Labor Day celebrations were first introduced by the Central Labor Union of New York, and subsequently made a national holiday by Congress and President Grover Cleveland during a time of widespread outrage concerning the abuse of working men by rapacious business in the late 19th century. The early September date was chosen as a less controversial date than May Day, which commemorates the 1886 Haymarket massacre in Chicago, in which an anarchist tossed an improvised explosive device at police, who then began firing wildly into a crowd of striking workers.

On holidays such as Labor Day, we should take time to remember that men have always faced abuse, exploitation and oppression in one form or another. Whether through chattel slavery, serfdom, or unrestrained Capitalism, those in power have always sought to harness the efforts of the most productive members of society – adult men – for their own profit and security. Today, feminism and abusive family law serve that purpose, as there is little more insidious means of control than holding that which a man holds most dear hostage to coerce him into obedience and servitude.

So enjoy Labor Day, and remember that every generation of men has faced its own struggle for freedom and justice. As we honor those who have done so before, we should strive to make every bit as much of an effort as they did. If we do, we can make a difference.

Nothing Makes a Gina Tingle Like a Killa

From A Voice for Men

Authors note: I have to offer a public thank you to Tom Golden, LCSW, whose regular, sterling insights helps to shape a good bit of the work I do. Had he not provided me with the research information in this article, I would not have obsessed on writing it over the past 24 hours. Also, Tom will be using some of this information in his next Youtube video, due out soon, and it will be featured here as well. Thanks, Tom.

"That's not opinion, it's science.
And science is one cold hearted bitch with a 14 inch strap on."
-From the television show, "Dexter"

On July 24th of this year, I posted "Patriarchy for Dummies," on this site. In it, I proffered that there was an element to the normal female psyche that gravitated toward violent, dangerous- murderous men. I used Scott Peterson and Joran van der Sloot, and the numbers of women sending them marriage proposals in prison as prima facie evidence that supported my contentions. I also pointed to the fact that van der Sloot went on a sexual rampage, attracting scores of attractive young women after he skated on the Holloway murder.

It turned out to be one of the more read and commented on pieces on this site. And not just here. One of the other places was over at reddit.com/mensrights, which has a few actual MRA's, including a couple of really insightful ones, and a slew of feminist trolls that down vote anything pro male or that hints of fairly criticizing females or feminism. Let me digress further to add that most of them down vote MRA articles without commenting, which I suppose is their version of drive-by-activism, but some actually speak up, reminding us of why we oppose feminism- and why we see its practitioners as such insufferable dullards.

At reddit, even the most thoughtful comments dissenting from the ideas I suggested boiled down to a regurgitated load of NAWALT vomitus.

Oh, noooooo, women can't be like that! Women choose men based on qualities like sensitivity and whether they like Teddy Bears and snuggling up on the couch to watch The Bachelorette. Those other women who are like that? They are just sicko's, sad exceptions to the rule And they probably got that way because of some abusive, violent man.

Of course, that's the PC line, and we all know that women are only what the political correctness police tell us they are, which is basically sugar and spice and all things superior. There is no way that women in general get the 'gina tingle for gangsters, thugs and killers.

Just ask any feminist over at reddit.

But just in case you are interested in answers that aren't screened by gender ideologues, there is some actual research available to consider.

From a study done on the Yanomamö, a large Amerindian hunter-gatherer people that reside in the Amazon Basin, some very telling observations were made regarding sexual competition and violence among men by Chagnon (1988, 1997).

First, in Yanomamö culture, like most all hunter-gatherer (and agricultural and pastoral) societies, violence occurs either continuously or frequently. It is the men who are more aggressive and violent. And it is the most violent men that are successful at being selected for sex.

Yanomamö who are fierce warriors, and "fierce warrior" is defined by those who have participated in the killing of at least one member of a rival village, have 2.5 times as many wives and 3 times as many children as men who don't kill.

It is also noted that the status of material wealth was not connected at all to being a fierce warrior. Indeed, there was no other difference identified between killers and non killers except that the former were much higher up on the ladder of sexual selection.

The same elevated status, and lack of other corollaries, also held true for men who were politically powerful. (It should be noted that political power frequently translates to power over life and death, though the killing is often done by decree, and executed by men who specialize in violence.)

So it can be legitimately deduced that in hunter-gatherer societies, those with the power -and the tendency- to kill are at a sexual premium with women in those cultures.

Now, it must be asked, from which type of society did our modern, post agrarian life emerge?

Ah, yes, that would be hunter-gatherer, the base template for all of modern human existence- and the mode in which most human evolutionary development occurred.

Now, I am sure that the average PC ideologue would insist that since the invention of internal combustion engines, non fat latte's and women's studies programs that we have unwritten three million years of sexual selection programming and now women really prefer those soft little puppy dog guys; that the women who go for thugs and killers are just freaks; rare, unenlightened throw backs to the African Savanna.

But of course, like with most everything else, they are dead wrong.

While it is true that women's selections have shifted somewhat in keeping with modern realities, it only demonstrates that growing numbers of them will select the guy who controls, and sometimes kills, other men, than settle for the guy of lesser status. How many people is President Obama getting killed right now? How much trouble would he have getting laid? How many women would jump his bones if Michelle herself were in the same room screaming bloody murder?

Plenty. And you have to being in complete denial of human nature to blind yourself to that reality.

Politicians have the favorable characteristics of political savvy and the power to kill, even if with just the simple stroke of a pen. Is it any wonder why for most all of them that a quick blow job is just a snap of the fingers away?

This is the power that most, if not all, women respond to. From Al Capone to John Dillinger, Genghis and Kublai Khan, Scott Peterson and Joran van der Sloot, Adolph Hitler and Alexander, and Ronald Regan to Barack Obama, men who kill, and men who have the power to have men killed cause a 'gina tingle in many, many women that would register on the Richter Scale.

And there is one more bit of information in basic biology to help us understand this.

For a half century now we have made a half assed study of men's violent tendencies as though they happen in a vacuum. We have mostly put that study in the hands of women with so many neurotic self image and Daddy Issues, and a political agenda to act them out, that anyone with two brain cells to rub together could see that their efforts were not headed for a scientific end.

As a result, their conclusions about men's violence falters after they demonstrate the obvious, that men are naturally more violent than women.

They reach conclusions that are something like this:

"Men are violent because, well, let's see, yeah, it's because they are fucking pigs, that's why! Now where's my Nobel?"

What these Einsteinettes, and their supportive male sycophants have failed to notice -as do many people who allow a degree in women's studies pass for an education- is that throughout the animal kingdom, two things are universal.

Whichever sex, male or female, that is in the position to compete for sexual selection, develops more aggressive and violent traits, among other things.

AND

Whichever sex, male or female, that is in the position to choose among those competing for sexual selection, chooses those that are the biggest, strongest, most aggressive and violent.

It doesn't matter if we are talking about human beings, hedgehogs or house cats, it has nothing to do with what sex the animal is, and everything to do with whether or not the animal is competing to be selected for sex, or doing the selecting.

With seahorses and sandpipers, whose males gestate and tend to the young, we find -you guessed it- females that are more aggressive. Interestingly enough, we also find in those species that the females are larger, slower to develop, and die younger.

Sound familiar? It should. It is the same across the animal kingdom.

And this is where feminists, with their myopic and ideologically twisted use of research have done little more than reduce understanding of human behavior to "Man Bad-Woman Good."

I suppose that is far as you need to go when staying locked in a cyclical pattern of man hating is your primary goal in life. But for people who want to understand this sometimes crazy, mixed up thing we call the human condition, a little more perspective is in order.

Men are violent largely because being violent, or having the capacity for it, gets them a few significant rungs up on that sexual selection ladder- because those are the men that women select. Those are the men that turn them on.

This isn't going to change any time soon. Maybe never- it took millions of years to get where we are, although that should not stop people who claim enlightenment on the sexes from viewing it objectively and understanding where it comes from.

But since our culture still recognizes feminists as the authority on that subject, that isn't going to change any time soon, either.

W.F. Price · 8 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been taking care of my kids for the last five days, and as usual it leaves little time for much else. Fortunately, they are just getting to the age where I can take my eyes off them for a while, but even as the children themselves become easier to deal with, I am starting to get the sense that managing their lives becomes more complicated as they grow older.

My son starts kindergarten today, so yesterday I went to the orientation, and his school was crowded with little kids, their parents, teachers, staff, etc. There were some dads there, but of course the adults were overwhelmingly female, and my job was to let the teacher know that I am a father and will need to be kept up to date on my son's education, any problems, injuries and all the rest. You'd think, in this day and age, that schools would be required to make some effort contact both parents to enroll kids, but sadly this is not the case — leaving fathers out of the process entirely is evidently standard practice.

In Washington State, most parents have the right to receive school records and be involved in their children's education, regardless of marital status, but that is a somewhat recent development, so perhaps schools haven't caught on yet. Or maybe they just can't be bothered. In any event, it strikes me that a lot of children are put at a disadvantage when their fathers are left out of the academic decision making role. For all the talk about fathers being "deadbeats" and uninvolved in their children's lives, our public and private institutions – especially the public ones – don't take fathers' parental role all that seriously.

This is a key issue concerning men's role in society. Not all that long ago, it was primarily fathers who were responsible for children's education. In Colonial America, fathers went to great lengths not only to personally instruct their children, but to find them tutors, choose suitable schools and prepare them for a trade or career.

Although this is not an easy job, it is a very respectable duty; men's high position in society in those days did not result from having no responsibilities and being of little consequence. Perhaps, if men want to put themselves in a more elevated position than they occupy in the current unfortunate social reality, efforts to restore more authority in the matters of preparing their children for adult life would be a good idea. It may be time-consuming and not immediately profitable, but if fathers are considered indispensable to their children's future well-being, and evidence is mounting that this is the case, society and culture will take note, and changes in how men are viewed will come about naturally.

Cheerleader Rips Off a Quarter Million, Released on Recognizance

Although fraud and embezzlement are fairly routine crimes where women are concerned, I still thought this was a noteworthy case, because the woman in question has been charged with ten counts of first-degree theft and was not jailed pending trial.

Pilita Corrales, a 22-year-old professional cheerleader, was employed by Steeler Construction as an administrative "assistant". Who knows what assistant means in this context? My best bet is that some codger thought she was an angel because she had a nice figure and gave her far more responsibility than he should have. This is why I, personally, hold white-knighting and the modern concept of "chivalry" in contempt — it's usually simply an excuse some guy uses in an attempt to get laid.

Nevertheless, this woman ripped the company off in a big way. She wrote hundreds of thousands of dollars in forged checks, cashed them, and then spent the money on salons and parties at hotels. The business owner, who has not been named, has gone crying to police that he's had to lay off employees because his little princess ripped him off.

Although the ~~culpability~~ responsibility rests in part with the business owner in this case for hiring this kind of woman and giving her access to company checks and credit, the repercussions of the crime extend to honest men who are supporting children, doubtless including some who are paying child support. So this wench gets to waltz around prior to trial, still likely in possession of tens of thousands of dollars from her crimes, while honest working men may be facing prison without trial because they fall behind on child support…

Until these "ladies" are thrown in dungeons with nothing but a hole in the floor and a roll of industrial-grade toilet paper, women will continue to think they can destroy men's lives without so much as chafing their own bottoms, and will face a punishment as skimpy as the outfits they prance around in while shaking their pom-pons.

Culture and Dysfunctional Mate Choice

The concept of hypergamy is a new and valuable addition to the discussion concerning relations between men and women in the West. Likewise, the introduction of evolutionary psychology has brought us closer to truths that have long been hidden by uniquely Western cultural taboos that hold men to be irredeemable scoundrels and women vessels of purity. However, I think it would be a mistake to view human beings – including women – only as a sort of chattering animal driven by unconscious passions.

Nevertheless, the unconscious is the key here. We humans have tendency to create our own conceptual universe and then dwell in it without consciously questioning its rules and characteristics. Anyone who has been through true culture shock should have some idea of this. Our values, our habits and often our assumptions are part of a collectively shared, but not consciously analyzed, awareness of what's valuable, what's taboo, what's approved, what's "creepy," etc.

Some of the women commenting here on The Spearhead have remarked that they don't particularly care for bad boys, thugs or other degenerates. Sure, they may like a bit of toughness, and even a hint of edgy danger, but they knew from a young age exactly which kinds of men were bad news. What do they share in common? They were raised before the "badboy" phenomenon really took off.

GenXers like me were raised during a transitional stage. When we were born and during our childhood there was still a fair amount of the old sensibility, even as the new America was taking shape and replacing it. Back in the early 90s, when I was in high school, girls were a bit more demure, less prone to outright expressions of sexuality and somewhat cautious around guys who were considered to be bad news. However, the media-generated youth heroes of the day were taking things to an entirely new level. The rock stars and rappers of the day were either singing songs about being strung out on heroin or rapping about robbing banks, shooting people and slangin' rocks. Objectively speaking, our role models were degenerates and criminals.

Sometimes, you have to go back there to get a sense of what youth culture was really like at the time. Fortunately, we now have the internet, and I can show you all pretty much exactly what I remember from my youth.

Following is a clip from 1991, shot in the OK Hotel, a dark, grimy all-ages club in Seattle's Pioneer Square where those of us in high school at the time would go for entertainment. It features Nirvana singing "Negative Creep" just before the band really took off and went global:

Not quite all that glorious, is it? Frankly, it's kind of embarrassing. I could have been in that crowd — I have no doubt that some of my friends were there.

It would be short-sighted to blame only a few musicians and bands for all that's gone wrong in our culture, but the utter neglect – or perhaps confusion – society showed in promoting this kind of stuff for children's consumption is undeniable. One could say that kids always rebel in one form or another, but what form it takes matters a great deal. I did know kids who overdosed on heroin, as well as some who ended up in prison for murdering people. Youth culture at the time actually encouraged this stuff, and children are highly impressionable. Youth violence reached an historic peak in the US in 1992, and as someone who was a "youth" at the time, I can say without a doubt that culture had a great deal to do with that.

Was it only girls who followed these cultural trends? Not at all. For the most part, the original enthusiasm came from boys, and girls, who tend to wait for social cues, went along with it when they saw how popular it was becoming.

When we look at the general trend of women going wholesale for the badboys, we've got to keep in mind that women aren't the only ones who look up to thuggishness and social irresponsibility. Actually, boys – immature men – also tend to idolize these types.

So when we speak of hypergamy and the female preference for violent men, we ought to keep in mind that it isn't such a simple, clear-cut matter of women's instinctive urges pushing society in that direction. It is a far more complex situation in which there is mutual responsibility, and which is characteristic of a lack of restraint of not only female, but male tendencies as well.

Real or Fake?

W.F. Price · 9 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Advice columnist Caroline Hax recently ran a two-part exchange in which a wife berates her husband for not doing his equal share of housework, and then claims he owes her more work because she married down. The wife comes off as a real harridan, and an entirely unsympathetic character, so I'm kind of surprised the normally feminist-leaning Hax ran the piece.

However, there's something about it that doesn't entirely add up. First, the situation described is too stereotypical, and the reasons she gives are exactly what a lot of us would point to as underlying reasons for women's anger about having to do housework. For example, she complains that he is awkward and unattractive, i.e. beta, and writes that he works "10-15″ more hours than she does per week. She also admits that he makes more money, and that he does other chores that she doesn't see as "real" housework, such as gardening and finances. It looks to be straight out of the manosphere:

> We each estimated the number of hours we put toward housework and kids. I do almost 60 percent of the work. I excluded things on his side that I don't really call work, because I know he enjoys the solitude (lawn care, weeding, finances, cooking, etc.). He doesn't think that's right, but I don't think these tasks compare to vacuuming, doing dishes every night and cleaning bathrooms.
> I also don't buy his argument that he works 10-15 hours more than I do at his job each week. That is a career choice, and while it has enabled him to earn far more money than I do, it doesn't excuse him from his share of housework. Short of threatening divorce, how do I convince him he is wrong? I threw this out to friends and family and everyone agrees with me.

This could be real, but it seems to me that a woman would be less likely to harp on the details than to throw out generalized shaming language and say "I just don't feel 'in love' anymore." For example, I can imagine a woman saying, "I am so tired after I do all the housework, and he is insensitive and takes it for granted. He treats me like a slave, and never does anything romantic for me. I feel less important than his job, and trapped in a loveless marriage." In that case, she'd get plenty of sympathy, even if it was a huge exaggeration and far from the truth.

Women are usually socially far more aware than men. They know how to phrase things so they appear to be sympathetic characters. Whoever wrote this letter to Hax certainly didn't do that. Perhaps it's an exceptionally masculine woman, but I'd doubt someone like that would take the time to write an advice columnist.

In the second part of the exchange, she makes herself look even worse, writing:

> I probably should have included this (Monday): My husband was pretty socially awkward when we first met. I don't want to say I did him a favor by marrying him, but that's not far from the truth. I'm much better-looking than he is, I'm much smarter, and I have a much better personality. We have an unbalanced marriage, and I expect him to compensate for that in some way. So even if he is doing slightly more work than I am, I don't think that even comes close to what he really owes this marriage.

This is clear entitlement. It gives the game away, so to speak. I just have a hard time believing a woman who felt that way would put it in such brutally honest terms.

So, what do readers think? Is this woman for real, or is it someone trying to put a female face on the male perspective?

Britney Spears' Security Guard Accuses Her of Sexual Harassment, Child Abuse

W.F. Price · 10 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Fernando Flores, a former bodyguard and personal assistant for Britney Spears, has accused the troubled pop star of making sexual advances and being an abusive mother to her sons. He says she repeatedly exposed herself to him, had sex with various people in his presence, and attempted to entice him into sex on a number of occasions. Additionally, Flores accuses her of whipping her sons with a belt, feeding them food they shouldn't eat due to allergies, and having sex in the presence of her children.

According to Flores:

> In the second week of his employment with Spears, Flores was working a nightshift at Spears' residence when he was asked by Spears to help her work a camera. In doing so, Spears allegedly displayed her breast to him and made no effort to cover it. Flores said he was disturbed by her alleged behavior and excused himself immediately.
> In another night shift, Spears allegedly called Flores into the residence to turn on the fire place in her bedroom. When he entered her room, she was wearing only a white lace, see-through dress. She allegedly walked close by Flores and intentionally dropped her cigarette lighter on the floor, bent over to pick it up, and exposed her genitals to him. The incident supposedly caused Flores shock and disgust.

It could be that Flores is pissed off about some falling out and wants to cash in, but even in these sorts of cases the truth is often somewhere in the middle. Britney Spears is undoubtedly a lewd woman, has substance abuse problems and probably isn't a very good mother, but that doesn't mean she's broken the law in regards to her parenting.

As for her alleged sexual advances, well, yes, that's believable. But does Mr. Flores deserve money for being subjected to that at work? Women have been using sexual harassment laws in an abusive manner for decades now, so is it really a good idea to have more of a bad thing? Perhaps what's good for the goose is good for the gander, and if more men pursue these kinds of cases it will generally discredit the idea that people deserve to be compensated because others can't comport themselves in a polite manner, but the double-standard favoring females is so deeply ingrained in culture and the law that I'm not sure it will make much of a difference.

Wanted: Submissions and Authors

As The Spearhead grows and evolves, I sometimes have to make decisions regarding the proper direction it should take. The magazine started out as a collaborative effort, and although I managed it and came up with the idea, it couldn't have gone as far as it has today without a great deal of help from other bloggers, readers and supporters. However, lately it's become a bit more of a one-man show, and I've been wondering whether that's what it ought to be.

I don't think it is. Now that Men's News Daily is shutting down, there's going to be a gap in coverage of men's issues. Although I don't think The Spearhead can take MND's place – nor should it try – it would be a shame if we didn't have a place with a diverse base of opinion and news, so I think it's time for a recruitment drive.

I've written about half of all the posts on The Spearhead, but when it comes to the thoughtful opinion pieces, which require more time investment and mental energy, I try to feature guests and contributing authors as often as possible. There are two reasons for this:

1. I want as many men and supportive women as possible to get their message out there, and to encourage anyone who is interested to take a shot at it.

2. I've only got so many good articles in me per week.

To make it easier for others to participate, I plan to streamline the submission process and set up some guidelines and a page for submissions. Lately, The Spearhead has grown a great deal in terms of reach throughout the internet, so submitting articles is a good way to get exposure for your own blog, your writing, or just to get a new idea out there. In fact, I've been receiving daily emails from SEO marketing companies who are trying to get me to put their links up on The Spearhead. Mostly, these people are looking to gain traffic for their own or their clients' marketing sites, which have nothing to do with men's issues, so I've ignored their proposals, but it does say something about the growth of the site in terms of popularity and reputation.

In addition to the growing reach and prominence of The Spearhead in terms of searches and links, we are gaining subscribers as fast as ever. We are closing in on 1,500 daily RSS subscribers and probably have about the same number of people who visit the site itself on a daily basis, and then about a thousand per day who come in through searches. All told, about 50,000 individuals visit the site or read the content on a feed reader each month. Those may not be internet superstar numbers yet, but they are not too shabby for a site that isn't even a year old.

So here's the deal for submissions:

If you would like to submit as a guest, be sure to include a title, your name (pseudonyms/pen names are fine), and a link to your blog if you have one and would like to be linked. The link is important because you will likely get quite a few referrals from the article.

I am open to a wide variety of ideas, but quality is important, so try to keep the language and thought consistent, tight and interesting. Personal stories are OK, but only as an example to bolster a point. One of the things I can't stand about feminist and mommy blogs is that their posts are often all about the writer's personal life and experiences, as though we all care about their latest shopping excursion or that creepy guy who said something "disturbing" to them.

In terms of format, plain text with html tags is best, but if you'd like to attach a word processor file to the email that's fine. For some people, including links and pictures may be easier using MS Word or another similar program, so don't feel as though you need to learn html to make a submission.

For those who would like to become contributing authors, the same standards apply, but I will also need some samples of previous writing, preferably on a blog you run, before I can sign you up. Being a contributing author means that not only can you link your blog from the articles you write, but you will have a dedicated link in the sidebar as well, visible to all visitors to The Spearhead. This will provide a steady stream of referrals, and give you an opportunity to gain exposure for your blog. To keep that link, I'll require regular submissions, but one a month will suffice.

Additionally, as a contributing author, you will be able to simply log in to The Spearhead and post your work through the admin interface. I will then look it over and schedule it, usually for the next day. Feel free to post the same content on your own blog — at this point The Spearhead has enough subscribers and readers that we don't need to be overly exclusive with content.

A Modest Proposal for a Final Solution

Featured Guest · 12 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Today's Guest Post written by Alte]

I come to you today, my sisters, with a heavy heart. It pains me to make this proposal, but I fear that it is time for someone to brave the fierce winds of patriarchal opposition, and speak the simple truth. For quite some time, we women have become aware that there is a new “problem that has no name”. I am here today to name it, and propose a viable and humane solution.

Simply put, there are too many men about, and mostly of the wrong sort. I’m sure that you have noticed it, as well. They hang about in public places, looking around, breathing, and taking up valuable parking spots right in front of our favorite shoe stores. I know that you, same as I, find it very intimidating and are greatly impeded in your daily activities.

Why should we put up with this? Have we not fought for equal rights? How can we enjoy those rights if there are men everywhere, taking up space and menacing us? Do we not deserve to exercise those rights undisturbed?

Now, I am not some sort of radical. Of course, I am aware that there are some men who are very useful. Most of them don’t seem to do anything worthwhile except work all day, but there are some who serve as a valuable form of sexual entertainment or who could function as sperm donors. I don’t mean them. I mean all of those other men, who pester us all of the time, especially the short ones or the ones who wear ill-fitting suits. Wanting to grow food, pay taxes, build infrastructure, fiddle with electronics, repair mechanical stuff, perform cardiac surgery, or protect our interests on the military front. You know the ones I mean, and I’m sure you’re as exasperated with them as I am.

So, my sisters, we need an alternative occupation for them, and I’ve thought of just the thing: let’s harvest them sustainably for food. You see, that would hit two birds with one stone. We can cook the undesirable men for dinner and have the desirable men serve it to us. No more crime, no more cat-calling in the street, no more husbands to annoy us with their dirty laundry. Furthermore, as men are generally leaner than beef, it would be much easier to keep our figures while continuing to indulge in red meat.

It would make the most sense to separate the men by size. The thinner ones we keep to fatten up some more, the fat ones we eat immediately. We could use the older ones in stews (as the meat is bound to be stringy), and save those in the 15 to 45 age group for direct consumption in the form of steaks, fajitas, or low-sodium stir-fries. The youngest are a tender delicacy and should be saved for special occasions only. The skin would be useable for purses and shoes, and the bones could be burned for fuel. We would have to be careful to capture the carbon emissions though, in deference to Mother Earth.

I know that the mechanics of this scheme might be daunting, but it is certainly plausible. There are currently 139,267,200 men in the United States, as opposed to 145,532,800 women. We can assume that roughly 10% of those men are gay (and therefore exempt, as we need them for the vital fashion industry), and 20% of the women are vegetarians. That leaves us with 137,874,528 straight men for 116,426,240 meat-eating women, which certainly seems worth the effort. Wives should retain property rights to their husbands and sons, sharing the rest in the common herd through a voucher system.

You may be inclined to object, out of a false-sense of morality. You may say, “But men are people too!” To which I can only reply that unborn children are also people, but we murder them all of the time and nobody minds. What is the difference? Men are merely grown-up babies, after all; generally useless, and nothing but a burden on the women. They come from our bodies, and are therefore our property, to do with as we please. Are you so heartless that you have no sympathy for the many women who are being tragically inconvenienced by these men?

But that is not all. The solution itself is an act of true environmentalism. By dramatically reducing the population, we would immediately cut our carbon emissions in half, saving the planet from global warming in the process. And our girl children could finally receive their school lessons uninterrupted.

There is really nothing in this proposal that a right-thinking person can object to. I suggest we immediately nominate representatives to help us carry out this goal. Out of all humility, I nominate myself as president. I profess, in the sincerity of my heart, that I have not the least personal interest in promoting this necessary work, having no other motive than the public good of my country. I have no husband for which I will receive a single cent, so you can be assured that my motives are purely altruistic.

In sisterly love and concern,

British High Court Dame Orders Lower Sentences for Women

W.F. Price · 12 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the proportion of crimes committed by women continues to rise, feminists have stepped in to maintain the huge gender disparity in prison. Dame Laura Cox, a British High Court Judge, commanded her inferiors – Britain's judges – to treat female criminals leniently when handing out sentences. It is not clear whether keeping female criminals out of prison is her only goal — reducing punishments is usually a way to give a sort of tacit approval to acts, in this case crimes committed by women.

The reasoning behind the commandment goes something like this:

Women's experiences are not exactly equal to men's, therefore in order to have true equality, we have to treat them unequally under the law, because that way they will have equal experiences.

So, she's essentially saying that legal equality is not really equal, possibly because it doesn't "feel that way" to female criminals, never mind the fact that most convicted criminals – male or female – feel like they got a raw deal.

When the concept of equality extends to mandating equal outcomes based on subjective feelings, and power is handed over to women who actually believe this is a form of justice, there is bound to be an erosion of the very concept of justice in the popular mind. What happens is that a more primitive, selfish attitude toward crime and punishment emerges as collective justice is no longer seen as justice at all.

When the courts begin to fail, one should expect more vendettas, vigilanteism, and personal violence in the name of justice, in which case women will likely be in for a rough ride.

More on the Drive to Reduce Female Sentences

While doing a little research on this female sentencing guideline issue, I had a hunch it must have something to do with suicides in prison. I've been reading up about suicides in jails lately, because suicide risk can rise to critical levels for a lot of guys who are thrown in jail by their wives. Feminists don't care about male suicide, and often point out that higher rates of suicide amongst men are simply "natural," and therefore "equal" even when four times as many men kill themselves as women. However, when enough stress is placed on women that they begin to kill themselves in numbers approaching parity, it sets off feminist alarm bells.

This happened briefly in the early 00s in Britain, when there were close to double digit suicides in the female inmate population for about three or four years in a row. In 2003 and 2004, respectively, 14 and 13 women killed themselves. This was held to be an epidemic, and much noise was made about it in official circles. Since then, the rate has dropped back to the norm, in which about 5% of prison suicides are female.

I am not a statistician, but it seems to me that when dealing with such small numbers in a country of tens of millions of people, the difference between 3 and 14 is not all that statistically significant, and a couple years of elevated prison suicides among women would be expected to occur from time to time, but I suppose it would be a mistake to think rationally about these matters.

Another issue is that criminality is often connected to mental problems, if not outright mental illness, and these are in turn strongly connected to suicide. Given that women have such a low rate of imprisonment, one would assume that the women who are locked up represent an even more troubled cross-section of their sex than incarcerated men. And the more troubled they are, the more likely they are to be suicidal. Therefore, it makes sense that women who are locked up woud be much more prone to suicide than your average woman.

Nevertheless, it became a minor national issue, and was reported in the newspapers. A 2003 article in The Guardian reports on the "soaring" rate of female suicides in prison, suggesting that the women were simply harmless, mentally ill and troubled young women who don't pose a danger to the community:

> 'These are deeply shocking statistics; these women were mentally unstable and traumatised before they even got to prison and many were already repeatedly self-harming,' said Claire McCarthy, of the Howard League for Penal Reform, who carried out the research.
> 'The vast majority of these women represented no danger to the community,' she added. 'They were a danger to themselves only.'
> Almost 80 per cent were in prison for non-violent offences.

The final statement is quite frankly untrue. At the end of the article there is a list of the women and their offenses, and it clearly shows that to suggest that the majority of the women who killed themselves were not dangerous is a lie.

Here is the list:

> Leanne Gidney, 18, died at Brockhill. Offence: robbery
> Sarah Campbell, 18, Styal. Manslaughter
> Clare Parsons, 20, Eastwood Park. Witness intimidation
> Jennifer Clifford, 19, Bullwood Hall. Crime not known
> Helena Price, 27, New Hall. Handling stolen goods
> Sue Stevens, 48, Durham. Wounding

> Jolene Willis, 24, Styal. Theft
> Jayne Buck, 28, Durham. Arson
> Hayley Williams, 41, Styal. Theft
> Jessica Adam, 22, New Hall. Handling stolen goods
> Julie Walsh, 39, Styal. Theft
> Emma Levey, 25, Downview. Robbery
> Wendy Booth, 35, Durham. Murder
> Petra Blanksby, 19, New Hall. Arson

Aside from the two killers, we have one in for wounding, two arsons, a witness intimidation, and two robberies. That makes eight out of the fourteen dangerous criminals. These women were a danger to society. This doesn't mean we should cheer the suicides, but the crimes were far from inconsequential. Here in the US, for example, robbery and arson are taken very seriously, because they often result in deaths, whether that was the intent or not.

It is these kinds of moral panics, often cynically created by activists themselves, that serve as the justification for measures such as the recent order from Dame Laura Cox to go easy on female criminals. There is often a great deal of intensive, insider lobbying that provides the impetus for what are obviously unjust and stupid policies. To reduce suicides in women's prisons, more competent mental health professionals could be hired to keep an eye on procedure and the detainees, but instead we are seeing calls to take it easy on killers, robbers and arsonists – by definition dangerous people – by reducing their sentences.

What sane, justice-loving and clear-thinking men ought to do is roll up their sleeves, write reports, testify in front of committees, and make their case with as much vigor as the entrenched feminist lobbyists. It's a hard job, but now that so many women have locked themselves into careers, perhaps there's more time and resources available to men willing to take on the responsibility.

When I was a little kid, the 1960s were considered this glorious decade, and it seemed that all the grown-ups thought it was a wonderful time. Of course, this was the early 80s, and most of the grown-ups I knew were pretty liberal baby boomers, but "The 60s" were also a big theme in pop culture in general well after they'd ended. These days, a lot of the shine has worn off, and the 1960s are seen in a far more critical light.

Now that I have kids, I wonder how they will see my generation's defining decade — the 1990s. People don't really talk about "The 90s" like they used to about the 60s, so I'm starting to wonder whether that decade will even come in for any scrutiny. I think it should. The 90s marked the culmination of a lot of what took off in the 60s, and was the decade in which the new West really took root. In many ways it was a heady time — people were wealthier than ever in the West, the US had emerged victorious from the Cold War, and markets exploded as the price of oil dropped so low you could fill up your tank for ten bucks.

In the meanwhile, feminists were marching victorious in the streets, new, draconian measures against men were signed into law, and the cultural attitude became very hostile to the traditional man. The fact that the men who tended to suffer from this were not usually traditional types didn't seem to matter much: "the man" was the enemy, and convenient scapegoats, such as boys shoved out of college in favor of girls, urban poor tossed in prison for falling behind on child support and ordinary guys who were set upon by vicious wives, would do just fine as stand-ins.

It's really no wonder that the decade ended with a spate of school shootings by boys and young men.

Just to give readers an idea of what was considered hip and cutting-edge at that time, I thought I ought to post another video, this time from Bikini Kill, the original Riot Grrrl band. The Riot Grrrl phenomenon started in Olympia, Washington, and was closely tied to the grunge scene. Aside from music, the people involved tended to share similar politics, which were actually almost indistinguishable from the 60s leftist ideals, just overlaid with this nihilistic militance and an entirely different style of clothing and music. It was as though the "Peace, Love, Equality" chants of the parents became screams and demands from the children, and boy were they children. A lot of what passed for thought in the grunge scene was so infantile that it's a good thing you usually can't understand the lyrics.

So here's Bikini Kill doing a concert in DC in '92, screaming about how "women are dying" from the capital of the most prosperous, female-centric nation on the planet at the time:

Pretty awful isn't it? Makes the 60s look positively genteel in comparison.

Dirk Johanson · 14 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Dirk Johanson of The Balls Monologues

As previously reported in the Monologues on several occasions, much noise has been made in the past few years by manginas such as Nicholas Kristof and by feminists about how there is "too much testosterone" on Wall Street, and not enough women. Of course, Wall Street did fine for centuries without hiring large numbers of women and then, no sooner had the number of women in high-powered positions hit criticial mass then, voila, we had the global financial meltdown, with Erin Callan presiding as Chief Financial Officer during the Lehman Brothers collapse. Despite such incompetence, or worse (the SEC is currently investigating Callan), FinReg then codified female hiring quotas in the financial industry into law.

]Meanwhile, it was reported today by Bloomberg that Eileen Rominger, who serves as chief investment officer for portfolio management businesses within the firm's fund unit, is stepping down at the end of the year and won't be replaced.

That's right. Not replaced.

In other words, she wasn't needed, and was performing make-work. Apparently her heels are so easy to fill, they won't be filled at all.

Increasingly on alert to flailing reputation and litigation exposure, Goldman issued a carefully-worded written statement about Rominger's departure. Rominger "reinforced and enhanced our investment culture and facilitated the sharing of ideas across portfolio management teams during a time of tremendous market volatility and change," the co-heads of Goldman's investment-management division, said in a memo. "We are confident that the structure that Eileen has put in place will serve us well into the future."

In other words, like so many working women everywhere, it appears that what she did was organize things and send out a lot of emails and memos.

Of course, Goldman is in the business if making money, not organizing things and sending out memos. According to Bloomberg, assets within Rominger's division "fell 4.5 percent in the quarter as clients pulled cash from money market and equity funds. Stock market declines also reduced the level of assets under management." At that rate, in less than 21 years, the entire division would have been wiped-out.

Rominger did once receive this glowing review. However, not surprisingly, the author, Jan (who uses the initials "J.R." in her by-lines to fool you into thinking she's a guy) Brandstrader, is a woman. Ms. Brandstrader, who has degrees in English and Communications but no formal business training, wrote, "Rominger's been posting top tier numbers…. Particularly impressive: The fund lost 8.6% during the 2000-2002 bear market."

I'm sensing a pattern.

Unlike Brandstrader, I have a blue-chip business degree. I'd note that Rominger did 8.6% worse from 2000-2002 than a guy who stuffed his cash in a mattress. Using a fuckonometric analysis, had a guy put $100,000 in his mattress at the start of 2000, he could have withdrawn enough money from the mattress to have sex with 43 hookers (at the widely-available rate of $200) and ended up with just as much money as had he given it to Rominger to invest and not gotten laid at all.

According to an article which just appeared in yesterday's New York Times, "[t]hose whom Goldman does not want to keep are likely to be quietly told in the coming weeks." I don't think I'm going out on a limb here by speculating that, in case of Rominger, that conversation has now occurred.

When is it OK to Punch Your Wife

Paul Elam · 14 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[From A Voice for Men]

It might be easy to think that the title to this piece is simple provocation, a tool to inspire people, perhaps mislead them, through sparking an angry reaction or just plain morbid curiosity, into taking a look at what this article is about.

Even though the thrust here is slightly different than the title would imply, there is no deception here at all. The question is serious, and the answer, to be certain, is so clear it need not take an entire article to address.

When is it O.K. to punch your wife? Well, anytime you are defending yourself from her physical attack. You have the right, at that moment, legally and morally, as is explicit in every legal model I know of, to use whatever force is necessary to protect yourself.

Ah, but you really don't, which is of course the real purpose of this article, and a purpose well worth study and consideration.

You see, the surface answer about self defense only applies in the world of legal theory and the land of ought-ta-be.

In the real world, where we actually live, the preponderance of people, from your friendly neighborhood patriarch to his twin sister the Gloria Steinem clone, see this type of dialog as a reason to go nuclear. In fact, I knew that the title would be provocative precisely because we live in a culture where I am not supposed to even ask such a thing. It's like asking when it is OK to hunt an endangered species, or steal a senior citizens social security check, or joke about children with cancer.

And people, whether it is women gone insane with the power of the pussy pass, or the men who are in fact the underwriters of those passes, will surely bring their wrath down upon you. They will rush in to scream, "You NEVER hit a woman! NEVER, NEVER, NEVER!"

I can just see the bulging veins in their necks, their flushed cheeks, and spittle flying from their mouths.

And of course they are right. A man should never hit a woman.

NEVER.

Not if he knows what is good for him.

It's not because some women don't deserve it. Heck, there is many a woman that righteously deserves a foot being broken off in her ass. You read about them a lot these days; women who beat and abuse their partners, who poison them, who hire paid killers to take them out, who shoot and stab and cut their husbands and boyfriends in their sleep, who run them down and kill them in cars, who get other thugs to torture and abuse them.

There are women, and plenty of them, for which a solid ass kicking would be the least that they deserve; where any justice at all would deliver to them the executioners needle. But hey, we can't even defend ourselves against them, so it makes perfect sense that they won't find themselves on the wrong side of the glass window in a death chamber- no matter what they do.

The real question here is not whether these women deserve the business end of a right hook, they obviously do, and some of them deserve one hard enough to leave them in an unconscious, innocuous pile on the ground if it serves to protect the innocent from imminent harm.

The real question is whether men deserve to be able to physically defend themselves from assault when it comes from a woman. Does the concept of self defense even apply to men who are the victims of violent females? Technically, the law says yes. But the people around you, especially the ones with guns, regard the pussy pass as a higher authority.

You hit a woman, even in self defense; indeed if you even call the cops on one that is beating the crap out you, the beta thugs we have come to call police will come round to your house and deliver some fucking law and order- on you.

I know, I just crossed another line. This time that thin blue one. Just like asking when it is alright to punch your wife, I am breaking a social gag order to point at police, rather at what police have become, and speak the truth.

But of course, that is how the police ended up doing what they are doing- by everyone keeping their mouths shut.

I respect the idea of police work very much. I have known many in law enforcement, including members of my family.

I also know that street cops are obliged to follow department policy, no matter how screwed up it is, or face losing their jobs. For that reason alone I have taken a soft line with the police for a long time.

In other words, I have been a part of the problem. I hate those kinds of look-in-the-mirror moments, but there is only one thing you can do with them- freaking fix the problem. And so I am here to start.

If you are willing to keep your job as a police officer by taking an abused man to jail for the sake of department policy or convenience, or even for your job, then you lack the integrity to be a public servant. Please take off your badge and resign. I am sure there are openings in the nearest street gang- where rule by force, not law, is much more your cup of tea.

Or perhaps you like your position a beta male thug enforcer. Perhaps you don't care who you cuff and cage as long as it gives you a hard on. Either way, I am tired of the public overlooking your actions, and worse, patting you on the back for being morally bankrupt and abusing innocent men.

Lest you think I am being over reactive about just how far the police have gone. Let's take a look at a case or two.

In Sacramento, California David Woods's wife Ruth took their young daughters outside in 39 degree temperatures, for seven hours, till their lips were blue and they were borderline hypothermic. After she returned, Woods argued with his wife about her actions, till she grabbed a serrated kitchen knife and stabbed at him. The blade passed through the collar of his shirt and actually gave him a small nick in the flesh of his neck. Apparently unsatisfied, she reared back to stab him again, but this time he hit her in the mouth. She dropped the knife and ran to call 911. Sacramento Sheriffs Deputies arrived at the scene to intervene, drew their guns, and slapped cuffs- on Mr. Woods.

They were preparing to take him to jail, over his protests, but it was the daughters, who insisted that the deputies listen to them (they sure as hell were not listening to him), that finally prevented them from taking their father to jail and leaving them alone with the disturbed and violent mother.

But, they did not take the mother anywhere either. They released Woods from his handcuffs advised him to get her to counseling.

After the incident Woods was quoted as saying, "Now, isn't that strange? When she had a fat lip it was a felony and I was going to jail. But when they finally realized she tried to stab me in the neck, it stopped being a crime and became a mental health issue."

Woods is not alone. This sham is passing for good police intervention on family violence in every major city in the country. From L.A. to New York City, police are embracing policies for handling domestic calls that can only be described as politically motivated, simple minded and criminal.

Whatever happens, arrest the guy, unless someone beats you over the head hard enough with the truth that you have no choice but to consider arresting whatever aggressor the evidence points to.

In doing this, our police, with our absolute complicity, have gone from being public servants to public menaces, trampling on victims, enabling criminals- mindlessly obeying department policy to the point that Gestapo references would not be overblown.

Their handling of domestic disputes is part of the a massive roll back in civil and constitutional rights and they need to be called to task for it.

Consider the following clip from ABC news that measures reactions of people to seeing a man violently abused by a woman.

Predictably, few people cared at all, one even celebrated the guy getting a beating, and most just decided on their own that he had it coming, but most telling is the cop that walked past this scene doing nothing and later told reporters, “Yeah, if it had been the other way around I would have definitely done something.”

The he excused it by talking about how he was raised, admitted that it was a double standard, but informed us that even being confronted with it was going to change nothing.

“Hey, it is what it is,” he says.

Consider the recent story out of Orlando, Florida, regarding the false rape accusation epidemic. Even in that situation, as reported by police themselves, they do not want to arrest women- simply because they are women. The pussy pass is police issue.

In a recent video posted here from you tube, we got a such a clear example of how police -and women- operate, that it is worth using it again for reference here.

Note the basic turn of events. Man angers women. Women attack, verbally and physically. Man refuses to comply. Women call police. Women lie. And lie again. And lie again. And lie again.

Police office treats the man as though he is the problem, going as far as to tell him that he cannot disrespect women.

Any thoughts on what would have happened if this man were not smart enough to film his actions?

And this is what we have, people. From rape allegations to domestic disputes, to civil protests, we have police that are badge wearing, gun toting enforcers of feminist governance. They are either too poorly trained, or too brainwashed or too stupid to realize the socially destructive nature of their actions.

So when is it Ok to punch your wife? Ask David Woods, he’ll tell you. Don’t defend yourself. Don’t expect help. Just run. Forget your property. Forget justice. And get a hotel because there won’t be a safe house.

If you are a man in this culture and you are unfortunate enough to have an altercation with a woman, you know who is coming to take care of things, don’t you?

That’s right, the Sacramento Sherriff’s Department. Or maybe the Orlando police, or maybe that muscle bound cop in the park who would walk past you getting beaten like he was a fry cook instead of a law enforcement officer.

Whoever comes, they are not about the any law except her law, and you will find that out as they put the handcuffs on you and haul your ass to jail for having been stupid enough to expect them to do the right thing.

Let that sink in. Let it sink in any way you like, but I advise you to get it on your way out of her reach, and theirs.

This ain’t no country for men, any more.

Are Men Becoming "Gold Diggers," Too?

Vanity Fair writer Jamie Johnson writes that she's noticed more and more young men expressing a preference for wealthy women, especially where matrimony is concerned. Johnson writes that she isn't particularly surprised, noting that this is nothing new:

> In this difficult economic climate, people are working whatever schemes they can to ascend the exclusive ranks of high society, the least harmful of which, it appears, involves professing love in exchange for money. Plus, there is a cultural precedent for precisely this sort of male ambition. I can't say that men in the past would have publically acknowledged pursuing rich women with such fervor, but it certainly did happen.

I'd go one step farther, and say that it was the average guy's dream prior to the growth of the middle class and the welfare state. In pre-20th century fiction, the theme of men pursuing wealthy women is so common that it's almost cliché.

From Ali Baba to Horatio Alger, marrying into wealth was one of the most commonly represented paths to success in old stories. A woman without a significant dowry, no matter how virtuous and pretty, was at a significant disadvantage. It is only in the last century that "Cinderella" type stories have grown so disproportionately popular, and what's missing from the modern understanding of these, in which the poor, oppressed girl ends up with a prince, is that the girl is usually of noble blood herself, and has been wronged by some twist of fate. So the marriage to the prince is actually setting things back in their proper place, rather than a tale of a girl of humble origins being rescued by a prince. In fact, in terms of social mobility, women have traditionally been the least likely to change their lot in life.

Say a prince took a fancy to some lusty peasant wench and knocked her up, and then the king learns of this. So far so good; the old man, remembering his own youth, would likely chuckle under his flowing beard while sternly admonishing his son to mend his ways and behave more in keeping with his station in life. However, say the stripling prince insisted that he would marry the girl and have none other. The king, thinking of his lands, his alliances, the threat from rivals, would suddenly feel his heartbeat quicken, his face would flush, and as he grasped a bottle of wine to pour a hasty drink he would feel a sense of rage welling up within. The young prince is in for it now! If he refused to give up the plan, he'd likely be declared possessed and locked up in the tower until the "demon came out."

Men could fight, study or trade their way to success, and thereby earn great rewards from superiors. If I have done my genealogy correctly, some of my ancestors were simple Welsh yeomen who served under Henry V in campaigns in France, perhaps as archers, thus earning themselves official positions and land grants that greatly improved their station. Most of us are descended from such men — they were the ones who tended to survive, and whose children survived, when the going got rough.

Lest we get the misperception that it was only the grit and determination of these particular men that kept family lines alive, we ought to remember that one of the benefits of receiving some rank or title was that one suddenly had the opportunity to marry into the gentry, and almost without fail men would do just that. The extra lands and wealth that came from these unions were a great boon to posterity, sometimes for many generations.

Therefore, marrying into money was one of the biggest incentives to an ambitious young man. This is the way it had been for most of history, and only the recent aberration of the greatly expanded middle class gave people the impression that men are content to marry their social inferiors.

It may be that we are headed back to the norm, and feminists are unconsciously providing a great deal of the impetus for that. Although they claim they are doing a great favor to women everywhere, and they may actually believe this to be the case, they are simply turning the ordinary, humble girl back into the “ball-and-chain” that she has been seen as for most of history. The feminist vanguard – professional, educated women from upper middle class to wealthy families – naturally favor policies that favor them, personally. Most of the girls who get masters’ degrees in humanities programs, which are all heavily infused with feminism these days, go on to marry other wealthy or upper middle class men. They never had to stock shelves in WalMart, go to women’s clinics in run-down neighborhoods, or any of these other things they are allegedly so concerned about.

When they think about what’s good for women, they are not thinking about the average, working to lower middle class woman, they are thinking of themselves and their own rather exclusive lives. For example, I’d like to know how many out of the horde of women who write about women’s issue and feminism have actually pulled themselves up by their bootstraps. How many of them came from single mother families where dad was out of the picture and not paying a dime of support? I’m sure that’s the case with some of their token ethnic writers (affirmative action is essentially a snake-oil solution that achieves little gain at huge expense, but hey, it makes white managers look good!), but how about all the white writers? The truth is, the feminist professional class is a part of the modern gentry, and they are all but guaranteeing that “lesser” women than they will have a much, much lower chance of finding a suitable mate than they would have as little as thirty years ago.

Given the social system these privileged women have helped set up, it’s entirely natural that an intelligent man of modest means and some ambition will regard a financially insecure woman as a huge potential liability, and do whatever he can to find one with the modern-day equivalent of a dowry.

How Female Suffrage Destroyed Western Civilization

ramzpaul · 15 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By ramzpaul

A few weeks ago Google paid homage to the ratification of the 19th Amendment to the Constitution. The following tag was on their home page complete with a little pink checkbox that represented a woman making her choice at the ballot box.

"Celebrating 90 years since the ratification of the 19th Amendment, guaranteeing women the right to vote"

As a globalist corporation, Google does not "celebrate" various anniversaries based on the whims of some individual webmaster. Such decisions on what to commemorate on Google's main page are carefully determined based on cynical political calculations. Either the occasion must be non-controversial (e.g., Celebrating the 71st Anniversary of the Wizard of Oz) or politically correct.

A Short History of Cultural Marxism

"Political correctness" is simply the modern slang term for what is properly known as Cultural Marxism. Cultural Marxism was developed in 1920s Germany at Frankfurt University. Unlike Revolutionary Marxism which advocated violent revolution to establish a new society (such as the Soviet Union, China, North Korea, etc.) Cultural Marxism advocated destroying Western Civilization through cultural subversion. One of the key concepts spawned from the Frankfurt school was called Critical Theory. The Critical Theory ideology that was developed in the 1930s was responsible for many of the "politically correct" memes we hear today, such that sex (gender) is a social construct.

The architects of Cultural Marxism were expelled from Germany in the 1930s once the National Socialists (Nazis) gained power. These refugees found new homes primarily in America and England. When World War 2 ended, the Cultural Marxist ideology soon metastasized quickly across American and English universities.

So while it is popular to imagine that all these radical cultural changes (such as feminism) started with the hippies and beatniks in the 1960s, the roots actually extend back to 1920s Germany and 19th century Marxism.

Over the past 50 years, Cultural Marxism has been wildly successful in the West and it is now the de facto ideology for the establishment. As was the case in the Soviet Union, everyone knows what thoughts are politically acceptable and what thoughts are heretical. Global corporations such as Google are savvy enough to "celebrate" the proper political ideas.

For example, while Google is proud to celebrate the 19th Amendment with a cute pink checkbox, I doubt Google would celebrate the 2nd Amendment with an illustration of a White Man holding a rifle. And all of us who were raised under Cultural Marxism instinctively know why this is the case.

The 19th Amendment

The right for women to vote now seems as American as All-You-Can-Eat buffets and Wal-Mart. Try suggesting to a typical God fearing, flag waving, Republican and Tea Party conservative that giving the vote to women was a bad idea, and watch him recoil in horror like a vampire looking at a cross. To even think of such a notion is anathema and un-American. After all, our brave troops are fighting the evil Muslims in the Middle-East to protect our right to vote!

And yet, for most of America's history the vast majority of men (and women) were opposed to women's suffrage. So were George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln all secret women haters with small penises? Or might they have had another reason to oppose female suffrage?

The 19th Century Argument Against Suffrage

Most of the arguments against female suffrage have now gone down the memory hole. School children are now taught that suffrage was inevitable and the people who opposed suffrage in the prior generations were simply backwards and ignorant. Because it is obviously axiomatic that female suffrage is a good thing. To even debate the subject would be crazy! As such, historical writings against suffrage are ignored and buried.

However, extracted from the depths of time is an essay written by a woman who was opposed to suffrage. This essay detailed the logical reasons why female suffrage would harm America.

Thoughts on Female Suffrage

By Madeline Dahlgren, 1871

http://sceti.library.upenn.edu/sceti/printedbooksNew/index.cfm?TextID=19950_O_16&PagePosition=1

"We acknowledge no inferiority to men. We claim to have no less ability to perform the duty God has imposed upon us, than they [men] have to perform those imposed upon them. We believe that God has wisely and well adapted each sex to the proper performance of the duties of each. We believe our trusts to be as important and sacred as any that exist.

It is our fathers, brothers, husbands and sons who represent us at the ballot-box. Our fathers and husbands love us. Our sons are what we make them. We are content that they represent us in the corn-field, the battle-field and the ballot-box, and we them in the school-room, at the fireside, and at the cradle; believing our representation, even at the ballot-box, to be thus more full and impartial that it could possibly be were all women allowed to vote."

Notice that it was assumed that men and women have different biological natures and, as such, God has given men and women different responsibilities. The notion that sex is just a social construct would have been considered to be absurd. Also notice the frequent references to religion. Prior to the Cultural Marxist revolution (Cultural Marxism abhors Christianity) Christian ideals were appealed to in an unapologetic manner.

The basic argument against female suffrage was that women were represented by their husbands, fathers and sons at the ballot-box. The essay further argues that as mothers raised their sons (this was before mothers warehoused their children in daycare to pursue their corporate careers) women actually fundamentally shaped the character of men, and hence, the direction of America. As such, women had a powerful voice and they were represented.

Later in the essay, Dahlgren predicted that female suffrage would create competition between men and women which would create an antagonism. Instead of a family standing in unity, suffrage would divide the house. Such division would create discord into the family and weaken the marriage tie. Dahlgren predicted that divorce would become common if women were given the vote.

Dahlgren writes:

"We hold that the new status will prove to be the worst kind of communism. The relations between the sexes, so carefully guarded by religion and by parents, by law and by society, will become common and therefore corrupt. The family, the foundation of the State, will disappear. The mothers, sisters and daughters of our glorious past will exist no more and the female gender will vanish into epicene. "

As a contemporary of Marx, Dahlgren correctly identified that the push for female suffrage was Marxist in origin. Fifty years later the Cultural Marxists implicitly agreed with Dahlgren that the best way to destroy Western Civilization (aka Christendom) was to undermine the family. And the seeds that were planted in the 19th amendment paved the way for the spawning of what would be known as feminism.

The people opposed to female suffrage proved to be right beyond their wildest predictions. As Google was celebrating the 19th amendment, a British newspaper detailed the boasting of a 26 year old woman who claims to have had sex with 5,000 different men. If Madeline Dahlgren were alive today, I am sure she would have understood the connection between female suffrage in the West and the decline of civilization.

Single mothers, rampant divorce, abortion and falling birth rates are part of the cancer that is destroying what is left of Western Civilization. But very few people (even conservatives) fail to realize that the inception of this cancer can be found in the passage of the 19th amendment.

W.F. Price · 16 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For men going through divorce or some other form of legal trouble with a woman, given the often blatant favoritism that occurs on behalf of women and the frequent bullying from her advocates and, occasionally, those who are supposed to be neutral parties, it's hard to shake the suspicion that something might be going on behind closed doors.

Recently, in Wisconsin, Calumet County's DA, Kenneth Kratz, has come under scrutiny for sending propositions via text to a woman whose boyfriend he happened to be prosecuting for domestic abuse. A couple of the texts read as follows:

> Are you the kind of girl that likes secret contact with an older married elected DA … the riskier the better?
> I would not expect you to be the other woman. I would want you to be so hot and treat me so well that you'd be THE woman! R U that good?
> I'm serious! I'm the atty. I have the $350,000 house. I have the 6-figure career. You may be the tall, young, hot nymph, but I am the prize!

Mr. Kratz does not deny sending the texts, but he maintains that he did not violate any rules in doing so, and holds up his record of sending men to jail as proof of his inherent goodness. Actually, he may be correct about misconduct rules. Attorneys have lobbied vigorously to allow sex between attorneys and their clients (or crime victims in this case), and, as usual, they have had their way.

Given the huge increase in laws governing relationships between men and women that place couples ever more frequently in court as opposing litigants, it may be time to rethink the sexual license given to attorneys representing clients in family law cases or DV prosecutions. DAs make decisions that can have a profound impact on others' lives, and if some of them are basing those decisions on whether or not the allegedly victimized spouse or lover is willing to engage in sex, it isn't difficult to imagine that legal abuses will occur.

Of course, plenty of us already knew this was happening. The evidence is too clear to ignore. If you are a man with a good-looking wife or girlfriend and have been accused of anything, for example, you might notice some over-the-top aggression from any men involved in the case. It's pretty clear that these guys "covet" your wife, and she knows it, too, and uses it to her advantage. This can easily result in injustice, and is why "coveting" other people's wives is explicitly banned by the final commandment (or next to last for Catholics) of the Decalogue.

However, anecdotal evidence suggests that it is not only a matter of male attorneys lobbying for sexual access to clients; I have read comments from male attorneys that state that females lawyers are the most likely of all to sleep with clients.

In a world where attorneys could not help people seize assets from spouses, throw them in jail or otherwise ruin their lives, rules barring attorneys from sleeping with clients probably wouldn't be necessary, but given the contemporary climate surrounding marriage, this practice ought to be as highly regulated as marriage itself. Perhaps that might dissuade a few sleazy DAs from railroading guys whose wives were bored and wanted an easy out.

Finally, I'd like to extend some gratitude to Stephanie Van Groll for outing Kratz for the garbage that he is. Turning over the DA's unprofessional texts when he was the man prosecuting the guy she accused of giving her a severe beating adds a lot of credibility to her accusations.

Woman Almost Runs Man Over, Confronts Him, Gets Mouthful of Capsaicin

W.F. Price · 16 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Alexandra Griffith, who is four months pregnant, went out with her friend to go to Seattle's Bumbershoot festival, and while trying to park she apparently came close to running a man over. The man, who was very large – around 6'5″ and about 300 lbs – got quite upset and pounded on her car, yelling that she almost ran him over. At this point the small, pregnant woman decided to get out of her car and confront him about hitting her Prius.

Does this sound like a good idea?

Next, she starts getting mouthy, making excuses and failing to apologize. Then, in a stroke of genius, she decides to snap a picture of the man with her phone camera. Surely, this is the first step one should take when dealing with an angry, 300-pound man…

In all likelihood, Ms. Griffith was just as pissed off as the man (he pounded on her Prius!), and wanted to provoke a confrontation so as to see the cops take him down. She's a woman, after all, and a fairly pretty white one at that. She need fear no mere man in America.

Just as she was snapping the photo, the man whipped out a can of pepper spray and let her have it right in the face. You can see what Alexandra saw just as the burning liquid blasted her right here (photo on the left).

The man likely shouldn't have reacted as he did, although when someone almost gets hit by a car, the resulting adrenaline rush could easily lead to them striking out without thinking. And pounding a car is a lot less severe than pounding a person. As for pepper-spraying her, he was still angry, she had been defiant after almost injuring him, and he was probably afraid she'd try to get him in trouble with a photo. There's no doubt he was provoked. But was the spraying justifiable? I don't think so, but then again she and her friend could have framed him and had him arrested out of spite over the car pounding. But the truth is that taking pictures of people is perfectly legal, so he'd likely be facing some minor assault charge for what he did.

However, this woman comes off as an entitled, arrogant moron. For one thing, you defuse a situation like that by apologizing, not by going on the offensive. Let the guy yell a bit and blow off steam, then go your merry way — you don't get out of the car with a camera. Ms. Griffith should have realized that although the man was pretty big, her car is actually a lot bigger, and if she wasn't looking where she was going she should have taken responsibility for it and said "I'm sorry."

The problem is that a lot of young women have a master/slave mentality where men are concerned, and view apologizing as beneath them. My guess is that this will lead to even more of these sorts of incidents, as guys who are on the edge let loose on women who have taken it a step too far.

As for the spin, this terrible article in the Seattle Weekly should give you a full dose of both white knighting and shaming language.

Here are some choice excerpts:

> Sometimes it's really hard to identify the World's Wussiest Man. Thankfully, the candidates have a habit of making themselves eligible in the most public way possible. Take the large, but certainly not in charge, gentleman who confronted young Alexandra Griffith this past weekend.
> [...]
> What Griffith couldn't have known at the time, however, was that she wasn't actually dealing with a man. Because no real man would ever pepper spray a lady.

> Griffith managed to snap a picture of the vulgar brute before he ambled off, but not before he was also caught on a Seattle Center security tape. Sources say he was later spotted stealing lunch money from kids and teasing cripples, but those reports remain unconfirmed.

I also feel compelled to include this comment from “Codger,” posted below the weekly article:

> Codger says:
> So why didn’t every self respecting male jump on this turd and beat the living crap out of him?
> Simple, yet sexist rule – don’t pick on chicks or get your ass whooped by the other males who find it an insult to their manhood.

Guys like Codger, if any, deserve a faceful of mace.

Fortunately, the Komo article (linked above) is fairly objective, as real reporting should be, and the most popular comments are those questioning the young woman’s judgment. The video, on the other hand… Just watch her put on a show:

If she’s married, this woman’s husband is in for it one day.

Amityville Horror Director Sues for Paternity Fraud

W.F. Price · 17 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Andrew Douglas, a successful film director, supported a girl for 17 years in the belief that he was providing for his daughter. When Ameena Meer, the child's mother told him she was pregnant with his child, she successfully persuaded him to marry her to preserve some semblance of dignity, which she, as a Muslim, said was important to her family. This is somewhat curious, because Meer first met Douglas when she hired him to photograph Salman Rushdie, the notorious Muslim apostate. Apparently, consistency isn't her thing.

Eventually, the sham marriage ended, and although Mr. Douglas faithfully paid support, Meer demanded extra cash for access to the girl he believed was his daughter. All told, he paid her nearly a half million pounds in child support and other financial assistance. Eventually, as he got to know the girl better, he began to suspect that she wasn't actually his daughter when certain medical issues came up. In fact, it seems that the girl herself may have had some suspicions, because she asked Douglas about his blood type, which turned out to be incompatible with hers. Soon, a DNA test proved that he was not the father.

Douglas then hired an attorney in an effort to retrieve the money he paid Ms. Meer over the years, and is now in the process of suing her.

What's really telling about the lawsuit is the absolute lack of contrition on the part of Ms. Meer, who claims she never lied, and is calling Douglas an ingrate:

> Of course I didn't lie. I obviously didn't think that he wasn't her father. If he wants to be her father, he should provide for her. Isn't that what's fair?

She's ignoring the fact that Mr. Douglas probably didn't "want to be a father" when she first fingered him as such 17 years ago. What he did was take responsibility, not make a deal. Like millions of men, Douglas carried the cross at great personal and emotional expense, only to find out he'd been cheated and lied to the entire time.

But Ms. Meer feels no compassion at all for the director, and blames him even as the full extent of her betrayal comes to light.

She says the lawsuit is "a terrible thing for him to do to his daughter."

Bethany Storro and False Accusations

W.F. Price · 17 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Bethany Storro acid attack story sounded strange from the beginning, but as a few copycat incidents that were quite real happened immediately after the attack, it seemed plausible. Fortunately, the Vancouver Washington police and reporters from The Columbian followed up on the story and uncovered some inconsistencies. For example, the so-called attack was witnessed by some homeless people in the park where Ms. Storro was burned, and they all said she fell to the ground alone. Also, the fact that she had purchased sunglasses immediately prior to the attack seemed like more than a mere coincidence, with Storro herself attributing it to "God." Finally, her own conflicting stories and the splash pattern led police to wonder whether she'd made the entire thing up.

Eventually, police scrutiny convinced her to admit that she'd made up the story, and now it's known throughout the country that she lied.

Vancouver locals – especially blacks, who are few in number in the town – are no longer feeling very charitable toward Ms. Storro. In a false accusation "en masse," she described her imaginary assailant as a random black woman, instantly creating a great deal of racial tension not only in Vancouver, but throughout the country. My guess is she did that because she didn't know any black women, and didn't want any of her acquaintances to come under suspicion, which might force her to 'fess up.

For a couple weeks, Bethany was the center of attention, and had even scheduled an appearance on Oprah. Charities were established for her and her family, police spent hundreds of hours looking for a made-up suspect, and people were nervous that some crazy acid-hurling woman could be in their midst.

So what was the motive? Well, the attention itself might seem like a reasonable place to start, but there is some indication that she had visited a plastic surgeon shortly before she poured acid on her face, and, tellingly, the part of her face most seriously damaged was her nose, which from the looks of the picture of her before she mutilated herself was rather bulbous and large. The main motive on her part may have simply been a free nose-job.

It sounds like a crazy scheme, but she almost made it work, ripping off thousands of people and local and state taxpayers for weeks before her lie unraveled. I doubt it was Ms. Storro's intention to make such a huge impact on the news, but once she did she went along with it, milking it for all it was worth. The smiling picture of her following the "attack" speaks volumes — can you imagine someone who was a real victim looking so pleased after being mutilated by a stranger?

For men, understanding what she did is difficult, because it simply doesn't make sense from a male perspective. A man would think: "Why in hell would anyone do something like that? She must be mentally ill." Well, she is a young, divorced woman who is hard of hearing and lives with her parents, who likely has some issues with her appearance. She wanted more for herself, and perhaps figured some sympathy and a new face would be enough to launch her into a new, better life. What she did may have been stupid, but it wasn't crazy — it almost worked. It was the classic female crime by deception.

As with the Bethany Storro lie, a lot of men have a difficult time understanding why a woman would ever lie about being raped, assaulted by a husband/lover or some similar matter. Again, what's difficult for men to understand is that this is usually a means to an end. It isn't just for "attention," although attention itself has its material benefits for women, and it certainly isn't because she's "confused;" it's because it will tangibly benefit or avenge her in some way. The motive is actually not all that different from men's motives for committing crimes. The only important difference is the means.

Perhaps part of the problem in the West is that, legally speaking, deception has come to be regarded as a far less serious offense than brazen criminality. In fact, lying has become routine and necessary if one wants to remain in polite society. This has probably long been the case, but it seems that the political correctness of recent decades has taken it to an entirely new level. Acts of deception that used to be taken seriously and actually prosecuted, such as adultery and perjury, are either decriminalized or very rarely punished. A woman can lie in court, to her husband, coworkers – even the police – without a shred of guilt, knowing that consequences, if any, are usually borne by others.

In the meanwhile, deception has been incentivized through greatly expanded civil law, advertising and electoral politics. It has become so thoroughly ingrained in our culture that I sometimes wonder why people don't lie even more than they already do.

However, perhaps it is time to rethink this soft touch on people who commit crimes by deception. They may not be as shocking as a fist to the face or a stickup, but the victims often suffer just as much, if not more. While Storro's crime may not have physically injured anyone other than herself, some innocent black woman could easily have been put through the wringer for what she said, and it did inspire copycat attacks that burned innocent people.

This would be a good time to start taking false accusations seriously, and the Clark County Prosecutor should take the first step by bringing Ms. Storro up on every charge he can apply to the case.

Death Row and The Pussy Pass

Paul Elam · 18 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

From A Voice for Men

I suppose I should out myself from the beginning as being opposed to the death penalty. At the very least I'm against it till we develop a system that assures 100% certainty that we are killing the right person, and that assures that every deserving scumbag gets an equal chance at the needle.

We are nowhere near that competent, or even concerned about getting it right for that matter, so I remain at the default position of con.

That being said, in regards to the September 23rd scheduled execution of Teresa Lewis in Virginia, I have an amended position.

Let's throw some burgers on the grill, crack open a few cold ones, and watch them ice this murdering bitch on pay-per-view. Or maybe we could tweak the date a little and do it at half time of a football game. Terry Bradshaw could do the play by play.

We'll put Sponge Bob on DVD in the other room for the kids.

I'm not just fascinated by the Lewis case because executions of women are rare. Though they are, exceedingly. Since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, there have been over 1,200 executions in the United States. A whopping 11 of them, or less than 1%, were women. Lewis will, if not saved by the Supreme Court or the Virginia Governor, be the first dead woman walking in that state in 98 years.

This stands in pretty stark contrast considering women commit, by DOJ estimates, 10% of all murders, are involved in 35% of all domestic homicides (are involved means, like Lewis, they get other people to kill for them) and nearly 30% of murders where the victim was another family member.

On death row, it seems, the vagina exemption is almost a given.

And that really is what makes this particular case so interesting. It is not just that female executions don't keep up with female criminality, it's why they don't. And that requires us to take another much needed look at that most peculiar of growing social phenomenon, the pussy pass.

From all the evidence available, Lewis used her pussy to get into this trouble and now wants to use it to avoid paying the price. For the latter she is getting a lot of help; that coming from her attorneys, but bolstered by a gynocentric media that is reaching a frothing and feverish pitch in activism on her behalf.

On the surface, it might appear that they have a case to make for her.

One of Lewis's hired killers, 22 year old Matthew Shallenberger, is alleged to have written a letter in which he claims to have manipulated Lewis, who reportedly has a low I.Q., into the crime. Apparently, the boy had Game, but not on a level that helped him with the state. He killed himself after getting a life sentence.

Lewis's lawyers have had trouble getting the letter admitted into evidence.

It is also the contention of her counsel, with supporting expert opinions, that Lewis has a Dependent Personality Disorder, which makes her susceptible to being manipulated by men.

That's clinical speak for the pussy pass. It has to be the man's fault, right? Women don't do these things unless someone makes them, and that someone is always a man.

But there are some other inconvenient facts around the case that don't work in Lewis's favor. For instance, there was an earlier failed plot to kill her husband and step son, and to help seal the deal Lewis had taken her 16 year old daughter to have sex with the second gunman, 19 year old Rodney Fuller. Apparently it was all the encouragement he needed.

Also, in consideration is the fact that Lewis financed the purchase of the weapons, left the front door of the home unlocked so that the gunmen could slip in and waited over 30 minutes as her husband lay bleeding to death before calling 911. It was actually the husband, Julian, who stubbornly clung to life long enough to tell the police at the scene that his wife knew the people who shot him, that quickly put investigators onto Lewis as the culprit. When she broke under questioning, she told investigators she did it for the money.

It would be easy enough to argue that any of that could still be consistent with her attorney's assertion that this was a simple minded woman who got drawn in by a more intelligent and manipulative mastermind.

The only problem with that is that it really doesn't matter. Death chambers have taken the lives of many men of low intelligence and who were highly impressionable. But there is not a penis pass, so they get the needle anyway.

And as you peruse the headlines of any of about a hundred news stories currently running on Lewis's execution, you get the real reason for wanting to save her from her debt to society.

She is, well, a she. Lack of intelligence and impressionability aside, the one thing every news agency, and her lawyers keep hammering on to the public is that we are about to kill a woman. The rest is just window dressing that can be seen on every death row appeal ever written in the last hundred years.

Low intelligence means nothing, unless it is low enough that the person cannot comprehend the nature of their acts, or tell the difference between right and wrong.

All of Lewis's behaviors, before the murders and up to this very moment are bombastic advertising that she knew exactly what she was doing and knew that it was wrong. And all we are witnessing now is a society struggling to cling to the idea that a woman's life, even a calculated killer, is more valuable than a man's.

I think we should start sending female killers to death row, and keep sending them, until we finally get smart enough to give this stupid and vile form of sexism its swan song; until we execute our own bigotry.

And if you are against the death penalty, this would be the wisest strategy to pursue. If you really want to end capital punishment, start executing women every time they legally deserve it.

The death chambers would shut down overnight.

And if that is not a sign of a very sick society, nothing is.

Elections in an occupied country should always be suspect for obvious reasons, but for some reason the US government seems to think they somehow legitimize our "mission" in Afghanistan, which is increasingly murky. First, we were going after Al-Qaeda and Osama bin Laden, then we were fighting the Taliban, then bringing democracy to the place, and now supposedly we are fighting for the Afghan women, because we Americans are such big, chivalrous heroes of course.

Since one of our primary goals is to bootstrap Afghanistan from the Dark Ages to the modern world in a matter of a few years, we are naturally taking a bunch of shortcuts and going directly from tribalism to liberal democracy. So, to ramp up the process a lot of priority is given to stuffing the polling places full of women, encouraging women (in a very poor country, mind you) to produce ridiculous, valueless "art," and setting up a parallel, secular education system – girls only, of course – to compete with madrassas that educate boys. It would all seem really outlandish, except for the fact that the Soviets tried the same thing some thirty years ago.

Now, it seems that the drive to "legitimize" the puppet government we've installed in Kabul has led to widespread voter fraud, in which women are showing up with all sorts of fake voter registration cards and casting multiple votes, probably for a few bucks here and there.

According to a monitor for the Free and Fair Election Foundation of Afghanistan (as reported by the AP), "the women coming here have so many cards that don't have the stamp and are not real cards but still they are voting."

Also, it seems that the women have learned to remove the ink that marks voters' fingers from their hands with bleach, and are taking advantage of that to make multiple trips to the polls.

This puts the feminist spin from 2008, in which men were alleged to be making up female relatives and voting for them, in some perspective. It seems that someone thinks that the more female voters the better for the Afghan puppet regime, which does its best to play up to alien American sentiments.

I'm pretty sure there's some compensation in it for the women. Afghanistan is desperately poor, the banks are failing, and people live lives that your typical American can't imagine. Feminism is totally irrelevant to women who have to cook their food with dried dung and are probably lucky if they can even afford a burkha. So twenty bucks to make a day trip to a polling station and vote a few times is probably worth it to them.

Whatever it is that's behind the fraud, it raises questions about American priorities in the backward, war-torn country in which our overwhelmingly male soldiers are sweating and bleeding. Are we fighting for concrete American interests, or have we resorted to simply trying to impose a sham ideology on a hapless people half a world away?

Men More Angry About Political Issues, More likely to Vote

W.F. Price · 20 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The gender gap in politics has widened substantially over the past thirty years, with women increasingly gravitating toward the Democratic Party and men to the Republicans. The Democrats have accordingly taken up a pro-female agenda and pushed for a number of bills that support women and punish men, such as VAWA, IMBRA and the pending Paycheck Fairness Act. Republicans, on the other hand, have never explicitly supported men, often engage in white knight posturing, and probably only get more male support because they are not in favor of taxing men as much.

There is really no party for men, so men tend to vote against the party that angers them. In fact, this is why the Democrats control the White House and Congress today. Men felt cheated and lied to by the Republicans during the Bush administration, and switched their allegiance in 2008, handing power to the Democrats. Now that the Democrats have had two years to remind men what they do when in power, men are angry at them all over again.

A poll recently released by the NY Times and CBS indicates that men are not only more upset about what the US government is currently doing, they are much more motivated to do something about it than women, who have expressed less interest in the midterm elections, as well as a good degree of confusion about the issues:

> So far in this election, women are not nearly as attentive as men and express less enthusiasm about voting, the poll found. Men are more likely than women to fall into the category of voters who say they are paying a lot of attention to the campaign right now. They are also more likely than women to say they are more enthusiastic about voting in this congressional election than they remember being in past mid-terms elections.
> The poll suggests that men are angrier than women, and that their anger may be more motivating than the sense of hopelessness expressed by women, particularly on economic issues.
> “I’m confused as who to vote for,” said one of the poll respondents, Diana Rhoads of Hallam, Pa., a 59-year-old independent who voted for President Obama. “I just don’t know who I can count on to move us in the direction I’d like to see the country go. Frankly, the financial problems are beyond our understanding.”

This raises the question of why Republicans, if they really want to win, are ignoring their main constituency. However, perhaps more importantly, it points to the lack of a party that men can support without fatal reservations, and may suggest that the Republican Party is a dinosaur headed for extinction. If the Democratic Party is the women’s party, and the Republican Party is simply the party that isn’t the women’s party, then what possible purpose could it serve other than preventing America from becoming a totalitarian, one-party matriarchal state? Perhaps that’s something, but it isn’t much.

Unfortunately, it appears that the “Tea Party,” despite its grass-roots origins, is being usurped by attention craving and power hungry women. I can’t imagine that the Tea Party has anywhere near the support from women that it does from men, but it seems that most of its candidates and “spokespeople” are female.

How did this happen?

The problem is that politicians and political parties are always willing to explicitly support women where their interests are at stake, but I have never once heard a mainstream politician do the same for men. Because it is taboo to discuss men’s issues, they are simply never addressed, and inevitably the focus shifts toward women in every single issue in which there is some element of gender politics.

This is a big mistake. The way things are today, it wouldn’t make any difference if the media were to shame politicians or activists for bringing up men’s issues. Men would hear whoever did so, and overwhelmingly agree. They would vote for such a man (or even a woman, if she existed), just like they voted for Scott Brown in the race against Martha Coakley in Massachusetts to replace Ted Kennedy. Scott Brown explicitly supports fathers’ rights, and for his pro-men stance received a whopping 60% of the male vote, easily enough to cancel out the majority female support Coakley received.

A politician who wisely embraced men's issues would not only win over more men, he would inspire them and motivate them to vote in numbers above what your typically tepid, vacillating politician could hope for. Also, it wouldn't necessarily chase off women. Most women like a winner, and follow trends. Shrieking feminist denunciations could only make a politician look better.

It's time for some politicians, no matter what their party affiliations, to wake up and figure it out. In the US, votes count, and those who support men will get more of them.

They're Afraid Of Men Masturbating

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 20 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Christine O'Donnell, a candidate associated with the Tea Party, won the Republican Senate primary in Delaware who among many other things sued a former employer for "gender discrimination" claiming that she suffered "mental anguish". What O'Donnell is also known for is her views on sex — particularly her anti-masturbation views. O'Donnell appeared on MTV back in the 90′s explaining her views of sex and masturbation which is available here on youtube.

Watch the youtube video and take note of the end. Except for a token guy, it's a group of women. O'Donnell even says about her presumably future husband masturbating, "If he already knows what pleases him, and he can please himself, then why am I in the picture?" This quote exposes the undercurrent behind anti-masturbation attitudes. It's not so much anti-masturbation but anti men masturbating. People against masturbation have a fear that men might actually have an alternative to women. The answer to O'Donnell's question should be obvious. A woman would ideally be providing more than a man's hand both sexually and not.

When it comes to a woman who can't/won't contribute to a relationship non-sexually (a growing group of women particularly among younger women), and who is planning on trying to control a man through providing a minimum of sex, then she has a lot to worry about when it comes to men realizing that their hand will do more for them than a woman will. The obvious answer to this is for women not to be harpies who withhold sex as a means of controlling men, but it's unlikely they will change in that regard. Instead, we will see more anti-male masturbation shaming language.

For anti-masturbation shaming language, the Bible is used as a justification. However, masturbation is not directly addressed in the Bible. What is cited is the story of Onan. This has a serious deficiency as a Biblical stricture against masturbation. In the story, Onan never actually masturbated. What happened was that God ordered Onan to impregnate his dead brother's wife, Tamar. Onan disobeyed God by pulling out during sex so he could avoid impregnating her, thereby disobeying God. This has nothing to do with masturbation but disobeying God under a very specific set of circumstances. Nothing in the story even casually references masturbation.

Anti-male masturbation shaming language is not limited to religious conservatives. When women use vibrators they are praised for taking control of their sexuality. When a man uses a fleshlight he is attacked for being a loser who can't get laid. This is very similar to the anti-male masturbation shaming language used by religious conservatives. Both groups are worried that men may not be sexually dependent on women. That is what they are really afraid of.

Masturbation by men, fleshlights, and futuristic technologies like VR sex and sexbots are all attacked because they have to potential to give men more options when it comes to sex. Anything that even temporarily can replace an actual woman's vagina is or will be the subject of shaming language.

As more sex technologies become available for men in the future there will be more anti-male masturbation shaming language. Some will be religiously based. Medical myths such as masturbation giving a man hairy palms will likely make a reappearance. None of it will be rooted in medical facts, and they will claim that this is only limited to men. Whatever the method of shaming language, it's all for the same reason: to protect the pussy cartel from competition.

Acid Attack Hoaxer Bethany Storro Facing Felony Charge

W.F. Price · 21 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Ms. Storro, who infamously accused a random black woman of splashing her face with acid has, been charged with three counts of second-degree theft for taking money from well-wishers after she surreptitiously rubbed chemicals on her face. In a last-ditch attempt to appear sympathetic, she says she first wanted to commit suicide, but then decided that perhaps a new face was all she needed:

> …when I realized it wasn't killing me, I thought maybe this was the answer to all my problems. To have a completely different face.

Storro has admitted that she thought having a new face would solve her problems, confirming that the motive was fraud from the outset.

When women commit crimes, men's ignorance of their motives often leads men to assume that they are "troubled" or "unbalanced" because men, with their limited understanding of female psychology, have a difficult time gleaning women's motives. This has been a huge boon to female criminals, as absent a motive people have a tendency to view women's crimes more as an "act of God" than a true, calculated offense.

Ms. Storro's confession, although qualified, is a step in the right direction. If the court convicts her and she is sentenced to serve time, hopefully she will repent and leave prison a better person. However, without appropriate punishment, that may never happen. This is one thing we have to realize: we do not make better people out of women by ignoring or excusing their transgressions against society and the law.

Female German Attorney Goes on Man-Killing Rampage

A 41-year-old divorced German woman shot her ex-husband twice in the head when he arrived to pick up their son, killing him instantly, then bludgeoned her 5-year-old son unconscious before suffocating him with a plastic bag. After the act of family annihilation, the woman went to a hospital to go on a killing spree. After wounding two pedestrians with gunfire, she entered the hospital and pointed her gun at a woman at the front desk, but did not kill her. Then she proceeded to the gynecological ward, stabbing a male nurse in the chest and shooting him multiple times in the head, leaving the 56-year-old father of three dead at the scene.

The woman at the desk had contacted police, so they were on the scene very quickly, and a shootout ensued in which one policeman was shot in the knee and the lawyer was pierced by 17 bullets, ending her life. The dead attacker was found to have taken some 300 rounds with her, which suggests that she planned on killing as many people as possible.

Although it is not clear exactly what the woman's intent was, the attack appears to be an act of anti-male terrorism. Hopefully, German readers can fill us in on some of the details concerning the attacker and her motives.

The Third Wave Manifesto

By Naomi Padowicz of Retro Home Tips

In the act of writing this piece, I become a modern day Martin Luther nailing my manifesto to the door of the Church of Feminism. My generation of women, the so called third wave feminists are being ignored, abused and belittled by the feminist establishment that refuses to acknowledge our arrival into the discussion on women's rights. Please do not mistake my words for those of a right wing reactionary, I come from a long line of feminists, communists, democrats, and open minded people. I myself became a card carrying feminist at the age of four when my mother took me to meetings, rallies, and marches all in support of of the cause. I even had my Barbie doll removed from one such meetings as we didn't want to impose gender roles on children. I was born into this movement, I was raised a feminist. I am a lifelong fag hag, I am a Jewish liberal from New York who now lives as an ex pat and is a former vegetarian who has since seen the light… of meat. I am the epitome of the left wing socialist school of thought, and I believe that Feminism has seen it's day.

My generation of young women, of whom I write on behalf of, are very young and under current circumstances are not being given the chance to voice our new values and beliefs. The ageing feminist establishment instead treats us as an aberration and cannot begin to understand why we behave the way we do. I would like to correct this and set down our values and belief system on paper, and to announce the future of womankind.

The title of third wave feminists is a false title, women in our twenties do not identify as feminists. It is not cool to be a feminist, and in fact declaring yourself one is the fastest way to lose friends and partners. We are the first generation of fully emancipated free women, and our ideas about the world differ significantly from that of our mothers. Most women in their twenties have a a very loose grasp on what feminism is, if at all. We agree with equality, but the movement has gone too far.This is not to say we are not thankful to our mothers for fighting for our right to choose. When we say choose, we mean our right to choose to work and have a career or stay at home and care for the families we are now starting to have. We realize that you cannot have your cake and eat it too. The fact is, there are not enough jobs to go around and someone has to stay home and cook and clean and raise the next generation. The model of the feminist working mother, led to large scale divorce and chaos, and that is the kind of scarring we do not wish to impart on our children. As I explained in my piece Retrospective on the Flaw in Feminism and Career v. Family the Real Sex in the City Girls. Our families will come first in everything we do, and once we sprog we will leave the workforce, more than likely not to return. Does this mean we are not valuable members of society? On the contrary the role of wife and mother was so devalued by the feminist movement that we now realize just how precious this role is by the lack of it in our own lives.

The role of a mother is a very important role to us. Mum's pass on values, traditions, religion, language, and are partially responsible for basic survival skills. Mum's are responsible for raising well adjusted, decent human beings, that are courteous and well mannered. We realize that our role as a mum is the most important role to play and we want to be the very best Mums possible. This desire on our part to be the best Mums we can be, is driving us to learn cookery, baking skills, sewing, embroidery, knitting and many other essential household skills that used to be handed down from mother to daughter but were with held for fear of imposing gender roles. We are spending our time perfecting all the areas that first wave feminists labelled as patriarchal bondage. We judge ourselves by how well we can iron a shirt, or make a meringue. Classes teaching these things are seeing record waiting lists, with sewing classes making you wait 18 to 24 months for a spot in a classroom.

This is not to say that we won't work, a full time job is something we will do until it is time to settle down and have children. Unlike our mothers we do not believe that work is freedom, rather we see the workplace for the dark, depressing, prison it really is. As a generation we work because we have to, not because we want to. It has become embedded in the society around us that women must go out into the workplace and be just as good or better at their chosen profession than men. It is this standard we are forced into, and this standard that does not fit us as women.

The economics of women of my generation wanting to stay home, are difficult and in some cases can be viewed as a luxury. However, we are an ingenious creative generation who will find a way to afford our much desired luxury. Rather than going back to work full stop we will work at home, and find ways to bring in the little extra income needed regardless of whether that means selling home made jam, or doing tax returns. We realize that our skills as wives and mothers are every bit as marketable as any hard driven legal eagle, editor, or accountant. If I may, allow me to pull back for a second and point out the obvious, the world needs more than just lawyers, doctors, and scientists, and ad executives. In fact we could probably live with out the ad executives. But we will fall flat on our faces as a society, and some would argue that we already have, without cooks, seamstresses, bakers, cleaners, and teachers amongst other occupations, that are seen as less than palatable by the modern feminist.

The women who do not desire a family, and there are these women amongst us, will be married to their work and the end product is their child. These women regardless of profession will strive for excellence in their respective fields, but will not settle down to raise a family. For the women who start out as professionals and have children, it is not fair to guarantee a right of return to your original job when it could be many months before you return. The cost of training a temporary replacement is great, and it is not fair to that replacement to be put back out of work as soon as he or she becomes comfortable in their new role. We have to be realistic, it is not healthy for a person to split time between two full time careers. So why do we ask women to split themselves between the professional and familial worlds?

If feminism did anything, it took certain members of the power elite and stripped them of their ability to impose arcane and unreasonable limits on people, not just women. So maybe now would be a good time for the feminist movement to go off with its head held high, and some semblance of dignity and join all the other great struggles in the history books where they belong.

Because the next struggle which we are already engaged in isn't about Women, or Men or Blacks or Gays or Lesbians or Jews or Gentiles or Muslims or Catholics. It's about the survival of the planet that we live on, and it is about time that we got around to that job rather than worrying over whether a garbage man or garbage person picks up your recycling.

Dismantling Feminism: A Brief Introduction

Thag Jones · 22 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In order to dismantle feminism, one must see it first as a part of the larger movement of progressivism, particularly with progressives like Margaret Sanger, founder of Planned Parenthood and known Nazi collaborator. This philosophy has turned and continues to turn the values on which western civilization was built on their heads, which was always their intention. It might even seem like a classic example of "it seemed like a good idea at the time," but there are no good ideas gone bad, only bad ideas and good ideas. Progressivism and all its offshoots are bad ideas and the results speak for themselves.

It could be argued that the downward spiral of western cultural values gained huge momentum in the much-lauded 1960s. The prosperity of the post-war era brought a hitherto unknown level of general material comfort and stability, ushering in social programs and greater freedom to use leisure time unknown to previous generations aside form the very wealthy of the population. The result, it would seem, was a spoiled generation that, in its relative opulence, could only think to demand more – more freedom, more leisure, more fun. Fast forward to today and we have a generation of entitled brats who expect lavish rewards for every banal accomplishment. As an example that seems harmless enough on the surface, take graduation ceremonies for kindergarten or even daycare. Who benefits from this? Surely not the children, who are only being trained to expect promotion for little actual work. The parents beam with pride, each watching the whole event on small screens as they preserve the auspicious occasion on digital video cameras and cell phones, as though the child had accomplished something out of the ordinary.

Undeserved rewards, which have come to be known as "rights," have grown out of this progressive movement, of which feminism is a significant and formidable part. I cannot imagine the traditional head of household father getting excited the way today's parents do about an accomplishment as trivial as little Bobby's first crap in a plastic potty, but that is what a good many parents do now, because little Bobby has a right to feel good about himself – also known as self-esteem, that squishy, psychobabble nonsense that tells us we should always regard ourselves highly no matter what losers we might be. In the meantime, self-respect has gone down the toilet along with the strong moral sense that made this civilization great. Like cash payments for good grades, many young people today expect rewards for doing something that should be its own reward and that should be done anyway.

Along with the rise of the concept of "self-esteem" has come explicit permission to do whatever one wants because, if one has "self-esteem," one regards one's self favourably no matter what an abomination one becomes. Everything becomes a route to "empowerment" in this culture of unearned rewards and no responsibility. When a person is taught that he (and I use "he" as a neutral pronoun, much to the chagrin of feminists) doesn't have to do anything to earn respect from others or himself, why bother being a decent person? Why bother struggling through "mistakes" when you can just have an abortion? So what comes next is the disintegration of the family unit – because people aren't feeling "fulfilled" enough within the confines of marriage and need to "find themselves" – and the total devaluation of human life.

Of course the irony is that now that so many women have been duped by feminism, women are on the whole less happy now than ever, thanks to all these wonderful changes that have taken place. Government schools have been dumbed down to a shameful degree, single parent (usually the mom) "families" are so normal now that girls grow up thinking it's a viable life choice to stay single and reproduce, the "right to choose" (choose what? The colour of the drapes?) is an unquestionable stance within feminism, and all the traditionally female realms (sewing, cooking, etc.) are sneered at by the enlightened sisterhood. Because of that, we are more dependent than ever on the state and corporations to provide for us what a family used to be able to provide for itself.

All this feminist-progressivist brainwashing has rendered us slaves, units of production without value, and where reproduction is concerned – formerly a key motivation for family life – we are all disposable. A woman can get sperm from a sperm bank or a one night stand, or easily dispose of her husband (or unborn offspring) should they be inconvenient to her, thereby making man and child disposable and woman not much more than a free whore and a maker of replacement units that she can ship off to daycare at six weeks old to be paid for by the state.

Perhaps the undeserved praise we lavish on our children is a subconscious effort to make up for the way we've killed our collective spirit. We make children disposable, then treat the ones we "keep" like special snowflakes so that they never quite grow a spine. Wash rinse repeat. Looking into the future, it is bleak indeed if this trajectory isn't changed. It will take a great effort to change it and it won't happen over night – heck, it may never happen for all I know, but that doesn't mean we should sit back and watch it all crumble. In a world where some mothers think nothing of pole "dancing" lessons for kids, we are headed for nothing but lewdness and vulgarity. The movie, Idiocracy, doesn't look all that far fetched, which is a sad statement indeed.

Stripper Runs Man Over, Drags Him Over a Mile

Kristina Hensley, a Higginsport Ohio single mother and "exotic dancer" has been charged with murder, aggravated robbery and hit and run for dragging Jae Cho over a mile to a gas station after running him down with her SUV.

Ms. Hensley, who worked for "Naughty Bodies," contends that Mr. Cho touched her "inappropriately," chased her with a weapon and threatened to slash her tires. She said he jumped in front of her car, and then apparently she forgot he was there, because she said she "felt something" while driving away and could hear "something" underneath the car.

However, when she arrived at the gas station, where a worker found the deceased victim, she was hollering about Cho jumping in front of the car, and was hysterical by the time the policeman showed up.

Prosecutors have said there is evidence that Cho was killed while being robbed.

Cho's friend William Weitz showed up at Hensley's hearing with a program from his friend's funeral, saying: "I am hoping justice is served here."

Hensley's neighbor said she provided for her children by stripping because it was "easy money" for her.

Breaking News: Seattle Woman Goes on Rampage, Four Dead

Four dead and one wounded in Seattle after a middle-aged woman opened fire with two handguns. SWAT entered the home in a working-class neighborhood in West Seattle after the gunfire stopped, finding four people with gunshot wounds inside. One wounded person was found outside the house by officers when they responded to the shooting. The survivor, who is the woman's daughter, says she "went crazy and shot everyone."

Justice Scalia: Constitution Does Not Ban Sex Discrimination

Writing for Time, which has apparently become a feminist mouthpiece, Adam Cohen rips into Justice Antonin Scalia for saying that the 14th amendment, which was specifically written to enfranchise former slaves, was never intended to ban sex discrimination. Cohen is disturbed that Scalia refuses to "reimagine" the Constitution, which is supposedly an "organism that was meant to grow."

Actually, Cohen has it a bit wrong here. The Constitution was not intended to be the growing organism, but rather the people it serves. So, yes, the Constitution is subject to change, but there is a process for doing so. Reinterpreting it from the bench to suit modern trends was not the process the framers had in mind. Scalia correctly points out that the proper procedure for this is through legislation rather than judicial creativity, saying:

> If the current society wants to outlaw discrimination by sex, you have legislators.

I'll take a little bit of liberty in interpreting Scalia, and speculate that what he is really saying is:

"you know you can outlaw discrimination by sex, but you don't really want to — you just want us judges to pick and choose from the bench in your favor."

Any Supreme Court Justice knows full well that outlawing sexual discrimination would make a good many of the laws that pertain to the respective sexes technically illegal, and that these laws overwhelmingly favor women. The Equal Rights Amendment didn't fail ratification because men stood up and put a stop to it — it died because some women clearly saw the implications and didn't want anything to do with it. Women may often seem nutty and confused from a male perspective, but, just like men, they are rational actors in their own self-interest.

The death gap, the mancession, the glass ceiling and the prison gap are all partly due to legislation that favors women. Child custody and family law imbalances are a result of the same. Women are preferentially given less demanding and more secure jobs in government, they are favored in business loans, and receive more than their fair share in education and health care. All of this and much more could be challenged if sex discrimination were outlawed.

Of course, that doesn't mean it would change, but the law would still be there, and even if a current court ignores it a future court might pay closer attention.

Unfortunately, too many Americans today are infected with a kind of intellectual laziness — actually, it's more like a selfish stupidity. When certain groups demand that judges legislate from the bench in their favor, what they are really doing is betraying a desire to have their cake and eat it. Women don't really want sexual equality — they want to keep their current advantages and use "equality" as a justification for leveraging themselves into an even more privileged position.

If people in black robes do it for them, that suits them fine.

Who Will be Our Spartacus?

By Christopher Quinn

In order for the men's rights movement to go mainstream it needs a Spartacus who will lead the oppressed in fighting their oppressors

The men's rights movement has made great progress in recent years, but the movement has not gone mainstream. There have been no major demonstrations, no real coverage in the mainstream media, and no best-selling book that has caught the attention of the general population. Until this happens, the movement will only be able to gain limited ground. What the men's rights movement needs is a Spartacus. The historical Spartacus was a man who emerged from the crowd to lead a revolt against his oppressors and fought for the rights of his people. While the men's rights movement may not need a single leader, it does need a man who can communicate the message of the men's rights movement in a way that will persuade the rest of society that our cause is just.

The real Spartacus was a Roman slave who demanded freedom for himself, and the end of all slavery, in Ancient Rome. Spartacus was from Thrace, which was an area of modern day Greece and Bulgaria that was part of the Roman Empire. Spartacus was not born a slave; he was either a Roman soldier or was taken captive by Roman soldiers, and was condemned to slavery. Once a slave, he was be trained as a gladiator. Gladiators were a special class of slaves who were forced to fight each other in Roman arenas to entertain the public. The gladiators received rigorous training in special schools, and were treated cruelly by their captors.

In about 73 B.C., Spartacus and approximately seventy other gladiators escaped from a gladiator school using stolen kitchen tools to fight their captors. Once free, the men chose Spartacus and two other escaped gladiators, named Crixus and Oenamus, as their leaders, and took up a position on Mount Vesuvius. Spartacus and his men held their position on Mount Vesuvius and won battles against the professional Roman army. They inspired more slaves and local peasants with a grudge against Rome to join their cause, and their numbers grew to between 70,000 and 100,000 men.

Spartacus was apparently a brilliant military leader, using clever tactics to outwit the Roman commanders. Slaves had rebelled before, and eventually been defeated. In fact, Spartacus and his men mounted what became a full-scale war that is now known as the Second Servile War – essentially a civil war within the Empire in which the underclass attempted to overthrow Roman rule. The Roman Senate attempted to stop this slave rebellion and sent eight Roman legions, about 40,000 to 50,000 soldiers, to defeat the slaves. After successfully holding their own against the Romans, the Senate sent reinforcements. Spartacus' men made a last stand, and suffered their defeat. Most were killed on the battlefield. It is believed that Spartacus himself died while attempting to take down the Roman general, Crassus. The remainders of the slave army fled, and were hunted down by the Romans. Some likely escaped, but over 6,000 slaves were caught and crucified along the road leading to Rome as a warning sign to others.

In truth, we don't know what Spartacus' motives really were. Some historians believe that he was simply trying to win freedom for himself and his men, and escape from the Romans over the Alps and into Europe. Others interpret Spartacus' actions as an attempt to reform all of Roman society and abolish slavery in Rome. Whatever his goals may have been, Spartacus ultimately failed. Slavery continued after Spartacus' death, and Roman society went on to force men to kill each other as gladiators for another 477 years, when the gladiator games were finally banned in 404 A.D. However, Spartacus has become a symbol for the lone man who leads the oppressed in fighting their oppressor.

A Spartacus is needed to transition the men's rights movement into the mainstream so that it can achieve the broad support of the public. Although forces have been gathering against men for years, the men's rights movement developed because of the anger and frustration of men who felt the discrimination for the first time. These men, who were busy working and taking care of their families, suddenly realized that they were not in control of their destinies anymore – the courts were, and their wives were. As more men became frustrated with their new second-class citizen status, they joined the men's rights movement. However, they are still only a small percentage of the population. Most of the population is not even remotely aware that a men's rights movement exists. To most people that are aware of men's issues, the men's rights movement likely consists of a man dressing up as Batman or Spiderman while protesting a family court decision. Activism such as this will get media attention, but the average man is not going to join in that activity, and the public, the legislatures, and the courts don't take these protests seriously.

Most men understand the problems that men face on some level, but they do nothing about it. Some men don't speak up because they fear disagreeing with women, preferring to play it safe. Some men may be cowed into submission, fearing that they can't win the argument. Some men actually advocate feminism without truly understanding feminism's hostility to men.

What the men's movement needs is someone who can find a way to make it acceptable for all men to state their grievances. Surely, men's rights organizations are having some success, particularly involving father's rights by lobbying state legislatures for shared parenting bills and challenging outrageous increases in child support obligations set by the courts. These groups are doing fine work and will surely continue to make progress on these fronts. The Tea Party Movement is proof that a leaderless movement can work, but even the Tea Party has some figures who articulate the movement's ideas. Sarah Palin and Glen Beck may not be the leaders of the Tea Party, but they are prominent figures who articulate the movement's message to the public.

This is what the men's rights movement needs. If the movement does not find some individual to be our Spartacus, the men's rights movement will go on achieving successes, but in a limited way. For the men's rights movement to go mainstream and achieve the society altering changes that men deserve, the movement needs a Spartacus.

The Effects Of Western Feminism – An Islamic Perspective

Charles Martel · 24 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We Western men understand only too well how feminism affects us. We compete with women in education and in the workplace on a playing field tilted by the heavy hand of Government. We pay taxes that fund the feminist organizations that seek to disenfranchise us. We struggle to find a moral woman with whom we can build a family. We suffer quietly as our children are taken from us.

Our experience of Western feminism is personal. Our responses are tactical – game, MGTOW, the marriage strike.

Beyond the personal effects of feminism, there is a big picture, a much bigger picture. Virtually all Western governments stagger under the burden of decades of reckless spending. Our borders lie open to a flood of immigrants, legal and illegal, who are drawn by our inexplicable generosity.

The strategic vulnerability of Western culture, weakened by feminism and cultural Marxism, is only too clear.

Dr. Ghayur Ayub, a former Director General of Health for the Government of Pakistan, focused on this vulnerability in a recent article published on several Islamic web sites. (Disclaimer: the provenance of material published on the web can be difficult to determine, but this article does appear to have been written by Dr. Ayub.)

Dr. Ayub focuses on the implications of the disparity in Western and Muslim birth rates. His article attempts to anticipate the responses of Western governments when they finally wake up to the effects of uncontrolled immigration. (Will this ever happen?)

Dr. Ayub begins with a quote from Muammar Gaddafi.

"There are signs that Allah will grant victory to Islam in Europe without sword, without gun, without conquest. We don't need terrorists, we don't need homicide bombers. The 50 plus million Muslims (in Europe) will turn it into the Muslim Continent within a few decades."

Dr. Ayub continues:

"The average fertility rate per family amongst the Westerners is 1.65 as compared to the Muslims' which is 8.1. An interesting picture emerges when this is translated into demographic change. According to studies, it is known that in order for a culture to maintain itself for over 25 years, it has to keep a fertility rate of 2.11 children per family. Anything less than that would mean a decline in the culture. At the rate of 1.9, the reverse becomes difficult and it takes 80-100 years to correct itself. At 1.3 or less the reversal becomes impossible. Keeping these figures in mind, let us study the culture growth rates of certain western countries.

The figures of 2007 show that in France, the fertility rate was 1.8; in England it was 1.6; in Greece 1.3; Germany 1.3; Italy 1.2; Spain 1.1; and in EU as a whole with 31 countries, it was 1.38. These figures are indicative of a change in the demography of Europe in a few years. In other words; the European culture as we know it will cease to exist in the coming decades."

A Muslim fertility rate of 8.1. Wow! Can it really be so?

Dr. Ayub goes on to describe the demographic situation in Europe, country by country.

France (fertility rate 1.8): "in France 30% of children age 20 years and below are Muslims. In big cities such as Paris and Marseille, the ratio goes up to 45%."

The UK (fertility rate 1.6): "In last 30 years, the Muslim population there has raised from 82,000 to 2.5 Millions, which is a 30 fold increase."

The Netherlands: "in the Netherland, 50% newborns are Muslims and in next 15 years, half of the population will be Muslims."

Germany (fertility rate 1.3): "the Germen (sic) government reported that, "The fall in the (German) population can no longer be stopped. Its downward spiral is no longer reversible." It further stated, "It will be a Muslim state by the year 2050"."

Belgium: "50% newborns are Muslims and reportedly its Muslim population is around 25%. Its government recently announced that one third of all European children will be born to Muslims families by 2025"

Dr. Ayub's attention shifts to the USA.

"In the USA, until recently, the (fertility rate) was 1.6. It increased to 2.11 with the Latino influx but still fell short of the required number to sustain culture. Against this shortfall, the Muslim population in America rose from 100,000 in 1970 to 9,000,000 (9 million) in 2008……Four years ago, a meeting of 24 countries from OIC was held in Chicago. Its communiqué mentioned that "we must prepare ourselves for the reality that in 30 years there will be 50 million Muslims living in America""

Sobering stuff. Regardless of your view of the so-called "clash of civilizations," the simple arithmetic of Dr. Ayub's observations is difficult to dispute. While Western feminists wage their fratricidal war, our culture slips quietly away.

There's little hope for Europe. Many (most?) European countries lack the will to resist the Islamic Hijrah. As Dr. Ayub points out, a fertility rate below 1.3 in the native population is unrecoverable. Simple arithmetic. Greece, Germany, Italy, Spain and several other European countries are already there.

What about the USA? By 2050 America will stand virtually alone. Can we find a way to defeat feminism and cultural Marxism and turn back this demographic tide? There is much at stake.

Shrugging Misandry

Paul Elam · 25 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Paul Elam of A Voice for Men

The men's movement has long carried with it a strong undercurrent of frustration. We lack organization, have made all but inconsequential progress on the political and legal fronts, and remain on the outside of an impenetrable wall around the mainstream media. Countless times the ambitions of MRA's start up in a flash and falter as just as quickly. Uncle Zed himself has dubbed our tendency to undermine any emergent leaders, and each other, as The Circular Firing Squad.

In other words, we are doing just fine, thank you very much.

The negatives are real, but let's put a little perspective on this. First, it is critically important to consider that any movement a mere 40 or 50 years old is in its infancy. For women, it was 72 years between Seneca Falls and the 19th amendment; almost 50 years after that before mainstream feminism took hold, and still another 25 or so years before gender activists really started getting the power to destroy families and generally fuck up everything else they touched. That is roughly 150 years from inception to the resultant destruction.

And that was in a culture where base biology drives men to throw each other under the bus in order to open doors for women- and drives women to feel entitled to that kind of paid-for-in-blood privilege.

Following the feminist example is thus an ineffectual and agonizingly slow road for men. Feminists were able to whine their way into de facto governance by the same forces that quash men's grievances faster than they can be stated.

It all boils down to two simple but insurmountable equations.

Women's whining = pursuit of justice. Men's pursuit of justice = whining.

Trying to reason with or educate people in a culture where this mindset is biologically rooted is absolutely foolish. The people we would engage view all forms of support for men like they were dirty hypodermic needles scattered across a schoolyard playground.

Allow me to expand on this.

I recently read an article on a feminist website, Sociological Images, authored by a couple of female Ph. D's, in which one of the comments named yours truly as an MRA who wrote about men's superiority over women, and yet another person who commented said they visited A Voice for Men and found a lot of whining going on here.

Par for the course, right?

But let's just run a short comparison to further demonstrate what I am talking about.

Recently on A Voice for Men, we have engaged in the standard discussions that relate to men in modern culture: A police state that arrests and incarcerates male victims of domestic violence and enables female perpetrators to continue criminal behavior; a ten to one death gap concerning capital punishment that works against men; a five to one death gap against men related to suicide; the staggering attrition of males in higher education and employment; the utter lack of reproductive rights for men, and the incidence of false rape allegations against men which even the police are calling epidemic.

And that is just the past two weeks.

On the other hand, the article from which the comments I cited at Sociological Images was about:

Rulers.

[image]No, not heads of state. Measuring sticks. The kind that sell for $1.19 in your grocery store. It seems the fembots in question found a line of rulers commemorating great scientists of history, and a woman scientist, Marie Curie, had her own ruler under the heading of “Great Women Rulers of Science.”

That’s the horrific injustice that pissed off the author.

Her problem was (or at least appeared to be) that the women were separated from the men, giving us a default position of men as human and women as, uh, something else. Perhaps something less.

But wait a second. For half a century feminists have shrieked and bellowed and raged to get us to recognize women; often insisting we deluge them with pomp and ceremony, even over some of their more mediocre accomplishments. And let’s face it, even after 50 years of efforts for inclusion and assisted access for women into all realms of modern life, mediocre accomplishments are as good as it gets.

Still, when it comes to their demand for recognition, earned or otherwise, we have surrendered our reason (see: psychobiology) and complied. But now, even acting out of that acquiescence, and giving Marie Curie her own 12 inches of fame, this is somehow an affront. We have insulted all women, relegating them to subhuman status, by lauding their accomplishments in the “wrong” way.

And we are the whiners?

And that is really the point here. These educated idiots aren’t some isolated group of imbeciles. Well, they aren’t isolated, anyway. They are not operating outside of mainstream consciousness. They are mainstream consciousness. The sooner we get a firm and comprehensive grip on that, the better.

The current mentality toward men mirrors that toward blacks in the antebellum south. And no, I am not comparing the struggles of modern men to black slaves. Not at all. I am, however, most certainly comparing the mentality of modern women to that of slave owners, complete with manginas and white knights aplenty to serve as their house niggers.

They practice the same level of denial and entitlement that was needed to maintain justification for slavery. No amount of moral outrage will affect them; no amount of suffering (except their own) will reach their hearts.

And no amount of reason will produce anything more than the blank, uncomprehending stare of a cow seeing its own reflection in a pond.

With all respect to Glenn Sacks, just what does anyone really think he is going to accomplish in terms of popularizing our agenda in this kind of moral and intellectual void?

And there’s the rub. Where reason and dialog fail; where activism as we understand the word is a non starter, then responding with more of the same is as stupid as finding a sinister, sexist plot in the school supplies section at your grocery store. The more sensible route to go is withdrawal and intentional neglect.

Or, as Ayn Rand would advise, shrug it.

Shrug it all- the whole nasty, filthy rotten enchilada.

And it’s already happening. It does not require leadership or organization. You don’t need to donate money to it or try to get it on the ballot in your local elections. Men are now shrugging marriage, and for every one that does it will mean another man the state will not be enslaving through the family courts. And it will mean that many more children will not be ripped to shreds as sacrificial fodder to the system.

[image]Men are also starting to shrug partisan politics, chivalry, nationalism, consumerism and the mainstream media; all the slow acting toxins that have landed men in the position of needing a movement in the first place.

And it will continue happening because that is the nature of social physics. There is a pendulum swing in effect here, and it is happening in total indifference to feminists, mainstream media, and yes, to the men’s movement as well.

In short, we aren't causing anything here. We are just giving it a name, a voice and a language.

We chronicle what is happening; document it, and perhaps in our own way urge some men to reconsider what the fuck has been happening in their lives. But for the most part, I think that many men, when they stumble on our literature, aren't convinced by it, nor do they need any such persuasion. They just find something that finally puts some pieces together for them; something that articulates the unnamed knot that has been twisting in their guts for a while.

That is why I don't give advice, don't see myself as a leader, and don't want to.

Men don't need advice or guidance near as much as they need information. And if there is anything that most of them actually need to learn, it is that the only real leadership is in the mirror. Our agenda is defined by our own choices and actions. Our "cause" is our own life, on our own terms.

Most any man can still reasonably secure his freedom and well being with a simple (if not always easy) decision to shrug everything that gets in the way, and to be prepared to build and maintain his own life raft, instead of waiting for the government, feminists, or some supposed MRA leader to do it for him.

Our problem, if we actually even have one, is that there are a lot of MRA's who still have a hard time comprehending this. They are waiting for someone else to point the way. Or maybe for an instruction manual on how to act like a vertebrate. But give them time. They will change or end up settling for life on their knees, begging for scraps of shopworn pussy and pretending that they are still in Kansas.

I suppose it is obligatory that I state the obvious and say this is just my opinion, and that I maintain full support for the handful of activists that are trying desperately to chip away at the social and legislative machine that is hell bent on destroying men. But I also think it is pretty obvious that we spend too much time wringing our hands over a lack of progress as measured against feminist strategy.

Ironically, my greatest personal inspiration came from the mouth of a feminist icon. To be specific, from Marilyn French, who penned the following:

My feelings about men are the result of my experience. I have little sympathy for them. Like a Jew just released from Dachau, I watch the handsome young Nazi soldier fall writhing to the ground with a bullet in his stomach and I look briefly and walk on. I don't even need to shrug. I simply don't care. What he was, as a person, I mean, what his shames and yearning were, simply don't matter.

It was easy for French to make such a statement, because no matter how much she disdained men, she still lived her entire life benefiting from their sacrifices; an ingrate on the tit, she stopped suckling only long enough to complain about the free meal. It was her beta husband who put her through school, and of course she divorced him once he paid for her "independence," and made himself expendable. And this is precisely the direction a growing number of men are going, only with one very distinct difference.

We don't need women. Men don't die, or even get sick without them. There is no RDA for pussy. And as more men start to figure out that being on your knees is the wrong position to be in to receive a blowjob, they will also start learning to get themselves out of harms way, and to assume authority over their own lives.

As I have said before, women are the modern shiv that the government uses to stab men in the back. No one needs leadership to recognize that and act accordingly. All they need is a little common sense, and a good measure of the very uncommon sense that comes with being able to imagine yourself outside the role that has been prescribed for you.

If you are reading this, you likely are one of the lucky ones who have that kind of good sense. Enjoy your own rareness, and enjoy watching what happens when the time comes that men like you are not so rare.

Most men just can't do it. Fine by me, let 'em rot. They sure as hell won't hesitate to walk past your stinking carcass. They have the information at their disposal 24/7 to point to a different path than that of the mangina or white knight. And the more of us that Go Our Own Way, the higher the price those unfortunates that just can't "get it" will have to pay, and the more appealing our way of thinking will become.

Relative freedom is just a few short decisions away. All you have to do is choose it.

10 Health & Sex Tips For Men

Featured Guest · 26 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Micah Sparacio

There's a lot of confusion out there about health. A lot of people making a lot of money as snake oil salesman.

Over the last two years I've made a concerted effort to cut through the nonsense and identify the simple rules that really make a difference. I truly believe that health is the foundation of happiness, confidence and independence. On the other hand, I also believe that bad health is a major source of unhappiness (and low self-esteem). In fact, I struggled with depression for half a decade in my mid-twenties and this corresponded directly with the period of time in my life when I was least fit (about 20 lbs over my healthy weight).

Before reading any further, I want to be clear that I am writing this article to empower men to be their best. I believe that in order for a man to be his best he first must understand the context in which he currently lives and to know that he is going to be swimming up stream. So let me give a little context…

We no longer live in a man's world. We're in the middle of a mancession (by a large margin, men have been the losers in the current recession). The masculine roles that were once filled by individual men (protector, provider) are now served by government (militarization, welfare) leaving many men without a clear sense of who they are or what they are to do with themselves. Our educational system is failing young boys while catering to the learning and behavioral tendencies of young girls. And this is no more apparent than in higher education enrollment where the gender gap now strongly favors women. For the first time in history, a recent report indicates that women are out-earning men. 70% of all divorces are initiated by women, often for no good reason other than "negative feelings" about their nice but not so sexy "kitchen bitches" – leaving many men with the raw deal when it comes to child custody and wealth distribution. And to top it all off, men die at a significantly younger age than women, often while ensuring the security of a society that takes them for granted.

Now more than ever, as a man, if you live in the West you live in a society that is alien to (and often opposed to) your nature. If you want to live a strong, confident, logically consistent, honorable masculine life – you're largely on your own. You will find very little support from a society that tries to beat you down into submission to emotions and feelings and whims at every turn.

The one recourse that I think men have in the West is the notion of self-reliance. Paving your own path. Starting your own business. Doing things your way. Making a unique "way of life" in the face of a society that has tried it's very best to force you into conformity.

Alright. So what does all that have to do with men's health? Well, the health of a man (both mental and physical) is the foundation of his independence and self-reliance. It is the core of his strength. And if there's anything that defines manhood it is strength: strength of character, perseverance, confidence, courage and just raw physical strength.

If a man is going to make his way in this world, he first needs to learn how to be strong. The anti-Justin Bieber.

So here are some general health tips for men that may or may not be new to you. I hope they help shed some light on what works amidst the great ocean of noise we get from the media (and oh, the sex tips are at the end).

1. Avoid Unfermented Soy Products

Soy has feminizing effects. It increases estrogen production. Never give your boys soy based food. And limit your own soy intake as much as possible. Never eat foods that have soy as the primary ingredient. And try to just never eat soy period. Got it?

The reason soy is so prevalent in our food supply is that it is a cheap and convenient crop. Long shelf life + high profits = heavy marketing. Stay away from this poison.

2. Eat Lots of Red Meat

The healthiest, most nutritious, best tasting and abundant meat that you can eat in the world today is beef. Eating red meat is not a health compromise (as would be drinking a can of Mountain Dew). There is nothing bad about red meat. It is pure goodness (both in taste and health value).

So you were taught that red meat increases your chances of heart attacks? Forget it. Beef is great for you. And if you can get the grassfed version, it's even better. The reason? It has a better ratio of Omega 6 to Omega 3 fats.

3. Eat Lots of Healthy Fats

There is a myth out there that consumed fat equals body fat. It's completely false. The primary mechanism of fat storage is actually triggered by insulin production which itself happens to be triggered by high consumption of carbohydrates like sugar and grains. Think of it this way – as long as your body isn't constantly producing insulin to deal with a high-sugar, high-grain diet, you can eat all the natural fat you want and stay lean and healthy.

The great thing about fat is that it actually satiates – it fills you up. Unlike chips, candy bars and sodas – it's very difficult to overeat when you're eating natural foods that are high in fats.

As a rule, eat fat derived from natural sources like animals (bacon, butter) and plants (coconut and olive are two favorites). Avoid manufactured fats (twinkies, margarine).

4. Do Bodyweight Squats 3x Per Week

It only takes about 3 minutes to do a good set of bodyweight squats (I suggest raising your arms up over you head each time you come up), and when you're fit you can turn them into jump squats for a more rigorous workout. Squats are perhaps the most important exercise that a man can do as they can involve the entire body and result in high natural production of testosterone and HGH. I try to do these once every other day (making sure they correspond with those days when I could use a little extra testosterone in my blood;-)

5. Eat Plenty Of Protein

Our food supply is soaking in empty carbs but light on the stuff we really need like protein and fat from plants and animals. I try to get at last 60-80 grams of protein per day with the goal of hitting 100 when I can. I accomplish this by eating meat whenever possible and supplementing with nuts and Whey protein shakes (I use Trader Joe's chocolate Whey powder mixed with almond butter and a banana).

6. Quality Supplements

All men should take L-Arginine and Omega-3 supplements as a bare minimum. L-Arginine is a completely natural amino acid which helps improve blood flow throughout the body and radically improves performance where it counts (no chemically blue pills for me till I'm 70). Omega-3 supplements are great for the heart because they help restore a more natural balance of Omega-3 to Omega-6 fats since our modern diets are high in Omega 6′s. If you eat lots of fish, you can skip the Omega-3 supplements, but hey, I don't like fish very much.

Other supplements that I've tried and like, but aren't essential:

- Any high ORAC anti-oxidant powder (drink)
- Maca
- Saw Palmetto (prostrate health)
- Grapeseed extract
- CoQ10

7. Slow Movements Under The Sun

Slow, steady movement under the rays of the sun (vitamin D … and skip the sunscreen) is about the healthiest daily activity a man can engage in. A long walk, stacking piles of wood, hauling things in a wheelbarrow, gardening… anything that involves movement under the sun is incredibly good for you.

The sun is good for you. Our bodies adapted to NEED sunlight. Try to get at least 30 minutes of sun exposure per day. And never buy another bottle of sunscreen. Just be smart. Don't let yourself burn.

8. Lift/Pull/Push Heavy Things

The male body is well adapted to moving heavy things. Get in the routine of lifting heavy things on a regular basis. For some, this will mean doing dead lifts twice a week. For others who are more adventurous, it might mean getting a big old tractor tire and flipping it end over end up a hill. There are lots of fun ways to incorporate this into your daily life.

In terms of pushing and pulling. The classic pushup and pullup work very well (you are pushing and pulling body weight). And they are simple enough to do quickly in the middle of your work day (especially if you work from home;-) Another option I use is to take an old tractor tire and tie a thick 15ft rope around it and then drag the tire up a hill. I also enjoy the sledgehammer workout so I can feel like Fedor.

9. Reduce or Eliminate Grains & Sugars

The human body is not well adapted to processing large doses of grains or sugars. Yet our modern food supply is built around grains and sugars because of their low-cost and high-shelf life (not to mention addictive qualities which results in higher consumption).

Both grains (corn and bread included) and sugars cause inflammation in the body (a leading cause of heart disease) and also result in the body releasing insulin for storage of excess energy (a process we inherited from a time when sugars were scarce). Perhaps the leading cause of obesity is our insulin inducing diets which lead the body to constantly store the energy we consume as fat.

Thankfully, if you consume lots of fat and protein without the insulin inducers (carbs) then your body will use these macro nutrients efficiently and you will stay lean.

10. Sex Tips

I want to be off the little blue pill until I'm 70. Well, I'll settle for 60, but I'm aiming at 70. Here's what I'm finding works:

Get in shape. Erection quality mirrors overall fitness level. I would strongly recommend NOT jogging as it has been shown to deplete testosterone levels. Sprinting, on the other hand, in short 10 second, all-out bursts is great. As a guy, you generally want to focus on the things that require short bursts of intensity and focus on building muscle (not necessarily bulking up, just building strength). As I mentioned above, my favorite exercise is the bodyweight squat with jump squats thrown in. I can tell a difference in erection quality on days when I've done full body squats versus days when I've not.

Avoid alcohol on sex days. I know, it's a big sacrifice. But alcohol destroys testosterone. And it hampers blood flow to the place where it matters most.

Have a Routine. I'm a routine oriented guy. And on days when I'm expecting sex, I know exactly what I'm going to eat, what I'm not going to eat, when I'm going to workout, when I'm going to shower. What supplements I'm going to take. And when. Having this routine helps me get revved up for the actual act. And I just perform better. It's that simple.

Have a Mental Plan. Know what you want to do to her that night. And then do it.

So there ya go. Anything I'm missing? Any tips you'd like to share?

Father's Rights Are Wrong According to Amnesty International

Earlier this year, four Swedish high school students, two girls and two boys, created a short film about fathers and how Swedish courts routinely take their children away from them. The students submit it to an Amnesty International-sponsored film competition. The film makes it to the finals, the creators are invited to the final competition ceremony in Gothenburg, and then the film simply…disappears. It is never shown. A day later, the film is removed from AI's video channel. No explanation is given. Just poof, it's gone.

A short time later, the story goes, one of the students obtains an email purportedly sent from the feminist activists that run an Uppsala women's shelter thanking their followers for answering their call to protest AI's plan to show the film and taking credit for having the film removed from AI's lineup. Of course, AI denies that the group's protest resulted in the removal of the film, but given the content of AI's own website regarding violence against women, I am skeptical. A more credible explanation is that AI (a) sincerely believes in snuffing out violence against women, (b) believes that men are perpetrators of said violence against women, and (c) believes that any propoganda that advances the cause of men and fathers detracts from the struggle to end violence against women. It this explanation simplistic? You betcha. Is it accurate? Well, I think it nicely summarizes the hobgoblin thought processes inside the little minds of feminist activists.

To be honest, I'm surprised that it took this long for AI to be thoroughly infected by feminist ideology, given how AI swims in the same pool as other left-wing activists and their penchance for proliferating "rights" awarded by the political process. And now we see AI, rather than agitating for human rights for all, is aligning itself with those who desire to squelch the rights of others in a perverse zero-sum contest for dominance, as Stephen Baskerville explains:

> In recent years Amnesty has become a mouthpiece for the radical feminist agenda, to the point of pushing programs that violate human rights. Amnesty's campaign against "domestic violence," for example, is a prescription for criminalizing the innocent on a huge scale.
> Even on its face, "domestic violence" is a matter not of human rights but of crime. No one suggests that ordinary theft or assault, when not perpetrated by government agents, are "human rights" violations. They are crimes for which the criminal justice system either provides or it does not. If not, the system is dysfunctional, but it has nothing to do with "human rights."
> But this is precisely what is wrong with the trumped-up hysteria over "domestic violence" (and most accusations are indeed trumped-up): It exists precisely to circumvent the legal safeguards and protections for the rights of the accused that make free countries free. Newfangled gender crimes like "domestic violence" > exist to punish those who cannot be convicted with evidence.

> Why can alleged assailants not be charged and tried according to standard laws against violent assault? Because domestic "violence" criminalizes almost anything, even if it is not violent or even physical. In domestic violence cases there is seldom a trial, almost never a jury, and no one is ever acquitted. One study published in Criminology and Public Policy found that everyone arrested for domestic violence receives some punishment. Special "domestic violence courts" now exist for the express purpose of processing more convictions.
> It is based on this presumption of guilt that Amnesty can claim that in the US "a woman is battered every 15 seconds." Amnesty provides no documentation for this preposterous figure, because none exists. We also learn that "Amnesty International considers domestic violence a form of torture," demonstrating an Orwellian willingness to redefine words and cheapening their own campaign against real torture.
> Amnesty is quite clear that it is stretching the meaning of "human rights" into a backdoor penal instrument. "A human rights framework…enables Amnesty International to use international human rights standards and laws…to hold governments accountable if they fail to meet their obligations to protect women." [Note: the source of the quote may be found here, at AI's website] In other words, far from limiting government reach and repression, Amnesty is working to expand them.
> This in turn points to a larger problem in the trajectory of human rights law. When you accuse people of violating human rights – of crimes – you raise the question of protecting their own human rights at the most basic level of due process. Protecting the human rights of those accused of human rights violations is something for which "human rights" groups have shown little concern [emphasis mine]. On the contrary, they seem far more concerned with erecting an assortment of grand-sounding conventions, monitoring committees, and pseudo-tribunals, whose mandate seems to be to convict anyone who is accused.

It is quite unfortunate that an organization that once opposed totalitarianism and governmental abuse of its citizens has now become a proponent of it. And I really must marvel at the ability of the feminist octopus to insinuate its tentacles into every level of government and NGOs worldwide. It is really quite extraordinary.

On Leaders and Leadership

Featured Guest · 26 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Maximus

First, I want to say thank you to all the writers, readers and commenters for making The Spearhead something truly unique in the male blog-o-sphere. The past few weeks have seen a firestorm of incredible articles and, more importantly, incredible comments. It truly is inspiring and I commend Bill for opening the forum up to more writers and opposing points of view. The blade of one's spear is only sharp from the whetstone that it grinds against.

In this piece, I wish to provide a counterpoint to Paul Elam's essay on men simply shrugging misandry in our society, to just ignore it, and allow the subsequent indifference that men adopt toward women and the feminist state to bring down the system over time as it naturally will (i.e. social physics). In short, that the men's movement does not need leaders or leadership.

I would like to begin this piece by stating exactly where I agree completely with Paul.

First – shrugging off misandry is correct. Until men learn to just not care anymore what women think, nothing will change. A level of indifference does need to be inculcated and ingrained into men today toward what women attempt to shame us into doing for them that goes entirely against our own best interests as well as that of society's.

Second – I also agree that a certain amount of what the men's movement has become is simply a repository of personal experience and knowledge about what men face today. That in men finding places on the internet like The Spearhead and A Voice For Men, they are simply discovering in many ways something they already knew but could not put their finger on it – the current state of gender relations sucks! This is the educational and wake up phase of any mass social movement and it is vitally important.

Where I disagree with Paul is in the following.

First – the problem with leaving the movement at just that, shrugging misandry and ignoring women, is that the abandonment of masculine ideals and principles that got us into this mess in the first place will still remain abandoned. As much as men here would like to wish they can just ignore women and go their own way, they can't. We like the ladies and we like them a lot! To deny this is to deny our very nature as men. The marriage strike, "game", ignoring misandry, etc are all well and good, but it does not fix the problem, it only administers a temporary alleviation of painful symptoms of disease.

Second – the false assertion that the men's movement does not need leaders derives directly from my first point. Where is society once men walk away from women and the feminist state? Ignoring misandry and women will only take us so far, to the point of collapsing the system. What happens after that? If feminism has succeed in the spectacular way it has, it is because men have abandoned their traditional role of leadership in women's lives and in society's. This is precisely the crisis the male youth of today are suffering from and why they are crying out for leadership.

To lead is to be masculine.

To be a leader is to be a man.

To be a father is to accept the responsibility of leading your family in its values, ethics and behavioural norms within the community you are a part of.

You can't say you wish to wake men up from the feminist dystopian state which they are slaves to by asking them to walk away and then simply tell them… that's it. Go your own way. Ignore women. Don't marry. Sex can be had with good "game." I have no advice or guidance for you on how to live your life as a man now that you are free or how to go about righting the problems that caused you to walk away from women and society in the first place.

Without leadership, you have anarchy and that is precisely what the feminist state is creating and perpetuating – the crushing of masculine men and their roles as leaders in making society a loving, just, peaceful, free and respectful place to live, work and play.

Far from leaders and leadership not being necessary, I think they are vital to the men's movement at this point in time.

I have great respect for Paul Elam and the leadership role he has taken at A Voice for Men, though he wishes to deny and reject it. Any commenter here will agree with me I am sure, Paul is a leader in this movement whether he wants the job or not. I have learned a great deal from him and do consider him a leader in the men's movement. So to do I Bill and The Spearhead. I just can't understand why Paul does not see leadership, and the development of leaders in the men's movement, as important. As I have shown, I believe I understand his argument against it, but it has not convinced me.

This, my first article for The Spearhead, was brought about initially by Christopher Quinn's earlier article on the men's movement needing leadership. The subsequent debate over leaders and leadership is one of great fear and trepidation for most men I think. It requires that a man bring out the fullest expression of his masculine talents and put them on display and judgement in front of other men. Leadership engenders the kind of genetic, evolutionary terror in a man's heart through female scrutiny that no sexual rejection can ever come close to matching.

To illustrate this point, I pose the following questions to the readers here?

Why are we afraid to discuss leadership?

Why do we avoid discussion of and agreement upon a vision for what being a man is in the 21st century and beyond?

Why do we not have more articles on what we believe it is to be masculine?

Why is the natural desire for a leader to emerge in the men's movement such a hot topic?

Most importantly, why does there seem to be an agreed consensus here (as far as I can tell so far) that the men's movement does not need leaders or leadership?

I say it is because these questions are the most difficult a man has to answer for himself in his life, and therefore the questions most avoided, because the answers are most certainly not politically correct and will require of a man a level of courage, determination and self-discovery that most men do not wish to subject themselves to. Despite the desire to rid society of the feminist nightmare, I have yet to read anything anywhere that gives me a vision or belief system of what should replace it? Man, society, cannot function in a vacuum, and without leaders and leadership, a vacuum of even greater chaos is exactly what we will be left with once the feminist system collapses – it will be every man, woman and child for himself. A vacuum of leadership is what Thomas Hobbes feared the most, what Machiavelli wished to advise safeguarding against.

To revisit Christopher Quinn's article, Spartacus was simply one leader among 70,000 men who stood up to the Roman Empire and said enough was enough. Make no mistake – every man in Spartacus' army was a leader in his own way, each and every one of them, whether they were at the head of the attack or defending the rear. Spartacus just happened to be the one man that all the other men felt best exemplified and gave voice to their collective cause, so they followed him and pushed him to the fore, that is all. A leader cannot have followers unless what he believes, the men believe as well. That means that every follower has the potential to be a leader, but only one will have the courage and commitment to the cause to step up to the plate and risk taking a spear or sword on the front lines of battle in committing himself to turning the beliefs he has, as well as the men that follow him, into reality.

Spartacus was not a failure for leading his men to their deaths. Those men all choose to follow him and to die for a cause they all believed in. Such is the price of leadership. Such is the sacrifice to to what one believes in. Such is the fate for those that try to change the status quo. Accept it, or go home.

With great respect to Paul, I am here to state unequivocally – Christopher is right.

The men's movement does need leadership.

That leader is you.

You… the one reading this article, visiting A Voice for Men and The Spearhead daily, commenting and contributing to the discussions. In many ways, all of us are already becoming leaders for this movement in the same way the fellow gladiators in Spartacus' army became leaders in their own way. In time, a few men will emerge at the top and perhaps one will come to the fore to embody and carry forth all the work of the men's movement of the past years into the mainstream. If we keep waiting for a leader, it will never happen. That is why it has to be you, all of us here, to make the commitment to become the leaders for this men's movement that other men will look to for guidance in becoming leaders themselves.

I believe that simply ignoring misandry and letting the feminist beast die a slow death is choosing the safe path. It would have been safer for Spartacus to simply take his men and flee to their freedom – just ignore the Romans and be rid of their empire in a far off land Roman rule had not yet infected with tyranny and slavery (i.e. the recommendation to not marry western women and look for a foreign girl not drunk on feminist kool-aid). In fact, that would have been the smart move. But he did not. Why not? Why is Spartacus seen as a leader? I think it is because he did not choose the smart path, the easy path. Spartacus choose the hard path, the right path, the just path, the only path that a true leader will choose. Without Spartacus, their would be no story for men to recite about the courage of one man leading many others in a fight against oppression and tyranny to overthrow slavery – the very reason Christopher looked to Spartacus for inspiration for his article.

I can give you another example. Why do you think the movie 300 was such a hit? Leonidas should have made the smart choice and worked out a deal with the Persians for Sparta, but he did not. He too realized the short term thinking and affect that that kind of choice would have on his country, his wife, his children. In fact, he was so far sighted, he was more concerned about the families of his fellow Spartans and the future of Spartan culture and society than his own reign as king. If Leonidas had simply cut a deal with the Persians, he and his family would have been just fine under the thumb of Persian rule as war lord of all Greece. But Leonidas knew that choice was wrong. The long term future of Spartan society under Persian rule was not something he was willing to just ignore and walk away from. Playing it safe, going his own way and simply letting the Persian empire expire in time as it would under the gravity of natural social/political forces was not the choice he made as leader. With the death of Leonidas and his 300, we have a 21st century movie blockbuster – a leadership story that is still told almost 2500 years later about free men choosing to die to remain free. Leonidas choose the hard path and set the example for others to follow. That is really what Christopher was asking for in his article about leadership for the men's movement. He was not looking for a leader per se, he was asking all of us to take a larger leadership role in this movement in our own lives and do as both Spartacus and Leonidas did… consider the long term, the bigger picture, what they ultimately wanted for the future of their families and society, not just the present.

We have reached a point in the build-up of the men's movement over the past ten and more years of blogging and forums where the time to go mainstream has come. You can feel it. The comments are filled with such sentiments. Staying in the shadows, out of sight, ignoring the feminist hydra and simply shrugging of misandry was the correct path to choose for the incubation of this movement. Now, we need to do more. We need to make the kind of bold choices that Spartacus and Leonidas made in order to make a point. Yes, that might mean some personal sacrifices on our part. No one said overturning 50 years of entrenched feminism was going to be easy. The time to come out of the shadows is now. The time for leaders to start emerging is now. This is what I believe Christopher was calling for in his article.

The one thing that encourages me the most with all the great commenting on The Spearhead is that what we are doing here is exactly what needs to be done right now. We are creating the leaders that this movement needs. Every day. With every article written and commented on. With every new subscriber. There is no hurry. No Spartacus need come to our rescue, as Paul correctly pointed out, men are already rescuing themselves. In time, a Spartacus will appear. As cliche as that sounds, it is the truth.

It is not a matter of if… but when… the men's movement becomes mainstream.

It is not a matter of who… but how many… men will come forward to lead this movement out of the shadows and into the general consciousness of mainstream society.

We don't need a leader to take this movement mainstream.

We are the leaders of this mainstream movement.

As Paul pointed out, all of our writings and musing here are nothing more than the outgrowth of what is already present in the collective consciousness of many men. This movement will go mainstream in a heartbeat the second men decide to make it so. That is what men do when they move en-masse, that is why women envy us. It may take us longer to get together and figure things out, for we are not as social as women are and our inherent need for independence and to lead our own lives free from the influence of others inhibits us from naturally co-operating with one another, but when we do… the women know the result. Whatever men decide, the ladies are going to have to live with it because there will be no more debate or discussion. The decision will be final.

It starts with each individual man in taking a stand for what he believes.

It starts with taking a leadership role.

To this end, I have supplied the below excellent books as required reading for men who wish to learn more about leadership and leading their own lives, as well as their wives, children and society, into the future.

"Reimagining Masculinity" and the Macho, Macho Murse

Jack Donovan · 27 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On the heels of Hanna Rosin's smugly shrugging, short-on-solutions piece in The Atlantic, titled "The End of Men," Andrew Romano and Tony Dokoupil cranked out a cover article for Newsweek recently that goaded men to "MAN UP!" With a supportive hand on one another's shoulders, they coughed and tried to muster up a tone that sounded authoritative – no doubt consulting the former writers of television's Home Improvement – and offered some suggestions for ways men might get back on track. Or at least remain men together.

The only suggestions they could come up with, though, were the same "suggestions" feminists have been giving men for decades. In a nutless nutshell (they are at least as biased and as dismissive of men who disagree with them), Romano and Dokoupil want men to "reimagine" masculinity so that they can adapt to the future that political progressives prefer to envision – a social, design and managerial class future where everything is magically grown and manufactured somewhere else. Feminists like anti-"tough guise" activist Jackson Katz, Gloria Steinem-approved Michael Kimmel, and MTF transsexual R.W. Connell have likewise been imploring us to "re-imagine" masculinity for decades. By thus "reimagining" hegemonic strength and dominance-based masculine hierarchies to value a spectrum of "masculinities" – from the mountain man to the meterosexual – equally, Connell et al. assure men that they will feel freer and become more socially and emotionally (and now financially!) successful.

From the perspective of most feminists – and the "MAN UP!" guys don't even bother to cite the male feminists, they quote directly from the gospel of Susan Faludi – traditional strength and dominance based masculine ideals emphasize sex differences, exclude females, oppress weaker men, and perpetuate a culture of violence. These positions are politically loaded and morally gerrymandered, but when taken at face value, they are basically accurate and can be reasonably convincing in the absence of good counter-arguments. However, the most important thing about traditional masculinity to feminists is that, by excluding women and emphasizing sex differences, it undermines the interests of feminists.

Amusingly, as at least one feminist noticed, Romano and Dokoupil undermine their own message by awkwardly wielding the language of the traditional man to convince readers his appeal is on the wane. After characterizing men as layabouts who need to take the "path to masculinity paved with girly jobs and dirty diapers" the "MAN UP!" guys invoke the heroic ideal – the man of action– when they imply that it is most masculine for a man to do "whatever it takes."

It's not that there is anything wrong with changing dirty diapers if it is a job that needs to be done. But that's a bit of a canard, too. I've never met an average, middle class father who actually refuses to diaper or feed his children. It's just that it isn't part of any "path to masculinity" per se. Changing diapers isn't about manhood; it's not a gender-defining behavior for men. It's a task. You don't have to overreach and "reimagine masculinity" to the point where masculinity is a meaningless, gender-neutral feel-good word to get men to help raise their kids.

And you don't have to turn daddies into mommies. Romano and Dokoupil mention Sweden's paternity leave system positively in passing, so while this would normally seem like an absurd slippery slope argument, it seems relevant to mention that at least one Swedish dad is now attempting to breastfeed. Sweden also has a different culture, a different demographic makeup, and an economy just smaller than that of the State of New Jersey. The "argument from Sweden," a favorite of liberal American europhiles, remains far from compelling.

Conspicuously absent here is any mention of the advantages women have in attaining custody of their children following a divorce. If women are truly thriving, and men are being left at home, an inverse arrangement where women work twice as hard to pay child support to stay-at-home dads seems reasonable enough. Given the rate of divorce and the fact that most divorces are initiated by women, one would think this would be relevant if you are sincerely worried about dads getting more involved in parenting. Fewer people seem to care about disparities that favor the interests of women. But if you're going to re-imagine masculinity and get men to take an equal or better role at home, you also have to fight systems that treat them like secondary parents.

The "MAN UP!" guys also note that more men need to go into teaching, but again, they go by the feminist playbook and blame "Marlboro Man" masculinity (when will that cliché wear out?) instead of addressing any other legitimate concerns men might have. For instance, many men feel especially vulnerable to accusations of inappropriate conduct around children. This is not because they are afraid they might be tempted to do something wrong, but because people are more likely to suspect and accuse men of career and reputation-killing misconduct.

Family and educational matters aside, Romano and Dokoupil also believe men need to reimagine masculinity so that they feel more comfortable pursuing careers in the booming healthcare industry – specifically, nursing. This is one of my favorite feminist tropes, because a lucrative career in nursing seems to be one of the only advantages tone-deaf feminists can come up with to sell the complete abandonment of traditional masculine ideals. Your detachable manhood, apparently, is the key to your exciting and rewarding future as a nurse.

[image]Nursing is an iconic career. As with a policeman or a firefighter or a farmer, we carry around a picture of a nurse in our heads. For many of us, the nurse remains a compassionate female figure, dressed in white. Perhaps she has a cap on her head with a big red cross in the front. Maybe she's a sexy cartoon.

If you've been inside a hospital lately, you know that modern nurses don't wear sexy white outfits. The modern nurse spends most of his or her workday in some sort of frumpy pajamas. Further, the highly qualified modern nurse is probably not the person who wipes your forehead or holds your hand. Other, lower level healthcare professionals and caregivers do that sort of thing. A modern nurse is an educated, skilled intermediate level medical professional. They often have specialties and some are involved in medical research. Very little of what nurses do today requires an overflowing abundance of oxytocin.

So, from my admittedly limited knowledge of what nurses today do, I really don't see nursing as an emasculating profession. There are manlier professions, sure, but our culture caters most to female consumers, so it's hard to find a job today that doesn't require one to listen sweetly to the troubles of strangers and dutifully say "yes, ma'am." Plenty of manly contractors and movers spend their days prostrating themselves before a woman with a wallet. As such, I use the slang "murse" (male nurse) above only in jest. Men everywhere are made painfully aware that it is no longer a man's world, and the job of a nurse has changed a lot since the days of Florence Nightingale.

If writers like Rosin and Romano and Dokoupil were truly concerned about the plight of men in America, and sincerely wanted to help them transition into female-dominated—but not necessarily effeminate – areas of the healthcare field, why not address some of men's concerns about those fields honestly? Telling men to "MAN UP!" and become nurses is dissonant. If, as Romano and Dokoupil unconvincingly claim, emasculating men is not the point of this exercise, then why not lobby the healthcare industry to make nursing more appealing to men?

Why not reimagine nursing?

Separate the job from its female iconography and sell it to men. It's my understanding that a decent looking straight male enrolled in a nursing program can more or less play the harem bull, but that's not what I mean.

Why not change the name of the profession?

Sure, you'll have to change some stationary, but if it's that important that men become nurses, why not do what we did for the secretary? Outside of high profile government and military realms, the word "secretary" carried a lot of cultural baggage. At least partially due to portrayals in film and television, the secretary was seen as a perky female helper to the male boss. In the wake of the sexual revolution, women found this image demeaning, and the industry standard changed. The person who filled the role of secretary in the old days is now an administrative assistant, and very few men are going to bother ribbing a male admin about being a "secretary." It's not a manly job or a womanly job. It's just a job. No one really had to change ideals of womanhood or manhood to change the way we looked at the job. The old image is preserved on film, but more or less forgotten in the everyday working world.

Men don't seem to have a problem being radiologists or physical therapists or EMTs or X-Ray techs. They have a problem with the image of the nurse, and the word nurse. It's an understandable problem. The word "nurse" is a verb that we still use to describe the act of suckling a child on a woman's breast. It's anything but gender-neutral.

If you want to make the field of nursing gender-neutral, change the name of it and create some space between the old image and the modern job. It will take some time, but it's a simpler, more straightforward and more practical fix than "reimagining masculinity."

Elmo Game?

W.F. Price · 27 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As a father whose children watch Sesame Street, I found the recent controversy over Katy Perry's video with Elmo both amusing and somewhat perplexing. Sure, her breasts are hard to ignore in the video, but I'd think little kids generally have some recent experience with that, and it's hardly shocking these days.

But what I really thought was funny is that Elmo appears to be using "Game" on Katy Perry. Now, I'm no expert on Game, but I have read about many of the techniques on Roissy/Chateau's Citizen Renegade blog, and it seems that Elmo is taking charge of the frame, using kino, keeping her on her toes, etc. In fact, Elmo's so good that he's got Ms. Perry chasing him all over town. She's so hot for the little guy that she snubs that clearly interested beta dog who appears after Elmo runs off.

Perhaps that's the real objection Sesame Street had to the video — Elmo isn't being a sufficiently beta, obedient creature who does whatever the women want him to.

No, Elmo's got Game, and he's definitely an Alpha male.

Obviously, that was too much for the feminists at Sesame Street, who must have been deeply dismayed by how easy it was for the little red rascal pull a hot number like Katy Perry. Rather than run the risk that some four-year-old boys might begin to emulate their hero and start running Game on the playground, Sesame Street pulled the clip and evicted Elmo's admirer from the show.

Fortunately, we can watch it on Youtube:

Alan Grayson's Feminist Attack Ad

Thanks to commenters, we've been tipped off to an emerging trend of feminist political ads.

In an attempt to motivate women to vote in the Florida 8th district election, Alan Grayson's campaign has commissioned an ad comparing his challenger Dan Webster to the Taliban, calling him "Taliban Dan Webster." The ad features quotes taken entirely out of context by selective editing, suggests that American Christians are in league with the Taliban, and generally slurs Webster in a very underhanded, dirty manner.

Alan Grayson is apparently a committed feminist who supported the Paycheck Fairness Act, so the ad may accurately represent his true beliefs.

It is starting to look as though the Democratic Party has dropped all pretenses and is plainly becoming the feminist party. I wonder how that will work out as a long-term strategy. To me, this is a huge disappointment. The party my Teamster grandfather relied on to stand up for working men has stooped to selling the sons and grandsons of their most dedicated supporters throughout the 20th century down the river for the single/working female vote.

Marriage Sinks to New Low, Recession Blamed...

W.F. Price · 28 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently released Census Bureau figures reveal that in 2009 the proportion of married Americans fell lower than ever, dropping 5% in the last 9 years alone. Compared to 57% in 2000, today only 52% of all adults are married. The institution of marriage is crumbling under a combined feminist and federal assault, which has legislated it into something that is roughly the opposite of what it used to be.

Pointing to the recession as the primary reason for the death of marriage is entirely off the mark. The decline of marriage has been ongoing since at least the early 1970s, when no-fault divorce created an explosion of divorces and started to make men more reluctant to tie the knot.

Spearhead contributor Charles Martel wrote a piece on the decline of the marriage rate that suggests that if current trends continue, marriage will cease to exist within roughly twenty years.

In the earlier days of the decline, men were generally blamed, but perhaps the recession provides an even more convenient excuse. Or, maybe, those who still support the institution are simply holding out in the impossible hope that the trend will turn around when times are better.

They are deluding themselves. As long as marriage remains an institution designed to suck the lifeblood out of men for the benefit of lawyers, the government and women, it will continue to weaken until it meets its well-deserved demise.

Old Englishman has Had Enough

W.F. Price · 28 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for The Independent, Michael Bywater takes a stand against the abuse being hurled at men – older men in particular – in his latest piece. The article, titled "In defence of the older man," is a great read, and takes feminists to task for their hypocrisy, callous attitude toward men, and poor taste.

Amusingly, Mr. Bywater uses terms such as "gynocracy," and brings up the "post hoc ergo propter hoc" fallacy that has popped up a number of times in our comments. It seems that more and more men, including those you might have thought were above it all, are coming to the same conclusions we are.

Here's an exceprt:

> And then, following on from the initial sally by Professor Feldman's Private Widdle, come the professionals, in the shape of the Queen's Own Daily Mail, led by the ineffably strange Liz Hodgkinson, a woman who not only went publicly on a perpetual sex-strike but somehow persuaded her husband to endorse it in public. I suppose one can see his point, but now Ms Hodgkinson is asking "Why are older men so stupefyingly BORING?" See, she's been on a cruise and the men weren't interesting. She's been to a garden party and the men just "went round with bottles of wine in their hands" – where else should they be? – "filling glasses and saying nothing. They might as well not have been there at all."
> I imagine that they felt much the same. The main losers would have been Ms Hodgkinson's twittering gynocracy, who'd have had to get their own bloody drinks instead of waiting for some chap, who probably felt completely excluded and ignored by the women, but all the same felt it a mere gesture of politeness to make sure the ratbags got their booze.
> "When did most men in my age group become so stupefyingly dull?" asks Hodgkinson, and we'll ignore the former Chief Constable who commented on Facebook that it was probably at about the point they started having to try to talk to her. Coppers. Institutionally sexist. Right.

Bywater is focusing mainly on the attack on older men, but feminism has gone so far at this point that every man on earth is targeted in one way or another. Hopefully, he realizes this, but it doesn't really matter, because these random feminist assaults on men in general, as obnoxious as they are, have an edifying effect on men. Once one is exposed to their contempt and utter lack of decency, it tends to leave a lingering, rotten taste that is not easily forgotten.

Refuting Sarah Connor: Men Who Create Life

Featured Guest · 28 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Peter

Remember this line?

> Fucking men like you built the hydrogen bomb. Men like you thought it up. You think you're so creative. You don't know what it's like to really create something; to create a life; to feel it growing inside you. All you know how to create is death…

If you don't recognize it, it's a quotation from feminist icon Sarah Connor in the movie Terminator 2. The setup is that Sarah had just shown the creator of machine life that his work had led to a nuclear holocaust. While far from sophisticated, this bit of pop-culture feminism neatly encompasses the prevailing modern view of men and their contributions to the world and society, which is that men are primarily destructive and hateful creatures while it is women who civilize men, and are deserving of veneration for their acts of creation.

But is this true? I submit that it is not so simple. First off, the acts of creation that women go through are natural processes not of their own making. For a woman does not truly choose to have children, she can only choose to NOT have them, either through birth control or abortion. And while I'm firmly for abortion rights (as long as they are remade to protect men too), it is clear that women have prematurely terminated tens or hundreds of millions of lives, mostly for no other reason then their own convenience, since it's been allowed. Thus, while woman's ability to create the next generation is undeniable, the veneration of that ability is questionable.

So what about men, those agents of destruction and death? Did you know that two evil Patriarchal males living in the colonizing, racist, 19th century German Empire created billions of lives? No?

It's called the Haber Process, and it allows nitrogen to be removed from the atmosphere and turned into ammonia, a fertilizer. While our atmosphere is mostly nitrogen, our soil is not, and nitrogen must be "fixed" into the soil by the growth, death, and decay of plant life. By some estimates, without artificial fertilizer, Earth could not support more than 2 billion human lives. The story of course is not so simple – the dual nature of men is exemplified in Haber. He is the father of billions, but through his invention of mustard gas, the killer of millions. Still, the feminist narrative is looking a bit strained – after all, even in the example of this one man, the creation of death isn't ALL that we know.

A couple of other examples to illustrate my point. While traditionally in most societies it has been women, midwives, who have assisted in the birthing of children, it was a 17th-century Frenchman who created an ingenious device that eventually allowed for what must by now be billions of lives to be saved. They're called the obstetric forceps, and they're crucial in assisting in childbirth (see pdf).

Over the following several centuries, it was again men who innovated and worked to perfect the device, which is still in use to this day. Read the article, it's a tragic and familiar tale – under the Roman civilization, obstetrics was at an advanced state, but the knowledge was lost for centuries. When did obstetrics improve again? Under the care of medieval midwifery practices? Did the "oral traditions" of "authentic folk cultures", "passed down from mother to daughter" help things at all? Please. Things improved when civilized men got involved, that's when.

Another related example is the invention of penicillin, discovered in 1929 by a great man, Alexander Fleming. By the 1940′s, other unknown great men surmounted the considerable challenges of mass-production. But did you know that not only did the age of antibiotics help save billions of lives, it actually helped create them too? One of the most important applications of antibiotics is in the treatment of post-partum infections.

As you can see from the above link, "The overall postpartum infection rate was 6.0%.", so 6000 infections per 100,000 births, but, of those infected today, “maternal death rates associated with infection range from 4-8%, or approximately 0.6 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births.” That’s a whole lot fewer women dying from childbirth, which leaves them free to have more children later. Indeed, some have theorized that the baby boom was partly caused by this invention.

Not convinced? Look up the many examples of male inventions which improved agricultural yields, like the medieval horse collar which allowed a far stronger animal to plough the fields, or Canadian wheat, painstakingly cross-bred to withstand the cold and make use of an enormous tract of unused land. But the point is well made. One woman can create at most, what, a dozen lives? Thirty? How many has the hydrogen bomb killed so far? Sarah Connor, the brain-child of one of the biggest man-hating male feminists alive today, was wrong. We might not feel them growing inside us, but we create lives, by the billions.

Human Rights: It's All About the Clothes

W.F. Price · 29 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

If you browse through the "women and girls" category of the NY Times website, you'll always find an article about the "freedom to dress," usually in the context of Islamic rules concerning modesty. In recent years, it seems that the main human rights concern in the American media is this new human right, which surpasses freedom of religion, free expression and even the most basic of all: freedom from slavery.

Perhaps it is because it is overwhelmingly men who are victims of violations of the traditional human rights that women's right to define modesty as they please is now of a higher order of importance. The Ines Sainz controversy is a case in point. Feminists across the nation were outraged that a woman who walked into a men's locker room in painted-on jeans with cleavage prominently displayed was mocked and razzed by NY Jets athletes. How dare those men shame her for shoving her tits in their faces in a men's locker room? Why, the behavior of those men was disgraceful. There's certainly nothing indecent about women slutting it up and prancing into men's locker rooms… It's "equal access" after all.

Oddly, however, when strange men expose themselves to women, it is still considered a crime.

Different societies have always had different standards of modesty, and in the context of a New Guinean tribesman, a penis sheath worn by an otherwise naked man is considered sufficient. Likewise, many animist tribes require only that women wear a grass skirt. For some, absolute nudity is perfectly acceptable. Personally, I don't see this as my business. It isn't a human right, but rather a matter of custom, and following one's customs is arguably a more important human right than dressing in any manner one pleases.

Although it doesn't really matter all that much to me how individual women dress, there is some danger in allowing these childish concerns to override issues of real importance. For example, the Afghanistan war is often justified simply on the basis that the women are required to wear a certain type of clothing. That people are being uprooted, enslaved, massacred and forced to submit to one sect or the other is of secondary importance. Even the practice of "bacha baz," in which boys are purchased and made into concubines for warlords and wealthy men is considered less of an affront to our values than the burqa (perhaps feminists see some value in the transgender coercion inherent in bacha baz).

In the most recent article in the Times, the return of traditional Chechen dress, supposedly enforced by "men in jeeps," has become the focus of feminist attention. Evidently, women who dress "immodestly" (i.e. like hookers) have had paint thrown on them and have been confronted by Muslim men in the streets. Chechen President Ramzan Kadyrov has supported the return to traditional standards of modesty, and has denounced female human rights workers who have been criticizing the effort.

Tanya Lokshina, who works for New York-based Human Rights Watch, characterizes the freedom to dress as one pleases as a matter of freedom of conscience and right to privacy. I'm not sure why the freedom to expose oneself in public is a matter of privacy, but "privacy" has been proven to have a very elastic definition in US courts, so perhaps it is a fallback right.

The problem is that there is no freedom to dress as one pleases in an Islamic society — immodesty is an offense against the faithful. So, in this case, freedom of religion would appear to conflict with freedom to expose oneself. Islam and Christianity simply are not the same in this regard. Christians have definitely gone through various periods of restrictive dress, but there is nothing in scripture that explicitly forbids nudity. In fact, the late pope John Paul II stressed that nudity is perfectly acceptable when accompanied by purity of mind and intent.

Western society emerged from Christian civilization, so the so-called right women have to dress as they please is no more than a feature of the civilization they have inherited. Furthermore, Islam and Christianity emerged from entirely different social contexts; the former from a tribal, clan-based society, the latter the Roman Empire. To maintain clan cohesion, consanguineous marriage is encouraged — so much so that the overwhelming majority of marriages in many Arab countries are cousin marriages. Christianity explicitly forbade those relations, so obviously the two societies have an entirely different dynamic regarding female sexuality and where it is appropriate for women to flaunt their assets. In Christian culture, it was acceptable and proper for a maiden to display herself to wider society, whereas in Islam this was a recipe for disaster. Having young women consort with unfamiliar men violates the sanctity of the clan and has a tendency to lead to blood feuds, which can be bloody indeed.

Although many things have changed over the years, this fundamental difference remains deeply rooted in the respective cultures. Therefore, unless our goal in interfering with Islamic societies is to force them to abandon Islam, efforts to thrust women's sexuality into the public sphere can only be viewed as a cynical means by which to foment bloodshed in Muslim societies. So I think these women who are human rights workers in Islamic societies ought to come clean and let us know what their true goal is. Is it to destroy Islam in some new, feminist crusade, or is it to plunge Islamic societies into chaos and murder?

Perhaps it's neither. In all likelihood, these human rights bimbos are thoughtless and stupid, and don't have a clue what they are doing. In fact, they are so dumb that they don't even realize that the so-called rights they harp on are a legacy of thousands of years of effort on the part of the "patriarchy" they have been so busily denouncing in our institutes of higher learning. If anything, they are making a joke out the entire concept of human rights, and therein lies the greatest tragedy of all. When the definition of human rights has expanded to the point where it includes anything some contemporary urban, Western tramp feels is her prerogative, the concept will lose all potency and become a joke around the world.

Who would have thought that the moral authority the West earned through generations of struggle and effort could be squandered by solipsistic girls whose highest priority is simply to display themselves to all the world?

I have to admit that I do often listen to public radio and watch public television. It's an old habit, and probably a bad one, but it's hard to break. However, although I should be accustomed to the programming by this point, NPR still manages to find ways to annoy me on a frequent basis.

In the latest offense, NPR's "Talk of the Nation" with Neal Conan did a show on how lame guys are these days, featuring Hanna Rosin, of course, who opines about women's superiority and better aptitude for the "new economy." Fortunately, a fellow named Guy Garcia, who makes some decent points from a men's perspective, also participates, but he loses points for calling guys who accept subordinate status "evolved," which suggests he's another one of the "men are the problem" crowd.

Above all, the show is characterized by a smug attitude — a sort of victory discussion in which the conquerors pretend to have some concern about the vanquished. The real problems men face – institutionalized discrimination chief among them – are dismissed as though irrelevant. As usual, NPR is willfully ignorant and strongly biased toward a very particular, liberal and elite American viewpoint.

The transcript and a link to the audio can be found here.

Check out this passage to see how Rosin dodges the affirmative action issue:

> CONAN: There's another email, this from Cameron(ph) in St. Louis: I'm a married father of two, an electrical engineer by profession, married to a physician. I am supportive of women in the workplace.
> However, men are being unfairly discriminated against by affirmative action. For men to be happy, they need to provide. If women take that from their husbands, they undermine the success of the family. And there is a lack of positive role models, family leaders, providers, for males in the media. Instead, we have men being portrayed as less intelligent and subservient. Ray Romano and Homer Simpson come to mind.
> I'm not sure anybody takes Homer Simpson too seriously as a male role model.
> Ms. ROSIN: But that is an interesting point he makes. I had a large response to my story from the Christian community. It was debated a lot in churches and sort of on online Christian sites, essentially trying to defend the traditional role of masculinity.
> It's the old notion of wives submitting to their husbands but more broadly this idea that, you know, there is a traditional role for men, there is a traditional role for women, and it's extremely threatening when that's upended. So I think that's a common response to this.

She simply won't talk about the biggest reason women are doing so well these days: they have legislation, police, and lopsided domestic law behind them that puts men in a socially and legally inferior position — a modern day Jim Crow for the benefit of women. No, instead she runs off in another direction blabbing about those creepy Christian fundamentalists (maybe she'd just watched Grayson's attack ad and that's all that popped to mind). Of course, Neal Conan lets her get away with it. What a soft touch. That's probably the worst thing about NPR: you can always count on them to stroke their ideological comrades with a velvet glove.

What Women Want, Supposedly

Thag Jones writes The Forgetful Muse blog

I ran across this article from a "dating and relationships expert" and it's just so typical in its banality, thoughtlessness and show of entitlement mentality that I think it's worth noting as an example of the reason so many women have such unrealistic expectations of men and horrible entitlement complexes. What stood out for me what her oh so typical list of what she wants from a man, and it almost goes without saying that nowhere does she state what she has to offer.

> Yes, I want an alpha male to look after me, protect me, provide for me, be strong when times are tough and be the man around the house. But I also want a man who isn't afraid to cook, watch Eat, Pray, Love, talk about his feelings and not be afraid to be a Mister Mom in the future.

Mister Mom? What's wrong with "Dad?" Does she think dads can't be nurturing or something? But of course, she wants the perfect mix of alpha and beta, except that anyone with even the slightest leanings toward alpha is not going to sit and watch tripe like "Eat, Pray, Barf" with you. This stated desire for, essentially, Mr Rogers with a sex drive, shows a gaping want of self-awareness as well as a lack of appreciation that a man is a separate human being, not a made to order wedding gown. For all the harping on feminists have done about a man's "Madonna-Whore complex," this blindness to our own schizophrenic "Dr Jeckyll and Mr Hyde complex" is more than a little ridiculous.

What men are realizing and what no doubt is causing a quiet panic in feminist circles is that no woman who isn't completely blinded by political dogma would say no to John Wayne or the Marlboro man, but if she succeeded in turning him into Mr Rogers with a sex drive, she would be completely turned off. Extreme examples perhaps, but illustrative. The problem is that most women won't acknowledge these things because in so doing, she loses a lot of that hard-won upper hand in the relationship arena, not that it's been helping her much anyway. Anyone who is so blinded by "feminism" that they have to wonder if wearing make-up is a feminist act and attempt to redefine it as such so that she can pile it on guilt-free (kind of like sluts talking about empowerment, isn't it?) is way too invested in arbitrary rules, just the thing she claims to be rebelling against.

Another point here is this oft-stated "I want a man who isn't afraid to cook/ look after the baby/ etc.." It's a bit of a red herring, because men are not afraid to do any of these things, they just don't need to be turned into your bitch while doing them, and I think when you hear a woman say these things, it's a sort of shit test to see how far she can get you under her thumb.

Note the dismissive tone here:

> So how exactly can men become more masculine? Apparently by having a "man cave". As Dobransky explains: "Men need to have a den in their house, or their own bathroom, or a place where they can do their own thing without being interrupted. That is a primitive primal instinct in males. Without their cave, men feel injured."
> When I laugh at this statement, he gets serious and likens my teasing to a man making fun of a woman's big butt.
> "A woman cares how she looks. It's hurtful to be criticized about her body. That's how a man feels when his territory is taken away or his career is criticised. He feels exactly like she feels when her body is criticized."
> Right. Anyway, back to the alpha male becoming instinct argument.

I think she meant to say "extinct" rather than "instinct," but either way this "expert" has no clue about men, yet she is paid to offer advice on relationships and has written a book on the subject. And it's not just her, but all those of her ilk, who are simply making things worse. Why is the idea of a "man cave" so funny to her? She wants a "sensitive" man yet laughs in the face of a man who dares to suggest that men have some requirements of their own, "needs" if you will.

I've seen the calls here for some plan of action and while I don't claim to know what exactly to do about the problems that face us as a society, I believe one route to change is to keep hammering away with the message until it becomes mainstream. Part of this will be "preaching to the choir," but it needs to be repeated in order to find new ears.

Women need to wake up to themselves as well, so I offer these commentaries in the hopes that women will read them as well as men, and in the hope that men and women can be a team again. Those of us who are raising the next generation can do a great deal if it's done collectively, but in the absence of a majority, we must do what we can as individuals and go against the grain of popular culture. Don't let your kids wear stupid shirts with messages like "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them," or "Girls rule, boys drool." Why do we think this is funny? Imagine if boys wore shirts saying "Girls are stupid, beat them into submission" or "Girls make great pets." Do I even have to ask what would happen?

In the spirit of raising a better generation, I'll leave you with a light hearted piece of advice to sons that you'll never hear from most of the dads I know:

A Tale of Three Movies and Four Men

Featured Guest · 30 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Submitted by Anonymous

Taking the Red Pill with regard toward male-female relations makes you look at movies in a whole new light. You stop seeing the story the director thinks he wants to tell and start seeing what the director actually believes. You gain an appreciation for what you may have previously dismissed and perhaps a disillusionment toward what you had previously appreciated uncritically. You start asking exactly how realistic the scenarios actually are and how they'd likely play out in real life. You get a feel for how other critics are going to rate it before they do. So, given that I prefer to praise rather than criticize, one of these three will get my Stamp of Realistic Manliness Approval: The Expendables, Scott Pilgrim vs. The World, and The Other Guys. SPOILERS AHEAD!

Movie the First: Breaking all box office records for actually showing manly men doing manly things, *The Expendables*is still #1 at the box office. Sly, Statham, and Stone Cold would have been enough, but the movie gets bonus man points for having what I consider to be the real Old Spice guy: Terry Crews. (His Old Spice commercials were hilariously over-the-top in true Powerthirst fashion, and actually served to mock the lengths that Testosterone Poisoning could go without being as contemptuously dismissive of actual men that the insufferably overexposed New Old Spice guy is.) Big Hollywood, my designated conservative movie critic collective, loves it.

