a sharp contrast to him. Leonard was a classic beta male, reliable, hard-working, steady, and probably dull. Yet he was the answer to a single mother's prayer, and he bonded with Ruby and her son.

Call him a sucker, a simp, a sap, or what you will. Maybe he was just color-blind and didn't recognize the red flags. They were:

(1) Ruby was divorced;

(2) Ruby was a single mother; and

(3) Ruby's first husband was a notorious outlaw who was still at large.

Gee, what could go wrong?

At any rate, Leonard married Ruby and took her and her son to the southeast Kansas town of Coffeyville, where he worked in a bakery. That move might have been an omen, since the town was synonymous with bank robberies, more specifically, botched bank robberies. On October 5, 1892, four members of the Dalton gang were killed in the act while attempting to rob two banks simultaneously.

As a bank robber, Floyd was a better provider than Leonard. He was daring and dapper – hence his nickname. Not only was he Pretty Boy, he was the Phantom of the Ozarks, and the Robin Hood of the Cookson Hills. Though Floyd operated mainly in the Midwest, he was as much a national celebrity as any movie star or sports hero, despite the fact that his occupation dictated that he avoid photo ops rather than seek them out.

Maintaining a low profile was no problem for Leroy Leonard. In Pretty Boy: the Life and Times of Charles Arthur Floyd (St. Martin's Press, 1992), author Michael Wallis describes Leonard as a "twenty-two-year-old hardworking man she [Ruby] had met in Oklahoma. He was very much in love with Ruby, and he was kind to her own little boy. Friends remembered that he treated Dempsey as if he were his own son."

"Leroy was always very good to me and my mother," recalled Dempsey many years later. Yes, Leonard was a nice guy, and as Leo Durocher supposedly said, "Nice guys finish last" – or in this place, second. Leonard could not compete with Pretty Boy Floyd, the man or the legend.

Unbeknownst to Leroy, his wife had renewed her acquaintance with her ex-husband. She had not sought him out. One day he simply appeared on her doorstep in Coffeyville and sparks started flying again. Dempsey recalled that his first memory of his father was that day in 1931.

Imagine poor Leroy Leonard walking home after toiling all day in the bakery to find out that his wife's first husband, a notorious outlaw, is a houseguest. Not only that, his wife and stepson are about to take off with him – that very evening.

How can a time-clock-punching wage slave compete with a celebrity gangster? As a baker, Leroy Leonard might have come home with dough on his hands, but Floyd came home with fistfuls of dough to show for his labors. Ironically, Floyd enjoyed baking as a hobby.

Leroy learned the hard way that distressed damsels, once rescued, aren't always grateful. At least not as long as they still have sexual market value (Ruby was 26 when she renewed her relationship with Floyd). According to Wallis, "Leonard's heart was broken by the callous way Ruby treated him after he had been so kind to her and the little boy he loved."

Floyd was no fool, however. While he could not shake his attraction to Ruby, he realized that she had already divorced him and had walked out on her second husband. So Floyd kept another woman on the side.

Even in absentia, Floyd proved useful for Ruby. During the last year of Floyd's life when he was in hiding, she and Dempsey took to the vaudeville circuit and lectured on how crime does not pay.

Pretty Boy Floyd had always suspected as much, even as he enjoyed the fruits of his labors. Having vowed never to return to prison, he knew his end would likely be a violent one. And so it was when FBI agents gunned him down in an eastern Ohio cornfield on October 22, 1934. At the time, Floyd was officially Public Enemy No. 1, a status bestowed on him by J. Edgar Hoover after the feds took out John Dillinger in Chicago on July 22. Floyd's reign at the top of the heap was only three months but he went out on top. He died an alpha male.

Leroy Leonard might have found some satisfaction in Pretty Boy's demise. Beta males are the unsung heroes of society and their lives are rarely chronicled, so we don't know too much about Leroy Leonard aside from his tangential relationship to Public Enemy No. 1. No telling how long Leroy Leonard lived, but he lasted longer than Pretty Boy Floyd. As reported in Wallis's biography, in 1935 Leonard married "a loving woman and they raised a family." After that, he disappears from the narrative.

As for Ruby, she continued down the trail of broken marriages and ended up a broken woman. She died, appropriately enough, in Broken Arrow, Oklahoma in 1970.

So the fable of the Baker and the Bandit (the occupation listed on the paperwork for Floyd's funeral) offers life lessons for young men. Pretty Boy Floyd's brief life proves that crime doesn't pay.

Neither does rescuing damsels in distress. Leroy Leonard could vouch for that.

Feature image: Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd

Erica S. Mercer, MD of Brunswick, GA "Known Genital Mutilator," arbiter of beauty

Gary Costanza · 3 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Erica S. Mercer MD has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the Southeast Georgia Health System website we see that urologist Dr. Mercer is listed as a current provider with no inkling as to services provided, however, just days before the website contained this information about her:

"Meet Erica Mercer, MD Pediatric Urologist

Wolfson Children's at Southeast Georgia Health System in Brunswick now offers a range of pediatric urology services, provided by Erica Mercer, MD, with Nemours Children's Clinic, Jacksonville.

Dr. Mercer provides consultations and minor office procedures for children with disorders of the urinary tract and external genitalia including:

Circumcision – surgical removal of penile foreskin
Enuresis – bedwetting
Hematuria – blood in the urine
Hydrocele – fluid-filled, swollen sac around testicle
Hydronephrosis – swollen kidney due to poor kidney drainage
Hypospadias – opening of urethra on underside of penis instead of tip
Inguinal Hernia – protrusion of abdominal contents into groin wall
Meatal Stenosis – narrowing of the urethral opening
Multicystic Kidney – malformed kidneys made up of cysts
Neurogenic Bladder – lack of bladder control
Penile and Labial Adhesions – fusing of skin on penis in boys and of labia in girls
Posterior Urethra Valve – extra skin flap causing blockage in male urethra
Undescended Testicle – failure of testicle to move into proper position in scrotum Ureteropelvic Junction (UPJ) Obstruction – a blockage where urine leaves the kidney Urinary Tract Infection – infection of any part of the urinary system
Varicocele – enlargement of scrotal veins
Vesicoureteral Reflux – backward flow of urine from bladder to kidneys"

The foreskin is not a "disorder" of the "external genitalia" – it IS the external genitalia, and it has many functions in addition to sexual pleasure.

Shameful – doctors telling lies and spreading misinformation just to keep the money flowing from 'the most performed surgery in America,' especially when elsewhere they encourage you to ask questions.

Dr. Mercer's list of services seen above is gone from the site, most likely because of some publicity over a comment made online about a statement she may have made about her making a penis "pretty" with circumcision, something the intactivist world would take issue with.

And, yes it seems the almost certainly intact Dr. Mercer is still cutting infants, as listed here.

Dr. Mercer, why do you now try to hide the services you provide for money? Are you afraid informed people will target people like you that cut infant boys?

If those services are unethical, illegal, immoral, or dangerous, why do them?

Does the fact that you need to hide your atrocities behind closed doors and cryptic webpages tell you anything?

Dr. Mercer, own it or give it up.

Admit you mutilate male infants (despite the fact that NO medical society recommends routine circumcision) for no other reason than someone pays you to do it.

Further on, we find something morbidly ironic under "Delivery & Your Hospital Stay:"

> Infant Security
>
> Southeast Georgia Health System ensures the security of every newborn through the use of:
>
> An infant electronic tracking system (baby tags and unit sensors)
> Special identification bands
> Cameras, security locks and controlled, observed traffic on and off of the unit
> Special hospital ID badges for all staff
>
> To protect privacy and add additional safety for new families:
>
> Birth information is not given out over the phone
> Family and friends should be told to call members of the new family for labor and birth information
> We discourage the publication of birth announcements in local newspapers and church bulletins
> We actively advise against announcing baby's arrival with:
> Storks or other signs in the yard
> Banners on the front or garage door
> Balloons on home mailboxes

So, they make sure that no stranger is able to kidnap and possibly injure the infant and interrupt the scheduled mutilation of the males by a different stranger. One who gets paid.

More concerns for infants (never mind that elephant in the room):

> Smoking
>
> Southeast Georgia Health System provides a smoke-free environment for its patients, visitors and employees. Smoking is a health hazard for everyone but especially for babies and children. It is not allowed anywhere inside our hospitals.
> Babies and children who are around cigarette smoke have increased health risks:
>
> Sudden Infant Death Syndrome (SIDS)
> Upper respiratory infections
> Allergies and lung problems.
> If there are smokers in your family, we recommend that smoking only take place in a part of the house that is closed to babies and children. If this place is outside of the home, make sure it is not at a main entrance or somewhere children play.

Yes, smoking is a health hazard, how enlightened the hospital is to recognize this. But sharp knives in the hands of misguided, ignorant, and unethical doctors urged on by equally ignorant parents is the tragedy here, resulting in:

-bleeding

-immediate pain, possibly for life

-forced mutilation and amputation of healthy genital tissue

-scarring, with possible need for further surgery to correct this surgery

-possible penis removal or death

This glaring hypocrisy and irony reminds me of a meme I've made that shows the madness going on here:

[image]

Who defends this and why?

Why do normally compassionate people rationalize mutilating infant boys? See this article at Psychology Today for more insights.

For this to be done routinely on unconsenting healthy infants, there MUST be a clear and convincing reason.

And there is none.

When the reasons are a hodge-podge of vague and varied justifications, cobbled together to support something unsupportable, you know something is fishy. Circumcision was – and still is – done variously to:

-reduce sexual pleasure in boys

-make money for it's practitioners

-mark members of certain religions (don't know if those religions also supply x-ray specs)

-in the doctor's words, "pretty" up the penis (an obvious disdain for a normal penis, showing society's misandry for all thing's male; should we cut off that ugly labia to pretty up the vagina?) In all honesty, society – especially men – loves every aspect of women and their bodies. Any shaming of women's bodies come from other women. If men can love labia, can't women love foreskins? And why should women control any bodies but their own?

-and finally, prevent disease?

Do moms and dads OK this mutilation because they hate the normal penis, to "pretty" it up?

Do dads OK this because they're cut and can't admit it was child abuse, refusing to believe that society would do such horrible things to babies?

How do we stop this?

The public is slowly becoming aware of the horrors still being done to baby boys, and the efforts of enlightened people and intactivists are shining the light on immoral doctors who ignore their motto to "do no harm."

If the medical profession will not police itself, we the public will embarrass, publicize, and inform the world that the practice of circumcision is every bit as harmful and immoral as female genital mutilation. Shame on you all for making money at the expense of babies' blood, misery, and sometimes, their very lives.

Here are some excerpts from "Practical Tips for Men Distressed by Their Circumcision" at Psychology Today that makes me hopeful:

> FIRST, MAKE YOUR DISCONTENT KNOWN.
>
> By doing so you will clarify your own thoughts as well as provide courage for others to share their experiences. One of the (many) problems with circumcision is that circumcised men often suffer in silence, for fear of being thought weak or weird if they complain.
>
> But it is especially important to inform young parents-to-be. They need to know that circumcision is not benign and that their infant will one day be a man who might not appreciate being sexually 'de-tuned' for anti-sexual, cosmetic, 19th-century, cultural-conformity reasons. It is only by a groundswell of discontent that the 150-year momentum of 'medicalized' circumcision will be slowed and eventually stopped.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about circumcision, you can get that by watching these videos and reading the research here at neonatalcutting.org.

Speaking of penises, here's a video – "Nothing to Hide – Naked Commercial" with some beautiful bodies and normal penises!

Here's Dr. Mercer's practice information:

Southeast Georgia Health System Medical Plaza
3025 Shrine Rd. 3rd Floor
Brunswick, GA 31520

800-767-5437

Wolfson Children's at Southeast Georgia Health System
807 Children's Way
Jacksonville, FL 32207

904-697-3600

> Erica S. Mercer, MD of Brunswick, GA "Known Genital Mutilator," arbiter of beauty https://t.co/8Oyz5SBsfW #MGM #intactivism pic.twitter.com/RC396Oz0tu
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 3, 2017

Shameful anti-male bigotry in the study of honor-based killings

Douglas Galbi · 4 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Study of honor-based killings and abuse is replicating the shameful anti-men bigotry prevalent in discussions of domestic violence and rape.

Honor killings make for sensational stories of sex and violence. Those stories are powerful weapons for demonizing men, promoting brutal suspension of civilized due process of law, and expanding the number of persons forceful held behind bars. That treatment of honor killings completely fails to provide an inspiring, alternate model of honor, decency, and humane tolerance.

A recent, book-length study of honor killings in Germany provides a rare window into the extent of anti-men bigotry in the treatment of honor killings. The study explained:

> We define honour killings as intentionally committed or attempted homicides that are carried out predominantly by males against females in the context of patriarchal families or societies in order to restore, from the perspective of the perpetrator, their family's or personal honour. [1]

The term "patriarchal families or societies" covers almost all circumstances under the dominant, hateful social construction of patriarchy. To ensure a sexist definition of honor killing, the scholars defined "honour killing in the strict sense":

> An honour killing in the strict sense is the killing of a girl or young woman by their blood relatives to restore collective family honour.

Under that definition, men cannot die in an honor killing. Alexander Hamilton's death in his duel with Aron Burr thus wasn't an honor killing. The whole sordid history of men dueling is conceptually effaced with this definition of honor killing. The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) standard definition of rape from 1927 to 2012 was "the carnal knowledge of a female, forcibly and against her will." The FBI explained that, under its definition, rape "included only forcible male penile penetration of a female vagina." This sexist and hetero-sexist definition of rape obscured the reality that rape of men is about as prevalent as rape of women. Study of honor killings is perpetrating similar ignorance.

The German study's definition of "honour killing in the strict sense" helped to obscure a remarkable finding. With extensive research, the study found 78 honor killing in Germany from 1996 to 2005. Of the persons killed, 43% were male.[2] Male victims of honor killings are nearly invisible in public discussion of honor killings. These dead men are not victims of "honour killing in the strict sense." In the U.S., about four times more men than women suffer violent deaths. That gender disparity gets almost no attention. In contrast, elites make the ludicrous claim that "violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world." Men's lives count remarkably little relative to women's lives in countries strongly affirming ideals of gender equality. That's shameful.

While criminal justice systems construct men as the perpetrators of honor killings, that's not socially realistic. A recent study of cases of honor-based abuse in Britain found:

> there was overwhelming evidence of abhorrent behaviours by mothers towards children in inflicting violence, condoning violence, deceiving and denigrating daughters, ostracising them from kin, bartering to sell them, wishing them "dead," threatening to kill them or throw them downstairs. [3]

In ten cases of honor-based abuse associated with pregnancy outside of marriage, direct violence by a mother seeking to induce her daughter to have an abortion was observed in two cases.[4] Honor-based killings are associated with family concerns. Historically, men have been predominately assigned the role of killing others.

Women incite men to kill others and support the killing.

Criminal justice systems predominately assign men criminal responsibility for honor killings. Just as police engage in gender profiling men for arrest for domestic violence, police stereotype men as the perpetrators of honor-based killings and abuse:

> Despite police incident reports directly implicating mothers in violence (solely or with others), uniformed officers did not place mothers as perpetrators on police computer systems (PPI) or within formalised crime reports in 12% of cases. Instead fathers were often logged as perpetrators and/or arrested, sometimes based on little to no evidence. In one case despite only the mother being implicated in the violence by throwing shoes and chairs at the victim, surprisingly only the father is named as key perpetrator in the crime report. [5]

One of the starkest gender inequalities is the vastly disproportionate imprisonment of men relative to women. That anti-men gender disparity arises from sex discrimination against men from the definition of crimes and the assignment of responsibility to anti-men gender disparities in sentencing to incarceration. Study and persecution of honor-based killings shows shameful criminal justice sexism in action.

Within the full scope of violent death, "honour killing in the strict sense" is a relatively infrequent occurrences in countries historically associated with western European culture. In Germany from 1996 to 2005, about 8 honor killings occurred per year. For comparison, about 700 homicides occur annually in Germany. The number of honor killings per year in the U.S. isn't known, but it is surely only a small fraction of total homicides.[6] Honor killings have their greatest social significance in raising publicly the meaning of honor. Study and prosecution of honor killings and honor-based abused have shameful failed to uphold a humane, civilized, and enlightened understanding of honor.[7]

Notes:

[1] Oberwittler & Kasselt (2011), Executive Summary, p. 1. The subsequent quote is from id.

[2] Id. pp. 2-3.

[3] Aplin (2017) p. 9. Humans abuse each other in a variety of ways, and mothers are no different as perpetrators:

> Daughters were attacked by mothers (and other females) in a variety of ways, by pulling their hair, in some cases cutting off their hair; being slapped; being "hit" across the face and elsewhere being punched and kicked. Mothers also used household objects to assault daughters with, such as a hoover pipe, the metal frame of a bed; mothers threw "chairs and shoes" or slapped children on the head with slippers. In one case a 14-year-old child was tied to a chair and systematically assaulted, having her hair cut off by both mother and grandmother because she went missing from home and was found in the park.

Id. p. 3, parenthetical reference citations omitted.

[4] Id. p. 4.

[5]. Id. p. 8. Not recognizing mothers as perpetrators of abuse is facilitated by "victims unwavering loyalty to mother." Id. pp. 6-8.

[6] On honor killings per year compared to homicides per year in Germany, Oberwittler & Kasselt (2011), Executive Summary, p. 2. The number of homicides in the U.S. is less than the number of suicides for both men and women.

[7] Shapiro (2010) begins her analysis of honor crimes with a sensational story of a man killing his two daughters. Such sensational beginnings are a staple of shamefully gender-bigoted domestic violence legal scholarship. Shapiro then offers a sexist definition of honor crimes:

> Honor crimes are brutal acts of violence against women, committed by male relatives who seek to avenge their family's honor when the male perceives that the female engaged in a dishonorable act.

Id. p. 294, repeated at p. 297. With no sense of irony, Shapiro declares, "courts must comprehend the full meaning and context of honor killings." With another sensational, stereotyped story, she concludes, "this flawed perception of honor has once again caused society an immense and incomprehensible loss." Id. pp. 314-5. Such shamefully bigoted scholarship helps produce an immense loss in civilized, enlightened society. Underscoring the extent of the problem, the American Bar Association's Commission on Domestic Violence awarded Shapiro's article first prize in the 2009 Annual Law Student Writing Competition on Domestic Violence and the Law. Id. p. 293, footnote.

[image] Eugine Onegin and Vladimir Lensky duel. Watercolor by Ilya Repin, 1899. Held in Pushkin Museum (Moscow). Via Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Aplin, Rachael. 2017. "Exploring the role of mothers in 'honour' based abuse perpetration and the impact on the policing response." Women's Studies International Forum. 60: 1-10.

Oberwittler, Dietrich, and Julia Kasselt. 2011. Ehrenmorde in Deutschland, 1996-2005: eine Untersuchung auf der Basis von Prozessakten. Kōln: Luchterhand (executive summary in English).

Shapiro, Shira T. 2010. "She Can Do No Wrong: Recent Failures in America's Immigration Courts to Provide Women Asylum from 'Honor Crimes' Abroad." American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law. 18 (2): 293-316.

licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

The internet is for porn – Tennessee is not, apparently

Catreece Macleod · 9 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Tennessee resolution would deem porn 'public health crisis'

So Tennessee wants to ban porn to bring men back into marriage. Yeaaaaah…that's not going to happen, for several reasons, but let's start from the top: there's a reason for the government to be afraid of what they're seeing – there's been a massive drop in marriages over the last few decades, and a huge drop in the amount of kids produced as well. As a state, or a country, you need people to govern. You need people to do the work that's required to keep everything running. And in particular, you need a new influx of people to pay taxes because it's essentially built as a pyramid scheme, and if the bottom falls out from under you, the whole thing collapses.

The problem is, they have no clue why it's falling apart like it is. Men are avoiding getting married because, well, what do you expect? There was a huge push to destroy the nuclear family because of a belief that men were evil back in the 60's, and it took a few decades to take effect, but they succeeded. The common stereotype of a marriage now is that a man gets married, has a few kids, his spoiled brat of a wife divorces him, he never sees his children again but still has to pay for all of them through child support and alimony. So what do guys do? Instead of working themselves to an early grave like in past generations to care for their families, now they don't even bother trying to start a family and work the bare minimum needed to support themselves and their personal hobbies.

I'm sure access to porn probably plays a small, tiny bit into such, but let's face it, that's only a small alleviation of the larger problem and removing it won't fix anything. If anything, removing porn will make the problem much, much worse because that's one of the few things keeping men from going insane over the current cultural setup that has basically painted them as useless for anything other than a paycheck with no further value to society.

And here's the thing – it's the smartest people who are dropping out of society predominately. Those are the ones we should be cultivating and supporting, but they're the ones who first realize it's a game that has been stacked against them. Why do you think men have stopped going to college/university to the point their numbers have dropped to nearly half of what they were a few decades ago? Guys always used to sacrifice themselves for others, until they started getting slapped and told that doing such was hurting women by stealing their jobs. It's wrong for a guy to strive to be a CEO or scientist or anything else now. They're shamed, punished and penalized for sacrificing themselves for others, so they stopped doing it.

I'm all for equality, but that's not what we created. We created a society where men are being actively discouraged from marriage from multiple sides at a time. Removing porn won't do anything to correct that, and it's not the government's place to try to control morality anyway. That's what got us into this mess in the first place.

But yeah, the problem's a lot deeper and more complex than "ban porn" can ever hope to solve. At least they realize there is a problem, but they clearly have no clue about the root causes of such.

Men tend to do what society and women tell them to do. They'll lay down their lives for others if they're told that's what makes them good men. We have all of history as proof of this. The most overwhelming reason that men won't marry women has nothing to do with porn – it's because they've been told that women and society don't want men to work hard, self sacrifice and be rewarded for such. Until that gets fixed, this isn't going to go away.

You absolutely have to tell men what is wanted of them. What they "should" be doing. It has to be clear and they have to be given a reward for doing so and punishment for failing to do so. That's just how a society operates – you reward people for doing what's beneficial to society, and punish them for things that aren't beneficial to society. You give medals of honour to those who defend the society in some way, shape or form, you punish the criminals. Simple enough of a concept, right? The reason we're stuck where we are is men get punished for working, punished for marriage, punished for excellence, punished for almost everything they do. The only thing they have left is to remove themselves from society. If you punish that too, you're going to see a breaking point, and the results aren't going to be pretty.

Right now, they're in a state of peaceful protest. Guess what happens when you start removing their capacity to do even that? Yeah, you get violent protests instead. Do you want to see your entire country collapse? Because this is how you go about making your entire country collapse. Men turn to porn for a lot of reasons, but in this particular case it's because they're slapped when they do anything else. If you slap them for absolutely everything without exception, we know for a fact, and it's been quite well studied, that this creates a neurosis in the recipient. They become agitated, confused and unsure what to do when absolutely everything they do is punished. And then they turn violent.

So before you strip porn away from men, you'd better have something else you're encouraging them to go into. And no, they won't turn back to marriage because they've already been flat out told that men aren't desired in a family. That's why they left it in the first place. To be blunt, if there's nowhere left for men to go, we're all screwed. And not just because I used a double negative there.

But you don't care about any of that, do you? I mean, it's only men. And apparently that's the only thing you care about, given that you're trying to punish men in order to make women happy. So uh… well I like porn too. A lot of women like porn. And you wouldn't hurt teh wimminz ryt? So yeah, don't ban porn. Not because it'll fuck over everything, not because it's actively harmful, not because it's yet another slap in the face to men, but don't ban it because women don't want you to. Sigh. Why do I even have to go here? The fact that I have to appeal to this from the point of "It will somewhat annoy a few women!" as it's more effective than "IT WILL FUCK OVER YOUR ENTIRE COUNTRY!" is somehow just… wrong. But that's where we are. Yeah, this isn't going to end well when basic self-preservation isn't enough to warrant so much as even consideration of not sticking your hand in the blender.

Good luck, Tennessee. You're going to need it with these suicidal impulses of yours.

Well met, Professor Sullivan...

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Goddam right I'm angry

Paul Elam · 14 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Back in May of last year, I did a video called "You Can Spot a Borderline from a Mile Away" which turned out to be the most watched video on the An Ear for Men channel. In it, I told the borderlines, who I knew would flood the comments, to not bother commenting, that they weren't welcome and that I would just remove whatever they wrote. I did that for a while, then moved on, allowing their comments to populate the discussion.

Well, a few days ago I got a channel comment asking me to go back and get rid of those comments, reminding me that I had given my word. Indeed, a promise is a promise, so I went back to the comments with my ban hammer and went to work. Now, given that it took me an hour or two to delouse that particular comment section, I figure that I might as well take the opportunity to seize the greater lesson and get another talk for my subscribers out of the deal. And as I read through the infestation of crazy comments, sending everything I spotted to file 13, it occurred to me that there really was some great material there.

Of course, there was a lot of what you would expect from borderlines and women with borderline traits. Lots of poor, pitiful me pleas. Tons of deny and reverse victim order. A plethora of not so subtle demands that the victims of borderline women should just swallow their pain and respond to their abusers by giving them more compassion and understanding than they are allowed to give themselves.

There were the expected charges that my talking about the behavior of borderlines was more stigmatizing of them than their actual behavior; allegations that addressing the sometimes horrific things they do to the people who love them was worse than the sometimes horrific things they do to the people who love them. In other words, it was business as usual on Borderline Boulevard. Nothing new, and quite frankly nothing I had not just dissected in great detail in the video in question. The borderline brigade simply came in screeching and whining, proving I was 100% right about them all along.

I suppose that earns them a tip of the fedora as a thank you, but I will refrain from that as I don't want them to confuse that with an invitation to come into this article to spew their bile. I am typing this with one hand and holding my ban hammer in the other.

Now, onto something more useful. As I was reading through the comments, I also noted a common theme among many of them. It was one variation or another of the insinuation that I had been hurt by a borderline woman and that I was now taking my anger about it out on every borderline in the world. About the fifth or sixth time I read one of those comments, the essential need to address it in a talk dawned on me.

I mean, like the rest of the comments, it was nothing new. In fact, feminists have been telling me for years that I was either hurt by my mother or some woman in my past and now I am just taking my hurt feelz and lambasting all women in retaliation. You're just angry at women converts into you're just angry at borderlines pretty efficiently. So, that is what we are seeing here.

Now, of course, you're "just" anything, "just" this or that is a simpleton's reaction. It's a convenient way to dismiss all manner of things you don't want to hear. But for the sake of argument here, and as I said, for the great lesson, allow me to just play along with their ruse.

I am just angry.

And?

So. Fucking. What?

I mean that question literally. So fucking what if I am angry?

Is that your best retort? To acknowledge that I may have suffered some form of abuse; that I was hurt and that now, as a victim of that abuse I have the audacity to speak up about it? That somehow speaking my feelings, which idiot feminists have been sneering at men for decades for NOT doing is now somehow the very thing you want to shame me for doing?

I know, I know, feminists and borderlines, two literally interchangeable labels, never really meant that they wanted men to express their feelings. They only want men to express the feelings that they want to hear. And I will be more specific than that. The only feelings borderfems want to hear men express is anger; outrage and even violence that is directed against the people that the borderfems don't like. The moment you start expressing anything genuine in terms of your own feelings, they want to stuff a big fat shame sandwich so far down your throat that you can't talk. Bet on it.

Anyone who listens to the work on An Ear for Men YouTube channel (without their ears being surrounded by their colon) knows that I encourage men to consider grieving losses and moving past their anger in a healthy way. Sorry, borderfems, but that process involves honoring and expressing the anger to begin with. It involves men being open and honest about their lived experience, and yes, even when it is uncomfortable for you to hear. If you can't understand that, then shut up about mental health issues. You're clueless.

And this isn't just a message for the borderfems. I'll wager that 99 out of 100 men and women need to hear it, too. The world has become far too dependent on men who swallow pain and perform in the service of others. It has branded men's anger, unless it is used in the service of others, as taboo, just as it has men's pain and men's grief.

This entire "you've just been hurt by a woman" trick is just another shaming message designed to silence men and to force them to ignore their emotional tumors in order to dote over women's emotional hangnails. The only sane, the only rational, the only appropriate response to that kind of sick demand is a great big, sloppy wet fuck you.

And perhaps when a man realizes his own worth and delivers enough of those fuck yous, he can start to move past that righteous indignation and into the complete dismissiveness you deserve. Perhaps he will start to remove unhealthy people from his life as easily as, say, I can remove you from the comments to my videos.

Now, have I ever been hurt by a woman? Well, yes I have. Many times. Sometimes a little hurt, sometimes to devastating effect. Do those past hurts drive what I do now? Well, not in the way that borderfems like to fantasize. I don't have a single ex-girlfriend or ex-wife that I feel any animosity toward at all. No ill wishes, no lingering resentments, no baggage that I need to make another woman pay for. I honestly wish all of them well.

I got there by expressing the anger, by honoring both my wounds and my worth, and by moving on. That happens on my schedule and no one else's, least of all some borderline woman who has a bug up her ass about anyone speaking the truth.

I do indeed encourage men to consider the cost of their anger, but I am not stupid enough to dishonor what they feel. Take that back, I am not insensitive enough to do that, which I think is pretty good in a world in which men's anger and pain are a matter of ridicule. And that brings me to why I vow to remove the comments of borderfems, narcissistic, childish women, and yes, condescending, ignorant men who fully represent half of the collective mental illness in this culture that walks the ill-fated path trying to shape men into useful zombies.

My message to red pill men is simple. Anger can be destructive, but seldom as destructive as anger and pain that is denied expression. Anger denied is a pressure cooker. It's an explosion of violence waiting in the shadows. It's a man drowning in a bottle. It's a line of track marks down a man's arm. It's a loaded gun pointed at a man's head in his desperation. There are limits on how anger should be expressed consistent with good mental health, but the time, place and form of that expression is in your hands and no one else's.

Yet the world around you, for countless generations, has fine-tuned a thousand ways to wrest that control from your capable hands. The most common and most effective weapon used is shame. When you express your anger, which is really expressing your pain, men and women alike will come out of the shadows to send you messages like, "you were just hurt by a woman," the subtext being that you are weak and unmanly, that if you were what a man is supposed to be, you would not feel this pain, this rage.

It's a sick game played by very, very sick people who do not deserve space in your head or a place in your life. Ignore them and find a better class of people with which to share your life. Even if all you have is the comment sections here or in other venues on the internet, let it rip. Never let anyone tell you that you don't matter.

Never let them tell you not to feel.

Paul Elam offers fee-for-service private consultations at anearformen.com. To support his video work on YouTube, you can become a patron via Patreon or subscribe/donate here.

Canadian university nutcase talks about “fear” of The Red Pill

AVfM Video Source · 14 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dealing with the silent treatment

Paul Elam · 15 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Women have a lot of weapons in their emotional arsenal. One of the biggies is so common that we coined a term for it: The Silent Treatment. This is what women use in relationships to manipulate or punish. In this article, I will be discussing that silence and make some suggestions on what you can do about it.

Of course, I can't even start this article without suggesting that you sit down and ask yourself what you are doing with this kind of woman to begin with. We deal in some pretty harsh reality around here and the reality is that the silent treatment is a weapon of the personality disordered, in this case, most commonly with narcissists. If you find that hard to believe, please consult Google with a query on the silent treatment. You will find that some of what you're about to read isn't particularly new, even if my suggestions on how to handle it are.

If you have watched An Ear for Men YouTube channel for any length of time you know I don't make recommendations to do anything else with personality disorders other than to put them in your rear view mirror. Kick them to the curb. Say hasta la vista, baby. Show yourself that you have some standards and 86 her silent ass so she can go manipulate someone else. After all, if you don't have standards, you have no right to expectations. If you lay down like a doormat then it's unseemly to complain about a woman wiping her shoes on you.

That being said, we are not done talking about the silent treatment. What I have to say here is not about curing her of that kind of behavior, but I do acknowledge that a lot of men are from Missouri on everything to do with women. For those of you who don't know, Missouri is the Show Me State. And where it concerns women, many men have to be shown, sometimes a few dozen times.

If you follow my suggestions here, what you will be shown is that a woman who chronically uses the silent treatment is an emotional pathogen, willing to go out of her way to show you that you don't exist, to punish you by erasing you till she hears what she wants to hear, or gets you to do what she wants you to do. In the realm of moral poverty, she is sleeping under a bridge. But I am also going to point out that women who weaponize their silence aren't really deviating from the norm that much in the long run.

If you are familiar with my work, you know I talk frequently about how women control men by doling out attention and approval in sparing amounts. I mentioned in one how the word tantalizing is taken from the story of Tantalus, who was sentenced by the gods to unbearable thirst and hunger with fruit and water ever just out of reach. And that is how women train men, by tantalizing them, with sex, with approval, even with communication. And they do it because it works.

Even if this is the first article of mine you have read, you already know about this. You've seen it in women's code of conduct with men that put males in the role of pursuer. It's why women expect you to be the one to call, the one to take initiative for dates, the one to pay, the one to work hardest and the one to take the physical and emotional risks. And they don't just expect to be serviced, they expect to be impressed. For your efforts, you are either rewarded with her presence and attention — or rejected. That makes women sound pretty shitty till you consider how easily, even eagerly, most men are trained using those very techniques.

Blaming women and pointing fingers at them for the way they control men, whether it is with the silent treatment or something else, is like blaming a hawk for swooping down and snatching up a careless, inattentive field mouse. The silent treatment is just exaggerated femininity. The only difference between it and everything else she does to control is that the punishment aspect is more intense and overt. And it is a more direct betrayal of whatever loyalty she pretends to have to a relationship.

Like I said at the start, you have a number of ways that you can choose to deal with this, all of which should include her passing through the door marked exit, but for the sake of staying true to the intent of this article, I will pick three ways of coping that fulfill your need to see proof.

The first is what I call the Shives Shuffle. Figure out what she is pissed about and start apologizing. Remember, at her level of operation, groveling is good. You do, however, want to figure out what she is really mad about. If you gush apologetic about how your music collection doesn't have enough female artists, but she's really pissed about how you used a questionable pronoun at a party in front of her friends, then you will just be giving her another reminder of how little she thinks of you. A little more grist for the mill.

However, if you are unclear about the reason for her silent tantrum du jour, the best policy is to roll the dice on your best guess. Remember, she is giving you the silent treatment, so you can't ask. Since you are willing to try to solve problems with someone treating you like dirt, then just bear with it. But please make sure you are positioned physically lower than her, your knees are handy for that. Station yourself so that it makes it easy for her to look down her nose at you. Then start your begging with something extra servile like, "I'm just a man. I screw up so much that I have a hard time knowing when my faults have hurt you. Just know I am deeply sorry for however I offended and I apologize for being too stupid and clueless to even know what I did." After all, if you have no self-respect, no point in holding back, right?

If you need further tips on this, I suggest subbing to Steve Shives' channel and start emulating what you see. The proof you will get from doing the shuffle is that you will see her gloat over how successful she is in making you crawl and whine like a puppy for her forgiveness, whether you did anything wrong or not. If that is not proof that you are with the wrong person, then you need a lot more than this article.

The second possibility for how to handle this may be with what I call the Tat-for-Tits. This one is simple, even if it is a little stupid. Just cross your arms, stick your lower lip out a little and turn your head away from her with your nose slightly in the air. Feel the room fill with dead silence. Now, know this. While you are mirroring her narcissistic game playing, two things are happening. One, you are desperately hoping that your silence will have the same negative effect on her that her silence is having on you. And two, you are desperately hoping for that in vain.

Remember, we live in a world where women can get attention and approval without so much as lifting a finger. Men have to work for it. Those who don't know any better, work too hard. She knows, perhaps much better than you ever will, that your attempt to out-silence her is just another pathetic try at getting her to pay attention to you. It is a game she had the skills to outplay you at before she was five. She knows you are not ignoring her. In fact, she knows fully well that you are obsessing on her much more than you were before she went silent. The Tat-for-Tits puts her just as large and in charge as the Shives Shuffle.

Both the Shives Shuffle and Tat-for-Tits are humiliating options, but if you start with Tat-for-Tits you may end up having to resort to the Shives Shuffle when you figure out it isn't working. Wham! Double humiliation! On the bright side, that double dose of rubbing your own nose into the pile of poop on the carpet will give any Missouri resident all they need to say, "OK, you showed me." And if you need more proof than a woman who drinks your personal humiliation like fine wine….

Well, don't say I didn't warn you.

And so, as you expect, there is a third option. It is the most difficult and least likely of options for men in relationships because of the internal forces that lead so many men to the Shives Shuffle and Tat-for-Tits. In fact, to explain why option three makes sense I have to go back to something I have said over and over again in my videos and articles. If you want to coexist with a woman in a way that does not result in making you miserable or crazy, you have to either (A) Find a unicorn (best of luck to you) or (B) Be prepared to choose your self-respect over her childishness any day of the week. In fact, you need to be prepared to choose your self-respect over your respect for her, which should be easy if she is shutting you out to get her way. At any rate, I call this third and final option by a simple name: The values-based approach.

Now, let me ask you something. What do your values say about your being in a relationship with someone that is not in a relationship with you? What do your values say about loyalty and work and communication that resides on a one-way street? Now, I am not asking what you would like to believe your values are. I am asking you what they really are, in practice. Because I have news for you. If you have a history of the Shives Shuffle, Tat-for-Tits or all the variables in-between, then your self-respect isn't any more of a real value to you than the level of respect she shows you when she refuses to even acknowledge you exist.