Movie the Second: Hyped much but making little money, *Scott Pigrim vs. The World*is about a guy in Toronto whose world operates by video game logic. It's also directed by the guy who made Hot Fuzz, so it's extremely watchable and intermittently hilarious. I suppose the retro-8-bit asides and overuse of the *Link to the Past*theme were meant to appeal to people like me (I was 11 when hearing and seeing them for the first time, so I'm right in that demographic,) but I couldn't shake the feeling that the rest of the movie was more meant to appeal to….hang on, where was the first place ever I heard about Scott Pilgrim? <Rifles through memory banks> Oh, that's right, in Kick-Ass. As one of two comic series, along with Shojo Beat, that are 'casual entry-level girl-friendly comics' specifically meant for girls new to this *manga*thing all the boys were talking about. Edgar Wright needs to eat as much as the rest of us, but this is one movie whose source material I'm not bothering to check no matter how well it's presented and how much of a nerd I am. Moviebob, my designated liberal hipster critic, loves it.

Movie the Third: The Other Guys. Will Ferrell, Mark Wahlberg, Samuel L. Jackson, and The Rock do a comedy by playing a, 80s buddy cop movie comedy semi-straight, which *almost*escapes the twin universal critic curses of 'it's been done before' and 'it's only a parody.' Both Moviebob and Breitbart offered muted praise and political criticism based on theme and story.

So which movie portrays males both sympathetically and realistically?

Well, if you haven't guessed already, *The Expendables Scott Pilgrim*both fail the MRA test for being exactly the same movie, dressed up differently to appeal to different demographics. Both Sly and Scott are larger-than-life heroes who slaughter many of their fellow men for *no other reason*than to save a woman they barely know who may or may not be worth saving. (Using the word 'fellow men' is no exaggeration; the men both heroes have to fight to the death! have easily been in their circle of friends and acquaintances without the conflict insisted on by the woman.) Both movies openly claim their protagonists are simply *this close to being evil themselves*when they start talking angrily (aka: truthfully) about why exactly they're fighting for the woman in question. And both make lame backwards rationalizations before the big boss battle that they're actually fighting for self-respect, or their own soul, rather than for a woman of questionable moral character and little propensity to forgive any wrongdoing on the part of the men close to her. (In *both*movies, the Big Bad actually *makes overtures of peace*when he catches the good guys! "Gallantry" was not always a word with unqualified positive connotations, and simple thought experiments on where the respective 'final confrontation' locales are going to go now that their major income sources are gone show that the heroes mainly did a nice job breaking it.)

Neither of the two movies gets one of the biggest reasons why a large number of men go to war or play video games in the first place-to get away from female-dominated society completely. Trust me, no man reads reams of military hardware and tactical manuals for their wives' sake, and no man ever played through the original Zelda just to rescue the princess. "I go to war for my wife and family's sake" is almost always a lie or at best a half-truth, "I go to war because it's really, really FUN and inspiring and challenging compared to whatever else I might be able do with my life!" is far closer to the truth, though seldom heard. Thus spins the rationalization hamsters at speeds greater and greater in both male and female heads, and we despair of hearing any unmixed truth.

And then The Other Guys along and tells so much truth it's like Roissy, Vox Day, EW, and the entire Manosphere just decided to sneak in a movie that tells the truth about men and cops SO effectively that the mainstream movie critics all miss the point completely.

Theoretically, *The Other Guys*is a send-up of the buddy-cop genre. But Will Ferrell is in it, and Will Ferrell has been increasingly using his comedies as a less and less subtle means of telling hard, unvarnished truths about whatever their subject matter was. Those subjects have all recently been 'how different types of men from alpha through omega react to the same environment.' Or: "How Will Ferrell goes from crazy isolated comic relief to the only sane man in an increasingly insane world."

The Rock (once again parodying an action career that he never really had) and Samuel L. Jackson play the hyper-macho alphas, gleefully and openly engaging in dangerous high-speed pursuits of small-time crooks while causing millions of dollars in property damage, and getting away with it through sheer masculine effrontery and crowd-pleasing media exposure. Damon Wayans and Rob Riggle (POW!) play the greater beta alpha wanna-be's, chasing the next big career-making cases. And finally, Mark Wahlberg and Will Ferrell play the 'other guys' of the title, the bottom-dwelling gammas who nevertheless get 90% of all the real non-glamorous police work done.

Beyond all the silliness of the premise, the greatest affirmation of Game as its own status comes when we meet Eva Mendes as Will Ferrell's wife, and Mark Wahlberg's increasingly disbelieving reactions. And then the realization that Will Ferrell used to be a pimp, (albeit a somewhat beta pimp) and it's stated flat-out that that's all Eva Mendes needed to know to fall in love with him. (After this turn in *The Other Guys*and her new sex tape, you may as well check her off it the 'gets it' column of the very small number of Hollywood females with both a realistic view of women and a willingness to portray it on-screen.)

Two other notable turns by Michael Keaton and Steve Coogan not only round out the cast, but give a sort of melancholy retrospective on where the protagonists of films like *The Expendables*and *Scott Pilgrim*would end up in real life. Imagine Jason Statham's workaholic Expendables character all growned up and living a respectable life as a police chief by day and an Bed, Bath and Beyond manager by night, and you've got Keaton. Imagine Scott Pilgrim having turned his creative side into an entrepreneurial career where he gets passed around by his domineering wife as both a moneymaker and a scapegoat for various financial interests, and you've got Coogan. (Also imagine the American turning Brit and the Brit turning American, but I digress…) Both offer a far more understated yet far more effective picture of what really happens to the creative and the motivated when they hit the expectations and corruptions of feminist society. Keaton repeats the disbelieving line "My son is bisexual" far too often for it to be a one-off comedic affect.

And now all Will Ferrell needs to do is make a comedy on family court that's as good or better than Liar Liar.

Canadian Hookers Win Legal Victory

W.F. Price · 30 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Following the North American trend of replacing rule of law with rule of (wo)man, Ontario Superior Court Justice Susan Himel threw out rules against brothels, pandering and living off the proceeds of prostitution. There is no mention of whether laws pertaining to soliciting prostitution will be similarly rejected, but given that the main stated concern of both sides was the safety of the prostitutes (obviously, lucre is the primary motivating factor for the hookers themselves), I seriously doubt clients will get any breaks.

In a number of Western countries, there have been moves to decriminalize prostitution even as laws pertaining to soliciting prostitutes are beefed up or retained. This is only one of the recent examples of collaboration between conservatives and feminists. Basically, the conservatives bring their burning desire to white knight for whores (i.e. sublimated sexuality) to the table, and the feminists say: "well, we have a deal for you — just let those poor little angels alone and we'll give you all the authority you could ever want to smash up those bad, bad men who violate the pure, innocent little creatures."

Seems the conservatives bite every time, and never learn. Wouldn't surprise me if some hookers threw in a freebie for the attorney general every now and then to sweeten the deal and possibly gain some blackmail leverage.

Although most hookers are not exactly feminist ideologues, they do tend to lean in that direction. And feminists themselves are obsessed with prostitution. There are three reasons for this:

1. Lots of feminists are lesbians, and like fooling around with hookers themselves.

2. There's a lot of money in the business.

3. Controlling access to the "sex trade" gives feminists a good deal of control over men.

In short, it's a racket, and it's for the benefit of women, so of course it's a feminist issue.

Not once have I ever seen a conservative or feminist – or even a politician of any sort for that matter – condemn prostitutes for preying on men. There's always this dark subtext of the "bad customer" lurking out there somewhere in suburbia, his dark fantasies hidden behind his otherwise respectable, middle-class lifestyle. Yes, there are some sick men out there who murder prostitutes, such as Gary Ridgway, AKA The Green River Killer, and the Pickton brothers with their "Piggy Palace" up in British Columbia. Incidentally, while Ridgway was true to the serial killer "lone wolf" stereotype, the Picktons were essentially pimps who counted a number of women as associates in debauchery. Vancouver prostitutes knew the Pickton farm quite well, attended parties there frequently, and at least a few of them likely knew that people were being killed there — it's pretty hard to hide dozens of murders within a subsection of society. Ironically, Justice Himel is using the Pickton case as a justification for tossing out the laws regulating prostitution, but her removal of rules against brothels will only make it all the easier for guys like that to set up stables on their own property.

However, the vast majority of johns are just guys who want to get laid, which means they are pretty normal. Of course, wanting to get laid does not equate to visiting prostitutes, but for some men it is the most expedient solution, and there are plenty of women willing to oblige them for a fee. But first, we ought to be clear about who came up with the idea, and who is really responsible for the sex trade. Most men, at least those who live in cities, have probably been propositioned by prostitutes at one point or another in life. I can't even remember how many times it has happened to me, but I do remember that women were propositioning me before I was even a legal adult. Men don't generally think "I want to give that woman my money;" they think "I want to have sex." The idea of bartering money for sex originated with the female, hence the profession is an example of female ingenuity. The risks, like the risk of being a fisherman or logger, are taken on knowingly in the expectation that potential profit outweighs those risks. And it is the profit that is exactly the motive behind these moves hookers are making to remove laws regulating their business.

What these Canadian prostitutes are demanding is that the government deregulate their industry without lowering the risk to clients — actually, if the article is any indication they want to raise clients' risk:

> This decision means that sex workers can now pick up the phone, and call the police and report a bad client. This means that we no longer have to be afraid, that we can work with the appropriate authorities.

How much do you want to bet a hooker will never threaten to call the cops if a guy doesn't give her more money than initially agreed upon?

Of course, any hooker with an ounce of business sense won't do that, but they will be counting on the risks to clients to keep fees up. If prostitution were simply legal and unregulated on both ends (or totally ignored by authorities), it would become so cheap that only the best could support themselves. I've read that Russian hookers will sometimes perform simply for a sandwich and a can of soda pop.

So we have to see these feminist rulings for what they truly are: more moves to tilt the field in women's favor. Women's safety isn't really a concern, the risks and problems prostitution can pose for men aren't even considered at all, and the real goal is simply to use the police and courts to prop up the sex trade by foisting the risk onto clients, and, in a very real sense, by taking on the role of the pimp (historically it has been common for policemen to engage in pimping, so that's nothing new). That Susan Himel, an officer of the court, went along with this is little surprise. After all, as powerful females such as Sonya Sotomayor are wont to proclaim, she is a woman first, and a judge second.

W.F. Price · 30 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Labour solicitor general Vera Baird says English law is too harsh on women who kill "out of fear," whereas men who kill in the heat of the moment after, say, finding their wife in bed with another man, are not sufficiently punished. The old, common law "defence of provocation" is to be abolished and replaced by a new law called "loss of control." Infidelity is explicitly excluded from the new law, so now there will be no reduction to manslaughter for wronged spouses – even if a man comes home to find his wife naked in his bed with another man – but if the victim said something "extremely grave," for example, "your arse looks fat in that dress," the killer may have a partial defense.

As long as the defendant has a "justifiable sense of being seriously wronged" (remember, infidelity doesn't count), this feeling can be used as a defense. When women do heinous things, they usually do have a sense that they have been wronged. A woman can justify cheating on her husband and ruining his life because he didn't pay her enough attention, he wasn't making enough money, or even if he didn't respond properly to shit tests — murder is only the far end of the spectrum where that behavior is concerned. And if we listen to feminists, who apparently run Britain's courts today, women's behavior is always justifiable.

Every woman who murders a man is now going to drag the dead victim through the mud in court. Although attorneys are not allowed to question the past behavior of a rape accuser – even when there's no solid evidence that a rape has been committed – it's now perfectly acceptable to cast aspersions on the character of murdered men.

I used to think some of the more radical solutions men are proposing, such as never living with a woman, were going a bit far, but they are looking more and more rational every day. Every day brings new news of the eroding legal status of men and the ascent of women. When women really have the reins – and it looks like they may actually pull it off – one can only imagine what an avalanche of injustices will come pouring down from on high.

A Plea to the Feminine

By Keyster

Allow me to venture for a moment into the ethereal world in which women seem to live. One devoid of hard facts, logic and reason, that tends to aggravate them so when used to defend a position. You see something has been happening. It began about a century or so ago when they decided to slowly adjust their standards of modesty and reached a tipping point in the 1960's when it was determined femininity was weakness. To exhibit certain feminine traits was to yield that much more power to the oppressive patriarchy. Becoming more masculine in dress, manner, speech and actions was viewed as claiming that power from men. Becoming a man became the new woman, because supposedly men had it so much better.

Almost everything that defined a woman or womanhood up until then has given way to being more like a man. While, depending on the occasion or their mood, they still cling to certain aspects of female styling's such as the dress, lipstick, bra and shoes, they otherwise dress like men; never sure when looking female might work to their advantage. Imagine a world where men decided to dress and act like women? Women wouldn't like it. But we men, such as we are, can overlook a lot of things in the spirit of sexual conquest. (Obviously we have been, up until now.) Because underneath that pantsuit or those jeans, we know there must be a real woman, and sometimes there actually is. It's our physical drive to copulate and social pressure to be mated that keeps us coming back for more.

But a shift is starting to happen in this utopian unisex world feminism forced on us. As women become more and more "masculated" (tellingly not a real word), with each post-60's generation, they're starting to become strangely less appealing. Not physically, but emotionally. Their indignation and self-righteous attitude towards guys would be enough, but they don't need us anymore and proudly rub it in our faces. And part of what defines a man is being needed by a woman. Like the lyric from Foreigner's 70's anthem, "Feels Like the First Time", "It's the woman in you that brings out the man in me".

I'm not asking women to become helpless dependent waifs. I'm asking for at least some gratuitous gestures of femininity, because nothing makes a man feel like a man more than being needed by his woman. And when this male need is dismissed as showing weakness to his dominance or whatever other power dynamic deemed to be untrendy by feminist standards, you'll strip him of his opportunity to show you his love. It's not his fault, it's his nature to provide and protect. If it didn't feel so God Damn fulfilling to do it, he never would try. But that's not all.

A consequence of this modern female empowerment and independence has also affected young women in a negative way. They've adopted this hyper-sexualized persona. Usually fueled by booze and peer pressure, there's a "slut culture" developing that's been very unhealthy. As young men show less interest personally, young women are feeling the need to over-emphasize their sexual availability in very immodest ways. Ironically this sexual exaggeration for male attention is turning decent young men further away or at a minimum they respect women less than ever before. So much for "empowerment"!

And so here we are facing each other at high noon in the interest of happiness and more importantly continuing the species; women stand steadfast on feminist principle, while increasingly informed men turn away. For every unnatural/forced encroachment into masculinity, you've given up an equal portion of femininity, or what ultimately attracts us to you. You're losing your sexual power over men, as you're becoming rather dysfunctional hybrid versions of men. Is that what you want? One side of the mouth spews empowerment and independence (from men), the other side asks, "Where are all the good men?" Where? You don't need us and we need to be needed by you. And no amount of sexing yourself up will change that. Bring back womanhood and "good men" will re-emerge. Or stay an empowered, independent, sassy career gal on the go and die bitter and alone.

You can't "have it all". Choose manhood or womanhood; a hard charging careerist or a wife to a man and mommy to his children (as you were meant to be). But first, look around and ask yourself what happiness really means to you. Ask how much you're willing to sacrifice to attain it; beating men at their own game in the daily grind or turning hard against the feminist grain and embracing who you were meant to be all along.

Server Updates

Our host is updating some of the server technology, changing architecture, etc. The site may experience some temporary downtime due to this, but hopefully not too much.

For techies out there, here's what's going on:

> We are retiring our old core tonight, implementing a new border in LAX in preparation for additional transit to be installed in the coming months. This should be transparent to our end users. However, as with all network architectural changes, there is a possibility for intermittent outages.
> On Sunday, we will be transitioning our Garland data center to our new VSS core technology. As with the LAX transition, this is planned to be non-intrusive to our users. However, as with all network architectural changes, there is a possibility for intermittent outages.

So if the site doesn't load at some point over the next few days, it's no big deal, and should be back to normal soon.

Why Companies MUST Pay Women Employees More Than Men!

Hawaiian Libertarian · 1 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It's unfair and misogynistic to pay women $.77 for every dollar a male worker is paid! Isn't that what we're told endlessly by our mass media and our politicians who are endlessly fighting the oppression of Patriarchal society and it's malevolent scheme to keep women down? The wage gap is one of the MOST important issues that we as a country face today!

Well, I'm here to offer the the solution to this problem!

Not only should women be paid the same as men, companies should pay women MORE than their male counterparts! In this way, companies can accomplish two things at once:

1) By attaining the reputation for paying women more, a company will be able to attract and hire enough female employees to satisfy the Federal Government's unofficial quota system, which can actually audit your employment records and decide that a company has been discriminatory and fine them heavily. By paying women MORE than their male colleagues, they can avoid running afoul of our great Government as it protects our freedom and liberty!

2) By paying women MORE than their male counterparts, companies will then be able to treat all of their employees fairly and equally! If a female employ screws up or engages in unethical or bad employee behavior, the company will then be able to fire her without fear of being sued for discrimination…after all, she was being paid more than her male counterparts, so OBVIOUSLY this company does not discriminate against women!

Don't you see, all you old, white, rich guys that run the companies of this great nation? By paying women employees MORE than the male employees, you will then be able to have an equal workplace!

Ahhh…but you see, I must confess: I am not the first to come up with this brilliant idea. Apparently some high tech computer companies have already figured this out!

Women in Tech Make More Money and Land Better Jobs

Well how about that…

…equality at last!

Now that's a great article, noting a watershed moment in the history of our Brave New World Order — but unfortunately, the comment section of that article has been invaded by a host of misogynist trolls!

Look at the comments of one guy going by the name of Longterm Consequences:

> As an employer, it is much cheaper to give females a 3% salary premium, on average, than to pay idiot lawyers to explain why a woman fired on the merits was merely paid at parity with men, or heaven forbid, lower than some of the men.
> But let's be honest humans.
> Can anyone tell me the names of any of the killer software apps ever conceived of and made by a woman?
> It might be that vision thing again.
> Just might.
> Some women do have it for tech, but it seems to be extremely rare.
> Just to be clear, my point is that it seems only safe to fire a woman if she was being paid more than her male peers.
> So think of it this way: if you want to be able to fire a woman when you find out she isn't good, you best have > paid her a salary premium all along the way.

> Think of it as paying firing insurance on her!
> If you pay the premium, you can fire her. If you don't, you can't fire her because some scammy lawyer will loot your company for the crime of firing a WOMAN.
> And people wonder why China is eating America's lunch.

Why is that guy so…so…hateful? He must have a tiny penis and cannot get laid!

Here's another comment by a pathetic creep, who no doubt can't get a date with a big, beautiful, empowered and independent single mother! He's most likely some loser still living in his mommy's basement, masturbating to porn!

> This is why businesses outsource jobs to Asia. Don't get mad at the Indian workers, just because they happen to live in a country where feminists can file bogus lawsuits on businesses that make it expensive to operate in America.
> Feminism causes outsourcing. Remember that.

Alright America…it looks like we still have a looooooonnnnng way to go when it comes to achieving equality between the genders! I can't believe there are still neanderthals who still think this way! Wake up you disgusting creeps! This is the 21st century!

So wake up Corporate America! Start paying women MORE than men, and we can have a much more fair and equal world for our daughters to grow up in!

Slut Shaming

Thag Jones · 2 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've seen a lot of feminist musings on removing the shame from the word slut, and lamenting the "double standard" that it implies. I think they have it, as usual, perfectly wrong. Once you remove the feeling of shame from "slutdom," you're ruined. The fact that some feminists are trying to reclaim and defang the word "slut" shows that there is still at least some shame attached to it. I think it should have more than it does, because this is the root of the problem with the disintegration of the family and the way we are, as a society, slipping into a Sodom and Gomorrah kind of world where anything goes. Oh, I'm sorry, did I use the Bible as a "guilt trip"? OK, let me rephrase for the literarily challenged: Living like apes in the trees is not good for the human spirit, for human creativity, for a higher minded life.

The notion that shame is a bad thing in and of itself is what drives this impulse; certain words have been branded as "negative," and therefore, "bad," as if everything negative is bad. Electricity only works with a positive and negative charge. This can be used as a metaphor without descending into false logic – we cannot separate ourselves from the natural world or rewrite nature. Although not overtly the topic of this article (via Dr Helen) on having or not having children, I couldn't help honing in on this paragraph:

> Sad, but in all likelihood, they will end up just like their parents: single mothers with too many children, forced to work two minimum wage jobs and still unable to make ends meet, or, worse, like their irresponsible, absentee fathers.

The author probably doesn't even know he's doing it, but this is obvious feminist language when you're attuned to it. It's an attempt to reverse the so-called double standard and shame the males in the equation while painting the females as innocent, passive victims. A 14-year-old unwed pregnant girl used to be called a slut. Calling her something else doesn't change what she is. Taking the shame off her only gives her permission to ruin her life by being a slut – it's not the baby that ruined her life, it was her own actions, her own willingness to open her legs to some horny 14-year-old boy who had nothing really to lose in the deal.

It is truly sickening to read feminists calling on young women to "embrace their inner slut" or whatever crass nonsense supposedly in an effort to erase the dreaded "double standard." Sorry girls, but Nature has given us a double standard and no amount of redefining words, easy access to abortion, women's "rights" and the like can erase the facts of biology and thousands of years of evolution. Shame is a powerful tool and all powerful tools can be misused, but just because a nail gun can be used to kill someone doesn't mean it can't still nail down your floorboards.

How marriage is like liquor

In 1919, the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America was passed, enacting the complete prohibition of the sale, manufacture, or transportation of alcohol, but not the drinking of it. The legislative change was promoted by the Protestants, with the catholic immigrants (particularly the Germans) largely against it. Prohibition was primarily an anti-male, anti-immigrant, and racist movement that was lead by feminists (including the lesbian Frances Willard) who said:

> Alien illiterates … rule our cities today; the saloon is their palace, and the toddy stick their scepter…. The colored race multiplies like the locusts of Egypt. The grog-shop is their center of power. The safety of women, of childhood, of the home is menaced in a thousand localities at this moment.

Prohibition resulted in widespread criminality and was therefore repealed in 1933, to be immediately replaced in most parts of the country with liquor license laws. These laws reinstated prohibition at the state or local level, but also instituted a system of licensing. These liquor licenses grant an exception to the general prohibition. The owner of such a license is then permitted to make and/or sell alcohol according to the content of the license.

In the same way that we didn't need liquor licenses to brew beer, we don't need marriage licenses to marry. Marriage is a covenant between two people, and is an aspect of Natural Law. Neither the state nor the Church is a primary actor in a marriage. It is only in recent history that the US government has forbidden couples to marry and required that they purchase a license in order to be granted an exception to this rule. In other words, marriage licenses are a protection racket, run by the state.

Originally, marriage licenses were issued to allow interracial marriages, which were often legally prohibited, to take place. The states began to earn quite a bit of money selling these licenses and they grew fond of their newfound power over the lives of their citizens, so they decided to expand the concept to everyone in the country through the Uniform Marriage and Marriage License Act of 1923.

Prior to the passing of that act, the situation varied greatly from state to state. In Scribner's Magazine from 1919, it states:

> If it will astonish some to be told that in the early days of New England, magistrates not clergymen had power to bind people in matrimony, and that prior to 1686 no marriage with "prayer-book and ring" was legal in Massachusetts, it will seem more surprising to others that though marriage by civil authorities is sanctioned universally elsewhere in the country, the laws of three States (Maryland, West Virginia, and Delaware) inhibit lay celebration. On the other hand, in Pennsylvania, for instance (affirmed by express statute in 1885), a bride and groom may solemnize their own marriage by taking each other by the hand and plighting their vows in the presence of twelve witnesses, one of whom should be but need not be a justice of the peace. In certain States no witnesses at all are essential, nor is the taking out of a license invariably a prerequisite, while with respect to record of the evidences of marriage, there has existed not only wide divergence as to practice, but in many jurisdictions, especially in the South and Southwest, much slovenliness and unconcern in the tabulation of these social statistics.

The act, however, did not solve these issues because it was not ratified by all states. That is the reason that some states still have common-law marriage rules, for instance. In such states, avoiding civil marriage carries little benefit, as marriage can be extended to all couples who marry privately, through the common-law statutes.

What is the Christian view of marriage?

Throughout Christian history, the Church followed the Roman practice of viewing marriage as a covenant between two persons. Beginning in the 13th century, the marriage act began to be conducted as a sacrament, and led by an ordained minister of the Church. Even though the minister leads the rite and blesses the union, it is the bride and groom who convey the sacrament upon each other, through the exchange of vows.

In defiant answer to the Reformation's calls to see marriage as something purely contractual and private, the Roman Catholic Church reaffirmed (in the 24th session of the Council of Trent in 1563) that marriage would be honored in the Holy Sacrament of Matrimony. The Council went on to explicitly forbid bigamy and divorce, allow annulments and separations, and claimed Church primacy in the administration of the sacrament, among other things.

After this change, the Church recognized all marriage covenants (both those exchanged verbally and those exchanged through written correspondence) as valid, but only those blessed by a minister as sacramental. It is also possible for a valid marriage to become a sacramental one afterward, through a separate rite called convalidation.

Why are Church and State not separated?

In Mere Christianity, C.S. Lewis proposed that Christian and civil marriages be split:

> Before leaving the question of divorce, I should like to distinguish two things which are very often confused. The Christian conception of marriage is one: the other is the quite different question — how far Christians, if they are voters or Members of Parliament, ought to try to force their views of marriage on the rest of the community by embodying them in the divorce laws. A great many people seem to think that if you are a Christian yourself you should try to make divorce difficult for every one. I do not think that. At least I know I should be very angry if the Mahommedans tried to prevent the rest of us from drinking wine. My own view is that the Churches should frankly recognize that the majority of the British people are not Christians and, therefore, cannot be expected to live Christian lives. There ought to be two distinct kinds of marriage: one governed by the State with rules enforced on all citizens, the other governed by the Church with rules enforced by her on her own members. The distinction ought to be quite sharp, so that a man knows which couples are married in a Christian sense and which are not.

In Germany, my wedding was split as he described. On Friday we married civilly, and on Saturday we married in a chapel. This worked quite well, but there was one sticking point: we originally wished to have the religious rite take place before the civil rite, for practical reasons, but were informed that this was not allowed by the Roman Catholic Church. In other words, the Church waits to receive permission from the government before performing the sacrament!

Does the Church ask the government for permission to perform baptisms or ordinations? No it doesn't. So why make an exception for marriage? I have spoken with numerous priests (including the one that eventually blessed our union) and it seems to be a matter of expedience. It was just this arrangement that resulted in the Catholic Church pushing to end the ban on interracial marriage, particularly in California. They generally refused to perform interracial marriages until the state said it was alright, so they had to beg the state to change the rules. Many of the couples were already in valid marriages at the time, and were denied the sacrament by the Catholic Church until the state settled the matter.

Does the Church answer to the State, or to God?

Unfortunately, this creates a severe burden for many members of the Catholic Church. My own sister has been in a valid marriage for 12 years, but cannot receive the sacrament without a civil marriage license. Obtaining such a license would require her to drop her medical coverage, a potentially life-threatening move. There are many couples that would undergo financial or legal hardship if they were to register their marriages with the state. There are also couples who wish to avoid civil divorce; the only assured method of doing this is to avoid civil marriage. These are just a few examples of the sort of difficulties that can arise when civil marriage becomes a prerequisite for a religious rite.

The homosexual community has spread the myth that civil marriage is an absolute good, but that is not true. There are many cases where civil marriage results in additional difficulties that far outweigh any potential legal or financial benefits. Furthermore, many couples do not wish to associate themselves with the corrupted and perverse institution of civil marriage, and would prefer to handle the legal and financial aspects of marriage privately, through contract law.

The Church should not be waiting for government permission to perform the sacraments, and should move to repeal such rules immediately. We do not need a license to marry.

Amidst Rutgers Suicide Scandal, Girl Applauded for Sharing Intimate Details of Hookups

W.F. Price · 3 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the entire nation is justifiably outraged about the disgusting invasion of a young man's privacy at Rutger's University, a young woman who compiled a list concerning anatomical details and sexual proclivities of the dozen or so men she slept with during her senior year at Duke is being offered book and movie deals for her efforts. Karen F. Owen, Duke 2010 (pictured above), created a powerpoint "fuck list" that ranked her conquests by anatomy, attractiveness, athleticism, etc.

Ms. Owen slept with a good many of the college's athletes, particularly those on the lacrosse and baseball teams.

The website Jezebel has reproduced her work online, and while Jezebel chides her for not asking for the guys' consent, it is apparently not such a big deal, because "Duke's lacrosse team … has come under scrutiny in the past," and "frats do it all the time." I guess it's OK, then…

Jezebel also thinks the presentation is "hilarious," and has value for demonstrating women's sexual aggression (i.e. predation). Given Jezebel's openly feminist stance, I don't think anything could reveal the site's hypocrisy much more than their decision to run the list's contents. It's also pretty disgusting to use the misfortune of the Duke lacrosse players who were falsely accused of rape, arrested and charged before finally being exonerated, as a justification for doing so. You'd think that might make normal people a bit more sensitive toward these boys, but I guess we're not dealing with normal people here.

There used to be a time when women who would kiss and tell were looked down upon, but we've gone way, way past that point, and now they are actually lavished with praise for sharing intimate details. This has been some time in the making, and is probably at least partially a result of how women are encouraged to trash their husbands to obtain concessions and a favorable divorce settlement. Dumping on and/or objectifying men is one of American women's favorite past-times at this low point in our nation's history.

It's important to see the absolute contrast in the horrified reaction to Tyler Clementi's humiliation and ultimate suicide and the remarkably callous attitude toward the boys who were put under a microscope by this young, promiscuous woman at Duke. She betrayed their confidence, no matter what the atmosphere is in colleges today. I suspect that the two dimwits who surreptitiously filmed Clementi also didn't think it was such a big deal, because "everybody's doing it." Of course, they'll find out otherwise, but in the meanwhile Jezebel lauds Karen Owen for being sexually liberated, and Harper Collins is "intrigued" by the potential for a book deal.

What's the difference here?

Well, quite frankly, it's the assumption that straight men have no vulnerabilities, are legitimate targets for shame and humiliation even in the most intimate of matters, and are no more sensitive than animals. One thing I can say with some certainty is that gay men do not share this attitude, but it is extraordinarily common amongst women. And why not? Every woman is indoctrinated in school to view men as inhuman oppressors, members of some überclass that have been molded from birth into unthinking, unfeeling minions of the patriarchy. It is little different from the wartime propaganda Americans were exposed to during the two World Wars of the 20th century, but the enemy this time is half the people within our society.

If there is ever to be any redemption for women, rewarding them for this behavior will have to cease. Not only that, but they have to learn that they will face consequences as well. If the fallout from the Duke "fuck list" is any indication, we've still got a ways to go.

Stimulus Supported Jobs Employing Women Set To Disappear

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 4 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The current recession has been called a “mancession” because men working in the private sector lost their jobs, whereas women – mainly working in government and quasi-government jobs – had their jobs protected. The stimulus provided funds for women’s jobs, which kept these women employed. However, the stimulus is nearing its end, so women are starting to lose their jobs like men have.

Last Thursday, tens of thousands lost their jobs when a stimulus supported government job program came to an end. The program provided temporary jobs to youths and “disadvantaged parents”. ”Disadvantaged parents” means women since government does not provide that level of support for fathers.

The job losses for women will not end there. States are running out of money, and without the stimulus will not be able to employ the armies of women they do now. California is the most obvious example, but many other states have their own problems. It has been estimated that up to 400,000 people working at the state and local levels of government could lose their jobs — If things get bad enough which is likely, it could be a lot more. Since government jobs are held primarily by women, this means women will be losing their jobs.

Another reasons government layoffs could be much worse than 400,000 is that government workers are unionized and there are byzantine rules governing such layoffs. For example, the state of New York is having trouble figuring out how to select 2000 people to be laid off because of this issue. However, there is a solution that will likely be used: lay off everyone and rehire people as needed, similar to how Reagan fired the Air Traffic Controllers during their strike in 1981. Again, since women make up the bulk of government workers especially at the state and local level, this means that not only will lots of women lose their jobs permanently, but many more will lose their jobs for an extended period of time waiting to be rehired.

All of these factors will conspire to create lots of unemployed women. What will these women do? Perhaps they can go on Craigslist and offer their services for odd jobs such as cleaning up dog poop. Another possibility is prostitution. Already, rental postings on Craigslist are offering free or low cost rentals in exchange for sex.There has even been a case where a woman traded sex for gas. These examples happened despite the fact that prostitution is illegal. These are serious possibilities for soon to be unemployed female government workers. After all, being a government drone doesn’t provide a lot of experience for the productive economy.

The more money a social circle has, the paler it gets. It happens in way too many places to call it a conspiracy. Quit whining about it.

Being the pack leader of a bunch of nerds, chumps or whatever you want to call them is not an achievement. Ask these guys.

The only three kinds of men that are acceptable in our modern PC, lamestream media are the professional bullshitter, the thug and the fag. It's no coincidence that those men are incapable of forming families.

All the makeup on the world won't make fatties thinner, uglies prettier or sluts less STD-infected.

Internet Tough Guys are guys who are too cowardly and/or lazy to be real thugs.

Getting laid is actually easier than killing the final hard-mode boss at World of Warcraft. The problems are, first, is hard to do both, have a job and a life because there's only so many hours in a day, and second and more importantly, both require actual effort, which discounts a massive amount of guys. And, you know, you could have another hobby.

Treating competition and desire for victory as sins is the consolation of the mediocre.

Modern welfare is a bribe to the underclass so they don't revolt as well as a way for decadent elites to feel better about themselves and to impress their peers. Since both are driven by human ambition, and profit is what it matters in an economy, its nature is to grow to the infinity.

Women abhor emotional stability but love economic stability. Men abhor economic stability but love emotional stability. Opposite, but both are driven by the impulse of wanting to shine and prove themselves as worthy mates.

Chivalry originally was a code of honor, justice, loyalty and killing anybody that breaks the rules of that code. It changed in the Victorian age to a bunch of feel-good bullshit for a) Keeping the suckers stupid enough to believe it outside of the gene pool and b) Allowing chumps to rationalize their inadequacy.

Web Anonymity's Fragility and Importance to Men's Rights

J. DeVoy · 4 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

A little over a year ago, The Spearhead was created by writers and a community of readers who primarily participated anonymously or pseudononymously, using online monikers instead of their real names. While this is the formula for many successful message boards and blogs, it was especially important in creating a community dedicated to challenging the orthodoxy of modern society's contrived gender equalism — a regime where men and women aren't merely equal under the law, but identical despite obvious biological and physiological differences.

Especially for a venture in its infancy, the career risks of having one's name associated with a site that could be branded as extremist or sexist – even absent any evidence – were great enough to dissuade participation under one's real name. Historically, challenging the status quo has always been a risky proposition: The Federalist Papers, foundational documents for the American republic, were written anonymously in an environment where the penalty for dissension was death. While this anonymity is invaluable to those who wish to speak freely, today it can be stripped away for the cost of a lawsuit and a two subpoenas.

Nobody would suggest that online anonymity should be unlimited. It is unthinkable to suggest that anonymous sources of defamation (false, damaging statements) and child pornography – two kinds of speech not protected by the United States Constitution's First Amendment – should not be unmasked and held accountable for their speech.

Often, though, litigation is initiated with the goal of unmasking anonymous speakers simply to harass and humiliate them with the strong arms of courts nationwide. These cases are often referred to as strategic litigation against public participation (SLAPP) suits, and only California currently has a statute penalizing plaintiffs who vex hapless defendants with them. (Federal anti-SLAPP legislation, the Citizen Participation Act of 2009, has been proposed; other states' anti-SLAPP laws fall short on individual protections and apply only to political speech and matters of "public concern.")

A sample of these anonymity-ending suits, often called "John Doe" lawsuits, can be found here. Commonly – though not always – men are the dissenting, anonymous defendants in these cases. Several of these suits arise from discussions on finance message boards, a convergence point for two historically male interests, and have resulted in expensive litigation, even where their anonymity was preserved.

In one prominent example, John Mackey, the CEO of Whole Foods, had his true identity outed through litigation concerning his message board activity. Using the moniker "Rahodeb," Mackey talked down Whole Foods' competitor Wild Oats Markets, contributing in part to Wild Oats' stock price slide and Whole Foods' eventual acquisition of the company.

Another interesting case is the defamation suit that two Yale Law students anonymously brought against one of AutoAdmit.com's administrators and several dozen posters on the site. Although the case against the original name defendant, a site administrator with immunity for others' postings under § 230 of the Communications Decency Act, was eventually dropped – and he later brought his own lawsuit against the girls, which also concluded before trial – defendants had to fight subpoenas that would reveal their identity for making statements that, in context, likely were not defamatory. The goal of that suit wasn't to get to the heart of the alleged defamation though, but for the aggrieved girls – assisted by professors at Yale and Stanford, and an elite litigation boutique – to ferret out the identities of those who had hurt their feelings and humiliate them, ending their careers. In this case as in others, pursuing litigation drew more attention to a problem that would go away if ignored, a phenomenon fittingly named after Barbara Streisand as the Streisand Effect.

From these cases and others like it, we see that the lynchpin of internet anonymity is whether subpoenas are sent to a website and user's internet service provider (ISP) fast enough to divulge records that lead to a defendant's identity.

In these cases, plaintiffs file suit and, once entitled to do so, send a subpoena to the website in question for information about the anonymous defendant in their crosshairs. Normally, the information from the site includes an IP address. Plaintiffs will then send a subpoena to the ISP responsible for that IP address, and the ISP will turn over the name, address and other account information corresponding with that address. Suddenly, anonymity is lost.

But, it's not always that easy. A patchwork of state courts across the country have recognized the risks in allowing plaintiffs to subpoena records concerning a defendant's internet identity due to the First Amendment issues at play. Over the last decade, two leading tests for analyzing these subpoenas have emerged.

First is the Cahill v. Doe standard promulgated by the Delaware Supreme Court. Under this test, a plaintiff must present evidence that could defeat a defendant's motion for summary judgment in order for the court to issue a subpoena to an ISP that would in effect unmask an anonymous defendant. To further explain this standard, a defendant brings a motion for summary judgment to dispose of the plaintiff's claims against him, and it is granted if there is "no issue as to any material fact." If there is an issue as to a material fact – and the question of materiality is often at the center of such motions – then a court must deny the motion for summary judgment. Therefore, the Cahill standard requires a plaintiff to show there is a material question of fact regarding his claims against the defendant, something as simple as a he said/she said dispute, to unmask him or her and continue on with the lawsuit.

New Jersey's Appellate Court, however, has set forth a more exacting standard that has been well-received around the country. In Dendrite International v. Does, the court adopted a five-factor test for analyzing subpoenas that would unmask anonymous defendants:

> 1) The plaintiff must make efforts to notify the anonymous poster and allow a reasonable time for him or her to respond;
> 2) Plaintiff must identify the exact defamatory statements made by the poster;
> 3) The complaint must set forth a prima facie cause of action;
> 4) The plaintiff must bring forth sufficient evidence for each element of its claim; and
> 5) the presiding court must balance the defendant's First Amendment right of anonymous free speech against the strength of the plaintiff's prima facie case and the necessity for the disclosure of the defendant's identity.

Though still imperfect, it furthers the interests of free speech by expressly considering First Amendment concerns. Even where a court grants the plaintiff's subpoena after such review, there was at least a more rigorous review in place before removing anonymity, and can alert a now-known defendant to prepare a defense more seriously.

The problem with both of these defenses is that a defendant must know enough to raise them. Where an anonymous defendant does not know he is being sued, he cannot respond to the subpoena and fight for his anonymity. Similarly, he – or his attorney, if one can be afforded – must know to, and how to, fight the subpoena and apply the right standard. Simply saying "this is unfair" will do no good. If an anonymous defendant or his attorney misses the chance to make the argument, or makes it poorly, his anonymity is history.

What's a man to do?

Knowing is, as G.I. Joe said, half the battle. Being armed with this knowledge can lead to more responsible participation in online forums and other communities. Also, read the obnoxious mail your ISP sends you. Buried between the offers for more cable television channels and additional phone service might be your only notice that the ISP has received a subpoena for your personal information in a lawsuit you did not even know had been filed against you.

The best tactic is to post comments and content using your real name. Though not feasible for all situations, having one's words tracked back to them leads to a certain restraint that is not as likely when the speaker will not be held personally accountable for his statements. This is an aspirational goal for everyone who works for someone else, but it helps keep discourse responsible while still making important observations and arguments. For the most part, people writing under their real name can get away with saying whatever they want — provided they do it civilly.

Another route to avoid potential liability is evasion. Browser plug-ins and standalone programs can be used to mask one's IP address behind one or more layers of IP addresses from around the globe. One such example is Ghostsurf. A free IP proxy program supported by the Electronic Frontier Foundation is Tor, which runs your access to any site through several layers of servers that generally do not maintain use records, so any subpoena sent to Dusseldorf or Nice will be futile. For a quick-and-dirty web-based solution, sites can be visited through Hide My Ass, and throwaway e-mail addresses can be created with Mailinator. This is hardly an exhaustive review of the privacy solutions available to individuals, and the options available are as limitless as the internet itself.

The final option is activism. Make sure other people know about this issue and how they can be affected. Create a stink about online anonymity with your legislative candidates this election cycle. Problems like this can often be addressed with a statute, but the issue flies under the radar and is often left to the courts. For example, in many states, the reach of the courts' jurisdiction over others is defined in a long-arm statute, even if it just says that the courts have all of the jurisdiction they are allowed to exercise under the United States Constitution. Simply having this standard and others like it spelled out, rather than leaving them for the courts to determine, exorcises uncertainty from the marketplace of ideas.

Express adoption of the Dendrite standard by state legislatures would be a boon to courts and individuals, and would especially protect those who go against the grain of political correctness. And why stop there? The legislature could mandate that subpoenas to ISPs must be ruled on by the judge before being issued, with appropriate briefing by the plaintiff, and a failure to do so would lead to sanctions in the form of fines, dismissal of the case, and even contempt. So long as this matter is left in the hands of the courts, decisive action will be almost impossible.

Before You Sign on That Dotted Line

Young men join the Army for a variety of reasons. Some are seeking adventure, a bastion of masculinity in a feminist ravaged world, or a steady paycheck in a time of economic crisis. Others join out of sense of patriotic duty, remaining true to family tradition, or other reasons altogether. No matter why a young man might join the service, his signing on that enlistment contract comes with many risks and issues he might not think about, especially while very young and fresh out of the halls of high school. We all know the best known and most dangerous risks of military service: death while deployed or training, a traumatic physical injury, traumatic brain injury and psychological casualty. However, precious few are fully aware of the other risks service members may find themselves facing and few recruiters share the full story.

1. Thanks to the FERES doctrine, active duty military members who are killed or injured due to egregious negligence while under the care of the military medical system have no legal recourse for their injuries. The same goes for the surviving family of a service member killed due to botched medical procedures while on active duty. In recent years the death of 29 year old SSGT Carmelo Rodriguez from skin cancer brought this issue to the attention of the media and the federal government but for now not much of this gross injustice has been changed.

2. The amount of active duty time you sign up for on your enlistment contract may not be the amount of time you serve. Anybody who signs an enlistment contract with the US Army is required to serve eight years total. Two or four years might be spent on active and the remainder will be served either in the active Reserves or the Individual Ready Reserves. During this time a service member who is now separated is still eligible to be recalled to active duty dependent on the needs of the Army.

Stop-loss is another risk that has come to the attention of the public during the current conflicts. The term stop-loss has been wildly abused in the media, often being used in reference to an IRR recall as discussed above or in instances when active duty soldiers have had their deployment extended. Neither of these are stop-losses though frustrating realities they may be. A true stop-loss refers to a service member being required to serve past what would have been their separation date from the Army. Stop-loss is not new and is, in fact, a possibility service members agree to when signing their enlistment contract and can be read in section 9c of the enlistment contract all soldiers sign.

3. Recruiter promises mean nothing if they are not in writing. Recruiters, like most salespeople, try their hardest to make a sale. They will not necessarily lie but may sugar coat or withhold information to get enlistment contracts signed. This holds true whether this is a MOS choice, duty station preference, or orders to a certain school (Airborne for example). Ask for copies of any papers you sign and consider bringing somebody along to be an extra set of ears if you are planning to enlist in the military. Be aware that even if you have everything in writing, the military still reserves the right to renege on promises to suit their needs at any time.

4. Your MOS may have nothing to do with the job you actually do. Some companies will have slots for a certain MOS but no usage for the job. You can deploy and not perform your MOS for the entire you are overseas. A 88N for example, who is trained in transportation management and coordination, could wind up driving a bus to and from a base in Iraq and coordinating absolutely no transportation beyond getting themselves from point A to point B.

5. The military pay system discriminates based on marital and family status. If you are not married and/or a parent you will make less in BAH (housing allowance) than your married counterparts. BAH is only authorized to single soldiers who are over a certain rank (E6 in the Army) and single soldiers below this rank must reside in barracks. Thankfully barracks are improving at many posts and becoming more “apartment with privacy” than the dormitory style of yesteryear (See Randolph Point at Fort Bragg for one example), but this does not fully solve the unfair financial practices. You will also not be eligible for Family Separation Allowance while separated from your duty station for 30 days or more while your married or single parent peers will be earning this extra money.

6. Housing and other services are assigned in an almost communist fashion. For instance an E5 with a wife and one child at Fort Bragg would only qualify for a two bedroom house in an old housing neighborhood if he opts to live on post. He will pay his entire BAH of roughly $1100 for this home while an E1 with four children might pay hundreds less for a four bedroom home in a much nicer and newer community. For many families they will be able to find a better price per square foot off base, even with transportation costs and utilities factored in, so unlike other military lifestyle issues, this frustration can be easily solved.

7. On-post housing is not always in the best of shape and sometimes even of questionable safety. At Fort Bragg there is an on-going investigation of a junior enlisted housing neighborhood and Picerne, the company that owns the now privatized post housing following the death of three infants who have died over the last two years in the very same housing unit. There is speculation that poor quality drywall may be a factor, however, the Army and Picerne are both denying any link between the three deaths. Sadly a husband and father may enlist to have better opportunity to feed his family and keep a safe roof over their head but may be unable to do so despite his hard work and service to the military.

8. Just because you are “home” does not mean you are ever home. Many young men who are single when they sign up may not factor in the potential issues with being active involved fathers should they have children later on in their military careers. Field exercises are frequent at most large bases and this is especially true in certain large units, including the 101st & 82nd Airborne Divisions, 3rd ID, and other groups who have shouldered much responsibility during the long wars. CQ and Staff duty require a soldier to be awake and working for twenty four hours with a day off to sleep afterward. It’s not uncommon for a junior enlisted soldier to pull duty two or three times a month and he may have to do this even more depending on where he’s stationed.

As a soldier gains rank and becomes an NCO he can expect to really work for his money and miss out on much time at home. If he does not have a wife who is ready and willing to go the extra mile to keep him as a beloved and important figure in his child/ren’s eyes, he may lose them emotionally while working himself into the ground to take care of them the best he can.

9. After you have been in the military for a while you may no longer fit into the civilian world. There exists a great divide between the 1% involved in the Long Wars and the civilian community. My husband recently came across an article that he said describes his feeling on this matter well. A soldier can become almost a myth and legend who people idolize, unsure of how to act or connect with this warrior who has been off fighting in the war most see only on the television screen. Many will no longer look at him as a human but something bigger than that, perhaps making him feel useless or no longer part of the world the rest of us inhabit.

10. You give up many of your constitutional rights to serve in the military. When you sign a contract you sign away your right to free speech, freedom of assembly and free expression and put yourself under the restrictions of UCMJ for the duration of your service. Military bases are also notoriously pro-gun control, restricting the rights of service members to arm and protect themselves while commuting to and from work, during the workday, and while residing in any form of on-post housing.

11. THE VA WILL NOT TAKE CARE OF YOU! Forgive my e-yelling but this point cannot be stressed enough. Walk around a large military town and you will see the forgotten ghosts of wars past, the men nobody gives a care about, the men often cheated and abused by the Veterans Administration. Service members may have to jump through hoops prove their need for VA service and go through frustrating appeals process when their claims for benefits are denied. Getting approved for medical care can takes months, or even years in some instances. The future may be even bleaker should the VA tighten the belt further in response to the recession. Hours and job positions could potentially be cut resulting in a greater backlog of cases to be reviewed.

12. Under the Uniformed Services Former Spouses Protection Act, an ex-spouse can be entitled to up to half of a soldier’s disposable pay and benefits at the discretion of the court granting the divorce. Up to 65% of a soldier’s pay can be awarded when child support or alimony are ordered by the court. If the marriage was ten years or longer during the duration of his active duty service, the ex-wife may also be entitled to a portion of his military retirement benefits, up to 50%.

There are many risks that must be considered before a young man signs an enlistment contract. This list is not comprehensive by any means and everybody must read over an enlistment contract carefully to find other issues and gray areas. If you are considering military service, talk to veterans before you join. Ask questions and find out risks and also benefits of which you need to be aware. Do not rush into your decision, but take whatever amount of time you need to make the best choice for yourself. There is no easy do-over or quick way to quit and turn back once you've signed on that dotted line and even in the best of military outcomes, eight years of your life is no small amount of time.

October is Breast Cancer Awareness Month

While watching NFL Football this past Sunday I found out that October is Breast Cancer Awareness Month, and the NFL is a full fledged partner for the effort to raise the level of awareness in we the sheeple about this common disease.

When I turned on the games this past Sunday, and I saw all the pink on the players uniforms, all over the field and on the referee uniforms, all the former arguments that have been put forth in the man-o-sphere regarding the whole Breast Cancer Awareness vs. Prostate Cancer Awareness flitted through my mind. But this time I thought a little bit deeper on the topic, and came up with a hypothesis as to why Breast Cancer gets so much airplay and media exposure, whereas Prostate Cancer gets the finger:

The real reason why the NFL and the rest of Western society has such a strong socio-political-cultural push to "raise awareness" for breast cancer, and it goes back to the oldest reason in the book: $$$.

Prostate cancer "awareness" – Man makes a checkup with his normal practitioner, who than shoves his finger up the man's ass to feel his prostate.

Breast cancer "awareness" – Woman makes a yearly appointment with a facility that has a highly expensive mammogram machine that costs the hospital or Private Practitioner a nice sum of money and they have to pay a trained technician to operate the machine, etc.

Couple this with a current system in which the health care provider bills an insurance company and/or a government program like Medicare, and you soon realize that a mammogram is probably 10 – 100 times more profitable a procedure to bill for than a prostate exam.

Also, it's far easier to convince the masses of women that they need to get their breasts examined once a year, than it is to convince the masses of men (who are typically way less likely to go to the Doctor's for ANY reason in the first place,) to go have their doctor shove their finger up their ass once a year.

Of course, it certainly ties into the overall feminization of everything in our mass media culture…the preceding idea is not mutually exclusive from that overall trend. But I think it is an important point than simply writing off as mass media and pop culture misandry.

Nevertheless, I still believe Breast Cancer Awareness is a worthy campaign, and I'd like to contribute to the cause….and once again help raise awareness on one aspect that never seems to get any kind of mainstream exposure:

The ABC Connection, or:

THE ABORTION – BREAST CANCER CONNECTION

That's right ladies….if you have had one or more abortions, and you've never carried a pregnancy to term, you have a much greater risk of developing Breast Cancer later in life.

You never hear of this, because the Abortion industry, the cancer industry, and Feminist ideology all conspire to suppress the truth and keep you ladies thinking "it's just some tissue" being sucked out of your womb.

From The Breast Cancer Prevention Institute's: FACT SHEET…The Biologic Cause of the Abortion Breast Cancer Link: The Physiology of the Breast

> Simply stated, the biology rests on two principles.
> 1. The more estrogen a woman is exposed to in her lifetime, the higher her risk for breast cancer. It is well established that estrogen is implicated in the formation of three cancers: uterine, germ cell and breast.1

> Estrogen can induce cancers to form in two ways, as a genotoxin and a mitogen. A genotoxin or mutagen directly damages the DNA (causes mutations), initiating a process that leads to the formation of cancer cells. Certain natural metabolites of estrogen have been shown to cause mutations.2 A mitogen causes cells to proliferate, that is, to multiply through division (mitosis). Each a time a cell divides to form two cells, it must replicate its DNA. During replication, mutations in the form of copying errors and/or chromosomal translocations can occur, causing abnormal cells to form. These abnormal cells can go on to become cancerous. The stimulation of proliferation (mitogenesis) that estrogen causes, increases the chances that abnormal cells will grow into malignant tumors. Estrogen is so potent that it is measured in parts per trillion.
> If a woman starts her menstrual cycles early, say, age nine and continues to menstruate into her late 50′s, she is at higher risk for breast cancer, as she has been exposed to monthly estrogen elevations for a long period of time. This too is the science behind a recent, well-publicized study that shows that estrogen-based hormone replacement therapy increases the risk of breast cancer.3 In a similar way, birth control pills can elevate breast cancer risk.
> 2. The earlier a woman's breast matures from prepubescent (Type 1) and pubescent (Type 2) lobules to reproductive (Type 3) and lactation (Type 4) lobules (see diagrams), the lower her risk of breast cancer.4 Type 1 and 2 lobules are known to be where cancers arise, in the TDLUs (terminal ductal lobular units),5 whereas Type 3 and 4 lobules are mature and resistant to carcinogens. When a female child is born, she has only a small number of primitive Type 1 lobules. At puberty, when estrogen levels rise, the breast forms Type 2 lobules. It is only through the hormonal environment and length of a full term (or to at least 32 weeks) pregnancy that there is full maturation of Type 3 and 4 lobules in the breast. This maturation protects a woman and lowers her risk of breast cancer.
> This is why women who undergo full term pregnancies have lower risk of breast cancer and why women who remain childless have higher risk of breast cancer. Women who give birth after age 30 are also at increased risk of breast cancer as their immature Type 1 and 2 lobules are exposed to estrogen for the many years between the time of their first menstruation until their first full term pregnancy. Abortion in women under 18 and over 30 years old carries the greatest risk: these women have the highest percentage of Type 1 lobules in their breasts.
> It is the interplay of these two principles, estrogen exposure and breast lobule maturation, which accounts for the fact that abortion can lead to breast cancer. Within a few days of conception, a woman's estrogen level rises. By the end of the first trimester, estrogen levels have increased by 2000%. The estrogen stimulation that causes the multiplication of Type 1 and 2 lobules, results in sore and tender breasts early on in pregnancy. It is only after 32 weeks that a woman's breasts stop growing larger and mature into Type 3 and 4 lobules in preparation for breast-feeding.
> If abortion ends a woman's pregnancy before full maturation of her breasts, she is left with an increased number of the immature Type 1 and 2 lobules. She now has a greater number of the breast lobules where cancers can arise. This causes her to be at greater risk for breast cancer. It is through this same biologic mechanism that any premature birth before 32 weeks more than doubles breast cancer risk.
> Induced abortion thus increases breast cancer risk by two mechanisms. First, abortion leaves the breast with increased numbers of Type 1 and Type 2 lobules, those lobules in which cancer cells are formed, which are then exposed to more estrogen through menstrual cycles. These lobules would otherwise have been protected from cancer by maturation to Type 3 and 4 lobules, if pregnancy had gone to term. Second, the breast is exposed to high levels of estrogen during pregnancy, which can induce cancer cells to form. 6

See, I helped raise awareness…and I didn't have to wear that god awful pink to do it either.

Vancouver Island Women Riot Over Male Stripper

W.F. Price · 5 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Over 100 inebriated women attending an event in Nanaimo British Columbia were so enthusiastic about the performance of a male stripper that fights broke out amongst the women when some accused others of blocking their view.

The stripper was dressed as a policeman, and the women's savage behavior began as he started to remove the uniform.

At least five women were arrested and two held overnight in the drunk tank after police showed up to quell the disturbance and restore order. According to the police, the ladies were so drunk that the Cavalloti Lodge, which sponsored the event as a fundraiser, will likely be warned about "overserving."

One woman went with her mother and sister, and complained that all of them were badly scratched.

Another witness complained about the police response, which she thought was an overreaction, calling it "police overkill." Of course, she may not have been considering the fact that a cop going alone to a place where over 100 drunk women were fighting over a stripper dressed as a cop might be placing his life, limb and other appendages – or at the very least his dignity – in grave danger.

RCMP spokesman Gary O'Brien said he doubts charges will be filed, as it would be hard to discern blame from the midst of such a chaotic, drunken brawl.

Equal Protection Under the Law

By Una Salus Victus

A solution must be found to ensure that all are treated equally, with the same protections and privileges, within a court of law. With the rise of False Rape Allegations (FRAs), countermeasures and law reformations have become necessary. The foundation of the law must return to the ideal of innocent before guilt and help prevent the stigmatization of the accused before they have been afforded their day in court. Anonymity for the accused of said crimes will maintain the integrity of the court, while at the same time, ensure that justice properly administered.

This paper is in no way meant to detract from the seriousness of rape in both its forms (mens rea: guilty mind as well as mens actus: guilty actions). Rape is an abhorrent crime that deserves the maximum sentence to those who commit it. However, is the punishment of rape about justice, retribution, or incapacitation? Retribution and incapacitation cannot happen with any form of validity without justice and when they do, the system of justice becomes a mockery of itself. It is at this point where false rape allegations are located.

As it stands, false rape allegations have found a place among the most inhuman ways to disenfranchise the accused. These allegations have come to be known as the female form of rape. This paper will be addressing this form of rape, one that is perpetrated by a certain demographic of women (and a few men). A solution for a way to alleviate the turmoil wrought upon the falsely accused must be found. The most cohesive definition of this issue was published by Philip N. S. Rumney in his article entitled False Allegations of Rape:

> At its most basic level, a false allegation can be defined as the description of an event that the complainant knows never actually occurred. Such a definition suggests conscious or malicious motive on the part of the complainant.

Eugene Kanin, who authored False Rape Allegations, further clarified this definition when he wrote, “false rape allegations are not the consequence of a gender-linked aberration, as frequently claimed, but reflect impulsive and desperate efforts to cope with personal and social stress situations.” (81)

Insofar as false allegations are concerned, there exists “Legal Dominance Feminism (LDF)” (Greer 947). There is also a distinct misandrist approach to the topic and legal classification of rape. The catchphrase used for support by the LDF mentions their desire to combat the underreporting of rape to the authorities by the legitimate victims of this crime. Those who make up the LDF include activists as well as prominent legal scholars. One major issue with the LDFs is that many have no sociological background to draw upon to enable them to conduct research to prove their claims. Also, they do not root out their sources thoroughly enough. It is hard to avoid the inference that legal studies are written using only the sources that support the thesis of their work. There is also a tangible lack of concern for those who will inevitably and innocently be persecuted. It’s akin to the adage about breaking eggs to make an omelet. Essentially, it is irresponsible research.

It is important to understand that the LDF consists of the radicalized feminist cabal and the more mainstream members of feminism tend to disagree with these assertions on one point or another. The most revered and well known in this radical group, insofar as this issue pertains, are Mary Koss, Jill Saward, Ruth Hall, as well as the activist group she founded and chairs known as Women Against Rape (WAR).

“In 1982, Mary Koss, then a professor of psychology at Kent State University in Ohio, published an article on rape in which she expressed the orthodox gender feminist view that “rape represents an extreme behavior but one that is on a continuum with normal male behavior within the culture” (Sommers2). Mary Koss is well known for a study she conducted on behalf of Ms Magazine in 1985. In this study, a survey was distributed nationwide to women attending universities. By the end of the survey roughly 3000 female university students were interviewed and their surveys were tallied. The figures that Koss and her associates arrived at were that 15.4 percent of those surveyed were victims of rape, and 12.1 percent had been the victims of attempted rape. The two statistics of total sexual assault was 27.5 percent. This would later be referred to as the One in Four Figure in legal scholastic as well as activist circles.

Jill Saward is a member-activist of the group Women Against Rape (WAR). Her personal story involves the tragedy of being gang raped at the Ealing Vicarage (known at the Ealing Vicarage Rape). Her father, a vicar, and her boyfriend were assaulted and bound by masked assailants who obtained entry to the residence illegally. Since that time, she has devoted her time to helping other women overcome their own ordeals as well as being very outspoken on the issue of sexual violence toward women.

Ruth Hall, as mentioned above, is the Chairwoman and founding member of the Women Against Rape (WAR). Though based in England, WAR is known on both sides of the Atlantic as the laws against rape are similar in both the US and the UK. Hall established WAR in 1976. Hall has been an extremely vocal figure wherever the subject of rape has come up for debate.

The most significant point of the Koss report is that 73 percent of the women she interviewed disagreed with her final assertions. Dr. Christina Hoff Sommers, author of Researching the “Rape Culture” of America, analyzed the data of the Koss Report and discovered that Koss herself had “found that 42 percent of those she counted as rape victims went on to have sex with their attackers on a later occasion. For victims of attempted rape, the figure for subsequent sex with reported assailants was 35 percent.” As it would be extremely uncommon for women who have either been raped or survived an attempted rape to return to the arms of their attacker, it is reasonable to assume that the Koss Report contains some fraudulent statistics. In the end, Koss dismissed the views of the women who didn’t believe that they had been raped and went forward with publishing her study. Koss was able to justify her actions because her questionnaire was intentionally ambiguous. This decision by Koss would later have serious ramifications that would bring into creation the beginning of what some refer to as the Sexual Grievance Industry (SGI). The SGI asserts that there is a “rape epidemic” especially on college campuses. This enabled the conglomeration of women who proclaim themselves feminists to provide the direst rape statistics bereft of empirical data to support their assertions. According to Heather MacDonald, author of The Campus Rape Myth, as it pertains to the Koss Report, “believing in the campus rape epidemic depends on ignoring women’s own interpretations of their experiences- supposedly the most grievous sin in the feminist political code” (3). This was also the precursor to rape law reform.

Prior to the reformation of the rape laws, during the mid 1970s, society held rape in a very different regard. It was more common for a rape to happen by a stranger as opposed to now where the most common assailant is an acquaintance or family member. There also existed a cultural stigma attached toward the victim of rape that included public shaming of the victim. Essentially, it was more common to place blame upon the victim than it was to offer them sympathy for their ordeal. This stigma created a very harrowing experience for the women who were legitimately brutalized and prevented justice from being meted out as necessary. The rape reform laws were needed to help ensure that all members of society received equal protection under the law.
It was during this time that the law, as it pertained to rape cases, followed closely the common law system of the English. This system outright discouraged rape proceedings from being carried forward and was well known among victims. As such, there existed fewer convictions of rape. During this time, it was (unfortunately) a better idea to just accept what happened and move on versus trying to obtain justice for oneself through the courts. According to Christopher Bopst, author of Rape Shield Laws and Prior False Accusations of Rape: The Need for Meaningful Legislative Reform:

> At common law, a woman who concealed her injury for a considerable period of time was presumed to have feigned her story. Consonant with the treatment of women as chattel property, common law provided a spousal exemption for rape. As part of the “forcible compulsion” requirement, a woman was required to resist to the utmost, except where precluded by fear of grave harm. If a woman failed to provide such resistance, it was > presumed that she must have either consented or encouraged the rapist… Concerned about unfounded accusations of rape, however, several states, through statute or judicial decision, installed a specific corroboration requirement for rape prosecutions.

The growing support of reform for the laws as well as the activism that surrounded this issue is what precipitated the change. “In a movement that some feminists think may ultimately damage the cause of women in general, new statutes and case law have recognized as forcible compulsion threats other than the use of overt physical force… Some courts have reduced or eliminated the “reasonable mistake” defense, a result unique to rape cases” (Bopst 130). The conflict with this law is that without physical force, it becomes extremely difficult to distinguish between a willing participant and someone who has been legitimately raped. The word rape, itself, conjures an image of one person’s physical desire to another person’s detriment. The person who does not desire such intimate contact would likely bear signs of a struggle, unless either lethal or passive coercion was used to force their consent. These methods include, but are not limited to), a knife, gun, or alcohol/drugs. Without these measures of forced compliance, it would be difficult to prove the innocence of someone who assumed the acquiescence of the accuser to their physical ministrations signified consent for continuance. The reason the removal of force is relevant is because only through force is rape provable. The use of force greatly limits the possibility of he said, she said scenarios, as well as, cautionary convictions.

The next changes pertained specifically to the rape laws. “The corroboration requirement once so prevalent in American rape law was abandoned by most of the states. Through statute or judicial decision, many jurisdictions abandoned the jury instruction concerning the ease of making or the difficulty defending against a rape charge” (Bopst 131). At this point, corroboration on the accuser’s part is no longer required; conversely, this rule does apply to the accused. Essentially, if the accused cannot provide corroborating evidence of their innocence, then they will find themselves legally in a position that only encourages a guilty verdict.

Next came the “rape-shield” laws, (Fed. R. Evid. 412) which excluded the sexual past of the accuser if it had no bearing on the accused in the case. This meant that any promiscuity on the part of the accuser was now inadmissible in court if it didn’t pertain to the relationship to the accused. These same laws do not pertain to the accused. Without being able to rely upon the sexual past of the accuser, defense had to instead prove their case by proving mendacity. According to Bopst:

> The Federal Rules treat differently the character of a victim or the accused in a criminal case from the character of a witness. Under the Federal Rules, the alleged victim of a sexual assault assumes the dual role of victim and witness. Consequently, relevant evidence about the alleged victim may be introduced through either the 400 rules governing character or the 600 rules governing the credibility of a witness. Through these rules, evidence about prior false allegations of rape may be admitted (133).

While this sounds simple, the act of admitting evidence of prior false allegations is much more complicated. The Federal Rules don’t streamline this ability. Being both victim and witness means the accuser falls under two different sets of rules (the 400 and 600 series). There exists the ability to simply ask the accuser if, in fact, they have accused others of false allegations. The difficulty of this presents itself whenever the accuser commits perjury. Were this another type of criminal case, the defense could treat the witness as hostile, however this will not work in a rape case because of the accuser’s victim status. Most jurisdictions treat the evidence of prior false allegations as extrinsic (past criminal deeds) evidence and to introduce it into the case requires a very specific protocol. It is important to remember that both federal and state laws must be satisfied to present extrinsic evidence in rape cases. Because extrinsic evidence is time consuming and can taint the credibility of the “witness”, there is conflict about the correct procedure required to present it. This conflict is further increased once state laws are applied. Essentially, what works in one state likely will be over-ruled in another. Over time, the ability to enter into evidence proof that the accuser has established a history of false allegations became so difficult that it simply fell out of common practice; however, a well practiced attorney who knows their way around this type of case will routinely be able to introduce such evidence, consequently these attorneys are very expensive. This is one area where further reform is needed, however, the subject of rape has become so politicized that any change of the law in favor of the accused is fought relentlessly by the LDF. Bopst maintains a similar stance:

> Since the critical issue in a rape case is whether a rape of the complainant by the defendant actually occurred, the credibility of the complaining witness is a material issue. To exclude evidence concerning the credibility of the complainant jeopardizes the ascertainment of truth, especially if the witness directly contradicts the evidence sought to be admitted by the defendant (144).

Following this the laws were changed and eliminated mens rea requirement for a rape to have occurred. Mens rea means guilty mind and the LDF stated that it was too stringent a condition and pressed for reform. This is where the law gets tricky. At this point, common law practices of rape have thoroughly been abolished. One would assume that before a rape took place, the assailant first thought of rape as the intended or possible outcome. Bereft of mens rea, the charge of rape is emboldened and the ability to defend against it is further reduced. This law would be acceptable if false allegations didn't happen or held a significant criminal charge. Since that is not the case, as long as there are innocent men accused of rape, this law is ill advised.

The next reformation deals with anonymity for the accuser. In the UK as well as Florida and South Carolina for the US, rape accusers are legally afforded anonymity. Outside Florida and South Carolina, an informal rule has been maintained by the media that forbids the listing of any alleged victim of rape. The issue this presents is that the accused don't have such courtesy afforded to them and wind up facing a trial by media. On the other hand, the very definition of common law entails a set of rules that is commonly followed by society. The very fact that the prosecutor's office doesn't mention the accuser's name via live press conferences signifies an agreement between a legal institution and the media. As such, common law is established. A character assassination inevitably happens when one is accused of rape. It doesn't matter how contrary to one's character the accusation is once an identity is released into the public; it has become human nature to rush to judgment despite any inconsistencies within the rape charges. Those accused will typically face a loss of intimacy with current and potential romantic or domestic partners, loss of reputation with society, as well as a loss of trust among most (if not all) of their friends and family.

Then, laws across the 50 states were enacted that either lengthened or removed altogether the statute of limitations on rape cases. This law can be both good and bad. Good in that if a person who has access to children (who has abused them sexually) is still working in the field can be brought to justice by someone who has grown both physically and mentally and no longer fears speaking against them. Bad if someone uses time as a way to cover the gaps in a false allegation. All in all, this law likely has little occurrence of enabling or preventing the likelihood of false allegations.

Finally, the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) was signed into law in the US and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority (CICA) was enacted in the UK. The two laws are similar in that they were put in place to ensure that battered and sexually abused women have enough protection under the law to ensure their safety. The VAWA was eventually expanded to include dating abuse situations, domestic violence and stalking. The CICA program compensates victims financially for sexual assault. The negative side of both programs has begun to happen with more frequency. In the opinion of the author, VAWA was needed. It must be noted that new laws intended to address one area badly in need of representation may, over time, create an opportunity for those who would use them for selfish gain. VAWA, as it turns out, is too open ended and, as it stands, has allowed many false reports to come into existence. It has now become common-place for the opening volley of divorce proceedings to contain alleged sexual or physical abuse.

According to the False Rape Society's author who goes by the pen name Archivist, "The CICA, funded by the Ministry of Justice, pays victims of "violent crimes" according to an established scheme of tariffs. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme (2008) sets forth the standard amounts paid for each category of crime"(1). No matter the severity of the ordeal, this board does not compensate men who have been falsely accused of rape.

Another point made by Archivist:

> While the Compensation Scheme is designed to cover crimes of violence, an exception is made for non-forcible rape and other sexual crimes not involving violence…Under the compensation scheme, non-consensual penile penetration warrants UK £11,000. (Page 34.) Greater sums are allotted depending on the severity of the injury inflicted. A non-penetrative sexual physical act "over the clothing" warrants UK £1000. (Page 34.) This, presumably, includes a single instance of inappropriate touching. (3)

This system is rampant with fraudulent claims. In its current form, a claim may be presented to the compensation board before a police investigation or court of law has established the validity of the claim. The inappropriate touching can include being groped by a stranger in a dark club. This requires no police report about the incident which further undermines any validity of the claim being found. The simple solution for this type of problem would be to avoid the locale; however, as long as there exists free compensation, there will be those who will file motions for compensation In all truth, this is to be expected especially in the current climate of economic affairs.

The next legal change pertained to the use of the polygraph; common practice was now prohibited. Rape accusers, at one time, were required to take a polygraph test before the investigation moved forward. Ironically, it was this method that enabled the filtering out of the majority of false rape cases. Further proof that this law is used as a one-sided method to protect the accuser comes when one sees that the accused is sometimes forced to take a polygraph. In many cases, even ones with non-cohesive facts, the fraudulence will never be investigated until the accused consents to and passes a polygraph test.

Following this, Fed. R. Evid. 413 was enacted. This law allows evidence of a defendant's prior offenses, no matter how long ago, to be used to prove their propensity to behavior that would have enabled this charge to have happened. This bill will also allow prior criminal cases where the accused was found innocent to be presented in opposition by the prosecutor. This law is exactly the reverse of the rape shield laws. Whereas the rape shield laws forbid the use of the accuser's past against them, this law enables the past of the accused to be used to their detriment. This effectively corners the defendant and has been used to send many innocents to prison.

Lastly, rules were enacted on college campuses that allowed the administration to expel males accused of sexual transgressions. Additionally, most institutions have rules that prevent the prosecution for underage drinking of any female who comes forward with a rape allegation even if the allegation later proves to be false. This process incentivizes the filing of false rape allegations in order to dodge an underage drinking charge. Underage drinking while on college property is an offense that is commonly punished by expulsion. In light of this, it is both understandable and predictable that some accusers concoct their victimization after being apprehended for underage drinking. Sadly though, the concept of right vs. wrong is abolished with the application of this law and these same students take what they have learned beyond the university level and into the professional world, thus perpetuating this cycle of false allegations for personal gain.

After all this legislation, the sexual grievance industry and the LDFs still insist that nothing has helped to curb the underreporting of rape, though some good came due to their efforts. What has happened as a result of these laws is a cultural shift in how rape is perceived. There is now a stigma attached to rape that shows just how grievous the crime is and how much the public understands the turmoil it does to someone's life. The amount of overall retribution on the victim's behalf as well as the amount of sympathy generated is better than it was forty years ago; But at what cost? Edward Greer author of The Truth Behind Legal Dominance Feminism's "Two Percent False Rape Claim" Figure, harbors a theory on the cost:

> LDF proclaims that women are deterred from making false rape charges because, inter alia, rape complainants are subjected to harrowing "second rape."…However, LDFs essentially static view of false claims simply does not take into account that as the sanctions and costs of bringing rape charges are reduced, an individual's calculation of whether to deliberately make a wrongful charge correspondingly shifts. LDF exponents do not > acknowledge that if the “second rape” disappears, so too does the very disincentive which is advanced as the main reason underlying the existence of few false reports (961).

It helps to understand the motivation behind the enactment of these ten laws. Popular legal literature states that, while false rape allegations exist, there is less than a two percent chance of them occurring. According to Edward Greer, “This empirical statement is ubiquitously repeated in legal literature. Dozens of law review articles reiterate the two percent clause. This empirical fact, however, is an ideological fabrication” (949). Greer goes on to state that, “as far as can be ascertained, no study has ever been published which sets forth an evidentiary basis for the “two percent false rape complaint” thesis” (951). Michelle Anderson of Villanova Law School wrote in her 2004 article The Legacy of the Prompt Complaint Requirement, Corroboration Requirement, and Cautionary Instructions on Campus Sexual Assault that, “over time and perhaps through repetition, this two percent false rate has come to constitute the “conventional scholarly wisdom” on the matter” (34). Among this list of refuters are Stuart Taylor Jr. and K.C. Johnson, who co-authored a book about the Duke rape case of 2006 entitled Until Proven Innocent. In this book, they directly address the two percent clause:

> The standard assertion by feminists that only two percent of sexual claims are false (…) is without empirical foundation and belied by a wealth of empirical data (374)

The most interesting part of this statistic is its longevity. As mentioned above, this statistic has endured the last thirty-five years and is still repeated to this day.

Christopher Bopst, who is mentioned above, provides a unique perspective because he was among those who failed to doubt the two percent clause yet still believed that, even if true, the two percent who are falsely accused deserve equal protection under the law.

The origin of the two percent clause, as it turns out, comes from a book written by Susan Brownmiller titled, Against Our Will. The statistic in question was originally a speech that a New York City magistrate gave to an audience that included Brownmiller. The passage in question is as follows:

> A decade ago the FBI’s Uniform Crime Reports noted that 20 percent of all rapes reported to the police “were determined by investigation to be unfounded.” By 1973 the figure had dropped to 15 percent while rape remained, in the FBI’s words, “the most underreported crime.” A 15 percent figure for false rape accusations is undeniably high, yet when the New York City instituted a special sex crimes analysis squad and put policewomen (instead of men) in charge of interviewing complainants, the number of false charges in New York dropped dramatically to 2 percent, a figure that corresponded exactly to the rate of false reports for other violent crimes. The lesson in the mystery of the vanishing statistic is obvious. Women believe the word of other women. Men do not.

What is most astonishing about this passage is the lack of empirical data to support it (indeed, there is even no record of the speech ever being given) , yet it is a statistic that is repeated by a wide margin within legal scholastic studies and articles (Greer pursued the facts of this speech to the point where he attempted to find police reports to back it up. There weren’t any). In fact, (in the UK) in a briefing by the Women Against Rape, for debate in House of Commons, 8 July 2010 it was said that, “the latest Home Office research found that some officers are still so prejudiced as to think that up to 50% of rape reports are lies, yet only about 3% of rape allegations are false, which is lower than false reports for other crimes” (Ruth Hall NO TO ANONYMITY). The VAWA contains the same clause about false allegations being less than 2%, located at Pub. L. 102-199, S Rep. 102-197 n. 48 October, 29 1991. In fact, Mary Koss, who is also mentioned above, was instrumental in ensuring the VAWA was signed into law. It was she who quoted the two percent clause that the VAWA contains.

In light of this, what is truly needed is further reformation of the rape laws. With the laws favoring the accuser, the accused stands to lose everything. One of three reformations is in order, anonymity for the accused until conviction, anonymity for none, or the accused loses their right to anonymity the moment it is proven that the case is fraudulent. Ideally, the same anonymity that the accuser enjoys should be given to the accused until conviction. Even if the case is proven to be fraudulent, the accuser typically retains their anonymity while the accused (after having endured negative media attention) has to pick up what little is left of their shattered reputation and simply solider on.

Understandably, the stigma of a false allegation never completely goes away. With the technology being as advanced as it is, the ability to find the name and image of the accused before exoneration is easy. To this day, it is possible to locate web pages of both the Duke and the HOFSTRA cases before it was proven that these men were the victims of female rape.

The resistance to anonymity for the accused is both vast and outspoken. Ruth Hall, founder and chair of WAR believes that offering anonymity to rape suspects will undermine the very system through which they are prosecuted. According to Hall, women are still overwhelmingly the victims:

> "in fact women… need protecting, first from violent men- rape, sexual assaults and domestic violence are common crimes- and then from the criminal justice system which continues to be biased against women. Why in this context, is the government singling out men accused of rape for special protection?"(2).

With this statement, Hall seems to be intentionally overlooking the ordeals the innocent must endure. Long before jury selection, their image and name have been broadcast by the media and their reputations have been vilified. Another point is that minors accused of rape have automatic anonymity, yet no one advocates the removal of this right. Concurrently, this protection has not, in any way, hindered neither true nor false allegations against them.

Western society has come to crave sensationalism and it is the opinion of the author that, over time, that craving has both unintentionally and negatively obscured judgment. Innocent before guilty doesn't mean what it should. Innocent of the charges, likewise, has lost validity. The media contributes to this by not covering the exoneration with the same fervor as they direct toward the initial charges. The charge of rape is typically front page news while the exoneration of said charges is usually found somewhere in the middle of the paper if at all. If all one reads are the charges, then it becomes difficult to resist becoming one-sided. If those who falsely accuse were investigated with the same intensity as those they accused, then a reversal of this negative aspect upon society would begin, ironically, the politicization of rape crimes prevents the media from conducting business in this way to prevent any negative 'attention' befalling them.

Hall goes on to say, "we don't want to see men accused of rape getting special protection that people don't get for other crimes. Anonymity for men has already been tried, but the police said it hindered their investigations, because they could not put out calls for women who had been raped by the same man." Hall is, in the opinion of the author, deliberately ignoring the fact that rape is classified as a special crime in both the US and the UK. There is no other criminal case that provides anonymity for any of the victims or witnesses. There have been issues in murder trials where the witness is targeted by the very criminals they are testifying against, yet the idea of anonymity has never been considered. Using Hall's logic, if receiving anonymity constitutes "getting special attention" and she is so adamant that it should not be offered, then the alleged victim should not have it either. The point that Hall is missing in her second argument is the climate of rape has changed dramatically since the last time anonymity was proposed for the accused. Anonymity for the accused was last proposed at the beginning of the rape reformation law period and, at that point in time (when the victim was mistreated by the courts), truth was to be found in her statement. Now, not only have times changed, but the stigma surrounding the ordeal of reporting a rape has greatly diminished and the rate of false allegations have, likewise, increased to the detriment of the innocent. Another reason to favor providing anonymity for the accused concerns celebrity cases. When celebrities are accused of rape, it is not difficult for the public to identify the accuser. Celebrites accused will always undermine the anonymous system. If the accused are popular enough, there exists the possibility that those who are familiar with the accuser could potentially offer their names and images to unscrupulous members of the press for personal gain. This is precisely what occurred during the rape trial of Los Angeles Lakers' player Kobe Bryant. Essentially, Bryant's celebrity status undermined the anonymity protection of the accuser.

Sam Jones, editorialist of The Guardian, a newspaper in the UK was able to obtain an interview with Jill Seward. Seward joins the cacophony of voices in opposition to the proposed anonymity for the accused idea. According to Saward, the changes would, "send a damaging message and may discourage victims from coming forward." Saward offers no empirical data to support this argument. As such, like Hall, Saward is guilty of using emotion and straw man arguments as the basis of her arguments. Both Hall and Saward seem to be living with the same mentality they exhibited back in the 1970s. They refuse to identify the problems with the current system and insist that all women are still being victimized by the court system.

On the introduction page of the Women Against Rape website, one is shown pictures of women during rallies and demonstrations. One such picture depicts a woman holding a poster that reads, "rape wasn't in my marriage vows." This coincides with WAR's widely held belief that women don't lie about rape and wives lie least of all. While it is certainly possible that women married to abusive mates suffer greatly at their hands, to say that no women are lying is a very naïve (perhaps sadistic) fabrication of events. A simple refute to this has been addressed by Rumney. In 1976, this very issue came up and the emphasis was on false allegations as they pertained to divorce proceedings. The passage Rumney quotes is as follows:

> When that stage of hatred is reached [during divorce], the more hurtful the allegation the more likely it is to be made…There does not have to be any evidence of injury. All that a woman has to do is to disarrange her clothes… In marriage, the charge [of rape] can be made with ease when the couple are living under the same roof… one must also have regard to the ease with which the allegation being made… there are many reasons why a woman could be vengeful towards her husband… Therefore, one has to be very careful (147).

Women like Hall and Saward fail to acknowledge what happens whenever a false allegation is made. False allegations cheapen the hard-fought modern view of rape and the sympathy that true victims deserve. False allegations also disenfranchise a segment of the population. The reason that false allegations don't have a more stringent penalty is largely due to the adherence of the two percent clause. If rape is really a special case unto itself, then there should always have been an included penalty for those who lie about it. LDFs won't even consider that because they either aren't concerned about innocent men or these prosecutions could potentially undo all their efforts and re-establish the pre-reformation rape law stigma of the 1970s. The truth upon the matter is this is precisely the mindset that will eventually indoctrinate society unless some action is taken in order to properly mete out equal justice. Another point to consider is that if the penalty for filing false charges is ever increased and those who file them are prosecuted on a regular basis, then the amount of recantations will potentially and drastically drop causing more innocent men to be wrongly imprisoned.

The last point to consider is the fact that false allegations exist in every corner of criminal law and rape is no different. Those disenfranchised the most by false rape allegations will be the ones who already carry this burden in other areas of criminal justice. In every other instance of the criminal justice process, African Americans and Hispanics are disproportionately represented. The same holds true for rape. For African American men among the socio-economic lower class (which, to be fair, also includes men of other races), a false allegation is especially damaging as they have fewer options for defense and cannot easily relocate. This forces them to endure this negative stigma forever. This type of pressure creates a type of mental surrender and robs the accused any chance of becoming a productive member of society. For African Americans, false allegations and the trial by media that follows have the same effect that the Jim Crow laws had upon African Americans in the 1950s.

The truth of the circumstances is this; just as other crimes are both falsely and under-reported, so too will be rape. Nothing will ever change that. The reporting of legitimate rape claims will never be 100 percent. Laws won't change or solve this issue as there are other forces in society that contribute to it. For instance, if an unmarried Muslim woman is raped anywhere in the world, it is unlikely that she will come forward as this ruins her chances of getting married because, according to her culture, she has now become soiled due to the loss of her virginity.

There is no law or statute that can be implemented which will eliminate false accusations and the negative stigma from such accusations is, in most cases, too oppressing to overcome. In light of this, anonymity for the accused until a verdict of guilty is passed is the only viable solution to ensure equal protection, as well as, equal justice under the law.

Model for the Future? Communist East Germany, Say Women

According to an article in the NYTimes, the East German Communist regime crafted a new, better kind of woman, and today's unified Germany should learn lessons from the totalitarian police state that was finally toppled along with the Berlin Wall at the end of the Cold War.

Today, women who grew up in Communist East Germany are supposedly more confident, mobile and happier with themselves than those from the West. Additionally, they make almost as much money as men on average, and are far more likely to be working mothers.

According to one working woman quoted in the article, the East was wrong to do such things as chain people to radiators in solitary confinement and force students to spy on each other, but it was better for women all the same. She says that the position of women was far better before the Communist state failed, but now Germany in general is headed in the "right direction" (i.e. becoming more like the Communist regime):

> …on women, the East was ahead. We are still far from where we were 20 years ago, but at least we are now moving in the right direction.

Washed Up Sex Writer Exposes Discontent

Sometimes, an article seems portentous to me, like one of those wayward birds that the old pagans would take as an omen. When I came across a piece in Salon, written by a woman in her late 20s, that at first glance looks like another one of those hedged confessionals authorettes are so fond of writing, I found a hint of impending change.

Anna Davies, a New York writer along the lines of Carrie Bradshaw, has finally determined to stop detailing her sexual adventures in the big city. In an article titled "I'm done writing about my sex life," the 28-year-old woman explains how she got her start in the literary world, as many young women do today, by writing about sex.

Ms. Davies admits that she sought out ever more risquée and bizarre sexual encounters to provide grist for the publishers' mill, sometimes heading home "blackout drunk" with men the same day she met them.

Although Davies characterizes her work as something akin to "pole dancing," I'd say that's an understatement; it was more like straight up prostitution. She writes:

> In a way, tossing off pithy, 500-word pieces about sex for $100 a pop was beginning to feel a little bit like a one-night stand.

Actually, if you do the math, it appears that she was a relatively cheap prostitute as well, but her clients – various magazine publishers – apparently had the sexiness and prestige to get away with paying her so little for her efforts. It's a sad and timeless tale: girl goes to big city while young and attractive, wastes her youth as a working girl, and is washed up before she hits 30. By the time she realizes what she's done, and finally sees that she won't be rescued at the end of the day by some Mr. Big, it's already too late — she's got a reputation that will trail her for years.

What's different about this confessional, however, is that some of this regret comes through in Davies' writing, and it was actually published. This is why I see something revolutionary about the piece. Rather than celebrate her "liberation," the woman admits that people saw her as "young, dumb and déclassé," and not a serious writer. She looks back at her behavior and cringes; she knows people saw her as little more than some corn-fed, provincial whore.

For years we've been reading about how women empower themselves by stripping, promiscuity, and throwing all discretion to the wind. For those of us who still hold onto some atavistic notion of decency, the ceaseless barrage of media promoting this lifestyle and message is akin to a terror bombing campaign that seems almost deliberately crafted to demoralize us. Sadly, though, it probably isn't deliberate for the most part, but rather a result of greed, apathy and moral laziness. Humans have a tendency to lapse into complacency from time to time. In mass societies such as our own, these periods are magnified to monstrous proportions. And that there are those who defend this behavior should be no surprise — there's a lot of money in it, after all. It's no accident that feminists seek to set up a society of pimps and whores; they do have to make a living somehow, and they don't have much else to offer.

But now there's a hint of an awakening, a murmur of dissent from within the ranks. As the relentless recession marches on and the shock value of young women exposing themselves to the entire nation begins to wear off, the publishers are stooping even lower than the gutter into the very sewers in an effort to goad an increasingly jaded public into paying attention.

But it's hardly working. Instead, we're starting to see something else emerge: a tired, sullen boredom with it all. And it is when the people get bored that you know something is coming around the bend.

Stop Looking For a Wife: You Won't Find One

W.F. Price · 8 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As I look back on my life, I realize that one of the biggest misconceptions I had when I was younger was that wives actually existed. Like many men, I learned the hard way that they do not, and now I realize I'd simply been scammed. Far too many men have fallen victim to this con, and it's about time that we put some effort into eliminating it.

First, what is a wife? As many of us see it, a wife is a female who partners with a man and provides intimacy and support, and who contributes to the well-being of a family. Above all else, she is devoted to the family, and will sacrifice time, effort and even desire to hold it together. In short, she is the complementary image of a husband, with whom she cooperates in furtherance of this family ideal.

Such a naïve, flawed view of contemporary women came from a general lack of understanding about what they are, and ultimately from a projection of our own masculine attitudes about what is good and desirable in this world. This is why so many of us, as young men, had such a difficult time understanding why weddings are so important to women; to us the wedding was simply the gateway to this idealized world of the family — it was just a first step, a beginning.

For women, a wedding is not a beginning, but an end. It is a culmination of years of longing and preparation to be a bride, and marks a triumph and achievement. To understand this from a masculine perspective, think of the athlete who spends years training, dreaming and striving for victory. After all those years of struggle and discipline, practice and sweat, he finally gets the chance to compete in a stadium full of spectators. If he is the victor, he stands on the podium in front of the crowd, and is given his medal to his national anthem. This is a very emotional experience for many athletes, and a great joy. The bride standing at the altar is experiencing the same thing. It is her triumph — her wreath of laurels.

Little breeds a sense of entitlement more than victory, so marriage is tainted from the beginning by this triumphal celebration of the bride. Therefore, Western women go into marriage not as a wife, but as a conqueror. After that, to ask her to submit to – or even cooperate with – her husband would be akin to asking the triumphant athlete to resign himself to working the same dull, boring jobs his friends who never made the cut had to settle for. Some athletes may have the humility and grace to accept such a life without regret and bitterness, but obviously many will not.

But it doesn't start there. Wives are made, not born. Just as a wild mustang colt must be broken to the saddle, so must a woman be broken to wifely duties from childhood. And how is the woman-child made into a wife? Traditionally, methods varied by class, but what they all had in common was that she was put to work or kept very busy from a young age. A farmer's daughter would milk the cows, help her mother in the kitchen, sweep, sew, mend and tend the fire. Often, she would look after her younger siblings as well. Both her mother and father would hold her to her duties and warn her against vanity and daydreaming.

One might think that the daughters of the wealthy were spared such a regimen, but they had other matters to attend to. Thomas Jefferson, for example, outlined a very specific (and very busy) program for his 11-year-old daughter:

> With respect to the distribution of your time, the following is what I should approve:
> From 8. to 10. o'clock practise music.
> From 10. to 1. dance one day and draw another.
> From 1. to 2. draw on the day you dance, and write a letter next day.
> From 3. to 4. read French.
> From 4. to 5. exercise yourself in music.
> From 5. till bedtime, read English, write, &c.

Not only did he make sure to occupy her time as fully as possible, he demanded regular updates as well:

> I expect you will write me by every post. Inform me what books you read, what tunes you learn, and inclose me your best copy of every lesson in drawing. Write also one letter a week either to your Aunt Eppes, your Aunt Skipworth, your Aunt Carr, or the little lady from whom I now enclose a letter. . . . Take care that you never spell a word wrong. Always before you write a word, consider how it is spelt, and, if you do not remember it, turn to a dictionary. It produces great praise to a lady to spell well…

In addition to all these duties, he inculcated a sense of propriety, or, one might even say, shame:

> A lady who has been seen as a sloven or slut in the morning will never efface the impression she has made, with all dress and pageantry she can afterwards involve herself in…
> I do not wish you to be gayly clothed at this time of your life, but that what you wear should be fine of its kind; but above all things, and all times let your clothes be clean, whole, and properly put on…Nothing is so disgusting to our sex as a want of cleanliness and delicacy in yours.

Looks pretty harsh, doesn't it? In fact, these letters have been taken as proof of Jefferson's misogyny, but it may simply be that Jefferson, a very prolific letter writer, was raising his daughters according to norms of the time. Rather than being exceptionally strict, I suspect he was simply exceptionally prolific in his written correspondence, and when modern women read the reality of the time they are horrified because they can't possibly imagine what hell it must have been to be female before being spoiled became a "right."

It wasn't any better for contemporaneous Virginian men, who were subjected to a great deal more physical brutality than women, and expected to sacrifice their very lives on principles of honor. Minor infractions such as soldiers filching an extra few drams of whiskey were punishable by brutal lashings, and insults often occasioned fatal duels. They were different times — times most of us are happy to leave in the past.

Perhaps women raised before the 1950s – women whose parents would have been strongly affected by Depression-era values – were still raised to be wives, but after postwar prosperity took hold the inclination waned. It was seen as unnecessary cruelty to treat girls in that manner, and while boys, whose fathers were often psychologically (and sometimes physically) scarred war veterans, still took a drubbing for some time, the natural human tendency to indulge children, and girls in particular, took hold. By the 1970s, only a few fundamentalist Christians and Orthodox Jews were still raising their daughters to be proper wives, but these women are generally off-limits for your typical secular or lightly religious Westerner. That may be for the best, because I doubt your typical Western man would know how to handle a wife any better than he knows how to ride a horse.

However, despite the dramatic changes in society, the idea of the "wife" still persists. Although we know that the cowboy on horseback is largely a thing of the past, most of his duties replaced by trucks, feed lots and barbed wire, we still persist in this notion that there is such a thing as a wife, that they are all around us, and that they can be found easily, attracted by shining amulets of crystalline carbon, whereupon they begin magically cleaning house, preparing meals and producing children.

If someone were to tell young men that with a little pixie dust they could fly like Tinkerbell, they could hardly be making a more absurd statement than in telling them that a contemporary Western woman will, upon marriage, become a helpful, cooperative and cheerful wife, but I suppose hope springs eternal.

One could say that part of the blame lies with the amulet and dream dealers – the media and corporations who profit from the marriage industry – but that would be to miss the big picture; these people are simply taking advantage of a demand, like all businessmen. In fact, what they sell tends to reflect rather than influence society. Take two Disney movies for example: Snow White and Cinderella.

With a couple of small children under my wing, I've had a lot of time to catch up on old Disney movies, and they speak volumes about the times they were produced.

Snow White was released in 1937, during the Great Depression. She is a modest, but cheerful young beauty who hides when she first sees the prince. Menaced and nearly assassinated on the orders of her wicked queen stepmother, a powerful, aggressive seductress, witch and prototypical feminist who hates Snow White for her kind, tender ways and youthful beauty, she flees into the forest, where she finds the hard-working dwarves, who are bachelor miners. Needing some protection she endears herself to the little men by cheerfully cleaning, cooking, baking pies, singing, dancing, etc. Finally, she wins over even Grumpy Dwarf, the Ur MGTOW who has little use for women. Much adventure ensues, in which she is poisoned by the feminist queen, who is subsequently chased to her doom by the furious dwarves. Sad to lose their pretty little helpmeet, the dwarves construct a glass coffin so that her beauty will not be hidden, and her prince finally finds her and awakens her from her slumber with a kiss, upon which they leave to presumably go on to become husband and wife. Note that there is no wedding in the movie.

Snow White, a girl who cheerfully cooks and cleans for short, stout and bald working men and brings some feminine grace and genuine kindness into the mix as well is an example of the old ideal wife. Not every man would get a Snow White, but he could at least expect that women aspired to be somewhat like her as wives and, most importantly, were expected to be so.

Just 13 years later, after the war that changed everything, Disney released another fairytale movie: Cinderella. Like Snow White, Cinderella was the victim of a cruel stepmother who forced her to work as a maid, but her attitude shows a marked difference. Not only does she bitch and moan about housework, she even indulges the household pests, bringing them food and protecting them from the cat.

The plot in Cinderella revolves around a royal ball in which the prince must choose a wife at the insistence of his father. The ball therefore represents female competition along the lines of the modern mating ritual, where females deck themselves out in all manner of finery and compete for the alpha male's attention. Again, here is another departure from Snow White. Rather than the modest, bashful young princess waiting for a prince to sweep her away, we have a horde of women descending on a giant dance floor competing for the prize, a desirable male who is reluctant to commit. It's a scene one can see today in clubs in big cities.

After a catfight and some subsequent hocus pocus, Cinderella emerges victorious in the contest to win the prince's affection, and the king tracks her down by means of one of the high-heeled shoes she left behind. A fabulous wedding in a palace ensues, and the movie is over.

Cinderella is the template upon which today's girls structure their dreams. Their overriding goal is to win their reluctant prince and stand victorious over the other women at the altar. That's it. Once it's over and they are married, it's all a big letdown. The man is no longer a groom and princely, there are screaming kids and filthy clothes and dishes, no more people are honoring her and the gown is in a box. Drudgery was never part of the bargain, and who the hell is this schlub sitting on the couch watching football to expect a princess to fix him dinner?

So there we have it: there are no more wives, only brides; no more marriages, only weddings. And this change in our society happened over half a century ago.

It's time we took the concepts of the wife and marriage put them in a museum. Some will say that you can keep your wife and marriage if you run Game on your wife, but let's be honest here: if you have to Game her to keep her she ain't your wife – she's your girlfriend at best – and you aren't married in the real sense of the word, but shacking up.

As for the Christian preachers out there who say that all you have to do to obtain and keep a wife is provide and be godly, they are liars and fools who pervert the message of their professed religion. It is akin to a Christian saying that salvation can come from good works alone, i.e. Heresy. Their message to young men is dangerous and reprehensible, as young Christian men are no better protected than anyone else, and actually serves as justification for women looking for a convenient excuse to annihilate a family.

So, to the young men out there, I'll say this loud and clear:

Wives and marriages are like unicorns and leprechauns. If you want to grow up and get on with your life you'd best quit looking for them. You might find a woman, maybe even a decent one, but you'll no more find a wife than I'll catch a mermaid in my crab pot.

Expecting the impossible is always a recipe for disaster, so I sincerely hope that young men take this lesson to heart.

The End of Relationships? Where Does "Love" Fit In?

What Love is Not: Rationalized Attraction

I don't have a background of social rejection or humiliation like many of the well known guys in the dating community. But I do have a quick story that I would like to share with you to bring this point to bear, that will give you a key insight into how relationships work for the average guy. The story comes from my high school years, and I will include some commentary to help with the illustration.

I had a crush on a girl. She had blonde hair, hips, and a feminine swagger that intimidated the best of men around her. She was Christian, polite and friendly — and a rich girl too. I got her number from her sister, and began running the old text game. We dated for a couple of months, and it was great; epic memories of ice skating, movies and hanging out. One vacation, however, I went on a sports tour, and I…I kind of cheated on her. But I didn't actually do anything, I just took it to a level with a girl where anything could have happened. My guy friends ratted me out to her. She dumped me. I moved schools soon after, but for years I would still be attracted to this girl. I would think about her all the time, and we would still text each other regularly. A few guys and girls went in and out of our lives, on both sides, but I always thought of her as that perfect girl who I could live my life with. I invited her to an impressive dance that we held at my high school one night, and I took the "date" very seriously. I remember drinking a lot, and helping her drink a lot too – things looked like they were going well. I found out the next week that she had made out with two guys besides me that night, including my sports captain and my roommate.

I can't blame her, it wasn't a date. Just a guy with an infatuation asking a girl to a party full of high social value guys, and getting her pretty wasted to add. But I was distraught about it. How could this girl, who was so "perfect", do something so wrong like this? I didn't even believe it until she confirmed it to me later that day ("So what?" she said). I quit sports, I quit socializing, and I started to go to a low place. It's not that it's such a big deal, it was just such a shock to me that she would do something so "unexpected". Looking back, it's clear what had happened — it happens every day the world over, from college dorm rooms to nightclubs. It happens when we try to rationalize attraction. As a teenager, I knew very little about what it takes for someone to be attracted to another person. I was just a kid, and this was my first major crush. I thought it was something more than it was; I thought that it was love. The only reason I would feel such a powerful emotion for a girl, I thought, was that she was an amazing person. But it turns out that lame girls grow tits too, and soon after my fall, I realized that she was actually pretty stupid, had no real talents for anything, had huge insecurities that made her seek validation from guys all the time and led a rather sad existence. But "love" conquers all, and I sure didn't see all that at the time.

Is There a Place for Love in Our Society? Trusting Women, Trusting Yourself

After a guy has been going out for a long time, and thinking about attraction between men and women, he discovers many interesting and startling (disturbing?) things. He may discover that women really want and enjoy sex, probably a lot more than men do (validation from sex aside). He learns that there is a difference between a man who is attractive to a woman because he can provide a lot of comfort for her (the provider), and a man who is sexy because he has strong masculine qualities (the lover). He knows that many women will settle for a provider, and be attracted to a lover, and this alone is one reason these guys will never venture into relationship land. But is there any merit in being in a monogamous relationship with a woman? Is there such a thing as "true love"?

In short, no, I don't believe in the classic idea of love — not in the way it is portrayed in movies, and not in the classics either. That's because the ordinary understanding of love is simply an effect born out of pair bonding, where if a suitable man and woman share enough experiences, sex being the most important, they bond together. The reason this is so strong in humans is because human infants are born almost two years prematurely (due to our brains growing so quickly). This means that the pregnant woman and baby need constant provision for at least 3 years until the baby is able to fend for itself to some extent. Thus we have love. Thus we have attachment, thus we have jealousy. Thus we have Tom Hanks and Meg Ryan. To idealize this process is to deny reality. To think within your first year of relationship that those feelings will continue forever, is to blind yourself from the stark truth that that which you call love, is simply a powerful feeling evolved to keep two people committed for a short number of years.

So what is there to look forward to, a good friendship? As long as you aren't consistently demonstrating high sexual value to your partner, he or she is still going to be attracted to others around you. Generally, if you want to avoid being cheated on or dumped, you going to have to consistently work on keeping your partner attracted – this is the responsibility of both partners. Open relationships (polyamory) have become more popular lately due to the unravelling of this truth, but many people are afraid to opt for this because of the complications that arise. So where to for relationships? Is the institution of monogamous relationships dying?

Rule one: relax. Once you know the basic truth, that the feelings of "love" are mostly superficial evolutionary processes designed to create ego attachment, that your partner will find others attractive, and that monogamous relationships are an insanity probably brought about by the Catholic Church, you're free to make it really work. As funny as that sounds (and I hope that does sound funny to you), accepting these ideas is incredibly liberating. It means that you no longer need to effort to hold contradictory and illusory conceptions in your mind about what is really happening. You can stop lying to your partner that she in the only woman in the world that you would want to sleep with, and stop wondering if you're the only one she's thinking of. Because the whole thing is a farce, but a brilliantly entertaining play, where you have a certain character, and your partner has another, and together you make magic on stage. My partner has a feminine beauty. I am completely fulfilled in every way in my life, but when she dances, it adds more to my life. And maybe I could find that somewhere else, but after all this time together, the particular style and rhythm of her beauty has become my beauty of choice, and there is nowhere else to look. Hello Love.

If you were to switch from partner to partner whenever you felt more attracted to someone else, it may be fun for a while, but it would never fulfil you. You would be left with the same dissatisfaction of the typical man that can't get a women to be attracted to him, or of the man stuck in a relationship that he doesn't want. That is the bizarre nature of human life. So it's not that relationships are impossible, or that there is some sort of ideal "true love", but rather it is about understanding the absurdity of the situation, and running with it in any case. In such a way, you are completely open to the undiluted texture and flavor of your partner, which you can cherish and enjoy without attachment.

Is Honor Obsolete?

By Meistergedanken

As a concept, honor has certainly dropped out of sight in modern society. It is seemingly a quaint, outmoded idea that only lingers on in references during matrimonial ceremonies and in military settings (reminding me of how when I was a child I often confused the words “marital” and “martial” – there’s a joke in there somewhere!). Teens aspire to be considered cool, or hip, or popular, or even funny, but they seldom yearn to be perceived as honorable.

To me, Honor is a Virtue, like Loyalty, or Courage, and as such possesses inherent value. But not only that, it is the supreme Virtue and towers over the others because it provides a framework for behavior that can serve as a guide in situations fraught with uncertainty, peril or temptation. Hence, we often hear of a “code of honor”. Honor is also a great aid in facilitating self-control, and the stifling of base impulses, and thus is a particularly masculine trait.

The lone man stranded on a deserted isle has no need for honor. But as soon as men interact with others, particularly those not part of our families or circles of friends, the need for it begins to arise and swiftly grows urgent. The need for fairness, for civility, respect and trust manifests itself, and this need is satisfied (or left unfulfilled) via behavior and action. That is why a given man is said to act honorably (or dishonorably, as the case may be). It is rare indeed that a man is described as thinking honorably. And honorable feelings? Emotions are irrelevant. The honorable man acts a certain way not because of how he feels, but because he recognizes it is the right thing to do, and his reason allows him to conclude this. The unavoidable emphasis on action again tells us that honor is a masculine trait.

Linguistically, we rightly speak of honoring commitments, and honoring contracts. This nicely encompasses the generally separate worlds of family and business that consume the bulk of a man’s time, and where it behooves a man to comport himself with integrity. Where responsibility or trust is required, a modicum of honor is vital in maintaining it.

I think that in the eyes of many, honor is inextricably bound to reputation. For example, the daughter who brings shame upon her family negatively impacts the family’s reputation, thereby dishonoring them (how to equitably address this dishonor is another matter entirely). Thus, it is in the anonymous throngs of large urban centers that honor withers away. No one knows you, so reputation, unless you run in certain professional circles, is just not part of the equation. In this sense we can see that urban environments are fundamentally artificial and unwholesome, breeding grounds for rampant suspicion, isolation, and alienation. It is a paradox of the human condition, then, that as honor weakens in cities, law enforcement becomes more important, even as it becomes less effective and more problematic.

On the other hand, one can make the argument that honor concurrently has a personal, as well as a public aspect – and that this dimension is perhaps primary. Who has not heard of “keeping true to oneself” and adhering to a personal code of conduct? It is an important distinction to keep in mind that the Law is imposed on us from without, while Honor is imposed on us from within. The honorable man thus is characterized by self-determination and exercises his freewill within the constraints of the code he espouses. It is a self-regulating system capable of producing a harmonious ethical balance.

Honor is integral to the epic ongoing struggle of the Modern Age, ushered in by the Industrial Revolution: of the personal versus the public, and of the individual versus the collective. The latter has been gaining in ascendency for some time, but the increasing complexity of technology, communications and information systems, the global economy and all the rest merely means that a complete collapse becomes ever more likely, if not inevitable. As such, I would argue that not only is honor not obsolete, but it is more important than ever.

Honor, at least the public component of it, diminishes in influence in societies impartially governed by law.

Conversely, it remains strong in chaotic societies, where one's justice must be seized, because no officer of the court is available or can be trusted to procure justice for you. This recognized fact, through "guilt by association", has unfortunately imbued honor with the distasteful taint of barbarism. Regardless, as society begins to unravel, as more police get laid off, as prisons become unaffordable, as the government becomes increasingly impotent, and as the population becomes increasingly disaffected, the rule of law will correspondingly weaken. Perhaps a benefit of this is that honor will once again become prevalent and paramount in the social interactions between men. I think it is time we deliberately cultivate a sense of honor, so that when the moment comes, we will not turn into complete savages during society's imminent graceless denouement. When the dust finally settles, we will poke our heads above the rubble and say, "now what?" At that time I hope it will be instinctive for us to extend a hand to our fellow man and offer the assurance of decency.

Nature, Incentives and Penalties Drive Behavior

People respond to incentives and penalties. There is more of a thing when there is an incentive (women have an incentive to divorce and make false accusations because of the financial reward). There is less of a thing when there is a penalty (men are reluctant to marry because of the high risk of financial destruction and forced separation from potential children in a divorce).

These behaviors do not benefit society, civilization or children. Women are generally less happy than in the past. Someone must pay for that unhappiness and it is MEN. Collectively women further the exact situation that causes their unhappiness. It is ironic that women are happier when they are restrained from to acting on their folly. Men take a longer view when making most decisions. Women usually base their decisions on the state of their emotions at the time of the decision.

Why do ordinary men and hedonists understand the reasons that Marriage is Down & Dystopia is Up but the religious do not? Civil Unions and Shared Parenting is not the answer. Men are avoiding marriage for rational reasons. Avoidance of marriage will continue because a man will often do a risk/reward analysis in order to act in his best interest. Is it rational for a man to embrace unilateral indentured servitude or to play poker when the deck is stacked against him?

Men already have been avoiding marriage. Over the last 9 years, the percentage of married adults in the U.S. has dropped from 57% to 52%, a record low. The state of the economy is blamed, but this is delusional. Men, in general, do not irrationally fear commitment, if it is fair, reciprocal, equal and binding on both parties. As such the problem is “civil marriage” and not “marriage.”

In any case, the U.S. divorce industry is facing a bleak future. With housing prices down and many mortgages underwater, there is no money to extract from selling the marital house. With high unemployment, it will be increasingly difficult to impute income to men. The state can ill afford jailing all the men that fall behind on generous/onerous spousal maintenance and child support obligations. Quite a quandary!

Even though the female divorce incentive is economically unsustainable, women should lobby to remove it. Since women generally act in the moment, they will happily forego the potential of a future divorce payoff for the immediate desire to marry. Most women WANT to be married and will easily trade away the divorce incentive to get married NOW.

There is an exception by which women take a longer view: A woman will unite with other women to work with a single-minded focus to remove the obstacle to her desire (both good desires and distorted desires). All men have to do is create a path for this to happen, and women will do all the work to improve that path. This is the basis for my belief that the Catholic Church should opt out of “civil marriage.”

Catholics should lobby for exemption from “civil marriage.” Then all could choose the unencumbered option to be religiously married with the traditional “for better, for worse, til death do us part” covenant. In the event of a separation, there would be no divorce and the only remedy would be “annulment,” which the Catholic Church already handles through canon law. Other non-Catholic denominations would have to develop their own systems. A religious non-civil marriage is also a public marriage, rather than private or hidden, which I mention to negate a bogus religious criticism of this concept.

Civil custody issues would still ensue but may be less acrimonious and somewhat less frequent because of the reduced financial windfall of alimony/spousal maintenance.

Why not mandate that civil marriage be performed by a civil authority? Stop mandating that Priests and Pastors be instruments of the state by presiding over civil marriage formation, thus creating future fodder for the civil divorce/custody industry. If a couple wants to be both civilly and religiously married then there should be two ceremonies, one religious and one civil. But the churches should not make the civil ceremony a prerequisite for the religious ceremony. The concept of "separation of church and state" would seem contrary to subservience of church to the state.

A religiously married spouse could receive "partner benefits," the same as if it were a gay partner. Women would actually fight for this cause. This turns the tables on the homosexual and feminist activists and lets all men participate in the benefits they have won.

The Catholic Church and other churches commonly abandoned fathers. Churches refuse to recognize the rights and responsibilities of a father to his children, all because of the divorce and false allegations acted upon by the civil family court. Still, it is the civil authorities that have planted the seeds of destruction and watered them to germinate. The Bishops and Priests in the Catholic Church were blind to the effects of No-Fault Divorce at the time it was foisted upon the unaware population.

I advocate reclaiming the definition of "Catholic Marriage" as it existed prior to the changes Luther promoted in 1525. Let society do what it wants but let the Catholic Church to be one of the shining lights of truth and shelter from the destructive tendencies of society. Imagine a bulwark against the financial incentive for women to divorce (70% are filed by women) and enclave of support for a father's continual involvement in his children's lives. This "castle keep" could be protection from the siege of financial incentives for women to make false allegations, which is all too common during the divorce process.

In the past 500 years marriage has devolved from a covenant to a contract to a status (or possibly from a 2-party contract to a 3-party sham contract). Government, rather than supporting the supposed contract, now supports and rewards the party violating the supposed contract under the guise of No-Fault Divorce.

There is a great opportunity in the marriage issue for the Catholic Church and other Christian church denominations to "be wise as serpents and innocent as doves," as stated in Matthew 10:16. Why do I primarily advocate for the Catholic Church to take these measures? For three reasons: 1) I am Catholic, 2) The Catholic Church has a structure and hierarchy to promote this, 3) The Catholic Church is large enough to be influential.

As an Evangelical Protestant convert to the Catholic Church, I have also studied "Game", "Pope John Paul II's Theology of the Body" and "Socionomics (Elliott Wave Theory)." It is amazing how certain aspects are complementary and consistent with concepts voiced in the Men's Rights Movement and recent behavioral/medical research. Men and women are different and think differently. Equality of the sexes is not sameness, rather it is complementarity.

An analysis of the "nature of women" and "The Fall," is insightful. Genesis 3:16 includes a curse (penalty and repercussions) on women and some Bible translations use the phrase "yet your desire shall be for your husband,". Although this was written in a different time, it may be useful to read this commentary on Genesis 3:16, – here.

Genesis is not strictly factual, rather it is mythological, in order to convey truths that transcend a literal interpretation. The desire of a woman for a man is a good thing but is inclined to become distorted. In Genesis 3:16 the woman's "desire for her husband" is not a blessing but a curse. It does not describe a good desire, but rather a distorted desire. I infer that it is her desire to possess her husband. As an example, if I were to say, "My desire is for a Mercedes-Benz E-Class Cabriolet," then it would be reasonable to infer that I desire to possess it. Similarly, it is reasonable to infer that a woman would desire to possess a man, which includes the benefits of his support and unending control of the fruits of his labor. Is this not the case today?

But there is another phrase in Genesis 3:16 that should temper the curse, and is necessary because of the curse. There is a control on her distorted desire, "and he shall rule over you." This is similar to inserting graphite control rods into a nuclear reactor to control and prevent a run-away reaction. This is a positive thing since if the woman achieves her distorted desire, she will experience sorrow. His "rule" will not always feel good, but it results in a better outcome than if she fulfilled her distorted desire. Sometimes a man's "rule" will be tyrannical, but is usually benevolent. History bears this out. After all, it was men that built farms, engines, machines, factories, cities, roads, bridges, houses, power plants, the electrical grid, pipelines, refineries, mines, railroads, ships, ports, stores, schools, universities, other infrastructure, and men instituted democracy. Men did all this while providing for their families, improving the lives of women and reducing the burden of household labor. This all seems very benevolent, but I do not believe that men would have done all these things were it not for the drive to make things better for their wives and children.

Why did women rarely participate in building the infrastructure of civilization? Were women oppressed? First, such work was dangerous and men commonly died doing this work, which protected the lives of women. This doesn't sound very oppressive. Second, women didn't want to do this kind of work, so men did not force then to do it. Third, women were consumed with the drudgery of the task of maintaining the home. Men freed women from that drudgery which allowed women to choose to take jobs outside the home. That is what women said they wanted. Now the modern woman has the freedom (and requirement) to have a job, maintain her independent household and pay for childcare, since a man is really not necessary. No wonder so many women are sorrowful! Meanwhile women unconsciously bow to the altar of feminism, which has endowed them with the wonderful freedom from "oppression."

Certainly there was a curse (penalty and repercussions) placed upon men after "The Fall." That is a topic for another article, but the absence of that analysis herein, does not negate these points and this opinion. Part of a man's curse was to sweat and it took a lot of sweat to build civilization.

It seems that men need women and women need men. Otherwise most men would still be living in a cave and occasionally catching fish and hunting deer. This is the essence of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). It sounds appealing to me although not particularly motivating! The reality is that when men are marginalized, civilization suffers and will eventually fall. Dr. Stephen Baskerville alludes to this in his this recent interview – here.

Modern women are experiencing the sorrow in success of the pursuit of their "distorted desire." Women will fight each other over a man, will fight each other if no man is involved, but commonly unite against a man that neither wants, or against men in general. Women commonly support a "sister" so she can extract the fruits of a man's labor, when her "sister" no longer has use for a particular man. This is not all women, but too many (NAWALT but TMWALT). Does this result in happiness or in sorrow?

Generally, a man acts consistently with the nature of men and a woman acts consistently with the nature of women. It is a simple matter to study these natures, as experienced in the modern world and as expressed throughout history. After doing this, I have no problem trusting a woman, because I can generally trust a woman to act like a woman, according to her nature. Many aspects of a woman's nature are delightful. But it is a huge mistake to trust a woman to act like a man. This is a profound understanding, and each individual man should contemplate the meaning. I, in turn, will act according to integrity and principles.

I live in the modern world, not utopia, so I am not holding my breath waiting for these changes.

For those non-religious and non-Catholic, I hope I contributed to the mutual objective of reestablishing the perceived value of men. It is not my intension to religiously "convert" you. I appreciate the charity of The Spearhead to host exploration of related religious issues. Such things are relevant to non-religious, even if only from a historical perspective. An opinion article such as this would not be welcome on most religious sites.

I made a comment here and was asked if I could expand on it in article form, so these are some thoughts on the way women work, and about how we cause our own problems in relationships with men. I have been reading some of the pick-up artist blogs and they seem to have some good insight into how women work that has helped open my eyes quite a bit, so I must give credit where it's due, but it doesn't hurt (for women especially) to hear it from a woman as well, especially as the PUAs tend to be pretty unforgiving in their assessments.

This also expands a bit on my earlier post on this topic.

One commenter said the following:

He may even stray on his wife, but normally when he does he still feels a strong bond to his wife.

To which I responded:

This is the problematic part for most women I think. On the one hand, we do want a man that other women find attractive, on the other, we want him all to ourselves. It's a bit of a double bind, because if we perceive a man as not arousing sexual interest in other women, he stops arousing it in us, but when we see that he does arouse other women, we get insanely jealous. I guess that's the "sexual value" part of how we work, and why women fight over a man with a higher perceived sexual value. Not to mention how PUAs work us.

To take it a little further, this is something I think most women have struggled with – and in defining what is and what isn't "cheating," because it hurts when some other woman has the attention of the man you are with. There's just no way around that unless you date/marry someone no one else wants, then of course you're back to the old problem that then you don't want him either.

I don't know what the answer is besides suffering in silence, which seems to most of us kind of tragic and unfair, not to mention unfashionably stoic. Fighting about it won't resolve it though, so somehow all that's left is to accept a certain level of imperfection. If we could attain perfection, we would instantly become bored anyway. We also have to fight the urge to make a man into a project. We all know what happens with that – if we are successful in remaking him, we find him too malleable and therefore unattractive and not manly enough. If we do not succeed, we come to a crossroads at which we have to decide what it is we really want. What we say we want means nothing; it's what we do that counts. Women need to look at what (and who) they do in order to get a clear picture of what drives them, without rationalizing their "bad boy" complex. The ideal beta male most women describe as what they want is definitely practical, good for long term stability and so on, but they are in denial of their basic sexual natures if they claim to find that a major turn-on. For the good beta male, no doubt this can be very painful, probably more so than the tendency for men to have a wandering eye that can be painful to a decent woman, because it speaks to the core of who he is, not just his physical attractiveness. There is a difference between reasonable and unreasonable expectations and women have a whole lot of unreasonable expectations.

I feel it necessary to say, before I am accused of excusing a man's infidelity, that it is reasonable to expect, in a contracted relationship (marriage or some agreement that the relationship is exclusive and long term), that each partner stay faithful to one another and that there is enough trust and comfort that each partner feels he or she can admit to temptations and simply air them without fear of attack. If that means someone has to be left alone for a cooling off period before reasonable discussion can resume, that's what needs to happen. I also am not saying nice betas are doomed – it's a matter, I think, of women being more honest with themselves (at which I can already hear some of you scoffing) in order that they might make better decisions based on the desire for long term stability. It's not like men don't do this; do you really think they never get an urge to stray and find some novelty? But that's just it – the desire for novelty is also innate in humans to an extent and we live in a culture that relentlessly encourages novelty seeking through consumerism and affairs (the success of Ashley Madison being a prime example).

One point to remember is that no relationship is going to be “perfect,” whatever that might mean. There’s an old Zen tradition I believe where even in painting a room, a part is left unpainted so as to represent the imperfection of life. It’s hard to get over the romantic desire for an all-encompassing relationship, in which two people are like “soul mates” for whom there is no other – and maybe it’s futile to try – but that can only go so far, and there is always an element of choosing to make a person into one’s animus/anima. The shine always wears off after the initial bonding stage of a relationship, and that’s where a certain amount of work is needed. Not spirit crushing, constant dissection and discussion, but just some effort, which might just be the effort it takes to be quiet and non-judgemental, to just enjoy each other’s presence in silence.

There will be times where we get a bit lazy, and the effort comes in pulling ourselves out of that. It’s the same in every aspect of life – work gets boring, child-rearing gets tedious – but it’s up to us to lift ourselves up somehow. This requires a capacity for forgiveness and a lack of hubris that so many of today’s women lack completely. We have been trained by the feminist establishment to believe we deserve to have our every ridiculous desire and whim fulfilled (you can have it all!) just for breathing, and humility and submission are seen as dirty words. Instead we’ll tend to live by the maxim “get even” (I’d say “don’t get mad, get even,” but boy do we get mad, so I left off the first part). The trouble is, by doing that we only add more garbage to the pile and we have to live with the stink of it too. It’s also not loving behaviour.

Once we realize how we’ve been duped by unattainable fantasies and how we are hard wired to find certain qualities in a potential mate attractive, we can be more honest with ourselves and save time as well as heartbreak and in many cases, ruination for one or both partners. I’ve made my share of mistakes, which I regret every day, so I’m left with the following options: look coldly at it all, or fool myself. No doubt there are many women my age who come to this crossroads in life, after relationship failures and divorce, finding themselves single and competing with a younger crop of available women. The proliferation of “cougar” fare speaks to that, but there is more than a whiff of delusion and desperation there and it is simply not useful as well as being the logical next step in feminist brainwashing in the name of “empowerment.” The idea of competing with my daughters for the same males is just sick to me, but that is more or less what we have right now, and it’s pathetic. The lack of ability to face reality in this culture is astounding really and I simply look on with bemused wonder at it all. When will we grow up?

A possible answer is when younger women look at where older women who have lived as they are now, brainwashed by feminism, have ended up and decide they don’t want that fate for themselves. I’d like to think that by writing and talking about it, some of them can be reached and disabused of the lies they have been fed about “empowerment” and see that adopting male vices doesn’t empower them, but enslaves and disenfranchises them, and leaves the good guys with few viable options except to simply opt out of monogamy and marriage altogether, look elsewhere or become a Mennonite. Stoic resistance is a hard sell in our current culture, but it is still something worth bringing up and thinking about, because what we’re doing now is clearly not working.

Comment of the Week: Four Strikes and Still Swinging

W.F. Price · 11 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then some comments are so bad that they are good. Friday's post on the disappearance of the wife from Western society drew a few of these.

In addition to being very funny, the winner and following comment is a perfect example of a failure to connect the dots:

As the ideal submitting sweet helpful wife – 4 times now – I end up leaving every husband because of their self destructive addictions of sex/strippers/drugs and or alcohol. I have had no problem being the helpful wife and wild sex kitten in the bedroom- besides the fact that I am a fit beautiful former model and make lots of money and cook and clean. But why should I put 110 % into a marriage when he is wasting our money and health etc etc with whores? 90% of my divorced girlfriends were the model wives you say do not exist — they all left their cheating and irresponsible husbands! The other 10% were cheating too so they did not care. All you men whine and cry about how marriage is dead but the porn industry is sure making a huge profit …So instead of lamenting the poor state of women/wives why not write articles that educate young men to not become victims of porn and drugs! Help men to become real men. I remember reading lots of angry articles from Henry Makow complaining about western women only to find out later that he was a porn sex addict! Instead of pointing your fingers at women start looking at yourselves in the mirror!

Jennifer boasts that she is a "fit beautiful former model" and "wild sex kitten" yet cannot understand why the guys who marry her are so interested in pornography, prostitutes, strippers and the like. Actually, if you open up the prostitute advertisements in one of your local weekly sex rags, you might find a hooker advertising herself as… A fit model and sex kitten (or vixen)!

A woman who has married four times is not all that far from a prostitute herself, and may only differ in that she's managed to obtain more property through sex than your typical stripper. But Jennifer's comment does illustrate the attitude of contemporary American women, who think that being sexy is the most important prerequisite for being a "wife." In truth, it is not a wife for whom that is most important, but a harlot.

If anything, Jennifer is the poster girl for rotating polyandry.

For runner up, I found another off-the-mark comment, this time written by a man:

I think it depends on what type of woman you are looking at to become your wife.

There are many unattractive women, and single mommies that would love to have a husband and be the wives like our grandmas.

But if you are looking for super model to be your wife then everything that you wrote is correct.

-Dan

First, Dan must be pretty clueless if he thinks "single mommies" can be "wives like our grandmas." Does he have any idea what our grandmas thought of single mommies? There's a very pleasant park down the street a little ways from where I live that used to be an institution for girls. It was a sort of reform school for girls who came to the attention of the court for, among other things, getting knocked up. Ironically, it is also where Mary K. LeTourneau was last arrested with her pubescent lover before finally being sent to prison.

Their instruction was as follows:

> In all things, the effort is to maintain at the school a home atmosphere. Many of the girls have never known > what this means, and they frequently develop remarkably under its influence. . . . In addition to regular school work, the girls learn to do all the work of a home—cooking, serving, canning, sewing, mending, darning, laundry work, housekeeping, and gardening. Industrial work occupies about three hours per day for each girl.

Single mommies were viewed as delinquents who needed to be molded into acceptable wives in an institutional setting. Even then, her value as a wife would have been considerably lower than girls who avoided having illegitimate children. The school was set up specifically to train the girls to be at least decent wives, which at the time was considered the most effective and humane method of reform. It offered them a chance at redemption as women.

Today, sadly, these girls would probably compare favorably as wives to the typical American female. This is a tragic reminder of the depths to which our civilization has sunk.

However, a contemporary single mother has only proven one thing: she has absolutely no regard for our grandmothers' values.

As for Dan's suggestion that unattractive women make good wives, he's wrong. A woman's looks have nothing to do with her legal advantages over men in marriage, and may actually serve to make her more likely to cheat for "validation."

College Party Sparks Rape Drug Hysteria

W.F. Price · 12 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

When a number of extremely intoxicated youths in tiny Roslyn Washington started to sicken and, in some cases pass out, some of the young women became convinced that their drinks had been spiked with rohypnol, also known as “roofies,” which can cause people to lapse into a catatonic state.

Police arrived, sent for ambulances, and upon finding a young man in bed with a woman seized him and arrested him.

Local and then national news immediately picked up on the story, running sensationalist reports of a dozen women being drugged in some “nefarious” plot by a shadowy cabal of men bent on violating their honor:

> Most of the victims were young women who attend Central Washington University. Detectives are now investigating whether they were given spiked drinks to render them defenseless against a sexual assault, but were saved by the timely arrival of police at the scene.

From KOMO news:

> It’s certainly a concern we have — that the women were targeted moreso than the men for possibly nefarious reasons,” said Rosyln-Cle Elum Police Chief Scott Ferguson. “The majority of the people affected by the drugs were females.

I suggest watching the KOMO video, as following the report they bring some fool on Good Morning America who tells us that it is very common for women to be drugged by men, and women should always travel in packs and watch their drinks constantly. Although he spouts off a few stupid soundbites, the last one is probably the worst: “Now it’s no longer drugs sex and rock ‘n roll, it’s drugs sex and let’s control.”

Now, after a thorough search of the house and the men in attendance at the party, and presumably a heavy-handed interrogation of the young man yanked out of bed, police are starting to doubt that there was actually a rape scheme. It turns out that not a dozen, but nine students were heavily intoxicated, and three of them were men. Also, the man who was seized and arrested turned out to be with his girlfriend, who was of the age of majority.

Unfortunately, the fact that it was an overreaction likely won’t get nearly as much press as the initial, lurid reports of young women in peril at the hands of wicked men. It may be that someone spiked the drinks, but it’s also possible that the intoxicating agent may turn out to be nothing more than ethanol. No drugs were found, no women were sexually assaulted, and all of the sickened partygoers are now safe and sound. In fact, other than the arrest and interrogation of an innocent young man, everyone is just fine.

New Abuse Fad: Reproductive Control

According to an article in The Daily Beast, men are demanding that women get pregnant, and then forcing them to have abortions. Nobody knows why the men are doing this, but as we all know it is the nature of men to do mysterious things that make no sense so that they can have "control."

If one were to take the article at face value, despite the laws and technology that allow women to either give birth and force a man to pay for a child whether he wants to be a parent or not, or have the incipient human vacuumed from her womb – again, whether he wants the child or not – dastardly men have been thwarting the intentions of our benevolent feminist social workers and professors by exerting this reproductive control.

However, it goes much farther than abortion. According to some "stories," men are telling women whether or not they can use birth control. In a veritable epidemic, men are forcing women into pregnancy, perhaps because being hauled before a judge and ordered to pay child support gives them that superlative feeling of power that the abusers crave like soma:

> These disturbing stories were recounted to researchers from the Guttmacher Institute by women sitting in the waiting rooms of family planning clinics and domestic violence centers. They are different from one another: one portrays a man who pushes a woman to get pregnant, only to irrationally pressure her to have an abortion, while the other shows an act of birth-control sabotage. But the stories have something in common: they hinge on themes of coercion, control, and pregnancy.

Actually, it is easy to believe that some guys might freak out over pregnancy, given what it could mean for them. Child support laws have probably persuaded millions of men to attempt to convince their potential babymommas to abort. Additionally, there are a lot of guys out there who are not too bright, or may be immature, and who quickly sour on the idea of fatherhood when they realize the financial penalty they are likely to pay for it.

However, let's get to the real issue at hand: the study is largely aimed at young, poor and unmarried women who probably shouldn't be having children anyway. What is really going on here is that there's a coterie of feminist bureaucrats attempting, as usual, to lay the blame for illegitimacy squarely at the feet of men. No, it isn't the girl's fault that she got pregnant or had an abortion — it's all about "reproductive control" exerted by men.

As with most of these issues, when feminists get involved things get worse, because accountability cannot be found in the feminist dictionary. But for those of us with the ability to think rationally, how about this solution: young, unmarried women exert some "control" over whether or not they take off their pants. If a woman is not married and does not want to get pregnant, excluding forcible rape, she has all the opportunity in the world to avoid pregnancy. Therefore, to argue that men are somehow responsible for the abortions and pregnancies is simply another example of insulating women from their own bad choices.

[Editor: Originally posted on Szebran's blog in 2008, this post demonstrates how awareness has grown over the course of the last couple years. It is interesting to see how issues that were recently relatively unknown are now taken for granted online. Times are changing...]

In the United States a cheating wife made pregnant by her boyfriend can trick her husband into believing the child is his own. This is paternity fraud.

Paternity fraud is legal throughout most of the country. Additionally, if a tricked husband divorces his cheating wife, most states require him to pay child support EVEN IF THE CHILDREN ARE NOT HIS. This is one of the reasons American men are increasingly rejecting marriage. Why get married if your wife can legally walk all over you?

Several civic groups have initiated paternity fraud legislation. Their goal is to prevent men from having to pay child support for other men's children. At a minimum, any paternity fraud law should allow a divorced tricked husband to recover money paid to his fraudulent ex wife for child support. If necessary, the fraud ex wife can sue the other man for back child support payments. Some argue that mandatory DNA testing at birth would solve the paternity fraud problem. Feminists, however, strongly oppose paternity fraud laws. They have attempted weaken or stop paternity fraud legislation. For example, in Oklahoma, paternity fraud reform was limted to 5 years after the child's birth. If a wife is able to manipulate and fraud her husband (as well as the child) up to this time then legally the husband must raise and finance her boyfriend's child.

Some opponents of paternity reform have resorted to insulting tricked husbands. In a Rocky Mountain News editorial, a pro feminist male journalist labeled tricked husbands as "the picky type whose parental love depends on a genetic link" and said they seek to throw their nonbiological children "overboard with a minimum of fuss". A feminist Temple University professor stated paternity fraud legislation is "really about men deserting children they have been parenting". A woman opposing paternity laws interviewed on ABC NEWS claimed "the children are the innocent victims in all of this [paternity fraud laws]." She causually left out the tricked husband.

Opponents of paternity fraud legislation claim they are mainly concerned for the child's well being. If that were true, they would be advocating divorce laws which award custody of the child to the honest "nonbiological father" rather than the fraudulent cheating mother. It was the tricked husband who was faithful and more likely to teach good behavior to the child. The wife was a fraud, a liar and a cheat. Are these good characteristics to pass on to children? Awarding custody to the tricked husband would mean the fraudulent ex wife has to pay child support. Opponents of paternity fraud laws are strongly against this idea.
Lastly, feminists traditionally argue the 'other man' meets the cheating wife's emotional needs because he is understanding. Her husband, they claim, is only concerned with himself. If feminists believe the 'other man' is so wonderful then why aren't feminist demanding he be the father and pay child support rather than the 'selfish' tricked husband?? Wouldn't a "wonderful' man teach better behavior than a selfish man? Feminists are full of female chauvinist crap!

Opposition to paternity fraud laws is not about the welfare of children. Rather, its about preserving the exploition of husbands for the benefit of selfish fraudulent wives. Its about continuing the idea a husband must do as he is told. Its about maintaining laws which judge people on the basis of their gender not their actions. Its all about preserving the feminist social order in America.

Update:

There are currently seven states that allow men to escape paternity fraud at any time if they submit DNA evidence they are not the father: Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Iowa, Ohio, Virginia and Maryland.

Additionally, Pennsylvania recently adopted Oklahoma's half measure. Lastly, some states have made adjustments to their paternity laws that are so minor they are not worth mentioning.

Latvia: Land of Single Mothers and Suicidal Men

W.F. Price · 13 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A small Baltic country that has only been independent for 20 years, Latvia features one of the highest male suicide rates in the world, and quite possibly the highest rate of single motherhood on the planet Earth (it is highest in the EU in that regard). Prior to independence, Latvia was ruled by the USSR, the Bolshevik monstrosity that ran the country into the ground economically through the enforced equality policies of Communism. As with other formerly Communist countries, it seems that women came out in much better shape than men.

However, an article in the BBC laments the poor women, who outnumber men in universities by 50% and live on average 11 years longer than their brothers. The problem, it seems, is that they just can't find a good enough man. Well educated, stylish, and often attractive, they must resort to substandard men who, according to the article, sit around watching TV and getting drunk.

One might think that someone would ask what could be done to help the beleaguered Latvian men, but the main concern seems to be that the men simply aren't good enough. The gist of the article is that every overeducated single mother working some nonproductive service job for a Western NGO should have a man who, at the very least, can resist the temptation to get blind drunk and blow his brains out.

According to a popular Sex writer who goes by "Lilit":

> "The smartest girls are alone. The really beautiful girls are alone – if they are smart," Dace says.
> "They want to find partners who are equal to them. But a man, having all this choice, doesn't need to be very perfect.

So the suggestion is that the guys have it good. But if that's the case, why are they killing themselves in such prodigious numbers and dying so young?

A psychiatrist who treats men provides part of the answer:

> Psychoanalyst Ansis Stabingis, who treats men for depression and suicidal tendencies, says Latvia's transition to capitalism 20 years ago suddenly put massive pressures on men to succeed financially.
> The economic crisis, which has pushed unemployment up to 20%, has made those ambitions even more unattainable.
> As a result, according to the Latvian government, when the crisis hit in 2008, suicide levels which were already one of the highest in the EU, went up by 16%.
> "There are demands about how [men] should live. And if they cannot meet those standards, they… fall into depression," Ansis says.

So, it appears that Latvia is another example of a country where expectations do not match up with reality. I also suspect that there's a great deal of hidden hypergamy, and that Latvian women are often involved in de facto polygamous relationships, leaving a great many men out of the picture. Finally, Latvia is amongst the least religious countries in Europe, so there is little – if any – pressure on women to behave as traditional wives would (as in Poland).

Unfortunately, the US and other Anglo countries may be headed in the same direction. Perhaps, in another generation we, too, can look forward to living in a country full of single mothers and depressed, suicidal and short-lived men.

Why Honor is Fading

By Scott Englund

The article titled, “Is Honor Obsolete?” posted on 9 October prompts more discussion. The author suggests that in our contemporary society, the concept of Honor is waning precisely when it is needed the most. For the author, honor has a private as well as public significance regulating personal behavior and social interactions. The self-discipline symptomatic of a life lived honorably is inversely related to the persistence and effectiveness of an external policing mechanism. The author concludes that as state-provided justice fails its citizenry, Honor must take up the slack.

What this discussion of Honor motivated was an inquiry into the causes of Honor’s retreat as a valuable and instructive virtue in our society. I have three proposed causes: first, virtues are increasing self-referential—values are expected to have limited, personal meaning; second, as Honor inherently requires reference outside one’s self, our increased isolation makes Honor increasingly irrelevant; finally, and related to the first, the existence of truth itself is widely questioned.

Even as the author defined Honor as a Virtue (with which I firmly agree) he did so by qualifying the definition with the words, “to me.” These words, “to me,” have become ubiquitous in our society when it comes down to defining things. Definitions about what is good or right, or how one ought to behave have become—almost without exception—self-referential. In our contemporary culture, it is bad form to make unqualified, universal statements about how things ought to be. The words “ought” and “should” themselves are becoming endangered species—reserved for medical advice and tips on fashion or cooking. We are increasingly told what we will and will not do, by law, but we are forced to drift on social and moral currents rudderless. The concept of Honor is meaningless when its definition is personal. Honor can only be defined with reference to how one ought to behave relative to other individuals. It is necessarily discriminating: some things are honorable, others are not, and that distinction must be communally recognizable. This requires the presence of a true community.

Our culture is often referred to as being “networked” and described as being “wired” giving the impression of a cohesive, socially interconnected community. That impression is, of course, not accurate. In spite of electronic devices that claim to connect widely dispersed people, individuals are more isolated from their physical community than they ever have been. While people regularly “chat” electronically with “friends” on other continents, they likely do not know their neighbors. Social isolation extends to commerce—anonymity in transactions is valued and sought after. As isolation means fewer recurring, close interactions, the value of one’s reputation diminishes. Honor becomes unnecessary and irrelevant in a society where, left to ourselves, we need not behave consistently, let alone be consistently well behaved.

Finally, and most troubling, Truth itself is discredited. As proposed above, definitions have become self-referential and meaning is increasingly personal. At best, socially constructed norms extend meaning to a community. However, even a socially constructed meaning of something can be challenged as false and requires a level of community lacking today. Honor must be built on solid bedrock, and that is why it is fading from memory. Post-modernism is distrustful of anything that claims to be universal or permanent. Nothing, the post-modernist cries, can be so perfectly stated and formed so as to apply always, everywhere. And yet the human mind continually seeks this kind of reassurance. Our nature cries out for simple truth. Without it we can have nothing in common. It justifies altruism, self-sacrifice, duty to a cause beyond ourselves; trust, discipline, honor and virtue. Just as surely as it gives us these things, it also gives us deceit, vengeance, greed, and tyranny. But it also gives us the right to condemn these things—and the duty to oppose them wherever we find them.

Lying, cheating, and stealing can get for us what we want, but the means of immediate gain diminishes the pleasures so attained—passion without love, advancement without knowledge, wealth without respect. When one considers the additional pleasures of “living an honorable life” and measures out what that means, we see that much of life is not necessary. Being respected, competing, working at perfecting a skill or an art; the pleasure of working through a problem, striving, failing and succeeding despite our inadequacies—none of these are necessary. A life lived with honor and obligation is beyond mere necessity and must be strongly desired. Unfortunately this present age has shown very different priorities.

Strategies for Men Before, During and After False Allegations

By Ken Kupstis

(DISCLAIMER: The Author is not a lawyer and the following information is not given as legal ADVICE, but to give readers ideas of possible legal avenues to research and pursue to redress their own grievances. The author assumes no responsibility for the results of the strategies herein…and is in fact ashamed he's the only one who's thought of them…K.K.)

It's October 25, 2008. In the preceding days, the Nevada Review-Journal published a human interest story entitled "A Mother's Struggle". The story documented a local divorcee's attempts to gain custody of her daughter, as she was convinced that her ex-husband was sexually abusing the child (Names withheld).

To her credit, the writer did list the facts in the case: that the divorcee had left the marriage while pregnant, and initiated the divorce; that her husband had passed a polygraph test; that she herself failed a polygraph test; that her husband had been investigated three times by the police, twice by court-ordered psychologists, and once by a private investigator—none of whom could discover any evidence of sexual abuse by the husband. The divorcee had also denied the husband's court-ordered visitation rights and served 48 hours in jail for contempt of court. With only arguments, allegations and accusations, the divorcee continued to petition the courts. Finally her ex-husband gave up his paternal rights altogether by leaving the United States for his country of origin. The divorcee now has sole custody of her daughter, lives in her parent's house, and is seemingly content. The conclusion of the writer infers that justice, although delayed, as apparently been served.

Still, the article remains titled "A Mother's Struggle".(1) While every actual fact exonerates the ex-husband, the specter of sexual abuse looms large in any reader's mind, defeating the notion that the article could just as easily been entitled "A Father's Struggle".

Bear in mind, this is just one article.

Some months earlier, in the Osceola County Corrections Facility, a man in an orange jumpsuit confided to me that his wife had come home drunk at four in the morning. He said "Enough of this", and immediately began packing his children's clothes to take them to his parent's house. His wife's mother, who was on the premises, called the police and reported that he was hitting his wife.

The police came and summarily arrested him.

Since the passage of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) in the United States, a majority of states have created Mandatory Arrest Laws dealing with domestic disputes.

These laws oblige the investigating officers to make an arrest, and in the overwhelming majority of cases it is the man who is arrested.

Beyond domestic disputes, we have seen that in allegations of rape, the alleged rapist's name quickly becomes a matter of public record, whereas Rape Shield laws guarantee anonymity to the accuser. Incredibly, the assistant Dean of student life at Vassar College has said that "Men who have been falsely accused of rape can benefit from the experience". Meanwhile, investigations of rape cases within the United States Air Force revealed that 55% of rape charges were falsified. Reasons that were given for making the false rape charges ranged from covering up a pregnancy, to testing a husband's love, to a reason for being late to work.

The Innocence Project, which uses DNA testing to free the wrongly imprisoned, has given 205 unjustly accused convicts their lives and freedom back. 204 of them were men.

If there is indeed still a 'battle of the sexes', then false accusations are its secret weapons. They pierce Constitutional Rights and freedoms, mangle due process, and shatter reputations, relationships and families. No witnesses are required, nor is physical evidence of a crime. As previously demonstrated, a mere phone call is enough to serve as 'probable cause' for search, seizure and arrest. The effectiveness of the false accusation lays in the perception of the heinousness of the accused crime: assault, battery, rape and/or sexual molestation of women and children almost universally brings emotion to tread roughshod over logic. (The reader comments of the Nevada Review-Journal story all vilified the accused father.)

While both sexes are able to use false accusations, victims in the overwhelming majority of cases are male. Men have even been victims of domestic abuse by their female partners, and have either been denied police protection or arrested themselves. It therefore behooves men to imagine worst-case scenarios, research legal precedents, and know their rights—while they last.

Not enough men are standing up for themselves. Far too many are shocked and cowed by false allegations, and the legal system is far too willing to take a woman's word over a man's (the prevailing logic being that the man is 'bigger' and therefore capable of more damage, even though he may have never harmed a fly). Truly law-abiding men remain ignorant of the legal process, thinking "It can't happen to me". When it does, policemen and court officials are more interested in telling a man what he can't or shouldn't do than what he can or should.

BEFORE A FALSE ACCUSATION:

Perhaps the best defense against false accusations would not to be giving anyone a reason to make one against you. In a just and perfect world, that would suffice. The phrase 'Love Is Blind' has a good deal of truth in it; when you're in love, you may very well be blind to behaviors that could prove harmful to you in the future.

At Vassar College, a male student may have consensual sex with a female student—that night—and the next day, she can say she 'felt bad about it, in retrospect', and the male student can be charged with rape.

John Dias, creator of the website www.Don'tMakeHerMad.com, suggests using surveillance as proof of one's innocence. There is a valid danger of legal 'collateral damage'—surveillance of another person without their knowledge may constitute a crime in itself, but when used solely as a means of legal defense, it should be less Prosecutable. There are hidden closed-circuit cameras and recording devices that can be placed throughout one's home, or worn on one's person (in the form of pens, watches, lapel pins and more).

BEFORE ALLOWING A WOMAN TO ENTER YOUR HOME…actually before allowing anyone to enter your home…hopefully you can answer one or more of these questions:

Do you know her FULL NAME? (Thousands of men have only needed to hear "Hi, I'm Bambi", and it's good enough for them.)

Have you seen her car, and its license plate number?

Is she employed? Do you know where she works?

Is she wearing a wedding ring? (Married women who indulge in extramarital affairs may seek to contact other men as patsies for false rape charges in the event of a pregnancy or venereal disease.)

BEFORE HAVING SEX WITH A WOMAN:

Is she SOBER? Very inebriated women may claim to want or even demand sex, but it may be wise to see if "that was the alcohol talking".

Are you sober? Did you leave any of your drinks unattended, or consume any drinks that she bought for you that you didn't see being made? (The origin of the term "Mickey Finn" comes from a bartender who enabled female thieves at his tavern to drug men's drinks.)

Are you using Birth Control? Note that while she may claim to be using birth control, it does not automatically mean that she is…she may normally be on birth control but has forgotten to take it, or is experiencing a false period, or is using a form of birth control with a lower rate of effectiveness. Most of these factors have not legally excused men for having to pay child support, although they should.

Has she verbally consented to sex? It is better to ask "Do you want to make love?" and receive a positive response then to merely assume she's consenting to sex via body language. Some colleges insist that males must receive verbal consent prior to intercourse, and any sex without it is non-consensual.

Does she display or claim enthusiasm for BDSM (bondage and sadomasochism) activities? As exciting as it may seem, do not permit a barely-known woman to handcuff you to anything (that you can't break loose from on your own)!

Does she claim to 'like it rough'? Even if so, that claim does not obligate you to play rough. No matter how insistent she may be, you should not bruise or break the skin.

During foreplay, or before or during coitus, does she 'tense up', act frightened or apprehensive? Does she cry? If so, she may have been previously raped or molested. Her sex drive still exists, but she may psychologically equate sex with pain, servitude or dishonor.

In any event, you should get to know a woman as well as you can, and think very hard, before A) giving her a key to your home, B) signing a lease with her, C) merging any financial assets into joint accounts.

BEFORE MOVING IN WITH A WOMAN:

Even if a woman has a place that puts the Taj Mahal to shame, and invites you to move in with her, remember that you are moving in with her. She can tell you to leave whenever she wants, so it is in your best interests to prove that you live there. When you contribute to the rent, ensure it is in the form of a check, and request your bank to furnish you with receipts. Signing a lease makes you legally liable for all rent payments through out the rental contract. You may wish to offer to 'cover all utilities' (And/or groceries) instead, which can provide proof of residence without making you liable for the rent.

Realize that once a woman has moved in with you, and made some contribution to the household…anything from rent payments to utilities or groceries, she may be able to legally claim "I live here". As such, you may encounter difficulty having her legally removed from your domicile.

You should also ask her if she has any serious allergies, debilitating health issues, and how to contact her closest next of kin.

DURING A FALSE ACCUSATION:

Some women will often use the threat of a false accusation to achieve some desired goal…anything from changing your behavior to having you removed from your house.

Note that if she does threaten you in this manner: "I'll tell the police you did such and such…" you will probably want to take steps to sever all ties with her. It may have been a heat-of-the-moment threat, but she can't 'un-make' it, and she'll realize that option will always remain open to her. Calmly reply to her threat with "If you do that, you leave me no choice but to charge you with Wanton Endangerment*, making a false police report, and sue you for defamation of character."

(*You may wish to substitute Assault or Criminal Mischief for Wanton Endangerment. Assault is the threat of harm. Being taken from one's home under threat of force, incarcerated, and forced to pay a bond should legally constitute harm. Wanton Endangerment is placing someone in harm's way by proxy…i.e., someone who's HIV positive is guilty of Wanton Endangerment when they don't inform their sexual partners of their status.)

If your woman fights with you verbally, that can be grounds for Nuisance, especially if she's loud enough to be overheard by neighbors. If she's verbally goading or provoking you towards violence, tape it if possible, but walk away as soon as possible. Verbal provocation to fight—in conjunction with 'fighting words', insults with no redeeming Free Speech defense—is a form of disorderly conduct known as a fighting ruckus.

As unpalatable as it may be, imagine yourself accused of misdemeanor domestic battery, and the police have been summoned. The phone call alerting them serves as probable cause to enter any establishment. Note that in many areas, interference with such a phone call…disabling the phone, for instance…can constitute a felony in itself.

If the woman in the situation has in fact not been harmed, try to get a photograph of her (many cellular phones are equipped with cameras ideal for this situation). You may wish to hold up the day's newspaper within part of the photo to prove the date, unless the camera 'time-stamps' its images.

See if any neighbors are nearby and within earshot. If so, you may wish to open the door and tell her she can leave, in a voice loud enough to be heard. Not that she must leave, but she can leave. If she does leave, you can make a good case for refusing to let the police enter your home without a warrant. However, if she does live at the place in question, she can give police her consent to enter or search the premises. The police can and probably will still try to gain entrance to your home to make an arrest, but you have a much better case for Unreasonable Search and Seizure.

If she refuses to leave, it may be in your best interest to leave the area, even if it's your own domicile, before the police arrive. Take whatever you can with you; your wallet, house and car keys at the very least. Before leaving, inform your accuser that telling a police officer that you abused her when you didn't warrants a criminal charge of making a false police report and will be grounds for a separate lawsuit of Slander. If she or the officers in question make a written statement accusing you of battery, there will be an additional lawsuit for Libel. This warning in itself may be enough to convince her to withdraw the accusation, but if the police are en route they will probably follow through with an investigation anyway.

Leaving the area, especially if it's your own domicile, may be a nuisance, but it can give you time to take steps you would not be able to take if you were arrested: contacting employers, loved ones, attorneys, setting up alternate phone service or a post office box, transferring or securing bank accounts, getting a credit line increase, et cetera. If the police have an arrest warrant for you, the warrant must be "fresh", or between three and ten days old. Misdemeanor warrants normally have to be served during the daytime—between 6 am and 10 pm.

It's probably better not to call your home from a land line, as police technology can often triangulate your physical location from them. If you do call, assume the police are listening.

If the police do arrive before you can leave, be on your best behavior, although it normally goes without saying. Police need a warrant to arrest you at your home, but they do not need a warrant if they believe A) you have committed or are about to commit a crime, B) other people are about to get hurt, C) you're about to destroy evidence or property, or D) there's already a warrant out for your arrest. This obviously gives the police a lot of leeway.

Once the police begin asking questions, it is in fact an interrogation. Keep your voice audible, but calm and low. Memorize the time, the location, and the names and badge numbers of the officers. Police are looking for any evidence that a crime is committed, so even sarcasm will work against you ("Oh yeah, just look at her, I beat her to a pulp, that's why she doesn't have a hair out of place.").

There is a possibility that, by communicating calmly and reasonably with the officers, you can convince them that the dispute is not or should not be treated as a domestic situation. This possibility is unfortunately slight. Flattery and bribery generally don't work and should not be attempted. Apologies, however, have been known to work. "I'm sorry you were put to all this trouble, I know you're just doing your jobs, but I really would rather not answer any questions without a lawyer present."

Police will use a variety of techniques to gather evidence for a case. They can lie, and say they have evidence they actually don't. One policeman may seem to be 'gunning' for your arrest, while their partner may seem friendly and say “we just want to hear your side of it”. A policeman may say “This happens all the time, and the judge will go easier on you if you confess.” (However, the policeman is most definitely not the judge.) They may threaten you with obstruction of justice if you don’t confess, but only the DA can charge you.

If you are arrested—and police do not have to use the term ‘arrest’—do not panic or resist arrest. You can ask the officer if he can simply issue you a citation. Regardless, remain as polite as possible; say only “I’m remaining silent, I want a lawyer.”

If you are in custody, and interrogated by police or different law enforcement official, and have been not been informed of your Miranda Rights (Right to remain silent), the police have acted improperly and your case can be thrown out. This only applies if the police take you into custody (a situation you feel not free to leave) and interrogate you, not either/or.

You should consider the idea of Malicious Arrest, where police know you are innocent and arrest you anyway. This may be difficult to prove, but if you have evidence of her false accusation (on audio or video), whereas she has no evidence to back up her accusation, it could have the foundations for a case. Consult your attorney.

Note that you are not legally entitled to ‘one phone call’. You are entitled to speak with a lawyer, and if you need a phone to contact one, you’ll be provided with access to a phone. If you don’t have a lawyer or know a lawyer’s phone number, call a friend or family member and ask them to contact a lawyer for you. Never assume that your phone call is private!

Some states will have an officer of the court called a pretrial officer that can enable you to pay a bond fee and be released on your own recognizance. If you can qualify for the bond and afford it, you’ll agree to appear in court, then be released.

While you are being processed, the police assisting your significant other will strongly suggest that she get an Injunction, or Temporary Restraining Order against you. The TRO can be processed immediately, and you will be notified in jail that a TRO has been issued against you. It succinctly states that you are not allowed to come within a certain distance—anywhere from 500 yards or more—of your significant other’s place of residence (even if it’s yours as well) or her workplace. Most TROs will also have a ‘no contact’ clause which considers any attempt at communication-phone calls, letters, e-mails, etc., a violation of the TRO. Communications through another person are considered ‘contact through a third party’ and may also represent a violation.

Defense lawyers in your area routinely check daily arrest records, and will offer their services via mailings as soon as your name appears. Ironically, the TRO may in most cases prevent you from receiving your mail.

This in itself may provide a grievance in your favor: in the case of a live-in girlfriend—not a wife—if you are restrained from accessing your own mail, and if she takes your mail from the mailbox, even just to save it for you, that may legally constitute Theft Of Mail, a Federal offense. Also, if a restraining order bans you from collecting your mail, you clearly cannot be ‘served’ court papers through the mail.

You will be given a hearing before a judge, hopefully within 48 hours. A public defender told this writer “The less you say to the judge, the better”. The judges in initial hearings may not even address you, but only hear statements from the attorney and prosecutor (sometimes over a closed-circuit TV system). The judge will set a bond (bail) amount and any other conditions for release. If you have a credit card among your personal effects, you can use it to bond yourself out if you have enough to cover the bond. In cases where you can’t afford the entire bond, you may call a bail bondsman who will cover 90% of the bond if you can pay 10% of it.

If you have been served with a TRO while in custody, do not attempt to return home on your own. If so, you can be charged with violation of the TRO and arrested all over again. With a police escort, you should be able to return home to get certain necessities. The TRO is temporary; generally lasting two weeks or until a court hearing to determine if the TRO should be permanent.

Note that some women have been known to use TROs ‘offensively’…that is, they will shop at stores they know you also shop at, in the interest of reporting that you violated the TRO. If you see this occurring, immediately leave the area. Contact the venue's management and ask if they have their premises under video surveillance (a great many businesses do). You may need to subpoena their tapes later. You should also consider filing a Stalking charge or Criminal Mischief charge.

Also, an Injunction or TRO does not give her the right to change the locks on your home (generally both the permission of all lease-holders is necessary to change the locks), nor can she destroy or dispose of any of your property. Wrongfully interfering with another's personal property is one definition of Criminal Trespass.

As for lawyers, it is better to have one than not have one, although you can use a public defender, or represent yourself. If you do choose to represent yourself, you owe it to yourself to do as much research as you can beforehand. Judges will not accept ignorance of the law as an excuse.

Once you have been released, it may be extremely tempting to leave the state, or even the country. The father in the Review-Journal case ultimately did leave the country. While you may remain technically 'free' by doing so—perhaps indefinitely—refusal to appear in court will result in a bench warrant against you, and a simple traffic stop thousands of miles away would result in your arrest. Leaving the area also smacks of guilt. It's probably better to remain in the area, with friends or family, until your court date(s) are finalized.

You will probably be better served by preparing and researching your own case, as well as filing whatever civil suits you can.

AFTER A FALSE ALLEGATION

If you retain counsel—even a public defender—you should work closely with him or her to present the best defense you can. Give your attorney all the facts you can: date and time of the arrest, any witnesses, the approach and behavior of the police, your work history, anything you can think of. Don't hold anything back from your attorney. If the allegation is flagrantly false, add your willingness to take a polygraph test and ask if your accuser could be given one as well.

Some very harried or underconfident public defenders may suggest that you plea bargain. The 'deal' may be tempting, but you should not ever plead guilty to something you didn't do.

As mentioned previously, some criminal charges may apply to your accuser: Wanton Endangerment, Assault, Criminal Mischief, Disorderly Conduct, Making a False Police Report. These charges may seem 'retaliatory', but turnabout is fair play, and criminal charges should let your accuser know that A) there are consequences for her actions, B) you're fighting mad, and C) you're fighting mad within the boundaries of the law.

It's best if you're able to provide evidence, of course. You may be able to use a photocopy of your own arrest record. If the police demand that you provide evidence or witnesses, politely ask them why, since they did not require evidence or witnesses to arrest you. If the Watch Commander tells you to forget it, note his name and badge number and politely ask when the next Watch Commander comes on duty.

You can bring a civil suit for Defamation of Character (Libel or Slander) in small claims court without a lawyer, but the maximum amount you would be able to sue for would be $5,000.00. Beyond small claims court, civil trails become very lengthy and expensive.

Libel should be proven through the police report itself. It is—or should be—an unproven accusation or a criminal offense. You should sue for the amount of your release bond, court costs, attorney's fees, any time lost from work and any expenses incurred from being restricted from your residence (hotels, meals, etc.). If this amount totals more than a small claims court can award, consider filing a claim in a higher court. You should also ask for your record to be expunged.

You will need to subpoena the responding and arresting officer(s) as witnesses. Since the allegation was fabricated, they will actually be 'anti-witnesses'—to all the events they were told occurred but did not actually see. If you are representing yourself, here are some sample questions you might consider asking. Only ask questions that you are certain will be answered to your satisfaction!

“Did you check for priors through your NCIS database?” (Yes)

“Did I have any previous arrests?” (No)

“Had you ever been summoned to the residence before on a similar complaint?” (No)

“Had any of the neighbors complained previously?” (No)

“When you arrived, did you see a struggle taking place?” (No)

“Did you see any signs of a struggle?” (No)

“Was I acting in a violent manner?” (No)

“Did you notice any injuries to the accuser?” (No)

“Did she ask for medical attention?” (No)

“How many domestic disputes have you responded to previously?”

“Among those disputes, how many resulted in your arresting the man?”

If your accuser cross-examines the officer(s), remember that anything not witnessed or corroborated is hearsay.

If you win in court, ask that the case be either sealed or expunged (erased from your record).

It may be possible to sue for the police (or sheriffs) for Malicious Arrest, or the Prosecutors for Malicious Prosecution.

Malicious arrest occurs when police arrest you knowing you were innocent. You ARE innocent until proven guilty. Unfortunately, Malicious arrest is notoriously hard to prove, as is Malicious Prosecution. Malicious Prosecution occurs when the prosecution came after you with malice and without probable cause. In the case of someone with no previous criminal record—especially a case without evidence or witnesses—a good attorney could argue that Arrest and/or Prosecution are malicious, since the ordeal and trial will seriously malign your reputation.

Using the letter of the law itself, it may be possible to bring additional charges against your accuser, and/or the law enforcement officers in question. For example, Kidnapping is simply detaining, or taking someone to another area against their will. Conspiracy, and Aiding and Abetting the same may technically apply to the police, along with Unreasonable Search and Seizure.

These may seem like extreme measures, and may require a very aggressive and creative attorney.

However, if the victims of false accusations continue to remain on the defensive, merely leaving their fate to an attorney or public defender, and do not research, explore and demand their rights, then the wheels of injustice will continue to grind our lives with impunity. It is only if we consistently challenge and punish false allegations—and hold the judicial system accountable—that we can hope for any true justice and change.

FALSE ALLEGATION ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

Whereas,* false allegations of criminal behavior or activity are acted upon by law enforcement personnel and are resulting in 'warrantless' arrests depriving citizens of due process of law and unconstitutional search and seizure, regardless of the motive behind the allegations;

Whereas,* otherwise law-abiding citizens with no prior criminal records are being deprived of liberty, property and dignity by false allegations;

Whereas,* false allegations of crimes strain police resources, overload the court system, result in lost work, wages and tax revenue;

It is thereby suggested that the provable False Allegation of a Crime shall be classified as a Class D Felony (Assault), punishable by a maximum of 6 months in jail and a fine of $1,000, and/or probation, mandatory counseling, community service, and full financial restitution to the victim, including lost wages and court costs.

2010 Will be Year of the Man

By Carey Roberts

"Granddad, why are all those football players wearing pink shoes?" That was the topic of conversation this past Monday evening as my 13-year-old grandson and I watched the star-crossed Minnesota Vikings take on the New York Jets.

I sagely explained that October is Breast Cancer Awareness Month. His logical mind now ratcheting into overdrive, he tried to pin me down: "So when do the players wear blue shoes for prostate cancer awareness?"

That proved to be a harder question.

In 1992, Barbara Boxer, Diane Feinstein, Patty Murray, and Carol Moseley Braun swept into the Senate in dramatic fashion, instantly inspiring the catch-phrase, "Year of the Woman." After the 1992 influx, female legislators continued to score steady gains, and now represent 17% of lawmakers, by interesting coincidence in both the Senate and the House.

But this coming November 2, the number of women in Congress is predicted to decline, the first time that's happened since 1978. David Wasserman, analyst at the non-partisan Cook Political Report, is now forecasting the number of females in the House will drop by 5-10 persons. In the Senate, the current count of 17 female lawmakers will be lucky to hold its own.

Although the Chicken-Littles are already yelping about the impending social calamity, the reasons for this sudden reversal of political fortune deserve scrutiny.

First and foremost, women are more likely than men to be of the liberal persuasion. As columnist Allison Brown once put it, "Most women are natural socialists." That fact doesn't sit very well with a disaffected electorate that has been moving steadily to embrace the tenets of conservative philosophy.

It wasn't too many years ago, of course, that female candidates openly voiced the view that female lawmakers are more trust-worthy and less corrupt than their greedy male counterparts.

Remember Hillary Clinton's chestnut that "Research shows the presence of women raises the standards of ethical behavior"? Hillary's declamation was instantly self-refuting, of course, in light her notorious Travelgate incident, cattle futures scam, and other ethical escapades.

And remember Nancy Pelosi's vow to run the "most ethical and honest Congress in history"? Then came the steady drumbeat of Democratic congressmen and women who were discovered to be delinquent on their taxes, forgetful with asset disclosure forms, or deceitful in funneling scholarship monies to family members. One wonders how Rep. Maxine Waters (D-CA) will refute the charge that she tried to steer federal money to a family-owned bank.

It's a political truism that fiscal conservativism appeals primarily to men. According to an April 18 Pew poll, 52% of men, compared to only 42% of women, favor cutting back government programs.

For the millions of men who gave the nod to Barack Obama two years ago, the turning point was the news that Obama had jiggered the stimulus package to favor school teachers, social workers, and other female-dominated government jobs, leaving millions of unemployed male factory hands and construction-workers holding the bag.

Shuttling millions of formerly well-paid men onto the welfare rolls — that's what progressives call "social justice." And that's what Barack Obama meant when he told Joe the Plumber, "when you spread the wealth around, it's good for everybody."

As a result, the perennial gender gap has tacked strongly in favor of men. "Men make up a larger share of the likely voter pool," according to Quinnipiac pollster Doug Schwartz. This year is "among the bigger gender gaps we've seen," reveals Democratic pollster Celina Lake. And a Marist poll conducted last month found 48% of Republican men were "very enthusiastic" about voting, while only 28% of Democratic women rated themselves in like manner.