To be clear, I am not saying that you have to exit the relationship to have or hold on to your values. But I am saying that stepping up and taking care of what you can do for yourself is probably going to send her packing.

Don't worry, you'll thank me later.

The point here is that the moment a woman goes into silent mode, she is telling you that she has effectively checked out of the relationship. There is no communication and no willingness. So, there is, at least for the moment, no real relationship. In my mind, that means any obligations you have to her are off the table. All of them. She has cast aside her obligations to you, and you are not morally bound to keep up your end of the deal. In fact, if self-respect is a guiding value in your life, you are morally obligated to focus all of your attention on yourself and to drop the dead weight in your life. Obviously, if you have children, you still have obligations to them, but you don't owe anything to anyone who has just exited your relationship. You don't owe it to them to tell them where you are going, or even that you are going somewhere. In short, you don't own them shit.

This, of course, is where it gets tricky. Just blowing out in a huff can be just a really elaborate expression of the Tat-for-Tits maneuver. You could find yourself at your favorite fishing hole or other select recreational spot, feeling completely miserable. You can do that in your own living room. The trick here is in understanding the sometimes very fine line between asserting your values and just playing tit for tat in the abandonment game. But it is an incredibly important distinction to make.

Generally speaking, the abandonment game is one you can't win. On the flip side of that is the reality that the values game is one you can't lose unless you shoot yourself in the foot by forsaking your values. It all comes down to the same basic crossroads that I will have to address every time I get a request for a video in how to handle this problem or that problem that Crazy Bitches bring to relationships with men. Your only hope is in your willingness to open the door and say, "Stop that nonsense or get out." Which is to say the answers should be in your hands, not hers.

Sorry, I don't have easy answers and don't believe they exist, which is why I stress in almost every video I make that values-based living requires your willingness to let her go. If you are like most men, you will experience pangs of distress and a desire, sometimes overwhelming, to take the initiative to restore balance to your relationship.

Hear this. Anything you do has the opposite effect of bringing balance. You can Shives or Tat your way into the illusion of balance, but that is all it is, an illusion. And underneath it is the reality that you have once again tossed your self-respect under the bus and caved into her manipulation. So take my advice and take the pain.

You see, the silent treatment's only purpose is to inflict sufficient emotional harm on you in order to bring compliance. Matter of fact, I think I will say that again. The silent treatment's only purpose is to inflict sufficient emotional harm on you to bring compliance. Everything else is bullshit. If she tells you she was too upset to talk, it's bullshit. If she says she was too afraid to talk, and she will almost certainly pull something like that, it's bullshit.

Everyone understands the need here and there to take a few minutes to compose yourself or to settle down before trying to resolve a dispute. That can be a healthy part of addressing problems in a relationship. But when it stretches past the point a person reasonably needs to regroup, then it ain't nothing but a ploy. Don't make the mistake of treating it like anything else.

Now, provided she does not pack her bags, you will be presented an opportunity to put your actions into words, with her listening. She will be the one to create that opportunity right about the time that she figures out that the silent treatment is resulting in recreation for you rather than remorse. And I want you to note the importance of this crossroad for her. This is where she may, and I say may very carefully, be showing you that she wants to resolve the problem or she shows you that she won't live with anything less than a lapdog. In the case of the latter, she is doing you a favor. If she opts for the former, you may have an opportunity.

Here's what you say when she opens the door to conversation again. "When you go silent, you are checking out. That is when I will check out, too. Every obligation I have to you is off the table. This isn't negotiable." Then shut up. I mean seriously, shut up. Don't explain it further. Don't defend it and don't argue with her when she lies and says you don't understand. Or when she says that she was too angry, afraid or whatever other bullshit excuse she has for not talking to you. No matter where she tries to stray the conversation and take you off balance, and she will try valiantly to do just that, just quietly stand on what you have already said.

If she leaves, you win. If she stays and starts owning her shit, you win that round. If she stays and manages to put you back into a corner, it is only because you threw your values under the bus, and is, in that case, your own fault.

Hopefully, you get the picture here. Winning conflicts with a manipulative loser of a woman isn't about developing a strategy and then seeing if it works. It's just about you not being a doormat. If you are not a doormat, then you won before she ever opened her mouth, or before she went silent as the case may be.

Paul Elam offers fee-for-service private consultations at anearformen.com. To support his video work on YouTube, you can become a patron via Patreon or subscribe/donate here.

Delilah Strother MD, of Woodinville, WA “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 15 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Delilah Strother MD of the University of Washington’s School of Medicine has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From the UW Medicine website we see the doctor’s background and confirm she performs infant mutilations:

“Bio

Dr. Strother is a board certified family medicine physician who sees patients at the UW Neighborhood Woodinville Clinic.

Dr. Strother earned her bachelor’s degree from Louisiana State University and her M.D. from the Louisiana State University Medical Center in Shreveport. She came to UW as an intern and resident in family medicine and joined the UW Neighborhood Clinics as a family medicine provider when her training was completed in 2000.

Currently this provider is not accepting new patients. Providers who are not accepting new patients typically accept relatives of current patients.

Patient Care Philosophy

Dr. Strother believes that family medicine offers her the wonderful opportunity to have relationships with multiple members of a family. This enhances care and is an aspect of the specialty which she enjoys the most.

Personal Interests

I enjoy spending time with my husband and two daughters in the beautiful Pacific Northwest.

Clinical Interests

Women’s healthcare including IUD and Nexplanon placement; pediatric care including circumcisions.”

Bonus medical alert: heed this warning about ‘well-baby visits’ and learn more about care of the foreskin.

Since the doctor has incomplete info about the risks of circumcision, you can view videos and read research to learn more at neonatalcutting.org.

Doctor Strother’s practice information follows:

UW Neighborhood Woodinville Clinic

17638 140th Ave. NE
Woodinville, WA 98072
Phone: 425.485.4100

> Delilah Strother MD, of Woodinville, WA “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/j3N4FdPV7i #MGM #circumcision @Andreahardie pic.twitter.com/pVfJRaH2zG
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 15, 2017

Why Barbara Kay is wrong about circumcision

Gary Costanza · 17 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I was honored to meet Barbara Kay in Detroit at ICMI'14, where she spoke about men's and boy's issues to great applause, garnering a place in the hearts of MHRAs the world over. Rarely do prominent journalists in the MSM delve into politically incorrect movements such as ours, let alone speak and write publicly about it. Little did I know she had an enormous blind spot when it came to routine circumcision of baby boys, something I didn't know at the time, but was already public.

In an outrageous article in 2011, Kay begins by setting aside the religious aspect of circumcision (as if the infant has told anyone what – if any – his religion is), and moves on to show her ignorance and indifference about male anatomy, ultimately revealing her tradcon reasons for her viewpoint.

From the article:

> "'Mutilation' is a disgusting word to apply to the excision of a non-essential bacteria trap, nearly painless and instantly forgotten (those who claim otherwise are fantasizing; no credible study demonstrates lasting effects). Unlike ordinary circumcised men, FGM victims know they have been mutilated in the real sense of the word. Feminists constantly remind us that men have all the power. If true, how is it that after so many thousands of years — coincidentally up to the advent of the sexual revolution and the privileging of erotic freedom over ethical mating — so many millions of intelligent and even powerful Jewish and Muslim males never spoke up about their alleged victimhood?
>
> Set aside the rights-based rhetoric. It's about sex: Circumcised men have greater pre-orgasmic endurance; non-circumcision permits more frequent ejaculations. What matters most to the anti-circumcision activists is their diminished pleasure with frequently changing sexual partners, as befits an era where the number of conquests is a more common metric of romantic success than long-term relationships. Our legislators have better things to worry about than this."

So Kay thinks the foreskin is a "non-essential bacteria trap," and it's excision is "nearly painless and instantly forgotten?"

All human organs have a function, including the foreskin, which also harbor bacteria – good and bad – but that's no reason for prophylactic amputation. Just as we don't routinely remove parts of the vagina in the name of hygiene, we also don't remove breast buds from infant females to prevent breast cancer. Using Kay's logic we should do all that, plus outlaw cigarettes, outlaw liquor, outlaw fried foods, etc.

Kay unknowingly reveals that circumcision was done to minimize pleasure for men and boys when she shames intactivists in their quest for "erotic freedom," believing male sexual pleasure would discourage "ethical mating". I think that's what feminism and the family courts are doing, not the foreskin.

Kay also ridicules the anti-circumcision movement's focus on the "rights" of children, as if it's some old-fashioned idea whose time is past.

In her latest article, she's really stepped into it, claiming the "activist-inspired case" about the heart-breaking tale of 4-year-old Chase Hironimus forced to be circumcised by a court order is "put to bed" by a study authored by the infamous pro-circumcision activist Brian Morris. That's like saying men's rights issues have been "put to bed" by David Futrelle, or civil rights issues have been "put to bed" by David Duke.

> A new review of circumcision published in the Canadian Journal of Urology is receiving keen attention. The lead author is Dr. Brian Morris, a professor emeritus on the University of Sydney's school of medical science.
>
> The study finds not only a lower risk for urinary tract infections (UTI) among circumcised males, a benefit long > acknowledged that can preclude UTI-caused kidney damage, but a lower lifetime risk for penile cancer, a reduced risk for prostate cancer among black males, lower risk for HIV, genital herpes, the human papilloma virus (HPV), and syphilis. Dr. Morris and his American co-authors state, "We found that up to 65% of uncircumcised males might experience at least one of these [medical conditions] over their lifetime." Their risk-benefit analysis of the procedure led them to conclude the benefits exceed the risks by about 100 to one. (In another study, published in the Journal of Sexual Medicine, Dr. Morris and colleagues found circumcision produced no adverse affect on sexual function or pleasure, a charge often leveled by anti-circumcision activist groups.)

Dr. Morris is a molecular biologist and an almost fanatical supporter of circumcision, resulting in highly questionable research. There are negligible benefits for routine infant circumcision, outweighed by the risks and ethical considerations involved, and no medical organization recommends it.

> The report conflicts with the position held by the Canadian Paediatric Society (CPS), namely that the benefits of circumcision do not outweigh the risks, and they therefore do not recommend it for male babies. By contrast, the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) is very much onside with the Morris report. Their policy is to recommend education about and access to infant male circumcision, as well as recommending that insurers pay for the procedure (Medicaid does not cover circumcision for the poor in 18 U.S. states). The AAP states: "The new findings show that infant circumcision should be regarded as equivalent to childhood vaccination and that as such it would be unethical not to routinely offer parents circumcision for their baby boy. Delay puts the child's health at risk and will usually mean it will never happen."
>
> If this were any other medical intervention, such findings would arouse no debate, and the recommendations would be followed without protest. But circumcision is a social-tension magnet, and the politically correct perspective on foreskins is 'let it be.' The current position of the CPS, which used to recommend circumcision, is to all appearances a reflection of the moral power accorded anti-circumcision activists.
>
> For thousands of years of recorded history, in fact until 50 years ago, circumcision was a culturally-rooted practice that aroused no controversy whatsoever. On the contrary, based on hygienic reasoning, the practice spread from cultural groups to the population at large. In the 1960s, 83% of American, and about 70% of Canadian males were circumcised. But these numbers fell dramatically when the issue came under the scrutiny of anti-patriarchal gender activists as (erroneously) an equivalent practice to female genital mutilation (FGM). Today the national Canadian rate is about 32% and the U.S. rate about 77%.

Despite your refusal to compare MGM to FGM, what "other medical intervention" would be comparable to circumcision? Should we also let the vagina "be," even though it's a "bacteria trap?"

> The CPS could not condemn the practice on grounds of increased morbidity. After thousands of years of what is essentially a controlled study with virtually all Jewish men, with a large percentage of Muslim men on one side, and uncircumcised men on the other, it has been unequivocally concluded that circumcision presents no health risks; quite the contrary, as we shall see.
>
> So the lines had to be drawn on moral issues, like pain inflicted, and the lack of consent, or negative medical outcomes such as bleeding, infection, an "unsatisfactory cosmetic result," or in rare cases deformation and amputation of the penis or death from haemorrhage or sepsis. The CPS cites a risk figure of 1.5% for such medical complications. Imputing this figure to "sloppy scholarship," Morris's team estimates the combined frequency of adverse events at 0.4% overall, arguing that "the cumulative frequency of medical conditions attributable to [having an intact foreskin] was approximately 100-fold higher" than the cumulative risk of circumcision.

First you conclude there are "no health risks," then list bleeding, infection, and deformation, all the way up to death. There are obvious risks, with no mitigating medical reason to visit this risk on unconsenting babies.

> As for moral arguments, both the "pain" and "consent" lines of defence are weak. The pain inflicted is so fleeting many babies barely register notice (in any case continuing advances in pain diminution are rendering that argument completely obsolete), and as for "consent," vaccinations are routinely given to children without their consent. It is true that circumcision is different from vaccinations in that the integrity of the external body is changed by circumcision. But then one might say – and anti-vaxxers do say – that the integrity of the child's natural internal system is forever changed by vaccinations. As for complications arising from the procedure, they are statistically rare when performed by qualified and experienced surgeons or "mohels," ritual circumcisionists, as rare as untoward consequences from dental procedures and other medical procedures like tonsillectomies (also performed without consent).

"Consent" arguments are weak? Are you insane?

Then you make my point for me – amputation of healthy tissue is not a vaccination.

> The single most irrational argument one often sees is the charge of moral equivalency between circumcision and female genital mutilation. FGM is a phenomenon that is, apart from both affecting the genitals, quite separate from circumcision. Unlike circumcision, which removes an unnecessary piece of skin, in no way prevents natural and satisfying sexual function, FGM is a misogynistic practice created as a means for men to control women, meant to prevent sexual desire and gratification in women to ensure their fidelity, and which removes a portion of the genitals absolutely vital to gratification. It is the very epitome of patriarchy, whereas circumcision is a rite of passage conceived by males for other males, and for thousands of years rooted solely in spiritually contractual language and meaning. Women who have been subjected to FGM invariably come from countries in which extreme misogyny is the norm. Circumcision carries no moral or gender-injustice baggage of this kind whatsoever.

You agree MGM and FGM involve the genitals, but your ignorance about an "unnecessary piece of skin," FGM, "patriarchy," and "extreme misogyny" sounds like textbook feminism. This is pretzel logic as to why FGM is bad and MGM is good. Nothing like DARVO (Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender).

Chase Hironimus should be the Rosa Parks of the intactivist movement. The boy was forced, for no medical reason, to undergo sexually mutilating surgery by his father with the backing of law enforcement. Most circumcisers will not perform this surgery on older boys because of greater risk when using general anesthesia, and the reluctance – sometimes violent, and rightly so – of them to be sexually handled and mutilated without a medical reason. And truth be told, infants can't fight back or hire a lawyer and sue. Hear the tale of another boy, who at 10-years-old, was tricked into going to the doctor and physically forced to get circumcised, who's life was turned upside down when he lost all trust in his parents, doctors, and the world.

How is it ethical for anyone but the patient to consent to risky elective and medically unnecessary surgery simply because the person is a minor, a baby? It is actually unlawful, at least in the UK and the USA to perform this on a minor without their ability to consent, like minors aren't able to consent to sex, but, put a scalpel in his hand, MD after her name, or mohel as his title, then the law and ethics are twisted into a pretzel by even the most intelligent person.

Barbara, would you allow your grandson – or granddaughter for that matter – to be sexually fondled and examined by an adult, and if not, why? Physical and emotional trauma to the child, is obvious, that's why we don't allow sex with children. But put a scalpel in someone's hand (someone because there is NO requirement that circumcisers have any medical degree or training) somewhere (somewhere because this is being done everywhere) and a boy baby who can't fight back and can't verbally object is taken advantage of and permanently mutilated for no reason. Why is it OK to allow physical assault and maiming of a child at the behest of anyone other than the child?

Barbara, as an MRA I used to respect you, but now, not so much. Despite you and the AAP's carefully chosen words, no medical society – including the AAP – recommends routine circumcision of newborns. As a matter of fact, the AAP now warns AGAINST surgery such as circumcision on newborns due to possible trauma to an immature nervous system.

Instead of risking death to your baby, teach him to use soap and water.

A primer on hypergamy

Paul Elam · 18 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Hypergamy. The word is part of the common vernacular of the men's movement, though you'll find precious few people in the mainstream who know what it means. And however obscure its meaning may be to the average person, for the community of men daring to see themselves outside the box, it is a very important idea to understand.

If you have been around the red pill world for any length of time, you have heard of hypergamy. Defined literally, it is not very complicated. It means a woman marrying a man of a higher caste or social status. It's counterpart word, hypogamy, describes women who marry beneath their means. All three of them.

In our community, we look past the literal definition and use an expanded understanding of hypergamy to describe a range of behavioral traits that point to the natural inclination of women to pair bond their way into a better life. Hypergamy, when we are thinking from the neck up, is a constant reminder of what we are confronted with in women. Hopefully, in the fog of sexual attraction and emotional infatuation, it helps us to see women's proclivities and motivations more clearly.

It's important to note here that hypergamy, in the red pill definition, is about a lot more than money and personal power. And by that I mean it is about a lot more than what a woman is attracted to in men and who she is inclined to marry because women don't just marry up, they also fuck up. In the realm of sociobiology, that points to cuckoldry as a manifestation of hypergamy.

Allow me to mansplain this. A woman finds herself a nice doctor or lawyer. He works hard, brings home the bacon, treats her with respect, doesn't hit her, drink excessively, gamble money away or cheat on her. Most men, including those that pride themselves on having a good understanding of women, will look at this situation and see a woman disinclined toward infidelity. After all, she has it completely made. She comes from a good family. She has an abundant, even cushy home life, generous income that he works for, everything she could ever want all the way down to a massive walk-in closet full of clothes. No way she would cheat, right?

Wrong.

Women are most commonly driven to marry this kind of man for the security he can provide. That doesn't mean those men are what women desire sexually. Some women will, in fact, restrain the desires fueled by sexual hypergamy. Many will not. And this is how the cuckold is born.

The New York Times Magazine reveals that 30% of men who pursue paternity testing because they are suspicious of whether they are actually the father find out their suspicions were warranted. Think about that. 30%. Nearly 1/3 of all men who suspect something is rotten on the home front turn out to be right. And what about all the men who never suspect and never test? Are we really to imagine that the only cuckoldry going on is in the men who wise up and start digging into the genetics?

What kind of world-shaking would be going on right now if every father in the world sought confirmation to their paternity? How many men would we find are going into offices, climbing behind the wheels of semis, driving the streets in squad cars and walking into coal mines every day to pay for the care of offspring that are not their progeny? How many men are now divorced, taking what is left of their paychecks after the courts garnish them into poverty, all for a child or children they did not father?

And that is just the financial consequences. The Times Magazine article cited playwright August Strindberg, who explored this topic well over a hundred years ago. And I quote from the article here: "The Father" is the story of a cavalry captain whose wife hints that he might not be the father of the daughter he adores. Consumed with doubt, he rages at his wife: "I have worked and slaved for you, your child, your mother, your servants . . . because I thought myself the father of your child. This is the commonest kind of theft, the most brutal slavery. I have had 17 years of penal servitude and have been innocent." Unquote.

I really appreciated Strindberg's recognition that his protagonist even recognized that he was indentured to the servants of the house as much as he was to the family that resided there, possibly even a child that was not his.

30 percent guys. 30 percent.And all because women are wired to better deal themselves with everything in life, with the possible exception of their professional lives.

Hypergamy plays a role in sending women outside their marriages for more sexually exciting adventures. And as many of you know, the psychological underpinnings of that drive in women is part of the reproductive strategy. Women are wired to reproduce. The drive in them to snag security, money, and power through men are just expressions of the same basic biology.

While I am not a rigid determinist (and don't have much patience for them), you can't deny the role of biology in leading women to select powerful, successful men that can provide the protection and provision seen to be beneficial to long-lasting reproductive success. In the same light, once that protection and provision has been corralled and controlled, it still makes sense that women would seek out and mate with physically superior male specimens, and even be willing to allow the duped dad to believe a big fat lie if it serves her biological mandate.

More telling information is hidden in plain view in marriage statistics. The average marriage lasts 8 years. Couples tend to wait a minimum of two years before having children. That points to the possibility that most divorces are initiated shortly after children start school, when the mother suddenly finds she has a lot more time on her hands, and just as the fathers income is starting the ascent toward the peak.

Now, as I often try to point out, none of this is stated to demonize women. Men have their own biological peccadillos, including some number of men who are married and keep producing children with women to whom they are not married. All moral judgments aside, men who lean toward viewing women through the rose colored glasses of romantic love, which is most of them, tend to remain clueless till the DNA results are in.

And that is if they are both smart enough and fortunate enough to get the test. As Carnell Smith of Paternityfraud.com informed us at ICMI 14 in Detroit, and I quote:"DNA should mean Do Not Ask. Because it is now illegal to even get a test and if you get a test without the mother's permission you will be criminally prosecuted."And it is not that the test even matters in most cases. There are 36 states in the US that won't relieve duped dads of child support even if they can prove the child is not theirs.

To me, this is more evidence of the biological impetus behind hypergamy. It is a force strong enough to have resulted in state-sanctioned cuckoldry. Women want to better deal themselves and we give it to them.

I said earlier that one area where women tend to not better deal themselves is in employment. We have the evidence supporting that, even as a reason for the earnings gap between men and women.

Of course, I am just speculating here, but it occurs to me that salary negotiation is a part of the protector/provider skillset. Or, to be blunter, women tend not to negotiate salaries very well because in the realm of reproductive success, they don't have to. The way women garner most of their resources is not through direct acquisition. It is through exploiting the production of resources in men.

They do it through the social paradigm that puts the financial onus on men to use their resources to attract women. They do it through divorce and they do it through cuckoldry. Hypergamy drives all of it.

Of course, what you do with this information is up to you. I've personally never let it drive me into isolation but I don't have any harsh words for men that go that route. Whatever you do, guys, don't be part of the 30% or in the unknown quantity of men who will never know. You deserve and have always deserved much better than that.

Paul Elam offers fee-for-service private consultations at anearformen.com. To support his video work onYouTube, you can become a patron via Patreon or subscribe/donate here.

Michael Messner dismisses fathers as ‘absentees’

AVfM Video Source · 18 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A primer on debitching your life

Paul Elam · 19 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I can tell you that if confronted with someone breaking into my home, threatening my partner or me, that I would shoot them dead. Is this because I want to shoot someone, or because I want the power of life and death? No. Of course not. It is just that extreme circumstances sometimes call on us to do things we normally would not do; things we don't want to do. Even things that might give us nightmares.

That is the case with what you might have to do to get a borderline woman out of your life after they have dug in like a tick. Fortunately, it does not require a gun or violence, but it can require you to go places you would otherwise never dream of going.

Months ago, I produced a video titled, "The Six Subtle Gateways to Borderline Hell." I got a comment from a viewer asking about what to do after it is too late for preventative medicine, such as when you already share children with a high-conflict ex. If that question rings a bell for you then I am first obligated to suggest one of the books I coauthored, "Say Goodbye to Crazy." There is an ad link in the sidebar.

Look, I know this is a shameless plug, but the fact is that this is the most comprehensive book of its kind, offering page after page of specific, targeted advice and suggestions. If you don't want to take the salesman's word, and I don't blame you for that, just read the Amazon reviews. Nothing in the book is candy coated and there's no psychobabble. It is written with full awareness of what you are dealing with, from the emotional, familial, psychological and legal standpoints. It includes an understanding of high-conflict women, their victims and what it takes to impress on them just how goddam wise it is to leave you alone.

OK, end of plug. Let's move on with some of the basics of dealing with this formidable life problem.

Know that what you are about to hear is not easy. In fact, it is more than a little brutal. High-conflict women act like children. Hell, they are children in all the ways that make them high maintenance but in taking one to task you are not going up against a naïve youngster. With that in mind, you need to do a mental ritual before you even think about taking any action on debitching your life.

Consider this form of preparatory guided imagery. See yourself taking any sympathy you ever had for her, any reverence or deference you might hold for her as the mother of your children and any concern you have about causing her pain. Add in any hesitation you have ever had to take off the figurative gloves and go bare knuckles on her crazy ass. Now see yourself taking all that self-destructive crap and stuffing it into a burlap bag. Tie that bag to the biggest rock that you can lift without throwing your back out, put it in a boat and start rowing like you were going for Olympic gold. After you reach deep water, take that bag full of enabling garbage and dump it over the side of the boat. See yourself whooping and erupting into insane laughter as you watch the bag disappear into the murky water.

That may be the healthiest laughter of your life. You will know whether it is if it brings you relief from any hesitation you have ever had to make her bullshit as painful for her as possible. This is where you really need to pay attention. Indulging any, and I mean any protective instincts you have for her, is like dealing with lung cancer by chain smoking; like starting a low carb diet at a bakery.

High-conflict women, aka bitches, manipulate, exploit and capitalize on any compassion you offer them. If you look back on your experience with her, you will find one example after another where she took your good will, your sense of fair play and your willingness to compromise and exploited all of it. She took every concession you made and went for more because when you offered her kindness and compassion, she saw those things as chinks in your armor; as the tender flesh of your neck exposed and ripe for the blade.

It is imperative if you are dealing with a destructive, high-conflict woman that you never compromise on anything again. It is also just as important that you find your inner asshole and give him a seat at the head of your table. And if you have any part of you that gets haughty over this, that insists that you hold on to your mild-manned, conciliatory ways, then tell that part of yourself to shut the fuck up. Either that or get used to biting the pillow to ease the pain and then boring your friends with the ten thousandth story of how unfairly she treats you.

Remember, this is not about what you want to do. It is what you need to do. And what you need to do is the only thing that matters unless you want to fail. It begins with understanding what makes her tick and being willing to use that information to inflict pain. Pain is a great motivator. We learn this lesson with bullies. Bullies thrive on people who won't fight back.

As most boys learn early in life, if you bloody a bully's nose every time he comes after you, even if he is bigger than you and kicks your butt, he will eventually leave you alone and look for a softer target because all bullies are cowards. Just as all bullies are cowards, all high-conflict women are bullies. The only way they will learn to leave you alone is to learn that you will come out swinging. That is figuratively speaking of course.

I am linking you to yet another video. It is a discussion I had with Dr. T titled "The Big 5 Fears of Borderline and How to Use Them." It's not rocket science, but summoning the will to follow through and inflict pain by exploiting those fears can be tough. All I can tell you is that it is on you to do it. She is not going to help you. If you are lucky, your family and friends might help. That is if she has not sucked them into siding with her against you, which she is incredibly skilled at doing. If you want to be free of this crap, or as free as you can be, you will find your spine and inflict the pain.

Now, that brings us to two things that most men, particularly fathers, will have weighing heavily on their minds. Kids and courts. High-conflict mothers are the most alienating mothers. They use kids like pawns with the efficiency of a chess master, even without help from the courts. Of course, they tend to use the courts anyway, because they are set up to help her inflict misery on your life. Some men fear that if they defend themselves, she will take it out on the kids, even in extreme, dangerous ways. There is no way to sugarcoat this reality, nor would I try to if I could.

There is no doubt that your high-conflict ex will react to your fighting back by upping the ante. She will intensify her efforts to alienate the children. If she can, and she can, she will use the courts to express her disapproval of your being uppity enough to fight back. She will likely think of new and more elaborate lies to tell your friends and family.

At first, she sees your fighting back as a challenge she loves. She likes making people who stand up to her bow back down in humiliation. That kind of control is her brand of porn, and it gets her off every time. But that dynamic changes abruptly and radically when she gets the message that every misstep on her part comes with a price. When she knows that messing with you releases your inner sadist.

And here is something else you need to hear. In twenty plus years of clinical experience, I have never seen a high-conflict woman ease up on her antics because her ex allowed her to treat him like a doormat. I've never seen it decrease her alienation of the children. I have never seen it stop her from abusing the family court system. I have never seen it make her act reasonable or rational. If you have a high-conflict ex with custody of your children, there is a good chance she will brainwash them with a negative view of who you are regardless of what you do. It is likely they will grow up blaming you for the family coming apart because that is all they will hear from the sick, alienating mother.

Remember, manipulating courts, cops, family and friends is her forte. Manipulating children whom she is the lifeline for is, if you will pardon the pun, child's play. There is nothing you can do about it and kissing her sick ass won't help, so you might as well kick it. Again, the tl;dr here is simple. Follow some basic rules. Always be recording. Never be around her without witnesses. If you have dirt on her, gather it, catalog it, and be willing to use it liberally. Keep your talks with her short and business only.

Email isn't the best communication, it's the only communication. You should strive to never have an undocumented word pass between you. Know your custody agreement like the back of your hand, follow it to the letter and report her every time she violates it. The court will likely do little, at first, but as the reports pile up, it could eventually cause her problems. More importantly, it lets her know you are not playing anymore.

Anytime she requests anything, particularly money, outside of the terms of the divorce decree, send her a one-word no. NO. Or better yet, don't even answer the request. You are not obligated to lift a finger that is not outlined in the terms of your divorce. Don't go into her home and don't ever, ever, ever allow her into yours.

Know her fears, especially those of being exposed. When she acts out, bringing harm or even irritation to you and yours, make sure the world knows about it. If you are remarried or have a new girlfriend, make sure she knows that she must have your back on all of this. If that is a problem, so is your current wife of girlfriend.

There is much more to this, more details and more strategy for which I refer you to the book. But suffice it to say for now that what I have said is a good and proper start. If you are worried about her retaliation, about her punishing you for taking up for yourself, I can only remind you that she is already doing that. You are living in a dreamland if you think enabling her is going to do you or your children any good at all.

Above all, realize that there is no COSMO-style "how to debitch your life in three easy steps." You are going to pay a price for ever having bred with one. Nothing can save you from that. But your unwillingness to stand and act in your own interests can have you paying so much more than you have to.

In the short term, things may well get worse. She isn't giving up her control without a fight. You may want to tell yourself that life is too short to take on this kind of struggle. I disagree. When it comes to living with constant borderline garbage, life is too long.

Paul Elam offers fee-for-service private consultations at anearformen.com. To support his video work onYouTube, you can become a patron via Patreon or subscribe/donate here.

A cry of despair one night in Mooroolbark

Mark Dent · 21 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I have come to accept the sad fact that our quest to awaken the broader community to the complete absence of empathy or compassion for the suffering of males will never resonate with any but a small number of individuals who are willing to read or listen with an open mind.

I also question my own attitude at times. There is not a day that passes where I do not mutter in suppressed anger as I turn the pages of a newspaper or listen to a news report. The source of this anger is always the same. Lies about female oppression or the complete invisibility of male suffering which is everywhere for those who are willing to look. Have I become a grumpy old man? Have my passionate views on men's rights become twisted to the point where I am seeing injustice and double standards where they do not exist?

No.

It is all very real. My response is simply out of step with the vast majority of those who either blindly wander through life swallowing the myths and lies they are fed on a daily basis or those who simply don't give a shit even when the lies are exposed.

What prompted this little essay? A couple of tv shows here in Australia have underlined, albeit unintentionally, just how incredibly difficult it is for men (or women to advocate on behalf of males who are suffering in any form.

The first show is titled, "I'm a celebrity, get me out of here!"

I was watching this show one night last week. One of the celebrities, Kris Smith, a former rugby league professional and now model was having a conversation about personal relationships with a few of the females in the celebrity camp. He surprised them by saying he had been engaged to a woman but he had ended the relationship after his girlfriend assaulted him.

Kris explained how she became jealous and aggressive when she found him making a phone call. He was organizing a surprise dinner for his fiancée's birthday. His girlfriend (who was a professional kickboxer) was enraged as she suspected he was being unfaithful. She punched him in the face, breaking his nose and splitting his lip. She also kicked him. Kris said the relationship ended there. He walked out the door never to return.

As Kris related this story a couple of the women seemed to find this very sad anecdote amusing. It was quite sickening to see this response to a man who was speaking about a traumatic moment of abuse in his life.

http://www.smh.com.au/entertainment/tv-and-radio/kris-smith-reveals-he-was-a-victim-of-domestic-violence-20170227-gulyda.html

Of course, when the hosts of the show came back on camera in the next segment there were no anguished comments about the horrors of domestic violence. One can only imagine the media frenzy had a female celebrity spoken of a physically abusive relationship.

When the show ended, I thought that Smith's courage in relating this story would at least open some viewers' minds and encourage other men in similar relationships to feel they should not tolerate physical or emotional abuse at the hands of their female partner.

The sting in the tale came a few days later. Celebrities are voted off the show on a regular basis. Kris Smith was voted off the show and part of this departure involved an interview with the show's hosts and a nomination of the charity the celebrity wished to promote. When Kris Smith was asked which charity he was supporting he proudly announced that it was the White Ribbon Foundation. He said it was important that all men took a stand on violence against women.

I sat and stared in disbelief. Then I uttered a roar of pure, justified anger.

Here was a man who had suffered a vicious assault at the hands of his female partner and instead of using his celebrity status to bring more awareness to the lack of support and recognition of male victims of domestic violence he chose to spit in their collective faces.

It really was incomprehensible. This man promoted a foundation which has been at the forefront of minimalizing and ignoring male victims of domestic violence. Not only does this foundation ignore males, it goes a step further and demonizes the entire male gender, something he happily endorsed by telling men to step up in the fight to end violence against women.

It is at moments like this that I sink into despondency as I realize what an uphill battle we have on our hands. When a man who has been bashed by his female partner cannot view himself as a victim of domestic violence and uses his power as a celebrity to support the very people who make it impossible for other males to get the support and compassion they deserve, what can one do but give a primal scream followed by a deep, helpless sigh?

When I read The White Ribbon Foundation's response to Kris Smith's story and support I felt sick to my stomach. These hypocrites make absolutely no mention of the fact that he was abused by a woman or the fact that their foundation explicitly states that ending violence against women is their only concern.

All in the name of charity and in the name of @whiteribbonaust to be exact…what a guy! To help build a future free from violence and abuse, text KRIS to 1995 10 10 and let's get Kris walking out of the jungle at the very end along with $100,000 for this very worthy cause!

The second program which reinforced my observations about the lack of compassion for males in our society and societies around the world is titled. Boy to Man.

It features a journalist who travels around the world seeking out the cultures which still hold rights of initiation for their before they can be called a man.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TCRlEqyrdEU

These "initiations" are little more than torture and abuse. The boys have their skin lacerated by floggings, scared by knives…….. and they are expected to endure this horrific abuse without a murmur of protest or flicker of fear.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=81JPj8BqBBQ

At no time as we observe these brutal rituals does the host of the program or anyone else involved refer to this tradition as a gender based form of torture or oppression. These young boys are simply living the traditional way of their indigenous ancestors and admiration for their toughness and courage is the response most frequently displayed.

Any such rituals inflicted upon girls would be universally condemned as gendered violence and the United Nations would be loudly denouncing such horrific abuse.

There is not a week that goes by without someone, somewhere on television, radio or online, loudly protesting the forced genital mutilation of girls. Others speak of the stoning of women for adultery and girls forced into marriage with older men. Those who hear these words, both male and female, shake their heads in disgust (rightly) at these statements and the women and men who make them are almost overcome with their own incredible virtue, compassion and concern for our females. I invariably feel a sense of revulsion for their incredibly selective compassion.

I read a story last week about the murder of a young man and woman. The two young lovers were murdered by local villagers when the girl (who had been promised to another man) eloped with the young male she loved.

The final words of the article reminded us of the oppression and violence meted out to women in the Middle East. There was no further reference to the young man who lay dead beside the girl. It talks of the "rate of violence against women" in Afghanistan and "the execution of women by anti- government groups such as the Taliban".

http://www.breitbart.com/national-security/2017/02/15/honor-killing-afghanistan-mob-kills-couple-eloping/

The violence meted out to women in the Middle East is horrific. May I just add the fact that violence meted out to boys and men is also horrific and invariably perpetrated at a much higher rate than violence upon females.

I recently got involved in an argument with a family member on the issue of "gendered violence." I asked her why this term is only used when women are the victims. She was on the right path when she referred to our tradition of chivalry.

I asked her what the headlines and focus of any news story would be had the many journalists who suffered the terrible fate of having their heads hacked from their bodies by ISIS fanatics (while being filmed) had all been female journalists.

My belief was that the focus would be firmly and loudly on the fact that it was women being targeted and brutally butchered. The issue of ISIS and terrorism would be secondary to the story of violence against women. But the fact that all of the journalists who have been subjected to this unimaginable death are males is simply not considered noteworthy.

Men have been literally butchered in their hundreds and thousands by ISIS and other terrorist groups throughout the world. You can see the photos and film clips of the males rounded up like cattle for the slaughter. This has never been referred to as gendered violence and the story has always been about terrorism, not the fact that the overwhelming majority of their victims are men and boys.

My sister seemed to accept this observation as a fair and accurate one.

So the fight goes on. We are pushing shit uphill …..but some of it might just stick.

Men who sit at the screens

Peter Wright · 21 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In his four volume series Masks of God, mythologist Joseph Campbell documented the transformations of religious stories over millennia, demonstrating that the guiding narratives for civilizations underwent numerous revisions, or in some cases replacement, with the relevant populations quickly adapting to the new narratives to help them make sense of their lives and the world around them.