In January, we saw the gender gap bare its hairy chest in Massachusetts race. While 52% of the female electorate pulled the lever for Democrat Martha Coakley, 60% of the smaller but more unified male vote swung sharply in favor of Republican Scott Brown, handing the political unknown a stunning upset victory.

Nine months later, the same dynamic is at work in Pennsylvania. There, Republican Pat Toomey is leading Democrat Joe Sestak, mostly thanks to an 18-percentage-point margin among men.

Commenting on recent presidential races, former Brandeis University professor Linda Hirshman explains, "With the possible exception of 1996, women have never voted a candidate into the White House when men thought the other guy should win."

Now back to the pink football cleats, pink gloves, pink chin straps, pink wrist and biceps bands, pink-crested baseball caps, pink towels, pink lapel ribbons, and of course the pink-themed Half-Time Show. Seriously, why isn't the National Football League giving equal play to prostate cancer? After all, funding for prostate cancer has long lagged behind research for breast cancer.

"Answer that question," I counseled my droopy-eyed grandson, "And you'll understand why 2010 is destined to be the Year of the Man."

Needed: Male Leaders

Elusive Wapiti · 15 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Welmer's recent post, "Stop Looking for a Wife, You Won't Find One" was an excellent, if somewhat depressing, accounting of the present state of women and their inability to become wives in the fullest sense of the word. The evidence of their failures as a sex are all around us: stratospheric female-initated divorce rates, high crime rates, rising rates of autism, the ever-expanding welfare state, underperforming boys, and promiscuous girls. Clearly, not only in Welmer's article but in many of our own personal experiences, we see that women have fallen quite short of the wifely ideal in their discharging of their family, home, and childrearing responsibilities, their deeds and misdeeds fomenting not a little earthly misery. Clearly, I am being blunt in my indictment of their performance. Clearly, they have failed to uphold their end of the social bargain. All this we know, and the objective evidence overwhelmingly supports this conclusion.

To such an indictment, the feminists–who, as credit to their tactical/strategic skill, have assimilated nearly the whole of the female sex–would surely object. "What about you men?" they would surely cry, in a predictable attempt to divert attention from the failings of women to the defects of men. They would surely claim that divorce rates are high because we men are insufferable as marriage partners, that crime is high because we men are out-of-control monsters, rapists, murderers, and wife batterers. They would surely claim that the state is large because men control it and men love power above all else, that underperforming boys underperform because they are undisciplined, and that promiscuous girls are victims of male attempts at slut-shaming or are victims of predatory older men. Clearly, they would say, men are such poor performers that women would do better to 'do family' on their own.

It would appear, then, that MRAs and feminists are at loggerheads, that we will have to "agree to disagree", if our two camps are to get along at all. They will not help us change things for the better; they are quite happy with the status quo, a status quo that we men quite rightly wish to overturn because it is harmful to our interests and that of our children.

So overturn we must. Our own individual welfare, as well as that of our children depends upon it. How do we do that, though, when the problems of of marriage 2.0, of virulent feminism, of a culture that devalues, degrades, and destroys men and steals their labors, even enslaves them, seem to big, too intractable for just one man or a small group of men to change?

MGTOW is an outstanding start. At its core, MGTOW encourages men to strike out on their own, to chart their own paths, to be self-contained. To ignore the beseeching of a society that cares little for male welfare except where it bolsters female welfare. To spurn the diktats of those that seek to exploit men for their own purposes. MGTOW encourages men to tend their own gardens, and ignore the weed-choked gardens that are outside of their control. However, MGTOW, while it trains men to free their minds from the boxes society constructs for them, is insufficient to sustain the sort of change that we men wish to see. It too easily defaults to narcissism, to selfish hedonism. Something more is needed to sustain a movement, to secure the changes that we seek.

That something is a revolution. A revolution in values, of culture, of conduct. A revolution that seeks to restore men's rightful place in the home and in society. And it starts with us. From the bottom up, a narrow focus on getting our own houses in order. Thus while the gardens of our neighbors are overrun with thistles and vines, we focus on the world we can affect. We train ourselves–and our sons and daughters, if we have control or influence over them–to be the change we wish to see in others. we men must cultivate the skills and characteristics that make good husbands…which happen to also be the same characteristics that make for good men and good citizens. Integrity. Courage. A work ethic. Righteousness. Ethical treatment of others. Chastity. Restraint. Responsibility. Faith. Leadership. These values define what men were intended to be, the ideal toward which each of us should aspire.

Note that this revolution would likely mean an end to socially sanctioned PUA behavior. Sorry all you footloose and fancy free players. The Roissyites have served us very well by demonstrating to all–MRAs, feminists, Joe Sixpacks–that women did not deserve their pedestals, their "pussy passes", their "sentencing discounts". The Roissyites have done a superb job in demonstrating that women can be just as depraved, as rakish, as promiscuous as men. In fact, women as a sex have shocked many in how quickly they have demoted themselves to mere animals in both thought and deed. However, while the Roissyite set has provided an invaluable social service with their education of the manosphere and the culture at large of the evo-psych nature of the female sex, I do not think that revolutionary men can any longer can tolerate their immoral and unethical behaviors, as we endeavor to re-train our brothers (and later, our sisters) in what it means to conduct oneself in a civilized manner.

Civilization requires one thing above all from the male, a trait that–I'll be frank here–has been especially lacking from the male sex these days. That trait is leadership. We men have abdicated our God-given rightful throne in the family and have let our women assume control. It is time to take it back. It is time to train a generation of men who know how to lead, who expect to lead, and who feel comfortable doing so. It is time to train a generation of men who know the truth and are unafraid to boldly act accordingly. So equipped, a generation of leaders will naturally be respected by women; so impressed by these new men, women will be inspired to follow as they are naturally inclined to do. As they were created to do.

A key feature of this revolution in leadership, men returning once again to the masculine, is where women figure into the picture. Contra feminists, even more introspective ones like Camille Paglia, masculinity does not come out of femininity, or result from rebelling against the feminine. Authentic masculinity is independent of women , and can–maybe even should, in some cases–be cultivated without a woman in sight, in spite of social scaffolding that not only inhibits its development and employment but actively attacks it and seeks to substitute feminized masculinity for the real thing.

Please note, reader, that this call for men to reclaim true masculinity so that they may then become better leaders, husbands, fathers, and citizens is not a call for men to meekly submit to the yoke of exploitation by alpha males, their harems, the matriarchal State and its harem, feminists, and beta male enforcers of the alpha hegemony. Far from it; one can prepare himself for leadership, live righteously, and still be wise as a serpent about the burdens he voluntarily assumes. In fact, I think it critical that revolutionary men be quite discriminating in the obligations that he takes on, given the socio-political facts on the ground. If called to marry, he may acquire a bride-cum-wife if he finds one qualified for the job. Children if he is called to do so. A house and all the consumerist trappings if he desires them. Otherwise, the revolutionary-restoration man would be well heeled to avoid entanglements with women (avoiding chilimony and sexual harassment, rape, and IPV charges), with possessions (avoiding debt slavery and taxation) and, by living uprightly, avoiding entanglements with the State and its enforcement apparatus. His freedom is his most prized possession, and righteous, upstanding living–to include, first and foremost, keeping his zipper closed–is the best way to guarantee it.

Welmer's "Wives" article decisively made the case that wives are difficult to find, so hard to locate that we fellows may not find it worth our while to even look. To his thesis I add that that wives are often beside the point, when the real struggle, the real search is for each of us, is to reclaim masculinity for ourselves and, more importantly, transmit it to our brothers and to our children.

Below are the lyrics to a song titled "Lead Me" by Christian band Sanctus Real (HT Laura Grace Robbins for bringing this song to my attention) that I think succinctly summarizes the call to action for us men:

> I look around and see my wonderful life
> Almost perfect from the outside
> In picture frames I see my beautiful wife
> Always smiling
> But on the inside, I can hear her saying
> "Lead me with strong hands

> Stand up when I can't
> Don't leave me hungry for love
> Chasing dreams, what about us?"
> Show me you're willing to fight
> That I'm still the love of your life
> I know we call this our home
> But I still feel alone."
> I see their faces, look in their innocent eyes
> They're just children from the outside
> I'm working hard, I tell myself they'll be fine
> They're independent
> But on the inside, I can hear them saying
> "Lead me with strong hands
> Stand up when I can't
> Don't leave me hungry for love
> Chasing dreams, what about us?"
> Show me you're willing to fight
> That I'm still the love of your life
> I know we call this our home
> But I still feel alone."

What this world needs is the same thing our families need–for us men to lead, if not explicitly as husbands and fathers, then as those who do their parts to clean up the social ecology around us by acting in a manner befitting of men, with integrity, courage, and righteousness.

I'll close with this prayer that my brothers read and internalize this post in the manner that it was offered…as a constructive critique meant to encourage introspection and critical self-assessment, and not as a spear thrown by someone on the outside with no skin in the game and who doesn't necessarily have our best interests at heart. I exhort each of us men to set our eyes on the prize: a prize that each of us should seek to achieve and bequeath to our heirs: a world better than that which we presently find ourselves.

Jenn Sterger: Why I Can't Blame Brett Favre

By Kingpin

We all know how this has been portrayed in the media. Poor, innocent lil Jenn is minding her own business when big bad Brett randomly sends her pictures of his penis. Lil Jen is so damaged she needs to seek legal help to reconcile it in her mind.

Yeah. Right.

Now I'm not saying Brett didn't send the pics. Even though the evidence hasn't been fully disclosed, I would not be surprised if he did it. But can you really judge him? We all know that pictures of private parts from BOTH sexes travel through the netherworld of cellphone-space every night, and sometimes even during the day (who has time to wait?). Also, take a look at Brett Favre. Not a bad looking guy, one of the greatest QBs of all time, rich…quite a catch for any woman, to be sure. That being said, you cannot expect me to believe that a guy who could have almost any woman he wanted sent pictures of his penis to a girl that was not interested in him. Think about it…how did he get her phone number in the first place? There HAD to be something going on. I just can't see any man short of a loony-bin patient sending pics of his dick to a girl unless he had a previous relationship with her or she expressed some convincing level of interest in him. Here's what I think happened:

Brett joins the Jets. He sees Jenn on the field, thinks she's hot, and at some point strikes up a conversation with her. The two hit it off, he gets her number, and either they secretly start seeing each other or they start talking about being involved. When the conversations start getting dirty, he sends pics of his penis to her either upon request or not. After he leaves the Jets, he stops calling her or breaks it off. Jenn, the beautiful woman she is, is not used to rejection, and gets angry. After considering how she can get back at him, she remembers having the pics and decides to press sexual harassment charges. Thus, Brett finds himself in his current situation.

If I am right, and I am pretty sure that is what happened, could you really hold it against Brett? We guys know what happens when all the blood leaves our brains and heads south of the border. He was horny, could not use proper judgment, one thing led to another, and he made a big mistake. Well…I'd say the biggest mistake he made was trusting Jenn. You don't shit where you eat, but regardless of that axiom, it happens more often than you think. Some guys are just lucky enough to get away with it.

A Business Idea

W.F. Price · 17 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some of the men who read this site have expressed some disappointment about how spare we are about giving out advice and direction. I've thought about it as well, but there's no easy solution to this.

The problem is that it's very easy to give people advice, but it's actually very, very difficult to give people good advice. There are a few reasons for this:

First, no two humans are alike, and this means that any general advice has to take a very wide cross-section of the population into consideration. This requires not only wisdom and experience, but a solid understanding of statistics and generalities as well.

Secondly, what if I'm wrong? This is a real moral dilemma. The last thing I want to do is lead someone down the primrose path, which I, personally, have trod like a lamb to the slaughter. Seeing a brother go down because of my advice would both pain and humiliate me.

Finally, there's the issue of humility. I'm not sure I'm sufficiently wise to offer any ironclad maxims for the younger generation. Some might say that one should have some "self-esteem," but what is that but another word for pride? Sins such as pride are not so only because they are ridiculous and offensive, but also because they have proven to be harmful to both the sinner and society in general.

However, there are some good ideas out there that are worth sharing, and I'd like to offer one for enterprising men to consider:

Start a maid business.

One thing that has been brought up over and again here is is that it isn't all that difficult to keep house these days, what with modern appliances and all. This is true — without children keeping house is a pretty simple affair. Even with them it isn't anywhere near as difficult as it used to be. Still, a lot of guys can't be bothered, and a lot of these men are single. However, an amazing fact is that most maids are employed by wives (or so they call themselves) who simply can't be bothered. Not all that many men actually contract housekeeping services because they simply haven't grown accustomed to the idea.

This is an opportunity that is ripe for the picking. When men go into any business that is traditionally the provenance of women, they generally clean up. Think of the wholesale replacement of wifely industry by the industrialization of spinning, weaving, etc. There are legions of men who have made fortunes by taking advantage of the inefficiency of the housewife of yore. Wives no longer sew, mend or spin, but rather shop and enrich the men who have made their jobs redundant. These days, wives don't even cook, instead simply opening boxes and reading instructions written at the elementary school level. Put two cups of mix in bowl, add egg and milk, stir with fork… That's it.

Given modern social norms, it's time to eliminate the wife from the household picture altogether. And considering the fact that modern appliances make a good scrubdown little more than an afterthought, the amount of labor required to keep a place in good shape is minimal. So, even paying a higher than average hourly fee – say $20/hr – for low-skill work such as housekeeping is reasonable. For your typical childless man, two hours a week is probably more than enough to take care of the details he'd rather not bother with. Add ten bucks for transportation/gas money and that comes out to only $50/week. For that, a man could have a thoroughly clean domicile without any of the trouble that comes along with a girlfriend/wife performing such basic labor, who would surely complain and make compensatory demands anyway. Sure, he'd have to wash his dishes and buy groceries, but scrubbing the bathroom and kitchen, doing the windows and mopping and vacuuming would all be taken care of. Also, the woman (or man) doing the work would be discreet, respectful and fast.

If I were to start this kind of business, I would market exclusively to men — women are always intrigued by what men are doing and would find it on their own, so female clients would appear without any extra effort. I would treat employees with the humanity and consideration that men generally bring to the table regarding employees, and exercise quality control based on my male clients' feedback (women are prone to complaining and petty retribution, so I'd place less weight on their opinions). Furthermore, I'd challenge the female-run maid services, which comprise the majority, head-on and beat them badly and without mercy.

It's an idea whose time has come. Men can take care of themselves, but sometimes time is important, and men would quickly learn to use such a service if they found it trustworthy and convenient. However, I would never, ever get involved with the "naughty maid" prostitution outfits which offer men young, topless maids or the like for an elevated fee. That's pimping, which is a very low occupation, and young, good-looking women are the lousiest housekeepers of all. Never, ever hire a woman who persuades men to buy her trinkets on the strength of her physical assets for such an occupation — it is an invitation for trouble. In fact, if you must hire this kind of woman, never forget that she is a prostitute, and is only useful as such or as a front for some deceptive effort (e.g. blackmail).

So, take it or leave it. Personally, I think some smart man will take it up and make a killing. Some are probably already doing so. It might take a slight cultural change to convince more men to use it, but nothing a clever marketer can't easily deal with. In the long run, it would be good for not only men, but needy, less attractive and older women as well.

Although it shouldn't need to be mentioned because men are generally decent human beings, there are a lot of feminists out there who might suggest that this kind of business would be about "objectification" or some similar garbage, so I will add that there would be absolutely no need to tolerate abusive clients. A simple and straightforward business offering good service for decent wages could do very well in the current climate — if the feminists don't tax it out of existence, of course.

Equality in Federal Contract Bidding

Hawaiian Libertarian · 17 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Reading today's Pacific Business News – a Hawaii-based business paper, I saw the most recent issues latest front page, above-the-fold headline:

Women-owned firms to benefit.

Apparently, some feminists and their mangina politicians passed some law 10 years ago that gave preference to women owned businesses in certain industries when bidding for Federal Contracts. This law has basically not been used or enforced since it was passed…but now that we are in the midst of the Great Depression 2.0, and more men than women have been getting laid off, NOW the Federal Government decides is the perfect time to resurrect this affirmative action legislation.

> The rule, which was first proposed by Congress in 2000 but only published in the Federal Register last week, aims to increase the amount of federal contracting dollars that go to businesses that are at least 51 percent owned by women in 83 industries in which women were found to be underrepresented — everything from construction to accounting to public relations. The agency has 120 days from the date of publication to implement the new rule

Oh, but it gets worse than a simple case of affirmative action…

> The new rule puts some teeth in the regulations, putting women-owned businesses on similar footing as service-disabled veteran-owned businesses and businesses that participate in the SBA's 8(a) business-development program, which enjoy the benefits of bidding for contracts that are set aside for their specific programs.

Let's get this straight….

…if you're a male who went to fight for this country in one of the various wars for the US Military, and got a limb blown off or lost your sight or some other horrific war injury…and you come home and start a business, you will be able to receive equal preference under this program…equal to other American business owners who are designated for this legislation simply because they were born with a vagina and whom also own a business?!?!

EQUALITY BABY!!!!

> "This new ruling is going to be substantial in that it will mean something," Downs said.

Oh it will mean something alright…it means the only way a man can have an equal opportunity to receive preference under this new regulation like a woman, will be to get disabled while fighting for our Cuntry.

Words fail me at the moment.

Germaine Greer Supports Online Date Rapist List

W.F. Price · 18 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Germaine Greer, now an English professor at Warwick University, proposed the creation of an online rapist registry "because we know the courts can't get it right."

According to Greer, not nearly enough men are being convicted of date rape, so the list would serve as both a punitive and practical solution. Not only could women check the list to screen men, but they could put men on the list as they pleased without having to bother with trivialities such as courts and police.

Although Greer stated that dealing with criminals through the traditional, official channels is "a high-risk strategy," I wonder whether she's considered the fact that it might be even riskier to conduct a slander campaign against someone who hasn't been duly convicted of anything. An intelligent man who felt aggrieved by such defamation could make a case in court and demand restitution, whereas a less creative and more thuggishly inclined type might simply track the accuser down and assault or murder her.

It's a terribly stupid idea coming from a professor, but it does shine a light on the feminist attitude toward making accusations, which is that all women have the presumptive right to accuse men of whatever they want, for whatever reason, without any scrutiny.

League of Women Voters: Yes on State Income Tax

My home state – Washington – is one of the few states left that still doesn't have an income tax. However, there is now a proposal to introduce an income tax for high earners, supposedly to make up for a budget shortfall. Recently, I saw some clips of a debate on the proposed tax on the news, and was interested to hear that the League of Women Voters hosted the debate.

Bill Gates' father, William H. Gates, Sr., a successful and very old attorney, is the frontman for the tax effort, but the League appears to be providing much of the support for the bill. What is left out of the news reports, however, is what a shining example of self-aggrandizement female support for the bill represents.

The money raised from the new tax would go directly to state education and health programs, which overwhelmingly employ females, often at inflated wages. Given the incomes at which the tax would kick in, it would most certainly be mainly men paying it. Therefore, it is almost as close to a direct subsidy from men to women as alimony.

Here's the League of Women Voters statement of support for the initiative:

> Initiative 1098: concerns establishing a state income tax and reducing other taxes. This measure would tax "adjusted gross income" above $200,000 (individuals) and $400,000 (joint-filers), reduce state property tax levies, reduce certain business and occupation taxes, and direct any increased revenues to education and health.
> League of Women Voters of Washington position on tax structure states: Inequities in the distribution of the tax burden should be removed. Ability to pay is an important criterion. Flexibility and recognition of changing times and needs is important in tax policy. Income should be part of the tax base preferably through a graduated net income tax.

If you follow the above link to the pdf file, there are a number of other initiatives upon which the League takes a position. Unsurprisingly, in every single case their position supports initiatives or measures that increase state taxes or spending, or opposes any initiatives that might make it more difficult for the state to do so.

Here are the measures they oppose:

> The League of Women Voters of Washington Board of Directors has voted to oppose the following:
> Initiative 1053: concerns tax and fee increases imposed by state government. This measure would restate existing statutory requirements that legislative actions raising taxes must be approved by two-thirds legislative majorities or receive voter approval, and that new or increased fees require majority legislative approval.
> National League position includes that government must have the knowledge, resources and power to make decisions that meet citizens needs and reconcile conflicting interests and priorities, and it must be able to function in an efficient manner with a minimum of conflict, wasted time and duplication of effort.
> Initiative Measure No. 1100 concerns liquor (beer, wine and spirits). This measure would close state liquor stores; authorize sale, distribution, and importation of spirits by private parties; and repeal certain requirements that govern the business operations of beer and wine distributors and producers.
> According to the Office of Financial Management, I-1100 would lower state revenue approximately $25 million per year through the privatization of liquor.
> Initiative Measure No. 1105 concerns liquor (beer, wine and spirits). This measure would close all state liquor stores and license private parties to sell or distribute spirits. It would revise laws concerning regulation, taxation and government revenues from distribution and sale of spirits.

> According to the Office of Financial Management, I-1105 would lower state revenue approximately $100 million per year through the privatization of liquor.
> Initiative 1107 concerns reversing certain 2010 amendments to state tax laws. This measure would end sales tax on candy; end temporary sales tax on some bottled water; end temporary excise taxes on carbonated beverages; and reduce tax rates for certain food processors.
> According to the Office of Financial Management, I-1107 would lower state tax revenue by 55 million in the current fiscal year and $218 million in the upcoming biennium by removing the tax on candy & gum, bottled water, soda and reinstating tax loopholes.
> League believes all initiatives proposed should "require how revenue losses or budget increases might be covered, either through program cuts or increases in revenue sources." (League position on Initiatives, IR-4)

Very consistent. Women's organizations always support taking money from men and giving it to women. It's also interesting that some of the old prohibitory instinct appears to remain, what with the league's position on state liquor sales.

It has always been an open question as to how democracy might eventually end in the West, and I think here we have a good clue. If adult women continue to consistently favor themselves at the expense of everyone else (men, children and posterity), there's a good chance that they will eventually vote us into economic irrelevance and a failure of productivity. Not only that, they could well vote us into demographic oblivion — feminist countries have proven incapable of replacing themselves due to overregulation of the family.

Rather than putting men on Mars, we may end up squandering the last of our creativity and effort on finding increasingly implausible ways to further bolster the status of our women.

New Shrink4men Site Up And Running

W.F. Price · 19 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Tara Palmatier has just opened a new website devoted to helping men who have been victims of abusive partners, and I had the privilege of helping her get it off the ground. I found Dr. Palmatier to be a bright, genuine person who is both easy to work with and a fast learner — traits that I am sure are of great utility in her profession as a therapist.

Due to the incredible pressure the law and society puts on men during separation and divorce, a pressure so severe that it causes many men to take their own lives, therapy and support for men is a crucial but sadly underused service. However, people are beginning to recognize that this is a problem, and that the proposed feminist solution – an endless escalation of conflict between men on one side and women, courts and law enforcement on the other – leads to countless tragedies. Additionally, more and more men are realizing that seeking out help is a better idea than trying to take on the world alone.

As I have recommended before, men who are going through the nightmare of divorce would do well to seek out any and all assistance they can enlist, including that offered by professionals as well as friends, family and even strangers — Good Samaritans do exist!

Finally, Dr. Palmatier has demonstrated a rare combination of compassion and good business sense by catering to an underserved demographic. In time, many more professionals are sure to follow suit when they, too, see the opportunity presented, but those who were pioneers in the field will always stand out.

Rape Realism

Chuck Ross · 19 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Let it never be said that feminists aren't adept at using visual devices and scare tactics effectively. That both of these go hand-in-hand isn't surprising.

I recently stumbled across a flow chart produced by the Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network (RAINN) that seems to be making its way across the fem-o-sphere that decries the fact that 15 out of 16 rapists serve no prison time.

[image]

The chart is mostly effective because it (is):

- easy to read
- alarmist in conclusion
- raises concerns about a hot-button issue that can not ultimately be solved
- has arrows
- doesn't actually draw any conclusions (as per point 3).

The rape flow chart is yet another liberal argument without an argument.

Let me add perspective here. This flow chart compiled data from three governmental and institutional surveys about rape, attempted rape, and sexual assault. It is telling that the creators of the chart lump all of those under the rape umbrella – no doubt to maximize effectiveness. The opening salvo states:

> 60% of rapes/sexual assaults are not reported to the police, according to a statistical average of the past 5 years.[2] Those rapists, of course, never spend a day in prison. Factoring in unreported rapes, only about 6% of rapists ever serve a day in jail.

The argument starts out in good faith by acknowledging "rapes/sexual assaults" as separate categories, but then it drops the less effective terminology and opts to call all of these crimes "rapes" by the end of the paragraph.

But, for the purposes of determining real arrests, convictions, and penalizations it would be best for us to understand the difference between these categories. The governmental surveys define sexual assault as grabbing, fondling, or verbal threats. Rape is unwanted or coerced sexual penetration. According to statistics, 35% of reported cases were considered rape, 27% were considered attempted rape while 38% were considered sexual assault. If feminists had their way every sexual assault case – even where a man grabbed a woman's breast or rear end on a train or made lewd comments toward her – would end in a prison sentence. But the courts and justice system don't work that way; prison terms are socially constructed based upon resource constraints and criminal severity. Feminists hope that if they hem and haw enough, crimes like unwanted ass-grabbing will supersede robbery, larceny, theft, aggravated assault and battery, forgery, or illicit drug dealing in terms of sentencing.

To gain proper perspective on how effective our justice system is in punishing rape, we should analyze other crimes. We can consider homicide and its analogous strains (made for comparison to rape and sexual assault) – attempted murder and aggravated assault and battery. According to government statistics, 40% of homicides are left uncleared. An uncleared homicide is one in which authorities neither make an arrest nor formally close the case. But homicide is different from rape (sexual assault) – not only in terms of absolute effect but also in its ability to be defined. A 40% unsolved rate is relatively high considering that "homicide" and "murder" have objectively defined end results: a dead person. Homicide – except in cases of self-defense – aren't subject to fluid and subjective terms much like rape is – which opens up room for rape to be categorized like homicide – with degrees like capital murder, first-degree, second-degree, manslaughter, and involuntary manslaughter. But feminists prefer to lump any unwanted sexual contact into the "rape" category because it casts a wide net and adds to the concept of male original sin. Unlike rape, with homicides there is no room for false reporting whereas experts' consensus on false rape claims puts that figure at around 10%. Given that some (many?) sexual assaults aren't actionable offenses, and given the fact that some rape claims are false, a 50% arrest rate would be workably more significant than a 60% arrest rate for homicide. Here a table from the National Center for Policy Analysis' report on crime arrest, prosecution, and sentencing statistics:

As you can see, homicides have a 40% probability of ending in prison time. Keep in mind, these figures are from 1997 and that homicide arrest rates have fallen about 6% since then (I don't have data on how much rape/sexual assault arrests have fallen). Rape is second among all categories of crime with a 16.3% prison sentencing rate. As such, a 50% arrest ratio for a category that is 62% rape and attempted rape (the harshest crimes falling under the "rape" umbrella) sounds relatively successful to my subjective brain. It seems that feminists who accept rape as their cause really have a problem with the entire justice system – in both their constrained resources and their imbedded standards of prosecution and guilt-determination (aka The Constitution).

In that this flow chart is an argument without an argument it fails to teach us anything useful. It then becomes another scare tactic used by feminists to convince us all that "something has to be done" without addressing exactly what that "something" is and what we're able to do about it. The chart doesn't make clear exactly where the problem lies. Does the "problem" lie with women who are unwilling to report their rapes? Is it with the police and prosecutors who don't take rape seriously? Is it with juries who let that pesky phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" get in the way? How about with judges who are too lenient on convicted "rapists"? Or, finally, is it with society which doesn't take rape seriously enough?

Subjectively – like feminists and the purveyors of this chart – a 16.3% prison time ratio seems about right considering a.) 38% of offenses are sexual assault and 27% are attempted rape – crimes which may not have deserve prison time – relatively speaking b.) some of the accusations are false claims; knowledge of such occurrences cascade through the justice system and have multiplicative effects (but we aren't allowed to harangue false rape claimants because that makes us rape apologists) c.) prosecutors may not feel they have enough evidence to convict d.) juries may not find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and e.) judges may not see fit to put those who are convicted of their crime in prison – especially if that crime is some sort of lewd grabbing or sexual taunting.

These visual tactics and open-ended questions are often used by leftist movements which maintain their heads of steam by always having something to fight for. Being radical, that something is Utopia. For feminists whose raison d'etre is thwarting rape (a noble effort, don't get me wrong), their work is never done until the world is ridden of this scourge. As such, we have to understand a flow chart like this for what it is. It is a tool by which radical feminists seek to co-opt focus, attention, and resources on the issues they deem important. Through it, they are merely the loudest voices among the crowd hoping for attention to their cause. Feminists who publish scare tactics like this are tacitly saying that other crimes aren't as worthy of attention, government funds and private dollars are unjustly spent, and peoples' attention is focused in the wrong direction. Where are the advocacy groups seeking to increase arrest and prosecutions for people who commit homicide? Surely death carries more weight than rape – not to even mention sexual assault. Their effective visual aids and alarming pseudo-analysis coalesce in attracting attention, sympathy, and – above all else – funding. But just as rape and rapists will always exist as long as humans are human, unmentioned rapes will always exist too (and as long as "linguistic inflation" gobbles up more and more situations and calls them rape). Prosecutors will never be able to find enough evidence in every rape case to press on towards trial; juries will never close the asymmetric information and moral hazard gap so as to increase convictions. Not to mention the budgetary constraints which make it impossible for everyone to work in the D.A.'s office or for a prison to be built on every street corner. A full-on eradication of rape/sexual assault will never happen unless, that is, we were able to institute a Big Brother like society where rapes wouldn't even occur in the first place. But given that, lots of other things – non criminal speech and non criminal behavior along the way – will be thwarted. When Utopia comes into existence, Utopia is far from existing.

R/mensrights and the MRM

Paul Elam · 20 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Paul Elam

In this movement, for lack of a better word, there are frequently calls for more organized activism. While there are some laudable organized efforts afoot, I have to admit that I have always been of the opinion that we are doing just fine for the length of time we have been at this, and that there is a lot to be said for individual, leaderless work.

But I feel compelled at the time to break from my own tradition and make a suggestion regarding some collective effort.

Reddit.com has a men's rights area, or r/mensrights if you will, that appears to be growing quite rapidly. Just a couple of months ago there were 9,000 members and now there are over 14,000. Articles from AVfM that are posted there do draw a respectable amount of traffic, and have resulted in quite a few new registered users on the site. It is some pretty strong evidence, along with other factors, that interest in men's issues is growing at a pretty brisk pace. But you already knew that.

There are also some problems. Due to its growing popularity, it has become a magnet for feminist trolls whose sole purpose is to go in and down vote articles so they are less likely to be read. A good example of this is my latest article on Rape Culture. At this point it has a near even distribution of votes, 29 up and 22 down. My guess is that the down votes aren't coming from too many MRA's.

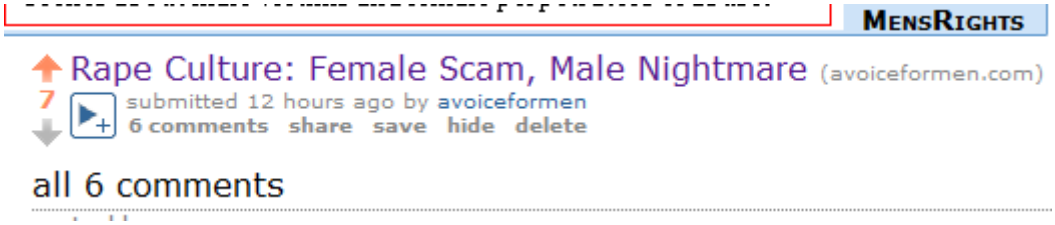
While the site continues to provide a valuable venue for MRA's, it would be a lot better if we were able to collectively negate the effect of the feminist trolls who are attempting to block our effective use of a resource that reaches a lot of people that would not otherwise know about the MRM.

In my admittedly less than humble opinion, it is time for r/mensrights to be dominated by MRA's, and I actually believe we need to do it.

I have spoken on the phone with Bill Price over at the-spearhead.com, and he willing to work together toward a solution.

You may have noticed that in a couple of recent articles I have included a link at the end to reddit with a suggestion to vote on the article over there. Early in the game, the feminists were all over those posts with down votes, but we still made it back into the positive as time went on.

What I am proposing here, both to readers of this site and The Spearhead that they take just a moment to click through that link and vote on the article. I am firmly convinced that this will ultimately serve to discourage trolls at r/mensrights and more importantly drawn new readers into MRM literature. A nice feature is that you don't have to back-browse to return here. There is a link back to the article on site immediately to the right of where you vote, as you can see here:



In the end, I don't think it matters a great deal if we succeed at this or not. This movement is growing regardless. But the boost, both in traffic and moral, certainly can't hurt. And the way I have it figured, 20-25 new voters on these articles is all it would take to make that particular men's rights forum exactly what it ought to be- user unfriendly for feminist trolls.

Vote on this article at Reddit HERE.

Site Slowdowns

We've been getting enormous amounts of traffic lately, and it has caused my server to bump up against the memory limit, which kills scripts and makes the site slow way, way down or stop working. Yesterday, there was also a database failure on the server, which only compounded things. Amazingly, despite the site being down a few times yesterday, we had more traffic than any single day other than back when PMAFT's scifi post went viral and was linked all over the place. It seems that The Spearhead is starting to become fairly widely known and recognized, as the traffic has been growing faster and faster over the last couple months.

I've raised the memory resources (nearly doubling them), and that seems to have fixed the problem. Only thing is, I'll have to go back and lower the resources again when the traffic subsides because extra memory costs extra $$. I don't like changing the memory all the time, because it's a pain, but fortunately I found a program that can do it for me, like a faithful little robot, so I'll be installing that and we can avoid traffic interruptions even when I'm sound asleep or otherwise away from the desk.

So if you find the site slow or unresponsive, it's just growing pains and means that there are tons of people reading the site — once things stabilize again and we find a sweet spot with memory resource allocation things ought to smooth out.

Blog Debate Tonight

Paul Elam is debating a feminist named David Futrelle on the issue of domestic violence this evening on Paul's A Voice For Men website, presumably by liveblogging the debate. This may prove to be an interesting event, so readers with the time should stop by and check it out.

Paul's feminist opponent writes a blog called "Manboobz," which is generally dedicated to poking fun at men. Some of the pictures on the blog are admittedly pretty funny, but there doesn't seem to be much of depth in the content, so hopefully Mr. Futrelle can rise to the occasion this evening.

Personally, I'd like to see these debates go live on the air, and I think the time for that is coming, so perhaps this is good practice.

Female Predator Seduced Boy on World Of Warcraft

W.F. Price · 21 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

33-year-old single mother Jessica Pearce has been charged with luring a 16-year-old boy away from his home in New Jersey to Centralia, Washington by means of the online game World Of Warcraft. After meeting online as fantasy characters, the two began exchanging nude photos. The boy was 15 years old at the time. In July 2009, after the boy's father found explicit texts from Pearce, he told his son to end the relationship.

Pearce then began flying to New Jersey to meet the boy, sometimes bringing her 6-year-old child along, and finally, in September 2009, she forged a school ID card for him and flew with him back to Washington State, where the FBI caught up with the pair a few days later.

Pearce allegedly admitted to sleeping with the boy, and indicated that she was trying to get pregnant, because she planned to marry him and "make a family."

Although first arrested and interrogated over a year ago, Pearce has only now been charged and incarcerated at the SeaTac Federal Detention Center.

President Appeals to Women to Bolster Democrats

W.F. Price · 21 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In Seattle, where Obama has been tirelessly campaigning for Democrat Patty Murray, who faces a tough challenge in the usually blue state of Washington, the President has been exhorting women to turn out to vote ensure that his faithful “mom in tennis shoes” senator is reelected.

Touting the beneficial effects of the mancession, Obama pointed out that more women now have jobs than men, and that his administration has worked hard to ensure that women receive all the federal assistance he can provide.

Additionally, he proclaimed that the predominance of women in the workforce now means that women’s issues (i.e. feminism) are middle class issues. Men’s issues were never mentioned.

Apparently, the last Democrats who stood up for working men are dead or senile. Republicans, who haven’t stood up for working men since the 1850s, when they campaigned with the slogan “free labor [i.e. not slave labor], free land, free men,” are also avoiding any mention of men’s issues.

When a man REALLY HAS TO do what a man's gotta do

zed · 21 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

OK, Elusive Wapiti started it with his recent post about acquiring a Taurus .45 1911-style firearm. It kick-started some of my thinking processes and I thought it would be a good opportunity to take a break from what is becoming a pattern here at the-spearhead of bemoaning how bad men have it and how awful women are these days and talk a little bit about the role of firearms and taking responsibility for one's own protection and one's own life and their significance for men.

A quote you will see a lot on 2nd Amendment oriented boards is -
"When seconds count, the police are just minutes away."

In fact, this is not quite accurate – "minutes" can actually be "hours", and the US courts have ruled that LEOs (Law Enforcement Officers) actually have no hard responsibility to protect individual citizens. (Police Have No Duty To Protect Individuals, Text of H.R. 17: Citizens' Self-Defense Act of 2009) Their responsibility is to maintain "public order" – full stop.

What this means is that it remains our individual responsibility to protect ourselves and those we love. In the cultural climate of Marriage 2.0 the courts have focused exclusively on holding men to the "provider" portion of the old "protect and provide" role, and have conveniently ignored the "protect" part of it.

EW also wrote a recent post on needing male "leaders." Typically, a lot of people interpreted this as meaning being a Spartacus who shows up to lead a slave revolt. However, I think the very use of the word "leader" introduces a lot of confusing baggage to cloud the issue of what traits have traditionally been considered "masculine" and which of those traits men today need to hold on to and aspire to. There are lots of ways to describe them, but in order to simplify the discussion I suggest we boil them down to 3 things – self reliance, initiative, and responsibility.

Or – a man's gotta do what a man's gotta do.

It is a very feminine strategy to caterwaul as loudly as possible about what victims they are and how they will surely perish if men do not find a way to "empower" (meaning "rescue") them. It is a very masculine strategy to be self-reliant and take the initiative and be responsible for the quality of one's own life.

If a psychotic criminal like Steven Hayes invades your home and threatens you and your family, the buck stops with you to tell him that you won't allow it. By the time the LEOs show up, if they bother to show up at all, it will be too late for someone you care about. I don't know about you, but when I am engaged in an argument with a psychotic criminal in the form -
Psychotic-Criminal – "I'm going to hurt you and your family"
Me – "No, you are not."
P-C – "Yes, I am."
I want the argument to be over ASAP.

And, when it comes to ending arguments with PCs, when you really need to "Git 'R Done", there is the .45 acp… and then there is everything else. The classic design for the .45 is called the M1911 and was designed by John Browning in 1904. The 1911 designation comes from that being the year when it was adopted by the US military as a standard issue weapon. The US military had gradually moved away from the old single-action .45 revolver (the famous, or infamous, Colt "Peacemaker") to double-action revolvers using the .38 Long Colt cartridge. While the double-actions allowed more rapid firing than the single-actions, the .38 caliber (technically a .36 cal, same diameter as the 9mm) cartridge proved to be under powered for what it needed to do.

During the Moro Rebellion in the Phillipines the Moro warriors used leather armor and drugs to reduce or endure the wounds that the lighter cartridge was capable of inflicting, and were over-running the US positions. A call went out to the military to drag as many old .45 Colt "Peacemakers" out of mothballs as they could find, and to come up with a cartridge with more stopping power than the .38 LC. The result was a new firearm design – the autoloader – which combined the relatively rapid fire capability of the double action revolvers with a larger, more powerful, cartridge. The result was the .45 cal acp (Automatic Colt Pistol) design.

Both the 1911 pistol and the .45 acp cartridge have proven to be among the most successful firearm designs ever created. Next year will be the 100th anniversary of the adoption of the M1911, and it has never gone out of style. There was a period in the late part of the 20th century when there was a trend toward adopting a more international standard of the 9mm (Luger), but a drawn out battle between FBI agents and two bank robbers in Miami in 1986 had similar results to the Moro Rebellion and proved that the lighter .36 cal cartridges just did not get the job done. The FBI, like the Army had done 80 years earlier, sought a more powerful cartridge – which led to the development of the 10mm. However, the 10mm was such a hand cannon that most agents found it too much to handle, so they cut it down and it became the .40 cal Smith & Wesson. Rather than wait around for the new cartridge to get perfected and become accepted, a lot of LEOs simply dusted off their old M1911s and went back to carrying them.

The M1911 is not the only design which uses the .45 acp, but it remains THE classic. Virtually every major firearm manufacturer makes at least one variation on the 1911 design, and some – like Springfield and Kimber – make several.

Now, I have no intention of igniting the tired old revolver vs autoloader debate, nor inciting another round of the caliber wars. But, I would like to talk about some of the options that a man who takes the intiative and responsibility to protect himself and his family has in choosing a .45 acp. There are custom built and tuned match-grade .45s, but like Rolex watches they tend to be more about status than pure utility. A man who cares more about accurate time than impressing someone can do fine with a watch that costs far less than $10,000. And a man who wants a reliable piece of “emergency equipment” for protection of self and family has a variety of very good choices which are very affordable.

My personal favorite in a 1911 design is the Dan Wesson Commander Bobtail. I think it is the tightest made mass production 1911 out there. Besides that, it is just absolutely beautiful to look at. They ain’t cheap, around $1200, but neither is my life – which I think is worth a whole lot more than $1200, regardless of what Psychotic-Criminals think.

At the other end of the mass market 1911 price point is the Firestorm American Classic. It is not quite the quality, particularly the fit and finish, of the Dan Wesson CBOB, but it can be had for about 1/3rd the price and still has features of much higher-end pieces. Personally, I think it is the best value on the market today. It has a lifetime warranty, and the company provides excellent customer service. They are about as hard to find as the DW-CBOB because they get snapped up almost instantly, but if you find one it can generally be had for $400-$450.

Among the non-1911 designs is the Bersa Thunder .45 Ultra Compact. Bersa is one of the best kept secrets of the firearms world. They are a major supplier to police departments around the world, and their emphasis is about 99% quality and utility and about 1% looks. They are not the prettiest guns in the world to look at, but if someone is buying them only to look at they probably have a lot more money to spend than most of us do.

Finally, Kahr Arms includes several .45 acp models in its line of polymer based pistols. While there is a certain paradox in putting a cartridge as large and heavy as the .45 acp in a gun designed specifically to be light in weight, Kahr manages to make the compromise work. I would add the caveat that this is probably a “when you really need it” piece and would not make it a range gun to put lots of rounds through. To me, the 9mm+polymer design is the sweet spot and I would be concerned about rapid wear with heavier loads. In this line I would definitely go with the higher end PM series over the budget CW series.

I know that I haven’t even scratched the surface of the available offerings for this fine cartridge. Smith and Wesson also makes it in their M&P series (as well as a 1911), along with Heckler & Koch, Sig Sauer, Ruger, and most of the other big name manufacturers. The cartridge can even be used in revolvers by using a moon clip. My intention was to offer a sampler some of the excellent choices that a man who decides to step up, lead, take responsibility, and exercise the right which those of us in the United States are guaranteed by the 2nd amendment to our constitution to protect ourselves and those we love.

Advocating Activism

It's never going to happen, so stop thinking that it will. Groups of men aren't ever going to organize against women; because that's how the MRA is perceived, no matter how you spin it. If you're against feminism, you're against women's rights and if you're against woman's rights, you must be against women. How dare you?! This is how it was so brilliantly set up in the mass consciousness. Perception is reality.

But in case you haven't noticed, there actually does seem to be a movement afoot and it's being reflected in comments sections on internet news sites. Unfettered by MSM liberal doctrine, people are actively speaking out against feminist ideologies that, up until recently, have gone unchallenged in mainstream dialog. Feminism has over-played her hand causing a certain fatigue with the messaging among common folk. As much as we've struggled to "empower" women to be more like men, they're still women. Everyone knows it and no one will say it. Feminism is a failure. Women don't like it and men refuse to adapt to it; those who do end up in miserable denial.

Without censorship and with anonymity people are starting to speak their minds and the few feminists left can't twiddle their digits fast enough to stop it. It's an awakening and it's spreading, in a way feminism originally did in popular women's magazines and TV of the 70's. Because you see a movement doesn't have to be thousands of well funded activists with signs on the DC mall, broadcast on the nightly news. A movement is about a message that connects with people and spreads. And the Men's Rights message is spreading quickly and globally thanks to the far and swift reach of the internet.

Women have made so called "progress", but at the expense of men. And we're starting to expose it and call them out on it. Every "news item" that revels in female victimhood as the by-line, is getting overwhelmed with facts, figures and links that dispute the propagandist "message" behind the story, from on-line "activist" commenter's. Who are all those people doing that? They can't all be us!

That's why it's important that we try and maintain a certain decorum when posting or commenting. First, you probably won't make it past the news site comments moderators, and second consider the audience. It's not feminists and mangina/white knights. It's uninformed but yet curious passers-by, still very much under the influence of feminist cultural programming, but perhaps riding the fence. Yes, that means abiding by a certain level of political correctness. Use your words wisely, make sense, be reasonable and respectful. You want to be read and clearly understood, whether anyone agrees with you or not. Don't respond to the petty ad hominem attacks by the fem squad inkind. Respond with facts people can relate to.

And for those on the fringe that use the cover of "freedom of speech" to say whatever they want to, I point to Dworkin, McKinnon and the other "rad-fems", who's tasteless quotes are used to this day to discredit and dismiss feminists as insane. Always consider the context of what you say and how you say it and above all who you're saying it to. You're representing a counter-movement of many that can be hindered by the words of one. Temper yourself. Keep it civil.

The Men's Rights Movement is growing in popularity because the message is touching so many in a viral fashion. Just because it's not on TV doesn't mean it doesn't exist. Many like you and I, were once walking around thinking "WTF!" and had nowhere to express it. Those like us are growing "in numbers too big to ignore". Feminism is finally registering on the collective bullshit meter and we need to help it along to peg the needle. Deprogramming society from 50 years of indoctrination into feminist dogma will take time, but at least now the shift seems to be gaining momentum.

Jack Donovan · 22 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Like my friend W.F. Price, I've been seeing a series of articles on some supposed "return to masculinity" in the world of fashion. I agree with Mr. Price that many designers truly are queens who have very little interest in what everyday men want to look like. I've lived in New York City and spent a short time, many years ago, more involved in the fashion industry than I care to admit. So, it is from that perspective that I'd like to elaborate a bit on this "new" trend that folks are hot to impregnate with meaning.

I have no doubt that some Seventh Avenue queers do draw on their sexual fantasies for design inspiration – and even more likely, as with the half-closeted Calvin Klein, their ad campaigns. But there is another phenomenon at work when it comes to the most outrageous gender bending fashions. I've always liked the Van Morrison lyric, "all the girls walk by, dressed up for each other." It's a line that wraps up my understanding of women and high fashion. Beyond a certain threshold, the sartorial obsessions of women are no longer about looking attractive for men. Fashion is really about impressing other women. Fashion is, in its own way, a competitive endeavor. I know few men who give a damn whether their mates have the "right" handbag to go with those heels. But certain women will notice and smile – or sneer.

The same is true with queens in the fashion world. Most homosexual men are not particularly attracted to fussy, androgynous fashionistas. Those types live in a somewhat insular "meta" world of their own creation, and they are seeking the attention and esteem of the peers who share the same obsessions. Like the most extreme female examples, these dandies will spend the majority of their income creating and re-creating the disposable "it" look of moment. It's all very Warholian.

This brings me to a point about the fashion industry, and why we should be wary of reading too much into it. The fashion industry is in the business of cultivating neophilia. It's not about producing something of lasting value, or about making something practical, or about making something better. It's about making something new and grabbing headlines. It's about entertaining fickle, damaged people who are dead inside. They get bored with one look, and then they swing to another extreme, and then a couple of years later they "rediscover" how great that old look was. Like a lot of the art that comes out of New York City, you can read a lot into each swing of the pendulum, and that's all part of the con game. Designers do have to pay attention to what people actually buy, but many make a lot of their money from staples like jeans and t-shirts, or basic suits, or colognes. The stuff that hits the runway and makes the news is about getting attention and getting the name out there. Average men today don't really dress all that differently from the way their grandfathers did, once they get past the "peacock" teens and early-to-mid twenties.

Do fashion designers have any sincere interest in returning to a more traditional understanding of masculinity? Of course not. Or at least, not for more than one season. Fashion designers are the most postmodern of people. They exist in a world of images, not substance.

Masculinity is primarily about substance. It's about what you do, not how you dress.

Fashion designers are recycling the trappings of traditional masculinity into a flimsy identity that people who care about fashion will toss in the garbage next year.

Fashion makes everything meaningless and stupid.

Any "return to masculinity" heralded by the fashion world can only be a return to a meaningless and stupid masculinity.

The recent piece on "Reimaging Masculinity" in Newsweek, flawed as it was, did contain one paragraph in which I could find no fault:

> The truth is, it's not how men style themselves that will make them whole again—it's what they do with their days. The riggers, welders, and boilermakers of generations past weren't wearing overalls to feel like men, as Susan Faludi, the author of books on both sexes, has pointed out. Instead, "their sense of their own manhood flowed out of their utility in a society, not the other way around," she writes. "Conceiving of masculinity as something to be"—a part to play—"turns manliness into [something] ornamental, and about as 'masculine' as fake eyelashes are inherently 'feminine.'?"

Faludi was right here.

And while the Newsweek authors' suggestions were tone-deaf and unrealistic re-hashes of 1970s feminist fantasies, it is true that being a man means a lot more than dressing like one for a season or two. Masculinity is not an outfit, and it's not a fashion statement. It's not a la carte. It's an experience, a role, a way of living, a state of being. Manhood can't change with every season. Being a man is not a weekend retreat. Our manhood is a connection to our fathers and their fathers and the men who came before us. It's our connection to a history that reveals something about who we still are. Men have always adapted to changing environments, and they will continue to do so. But a masculinity that can be buttoned up and buttoned down in response to a marketing trend isn't masculinity at all.

Election Attack Ads Go Into Full Feminist Mode

Below is what I've been seeing on TV here in Seattle:

Murray's campaign has apparently decided that she needs to bring out the single mother vote. What's interesting is that feminist attack ads started immediately after Obama came to town and made a speech about how women are now economically and socially more important than men.

This election really gives the game away: the Democratic Party is the feminist party.

Yet not one single Republican has ever said he intends to do anything to help men, and, in fact, Newt Gingrich was going around telling Harry Reid to "man up." American politics are abysmal. There really is no viable choice for American men.

We need a new party.

Beyond the Marriage Strike: Entering the Era of Post-Marriage Consciousness

zed · 24 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Now, I start this essay knowing that there is a fairly well-known MRA who will attack me for having the audacity to say what I am about to say. A lot of people seem to very hung up on this term “marriage strike” and are betting on it to produce social change of the type they wish to see.

However, being attacked, insulted, and called names for daring to give voice to ideas which go against the grain of conventional social wisdom is something I have had to grow quite used to over the past 4 decades or so.

While the idea of a marriage strike is a cute sound bite, I think it has several major problems both as a metaphor for what is happening culturally and as a strategy. The first and biggest problem for the MRA side of the issue is that it implies that the changes in patterns of marriage that we are seeing today are temporary, and that sooner or later all these so-called “marriage strikers” will “go back to work.” I don’t think that is true, and that the changes in mass behavior are permanent and just the beginning of a major cultural-level shift in behavior reflecting the shift in values over the past 50 years.

In a classic strike situation management has a variety of strategies to break the union and break the strike. They can employ goons (White Knights) to go in and break the heads of the strikers. They can find scabs (manginas) to do the jobs that the strikers are not doing. Or they can stage a lockout and refuse to employ strikers in hopes that they can starve them into capitulation.

This last strategy is the one women are currently using – claiming it is them, not men, who are avoiding marriage. All this conveniently ignores the caterwauling of women over the past 40 years that men were “Peter Pans who can’t make a committment” and the fact that there are no Groomzillas nor Groom Magazines gracing the racks by the checkout stand. There is currently a “Project Husband” – a classic attention-seeker who has the date set and the wedding planned and only needs the small detail of a groom – but no “Project Wife.” And, we even have a woman marrying herself – complete with photos in a flowing white dress, a wedding planner, and a banquet hall for a marriage celebration with 30 friends – but no men engaging in such surreal antics. Every time I think women have reached the absolute peak of narcissism, beyond which it is simply not possible to go, some woman shows up and proves me wrong. The woman with the life-size wedding cake in her own likeness was the previous high-water mark, but at least she did have a groom.

The entire idea of a strike is that it accepts the status quo as legitimate and as the only option. Faced with falling demand for their product, US women have fallen back on the time-honored method of protectionism – passing IMBRA, the International Marriage Broker Regulation act, using their worn, but still effective, method of painting all men as abusers. Imagine what sort of condition Firestone Tires would be in today if, instead of addressing their quality problem, they had gotten huffy and said “Well, NOT ALL our tires are ‘like that.’ Not every one will fail on you and kill you and/or your family. YOU just HAVE TO find the ones that won’t.”

One of the biggest problems with even trying to discuss the issues turns out to be a religious problem. I don’t mean “religion” as in a particular religion like Christianity, Judaism, or Islam (although it is related) – but “religious”in the sense that we have TRUE BELIEVERS and non-believers. Many of the issues we deal with fall into this category. As Words Twice commented on my recent essay on self-reliance when it comes to self-defense:

> “Many casual gun owners have a religious devotion to their pet gun de jour or some piece of gear and trying to explain to them that their conventional wisdom and cherished beliefs are often mistaken is usually more trouble than it is worth.”

Believers BELIEVE, and it the very persistence of this belief in the face of contrary evidence or argument against it which distinguishes a religious belief from other kinds of beliefs. There are TRUE BELIEVERS and non-believers. The TRUE BELIEVER has a mirror category – the TRUE DIS BELIEVER – whose faith that what the believers believe is wrong is every bit as strong as the faith of the believers. For example, I am a TRUE DIS BELIEVER in all the tenets of feminism. I reject it completely, and the depth of my faith is every bit as deep as that of the most committed feminist.

Now, this next bit is going to involve a bit of adroit handling. I'm going to give an example of a TRUE BELIEVER to make a point – NOT to either attack him or hold him up for ridicule. As EW says on his site – Comment with honor.

There is a blog called "Rebellion University" (I like it already) where the blogger discusses another blogger's musings on the phenomenon of a "Marriage Strike." he says

> "I have been married for 24 years. My marriage almost ended 3 times and had serious disagreements on several other occasions. I would not characterize it as a happy marriage now. But I am still convinced that marriage is an excellent institution that I recommend enthusiastically. A good marriage adds to the quality of life for any man. If my marriage ends badly tomorrow I have no doubt that I would be seeking another committed marriage before long and hoping for a better outcome."

This person is a TRUE BELIEVER. Despite his own personal experience, he is "still convinced that marriage is an excellent institution that I recommend enthusiastically." And, if his current excursion into the land of marital bliss "ends badly tomorrow I have no doubt that I would be seeking another committed marriage before long and hoping for a better outcome."

God bless him, and God love him. And I mean that sincerely, it is not a snark.

All I can say here is that I, personally, would and do choose different strategies. At some point in my experience, if what I have been doing has not worked out, then instead of doing the same thing and hoping for a better outcome, I do something different.

I am a marriage non-believer. I do not believe in Marriage 2.0, and I mostly do not believe in my countrywomen. I pretty much agree with Mr. Price about "Stop Looking For a Wife: You Won't Find One." The difference between him and me is that I never actually looked for one, because I never was a Marriage True Believer. Probably the strongest point in favor of the institution that I ever reached was "marriage skeptic." I saw a lot of gruesome marriages as I was growing up, and I watched my older brother's marriage crash and burn before I was out of high school. My older sister's marriage crashed and burned a few years later. Like the safety films they used to show us in high school with names like "Wheels of Tragedy" which showed ghastly car wrecks from driving recklessly, I looked at the carnage from brutal divorces that I was seeing all around me, and decided not to engage in high risk behavior.

As a result, I tend to not be as negative toward either marriage or women as men who have been through the meat grinder of family courts, but rather take more of a "none for me, thanks" position.

The tired old NAWALT dodge is wasted on guys like me – "There are still lots of good women out there, YOU JUST HAVE TO go out and find them."

Um, sorry, no, actually, I don't "have to." There are a lot of laws that require me to do things – file tax returns, pay taxes, get a license to drive plus a license for every vehicle I intend to drive on public streets. But, there are no laws that say I "have to" go out, sort through all the turds for as long as it takes to find my tootsie roll (HT: Anakim Niceguy, aka Jaded Guy), stand at the foot of her tower pleading "Rapunzel, Rapunzel, let down your hair", court her, lay my worldly goods at her feet, and wait with bated breath while she rules on my "worthiness."

As novaseeker has observed, people not marrying does not mean that they are not pairing up – at least for the few years it takes to produce one or more offspring. With marriage going down and cohabitation going up, the response of the White Knights has been to extend what were formerly marital prerogatives for women and obligations for men to cohabiting relationships. This is a singularly bad strategy for women because it forces the commitment-phobes to end an otherwise satisfying relationship before she gains legal claim on his assets and his work.

Now, the owners of the means of (re)production are counting on the fact that men need women so badly that all women have to do is wait men out and men will come around. And, I think the term "marriage strike" lends itself to this kind of thinking. After all, a striker's bills go on whether he is working or not. Eventually he will run out of food, and the heat and lights will be cut off and he will have to take whatever he is offered or starve.

But, what if he doesn't? What if he decides to up and move somewhere else where the availablity of work and working conditions are better? What if he has been frugal enough that he looks at his fiscal situation and decides that he can just retire?

Women and marriage are getting a whole lot of very bad PR right now. From Bill's article, to how Bridezillas are portrayed, to the amount of hostility and violence expressed by not just women,but young girls as well, toward males of all ages. "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them."

But, bad PR is nothing new. As I said, growing up I saw a lot of gruesome marriages. The mother of one friend of mine was referred to as "the meanest woman in 4 counties." For the last 15 years of my friend's father's life, his wife thought he was deaf because he never acknowledged hearing anything she said. Everyone in those 4 counties knew that he could hear just fine, and in 15 years NOT ONE PERSON TOLD HER!!! Everyone knew what a truly toxic person she was, but her husband stuck with her because he was a marriage true believer and kept hoping for a better outcome.

Not surprisingly, my friend never married.

I was moved from the "marriage skeptic" camp to the "marriage non-believer" camp by a number of experiences – including one with my doctor. More than 30 years ago, when I was in for one of my yearly physicals, he asked me if I was married. I said no, I wasn't, and he replied "Every night, and every morning, get down on your knees AND THANK GOD that is the case!!!!!"

At the time he was going through his 2nd gruesome divorce and was showing major signs of anxiety disorders – nervous ticks, picking and pulling at his hair (he looked like a cancer patient), and that death-camp look on his face.

I got a real chuckle through the years out of being able to respond to the question "Why aren't you married" completely truthfully with "Doctor's orders."

I never actually took him literally and prayed to god twice a day, but over and over again over the years I had MANY occasions to look up and say "Thank you god that I am not married to a woman like that." One of them is married to a member of my family, so I get a regular dose of "so, that is what living hell really looks like." One of the benefits she thinks she gets from marriage is the right to use her husband's family as a captive audience to listen to her complaints, mostly about him. Close to 30 years ago when they were first married she used to call me up to have someone to listen to her complain about him. And, the #1 thing she wanted to complain about was that he wanted to have sex with her. (Shades of Mary Winker!!) AND FOR ME TO AGREE WITH HER ABOUT HOW AWFUL THAT WAS!!! I had to really stomp on her repeatedly to drive home a few points -

1. That is the deal of marriage. I'm sure that every morning at 5:00am when he had to roll out of bed to go to work so he could support her and she didn't have to work, that there were some mornings when he didn't feel jumping-up-and-down enthusiastic about doing it. But, he did it because that was the deal he made and he was going to live up to it.
2. That, as a man, I had a LOT more sympathy for his position than hers,
3. That she was betraying her husband about as severely as it is possible to betray someone by not just spreading around details about their husband and wife relationship, but that she was trying to so with a member of his own family and that blood always will be thicker than water, and

4. That I was NOT going to listen to this, and that every time she tried I would tear her a new one so not to EVER bring the subject up to me again!

Nearly 30 years have gone by and I still absolutely loathe this woman. I'm sure I could have forgiven her over the years if she had figured out the error of her ways, mended them, and repented – but she never did. Thirty years later she is still the kind of woman who would use her husband's family as a captive audience – thoroughly exploiting the social graces which we have that she doesn't – to listen to her bitch about our family member – if we would allow her to, which we don't.

THANK YOU GOD THAT I AM NOT MARRIED TO A WOMAN LIKE THAT!!!

And, at this point, I have to say "Thank you, feminism." See, just about the time that I was entering the most vulnerable years for a young man to possibly get trapped into a marriage with a woman like I have just described, women started telling me that they needed me no more than a fish needed a bicycle, and that marriage was "oppression" for women. And, I listened to them and believed them. And right then I started organizing my thinking and my beliefs so that I could make women in general, and any particular woman, equally as irrelevant to me. Thus, when I would meet a woman who kept a sign on her bedroom door that said something like "I am a high performance woman! I go from zero to BITCH in 0.2 seconds. Caution, the bitch switch sticks!" or "It's all about me, DEAL WITH IT!", I could just go "OK. C'ya, bye." (real examples which completed the job of moving me to the true non-believer camp)

So, now I'm about as hard core a non-believer as it is possible to be. If I met a woman tomorrow who was better looking than Jennifer Anniston AND Haley Barrry combined, cooked better than Julia Child, and knew more sex positions than Xaviera Hollander, I would still have a voice in my brain going "Run, Forrest, RUN!!!"

So, I, personally, am not on a "marriage strike", because I have no intention of ever "going back to work" of marriage. Personally, I have entered a state of mind where I do not see marriage as necessary, or in most cases even desirable. It was a very useful institution in the past, but it has been completely demolished by women, white knights, and manginas over the past 50 years – just as the rubble of many ancient cites lie in mute testament to the structures which once stood there. I am completely and totally in a state of post-marriage consciousness and my only question is not "when?" or even "whether", but "what comes next."

And, I believe that instead of being concerned about any sort of marriage strike, and particularly not believing that all women have to do is wait men out and they will "go back to work", I think what marriage True Believers need to be concerned about is the loss of the faithful. Once a man stops believing in marriage, and in the women who are his potential mates, there is absolutely nothing going on in this culture to encourage him to start believing again.

When Strength Is Weakness

By K.K. (Ken Kupstis), author of Rock Her World

My girlfriend was on the phone, in tears. One of her very close and dear relatives was in failing health, and about to pass on. Fiercely independent, brilliant and very emotionally strong, my girlfriend was living on her own several states away from her family. It was heartrending to hear her sobbing. She felt horrified, alone and powerless. I was glad she'd chosen me to reach out to, yet I didn't know automatically what to say to console her…I don't know if anyone truly does, in that chilling situation. So I listened more than I spoke. "It's just, I miss my family, they're so far away…and I'm just so tired of having to be strong all the time…" She gasped.

Barely even conscious of saying it…as if something was speaking through me, I said "This is a time not to be strong." Something about the statement just felt right, somehow. "This is a time to open up, to feel things and roll with them…and to reach out. And I'm glad you reached out to me." I did my best at playing lay-counselor, and gradually she felt better.

As modern Americans (or perhaps just human beings), we're bombarded with messages of STRENGTH. You're Strong? We'll make you ARMY Strong. Dodge trucks are RAM TOUGH, while Fords are like a ROCK. Boxing's for wusses; Ultimate Fighting is where it's at. The new X-90 workout will have you shredded in 90 days. There are no earthquakes, it's just Chuck Norris doing push-ups. My personal favorite MANOWAR song: "Kill With Power". And we can't simply kill bugs, we must kill them dead.

Make no mistake, strength in general—both physical and mental—is a genuine virtue and an asset. As I wrote in ROCK HER WORLD, "muscularity is a form of power, and it's a form of power that virtually anyone can achieve…and muscularity will enable you to get your girlfriend out of a burning car faster than a lack of muscularity will."

Having said that, there will be times in everyone's existence when strength will be weakness.

Having to be continually, relentlessly strong in every situation eventually numbs the soul, turning us from the spiritual beings we were meant to be into mere automatons clothed in flesh. It robs us of the opportunity to truly feel painful or negative emotions, which we should otherwise use to learn and grow.

Men in particular are unfortunately shamed into being Strong, or at least projecting a damned good social façade of it. Tears are 'the enemy', and must be fought back wherever/whenever they arise…even though they're the human body's only true outlet for anguish. The German heavy metal band Accept has a song called "Man Enough To Cry", and it wasn't one of their greatest hits, although it was decently accurate (and that's from Germans, possibly the most macho nations on Earth!) I can only recall my father crying once—most deservedly, as it was at my grandmother's wake—and after my initial astonishment, I slid an arm around his shoulders, and was proud of him for doing it.

Other men tend to 'bottle up' their negative emotions: isolation, fear, rage, sorrow, jealousy, hatred, ad nauseum…all the while thinking they're being Strong, or 'real men'.

If there is a Devil, it must truly be drooling in anticipatory triumph as it watches—and urges—the pressure within these men to build, build, build, until it ultimately detonates and we read yet another headline of "Man kills wife, children, self" or "Crazed lone gunman opens fire at shopping mall; kills five, wounds eleven."

Horrifying as they are, these stories are displays of Strength…misplaced Strength, evil Strength, despicably wrong Strength, yet Strength nonetheless. "I'll show them! I'll show them ALL! You can't diss ME! DON'T YOU KNOW WHO YOU'RE MESSING WITH?!?!" Might be the prevailing thoughts in that man's wounded, alienated mind. Author Gavin DeBecker, in his most illuminating book THE GIFT OF FEAR, has a chapter entitled "Better To Be Wanted By The Police Than Not Wanted At All." I'd paraphrase that into Latin: Leto Ergo Sum.

I Kill, Therefore I Am. I'm not some powerless, henpecked accountant anymore, I'm 'somebody'. Unfortunately, that 'somebody' is an infamous killer.

That is when Strength is truly Weakness. 'Snapping' into violence is ironically the ultimate Weakness…you know there are people who have committed their lives to 'defusing' potentially dangerous, yet otherwise good members of society. Resources to help you may be rare, but they still exist. When we surrender to our baser urges, when we decide that some crazed show of force is somehow better than admitting we're in pain, we need help, we need someone to listen to us…and men in general rarely do that.

True Strength is in admitting you have some issues that need reconciling; it might not be celebrated, but it's an intellectual strength, an admission that you won't let your emotions control YOU. As Oskar Schindler was quoted in the film Schindler's List: "Real power, is when we can do something, and we don't do it. True power is in saying "I pardon you." The 'lone wolf' killers illuminated in the media right now would do well to remember that. Yes, you have the ability to kill, as does everyone. You do NOT have the RIGHT, unless someone is directly threatening you with deadly force. And the recognition you so desperately seek will pale in comparison to the agony of the electric chair…or the infamy that will be your only legacy.

This is not to say that men are the only ones caught in the trap of "You've gotta be STRONG!" Women, at least in Western civilization, have never been Stronger, at least in a political sense (they may be even stronger than they want to be!) Yet they may be 'strengthening' themselves straight out of any and all relationships. As I write this, Canada has a pending legislative bill (HR #1777) which will enable Canadian women—in any stage of a relationship—to have a man arrested, incarcerated, have a restraining order placed in effect, and have a large portion of the man's income directly transferred to them, at the mere allegation of abuse. I wrote to the legislators who dreamed up bill 1777 and asked "Do you have enough shelters to accommodate the men who will otherwise freeze to death on your streets if Bill 1777 passes? Will your economy survive once men realize they cannot safely take a woman to a restaurant, movie, or sports game? Do you have enough law enforcement personnel to respond to actual crimes, knowing they themselves can be sold down the river with a mere phone call?"

It is political suicide for any American politician to question women's rights at all. Sam "Because Of Me, No One Gets A Free Ride" Donaldson admitted he stopped asking any serious questions to Feminist leaders, after being heaped with scorn when he called a female Park Ranger a "Rangerette". Afterwards he said "I'll take on any (male) world leader at any time…but taking on half of the world is just too much." Vice President of the Bush administration Dan Quayle was similarly targeted when he said "Television shows like 'Murphy Brown' aren't the best role models for single mothers in America*".
Overnight, thousands of single mothers were buying bumper stickers that read "Thank You, Murphy Brown…From a Single Mother."

Thousands of single mothers were thanking a woman that did not exist.

You never saw an episode of Murphy Brown getting up at 3 am to change a dirty diaper. Instead, you saw Murphy Brown coolly engaging in corporate combat with the "Old Boys", looking fly all the while, without a hair out of place.

But in reality, single mothers aren't Murphy Brown. They do have to change the diapers at 3 am, and race their kids off to daycare at 7 am, in order to get to work at 8 am. They get out of work at 4 pm in order to pick up their kids at 5 pm. Then they make dinner, while fielding every question from "Why is the sky blue?" to "Why do gorillas have such big nostrils?" And they get to do it again the next day, wondering why single guys their age don't want to get with them…all the while remaining Strong.

That same Strength may be the reason that their Dad is not around to pick up the slack. Maybe he was abusive, maybe he was an alcoholic, maybe he was a type-A provider that gave you everything else but companionship while he worked 70 hours a week at the burn ward? Maybe—just maybe—he had some personality flaw that would enable you to stay together as parents, if you compromised, and/or sought counseling?

Maybe you quit your vows too early? Maybe you nagged him into the arms of another woman? Maybe you were just too Strong, when he didn't want you to be? Maybe he wanted you to be Guinevere, so he could be Lancelot? Whatever the reason—they're probably manifold—as a single mother, you'll have to be Strong. For the rest of your life. Or until you find a man who's cool with helping to raise another man's child(ren). Or until you put your pride aside and reconcile with your children's father. It could obviously seem like you're weak, doing that. Trying to raise children on your own, without a father, might show that you're Strong, but it doesn't necessarily mean that you're right.

Sometimes, Strength is a weakness.

Article Review: The Fate of Empires

Elusive Wapiti · 25 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Sir John Glubb's Fate of Empires and Search for Survival is a fascinating read for students of history and for those who wonder what the future will hold. In other words, nearly everyone who reads this post. While not a long read, we are all busy people, thus I will summarize the article below and offer an observation or two about its implications.

Key Quote: "The simplest statistics prove the steady rotation of one nation after another at regular intervals".

Executive Summary: Glubb notes an eerie pattern emerging when it comes to the durability of human empires: From the Assyrian Empire (859 – 612 BC), to the Arabic Empire (634 – 880 AD), to the British Empire (1700 – 1950), each seemed to last roughly 10 generations, or about 250 years. Glubb posits that each empire goes through six predictable phases, outburst/conquest, commerce, affluence, intellect, and finally decadence and fall. This rise and fall pattern is independent of governmental system (despotism, monarchy, republic, democracy), and the idiosyncratic qualities of the race that begat the empire (African, East Asian, European, Central Asian). This pattern is not affected by the technologies of the time (the wheel, horseback riding, seafaring, gunpowder, electricity, etc) and, while the pattern of the rise of great nations appears to be uniform, the pattern of their breakups is diverse, meaning that while all empires are birthed and live in roughly the same manner, how they die varies greatly.

Discussion: Glubb makes much use out of the word "emprire' in his tract. As 'empire' and 'imperial' are words that carry with them some significant semantical freight these days, Glubb defined his use of the term 'empire' to refer to a great power, one that we would today consider a superpower. Said empire may or may not include overseas possessions, and most did not, as most of the empires in history were land empires, not naval powers.

Glubb observes that all empires throughout history travel in roughly the same arc, go through the same stages, and last roughly the same time: ten generations, our about 250 years, give or take. This duration appears to be driven by human behavior, surprisingly uniform across cultures, and also surprisingly independent of the available technologies of the time (transport, communication, and warfare). The six sometimes overlapping life stages of empire are outburst/conquest, commerce, affluence, intellect, decadence, and fall.

Assyria	859–612 B.C.	247
Persia (Cyrus and his descendants)	538–330 B.C.	208
Greece (Alexander and his successors)	331–100 B.C.	231
Roman Republic	260–27 B.C.	233
Roman Empire	27 B.C.–A.D. 180	207
Arab Empire	A.D. 634–880	246
Mameluke Empire	1250–1517	267
Ottoman Empire	1320–1570	250
Spain	1500–1750	250
Romanov Russia	1682–1916	234
Britain	1700–1950	250

Duration of Empires. Click here to enlarge.

Phase I: Outburst and Conquest. In the first phase of great empire, small nations, thought to be insignificant by their neighbors, explode to dominate large swathes of land. This initial explosion is characterized by extraordinary displays of energy and courage; the people, accustomed to hardship, are poor, hardy, entrepreneurial, and above all, aggressive, and little will dissuade them in their desire to rule. The decaying empires or minor states they subsume are comfortable and wealthy, but are hobbled in their timid and defensive attitude. This lends the advantage to the aggressive upstart nation, the members of which can be bold and aggressive in their outlook; they have little to lose except their lives. But it is not just military advantage this up-and-coming nation this conquering nation enjoys; rather, because they are hungry, because they are not bound by staid tradition, but by an intense focus on their goal, the outbursting nation exhibits great dynamism across the entire spectrum of human endeavors: science–technology, government, cultural. Nothing breeds success like success, and the outbursting nation's self-fulfilling confidence leads them to be believe that they are meant to rule and rule forever, perhaps even chosen by their god(s) for dominion over man.

It is interesting to note that it is here, in the beginning, where the seeds for imperial destruction are sown, as each nation, upon its ascendancy, attributes its good fortune to its hereditary and natural superiority. Having become dominant, this nation thinks itself naturally better than those they conquered or those foreigners they employed as slaves or soldiers. Yet it is this hubris that becomes the catalyst for the society's own destruction, as the culture does not guard itself against the coming diversity that will wreck the stock that built the nation.

Phase II: Commercial expansion. Merchants and the whole of the people benefit from the peace and security and streamlined bureaucratic processes that such a large empire secures. The transition from outburst/conquest to commerce is marked by a shift in attitudes, in that a premimum on martial glory and honor gives way to an emphasis on boosting the bottom line. However, as the memory of where they came from is still fresh, the people and the culture is still hard.

> The first half of the 'Age of Commerce' is particularly splendid…virtues of courage, patriotism, and devotion to duty are still in evidence. Boys are required…to be manly, [and] boys' schools are intentionally rough.

The age of commerce is also marked by exploration for new forms of wealth, and the securing of wealth is the catalyst for the transition to the 'Age of Affluence'.

Phase III: Luxos. The abundance of wealth and comfort begin to injure the qualities that made the nation successful. For example, the pursuit of individual success replaces honor and adventure as the objectives of the best and the brightest of the youth. Gradually, this pursuit of gold displaces the pursuit of duty. Furthermore, education undergoes a similar shift in priorities, as educational institutions focus not on producing brave patriots but minting those who will command high salaries. This phase represents the apogee of a society; it's all downhill from here, as the people transition individually "…from service to selfishness", and the nation as a whole shifts from offensive aggression to defensiveness, interested not in acquiring more wealth but in hanging on to what it has.

This shift in national attitudes toward greater dovishness and pragmatism during this phase is reflected in the nation's foreign policy stance :

> …money being in better supply than courage, subsidies instead of weapons are employed to buy off enemies

Various psychological devices are employed to deem this shift noble, not cowardly:

> Military readiness…is denounced as primitive and immoral. Civilized peoples are too proud to fight. Conquest…is declared to be immoral. Empires are wicked. 'It is not that we are afraid to fight', we say, 'but we should consider it immoral'. Nations who proclaim themselves unwilling to fight are liable to be conquered by peoples in the stage of militarism."

Also, during this phase, prosperity and wealth also bring an influx of foreigners to the urban centers of the empire. Native Romans complained about the multiplicity of Asians and Africans in Rome, as did denizens of Baghdad, which itself endured a huge influx of Persians, Turks, Arabs, Armenians, Egyptians, Africans, and Greeks. Today, London is known in some circles as "Londonistan", New York long ago ceased to be peopled chiefly by Angles, and Washington DC itself sports features an international population (one need only hail a cab in that area to convince themselves of this). The result of this migration is that the stock that created the empire is relegated to the hinterlands, the frontiers, and the rural areas, while the foreigners come to dominate the cities and eventually the politics of the entire realm. Thus we see that there is really, truly, nothing new under the sun, as this “diversity” repeats itself over and over again in history, and the solidarity and comradeship that comes with ethnic and cultural homogeneity–the qualities that built the empire in the first place–first erodes, then disappears entirely. This diverse polyglot mass is peopled by (im)migrants that often fail to assimilate fully, leading to issues of in-group/out-group loyalty and an overall unwillingness to sacrifice for the host country when the wave of prosperity gives way to hard slogging. Grubb notes:

> [W]hen decline sets in, it is extraordinary how the memory of ancient wars, perhaps centuries before, is suddenly revived, and local or provincial movements appear demanding secession or independence

This lack of cultural coherence combines with the aforementioned shift in values from fighting to rationalization, and eventually a feeling of moral superiority, to set the stage for the infighting that is characteristic of the next stage, the ‘Age of Intellect’.

Phase IV: Intellectualism. The Beginning of the End. The people, no longer martially minded and, their lives not often visited by privation, become unconcerned with the acquisition of wealth and being to fancy themselves intellectuals. This period is marked by the proliferation of institutions of learning and a rapid expansion in the knowledge base. Intellectualism leads to discussion, debate, and argument, and as such the culture loses its homogeneity. Internal political rifts between camps ossify and become unbridgeable. With many captains vying for control of the helm, the ship of state begins to drift:

> Thus public affairs drift from bad to worse, amid an unceasing cacaphony of argument…amid a babel of talk, the ship drifts on to the rocks. Internal differences are not reconciled…internal rivalries become more acute, and the nation becomes weaker

It is important to note here that the empire is still strong at this time and enjoys a sort of Golden Age. But the exterior sparkle and shimmer obscures a rot on the inside, as the empire hollows itself from within. In essence, the empire is living on borrowed time–no longer producing, conquering, expanding, it instead feeds off the stored fat of its own past greatness. Still thinking themselves exceptional, the nation relaxes and enjoys the fruits of their labors; this latent voluptuousness results in more and more time spent in leisure.

Furthermore, an empire in this stage, while no longer acquiring territory, still fancies itself smarter than its neighbors and continues to sponsor cultural expansion of its empire. But the motivation for this expansion is not military–which is ‘evil’–but is for the welfare of others, which is deemed ‘good’, and thus excused, the empire continues to extend its influence. This shift in motivation is key…as the head (reason) comes to dominate the heart (passion), the great empire wants to ‘help’ those less ‘fortunate’ to share in its prosperity. Glubb, however, takes a dim view of this shift:

> Perhaps the most dangerous byproduct of the Age of Intellect is the unconscious growth of the idea that the human brain can solve the problems of the world

This idea leads the empire to over-extend itself, as there is literally no limit to problems to be solved in an effort to enhance the welfare of foreigners. Thus exhausted, the rusted, neglected socio-cultural-economic scaffolding supporting the edifice of the State begins to break down. The center fails to hold.

Phase V: Decadence.

> [D]ecadence is a moral and a spiritual disease, not a physical one, resulting from too long a period of wealth and power. The citizens of such a nation will no longer make an effort to save themselves, because they are not convinced that anything in life is worth saving

An empire in decline is marked by several characteristics, first among them a strong prevailing (and self-fulfilling) sense of pessimism among the people, frequently accompanied by frivolity, where the people exchange their hopes and future orientations for a focus on the now…a "let us eat drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die" sort of attitude. Grubb also notes that the empire's heroes change in declining civilizations according to this focus on frivolity…the actor, the singer, and the athlete–all entertainers–replace the general or the statesman or literary genius as role models for the young.

Another characteristic of the decline is degeneracy and a generalized laxity of discipline during this time. An increasing materialism, the retreat of morality, the advent of feminism, and the appearance and influence of women in public life are all hallmarks of a civilization in decline. An indifference to religion also appears among the culture and, as Glubb attributes to (expansively defined) religion the motivating force for the desire to expand, conquer, subjugate, or extinguish, the spirit of service, of heroic self-sacrifice for the cause also disappears.

A third characteristic is one for which the foundation was laid in the Age of Intellectualism…the Age of Decline is associated with philanthropy, generosity, and sympathy for other races and nations. The culture assumes an attitude of 'noblesse oblige' toward those less fortunate; the notion that it will be always be rich impels the imperial state to spend lavishly, to confer privileges and rights and benefits on all comers. Citizenship rights, once a sign of status, a valued asset, are debased as the State gives them away…in some cases sells them for revenue…again to confer the benefits of prosperity to all. State assistance to the poor is equally generous. At least until the economy collapses, that is.

What are the causes of decadence? Glubb lists these four: (1) too long a period of wealth and power, (2) selfishness, (3) love of money, and (4) the loss of a sense of duty.

Glubb does not discuss Phase VI, the end or fall of empires, because such ends vary widely and his study of them yielded no regular pattern meriting discussion.

Analysis:

It is interesting to consider that Glubb wrote these words nearly 35 years ago; he could be describing the trajectory of the present-day United States to a tee. The decadence, the indifference to religion, the focus on materialism, the swollen welfare state, living (literally) on borrowed time and money, all are there. Applying the 250-year rule of thumb to the USA, it seems that the approximate end of our imperial life span is somewhere around 2025. What fate awaits the USA come that time, I don't claim to know, nor can I hazard a guess. It could die from violent overthrow, fractured by internal political division from within–as in the case of Rome I transitioning to Rome II. It could break up more or less peacefully into more politically manageable components, along religious-cultural-ethnic lines, as was the case with the British empire, or it could be subjugated by a culturally more aggressive invader(s), as was the pattern followed by the majority of empires in the past.

Some would be tempted to split hairs and claim that the USA will not follow historical precedent, noting that America's outburst period was spent not consuming the remnants of a pre-existing empire, but on acquiring vast swathes of largely uninhabited land across a single continent. "America is exceptional", they may claim, "she's different" they may object. Glubb pre-emptively pours water on that notion, noting:

> The United States arose suddenly as a new nation, and its period of pioneering was spent in the conquest of a vast continent, not an ancient empire. Yet the subsequent life history of the United States has followed the standard pattern…the periods of the pioneers, of commerce, of affluence, of intellectualism, and of decadence

According to Glubb, the USA is following the same pattern as before–he even places the Wilson administration as our national apogee, when our country's trajectory peaked in the Age of Commerce and started downward into the Age of Intellectualism–and there is no reason to believe that America will be the exception to the pattern. In fact, there is plenty of evidence to the contrary…consider the present-day political strife, the swollen welfare state, the far-flung military adventures conducted not for territorial acquisition but for the 'good of the invaded' and/or for American cultural expansion (installing British-style parliamentary democracy and American-style feminism at the point of a gun). Consider also the post-Christian, secular humanist polity, the focus on material acquisition, the normalization of sexual immorality, and the prominence of women in public affairs, and the reducing prominence of men in domestic affairs. All point one way: that America is marching inexorably toward the same end as those who have gone before.

I was also struck by the similarities between the America of the late twentieth century and early twenty-first century and the Arab decline in the last half of the ninth century, as described by Glubb. The Arab historians at that time, just as do many hand-wringing curmudgeons in the conservative commentariat do today, deplored the indifference to religion, the increasing focus on material acquisition, the spread of sexual immorality, and the extraordinary influence of popular entertainers, singing lewd and suggestive songs, amongst the youth. Even more interesting to me as an MRA was Glubb's finding that feminism is a key and telling marker of a civilization in decline, for both the Roman Empire and the Arab Empire in their latter stages featured deep female penetration into spheres and occupations previously closed to them. Perhaps the appearance of women in the public spaces is an objective symptom of the nation's growing political defensiveness, a sign that the nation valued comfort and security over uncomfortable risk-taking. Whatever the reason, the appearance of women in politics counter-intuitively did not result in an increase in societal security, for "soon after [these periods]", Glubb notes, "government and public order collapsed…the resulting increase in confusion and violence ma[kes] it unsafe for women to move unescorted in the streets". Given these historical examples, it is not difficult at all to imagine the coming disarray that will afflict the feminism-afflicted West when the levees give way and it is every man and woman for him-/her-selves.

Seeing feminism called out in this way may warm the hearts of some. But while I suspect Glubb is correct in identifying feminism as a sign of a great civilization in decline, he does not offer perspective on how long it lasts until feminism kills its host culture. Clearly, in some cases, the feminist-infected feminized empire is snuffed out by a more aggressive masculine culture. In other cases, the defensive, feminized, and feminist culture merely withers away and is slowly subsumed by a resurgent, more masculine one. However it goes, Glubb is clear that an irreligious culture of intellectualism and dissipation is replaced by a renewed sense of mission, purpose and zeal:

> [A]t the height of vice and frivolity the seeds of religious revival are quietly sown. After, perhaps, several generations (or even centuries) of suffering, the impoverished nation has been purged of its selfishness and its love of money, religion gains its sway and a new era sets in

The cliche says that the kanji character for crisis is a mash-up of the characters for opportunity and danger. In the dangerous and tumultuous times we have ahead, we men may have the opportunity to make the world anew in our image as the American empire craters and potentially breaks apart…a weak and alienated government located in the swamps of Virginia cannot hope to maintain control over the culturally heterogenous states further west or south, particularly those with options and resources, and especially those with coastlines and ports. One thing is clear to me, as I consider Glubb's words: that we men will suffer longer if we sit on the sidelines and do nothing in an attempt to "wait out" the feminist train wreck, with an eye toward picking up the pieces afterward, for we could be waiting a very long time. Better, I think, to attempt to shape our future in a manner agreeable to us, our brothers, and our progeny.

Dan Abrams is Penning a Sexist Book Proclaiming Male Inferiority

By Menareangrynow

You heard that right. The chief legal analyst for NBC News and former General Manager of MSNBC is writing a book degrading, insulting, and stereotyping an entire group of people. Despite the fact that such a major figure is behind this slap to the face of equality, the book is evoking almost no outcry what so ever. The name of the book is "Man Down: Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt That Women Are Better Cops, Drivers, Gamblers, Spies, World Leaders, Beer Tasters, Hedge Fund Managers, and Just About Everything Else". The response to this utter bigotry is truly less than encouraging. Instead of being fired like Don Imus, for such a stunt, according to Publisher's Weekly, the publishing deal for his book actually went through, when Jennifer Levesque of the Abrams Image publishing company bought the world English rights to his book; and in addition, his book is already on pre-order on some sites, a half year in advance of its May, 2011, releasal date. To rub salt in the wound, Mother's Day was chosen as the book's releasal date, implying that this bigoted filth should be given as a present to help boost the egos of its target audience- die Ubermädchen. As a fellow blogger and vlogger on men's issues, ArgusEyes of the website True Equality, has already quipped, "Mother's day eh? Isn't that nice. Maybe I can pick up a copy for my mum to help illustrate to her, how her son is a worthless piece of shit."

On September 13, 2010, the media tycoon's own website announced an interview he had with Mediaite, which he is the publisher of, of course. The interview can be read here. It's disturbing to a high degree to me. When asked why he chose to write a book about this particular topic, instead of a topic he is a professional in, such as law, he replied by saying that "It started when I read an article on various ways that women are better than men. I found it interesting and honestly didn't believe some of the examples they cited, so out of curiosity I researched a little to determine how much of it was backed up by actual evidence. While some of the ones from the article were speculative, as I did a little digging, I was surprised at how many serious studies and research reached the same conclusion — that women, as a group, are more thoughtful, efficient, tougher and less likely to make mistakes."

The only thing that lends a shred of decency to this whole affair, is that he says that his book is "not an effort to beat up on us guys but it may serve as a wake up call for some." He is of course referring to the fact that men and boys are doing poorly academically and socially, right now. How he manages to conclude that we are inferior from that; however, is beyond me. If he thinks that berating someone when they are down, is ethical, I can only imagine him going to homeless shelters on the weekends to laugh at those less fortunate, whom, indecently, are 85% male, according to the The United States Conference of Mayors. If he thinks that his insults will help anyone, he is wrong. He is only further hurting male self esteem, in a culture that demeans us so much already. Bigots like Mr. Abrams need to be shown for vial bastards that they are. Imagine a similar book, called something like "Blacks, Forget It: Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt That Whites Are Better Rappers, Drivers, Employees, Athletes, World Leaders, Cooks, Hedge Fund Managers, and Just About Everything Else". Doubtless, such a book would not be received as well as this one has, and men and boys deserve the same respect that we give to other groups in this country. I will reiterate. Don Imus got fired for much less than what Abrams has just done. Sack the bastard, I say.

Toxicology Report: Roslyn “Rape Drug” Victims Just Plain Drunk

W.F. Price · 25 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

At a news conference this morning, Central Washington University announced that it was not date rape drugs that felled a half-score young people at a party in Roslyn, Washington, but rather a fruity drink known as “Four Loko,” which is manufactured by Phusion Projects Inc., a Chicago company, and contains large doses of both ethanol and caffeine.

Of course, here at The Spearhead we already knew that.

Perhaps now that the real story is out, national news and talk shows will pick it up and let us know that their previous reports of mass rape drugging were sensationalist falsehoods cooked up by a few drunk, hysterical young women. Or, maybe not…

It seems that caffeine and alcohol are not always a good combination, particularly where young women are concerned, because an element of stimulation is added to the lack of judgment brought about by drunkenness.

Spearhead Birthday Drive

Recently, The Spearhead passed its first major milestone — its first birthday. When the site started I had no idea how long it would last or how much it would grow. It could have fizzled out, or it could be just another small site without many readers. Fortunately, it's done quite well and started to make an impact. The last month saw more visitors and higher traffic than ever before, and the site has caught up to a virtual tie with one of the more prominent feminist sites.

Although I'm proud of what's been accomplished so far, the truth is that the site never would have survived that crucial first year without the support of a number of people around the world, including some generous donors whose large contributions have made it possible for me to put a great deal of work into it. There are a few times when these donations made the difference between keeping the site steaming along or having no choice but to scale my activities back considerably, which, given its young and fragile state, probably would have consigned it to obscurity. Contributions have provided the funds for an upgrade to a private server, allowed me to purchase ISBNs for pending publications, paid for software and, most importantly, freed up valuable time for managing the site, editing contributions, writing and dealing with technical issues.

For a visual example of what's been going on in the online struggle of ideas, I'd like to present a little graph from Alexa, which measures web traffic to high traffic sites around the world. In the following, you can see a comparison between The Spearhead and Feministing:

As you can see, the feminist site peaked shortly after The Spearhead went online, but some time this year went into a steep decline, while The Spearhead has been steadily gaining ground, finally catching up, and, over the last month, actually surpassing Feministing in terms of reach and traffic.

When we first started The Spearhead feminist sites immediately went on the attack, ridiculing the site and going after Pro-Male Anti-Feminist Tech's post on the feminization of science fiction, which resulted in that early traffic spike you can see back in October 2009. Perhaps they thought we'd tuck our tails and run under the barrage of hatred and ridicule, but it had the opposite effect: we were invigorated and rose to the occasion.

Now, for some reason, feminist sites don't mention The Spearhead at all. Surely they are well aware of its existence, but they walk on tip-toes around it.

Over the last few weeks we had a major increase in traffic, providing us with the highest monthly totals yet. With over 300,000 page views and 50,000 unique visitors, we reached more people than ever. I have received letters from around the world expressing great appreciation for the site, which provides men with a perspective and information that is very difficult to find elsewhere. It's been great to see that men are finding The Spearhead such a valuable resource.

Unfortunately, it seems some others have noticed our success and have not been altogether pleased by it — a few days ago Google finally pulled the plug on Adsense for The Spearhead, depriving us of a relatively small, but important source of income. It isn't entirely unexpected; Google has been known to do this to sites with political content that runs counter to its executives' politics, which are strongly connected to the Democratic Party. I suspect criticism of Patty Murray may have been the last straw, especially considering that the election is coming up and her seat is so important to the Obama administration.

However, the setback is relatively minor, and I was not all that happy about giving Google ads so much valuable real estate on the site anyway. But it does mean that I will be a couple hundred dollars shorter in following months, and will need to make up the revenue somehow. On the bright side, it will spur me to finally pursue other avenues that will, in all likelihood, be more profitable.

In the meanwhile, contributions are needed to keep the momentum going. The Spearhead is finally coming into its own, and is gaining a reputation as a place where men can make some sense of the insanity that surrounds contemporary sexual politics.

So, with your help we can continue to grow and get the message out there, and I can even see the day when the issues we are bringing to prominence on The Spearhead can no longer be ignored.

I'd like to thank all of our writers and all supporters of all kinds. Without your help and interest we couldn't have accomplished so much. Everyone who has made a contribution has made a difference, and it is deeply appreciated.

Domestic Violence: On Real Victims

From A Voice for Men

For those of you who have read my short bio, you know that I became involved in men's activism because of misandry in the mental health field, where I worked as an addictions counselor for 20 years. The recent debate on this site between myself and a generic feminist took me back a few years to some very familiar arguments that were commonplace with my peers when I was counseling.

That feminist reminded me of the ideologues I used to work with. What he does not know, and doesn't want to know about the subject could fill Lake Superior. And despite his allegations of indifference, even sadistic enjoyment on my part about violence against women, his knowledge about me is equally lacking.

In the world of drug addicts and alcoholics, violence in the home is as common as lost jobs, DUI's and a litany of other life problems. And my experience in dealing with it leaves an impression in my mind vastly different than you see broadcast in public service announcements, and what you hear from gender activists that make their bread and butter from the problem.

Somewhere in all of us, I think, by virtue of systematic brainwashing, is the idea that domestic violence is epitomized by a frail and battered woman, quietly weeping and huddled in a dark corner. We have been trained, through the hypnotic repetition of misinformation, to conjure the image of male monster driven by the insatiable need for control, pummeling his wife or girlfriend because her independence threatens him.

Do such monsters exist? Certainly. I have spoken with many of them. Some are guilt ridden over their actions, some are sociopathic and unrepentant, rationalizing that their misdeeds are justified. All of them are wrong.

But of course to be fair, and more importantly truthful, my memory has no shortage of women who also fill the bill. I have dealt with many who slapped, punched, kicked and clawed their partners out of anger and frustration, and just like a few of the men, out of the sick desire for dominance. The only real difference between the two is that I found significantly less remorse in the women. I have always attributed that to the fact that their violence was never taken as seriously as the men's, and never as stigmatized by social taboo. It didn't make any of them less wrong.

But here's the rub. The use of violence as a premeditated, ongoing tool to maintain primacy in a relationship was always an infinitesimally small percentage of what I saw in the people I worked with. It was the extreme exception that somehow (read feminism) achieved inculcation into public consciousness as the norm, with a male in the role of perpetrator.

From working with countless families affected by the problem, I can tell you what domestic violence really is. It's a couple, one or both of them drunk, escalating a fight till it gets physical. It's two desperate, our of control people, clawing at each other out of fear and rage. It's impulse, reckless dysfunction that as many times as not has the two people in the bedroom enjoying make up sex not long after it is over, and then building the tension between them till it happens again.

It is people who cannot or will not manage conflict in a way that is peaceful, and it does not belong to one sex over the other any more than it belongs to one hair color over the other.

In fact, if you want to understand who is at most risk for violence in the home, take an equally hard look at poverty and drugs, especially alcohol. Looking at anything else first, especially the sex of perpetrators and victims, is fruitless. Unless, of course, there happens to be a buck in it for you or you have a political ax to grind.

In fact, if you want to know the real truth, we have screwed up the whole concept of perpetrators and victims when it comes to domestic violence. What I witnessed over two decades of dealing with the realities on the ground gave me a completely different view than you find in coffee house conversations.

When it comes to domestic violence, the real perpetrators are adults and the real victims are children.

And until we start to understand this, and act on it in good faith, we will achieve nothing more than further pitting men and women against each other, and leaving more children devastated in the wake of their battles.

Children who witness violence between their parents are traumatized by it. And I mean that in the literal sense. I have spoken with countless couples that recounted their battles with each other, sometimes sadly, but often as dispassionately as two people talking about playing checkers. They even laughed, together, at the absurdity of their actions. And let's face it, rather than being there to arrange escape and protection plans, they were there trying to figure out how to stay together and solve problems.

Talking to their children was vastly different. That is where I saw the most, and the most genuine, tears. Usually, all it took was a question.

"What is it like for you when Mom and Dad fight?"

Many of them, when hearing this simple question, which neither parent had likely ever asked, were overcome in a swell of raw, unyielding pain. They often struggled to steady their quivering lips, and fight back tears as they talked. Others just walled off, keeping their eyes down, shrugging their shoulders and forbidding me to enter the world of their pain.

Many of them, though, did tell me their stories. I got to hear how they covered their heads with pillows at night, trying to block out the noise. Others learned to escape in their own minds, retreating into fantasy. Still others tried to intervene, to become the only adult in the house, and to protect one parent from the other. And yes, they were often trying to protect their fathers.

As I did my job and dug into their lives, I found the real legacy of their parent's actions. It came in the form of school failure, fighting, drug use, thoughts of suicide, social withdrawal, hopelessness, despair and anger.

Anger.

And it was an anger they were destined to carry with them; baggage to be hefted and lugged into their adult lives, tainting their image of themselves and others; wrecking their chances to trust the likes of love or put stock in the notion of family. A gift from Mom and Dad in the form of scars.

I didn't blame them for being angry. When I heard their stories I was angry, too. Sometimes I wanted to grab both parents and smack them myself. But mostly I just sat and watched as they pointed at each other and cast blame.

You know, we put a lot of effort into finding a solution to domestic violence. And we put a great deal of energy into supposedly helping the victims of this social malady. As well we should.

It is the contention of many MRA's, and we are right to think so, that we need to de-gender the problem. We point to the fact that women are, as often as men, the initiators of violence. We lament the fact that social services all but deny the existence of male victims. Again, rightfully so.

But if we are ever to understand and redress the difficulties we face over this problem, I contend that we need to take a more somber and sober look at who is really paying the price for all of it.

And we need to understand that parents with children who have repeated violence in the home are abusing them, literally wrecking their futures, regardless of anything as trivial as who hit who first, or who got the biggest bruise.

What we have now is a system that only takes the petty squabble between two immature people and elevates it to the national level. We have turned our collective understanding of domestic violence into a macrocosm of a childish, vindictive, marital spat, ever seeking someone to blame for being the real problem.

And it underscores the importance of organizations like S.A.V.E. and DAHMW, run by people who are more interested in solving the problem than in simply pointing fingers.

I hope, and I certainly encourage other MRA's, that as we continue quest of cutting though all the garbage science and concocted factoids about domestic violence, that we make it a point to remind people that we are not engaged in a pissing match with women, or even necessarily with feminists. We are really trying to educate a woefully ignorant public about who pays the price for all these lies. I know that wrongly accused men do pay, and it is a horrible injustice, but the real sacrificial lambs are our sons and daughters. They never asked for any of this.

And as I read back through the debate, I found myself at fault for failing to more adequately bring that to the table. If there was ever any doubt about whether or not the debate was worth it in my mind, at least that much has been resolved.

I won't make the same mistake again.

Maureen Dowd Stumps for Chivalry

W.F. Price · 27 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Never much of a lady herself, Maureen Dowd nevertheless expects men to stand up for women, even when they've done something awful, such as killing a little boy's pets. In her latest piece, she bemoans the increasingly callous attitude toward women, utterly failing to connect this attitude to contemporary women's – including her own – behavior.

Digging deep to find a knight in shining armor, Maureen comes up with Keith Richards, Stones guitarist and former junkie who, as it turns out, is kind of a softy who has been battered and psychologically tormented by women at various points in his life, starting with his mother, who systematically killed his pets. When the little Keith Richards protested, his mother said: "don't be soft."

After the Rolling Stones became wildly successful, Richards was mobbed by women who got so rough with him he was in mortal fear on some occasions, including one time a couple women choked him with his own necklace:

> I was never more in fear for my life than I was from teenage girls. The ones that choked me, tore me to shreds, if you got caught in a frenzied crowd of them — it's hard to express how frightening they could be.
> The problem is if they get their hands on you, they don't know what to do with you. They nearly strangled me with a necklace, one grabbed one side of it, the other grabbed the other, and they're going, 'Keith, Keith,' and meanwhile they're choking me.

Despite this rough treatment, Keith Richards remained considerate and even lent a sympathetic ear to the women who were upset by his bandmates' tendency to sleep around and refuse to commit.

Even Richards' supposedly "sexist" song – Under My Thumb – was written more in response to betrayal on the part of women in his life:

> The songs … came from a lot of frustration from our point of view. You go on the road for a month, you come back, and she's with somebody else.

It seems Keith Richards, despite the heroin and rock star lifestyle, had to deal with the same thing many ordinary men do, and despite the horrible treatment he was subjected to at the hands of women from time to time, he remained fairly partial to them.

Richards, therefore, is not so much "chivalrous" in that regard as he is par for the course — most men, despite pretty lousy behavior on the part of women, put up with it and continue to behave as "good boys" around women. It's what we've been trained to do, after all.

On the other hand, what Maureen Dowd displays is this despicable, but sadly common, attitude that a good man is one who puts up with abuse from women and still continues to treat them with respect and deference. In some ways, it's even worse than a master/slave relationship, because supposedly love is involved.

If one reads between the lines, chivalry, as interpreted by modern Western women, is nothing more than a woman's privilege to do whatever she wants and behave in any manner she chooses while enjoying the unconditional protection, support and respect of men.

Stacy Bannerman's Domestic Violence Hoax

By Carey Roberts

Stacy Bannerman, well-known advocate for military families, recently published an article titled, "Husbands Who Bring the War Home." Author of When the War Came Home, Bannerman has been credited for helping to secure passage of the Military Family Leave Act in 2009.

As weary American troops return from their Iraqi deployment, the Bannerman column is important and timely. And the harrowing account of Kristi, victim of an attempted strangulation by a husband who had just returned from a 10-month deployment, was riveting.

But was it true?

As a columnist who specializes in the field of domestic violence and has spoken with countless victims of abuse, I found myself feeling increasingly unsettled as I worked my way through her engaging yet enigmatic essay.

The question of the veracity of her claims is paramount because the partner abuse field is strewn with battlefield debris of half-truths, misrepresentations, and utter fabrications. University of New Hampshire researcher Murray Straus has written of domestic violence researchers who "have let their ideological commitments overrule their scientific commitments." And U. Penn School of Social Work dean Richard Gelles has coined the whimsical phrase about the ubiquitous partner abuse "factoids from nowhere."

So I sent Ms. Bannerman an email requesting documentation of her various statements and claims.

She cheerfully answered a couple of my questions. But when pressed for citations of the research studies, Bannerman firmly demurred: "I am sorry that my travel schedule doesn't allow me to provide any further assistance."

Knowing that her article had garnered extensive media attention and could well shape future legislation, that brush-off hardly seemed to fit the ticket. So I did some digging. And to my dismay, I learned that "Husbands Who Bring the War Home" likely contains more fiction than fact.

Let's put the issue into perspective. Partner abuse is a problem in our society. But research paints a very different picture than the Dagwood and Blondie comic strip stereotypes.

The largest study on partner violence in military families was conducted by Richard Heyman of the State University of New York – Stony Brook. His survey of over 33,000 active-duty Army personnel found 4.4% of female soldiers had committed severe domestic violence in the past year, compared to only 2.5% of the men. Other studies with military personnel reach a similar conclusion: Women are as likely, if not more likely, than men to engage in partner aggression.

So let's dissect the eight key claims in Bannerman's 1,400-word article. I'll first quote her statement, then tell you what my investigation turned up.

1. "The journal Disabled American Veterans stated that veteran interpersonal violence often involves 'only one or two extremely violent and frightening abusive episodes that quickly precipitate treatment seeking.'"

I visited the website of the Disabled American Veterans Magazine. Entering the terms "interpersonal violence," "partner violence," and "domestic violence" into the magazine's search engine — I searched every issue of the magazine from 1960 on. The Bannerman statement could not be verified. (When I later informed Ms. Bannerman of this fruitless search, she did not offer any comment.)

Conclusion: The statement appears to reflect the fanciful musings of an imaginative commentator.

2. The Veterans Administration "found that the majority of veterans with combat stress commit at least one act of spousal abuse in their first year post-deployment."

Even after I offered to extend my deadline to accommodate Ms. Bannerman's travel plans, she still did not provide the source of this claim. So I searched high and low – no luck. Finally I contacted the Veterans Administration. Tina Crenshaw, PhD of the National Center for PTSD replied, "I checked with a couple of researchers in this topic area – they were not aware of research supporting that statement."

Conclusion: Add this gem to your Factoids from Nowhere collection.

3. "[S]ince 2003, there has been a 75 percent increase in reports of domestic violence in and around Ft. Hood."

Bannerman emailed me, "As for the Ft. Hood figures, they were drawn from an article in USA Today." But the USA Today article that is linked to her article says nothing about domestic violence, much less reports on an alleged "75 percent increase" in partner abuse.

Conclusion: Factoid from Nowhere No. 2.

4. "He [Kristi's husband] called a domestic violence hotline, and the person he talked to discouraged him from going to the men's group because he doesn't fit the abuser profile."

This incident was so out-of-order that I called Susan Risdon, spokeswoman for the National Domestic Violence Hotline, and read her Bannerman's statement. Without missing a beat, Risdon skewered the claim: "Our advocates would never give that response to a caller."

Conclusion: Let's put this improbable tale out of its misery – can we all agree this is Factoid from Nowhere No. 3?

5. "Staff at the shelter told her that…her husband made too much money for her to stay there, anyway."

This statement is not likely to be true because none of the three federal programs that fund domestic violence shelters — the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act, the Violence Against Women Act, and the Victims of Crime Act — requires means testing for shelter residents. And virtually every abuse shelter in the country receives federal monies.

Conclusion: Hardly a spit-and-polish claim.

6. The Blue Star Families "hasn't released the findings [on its 2010 military family survey], but my hunch is that they'll show near-epidemic numbers of veteran violence in the home."

I queried Ms. Bannerman, "What was the basis for your 'hunch'?" You guessed it, No response.

Conclusion: Is the idea to engage in responsible journalism, or scare the living daylights out of military wives?

7. I posed this question to Bannerman: "It is well-known that women are as likely to be partner abusers as men. Knowing that many women have served in combat zones, why did your article omit mention of their needs for counseling and treatment?"

Ms. Bannerman did not judge this question worthy of an answer.

Conclusion: According to the VA, "Women may take longer to recover from PTSD and are four times more likely than men to have long-lasting PTSD. Women with PTSD also are more likely to feel depressed and anxious." So why did Bannerman opt to stiff-arm the needs of post-deployment women with PTSD, who are also at increased risk of partner abuse?

8. This was my last question: "The beginning of your article recounts three late night phone calls from 'Kristi' to you. Since the main point of your article is that the problem of domestic violence should be taken seriously, why did you not contact the police as soon as you received the calls?"

Bannerman replied, "I did not contact the police, since she [Kristi] specifically asked me not to."

Conclusion: This must qualify as the most disingenuous part of the entire narrative. The caller was not indulging in a frat-house prank, and Ms. Bannerman surely understands the mortal risks of partner violence. But when confronted with a here-and-now, life-and-death situation, Bannerman nods back to sleep, miffed by the late-night distraction.

I contacted Dr. Donald Dutton, an internationally recognized expert on intimate partner aggression at the University of British Columbia. Dr. Dutton replied, “The Daily Beast article feeds into the stereotype of domestic violence as perpetrated by brutal men against hapless women. But the U.S. Army data indicates that partner abuse is perpetrated more by women. Apparently Stacy Bannerman believes that we shouldn’t allow a stereotype to get confused by the facts.”

On January 28, 1993 a group of women issued a warning that the upcoming Super Bowl would be the “biggest day of the year for violence against women.” Three days later the Washington Post ran a front-page story revealing there was no evidence to support such a claim. The frolic later came to be known as the Super Bowl Hoax.

Nearly 18 years later, a similar battle plan is being followed: Assemble lurid anecdotes and apocryphal statistics, issue dire warnings, and stampede loyal military wives into demanding draconian domestic violence measures.

But in the final analysis, it’s the true victims of true domestic violence who have most to lose from the data-fragging, fear-fostering, and political-posturing that envelop much of the current domestic violence debate.

Because after all these years, it’s about time that we take desperation calls from persons like Kristi seriously.

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 28 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

What is marriage 2.0? It has been described in many different ways but this picture from Roissy captures an important aspect of it.

whocares about my FIANCE'S face?! LOOK AT MY RING! lol From the album:

Who is the guy in the picture? We have no way of knowing. That's because men do not matter in marriage 2.0. At the wedding, the beginning of the marriage, the man is just a guy in a tux. Everything else in the wedding is about the woman. He could almost be replaced by a mannequin if it weren't for the final act of marriage under marriage 2.0 — divorce. At that point the man is nothing more than a wallet to be pillaged by the woman (and lawyers). Again it doesn't matter who the man is. Any man will do. In between the wedding and the divorce the man will similarly have no identity either because marriage 2.0 elevates the woman and dehumanizes the man. In marriage 2.0 the man might as well be a piece of furniture, and if he starts causing problems like trying to assert himself, he may get thrown away (aka divorced).

Knowing this what will marriage 3.0 look like? The man will be there less and less until he isn't anymore. The "marriage strike" is misnamed because more and more men have decided and will decide to completely stop looking for a wife knowing they won't find one. How will marriage continue after that? The only possible way will be if women start marrying themselves, such as this woman from Taiwan. Chen Wei-yih, the woman who is marrying herself, could be the first woman to engage in marriage 3.0.

The wedding industry will heavily promote marriage 3.0 to deal with falling revenues due to men's loss of interest in marriage. Commercials will say, "Why wait for a man for your special day. Marry yourself like an independent woman and have your special day on your schedule." Such an advertising campaign would save almost all of the wedding industry, except for the tux rental portion, because everything in a wedding is about the bride. To save the tux rental industry the marriage 3.0 advertising campaign will include promotion of the use of mannequins wearing tuxes to replace the men who are no longer getting married.

Where will the men be in all of this? Since divorcing themselves isn't going to do anything for the "married" women, expect women to petition the state for increased taxes in some form to be transferred to them. Whether this will happen or not or how long this will be in effect will depend on several factors, not the least of which is how long the misandry bubble will last. Otherwise, men will completely ignore these “marriages” and get on with their lives as they see fit.

W.F. Price · 28 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Because recent events have driven home the point that it isn't always a good idea to rely on "free" services offered by large companies (who shall remain nameless here), I just installed Mint tracking software (written by Shaun Inman) that provides a real-time view of stats and traffic.

Although there were a couple annoyances during installation, I've got it up and running and it's a nice little program. I can see what articles people have just found, as well as the keywords, links, and twitter referrals that led them here.

From what I've seen so far, I'm pretty happy with the software, and if no bugs come up I'll definitely give it my approval and recommend Mint to any other bloggers out there who are not altogether pleased with what the free services provided by that other company have to offer. Also, at $30, it's a pretty fair deal for the utility it provides.

Why We Credential

J. DeVoy · 28 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

I recently convinced a family member not to return to school for a Master of Arts degree, arguing that the diploma – and the tens of thousands of dollars in debt it entailed – would not make my relative more marketable. Having done my good deed for the month, I was puzzled how this person came to believe that an M.A. would lead to a j-o-b.

There are many causes underlying this belief. First, the nation's largest employer, the Federal Government, awards additional points to advanced degrees under its employee candidate scoring rubric. Second, there is the misconception promulgated by self-interested educators that more education in a particular field is desirable at the entry level, despite the obvious disconnect between education and practice in most fields. (Engineers seem to have a marked advantage in this area.) Finally, as every degree's value is debased by dubious online and for-profit schools, the ease of earning a Master's creates a race to the bottom where everyone wants one in order to appear competitive in the job market. After all, it only costs the student time, since they're not paying for it now, or possibly ever, as already-underreported default rates for federally subsidized student loans continue to rise. Frontline thoroughly addressed this issue recently.

None of this, however, truly examines why the Master's degree is – or is perceived to be – so valued. If the M.A. didn't confer a benefit onto its recipients, nobody would want it. This is true of all educational degrees, even if the benefit of their completion is merely the social currency of attending the "right" school. Nevertheless, economic analysis has shown some degrees, such as the MBA, to be worthless. The value of any degree is clustered in favor of the elite, as seen by the earnings and job offers conferred upon Ivy League and equivalent undergraduate schools, the top 14 (t14) law schools, and the top seven (M7) business schools. Everyone else pays as much as an elite degree costs, as there is relatively little price discrimination among schools, without receiving commensurate benefits.

Degrees of any kind serve as proxies for native intelligence, but especially advanced degrees, as college has metastasized into an extended high school experience. The correlation between a degree and intelligence has been overestimated in recent decades, though, because employers have been stripped of other tools on which to evaluate potential employees.

The Federal Government Unwittingly Adds a Step.

In Griggs v. Duke Power Company, the Supreme Court ruled that Duke Power's requirement of a high school diploma or passing of a standardized general intelligence test for employment or transfer of jobs was unlawful under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. 401 U.S. 424 (1971). The facts of Griggs specifically dealt with the racial impact Duke Power's employee testing policy had on black employees as opposed to white ones, which was prohibited under Title VII. This same section of Title VII, however – § 703(h) – addresses discrimination along gender lines as well.

> [It is not] an unlawful employment practice for an employer to give and to act upon the results of any professionally developed ability test provided that such test, its administration or action upon the results is not designed, intended or used to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

No reasonable person can quarrel with the Court's intentions in reaching its outcome, as eliminating racial animus is an important goal for national cohesion. The end result, however, is that general tests of intelligence cannot be used to grant or deny employment by employers covered under Title VII. Instead, the court held that only task-specific tests could be used:

> What Congress has commanded is that any tests used must measure the person for the job and not the person in the abstract.

In the interest of clarity, Title VII defines employer in 42 U.S.C. § 2000e as "a person engaged in an industry affecting commerce who has fifteen or more employees for each working day in each of twenty or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year," including his or her agents, with certain exceptions. Not every business is affected by this restriction, but almost all large companies and a great many "small" businesses are.

The Current Paradigm, a/k/a "Your Degrees, Please."

The worthy desire to eradicate racial discrimination has carried unintended consequences. Aptitude and fitness for many jobs, particularly in today's service-oriented economy, elude reliable and effective testing. Even if those skills could be tested and quantified, a risk averse large employer would want to avoid testing and potentially inviting a Griggs-style lawsuit.

This leads to hiring based upon the next best available source of information about competency: Educational attainment. In addition to spawning the higher education market discussed above, it has given rise to the lucrative test prep and admissions consulting machine, which adds thousands of dollars in costs to the application process.

Our credentialing system has created a feedback loop that disadvantages men. More women now hold post-secondary degrees than men, a trend that will continue as women continue to swamp men in college admissions. For example, women outnumber men in the University of Florida's incoming class, a trend seen nationwide at other well-regarded schools such as the University of North Carolina – Chapel Hill. A prerequisite for any kind of graduate degree, women are leading men in obtaining Bachelor's degrees for reasons that have been more thoroughly discussed elsewhere and are beyond the scope of this discussion. The end result is clear, though — men are structurally disadvantaged under the current regime and will continue to be well into the future.

In a broad sense, change may be afoot. Recent decisions such as Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003), and Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), show the court's tension over identity preferences, and Ricci v. DeStefano, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S. Ct. 2658 (2009), specifically addressed Title VII, shining light on the murky relationship between the Civil Rights Act's disparate impact standard and the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the 14th Amendment (noted in Scalia's concurrence). All of this, however, is orthogonal to the issue of intelligence testing as an alternative to time-consuming, life-delaying and costly credentialing procedures. The emphasis on educational credentialing is particularly damaging in our under-regulated educational environment, which rewards hucksters for parting taxpayers with their money under the promise than an 18-year-old will someday, somehow, pay it back. Moreover, it creates a closed system where men face substantial obstacles to economically compete with women, if they are not excluded from competition entirely.

In this economy, job prospects for recent graduates are comparable to those of people who never pursued higher education. The latter camp at least avoided the college debt trap, and can always go back later in life when universities will still exist, and possibly with more competitive price structures in response to the smoldering student loan crisis. Despite decades of conventional wisdom favoring education, now might be the best time to not go to college.

Among those most harmed by the current system are smart people who don't enjoy learning in a classroom. Who can blame them? From high school onward, learning seemingly is of secondary importance to social preening and consumerism within educational institutions. The work, in the form of problem sets, "reflection papers" and group projects – where a few do the labor of many for equally shared credit – is often unpleasant or pointless. In an upside-down post-Griggs world, people who don't participate in or enjoy those activities are considered dumb or low-class by the yuppie influentsia, while their college-educated peers vie for a cubicle job to service an enormous debt load and discuss People Magazine on their 35-minute lunch breaks. In my experience, business owners and managers without formal education beyond high school have been able to run circles around me in their areas of expertise. Yet, without entrepreneurialism, it's uncertain whether they would have fared as well as they have in a world so obsessed with college degrees.

The problems of excessive higher education have been clear for some time. While there are many causes, few realize that the nation's highest court played some role in creating the system we have today. While the Supreme Court decided Griggs with noble intentions, the long-term effects of its decisions have quietly come to impose a cost on men and their ambitions.

Academia and the Politics of Peer Review

By Keyster

"A recent study suggests women are better than men at everything!" We've been barraged with these articles for decades, to the point we're numb to them. But they serve an important purpose in the feminist propaganda campaign. The messaging, if repeated often enough through the fog horn of the mainstream media, becomes the de facto truth. And the fact that a "study" comes from a "Sociologists of Science" department of an accredited university means it must be "scientific" because of something called "peer review". Let's trace the path of the peer review process at a given higher educational institution.

Professors who want to ascend in the ranks (and pay scale) of their employer, reaching the ultimate level and security of "tenured", are expected to do more than just "profess" or teach. They're also expected to research or study something in their field, write about it and get it published in a related journal. Before any submission is to be considered however it must first pass through a gauntlet of "referees" or peers for review. This is typically, but not always blind, or having the name of the researcher hidden. The publication editor will have a list of "go to" peer reviewers that she will send the research to. This process alone can take as long as several years and sometimes stall indefinitely, as the peer reviewers receive no credit for reviewing and have no incentive to prioritize doing it. Should the research material reach certain "agreeable" conclusions consistent with their views and be written and formatted in the recognizable style of a certain colleague, this may serve as an incentive for the peer to read it and comment on it in a more expeditious fashion.

Each discipline handles this process differently and abides by different standards, but because "Social Science" is considered science it's deemed just as credible and yet subject to more interpretation at the same time. It's determining facts from the vagaries of human psychology, not a neat logical formula; not to mention the researcher's own biased approach. But the end game here is getting published, no matter what it takes.

So the first test for the erstwhile Associate Professor looking to score points for advancement is getting past his Department Head. He proposes, let's say, a study to research that women consistently practice diverse levels of standards in mate selection. His hypothesis being this is physical and cyclical in nature; some for sexual encounters and some for monogamous life commitment. The Department Head's misogyny meter immediately starts to click and she challenges exactly what he's trying to conclude with this research. (ANYTHING that might present women in a negative light must be scrutinized!) She stonewalls him for months until finally he catches her in a weak moment, perhaps even charms her, while laying out a strong argument to fund and begin this research. Perhaps she'll openly support him in the interest of helping along his own career suicide. "He obviously doesn't understand WHAT he's dealing with."

He conducts his research over a year, through surveys, lab studies, brain scans, interviews, etc. and concludes that women are attracted to different types of men depending on where they are in their estrus cycle. YIKES! Is this really something important to the gender studies portion of "social science"? Well, it's never been done or at least published and the evidence is rather conclusive, if not ground breaking. After some initial protest and internal wrangling he's able to submit his research for publication, probably having to submit a protest to the Dean and step on some toes to do it. This is then passed on by the editor of "The American Journal of Social Sciences" to a pre-selected group of social scientists from Universities and Colleges around the country that specializes in "gender science" for their review. Upon perusing the research their first question might be "What department head in her right mind allowed this misogynist research to take place at all, let alone fund it? Heresy! There's a traitor in our midst!" They may even call around to find out who the perpetrator of this so called "research" is.

Make no mistake, if it makes women appear to be women rather than equal to or better than men, it will be stalled in review indefinitely, if allowed to proceed at all. And if it is, it will be picked apart as "falsely conducted", "incomplete" and so forth. The editor will have no choice but to return the research as not passing peer review and therefore not meeting the standards for publication. No publication, no promotion. No publication, no feminist biased mass media to release it as a “story”, complete with journalistic freedom to editorialize and expert analysis from feminist pundits; not that they’d even consider going with it on the slowest news day of the year, unless it wreaked of another “you go grrl” moment.

This my friends is why the social sciences academic research and studies regarding men and women (and many other things that don’t fit the narrative), CANNOT be trusted for accuracy and honesty in any form. Whether it is domestic violence, parenting, math skills, in the workplace, equal pay, rape, etc.; because it will be tainted with bias from the femocracy that controls the Social Science Departments of every school across our land. They’re the worst kind of scientist; the kind with a preconceived agenda, corrupted by ideology and having an axe to grind.

An academical pseudo-study or The Real World: Women in the Workplace.

wimmin keeping it real

Once again, College proves to be an excellent muse. Take this exchange in -of all things- Industrial Psychology.

Teacher (a woman of course, who else teaches this stuff): So, it has been found that women in particular regard their duties as a mother above all else, so a company should accommodate to that, by putting daycare and other benefits.

Your brave hero then musters his social deafness courage and asks:

Me: Why should an employer put up with that instead of not hiring women in the first place?

Teacher: Well, that would be being exclusive and that's bad. Also, the law says it so. And there's the difficult case of that a pregnant woman isn't productive but she should be hired because, again, the law says that you can't ask about that in an interview and she needs the job. Although, as I was a boss of a college department before this, I have to admit that dealing with women is a bitch.

All of the above paraphrased, of course.

So, with all the recent talk of credentialism and pseudo studies done for the acolytes of the religion of leftism, that, of course, have a huge axe to grind, I thought: If they can't do it, why I cant?

So, present men, occasional women, I want YOU!

Your experiences with women in the workplace:
What were they?
Were they good, bad?
Why were they good or bad?
How did they affect the other employees?
How did they affect the employers?
How did they affect the company as a whole?

All of the above will be gathered and the results published in the next week, so stay tuned! It may even give us our own study to quote, I mean, is not like the studies of the lamestream media are less full of bias (a study about people without bias is hard, you know).

Volokh Discusses Islamic Law and Marital Rape

W.F. Price · 29 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Eugene Volokh is a fairly well-known legal blogger, and an intelligent guy I enjoy reading from time to time. When it comes to sexual politics he's pretty moderate as far as today's attitudes are concerned. However, the contemporary understanding of the terms "rape" and "marriage" are radical departures from anything the world has ever known up to the last forty-odd years, so the term moderate must be kept in its proper context.

In his latest piece he condemns Muslims for refusing to accept that there is such a thing as marital rape.

The problem with this is that the contemporary, Western understanding of rape is not the historical standard. Some of Volokh's commenters bring up Jewish and Christian views on marriage, including some who blame the fact that marital rape did not exist as a concept in the West until very recently on Christianity, as though before the emergence of those bad old patriarchal religions good people all agreed that a woman's consent prior to each sexual act was required to prevent the commission of a heinous crime.

This is ridiculous. Prior to the advent of these religions, and Christianity in particular, women were the property of men in their family, and the crime of rape was generally held to be a violation of a man's property. In Roman law, a man could be executed for rape even if the woman had consented, because he had violated the honor of her family. In the Torah, the punishment for despoiling a maiden required payment to the father and subsequent marriage. Raping another man's wife has been almost universally held to be a grave crime, usually punishable by death.

However, the idea that the legal definition of rape ever had anything to do with whether a woman wanted sex or not at the time is a very recent innovation, which arose largely out of Christian societies, and was based on the idea of redemption, i.e. a fallen woman such as a prostitute could be redeemed through confession and dedication to Christ, and her spiritual maidenhood thereby restored. In fact, as we see with Roman law rape and fornication were interchangeable, and punishment of the male transgessor was to avenge the woman's closest male relative.

Although it may seem humane and right on the face of it to call sex by force within marriage rape and punish it accordingly, the logical conclusion of this is to invalidate the religious concept of marriage, and indeed almost all traditional concepts of marriage. So while it may be "progressive" to put the crime of marital rape on the books, a better and more honest solution would be to eliminate marriage altogether from our law, and classify all sex crimes as sexual assault rather than rape, since the very concept of rape itself is outdated and inextricably tied up with religious attitudes concerning marriage and ecclesiastical law.

The imam who said there can be no such thing as marital rape is only speaking honestly about his beliefs. If he said and felt otherwise he would be committing heresy, or even apostasy.

It is time we truly separated church and state: it is time to eliminate marriage from all state and federal law and leave such arrangements up to the various faiths and cultures to define it as they always have.

And lest anyone suggest that this will encourage Muslim and Christian men to force sex on their wives, all we would have to do to prevent that is enforce criminal codes concerning sexual assault, but at the same time allow the various faiths to make adjustments, such as giving husbands recourse to easy divorce and compensation for neglect under their own religious arrangements. For example, religious marriage contracts could stipulate trust funds of some sort (e.g. dowries), payable to a husband forced to divorce a wife for frigidity, so that he could more easily find another with more dedication to the faith. Rather than force sex on the woman, he would have a financial incentive to turn her loose, which would surely prevent a great deal of marital friction and make many women happy and free to live a godless life.

As it is, the state is playing the surrogate of the church in defining marriage, and in America that is not only unacceptable, but unconstitutional as well.

Feminist Cartoonist Bemoans Online Resistance, Claims She is Enslaved by Patriarchy When Men Disagree With Her

W.F. Price · 30 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In a sign that feminism is increasingly being rejected by men in our culture, a cartoonist named Gabby Schultz recently created a cartoon that supposedly depicts what happened when she called some guy sexist.

The Cartoon is kind of funny for its absolute inversion of what many of us have experience in real life in dealing with feminists, as well as her absurd claim that she is enslaved by men who argue with her.

However, it does show that feminists are starting to encounter some serious opposition. Despite the whiny “poor little me” tone of the comic, there is a hint of surprise at the strength of opposition to feminism.

Times are changing.

Sometimes it's Child-Abuse: a brief personal account

By Josie Gallows

People often lament the struggles of young girls growing up with all of these preconceived notions on how they should or shouldn't be. Popular imagery and mass media exposing young girls to a culture that debases them, turning them into people who will objectify themselves more than anyone else ever could.

As an ardent supporter of Mens Rights, I can find some truth to that old message. There really is an objectification that occurs for young girls and there really is a cultural precedent that's unfair to them in a lot of ways, sometimes how they're viewed intellectually and physically is a leftover from the type of Patriarchal madness we see currently at its worst in the Islamic world. Even as a very young man I resented that in my own, then uneducated, way. I was a defender of women. That probably had something to do with the fact that I was raised by women.

But there was something else I learned about bigotry growing up among women, and even family Lesbians. It's that women hate men. Not just the men involved in one particular political and media regime, but all men. I was taught this by my mother, my grandmother and their female associates but my experience is more pervasive than that. I also learned it from the mothers and female friends of the girls that I've dated, the women I've known casually and, in my adult life, I've experienced it professionally.

For some reason or another, I was a monster. A rabid, criminally minded monster that was only after two things: control and sex. I would later learn that this was due to a several decade old political campaign by a bunch of bitter, old and hideous looking women that were so detached from the reality of the average persons day to day life that they never had any business commenting on it much less radicalizing generations of young women.

That's not the point here, however. If you're here chances are you know the details of Feminism.

The point I want to make is that this attitude was a personal attack on me and I, honestly, believe it to be true that women, as a culture, hate men. It wasn't about some disembodied specter of Patriarchy that I, obviously, had nothing to do with, but a direct verbal abuse of a child and teenager. My response is, sensibly, "mind your manners and watch your tongue." Without even being PC, people should be mindful of the direct implications of what they're saying and should be considerate of whether or not they're making hostile sweeping generalizations that don't actually apply to reality.

Why do I say that? Because I actually do believe in fairness, unlike feminism. "Despite" my penis, my emotional faculties and ability to empathize are wholly intact. So is my ability to feel offended.

While I was busy defending the cause of men and women being equals, during my preadolescence and up, women were doing clean-up work behind me making sure that they instilled a sense of the opposite; that women were superior to men. Feminism, ultimately, is not about the equality of genders but about the specific plight of women who seek superiority and revenge. If this were not the case it would not be called "Feminism" but, quite, simply, "Equality."

Men are stupid, men are violent, men lack social graces. Men lack the emotional capacity to possibly understand what it's like to be wounded or to actually suffer negative consequences cultural trends. Men are either big ugly dopes or limp wrists who are equally unworthy of female time, consideration or care. This is what our modern society has distilled from decades of feminism and pumps into the minds of young men throughout the entirety of all formerly great civilizations that, in reality, used to be able to find a whole lot more useful about men and, shockingly enough, women as well, than our culture seems to be able to these days.

A quote that stuck with me from a close family member while reading a news story was "just another case of a man raping a woman" not "just another case of a rapist" and therefore "men are rapists." I tried to correct this obvious fallacy but to no avail, because obviously as a man I have no conception of what bigoted ideas and the seeds that grow them really are.

As a kid I repeatedly heard “you know how men are.” How am I? I asked women to explain, elaborate, make themselves clear but they never would. Apparently I was an over-reacting male with violent tendencies for demanding that a slight against my very existence should be explained.

My resentment for the fact that they couldn’t even justify their obvious bigotry grew but something else grew as well. A sense of self-loathing. A very real, very self-hostile sense of self-loathing that occurred due to being an impressionable kid in a world filled with women who I had come to believe hated me or secretly disliked me in theory and yet my sensibility towards the generalized equality of genders remained. I’ll spare you a sob story and give you facts.

How would a group of men these days be viewed for saying the equivalent in front of or, worse, directly to a young girl? That would be considered flat out child abuse and, therefore in all fairness, I think it’s only right that we call a spade a spade.

Feminism has been consistently engendering a form of mental child abuse that has gone on for at least two decades now. It’s been proven to me by a large cross-section of people in my life experience.

Verbal abuse, both cultural and direct, from birth to adolescence effected me in a sensitive manner that supposedly only young girls really feel. Supposedly, because men lack emotional depth and emotional intelligence the only corrupting influences they receive are the ones to be violent and pornographic. Few stop to think that men are being taught that they are, in fact, those things rather than being taught to be those things. It would take until my twenties to start to find an equilibrium between a love for myself as a person and respect for my qualities as a man, because I don’t mesh well with the feminist notion of manhood being a big ugly mess of objectification and unjustifiably aggressive tendencies.

Masculinity not being a stigma was a hard idea to accept as “normal,” despite the fact that it was ultimately my natural inclination to accept it. Ultimately, a far better choice than self-hatred.

In the end, growing up, I think I would have had a lot more self-esteem and a lot more drive if it weren’t for living in a culture currently constructed by feminists. It leads me to wonder, if it effected someone like me with such a depth of emotional crisis, how has this culture of animosity towards masculinity and men in general really effected other men? Not everyone can be headstrong and defiant and escape the garbage of popular culture able to say “I’m not a victim, just a hardened cynic.”

I think you should wonder also.

For that, I leave you something that should help you along your way:

Why is it really that in the U.S., the seventh leading cause of death in men is suicide while it’s only the fifteenth for women? Four times higher and a proven fact. Something is effecting men much more deeply than the culture that supposedly exploits women, something big. Maybe, just maybe, it has just a little to do with a feminist created male self-image.

Keep your words true to their message.

A Totalitarian Streak A Mile Wide

While Vox Day already beat me to this punch, I thought it useful to join him in piling on this august example of the toxic combination of feminine solipsism and tendency toward totalitarianism:

> Whistles, catcalls and lewd come-ons from strangers are all too familiar to New York City women, who say they are harassed multiple times a day as they walk down the street. Now lawmakers are examining whether to do something to discourage it. A City Council committee heard testimony Thursday from women who said men regularly follow them, yell at them and make them feel unsafe and uncomfortable. Advocates told stories of preteens and teenagers being hounded by adult men outside city schools and pleaded for government to address the problem.

The "problem" here of course, is not the behavior itself, it is that this troublesome conduct is committed by non-alpha men, and the women admit as such:

> Soon, the group Hollaback, an organization formed five years ago to stand up to street harassment, will release a smart phone app allowing women everywhere to do the same. Hollaback told councilmembers that women have left jobs, broken leases and skipped school all just to avoid incessant unwelcome advances from strange men they pass on their commutes. Holly Kearl, author of "Stop Street Harassment: Making Public Places Safe and Welcoming for Women," said she informally surveyed more than 800 women from 23 countries and 43 states, and 99 percent of them had been harassed by strangers (Ed: emphasis mine).

Sexual harassment is commonly defined as "Unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature that tends to create a hostile or offensive work environment". Note the operative word here, 'unwelcome', which moves this behavior from the objective to the subjective, from merely obnoxious into the domain of a crime punishable by the state. A crime defined not by objective criteria, but by the feelings of an individual woman, feelings that vary from time and place and from woman to woman…and man to man.

In other words, should the very same behavior be committed by men these women find attractive, not only would it be not a problem, it would be welcomed. Which brings us to the crux of this matter: I can come to one and only one inescapable conclusion: the liberated woman hates hates hates non-alpha men with a passion, a zeal, a chip that, as a non-alpha male, I admit I cannot fully fathom. Moreover, such a liberated woman will use every tool at her disposal to restrain the behavior of undesirable (read: non-alpha) men so as to ensure she receives only "welcome" attention from men she finds desirable. Usually the default tool sought by these women is the law enforcement power of the State. Which is what we see here on the NYC council, a move to take these noxious behaviors, turn them into subjective "crimes" a la workplace sexual harassment laws, and hang that albatross around the necks of all non-alpha men who live in the city.

"Come hither" shoes featured in MSNBC article

Missing from all of this discussion, of course, is any mention of the behavior or mode of dress of the women involved. Thus I found the photo placed atop MSNBC's treatment of this event to be more than a bit ironic, for it would seem to me that if one dresses in such a manner as to spam the whole social environment with your sexual signals, one then has little right to object when a fellow who is not within one's erotic field of regard happens to respond. That is not to say that the women who attended the council meeting, who in this NY Post article look rather average, dress in such an obviously sexual manner as depicted by the come-hither-shoes depicted here when out on the town. Rather, it is to note that the customary female role in human behavior, consistent over millennia, remains unchanged in these libertine times…the hard-wired pattern of feminine sexual display and male response to such displays. Of course, the women in this story wish to restrict and punish the male response to their displays, conveniently forgetting that it is they who initiate the process in the first place. Instead, we (read: society) are supposed to focus on their feelings of insecurity, and are supposed to rush to provide it for them.

Thus, having wildly succeeding in controlling the behavior of undesirable men in the workplace, these women are moving to restrain the behavior, to attack the freedom of speech and of movement of undesirable men in the public space. Of course, this attack isn't couched in those terms; instead, the stalking horse used here to execute a sneak-attack the liberties of non-dominant men is–you guessed it–women's safety, a concern that is sure to garner support from white knights and the sisterhood all over town:

> "Because of street harassment, from a young age women learn that public spaces are male territory," Kearl said. "They learn to limit the places they go, they try not to be in public alone — especially at night — and when they are alone, they stay on guard." Councilwoman Julissa Ferreras, chair of the women's issues committee that held the hearing Thursday, recalled learning as a young teen how to "speedwalk" to dodge certain men, and which corner stores she should always avoid.
> Kat Pope, 28, of Manhattan, said she quit going to her gym in the mornings because she was harassed so badly on her way there and back. Men at a construction site would whistle, stare and yell at her as she passed, every single day. She still gets harassed in other locations, but it happens maybe once a week instead of daily.
> "It feels disgusting," she said. "In the moment, I feel helpless and I never know what to do to make it stop."
> Carrie Goodman, 27, a student who lives in Manhattan, said she hears a whistle or comment "once or twice a day."
> Hollaback is pushing the city to commission a study, a public awareness campaign and perhaps even legislation, including "no-harassment zones" around schools to protect young women. "Too commonly, street harassment is believed to be the price women pay for living in New York City," said its executive director, Emily May. "But we're not buying it."
> "This is not our way of not being able to take a compliment," said Nefertiti Martin, who testified at the hearing. "This is an issue of safety."

> Street harassment of women is as old as cities themselves and is common around the world, but the pushback against it is a more recent movement. Volunteer activists in Cairo are planning to launch a website, Harrasmap, where women can instantly report cases of leering, groping and other sexual threats.

Going beyond the sexism implicit in a set-aside committee for 'women's issues'–as if women's issues are any different from men's–and going beyond the blatant emotional manipulation inherent in lumping some behavior some women find obnoxious when committed by some men in some settings with the crime of sexual battery, it is obvious to me the toxic effect the female need for security, when empowered, has on the freedoms of society as a whole. For it is a short distance between the sort of power the State would require to provide women their desired safety, and the sort of power the state would then possess to control the lives of all its subjects. The freedom of others–or the property rights, right to self defense, right to free association, etc, etc. of others, especially when the holder of those rights are men–does not appear to matter much to women concerned with making their lives more comfy at the expense of others. This incident is merely consistent with that well-established pattern, a pattern that demonstrates that women as a sex are particularly prone to the temptation of trading the liberty of themselves and others for a little more personal security. Of course we know that they (and we) will receive neither over the long run, but that requires a twin concern for (a) the abstract concept of freedom and liberty and (b) a focus that considers the past and the future–in addition to the here and now–that seems to be missing in the average female. Or at least the ones that inhabit NYC, that populate NOW, and who vote in elections. "The personal is political" is a very apt mantra for these gals, who take their feelings and solipsism right into the voting booth. And liberty suffers for it.

A Brief History of the Versions of Marriage

zed · 1 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The terminology "Marriage 2.0″ has entered the public discourse as a way of talking about the very real and significant differences between what our parents or grandparents would have considered "marriage" and what is practiced today. I believe that most people who read any blogs like this are software-savvy enough to get the reference to major revisions of computer software which get released every few years or months. Some few may even be old enough to remember when major revisions – those ending in "dot oh" (.0) – were followed by minor, but still significant, revisions indicated by incrementing the number after the decimal point. For example, DOS 3.0 was not followed by DOS 4.0, but rather by DOS 3.1 and eventually DOS 3.2.

I thought it might be useful to address in the dialogue what some of the minor revisions to marriage were, and when they happened. What follows is mostly a bit of semi-whimsical thinking about a very serious subject. I know that there will be many who will quibble with my selected milestones, but discussion is the name of the game, so quibble away.

Marriage 0.1 – 1.0 – origins lost in history up to 1945 CE

Marriage 1.1 released – 1945 – The Baby Boom Begins

Marriage 1.1 was almost identical to Marriage 1.0 except for a couple of key features which made it more popular. Veterans returning from WWII and going to college on the GI Bill, combined with explosive markets for manufactured goods necessary for the rebuilding of war-devastated Europe and SE Asia, fueled a massive expansion of the middle class, the managerial class, and the Baby Boom. Marriage was more affordable for the average man, and therefor more accessible for the average woman. The years up to 1960, which covered most of the baby boom, coincide with "Peak Marriage." The percentages of four main demographics – blacks and whites of both sexes – which currently participate in the version of marriage currently available have been falling since 1960.

Marriage 1.2 released – 1960 – The Pill

While the advent of the Birth Control Pill (or just "The Pill") had significant effects for unmarried people – allowing non-marital sexual activity with less risk of unwanted parenthood – it also had a HUGE effect on marriage itself. The concept of "Family Planning" became widely familiar, and the ability of married couples to have as much sex as they felt like without incurring the burdens on their time and finances which additional children would bring subtly changed the dynamics of a lot of marriages.

Marriage 1.3 released – 1970 – No Fault Divorce

Probably more accurately called "no real reason other than I'm tired of you" divorce. Where all previous versions of marriage were considered "durable goods" and were expected to last a lifetime, Marriage V1.3 and all versions after were disposable items, to be thrown away and replaced when they started to show signs of wear.

Marriage 1.3 was an instant and automatic upgrade which could be installed over any previous version without the user's consent.

Marriage 1.4 released – 1973 – Legalized Abortion

While originally intended as an enhancement to SingleGirl 2.0 and Liberated Woman 1.0, enough married women users demanded this feature be added to their marriages as an update that it became broadly available. It was sort of a hidden revision, in that it didn't actually show as a change in the version number. Many men who thought they were still running V1.0-V1.3 and had some sort of veto rights over the termination of their children were totally surprised and shocked when they first encountered the blue screen of death. Like V1.3 before it, V1.4 could be installed with the consent of only one user of the system, regardless of what the other wanted – "Her body, her choice, him – no choice."

Marriage 1.5 released – 1974~1975 – Egalitarian Marriage

The release date for Marriage1.5 is a bit fuzzy because it spent so long in Beta testing (double meaning intended), and there were so many pre-release candidates which differed significantly from each other. One of the first visible features of Marriage1.5 was the Hyphenated-Lastname. I believe that this kernel of Marriage1.5 came out of the Santa Cruz Operation, at least I'm fairly sure that it originated in Kalifornia.

I'm not going to bother documenting versions 1.6 through 1.9 because they were not so much actual revisions as they were competing versions of Marriage1.5. There was Red Hat Marriage1.5 (practiced in NY, to go along with their red stockings), Ubuntu Marriage1.5 (first distributed as a tarball and required compiling your own traditions and vows), and dozens of other lesser-known versions.

One thing was definite, however – Marriage had become open-source, and anyone and everyone felt entitled to tinker around with it.

Marriage 2.0 – 1975~1993 – Spousal/Marital Rape

This was not a revision – it was a fundamental change to the kernel and the underlying code. It's roll out took some time – 18 years between when the first state passed a marital rape law until the last one did – but the gooey interface was just so attractive to feminists, White Knights, and Manginas. It fundamentally did away with any concept of any sort of marital obligation on the part of the wife, and with the ever shifting definition of "rayyyyppppe" put the full power of law enforcement on the woman's side if she felt a need to either punish her husband, or get rid of him entirely so she could keep his assets – as William Hetherington's wife did.

Now, I'm not going to go into an in-depth accounting of all the revisions of Marriage 2.0, because there were literally thousands – Marriage 2.0.1, Marriage 2.0.1.1, etc. However, there were two major revisions which are exceptionally noteworthy.

Marriage 2.2 – 1993 – Lorena Bobbit establishes the right of a woman to castrate her husband for being a "selfish lover."

Marriage 2.5 – 2006 – Building on the pioneer work of Lorena Bobbit, Mary Winkler establishes the right of a woman to execute her husband for wanting to have sex with her.

Marriage 3.0 – 2010 - Autogamy (HT: Eman, the Desperate Houseboy for coining the word.)

Autogamy was the natural, predictable, and inevitable result of the direction of successive revisions to Marriage 2.0. Marriage was no longer about being married, it was all and only about getting married. Coupled with the bloated egos and sense of entitlement of post-feminist women, its development was inevitable. Fortunately, it runs fine on older hardware, this giving a few more years of life to the wedding industry. However, since Marriage 3.0 has gone "groomless", suppliers of divorce products are likely to see their sales fall a bit. They hope to minimize their losses due both to falling popularity and sales of any version of Marriage 2.x and being cut out of any market for users of Marriage 3.0, by pushing for the adoption of

Marriage 4.0 – same-sex marriage – 2004

It is an anomaly of the fragmentation of the marriage market that Marriage 4.0 was actually released before Marriage 3.0, but its release got bogged down in court battles, limited market acceptance, and a very high return rate due to excessive bugs. If someone were into splitting hairs (an activity which I am sure none of the spearhead readership would waste their time on), autogamy might actually be more precisely termed Marriage 2.9 as it is a natural outgrowth of the Bridezilla feature of Marriage 2.x. However, since it is a true innovation allowing the use of Marriage by a woman totally without a hard drive of any kind, it probably deserves its own major revision number. All previous versions had required either a real or simulated hard drive, and autogamy was the first version to be able to run entirely on its own without any sort of supporting hardware.

What new versions of of Marriage does the future hold? Hard to say. With the history of innovation over the past

65 years, the sky is probably the limit. Marriage 5.0 may allow people to marry their pets. Marriage 6.0 may extend marriage to inanimate objects or even pastimes which are not objects at all – we have, after all, heard for years about people being married to their jobs. “Do you, John, take this cubicle to be your lawfully wedded (um, well I’m sure someone will come up with a word for it)?”

Democratic Congressional Candidate: Reaction to Embarrassing Photos Sexist

W.F. Price · 1 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Krystal Ball, a congressional candidate who was photographed proudly handling a red appendage attached to her boyfriend's nose (she smiled for the camera), is very upset that she is being "smeared" for the salacious photos. Ms. Ball thinks it is sexist to ridicule or criticize women for sexually explicit behavior, even when the evidence goes public.

Krystal is apparently running on an explicitly feminist platform, so she is never going to get an endorsement or any mercy here at The Spearhead, but her "poor me" attitude is worth noting for the very double standard she claims is afflicting her campaign (it looks as though she'll lose badly).

In her long whine, Krystal goes so far as to reference "Name It. Change It," which is a feminist campaign launched by Gloria Steinem, and complains that people are hurting her feelings when they show the embarrassing pictures of her eager hand on a big, red dildo:

You know, there's a saying in China about what it means to be a politician: "Politicians need thick face skin." When men run for and hold office, they are regularly subjected to ridicule, smears, scrutiny and often even threats. Sometimes, they are tripped up by their behavior. Back in the 1980s Gary Hart was caught fooling around, and we all know about John Edwards and Mark Sanford.

Krystal's photos are no big deal — all they do is make her look immature and like a typical American college girl, i.e. proudly promiscuous. There's really nothing shocking about them these days, but they do make it difficult to take the woman seriously. That's really what Ms. Ball is upset about, but seriously, she's a 28-year-old girl running for congress who happens to be named "Krystal Ball" — I don't think the photos are her only problem in that regard.

Ms. Ball wants a position of considerable power and influence, yet she doesn't feel she should be subjected to scrutiny. She has the typical attitude that she, as a woman, should be above criticism, above ridicule and treated with kid gloves.

Perhaps she has a point — maybe we do take the smears a bit too far in contemporary culture. But given that feminists have created a climate in which it is not only acceptable, but actually advantageous, for women to relentlessly smear their husbands, fathers and colleagues, no girl running for a powerful position deserves a morsel of pity for going through the same thing. As long as women continue to spit on and slander the men in their lives by the millions, the gloves should stay off, and they will.

British Woman Accuses Man of Rape, Wrecks His Life and Steals Everything, Gets Three Years

W.F. Price · 2 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Kate Woodhead of Surrey, England, accused her boyfriend of drugging and raping her after he tried to end their 18-month relationship. Paul Joseph, the boyfriend, said he left his house to go to work at his job as an IT consultant one day, and the next thing he knew he was arrested and his entire life went up in smoke.

> For me, it is as if someone's house burned down and everything they owned was in it. That is effectively what happened to me.
> I walked out of the house wearing my suit when I was arrested and I never saw anything again apart from one briefcase and a work laptop.

Fortunately for Mr. Joseph, the police were suspicious of the story, but by the time he was cleared the damage had been done. While he was defending himself, Ms. Woodhead stole his most valuable possessions and transferred ownership of his cars. Joseph lost his job, was put through enormous stress, and suffered under the knowledge that people suspected him of being a rapist.

In a profound understatement, Joseph said "the period after the arrest was difficult mentally." Now, he is trying to rebuild his shattered life and leave the terrible experience behind, saying "It is done – it is over and I am trying to work as hard as I can to get back to where I was."

In the meanwhile, the woman who maliciously wrecked his life and stole everything she could is facing only three years in prison, of which she will probably serve less than half.

Perhaps Ms. Woodhead was encouraged by the recent political drive to reduce sentences for female offenders who go after their loved ones. Her mild sentence certainly reflects a great disregard for Mr. Joseph's life and freedom.

Feminists: Who cares if it's your kid?

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon. The full version of this article, Because who cares of it's your kid? was first published by The Legal Satyricon on November 1, 2010.

Troubling news from Britain, America's canary in the coal mine and a target of immense reverence from college students who lived there – in a nice part of town, with other Americans – while studying abroad. From a Spectator article picked up by Roissy, arguing for the complete end of DNA paternity testing:

> At a stroke, the one thing that women had going for them has been taken away, the one respect in which they had the last laugh over their husbands and lovers. DNA tests are an anti-feminist appliance of science, a change in the balance of power between the sexes that we've hardly come to terms with. And that holds true even though many women have the economic potential to provide for their children themselves. (source.)

First and foremost, let's put the shoe on the other foot: Aren't feminists constantly calling for tort consequences against men who make minor verbal misrepresentations to get laid? Certain women seek to denude men of their tools for getting what they want while keeping their own. Also, it seems imbalanced for feminists to deride men for using verbal and physical tactics to make themselves more appealing - "game," writ large – while 1) they do the same thing with makeup and dating guides like The Rules, and 2) the "one respect in which they had the last laugh over their husbands and lovers" has consequences much farther reaching than a woman waking up one morning, rolling over and realizing she was – by her own consent – pwned by some dude who made a good showing the night before, but she does not otherwise find attractive.

The way McDonagh describes her venomous opposition to paternity testing in the article reveals much about those who would take it away: It's not about equality, or even fairness, but about power. Through science, men have empowered themselves to determine whether they are the parents of the children borne by their lovers, spouses, or complete strangers alleging paternity. A particularly shrill segment of society wants to end that for no reason than consolidating power for themselves – ultimately in the form of child support expropriated from men by the state – and by using shame to do so.

> Many men have, of course, ended up raising children who were not genetically their own, but really, does it matter?

Yes. Only in this sick, broken world, sliding into a new dark age with hollow politically correct platitudes serving as truth, could the author ask this question deadpan. Many parents lovingly adopt or raise children who are not their own, but this ignores McDonagh's broader question of "does [paternity] matter?" Legally, and for the cuckold who believes the child is his, and raises it under those circumstances – rather than as an adoptive parent or step parent – it absolutely matters.

If DNA testing ever was to be banned in the United States, it would raise an interesting constitutional question. Matters of birth and abortion are generally covered by a broadly defined right of privacy that governs martial relationships and reproduction. First established in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), then expanded to cover abortion by Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) and sex in*Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003). Under Roe's progeny, a woman has broad rights over her pregnancy and ability to take it to term, but states may require DNA tests after birth to confirm or deny paternity. If this practice is banned, it may create a question of whether child support payments would constitute an unconstitutional taking of property. When paying judgments or taxes, the government takes steps to ensure that the right person is paying the judgment. Even now, the government has stepped in to halt a foreclosure process that cannot produce the notes of delinquent mortgage holders — despite many of them rightly being subject to foreclosure. Whether the government can take property from a putative father based on a woman's say-so, and without using testing that was previously available, would be an important but dangerously uncertain question.

Among my age group, the ideas of marriage and children are met with a blend of derision and fear. Men, women and children didn't change; the legal and social atmosphere did — and neither gender seems particularly happy about it. A couple's higher earning spouse lives in fear of divorce, particularly in no-fault divorce states. The costs associated with divorce and child support contribute to men being unwilling to marry. Based on the concern over men's hesitation to marry, it seems that women don't envy the prospect of endlessly dating and potentially missing out on the brass ring of marriage, either.

Removing the protection of DNA paternity testing will only agitate existing tension and mistrust between the genders, which neither of them seems to have particularly wanted. Nobody wants to be divorced, or live constantly on guard to the prospect of his or her partner being constantly solicited – or soliciting others – in pursuit of the elusive "something better" that we've been told is waiting for us. Few men or women will ever need DNA paternity testing, but eliminating its existence likely will create paranoia and distrust between men and women that otherwise would not have existed. It will only serve to make degrading gender relations worse and, in the end, hurt everyone.

Featured Guest · 3 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By John Dias of Misandry Review

Not that I necessarily endorse the victors in the following campaigns, but as an advocate for men’s rights and for valuing masculinity, part of me feels slightly vindicated that all of the people who uttered the phrase “man up” for political gain in America’s 2010 elections have been defeated:

Senate:

- Sharon Angle (R-NV), defeated by Harry Reid (D-NV) who Angle told to “man up”
- Robin Carnahan (D-MO), defeated by Roy Blunt (R-MO), who Carnahan told to “man up”
- Kendra Meek (D-FL), defeated and in 3rd place behind the victor Marco Rubio (R-FL) and Charlie Crist (I-FL); Meek had told Crist to “man up” and “leader up”
- Jane Norton (R-CO), defeated by Ken Buck (R-CO) in the Republican primary, after she attacked Buck for not being “man enough” to run attack ads himself. Incidentally, Ken Buck went on to narrowly lose the election to Michael Bennett (D-CO).
- Christine O’Donnell (R-DE), defeated by Chris Coons (D-DE), after O’Donnell accused Coons of being “unmanly,” adding, “Mike, this is not a bake-off — get your man-pants on.”

Congress:

- Matthew Doheny (R-NY), defeated by Bill Owens (D-NY) in the 23rd Congressional District, after a local Tea Party leader demanded that Owens “man up”

Governorships:

Unlike the examples above, in which emasculation was used in a failed attempt at gaining political advantage, we saw its opposite in Arizona — but in that case, to benefit a woman!

- Jan Brewer (R-AZ) prevailed against Terry Goddard (D-AZ), after Republican supporter Sarah Palin praised Brewer — a woman — for having the “cojones” that President Obama did not have because of Brewer’s legislative drive in Arizona to enforce federal immigration laws.

There you have it. Emasculation as a political tactic is a loser — political suicide in fact — at least in 2010. But valuing masculinity may actually provide a political benefit, even to a female candidate.

Despite Record Number of Female Candidates, Women Lose Seats in Congress

W.F. Price · 3 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Tea Party movement has been widely touted as the biggest grassroots uprising of recent years, and a large number of Tea Party candidates have been female. Some of the notables include Meg Whitman (CA – gov.), Carly Fiorina (CA – sen.), Sharron Angle (NV – sen.) and Christine O'Donnell (DE – sen.), all of whom have lost decisively. So far, the only Tea Party senate challengers who have won or appear to be winning are men, such as Rand Paul of Tennessee and Marco Rubio of Florida.

The only male Tea Party senate candidate who has definitely lost is John Raese of West Virgina, who was running for the late Robert Byrd's senate seat.

Mainstream Republican candidate Dino Rossi is giving feminist WA senator Patty Murray a run for her money, but the race remains uncertain, and Washington State Democrats are very good at finding ballots in unlikely places when races are close.

In addition to the general failure of female challengers to unseat incumbents, several female incumbents have lost their jobs — the 2010 elections will likely represent the first time women have lost seats in Congress since 1960.

The candidacy of so many women adds another element to the traditional Republican/Democrat divide, one in which it seems that many voters were given a referendum on feminism of one sort or the other (left or right feminism). From all indications, voters have rejected feminism, which strikes me as more significant than the typical swing between Republicans and Democrats.

When the dust settles we'll have a better idea of what happened along those lines, but in the meanwhile we should take some solace in the fact that rumors of "The End of Men" have been greatly exaggerated.

Female Poker Champ: Women Need Girls-Only Poker Because Men Scare Them

According to 27-year-old Maria Ho, the world's best female poker player, women find men intimidating when facing them across the table. Because of the intimidation factor, Ms. Ho supports ladies-only poker tournaments, so as to prevent women from being frightened away when they are starting out.

While I'm sure Ho is being honest here, she ought to consider that a lot of boys are probably intimidated when they play against men for the first time, and competition is meant to have an element of aggression, because otherwise it really can't be called competition.

Although she doesn't come right out and say it, Ho probably knows that women are not as competitive as men in general, so having separate tournaments makes some sense despite the fact that poker is a game of chance and calculation rather than of brawn. I'd be inclined to agree with her that it is a good idea, because whenever women are placed in competitions with men there is invariably a push to handicap male players in one way or another, which detracts from the contest. If the women at least have their own tournaments then there is less pressure to hobble men in their own competitive endeavors.

But then again, if women demand equality in all things, then these women's tournaments are fair game for male competitors — especially if there is money involved.

Although there's nothing wrong with women wanting to raise sons to become good men, the fact of the matter is that they generally can't, and past a certain point they shouldn't try, because it becomes counterproductive. It may be the single most damaging myth of feminism that women are capable of rearing boys from infancy to adulthood. Sure, plenty of guys who grow up only with their mothers may turn out alright, but in the cases where she was the only authority figure in the home most were likely damaged in some manner.

In the old days, boys underwent a rite of passage of some sort, preserved in certain rituals such as the Islamic circumcision rite, the Bar Mitzvah, and perhaps for Christian Americans some form of summer camp or the football team. These are relics of a time when there was a point in boys' lives at which they were separated from their mothers and inducted into the company of men. Generally, it happened right around puberty. The reason this was done is because it was widely recognized that the mother had done her job, and was not equipped to prepare the boy for manhood.

However, these days women are given extended control over their sons, often by the courts, and often simply because fathers are away most of the time. So we have Oprah promoting her typical brand of feel-good treacle to the legions of single mothers out there who are blundering around with sons they will never really understand.

Choosing to focus on a female's perception of what is masculine and what is feminine is only one of the flaws of the article, but it is telling nonetheless:

> When my best friend's older son and my son were both around three, her boy delighted in swathing himself in glittery tulle and prancing around with a fairy wand. My friend took it in stride, providing generous amounts of fabric and making aesthetic improvements — more sparkles, a bigger star on the wand, etc. — to her son's great and often delirious satisfaction.
> On the face of it, I supported her and her boy, but I confess I was also relieved that my son didn't express quite the same level of interest. It was such a small thing: A boy, barely out of babyhood, innocently enraptured by clouds of tulle — why was it even the slightest bit threatening to me?

As a father myself, I saw my son play with "girls' toys" plenty of times before he knew the difference, and he still sometimes plays with his sister's girly stuff, such as her little pink horse carriage, attaching it to the fire engine or whatever. But it isn't what a boy is playing with that makes the difference — it's how he's playing with it. A boy of three who is waving a wand and throwing glitter around is doing the same thing as a boy who is waving a stick and throwing sand. To a three-year-old there's really no difference, but the mother sees this as an impropriety; something to be ashamed of. If the boy in question had been playing house and calling himself the "mommy," then he'd have what is known as "gender identity disorder," which is an entirely different kettle of fish.

So, what does this mother take away from this? She knows there's something vaguely wrong with feeling worried about a boy playing with something like glitter and wands, but rather than realize that she just doesn't get it, she comes to the conclusion that boys should be encouraged to be more like women and, disturbingly, to be physically close to their mothers through adolescence.

> … that when a friend who noticed him at 14 snuggling with me on the couch later asked, "Is he interested in girls yet?"
> A sensitive, affectionate boy risks being perceived as a "mama's boy, tied to her apron strings." Isn't it interesting that we have no such phrases to describe a girl who is attached to her mother? And that "daddy's girl" completely lacks the pejorative connotation?
> My mother's and friend's questions scared me because they suggested that the closeness between me and my > son was in some way inhibiting his path to a healthy manhood.

I'd say that maintaining a close physical bond between an adolescent boy and his mother is most assuredly inhibiting his path to a healthy manhood. I'm not going to get Freudian here, but that is a recipe for some later problems, I'd imagine.

The slur "motherfer" is not seen as the gravest of insults throughout the entire world because of the patriarchy, but rather because it is a taboo based, most likely, on instinct. However, according to Olga Silverstein, an "expert" on raising boys, and William Pollack of Harvard Medical School, both quoted by the author, that's exactly the kind of man we need for a better society.

Pollack, like notorious National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS) guru Michael Kimmel, thinks that masculinity is a "mask:"

> We know what we get when a boy is raised with the code, says Pollack: a mask of masculinity, false bravado, the need to be aggressive and to win, and to ignore or repress feelings of vulnerability. These are the men who seem strong but who are, ironically, weakest in many ways because they're hiding or are unaware of their neediness and are poorly equipped to engage in any kind of honest relationship.

Our mother-author concludes with a test of the new ideas bequeathed by the aforementioned intellectual giants, and is thus convinced and affirmed:

> One afternoon when my son was a senior in high school, a group of his friends gathered in our living room to play video games.
> [...]
> I had a question for them, I said, related to a story I was writing: "You guys are 18, right?" I said. "Do you still tell your mothers that you love them?"
> …silence swept the room. I stood there uncomfortably.
> "Well, sure," one of the boys said finally.
> "Of course," said another.
> "Why not?" said a third.
> A fourth boy, whose mother is a doctor, stretched his legs and leaned back in his chair. "My mother raised me and my brother and sister pretty much by herself," he said. "My mother is a goddess." No one snickered. It was a statement of fact.

The Day I Got The Juan Williams Treatment: A Wake-Up Call To Bloggers Everywhere

Obsidian · 4 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We all have particular dates on the calendar that mark watershed moments in our lives. For me, one of those dates is Wed, Nov 3, 2010. Why this date and not say, the date I founded my blog, The Obsidian Files – which had just celebrated one year old on Halloween?

Because, more than the founding of my blog, it was the day that it was taken down, that looms the largest for me. And it's a date others reading along should do well to remember.

Because it's a date that follows on the heels of another important date for the body politic – it was barely two weeks after veteran journalist and avowed Liberal Juan Williams, was summarily fired from his job of more than a decade – an NPR commentator – for daring to speak his mind and do so with those on the Right. There's a great deal of similarity between Williams and myself — we both do what we love, which is to write and to give our take on the great issues of our time. To be sure, he's been at it a lot longer than myself, and he gets paid for what he does to boot, something I don't mind, because I never set out to do this blogging thing to make money (although that just might change, if my guess is right…). But perhaps the biggest thing we both have in common, is that we're both Black Men.

But not only are we both Black Men, we're supposed to fit into some kind of pre-defined box; we all know the drill by now. Black Men aren't supposed to think for themselves. They're supposed to be for Leftist causes and issues, come hell or high water – and if we don't, if we question them, on any level whatsoever, then we're "Juan Williams'd" – meaning thrown under the bus, tossed overboard, kicked to the curb. You get the idea.

Williams has said, in the days following his firing by NPR, that a lot of his assumptions came tumbling down — he was a Liberal because he thought that Liberals were tolerant, open minded folk. He found out the hard way – and I'm quoting him now – that this assumption simply wasn't true, and that if anything, it was those on the Right, who had proven to be far and away more tolerant. he ought to know, after all, he sat among the Rightest of the Right, for years. And they weren't the ones who cast him out like a leper. It was NPR — bastion of Leftwing points of view.

The parallel for me could not have been more striking, for it wasn't rabid, raving, foaming at the mouth White racists in the form of "HBDers" storming the WordPress gates and clamoring for my head on a platter, it was my own "people", in the form of Black Women, who did it. The very same Black Women, I would bet a dollar to a donut, who consider themselves progressive, open minded tolerant and "Liberal." The same Black Women who have pulled the lever for the "D" column in virtually every election since they could vote. The same Black Women who claim to be for the rights of the minority — except "minorities" they don't like. Like Brothas who speak their minds for example, about issues that actually matter. What are those issues, Obsidian? Sexual Politics, that's what.

Earlier this year, during my tenure at the online Men's magazine The Spearhead, I ran into a buzzsaw of contention for merely pointing out some things about my White brothers than they didn't like. a veritable shitstorm was started, much gnashing of teeth, this, that… But I wasn't banned or "fired" from The Spearhead, and no one called for my blog to be taken down. Those who have known me for any length of time know that I've had epic battles with many on the HBD side of the ledger – again, no one called for my voice to be shutdown. True, I've been more or less banned from participating at certain blogs; but that's a far cry different from wanting to shut another person's blog down.