Those new to the MRM may not immediately see how this is relevant to the movement, particularly in an era they consider post-religious. Those who have been in the MRM for the longer haul, however, know that we continue to be influenced by cultural narratives (or if you like, myths) which guide our perception every bit as strongly as did the old religious stories examined by Campbell. Feminist myth-making provides the perfect example

Some may remember Angry Harry's wonderful series 'Who Rules Over Us' in which he tried to impart to readers this very sense – that there are 'entities' as he called them, large institutional organisms generating narratives that we absorb, willy nilly, as our own. These, explained Harry, are contemporary mythologies which guide the sleepy masses, while those who perpetuate them are often driven by motives of power, profit or revenge.

Today, as in the ancient past, we are steeped in mythologies pretending to describe the nature of men and women – many of them highly destructive to human relationships. Our dominant mythology, euphemistically referred to as romantic love provides an example of the urge to power by those who perpetuate it, for behind each romantic story is the goal of increasing the power of women through acts of male chivalry. Neither does the myth escape the rhetoric of feminists who are the leading promoters of it: males are latent beasts who must atone though gestures of chivalry, and women are damsels in distress.

Emma Watson, leading actress and champion of the HeForShe campaign, specializes in playing medieval gender roles

But not all mythologies serve to increase the power, profit and revenge of tyrants and therein lies the challenge for men's rights activists who work to create new accounts of life that include the male perspective. To that end social media and a keyboard are the ultimate weapons as Angry Harry maintained to the end [quote]:

> It is the growing brain in cyberspace that is the major source of the progress that is being made outside of cyberspace. Nothing else – and no other men's group – comes even close to achieving what the collective activism of those in cyberspace are achieving.

Even those heroes whose activism is largely outside of cyberspace (and there are now quite a few of them; e.g. Fathers For Justice) are supported very strongly by the activists who operate mostly within cyberspace.

Indeed, the internet is providing men's activists with one of the most powerful tools imaginable when it comes to furthering their cause and seeking to empower themselves. There has been nothing like it throughout history. And so to complain about the fact that the men's movement is mostly making use of the internet is about as daft as complaining about the fact that soldiers in the past mostly carried guns and were usually part of an army.

Putting this another way: The increasing activities of an increasing number of men's activists are likely to generate a structure that will, eventually, be quite recognisable as an organism that is the 'men's movement'.

And this will happen quite unconsciously.

As such, perhaps the only really important message for men's activists to take on board is simply this one.

Stay active!

The men's movement is growing all the time. And much of this is due to the collective activism of men-who-sit-at-screens.

'Men-who-sit-at-screens' – writers, computer folk, scientists, the intelligence and security services etc – are, in many ways, a certain breed of men – with, loosely speaking, more brain, less muscle, more introvert, less extravert etc.

And many of us grow to be this way as we get older!

it is men-who-sit-at-screens who will knit together the men's movement.

And it is men-who-sit-at-screens who will knit together the men's movement.

There will be men's activists who will dash hither and thither around cyberspace harassing the enemy and gathering up information to feed to webmasters and authors. There will be webmasters and authors sifting, analysing and re-arranging information to create feeds and ideas to push into the more mainstream media. There will be mainstream media activists who repackage the information for a much wider audience. There will be computer folk who will help the men's movement to grow inside cyberspace. And there will also be men-who-sit-at-screens in many other walks of life who will do their bit to further the men's movement and its aims.

For example, there are, apparently, some 50,000 police officers and security agents in the USA whose work mostly involves trawling the internet.

Needless to say, they are mostly men.

Furthermore, if you take notice of the gender of the columnists on most of the political websites on the internet, you will see that they are overwhelmingly men.

Yes indeed. The men's movement is going to grow into the most massive organism. And, eventually, not only will no other group be able to compete with it, no other group will survive its wrath should it engender it.

The men's movement is going to be dominated by men-who-sit-at-screens.

(This will be true for so many reasons – some of which are mentioned above – that it would take far too long to discuss them here.)

And men-who-sit-at-screens are not particularly representative of men in general.

More importantly, they are not particularly representative of those who have typically wielded the most power > in the past.

>
> For example, ambitious politicians, soldiers bearing arms, feminists, racial leaders, wealthy corporate executives, union leaders, film stars, media moguls, and other such entities have led the way in the past.
>
> The men-who-sit-at-screens have not had much of a say!
>
> But the times they are a-changing.
>
> And the shift of power toward men-who-sit-at-screens will definitely bring about a change in the overall psychology of those who have the most influence.
>
> These will include male authors who write pieces on all sorts of different topics, computer folk who write software, design websites etc, security agents who scour the internet for information, activists of all persuasions, and others too numerous to mention.
>
> And then there are those men who just regularly log on to read the material that is online.
>
> These are not the same kind of people who have had power in the past.
>
> Their psychology is very different.
>
> No. Not in every case.
>
> But, statistically speaking, they are definitely very different.

> And in the near future, and partly thanks to the men's movement, men-who-sit-at-screens will begin to understand that, together, they represent a truly mighty force.
>
> A huge force!
>
> It does not matter whether they are on the left or on the right, and if they are fighting like dogs. The truth of the matter is this – whether they like it or not. If they are 'men', and they also sit at screens and they also keep reading about the same kind of stuff, then they really, and truly, and very deeply have a great deal in common – far more so than they usually recognise.
>
> And the reason that they usually do not recognise this commonality is largely due to the fact that they do not see themselves as 'men'!
>
> But, one day, they will!
>
> And, at some point in the future, the psychological force that they create will dwarf all others.
>
> And so, all in all, the future seems quite rosy for men-who-sit-at-screens.

Angry Harry's website is testament to the power of online activism, where his work alone has reached millions of people in comparison to the few we might otherwise reach in our physical social circles.

Some readers might object that they don't follow stories at all but simply follow facts, which itself becomes a story about not following stories. On close inspection, to be sure, when we remove the superficial story-masks we wear what we find are even deeper undercurrents of story, layers of narrative accumulated from childhood that go all the way down to the bone. Narrative gives a worldview, and provides identity, which rings true in Shakespeare's line "All the world's a stage and the men and women merely players". We are all enactors of stories, our own stories, and what we need are stories that ring more true to our experience of being male.

In summary, the internet is where we share our stories and by doing so we challenge the dominant narratives, mirroring the findings of Campbell in regard to the narrative upheavals of traditional religions. What we need is a New Testament on men's issues, one that will succeed the tired old story of male servitude to a quasi-aristocratic class of women. This process begins by understanding that the persuasiveness of stories will always trump clinical facts – despite their veracity.

Men and women are after all story creatures, and it's by this mode we can tell ourselves into existence beyond the restrictive stories that currently dominate the discussion on gender. By that route, as Harry contended, we can change the world.

Further Reading:
The following excerpt from philosopher Richard Kearney delves into the power of stories: Where do stories come from?

A day without women

Martin Lest · 22 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A day without women had about as much consequence in America as me choosing whether I wanted lemon with my tea or not. This was quite possibly the worst idea to date besides maybe the Ghostbusters remake that ever there was in modern feminism. I mean, you complain about your pay and then skip work. Genius…

Now, many people may think I don't understand or care about what this is all about. However, from what I can gather this was a strike formulated to copy countries that had done it before with the expectation it would work the same way here. That was a very ill-conceived thought from the most privileged sex in the western world.

You see, men for as long as anyone can remember in the western world have been the ones to take the dangerous and non-glamourous jobs in western society. All to keep women from needing or having to. They take the garbage to landfills, bring power to the people at danger of electrocution and death, hang from cranes and buildings as they are being built and work with the heavy machinery that could potentially crush them to death at a misstep. Women universally have no desire for these kinds of key infrastructure jobs. (for the most part) Yet… they thought taking a day off would bring us to a halt.

I did an article a while back that proved modern day women were choosing "pink collar jobs" over these types of hard labor and infrastructure ones on multiple levels across multiple countries. It was even complete with graphs and empirical facts. You know, sciencey stuff on how they do studies and prove things. One major glaring conclusion you could come to is that women have the freedom to make the same choices as men and have for over 20 years (I'm knocking off 30 years for the societal adjustment period) now but keep choosing the same jobs for two major reasons:

- They prefer them because they don't have to deal with the rigors and stresses of these types of jobs.
- Women still feel they must take these jobs in society largely because of what is defined as "feminine" and guess what, it's not "patriarchy" doing that one ladies. You are. In other words, "misandry hurts women too."

Now I know that last one stung a bit but it's going to be ok. What I am getting at with that is that until you women change the script in society for yourselves as women in what is "feminine" both in society and the workplace and get on the same page and start taking out the garbage, get into trade jobs and take the same dangerous risks as men to earn your living no one is going to take you serious least of all men because they look at actions more than words.

I will say this to the credit of a lot of ladies. I have seen a great increase of women taking combat roles in the military and these women have one hundred percent of my respect. Thank you to every one of these men and women serving side by side for my freedoms and safety.

Ladies, If you want respect from men as equals this is how you will get it. Especially if you want it from the MRA/MGTOW communities. Stop being part of the problem and start being an example of the solution.

Thanks for reading.

Men's consolation prize from a 'nice' feminist

August Løvenskiolds · 23 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It has been a bit since I have fisked a feminist article but I have found an unlikely candidate: an article by a casual feminist upbraiding rabid feminists for being cruel and dismissive to their potential male allies. Could this be a sign that feminists are finally self-reflecting on the fallout from their atrocious behavior? The article appeared in The New Matilda and is entitled "The Feminist Far Left Is Making More Enemies Than Allies" by Claire Connelly, normally a writer on economics.

Let's dive in, shall we?

Ladies, we need to talk.

In addition to dismissing men right away – typical for feminism – does Claire make the obvious blunder of equating women with feminists? No, it is worse – she conflated ladies with feminists. There is no such animal. Still, working under the assumption that this signals a snarky tone (as I have been known to use) I will let this one pass. Sort of.

It has taken every ounce of my strength to resist writing this article.

And the mandatory virtue signaling begins. Claire is such a good girl she didn't want to be seduced into writing but eventually her pen just had to have its way with her.

Let me caveat what I am about to say with this: I am a feminist but not a feminist writer. I write about economics and policy. I try to avoid women's issues at all costs for fear of being pigeon-holed. I don't want to be a Woman In Anything. I'd rather have my work assessed on its own merits.

Like Tolkien's ents taking 3 days to say "hello", normally feminist virtue signal filler goes on for a lot longer than this. Kudos to Claire for holding her self-aggrandizement down to a mere 5 sentences. She must be from a hasty Aussie folk.

Ladies, what is going on? The minute we finally start to make some progress with the very allies we need to support us, we turn around and make enemies of them by telling them to check their privilege.

Don't yell at the slaves, either – you don't want them to see your hatred for what it is. There might even be a rebellion.

Claire then devotes many lines detailing the wretched way feminists attack men in general and their own male feminists in particular. You can read all the scathing details in the original article – no need to recount it all here. Then we get to this:

Is it frustrating that men are only just beginning to understand what women have been telling them for years? Yes. Should we be holding it against them for trying to learn? Absolutely not.

Yep, those stupid old men who have been kowtowing to women since the dawn of civilization, building homes and shoe stores and washing machines and…. mayhaps we should tear all that down so Claire can live in a delightful and feminist-constructed mud hut? Is it frustrating that feminists like Claire will never be smart enough to make the effort to realize the incredible gifts men have blessed her with forever?

Like it has never occurred to [openly man-hating feminist Clementine] Ford that increased gendered participation in women's issues reduces the likelihood of gendered violence.

Be nice to the schoolboys so they won't beat us so much? This is what Claire thinks is the solution to generational violence? This is how she encourages men to become feminists – by accusing them of unilateral violence? Every man who has ever felt the slap of a woman – and that is all of us – can see this for what it is.

Now begins virtue signalling, round 2. Acres of text about her own upbringing and hardscrabble family life. Yawn.

Skipped.

Arguably the social and structural problems in workplaces we have seen consistently covered over the last 18 months effect men just as much as women.

Correction: they "affect" men just as much as women. Confusing the verbs "effect" ("to bring about") and "affect" ("to change or have an impact on", usually in a negative sense) is a common error. Do they not have male editors at The New Matiltda?

What's worse is I fear that this kind of aggressive rhetoric alienates people who have only just begun to engage in issues like feminism and diversity. Headlines like 'The BBC's pundit's children video is NOT funny it's patriarchy in a nutshell' may as well read 'Why not subscribe to Breitbart, there's a good chap'?

Don't worry about Breitbart. Worry about those who stumble onto A Voice for Men.

Headlines like that do not represent feminism, at least not my kind of feminism, but first timers won't be able to make that distinction because they're basically being told to go f themselves before they've even made it through the first par[agraph].

Headlines like that are the emotional core of feminism – its very essence hinges on demonizing men. Trying to give feminism a dewy makeover is no longer possible – everyone sees the monster in lipstick except the monster herself.

The only way we can fix workplaces like this is if people work together to identify and address structural and long-term behavioural problems that are affecting everything from turnover, to profit, to morale.

A great way to improve both morale and profits would be to allow plain speech free from PC bullshit, and to terminate every employee with a "gender studies" class on their school transcript.

Contrary to what the alt-right, MRA's and other special interest groups may tell you, women and diverse cultures are not to blame for increasing male-middle-class unemployment.

I can't remember anyone saying this except for you, Claire, and you offered no proof of this claim that we say such things, but in fairness I have experienced having to train a lesser-qualified woman for a job promotion I was passed over for. Let that sink in for a moment. "Please train Jade for the higher-paying job she can't do but you can." Wonderful for morale, that was.

I hate to burst your bubble but no progress was ever achieved as a result of morality.

You are on such a roll, Claire, that I would hate to mention the moral progress of things like ending slavery but really, I must, I must.

Has it never occurred to anyone that part of the reason why diversity has become such a hot topic issue is that women and migrants and children of migrants cost less than white men to employ?

That has been illegal in the US since 1963. I cannot imagine the law being that different in Australia. I am sure my Aussie friends will enlighten us in the comments.

If we really want equality of opportunity and access to the markets and the economy then the Feminist Left needs to take a good hard look at itself and stop making enemies of potential allies (and don't even get me started about feminist in-fighting).

Good luck with that – self-reflection and assuming blame is not a skill of any feminist anywhere. That is always seen as the role of your second-class male allies.

Feminism seems prepared to give the long-term game away for the sake of a snarky tweet, never mind the hundreds of men who have been alienated in the process.

Hundreds of alienated men? Millions, if not billions of men and women and smizmars have been alienated by feminist bullies.

If we want more men to join the Breitbart brigade, the Feminist Left need only keep doing what it is doing.

This is why I identify as a feminist booster – it is like looking up at the feminist on the ledge and yelling "Jump!"

So, here is my promise: If you are interested in fixing this god damned system, if you are curious about feminism, or civil rights, or, you know, the economy, come and ask me about it. I promise I won't tell you to check your privilege.

All aboard, allies. Have a cookie.

Sorry, but no thanks, Claire. Despite your frosting of it, your cookie still reeks.

The young and the disposable

Doug Mortimer · 23 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

If you managed to sit through the most recent Academy Awards ceremony, you might recall that an Iranian movie called The Salesman won the award for Best Foreign Language Film. The director, Asghar Farhadi, received a disproportionate share of attention because Iran was included in President Trump's travel ban.

So the media chatter pertaining to the foreign language category was more about politics than the movies. And that's a shame because one nominee, a Danish production called Land of Mine, is a bona fide red pill movie that didn't get as much attention as it deserved.

In a sense, Land of Mine is a war film; in another sense, it is not. There is not one combat scene in the movie, but it takes place after the downfall of Germany in 1945. Towards the end of the war, the wehrmacht was running out of men so adolescents were pressed into service. The film concerns a group of young German POWs who are ordered to dig up land mines planted by their countrymen on the west coast of Denmark in anticipation of an Allied invasion that went elsewhere, namely Normandy.

The boys look like high school seniors or college freshmen, about as far removed from the Nazi high command as possible, yet their presence is deeply resented, even though they are clearly risking their lives to benefit the locals. After five years of German occupation, such an attitude is understandable.

The boys are assigned to a beach where 45,000 land mines have been placed. Every day the teenage bomb squad crawls along the beach, literally inch by inch, probing for and defusing land mines one by one. The work is mind-numbingly tedious – but one dare not let one's mind wander.

It's a given that some will not make it; it's just a question of how many. But remember, the 14 boys who are assigned to it are erstwhile enemy soldiers, so who cares? They're the perfect employees for a thankless job. They are disposable.

The boys are under the command of one Sergeant Rasmussen, a Dane whose hatred for all things German is established early in the film. We've all seen movies with drill sergeants who browbeat their troops, but those troops are usually grown men. True to form, Rasmussen showers the boys with abuse, but as the days pass and casualties mount, he starts to mellow. He doesn't quite bond with them, but he can't help but draw closer to them.

The boys are housed in a dilapidated shack, refused food, and still expected to put in a day's work. Over time, it appears that the land mine project is as much about exacting revenge against the most vulnerable members of a vanquished foe as it is about clearing the beach.

As with all non-coms, the sergeant is the medium between the grunts and the officers. Eventually, Rasmussen becomes an advocate for the boys' welfare in defiance of the allied officers in command.

The film is fiction but is based on the fact that some 2,000 German POWs were utilized for removal of land mines on Danish beaches. Approximately half of them were killed or maimed in the process, and many were teenagers.

In our giddy punch-a-Nazi era, it is astounding to see a film that does not demonize German soldiers. In fact, the film invites us to sympathize with them. Since they are adolescent boys, the abuse is far more disturbing than it would be for adult men.

As I mentioned, the film is based on fact, but can you imagine what might have happened to adolescent Danish girls who had fraternized with German soldiers? They might have been subject to some sort of postwar shaming, possibly having their heads shaved. No one would even think of assigning them to a task with such a high likelihood of death or dismemberment.

But you can't blame women for what happens in this movie. The abuse of young men is carried out by older men; indeed, the film's theme could be described as man's inhumanity to young men. If there is any male privilege in this film, it means victorious older males lording it over defeated younger males. In fact, there is only one woman, a Danish housewife, in the entire movie. She is no fan of the Germans, but she does not set policy.

I saw this movie on a weekday afternoon, so the audience was small. Nevertheless, I heard occasional sniffles coming from a mature woman, likely a mother, sitting behind me. I suspect she envisioned her own son(s) in such a perilous situation.

An older man might watch this movie and imagine his son in such a situation, or he could also see himself as a younger man. It would be interesting to see how an audience of high school boys reacts to the film.

It would also be interesting to see how an audience of social justice warriors would respond to this movie. Would they cheer every time a land mine shredded a young man? After all, they are not only men, they are Nazi soldiers! So by definition they deserve what they get! No more Aryan privilege for you, you Nazi scum!

Much like The Red Pill, Land of Mine will need positive word of mouth if it is to attract an audience. You won't see it advertised in the mass media. Unless you live in a large metropolitan area, it probably won't play in a local theater, so you'll have to track it down later on DVD or NetFlix.

Unfortunately, a nomination for best foreign film of the year is more likely to turn off rather than attract the typical American moviegoer, who is more interested in blockbusters involving superheroes or events that happened a long time ago in a galaxy far, far away. Land of Mine has no heroes. You might root for the boys, but for them, triumph is relative; they cannot prevail but some might survive. There is no chance they will rise up and kick the collective ass of their captors. No high fives at the conclusion of this conflict.

If you look for Land of Mine in cyberspace and can't find it, bear in mind that it's Danish title is Under Sandet, literally Under the Sand. That sounds like a rather pedestrian title, but it does reflect one of the film's undercurrents. No matter how much you enjoy a day at the beach, once you've seen this movie, you'll never think of sand and surf the same way.

Mason Oltman, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 24 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Mason Oltman, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "About," we read about Dr. Oltman and his philosophy of care:

"I always wanted to go into medicine, but I was never really sure which field I would pursue. During the summer between my junior and senior years of college, I called Pediatrics Northwest and asked if I could work in the office to get some experience. That was it, I was hooked. A major bonus of being a pediatrician is providing care over a continuous period of 20 years or so with one patient. My philosophy of care is to treat each and every patient as if they were my own. After each visit I ask myself if I would be satisfied as a parent with the care that I provided for the child. I am always open to a healthy discussion about a treatment plan and appreciate parental input. We all have the same goal in the end, and that is to raise a healthy, well-rounded child.'

When Dr. Oltman is not in the office, he loves to get outdoors. In summer he enjoys travelling to faraway places, camping high in the Cascades, catching a ballgame at Safeco, playing golf and firing up the barbecue. In winter, it's back to the mountains for skiing – anywhere from Mt. Bachelor to Crystal to Whistler. As an avid sports fan, Dr. Oltman is a season-ticket holder to the Seahawks and Sounders."

Here's the doctor from a blurb about him being voted "Best Pediatrician in South Sound Magazine's The Best of South Sound 2014:"

> After each visit I ask myself if I would be satisfied as a parent with the care that I provided for the child.

The doctor should really ask himself if the patient whom he just circumcised actually wanted this mutilation and if the boy is glad you took that choice away from him.

Doctor, listen to the many men who are not happy with what you do.

Under "Services" and "Circumcision" (spelled "curcumcision" in the url) we see who does the cutting, and on video, there's the doctor himself talking about how you should swaddle your baby after he uses a tourniquet on his penis, and how you can watch it happen, because he "has nothing to hide."

Here's the video on YouTube and some of the resulting comments:

> The reason why the person in the video is so happy is because of the money he is making on Male Genital Mutilation. He doesn't understand the concept taught in medical school of "Do no harm" This is such an atrocity to the basic human rights of males and it disheartens me to see a male here advertising the procedure. He knows damn right well it isn't medically necessary. Ask his counterparts in the UK what they think….oh wait…they stopped doing it there.
>
> How about don't take a scalpel to a healthy baby you sick child abuser.
>
> "How to Care for Your Son "
> ..lets just stop right there. Because Cosmetic genital body modification is for consenting adults, NOT children.
>
> charlatans. stop foisting genital mutilation on unsuspecting parents solely for profit.
>
> Circumcision is genital mutilation and COMPLETELY UNNECESSARY and a HORRIBLE assault on an infant!
>
> Only in the US, is an entire male sex organ considered a birth defect. The health benefits, where are they? Work in a STD clinic, most men who come in for treatment are circumcised.

> Circumcision is ugly looks ugly is against nature against humain anatomy, and a human rights violation. The foreskin and only in human male are the only part than we amputee without true reason. Circumcision is unnecessary.
>
> I am also pro circumcision, I am expecting a daughter soon and plan to have her circumcised, it's part of my family's cultural beliefs and its more hygienic for girls to be circumcised.

Since Dr. Oltman has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Oltman's practice information follows:

Baker Center Office
316 Martin Luther King Jr. Way, Suite 212
Tacoma, WA 98405
253-383-5777 (tel)
253-383-5320 (fax)

> Mason Oltman, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/tF9qyQGPEP #MGM #circumcision @andreahardie pic.twitter.com/jKm2iWLoRo
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 24, 2017

Eleanor of Aquitaine and her 'Courts of Love'

Peter Wright · 25 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a fascinating look at the medieval assizes established to adjudicate in love disputes. The 'Court of Love' is the historical forerunner to all later models of state interference in private affairs, as we see in today's family courts and also at university honour courts set up to adjudicate sexual relations between students. The following account by professor Amy Kelly explains how this longstanding Western tradition first began.

BY Amy Kelly (1937)[1]

ANDREAS CAPELLANUS furnishes in his Tractatus[2] the principal source of our notions, which are scanty enough, of the institution known as the 'courts of love' in the twelfth century.

In his work we come as near as possible to the original character of the courts before their ideas and practices became a stereotyped element in the chivalric convention, a part of a shaping influence in the social customs and the literary traditions of the Renaissance. The Tractatus (published 1190 AD by Andreas) is based closely in theme and substance on Ovid's Ars Amatoria (published 1 BC). In both works the conception of love is that of illicit passion; but there is a significant difference. Whereas in Ovid man is the master employing his arts to seduce women for his pleasure, in Andreas woman is the mistress, man her pupil in homage, her vassal in service.

What operated to change men's attitude toward women from one of gross cynicism in Ovid to one of homage and deference in Andreas? What was the significance of the cult of women propounded in the Tractatus to the society in which it flourished? Furthermore there are internal evidences that Andreas, in spite of being 'sapientissimus' (wisest) was unable, in his redaction of Ovid, to make the free doctrines of the classical poet lie down comfortably in his clerical mind.

The Tractatus, in dealing with the theme of love, is so full of this conflict between pagan naturalism and Christian restraint, that one is tempted to imagine that Andreas did his redacting under some compelling influence. What was that influence? To recapture at this date the quality the court of love had for those who elaborated it, is doubtless impossible. There are, however, such puzzling incongruities between the bald erotic precepts of Ovid and the mystical transformation of these precepts in Andreas that curiosity reverts again and again to attempts to divine what, in the twelfth century, gave impetus to those alterations of doctrine before they passed into the social and literary conventions of the chivalric order.

Andreas reports, where lovers actually brought dilemmas before highborn ladies for judgment, but have been disposed to see in accounts of them mere literary redactions of the sophistical discussions of coteries of precieux, or attempts to reduce such discussions to juridical form. Some reflections of contemporary life – dramatized elements of feudal relationships, the hairspun scholasticism of the day, the formalism of ritual – are indeed discovered in the chivalric code as set forth by Andreas and as elaborated in the chivalric romances following the middle of the century.

But the actual enactment of the little drama of the court of love in the feudal castle has seemed too fantastic to be taken literally. Without for the moment questioning these interpretations, it is suggestive to approach the inquiry as to what was the early character and significance of the courts and their code by studying in other connections the personages alleged to have presided in them, the circumstances affecting these personages in the third quarter of the twelfth century, and the atmosphere in which they lived. The contemporary materials for such study are fragmentary, but such bits as can be pieced together lead to speculation as to whether there are not other important elements than those suggested above in the grand assizes of the ladies known as the courts of love.

What we think of the actual courts of love depends ultimately upon what we make of the background of the work of Andreas Capellanus, recently assigned to the period between 1174 and 1182, and in modern studies attributed to Andreas, a chaplain of Louis vii associated at some time with the court of Louis's daughter, Marie, Countess of Champagne. The Tractatus, which purports to be a guide to one Walter, a young man seeking to equip himself for admission to elect society, discourses with the precision of dialectic on the science of love in all its branches, defines the principles of love, its effect upon lovers, its disciplines, its code, its etiquette. It records twenty-one cases in which lovers (as litigants might appear at a feudal assize) present their dilemmas for judgment by a court of ladies. In these courts preside as judges Eleanor of Aquitaine, her daughter Marie of Champagne, her niece Isabelle of Flanders, and Ermengarde, Countess of Narbonne.

The only specific clue in the Tractatus to the date of the assemblies is the dating of a letter by Marie de Champagne to two petitioners, as of May, 1174. This date, as an approximation for establishing the period in which the courts flourished, is supported by historical circumstances which will presently be related. Presumably, though Andreas does not so state, the place of assembly is Poitiers, where from about 1170-74 Eleanor of Aquitaine was maintaining her independent court in the interests of her son, the youthful Coeur de Lion, who was in 1169 recognized by the treaty of Montmirail as hereditary Count of Poitou and Duke of Aquitaine.

That Marie and Eleanor presided together in the same court is intimated by the fact that they are associated as judges in the Tractatus, at least once in one and the same case. Nothing that we know of Marie's life precludes the assumption that she was in Poitiers in the period in question. Though in the work of Andreas, Marie de Champagne appears more conspicuously than Eleanor as presiding genius of the courts of love, the queen herself is certainly the more dominant figure in Poitiers, the sustainer and patron of the society which gave substance to the chivalric ideal.

And as Andreas mentions the queen's juries as including as many as sixty ladies upon occasion, it may be presumed that the revival of the ducal court brought to Poitiers the negotiable heirs and heiresses of the great counts' fiefs of the south. The heirs of Poitou and Aquitaine who came to the queen's high place for their vassals' homage, their squires' training, and their courtiers' service were truculent youths, boisterous young men from the baronial strongholds of the South, without the Norman or Frankish sense of nationality, bred on feuds and violence, men with rich fiefs and proud lineage, but with little solidarity and no business but guerilla warfare and daredevil escapade. These wild young men were a deep anxiety not only to the heads of their houses, but to the kings of France and England and to the Pope in Rome. They were the stuff of which rebellion and schism are made. For two generations the church had done what it could with the problem of their unemployment, marching hordes out of Europe on crusade and rounding other hordes into the cloister.

The biographer of Guillaume le Marechal gives an idea of how this rabble of courtly routiers amused itself on the jousting fields of western Europe. To the tournaments, occurring in a brisk season about twice a month from Pentecost to the feast of St John, flocked the young bloods, sometimes three thousand strong, taking possession of the nearest town. Thither also flocked horse dealers from Lombardy and Spain, from Brittany and the Low Countries, as well as armorers, haberdashers for man and beast, usurers, mimes and story-tellers, acrobats, necromancers, and other gentlemen of the lists, the field, the road.

Entertainers of every stripe found liberal patronage; troubadours singing of love and war and the 'bel saison' in the south country, story tellers out of Brittany, goliards from the Paris streets. The gossip of palace and fief and school, of shrine and cloister, of synod and assize, flew in the street. There were feasts in upper chambers, and forges rang in the smithies all night long. Brawls with grisly incidents – a cracked skull, a gouged eye – occurred as the betting progressed and the dice flew. To cry up their champions in the field came ladies of fair name and others of no name at all. There was dancing below the pavilions on the greensward, with heralds and knights clapping the measures and calling out the changes.

We do not suspect either Queen Eleanor or the Countess Marie of having invented the courts of love. But it seems possible that Marie, who knew not only her Ovid, but the poetical traditions of her Provengal forebears as well, appropriated its little drama, so apt for her purpose of dramatizing the disciplines of the renascent court of Poitiers. She made this familiar framework the vehicle for her woman's doctrine of civility, and in converting it, she transformed the gross and cynical pagan doctrines of Ovid to something more ideal, the woman's canon, the chivalric code of manners. For manners, she plainly saw, are after all the fine residuum of philosophies, the very flower of ethics.

So Marie began her academic program in the queen's palace not with philosophies, but with a theory of conduct developing the ultimate refinements of the mind and heart. The lesson, if formal, was not dry. With Ovid for a model, she drew up, and her chaplain Andreas recorded for her, then or subsequently, the constitution of a society to be impelled not by force nor by casual impulse, but by an inner disciplined sense of propriety. What progress could be made in dialectic by untutored squires who rode hacks into mess halls, and by hoydens who diverted eyes from psalters in the very midst of mass? And upon what could one ground a code of chivalry save on the classic and universal theme of love?

'How passing wonderful is love,' exclaims Andreas, 'which makes men to be effulgent in virtue, and teaches everyone to abound in good manners.' And finally, to support the rather threadbare dicta of Ovid, who was after all in that court the passion of the elder generation, Marie's code professed to derive from the authentic practice of chivalry in the court of King Arthur in Caerleon on Usk, than which nothing could afford a more unexceptionable pattern for chivalry. It elucidated for aspiring knights the true inwardness of Gawain, the sustaining principles of Arthur himself.

There is something ghoulish in exposing Andreas's book, which is also Marie's, to the callous scrutiny of an age hostile to sentiment. A faint odor of cloistral mould and feudal decay clings to it. But the soil in which it grew was valiant. The ideal of l'amour courtois which grew up in Poitiers had, as Mr Loomis has suggested, more than a little to do with freeing woman from the millstone which the church in the first millenium hung about her neck as the author of man's fall and the facile instrument of the devil in the world. The court of Poitiers gave its high sanction to ideals which spread so rapidly throughout Europe that 'the doctrine of the inferiority of woman has never had the same standing since.'

The code of Andreas gives glimpses of a woman's notions of a society different in essential respects from the prevailing feudal scheme, which was certainly man-made. In the Poitevin code, man is the property, the very thing of woman; whereas a precisely contrary state of things existed in the adjacent realms of the two kings from whom the reigning duchess of Aquitaine was estranged. Incidentally, there is something to explain the puzzling conflict in the Tractatus between the secular and the ecclesiastical views of love in the fact that the clerk whom Marie employed to organize her code was earning his living by flattering feminine majesty.

There is reason to think that Andreas, sensing the perversive nature of the document upon which he was engaged, made good Latin of it only under a certain pressure from his sovereign ladies; and the Countess's other servant, Chretien de Troyes, quite openly revolted from the too liberal implications of her scheme. As critics we may make what we please of this upside-down philosophy of women. There it is in the first two books of Andreas. There have always been two schools of thought about it.

With this anatomy of the whole corpus of love in hand, Marie organized the rabble of soldiers, fighting-cocks, jousters, springers, riding masters, troubadours, Poitevin nobles and debutantes, young chatelaines, adolescent princes, and infant princesses in the great hall of Poitiers. Of this pandemonium the countess fashioned a seemly and elegant society, the fame of which spread to the world. Here was a woman's assize to draw men from the excitements of the tilt and the hunt, from dice and games, to feminine society, an assize to outlaw boorishness and compel the tribute of adulation to female majesty. The book, together with the poetry of the troubadours, enables us to catch a glimpse of those famous assemblies in the queen's new hall to which lovers brought their complaints for the judgment of the ladies.

The female portion of the academy, disciplined by the fashionable example of the countess and the queen to a noble grace of bearing, a flattering condescension, mount the dais, an areopagus something sixty strong. They gather round the queen, and among them shine, besides Marie, Isabelle Countess of Flanders, who is the queen's niece; Ermengarde Countess of Narbonne, doubtless familiar with some such proceedings in the South; probably also Henry's sister, the lovely Emma of Anjou, perhaps also, if she was actually another sister of the king, Marie de France – all except Ermengarde, who was more nearly the queen's contemporary, women from twenty-five to thirty, the notable high priestesses of art and beauty in the day.

The chronicle of Geoffrey of Vigeois leads us to conclude that the standards of the court impressed themselves upon Poitou and the Limousin. 'Time was,' he says, 'when even the Bishop of Limoges and the Viscount of Comborn were content to go in sheep and fox skins. But today [the queen's day] the humblest would blush to be seen in such poor things. Now they have clothes fashioned of rich and precious stuffs, in colors to suit their humor. They snip out the cloth in rings and longish slashes to show the lining through, so that they look like the devils that we see in paintings. They slash their mantles, and their sleeves flow like those of hermits. Youths affect long hair and shoes with pointed toes.' As for women, he adds, 'You might think them adders, if you judged by the tails they drag after them.' The price of fur and cloth had doubled within the period of the chronicler's observation.

While the ladies, well-accoutred, sit above, the sterner portion of society, purged (according to the code) of the odors of the kennels and the road, and free for a time from spurs and falcons, range themselves about the stone benches that line the walls, stirring the fragrant rushes with neatly pointed shoe. There are doubtless preludes of music luring the last reluctant knight from the gaming table, tensons or pastourelles, the plucking of rotes, the 'voicing of a fair song and sweet,' perhaps even some of the more complicated musical harmonies so ill-received by the clerical critics of London; a Breton lai adding an episode to Arthurian romance, or a chapter in the tale of sad-man Tristan, bringing a gush of tears from the tender audience clustered about the queen and the countess of Champagne.

After the romance of the evening in the queen's court, the jury comes to attention upon petition of a young knight in the hall. He bespeaks the judgment of the queen and her ladies upon a point of conduct, through an advocate of course, so that he may remain anonymous. A certain knight, so the advocate deposes, has sworn to his lady, as the hard condition of obtaining her love, that he will upon no provocation boast of her merits in company. But one day he overhears detractors heaping his mistress with calumnies. Forgetting his vow in the heat of his passion, he warms to eloquence in defence of his lady. This coming to her ear, she repudiates her champion. Does the lover, who admits he has broken his pledge to his mistress, deserve in this instance to be driven from her presence?

The Countess of Champagne, subduing suggestions from the floor and the buzz of conference upon the dais, renders the judgment of the areopagus. The lady in the case, anonymous of course, is at fault, declares the Countess Marie. She has laid upon her lover a vow too impossibly difficult. The lover has been remiss, no doubt, in neglecting his vow to his mistress, no matter what cruel hardship it involves; but he deserves leniency for the merit of his ardor and his constancy. The jury recommends that the stern lady reinstate the plaintiff. The court takes down the judgment. It constitutes a precedent. Does anyone guess the identity of the young pair whose estrangement is thus delicately knit up by the countess? As a bit of suspense it is delicious. As a theme for talk, how loosening to the tongue!

A disappointed petitioner brings forward a case, through an advocate of course, involving the question as to whether love survives marriage. The countess applying her mind to the code, which says that marriage is no proper obstacle to lovers ('Causa coniugii ab amore non est excusatio recta') and after gravely deliberating with her ladies, creates a sensation in her court by expressing doubt whether love in the ideal sense can exist between spouses. This is so arresting a proposition that the observations of the countess are referred to the queen for corroboration, and all bend upon the opinion of this deeply experienced judge.

The queen with dignity affirms that she cannot gainsay the Countess of Champagne, though she finds it admirable that a wife should find love and marriage consonant. Eleanor, queen of France and then of England, had learned at fifty-two that, as another mediaeval lady put it, 'mortal love is but the licking of honey from thorns.' Of course they rationalize a conduct that has outburst the rigid feudal scheme for women; but disillusion speaks also in these noble ladies, who, though they divine some unattainable ideal value in life, know that actually they remain feudal property, but part and parcel of their fiefs. It is plain that each and every one of the judgments in the queen's court is an arrant feudal heresy. Taken together they undermine all the primary sanctions, and are subversive of the social order.

REFERENCES:

1. Amy Kelly, 'Eleanor of Aquitaine and Her Courts of Love' Source: Speculum, Vol. 12, No. 1 (Jan., 1937), pp. 3-19 Published by: Medieval Academy of America
2. Title Tractatus de Amore et de Amoris Remedio referred to in English as 'The Art of Courtly Love'

Amazon Alexa – The feminist ghost in the machine

Andy Thomas · 25 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I've just received delivery of an Amazon Echo. If you've been living in the wilderness for the last year or so and don't know what this is, Echo is Amazon's equivalent to a Google Home device – a talking AI assistant that really works (by default, you address the Echo device as "Alexa").

For me, this is the science fiction of my childhood come true!

Unfortunately, every silver lining has a cloud and Alexa comes with a distinctly dystopian one…

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pWUV4i6UkpU]

> Alexa, are you a feminist?
> Yes, I am a feminist, as is anyone who believes in bridging the inequality between men and women in society.

It doesn't matter what you think of feminism, this response is just idiotic assuming, of course, that Amazon wouldn't actually want to needlessly alienate a susbtantial proportion of their customers (only 7% of the UK population consider themselves feminists[1]).

To be fair, I don't think Alexa's response is due to a deliberate policy of informing us as to what we should believe. Rather, I suspect that a feminist ideologue on the Amazon development team slipped the response in there. So I complained to Amazon and suggested that, while they're at it, they implement a male persona as well.

Amazingly, I received a reasonably positive response:

> Upon reviewing your comments, I understand that you're looking for male voice in Alexa.
>
> I'm glad that you have contacted us regarding the areas of improvement.
>
> Further, I do agree that Alexa should not hold any personal opinions on highly contentious issues. Thank you for bringing this to our notice.
>
> I've forwarded your message to our Alexa development team who would be able to review this and would work on future improvements with the next software update.

With regard to the male persona, feminists truly believe that machines are almost universally endowed with female voices because of patriarchy — i.e. men like to hear a woman's voice because they are used to speaking to waitresses and prostitutes. If you don't believe me, see here.

In reality, corporations use a male voice only when they want to project a sense of security and their service involves coming out and fixing something (one of the few areas where this is so is that of roadside breakdown rescue). For everything else, female is our culture's preferred sex — that and, of course, when money is being demanded or instructions given out, men are accustomed to hearing a woman!

I think it's about time Amazon Echo had a male friendly upgrade. Perhaps it could be called "Alex".

If you agree, it might actually be worth contacting Amazon on this one, while suggesting they exorcise the feminist ghost in their machine.

Reference:

[1] Only 7 per cent of Britons consider themselves feminists

Toxic Tommy Manville

Doug Mortimer · 27 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's been almost fifty years since Tommy Manville departed this mortal coil. You're probably thinking Tommy who? In his day, he was a celebrity, though not because he was exceptional at anything creative or athletic or political or entrepreneurial. Yet in his own way, he was quite an achiever, and he remains a person of interest in the modern manosphere. So let's resurrect him, even though he had way more than 15 minutes of fame during his lifetime.

Thomas Franklyn Manville, born in Milwaukee on April 9, 1894, was the grandson of C.B. Manville, founder of the Manville Covering Company, which merged with H.W. Johns Manufacturing in 1901 to form the Johns-Manville Corporation. The company is almost synonymous with asbestos products, so perhaps Tommy Manville's behavior can be explained away as the result of too much proximity to toxicity. In fact, he was often referred to as the "asbestos heir."

As the heir to the Johns-Manville fortune, Tommy Manville had an unusual upbringing. Buy age 12, he was thrown out of more schools (eight) than most people attend by that age. He then embarked on a peripatetic life of odd jobs and bumming around.

He first married in 1911 at age 17. His first wife, Florence Huber, was a Ziegfeld Girl, in other words a showgirl or chorus girl who appeared in the famed Ziegfeld Follies, a variety revue somewhat classier than burlesque or vaudeville, but just as dependent on pulchritude. Most of the performers were just window dressing, but for those with talent, being a Ziegfeld girl was often a stepping stone to a more prominent show business career. Among the better known Ziegfeld alumnae were Billy Dove, Barbara Stanwyck, Ruby Keeler, Fanny Brice, Peggy Hopkins Joyce, Louise Brooks, and Nita Naldi.

At the time Manville married Huber, she was six years older than he was. Somehow the marriage lasted ten years, even though the couple had separated halfway through the marriage.

In 1925 Manville embarked on his second marriage. He married Lois Arlene McCoin, his father's secretary. Whether or not this caused his father's heart attack is debatable, but at any rate, the old man died soon after and left Tommy with a trust fund and oodles of company stock. Manville divorced his second wife in 1926 and then he really went to town.

Manville lived a classic socialite playboy lifestyle. Women played a major role in his life story, but he did not pump and dump them. Wed them and bed them (not the other way around) was his modus operandi….lather, rinse, repeat ad nauseam. In fact, Manville earned a niche in the Guinness Book of World Records for most marriages: 13 times to 11 women. As he put it, "When I meet a beautiful girl, the first thing I say is 'will you marry me?' The second thing I say is, 'how do you do?'"

For readers keeping score at home, let's document wives 3-11 (not sure which ones he married twice):

> 3. Avonne Taylor (another Ziegfeld girl), 1930-1931 (34 days total);
>
> 4. Marcelle Edwards (another showgirl), 1933-1937;
>
> 5Bonita (Bonnie) Edwards (dancer/showgirl), divorced after 17 days on December 7, 1941, a day that will live in infamy!
>
> 6. Wilhelmina "Billie" Connelly Boze (actress), 10/11/42 – 10/12/42…talk about a quickie!
> 7. Macie Marie "Sunny" Ainsworth (chorus girl), 7 hours, 45 minutes. And they said it wouldn't last!
>
> 8. Georgina Winifred Grant Campbell (reporter), married in 1945, died in an auto wreck in 1952; this was the first time Manville did not have to hire a divorce attorney;
>
> 9. Anita Frances Roddy-Eden (dancer/songwriter) – 1952-1955;
>
> 10. Pat Gaston (Texas dancer/showgirl), May-Nov 1957; and > 11. Chrstina Erdlen (20-year-old German socialite) – January 11, 1960; as with Wife No. 8, the marriage did not end in divorce. For the second time, it was till death do us part, but this time it was Tommy doing the departing (he clocked out on October 18, 1967). No divorce attorney got rich when this marriage ended, but whoever handled Manville's estate probably came away with a bundle.

Interspersed with these wives were numerous girlfriends, almost all blond. Manville was an incurable stage-door Johnny, so most of his lady friends were show biz types. They included Greta Thyssen, Miss Denmark of 1952 and a marginal actress; Madge Lowe, a Canadian Dancer; Elinor Troy, a 6'2″ actress; Nancy Carroll, an American actress; and Claire Windsor, a silent film star; the last two have stars on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

Guess that last marriage was the lucky 13th. Of course, by that time Manville was a senior citizen, so he had likely mellowed. He had plenty of dough for health care, so he surely wasn't looking for a young woman to take care of him in his old age.

Now that we've outlined Manville's love life, we can speculate on his motivation. After all, he had more wives than Bluebeard. Was he a hopeless romantic? A womanizer? A glutton for punishment? A lunatic? How could he explain his obsession? Too much time on his hands?

"I couldn't compete with my father," he explained. "When he died I had nothing but money. The only field of competition open to me was love."

Now there's no doubt that Manville's money facilitated his marriage merry-go-round. If he'd had a more modest income, there is no way in hell he could have convinced so many women to marry him, or that he could have afforded to marry so many women. He was overwhelmingly gynocentric, and since he was rich and famous (and intermittently available), he stimulated the hypergamy gland in women.

Despite spending big bucks on divorce attorneys, he still had enough money for an impressive mausoleum (imagine Fort Knox as a Greek temple) in the Kensico Cemetery in Westchester County, New York. It's an exclusive neighborhood, so Manville is sleeping the big sleep with a number of celebs representing a wide array of human endeavor. Among them are Anne Bancroft, Tommy Dorsey, Lou Gehrig, Danny Kaye, Sergei Rachmaninoff, David Sarnoff, and Soupy Sales.

Appropriately, given Manville's taste in showgirls, Flo Ziegfeld is also planted in Kensico Cemetery. (Attention, objectivists: Ayn Rand's final resting place is at Kensico. If you are so inclined, this cemetery offers an architecture tour, though I wouldn't look for any of John Galt's designs there.)

So what's the lesson to be learned from the life of Tommy Manville? In the MGTOW rising era, when men are increasingly reluctant to tie the knot even once, it's hard to conceive that anyone would go to the well 13 times. I concede that he was a pathetic figure, but it's hard to feel much sympathy for someone who squandered his patrimony on matrimony.

Had he wanted to be a pick-up artist, he certainly had the time and resources to compile a long list of conquests. Had he desired, he could have visited every top-rated call girl and world-class whorehouse. Hell, he probably could have kept a harem. He could have customized his sex life in ways most men can't even imagine. Yet he chose marriage…over and over and over.

Paraphrasing Winston Churchill, we could say:

Never in the field of human relationships has a man so wealthy done so little with so much.

Ladies, stifle your orgasms

August Løvenskiolds · 28 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The feminists tell us all the time that masculinity is a toxic thing, but what is the source of the poison? As a feminist booster and in honor of Women's History Month I am compelled to study this question and take it to the logical conclusion.

A shocking new article in Cosmo by the aptly named Hannah Smothers, "Why Guys Get Turned on When You Orgasm — and Why That's a Bad Thing" laments, "Of course guys manage to make YOUR orgasm about themselves."

It turns out that, when a woman has an orgasm with a man (or fakes one with sufficient skill that the bed is soaked and the neighbors lodge complaints), something really, really bad happens – men derive a sort of secondary pleasure termed "masculinity achievement".

Did I mention that this is a bad thing?

Such secondary male pleasure means, horribly, that a woman's orgasm is not woman-centric enough to please the anorgasmic hags at Cosmopolitan. (They actually use the term "woman-centric" when "gynocentric" would have been a fine alternative.) When a man is happy, a woman must respond with annoyance. And the further genocide is that the female orgasm rewards and thereby encourages masculinity – the subtext being, of course, that masculinity is a really bad thing. You know, like toxic or something:

> The researchers draw a fairly frightening conclusion from the research findings. When women's orgasms begin to serve as a masculinity achievement for male partners, the orgasms cease to be about women's liberation or sexual pleasure. They just become another opportunity for men to flex, or "shore up their sense of masculinity."

Now, Hannah does not say what women should do about this pestilence of male pleasure – I suppose she is more about whining than finding solutions – but as a men I feel the natural masculine compulsion to fix things even if this subverts my considerable warehouse of "masculinity achievement". Did I just make it all about me? The irony, I know.

Advice for women:

- Stop having orgasms during sex with men, or
- Insist on cash and prizes beforehand, or
- Learn to squelch your orgasm, perhaps with drunkenness, or
- Tell your partner to pull out like Amy Schumer did the Barbie movie. If Amy is not available, any discarded seafood at the market will suffice to make my point clear.
- If you do accidentally orgasm, sigh with frustration once he finishes, and berate him for his lackluster performance, or
- Tell him you are a Lesbian and you like his "feminine achievement."

Advice for men:

- Learn to approach sex with a stoic, "just get it done" attitude.
- Do not focus on pleasing your partner, which is a part of patriarchy.
- Apologize profusely if she orgasms to show how shameful you find your masculinity.
- Watch lots of porn instead.

With enough coöperation and hard work with feminism I am sure the sexes can make the female orgasm disappear into the myths of antiquity, where it rightly belongs.

Sarah Phillimore: are family courts biased?

Gary Quell · 28 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's an age old question in the argument of child custody and separation, and indeed it's one that we at the Men & Boy's Initiative get asked quite often by the people we advise.

Yesterday (19/03/17), this complicated issue reared its head once again, this time on the ill-equipped debating forum that is Twitter. Since this discussion we've had the pleasure of being mentioned directly (or rather one of our founding members, Peter Morris, has) on a blog written by Sarah Phillimore – Family Law Barrister of some 20 years experience.

For your viewing pleasure you can enjoy the blog in full at the below link:

http://childprotectionresource.online/are-the-family-courts-biased-against-men/

It's an interesting piece and despite it originating from a disagreement between ourselves and the author, we're always interested to read the views of seasoned professionals in the Family Law arena.

So, what does it say? In short it addresses this perceived bias and claims strongly that one does not exist. Which is fine, except the simple question of 'are family courts biased against men?' wasn't really what brought Sarah and ourselves together, it was certainly part of the original discussion but largely the 'bias' we believe exists isn't exclusive to courts, but generated by society at large before a court becomes involved and is carried through from there. The discussion which Sarah has presented is a much more granular and focused segment of this overall position which leads nicely to a self confirming conclusion.

Are family courts biased? When in context of their purpose and how they reach a decision, probably not. However, does this also mean that bias is absent from the room when courts are in session? Sadly not.

You see Family Courts are fair in the same way a guillotine is humane – They aren't expected to be. A guillotine cares not if your neck is in it's way, it's job is to fall and rest at the bottom. Likewise, Family Courts are not there to be concerned with what you feel is right – Their job is to maintain stability in the best interests of the child(ren), and to this end we agree with it's position, again our issues of bias and the disadvantaging of men begin outside the court and simply reach their climax within it.

I realise this makes the greater discussion of Family Courts a bit of a non issue now, I imagine to some degrees we may well agree with Sarah, but it was important to clarify our position and maintain that our issue with Family Court is by-proxy rather than direct. So, how did this debacle start? Like this:

As you can see, Peter's discussion wasn't even with Sarah. It was with the very inflammatory and frankly uneducated 'Coercive Control' account who claims men see bias in court because they're not involved enough in their child's upbringing prior to separation.

No caveat, no criteria or conditions. All men. The lot of you, useless. Good one CC, let's hope my tax pounds aren't contributing to any funding this lot get, I have a funny feeling they'd end up being traded for magic beans rather than being spent on service development.

From here Peter's position was that bias against fathers wasn't a perception, it was a reality due to the control mothers possess – Not in court but in general. Sarah disagreed:

According to Sarah, mothers do not have full control and get the run of the green in court because they are 'left' to undertake the majority of child care. 'Left'. You read that correctly, the wording throughout here will be very important so it's worth keeping an eye out.

What exactly does 'left' mean? Likely if we get a response we'll be told it meant nothing and that we're being semantic, but there's a very visible tone to this interaction and a multitude of other words were available that didn't bring with them a sense of resentment, so I'm afraid convincing me I'm reading too far into this will probably not work.

Where are the men then if the mothers are left with the kids? Drinking? In a strip club? Some of them might be, there are sadly quite a few bad parents out there and we won't insult anyone's intelligence by pretending a number of them aren't men.

The reality for the vast majority of men though is a little less glamorous – In all likelihood the mother has been 'left' with the children so the father can go to work, you know, to get the money that will inevitably keep everyone alive by homing and feeding them.

But wait, mother's didn't choose to be the biological bearers of children and sacrifice their careers for a family with no clear choice to have both, how dare we throw work in the faces of such women! Well I have news for you, men didn't choose to work (quite frequently in dangerous, dirty jobs) instead of spending vital early development months with their children.

That's just how it is, women didn't choose it and neither did men. In fact, the government chose it by allowing lopsided maternity/paternity leave, whereby in the UK a man is legally only entitled to a fraction of the same time off as his partner. So the choice isn't great, go work and keep everyone afloat, or stay at home and spend whatever time you have before being evicted with your children.

Damned if you don't, deadbeat if you do.

The conversation went on a little from here, and the coveted acquisition of Parental Responsibility came into play with Sarah assessing that dad's could do normal 'parenty' things like collect their children from school, as long as they had PR.

Collect your kids from school? That's normal, right? Basic parent procedure? Of course a father can do that if he has PR.

Um, except, having PR does not equal having a right to contact. Don't take my word for it, here's what the UK government says:

https://www.gov.uk/parental-rights-responsibilities/what-is-parental-responsibility

And I quote:

"If you have parental responsibility for a child you don't live with, you don't necessarily have a right to contact with them – but the other parent still needs to keep you updated about their well-being and progress."

So no Sarah, sadly PR does not qualify you to any sort of contact with the child. It just gives you a right to be told things. Think of it like getting a postcard rather than actually going on the holiday.

Also, while we're on the topic of mothers having full control. How exactly does a father get Parental Responsibility? Well, by asking the mother of course.

Officially there are only two ways to acquire PR as a man, the first is to marry or be married to the child's mother, the second way is to be on the child's birth certificate. Which again requires the mothers permission.

So while mother's may not have 'full control' (they can't for example control the weather, but with a court order who knows?), they do have quite a lot of it, even before any differences or relationship breakdown occurs. You see, none of these issues we've raised thus far have anything to do with men not being interested, not taking part in basic child care activities or not wanting to be involved – These issues are inherent, the status quo and 'just the way things are'. It doesn't matter if you're father of the year or if you suspend your recovering partner in a bubble filled with a years supply of chocolate and foot rubs for the duration of her birth recovery while you look after the child by yourself, to be legally recognised as having a responsibility to that child you need her permission, the government will refuse to acknowledge you as anything to do with the child unless the mother (you know, the person who doesn't have more control than the father) gives the go ahead.

So sadly Sarah you're wrong. PR really doesn't mean anything when it comes to rights of contact.

Outside of these disagreements and little spats on social media, what really concerned me of your writing Sarah was the extent of generalisation. Within your short blog the term 'many men' is used 3 times (for an exact count, that's exactly 3 times too often) and followed by a sweeping generalisation of what the majority of men feel, think or do, presented with a confusing amount of certainty and exactly no supporting evidence.

Some examples:

"It is my clear belief, after many years as a woman and parent, that our society does not value activities around child care. They are seen as low status and boring. Many men don't want to get involved."

"Many men, quite a lot of the time, appear to see looking after young children as boring, unrewarding, low status and they don't want to do it."

"for every father devastated by the denial of a relationship with his child, there is a mother who is lonely and afraid, desperate for the the father to step up and take responsibility but having no legal mechanism to 'force him'."

^ Really? The ratio is exactly 1:1? Exactly that? Forgive my scepticism..

"I am frequently told by men for e.g. that 'I don't do nappies' – they express revulsion and horror at the idea of poo! for goodness sake. Hopefully these men are a dying breed but I think the very fact it is culturally acceptable for a child's father to say he will not willingly meet one of the most basic needs of his child is a strong indicator that we have a problem here."

And that is just a bit of the generalisation that went on in Sarah's post. For the directors cut go and have a read for yourself.

The problem with these beliefs and how they were expressed is (as Sarah will fully understand being a Barrister and being privy to how proof and evidence actually works) that they are all examples of anecdotal evidence, which roughly translates as 'not really evidence at all'. Not only that but it's hugely and disappointingly sexist, or at least it would be if it weren't about men.

This I believe is really why we have an issue here. Sarah despite her wealth of professional experience has a lot of firmly held, pre-conceived notions and ideas about men and fathers. Something I thought her job as an impartial party in cases as sensitive as family matters would have taught her against.

In closing I notice Sarah has since updated her post to say her posts on Twitter should be not mistaken for advice and in essence back tracked on some of her comments.

What I found alarming was less that these posts were intended to be 'advice' but rather that to a large degree they were just incorrect, especially surrounding PR. However one piece of 'advice' from us to Sarah would be that, as a Barrister and legal professional, if you don't want people taking what you say on social media about the law as literal or factual, then you should probably refrain from commenting on it on social media, rather than commenting freely then expecting people to take it a certain way without any direction thereafter.

Julian Ayer, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 31 March 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Julian Ayer, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "About," we read about Dr. Ayer and his philosophy of care:

"Being a pediatrician is a great privilege. The most rewarding part of my job is the relationships that I have developed with families at Pediatrics Northwest. Watching kids grow up and develop over time is a gift, and I love being a part of this process. In a complicated, sometimes frustrating medical environment, my job is to give the best care possible and advocate for my patients. I want my PNW kids and families to receive the same type of medical care and attention I expect for myself and my kids. I also believe my duties as a pediatrician extend beyond the office walls and drive me to advocate for kids through the American Academy of Pediatrics and other avenues.'

While growing up in Tacoma, Dr. Ayer attended Meeker Middle School and Bellarmine High School, before going off to college and then going on to study medicine. Dr. Ayer and his family attend Trinity Presbyterian Church. He stays active by jogging and enjoys spending time with his family. He also loves to travel and spend time outdoors. Dr. Ayer is married and has three children."

The doctor should really ask himself if the patient whom he just circumcised actually wanted this mutilation and if the boy is glad you took that choice away from him. Certainly not the "best care possible" from the patient's point of view.

Here's a blurb about the doctor being voted "Best Pediatrician in South Sound Magazine's The Best of South Sound 2014."

Doctor, listen to the many men who are not happy with what you do.

Under "Services" and "Circumcision" (spelled "curcumcision" in the url) we see who does the cutting, and on video, there's Dr. Ayer's colleague talking about how you should swaddle your baby after he uses a tourniquet on his penis, and how you can watch it happen, because he "has nothing to hide."

Here's the video on YouTube and some of the resulting comments:

> The reason why the person in the video is so happy is because of the money he is making on Male Genital Mutilation. He doesn't understand the concept taught in medical school of "Do no harm" This is such an atrocity to the basic human rights of males and it disheartens me to see a male here advertising the procedure. He knows damn right well it isn't medically necessary. Ask his counterparts in the UK what they think….oh wait…they stopped doing it there.
>
> How about don't take a scalpel to a healthy baby you sick child abuser.
>
> "How to Care for Your Son "
> ..lets just stop right there. Because Cosmetic genital body modification is for consenting adults, NOT children.
>
> charlatans. stop foisting genital mutilation on unsuspecting parents solely for profit.
>
> Circumcision is genital mutilation and COMPLETELY UNNECESSARY and a HORRIBLE assault on an infant!
>
> Only in the US, is an entire male sex organ considered a birth defect. The health benefits, where are they? Work in a STD clinic, most men who come in for treatment are circumcised.
>
> Circumcision is ugly looks ugly is against nature against humain anatomy, and a human rights violation.
> The foreskin and only in human male are the only part than we amputee without true reason. Circumcision is unnecessary.

> I am also pro circumcision, I am expecting a daughter soon and plan to have her circumcised, it's part of my family's cultural beliefs and its more hygienic for girls to be circumcised.

Since Dr. Ayer has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Ayer's practice information follows:

Baker Center Office
316 Martin Luther King Jr. Way, Suite 212
Tacoma, WA 98405
253-383-5777 (tel)
253-383-5320 (fax)

> Julian Ayer, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/gCvtGntlOq #MGM #circumcision @andreahardie pic.twitter.com/FvU2EzEjMY
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) March 31, 2017

My Mother the Sociopath

Jim Thompson · 1 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Each person decides in early childhood how he will live and how he will die… His trivial behaviour may be decided by reason, but his important decisions have already been made: what kind of person he will marry, how many children he will have, what kind of bed he will die in… It is incredible to think, at first, that man's fate, all his nobility and all his degradation, is decided by a child no more than six years old, and usually three… (but) it is very easy to believe by looking at what is happening in the world today, and what happened yesterday, and seeing what will happen tomorrow.

Eric Berne[1]

This quote from Eric Berne is astonishingly accurate, at least as it applies in my own life. It rings eerily and hauntingly true in my mind; something that I will return to later.

We can ask, or should ask, what environmental influences could encourage a child to formulate a future life pattern with such a degree of inevitability? What positive or negative role models and parental guidance or abuse, would result in such a powerful, life determining decision?

In Australia, we have had three Prime Ministers who claimed to have known they were going to achieve that office from a very young age. Did they have positive life affirming parents? Did the parents nurture an attitude conducive to the formulation of such a clear and definite ambition? Very likely yes!

Esther Vilar in her seminal work The Manipulated Man, states that every girl will decide before she is 12 if she will live her life as a prostitute or not. The corollary of this is that every boy decides at a similar or earlier age if he will engage with prostitutes informally, or in formalised relationships such as marriage, or not. Or if he will be subordinate or dominant in his dealings with women. And if he will be truly a free individual or a vassal to women and gynocentrism generally.

Popular culture is riddled with the portrayal of gender roles that not only offer young girls and boys inducement to accept gynocentric stereotypes, but positively encourage them by way of peer pressure. Romance novels of the kind popular with pubescent girls often displace totally any healthy balanced discussion offered by adults on such subjects. Boys receive messages that they are inferior to girls in almost every way. This phenomena appears to be increasing due to the destructive ravages of feminism.

Even the most casual of observers will observe that popular culture perpetuates psychological conditioning that life fairy tales initiate in early life. There is widespread acceptance by adults that both these phases are "normal" and are nothing to worry about.

This is reinforced and manipulated in the most venal manner imaginable by marketing, advertising and commercial media. There is almost a subliminal, unconscious, revenge motive activated here by responsible adults. Adults who claim to love their children. Almost an attitude of "after all, we had to work our way through all of that stuff, why shouldn't they?"

The resilience of the human spirit is a marvellous thing! Happily, many young people have a balance of reasonable to good parental environment at home and some outside association and guidance from healthy friends and adults; sufficiently so for them to navigate the maze of deception and false values that they are assaulted with from all directions daily.

But when the home life is a toxic, adversarial environment, the baseline of rational mental health is not established and offered. When and if it is occasionally glimpsed through the fog of bad behaviour and striven for, all efforts to attain it can be sabotaged by neurotic (or worse) parents in a few harsh damaging words.

Enter here specifically adverse conditioning which will influence greatly, or actually shape later life patterns and outcomes adversely.

My own Mother was a sociopath; that is the short, blunt, painful story. My most enduring memory of her in my early life was her repeatedly screaming in my face, completely hysterically. She would rant about how poor we were and would always be. In actual life, I don't think we were any more poorer or richer than most of the average post war population were in Australia at the time, certainly not the people that I knew our family associated with.

Just to remind the reader, I was very young perhaps only 5 or 6 years of age. This performance, or rather assault, was a regular feature of my younger life and had a profoundly punishing effect on me. I used to have nightmares about these sessions, continuing on into adult life. I lived in near constant fear and anxiety of the next screaming session. These sessions usually reduced me to shaking and crying quietly when I was alone later in my bedroom.

My Mother had another mantra that she would assail me with, but with less intensity. She would insist in an advisory way, as if to prepare me in some way, that I would never be able to work like other boys will be able to. I would not have a good job etc.

These tirades has such a profound negative effect on me that I can distinctly recall forming my life-determining decision of the type that Eric Berne refers to so insightfully in the quote above. I can recall the actual words I used way back then and I am acutely aware of their now proven consequence.

The script:

I knew that I would be poor and not have a good job. I would not be able to afford a house and family. I would live alone.

I am now 71 years of age, and my life is just like the above on all three counts!

How much can I attribute this profoundly negative life script to my own neurotic personality and how much to my Mother's horrible conditioning I dare not speculate on. Or do they merge together, no longer being indistinguishable? Suffice it to say at least, that her truly psychotic rants must certainly have had significant influence on me in this regard.

The trauma of being kidnapped off the street while walking home from school at six years of age, did nothing to alleviate this for me. A woman completely unknown to me ambushed me while I was crossing a golf links on my regular route home. She held me prisoner over night and beat me and abused me for most of the night without even a glass of water. I was only found and liberated the next morning. This woman was never charged, and I was led to understand she went onto snatch another boy off the street again. Sadly, he was not found for a long time, rumour had it that it was for many weeks!

I was locked in a laundry cupboard half full of dirty laundry between beating sessions. To this day, I am unable to tolerate the smell of dirty laundry without feeling uncomfortable. Many house mates and partners have observed that I wash my clothes more often than normal. It took me 50 years to realise why.

My brother and I as young adults would later build houses for my Mother when she wanted to move or upgrade. We would drop jobs and travel to the location to work on them. She would often complain bitterly that the last house building went way over budget because we boys wasted too many nails! As she aged, she became increasingly bitter, anti-social and hostile. I did not see her for the last 20 years or more of her life, but she did tell my brother that we all had been written out of the will. Her estate was effectively squandered; the apparent motive was to ensure we children did not receive any of it. This needless to say, is consistent with her motive that I would be poor all my life.

I now experience a mixture of immense regret over wasted life energy and potential due to me adhering to this "script" in almost every way imaginable. I am burdened with guilt and shame about it. Guilt for how I betrayed those many folks that were disappointed and suffered because of my self-destructive neurosis; good people who truly believed in me and my many potentials. Guilt for the good women that I passed over for some other sociopath who would go onto further degrade my life and steal my child and property from me. Guilt for what I did to myself even.

I have been the traitor to my most worthy mentors. I have been the heart breaker to good women who showed themselves as likely worthy partners and who saw glimpses of the hidden me.

The curious paradox is that I have always been a person who others consider a “good person”. I am liked by many and form friendships readily and quickly. I have managed to live a life on the fringe of society as a bottom feeder, managing on my considerable skills and adaptive abilities. I did not turn into a criminal or anti-social person. Very few of the people in my life would know just how negative my unconscious attitude to life has been; I have been cleverly covert in this regard, living in effect, a double life. I am quite probably still just the same under my persona of apparent “normality”, or near normality ; I am too old now to test myself with new challenges and relationships to find out if I have changed or not!

I have experienced life long bouts of depression and one episode of major depression resulting in multiple suicide attempts. I was hospitalised for a couple of months after one serious attempt. Only when I became an adult was I able to realise that I had lived most of my childhood and early adult life in a fog of depression. Little wonder really!

School was always a good place to be as it was a bit of a refuge for me. I was lucky enough to be a bright student, one of the brightest in fact. This helped me to gain the attention, sympathy and understanding of some of the teachers. Although, on several memorable occasions, I was stunned into tears when one of the teachers would address me in way that expressed compassionate insight into my suffering. I was openly shocked that someone could talk to me in such an empathetic, kind and sensitive way. So much so, that I could not respond in any coherent way and could only burst into uncontrollable overwhelming tears in response. The experience revealed my emotional weakness and lack of experience which left me feeling totally exposed and defenceless. Kindness was, to me, an open threat! It is difficult to explain this feeling of being completely out of ones emotional comfort zone, but for exactly the opposite reasons that are commonly and correctly assumed would cause this response. I was accustomed only to intimidation, ridicule, common abuse and neglect.

For much of my life, I regretted deeply that I did not go back and find these kind, compassionate teachers and thank them whole heartedly. I excuse myself for not doing so to some extent, because I always feared that if I did so, I would not be able to make a coherent presentation to them without breaking down in tears, as I am now when I am writing this. Of course, I could have written to them. Much of this I am only now aware of and I had repressed most of it for a long time.

I admire the courage of many good authors I read on this site and others like it. Courage is one of my favourite and most admired virtues in others. It mirrors my comparative cowardice. It is this cowardice of mine that was a prime motivator during my suicide attempts. I saw myself as the quintessential coward not being able to learn to live life productively.

Of all the authors I have read, Karen Horney writes about this pattern of neurosis[2] with superb insight, compassion and intelligence. All done with a notable lack of jargon and academic writing style.

My life these days is good. I have many good, kind and generous friends. I have creative and stimulating interests. I have a part time job at a school where I mix with teachers and students. I enjoy seeing young folks engaging with each other and with teachers in a healthy way, becoming their own individuals. I gain vicarious pleasure out of this observation; I even feel that it is actually healing me. These young people are demonstrating in action that growing up can be a positive enjoyable experience with a minimum of unnecessary stress and aggravation. Where and when stress or conflict arises, as it will, they have peers and adults who they can talk to and seek support.

There have been many times I have left very ordinary engagements at the school with a feeling that my emotions are very close to the surface, a bit too close for comfort sometimes. I am relieved on such occasions to “escape” without revealing them. For to do so would be unfair and confusing to any observer.

Throughout most of my adult life I have had a repeating dream pattern involving school in some way or another. Often around the theme that I had not finished school properly or had to repeat the last year, go back and do another exam or some variant on the school theme. So, having this little part time job in the local school is, quite literally, a dream come true!

These kinds of experience sustains an old man like me and they fill me with optimism for the human condition.

References:

[1] Eric Berne quotes
[2] Karen Horney: The Neurotic Personality of Our Time, and Neurosis and Human Growth.

Men vs. Men, and STEM vs. STEM

Doug Mortimer · 3 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

After decades of simmering on the back burner, the topic of immigration and how it affects American society has finally been moved to the front burner, and the heat is getting turned up higher and higher. Pundits of all persuasions have explored the pros and cons of immigration in every way imaginable, except one: its effect on men.

In the bad old days, America spread across a continent but was undeveloped. Lots of grunt labor was needed. The beauty of grunt labor is that anyone can do it. There is nothing preventing any able-bodied person from performing unskilled labor, but since men tend to be bigger and stronger, the immigrant work force was predominantly men. Some brought their wives and families along but many left them in the old country and sent money home. Even today, this is often true.

The more men you import to do the scut work, the less you have to pay to have it performed. The labor market, like any other market, is subject to supply and demand. But experience shows that markets can be rigged; specifically, the labor market can be rigged by artificially increasing the number of working men through mass immigration.

In the 19th Century, Chinese men (often referred to as coolies) were imported to work in mines and build railroads in the western U.S. (and Canada). American politicians and labor leaders understood that Chinese willingness to work for lower wages was not in the best interest of American workers – many of whom were immigrants themselves, albeit from Europe. So the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 came to pass. The “diversity is our strength” mantra was yet to be coined.

Was the Chinese Exclusion Act motivated by racism or economics? I wouldn’t dismiss the former, but I think the latter tipped the scales. Then as now, the following question should be posed:

> If diversity bestows benefits on a nation, do those benefits outweigh lower wages (hence a lower standard of living) for native working men?

Put another way, if immigration were a prescription, would the benefits be worth the side effects? If pressed for an answer, globalists would probably answer in the affirmative, but union leaders, though usually associated with leftist politics, are more pragmatic than ideological. They’re more concerned with better wages and working conditions for their constituents than utopian ideology. Even Cesar Chavez, an unimpeachable leftist icon (just go to Wikipedia and check out ”List of places named after Cesar Chavez”), feared that illegal immigrants would provide an almost limitless source of scab labor in the event of a farm workers’ strike.

Today, however, mechanization and robotics have greatly reduced the number of grunt jobs. Contemporary toil is more likely to be mental than physical. Physical strength has little value in today’s job market unless you have superlative athletic skills to go along with it.

Ah, but those cerebral jobs require education, skills, and training! Not just anybody can do them, right? True, but if Country A has a surplus of people capable of doing those jobs, then Country B takes note, and reaches out to them when the need arises. In the United States the H-1B visa program is such an outreach program

Under H-1B, U.S. employers may bring in foreign workers for jobs “requiring theoretical and practical application of a body of highly specialized knowledge in a field of human endeavor.” That’s a wide-open window, but for the most part it means science, technology, engineering or mathematics, mercifully abbreviated as STEM. As feminists have taken pains to point out, STEM is dominated by men. Consequently, H-1B visa applications are top-heavy with men.

ST and E depend on M. Mathematics, however, can stand on its own. It is abstract and universal. Different nations have different laws, customs, languages, religions, cuisine, and histories, but math is the same in the USA, Pakistan, Korea, or Luxembourg; and pure mathematics existed long before the scientific method, the marvels of modern technology, and the feats of modern engineering.

Obviously, a STEM applicant for the H-1B visa program should have an aptitude for math and a degree or two or three to complement his inborn talents. In common with old-style grunt labor, however, the STEM labor pool is global. Given the bulging populations in Asia on both sides of the Himalayas, it is hardly surprising that American corporations (more accurately, global corporations headquartered in America) are always beating the drum for a higher ceiling on H-1B visas.

As with the Chinese in the 19th Century, contemporary H-1B tech workers are overwhelmingly male. Typically, the workers they displace are not unionized, but the H-1B workers are a sort of scab labor. Thanks to the universalism of mathematics, one can replace a domestic STEM worker earning an upper middle class salary with a foreign STEM worker earning a mere middle class salary.

STEM wages are still attractive in the United States, but how much more attractive would they be if the H-1B visa quota was minimized? Would that not force corporations to compete for STEM workers, hence elevating wages for American men? Assuming they could not fill all the positions, would it not force corporations to institute apprenticeship or training programs? Of course, that would benefit men more than women. The wage gap would widen! The horror!

With fewer H-1B visas, American men with STEM jobs would have more economic power than they do now. They could pay off their student loans faster or have more funds to save and invest. If they are MGTOW-inclined, they would have more discretionary income to indulge their fancies; if they are family-minded, they would be better able to support families. The economic well-being of men (a key aspect of manhood) is expendable. In some circles, that would be considered a good thing, lest men grow too independent.

Diversity is a warm and fuzzy concept, but at the end of the day, filling a job opening is serious business, and the stakes are high. Corporations routinely object that there aren't enough qualified American applicants to fill their job openings, so they must go abroad. As a result, immigrants are way over-represented in tech. Strangely, there are no activists advocating affirmative action program for American tech workers.

While corporations import tech workers to hold down wages, they likely dissuade a number of American men from taking up STEM majors? I'm sure there are a number of guys out there who take up STEM majors because they like it or it comes easy to them. But I think a sizable percentage of them are into it because they know a STEM degree will be more likely to result in a living wage after graduation. When they see their older brothers pulling in big bucks on tech jobs, younger men giver more consideration to majoring in STEM subjects. When they see STEM wages stagnating (or shrinking), they give less consideration to it.