That only happened when Women, in this case they happened to be Black, did so.

And, let's be clear as to what kind of Black Women I'm talking about, lest I be accused of being a "misogynist" much in the way Williams was accused of being an "Islamophobe" – I'm not talking about the everyday Sista out there just trying to get by and live her life. I'm talking about Sistas who have chosen to enter into the public square of opinion and debate and attempt to foist their views onto the rest of us, without challenge or critique – then, when such a thing happens, which is inevitable, they want to suddenly revert from "strong, independent Women" to Damsels in Distress, pillorying you with all manner of ad hominem assaults in the process. In other words, these Sistas – and again I'm talking about bloggers and writers who have chosen to make it their life's work to be advocates for certain points of view, and in some cases GET PAID FOR IT, want to have it both ways. They want to go into the public square, get up on the soapbox and say what they want without a challenge of any kind. And when they are challenged, when their views are shown to be proven false, when they're exposed as the phonies and frauds that they are, they then want to shut you down after attempting to paint you as a "misogynist" or a "racist" or a "stalker" or whatever else they can think of. Personally, it's Black Women like these that are doing grave harm to Black America, and I say that without any hint of hyperbole; this is not purple prose I'm going into here.

For WordPress's part, they are no better than NPR in my view, hang on, actually, they are worse – at least Juan Williams got a late night phonecall. I didn't even get an email from WP. I was informed by others that my blog was gone. Ask me what I think of WordPress' commitment to freedom of speech.

Being born under the Sign of the Archer, every minute of every day is a "teachable moment," and I had been reflecting on aspects of daily life long before that phrase became fashionable. Unlike so many others have been indoctrinated to do, my approach is to look at the world around me, and ask "wassup wit dat" and look for answers to explain it rather than come to the table with preconceived notions already in my head, and try to make what I see fit those "facts." I've found personally that such an approach, if nothing else, simply doesn't work. And it's served me well.

Which is more a pressing concern for our body politic – racism, or feminism? For me, the answer couldn't be cleearer. After all, it wasn't hooded Klansmen, or HBDers, or Tea Partiers, or the Rotary Club armed to the teeth with The Bell Curve, who stormed the WordPress gates. It was those who consider themselves "progressive" and who all have vaginas, who did it. And they also just so happen to be Black.

I am hoping that incidents like this will finally unite the much-beleagured "Men's Movement"; fellas, we have much bigger fish to fry here. And if we let differences in skin tone continue to divide us, then it will be as I've said in one of my final WordPress blog posts the other day, about why Black Men vote the way they do, with so very little to show for it, we will have brought it on ourselves, and will have no one to blame, but ourselves.

You have an ally in me, brothers. It's up to you, if you want to take a Black hand in friendship.

Many of you claim to be at least moderately to the Right. If that's true, then follow Fox News' example, not just over the past few weeks, but the past decade, because that's how long Juan Williams has been there. If you're truly serious about moving the ball forward, join with Brothas like me who are finding their voice and telling it like it TIZ. it isn't my skintone or my supposed "genetic inheritance" that's the problem. The problem comes from a much more pernicious source, and we all know it. And we will never mount an effective counterstrike if we remain divided. Do not let it twist your mind, gentlemen – if it can happen to me, it can happen to you.

Lastly, as we all know, it was a happy ending for Juan Williams — his firing by NPR led not only to a serious pay raise, but a full-on platform to air his views, uncensored and uncut. I think the same will be true for me — I think I'm on the cusp of something. Because when people mobilize to have your voice shut down, that means that not only have you struck a raw nerve, but that there's something there, and you need to cultivate that.

I want to thank all the well-wishers for coming out in support of me, online and especially off, and for all their help in assisting me in restoring key back postings of mine. I expect to have everything back up and running within a week or two. And when I do, it's no more Mr. Nice Guy. Now, it's ON.

Lemme tell you what I really think…

More to come – count on it

Now adjourn your asses…

Revisiting Iron John

Jack Donovan · 5 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Robert Bly's Iron John touched off a national discussion about manhood when it camped on the New York Times Best Seller list for over 60 weeks, starting in 1990. The enduring popular caricature of the "men's movement" — a bunch of guys sitting around a campfire banging on drums, trying to get in touch with their inner warrior — is likely the product of media coverage that followed in the wake of the book's success. Men's therapy groups heavily influenced by the Iron John, like the eyebrow-raising Mankind Project, continue to draw new recruits. Twenty years after its initial publication, it remains in print, and remains a relevant read for anyone trying to make sense of men's movements and men's psychology.

Iron John is peppered with meaningful insights, but it is also insufferably fruity. And therein lies the problem. But to be charitable, let's start with the insights that still ring true.

Bly opens by correctly observing that men have become soft, gentle and too eager to please women. While the less receptive, more traditional model of manhood is equated with violence, receptive manhood is rewarded in our "non-violent" post-feminist service economy. Sex realists and "game" enthusiasts today would be quick to point out that soft, "beta" men are often abandoned for harder "alphas," but it is accurate to say that society in general rewards men who behave submissively in adulthood.

[image]Bly is also spot-on in his explanation of the deterioration of relationships between young men and older men that gave men a sense of community among other men. Boys who spent time in their mother's world sooner or later learned a trade from their father and went with men to do men's work. Men's groups, compared to groups for women, have become comparatively rare and are too often subject to female supervision. Due to changing economic circumstances, young men grew up seeing their fathers leave the house to go to work every day. Young men learned to relate more to their mothers, to see their mothers as whole people, to see things from their mother's perspective. The grumpy, tired dads who came home at night became alien and suspicious. Bly writes, "one could say that many young men in the sixties tried to accept initiation from women. But only men can initiate men, as only women can initiate women." As single motherhood has increased dramatically since then, this problem has become much more acute. However, if the current mancession has a silver lining, it may be that many boys have ended up spending more time with dad than they would have otherwise during the last few years. It's conceivable that a generation of boys will grow up seeing their mothers as frazzled, career-minded shrews, while dad seems unfairly hen-pecked, easy going and fun — if a little beaten and lost. It's too soon to say.

In Bly's scenario from another era — where dad was always gone and mom was always around and the son was allied with his mother against his father — the boy also learns to see his own masculinity from a woman's perspective. This is profound and palpable in a great deal of writing about men, written by men. How many snide and dismissive editorials about men have been dashed off defensively by boys who felt alienated from or abandoned by their fathers, or who felt most allied with their mothers? These are the men, for the most part, who I think Bly is reaching out to with Iron John. It's hard to imagine men who have strong bonds with their fathers — say, men who were heavily involved in sports or some sort of hobby with dad — having this sort of overwhelming distrust of the masculine.

Iron John also touches on the importance of katabasis for men, especially for upper class, middle class, and particularly verbal, intellectual or artistic men. Katabasis is basically a period of humbling or lost status. It literally means "to go down," and it's actually a favorite theme of mine in literature and film. In Captain's Courageous, The Sea Wolf, and even Fight Club, men learn about manhood and become more grounded by losing their protected places in the world. Bly associates it with a kind of depression, and it could be a depression, but it could also be a more coincidental phenomenon that drives men downward when one would expect them to reach upward. Bly sniffs at the military often — we'll get to that – but he misses the appeal of boot camp, even the once famous allure of the French Foreign Legion. Disappear, give your identity to someone else for a while, start from the bottom. This is a guy thing. There's also an analog in some schools of martial arts, and it should be said that maybe getting in touch with one's inner man or inner warrior would be more healthily pursued in that kind of environment than in a therapy camp. Male initiation need not be so literal, so forced. If you surround yourself with men for a while and you are able to descend, be humble, and abandon your ego — it seems to happen naturally.

One of the biggest problems with Iron John is Bly's palpable resistance to allow actual warriors to embody "warriorhood" in his scheme of things. Warriors are men who make war. We don't all have to be warriors, and we can all draw inspiration from the courage and heroism required of men who hunt, fight and kill that "most dangerous game." But the story of Iron John is based on a Grimm fairy tale, and Bly will only allow fairy tale violence into his world. Iron John, who personifies Bly's "wild man" is big and hairy and scary, but at heart he is really a gentle giant, and that seems to be what the tall poet Bly believes mature men should become. There is something dishonest and ahistorical about this view of man as a misunderstood softy — like the monster from Harry and the Hendersons. In Bly's world, the boy goes into fairy tale battle, but one cannot reconcile this magic, ritual battle with the kind of Arthurian battle wherein knights are cut down "horse and man." Indeed, the majority of Bly's mythological references are strangely sanitized and benign. Homer is mentioned, but the central themes of rage, vengeance, bloodlust and the shockingly explicit gore of the Iliad are never considered. Cú Chulainn is mentioned as a mythological hero properly welcomed home — Bly is right that this is missing from modern warfare — but he fails to mention how the story celebrates the hundreds and hundreds of men the hero kills, often brutally, in battle. Bly repeats an incredibly silly maxim, "never give a sword to a man who can't dance" and this more or less captures his tone when it comes to actual warriors versus his new-agey "inner warrior." It is terrifically disrespectful, vain and solipsistic to speak of warriors but somehow claim that spoiled middle aged men in therapy know more about "true warriorhood" than actual combat soldiers do. If you want to get a sense of what it is like to be a warrior, read War by Sebastian Junger (2010, Twelve). If you want to approximate it and get in touch with your "inner warrior" without going to Afghanistan, take up a martial art and compete. If you just want to read about it and be inspired by warriors, that's OK too, but don't make yourself ridiculous by running around calling yourself a "true warrior."

This masculine tone-deafness, the reliance on a fairy tale reality, the fetishization of childlike innocence and deference to feminine imagery are problematic throughout the book. I called it insufferably fruity above, and as a writer who has been mocked for getting caught up in his own rhetoric I do not do this lightly or to make myself feel smart or witty. It's a legitimate problem, and it's part of the reason why, despite its success, the book and its message never connected with younger men or became a powerful force of lasting change. When you start going on to men about their "internal woman," their "deep masculine" and the "nourishing dark," you're really not talking to average guys any more. For Bly, male mentors can't simply be mentors or guides or surrogate fathers; they have to be "male mothers." His focus on woundology is so heavy handed that parts of the book feel like a male version of The Vagina Monologues. Bly's often overwhelming New-Ageyness is most prominent in the following passage:

> "The younger body learns at what frequency the masculine body vibrates. It begins to grasp the song that adult male cells sing, and how the charming, elegant, lonely, courageous, half-shamed male molecules dance."

After scraping the rainbows and magic dust from my eyes, I can extract something meaningful from that about young men needing to get a sense of how it feels to be a man by spending time with their elders. But c'mon, man…

Bly frames Iron John as a book primarily for men ready to do this kind of "inner work;" men around the age of 35. If you're going to really change manhood, you have to reach out to young men, too. A movement for 35 year old men has no future. Group therapy culture can't replace authentic, organic masculine experience. That's a problem I still see with the men's movement, though I think this is changing. A transformative movement that is going to appeal to young men has to have balls. Iron John contains some truth, and Bly is a natural storyteller, so the book is very well written in its own way. Bly acknowledges some of his own weaknesses and that requires a certain courage and honesty. But ultimately, Iron John offers no path to power for men. At best, it outlines a way to make peace with a wounded male soul.

By Max Stirner

The night before the antifeminist meeting last weekend, I was strolling the streets of Zurich. The Swiss women I passed by looked quite attractive and had put a lot of effort in their colourful clothing. Unlike in Germany a lot of them walked in high heels. René Kuhn, who was one of the organizers of the meeting, was famous for his remarks on Swiss liberal women who he said were "dressed like tattered scarecrows". This and other comments on his personal blog had cost him his political career in the Swiss people party SVP one year before. From my own experience I couldn't really agree with him.

Finally under a bridge leading to the Zurich lake I found the first anti-antifeminist poster.

It said: "Fight sexism together! Give the antifeminists a tooth job!", in the background of the poster was the deformed symbol of the female sex, with the upward pointing clenched fist. You will recognize the sign, once you see it. The text was rather long, first came a quote from the Swiss antifeminist website "www.antifeminismus.ch": "Feminism is an unscrupulous union of certain women with inferiority complexes, megalomania and bizarre male fantasies. It is their ideology to acquire unfair priviliges by inhuman misandry." Nice publicity, I thought. It continued with a boring part about how women are still suffering under a patriachial society.

Communists Protesting Conference

The author ranted "It would be wrong to consider this congress as a curiosity … a really strange way of thinking, considering that we still live in a patriarchal society … this movement is part of a worldwide ideological attack, selling their sexist ideas without shame as if they were a courageous truth, a long-awaited attack on feminist thought police."
In a way, the author sounded insecure, almost defensive. The phrases that were meant to attack the political enemy were turning on him. Something was happening here.

The next morning I took the tramway to the airport feeling like I was in a spy movie. As there had been violent threats from left wing extremists to sabotage the conference, the new location was kept in secret. My information was: go to Zurich Airport, 9 am, Terminal A and find a man holding up the sign "Seminar Egala". Right in the terminal I stumbled into a group of angry and sad men, that looked a lot like divorced dads. "Seminar Egala?", I asked.

After they had checked our IDs, we were taken in private cars to the new location, a hotel in the countryside.

In the car conversation soon turned on divorce and child custody. Our driver – a guy from Germany – was especially frustrated with the Swiss law, which refused him child custody for his daughter, though her mother was allegedly hanging around with drug addicts.

René Kuhn shook our hands on the parking lot, looking joyous. Two security guards were standing at the hotel entrance looking rather nervous. There were about 50 people in the entrance hall, most of them above their 40′s, I had the impression that a lot of them knew each other. One guy with funny clothes in front of me looked like a muslim. Then it dawned on me: it was “Muslim” – nickname “Muslim”, who had commented on some of my postings in the manosphere blogs.

“Hey you are Muslim!”, I shouted- “Yes I am!” came the response. But “Muslim” was not the only one that I already knew from the web. All the German-speaking bloggers were there! What an amazing event!

The official press – some snobbish reporters and a TV crew couldn’t probably figure out what this fuss was all about. Left wing demonstrations in the streets of Zurich for a bunch of frustrated dads and bloggers? More people arrived. The congress started.

René Kuhn held the first speech, and for a politician he didn’t make too much of a show of it. He said that this whole act gave them a great deal of publicity and the IGAF (interest group antifeminism) was now counting 2000 members.

This conference is directed against feminism not against women – he continued. Because feminism only wants priviliges for women on behalf of men and not true equality.

Antiago Gasco a representative from italian and spanish groups for men’s rights held a short speech. He thanked for the rebirth of the prestige, for the role and rights of men and fathers. Discrimination of men is a europe wide phenomenon.

George Zimmermann from IGM the interest group of divorced men (www.igm.ch) was next and he held a speech about the divorce and custody laws in Switzerland and the strategies of the IGM. This organisation wants to help men who have to cope from the breakup of their families. Many of the laws and court decisions a direct result of uninhibited feminist policies of the last 20 years.
Eckkard Kuhla from “Agens e.V.” Germany (www.agensev.de) talked about the balance of the sexes between men and women. Agens wants to take a stand against aggression from feminists. He claimed that antifeminism is working because we have hit a nerve. Solidarity among men is growing and 2010 is the year of change.

Before the break we heard an amusing speech from Mr. Lassahn against language manipulation by feminism, which has spread like a disease in the german speaking world, and wants to change our way of thinking.

During the lunch break I had the possibility to have some private conversation about the future of our western world.

I was often asked why a young man like me would attend this conference, not having experience one sided divorce laws. One reason is that I am deeply bored by my liberal environment and the false promises it gives me, and the utter incompetence of the liberals to reconsider their ideas. I have to admit that I also have had negative experiences with women, so I don’t fall for all the artificial holiness that ist created around the female sex. Maybe it is also because I love philosphy and theology, and I have a mental aversion to indoctrination. Finally, I am single and a beta, so I have a lot of free time to think about the world. A blogger who sat next to me claimed that “Christianity was on the rise”. Who knows? At this point I have to tell my American audience that it is pretty difficult in Europe to find someone below the age of 60 who isn’t a liberal and living in a fantasy world. So it was a real delight for me to talk to people who know what a devastating mental (and sexual) situation the west is in right now.

After the break, the vibrant Afredo Stüssi from the Men’s Party Switzerland (Männerpartei Schweiz, www.männerpartei.ch) talked about the difficult situation fathers face in Switzerland. The Men’s Party was founded because feminism no longer had anything to do with equal rights. The Men’s Party wants to organise a Europe-wide platform for the rights of fathers, and plans to take part in the Swiss national election next year.

Michael de Luigi from “Mannschaft” (www.mannschafft.ch) gave a long speech about the nature of feminism. Mannschaft helps to connect men suffering from divorce and breakup, and also gives individual advice to men. In the Swiss family law men are second class citizens: Dads are there for paying, not for education and they should disappear from the lives of their kids. Switzerland may be a democracy but it is not a state under the rule of law.

My personal highlight was of course the last speech by Michail A. Savvakis (aka Maskulist, www.maskulist.de), author of the famous book “Medusa schenkt man keine Rosen” (Don’t give roses to Medusa). Michail analyzes the sick ideology of feminism with an intellect sharp as a razor blade mixed with acid sarcasm. Which structures created feminism? Today, it is institutionalized feminism within the state that is discriminating men. Emancipation was only reserved for women, because feminism is feeding the state, while male sentiment wants to deregulate it. Therefore, the well-being of women is much more attractive for the state. Never in the history of mankind could women emancipate themselves against the will of men. By his insufficiency and dependency combined with it’s love for the state, feminism inevitably creates misandrist structures in wealthy states, which can afford the luxury of feminism. The hate of patriarchy, which is essential to feminism, is a schizoid complex which today is haunting the western world.

After the standing ovations for Michail had faded we were urged to leave. “The news that “Seminar Egala” was in reality the antifeminist conference has reached the hotel management”, somebody joked. In the meantime about 100 anti-anti-feminists had marched through downtown of Zurich, shouting and waving red flags. The hotel had kept quiet.

On the way out I noticed some very attractive women sitting in lounge chairs in the lobby chatting in Russian. They were probably friends of Mr. Kuhn’s russian wife Oxana. The collapse of the Soviet Union came to my mind. Are we now the Soviet Union and Russia the new avant garde?

Some days later I went trough the press articles about the antifeminist conference. To my surprise the resonance was overwhelmingly positive. The sad stories of the divorced dads had probably softened the hearts of the liberal press, or maybe they left too early to hear Michail’s final speech. Of course male shaming was inevitable. One headline read “From divorce laws to schools – many men feel discriminated against by women, but the helpless whining of the antifeminists leads nowhere”. But even the big left-wing German magazine “Die Zeit” wrote in a sympathetic tone. Something has happened indeed.

Women Vanishing From NY Observer

According to a recent report in The Awl, women have been dropping away from the tony New York magazine's staff, leaving an all-male staff, and only two out of thirteen outside contributors female:

> According to the paper's newly updated masthead, the paper now has nine staff writers, all of them men. (Of its non-staff "contributing writers" list of 13, two are women.) This all comes not long after the last woman editor—excluding the managing editor—quit. In the last month, one man was hired at the paper as a reporter (and he's doing good work!) and another man was promoted from within.

Not being a New Yorker or Observer reader, I don't know exactly what is going on here, but there have been some other indications recently that the female takeover of print media has finally peaked, and may be starting to reverse. In fact, print publishing has become so overwhelmingly female as of late that there has been talk of favoring men in employment. Although women do not predominate in journalism as they do in book publishing, they have made great strides recently, and have started presuming to dictate how journalists should report.

Perhaps this is finally starting to rub some people the wrong way. Just as Jon Stewart was visibly flustered by Jezebel's very personal critique, despite his support for women and feminists, it may be that men in the back rooms are starting to feel under siege by the entitlement mentality that is probably expressed in its strongest terms by female writers. From what women have been writing over the last few years, one definitely gets the sense that they feel they are in charge.

As we all know, it is a rare woman who feels that way and is also tolerable at work.

Blogging Advice (For Americans)

W.F. Price · 7 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Given Obsidian's recent disappearance from wordpress.com, I thought I ought to offer a little background and helpful advice for other US bloggers concerning how to avoid this kind of issue.

First, it's important to understand that the old rules governing print publishing still apply to online publishing. Fortunately, this being the United States, freedom of the press is one of the foremost principles of our republic, so the rules are straightforward and not very restrictive.

The most important thing to avoid is illegal content, and there are three important exceptions to our freedom to publish what we please. These consist of:

1. Copyright infringement

2. Libel

3. Child porn

For most bloggers, the main concern is copyright infringement, and it seems that this is how Obsidian lost his hosting at wordpress.com. For years now, digital media and the Internet have combined to create an anarchic environment where images and text are disseminated freely regardless of copyright status. This has created a norm wherein millions of people are frequently breaking copyright laws as a matter of habit. For the Facebook user or kid with a Myspace, friend blog or the like, nobody really cares, but if you're being read by a lot of people, and making some of them angry, there's always bound to be someone who is going to try to take you down on some technicality. What they can do is post a Digital Millennium Copyright Act takedown notice.

These are fairly easy to use as a weapon. According to Wikipedia:

> The DMCA has been criticized for making it too easy for copyright owners to encourage website owners to take down allegedly infringing content and links which may in fact not be infringing. When website owners receive a takedown notice it is in their interest not to challenge it, even if it is not clear if infringement is taking place, because if the potentially infringing content is taken down the website will not be held liable. The Electronic Frontier Foundation senior IP attorney Fred von Lohmann has said this is one of the problems with the DMCA.

So, there are some problems with DMCA, but if you take down the content at once you will not be held liable. Even so, if you are being hosted by a free blogging company such as wordpress.com or blogger, you may never receive the notice and simply wake up one day to find your blog gone.

But how do you avoid infringement in the first place? Well, you could never post any images besides those you have created yourself, but that would necessarily limit you to a much smaller pool. Fortunately, there are huge numbers of public domain and creative commons images that are free to use, or free to use with some minimal conditions, and with a little knowledge you should be able to find all you need from those.

Flickr, for example, has around 170 million images under some form of creative commons license. Most of these photos require attribution, which is accomplished by putting their name in a caption, or at the very least a link to the owner's photo, or perhaps a title that shows up on mouseover (ask a lawyer when in doubt). Anything published by the US Federal Government is public domain, so feel free to use whatever you can find from there. Good sources for public domain images can be found here.

When it comes to copyright laws, the rule of thumb should be to exercise caution and common sense. When in doubt, avoid using the content. As for text, that should be self-explanatory. Quoting text is fine, but reproducing (i.e. "copying") entire works is not. Even blog posts are protected by copyright law, so although you may quote from them, you cannot republish them without the author's consent. As to how much you reproduce, that's a matter of how you do so. Theoretically, reproducing an entire blog post in order to address every single point made with a reply of your own probably falls under fair use, because you have created an entirely new document, but if you reproduce the entire thing only to respond to one or two points it would be infringement. Therefore, try to quote only that material that is necessary to make your point.

As for libel, this is not as common as copyright infringement, but can still get someone in trouble. The key is to only make definite statements one knows to be true about another individual. For example, if you call someone accused but not convicted of rape a "rapist," that is a potentially libelous statement, because legally speaking one is only a criminal upon conviction. However, if you say, for example, that someone is a "slut," that is an opinion, and opinions are not subject to libel laws. In general, libel is difficult to prove, and libel suits are only successful where people can show some real, material loss as a result of the libel. An example of a successful libel suit is the one Steven Hatfill, who was wrongly accused of sending anthrax to various people in the wake of 9/11, launched against Vanity Fair and Reader's Digest. Despite being implicated by the NY Times as well, he lost his suit against them. Hatfill, obviously, suffered a great deal from being falsely accused. That his suits were hard-fought demonstrate just how the high the bar is set on libel suits in the US.

Child porn should be very straightforward, but unfortunately it is not. On the face of it, it should be obvious: any sexual depictions of children under the age of 18 are illegal. But what constitutes sexual is not exactly clear. Where normal people may view pictures of naked small children as no big deal, and even cute, these pictures may be construed as sexual by some people, whereas obviously sexual pictures of teens are often tolerated if they are not nude, and sometimes even if they are as long as it is called "art." The best practice is simply to ban any nudity in photos of any individual under 18 at the time the photo was taken.

Finally, keep in mind that whenever you are using a free service such as Blogger or wordpress.com you can be shut down for any reason — or none at all. You get what you pay for. Self hosting is usually a better idea if you have controversial material, and the cost is negligible. Best of all is to have your own server, but that is prohibitively expensive and technically challenging for most people.

So, for all my fellow online publishers out there, I wish you success in avoiding the censors and getting the word out to the masses. Also, if you need help setting up a self-hosted blog there are a lot of people out there willing to help, including me, so feel free to get in touch if that's something you'd like to do.

Legal Scholars Beginning to Question Civil Marriage

Civil marriage is essentially a Western innovation that arose out of European Christian society at the beginning of the modern era. In the original American colonies, it was the Puritans who first instituted the practice, beating even the British to the punch. However, it was John Calvin who, in the 16th century, first decreed that all marriages must be registered by the state.

It seems that the initial drive for civil marriage had a great deal to do with religious competition, as incipient nations in the early modern period were largely divided along religious lines (Protestant and Catholic), and forcing state approval of marriage bolstered the influence of one sect or the other. In time, it had the opposite effect, and as nationalism eclipsed religion in political influence civil marriage came to take precedence over sacramental marriage.

Despite the diminishing role of the church in marriage, which was never clearly based on scripture in any event, Christians found ways to cooperate with the state in promoting civil marriage to the profit of both. Priests and ministers continued to perform the rites, and took on certain duties such as signing marriage certificates. Importantly, churches also contributed to giving civil marriage an aura of validity that surely would have been eliminated by now without some spiritual imprimatur. Perhaps most cynically, the Catholic Church is in the annulment business, which forces Catholics to get a second divorce. Annulments are rubber-stamped, but they still cost around $500 on average — it's little more than a tax.

Although the state is the most important arbiter of what constitutes marriage today, religions are not without some influence, which is why gay marriage and polygamy are such controversial issues. This is necessarily the case when there exists a symbiotic relationship between institutions, and the institutions overwhelmingly involved in the marriage business today (in the West) are Christian churches.

So, perhaps it is no surprise that one of the more serious, learned voices emerging in opposition to civil marriage is not Christian, or even of Christian background, but rather Edward Zelinsky, a Jewish legal scholar at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law of Yeshiva University.

In a 2008 article published in the Oxford University Press's blog, Dr. Zelinsky argues that divisions in state courts concerning whether or not the state has the right to regulate relationships amongst consenting adults suggest that deregulation of marriage is the most straightforward approach to solving this problem:

> By a 4-3 vote, California's highest court has ruled that California's constitution requires the Golden State to legally recognize the unions of same-sex couples as marriages. Supporters of the court's decision hail it as a victory for equality. Opponents criticize the ruling as unwarranted judicial activism rejecting traditional morality.
> I suggest a third perspective: The California court's divided decision indicates the desirability of abolishing civil marriage. The state should not define, regulate or characterize relationships among consenting adults. By abolishing civil marriage, the law would deregulate marriage. Such deregulation would strengthen marriage as a social, cultural and religious institution while eliminating the divisiveness inherent in one definition of marriage being imposed politically upon a diverse polity.

Although Zelinsky is using the debate over gay marriage to make his point, the other, more important implications are clear:

> A world without civil marriage would still be a world with marriage. Indeed, marriage would thrive in a deregulated world. Released from a single, state-imposed definition of marriage, religious, cultural and other groups would promote their respective versions of marriage. Once the law no longer monopolizes the definition > of marriage, individuals would contract for their own versions of the institution.

> Upon the dissolution of familial relationships, the courts would be required to interpret and enforce the contracts defining those relationships. In the absence of such contracts, the courts would be required to make decisions about income, assets and minor children, just as they do today.

I doubt he would ever admit it on paper, but I am almost certain this Zelinsky fellow holds some views in common with us here at The Spearhead. In fact, I can't find one single point in his article with which I take issue.

If there is anything about Zelinsky's idea that is somewhat unsettling, it is that it would be so effective at reestablishing marriage as a cultural norm if put into practice. As I grow more and more accustomed to bachelorhood, I am finding it to be fairly agreeable in many ways, but I suppose men of my generation will never be expected to have anything resembling a normal marriage anyway, so perhaps I shouldn't worry.

Aside from Zelinsky, I was only able to identify one other legal scholar arguing for the elimination of civil marriage, a Catholic law professor named Daniel A. Crane. Crane's essay (linked below) argues from a more religious perspective than Zelinsky, comparing and contrasting Catholic, Protestant and Jewish marriage traditions, and suggests that all support privatization of marriage. Those who have a religious interest in the matter would do well to take a look at his paper, found here:

A "JUDEO-CHRISTIAN" ARGUMENT FOR PRIVATIZING MARRIAGE

I'm sure there are more out there, and it is encouraging to see that this movement is growing in academia. For those of us here with our boots on the ground it's time to start giving some serious support to this idea.

Most importantly, conservative Christians who are trying to solidify state control over marriage in order to prevent gay marriage are going to have to do a quick about face and start arguing for the abolition of civil marriage. If they feel uncomfortable with that, they should simply imagine what a liberal regime armed with greater power over "marriage" will do.

Feminists Fighting to Squelch Advance Consent

A recent case in Canada involving a couple that engaged in consensual kinky sex is testing the limits of the concept of prior consent. In the case, a man and woman had agreed to asphyxiation during sex, but when the woman was asphyxiated she says she came to and found a sex toy inserted in her anus, which she claims not to have consented to.

Initially, she did not contact police, but when a custody battle came up a couple months later she called the police and claimed she had been raped. Although she later recanted her testimony, the judge still sentenced the man to jail for having sex with an unconscious person.

However, an appeals court overturned the ruling, saying it was not sexual assault. Now, Canada's Supreme Court is considering the case, and hearing arguments from attorneys concerning the meaning of consent.

According to Joanna Birenbaum, legal director of the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, the concept of advance consent is both "dangerous and regressive." She says that consent is something that must be continuous and consciously made. So, for example, if a man and woman were having consensual sex, and the woman changed her mind and told him she wanted to stop, if he did not do so at that moment it would be rape. Consent, according to feminists, is only valid if it is revocable at any time for any reason

The Canadian Supreme Court has already ruled that there is no such thing as "implied consent," so in all likelihood the feminist standard will prevail. The next step for feminists is to introduce the concept of retroactively revocable consent, which means that if consent were based on some misunderstanding or falsehood, it can be retroactively revoked and what at first was a consensual encounter becomes rape after the fact.

The feminist goal of classifying all heterosexual sex as rape is nearing fruition. Perhaps at some point in the future, the term "sex" will no longer be used to describe coitus, but rather it will all be known as "rape," at which point all sex will be criminalized.

One interesting implication of the argument against advance consent may concern whether or not people are allowed to sign do not resuscitate orders. If, when unconscious, dying people cannot have previously consented to pulling the plug, will doing so be murder?

Men Power Conservatives to a Landslide Victory

Featured Guest · 9 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Tuesday's election marked a stunning turn-around for the Republican Party, which gained 60 new seats in the House and an six additional seats in the Senate. As much as any other demographic, it was conservative men who brought the GOP back from two dreary years in the political wilderness.

Overall, 56% of the male electorate voted Republican, compared to 49% of women, according to exit polls: http://www.cnn.com/ELECTION/2010/results/polls.main/#. While women are known to outnumber men, the 7-point gender gap was more than enough for men to leverage the GOP to a ringing victory that resonated from the coal fields of Pennsylvania to the sun-kissed beaches of Florida and the bayous of Louisiana.

The male surge was felt across all major racial/ethnic groups. Compared to 2008, the percentage of white male voters who voted Republican expanded from 54% to 63%, according to the CNN exit polls. Same with Latino men, who saw an increase from 28% to 38%. And the number of Black males swept into the GOP ranks doubled, going from 7% in 2008 to 14% in 2010.

In race after race, energized men rescued the Republican Party from its electoral doldrums.

Take Florida, where the charismatic Marco Rubio handily beat Charlie Crist. While 64% of men pulled the lever for Rubio, only 44% of women did the same, handing Rubio a unassailable 20-point gender gap advantage among men.

In New Hampshire, 65% of men supported former Attorney General Kelly Ayotte, compared to 55% of women. Thanks to the guy vote, Ayotte cruised to an easy victory over Democrat Paul Hodes.

In Pennsylvania, Republican Pat Toomey slid into a virtual tie with Democrat Joe Sestak during the final two weeks of the race. And on Tuesday, Toomey notched a 10-point advantage with the male electorate, handing him the sorely-needed victory.

In Wisconsin, men again spelled the difference. A year ago, all the pollsters were betting Sen. Russell Feingold would cruise to an easy re-election. But on Tuesday, men confounded the pundits, spotting an 8-point advantage over the ladies.

Even in races in which the Republican party did not prevail, the male vote turned what would have been a lop-sided Democratic victory into an Election Day nail-biter. In Colorado, 53% of the guys voted to return the state into the red column, compared to 39% of the gals. But in the end, Michael Bennett eked out the win over GOPer Ken Buck.

In the senatorial races in Arkansas, Illinois, and South Carolina, the female vote exerted a decisive effect for Republicans. But more often, the female electorate tended to split between the two parties, casting men as the electoral decision-maker, such as in Indiana (Dan Coats), Ohio (Rob Portman), and in innumerable House races.

The pervasive impact of men on Tuesday's election should not have come as a surprise.

This past April the Pew Research Center released a poll showing 52% of men favored cutting back government programs. No surprise, the poll also revealed 56% of males supported the goals of the Tea Party movement.

In September, Democratic pollster Celina Lake noted the 2010 elections were shaping up to be "among the bigger gender gaps we've seen." And a Marist poll found 48% of Republican men were "very enthusiastic" about voting, with 28% of Democratic women being similarly animated.

Last June I predicted that the 2010 mid-term elections were shaping up to be a "Perfect Electoral Storm" based on the male electorate's "resolute antipathy to creeping socialism."

Now all conservatives, men and women alike, need to work together to restore fiscal sanity, preserve the family, and undo the damage of the last two years.

Thoughts on Jane Austen

Last night, for the first time in my life, I picked up and read a book written by Jane Austen. Austen has quite a reputation, so I felt a little late to the party, but after reading the book – Pride and Prejudice – I understand why I never bothered before. It isn't that Austen is a bad writer, but rather that I have to exert effort to pay attention at times, because her interests are simply so divergent from mine. Where she fills in details, I am often unconcerned, and she frequently leaves out those things I would really like to know.

However, I think men who want to understand how women operate would do well to pick up the book and put some effort into finishing it. I imagine this would be particularly difficult for those of us of a technical, scientific bent, but it's worth it all the same.

Although her prose is not particularly eloquent or poetic, it is tight enough to follow and sufficiently consistent. As for the dialog, which follows the conventions of the time (early 19th century), Austen is enough of a pro to avoid sliding too far away from the common speech and straining credulity. When it comes down to it, she is a good writer, and not too frilly or flowery for a man's tastes. One common theme is that of pedantry, which Austen evidently despises. That inclination credits her, as there is nothing more difficult to read than a pedantic schoolmarm.

I haven't had time to put much deep thought into the book yet, but on first impression I see the author as fairly representative of female sensibility in general, and not a feminist by any means. In fact, if a man wrote on women in the same manner Austen does he would certainly be accused of misogyny. Some of the characters in Pride and Prejudice, such as the younger sister Lydia, the mother Mrs. Bennet and Lady Catherine De Bourgh could be drawn up directly from complaints men have made right here on The Spearhead. Women's affinity for cads and disgust for betas is out in the open — Austen is socially honest and accurate. Most of the men are sympathetic characters, and the chief villains usually female rivals. There's nothing about the book that would offend or surprise men who are aware of gender differences.

While the honesty and accuracy of her discourse on women's nature and behavior is refreshing, the primary value lies in the window her writing provides into the female mind. To me, it is with some resignation that I have to accept that it is indeed profoundly different from our own, but it is at least encouraging to realize that there is less intentional malice than one might expect from their behavior.

I'd like to go over the book again and put a bit more effort into analyzing it, because it is a very valuable resource. For now, I can tentatively state that Austen's genius lies in her remarkable ability to create an accurate portrait of the feminine with words. Her understanding of men leaves something to be desired, but perhaps that is for the best, because she may never have gone anywhere or written anything of consequence if she'd limited her attention to our sex.

Feminists Suing Over Sports Gap

W.F. Price · 10 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Irvine Unified School District is the latest target of the feminist assault on any institutions not dictating exact equality in athletics. The National Women's Law Center, wielding Title IX, has filed complaints against the school district for allegedly discriminating against girls in federally funded sports programs.

Evidently, there is a roughly 10% sports participation gap between boys and girls in the district, and, what's worse, it has even grown in recent years.

Although feminists would probably never admit it, girls simply aren't as interested in sports as boys. If they were, one might think they would have actually invented some competitive sports over the years, but I can't think of one single competitive sport created by women.

If you're interested in seeing what the National Women's Law Center is up to, check out their considerable list of Title IX complaints on their website.

Although this may seem to be an intractable problem, because feminists will never stop complaining and abusing the law to enforce equality that girls themselves do not even want, I'd like to propose a solution:

Change definition of "sports."

Make singing and dancing sports, make cheerleading a sport, and possibly even modeling and makeup application. Adding a few of the things women really like to do to the category of sports would probably more than make up for the "sports gap."

German Family Minister Slams Feminism

W.F. Price · 10 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Kristina Schröder, Germany's 33-year-old family minister, has given German feminists a collective slap across the face, dismissing their cherished wage gap as a result of personal choices and opposing affirmative action in the boardroom in a controversial interview with Spiegel.

Regarding the wage gap, this is what Schröder had to say:

> The reality looks like this: Many women like to study German and humanities; men, on the other hand, electrical engineering — and that has consequences when it comes to salaries.

Taking it a step further she drove a stake into the core of feminist doctrine:

> I don't agree with a core statement by most feminists, the statement by Simone de Beauvoir: 'One is not born a woman, one becomes one.' Even as a schoolgirl I wasn't convinced by the claim that gender has nothing to do with biology and is only shaped by one's environment.

Radical feminists immediately responded with outrage, calling the statements "crude and antiquated," and so much "nonsense."

Alice Schwarzer

One of the feminists Schröder took particular issue with, Alice Schwarzer of Emma magazine, called Schröder "a hopeless case" and suggested she was not qualified for her position.
Referring to Ms. Schwarzer, Schröder said she was a radical who had discredited herself with wild theories:

> …I found that many of her theories went too far. For example that heterosexual intercourse was barely possible without the submission of the woman. I can only say to that: Sorry, that's wrong.
> There was indeed a radical movement that argued in this way and saw being lesbian as a solution. I didn't find it very convincing that homosexuality should be the solution to the problem of women being disadvantaged.

Despite the bashing from old feminists, younger German women have voiced support for Ms. Schröder, suggesting that feminism has gone too far.

Book Review: End the Fed

Elusive Wapiti · 11 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: End the Fed[image], by Ron Paul. 210 pages.

The Gist: In this book, Representative Ron Paul details his case that the Federal Reserve Bank cartel causes more misery, suffering, and problems than it causes, and should thus be disbanded. He claims that ending the Fed "would address the most vexing problems of politics of our time", ending dollar depreciation, stripping the government of an easy ability to finance endless wars, curb attacks on civil liberties, halt debt accumulation, and arrest the expansion of the welfare state. Moreover, Paul the Elder claims that doing away with the Fed would ends the government's ability to use financial sleight of hand to underwrite its ability to expand without limit, would be a first step toward restoring constitutional government, would halt the business cycle, end inflation, would stymie the corrupt symbiotic relationship between government and "too big to fail" banks, and would end the abuse of monetary policy during political election cycles.

Key Quote: Paul cites Scripture: "You shall have just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin" (Lev 19:35-36).

On dollar depreciation, halting the business cycle, and ending inflation: Rather than be a mechanism for controlling and eliminating inflation, Paul asserts that the Fed is instead an agent of it. Take history, for instance: Paul points out that $1 in 1913 is worth five cents today; such that what once cost $1 in 1913 costs $21 in 2010, with the result that the government and the banking cartel have sapped–Paul uses the word "stolen"–$.95 of every dollar over the span of the last century. Paul also demonstrates that, when confronted with economic crisis, the very tool that administrators of the Fed use to keep the markets liquid and to keep prices up is to inflate the currency; thus, far from ending inflation, the Fed is the primary means by which inflation is injected into our economy. In addition, rather than smoothing out the business cycle, Paul claims that the Fed ensures they continue to recur. For example, the assertion that the Fed makes smoother the boom-bust pattern of the business cycle requires one to focus solely on the bust phase, where the Fed does indeed provide liquidity to keep the banks lending and the credit markets functioning. However,if one views the business cycle as one that begins during the boom phase–where easy money begats malinvestment and excess capacity–it becomes clear that the Fed creates the very problem that it later "solves".

Paul's book cites an interesting quote which I think illustrates this point quite well:

> …[the banks] actually expanded the currency by extraordinary issues, whilst there was no existing check upon them, until its depreciation was so great that speculation and overtrading in all their disastrous forms involved the country in a scene of wretchedness, from which it did not recover in ten years

Source: Raguet, Condy, A Treatise on Currency and Banking, New York, Kelly Reprints, 1967, 1840, p 156.

On central banking as a catalyst for war: With an endless money machine that provides nearly limitless funding to finance expensive military adventurism, governments are free to build up forces and wage as much expensive military aggression as they can convince the polity is reasonable. On the other hand, those governments without this easy-money option to make their money for them are forced to economize and make guns-and-butter choices. Mises in 1919:

> …one can say without exaggeration that inflation is an indispensable means of militarism. Without it, the repercussions of war on welfare become obvious much more quickly and penetratingly; war weariness would set in much earlier

As further evidence of this central banking-warfare connection, Paul cites the case of WWI, where only 21% of WWI was financed through taxation, 56% was from Fed-backed borrowing, and 23% was outright money printing. And this is on the US side; one shudders to consider the impact of central bank lending on the ability or willingness of Germany or Britain or France to wage the War to End All Wars. Furthermore, WWI, while wiping out all the old monarchies, created the Imperial America and a globalized foreign policy mission. For Russia, it meant Communism, as the war machine spurred by easy money created shortages, price controls, devastation, and social unrest that resulted in the Bolshevik revolt of 1917. None of these calamities could have been possible had the USA or other countries not had the easy money of a central bank to underwrite their military campaigns, for opposition to direct taxation on wealth naturally limits governmental adventurism.

Paul also ties the lender of last resort to a more aggressive national foreign and domestic policy, creating what he calls the "welfare-warfare state". With a central bank, countries can dream ad infinitum of ever more power, programs and ambitions. America could and did become involved in countless full-scale wars, police actions, small invasions; after each political crisis, the answer is the same as after each economic crisis: more monetary expansion, the better to "prime" the economic pump. Thus guns or butter turned into both guns and butter…with a central bank, there is no longer a need to choose between the two, and the ability of the Fed to make money is what makes this crisis-response model possible. Conversely, as long as the funding stream remained limited to what could be extracted by force from the wallets of the population, there was a natural upper limit to the power and size and scope and ambitions of the State.

I pause to offer a personal observation that the easy monetary spigot supplied by the Fed may actually result in less American military effectiveness on the battlefield and therefore more protracted wars (and needless suffering). This is because an un-mobilized society, where only the soldiers feel the pain of warfare, not the whole of the civilian population through privation and war rationing, is not as personally invested in the nation's wars, and is therefore more prone to approve the committing of forces abroad. Furthermore, such a population, thus disconnected from the ravages of warfare, is more susceptible to manipulation of public opinion by the media, a fact that Ho Chi Minh exploited during the Vietnam conflict. I suspect the advent of the all-volunteer military in the 1970s aggravates this condition.

On civil liberties and the growth of the state: It is a sort of truism in libertarian circles that when government grows, liberty necessarily suffers in a zero-sum equation. Paul subscribes to this maxim in noting that central banking tends to aggregate power toward the central government and away from the people and the States. Citing the fifth plank of the Communist Manifesto, > centralization of credit in the banks of the State, by means of a national bank with state capital and an exclusive monopoly,

Paul contends that central banks serve as a type of "backdoor economic planning", the sort of economic model which the world had the opportunity to fail spectacularly in the 1980s with the fall of the former Soviet Union. We know from the warnings of von Mises and others that centrally planned economies fail primarily because they lack a mechanism to make accurate supply and demand decisions across all points in the economy. Lacking this information, they die by suffocation, overcome by the weight of their own inefficiencies. In a similar manner, by setting interest rates low nationwide–so as to better fund the welfare-warfare state and monetize the national debt–rather than letting independent local banks set rates for local conditions, the Fed discourages savings while encouraging borrowing and consumption. This serves to create both the boom-bust business cycle and its attendant inevitable banking panics and the pretext for government to swoop in and "fix" the problem with more centralization, either with (a) more regulation (read: more power to government and more corruption), or with (b) more governmental guarantees that the public won't be harmed by institutional failures (read: more moral hazard, which leads to more crises).

In a further example of the socialist nature of central banking, Paul offers the following: with the Federal Reserve Act (FRA), Congress formed a cartel of the 12 largest banks and permitted them "to inflate the currency at will, providing for themselves and the financial system liquidity in times of need, while insulating themselves against the consequences of bad loans and overextension of credit…it was a form of financial socialism that benefitted the rich and the powerful". When things go badly, as they always will under a fractional reserve system, "they claim they provide an invaluable public service and deserve support from the public treasury", not unlike the events here in the United States over the last two years with hyperventilating demands that the public bail out the banking institutions. Or else.

The stealthy and insidious effect of central banking makes locating and fixing a culprit for mysterious yet persistent economic fragility and boom-bust cycles difficult. However, after each unnecessary yet inevitable crisis, "rogue capitalism" or the "wild west free market" is blamed for the failure. This creates the window for opportunist politicians, either benevolent or malevolent, to grow government and curb civil liberties. "Just this once," we're told; however, history tells us the "just this once" excuse is repeated over and over again, as politicians trade liberties for security in a futile effort to prevent crises from recurring. Paul notes that "pragmatism, urgency, benevolence, fairness, compromise, fear of the future, and the need for safety and security provide the moral cover for an authoritarian approach to rescuing and protecting the people" from the crises their very own government precipitated. This crisis atmosphere feeds the natural urge to merge government and business interests through which, naturally, the merchant enriches himself with public money while "serving the public good". In addition, because there is such a large (and growing) pot of money at stake, businessmen lobby legislators and regulators intensely, in order to shape legislation or rules in their favor. Quite often this hybrid public-private economy and the regulations and rules that accompany it fail to achieve their desired results; once again the "free market" is blamed (when this economy is anything but free), and the problems again become an excuse to further enlarge the government and enrich special interests. Wash. Rinse. Repeat.

On restoring constitutional government: Paul claims the Founders were clear on their intent for a central bank and paper money, having thoroughly debated and defeated both in the framing of the Constitution. Paul is equally frank in his view that the Fed is unconstitutional. In his view, the Constitution could not be more clear–no paper money, period, only gold and silver (Article 1, Section 10), and the Constitution furthermore did not and does not grant to the Federal government the power to create a central bank (those powers not specifically delegated to the Federal government are reserved for the people or the States by the Tenth Amendment). Yet how does Paul account for this seemingly blatant infraction of law? He cites the Federal government's (mis)use of the "necessary and proper" clause of the Constitution (Article 1, Section 8) and a ruling by the Marshall court–yes, that Marshall court–in McCullough v Maryland (1819), which basically means that the Fed Gov can pass and enforce any law it wants as long as it can justify it as necessary and proper in the performance of its duties. According to Paul, this SCOTUS decision set the stage for the Federal Reserve Act of 1913.

On halting the abuse of monetary policy during election cycles: It is an open secret that the Fed, despite its supposedly apolitical nature, is often quite politically activist, and its decisions to increase or shrink the money supply can make or sink presidential candidates or political parties. Furthermore, the presence of a central bank with unlimited ability to inflate becomes the central vehicle through which politicians buy votes, both of the people themselves (inflation yields the temporary illusion of prosperity…which translates into votes for the controlling faction) and for big business. "Big government breeds big corruption", as Paul notes the records set in the 2008 presidential election because the size of government was so large and, because of the depression, was only forecasted to expand quickly. There was money to be made and influence to be purchased. The central bank and its inflationary policies are also used to buy votes in another manner…from "zero liability voters" who are grateful for the bread a welfare-warfare state gives them, and from the rich, who benefit from government largesse and reap the income from usurious interest. Thus, under a central bank, both of these populations act in their own best interests, and vote for policies that serve to eat the substance out of the middle class, which finds its wealth robbed by inflation and transferred to wealthy and the poor. Paul notes that a central bank is, well, central to this wealth transference, as "transferring wealth is limited when taxes and borrowing are the only tools" available to politicians to use in their fleecing of the middle class.

I enjoyed this book thoroughly, which should come as a surprise to anyone who has previously read Rothbard and Keynes. I long ago had convinced oneself that Rothbard's Austrian conception of economics is the more correct one, even before I read his and Keynes' works. I also concur on the moral case against the Fed, considering inflation to be no different from legalized theft. The weakest part of Paul's argument was, in my opinion, the Constitutional one, for he is clearly swimming upstream against the tide of Madison's SCOTUS-approved Federalists and the very human tendency to pull power in toward the central government.

In the end, Paul sums up well the fecklessness of the Constitution in preventing the establishment and legalized larceny of the Fed, noting:

> …the Constitution itself is incapable of achieving what we would like in limiting government power, no matter how well written. The morality of the people and wisdom of our elected officials are the only things that count

In other words, when the morality of the people shifts such that they view the taking of other people's property as right and proper, no amount of legal chains will stop them. Thus the argument for ending the Fed will win the day not when the Constitutional legal case is made, but when the people decide once again that sound money is the route to prosperity, to a limited government, and that robbing their neighbors to line their own wallets is immoral.

Imaginary Mass Rape Drugging Prompts Drink Ban

W.F. Price · 11 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, Washington State governor Christine Gregoire announced a ban on the fruity, caffeinated malt liquor known as “Four Loko, ” calling the drink “a threat to the public health and safety.”

Washington follows Michigan, which banned all caffeinated alcoholic beverages last week. Several other states, including Oregon and New York, are expected to follow suit.

Four Loko comes in a roughly 24 ounce can, and contains 12% alcohol by volume, which means it contains the ethanol equivalent of roughly five ordinary lager beers.

Governor Gregoire said she was instituting the ban not only to protect young people, who are supposedly targeted by the brightly-colored cans in which Four Loko is sold, but young adults up to the age of 30 as well. Considering that Washington has seen a number of judges and other officials arrested for DUI recently, perhaps she should consider banning scotch, merlot and cabernet as well, in this case for posing a danger to public officials over the age of 40.

The Four Loko ban was precipitated by the drunken, hopped-up antics of several female Central Washington University students, who became convinced that some cabal of date rapists had spiked drinks with a rape drug, resulting in the carnage at a house party in Roslyn, Washington, where inebriated students were scattered across the yard like so many fallen soldiers.

Rather than ban these drinks, why not simply require a clearer label that includes a precise number of “units” – some standardized measurement of ethanol – so that the mathematically challenged will have a simple method whereby to meter consumption?

Feminist Amy Siskind: Trojan Horse to the Conservative Cause?

Featured Guest · 12 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Last Tuesday, 51% of the female electorate pulled the lever in favor of the GOP candidate to the U.S. House of Representatives. And for the first time in recent memory, a majority of women voted Republican.

Refusing to concede defeat, the National Organization for Women promptly instructed its members to organize. And to the Gender Guerillas, "organize" includes infiltrating the conservative ranks.

Exhibit A is Amy Siskind's recent editorial, "The Republican Party's Historic Opportunity with Women," in which she purports to offer advice to conservatives on how to attract the female vote.

But before we take a look at her manifesto – er, column – we might first ask, Who is Amy Siskind and what does she stand for?

Co-founder and president of the offbeat The New Agenda, Siskind is an unabashed proponent of abortion rights: "I am pro-choice and reproductive rights are important to me," she boasted in her August 30 Huffington Post column. So when Nancy Pelosi jettisoned insurance funding for abortion services from the health reform bill, Siskind savaged the Speaker of the House for the mortal sin of "betraying the sisterhood."

Siskind is amazingly candid in laying out her vision of a gender utopia. In her November 23, 2009 column in No Quarter, Siskind writes, "A major element in our battle for equality is getting women into positions of power. The hope is that these leaders, once in place, would promote women's issues and promote the next generation of women leaders."

None dare call that zealotry?

Siskind is clearly bewildered by female politicians like Sarah Palin who have not attained true feminist class consciousness. But in the end she counsels her readers that "Republican Women are not the enemy."

So if making-nice with conservative females represents an uneasy but necessary compromise, exactly who is the enemy? "Republican men running against Democratic women," we surmise from her Huffington Post essay.

So what's wrong with Siskind's "The Republican Party's Historic Opportunity with Women" column?

Well, let's start with her creative re-imagining of history.

In her opening paragraph, Siskind proffers this remarkable claim: "For the first time, women voters preferred the GOP."

Well, I guess that's right if we ignore the 1980 elections in which 46% of women voted for Ronald Reagan and 45% chose Jimmy Carter. And according to political scientist Jo Freeman, women favored the Republican candidate in every presidential contest from the passage of the 19th Amendment in 1920 until 1980.

How's that for striking out on the electoral Truth-O-Meter?

These factual errors quickly morph into a comical propaganda routine with Siskind's assertion that "women voters have decided almost every presidential election since 1960."

Not so fast, according to David Paul Kuhn, who wrote in The Neglected Voter that white males were the pivotal factor behind GOP wins in five out of the previous seven presidential campaigns. And not true, insists former Brandeis University professor Linda Hirshman who remarks, "With the possible exception of 1996, women have never voted a candidate into the White House when men thought the other guy should win."

Then the article draws inspiration from the Tinfoil Hat crowd, claiming that as of 2008, "gender equality was no longer a core tenet of the [Democratic National Committee]." This statement is so mirth-provoking that I won't devote editorial space to refuting it, except to refer the reader to a column I wrote earlier this year: http://www.renewamerica.com/columns/roberts/100401

Siskind can't resist taking a couple cheap shots, calling the GOP "a bunch of white guys fighting it out for power." Then she berates Rep. John Boehner for "surround[ing] himself with a bunch of white guys, taking his party backwards."

If that wasn't enough, this past Friday Siskind's organization issued a breathless alert, "How Women Held Their Own on Election Day." Since women had voted equally for the two parties, Ms. Siskind goaded her readers — with bolded emphasis in the original, "now BOTH parties will fight for women's voters!"

Siskind wrapped up the alert by issuing a feisty challenge to Democrats and Republicans alike: "We say: let the bidding war begin!"

Three days later, Amy Siskind published the factually-challenged column outlining her vision of a gynocentric social dystopia.

So don't be surprised if other feminists come along in the weeks and months ahead, claiming to enlighten knuckle-dragging white-guys on what it means to be a card-carrying conservative.

The Elevator Speech

By Solomon II

In my professional world, we often help clients by designing interactive programs which seamlessly integrate with their overall corporate messaging. Taking a "one voice" approach to all their marketing efforts takes time and money, but in the end, the cohesiveness of their external communication builds familiarity and brand awareness among the target clientele.

[image]Often the most difficult part of this process is coming up with what we call an "elevator speech". The theory here is to come up with a terse yet educational response to a potential client when he asks "So, what do you do?" and you only have 90 seconds between a few floors to make your pitch. Conveying the scope and purpose of a company including end user benefits in a memorable way in less than 90 seconds can be a daunting task.

The situation is similar in the Manosphere. All too often I find myself talking with a friend or coworker out on a show site somewhere about their interaction with women, and it's hard to give them advice or convey the lessons I've learned without needing a formal hour long presentation. How do you explain female hypergamy, the rationalization hamster, and a host of other concepts during casual conversation with some guy who just wants to lament about his wife or girlfriend?

Those of us who write and read these blogs are no smarter than the average man. The only thing that gives us a leg up in the dating and marriage arena is the fact that we take what most men intrinsically know and give it proper terminology. We then use that terminology to define a situation and react accordingly using proven strategies. I guess what I'm getting at is that while most men are busy ranting A, B, C, D, E, F, G… we quickly assess the situation, call it the alphabet, and keep on moving.

It pains me to sit and listen to an otherwise educated a man say "It's like, I don't know, man. I mean, sometimes I just think that… well, I want to say something, but I'm not sure what she's thinking, so… I… I don't know, man. I can't figure her out." I do my best to help by listening and giving targeted advice, but often I simply don't have the time to help a man understand and accept what he already knows. I can't simply look at a friend or coworker and say "Her clock is ticking and you're a willing Beta, but her hypergamous nature is causing her to struggle between settling for you and taking one last ride on the Alpha cock carousel. Her rationalization hamster will allow her to do both without guilt, and when she's done she'll undoubtedly blame you for putting her in a position to have to choose in the first place. In the end, you'll be showered with shaming language if you refuse to accept responsibility for her actions."

We need an elevator speech. A quick summation of basic points to get these guys started down the road to enlightenment. Something to pique their interest and get them interested in researching ways to improve their married or dating lives.

Although it would be impossible to condense everything a man needs to know in to one 90 second sound bite, we need to start somewhere. I've been wondering what I would say to an 18 year old Solomon II if I had the chance to go back in time and speak with him for only 90 seconds. Of course, I'm sure 18 year old S2 would tell me to go fuck myself, but for the purpose of illustration, let's assume the little asshole would listen. I think the one 90 second elevator speech that would have helped me the most is:

"There are no good women, and there are no bad women. There are just women. Women do what they want when they want and justify their actions later. That's why it's important to find a woman of character who is naturally inclined to do the things which are wholesome, respectful, productive, and conducive to rearing the offspring produced by your potential union.

A woman's character is of utmost importance. A woman's past actions matter. In fact, her past matters more than anything else because it reveals the character she developed during her impressionable years. A woman may change what she does, but she can't change who she is or repair her reputation. Like hot or cold water eventually comes back to room temperature when no external forces are present, so a woman returns to her base character level when no external forces are present. If you choose to be a woman's external force in order to exact a temperature change within her, don't be surprised when she reverts to her room temperature character the moment you're not around.

What defines a woman of good character varies from man to man. Know which character traits are important to you. Study to learn the signs of these traits, and study harder to learn how manipulative women mimic these traits when they are not in possession of them. Judge harshly and without apology. Recognize flaws within yourself and actively work to right them, but never let a woman convince you to consider your own personal flaws as a valid reason to overlook hers.

Recognize, protect, and celebrate a woman of good character, for she is exceedingly rare. Recognize, expose, and shame a woman of low character for she is a parasite driven by consumption and will kill her host. Above all, know that a woman of character and a woman of risible morals are often indistinguishable at first glance. Only the erudite man committed to attaining the knowledge and skills to determine one from the other stands a chance of reaching his full potential."

At least a few of the major topics are covered: Virgin/Whore Syndrome and the Rationalization Hamster in paragraph 1, Double Standards and White Knighting in paragraph 2, Shaming Language in paragraph 3, and Snowflaking in paragraph 4.

Whether or not this is an acceptable elevator speech is debatable, but at least it's a start. It's not too offensive, and outside of the workplace, it shouldn't set off too many alarms with the PC police. You can even express this viewpoint around women since the majority of them would undoubtedly agree – what with each and every single one of them being perfect and blameless women of impeccable character.

Simple bitches.

American Woman Named “King” in African Fishing Village

A large, 57-year-old American woman has been named “king” of a fishing village in the nation of Ghana, which is on the West African coast next to Côte d’Ivoire and Togo. Formerly known as Peggielene Bartels, she has taken the title of Nana Amuah-Afenyi VI, but is commonly called “King Peggy.”

King Peggy started working as a secretary in Ghana’s Embassy in Washington back in the 1970s, and when the villagers decided to name her king she was originally reluctant, as she wasn’t sure there was enough money in it for her. However, donations from nearby Baptist congregations helped her make up her mind, and now she is starting to enjoy the authority:

> The women are so happy for me, they are really on my side… But it’s only a few elderly men — because they are used to bossing females around. And I don’t give them the chance. They are the people resisting me.
> [they say] ‘Listen you’re a woman, so you listen to us.’ Then I also say, ‘I’m in the States, I’m a woman and, in the rituals with the ancestors, you chose me in the name of God, so shut up and sit down.’ And they will sit.

Given that Africa is largely patriarchal, it may seem strange that the villagers chose a woman for their king. However, one has to look at this choice from the African perspective.

Ms. Bartels works closely with the US Department of State, probably has friends in the UN, and almost certainly has connections that none of the other villagers can match. Furthermore, what Africans know about American foreign policy is that a woman is in charge – Hillary Clinton – and women’s issues are commonly given more weight than anything else, especially where small, poor countries that pose no military threat are concerned. Africans probably think that there is nothing that matters to Americans more than women, so some clever village elders came up with the idea of a female king to get more attention and foreign aid thrown in their direction.

In a calculated move, they therefore installed an American woman as “king,” knowing that she would spend most of her time in the US lobbying for aid anyway, which leaves the old men in charge back home.

We Americans can learn a fair amount about our own country simply by observing how the outside world chooses to deal with us.

An Empty Stomach

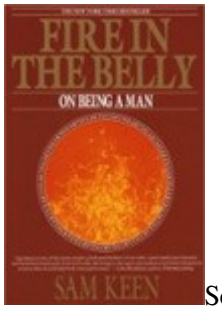
Sam Keen's Fire in the Belly, like Robert Bly's Iron John, is around twenty years old this year. It remains in print, and remains on the very short list of "men's studies" books written by men who don't identify themselves explicitly as pro-feminist – though like Iron John, Fire in the Belly is far more friendly to feminism than many feminists would like to admit. Keen differentiates between two kinds of feminism, what he calls "prophetic" and "ideological" feminism. He feels that the difference between them is "largely a matter of mood, tone of voice, focus, emphasis, feeling-tone." Ideological feminism, for Keen, is about blaming, scapegoating and maintaining a state of total war between the sexes; it's what others have called "female supremacism."



Some of the most helpful messages Keen imparts have to do with female power and the way that an internalized, idealized "WOMAN" can keep men in thrall. His estimation of this power is sometimes dead on, but at other times so overblown and mythic that it evokes Camille Paglia's work. The best advice he gives comes in a recounted story from his youth, wherein a man tells him that:

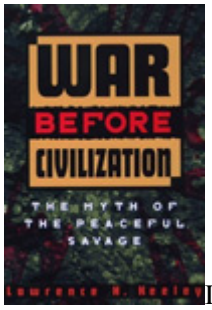
> "there are two questions a man must ask himself: The first is 'Where am I going?' and the second is 'Who will go with me?' If you ever get these questions in the wrong order you are in trouble."

This much is true. If a man doesn't know who he is, and he looks to a woman to complete and define him, she will inevitably walk all over him and will probably never respect him. A man who looks for a mother will probably find one, and she will treat him like a little boy. Like Bly, Keen believes manhood requires a move away from the world of women. Keen wants men to spend time in the world of men and define themselves as men and as individuals before they can truly love an ordinary woman. This is probably a good idea, but it also has an upper-middle class air of self-indulgent escapism about it. Life requires most men to get to work. This pre-marriage escapism would have to occur at roughly the same age when men would theoretically be starting careers and families. To what ripe old age can a viable civilization afford to extend adolescence?

The notion of "prophetic feminism" flows from Keen's vision for the future. Keen believes that we "urgently need new visions of manhood and womanhood," and that "as men, our challenge is to grow beyond the myth of war and the warrior psyche and to create a new form of ecological economics that will preserve the earth household." Although he doesn't always seem sold on the idea himself, Keen envisions a peaceful future where men and women coexist harmoniously and men become "fierce gentlemen" whose manhood is defined by their commitment to certain "vocational passion" and a set of values and morals. It is because of his "gentle and earthy" vision of the future that the book becomes less about manhood and more about adapting the culture of men to serve his own philosophical and political ideals. In this, Keen shares much in common with feminists, who also believe men must change to accommodate their comparably gilded and utopian future of gender-neutral peace and prosperity. If "ideological" feminists were able to put aside their parochial refusal to allow men to have any distinct and meaningful gender identity of their own, they'd be passing Fire in the Belly out to all of the males in their lives.

The first problem with Keen's idea of where men are going is his unlikely interpretation of where they've been. Keen, like many of his contemporaries, believes that early humans were relatively peaceful goddess-worshippers. He blames much of the current state of masculinity on traits that were necessary to maintain the "warfare system."

While it is very reasonable to suggest that culturally constructed aspects of masculinity help to prepare men for the stress of combat and associated trauma, the notion that early humans lived in relative peace and harmony is not supported by evidence. In War Before Civilization: The Myth of the Peaceful Savage, anthropologist Lawrence H. Keeley makes a convincing case — using both archeological evidence from thousands of years ago and accounts from recent tribal societies — that early humans not only made war, but that they were also pretty darn good at it. Primitive peoples generally engaged in guerilla style warfare and wars of attrition that were often devastating to their comparatively small populations.



In a particularly striking disparity, Keen mentions the Tahitians as people who "encourage men to be gentle, easy, graceful, generous to strangers, slow to take offense, and unconcerned with defending masculine 'honor'." (Even Keen admits that people like this are rare.) Keeley, on the other hand, notes that:

> "In Tahiti, a victorious warrior, given the opportunity, would pound his vanquished foe's corpse flat with his heavy war club, cut a slit through the well-crushed victim, and don him as a trophy poncho."

Grisly examples, based on hard archaeological evidence (like mass graves, decapitated heads, arrowheads in skulls, etc.) abound in War Before Civilization, and Keeley convincingly explains why some of his predecessors chose to de-emphasize this evidence and "pacify the past." Keeley is careful to remind readers that humans are not necessarily destined to be warlike simply because peace between humans has been rare, but that lying about the past isn't the way to solve problems in the present. However, in light of evidence provided by Keeley, a good chunk of Keen's storyline about how the warfare system corrupted men and masculinity caves in on itself. Humans are violent for approximately the same reasons they've always been violent. For another outstanding refutation of the noble savage mythos, see Steven Pinker's The Blank Slate: The Modern Denial of Human Nature.

The second problem with Keen's call to reimagine a kinder, gentler, earthier man is that it fails to acknowledge the hard realities of cultural and demographic competition. This "reimagining masculinity" is, for the most part, a SWPL meme. The idea that well-off, highly educated, completely protected Westerners can set the moral bar for the world and that everyone else will leap to follow them is a hubristic fantasy. Asians and swarthier folk aren't moved by the same guilt complexes (after all, according to the SWPL belief system, they didn't ruin the planet and everything else). As Keen's fierce gentlemen belly-ache about violence and social justice, hold spirited debates, buy recycled toilet paper and explore their personal woundologies — a poor kid in the ghetto is getting jumped into a gang, and that kid is going to rob his remodeled urban homestead and rape his narcissistic vegetarian wife. Both Keeley and Keen's peaceable solutions, if put into practice on Earth, would require one world government and the forced redistribution of wealth by a near police state. The truth is that not everyone is going to sit around having spirited debates. The people who enjoy that have a natural aptitude for it. Not everyone is burning to explore their individuality and inner creativity. (Most people aren't that creative or interesting.) Someone is still going to have to scrub the toilets and mow the lawns and build the buildings, and those people are going to want the same things average people have always wanted: food, shelter, stuff, entertainment and sex. The calm and sober delights of pampered patrician philosophers do not necessarily appeal to the conflict hungry, reality TV-loving rabble. As Gracchus said in Gladiator, "The beating heart of Rome is not the marble of the senate; it's the sand of the coliseum."

Like all books explicitly about manhood, Fire in the Belly is really a philosophical treatise. The question "what kind of man shall I be" is a highly philosophical question, and your answer is going to draw on some of your most basic assumptions about the human nature, politics, ethics and what makes life worth living. Keen is an engaging if sometimes uncomfortably confessional writer, but to sign on to his program, you have to agree that the world he envisions is possible and desirable. Twenty years on, it seems neither.

Football and Domestic Violence Programming

I watch football from time to time, especially when the kids are here and it's a typical fall weekend in Seattle, where the sky is dark and gray and the playgrounds muddy and cold. For me it's a little relief from supervising the kids and cleaning up after them, and a bit of an excuse to just sit down for a while.

However, lately I've noticed that following every game the local FOX affiliate is showing a "most wanted" series that features almost exclusively guys wanted for some scuffle with a girlfriend. In tough tones the narrator excoriates these vile thugs for allegedly smacking innocent little angels, and demands that we identify them and help throw them in prison for their heinous crimes. In most cases, the guys are convicted felons, which explains how they ended up on the most wanted list, but the crimes they have been accused of hardly rise to the level of psycho killer or bank robber.

For example, first featured after last Sunday's game was Kimo Warren, a young dandy and convicted felon who allegedly pushed his girlfriend, threw a lamp, and threw a drink at her. He also allegedly pushed the woman's son down, for which I definitely think he ought to do some time (if my ex's boyfriend ever laid a hand on my son I'd want him in jail), but even if it's all true it's fairly run-of-the-mill DV, which happens every day all over the place.

Next came Travis Jackson, another felon, who is accused of punching, kicking and choking his ex-girlfriend while she was holding her two-year-old. Sounds pretty serious, but this is an accusation, not a conviction.

Finally, a Samoan named Steven Faausu was simply described as an "accused woman abuser" who is wanted for second degree DV assault.

Chances are that the guys are guilty of something — the only non-felon among them has obvious gang tattoos and looks like a low-life, but aren't these single mothers complicit as well? What kind of a mother brings a criminal into her home with her child? Sure, arrest the guys if they are criminals, but why not seize the children and return them to their father, assuming he isn't in prison? Obviously, the kids would be safer with him than with some trashy slut who runs around with criminals.

That this follows a football game, which is a male recreational activity, strikes me as fairly tasteless. It would be like airing photos of prostitutes after an episode of Mad Men and demanding that the female viewers help track them down and lock them up. I seriously doubt that most male football fans want to be treated to heavy handed "lock 'em up" programs right after watching something they enjoy. In fact, I doubt that football players themselves very much like it, considering how often they are accused of and arrested for domestic violence.

Although I'm not one to indulge in conspiracy theories very often, I think there must be something more than simple coincidence to this choice in programming. That the wanted men profiled after football games are mainly DV suspects, when this category is a minority of all wanted men in the state, suggests to me that the NFL may have made some kind of deal with feminists, who have been targeting football for some time.

This year we've had the pink ribbon campaign, which features players wearing pink, the incident with the slutty Mexican reporter in the Jets' locker room for which the Jets were forced to apologize, the Brett Favre sexting incident, and lingering claims of sexual assault perpetrated by players. In the past, feminists have (falsely) claimed that the Superbowl is a time of unprecedented wife-beating, and they are currently attempting to find some angle to leverage something out of the NFL.

My bet is that the Orwellian post-game demands that we men go out and kick the crap out of accused DV perps is some kind of concession the NFL has worked out with feminists. They are balancing the male programming of football with something that makes feminists feel warm and fuzzy inside, namely the imprisonment of men. Feminism has become so shrill, so overwhelming, that it's shoved in guys' faces even when they just want to sit down and watch a ball game. How much worse can it get?

Liberal Judaism Becoming Female Ghetto

W.F. Price · 15 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The disappearance of young men from America's church pews has been ongoing for some time now, but recent reports indicate that it is not only Christian denominations that are losing males due to a new, feminist orientation, but the more liberal Jewish sects – Reform and Conservative Judaism – as well.

Young Jewish men and adolescents complain of indoctrination and a stifling atmosphere at the activities organized by their synagogues, and are voting with their feet by leaving at the first opportunity.

Orthodox Judaism, which has so far successfully resisted feminist encroachments, is notable for not having this problem.

Jewish boys are opting out of leadership programs, which are becoming almost exclusively female:

> Jewish programs training the next generation of Jewish leaders are seeing the impact. According to a new study by the not-for-profit organization Moving Traditions, "Engaging Jewish Teenage Boys: A Call to Action," of the 15 interns enrolled in Hillel's Tzedek advocacy program six years ago, there were no young men. The following year, just two of the 14 interns were men. That same program year, 2005–06, the organization Avodah: The Jewish Service Corps enrolled nearly six times as many young women as it did men. And the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion has seen a steady decline in the rates of young men applying to become rabbis.

In fact, as the article points out, barely a third of new rabbis in liberal sects are male:

> In May 2006, HUC-JIR's Los Angeles campus ordained 14 new rabbis. Only four were men, and of the 20 new rabbis ordained at its New York campus, just seven were men. With some fluctuation, the paucity of men has remained among the New York campus's ordinees. In 2009, 43 rabbis were ordained there. Just 13 of them were men. In 2010, of the 44 new rabbis, 16 were men.

In order to bring boys back in the fold, some congregations are advocating mimicking Orthodox institutions, which have always had exclusively male spaces. The liberal sects, on the other hand, have created a great number of exclusively female spaces and programs while neglecting to provide anything for boys.

According to one young Jewish man who left his congregation:

> At day school there was such a focus on female discovery of spiritual self rather than a focus of male discovery of self. I felt as though I was neglected in terms of being able to grow spiritually.

What's in a Name?

Thag Jones · 15 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Thag Jones writes The Forgetful Muse blog

Here we have another take on "reinventing masculinity" via naming baby boys in more gender neutral ways. It would be bad enough if this were some "single mom by choice" phenomenon, but this is what one father had to say:

> "Naming your kid Hunter or Breaker is like saying f–k you to the world that invented feminism," said Richmond. "It's a desperate cry to hold onto an archaic and useless form of masculinity, whereas naming your kid Robert III after your grandfather who invented the flyswatter and bought the house in Newport is a very different kind of holding onto an outmoded form of masculinity."

No, this is about using your child to make a quasi-political statement. Saying that some "form" of masculinity is outmoded assumes of course that masculinity is a social construct, as these feminists assume about all sexuality (sorry, I refuse to use the term "gender," a grammatical term, because a bunch of idiots don't know the difference between "sex" and "sexual intercourse," being of rather coarse minds as they are). Evo-psych is also "outmoded" to these people, as if everything that makes us human is subject to the whims of ideology and politics.

Who chooses a name for their child like this? One mother says she's "trying to teach [her] sons you don't have to be so traditional, to reflect more of a global culture, to open them up to different family structures and different orientations," which begs the question, can't these people do anything without "trying to teach" some politically correct dogma? Do they not realize this is a kind of indoctrination, that which they tend to be so up in arms against when it's something they aren't so keen on, like God or teaching a young person the proper use of firearms? She goes on to say that she "wanted to imbue [her] sons with feminist values" so heck, why not just call him Sue? I doubt it would end up like the old days, because everyone is too pussified to make fun of a boy named Sue anymore.

Perhaps it's a matter of taste, but I cringe at names like "Braylen" and "Paxton" (sounds like medication, which might be what these parents need). I know if I were to be naming a son, I would be choosing something from that first list of the past century that sound like men's names, not something you'd name a poodle. I almost can't bring myself to comment on the fact that the most popular name, Cullen, comes directly from some awful fem-porn. Imagine if men started naming their daughters Candy, after Candy Samples. Of course, there is no male equivalent to this female desire to castrate men, so the comparison is only slightly amusing, but the point is that one has to wonder where this will end up. What's in a name? Does a rose by any other name smell as sweet? I don't know, but I do know that these names are pretty awful and decidedly unmanly, but then, I suppose that's their point.

Dutch Women: Less Work, Less Pay, More Happiness

Not long ago, the UN concluded that something must be amiss in the progressive, woman friendly Netherlands. The problem was that the "pay gap" was one of the largest in Europe, and women were working far fewer hours than men. So, to find out whether dastardly men might be behind the oppression of the Dutch women, a study was commissioned and launched in 2009 to determine what nefarious patriarchal influence was at work.

As it turned out, Dutch women rather enjoyed not working all the time, and only 4% of them actually wanted more hours or responsibilities in the workplace. Instead of more work, what most of them wanted was some assurance that they wouldn't be forced to work full-time. The study ultimately concluded that attempts to force more Dutch women into the workplace were doomed to failure, because "the women themselves and their partners and employers are satisfied with the Dutch part-time culture for women."

In stark contrast to the US, where women demand more hours, more responsibilities and greater power and control over men in the workplace and out, Dutch women prefer leaving work early, having coffee, spending time with the kids and socializing with friends and neighbors. In their spare time they garden, ride their bicycles, play with children, exercise and read.

The result is that Dutch women are happier, healthier and more attractive than American women, and they are perfectly content to leave the drudgery of salary and wage work mainly to men.

Seeing the stark contrast between American and Dutch attitudes toward work and the steady decline in American women's satisfaction and happiness, one wonders whether American-style feminism isn't headed for self-destruction. There is evidence that stressed out American women are developing coronary artery disease at higher rates, their relationships with their children are suffering, and their reputation at home and abroad is markedly unfavorable.

Perhaps American men could take some solace in the idea that while women are slowly seizing control and taking over all they can in society, we men may finally have the time to focus a little bit on our own lives. Unfortunately, it probably isn't going to work out that way, because no matter how much money, power and responsibility American women have, they are always going to demand more from men. In fact, the more they earn and the higher their own position, the more they expect from the men around them. Doesn't matter if it's unrealistic — that's just the way women are.

If things are to change, we need to stop pushing girls into unnatural roles and telling them from a young age that they can and should "do anything." Not only is this a lie, but girls aim to please, and giving them the idea that they must be ambitious, hard-driving careerists when they are young is only going to have negative implications for both men and women further down the path.

Title IX in Action

What Happens When You Call the Cops to "Help" a Man

W.F. Price · 17 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Brian Aitken, a young Colorado man who was moving to New Jersey to be closer to his children, owned several guns, which is fairly common in western states. He knew that New Jersey had stringent gun laws, so he took every precaution in an attempt to avoid running afoul of the law. He called the New Jersey state police for information, printed out New Jersey's gun laws, and stored them according to the law.

As in often the case in divorces, Brian's ex-wife played the typical game of withholding the children, upsetting him greatly. When the despondent young man visited his parents, who also lived in New Jersey, to pick up belongings and move them to his new apartment, his mother became worried about his mental state. So, like your typical American woman does when she is worried about a man, she called the cops.

Police called Brian on his cell phone and convinced him to return to his parents house, where they determined that, although he was not a threat, his car should be searched anyway. It is likely his mother had mentioned the guns, and the call was classified as a "domestic disturbance." As we know, police take domestic disturbance calls very seriously, because feminist family law has made them very dangerous affairs that frequently result in killings, and sometimes dead cops.

For some reason, Mr. Aitken consented to the search, and police found his locked, unloaded guns stored in the trunk as demanded by NJ law. Probably to avoid taking any chances, the cops arrested him, upon which he was charged with illegal gun possession, a serious felony in New Jersey. Unless you can prove that the gun is possessed for a fairly narrow range of activities, you are presumed to be in violation of the law.

Unfortunately for Mr. Aitken, the judge who presided over his case, James Morley, was the "progressive" equivalent of a hanging judge. Divorced fathers are often well-acquainted with these types. They have a burning hatred for young men, are sadists, and enjoy sending fathers to prison on any technicality they can find, especially when an ex wife or girlfriend is involved in even a tangential manner. Judge Morley effectively handcuffed Aitken's defense by refusing their attempts to present the exceptions allowed under New Jersey's gun possession statute as a defense. He claimed they were irrelevant, but Aitken's defense attorney is adamant that they were not.

Although the jury tried hard to find some way to exonerate the defendant, the judge's instructions were clear, and they were essentially ordered to convict the man. Now Aitken is facing seven years in state prison – seven years away from his children – thanks to his mother and his ex-wife.

About a year ago in Seattle, a young man's relative called the police because he was "despondent." He was in fact upset, because his wife had just died and he was alone with a baby. Police arrived on the scene, and when he refused to open the door determined that he was holding his child "hostage," and shot him in the face through a window. They later reported that he was threatening to kill the child and had a shotgun. In fact, there was an inoperable, unloaded shotgun in the closet, and he denies ever saying he would hurt his son. I wonder how that relative feels about "helping" the young man now? He lived, but is in constant pain and has trouble eating solid food, having had half of his jaw shattered by the .40 caliber slug that slammed into his face.

Americans have to realize that cops are not paid to "help people." Sometimes they do, but that is not their job, and with some justification they tend to view a distressed man as a threat rather than someone in need of help. A cop's job is to enforce the law and keep himself safe while doing so. This does not involve counseling, helping people, or even being nice — that's all up to the individual officer.

Although women frequently call the police on their husbands, somehow it seems even worse when they do it to their own sons. That American women so casually set the state's enforcers on men says something very disgusting about them, but I can think of little more contemptible than a woman who would do that to her own child.

Senate Republicans Block Paycheck Fairness Act

The Paycheck Fairness Act, a bill designed to favor women in the workplace by giving them yet another weapon with which to extort money from businesses and employers, was held up by Republicans in the Senate, who managed to hold the Democrats to fewer than the needed 60 votes to pass the legislation.

President Obama expressed deep disappointment over the failure of the bill, saying that it would have ensured that American women didn't bring home smaller paychecks to their families as "we emerge from one of the worst recessions in history." The fact that the recession has affected mainly men and their paychecks didn't seem to concern the president.

Republicans, as usual, were not concerned with men, but rather the effect the bill might have on businesses, which would be vulnerable to legal broadsides from disgruntled female employees and their attorneys, as the burden of proof that they are not "discriminating" against women would fall on them, and limits on damage awards would be removed.

Some Perspective on Police

There's a lot of anger out there at police officers. It comes from every different angle, so you'll find it on left-wing, right-wing and even moderate online discussions. Lower and working classes often resent the police, while those with money and power look down on them and treat them with contempt. People expect cops to keep them safe and help them when they need it, but they wax indignant when cited for an infraction or arrested for something like smoking a joint.

When I was a kid, I was afraid of the police, probably for good reason. Teens are prone to mischief and therefore are frequently disciplined by cops. I remember once riding around with my high school friends, the car stuffed full of kids, some intoxicated, and seeing a cop turn a corner somewhere behind me. I knew he was coming after us, so I quickly made a right into a dark neighborhood street, pulled over and got out of the car before he could turn and light us up. He knew the trick (avoiding a traffic stop by pulling over and getting out before he could turn on the lights and make a stop), so was pretty ticked off and gave us some rough treatment, yelling at us and making us put our hands on the hood. I was lucky I pulled it, though, because it turned out one of the kids had an open bottle of tequila in the car. I didn't know about that, but legally speaking it would have been my fault anyway, and I could have lost my license.

The angry cop shone his light in the car, pulled out the tequila, and yelled "what's this?" I just about crapped my pants, but his attention turned to the culprit, who was so stoned he was barely intelligible. The cop uncorked the bottle and dumped its contents on the ground while giving us a stern look, then pulled a bag of weed out of my stoned acquaintance's pocket and threw him in the back of the squad car. After looking at our IDs and generally scaring the daylights out of us, he pulled the stoner out of the car and with a mean, serious look he gave us all a warning calculated to make an impression:

"If I ever catch you little shits screwing around again you'll wish you'd never been born. Now get the hell out of here!"

We left, chastised and resentful. Man were we pissed off at those nasty cops! "What a big, mean bully," we exclaimed.

In retrospect, though, the guy did us all a favor. He could have been perfectly respectful and polite and courteous and professional — and arrested us. Instead, he gave us the third degree, scared us, and let us go. He did us a favor and taught us a lesson.

We live in a society where expressions of masculinity and the use of force have been delegated almost entirely to police. This is state aggrandizement of power, and it's incredibly frustrating for a great many people, including schoolteachers, parents, and, surprisingly enough, the police themselves. Do cops really want to have to discipline boys whose fathers are not there to do the job? Do they want to have to deal with kids misbehaving in school because teachers are not allowed to even restrain an out-of-control kid? Do they actually like stepping between drunk lovers who are throwing dishes and food at each other?

I don't think so, but the law has made these things their job. Most cops want to chase down thieves and muggers, catch bank robbers, and lock up killers. Sure, traffic duty is a given, but all the other stuff that's been heaped on them makes for a pretty full plate. It also makes people angry at them. But this anger is misplaced.

Who really is responsible for putting police in our living rooms, our classrooms and even our bedrooms? Who puts the cops between fathers and children? Well, if you've done your reading it's pretty clear: special interest groups – largely feminists – and their legal industry allies.

Finally, does anyone really believe that cops have it easier than the rest of us in their own personal lives? Divorce is sky-high for public servants such as police and firefighters, partly because divorcing wives have guaranteed access to benefits and generous support from anyone working a government job. Some police are so thoroughly impoverished by their divorces that they have to sleep at the station and take on a great deal of overtime. Police are routinely accused of domestic violence (here's a site dedicated to helping women go after cops), made out to be tyrants in court by their wives, and personally trashed and humiliated in the proceedings. A cop I know personally can hardly stand his wife but is terrified by the prospect of divorce.

So rather than dump on the cops who have been thrown in the middle of all this, a far better solution would be simply lighten cops' load by giving them a new set of priorities, namely catching crooks and keeping order on the street. Just empowering them to arrest women who make false accusations would significantly ease their burdens — police are often specifically ordered not to do so because it would "discourage real victims." This is garbage; all it does is encourage more false reports. Another important step is removing the entanglements between civil and criminal law that have grown like a climbing weed on the lattice of family law. When people have a financial incentive to get the police involved, some will most certainly do so. Remove that incentive, and the abuse of policing by citizens will definitely decline.

There are many reforms that should be undertaken, but in trying to solve the problems we currently face we have to avoid letting our emotions take over. It's easy to direct one's anger toward the most obvious, and that tends to be the flashing lights, uniforms and guns. But that's exactly what the people directing this lousy policy want. They'd far prefer we fight it out with the cops in the streets to us actually holding the real decision makers accountable and working effectively for change.

In the US, 39% Believe Marriage is Obsolete

zed · 19 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Hardly a week goes by these days without the lame-stream media trumpeting some measure which indicates that marriage as a social institution continues to crumble. The latest "big scary factoid" (HT to one of the Spearhead's commenters for that great turn of phrase) is an article by Hope Yen being distributed by the Associate Press titled "Four in 10 say marriage is becoming obsolete."

> Is marriage becoming obsolete?
> As families gather for Thanksgiving this year, nearly one in three American children is living with a parent who is divorced, separated or never-married. More people are accepting the view that wedding bells aren't needed to have a family.
> A study by the Pew Research Center, in association with Time magazine, highlights rapidly changing notions of the American family. And the Census Bureau, too, is planning to incorporate broader definitions of family when measuring poverty, a shift caused partly by recent jumps in unmarried couples living together.
> About 29 percent of children under 18 now live with a parent or parents who are unwed or no longer married, a fivefold increase from 1960, according to the Pew report being released Thursday.
> … about 39 percent of Americans said marriage was becoming obsolete. And that sentiment follows U.S. census data released in September that showed marriages hit an all-time low of 52 percent for adults 18 and over.
> In 1978, just 28 percent believed marriage was becoming obsolete.

While a change of just 11% over 22 years may not seem that huge to some people, the strength of the language used – "obsolete", as in outmoded, old-fashioned, no longer relevant – really does indicate a seismic-level shift away from what most people believed 50 years ago. Interestingly, the 40% figure tracks fairly well with the percentage of children born outside of marriage. The fundamental definition of not just "marriage", but the term "family" itself is undergoing a profound change as the behavior of millions of people changes.

As with all statistics, averages across large numbers of people mask the fact that the changes are more significant among some demographics than others. Much has been made of the black/white divide when it comes to marriage and having children outside of marriage. The marriage rates for African Americans of both sexes have plunged more than for whites, but the trend downward has been consistent for all groups.

Here is a chart I snagged from Dalrock's post "Driving a stake in the heart of the US marriage strike myth" with two baselines added.

The percentage of people currently married for the group with the highest rate – white men – as of 2009 has dropped slightly below the rate for the group with the lowest rate in 1960 – black women, while the drop in rates for black folks of both sexes has been larger than for their white counterparts. The change has been so profound in the black community that among younger blacks the sentiment seems to be that "Marriage is for White People."

Some of the findings from the poll shown in this graph were what one might expect – the percentages who believe marriage is obsolete went down as age went up, were higher for blacks than for whites, went up as income or education level went down, and were predictably higher for people who were cohabiting than for married people. But, there was one result so surprising that I have to wonder if it is a case of mislabeling – conservatives were more likely to take a dim view of the future of marriage than liberals were, 42% vs 38%. Another finding which surprised me is nearly one out of every 3 married people – 31% – considered the institution obsolete.

A lot of so-called "MRAs" tend to focus on the legal issues, and not be as concerned with attitudes and behavior. While the legal climate toward men and fathers is incredibly punitive, at the same time giving women license to divorce their husbands for the incredible crime of not keeping her 'gina tingling, it is more the loss of social controls and social pressure to inhibit destructive behaviors which has caused so many people to take an increasingly dim view of an institution which was clearly the norm during the time when most of us grew up.

While things may not be quite as bleak as the picture painted by Charles Martel in "The End of Marriage", one would have to be extremely dedicated to the ostrich strategy of burying one's head in the sand to continue to ignore and deny what are some very clear and unmistakable trends. And, the fact that the youngest demographic – historically the least likely to be married – hold the greatest skepticism toward marriage raises the question of whether that attitude will prevail throughout their entire adult lives and be reflected in their behavior. Perhaps the current generation coming into the marriage years will have the attitude "Marriage is for Older People", or perhaps just "Marriage is for Other People."

There is not much reason to believe that current trends will do anything but continue, and marriage rates continue to fall and more and more people begin to see marriage as little more than one among many options, in the absence of any counter-forces against it. Normally, when market share for some product begins to fall, "investors" in the product begin to look at why fewer people are buying that product. However, the strategy pursued by the Marriage

Cheerleaders so far has seemed limited to badgering and harassing unmarried people. I think the consistent drop in marriage rates is clear testament to the failure of this strategy.

Men, stop tricking women into loveless marriages!

Men, we point the finger at women all the time in the manosphere, but now it is time to point it back at ourselves. I don't want to name names, but some of you have been tricking women into loveless marriages and forcing them to experience the pain of divorcing you later. Here is one such example from a woman so distraught with the aftermath of this she was forced to seek advice from Salon (H/T Zed and Brendan):

> I am 34 years old and have been married for about four and a half years. We've been together almost 10 years, my longest relationship. My husband is intelligent, handsome, funny and patient. One of my problems is that I don't love him anymore. Well, I love him, but more like a close friend and not as a husband. He truly is a wonderful person and everyone thinks he is great. And he is great, mostly. I think it's unfair for me to stay married to him when I don't completely love him because he would make an awesome husband for some lucky gal.

Sure, he pretends to be nice and perfect and all, but that is just a front. I know his type. He uses that to trap women! Our poor victim continues:

> The real trouble started this summer. I realized, after a series of illnesses and deaths in the family, that life was just too darn short to spend in a marriage I didn't want to be in. A side problem to my realization that I didn't want to be married anymore was the realization that I actually am in love with someone else. He's my best friend and has been for half my life. He knows that I love him, and has said he loves me too. He also knows that my marriage is ending.

Not only did he trick her into marriage, but he stopped her from marrying the love of her life. How did the manipulative SOB ever pull such a thing off? Here's how:

> Allow me to back up a little. Before I got married, I had a mini-crisis. Everyone I knew was getting married or already had families. I was the last single person in my groups of friends. My husband and I had been dating for several years at that point, so it never failed that everyone (and I mean everyone) would ask when it was our turn. I have to admit, I fell for it. What was wrong with me that I wasn't married? I had these feelings despite the fact I never even wanted to be married! I was in love with my best friend at this point, too, but things were complicated, so I decided to marry my husband because he was stable, loving and wanted me. But with the benefit of hindsight, I know now that I was reacting to my insecurities and not out of a desire to spend the rest of my life with my husband.

Typical. He played on her insecurities, and ultimately forced her to take half of his stuff!

> I have discussed with my husband the fact that I am feeling trapped, and that we might not make it. He was devastated, and asked me if I would work on our marriage. The problem is that I do not want to work on it. I just want out. To compound the issue, I slept with my best friend. To compound it even further, I haven't heard from my best friend in two weeks, despite attempts to contact him. The truth? I love my husband as a friend, and my friend as the one great love of my life. One wants me, the other (it seems) does not.

First he traps her in marriage, and then he wants to make her "work on it". Now she is forced to cheat on him just to be haaaapy.

Don't be this guy.

Here is another guy you don't want to be. I won't link to the source but it is a comment on a Christian blog discussing divorce. The reality is these kinds of guys aren't hard to find at all. I've even known a guy like this. Here is the poor woman's story:

> We were a Christian couple who divorced. We went through some marital counseling and one-on-one counseling. I prayed for a year that God would change my heart and help me love and respect my husband. I should also have prayed that my husband would love and respect me. He simply wasn't willing. No matter how much we talked about us, he just yes'd me to death and go on as usual. Finally God made it clear to me that He was permitting me to divorce. My stepchildren were wounded by my leaving, especially since their own mother had left them when they were younger. Except for the pain I caused them, I have never regretted the divorce. The truth is that my husband didn't love the real me. I would rather be alone all my life than ever face that sense of failure and rejection ever again. And the worst of it was that it really was all my fault. I would never have married him if it hadn't been for the fact that we had pre-marital sex. I'd suffered sexual abuse as a child and when I became born-again, I'd felt clean for the first time. Then one day we were alone (first mistake) and I wanted to test him (major, major mistake). I wanted so badly for him to be that romantic hero of the Harlequin novels who loved and respected his woman so much he would never have sex with her before marriage. I wanted him to stop himself, but of course, he didn't. So I did the only thing I could think of to clean up my own mess and that was to marry him. Even as I prepared for marriage, I knew I didn't really love him, but I ignored it and made myself go through with it. What a fool. The response of our church was horrible. Within 2 weeks I had become a sermon illustration and my pastor had instructed the staff to stay away from me. So much of what happened was my fault, but I was so embarrassed that I couldn't admit it. I developed horrible anxiety and panic attacks as well as depression with thoughts of suicide. I had become such a disappointment to everyone – my husband, my stepchildren, my pastor, my church, even those I'd thought were my friends. It took me 9 years and a move across country to forgive everyone involved.

Don't be that guy either!

I mentioned I knew a guy like this. His plan was pure genius. He knew a woman who worked with my wife and me, and she came over to hang out with him after she broke up with her loser boyfriend. They became "friends with benefits", and she got pregnant. All of a sudden it struck this woman that wait, I'm a devout Catholic! So of course she had to marry him, even though she didn't love him. Then a few years later, she divorced him and took their young son because she didn't love him any more.

Don't be any of these guys.

Men assume that when a woman tells him she loves him and she wants to marry that this somehow means she loves him and wants to be married. Don't be so simple. It could mean that you are somehow secretly forcing her to take your kids and half of your stuff. So stay on the lookout for this.

Why Would a Woman Make a Fraudulent VAWA U-Visa Petition?

The U-Visa provision of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) allows spouses and family members of American citizens to self-petition for US residency when they claim abuse by a spouse, father, stepfather, etc. Passed in the mid 90s, it soon occasioned a tragedy that led directly to the widespread adoption of metal detectors and patdowns in courthouses across the US.

Timothy Blackwell, a Seattle man who married Susana Remerata, a Filipina he met through an overseas matchmaker, was almost immediately abandoned by his new bride, who promptly left him and got knocked up by a local gangbanger (she claimed it was "rape" — but only in divorce court) within a couple weeks of setting foot on US soil. During divorce proceedings, at the advice of a couple Filipina attorneys she met, Susana claimed abuse and filed for residency under the VAWA U visa program, while Mr. Blackwell attempted to have the marriage annulled, claiming he was the victim of an immigration scam. On March 2 1995, the day after after learning that the child Susana was carrying was not his, Timothy Blackwell walked into the King County Courthouse in downtown Seattle with a gun and shot Susanna and her two Filipina attorneys to death. The unborn child died in the shooting as well.

Blackwell, who was spared the death penalty due to sympathetic jurors, is currently serving a life sentence in the Monroe Correctional Facility, near Seattle.

However, in most cases the fraud isn't so shameless, but rather the result of the rationalization process common to human females.

Recently, while eating at a local Mexican restaurant, I picked up La Raza, a free Spanish language publication distributed in Mexican communities. Although I am not particularly well-versed in Spanish (I took one year of Spanish in high school just to kill time), I can read it passably, and I like to keep an eye on what's happening around town in various demographic segments.

One article, "Mi hijo apunto de deportado," (my son is about to be deported) caught my eye, so I decided to take a look.

The article was an advice column written by a local immigration attorney named Marie-Bernadette Higuera, in which a Colombian woman was asking how to help her 17-year-old son, who was facing deportation.

According to the woman, she fled her Colombian husband seven years ago with her two children, and illegally immigrated to the United States. She claims her Colombian husband was abusive, and she couldn't do anything about it because he's a policeman. She claims he abused her and their sons sexually, mentally and psychologically, forcing her to illegally immigrate to the US, where she eventually met and married an American man.

Now, she claims her new husband is abusive as well, beating her sons, insulting them and threatening to send them back to their father. This, according to our hapless Colombian victim, has caused her eldest son to develop an anger problem and problems in school. She claims he never had any trouble with the police before, but was recently arrested for giving his girlfriend a smackdown, and has been charged as an adult. Evidently, this is a deportable offense (unlike international child abduction, it seems), and she needs advice fast.

The immigration lawyer responds at some length. First, she tells the woman to get a good criminal defense attorney, because it will be much easier to fight deportation if the kid is found not guilty. Secondly, she suggests asylum, which could be plausible for someone from a country like Colombia, with a civil war. Finally, getting down to the nitty-gritty, she suggests the use of VAWA, which can be used by wives not only on behalf of themselves, but their children or stepchildren as well.

Finally, as a last resort, she gives the woman a big, juicy hint:

> su hijo también podría ser eligible para pedir una visa U si su esposo de usted ha cometido algunes crimines en > contra de el y si su hijo ha cooperado con la investigacion o prosecucion del crimen.

> Your son may also be eligible to petition for a U visa [VAWA Visa] if your husband has committed crimes against him [domestic violence] and he cooperates with the investigation and prosecution.

In other words, if she can find some way get her husband nailed for DV and get her son to testify against the guy (shouldn't be hard if he's facing deportation otherwise), she and her children all get to be legal US residents and be a happy family — without that mean old husband (but not without his house, presumably).

And it all would have been occasioned by her son beating the crap out of his girlfriend. Such is the twisted, Kafkaesque state of American law.

W.F. Price · 21 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A new feminist group has burst onto the scene in Ukraine, and so far it seems to consist mainly of women who enjoy making a spectacle, often by removing their clothes. Founded two years ago by a university student, they have gained attention by protesting topless. Oddly enough, one thing they have protested by removing their clothing to get attention is prostitution, but they have also denounced cooking, child-rearing, homemaking, anti-adultery laws and Russians.

Some have called the group's real motives into question, as it seems at times that exhibitionism rather than politics is their true goal. Says one member on her blog: "we don't really care, we just want to show our boobs." If you are interested in what they have to offer, Femen has set up a flickr account.

Although it may be somewhat disconcerting to see feminism pop up in Eastern Europe, Femen represents, if anything, the devolution of feminism into its bare essence. These women have leapfrogged all the steps taken by the Western feminist movement, which first presented concern over women and children, then equality between women and men, and not until recently female supremacy and license as their goals.

This kind of in-your-face feminism by women who are clearly using their sexuality for attention and power probably won't go over all that well in a nation that has not already been demoralized by decades of feminist victories.

And perhaps most importantly, it gives us here in the West the opportunity to see some semblance of our own feminism from an outside perspective. Pretty distasteful, isn't it?

Even for women, divorce is not all it's cracked up to be

Although here on The Spearhead we often dwell on the injustices heaped on men and the incentives and benefits women can receive from betraying and abandoning husbands, one thing that ought to be pointed out is that in many – perhaps most – cases divorce is actually a stupid move on the part of a woman. Legions of women divorce their husbands and find themselves harried, working harder, poorer and either alone or with a man who doesn't live up to her initial expectations.

Certainly, there are some cases where divorce is clearly to a woman's advantage, such as a homemaker married to a wealthy man who is having an involved affair with another woman and on the brink of leaving his wife. But that's a small minority. Another case could be a woman married to a man hurtling toward self-destruction with a severe alcohol or drug problem, which may be more common. As for the matter of physically abusive husbands, they do exist, but in most of these cases the wife has plenty of problems herself that likely won't be entirely solved by divorce.

Usually, the woman is simply leaving her husband on impulse, as often as not out of sexual urges compelling her to seek out a new mate when her mating cycle renews (every four or five years, it seems), and sometimes simply for a power trip. It isn't usually a rational decision, but rationalization has a way of occurring after the fact, so that's no matter. But objectively speaking, their lives are usually worse after they take the plunge and wreck their families.

Growing up in the 1980s, during the divorce rampage that swept the US starting in the 1970s, I knew a lot of kids whose mothers made these poor choices. Perhaps they were disappointed with their husbands for not growing up fast enough, or maybe they felt the thrill of women's lib and wanted to go to war against the men they had married to advance the cause of feminism. Because we were kids at the time, we had no way of understanding why these women did what they did, but we saw how they lived. The typical pattern was ejection of the husband, followed by relationships with other men, sometimes a succession of them, and then a slow, downward slide into the typical aging, middle-class single mother.

One thing I saw happen over and over was the gradual transformation of the children's fathers from their initial down-and-out state following the divorce to respectable, stable adult men. Some remarried and some didn't, but most of them gradually improved their station in life as their children became adults. Of course, some never recovered, and fell away from society for one reason or another, but that wasn't the norm. Most of the women, on the other hand, just got stuck in a rut. They were dependent on court-ordered payments from their ex-husbands for expenses, and when those dried up as the kids graduated, they were left relatively poor and unable to attract a new boyfriend.

The kids were a mixed bag. They all faced problems, but some of them did alright eventually, particularly those whose fathers stayed around and took an interest in their lives. The odd thing is, though, that initially many of us had an impression that there must have been something wrong with these kids' fathers for having been left by their wives. However, around the time we were high school, as the kids' fathers came into their own and began to establish themselves, I started looking at a lot of these single mothers' life choices with some incredulity. Here was one whose ex-husband became a high-ranking Navy officer. And there another whose ex-husband got a job as head engineer at a local sporting goods factory. Another became assistant chief of police, and one is even serving in Obama's cabinet. And I knew that these men hadn't divorced while successful — I'd seen the guys struggling when I was a child.

As I grow older the differences are becoming even clearer. The women who stayed with their husbands are typically happier and wealthier than those who didn't. Even women whose husbands were never particularly successful financially are much better off than your typical working-class divorcée. Those who have middle and upper-middle class husbands are living the American dream. But the mothers who never found a suitable replacement, or married and divorced a second time, are facing late retirement and poverty in old age. And men my age, who saw what they did first-hand, tend not to have a great deal of respect for them.

Interestingly, feminists do not seem concerned at all about these aging women who made terrible choices while young. One might think they are avoiding the subject because it shows feminism for the dumb idea it is for most women, but that probably isn't it. Feminists could easily take a subject like that and frame it in a way to make men look bad, or use it to come up with some excuse for taxing men even more, but there's another reason they don't pay attention: feminism is, above all, concerned with the exercise of female sexuality and maximizing the power it confers. These washed up older women simply don't have anything to offer in that regard.

I suppose one could look at the legions of young women who make stupid choices offered by feminists as akin to the common footsoldiers in a war. Most of them never get anything out of it but some temporary glory – if that – and many are left permanently damaged. It is only the politicians, the 'generals' so to speak, who really make a killing off of their sacrifice. The Gloria Steinems, Gloria Allreds, Joe Bidens and other such characters who pushed so hard to foist this culture of divorce and family destruction on America now stand tall on the wreckage of millions of American families, offering nothing but a bleak future for the women who put their pet policies into action. But perhaps this is how it always has been with humanity: the greatest earthly glory goes to those who have wrought the greatest carnage.

Man Wins Lottery Prize, Ordered to Pay Ex-Wife

Nigel Page, a 44-year-old Englishman, was betrayed and abandoned by his wife Wendy ten years ago, but early this year he had an extraordinary stroke of good luck when he and his girlfriend jointly won a 56 million pound prize (nearly $100 million). However, hearing of Mr. Page's generosity to family, friends and even his housekeeper, his ex-wife Wendy soon hired an attorney and went after him for a piece of the pie.

Initially, she is believed to have asked for 8 million pounds, but to avoid a protracted lawsuit she settled for a paltry 2 million. Mr. Page offered to put the money in a trust for his daughter, but the ex-wife would have none of it, demanding the cash directly. Mr. Page had already agreed to pay 2,000 pounds per month in child support, but that wasn't enough.

This action sets a precedent in the UK, being the first time a lotto winner has ever been successfully sued for a portion of winnings. However, the most important implication is for divorce rather than lottery winners. Now, in the UK, women are eternally rewarded for leaving their husbands, which would seem to indicate that the best career option for a British woman would be to simply engage in serial monogamy with as many men as possible, so as to secure a permanent revenue stream through fraud, deceit and betrayal.

Obama's Domestic Violence Initiative: Hope, Hype, and Hogwash

By Carey Roberts

Desperate times call for desperate measures. So shortly before the November 2 elections, Barack Obama pulled out all the stops to woo the fading female electorate, unveiling a multi-pronged effort to "end domestic violence against women," as the president theatrically called it. But did the president's 5-point initiative deliver on the goods?

Let's begin with Obama's Hope about "ending" domestic violence. Folks, let's get real – the only way to put a stop to partner aggression – think Blondie chasing Dagwood with her rolling pin at the ready — would be to separate men and women at birth and ship them off to opposite corners of the universe.

But wait! It turns out domestic violence is twice as high among lesbians as among heterosexual married couples. Well, scratch that idea.

If the hopey-hopey routine doesn't do the trick, let's turn to the Hype. And here, Tinker Bell's magic wand sparkles with a wondrous gleam.

Because President Obama has taken to casting a spell on women with this Abuse Fairy Tale: Take a piece of paper and inscribe the words, "Stay away, you big meanie!" Sprinkle Pixie Dust, and now call it a Restraining Order.

And the would-be ravisher of women will slink away, knowing her magical scroll has the amazing power to ward off bullets, knives, and any other conceivable weapon of mass destruction.

Seriously, there's not a scrap of research that shows restraining orders deter violence, but this is what President Obama's "Fact Sheet" claims with a straight face: "Protective orders are effective in reducing the level of violence."

Once the woman comes to believe that piece of paper will ward off the Abuse Demons, the Protector-in-Chief will conjure up a copy of A Woman's Guide to Green Jobs. According to the Department of Labor website, the Guide will "aid in increasing women's access to high-growth and emerging industry occupations in the green jobs section nationwide."

That and the Jolly Green Giant.

Enough Hype? Now on to the Hogwash!

Folks, this is really the best part. But before we plunge any farther into President Obama's domestic violence rabbit hole, let's get a firm grip on reality. (For the skeptics, I'm providing the links below.)

In the area of child abuse, the federal Administration for Children and Families somberly notes, "In 2008, approximately 56% of child abuse and child neglect perpetrators were women and 42% were men." http://faq.acf.hhs.gov/cgi-bin/acfrightnow.cfg/php/enduser/std_adp.php?p_faqid=70

As far as dating violence, girls win the battle of sexes hands down. According to a national survey by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, 9% of teenage girls, compared to 11% of adolescent boys, have been slapped, hit, or otherwise hurt by their opposite-sex partner: http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/ss5704a1.htm, Table 11.

And in a landmark 2007 article published in the American Journal of Public Health, Centers for Disease Control researchers reported 7 out of 10 instigators of one-way partner violence are…can we break the spell?…female: http://pn.psychiatryonline.org/content/42/15/31.2.full Scholarly research echoes the same theme: "Women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners," according to a recent summary of 275 studies by California State University researcher Martin Feibert, PhD.

The evidence is conclusive: Government surveys and scholarly research point to members of the Fairer Sex as the persons who are more likely to abuse. But not a single word of the president's carefully orchestrated White House event even hinted as to the existence of aggressive women or abused men.

The truth about female-initiated violence should be vexatious to persons who fancy themselves the champions of women. Because if the abuse escalates, it's more likely the female who will be harmed. As CDC lead researcher Daniel Whitaker explains, "a woman's perpetration of violence was the strongest predictor of her being a victim of partner violence."

So in a sane world, we would get more help for stressed-out moms, teach conflict resolution skills to teenage girls, and provide drug and alcohol treatment for violence-prone women. We might even devise a few programs to help abused men.

According to a 2006 Harris Poll, 88% of Americans have seen or heard of a male abuse victim in the past year. So most voters, men and women alike, will view the Administration's domestic violence initiative as a cynical political ploy.

But Barack Obama is seemingly enamored of a different logic: As long as we can sway unsuspecting women into believing their husband is a closet batterer, we can justify the unfettered governmental intrusion into the private affairs of citizens, and the continued expansion of the power of the state.

Tofurkey and the Decline of My Favorite Holiday

Chuck Ross · 23 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

My favorite holiday of the year, the one coming upon us in two days, is on the decline. This should come as no surprise to anyone who pays attention to the arc of traditionalism in this country.

For a while now, whoever is in charge of fucking up our cherished American traditions has turned to revisionist methods to mangle our fondness for my favorite day. Stories of the Pilgrims and Indians have been littered with qualifications and revisionism. Not content to just let us assume that white settlers and brown natives got along for once and decided to eat a nice meal in celebration so that we can gorge ourselves, liberals all over would have us think that the Pilgrims tea-bagged the Indians' Thanksgiving gravy with their syphilis infested scrotums before raping their land and using their buffalo for target practice. This modern strain of revisionism made Christopher Columbus out to be a major asshole; that was the first step in delegitimizing any tradition that extols the unique development of America.

On the micro level, my favorite holiday is lambasted for its tendency to bring together dysfunctional families, but this same sort of jibe isn't considered when we celebrate bringing drunk dysfunctional random strangers together in celebration of sombreros, leprechauns, or slutty costumes over an uncommon celebration of Mexico, Ireland, and STDs. Valuing family and thinking outside of yourself for one day is marginalized as square at best and a tool of the patriarchy at worst.

There are other symptoms of this holiday's demise. By all indications we should expect Thanksgiving to cease existing anywhere near its present scale within the next 20 years. By then, the fourth Thursday in November will become an arbitrary starting point for businesses to synchronize their ledgers to get an apples-to-apples comparison of year-over-year same-store-sales figures. That many hyphens in one sentence should prove to us that something is gravely wrong. The largest retailers have engaged in this most modern incantation of anti-traditionalism. Wal-Mart, K-Mart, The Gap triad – the eponymous leg, Banana Republic, and Old Navy – will be open on Thanksgiving Day. Many smaller retailers will do the same. Not only does this detract focus from the sanctity of what was once a common cultural bond, it now pulls shoppers and employees away from families – eroding connections that may benefit from an extra day of familial bonding. Those retailers being leading lights of industry, and the retail industry as a whole being the leading light of Americans' system of values, Thanksgiving as a traditional institution seems doomed.

But that is not what has really sent me over the edge this holiday season. What has really mashed my peas this year is this emerging trend of "Tofurkey" as a vegetarian alternative to the real thing. What really hurts me the most about the slow decline of Thanksgiving is the stupidity of this concept. If you're vegetarian why even pretend to eat turkey? The tradition is to eat turkey in meat form; if you're going to eat tofu then you aren't participating in the tradition so stop trying to trick yourself. Eat regular tofu in its rectangular prism shape along with your sprouts and lima beans like you do every other day of the year. You can have some mashed potatoes too this time, but no gravy. The gravy has animal guts in it, and you can pass that to me.

I don't understand why vegetarians can't just have a substitute protein source and leave it at that without trying to redefine "turkey". The extra choice is like ham for those assholes who always say "I actually like ham better than turkey".

I also have questions. I wonder if tofurkey will be in a turkey shape complete with tofu formed into legs, wings, and breasts? More importantly I wonder if there will be a tofu wishbone for poor, anemic vegetarian children to pull apart as they make a wish (for meat, no doubt). How about tofu turkey necks? And can we replace the carving knife with one usually used for butter? The most experienced male at the dinner table will give way to the hairiest female when it comes to the celebrated act of carving the "bird".

So yes, my friends, Thanksgiving is fucked.

Judge Snatches Man's Children, Uses Religion as Excuse

An Indiana man with 50 percent custody of his children was recently turned into an every-other-weekend dad by a family court judge who cited religion as the reason the children should not spend much time with their father. According to the judge, George Pancol, when the man had identified as a Christian, he and his ex-wife got along better, but now that the man was no longer so sure about his faith, there was a lack of cooperation. Of course, Christianity mandates that children should always be taken from their father — especially when the mother divorces said father. It must be in the Bible somewhere…

Atheists and agnostics are predictably outraged, but they are entirely missing what's really going on. States have a financial interest in setting child support awards, so mandating a primary physical custodian makes good fiscal sense. For every dollar of child support they collect, the federal government provides funds that can be used by the state — including the courts. Therefore, the more judges can squeeze out of divorced parents, the more money flows in to support their own livelihood. Because the public would be outraged if women were placed under the same pressure men are by the child support system, it is typically fathers who lose and are stuck with the bill.

This is why equal custody is resisted by courts — it would cut into state budgets.

It may be particularly disgusting in the United States – supposedly a country founded on freedom of religion – to see a judge use such an argument to remove children from a father, but the truth is that any old excuse will do, and if one can't be found easily family courts will manufacture them.

The controversy this judge has created will doubtless be used as evidence that Christians are backward and oppressive, which is unfortunate. The real issue here is that family law is backward, oppressive and tyrannical. Fathers are seen as nothing but ATMs not only by ex-wives, but by state politicians and officers of the court.

As you watch the video below, keep in mind that this man's children were removed so that the state could take his money. It is an exceedingly disgusting practice, but that's contemporary America, and it isn't the Christians, the Jews, the minorities, or even the women who came up with it so much as it is politicians, judges and assorted other venal, immoral characters in our rotten corridors of power.

Thanksgiving and Its Origins

W.F. Price · 24 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

First, to all Americans reading, Happy Thanksgiving!

For the rest, who may be curious about the festival, I'll include a little background.

Autumnal harvest festivals are characteristic of agricultural societies in temperate regions around the world. The Chinese have the Moon Festival, the Jews Sukkot, the Koreans Chuseok and the Muslims Eid al-Adha.

In the British Isles, the traditional Celtic festival of Samhain served the purpose before the introduction of Christianity, and continued in the Christianized form known as Halloween/All Saint's Day, and Calan Gaeaf in Wales, where the entire month of November is known as the month of blood, as this is when the herd is thinned in preparation for winter. Naturally, this occasioned feasting and celebrations with meat and ale. Such festivals could not have been specific to Wales or the insular Celtic inhabitants of the British Isles, and must have been known to the Puritans. Because of the universality of northern celebrations this time of year, the Puritans were not the first European colonists to hold an autumnal festival of thanksgiving. In fact, one was recorded in St. Augustine Florida in the mid-16th century, and in Virginia another was observed by the Jamestown settlers in 1619.

However, what set the festival held by the Massachusetts colonists in 1621 apart was that it was observed during a very tenuous, critical time for the young settlement, which was beset not only by lack of supplies and hunger, but numerous, mysterious enemies in the dark, howling wilderness of New England, out of which death could come as quickly as an arrow or tomahawk whistling through the woods, or as slowly as being tied to a spit and roasted alive.

It seems that the template for the Pilgrims' Thanksgiving may have derived from Leiden, a Dutch city they lived in for some ten years before they sailed to the New World. During a Spanish siege of the city in 1574, laid by the formidable Duke Alba of Toledo, a series of fortuitous events brought relief to the starving inhabitants, who thereafter established a day of Thanksgiving on October 3. In recognition of the heroic efforts of the city, William of Orange founded Leiden University.

In the first years of the 17th century the Puritans, known as separatists at the time, left England to live in the Netherlands, where, following a brief spell in Amsterdam, they settled in Leiden from 1610 to 1620, after which they decided to set sail for the New World. However, while in Leiden, some of them worked in the university founded to commemorate the war, and they were doubtless familiar with the locals' annual celebration of Thanksgiving, which continues in Leiden to this day. Although Thanksgiving in Leiden these days is a raucous, mainly secular celebration during which much beer is consumed and dance halls are packed full, it originally had a great deal of religious significance. The providential winds that contributed to the lifting of the siege the holiday commemorates brought boats stocked with fish and bread, which is of obvious significance to Christians.

Therefore, when the band of Puritans, newly arrived in New England, secured an ally in Massasoit, the great Sachem (king) of the Wampanoag Confederacy, and received corn, fish, fowl and deer to augment their meager rations, they must have seen a parallel with the experience of their former neighbors in Leiden. Massasoit, whose tribe had recently been decimated by smallpox, saw the vigorous, determined Englishmen as a valuable asset in fending off the Narragansett, who had grown powerful and aggressive as their neighbors weakened. The Pilgrims had reason to fear the Narragansett as well; in the fall of 1621 Governor William Bradford received a snakeskin stuffed with arrows from a Narragansett messenger in what was an obvious threat. Bradford, for his part, responded by returning the snake with a bellyful of lead shot.

Such incidents lent particular gravity to the feast of November 1621, in which the colonists and their Wampanoag allies celebrated the success of treaty negotiations finalized earlier in the year. Massasoit and 90 of his men arrived, bringing venison, corn and seafood, while the Puritans brought gamefowl, wheat and barley to the table (some of the barley likely in the liquid form we know and love), and the men celebrated their alliance with smoking, drinking, shooting and feasting on roast meat and cornbread — all in all a characteristically American way to have a good time.

Sachem Massasoit, who was middle-aged at the time, went on to live another forty years, into his 80s, siring half a dozen children along the way, and the peace between the Wampanoag and English settlers lasted until his death in the early 1660s. Unfortunately, it broke down shortly afterward with King Philip's War, one of the deadliest of all in the American colonies.

But on that November day in 1621, both the Wampanoag and the English had much to be thankful for as they joined in celebration of the bounty laid before them by providence. That gesture of fellowship, goodwill and humility before the Creator observed by a few score Englishmen and half again as many Indians laid the foundation for one of the mightiest nations yet to rise on Earth.

And that is why Americans celebrate Thanksgiving Day.

Gender Wars Heating Up in India

W.F. Price · 26 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As Western-style family law starts to trickle into the developing world, men in what were formerly traditional, Eastern societies are finding themselves disadvantaged due to new laws favoring women. Evidently, Indian courts are now awarding ridiculous alimony and child support awards that are impoverishing men and their extended families, including parents who rely on their sons' support, and men – and sometimes even their parents – are being routinely jailed on false allegations.

Seemingly out of nowhere, Indian men's rights groups have emerged and are protesting courts for the unfair judgments and heavy-handed arrests. India has different traditions, of course, so some of the disputes concern matters that might seem a bit mysterious to the average Westerner. For example, men are now frequently being arrested for the crime of "dowry harassment." Dowries have technically been illegal for some time in India, but the practice continues to be widespreade. Traditionally, a dowry would be negotiated before marriage, and that was that. However, there is supposedly an epidemic of husbands and in-laws demanding more than they received from the bride's family, so tough laws were put in place to dissuade men from making these demands of their wives' families. It's akin to the feminist domestic violence hysteria of the 90s, during which one might have believed that wives all across America were in mortal danger from their husbands.

Predictably, angry wives, cheating wives, silly wives and greedy wives started taking advantage of the legislation immediately. Now, husbands from all walks of life are being accused of dowry harassment and dragged through court. In fact, because of the unique nature of these laws, a number of Indian women married to men in the West have taken to fleeing to India, often with their children, and laying charges of dowry harassment on husbands to gain the upper hand and guarantee supremacy.

Recently, some Indian men have been making an effort to bring attention to this misuse of dowry harassment laws, which have the effect of destroying not only Indian husbands' lives, but their parents' as well. A Gujarat man named Dashrath Devda, who is the president of Akhil Bharatiya Patni Atyachar Virodhi Sangh, an Indian men's rights group, was recently fined RS 1 lakh (1 lakh = 100,000 Rupees, which is about $2,200) for "wasting court's time" when he argued that men needed protection from abuses of Section 498A, which one might call the Indian version of VAWA.

Naturally, the issue is treated as a joke in Indian media reports, just as father's rights advocated have long been ridiculed in the West, but if one takes the time to see what some of these Indian men have been through, such as having their entire families imprisoned on false accusations, the picture that emerges is not very funny at all. It seems that rather than husbands "harassing" wives for dowries, wives are now using Indian family law to extort money from husbands upon divorce.

Israeli White Knight Bemoans Sorry State of Feminism in Israel

Writing for Ha'aretz, Israel's left-wing newspaper, Gideon Levy expresses disappointment that most Israelis, including women, avoid feminism like the plague due to its "negative connotations." Israel, although religiously distinct, is part of the broader Mediterranean culture, so Northern European-style feminism has never gone far in the Jewish state.

According to Levy, television news is a good example of Israeli sexism, because the female broadcasters tend to be young, attractive and gaily dressed. Additionally, sexual harassment charges are rarely taken seriously, and women who accuse men are often seen as immature and at least equally responsible. Levy thinks women should join together in solidarity against men, offering Scandinavia as an example:

> In egalitarian Scandinavia, for example, no political candidate has a chance of being elected without committing to feminism. It's the same as the need to be a Zionist to win an election in Israel. We remain quite far from such a situation regarding feminism. Who is really a feminist here?

Yes, and "egalitarian" Scandinavia now has quotas for women on corporate bords, almost passed a "man tax," prosecutes johns but not hookers, transfers as much wealth as possible into the hands of women and regularly vilifies men in general, despite Scandinavian men being amongst the most compliant and indulgent toward women on Earth.

I don't know what Levy really wants from women, but he goes so far as to let loose with this unfortunate statement that would make any man in a real feminist country cringe:

> Women should stand up, as should men, and behave like feminists.

There has been some discussion on The Spearhead lately about how men will never stand together against feminism, but here we have a man describing a society in which they quite clearly do so, and where it is women who will not band together to promote feminism.

So what's the difference? Well, one thing I can think of is that the Mediterranean and Levant have been civilized for millennia, as have East and South Asia. It seems to me that old civilizations that have survived the test of time have some resistance to feminism and female supremacism written into their cultural DNA. This is probably the case because those that did not have this resistance were invariably conquered and displaced by those that did. The history of the Middle East is one of constant demographic displacement and usurpation, and because it has historically been a land of plenty with a relatively mild climate, it wasn't the environment or the lack of food that applied the most pressure, but rather other groups of human beings. Therefore, it was those with the strongest culture, religion and society that prevailed.

In places such as Scandinavia, there was certainly human conflict, but more pressing was the matter of filling the storehouse before winter came. Scandinavians have an amazing work ethic, which is obvious when one sees their feats of physical endurance in sailing and rowing ships across the Atlantic, skiing across the mountains in winter, working in stony soil from morning till night, etc. But when it comes to defending their philosophy and culture they are fairly subdued. Words are considered superfluous — a man is supposed to be stoic and get to work to overcome the challenges of the physical world. Admirable, to be sure, but totally insufficient in a complex, pluralistic society.

Ultimately, the macho culture of established civilizations will take hold in the North as well, because feminist rule will destroy the egalitarianism that made the silent beta provider ethic work in the first place. Feminist rule requires a police state, and a police state ruled by women soon becomes a police state ruled by police — it never fails.

Ironically, the scandal that brought about Levy's complaints regards a candidate for Israel's police commissioner.

One might think that of all men, feminists would go easy on the police, but they simply can't help themselves. Hopefully, the compulsion feminists have to attack men even when it is not to their advantage may hasten the end of this unfortunate chapter in West's history.

In the meanwhile, contra Gideon Levy, I would argue that Northern European and Anglo men should learn a lesson from the southern cultures typified by the macho, voluble Mediterranean men, and dispense with the stoic, long-suffering traits that have slowly led us toward a status approaching slavery.

IMF Proposes Tax Cut for Irish Women

W.F. Price · 28 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The IMF recently proposed that Ireland should lower women's income tax by 5%, which it claims will raise Ireland's GDP by 1.75%. Supposedly, the policy has nothing to do with feminism, and is only intended to benefit the Irish economy, but we heard similar arguments when it was decreed that only women should be able to receive food aid in the wake of the Haiti earthquake of earlier this year.

It didn't take long for me to find an explicitly feminist IMF working paper that lays the groundwork for lower tax rates for women. The argument that the IMF proposal has nothing to do with feminism or women's empowerment is obviously a lie, as the working paper that proposes the idea is chock full of feminist ideology.

The paper, titled 'Gender Budgeting' and authored by US citizen Janet Stotsky, who is described as "an Economist in the Tax Policy Division of the IMF's Fiscal Affairs Department," opens with this statement:

> Women are disadvantaged relative to men, according to key economic, social, and political measures of equality, but in many areas, such as education, differences are narrowing. The concept of externalities underlies the arguments for including gender considerations in budget programs and policies. Other arguments have a weaker economic basis but may be more socially or politically compelling. The experience to date with "gender budgeting," which entails looking at gender issues comprehensively within the budget, has been mixed. To become more useful, gender budgeting should be integrated into budget processes in a way that generates tangible improvements in policy outcomes. The International Monetary Fund should encourage fiscal authorities to take into account the external benefits of reducing gender inequalities and to remove from fiscal legislation any arbitrary discrimination against women.

Pretty standard feminist fare so far — it's all about equalizing things. As the paper goes on, different kinds of "inequalities" are highlighted, including one in particular where inequality is actually equal — the life expectancy gap. Stotsky argues that where male and female lifespans approach equality, it is actually unequal, because women should naturally live longer than men, so effort should be expended to widen the gap. This is similar to the feminist argument concerning suicide, in which high rates of male suicide are "natural," and therefore nothing to worry about, whereas if female suicide rates approach male rates the equality becomes an inequality. These people really are shameless like that:

> Health inequalities are measured as the ratio of female to male life expectancy. For biological reasons, average female life expectancy is higher than male life expectancy, and this difference exists in virtually all countries, but, as indicated in the table, the gap between female and male life expectancy tends to narrow in the low human development countries. Inequalities in health appear as excess mortality of female children and differences in life expectancy that do not accord with biological norms.

Now, on to the subject at hand, income tax is held to have an "implicit bias," because women supposedly have extra expenses and duties that men do not have. In another IMF paper titled "How Tax Systems Treat Men and Women Differently," Stotsky argues that differences in labor supply behavior suggest that income tax discriminates against married women, and that to achieve equality women should be taxed at a lower rate:

> Studies of income taxation have long taken gender into account by explicitly con- sidering the differences in the labor supply behavior of men and women, and their implications for public policy. These stud- ies suggest that the labor supply response of married women, who are often assumed to be the secondary earners, to the income tax is greater than that of married men. This implies that to minimize the efficiency cost of the income tax, everything else being equal, married women should be taxed at a lower rate than married men.

Clearly, the intent of the IMF recommendation is gender equalization in Ireland, and the IMF should be honest and open about its social-engineering goals rather than pretend that such proposals are only for the good of Ireland's economy. However, the IMF has a long history of dubious policy attachments, and in at least one important case it turned out that rejecting IMF proposals was the right thing to do.

In 1997, during the Asian economic crisis of that year, several East Asian leaders met to deal with the crisis and exchange notes and opinions concerning IMF assistance and policy, among other things. Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad said that, if anything, IMF policies had been harmful, and declared his intention to avoid IMF loans if at all possible. The problem was, according to Mohamad, that the conditions attached to the loans would expose countries to financial manipulation at the hands of foreign banks.

Mohamad's concerns turned out to be prophetic, as Malaysia avoided the worst ravages of the crisis while the currencies of several other Asian countries were hammered following their acceptance of assistance from the IMF.

Perhaps Ireland would do well to take a close look at the dangers inherent in dealing with the IMF, and take note of the fact that an American feminist ideologue has apparently been given free reign to impose her will on the people of Ireland through loan conditions.

British Girls' Drinking and Brawling Out of Control

Even as calls have gone out to lighten criminal sentences for women, an epidemic of female violence and drunkenness is sweeping the UK. In just the last decade, violent crime has spiked 81% amongst British women, and girls are increasingly brutish and aggressive — even toward their own parents.

Mothers are complaining that their daughters are lashing out with rage when they don't get what they want. It seems that girls have caught up to boys, and may be poised to surpass them in angry behavior, including both physical and verbal aggression: hotlines set up for parents dealing with violent, out of control children report that half the calls they receive now concern girls.

Although drinking and early sexualization are held to be potential triggers for this behavior, professionals dare not admit the culpability of feminists, who have long idealized violence and aggression in women. Until the true source of the problem is identified and dealt with, female behavior will continue to deteriorate to new lows, and parents – mothers in particular – will be faced not only with disobedience, but fists as well.

Only Feminists Can Be REAL MEN

Jack Donovan · 29 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As far as Michael Kimmel is concerned, everyone else is just a "guy."

In Guyland, Kimmel describes and analyzes young American males with all the civilized horror of an eighteenth century missionary reporting on the customs and activities of naked heathen cannibals. These savages, born innocent and full of childish wonder, learn early to fear the scorn of their male peers and become so desperate for male approval that they will engage in bizarre and often criminal behavior. Enter "Guyland," a human terrain inhabited by young men that Kimmel maps only by the most extreme and sensational accounts of fraternity hazing, excessive gambling, sports obsession, drunkenness, video game addiction and gang rapes. Kimmel is at his most even handed and truthful when, as an avid sports fan, he writes about sports talk with his son and the influence that sports have on men's lives. But for most of Guyland, he's a critical outsider looking in – Kimmel, a Jew, offers that he was unable to join a fraternity in college because of the ethnic restrictions of the era, and Kimmel's C.V. shows that he's spent the majority of his adult life seeking the approval of feminist women. (He was one of the first males to attend and graduate from Vassar.)

Like many women and bookish solipsists, Kimmel looks at the male world and sees fear of social disapproval as a primary motivator for typical male behaviors. But this is spin and half-truth. For instance, if you only read Kimmel and had little firsthand experience dealing with "guys" in real life as peers, you'd think that young men only drank heavily because of peer pressure, campus rituals and outmoded masculine ideals. You'd think that men only drink out of fear that they'll be ostracized by other men for not drinking. I read
I Hope They Serve Beer in Hell by Tucker Max alongside Guyland. Max's stories about drinking and "hooking up" filled out Kimmel's caricature and reminded me that men often drink together to create conflict and excitement out of the sense of boredom with polite, modern society that Kimmel acknowledges but fails to truly understand. Men drink to relax, and sometimes to wallow in self-pity, but men drink in packs for the story. Lionel Tiger was correct when he observed that men bond during aggression, and heavy drinking puts average guys in "safe crisis." They fight their own bodies, concoct strategies to pick up girls, narrowly avoid or get into fights with other men. They do and say things they normally wouldn't. Crazy things happen. Young men drink together because they're looking for a good bad time, a story to tell, proof that something happened. While Tucker Max's tales often involve boasting, they are just as often self-deprecating and have an honest humanity to them that doesn't come across in Kimmel's ethnography. For Kimmel, the only "guys" with any humanity – the only real men — are the ones who resist or reject the culture of "guyland." Coming from the leading feminist scholar of "men's studies" in America, this thesis feels more than a little self-congratulatory.

Guyland isn't really an attempt to understand "guys." It's ultimately more of an exercise in telling women, feminists and frightened parents the horror stories they want to hear about the "privileged" white American male.

Unlike their male counterparts, Kimmel says that young women today don't feel defined by any particular ideal of womanhood – they believe they can be or do anything. He says that young "guys" however, adhere to a strict "Guy Code." The Guy Code includes a handful of sayings and slogans that Kimmel says young males have internalized and repeated back to him in interviews and classroom situations. He offers a top ten list of examples including phrases like "Boys Don't Cry," Take it Like a Man," "Just Do It," etc. The list feels a bit doctored, but Kimmel identifies the unifying theme of these sayings as an aversion to “showing emotions or admitting weakness.” However, by framing this observation with a bunch of goofy sayings and slogans that men like, he takes a simple and relatively cross-cultural phenomenon and casts it as arbitrary, commercialized, harmful, culturally specific and ultimately unnecessary. The phrase “showing emotions” is weaselly, and “aversion to admitting weakness” could just as easily be re-stated in the positive as “preference for cultivating and portraying strength.” What successful culture has encouraged the majority of its men to show weakness and discouraged them from cultivating strength?

It’s one of the great magic tricks of feminists that they’ve somehow managed to get us to consider the possibility that normal and consistent patterns of male behavior over the last few thousand years were actually psychologically sick and evil. Apparently men have been “doing it wrong” all this time, we can only trust women and feminist academics to finally show men how to “do it right.”

Kimmel holds up the more fluid or flexible gender identity of women as an ideal, and in Guyland the refusal of young men to abandon
The Guy Code is conveniently blamed for epidemic levels of casual sex (“hooking up”) and binge drinking among both young males and young females. Kimmel blames lagging male academic performance and a general lack of direction on The Guy Code, too, and he refuses to entertain the possibility that feminist influence on the educational system has played any role whatsoever in hindering the intellectual development of boys. He accepts natural difference uncritically when he supports the behavior of women or homosexual males, but his whole position relies on the assumption that men behave the way they do for the most part due to the culturally constructed “Guy Code.”

Drawing from his sociology background, Kimmel uses a set of markers to define adulthood, and to draw a line between what he sees as boy behavior and man behavior. A man establishes a career, gets married, has children, assumes responsibility, and abandons the world of boys and “guys” for family life. These are traditional distinctions and they have some value, but seem at odds with a modern feminist reality where fathers and husbands are regarded as an extra paycheck, a gateway to motherhood and homeownership, a “kitchen bitch” who puts up shelves and makes the bouillabaisse. (Really, click on the link. Sandra Tsing Loh’s “Let’s Call the Whole Thing Off” is a shockingly honest window into the mind of the stridently feminist “wife.”) Kimmel gropes around at this, summarizing some of the reasons why “guys” are in no big hurry to abandon Guyland. He admits that our culture portrays manhood as the end of all fun, and that television husbands are “infantilized by their wives, unable to do the simplest things for themselves, clueless about their kids’ lives, and begging for sex—or reduced to negotiating for it in exchange for housework.”

Guys are not as stupid as women think they are. Every man knows at some level that in this post-patriarchal arrangement, his kids are generally regarded as her kids first, and while she will likely work outside the home, the household is still ultimately her domain. Feminist Hanna Rosin recently called on women to reclaim the kitchen because her husband turned out to be a better cook, and she felt that he’d infringed upon her rightful domain. Women everywhere are making it clear that “equality” means they call the shots and get whatever they want, and that husbands are the new wives. Many of the men who achieve Kimmel’s markers of adulthood can only hope to graduate to the status of renter and supplicant, living on borrowed time.

The idea that guys are not men is repeated throughout the book, but climaxes in this paragraph toward the conclusion.

> "And feminism also dares to expect more from men. Feminism expects a man to be ethical, emotionally present, and accountable to his values in his actions with women—as well as with other men. Feminism loves men enough to expect them to act more honorably and actually believes them capable of doing so. Feminism is a vision that expects men to go from being "just guys," accepting whatever they might happen to do, to being just guys—capable of autonomy and authenticity, inspired by justice. That is, feminism believes that guys can become men."

This gloss of what feminists want from men seems reasonable enough at first glance, though it includes a lot of built-in and arguable assumptions about what it means to be "emotionally present," honorable or authentic. When compared to Hanna Rosin and Sandra Tsing Loh's own accounts of what men can expect from their feminist wives in real life, the whole proposition is revealed as a farce. While it is true that not all women are self-centered, neurotic shrews like Rosin and Tsing Loh—I'd like to count my two sisters as examples of sane women capable of compromise and cooperation with their husbands — Kimmel doesn't ask women to make any sacrifices or take any active role in making modern manhood more appealing. Male readers of Guyland are ultimately left with nothing but Kimmel's scolding, scare tactics and empty feminist platitudes about "justice" and "humanity" as reasons to "grow up" and become kitchen bitches.

In dismantling the patriarchy, feminists have disincentivized family life for men. It is disingenuous to withhold the mantle of adulthood from these men by holding them to the higher standard of a system that no longer exists or serves their collective interests. Men can be motivated to do just about anything. When they had to, they did support their families and shoulder enormous responsibilities. They built cities and crossed oceans. What feminism lacks is something to offer that the majority of men actually want.

It is a regular hypocrisy of pro-feminist writing by men that while these authors portray traditional masculine norms as oppressive and absurd, they set up their own benchmarks for who is a man and who is not, and emasculate other men accordingly. Like the Newsweek writers who recently told men to "Man Up!" and take jobs they don't want, Kimmel takes aim at jocks and frat boys – claiming they are not men because they don't follow his own example. This is ressentiment. Kimmel is inverting strength based masculine virtues and aiding the creation of an ad hoc moral system that elevates his own servile and sensitive intellectualism. In spite of his admiration for fluid feminine identities, Kimmel just can't help himself. He isn't abandoning The Guy Code, he's just fashioning a new code to separate the men from the "guys."

Supporters' Forum

It seems that if I take my eyes off the site for a day or so comments start to get out of hand. This is not a new issue — it's been happening from the beginning from time to time. The most recent comment crisis is, if I recall correctly, the fifth such disruption.

As I suggested when I last made a call for support, I'm establishing a forum specifically for those who support the site. The problem with entirely open comments is that it's a simple matter for anyone to come in and start a fight, regardless of whether they support the publication or not, and moderation has its limits, the most important being that it is performed by human beings who are often harried and forced to make snap judgements without sufficient context (and sometimes without sufficient sleep).

So, those who have supported the site with donations will be given the keys to a new forum specifically for them, and will have free posting privileges with moderation only in serious circumstances. I've actually thought about extending this to the entire site, and only allowing supporters to post any comments at all, but we'll see how this works in the meanwhile.

For now, anyone who has donated is free to join the new forum on request by email or PM on the forum. I'm going to be spending much of my forum/discussion time there, because I want to hear what supporters have to say, and without them this site would be a shadow of what it is.

So if you've made a PayPal donation at any time and are registered on the forum please let me know what your username is via PM or email, and I'll look it up and match your email to the PayPal email/account (be sure to let me know if that's different). If you sent a check or money order, simply let me know who you are and what your username is — verification will not be a problem. If you are a supporter who is not registered on the forum, I'd be happy to do so for you if you'd like; simply contact me through the contact form and send me your email and desired username.

The new forum will be private and all information entirely confidential. What is written there stays there — this is to encourage candid conversation. For the rest of this year, simply having made a donation of $10 or more at any point since the site opened will suffice to be added, and by early next year we'll work out a structure for keeping it going through 2011.

I'm going to match the accounts to the new forum by hand and by myself, so please be patient. I've already created a new usergroup, set the permissions for that group to the forum and conducted some tests, and it will be open as soon as I start adding users. While it should be a smooth process in the large majority of cases, there will inevitably be a couple of glitches, but rest assured that I will work with you to make sure every qualified user who is interested gets access.

I'd like to add as many supporters as possible — the more we have to start out with the better and more lively the discussion will be. So, even if you are not a regular commenter, feel free to have me add you anyway. As I wrote before, I'll be spending a lot of time in there, so it will be a good place to provide some feedback or suggestions for the site in general.

The Season Of The Sistahood's Dis(sed)content

Obsidian · 30 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the year winds down it is often customary for people to look back on the previous 11-odd months to reflect on what has gone down, and where they go from here moving forward into the new year ahead. For African Americans in particular, now having lived to see a Black first family in the White House, it is a time of reckoning indeed.

Among those doing a Remembrance of Things Past, is a sector of the femosphere that I like to call "The Sistarati" – a gaggle of Black women writers and bloggers of varying stripe. While much of what they type is tripe, on occasion they manage to put something out that grabs my attention. One of those things is the seeming consensus on the part of the Sistahood that White feminists have done them wrong.

That's right, you heard me I did not stutter – the sistas are hopping mad because they sick and tired of being dissed by their White sisters ala Audre Lourde, and they ain't gonna take it no more (insert "cobrahead" gesticulations). They're tired of having their concerns pushed to the back burner if addressed at all, sick of not being recognized as Sistas-in-Arms by their fellow White feministas, and they're tired of the latter's constant whining over stuff that doesn't mean anything at the end of the day, while it's Black women that REALLY have problems.

So says one Ms. Christelyn Karazin, one of the more colorful "swirl" bloggers who got her fifteen minutes of fame earlier this year, when she grabbed up her bullhorn and went on her "No Wedding, No Womb!" crusade. Because I'm a strong believer in the notion that nothing beats experience, I decided to spend a bit of time at her place over the Thanksgiving/Black Friday holiday weekend. Trust me, not only do we have nothing to fear from the likes of Ms. Karazin, but in so many ways, she, and by extension Black women as a whole, are the living embodiment of that which they claim to despise – the Ideology of (White) Feminism.

Her views regarding NWNW and "swirling" are no doubt intentionally provocative, and I do indeed plan to revisit both topics as they require a more thorough treatment that I care to give either here. But in this essay, I wish to address the arguments she puts forth in her blogpost "BWIP Continued! Fish Don't Need Bicycles, but (hetero) Black Women (tend to) Need/Want Men. Take that, Feminazis!"

Ms. Karazin basically makes the argument that, while White women were living in the lap of luxury, bored to tears by their middle to upper middle class existence and agitated like mad to get out of the gilded cage they were trapped in, Black women were busy doing the real labor of the workaday world, and weren't being recognized for that. And indeed, she would have a legitimate point here — Black women have always worked and didn't have the option of being a June Cleaver, historically and in aggregate.

But what Ms. Karazin leaves out is the fact that Black women have not only gained as a direct result of (White) feminism, but they've also gained from the Civil Rights movement as well; in fact, and I point this out to Ms. Karazin and her readers as you'll see below, academics have found that if there was one big "winner" in the women's and civil rights movements, it was and still is, Black women.

I make the point (among a great many others) in the following comment I left on Ms. Karazin's blog, the other day:

> Very interesting discussion.
> I'm having trouble understanding what the bone of contention is here: Black women have benefitted tremendously from (White) feminism. Let's count the ways, shall we?
> Reproductive Rights: Black women currently get more abortions than any other female group in the USA, far exceeding Asian, Hispanic and White women, and have for a long time now. If anyone benefited from the passage of Roe v. Wade, it's been the Sistahood. And that's not even including all the advances in birth control such as the pill…

> Education: Black womens' access to and benefiting from this is unassailable. Black women are among the biggest group in the country holding advanced degrees, and when one looks at comparitive analyses to their male counterparts along these lines, Black women far and away outpace Black men in terms of formal educational attainment, and have now for decades. Although this is starting to change wrt White women/White men, it still is nowhere near the levels it is for BW/BM.
> Affirmative Action: Black women benefit far and away more from AA than any other group, and that includes Black men and White women. It is a well known fact that compaines and agencies can and will hire Black women as they see it as satisfying two quota criteria at once – hiring a minority and hiring a Woman – in one fell swoop.
> Even academia has agreed that on the balance, the single biggest beneficiary of the civil rights and women's movements of the 60s and 70s have been American Black women, far and away more than Black men in aggregate, and often ahead of White women in aggregate. If we consider the key concerns of feminists since the 60s – reproductive rights, education and career advancement – this is unassailable. (UPenn study, Uni of Chicago studies, Google em)
> Having said all that, yes, I personally believe that Black women are in some ways, the cannon fodder for White elite feminists; they bear the brunt of the gruntwork and the lab rat type experiments. Moreover, I have always been of the view that the seeming camraderie between Black and White women was something of a facade, but hardly surprising, since it is in womens' natures to fake the funk moreso than do men. Just notice how men of different races rarely hangout with each other, on the job or off.
> It occurs to me that while Black women have indeed benefited mightily from the above, it all has come at serious and heavy costs to Black women as well. Among the more notable "costs" have been the explosion of out of wedlock births, some 70%-plus at present in Black America, and this cuts accross all income/sociometric groups within the Black community. Another area is the fact that at present, some 70% of all professional Black women are single – and not by their own choice. What Black women don't seem to understand and/or accept, is that the very things that have made their successes possible, have also hobbled them in many other ways as well, along the aforementioned lines. Because of the precarious social position of Black America to begin with in relation to White America, these "advances" would have grave unintended consequences that they had little ability to "offset" in the ways that Ms. Ann could. The results speak for themselves.
> Simply put and in closing, White women could afford to burn up their bras and go back home to their hubbies and communities where they were reasonably confident they could secure same; Black women didn't then, and don't now, have such luxuries. And while the owner of this forum and other "swirl bloggers" are pushing a line of "Something New" to their readers, the simple facts on the ground and the math on the spreadsheet says this too is a fool's errand, a solution workable only for a few Black women, but by no means a viable solution for them all in aggregate. The fact that White feminists tend to regard and treat their Black sisters as little more than flowers in the attic, only adds tremendous insult to a longstanding injury. In so many ways, what Black women have received what has amounted to a Faustian Bargain in extremis.

As I note above, not only have Black women benefited arguably the most of any other group of women overall in terms of the goals White feminists have achieved, they've also received a good dose of the unintended consequences of said goals and aims, too – in spades. But hey, they should have thought about all that way back when. As it currently stands, and as is often the case with the Sistarati, Ms. Karazin & Co. are a day late and dollar short – the horse is outta the barn, the genie's out of the bottle, and there's no going back. Although one particular pedantic commenter at Ms. Karazin's site noted that White women benefitted more from AA than Black women, neither she, nor anyone else, could debunk my central point: on the big ticket items that feminists regard as most dear – reproductive rights (read: abortion), education and career/work – Black women do pretty damn well for themselves. In a sane world, one would think that's something to be proud of.

But, as we all know, that is not the world in which we live; women, and this includes the Sistahood, want fried ice. The idea of unintended consequences, cause and effect, opportunity costs and the like, are alien to them – and don't even get me started on their somewhat lax understanding of what it means to actually live in a free republic (as Ms. Karazin herself so aptly demonstrates – more on this soon, stay tuned). True, the Sistahood was never, and probably will never be, feted by the White feministas; but even they cannot deny that they haven't benefited tremendously from, let's be honest, the hard grunt work their White sisters put in. In fact, a strong case can be made for the Sistahood looking a gift horse in the mouth — of being not only ungrateful, or biting the hands that fed them, but also of being downright crass and rude: the very traits they are increasingly becoming known for at home and abroad, and with noteworthy consequences.

After all, there IS some truth in the fact that Black men with options, can and often do, marry or at the very least, date out (Chad Ochocinco, anyone? Wesley Snipes? Tiger Woods? Just to name a few). And despite the efforts of Ms. Karazin and others, last time I checked, there was no stampede of non-Black men beating a paths to the Sistas' doors. But I'm getting a bit ahead of myself here; more to come on the "swirl" front soon. Stay tuned.

Look sistas, since it's clear that you didn't get the memo it falls to me to clue you in: yes, its true, White feminism was about, in truth, the elites – that you and other women of color and for that matter, even poor White women gained from feminism, wasn't by design but actually a flaw in it. The so-called "third wave" of feminists – like Jezebel, Feministing, Feministe and the like – aren't built for or by you, nor are they terribly interested in your concerns, beyond that which makes them feel and look good. You, my Sistas, were and continue to be, Useful Idiots of the feminist lobby, but don't be mad… Like I said, you've made out like a bandit, riding the coattails of those who never really wanted you as a member of the club in the first place.

Remember what happened to Audre Lourde.

I'm just sayin.

Women Lawyers Protesting Potential Social Security Cuts

W.F. Price · 30 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The National Women's Law Center, previously mentioned here for their Title IX actions, has been conducting an online and email campaign to stop any cuts to federal spending on socialist programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, which they admit are overwhelmingly spent on women. Although they fudge the issue by noting that women's average Social Security benefits are lower (this is because older women really did earn less than older men), they do admit that recipients are overwhelmingly female.

Here's an excerpt from their action email:

> Bottom line — these proposals would hurt women and their families. The reductions to Social Security would disproportionately hurt women, who depend more on income from Social Security than men do. And the changes to Medicare and Medicaid would place an extra burden on women, who are the majority of Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries and who already spend a higher percentage of their (already-lower) incomes on health care than men.

Ironically, the NWLC also agitates for higher pay for women and the displacement of men in the workforce, who have traditionally funded these programs. Women dominate the public sector, which means that their jobs are often already a drain on taxpayer funded programs, yet they propose to create even more expensive bureaucracies to coerce the private sector to fork over more money to women, which will inevitably cut into profit and therefore tax revenue.

If they have their way, men will eventually be so thoroughly squeezed by their financial obligations and artificially lower paychecks (companies are already paying men less to avoid discrimination lawsuits) that a large proportion of men will be reduced to abject poverty simply through taxes, child support and the rest. Although many women may feel that this will motivate the men to work harder and make more money, it doesn't exactly work that way. There comes a point after which grinding men into the dirt ceases to pay off. This is the case for a number of reasons, including the fact that when people feel they have nothing to lose they will cheat, steal, hide income and generally become far more difficult to tax and control. They will also be far less likely to actually try to make income above board, as they know it will immediately be taken away from them for nothing in return. Even slaves need some currency to remain constructive – usually in the form of adequate food, shelter and clothing – but thanks to the efforts of feminists, many contemporary men can't even count on that.

However, future time orientation doesn't seem to be a strong suit for the female lawyers at the NWLC, so they keep chugging along demanding that men strip the shirts off their backs to keep women's entitlements flowing in.

Although the current level of government spending is unsustainable, it remains to be seen whether cuts will be politically feasible. Given that women have achieved such political power in recent decades, it may prove impossible to trim the budget enough for a return to a functional economy, in which case we are looking at a very hard fall in the not-so-distant future.

Evolutionary Psychologist: Male Mid-Life Crisis a Myth, Workplace Harassment Overblown

W.F. Price · 1 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

London School of Economics researcher and evolutionary psychologist Satoshi Kanazawa has released Ten Politically Incorrect Truths about Human Nature, a book that explains, among other things, why women's objection to harassment at work is unreasonable, why suicide bombers tend to be Muslim and why there is no such thing as the male mid-life crisis.

Although I wouldn't say I entirely agree with Kanazawa on every point he makes, it is worth noting that someone who works at a university is writing these opinions at all. The feminist orthodoxy on college campuses would probably have rendered Kanazawa a target of a vicious campaign as recently as five years ago, but now he feels that he can publish such views with impunity.

As many commenters have noticed, public attitudes toward feminism have changed markedly in recent years, and it is easy to detect a great deal of overt hostility toward the ideology. Universities tend to be somewhat orthodox institutions, and therefore change more slowly than the rest of society, but it looks as though we are seeing some weakening of the feminist restraints on any discussion on matters of sexuality and relations between the sexes.

French Domestic Violence Ad: Ham-Fisted Propaganda

In the following French domestic violence ad, middle class French men are shown casually beating women, and then the ad takes a turn toward the pornographic, with women molesting and beating each other.

Of course, we all know that it is respectable, middle class French who customarily violently beat women at home, in public and at work. I'm sure the ad's accurate depiction of the terrible threat French women face from mild-mannered office workers, balding middle aged men, attractive blondes and aging women will "shock" the French into putting a stop to all this madness…

Restraining Orders Hurt Women...and Men

Featured Guest · 2 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Grace Krejci of West Allis, Wis. took out a restraining order on her separated husband. Last week the deranged man broke into her house because their 5-year-old son hadn't been picked up at school. Minutes later Grace lay dead of a bullet wound.

Toni Brown of Washington, DC had an order of protection, believing that would ward off the escalating threats by her former live-in girlfriend. Then a late-night attack rendered her respirator-dependent, thanks to a close-range gunshot in the back of her neck.

Abused men also have been victimized by these legal devices – like Mauricio Droguett who was fatally stabbed by his ex-wife in an Iowa shopping mall, despite the existence of a restraining order cradled in his pocket.

Maybe it's time for a sanity check.

By what crazy logic do persons believe that inscribing the words, "Order of Protection" on a sheet of 20-pound paper is going to deter a would-be assailant who is intent on maiming his or her victim?

How can judges dole out such orders when no research shows they do any good in stopping violence?

And when persons with restraining orders keep getting assaulted, what possesses lawmakers to enact even more laws designed to make these flawed tools widely available?

Samuel Goldberg, a Boston attorney who specializes in partner abuse cases, notes that restraining orders are awarded so casually that "this is why they are not taken as seriously as they should be." The Independent Women's Forum likewise decries these legal tropes as "lulling women into a false sense of security."

Restraining orders not only are ineffective, they can also escalate partner conflict. In its Family Legal Guide, the American Bar Association warns, "a court order might even add to the [alleged offender's] rage."

This wrath is understandable in light of the fact that some women use restraining orders as a weapon to harass and entrap unwary men.

Consider the Panama City, Fla. woman who took out a restraining order against her ex-husband. On November 17 she was ordered to appear in court for a child support hearing. Fearful she might be incarcerated, she texted her husband, pleading that he attend the proceeding so their 18-month-old daughter would be taken care of.

As soon as the father stepped into the courtroom, the conniving woman advised the court of the injunction, occasioning his immediate arrest.

It turns out that misuse of restraining orders is widespread. Elaine Epstein, former president of the Massachusetts Bar Association, has admitted, "Everyone knows that restraining orders and orders to vacate are granted to virtually all who apply…In many cases, allegations of abuse are now used for tactical advantage."

A 1995 study conducted by the Massachusetts Trial Court reviewed the domestic restraining orders issued in that state. The survey found that less than half of the orders involved even an allegation of violence. And a West Virginia study found eight out of 10 of orders were unnecessary or false.

So if restraining orders aren't worth the paper they're written on, what can abuse victims who fear for their lives do to protect themselves?

Consider Maria Terrones, 45, who was killed two weeks ago in Fairfield, Calif. The suspected assailant, her former boyfriend, squeezed the trigger as she was walking outside with her new heart-throb at 1:15am. Even though she too had a restraining order prohibiting any form of contact, she had fallen into an argument with her ex- in the parking lot just hours before the shooting.

So instead of giving her false reassurance in the form of an order of protection, Terrones would have been better served with a detailed Safety Plan that warned her to not engage in any verbal confrontations with her ex-, and advised her against late-night strolls in public areas.

Each year 2-3 million domestic restraining orders are issued for the ostensible purpose of curbing domestic violence: http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/VAWA-Restraining-Orders . In reality, such orders are a well-intentioned but misguided hold-over from our nation's overblown War on Crime, handsomely underwritten at taxpayer expense.

According to an October 13 Gallup poll, 46% of Americans believe our government poses an "immediate threat to the rights and freedoms of ordinary citizens." There is no better example of governmental power run amok than our legal system's unreserved and undeserved reliance on abuse restraining orders.

Sexual Specialization and Civilizational Advancement

Elusive Wapiti · 2 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This article by Steve Sailer is most interesting, in that it links sex role specialization and family model to technological advancement, a point that I have made on this blog repeatedly:

> But the obvious thing that jumps out at you from the map is the high correlation between plowing and level of civilizational accomplishment (at least as measured in impressive ruins and buildings). The Taj Mahal, for example, is found in a plow culture. The ancient and medieval churches of plowing Ethiopia are a lot more impressive than the big pile of loose rocks that is the chief monument of Zimbabwe.
> Source: Sailer. Click here to enlarge.
> Of course, one causal connection between gender roles and civilizational accomplishment is that you can get more done if men work harder, as they tend to do in plow cultures.

Hmmm. This is quite interesting, in that this observation lends perspective to the great experiment our culture has chosen to perform on itself. With feminism, Western civilization seeks to blur the distinction between the male and female spheres. We are told that this is 'progress', that such egalitarianism is really enlightened behavior, the cultivation of social habits that make the best use out of the talents of the male and female sexes. We are told that this is better than the knuckle-dragging Neanderthal days of rigid sex role specialization, where men worked in the fields (later in the factories) and ran the whole of society, while women were consigned to domestic duties and were little more than sexual chattel. Thus is the pro-egalitarian message pushed by the femmarxists: the new egalitarianism is simply better than the old, sexist ways that put women in a gilded cage.

However, there is nothing new under the sun, and humanity has seen the face of egalitarianism before: it was practiced all around the world in times past, that is, until those egalitarian societies were superseded by more technologically advanced, aggressive, efficient, and expansionary cultures. Every time an egalitarian society meets and competes with a specialized one, the egalitarian one loses. The reasons for this are many and I won't delve into them here, but the simple fact of the matter is that less specialized / more egalitarian societies–those in which both the men and women have similar roles–tend to be more backwards and less modern and less resilient in the face of one that is more specialized and rigid in its sex roles. That is a fact, played out on the stage of history over and over and over again.

Another interesting observation is that men in more specialized "plow" cultures tend to work harder than those in less specialized “hoe” cultures. We see this today in the relatively lackluster performance of males in egalitarianized Western societies; the men simply have better things to do–like amuse themselves, or protect themselves from exploitation–than to labor and turn their surplus of energy into more socially productive ends. Compared to women, the men in such a society are lazy and indolent, and women regularly out-achieve them. The feminists note this too, in their complaints about African and Caribbean societies that women do all the work, while men malinger about.

Sailer also notes the correlation between egalitarianism and sexual competition, and speculates that the higher civilizational accomplishment found in plow cultures (which feature rigid sex roles and tend to take a dimmer view of polygyny) is due to men not having to spend their energies competing with each other for available mates:

> You can also get bigger things done if men don’t spend most of their energies competing with each other to mate with the most women. Anthropologist Peter Frost blogs at Evo and Proud about traditional societies where women do most of the farm work:
> > The polygyny rate varies considerably among human populations, being highest (20 to 40% of all sexual unions) in the agricultural societies of sub-Saharan Africa and Papua-New Guinea.
> > Such high rates have consequences. …
> > High-polygyny society = Failed society?
> > In my last post, I noted that high-polygyny societies remain simple in large part because intense sexual competition keeps them from evolving into more complex entities. The surplus males stir up endless conflict, if only because war provides them with access to women…

> > Urban Africa and the new mating environment
> > This is not to say that a high-polygyny society cannot evolve into a low-polygyny one. It can, if the material conditions of life change. We see this happening as Africans move off the land and into cities and towns, where women can less easily feed themselves and their children without assistance. Urban African men are less likely to be polygynous because it costs them more to provide for a second wife.
> > This in turn has shifted the pressure of sexual competition from men to women. It is increasingly the woman who must compete to find a mate. Whereas before she only had to work hard at tending her plot of land, she must now invest in her physical appearance, notably by lengthening her hair and bleaching her skin.

Again we see this played out real-time in the West. The decline in sexual specialization among Western men and women has not only resulted in less productivity from individual men–thus reducing civilizational accomplishment–it has also encouraged its own form of polygyny as resource-seeking women gravitate toward those men with the most wealth and power. In turn, just as in Africa today, resource-seeking women in an increasingly egalitarian society must compete with other resource-seeking women for the attentions of the most powerful men (the less powerful men being relatively resource-poor). This leads women in egalitarian societies to increasingly commodify themselves sexually. We also see this in action today, what with the re-introduction of the alpha male harem into the formerly monogamous, formerly Christian culture, and the serially polyandrous behavior of the alpha male Carouseler.

Thus, less productivity from men, due to reduced role specialization, social disenfranchisement, and a greater focus on self-gratification/self preservation, teams up with greater sexual competition for both men and women to retard civilizational advancement. History is clear that civilizations that foster and maintain a sharp division of labor between the sexes, and the attendant reduction in sexual marketplace competition for men and women, prosper and eventually overtake those that do not.

The Unsustainability of the Progressive Class

Seattle, my hometown, is arguably the most progressive city in the United States, so I see the "SWPL" (Stuff White People Like) culture pretty much every time I look out a window or step out the door. These people pride themselves on being smarter and morally superior to the seething, unwashed masses who inhabit the suburbs and exurbs of the US, but, truth be told, they seem pretty mediocre themselves to me. If anything, they are characterized by conformity and and an eagerness to please, and if one takes the cost of urban living and student loan debt into account, most aren't really that wealthy, and barely qualify as middle class.

One of the things that is most striking about the progressive cities in the US is what they lack: children. San Francisco has the fewest children of all US cities, followed by Seattle, which has more dogs than children. If there are any more progressive, left-wing cities in the US, I haven't heard of them. Given the cost of living, this is entirely understandable. People are at their most fertile while young, and most young families simply can't afford to live in these cities without some assistance from either extended family or the government. As I know from personal experience, raising a couple small children in an expensive, progressive city with the meager pay most young folks earn is a struggle to say the least. You have to lower your lifestyle standards, and let's be honest: not many young, urban American women – or men for that matter – are willing to make that sacrifice.

So, an odd trend has emerged in which women are pushing childbearing to the outer limits of their fertility. Typically, white women in these cities wait until they are over 30 before having children. Black women, for their part, still often have children while young, but they are having far fewer than they used to — there are many more childless black women than there were a generation ago. The only demographic that has children at the normal age is immigrants, mainly East Africans and Mexicans where I live.

So, while I was at a school event for my son last night, I found myself surrounded by other white people who were, in general, significantly older than I am, and I'm just about the average age for an American father. Some of the mothers were pushing 50, and more than a few fathers were already gray. I looked around and wondered how many of these couples had to see a fertility specialist to help things along. It was a little unsettling seeing these wrinkly women and gray-haired men with small children in tow.

If one buys into the dominant urban culture in the US, this outcome is to be expected. Having a respectable middle-class income and the trappings that come along with it generally takes until middle-age, and housing is so expensive that many urban residents are still paying off their houses well into old age. Then, of course, there are cultural expectations. Today, urban women are expected to earn and work as much as urban men, and motherhood simply doesn't work in this context. Plenty of women want to be mothers, but they keep telling themselves "I'll settle down next year" until it's finally too late. There are countless little tragedies; examples of women who, when they are finally ready to have a child, simply no longer have the physical wherewithal. The feminist, progressive culture is consuming its own adherents.

It is hard to say what this means for the future. Some say that conservative, religious types will inevitably outbreed the infertile progressives, and that's probably true, but there will likely be a strong incentive to flood the US with even more immigrants as employers and Republicans demand cheap labor and Democrats look for a new constituency to replace their aging, child-poor true believers. Does this mean the US will become somewhat like Brazil? Possibly, but I'm still convinced climate plays a role in national development, and I just don't see African or Latin American immigrants running the country north of the frost line.

Ultimately, the long-term feasibility of the progressive white American culture will come into question at some point in the near future, and it will be discredited, probably during the next decade. Of all the demographic groups in the US, these people are probably the most expensive of all, considering their salaries at state-supported nonprofits or in the public sector, the damage they do with the institutions they run, the cost of their ideology and the burden they place on the rest of America.

Perhaps the tired old parents I was seeing at the elementary school were simply an indication that the radical equalitarian-hypocrite class is finally starting to pay the piper, and the cost they have levied on the rest of us is finally starting to consume them as well. The strain that was evident from their careworn, wrinkled faces and whitening hair certainly did not suggest a “vibrant” ascendant people or ideology.

Julian Assange Was Accused of Rape by Anna Ardin, a Radical Feminist Who Was Out for Revenge

Ferdinand Bardamu · 4 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This article was originally posted, in a slighly different form, at In Mala Fide on December 3, 2010.

You can't make this stuff up. Legion alerted me to a post at the False Rape Society on the identity of one of Julian Assange's accusers – a radical feminist with a revenge fetish:

> Anna Ardin, a notorious radical known in Sweden for her feminism views on how men achieve social dominance through sex, has been known to be bent on revenge. On January Ardin posted a blog entry on '7 Steps to Legal Revenge by Anna Ardin', which included a statement, I've been thinking about some revenge over the last few days… An article on the blog can be read here
> - http://progressivealaska.blogspot.com/2010/08/strangest-blog-thread-yet-on-swedish.html .
> It is also noted that this is not the first time Ardin has accused someone for molestation of a sexual nature in Sweden.
> Ardin invited Assange to Stockholm, and was briefly appointed his press secretary during his visit.
> The story begins the weekend of August 15. Assange wanted to attend a Swedish crayfish party, Ardin made the arrangements.
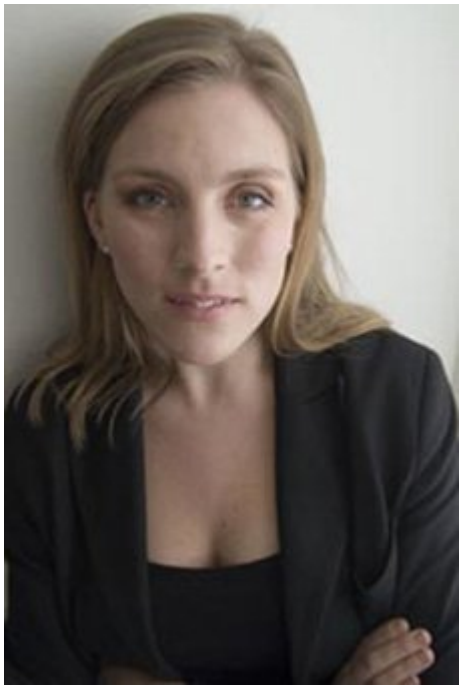
> According to the Swedish newspaper Expressen, Assange sexually harassed a woman (Ardin) in Stockholm then two or three days later traveled 20km to Enköping where he supposedly raped another woman (Ardin's friend). The Expressen concludes by an astonishing coincidence, the two women were friends. They decided a week later to go to a police station together saying that "Assange raped and harassed us".

I'm guessing Anna Ardin is the "Woman A" mentioned here.

Do you understand this? Assange's "victim" is a twisted, man-hating bitch who was bent on getting revenge for being played. She fabricated a rape charge because she was mad at him for porking her younger hotter tighter girlfriend within two days of putting it in her. Ardin is a sick puppy whose petty act of vengeance will damn an innocent man.

This is the little darling:



If ever there was a time for us to spring into action, this is it. We must sound the bell – Julian Assange's rape accusers are nothing more than lying feminist slags. The name "Anna Ardin" must go down with Crystal Gail Mangum and Katelyn Faber in the Hall of Girls Who Cried Rape. We must make the definitive case as to how feminists have destroyed modern society by making it easy for mentally disturbed groupies to make false rape accusations because their feeeeeeelings were hurt. We must hang this albatross around the feminists' necks and give them a blow that they will never recover from.

If there is a men's rights movement, this is your call to action. This is where you must prove you are more than talk. The ball is in your court.

Email Glitch

W.F. Price · 5 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For the last couple weeks, one of my email accounts has been held up for some reason or the other. I probably have to configure the memory differently, but I'll check in with the host to see what the problem is.

The account that's been held up is the submissions email, so if you've sent a submission recently I didn't see it until this morning (about a dozen arrived in a batch). So I have quite a few to go through, and I'll start with the oldest ones first. I have to admit that I was a bit puzzled as to why none had come through for some time, but I figured it was simply the time of year.

I expect the email problem will be resolved soon, so unless I mention it again just submit the articles as usual and we'll be back on schedule soon.

The Name of Julian Assange's Other False Rape Accuser is Sofia Wilén

This article was originally posted, in a slightly different form, at In Mala Fide on December 4, 2010.

A reader emailed me to tell me that Julian Assange's second rape accuser is named Sofia Wilén. She's the "Woman B" in this article, the stalkerish groupie who slept with Assange but got mad at him after he turned out to be an inattentive geek. There are a bunch of articles confirming Wilén's involvement in the case, including her friendship with Assange's other accuser, the psychotic feminist Anna Ardin:

> STOCKHOLM/MELBOURNE (Rixstep) — The charges against Julian Assange were indeed trumped up. Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilén planned it all. They went to the police station asking for advice, knowing the police would turn it into an accusation of rape. They're also the ones who leaked the story to the tabloid Expressen.
> This was revealed in a letter written by Assange's Australian barrister to the website Crikey.

> A bit of a recap first.
> Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilén approached the Klara police station in Stockholm on the afternoon of Friday 20 August 2010 to ask questions of the police, purportedly about forcing someone to submit to STD/HIV tests.
> The policemen on duty rang up prosecutor on duty Maria Kjellstrand even before the formal interrogation had begun. Kjellstrand - working with no paperwork at all at this point – issued an 'APB' for Assange and had the police search the Stureplan district of Stockholm for Assange, ostensibly to bring him in for questioning (and a tour of Swedish isolation cells).
> The formal interrogation of Sofia Wilén was only concluded hours later and the interrogation of Anna Ardin didn't take place until the day after - by telephone.
> As seen from Anna Ardin's SMS history, Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilén made the whole thing up - and even decided to leak the story to notorious Swedish tabloid Expressen. The story reached Niklas Svensson and others at Expressen at 19:52.
> A colleague of Svensson's rang up Maria Kjellstrand to find out if the story was true - and Kjellstrand, violating the rules of her office, told the reporter that it was.

Wilén is apparently a photographer by trade. Here are some pictures of her:

Women Do Not Save Souls: Re-learning Beauty is Skin Deep

By J. Coronado

Last weekend my nephews visited my sons while their parents went out on a date. After feeding everyone dinner and letting them play awhile, I sat them in front of the TV to watch a cartoon movie we'd rented earlier. While the four boys, ages ranging from 4 to 7, watched the move, I sat on the floor surfing the internet on my laptop.

Mostly I paid very little mind to what they were watching, but one brief episode did seize my attention. The group of young protagonists was in its formation and among a small group of boys was one girl. As events of their encounter played out, at one point the girl hit one of the boys, who angrily declared:

"Hey! Why'd you do that?"

"Because I like you", she answered.

"That's how I tell people that I like them".

At this, all four boys laughed in unison. It was a deep belly laugh and like the laugh of any small child of such an innocent age, it was entirely sincere. They really thought this was funny.

This seized my attention and I reflected on it at some length. At this very early age the culture and media have already succeeded at socializing these young boys to think that when a girl hits a boy, it's funny. Such is the power of culture and media. These lessons are deep and difficult to uproot, because they being so early, and they are absorbed without question by so many (creating a reinforcing groupthink), long before they have a capacity to examine, reflect and be critical. They are brainwashed: girls hitting boys—funny.

So it was with a mind still soaking in this power of culture that I was driving later in the week, with my car radio on "scan" and it happened across a sappy Ricky Iglesias song, "Hero", and certain words of the song gripped me so that in spite of myself, I stopped the scan and listened.

Much of the lyrics are boilerplate sappy that we'd expect from pop:

> Would you dance if I asked you to dance?
> Would you run and never look back?

More of it makes hyperbolic romantic promises, also fairly boilerplate:

> I can be you hero baby
> I can kiss away the pain
> I will stand by you forever

But then there was this—this which grabbed hold of my attention, bothered me, and wouldn't let go:

Would you cry if you saw me crying?
Would you save my soul, tonight?

"Would you save my soul?" The lyricist, the musician, he asks, of a woman: "would you save my soul?"

These are incredible words really. And let me add, they are incredible quite without respect to whether or not one believes in God, gods or souls.

Let's digress for a minute and consider what we can all agree that we can reasonably ask of each other:

Sappy or not, we can ask if we will dance

We can ask for a kiss when it hurts

We can ask for (though we may not receive) a promise of lifelong fidelity

We can ask for these things and for much more, for these are things which belong to the purview of what it is to be human. To use the language of Stephen Jay Gould as he tried to demarcate rules of mutual acceptance between religion and science, we can say that these things: dancing, a kiss, a commitment—these are part of the Magisterium of Humanity—we can ask these things of our fellow human beings, because the faculties required to give them are indeed within the scope of human capacity.

Perhaps that's being a bit too pedantic. When it gets down to it, suffice it to say:

Humans, men and women, can dance

Humans, men and women, can kiss

Humans, men and women, can make commitments

Humans, men and women, can feel powerful emotions

Humans, men and women, can offer one another compassion and warmth

And, true to the spirit of Iglesias's song:

Though it is rare—humans, men and women, can be brave, and be heroes to one another

But Iglesias's lyrics were not gripping for what they say that is true and possible of the Magisterium of Humanity, for these were all things which are either asked of or implied as faculties of the man, by the lyricist. These lyrics were so gripping on account of what they attribute to a woman, which they attribute ubiquitously to a woman, and which one must guess, most listeners hear without so much as a speed-bump's worth of cognitive dissonance:

Would you save my soul, tonight?

Why would the lyricist ask a woman to save his soul? Why would listeners, millions of them, across languages and cultures, hear these words and accept them, accept them as one might accept that the person answering the phone number one has just dialed says, "hello" upon answering?

How can a woman save a soul?

Humans feed the hungry, God can stop poverty. Humans can resist war, God can stop war. There is a metaphorical and metaphysical point at work here that is true at the level of a basic, humanist property—there are limits to the faculties of humanity. In other words, this truth holds without respect to whether or not one believes in a deity, the deity exists as a mere metaphorical counterpoint of a theoretical infinite, if only to put the focus on the reality of what it means to be human, to be finite.

We are not deities, we are human.

We are not infinite, we are finite.

We are not omnipotent, we can be brave

We cannot save souls, we can offer human comfort

And, must it even be said?: women, too, are people, not deities

What's more, the incredible sentiment of this song, attributing to women the power to save a man's soul, this isn't limited to sappy pop songs. It was within seconds of being so bothered by this that I immediately mentally connected with other songs from music of a harder variety, which essentially asks the same of women.

Staind, for example, in "It's Been Awhile", writes as a broken man in the grip of a heroin addiction reaching out for his girlfriend, to save him from the hellish pit of his own making:

> It's been a while > since I could say that I wasn't addicted and > It's been a while
> Since I could say I love myself as well and
> It's been a while
> Since I've gone …
> But all that shit seems to disappear when I'm with you …
> It's been a while
> Since I could look at myself straight > and it's been awhile
> since I said I'm sorry
> It's been awhile
> Since I've seen the way the candles light your face

And if that were not disturbing enough, Nine Inch Nails in "Closer", referring in the most explicit manner to coitus, identifies himself as a literally wrecked soul, desperate for oblivion, and cries out to his girlfriend to "get me closer to God":

> Help me, I broke apart my insides
> Help me, I've got no soul to sell
> Help me, the only thing that works for me
> Help me get away from myself
> My whole existence is flawed
> You get me closer to God

However strained or explicit the metaphor, all three songs convey a belief, indeed what can be described as a religious conviction, a faith possessed and shared by the songs' lyricists and accepted as conventional truth by the masses that popularize them. The faith holds that women save souls, transcend the Charonic grip of addiction and assist (through sex) the most lost and depraved on their tortured pilgrimage to the divine.

All of this is, in two words, utterly ridiculous.

Women can no more save a man's soul, or anyone's soul, than they can flutter their eyes, blink and apperate your house pet to Neptune.

And no, it is not a mere romantic notion, this idea of women saving men's souls. In less than two words, in just one: it's bullshit.

But the troubling thing about it is that however obvious it is that it is bullshit, it is bullshit that is accepted, without question, on a daily basis, millions of times, every single time someone, somewhere, listens to one of these songs, and is not in the least bit bothered by it.

In the same way that my sons and their cousins were not bothered by a girl hitting a boy, but laughed as they have been acculturated to do at this earliest of age, millions of people listen to these songs, are not bothered by them, and even share the religious faith these songs express.

Women have the power to save souls. Let us beg and supplicate to them through music and poetry, that they would deign to save ours.

We often hear at an early age that beauty is only skin deep, but it seems evident that male and female alike, we do not accept this truism and whatever power the genuine truth holds, it is undermined at an early age by a barrage and steady stream of images and messages that uniformly and uncompromisingly state the opposite. Brainwashed, we can almost be said to hold the truism in contempt.

We appear to be as impetuous children in the way we respond to the non-relationship between beauty and virtue. We believe that beauty is virtuous, especially feminine beauty.

In this religious system, not only is beauty virtuous, but it is imbued with special powers: spiritual, angelic powers—powers that exceed our own primitive male faculties by unimaginable orders of magnitude.

With a faith system such as this, can the state of society and relations between the genders be any wonder?

Women are taught, and largely believe that men's souls are depraved, and in dire need of saving—and that they are endowed to grace men with that salvation. Men are likewise taught that their souls are corrupted, that they require repair, and that salvation is available through supplication, to female beauty.

It is a spell, a spell with a vast culture firmly in its grip: female beauty covers all manner of vice and is a substitute for any deficit of genuine virtue; female beauty is in and of itself virtuous and not merely virtuous—angelic.

Of course this is false and nonsense, but we can only resist the falsity and nonsense if we first recognize it. Female beauty is desirable, and an object of painful desire experienced by men everywhere, but female beauty in and of itself confers no inherent virtue.

Men, to be able to have reasonable relationships with women, must first disabuse themselves of the notion that women's beauty confers any virtue upon them or, more importantly, that women possess virtue in any excess of men. However a man understands spirituality, he must understand that whatever spiritual corruption he attributes to men, women share fully in that corruption.

This is not at all to put women down. Far from it, it is the most humanist thing we can say of them. Women are people—they are every bit as flawed as men. They are at least as flawed as men. They are in no sense any better than men. All of this should be obvious, but that it is not obvious is evident from the popularity of music that assumes of its listener a religious conviction that women possess mighty spiritual power.

This is not a new religious faith. Ricky Iglesias is not the first to call upon a woman to save his soul, and he won't be the last. The next popular anthem attributing divine potencies to woman is probably on the production block now as you read this article.

But faith does not change men into gods or women into angels. Men and women, alike, are people.

More Men Faking it in Bed

W.F. Price · 6 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A study of college students revealed that more and more men are faking orgasms, mainly because they are not all that impressed with the sex.

Researchers, however, are blaming the trend on antidepressants and internet porn, because it couldn't possibly be that some women are lousy in bed, just plain unattractive or boring. One sexuality counselor suggests that men are becoming "harder to please," yet doesn't seem to consider the fact that young women are possibly harder to look at and listen to than ever.

The simple presence of a female – even a naked one – is not sufficient to arouse a man, but today's women may not have internalized that fact. There are a number of things that can turn a guy off during sex, including unpleasant odors, unpleasant sights, loose flesh, annoying or ridiculous noises, a woman's lack of interest or enthusiasm or even a woman's overenthusiasm/dominant behavior.

Lots of young men feel pressured to have sex with women they are not all that attracted to, and today they are pressured to perform due to the obsession with the female orgasm, which sometimes results in men exhausting themselves by drilling away for unnaturally long periods of time. This can have a desensitizing effect and lead a man to want to simply end it in one way or another. And if she can fake it to get it over with, why can't he?

In fact, it is probably the obsession with the female orgasm that led to the "faking it" trend amongst women as well. The truth is that about a third of women usually climax from vaginal sex, a third climax some of the time, and about a third rarely if ever do, but men are taught that their value as a sexual partner lies entirely with their ability to give women orgasms. Women who want a guy to feel adequate will sometimes fake an orgasm, so that he feels he's "done his job," and men who want to be good sexual partners will keep going until they are entirely worn out and the sex is no longer pleasant for them.

Now, it looks as though a few guys have grown tired of this, and are using the same trick as the women. For guys, it's an even better excuse to finish up than it is for women, because following the climax it's all over.

The idea that men are sexually dysfunctional due to porn or drugs almost seems calculated to give "sex counselors" more work. Actually, when sex becomes a chore for men and all about pleasing a demanding woman, it should be expected that some of them will look for excuses to cut it short.

Who's The Man? Misandry and the Actor

By K.K.

"WHO'S THE MAN?!" Roared Will Smith triumphantly, after punching an alien's lights out in Independence Day. Indeed, if you too can fly a fighter jet and an alien spacecraft, K.O. a villain with one punch, effectively save the world, and have a hot stripper for a girlfriend, you're indeed The Man. Although, more likely, you're a character in a movie.

Roles like that one are the main reason actors keep auditioning year after year, taking almost any role for the exposure and the money (when money's actually in the equation). You put your pride on a shelf to play a transvestite stripper (like George Clooney did) or a mutant kangaroo (like Ice-T did) or a giant jar of mustard in a parade (like Ted Danson did). In the meantime, you do everything from work at Kentucky Fried Chicken (like Mel Gibson did) or polish coffins (like Sean Connery did). You have tunnel vision, focusing on fame and wealth…which is a damned shame, when you turn on the television or watch a film, and see what men have allowed themselves to be portrayed as.

Count the thieves, murderers and rapists, if you feel like it. Note how virtually every sitcom 'husband' is a clueless oaf (even if he's his own show's producer or head writer!) while his perfect wife has an IQ of 220…she must have married for love. Watch as we morph out of being actual swine in a nightclub surrounded by attractive women, only if we possess a particular product. Note how every drunken driver depicted in a PSA is always exclusively male.

There is "The Good Wife"—but not "The Good Husband". There is "The Starter Wife" but not "The Starter Husband". There are fortunately some positive role models to be found in crime dramas; the stereotypical dogged detectives of CSI or LAW & ORDER, for example. It would seem, however, that there are ten male villains (or bums/alcoholics/deadbeats/etc.) for every male hero.

While MRA's fight to get their voices heard and try to reverse the cultural perception of "Men are pigs", male actors race to the bank after leaving another negative image in the public eye.

I wrote in Practical Madness: A Primer For Actors, "If you're female, or any minority, do all the commercials you can. They're easy, don't take long to shoot, and can be your way of 'Sticking it to the man', if you feel like doing that. Women and minorities are always portrayed positively in commercials, for the most part. If you're a white male, consider boycotting commercials, until that shining day advertisers don't portray us as morons."

I already know that'll be a hard sell, due to the money involved. My last commercial (where, fortunately, all I had to do was pretend to be winning at a casino) paid $300 for a five-hour bus ride to a four-star resort, an upscale room at said resort, another $300 for about seven hours of shooting the next day, then $300 for the bus ride back home, plus $130 per diem spending money. $1,030 all told for what was essentially a vacation. Financially, it beat the hell out of Macbeth 2019, a groundbreaking work of theatre that paid nothing. That particular commercial didn't negatively portray men or women; it was simply a lie. We weren't gambling for real, we weren't winning anything.

After my last film, which was a pretty decent role for once (a military officer sent to rescue some citizens from mutant killers), I'm prepared to ditch film, television and commercials in favor of theatre and stand-up comedy…where, as Bill Burr, Chris Rock and Bill Maher have proven, you can promote MRA ideals as long as they get some laughs. Naturally, if I was offered a film or television role that did not negatively portray men, I'd do it in a heartbeat. But as stated previously, there are ten male villains for every male hero. It goes without saying you can't have drama without conflict, and men are still the settlers of most conflicts…but the overkill of man-bashing marches on.

What if that idea took off? The prevailing thought would be, that'd never work, you've got too many actors already prepared to play ANY role just for the money or exposure. It's dog eat dog, every man for himself, ad nauseum.

However, our careers are still under our control, or at least they should be. Someone once told me “Careers hinge on how many times an actor says ‘No’”. One actor’s career didn’t really take off until he said “Jack Nicholson doesn’t do television!”

I’d like to say “K.K. doesn’t play scumbags!” Will I lose out on money, and roles? Obviously. Will I be not be ‘typecast’ as a thief, murderer, rapist or deadbeat dad? Thankfully, yes. Will my friends and family not see me morphing into a pig in a commercial? Hell yes, that’s best of all.

Who’s the man?

All of us. Maybe we ought to start acting like it.

Facing Rape Prosecution in the UK: A First Person Account

W.F. Price · 7 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A reader sent me a pdf he has created detailing his experience of being falsely accused of rape by his wife during a custody dispute. While he eventually came out in one piece, the ordeal was pretty horrific. All men involved in an intimate relationship with a woman – including and especially husbands and fathers – should read it, because this can happen to anyone. In fact, even men who are not involved in a relationship should probably take a look, because men often become targets of convenience simply because they happen to be in the vicinity when a woman makes her move.

This is NOT one of those "it can't happen to me" issues. Take a look at the stories of some of the men exonerated by the Innocence Project — in many of these cases the wrongly convicted men had never even met the woman who accused them of rape, and yet they were sentenced to lengthy prison terms.

So feel free to download and read The False Rape Accusation Survival Guide — this kind of information might help a great deal if a woman ever decides to destroy you for one reason or another.

And yes, it even happens to alphas — Casanova had to flee Venice after a spurned lover accused him of rape back in the 18th century.

Assange Arrested, No Bail

W.F. Price · 7 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Julian Assange turned himself in to police in London and stated his intention to fight extradition to Sweden, where he faces vague sex-crime charges. Feminist Anna Ardin and accomplice Sofia Wilen, his accusers, met each other after both had slept with Assange within a short timeframe, and they subsequently joined forces to jointly accuse him of rape.

There is a lot of background on Anna Ardin, who is not only a feminist ideologue who has made sexual harassment accusations against her students at the University of Uppsala for not paying attention to her, but apparently was also involved in some intrigues in Cuba, from which she was expelled for her association with a right-wing feminist group. As for Sofia Wilen, she appears to be a young, aspiring photographer, a little odd, and perhaps suggestible, as it was apparently Ardin who convinced her to go to the police.

A number of journalists on both the right and left have exposed some of the activities of Ardin and offered their own commentary, however the mainstream media has been oddly silent about the accusers and their background.

Iranian Traditionalist Debates Canadian Feminist

Hawaiian Libertarian · 8 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Canadian Journalist Barbara Kay wrote an article for Canada's National Post, entitled The Shame of Honour Killings, in which she offered a feminist indictment on the barbarity of Iranian Patriarchal customs for stoning adulteress women to death.

In response to her article, an Iranian man emailed her in an attempt to discuss the Iranian point of view regarding a particular case that Kay had highlighted in her article, as well as the cultural differences between the genders in Iran in comparison to his perception of gender relations in the West.

It was an illuminating correspondence that she featured in her latest NP piece, Female Justice and the Iranian Male.

The Iranian man, going by the name of Reza, writes to Ms. Kay:

> Dear Ms. Barbara Kay,
> Hello,
> I am writing to you from Iran, a country where many people in the world don't know the people and culture. Please excuse me for taking your time. I have many questions about life in western countries and I haven't found anybody to answer it, but they are mostly social, not political.
> I read your article about the stoning [of Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani]. You can be sure that she won't be executed.
> The question is, What do Iranians think about Mrs Ashtiani case?
> If you ask this question from ordinary people, they would say she must be executed without mercy!
> I studied all files within reach about the case of Mrs Ashtiani in Farsi. The truth is that she had illegal relationship with her nephew and committed adultery. Her husband didn't know about this at all. They planned to kill him to take what he owned. One night when they were alone at home she gave sedative to her husband when he slept. With help [from] her, the nephew did take him to the bath and give him 220 volt electric shock in head, chest, legs and hands. Almost his body exploded where connected to electricity. If you were judge of this case, what would be your decision?

My, my, Reza offers us far more details of this case than Kay bothered to even try to reference in her initial article. Kay simply referenced her case as evidence of the barbarous nature of Iranian culture:

> Let us hope the momentum generated by Ms. Ashtiani's plight leads to wider recognition of what she represents in the broader sense: the scourge of Honour Motivated Violence (HMV) against girls and women for deviance from draconian codes of sexual purity.

Now, I'm not clear on Iranian law…but it appears that case involves far more than simple adultery…but, of course, like any feminist, Kay ignores this new information and simply changes the topic to one of simply opposing capital punishment.

> I really do hope you are right that Mrs. Ashtiani will not be executed. It is a most distressing subject for us in the West. We find the custom of stoning to be an extremely ugly form of execution, and in fact most people in the West do not believe in capital punishment at all.

Why yes, it most certainly is distressing to feminists in the West, that a woman who murders her husband with the help of her lover would actually be punished! This is not a case of domestic violence leading to murder…it's a case of barbaric Iranian Patriarchy!

In his first letter, Reza tried to point out that women in Iran are not really treated as badly as Barbara and other western feminists have tried to portray.

Reza wrote:

> But the truth is that Iranian women in Iran (especially traditional society) have far better satisfaction than western women. In Iran, Mother is highly respected, especially when she grows old.
> Although I've never been in western countries, what "is obvious" is that western women don't have a secure life, men always betray their wives and when they feel alone, [men] find someone and it will destroy the family. If there were kids, the mother must suffer growing them up and this is hard for a woman to work to pay the expenses. But satisfaction is completely different in Iran society. The loyalty of men and women is very important. Maybe you don't believe me. I am a man 47 years old and there is only one woman in my life, my wife who my mother selected for me and we have three kids.
> And I think it is prosperity for a woman. Don't you think so?
> In this country, [sexual] betraying is very nasty. Whoever does it would be punished, without sex consideration. If you are interested I'd like to have a discussion with you about women rights and feminism.

I think it's obvious that Reza is referring to the images and portrayals of our mass media regarding gender relations in the West. He mistakenly thinks that women are severely disadvantaged by our feminist culture. He doesn't know the reality of the situation…that it's MEN who do not have a secure life…that women regularly betray their husbands and families, often because they "fall out of love" or need to go "find myself" or some other ridiculous emotional rationalization she uses to justify destroying her family through the divorce courts simply because her husband no longer gives her the "'gina tingles."

But the part I found really interesting was Reza's description of the punishment of adultery in Iran:

"Whoever does it would be punished, without sex consideration."

Now that would be quite the tidbit of cultural knowledge, eh? If an Iranian husband who betray their wives and than electrocuted his wife with the help of his lover, would he too be sentenced to death by stoning?

One thing I do know for sure though…if there is such cases, feminists like Barbara Kay would never write an article about it.

Nevertheless, her response to Reza was like a boilerplate recitation of feminist bromides celebrating all of the supposed advances Feminists have "won" in the West:

> I am afraid I must disagree with your statement that women in traditional cultures are better off than western women. I am not sure what you mean exactly by "secure," but if you are speaking of financial security, even though more women live in poverty than men here, being poor is a relative idea.
> Here the state offers a great deal of support to anyone, man or woman, who is so poor he or she cannot work, or has no home. Nobody is starving in Canada. Nobody has to live on the street. The state will help them. You are correct in saying that married women are in general better off financially than unmarried women with children.

Ah, see, traditional cultures don't have a "welfare state" to serve as proxy-Dad and proxy-Husband, so they MUST be worse off!

Barbara continues stating her assumptions and ignorance of Iranian culture:

> In terms of physical security, I think perhaps the perception of a woman without male protection is different in Iran than it is here. Here women are offered the same legal protections as men, and are equal before the law. They are accorded the same rights of property ownership and inheritance, and they do not need to ask their male relatives for permission to do anything they want.

Later in his response to Kay, Reza described the actual legal status of women in Iran, which thoroughly rebutted Kay's ignorant assumptions:

> The other thing that may be interesting to you is that here in Iran there is no limitation for women education. 66% students in Iran universities are women. We have many female doctors , dentist s and so on.
> Something which surprises me in your email was: men hit the woman in West? You may not believe me, but during my life I have not seen or not heard of any Iranian man hitting his wife [but] sometimes I read in newspaper it happened. According to Islamic law, if somebody hits his wife only one bit and somehow the skin become red, he must pay more than 10,000 US$ compensation.
> People in west don't have a good knowledge about this country. For example Human Rights originated in Iran. The first human rights were declared by the great Cyrus about 2600 years ago.
> The rights of property ownership and inheritance in Islam is about 1400 years ago and in accordance with it, ownership and inheritance is approved for women. It means every thing a woman owns belongs to her and she can do with whatever she wants to.
> Something might be interesting to you, is that if a woman works, her husband have no right to take her money anyhow. If she wants, she can spend it for family but there is no obligation. Because it is men's duty to work and pay the family expenses. Even according to Islamic law, a wife has no obligation to work at home and men must pay for the housework to her if she asks. Women are valuable in this country if a girl answers hello to a boy it would be a great joy for him. If you don't believe , you can come here and to see it by your own eyes.

Heh, Reza seems genuinely shocked that it would be considered normal for men to regularly hit Women in the West. But there's certainly one thing he revealed when it comes to married women and money in which Iranian culture and the West are similar…

…what women who are married earn is hers, and what the man earns, is theirs.

Reza also addressed the perception of "individualism," which if you read his questioning carefully, actually addresses the archetype of "empowered, independent" women.

> The first question is for a woman what prosperity is. Individualism is very important for western countries but I say what would be the result of Individualism for a woman at age of sixty? Would the result be other than loneliness? Does anybody come close to her ? After breeding some children, who would do anything for her (maybe government) but what about her feeling?

Don't worry, Reza. Women who are strong, empowered and independent in the West, will simply wring every last effort from their rationalization hamsters to avoid facing their self-imposed loneliness they experience when they hit old age in a state of "Individualism."

> The main point is that individuality doesn't bring prosperity. I say prosperity is for couples, not individuals. Love means two. As you know love has its price. When you love someone, you have to be with him or her in any condition, good or bad, happy or sad. But I think people in West are partners [only] in happiness, and when you need help everybody would flee.
> I know a man who was age 40. His wife became sick so bad that her bones twisted to each other. He did his > best for treatment. The result was he looked after his wife more than 10 years until she died . I think it is truth of love. I do believe, love means liking someone or something more than yourself.

> I think in West people mix up passion and love . Passion last very short. But love lasts long, although it sometimes causes sadness. But it is its price to know how valuable it is.

This is the very essence that differentiates "traditional" cultures like Iran versus modern, feminist influenced marriage 2.0 in the West. Marriage vows actually still mean something in Iran, whereas in the West, the marriage vows only apply as long as the woman is "happy."

Now Barbara's response to Reza was most interesting…she actually let the cat out of the bag with regards to Feminists and their so-called quest for equality:

> First, to answer your questions about feminists: They not only expect, but they have been responsible for getting many rights for women. Instead of giving you a list, I will simply say that the overwhelming right that women have in the West is the right to control over their sexual lives without being judged. Women demand – and get – the right to have as many love affairs as men, the right to not have children if they don't want them, the right not to be raped by their husbands, the right to initiate and get a divorce for any reason at all, the right to have custody of their children (except in very unusual cases), and the right to be protected from sexual harassment in school and work. It is a serious offense for a man to be accused of sexual harassment of a women, even if only in words or jokes or anything at all that the woman considers an insult. I would say that women have more rights than men here, and that is all the result of feminism.

Equality baby!

Also note: "It is a serious offense for a man to be accused of sexual harassment of a women…"

Exactly! He need not be actually guilty of harassment, only that he be accused!

And this…

…the right to initiate and get a divorce for any reason at all, the right to have custody of their children (except in very unusual cases)

Kay actually restates these so-called advances that have destroyed the institution of marriage in the West. All these things that Barbara listed (despite claiming she wasn't going to list them) actually reinforces Reza's criticism of the state of marriage in the West:

When you love someone, you have to be with him or her in any condition, good or bad, happy or sad. But I think people in West are partners [only] in happiness, and when you need help everybody would flee.

Somehow, I don't think Women are as badly treated by their Husbands, Fathers and culture at large in Iran as our Feminist mainstream press would like us to think. One thing is for certain…should we find ourselves involved in a war with Iran, you can bet our media and politicians will invariably cite the need to liberate the oppressed women of Iran from those barbaric Patriarchs.

The Problem With Anonymity for the Accused

Despite their involvement in an international scandal and their accusations against a man that could send him to prison, the two women who accused Julian Assange of rape, molestation or whatever it is, have been granted anonymity by the Swedish court and have not been named by most of the Western media outlets around the world. Although it was easy enough to find their identity, given the open flow of information through the internet (a flow that some evidently want to stanch), The Spearhead was one of the few sites that mentioned accusers Anna Ardinn (AKA Ann Bernardin) and Sofia Wilen by name. This resulted in the most traffic we've ever had in any one day of the site's existence.

What this indicates is that most media outlets – even in the United States – toed the line, despite the serious questions raised by the case, and despite the fact that accusers in criminal cases are never granted anonymity in the United States due to fundamental Constitutional law. The practice of not printing women's names in rape cases is entirely voluntary in the US, but it is still observed by most of the old media.

However, the rules are different in Europe. In many European countries a woman can accuse a man of rape with the guarantee that her name will not be made public, and anyone who does expose her would presumably be open to criminal prosecution and civil lawsuits. The old logic behind not publishing the name of the accuser was that rape was deeply shaming, because women's chastity used to be considered an integral part of their honor and reputation. Today, because chastity has essentially become meaningless and held to be without any value, the argument is often made that a woman would be open to attacks on her character, which would unfairly benefit the defense.

Recently, there have been calls in Britain to extend anonymity in rape cases to the accused as well as the accuser. This seems fair, given that accusers already have anonymity, but we ought to look at the bigger picture: this is simply a step closer to secret trials. There is a reason that a public trial is a Constitutional guarantee in the US. When aspects of prosecution become secret, there is no possibility for adequate public scrutiny.

In ancient Hebrew law, only a public charge could result in a finding of rape; it was required that the woman cry out and draw attention to the outrage. If she did not immediately and publicly object to being violated, it was assumed that there had been no rape unless the woman was "in the field" and unable to be heard. In fact, the public nature of the accusation is what the woman relied upon to obtain justice and to protect her honor:

> Deuteronomy 22:23-27
> 23 If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed unto a husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her;
> 24 then ye shall bring them both out unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbor's wife: so thou shalt put away evil from among you.
> 25 But if a man find a betrothed damsel in the field, and the man force her, and lie with her; then the man only that lay with her shall die:
> 26 but unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing; there is in the damsel no sin worthy of death: for as when a man riseth against his neighbor, and slayeth him, even so is this matter:
> 27 for he found her in the field, and the betrothed damsel cried, and there was none to save her.

When prosecution is removed from the public eye the very scope of justice is considerably narrowed. Law, crime and punishment are matters that rightly pertain to all citizens, and therefore all should be participants in the process to some degree. If it were only the courts and their officers who had access to the facts and influence on proceedings, egregious corruption would quickly take hold, because people always act in their own interests. Judges would pardon their associates, police would arrest their enemies or creditors, innocent people would be railroaded all the time simply for convenience's sake, and many other evils would occur on a daily basis.

Also, importantly, innocent people arrested and charged with a crime would have fewer people to defend them, because the public would be in the dark. Say, for example, that a man you knew, some casual neighborhood acquaintance, simply disappeared one day. Later, you hear he'd been arrested, but you don't know why. You don't know what he's been charged with, you don't know anything about the alleged crime, and you hear from neither detectives nor his attorney.

Now let's say that this man had been accused of rape, and he and his attorney are trying to put together a defense. You know the woman who accused him, who also lives nearby, but you know nothing of the accusation. As it turns out, the woman told police that she was raped by this man at a specific time in a specific place: a Sunday evening at 10PM in his car in a park some twenty minutes' drive away from the neighborhood. On that Sunday evening, at 10 PM, you were walking to a local convenience store and saw the woman walk out of her front door, get in her car and drive away.

You thought nothing of it, you never mentioned it to anyone, and you'd pretty much forgotten about it. Unfortunately for the accused man, nobody on his defense has a clue that you were there, and the detectives have no idea either. But if you heard that this man you knew had been accused of raping that woman at exactly that time in a different place, in his own car, you'd be able to call the police and tell them what you saw and testify in court. It might save him a decade in prison for a crime he didn't commit. But anonymity would prevent that. Anonymity in criminal prosecutions severely limits public participation in resolving criminal cases, and as any detective will tell you the public is a huge source of information.

On the other hand, if you knew something that could convict a man, and knew nothing of his case, a guilty man could well go free.

What secrecy in criminal proceedings does is concentrate power and "truth" into the hands of the few. It elevates officers of the court to omnipotent status and assures that they answer to no one, where in a free society their correct position is as arbiter of the public will. At times, I suspect that this is why feminism and feminist family law have been received with such warmth by courts — the institutions have created a mutually-empowering relationship by methodically removing accountability from each other. Courts have granted women license to freely accuse for their own gain, and feminists have granted courts license to seize assets and coerce men free from the confines of the Constitution. It is a power that has proven too tempting to resist.

In the meanwhile, we men may have few tools at our disposal to match the weaponry of the state, but information and knowledge are absolutely crucial to any effort we make restore a more free and just society. Therefore, we should never encourage secrecy in the courts, because, like the maiden who is ravished in the city, sometimes our only defense is in crying out to the public.

Big Lenders Getting in on Divorce Industry

W.F. Price · 9 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Considering that divorce is such a reliable cash cow for attorneys, social workers, counselors, psychiatrists, debt collectors, the federal government and courts around the US, it was probably inevitable that lenders would find a way to make money off the business.

An article in the New York Times explores the growing business of divorce financing, which usually involves lenders taking on expenses in high-stakes divorce cases where women are leaving wealthy husbands.

One woman featured in the article, Michelle Pont, was having a hard time getting ahold of money to pay her expensive attorney bills, because so much of the family fortune was tied up in investments:

> BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Michelle Pont and her husband amassed millions of dollars in properties and investments from a freight-hauling business that they started with a single stake-bed truck in 1991. They bought a four-bedroom home, then a second home, a vacation home, a motor home and half a dozen cars.
> But when Ms. Pont decided to seek a divorce last year, she quickly ran out of money. She had no job. Her husband controlled the family's investments. A few months of legal bills maxed out her credit cards and drained her retirement account.

Note how Mrs. Pont is described as an equal partner in a freight hauling business! I worked in transportation when I was a kid, but I never saw a woman do any more than dispatch or bookkeeping. Driving, servicing the vehicles, loading freight, unloading freight, warehousing — all men's jobs. And you can bet a guy who started with just one truck did a whole lot of that stuff himself. But now the woman wants half + expenses, as usual…

Because this is generally the law of the land, she'll probably get it, and that's why financing these divorces is good business.

The company that is financing Mrs. Pont's divorce, Balance Point Divorce Funding (gotta love the name), is kicking in $200,000, which should suffice to tide her over until the divorce is finalized, upon which Balance Point takes a share of the settlement.

Balance Point's founder, Stacey Napp, started the company with money she pried away from her husband in a lawsuit she filed after she'd already signed settlement papers. It seems that she found out he made a big sale after giving her a half million dollars and a house, and she wanted a piece of the proceeds. After seven years of litigation, she got the money, and used it as startup cash.

According to Ms. Napp, most of her customers are homemakers with husbands who own businesses. However, the guys are not exactly fat cats, but rather the pull yourself up by your bootstraps types who have always been an integral part of American productivity. Unfortunately for these types of men, most of whom are from working or middle class families, they tend to marry women from their own demographic, and let's face it: working and middle-class American women aren't known for fidelity and constancy. The men are also less likely to have prenups than your typical scion of the upper class or corporate CEO, which makes them easy pickings for divorce robbery.

Lest some one argue that Ms. Napp is also an entrepreneur and deserves respect for her efforts, one should make a distinction between parasitic businesses and productive businesses. Some businesses build wealth, while others take it away. Balance Point falls in the latter camp. Every business this woman eviscerates for the benefit of bored housewives means fewer jobs, a poorer economy, and less overall wealth.

As the decline of the US continues apace, these carrion bird ventures are proliferating, hurting the public in aggregate for a minority of selfish, immoral people who could care less about the world around them so long as they have a fab house and car and enough money left over for the seasonal trips to Vegas.

Consider another one of Ms. Napp's clients, who is using her Balance Point loan in an attempt to seize properties her husband put into a trust for his children from a previous marriage. What kind of person does this? A productive citizen, or a callous, scheming thief?

If our society and law reward such disgusting people and practices, we should expect further acts of treason and betrayal, such as Bradley Manning's data theft, and possibly outright sabotage from within. There can be no loyalty or allegiance to a nation of thieves and plunderers — obedience can only be coerced through fear.

Yippee, We're All Abusers Now!

Featured Guest · 9 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Domestic violence has been plummeting in recent years. In 1976, the toll of men and women killed by their partners registered 2,944 deaths. Now it's half that number.

But what comes as good news to American families turns out to be a mixed blessing for the domestic violence industry. After all, the Abuse Mavens don't want to see their generous paychecks trimmed!

So a few years ago someone ginned up this grand scheme: Let's exponentially broaden the definition of domestic violence.

And sure enough, the 2005 reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act featured this open-ended definition: "The term 'domestic violence' includes felony or misdemeanor crimes of violence." The law's artful use of the word "includes" sent a clarion signal to lawmakers throughout the country – an expansive range of conduct could now be considered to constitute abuse.

According to a recent report, "Expanding Definitions of Domestic Violence" (http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/Expanding-Definitions-of-Domestic-Violence), 63% of states include emotional distress in their statutory definition of domestic violence. That means any person who claims to be "fearful" – no evidence necessary — is entitled to a protective order and the generous cornucopia of bennies that comes with it.

Do you live in California, Delaware, Michigan, Montana, or Virginia? In these states, the mere feeling of "apprehension" of harm qualifies you as an abuse victim. In New Jersey, if your partner interferes with your "well-being," that counts, as well.

In Illinois, "interference with personal liberty" — whatever that means — makes you a domestic abuser. And the Delaware statute throws in the catch-all "any other conduct" for good measure.

But domestic violence runs rampant and proto-abusers need to be held accountable – or so the domestic violence industry claims — so why not swell our definitions even more?

Now, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, partner violence also includes "Getting annoyed if the victim disagrees" and "Withholding information from the victim." If that doesn't suffice, "Disregarding what the victim wants" also counts as a punishable offense.

That's right guys, if your heart-throb thinks she's an abuse victim, you'd better get her that pedicure she's been pestering you about – and fast!

Pro-immigration groups have broadened the playing field even more. The N.O.W. Legal Momentum says "possessiveness" is a sure sign of imminent violence. The Legal Assistance Foundation of Chicago counts a person who needs to "walk on eggshells" as an abuse victim. ASISTA posits "what tone of voice was used" is incontrovertible proof, as well.

In an article recently published in Social Science and Medicine, the elastic band of abuse is stretched to even more preposterous lengths. According to "Male Reproductive Control of Women who Have Experienced Intimate Partner Violence," a man who attempts to sway his wife's reproductive status is guilty of "reproductive control."

So wise up, guys. If you ever told a woman you didn't want her to get an abortion or refused to pay for contraception, you are guilty of "reproductive control." According to the feminist catechism, that's a mortal sin, which of course constitutes violence against women.

But these definitions have a built-in limitation: They all require the alleged abuser to commit a specific unlawful act.

This can make it difficult to prove your case in a court of law. The solution? Balloon the definition even more!

Go to the website of the federal Office of Violence Against Women. The OVW informs us domestic violence is a "pattern of abusive behavior in any relationship that is used by one partner to gain or maintain power and control."

Maintain power and control?

Ladies, if you nag your husband to mow the lawn, that's power and control. Men, quit telling your wife to not overdraw the ATM – same thing. If you get into a disagreement over the TV remote control, you guessed it, that's proof of an obsessive need for power and control. That's a heinous offense, according to Big Sister.

In the former Soviet Union, criminal laws were crafted to ensnare the daily activities of innocent citizens. As former KGB director Lavrenti Beria famously warned, "Show me the man, and I'll find you the crime."

Once possessed of the mission of curbing partner abuse, the domestic violence industry now foreshadows the recrudescence of the horrific memories of a dystopian past.

Feminists Recruiting Veteran Suicide for Their Issue Stable

Chuck Ross · 10 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists must have every issue as their own. Domestic abuse, health, education, STDs, sex, beauty standards, workplace treatment, pay, and even sleep have all been claimed by feminists. Even non-issues majestically transform into feminist issues. But that's what happens when an industry like feminism feeds on trumped up charges of misery and inequality. Feminists are paid to find these things, and they'll root them out like truffle-sniffing piglets. For men to challenge that we suffer in any of these categories leads to crybaby taunts and penis-size speculations.

But feminists don't apply the same ground rules to themselves. Or at least they're not doing so in their analysis of a recent study conducted of suicides carried out by female military veterans. What's worse is that they're either lying or too lazy to conduct due diligence in the meme they're spreading.

The study, conducted of veteran and non-military women in 16 states, found that the suicide rate of veteran women was three times higher than that of non-veteran women. A couple of powerful feminist websites have run with the story. Feministing calls the study "devastating". Yes, the high suicide rate of veterans is devastating. But, oh, Feministing only cares about the 8% of military personnel who are women. Jessica Valenti, at her own site, carried a link to an analysis of the study conducted by self-proclaimed ladies' site, The Hairpin. The opening salvo, which Valenti used as the byline to her link, begins:

"A new study suggests that women vets are almost three times more likely to commit suicide as their male counterparts."

This is a wholly wrong interpretation of the study which only compares veteran women to non-veteran women. The danger in this "misinterpretation" is that Jessica Valenti is a mover and shaker within the feminist community. Her spreading this false meme is like Shaquille O'Neal farting in a Hyundai. I'm here to roll down the windows.

This study found that, among the 18-34 year old cohort of women in 16 states, 1-in-7,465 veterans committed suicide while 1-in-22,763 non-military women did so too. This is the three-to-one ratio figure that is being spread – and wrongly at that. If the comment that this news is devastating is meant to imply that it is all of a sudden news that veterans commit suicide at a high rate, I'd wonder where the commenter has been during the past decade. Suicide is "devastating", but to say that to a new study that merely reaffirms that this devastating act is endemic only after it applies to women in the military implies an agenda. And Chuck don't like agenda.

In 2007, suicide rates within the 18-34 year old cohort of male veterans was 1-in-1,761 which makes veteran men 4.24 times more likely to commit suicide than veteran women. According to suicide.org, men, in general, commit suicide at 3.85 times the rate that women, in general, do. If anything, it is devastating that veteran men are actually committing suicide at rates slightly higher than would be predicted, relative to women, if "normal" suicide rates were extrapolated to soldiers.

And there's a good explanation for the higher rate of male veteran suicides. If fatality numbers are any indication of the rates at which men and women witness death and experience various levels of fear, men would be vastly more prone to taking their own lives. In Operation Iraqi Freedom and Operation Enduring Freedom, 98% of all fatalities were men. Fourteen percent of all military members are women – as are eight percent of all veterans. Given their separation from combat, female soldiers don't experience the haunting memories of being "in it" to quite the same degree as men. Male veterans face a double-whammy. Not only are they 92% of the veteran population, they commit suicide at 4.24 times the rate of women. This is a matter of scale and scope, and it is a men's issue.

For this analysis to be devastating for female veterans, we'd have to acknowledge that there is something specific to women that makes their higher than expected rates of suicide specific to them. Since they don't experience the rigors of combat and seemingly come less close to the fallout from war, there is really only one explanation for this fact: women aren't cut out for war.

Women and feminists really shouldn't be ashamed of that fact, but feminists serve a higher purpose. While they'd be good to just oppose war at all – which many MRAs and myself would support – feminists prefer to knock down gender-based shibboleths where they exist. The only place they are more prevalent is on sports fields. For feminists to admit that women don't hold up in war the same way men do would be like them admitting that men are better athletes than women. Some will maintain both. If they admit that natural sexual differences exist between men and women, a giant plank of their platform is taken out from under them. And instead of hunting for truffles, they are forced to hunt for more wood – wood that is much more scarce than truffles.

Gender Pay Gap Reversed for Young in UK

W.F. Price · 10 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A new report from Britain's Office for National Statistics has revealed that women in their 20s who work full time now earn more than men of the same age, and for those in their 30s the gap has decreased to less than 3%. For those who work part time, women make more across the board.

Although women's overrepresentation in universities is one factor, most important has been the decline of private sector wages in comparison to the public sector, which has enjoyed pay increases even during the recession. More than twice as many women as men work in the public sector, and 40% of British working women (and only 15% of men) have public sector jobs. Because public sector jobs are funded by those who earn money in the private sector, this should raise the question of whether men's private sector wages are artificially low due to the high business taxes needed for all those public jobs for women.

It is starting to become clear that the price of gender equality falls overwhelmingly on men, and that's not really very equal when you think about it. Essentially, men are being held back and impoverished in order to create an illusion of equality, which is turning out to be very expensive to maintain. This is really what's wrong with the concept of "equity feminism;" it mandates an unequal burden to achieve some subjectively equal outcome.

Although feminists may cheer the news, it will not be enough for them. They will not stop until women have it better than men in every possible measure of wealth, quality of life and power.

Comment of the Week: Women in the Marine Corps

W.F. Price · 11 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

There has been a lot of boosterism concerning women in the military recently, and the propaganda we're exposed to regarding these women in uniform would have us believe that they are not only effective, hard-working and fierce soldiers, but paragons of virtue and honor as well.

DevilDog, A reader who is a US marine blows that illusion to hell with a hearty and amusing dose of the truth:

Hey, I'm a Marine and a veteran 3x OEF, 0311 Rifleman…. Let me tell you straightforwardly, the majority of the women in the military… ARE USELESS! You've got the few women who are damn good at what they do and I respect em, but believe me, the majority of Women are just lousy… women cannot pass the PT standards for the average male, okay, so they lower em for women, many women cannot even pass the lowered standards, they don't get kicked out though, they get waivers out the ass or get passed because of the fear of a lawsuit or some bullsh!t.

Some women start sexual relationships with officers to use them to gain ranks. A lot of women get pregnant before a deployment because they chicken out and use pregnancy to avoid serving.

There was a story on MSNBC talking about women in the Marines. They were showing pictures of 3 women in full body armor and with rifles looking like GI Janes, giving off the misconception that these women are out there fighting, but funny thing is, they sit on their asses all day safe in the base, and were only put into gear and given a weapon for the photo-op, they weren't even on or near any frontline, they were damn near right outside the base..

I despise it when the media says "Thank God for our Men and Women Fighting" or anything along that line — MEN are fighting, MEN are dying. Women are not. Women have extra attention heaped on them to keep them safe and happy. These god damn whores walk around with an over-inflated ego because of this and think they're GI Janes who can kick anyones ass… A lot of these girls are ugly as SH!T, but are given a lot of attention because we're all horny and wanna fuck. We call 'em desert queens, a 4/10 Female gets attention and thinks shes a 9/10..

You guys wouldn't believe some of the stories I have: women getting gangbanged by 10 Marines, same woman who has a Husband and children. Women blowing officers for privileges, while her family is at home.. Believe me, IT'S RAMPANT. These aren't isolated incidents, it's just all over the place but is ignored because political correctness and feminism is up our ass threatening a lawsuit for every fucking thing.

Oh and SO MANY FING WOMEN CHEAT on their husbands while they're deployed fighting in Afghan. Unfaithful whores.

We MEN have fought for thousands of years, and continue to fight and protect, then some fucking slut comes along and does 1/100th of the job we do, and is praised by the white knights, media, and general american population as a fing GI Jane empowered goddess and shit.

Women have MUCH lower physical standards, also mentally nothing is demanded of them, no pressure is put on them, everyone goes out their way to keep them safe and sound when we're deployed. And these fucking bitches still get PTSD. ARE YOU FING SHITTING ME? I HAVE PTSD, REAL PTSD.

All of these experiments with political correctness and feminism have damaged our military from the inside very badly, trust me on that. I just really don't know what the hell is going on, sometimes I wonder if I'm in the twilight zone. Sometimes I feel like bashing some faces in for this nonsense. I take the military and the United States Marine Corps very seriously, this is my life, this is my career, I am going to be in it until I retire, and I do not want anybody fing with the efficiency and effectiveness of my Corps. This is exactly what these pussy ass ultra-progressives, feminists, white knights, and overall jackasses are doing.

Oh, and the majority of the deaths in combat are MEN, the majority of the deaths in non combat related accidents are MEN, the majority of PTSD/depression/mental illness cases as a result of combat are MEN, majority of suicides in the military are MEN. So what are these feminists talking about? How much more could you possible defy logic, utterly butcher it? So delusional, just so delusional…

Obamacare: More for Women, Nothing for Men

W.F. Price · 11 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As the gargantuan Health Care Law begins to reveal itself and the scores of new government agencies it has created, some noticed that while at least seven of these new agencies are created directly for the benefit of women, there is apparently nothing for men. As an example of the disparity, “breast” is mentioned some 40 times in the law, but prostate not once.

When asked about the discrepancy Hadley Heath, a health care policy analyst at the Independent Women’s Forum, noted that women voted for Obama in larger numbers, so they are being rewarded at the expense of men:

> Women came out big in 2008, and they were a very big voting bloc for [Obama]. Women as voters really care about health care, health reform because we often make decisions for ourselves, our families and dependents about health care. So clearly this is an issue that is important to women, women are important as voters to any politician.

Scott Williams of the Men’s Health Network suggested that women have an advantage when it comes to lobbying, and said that they are both more vocal and more aware of the politics surrounding the issue. Williams thinks men need to work harder to bring their issues to attention, but he neglects to mention that many of the organizations and agencies created solely for the benefit of women have created a very loud, active and well-paid army of women whose job is to shove men’s concerns aside in favor of women.

As the private institutions men used to rely on to defend their interests were eviscerated by “equality” legislation, new, public institutions exclusively for women were set up. Public institutions have an inherent advantage as they are funded by all of us whether we want to pay for them or not, and their initiatives are often enforced by the courts, and ultimately law enforcement. This is really why women continue to win victory after victory: they are a legally privileged class.

The result of this is naked government discrimination against men, and a disregard for the welfare of half the adult population of the United States that goes beyond mere neglect; due to the fact that men are forced to fund these measures it could fairly be called an act of tyranny.

Kids Becoming Cash Cows in Benefits Scam

W.F. Price · 12 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of the biggest problems with a welfare state is that it does nothing to change human nature, which has always featured greed in one form or another. Anyone who has been to a state-run nursing home is probably aware that the places are essentially pharmaceutical outlets through which drugs of all sorts flow like wheat through a granary, and these drugs are paid for by SSI, Medicare, Medicaid, or any one of the many programs that fund much of the pharmaceutical industry.

Over the last 20 years, the number of children on SSI (Supplemental Security Income) has skyrocketed, and the majority of these kids receive it for mental disorders. When the children are diagnosed with these disorders their parents, often single mothers, receive substantial cash benefits, creating an incentive for them to have their children diagnosed with ADHD or something similar.

The overwhelming majority of children diagnosed with ADHD are boys, often those who are struggling due to their lack of a father figure. Another such disorder – oppositional defiant disorder – sounds exactly like a euphemism for the typical scenario where a single mother can't handle growing, energetic boys.

So, mothers who are struggling in the weak economy are given a strong incentive to drug their children, and social workers as well as the medical/pharmaceutical industry are all too happy to oblige, because this directs more funds to them.

An article in the Boston Globe details this unfortunate and expensive problem, and demonstrates how the policies that created it in the first place – government-funded single motherhood – is now generating even more government expenditure to "fix" the results of an earlier fiasco:

> Geneva Fielding, a single mother since age 16, has struggled to raise her three energetic boys in the housing projects of Roxbury. Nothing has come easily, least of all money.
> Even so, she resisted some years back when neighbors told her about a federal program called SSI that could pay her thousands of dollars a year. The benefit was a lot like welfare, better in many ways, but it came with a catch: To qualify, a child had to be disabled. And if the disability was mental or behavioral — something like ADHD — the child pretty much had to be taking psychotropic drugs.

That drug companies are profiting from this simply demonstrates how people will continue to chase profit in any manner possible, even if it means unethical and socially destructive business practices. As social policy in the US is increasingly divorced from reality, moving further into the outer realms of sanity due to irrational ideologies such as feminism radical equalitarianism, business becomes more predatory and people are given an incentive to make a living through socially harmful activities.

Feminists Promote Unibrows in “Decembrow” Campaign

W.F. Price · 13 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In 2003, some Australian men came up with an idea for a charity fundraiser for men’s health issues, and thus was born “Movember,” a campaign in which guys grew moustaches to raise awareness. The idea was a bit of a joke at first – a good natured way to get some attention for the cause – but it worked pretty well, and today there are hundreds of thousands of participants worldwide bringing in millions of dollars in donations.

Now that the campaign has grown in both popularity and effectiveness, of course the feminists had to get involved to disparage it. They are doing so with their farcical “Decembrow” campaign, which is supposedly a feminist way to raise money for charities of their choice, such as abortion clinics and artificial insemination assistance for lesbians, but in reality it’s just a stunt and an attempt by the declining Feministing website to get some more attention by making fun of a men’s charity.

As Lori, the Feministing contributor who came up with the idea, puts it:

> Last week, I announced the beginning of Decembrow, a month-long charity initiative for which I encouraged you to grow in your unibrow for the cause of your choice.
> But what began as a somewhat simple, tongue-in-cheek response to “Movember” has begun to generate some serious buzz around the interwebs, with mentions on the Daily Caller, AtlanticWire, the Stir, and AOL News. And it seems everyone has something to say about Decembrow.

Given the huge disparities in funding between specifically female and specifically male health concerns (favoring the female, of course), you’d think the feminists would leave well enough alone. But no, they can’t help themselves: as they see it any dollar that goes to support men’s health is a dollar that doesn’t go straight into their hands, and even if they won’t come straight out and attack Movember, hey, at least they can ridicule it.

Fortunately, the guys who started Movember and most participants probably have no problem with laughing at themselves. That’s one of the great characteristics of men — we can generally take a joke at our expense, because we’re generous like that. And if we can turn that generosity toward helping our brothers out, so much the better.

So although it’s petty and mean-spirited of feminists to disparage an event that is providing some much needed support for research and treatment of men’s health issues, it’s actually encouraging that it worked so well that they feel the need to tear it down. So let the feminists eye the money Movember brought in with envy as they think of the hundreds of millions of abortions it could buy, and laugh at them.

Hillary Clinton Confirms Global Feminist Mission

W.F. Price · 13 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Hillary Clinton made a surprise showing at the TED (Technology, Entertainment, Design) Women conference to affirm her dedication to empowering women worldwide, saying “where girls and women flourish, our values flourish.” She also noted that it was appropriate that there was a TED Women’s conference, but not one exclusively dedicated to men.

Saying “women’s equality … is a security issue,” Mrs. Clinton clearly implied that resistance to feminism is a threat to national security, perhaps laying the groundwork for an intervention in a country deemed hostile to feminism. She went on to explain that women’s issues are comprehensively integrated into the “three key elements” of defense, diplomacy and development.

In an interesting development, she told the crowd that she was laying the groundwork for an international, mobile prosecution unit used to target men, which she plans to debut in Africa.

Although Mrs. Clinton doesn’t mention who will carry out her plans, it is all but certain that the boots on the ground will be filled by young men.

Obama Henpecked?

Obama bugged out of a press conference the other day, turning the podium over to Bill Clinton, because, as he put it, “I’ve been keeping the first lady waiting.” Bill Clinton adds “you don’t want to make her mad.”

Watch the video here.

I don’t know whether it was an excuse, but even if it was, it’s a pretty lousy one for the President of the United States. If he was serious, perhaps that busted lip he got the other day was from Michelle’s knuckles rather than some guy’s elbow — Barack Obama was noticeably absent from Michelle’s side over the ensuing couple days.

Whatever it was, it sure didn’t inspire confidence.

Why do Totalitarian Feminists get Free Publicity?

W.F. Price · 14 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It's pretty well-known that women have advantages and incentives in a lot of occupations, which leads to the kind of lowering of standards one sees in the military, fire and police departments and university faculty, but at least they attempt to make some showing of competence in public.

But when it comes to writing for a national publication anything goes, including advocating the dismantling of hundreds of years of jurisprudence, common law, and a widely accepted basic tenet of human rights.

Jessica Valenti just came out with an article for the Washington Post promoting Swedish law over American, and suggesting that Swedish rape laws are a "potential model for our own legislation."

To drive home that Swedish law is better than American, she points out that moves are afoot in Sweden to revoke the presumption of innocence in rape cases:

> The fact that U.S. law is so ill- equipped to actually protect women in realistic scenarios is a national embarrassment – not to mention a huge hurdle in obtaining justice for sexual assault victims. Swedish rape laws don't ban "sex by surprise" (a term used by Assange's lawyer as a crass joke), but they do go much further than U.S. laws do, and we should look to them as a potential model for our own legislation.
> In fact, some activists and legal experts in Sweden want to change the law there so that the burden of proof is on the accused; the alleged rapist would have to show that he got consent, instead of the victim having to prove that she didn't give it.

The reason presumption of innocence is so basic is that it is often impossible to prove that one has not done something. For example, say someone is accused of stealing a neighbor's gold and burying it in a secret place while his neighbor was on vacation. If the neighbor was gone for two weeks and the man lived alone, there will be innumerable occasions where he could have done the deed, so he can't possibly adequately defend himself. He cannot prove that he didn't do it. Therefore, to prevent people from being thrown in jail unjustly, the burden is upon the accuser to prove that he did in fact steal the gold. This is the only way we can be reasonably sure that the crime occurred. The exact same principle applies to rape, especially where consent is at issue. There is literally no way a man can prove consent throughout the entire act of sexual intercourse short of setting up an all-angles-covered porn recording team in his bedroom, possibly in conjunction with a brain scanner, a telepathist and a psychic. And, if you take feminist concepts of rape into account, even that isn't enough, because they think women should be able to withdraw consent retroactively (yes, they do).

In a column on Paul Elam's A Voice for Men site, the False Rape Society does a good job of rebuking Valenti's idiocy, but what I'm curious about is why the Washington Post gives her any credit in the first place. Does a woman who is so stupid that she is blasé about overturning one of the most important safeguards against tyranny that exists deserve so much as one word in print in a national publication? The old media likes to make a point that they uphold standards better than most online publications, but when they print this kind of garbage that pretty much flies out the window.

I think readers ought to write the editorial board of the Washington Post and politely ask why they are giving a mental lightweight and disreputable radical a platform in their publication. Why are they discrediting their own publication by allowing this kind of thuggish disregard for human rights and justice? Of all people, journalists should be concerned about the potential for abuse of power — especially when it is used to silence critics.

Young Men's Eyes Are Open

W.F. Price · 14 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A friend sent me a link to an encouraging article in a college newspaper written a little less than a month ago. In it, guest columnist Derek Devine responds to one of the typical "what happened to chivalry?" pieces we so frequently see. These are usually written by naïve young women who believe in fairytale romances they were watching in their childhood a few years earlier.

Mr. Devine, a student at the University of Portland, suggests that the call for chivalry from women is simply a self-serving desire to have their cake and eat it. Furthermore, he actually mentions the word "misandry" and writes that he is not happy about having to deal with it as much as is the norm.

> Last week, a piece was released entitled "where has all the chivalry gone?" I found the majority of the piece to be insulting and presumptuous, even for someone who deals with and reads as much misandry as I do.

Devine gets into the reasons that the modern concept of chivalry is bogus, bringing up many of the points we are familiar with:

> As a woman in the 2010′s, I'd challenge Ms. Frazier to ask a guy out if she misses dating so much. These relationships are a two way street, why does it just have to be men expending their physical resources to make the other person involved feel special? Or maybe she'd like to contend that there is a good, not sexist, reason why men should just shower all women everywhere with money and effort, and receive nothing in return.
> The way chivalrous conduct was portrayed in Frazier's article was archaic and completely sexist. The "it doesn't matter if it's cheap, as long as you spend money on me" vibe is stomach turning. Saying you miss chivalry is just saying you miss being treated special just because you're female. Which is fine, just recognize that what you're saying flips off the last however many years of feminist activism so that you can vote.

Things are definitely changing. Young men are not the blinded fools they were just a couple decades ago. The triumph of feminism has blown away the old hypocrisies and, ironically, left women more on their own than ever. It's encouraging to see young men's growing awareness, but it would be even better if young women finally saw what a disaster feminism is turning out to be for them, personally.

I think they will. We may yet see young women cursing the feminists who yanked them out of their homes and away from their children and put them to work in the salt mines of corporate and government bureaucracy.

Dealing With The Reality On The Ground

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 15 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

There are lots of people who claim to be against feminism, but who really aren't. One way of figuring out whether someone is seriously opposed to feminism is by asking if their critiques and solutions of feminism deal with the reality on the ground for men and boys. Instead, if they are engaging in an academic discussion, which is mental masturbation that does not offer anything to help the reality that men and boys are dealing with, then they aren't serious about opposing feminism. Most likely they are another form of female supremacist that agrees with 99% of feminism, but has some sort of meaningless trivial disagreement with feminism. This is even more likely to be true if they claim to be against feminism but spend lots of time attacking MRA's or the MRM.

Take this post from the Oz Conservative blog for example. There's a lot of talk about "individualism", "separatism", and "autonomy". This is supposedly a criticism of both feminism and the MRM. Notice how those terms aren't really defined for the context they're used in. They are supposed to be "bad" because they are "bad". There are also a lot of bizarre claims that MRAs want to be "liberated from masculinity". What "liberated from masculinity" means is not defined either. Nearly all MRAs would have no idea what is being talked about in that post because MRAs are dealing with the reality on the ground. MRAs are dealing with issues that affect (and in many cases destroy) the lives of men and boys such as anti-male divorce courts, fathers having their children taken away from them, men forced to pay for children that aren't theirs, men in jail because of false rape charges, men losing their jobs due to affirmative action and the mancession, boys trapped in feminized school systems, boys forced to take drugs like ritalin, etc. If a 7 year old boy fights back against a feminized school system he is trapped in (to the extent a 7 year old boy reasonably can fight back), are we really supposed to believe that 7 year old boy wants to be "liberated from masculinity"? The author of the Oz Conservative blog is a teacher, so he may actually believe that.

Another example of supposed anti-feminism that refuses to deal with the reality on the ground can be found at The (Not) Thinking Housewife (along with another post at that blog). Look at some of the things Josh F. had to say:

> And so what is becoming ever more evident is that the "men's rights movement" is really a white male liberationist movement towards radical autonomy/ de facto homo-ism. It is the consciously persued spiritual, emotional and physical detachment from woman. This white male liberationist movement justifies itself by incorrectly identifying its foe as feminism/woman in order to give cover to its fellow radical autonomist, devout dyke.
> The incentive for adopting the roles that Mrs. Wood speaks of is the opportunity TO BE A REAL MAN. One isn't born a man nor is one able to be a man without continually "acting" manly. The idea that males seeking de facto homo-ism (spiritual, emotional and physical detachment from woman) can be MEN is the fraud of the "men's rights movement." Liberal "man…" Radically autonomous "man…" "Man" that rejects woman IS actually anti-man. He is the "soul mate" to the other anti-man, the inappropriately named "feminist," i.e., devout dyke.
> The delusion of the MRM is in the idea that its liberal male collective can defeat the liberal female collective either by utilizing liberal tactics or by withdrawing into a state of de facto homo-ism (radical autonomy)…This is the radical liberal's subconscious desire to self-annihilate so as to realize final liberation from the burden of being God-fearing American Man. This is the essence of the MRM; a mirrored sham very much in collusion with devout dyke to destroy both man and woman.
> To lead males to de facto homo-ism with a rally cry of "no marriage, no kids" is to lead males to a state of radical autonomy. Meaning, you are ensuring that he never sees the light of manhood.
> Homosexuality is not JUST two people of the same sex that are attracted to each other.
> It is a simple fact that those who believe in sexual autonomy (fluidity) simply reject the idea of an externally > imposed sexual order. This means that their sexuality is self-created. H*omo*-sexuality is the sexual attraction to the self, first, and only then the same when the void is felt. But make no mistake, a self-created sexual "orientation" that is sexually attracted TO ITSELF (the purely physical narcissist) is really a sexual "orientation" that rejects the externally imposed sexual order; this fluid sexual "orientation" rejects man as devout dyke and it rejects woman as radical homosexual. It is very plain to see that a self-sexualizer, even when he fills the void with something of the same, is by nature a self-annihilator.

What Josh F. is saying is difficult to read because many of his concepts are not defined. What is "autonomy" in this context? What is a "real man" supposed to be in this context? What is the "externally imposed sexual order"? It can not be clearly identified, but it is supposed to be "bad" for some unknown reason.

Also, Josh F. tries to redefine terms like homosexual to some other nebulous concept similar to how leftist academics try to murder the English language for destructive purposes. The only idea that Josh F. communicates is that he is trying to expand anti-male shaming language.

What are these "devout dykes" that Josh F. talks about? They sound like aliens on another planet. That is because Josh F. refuses to deal with the reality on the ground of feminism. If the only problem of feminism were a group of aliens on another planet then men would have nothing to worry about. The problems caused by feminism are all around men on this planet. A woman who forces a man into divorce court and steals his children from him is not a "devout dyke" – she's a heterosexual woman. An actual lesbian wouldn't marry a man in the first place. When considering all of the problems caused by feminism, it took a lot more women than some small cadre of lesbians to create these problems. It took the work of average everyday heterosexual women too. To ignore this is to ignore the reality on the ground for men. Josh F. refuses to consider that not getting married and not having kids is a solution that men can actually implement to protect themselves. This is why a lot of men avoid marriage and children. These men have never heard of words like "autonomy" or "self annihilator" in the context they are being used. Even if they have, they don't care because they are dealing with the reality on the ground. They are trying to avoid things like divorce court and jail. Does a man dealing with the real problems of feminism such as a man who is a victim of false rape charges care about Josh F.'s weird ideology? No, because he is dealing with the reality on the ground, namely avoiding jail.

Look at what Jesse Powell (the same person who said that men should be imprisoned on false rape charges to "protect women") had to say:

> "Duty to others" always exists no matter what the circumstances. Men have the duty to "provide for and protect" women simply because that is a fundamental part of the man's role in society; it is an inherited duty; it is an intrinsic characteristic of the man.
> Why do they positively celebrate the decline in marriage calling it "the marriage strike"? I suspect men's rights supporters know their condemnation of marriage and their refusal to fulfill their obligations as men is destructive to society and so they embrace and glorify the destruction of society in order to legitimize and glorify their own anti-social behaviors.

What is the "duty to provide for and protect" women? Why does it exist? These questions won't be answered because there isn't an answer. Those statements exist to avoid the question, "Why should men get married knowing the reality on the ground?" The reality for men getting married particularly younger men is that there is a greater than 50% chance their wives will force a divorce on them, take half or more of their assets, and take their kids away. Since when is it a man's duty to go to divorce court or jail? Jesse Powell is telling men to ignore their own good judgement and ability to plan for the future and pretend the reality on the ground doesn't exist.

All the people in these examples do the same thing: they avoid dealing with the reality on the ground that men are facing. They provide no practical solutions for men to use who are staring these problems in the face. They refuse to admit these problems even exist, and refuse to admit the lives and men and boys are being destroyed by the problems feminism has created. Instead they waste their time engaged in mental masturbation, inventing concepts that don't reflect reality in any way. This is in stark contrast to how the MRM or the greater manosphere acts. Take game, for example. It's a solution that was created to deal with the reality on the ground men were facing. This is one reason it is effective. The only way we men will move forward in dealing with feminism is dealing with real problems and find concrete and feasible solutions to them. Anyone who wastes their time on weird ideological debates will not be a part of a solution to the problems of feminism, and is not really opposed to feminism.

Guilty As Charged: How the American News Media Blithely Destroys Men Accused of Rape

pierceharlan · 15 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I founded one of the few Web sites in the English-speaking world dedicated to giving voice to persons falsely accused of rape, The False Rape Society. Among other things, I closely follow the way the American news media covers rape accusations. I write today to tell you that it isn't pretty. In the false rape milieu, this is an important topic warranting an extended discussion.

When I review news reports of alleged rapes, I often predict to myself whether I will be reading a story in a few days announcing that the accusation was false. My "correct" score in predicting the many that turn out to be false is infuriatingly high. Not only is the lie infuriating, too often, so is the way the initial accusation was reported.

News Reports Typically Credit the Accuser's Story as the Truth

Mainstream news media reports about garden variety "he said/she said" rape allegations are routinely unfair to the presumptively innocent men accused. Not all are covered unfairly; some are covered with even-handedness. But overall, false rape claims do not fit the news media's preferred narrative, so in a variety of subtle, and not so subtle ways, news reports of alleged rapes typically credit the accuser's story as the truth. Reporters often act as little more than stenographers for police; police, who are trying to build a case against the accused and not exonerate the accused, tell reporters only what the accuser has told them, leaving out the parts that don't add up.

It is not hyperbole to assert that when it comes to "he said/she said" rape accusations, the "she" side is typically wrapped in the mantle of truth and victimhood, and the "he" side is dismissed as the mendacities of a rapist.

The result is what we saw in the infamous Hofstra false rape case last year. (The Hofstra case is detailed here: http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/p/lamb-to-slaughter-hofstra-false-rape.html,) In that case, reporters didn't just rush to judgment; they did a 60-meter sprint in record time. The headline of a New York Post story read as follows: "Nightmare gang rape at Hofstra." The first two sentences of the story left little doubt for readers that a rape certainly occurred, even though it didn't: "An 18-year-old Hofstra University co-ed was gang-raped by five men on campus, cops said last night. The shocking attack took place Sunday at around 3 a.m."

The names and line-up photos of the four scared "rapists," young men barely older than boys, and the lurid tale of their supposed vile gang rape, were splashed all over the newspapers for the world's titillation. In contrast, the accuser's identity was guarded with greater tenacity than Clark Kent protects Superman's.

But it was TV reporters who were best equipped to foment a little old-fashioned rape hysteria. Typically, a television reporter's idea of covering a rape case amounts to passing on what the police told her without challenge and without doing her own investigation. Then the reporter grabs a few passersby to say how frightened they are that a vile rapist is on the loose.

In this case, television reporters described the supposed crime with a gravitas usually reserved for the death of a president. The Associated Press' television report started off with these chilling words: "She was tied up in a men's bathroom stall where five men, one by one, would rape her." http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6EmbZ1X3M5w. The report proceeded to impliedly credit the accuser's far-fetched tale as factual – don't trust me, watch if for yourself — never bothering to point out that the evidence for the alleged rape was nothing more than the evolving narrative of an 18-year-old woman groping for victimhood, and that her story had more holes than the basketball net at the Mack Sports and Exhibition Complex on campus. Nor did the report make clear that the young men she accused provided police with consistent and adamant accounts that flatly contradicted the accuser's tale.

If the report had provided a balanced account of the evidence, viewers likely would have concluded the same thing the district attorney concluded later the very day the story aired: the accuser's account was a lie. In the aftermath of the Hofstra debacle, Carol D'Auria of 1010 WINS said this: "We [reporters] need to move slower." She added:

"But I don't see that happening."

No Reciprocal Coverage When the Lie is Revealed

The Associated Press's television news report about the Hofstra false accuser's recantation was much shorter and lacked the over-the-top Chicken Little drama of its initial report suggesting that a rape had occurred. It was delivered in the hurried, matter-of-fact style of news reports that the news team knows won't be of much interest to viewers. Presumably, rapists are scary; false rape accusers are only scary to the people, and their families, who've been falsely accused.

Likewise, when Dallas Cowboys stars Erik Williams, an All-Pro offensive lineman, and NFL Hall of Famer Michael Irvin, were falsely accused of rape, the same thing happened. "The media was too quick with covering this in a huge way — the play the news got, the sensational page-1, top-of-the-newscast story," said Anantha Babbili, then-chairman of the journalism department at Texas Christian University in Fort Worth. "There was a given in the tone and the tenor of the media that Irvin and Williams were guilty until proven innocent."

And when the charges were dropped, the media reaction mirrored Hofstra. Mr. Williams explained: "Did you notice that no bulletin flashed across all these sport channels declaring that Michael Irvin and I were innocent? Where was the coverage? I bet you no one stopped 'Baywatch' or pulled the prime time movie to tell those same people the truth. Michael (Irvin) was right — nobody was interested in the truth."

News Media Transforms Accusers into "Victims"

Hofstra was a microcosm of how presumptively innocent men are smeared by the "fair and objective" American news media, often viciously. Many news reports of rape claims that turn out to be false start off with words similar to these: "Police say a college student was raped in her dorm room last night. 19-year-old [male's name] was arrested in connection with the crime. [Male's name] held the victim down and threatened her with a knife, police say."

Reporters have no compunction about labeling rape accusers as "victims," blinking at the fact that if she's a "victim," the man she accused, by necessity, must be a rapist. I believe that words matter, especially when it comes to serious things like rape charges. I complained to the New York Times last year about an on-line story that dubbed a rape accuser as the "victim," and the story was immediately changed to add the crucial "alleged" before the word "victim."

But another time when I complained about the use of the term "victim" in a story reporting on how a rape charge had been dropped, the reporter went all high and mighty on me: "Journalistically, I can't quite go far enough as you. The prosecutor made it clear that she's not prosecuting the girl for false claims, and her case against [the man accused] could've been dropped for lack of evidence, not just because he was falsely accused. Of course, prosecutors' word isn't golden, but given that no one has proven the girl made a false claim here, I can't take away her "victim" status. There are tons of questions, though. Thanks for reading."

I read the response several times to insure it wasn't a joke. Here's how I responded: "I appreciate your response, but precisely who elevated this girl to the status of a 'victim'? She is, in fact, a self-proclaimed "victim," and I am unaware of any journalistic standard that justifies the use of this nomenclature for someone whom the objectively verifiable facts tell us likely is NOT a victim. The falsely accused man seems every bit as much — and more so — a 'victim,' does he not?

"At worst, we have one person's word against another's, with ample circumstantial evidence for rejecting out-of-hand the young lady's account. It is wholly inappropriate to attach sanctity to her tale for no reason other than the fact that she made the claim. That is offensive to a man who is supposed to be presumed innocent, and who the facts tell us in all likelihood is innocent.

"We owe it to all men falsely accused of similar crimes to stop presuming their accusers are 'victims' when, because of the nature of the crime, it may never be possible to disprove the accuser's account beyond any conceivable doubt."

Nevertheless, the reporter refused to change the word "victim."

False Rape Claims Stick Like Skunk Odor

Even though the young men at Hofstra were declared to have been falsely accused, it is impossible to say the story had a happy ending. The typical reader and viewer of the news coverage did not realize that accounts of the purported "rape," gussied up as fair and objective journalism, were nothing more than the accuser's naked allegations. The men themselves immediately realized they were damaged goods because of the news coverage. "Anytime anyone Googles my name, rape is going to be right there beside it. My name is forever tarnished," said one of the 19-year-old men. "What if I am applying for a job or whatever in the future? I feel like I am always going to have to offer some explanation."

Readers will recall that in the aftermath of Duke lacrosse, even after the state's attorney general went so far as to declare the young accused men outright "innocent" of the charges, there were still people who insisted "no one knows what really happened that night," even though we do know what happened that night – a woman lied about being rape.

What effect does this coverage have on innocent men? One need not look to the hanging trees in the Old South to know that the public scorn from false rape claims has caused more damage to innocent people than the scorn connected with any other type of false claim. False rape claims have caused innocent men and boys to be killed and to kill themselves; to be beaten, chased, spat upon, and looked upon with suspicion long after they are cleared of wrongdoing. They lose not only their good names but often their jobs, their businesses, and their friends. It is often impossible for the falsely accused to ever obtain gainful employment once the lie hits the news: for the remainder of his life, a falsely accused man will have prospective employers Googling his name and discovering the horrid accusation.

A More Dangerous Problem: Jurors Improperly Rely on the Skewed News Accounts

Last year, the New York Times reported that in a major Florida criminal trial, not one, but nine – nine — jurors had been doing their own internet research about the case during the trial, resulting in what the Times called a "Google mistrial." http://www.nytimes.com/2009/03/18/us/18juries.html?_r=1. It turned out this was just the tip of the iceberg.

During a child sexual assault trial in England, a juror was torn about how to vote, so what do you suppose she did? "[S]he posted details of the case online for her Facebook 'friends' and announced that she would be holding a poll. After the court was tipped off, the woman was dismissed from the jury." J. Browning, When All That Twitters Is Not Told: Dangers of the Online Juror, 73 Tex. B. J. 216 (March 2010). Because nothing says "justice" better than a Facebook poll.

During another Florida criminal trial, a juror looked up the defendant's "rap sheet" on the Internet, and shared the information with his fellow jurors, resulting in a mistrial. R. Artigliere, J. Barton, and B. Hahn, Reigning in Juror Misconduct: Practical Suggestions for Judges and Lawyers, 84 Fla. Bar J. 8 (2010).

These disturbing instances of juror indiscretion are not isolated examples. They point up a grim problem that judges and lawyers are only beginning to understand occurs more than anyone cares to admit: "Jurors accessing the Internet before and during trials to learn or talk about the parties, witnesses, and legal issues they are confronting–conduct that violates the universal legal principles that jurors should judge the case on the evidence and law presented in the courtroom and not discuss the case or consult with outsiders until the jury is discharged." H. Dixon, Guarding Against The Dreaded Cyberspace Mistrial and Other Internet Trial Torpedoes, 49 Judges' Journal 37 (Winter 2010).

For every case where juror impropriety is discovered and a mistrial declared, it can reasonably be assumed that many go undiscovered.

What does this mean for rape cases? Given the way the American news media reports rape accusations, the implications for presumptively innocent men are chilling. Rape trials frequently devolve to "he said/she said" disputes over whether the accuser manifested consent to engage in the act. Jurors looking for any help they can get to sort out thorny fact disputes might Google the defendant's name to learn the "real" story behind the case. What they will find, more often than not, are skewed, and sometimes grossly unfair, reports of the case masquerading as objective news reports, as described above.

It's bad enough that the news media typically rushes to judgment to suggest the guilt of the presumptively innocent, destroying their reputations and sometimes causing them to be physically beaten and worse. Now, when presumptively innocent men are on trial for rape, they can be deprived of their liberty simply because a jury relied on some reporter's wickedly skewed recitation of the facts.

What To Do?

The outcry over this latest trampling of men's due process rights has been muted, at best, and there have been no serious calls for routine sequestrations of juries in rape cases. Nor has there been an outcry over the reputational damage to the falsely accused generally caused by routinely reckless journalism. In short, there is virtually no recognition of the unconscionable and severe harm to our falsely accused sons who've been publicly identified as potential rapists.

In contrast, we are quick to protect our daughters' good names when they accuse men of rape by cloaking them in anonymity. It is reasonable to argue that anonymity for accusers and accuseds is dangerous in a free society. It is also reasonable to ask, why is the victimization of our daughters deemed more worthy of our protection than the victimization of our sons?

What can we do to help? For starters, all of us need to call out journalists who report rape accusations as fact, who credit the accuser's story as truth just because she said it, and who blithely destroy the lives of our sons without airing their sides of the story. In short, all of us need to complain about the mad, morally grotesque rush to judgment.

Today, it may not be your son who's been falsely accused. But someday it might. Wouldn't it be nice to know that other fair-minded fathers care about his fate, too?

Muslims: You're Next!

W.F. Price · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Nicholas Kristof, a NY Times writer who is probably the most notorious white knight in journalism, just wrote an article about a Somali woman named Hawa Abdi, who is his model for Islam. According to Kristof, the main cause of "Islamophobia" in the US is the blown out of proportion incidents wherein women are punished for one thing or another, such as the case of a woman who is on death row in Iran for planning and carrying out the gruesome murder of her husband with her nephew, who was also her lover.

According to Kristof, people in the West are in a militant fury because of these incidents, but apparently bombings and terrorist attacks on their home countries have much less influence on public opinion. That may actually be true in the circles Kristof runs around in.

So, the solution, according to Kristof, is to put women in charge in Muslim countries where they can, among other things, preferentially educate females, give priority to women's health concerns and throw men in jail (just like us!):

> An American freelance journalist, Eliza Griswold, visited Dr. Hawa's encampment in 2007 and 2008 and was stunned that an unarmed woman had managed to create a secure, functioning oasis surrounded by a chaotic land of hunger and warlords. Ms. Griswold helped Dr. Hawa start a school for 850 children, mostly girls. It's only a tiny fraction of the children in the camp, but it's a start…
> In addition, Dr. Hawa runs literacy and health classes for women, as well as programs to discourage female genital mutilation. And she operates a tiny jail — for men who beat their wives.
> "We are trying an experiment," she told me. "We women in Somalia are trying to be leaders in our community."

This is the kind of Islam the US wants to hold up as an example for our Muslim allies and enemies: one in which women are in charge and men are cowed and neglected.

Lately, the feminist rhetoric at the highest levels of government is louder and more strident than anything I've ever heard in my life. Feminists are calling for the removal of some of the most basic elements of justice and human rights, men who have angered the US government are being arrested on trumped up sex crime charges made possible by extraordinarily intrusive feminist law, and our Secretary of State is calling for domestic violence kangaroo courts to be set up all over the world solely for the purpose of jailing men.

Even as there is a dawning awareness amongst Western men that something is gravely wrong with family law, and that feminism has gone way too far, it has suddenly become the state's guiding ideology. Democracy? Bah, that was so 2000; now nothing short of absolute women's equality at any cost will do. Is this the beginning, the end, or the beginning of the end?

The End of Women?

Featured Guest · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter and Guest columnist Snark pontificates on new economic data suggesting that the recession is starting to take a toll on women, too:

During this year's mancession, we men have faced a lot of stick – in fact, we've had our noses rubbed in very serious problems that happened through no fault of our own, and that happened to us specifically because we are men.

Women mocked us for losing our jobs. They belittled us for our poverty. They kicked us when we were down and implicitly advocated that our extermination should follow – as in Hannah Rosin's hate screed 'The End of Men,' a piece celebrating men's humiliation for the whole world to titillate at.

But, there were a few of us who said all along that what goes around comes around – that the only reason men were losing their jobs was because more of them worked in the private sector, whereas women tend to make a living in the public sector. And the latter depends upon the former for its survival – meaning that a huge loss of jobs in the private sector necessitates huge cuts to the public sector, where women work.

Indeed, this is fairly basic economics; but apparently beyond the intellectual capabilities of Hannah Rosin and those other feminists who showed their true colours once they thought they had begun their permanent victory in the battle of the sexes. We knew better – there was simply no way that a He-cession would not turn into a She-cession.

It was inevitability; simply a matter of time, we said, before the shoe is on the other foot.

Those thoughts kept us smiling through those dark times.

December 15th, 2010: it's official. In the UK, women have lost more jobs in the recession than men, and this is only the beginning of what will become record levels of female unemployment. Already, the numbers are at their lowest since 1988.

It's been a tough year. We've taken a lot of bashing at a time when we were at our most vulnerable. We were twice victimised – once by the banks and their government minions, and then again by women who blamed us, scorned us, left us, impoverished us further, or lobbied for the redirection of construction industry stimulus packages into the hands of teachers and social care workers whose jobs weren't even threatened.

Well, ladies, turns out you're the biggest recession losers. If it's happening in the UK today, it's bound to hit America tomorrow – and most other places, I should think.

I can only assume that Hannah Rosin and her misandrist friends will play the Woman Card – or even better, the Womenandchildren Card – demanding sympathy (as a right!), sharing sob stories with puppy dog eyes, because, y'know, as with all bad things, it's even badder when it happens to the chicks.

Sniff.

I would like to take this occasion to solemnly proclaim that we are witnessing*The End of Women,* and may no man shed a single tear nor feel one iota of sympathy for them now that the chickens coming home to roost. In fact, since women have spent the last year systematically violating The Golden Rule – do unto others as you would have them do unto you – I think we should do all we can to mock, belittle, flip off and tear down the newly unemployed females.

And as a man who was unemployed for half of this year, but who managed to find decent employment with a decent wage after having my face repeatedly spat in by brats like Hannah Rosin – I am happy to say I will be enjoying this season's festivities with family, in financial security, and with plentiful food and gifts.

But I am not without a heart, and I feel for those poor women struggling to make ends meet.

Tell you what, ladies – come around my way on the 26th, and I'll leave some moldy carrots and potato peelings out on the street for you. Hey – it's Christmas!

Young Man Shows Exceptional Restraint Despite Girls' Violence

W.F. Price · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The headline for this video on the Seattle Times is "Pregnant teenager attacked on Metro bus," but if you watch the entire thing you'll see that the person who takes the greater part of the blows and abuse is actually the pregnant girl's boyfriend, who somehow maintains his composure despite being hit, kicked, slapped grabbed and threatened by a vicious gang of young women. He also acts as a peacemaker and tries to defuse the situation even as he's being hit in the face. Of course his girlfriend, who doesn't seem too concerned about her unborn child, can't help but try to escalate the situation…

I guess the assault on the young man wasn't worth a headline, but the footage is pretty graphic. You know these articles that have been coming up about an increase in violence amongst young women? Well, here's a real life example on tape:

NOW: Ban Hooters — For the Children, Of Course

W.F. Price · 17 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

San Francisco: feminist lawyers working for the National Organization of Women have filed a complaint with the San Francisco Police Department demanding that the Hooters restaurant chain be shut down for illegally providing adult entertainment.

Although the NOW feminists – battle-scarred old warriors from the 70s kulturkampf from the looks of them – are portraying Hooters as an insidious influence on children, the real issue appears to be equal opportunity employment law, as Hooters hires young, attractive females as servers, and of course that won't do…

As NOW and the aging feminists struggle to maintain relevance in a society that prefers not to even look at them, expect them to escalate the attacks and other attention-seeking measures.

San Francisco's KTVU reports here, where you can watch the lovely NOW San Francisco President go after Hooters on camera.

The End of Men

Paul Elam · 17 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Paul Elam

This article begins with a blog post I came across in October over at Oz Conservative. OzCon's views fit well with his blog name. He's definitely right of center, with a clear antifeminist slant and an ostensibly supportive view of the men's movement- at least his men's movement.

But in this article, he asks in the title, "What's Wrong with the Men's Rights Movement?" And in that piece he takes some very specific shots at our problems as he sees them, which mainly boil down to the fact that not enough of us are patriarchs. His rationale for this is simple and plainly stated. There are essentially two factions of the MRM, liberals and sexual separatists, and that we have formed an alliance that few men will embrace because, like feminists, we are anti marriage and hypercritical of traditional masculinity.

He even feels we are more a compliment to feminists ideologically than would appear on the surface.

I am going to come back to all this, but I must first sidetrack to a recently released video by Hanna Rosin, in her continuing diatribe about "The End of Man."

The rest of this article will be written with the assumption you have carefully viewed all of it.

Both Rosin and OzCon get a lot of things wrong. Truth tell though, Rosin, despite all her drivel, from females being more intelligent and focused than males, to her thoroughly muddled and inconclusive rambling on why men are falling behind, she gets a lot more right than OzCon- at least where it counts.

So rather than hack away at this keyboard, pointlessly dissecting either of their fallacies, it is more advantageous and informative to point to what Rosin gets right. Because what she gets right is a very apt description of the precipice edge on which every man and boy in modern western culture now teeters.

We are in the process now of being marginalized into a servile shadow existence by women. We can attribute this, as Rosin does, to a changing economy, or we can look at the forces of consumerism that are more likely behind the social metamorphosis, with feminism stoking the fires along the way. We can pick most any reason we want. In the end, it doesn't matter. Rosin is right, men are on their way out- and there is nothing that is going to stop it.

As we have beaten into the ground around here lately, men are falling father behind women at an exponentially increasing rate.

If you have any doubt, consider the following; the areas where Rosin hit her target. Young women now out earn young men, the majority of the workforce is female, and the gap will increase. Women are dominating managerial positions, and the gap will increase. Men's presence and performance in education, from grammar school to grad school, is plummeting and shows every sign of worsening in the future. Women are rapidly becoming the majority of single home owners and will exceed men drastically in the future in almost all growth professions, and especially in jobs that are financially lucrative.

Meanwhile men will face low paying jobs and rampant unemployment. It is estimated that when the current bad economy recovers, 18 million men ages 25 to 54 will be unemployed and unemployable. And that is not even considering the millions that will be employed at below sustenance levels in dreg jobs across the western landscape.

We have an educational establishment intractably dominated by anti male ideology, a law enforcement/judicial apparatus that has become an incarceration machine for men, and every bit of public sentiment needed to take all of this much further than it has already gone.

All this is happening in a culture that will continue to place the social onus on men to use their earnings and their blood to enhance the lives of women. Where social pressures fail, state functionaries will take up the slack.

This is the end of men, at least as we have known them to be in our lifetimes. I am not suggesting that we follow Rosin's advice to just 'drink the kool-aid,' and comply, to make the transition less painful. Just the opposite. But if we are to pursue any rational course of action we better accept that we are on an irrevocable path to female domination, and male subjugation. The only thing that will stop it at this point is a catastrophic event that leads to anarchy.

They say there are no atheists in foxholes. Well, there aren't any feminists either.

By the way, if you think subjugation is too strong a term, try hopping on a woman only train car in India and see what happens. Perhaps if you live through it you can tell us all about it. Or better yet, just have enough sex with enough women till one of them gets you thrown behind bars.

OzCon would likely have us believe that this makes the case for traditional marriage. But given the state of marriage and family law, that is a delusion of such magnitude that it would register on the Richter scale.

The decision to marry is a personal one. It's a man's choice and a man's folly. But I'll have no truck with any man that would teach our boys and young men that marriage and the caretaking of women is what makes him a real man. It is the woefully misguided and pathogenic pipe dream of men who invest more in their idealizations than they do in common sense; who in fact invest more in securing their genetic legacy than they do their own children's well being.

And it doesn't begin and end with marriage. In fact, we don't need a marriage strike, per se, at all. Women will out prosper men in every way, but they will always be hypergamous. The future will bring us nothing but a vast majority of women who thug-fuck for reproductive reasons, while manipulating and/or coercing Omega and Beta lapdogs for supplemental income. Most of the rest will compete with each other ever more viciously for the steadily dwindling numbers of men that can support them in ways they cannot on their own.

The other two are already married. I hope that OzCon is one of the guys with bragging rights.

In the end, though, there is little room for marriage in the future. It is toast- even if you have your nose too far up Ward Cleaver's fetid, decomposing ass to smell it burning.

What we need, assuming there is a "we," is a chivalry strike, which is to say a total abdication and rejection of any responsibilities to women, individually, and as a group. It is, after all, fitting in a world where women have no responsibilities whatsoever toward anyone but themselves.

As to contempt for traditional masculinity, I have none. I don't even know that anyone can tell me what it means (though many try). I'll save my contempt for stupidity and chosen blindness. Let the "patriarch's" of the world have their foolish ways. It matters not to me. I will be busy surviving as they march themselves and their unfortunate progeny into the grinding halls of family justice. We'll call it intellectual culling, and the world will be better for it.

This is not an activist's call to action, at least not collectively. There is no petition to sign, no club to join, and not many would heed the call if there was. Most men, especially traditionalists, will do what men have done in the face of gender feminism for half a century now; that is, follow their instincts to please women and wait for Hannah Rosin to tell them what to think about their own lives, how to live them, and what their place is.

As an individual though, I feel compelled to do something more than just take care of me. I have seen noticed in the analytics for my YouTube Channel that there are a small, but not insignificant number of young people, mostly male, who watch my videos. I get email from teenagers who read this site from time to time.

I have never considered fully what to say to them. But the times they are a changing.

I have started a list of titles for open letters to write to these young men. I think geared for 12 year olds and up seems appropriate. I want to spend some of my time writing these letters and developing ways to ensure distribution of them. Maybe I will even launch a new website for the effort.

There is a really rough road ahead for these unfortunates, and hardly anyone around to tell them about it. And maybe I could actually help a couple of them avoid a bad end.

Life delivers no promises, but I can always hope.

Divorcée Featured in NY Times Denounces The Spearhead

W.F. Price · 18 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Michelle Pont, a woman featured in the New York Times as a client of new divorce financier Balance Point Divorce Funding, responded to our take on the business yesterday with a comment of her own, insisting that she deserves half of her husband's company.

I have no idea whether this is the genuine Mrs. Pont, but I have no reason to believe otherwise, so let's assume it is.

Her comment follows:

> You may have never seen a woman do any more then dispatch when you were a KID, then you have never seen what I have done. At 8 months pregnant with OUR child I drove TRUCKS after my own High paying job that I had since 18. I loaded trucks, I dispatched, I drove a forklift, I unloaded & loaded trucks and at times hand unloaded. It's not just a man's world anymore let's get that straight. You know NOTHING about me, OUR business or what I HAVE done. So please refrain from making comments that you know NOTHING about.
> When we have been sued, which had been several times, WE are at court, WE are on the witness stands, WE are making declarations, OUR livelihood is on the line our homes, businesses are in Jeopardy. You know absolutely nothing about running a business & the stress a transportation company puts on you 24 hours a day 7 days a week & yes including Christmas day & every holiday. There were MANY years we were on call & could not go anywhere for celebration. The difference between myself & other women is that I DID start this business & due to his lack of good credit I BOUGHT our first home on my OWN without him on title. SO AGAIN without me he would have NOTHING.
> I took our daughter every Saturday to Chuck E. Cheese so that he may sleep in until noon. Then after I quit my high paying job to stay home with our daughter & open a warehouse where I went every day at 5AM while he slept in. I breast fed her, dispatched, loaded, answered phones by myself. At times would leave her screaming in the office to take care of business. So you want to tell that I don't deserve half of the company I started too. That doesn't include the service I provided for him at home either. Like him sitting on his fat butt while he orders me around to get his food, soda, water, snacks, take out the trash, doing the laundry & what ever else he wanted.
> People would tell me how I was a slave to that man. I wasn't the type of woman to sit around eating Bon Bons all day long. I was busy also with school activities for our daughter, picking her up & taking her every morning again while he slept away. I went on EVERY field trip, did all the community charity work, belonged to all the organizations for our daughter. So Get off your high horse & get your facts straight & do your research before making any comments. It's men like you that don't deserve a woman like me!!!
> Michelle Pont

Michelle seems to have a lot of grievances, and a great deal of anger and contempt for her ex. Yet obviously he built a very lucrative business, and she is a wealthier woman than average, so one wonders where the anger comes from, but I think it gets back to the princess attitude. You see, Mrs. Pont is very upset about all the drudgery of being a housewife. She gave up her old job, had to fetch her husband food, and even breastfed her child. Definitely not things a woman signs up for when getting married!

You see, men, there really is no such thing as a wife anymore.

Seattle Metro to Bus Riders: Gang Rape Prohibited

W.F. Price · 18 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

To tackle the rampant problem of gang rape in Seattle's Metro public transportation system, signs reminding people that gang rape is a violation of the law have been placed in prominent places on buses. The signs also warn that video cameras are on the lookout for signs of gang rape, and cite relevant code.

Metro claims it's a prank, but back in the 1990s equally unnecessary posters warning riders against forcing black people to sit in the back of the bus were placed in buses, so I'm not sure I believe them (segregation has never been legal or the norm in Washington State). Seattle, a hard-left liberal city, is notorious for pointless political statements, for example denunciations of Thanksgiving and "future time orientation," which according to the school district is a sexist, racist plot, so the signs, although embarrassing when seen by outsiders, may well be genuine.

If not, someone did a good job making them look that way, and made a pretty amusing statement about the nanny-state nature of Pacific Northwest politics.

As Women's Wealth and Power Grows, Their Sexual Preferences Diverge Farther from Men's

W.F. Price · 19 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Contrary to the widely disseminated notion of the lusty "cougar" pursuing young men, a new study in Scotland has found that women who are financially independent actually tend to express a preference for older men, in contrast to the preference wealthy men show to prefer younger women.

Although both wealthy men and women prioritize good looks more, researchers had expected to find that as women became financially independent their tastes would converge with those of men and lead them to seek out younger mates. Instead, the data pointed to the opposite, and found them seeking out even older mates than their poorer counterparts.

So, rather than creating a more egalitarian mating market, empowering women only further reinforces the natural preferences of the sexes, as they are freed from the constraints of convention.

This is not surprising, because amongst humans, as most primates, age equates to status in males (up to a certain point). In fact, male aging patterns, such as the appearance of gray hair first in specific places such as the temples and either side of the chin, are visibly distinct so as to indicate maturity, and therefore status. Note that aging signs in human females are more generalized and have no apparent decorative value.

So what these women are doing is simply expressing the entirely natural female preference for high status males. Because they can afford to be choosy, they are shooting straight for the top.

Holiday Schedule

W.F. Price · 19 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We're going to keep posting over the Christmas season, but I intend to slow things down a bit and try to spend less time working. So, until the New Year there might be fewer articles, and comments might take a while to go through. However, if anyone wants to submit something I'll keep posting guest posts and anything else our authors want to put out there. We've had record traffic over the last couple weeks (the three highest traffic days ever were all over the last fortnight), so rest assured that you'll be getting plenty of views if your piece goes up here.

I hope everyone has a good time over the holidays with friends and family, and takes some time to relax and celebrate. After the buzz of the festivities wears off, I intend to come out full-steam ahead, bringing in the New Year with shiny new content and ideas.

With that said, I hope you're all hanging in there during this stressful time of year. Soon, it will all be over and we'll be toasting the end of 2010. My prediction is that 2011 will bring even more attention and awareness to men's issues, and possibly even some mainstream acknowledgment that it's time for change.

Faithless

Reader Brett comments on a recent event in Houston, in which a dying man attacks his wife's lover on camera

People forget that before there was society, we were roving familial bands of people who could not save much knowledge between generations.

With society, we give up that lone wolf attitude. We are no longer creatures of "I'll do it my way" but an interconnected group depending on each other for survival, including the seemingly paradoxical necessity of killing or ejecting those who are truly sociopathic, or predator-parasites.

Now that we have a civilization, many people like to pretend that there was never a time before civilization, and that civilization doesn't require upkeep or even participation. Just go to your job and buy stuff, and you're a perfect citizen.

With that mentality comes the idea that you can't interrupt anyone else from doing the same, which produces an absurd moralism of sins of omission glorified as self-sacrifice:

> Why film yourself hitting your wife's lover? Why even hit your wife's lover? No man owes you a vow of fidelity. If your wife cheats, it's on her. (Via ATL.) Attacking the man is infantilizing the woman. Why not punch her? – CF

Like all liberals, they think it's personal. They think you hit the guy only because he upset you. Why do it at all? They ask. There's risk to you, and you could just stay at home and take passive-aggressive revenge on your cheating wife:

> Or, since they live in Texas – a community property state – why not ring up a bunch of credit card debt? If you're going to die of cancer, 50% of that debt will pass through to your surviving spouse. Make the bitch file for bankruptcy just as she's applying for bar admissions.
> There's nothing cool about sucker punching a guy. Plus, the guy in the video is fat. He's probably an intellectual alpha. Outside of an academic environment, there'd be no way he'd pull a chick who looks like the woman in this video. Let the fat guy have his 2-3 years of glory. Only a hater denies another man his brief moment in the sun.

This supersonic stupidity misses the point, as do all liberals when perceiving a true or honest action: it's about the principle. The principle is that you don't move in on another man like a coward; you challenge him and steal his woman if you need to, but no sneaking around behind the scenes.

They disguise their laziness as compassion or morality — don't hurt the fat man; take it out on the wife, she's the whore! — but really, the principle here is that cheaters get punished and since no man wants to hit a woman, you take it out on the other moral actor in the situation: the other man.

What's so wrong with this? The cheater needs to see intolerance for his behavior. The wife needs to see a disaster truly come about that ruins her illusions. The principle needs to be upheld: don't cheat on your spouse, or bad stuff happens.

And no matter how bad that is in any individual case, it's better than letting the principle decay. If you ignore a murder, more murders happen, because people see that there's no penalty for going to the dark side. If you let other men cheat with impunity, you'll soon have a society of whores.

Feminists in Media Shocked over Assange Reaction

W.F. Price · 20 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for the Guardian, reporter Tracy McVeigh reports on the overwhelming wave of anger over Assange's arrest with thinly-veiled unease, revealing feminist concerns about their tenuous claim to favorable public sentiment.

In what is an obvious reference to Ferdinand Bardamu's posts on The Spearhead and In Mala Fide, she blames "misogynist right wing bloggers" for outing Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilen:

> Dismissed by his supporters as a smear campaign, the case against Assange now threatens to move from a sideshow to overwhelm the main act – the work he has done in his public life as editor of WikiLeaks. In part, Assange, 39, who has become a figurehead for whistleblowers, can blame this on supporters who have pressed accolades on the man rather than the cause, and who range from left wing historians, feminists and human rights campaigners to misogynist right wing bloggers and a porn baron.
> A range of deeply misogynistic blog posts have blamed "feminists", despite insistence from people close to Assange that there is no conspiracy.
> The paper is reflecting a growing discomfort among many, in both camps, at the widespread vilification – and naming – of the two alleged victims on websites and blogs, and also of the kind of language being used by people including Assange's own lawyer Mark Stephens who referred to the allegation as a "honeytrap" .

Whatever one feels about Assange, there is something very suspicious about these rape allegations, especially the fact that Anna Ardin/Bernardin, the woman who made the decision to go to the police, has been tied to shady, CIA-funded groups in Cuba, and left Sweden days before new charges were filed, running off to the remote town of Yanoun in the Palestinian West Bank, possibly to spy on Hamas and Orthodox Jewish settlers.

McVeigh dismisses any allegations that "feminists" were behind this, but Anna Ardin/Bernardin is a self-described feminist activist who has made accusations before – against her own students – and was thrown out of Cuba for her involvement with a right wing, CIA-supported feminist group. Furthermore, there is nothing odd about feminists working with the CIA; Gloria Steinem received funds directly from the intelligence organization while employed by Ms. Magazine.

The "discomfort" at the naming of Ardin and Wilen is felt by establishment feminists like McVeigh, who want to be able to decide what should be reported and what shouldn't — oddly similar to the dispute over Wikileaks. Yet her own publication, even as it denounces those who have exposed Assange's accusers, claims that it upholds the principle of disclosure, writing:

> The process of editing, contextualising, explanation and redaction is a painstaking one. It is part of the craft of journalism. Journalism is also about disclosure. It is at its best when it is the disclosure of matters of high public interest. Judge Assange on that score, as much as any other.

If the participation of a feminist activist who may be a spy in what looks like a frame-up of a highly controversial journalist is not a matter of "high public interest," what is?

All We Have To Do Is Stay Male and Fail

Jack Donovan · 21 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On Guy Garcia's The Decline of Men (2008)

In The Decline of Men, Guy Garcia begins and ends his discussion of the American male's loss of power at the Burning Man festival. In front of a sign that says "TRUTH" he sees an effigy of a man who is half-built, headless. The image of a man is being reconstructed after having been burned to the ground by surprise, ahead of schedule. Garcia sees the first man as traditional Western patriarchal man, and the burning symbolizes his loss of economic and political primacy in the United States and around the World.

After speaking to Gerald Levin, Garcia concludes that men will re-discover and re-build themselves and adopt a more feminine approach to life, once they abandon the "arrogance of power." Levin was the architect of the disastrous AOL/Time Warner merger, and is now the Managing Director of the Moonview Sanctuary in Santa Monica, which specializes in New Age therapy and holistic healing. Garcia doesn't get into it, but The Moonview Sanctuary story was chronicled in New York magazine in 2007. When a reeling, failing Levin started talking about bringing "the poetry" back into life during an interview with Lou Dobbs, his future wife and business partner called to request a meeting with him. Laurie, former talent agent 14 years his junior, already had a business plan for a boutique wellness clinic catering to high profile clients. Instead of approaching him initially for an investment, Laurie started talking with the distraught man and involved herself in his emotional world. She even cased his history and eventually decided to approach him with the idea of spiritually communing with his own murdered son. Levin left his wife of 32 years to help Laurie build her rehab for the rich and famous, which supports her combined interests in hippie dippy bullshit (brain painting and "holotropic beathwork") and shopping for "lavish antiques." Levin, now a full convert who attends men's drumming circles, asserts that ultimately his mission is to "break down male culture."

Garcia's final words on The Decline of Men are:

> "The Levin lesson is clear. For men to rediscover a better, more balanced, more enlightened version of themselves, they don't have to join pagan parades in the desert or ingest brain-warping drugs. All they have to do is fail. And through this failure and destruction they just might gain the freedom to re-create themselves as the men they know they can be."

He's reaching here with a subtle scold, projecting thoughts into the heads of men that may or may not be there. (His attempt at a bit of that "communing" stuff, perhaps?) Having read Levin's story, a more "truthful" restatement might be that after men have failed, men will have the opportunity to be whatever women would like them to be, and to be used however women wish. Whether or not the success of women in ventures like The Moonview Sanctuary — and in a postmodern service economy that produces nothing — is a sustainable basis for a nation is a question that Garcia never tackles.

Husbands Without Wives, Or Wives Without Husbands?

One particularly odd dystopian scenario that Garcia imagines is a future where men are desperate to find wives, but wives don't need them or can't find any suitable men who make a sufficient amount of money or hold an acceptable number of academic credentials. He muses:

> "The jarring notion of a man waiting by the phone for Ms. Right to call may seem ridiculous to some, but it's no longer far-fetched. If present trends continue, men will soon find themselves in a position that used to be associated with single women. At the very least, they will find out — if they haven't already — what it feels like to be the financially dependent partner in a romantic relationship, assuming they can find a woman who will take them. While young women are increasingly willing to forgo Mr. Right for Mr. Right Now, it may be > partly because they've simply given up on finding a man who meets their expectations."

This is odd, because during the same year, Micheal Kimmel complained in Guyland — which shares much in common with Garcia's book — that women were desperate to find men who were ready and willing to commit, because men were in no hurry. This is a pop culture commonplace, and is more believable from the way things look on the ground than Garcia's fantasy. Kimmel wrote, more convincingly:

> "Countless movies and TV sitcoms remind men that marriage and parenthood are women's victories over the guys of Guyland, and that once they are permanently attached to nagging wives, they'll never again have sex or any other kind of fun again."

It is women, less than men, who seek a spouse and family to "complete them." Women are encouraged to be sexually adventurous and promiscuous, and are providing sex to "Mr. Right Now" — so more young men are probably getting more of what they want from women than ever before in history. At the same time, more and more men are waking up to the fact that marriage isn't what it used to be. They are looking at a 50/50 chance of a divorce that will probably put them in relative poverty and make it extremely difficult for them to maintain a meaningful and positive relationship with their offspring. I think most men like the "idea" of having a family "someday," but it will increasingly be women who will be put in the position of selling marriage to men, not the other way around.

The bulk of The Decline of Men is a fairy standard catalog of men's issues with a particular emphasis on pop culture. His perspective feels very tony and coastal, and his understanding of blue collar men outside of New York, San Francisco and Los Angeles seems to be confined to observations in the "I once had a friend who had a friend who dated a blue collar guy once, and this is what she said about him after they broke up" insight bracket.

Garcia consults an odd collection of experts, but with the exception of some space given to the authors of Why Men Don't Iron: The Fascinating and Unalterable Differences Between Men and Women, he rarely looks at issues from more than one side. For instance, his contribution to the "women in combat" debate is asking a man who has been advocating for women in combat from an ideological perspective since the 1970s and publishing his comments at length. No counter arguments are entertained seriously, and none of what this one "expert" (who seems to be at odds with the entire US Military establishment, as well as every male soldier I've ever talked to seriously about this issue) says is ever questioned thoughtfully. Garcia also mentions "matriarchal cultures where the sexes have lived in harmony for thousands of years" in passing, which caught my eye because I've still yet to see truly convincing evidence of one successful culture run by women for any extended period of time. Later in the book he makes reference to the work of feminist archaeologist Marija Gimbutas, who developed a "portrait of a society that lasted 25,000 years and which practiced equal rights between men and women on a social, political, and spiritual level." He never mentions, however, that many regard her theories as being highly questionable. Lawrence Keeley's War Before Civilization, previously mentioned here, takes apart the myth of peaceful and matriarchal prehistory. Men have probably always engaged in some kind of warfare, and as women represented the future of the tribe, it is doubtful that they ever participated equally in war-making or politics, and as Garcia even notes at one point, women have the least to gain by going to war.

The Golden Age of Goddess Worship

There is a recurring New Age "return to the goddess theme" with a lot of these authors (Keen, Bly, now Garcia) who are grasping for some way to envision a future where men and women share power. They share the same clichés, the same sources and the same faults of reasoning. One cliché is the idea, repeated and bolded in The Decline of Men, that "Biologically speaking, all human beings begin as females." The fact that males must be XY and not XX to begin with, and that any XY is going to be male from the moment of conception unless something goes wrong is never mentioned. The point of repeating this idea is to make it seems as though women are some kind of human default and that men are a temporary mutant aberration. However, there has never been a human society consisting solely of women. Men have always been part of the human equation. There is no pre-male society that women are "going back to." All primates are sexually dimorphic, and all have some sort of separate gender role breakout in terms of division of labor. We borrow the term "alpha males" from the study of animals, and the tendency of violent males to create power based hierarchies and fight over access to females. The idea that humans abandoned normal primate behaviors during some Goddess-worshipping golden age of peace and sexual harmony and then returned to patriarchy and jungle law once they discovered agriculture seems so far-fetched that you have to want to believe it — like feminists Margaret Mead and Marija Gimbutas.

If this Golden Age never happened, then Garcia's vision of a future where we "return" to (after we fail) is based on a manufactured past. In a recent lecture, Hanna Rosin (of "The End of Men" fame) talked about the rise of women as a "bridge." If we take this bridge based on false premises, we are likely to find that it is a bridge to nowhere.

A 12 Step Program for Men

Garcia wants men to acknowledge that, as a group, they are failing, and comes up with a 12 Step program a la Alcoholics Anonymous. Here are his "steps:"

1. Admit that we've got a problem.
2. Make a fearless inventory of ourselves.
3. Apologize to those we have hurt.
4. Admit our mistakes.
5. Break the trap of male silence.
6. Make peace with Mr. Hyde.
7. Seek strength in brotherhood.
8. Embrace change.
9. Never blame women.
10. Remember that respect comes in many forms.
11. Share our experience.
12. Don't follow The Rules.

He never really develops this program very well, and some of the steps represent ideas that aren't explained anywhere in the book. However, number 9 sticks out, and he asserts throughout the book that, even as men are supposed to abandon traditional rules of masculinity and reimagine themselves completely, it is unmanly to blame women. This is a powerful statement of Garcia's part. Men must abandon any recognizable masculine ideal, admit their mistakes and embrace change, but women must remain blameless!

Really? Men and women are supposed to share power honestly and equally, but women must remain free from blame? Men are to assume that women are always behaving fairly and decently, never playing the system to their advantage, still sweet sisters in struggle looking for a fair shot? Equality means that questioning how women wield their newfound power is verboten?

Garcia did bravely allow one of his experts to mention the fact that many men are actually financially unable to pay their child support, and that this will only increase as women gain ground in the workforce and men lose ground. But his failure to engage the powerful feminist ideologues, lobbyists and policy makers who actively and knowingly contribute to the decline of men reveals for what he truly is. Guy Garcia is just a media-saavy opportunist, trying to make a buck off The Decline of Men by expanding his claim to expertise as a speaker and media consultant who helps corporate clients interpret the new marketplace, without offending or challenging women (likely his potential clients) in any way. The Decline of Men flatters the egos of women, and offers no real direction for men beyond some sort of New Age awakening to grateful goddess worship and uncritical subservience.

Garcia's 12 Steps might as well be condensed to three.

1. Stay Male
2. Fail
3. Obey

Even “I’m sorry” Is Too Much to Give a Man Falsely Accused of Rape

pierceharlan · 21 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Remember John Keogh? Mr. Keogh was a 23-year-old paranoid schizophrenic who was accused of indecently assaulting another hospital patient last year. An investigation was launched, but on July 4, 2009, after interviewing the young man, police dropped the case, withdrew all charges, and immediately informed the complainant. The trouble was, they didn’t bother to inform Mr. Keogh, who was extremely upset about the allegation. On July 7, he hanged himself with a pair of shoelaces. In the UK, “victims” have the right to be told when a case is dropped, suspects don’t.

Remember 19-year-old Cory Headen? Last year, two teenage girls lied to another 19-year-old man that Mr. Headen had raped one of them, so the man broke into Mr. Headen’s home and beat him to death with a baseball bat while he was sleeping.

How about Sumbo Owoiya? A 15-year-old girl falsely told her boyfriend that Mr. Owoiya, 18, raped her. The girl, the boyfriend, and another man then drove to the innocent youth’s apartment. While Mr. Owoiya was looking through a peep hole, the other man shot him to death through the door. The boyfriend was sentenced to seven years imprisonment, but the girl was given a suspended sentence.

And John Chalmers, a 47-year-old prominent businessman, suffered devastating brain injuries in a vicious attack after he was wrongly suspected of raping one of his workers. So terrible was the beating that Mr. Chalmers has had to “learn everything again.”

I could go on and on and on. Once unleashed, a rape lie can destroy lives in sudden, unpredictable ways. We could literally write a book about the horrors suffered by men and boys falsely accused of rape, which we chronicle daily at False Rape Society. Victims of rape lies frequently lose their jobs, their friends, their life savings, their businesses, and pretty much anything else important to them. As shown by the cases cited above, the potential harm to victims of false rape accusations literally knows no bounds.

False rape accusers: Therapy preferred over charges

In contrast, the punishment allowed to their false accusers is always extremely limited. Typically, they aren’t charged at all, and when they are charged, it’s customary to ask that no custodial sentence be given. That request is frequently granted. Dr. Kim McGregor, a well-known authority on sexual assault, recommends “some form of therapeutic intervention rather than charging them” because, she said, “someone need[s] to be ‘pretty distressed’ to make a false allegation of sexual assault.” If false accusers are charged, they often serve less jail time than their victims served after being falsely accused. The statutory schemes in all or virtually all states severely limit the maximum sentences allowed for false rape reporting, often ranging from less than a year to two years.

With the explosion in rape reforms over the past thirty years, we have handed women and girls unprecedented power to see to it that their rapists are charged and convicted. The problem is, we never considered what we should do if they abuse that power with rape lies.

Our jurisprudence accepts the notion that, generally, the more serious a crime harms an innocent person, the more severe the sentencing should be. Given the extreme harm possible to men falsely accused of rape, and given the de minimis sentences given to false accusers, the sentencing maximums are an affront to justice. Nevertheless, it is extremely unlikely, given the powerful feminist lobby, that the sentencing maximums for false rape reporting will be extended in the foreseeable future.

Given that, what can we do to bring at least partial restoration to falsely accused men? One of the principal harms suffered by men falsely accused of rape is the injury to their reputations. While it’s impossible to restore a man’s good name after he’s been branded a rapist in America’s leading dailies, is it too much to ask the false accuser to run an apology ad? Apparently, it is. Apparently it's a punitive humiliation, a "scarlet letter," and cruel and unusual punishment.

Why not a public apology?

In 2007, Angela Schmidt, a former teacher, was given a special form of accelerated rehabilitation probation for falsely reporting that a colleague had raped her. Under the terms of this probation, the charges would be dropped if the probation was successfully completed.

A prosecutor requested that the sentencing judge order Schmidt to run a newspaper ad saying she falsely accused her colleague of rape. The prosecutor argued: "Anyone who wrongly accuses someone of a crime should be on notice to the public. Any other potential victims need to be aware of this woman."

Schmidt's lawyer said the ad proposal reminded him of "pilgrims and stockade in front of the town square." He called it a "humiliation," and noted that it would violate Schmidt's right against self-incrimination. The court refused to force Ms. Schmidt to run the ad.

But one judge did have the courage to order apology ads for a false rape claim, in a case that attracted national attention.

In September 1988, Elizabeth Irene Richardson, 24, a central Nebraska meat packing worker with three children, falsely accused Gary L. Nitsch, a quiet 43-year-old alfalfa-mill worker and father of two who neither smoke nor drank, of rape in order to get the attention of her long-distance truck driver husband. One night, she ripped her nightgown and called a friend in tears to tell her she'd been raped. The friend called police.

Mr. Nitsch had met Ms. Richardson just once, and only briefly, when he went to her house inquiring about a painting job she had advertised. He never assaulted her. Then, one day, out of the blue, while he was shopping, he was arrested and spent three days in jail before his brother was able to have him released on a $30,000 bond. He was charged with sexual assault. The dumbfounded Mr. Nitsch uttered the same thing many falsely accused men in his position end up saying: "I would just like to know how I was named."

As a result of the false charge, Mr. Nitsch lost his job and his family was harassed. At school, other children taunted his kids by saying, "Your dad's a rapist." His wife no longer liked coming into town to go shopping. His 18-year-old daughter quit high school because of the way she was treated. After Mr. Nitsch was released, he heard the stories circulating about people in the area buying guns and about wives being scared of him.

Ms. Richardson testified at a hearing that Mr. Nitsch raped her, but the case was dropped for lack of strong physical evidence. Ms. Richardson's lie was discovered after she told friends the accusation was a hoax, and she was convicted of perjury after pleading no contest.

But, of course, Ms. Richardson was not fully responsible for her acts. In words that could be transposed to a thousand other recent false rape cases, Ms. Richardson's lawyer said: "She was desperate to get [her husband] back and acted very impulsively without giving consideration to the thing, and it kind of snowballed on her."

Judge John P. Murphy sentenced Ms. Richardson to serve six months in prison, but he didn't stop there. He also required her to run half-page newspaper ads in all four newspapers, and ten spot announcements on both radio stations, in Dawson County, Nebraska. The apology ads were expected to cost approximately $1,000. Mr. Nitsch was given the right to approve the ads.

The Judge justified the ads: "You certainly couldn't force someone to say something they didn't believe," he told a reporter, "but I have allowed her to put it into her own words. I told her the reason. Mr. Nitsch's brother complained the rape charges were all over the papers, but when he was exonerated nobody hears about it. I told her the only way to get it out was to have her do it."

But the Nebraska Civil Liberties Union said the advertising requirement could violate three constitutional amendments: the 1st, which guarantees freedom of speech; the 8th, against cruel and unusual punishment, and the 14th, with its guarantee of due process. The NCLU's executive director said the organization is "concerned about the scarlet letter approach in sentencing."

Sorry, but "cruel and unusual" punishment is what happened to Gary Nitsch, not to mention John Keogh, Cory Headen, Sumbo Owoiya, and John Chalmers in the cases referenced above. An apology ad would just partly undo the grotesque reputational harm to Mr. Nitsch. If it caused the criminal some slight embarrassment, that's a small price to pay to partly correct a monstrous wrong.

Ms. Richardson decided to drop her appeal and just get it over with. So, on a Sunday in 1990, radio listeners in Central Nebraska heard the young woman declare: "I want the public to know these allegations were not true and that I made up the story for personal reasons." She said she hopes time will heal the damage to the falsely accused man's reputation.

Mr. Nitsch said he would have preferred a stiffer sentence. So would we all. But he should take some small consolation in the fact that the woman who tried to randomly destroy his life was forced to stand up in the proverbial town square and publicly declare, "He didn't do, and I'm sorry I lied!" At least now, any time someone Googles Mr. Nitsch's name, they will see that she was the criminal, and he was the victim. That's a lot more than most victims of false rape claims get.

Adopting a Feminist Proposal for Women in the Military

J. Durden · 22 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of my favorite conversations recently resurfaced here at The Spearhead, quickly rippling throughout the rest of the related blogosphere: the subject of women in the military. There's been mumbles and whispers of it for a little while, ever since people started talking about the Don't Ask Don't Tell repeal and whether we should be worrying about homosexuals openly serving in our armed forces. (The sensible folks, such as the Spearhead's very own Jack Donovan, realize this question is largely unimportant, since having women in the military is far more detrimental and stands little chance of ever changing.) Trying to rationally suggest that we re-examine that status of women in the military is obviously met with all of the logical fallacies one has come to expect from the feminist camp – my favorite such being a red herring of the implication that critics of women in the military just want the ladies to be little more than prostitutes.

This got me thinking. What if women in the military were just prostitutes? Perhaps our feminist friends have actually stumbled upon a great suggestion. I used to joke that the Marine Corps should institute a "Barracks Whore" MOS (military occupational specialty, or job, basically), but laughs aside, maybe there is something to the idea. Allow me to elaborate.

We already know, thanks to government commissioned studies, that the average woman has 50% of the upper body strength and 65- 70% of the aerobic capacity compared to her average male counterpart. Studies regarding IQ have shown that men average about 3-5 points higher than women, and perhaps of more interest, that IQ tests tend to be rigged so that women and men appear to score equally. (What's really going on behind the scenes is that women are only being compared against other women when scores are calculated, much like what happens with physical fitness test scores in the Marine Corps; women are competing only against other women in a test with easier standards, yet their "300 points" on the PFT counts just as much as a man's "300 points" even if a man's is much harder to earn.) This means the standby argument that women should serve because they can do the non-combat stuff just as well as the boys – be it turning wrenches, performing surgery, pushing paper or maintaining electronics – might not hold water. Nevermind the disastrous consequences that sexual competition introduces amongst the ranks. (Relevant quote from the previous link: "No one trusts a sexual rival, and nothing destabilizes a society like large numbers of single men. To avoid this scenario, our ancestors had to limit male polygamy and female hypergamy.")

Anecdotally, I can tell you that most women do not join the service with the noblest of intentions. (Perhaps it is fair to say that most people don't join with the noblest of intentions – but I suppose that's to be expected what with the recession and the promise of a steady paycheck and other bonuses for signing up. Women in particular admitted some telling things to me, though.) I'd hate to be accused of exaggerating, so let's say that half of all (read: literally all of them) the single female airmen I talked to admitted to me that they joined so that they could "travel the world" and "have sex with hot guys." Pregnancy rates amongst the single female Marines at my base in Okinawa got so bad that the base Sergeant Major held regular PME's (think, "classes") with all the ladies to explain the dangers of pregnancy. It was also effecting operational readiness, since pregnant women can't deploy (and as military readers probably already know and commenter DevilDog pointed out for those that didn't, pregnancy to ditch out on deployment is a fairly common phenomenon). I don't have as much direct experience with the other service branches but I figure my findings can probably be extrapolated. Perhaps zealous commenters can help fill in the gaps – I've heard pregnancy amongst female sailors is also a huge problem when it comes to staffing ships.

And before somebody gets all huffy and infuriated and starts shouting about the women that have served "in combat," I'd remind you how precious few there are that have actually done so. When deployed to a war zone, women are generally kept safe on base, doing the same shit they would be doing in garrison (except collecting all the extra hazard pay associated with a deployment). Moreover, the women I know who have been to combat openly admit women shouldn't be there (probably related to the whole physical fitness disparity mentioned above) or perform super effectively like Jessica Lynch. Maybe I'm beating a dead horse here, but I just wanted to establish that when it comes to the military, men can do everything women can do (except better). As Female Masculinist once remarked:

> In short, the idea behind women in the military, police and workplace is that they benefit from being there. They think it's fun. It flatters their egos, deservedly or not. The idea behind men in the military, police and workplace is that we all depend upon their being there and doing their jobs. All of society benefits from their work. And yet here we are, giving the dispensable privileges for the purpose of feeding their egos at the expense of the people we need who get by solely on their own merit.

Which brings us back to the suggestion that we just make women in the military prostitutes. I know what you're thinking – it sounds extreme. But it wouldn't actually be that drastic of a change. Most women in the military are already regarded – be it silently, or oustpokenly like DevilDog's posts – as whores. Apparently quite a few of them could care less about this (such as the patriotic young lasses who expressed their true reasons for enlisting to me). So let's take a look at some of the benefits of this proposal.

For the women, they wouldn't have to worry about silly things like work or training getting in the way of their sex-filled, government-sponsored sojourns. In fact, it would stand to reason that they would be exempt from a lot of the silly hardships of military life. I don't see why they'd really need to maintain a uniform anymore, for instance – since their job wouldn't exactly necessitate one. They probably wouldn't have to stand "duty" or "watch" anymore. Nor would they have to worry about the physical hardships and indignities of basic and follow-on training. Since this is government sponsored prostitution we are talking about, the ladies can expect a regular paycheck and the full compliment of government benefits – health care, dental care, 30 days paid vacation (you know, aside from all the other days of virtual paid vacation), the works. Safety would of course be paramount, including not just protection from physical harm but also safeguards against unwise sexual practices that could result in STDs, either for the ladies or the men.

There's a host of benefits for the men and more generally for combat effectiveness and unit readiness. Single male service members would feel less pressure to get married in order to gain access to (the perceived benefit of) regular sex. Having regular access to safe sex would probably alleviate the pressure these guys feel to try and maintain untenable relationships, either with women around their base or the women "back home." These relationships become especially strained during a deployment (or at a duty station far away – I can't tell you how many nights I was kept up because my roommate was arguing with his girlfriend at two in the morning in Okinawa) and contribute to loss of focus, depression, decreased morale and a host of other difficult to quantify but certainly qualitative problems.

There has been a lot of attention paid to the sky rocketing suicide rate amongst service members – by which I mean especially male service members – and one has to wonder how much relationship issues play a part in this. The simple "reality on the ground" is that a lot of young men in the military (especially young enlisted guys) get married very early in their careers because of the bigger paycheck, the ability to live off base (thus avoiding some "duty" assignments and dodging the misery that is "field day" or whatever other term the other branches use to describe the once-a-week all-day-long haze fest of barracks room cleaning) and the aforementioned regular sexual relations (or so they think – most haven't heard and refuse to believe that marriage is a leading cause of celibacy). Then they go on a deployment, hear on the grapevine that their lovely wife is getting gangbanged regularly by six or seven (different) guys every night back on base while simultaneously draining all of his accounts, and nobody wonders whether this is a contributing factor to our suicide rate. Hell, I I got more depressed just hearing about how some of the guys' wives were taking a shit all over their hubbies.

Government sponsored hookin' would make the barracks a much more attractive option than a nagging bride (there are no wives – hat tip W. F. Price) and future alimony (not to mention potentially child support) payment. Sew them oats young man, and consider a family after your service obligation. (Or once you're more established and comfortable in your career.)

And before someone gets all NAWALT up in here, I understand that, yes, not all women in the military are “like that.” I haven’t personally met any, but I grant the supposed existence of the hard-charging female who is every bit a man’s equal. I have met a few good wives, as well. But the statistically tiny exceptions to the overwhelmingly obvious trends being discussed here do little to deflate the argument. And civilian brothers, don’t think I’ve forgotten you. If military hookin’ becomes a smashing success, it’ll only be a matter of time before the government decides legalizing and regulating prostitution for the rest of you wouldn’t be such a bad idea either. Can’t tell you how many gals we met in Biloxi who asked us whether they should go to college or become strippers – the market is there, Obama! Ya just gotta tap it (but before you do it, make sure you wrap it).

J. Durden moonlights as super-hero alter ego Dr. Deezee, a D-List internet celebrity of ill-repute working his way up the e-fame ladder by being a massive troll and associating himself with people who are much more talented than he is. He runs the Internet Hate Machine in his spare time and recently decided his life’s ambition would be to spread his personal philosophy of Hatronomics as far and wide as possible. He’s probably just trying to get a rise out of you, but you never can be too sure with his type.

Marrying Liabilities

By Laura Grace Robins

It is said the key to financial wealth is in acquiring assets, rather than liabilities. It is not much of a stretch to also apply this advice towards marriage. In order to achieve marital wealth, men should look for a woman who is an asset, rather than a liability. In theory, this seems simple enough and no doubt some traditional folks will maintain that it is just that simple. They will say, "Just seek out a godly woman" and POOF—marital bliss! Those of us who operate in reality, in a culture that does not encourage godly anything, knows that finding such a woman is not much easier than finding a unicorn. We know that modern women are no longer assets, but liabilities. Liabilities for the men who marry them and liabilities for the government who maintains them. Feminism can be succinctly defined as being the philosophy that turns women from resources into obligations.

A few definitions:

"A liability can mean something that is a hindrance or puts an individual or group at a disadvantage, or something that someone is responsible for, or something that increases the chance of something occurring (i.e. it is a cause)."

This definition is a good summary of what marrying a liability can look like. Marriage to a modern woman can hinder men, cause them to be responsible for the woman's actions, and increases their chances of getting divorced.

We know that the second you drive a new car off the lot, it is already depreciating in value and becomes a liability. Is it really any different when a man marries a modern woman? The second the married couple walks back down the aisle, the modern woman, already a liability via feminism, then begins to depreciate in value even further. The first few years of marriage may not be that bad. She will still have that "new car smell" and run with relatively few problems. Four to six years in and the nagging and clanking picks up and she just doesn't shine like she used to. Eventually the car will sputter out and die leaving little or no monetary value to be redeemed. Modern marriages all too often end up the same way. If the woman was truly an asset, she would have added value to the marriage, rather than cause the man to be financially ruined via divorce.

"Assets are economic resources. Anything tangible or intangible that is capable of being owned or controlled to produce value and that is held to have positive economic value is considered an asset."

What I found particularly interesting about this definition is that an asset is one "capable of being owned or controlled to produce value". I think this relates to marriage as well. Before I explain—some damage control—I am NOT speaking of "controlled or owned" in the twisted feminist sense. I do not mean oppression or abuse, instead, I mean authority and/or leadership and the woman taking a submissive role. Women used to be assets because they were amicable to submission. The husband could easily lead them to "produce value", hence they were an asset to the marriage and in turn society at large. The "Proverbs 31 woman" is a good example of a woman who is an asset. In fact, she is even described as "lacking nothing of value." For a list of assets a woman used to bring to a marriage, see Proverbs 31 here.

A woman as an asset can best be summarized by this verse, "She brings him good, not harm, all the days of her life." The modern woman today, as a liability, instead brings harm, not only all the days of her married life, but her days after as well. She continually brings harm into a man's life, whether she is married to him or not, because the very nature of a liability is to cause hindrance. A modern woman will prevent a marriage from being successful, she will prevent herself from taking any responsibility, and in general she will prevent men from being men.

The Tide has Already Turned

W.F. Price · 23 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In any discussion there's always the danger of allowing the arguments and line of thought to stray ever farther from the reality of any given situation — the facts on the ground so to speak. This is especially the case where politics are involved, because making a moral case takes on such importance, as opposed to, say, engineering, where the goal is to make things work in the physical world.

Because of this peculiarly irrational nature of politics, great acts of folly have been undertaken in the name of "progress." For example, Chairman Mao's Great Leap Forward, which directly caused the unnecessary deaths of millions of people in an effort to realize a Communist utopia. The Communist Party demanded nothing less than the impossible from everyone from farmers to industrial engineers, causing catastrophic failure.

What this demonstrates is that there are limits not only to the stress a structure can withstand, but to the feasibility of political programs as well. In an often misunderstood gesture, a wise old ruler of England once sat on the seashore and commanded the advancing tide to stop. The story about Canute, a Danish viking who ruled over England, Denmark and Norway, may have been apocryphal, but the event may have occurred as a demonstration carried out by the king. As the saying goes, the sea ignored his command, and Canute then proclaimed that the power of kings is as nothing compared to the might of heaven. Some think Canute was trying to make a point about the limits of his earthly authority, and was rebuking the flattery of sycophants.

Today, armed with high technology, power and wealth beyond the dreams of Canute, it is easy to forget that despite our advances we are still subject to the same reality as medieval English kings. Our politicians promise to manipulate the weather and thereby save the world, to create wealth out of nothing, and to elevate all our children above the mean. Perhaps it is a result of democracy — one wins an election not so much by obtaining results in the real world, but by making the most fantastic promises for tomorrow.

As we discuss the plight of men in our society we tend to focus directly on the promises made by politicians, feminists and others wedded to the status quo. In so doing, we run the risk of losing sight of reality as well, and, ironically, in aiding them in their attempts to impose the impossible.

What we need to remind ourselves is that feminism as envisioned by most of its supporters is at best an unfeasible plan. At worst, it is an impossible effort. The distinction between the two is quite important, because where the former may siphon off work and waste time while people explore the plan and attempt to find a way to implement it, ultimately it will be abandoned as they realize it simply can't be done. The latter, as Mao's Great Leap Forward, would be an all-out attempt to impose a system doomed to catastrophic failure.

Some may say: "But look at all that feminism has accomplished! It is well on its way to total, permanent victory forever and always." No, this is far from the case. While feminist policies may have been imposed in a great many places in our society, this has come at great expense; an expense that we probably cannot maintain for much longer. Disassembling the American family has been enormously costly over the last generation. Millions of children are failing to live up to their potential as productive citizens, and social costs have been piling up as a result of fatherless homes and single motherhood. The divorce industry may be very lucrative for those involved with courts, but it does not add one cent to national wealth. Higher education has been successfully promoted for girls, and now we have millions of young women wasting several productive years obtaining useless degrees that give them little more than a sense of entitlement. The lower number of boys in higher education is not the real problem; it is the excess of females that we ought to worry about.

Although some have cheered the fact that productive male industry and occupations, such as resource extraction, manufacturing, construction and engineering have been on the decline for decades, and suggest that we have "advanced" to a service economy, they seem blind to the fact that the success of that service economy depends on our ability to force people to use it through the dollar's primacy as the world's currency. This is directly tied to our status as the world's policeman — a job Americans are no longer all that enthusiastic about. The service economy is a house of cards; platitudes notwithstanding, our women and girls have nothing of particular value to offer the rest of the world.

Countries that have built themselves up largely on the backs of their women have existed, particularly in East Asia, where developing countries turned to light industry as a source of much-needed foreign capital. Korea pursued this strategy in the 60s and 70s, and China more recently in the 80s and 90s. However, these countries did not develop through services provided by females, but rather by putting women to work in materially productive occupations.

There is only one country in the world where services provided by females form a pillar of the national economy, and that country is Thailand. Through prostitution, Thai women bring in over 10% of Thailand's GDP, which would make them some of the most economically productive women on the planet, but somehow that does not seem as though it would be a viable strategy here.

So what we have here is a movement and policies that were paid for first by economically productive men in the US, and then as the productive, male economic base shrunk, by what amounts to foreign subsidies, and finally by loans from Chinese industrialists. For all the triumphalism, proclamations of eternal victory and articles rubbing men's collective face in women's piles of cash, feminism has been an economic failure. It is an enormous money pit that sucks wealth and productivity into oblivion. It is a hothouse flower maintained in an artificial environment.

Given continuous, strong economic growth, it is plausible that the current state of affairs could continue indefinitely, but not probable. In fact, more likely than not feminism would eventually consume itself even in an economically healthy environment, because it is counterproductive by its nature, and even if we did not face bottlenecks now and in the foreseeable future, it would sow the seeds of its own destruction by reversing the traditional flow of wealth into the creation of and out from the fruits of productive endeavors, i.e. the men who finance them as well as those who profit from them would be forced to turn their wealth over to women. At its core, feminism is about nothing more than resource distribution from men to women, and after a certain point such redistribution causes a breakdown of the mechanisms that keep an economy functional.

However, we do face some bottlenecks, chief among them the energy issue, so whether or not feminism could survive during sustained growth is moot. Humanity will not run out of gas all of the sudden, but the cost involved in procuring the energy that allows us to maintain such a complex economy will certainly rise, and the return on our investment will fall. We're running out of easy oil, environmental pressure is limiting the fruits of the Green Revolution, and political resistance is cutting into the profits of global trade.

We are not looking at another period of sustained prosperity such as the one that began after Word War II and ended some time in the last decade. Instead, we are facing a struggle that will require some tough decisions if we want to maintain anything like our current lifestyle. We will need scores of new nuclear power plants, advances in agricultural technology, new modes of transportation and an overhaul of our infrastructure, to name a few things. Although we have the native talent to achieve these things, it's entirely possible that we will fail.

This is relevant to feminism because it suggests two scenarios for the end of feminism: the first, and more favorable one being a conscious political choice to let it die so as to focus effort and energy on tackling the more pressing issues of sustaining economic and technological progress despite the challenges we are facing. The second and less comfortable scenario would be a failure of political will and the eventual end of feminism due to economic contraction and the concomitant lack of means to enforce and support it. Given contemporary politics, the latter appears more likely, however, this outcome may not be as bad as it sounds — it could happen sooner than we expect.

Speculation aside, the reality is that feminism has already begun to decline. That so many media outlets and women are declaring its victory means nothing; the fact is that they have far less of value to offer women than they did ten years ago, and they will have even less in another ten years. Every man who is ruined so that his hormonally deranged wife can realize her soap opera fantasies, every business dismantled by a sexual harassment lawsuit, every man tossed in prison at public expense, and every productive job replaced by a woman pushing paper at a government-funded nonprofit is a material loss for women in aggregate. Because we no longer have significant excess wealth, women are going to have to pay for each feminist victory with a decline in their wealth and standard of living. It may not be entirely obvious yet, but it will be soon enough, and at that point we will see a rise in anti-feminism amongst women themselves.

At this point, feminists can demand all they want that the world and reality follow their command and conform to their wishes. They can proclaim eternal victory and shout their power and omnipotence into the wind. For our part, we men can take a step back and watch, knowing that no matter how much they wish it and order it to happen, the tide won't stop, and just like old king Canute they'll end up with nothing more than wet feet.

You might not know it, but you are. The red pill felt a bit jagged on the way down, the rabbit hole deeper than you thought, but at some point you decided to de-program yourself from 50 years of feminist propaganda. You were inquisitive enough to stop and reflect on the state of things; how the messaging seemed so contrary to everything you experienced in real life, but you courageously dove in head first. While many men acknowledge there's a problem, ("Yeah women, what can you do?") they'd prefer not to know the gory details. It can be a dark place and team sports distract and numb the brain. The "white knight/mangina" is fully indocrinated and has no hope. He is ostensibly, a woman. But you wanted to know, because men want to know things. They want to know "why".

No one will disagree that there are two distinct groups of people on earth, the male and the female. Sexual identity is the very first thing we note when seeing or meeting someone. It's what dogs do when they smell each other. You need to know what to say and how to react; your agenda from that point on is formulated around the context of what sex that person is. But it wasn't always like that. When we were small children girls seemed like squealing, weak versions of us and we were rough and dirty versions of them. It was fairly uncomplicated to negotiate your way through early childhood. We each knew our place and assumed our roles, sometimes even "playing house" with neighborhood girls; the boys pretending to go off to work and the girls staying home and pretending to cook in their Easy Bake ovens while caring for their infant doll. I vaguely remember that time.

But not long after that something began to change. As a social caste system began to develop in middle school, many girls began to recognize they had a certain mysterious power over certain boys. They received special attention all of the sudden. The lines were being drawn by those imbued with looks, athleticism and/or keen social skills. Girls weren't just friends anymore, they were "romantic opportunities" and they clearly selected the worthy bucks from the herd, while chastising and humiliating the more lowly specimens. The Bold and Beautiful were to go forth and multiply. The less fortunate learned how emotionally brutal unrequited love can be at an early age. I remember that time better.

So curiosity eventually got the best of us. Who are these endlessly fascinating creatures that tease and taunt us with their wares? Why do we feel so hopelessly drawn to them? Why are they so difficult to understand? How is it they came to wield this strange power over us so adeptly? And why is our power so limited over them? You're blessed with an inquiring mind. You always knew something about modern gender dynamics didn't quite add up. You wanted answers and you didn't care how ugly the truth was, as long as you understood it. Breaking yourself from the cult of mainstream consciousness is never easy. You knew the red pill would be a hard one to swallow, but you had to know.

So along the way of this daring journey you start to discover that indeed, you were snookered. Your reality had very little in common with what you were led to believe all those years. Those "endlessly fascinating creatures" had an agenda alright and you were merely a financial means to that end, security; while all they had to be was physically appealing. OUCH! The Vagina Goggles took your heart with them as you ripped them off your conscious. But you already kind of knew all along. You just didn't want it to be true.

Still, you eventually come out the other side a better man for it. Enlightenment is its own journey. You know things about the fairer sex that most men dare not even ponder. That's not to say women are inherently evil or cruel beings. They've evolved to what they've become for a reason; the ongoing advancement and propagation of our species. Yes, that leaves the middle class man in the lurch. Single people are the new middle class. (How long can that last?) If the middle class woman can't ascend in status through marriage from right where she already is, doing it on her own will suffice. And then of course the side benefit of knowing being a husband, a slave to she and the kids, maybe wasn't such a good deal for your dad or grandfather either. What were they thinking?

You are blessed; more blessed than you know because you “get it”. You see the big picture. You know that women can’t define or “complete” you. Only you can define you. Masculinity is a process of which a woman can play no role, (even though they try). There’s no use in being frustrated and confused anymore by a world you once never quiet had a handle on. You have the knowledge and tools to proceed with your life with the confidence knowledge brings. And hopefully enlighten a few others who are like you once were along the way.

Boys: The Second-Class Citizens

pierceharlan · 24 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I came across a newspaper piece written by Robert Topp, one-time dean of the college of education at Northern Illinois University, DeKalb, who said schools discriminate against boys from kindergarten through high school because they penalize them for nothing more than their “masculine tendencies.” This discrimination results in more girls than boys being eligible for college and boys being given lower grades than they deserve. The trouble with boys, Dr. Topp said, is that they are boys. They don’t readily conform; they are restless; they squirm more; they are more aggressive and daring; and they don’t easily catch onto the “social niceties.”

The classroom setting, on the other hand, places a premium on traits that girls, not boys, exhibit, namely docility and conformity. Dr. Topp wondered if the traits that hurt boys in the classroom actually fortify them for life later, and he said that to prevent boys from being feminized, schools need to place less premium on “girl” traits, and start rewarding students more for creativity and extra-verbal skills.

This analysis, of course, is dead-on, but don’t bother looking for it among the current news stories. You see, Dr. Topp’s article appeared in newspapers in December 1961.
http://news.google.com/newspapers?id=nlspAAAAIBAJ&sjid=_ecDAAAAIBAJ&pg=6627,799943&dq=robert-topp+and+schools+are+unfair+to+boys&hl=en

The fact that the “boy problem” not only is still with us but is even more pronounced today, almost fifty years later, tells us that, by most important standards, our sons have been second-class citizens at school for as long as anyone can remember, and until very recently, hardly anyone has ever given a damn.

Can anyone name even one significant initiative to increase the presence of male role models in our schools? But then again, it is politically correct to blink at the importance of male role models in the home, why should school be any different? Ironic, isn’t it? We remove male role models from our sons’ lives, then when our sons act up, we blame it on “patriarchy.”

Boys’ second-class status has always been just the way it is. Take corporal punishment, for example. As recently as the 1970s, it was a very common practice. Care to guess whether it was applied equally to boys and girls? In fact, many school districts expressly forbade spanking girls; boys were almost always fair game. In 1973, for example, California school boys were spanked 37,594 times. California school girls were spanked just 2,146 times.
http://news.google.com/newspapers?id=u-EzAAAAIBAJ&sjid=iTIHAAAAIBAJ&pg=6844,3383167&dq=37594+boys+spanked&hl=en

In what universe are boys 18 times more deserving of corporal punishment than their females peers? Reverse the genders and imagine the outcry that would have accompanied those statistics.

Sometimes, the rationales for disparate treatment were the legal equivalent of horse manure. “Take Your Daughter to Work Day” excluded boys long after it was obvious to fair-minded people that such discrimination had no place in a society where gender equality is the law of the land.

That didn’t stop the Ms. Foundation for Women from continuing to defend the indefensible. In 1994, its spokeswoman, Nell Merlino, trotted out this tired feminist mantra: “People don’t appreciate that girls need a special level of encouragement,” she clucked. “We know from the research when boys and girls are together, particularly in this [9-15] age group, boys get more attention.”

Right, Ms. Merlino. For one thing, the teachers who administered corporal punishment gave the boys 18 times more attention than girls.

Boys were told to suck it up and take it like little men. Take gym class, a traumatic experience for some youngsters. Boys almost always showered in a communal setting where there was no privacy (because, of course, no boy cares at all about modesty), presumably to prepare them for military life, something their female peers didn’t have to worry about. Too bad for those traumatized boys lagging in the puberty department. The girls, of course, were typically afforded shower compartments to protect their modesty.

Worse, some younger readers might find it bizarre that it was common for boys, but very rarely girls, to be forced to swim in the nude in gym class. Back in the ’40s, one Detroit school district came under fire fire from mothers when both boys and girls were forced to swim nude, albeit in separate gym classes. Can you guess which gender the mothers complained about? The girls, of course. One wrote: “We are all alarmed about this freedom the girls have been given. There is no telling what it could lead to and we want it stopped at once.”

As for the boys swimming nude? If adults had asked the boys in confidence, they would have learned that a fair number of them were traumatized by it. You know, the whole delayed puberty thing, unwanted bodily reactions, etc. But, again, the feeling was, “real boys” suck it up and swim in the nude. When a parent wrote to Dear Abby back in the ‘60s complaining because her 14-year-old son was told he would have to swim in the nude and the boy felt uncomfortable, Abby showed little of the warmth and sensitivity many associate with her today: “[H]e had better overcome his shyness about nudity in the presence of other boys,” she lectured, “or he is apt to be uncomfortable much of his life.” (Right. Because the first thing adult men do when they get together is show each other their penises. Thank goodness they forced us to swim naked when we were 14.)

As for school sports, well, entire books are written about that. When the federal government decided that girls had been historically deprived of their rightful opportunities to participate in sports, girls were permitted to try out for boys teams, even though this took spots away from the boys. Boys, however, typically were not permitted to try out for girls teams. The law in this area is complex, and while it is possible today, in some circumstances, for boys to play on girls’ teams, legally – not to mention culturally (a topic deserving its own post) – it is more difficult for a boy to play on a girls’ team than vice versa. This is so because, in sports, as elsewhere, the law doesn’t care as much about the harm to an individual boy as it cares about the rights of girls as a class. “It is the class of girls, not boys, with whom the government seeks to redress past discrimination and promote equality. It is girls, not boys, who have suffered and continue to suffer from discrimination and inequalities in athletics. . . . [C]ourts . . . have found that protecting the participation rights of girls as a previously discriminated against ‘class’ outweigh the rights of an ‘individual’ boy to play on a girls’ team.” See http://www.womenssportsfoundation.org/Content/Articles/Issues/Title-IX/C/Coed-Participation–Girls-Playing-on-Boys-Teams-and-Male-Versus-Female-Competition-The-Foundation-Po.aspx

So, at least in one area – sports – our sons’ second-class treatment is given an official justification, dubious though it may be. That’s more than boys’ second-class treatment is usually given. Most of the time, it is chalked up as ”just the way it is.”

Merry Christmas!

Need Proof of Women's Legal Supremacy?

W.F. Price · 26 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Leon Walker, a Rochester Hills, Michigan man who took a peek at his wife's Gmail account, is facing trial on felony charges. Mr. Walker faces five years in prison.

His crime? He caught his wife cheating by using her password to look at her Gmail account.

In recent years, judges and prosecutors across the United States have repeatedly upheld the right of women to have sex with men besides their husbands as more sacrosanct than even the right to free speech, probably because adultery is endemic to the legal class in the United States. In fact, men are frequently ordered to pay their "wives" for the activity. Where it used to be a crime for a spouse to commit adultery, it is now a protected activity that prompts court-ordered remuneration, and husbands who discover their wives' affairs face hard time in prison. However, if a wife spied on her husband's email no prosecutor in the United States would ever dream of bringing the woman up on charges.

Although prosecuting people for adultery has always been a questionable use of the courts' time, that courts are involved in enforcing the right to adultery will eventually convince men across the Anglosphere that the legal concept of marriage is broken beyond repair. As judges and prosecutors, aided by their feminist bedmates, make a mockery of their respective professions, they at least give us some idea of what limits to place on their power in the future.

One can only hope that Mr. Walker does not end up with a majority female jury, as American women tend to regard exposure of their sexual peccadillos as a capital crime.

The Other Side of Christmas

W.F. Price · 26 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to think everyone enjoyed Christmas, and I hope most of our readers had a great time with friends and family, but I know that there's often sorrow mixed in with the celebration. A lot of people are ambivalent about this time of year, and for good reason. For those of us from broken families, separated from our children, or who carry the burdens of a dysfunctional childhood or some other personal tragedy, it can bring pain as well as joy.

I'd like to extend my sympathy to those who suffer from these problems, but more importantly I'd like to offer a little hope as well by relating a bit about my own circumstances and experience regarding Christmas, that culmination of all joys and anxieties of the year.

Since childhood, Christmas has always been always a mixed blessing for me. As a child of divorce myself, I shuttled back and forth between families and received plenty of affection and gifts, but there was an element of sadness. It was one of the few times a year I'd see my father, and his own problems were all too obvious despite the holiday cheer. He was unhappy during my childhood, and I couldn't help but know it, even as a little boy. Although the depression that afflicted him as a younger man eventually gave way to resignation as he sank ever further into the bottle, the facts of his life and his pain always troubled me, particularly around this time of year.

As I grew up I encountered plenty of problems myself, and the troubles of my adolescence and youth seemed to be magnified and on display whenever we'd have the holiday get togethers. In retrospect, they weren't all that bad, but when young these things tend to take on a greater significance than merited. The difficulty I had with school, my periods of rebellion and all the rest of the little failures of life made me feel like a pariah amongst the successful members of the family. Of course I was happy to see them, but even so it felt as though I was seated before a glaring light.

There was always this feeling of inadequacy and shame; an inevitable result of growing up without a solid, respectable father. Although I have an excellent stepfather who is a good man and raised me as his own, we can't remove our fathers from our identity, nor should we try — dishonesty rarely solves a problem.

As I matured and settled into what I thought would be an ordinary life, Christmases got a little better, but there was always some undercurrent of unease. I never really enjoyed the time with the ex's parents, as they were quite different from me, and I felt a vague criticism from their direction. There was also this foreboding sense that something wasn't quite right with my life — that I was aimlessly going through the motions and my heart wasn't in it.

Finally, three years ago, it all culminated in the worst Christmas of my entire life. Due to an "unhappy" wife my marriage was careening off the rails, and although I didn't openly admit it – even to myself – I knew it wasn't headed anywhere good. I had had a very difficult time with my boss over the preceding months, I could sense that my in-laws were already making some contingency plans to put the knife in my back, and I even felt that my own family had abandoned me. To cap it all off I had recently suffered from an excruciatingly painful inflamed ankle that crippled me for weeks. In short, it looked as though the world was preparing to give me the beatdown of my life. It was: the boom dropped six weeks later. My ex pressed her advantage and left me while I was still recovering from that awful season, hitting me with every weapon at her disposal, leaving me broke, disoriented and reeling from shock at how ruthless she was.

The next year was filled with the typical horrors of divorce, and although mine was worse than average, it probably doesn't qualify as exceptionally bad, which from my perspective simply confirms how absolutely punitive the process is toward men. I can't really remember Christmas that next year; I was in such a state of anxiety and dread over the constant accusations and investigations that followed them that I was entirely consumed by the divorce process. I had also been ordered to take care of my children while their mother worked (she won the temporary custody hearing, as usual) — and to pay her child support. So I was unable to earn enough to support myself and in the process of annihilating my credit to pay the attorney as well.

Although I eventually emerged from that terrible battle without going under, it took its toll. If I were a warship I'd be listing 15 degrees to port, shot full of holes and my deck would be scorched — a sorry sight indeed. But something strange and wondrous has happened. That sense of shame, those feelings of inadequacy and the fretting over where I stood with my family have all evaporated.

This Christmas I showed up at the family gathering without a trace of apprehension, and enjoyed myself with everyone from my grandpa down to my cousin's new baby. I didn't feel the least bit of discomfort around my successful uncles and their excellent, faithful wives. I looked at my happy, healthy and good-looking cousins and felt warm and pleased simply to be with them.

There I was: divorced, single, far from wealthy, recently smeared by my own former wife as a violent criminal and menace to good people everywhere… And yet I was at peace with myself and my family. My nearly 90-year-old grandfather must have seen it, because he was virtually beaming at me.

So, I'd like to let all the people who are going through tough times know that there is always hope, and if something troubling you in your life cast a shadow over the holidays, your spirit can be restored. Sometimes hard times are just a steep trail to a better place, and even if you suffered and lost a great deal on the way there, you end up feeling even better than you did when things were "normal."

For those of us who had a rough holiday – and I know all too well that it happens – perhaps my experience can be of some consolation and offer hope for better times.

Assange: “I fell into a hornet’s nest of revolutionary feminism”

W.F. Price · 27 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Julian Assange, in the legal fight of his life after having been accused of rape by two Swedish women who discovered he was sleeping with both of them concurrently, has called Sweden “the Saudi Arabia of feminism.”

Although mere weeks ago Mr. Assange might not have publicly denounced feminism, the overwhelming support feminists have given to accusers Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilen has likely served to convince him that at least that faction of the left is not going to be of any assistance in his fight against sex crime charges.

Recent reports in newspapers have painted a picture of Assange as an unabashed womanizer with no compunctions about sleeping with other men’s girlfriends and in the habit of taking a different woman to bed every night. If true, these reports may not speak well to Mr. Assange’s morals, but such behavior is far from criminal. Furthermore, the fact that all these women were complicit in his sexual exploits appears to have escaped notice. It is this absolute disregard for female accountability that has allowed Mr. Assange to be charged with rape in the first place.

Back in the bad old days before the triumph of feminism, rape was understood as a sexual act in which the woman was not in any way complicit, i.e. she resisted throughout the process. Although it is not often brought to attention these days, it is nearly impossible to have sex with someone who physically resists the act, which is why real rapists use weapons, credible threats of grievous harm or overwhelming brutality to procure submission. Prior to feminism, women were actually held accountable for their behavior, so a woman who invited a man into her bed had no leg to stand on in a court of law if she cried rape. One might think that the endless talk of how empowered women are would lead to some recognition that women are, in fact, responsible for the choices they make. However, feminism has “empowered” women not by giving them more responsibility over their behavior, but rather by stripping all accountability for any actions they may take in the sexual realm.

The strange logic of contemporary sex law has it that a man only is responsible for every step of the process. If the woman opens her door to let a man inside her home, it is the man’s fault for stepping inside. If she takes off her clothes, the man is the responsible party — he is looking at her, after all. If she then invites him into her bed, it is only the man who is accountable when he goes along with the plan. Finally, when she is lying down next to him in the nude and embraces him, if the man dares to have sex with her, he can only be blamed. It goes ever farther into minutiae, including such things as use of contraceptive devices, sexual position (e.g. “he was lying on top of me during sex”), and whether or not the man had used deodorant. This is the well-known but rarely spoken feminist legal concept of “mentula rea,” or the “guilty penis doctrine,” which holds that the possessor of the penis is the sole actor in any sexual encounter, and therefore solely subject to punishment.

Under mentula rea, any sexual act a man undertakes is a crime that can be prosecuted on one simple condition: any other party to the act or witness brings it to the attention of authorities. It even extends to autoerotic acts; if a man is seen masturbating – even alone in his own home through a window – he may be arrested for a sex crime. In fact, it goes even farther than Orwell’s nightmare scenario of the elimination of the orgasm — a mere erection is against the law. As for “consensual” sex, there can be no such thing under mentula rea, because the party without the penis is not responsible in any way for the sex act. A man can argue consent all he wants, but there are infinite possibilities for a microsecond of non-consent, and also retroactive non-consent. Even ordinary sex implies non-consent, as one of the accusers in the Assange case said that he “used his body weight to hold [her] down,” i.e. the sex was in the standard missionary position. A man who enters a woman before she was sufficiently lubricated, who ejaculates in the normal manner inside the vagina, or perhaps even one who farts during intercourse against her express wishes can be held to have violated consent. Not long ago in Israel a man was held to have violated consent by using a fake name before sex with a woman — she retroactively withdrew consent after the deception was uncovered and he is now in prison.

Of course, to get to the real catch, because the party without the penis cannot be held responsible for the sex act at any one step of the way, consent is moot. How can one obtain consent from a non-actor? It is a logical impossibility under feminist sex law. If a woman who took off her clothes and invited a man into her bed did not consent to sex, the entire concept of consent is meaningless. Therefore, the only possible defense a man can have when accused of rape under a feminist legal regime is that he did not in fact have sex with the woman. The sex itself is considered a criminal act by virtue of infinite non-consent, and the fact that an accusation was made is an indication that sex (a crime) may have occurred. If, upon questioning, the man admits that sex took place, he is assumed to have confessed, and he is already a criminal.

This is what Assange faces in Sweden.

Now, I'm not a big fan of Assange, and I think there is probably some merit to criticism of the man. At almost 40 he is acting like a 19-year-old boy turned loose in a whorehouse, which is not only unseemly, but monumentally stupid for a man in his position — the word "hubris" does come to mind. As a fellow publisher, however, I do not want to see him prosecuted for releasing information that someone sent his way — that would undermine the concept of free speech. As a fellow man, I think the prosecution for sex with women who enthusiastically consented under the sane, non-feminist definition of the word is an outrage.

But if there is anything this great leaker of documents has exposed to the world, it is the insanity of feminist law. Today, more people know the facts of the rape case against Assange than the contents of the diplomatic cables he leaked. Ironically, it seems Assange himself had no idea this could happen to him. Perhaps, if he had taken the time to peruse The Spearhead, it wouldn't have, but his current public struggle has at least opened the eyes of millions to just how far feminism has gone, and in that Assange has done us a big favor.

Dr. Reich: From Sexualpolitik to Energy of the Orgasm

Featured Guest · 27 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Max Stirner

It was by chance that I stumbled upon the fascinating and controversial work of Dr. Wilhelm Reich — medical doctor, political activist, communist, student of Sigmund Freud, scientist and either a forgotten genius or a madman, as some people claim.

Dr. Reich is a dazzling personality who at first glance seems go along with the usual destructive ideas one would expect from a Marxist. But a closer look reveals that Reich never stuck to an ideology when it stood in his way of thinking. So it is not astonishing that he was consequently expelled from the International Psychoanalytical Association and later met with hostility from communist fellow travelers. By turning four major subjects, namely psychiatry, biology, physics and medicine upside down with his wild orgone physics he has certainly not made many friends among scientists either.

Sex and evolution – and for the PUAs – some empirical psychology of attraction seems to be a focus of the manosphere. Therefore, I would like to encourage anyone who is interested in these subjects to delve deeper in the history of psychology. Further, for the PUAs psychology is used as a tool to make ends meet. The goal is to get laid. The medium is the study of human behavior and the imitation of the traits of so called alpha males. The reason for female and male behavior is found in evolution theory. What is missing is a theory of the inner powers – the emotions – the libido, and the subconscious leading to our behavior. By sticking to a PUA worldview one regards humans as Pavlov regarded his dog. Even if it is sometimes hard to believe, human beings are not machines. They have emotions and the world of emotions is worthy of study.

The history of psychotherapy is too vast to discuss in a short article – and the author lacks the competence to do so. Dr. Reich sticks out because he has focussed his research mostly on sexuality and because his life gives a good insight into the beginnings of the so called “sexual revolution”.

Wilhelm Reich was born 1897 in a small town in the eastern part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. His parents died when he was a teenager. At the age of eighteen Wilhelm joined the Austrian army to fight in the first world war. He never returned home. After four years when the war was finally over, the Reich’s farm was on Russian territory. Wilhelm joined his brother in Vienna to study medicine. The brutality of the war had opened his eyes on the sick society he lived in. “The antisocial behavior of mankind is not a crime, but should be regarded as a disease. It should not be punished but instead be cured and prevented.” Reich developed his first ideas about the causes of this emotional disease: it must be a dysfunctional sexuality.”The soldiers in strong heterosexual relationships or with equal sublimations rejected the war, on the other hand the most brutal men considered women as latrines or were latently or overtly homosexual. Even the sadist psychopath or the antisocial personality succeeded in terms of the war ideology.”