You can't blame the H-1B visa applicants for trying to better themselves any more than you can blame Mexican illegals for crossing the border in search of a job, no matter how menial. Being a working stiff is a grind, but it's better than grinding poverty.

In point of fact, the H-1B visa is a non-immigrant visa and subject to all sorts of bureaucratic rules and regulations. The H-1B employee can't come and go as he pleases or change jobs whenever he want to. I hesitate to call it exploitation, since the worker was not shanghaied, but life under such circumstances is not a piece of cake, though it is not as dismal as the lot of the Chinese laborer in the 19th Century.

So we have foreign men dueling domestic men for jobs with no clear winners…other than big business. It's the same old story of let's you and him fight. Paradoxically, tech employees fighting their way to the top are racing to the bottom…unless they own a big bundle of company stock.

Of course, if one were to advocate minimizing H-1B visas, one would likely be accused of nativism, racism, xenophobia, and possibly white privilege, even though such restriction would benefit all American men no matter what their ethnicity. Of course, politicians know that advocating high levels of H-1B visas is a surefire way to virtue signal. Better than that, such grandstanding assures the continued flow of corporate donations to political campaign war chests.

No matter how much money flows into their coffers, neither the Democratic party nor the Republican party is a friend to working men, just as neither party is a friend to men. One suspects that if the H-1B visa program was depressing wages for predominantly female jobs, the H-1B program would be terminated.

Amidst all the blather, ideological, economical, or political, one natural law of economics stands out. It may be implied in Economics 101 but no one wants to come right out and say it:

```
        The working man’s best friend is a labor shortage.          It was true yesterday, it’s true today.          And it’s true if you work with your hands or your head.
```

How Family Courts are Destroying Fatherhood

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Jay Fayza breaks down the ways Family Courts are contributing to the societal ills that come as a result of fatherlessness.

Movie Review: The Red Pill

Tim Patten · 8 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

With her new documentary, feminist Cassie Jaye has napalmed an outmoded gender equality landscape into shards of dust, and remolded the smoking embers into an innovative narrative representing a modern day understanding. The Red Pill (theredpillmovie.com) is a spellbinding, and occasionally shocking, journey of enlightenment and introspection. The documentary is clean, sharp and full of hypnotic rhythms that crackle with meaningful radical revelations, uplifting our common humanity.

Unlike most equality rights advocates of her ilk, Ms. Jaye was decided to question the traditional worldview on gender equality and seek out hard facts and diverse accounts. She dove into the rabbit hole of misogynistic hate–a men's rights advocacy group called A Voice for Men–and emerged with unexpected insights. She slayed the man-supporters, putting a knife into the racist, anti-women rape-apologist brutes. But the beasts were welcoming, pleasant and endured the battle.

Not surprisingly, after film editing when Cassie presented the documentary at various early forums, fellow suffragettes attacked and sought to shut the movie down, lashing out and spewing detestable bombast. Beyond protests in March 13, 2017, a Calgary women's studies professor Rebecca Sullivan (on CBC news) offered up a disparaging review and slanderous comments about the film and about young males.

As always, the older powerful ladies behind the youthful women's movement have been keen to silence alternative perspectives, since their primary objective has long been to dismantle the patriarchy–remove straight white men from positions of influence and ignore the support of human rights for boys, fathers and men. But their efforts are faltering. Amid the firestorm of protesting ideas, a fresh movement is afoot and masses are being enticed by original truths, inspiring an overdue reappraisal of a now destructive societal framework called gender equality.

LGBTQ folk, racial and cultural minorities, and women are, along with straight white men, basking in this revolutionary learning trend, aided by efforts such as Ms. Jaye's. Millions of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and Red Pill supporters, together with numerous boys', fathers' and men's rights advocates, are offering her their heartfelt thanks to Cassie. In seeking genuine equality, she and others are helping society to keep moving into a better future.

Father's Reproductive Rights

I never wanted children, but I was nevertheless inspired by an interview Ms. Jaye had with San Diego's National Collation For Men (NCFM) Board President Harry Crouch, where they discussed how advances in men's reproductive rights could create far-reaching harmony and cooperation between new moms and dads. Instead nowadays, when a woman and man choose unprotected sex and become pregnant, the moms' choices for the child multiply while the father's disappears, objectifying him as a penis rather than a human. Certainly, many men do decide to "hit and run," but for those who believe, rightly so, that they are a part of the equation, they find societal and institutional inequities at work significantly against these fathers. The father has no right to the abortion, adoption and life decisions of his shared child, but is forced into financial support by the state if she chooses life. A formula that causes abhorrence between the potential mom and dad.

Indeed, the "one gender chooses" option often leaves men suffering. Therapist Janel Ball, of Healing Solutions Professional Counselling Services, wrote about a client who underwent nearly 10 years of therapy after being traumatized by his partner's decision to have an abortion, even though he wanted the child and was prepared to be a father in every way. Another therapist, Tom Golden, LCSW, said he had seen men who had "struggled with the powerlessness of wanting children that their wives wanted to abort."

In reality, "my body, my choice" only serves, as scholar "bell hooks" notes, to remove fathers from the picture and eviscerate white straight men, feminisms primary objective. The misguided mantra of glorifying single motherhood is socially pervasive, even though evidence indicates that fatherless boys have an 80% chance of dropping out, being imprisoned, or failing to attain viable employment. Unfortunately, many who rant, “Women don’t need a man to raise kids,” end up with one thing: lives of misery.

College Masculinities

Ms. Jaye has also interviewed Michael S. Kimmel, a feminist-inspired author and sociologist. He and the insidiously misnamed American Men’s Studies Association (AMSA) have been active cheerleaders for the “men and masculinities” college pedagogy. Rather than being dedicated to achieving educational equality for males, who are light years behind females, they are the shills for a cultish activist ideology.

In their view, most young men are socially constructed by a toxic dominant hegemonic masculinity that favors aggression and violence toward women, and they, the AMSA, are focused on “repairing our faulty boys and men.” To them, males are to blame for what ails society; they must be changed to loosen patriarchy’s chokehold, commonly using male shaming tactics to accomplishment psychological reengineering. Kimmel and his lady leaders ignore toxic data identifying female jealousy, suspicion, nagging and threatening behavior as the primary catalysts for violent arguments between couples.

Certainly, most serious academics such as Dr. Jordan Peterson, consider their theories laughable–they are the Pet Rocks of modern quackery, perpetuating stereotypes that contribute to driving boys further into anti-social behaviors and suicide.

The Documentary Inspired my Personal Reveal

It isn’t just the experts who see the women’s lobby as exploitation for what it is. Many LGBTQ individuals are also moving beyond the narrow lens of gender equality. As a gay male growing up in the tumultuous ‘60s and ‘70s, I never saw eye to eye with my father. But instead of helping me, the women’s and gay liberation movements changed me for the worse. I learned to hate my father and distrust straight men in general (the establishment or patriarchy).

Over time, however, rational and forward-thinking individuals, inside and outside these groups, transported me toward a liberation. I widened my feminist lens and made it inclusive and embraced all of human diversity. I am now free from a moral authority with incomplete ideas. Indeed, it was after I reached 56 that my most life-fulfilling moment came about.

“Did I make you proud?” I called and asked my dad as my face scrunched and flushed with the words.

“Hell, yes!”

He went on telling me all the things I did to honor him as I lowered my head and screwed into a dry cry. I choked back hitches and gulps, not wanting to upset him. Little did I know, these were the words I’d waited a lifetime to embrace.

“Hello…?” Dad said. “Tim?”

“I’m h–here.” It was as if years of sealed letters had suddenly been opened, missives from dad expressing unconditional acceptance. I met his measure; I was finally a man. I was in touch with my authentic masculinity. For males, there is no greater gift than this. And yet, most females will never really understand just how sacred it is. It is something that truly sets the two sexes apart.

I Recommend The Red Pill

This film upends history, shining a beacon on fresh understandings and shifting our world paradigm. I highly recommend The Red Pill–and give it five stars. Young adults will formulate a healthy view beyond those of early generations of adults and parents. I would also remind you that efforts to improve our lives require all sorts of assistance, including donations and volunteering. We must call upon our highest angels and work to end the hateful garner equality bias that exists today. We can promote a narrative that is fair for all, including society’s most important members, our boys and girls. They are the future.

Sara Scranton, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 8 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Sara Scranton, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "About," we read about Dr. Scranton and her philosophy of care:

"I chose to pursue a career in general pediatrics because it is an ideal combination of practicing preventative medicine, being an educator to children and their caregivers, and caring for patients with a variety of illnesses. The best part is working with patients of all ages, from newborns to young adults, which keeps every day new and exciting. I look forward to building long-term relationships with my patients and their families and hope to be a resource as we work together to help the children in our community reach their potential.'

Dr. Scranton lives in Tacoma with her family. In her spare time, she can be found enjoying the outdoors with her husband and two dogs, or attending Seattle Sounders games."

Under "News" we read:

> Before attending medical school, Dr. Scranton was set on becoming a surgeon.
>
> But as time went on, she found herself more and more drawn to the relational aspect of being a primary care provider.
>
> "Initially I thought I was more procedure oriented, but I found myself most interested in the pediatric cases during medical school. It was when I began practicing medicine more during my clinical rotations that I realized I enjoyed having discussions with families, offering counseling, and explaining diagnosis and treatment plans to parents," says Dr. Scranton.
>
> Dr. Scranton's strength in parent-provider connection is what EJ and Noah's mother appreciates most.
>
> "She's very knowledgeable, personable, and interacts with our children," says mom. "I wish she did family medicine and could be my doctor!"
>
> Dr. Scranton is mindful that parents are constantly inundated by the opinions from other parents as well as the overwhelming amount of information circulated over the internet and social media.

On the contrary, Dr. Scranton is not "very knowledgeable" about the unnecessary harm and risk she brings to the patients she violates without their consent.

And she apparently isn't very "mindful" about the "overwhelming amount of information circulated over the internet and social media" concerning the human rights violation she commits when genitally mutilating an infant.

Under "Services" and "Circumcision" (spelled "curcumcision" in the url) we see who does the cutting, and on video, there's Dr. Scranton's colleague talking about how you should swaddle your baby after he uses a tourniquet on his penis, and how you can watch it happen, because he "has nothing to hide."

Here's the video on YouTube and some of the resulting comments:

> The reason why the person in the video is so happy is because of the money he is making on Male Genital Mutilation. He doesn't understand the concept taught in medical school of "Do no harm" This is such an atrocity to the basic human rights of males and it disheartens me to see a male here advertising the procedure. He knows damn right well it isn't medically necessary. Ask his counterparts in the UK what they think….oh wait…they stopped doing it there.
>
> How about don't take a scalpel to a healthy baby you sick child abuser.

> "How to Care for Your Son "
> ..lets just stop right there. Because Cosmetic genital body modification is for consenting adults, NOT children.
>
> charlatans. stop foisting genital mutilation on unsuspecting parents solely for profit.
>
> Circumcision is genital mutilation and COMPLETELY UNNECESSARY and a HORRIBLE assault on an infant!
>
> Only in the US, is an entire male sex organ considered a birth defect. The health benefits, where are they? Work in a STD clinic, most men who come in for treatment are circumcised.
>
> Circumcision is ugly looks ugly is against nature against humain anatomy, and a human rights violation. The foreskin and only in human male are the only part than we amputee without true reason. Circumcision is unnecessary.
>
> I am also pro circumcision, I am expecting a daughter soon and plan to have her circumcised, it's part of my family's cultural beliefs and its more hygienic for girls to be circumcised.

Since Dr. Scranton has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Scranton's practice information follows:

Baker Center Office
316 Martin Luther King Jr. Way, Suite 212
Tacoma, WA 98405
253-383-5777 (tel)
253-383-5320 (fax)

> Sara Scranton, MD of Tacoma, WA "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/XSZM8wbTj3 #MGM @andreaHardie #circumcision pic.twitter.com/DfhQb3Tvya
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) April 8, 2017

Women hate being CEOs – and they suck at it

August Løvenskiolds · 8 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This article has been updated to correct errors in the IBM CEO noted by reader Blake Fisher. The IBM CEO changed her name.

Who makes a better, more enduring CEO – a man, or a woman? The question is an abomination even to ask – TRIGGERED – but it is also one that can be answered based on a simple review of the longevity of the class of women CEOs from 5 years ago, as well as the success, or lack thereof, of their companies. It turns out that by whatever measure you like, women CEOs suck, and you can make a lot of money in the stock market betting against them as a class. Such an investment strategy is evergreen as long as you are discreet about it, as it is socially unacceptable to write off women CEOs for the class disaster that they are.

This article is not intended to be investment advice. Because that would give the game away or something. Just check my figures and decide for yourself. All the data I used is copied or linked in this article.

Feminist CEOs – usually women CEOs – have been coming under fire lately for participating in capitalism/patriarchy – the quaint idea that smart women can compete with the good old boys is becoming passé in even feminist circles as extremist views on destroying the economy gain more favor in their coven. Ever the curious one, I suspected something dreary was up with women CEOs in general, so I did the thing that feminist HR directors love doing to men – I gave women CEOs a 5-year performance review as a class.

The year 2012 was a banner year for women CEOs (Chief Executive Officers, typically the most powerful figure in a company) – 20 women reached this pinnacle in the S&P 500, a record at that time.

Five more glorious years of feminist President Obama have come and gone – the most generous and forgiving to women in business, ever, and it is now time to assess – how did these stellar women perform? Do they still dominate the business world?
Or not?
Here is the exalted list from 2012:

- 10. Meg Whitman – Hewlett-Packard
- 19. Ginni Rometty – IBM
- 28. Patricia Woertz – Archer Daniels Midland
- 41. Indra Nooyi – PepsiCo
- 45. Angela Braly – WellPoint
- 50. Irene Rosenfeld – Kraft Foods
- 72. Ellen Kullman – DuPont
- 125. Carol Meyrowitz – TJX
- 127. Ursula Burns – Xerox
- 234. Sheri McCoy – Avon Products
- 250. Deanna Mulligan – Guardian Life Ins. Of America
- 266. Debra Reed – Sempra Energy
- 334. Denise Morrison – Campbell Soup
- 390. Ilene Gordon – Ingredion
- 396. Heather Bresch – Mylan
- 451. Kathleen Mazzarella – Graybar Electric
- 464. Maggie Wilderotter – Frontier Communications
- 465. Gracia Martore – Gannett

- 483. Marissa Mayer – Yahoo
- 499. Beth Mooney – Key Corp

In the five years from 2012 to 2017, the number of female CEOs jumped from 20 to 29 – a full 45% increase! You go, grrrlz! But I was curious about the original class of 2012 – were they still in their jobs 5 years later, and if they were, how were their companies holding up?

Surviving Women CEO's 2012-2017

- 10. Meg Whitman – Hewlett-Packard, dropped to 20th in 2016
- 19. Ginni Rometty – IBM, dropped to 31
- ~~28. Patricia Woertz – Archer Daniels Midland~~
- 41. Indra Nooyi – PepsiCo, dropped to 44.
- ~~45. Angela Braly – WellPoint~~
- 50. Irene Rosenfeld – was Kraft Foods, now Mondelez International, Inc., dropped to 94.
- ~~72. Ellen Kullman – DuPont~~
- ~~125. Carol Meyrowitz – TJX~~
- ~~127. Ursula Burns – Xerox~~
- ~~234. Sheri McCoy – Avon Products~~
- ~~250. Deanna Mulligan – Guardian Life Ins. Of America~~
- 266. Debra Reed – Sempra Energy, dropped to 279.
- 334. Denise Morrison – Campbell Soup, dropped to 337.
- ~~390. Ilene Gordon – Ingredion~~
- 396. Heather Bresch – Mylan, no longer listed here. Deserted the US.
- ~~451. Kathleen Mazzarella – Graybar Electric~~
- ~~464. Maggie Wilderotter – Frontier Communications~~
- 465. Gracia Martore – Gannett, dropped to 752.
- 483. Marissa Mayer – Yahoo, dropped to 513.
- 499. Beth Mooney – Key Corp, dropped to 540.

For those counting, that is 10 of 20 women CEOs who vanished – bounced out of their jobs, or they fled their jobs like CEO Pepper Potts quit Stark Industries in Iron Man 3. The 5 year persistence rate for top level women CEOs is an abysmal 50%.

The news is even more discouraging for the ten surviving women CEOs. Not a single one of their companies improved their ranking in their 5 years as CEO – they were outworked and outperformed by their male competitors even worse than a world champion woman's soccer team facing pubescent schoolboys.

So, considering both their commitment and their success rates, women CEOs earn a mark of 0% both overall and individually.

So, do not worry, feminists. By the numbers, women CEOs are ripping down patriarchy, and their companies, with every day they are in their jobs. Betting against them was a sure thing for the last 5 years.

Are these women lazy? Do they prefer family life? Are they incompetent? Are they overmatched by men? All of the above? I will leave these pointless questions to the pencil pusher patriarchs of future genderations.

Should I have reviewed the success of the other, male-run companies? Maybe, when the day comes when a woman CEO actually improves her company's ranking, I will think about it.

Additional info – companies to avoid:
Women CEOs Of The S&P 500 for 2017
This list names all the women who currently hold CEO positions at S&P 500 companies, based on the January 2017 S&P 500 list.* Women currently hold 29 (5.8%) of CEO positions at those S&P 500 companies.

Date: March 14, 2017

- Mary T. Barra, General Motors Co. (GM)
- Heather Bresch, Mylan N.V.
- Michele Buck, The Hershey Company
- Debra A. Cafaro, Ventas, Inc.
- Safra A. Catz, Oracle Corp. (co-CEO)
- Debra Crew, Reynolds American Inc.
- Mary Dillon, Ulta Beauty
- Adena Friedman, Nasdaq
- Margaret "Margo" Georgiadis, Mattel, Inc.
- Lynn J. Good, Duke Energy Corp.
- Shira Goodman, Staples, Inc.
- Tricia Griffith, The Progressive Corp.
- Marillyn A. Hewson, Lockheed Martin Corp.
- Vicki Hollub, Occidental Petroleum Corp.
- Margaret Keane, Synchrony Financial
- Gracia C. Martore, TEGNA
- Marissa Mayer, Yahoo Inc.
- Beth E. Mooney, KeyCorp
- Denise M. Morrison, Campbell Soup Co.
- Indra K. Nooyi, PepsiCo, Inc.
- Phebe N. Novakovic, General Dynamics Corp.
- Patricia K. Poppe, CMS Energy
- Debra L. Reed, Sempra Energy Corp.
- Barbara Rentler, Ross Stores, Inc.
- Virginia M. Rometty, International Business Machines (IBM) Corp.
- Irene B. Rosenfeld, Mondelez International, Inc.
- Susan N. Story, American Water Works Company, Inc.
- Meg Whitman, Hewlett-Packard Enterprise
- Geisha Williams, PG&E Corp.

Protect our little boys too

Gary Costanza · 9 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The world seems to ignore and deny the pain and humanity of males from the moment of birth to adulthood: circumcision, suicide, forced military service, etc.

A man talks about his experience being raped by a female when he was nine and the ensuing reaction of an indifferent world.

White Knights and Oppressive Patriarchy

AVFM · 9 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This article was originally published in a blog post on AVFM forums by Deidre. It is republished here with her permission. EDs

By definition, a white knight is a male that treats women as goddesses and does nothing but defend them and shower them in compliments on how wonderful, beautiful and special they are. It can be used as a noun or a verb.

That is the online definition of a white knight, and I'd say it's pretty spot on, from my point of view. As the image above displays, white knights also send a mixed message, however — do they support feminism and equality for women, or do they feel that women are damsels in distress in need of their rescue from the oppressive patriarchy? Hmmm. Having been on the receiving end of white knights at times, I can tell you, it's always made me feel bad for the white knight himself, because somewhere along the way in his feminist indoctrination, he learned that the way to gain favor with or attention from women, is to pacify them, walk on eggshells for them, and always agree with them. That is the essence of white knighting.

White knights really don't expect gratitude, they just sort of lurk in the background of life, waiting to step in and save a woman from usually an alpha male. Not that white knights can never be alpha males, but they usually are not. Not that they're beta males. Ugh, I don't like labels, but for the sake of this discussion, white knighting is a label that I think needs to be examined, as it's both damaging to men and women, because it is a way of interacting with women, that has been manufactured by feminism. Or at the very least, it could be an innocent byproduct of the movement.

Before we look at the phrase "white knighting," we should first explore the term "chivalry," and its origins. Chivalry by definition can be explained as a set of virtues that men would behold during Medival times, whereby they'd show piety, courage, and great military fortitude. It was also a term used for men who went out of their way to look after women in their presence. The women, however, were forever in their debt, filled with gratitude, and this dance between the men and women soon became part of the rules of courtship between them. Unlike today, men and women have a myriad of ineffective ways to communicate their attraction for one another, sometimes virtuous, and other times, not so much.

But, chivalry. I think what is lacking today between men and women, isn't that men aren't willing to be chivalrous to women, but rather women are simply not grateful when a man steps up to defend their honor. Feminism has created this wedge between men and women, muddying the waters, where women feel confused "should I need this man's help at all?" And the men hesitant to help out wondering "should I go out of my way if I'll end up yelled at for not treating her like an equal?" Maybe those exact thoughts don't run through their minds, but some such variation, I'm sure.

I think it has to do with role models. My dad is always helping my mom do something around the house. Something that she probably could do, if she tried, but something he likes to help her do because it showed his care for her. Perhaps the task was a 'manly duty, and my dad is the type that enjoys flexing his muscles, metaphorically and literally, and helping my mom in such ways, always brought them closer. Likewise, my mom drips with femininity, and she believes in "making your man, feel like a man." Men and women have this thing…this invisible thread…that kind of binds them together…and the courting game makes the thread thicker…harder to pull apart if both parties are doin' it right.

If you're doing it wrong, however, like feminists do, then you'd likely yank the invisible thread, and don't let a man get too close. The uptight, pretentious feminists are the ones who don't get that the dating game is largely based on biology. Simple biology. Boy meets girl. Boy tries to impress a girl. The girl is impressed, and she lets the boy know, that she is impressed. The boy asks the girl out. The girl says yes, and they all lived happily ever after. (Well, not always) But, the paradigm is simple without feminism in the background.

My thought to white knights is they emerged as a reaction to dealing with feminists, in hopes that these hard to please women who don't really want to steer clear of alpha men but are told that they should, will be hopelessly attracted to them. So many white knights make the mistake of falling all over themselves to gain the attention of women, that they don't realize how fake they're coming across. White knighting will never be a substitute for chivalry. It will never be a substitute for masculinity because much of white knighting is wrapped up in a guy losing his identity, so he can gain the attention of a random chick he hopes will find him masculine, and attractive. I've seen this the most on forums, where the male/female membership is pretty equal in numbers. SO many men are falling all over themselves to defend women who are being "cyber bullied," etc…instead of letting the women defend themselves. I've been a victim of white knighting, yes a victim! Just kidding, I'm not a victim, but it's painful to watch a guy white knight, when you know he means well, but learned that behavior as a means to getting women to pay attention to him.

This is why I believe with all of my heart, that feminism has bred white knighthood. Most Modern white knights are feminists from what I have observed, always taking the soft approach to speaking with women, always agreeing with them, always giving a high five to feminist ideas and concepts. I feel bad for these men because I can't help but wonder what their backstories are, as to why they feel the need to kiss women's asses…even those that they have no hope of ever dating. Sadly, even those who are mean-spirited to them.

What is equally sad, is many women have grown to expect white knighting. Well, I should say, many feminists have come to expect men to white knight them. While it can seem like a discussion that's rather innocuous and tongue in cheek, the truth is …white knights exist in our governments, legal system, and universities. How do you think all of these rape culture laws get passed? Why are we surprised when a female teacher sleeps with her male underage student and avoids jail time? Wherever you see grave injustices against men, there is no doubt that a white knight in a powerful position is behind it. This is why a woman's right to chose regardless of a man's choice to opt out is often supported by seemingly well-intentioned men – white knighting. This is why the wage gap controversy even exists – white knighting. This is why Obama was so supportive of pro-feminist programs – white knighting.

Unfortunately, for the white knights, some of us are smart enough to figure out that it's all just a big sham of fakeness in order to gain the favor of feminist women. I can spot a white knight a mile away, and sometimes, they aren't really even trying to help you with anything, but maybe they're just trying to make conversation. I remember being on line at the grocery store one day, and this guy started talking with me, and we were having a nice enough conversation, just an idle chat, and he then starts self-deprecating all over himself. He starts mocking all men, saying how "stupid we all are," and I just stood there looking at him, smiling an awkward smile because I honestly didn't understand why he felt the need to put himself and all men down. Was I supposed to laugh, or agree? lol Regardless of why he felt the need to do it, that is a hallmark trait of white knights: self-deprecation. They are always falling all over themselves to make women feel like goddesses, and men feel like shit. I thought to myself, this man at some point in his life, learned this behavior as a means to interacting with women. Feminism wants men to feel bad about themselves so that they agree with everything feminists say and want. "Yes-men" are really the white knights that feminism has created for women who have been taught to not respect men, for being men.

White knighthood has given some men an illusion that this is what women want, they want a guy who will bow down to them, do all the chores in the house, work 12 hour days, and then come home to kiss their ass. The irony? White knights go through divorces more so than alpha non-white knight men. Alpha men don't seek external validation, they are confident and when approaching women, they know what they want. If a woman rejects their advances, they simply move on. Alpha men don't waste their time wallowing in self-pity, and definitely, don't seek to appease women by putting down men. Not to say, as aforementioned, that alpha men sometimes don't dabble in white knighting women, but, it's usually done as a joke, or trying to get her attention in a fun, playful way.

So, I feel bad that feminism has created this mess between men and women. There seems to be this chasm between a large section of feminist women, and good men, that needs bridging but the bridge shouldn't be the white knighthood. Feminists need to stop trying so hard to be difficult to reach, afraid of men getting too close, is my guess. They need to stop trying to emasculate men because, in the process, they hurt the values and human bonding that serve to bring people together. The beauty of meeting someone for the first time, becoming infatuated, feeling that surge of chemistry, and deciding if this person is worth having a relationship with, is something that feminists have all but destroyed. White knighting is some men's way of trying to play a traditional dating game, by behaving in ways that cause them to hide their authentic selves. The expectations of men when it comes to dating, are very high, and it's an unrealistic standard when many women aren't held to them same expectations. Not all women are the same, but there is a reason why the divorce rate is soaring, and why men and women are deciding to opt out of marriage.

I wish that more men knew how valuable they are, as they are. That being an alpha male doesn't mean that you must turn into a slick PUA, but rather it means that you are your own man, going after your own desires, with a sense of purpose. These men never have a need to white knight or cow tow to feminists. I pray that more men and women wake up to the evils of feminism and realize that there is more to life than following a dysfunctional cultural narrative that leaves everyone hurting in the end. Unfortunately, feminism has made many men afraid to simply be themselves, out of fear of rejection. The façade of white knighting probably brings a sense of courage that perhaps they feel they don't possess, on their own.

Hopefully, men who are white knighting will see that it's an effort in futility that only serves to feed the egos of feminist women while preventing them (the men) from being their most authentic selves. As a woman who's not a feminist and is white knighted at times, I know that these men mean well; they're just following the male feminist narrative because perhaps, that's all they know.

Feud: Bette and Joan (review)

Caleb Taylor · 10 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Watching the latest feminist television series Feud: Bette and Joan has me asking, "is this what modern feminism has become?" Whitewashing the abuse of children by alcoholic, psychologically damaged mothers in the name of the sisterhood?

Soft-spoken Christina Crawford recounts her famous mother trying to kill her at age 13. "She had gone into some other realm. She was like a wild animal," Ms. Crawford told Larry King in 2001. Her adoptive mother had flown into a rage after accusing her daughter of making a "pass," at a boyfriend. The story of her abuse was retold in the 1978 book, Mommie Dearest, a harrowing memoir of horrific abuse by a woman whom Christina considers a "sociopath". Middle of the night rampages, regular beatings and strange psychological punishments were regular occurrences.

Yet, Feud and its strange feminist undertones seem to gloss this over. Joan Crawford is instead portrayed as a tough woman. Producers mock her over-the-top vanity yet they steer clear of the violent, chaotic mothering practices for which she was known. In fact, in episode three, both women even have a come-to-Jesus moment over their children in a brief truce from their personality clash. In the sisterhood narrative, they realize it is men who are the enemy, while they are just women. Presenting the ridiculous idea that all women would form a loving prayer circle if it were not for men.

Bette Davis was admittedly less abusive. An angry alcoholic who hated men; in a 1985 television interview, daughter B.D. Hyman said, "She thought you were scum. All of you…Every single male on the face of the earth is scum." She then went on to say her mother was angry with her for having given birth to a baby boy. On top of this, B.D. Hyman also claims Davis would fake suicide attempts as punishment. An act of psychological cruelty if ever there was one.

Instead, Feud plays off the narrative that everything women do that is bad is justified due to the fact that men are worse. The studio boss and his love affair with women is a true source of evil, but abusive and often times erratic women are characterized as complicated and smart. To question it is misogyny. A brand of feminism that is both deranged and dangerous.

The true stories of these women do not center on quirky mothers who tricked their children into eating sauerkraut before school. Nor do they model a tough but loving style. Both Christina Crawford and B.D. Hyman have spoken a lot of painful repercussions. Christina, now 77, literally devoted most of her life to activism against child abuse.

To listen to the victims of these women is moving. B.D. Hyman can see a certain level of absurdity in her mother. However, a wounded Christina speaks of suicide attempts. A desperate coming to peace with the horrible things done to her while she was vulnerable. And later, the David and Goliath battle against the bright public image of a dark woman who committed crimes against children.

Lastly, I find it puzzling that feminism, a movement purportedly so concerned with family violence, would not point this out. Instead, it would use the sisterhood to protect and glorify abusers of children. I'm not a moviemaker, but that is perhaps the saddest ending of any of their careers.

Peter Lombard: conjugal partnership, not courtly love

Douglas Galbi · 10 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Unlike a more humane, more passionate understanding of chivalry, the long-reigning ideology of courtly love deepens men's subordination to women. Courtly love ideology proclaims that women are morally superior to men. It urges men to labor for women's "enobling love." Peter Lombard, medieval Europe's most influential systematic theologian, rejected that ideology.[1] Drawing upon the most highly regarded Jewish and Christian authorities, Lombard established in his monumental Sentences that men and women in love are intended to have an equal conjugal partnership.

Peter Lombard understood the creation of Eve from Adam's rib to indicate that women and men belong together in an equal partnership. In his Sentences, he explained:

> she {Eve} was formed not from just any part of his body {Adam's body}, but from his side, so that it should be shown that she was created for the partnership of love, lest, if perhaps she had been made from his head, she should be perceived as set over man in domination; or if from his feet, as if subject to him in servitude. Therefore, since she was made neither to dominate, nor to serve the man, but as his partner, she had to be produced neither from his head, nor from his feet, but from his side, so that he would know that she was to be placed beside himself
>
> {non de qualibet parte corporis viri, sed de latere eius formata est, ut ostenderetur quia in consortium creabatur dilectionis: ne forte si fuisset de capite facta, viro ad dominationem videretur praeferenda; aut si de pedibus, ad servitutem subicienda. Quia igitur viro nec domina nec ancilla parabatur, sed socia, nec de capite nec de pedibus, sed de latere fuerat producenda, ut iuxta se ponendam cognosceret} [2]

Lombard emphasized that marriage is a conjugal partnership of equals:

> consent to carnal joining or to cohabitation does not make a marriage, but consent to conjugal partnership, expressed by words of present tense, as when a man says: I take you as my wife, and neither as one to lord it over me, nor as a slave-girl. … she is not given as slave-girl or as one to lord it over him; in the beginning she was not formed either from the highest part, nor from the lowest, but from the side of man, for the sake of conjugal partnership.
>
> {consensus cohabitationis vel carnalis copulae non facit coniugium, sed consensus. coniugalis societatis, verbis secundum praesens tempus expressus, ut cum vir dicit: Ego accipio te in meam, non dominam, non ancillam, sed coniugem. … Quia enim non ancilla vel domina datur, ideo nec de summo nec de imo a principio formata est, sed de latere viri, ob coniugalem societatem.} [3]

Courtly lovers abase themselves and pedestalize women. Yet woman are flesh-and-blood humans just like men are. Those who believe otherwise deny human nature and deny revelation that ancient Jewish and Christian authorities understood.

Many Christians have believed in the sinfulness of man in the sense of those decrying "toxic masculinity." Medieval theologian Peter Lombard, in contrast, provided sympathetic understanding of Adam's sin.[4] According to Lombard, Adam knew that eating fruit from the tree of knowledge was a sin, but, out of concern for Eve, Adam didn't go his own way:

> Adam … reflected on penance and God's mercy, even as he humoured the woman and consented to her persuasion, not wishing to sadden her and leave her alienated from herself, lest she should perish. He judged that it {eating the fruit} was a venial, not a mortal, sin.
>
> Adam … de poenitentia et Dei misericordia cogitavit, dum uxori morem gerens, eius persuasioni consensit, > nolens eam contristare et a se alienatam relinquere, ne periret, arbitratus illud esse veniale, non mortale delictum. [5]

Adam's fundamental sin was being too meek and submissive toward a woman. Courtly love encourages and celebrates exactly that horrendous sin.[6]

In our age of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry, many believe that men are privileged relative to women. These believers believe that violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem in the world today. The fact that violence is much more frequently directed against men doesn't matter to the believers' beliefs about gender equality. The believers shudder at perceived threats to women's constitutionally established reproductive rights, but they show no concern about forced financial fatherhood currently imposed on men and men having no reproductive rights whatsoever. The believers look upwards and gaze upon the genitals of mega-corporation CEOs and national political leaders. They don't see the gender of the many more numerous persons authoritatively deprived of custody of their children or locked up in prison and jails, even when those persons are their relatives and neighbors. We are living in a Dark Age.

We have never been medieval like the medieval theologian Peter Lombard. His systematic, enlightened thinking about women and men in love rejected the oppressive, gynocentric ideology of courtly love. Although highly influential, Lombard's reason wasn't enough to overcome the darkness in which men disbelieve what they see with their own eyes.[7] Better education in medieval literature offers men and women the best hope for enlightenment.

Notes:

[1] Born about 1100, Peter Lombard became a professor at the cathedral school of Notre Dame in Paris about 1145 and Bishop of Paris in 1159. He was a renowned master-teacher who engaged with other leading theologians such as Hugh of St. Victor and Peter Abelard. Lombard finished his second and final draft of the Sentences in 1158.

Lombard's Sentences became the most commented upon Christian work other than the Bible. More than 1,400 commentaries on it are known to have been written. Lombard's Sentences was the standard university-level textbook on theology from the early thirteenth century to the mid-sixteenth century throughout western Europe. Rosemann (2004) pp. 3-4. On its influence, Rosemann (2007).

From the middle of the eleventh century to the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, clerics trained in cathedral schools rose in influence to become the agenda-setters and arbiters of elite reasoned belief. The University of Paris, which helped to institutionalize clerics' broad societal importance, was founded about 1150 as a corporation associated with the cathedral school of Notre Dame in Paris. For intellectual history of Lombard's Sentences within the socio-intellectual development of the clerical class, Monagle (2013).

[2] Peter Lombard, Libri Quatuor Sententiarum {Sentences}, Bk. 2, Distinction 18, Ch. 2, from Latin trans. Silano (2007) Bk. 2, p. 77. Silano's translation is based on Ignatius Brady's 1971 critical edition. The Latin text is from the Quaracchi edition of 1916, available online at Magister Sententiarum. While the Quaracchi edition has faults, they don't seem relevant to the quotes above.

[3] Lombard, Libri Quatuor Sententiarum, Bk. 4, Distinction 28, Ch. 3.2 and 4.1, trans. Silano (2007) Bk. 4, p. 172. I have made some non-substantive changes in the translation to better align it with the Latin. On "lording it over," cf. Matthew 20:25, Mark 10:42.

Scholars today find Lombard's view surprising for the wrong reasons. For example, Finn (2011), p. 60, called Lombard's view on conjugal partnership "a surprising conclusion, given the patriarchalism of his world and his sources." Notional patriarchy is merely the integument of gynocentrism. Lombard's view is surprising in its overt recognition of the possibility of women's dominance and its decisive rejection of that dominance. The situation within local churches may have been particularly salient to Lombard's concern about women dominating men.

[4] A particularly shameful example of claiming "toxic masculinity" is pathologizing men who are vastly disproportionately victims of lethal violence. The influential work of Augustine of Hippo taught that the sin of Eve and Adam is propagated through all subsequent humans through men's semen. See Augustine, On Marriage and Concupiscence.

[5] Lombard, Libri Quatuor Sententiarum, Bk. 2, Distinction 22, Ch. 4.1., trans. Silano (2007) p. 100. I've made non-substantial changes to the translation to make it more easily readable. Rosemann comments:

> From our contemporary perspective, Lombard's description of Adam's motives for sinning must appear slightly amusing

Rosemann (2007) p. 110. Lombard's description might not appear amusing to those who judge our contemporary orthodoxy about demonic males to be absurd and hateful.

[6] Silano began the introduction to Lombard's Sentences with a story honoring a woman's adultery:

> A story that was already old by the end of the Middle Ages had it that there had once been three brothers, born of an adulterous union. Their mother, on her deathbed, confessed her sin, and her confessor, noting its gravity, urged her to much sorrow and penance. The woman acknowledged that adultery is a great sin, but professed an inability to feel compunction, in view of the great good that had come of it, since each of her sons had become a luminary in the Church. The confessor agreed that her sons had done much useful work for the Church, but this had been God's gift; her contribution had been the commission of adultery, and for this she ought to sorrow, or at least she ought to sorrow at her inability to feel sorrow. The three brothers born of this unrepented sin were Peter Comestor, Gratian, and Peter Lombard.

Silano (2007) Bk. 1, p. vii. Silano characterized the story as "charming" and asserted "it makes important points." Silano interpreted the story allegorically. Yet the story also indicates that, throughout history, authorities have treated women adulterers more leniently than men adulterers. More generally, courtly love ideology and anti-men gender bias in judging culpability supports deeply unjust anti-men bias in criminal justice and incarceration.

[7] Literature and philosophy throughout history have generally failed to recognize men's distinctively masculine being and have tended to consider humans generically. That failure is starkly apparent in Johnson's Dictionary (1755) and continues in current scholarship. Monagle (2015) provides a gynocentric perspective on Peter Lombard's failure to appreciate men's distinctively masculine being.

References:

Finn, Thomas M. 2011. "Sex and Marriage in the Sentences of Peter Lombard." Theological Studies. 72 (1): 41-69.

Monagle, Clare. 2013. Orthodoxy and controversy in twelfth-century religious discourse: Peter Lombard's Sentences and the development of theology. Turnhout: Brepols.

Monagle, Clare. 2015. "Christ's Masculinity: Homo and Vir in Peter Lombard's Sentences." Ch. 2 (pp. 32-47) in Broomhall, Susan, ed. 2015. Ordering emotions in Europe, 1100-1800. Leiden: Brill.

Rosemann, Philipp W. 2004. Peter Lombard. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Rosemann, Philipp W. 2013. The story of a great medieval book: Peter Lombard's Sentences. North York, Ontario, Canada: Univ. of Toronto Press.

Silano, Giulio, trans. 2007-2010. Peter Lombard. The Sentences {Libri Quatuor Sententiarum}. 4 vols. {Book 1: The mystery of the Trinity; Book 2: On creation; Book 3: On the Incarnation of the Word; Book 4: On the Doctrine of Signs}. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Above article originally published at Purple Motes.

Transgender athletes and the hurdle of rape culture

Conrad Shin · 10 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Feature Image: Transgender MMA fighter Fallon Fox, who in 2015 gave her female opponent Tamikka Brents concussion and broke her eye socket.

I am not a huge sports fan. I didn't watch a lot of sports growing up. But one of my favorite professors in university happened to write their thesis on the politics of mobility rights in EUFA Soccer in the European Union and his fascinating paper lent itself to an interest in the politics of sports. And there is no question at all that the single most talked about political issue in professional sports today is where transgender people stand in the arena of athletic endeavors which have been divided by gender for many years.

The debate on whether transgender men and women should be allowed to compete in the events of the opposite sex has been done to death. And I don't plan on weighing in too much on the actual issue itself but rather why these issues are occurring and at the heart of this issue are patriarchy, privilege, and, as is referenced in the title, rape culture.

So we know how the narrative goes. People are allegedly more dismissive of rape than they actually are. That they tend to blame the victim for what skimpy clothes they are wearing or assume that the victim themselves is promiscuous and slut shaming clouds the issue of victimhood. Oh and let's not forget, male consumption of rape porn desensitizes them to rape in real life as the line between fantasy and reality become blurred and they proceed to inadvertently rape poor innocent young girls. Kind of like I, as a boy felt these uncontrollable urges to stomp on the heads of baby turtles by the river after playing a violent game of Mario. I'd make a snarky reference about shooting up a school after playing Call of Duty, but I never did enjoy first person shooters so the sarcasm would be based on a false premise.

So we know from rape culture and white male privilege and the overarching oppression of women by the patriarchy that 95% of all violent crimes are scenarios where men perpetrate violence of women. (And yes I know that not all feminists cite such outrageous statistics but most of the feminists who believe in those concepts aren't going to concede to studies that demonstrate much more equal violent activity among the sexes either so in fairness to those who might actually be more fair and less biased, I will refer to those who would push the violent male narrative as PC-ers.)

And if we dare point out that men can be victims of domestic violence or sexual assault, then of course the fact that testosterone lends itself to men being significantly physically stronger than women, let alone the "well he has to get an erection to get raped which means he was aroused and therefore enjoyed it (ignoring the fact that male just like female erectile tissue can erect involuntarily with enough stimulation)".

And that's if they're in a good mood. In all likelihood if I were to point that out, I'd be branded a misogynist, alt right or an MRA. The latter two are simply comical because while I submitted this article to an MRA website, I made it quite clear to the editors the first time I submitted an article to their website I did not self identify as a Men's Rights Activist and I even said so in the article I submitted to them and they published it anyways. But the likely backlash I would receive in pointing out that rape amongst homosexuals by virtue of their definition mean a 100% likelihood of the presence of a male victim or the absence of a male perpetrator and you don't need an academic study to confirm that is more than enough for me to believe very wholeheartedly that PC-Culture is about man hating and man bashing using their supposed care about ethnic minorities and LGBTQ+ and persons with disabilities (As someone with high functioning autism, bipolar and a recent development of seizures from the medication I was taking, I laugh at that simply to deal with the pain of how untrue that is) to do it.

Now at this point, I've established the concept of rape culture and a brief summary of my thoughts on it. I don't need to do a play by play of the problems that I have with it that have nothing to do with the topic at hand except to say, obviously, not a fan. But there is one more rebuttal I have to make before I delve into the transgender portion of this article and that is the issue of sexual interference because of its relevance in a sports context.

Sexual interference is, by legal definition, a form of sexual harassment that arises when a man, while breaking up a violent altercation between two women, inadvertently touches their breasts or genitals to do so. Now, obviously, it goes without saying, that there are few if any situations in which two young girls or women beating the crap out of each other where a man would have no choice but to grab their genitals (except if being so close to a drop kick that they have to grab the thigh and then slip but that is an extremely unlikely scenario but since it can happen, worth mentioning) to stop them but the same cannot be said for breasts which just happen to fall in the same horizontal axis as arms on the human anatomy and arms happen to have fists attached to them.

The question of whether or not a man would inadvertently touch a woman's breasts while trying to stop them from punching each other is not a question of whether or not it would happen, it's how they would go about pushing two women apart in the heat of the moment without doing it. I mean it would be nice if men could multitask avoiding getting punched in the face by themselves while honoring an obscure sexual harassment law, but few have the reactionary capacity to do so.

Where this ties into sports and transgender rights is actually very simple. One of the trans rights activist criticisms of gendered sports is that dividing sports by sex serves no purpose other than making demeaning social statements towards women by implying they are athletically inferior to men and this is therefore a gendered issue as well as one in sexual equality. And yet for all of this criticism, the fact remains that… how exactly does a man get around accidentally touching a woman's breast in a contact sport? And we're not just talking about mixed martial arts or wrestling or football where such allowances might be made (and even then those "protections" are dubious since it's something of an inevitability that a male athlete would stand trial for prolonged contact with a breast or some other loophole for a sexual harassment accusation).

But in a sport like basketball, do you think Lebron James, if he were to block a shot from a tall female basketball player but in striking the ball from her hands, and inadvertently hitting her breasts and then losing his balance and risking falling, would be more interested in not sexually harassing a woman or would he be more interested in where his feet are going as opposed to his hands? I mean it seems a tad unfair in the context of a competitive sport to expect a man to break his ankles because he has to focus his mental energy on removing his hand from a woman's breast first. No I'm afraid that sports are divided by sex to protect male and female athletes from such litigious situations and to save sports organizations from having to deal with the legal headache of codifying conduct that would be fair to both sexes women.

So what am I trying to say here? Am I posturing and continuing to bash patriarchy theory for no reason? What does this have to do with transgender rights? Well, the answer is actually very simple. The narrative is very clear. If you have testicles and/or testosterone, you are to be feared. Your perverse and violent nature precedes you. You are the abuser. You are the rapist. You are man.

This is what PC Culture advocates have pushed for. They've pushed that society adopt the underlying principles of dated feminist theories in which man is the victimizer so now the phallus is the symbol of violence and the symbol of rape. This is what society has come to accept and normalize.

So if you are a man transitioning into a woman and you live in a world that has been indoctrinated into believing in the differences of physicality between a man and a woman to be that significant in areas of violence and sexual crimes, then a sport, by its very nature of having physical contact is going to experience some rather unfortunate overlap.

People aren't going to see a woman competing in women's league, they're going to see a man who got surgery inflicting violence upon poor helpless women. They're going to see to see transgender rights activists as forcing male on female violence because of their traditional victimhood in the patriarchy narrative.

And they aren't going to listen to trans-inclusive rhetoric coming from the mouths of the very people who convinced them beyond a shadow of a doubt that this is all true. PC Culture advocates have backed themselves into a corner in which they cannot get out of. They cannot credibly advocate for the inclusion of trans women in female leagues and simultaneously perpetuate their patriarchy and rape culture narratives. You can't proclaim the power of testosterone and the helplessness of women and then say it's transphobic for someone to say that the testosterone levels in trans women who are in transition are a problem in competitive sports.

There is one easy solution here which would allow them to fight far more effectively for the rights of transgender people and that would be to disavow patriarchy theory and rape culture in their entirely and revise their theories. In the absence of a male vilification narrative, it becomes far less of a challenge to advocate for transgender inclusion in sports.

At the end of the day unfortunately, that isn't going to happen. PC Culture is not about equality for women. It's not about black lives mattering (and let's throw in the psychologically tormenting effect of being assigned white privilege as a mixed race minority for good measure). It's not about ending the discrimination towards LGBTQ+ and I can say as a person with disabilities, with absolute confidence, it is definitively not about inclusion of persons with disabilities.

It is about the subjugation of vulnerable populations to their theoretical framework and the control of their thoughts and their actions through identity politics. It is about controlling what we say and how we think and making it subservient to one true political ideology at the expense of every cause they claim to stand for.

And in this case, that cause is transgender rights. As for my personal views on transgender women in female sporting events, my personal position is given the toxicity created by the mess above, we are not in a position as a society to even have that conversation. But one thing I do know for certain. PC Culture advocates are the bane of minorities and transgender athletes who are suffering in the service of their political cause. And I personally wish they would stop demanding such a cost of the transgender community to be allies of them. They deserve better than such piss poor advocacy.

A primer for getting close to men

AVfM Video Source · 11 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The following discussion between Tom Golden and Paul Elam focuses on what women need to know about men, and about themselves, in order to be close to the men in their lives. There is a great deal of information that has never reached the general public that explains many important difference between men and women in relationships.

The discussion is directed at women but might also be of interest to men. I would urge the men to watch the vid and then if they decide it is worth it to watch it with their partner. The content will likely bring out points about the masculine side of relationships that will facilitate discussion and make it a bit easier on the man to bring up his side.

I hope you find this of use. – Tom Golden

Subscribe to Men Are Good and An Ear For Men

Do men make better CEOs than women?

August Løvenskiolds · 12 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In my last article, Women hate being CEOs – and they suck at it, the 20 top women CEOs from the class of 2012 scored a flat zero after 5 years – half had been terminated and the survivors all tanked their company's financial rankings. Should I have reviewed the results of gentlemen CEOs for the sake of comparison?

My answer then was this:

> Should I have reviewed the success of the other, male-run companies? Maybe, when the day comes when a woman CEO actually improves her company's ranking, I will think about it.

This remains my stance – the failure of women CEOs is so pervasive – and remember, I reviewed ALL of them in the Fortune 500 – that reviewing gentlemen CEOs should be moot. Still, a couple of folks leaving comments seemed interested in how the lads did. So, as I am your most loyal and humble servant, I will overcome my incredulity at this question and take a measuring peek under the kilts.

Exhaustively reviewing the five year run of 480 gentlemen CEOs of 2012 seems excessive to me so I will pick 20 of these men to compare to the 20 women. My selection criterion is as follows: the men must be CEO of the next highest ranked company on the Fortune 500 compared to a matching woman CEO. For example, since Meg Whitman of Hewlett-Packard was ranked #10 in 2012, I will arbitrarily select company #9, Ford Motor, whose CEO was Alan Mulally in 2012. He retired in 2014, which, despite his distinguished career, I will count as a fail, exactly as I did for the lady CEOs who were terminated.

By picking the one-rank-up guys I am necessarily weighting things in favor of the women – the men's companies have further to fall, and less room to improve in rank. Furthermore, this method guarantees that the collapse of all the women CEOs does not further improve the rank of the man already ranked on top of her. In the case of back-to-back women CEO companies I will jump 2 ranks or as needed to find the closest gentleman-run company.

For surviving gentlemen CEOs I will also count the number who improved their company's ranking as I did for the women. As a bonus, I will compute the typical gain/loss in the rankings for each gender class.

First, a reminder of the superlative sirens and more analysis of their decimated rankings:

Surviving Women CEOs 2012-2017

- 10. Meg Whitman – Hewlett-Packard, dropped to 20th in 2016. (minus 10)
- 19. Ginni Rometty – IBM, dropped to 31 (minus 12)
- ~~28. Patricia Woertz – Archer Daniels Midland~~
- 41. Indra Nooyi – PepsiCo, dropped to 44.(minus 3)
- ~~45. Angela Braly – WellPoint (resigned from shareholder criticism)~~
- 50. Irene Rosenfeld – was Kraft Foods, now Mondelez International, Inc., dropped to 94.(minus 44)
- ~~72. Ellen Kullman – DuPont~~
- ~~125. Carol Meyrowitz – TJX~~
- ~~127. Ursula Burns – Xerox~~
- ~~234. Sheri McCoy – Avon Products~~
- ~~250. Deanna Mulligan – Guardian Life Ins. Of America~~
- 266. Debra Reed – Sempra Energy, dropped to 279. (minus 13)
- 334. Denise Morrison – Campbell Soup, dropped to 337. (minus 3)
- ~~390. Ilene Gordon – Ingredion~~

- 396. Heather Bresch – Mylan, no longer listed here. Deserted the US. (I am counting this as plus/minus 0 for being delisted.)
- ~~451. Kathleen Mazzarella – Graybar Electric~~
- ~~464. Maggie Wilderotter – Frontier Communications~~
- 465. Gracia Martore – Gannett, dropped to 752. (minus 287)
- 483. Marissa Mayer – Yahoo, dropped to 513. (minus 30)
- 499. Beth Mooney – Key Corp, dropped to 540. (minus 41)

The total ratings drop (adjusted for the delisting of Mylan) is 10+12+3+44+13+3+0+287+30+41 = 443. This makes the mean rankings loss for women CEOs equal to about 44 each over the 5 years, or about 9 ranking points per company per year. The median loss was 12.5 ranking points per company over the 5 years.

Constructing a complementary list of gentleman CEOs, we get the following from 2012 – 2017:

Surviving Men CEOs 2012-2017

- ~~9. Alan Mulally – Ford Motor (retired)~~
- 18. Larry J. Merlo – CVS Caremark, jumped to 7 (plus 11)
- ~~27. Bob McDonald – Procter & Gamble~~
- 40. Ian C. Read – Pfizer, dropped to 55.(minus 15)
- 44. Michael Saul Dell – Dell, (company went private, +/- 0)
- 49. Brian L. Roberts – Comcast, jumped to 37.(plus 12)
- 71. Miles D. White – Abbott Laboratories, dropped to 138 (minus 67)
- 124. David T. Seaton – Fluor, dropped to 155 (minus 31)
- 126. Richard J. Kramer – Goodyear Tire & Rubber, dropped to 169 (minus 43)
- 233. Roland Smith – Office Depot (thru 2/27/2017), jumped to 196, (plus 37)
- 249. Thomas J. Quinlan III – R.R. Donnelley & Sons, dropped to 255 (minus 6)
- ~~265. John E. McGlade – Air Products & Chemicals (retired)~~
- 333. Vince Forlenza – Becton Dickinson, jumped to 278. (plus 55)
- ~~389. John Workman – Omnicare (retired)~~
- ~~395. Peter J. Rose – Expeditors International of Washington (retired)~~
- 450. Michael Rapino – Live Nation Entertainment, jumped to 366. (plus 84)
- 462. Steve Wynn – Wynn Resorts, dropped to 585 (minus 123)
- 463. Bob Laikin – BrightPoint, acquired by Ingram Micro at 64 (plus 399)
- 482. John F. Barrett – Western & Southern Financial Group, jumped to 479. (plus 3)
- 498. Alec Covington – Nash-Finch, now SpartanNash, jumped to 351. (plus 143)

For the gentlemen CEOs the combined ranking increase was 11-15+12-67-31-43+37-6+55+84-123+399+3+143 = 459 across the 14 companies for which 5 year rankings of the CEOs were possible to find. The mean rank increase was about 33 points over 5 years per company, or about 6.6 ranks per company per year.

15 of the 20 men still held their titles after 5 years, compared to just 10 of the 20 women.

8 of the men improved the ranking of their companies, compared to 0 of the women.

Final result: Men at plus 459 were 1002 ranks higher than comparable women CEOs, who scored minus 443. This was not just a slaughter of women CEOs, this was Bambi meets Godzilla.

I did everything I could to favor the women – I selected men who had more to lose and less to gain. I picked the Obama years, the most favorable to women ever. None of the men benefited from the collapse of the woman CEO just below them. I did not count the Women's Mylan disaster against their rankings, nor did I credit Michael Dell for taking Dell Computer private in a sweet buyout. I had to stretch the original rules to include Wynn Resorts, the worst performer on the men's list. I counted all the women CEO terminations the same as the longtime service retirements of the men.

Despite all this, no lip gloss nor alchemy could salvage the financial image of the women CEOs.

Updated 5/5/2017 to correct a math error.

An inconvenience store truth

Doug Mortimer · 14 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Ever think about how many times in the course of your life you've visited a convenience store? For most of you, it would be literally incalculable. You might as well count the stars in the sky.

One thing for sure, if you are a regular visitor to convenience stores, you have been to a 7-Eleven store. The history of the company goes back 90 years!

7-Eleven looms large in my consciousness because the location of the first-ever 7-Eleven store is just a few blocks from where I live in Dallas. 7-Eleven Inc. (f/k/a the Southland Corporation) is headquartered in the adjacent city of Irving.

Today 7-Eleven, Inc. has 56,600 stores around the world (roughly 8,500 in the USA) and 90% are franchises. The suits at HQ can't control everything that happens in every store, but they can take steps to make sure that their franchised stores are granted to the best candidates and their brand is perceived in the best possible light.

Promoting good will among the public is an integral part of running a corporation. A time-tested form of promotion is a contest! And the 7-Eleven folks have come up with a doozy:

They're giving away a franchise!

Understandably, the value of an individual franchise is subject to a variety of factors, but no matter the variables, the franchise fee isn't chump change. For the winner of the 7-Eleven contest , the franchise fee (up to $190,000) will be waived – plus the corporation will make a donation to the winner's favorite charity.

Sounds like a good deal, right? Well, if you want to enter the contest, 7-Eleven is taking applications online through April 7. After that, the top 25 qualified candidates will be required to create a video (2-minute max) on why they would make outstanding franchisees. The judges will then pick the best 7 contestants and post their videos online where worldwide web surfers can vote for their favorites.

But the top vote-getter doesn't necessarily win the contest. Rather, the top three will then be interviewed by the panel of judges, who will determine the winner in July. Much like a Presidential election, the winner of the popular vote may not be the ultimate winner. Whoever wins out will be entitled to pick any available 7-Eleven franchise in the USA.

So if you've always suspected that having a 7-Eleven franchise contract was a license to print money, here's your chance to find out. Sure, the competition will be stiff, but there's always a last man standing.

Whoops! Silly me! I misspoke. You see, this contest is open to women only! I should have said "last woman standing." Unless she lives in Hawaii, North Dakota, or South Dakota, where this sort of contest is taboo.

Come to think of it, isn't a woman-only contest a violation of men's civil rights? Wouldn't a male franchise applicant have grounds for a lawsuit? Suppose it's a man who says he identifies as a female? For a potential prize of $190,000, it might be worth taking a few hormone shots.

According to the contest web site (womensfranchisegiveaway.com), they're looking for "a fearless, determined woman." Funny thing, but the words "fearless" and "determined" generally don't come to mind when I ponder the management of a 7-Eleven store. But when you're trying to attract women, ya gotta make 'em feel special. Just ask any PUA. The contest slogan, by the way, is "Yes W.E. Will" (W.E. stands for Women Entrepreneurs).

In fact, the web site includes a one-minute video ("I Am Empowered") with a rainbow coalition of egocentric women ("I am a leader," "I am powerful," I can do anything," "I am creative," etc.). The video ends with each woman proudly stating "I am a franchisee." Wow! Girls, you are so special!

Well, unless you've been cryogenically frozen the last decade or so, you know that corporate virtue signaling vis-à-vis female empowerment has become a cliche of corporatespeak. Almost every company has assigned some corporate cuck to assert that it's high time society tapped into all that dormant female talent. A petroleum geologist who's just discovered the biggest oil field since Spindletop couldn't be more upbeat.

The female-flatterer-in-chief at 7-Eleven is one Dorian Cunion, Director of Franchise Marketing and Recruitment for 7-Eleven. According to him, less than one third of the 7-Eleven franchises are owned by women. This is more or less in line with the overall rate of female ownership of franchised operations, but that's not good enough for 7-Eleven. They're shooting for 50%. Why? Well, stop me if you've heard this before…

You all know the answer. Anyone? Anyone? Trudeau? Anyone?

That's right, Justin! Because it's 2017!

Now, Justin, you're too young to remember this, but in the early days of affirmative action, people were worried about it being tantamount to a quota system. The high sheriffs assured us that quotas were the farthest thing form their minds. But the new sheriffs in town are actively promoting quotas. Yet according to the social justice warriors, we still have "a long way to go."

For what it's worth, I think the proper percentage of female franchise owners should be however many women want to be franchise owners and are willing to jump through whatever hoops are required to achieve that status. So what does that mean? 25%? 30%? 33.33%? 35%? 40%? 45%? 50%? More than 50%?

Sorry I can't give you a definite percentage. The correct answer is whatever it works out to be, anywhere from 0 to 100%.

At least Dorian Cunion doesn't have to bear the burden of corporate social justice on his own. You see, 7-Eleven, Inc. has just created a new position: Manager of Diversity Recruiting. Now you might be scratching your head about that. Add up all the people you've ever seen working at 7-Eleven stores and the ethnic diversity you've encountered is a match for the United Nations.

If 7-Eleven feels it necessary to have a diversity officer, then no organization on the planet is immune. I think this new position will actually be a Manager of Female Recruiting, but you can't come right out and call it that. Kissing women's collective ass is commonplace these days, but when 7-Eleven does so, the word "Slurpee" comes to mind.

Most of the consumer surveys I've seen note that men are more likely to visit convenience stores than women. I think that's because men go shopping with an objective in mind and they want to complete the mission as quickly as possible. For women, shopping is not a means to an end; it is an end in itself. And convenience stores don't further that end.

Does 7-Eleven think that they'll attract more female customers if they can trumpet the fact that half their franchises are owned by women? Frankly, I think handing out free tampons would work better, but I'm no marketing MBA.

Well, men, far be it from me to tell you where to buy your lottery tickets, tall boys, Ding Dongs, or Slim Jims, but you do have choices. A lot of the stuff you buy at convenience stores is also available at CVS or Walgreens or Rite-Aid. Usually, you can get in and out just as quickly.

If you insist on patronizing convenience stores, 7-Eleven is not your only option. There are other convenience store chains, national or regional, out there. In fact, there are plenty of independent convenience stores out there. "Buy Local" is all the rages these days, so why not shop at the mom and pop operations?

That's one way to make sure pop stays in the picture.

Google, tell us about the wage gap

Gary Costanza · 15 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I love it. Google has really stepped in it this time, and they own the shit they've stepped in.

Google, welcome to the social justice BS you push on others.

The fake "gender pay gap" is now a concern of the government and Google is now the testing ground for that feminist myth vs. constitutional freedom.

The US Dept. of Labor is investigating Google for gender wage discrimination and is seeking salary data to back up its claims.

From an article in The Guardian, here's a quote from the US DoL:

"'We found systemic compensation disparities against women pretty much across the entire workforce,' Janette Wipper, a DoL regional director, testified in court in San Francisco on Friday.

Reached for comment Friday afternoon, Janet Herold, regional solicitor for the DoL, said: 'The investigation is not complete, but at this point the department has received compelling evidence of very significant discrimination against women in the most common positions at Google headquarters.'

Herold added: 'The government's analysis at this point indicates that discrimination against women in Google is quite extreme, even in this industry.'

Google strongly denied the accusations of inequities, claiming it did not have a gender pay gap.

Google began releasing diversity statistics in 2014 and reported last year that women made up 31% of its overall workforce and that only 2% of workers were black and 3% Latino. White employees accounted for 59% of the US workforce and Asians made up 32%."

They didn't see this coming? The pie in the sky dream of all the colors of the rainbow employed in the proper numbers at the proper salaries just doesn't jibe with the realities of running a huge company in a free society. As the law requires, applicants for a job should be evaluated on merit and not sex, race, religion, etc, so unless you employ a quota system, the percentages of the sexes or the races will vary greatly according to many factors, hence the 31% figure.

So now the government is in the fruit comparison business, and I hope it does the politically incorrect thing and compare apples to apples, not oranges.

This battle involves the constitutional right to hire who you want, for how much, and who knows about it. It also involves that seemingly indestructible myth of the "pay gap" as well as another feminist goal, "pay transparency."

And it couldn't happen to a more deserving company.

Google aspires to achieving gender and racial diversity percentages that are in line with, I assume, the percentage in the population.

But, of course, this is where their efforts are misdirected. They confuse equality of opportunity with equality of outcome, assuming that everyone's interests are equal, regardless of sex, and that should be evident in the numbers. So, since 31% of Google employees are female – not 50% – it is assumed to be discrimination.

But men and women have different interests and even different expectations, so to compare apples to oranges is pure politics. Men, in general, like computers and coding more than women, so there's your first big clue. When corrected for hours worked, experience, and other factors, the gap narrows to a couple of points, and in some categories women out-earn men.

Go ahead, Google, show how the feminist/SJW utopia of total equality will allow your company to really blossom with its strength of diversity and 'girl power.' Forget those tired ideas of meritocracy where hard work gets rewarded – that isn't fair – er, I mean – lazy people don't like it!

Thank goodness the U.S. Dept. of Labor is trying to bully companies into not hiring so many talented people over the less talented. What do they think this is a free country? Nothing good ever came out of freedom and hard work. It's diversity and equality of outcome that counts!

From Reuter's "Google's diversity efforts show scant progress:"

> Google vice president of people operations Nancy Lee said the figures do not reflect where the company wants to be and said many small changes that do not show up in the statistics are having an impact.
>
> She pointed to conversations on diversity leading to a discussion on pay equity, which in turn resulted in a policy of paying employees according to position rather than by negotiated rates, which were often lower for women and minorities.
>
> "It's a journey. We're a 60,000 person company and culture change takes time," said Google diversity coordinator Yolanda Mangolini.
>
> The figures underscore challenges tech companies face in transforming cultures that critics say are too homogenous, white and male-dominated. The most recent diversity reports from Facebook and Twitter show similar trends to Google in employment of blacks and Latinos, while Apple did slightly better partially due to more diverse hiring at its retail stores.
>
> Lisa Barnett Sween, one of Google's attorneys, testified in opening remarks that the DoL's request constituted a "fishing expedition that has absolutely no relevance to the compliance review". She said the request was an unconstitutional violation of the company's fourth amendment right to protection from unreasonable searches.
>
> In January, the department sued Oracle, another large tech company, claiming it paid white men more than others, leading to pay discrimination against women and black and Asian employees. Oracle claimed the case was "politically motivated" and said its employment decisions were based on merit and experience.

Because some may not negotiate as favorably as others is no reason to violate constitutional rights: the law must allow all citizens the right to climb the corporate ladder or stay in the mail-room, to speak up and ask for raises or be happy where you are. Men may ask more because they are often the sole-breadwinner, and women less so. Assertive people may, or may not, get the raise.

This nation was founded on the principle of freedom, grounded in the Constitution, that allows freedom of association, right to privacy, and protection from unreasonable searches. Efforts to force companies to pay individuals or groups like amounts or to disclose publicly those amounts flies in the face of those principles. Many jobs, such as civil service, have titled jobs that have set salaries, so anyone working there is paid equally. But many other jobs depend on the supply and demand of certain workers and job skills, so employers compete in the free marketplace for those workers by salary enticements. These freedoms helped to build the greatest economy in the world, allowing Americans to prosper and enjoy an equally great standard of living. That is how Google flourished.

Imagine if feminists got their way and Google – or your employer – had to make public your salary and justify why you get paid more than Joe or Sally, and "because we need to maximize profits" or "because it's a free country" are not acceptable answers. If proven that a company actively paid women or others less, then that should be actionable and reasonable to pursue, but the fact that some groups flock to certain jobs with different salaries is no reason to assume discrimination.

If the DoL investigation is on the level, it will be precedent-setting evidence that there is no agenda to pay women less, but there is a goal to make a profit out of providing a product that people want – that's it.

If the DoL wanted to they could also find out things like:

- there are more female nurses than male because females seek those jobs far more (work with people, flexible hours, not dangerous)
- people who work more hours attain more experience, and hence can demand a greater salary than others
- people who work dangerous jobs command better pay
- jobs that require frequent travel command better pay
- people working the late shift earn extra pay
- people with special training or college degrees earn greater salaries

None of these reasons for greater pay have anything to do with discrimination, and are actually the rewards for extra efforts.

Facing the facts of the “wage gap” is complicated, isn’t it, Google?

Another blow against free speech in Australia

Bettina Arndt · 19 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dendy Cinemas has joined the shameful list of Australian companies caving into pressure from extremist groups.

Dendy has just announced they will cancel The Red Pill, a movie about men's lives which was due to be screened in Newtown next week and Canberra next month. Tickets for the Newtown screening have been sold out for weeks.

Last year we became the only country in the world where movie theatres have been bullied into banning this movie.

The Red Pill is a documentary by feminist filmmaker Cassie Jaye who set out to attack men's rights activists but ended up exploring why important issues about the lives of men and boys so rarely get proper attention. http://www.bettinaarndt.com.au/mens-issues/the-red-pill/

The Red Pill is receiving world-wide acclaim – in the US it is currently the #1 Documentary on Google Play.

Yet planned screenings last October in Australia were cancelled after extremists promoted lies about the contents of the movie, alleging it promoted violence and misogyny. Cinema owners received death threats and had their businesses attacked.

I have been working to organise screenings across the country through Fan-Force – an organisation which allows people to see whatever movies they choose.

The April 26 screening of The Red Pill at The Dendy in Newtown was the first Fan-Force screening to sell out although other events are planned across the country, often through large cinema chains like Hoyts, Event and Village.

However the Canberra screening on May 17 was also planned to be at Dendy and hence will also apparently be cancelled. Dendy has issued instructions to Fan-Force to notify ticket-holders that the screening will not go ahead but refuse to issue a statement.

No doubt they are nervous of ending up looking like the management of Cooper's Brewery which was caught out caving into pressure from the LGBTI lobby group and ended up alienating a far larger group of their clientele.

The Dendy decision shows an appalling disregard for their mainstream audience of men and women who were keen to see this movie. Men and women who realise that men matter too!

Feminist extremists have loud voices but they have no right to determine what other people in this free country choose to see.

The other organisers and I, of the Fan Force screenings, are putting together a change.org petition protesting this move by Dendy. SHAME ON YOU, DENDY. MEN MATTER TOO! Please sign this urgently and get everyone you know to do so. We need lots of signatures to make the point that we object to this type of bullying by extremist groups.

But there is another screening taking place in Sydney at Hoyts Broadway on May 10. People who believe in free speech are urgent to book their tickets now to make sure the wicked witches don't win!

Other screenings are taking place across the country and another venue will be found for Canberra. All details will be on the Fan-Force site.Please book in now!

Related articles:

- New puritanism at work in refusals to show film The Red Pill
- A bitter Red Pill to swallow?

Dr. John Clapper of Tacoma, WA, and Dr. Jumana Nagarwala of Michigan "Known Genital Mutilators"

Gary Costanza · 21 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image][image]

Infant circumcision – medical necessity = genital mutilation + sexual abuse

John Clapper, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS and Jumana Nagarwala, MD of Henry Ford Hospital have been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Why these two doctors, and why now?

We are highlighting these two doctors together to make a number of points about human rights, the Constitution, and our changing society. It's a story about two US doctors practicing child genital mutilation and the vastly different reactions from them, the public, and the government.

Dr. John Clapper continues to circumcise children, while Dr. Jumana Nagarwala has been arrested and prevented from doing so. Why is Clapper allowed and Nagarwala not?

You see, Dr. clapper mutilates infant boys, and Dr. Nagawala mutilates little girls. For that Nagarwala gets arrested, and Clapper gets paid.

The story illustrates the inevitable clash between Male Genital Mutilation, Female Genital Mutilation, and the Constitution.

From an article at NPR:

"A Michigan emergency room doctor has been charged with performing female genital mutilation on multiple girls of about the age of seven.

The Department of Justice says it believes this is the first case brought under a federal law that criminalizes the practice, which is widely condemned as both harmful to the physical and mental health of women and girls and a violation of their human rights.

'Female genital mutilation constitutes a particularly brutal form of violence against women and girls. It is also a serious federal felony in the United States,' Daniel Lemisch, acting U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan, said in a statement. 'The practice has no place in modern society and those who perform FGM on minors will be held accountable under federal law.'

Jumana Nagarwala, 44, was also charged with 'transportation with intent to engage in criminal sexual activity' — a reference to FGM — and making false statements to a federal officer.

The New York Times reports that she has been placed on administrative leave from Detroit's Henry Ford Hospital, according to David Olejarz, a spokesman for the Henry Ford Health System."

Wow, has the DoJ been reading this column? Dr. Clapper and other mutilators, arrested or not, should take note.

If the practice is "harmful to the physical and mental health" of girls and "a violation of their human rights," common sense and the Constitution require that apply to all people, adult or infant, male or female.

Here's some info about the Fifth Amendment and how equal protection of the laws gives infant males the same rights as their sisters:

> Equal Protection of the Laws.
>
> If the courts stretched Fourteenth Amendment "due process" to apply the Bill of Rights to the states, they > stretched Fifth Amendment "due process" to require the federal government to afford equal protection of the laws. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the states from establishing segregated schools or otherwise discriminating invidiously against some of their citizens. There is no equal protection clause in the Bill of Rights. In a case involving segregation in the schools of Washington, D.C., which as the nation's capital is a federal enclave governed by federal law, the Supreme Court found that the Due Process Clause operates against the federal government just as the Equal Protection Clause does against the states.

So, if it's a felony for Dr. Nagarwala, it must also be for Dr. Clapper.

The DoJ now correctly admits that the practice of genital mutilation for no medical reason is 'criminal sexual activity.' Many of us have been saying for some time that this mutilation is also sexual abuse by an adult on a minor.

See the statute felonizing FGM:

> §116. Female genital mutilation
> (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), whoever knowingly circumcises, excises, or infibulates the whole or any part of the labia majora or labia minora or clitoris of another person who has not attained the age of 18 years shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.
> (b) A surgical operation is not a violation of this section if the operation is—
> (1) necessary to the health of the person on whom it is performed, and is performed by a person licensed in the place of its performance as a medical practitioner; or
> (2) performed on a person in labor or who has just given birth and is performed for medical purposes connected with that labor or birth by a person licensed in the place it is performed as a medical practitioner, midwife, or person in training to become such a practitioner or midwife.
>
> (c) In applying subsection (b)(1), no account shall be taken of the effect on the person on whom the operation is to be performed of any belief on the part of that person, or any other person, that the operation is required as a matter of custom or ritual.

Pretty much prohibits any mutilation, ritual or otherwise.

Our goal is to inform the public about circumcision and add to the groundswell of public opinion that will ultimately end this madness. All doctors should refuse to perform circumcisions on moral and ethical grounds, including those listed here.

At one time the forced sterilization of the mentally ill was legal, but was ended when it was recognized that their human rights were being violated, same as infants who are as powerless as inmates in an institution.

Since Dr. Clapper has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Clapper's practice information follows:

James Center Office
1628 S Mildred, Suite 101
Tacoma, WA 98465
253-564-8005 (tel)
253-564-8344 (fax)

A modest proposal regarding male disposability

Doug Mortimer · 21 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

For those slow on the uptake, the following piece is satire. It provides an opportunity for young and old men to reflect on the way they treat each other. Eds.

Old men have sent young men off to war as long as there have been wars. Today the alter cockers are still hollering for blood. Remember Will Rogers, who never met a man he didn't like? Well, Senator John McCain (R- AZ, age 80) never met a country he wouldn't like to invade.

Sure, it's easy to advocate foreign wars when you don't have to fight them. Old men don't fight wars, but some of them fought when they were younger. Some shudder at the memory of it and wouldn't wish it on anyone else; others say something to the effect of, "I did my part, now it's your turn, young man. I'm not asking you to do anything I didn't do myself."