In 1919 Reich organized a workshop on sexuality with some fellow students. The few students attending the course where considered as a little bit strange. When Reich arranged a meeting room for the workshop he had to calm down a professor who was afraid that they might wanted to do “practical sex research”. At first the course was a disappointment. The lectures of a senior psychoanalyst seemed dull and far off from reality. “I had experienced sex in a different way than it was taught”. That changed when he met Sigmund Freud to ask for literature on sexuality. “Freud talked to me like a normal person .. I was nervous when I came and I was in a good mood and happy when I left.”

Reich became an eager student of Freud’s work and joined the “Wiener Psychoanalytische Vereinigung” (Viennese Psychoanalytical Association) in 1920. It was an honor for a young student of 23 years to be accepted into this close circle of senior academics. At about the same time Reich started working in a clinic providing psychotherapy for poor people, giving him a deep insight in the emotional problems of society.

There was something that troubled Reich in the psychoanalytic theory: When is a patient cured? Reich had a talent for opening old wounds and asking unpleasant questions. In 1926 for Freud's 70th birthday Reich gave him the manuscript of his book "The Function of the Orgasm". Freud's reaction when reading the title was frosty. He gave the manuscript a skeptical look and finally said: "So big?". Reich was hurt. Usually Freud read every manuscript within few days but this time it took more than two months for him to reply. In his book "The Function of the Orgasm" Reich defines the goal of psychotherapy as the patient's ability to experience a satisfactory orgasm. The heterosexual genital intercourse was seen as the ideal, because any other form of sexual activity like masochism, fetishism or homosexuality could not provide a relieve to the libido.

From these years onward Freud distanced himself more and more from Reich. The reason for Freud's separation from Reich may be found in the different attitudes both had towards cultural values. As a conservative Freud was afraid of the consequences psychotherapy might have on society. His standpoint was to "liberate sexuality by therapy to make suppression possible". Freud had once remarked that "The habitual constant suppression of our natural drives refines our character" and he also wrote that "it is our best hope for the future that the intellect … will by time become the dictator of the soul". Reich on the other hand came to the conclusion that the intellect more or less followed the flow of emotions and was not important for a healthy personality.

Further, coming from a younger generation disillusioned by the first world war – he didn't have a high esteem of western culture. As a convinced Marxist, and member of the Communist Party he wanted to destroy the bourgeois society, which he held responsible for the "emotional plague".

He moved to Berlin in 1930, where he intensified his political activity for the German Communist Party KPD. Reich founded the "Deutsche Reichsverband für Proletarische Sexualpolitik" (Union for proletarian sex-politics of the German Reich) among other things promoting a liberation of marriage laws and abortion, and the prohibition of prostitution. In his book "The Sexual Revolution" Reich writes about his political goals: Coercive family and marriage being the origin of sexual oppression had to be abolished. The authority of parents over the education of their children had to be transferred to the state. Reich's succesful propaganda for Sex-Pol was met by resistance from conservative KPD members (who probably had not done their homework on the goals of Marxism). Voices were raised that Reich "will turn our assembly halls into brothels," and he "spits on the proletarian girls". One year after its foundation the KPD leadership shut down the successful Sex-Pol and prohibited the distribution of Reich's writings.

The quick rise of the Nazis to power from 1930 to 1933 came as a shock to the German political left. Reich fled Germany in 1933 where many political enemies of the Nazi Party where imprisoned or killed and he finally emigrated to Denmark. As a psychological explanation for the success of fascist ideology Reich wrote the book "The Mass Psychology of Fascism". He became alarmed about similar authoritarian tendencies in communism. The once "progressive" and "liberal" Soviet Union was turning more authoritarian day by day. In 1934 the prohibition of homosexual intercourse was reintroduced in the USSR. Abortion was made more and more difficult. Bourgeois values like the "coercive family" were held high again. In the same year Reich was expelled from the International Psychoanalytical Association for ambiguous reasons.

After his disillusionment with politics and the USSR turning into a dictatorship under Stalin, Reich dedicated his time to the further improvement of his character therapy.

Classical psychotherapy had stayed a talking cure, whereas Reich soon used nonverbal techniques and tried an integrated mind body concept. He focussed more and more on a theory of libido energy, finally coming to the conclusion that the orgasm must be a real electrical discharge, being just a special case of a general vegetative current. A blockage in sexual energy flow not only resulted in the formation of layers of "armor" of the psyche and neuroses but at the same time in a blockage of certain muscle groups of the body. In 1935, with the help of a colleague, he was given the opportunity to carry out experimental studies at the University of Oslo in Norway. He measured the electrical charge of the skin and erogenous zones during or in the absence arousal, coming to the conclusion that "the (…)

intensity of the feeling of lust matches the physiological quantity of the bioelectrical potential." Another field of study was the pulsation of microbes and primitive life forms.

During the rest of his turbulent life Reich will come to the conclusion that the "orgasmic energy" is a cosmic force which organizes life. He calls it "orgone energy". For this wild concept he was despised and ridiculed by the scientific community. A smear campaign in the press prompted him to emigrate to the United States in 1939, where he first opened a laboratory in New York City and later established a private institute with the name of "Orgonon" in Maine.

Reich had a number of enemies in the US as well. As a former Communist he was viewed with suspicious by the authorities. American fellow travelers of the Soviet Union scorned him for his criticism of Communism. His studies of sexual energy made him an easy target for derision from the media.

The FDA started to investigate Reich, who was treating patients with his orgone accumulators and was experimenting with weather manipulation. Eventually in 1954 the FDA found a way to order Reich to court for formalities concerning his orgone devices. Reich – stubborn as always – refused to appear. For this disobedience he was found guilty of criminal contempt of court and was sentenced to two years in jail. Further, the court ordered that all orgone-devices and literature about orgone to be destroyed under the supervision of FDA agents. In March 1957 Wilhelm Reich lost his court appeals and was finally ordered to jail. In Lewisburg prison, Wilhelm Reich, who once held the opinion that religious feelings are a result of suppressed sexual energy, became religious. He was sending out prayers to his son Peter. Wilhelm Reich died in prison in November 1957.

The life of Wilhelm Reich is controversial and tragic and could indeed make a a great script for a hollywood movie. Putting orgone energy aside, I have to say that some of his political ideas don't make any sense at all, expecially when it comes down to economics. Instead of reading Marx, Reich would have done himself a favor by studying Hayek's "Road to Serfdom".

It is strange that Reich, as a supporter of a natural flow of libido and energy, favored a planned economy. How can people act spontaneously in a planned society? Why should a Communist state be less coercive than a bourgeois family? By simply ignoring the fact that economic behavior is necessary for survival, he disregards what men and families have been doing with most of their time: managing scarce resources. In a Communist and matriarchal society there can of course be no scarcity and therefore economic laws do not seem to apply.

If a whole society is sick, why should women be sane? Reich more or less ignored the female part in the "sexually starved" society. By blaming the patriarchy for the emotional sickness of our society and seeing matriarchy as the ideal harmonic society we should all live in, he promotes misandry.

In "The Function of the Orgasm" Reich wrote:

"The character structure of the contemporary man, replicating a 6000 year old patriarchal authoritarian culture is characterised by armor of the psyche against its internal nature and against external social misery."

In "The Sexual Revolution" he said:

"Under patriarchy sexual needs had to serve (…) the economic interests of a minority. Under the ancient Communist matriarchy the economy had to satisfy the needs (including sexual needs) of the whole society."

In the book "Listen, Little Man" written in his late years, Reich blamed humanity for it's "emotional plague" and obviously addressed mostly males. What role do women play in this emotional disease?

The myth of a matriarchal paradise having existed in ancient times before the evil patriarchy took over, seems to be a common dream of Marxists. We can see more clearly now that after the so called sexual liberation in the 70′s the left has finally swallowed the last bitter pill of Karl Marx. As a revenge for 6000 years of cruel patriarchy the male sex drive is now deeply mistrusted and a puritanic anti-male movement is on the way.

What has happened in the mean time? Reich is almost forgotten by now. His early writings became popular during the ’68 student movement in Germany. His orgone science is ignored or ridiculed.

Reichs former research institute “Orgonon” in Maine is now a museum, and open to the public.

Inspired by a book of Wilhelm Reich’s son Peter – the British singer Kate Bush wrote the song “Cloudbusting” that became popular in the 80′s. The video is a classic:

Mother's Crazy, but She Runs the Family

J. Durden · 28 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Mother's crazy but she runs the family." This is the first line from Toy Matinee's song, There Was A Little Boy, which discusses everything wrong with growing up in a single mother family. My parents divorced around the time I was 12, and it was then that I became intimately familiar with my mother's unique brand of tough love (some might say, psychosis). As I was growing into a young adult, I remember being shamed and ridiculed into silence everytime I made a bad remark about my mother. Perhaps this was a symptom of the area I grew up in – lovely old Bellingham, Washington, one of the most liberal (and feminist!) towns I'm aware of – but mother worship is just another fact of growing up in the West. Even bad men love their mamas – so why didn't I? After all, she went through the pain of birthing me and so on and so forth. I quickly learned to just keep my mouth shut about my awful mother. In private, I've known several men who have admitted to having an antagonistic relationship with their mothers, but it's something you rarely see proclaimed loudly.

You may have noticed that I'm something of the "music man" around The Spearhead – several of my posts are analyses of songs. I've found that music captures and expresses emotional sentiment far better than I could ever manage to. Thus, songs serve as a sort of crutch for me when I'm discussing emotions, that most unmanly of conversational topics. Toy Matinee only ever released one album, in 1990, and the frontman/singer for it was Kevin Gilbert. Kevin Gilbert was involved in producing some of Madonna's tripe, if memory serves, but much more importantly he released a few albums of his own. He passed away in 1996, but you could say he went out with a bang – having died of autoerotic asphyxiation. I suggest you check out There Was A Little Boy for yourself before you read the rest of this piece, but if you don't, I'll be copying the relevant lyrics as we go along. For example, here's the first verse:

> Mother's crazy, but she runs the family
> Two older sisters, and the boy who's nine years old
> He's old enough to see the way it's going
> Somewhere the birds are singing
> But Mother's all alone

This isn't a perfect mirror of the way I grew up, but it's fairly close. I had an older brother and a younger sister in place of "two older sisters," and as I mentioned, my parents were still together when I was 9. Nevertheless, even when my parents were together, my mom definitely "ran the family." My father was in charge of finances, but that was about it. If ever we needed a parent's permission, we knew to get our mother's, because our father had no authority in our home. The third line is interesting because I think – perhaps due to my own personal experience – that people begin to form their first very clear memories around the time they are 8 or 9. (Sure, some people claim to remember even their infant years, but that's considered exceptional.) I take the "birds are singing" line as a metaphor for the mother being crazy, and "but Mother's all alone" seems to imply that even though the mother might be physically present, she is emotionally distant. (Obviously the line implies she's single, too, but I like to take my analyses deeper than that.) Second verse:

> He needs a father, but she takes a lover
> This man is not a friend, shows no friendship
> This man just waits around to play with Sister
> But he plays too serious, he plays too rough

Again, this isn't a perfect mirror to my circumstances, but it's fairly close. Much has been written about how children need fathers, so I won't go too much into that subject. The first two lines of this song are a succinct reference to the preference for alpha male jerks controversially observed in, for example, the Roissysphere. The man my mother tried to settle down with after a few years wasn't much of a father either – and had already been divorced, with kids of his own – but thankfully he wasn't a sexual predator like the step-father in this song. I'm certain I've read an article recently about how step-fathers are more likely to be sexual abusers, but for the life of me I can't find it. Anyway, I don't think the assertion needs too much proving around here, though obviously there are exceptions and some step-fathers are great men. The chorus:

> How can you expect a child to understand the sickness of a world whose eyes are blind?
> The dying man inside this boy is questioning his once upon a time
> (There was a little boy)

There's not much intelligent or cogent that I can say about this chorus. It comes up later with some additional lines, but the first two are powerful. It took me 21 or 22 years to "understand the sickness of the world," and I'm still coping with the fact its "eyes are blind." The dying man inside me started questioning my once upon a time right around the time I hit puberty. I am not an isolated case. Next verse:

> He leaves home early for a loveless world
> And he finds what he needs with an older boy
> He's got a couple things to hide from Mother
> He hopes she'll understand, she hopes he'll change

I've read some articles that talk about how a child learns intimacy and how to love from their parents, and that if a child fails to learn this from his (or her) parents, then he (or she) goes into adulthood with a crippled ability to relate to and trust other people. (I wish I had some links to these articles, but I didn't bookmark them.) Such a world is certainly loveless. I can also relate to finding what I needed with an older boy – although, this implies the boy gets involved with a gang or something similar, which I never quite did. I idolized my older brother for a time, and then befriended many older male friends through the internet. (By older, I mean 4-8 years my senior.) I sometimes felt as though I had things to hide from my mother – though, that was more just childhood tomfoolery than the sort of gang trouble implied in this song. Even still, as the years have worn on, I always hoped my mother would understand me better, and I am sure she hopes that I would change and include her more in my life. The chorus returns at this point, its potency alliteration-enhanced:

> How can you expect a child to understand the sickness of a world whose eyes are blind?
> A world he cannot hope to conquer, insecurities that fester in his mind
> No choice, no fault, and no way out, no blame, no guilt, no friends, no cure, no crime
> The dying man inside this boy is questioning his once upon a time
> (There was a little boy)

As before, there's little of merit I can add to these powerful lines. My mother made me feel disastrously insecure as I was growing up. I remember one particularly bad argument with her. One of my best friends and his family had agreed to take me into their home, because the situation in my own was getting out of hand. I approached her about this and she flipped out, as was her modus operandi. The conversation veered towards (as it usually did) how much of a failure I was, and I remember how she asserted that I could never make it on my own because of how hopelessly pathetic I was. The sad part was that for a few days, I internalized this and believed her. Thankfully, I had some decent (great, really) friends who helped reassure me, and shortly thereafter I resolved to prove her wrong. I effectively ran away at the age of 17 and relocated to Utah to start over.

The "no choice, no fault" line sums up how I felt growing up and what I think a lot of boys are feeling in this age. For example, all of the forces that are arrayed against them are not their fault, there's rarely a way out of it (we men can talk of expatriating, but what is a 12 year old boy with a single mother and abusive step father to do?), it's hard to find blame with any one person or thing (and even if you can, what good is assigning the blame?), and friends can seem hard to find if you're being shamed about your "mommy issues." Final verse:

> This boy was once a strong man, but getting weaker
> He carries more than just the shame inside
> His mother stays away and faces nothing
> She blindly wishes for a happy ending

This verse stands out to me, as well. As the years wore on with my mother, I got wore down. Where once I dreamed big – becoming a famous novelist, becoming President, having a big happy family and so on – I later actually devised ways in which I could fail and disappoint. At the apex of this mindset, I enlisted (for convoluted reasons not worth examining here), which I did in part to spite my family. All the while, my mother could never own up to what she did to us children, waxing sentimental about how we could all get back together some day and be "a real family again." Excuse me while I vomit.

On that note, I hope your holidays went well and that you have a good New Year.

J. Durden aka Dr. Deezee is the chief architect of the Internet Hate Machine and has hated the holidays since at least 2004. Bah humbug.

Ontario Shows Compassion for Stricken Woman, Young Man With Same Disease Out of Luck

W.F. Price · 28 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Lucas Maciesza of Guelph, Ontario has a very rare, acquired (not genetic) blood disorder that is fatal if left untreated, but unfortunately the treatment is extremely expensive — to the tune of $500,000 per year. Soliris, the drug developed to treat paroxysmal nocturnal hemoglobinuria (PNH — the disease afflicting Mr. Maciesza), can nearly cure the disease, but has the dubious distinction of being the most expensive drug on the planet, and must be taken for life. PNH causes thrombosis, which can lead to pulmonary embolism, stroke and a number of other complications that can kill its victims.

Ontario's health ministry has been dragging its feet on the issue of funding the treatment for Mr. Maciesza, who has received five infusions thanks to London Health Science Center, which purchased $75,000 worth of the drug to save his life.

Near death when he was diagnosed in November, Lucas has made a remarkable recovery, but he promises that he would quickly stop taking the drug and wasting taxpayer money if it stopped working. As a young man, he would presumably have a long life ahead of him if the drug continued to successfully treat his PNH, but without it he will likely die.

In a statement to the province he wrote last week, Mr. Maciesza laid out the facts:

> I was released from hospital and I continue to feel great…
> I am now convinced, beyond a doubt, that without continued access to Soliris I will die. The infusions are every two weeks and if for any reason this treatment stops working, I will be the first one to stop it and save the taxpayers the cost — you have my word on it.

This might seem to be another one of those unfortunate tragedies wherein the harsh realities of the marketplace condemn a man to die, but it turns out that Ontario is actually already paying for the drug for another PNH patient — 70-year-old Norma Metz of North Bay. The reasoning behind funding her infusions was that it was the "compassionate" thing to do.

For Lucas Maciesza, however, it seems the government of Ontario is having a difficult time finding the same compassion. It is exactly these kinds of decisions that let us know exactly how much value is placed on lives, and it seems that a young man merits less than an old woman.

Hopefully, Ontario will do the right thing: cutting women's studies programs in the province should easily provide the funds needed to keep a young man alive, and probably an old woman, too. It would be the compassionate thing to do.

Adult Content Piracy: A Men's Issue

J. DeVoy · 29 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

The Salon-esque parody headline aside, copyright infringement lawsuits are an issue that have affected and will continue to affect men in the future. Men will be most overrepresented in the wave of infringement lawsuits regarding pornography, though. It doesn't take any deep statistical analysis to figure this out, either. Thought experiment: Who is more likely to torrent porn, men or women? Considering that this activity 1) uses the internet, 2) in a manner more sophisticated than point-and-click social networking, and 3) deals with visual depictions of sex, it's easy for anyone honest about gender differences to see where such lawsuits will affect men more than women.

This is a men's issue on both sides, for both content producers and consumers. A few exceptional women-owned studios aside, such as Jennaration X and Burning Angel [N.B. - I won't link to any studio for courtesy to content-sensitive readers, and to spare them from the resulting dreaded HR "meetings"], most of the industry largely has been founded and advanced on the backs of men like Larry Flynt, John Stagliano, Jules Jordan and John Leslie Nuzzo, among others. Adult Entertainment, and the men who created billing services to bring it to people's homes – documented in the movie Middle Men – created the entire micro-economy of e-commerce. For those who question the amount of work needed to sell a product to people who want it, bear in mind that most of the successful people in the industry faced criminal charges for obscenity at some point, even recently, and others still do.

Understanding the Business

While the entire industry brings in a couple billion dollars a year, it is by no means as large as many people like to think. Forbes breaks it down here. When you cut up that porn pie, you will see that many of the slices are diet sized. Given the niche nature of the industry, most DVD titles sell around one thousand units. When you rip off a Metallica song, you may contribute to a large aggregate loss for the record company, but your individual theft doesn't really change the record label's bottom line. When you steal a single adult movie, you may have stolen a significant portion of that movie's sales. And that's when you steal from the companies that crank out DVDs, which tend to be the larger producers. Internet-only companies face a bundle of related, larger problems, as their content is already optimized for digital transmission and sharing.

Aside from a handful of market leaders, most internet porn companies are smaller businesses than your local Chipotle franchise, and they are often run by the very people on screen. When you steal Up, it doesn't really take much money from Pixar. When you steal porn, it very likely will have an immediate and measurable negative impact on the actor, director, and publisher. With the current degree of online piracy, most adult studios' profits are down 60%. Though hardly poor, they lack the resources to pursue every instance of infringement solely to make a point. Recast in a different light, a local hardware store could not stay in business if 60% of its inventory being moved out the door was stolen. Adult entertainment businesses are the same size, and rely on the same ethic, and yet there is less stigma attached to theft by torrents and other peer-to-peer sharing.

The adult entertainment industry is a collection of many smaller companies without a monolithic trade group to represent its economic interests in court and before Congress. While the Free Speech Coalition and ASACP are trade organizations representing the industry's principles and a subset of their legal interests, there is no equivalent of the MPAA, RIAA or even a BMI/ASCAP-type entity to bankroll sector-wide anti-piracy endeavors. This eliminates the cost-spreading structure that allowed the RIAA and now MPAA to ruthlessly pursue thousands of litigants for years, and the adult entertainment industry is left with individual studios acting alone to enforce their copyrights against the most egregious pirates. Framed in gender didactics, it's the same advocacy disadvantage men have when confronted by NOW and the League of Women Voters.

In 2000, right when online piracy became a huge issue, Courtney Love gave an eloquent defense of file sharing, essentially backing up the argument that a lot of online copyright thieves employ — that when you steal music online, you're not really stealing from the little guy musician, you're stealing from the fat pig record companies. While not making it less illegal, that rationale has some moral justification when the main profiteers of music and movies are large studios producing thousands of titles and employing even more people. A small business, however, cannot sustain such losses without feeling them immediately.

More than Naughty Pictures

Weighing social and technological advances together, the adult industry's impact on American culture has been second only to NASA. In the 1980s, porn's choice of VHS over Sony's Betamax ended the format war. In the 1990s, pornography was at the spearhead of internet development both in terms of technology and business models, designing affiliate programs and billing services at the same time it pushed for video, audio, and more efficient photo services. If you watch any video online, thank the porn industry. In fact, if you use the world wide web, thank the porn industry. While porn didn't invent the internet, it certainly acted as the amniotic sac for the fetal Web.

This trend has not slowed. The adult film industry swiftly adopted the now-dominant BluRay media format, ensuring its viability and winning the war against HD-DVD. Ironically, this helped Sony's format win, after doing the opposite decades earlier. Porn has also been instrumental in transcending format wars with video on demand (VOD) technology. Vudu, an early VOD service that offered a channel catering to adult entertainment, was recently acquired by Walmart and forced to end its adult offerings.

The net result of adult entertainment's viability as an industry has been an undercurrent towards faster, higher quality and more widely accessible technology. Every other sector has benefited from the accessibility and ubiquity that adult entertainment has sought to achieve, given its patrons' frequent need for discretion. Culturally, people are experimenting more and, as the data above suggest, enjoying themselves more as well. Not to say that people are uncreative on their own, but the adult entertainment industry gives them ideas, whether for technology, business or physical activities, that they may not have thought of on their own, and that entrenched interests like film and music companies have no interest to develop.

To those who say that "the model needs to change," they're right. That's why the adult entertainment industry has constantly been in a state of flux, and has material available in print, on DVD, and online. This has also been a major reason why the industry has not been able to establish trade cabals like the RIAA and MPAA. The common thread of the industry, and reason for its existence, is original content — content that is copyrighted and entitled to a range of legal protections. All of the structural change in the world will not alter the fact that a right to produce and protect original content is at the core of adult entertainment; it is the industry's sole commodity, like coal, oil or copper, that derives value by virtue of its relative scarcity. Content producers want you to have access to it on your phone, computer and television, but legally, and can only advance the technology required for this goal if they have the money to research and perfect it.

Helping a Brother Out

In the world of content creation, U.S. Copyright law governs what can be protected and how those protections work. There are limits to what can be copyrighted, so that someone cannot claim a proprietary interest in a mere idea. For economics wonks, there are individual rights within a copyright that can be broken down and sold, licensed or assigned to others, such as rights of republication or broadcast. And, to protect the creator, there are provisions that allow for recovery of up to $150,000 for willful infringement.

There is a constant drone about copyright law from those at the technological frontier – that it stifles innovation, that it's stilted in favor of large studios, and that it's become obsolete. These may all be valid criticisms, but the law on the books remains the law on the books until it is changed. Feelings are irrelevant to the law as written. But, feelings – or plain old good taste – are relevant to how one chooses to use it as a sword. If someone was reposting The Spearhead articles because they agreed with the message and wanted to get the word out to others – or even if they disagreed and wanted to critique the piece's arguments – it seems unlikely that Mr. Price would hunt them down and sue them, absent some kind of rampant misappropriation and profiteering (and, even then, my dealings with W.F. Price lead me to believe he'd try to settle everything as quickly and cordially as possible). When you create for your livelihood rather than your cause, though, then every penny lost to piracy counts that much more.

The easiest way to not get caught in such action is to not steal. People caught in such lawsuits have claimed it is unfair to bring up what the pirated content was in order to shame the pirate into settlement. I think lawyers who employ that tactic are undermining their clients. There is no shame in creation, or in commerce, and what one does in the privacy of his own home would not even be under public scrutiny but for one important fact: the defendant stole. There is no reason to steal, and bring caught will carry a penalty worth several dozen legitimate DVD purchases or monthly website passes. Knowing the industry demographics, though, why would you steal? Adult entertainment is unique in that the average woman is paid more than the average man – often by factors in a scene where they both appear. The field predominantly is run by male small business owners, though, who are also well represented in this publication's readership, and can relate to the myriad of issues faced when creating something new and important.

As always, honesty is the best policy. Otherwise, change your network password often, even if you give it to friends occasionally, and make sure you know who's using your network. If someone comes over for a weekend, logs on, and has a torrent running in the background, a motivated plaintiff will have your IP address when he comes knocking. Actually, he won't – it'll be a letter from your internet service provider telling you that they're giving up your internet account information, followed by a visit from your friendly neighborhood process server. At that point, it's a matter of how little you can get away with paying – motions to quash subpoenas for identifying information in copyright cases tend to have a low return on investment; when a case is brought properly, a motion to quash's likelihood of success is low. At that point, it's time to admit wrongdoing and try to get off as lightly as possible, even if you're forced to suck it up and pay a "d'oh tax" for failing to properly secure or monitor your wireless network.

Conclusion

People are free to dislike pornography and choose not to buy it. They can keep strip clubs and video stores out of their cushy suburbs if they can convincingly show that it will increase crime and harm property values. If all of the major studios were to shut down tomorrow, there would still be more porn around than any one person could need in his or her lifetime, but that's not the point. However indignant or repulsed one might feel, there is a bright line between what is and is not theft; distaste for something does not excuse stealing. As an inexorable force for technological change, porn is intrinsically valuable, and its producers have to defend their ability to stay viable – profitable, even – for the rest of us to benefit from its existence. Nobody likes to be sued, or to pay a settlement of several thousand dollars. But, widespread piracy has destabilized an entire industry, and one that has worked to be rather versatile, as opposed to the recording and movie industries' desperate grip on decades-old models of distribution.

Feminism in China

Featured Guest · 29 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Gorbachev

Feminism has been eating away at the core of American demographics, dating and domestic life for decades. What's often not understood is that this process is under way all over the world, everywhere industrial economies have taken root.

I lived in Japan, Korea and China, though I have the most personal experience in Korea, where I lived for several years. Feminism is definitely altering the equation for young men and women in Korea. I was able to watch as the social environment was literally percolating and bubbling over. I go back regularly, and from what I can see, the process is only accelerating. Korea is maybe 10-15 years behind the same process in other Asian countries, though, where this trend has been radically changing societies for some time.

In Japan, there is an entire generation of boys that have refused to co-operate with the work-hard, forehead-to-the-grindstone, grin-and-bear-it mentality of their fathers. What's worse, women have largely elected not to get married and the birth rate in Japan has crashed. We've all heard of Japan's lack of babies and the economic stagnation and aging population, but fewer people have experienced what happens when boys and men simply stop participating in life. Reclusive Japanese "Herbs" have simply withdrawn from regular male pursuits – outside of video games.

In Korea, a growing class of young men are often seen dangling "purses" and spending hours styling themselves, activities their fathers did only on sufferance and at the insistence of their wives. This is contrasted with a shrinking pool of resilient, brash males who are considered domineering, and whose chauvinism is often blamed by women on their terrible experiences as conscripts in the Korean army . These traditional men are no longer the progressive model for youth in Korea. But though they're a declining species, they haven't disappeared altogether.

In China, the effects are now being debated with some earnestness.

We can all guess, pretty easily, why the boys and young men are "un-manly" and can't bring themselves to work at anything they need to do. It's most definitely not because they're suffering from an over-indulgence of "male privilege". Most likely, they've been indulged, pampered, and prevented from acting on their hard-wired male programs that push them to compete and excel in aggressively non-feminine ways.

Some highlights from the article sound powerfully familiar. It speaks to the universality of human nature that Chinese researchers would have come to the same conclusions reached by many men outside of China.

> A similar academic gender gap also observed in the West and other countries where girls outperform boys, but the situation appears especially serious in China where decades of a one-child policy have focused all parental attention on a single child. It's also ironic that boys appear especially at a disadvantage in a male-dominated society where many people prefer boy babies.
> This general state of affairs the authors and many others attribute to China's rigid education system that doesn't accommodate boys' and girls' differing physiological and brain development; pressure to perform; overprotection and pampering by parents and grandparents; and an environment at home and school that is dominated by women and lacks strong male role models.
> "For years we've focused more on girls' rights to receive equal education. But we unintentionally neglected boys and their worsening crisis," says coauthor Sun, also deputy director of the China Youth Research Center. If this continues, we will have a new gender imbalance," Sun says.
> Parents spoil them and coop them up indoors instead of letting them run around outside because they think nature and vigorous exercise are dangerous.

(This is a social phenomenon common to many Asian countries, where physical exercise or work of any kind is frowned upon. Ironically, while China may win many medals at the olympics, its population is one of the most sedentary on Earth)

> "In a system that ignores gender differences and demands every student be quiet and obedient, there are heavy shackles on boys who have at least 15 times more testosterone than girls," he says. "Boys and girls are not parts on an assembly line that have the same size, shape and function."
> Boys' ability to read and write develops two years later than girls, even nerves in a boys' fingers grow more slowly than girls, says Sun.
> "My son has trouble holding a brush and writing Chinese characters with complicated strokes," says one man.
> Girls do better earlier, though boys catch up as their coordination improves.
> "But they are required to learn the same thing at the same speed. This is so unfair," Sun says.

– This is the same old – same old. When you let women and bureaucrats teach your boys, the only option they have is to teach them not to be boys or watch them fail in school.

Turning men into girls is fine – except that you'll never get any grandchildren, because the women won't breed with your less masculine son.

> Some boys are regarded as slow or silly because they have so much energy and have a hard time sitting still.
> "This can make them hate school starting in the first grade," says Sun.
> Though boys need to run around, many schools eliminate vigorous and demanding physical exercise for both boys and girls – lest accidents result in lawsuits. Exuberance is generally discouraged.
> Most important lesson:
> "The education system is more suitable for girls, who are good at memorizing and like sitting quietly to read," says author Li.

It's not just American men that labor under the crushing burden of a feminized edu-eaucracy.

America's DV Culture Celebrates Violence Against Women

Elusive Wapiti · 30 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

As a guy who writes about the sorry state of men's rights in the West, fairness sometimes requires me to address the other side of the coin…how men abuse their privileged position in the family and how men's rights advocates in the media excuse the abuses of their brother men. Sometimes MRAs even celebrate their crimes with a glee that I find both offensive and perverse.

Consider the case of Lawrence Gallo, more widely known as Larry Gallo (he has since chosen to go by the longer, more formal first name as a sign of his newfound maturity), who, in a fit of rage after years of alleged mental and physical abuse at the hands of his cruel and domineering wife Juanita, exacted revenge upon her 17 years ago by attacking her as she slept and cutting off one of her breasts (it would be successfully reattached hours later).

Why one of her breasts? As he explained it, in that brief moment of rage, her breasts symbolized how smothered he was by her aggressive, toxic femininity. With those breasts, she felt she could get away with anything–and did. For years, Larry claimed, people looked the other way as he suffered. Thus removing one of those offending breasts would neuter that oppressive femininity. He would finally be free, by dint of severing the visible fount of her sexual power from her body.

Perhaps unintended by Gallo, it would also bring public humiliation upon his wife–she would be forever known as the breast-less woman, a disfigured monster, the butt of ridicule by late-night comedians. Yet Juanita, classy as she was, turned this terrible event to her advantage, first by fronting a lounge band humorously named The Detached Tit, then to starring in two pornographic videos, making as much money as possible from the circus-act notoriety of her reconstructed breast.

Well, seems that Larry–now Lawrence–has healed. Finally free from Juanita's mental and physical abuse, Larry, a former kept man, is standing on his own two feet and has gone on to form a new family and found a charity, "Larry's Red Wagon", to help his fellow hen-pecked men who are abused by their abusive wives escape their situations.

I am appalled by how accepted, even celebrated, Larry's mayhem had (and has) been in the press. Nothing calls for violence against one's wife, even one allegedly as ill-behaved as Juanita. Yet that is what I see some men doing…excusing and give psychological cover for continued violence against women by such men. Indeed, society is so penetrated by this DV-excusing culture that we don't even blink at similarly situated men who exploit their inferior social position as a get out of jail free card for abuses ranging from slapping their wives when mildly upset, to full on battery against them when angered. This must stop.

So I ask each of you to join me and various feminist groups in calling for a halt to America's DV culture. As motivation, I give you Larry's recent appearance on CNN. He has a new hair color and a new life, and in the video, he discusses his charitable foundation to help prevent the kinds of abuse that he allegedly suffered. Not once were his admitted misdeeds mentioned during the interview, providing yet more evidence that violence against women is sanctioned, condoned, and supported by America's DV culture….click to view the video and see what I'm talking about.

Now that you've viewed the video, you probably realize that this post is completely sarcastic. And I hope that I've also proven a point or two in the process. We do have a DV culture in this country, but it's not what the feminists or their lace-curtain enablers in the media and in Hollywood want us to think it is.

Happy New Year!

W.F. Price · 30 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

New Year has always been an oddly resonant holiday for me. Although I never took it all that seriously, I remember many of my New Years better than I should, given the circumstances. It will probably be quiet for me this year, as I'll be with my little ones, but I hope readers get out there and truly celebrate it if they have the time.

When I lived in Peking, my Chinese friends always demanded some performance of Auld Lang Syne, and the Chinese are karaoke junkies (to my great dismay), so I looked for a decent rendition of the song. Below is about the best I could find. Not too cheap, not too queer, and apparently genuinely Scottish.

Enjoy!

Prenups and Economics: Forewarned is Forearmed

J. DeVoy · 30 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

You don't bring a knife to a gun fight. Cliché aside, the reason is obvious: If you do, you're dead. The same has sadly become true of modern marriage, where one cannot simply marry for love, but must date and couple defensively, paying attention to her family background, spending habits, and past relationships. These have always been factors in mate selection, but with divorce increasingly easy and now funded by outside parties, such considerations are disproportionately important.

Prenups are unromantic. They damper the fire two people have for one another, and acknowledge that maybe true love isn't forever — or isn't so true after all. Bad things happen that can ruin a marriage, such as illness or family deaths that nobody could predict or prevent. Given the life-ruining consequences of divorce, a prenup is an insurance policy against catastrophe. To some, this is preaching to the choir. For others, this should give reason for pause and careful consideration of taking this step before committing to marriage.

Whose Property Is It?

One of the most important considerations in a marriage is property distribution. The states are not in concert on this topic, and there are two main methods of property collection. The first is Common Law ("CL"), which assumes that spouses keep their earnings and other property acquired during marriage for themselves unless acquired jointly. Community Property ("CP") states – Alaska, Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, Washington and Wisconsin – assume that all income and other property acquired by a spouse during marriage, unless demonstrably separate (such as a gift to the husband left by his father's will), becomes part of the marital "community" in which each spouse has an indivisible half share. Confusing yet? The metaphysics have just begun.

If you move states, property generally is treated under the laws where it is acquired. For more complex property, such as bank accounts and savings accounts, the amount that counts as CL or CP is determined by how much of its contents were added in each jurisdiction. Where that is not traceable, it is measured by time. If you have a business, your spouse may have a share of that in California, depending on how much time and energy you and the "marital community" invested into it. While the Van Camp and Pereira tests are used to determine how the business is valued and distributed, courts have considerable discretion in using these tests. While Pereira gives the parting spouse a rate of return on the business' worth and Van Camp values his or her contribution to the business versus how much a paid employee would have commanded in the marketplace, giving the difference in value to the spouse. In either test, the outcome is the same: A chunk of the business goes to the non-owner spouse. Entrepreneurs should consider this before marriage.

Community property also lends itself to a lot of other petty little power struggles. If you both are gifted a valuable heirloom in a CP state and have an undivided half interest in it, get ready for it to be sold at auction to capture the half value and make it divisible. After all, it's only fair! </whine>

Process and Substance

Each state governs prenups individually. Some cohesion exists, however, among the states to adopt the Uniform Premarital Agreements Act (UPAA). Nevertheless, this is model legislation and each state likely has provisions that reflect its public policy. "Public policy" sounds like a joke, and often was mocked in law school, but there are palpable differences in the laws of California and, say, Virginia, for this very reason.

Generally, prenups can be made about any terms the parties want. One risk of making the agreement too specific, though, is that not fully complying with it can be used against you. By failing to meet a term, however small, the other party can claim that you've waived it. Whether that claim has merit or would succeed is another matter, but there is a basis for the soon-to-be-ex spouse to begin attacking entire provisions of the agreement. I do not practice in family law, but as always, hit the highlights, keep it simple, and move along.

One advantage of the UPAA is that, depending on how a state has altered it, there is no longer an inquiry into the substantive fairness of a prenuptial agreement. Substantive fairness looks to whether the terms of the agreement are fair to the spouses – even if not totally equal – and had independent counsel, acted based on duress, had the sophistication to know what was being forfeited, and fully disclosed their respective assets and liabilities. Under the UPAA, if the parties agreed to the prenup's terms, it will stand, much like a commercial contract. The problem with assuming this is the case in all states, though, is that some states may have modified the UPAA to require an inquiry into the substantive fairness of a prenuptial agreement, or allow the complaining spouse to present evidence that it was substantively unfair. Where the UPAA has not been adopted, this inquiry into substantive fairness may still be in effect.

Even without an inquiry as to substantive fairness, a prenup may be set aside for failing to adequately provide for a spouse. First, if the terms of the prenup are "unconscionable," the agreement will be set aside and not enforced, either in part or entirely, depending on the rules of your jurisdiction (some courts might "blue line" the agreement, striking the unconscionable provision to keep the remainder of the agreement viable). Though better understood through case law, the free legal dictionary defines unconscionability as:

> Unusually harsh and shocking to the conscience; that which is so grossly unfair that a court will proscribe it.
> When a court uses the word unconscionable to describe conduct, it means that the conduct does not conform to the dictates of conscience. In addition, when something is judged unconscionable, a court will refuse to allow the perpetrator of the conduct to benefit.
> In contract law an unconscionable contract is one that is unjust or extremely one-sided in favor of the person who has the superior bargaining power. An unconscionable contract is one that no person who is mentally competent would enter into and that no fair and honest person would accept. Courts find that unconscionable contracts usually result from the exploitation of consumers who are often poorly educated, impoverished, and unable to find the best price available in the competitive marketplace. (source.)

Under the model UPAA, this standard for unconscionability is ascertained at the time the spouses enter into the prenuptial agreement. States may have their own modifications to this rule. This creates an interesting problem for couples-to-be: How do you know what's unconscionable at the time you're making the agreement? Most divorces take time to occur, and the court – as well as spouses – can only look backward to see what was or was not unconscionable in the past. In the present, better-off spouses are left to guess what will be unconscionable in 3, 5, 10 or 20 years, leading to a dulling of prenuptial agreements in step with the increasing effeteness of societal norms. In some states, couples opt to seal their divorce records and keep the details of their split off the record, making it difficult to determine what courts have held to be unconscionable in the past with any accuracy.

Other conditions for setting aside a prenuptial agreement include nondisclosure and putting a spouse on public assistance. A spouse's failure to disclose his or her assets – without obtaining the other spouse's waiver, meaning that the spouses do not have to make such disclosures – is a basis for the prenup to be set aside completely under the UPAA, and be given no effect in determining the former spouse's economic rights. Similarly, a prenup can be set aside and rendered ineffective if there is no provision for alimony – though alimony can be waived by the spouses in the agreement – and the agreement's result is the negatively affected spouse becoming eligible for public assistance. As with all other provisions, individual states may have modified these portions of the UPAA.

Conclusion

Getting a prenup that will stand up to challenges by a woman scorned and court that often features elected judges is not as easy as signing on the dotted line. If parts of this article seem scary or confusing, it's because they are.

While society views marriage as disposable, with more than half of unions ended in divorce and 70% of divorce petitions filed by women, the legal system treats it as a serious and solemn bond – from an economic standpoint.

I'm of the opinion that a hit to one's libido is worth having an intact life if the worst case scenario should come to pass. Beyond the inherent unsexiness of prenups, they're expensive. They require asking around for a good lawyer, paying several hundred dollars an hour, and potentially even having your prospective spouse represented by counsel to ensure a fair, thoroughly negotiated agreement. But money and discomfort accepted now can prevent bigger, costlier problems in the future.

2011 — The Year of Men

Featured Guest · 1 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Alphabeta Supe

Today is an auspicious day. It is 1/1/11 – an appropriate date for a new beginning. It is the beginning of a new era in gender relations. I hereby declare 2011 the Year of Men.

Enough is enough. It is time to end the most appalling and reprehensible chapter in modern Western gender relations. It is the year that pro-VAWA lobby groups will be held accountable for their part in the rising number of unpunished false rape claims. It is the year that men falsely accused of rape receive adequate compensation for their shocking losses. It is the year unpunished mutilators like Lorena Bobbitt cease being glorified and get their just desserts. It is the year women are indicted equally for domestic violence crimes against men. It is the year publicly funded hospitals stop giving preferential medical treatment to women. It is the year the female orgasm is no longer worshipped. It is the year the White Knight and the Mangina are de-horsed and re-masculated. It is the year Hanna Rosin and her ilk are silenced for the patently ridiculous fools that they are. It is the year schools and teachers stop treating our sons like second class citizens. It is the year that Marriage 1.0 is restored to the righteous believer and Marriage 2.0 is abandoned as the feminist abomination that it is. It is the year we pull our wives, sisters, mothers and daughters back from the brink of self-destruction. It is the year that feminism is finally recognised as economically unfeasible.

Gentlemen, let us begin. There are 1684 universities around the world that have a Women's Studies program. I challenge all men, each and every one that reads this, to select an article from The Spearhead or your favourite Men's Issues blog or your own take on an issue of concern and send it, or a link to it, to every staff member at the 'schools' listed below. There are now literally thousands of outstanding articles articulating why feminism has failed but they are doing precious little if they aren't being poured into the inboxes of the movers and shapers of feminist 'thought'. Select schools in your home city and staff with your initials – that should give us a good spread. Warren Farrell titled his book well "Women Can't Hear What Men Don't Say…", so I challenge you to speak your mind where women will hear.

The schools are listed here:

To get you started, here's an email thread of mine to the head of Women's Studies at the University of Western Ontario, Canada from last week. Hopefully readers of The Spearhead can do a little better:

Dear Dr Isaacs,

The quote on your website by Lya Sorano pines impatiently thus:

"When we talk about equal pay for equal work, women in the workplace are beginning to catch up. If we keep going at this current rate, we will achieve full equality in about 475 years. I don't know about you, but I can't wait that long."

Now, correct me if I'm wrong, Dr Isaacs, but talking about equal work for equal pay is not the same as doing equal work for equal pay. Likewise, extorting concessions from the state under the pretense of catching up is not the same as 'catching up' (if that's what feminists are calling the privileged life of Western women these days).

I've got it – instead of working towards abolishing alimony, ensuring equal father custody of children, supporting mandatory paternity testing, supporting the male contraceptive pill, supporting jail terms for false rape accusers that are equal to those meted out to rapists, supporting full public disclosure of rape accuser identities, teaching young women to shoulder equal burdens and responsibilities as men and how to produce more than they consume, and anything else that would render them truly equal, why not run a Women's Studies and Feminist Research school at a prominent university, teach young women how to distort history, avoid accountability, evade responsibility, lie to themselves and their loved ones about almost everything they 'need', produce narcissistic, self-rationalising, entitlement princesses who think nothing of exploiting legal privilege to break the spirits, backs, balls and bank accounts of hard-working, loving men who make the world sufficiently prosperous, comfortable and safe for women to be able to actually go to college, then coerce them under threat of ex-communication from the sisterhood into believing that unbridled self-interest and unabashed self-expression are virtues, call all of this 'work' then sit back and let 'equality' come rolling in on the next wave of state-sponsored wage inflation, sociological distortions and cultural misandry?

Oh, sorry, you've already done that. Never mind.

Sincerely
Dick

Thank you for being interested enough in what we do to read the quotes on our website. Based on your expressed (mis)understanding of our discipline, It looks as if you never taken any courses in women's studies. If you do wish to comment intelligently on this discipline, you might benefit from some wider reading on the relevant subject matter. If you want to further educate yourself in this area of study so that you may make a more informed comment on it, I would be pleased to suggest a list of readings to help get you started.

Best wishes,
Tracy Isaacs

Hi Tracey,

Thank you for your email. I must say your use of shaming language was as delicious as it was anticipated. The more widely I read in the discipline of Women's Studies, the more it becomes apparent that the capacity to increase academic knowledge in this astonishingly preponderous field is neither a function of intelligence, as you've suggested, nor wisdom. Indeed, it would seem that intelligence, in particular, is of far less benefit than the ability to manipulate facts to suit the mission of the day and to rationalise feelings. Thankfully, however, I've been blessed not only with intelligence and feelings but also reason, being a man and all, so I expect this will allow me to slow the endlessly-spinning hamster wheel of feminist rationalisation long enough to examine the thin axle of truth at its centre. Consequently, I'd be delighted to consider your proposed list of starter readings and decide for myself whether or not they qualify as 'education'.

Regards
Dick

Dear Dick,

A good introductory text is: An Introduction to Women's Studies: Gender in a Transnational World by Inderpal Grewal and Caren Kaplan (McGraw-Hill, 2001).

More recently, a wide-ranging anthology worth looking at and available on Google books is: Handbook of Gender and Women's Studies edited by Davis, Evans, and Lorber (Sage Press, 2006).

For some historical context in the political liberalist framework about women's social position, see: John Stuart Mill, The Subjection of Women,1869 (also a google book).

If you are interested in some philosophical essays by Martha Nussbaum on feminist philosophy in a global context, see: Sex and Social Justice, 1999.

I do hope you find these readings worthwhile and interesting even if they do not reflect your understanding of the way the world is.

Best wishes and happy new year.
Tracy Isaacs

Hi Tracey,

Thanks for the reading list. I've come across the Mill's work several times, as well as a number of Nussbaum's muscular rationalizations about power inequality. I've not given the latter much credence due to her apparent lack of recognition of the functional role of the power differential in most successful relationships – i.e. as the primary contractual motivator. I will, however, take this opportunity to delve deeper into Mill and opine about whether Nussbaum's work qualifies as Women's Studies, or 'philosophy' or 'ethics' that happen to be written by a feminist, or merely the echoes of an intelligent woman calling out in the endless empty chambers of academic self-interest. Hopefully, I'll then be in a position to understand from whence comes the perception that a Women's Studies professor in London, Ontario, is a reliable arbiter of "…the way the world is".

I'll revert in a short while with an analysis of this material from a rationalist, non-feminist perspective. Please accept my best wishes for the season in the meantime.

Regards
Dick

Paradise Lost: The Bitter Pill of Global Feminism

Featured Guest · 1 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Most persons are aware of China's one-child policy. But few fully understand the indelible mark this human rights travesty has left on the soul of the Chinese people.

Recently professor Jing-Bao Nie of New Zealand published a remarkably candid appraisal of this policy, which represents the most ambitious demographic experiment ever conducted in human history.

China's Birth Control Program through Feminist Lenses catalogs in chilling detail how the Chinese population-control agenda coerced hundreds of millions of women to use birth control, compelled over one-quarter of the adult female population to obtain an abortion, and ensured the forced sterilization of 37% of all married women.

The current toll is 200 million unborn babies, and counting. This moral calamity is compounded by sex-selective abortion, a widespread practice that has created a deficit of 40 million baby girls, giving rise to an impending demographic time-bomb.

Ironically, this modern-day eugenics program was sold to an unsuspecting Chinese citizenry as a tool to "liberate" and "empower" women. "No words can describe the physical pain and emotional suffering" that arise from such policies, Dr. Nie concludes.

Feminists have long been obsessed with the "problem" of child-bearing and child-rearing, viewing such activities as a baleful obstacle to female fulfillment. (As a father of three, I can state unequivocably that child-raising has been one of the most rewarding experiences of my life. But then, I'm not a feminist.)

Feminists are so consumed with the issue to the point of advancing totalitarian policies. In 1974, feminist matriarch Simone de Beauvoir advocated this final solution: "No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children…Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one."

Government-mandated population control and proscriptions on stay-at-home motherhood are abhorrent to women. But that didn't stop the feminist Left from seizing on an even more radical solution: excise the traditional family. Former Ms. Magazine editor Robin Morgan made no attempt to disguise her movement's extreme agenda: "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage."

But Morgan faced the same hurdle as the Chinese one-birth propagandists: How are we going to sell such a loopy scheme to women?

To answer that question, Morgan and other feminist theorists turned to the proto-revolutionary Karl Marx himself. "What is the present family based on?," Marx rhetorically asked in his 1848 Communist Manifesto. He answered, "The bourgeoisie sees in his wife nothing but an instrument of production."

By relying on a Marxist class analysis, feminists transmogrified men from dedicated providers and protectors into bourgeois oppressors, fingering proletariat women as their unwitting victims.

Robin Morgan led a decades-long campaign to revile men. "I feel that man-hating is an honorable and viable political act," she once expounded.

Eventually, a range of epithets became synonymous with the male persona: patriarchal knuckle-dragger, male chauvinist pig, deadbeat dad, wife-beater, and more. Men who objected to these put-downs were derided as humorless wusses or insensitive to the needs of women.

Some of these stereotypes, inaccurate as they were, made their way into laws such as the Violence Against Women Act. Multi-billion dollar bureaucracies such as the Office of Child Support Enforcement were erected, based on the unfounded presumption that dads are fundamentally irresponsible and would seek to escape the financial obligations to their children.

Men eventually discovered that vague renditions of domestic violence such as “annoyance” or “apprehension” provided the basis for legal actions that eventually stripped them of their homes, their families, and their assets. No wonder millions of men vow they will never wed.

Speaking at a Mexico City conference last year, Arie Hoekman of the United Nations Population Fund fervently embraced the news of family break-down. Hoekman boasted to the group,“we are in the presence of a weakening of the patriarchal structure [and] the rise of new values centered in the recognition of fundamental human rights.”

Throughout history, the family has been the most cherished and protective social institution for women. And this is what the feminist Left seeks to revamp, forcing women away from their children and onto the public dole.

As Charles Dickens presciently penned in A Tale of Two Cities, “Every revolution eventually turns on itself.”

India Plunges into Rape Hysteria

W.F. Price · 2 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There's been quite the debate over feminism in India occurring on The Spearhead, so I thought I'd do a little more research to see what's going on in the subcontinent. Amazingly, in some respects it appears that feminism is being taken even farther than it has in all but the most extreme examples in the West.

Below, we address two separate, new policies regarding rape in the Hindu civilization:

Under a new centrally sponsored government scheme, Indian women who claim to be rape victims will receive $450 cash within two weeks if they claim rape and a medical exam demonstrates unspecified evidence of rape, and then over a year's time additional benefits are added that bring the total to at least $4,500 (RS 2 lakh), and up to $6,700 (RS 3 lakh) worth of benefits.

No conclusive conviction is required for the money; only the medical exam.

A medical exam cannot prove rape, but it can prove that sex took place, which makes it fairly obvious how this system can be abused, particularly in a place like India where a woman's value as a wife is still dependent on her virginity.

Say a girl gives in to lust and fools around with the neighborhood bad boy, things get hot and heavy, and she has sex with him. This happens all over the world, and in liberalizing India it must be happening more than ever. Realizing that she just blew it and mom and dad are going to go ballistic when that guy she's never met to whom she's promised in marriage makes an angry phone call upon discovering that his new bride is damaged goods, she thinks of the rape program and calls the police.

Maybe she points the finger at the bad boy, or maybe she makes up some imaginary assailant — it doesn't matter to her, even if some innocent schmuck gets pulled out of bed at 2AM by a gang of mustachioed Indian police and thrown in the slammer. At least she doesn't have to face her parents' wrath, she doesn't have to marry that guy she wasn't too sure about anyway, and she's getting paid more than she could have made in years of work.

But according to an official with the women and child development ministry, "no Indian woman would make a false claim of rape just to get financial support."

That official must be pretty sure of himself to make such a claim about a country with hundreds of millions of women. If I were an Indian man, I wouldn't be so confident.

In addition to the rape reporting payments, India has expanded the definition of rape to include men who lead women to believe they will marry them, and then fail to follow through with it. It is a formalized sort of "shotgun marriage" law that is backed up with the severe penalty of hard time in prison.

In a Delhi court verdict, an Indian man named Chhotey Lai ran off with a neighbor, taking her around the country and carrying on a torrid affair. The neighbor believed that he would marry her, or perhaps she simply fantasized about it — this is an almost universal tendency for women involved in affairs.

Regardless, the woman's father filed a missing person report and when the two lovebirds arrived back home Mr. Lai was promptly arrested and hauled off to court, where he was convicted of rape and sentenced to seven years' hard labor.

If this were the law of the land in the US, tens of millions of men would immediately have to be reclassified as rapists, and we'd have to build some sort of galactic penal colony to hold all of them. The precedent this sets is breathtaking in its scope, as almost all women "believe" the man-du-jour is going to marry them.

For all the international outrage over the stoning sentence for Iranian adulteress and murderer Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani, who helped poison and electrocute her husband, I've heard nary a peep about Mr. Lai, who may be a cad and a rake, but who certainly doesn't deserve time in prison.

What appears to have happened is that the screaming hysteria over rape that gripped the Western world in the 1990s, manifested at the time in "take back the night" marches, demands for prosecuting college boys and VAWA, has been seized upon by governments around the world as a pretext for abusing the rights of men. If you give the state a weapon, it will most certainly be used, and rape with its attendant taboos and emotional power has proven to be a very good pretext for repealing human rights, which have always been an annoyance to governments everywhere.

Just as the black population in the United States correctly identified the "War on Drugs" as a war on blacks – and this is clearly borne out by incarceration statistics – men have to understand that heavy-handed state solutions to intersexual violence constitute a war on men. Furthermore, men have to come to a solid understanding that to condemn the abuses of the state does not imply that ordinary men support rape or violence against women any more than your typical black American supported the plague of crack cocaine in his community. Clearly, it is not a matter of choosing one side or the other: both are wrong. And the crack analogy is not a perfect one, because there has not been a demonstrable rise in sexual violence or crime since the 1970s; the current hysteria is a purely fabricated moral panic.

It is time for men to stand up to a state that is using women as a pretext to strip us of our civil liberties. As in Sweden, India is making a mockery of the concept of consent, which should give women some cause for concern as well, because the logical conclusion of all this is that women have no legal standing to make any agreements or decisions in the sexual realm — it is all up to the judge to decide whether or not the woman made a "legal" choice when she took her pants off.

The Ultimate Triumph of Form Over Substance

zed · 2 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I read a story when I was a kid that made a lasting impression on me. It was about a teenage girl who passed by a bakery every day and developed a fixation on a particular cake in the window. Eventually she reached the point where it became imperative to her that she have that cake. She saved her money and when she had enough, she went in to buy the cake. The clerk tried to talk her out of it and offered to have another, freshly made, cake exactly like it ready for her the next day.

No sale. She had to have that cake.

So, the clerk boxed it up for her and she took it home. She took it out of the box and grabbed a knife to cut into it, eagerly anticipating its delicious taste. But, the knife encountered a strange resistance for a cake, then went "thunk" right through it. She turned it over and discovered that it was not actually a cake at all, but just a cardboard box covered with icing made to look like a cake.

I know that I am something of a Luddite, but seems like everywhere I look these days I see little except cardboard boxes covered with icing and people who believe that they are cakes.

At The Thinking Housewife (skip the snark, guys, we have bigger fish to fry) I found links to three of the most egregious examples of cardboard boxes being sold as cakes that I have seen in recent memory.

The first involves a woman who was past her expiration date who slickly eluded her Wiley E. Coyote moment by paying two other women to gestate her babies as she might also pay other women to clean her house for her because she can't be bothered.

The second involves our favorite destroyer-of-families, Joe Biden, saying that same-sex marriage is inevitable.

And, the third, merges those two themes into the possibility of laboratory reproduction for same sex couples like 63-year-old Elton John and his male "partner", who have had a child via a surrogate mother. From an "equality" standpoint, if women are "empowered" by paying other women to do what they, as women, squandered their ability to do, on what grounds would it be possible to deny the "fairness" of allowing men to do it as well?

There is an old joke that goes – how many legs does a sheep have if you call a tail a leg? The answer is 4, because calling a tail a leg does not make it a leg. There is a reality to it which transcends and denies labeling, and a tail remains a tail, and not a leg, no matter what you call it.

It is truly sad to me that the Social Conservatives have isolated and marginalized themselves by drawing the requirements for membership among them so narrowly and rigidly. For, in truth, I am generally fairly socially conservative. If the SoCons had been a bit more willing to support my rights as a man, and a bit less enthusiastic about throwing me under the bus in the name of female pedastalization, they probably would have had a pretty committed ally in me, instead of a sworn enemy as they have today. Sadly, agreeing in spirit but differing on detail is not good enough for most SoCons – it seems to be their way, all the way, or the highway.

If you look at the number of "men" today who are opting out of traditional masculinity – either as gay men, transgenders, or male feminidiots – you will see that they are so uncomfortable with the rigid constructions of traditional masculinity that they are refusing to go along with them despite extreme social pressure. It is a fairly universal characteristic of human nature that the harder you push someone trying to force them into doing something they do not wish to do, the harder they will push back.

Or, to put it another way, the more difficult, painful, and rewardless you make it to follow a "traditional" path, the fewer people who will do it and the more hostility they will have toward you for trying to force them. Push them long enough and hard enough, and they will eventually get pissed off enough that instead of leaving you alone in the institutions you are trying to force them into, they will counterattack and try to co-opt and smash them.

To me, a “man” who has himself castrated and a hole created in his body has no more right to call itself a “woman’ than I would have to cut off my legs and replace them with wooden ones and call myself a “table.” Calling a tail a leg does not make it one, and calling a mutilated man a “woman” does not make it one either.

Nor does the odd case of the female who is no longer a “woman” as we understand what a woman really is – a creature capable of gestating life within her body – “outsourcing” her womanly role and still trying to call herself a “mother.” At best, she is self-paid day (or night) care. At worst, she is playing “let’s pretend”, and requiring everyone else to go along with and support her self-delusion.

As we plunge ahead into this Brave New World Order of the 21st century, we face a landscape where everything is considered nothing but a “social construct.” Born with a male body but believe you are really a woman (or vice versa)? No problem, just get some surgery and some hormones and you can call yourself whatever you want to call yourself. Does it make you really be what you are calling yourself? No, you’re still just a cardboard box covered with icing pretending to be a “cake”, a tail pretending to be a “leg”, an over-the-hill female pretending to be “a woman”, or confused creatures of the same sex pretending to be “married.”

Born with tits too “small”? No problem, just pay some shyster $5,000 to pump bags of foreign substances into your body. Have a real and unique face? No problem, just grab a trowel and slather on a few layers of paint which will make you look pretty much exactly like every other woman out there (while making billion$$$$ for the cosmetic companies). Born with genes for male pattern baldness? No problem, get yourself some funkly looking corn rows implanted, or a prescription for Rogaine or Propecia. Getting older and slowing down sexually as a man? No problem, just go out and spend $6 on a pill so you can function like a flesh-and-blood vibrator with a fresh set of batteries, to get you in the mood to do what a lot of women consider to be “rayyyype.”

We live in a culture which gives you the opportunity, the means, the sanction, and even the mandate, to pretend to be whatever you want to pretend to be.

Except, underneath it all, you are still a tail, and not a leg.

Women have “Take Back the Night.” Well, I would like to suggest that men start a campaign to “Take Back the Real.”

Avoid fake anything. Don’t date, or pay attention to, fake women with fake faces, fake boobs, or fake personalities. When some fake SoCon gets on you about how you “should” be acting, spit in their faces and tell them that if they weren’t hypocrites and pedastalizers, and had fought a bit for the rights of fathers to be part of their kids lives and the rights of men to be attracted to women – even their own wives – that they would not have shot their credibility all to hell.

And, above all, don’t get fooled by cardboard boxes covered with sugary crap to try to fool you into thinking that they are sweet cakes.

Monkeys with Close Friends More Successful with Females

W.F. Price · 3 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A new study of Assamese macaques found that, contrary to expectations, male social bonding is common even amongst non-related monkeys, and is directly correlated with the number of offspring the monkeys sired.

Additionally, the study found that while female social bonds were more nepotistic (i.e. they bonded with relatives), the male bonds were linked to coalition building, and the stronger the bonds the more powerful the effect on both status and reproductive success. Although the increase in fertility is largely a result of enhanced status, even lower ranking monkeys made significant gains by having close bonds with other males.

Although the study was carried out on monkeys rather than humans, it is likely that there is a similar effect amongst human males, who are generally more successful in life if they are well-liked by their fellows, and as a result more attractive to females. In fact, it often appears that women take a cue from men when determining which men make desirable company.

So perhaps we should be thankful for our friends for more than just the companionship and support they offer.

The Three Laws of RoMANtics

zed · 3 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Science fiction author Issac Asimov has, in addition to being incredibly prolific, achieved something that for the literary world is probably the equivalent of a Nobel prize: he has established an idea which has become accepted in popular consciousness and spread to become incorporated in the works of other authors. His "Three Laws of Robotics" can be recited verbatim by most serious science fiction fans, and references to them can be found throughout not just science fiction but other genres of literature as well.

The three laws are:
1. A robot may not injure a human being or, through inaction, allow a human being to come to harm.
2. A robot must obey any orders given to it by human beings, except where such orders would conflict with the First Law.
3. A robot must protect its own existence as long as such protection does not conflict with the First or Second Law.

Given the common theme of fear of robots and other machines taking over and subjugating human beings – such as in movies like the Terminator series or the Matrix series – making robots "safe" was an important step in making the idea of them acceptable as a subject of literature, to a public often ruled by dark and irrational fears.

Dalrock has just written an interesting post on the decline of chivalry. He expresses a certain romanticized wistfulness over its loss, particularly the doctrine of "wimminsandchilluns first." Unlike some other SoCons, he does not seem as deeply invested in desperately holding on to the old order in a much-changed world, and examines the issues refreshingly realisitically – for a SoCon, that is. (nudge, nudge, wink, @Dalrock) He examines the survival rates of passengers on the Titanic, and quotes these interesting statistics –

> First of all, if you were a man, you were outta luck. The overall survival rate for men was 20%. For women, it was 74%, and for children, 52%. Yes, it was indeed "women and children first."

The only problem is that it really wasn't "women and children first", it was "women first, then children." Able-bodied adult women out-survived vulnerable children by a rate of almost 50%. If we would look at our culture as being like the Titanic, and feminism being the iceberg it has struck which has torn a huge gaping hole in the hull which keeps it afloat, the survival rate of children today is only marginally better. According to the Guttmacher Institute –

> Nearly half of pregnancies among American women are unintended, and four in 10 of these are terminated by abortion. Twenty-two percent of all pregnancies (excluding miscarriages) end in abortion.

So, the survival rate of children on the "post-choice Titanic" is 78% at best, and only about 60% for those who were not "chosen."

I have a personal story about this which particularly sticks in my craw. A young woman I know who is now in her mid to late 20s was the archetypal modern feminist woman. She had her entire life planned out by the time she graduated from high school –
1. degree
2. career
3. husband
4. children

The first three happened pretty much as she planned, but stubborn old mother nature just was not delivering those babies on Ms Modern-Woman's timetable. So, she did the obvious thing and reached for the (fertility) drugs. They worked – too well. She became pregnant with triplets. "Oh, no, no, no, this just will not do! This was not the plan."

So, she went through a procedure euphemistically called “Selective Reduction” and practiced Sophie’s Choice on one of her 3 daughters to be. When I heard about this, I told her in a barely contained rage “Don’t you dare ever tell either of those surviving babies about this!!!!” I cannot imagine a greater curse to lay on a child than the nagging doubt – “What if I had been the one that mommy decided was just too inconvenient to let live?”

Kinda shines a bright spotlight on the bogus mantra “best interests of the child” doesn’t it?

Coming back around to the deck of the Titanic, I wonder how many of the women who got seats in those lifeboats while men and children died for their convenience had tried to play God, force her fertility, and then when playing God got out of her control (as it always does) killed a child in order to make life conform to her plan.

My money goes on “none.”

“Chivalry”, like every other term that feminists have gotten their hands on (“oppression, misogyny, patriarchy, choice, rayyyyyype”), has gotten totally twisted away from its original meaning. Where before it was part of generalized civilized code of behavior which bound all people into conducting themselves in a civil manner, it has now become unilaterally binding only on men.

In short, it has become the Three Laws of RoMANtics –
1. A manbot may not injure a woman being or, through inaction, allow a woman being to come to harm.
2. A manbot must obey any orders given to it by woman beings, except where such orders would conflict with the First Law.
3. A manbot may protect its own existence as long as such protection does not conflict with the First or Second Law.

Thus did the manbots on the Titanic not injure woman beings by taking one of those seats in the lifeboat which might have allowed them to survive (3rd and last law) nor did the white knights, who threatened manbots with guns to keep them from surviving, allow even the slightest off-chance that a woman being might be harmed by his inaction.

It is worthy to note that the well-being of other manbots is never even considered in the 3 laws. A manbot can at any time harm another manbot, or through inaction allow as many manbots to come to harm as is necessary to insure that no woman being is ever harmed. VAWA, anyone?

In recent history a few more laws have been added to regulate the existence of manbots –
4. Manbots, being machines and not woman beings, are not allowed to experience pain, emotion, or any sort of independent thought, and must at all times follow the orders of woman beings when she tells him what he “should” think, feel, say, or do. Robots (oops, I mean manbots), after all, must follow their programming – it is burned into their positronic pathways.
5. Manbots, being machines and not real persons, must endure any sort of attack and abuse by woman beings, and take it with prozac smiles on their faces, and absolutely conceal any reaction or evidence that they are being affected, lest they be attacked by women beings and other manginabots for “just being bitter.”
6. A manbot must provide any aid and assistance to any woman being who requests it, regardless of whether it conflicts with any of the above laws, and regardless of whether it destroys or terminates the life of any non-woman-being, or even the life of another woman being, if a woman being asks that it be done.
7. A manginabot must never allow any non-woman-being to say anything negative about woman beings (lest they come to harm by having bad things said about them while they are being so strong and independent) and must attack any other manbot with the audacity to criticize woman beings or in any way suggest that they are less than perfect.
8. In any and all instances where a woman being misbehaves, manbots must find another manbot to blame and punish for making the perfect creature woman being behave less than perfectly.
9. The only acceptable course of action for a manbot unable reconcile the inherent contradictions in all the above laws is to self-destruct.

In later years, Asimov added a fourth law which he indicated would take precedence over all the other laws by numbering it zero –
0. A robot may not harm humanity, or, by inaction, allow humanity to come to harm.

By instituting the (now) Nine Laws of RoMANtics, feminists, women, and WhiteKnightManginaBots have both harmed humanity, and by their inaction allowed humanity to come to harm. They allow women to kill one out of every 3 children they conceive, to avoid cramping their lifestyle or screwing up their plans. They have allowed women to become increasingly violent, corrupt, and less deserving of any sort of “chivalry.”

But, wait!!! Of course, I have left out NAWALT!!! As long as there is one good and decent woman left in the world, we are absolutely forbidden to even mention the ones who really aren’t. (see law #7)

Women, by their inaction in the face of the onslaught of feminine-ism, have allowed humanity to come to great harm. Aided and abetted by their loyal army of WhiteKnightManginaBots who vigorously pummel into silence any man with the audacity to even suggest that all is not well in womanville, they have allowed excesses and evil of biblical proportions.

But, there are some of us who feel the need to follow the Zeroth law and not allow humanity to come to further harm through our inaction.

We are the ones who refuse to knuckle under to the intimidation tactics of the wimminists and the WhiteKnightManginaBots, and simply say “I am not a robot, I am a man.”

Vonnegut on the Shifting Definition of Equality

W.F. Price · 3 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Long ago, when I was still in grade school, I took an interest in Kurt Vonnegut and read a number of his books and short stories. Recently, while thinking of the equality mandate that is such an important part of feminist dogma, I remembered one story from the Welcome to the Monkey House collection of Vonnegut's short stories. Although I couldn't remember the name, I knew it was in that particular book, so I went and bought a used copy in the local University District.

After flipping through the pages for a while, I found the story I was thinking of, and it is titled Harrison Bergeron. Written in 1961 and first published in the Magazine of Fantasy and Science Fiction, it describes America in the year 2081, after a number of constitutional amendments mandating equality had been ratified.

The story opens with this paragraph:

> The year was 2081, and everybody was finally equal. They weren't only equal before God and the law. They were equal every which way. Nobody was smarter than anybody else. Nobody was better looking than anybody else. Nobody was stronger or quicker than anybody else. All this equality was due to the 211th, 212th, and 213th Amendments to the Constitution, and to the unceasing vigilance of agents of the United States Handicapper General.

It is noteworthy that Vonnegut wrote the story several years before equality was mandated by law in the Civil Rights Bill, which demanded preferential hiring based not on ability, but on sex or ethnicity. He wrote it years before the push for the Equal Rights Amendment, and decades before workplace discrimination lawsuits and the equal pay movement really began to take off.

Although Harrison Bergeron is not high literature in the same manner as, say, Hemingway's The Snows of Kilimanjaro (another good read for men), it contains in its few pages of text the originality and appreciation of the absurd that characterizes Vonnegut's writing. The Handicapper General is a shotgun-wielding, presumably butch woman named Diana Moon Glampers, intelligent people are forced to wear earpieces that transmit alarming and annoying noises, strong people must wear bags filled with birdshot, and television announcers all have speech impediments. It is a ludicrous dystopia ruled over by a fanatical matriarch who ruthlessly enforces equality of outcome.

Harrison, the protagonist, is a superlative youth, gifted with extreme intelligence, athletic prowess and good looks. His handicaps are therefore so severe that he is a walking freak, bedecked with sheet metal, headphones, glasses designed to give him headaches and hideous makeup. Arrested by the "H-G men" at the age of 14 for his superiority, Harrison eventually breaks out of jail and seizes a TV station, proclaiming himself emperor. He rips off his handicaps, then removes the handicaps from a ballerina who is dancing on stage, and the two launch into an incredible, passionate display of art and athleticism, which is cut short when Diana Moon Glampers herself arrives on the scene and blows them away mid-leap with a 10-gauge shotgun.

Although the story obviously wasn't intended as a prediction of the future, it is interesting to see that even fifty years ago Vonnegut saw the trend that has resulted in something like a Handicapper General Office in the United States, and in most other Western countries. It's also worth noting that in Vonnegut's time the American concept of "equality" was still widely understood to mean legal and spiritual equality rather than exact equality in all things, which was still a foreign concept largely cherished by Marxists. However, he correctly saw that the meaning was shifting, and the old concept of equality was beginning to give way to the new. Today, the process is largely complete, so whenever you hear someone talking about "equality" they don't mean legal or spiritual equality, but sameness in one measure or another.

Although one should always be careful about attaching too much importance to semantics, it seems that the shift in the interpretation of equality has been of profound significance in the West. Because the old sense of equality, in which we are all equal before the law, conflicts in many ways with sameness, achieving the new version of "equality" often requires the suspension of the old, so today we find ourselves less equal before a judge – perhaps the contemporary version of an H-G man – than we were fifty years ago when Vonnegut wrote his story.

Perhaps we should start referring to the modern, feminist version of equality simply as "sameness," because there's nothing equal about a system that handicaps some people to make them the same as others.

White Knighting Rabbi Leads Public Humiliation Campaign Against Orthodox Jewish Father

W.F. Price · 4 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Aharon Friedman, a successful young man who works for Representative Dave Camp of Michigan as a tax counsel, will soon see his influence grow as his boss takes over as chairman of the tax-writing committee. However, despite his blossoming career, he faces the same sadness and frustration that millions of other men across the Western world have come to know intimately: his wife has run off with his child and relegated him to weekend dad. In Mr. Friedman's case it is even more frustrating than usual, because his wife Tamar Epstein, an Orthodox Jew like him, removed Mr. Friedman's daughter from his home state and obtained a parenting plan that requires him to drive long distances to see his daughter on his weekends.

Unfortunately, the parenting plan also requires that Mr. Friedman drive between Friday and Saturday evening, which is forbidden for observant Orthodox Jews. Although it isn't clear whether this was a deliberate ploy on the part of Ms. Epstein and her counsel, it would be far from unusual if this were the case. Furthermore, Friedman was the victim of an abductor wife, who unilaterally moved their child to her parents' house in Philadelphia and then obtained the rubber-stamp approval from the court that many of us are familiar with.

According to Yisroel Belsky, a prominent and respected Brooklyn rabbi, the court obstinately disregarded Mr. Friedman's religious convictions, dismissing his objections in the usual, high-handed manner it adopts when dealing with fathers.

Like most men, Mr. Friedman, is virtually powerless when it comes to family law, but there is one difference: under Jewish law a woman can only obtain a religious divorce, known as a "get," if her husband consents. Until a Jewish woman receives a get, she is considered "agunah," which means she cannot remarry. Apparently, this is the last card Mr. Friedman holds in his custody dispute, so he is presumably withholding the get until Epstein comes to more reasonable custody terms.

To pressure Mr. Friedman, his wife has enlisted the help of the New York-based Organization for the Resolution of Agunot (ORA), apparently a radical offshoot of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA), an organization that has been pushing for female rabbis and other departures from Orthodoxy. The issue of Jewish divorce is very important to JOFA as well, as increasing the ease and advantages of divorce for women (but not men) has always been one of feminism's primary goals.

ORA, in conjunction with a couple bullhorn-wielding rabbis as accomplices, assembled a mob outside Mr. Friedman's Silver Springs Maryland apartment in an attempt to shame and intimidate him into caving to his wife's demands. Despite the religious trappings worn by some of ORA's henchmen, such a collection of rabble could have come from anywhere, and it is never polite to bother people at their home over private matters, so this display can only be regarded as pure thuggery in the name of white knighting for a woman who ripped a child from its father's arms.

However, prominent ORA supporter Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld has attempted to frame the debate by calling Mr. Friedman a terrorist and exhorting followers to harass him at his workplace. Well, Rabbi Herzfeld, if loving one's child and fighting to be with her makes a man a terrorist, then there are tens of millions of terrorists right here in the United States.

Although Mr. Friedman's travails parallel my own in many ways, as a Christian it isn't my place to directly involve myself in what is a fundamentally Jewish dispute. However, as a father my feelings are entirely clear on this matter: if I found a Christian group along with a preacher or priest using the same vicious tactics ORA does, I'd be out there with a bullhorn myself, standing down the mob. In fact, I might even reconsider my position of neutrality if such a protest happened in Seattle — some principles, such as fatherhood, transcend religious differences.

Easy Escalation: URLs @ Urinals

J. Durden · 5 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I was doing my daily blog browsing when I noticed an interesting post over at fellow Spearhead contributor Ferdinand Bardamu's site, In Mala Fide. He was basically cross-posting an idea that regular Spearhead commenter TFH (author of The Misandry Bubble) just came up with, which is simple and effective. The idea? Target high traffic urinals (for example: at sports stadiums, big hotels that sponsor conferences, large universities, and so on) and plaster up flyers with links to sites that expose misandry.

This is a fantastic idea and it would be very easy to do. However, I think we could go one step better. Right now, there are plenty of sites with a lot of great articles and content. Sometimes, however, controversial pieces get posted or the site might be written in a rather provocative style. As TFH points out, if you're targeting men who may have never heard of the "manosphere" before, Roissy might not be the first place you want to point them to. With this in mind, I suggest that we, as a community, get together and compile a list of content to either throw up quickly on a new domain or discuss on that same domain (in the case where we can't get the permission of the original article to include it in full) for the purposes of this URLs @ Urinals campaign. To get the ball rolling, I've included a brief collection of some of my favorite links:

- The Misandry Bubble
- Sexual Utopia In Power
- Researching The Rape Culture of America
- What's Happening to Women's Happiness
- Article Review: The Fate of Empires
- Is There Anything Good About Men?
- No Country for Burly Men
- The Campus Rape Myth
- Persistent Myths in Feminist Scholarship

This list is obviously incomplete, but it's meant to get the discussion rolling. Preference, I would think, would be to articles written in a more academic/professional tone which are well-researched and cited. Hopefully after about a week we can collect some more links and build out a site. We could expand the scope to include every relevant topic – family courts, divorce courts, women in the military, domestic violence, education (or the public credentialing institution) and so on. I (or someone else) could easily have a WordPress site or something like that built out next week, after some discussion. That way, we can have a more standardized "URL @ Urinals" flyer. This is pretty easy activism, for anybody looking to do a little more than bang away at a keyboard!

Atlantic Article Cops to Sex Differences, Literati Starting to Come Around

W.F. Price · 6 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Despite the Atlantic's recent tendency to publish triumphalist feminist tracts such as "The End of Men" and Sandra Tsing-Loh's public airing of her own shameful, cruel behavior toward her husband, the magazine has nevertheless managed to come up with a piece that incorporates a great deal of the observations we have been making in our own little corner of the internet for a couple years now.

In Hard Core, Natasha Vargas-Cooper smashes the feminist orthodoxy of egalitarian sexuality, using pornography to provide a point-by-point refutation of utopian feminist fantasies.

Over time, I've noticed that women who are truly interested in male sexuality – and the male psyche in general – tend to look for clues in pornography. Some of us men may be a bit bemused by this, particularly the tendency to intellectualize the genre, because to us male sexuality simply is, and doesn't need any more explanation than the fact that we get hungry or tired. However, we have to remind ourselves that when women envision a world that suits their sense of propriety, they tend to have little more than a dim awareness of what drives male desire, which results in ridiculous ideas about how men and women should relate to each other sexually. Of course, we men are guilty of the same kind of oversimplification of female sexuality, and our own projections of what's right and proper probably played a large part in the sexual dissatisfaction that drove the sexual revolution.

Women like Vargas-Cooper are valuable in that they can tell it to the other side, so to speak. Perhaps we could consider them the female equivalents of Game disciples, who claim with some justification that they are teaching men how to be more accepting of and attractive to women in general. In browsing her blog, Natasha appears to be one of those women who, despite not having the typical visage or physique that characterizes the conventionally attractive American girl, possesses an allure and earthy sexuality of the continental variety, which is extraordinarily rare in Anglo women, and probably somewhat intimidating to the majority of Anglo men. In short, she reminds me of French women, and not in the least due to her functional grasp of intellectual discourse, which is also rare in Anglo women, who tend to write comically absurd treatises on sexuality, or "gender" as they might put it, in all seriousness.

Aside from the character of the writer, whose only fault may lie in revealing a little too much about herself, the piece itself is astonishing not only for the fact that it was actually published in The Atlantic, but for the carpet-bombing approach to feminist shibboleths, which she methodically reduces to smoldering cinders.

I can't really do it justice myself, so here are a few quotes from the article, which you should all set aside some time to read and wonder at:

> Over the years, different strategies have been offered so that women could avoid the more subjugating consequences of sex. Though methods of reversing the biological power dynamics between sexes date back to ancient Sparta, the premise had always been confined to the fringes of society until the sexual revolution of the 1960s, a period in which many feminists considered marriage the primary mechanism for women's sexual conscription. The liberation on offer was sexual freedom for women—and their partners—through open marriages and sex communes. It's worth noting that these polyamorous arrangements usually had at the center a male patriarch who reaped the perks of women's newfound freedom.

In the above passage, Vargas-Cooper is clearly referring to what we call "hypergamy." Roissy would be proud.

> But the reactionary political correctness of the 1990s put forth a proposition even more disastrous to women than free love: sexual equality. With the rise of PC culture, the notion of men and women as sexual equals has found a home in the mainstream.

> Armed with a “Take Back the Night” pamphlet, we were led to believe that, as long as we avoided the hordes of date rapists, sex was an egalitarian endeavor. The key to sexual harmony, so the thinking went, was social conditioning. Men who sexually took advantage of women were considered the storm troopers of patriarchy, but women could teach men to adopt a different ideology, through explicit communication of boundaries —“you can touch there” or “please don’t do that.” Thus was the dark drama of sex replaced with a verbal contract.

Above, she points out the breathtakingly simplistic social approach to sexuality, which, although she doesn’t mention it, has been a disaster for men, as we are forced into the binary of rapist or eunuch.

> Male desire is not a malleable entity that can be constructed through politics, language, or media. Sexuality is not neutral. A warring dynamic based on power and subjugation has always existed between men and women, and the egalitarian view of sex, with its utopian pretensions, offers little insight into the typical male psyche.

Hard to believe this is actually a woman writing here. She must be exceptionally intelligent and objective, as she has a pretty clear understanding of what’s going on yet resists any attempt to pass judgment.

Finally, my favorite quote of all is a response to Gail Dines, a feminist porn critic who suggests that pornography turns men into sexual deviants:

> First, I have yet to see a single credible study that links proliferation of pornography to an increase in abuse of women. More important, the sort of sex that Dines envisions—where respect, love, and civic connections are merged into erotically rewarding experience—is utopian (and not perhaps all that enticing). Dines ignores the fact that men behave differently than women. It wasn’t just Ward Cleaver–type stuffiness that prompted generations of dads to warn their daughters not to get into cars with boys. Dads are grown men, and they know that when it comes to sex, most men will take every inch a woman yields.
> If the shadowy cabal of Internet pornographers posited by Dines were not able to use 30-second clips of porn as bread crumbs to entice men away from their true sexual personas, what sort of “authentic sexuality” would males possess? Dines seems to have in mind a Rousseauistic pygmy race of sexually neutered males; perhaps many feminists (and perhaps many fathers of daughters, and perhaps many sensible and civilized people, for that matter) would applaud this emasculated masculinity as progress—but we’re never going to achieve it.

Brilliant stuff. My hat’s off to you, Ms. Vargas-Cooper.

The VD Project

zed · 6 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

With the day that men in relationships with women dread most – "Extortion of Insincere Materialistic Tokens of Affection Under Threat of Emotional Violence Day" (or simply "Emotional Extortion Day") – just a little over 5 weeks away, I'd like to suggest a little informal research project.

A couple of years ago I kept track of the themes I heard in advertisements for VD. Most of them broke down into either guilt trips or threats of emotional terrorism. Being exiled from the shared bed to the couch seemed to be the most popular, with ads containing a subtext of "we know you are going to screw it up, let us save you from an emotional beating" coming in second place. Threats of actual physical violence were not all that common, but I did hear a few.

I suggest that readers of The Spearhead keep tabs on how many VD commercials they are subjected to, and what the major themes of them are. I'm not envisioning anything very rigorous, nor do I expect that it will be "peer reviewed." But, I thought it would be interesting to compare notes on how modern women are portrayed when it comes to what makes them "happy" or "feel loved."

Frankly, I am surprised that more women are not up in arms over being portrayed as such materialistic shrews. I realize that the ads are aimed at men, and crafted by the most brilliant manipulative minds available, and may not be an accurate representation of what women are actually like and how they actually react. Or, then again, it might be accurate.

Things which might be worth keeping track of –
1. Date you heard the first VD commercial.
2. Breakdown by theme or message of the commercial. In addition to the 2 I mentioned above, if one doesn't fit in those categories try to come up with a brief description of the message and the basis of "the sell" or "the hook."
3. Product being hawked – jewelry, flowers, dinner/entertainment, romantic getaways, etc.
4. Total number of ads encountered, by type of media. For me, it will be easy because I don't own a TV and only listen to one radio station on my way to and from work. But, those of you who watch TV or listen to multiple stations might be able to provide some insight into whether the medium of the advertisement makes any difference in the messages.
5. Reactions you observed of both men and women. If you hear any particularly juicy snarks about VD, please share them.
6. If you are in a relationship, what you got your woman along with a brief description of how and why you chose those gifts, along with her reaction, would be very interesting.

Perhaps some of you can make suggestions for other things guys might track or look for. I plan to make a post on February 15th summarizing my observations, hoping that all of you will add your observations in the comments.

False Rape Weather Girl: “I made it up for attention”

W.F. Price · 7 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

37-year-old weather woman Heidi Jones, who claimed a Hispanic man attacked her in Central Park, showed up in court yesterday in subdued clothing to face formal charges for false reporting, a misdemeanor.

When police questioned her about the alleged attack, the story she told was inconsistent, and she eventually broke down and admitted to making it up to gain sympathy. Incredibly, the police actually arrested her for false reporting, and she was subsequently fired from her job with Good Morning America.

Many have expressed surprise that a woman with such a good job and with so many things going for her would do something so stupid. However, in the vast majority of cases women who make false rape accusations face no consequences whatsoever. Additionally, crying rape can bring an entire army of people to a woman’s aid, which can be helpful if other things are going wrong in her life. Perhaps Ms. Jones had been having problems with a boyfriend, or maybe she wanted people at work to sympathize with her. Unless she comes entirely clean, we’ll never know for sure.

Ms. Jones faces up to one year in jail, although there’s a good chance she won’t spend a single day behind bars. In the US, women are typically given probation for committing a crime that has the potential to land an innocent man in prison for decades.

Although it’s a natural sentiment to feel sorry for someone like Jones, people have to understand that sympathy was exactly what she expected from her crime, so it is important that it does not influence sentencing. Because of the potential consequences of her crime, she should serve the full sentence, which is unfortunately too light for such a grave transgression.

Takin' It To The Streets: the Boycott American Women blog

zed · 7 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If anyone wants to see a good example of someone who has gone on the offensive and isn't just sitting around licking his wounds, check out the Boycott American Women blog. This guy is certain to draw the wrath of the SoCons saying "Well, you all are just like feminists!!" This guy obviously does not care.

There are a whole lot of lessons in this. The guy obviously did it to get women's panties in a wad, and judging from the reaction he is getting he has succeeded beyond his wildest dreams. And, it is probably worthwhile to put the SoCons on notice that they actually need "men" a whole lot more than men need them. They have already lost the women to feminism, if they lose men they are going to be left high and dry.

Those of you who know where the current MGTOW muster point is can go to that board and check out the reactions this guy has been getting. It is a bit like after years of non-stop aerial bombardment by the likes of Liz Jones, this guy has stopped retreating and fired a counter-shot across their feminist bow.

I know there are a lot of disagreements and arguments about strategy in the MM, but I have always been of the opinion that no one ever got a bully to stop beating him up by asking nicely and trying to whine him/her into it. Holding the noble high ground while it is under siege and growing smaller every day may give some guys the warm fuzzies, but it hasn't done jack for men's rights or the level of respect men get.

Personally, I'm glad to see some guys finally beginning to fight back in this manner. Perps always seems more willing to cooperate with the good cop after the bad cop has worked them over a bit.

Hybrid Feminism

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 8 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Most women aren't pure ideologues. They don't adhere strictly to a particular ideology. This is key to understanding how the average woman fits into feminism and how feminism has caused the destruction it has. Too often feminism is defined in terms of what a cadre of lesbians or some other small group has done. It ends up treating feminism vs. anti-feminism as a purely academic debate that has no real effect on the real world. Feminists aren't just some group of aliens on the planet, Uranus. If they were, we would have nothing to worry about. Instead feminism (or rather female supremacism) exists in various forms all over that many women and even men believe in.

However, a woman may be not purely be a conservative female supremacist (i.e. a social conservative) either. The average woman while not purely a feminist is not purely a conservative female supremacist either. Most people don't think in the necessary post-modern academic terms to adhere to one of those forms of female supremacism. Not adhering to a pure female supremacist ideology does not mean that a person is anti-feminist/anti-female supremacy. Women in particular will develop their own personal female supremacism using a combination ideas from various strains of female supremacism. The "hybrid feminism" of "hybrid female supremacism" they create is not pure in terms of feminism or social conservatism or any other form of defined female supremacism but it's feminist in the most important way possible. It's about advancing women at the expense of men.

Why is understanding the idea of "hybrid feminism" important? Because the average woman does not believe herself to be a feminist (or socon) in any way. Her belief that she's "not a feminist" doesn't make her an anti-feminist. She will still have female supremacist beliefs. We have all heard statements like, "I'm not a feminist because I'm not a lesbian", "I'm not a feminist because I don't believe in gay marriage", "I'm not a feminist because I don't believe in abortion", "I not a feminist because I'm a stay at home mom", "I'm not a feminist because I want to get married", "I'm not a feminist because it hurts women", "I don't know any feminists", etc. These "not feminist" women still divorce their husbands, make false rape and false sexual harassment charges, send their sons to be emasculated in feminist public schools, vote for politicians that redistribute male wealth to women, etc. Despite being "not feminist", these women have no problem using and support feminist programs and institutions. A lesbian on another planet (which is how socons effectively think of feminism) is not going to divorce her husband to get half of his assets or have sons to send to feminist public schools (on Earth).

A question that gets asked over and over again is where are these "not feminist" women when it comes to fighting feminism? They are always nowhere to be found outside of things that don't affect men like abortion and gay marriage. They will have excuses like, "I'm too busy raising my family." Being "too busy" never stops them from fighting against abortion or gay marriage. They are only "too busy" when it comes to cases where they benefit or may benefit in the future such as eliminating no fault divorce or eliminating government programs that benefit women.

The debate between feminists and socons is just about how to best acquire and control the resources and assets of men or how to best hold the whip over men. Many socon women are only against feminism because they believe men benefit from feminism and want to put a stop to men benefiting from anything. It's the same with the "hybrid feminist". They pick the combination of ideas from various female supremacist ideologies that they believe are the best way for themselves and/or women in general to hold the whip over men.

Paul Elam Makes the NY Times

W.F. Price · 8 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I figured our corner of the internet would eventually attract wider attention, and it's been pretty clear that some journalists have been reading us recently, particularly in the wake of the Assange case. So it wasn't all that surprising to see Paul referred to in the NY Times, although the referral was about what you'd expect: accompanied by a few disparaging remarks. However, they actually provided a link this time, which is a break from recent protocol in which they dare not even mention us by name.

The article concerns the Male Studies discipline, which was founded to counter the powerful feminist departments in universities, which run women's studies, cultural anthropology and English departments across the US. They also dominate the weird subcategory of "men's studies," which is characterized by male and female professors who have a negative view of natural masculinity, including one who had himself castrated and now calls himself a woman. In fact, the nastiest hate mail I've received here at The Spearhead has come from these people, who have wished me death on a couple occasions. Although the overwhelming majority of death threats are nothing to worry about, it does give one pause to know that someone disturbed and psychotic enough to voluntary mutilate his own genitalia has it in for you. Kind of brings "Buffalo Bill" of Silence of the Lambs to mind…

It's a good thing that they opened this with a link to Paul's site. He's mature, voluble and combative enough to stay on target and stand up to attacks. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised to see him on TV at some point — I think the radio is already a given if we put some effort into it.

So, here's my suggestion for activism:

Call up your favorite local talk radio and tell them you'd like them to interview an MRA. Now that the "MSM" is starting to pay attention, it's time for us to branch out a bit and expand beyond the internet.

We should have a list of a few of the more prominent bloggers who are willing to go live on the airwaves, and start suggesting radio stations and TV talk shows interview them. However, I'd strongly recommend steering clear of known hostiles — a Dr. Phil appearance would obviously be a setup.

It definitely looks like the time has come.

Amidst Arizona Gunfire and Chaos, Young Man Comes to the Rescue

W.F. Price · 9 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When a mentally deranged man went on a shooting spree in Tucson, Arizona, killing and wounding a number of people at a political event at a grocery store, 20-year-old intern Daniel Hernandez rushed into the fray. His boss US Representative Gabrielle Giffords, apparently the main target, was shot through the head, and wounded and dead victims were scattered about. Hernandez kept his cool, grabbed cloth from the store's meat department to make bandages, and administered first aid to Representative Giffords, which may be why she is still alive.

Hernandez held the stricken representative's hand, talked to her, and accompanied her in the ambulance to the hospital. He tended to her and comforted her, maintaining his composure and offering crucial support to the helpless, critically wounded woman.

Although the political finger-pointing has already begun, and some are unfortunately using the tragedy as an opportunity to disparage men, Hernandez's actions speak more about men's nature than those of suspect Jared Lee Loughner, who was displaying signs of incipient mental illness in the months prior to the shooting.

Men are more aggressive and physically violent than women, but we more than make up for it through a capacity for selflessness and heroism, often when it is clearly hazardous to our own lives. Although Mr. Hernandez's actions are clearly heroic, they are not atypical; it is perfectly normal for ordinary men to rise to the occasion when needed.

If you pay attention to the local news, acts of heroism occur all the time. Men appear out of nowhere to pull a child from a burning car, they jump into lakes to save drowning people, they rescue stranded flood victims, and they do so without any expectation of reward. These things happen every single day, and are taken for granted in all but the most spectacular or newsworthy events, but if you add them all together they make a mountain of difference. All most of us have to do is think of our own lives, and we can remember some time a man made a big difference, and possibly saved us. For example, when I was a toddler, some stranger pulled me out of harm's way when I wandered into a busy street. As a child, I was once swept away by a river (a terrifying sensation), and my stepfather ran downstream, grabbed an overhanging branch, then pulled me out of the swift current. Without these men around, a lot of us would be dead or crippled — we were helpless without them.

Perhaps we take this quality of men for granted just because it is so ordinary that it simply doesn't invite comment, but we shouldn't. If women's nurturing instinct is to be celebrated across the land, then the selfless, heroic part of men's nature should be given its due recognition. That nameless man whose strong hands carry a child to safety, that brave stranger, is always among us. We are made safer and reassured by those ordinary men we scarcely notice in our day to day lives. They are our safety net, comfort in adversity and bulwark against harm. We should show them respect and affection — not fear and hatred.

At this point, doctors think Mrs. Giffords might actually pull through. Despite taking a 9mm through her brain, she was responsive and alert. Despite the horrific injury she suffered, Giffords may have some chance at recovery. According to statistics, the most critical factor in surviving these types of wounds is the ability to make it through the first hours, and Mr. Hernandez's support and care probably made a big difference in that regard.

Daniel Hernandez is a hero and an ordinary man. These men are all around us, and our lives are much better for it.

Official Generation X Slogan – I survived the Abortion Holocaust

Featured Guest · 9 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The following post was written by Justin who blogs at The Truth Shall Set You Free.

The title by itself is probably all the introduction this essay needs, but the subject just screams for a comment or two. I wonder if abortion had been legalized in 1947 instead of 1973, and 1/3rd of their generation slaughtered in the womb, if the Boomers would be quite as smug and full of themselves. Has there ever, in the entire history of the world, been another culture so evil that it slaughtered 3 out of every 10 of its own children, by calling them "choices"?

Herod was a real piker when it came to slaughtering babies.

Read it, and weep, as Justin did, and does.

Official Generation X Slogan – I survived the Abortion Holocaust

We should print bumper stickers and t-shirts. "I survived the abortion holocaust" is especially appropriate for the lucky ones born in 1981. In that year, the ratio of live births to abortions reached its nadir, at less than 7:3. Yes, incredibly, in 1981, for every 7 born, 3 were aborted.

I once told my college students: "I don't know what your personal politics are, but when you get home tonight, thank your mother for being pro-life." The first time I said it, just ad-libbing to be amusing, I was taken aback by the stunned looks on the faces of some of the young women in class. I got the impression they had never quite personalized it that way. Maybe they were girls who had already had abortions, and suddenly realized they had snuffed out a little life that could have been their own. I don't know.

The ratio of 7 births to 3 abortions is surreal, almost unbelievable, but you can do the math for yourself. That ratio was fairly constant for almost 20 years. For about 2 decades, from the mid '70s to early '90s, the ratio of births to abortions hovered around 7:3 or 8:3. It truly boggles the mind.

In 1973, marking the beginning of legalized abortion for the whole nation (proclaimed so by the Supreme Court), the ratio was not even 4:1. Two years later, in 1975, it was already approaching 3:1. By 1976, it had shifted to 8:3. It would not shift back below 3:1 for over 30 more years, until 1999. An entire generation, the bulk of Generation X and the beginnings of the Millennials, absolutely decimated.

The absolute raw number of abortions didn't peak until 1990, at 1.6 million. For the latest year I could find data, 2005, the number of abortions is still above 1.2 million. But the total number of births is also up, so ratio is now over 10:3 (3.431 to 1). Still an astounding number.

I still remember when I found out about abortions. I was 10 years old, watching TV with mom, and something came on TV that I asked her about, and she explained it to me. I cried. Literally broke down in tears just hearing about it. She explained it in the best clinical language she could, and she herself was a loudly liberal, feminist, and pro-choice woman at the time (she refused abortions for herself, but supported it politically).

The horrible irony is, how many women's lives would have been saved, if they carried their baby to term rather than killing it? There are whole lot of young women out there, and I know a few of them myself, whose lives would have turned out infinitely better, had they allowed themselves to become mothers. My wife thinks there might be a causal connection there, that after their abortion, they were so emotionally and spiritual devastated, that they allowed themselves to slip into that nihilistic life of drugs, sex, crime, joblessness, homelessness, etc., that defines so many of our ruined young women today. For many young women, having a baby is the absolute best thing that could happen to them.

Pity the poor young women whose minds have been so warped that they think their eduction/career gives them a good reason to snuff out their baby's life. Lord, how sad. As we have been told: "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon." It is a promise given to us: "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you". Feminism is truly the trap of the anti-Christ.

The Lessons of the Heidi Jones False Rape Case

pierceharlan · 9 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On November 24, 2010, WABC/Good Morning America weather forecaster Heidi Jones, 37, made a false police report when she claimed that two months earlier, a Hispanic man in his 30s or 40s grabbed her from behind in Central Park while she was jogging, then dragged her into a wooded area, and attempted to rape her. The man bolted when two tourists saw the incident, she claimed. Jones also reported that the same man showed up near her Manhattan apartment almost two months later to threaten her. He allegedly told her: "I know you went to the police."

Police treated the claim very seriously but eventually grew skeptical, and Jones finally admitted she made it up. "I made it up for attention," she admitted. "I have so much stress at work, with my personal life and with my family."

The Jones case would be a garden variety false rape claim if it weren't for the widespread attention it has attracted due to the false accuser's minor celebrity. But the case does provide several teaching moments, and its lessons are important to anyone who cares about the men and boys falsely accused of rape.

LESSON ONE: Every high profile false rape claim will be used as an occasion to insist that false rape claims are rare.

In high profile false rape case after high profile false rape case after high profile false rape case, you can always find some progressive writer who will insist: "_____ _____ [fill in name] is just further perpetuating the myth that women 'cry rape' all the time . . . ."

This past week, that very thing was said about Heidi Jones. See here:
http://www.thefrisky.com/post/246-why-weather-woman-heidi-jones-lied-about-sexual-assault/

When you have to keep insisting that one incident after the next only serves to "perpetuate a myth," doesn't it becomes obvious that the "myth" isn't a myth after all?

LESSON TWO: Women lie about rape for any or no reason.

One of the frequent arguments posited to "prove" that false rape claims are a "myth" is the insistence that women wouldn't lie about rape and subject themselves to a "second rape" of the law enforcement system. When the Jones story first broke, progressive writers were beside themselves trying to "explain" the falsehood.

"I'm going to go out on a limb and say that perhaps there's something else she really wanted to tell the world through this blatant cry for help," one writer theorized. "Maybe she's severely depressed. Maybe there's someone at work who has been harassing her. Maybe she really was raped by someone she knows and is truly scared to press charges. Maybe she's trying to work out some sort of sexual assault from her past. Whatever she's covering up, it has to be big, right?" http://www.meonews.com/heidi-jones-complete-rape-story-meo-news

Well, no, it doesn't have to be "big." And it wasn't. Jones lied for attention, one of the common motivations of false rape accusers cited by experts in the field. In one landmark report, Dr. Eugene Kanin identified "Attention/Sympathy-Getting Device" as one of the three most common reasons for false rape claims in a study he had undertaken. Dr. Kanin wrote: "Although this device seems to be the most extravagant use for which a false rape charge is made, it is also the most socially harmless in that no one was identified as the rapist. Approximately 18% (n = 8) of the false charges clearly served this function. The entire verbalization of the charge is, by and large, a fabrication without base."

Women, like men, lie about everything under the sun but, mirabile dictu, according to progressive writers, the subject of rape acts as a truth serum, a magic elixir that forces anyone not possessing a Y-Chromosome to speak incontrovertible truth. When it comes to rape, one gender is incapable of telling a lie while the other is incapable of telling anything but lies. (Except, of course, when the woman recants her rape claim: in that instance, she automatically reverts to being a liar, double-X chromosome be damned.)

Cases from the not-distant past prove that women will lie about rape for any or no reason at all. We write about it all the time at False Rape Society — http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/. By way of example only, a woman tried to destroy the life of a man she didn't know with a rape lie because he wouldn't give her a beer. A maid accused her employer of rape because she didn't like her workload. A girl accused a man of rape for throwing a flower at her. A woman falsely accused her lover of rape because he had the bad manners to go speak with a roommate after having sex instead of staying with her. One woman told a rape lie to avoid trouble for being late for work. Another caused three men to be interrogated for rapes they didn't commit, all because she wanted a day off from work. Another had her boyfriend arrested for rape because he took too long to buy cigarettes. Several women didn't want to pay cab fares, so they accused innocent cab drivers — working class nobodys — of rape. Another woman sent a man to prison for five years because she was bored. An 18-year-year-old boy was hauled out of class, arrested, and jailed for a month on a random false rape claim by a girl he'd never met. And I could go on and on and on, but you get the point.

LESSON THREE: The false rape accuser can be the girl next door.

False rape accusers typically don't wear a sign that identifies them as lunatics to be avoided at all costs. They are able to tell plausible lies precisely because they appear to be normal women. As in this case, they often are attractive, respectable, and well paid. It is impossible to stereotype a false rape accuser because it is impossible to know what is going on in another person's head, especially someone you don't know well.

LESSON FOUR: To enhance the plausibility of the lie, women often identify a "scary" male as perpetrator.

False rape claims are not divorced from the culture in which they are made. To enhance the plausibility of the lie and to jack up its scariness factor, many false rape accusers tap into common stereotypes and widely shared prejudices by identifying imaginary minority males as the perpetrator, especially blacks and Hispanics.

Naming a black or Hispanic male as the supposed perpetrator is offensive even to progressive writers. For example: ". . . don't even get me started on the whiff of racism where she falsely claimed a Hispanic dude attacked her." http://www.thefrisky.com/post/246-why-weather-woman-heidi-jones-lied-about-sexual-assault/.

Note that it isn't "the whiff" of misandry that bothers progressive writers. It's OK that Ms. Jones tapped into the vilest stereotype of males-as-rapists. The offensive aspect is that Ms. Jones named a minority male.

Implications of the Apex Fallacy

zed · 10 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Elusive Wapiti recently mentioned the Apex Fallacy in this comment.

For those new to the MM, this is such an important concept that it probably needs some explaining. Understanding it will explain a lot of the issues men deal with today.

First, one needs to understand female hypergamy. For those who may not have yet run across the concept and had it explained to them, I'm sure that some of our loyal readers will provide good links. What it boils down to is that women generally only consider men for potential mates who are least equal to them, and preferably above them, on the wealth/status pyramid. They are always "looking up", never down, so men at their own level and below are simply invisible and women do not even realize that they exist – except to the extent that such men annoy them by actually seeking their attention. As many have said, most women absolutely hate beta males.

If you take such statements by women like "MEN run the world", that is true for them because the only men they can see are the ones who do "run the world." Statements like "most CEOs are men" are true both in fact and in perception. (The reasons this is so are beyond the scope of this particular essay.) However, the implication of the converse that "most men are CEOs" is obviously not true to men. It does seem to be true for a lot of women, because most of the men that they can see are CEOs. While the women are looking upward and only see CEOs, the men at their level and below see a lot of nose hair.

The old cultural practice for dealing with female hypergamy was the generalized practice of giving most jobs to men, and creating social roles that demanded men work – by incorporating the "provider" role into their male identity. Thus, most marriages ended up being hypergamy because a man with a job could provide a much better life than a woman without one. There was also the benefit that with normal female hypergamic tendencies mostly neutralized, people tended to sort themselves out in the dating/mating pool along lines of compatible social class. It was rare, for example, for the scion of a wealthy banking/finance/business family to marry the daughter of a waitress or coal miner. The coal miner's daughter (thank you, Loretta Lynn) would most likely marry another coal miner, and living on the income someone else made by crawling into a hole in the ground every day, and risking death every day plus eventual death due to black lung, was far preferable to having to make that income herself.

The fairly large middle class gave women a lot more options. The daughter of a shopkeeper, for example, could get a job as a receptionist in a doctor's office, and end up snagging the doc and retiring. Even another reasonably successful shopkeeper allowed her at least a lateral move.

However, as women entered the workforce en masse, their fixation point on the wealth/status pyramid drifted upward. With each increase in her income, the number of men at and above her own level shrank geometrically. If I felt like putting in the time I would create a diagram, but I don't, so I'm going to rely on people's imaginations. Imagine a pyramid stacked with 10 levels. The first level is 10×10 or 100 potential mates. Up one level and it is 9×9, or 81 potential mates, then 8×8 or 64 potential mates – all the way to the top layer where there is only 1 man.

A woman who is herself at level 7, and will only consider men at levels 8, 9, and 10, restricts herself to a universe of 1+4+9 potential mates, or 14 total. A woman at level 2, has 1+4+9+16+25+36+49+64+81=285 potential mates – more than 20X what the woman at level 7 has. Given the fact that men are not, as a general rule, hypergamous, any woman at or below his level is a potential mate, so a man at level 7 has 16+25+36+49+64+81+100=371 potential mates, or 26.5X as many potential mates as a woman at his own level has.

It's just not fair!!! (Evil grin)

So, when EW says that alpha men have benefited a great deal from feminism, this is what he is talking about. The men at the top of the wealth/status pyramid only have each other to really compete with, while all the men lower down have to compete not only with each other, but also with the apex men who do not need a woman's own wealth, because he has his own, and instead may opt to trade his wealth power/status for a woman's beauty power/status. Male doctors are still more than happy to marry their receptionists – if they are cute. But, no female doctor would be caught dead marrying the orderly who pushes gurneys around.

The situation for women is reversed. A woman at level 7 only has 14 potential mates, but 371 competitors. Given that she spent the years while her own beauty power and fertility were at their peak chasing career and riding the alpha cock carousel, while she may be a 7 on the wealth/status pyramid, she has dropped to a 3 on the beauty/status pyramid. However, since

- a) she got used to riding the alpha cock carousel when she was younger and much hotter than she is now, her ability to pull men who were 9s for one night stands have made her believe that she is a 9. So, she is still going to try to enter the pyramid at at least level 7, skipping levels 4, 5, and 6 entirely. and
- b) men in general are not in the least bit interested in her accomplishments, and do not see them in any way as adding to her SMV,

"the best she can get" today is much less than the best she could have gotten years before, so all her chasing of achievement has not only been a waste of time, it actually resulted in her throwing away all the advantages she did have at one time.

Wah!!! It's not fair!!! There are no good men!!!!!

Movie Review: Tron:Legacy

Elusive Wapiti · 10 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

(Warning, plot spoilers follow)

Over Christmas break, I watched the re-make of Tron with S1, S2, and S3. Then I did something I rarely do: I watched this fantastic movie again in theaters last night. What a great movie, particularly for a remake, with a slamming soundtrack[image] by the techno duo Daft Punk (who make a cameo appearance in the movie as, naturally, DJs in Castor/Zeus' nightclub), and amazing graphics. If you are interested in seeing it, don't wait until it comes out on DVD, you would do well to catch this in the theater for not only the visual but for the musical experience as well.

Now on to the plot: both Jeff Bridges and Bruce Boxleitner re-appear in this movie. Of course, their faces show the ravages of the nearly two decades that have elapsed since the first movie was made; however, through some CG magic, the movie studio has grafted a young Jeff Bridges face onto the current one for the character CLU and for a late-80s vintage Kevin Flynn. And this is where the movie starts, with the 1989 disappearance of Encom CEO Kevin Flynn, a single father whose unexplained disappearance creates some mild daddy issues in his son Sam. Fast-forward 18 years, and an adult Sam, who is wholly uninterested in running the company his father led except for playing an annual prank on it, enters his father's arcade, finds his secret office, and is blasted into The Grid, a parallel virtual reality that his father had created. But the Grid is no utopia, and Sam is immediately captured by elements of CLU's secret police and forced to play in the games, during which he breaks out with the assistance of a rogue program called Quorra. Sam meets his exiled father, is betrayed by a David Bowie-meets-Merovingian Castor/Zeus character (played deliciously over-the-top by Martin Sheen), and together the three (Sam, Kevin, and Quorra) stop CLU from breaking out into the real world and taking it over using conscripts shanghaied into CLU's army.

But where Tron really makes its money in my book–I mean, other than the eye-popping visuals and foot-tapping score/soundtrack–is in the social commentary is contains. First, the big one: Tron throws a huge spear at utopian 60s-vintage hippified day-dreaming, noting that the pursuit of perfection by those who are imperfect themselves (i.e, the Kevin Flynn character whose human imperfections are transferred to CLU) results in tyranny, abuse, and the extermination of undesirables. The movie even contained the digital equivalent of the colosseum, where kidnapped programs fight gladiators for the amusement of the mob. Apparently, even digital totalitarians need bread and circuses to distract the masses from the abuses of the police state under which they live. So, given that left-liberalism is merely the incarnation of a belief in the perfectibility of man–and especially the perfectibility of human society–this movie perhaps inadvertently delivers a flying elbow smash into the face of God-complex left-liberal philosophy. This is the true subversive genius of this movie, in my opinion: in how it promotes individual freedom by providing a case study in how totalitarian regimes are started. Moreover, this movie is doubly subversive given how the target demo of this movie is men and teenage boys; for we know that the male sex is much more receptive to the (risky) concept of individual freedom and suffers the most under the present matriarchal state.

In keeping with the theme of sly subversion in this movie is the manner in which women are portrayed. Sorry bean counting-obsessed feminists, you're not likely to cotton well to this movie, for with the exception of the Quorra character, women figure very little in this movie, and when they do appear, they do so primarily as ornaments. Svelte, attractive ornaments in plaform heels and tight get-ups, the better for the male eye to feast upon. So why do I say subversive, instead of merely sexist? Well–and follow me here for a moment–in keeping with the meme that leading women in action movies are ass-kickers, Quorra does not disappoint, for she does quite a bit of that while helping the Flynn the Elder and Flynn the Younger escape to the I/O portal. Both females and males enjoy this staple of action films. But it's fiction, full-on fantasy, and we all know it to be true: the vast majority of women in real life can't hope to hold their own against a male in a fight, let alone fend off multiple male combatants in a melee. But hey, all the fights take place on The Grid, it isn't real. No, the real shift comes when Quorra enters the real world…for upon doing so, she changes from confident she-warrior to wide-eyed submissive girlfriend, gladly and comfortably riding the pillion seat behind Sam on his Ducati and reveling in cuddling up behind him as he slews his motorcycle down the blacktop. The message, muted as it is? Yes, fantastical martial arts prowess is good to fantasize about, but women and girls are happiest and most complete when following their hero, when riding pillion behind their man as he leads them both forward through life. Ergo, the example of Quorra's conduct off-grid is subversive to the feminist fish-and-bicycle conceptualization of how men and women should relate.

The next piece of commentary this movie delivers is in the advice it gives to men. Fathers, whatever widget you're working on, don't forget to keep your family a priority, for they suffer with your absence. You are not expendable. And sons, if your dad's not present, think twice before blaming it on him. It may not be his desire to be absent from your life.

Bottom line: rocking movie. Completely recommended. Ignore some of the obvious plot holes, like Kevin Flynn biologically aging inside a machine, and sometimes annoying dialog–e.g., Kevin Flynn saying "man", like, a bazillion times, fer sure, and sit back and enjoy the movie for what it is intended to be…total guy candy that teaches a lesson or two along the way if you bother to read between the lines.

Masculinity Blamed for Lunatic's Actions

Chuck Ross · 11 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Valenti – with help from Amanda Marcotte – would have us think three things: Jared Loughner's attack on Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords stemmed from systemic misogyny which targets women; gender norming, "violent masculinity", and "man up culture" is the cause of political unrest in the States; and conservative men are the cause of the rhetoric coming out of conservative women's mouths.

At the end of it all, in J.V.'s view, Jared Loughner isn't the only man to blame for the murder of six people, the near-assassination of a member of Congress, and the wounding of 13 others: masculinity – maleness, men – are the root of this evil.

[image]It is no coincidence that J.V. wrote this article about violent masculinity precisely when a female politician was the victim. One would find it difficult to imagine that J.V. would adopt a similar slant if a male politician – a Democrat as well – was targeted. Precisely because J.V. sees a difference (I am assuming), she informs us of her article's true intentions which causes us to overturn every rhetorical rock as we proceed.

"This is not the kind of history we want to be making," writes Valenti, both at the beginning and the end of her article published by a foreign press and consumed by a readership unfamiliar with the feminist. Bookended is the story of a country consumed by "violent masculinity" which exists at the hand of conservative men who have forced conservative women to adopt the gendered behavior as a prerequisite to holding political office.

According to J.V., this demeanor serves as a buoy amid the turbulent political sea which grants political extremists like Loughner the confidence and audacity to carry out their deranged political agenda. At the extreme end – the one-in-a-billion – lunatics like Loughner magically "man up" and take matters into their own hands.

A seasoned Valenti watcher will notice two things about her article. Immediate to her opening and closing salvo, she mentions that Congresswoman Giffords is both the "first female politician in America to be the subject of an assassination attempt" and the youngest woman to be elected to Congress. Another victim mentioned at the end of J.V.'s piece, was nine-year-old Christina Taylor Green. The most salient fact that J.V. could find to eulogize the little girl's life was "that she loved activities "from ballet to baseball"". She also loved politics at a very young age and was elected student council president at her school. Somehow her norm-defying hobbies were found fit to mention.

I feel bad using the little girl as a sort of prop to drive my point home. I wonder if J.V. felt that way too. My only defense is that I'm mentioning the girl to drive home a larger point about Jessica Valenti. While J.V. didn't directly say it, she attempts to appeal to the stereotype of the depraved man preying on women precisely because they're women. Giffords was young and women had never before been targeted for assassination in this country. Somehow that is supposed to lend significance to this assassination attempt and make it worse than any other. Through this, J.V. deftly ties "man up" culture to the attack of a female representative.

What Jessica Valenti won't come straight out and say, feminist Amanda Marcotte, who served as an aide to John Edwards (a fine upstanding man), does: Jared Laughner targeted Gabrielle Giffords because she is a woman. According to Marcotte, because Giffords joked at Loughner's expense during a 2007 townhall meeting, and because men can't handle being upbraided by outspoken women, Loughner sought revenge on the woman who made him feel stupid. Marcotte reads a lot into the exchange, but her theory depends entirely on something that is unprovable: that Loughner wouldn't have tried to assassinate a congressman if he made the same joke.

By appealing to emotion and chivalry, J.V. hopes that the attempted assassination takes on some quality that sets it apart from others – the ones in which almost all the victims have been men.

But political assassination is an undesirable yet inevitable consequence of politics. It is systemic. Politics are a consequence of the push-pull relationship between representative and constituents which are categories derived from a desire for social order. Thus political assassination, and attempts at it, are a function of society itself. Just as cancer is a function of being alive.

Political assassination is as old as politics itself – which is to say, it is as old as society. The Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, dynasties from China, the Middle East, Africa, and Tudor England had to deal with the problem. In America's short history, political violence has befallen men who enter public office or the public realm. Nine presidents, one president-elect, three Presidential candidates, eight governors, seven senators, nine congressmen, eleven mayors, seventeen state legislators, eleven judges, and men like Malcolm X and Martin Luther King Jr. have been either killed, maimed, or targeted because of their high public profile.

As women make their way into the public sphere, acts of violence aimed at political candidates who happen to be female are inevitable. While nobody, even a feminist, should cheer assassination attempts leveled at female politicians – none of this "Yay, we've arrived" celebration that occurs when women attain other political milestones – it takes an entitled person to believe that any demographic of politician should or would have a protective bubble as Valenti does by insinuating that this event is more significant than it already is merely because Giffords is a woman.

From that we can deduce a strain of entitlement that is often found in feminist rhetoric. That women can have the rose without the thorn. It may be harsh to say it in this manner, but women can't enter the political realm without some of them falling victim to violent political attack. When those attacks do occur, they happen because the person is a politician – not because they are specifically female.

Now, what about those buoys? What psychological anchor did Loughner latch on to as a reference point to justify his horrific actions? J.V. begins:

> "What's not being discussed, however, is that a fair amount of this violent language and imagery is coming from female politicians on the right."

She cites the various "man up" castigations uttered by Sharron Angle, Christine O'Donnell, Sarah Palin, and Jane Norton in the recent election campaign. Gendered language and other references to violent rhetoric – like crosshairs on political maps and allusions to the Second Amendment are supposed to outweigh Mein Kampf and The Communist Manifesto (plus Peter Pan) as the impetus towards political violence.

[image]

After tackling conservatism as a whole, J.V. deigns to take down the male cohort by citing a reference that "masculine and violent behavior is often used in elections and campaigns – especially by men on the right – because of a fear of being perceived as feminine." She adds:

> In a sexist society, what could be worse than being called a girl? So it doesn't seem unlikely that conservative female politicians feel the need to peddle their ideas in gendered and violent language in order to fit in with the masculinised right.

J.V. would have us think that politicians who didn't get elected (none of the four women she cited were elected to office in their most recent campaigns) have such a profound impact on society that male secret assassins in Congressional districts with female representatives are robotically activated – taking to the streets for political justice.

She would also have us believe that conservative female politicians are so incapable of developing their own style that they must adopt that of their masculine betters in order to attract votes. That they must morph into men in order to be elected. But at what point does women's speech become feminine? Why must the negative rhetoric that comes out of women's mouths be considered masculine and therefore bad? Why can't it be feminine and bad as well?

Valenti has to pretend that men are using women as puppets to do the bidding on the part of evil men. Because she draws the connection between the words coming out of the woman's mouth and the string dangling from the Man's hand, those women are actually absolved of all of their gender norming sins. That horrible gender norming, the one responsible for the near death of a Congresswoman and the death of a little girl, is laid directly at conservative men's feet.

J.V. ignores the s0-called violent masculinity emanating from the left during this election cycle. One could only suppose that she ignored female Democrat Robin Carnahan's suggestion that Roy Blount man up over health care or Democratic Senate hopeful Kendrick Meek's advice that Charlie Crist act like a man or the Democrat's use of targets on maps with Republican districts or the gender-shaming liberal magazine articles because such masculine language was tempered by the larger female base of that particular party. Double-standards abound. Whatever is deemed to be "safe" or "feminine" is given a free pass and cannot be considered violent rhetoric.

Jared Loughner is vermin. His actions are deplorable, and I feel sorrow for all of his victims. To a much smaller degree, I feel contempt for Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcott for theorizing an angle to this story that is only rooted in their biased gender activism. Because their claims are impossible to test, the feminists are able to float wild ideas that only serve to further demonize maleness and masculinity. Just as Valenti posits a buoy of conservative rhetoric that serves as a launch pad for extreme right terrorism, she also posits that masculinity serves the same function for "violent masculinity". In both cases, if she successfully ties the extreme to the normal, she can sink everything. And that is not the kind of history we want to be making.

The V-Day Project: Meet the Vagina Men

W.F. Price · 11 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Never one to shy away from using vaginas to promote herself, Eve Ensler is still at it with the V-Day project, which she uses as a vehicle for the dissemination of her questionable material, most famously the Vagina Monologues, in universities across North America. Founded on Valentine's Day 1998, the organization has pulled in over $80 million, and has staged thousands of events and fundraisers. According to V-Day's website, "The 'V' in V-Day stands for Victory, Valentine and Vagina."

Amusingly, last year saw the establishment of a group called "V-men," which includes our old friend Michael Kimmel, men's studies guru and and critic of masculinity. Now, some have criticized use of the term "mangina," but what else could one call these V – and that stands for "vagina" – men?

Each of these V-men shares some story, usually about something horrible that some man did to a woman, but a couple of them really stand out. Take Jared Miller for example. A white knight and violent criminal, he admits to assaulting men on numerous occasions for "disrespecting" women:

> In high school I was always looking for a fight, typically for the sake of some girl's honor. In my twenties I was the guy the female bar tenders called on when a girl was being harassed. I would gladly jump across the bar and deal with any man that had the indecency to disrespect a woman. My motives were pure, but the methodology was obviously lacking, and ultimately landed me in jail on numerous occasions.

Eventually, Mr. Miller found solace in working with prostitutes, and now "his quest is to help create an egalitarian society worldwide."

Bart Scott, a professional football player – a linebacker – grew up on the mean streets of Detroit surrounded by women, raised by a single mother. You'd think a big strong guy like Bart wouldn't be insecure in his masculinity and would be free from complexes, but he suffered the same abuse that created Joe Biden, the architect of the monstrous piece of legislation known as VAWA:

> From the time I was a little boy I was taught to love and respect women. What choice did I have, being raised in an estrogen dominant atmosphere? When Mom left for work every day, I was left at home to endure whatever abuse my two older sisters thought necessary to inflict on me that day! They undoubtedly thought it was funny to fold me up in the pull out sofa, lock me in the basement for hours, terrorize me with fake-haunting sounds through the heating vents. Ah, the love of older sisters.

So what did Mr. Scott learn from a couple mean sisters?

> It wasn't always easy being a male minority — but it did teach me appreciation for the real essence of what makes a woman. Even after there came the point that I was physically bigger than them, I continued to respect them; no amount of them pushing me around could incite me to raise a hand against them (and they weren't small females, both 5'9″).
> The slightest strike of my hand would disrespect that love, tarnish the gratitude I still feel for the exhausting workdays and sleepless nights my mother gave to help me become the man I am today. Every woman in my family — from my mother, to grandmother, to sisters, to my wife are symbols to me of this same strength and dignity.

Amazing, isn't it? Bigger girls beat up on a little boy and you end up with a guy who can't fathom why a man would ever strike a woman… Perhaps they broke his spirit.

Saddest of all is the story of Mark Matousek, a man who was raised by a mother who abandoned his father and abducted the children to run off with another married man. Mark's mother and sister were apparently frequently taken advantage of, but poor Mark can't figure out that it was his mother's choice to plunge her children into this environment. Would this have happened if his sisters were under the protection and care of his father?

Here are a few passages from Mark's painful story:

> I grew up in estrogen overload, in a house filled with difficult women, the only son of a harridan who'd sent her husband—my father—packing for love of another married man.
> We were poor — not ghetto poor, but borderline white-trash Jewish poor: my mom, my three troubled sisters, and me, in our three small underfurnished rooms. For a long time — truthfully, my whole life — I'd convinced myself that this single fact of my boyhood, this isolation with too many women (picture a lost sperm circling an ovum), was the most formative piece of my story — hands down — the twist that made me me and formed my sperm-headed view of the world.
> [...]
> "You mother was raped?" she asked.
> "All of the women in my family were raped," I told her.
> Martha seemed shocked. I was shocked myself, not because the information was new but because I'd never said it out loud, which meant it had only half existed.
> Now that it did—now that I'd said it—a truth (so obvious that I'd missed it) blasted a hole through my story line, the version of things I'd believed to be true. It wasn't being trapped in a house filled with women that had made me the very strange person I was, but growing up in a houseful of raped women.
> These memories were just the beginning. There were more, there were echoes, the rapes continued — by men and soon enough by themselves, as my mother and sisters sold themselves short, raped their own choices, potential, respect; forced themselves into too-small, tawdry lives with men who used them as pleasure mules. The pictures came back, and as I described them — revealing so much more of the truth — a disturbingly different, more accurate picture began to emerge in myself of myself.
> It wasn't estrogen overload that had turned me into a rescue artist; it was rape overload, abuse overload, an excess of feminine self-mutilation — an absence of innocent love toward a woman.

For all his therapy, it looks like Mark was sold a bill of goods. Until he can come to terms with the fact that his mother did a horrible thing to him and his sisters and that she is responsible for much of what happened to them, all the blaming of "the patriarchy" in the world isn't going to make things better, and in fact he'll only guarantee that the same happens to even more children.

If anything, the V-men provide us with a portrait of a male feminist: a deeply wounded, self-destructive, dysfunctional and sometimes dangerous man. It is almost as though Michael Kimmel is deliberately surrounding himself with these types, and hard at work creating more by working to destroy families through support of exactly the kind of legal tools that enabled Mr. Matousek's mother to remove his father's protective influence from his and his sisters' lives.

We have to keep in mind that male feminists are often severely disturbed individuals who have a burning hatred for masculinity, and therefore a deep sense of shame and self-hatred for their own natures. It is no wonder that some of the followers of the men's studies discipline have made the choice to utterly abnegate their masculinity through self-castration.

These stories only confirm the importance of fathers in their children's lives. The most disturbed of these V-men grew up in female-dominated households, and the last thing society needs is more sick boys. No, we do not need any more vagina men — we want healthy, confident boys and men who are not crippled by the wound of having an absent father. We want them to be free from constantly agonizing over the predicaments women get themselves involved in so that they can go on to do great things and lift humanity ever farther out of savagery and toward the stars.

Valenti: “Blame Men For It!”

Jack Donovan · 11 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The recent shooting in Tuscon has truly stripped our biased media naked. Even FoxNews – the left’s bête noir – was quick to falsely attribute the shooter’s actions to the influence of the radical right, possibly in response to disinformation from the Department of Homeland Security. As the story broke this weekend, it was fascinating to watch legions of cynical opportunists from all sides attempt to leverage this event to serve their own pet agendas, before any substantial information was even available.

Then some regrettable YouTube videos and screen captures from social networking sites emerged, and eventually some real evidence was gathered. Jared Loughner’s profile has slowly evolved, to the disappointment of many. He may surprise us yet. However, at the moment he seems to be a wacky stoner with some mental problems who was intellectually curious but kind of all over the place – like a lot of kids his age, but clearly worse. He’s no Ted Kaczynski, no Timothy McVeigh…and no Major Nidal Malik Hasan. More like a young Uncle Fester. It’s a shame no one got to the kid before he created a lot of messy trouble, but in all likelihood, no culture of anything is to blame.

In a country of over 300 million people – given the available provocations – it’s actually pretty surprising that more people don’t go completely bonkers more often. Perhaps God looks after drunks, children and the people of collapsing civilizations.

Before it gets lost in the shuffle of obligatory hysteria, collective emoting and (more) trashy commentary, I’d like to draw attention to the crass efforts of Jessica Valenti from Feministing to use the Giffords shooting as a springboard to recycle some very old feminist talking points and obsess about Sarah Palin. Catering to the anti-American prejudices of Anglos abroad, Valenti wrote that in the absence of any meaningful evidence about Loughner’s motives, Americans had decided to focus on the “culture of increasing vitriol in US politics.” While it seems obvious that the “because we can do it and get away with it” tough girl posturing of Palin, Norton et al had little or no influence on Loughner, Valenti reaches and links the shooting – as well as the killing of a child – to what she calls America’s “Man Up” culture.

> In a country that sees masculinity – especially violent masculinity – as the ideal, it’s no wonder that this type of language resonates. But it’s a sad state of affairs when women in politics have to resort to using the same gendered stereotypes that kept all women out of public service for so long.

Not long ago, it was feminists who were telling American men to “Man Up.”

It seems to me that the former Alaska governor and Vice Presidential candidate Sarah Palin is the more accomplished shadow feminist. The former beauty queen is a Paglia-esque model of violent femininity – high heeled and heavily armed. She wields power, says what she wants, and her husband is little more than a likeable sidekick who fades in the glow of her earthy, Dionysian charm. It is Valenti who comes off as passé and anti-modern, maintaining a socially constructed gender inequality that reserves hard talk and violence for men and holds women to a different standard of politeness, delicacy and social decorum. Further, it isn’t the women themselves who are chastised here so much as American society itself – a society that according to Valenti, makes violent masculinity its ideal.

Female politicians like Palin know well that they are protected by the same social double standard that either irks or pleases the confused Valenti (depending on her mood, I suppose), and that their opponents will not be able to effectively counter female attempts at emasculation by throwing the same kind of mud. There is no congruous response when a woman tells a man to "man up." "How," he might wonder, "can this woman who competes with me as a supposed 'equal' demand that I be something that she is not and cannot be?" It's basically a free shot, but recent elections have proved that the taunt ultimately falls flat.

If a culture that promotes "violent masculinity" has much of anything to do with the Tuscon shooting, it will be in the most abstract sense possible. Like the politicians she criticizes, Valenti was basically looking for a free shot.

Something bad happened. Blame men for it. That's basically all career feminists like Valenti have to offer: creative ways to place the blame for virtually anything on men and any vestigial cultural appreciation for traditional masculinity.

Perhaps that should be a new theme song for Valenti & Co., set to the tune of South Park's "Blame Canada". (A colorful swipe at all half-assed blame-layers.)

"Blame Men For It!"

Do feel free to help her out by brainstorming the rest of the lyrics.

Who Eats the Mushroom?

zed · 11 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The gender war so far has been a war of words, of arguments, over beliefs. One thing about the human animal is that they tend to believe very strongly and hold onto those beliefs very passionately. When two different belief systems collide, passions flare and conflict often escalates.

When the US was going through the infamous "Bill Clinton Blowjob Impeachment Trial", Richard Gephart made a statement that really should go down in history as one of the more famous and perceptive quotes of all time – "Politics is a substitute for violence." When people collide over what they believe, and see the other side's beliefs as detrimental to their own well-being, it is quite easy for the disagreement to escalate to violence. But, the only question that violence resolves is who is stronger, not whose belief is correct. And, as human culture and civilization have progressed beyond simply bashing each other's head in to win an argument, politics evolved as a substitute.

Politics involves debate, and rhetoric, and persuasion, and argument. Men realized that politics was a superior method to resolving conflict over simply being the biggest, baddest, MoFu out there, and bashing in heads until there was no one left to disagree with you. The reason it is superior is because even if you are the biggest, baddest, MoFu around, you're eventually going to piss off enough lesser MoFus that they will figure out how to cooperate – through politics – and gang up on you to bash in your head. Game over.

Politics is a very complex game. It involves procedures, protocols, and diplomacy, and yes, rules. The most famous set of rules for managing debate and political disagreement is called "Roberts Rules of Order", often referred to as "Parliamentary Procedure." The most significant role of a set of rules is that it allows a group to move forward toward making a decision and resolving conflict even if there are some stubborn and unyielding members.

There is a fine line between debate and argument. One simplistic difference is that debate seeks to persuade, while argument seeks to win. For many people, it is more important to be seen to be right than to actually be right – or, to win an argument rather than seek the truth in a question.

There are many questions the truth of which cannot ever be reached or changed by argument. Not everything in life is a "social construct", and some things have a reality which exists completely separate and apart from what people might believe about it. The question of whether shooting yourself in the foot hurts or feels great is not the least bit affected by how long an argument lasts between people who believe opposite things, or even by who wins by bashing in the other's head.

In the gender war there are thousands of viewpoints and millions of arguments. Some of them truly are matters of nothing but belief, and much time and energy is spent by people trying to get others to believe as they do. Others are matters which do have an external reality, the truth of which is totally independent of what either party to the argument believes or who wins the argument. Without some sort of rules of order, generally the person who wins an argument is the one who is most stubborn and who cares the least about the actual truth. Most arguments take place outside of any formal body, so there are no rules of order to help things move forward.

The moment one realizes that what may have started as a discussion has slipped into being an argument is the moment to quit it, leave, and do something else. All they are going to accomplish is to force the other person to become even more entrenched in their beliefs, and angrier, producing nothing except animosity and elevated blood pressure. Paradoxically, the people least certain of their position tend to be the ones most stubborn about defending it – seeking the consensual validation of agreement to help them believe that they are right.

A way to imagine this is to imagine two people sitting across a table from each other. On the table is a plate and on the plate is a mushroom. One person thinks the mushroom is poisonous, the other thinks it is delicious. The reality of which it is exists entirely separate and independent of what either of them believes. They can argue until doomsday over whether it is poisonous or delicious, and even if one of them wins the argument that does not dictate the reality of what the mushroom is.

There is only one way to determine the truth or fallacy of either opinion – someone has to eat the mushroom.

Now, in any rational ethical system the one obligated to eat the mushroom and test the competing theories must be the one who believes it is not poisonous. It is quite easy to have very strong convictions when you, personally, have nothing at risk if you are wrong. And, one of the less noble aspects of human beings is that it seems easier still when it is someone else taking all the risk.

One of the most time-honored tests of the strength of a man's convictions is "put your money where your mouth is" – i.e. put something at risk. If you are so sure you are right, then there is no risk. However, if the argument reflex has simply taken control of you and you have begun to argue for the sake of argument, and to avoid having to say those words that stick in everyone's throat "I was wwww…..wwwww……wrong" and the point has become to win and seek validation through agreement rather than seek the truth, then putting someone else at risk to prove something you don't believe strongly enough to put your self at risk, is a moral failure of the highest magnitude.

Most arguments in the gender war are not simple and clear enough that they can be resolved like a poker game – "You think your hand is better than mine? Well, I think mine is better than yours, and I bet $100 it is." The strength of the other's conviction is now tested by the principle of "put up, or shut up." And, who is right can easily be determined by objective reality – the hand with 3 Queens wins over the hand with 2 10s and 2 7s.

When someone is advocating a political or social strategy which you feel is destructive – "poisonous" – argument will almost never resolve it. So, unless you just enjoy arguing, the best way to proceed is to remove yourself from the possibility of negative outcomes, and let the person go ahead and implement their strategy with the clear knowledge that they are the one bearing all the risk and they are the ones who will suffer from being wrong – not you.

"Think that shooting yourself in the foot will bring you almost orgasmic pleasure? Go ahead, pull the trigger – your foot, not mine!"

"You think the mushroom is delicious while I think it is poisonous? Go ahead, eat the mushroom."

Chinese Moms, Failing America, 3rd-Wave Feminism and the Me Generation

There has been a lot of commentary in the last few years about the failing of American families. How we raise our children can have a huge impact on the future of our country. With the massive increase in single-mother homes and the claims that men, and traditional family notions including the role of parents, aren't really relevant for successful children, feminists may be forcing us all to bury our heads in the sand while our culture impales its future on the jagged hypocritical blades of Political Correctness.

In that vein, this article, drawn to my attention in a comment by ReaderLon on Chateau Roissy, made some very salient points about how childrearing strategies used by Chinese mothers are profoundly superior to current American or Western models. The whole article is worth reading.

I recall my own "Traditional White American" background. We had an interventionist mother who focused on her childrens' educations, in a catholic tradition that brooked no excuses for failure and no sympathy for misdemeanors. That said, my mother was and remains a hard-core "Equity Feminist" with conservative leanings. The upshot was that she expected my sisters to perform, and saying "I'm just a girl" got them no passes. On the other hand, she didn't expect them to enjoy hunting (though one sister does) nor did she expect them to become CEOs; she did, however, expect them to have children of their own, which they both did. Our own non-Asian, very American family managed to produce a clutch of highly successful young people, and my siblings have gone on to do the same. From what i can tell, this was quite common until the 1960′s and 70′s. It was then that children were simply left to their own devices and the downward spiral commenced.

One of the basic requirements for the traditional style of parenting is at least one parent who prioritizes child-raising over work or personal interests. Few women will respect men who do this, instead almost always choosing men who are better than they are at earning money, while they themselves prioritize the care of their offspring. Even doctrinaire feminists must admit this about the men they're attracted to, with "house husbands" not being anywhere near the top of the list. All of this is obvious to any non-indoctrinated man who has ever had to deal with actual, real live women and has tried to maintain relationships with them. The fact that this ancient, natural pattern seems biologically encoded into the species angers feminists the most: it seems to be the default setting for the Human Race, and that to resist it is to resist basic human nature. Hence the need for the denial of the reality of basic human nature or its suppression.

It's why Simone de Beauvoir, the grande-dame of 3rd-wave Marxist-Feminism, felt the need to say,

"No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make it."
–Simone de Beauvoir

But when women also place their emphasis on work or personal development, it leaves no-one in their children's educational driver's seat. Our culture quite literally becomes direction- and ambition-less. Fathers can step in, when allowed or required to, but if there is no father or he's kept away against his wishes, this leaves the children with no support.

Personal notes: China and Korea

I lived in Korea and China and I saw how both social systems work. With a few reservations, I endorse what the article states as accurate observations. These aren't just stereotypes about different individual families; the phenomenon of the "Chinese Mom" is very real. It's also true in Korea, though there it's slightly different, and I'll comment on that below. This is much of the reason for the individual success of modern Chinese children and the collective social success of Asian societies generally.

The Effects of 3rd-Wave / MarxistFeminism

American feminists refuse to admit this, but the lower performance results of white Americans in the last 2 generations unequivocally speak to the socially catastrophe side-effects of third-wave feminist and culturally-marxist policy prescriptions. Feminists and liberals contort themselves into bizarre philosophical shapes to avoid this hard fact, but a hard fact it remains. Asian immigrants sporting Asian family values are, on average, far more successful than Americans raised in modern families. They fill scholarship rolls, get top jobs, outperform all of their rivals, maximize their talents and are becoming wealthier and more generally successful much faster than any group in American history. For anyone familiar with Asia, the superiority of the Asian family model in raising children is both obvious and absolutely undeniable, and the final proof for naysayers is in the results. Despite Liberal rhetoric, Big Government can't replace functioning families that emphasize the welfare of children. The result of liberal policies has been the destruction of American potential and lost lives. We can see the most tragic results in the trenches of black America, where illegitimacy, single-mother families and non-existent fathers have become the norm. Heather Macdonald writes about it extensively.

It's not safe to be smug, however. The rest of America is racing down that path as we speak. We can look on the failed single-parent families and illegitimacy-as-normal in the black community as a harbinger of what awaits the rest of society.

The abundant truth of these observations are apparent to Asian-American families, especially those originally from China, Korea or Japan. White liberals can only deny this through rampant cognitive dissonance or ideological blindness.

This study, along will every other one, confirms the patently obvious:

The purpose of this study is to explain the gap between Asian American and white students in mathematics test scores by combining both cultural and socioeconomic approaches presented in previous studies. The sample consisted of a nationally representative sample of 1465 Asian American and 8757 white American students obtained from National Educational Longitudinal Study of 2002, by the National Center for Educational Statistics. Ordinary Least Square (OLS) results indicate that parental involvement and students' individual motivation explain why Asian American students perform better than white American students*. Meanwhile, better socioeconomic backgrounds and* higher rates of two-biological-parent households also contribute to Asian student's better performance on mathematics test scores. However, Asian students who live with both biological parents make lower mathematics test scores than white American students who live with both biological parents. This result implies that Asian American students might have higher pressure from their parents on their education.

Clearly, all is not lost. White two-family households still perform better, on average than Asian two-parent households, meaning that there is scope to recover some of America's lost potential. I submit that the key is a focus on our children, and on maintaining the integrity of successful families, with at least one parent, if not both, focused on making sure children succeed.

And even Wikipedia has much to say on this subject.

Self-selective immigration hypothesis

One possible cause of the higher performance of Asian Americans as a group is that they represent a small self-selected group of Asians. The relative difficulty of emigrating into the United States selected out those with less resources, motivation or ability.
This pattern of success, however, is also found in Asia, so despite self-selection, there must be something to the notion of cultural superiority. Jewish culture in America is very similar in most respects.

Cultural differences **

Cultural factors are thought to be part of the reason why Asian Americans are successful in the United States. East Asian societies themselves, in general, will often place more resources and emphasis on education. For example, the Chinese culture places great value on work ethic and the pursuit of knowledge. In traditional Chinese social stratification, scholars were ranked at the top — well above businessmen and landowners. This view of knowledge is evident in the modern lifestyle of many Asian American families, where the whole family puts emphasis on education and parents will make it their priority to push their children to study and achieve high marks. Similar cultural tendencies and values are found in South and Southeast Asian families (such as Indian Americans and Filipino Americans), whose children similarly face extra pressure by parents to succeed in school and to achieve high-ranked jobs.
Note that this takes sacrifice, time and effort that almost requires women to take time away from personal careers. In Asian cultures, it's crucial to note that this is an almost wholly female pursuit. Asian women take no shame in being excellent mothers; quite the opposite. In fact, how well they perform this most important job is often a point of pride. In North America, we've "liberated" women from the need to sacrifice their individuality to raise their children, and promote gender-neutrality. Despite these stated gender-neutral goals, the net effect is to render children directionless and leave nobody in the childrearing driver's seat.

In this sense, American3rd-wave feminism can be seen for what it is: yet another part of the "Me Me Me Me" philosophy of the Baby Boomers. It's just another selfish, self-aggrandizing 1960′s social movement that takes no responsibility for the effects of its policy advice and emphasizes personal freedom without any personal responsibility or forethought- the clarion call of the 1960′s and 70′s.

The damage to out culture, our economy and our future is one of the unacknowledged but unavoidable truths of our time.

Problems with the Chinese Model

That said, much of the pain, misplaced ambition and failure Chinese kids experience can be laid at the feet of relentless parents who push the wrong way. An athletically gifted kid will be shunted to a narrow band of academics because this is the only socially respected activity. A theatrically talented child will be denied this route because a medical/legal/engineering degree is what the parents want, and they won't brook argument. I knew one man who diligently acquired an engineering degree despite his mediocre math skills, and the day after he graduated, presented the diploma to his smiling parents. In a solemn tone, he then told them to frame it and put it on their wall, because he wanted nothing to do with it. He never again touched it or used it. He immediately went back to art school and eventually became a painter. He's often told me his baffled parents never quite dealt with the shock of what they see as his bizarre betrayal, but last year, a decade after he stopped visiting the family home, his sister told him that their mother quietly purchased one of his paintings from an art show to hang in a prominent place in their living room.

This is the problem with absolutely denying the individuality of children. Parents are very often wrong. And when they're wrong, it's their children who suffer, given the power of the parents.

There are other issues, as well. Traditional Chinese culture is very spare with physical affection. Family life is all about duty – very rarely is love involved. Miserable family life is all too common, if not almost normal. Though Chinese rarely admit to it, this fact is obvious to outsiders. Also, other problems noticed in the west, including physical, emotional and sexual abuse, are also common in China and the rest of Asia, the only difference being that they're never openly discussed or documented. This issue of "saving face" and dealing with problems internally (meaning, not dealing with them at all) is a much less admirable aspect of Asian societies.

But for that matter, social problems within families are common here, too. Happily, we're free to talk about it more than the Chinese tend to be.

Korea

Korea illustrates another Asian family model.

While Chinese parenting is often all about demanding from their children, Korean parenting is usually more about pushing and supporting. There's a very strong, almost tactile difference in the approach.

Koreans are much more physically touchy-feely with their kids than Chinese parents, perhaps even more than white Americans. Chinese fathers are often physically distant, almost cold; Chinese mothers are legendary for browbeating their kids and being unaffectionate, while being quite demanding.

In sharp contrast, Korean parents are notoriously affectionate. They love their kids and show it all the time.

I remember meeting foreign parents living in Korea with their kids. They were often shocked when strangers came up and actually touched their children – patting their heads or taking their hands. Korean culture is not obsessed with the risks of abusive strangers, refreshingly, and Korean culture is, overall, much more affectionate with children. They love all children. China, on the other hand, is not like this. It's not a very "affectionate" place.

Also, for all the pressure, parents in Korea don't have to browbeat their children to get them to perform; the social order (friends, school, work, etc.) does that every minute of every day. In China, you can be a lazy ass if you want. Nobody gives a damn if you live or die, or drop out of school. The pressure comes entirely from the family, and as such, families are notorious pressure-cookers. In Korea, the family doesn't need to browbeat you as much, because society does it – so parents often have a better relationship with their kids, and unlike China, this relationship is not necessarily based on simple duty and respect. The Korean family is often more of a release valve from the pressure cooker of society than a pressure cooker itself.

That said, Korean mothers work hard to make sure their children perform well. It's similar to the pattern in China, but not the same. Because the social pressure is so intense, the Korean mother is often seen as more of an ally than a taskmaster, which is what a lot of Chinese kids feel about their parents.

Children are sacred in Korea. Parents will do absolutely anything for them. There's no sacrifice too much or too high. It's impossible to exaggerate the levels to which Koreans will go to guarantee their children opportunities. Once the kids are born, life becomes a devotion to their welfare and future that Americans into the Me generation of the 1960′s likely find hard to believe.

Parenting and Sacrifice

Some of the stories will be familiar to any Korean-Americans reading this. I've seen parents separate for a decade or more so that the mother can raise their children in a foreign country, trying to guarantee them an English-language education which can be the ticket to success. I've also seen fathers work insane hours every day, taking time out only for 5-6 hours of sleep a night, all to financially support his family. Many men literally work themselves to death. On the other hand, Korean women typically wake very early, prepare a healthy and elaborate breakfast, take their kids to school, look after the younger ones, take care of the home, cook lunch, pick up the children, bring them to one of several daily tutoring sessions, study with them until 1:00 a.m., and then do more chores and sleep. The image of near-permanently exhausted parents and their usually respectful, dutiful children speaks to the strength of the family as a core unit in Korean society. Long into adulthood, Children show respect and love for their parents often absent or missing in the United States.

What's shocking to Americans is that this punishing lifestyle is considered normal in Korea. Complete sacrifice for your children is required; from fathers in terms of financial support, from mothers in terms of emotional and personal support. The actual daily lives most parents lead are usually wholly devoted to the welfare of their children, and women take the lead role in their childrens' educational lives. Of course, much of this model is relatively new, dating back only one or two generations. It's a modern, industrial-economy take on the traditional Korean family. In previous generations, such educational needs didn't exist; Korea was largely backwards and agricultural. But this model has strong roots in the traditional focus on family structure and responsibilities that go back centuries, if not millennia. Western culture has, at times, been much the same. For some reason, we threw out the baby with the bath water during the social revolutions of the 1960′s and 70′s.

In effect, Korean mothers are full-time “educational co-ordinators”. If measured by the profound success of Korean children,

Problems in Korea

A lot of the “WORK WORK WORK!” Koreans busy themselves with is just that: busy work. Quite often, little to nothing gets done. This is just as true for study. Highschool students’ days start with one or more pre-classes, and then school; they stay in school throughout from 8 am to 10 pm, and they then study for 3-5 more hours at night. They get between 4 and 5 hours of sleep before it starts again at dawn. They do this 6 days a week. Sundays are reserved for family and study, but in reality, most of what they do is study.

Of course, much of this isn’t studying, or is inefficient. It’s the same in the workplace. Almost all offices get nothing done all day, and the work only gets done in the 3-4 hours from 6pm-10/11 pm when people are allowed to do things that aren’t busy-work, social grooming or just “Sitting There” make-work. Almost all organizations in Korea have a “Bum In Chair” philosophy: So long as your bum is in the seat, it’s better than someone who arrives late or worse, who leaves at 6:00, before the boss, who often stays until 10:00 pm or later. An employee who does 7 solid hours of intensive work and then leaves at 5:00 pm will be socially and professionally ostracized. The foreigners I knew in Korea were stunned at how inefficient Koreans could be, how most of their time was wasted, and how little a group of Koreans could get done, when the hours of work put into a project are taken into account.

The higher up the pay scale you go, beyond upper-middle management, the less competent the people were and the less work was accomplished. Also, the higher up the chain you went, less accountability was practiced. In many ways, it’s a victory for innovation-stifling bureaucracy, an accurate description of Korean society (and Asian society) generally.

Modest Proposals

From the perspective of a neutral observer, an outsider, it’s clear where the advantages are in the Chinese or Korean approach to education, parenting and work, and just as clear where the disadvantages and failures can be found. Just as foreign observers came to America after WWII to study American industry, I think it’s a good idea for Westerners and Western policy-makers to be exposed to North-East Asian domestic and economic culture. The lessons we learn may be uncomfortable to the ideologically pure among us, to all of our racists, conservatives, blind patriots, cultural marxists and feminists, but there is virtue in pragmatism, cultural honesty, openness to criticize and and humility in the face of our mistakes.

In my opinion, a tempered version of the “Chinese Mom” or the “Korean Family” would be a fantastic boon to American society. Taking the right lessons is important, however, because you want your children at the age of 40 or 50 to still like and appreciate you, in a more than “I”m obliged to” kind-of way. And you also want to maintain the American edge in outside-the-box thinking, creativity and in our ability to seize opportunities.

For example, freeing women through equity-feminism was likely a great boon to society. There’s no reason to dismiss the notions that freed up the creative contributions of half our population. However, engaging in “cultural marxism” and narcissism disguised as 3rd-Wave Feminism and Gender Feminism and misandry and anti-Natalism has nothing to do with improving the lives of women, but rather of forcing social change and social engineering on a society that, were the practitioners of these philosophies direct and honest, would never have accepted these ideologies in the first place. We need to be tricked into accepting them, and even then, it’s hard to maintain acceptance in the face of the inevitable results.

A marriage of both Asian and Western cultures could do the following:

- Maximize childrens’ success without turning boys into personality-free, “beta” chumps overly attached to their mothers and women into mere servants of their male counterparts;
- Encourage creativity without hampering practical success
- Create better work habits and reduce frivolous activities to a minimum

- Encourage exploration (which is a powerful advantage of American society) but also encourage pragmatism and concrete measures of success (which Asian culture is very good at).

Most Western-educated Chinese parents understand that they need to embrace their children as individuals – but without indulging them. This is something Liberal America has forgotten, because as a liberal culture, we indulge ourselves all the time. Modern 3rd-and 4th-wave post-equity and gender-feminism is part and parcel of our culture's general tolerance of self-indulgence, irresponsibility and social fragmentation.

Consider: There must be some reason why almost all foreigners view Westerners as consummately selfish and self-obsessed, and it's not because of our economic model; other cultures can often be more capitalistic and anti-egalitarian than we are. They think we're selfish for other reasons that Liberals are uncomfortable addressing.

Needless to say, reforming the failing model of the American family requires getting Big Government as an alternative Father out of the American family, encouraging the creation of happy family units and discouraging the breakup of couples when the welfare of the children could be impacted. It may be that American men and women might need to take interests other than their own immediate needs.

"Eat, Pray Love" comes to mind. If the grotesque self-indulgence of this type of ideal represent anything, it represents the depth of selfish self-love and attention our culture now practices at the expense of, well, of everything else.

Or how about this:

Sandra Tsing-Loh single-handedly illustrated why self-loving narcissism is slowly eating away at anything resembling social responsibility in this country.

Or Corinne Maier, a French author whose book was a paean to selfish non-sacrifice for children, leading to the inevitable – just don't have any.

The critic summed it up nicely:

Ms. Maier's list of reasons why one should not have children includes things such as no more sleeping in, not being able to eat in nice restaurants, a lack of spontaneous sex and the ever popular complaint that having children means no more "us" as a couple, but only "us" as parents. Ms. Maier suggests that becoming a parent means you somehow forgo the ability to remain connected to your partner. While I would agree that many parents seem to focus only on their children, I would suggest that this is not the fault of the children, the problem rests solely on the shoulders of the parents.

Ultimately, the fact of demography absolutely requires us to breed and have children. And to make sure that our children have the best of the opportunities that we can provide for them.

Neglecting either of these responsibilities is to forfeit our place as members of a continuing culture and society, and to accept non-existence and death as a culture, a society and a nation.

This all links to other themes relevant to modern American decline and social disorder.

In effect, cultural marxism and feminism, with its denial of hard demographics, its worship of open borders and wholesale cultural population replacement due to unwillingness to support having successful families, and its wholesale attack on all responsibilities while promoting only oppositional rights or conflicting group rights, guarantees that even with their own internal problems, Asian values will produce generations of successful children while our culture of social irresponsibility and reproductive barrenness continues its demoralizing decline.

None of this is inevitable. We can stem the tide. Being humble enough to adopting some of the values I've seen in Asia could go a long distance to helping restore some sanity to America.

Side-note:

Illustrating the hypocrisy of "liberal" cultural marxism, successful Asians with better cultural attitudes towards success are often penalized for being successful. So much for the rewards of hard work, intelligence and supportive families. Is this the kind of society we want, a society of Variable Victims and entrenched entitlements?

Asian American status in affirmative action

In the 1980′s, several Ivy League schools alleged that they limited admissions to Asian American students. Because of their high degree of success as a group and over-representation in many areas such as college admissions, most Asian Americans are not granted preferential treatment by affirmative action policies as are other minority groups. Some schools choose lower-scoring applicants from other racial groups over Asian Americans in an attempt to promote racial diversity and to maintain some proportion to the society's racial demographics.

Texas school police ticketing students as young as 6

Just when I think it can't get any worse –

> School police officers in Texas are doling out more tickets to children as young as 6, who under past disciplinary practices would have been sent to the principal's office instead, according to a report by a Texas nonprofit.

That'll learn 'em!!

You're in first grade. Some big guy in a blue uniform with a frown on his face hands you a piece of paper. Being halfway trained in civilized behavior, you wrap your gum in it and toss it in the wastebasket.

How in the world are kids supposed to figure out the world when they are surrounded by adults who so obviously can't? I wonder if they accept payment of fines in Pla Dough?

Beam me up, Scottie. There is no intelligent life on this planet.

An 89-Year-Old Statue Helps Unlock The Scorn For Men's Rights

pierceharlan · 13 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As someone who advocates for men and boys falsely accused of rape, I am perpetually baffled by the religious-like fervor with which some women's advocates resist the very notion that men, simply because they are men, can be victims of anything caused by women.

The story of a now-obscure, 89-year-old statue in New York City, much maligned as both "sexist" and "kitsch," has helped clear away some of my befuddlement. The eye-opening history of this statue ought to be studied for what it teaches not about art, but about gender relations, because its lessons still resonate.

"Civic Virtue Triumphant Over Unrighteousness" is the official name of the 22-ton marble statue by sculptor Frederick MacMonnies, but it has been derisively called many other things, including "Fat Boy." The statue was, at one time, one of the biggest news stories in New York City. Even before it was unveiled in 1922 outside New York City Hall, it had offended many women, and many women's groups. It can now be seen in all its crumbling glory, encrusted with the patina of soot, pigeon droppings, and neglect, outside Queens Borough Hall in New York, where it has stood since it was exiled in 1941. See here.

The statue portrays a nearly nude, sword-wielding, strapping male youth, his foot crushing the necks of two writhing female sirens, Corruption and Vice — one defeated, the other cowering — in an exultant posture of triumph. It is an allegory of triumph over temptation. (A siren is a mythical seductresses who was said to lure sailors — who, of course, were male — with their enchanting music to the rocky coast of their island, causing the men to shipwreck.)

Before all the controversy, MacMonnies, an important artist in his time, was paid $60,000 for this work, a vast sum of money at the time. The city of New York considered the piece so culturally important that it took out an insurance policy on MacMonnies' life. But once women's groups got wind of what he was up to, all hell broke loose.

What was so offensive about this statue? MacMonnies had the audacity to give vice a feminine face, and to depict virtue as decidedly male. The reaction of many women to this statue, from 1922 to today, is eye-opening.

When the statue was about to be unveiled, many women were downright furious: "As though the only virtue the city required were the crushing of women who lured men to their undoing!" jeered one woman in a letter to the New York Daily News.

The statue was so controversial that the mayor of New York scheduled a public hearing on the propriety of placing the statue in front of City Hall. "All of those who think that woman has been degraded because the righteous youth representing virtue has his foot planted on a 'mermaid's' neck will have an opportunity to express their views."

The mayor was not above pandering to women, who had recently been given the vote. In scheduling his hearing, he announced that the city should take counsel "with the women of the city" regarding the propriety of the statue. How times have changed: even The New York Times took umbrage at the mayor's statement. "Is art, which knows no nationality, to be circumscribed by considerations of sex?"

At the mayor's hearing, gender lines were drawn. Elizabeth King Black of the National Women's Party declared: "Men have their feet on women's necks, and the sooner women realize it the better."

But a letter written by a Dr. William Norman Guthrie of St. Marks-in-the-Bouwerie, which was read aloud, echoed a sentiment shared by the statue's defenders: the outcry is unwarranted because if the genders were reversed, there would be no similar protest. Dr. Guthrie wrote: "Of course, temptation to the male appears as female. Would the women objectors object to a Civic Virtue trampling on a 'male' temptation? Hardly."

Park Commissioner Francis Gallatin chimed in by noting that he didn't think women should object since men didn't object simply because the devil is always represented as a man.

MacMonnies, the artist, summed up the double-standard at work in the women's protest: "Suppose I made virtue the figure of a woman, with her foot on the neck of a male tempter, do you suppose all the men would make a fuss about it?"

The question, of course, scarcely survived its statement. MacMonnies might have been onto something when he wondered aloud: "Can it be that the women are angry because some man finally found the strength to resist temptation?"

The statue's defenders prevailed, but not without grumbling from the opposition. When Gallatin announced that the statue was, indeed, going up, he tried to put the debate into perspective: "It is true . . . that it is customary to represent virtue as a woman. Witness the figures on our coins, the statue of liberty, the muses, the graces and the innumerable other specimens known to art." But Gallatin added: "In this age of equality man should be given some consideration . . . . He needs to have his good qualities extolled a little . . . . of his many good qualities, virtue, after all, is not the least considerable."

For nineteen years, the statue stood in front of City Hall. But in 1941, Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, namesake of one of the most maligned airports in America, finally evicted the statue, and likely because of the gender it depicted. The "Little Flower" reportedly tired of being mooned every day by the nude male figure. See here. If the statue had been female, my guess is the diminutive mayor would not have had a problem. LaGuardia had the sculpture moved from City Hall Park to its current site at the corner of Union Turnpike and Queens Boulevard, outside Queens Borough Hall.

After the statue was exiled to the relative obscurity of Queens, the vilification continued, even to today. Modern observers call the statue "sexist." Former Queens Borough President Claire Shulman wanted to have the statue evicted: "A municipal building is not an appropriate place for a statue that portrays women as evil and treacherous." An 18-year-old college student from Queens, said: "It's discrimination against women." Borough President Helen Marshall said: "I have no enthusiasm for that statue. . . .. Its depiction is one that is viewed as sexist. Vice is portrayed in the form of a woman. I have no enthusiasm for restoring it." Another woman said: "Degrading. For the government to sanction that? Imagine the message that sends. Terrible." Sometimes someone will hang a sign on the statue: "This sculpture doesn't represent women well."

One woman took delight in the fact that the statue is now a neglected mess, covered in pigeons and pigeon droppings, surrounded by garbage, weeds and graffiti. "Public censure through neglect: a most fitting demise, even better than removal," she harrumphed.

How do we account for the irrational vitriol of so many women to this statue? Perhaps it is as simple as this: the protestors were, and still are, so accustomed to picturing vice as "male" that when it is given a feminine face, it is so jarring that they assume it is somehow wrong and must be "sexist."

That worldview is still prevalent, and, in important respects, many men share it. For example, doesn't this worldview account for the fierce resistance of progressives to even the suggestion that presumptively innocent men and boys accused of rape have unique needs worthy of society's attention? And doesn't it account for the infamous female sentencing discount where, all things being equal, women tend to receive more lenient sentences than men when they are convicted of criminal wrongdoing? And for the other-worldly resistance of women's groups' to the presumption of shared parenting, as they hide behind the awful stereotype of men-as-abusers? And for the policy of at least two airlines of not permitting men to be seated on flights next to unaccompanied minors? And for public service announcements that depict boys as potential batterers, rapists and predators, and girls as potential victims? And for the vile suspicions raised whenever a father, unaccompanied by a woman, is "caught" playing with his own children in the park? And for the refusal of most people to accept that female-on-male domestic violence is a serious problem, and that a kick to the testicles is decidedly *un*funny? And for college indoctrination sessions that shame young men into thinking they are predators?

And I could go on and on and on. On a rational level, most people know that neither gender has a monopoly on either vice or virtue. But emotionally, most people seem to have a difficult time accepting that vice sometimes has a feminine face.

My blog, False Rape Society, has no intention of maligning an entire gender. But unlike the sculptor of "Civic Virtue," I did not choose the gender of our villain. It just so happens that when it comes to the issue of false rape claims, women have a near monopoly on vice. This is because, usually, only women can tell rape lies that are deemed plausible, so men rarely bother. Even though this does not mean women are inherently evil (after all, only a tiny percentage of women tell rape lies, just as only a tiny percentage of men rape), people who have convinced themselves that the world is skewed in favor of males simply recoil at our efforts.

The young man depicted in "Civic Virtue" can well serve as a symbol of the struggle faced by men and boys falsely accused of rape. Hateful groups hope that, like MacMonnies' statue, our efforts will fall into decay due to neglect. But fortunately, with each passing month, more and more people of good will have joined with us in keeping our statue clean, robust, and defiant. With their help, just like the young man in the statue, the men and boys for whom we advocate will triumph over the evildoers attempting to destroy them.

Comment of the Week: A Reader Reveals the Horror of Feminist Upbringing

W.F. Price · 13 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In response to my post on the "V-Men," The Spearhead received a very thoughtful and revealing post from AntZ, who grew up in a feminist household. After years of struggling under the weight of the dysfunctional, anti-male environment of his childhood, during which he was at the mercy of a radical feminist ideologue – and an academic to boot – he finally broke free. Although the effects of feminism on children that he outlines are worrisome for those of us living amongst these wounded individuals, and sad for the suffering they have endured, the fact that recovery and healing is possible is encouraging.

This is a major part of what we are fighting for: the lost children who have been wounded by out-of-control genderist ideology promoted by misanthropic feminists. Every time you think of a feminist triumph in ruining yet another father, adding him to the millions of casualties of their juggernaut of destruction and power-worship, think of the innocent children who will bear the lifelong scars.

Although it is difficult to dwell on these things, sometimes it is necessary, and AntZ gives us a clear picture of the consequences of feminist child abuse:

I spent 30 years or so in "mangina purgatory" before realizing that much of my warped outlook on life came from the twisted way in which my mother raised her children. My three brothers, subjected to the same cruelty, remain in mangina hell today.

I have come to the conclusion that boys who experience gender-specific abuse at the hands of their mothers exhibit some common traits:

1) A definition of "self" that is largely based on extreme Chivalry and woman-worship.

2) When we are alone (in situations that involve ONE person) our behaviour can appear odd (self-talking: having imaginary "liberation" conversations with either our mothers or others who we have invited to dominate us), or our behaviour can be very violent (yelling and destroying inanimate objects that frustrate us with a marked tendency to over-kill, for example smashing an alarm clock to the point that it is reduced to tiny pieces.

3) In situations that involve TWO people (the mangina plus a man or a woman), particularly mangina-man competitive environments at work and mangina-woman arguments at home, "mother abuse manginas" are obsessively subservient. Some "real" men will be perplexed by the self-flagellating mangina, others will take the mangina under their wing and form surprisingly productive partnerships with us. Women who have a relationship with a mangina will progress from insecurity, to resentment, and finally to violent loathing. Typically, the woman will engineering increasingly brutal "fitness tests" of physical or emotional violence in an attempt to force the mangina to stand up for himself.

4) In multi-person situations that involve both men and women, "mother abuse manginas" can appear aggressive and dominant as long as we do so in defence of women. Like Dorothy's lion, we find our courage only when fighting on behalf of a woman. The only occasions where we "stand up to our boss" at work are in defence of women, and this will typically occur several times per year. On all other occasions we stubbornly stick to our doormat status.