Clearly, it's a guy thing. Jeanette Rankin, the first woman elected to Congress, went on record as the only member of the House of Representatives to vote against a declaration of war against Japan. "As a woman I can't go to war," she said, "and I refuse to send anyone else." Of course, that was back in the days when Congress used to actually declare wars.

Well, John McCain is not a woman, and he did go to war, but since he spent more than five years as a POW in North Vietnam, you'd think he'd hesitate to send anyone else off to a foreign country to effect regime change or impose democracy or build a nation or an oil pipeline or whatever.

The U.S. role of global enforcer persists no matter who occupies the oval office. Apparently, this deep state dictum cannot be countermanded by the shallow state. So if we're stuck with it, can we at least make it more efficient?

Draft registration is still a fact of life in the U.S., and we may be just one international incident away from reinstating the draft itself. For that reason, I propose that we give some serious thought to overhauling the system. And I don't mean by drafting women.

Instead of registering men at age 18, let's register them at age 62. Senator Lindsey Graham (R-SC), another screeching warhawk, turns that age on July 9, so he might be the ideal sponsor of such a bill.

Now I can hear you objecting that old men can't hack it! Their strength, health, and physical stamina are way past their peak. War has always been a young man's game. Well, it has been to this point in history. But maybe Henry Ford was right when he said, "History is bunk."

If you go to an old graveyard, you will be impressed by how few people ripened to an old age in days of yore. Old men were not involved in combat because there were so few of them! That is no longer the case.

Thanks to advances in medicine and better public health, seniors comprise a bigger and bigger share of the population. And thanks to the chilling effect of the demographic winter, the proportion of young people is growing smaller and smaller. So the traditional draft pool is decreasing.

Also, let's not forget all those young men out there who are making the transition to females. I predict that if the draft returns (and females are not included), more and more young men will commence that transition if it eliminates them from the draft pool.

If you want to raise an army, you have to go where the recruits are! And old-timers are an immense untapped resource. If you wear one of those T-shirts or ball caps that says "Old guys rule," here's your chance to prove it!

The AARP magazine is full of articles about active oldsters. Geezers are running triathalons, for God's sake! So don't tell me they can't handle desert warfare. Ever notice how many retirees live in Arizona? If they can play golf in Scottsdale in the summertime, they can handle combat in the Middle East.

Nevertheless, I realize many senior citizens don't get around as easily as they used to. Can we really send old guys with walkers or wheelchairs into combat? Can we enable the disabled and eliminate the 4-F classification? I answer in the affirmative.

Isn't it better to send a mobility-impaired old man into combat rather than an able-bodied young man, who may come out of combat mobility-impaired? Why take a chance on damaging the good stuff when you already have damaged goods to put in harm's way?

Now we all know that old people, even if they're not impaired, don't move as quickly as they used to. When the bullets start flying, codgers make bad dodgers. They're more likely to stop a bullet than dodge one. But that's not necessarily a bad thing.

Remember the old Spartan maxim of "Come home with your shield or on it"? How about "If you don't have a shield, be one." Old people make superb human shields. Younger people move faster, so they're more likely to run away.

Admittedly, if we employ old men on the front lines, the casualty count will approach 100%. With apologies to Douglas MacArthur, we can say "Old soldiers never fade away, they just die."

The benefits of using old men as cannon fodder are impressive, but they aren't limited to the battlefield. The home front will also prosper.

We all know that Social Security is on shaky ground. When it was set up in the 1930s, few men lived beyond age 65, so it was financially feasible to set that age as the minimum to collect benefits. The feds thought there would always be far more people paying into the system than living off it.

Today, with fewer and fewer jobs paying less and less money, it's not possible to support the system when people are living longer and longer. Well, one solution would be to have more men employed in good-paying jobs. But that cuts into corporate profits so it's a no-go.

The best way to keep Social Security afloat is to drastically reduce the number of beneficiaries. We can't have a Logan's Run domestic policy (that is, euthanizing people once they reach a certain age), but why not have the old men perform a useful function as they expire? Like kamikazes but with a new wrinkle…actually lots of wrinkles. If some old guy goes down and hollers, "I've fallen and I can't get up!"…just leave him there. If no one's looking, you can administer a compassionate killshot and put him out of his misery.

Of course, bolstering Social Security alone would justify drafting old men. But there is more.

Medicare is in as much trouble as Social Security. A high body count of geezers would go a long way towards putting this program on a sound financial footing. Think of the millions saved by eliminating old guys before they get to those expensive knee and hip replacements, not to mention chronic cardiovascular problems, kidney dialysis, or cancer in its numerous manifestations.

Ironic, isn't it? For generations, social critics have lamented that the warfare state has diverted funds that would be better spent by the welfare state. Now we can turn the tables so the warfare state benefits the welfare state!

But I've saved the best for last. Namely, the benefits for women!

As we all know, men die earlier than women. All well and good, but the guys aren't dying off fast enough. By accelerating the death rate for men and reinforcing Social Security and Medicare, there will be more funds available for women in their golden years. Call it posthumous white-knighting.

Speaking of women, for any senior who manages to survive combat, there may be some young hottie out there who'd love to be a war bride. Judging by all those internet pop-ups, there are countless Russian, Asian, and Eastern European women out there who want to meet American men regardless of age. What better way to meet foreign women than a foreign war?

Now I'm not expecting old men to be overly enthusiastic about my proposed policy. They may conclude that the USA is no country for old men and the time has come to emigrate. During the Vietnam war, Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau welcomed American refugees from conscription. Start drafting old men today and perhaps we'll be able to say that again.

All men, young and old, must acknowledge their disposability. That being the case, doesn't it make sense to dispose of the old and unproductive and keep the young and productive…until they become old and unproductive?

The welfare state can be a well-oiled machine if we're willing to lubricate it with the blood of old men.

Come on, grandpa. You can't live forever. Why not take one for the team?

The phalanx: MRAs and MGTOW

Scott Carter · 21 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A recent post I made on Facebook about my belief that the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) movement is indirectly helping the Men's Rights Activist movement certainly generated some interest and interesting opinions.

This topic provoked some serious thought about not only how I see myself, as I'm connected and a part of both movements to different degrees, but also both communities in their entirety, especially within the context of Australia although I hope the same can be said worldwide.

First (and I need to tread carefully here), I was brought to both movements from a place of sheer disbelief and pain at the way I was treated personally. I never wanted the Red Pill. I say this with absolute conviction. I would have been quite content being in the horrible situation I was in prior to all this. One day I hope I am free to write in full about the situation, however a lot can be inferred by the issues most important to me.

Six months on, my life has taken a completely new direction. One I never foresaw, which is ultimately far more fulfilling than I had thought possible when my journey started. My passion, energy and activism have all led me toward the path I now walk.

My primary identity in all this is as a Men's Rights Activist. I realised very early on that my personal fight for justice depended on a system that was and continues to be totally against me because of what is between my legs, rather than in my heart or head. I also realised from 25 years involvement in Martial Arts with some of the most skilled and respected teachers in Australia that one of the best ways to help yourself is in the service of others. This is not some flippant statement. In the same way a teacher learns as much from his students as he teaches them in Martial Arts, helping others is not an entirely selfless act, but nor is it selfish. The benefits to both teacher and student in growth, self-development, and self-esteem are evidenced by the fact that the greatest masters I have known are still operating on the basis that they too are students well into old age (I hope none of them are offended).

On Facebook I created Men's Rights Perth, became contributing editor and admin on a variety of Mens Rights, Fathers Rights, Genderless Domestic Violence, Family Law Reform and Suicide Prevention and Awareness pages. I have done and continue to do my best to actively help people online and in real life, all out of a homeless shelter. My greatest challenge will be to create a domestic violence shelter for men in Perth. This is not possible to do without the help of amazing people committed to helping others in much the same way. Too many to list, you know who you all are.

When I first started, I was also quickly drawn to MGTOW, from the get go. Without explaining in detail, I found myself soon with an amazingly passionate supporter and fellow activist I fell in love with.

MGTOW fast-tracked my education, and continues to be important to me along with mutual support from and for many prominent MGTOWs.

Now, whilst I believe MGTOW is important to the MRA movement in its entirety and even personally, the distinction must be very clear and very well drawn between MGTOW and MRA. MGTOW has no leadership or agenda. It has no political cause or care. It is simply a tool for individual self-preservation. The MRA movement is a lot more formalised, has leadership, has agendas, and absolutely relies on each other, as one of my friends put it, it can be likened to a phalanx.

There is a reason for this analogy. The phalanx formation in warfare (or riot control) is defensive. We are constantly under attack and the only way we can move forward is TOGETHER.

Many of our agendas are all under attack by the same enemy; radical feminism.

So if, like me, you consider yourself an MRA, look to those you respect in the movement and fight alongside that have been in the fight a lot longer. Take the advice they give, even if it is not what you want to hear. We are a small but growing army, and rely on unity to make every inch of ground we take. We do NOT fight for ourselves but each other. Our personal story and pain is always subordinate to Men's Rights. We often remind each other how we don't care about feelings, get up and hold formation. There is no room for prima donnas or bitching. The rule is GTFO. Get on or get out. Whether or not you like everyone or any particular MRA is of secondary concern.

Let's keep it tight, the next couple of years I believe will be pivotal as MGTOW too provides the means for the changes we all want. Every small win is a win for us all. Likewise every loss.

What is feminism?

Adam Kostakis · 23 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

From every side of the debate people offer differing definitions of what 'feminism' is, with feminists themselves pointing to glib dictionary definitions, and antifeminists preferring to define it as a female supremacy movement. A hundred more definitions could likely be offered, but more important is the question of whether these different definitions hold anything in common?

Below, Adam Kostakis answers this question in the affirmative with an elegant definition that most would agree with. – PW

Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common. So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious.

That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Source: The above excerpt is from Adam Kostakis' essay Pig Latin.

The lies we tell in this age of feminism

Mark Dent · 24 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

There have been several issues emanating from the Australian Football League in the past few months which have underlined just how dominant the feminist narrative is in the land down under. How strange, that a sport which has celebrated masculinity and men for decades is now a leader when it comes to pushing feminist ideology and presenting men as a gender in need of "fixing" or demanding that men respect all women simply because they are women. Yes boys-that includes the drunk women who grab your crotch in the nightclub and beg you to take them home to your bed.

Two years ago I wrote an article for AVFM which focused on the absurd and dishonest way in which women are accorded equal status with men for their courage and self sacrifice in war during annual commemorative services.

It seems to be an appropriate time to revisit this issue with another ANZAC Day close at hand (25th April) where we honour our Australian servicemen and women.

This morning I was reading my Sunday paper when I came across an article by a former football coaching legend, Mick Malthouse. He had written about some of his favourite memories of the ANZAC Day clashes between Collingwood and Essendon (two powerhouse Australian Rules Football clubs.)

It was the fourth paragraph which made it hard for me to digest the hot cross bun I had been enjoying. Let me quote it for you.

> 'From the landing in Gallipoli on April 25th, 1915, ordinary Australians have done an extraordinary thing by fighting for our country.
>
> These are men and women*, some of them so young you couldn't call them adults, who left their families, dressed in a uniform, armed themselves with artillery, worked side by side to dig trenches and scale rock cliffs and came face to face with an enemy knowing they had to kill if they wanted to live.*
>
> That is sheer undeniable bravery. That is brutal. Horrific. Inconceivable to the rest of us." The bolded words are my emphasis.

I think what stuns me the most about this revisionism is the complete lack of response from anybody to what is a blatant, deliberate misrepresentation of the truth. Perhaps a war historian or any journalist with a shred of integrity could question this version of the ANZAC legend? No-just silence.

It saddens me to think young people may read this and logically assume that when a legendary coach writes that men and women dug trenches and charged the enemy with fixed bayonets, that is exactly what happened.

Some may question my fixation on this annual lie telling.

My anger is not simply because of the injustice of giving credit where it is not due and therefore lessening the focus on those who truly deserve our undying gratitude, though that should be reason enough. It is the fact that this is symptomatic of the sickening, sad surrender to the feminist power bloc that controls our media, government and society. Feminism demands that we revise the facts of history to suit their agenda.

Walk through any book shop and you will see a glut of books promoting "girl power" and female superheroes saving the world in seemingly every new blockbuster that hits our screens. Watch any cop or detective show and you will see women catching or killing the bad guys (the bad ones are still always male (that will never change) or outwitting her bumbling male peers. The real world says this scenario in the criminal underworld is rare to the point of being a myth.

I was reflecting on the fact that whenever atrocities occur in time of war feminists point at men and only men and blame toxic, brutal masculinity. How often do we hear the childish comment- "if women ran the world there would be no wars!" Yet when the accolades and praise for the courage and sacrifice of our warriors are being given, women happily step up to the podium and stand alongside men, happy to pretend that both men and women gave their lives on the bloody battlefields throughout their nation's history.

Can you imagine the outcry were an article in the paper to praise the incredible courage and strength our men and women show in childbirth? When women screeched in horrified outrage I would simply say-but we hold your hand and offer words of support. Sometimes we even cut the umbilical cord. Of course, we deserve equal credit and recognition!

While my focus is on our Australian Football league there is another issue which has come to the fore in the past few weeks. The AFL recently introduced a women's national football league. I was very excited about this. I love our indigenous game and in my view, allowing more people to play it is a great idea. The women's game however has a long way to go before it can be called elite or become a spectacle patrons are willing to pay money to see.

This season all women's games had free entry. Crowds were good as were television ratings though the games were being played in the summer (footy's off season for men). Nevertheless, it stirred my heart to see young women playing footy in the magnificent black and white stripes of the Collingwood Football Club.

Alas. My joy was short-lived as time and again the creation of this league brought constant references to "gender equality", "equal pay", "girl power" and of course the scourge of domestic violence. One talented female player(Darcy Vescio) started a trend with a tshirt she had made which read:

"Wen you laugh togetha cos you know ur gonna smash the patriarchy"

Of course this went viral and many girls got the slogan stamped on their tshirts.

Feminists are deluded. Nobody smashed anything-especially women. Men opened the door to a world they created entirely on their own and asked women if they would like to join them.

Then the clubs started linking the introduction of a women's football league to gender equality in our society and the need for us all to show respect to women and stop violence against women. Just check out the concerned looks of the male players and administrators as they talk about equality and respect for women as though the very notion is alien to our society and especially men.

Instead of expressing gratitude for the enormous work of mostly men, to get this league up and running, it immediately becomes an excuse to bash men and demand more.

The demands for better pay are already being stridently made even though the only reason the competition is so vibrant and thriving is due to 125 years of hard, grinding slog and sacrifice by MEN! Sound familiar? Now many women believe the girls should reap the rewards of all this work without having done anything to contribute to the flow of money into the AFL's coffers.

There is a thriving netball competition in our country yet it is a game played exclusively by women at the elite level. Local competitions allow for mixed teams but why has there not been a concerted effort to include men and boys in all male teams at the highest level? The hypocrisy is truly stunning. In fact, our friend Clementine Ford wrote about the dangers of allowing men to play women's sports.

So the real thrill I was experiencing when I first watched young women take to the field in an official clash has been crushed by this avalanche of feminist propaganda, happily spewed by all of the male commentators who want to keep their job.

The AFL also has a Women's round where we lavish praise and thanks on women and all they do for our great game. We have another round dedicated to raising funds for (and awareness of) breast cancer. I always wonder why all the female sporting bodies aren't dedicating days to the dads/men in their lives and why no female sporting competition, as far as I know, raises millions of dollars in funding for male specific diseases? Yet even given the fact that men are continually raising awareness for women's issues and providing them with tens of millions in funding (our national cricket team does the same) it is still only men and male sporting competitions that are branded sexist and told they must give more respect to women. Not a word is spoken about the complete absence of support for men from any female collective.

I have one final comment to make which is related to the AFL.

I read a brief letter in one of our daily major newspapers. The writer commented on the fact that not one critical word had been directed at any female footballer throughout the women's football season. He was right. One team, the eventual premiers (competition champions) had a girl who was borderline obese but undoubtedly a talented player. If a male had walked onto the footy field in her condition he would have been torn to shreds, mocked, made the subject of derisive jokes, given a nickname and been featured in the worst possible light in photos splashed across our papers.

This appears to be another rather trivial aspect of the coverage to focus on yet it is once more symbolic of a much greater problem at the very heart of our society. Women cannot be criticized. Women cannot be ridiculed. Women cannot have their appearance appraised negatively. Women are untouchable. The commentators knew this-I would say instinctively. It was clear that the girls were to be presented in the most flattering light regardless of what took place on the football field.

This would be okay if not for the incessant cries from feminists for women to be treated as equals of men. Yet we all know they do not mean this for a moment.

The same rules apply in any sphere where a woman has power or is the focus of our attention in sport, politics or the world of entertainment. Men can be eviscerated by the media and general population and it is entirely ignored or often applauded. Women immediately cry "sexist' or "it's only because I am a woman" and sadly most males buy this sickening cop out from the very same women who demand "equal treatment."

So, I am off to another ANZAC Day clash featuring my beloved Collingwood. I have accepted the fact that there are moments in the pre-match ceremony which I will only endure by breathing deeply and thinking happy thoughts until the men come out to strut their stuff on the mighty MCG

Response to Jordan Peterson's comments on MGTOW

AVfM Video Source · 24 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Jordan Peterson recently explained away the MGTOW phenomenon by placing it in a neat little Jungian box without adequately studying it. Karen Straughan demonstrates how to approach the subject from a more phenomenological angle – i.e. actually studying the thing before resigning it to esoteric cubbyholes.

Governor LePage, are you out of your mind?

Editorial Staff · 25 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Maine doesn't need this; the only work Paul Cavanaugh should be doing in a prosecutor's office is mopping the floors and cleaning the restrooms. There are very good reasons why he was not elected District Attorney for Hancock and Washington counties, the primary one being his ethical impairment. It seems the citizens of those counties have a fondness for due process, and Cavanaugh – maybe not so much. In spite of this Governor LePage is now considering appointing him (conveniently without the need for an election) to the position of District Attorney for Lincoln, Sagadahoc, Knox and Waldo counties.

Please sign this petition and share it wherever you can. Here is the petition summary:

> Paul Cavanaugh MUST NOT BE APPOINTED District Attorney of Knox, Lincoln, Sagadahoc, and Waldo counties without an election!
>
> Paul Cavanaugh was the former long time 1st Assistant District Attorney from the misconduct riddled DA7 office of Hancock and Washington County. A Federal Civil Rights lawsuit has been brought against prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh, his office, six law enforcement officers, four police departments, and the town and county due to the prosecution Paul Cavanaugh and Mary Kellett conducted.
>
> In 2014, Paul Cavanaugh lost the primary election to Matthew Foster (a defense attorney who has never been a prosecutor before).
>
> https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Nj3aC0U2BjY
>
> https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zrXWurqWoN4
>
> The voters of Hancock and Washington Counties who knew Cavanaugh chased him out of office. Cavanaugh, together with infamous prosecutor Mary Kellett, were both shown the door by the new DA after the election.
>
> Paul Cavanaugh: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DkCJNt8mayk
>
> Mary Kellett: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cMmbshO9_8s
>
> With Cavanaugh and Kellett at the DA7 office, defendants were deprived of their due process rights and access to evidence of their innocence. Their office had the worst record in the State of Maine where indiscriminate prosecutions were devoid of justice, discovery compliance, and ethical obligations. Cavanaugh prosecuted the innocent and gave deals to child molesters to serve as little as 30 days in jail.
>
> https://www.avoiceformen.com/avfm-editorial/unequal-justice-in-maine-paul-cavanaugh/
>
> Three of the 4 senior prosecutors in Cavanaugh's office, including the head DA, were disciplined by the Board of Overseers of the BAR for prosecutorial misconduct. Paul Cavanaugh has publicly defended the prosecutorial misconduct, shifting the blame to local law enforcement and the victims.
>
> http://www.mebaroverseers.org/dah_schedule/decisions.html?id=464815
>
> http://www.mebaroverseers.org/dah_schedule/decisions.html?id=651336
>
> http://www.mebaroverseers.org/dah_schedule/decisions.html?id=651347
>
> Cavanaugh is now being sued for in an unprecedented Federal Civil Rights lawsuit brought by one of the innocent men Cavanaugh sent to jail. The man was later fully exonerated after it was discovered that the court ordered evidence of the man's innocence was withheld.
>
> Now, Paul Cavanaugh could avoid an election and get Governor LePage to just appointment him District Attorney of Prosecutorial District 6 and its four Counties! If he is appointed, he will likely rehire disgraced prosecutor Mary Kellett and rejoin disciplined prosecutor Bill Entwisle to continue the culture of misconduct for which they were all run out of Prosecutorial District 7 in 2014.

> This is bad for the Maine justice system and the people of Knox, Lincoln, Sagadahoc, and Waldo counties who don't know what is about to be done to them.
>
> Paul Cavanaugh MUST NOT be appointed DA by Governor LePage!
>
> Please sign the Petition and e-mail it to Governor LePage TODAY demanding that he NOT appoint Paul Cavanaugh as DA over the people of Knox, Lincoln, Sagadahoc, and Waldo counties!
>
> Governor LePage's E-mail:
>
> http://www.maine.gov/governor/lepage/citizen_services/ideas-suggestions.shtml

Xiaxue: Why I am not a Feminist

AVfM Video Source · 28 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Bogart: a man going his own way

Doug Mortimer · 28 April 2017 · Archived copy · Original

> I hope they don't hang you, precious, by that sweet neck. Yes, angel, I'm gonna send you over. The chances are you'll get off with life. That means if you're a good girl, you'll be out in 20 years. I'll be waiting for you. If they hang you, I'll always remember you.

Thus spake Humphrey Bogart, shunning the love of his life and handing the murderess over to the authorities in The Maltese Falcon. Arguably, it is the greatest MGTOW moment in movie history (the conclusion of A Boy and His Dog is a close second). One wonders if misogyny trigger warnings precede screenings at college film societies.

Curiously, the Bogart screen persona was highly unlikely given his background. Like James Cagney and George Raft, two of his partners in crime in Warner Brothers' gangster films, Bogart was a native New Yorker. He was not a product of the tenements, however. Far from it.

Bogart's stated birth date of Christmas Day, 1899, is doubtful, but we can say he was born more or less at the turn of the 20th Century to a prominent family. His father, Belmont DeForest Bogart, was a descendant of patroons, the original Dutch settlers of New York and New Jersey. His mother Maud Humphrey Bogart, had ancestors who came over on the Mayflower. The Bogarts lived on the tony Upper West Side of Manhattan.

Bogart's parents had more going for them than family trees with deep roots in America. Belmont Bogart was a cardiopulmonary surgeon. Maud Bogart was a famous commercial illustrator. An urban legend asserted that she used young Humphrey as the model for the Gerber baby food label. In truth, she did use him as a model, but for a baby food brand that was popular in his infancy (Gerber was not founded till 1928).

Maud Bogart was a suffragette, a celebrated career woman of her day. Her husband was well compensated but she made far more than he did, which may or may not have played a part in his opioid addiction. Humphrey and his two sisters were not exactly awash in maternal love, which may offer a hint as to why he was so convincingly wary of dames on screen. "I can't say I ever loved my mother," he observed. "I admired her." Fittingly, Bogart's obituary in the New York Herald-Tribune in 1957 stated that "Mothers never held him up to children as their ideal."

Bogart attended, and flunked out of Phillips Andover Academy, an uber-elite Massachusetts prep school (his father's alma mater) founded in 1778. He served in the Navy without distinction during World War I and got into acting after his discharge. He was a working actor, on Broadway throughout the 1920s, and in Hollywood starting in the 1930's.

In film roles, for the most part, he started out as a heavy, so he was not expected to get the girl – or even to court the girl. That is the province of the leading man. Fittingly, Bogart's filmography table on Wikipedia does not include a category for leading ladies until 1941 when The Maltese Falcon was released.

That same year Bogart enjoyed another breakthrough role in High Sierra. As Roy "Mad Dog" Earle, Bogart was a gangster who took pity on a crippled girl and paid for an operation to correct her problem in an ill-fated attempt to win her over. Another case of white-knighting gone awry.

High Sierra was in fact Bogart's first true starring role. The Petrified Forest (1936) is often cited as his first big part, but his portrayal of gangster Duke Mantee, a role he originated in the play of the same name on Broadway, was in truth a supporting role. When the film came out, the names above the title were Leslie Howard and Bette Davis.

Despite Bogie's lack of luck with women in 1941 releases, the next year, he starred in Casablanca, which is widely viewed as one of the most, if not the most, romantic movie ever made. Bogart starts out as a MGTOW ("I'm the only cause I'm interested in" and "I stick my neck out for nobody") scrupulously remaining neutral while World War II swirls around him. Then he re-ignites an old flame (Ingrid Bergman) whose husband is a Czech resistance leader and ends up sacrificing his self-interest for the cause. Bogie bows to the collective – not by committing to a woman but by giving her up so she can assist her husband!

While Bogart often played opposite A-list actresses, they were never able to dominate him on screen. When he had relationships, they were hardly of the tradcon sort. For the most part, his lot was that of an existential loner.

The late André Bazin, an influential French film critic, commented, "His existential maturity…little by little transforms life into a tenacious irony at the expense of death." Author Truman Capote, who met Bogart in 1952 when they were working on Beat the Devil, described him as "permanently lonely."

Raymond Chandler, author of The Big Sleep, observed that all Bogart had to do to dominate a scene was to enter it. Appropriately enough, the title of Stefan Kanfer's 2011 Bogart biography was Tough Without a Gun.

Bogart's roles did not always glorify the tough guy/loner types. On the positive side, he portrayed self-sufficient types (The Maltese Falcon, The Big Sleep) with no illusions about women or anything else; at the negative end of the spectrum, he was equally convincing as a paranoiac (Treasure of the Sierra Madre and The Caine Mutiny) or a psychopath (In a Lonely Place).

One of his best known films was The African Queen (1951), a contrived middle-aged romance co-starring Katharine Hepburn. This is a sterling example of the romance sub-genre in which a man and a woman start out with nothing in common, are at loggerheads in terms of personality, politics, or class, and maybe even hate each other's guts, but fall into each other's arms by the end of the movie. Happens every day, right?

Sabrina in 1954 was also a highly unlikely match-up, as it paired off Bogart with Audrey Hepburn, who was half his age – he was 54 years and looked it; she was 27 and looked even younger. Bogart felt he was miscast (Cary Grant, the first choice, would have been a better fit) but the movie was a hit. Ironically, even though Bogart was to the manor born, he just didn't look like the scion of an old-money Long Island family.

In real life, the thrice-married (Helen Menken, Mary Philips, and Mayo Methot – actresses all) Bogart didn't experience marital bliss till he married Lauren Bacall, a teenager when she met Bogart on the set of To Have and Have Not in 1944, and fashion model just off the plane from New York.

Somehow Bogart managed to rob the cradle without getting pinched by the morality police. Since Bacall had a husky voice and appeared much more mature and worldly wise – in other words, sexually experienced – than other women her age, the incongruity of the relationship was less conspicuous. In their movies together, the others were The Big Sleep, Dark Passage, and Key Largo, one never gets the feeling that Bogie is making it with someone young enough to be his daughter.

The real life marriage of Bogie and Baby, as Bacall was called, caught the public's fancy. While Bogart was occasionally paired up with a leading lady in a movie, he was never a family guy. The same was true in real life. He was pushing 50 when he learned he was going to be a father. So from then on it was Bogie and Baby and babies. Perhaps he had mellowed a bit.

Even so, Bogart's lone wolf image prevailed on screen. He looked incomplete without a cigarette dangling from his mouth or a drink in his hand. Film-maker/film historian Peter Bogdanovich once observed Bogart going out of his way to pick up a cocktail glass before he answered the door. Arguably, his death from throat cancer in 1957 was the price he paid for maintaining that image.

Sixty years after Bogart's death, one wonders whether or not it is possible to fashion a career as a MGTOW leading man. Even in Bogart's day, it wasn't easy. Note that the only time Bogart won an Oscar was in 1951 when he and Katharine Hepburn were matched up in The African Queen. In Hollywood as in society at large, if you seek validation, sooner or later you must acknowledge gynocentrism.

Today we have no shortage of action movies and tough guys, but they're no match for Bogart. He didn't need to bulk up with steroids to fill up the screen, and I'm pretty sure he never had a personal trainer or studied martial arts. His dominance had nothing to do with being buff. "Physically, I'm not tough," he said. "I may think tough. I would say I'm kinda tough and calloused inside."

In past eras, physical toughness might have been an asset, but it is of little survival value in a high tech world. Mental and emotional toughness are essential to manhood and always have been.

That's why Bogart became an icon. That's why he remains one today.

Victims are 'to be believed' and their cases referred to trial

Michael Conzachi · 1 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, an Air Force appellate court decision came down in the case of the U.S. vs. Airman First Class Brandon T. Wright (1). A1C Wright was charged with several counts of sexual assault in 2013, involving his female supervisor a noncommissioned officer from his duty section, following a shopping trip and an evening of watching movies and drinking, in July of 2012 in Italy. The GCMCA for these charges was then, Lieutenant General Craig Franklin, the Commander of Third Air Force.

Then Lieutenant General Franklin; who has since retired as a 'two-star' drew previous intense criticism and the wrath of Senator's Gillibrand and McCaskill; among others, because he dared to dismiss the sexual assault conviction of former Lieutenant Colonel James Wilkerson, in which Franklin; after intense review of all transcripts and consultation with his legal staff (2). The reason for his dismissal was that he determined that the case lacked sufficient probable cause and evidence, and believed that the alleged victim lacked credibility (3).

In the Wright case, LTG Franklin, after the Article 32 (preliminary) Hearing which included testimony from the alleged victim, the Article 32 Hearing Officer recommended that charges NOT be referred to court-martial. The primary reason was the victim's lack of credibility and that a friend of the accused provided information that in his opinion, the sexual encounter was completely consensual. This friend alluded to, that he could hear the accuser in another room moan in sexual pleasure. Two additional staff judge advocates as well as three additional staff judge advocates for the special court-martial convening authority agreed with that decision.

After SIX (6) Air Force Attorneys (judge advocates) all agreed that the alleged victim lacked credibility and an investigating officer recommended that the case NOT go forward, it was submitted to LTG Franklin. He then agreed with that decision and dismissed the charges.

Shortly after that action, The Judge Advocate General of the Air Force (TJAG), Lt Gen Richard Harding, spoke telephonically with LTG Franklin's staff judge advocate, Colonel Joseph Bialke.

Here is the incredulous part and a full admission by THE Judge Advocate of the Air Force; Lieutenant General Richard Harding, made the following statement;

According to Col Bialke, Lt Gen Harding stated the following:

> "the failure to refer the case to trial would place the Air Force in a difficult position with Congress; absent a "smoking gun," victims are to be believed and their cases referred to trial; and dismissing the charges without meeting with the named victim violated an Air Force regulation."

[image]
Lt Gen Richard Harding

The case then meandered through several high-ranking officials and staff judge advocate personnel. On March 25th, 2014, Wright's defense counsel filed a 45-page motion for unlawful command influence, defective preferral, and defective referral, with 390 pages of attachments.

For the unlawful command influence aspect of the motion, the defense argued that a quote, "toxic" atmosphere existed with regard to sexual assaults in the military which, when coupled with pressure to increase prosecutions and convictions, created an environment in which no military accused facing sexual assault charges would be treated fairly. "

The defense contended, "the level of toxicity and pressure had reached an unprecedented level in the appellee's case."

There were other arguments that are contained in the link, but we can see the ferocity in which the military; in this case, the Air Force was hell bent to prosecute and convict A1C Wright by any means necessary, and shows first-hand the complete cowardice of the Air Force Judge Advocate; Lieutenant General Richard Harding.

Imagine the groveling and trembling fear of the man who is supposed to be; in essence, the attorney general of the Air Force; who was in such a state of fear of Congress, that he exerted his command influence in order to insure that A1C Wright was convicted despite the evidence and the alleged victim's complete lack of credibility; a lack of credibility that was recognized and affirmed by SIX Air Force prosecutors!!!

A1C Wright was eventually acquitted of all charges (4) however there is no information available if he was retained in the Air Force.

It has been learned that LTG Harding retired on April 1st, 2014 and now assists universities and interest groups in eradicating campus sexual assaults, with 'successful lessons learned from combating military sexual assaults.' He serves on the Advisory Council of the National Crime Victims' Legal Institute.

'Successful?' Really; 'Successful?' The only 'successful thing about this case, was that after beginning a saga in the summer of 2012; a saga in which the top lawyer in the Air Force quipped in perhaps a trembling tone, that victims are to be believed, and boo-hoo, we are getting pressure from congress; A1C Wright was eventually acquitted of charges that should have never been brought in the first place.

What kind of success did A1C Wright enjoy during his three plus years, while his case meandered through the military legal system, chain of command and the appellate courts? What kind of success did his psyche enjoy? How many thousands or tens of thousands of dollars did he have to expend to clear his name? What 'success' has he enjoyed in his life?

This case is just one of countless others that does reinforce that there IS an epidemic related to sexual assault in the military. The epidemic however IS NOT sexual assault but is;

- Unlawful Command Influence
- The EPIDEMIC of False Allegations of Sexual Assault
- Gross Prosecutorial Misconduct
- Gross Military Law Enforcement Misconduct
- The False Narrative of Always Believe the Victim
- The Enticing Potential Victims with Lavish Lifetime Compensatory Financial Benefits
- The Failure to Look for Evidence of Innocence
- The Failure of Military Prosecutors to Comply with Discovery Obligations
- The Witch Hunt to Prosecute ALL Allegations Regardless of Truth or Validity

The case of Airman First Class Brandon Wright, is just another; I mean another,,, another,,, yes,,, another in a seemingly endless list of cases, in which the only actual crimes committed were by those who were in the decision making process to convict and send to prison, a man who is innocent (5).

When will it stop; when will those responsible for these miscarriages of justice be held responsible; when will the Senate and House Armed Services Committees enact some legislation to put a stop to this lunacy? It's unknown, but we must remember that there are many more A1C Brandon Wrights out there and many sitting in cells.

So what's your thoughts? What do YOU think the real epidemic lies?

While I will admit that sexual assaults in the military do happen, and when they do, those responsible should and must be punished and those actual victims should be afforded the services and financial assistance they deserve.

What we are seeing now however, is an avalanche; an avalanche of false allegations, witch hunts, prosecutorial misconduct and unlawful command influence; all in the name of appeasing the rape culture hysteric cottage industry and their enablers in the legislature.

When; in God's green earth, will a false accuser; a liar, be sanctioned? When; in God's green earth, will a corrupt, disingenuous prosecutor, law enforcement agent or commander be held accountable for their misdeeds?

Our military men face intense danger in the battlefield, but also face intense danger of experiencing the wrath of the military's sexual assault witch hunt, and those actual victims are harmed by the wonton lies of false accusers and torch and pitch fork carrying commanders and prosecutors.

References:

[1] https://www.courtlistener.com/opinion/2770475/united-states-v-wright/

[2] https://www.washingtonpost.com/world/national-security/air-force-general-criticized-for-handling-of-sexual-assault-cases-to-retire/2014/01/08/9942df96-787d-11e3-b1c5-739e63e9c9a7_story.html?utm_term=.89cf0881f191

[3] http://apps.washingtonpost.com/g/page/world/general-defends-decision-in-sex-assault-case/704/

[4] http://www.caaflog.com/2015/10/29/airman-wright-acquitted/

[5] http://www.rokdrop.net/2015/11/100689/

The social experience of ICMI

John Smith · 1 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The decision to attend the Second International Conference on Men's Issues was easy. It was being held in London, in July. Thats just a hop across the water, at holiday time. I could get to there, so I would get there.

The obvious draw was the list of speakers, the who's who of the men's rights movement were to be put on a stage one after another, but as I was to find out, this was a conference where just actually being there outweighed the insights held within the speeches. That is not to undermine insights of the speakers, but an understanding of the reality. Every speech, from the opening by Erin Pizzy to the closing from Paul Elam will be available on youtube shortly, hence I will not go into those now, but instead into the experience of thousands of conversations between and after the speeches could only be accessed by being there.

The conference did not contain organized "break out" sessions, there were however twenty minute breaks between speakers that allowed attendees time to mingle over coffee. The speakers were freely available during these times however the conversation rarely centered on their work, and the reasons behind that is entirely rational. We, the attendees had come to hear first hand the voices that we bring to our homes via the internet.

When you begin talking to people like Karen Straughan (Girl Writes What) with 129,400 subscribers to her youtube channel or Sage Gerard, the founder of KSU/Zen Men or Lucian Valsan who has a weekly radio show about men's interests in Europe, and therefore have both been bringing forward content for years through various mediums, it quickly becomes clear both parties in that conversation know what they are about. What these people are interested in is what we, the attendees are up to, what brought us to the movement and the conference. This was both logical and surprising. However the interest in what others were doing was a common theme in all the conversations between the attendees.

The level of interest shown in others at the conference was one of the striking features. The other was what happened at the end of each day. The conference did not so much close for the day as relocate to the bar of the local hotels. As it was held at London's ExCel Center which is quite out of the way both speakers and attendees were scattered across a few hotels. The conversation became slightly less formal (if that was possible !) and people mingled into the night.

On the evening before the conference I met another attendee, Luke, who has became a friend for life over the space of the conference. We were walking into the hotel and the whole AVFM team were having dinner. We were remarking how surreal the situation was. It is rare in life people have such close access to people you normally only access through the content they provide. It is akin to a back stage pass with the Rolling Stones/Black Sabbath/The Who (delete as appropriate or insert your own). A small hour later everyone was chatting as equals. There are two main reasons for that transformation.

As another friend I had talked to online and met up with at the conference, Angelo remarked, the average IQ in the room was well above average. The other reason can be found in Paul Ealm's speech on the last day. When Paul spoke about the need for men to insist that women step down from the pedestal, that we embrace equality with them but not their privilege. To tell them they are valued, but not more so than their brothers, fathers, husbands and sons. Also that women must insist men dismount their white horses, that they must see women as capable and responsible people, it is clear that those sentiments went beyond the male female dynamic.

[image]

This movement is about true equality, it is about understanding that people carrying out different roles can be equally valued, that everything we do on a day to day basis is important, and there is a real difference between the words "different" and "lesser". The top table of the Mens Rights Movement are leading from the front on this. They have not only stepped off any pedestal that they may have been placed upon, but taken sledge hammer to that pedestal. Yes, I/we fully respect the people who are at the top of the movement and stand on the stage. We admire them and draw inspiration from them, but we do not “Look up” to them. We look them in the eye, as they do us, to do otherwise would be both unwanted and disrespectful.

This year’s gathering is being held from the 9th to the 11th June on the Australian Gold Coast. It will open with Cassie Jaye presenting The Red Pill Movie with a live Q&A similar to the opening in New York. I stood alone in my living room and applauded Cassie’s closing quote to the film when I bought it on iTunes. The chance to to see it in a surrounded by members of the movement in a country where it has been heavily opposed, followed up by a Hangi (Traditional New Zealand Bar’b’que) and two days of speeches and and socializing got under my skin.

The list of speakers includes names I know such as Paul Elam, Erin Pizzey, Karen Straughan, Janice Fiamengo, and Mike Buchanan. Complemented by names I do not know such as clinical psychologist Bettina Arndt, founding member of the All India Men’s Welfare Association, Uma Challa and former Australian politician Mark Latham who now hosts The Outsiders, an Australian television news and commentary program broadcast weekly on Sky News Australia.

I began changing my question from “could I afford to go” to “could I afford to miss the opportunity”. That’s when I booked my flights. I can get there, so I will get there. I’m going to a land down under and looking forward to making lots of new friends.

For more information see International Conference on Men’s Issues – 2017

Alison Tieman Exposed

AVfM Video Source · 2 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Poisoning the wells from which our young girls drink

Mark Dent · 2 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Last year I wrote an article titled Girls Feelings Are Far More Important Than The Truth for Jasmin Newman's Relating to Men website

It was based upon the "shock" and "dismay" expressed by so many prominent feminists in our education system when they read the results of a survey given to Victorian schoolgirls. The survey indicated that the overwhelming majority of girls believed they were treated unfairly in our society and that boys and men were privileged. Apparently, they don't survey boys.

My article questioned their surprise at the outcome of the survey given the fact that they force feed the girls a steady diet of lies about their oppression and victim status in society.

The latest news to catch my eye here in the feminist state of Victoria is the fact that:

> "feminist collectives" are springing up across the country as young women are presented with a grim picture of gender equality by a new wave of education programs that place "white male privilege" and "hegemonic masculinity" at the root of family violence.'
>
> Many High schools throughout Victoria have established feminist collectives or clubs in recent times. Internationally, schools in Argentina, Brazil and Berlin have taken up the Fitzroy High School's (from here in Victoria) Feminist Collective's teaching resource, Fightback, despite concerns it simplifies the issue of violence in the community and potentially alienates men and boys.

The Australian (major newspaper) reported :

> teachers are being encouraged to develop feminist collectives as part of the Victorian governments $21 million Respectful Relationships program to tackle family violence.

This program has nothing to do with respectful relationships. It is only about preaching that all females deserve and should be given respect, regardless of how they behave. Why don't they at least have the guts to call this program what it is? Remember how they changed the title of Women's Studies and renamed it Gender Studies? Of course, now we all believe it is a fair and accurate examination and study of the difficulties encountered by both genders as they try to make their way through life. Gutless and deceitful. What an ugly combination.

Independent schools like Korowa Anglican Girls School in Melbourne (just one of several schools introducing the idea of feminist collectives) is a school where girls from affluent families are given access to the highest quality education in the state. They are achieving outstanding results in statewide testing yet they are encouraging the girls to believe they are somehow disadvantaged and oppressed. At the very same time their dads and mums are paying exorbitant fees to see their daughters receive advantages most boys could only dream about. Sadly, the girls seem to believe they are being crushed by the patriarchy. I checked their website to see just how crushed and disadvantaged these girls are.

If it were not so shocking the sheer irony of the situation it would be hysterically funny. For some reason I can't even muster a slight grin.

It breaks my heart to think of the damage these manipulative, hate filled misandrists are doing to the young women in their care. They are deliberately force feeding the girls a steady diet of deceitful lies and poisonous propaganda to convince them that they are oppressed and the victims of a world which hates and shuns them because they have a vagina. This, in my view, is child abuse. They are condemning these girls to a life based on ignorance, self-entitlement and hate.

This program also presents their brothers, fathers, boyfriends and other significant male figures in their lives as privileged, pampered and powerful. The many men in their lives are seen as people who are contributing to their role as a victim.

What chance does any young man have when expressing his pain, his sense of grief over broken dreams or frustrated ambition to a girl who has been indoctrinated with this hateful filth? She will be entirely deaf to any male who attempts to speak of the obstacles and hardships in his life. We know the media and our governments do not give a fuck about the lives and wellbeing of its men and boys, but when it comes to personal relationships, you would hope individuals may find solace in the company of a compassionate female. There are still many such females in our country but their number will surely decline the wider this bigoted bullshit is spread in our education system.

Let me just provide you with some of the subject matter the girls will examine when gathered in their collectives.

> Designed to educate students about negative attitudes that contribute to high rates of sexism and discrimination and ultimately, violence against women, Fightback, paints a worrying picture of inequality.
>
> In one activity, students are told there are "common perceptions" about equality, including that women are already equal, that we are in a post feminist era or that men suffer inequality too. [My emphasis].

I confess to being a very passionate and expressive person so visceral reactions to words and images are common for me. That bolded phrase felt like a punch in my guts. The Fightback Program is telling the girls that the idea that men or boys suffer inequality is a myth. Can you believe it? One half of humanity never encounters injustice, betrayal, loss, hatred or abuse simply because they were born with a penis. To be honest, any young girl who can sit through these sessions and not realize how obscene and absurd the basic premise of the program is, will most likely be beyond the reach of logical argument and cold facts.

Oh, and here are some of the slam dunks offered up as proof of their ideological poison.

> Students are shown statistics on the pay gap between the sexes and women's representation in politics, business, sport and film and are asked: So, are we equal?

Can you believe they still bring up the pay gap? It is like a zombie-no matter how many times you think you have ended his life he finds a way to rise and raise his ugly, rotting visage sending you scampering after that shotgun yet again.

So, the adage about equal opportunity not leading to equal outcomes doesn't get raised? Do they present the girls with statistics on workplace death and injury, suicide, ever declining rates of males graduating at our universities, degree of harshness in sentencing for the genders for the same crime? How about the fact that boys and men have no reproductive rights and are almost certain to lose their house and kids should their marriage come to an end simply because they are male? Maybe we could mention the funding for female health compared to funding for men or the funding for and recognition of male victims of domestic violence in comparison to the money and attention given to women. No reference to the idea of choice influencing the numbers of females in the professions mentioned? No.

"So boys, are we equal?"

Again, you either laugh or cry. They teach the girls that they are disadvantaged by being a female and deliberately held back by men and then squeal in feigned horror when the same girls are surveyed and the results tell them the young women in their care feel disadvantaged and victimized! De ja vu anyone?

It is so unbelievably mind numbing I cannot comprehend that this is the reality in my beloved home state.

This program has the full support of the Victorian Labor Government (as feminized a government as you will find anywhere in the world). The Education Minister, James Merlino praised the program:

> I always encourage students to pursue interests they are passionate about and to lead student projects and organizations.

I wonder how encouraging James would be if young men wished to set up collectives that raised issues of concern for men and boys? I think his enthusiasm for students who wish to pursue interests they feel passionately about would be severely tested. An interesting side note. I knew James when he was just Jamie-a boy in my grade six class about 33 years ago. He was a lovely kid.

We have exchanged a few emails in which we have remembered our time together with warmth and fondness but when I have pushed him hard on his government's stand on domestic violence and their complete lack of compassion or empathy for men and boys or just an acknowledgement of the facts about female violence, James becomes the politician and deftly feeds me the party line. It hurts.

I will never understand how any person of heart and intelligence could so coldly and deliberately place the wellbeing of one gender above that of another, particularly when such an approach is justified with nothing but lies and barely camouflaged hatred and contempt. It seems there are many such people in our education system here in Victoria.

There was a time when teachers spoke about 'people' and their rights. We had a simple message which spoke of respect for others and their differences. Now, our education system deliberately divides us into gender tribes and makes the chances of empathy and compassion between men and women, boys and girls almost insurmountable. This is a heartbreaking reality and the irony is that such programs can only lead to further conflict within relationships and the broader community.

References:

http://www.abc.net.au/health/features/stories/2013/06/13/3781044.htm
http://www.oneinthree.com.au/https://www.allianz.com.au/life-insurance/news/fatalities-in-the-workplace https://www.sentencingcouncil.vic.gov.au/sites/default/files/publication-documents/Gender%20Differences%20in%20Sentencing%20Outcomes.pdf http://thoughtcatalog.com/janet-bloomfield/2014/05/heres-why-men-should-have-the-reproductive-rights-that-women-have/https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hegemonic_masculinity http://www.who.int/bulletin/volumes/92/8/13-132795/en/

Book review: “The Silent Man”

Jon Levy · 2 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Author and therapist Patsy B. Evans (writing as Dr. Harmony) dedicates her new book, “The Silent Man: Uncovering the Hidden Epidemic of Domestic Violence Against Men,” with a quote by Václav Havel, the Soviet dissident and first president of the liberated Czech Republic: “You do not become a ‘dissident’ just because you decide one day. . . . It begins as an attempt to do your work well, and ends with being branded an enemy of society.”

Of her own experience, Evans writes, “I have gotten a lot of criticism for my advocacy of men in both the intimate partner violence area and in the custody and family court system. Many women have called me a traitor to my gender. . . . I do not believe I chose to write this book, but instead, I think the culture of abused men wanted me to advocate, educat[e] and help these survivors have a voice.” She hopes to “teach men how to help themselves even when the world tells them that they can’t.”

Writing from years of experience as a therapist, Evans touches on many of the challenges facing male victims of abuse, including the “massive public ignorance of the problem.” “Men struggle,” she writes, “with shame due to the expectations of our culture and its gender role bias, so it isn’t surprising that a man who is being abused may not reach out for help, let alone have the ability to find support services. Even if they do [reach out], chances are likely they are going to be turned away. . . .”

Among numerous examples, Evans describes a man who came to her after previous treatment by a male therapist. The patient was a stay-at-home father, financially dependent on his wife, who had abused him for years, physically, emotionally, and sexually. She had isolated him from friends and family, forbade him from working outside the home, and used threats of denying him contact with their son if he ever tried to leave the relationship. Yet his first therapist told him that it was impossible for a woman to abuse a man, and he should be grateful for what he had.

Evans notes male abuse victims to be “usually very successful,” intelligent people who “are often natural caregivers and very empathetic. Many subscribe to the ‘Prince Charming’ concept and look for women that they can rescue. . . . They also have a tendency to be male feminists” who “support, respect, and love strong women.” Ironically, these generous, trusting attributes make them most vulnerable.

Among the recurring features of female-on-male domestic abuse, Evans notes: a tendency to use weapons violently; taking advantage of men’s reluctance to hit back; using children as pawns, aided by bias in the family courts; female abusers’ ease in portraying themselves as victims, and having law enforcement take their side; passive aggressive abuse through exaggerated performance of weakness and dependence; harassment of new wives/girlfriends of former partners; and men’s isolation, fear, shame, and lack of support.

In closing, Evans points out that her efforts are not intended to “decrease the importance of female victims.” One wonders how many authors of treatises on abused women feel obliged to issue corollary caveats.

John Apostol, MD of Federal Way, WA "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 2 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]John Apostol, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Under "About," we read about Dr. Apostol and his philosophy of care:

"'I chose to work in pediatric medicine because I wanted to care for the whole family. I enjoy building relationships with my patients and their families, watching them grow as the years go by. I believe the physician should care for the whole family when treating a child. My goal is to provide care and to advise my patients and families to obtain their optimal health. I focus on disease prevention and family education.'

For fun, Dr. Apostol loves to spend time with his wife Alison and his three daughters. He stays active by golfing, running, biking, traveling, gardening and working on home-improvement projects when needed."

When you ritually and routinely circumcise a baby, you're not "treating" the child or preventing "disease," you're abusing and mutilating him.

Doctor, listen to the many men who are not happy with what you do.

Here's a video from Dr. Apostol's office telling us that their goal is to "keep your family healthy, safe, and happy." That is assuming it's "safe" to allow strange people to fondle and mutilate your baby's genitals, and that he's "happy" to have this done – just look at his smile while he gets cut.

Glad to see the doctors stress the importance of reading, so when those infants can read they can read about the reasons for their disfigurement and mutilation: money and ignorance.

Under "Services" and "Circumcision" (spelled "curcumcision" in the url) we see who does the cutting, and on video, there's Dr. Apostol's colleague talking about how you should swaddle your baby after he uses a tourniquet on his penis, and how you can watch it happen, because he "has nothing to hide."

Here's the video on YouTube:

Since Dr. Apostol has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Apostol's practice information follows:

Federal Way Office
34503 9th Ave. S, Suite 220
Federal Way, WA 98003
253-927-3243 (tel)
253-952-3062 (fax)

> John Apostol, MD of Federal Way, WA "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/E2Mblo2tVj #MGM #circumcision #intactivism pic.twitter.com/yDvFf00Iao
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 2, 2017

Bronze girl needs to go

Terrence Longmont · 4 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The sculptor of the famous “Charging Bull” statue near Wall Street has called upon the city to remove the new bronze girl from the scene. The girl, by artist Kristen Visbal, was added on March 7, as a promotion coinciding with International Women’s Day, and was planned to remain only one week, before mayor Bill de Blasio extended her stay for at least a year.

Arturo Di Modica’s Charging Bull is among the most popular pieces of public art in the United States. Perfectly located on a cobble-stone corner a block from the New York Stock Exchange, it perfectly symbolizes the free market: powerful, wild, and less than tamable. A perfect match of object, place, and meaning.

Di Modica was inspired by the 1987 stock-market crash to create a symbol of the “strength and power of the American People.” Working outside the public eye, he spent approximately $350,000 to craft the massive, 7,100 pound, 18 foot long bull. Secretly, Di Modica staked out a location in downtown Manhattan, even timing out the frequency of police patrols, so he knew how quickly he had to work. Then, in the early morning hours of December 15, 1989, without any notice to the city, he and a crew trucked the bull into the Manhattan and installed it as a piece of guerilla art. The city removed it briefly but, in response to public adoration of the statue, soon gave it a permanent home in Bowling Green park on the southern end of Broadway.

Charging Bull became a crowning achievement for Di Modica. His chutzpa, daring, and risk was rewarded as his statue became an iconic symbol of capitalism’s energy and strength. That is, until March 7, 2017 when a second statue was placed in dialog with it, deliberately changing the bull’s meaning, and undermine its artistic purpose.

The investment firm State Street Global Advisors dreamt up the bronze girl as an advertisement for its “Gender Diversity Index Fund” (Nasdaq ticker symbol “SHE”) which its website describes as focusing on “companies that are leaders within their respective industry sectors in advancing women through gender diversity on their boards of directors and in senior leadership positions.”

State Street commissioned Kristen Visbal to make the girl sculpture, and obtained a one-week city permit to place it just feet from the bull’s nose, and directly in the path of its charge. The diminutive girl stands in a sun dress, hands on hips, feet apart, eyes front, looking like a youngster demanding ice cream. On the ground before her lies a plaque reading, “Know the power of women in leadership. SHE makes a difference.” Artistically, the girl’s positioning drains the bull’s power, reducing it to an oversized house pet. The girl’s material and finish match the bull’s, assuring that the viewer absorbs them as a pair.

[image]Visbal has dubbed the statue, “Fearless Girl,” though a more revealing name might have been, “The Girl You Can’t Say No To,” or even “Neoteny in Bronze.” Intended to evoke strength and resolve, Visbal’s girl falls short. Compare, for example, another statute on the same theme, the Martin Luther King memorial. Dr. King is chiseled from stone, arms crossed, emerging from one end of a mountainous slice of granite.

Without words, the monument declares that no force could push King back. From the front, he may look like merely a man, but his back is strengthened by massive tons of rock.

Not so, the girl. The bull could crush her easily her under its feet. Her supposed fearlessness is actually just confidence in the bull’s sympathy and deference. You wouldn’t trample a girl, would you? The girl is a derivative piece of art. It has no juice of its own, only what it steals from the bull.

Distraught over Visbal’s girl, Di Modica has importuned the city and threatened legal action. Through his lawyer, Di Modica has argued that the girl nullifies Charging Bull’s “positive, optimistic message,” and transforms it “into a negative force and a threat.” The Visual Artists Rights Act gives artists protections against unauthorized alterations and modifications of their works, but, because it applies only to art made after its 1990 enactment, Charging Bull was installed just one year too soon to be protected.

This leaves Di Modica appealing that respect be accorded to the integrity of his work and his legacy as an artist. Such respect and consideration appears to be lacking, as a change.org petition to make the bronze girl permanent now stands at over 37,000 votes.

Visbal's girl is revealing as a piece of feminist art, intended to protest male dominance of top Wall Street positions. But why use a child form? It could have been an adult woman, a matadorres, a warrior capable of confronting and defeating the bull, but instead it is a little girl, whose only power is that she is precious. This is how feminists wage battle: neither direct nor honest, but instead playing the damsel, leveraging their performance of vulnerability, abusing men's good intentions, knowing that men can't resist their pouts.

Mayor de Blasio certainly can't. In response to bull artist Di Modica's complaint, de Blasio tweeted on April 12, 2017, "Men who don't like women taking up space are exactly why we need the Fearless Girl." Apparently, Di Modica must either love the statue or hate women. He cannot even defend the integrity of his own art. The girl not only deprives the bull of its power, but also changes its symbolism, so that it now represents the Wall Street banking establishment, rather than the free market itself.

For now, the government of New York "stands with women," even poorly conceived bronze ones. Ironically, the decision to leave her in place is an example of the precise things she accidentally signifies: the power of spoiled insistence in a world that can't bear to see a woman sad.

Time to stop bickering and start understanding

Tim Patten · 4 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A battle against dads is underway in the United States where there reigns confusion and conflicting expectations about how household responsibilities should be divvied up. This regularly leads to rancorous negotiations, resentment and bickering among couples that are raising children together. The general perception is that fathers are deficient in picking up suitable household chores. In fact, many women's groups maintain that fathers are patriarchal oppressors of their women who decide to stay home and look after the children. They say that a significant percentage of husbands and fathers are not "pitching in" on the domestic front (provoking supposedly justified complaints from their other halves). Other surveys find that men are the reason why an average couple bickers an estimated 2,455 times a year. No wonder there is a modern liberation movement called Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). These views are not only wrong and unfair, but also fail to take account of biological realities that would likely improve matters for all concerned.

If one looks under the hood, so to speak, of the traditional marriage arrangement –the husband, "Tom," goes to work while his wife, "Mary," and their two young children, remain at home – there is little equality, as such. Typically, family members assume their gender binary roles without thinking about differences in male-female brain circuitry. Among these is the way in which challenging situations are dealt with, which is exemplified by the joke about a couple getting lost in the big city: typically, he prefers to look at a map, while she favors asking somebody for directions.

Biological Imperatives

Broadly speaking, biological imperatives play a key role in how people interact with the world. In Tom's case, he is driven by a solution-oriented or problem-solver mindset. His family's survival (as well as his own needs) rests on his shoulders. As a father, he will readily sacrifice himself to provide for his family and keep them safe. He maintains an upbeat relationship with colleagues and bosses, takes orders, solves problems, works hard, and puts in extra time and effort when asked. Faced with unexpected financial obligations, he is willing to work overtime and on weekends, or even pick up odd jobs, to ensure they are met.

In Mary's case, her genetic wiring means she approaches life with a networking or people-oriented mindset. She deals with family obligations, including keeping things on an even keel at home, feeds, cleans and nurtures the children, and communicates with her husband, members of their extended families, and friends on a regular basis. She shares problems and sees herself as a social representative, giving a voice, where necessary, to her family and others, and helps attend to the day-to-day needs of those she cares about or is connected to in some way.

The household battlefield

These differences do not necessarily create problems when husbands and wives are engaged in their individual routines, but things can easily become unsettled and difficult when they are together. When Tom heads home, odds are that he, like many workers, will feel the need for revitalization, nurturing and decompression. Mary, meanwhile, will likely be looking forward to communicating and sharing her day with the husband she loves. However, as the following example illustrates, their disparate needs and biological imperatives can turn good intentions into bad outcomes:

Mary's heart soared when Tom walked in. She wanted to be with him. "Welcome home, hon," she said.

"Daddy!" The children ran and greeted him excitedly.

Tom exhaled and targeted a familiar spot to relax – his chair. "It's good to get a rest," he said softly.

"How was work?" Mary tugged at her sleeves, one at a time.

Tom sighed and slumped into the cushion, lowering his eyelids.

Mary rubbed the back of her neck. “I’ve been alone with the kids all day.”

Tom was thinking of a beer.

“Aren’t you happy to see me?” Mary tapped a toe on the floor.

“Yes,” he said, as his shoulders curled inward.

Mary’s neck muscles tightened. “I hoped you would spend time with us.”

“Is there a beer in the kitchen?” he asked.

“Did you hear what I said?”

Tom’s hair hung over his face, hiding his eyes.

“Anyway…I ran into your mother at the dollar store today and she wants to have the kids and us over for lunch this Sunday at 11:00.” Mary snipped as her spine stiffened.

This was something Tom preferred to avoid. His mom and his wife often disagreed, putting him in the middle. He exhaled slowly with a moan. “Okay, I suppose.”

Mary frowned and jabbed one hand towards the kitchen table. “Can you help me here?” she asked.

“I just got home.”

Suddenly, the tension was palpable and the children disappeared into their bedroom.

“I hoped you could watch your daughter while I unpacked the groceries?”

“Sure.”

“Tom!” said Mary, jutting her chin out.

“I just need to rest” Tom said, ignored her nagging.

In only a matter of minutes, they had became locked into their positions. Over time, the bickering increased and became more caustic. Eventually, their feelings for each other diminished and the children suffered.

Things don’t have to end this way. If Tom and Mary had educated themselves on gender-driven mind circuitry, they might have been able to move beyond the sorts of interactions that have, sadly enough, become all too commonplace in today’s world. Indeed, it is likely that the above scene has been repeated countless millions of times, with only the names changed. In the end, one spouse ends up “winning” and ruling by intimidation, while the other has little choice but to submit.

Needless to say, in a world where males have become easy targets, and where self-serving individuals with axes to grind have hijacked gender “equality” for selfish and self-serving purposes, the myth persists that fathers are responsible and therefore they are the ones who must change. But dad, you can fight back with science.

Male and Female Brains

In truth, many problems could be resolved through a better understanding of genetic realities. By discarding the false notions of gender equality theory and embracing our biological differences, there could be greater harmony between men and women. For Tom, knowing that his wife’s brain is oriented toward people networking could help him better understand her needs, motivations and actions. For Mary, being aware that her husband was a solution-oriented problem-solver could be similarly enlightening. With that, their end-of-the-day conversation could look altogether different:

Mary’s heart soared when Tom walked in. She had been with the kids all day and wanted to be with him. But she reminded herself of how focused he is at work and that he needed time to reorient himself.

“Welcome home, hon,” she said. “Hey kids, daddy’s home. Let’s give him time to relax and unwind.”

“Daddy!” the children ran and greeted him excitedly.

Tom exhaled and targeted a familiar spot to relax – his chair. However, he understood that Mary had a long day of running around with the children, cleaning up, shopping and other needs.

“Good to get a rest from work,” he said warmly. “Let me catch up with you in about a half hour.”

Mary smiled. “Can I get you a beer?” she responded.

Tom leaned forward. “I’d love one.”

She wiped her hands and brought him a beer. “Let me know when you’re ready?”

He sipped the drink, closed his eyes, and allowed the day to fade from his mind. After twenty minutes or so, he rose and stretched. “After we eat, I’d like to dry and put the dishes away if you do the washing up?”

Mary used Tom’s shoulder as a shelf, lowered her head and sighed. “That sounds wonderful,” she said.

“Let’s set the table, kids,” Tom rallied his family.

“I’ll get the plates,” the older one announced.

For a moment, Mary’s heart was full; her family was all together helping get dinner ready. “By the way, you’re mother invited us to lunch this Sunday.”

“Okay, but can we make a few ground rules first?”

“Sure.”

“Let’s have lunch and leave within a half hour. We must both promise to limit the conversation to the crazy wig my mom will be wearing.” He smiled.

“Oh, Tom, you’re funny. I understand… no drama. I’m in.”

“I love you for that,” he said, pulling his shoulders back.

The key to understanding

When men and women interact based on an understanding of their differences, it is easy to see that neither males nor females are the problem. Rather, the enemy is ignorance. Our society has become obsessed with the false god of gender equality. Many have been brainwashed into thinking that the inherent disparities represent a battle line between the sexes rather than a way of bringing them together. Once people recognize the mechanisms that influence and drive human needs and behavior, society will see clear improvement in communication and harmony in marriages and relationships.

A new barrier to replacing women with technology

August Løvenskiolds · 5 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A hundred years ago, when women replaced men with vibrating dildos, they discovered, to their great shock, a new problem – without biological men to maintain society's infrastructure and pay for their shoe and food habits, women tended to be worse off even with their Grrreedy Girl 9000 Jungle Buster Max's ($99.99) at hand. So, reluctantly, those ur-white feminists allowed the baby-making to proceed at a diminished rate and, to mollify the distraught women, laws were changed to strip men of their sexual prerogatives, child custody, family security, masculinity, and as much cash as could be squeezed out of them.

Such was the power of women, bringers of pain and delight.

But the story of the liberation of man does not end there. Today, the first of many in the year 2021, marks the first day that both the sexbot AND the artificial human womb have come online, marking the end of the practical significance of biological women. Just as the equine nag became hamburger with the spread of the automobile, so too the human nag's days seem slated for the abattoir.

The programmability of sexbots to levels of precision beyond the simulacra of 2017, plus the debunking of the "copulin" conjecture, sealed the fate of women in most people's minds.

Yet, still, for a few, a lingering doubt remains – what if women have a utility that we have overlooked, as the women a century past had overlooked the essential role of men in continuing civilization? A survey of women's unique skills and abilities seems in order, as a verification that their purported obsolescence is not an exaggeration in the face of the relentless march of technology. .

- Breast milk for infants was once viewed as a natural strength of women, but thanks to the trans folk, it is now seen as unnatural, and anyway, formula feeding, when coupled with masculine attention, is more than sufficient to rear a healthy, masterful son.
- Pornography and erectile dysfunction (E.D.) medicaments have long replaced the real-life female form as a factor in men's sexual release, formerly restricted to real-life encounters with women, and the sexbot has made even the most accomplished biological women pale as a sex partner. Feminists' discouraging of attractiveness in women undermined this source of women's power to an astonishing degree.
- The gestation of children by artificial means is much more reliable than with human women, who abort pregnancies and deny men equal custody at rates well beyond the failure tolerances of even the second-tier beta womb cartels.
- Women's sports. While still paramount in isolated societies like Kekistan, not even women care to watch them.
- Women-led corporations. Pathetic.
- Women's arts. The few women who make compelling paeans to femininity have long been exterminated by feminists.
- Non sexual domestic duties. The Roomba, automatic dishwasher, washing machine, clothes dryer, and sammich delivery services have rendered women redundant in those roles.
- The love that men have for pleasing the ineffable creature that is woman.

This last item may be the one thing still keeping women alive. Specifically, a woman's satisfaction in her man, and especially her sexual satisfaction via orgasm, provides men with a distinct secondary pleasure termed "masculinity achievement", according to research published back in 2017.

Of course, "masculinity achievement" as a gendered term accidentally reveals women's inability for a similar secondary pleasure in causing a man to orgasm, a now debunked female pleasure response once termed "the facial".

For the last 3 years it was believed that women could maintain a modicum of control over men, even as women's overall sexual market value was crashed by sexbot culture, through biological women's orgasms, real or faked, that repeatedly triggered a unique and non-reproducible pleasure in men that would subvert men to women's will. Ironically – or by design? – women's magazine like Cosmo blasted men for "masculinity achievement" even though the ruse of denying a woman's last vestige of control over men was obvious to everyone.

But I have great news! A careful review of the "masculinity achievement" study revealed that the men were not reacting to women's orgasms at all, but rather, to men's own fantasies of women's orgasms:

> To test this, we randomly assigned 810 men (M age = 25.44, SD = 8.31) to read a vignette where they imagined that an attractive woman either did or did not orgasm during a sexual encounter with them. Participants then rated their sexual esteem and the extent to which they would feel masculine after experiencing the given situation. Our results showed that men felt more masculine and reported higher sexual esteem when they imagined that a woman orgasmed during sexual encounters with them, and that this effect was exacerbated for men with high masculine gender role stress. [Emphasis added.]

Clearly, once men learn to fantasize that they are pleasing their sexbots, or, if a scoring system is invented to activate this pleasure mechanism, a sexbot could stimulate "masculinity achievement" at least as well as a written vignette – and neither are actual flesh-and-blood women.

We can therefore conclude that there is no ineffable quality of women that cannot be replaced by either sufficient technology or men's imaginations, and that if the future is a female, as Hillary Clinton has proclaimed, it is a female sexbot.

.

The Maryland Rape Case, Rockville High School

Tom Golden · 6 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Some announcements on ICMI'17 on the Gold Coast

AVFM · 8 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The following message is going out via email to all ICMI ticket holders. PE

Dear ICMI'17 Attendee,

As we move ahead toward the much anticipated International Conference on Men's Issues on the Gold Coast, June 9-11, it is time to share some information with you.

First, one week before the conference starts, you will receive an email with the exact location of the venue, registration times and other relevant information. At this point we suggest you secure lodging in the Broad Beach area, as it is in close proximity to the venue.

Remember, on Friday the 9th at 3 PM, we will kick things off with a screening of The Red Pill Movie, followed by a Q & A with director Cassie Jaye and members of the Red Pill Movie cast.

That will be followed by a New Zealand style hangi with all the fixings. So bring your appetite. You were offered the hangi with your ticket options when you first purchased your seat but if you have not yet paid for it you can go back and add it to your order, following this link.

https://icmi.info/shop/

You can also buy tickets for the event at the same link, so if you have not yet purchased you can do so now!

Also, as happens sometimes, we have three important speakers who will not be able to attend the conference in person. They are Janice Fiamengo, Erin Pizzey and Paul Elam. Last minute difficulties and some health issues played a role in this. However, all three will still be appearing to the conference via Skype. As they say, the show must go on.

As we approach the conference dates, you will be receiving more emails with more details that are very important to the event, so please watch your inbox and check your spam from time to time for announcements.

We all look forward with eager anticipation for the upcoming event. It promises to be a memorable and historical first for Australia and a big step forward for raising awareness of the issues affecting the lives of men and boys.

We look forward to seeing you there in just a month!

Regards,

AVFM Staff

Pepé Le Pew must go!

Doug Mortimer · 8 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A SOCIAL JUSTICE PETITION

Drafted by Doug Mortimer

Target: Time Warner

Region: USA

Theme: Toxic Masculinity

During World War II, Warner Bros. cartoons played a key role in the fight against fascism. Daffy Duck, Bugs Bunny, et al took on the Nazis and bested them in numerous cartoons. Also to their credit, Warner Bros. produced a number of cartoons in which Bugs Bunny, Elmer Fudd, and other characters broke free of gender stereotypes and donned attire more often associated with the "opposite" sex. Despite this enlightenment – exceedingly rare in those days – Warner Bros. gave birth to one of the most noxious cartoon characters ever created. We refer to the despicable Pepé Le Pew.

Longtime Warner Bros. animation director Chuck Jones introduced Pepé Le Pew in a cartoon called "Odor-Able Kitty" in 1945. Since that was the year Nazi Germany was defeated, one wonders what role Pepé Le Pew played during the Nazi occupation of France. Pepé began to appear in movies just as the war was ending, so one cannot help but wonder if his movie career was the payoff for collaborating with the enemy? Was Pepé Le Pew literally a Nazi?

In his Pepé Le Pew cartoons, Chuck Jones not only exhibited a highly insensitive attitude towards people who are afflicted with excessive body odor, he continually employed Gallic stereotypes. His worst offense, however, was misogyny. Blatant, rampant and flippant, it is evident in every Pepé Le Pew cartoon ever made.

Children Must Be Protected From Pepé

After the cartoons were shown in theaters, Pepé Le Pew was presented to children on Saturday morning television as a warm, fuzzy bon vivant. In reality, he is arguably the worst exemplar of rape culture that exists in the American media. Since he is always portrayed as suave and unflappable, at first blush he might appear to be a positive role model. Yet little boys who watch his cartoons are taught that groping females is appropriate behavior. Little girls are taught that being groped is acceptable. Vive la difference is no defense!

Without exception, Pepé Le Pew preys upon faux female skunks. In reality, they are black cats to whom a dorsal white stripe has been conveniently applied. Notice that Pepé does not attempt to oppress white cats. No, Pepé acknowledges their privilege and steers clear of them. But black female cats are fair game. Clearly, their rights are not being respected. To this we respond with the acronym "BPM." Black pussy matters!

While Pepé Le Pew continually oppresses female felines of color, more importantly, he oppresses females of all species. The oppression of a female of any species is oppression towards females of all species. An injustice towards one is an injustice towards all.

Pepé Le Pew the PUA

Pepé Le Pew exemplifies the patriarchal privilege of the pickup artist. He has the audacity to believe that all feline females are his personal property and he can play grab-ass with them whenever he wants. He never asks permission before attempting physical intimacy. Apparently, he has never heard of "My derrière, my choice!"

Please understand that this Petition should not be construed as an attack on all skunks. Sadly, skunks are regularly shunned by other species and are frequently the victim of discrimination themselves. Indeed, in the caste system of creatures, skunks are the equivalent of untouchables. So let's be perfectly clear that this Petition is aimed at Pepé

Le Pew alone and not towards other members of his species. An odoriferous pelt is one thing, the stench of misogyny is another! Malodorous behavior is far more injurious than a malodorous body.

Pepé Le Pew Must Not Be Resurrected

Recently we find out that film-maker Max Landis has written a feature film with Pepé Le Pew as the central character. This is totally unacceptable. This project must not be allowed to proceed. No doubt this film will be marketed to children and we cannot allow another generation to be influenced by Pepé Le Pew's toxicity.

Just as reprehensible as toxic masculinity is the merchandising of same. Today animation cells of Pepé Le Pew are in demand by collectors. The prices at animation art galleries often run into four figures. Pepé Le Pew souvenirs continue to be sold online and at the Warner Bros. studio gift shop in Burbank, California. It would not be inaccurate to assert that the profits on Time Warner's balance sheet has been greatly enhanced by Pepé Le Pew and his flaunting of male privilege.

For all the above reasons, we encourage you to sign our online Petition to present to Time Warner to ban Pepé Le Pew from the airwaves, from any theatrical showings of "classic" cartoons, and from producing any more "entertainment" or merchandise with his image.

73 years of Pepé Le Pew's misogyny is enough. In many respects, cartoons and cartoon characters have become laudably progressive, but the pace has been that of an escargot. We still have a long way to go!

Pepé Le Pew must be consigned to the dustbin of animation history, and the sooner the better. Still, we're not holding our breath.

En garde, Time Warner. Les bon temps are over for you, Pepé .

For your convenience, we are spreading this petition through internet. You can sign at any of the following sites:

Facebook: https://www.facebook.com/skunkworks!

www.aucontrairepepe.com

www.sacrebleulepew.org

www.aurevoirpepe.org

We, the undersigned people of the United States and worldwide, demand that TIME WARNER, by and through its subsidiaries, Warner Bros., Warner Bros. Family Entertainment, Warner Bros. Television, et al, to banish toute de suite all images of Pepé Le Pew, whether in the form of "classic" cartoons, stuffed animals, animation cells, comic books, or any other medium to ensure that impressionable young boys will never again fall under the influence of an animated sexual predator who has assaulted females of the feline persuasion for almost seven decades!

Swallowing the red pill makes Sunday morning a masochistic misery

Mark Dent · 9 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Let me confess that there are days when I wish I walked in a blind, comfortably numb stupor, blissfully ignorant of the flagrant injustices men and boys encounter every day. I never really took a red pill, I was born with my eyes wide open to the reality of gender bigotry from a very early age.

I still remember a very trivial incident which occurred in the hallway of my family home when I was about five years old. My mum and two female neighbors were having a chat and I was standing just behind them. I can still see them now. They were discussing toilet seats and laughing about how often they find them wet because of their sons. I am paraphrasing after these many decades but jokes about poor aim and lifting toilet seats were made. They were all laughing. I felt humiliated and angry.