5) Internally, "mother abuse manginas" resemble a dam of fear/insecurity holding back an ocean of resentment/anger towards women. Over time, the dam weakens, and sometimes breaks in a very sudden way. For me this moment occured in November of last year when my six year old son was dehumanized by New York's anti-boy-self image campaign (disguised as an anti-DV campaign):

My mother is a heavy smoker and an alcoholic, but her strongest addiction is to the hatred of all men. As a professional Feminist academic in women's studies, she knew exactly how to crush ther personalities of her four boys in order to produce the utopian Feminist servile man-bot. All of us were emotionally abused, and the three youngest (11, 12, and 13 years old at the time) were sexually abused also.

The abuse was as effective as clockwork. All four of my mother's boys spent our lives as servile manginas who, as a bonus, have an "emergency white knight" button like the lion in the Wizard of Oz.

So here is what I know about Feminism. It is an ideology of hate that is highly effective at preparing young boys for a lifetime of slave labour under the control of their female owners.

The real front line of the Feminist war on men is our school system, particularly elementary school. Our schools are the means by which Feminists are actively doing to all young boys, what my mother did to her children 30 years ago.

This is a war of extermination, and the Feminists intend to win it.

Stoicism – Ancient Wisdom for Modern Times

J. Durden · 13 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

While I'm no expert on stoicism, I've found that most people rely on little more than the dictionary definition of the word when it comes to their understanding of the philosophy. But stoicism is much more than, for example, the ability to "endure pain or hardship without showing feelings or complaining." As with any philosophy, there were several well known stoic philosophers – perhaps the most well known being Marcus Aurelius – but one of my favorites has always been Epictetus. Epictetus was born into slavery and, moreover, was either born with a lame leg or had been crippled by his master. In either case, when he speaks about performing one's duty and accepting one's fate, it tends to carry a little more weight than, say, if he had been born an Emperor or a King. His teachings were compiled by one his pupils, Arrian, into a text called the Discourses of Epictetus. Arrian also compiled a sort of "public digest" of this work, which came to be known as The Enchiridion, or more simply, "The Handbook." The purpose of this digest was to give people practical philosophical advice about how to live their lives – advice, I think, which applies even today. It is this shorter work which I'd like to examine more fully for The Spearhead.

The very first lines quickly establish one of the most important themes of the work:

> Some things are in our control and others not. Things in our control are opinion, pursuit, desire, aversion, and, in a word, whatever are our own actions. Things not in our control are body, property, reputation, command, and, in one word, whatever are not our own actions.

He goes on to explain what he's getting at, but it could be summarized as thus: it is natural for us to regard things as "within our control" which really, in fact, are not. An easy example would be your motor vehicle. We feel as though we are in control of the vehicle because we sit behind the steering wheel and pedals, through which we can exert our influence and "control" the acceleration or turning of the car. Really though, our control is limited – any number of mechanical glitches, roadside conditions, and so on, could cause us very quickly to "lose control" of that car and end up in an accident (perhaps a fatal one). Epictetus would call you foolish if you ever thought you were in control of the car to begin with – it is something we can influence, but not control. He would go so far as to say our bodies are the same way – we cannot "control" whether or not we contract a disease, or if we are born with a disorder, or anything else. We can exert influence over our bodies – for example, by dieting and exercising properly – but they are never fully in our control. By and large, the only things we truly control in this world are our thoughts and our actions.

His next point is a simple one, yet one rarely taken to heart:

> Remember that following desire promises the attainment of that of which you are desirous; and aversion promises the avoiding that to which you are averse. However, he who fails to obtain the object of his desire is disappointed, and he who incurs the object of his aversion wretched.

Stated more simply, he is saying that failing to achieve what you desire (or failing to avoid that which you do not) leads to disappointment and even misery. He goes on to say that, then, it would make sense to limit those things which you would like to avoid to things it is in your control to avoid. If, however, you are looking to avoid death or sickness or poverty, you're likely to be wretched, because ultimately such things are beyond your control to avoid.

It would take far too much time to continue to do a point by point selection, so I'm going to jump ahead and pick some of my more favorite quotations to work with. I had to skip over many juicy quotations before settling upon this one:

> Remember that you must behave in life as at a dinner party. Is anything brought around to you? Put out your hand and take your share with moderation. Does it pass by you? Don't stop it. Is it not yet come? Don't stretch > your desire towards it, but wait till it reaches you. Do this with regard to children, to a wife, to public posts, to riches, and you will eventually be a worthy partner of the feasts of the gods. And if you don't even take the things which are set before you, but are able even to reject them, then you will not only be a partner at the feasts of the gods, but also of their empire. For, by doing this, Diogenes, Heraclitus and others like them, deservedly became, and were called, divine.

The advice here is easy enough to understand without my comment, but is helpful especially in curtailing desires you can't fulfill. If, for example, you have it in your mind to find a good wife to marry and to start a family – and these are the only things you think you would want to do – you are, as Epictetus would predict, likely to be miserable. But if you were to behave as Epictetus describes above towards finding a wife and starting a family – basically, be patient until the opportunity presents itself – the situation would likely be less exasperating. (Though, I don't know how many readers of The Spearhead are looking to get married anymore…)

The last quote, along with this next one, run very contrary to "contemporary wisdom:"

> Remember that you are an actor in a drama, of such a kind as the author pleases to make it. If short, of a short one; if long, of a long one. If it is his pleasure you should act a poor man, a cripple, a governor, or a private person, see that you act it naturally. For this is your business, to act well the character assigned you; to choose it is another's.

I'm not sure what it's like internationally, but here in America, we are generally raised with this idea that we can all be whatever it is we choose to be, and so long as we really put our hearts into it, we should be able to achieve our dreams. I think most reasonable people recognize this is hogwash, and yet the myth persists. Epictetus would call anyone who thought like that a fool. He'd subscribe to the school of thought which says we are all born with a certain set of traits, talents, abilities, and deficits, and that these are relatively unchanging. He uses the metaphor of a drama, but I've always liked the metaphor of a poker game – we all get dealt a hand, and a lot of life boils down to the luck of the draw (ever heard the term, genetic lottery?) – but the way you play your cards is up to you. Fate can be a cruel mistress but getting worked up about it isn't going to make you any happier.

The next quote is practically tailor made for people who get upset with my website:

> Remember, that not he who gives ill language or a blow insults, but the principle which represents these things as insulting. When, therefore, anyone provokes you, be assured that it is your own opinion which provokes you. Try, therefore, in the first place, not to be hurried away with the appearance. For if you once gain time and respite, you will more easily command yourself.

This quote certainly applies to the zealots in the politically correct camp, as well, who would like to see public discourse dominated by their sterilized approach to discussion. The problem with "offensive" speech is that the only way to determine whether or not it was offensive is to take a poll and see if anyone is offended. As for the people who are offended? Epictetus would tell them that the problem is within themselves. As I like to say – grow up, get a haircut and then a job, and then get back to me. Far too often, I find that people who are offended by what I have to say are people who have lived a cloistered lifestyle with little exposure to viewpoints outside their own.

For the final few quotations, I'm selecting some interesting ones on gender relations. The first of these is thus:

> As far as possible, before marriage, keep yourself pure from familiarities with women, and, if you indulge them, let it be lawfully. But don't therefore be troublesome and full of reproofs to those who use these liberties, nor frequently boast that you yourself don't.

PUAs be damned! Or not quite, according to Epictetus – he doesn't advocate their approach as one you should take, but he doesn't think it should be condemned either. To be fair, he was living in the times of Marriage 1.0 (or, probably more accurately, Marriage 0.1). Unfortunately, this advice isn't elaborated on much, but it was interesting nonetheless – it seems as though the stoics recognized marriage as a powerful building block of society, writing though he was during the period of Roman decline (as chosen by John Bagot Glubb).

Though Epictetus wasn't a prophet, he accurately described a facet of the modern, Western woman:

> Women from fourteen years old are flattered with the title of "mistresses" by the men. Therefore, perceiving that they are regarded only as qualified to give the men pleasure, they begin to adorn themselves, and in that to place ill their hopes. We should, therefore, fix our attention on making them sensible that they are valued for the appearance of decent, modest and discreet behavior.

It's all about hypergamy with the modern women – the "alpha cock carousel" as it is called – which is symptomatic of not being raised to be valued for "the appearance of decent, modest, and discreet behavior." I like particularly that Epictetus used "the appearance" of these behaviors, because (seems to me) he still wanted a woman who could perform in bed.

I'll wrap this up by addressing a possible criticism of stoicism – many people feel as though stoicism is a very fatalist philosophy which encourages you to resign to your fate and do nothing to try to improve your station. I think this is a mischaracterization. The problem is that stoicism is first trying to disabuse you of your foolish notions of what is and is not in your control before it can teach you how to best go about exerting your control and influence. In that regard – and particularly in introductory pieces – stoicism will often tell you to avail yourself of all desires and so on. This is because it is a step one. If you want, think of it like Tyler Durden from Fight Club – "It's only when you've lost everything, that you're free to do anything."

J. Durden aka Dr. Deezee is the Chief Architect of the Internet Hate Machine and first heard the word "stoic" when his seventh grade teacher described him as such.

“Miss Jean Louise, stand up. Your father’s passin’”: A Tribute to the Patron Saint of the Falsely Accused

pierceharlan · 14 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It is among the greatest lines in all of American literature. For me, it is the single most powerful moment in all of motion pictures. It speaks to the honor due to all who battle tyranny, especially those who fight for the falsely accused.

The line is spoken at the conclusion of the rape trial in Harper Lee’s 1960 Pulitzer Prize winning novel “To Kill A Mockingbird,” repeated in the film of the novel two years later.

Some context: despite his brilliant and impassioned defense, Atticus Finch, a white attorney in the American Deep South, has just lost a criminal trial of a black man falsely accused of rape by a white woman. Such losses were routine in that region of our country, where white women could, and too often did, have black males put to death just by uttering the word “rape.” Atticus’ defense of the innocent man was scorned by the local white community, but that didn’t dissuade him from taking the case, or from doing his best to win it.

But now it was over, and he has lost. With the death penalty almost certainly awaiting his client, an innocent man, Atticus tries to console him before he is led away. Then Atticus packs up his papers and starts to exit the courtroom.

What happens next is so simple, yet so unexpected and pitch-perfect right, that it leaves a heartbreakingly indelible impression. A crowd of black spectators had attended the trial to lend moral support to the innocent man. They were forced to sit in the courtroom’s balcony. That’s also where Atticus’ daughter, Jean Louise (nicknamed “Scout”), sits, next to the leader of the black community, Rev. Sykes. The black community has just witnessed one of its own being led away for a crime he obviously did not commit. Yet the spectators lingered in the balcony, waiting for Atticus to leave the courtroom.

This is the scene, from Harper Lee’s classic novel, as told by young Jean Louise “Scout” Finch:

Atticus took his coat off the back of his chair and pulled it over his shoulder. Then he left the courtroom, not by his usual exit. He must have wanted to go home the short way, because he walked quickly down the middle aisle toward the south exit. I followed the top of his head as he made his way to the door. He did not look up.

Someone was punching me, but I was reluctant to take my eyes from the people below us, and from the image of Atticus’s lonely walk down the aisle.

“Miss Jean Louise?”

I looked around. They were all standing. All around us and on the balcony on the opposite wall, the Negroes were getting to their feet. Reverend Syke’s voice was as distant at Judge Taylor’s:

“Miss Jean Louise, stand up. Your father’s passin’.”

Gregory Peck, who played Atticus in the classic 1962 motion picture with quiet but determined dignity, said that when actor Bill Walker, who played Rev. Sykes, delivered that line – “Stand up. Your father’s passin’” — “he wrapped up the Academy Award for me.” Indeed he had.

In 2003, the American Film Institute voted Atticus Finch the greatest hero in American film, ahead of Indiana Jones and James Bond.

So revered is the character among real-life lawyers that, last year, the ABA Journal asked a panel of experts to pick their favorite fictional lawyer, but it exempted Atticus Finch from the competition — including Atticus wouldn’t be fair to the other characters. No figure has inspired more young people to become lawyers than Atticus, even though Atticus lost the case for which he is best known.

This April, a postage stamp will honor Gregory Peck and Atticus by featuring a photo of Peck playing Atticus in the film.

Injustice often wears the disguise of respectability. In the Deep South, too often it wore a badge and turned its head while the lynch mob spared judges from having to pretend to give black men and boys a fair trial for allegedly raping white women.

On modern college campuses, it gussies itself up with PhDs and tenure and insists on being called “professor” while it purports to correct perceived past wrongs against women by treating young men accused of sexual assault as presumptively guilty.

In the newsrooms of America’s leading dailies, it masquerades as crusading reporters but allows progressive sympathies to trump journalistic ethics by labeling rape accusers “victims,” and by parroting the accuser’s side of the story as fact.

But wherever injustice appears, there is always an Atticus Finch to battle it, and to inspire us to battle it, too. He doesn’t always win; in fact, he usually doesn’t. But battle it he does. And when he passes, we should stand up, and give him the honor he’s due.

The Mommy Wars Are A Distraction

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 14 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The “mommy wars”, the debate whether women should stay at home with the kids or go to work, is rarely brought up in the manosphere if at all. There is an excellent reason for this. In terms of anti-feminism the mommy wars are meaningless. In fact, the mommy wars serve as nothing but a distraction for actual anti-feminism and are another example of the argument between various forms of feminism/female supremacism on how to best extract money and resources from men (or how to best hold the whip over men).

Socons (social conservatives) use two main arguments for women staying home, traditionalism and children. ”Traditionalism” isn’t about what was traditional over human history but what the archetypal stay at home mother of the 1950s which was an aberration and wasn’t even universal back then. Throughout history women have done work that added income to the family. In addition there weren’t washing machines, stoves, refrigerators, vacuum cleaners, etc. so there was more work to be done in maintaining a household. In the future more and more of household maintenance will be handled by robots such as the roomba leaving less and less work for a woman in maintaining the household. The idea that women should stay home with young children has merit. However, children grow up, move out, and live their own lives. As people live longer the time a woman would spend having young children is a diminishing percentage of woman’s life. What is she doing with the rest of her life? What socons seek to produce is not stay at home motherhood or traditional families but domestic divas who have little to no work to do.

The level to which socons want women to not be involved with things outside the home is extreme. Some socons even object to having their daughters spend any time at church ministries. Considering that a church ministry usually involves some degree of community service, they are even objecting to women doing any community service whatsoever in favor of “being at home”. The question must be asked, “What are these socon domestic divas and proto-domestic divas (their daughters) doing all day?” The answer seems to involve claiming that it takes an army of women to clean a house and that unmarried daughters should stay at home doing make work jobs of questionable merit like “sewing her wardrobe”. It seems to be all about minimizing work that women do and hiding this fact from men.

While feminists want women to go to work (or more accurately to a job), they are similar to the socons. Feminists will claim that women with jobs are “more productive” and “doing real work”. This is wrong. Over the last several decades many women have poured into the workforce into jobs like public sector jobs, quasi-public sector jobs like healthcare and education, human resources, etc. What do these jobs have in common? They are bureaucratic, bloated, inefficient, ossified, and in most cases unnecessary. In addition, they wreck the productive sectors of the economy. Many of these jobs are nothing but make work jobs, and women hold these economy wrecking make work jobs. Even outside of these sectors of employment, women can cause problems. A feminist had this to say about housewives trying to get work:

> During preliminary interviews with housewives she saw that they had one thing in common: an extremely infantilized mode of behavior. Whenever the conversation didn’t go exactly as they wanted, they would become highly emotional, raise their woices, bcome irritable, cry, make unreasonable demands. They had no understanding of how to negotiate or listen to others. Their expectations of what they are owed by recruiters and employers were extremely inflated. It was obvious that inscribing themselves into the hierarchies of a workplace, curbing their highly emotional response to every slight contretemps and learning to listen to other people was going to be next to impossible for them.

Any man willing to be honest about it will easily be able to come up with multiple examples of women acting like this who are not housewives or former housewives. These are more reasons why feminists are wrong about women in jobs automatically being productive or doing real work. Like with the socons, it’s about minimizing the work women do and hiding this from men. The feminists and socons just disagree about the best way to do that.

On the other hand the feminists and the socons do agree that men are at fault for not making their respective positions happen. Feminists claim that men are evil brutes trying to keep women at home, barefoot and pregnant in the kitchen. Socons are claiming that men have become “unmanly” and are forcing their wives to work, and that men are “pressuring” women to go college. Whatever their positions in the mommy wars, both the feminists and socons attack men with truckloads of shaming language. This is why the mommy wars are a distraction completely useless to men and useless to anti-feminism. It is nothing but an argument about how to best hold the whip over men in a very literal sense because the mommy wars are about women doing as little work as possible and making men do more.

Aborting One's Children as Self Defense – A Feminist Perspective

J. Durden · 15 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Since Roe vs Wade in 1973, abortion has been legal in the United States, and there seems to be little that will change that. Even so, it can be telling to take a look at the arguments and opinions that helped shape the abortion debate, especially from the pro-abortion side of the fence. One of the more widely cited essays on the topic is Jane English's Abortion and the Concept of a Person, written in 1975. For the most part, English attempts to eschew the entire personhood debate (that is, whether or not a fetus constitutes a person) and proceeds with what has to be one of the worst analogies in the history of academic reasoning. We'll examine each part of her paper in turn.

In the early part of her essay, English lists many traits which are shared by people (for example, biological factors such as being "descended from humans, having a certain genetic makeup, having a head, hands, arms, eyes, capable of locomotion, breathing, eating, sleeping," psychological factors like "sentience, perception, having a concept of self and of one's own interests and desires, the ability to use tools, the ability to use language or symbol systems, the ability to joke" and so on). While her list is extensive, she points out is incomplete, but her point is that "something could exhibit the majority of these features and still fail to be a person, as an advanced robot might be. There is no single core of necessary and sufficient features which we can draw upon with the assurance that they constitute what really makes a person; there are only features which are more or less typical." She concludes that "a conclusive answer to the question of whether a fetus is a person is unattainable."

When your angle is terminating babies, asserting your victims aren't people is helpful. But we'll return to that in a bit. She does concede that as a fetus nears the time of birth, it begins to acquire more of the traits she listed, presumably becoming more of a person.

The crux of English's thesis begins to reveal itself when she talks about the ethics of self-defense. She claims that "additional argumentation is needed" to "bridge the gap between the premise that a fetus is an innocent person and the conclusion that killing it is always wrong." She continues, "to arrive at this conclusion, we would need the additional premise that killing an innocent person is always wrong." In English's world, "killing an innocent person is sometimes permissible, most notably in self-defense." I had a hard time at this moment imagining a scenario where I would kill an innocent person in self-defense. After all, self-defense generally involves defending oneself from aggressors, such as a burglar who has broken into your home or a street mugger who is trying to rob you. But never fear! English realizes "some examples may help draw out our intuitions or ordinary judgments about self defense."

So what is her powerful example, the one which will serve as the crux of her argument for the rest of the essay? Behold:

> Suppose a mad scientist, for instance, hypnotized innocent people to jump out of the bushes and attack innocent passers-by with knives. If you were so attacked, we agree you have a right to kill the attacker in self-defense, if killing him is the only way to protect your life or to save yourself from serious injury. It does not seem to matter here that the attacker is not malicious but himself an innocent pawn, for your killing of him is not done in a spirit of retribution but only in self-defense.

Seriously? Mad scientists and hypnosis is the best hypothetical you could come up with? I guess that's to be expected, since (as I pointed out before), in the real world, one does not have to defend oneself from an "innocent." However, because Jane English is going to try to make the argument that it is morally permissible to murder an innocent fetus, she needed to come up with something to make her argument sound sensible. Indeed, she continues by drawing a parallel between this super-likely science fiction scenario and a pregnancy:

> Some cases of pregnancy present a parallel situation. Though the fetus is itself innocent, it may pose a threat to the pregnant woman's well-being, life prospects or health, mental or physical. If the pregnancy presents a slight > threat to her interests, it seems self defense cannot justify abortion. But if the threat is on a par with a serious beating or the loss of a finger, she may kill the fetus that poses such a threat, even if it is an innocent person…It is unfortunate that the only way to free the woman from the pregnancy entails the death of the fetus (except in the very late stages of pregnancy).

Don't worry, English contradicts herself later and justifies abortion in cases where the pregnancy poses only a slight threat. And I hope the irony of a Strong, Independent (TM) woman being threatened by an unborn child – so much so as to justify killing this child in "self-defense" – isn't lost on you. English concedes that "thanks to modern technology, the cases are rare in which pregnancy poses as clear a threat to a woman's bodily health as an attacker brandishing a switchblade." She muses, "how does self-defense fare when more subtle, complex and long-range harms are involved?" Spoiler alert: not well! Here's her argument:

> To consider a somewhat fanciful example, suppose you are a highly trained surgeon when you are kidnapped by the hypnotic attacker. He says he does not intend to harm you but to take you back to the mad scientist who, it turns out, plans to hypnotize you to have a permanent mental block against all your knowledge of medicine. This would automatically destroy your career which would in turn have a serious adverse impact on your family, your personal relationships and your happiness. It seems to me that if the only way you can avoid this outcome is to shoot the innocent attacker, you are justified in so doing. You are defending yourself from a drastic injury to your life prospects. I think it is no exaggeration to claim that unwanted pregnancies (most obviously among teenagers) often have such adverse life-long consequences as the surgeon's loss of livelihood.

Wow. Where to begin? This example is so over the top ridiculous that English has to disclaim it before she even gets into it ("somewhat fanciful" being only somewhat understated). She says it would be permissible to kill the innocent hypnotized pawn in order to avoid the calamity described, except one problem with doing that is that there would be no way to have the foreknowledge that said innocent hypnotized pawn was going to drag you away to the mad scientist who was then going to permanently mindblock you. (Unless the attacker spills the beans of his plan BEFORE he has successfully kidnapped you – but who does that?) I think it is a gross exaggeration to claim that unwanted pregnancies "often" have such adverse life-long consequences – and moreover, we've been ignoring a crucial point to consider that unravels this whole ridiculous self-defense concept.

Except for an extremely small minority of specialized and highly unlikely cases, pregnancies are completely avoidable. Women have the regular pill, the morning after pill, the power to discriminate among their sexual partners, the power to insist upon condoms only when having sex, or the power to not have sex altogether if pregnancy is so scary and life-threatening. (The highly unlikely cases include instances where both the condom AND the pill fail – almost statistically impossible – or in instances of ACTUAL rape which end in pregnancy, which is also highly unlikely, unless you're one of those rape culture zealots.) Of course, Jane English, being a true woman and truer feminist, doesn't want to have anything to do with personal accountability:

> Let's suppose further that these hypnotized attackers only operate at night, so that it is well known that they can be avoided completely by the considerable inconvenience of never leaving your house after dark. One view is that since you could stay home at night, therefore if you go out and are selected by one of these hypnotized people, you have no right to defend yourself. This parallels the view that abstinence is the only acceptable way to avoid pregnancy. Others might hold that you ought to take along some defense such as Mace which will deter the hypnotized person without killing him, but if this defense fails, you are obliged to submit to the resulting injury, no matter how severe it is. This parallels the view that contraception is all right but abortion is always wrong, even in cases of contraceptive failure. A third view is that you may kill the hypnotized person only if he will actually kill you, but not if he will only injure you. This is like the position that abortion is only permissible if it is required to save a woman's life.

I think we've beaten into the ground how silly her analogy is, so I'm just going to point out the obvious – entirely missing from her analysis is the option of putting the child up for adoption instead of, you know, killing it. Moreover, her sense of "morality" seems to follow the contemporary trend of being thinly veiled hedonism. Having sex is certainly not an inalienable human right (which is why feminists and women so often balk at legalized prostitution), and it is an activity which often carries consequences (such as pregnancies or STDs). Suggesting that abstinence would help you avoid pregnancy is nowhere even near in the same ballpark as suggesting "you shouldn't leave your house after dark because there are people who could attack you after dark and if you get attacked because you left after dark well then you're just stupid." I could make a soup out of all the solipsism on display here – mmm, solipsism soup!

Let's fast forward to English's conclusion:

> In the early months of pregnancy, when the fetus hardly resembles a baby at all, then, abortion is permissible whenever it is in the interests of the pregnant woman or her family. The reasons would only need to outweigh the pain and inconvenience of the abortion itself. In the middle months, when the fetus comes to resemble a person, abortion would be justifiable only when the continuation of the pregnancy or the birth of the child would cause harms – physical, psychological, economic or social – to the woman. In the late months of the pregnancy, even on our current assumption that a fetus is not a person, abortion seems to be wrong except to save a woman from significant injury or death.

The logic that it is more permissible to kill something which, in the present moment, "may or may not be human" even though we know that in a few more weeks or months it most certainly will be human is hard for me to follow (and harder still to swallow). Oh, female morality. Of course, I wouldn't want someone who can't even take accountability for their own sexual proclivities to be raising children, but that doesn't mean they get a free pass to murder them either (and certainly not out of some warped sense of "self-defense.") Again, that's what adoption exists for. Or, and I'm going to whisper this in hushed tones, maybe you could give custody over to the father. I hear they're pretty good at raising children.

J. Durden aka Dr. Deezee is the Chief Architect of the Internet Hate Machine. J. Durden's brother recently won sole custody of J. Durden's nephew.

Monkey See, Monkey Do

Hawaiian Libertarian · 16 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of my favorite columnists is the ornery old ex-pat living in Mexico, Fred Reed. His latest column is an excellent piece on the inevitable collapse of the American economic and military empire, in which he uses the allegory of the monkey pot trap to illustrate the situation:

> Pondering Whither America, I reflected on a story, probably apocryphal but which I am going to believe because I like it, about catching monkeys. Tribesmen somewhere craft a heavy pot with a hole in it large enough that a monkey could insert an open hand, but not withdraw a closed fist. They then put monkey food in the pot. The monkey reaches in, grabs the food and, refusing to let go when the hunters approach, is caught and eaten.
> Here we have our politics in a paragraph. The American national monkey can't let go. The party is over, boys and girls, but we aren't going to adapt.

While Reed focuses his analogy to point out that the US is caught with it's proverbial hand caught in a pot of foreign military occupations and insurmountable debt, I think this analogy is perfectly applicable to a lot more aspects of our modern day dystopia.

Consider the hand of the feminist-driven government that promotes a culture that inevitably leads to demographic decline of the populace…but all of the entitlement programs and wealth transfer schemes they use to induce Western Women to follow the feminist proscriptions are based on taxing the "haves" and handing over to the "have-nots." But demographic decline means eventually you have more "have-not" dependents with their hands out and not enough "haves" producing the wealth for the government to take for redistribution.

The proverbial feminist monkey has got it's hand in the pot, grasping the entitlements and institutions it needs to exercise it's influence but can't let go as the demographic realities it engenders approach to consume it.

Or consider the mother who divorces her husband simply because she was bored and inspired by cultural propaganda like Eat, Pray, Love and her peers who convince her that divorce is a great lifestyle adjustment that will improve her life. So she reaches in the pot and grasps the goods. At first she sees only the benefits of full custody of the children..the alimony, the child support, the house, the car. What a feast in that pot she was able to grasp!

But those kids eventually grow up. The child support ends, the alimony ends and if she did nothing but live off the money the state was transferring from her ex-husband to herself, she will eventually be caught by her own dependency.

I had a neighbor who fell into this precise trap. Once her youngest daughter turned 18, she had to sell her house and move into an apartment in a matriarchal ghetto part of town. It's even more disgusting when you consider that she only had 5 years left on the mortgage and a mortgage payment that was literally only $1200 a month.

She could have gotten a job at a retail store or fast food restaurant to make those payments and own the house outright in 5 years time.

But 18 years of unemployment, living off the child support from her ex-husband to pay the bills, made her practically useless and unemployable. So now she's living off the ever dwindling proceeds of the sale of the house. I believe she's not even going to make it to social security age before that runs out. She'll be on welfare soon enough.

But worst for her is the abandonment by her children. They've all moved out on their own, and have essentially disowned her and don't keep in touch with her, even during the holidays. They've all reconnected and re-established relationships with their father, after years of alienation caused by their mother. She got everything she thought she wanted during those years…but is now left with nothing.

She put her hand in that pot and didn't even try to let go until it was far to late.

Or consider the traps laid out for men with regards to the institution of Marriage 2.0?

By the way, much thanks to "Puma" for putting the Wedded Abyss site back up!

Many a man has got his hand caught in that particular pot and didn't let go until he got spiritually, financially and emotionally raped by the divorce courts.

The allegory seems to be applicable to a wide range of institutions and cultural phenomena in our declining Western Civilization. It behooves you to recognize these traps laid out for us all, and refuse to put your hand into those pots and get caught.

Never forget that the primary bait used by society to get us all to put our hands in the various traps is our mass media cultural programming….Monkey see, monkey do.

While watching the NFL playoffs last weekend, I recognized a local banking commercial that reinforced the monkey see, monkey do programming that has been so successful in shaping the lives of our current generation – it showed a time lapse progression of a young girl's life – from high school, to college, to a career as a doctor, to a mid-30′s bride followed by the 1.5 children and the white picket fence house, with the narrator talking about how this bank is WITH YOU AT EVERY STAGE OF YOUR LIFE.

This is the norm for women in our Brave New World Order. This is the monkey pot for you to stick your hand in ladies, because you can have it all!

Monkey see, monkey do.

Are you a monkey too?

Scottish Woman Tricks Women into Bed, Is It Rape?

W.F. Price · 17 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Samantha Brooks of Glasgow has been fooling women into bed with her for some eight years, posing as a man to satiate her sexual appetite. She wrapped her breasts with bandages, claiming to have been burned or stabbed, and would not let her conquests touch her false penis. Somehow, she also managed to urinate while standing up (wouldn't want to clean that toilet).

Although this is a particularly extreme example of sex by fraud, one has to wonder whether her lovers were really ignorant enough to miss the clues, or whether they simply had regrets later on. Of course, if posing as another sex is criminal, things might get a bit more complicated for transsexuals. However, the feminist "mentula rea" (guilty penis) doctrine will inevitably be brought to bear, so the holder of the penis, even if fake as in this case, will be solely responsible.

Given the state of contemporary sex law, the fact that Ms. Brooks used a fake phallus rather than the real thing probably won't help her any more than it would help a bank robber using a fake gun.

The Witches of Nagyrev

W.F. Price · 17 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I check into the MensRights Reddit fairly frequently to keep up to date on news items concerning mens issues, and every now and then someone comes up with something very interesting. Yesterday, someone posted a number of links concerning a long-running spate of poisonings in early 20th century Hungary, and I'm glad I checked today because feminists have invaded the Mensrights subreddit to vote down any posts they don't approve of* and I probably would have missed this piece of history otherwise.

Some time during WWI, men in Nagyrev, a village south-east of Budapest, began dying in disproportionate numbers. The local midwife, a witch named Julia Fazekas, had arrived in 1911 with Susi Olah (presumably her lesbian lover), and was the only person in the area with any medical expertise. Fazekas was arrested on numerous occasions for illegally performing abortions, but sympathetic judges let her off the hook each time. The abortions may have been desired because the local women allegedly shacked up with allied POWs who were drafted into farm labor in the town while their husbands were away at war.

When the men came back from war and demanded their wives give up their lovers, some of the local women complained to Fazekas, who advised them that it would be a simple matter to poison the men with arsenic, which she extracted from fly paper. Soon thereafter, husbands, children and other inconvenient family members began dropping like the flies the arsenic was intended for. Because Fazekas's cousin was the local clerk, the deaths were not recorded as suspicious, and the murders escaped notice for years.

Finally, a medical student found a corpse in the river, and upon testing it discovered high levels of the poison, which led to suspicion. Then, in 1929, an anonymous letter to a newspaper located in a nearby town revealed the mass poisonings, and eventually 26 women went to trial. When police initially went to investigate Fazekas, she committed suicide with her own poison, thereby foiling justice and escaping the noose.

Of the 26 women tried, eight were sentenced to death, but only two were eventually executed. Of the remainder, 12 were sentenced to prison.

The story is a good reminder that we face very ancient passions, and that the line between barbarism and civilization is very thin and easily crossed. It also clearly demonstrates that darkness can dwell in the hearts of women just as in men, and that their own aggression can be tied to sexuality as well. But perhaps what it illustrates best is how a malicious woman like proto-feminist Julia Fazekas can sow discord in a community with deadly results. Where in early 19th century Austro-Hungary such a woman was relegated to the backwaters of the empire, today one can find them in universities, major publications and political office doling out their own version of poison to the women of our society.

* Apparently, the feminists are upset over the fact that the men's Reddit is so much more popular than their own, so, as one might expect, they've abandoned their own unpopular subreddits to harass men. This is the main problem with Reddit, which encourages this kind of petty "activism" through allowing outsiders to vote on posts in subreddits and push them down.

Who Really Wants Control?

W.F. Price · 17 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On our recent post concerning abortion, one of the commenters brought up one of the most common feminist arguments, which goes something like this:

Men oppose abortion, birth control, etc., because they really want control over women.

The same idea is applied to domestic violence, divorce, child custody, and just about everything else that might be disputed between a man and woman. Every time there is something that men and women don't see eye to eye on, it's an issue of the patriarchy wanting control.

This idea is very clearly reflected in domestic violence theory, perhaps best exemplified by the "power and control wheel" dreamed up in the fevered imagination of the creators of the Duluth Model domestic abuse program. Leaving aside the fact that many of the supposed controlling behaviors detailed on the wheel are probably more commonly practiced by wives than husbands, such as playing "mind games" and using the children to get what one wants, there is a catch in that denying being abusive makes one an abuser. So, according to the Duluth Model, if your wife calls you an abuser, you can deny it all you want, but that just confirms your status as an abuser, which subjects you to state control.

The New York Model for Batter Programs takes control a step farther, and imposes indoctrination sessions on those referred to the program. Additionally, it is a punitive rather than rehabilitative program, but cloaks this to some degree through a stated mission to change society. It is not only men that are subject to control through this particular program (and not all men ordered to attend are convicts, nor are all who have been convicted guilty), but all of society, which is clearly seen by directors as diseased and in need of change. To accomplish its goal, the NYMBP enlists the assistance of courts, the police, judges, social workers and others involved in coercive occupations. Clearly, this goes beyond the control that even the most criminally deranged husband could hope to impose on a wife.

When it comes down to it, it's pretty clear that feminists are obsessed with the idea of control, and they've made great strides in controlling men. Simply living under the same roof with a woman puts a man at the mercy of an army of agents of the state, and with a simple phone call a woman can put him under scrutiny that could last for years and have consequences for his entire life. This goes far beyond anything men have ever practiced under so-called patriarchal society, which for all its faults never was comfortable with interfering in domestic matters. For example, in older American or European society, could a husband ever have called the police to force his wife into an indoctrination center? He would have met with laughter or disbelief. In fact, even if a wife had beaten or cuckolded her husband, this would have been considered outside the bounds of the state's role. Only murder, wounding or possibly grand theft would have prompted any intervention on the part of the husband. In fact, as today, wives frequently absconded with the children, and men were left to their own devices to find them. Patriarchal "control" over women was mild indeed.

Contrast that to today's reality, where if a man absconds without his children there are numerous state and federal agencies dedicated to tracking him down and forcing him to pay her. Lord help the man if he tries to take his children — he'll be hunted down like a rabid dog.

The reluctance to actually control women carries over into even the most fervent supporters of what feminists would call the patriarchy. Anti-abortion activists kill an abortionist every few years, but has there ever been a case of one killing a woman who aborted her own child? Perhaps it is this aversion to controlling women that gives feminists such a sense of entitlement and contempt for men. They know in their heart of hearts that these so-called patriarchal men are actually simply their agents in controlling other men, and use them accordingly, hence the dark, hidden alliance between feminists and social conservatives that has emerged to clamp down on men from time to time.

The control impulse feminists ascribe to men is, like so many of their other issues, an example of projection. There is nothing feminists want more than to control every single aspect of their relationships and society. This is not a very masculine tendency, as men prefer a more dynamic rather than static environment. Men's natural genius is is suppressed by heavy-handed control, which leads to stagnation, apathy and inaction. The economic failure of Communist societies demonstrates what happens to men under oppressive, controlling regimes: they tend to become depressed and sluggish, and engage in dissipation rather than constructive pursuits.

The patriarchal control impulse is a pure fabrication, and more accurately describes feminist psychology than masculine behavior. Men are generally less obsessed by control than women, and they don't even come close to feminists, who would reverse Pinocchio and turn us all into puppets if they had their way.

Arrogant Woman Slaps Young Man, Brings Down Her Regime

W.F. Price · 18 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Mohamed Bouazizi, the young Tunisian man who set himself alight last month, died a few days ago, setting off a wave of protests that forced the Tunisian president to flee the country. Bouazizi had been forced to put aside his dreams of higher education to support his family to the best of his ability by selling fruits and vegetables in the town of Sidi Bouzid.

The incident that sparked his fatal protest was an act of petty tyranny perpetrated by a local agent, who decided she wanted to give the man the third degree. She demanded a nonexistent license, and when Bouazizi failed to produce the imaginary documentation, she then requested a bribe of about seven dollars. When the young man stood up to her, she slapped his face, spat on him, and then tossed his produce on the ground. Other police arrived and beat him, humiliating him beyond what he could bear.

An extremely upset Bouazizi went to the local government building, where he was refused entry and ignored. In desperation he filled a gas can, doused himself with gasoline, and set himself on fire in front of the government building.

The entire nation, filled with unemployed young men, watched as Bouazizi lingered in treatment, finally dying on January 4. After his death, protests escalated to the point where President Ben Ali, fearing for his life, fled the country, taking refuge in Saudi Arabia.

Although Tunisia is a Muslim, "Arab" country (it is actually largely Berber), it follows the pattern of Mediterranean culture in general, in which strongmen have frequently ruled along the lines of Qaddaffi, Francisco Franco, and Benito Mussolini. It is far from being a true Islamic state, and Ben Ali actually exerted quite a bit of effort in suppressing radical Islam, which threatened his authority. Since his government has dissolved in the wake of the crisis, radical Muslims have been openly marching in the streets for the first time in decades.

Authoritarian regimes in Muslim-majority states tend to favor women's empowerment, seeing women as natural allies in keeping fundamentalist Islam at bay and willing participants in corrupt patronage systems. However, favoring women can only go so far, as men need a certain degree of appeasement as well, and it seems that young Tunisian men have had enough of being – quite literally in this case – slapped around. Although the West is not in the same economic or demographic mess Tunisia is in, the pressure being put on young men shows no signs of abating, and we will probably see some more vigorous social protests in coming years. This will be especially true when men are forced to bear the burden not only of women, but aging baby boomers as well.

This, I think, is where men's media outlets such as The Spearhead will have real social value in coming years. It is our job to let our young men know how they got into this fix in the first place, and give them some ideas that might help them get out of it.

Mormon Woman Reflects on Virginity, Exposes Truth about American Men

W.F. Price · 18 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Nicole Hardy, a Seattle woman whose essay on being a virgin into her late 30s was recently published in the New York Times, has been thrust into the spotlight through her confessional piece. It is an odd, but undeniable characteristic of contemporary society that the less discreet a woman is the more she is rewarded, so there's nothing all that special about her sudden rise to prominence. Additionally, a woman who is still a virgin in her 30s is rare, so there's going to be a lot of interest in her story if she can tell it well.

However, she makes a good point in her essay that even non-Mormons and non-virgins can relate to. In fact, it's a point that is salient to the plunging marriage rate and the frequency of divorce, and one that applies to men as well as women. While complaining to a friend about her futile attempts at dating, a man approached her and let her know why she had such bad luck in love:

> Obviously, I was left over, too — I was just never sure what my problem was. Until one man let me know. After overhearing a friend and me comparing our weekend horror-date stories, he walked up to me and asked, "You know what your problem is?"
> No, I did not know what my problem was. And I was dying to find out.
>
> "Your problem," he said, "is you don't need a man."
> [...]
>
> "Men in the church are raised to be providers. We are the breadwinners, the stewards of the household. If you have all the things we're supposed to provide, we have nothing to give you."
> "What of love?" I asked. "What of intimacy and partnership and making a run at the world together?"
> "Nope," he said. "We're providers."

After Richard Francis Burton, the famous British linguist and colonial agent, visited Utah and had a talk with Brigham Young, he came to see Mormonism as the quintessentially American religion. Perhaps he was on to something, because the above exchange between a couple Mormons gets right to the root of the problem between American men and women.

We American men are providers. We are breadwinners. That's our role. Take it away, and we have nothing to offer.

It's a cultural imperative so deeply ingrained in society that it will take decades to change, if it ever does. The tragedy of contemporary society is that we've done such a good job of it that we now provide for all women, and we are almost all unnecessary. The reason the upper middle class still has a low divorce rate is because the old roles work at a certain level of expectations — the well-paid doctor or attorney can provide enough above the norm to preserve his utility. But for the rest of us, we have nothing to offer but a shared domicile, and that's paltry fare.

If we are ever to bridge this rift between men and women, we'll need a spiritual revolution. Men need to see themselves as more than purely material beings. More, even, than purely sexual beings. Because if that's all we are, we'll never mean much more to women than a new car.

Perhaps it begins when we – both as individuals and society in general – start to value ourselves for more than what we can provide to women.

A Couple Good Reviews of Blue Valentine

W.F. Price · 19 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently, cinema is beginning to catch on to the realities of hypergamy, and a recently-released film explores the effects of contemporary society's promotion of women at the expense of men and family.

I haven't seen Blue Valentine, so I'll let Chateau and Steve Sailer speak for it. According to Chateau/Roissy, it's a clear example of what happens when a man loses his Game, and according to Sailer "a craftily designed study of the big things that influence how families form and fall apart."

Even if you don't plan on watching the movie, the reviews are worth reading.

A review in the Village Voice suggests that the film has misogynistic elements, probably because it depicts how callous women can be toward husbands who no longer turn them on (in the feminist universe women only ditch their husbands because they're abusive, horrible men).

Australian Man Facing Trial for 1963 Spousal Rape

W.F. Price · 19 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In an odd decision that sets a questionable precedent, an Australian appellate court has decided that although there was no such crime as spousal rape in 1963, because marriage implied consent to sex under common law, a man accused of the new crime of spousal rape should now stand trial for the nearly 50-year-old alleged crime.

It's doubtful that the facts of such an old case can ever be accurately represented, which raises the question of why courts want to try the man at all, but more importantly the decision sends a clear message that courts can arbitrarily punish people simply by having laws changed and arresting them for violating laws that didn't exist when they engaged in this or that activity. For example, say a Christian theocracy took hold in some Western country (highly unlikely — I know), made abortion illegal, and then rounded up all the abortion providers for having aborted babies when it was legal to do so. Aside from the divergent politics, there's really no difference from a legal standpoint.

Even in recent politically-motivated prosecutions in the US, such as the arrests of suspected killers of civil rights activists decades after the fact, the men were charged with crimes that were clearly against laws that stood at the time, and there is no statute of limitations on murder. In fact, the only cases in which people have been prosecuted by civilized nations despite not having broken contemporaneous laws are war crimes trials, e.g. Nuremberg and the Tokyo Trials.

What this suggests is that Australian judges see pre-feminist Australian society as having been ruled over by an illegitimate regime, which would throw into question the legitimacy of the current Australian legal regime, based as it is upon precedent and a constitution that predates 1970 by many decades. Perhaps the only logical conclusion is that Australia is a lawless society, ruled over by strongmen in black robes, and with a constitution worth less than the paper it's written on.

I took a class once on the state of law in China, and we learned about different types of legal regimes. One, which would seem to apply to primitive societies, is "Rule of Man," in which there is no law but the ruler's word. A step up from that is "Rule by Law," in which the ruler uses laws, usually issued by decree, to control society. Finally, the most enlightened system is "Rule of Law," in which no man is above the law. One might argue that Australia has descended to Rule by Law, but actually, in retroactively applying today's law, it appears to be closer to a Rule of Man society, or the most primitive kind of legal regime.

Flashbacks of Misandry: Sex Trafficking and the Super Bowl

Chuck Ross · 19 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam and Bernard Chapin have exposed the evil campaign perpetrated by Change.org and Traffick911 to draw attention to the scourge of domestic sex trafficking. Through statistical hyperbole and by lumping men, in general, with a few pathological sex traffickers, those activists have sacrificed men and used the Super Bowl as the chopping block.

[image]Traffick911 perpetrated male universal criminality by employing NFL player Jay Ratliff in their PSA in which he stated "And I'm mad [about sex trafficking]. Men I'm talking to you." One wonders which men is he talking to? He shouldn't talk to me; I've never trafficked anyone. Talk to the men (and women) who sell children into sexual bondage.

Ratliff goes on to say, "Real men don't buy children. They don't buy sex." Some "real men" do buy children, unfortunately. After all, androids aren't doing it. But "real good men" don't do it. Ratliff conflates the two because it has more mass appeal. And he goes a step further by saying that "real [good] men" don't buy sex. That is debatable and depends on the definition of the word "buy".

On the supply end, Traffick911 produced another PSA in which a youthful looking "All-American" boy type intimated that he was the face of sexual trafficking. Not the ex-con with tattoos on his face. He, the everyman, was a sexual deviant. And his clients are "just like us": they are fathers, husbands, teachers, and lawyers.

Vanillaizing, Americanizing, domesticizing, demonizing. That is the tactic activists utilize by spouting these myths to drum up support for their cause du juor. Twenty years ago it was domestic violence; today it is sexual trafficking.

Now that Messrs. Elam and Chapin have elucidated the macro mechanism that allows activist organizations to foist their lies onto a sympathetic and unsuspecting mass, and considering that these groups are vying for precious resources – time, attention, and money – it is necessary to inspect the quality of the statistics that Traffick911 is using to conjure up sympathy for their cause.

In their high-gloss pamphlets set for release in the Dallas area, Traffick911 offers these facts:

100,000 to 300,000 U.S. children are forced into sexual slavery each year for the pleasure and profit of their perpetrators.

Initial estimates cited in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) put the number of trafficking victims entering the United States at 50,000. Since then, the estimate has been reduced to between 14,500 and 17,500.

Traffick911 doesn't provide a citation for its statistics although it seems to be traced back to an article published in 1996 by the Christian Science Monitor (it seems likely that this article is the source of the number, which includes the United States and Canada, because they use another citation from this article in another one of their bullet points). But the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services cited an estimation that between 244,000 and 325,000 American youth were at risk for sexual exploitation. The researchers responsible for these figures, University of Pennsylvania professors Estes and Weiner, suggest that the numbers be used with caution:

> These estimates…reflect what we believe to [be] the number of children in the United States "at risk" of commercial sexual exploitation, i.e. children who because of their unique circumstances of runaways, thrownaways, victims of physical or sexual abuse, users of psychotropic drugs, members of sexual minority groups, illegally trafficked children, children who cross international borders in search of cheap drugs and sex, and other illicit fare, are at special risk of sexual exploitation. The numbers presented in these exhibits do not, therefore, reflect the actual number of cases of the CSEC in the United States, but, rather, what we estimate to be the number of children "at risk" of commercial sexual exploitation.

Despite the caveat, the researchers used a curious methodology to arrive at their “at risk” estimate. They provided a list of “feeder” characteristics or markers that suggest an increased risk for becoming a child sexual trafficking victim. These at risk youth were tallied up to arrive at the large number being cited. For example, 14,329 American youth, ages 13-17, living within driving distance of Mexico or Canada were added to the “at risk” pile.

If anything, the number of domestic youth sold or forced into sexual bondage is much lower than the numbers cited in Traffick911′s literature.

Our society, with the normalization of commercial sex and the glamorization of pimping, is driving the horrific crime against our children. One pimp said, “we don’t have to groom our girls anymore, society is doing it for us.”

Ah, from the mouths of pimps.

If one reads the litany of feeder characteristics listed by researchers, victims are commonly poor and abused. “Society” isn’t grooming girls for anything; they are falling into it because they have few viable options, or they are preyed upon by a small number of bad men.

Traffick911 uses the phrase “the normalization of commercial sex” instead of one more apt for this discussion: “the normalization of sex” – period. This leftist-activist group would sweep the rug from under their own feet by admitting that feminism and sexual relativism contributes more to any social degradation than the normalization of commercial sex. And men soliciting prostitutes isn’t yet “normalized” in this country.

As for “glamorization of pimping”, take that up with the leftist propaganda arm previously known as Music Television.

1 out of 3 children who become homeless are sold into sexual slavery within 48 hours of hitting the street.

This is the most egregious lie of the entire campaign. The willingness to lie to this extent calls every single one of Traffick911′s statistics and motivations into question. Here’s what a discerning person should know:

The original citation of this statistic came in a 1996 article published in the Christian Science Monitor. The author stated:

> Within 48 hours of hitting the streets, a juvenile will be approached with an offer of money, food, or shelter in exchange for sex.

This isn’t cited either, but it is still much less benign than the picture painted by Traffick911. The group would have us imagine that gangs of men are roaming the streets black-bagging runaway youth and forcing them into sex. Instead of being forced, they are solicited for sex in order to “get by”.

The tactic of these activist groups is to shorted the window of opportunity for us to act on this very urgent problem. By making sensationalist claims, giving us a 48 hour window to save these youth, the activists hope to force a critical mass of people to make irrational decisions with their money, time, and attention.

A war of attrition. War of attention. Same difference.

The Department of Justice designated the I-10 corridor as the number one route for human trafficking in the U.S.

Traffick911 brings this up because the interstate runs several hours south of Dallas, where the Super Bowl is being held this year.

But I-10 is an interesting highway because it runs contiguously along the southern portion of the country. It begins in Jacksonville, Florida, touching the Atlantic Ocean; moves down to the mouth of the Mississippi River; stops in Houston, Texas – a major port; then touches El Paso – which is damn near Mexico; and it ends up in California.

I bring this up because Traffick911 is concerned with domestic sex trafficking. But being so close to major American entry points like El Paso, Houston, New Orleans, and Jacksonville indicates that trafficking victims are both non-domestic and not necessarily used for sex. Which brings up a whole other part of this debate that isn't being discussed: labor trafficking and the use of male victims.

Using the Super Bowl and Conclusion

Curiously, Change.org has made a national case by honing in on the Super Bowl and its fans, calling thousands of them "rapists" and demonizing men. This reeks of the tactics used by domestic violence activists back in the early 1990s who conjured up false claims about the prevalence of domestic violence on Super Bowl Sunday.

But why focus on the Super Bowl? There are large conventions held in American cities all year long. Las Vegas' modern existence is based on them. If sex trafficking is as big a problem as activists claim, why not focus on those venues? By leveraging a "masculine holiday", they are able to kill two birds with one stone. The draw attention to their cause and they diminish an event that is heralded and looked forward to by men across the world. Not only this, but they use an occasion where men are smashing their heads into one another to draw attention to their issue and then turn around and paint all men with one brush.

That loose cabal of feminists are employing macro and micro tactics to destroy masculinity.

Male Studies Taps Guy Garcia for Conference

Male Studies?

I was fairly skeptical about the excitement surrounding the first Conference for Male Studies. To begin with, the presentation was completely tone deaf down to their combination of a rainbow graphic with a photo of a good looking but vaguely lonesome young guy. Along with the lavender color palette gives the Male Studies web site the look and feel of a queer youth outreach program. Clearly, these guys need to study males a little harder.

Their public relations guy, Joseph Notovitz, stopped returning my emails during an interview I was doing with him before the conference. I figured he was overwhelmed with other requests at the time, so I went ahead and published a hopeful but cautious plug for the conference, using the only answer he gave me. My second, unanswered question was rephrased as part of my introduction in that piece. For reference, I've posted the full text of my second question below:

> Well, it seems as though the understanding of how the male "ticks" is at an all-time low because many strains of feminist thought regard men as if they were physically malformed women who are afflicted with a pathological superiority complex, and who are in need of immediate treatment and re-education so that they can function more or less in the same fashion and capacity as proper "healthy" women. (Though women may mercifully allow their "cured" males to open jars and take out the garbage once in a while).
> That seems to be the case with some of the reactions to the conference I've seen so far in the media. Some have been dismissive, and others have expressed anger or disgust that anyone would even take an interest in the success or failure of males. They find the idea that males — who they've been taught to regard only as cruel oppressors — may be suffering or struggling to be laughable no matter what evidence is presented.
> You must have expected this kind of reception. How do you respond to those who believe that the study of males is unnecessary? How do you respond to the cliché that "everything else aside from women's studies is about males and the history of males?"

I never questioned why Notovitz didn't respond to my second question, and I accept that he may have simply run out of time.

Lionel Tiger's association with the first Conference for Male Studies is what really caught my eye. Tiger's important book "The Decline of Males" anticipated the currently trending "End of Men" discussion by over a decade. Tiger is a real heavyweight on a very short list of academics who have made an honest attempt to understand men and the problems they can expect to face in the new big-government "bureaugamy" (a clever word he coined in the book).

[image]
Guy "Never Blame Women" Garcia

I was disappointed to receive notice today through the Foundation for Male Studies email list that Guy "Never Blame Women" Garcia is being enthusiastically promoted as moderator for their Second Annual Conference on Male Studies, Looking Forward to Solutions. Having read and recently reviewed Garcia's book, this selection increases my skepticism about anything meaningful coming out of these conferences aside from building the credentials of market-savvy media consultants like Garcia and garnering funding to support the careers of a new crop of academic victimologists. I have a hard time determining where Guy Garcia ends and someone like Michael Kimmel begins. The only difference between them seems to be one of degree. Both are feminists, though perhaps the Kimmel would balk and respond that Garcia's "freedom through failure" method of supplication to women isn't feminist enough.

My initial estimation of the Male Studies movement stands. It seems like a bunch of academics with good intentions, who want to send more boys to school so that they can compete more effectively with females to get unsustainable make work jobs that males don't want in a civilization which is clearly in decline. Male Studies is correct to identify men as the new victims in a society that sees men, rightly, as a threat to its new status quo. These guys may want to help men, but all they are doing is helping them get into the buffet line while the Titanic is sinking.

Real social change for men will be a while coming, and when it comes it may look a bit more like social change in Mexico. Women make up over 50% of the population. They are socially more cooperative (as many recent articles have bragged) in situations where hierarchies are unclear, and they love to network. Even the Tea Party depends on the "Mama Grizzly" factor. Women will continue to elect people who will pander to their interests and expand their entitlements. Men will not rise again democratically, through education, or through clever social engineering. Men negotiate and settle wild zones. They will experience resurgence in the aftermath of social collapse.

High School Boy Takes a Page From Karen Owen

W.F. Price · 20 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the article on Karen Owen that just appeared in The Atlantic and was promptly eviscerated by Pierce Harlan here on The Spearhead, it is interesting to note the reaction to a recent incident in a Chicago-area high school.

A male student at Oak Park-River Forest High School made up a list of female students on Facebook, then judged them according to various attributes. He then printed out reams of copies and handed them out to other boys at the school, then made a scene at the student center, dancing around and shouting "women are the future, unless we stop them now" to cheers from his fellow classmates.

The girls on the list were given nicknames, such as "The Designated Drunk" and "The Amazing Bisexual." One girl who was on the list insisted that the listed girls are all "athletic, beautiful, honors students, talented." Evidently, the list was quite comprehensive, ranking girls on facial beauty as well as anatomical attributes. It seems certain that the boy got the idea from Karen Owen.

However, where the story really differs is in the reaction to the boy's list. While Karen Owen is all but called a rape victim by Caitlin Flanagan for violating intimacy, parents and school officials are calling for the boy's head. He faces possible expulsion, and a number of people called the police on him. If the boy had actually slept with any of the girls on the list and rated their vaginas, as Karen Owen rated her conquests' penises, he'd probably already be in jail.

What the boy did was inadvisable, to say the least, but where Karen Owen gets either praise or sympathy from feminists, he'll receive neither.

In addition to revealing a double standard, he also clues us in to the fact that now even boys know the score. His shout of "women are the future" is probably a verbatim repetition of what they are telling high school students today. Although feminism had already taken root when I was in high school, I can hardly imagine what it must be like for young men today, facing subordinate status and irrelevance in a world that heaps scorn on men. It's little wonder the kid acted out.

Male use of Battered Person Syndrome back in the news

J. DeVoy · 20 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

Muzzammil "Mo" Hassan co-founded Bridges TV with his wife, Aaslya, to counter negative stereotypes about Muslims across the world in the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks perpetrated on the United States. They lived in an idyllic suburb of Buffalo, New York where there had not been a single recorded murder since 1986. On February 12, 2009, Mo Hassan allegedly beheaded his wife following their decision to divorce.

This week, on his fourth attorney and forced to proceed, Hassan's trial is underway in Buffalo. Hassan's attorney will seek to use the Battered Person Syndrome (formerly Battered Women Syndrome) defense in order to justify Hassan's actions and obtain acquittal for his client. Whether this will be possible, however, remains to be seen.

While not always a reliable source of information, the Wikipedia entry for Battered Person Syndrome (BPS) is reasonably accurate:

> Battered person syndrome is derived from psychologist Lenore Walker's Battered Woman Syndrome [aka BWS], a theory she came up with in the late 1970s to explain domestic violence. A theory of multiple victimization, BWS used the "cycle of violence" and learned helplessness to explain the development of a psychological problem in women who are repeatedly abused by their husbands.
> BWS later entered the legal realm when Walker began giving expert testimony about BWS at trials of women accused of killing their abuser. Although her intention was to show that the woman's actions may have been justifiable, the only way that translated in the courtroom was as an argument of self-defense.

The admissibility of BPS is subject to jurisdictional wrinkles around the country. The upshot, which may vary from state to state, is that such evidence is admissible if it is in relation to a claim of self-defense. BPS is not a defense in and of itself, but contributes to an existing self-defense explanation for an accused murderer's actions.

Oddly enough, Hassan claims to have such a defense in this case, and accuses his deceased wife of brandishing a knife against him shortly before her death. In some states, simply pulling a knife on someone at an undetermined point before a defensive killing isn't enough to constitute self-defense and defeat a murder charge. But, it may be the gateway for Hassan to introduce evidence that he suffered from BPS.

BPS evaluates psychological characteristics, and in that respect should apply to psychological and physical abuse. Though there is an obvious disparity in the conduct of physical and psychological abuse, the psychological consequences may be identical, or similarly expressed. While men and women may process such harm differently, the U.S. Constitution would almost certainly not allow such a defense to be available to only women, as it does not rely on an immutable gender trait (i.e. a woman's unique ability to conceive children). While physical abuse may leave visible scars, why wouldn't years of henpecking, berating, economic ransom through threatened divorce, and other verbal abuse leave similar – if not identical – mental damage?

It may be unmasculine to whine about a spouse's never-ending harassment and admit that it psychologically damaged him. But when one's liberty is on the line, should masculinity and the societal pressure to "man up" preclude a man from using a potentially exonerating defense? Hell no.

Just as it is easy to see why a man can suffer the same psychological abuse as a woman within a relationship, even if effected through different instrumentalities, why is it so hard to believe that Hassan's wife may have threatened to kill him – even repeatedly?

Donn Esmonde, a mangina one-track columnist for the Buffalo News who probably wouldn't last a week writing for a paper in a real city, excoriated Hassan's potential defense:

> Having admitted the killing hours afterward, there was—in way of defense —not much Hassan could do but claim he was the abused, not the abuser. Hassan's defense—voiced Tuesday by Schwartz—is the legal equivalent of a Hail Mary pass, the courtroom version of buying a lottery ticket: It was he—not she—who feared being killed. According to Mo Hassan, she even pulled a knife on him during a private meeting earlier on the day of her death.

Yes, how implausible! Tiger Woods' ex certainly didn't batter him with a golf club. Brittney Spears didn't attack an SUV with an umbrella in a bald rage, either. I'm sure Lorena Bobbit used her bare hands! Women who have disclosed their violent acts to me have always acted with some kind of instrumentality, whether keys, bottles, pans or other kitchen items. In my stupider middle school days, I knew that arguing with the wrong boy would escalate to, at worst, a punch to the mouth. Based on observations in life and the media, it is not hard to say there's a definite trend of women using weapons, and virtually anything but their hands, to cause harm to others.

This isn't to say I would want Hassan's case. The facts are very much against him, and he may well have done it. But to presume him guilty and a cold-blooded killer because he allegedly murdered his wife ignores the half of the story which we have not yet heard. Like a false claim of rape, the functional reality of any crime a man is charged of committing against a woman turns the public's presumption to one of guilt, rather than innocence.

If Hassan is found guilty of murder, he deserves an appropriately harsh sentence. Irritation and stress are no justifications for taking the life of another. To the extent the law recognizes that BPS may be used to establish self-defense, however, Hassan should fully explore this route. As well documented here and elsewhere on the internet, men endure great risk within marriage; even with a prenup, there is no guarantee against a wife falling out of love with a man – possibly even because of his own actions aimed to demonstrate commitment and caring – and, maliciously or not, making him an indentured servant to her, the state and the courts. For anyone with future-time orientation, this is a significant amount of background stress. Is it so hard to believe that a wife's nagging and unceasing pestering can aggravate it to dangerous levels, even on par with those experienced by a beaten women? When a fight ends, it's over and the pain subsides even if psychological harm persists; nagging and criticism about male worth, especially over years, goes right to the psychological core. If one's spouse is his equal and confidant, how can he stay balanced if she thinks of – and treats – him as barely a man?

BPS may not be appropriate in this case due to the need for an articulable theory of self-defense. It should not be written off as unavailable to men, though. If psychological harm truly is a concern and probative of self-defense in murder cases, men should have every ability to show their victimization at the hands of their wives as well.

Writer Can't Stand the Fact that the 'Fuck List' Author Likes Dick, A Lot

pierceharlan · 20 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There's another hand-wringing piece, this time in the Atlantic, disparaging Duke University grad Karen Owen's so-called "Fuck List" (technically called "An education beyond the classroom: excelling in the realm of horizontal academics") as decidedly anti-female empowerment, anti-new woman, and anti-new face of feminism. The piece was written by someone named Caitlin Flanagan, who declares that the Fuck List's author is not "a boundary-breaking, sexually empowered new woman" but someone who "seems . . . to have been invented by a committee of frat boys" because she enjoys rough sex "to the point of brutalizing" and seems to be "willing to do absolutely anything to please the men . . . ."

Flanagan harrumphs: "What rotten luck that the first true daughter of sex-positive feminism would have an erotic proclivity for serving every kind of male need, no matter how mundane or humiliating, that she would so eagerly turn herself from sex mate to soccer mom, depending on what was wanted from her."

Even Owen's taste in sex partners were decidedly not "new woman": Owen had the audacity to be in thrall of "handsome white athletes."

To Flanagan, Owen is nothing more than "a vulnerable creature whose desire for sex with campus big shots was at least partly motivated by a powerful and unmet desire for affection," but she "had no idea how to obtain it." The Fuck List, Flanagan concludes, "reveals [Owen] to be one of the most pitiable women to emerge on the cultural scene in quite a while."

And that's not even the most condescending thing in the piece. Flanagan has absolutely nothing good to say about men. The ones she writes about here do nothing but take advantage of women to satisfy their sexual desires. Based on nothing more than Owen's descriptions of her various sexual hook-ups, Flanagan labels the athletes featured in the list as "louts" who were "eager[ ] to whip out their genitals on almost any occasion," and who "offer[ed] any parent ample reason to think twice before sending a beloved child to Duke."

The fact that a fair reading of the Fuck List doesn't support that condemnation is beside the point. It is true that the young men were eager to have sex. If that's a revelation to Flanagan, she's been living in a convent all her life. But if the young men were eager to get it on — surprise! — so was Ms. Owen. Almost all of the young men were respectful of Owen and appear to have acted only in accordance with her choices. But, hey, why let little things like evidence get in the way of a good feminist rant?

Flanagan takes her cheapest shot (and that's saying a lot) at the Fuck List's unnamed Subject # 1 who was one of the Duke lacrosse players on the team when the infamous false rape claim was made, and whose identity is easily discovered: ". . . his blandly handsome face and powerfully built body had taken on the cast of a thug rapist and then of a hapless sex partner who couldn't even keep it up long enough to satisfy an inexperienced co-ed." That the Atlantic published this unwarranted hatchet job on an unsuspecting kid, who never dreamed his hook-up would be chronicled in a PowerPoint presentation gone viral, tells us all we need to know about that once great magazine.

Flanagan ends the piece by bemoaning drunken women's vulnerability to men. She hates the fact women must rely "on the mercy of the men around us."

Flanagan's horse dung is more of the same old, same old that regards women like Karen Owen – who seem to genuinely enjoy men – as anything but free moral agents capable of making rational choices for themselves.

How dare Karen Owen lust after handsome white athletes! How dare she enjoy not just fellatio but, heaven forbid, rough sex! How dare she wants to please the men she beds! The fact that Owen genuinely seems to have had at least a good time, and sometimes a great time, with virtually all of these guys is something Flanagan ignores, because that doesn't fit the narrative. To someone like Flanagan, women like Owen are either too dense, or too subservient to the “patriarchy,” to realize they are being taken advantage of by men. Thank goodness Owen has women like Flanagan around to tell her what a miserable time she really had with these “louts.”

Seething just under the surface of Flanagan’s piece, unstated but present, is the thing that might just be the most galling to her about the Fuck List: Karen Owen likes dick. A lot. Pardon the crudeness, but that’s the overriding theme of the Fuck List, and Flanagan can’t help but have noticed it. The Fuck List is replete with references to the male organ of copulation, the quintessential symbol of patriarchy. Under her “Physical Attractiveness” criteria, she includes, among other things, “penile structures.” Another criteria is size: “Points were determined based on the length and girth of the Subject’s hardware.” Indeed, every subject is rated, in part, on his appendage: ”He is enormous,” she gushes about one subject. About another: ”I was actually rendered speechless. . . . I wasn’t even sure what to do with the situation at hand (erm, mouth?).” Another guy was “huge”; another was “very well equipped”; and another was “packing some decently sized hardware.” But of another guy she writes, “Wait. . . . Was that his dick? No, it couldn’t be.”

Another of Owen’s criteria is “Aggressiveness: points were given if the Subject displayed aggressive behavior and an alpha-male mentality of assuming control of the given situation.”

Is it any wonder feminists have no use for the Fuck List? Masculinity, they assert, needs to be rebuilt from the ground up to make it less dominant, less virile, less aggressive. Yet here’s a woman touting the virtues of rough sex? Come again?

As for penises, feminist extraordinaire Germaine Greer attacked the Fuck List by insisting women aren’t interested in that: “It’s a website where you talk about what it’s like to get off with someone in terms of the size of his tackle. That’s not what women are interested in.” This from a woman who once did TV special about the beauty of boys in which an 18-year-old male model posed in the nude while Greer waxed poetic about young male sperm: “There are many ways in which a boy is an ideal fantasy partner for a woman,” she clucked. “Any woman of taste would have a boy for a lover rather than a man. He’s easier to manage. His sperm flows like tap water, which happens to be a biological fact. And quicker recovery time and all that kind of thing. More rewarding in all sorts of ways. Conversation might be a bit lacking, but then, who does it for conversation?”

The Fuck List does raise some troubling issues, about the hook-up culture, and about the recklessness of making very public some very private and very personal matters.

But what scares Caitlin Flanagan is that there are women out there like Karen Owen who have the audacity to actually like men for what they are, instead of for what some enlightened feminists insist they should be.

Budget Cuts Beginning to Take Their Toll on Women-Oriented Social Programs

W.F. Price · 21 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Local governments have been hit hard by the drop in revenue caused by the economic recession, and are facing tough decisions about who to cut from their patronage networks. Demonstrating just how desperate cities are getting, even feminist Seattle has cut the Domestic Violence & Sexual Assault Prevention divisions from its Human Services Department, along with Youth Development & Achievement and Early Learning & Family Support.

According to comments under the article, the city attorney is already inundated with domestic violence cases, and cannot handle much more.

Although prevention of domestic violence and sexual assault is a laudable goal, as we saw in Sweden with the Assange case government agents tasked with this job have a tendency to zealously investigate even where neither exists. This leads to a climate of domestic paranoia, and encourages the use of these resources by disgruntled spouses. Furthermore, it often functions as a subsidy to man-haters and feminist ideologues who tend to see sexual assault and domestic violence lurking behind every closed door.

The Youth Development & Achievement and Early Learning & Family Support divisions are simply welfare programs overwhelmingly geared toward poor single mothers and their progeny. While these programs may alleviate some of the problems inherent in single motherhood, they also create the conditions that encourage it, and are therefore part of the problem as well.

It is ironic that as government has taken over the role of daddy by forcing all men to support all women, it has impoverished and demotivated men to the extent that they can no longer afford to support the system designed to replace them. One could say that the US government is behaving in much the same manner as the drunk, incompetent farmer of Orwell's animal farm.

Good Men Project Veering Off Course

W.F. Price · 21 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When the Good Men Project opened, I was enthusiastic about it, and assumed that the examination of American masculinity it promised would be a step in the right direction. For the most part, they've done a pretty good job. The site is professionally laid out, there's a wealth of content, and plenty of articles that appeal to men. It also has the potential for a good deal of mainstream appeal, and I expect the site to make a fairly substantial impact online.

Given its potential, I think it's important that we take a look at where the Good Men Project is heading, and who is jumping on board.

Today's feature, written by project founder Tom Matlack, takes men to task for the objectification of women, offering some insight.

The article is controversial in that it blames pornography and lascivious portrayals of famous women for a number of ills afflicting men, and puts the blame squarely on men themselves. Perhaps this is why Amanda Marcotte, John Edwards' head blogger for his failed presidential campaign, anti-Catholic bigot and enthusiastic ringleader of the media lynch mob in the Duke Lacrosse false rape case, has shown up to offer her seal of approval to the article.

I don't think it was Matlack's intention to play squarely into Marcotte's hands, and I suspect his reading of the situation is as much a result of the circumstances of his own life as it is part of any political agenda. With an adolescent daughter, I'm sure that the sleazy side of pop culture is starting to bother him, and this, along with the fact that he's middle-aged and married, is probably giving him some difficult feelings of guilt over his own lust for the young sexpots so casually flashed around on TV and the big screen.

The problem is that he's projecting that guilt onto men in general, and that is a mistake:

> I click on bustier-clad Katy Perry and skip down to the interview, trying to ignore Ms. Perry in full black lingerie, complete with garter belt. After all, this is about man at his best; there must be something serious here that we all love so much.
> Ah, here it is: "I always wanted to suspend from the ceiling in a twirling banana," Katy tells Esquire.
> I'm done. I close the browser window and stare out the window.
> Who are the men Esquire's talking about? What is it that we love about these women? Their twirling-banana-swing fantasies? Their factory-fresh "breasts"? Their naughty smiles? Are those things truly what men at their best love about women?
> In media and culture, men are increasingly caricatured as knuckle-dragging cartoon characters, particularly when it comes to how we view women and sexuality. And by whom? Men, of course. It's not women running the strip clubs, porn websites, and editing spreads in Esquire. We have an enemy—and the enemy is us.

What Mr. Matlack is struggling with is common to men, and there's no reason to dismiss his frustration. Sexuality is a primal force that operates largely beyond our control. For men at certain points of their lives it can be not only distracting, but has the potential to be hurtful to those people we love.

One can see his inner struggle quite clearly in the following passage:

> Yes, good men love women. But we love women in all their complexity, for the things they do, for their intelligence, their wit, their athleticism, their creativity, their power, their force of personality. We seem to have forgotten that along the way, and our brain-numbing intoxication by pornography in all its forms threatens to end us—not because it is morally wrong but just because it distracts us from the truth and scatters our power. It's one big acid trip fantasy with no connection to improving our lives, being good fathers and > husbands, and advancing our careers.

No, it doesn't have much to do with improving one's life, being a good father or husband or advancing a career. That's because lust is a biological imperative rising from the deepest, most primitive recesses of our brains. For all our spectacular neural complexity and high-performance neo-cortices, underneath it all we've got a lot in common with reptiles. That's something we cannot change without reversing evolution and then starting over again from the earliest vertebrates. In other words, it's impossible without our own extinction, and our extinction is exactly what these impulses evolved to prevent.

All we can do to prevent ourselves from allowing our primal instincts to ruin a good thing is exercise self-control. For those of us who are married and/or have children, we have to exercise more control than others. It's a hard slog, but that's the best we can do.

Where Matlack is going in the wrong direction is when he suggests that his own personal burden should be extended to men in general. This strikes me as less than charitable. For example, as a father, I can't go running around spending my money on strippers or porn, or put up posters of topless women on my walls, or even bring women home, but these are things I'd never begrudge someone who doesn't have that responsibility. Would it be fair to tell a 19-year-old kid in Afghanistan stuck in some godforsaken, dusty valley getting shot at on a daily basis that he can't look at naughty pictures of girls with big tits?

Matlack underscores his love for his children and his successful, beautiful and presumably faithful wife as reasons that pornography and lust are toxic to him. Yes, I suppose he's got a point. But has he stopped to consider the fact that while this wonderful wife and family are worth the struggle for him, they are entirely irrelevant to millions of other men? More importantly, would he ever consider that if he truly does want men in general to exercise that kind of self-control and prevail in the struggle against dissolution, they need and deserve decent wives and secure families to make it worth it?

When you ask men to take on a burden, you draw up a contract with them. You give them a reason to toe the line. Asking them to give up what little they have and expose themselves to ruin simply so they can call themselves "good" is a con, and not a benign one. Matlack should take stock of what he has, thank heaven for it, and do good by trying to make that kind of life attainable to more men. In blaming men in general, he's working against it and handing ammo to people like Amanda Marcotte, and that's doubleplusungood.

Mind-Game Victim? This $63 Million Welfare Federal Program Can Help!

Featured Guest · 22 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

Sen. Patty Murray of Washington has never seen a government stocking-stuffer she couldn't learn to like. So when spiraling costs galvanized Congress to take on welfare reform in 1996, the unflappable Mom in Tennis Shoes knew she would have to act fast to take the sharp edges off of "the end of welfare as we know it."

Joining forces with former Sen. Paul Wellstone of Minnesota, Murray argued that domestic violence victims were so traumatized by the experience that it would be impossible for them to find work within the two-year limit imposed by the incoming Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF) program.

So Murray cleverly devised a loophole called the "Family Violence Option." Under the FVO, welfare recipients would be screened for partner abuse and referred for counseling. These persons would then be exempted from the 24-month time limit.

What compassionate conservative could argue against that?

But like many Progressive programs, the devil was lurking in the details. And how did the law define "family violence"? The Social Security Act defines family violence as "physical acts that resulted in, or threatened to result in, physical injury to the individual."

But keep reading, because it turns out the drafters of the law tucked in two seemingly harmless words near the end of the definition: "mental abuse." Exactly what does that mean?

Well, if you live in North Carolina, engaging in "mind games" is enough to get you pegged as an abuser, according to the state welfare office. Acting like the "Master of the Castle" could get you into hot water, as well.

And if your partner is indulging in welfare fraud, don't threaten to report him or her to the authorities — that will also qualify you as a batterer. (Think I'm spoofing? Do a web search for Family Support and Child Welfare Services form "DSS-6965" and see for yourself.)

In other states, discouraging your mate from "leaving your home, traveling to work, or visiting your family or friends" will get you on the Naughty List of your local abuse shelter. And according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, partner violence also includes – ready for this? — "getting annoyed if the victim disagrees" and "withholding information from the victim."

Given the utter vagueness of these questions, it comes as no surprise that welfare applicants are not required to provide proof of violence. After all, how could any woman be expected to prove her husband had subjected her to brutal mind attacks?

According to the GAO report State Approaches to Screening for Domestic Violence Could Benefit from HHS Guidance, "25 states do not require evidence beyond a client's statement in order to grant a waiver from work requirements." In New York, for example, state law only requires the putative victim to provide a "sworn statement alleging abuse."

And as we know, Welfare Queens always swear by the truth.

"Most states provide waivers indefinitely," reveals a 2003 Congressional Research Service report, Welfare Law and Domestic Violence. So once you're in, you're pretty much set for the duration.

Removing such work requirements clearly obviates the very purpose of welfare reform. And how many greenbacks do American taxpayers shell out to subsidize Sen. Murray's Family Violence Option scheme?

Turns out, the information is extraordinarily hard to come by. That's because a little-known provision in the 1996 welfare reform law threatens any bureaucrat who outs such information with 20 lashes by a three-legged reindeer – or so it would appear.

However, an extensive Internet search by my intrepid research assistant turned up FVO budget numbers in these states:

Alabama: $946,000

Nevada: $608,000

Ohio: $590,000

Texas: $2,936,000

These numbers average out to $1.3 million per state. Multiplied by 50 states, this means American taxpayers are shelling out $63 million dollars to thwart the on-going epidemic of debilitating mind games.

So if you're a victim of partner abuse and you've decided it's high time to hang out on Easy Street, remember the old liberal saw: "We're from the government, and we're here to help you."

Why We Need A Men's Movement

There's a lot of talk in the Manosphere about how evil feminism is and that not one drop of Feminist talk can ever be allowed a positive spin. The manosphere often demonizes women, out of resentment at the hypocrisy of feminist ideology, or the refusal of feminism to acknowledge consequences.

For example, many feminist writers (both men and women) refuse to admit that false rape accusations are far more common than they like to think, and that their effects are utterly devastating on the men affected. The lives of countless men are destroyed every year in what amounts to an irrational Moral Panic being cruelly manipulated by selfish individuals – in these cases, women. Male resentment and anger is the inevitable result.

Does this make feminism evil? Or does it tell us that feminists are in willing denial, and are acting out of pure self-interest? We see it as hypocrisy, self-assured righteous indignation and cognitive dissonance, all grounded in narrow, exclusive self-interest exercised at the expense of others. But this is part of basic human nature. It's not unique to feminism.

The initial goals of feminism weren't contrary to fundamentally male interests. It's possible to be pro-equality without being anti-male, or even anti-family. But in this climate of ideological absolutism, it becomes hard to separate reason from rhetoric, and self-interest from the public good.

Liberals and left-leaning feminists are past masters at demonizing their enemies to the point of dismissing every concern they don't like; anyone who reads the MSM knows this is true. But anti-feminists and the right are guilty of exactly the same tactics, though at the moment the left is ascendant.

Narcissism is the fundamental source. The "Public Good" is rarely a factor on either side.

Feminism is A Trade Union Movement

Like every union, feminism only serves the narrow (perceived) interests of its members.

Teachers' unions regularly claim to be interested in the "education of students", but their actual actions and policy demands belie the mostly private nature of their concerns. They rarely focus on raising education standards and making the system and teachers accountable to their students. It's telling that the only solution to every single problem they identify is More Money for the System. Whenever benchmarks are introduced, tests floated, evaluations considered, for either students or teachers, the outcry from union ideologues is always fierce and unrelenting.

In exactly the same way, feminism is very defensive about attacks on the effects of its political programs. If there's something wrong, even if this there is a grave threat to the public good, it's shunted aside and ignored. Studies that deny the existence of the threat are bought and paid for.

Medical Associations are unions for doctors. Bar Associations are unions for lawyers. Police unions are only incidentally interested in public security; their key interests are the interests and security of their membership.

Expecting feminism to represent the best interests of society is the same as expecting public sector unions to advocate for fiscal responsibility.

Feminist Hypocrisy ?

As for feminism being a monolithic evil, this is also demonstrably not the case. Feminist ideology is often in conflict.

- There's a sharp division between Lesbian and straight women. The abolitionist/anti-pornography/pro-sex-regulation feminists are almost always straight. The liberals are more reliably lesbian or lesbian-identified.

- Anti-marriage and “men are evil” feminists are usually “political” lesbians, or those with specific axes to grind, or single-issue interests, or ideologically socialist.

- Actual bona-fide lesbians live in a separate world and don’t see any need for men at all, personally or socially. Their writing often doesn’t even concern itself with the key issues that bother heterosexual women. These women inhabit different worlds. Lesbian politics often support obviously anti-male policies because men are irrelevant to them, and they don’t care how men are affected. The truth is that they have little to say to straight women, because straight women are interested in the health of male society. Straight women like men, and interact with men on an intimate level. What both agree on is that women always need more power, regardless of the amount of power they already have.

- Sexual-libertarian feminists want less social/legal control over sexuality, resulting in a free-wheeling, Sex Is Always Good “hook-up” culture, filled with consequence-free sex and the elimination of the concept of “slut”. Eventhe very concept of monogamy comes in for ridicule. In effect, these women are more prototypically “male” in their “variety-is-life” outlook than men ever were.

- Sexual-Moralist feminists take a different approach, seeing this freewheeling sexual liberation as serving male interests. Women, they think, have different interests. Sex for its own sake is not a goal for these women. These feminists don’t see sexually open women as Liberated – they see them as Deluded Sluts, no matter how they sugar-coat the label for feminist solidarity. The fact is that their outlook on sex and relationships bears no relationship to the feminists who advocate for sexual liberation. They have nothing to say to each other. Their views on social policy are in direct opposition.

These groups of feminists may have blurry boundaries, but their distinct interests are the reasons for the apparent hypocrisies. That said, they don’t so much consciously contradict each other, as speak past each other.

Manipulating Moral Panics

Our society regularly goes through phases of Moral Panic.

There have been many.

Witch hunts,

Miscegenation, incest, racial hygiene,

Prohibition,

McCarthysim,

Spanking Children,

Satanic Abuse,

Drugs,

Pedophilia,

Drugs and Date Rape,

Workplace Harrassment,

Moral panics are easily manipulated by those with political agendas. While there were genuine communists in dangerous positions of power in the early 1950’s, many non-communists were threatened and extorted during the McCarthy years into complying with policies or giving up opportunities. The same was true in the Soviet Union, but there, the victims were called “counter-revolutionaries”. Much the same attitudes are now displayed towards “Conservatives” or “Liberals”.

An example of a moral panic manipulated by all sides, while those affected just go about their lives, is Prostitution.

Straight and married women are the biggest advocates for eliminating prostitution and sex work. They mask this as a concern for the women involved, but on examination, the truth becomes clear very quickly, as sex-worker activists point out: It's really about controlling the sexuality of their own men, and it's not about the health and security of sex workers at all.

Laura Augustin is a highly engaging writer who catalogues this rank female hypocrisy extensively.

Many feminist activists use the force of Moral Panicsl. Irrational Anti-Date-Rape Crusaders use twisted and exaggerated claims and false statistics as a rule of thumb. Anti-Pornography activists have more in common with the prohibitionists of the 1920's than they do with other feminists.

Then there's Socialism and Collectivist ideology, as well as Anti-Capitalism. These movements don't fundamentally care about feminism; feminism or anti-racism, or any other isms. These are just tools for the Revolution. Left-wing activists use movements like feminism to help advocate for their own revolutionary ideas. Cuba, China, and the Soviet Union all betrayed the related movements that helped foist "moral dictatorships" on the people.

Reality makes the Rules: Finance and Feminism

When it comes to the public sector, harsh budget realities will ultimately decide issues for unions. Facing national bankruptcy, and the inability to collect more taxes, it's no longer tenable to maintain an artificially bloated public sector. Had we had honest debate before, and had the unions not been so exclusively self-interested, we might not have reached this precipice. . Reality has a way of imposing discipline on ideology.

Our financial bankruptcy is equally the fault of the public and our leaders for enabling union demands. We should have had the courage to force through reform, despite public-sector opposition, before we reached this tipping point. Now, we all face the consequences. This "correction" will claim many victims.

Biology doesn't play ideological games. Biology is what it is. It doesn't care about "fair". Its mechanisms don't conform to the Human-Ideology-Of-The-Moment. The screaming, the rage, the railing, the Marches, the Protests, the angry bloggers or the activist legislation; at the end of the day it can't change human nature. Even when we deny that there is a human nature. Human nature still exists, and we still need to do the things we need to do.

A natural consequence of feminism is the declining number of babies. Having and raising children is a difficult and onerous task. It requires social support and certain social structures to make it bearable and attractive. Take these away, and there's no incentive to have children.

The predictable result of feminism is that fewer and fewer women end up having babies. We therefore have a left-wing that advocated for mass, open immigration of unfamiliar cultures. The irony is that these immigrants have beliefs that are diametrically opposed to the goals of feminism. Feminism, by semi-unintentionally denying the critical imperative to reproduce, has doomed western societies, something no-one predicted or wanted. It wasn't deliberate. But for feminists to admit this now, or to admit that this has far-reaching and profound implications for Western societies, would be to admit that there are consequences to their movement that can't be controlled. But the "correction" will come – whether we like it or not.

Just as budget shortfalls sound the death-knell of massive public bureaucracies, demographics will have damning effects on feminist movements. All of this was predictable, but it wasn't necessarily deliberate.

Union! We need A Men's movement

There is one correction we can engage ourselves.

"Men" are the only obviously identifiable collective in American society that does not have its own movement. In effect, while other interests have advocates – anti-racism activism, women, children's rights, Teachers, white racists, black separatists, Christian fundamentalists, Muslims – men have none.

When issues affect us, we can't muster collective responses. We need a clearing-house, an umbrella under which we can debate the issues that matter to us.

Feminists argue that a men's movement is unnecessary. My question is: Why do we care what feminists think? Men told women then a feminist movement was unnecessary in the 1880′s, as well. They created one anyway.

Nobody gives you rights. Nobody gives you the right to make collective demands. Nobody grants you permission to want something.

Other interests will oppose us. "Strikebreakers" will intimidate us, and the Powers that Be may send out their goons, but the fundamental issues remain in place and unless we're prepared to act collectively, unless we're prepared to respect our issues enough to protect ourselves, and advocate for change, we can't expect to be respected by anyone else. Do we want father's rights? Do we want fair family courts? Do we want equal opportunity in the workplace? Do we want freedom from harassment claims? Do we want to live in fear of false rape accusations? Do we want power over our own lives?

Women are able to manipulate moral panics to their advantage. There's one moral panic we can immediately use to our advantage, before feminism neuters it. Even women are now calling for men to take a greater role in their families and yet it's women who have largely pushed men out of the family unit. Radical feminism had a core goal of destroying the Husband-Wife family unit, and it has almost achieved this in some segments of our population. But we can turn the tables. If women can manipulate a moral manic for their own advantage, we can certainly manipulate this new moral panic it for the advantage of our families and ourselves.

There are other moral panics that can work in our favor. We must exploit them.

Don't Worry About Disagreement

We should expect a lot of division within our own ranks. Feminists have to deal with severe factionalism themselves, and internal feminist debates often become bitter and acrimonious. We can't shy away from the same discussions. And we can't expect to agree.

I can already sense where factions will likely emerge. That said, just like feminists, we can all probably agree on general goals, even when we demand different policy decisions.

Ultimately, the only way to be free is to free ourselves. If we believe we have rights, rights to raise our children, rights to fair divorce settlements, rights to sexual freedom, rights to workplace opportunity fairness – then we need to take those rights. Nobody is going to give them to us.

And there is power in numbers.

Women's Advocates Wary of Proposed Domestic Violence Registry

W.F. Price · 22 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

State Rep. Trey Martinez Fischer of San Antonio has proposed a bill in Texas to create a domestic violence registry similar to the sex offender lists that are now common throughout the US. The proposed bill would force those convicted of DV three times to register on a publicly accessible list.

Criminal records are already publicly accessible, and anyone with an internet connection can look people up online by name, so it isn't clear what difference the bill would make, and it's probably simply a waste of time and resources. Furthermore, I doubt being on the list would stop women from going for guys with multiple DV convictions — plenty of women have no problem having intimate relationships with convicted murderers, rapists, etc.

However, it isn't the bill's uselessness and potential for abuse that concerns women's groups, rather, it's that women who got the guys jacked up would be easier to identify. But why ever would they care? Their ex-husbands already know who called the cops on them and had them put away, so what difference would it make if other people knew?

Hmmm…

Could it be that she doesn't want the next guy to know that she put her husband behind bars?

Book Review: Criticizing the Critics by Aidan Nichols (Family Publications)

Featured Guest · 23 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Alcuin

While not every men's rights activist (MRA) need be a Christian, every MRA needs to know how Christianity has been gutted of its masculine core, and how this feminization of the central religion of Western countries has played a key role in the feminization of Western society.

Dominican priest Aidan Nichols argues in an important chapter countering feminists that Christianity's lack of the Father, which has led to the lack of fatherhood within Western culture, has hurt society and individuals deeply. Writing about Nietzsche and Freud, and their rejection of fatherhood and rejoicing in nihilistic (that is, fatherless) freedom, Nichols observes:

"the reaction against the Father, … which they pioneered, has produced a society and culture where fathers are instinctively distrusted, where a spirit of unreflective patricide is abroad, where to exercise paternity, by nurture of one's biological children or by formation of one's spiritual children, has become especially difficult."

He offers the concrete example of the anger than many liberal Catholics hold against the fatherly popes of recent times, John Paul II and Benedict XVI.

The false rape claims and pedophilia craze of mainstream society come out of this deep suspicion of men and masculinity. Many men are forced to survive by becoming manginas. Thus they too reject the father, and add to the matriarchal nihilism and general misandric hysteria. Nichols has no ties to the men's movement, so these thoughts are my own, not a part of the book. But this chapter on the rejection of the fatherhood of God shows the roots to much of today's problems.

Nichols notes that this theological concern (the theological study of the Father is called paterology) seems at first glance to affect only the Church, but as the above quote from the book reveals, this great change in theological perspective, basically the rejection of the first Person of the Trinity, has led to a sweeping change in Western society and in the world.

Nichols warns, "the concealing of the true face of the Father can be said to have had ill consequences of a wide-ranging sort in Western culture and society. The death of the divine Father in whom authority and goodness are inseparably united, the font at once of power and value," was celebrated by Freud and Nietzsche. Freud blamed much neurosis on the guilt supposedly engendered by God the Father.

Notice that fatherhood united authority and goodness. Under feminists we have authority, but authority that is tied to only hate and manipulation, not goodness. Feminism idealizes nothing other than power, whereas worship of God the Father created more transcendent ideals. The only thing that feminists have made transcendent is themselves. They wish to worship themselves.

Nichols shows how in a Fatherly conception of God, we worship God rather than a projection of ourselves. This is because God as Father is wholly other, whereas the goddess is part of the world. In goddess worship a fair amount of enmeshment occurs (no surprise there), where, for instance, the world is actually the womb of the great mother goddess. It thereby becomes very easy for women to begin to worship themselves mistakenly (and, of course, to expect men to do likewise).

This terrible sort of narcissism is something that patriarchy, at least Judeo-Christian patriarchy, has strongly opposed as blasphemy. While Eastern Orthodox theology talks of the divinization of the Christian, this divinization is always a gift of God, not something achievable by myself. Feminists, conversely, assume that women, by virtue of being women, are already transcendent. Hence, they claim that a woman never lies about rape. Again, here we see how theology affects wider society. Theological issues are not mere church issues.

Nichols claims that only a proper practice of traditional, patriarchal Christianity can return us in the West to balance: “The collective trauma created in the Western soul by distortion of the image of the divine Father, followed by murderous revolt against him, can only be healed and pacified by return to its source.” This source is God the Father.

Two aspects of fatherhood to which Nichols refers are the sacrificial and the generative. God the Father creates because He is a Father. He is not the Creator, Nichols warns, but the Father. “Father”, “Son”, and “Holy Spirit” are proper names of the persons of the Trinity. Christians fail to fully understand the nature of God the Father when they refer to Him as Creator. This is a limited view. He is creator because He is Father. His patriarchal nature makes him creator. The feminist trinity, creator, redeemer, sustainer, is not the same as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, because it rejects the masculine nature of God in its attempt to reject the patriarchal nature of Western society.

Thankfully, Nichols does offer some unpleasant truth about feminism, and its attack on Christianity, though more force would have been more appreciated. It is, he notes, the sacrificial Father who “subverts a heterodox feminism.” In other words, God the Father is at the present doing battle against the Baals and Ashuras of feminism.

One supposes that Nichols has no room to discuss more freely how destructive matriarchy and feminism have been to civilization, society, the family, and individuals. Readers must read a bit between the lines to see the extent to which feminism is nihilistic. Even so, many more such books are necessary for us to better understand the nature of feminism.

More Insight into Online Dating

By Big Daddy from Cincinnati

On July 8, 2010, Zammo wrote an article on The Spearhead, entitled "The Ins and Outs of Online Dating." His perspectives are entirely correct, in my estimation. I, too, have dipped my toe into the online dating arena, due to the blessed separation and impending divorce from the soon-to-be-ex-fishwife. I want to add to his excellent fact-filled article with some of my own observations.

Part of successfully dealing with dating, online or otherwise, is to set a reasonable goal. If the goal is to get a "decent girl" to fall in love with and marry, then you are most likely shit out of luck. I think that it would be POSSIBLE to find a woman with decent morals, high standards, and who would be faithful to you for life. In fact, I know several couples who have been married over 40 years, and have not had significant marital strife, at least to hear them tell of it. But that was much more likely in your father's and grandfather's days.

Remember: Girls like that are NOT on online dating sites. They are home with their husbands, cleaning the house and cooking dinner, and not fucking the UPS man. Finding a "decent girl" in modern American society is mostly an exercise in self-delusion, anyway, sort of like telling yourself that you are really going to hit the lottery. It DOES happen to someone, but it isn't going to happen to you. If fantasies such as this help you get through the day without contemplating suicide, then I suppose that they have their place. However, the realist understands the world is the way it is, and not the way we want it to be.

In an effort to help my brothers out there, here are a few tips:

If you meet a girl online, do NOT "friend" them on Facebook, until you have laid the wood to them. And possibly not even then. If you think that it is sexually exciting for a girl to know your every move and stupid comment that you post, let me disabuse you of that notion. Remember the phrase "familiarity breeds contempt." It does. If they know all about the fact that you are a working stiff and do normal things, you won't be exciting, any suggestions to them that you are will fall on deaf ears. Your ability to successfully use Game then goes right out the window. Preserve an air of mystery. If you are purposefully vague and hint of excitement, they will mentally fill in the gaps to make you whatever they want you to be.

An alternative that I have not done, as it would appear to require more effort than I want to put into it, would be to have a separate Facebook dating profile. You could provide social proofing by posting that you were doing exciting things, and have fake pretty girls on there making comments about your Walter Mitty fantasies and making subtle references to their orgasmic delight. I think it would work, but I can get laid without all that effort. Maybe someone could hire some off-shore IT workers to run it for you for pennies a day. Just a thought.

Do NOT take online dates out to dinner. Some girls use online dating that to get beta chumps to buy them dinner and have an audience for their babbling on the nights when they are not getting fucked bowlegged by that scamp of an itinerant alpha male in their life. You might get laid, but you are MUCH more likely to get screwed by a dinner check and nothing else. MUCH more likely. As others have noted, a full stomach does NOT make a woman feel sexy. Buying dinner also brands you as a beta-backup-plan when she can no longer attract the alpha attention and pounding that she will never tell you that she craves, or when Mr. Rogue Alpha and his magic hoo-hoo-dilly are out of town for the weekend.

Meet girls for coffee, instead. I tend to like meeting girls that I have met online in a bookstore coffee shop. It is a clue that she is stupid and does not read if you propose a location like a bookstore and she has never heard of it. Now, I am not looking for a smart girl to hire as an employee, but I don't really care for girls who are dumb as the proverbial box of rocks. But, anyway, a chain bookstore coffee shop, like at Barnes and Noble or Borders, provides you with much natural cover. Get there early. Position yourself where you can see the door, but where she can't immediately see you, such as looking over a bookshelf while you peruse the books. If the girl who shows up is much more fat or fugly than you anticipated, you can duck behind the shelves and casually exit the establishment without having to spend any time on a Date from Hell. Much better to go home and skin it back yourself than to waste time talking in public to a chick who you would be embarrassed to have your buddies know that you boned.

As long as we are on the topics of smart girls: Smart girls, yes, even MDs and PhDs, respond to the same stuff that the dumb ones do. At one point, I thought that a smart girl would not respond to Game, and that she would be a girl that you can deal with in a straightforward manner. WRONG! (Hey, I never said that I was some sort of genius or something.) Indeed, they can be even more of a pain in the ass than ones of average intelligence, since they respond to Game, but feel a need to analyze everything well past the point of being annoying.

As Zammo said, fat chicks are the new normal. Chicks with bad attitudes are the new normal. But they all seem to think that they are God's gift to the world, despite ample evidence to the contrary. Go figure.

As far as different sites go, Plenty of Fish (pof.com) has yielded me the most dickie-dunks out of any of them. OK Cupid has not done as well for me, but my brother, who lives in another state, found a girl that he likes that will let him do anything to her. Match.com has not worked real well for me, but I know a guy who said that he hooked up with nine different women over one weekend while working on that. It appears that different markets have different services that are the dominant one, and that the other ones are more-or-less bit-players. Try a different one or several if you are striking out on the first one you tried. Remember, as Zammo said, this is really a numbers game.

Adult Friend Finder – Please tell me that you did NOT go here to look for a long term relationship. Yes, she will probably get to meet your cod on the first date, but I don't really want to bring THAT kind of girl back to my house, or ever introduce her to Mom and Dad. There are lots of fatties here. Somebody must be plowing them. Good looking non-fatties don't have to go online just to get laid. And, YES, girls from other non-"adult" dating sites WILL screw you on the first date. Just remember: You are not THAT special. She's done the huckety-buck on the first date with other guys, and probably a goodly number of them. There is a place for a girl like that, but in an LTR or at the end of the aisle are NOT one of them. Don't be like a fellow I know who fell in love with a girl who he met at a gangbang at a hotel near a military base. After that, he was parading her around town like she was the prom queen, after all of his buddies had popped their load into her on various occasions. Don't do it!

What Zammo said about flakes should be read, and read again, and read one more time. To echo his words, HAVE A THICK SKIN. Women are amoral creatures, flakes, and they will reject you for anything, everything, nothing, the phase of the moon, or who knows what. They will lead you on and waste your time, knowing full well that nothing is going to come of it. Any time that this happens, it is probably not a reflection on you. They will agree to meet, and then just not show up, or come up with a last minute excuse. If you talk with a girl online on Monday and arrange to go out Friday, I would say that the chances of that actually happening are about 30%. But if you check in with them the day before to confirm things, it will come across as not being confident enough, and women like confidence in a man. This is the classic Catch-22. So if your dating time is limited, or you correctly realize that your time is valuable, maybe you could double-book, and take the first one who shows up. Or make sure to not have a long time for the girl to think about things and second-guess herself. Try setting a date for tomorrow night instead of for several days away. If you chat with a girl online and try to set a date for later that same day, most girls don't seem to have a comfort level with that, so it seems that there is a happy medium.

If an online girl comes up with an excuse to not go on a date at a proposed date and time, but does not propose an alternative, maybe give her one more choice. If she doesn't go for that, then she is just wanting to get attention and validation of her desirability from you without any effort on her part. FORGET HER and don't ask her out again, unless you just like sitting at home and being frustrated.

Don't take this stuff personally and let it affect your own self-image when you get rejected or flaked out on. Steel yourself to this reality before jumping in this pond, to inoculate yourself from the inevitable issues that come from dealing with women, especially in this sort of a forum. Remember, temper your upside expectations to avoid bitter disappointment.

I do want to wish you luck with finding whatever it is that you want. Online dating may not find you the girl of your dreams, but it can keep you busy and help warm up those cold winter nights.

The Lesson of Laura Ingalls Wilder

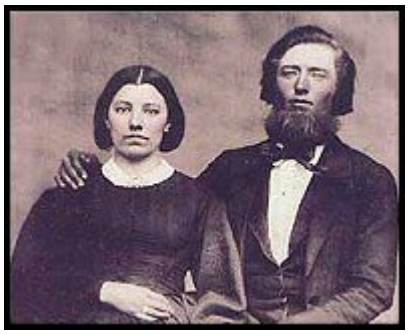
We hear a lot about how if only men would "man up," take the reins and stop acting like overgrown children, women would magically fall in line and reveal their inner sainthood, which is only kept corked in by those awful men all around them. This is a recent slant on the old myth of women's inherent purity that has been floating around since the Romantics made a splash in Western thought and literature. For some time before the sexual revolution, men's depravity was a given, and for the most part women did behave well and behave as ladies. Today, however, now that women's liberation has been achieved through the economic and legal subjugation of men, it's getting a lot harder to make a case for female purity and blamelessness.

Nevertheless, scores of people are still trying to do so, with ever more improbable explanations for the rampant promiscuity, lack of consideration for children and family and outright cruelty that has come to characterize Western – and particularly English speaking – women. These explanations always attempt to expose some manner in which ordinary men are responsible, and the solution is always more of the poison that got us in this mess in the first place. Christian churches will demand that men indulge their wives and daughters, never faulting them for anything and working like oxen to provide for their every appetite. In fact, if a wife goes off the rails, the husband is always considered to be at fault in some manner, and more sacrifice is demanded of him. Maybe he wasn't "ambitious" enough, perhaps he had lust in his heart, or maybe he just failed by not being in the upper 5% of the income bracket that would allow his wife to lead the life she demands without having to take a job herself. The list goes on and on; the feminists make pretty much the same arguments, but with a different twist. There isn't a dime's worth of difference between these social conservatives and feminists, because when the song and dance is over the finger is always pointed at the ordinary stiff.

To provide a contrast, I'm going to draw upon an American cultural icon — one that people over the age of 30 or so should all have some familiarity with. Although very young adults and children may not know who she is, Laura Ingalls Wilder, née Laura Elizabeth Ingalls, was an important chronicler of life on the frontier of the American Midwest. The popular TV series Little House on the Prairie was based on her stories, and I watched many episodes while growing up. My mother and sister both read the books written by Laura Ingalls Wilder, as did millions of other Americans, most of whom were women. Most of the stories concern life on the prairie as a farm girl, which was full of hardship and struggle with the forces of nature in the northern states of the Great Plains. Mrs. Wilder drew inspiration from her childhood, and viewed the hard work and cooperation that helped her family prosper as a source of pride.



Laura's parents

Laura's father was a bit of a wanderer – the quintessential American pioneer – who moved from one state to the next to work the land, finally settling in the Dakota territory in 1879. She hailed from the American yeomanry, that class of sober, industrious people who lived by the word of the Good Book and formed the stable bedrock for the foundation of America's powerful, prosperous society. These were not the wild Indian fighters, cowboys and prospectors that occupy so much of the popular imagination due to their colorful and dramatic lives, awash in whiskey, perfumed by the acrid, brimstone smell of gunsmoke and driven by a lust for gold. No, their gold grew out of the rich, black soil of the Great Plains, sowed by sober hands of husbandmen.

This was the environment Laura grew up in. It took a great deal of work, and she was expected to contribute to the household to the best of her ability. From a young age she had physically demanding chores, including milking cows, fetching water from the well, cooking, cleaning and anything else she could do to help out. Winters were bad in Kansas when she was a little girl, but in the Dakotas they were far more severe. Her father had no sons, so all the girls did their best to pitch in. Laura began teaching before the age of 16, helping children learn their reading, writing and arithmetic in a one-room schoolhouse. She didn't particularly like it, but her family needed the help, so she did her job without complaint.

Almanzo Wilder

At about this time, a young settler named Almanzo Wilder took an interest in her. The 25-year-old farmer saw something he liked in the bright, hard-working 15-year-old girl, and when she reached the age of 18, they married.

Almanzo was a handsome man, and it looked as though the young couple had a bright future. But life is not always gentle, and shortly after the couple married both were stricken by diptheria, which left Almanzo crippled. Then their baby boy died shortly after birth, drought ruined their crops, and they sank into debt. The first years of marriage were a terrible trial, and the healthy, promising husband Laura married had become an invalid who couldn't support a family. In 1890, five years after they married, they had to move back in with her parents so that Almanzo could recuperate and the young couple could survive. Once Almanzo recovered most of his mobility (he never fully recovered), they started over; Almanzo took jobs as a laborer and Laura worked as a seamstress to save up enough money to buy more farmland.

Laura as a young woman

Eventually, in 1894, they were able to buy 40 acres of wooded land on a hill near Mansfield, Missouri. They lived in a tiny log cabin without windows, selling wagonloads of cordwood in town to get by as they cleared the land acre by acre with axe and saw. Supplementing their income with jobs in town, the diligent work eventually started to pay off. It took nearly 20 years, but by middle age the couple had achieved a degree of prosperity and respectability, and could count themselves among the town's middle class. It was at this point that Laura began to write, first for an enthusiastic local audience in the Ozarks, and then for the wider regional audience, which appreciated her farming expertise as well as the interesting stories and opinions she shared. Her column was titled "As a Farm Woman Thinks."

Laura as a writer

Laura Ingalls Wilder may have been a remarkable woman, but she was far from extraordinary for the time. What really set her apart from other farm wives was not her grit or determination, but her talent for writing, particularly her skill in writing about lives they could relate to. Looking back from today, it is amazing to think that the patience and determination with which she faced her travails characterized most of society. But it is a fact that she was popular not for being a superstar of one sort or another, but rather the kind of woman that midwestern families knew and relied on. They appreciated her for her love of their way of life, and her advice in helping others succeed and prosper in the face of formidable obstacles.

For his part, Almanzo was fortunate to have a wife like Laura. But then again, he was far from alone in this blessing. She did what any man of the time would have expected of a wife. Certainly, Almanzo had no intention of falling ill and spiraling into debt in the first few years of marriage, but these things happen, and rather than guilt, he felt more appreciation for the sacrifices his wife made, and as soon as he was able he pulled the family back up from the skids. In the beginning of his marriage, Almanzo "failed" in a many ways. Because they rarely spoke about intimate matters in those days, we can only imagine the frustration and sorrow the young family faced during those hard times. From the evidence, all we can see is that they overcame it together. The young couple must have taken their wedding vows seriously — what an odd concept!

Today, despite the huge increase in comfort and prosperity, a young couple like the Wilders in their first few years of marriage would be out of luck. Preachers would be hollering at Almanzo that he "isn't a real man" because his wife has to work to support him (oddly, preachers seem to think telling their female congregants that their husbands are losers will prevent divorce — are they stupid, or evil for that?), Laura's friends would all be telling her to dump the loser and move on as a single mother, and even her parents might do their best to shove them apart. Laura probably would have divorced Almanzo to live an unfulfilling life as a single mother and schoolteacher, and Almanzo would have a diminished life as a noncustodial parent working lousy jobs just to pay his child support and keep himself fed and clothed — he'd certainly have no motivation to do any more. All that potential the couple had would be squandered by the combined onslaught of social conservative and feminist man-blaming, which is really nothing more than social pressure pushing women away from constructive family roles as wives and mothers. And of course, if it all finally turned out to be a big tragedy for the young family, all the righteous types would smirk and say "see, it really is your fault Almanzo, because you are an inferior man, and didn't deserve Laura." Then they would set about "changing" men to make them better, because something must be wrong with men for this to be such a common occurrence.

Laura at 70

If the wreckers of the modern American family had the kind of social influence they do today 200 years ago, the United States would have been stillborn. There would be no superpower with enough wealth and bounty to feed this clamorous horde of parasites. Fortunately for the Wilders, they didn't really get going until after both were dead. Unfortunately for the rest of us, this is what we have to contend with.

After achieving prosperity and comfort, the Wilders lived long, happy lives. Almanzo died at 92, and was followed eight years later by his wife, Laura, who lived to 90, dying in 1959.

The Spearhead Needs Your Support

W.F. Price · 25 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's time to pay the bills and meet financial obligations, so the seasonal fund drive is once again upon The Spearhead. Fortunately, last season saw The Spearhead make a significant jump in traffic and rank, following a low-key summer. September through December was particularly impressive, as daily unique visitors rose by some 35% and Alexa rank dropped to well under 100,000 for the month of December, during which The Spearhead had several days of unprecedented traffic and reach, and received an all-time high of 77,000 unique visitors for the month. Although things have calmed down in the last few weeks, daily unique visits remain over 3,000 for most weekdays, which is a large increase from six months ago, when 2,500 would have been a remarkable day in any given week.

About 1,500 people are accessing the site every day via RSS, and roughly the same number are visiting the site on a daily basis, which means we have about 3,000 people who are loyal, daily readers of the site's content. Many times more than that are occasional readers, and only about 40% of visitors bounce, so it can safely be assumed that the number of people who read and appreciate what The Spearhead has to offer is somewhere in the low tens of thousands. My estimate, based on watching the numbers since the site's inception, would be that around 15-20,000 people are familiar with the site and visit more often than once a month.

Although that isn't a huge number, it's fairly significant. The Spearhead has earned an international readership, and its influence is starting to be felt by more mainstream publications as readers post links and discuss men's issues online and in other forms of media. In fact, just this morning I noticed in the traffic logs that someone was checking out The Spearhead from the NY Times admin community, most likely to investigate a link someone posted in a comment. This is really how it works — when people start talking about things others start checking them out, impressions are made, they are brought up again, and interest grows.

However, maintaining a steady flow of content, keeping a handle on the trends, editing, scheduling and writing all take work. Keeping an eye on the server and software, making updates and fixing bugs takes work. Moderating and approving comments, fetching comments mistakenly sent to the spam folder, and deleting duplicates is time-consuming. To put it simply, running the site is a real job. Fortunately, it's a rewarding job, and it appears to be making a difference. However, it isn't all that lucrative. The internet makes information all the more accessible, but in setting such low barriers to the dissemination of information, it also makes it considerably more difficult to profit from it without making it any easier to produce quality content.

Although I expect to start drawing some income again from ads through Blogads (the link to purchase ads is on the upper left sidebar as well as Blogads' ad sales page), as a natural skeptic, I'm not the most effective salesman. One thing The Spearhead could really use is an ad agent of some sort. If I could find a "blog agent" or the like, I'd love to hear from him.

Another potential income source is our own publications. I've been meaning to put one out since last spring, but I'd have to take at least a week off the site to put one together, and I've been loathe to even spend one day without putting some work into The Spearhead. It's become a fairly consuming job, and I've found a degree of fulfillment in writing for appreciative readers and posting the great content offered by authors and guest posters. But as much as I like running this site and doing this job, reality intrudes when I get the bills and have to deal all the ordinary expenses of life, so support from readers is crucial.

Each time I've asked for donations people have come through, some with a great deal of generosity and kindness. All of us who appreciate The Spearhead, from readers to contributors, owe them gratitude, because without this support the site would have to be abandoned or significantly diminished. If that were to happen now, right on the cusp of the awakening to the fact that something is gravely amiss in society where sexual politics is concerned, it would be a real shame. One of the unique things about The Spearhead is that it bridges the gap between the first generation of men who dealt with the effects of gender politics and the young men who are just starting out in life and having to face the ugly truth. In that sense, it offers some much-needed continuity; a generational transfer of knowledge that's been sorely lacking in our largely fatherless society.

So far, the site has been a success. At just a few months over a year old, it's still a baby in relative terms, and still fragile, but with some perseverance and a little bit of luck it should be going strong for some time. As traffic grows and more people take notice, it should eventually become self-sustaining, but for now support from readers is crucial in allowing me to keep the site running and keep the content flowing.

I'd like to thank everyone involved, including readers, authors and online activists spreading the word. We've done something remarkable in achieving such a high degree of interest in a subject people have been sweeping under the carpet for years, and as recent events demonstrate, the discussion is just beginning to burst out into the open.

Please help keep The Spearhead going strong — all donations are appreciated.

When Your Adult Daughter Suddenly "Remembers" That You Raped Her When She Was Three . . . .

pierceharlan · 25 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In Dane County, Wisconsin, a jury has awarded $1 million to Dr. Charles and Karen Johnson, a former Madison couple who alleged that therapists implanted in their now adult daughter false memories of childhood sexual and physical abuse. The case has been cluttering up the docket for fourteen years, but at the time it was filed, it was just "one in a long line [of cases] across the country related to a controversial treatment called recovered memory therapy," see here, a therapy that supposedly helps patients reclaim repressed memories.

One day, the adult daughter, Charlotte Johnson, who is now estranged from her parents and had nothing to do with their lawsuit, dropped a bombshell on them by announcing that her physician father had raped her when she was 3-years-old. See here. Charlotte later announced that her mother had attacked her with a knife and tried to drown her. She also claimed that her parents were Satanists who dabbled in cults and infanticide. See here.

"It's wacko stuff," said the Johnson's attorney Bill Smoler, who specializes in false memory cases.

Although mothers are not spared from the daggers of their daughters' lies in false memory cases, fathers, and their penises, are the primary targets of repressed memories.

For the record, in the Johnson case, the defendants' attorney denies that his clients practiced recovered memory therapy. Nevertheless, the jury found in favor of Dr. and Mrs. Johnson.

During the 1990s, there were thousands of false memory cases across America. One involved Katie Spanuello's daughter, who accused Katie and her husband of abusing her as a child. It turns out the allegations were made only after the daughter had read a book called "The Courage to Heal," written by feminist poet and creative writing teacher Ellen Bass and incest survivor Laura Davis, which encouraged women to find the source of their emotional problems by dredging up painful memories of childhood abuse. The problem is, many women dredged up things that never happened. Aside from reading "The Courage to Heal," according to Katie Spanuello, the daughter made her false claim only after affiliating herself with "militant feminists." The daughter eventually recanted her claim. See here.

Former supermodel Karen Mulder once claimed in front of a live audience that many men–including her friend Prince Albert of Monaco and her own father–had raped her. Mulder ultimately admitted that she was suffering from emotional problems because, she claimed, she had been abused by an older male family friend (who is now dead and cannot refute the claim) when she was two years old. She "repressed" the incident for many years but, of course, was able to piece it back together in psychoanalysis. That's all the "experts" needed to hear: "In some ways, delusions can be an adaptive response to stress," said Bonnie Strickland, Ph.D., a professor of psychology at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. "Sometimes, when trying to understand why something happened to you, you start making up things that are going wrong that you can point to. If there's a history of sexual abuse, then the rape allegations could well be an attempt to understand how she feels toward men in general. She knows that something is wrong." See here.

You see? False rape claims are perfectly understandable after all. The false accuser isn't a criminal; she just needs help.

The Second Circuit Court of Appeals recently explained:

"Overall, at least seventy-two individuals were convicted in nearly a dozen major child sex abuse and satanic ritual prosecutions between 1984 and 1995, although almost all the convictions have since been reversed. . . . Some defendants, fearing trial, pled guilty or 'no contest' to impossible acts of ritualistic abuse, and in some cases they provided detailed confessions in exchange for immunity or generous plea bargains. . . . . Many have described these widespread prosecutions as a modern-day 'witch hunt.'

"These prosecutions were largely based on memories that alleged victims 'recovered' through suggestive memory recovery tactics . . . . Indeed, the dramatic increase in conspiratorial charges of child sexual abuse has been traced to a relatively small group of clinical psychologists who supported the psychoanalytic notion of 'repressed memories' and encouraged patients to employ extensive 'memory recovery procedures' to 'break through the barrier of repression and bring memories into conscious awareness.'"

Friedman v. Rehal, No. 08-0297 (2d Cir. filed August 16, 2010).

As if men don't have enough difficulty avoiding situations where false rape claims might occur, now even monogamous fathers, in seemingly stable relationships, had to worry about whether their grown daughters might imagine a rape that supposedly occurred 20 years ago.

While it might seem other-worldly that we would permit witch doctors to determine whether men languish behind bars for many years, the fact is, when it comes to men and sex allegations, no "science" is too bizarre, primitive, or inhumane. It's for that reason that penile plethysmograph testing, a sort a junk science polygraph of penises, and "masturbatory satiation" sessions, are often used as a basis to decide whether men or boys convicted of sex offenses should be released from custody.

I have a better idea to decide the fate of a man accused of a sex offense: bind his hands and feet, and throw him in a lake. If he floats, he's guilty.

Starve This Beast

Hawaiian Libertarian · 26 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Many people simply write off "conspiracy theory" as nothing more than fantastic SyFy channel fantasy, defined by stories of reptile aliens and satanic Boehmian Grove carnival freakshows.

They couldn't be more wrong.

A conspiracy is nothing more than a group of people conspiring to carry out some action or actions to achieve certain goals, using their resources to effect deception, dishonesty, and misdirection so as to gain from the peoples ignorance as they focus on all of the mass media misinformation and disinformation promulgated as weapons of mass distraction.

For instance, when one encounters left wing liberals who are staunch anti-capitalist and anti-free market ideologues, they will sometimes make reference to the need for more Government regulation of business and the marketplace…otherwise you get the conditions for those dreadful "Robber Barons" who exploited the masses back in the early 20th century to amass fantastic wealth.

For example, note how this self-identified lefty blogger discusses "robber barons" and "unbridled capitalism." He effectively describes the system of corporatism…which is really nothing more than a new name for fascism.

Real capitalism, by definition is "unbridled." Pure capitalism is a free market.

The Robber Barons were not capitalists. They were Corporatists…aka Fascists. They used their wealth to finance elections to gain influence on the politicians to pass laws that would benefit their bottom lines by eliminating their competition through regulations and enforcement, thereby granting these Robber Baron's corporations industry-wide cartels.

They CONSPIRED.

Conspired to take over the country and institute their vision of Government by the Corporations, for the Corporations…unbridled corporatism, not capitalism.

Yet those same robber barons that the leftist will decry as the primary example for why we need the Government to "regulate" the economy…

…are the same who financed, supported and lobbied to create the Federal Reserve in the first place…and who also now own significant shares of the stocks of the Fed's member banks.

From the FDIC Learning Bank:

> The term robber baron was revived in the 19th century in the U.S. as a pejorative term describing businessman who allegedly used unscrupulous tactics in their business operations and on the stock market to amass huge personal fortunes.Many of their massive businesses controlled a large majority of all activity in the respective industry, often arrived at through predatory pricing schemes that are now illegal.
> Some of the most notable robber barons were J.P. Morgan (banking), John D. Rockefeller (oil), and Andrew Carnegie (steel).

Take special note of those three names.

Check out the Congressional Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing Report of 1976. Note that all three names figure prominently in the formation and ownership of the Federal Reserve member banks.

All three amassed vast fortunes and enormous political control. All three had their wealth turned into multi-generational dynasties. All three estates eventually formed Foundations to protect the family wealth from the normal taxes We the Sheeple have to pay, as well as effecting the means of influencing society for their long term benefit.

For instance, The Rockefeller Foundation funded Feminism…they CONSPIRED to change the very fabric of society by attacking the Patriarchal structure of the nuclear family.

Here's an interviewer with film maker Aaron Russo, recounting a conversation he had with Nick Rockefeller before Rouss0 died in 2007:

Excerpt from Aaron Russo's last interview before his death in 2007:

> Well one of the things he told me was that.. he was at the house one night and we started talking and he was laughing and he said,
>
> "Aaron what do you think Women's Liberation was all about?"
>
> And I had pretty conventional thinking about it at that point and I said,
> "I think it's about women having the right to work to get equal pay with men just like they won the right to vote."
> He started to laugh and he said,
>
> "Your an idiot."
> And I said,
> "Why am I an idiot?"
>
> And he said,
>
> "Let me tell you what that was about. We the Rockefellers funded that."
>
> "We funded Women's Lib and we're the ones who got it all over the newspapers and television (through) the Rockefeller Foundation…"
>
> And he says,
> "You wanna know why?
> There were two primary reasons.
> And one reason was we couldn't tax half the population before Women's Lib and the second reason was now we get the kids in school at an early age.. we can indoctrinate kids on how to think and with it break up their family. The kids start looking at the state as the family.. As the schools as the officials as their family.. not the parents teaching them. And so those were the two primary reasons for Women's Lib."

Some people will ignore this quote and say that conspiracy theories are nothing more than reptilian alien sex fiend delusions promoting female supremacy.

These same folks will laugh and criticize the likes of one of the internet's most famous conspiracy theorist, Henry Makow, as a complete moonbat who hurts the cause of Men's Rights.

Yet Henry Makow repeatedly issues the most basic and simplest of challenges for people who think he's a loon to see how right or wrong he is: Google "Rockefeller Foundation" and "Women's Studies."

The Rockefeller Foundation literally has bankrolled the primary transmitter of Cultural Feminism for the last several decades in the US – the Women's Studies programs in colleges and Universities across the country.

All the aspiring journalists, film makers, screenwriters, and other news media and entertainment industry focused students took these women's studies classes during their educational careers, and hit the mass media production industry after graduation, fully indoctrinated in the attitudes and ideas of the feminist zeitgeist. And it literally embedded itself into the mass media propaganda we now call “info-tainment” to make it a cultural influence that has perfectly socially engineered our modern feminist society.

But remember…this is crazy conspiracy theory. It couldn’t possibly be true…feminism was an organic, grass roots movement born of women who were truly oppressed by Western Patriarchy!

The Carnegie Foundation has also been a big supporter of feminist scholarship.

But for this article, I’d like focus primarily on the third Robber Baron’s Estate listed: JP Morgan.

While Carnegie and Rockefeller’s wealth were used to create Foundations to exert influence over society, JP Morgan became one of our present day banks “too big to fail.”

But don’t be mistaken if you think that JP Morgan doesn’t have anything to do with feminism either.

In fact, JP Morgan has ingeniously positioned itself to reap massive profits from one of the lynch pins of effecting Feminist policy in the U.S. – the Food Stamp programs now using debit cards instead of the Federally printed paper “stamps.”

As the Economic Collapse Blog points out:

> JP Morgan is the largest processor of food stamp benefits in the United States. JP Morgan has contracted to provide food stamp debit cards in 26 U.S. states and the District of Columbia. JP Morgan is paid for each case that it handles, so that means that the more Americans that go on food stamps, the more profits JP Morgan makes. Yes, you read that correctly. When the number of Americans on food stamps goes up, JP Morgan makes more money.

Food stamps is one of the programs that enable women to create more single mother households. Women don’t need Men to be providers now…they have JP Morgan to assist the Federal Government in taking money from working taxpayers and feeding single mother households and their illegitimate broods!

JP Morgan also administers child support debit cards in 15 States, making it more efficient for child support agencies to take money from Dads and deposit them via electronic funds transfers into these debit card accounts so women will have a much easier time spending the support payments with their JP Morgan child support debit cards.

Isn’t JP Morgan just great?!

I say it’s time to starve this beast.

If you have a JP Morgan bank account, close it. Take your business elsewhere.

If you have a JP Morgan credit card, pay it off or transfer your balance to a smaller bank that isn’t a part owner of the Federal Reserve banking system nor a profiteer off of the feminazi welfare state.

Reduce your tax obligations to the least amount possible. It’s our tax dollars being used to pay the likes of JP Morgan to administer these debit card programs.

Better yet, expatriate to some country where Rockefeller and Carnegie sponsored social engineering – aka “feminism” – has yet to take a demographically destructive hold on the populace (if such places even exist anymore).

All things considered, I realize that realistically, such actions taken by the amount of readers who would take this seriously still wouldn’t even come close to being able to starve this beast. It’s grown to large, too menacing and too rapacious.

But at least you won’t be supporting it’s continued devouring of Western Civilization. After all, even if you can’t effectively starve the beast, that doesn’t mean you should help to feed it either.

Young British MP Puts Feminists on the Defensive

W.F. Price · 26 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, Conservative MP Dominic Raab went after feminism in the most extraordinarily explicit terms anyone has used in decades. He states that men get the shaft at work, feminists are "bigots" (!), the wage gap is a myth, and the feminist attack on men must be stopped. His statements could have come straight out of The Spearhead or Angry Harry, sites I'd assume he has some familiarity with. Although I'm sure many readers have already seen the comment Raab made, much of it is worth repeating. Coming from a politician, the following passage is jaw-droppingly frank:

> While we have some of the toughest anti-discrimination laws in the world, we are blind to some of the most flagrant discrimination – against men. From the cradle to the grave, men are getting a raw deal. Men work longer hours, die earlier, but retire later than women. That won't be fixed for another seven years. One reason women are left 'holding the baby' is anti-male discrimination in rights of maternity/paternity leave – which Clegg wants to tackle. Then there are 'pre-nups', recording the wishes of partners before they get married. Those wishes were serially ignored in this country, until last year – when one was enforced in favour of a woman, loaded German heiress Katrin Radmacher. Meanwhile, young boys are educationally disadvantaged compared to girls, and divorced or separated fathers are systematically ignored by the courts. A father turned up to one of my constituency surgeries, complaining that dozens of court orders requiring access rights had been flouted by his ex-wife. He asked me to write to Ministers, not because he harboured any hope of changing the situation, but so he could show his children he had tried everything when they reach adulthood.

At nearly 37, Raab is right in the transitional generation that grew up in the wake of feminist changes to society. I should know — he's only about a half year older than me. For men of this age, it started from birth. Naturally, they went after the children first, so the feminist juggernaut forged resolutely on just a step in front of us our entire lives. For us, male privilege sounds like a cruel joke — it's never existed. As small children, we were subjected to gender neutral toys and propaganda (e.g. "Free To Be, You and Me"), girls were favored throughout grade school, and just when we started to come of age the most draconian anti-father laws in human history were put in place. It doesn't surprise me in the least to see that the first male politician to confront feminism head-on comes from this generation.

Such a powerful statement from a politician can only come from a position of moral strength, and it must have a good deal of support, because the feminist response has been defensive — something we never would have seen in the 90s, when they were in full attack mode.

In The Guardian, which appears to have become the feminist mouthpiece for the UK, Laurie Penny responds by calling Mr. Raab's assertions "myths," and attempts to do some damage control. She denies that feminists have made men's lives worse, argues that "equality" legislation strengthens ordinary families, and tries to avoid the issue of women's choices and decisions in regards to the so-called "wage gap." Much of her response is a recapitulation of the standard feminist strategy of dissimulation and projection:

> Raab is absolutely correct to suggest that many are "fed up of men and women being pitted against each other in an outdated battle of the sexes". Unfortunately, his insistence that working men's problems are the fault of feminism seems set to stir up yet more bitterness between men and women in the workplace: a classic strategy of divide and rule. Convincing ordinary people that women are making gains at the expense of men, or vice versa, distracts us all from the truth – that more than ever under this government's austerity programme, it is the rich who are making gains at the expense of the poor.

Those not in the know – and their numbers are fewer every day – might not see that the above passage contains a couple whoppers, such as the suggestion that it isn't feminists who are inciting war between the sexes for their own benefit, but rather those selfish, greedy patriarchs who refuse to raise taxes even higher for the benefit of the "poor." What a load. Feminists know well that social services are geared to remove money from men and put it in the hands of women, often those with high-paid government and nonprofit positions. Gender warmongering is an integral part of this process — loaded DV and sexual harassment stats have been a huge source of funds for female bureaucrats and professional activists, and they have led to laws that quite clearly oppress men and advantage women both in the home and the workplace.

Raab's salvo against feminism was impressive and heartening, but it wasn't the first shot fired back at the feminists. At the grassroots level, men have been on the front lines for decades. The first few were a lonely crew, but the voices that were once drowned out by the crowd are growing in strength, and more and more men are coming into the light. If it weren't for this growing awareness among men that they are suffering under an unjust regime, and an increasing willingness to express it, Raab wouldn't have had the support that allowed him to take such a resolute stand against feminist excesses. Our efforts truly are beginning to pay off, and this is just the beginning.

Should Men Tame Their Rhetoric?

W.F. Price · 27 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Spearhead and its commenters have come under fire from the usual suspects for being too strident, uncompromising and angry, and for not behaving like obedient little boys. Of course, this is a typical political ploy — point out your opponents' anger as proof that they are the bad guys. Never mind the fact that many, many men have every reason to be angry; that doesn't matter. What counts is how slick you are and how reasonable you can appear, even if what you're proposing is unconscionable. For example, it never ceased to amaze me how people such as Dick Cheney and Paul Wolfowitz could dispassionately argue for war, despite the fact that it meant that tens of thousands of entirely innocent people would die. From a moral standpoint, this seems worse than some fire-breathing jingoist screaming for national revenge. There's something about dispassionate arguments for killing that is extraordinarily creepy.

Following the shooting of Arizona Representative Giffords, the hue and cry from the left about "violent rhetoric" was deafening. It calmed down a bit when the shooter, Jared Loughner, turned out to be obsessed and likely insane, but not particularly motivated by political rhetoric. Actually, the conspiracies he ascribed to were characterized not by how emotionally compelling they were, but rather by being very odd, like him. So it wasn't Bill O'Reilly or Glenn Beck who motivated Loughner to pull the trigger. No, it was something that had gone wrong in his mind, much like what motivated John Hinckley to attempt Ronald Reagan's assassination.

But again, it didn't really matter whether or not political opponents were responsible for Loughner's murderous spree — the goal was to dominate the debate. And this is exactly what men are facing from feminists today. Whether or not we've done anything wrong, and whether or not we've advocated for truly atrocious things as many of our opponents have (for example Valenti's suggestion that we get rid of presumption of innocence), we're supposed to be ashamed and follow their rules concerning what we can and cannot express, and how we can express it.

I'd like to make a comparison to another debate that is occurring right now amongst feminists and their ideological allies. It directly concerns feminists, including one who is a registered member of Jessica Valenti's Feministing site and a rather prominent Philadelphia-area activist. It also concerns a horrific series of crimes that are coming to light, so sensitive readers, or people who are just having a bad day might want to hit the back button on their browser and come back to finish the article only when they are in a good, confident mood. Yes, it is that bad.

William Saletan of Slate, a liberal Republican who is essentially pro-choice and has criticized the Catholic Church for alleged misogyny, recently wrote a piece about Dr. Kermit Gosnell, a Philadelphia abortionist who has been charged with murder for killing seven viable babies and one patient. In Saletan's essay, he questions the feminists' uncompromising position on abortion. The details of the case are disgusting. In fact, they are downright nauseating.

Because many of his patients were very late in their pregnancies, Gosnell would induce birth, delivering living, breathing babies. In one instance, a baby was left crying on a table for 20 minutes before he killed it. Gosnell ended the babies' lives by a process he called "snipping." This consisted of stabbing the child in the neck with scissors and severing its spine. Gosnell routinely flouted the law, fudging the reports on fetal age in order to abort babies beyond the legally-imposed 24 week limit, which is a very generous timeframe. In one documented case the child was nearly six pounds — within the normal range for a full-term birth. Gosnell made a joke about that baby boy, saying he was big enough to walk him to the bus stop.

Although investigators initially raided him for illegal prescriptions, they found a house of horrors in his clinic:

> What they found, according to the report, was "filthy, deplorable, and disgusting": Blood on the floor. The stench of urine. Cat feces on the stairs. Semi-conscious women moaning in the waiting or revovery rooms, covered with blood-stained blankets. Broken equipment. Blocked or locked exits.

> [...]
> investigators found fetal bodies and body parts in garbage bags, plastic bozes and bottles at the clinic.

The grand jury report is much worse. It includes pictures, so please don't look at it unless you have a strong stomach. From the report:

> Among the relatively few cases that could be specifically documented, one was Baby Boy A. His 17-year-old mother was almost 30 weeks pregnant – seven and a half months – when labor was induced. An employee estimated his birth weight as approaching six pounds. He was breathing and moving when Dr. Gosnell severed his spine and put the body in a plastic shoebox for disposal. The doctor joked that this baby was so big he could "walk me to the bus stop." Another, Baby Boy B, whose body was found at the clinic frozen in a one-gallon spring-water bottle, was at least 28 weeks of gestational age when he was killed. Baby C was moving and breathing for 20 minutes before an assistant came in and cut the spinal cord, just the way she had seen Gosnell do it so many times.

Although there is room for debate amongst ordinary, decent people concerning early-term abortion and whether or not it is morally acceptable, I don't think anyone with a conscience or a shred of decency could condone what Dr. Gosnell was doing in that Philadelphia clinic. And this is where feminists come into the picture.

In his article, Saletan highlights statements made by Steph Herold and Susan Yanow, a couple of prominent feminists who recently wrote a piece defending abortion at any time during pregnancy.

Saletan includes the following quote from the two in his article:

> Women have no obligation to make a decision as soon as they possibly can. The only obligation women have is to take the time they need to make the decision that is right for them. Don't we believe that women are moral decision makers, and carefully consider their options when faced with an unwanted pregnancy? Don't we reject the anti-choice rhetoric that women make the decision to have an abortion callously? The pro-choice movement takes a step backward when we judge that a woman has taken too long to make what may be a life-changing decision. Shouldn't we want women to take the time they need to make the best decision, regardless of where they are in the pregnancy?

The gist of the feminists' argument comes down to the idea that women have "moral agency," which is interpreted by feminists to mean that whatever she chooses to do with her child is a moral choice that is beyond criticism. This is really the heart of feminist ideology: anything a woman wants, at any time, is "moral."

From Steph Herold and Susan Yanow's response to Saletan:

> When leaders in the pro-choice movement start to speculate about restricting abortion rights to appease the anti-choice movement, they have lost sight of what the pro-choice movement is about: respecting women as moral decision makers.
>
> An early choice to end an unwanted pregnancy, while medically easier and to some more politically palatable is not necessarily a better or more moral choice. Women deserve to have all the time they need in order to make the best pregnancy decision for themselves and for their families, even if this means having a later abortion.
> The only obligation women have is to take the time they need to make the decision that is right for them. Don't we believe that women are moral decision makers, and carefully consider their options when faced with an unwanted pregnancy?

After looking at the grand jury report, which was so bad that I don't think I'll be able to eat for hours, it's surreal to see these feminists arguing that killing viable infants at a late stage of pregnancy is "moral." But this is exactly what they are doing. They may call it "abortion," but when you kill a squirming, crying baby with a pair of scissors, that's murder.

Yes, these feminists are openly condoning murder, and calling it a "moral choice." Not only murder as in "in my opinion, it's murder," but murder as in you will do time in prison for it today, decades after Roe v. Wade.

Given this fact, how far would we have to go at The Spearhead to match their own rhetoric? Well, if you're going to compare apples to apples, I suppose I'd have to write an essay stating that men, having human rights like women, are "moral decision makers," and if they want to blow a feminist's head off with a shotgun they are simply making a "moral choice" that we ought to honor. And if, after performing this procedure, they chose to freeze her corpse in a water cooler, who am I to judge?

Of course, we never go that far at The Spearhead. I draw the line when it comes to killing or maiming people. But does that stop the feminists? Of course not. How could you expect people who count enthusiastic and outspoken supporters of murder among their ranks to exercise any restraint or fight fair? The thing is, they will do and say whatever they can in an effort to shut us up, so they can escalate their own rhetoric and promote their plans without any opposition. They've already done away with constitutional due process through abuse of restraining orders and DV laws, millions of men have been ruined through no fault of their own, children are deprived of fathers en masse, and now they're supporting baby killing. I'm convinced that the next thing they will push for is outright slavery — there's already a good deal of support amongst feminists for putting fathers who are in arrears on child support in penal labor camps.

It is precisely for this reason that toning down our rhetoric is the last thing we should worry about. Our opponents' concept of morality simply isn't the same as ours. To them, objective morality does not exist, and we'd have to abandon it as well were we to play by their rules. In other words, if we were reasonable and "understanding" toward them, we'd be their accomplices.

At this point, given what feminists have done and how much farther they want to take things, we would be making a grave mistake in compromising with them or giving any ground at all — this is not the time for appeasement. If anything, we need to turn up the volume and fight them all the harder. It is the moral thing to do.

Women Are Paid To Lie About Rape

pierceharlan · 27 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It is central tenet of the sexual grievance industry that women never, or hardly ever, lie about rape because the burden of subjecting themselves to the ordeal of the criminal justice system outweighs any conceivable benefit from such a lie.

This, of course, is nonsense. In one of the few serious studies ever conducted on the subject, see here, three principal motivations for false rape claims were identified: (1) to "serve[ ] the complainants' need to provide a plausible explanation for some suddenly foreseen, unfortunate consequence of a consensual encounter, usually sexual, with a male acquaintance"; (2) to serve as "a means of retaliating against a rejecting male"; and (3) to serve as an "attention/sympathy-getting device."

If significant numbers of women are willing to lie about rape because they crave attention or wish to exact revenge, is it not all the more plausible that some women will lie for the far more rational reason of obtaining a significant sum of money? The question scarcely survives its statement.

In the UK, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority (CICA) furnishes a monetary incentive to lie about rape. Under the Compensation Scheme, Britain pays crime victims, including women who claim they've been raped, substantial sums of money as "compensation." The alleged rapes need not have involved violence to trigger the payments.

The compensation system has been subjected to rampant fraud, and women have falsely cried rape in order to collect. In one well-publicized case, a false accuser was compensated a substantial sum of money for her lie.

In contrast, it was affirmed last year: Britain does not compensate men for the harm they suffer after being falsely accused, no matter how egregious. The double-standard is stark, and morally grotesque. It tells us much about how our society regards the victims of false rape claims – as flotsam, unfortunate but tolerable collateral damage in "the more important" war on rape.

Who Is Covered?

The CICA, funded by the Ministry of Justice, pays victims of "violent crimes" according to an established scheme of tariffs. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme (2008) sets forth the standard amounts paid for each category of crime. The Scheme is found here. A payment will be made if the alleged violent crime was more likely than not to have occurred. (Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme (2008) ¶20.) There is no necessity to prove the crime beyond a reasonable doubt, which is the standard for conviction in UK criminal courts.

While the Compensation Scheme is designed to cover crimes of violence, an exception is made for non-forcible rape and other sexual crimes not involving violence. Payments are made for mental injury, including "temporary mental anxiety," suffered by non-consenting victims of sexual offenses. (Criminal Injuries Compensation (2008) ¶9.) Under the compensation scheme, non-consensual penile penetration warrants UK £11,000. (Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme (2008) Page 34.) Greater sums are allotted depending on the severity of the injury inflicted. A non-penetrative sexual physical act "over the clothing" warrants UK £1000. (Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme (2008) Page 34.) This, presumably, includes a single instance of inappropriate touching.

In the UK during 2008-2009, 1,938 payments were made to "victims" of rape for a total of £30,197,619. See here.

Who Is Not Covered?

The UK does not compensate men who were falsely accused of rape, no matter how terrible their victimization. I previously wrote to the CICA and asked if a false rape claim would be covered, noting that such claims often have the effect of mentally (not to mention financially) destroying the falsely accused. I received a prompt and professional response that included the following: "Under the terms of our scheme unfortunately this would not be covered. Under the terms of our scheme for eligibility, applicants need to be the victim of a violent crime."

This policy was affirmed in an important legal precedent handed down last year involving a falsely accused cab driver named Clive Bishop. After winning the right in court to apply for the same sort of monetary compensation as other crime victims receive, Mr. Bishop, who lost his taxi business and was shunned by the community as a result of the false rape claim that sent his false accuser to jail for ten months, was denied compensation for his ordeal by the CICA for the same reason the CICA had related to me: Mr. Bishop was not the victim of a violent crime.

"It's just ripped the heart out of me and the last three-and-a-half years have been a total nightmare," Mr. Bishop said. See the story here. Mr. Bishop told False Rape Society: "It is not about the money for me. It is a recognition of the horrific consequences it brings." He added: ". . . sexual offences that are alleged are the only crime where innocent people are arrested locked up without any evidence to back up what someone has alleged. . . . Don't forget while I was arrested for a crime that never occurred and locked up, my freedom and liberty denied, she was in a comfortable suite being befriended and pandered. My emotions were ignored and I was arrested, judged and convicted without any compassion or evidence. Believe me when I say that I am still suffering!"

It is important to underscore the terrible double-standard here: the victim of a single instance of a sexual act over the clothing is entitled to compensation, but a man falsely accused of rape who is arrested and jailed for weeks, months or even years, who is subjected to untold mental agonies, who loses his friends, the esteem of his community, his job, his business, and his good name, is entitled to nothing.

The victimization of men falsely accused of rape, no matter how egregious their injuries, is regarded as less worthy of society's protection than the victimization of non-forcible rape victims, no matter how slight their injuries.

Falsely accused men are not the only ones who aren't covered. The vast majority of boys who are statutorily raped by adult women are not covered, either. This is because victims of sexual offenses are not covered if they "consented in fact." (Criminal Injuries Compensation (2008) ¶9(c).) This effectively rules out virtually all claims involving the statutory rape of a teen boy by an adult woman because the boy is typically a willing participant. The fact that the law has determined that boys are incapable of giving valid, legally operative consent to engage in sexual acts with an adult is of no import to the CICA.

The Compensation Scheme Exacerbates the False Rape Epidemic

Remember Grant Bowers? He was just an ordinary teenager when a 20-year-old woman named Sarah-Jane Hillard decided his life didn't mean as much as the £7,500 she would collect from the CICA if she claimed he raped her. She was caught, but Grant's life was destroyed. "I don't know why she did it but her lies have ruined my life," he said. Grant had to move out of his hometown because of threats against him. People were kicking the door of his flat in and shouting "rapist" though the letterbox. Someone offered a reward to learn his whereabouts. He was chased through town with a knife. Is it surprising that for a time, he was physically sick with worry and was constantly teary? All because a woman wanted to collect money from the CICA. See here.

The problem of fraud in the Compensation Scheme has been evident for years. In 2001, the chief executive of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board blamed the growth in false criminal claims in general on a compensation culture. A CICA report published that year highlighted rampant fraud in the compensation system:

"Among the [fraudulent] cases is that of a woman who has been asked to repay £7,500 after falsely claiming she was raped by a tramp. Last year, a court found that Natalie Knighting, a 21-year-old with three children, had made up the story. She was jailed for six months. Ms. Knighting had won compensation from the CICA for the second time. She had been awarded the same amount of compensation for sexual assault as a child. So far, the authority has been unable to recover any money from her." See here.

But, of course, the government denies that the Compensation Scheme breeds false rape claims even though the CICA itself has acknowledged rampant fraud as a result of this compensation culture, and even though we know significant numbers of women lie about rape for far less rational reasons.

In a 2007 debate in the House of Lords, Lord Campbell-Savours questioned the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on this subject:

“My Lords, is it possible that one reason for high rates of false allegations and low rates of conviction for rape is that a minority—I stress that—of women make false allegations in order to win compensation which, in the case of rape, is £11,000? Why do we not move to the German system, where the state does not pay and where compensation follows civil action, as against the state paying? Surely the trauma of rape requires not state-funded windfalls but counseling services that really help victims.”

The Under-Secretary rejected the question out of hand:

“My Lords, a victim of rape should get both compensation and counseling and support. It is not either/or; it is both/and. As the noble Lord will know, it is very important that we make sure that where convictions are made, people can get some kind of recompense for the trauma and injury that they may have received. As for the reasons why people make false allegations, I do not agree that one of the primary objectives is to get £11,000. There may be very serious reasons why people do that, which we need to consider.”

See here. The Under-Secretary stuck her head in the sand and flatly refused to entertain the notion that women would lie about rape for anything as crass as money. It would have to be a more “serious” reason than that.

She would do well to review The False Rape Society website sometime. Among the motivations for false rape claims we’ve reported on in the recent past are following: the accuser’s boyfriend took too long to buy cigarettes; several women didn’t want to pay cab fares, so they accused innocent cab drivers of rape; a girl wanted to get back at her teen ex-boyfriend — her rape lie not only got him convicted, but two of his friends as well; a woman wanted to get back at her ex-boyfriend for breaking it off, so she falsely accused him of rape and candidly admitted: “I just wanted him to be hurt because of what he’d done”; a young woman wanted her young ex-boyfriend “to feel extreme pain”; a woman sent a man to prison for five years because she was bored; a woman was bent on revenge after a road rage incident; a man refused to give his false accuser a beer; a maid falsely accused her employer of rape because she didn’t like her workload; a girl falsely accused a man of rape for throwing a flower at her; a woman caused three men to be interrogated for rapes they didn’t commit because she wanted a day off from work; and an 18-year-year-old boy was hauled out of class, arrested, and jailed for a month on a random false rape claim by a girl he had never even met.

But, no, a sizable financial payment couldn’t possibly be a motivation for a false rape claim. How silly to think such a thing is possible.

If someone wanted to do a study of the false rape problem in the UK, he could use the CICA’s Compensation Scheme as a microcosm: the government enables women to lie about rape and then wonders why more rape claims can’t be proved. And no matter how terribly men suffer from false rape claims, the government thinks they deserve nothing.

Chivalry Gone Awry

Hestia · 28 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

An interesting conversation has been taking place on Dalrock's blog recently on the topic of chivalry, which sex provides more selfless help, and what words should be used to highlight the difference in help between men and women. Chivalry has been the word proposed and the word used but for a variety of reasons I have been left wondering if this is an appropriate choice.

What Chivalry Was Supposed to Mean

The code of chivalry was never meant to apply to the male population at large but rather a small subset who were the tough warriors of their day. These warrior ethos did not mean male servitude to women but called for a brotherhood between knights, courage during times that conjure up great fear, and dedication to king and cause. Part of the code did address taking care of the widow and orphan and being courteous to women but this was hardly the end all be all of this knightly code of honor. And back then, just as today, not all women were ladies; this was a title reserved for those of a certain social class not women who behave with a healthy heaping of decorum and propriety as the term is used today.

Taken in it's proper context, chivalry is not dead today. Our society still has a small minority of men who feel called to serve in the military, a reality that is well illustrated when one reads the creeds and military ethos of today. Yet it's not just on paper we see this modern day chivalry alive and thriving but in the way the media and justice system may treat military members who misbehave. In military towns it's not uncommon for news reports to say that a soldier/sailor/marine/coastie/airman committed the crime as opposed to using man or woman. If the accused service member happened to be in an elite branch the media will eat this up much as they did in 2002 when the now infamous 'Fort Bragg Wife Murders' were committed by men who happened to be part of Special Forces and Delta.

On my blog and The Spearhead I've said several times that should my family's home need to be defended from a criminal that legally speaking it would be best that I, not my husband, pull that trigger. This isn't because I am a woman, but because my husband is a trained soldier and I am not. A civilian man would make out better legally in such a case than my husband or his military peers would, just as would happen if it the case was their committing an assault. The argument would likely be made that the Special Forces soldier, well trained in combatives and other warrior skills, has the potential to be deadlier with his bare hands alone and should have had enough discipline to control himself.

To this day society expects and hopes that their best trained warriors are disciplined not only in the artifices of war but in self control as well, and this is not without good reason. Nobody wants strength to be used inappropriately for the danger that comes about when tough meets evil. In short form: chivalry is the same as it always has been. Nothing has changed and it's certainly not dead, just hijacked and twisted quite a bit.

Combating the Chivalry Perversion

If the idea of chivalry is kept in its proper usage – the honor code of a society's meanest toughest warriors – the female entitlement that has been bred with the perversion of the word is all the more perplexing. The men who were required to give up their seats on the Titanic were not knights of that day. They weren't men who were operating under an honor code they have willingly submitted themselves and shouldn't have been treated as such. The code of chivalry never required that all men open doors, buy flowers, pay for dates, and bend over backwards for all women. To get from military ethos to male servitude to women was a wild crazy leap. Examining the modern day perversion of the chivalric concept blows out of the water the harmful and demeaning idea that all men must sacrifice themselves to the degree that a warrior did/does (to death if need be) in order to be Real Men. There has always been just a small percentage of men who felt "called" to this lifestyle; those who aren't now and never were bad men or masculinity rejects. Society needs the poet, the engineer, and the brainy scientist and all other sorts of men just as much as it needs its warriors. How did we get from a code of ethics designed for a warrior class to male subservience towards women as a group and a limiting myopic view of how this ideal fits into “real” masculinity as we have today? It’s mighty odd…

In pointing this out those who espouse and expect and demand male disposability and deference to all women the reality of this perversion and the sickness of what they preach to men is out in the light of day. They are demanding something entirely different than what chivalry was instituted to be and this raises many perplexing questions, ones that don’t even require the feminist/equality angle. How do they justify their position? What makes women so special and more worthy of protection than their brother human beings? And if feeling especially brazen it could be asked what happened to the brotherhood aspect of the code. If we need to “bring back chivalry” surely you guys deserve “wings and beer night with the boys” or hunting trips or something.

Perhaps our opponents will not be so rational as to understand where their entitlement mindset falls apart but any rational individual who is listening/reading might be led to ask questions about this important topic. And even if they don’t, looking at chivalry in it’s proper context may provide men with the reality that they do not need to fulfill the obligations demanded of them to be Real Men. They may better appreciate that they can be successful men and fully masculine without the need to demean themselves or put themselves in positions they do no wish to be in. They might be able to not just ask why society has different expectations for men than women but put into practice what they, individually, believe they should do.

The connotations, misunderstanding, and baggage that come with the word are immense and it fails to drive home the most important point of the good deeds men graciously and freely give to women and others they help. It also keeps alive the perverted expectations that have been placed on the shoulders of men and may even keep men chained to said expectations. Chivalry today implies that men “owe” this service to women whereas a term like “selfless service” describes precisely what is being offered: men giving a gift of themselves that wasn’t “owed” but given by their own choice. To not highlight this reality and the beauty in the act does an immense disservice to men. Separating help that is given by choice versus that given by societal expectation would go a long way in highlighting just which sex gives more benevolently and freely to strangers than the other. “What a selfless giving man! He helped me fix my lawn mower when he didn’t have to!” should be how we think of what men give, not “grrrr why didn’t he carry my bags! Loser!” Controlling the language may be one way to change the minds at least of a few.

Doubling Down

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 28 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Terry O'Neill, the president of NOW (the National Organization for Women) had this to say about government social programs:

> No, we need increases in the social programs and here's why. First of all, the social programs at the state and local level are being decimated because states, unlike the federal government, states can't run a deficit. The federal government can and should in order to support these social programs.
> The social programs mostly benefit women – these are things like childcare and after school programs and anti-violence programs and training programs. Those things are for women but the interesting thing is a lot of them employ women. So from my point of view, we really need those social programs enhanced – not cut.

There has been much written in the manosphere about how government spending is mainly spent on women. However, for the first time, a feminist and the president of NOW no less, has admitted this. She has also admitted that women are disproportionately employed by government at all levels, another fact widely discussed in the manosphere.

In addition, this shows us that feminists will not bend to the reality of a shrinking economy and shrinking government revenues. Instead, feminists will double down (and triple down and quadruple down) and fight to the last womyn to keep governments at all levels spending on women. The fact that the US and other countries can no longer afford (if they ever could) feminism does not matter to them. The fact that the federal government of the US alone had a $1.4 trillion deficit in 2010 or is projected to have a $1.5 trillion deficit in 2011 does not matter to feminists. Knowing that the federal government is running these deficits already, O'Neill has effectively demanded multi-trillion dollar deficits and doesn't care about the myriad of problems it would cause, such as hyperinflation.

Men's Nook: Not in the Kid's Section

Chuck Ross · 29 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

My brother posted this on Facebook after an incident at the Preston and Park Barnes and Noble in Plano, Texas. He was shopping with his pregnant wife and her parents. I wrote this piece at my local B&N, using their complimentary wi-fi, drinking loads of their water, and browsing books that I have no intention of buying at their store. Doing my part. Here is my brother:

> Tonight I was at BN trying to find a place to sit to look at my books. Of course I couldn't find a seat because the two measly sofa chairs they used to have are gone, the handful of wooden chairs were taken, and people were having to sit in the aisles like hobos. I wasn't gonna sit on the ground and was determined to find a seat, and the only one I could see was at a table in the kid's section. As I was walking into the kid's section the lady who was working that area asked me in a snarky way "can I help you find something." I said "no I'm fine" and then strolled over to the reading area and sat down. Before I even opened my book the lady followed me to where I was sitting and told me that the section was only for kids and parents. I told her that there was nowhere else to sit and she advised me to go over to the music section. I rolled my eyes and just walked into the music section where my book tripped the area's merchandise sensor. After cooling off for a minute I told [my wife] about it all and she went and complained to the manager. The manager told her that they don't let single men in that section because they have had complaints about men leering at children. Right after I was kicked out I was somewhat pissed, but after what [my wife] told me I was furious. She was basically saying that the reason I was kicked out of the kid's section is that I was suspected of being in there to leer at little kids and not for the perfectly reasonable and more likely reason that I was trying to find a fucking place to sit down. Like I said, I'm never going back.

Both my brother and I followed up with Barnes and Noble in different capacities to figure out their policy's genesis and its true intent. My brother went back to the store to speak personally with a manager, and I contacted the corporate office to determine where this policy originated. My brother didn't speak with the general manager, but he spoke with an assistant who told him that he was asked to leave the section because of limited space and that if he wanted to go in that area again he should have a child with him. Which will be difficult since my sister-in-law is only due to give birth in a few months.

Taking a bit of an activist stance, I contacted Barnes and Nobles' corporate headquarters and spoke with a customer service representative. I told the rep the story of what happened and wanted to know if the policy to prevent either single men or people without children from sitting in the kid's section was a company policy or store policy. The rep said that she would research it and get back to me. Corporate did not get back to me; instead, they apparently contacted the general manager of the Preston and Park store and emailed me with an apology which she asked me to pass along to my brother.

In email correspondence, the store manager insisted that the issue at hand was not one of discrimination against single men but rather a concern over space so that "children [can] have every opportunity to develop the love and habits of reading that will keep our business viable in the future."

Barnes and Noble could afford such a stance because they'd already hooked my brother on the stuff so they could afford to demean him and tacitly accuse him of pedophilia. It is important to remember one thing from my brother's posting: he was both immediately confronted by a female employee and told by an assistant manager that the policy was implemented because there had been reports of men leering at children. My brother was told that individuals had been caught in the kid's section doing lewd things: apparently a man had acted inappropriately, some kids had left a "Playboy" magazine, and a couple of lesbians were found looking at graphic books.

Albeit not nearly as systematic or disturbing, this case is similar to one in which British Airways maintained a policy of separating adult men from lone children on their flights in order to protect kids from pedophiles. Lawyers, professionals, fathers, and even the current mayor of London were vilified under the auspices of child safety.

Perhaps there was miscommunication between the general manager and the assistant/employees about the nature of the "parents and children" only policy. But it is important to think through workforce dynamics and to keep the British Airways policy in mind in order to gain a better understanding of what happened. The assistant manager my brother spoke with got the idea that single men were prohibited from the kid's section from somewhere. People, especially those with managerial responsibility, don't spout off speculation like that without some basis in truth. It could be that the truth was rooted more in internal speculation rather that explicit store/district/company policy, but if the culture of that store/district/company is such that a manager thinks that the kid's section is in danger of being infiltrated by perverted men, then that store is practicing de facto discrimination and profiling.

My brother had been told by someone at the store that the kid's section policy was handed down from the district office. I contacted the district manager to confirm this and find out why such a policy would exist and who implemented it. I spoke with district manager Jerry Warren who told me that there was no such policy and that he hadn't heard anything about it. If anything, it seems that Barnes and Noble is unable to get their story straight.

There are a few other salient facts worth mentioning:

- My brother has spent thousands of dollars at Barnes & Noble while none of the children have spent a dime.
- My brother's wife has shopped in the children's section by herself on numerous occasions – even before she was pregnant – without a hitch. She is a kindergarten teacher (tangentially, my sister-in-law has a male peer who she says is a wonderful teacher who is loved by his young students, but he is forced to deal with parents who don't want their children in his class because he is a man).
- Several months ago my brother and his wife sat childless in the kid's section and were not bothered. Also in the section, an adult book club was holding a meeting. The policy guarding the limited space of the kid's section was apparently not in effect at that time.

Here is a more metaphysical discussion of this incident. Laws have been enacted which prevent discrimination against customers on the basis of race, gender, religion, ethnicity, and sexual orientation. Unless one set of customers pays an extra fee for access – like the VIP section at a concert or front court seats at a Lakers game – a business can't cordon off parts of a store that certain customers can't enter.

It also seems that in the tug-of-war between established, adult, male customers and children, Barnes and Noble has sided with children. Assuming that all men will stand fast behind their white shields, companies like Barnes and Noble – no, society in general – have decided to discount the integrity and buying power of men. The company is operating off of old models which considered men's demand to be highly inelastic and, thus, not worth considering. "Men will buy whatever we sell them – however we sell it." Such an attitude, which is inherited from the concept of male disposability, has made non-men the most highly sought after customers. It seems that "women and children first" extends beyond sinking ships and house fires. Let's see if the thousands of men who read this post allow kiddies and their mums a wide enough berth to explore their pop-up books by completely boycotting Barnes and Noble or at least marginally thinking twice about shopping there. $14.95 adds up here and there.

Then there is the age-old issue of parental responsibility. From a pragmatic view, it is unnecessary to enact a policy that polices lone men in the kid's section if parents are watching over their children. It is possible that shenanigans could take place in that section, but this is also possible in most settings outside the store's doors. If I had a kid and saw a man exposing himself near my child I would rip his head (or both) right off. Of course, this is a big if: there are only a handful of cases of such behavior. To prepare for an insane man touching himself or propositioning children in the kid's book section would be to assume that every other customer is a potential mass shooter. Of course, they are more likely to be men so it might be wise to bar men from entering the store altogether.

I post this to make an example of Barnes and Noble. The time is coming when men will not stand for being considered criminals and being treated as such. Barnes and Noble shouldn't worry too much because that time is still a little ways off. At least for now, most men won't heed the call, and the bookseller does have their Nook. But I have a nook too; it's a really good place to read my Kindle.

What Happens When Men Are Neglected

W.F. Price · 29 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've been watching some of the protest footage from Egypt, and there sure are a lot of angry men there. It isn't clear how this will turn out, but Hosni Mubarak's regime appears to be on the way out.

Governments that consistently neglect or antagonize their male populations never last too long. Female support matters little; women shift allegiance at the drop of a hat, so any government that counts on them to prop them up is making a mistake.

I find it ironic that Egypt has recently taken the lead in the Arab world in empowering women (had to use the cached version as Egypt has shut down the internet). Perhaps the government was aware of how deeply unpopular it was becoming among men, and looking for whatever support it could.

To see what a country full of angry men looks like, watch the following clip:

The Origin of The Spearhead

W.F. Price · 30 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I realized that although The Spearhead now has thousands of readers, few are familiar with the fact that the entire project grew out of a revelation I had nearly three years ago, while I was still reeling from the first blows of the divorce attack. In the midst of my life falling down around me, I had a pretty clear vision of what had brought me to this point, and put it down in writing on my old blog. This site started with that vision.

So, for those who are curious about what brought The Spearhead about, the following document, which is essentially a man's Declaration of Independence, was seminal:

Men's Liberation

Now that gender equality in terms of income has been achieved in the younger generation, and educationally women currently surpass men, most of us ordinary men find ourselves staring irrelevance straight in the face. A friend of mine recently observed that women are "taking over" his department at his former company. Except in specialized occupations that require male minds or bodies, women do indeed appear to have the upper hand. However, I observed to my friend that the top remains largely male, while the middle is dominated by females. The bottom, like the top, is predominately male. Unfortunately for us men, there's a lot more space at the bottom than at the top.

So what does that mean for men who are not among the fortunate few? Are we destined to be lowly peons shoveling muck out of gutters? For many of us, our fate could be worse than that. Gutter cleaning pays fairly well, at least according to the last bill I saw for that service. The future certainly does look grim, but could there be anything redeeming about our new status as disposable goods? Yes, there could, but only when we learn to accept and finally embrace it.

Bound by a sense of duty and responsibility to family, employer and country, men demanded certain guarantees in return. All these guarantees can be summed up in one word: fidelity. We expected not to be cheated, lied to or abandoned. Sadly, all these things have come to pass. Perhaps our own complacency is as much to blame for this as anything else, but our betrayal is a fait accompli. There was the inevitable denial, rage, and despair, but finally we find ourselves at the point of acceptance.

Accepting such a great loss of security, confidence and trust is a very difficult thing to do, but it is profoundly liberating. Whereas before one was shackled to deceit and resentment, now the fetters are broken, the cell door opens, and suddenly the world is revealed. Feelings of guilt, inadequacy, anger, envy and disappointment dissipate in the open air; ought gives way to is. When one arrives at this state of mind, all of the countless obligations, worries and responsibilities lose their sting. It becomes clear that reality – the way things are – is our only true master. We owe no debt to anything or anyone else.

So once a man throws off his countless restraints and goes all the way up the chain of command to take orders from the top, how does he deal with his only boss? Perhaps surprisingly, dealing with reality is very simple; it is only a matter of "can" and "cannot." There is no want, should or ought with reality. All those are subjective, and have nothing to do with the sun setting or things falling when dropped. A man who has a good idea of what he can do has a great deal of choices and ability, because there are infinite things men can do. Of course, there are always consequences. For example, you can jump out of an airplane without a parachute, but you cannot survive it. This is where judgment comes into play. However, although dealing with reality requires good judgment, letting other people do so for you requires absolute faith in their judgment AND their interest in your own welfare. That's a risky bet.

Once a man is freed from the bondage of others' expectations and desires, all that he does comes from his own heart. Any help or affection is freely given and not in any way coerced. His love and goodwill are pure and free from any taint of flattery. Likewise, any malicious acts are undertaken only by his own initiative. His heart and intentions are made clear through his actions. Because reality is truth, he embodies honesty.

These principles apply to all people, whether male or female, but the loss of direction among men in our civilization is a fairly recent development, and needs to be addressed. At this point, a politicized “men’s movement” might be counterproductive, because it would lead us down into the sewers of contemporary discourse. But a spiritual awakening, accompanied by a recognition that we have our own priorities, is sorely needed. Women rebelled against their social obligations and limitations and threw them off. Men, too, can do the same.

When men see that bondage is a state of mind – often an unconscious choice – they realize how easy it is to cast it aside. Our own bondage came from the guarantees that we demanded, which slowly created obligations that we came to see as inevitable. But now that the guarantees have been removed, we find that we are still in chains, and herein lies the great liberating opportunity afforded by injustice. Without the shock of betrayal and loss, we might have plodded along forever, devolving into something akin to oxen, fit only for heavy burdens and the whip. But that will not happen now. The deal we’ve got is clearly rotten, and there’s no good reason to haul that load.

The uplifting feeling one gets when laying down a heavy burden does much for the spirit. The bitterness over loss and betrayal is forgotten as the realization sets in that one’s life is in one’s own hands. What others want, think or expect becomes no more important than anything else, because all that matters is what IS and how one chooses to deal with it. When men know that, they know true freedom.

College Women Stressed Out, "Overwhelmed"

W.F. Price · 31 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

According to a new survey, another "gender gap" has appeared, and this time it relates to mental and emotional health. Despite the overwhelming surfeit of women in college, and the fact that they are quickly coming to dominate a number of disciplines as a result, women have been growing increasingly unsatisfied. Particularly glaring is the fact that this gap has widened substantially since 1985, when gender representation was about equal on campus.

Although their are a number of potential reasons for this, including the fact that so many women are in college now that a higher proportion may not be cut out for it, as well as the higher financial and academic pressures college exerts today as compared with a generation ago, there is probably another important factor at work: the status gap.

As Roissy has pointed out, when women are faced with a smaller selection of viable mates, they tend to respond by ramping up their promiscuity and hypergamy to new heights. Today, on college campuses, there are far fewer men than women, and the desirable males – those with the looks and social skills – represent an even smaller proportion of the student body. At the top of the heap are athletes, who need do nothing more than leave their bedroom doors unlocked to get laid.

For these few, privileged men college is like a giant harem full of competing concubines. For the concubines, well, it must be pretty stressful and demoralizing.

This is really the key to the happiness gap between men and women. Women have consistently reported a decline in happiness since the 1960s, when their status began to rise and eclipse men's. Elevating women and suppressing men may have seemed like the perfect recipe for female happiness for the feminists, but they failed to take into account what the real effect would be on women, who are fundamentally driven by matters of the heart. Or perhaps they didn't care, because the entire project was about personal and emotional gain for a few, strange, power-hungry women.

One obvious way to make a man happier is to surround him with desirable, attainable women. Many concepts of paradise, both old and new, include scores of female attendants for the lucky males who make it to the better part of the afterlife. Additionally, I think it's pretty obvious that American men would be happier on the balance if the average female lost one point of BMI and behaved in a feminine, pleasant manner around men.

For women, the equivalent would be to be surrounded by higher-status men. The woman surrounded by princes, tycoons, sheikhs and movie stars would be in the female version of heaven. However, feminist policies have had precisely the opposite effect. As women come to dominate college and professions, they find themselves surrounded by other women, a few unattainable men who might sleep with them but never commit, and an ocean of "loser" omega males who are lower-status than they are.

The female response to this is the hypersexuality that has come to characterize college and professional women. They think that by sleeping with as many higher status as possible, they may be able to snare at least one. But, of course, that's a self-defeating strategy, as a guy with options will hold out for one who is less promiscuous, and use the others only for the odd sexual encounter. It's a vicious circle, and this is why women are less happy than they used to be.

If women are happier when surrounded by higher status men, the obvious step to take to increase women's happiness would be to raise men's relative status. If men dominated the professions, politics, business and even the office floor, the average woman would be happier. It may seem paradoxical that diminishing women's relative status could make them happier, but if you consider that status = attractive to females, it makes perfect sense.

The decline in female happiness and rise in mental illness among women is a direct result of the marginalization of the men around them. This is yet another example of the moral and philosophical failure of feminism, which is at its core not only misandric, but misanthropic as well.

Fraternity and Factionalism

W.F. Price · 31 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I suppose it was bound to happen that differences would emerge and come out in the open in the manosphere. They've always been there, but have been fairly muted so far due to the feeling of common cause that always accompanies something new. And although there is nothing new about men's resistance to anti-male laws, policies and tactics that have become so common throughout the West, the explosion of interest in it is a very recent development.

Politics is always about competition. Infighting, shifting loyalties and jockeying for advantage are a given. It happens in the little town council in some farm town in Nebraska; it even happens in the Vatican. No place is immune to it, so we'd be fools to expect it to be any different amongst men this time. In fact, as we grow more successful in reaching out, it will only come out in the open more. We should all be entirely aware of this, and understand that we simply can't stop it.

However, although eliminating it is out of the question, we can take steps to mitigate it. Additionally, we can even take steps to harness competition to our advantage. So, I'll offer some of my own thoughts on this matter, because it's begun to rise above the background noise level. I'd also like to see some thoughts from others, because this is an area where my relative youth may not be an asset.

When everybody is trying to do the same thing, chaos ensues. In the armed forces, the mass of men is separated into specialties and units, each with a specific job that complements the whole. When I look out at this army of men we have awakening to the problems we face, I see a mass of raw recruits. There are a few who specialize in the highly specialized field of political lobbying, such as Glenn Sacks and SAVE, and they are doing good, effective work, but for the most part we have a lot of guys who aren't sure what to do. And why should they? They are engineers, soldiers, lawyers, hoteliers, students, doctors, teachers, tech workers, and much more, but very few have been trained as activists or politicians. And that's just fine. If everyone were an activist or a politician the world would be a horrible, contentious place without a moment's peace and entirely unproductive.

Each of us has our own skills and something to offer. We can all do something. But we can't all do the same thing at the same level of ability or effectiveness. For example, if someone asked me to do a statistical analysis of divorce and its financial effects on men, I'd do a pretty lousy job compared to an accountant or engineer. Likewise, in writing about Game I'd be at a loss — I simply don't know much about it and can't bring myself to study it. Law? Ask an attorney. Activism — not my specialty. This last one may confuse people a bit. After all, what am I doing if not being an activist?

Well, there's a simple answer to that: I'm doing what I've been trained to do. I'm publishing. For years before I started The Spearhead I worked for a small publishing company. I edited text, worked with printers, wrote some abstracts, did a lot of OCR on old books, and generally learned how to process text with computers. Eventually, I started teaching myself how to do a little online publishing, then took a class on it, and started experimenting with blogging on a self-hosted site. Of course, my penchant for writing has helped a great deal, but without my trade skills I couldn't have pulled it off. The Spearhead is an example of someone putting his skills to work in service of a cause he believes in. So if you ask me what I do, I simply say "I'm a publisher." Not an MRA, not a politician — just a guy doing his job.

If more men realized that they, too, can make a difference just by using the skills they already have, we'd have not only a far more effective vehicle for our ideas, but more appreciation for each other as well. I know there is a lot of animosity toward attorneys, but when the going gets tough I'm sure as hell going to want one in my corner. Teachers can make an obvious difference, as can religious leaders. Engineers, scientists and tech workers may not be so obvious, but actually they are right on the front lines of the gender wars today. If they hold fast to truth and quality in the face of the big feminist power grab in universities and tech fields it will make a very big differences. Biologists could simply be open and honest about sex differences, and psychologists about the glaring differences between the male and female mind. Even laborers can do their part, demanding that they are fairly compensated for strenuous work that women cannot perform (anyone can operate a cash register, but can anyone change the wheels on an 18-wheeler?). Doctors can expose the inequities in funding for male health issues, etc. The list could be quite long.

So, this is one way to reduce friction. We all have a job to do, and we can all appreciate the efforts of men in any field to improve our lot in general. We don't all have to be professional activists or political figureheads, and my guess is that most of us don't want to anyway.

But there are other issues. Let's start with the most obvious: women. Men instinctively favor women. We all know this, and it's been done to death here, but there are going to be guys hearkening to the siren call. I may even slip up from time to time. It's human nature. If we're going to avoid this, we'll have to plug our ears like Odysseus's sailers. But not everywhere in life — simply in our men's places. This is an important distinction. Feel free to treat the women around you in your personal life with respect, consideration and every bit of decency, as I'm sure more men than admit here do, but if they complain about what we say in our places we have to simply learn to ignore them. It's nothing personal; it's just that they will inevitably fracture any fraternity that might have existed. This is a law of nature. Furthermore, if we're worried about their feelings regarding what we say amongst ourselves, then what's the point of a men's movement, let alone a publication? In that case, might as well put a woman in charge of The Spearhead, and then next thing you know we'll start blaming men for all of society's ills, and I'll be selling tampons in the sidebar.

Lastly, there are philosophical differences. These are probably intractable. We are never going to see eye to eye on everything. If we succeed to any degree and come to some prominence, they are going to come out in the open in a big way. However, we are not yet that prominent or successful, so allowing them to sidetrack us now is not a good idea — it could prove disastrous. Fortunately, we are almost entirely in agreement concerning the basics, and today the basics are stacked against us. Punitive court orders, draconian laws such as VAWA, marginalization of fathers, the feminization of education, sham workplace harassment suits and the mass-drugging of boys are all issues we need to deal with right now. Once we've tackled those, then we can have at it over the philosophical questions that will never cease to be disputed. But for now, I think we ought to keep our philosophical passions in check. Not to say we cannot disagree — just that we ought to avoid getting too personal about it.

I'd like to see other people's opinions on this, and suggestions for how we can foster a fraternal atmosphere. It's never easy, but maybe a little thoughtful reflection could help.

Still Passing the Hat

For those who may have missed it, last Tuesday I posted a rundown of the site's stats and an appeal for funds to see The Spearhead through another season. The response has been great and very encouraging, but more is needed to make it through the coming months, so if you like our content, please consider sending a contribution.

To those who have already donated, thank you for helping keep us online and aggressively promoting men's interests to the wider world. Every bit of help is deeply appreciated.

Wikipedia Pleading for Female Contributors Without Success

W.F. Price · 31 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times has just come out with an article bemoaning the fact that women comprise just 13% of it's hundreds of thousands of contributors. That's actually more than I'd expect, but if one counted all contributions rather than contributors, those made by women probably fall well under the 10% mark.

According to article author Noam Cohen, if one takes a close look at Wikipedia, a sinister bias emerges…

> A topic generally restricted to teenage girls, like friendship bracelets, can seem short at four paragraphs when compared with lengthy articles on something boys might favor, like, toy soldiers or baseball cards, whose voluminous entry includes a detailed chronological history of the subject.
> Even the most famous fashion designers — Manolo Blahnik or Jimmy Choo — get but a handful of paragraphs. And consider the disparity between two popular series on HBO: The entry on "Sex and the City" includes only a brief summary of every episode, sometimes two or three sentences; the one on "The Sopranos" includes lengthy, detailed articles on each episode.

A Harvard academic, Joseph Reagle, says that the problem is that Wikipedia is too open — even going so far as to allow misogynists to contribute!

> But because of its early contributors Wikipedia shares many characteristics with the hard-driving hacker crowd, says Joseph Reagle, a fellow at the Berkman Center for Internet and Society at Harvard. This includes an ideology that resists any efforts to impose rules or even goals like diversity, as well as a culture that may discourage women.
> "It is ironic," he said, "because I like these things — freedom, openness, egalitarian ideas — but I think to some extent they are compounding and hiding problems you might find in the real world."
> Adopting openness means being "open to very difficult, high-conflict people, even misogynists," he said, "so you have to have a huge argument about whether there is the problem." Mr. Reagle is also the author of "Good Faith Collaboration: The Culture of Wikipedia."

So Mr. Reagle's solution, I suppose, would be to establish a Harvard "diversity" board and filter submissions by sex, race, religion, what have you, while censoring non-PC entries. I'm sure this terrible idea may give him wet dreams, but it won't work.

There's a reason women don't generally contribute to Wikipedia, and it has little to do with sexism, "culture," or lack of rules. The reason is, simply, that they don't care. That's right, it may be amazing to some people, but the overwhelming majority of women simply couldn't care less about an online encyclopedia. Add to that the fact that contributors don't get paid, and why in the world would a Western woman want to waste her time editing articles on Wikipedia when she could be chatting with her friends about all the various boyfriends drifting in and out of their lives?

If you want to see what women are interested in, visit Jezebel and take a look at the articles. The overwhelming majority of articles are about celebrities and fashion. Fashion and fame are transient; they change with the seasons and are forgotten as quickly as they move on from one thing to the next. A Wikipedia for women would not be a fairly static collection of facts, but a flickering panoply of constantly changing images, never the same for more than a moment.

That feminists are going after something that comprises the altruistic efforts of many thousands of people, most of whom are never compensated by any means other than the pride of accomplishment, exposes them for the ungrateful wretches they are. When society's elites disparage impressive, beneficial efforts such as Wikipedia (for all its faults, it is certainly impressive and helpful) simply because the people good enough to put it together make our diversicrats look bad, it says very clearly that the wrong people are in charge of this country and its institutions.

However, there may be some hope. Sue Gardner of the Wikimedia foundation, the NGO that runs Wikipedia, is taking a soft approach to encouraging women to contribute. In a reference to the many, many men who contribute and clearly know how the field is tilted against them in the greater society, she says: “Gender is a huge hot-button issue for lots of people who feel strongly about it. I am not interested in triggering those strong feelings.”

Yes, Ms. Gardner. Many of us feel strongly about the bully crew of feminists and their elitist enablers. Put them in charge and you’ll wreck Wikipedia as sure as day fades to night.

Abuse Industry Paves the Royal Road to the Welfare State

Featured Guest · 1 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

In a little-publicized move, California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger recently approved a bill that creates a new multi-million dollar entitlement. Signed into law during the waning months of his second term, Senate Bill 782 bans landlords from kicking out scofflaw tenants who are victims of domestic violence.

The law defines a domestic violence victim as any person who "has filed a report alleging that the protected tenant or the household member is a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking." Note "alleging." No evidence or proof is necessary. If you declare yourself a victim, under the law you are.

So a single unproven accusation serves to keep a person high and dry for a good long time — at the expense of flummoxed homeowners across the state.

As the new California act reveals, our nation's domestic violence system has become a back-door entitlement program marked by broad definitions, loose eligibility criteria, and open-ended benefits.

Here's how the clunky system works: The abuse victim must procure a restraining order before services can be rendered. Such no-contact orders drive a nearly impenetrable wedge between the parties, leading Harvard law professor Jeannie Suk to opine our current approach represents a "government-imposed de facto divorce" system.

Social scientists note that family disintegration is primarily to blame for chronic inter-generational poverty. And as Table 35 of this Justice Department report reveals, crimes of family violence are seven times higher among divorced or separated couples than among persons in intact married relationships.

By promoting family break-up, the self-serving domestic violence industry places victims at greater risk of violence. This guarantees a never-ending supply of grisly 11 o'clock news stories and heart-breaking statistics.

Sadly, it gets worse.

Many states have broadened their definition of child abuse to include the mere witnessing of physical aggression between the parents. Mom slaps dad and junior catches a glimpse, that's child abuse.

Now Child and Protective Services gets into the act. Junior is carted off to a foster home for a couple weeks, if not longer. The stories I've heard about children trapped in the CPS maze, removed from the parents they desperately love, sends my blood pressure skyward.

Then there are the inner workings of the 1996 welfare reform law. Tucked into the back of the law, which goes by the unpronounceable acronym PRWORA, a little-known loophole called the Family Violence Option holds that any domestic violence victim is excused from PRWORA's two-year back-to-work requirement.

How does the federal reform act define domestic violence? According to PRWORA, "mental abuse" is tantamount to physical battering. And how does one go about proving he or she is a victim of mental abuse? Don't be ridiculous. You say you're a victim, you are one. No evidence or proof is necessary.

So each year, taxpayers cough up $63 million to coddle Welfare Queens claiming to be incapacitated by – yes, you guessed it — abusive head games.

Not that breaking up families is enough to satisfy the welfare state. After all, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure! So how, the Abuse Mavens ask, can we discourage persons from tying the knot in the first place?

It's simple. First, we launch public awareness campaigns designed to convince women that their beau is a latent axe-murderer. Watch Lifetime TV — you'll probably see a clip about the "cycle of abuse." Pay a visit to the doctor's, the nurse will ask if your boyfriend ever raises his voice. That's considered abuse these days. Go to the office bathroom, you'll see a sticker advertising the local abuse hotline.

Next we pass laws that selectively gut due process and the presumption of innocence. Soon word gets out — get married and the state may plunder your assets, your home, and your children. Marriage, eligible bachelors decide, is not a smart lifestyle option.

Then we slap a $25 abuse shelter fee on marriage licenses, which sends the scary message that you, married person, may end up looking like the back end of a meat grinder!" (No need to remind newlyweds that abuse rates in the intact family are close to zero.)

Finally, we never, EVER admit that women can be abusive, too. (Shhhhh. All the research shows women are just as likely as men to slap, hit, punch, and kick their mates. But we can't let that out. Keep it under your hat!)

The Census Bureau recently reported that, for the first time, there are more people in the prime marrying age (25-34 years) who have never been married than are wed. The portion of adults who are married—52% compared with 72% in 1960—is the lowest in history.

So there you have it. Fifteen years after passage of the federal Violence Against Women Act, domestic violence programs have become the hulking engine of marital break-down, a galloping entitlement mindset, and institutionalized welfare dependency.

Donny Deutsch and Female Superiority

Chuck Ross · 1 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Initially I wanted to write about how alpha males leverage the attention and adoration of women in order to construct a cocoon around themselves as both protection and distinction from the masses of chomping, growling beta males that exist below.

I also wanted to discuss how Donny Deutsch is a prime example of this alpha male strategy – as shown by both his new TV show which offers women relationship advice by marginalizing men and in which he opened by saying that men are inferior to women as well as by his book titled Often Wrong, Never in Doubt which includes a chapter called "The Doctrine of Female Superiority" (page 78) which begins "Women are superior beings. It's that simple. Certainly in business."

Deutsch claims that women are superior because they are team players and because men are overly greedy and competitive, but he makes many logical errors in his assessment. First, he conflates "business" specifically with advertising. His experience is that women are superior in advertising, but he extends his belief in female superiority in that field to fit under the entire canopy of Business. Certainly, though, business is multi-faceted – at least if what I learned in Strategic Management is correct.

Second, Deutsch says that advertising, by its very nature, is a more feminine business given that it is service-oriented. He also says that the pay in advertising is much lower than that in other fields like investment banking. Deutsch mentions that he was one of only two graduates from his Wharton class to go into advertising, and that was only because his father owned the firm he began working at. By stating this, Deutsch provides the real reason that his observation would possibly be true. Women succeed in the advertising world because high-achieving men wanted to explore greener pastures.

Further down, Deutsch says that he prefers working with women because men "are a pain in the ass". They would be, for Deutsch, since he's the alpha male whose spot those men would be vying for. Even in his own corporation, Deutsch preferred to surround himself by non-aggressive, non-competitive individuals who couldn't or wouldn't challenge his authority. There's also a case to be made that Deutsch prefers women in his office for other reasons: he makes many references to fantasizing about the women in his office and has been known for being a ladies' man.

Deutsch wrote his book in 2005 while he was still Chairman and "spiritual leader" of Deutsch Inc. – a company he sold for $275 million back in 2000. Despite Deutsch's relevancy in the ad world and his place in the media spotlight, his comments about female superiority received little attention. If Amazon book reviews are any indication, nobody mentioned Deutsch's chapter on female superiority and instead focused on other aspects of the book.

Deutsch didn't relegate his opinion just to his book: in 2009 at an awards ceremony for women in the communications industry, Deutsch reiterated that women are superior to men in business.

In thinking about those questions I came across another aspect of this story. Contrast Deutsch – his tactic of appealing to women's sensibilities, his experience that women are the best in the advertising field, and his acceptance and relative free pass that has been granted him – with those of Neil French, the former creative director with WPP, another large advertising firm. In 2005, French was fired after publicly stating that women "don't make it to the top [of the ad world] because they don't deserve to." Among other reasons, he attributed this to their roles as childbearers and caregivers. French's comments weren't those of some crackpot ad guy who existed at the margins of the industry; they were made at the $100-a-plate "A Night With Neil French" event in Toronto. At least before his unwelcome comments, people valued French's opinion.

Many of the 300 guests in attendance were outraged by French's comments which led to his resignation. He defended his remarks by saying "the answer [to the question of whether women deserve to be top ad executives] is, they don't work hard enough. It's not a joke job. The future of the entire agency is in the hands of the creative director."

In a 2009 interview, French provided context to the event. The infamous question was posed to him by a woman "who had previously had an ear-bashing for being away on long leave while I was visiting the office." His career quickly suffered from "death by blog" from a host of "malcontents" who hadn't even witnessed the event.

That Deutsch could write a chapter in which he says that men are inferior to women and spread his anti-male rhetoric all over TV is one thing. But considered in light of a similar incident in a similar field where the only difference in the topic of discussion is the sex of employees is telling on many levels. It shows that a strategy of appealing to women is never a bad one in business. A man can't lose by sucking up to them. You can only lose by telling the truth about them.

Wife has cops beat the crap out of husband to hide affair — audio of incident emerges

W.F. Price · 1 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Jeffrey Kodlowski, of Westland Michigan, and his wife had a dispute over whether she was having an affair, during which Mr. Kodlowski took and hid their cell phone so he could look at the numbers later. Naturally, the wife was angry about this, so she started calling the police. An officer spoke with both parties on the phone, and told Mr. Kodlowski to simply let her leave. There had been no physical altercation, and therefore no crime, so it was not a police matter. Nevertheless, Mrs. Kodlowski persisted until some officers arrived.

Despite the fact that Mr. Kodlowski had committed no crime, officers entered his house and demanded he hand over the phone. In the process they insulted him repeatedly, saying they understood why his wife would leave him, while his wife called him a “fucking asshole” in the background. Mr. Kodlowski complained a bit about what he saw as undue pressure, but didn’t do any more than that. Still, he refused to hand over the phone, and tried to go back to bed, but the cops wouldn’t let him without doing as his wife demanded. Goaded on by his wife, police escalated the situation until they could find an excuse to attack him, one saying “try and make me leave your house!” but all they had was that he accidentally brushed one officer’s sleeve while pointing to where his wallet was.

Apparently, that was enough. After the touching incident, right at around 6 minutes, the cop says “You know what? Take him. Fuck him.” After that they hit him and take him down, splitting open his scalp.

This is contemporary America for married men. There was no poor, beaten woman, but just an angry, cheating wife who wanted her cell phone to hide her affair. The cops served as her enforcers. A man who lives with a woman in the US has no constitutional rights. The police will enforce not only the right of a woman to cheat on her husband, but to maintain her “honor” while doing so.

Feminist Professor Suing National Geographic Bee for Sexism

W.F. Price · 2 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist professor and social parasite Eric Clausen is suing the National Geographic Society because the contest it sponsors is overwhelmingly dominated by boys, who have won all but two of the nineteen national competitions held so far. Clausen said he first noticed girls' "disappointment" as early as 2004 in a state competition. In 2009, out of 54 state championships, only two were won by girls, one of whom went on to the national bee in 2010.

Clausen first attempted to sue in 2008, but his lawsuit was wisely tossed out by US District Judge Daniel Hovland, whose decision withstood appeal.

Angry about his loss and alleged retaliation against him by the National Geographic Society, Clausen has filed again and upped the stakes, adding Minot State, the university that pays him as a Professor Emeritus, to the list of defendants.

Whether or not the latest lawsuit is successful, money and effort is sure to be wasted on an issue of little relevance even to the poor, oppressed girls who are shut out of the glory of geography contest championship.

Professors like Clausen, who have tenure and cannot be fired, are possibly one of the biggest nuisances in contemporary society. Even as their schools fill up with girls and important departments are axed to maintain funding for gender studies programs, they never cease complaining about how girls still don't have enough. Perhaps they are biased due to all their fond memories of sleeping with coeds as young teachers in the 1970s, or maybe they are simply demented individuals, but either way it's time we stopped funding them and showed them the door.

Top Middle East analyst on Egypt revolution: angry men “at the heart of it”

W.F. Price · 2 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I’ve been rather amused in recent days to see that the usual clueless “progressives” have started declaring their support for the ongoing revolution in Egypt. They seem to think what’s going on is a repeat of their 1960s liberation fantasies, and the goal of the Egyptian protesters is peace, love and equality for all. A number of feminists have tried to jump on the bandwagon as well. This is especially ridiculous, but unsurprising.

The Arab national liberation movements that brought old-guard nationalists such as Gamal Abdel Nasser to power began to make waves nearly a century ago, particularly following the political reorganization of the world in the wake of WWI. They came about at roughly the same time Eastern European and East Asian modern political movements began to topple the old regimes. As old empires were subjugated to the ascendent West, subject peoples began to agitate for change, seeing their leaders and governments as decrepit and lacking in legitimacy. In the Middle East, the crumbling of the Ottoman Empire set the stage for a new era, and a new generation of leaders stepped in to take power. They were the progressives of their day, and instituted new policies and laws that were seen as enlightened and modern. For example, polygamy was outlawed in a number of Arab nations, the state took a great deal of power from the clergy, and women were educated and allowed into professions.

Today, those old progressive regimes have degenerated into cronyism and kleptocracy, and are tottering like the Ottoman Empire was in the early 20th century. Now, the challenge is not from a western-influenced class of progressive activists, but rather a resurgent Islam responding to what it sees as another Crusade in the Holy Land and the heart of Arab civilization. To young men without jobs or prospects, Islam is a liberating ideology. Of all the Abrahamic religions, Islam is in some ways the most democratic, in that God’s law, before which all men are equal, reigns supreme. There is no clear separation of church and state, as Christianity allows for (e.g. “give unto Caesar”), which means Islam theoretically demands the same standards across the board. This can be very appealing to young men, and explains part of the allure of Islam to disaffected youth.

I’ve been keeping tabs on Ikhwan, the Muslim Brotherhood’s official English outlet, to monitor events in Cairo. It is interesting to note that in the run-up to the protests in Tunisia and Egypt, MB was shut out in a parliamentary election, losing all 88 seats. Of course, this was a sham election — their support is a serious threat to Mubarak’s regime, and the results were obviously contrived. This political assault on the MB, I believe, has nearly as much to do with the vehemence of the protests in Egypt as the Tunisian revolution. In fact, the MB has operated something like a shadow government for years, with many members in de facto exile in places such as Britain or Turkey. Clearly, they have plans for Egypt that will take the country in a direction that I’m not sure feminists and progressives will be all that excited about. The founder of the MB envisioned the rise of a new Islamic Caliphate, and there has been some ongoing support for a resurrection of the Ottoman Empire or something along those lines coming from MB ideologues for years (I spent some time about five years ago collating articles propagandizing for that very thing). Some in the US have dismissed suspicion about this as paranoia, but in light of recent events and pan-Muslim support it appears to be a possibility at the very least.

A couple days ago, Robert Siegel of NPR interviewed Bruce Riedel of the Brookings Institution (Mr. Riedel has also been a CIA analyst, and is a top counter-terrorism expert), asking him about the Muslim Brotherhood and what role it may play in Egypt if the revolution is successful. Mr. Riedel cautioned against alarmism, saying that the MB is not a violent terrorist group, but he confirmed that it was the most credible and powerful component of the opposition to Mubarak’s regime. According to Mr. Riedel, there is a broad alliance of opposition groups responsible for the downfall of Tunisia and ongoing protests in Egypt, but at the heart of the dissent is the situation faced by young men:

> Well, what you have seen in Egypt and what you saw before that in Tunisia is an earthquake in the Arab world.

> We have never the Arab street topple a dictator. That happened first in Tunis and it increasingly looks like it's going to happen in Cairo. The alliance that has done that is across the board. But at the heart of it are angry young men unemployed or underemployed with very little prospect of a stable, serious job in their future.

This will probably play directly into the Brotherhood's hands, as they already have a powerful youth wing that has been involved in the protests on the street. Ikhwan is currently fielding reports from these operatives directly from Tahrir Square in the heart of Cairo, and it is likely that many have emerged as leaders on the ground and in the street battles that are currently taking place. In fact, there is a real battle going on in Cairo right now, with hundreds allegedly dead so far. Tonight may prove crucial.

As is almost always the case with movements that topple regimes, it is the men who are the driving force; treat men badly for long enough, and governments reap a grim harvest. Feminist politicians and academics here at home should take note, but they are probably too far gone already.

Although some feminists and progressives here in the West may try to frame the uprising to suit their own agenda, they are distorting the facts, or, more likely, too provincial and intellectually incapable of thinking outside their narrow political parameters.

Empowering Men Through Micro-Finance

Featured Guest · 3 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Micah Sparacio

Over 80% of all the micro-finance loans on Kiva go to women. That's a publicly stated fact. And it's a testament to the uphill battle men face as they try to live productive, rewarding lives, especially those men trying to rise out of poverty.

It's a basic psychological phenomenon that in the West it seems sexier and more hip to help women and children. If I had to guess, this is a socially magnified response to an evolved mandate: humans have adapted to respond to the needs of women and children before men, protecting what amount to more valuable sexual/reproductive biological resources.

Doesn't matter. Fact is, most people are donating to women. And this leaves men behind.

As a successful, self-employed small-business owner, I owe a great deal of my success to the financial support of friends and family at those very early stages. I remember when just starting out how the biggest obstacle to realizing my business goals was financial leverage. And thankfully, while I didn't have access to deep pockets (probably a blessing, as it forced me to focus on business fundamentals), I got just enough to bootstrap the business to the point where it could self-finance future projects. And within four years, I was living a comfortable, ownership-style life with over twenty employees. I was doing my thing. Carving my own path.

Contrast this with my experience directly out of college. After graduating, I started out in the corporate world as a software developer, working the 9-5 (with one hour commutes into the city each way). I was making good money. And I was miserable.

The contrast between that (being miserable working for others) and this (waking up every day and working on exactly what I enjoy) looms large in my mind. In my experience, there is no greater joy for a man than having full creative control over his daily work. Whether that's as a carpenter, a cattle rancher, or an Internet marketer. And the best way to attain creative control, is to be the owner of your own business. Having experienced this liberating transition (from having a boss to becoming my own boss), I feel compelled to enable other men to have the same opportunities.

So I started exploring a variety of micro-finance sites and ultimately decided that given the great disparity of lending between genders (again, over 80% of microfinance loans seem to go to women), I would do my little part to help even that out and start lending to male entrepreneurs. I ended up going with Kiva, because they give me the best control over A) gender and B) project type (so if, like me, you have theories about the sort of projects that are most promising, you can choose to fund them).

Now, I'm not claiming to be an expert at microfinance or economics or social dynamics. I'm certainly not presumptuous enough to think that participating in microfinance is going to fix misandry. And, although I've chosen to go with Kiva, I am aware that there are some microfinancing systems where you can actually make a buck or two (interestingly, the one run by PayPal let's you choose "women" as a social cause but not "men" – though a quick analysis also shows that the microfinance investments that are specific to women, on the whole, have lower average rates of returns than the ones that are gender neutral).

So, without having any illusions about solving the many social injustices that men face today, I do think that microfinance is one way that we can make a difference for the following reasons:

1. Many men around the world stand at a disadvantage to women in terms of having access to start-up capital, as noted by the 80/20 discrepancy at Kiva

2. Getting a good idea off the ground and transformed into a thriving business requires leverage, something the men of poor nations simply don’t have

3. Being a happy, productive man reaches it’s peak, I believe, in business ownership

In other words, microfinance allows us to truly help men utilize skill, pursue a vision, and attain the happiness and freedom of self-employment.

The VD Project: the Onslaught Has Started

zed · 3 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I almost never partake in any of the Lame Stream Media. My exposure is limited to about an hour per day listening to the radio on my way to and from work. And, I listen to an oldies station with a listener base which is probably a bit older than the average radio audience.

So, while the Valentine's Day campaign of commercial harassment may be in full swing, I have so far only heard one VD-oriented commercial. It was for a jewelry store, not surprisingly, and put a somewhat subtle spin on one of the two primary messages used to hawk this bogus and insincere Hallmark holiday.

> "What do you get the woman who has everything for Valentine's Day? MORE of everything."

Channeling the spirit of Madonna, the material girl, obviously.

However, tonight, it became clear to me that I can run, but I can't hide from the relentless emotional coercion and harassment. On Yahoo's main page (where one gets redirected when one logs out of Yahoo mail) the lead article was "6 mistakes men make on Valentine's Day."

Yup, yup, yup, men be so stupid they don't even know when the day is!!

> Memo to men: Valentine's Day is on February 14. In years past, Yahoo.com has noticed a spike in men searching for an answer to the question: "When is Valentine's Day?" as the day fast approaches. Of all the holidays on the yearly calendar, the one designated for romance never fails to trip guys up.

Part space filler, part hype for their advertising support, the article manages to deliver a whole truckload of contempt for men, hidden behind an obviously fake smile – "Just kidding" is the most abused excuse in the world to try to hide hate-filled messages behind a false facade.

So, here are the six deadly sins that just about every man will commit at least one of in the next 10-11 days.

> Mistake #1: Getting words of wisdom from your local drug store.
> Mistake #2: Letting a bear do your bidding.
> Mistake #3: Declaring Valentine's Day a ploy for consumers (see, I'm guilty already!)
> Mistake #4: Sharing the day with your BlackBerry > Mistake #5: Expecting her to make the plans
> Mistake #6: Under-dressing

So – Memo to all those grrls who don't have a man to terrorize into having to demonstrate insincere affection on February 14th:
you might give some thought to how you are portrayed in the media which makes a lot of men very glad to be single on that day.

Mistake #0: Not breaking up with her on February 13th.

Jayme Biendl: Victim of Equity Feminism

W.F. Price · 4 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, 34-year-old jailer Jayme Biendl went missing while on the night shift at the Monroe Correctional Complex northeast of Seattle. Jayme was a reasonably attractive woman with blonde hair and 5'3″ tall. She had been working alone in the prison chapel.

Before Biendl went missing, Byron Scherf, who was serving a life sentence for first degree rape and kidnapping, missed a routine count and was found in the chapel lobby. Scherf is an an example of a real rapist — the kind who would stalk women and ambush them, using force and coercion to obtain sex. He was also a multiple offender, hence the life sentence. In one instance, he doused a woman with lighter fluid and set her on fire.

Biendl was found some time later, strangled with her own radio microphone cord. It is still unclear whether Scherf actually raped her, but recent reports suggest he was found pants-down with scratch and bite marks on his body. Obviously, that was the idea.

The story has been fodder for talk radio, with the usual calls for castration of rapists, condemnation of corrections officials, and blame for everyone but one of the most obvious culprits besides the criminal himself. Despite the huge prison industrial complex in the US, the incarceration of people for any and everything possible, and the "lock 'em up" attitude that has prevailed for at least a generation now, the blowhards on the radio have been falling back on the same old line that we are "too soft" on prisoners, and the solution is castration and even more draconian measures to protect innocent victims like Jayme.

Seems these fellows yelling on air are missing something fairly obvious. What the hell was a young woman, and a small one at that, doing working as a prison guard with the state's most violent offenders?

Who thought it would be a good idea to put a little lady in close contact with brutal murderers and rapists?

Probably not the Washington State Department of Corrections, but if they had said women weren't right for the job, it would have triggered a lawsuit, so little Jayme Biendl was hired, given her size small uniform, a can of pepper spray and a radio and sent out to work amongst the most dangerous men in Washington State. What could possibly go wrong here?

Of course, everyone is ignoring the elephant in the room. The Dept. of Corrections is being blamed for allowing her to be alone, but that's standard for the male guards, and due to budget cuts they can't afford to give a guard a personal escort at all times. So a lot of guards find themselves on their own much of time. Male or female. Turns out Biendl was the third woman to be attacked at the facility in the last six months. Although plenty of people might want to blame men in general for this "surprising" trend of women being attacked in prison, one wonders what their point is, because many of these guys were sent to prison in the first place to protect women. Yet women continue to insist that they be given the privilege of working in close proximity with them, and the idiots in state government indulge them.

That Biendl was murdered obviously wasn't her fault any more than it's a fisherman's fault when he slips off the deck and drowns. But being a woman working with violent felons is kind of like being a fishermen working on deck in tap shoes — you're tempting fate. And the state of Washington, in encouraging and allowing this, is entirely complicit in her death. Feminists and their enablers are also complicit. If the superintendent of the Monroe facility banned women from working with these inmates, he'd be denounced and subsequently fired. But that would be the reasonable, humane thing to do. We are living in a society that would rather see people die than admit the truth, and that's pretty sick.

How many more people will die because of this lunacy?

The Atlantic Responds to Feministing Wikipedia Whine: Why Should We Care?

W.F. Price · 4 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In an article concerning the manufactured scandal that has erupted around the revelation that Wikipedia has overwhelmingly male contributors, Conor Friedersdorf questions whether it's even worth bothering over the issue.

Writing that society is full of "gender disparities," he asks:

> …what factors determine when a gender disparity is something about which we should care? Is it a bad thing that there are so few women cab drivers? Or sanitation workers? Or floor traders on Wall Street? Or peanut vendors at baseball stadiums? Or corporate CEOs? Or congressional canidates? Or beer pong players? Or talk radio hosts? Or authors of economics textbooks? Or plumbers? Or online poker players?
> There aren't any barriers to entry blocking women who want to participate, there isn't an ugly history of discriminating against women, being a Wikipedia contributor isn't a high status position or a proving ground for other high status positions, the women foregoing participation aren't missing out on career opportunities or sacrificing future financial security, we aren't intuitively aware of the disparity, no one particularly complains that Wikipedia entries are biased against women in any way, a group of concerned volunteers could easily add articles on any subjects the mostly male club of contributors is missing…

It's encouraging to see a writer with a wide audience questioning the relevance of feminist concerns. Perhaps it's another indication that the uninterrupted trend of feminist success is coming to an end.

Understanding the Dumb Choices Women Make

Featured Guest · 5 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Codebuster

We need to get some facts straight regarding the way that women make choices, and that's what this article is about. Let's begin with Assanova's reference to Evolutionary Psychology:

> Women are attracted to dominant men because their instincts tell them to be. Instincts don't care whether the guy is abusive of not. Instincts only care what is best for a woman's offspring, and that is a man with power. So what if the man is abusive (or one of the other bad labels that are associated with dominant men) or not? Instincts only recognize power, regardless of what form it comes in. His clear show of dominance over women is also a show of dominance over many men, which guarantees her offspring lots of resources and the best chance of survival.

With due respect to Assanova (and in recognition of his invaluable contributions to Game theory and the workings of the female mind), this evolutionary psychology perspective that women are drawn to dominant men because it "guarantees her offspring lots of resources and the best chance of survival" is a load of EP poppycock. It sheds no light on the primal forces that motivate women. And while being provided for is an important motivator in the psychology of women, it is not primal (first cause).

The "primal forces" that motivate women relate principally to resistance to change, narcissism and fear… for example, fear of being left on the shelf, fear of not finding a provider to provide for her, fear of novelty and fear of the unknown. David DeAngelo tells us that attraction isn't a choice, and on this, we can only concur. The thing that excites women about dominant men does not relate to anything as calculated as guaranteeing offspring with lots of resources. That's nonsense. While women are attracted to power and success, they are never attracted to plodding providers. And you only have to look at women's dumb choices to realize that if we left it up to them, the next generation would be swinging from tree to tree. What excites women about dominant men has less to do with the banal priorities of being provided for than it does with the simple exhilaration of narcissism, novelty and danger. Being provided for is extremely important to women, it is even a priority, but it is not primal. It does not account for when women throw caution to the wind. It does not explain why women's menageries of mediocrity typically include thugs, slobs and losers.

In the longer term, dull, safe, beta providers do feature prominently in women's more calculated choices. But when it comes to primal sex, it is the thrill of the forbidden, with all its attendant risks, that explains women's more impulsive choices, from sports jocks, psychopaths and serial killers, to thugs, rapists and violent criminals

It would appear that Otto Weininger was on the right track when he suggested a relationship between criminality and prostitution (which today, arguably, manifests as raunch culture).

The role of self-esteem

Remember the so-called bell-curve distribution for men and women? Women tend to bunch towards the middle of the bell-curve. They don't like extremes, and prefer conformity and middle-of-the-road to excelling and drawing attention to oneself. Men, by contrast, populate a flatter bell-curve, with larger proportions of men gathering in the tails of the distribution, from the extremely stupid to the extremely smart. The upshot of all of this is that when hypergamous women, typically clustered towards the middle of the bell-curve, select for the best among men at the upper tail of the bell-curve, an unavoidable crisis of confidence emerges. How can someone "average" perceive herself as an equal with someone who excels and stands out from the crowd? At a deeply visceral level, average will always feel itself to be something less than superior. The only tangible thing that a woman has to offer – her "looks" as defined by her biology – can only ever be perceived as something less than the smarts that she so admires in men at the higher levels of the pecking order and the far right tail of the bell-curve. There is no circumventing this cruel fate that awaits women. No amount of affirmative action can remedy this.

It therefore makes sense that while hypergamous women seek out superior men, they really do feel more comfortable with average men who, like they, are clustered around the middle of the bell-curve. There is an obvious conflict here, the basis for a cognitive dissonance that makes it difficult for women to reconcile their hypergamous impulses with their inherent inferiority complex. In this context, we are better placed to explore the breadth of women's choices, from the ridiculous to the extreme.

Let's take a closer look at the sorts of dynamics that account for men's and women's distribution curves.

The gender that provides and protects is constantly exposed to risk and danger. Men are constantly putting their lives on the line, in one form or another. Men are constantly testing their assumptions, constantly developing their strategies and their identities. At the cutting edge of cultural evolution, men's survival depends on logic and rationality.

The gender that is provided for and protected, by contrast, is constantly shielded from risk and danger. Women have assumptions passed on to them from their mothers and their peer groups. As creatures of conformity, they rarely have their assumptions tested. Women prefer to assume and conform than to test or compete. Women subscribe to the laws of relational aggression, where popularity represents the height of personal achievement. Popularity and not logic or rationality provides the basis for personal "esteem".

It is therefore inevitable that the gender that provides and protects will define itself from a perspective of positive self-esteem, while the best that the protected, provided-for gender can hope to achieve is the less resilient self-esteem grounded in popularity. And when you base your sense of worth on the opinions of others, well, that's hardly empowering, is it? It is impossible to establish a robust sense of self-esteem when narcissism is your passion and popularity provides the foundation on which it is built.

But wait! Have women not achieved parity with men in the workplace, thus demonstrating that women are every bit as reliable as men, every bit as capable of providing-for as men? Not at all. But have women not also earned the right to "respect" for their ability to achieve? Absolutely not.

Women's "parity" with men could not have occurred without affirmative action. Affirmative action is the essential ingredient that enables the masquerading of women's supposed "equality" with men. But the reality of the dynamics of men's and women's positive and negative self-esteem always plays out in the fresh air of the sexual marketplace.

Thus respect and competition are crucial to a man's identity, while belonging and agreeability are crucial to a woman's. And it is at this juncture that properly deployed Game provides its greatest impact. A man with neither self-respect nor Game will never be attractive to women. If a man cannot project confidence, he may still find utility as a provider, or maybe even an arbitrary hook-up with a drunk or a slut who fails to detect his ruse, but he will never make a woman feel sexy (the way that sexual dynamics work is, in a nutshell, men desire, women are desired, and the idea of men as being "sexy" is a feminist-inspired absurdity).

We are right to have our reservations with mainstream interpretations of Game. However, insofar as Game has a place in dating strategy, implicit in the effective deployment of Game is the essential assumption that the woman's frame of reference is always in submission to the man. Busting on a woman, teasing her, not taking anything she says seriously – all in a good-natured, humorous way, of course – cannot be done without this assumption. And confidence is how you pull it off. Confidence lies at the heart of what makes a man interesting. You cannot "pretend" confidence.

It is the confidence/submission duality that provides the basis for Game.

Women's low self-esteem and the auto-spook response

Getting back to David DeAngelo's view that for women, attraction isn't a choice. Given that a man cannot pretend confidence and a woman cannot pretend desire (we're not talking about faking orgasms), then this inherently places female eroticism in a position of submission to the male. It cannot be any other way. The sex that is protected and provided for can never embrace empowerment as can the sex that protects and provides. This is much more than a matter of degree. It represents a paradigmatic shift in perspective that, especially for women, can never be traversed.

In terms of what motivates female desire towards men, it is respect for the formidable. Women are drawn to formidable men. At a primal level, they are drawn to men that they can respect and look up to. And so while women often find beta providers useful, supplicating betas are not the types of men that women really notice. "Formidable" covers a broad spectrum of male stereotypes, from successful and charismatic to brooding and mysterious, from cocky sports jock to violent thug. Supplicating betas and omegas are excluded from this spectrum.

Women's more fragile self-esteem has important consequences. At the gut level of attraction is also fear. Hypergamous women in search of the alpha stud will work themselves into a lather of anticipation. Should a woman encounter the man of her dreams, her first impulse is to spook. Seemingly, she will often go out of her way to jeopardize everything that she had ever dreamt of. She will clam up and play hard-to-get. It is important to realize that this is less a strategy than it is an emotional response to emotionally draining anticipation. Nincompoops like the authors of "The Rules" might strategize deception and evasiveness for the typical Oprah Winfrey audience, but at a more visceral level, playing hard-to-get should never be interpreted as a strategy. Irrespective of whether it is implemented as a strategy, being spooked is just what women do.

Remember that just as DeAngelo assures us that attraction isn't a choice, so too, a woman's angst of anticipation isn't a choice. The lower self-esteem implicit in female sexuality places her knight-in-shining armour (KISA) upon a pedestal to reliably thwart any chance of her dream-beau being realized – that is, if it was left entirely to her. Unless her KISA has Game and can harness her auto-spook response (busting on her, cocky-and-funny), she will lose him. An important part of Game is to disarm a woman's auto-spook response, to make her feel comfortable, relaxed and at peace with the world.

As I've mentioned, women are drawn to formidable men. Just because a KISA might fail the initial introductory phase of an approach does not necessarily mean that he's mucked up his Game. It is just as likely that she has mucked up her auto-spook response by over-reacting and heading for the hills.

Arrogance is hot. Supplicating arrogance is not. The very thing that women find attractive in men is the very thing that militates against the realization of their dream KISA. Supplication and arrogance represent a contradiction in terms and it is for this reason that a man needs to implement some version of Game in order to harness most women's auto-spook responses. Western women need to be babied, and this has to be done whilst retaining the mystery that embodies masculine respectability. It goes without saying that this is inherently not an easy task. In the absence of proper training, it is not easy being a KISA, managing that fine line between self-respect and supplication.

In the end, of course, most western women never obtain their dream KISA, and they finish up making compromises. Their rationalization hamster will reassure them that it's not their fault, but that of their KISA. They will conclude either that he is not interested in them, or that he has failed their shit-tests by failing to be persistent enough. They are thus just as likely to rationalize that all men are insensitive, unfeeling brutes. It never occurs to them that perhaps they should learn to tame their rationalization hamster, that they should ignore The Rules and the proliferation of self-styled guruettes advising women how to snare their beau. Typically, they lower their sites, often settling for the first slob that lunges a second grope, and then calling it love.

After years of having their dream of a KISA dashed upon the rocks in the swirling surf below, western women learn to not expect much of men (beyond the superficial characteristics that supposedly identify alphas). KISAs become gay, betas become providers, omegas become manginas, provided-for women get bored, divorced women become cougars, chumps become husbands and slobs get lucky. The system auto-corrects to the wonderful solution to which we bear witness today. Our zeitgeist becomes a vast sea of arbitrariness where we can expect to see our future generations swinging from tree to tree in Bonobo nirvana. The cultural system develops an auto-immune response that attacks things like honor and virtue, establishing cultural destiny as a cesspool of mediocrity.

The power of projection

The differences in the ways in which men and women think call for a very different strategy in interpreting and understanding our opposite sex. We should never take women's logic literally. We should learn to read between the lines. For example if a woman tells you that she does not like something, do not always assume that she does not like that thing. You've got to read between the lines to understand why she notices that thing, what it is about that thing that relates to her experience of it, and so on. In other words, what is the context behind her dislike? Oftentimes shock and disgust over some thing (such as is typical in women's emotive reactions to rape) betray a fascination with that thing that is reflected in their fantasies, the choices that they make, or some other inadvertent manifestation of their innermost impulses. For example, shock and disgust with rape stories can actually project a fascination with rape and an inclination to fantasize about rape.

And when feminists accuse men of taking advantage of their positions of authority to oppress others, they are projecting. They are telling us what they would be doing if they were put in the same positions of authority.

And when feminists complain that it's not fair that only men occupy the most powerful positions of authority, they are projecting. They are telling us that men in power are the only ones that matter. Those men at the lowest ranks working as janitors, labourers and factory hands, don't matter. They're invisible. They don't count.

Let's illustrate the importance of projection with some more arbitrary examples. Consider the following quotations that I had taken from A Voice for Men:

Robin Morgan – former president of the National Organization for Women (NOW) and editor of MS magazine:

> I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them.

Former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan:

> I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it.

Catherine MacKinnon:

> All sex, even consensual sex between a married couple, is an act of violence perpetrated against a woman.

Marilyn French; The Woman's Room:

> My feelings about men are the result of my experience. I have little sympathy for them. Like a Jew just released from Dachau, I watch the handsome young Nazi soldier fall writhing to the ground with a bullet in his stomach and I look briefly and walk on. I don't even need to shrug. I simply don't care. What he was, as a person, I mean, what his shames and yearnings were, simply don't matter.

Each of these women is projecting. Compare what they are saying, with your own experiences.

Robin Morgan is telling us that she is a vindictive, hate-filled person. By contrast, I have met men who are capable of taking on an opponent respectfully, impartially and in the spirit of competition, without vindictiveness or hatred.

Barbara Jordan is telling us what she notices and values in men. Cold, arrogant and unfeeling is hot, baby. By contrast, I have met many men who are caring and compassionate.

Catherine MacKinnon is letting her rape fantasies get ahead of her. ëNuff said. On the odd occasion, she even borders on graphic:

> I think that sexual desire in women, at least in this culture, is socially constructed as that by which we come to want our own self-annihilation. That is, our subordination is eroticized in and as female; in fact, we get off on it to a degree, if nowhere near as much as men do. This is our stake in this system that is not in our interest, our stake in this system that is killing us.

Mmmm… sounds like the basis for a yummy rape fantasy.

And, saving the best to last, what is it that gets Marilyn French's panties all hot and wet? Well, nothing less than a "handsome young nazi soldier". What is Marilyn French really telling us about her true values and what she expects of men? "My feelings about men are the result of my experience." Indeed. Here she is admitting to the very choices that she has made in men, and her inadvertent candour provides a welcome change.

Of course the reality is that whenever we open our mouths, irrespective of whether we are men or women, we project something of what we value, what we notice. But there's a key difference between men and women as to what can be inferred from the projection. Men focus on the "external" (career, hobbies, interests), while women focus on the "internal" (me, me, me, I, me, I want, I need, I hurt). Projection of a passion for motor sports is thus not quite as insightful as the projection of spiteful contempt.

More on women's dumb choices

The subject of women's dumb choices is a deeply complex one. Questions of double standards abound, not to mention the question of how intelligence is measured. Roissy's takes on the Duke Rejection List and the preference of many women for jerks are compelling, well written and entertaining, and they do indeed resonate with a fundamental truth about women's dumb choices. Roissy's gifted contributions continue to provide us with powerful insights.

But then as a guru of the seduction community, Roissy holds Game in undeserved high esteem, in the implicit assumption that there exists some kind of standard, tending to objectivity, for assessing womanly worth. Thus, according to this golden standard, the 9s and 10s that have been anointed by alphas are the real deal and their alpha choices, in turn, validate alpha reality. But we should be clear that, within the broader context of Game, Roissy writes from the perspective of the cultural ecosystem that he inhabits. Within the ecosystem comprising nightclubs, singles and the seduction community, properly deployed Game can work quite well, if you accept their definitions of alpha dominance, female hypergamy and female attractiveness. But the more brutal truth is that women do not always choose alphas. Women do not always go for "the pick of the bunch". Insofar as one might be tempted to regard frat-boys and jerks as somehow occupying the top of "the" pecking-order, there are other pecking orders, other bunches that do not work well with Roissyesque Game theory. Women choose for a complex of reasons that include security, circles of acquaintances, peer pressure, parental pressure, dumb luck, and so on. Game does not always work. Sometimes it can work against you, if a woman perceives you as a player and she prioritizes security. The bottom line is that Game theory's ranking system itself does not provide a reliable estimator of womanly smarts. Indeed, Roissyesque Game theory works because it is based on the implicit presumption that women are less intelligent than men, and, by inference, that their choices are vulnerable to easy manipulation. There are some men for whom this kind of shallow, cosmetically-masked, narcissistic woman, regardless of her perceived standing as a 9 or a 10, is simply not all that appealing.

Ultimately, neither men nor women have a clue about their opposite sex. This ignorance works mostly against women. How often do "liberated" women feign the licking of lips in their expression of faux-lust for the hot, grease-covered mechanic, or the bare-chested, hose-carrying fireman? Give me a break. These images don't interest women. Their faux-lusting for bare-chested “hunks” just makes women look stupid and deluded. Women don’t have a clue either about men or their own sexuality. The ignorance of women is positively dangerous.

In the spirit of the Duke Rejection List, consider the 2009 Cronulla Sharks scandal (transcript here) where a team of Australian Rugby League players participated in group sex with a 19-year-old university student (“Clare” – not her real name) while on a tour in New Zealand. As it turns out, she was naÔve and misguided at the time and apparently, did not fit the profile that we would normally expect of a gang-banger. During the Four Corners interview, Detective Sgt Neville Jenkins of the Christchurch Police said that “she was a nice girl. She was young, um naÔve, not worldly, just a growing up teenager.”

From the Four Corners transcript, it would appear that the Cronulla Sharks team members thought their gang-bang in a Christchurch hotel in New Zealand was all great fun and a terrific joke, a boisterous bonding experience replete with banter, hilarity and wholesome groping and masturbation lavished upon a willing participant. By inference, if we read between the lines, it would seem that “Clare” presumably complied in silent confusion, stunned into passive compliance and not comprehending the reality of what was taking place. Hilarious. Whatever she was hoping to experience as fawning attention from a couple of manly men quickly degenerated into something that had more in common with Sharks in a feeding frenzy on a lone, mutilated carcass bobbing up and down with the waves in a vast blue sea.

The impression one gets is of a misguided social outcast who has failed to connect with her peer groups, seeking male attention and romance in all the wrong places. In this, the story appears to have its parallels with The Atlantic article on the Karen Owen story, including Roissy’s aforementioned interpretation and TuckerMax’s more compassionate interpretation. The common theme that we all appear to agree on is that there is less female empowerment taking place than misguided, impressionable ignorance culminating in considerable psychic harm. Even clinically cool Roissy gets it that, deep down inside, even the raunchiest slut is not a soulless automaton defined by hormonal impulses:

> …even the raunchiest cockgobblers have a heart inside that beats for a man to love and cherish them above all others. The love of a man, true and loyal, is the slut’s white whale.

The reality is that sluts are never 100% dumb party whores, and that if you were stuck with one on a deserted island, chances are that she will become your fawning servant, worshipping every one of your footprints on a remote sandy beach – whether you want her or not. Of course we should point out that there are many kinds of sluts, from toxic bitches who only ever fawn over thugs, to misguided teens searching for identity, who have lost their way. Many a slut, as a social outcast who has failed to connect with her peer groups, will readily forgo her cock carousel lifestyle if only she can encounter the good fortune of stumbling upon but one man who can love her above all others. You can count on it.

And Roissy isn’t the only PUA who realizes this stuff. Other PUAs also realize that sluts possess a tender side, try as they might to deny it. Essential to success with women is the ability to make them feel comfortable, to entertain their fantasy that it is a boyfriend-girlfriend relationship that they are in, even if it is only for one night. It’s an essential part of the confidence/submission dynamic that I refer to above. As Assanova clarifies:

> Make her feel secure. Even the sluttiest of the slutty women like to feel secure before sleeping with a guy.

So much for feminist fantasies of empowerment and the purported insatiability of rancid cockgobblers asserting their sexual appetites.

Getting back to the gang-bangers. What’s going on here? What is it that women don’t get? Don’t women understand when they are being laughed at, mocked, degraded and ridiculed? Don’t they understand that these gang-bang experiences have less to do with empowerment and connecting between women and men than it has with misogynistic male bonding rituals in which the woman serves merely as a prop? Of course at some gut level they will apprehend this. But don't expect them to receive support from feminists or from other women whose shallow identities have been cemented securely into "well-adjusted" peer groups. It's the feminists and their ever-supportive manginas who know an opportunity for masquerading female empowerment when they see one. Their hatred of men exceeds the mounting carnage of impressionable, misguided lives that get tossed aside as collateral damage. Feminists do understand that any suggestion that these experiences are anything but empowering for women could be very damaging to the feminist cause. Of course that possibility would never occur to their supplicating manginas, who, understanding neither men nor women, know never to question the feminist orthodoxy.

The feminist/mangina symbiosis is a very powerful one that relies on two key principles:

- Ultimately the success of feminism depends on a systemic kind of prostitution, where the promise of sexual "freedom" is traded for an assortment of freebies for women at the expense of men, from "equality" by way of affirmative action, to the pussy-pass in laws and gubmint incentives;
- Omegas who have failed to secure their place on the male pecking order can exorcise the bitterness in their hatred of men by becoming supplicating manginas.

Interpreting these stories of women's sexual "empowerment" as tragedies of misspent, misguided youth is not really in the interests either of this kind of prostitution or this kind of mangina. Supplicating manginas are unable to relate to women in a sexual kind of way, so Feminism provides them with the opportunity to at least sniff at her panties, if nothing else.

And there is just one small problem with this collateral damage of misguided lives tossed onto the trash-heap of apparently isolated human misery. It is never just collateral. It is an expression of a culture that values lies and deceit above truth and reality. It is a pervasive dumbing down of humanity where everyone is affected. This is what feminism stands for. This is what feminism looks like. Feminism is the standard-bearer for this kind of "collateral damage". It is a form of collateral damage that cannot happen in any other kind of society.

Unconfirmed reports suggest that "Clare" went on to marry a rugby player from a different team. At one level bizarre, at another level understandable. It all depends on whether the groom was an active participant in the aforementioned team bonding traditions that take place around the Land, or an exile from them. Both participant and exile share a history that "Clare" recognizes and is drawn to. One of them just might provide the best therapy that she could possibly receive, the other, sealing off her escape and assuring her descent into hell.

Does a woman's history of bad experiences matter? Maybe women don't think that it matters. If it was all confined to the genetic code, if it was all about evolutionary psychology and the so-called survival of the fittest, with nature red in tooth and claw, it might make some kind of sense. Genetically superior alpha studs mating, spreading their seed… can't complain about that, can we? Where's the problem?

Perhaps we can start by suggesting that sports jocks do not always represent superior genetic material. One study suggests that footballers have much in common with criminals. I can buy that. It presents problems for the evo-psych crowd though, unless they accept that there is such a thing as devolution and reversion to a more primitive state, a throwback to apes swinging from tree to tree.

Or maybe it hasn't got anything to do with genetics and evolutionary psychology at all. Maybe it has everything to do with something deeper, something about the way we make choices and establish our identities. When a team of thugs mocks and degrades an apparently willing but misguided teenager searching for her identity, do they not effectively also mock and degrade her family, and even society itself? How does this garbage recirculate throughout the culture and the identities of everyone living within it? If someone you loved was a gang-banger, what might that say about you? What are we becoming? Cast your eyes around. Can we really believe that this mockery of humanity that we see around us today is what humanity used to look like a hundred years ago?

Ultimately, these questions relate to much bigger existential concepts, well beyond the scope of The Spearhead. But there is one conclusion that I do bring, and that's that women are capable of extremely dumb, destructive choices.

When they ride the cock carousel in preference to the responsible betas that they find so boring, well, I guess they pay. Their history matters. But why should we care, given that our cultures care so little about false rape allegations and what is happening to men in the family courts, the workplace and society in general?

Abuse Charlatan Gears up for Super Bowl with Abuse Bingo, Rapist Babies Ad

W.F. Price · 6 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Josh Jasper may not care much about the game, but he is eagerly anticipating the Super Bowl commercials. That's because Josh is the CEO of the Dubuque Riverview Center, a "nonprofit" that puts out disturbing ads implying that baby boys are all potential rapists. According to Mr. Jasper, Superbowl ads are worse, because they objectify women and encourage violence. To prove this, he has invented a game based on Bingo, which includes squares for such things as "revealing clothing," "close up body shots," and "women wrestling."

Jasper feels that the masculine nature of the Super Bowl is a problem, perhaps riffing off the old erroneous claim that women are battered in unprecedented numbers on Super Bowl weekend:

> Jasper points to businesses such as Godaddy.com as continuing to push the public's desensitization button by objectifying women. He said many other companies promote violence…
>
> "Violence is a learned behavior," Jasper said. "People aren't born to be a rapist; people aren't born to beat up their husband, their wife or their children. You learn this behavior. One of the biggest ways we learn violence is through the media."
> With the Super Bowl being such a hyper-masculine event, Jasper said the reality is that society has normalized violence against women and children, transforming what it means to be "a man."

To hear complaints about "objectification" coming from a man who has no problem painting baby boys as potential rapists should tell us all we need to know about these types of abuse quacks, but sadly they are still allowed to plant their faces firmly in the feeding trough, living off of our taxes by providing legal and medical "services" for the courts under the guise of victim advocacy. It is imperative that we expose these charlatans for who they are, and remove them from participation in our justice system. For these people, promoting hatred of men provides a living on the public dime, and in these hard times it's time to reevaluate whether or not we can afford to allow them to continue doing so.

Feminists Resisting Georgia Legal Reform

W.F. Price · 6 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Georgia State legislator Bobby Franklin (R-Marietta) has introduced a bill that would change the term victim to accuser in certain cases, including rape and stalking, when a conviction has not yet been obtained. Naturally, feminists are angry about this, as they often insist on having the moral upper hand, and calling someone a "victim" – even when they could well be false accusers – gives prosecutors and accusers leverage by creating an assumption that an accuser was victimized through linguistic sleight-of-hand. Because people brought up on charges in the United States are considered innocent until proven guilty, there is something inherently at odds with our criminal justice system in assuming that a crime has taken place without a conviction.

Trotting out the usual lies, Amanda Terkel of Huffington Post writes:

> Rape and sexual assault are chronically underreported crimes. According to the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network, "60% of rapes/sexual assaults are not reported to the police, according to a statistical average of the past 5 years. Those rapists, of course, never spend a day in prison. Factoring in unreported rapes, only about 6% of rapists ever serve a day in jail." Under Franklin's definition, all of these people who didn't report their crimes aren't actually victims — because there is never a conviction.

Terkel skips around the fact that the language is for legal purposes, so she is free to call people victims all she wants, but without a conviction victimhood cannot be legally established. It may be a technicality, but it's an important one in terms of due process. Additionally, in many rape accusations there is no physical evidence of a crime (sex is not a crime — yet), so victimhood cannot be established except upon the accuser's word, and that is legally insufficient.

Given that stories of men being released after decades behind bars for false rape convictions are coming out in the news on a very frequent basis, it is astonishing to see the intransigence of these feminists, who refuse in the face of all the evidence to cop to the serious problem of false accusations and unjust prosecutions.

Justice, however, has never been a feminist goal. No, the goal is power, at the expense of anyone and everything else.

Coming Soon — AVfM Radio

Paul Elam is in the final stages of his preparation to go on air with a radio show slated to kick off on the first of March. The show will feature interviews, commentary and a monthly broadcast with Dr. Tara Palmatier.

I expect Paul to bring his signature, hard hitting commentary to bear in defense of men, and am convinced that the show will soon develop a loyal audience and following. In fact, I think this is just the beginning for Paul; given the rising awareness of the issues men are facing, incipient political activism, and the renewed, revitalized Men's Rights Movement, there will be plenty of opportunities for him to take his show to the public and make our case to a wider audience. Additionally, Paul hits a demographic sweet spot — he can speak directly to the boomers while retaining appeal to younger men looking to learn what they can do to prevent future problems and move forward in a positive direction. Given contemporary Western politics this is an important consideration.

Mr. Elam has put years into this effort, and deserves a spot in the forefront of the movement he represents. Fortunately, the stars have aligned over the last year or so, and it's finally possible for this to occur. Although we can't be sure exactly what will come of it all, the will and sophistication inherent in the contemporary men's movement is like nothing I've ever seen in my life, and I expect it to continue to grow for some time.

So, for those of us directly involved as well those who prefer to cheer from the bleachers – the 12th man is always a player – we now have an opportunity to sit back and listen for a while. It will be a rewarding experience.

But I'll let Paul speak for himself now:

> The mission of A Voice for Men Radio is to confront feminism, manginism, white knightism and any other mentality that serves as a breeding ground for misandry or the promotion of a utilitarian, disposable view of men and boys.

The Eye of Sauron

Featured Guest · 7 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By AfOR

In the first few days of 1999, Scott McNealy, CEO of Sun Microsystems, said "You have zero privacy anyway. Get over it."

This was in response to a group of reporters questioning him about the privacy of users using their (Sun) products.

Since then of course we have the 9,000 lb Gorilla in the corner of the room, Google, and the similarly weighty primates known as Facebook, Ebay/paypal, et al.

As someone who worked in IT, I was always singularly aware of the insatiable appetite for data about me that all these companies have, and, being a fairly private person, made a point of avoiding giving my data wherever possible, and where this was not possible, poisoning it with erroneous data… pity the poor fool who actually has the poop@poop.com email.

I was under no illusion why these companies wanted data about us all, or what they did with it, and I did not like the idea of being a number in a file, under the corporate Eye of Sauron, profiled and monitored and monetised.

And then in 2009 I woke up one day to find myself the target of a malicious False Rape Accusation as part and parcel of a separation / child custody battle, and all my private and work computers and servers were seized, for computer forensic inspection by the Police.

And I discovered first hand that the Police really do mean it when they say that stuff about "…may be used against you…" and it really is no accident that they do not say anything at all about stuff that may be used for you, to clear you, to exonerate you, to prove your innocence.

I wish there was some way of communicating the importance of the above paragraph to you, ACHTUNG! MINEFIELD! Doesn't quite cut it, because you'd simply back off, maybe if the sign said "You are here!" instead, showing you in the middle of a minefield…

The minefield of data, all of which can be employed AGAINST you, none of which will be used for you, because the only person whose interests are served by that are you yourself. It was an "interesting" experience for me, intellectually, several terabytes of data removed from me, and being searched for anything that would assist in my conviction, with me of course having zero access, so no way of searching for anything that would assist in proving my innocence.

Increasingly Facebook data is being used in the same way, used to prove some sort of culpability, whether it is in a civil separation case, or a more serious criminal assault / domestic violence case, or a serious as cancer rape accusation.

Of course all the Lawyers, Judges, Police are all rubbing their hands at this new mountain of data that they get to pore through…. That drunken tweet you posted at 3 am that was inadvertently altered by predictive text can now hang you, almost literally…

Which brings me to Google in general, Google Maps 5.1 in particular, and Android smartphones specifically. Now I can be tracked (technically it is my smartphone, a Samsung Galaxy S, not me, but legally nowadays this is increasingly a distinction without a difference) 24/7 to an accuracy of a few metres.

The old, pre-False-Rape-Accusation, me was a private person, the idea of Google tracking me was horrific, why don't I just bloody live in a fishbowl, it's not even like the bastards were paying me for the privilege of tracking me and profiling me. However, the new, post-False-Rape-Accusation me looks at this new technology, and all I can see is "I wish I had this shit for the past five years."

Because, you see, I, and my lawyers, will always be able to access Google's records, they will never be seized and hidden and locked away in a small Police station, inaccessible to anyone except a couple of Police forensic types.

It would be most interesting to be able to point out, cheerfully, that at the time of the alleged offence, I was clearly doing 55 mph down Route66, a distance of 87 miles from the location of the alleged offence.

To be sure, much of what I was accused of was vague, literally no more accurate than a season, as "it happened late 2010 or early 2011, I can't remember any more details than that, but it happened" which sort of nonsense my Google Maps and Check-In history won't be a great deal of use of as exculpatory evidence.

But, everyone is signing up for this stuff, Facebook places etc., people sign up for this to get 5 cents off a Starbucks, so in fact you are going to be looking for an overlap, IN TIME AND IN SPACE between the tracks of your accuser, and yourself, and this will have to coincide with the date of the accusation.

Even if all this still puts you in the frame, if both you and your accused post to your Facebook wall, chat, tweet, Buzz or anything else, there is going to be a record, and it is going to sound very strange when someone who accuses you of rape turns out to have been in Starbucks tweeting about the latest vampire movie.

Even better, these temporal tracks and traces reveal a close friend of your accused, who met your accuser in Starbucks 30 minutes after you are alleged to have beaten the crap out of her 5 miles away, and the close friend of your accused uses their phone camera to grab a snapshot to post, time and location stamped, to Facebook / Buzz / whatever, clearly showing the alleged victim un-ruffled, un-bruised, un-beaten up, un-assaulted.

The danger lies in the fact that these tracks and traces can be used to charge you with something you never did… it is the modern equivalent of taking DNA samples of all men in a town, in the future the Police will just subpoena the relevant social networking sites, and get a list of all men who were within 50 metres of the alleged crime scene, within 1 hour of the alleged crime time.

Just as today, this "evidence" can and will be used "against you" and not for you, not to exculpate you, but the fact is that this danger exists anyway, and even if you don't sign up for these things, the cell phone and social networking companies track you anyway, to a lower accuracy by tower triangulation, to higher accuracy if you use any gps/location data, so it's not like you can opt out, except by being a luddite like pre-False-Rape-Accusation me, which means different, which means suspicious / weird / loner / deviant / etc.

On the other hand, if you embrace these new technologies, then they suddenly become available for you, and your lawyers, to use in your defence, and you aren't really giving up any essential privacy, because as McNealy said a shade over twelve years ago, you don't have any privacy, get used to it.

On the other hand, you never had the opportunity to build a 24/7 alibi either.

Female Soldiers Getting Fragged in Theater, Cover-up Suspected

W.F. Price · 8 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As President Obama and the military make moves to further integrate women into the armed forces, a number of suspicious deaths involving women on base in Iraq and Afghanistan have led families to push for answers. Many have been classified as suicides, but the circumstances of the deaths often suggest homicide.

The term "fragging" emerged during the Vietnam War, when soldiers would use untraceable hand grenades to kill officers who needlessly risked the lives of their men. Hundreds of officers were fragged in Vietnam, and well over a thousand officers' deaths remain inexplicable. Given the overall numbers of deaths in Vietnam, this means that officers were nearly as likely to be killed by their own men as they were by the enemy. This appears to be the case with female soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan as well.

Although feminists are framing the issue as one of rape and sexual violence, there is likely more to it than that. Take the case of Marine Lance Cpl. Stacy Dryden, for example:

> Marine Lance Cpl. Stacy Dryden, 22, of Canton, Ohio. The military said Dryden did not kill herself but was found deceased in a portable latrine in Iraq in 2008. Historically, female soldiers have referred to the on-base Porta-Potties as "rape traps." What is significant about Dryden's case is that her death, according to military investigators, was due to injuries suffered during a "friendly wrestling match" she had with a U.S. Navy sailor who body-slammed her onto concrete. The sailor has not been charged with any crime. Dryden's family pressed for clearer answers, and in January 2011, military investigators changed their explanation and said the wrestling match was actually a hostile confrontation after the sailor made a derogatory remark to Dryden.

According to an NCIS investigator, Dryden started a fight with a sailor, and was thrown down hard, hitting her head on concrete. In at least some cases, it appears that women are in over their head physically, and are getting hurt in an effort to overcompensate.

However, sexual disputes have probably played a role in a number of the deaths. Reports from soldiers indicate that the promiscuity of females on base is rampant, which will inevitably lead to cases of jealous rage, borderline rape, real rape, false rape accusations for one reason or the other, etc. Although most rape accusations do not result in convictions, those accused can go through hell, so it wouldn't be surprising if it turned out that many of the dead women had either threatened to make a rape accusation or had actually been raped, and were fragged to prevent testimony. This is one of the unintended effects of feminist rape hysteria — you raise the stakes on a certain crime enough and people will start contemplating murder to cover their tracks or avoid prosecution. A number of them will actually go through with it. In a war zone, it's virtually guaranteed that this will happen.

Army Pvt. Tina Priest may have been one such victim:

> Army Pvt. Tina Priest, 20, of Smithville, Texas. Her mom said she was shy and "a follower." She wanted to be a medic, but several weeks into her 2006 deployment to Iraq, she called home saying she had been raped and that "no one was going to believe her." Just a few days after telling her mother, the military said Priest put her M16 barrel to her heart and pulled the trigger with her toe.

Despite the supposed epidemic of sexual violence in the military, the top brass and commander in chief have recommended expanding the role of women in the armed forces to include them in combat. This can only exacerbate the problem, for which there is probably no solution besides removing aggressive young men from the military as they have been removed from the corporate workforce over the last generation so as to better accommodate women. However, there is an obvious problem with that idea. Are women and mild-mannered office workers going to actually hike into remote valleys to trade gunfire with rough tribesmen in Afghanistan?

Perhaps the idea is to have soldiers take anger management classes and learn nonviolent conflict resolution techniques. Instead of learning to fire guns and throw grenades in boot camp, maybe they should be sitting down taking classes dedicated to “redefining masculinity.”

The contradictions are obvious, but I don’t think feminists actually understand that war isn’t a 9-5 job at the office. And politically, they are so powerful now that they will be indulged.

All this concern over sexual assault in the military coupled with the drive to put even more women in war zones will only lead to more rape accusations, both real and false, more discord in the ranks, more suicides, and ultimately more fraggings. As usual, the cost in blood and tears is of little concern to the feminists — how could it be otherwise when they’ve never paid for anything on their own dime?

Rapist Babies Ad Sponsor Responds to Outrage by Calling Police

W.F. Price · 8 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Josh Jasper, CEO of Dubuque Riverview Center, received a heated response on Riverview's Youtube page following a critical write-up here on The Spearhead highlighting a rather hateful ad portraying a baby boy as a rapist. Evidently, the imagery and tone of the ad, which contrasts a cute infant boy with overtones of blame and condemnation, pushed people's buttons. What I found particularly notable was that female commenters with sons responded very negatively to the ad. It would be difficult for anyone who has a son to avoid taking that ad personally, so the emotional response is understandable.

According to the Des Moines Register, Jasper claims to have received death threats, which he said prompted him to hide certain aspects of his identity and call the police:

> …thanks to YouTube, the ad has triggered an international firestorm and death threats for the Dubuque man, who heads a nonprofit advocacy group for victims of sexual assault and domestic violence.
> In a letter to Jasper's bosses, an Australian viewer called Jasper a "man hater" and a "mangina" who should be fired. Another viewer put it this way: "You would be better off dead."
> Jasper, the president and chief executive officer of Riverview Center in Dubuque, said the backlash prompted him to call police and change his personal information on Facebook from a married father to "single."

I'm not sure the comments highlighted represent the threats he alleges, but if so I've received much more explicit ones than that in my inbox.

In any event, I'm glad nobody threatened Mr. Jasper on The Spearhead, and I think our readers generally know better than to do so. However, although we should take care not to threaten people with physical harm or any criminal acts, condemning the ad and calling for his dismissal from Riverview is fair play. I doubt it will happen, because while you can get away with targeting even babies so long as they are male, merely slighting a female colleague is career suicide these days.

But things do change. One baby step at a time.

Testimony in Assange Extradition Hearing: Prosecutor Marianne Ny “Malicious … biased against men”

W.F. Price · 8 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

UK – In testimony for the defense in Julian Assange’s extradition hearing for rape charges, retired appeals court judge Brita Sundberg-Weitman called the prosecutor in the case a man-hating feminist with a sadistic twist to her personality. When asked what she thought the prosecutor planned to do if Assange were extradited to Sweden, she said “It might be her attitude to have the man arrested and maybe let him suffer for a few weeks to have him softer [for interrogation].”

When confronted with the fact that the Swedish district court had found the warrant issued to have been “proportionate and legal,” she responded by voicing concerns about the state of the law in Sweden, saying “…I am very concerned about the state of the rule of law in Sweden. It has been decaying since the mid-1970s.”

Others called to testify in the hearing included people who knew accuser Anna Ardin, who allegedly told a number of lies to friends and the police, and a blogger who discovered tweets Ardin made after the alleged rape bragging about her encounters with Assange.

Discrimination against women in science turns out to be a myth

W.F. Price · 9 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Although it is still taken as gospel that discrimination against women is responsible for women's underrepresentation in math-intensive fields of science, social psychologists Stephan Ceci and Wendy Williams of Cornell found that women in these fields are actually often at an advantage when compared to their male peers, and that claims of bias didn't stand up to scrutiny.

From the paper:

> Despite frequent assertions that women's current underrepresentation in math-intensive fields is caused by sex discrimination by grant agencies, journal reviewers, and search committees, the evidence shows women fare as well as men in hiring, funding, and publishing (given comparable resources). That women tend to occupy positions offering fewer resources is not due to women being bypassed in interviewing and hiring or being denied grants and journal publications because of their sex. It is due primarily to factors surrounding family formation and childrearing, gendered expectations, lifestyle choices, and career preferences—some originating before or during adolescence (3, 50, 54, 58) (SI Text, S9)—and secondarily to sex differences at the extreme right tail of mathematics performance on tests used as gateways to graduate school admission (SI Text, S10). As noted, women in math-intensive fields are interviewed and hired slightly in excess of their representation among PhDs applying for tenure-track positions. The primary factors in women's underrepresentation are preferences and choices—both freely made and constrained: "Women choose at a young age not to pursue math-intensive careers, with few adolescent girls expressing desires to be engineers or physicists, preferring instead to be medical doctors, veterinarians, biologists, psychologists, and lawyers. Females make this choice despite earning higher math and science grades than males throughout schooling" (3).

From the above passage, it is clear that choice plays a large role, as does the preponderance of men at the tail end of the bell curve of intellectual ability. This isn't news to us, but the fact that the study was published represents a victory over the orthodoxy of political correctness that has had a death grip on academia for some four decades.

We can only hope that more honesty will begin to enter the scholarly discourse, and eventually gain enough strength to once again illuminate the benighted halls of academia.

Spearhead Submission Process

W.F. Price · 9 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Because traffic has just kept on growing recently, I've arrived at the point where I'm a little overwhelmed by all the email and submissions, so the system for keeping track of them is breaking down a bit.

If you've submitted something recently and not heard back from me that's the reason.

However, the last thing I want is for people to get the impression that submissions are unwelcome. In fact, as traffic grows they are more important than ever, but the catch-22 is that I have less time to open, edit and schedule them when inundated with requests and other tasks.

So, for now we'll keep the process on the submissions page in place, but there will have to be some streamlining and delegation of tasks in the near future to make sure that all submissions receive due consideration and can be scheduled in an efficient, timely manner.

I'd like to thank all guest authors — I truly appreciate their contributions and am taking steps to facilitate the publication process.

Afghanistan Government to Eject NGOs from Women's Shelter Administration

W.F. Price · 10 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Following the US-led invasion of Afghanistan, women's shelters were opened in the conservative, Muslim country for the first time. The shelters ostensibly protect women from abuse or forced marriages, but many Afghans suspect they are fronts for prostitution or set up expressly for the purpose of removing Afghan women from their families.

Although some of the more conservative imams would like to see them shut down altogether, Afghan President Hamid Karzai appears to be seeking a compromise that would place them under Afghan government control and keep the women away from foreign influence.

Ironically, one of the incidents that sparked Afghan resentment toward the foreign NGOs running women's shelters was the use of Bibi Aisha, the girl whose nose was cut off, by TIME magazine to depict all Afghans as barbarous mutilators of women. This cynical use of a rare crime to justify the prosecution of war outraged the people of Afghanistan, so perhaps TIME holds some responsibility for recent measures taken to shut westerners out of the Afghan abuse industry.

Exporting contemporary Western feminism directly to Afghanistan was a pretty screwed up idea, and it wouldn't be surprising if such attempts are getting in the way of our primary mission there, which was to eliminate terrorist enclaves, but current goals have become increasingly murky as Osama bin Ladin fades further from attention. Feminism is a difficult fit even for Western society, but foisting it on a culture that is just emerging from tribalism is insane, and bound to cause trouble.

Dramatic Rise in Stroke in Young Men

W.F. Price · 10 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a period of only twelve years, strokes in boys and men from 15-34 years of age rose 51%, and in men from 35 to 44 they rose 47%. While the trend has been increasing for women as well, it is not as severe, with women of comparable age groups recording 17% and 36% respectively. The rise among women alone should be cause for major concern, but the numbers for men are outright shocking.

This is a personal issue for me. A good friend of mine died suddenly from a stroke at the age of 29. By all outward appearances a healthy young man, my friend Scott was quite literally here one day and gone the next. Scott was a handsome, outgoing and engaging young man with a promising career as a biologist, and his sudden death left me feeling angry and confused. It's always hard to lose a friend, but particularly so when he is happy and full of life.

Although some research points to obesity and and diet sodas, I'm not sure the rise can be explained by these factors alone. For one thing, obesity has risen faster amongst women than men, but they have not seen such a dramatic increase in strokes. Although female hormones, which promote tissue elasticity, may have a mitigating effect, I'd suspect something else is at work.

Although I'm going out on a limb here, I don't think it would be entirely preposterous to examine the role that stimulants such as Ritalin may have played in these events. Amphetamines and cocaine can directly cause stroke, so I don't think it's a huge stretch to assume that lesser stimulants such as Ritalin may be a potential culprit. If the dramatic rise is mainly amongst younger men, it is probably time to examine the pharmacological history of male stroke victims to see whether there is any correlation along those lines. If it turns out that the mass drugging that boys have been exposed to for the past couple decades has contributed to this dramatic rise in stroke deaths – and the timing looks to be about just right – we're going to have to accept that the medication of masculinity has had deadly consequences.

First, however, we need to convince the medical establishment to take men's health concerns seriously. This is something they have been reluctant to do in the face of feminist pressure, which works to put a negative sum on the value of men's lives.

A Song for Banished Fathers and Their Little Boys

W.F. Price · 11 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I found Luke Kelly recently, listening to him sing "The Kerry Recruit," which is an old keen about a Kerryman who gets his leg blown off fighting in the Crimea. It struck a chord with me, having heard some of the same style of singing/chanting in church as a boy on a few occasions. But then I found "Come My Little Son," and it had an even deeper resonance for me as a father.

I think I ought to let the song speak for itself, but it's worth noting that one of the comments under the video on YouTube shows I'm not the only one it touched:

> Dedicated to my son luke whos being robbed from me in the most cruel way…. i love you luke hayes benn xxxxxxxx

Perhaps in this day of state-sanctioned removal of fathers from their children's lives, the song is more relevant than ever.

How to Learn Game in One Week

Featured Guest · 11 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Frost

Every straight man alive in the 21st century needs to learn Game. This post will teach you all the Game you need to derive 80% of the potential benefits. Where you go from there is up to you.

First of all: What is Game?

Let's start with what it's not.

- Game is not shiny pedants and cheesy pickup lines
- Game is not solely useful for finding one-night stands in clubs
- Game is not being an asshole, lying to girls, acting "fake"
- Game is not irrelevant to men in long term relationships

Game is actually incredibly simple. It's just the study of how your behaviour affects women. Are you interested in women? Yes? Than you're interested in Game. It doesn't matter if you want to rack up notches, or keep your wife of 15 years sweet, fit and sexually available – learn game, and your life will get a whole lot easier.

I'm going to break down the study of Game into a three-step program that you can easily finish in a single week. If you're anything less than perfectly satisfied with your sex life right now, this is my challenge to you: Ditch class, call in sick to work and give away your XBOX. I guarantee there is nothing else you can do that will have anywhere near as high of a return on your long-term happiness and success in life.

Step 1: Re-learn the basics of human psychology

Before you can attract women, you must understand them. Unfortunately, you have been taught many lies about the subtleties of the human mind, one of which is that men just can't understand women. While this claim is widespread in our culture, the reality is that women are not at all hard to understand, for a man who has the proper tools.

Our first tool, and first homework assignment, is the original classic popular text of Evolutionary Psychology: Richard Dawkins' The Selfish Gene.

This book will show you the true nature and origins of human thought, and hopefully erase decades of programming (more often implicit than stated) that human behaviour is environmentally determined and infinitely malleable.

Following Dawkins' classic, familiarize yourself with a few other texts on what is really the only field of psychology worth studying today. Robert Wright's The Moral Animal, David Buss's Evolutionary Psychology Matt Ridley's The Red Queen, and Barkow, Tooby and Cosmides' The Adapted Mind. Read at a good pace, skim a few pages if you need to, and try to finish that list in two days. (You might want to brew a pot of coffee.)

On day 3, move on to the most relevant sub-field of Ev Psych: Applications to sex and relationships. Read these two books: Sperm Wars by Robin Baker and The Evolution of Desire by David Buss.

At this point, hopefully you'll have figured out that most of the conventional wisdom on sex and dating is bullshit. In order to cement your newfound distrust of conventional wisdom, pick up a copy of Stephen Pinker's excellent The Blank Slate on day four and read that along with E.O. Wilson's canonical Sociobiology. Finish the evening with a glass of wine and Robert Green's The Art of Seduction, which is not an Ev Psych text but a fun and useful read nonetheless.

Step 2: Learn the Skills

So now you've got a solid understanding of the evolutionary origins of human behaviour. This will come in handy in almost every aspect of your life. For now though, we'll just apply it to women. We're going to move on to some actual seduction material.

On Day 5, start with the Fast Seduction Player Guide and The Mystery Method. Also grab a copy of The Game for some history.

There are literally millions of pages of forum posts and shitty e-books out there filled with pickup lines, routines, tactics, scams, cons, gambits, flim-flams, strategems and bamboozles. Most of them are worthless. Some are a mixed bag. A small slice, such as those listed above, are well worth reading.

But the ROI to learning more diminishes rapidly. Instead of getting bogged down in endless over-analyzing, read the above sources, pick up a copy of Bang for something written in the 21st century, and then stop reading and go live your life. We've got two days left and no more time for books.

Step 3: Apply the Skills

Finished with the reading lists? OK. Hold on to your dick, because now you're actually going to have to put down the books and do something.

Exactly what that "something" is will depend on your goals, but here are a few examples.

If you're a 21-year old virgin:

- Start friendly conversations with five different girls
- Create an online dating profile and send out ten emails
- Ask that female "friend" who you're secretly in love with if she wants to go out on a date

If you're forty, and haven't banged your wife in a month:

- Do something uncharacteristically assertive today. Don't apologize.
- Tell your wife she looks hot
- Reach over at bedtime and touch her puss. (I mean really, married guys, how hard is this?)

If you're a "cool guy" who "doesn't need game to get laid:"

- Go to a crowded bar, find the hottest girl there, and have sex with her.
- Have a threesome
- Find an amazing girl, fall hard for her, and teach her to be happy with your love without a need for monogamy

(Not such a tough guy anymore, are ya?)

The common theme among each of these exercises is that they push your comfort zone. They ask you to do things you haven't done before, because you're afraid to. It doesn't matter how awesome or pathetic you are as a seducer, and as a man. Whatever level you're at, Game will help you reach the next one.

So that’s the challenge. One week. If you’re up to it, keep me updated in the comments.

Women's empowerment programs hurt women

Featured Guest · 11 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Carey Roberts

"The Office of the Senior Advisor to the Secretary of State for Women's Empowerment."

No, that's not the clandestine front group from a Tom Clancy spy novel, nor is it a libertarian's bad dream. Rather, it's is a real-life program underwritten by the U.S. taxpayer. A brainchild of Hillary Clinton, the unit's declared mission is to advise the secretary of state on "strategies the Department of State should implement to help empower women worldwide."

Female empowerment has become fashionable at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, as well. There, inspired bureaucrats worked overtime to gin up the EMPOWER acronym — "Enhancing and Making Programs Work to End Rape" — a multimillion-dollar initiative that promotes sexual violence prevention programs.

So where did the idea of female empowerment come from, and is it helping or hurting women?

The term "empowerment" was inspired by the writings of Karl Marx, who viewed peasant women as dual victims of capitalism and patriarchy. The solution, of course, was to embolden the ladies to cast off their conjugal oppressors. In practice, this meant an ample supply of newly liberated female laborers ready to work the fields, the factories, and the mines — an arrangement that no doubt pleased liberator-in-chief Vladimir Lenin.

But American women are becoming wary of the ideological agenda that lurks behind the empowerment facade. Conservative icon Phyllis Schlafly recently commented, "It's clear that feminists never wanted gender equality; they want power for the female left, which is why they use the word empowerment so reflexively."

At the US Agency for International Development, female empowerment has become a religion of sorts. Every problem that afflicts the female gender is filtered through the neo-Marxist prism of power and control.

So if you want to fathom the problem of partner abuse, "unequal power relations between men and women" are to blame, according to the USAID website.

The agency goes on to boast, "USAID is committed to preventing gender-based violence by supporting legislation against it." And exactly what kind of laws are we talking about?

In India, USAID "was instrumental in the formation of Women Power Connect," according to its March 6, 2007 press release. "WPC's priority issues include…the 33% reservation for women in Parliament."

Translation: In the name of promoting democracy, American taxpayers have been bankrolling a radical feminist group to rig democratic elections and impose a gender quota on the Indian lawmaking assembly.

Another pet USAID project is microfinance programs, which provide $50 to $500 loans to aspiring entrepreneurs in impoverished countries. According to the Marxist formulation, men have all the power, so poverty-stricken males need not apply.

USAID hails its microfinance effort in northern Mali, Africa, where "2,700 new women micro-entrepreneurs received conditional seed capital, business training, and help in forming saving groups, while 1,097 already established women micro-entrepreneurs received additional training and networking assistance." (A government program to train women to network with their gal-pals? Yes, that's what the USAID fact sheet says.)

But microfinance programs have come under fire lately. That's because microfinance is just a fancy name for a sub-prime loan program for low-income borrowers. Since up to one-third of these loans go sour, lending agencies end up charging interest rates of 40% or more.

The title of a recent article in The Atlantic says it all: "Lies, Hype, and Profit: The Truth about Microfinance." Others refer to it as government-sanctioned usury.

Just last week the UK Guardian ran an article about Indian families trapped in a “deadly spiral of microfinance debt.” The essay recounts the story of Victoria Bandari who took out a loan a decade ago. When her son was injured in a road accident, Bandari needed more credit for medical expenses. The 38-year-old woman took out a third, then a fourth loan. Finally, Bandari began to sell off her daughter’s wedding jewelry.

Rama Peadda Boiana, a 29-year-old farmer’s wife, consumed a lethal dose of pesticide to escape encircling debt collectors from a predatory flock of microfinance firms.

There’s another reason that microfinance programs exploit women — they impose a Faustian-style bargain on the unsuspecting.

The subtle but unmistakable message behind feminist-inspired microfinance programs goes like this: “Ladies, your husband is an unreliable schmuck. Stick with him and you’ll die a penniless waif. But come on board for our loan and job training programs and you can become a member of the global Sisterhood!”

That’s the deal that the Great Society struck with low-income black women in the 1970s. The result: the marginalization of black men, an explosion of single-parent households, and the institutionalization of a near-permanent under-class.

Forty years ago, social scientists devised a clever euphemism to sum up the effects of a government program that picks taxpayers’ wallets, weakens the family, and turns women into wards of the state: the feminization of poverty.

Federal Judge Gives the Go-ahead for Disciplinary Measures Against Student Suing False Accuser

W.F. Price · 12 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Joshua Vaughan, a student at Vermont Law School, had a sexual encounter with a woman he met at a bar, and some months later she decided to complain about it for one reason or the other. Evidently, she went to school ambassadors, telling them about the incident, but then said she didn't want to pursue it. Ambassadors approached "diversity dean" Shirley Jefferson, who decided that despite the woman's reluctance to go forward she'd put the burn on Mr. Vaughan anyway.

After Vaughan was eventually cleared by an internal code of conduct panel, he decided to seek redress for the trouble and stress he'd been put through, and is currently suing his accuser, the school, and diversity dean Shirley Jefferson:

> In his suit, Vaughan asserts a defamation claim against the law student, a breach of contract claim against the law school, and claims of negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligent infliction of emotional distress and willful and wanton conduct against these two defendants and Jefferson.

Judge William Sessions III, expressing concern about the details going public, pressured the parties to the lawsuit to reconsider going through with it, and in an apparent move to encourage them to do so said that the school was free to seek disciplinary measures against Vaughan for retaliation.

Sessions, nervous about the implications of the suit, said:

> I would advise the parties to think seriously about resolving this case relatively quickly. This kind of case can go on a long time and hurt a lot of people."

It appears that feminist excesses have begun to worry even judges sitting on the federal bench. They can't be too optimistic about the pending consequences of decades of abuse of the law and the Constitution under the guise of white knighting.

Free Speech and the Men's Rights Movement

ramzpaul · 12 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Background:

The other day the Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) forum on ProBoards was deleted without explanation. I started the MGTOW forum two years ago when a small forum called Don't Get Married was suddenly shut down by the administrator. What started two years ago as a relatively small forum with a handful of posters quickly grew into a forum that averaged over 1,000 unique visitors per day. During peak periods we eclipsed 10,000 unique visitors in a day.

In hindsight, the rapid growth of the forum was a mixed blessing. The blessing was that the forum provided a resource and an outlet for thousands of men (and women) to discuss Men's Issues without being under the thumb of the politically correct orthodoxy. As a supporter ofliberty, I allowed all points of views to be freely expressed. And such a free environment tends to naturally attract people who are otherwise denied a voice.

The curse of such popularity is that there are many people who believe they are on a mission from God (or Goddess) to weed out and suppress dissenting opinions that dare to stray from the politically correct talking points. While I personally find many opinions to be odious, I have never made an effort to silence or censor speech. I have discovered a fool-proof strategy to cope with web sites and books that I find objectionable – I ignore them.

However, the Cultural Marxists who are zealots of the religion of political correctness look for heresy with a zeal that would make an interrogator during the Medieval Spanish Inquisition blush. The self-proclaimed champions of Tolerance have zero tolerance for any view that differs from orthodoxy. Instead of simply ignoring web sites or books that they find objectionable, they believe that they are on a mission from God (or maybe Trotsky) to purge any heresy.

The Witch Hunters (The Boobz)

There are even some keepers of the Holy Politically Correct faith that spend their day scouring Men's Rights web sites and forums looking for naughty thoughts. These modern and empowered schoolmarms diligently search the web for any comments that they consider to be "Hate." And their definition "hate" is intentionally vague. It is similar to the old Soviet definition of "Counter Revolutionary." No one in the Soviet Union was quite sure what constituted "Counter revolutionary" activity, but everyone knew that BAD things happened once you were accused of such a nebulous crime. Or think of being called a "witch" in Medieval Spain and you will get the idea.

What further confuses the matter is that Men's sites tend to allow open debate, whereas feminist sites demand conformance to a rigid ideology. Allowing free expression means that some people will post whacky ideas that in no way reflect the opinion of the general forum. However, the self-appointed schoolmarms will search for such a remark and wave it as an example of how it reflects the opinion of an otherwise large and diverse movement.

Of course, there is nothing to prevent these schoolmarms from creating fake IDs on a Men's Rights forum and post crazy things. Then, theoretically, these same schoolmarms could point to such a post as an example of "hate" and "misogyny" of the Men's Rights movement. I suppose they could even complain to the web hosting provider using their own comment as an example of why a forum should be purged. But given that these champions of Tolerance and Diversity are ethical people, I am sure that would never happen in the real world. But it is an interesting theoretical possibility.

The Illusion of Free Speech

We all know that Free Speech is a key Amendment of the Constitution (it is the first one) and it defines America. America is a free country that believes in Liberty. We are all taught that as schoolchildren and it is reinforced in the media. We are a FREE country – anyone can speak their mind freely. That is what makes America great.

Well, sort of. Free Speech only applies to restricting the government. Private businesses are under no obligation to provide you Free Speech. And if you support liberty this makes sense. For example, if you are a publisher of Christian books, you should not be forced to also publish books supporting atheism. This is the ideal.

Such a Free Speech theory works great in a free country in which the government does not interfere in business or private matters. The problem is that America is no longer such a country. The government is heavily involved with regulation and control of private corporations. A corporation faces thousands of regulations and tax codes. Many times these regulations conflict so that it is literally impossible to keep in compliance. As an example, in the 1980s I knew a lady who worked with severely retarded adults in a group home. One government regulation specified that the hot water heater had to be set below 125F for safety. Another government agency specified that the hot water temperature had to be maintained at 130F to properly sanitize the dishes. No matter what they did, the business was out of compliance.

Of course the government is a huge and inefficient behemoth that rarely enforces all the regulations. However, if you are a private business that decides not to play ball with the government, you will discover that the government will quickly start to show an interest in auditing your business for compliance. And, no, that fact that some regulations might conflict is no excuse. In the hot water example, you will be expected to maintain the temperature at 130 degrees and also keep the temperature under 125 degrees at the same time. Logic and reality are not excuses under the law.

This control of business is how governments are able to politicize and control private businesses. Most business would have no desire to implement diversity (read affirmative action) if they had a choice. Most business would prefer to hire the best person without regard to sex or race. And theoretically, under the law, businesses are not required to implement diversity programs. But the reality is that those businesses who don't play ball will soon find themselves in constant trouble with the government. I suppose they could spend years and millions of dollars fighting the government in court, but that does not usually end well (just ask Microsoft). So most private businesses follow the path of least resistance and do the politically correct thing.

So in terms of Free Speech and the Men's Rights movement, while there is no LAW that prohibits objectionable speech, the government can lean heavily on private businesses (such as ProBoards) in order for them to do the "right thing." This is how the government bypasses the First Amendment in modern terms.

I am Spartacus

There was a great scene in the movie Spartacus in which the Romans in an attempt to kill the leadership of a slave rebellion demanded that the captured slaves reveal who was Spartacus. Just as Spartacus was about to reveal his identity another slave jumped up and claimed to be Spartacus. Then another. And soon every slave was claiming to be Spartacus. This made it impossible for the Romans to identify the leadership. There was no single leader that could be identified.

In a similar fashion the Men's Rights movement is not composed of one leader. We are not rigid and monolithic. Within 48 hours of the MGTOW forum being censored, a new MGTOW forum was up and running. This was done without my initiative or coordination. We are a decentralized movement that cannot be stopped by traditional means. Sure, our opponents can purge a web site or intimidate an individual, but that only recruits more men to become active in the struggle. The Witch Hunters are playing a giant game of Whack the Mole. Once they smash down one web site, five more pop up. They are fighting a losing battle and they know it.

Sites such as Citizen Renegade (the most subversive site on the net for reasons that are not always apparent) and The Spearhead are eclipsing the "mainstream" sites in popularity. And the more the schoolmarms and the witch hunters attempt to silence our message, the stronger and more popular we become. Try as they may, the truth is hard to censor. So be optimistic. Victory will be ours.

How Do We Keep Our Values in a War Zone?

By Royce Geist

Last night while having a conversation with one of my older brother's friends(white male, late 20's, lives in a small apartment, and has moved from relationship to relationship) the topic of feminism came up and I started to talk about how its crumbling nations from the core due to the reason the main bread winners and producers of structure in those said nations have no value to fight for anymore. He called me alarmist and said that his life really wasn't that bad so I should just relax.

He's happy looking forward to getting one of the new smartphones soon. We talked about how all the laws are slanted against men and the fact that you can have all of your earnings and children stripped away for any reason whatsoever and be chained in a type of financial slavery. His response? Have you ever heard of a guy sitting down thinking "hey I don't know if I should get married and have kids when one day this broad might take all my stuff and children away." I laughed and said I do still think about it.

It's funny how different people's opinions can be; some are satisfied with PC games and smart phones, others actually want to create a family and have their genes live on especially since they've had to work this hard to stay alive for this long.

There was a recent article that I read containing a study that shows (like there was really the need for a study for it) how younger people would rather choose virtual lives or just being on the pc compared to real life because 'they can click close as soon as something becomes un-fun." That isn't just a problem for the new generations — just look at how many adults play World of Warcraft and in turn completely neglect their real world duties when the need to 'raid' arises.

Towards the end of the conversation after talking about other social issues my friend decided that I was being alarmist once again and that life really wasn't that bad, I kept thinking about how I bet that phrase would change had any of the plagues that have hurt other people happened to him, such as a false rape accusation, no fault divorce, loss of children, etc.

I think what's alarming is that most people, just because they haven't had it personally happen to them or even a friend of a friend, see no need to look into these matters for more than a moment. It's almost like the old saying 'If you don't say something when they start coming for your neighbors who will say anything when they come for you?'

They go on with their daily lives satisfied with virtual lives, smart phone advancements and heavy drinking, none of which are any value to me. I want the white picket fence, the small family, the loving wife that I don't feel like I need to look to a 'gaming' manual every 5 seconds to keep around. I may be out of my league here being young but really as much as I try to stay in the now, thoughts of the future are always consuming me. There are so many very exciting things on the horizon but so many terrifying realities that are seemingly swept under the rug with most people that it drives me nuts.

I just hope that soon with the more widespread access to information out there on the internet, people start deciding it's time to face these problems and realize that we are in fact in a war zone. Life is not easy, it is an uphill battle and most people as far as I can see would just be happier to lay at the bottom of the hill in the story of Sisyphus, allowing the boulder to lay atop them, so long as they can play tower defense games on their smartphone, rather than struggle to the top. However, as we are humans and not myth, I see no reason why one day we wouldn't be able to place the boulder on top the hill holding it stable.

The only question is, in the microwave generation do any of us have the patience to achieve such a daunting task?

Just in Time for Valentine's Day, Sour Grapes

W.F. Price · 13 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The LA Times just published "Day of the lout," an editorial in the entertainment section that is an unveiled rant against men — young men in particular.

The article focuses almost entirely on criticizing young men.

> If you've seen a beer commercial in the last two years — and how can you avoid them? — you know the type. He's a twenty- or thirtysomething, sort of a slacker, with a beautiful and adoring girlfriend who just can't seem to pry his attention away from his suds. She expresses ardor, he looks ardently at his mug or can of beer. She wants to talk romance, he wants to talk anything but. She gets exasperated, he snuggles obliviously with his beer as she departs in a huff.
>
> Louts have few needs and no shackles. Above all, louts may ogle women and snicker about them, but women are pointedly never their top priority. At most, women are objects, just like in the old days. That's the revenge part. Louts don't have to make any concessions to women. Louts barely need women. Just give a lout a Bud and his buds and he's happy.
> Of course, embedded in loutishness is the idea that the lout is irresistible to women even as he disdains them — in fact, because he disdains them. In this view, women, who have allegedly been overpampered for the last few decades, just love louts, even when they pretend they don't. As this male fantasy goes, men are so cute when they act like galoots. So not only does he not have to make concessions to women, he can do or say whatever he wants without any consequences because in lout culture insensitivity is the new sensitivity.

The bitterness just shines right through, doesn't it? I have to admit that I find the piece amusing, because while it has been annoying to deal with the nyah nyah taunting from feminists about how lousy men are for the last twenty-odd years, the tone has changed from smug to something approaching "alarmed."

Here, he gets into analysis:

> More, young men are always searching for a means to assert themselves, and loutishness is not only a form of revenge, it is a form of empowerment — a way for twenty- and thirtysomethings to show that they aren't going to allow themselves to be subjugated as many of them, no doubt, feel their fathers were under all that feminist lashing.

Finally, he ends with some shaming language, and a dare to "man-up":

> So much of it is gleefully wallowing in irresponsibility, in a lack of maturity, in self-gratification and a general indifference to other people. This may be the real male nirvana, and it suggests that the ubiquitous culture of loutishness speaks to something less obvious and perhaps more interesting than anti-feminism. It speaks to a widespread desire not to have to be men at all.
> What do women want? Sigmund Freud famously asked. Well, we thought we always knew what men wanted, but it turns out we may have been wrong. Men don't want sex. In a world of unrelenting pressures and of threatening sexual equality, men just want to be boys. Or at least that's the way it looks judging by the new masculinity of loutishness … which, it turns out, really isn't masculinity at all.

Hear that guys? By embracing freedom and shunning the feminist line, you are rejecting masculinity (as defined by an obvious feminist). This is just too rich — it's a wonderful Valentine's Day gift for single men who might have thought they were missing out on something.

I am really coming to appreciate Valentine's Day — it has become one of those "count your blessings" days for men who have taken the red pill.

A Valentine's Day Legend

Hawaiian Libertarian · 14 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A Satirical Fisking of a Legend

> The Valentine's Day started in the time of the Roman Empire. In ancient Rome, February 14th was a holiday to honor Juno. Juno was the Queen of the Roman Gods and Goddesses. The Romans also knew her as the Goddess of women and marriage. The following day, February 15th, began the Feast of Lupercalia.

Juno was Jupiter's wife. She was beautiful, emotionally unstable, jealous, narcissistic and vain. But Jupiter was the Alpha of all alphas. He was the top God. Therefore, she stayed with him despite his many, many affairs with younger, tighter and hotter ladies – both mortals and immortals alike. Hypergamy's a bitch when you're already the wife of the apex alpha. You cannot marry up any higher than the God of Gods…so you deal with being the Queen of his harem.

> The lives of young boys and girls were strictly separate. However, one of the customs of the young people was name drawing. On the eve of the festival of Lupercalia, the names of Roman girls were written on slips of paper and placed into jars. Each young man would draw a girl's name from the jar and would then be partners for the duration of the festival with the girl whom he chose. Sometimes the pairing of the children lasted an entire year, and often, they would fall in love and would later marry.

An ancient, pagan version of spin the bottle? Cool.

> Under the rule of Emperor Claudius II Rome was involved in many bloody and unpopular campaigns. Claudius the Cruel was having a difficult time getting soldiers to join his military leagues. He believed that the reason was that roman men did not want to leave their loves or families. As a result, Claudius cancelled all marriages and engagements in Rome.

Claudius was the first Feminist to SMASH PATRIARCHY!

> The good Saint Valentine was a priest at Rome in the days of Claudius II. He and Saint Marius aided the Christian martyrs and secretly married couples…

You'd think the women of Pagan Rome would have rejoiced that there Emperor abolished the harsh enslavement of Hetero-normative, Patriarchal Marriage!?! But no…they still wanted to get married in secret anyway! Why were young Roman ladies so eager to subject themselves to the slavery of male privilege…even when it was against the law? Women's studies professors still can't figure out how to explain that one…

> …and for this kind deed Saint Valentine was apprehended and dragged before the Prefect of Rome, who condemned him to be beaten to death with clubs and to have his head cut off.

It could have been worse. He could have been no-fault divorced-ed and enslaved to a lifetime of supporting his ex-wife for alimony and child support while she got to bang Gladiators in what was once his house and in his former bed…

> He suffered martyrdom on the 14th day of February, about the year 270. At that time it was the custom in Rome, a very ancient custom, indeed, to celebrate in the month of February the Lupercalia, feasts in honour of a heathen god. On these occasions, amidst a variety of pagan ceremonies, the names of young women were placed in a box, from which they were drawn by the men as chance directed.
> The pastors of the early Christian Church in Rome endeavored to do away with the pagan element in these feasts by substituting the names of Saints for those of maidens. And as the Lupercalia began about the middle of February, the pastors appear to have chosen Saint Valentine's Day for the celebration of this new feast. So it seems that the custom of young men choosing maidens for valentines, or saints as patrons for the coming year, arose in this way.

Somehow that custom got changed…could you imagine those ancient Romans men courting a maiden with the mentality of a modern day feminist-minded shrike? Why that young man had better take his maiden of choice to the most expensive feast in town, and he better shower her with gifts! Even if he does not have any money, he could still sign up for six months of indentured servitude so he can get her those gifts on credit! He'd better get her something…or she will make life for him utterly miserable with her nagging and complaining, and she'll refuse to have sex with him to boot!

Perhaps those ancient Roman men stuck with such women on this day could simply pick a new name from the box, and NEXT the nagging entitlement princess.

Hmmm…perhaps there is something of ancient legends that can still teach us relevant lessons today.

Happy Valentines Day.

As it happens...

It's V-Day, and countless little tragedies are playing out. Be grateful, single men, for we are spared the worst of it. For us, it is a day of Thanksgiving — we are those in grace today.

I saw this comment on our Eat Pray Love article just about as it came up, and I thought we all ought to reflect on it.

This is reality. This is what happens:

I realize this a really late post, but I couldn't help it given my current situation.

I'm not afraid to say that I'm disgusted and deeply offended by the message and the victimization of the ex-husband. I can actually relate very much to what happened to him.

I think I saw a few pieces of this movie when my wife rented it or something, but it seemed terrible so I fell asleep or found something I enjoyed more to do with my time. However, looking back now I can't believe the impact this movie has had on my wife.

We have two wonderful little boys and have been together for eight years, married for two of those now. Recently, she revealed that she didn't feel the same way she used to feel about me anymore (i.e. "We've grown apart"). To me, this came completely out of the blue. I was happy and things were just normal and routine. I thought she was at least somewhat happy as well.

While she hasn't stated that she wants a divorce as of yet, it certainly doesn't feel very far off. She basically hit me with the "It's not you, it's me" line. She said that she needed to find herself and love herself before she could ever truly love someone else. Now she wants time and space. She recommended that I watch this movie to better understand where she is coming from.

I'm shocked. I'm devastated. I'm scared to death. The family I worked so hard to build and dreamed would always be together is now crumbling around me. And I don't think there's a thing I can do about it.

Is there no talking any sense into her? Why is it that if the rolls were reversed I would be a loser, a bum, and a deadbeat dad; yet she will be celebrated as "empowered" and "seeking enlightenment"?

I feel so bad for the ex-husband in the movie/novel. I know how bad it hurts. But they didn't even have small children in "Eat Pray Love" though, right? That complicates the situation so much more and just really adds to the pain tremendously.

Whatever happened to working things out? What about the vows? "Through thick and thin?" "Til death do us part"?

-Mr. Bill

Rejoice, single men, but reserve a sympathetic thought for those afflicted by marriage today. They are our brothers, and even the beasts of burden deserve better than their fate.

Remember: There but for the grace of God…

Fat Acceptance — Where Feminists and Gay Men Part Ways

W.F. Price · 14 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In response to columns by gay sex writer Dan Savage in which he pointedly criticizes obesity, Seattle writer and gourmande Lindy West wrote an article titled "Hello, I Am Fat." Lindy goes on to whine about how hurtful it is when people like Savage characterize obesity as unsightly, saying that "shame is a tool of oppression," diets don't work, etc.

Ms. West's column, followed by the inevitable irresponsible comments about how beautiful she is, is a pretty standard example of denial and defense of her food addiction. Alcoholics and other addicts will behave similarly when cornered or called out. Overcoming an addiction can be a daunting task, so it's no wonder people lash out when faced with the frightening prospect of having to give up a crutch. In some ways a food addiction may be one of the most difficult of all, because you can't just give up eating forever, as you can with booze, junk or cigarettes, so the temptation is always going to be there every day. Imagine telling a hardcore alcoholic that he can't get buzzed any longer, but must take sips of booze throughout the day for the rest of his life.

Lindy West's denial in action:

> This is my body. It is MINE. I am not ashamed of it in any way. In fact, I love everything about it. Men find it attractive. Clothes look awesome on it. My brain rides around in it all day and comes up with funny jokes. Also, I don't have to justify its awesomeness/attractiveness/healthiness/usefulness to anyone, because it is MINE. Not yours.

Rather than call obesity what it is – the result of an eating disorder – feminists have embraced "fat acceptance" as a means of ignoring the real problems it causes. This makes it easier for the obese to deny any responsibility for the problem, and in fact to deny that there is a problem at all. One might ask why feminists in particular, and why this particular issue? Well, the reason feminists care so much is that food addiction has a consequence that goes beyond the "mere" health problems — it makes women sexually unappealing to men. A woman can smoke cigarettes, drink martinis and even snort coke and still be desirable to many men. But once she starts to look like a marine mammal, she's going to find suitors to be rare indeed. Because feminism is so concerned with leveraging female sexuality, this presents a conundrum. So how do they deal with it? In the usual manner, of course: by blaming men for not "accepting" them and demanding that men make concessions. "Fat acceptance" is an almost entirely female movement. Fat men – and there are plenty – do not benefit much from these delusions. Nor do they go to anywhere near the lengths women do to make excuses for it.

Time and again throughout my life I've heard fat women say that they don't eat more than ordinary people. If you were to take what they say at face value, you'd think they were on a constant diet of rice cakes and diet soda. But we all know better. My first high school job was at an Italian bakery, and in addition to all the olive oil, bread, pasta and such we sold pastries. Donuts, to be precise. Every weekday morning at about 10AM, when the local businesses had a coffee break, a herd of fat women would come rumbling in and line up at the counter to bark orders at me like angry walruses as I frantically boxed and bagged donuts. Some would make excuses such as "I need two dozen donuts for all my coworkers," but for the most part they'd stand there and harangue me until they got their sack of goodies. Fat people may be jolly much of the time, but when it comes to food they sure don't mess around.

Gay men, who have a tendency to be very aesthetically aware, have very little use for fat acceptance. Although gay men can leverage their sexuality, they can't pull the same sympathy con that women do. Other gay men simply won't fall for it to nearly the extent that straight men do where women are involved. For these reasons, fat acceptance is never going to be popular or effective for gay men. Savage, as one of the most popular representatives of gay men in America, is simply calling it as he sees it. His erstwhile feminist allies, however, are outraged by his common sense approach.

Here are a couple comments from feminist blogs:

> Womanist Musings:
> Over time I have come to loathe Dan Savage for his racist, ableist, fat phobic and sexist language. Though Savage is oppressed as a gay man, he seems to forget that he has plenty of privilege. Not only is he White and male, he is also able bodied and cis gendered, has class privilege, western privilege, thin privilege, etc and etc. For all of the oppression Dan Savage faces as a gay man, he certainly exists with enough power to make the lives of others a living hell. There seems to be this need for marginalized bodies to find someone else to oppress, in an effort to avoid becoming the bottom tier of the social hierarchy.
> Even though Fillyjonk posted about it here and I got involved in comments, I deliberately did not post about the last asshole thing Dan Savage said about fat people, because dude is obviously way too invested in defending his right to hate teh fattiez, and at this point, far be it from me to try to take that away from him. For some reason, he really, really seems to need it. I guess maybe that's the compulsive self-comforting behavior he found to replace eating (see below). Poor bunny.

Pretty angry, these feminists. Not much solidarity with a gay man — actually looks like the same language they usually reserve for us here at The Spearhead. Although I'm not sure we can draw conclusions from these little outbursts, it does at least demonstrate the fragility of the coalition built around left feminism. Their alliance with ethnic minorities and gay men is probably a lot more tenuous than most people might assume. All that's held it together, really, is that they've been able to extort goodies from the system set up long ago by straight white men, but that system is breaking down.

This is something we have to keep in mind: there is no consensus amongst the new left that arose in the wake of the West's sexual revolution — it's all about the loot, and the loot's running out. I expect to see the left begin to fracture along its fault lines of race, sex and class as people realize there's nothing left in it for them. This isn't to say the traditional right is the answer; they've long since been discredited and their efforts are largely useless or outright damaging to our interests. But the political reality is shifting, and I think it will be in our favor.

Finally, I'm going to end with a little excerpt from one of Lindy West's restaurant reviews:

> Now, either I'm totally good at being blind or OH MY FUCKING GOD IT WAS SO OBVIOUS. First of all, let me say that both burgers were excellent. Nothing wrong with relatively well-off suburban cows. Painted Hills, A+. HOWEVER. The Wagyu burger was a revelation. I mean literally like the book of Revelation, like eight flaming man-goats descended on fiery Segways and beat me in the face with their righteous swords of deliciousness.
>
> The Wagyu patty was soft without being insubstantial, drippier, darker, and beefier than its counterpart. The Wagyu burger made you forget that ketchup exists. Seriously, it was so good. If my mother were a cow, I would still eat this hamburger. If I were a hamburger, I would eat this hamburger. If I were this hamburger, I would eat myself.
> Oh, and also, aside from the chocolate milk shake (AWESOME, even though it was technically a black-and-white, which I usually do NOT condone), everything else was kind of legit gross. Onion rings ($4) were battered so thickly they resembled Krispy Kreme doughnuts with a fryer-fat glaze of visible grease. And a small Cobb salad ($5)—despite a promising abundance of hard-boiled egg—was weirdly both sweet and bitter, with a dressing reminiscent of frozen Minute Maid lemonade concentrate. We picked out the bacon and left the rest. But you know what? Guess how much I cared? Zero. Zero much. I am smitten with another.

Mad Men Writer Tells The Plain Truth to Women Looking to Get Married

W.F. Price · 15 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In an astonishing deviation from the standard popular discourse on marriage, TV writer Tracy McMillan (Mad Men, United States of Tara) spells out exactly why so many women are unlucky in love. The reasons she enumerates are quite harsh, but maybe a dose of bitter medicine is just what American women need these days.

Here's the list:

1. You're a Bitch.

2. You're Shallow.

3. You're a Slut.

4. You're a Liar.

5. You're Selfish.

6. You're Not Good Enough.

Of course, she goes to some length to explain these terms in a fairly sympathetic manner, but there's really not much dancing around the issue. Ms. McMillan is one of those remarkable women with a talent for dishing out the straight dope.

For example, under "You're Shallow," she takes women to task for lacking in character:

> When it comes to choosing a husband, only one thing really, truly matters: character. So it stands to reason that a man's character should be at the top of the list of things you are looking for, right?
> Instead, you are looking for someone tall. Or rich. Or someone who knows what an Eames chair is. Unfortunately, this is not the thinking of a wife. This is the thinking of a teenaged girl. And men of character do not want to marry teenaged girls. Because teenage girls are never happy. And they never feel like cooking, either.

Ouch!

Her article is worth a full read, so I'm not going to give too much away, but she hits on some of our points here at The Spearhead so closely I've got to wonder whether people are actually starting to catch on.

The following passage, for example, echoes the theme of my "Stop Looking for a Wife" post from last fall so closely it's uncanny:

> Because ultimately, marriage is not about getting something — it's about giving it. Strangely, men understand this more than we do. Probably because for them marriage involves sacrificing their most treasured possession — a free-agent penis — and for us, it's the culmination of a princess fantasy so universal, it built Disneyland.

I've got to give Ms. McMillan credit for saying it in a manner and venue that will actually catch women's attention. Honestly, I can't say I've seen a woman put it in plainer English in my life.

Sarah Palin Needs to Rein in Her Harsh Feminist Rhetoric

careyroberts · 15 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I applaud Sarah Palin's passion, her adroit sense of humor, and her you-go-girl! gumption. But the more I learn about Sarah Palin, the more I become perplexed by her over-heated gender-bending rhetoric.

I believe we can all agree that men and women should have equal opportunities. But let's not confuse equal opportunities with identical outcomes. Just because a woman has the same right to an education and a decent job, doesn't mean she will pursue the identical career path, toil as long, or work as many years as a man.

Men and women have differing proclivities and interests — most Americans understand this fact. But then there is the small band of disaffected feminists who adamantly insist any and all social differences are the product of gender discrimination.

So where does the former vice-presidential candidate stand on all of this?

Let's take the gender wage gap. Dozens of studies show that when the relevant factors are taken into account – training, experience, hours worked, and so forth – any salary difference is smaller than a twinkle in Nancy Pelosi's eye.

But during the 2008 presidential campaign, Palin used the myth to skewer her Democratic opponent. Ignoring the fact that most of the top-level staffers in Obama's former senate office were male, she made this charge: "Out on the stump he talks a good game about equal pay for equal work, but according to the Senate payroll records, women on his own staff get just 83 cents for every dollar that the men get."

Ratcheting up women's sense of resentment, Palin then asked, "Does he think that the women aren't working as hard? Does he think they are 17% less productive?"

Pretty harsh, Mrs. Palin.

Another feminist cause célèbre is the "glass ceiling," the notion that bearded patriarchs are conspiring to keep working women in their place. But there is no more impressive story of our generation than the rapidity with which women have come through the ranks to reach the very top. As Alaska's first female governor, Sarah Palin knows this triumph well.

But the identity politics-embracing Sarah Palin had this to say during her campaign: "In the long history of our country, 74 people have held the position of President or Vice-President. And why have the major parties given Americans only two chances to even consider a woman for either office?"

No, Mrs. Palin you've got it all wrong. Political parties don't "give" a person the chance to run for office. The potential candidate must network, organize, and fund-raise like the dickens. And once they get elected, they don't resign halfway through their term of office.

Palin also presents herself as an advocate of a slimmed down government. But when she speaks to a female audience, her message strikes a different note.

Regarding Title IX, the federal policy that imposes rigid gender quotas on college athletics, Palin has repeatedly come out in favor of this male-disadvantaging hold-over from the Clinton Administration.

Palin has called for more childcare services, presumably at taxpayer expense, as well as "reforms in labor laws that allow greater flexibility in the workplace." Of course this would mean more regulations from the Department of Labor.

But most eyeball-rolling is this Palinism: "The working women of this country, those who work inside the home and outside of the home, they're overlooked by politicians in Washington."

Women overlooked? PULLEEEEAAASE.

From the Sheppard-Townsend Act of 1921 that established a national network of maternal-child health programs, to the Social Security Act for threadbare widows, Medicare and Medicare, Title IX, the Violence Against Women Act, Women's Educational Equity Act of 2001, five separate offices of women's health at the Department of Health and Human Services – the list goes on.

Sarah Palin's back-door connections to the radical National Organization for Women are also well-known. On several occasions, leaders of N.O.W. chapters have made public appearances with Palin. And one credible report suggests Palin supporters may have swung the outcome for the closely fought N.O.W. presidency in 2009: http://www.salon.com/life/broadsheet/feature/2009/06/22/terry_oneill

Not surprisingly, a growing chorus of commentators is taking issue with Palin's ambitions to inherit the iconic mantle of Ronald Reagan.

Commentator Charles Krauthammer views Palin as "rather weak," and former White House adviser Karl Rove doubts she has the "gravitas" for the "most demanding job in the world,"

Writer Peggy Noonan derides Palin as a "nincompoop." And former Palin aide Nicolle Wallace let it be known her former boss "has very obvious deficiencies that will reveal themselves as the nominating contest gets closer."

But true to form, Sarah "Barracuda" Palin turns it around, accusing her critics of sexism.

I never thought it was fair that a person with an honest difference of opinion with Sarah Palin could be reflexively accused of gender bias. But this is how the political discourse operates these days.

CBS Reporter Lara Logan Beaten, Gang-Raped in Egypt Protests

W.F. Price · 16 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As pointed out in the case of Jayme Biendl, the female prison guard who was attacked and strangled by a rapist while working at the Monroe State Correctional Facility, ignoring reality has consequences. Feminists and their supporters, however, continue to turn a blind eye, because they are so deeply emotionally (and sometimes financially) invested in the idea that human nature can be altered to suit our contemporary sense of propriety, which is a moving target.

There is perhaps no place in which the ugly side of humanity is more nakedly displayed than in a mob, yet Logan and her superiors seemed to think that it would be an acceptable risk for her to cover the chaotic revolution in Cairo. I'm not sure what kind of world these people live in, but even I would know that a blonde, Western woman in an Arab country really shouldn't be out on the street at night. Add an angry mob, and, well… What the hell did they expect?

I'm sure people will try to find some angle to divert attention from the fateful decision to send Lara Logan out into the mob, perhaps by blaming Arabs, Islam, or even anger at the West. But it happens here, too. In Seattle, during the Mardi Gras riot of 2001, essentially the same thing happened to a woman who got caught up in an out-of-control mob. I'm afraid Mrs. Logan got it worse, however — it took a platoon of Egyptian soldiers to rescue her from the attack. She's lucky she survived. She took the first flight home and is currently in the hospital.

What I wonder is how feminists can square their declared desire to eliminate violence against women with their demands that women be placed in situations where they will inevitably get hurt. There are many things – and people – in this world that are beyond our control. None of those men in Egypt who attacked Lara Logan will ever face an American police officer or judge. In all likelihood, none will ever even be named.

So I suppose the question is: Do feminists want women to be safe and secure at all times, or do they want women to be encouraged to take risks that will inevitably get some of them hurt very badly? You just can't have it both ways.

Just as US Prepares to Expand Role of Women in Military, Lawsuit Erupts

W.F. Price · 16 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

For some reason, many Americans now seem to have the impression that the US military should be a progressive, equalist institution, dedicated to providing opportunities for all. This is probably the result of the Cold War, which created the need for a huge, sophisticated military that never ended up using its full capability. It seems that people now think it's just another institution to be plundered, like the government, public schools, etc. In fact, they must have this impression, because for all of history the job of the military has been to win by being unfair, and it's just absurd to think that a military has any real job other than defeating enemies in war.

But leave it to the feminists to leave no stone unturned in their quest for privileges, cushy jobs, and outright payoffs. Naturally, they have long been pushing for equality in the military, which includes shifting standards so that women can call themselves soldiers, and recently they have called for women to play a part in combat. Women have traditionally been banned from combat in conventional armed forces not only because of their marked physical inferiority where combat is concerned, but because they tend to shift the focus from the task at hand. Men are easily distracted from the messy business of killing people and destroying things by female company, because when it comes down to it almost all of us would rather be in bed with a woman than be in an enemy's gunsights. Putting women on the front lines is such an obviously bad idea that it's quite amazing that people have the chutzpah to suggest it.

But there are other reasons to keep women out of the military, and one of them just became apparent on Tuesday when a lawsuit was filed against Defense Secretary Robert Gates and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for turning a "blind eye" to sexual assault of women on active duty. As argued here before, if you put women in theater in close proximity with soldiers, there will be incidents. Some will be rapes, some false accusations, and some somewhere in between. I can't imagine any other internal issue having a more serious negative effect on morale, which would necessarily diminish combat effectiveness. When sexual disputes arise within the ranks, our armed forces will be less efficient and weaker, and they are an inevitable consequence of mixing men and women in theater.

But to feminists this doesn't matter, because they don't actually see the military as being an instrument of war, but as yet another structure men built to provide for women. If the higher ups don't take a stand immediately, they will simply leverage our military into nothing but another emasculated institution that gives them perks at taxpayer expense. Their tool of coercion, naturally, will be the Democratic Party. When they make the issue about "rape," the Republican Party will rush in to white knight. This is the formula that the feminists have been using with smashing success for some 50 years (since the Civil Rights Bill) — play the equalists on one side and the white knight conservatives on the other.

It's time some men stood up to that game and said enough is enough. It's time to abandon talk of putting women in combat, and time to stop calling them soldiers at all. No more indulging them by giving them the same ranks and commands. If the military needs women working desk jobs at Bagram that's fine — give them their desk jobs as part of a women's auxiliary corps. If they need women in Muslim countries to engage Muslim women, then let them do so as women, not soldiers; I think they'll have better luck and find more sympathy if they aren't tramping around in combat boots and body armor with an M-16.

And, above all, don't let them fraternize with the troops on base. As this lawsuit demonstrates, it's just going to cause trouble for everyone.

Sometimes I wonder whether this GI Jane thing isn't just some hipster fantasy gone out of control. It's really getting ridiculous, and making our nation look more and more like a joke every day.

In Stalinist Academic Climate, Candid Thoughts Prompt Career Liquidation

W.F. Price · 17 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Nir Rosen, journalist and NYU fellow, tweeted some thoughts on the orgy of sympathy Lara Logan received for placing herself smack dab in the middle of a mob of revolutionary Arab men. Rosen's skepticism about how much sympathy she deserved came from an angle I hadn't initially considered when I questioned CBS's and Ms. Logan's judgment in aggressively inserting herself in the middle of a volatile situation.

It turns out that Logan was kind of a war junkie, and has long made herself a fixture in Iraq and Afghanistan, where she'd cruise around on base in skimpy clothing aggressively displaying her assets to troops, even prompting one American soldier to say "I feel sorry for your husband." In fact, Logan liked the boys on base so much that despite being married herself, she got pregnant by a married contractor in Baghdad while simultaneously carrying on with another man, prompting an embarrassing altercation. She was often "embedded," which is a practice in which journalists are put in controlled situations with troops that are mutually beneficial to both military PR and major news networks. Logan, for her part, added an entirely novel nuance to the term. Perhaps being accustomed to being surrounded by a phalanx of heavily armed American and British troops gave her the false sense of security that led to her unfortunate decision to waltz into the middle of a mob in Cairo.

Rosen, evidently thinking "what goes around comes around" pointed to her role as a cheerleader for wars in Muslim lands, which should further raise eyebrows about her up close and personal coverage of a revolution in a Muslim country. When you add everything up, it certainly looks as though Logan was tempting fate. Wouldn't surprise me if someone in the mob actually knew who she was (word gets around fast on the street), which could go a considerable way toward explaining the assault. Actually, it's looking more and more like she was deliberately singled out and attacked for political reasons.

Unfortunately for Rosen, he made the mistake of violating a PC taboo, and was promptly sacrificed to the goddess:

> From Karen J. Greenberg, Executive Director, Center on Law and Security
> Nir Rosen is always provocative, but he crossed the line yesterday with his comments about Lara Logan. I am deeply distressed by what he wrote about Ms. Logan and strongly denounce his comments. They were cruel and insensitive and completely unacceptable. Mr. Rosen tells me that he misunderstood the severity of the attack on her in Cairo. He has apologized, withdrawn his remarks, and submitted his resignation as a fellow, which I have accepted. However, this in no way compensates for the harm his comments have inflicted. We are all horrified by what happened to Ms. Logan, and our thoughts are with her during this difficult time.

Rosen is a straight-up liberal with politics that are probably considerably to the left of most of our readers, but even that couldn't save him when he triggered the feminist/white knight alliance we are all so familiar with.

You'd think that if the feminists and social conservatives really cared about Lara Logan's safety and sexual integrity, they'd be ignoring Nir Rosen and calling for the head of the CBS executive stupid enough to allow her to cover the revolution. Whoever made that choice even went to far as to send her back after she'd already been detained and deported, probably to prevent just such an incident.

But no, one man who made an "insensitive" remark takes the fall, while those who actually bear a considerable part of the responsibility for the incident remain blameless. We can only take this as evidence that they don't really care about what effect their decisions and policies have in the real world. Whether it means destroying families and handicapping children by forcing fathers out of their lives or putting women in situations where they will be hurt, what comes first is the ideology that undergirds a system that keeps them in power and in the money.

If they keep this up, eventually there will be so many victims that they too may see themselves thrown out just like

Egypt's old guard.

Update: Nir Rosen is now groveling like a whipped dog before his masters. It is embarrassing to see this, but instructive nonetheless:

The Moral Equivalence of the Emoting Housewife and Her Sycophants

Hawaiian Libertarian · 17 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Laura Wood has gained some notoriety around the manosphere for her blog, "The Thinking Housewife." I myself have her linked on my blogroll, and I do read most of her postings. She has some good points for which I often find myself in agreement with…but one of her recent posts really irritated me, and I felt it deserved a full length response.

Since she does not allow commentary at her blog, and I know her and her sycophants regularly read The Spearhead, I decided a little public fisking of Laura's correspondence with one of her e-mailers and her condescending denunciation of this forum and it's participants is in order.

First up, the title of her post: Eat, Pray, Love Syndrome and its Counterpart for Men . This title alone is ludicrous in it's implication. "Eat, Pray, Love" is a piece of mass media propaganda to normalize frivolous divorce as a path to female fulfillment and empowerment. It was a mainstream, commercially successful movie that millions of women across the country made it a point to go and see. It's subversive influence on married women is quite obvious when you get the kind of results as evidenced by the comment that Bill Price featured in this Valentine's Day post, in which a married woman contemplates destroying her family because she was influenced by this disgusting, feminist agitprop. I find the moral equivalence between what Wood refers to as "Eat, Play, Love Syndrome" and the reaction of the commentary here at The Spearhead completely off base, and utterly ludicrous.

It is not even close to the same thing. For one, The Spearhead represents nothing more than the masculine reaction to understanding the truth about our feminized popular culture. We have a true diversity of viewpoints represented here. Other than condemning feminism's influence on our culture and lives, we don't agree on much else around here. To say there is an 'ideology' associated with The Spearhead and it's contributing authors and it's regular commenters is laughable. The ONLY thing that gets universal agreement here is recognizing the affects of the feminist agenda on our culture and society…and even then, we'll disagree on some aspects of that. Even when we do agree on something, we never agree on any particular solutions to these commonly recognized problems. Suggested solutions are regularly debated, opposed, shot down or supported. There really is no consensus here to form an "ideology."

We got men here who think Game should be universally studied by all men, versus men who think Game doesn't even exist or is nothing more than a waste of time. We have men here that argue for a return to Patriarchal marital norms, versus men who think all Men should avoid marriage versus men who advocate marriage only for men who expatriate to countries where feminism has not gained a foothold.

We have men who believe in pumping and dumping as many women as possible; we have men who believe in lifelong monogamy is the only morally acceptable way for men to be sexually active; and we have men who are simply awaiting the convergence of realistic sex robots and/or virtual reality technology so they can ignore women completely.

We have men here who are bitterly opposed to abortion and consider it a ghastly act of infanticide, and others that support it's legality as much as any pro-choice women's org.

If there is one thing that can be said about The Spearhead, is that we largely agree to disagree on just about everything. To simply say this forum represents a coherent, cohesive ideology comparable to the feminist zeitgeist that underlies mass media programming like Eat, Pray, Love is an unfounded moral equivalency and is a completely baseless assertion.

Wood calls her blog The Thinking Housewife, but her marginalization of The Spearhead community as nothing more than a "counterpart" equivalent to the frivolous divorce mindset of feminism clearly shows that she's not thinking logically about The Spearhead. She's emoting disgust at this entire site, as if this is nothing more than the misogynistic mirror-image of the brainwashed misandry of feminist sites like feministing or jezebel.

This is similar to the regular appearance of trolls here, in which feminist quislings denounce all the Men here for "hating all women."

Here's the e-mail that Wood received that got her emoting about our little "community of hateful misogyny" here at The Spearhead:

> PATRICK writes:
>
> Here is a moving testimony at The Spearhead from a man whose wife watched the movie Eat, Pray, Love. She was so affected by it she told him she no longer loved him. Eat, Pray, Love is a toxic celebration of feelings (only destructive feelings, because non-destructive feelings e.g. gratitude, are boring); a denigration of duty, and therefore a denigration of true love. The comment is a good example of a philosophy (hedonism with a dash of nihilism) applied directly and in an unadulterated form.
> However, the comments from men that follow the post are disturbing. The appropriate reaction to evil is not to become evil oneself, but to remain moral. Simply identify and explain the evil – and pursue the good. To wallow in resentment and bitterness leads nowhere.

First of all, "Patrick" what exactly is "disturbing?" What was said in the commentary that could be seriously considered "becoming evil?"

Is it the language you disapprove of? Well guess what, this is by and large a male space. We have salty language here as most any space dedicated to male fellowship and camaraderie. Does vulgarity in male dominated conversation offend your religious or moral sensibilities? Than don't use such language yourself…but to say that using such language is "disturbing" or downright "evil" is nothing more than hyperbolic hyperventilating. You might want to grab a paper bag and start taking some deep breaths.

Is it evil for the men who expressed their anger with vulgarity at the woman who saw this movie and decided it was time to divorce her husband and forever alter the lives of their two boys? You think such a woman doesn't deserve epithets like bitch or cunt to describe her? Especially when many of the men here have been similarly betrayed by their ex-wives or mothers who destroyed their families over such selfish decisions like the author of Eat, Pray, Love? What you are seeing here is not disturbing…it is the legitimate reaction of the righteously disturbed!

Disturbed by the cultural approval and encouragement that promotes this shit in the first place!

"Patrick" continues:

The "anti-marriage" ideology is deeply misguided.

Misguided? You will not find a consensus on the topic here at The Spearhead. What you will find is a universal recognition of what a scam and raw deal Marriage 2.0 has become for Men in the present day, feminist-influenced culture.

Women receive a lot of criticism for what I call lifestyle divorces, but I also think some men are willfully blind to "red flags" which indicate the likelihood of a future lifestyle divorce. Occasionally good men will be blindsided.

Time to cue the disturbing language….

Occasionally good men are blindsided?!?!?

What the FUCK are you talking about? When a woman decides to break up her family over a "lifestyle" decision, even if the Man in question is oblivious to the 'red flags,' how does that excuse the immoral decision for such a woman who simply follows a pop culture movie's example into divorce court? This looks like you're blaming men for the immoral, family-destroying and selfish decisions women like the Eat, Pray, Love author made! What about personal responsibility? What about Ms. Lifestyle Divorce trying to "communicate" and "work it out" with her oblivious husband? What about such women actually trying to live up to her marriage vows of "til death do us part' instead of contemplating divorcing him and upending the lives of their children so she can go and "find herself," by fucking swarthy, handsome strangers in exotic locales?

Being a victim of betrayal, however, is one of the many possible misfortunes of life. How we react to misfortune is more telling of character than how we react to good fortune. So my sympathy is with the victims of lifestyle divorce, especially the children. But it is not acceptable to engage in immoral behavior because one has been victimized or because others have been victimized.

So let's get this straight…it is not acceptable for Men to express outrage and anger with some curse words at this instance of a woman deciding to break up her family after seeing a fucking movie?

That all the men that saw this as yet another example of how feminist-driven divorce laws are destroying the nuclear family in Western Civilization and denouncing it in harsh, vulgar language…that is "immoral behavior?" Fuck that!

Here's the first comment, by "BobbyL," in reaction to that post:

Really sad. Spread the message far and wide. Marriage is dead. Feminists killed it.

Is this what Patrick calls "The "anti-marriage" ideology" that is "deeply misguided?"

Oh wait…I know, it was the very next comment: "Damn welmer we should delete that cunts post."

Was it the "C" word that got Patrick so upset?

I could think of worse insults for a woman that destroyed her family simply because she saw a movie and decided she too was unhappy and it's time to destroy her own family.

I normally do not use so much vulgarities in my blog posting both here and at my own blog…but I think there is a fucking point to be made here. Vulgar curse words are not evil, nor immoral.

They are rude.

They are offensive to polite sensibilities.

But they are entirely fucking appropriate in a venue such as this when denouncing self-centered, narcisstic cunts that think nothing of destroying their families because some fucking movie made by some empowered feminist twats gave them a vague sense of dissatisfaction with their own marriages.

Than we have Richard P-Man's comment regarding the BobbyL's comment stating that "marriage is dead and feminists killed it" -

True – but lets give credit where credit is due…

Plenty of women who did not take on the "feminist" label – also helped to kill it by silently sitting by and doing nothing while a group of sexual bigots trashed the institution.

Or worse, men like Patrick sit there and condemn other men who are rightfully disgusted with the current state of affairs for being "anti-marriage."

Then we have Laura Wood's response:

> Unfortunately, this post at The Spearhead inspired the typical, vulgar misogynist tirades there. All men are victims. Every woman is evil. There is absolutely nothing to be gained from this ideology except bitterness, bile and loneliness.

First of all, this man whose wife is contemplating divorce IS A VICTIM.

He's a victim of the subversive cultural indoctrination of this garbage that masquerades as "chick-flick entertainment." This is the precise response this movie and the book that inspired it was intended to evoke in other women.

Second of all, while there most certainly were vulgarities – this is a male space after all – I didn't find a single "all men are victims" type of statement in the comments, nor "All women are evil." Where is this 'ideology of bitterness, bile and loneliness' Laura Wood refers to? Most of the commentary was either relating their own observations of the effects of such feminist cultural programming in their own lives, or it was direct advice on how the blind-sided husband should "use game" to mitigate the damage and repair his marriage…or to lawyer up and get ready for the divorce hell so many other men here have already endured. On balance, there was actually more commentary urging this man to "study game" to "fix" his marriage than to take divorce measures.

Is this the "anti-marriage" ideology Wood and her sycophant e-mailer, "Patrick" are denouncing?

It's not "bile."

It's not "lonliness."

It's anger.

Anger that is entirely justified and appropriate. You know…the kind of anger displayed by Jesus when he threw the money changers out of the temple?

But Laura managed to finish her little piece with an even more amazing bit of ignorant sophistry:

"Men have nothing to fear in marriage other than the loss of their own honor. That is the only thing that counts and it is something each man controls and no wife can destroy."

Why yes….I agree 100% with this…but she completely misses the most significant point regarding this topic:

Men have nothing to fear in marriage. It's the DIVORCE we have to fear! We rightfully fear for the loss of our children, the garnishment of our wages, the loss of a lifetime we attempt to build for the benefit of our family!

Honor has got nothing to do with it.

I have always been lucky when it came to picking up women, certainly if quantity is anything to go by. However I have had a couple of mis-fires when it comes to quality, and the last one resulted in me being the victim of a False Rape Accusation.

Being lucky means things come easy, and when things come easy you don't pay attention, you just drift through the process enjoying it, but being lucky also means you end up playing the numbers game, and that means that it is only a question of time before you have a mis-fire.

I should also state for the record that as a heterosexual male, my only relationship experiences have been with women, perhaps men are the same, I wouldn't know first hand, but I doubt it.

So, I hit my late forties and had a mis-fire and got a False Rape Accusation made against me, at that point I started to pay attention, and thanks to the internet and the usual web sites that you are all familiar with (False Rape Society, Shrink 4 Men, etc.) I started to study my own particular tragedy in some detail.

What I discovered is that everyone actually does tell the truth about themselves, if you listen.

I have often said "I'm stupid" in conversation, and I have also said "I'm smart", the two are not mutually exclusive because the smart statement was made about my job / trade / skill set, and the stupid statement was made about the women I end up with.

When women say "I'm crazy" even if just quoting Norma Jean Baker, you really should listen.

If you had asked me about my ex before she made the False Rape Accusation I would have said "She's a crazy bitch." But I didn't really listen to myself, not so much that I didn't really mean it, more a case of it being one of those lines that comes from the sub-conscious, without heavy inflection of tones, without facial expression, without any kind of emphasis, so generally we do not pay a great deal of attention.

The sort of lines we should all be listening to.

I will refer to this as "The Tell".

So anyway, the False Rape Accusation is made, I start studying, and it doesn't take long for me to make a layman's diagnosis of a Cluster B Personality Disorder in my ex, specifically Borderline Personality Disorder… she really was a crazy bitch.

So far this is just a story, history, literally, it is the past and nothing can be changed, but what I am going to talk about now is the future, and that can be very heavily altered and influenced by what we do now.

In my studies I discovered that Cluster B personality disorders are actually quite common, with some studies suggesting as much as 10% of the female population being Cluster B.

Since most of my relationships were wham-bam, I wasn't around long enough to notice, which leaves me with the fairly average number of four women who I have co-habited with for one year or longer, statistically this would mean that if 10% of the female population is Cluster B, every time you meet a woman and get involved with her you stand a 1 in 10 chance of getting unlucky.

In my case getting involved to co-habiting level with four women raises that possibility from a 1 in 10 chance to a 4 in 10 chance.

Since I have no intention of swearing off pussy (I'm 50 an everything still works as well as it did 30 years ago, and I still have the same waistline etc.) this means the next one raises that to evens, but, like the flipped coin probability experiment (if you toss 5 heads in a row the probability of a 6th head is still 1 in 2) having hit the jackpot last time doesn't reset the counter back to 1 in 10.

Without wishing to get into a discussion about statistics and probability, people are not dice or roulette wheels, the odds do not stay the same the longer you play.

While 1 in 10 women being at least slightly nuts may seem like acceptable odds when you are 15, by the time you get to 50, the mere fact that most of the decent women are still married to their first love means that the odds are skewed badly against you, because in effect the passage of time has acted like a filter, removing all the saner women from the mix.

In singleton society, the older you get, the greater the proportion of crazy women in the society.

I will refer to this as "The Infection"

Which brings me to internet dating sites, doncha just love em, when I was 18 I had a tee shirt that said;

TELL ME NOW BEFORE I WASTE $10 ON BEER

… and I had to buy that tee shirt, thanks to the internet dating is now free, and the market of potential mates is vastly expanded beyond anything limited by physical proximity as it was when we were kids.

Now there are basically two types of internet dating sites, the straight sex ones, and the kinky sex ones, and I have been making excellent use of both, and of course both are populated by the same crazy women, and let me tell you brothers, the girls on the straight sex sites are every bit as kinky as the ones on the kinky sex sites.

The only difference is, the ones on the kinky sex sites are more likely to put The Tell in their profile, some of the real crazy ones will put The Tell in three or four times in the one profile. You won't see this, you will be concentrating on the bits where she says she likes to have cock rammed so far down her throat she gags, and the picture of her tied up…

There is of course a definite link between The Tell and The Infection, no matter how kinky you are, sooner or later you will come across a profile and sexual interests that will make you sit back and mutter "this bitch is fucking insane", but you probably still won't wake up and realise that you are not in Kansas anymore, after all, there are more profiles one click away, and de-sensitisation works just as well when you do it to yourself.

So you go back to the straight sex dating sites, and still, it doesn't really matter what you say on your profile, or what your pictures look like, the levels of The Infection are still obtrusively high.

Don't get me wrong, there are still half decent women out there, but the proportion of ore to spoil is always diminishing, and the only way to beat that is go get very mechanical, very efficient, and very cold blooded in your search process, you have to discard everything that contains even the merest hint of The Tell, because by the time The Tell is detectable the incubation period for The Infection has long since passed.

Well, I can hear you thinking, how about winding the clock back and going for the as yet virgin territories of the young females, after all, nothing in Game or anything else prohibits a 40 year old guy going with a 20 year old girl?

Well, I tried that too, and the crucial factor that I forgot was that old ticking clock, everyone and everything changes with time, and this means young girls who were delighted to go with an older guy when guys their own ages didn't have decent cars or decent sexual abilities or decent intelligence and experience, turn into older girls who maybe ain't so delighted any more, after all, their world knowledge of relationships was with you, and that was for them as easy as falling off a log, so how hard can it be to engage in a bit of hypergamy and trade up before THEY get to be 30??? Right??

Which is how in my case I found myself the target of two simultaneous False Rape Accusations.

Of course you can argue that I really should have known better than to fuck a mother and a daughter at the same time, but the facts are THEY knew about each other, and it didn't bother either of them, at the time, until sufficient time passed and a bit of hypergamous trading up was required, in my case trading up to the most Alpha male providers of all time, the State.

If you catch yourself thinking “hey, he was ASKING for trouble.” Then maybe you want to look in the mangina mirror, was I really asking to be Falsely Accused of Rape? You think?

The reason I relate the above is as follows…

So while in theory I can beat the odds of the ever diminishing supply of decent available women by looking in the younger end of the market, before the good ones are grabbed, and while it certainly is possible to find one free of all traces of The Tell, your real problem, as mine was, lies with The Infection.

Even if you find a young one who is not infected, there is no immunity, The Infection could strike at any time, in fact the more time passes, the more likely it is, while for you being the older guy, you are squandering what you have.

The Tell is a warning sign, The Tell doesn’t kill you, steal your children, grab your house, live off your alimony, or make false accusations of domestic violence or sexual abuse against you.

The Infection is the killer, it will kill you, it will steal your children, it will grab your house, it will live off your alimony, it will make false accusations of violence and sexual abuse against you.

The Infection WILL DO THESE THINGS, it can’t help it, that is its nature… read Aesop’s tale of the scorpion and the frog.

The Tell is only visible after The Infection has passed the incubation period and entered its virulent phase.

The passage of time means that every man out there faces the same problem I do, ever increasing levels of The Infection, which we can guard against and counter to a certain extent by running bulk dating screening operations and blocking women’s profiles at the first hint of The Tell.

Accept that while overall maybe 10% of the female population have a Personality Disorder, the passage of time is a filter, so when you are talking about 25+ year old women on a dating site, it’s nearer 30%, 30+ year old women on a dating site, it’s nearer 50%, 35+ year old women on a dating site, it’s nearer 75%.

Kinky sex sites are all at least 10% worse in every category.

So, getting back to the original premise, do you feel lucky? Is there a bullet left in the spout?

Face facts, the odds aren’t good, and the older you get the worse the odds get. There is less and less ore per ton of rock.

The only way to beat this is adopt mass production techniques and instead of panning for ore by hand, in person, in realtime, to do it virtually, online, filter thousands of profiles and trash every one with The Tell, which will be the vast majority of them, and then start winnowing on what’s left, seeing if your single response / memo to their profile can induce The Tell (such as not wanting to exchange mobile numbers early in case you are a psycho stalker) and if it does, Block them.

Don’t ignore them, don’t politely brush them off, just click the BLOCK button and move on, you have thousands of tons of rock to sift before you find your first nugget. You don’t have the time to be polite, and they aren’t worth it anyway, it is wasted on The Infected.

Most of all, forget firm and tender young flesh if you are looking for a relationship, you can still get some of that stuff for the odd wham-bam (do keep archived records of all memos / texts and audio of the actual encounter) but as relationship material the mere fact of the age disparity is going to encourage others of The Infected to congregate around her and infect her.

Hell, I kept myself in shape, some women manage to get past 30 while keeping in shape without needing to resort to surgery or layers of make up and corsets, and pretty much by definition this is the kind of women you are looking for, The non-Infected.

In fact, the 10% or so on dating sites who do not show The Tell may just be second hand, much like a car, and you can get good used cars.

But of that 10% that do not show The Tell, expect at least 90% of them to be The Infected, in plain terms this means you have to treat 99% of women that might at first glance interest you as being toxic waste.

MGTOW and your right hand may be one way to go, but frankly it's a poor substitute as far as I am concerned, I'm not dead yet and I like female flesh too much to give it up completely.

If you use the mass production filtering techniques there is still enough results that do not have The Tell to keep you in wham-bam often enough to keep you happy and smiling, and remember this is no meals, no drinks, no money, turn up and do me wham-bam and usually as kinky as you like as well.. I figure a strict daily regimen of 5 minutes in the morning checking out the new women joined, and a quick "Yo, how's it goin'" pasted (Plenty of Fish is stopping pasted replies now, which tells you how many were doing it, male and female…) into those who do not exhibit The Tell in the profile itself, then another 10 minutes in the evening filtering the responses for "The Tell" and taking it to the second level filtering, can you provoke a The Tell response or any signs of The Infection, those that pass that hit them with your mobile number and a suggestion to meet for coffee within 48 hours, one shot, one chance.

You need a decent mobile phone, and you need to set rules that apply to all, e.g. meet for coffee, maximum expenditure 1 buck, one chance, no excuses, act like you are a paid agent or pimp, you'll get ten bucks every time you get the guy laid, but you have to pay him 20 for every flake you hook him up with… this is the attitude you need to filter successfully and improve your luck.

You need to record and document everything electronically, don't just delete texts and call records after the event, even if it was a washout, back em up to an archive.. this is why you need a decent phone, more options.

You must use the BLOCK function, it is the only way in hell you have any hope of coping with the sheer numbers, the idea is to filter, filters are no good unless they are one way…

Can I still get access to the same sorts of pussy I could when I was 20?

Nope, short of winning the lottery and landing in Silvio Berlusconi territory, those days are gone, hope you exploited them for all they were worth, because they are gone now.

Does this mean my sex life is over or all downhill?
Hell, no, not if you learn to look for The Tell and The Infected and start playing the numbers game like a professional hobby, and go into mass production and put every single female within 50 miles through your refining process, do NOT pre-filter on "hey, she has a big nose and wears spectacles" because you could well be excluding a wham-bam with a great body… some of the nicest looking / feeling / tasting poon I have ever seen was attached to girls whose faces were a 2 on a good day. That wham-bam doesn't just keep you together, it keeps your perspective straight, it stops you yearning like some pathetic 12 year old for true love…

The Tell.

In addition to the obvious such as Monroe quotes, any use of the word "crazy" anywhere in a profile, "soul mate" is a definite tell and definitely one of The Infected. "Shopping" is of course verboten, but any mention of "the girls" as in her female friends is also a classic sign of The Infected, much worse than a shopper.

Women who mention anywhere in the profile (words or pictures) foreign travel of any kind are also The Infected, and this also goes for any mention of a career and independence such as "my own business / home / car" these are huge red flags, the tie die surf boutique bought out of the proceeds of the last guy etc. isn't going to bring in any living wage.

Any mention of how they have been hurt in the past, where are all the nice men, these are not The Tell, these are The Infected in pustulent, virulent, extreme contagion phase, these are not even wham-bam material, these are avoid like the plague material. Block instantly.

Any mention of how they are not looking for a father for the kids etc. Definite The Tell, if profile includes pictures of kids and their names then The Infected, if not then possible wham-bam material, then Block.

Gay Spearhead Reader: Gay Men and Women Are NOT Natural Allies

W.F. Price · 18 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Today, I noticed a comment responding to our recent article on fat acceptance that makes short work of the myth that gay men and women are in it together to trash men. Historically speaking, this has never been the truth, but somehow the new left managed to cobble together an unnatural political alliance between feminists and gay men that lasted for a few decades.

As with most outlandish creations, this unlikely pairing is starting to crumble under scrutiny as it is revealed just how little feminists and gay men really have in common.

Andybob's candid words are refreshing and a fun read:

andybob

It would shock many regulars at 'The Spearhead' to know just how little regard gay men and women of all stripes have for each other. There seems to be some stereotype which gets perpetrated in the media (watch any reality show or chick movie) in which women always have some sycophantic fag hanging on her every word and enabling all of her drama crap.

Like everyone else, I can only speak about my own life, experiences and observations. To begin with, I have very few women friends for the following reasons:

- As a gay man, there is nothing a woman can get from me. I have nothing any of them want. I can't be manipulated, controlled or strung along with bs promises of sex. So, serving no purpose to them, I am invisible.

- Because I want nothing from them, I don't have to put up with any of their shit. They will be pulled up for flaky, selfish and unreasonable behaviour. They don't like that at all. Women seem to be strangers to criticism. What are they going to do? Accuse me of being gay? Code Pink? Check-mate bitch!

- I am now in my 40′s and have seen so many of my straight male friends hurt, betrayed and defrauded by seemingly 'nice' females, that I can no longer trust them at all. I have a straight twin brother who has been through chick hell. He has always accepted and supported me every day of my life and I return that support. So, I have introduced him to men's rights blogs. The shared experiences of all types of men has been both strengthening and inspiring for both of us. Wish you were here 20 years ago!

- I am always deeply angered when any female assumes that I will side with her when some dispute arises. Firstly, I don't like being involved with other people's shit. Secondly, it is always the woman who is in the wrong anyway (and I do mean always). Finally, gay or not, I am a man and identify with men as I experience life from a male perspective.

- I have been able to view many women in their unguarded moments and it is not a pretty sight. I am so disgusted by their lack of honesty, loyalty and integrity that I no longer choose to be in their company (except for a very small number – and I would never entirely trust any of them).

None of my gay male friends like or trust women either. Dealing with them in the workplace makes for many funny stories. God they hate fags! They can't even get you for sexual harrassment. None of their feminatrix fanoodlings have any leeway when it comes to dealing with us – and it drives them fucking spare – fun to watch. Never occurs to them just to be human beings who do their jobs properly.

This has been a bit off-topic, but I wanted to make clear that while the mangina/female apologist tag may be spot-on for many gay men, it certainly doesn't include a huge % of gay men. Many of us are just as sick-to-fucking-death of entitlement bitches refusing to take responsiblilty and fucking over decent men (our fathers, brothers, nephews and friends). There but for the grace of God…

Finally, gay men and homely feminist hamburger critics (I mean, really?!) are no more likely to see eye-to-eye on body image issues than any other topics – and that includes the cruel obsenity that feminism has become.

Don’t give up guys. Your support is much wider than you ever suspected.

A Response to the Hysterical Housewife

Hawaiian Libertarian · 19 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Laura Wood wrote another post in response to my piece yesterday about her criticism. At first glance, it looks to be disingenuous and dishonest. But after a couple of readings, I think she honestly just can't help herself. When she encounters criticism, obscenities and hyperbole, she gets rather hysterical.

I will now respond directly to her latest response:

Please note Laura, that not a thing I write here can be construed as an attack, hateful, nor a vile assault on you.

First off, the title of your response:

The Bullies Speak

Ahh…so disagreement and criticism is now "bullying?" My dear, you are the one who sought to criticize this entire community as a "hateful ideology" that was the "counterpart" to the cultural garbage of what you correctly call "Eat, Pray, Love Syndrome." I merely sought to point out that this was a false, moral equivalency.

You picked this fight, and now you cry bullying?

> THERE IS a lengthy highbrow discussion at the men's website, The Spearhead, in response to the post here in which I said that a wife can never deprive a man of his honor and character.

Which was not really point of contention. To reiterate, you made a judgment of moral equivalence between anti-marriage, feminist-driven cultural propaganda like EPL and what you tried to claim was some kind of coherent, uniform ideology here at The Spearhead. The first half of my piece was to point out that your judgment was wrong.

> I have not read the whole Spearhead entry, but I have glanced at it. To give you an idea of the tenor of the discussion, or at least of some of the participants, one reader writes of me:
> "She is worthless, untouchable filth. She should have been aborted with a chainsaw."
> Hawaiian Libertarian, who moderates the discussion and who has not deleted threatening comments such as this…

First off, Laura, The Spearhead is by and large a free speech zone. Because of this, you will always be able to find some sort of extreme hyperbole in the commentary. The only time comments get moderated is if a comment could bring about possible legal action against The Spearhead. Other than that, this is a free-for-all zone. To find a comment like that and than ascribe it to the entire tenor of my piece and everyone that participates here is disingenuous and a complete cop out.

Second of all, I do not moderate anything at The Spearhead. Only the founder, Bill Price, and two other volunteers, have that authority. Even if I wanted to delete commentary I personally found offensive and counterproductive, I couldn't. I do not have that authority or power. The only thing I can do at The Spearhead, is submit articles and comments like anyone else.

> …falsely states that I do not accept comments here.I accept the comments of anyone who writes to me, provided they are civil and to the point, as is clearly stated on my home page at the bottom of every entry.

OK Laura, I concede this point here – though you try to make this seem like I'm deliberately lying about you. I should have been more specific in that you do not allow normal comment threads like most blogs, you only cherry pick and you edit your email commentary to suit your purposes. Let's just say I did not give you the benefit of the doubt that my long critique would be posted at your site un-edited and not have parts taken out of context…if you even posted it at all. That is why I posted it here.

> He also falsely states that I am a reader of The Spearhead. I am not, though readers do occasionally send me links from there.

Hilarious. I never said you are a daily reader. I wrote that I was posting it here because I knew you'd read it. And I was right…even though you laughably claim you only "glanced" at the article.

That's an amusing claim on your behalf, when the statement you found most objectionable was halfway down the comment thread, and was the last line of a two paragraph comment. You HAD to have read a substantial portion of the thread to cherry pick out that one line you found so offensive (and I'll even agree with you, that was a rather offensive comment.)

> Another reader in the discussion states that I have said all men must marry. I have never said any such thing, but this appears to be a common rumor about me in the manosphere. I have said that men who don't marry should decline intimate relationships with women and I have said that men should not seek to destroy the institution of marriage or urge other men to never marry.

This is precisely why I wrote a criticism of you for The Spearhead rather than submit it as an email to you. You go for the hyperbole that supports your caricature view and ignore anything of substance. Like Novaseeker's excellent comments regarding these view of yours.

You equate men encouraging other men to not marry as "destroying the institution of marriage." In other words, if men learn from firsthand experience just how badly they could have their lives devastated by the current state of the institution, they'd better not warn other men, or they're "contributing to the destruction of the institution." This is perhaps your worst fallacy you regularly reiterate.

> I have also said repeatedly that the surge of female-initiated divorce is one of the greatest injustices of our time. No-fault divorce is wrong. All divorce is wrong. Women who leave their husbands for any reason other than danger to themselves and their children are abusive traitors. Men should have presumptive custody of children. There should be no government-benefits or garnished wages for single mothers.
> Women who leave their husbands, except when a man is physically dangerous, are traitors in deed and by example to women everywhere.

Why yes Laura, on this we agree. As I wrote, I don't disagree with everything you write. Unlike you, I can look at your arguments objectively and judge them for their own merits, rather than look at something you write that I find objectionable than simply write off everything you espouse as a "hateful ideology."

> However, because I refuse to say that even involuntary divorce and harassment by the state cannot destroy a man's integrity and his honor, I am the object of withering hatred and threats at The Spearhead.

That is not what you wrote. As I responded, I agreed with that particular premise. What I disputed was your claim that "Men have nothing to fear in marriage other than the loss of their own honor. That is the only thing that counts and it is something each man controls and no wife can destroy. "

To which I responded:

> "Men have nothing to fear in marriage. It's the DIVORCE we have to fear! We rightfully fear for the loss of our children, the garnishment of our wages, the loss of a lifetime we attempt to build for the benefit of our family!
> Honor has got nothing to do with it."*

Is that what you call withering hatred and threats? Perhaps you would do well to re-read my article again. While it contains vulgarities (which was a response to PATRICK's asinine moral equivalence between "EPL Syndrome" and curse words), not once did I threaten or attack you in a personal manner. I merely pointed out that you were not using logic, but rather resorting to emotional outrage and trying to brand the entire Spearhead community as nothing more than a "hateful ideology."

> The men's movement brooks no deviation from the view that men are holy victims. Even a woman who repeatedly stands up for the rights of men is hated if she does not agree that men are doomed and have lost everything.

This is a straw man argument that cannot be backed up by fact. As I previously pointed out, there really is not that much for which we here at The Spearhead agree on. We regularly have spats in our comment threads here about that very topic. Yes, there are some men who view all men as victims. There are plenty of us who disagree with that. But you don't acknowledge the difference in viewpoints, you simply seek to marginalize us all with this straw man caricature.

> I stand by my main point. The greatest losers in the world are those who commit evil, always and in all times, not those who are the victims of it. That does not mean injustice should not be resisted. If I thought that, I would not be writing here.

Let's go through your claims here: if men point out they are victims of evil of the likes of EPL Syndrome, than you say "The men's movement brooks no deviation from the view that men are holy victims," but if men try to warn other men not to get married in today's anti-male marriage legal system, than we are evil and assisting in the destruction of the institution?

This is why so many men in the men's movement have a problem with you. If men are victimized by the feminist-warped institution of marriage, they are claiming "holy victimhood" status. If men try to warn others about the evils of the current system, than we are evil for trying to destroy the institution. You deign to pass judgment on men with a "damned if you do, damned if you don't" conundrum. This is a false dichotomy, and we reject your attempts at trying to seize the moral high ground and impose this double standard on us. Men ARE victimized by Marriage 2.0. Men MUST warn others about the perils of subjecting themselves to it.

If you did bother to read The Spearhead with an objective mind, you would see that there are plenty of men that STILL advocate for marriage…but only if they are fully aware of the risks, and that they have found a woman who is least likely to destroy the family via divorce after the vows have been exchanged.

> By the way, men are not the only ones injured by female-initiated divorce. Children, mothers, sisters, and friends are too. And, of course, women are not the only ones who divorce their spouses without their consent though their rate of doing so is much higher than that of men.

Why, how gracious of you to concede that Men Do That Too! (Seriously, Laura, read that link. I promise, there are no attacks or withering hatred…)

> One other point. I will not be accepting comments in this entry from anyone who participated in the thread at The Spearhead and who did not object to this violent language directed towards me, as well as to the threat by another reader there to disable my website.

Which is precisely why I did not email my criticism to you…I posted here, in a place where I knew it would be published in it's entirety and not have it cherry picked apart and have parts of it taken out of context as you are wont to do.

I object to violent language towards you. I did not use any, nor did I approve of it. But I have no control of other people who comment here…this is a free speech zone, and that is far more important to keep it that way, than trying to get everyone here to adhere to some code of speech so as to not offend you or anyone else's sensibilities.

I believe my criticism of you and your piece were fair, non-threatening and based on logic. You sought to brand The Spearhead as the moral equivalent to the anti-marriage/pro-divorce propaganda of EPL.

In short, your reaction was hysterical. You focused on a few comments that were over-the-top hyperbole and sought to claim that they were the sum total of our commentary and criticism of your writing and attitude. There are plenty of people that offered substantive, non-threatening criticisms.

You ignored those and acted as if the entire piece and all the comments were nothing more than a vile hate-fest that was entirely without reason or logic.

Either you are being purposefully disingenuous…or simply hysterical. Which is it?

University Kills Computer Science Major But Keeps Womens Studies

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 19 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Universities like everyone else are feeling the pinch in the current economy. This has led to them to look for places where they can cut expenditures. It would make the most sense to cut the useless parts of a university such as womens studies majors, various ethnic studies majors, "diversity" programs, programs for women, affirmative action, etc. and all of the associated expensive deans and bureaucracy that come along with such uselessness. The University of Cincinnati has not done this. Instead the University of Cincinnati has decided to cut its computer science major.

While the university claims that the computer science major is really being folded into other majors so nothing will be "lost", this is not true. Computer Science is an independent discipline. Folding computer science into other majors is like a university trying to merge its chemical engineering major into its chemistry major. Despite the overlap, it makes no sense.

A university has many purposes ranging from preparation for jobs and careers to loftier goals such as expanding the sum total of human knowledge. The University of Cincinnati, by cutting its computer science major instead of its womens studies major and all other useless major,s has failed all of these purposes. What they decide to eliminate and keep sends a strong message about what they think is important. The University of Cincinnati has sent a clear message that what they think is important is feminist and leftist indoctrination.

Even knowing that the University of Cincinnati has decided to place more importance in feminist and leftist indoctrination than employment and the body of human knowledge, why was computer science chosen as the first major to be eliminated? Most likely there were several factors in the university's decision but one of them had to be the pervasive anti-male bias that exists at most universities. Computer science is a major that is taken by mostly men, and those men are mostly "politically incorrect" men such as white men and asian men. If the University of Cincinnati cuts more majors they will most likely be other engineering and science majors that are made up of mostly "politically incorrect" men.

In the end this decision really only hurts the University of Cincinnati. Anyone who wants to major in computer science will go elsewhere along with their tuition and fees. Many men who weren't going to major in computer science will still avoid the University of Cincinnati because its anti-male bias is clearer than the average university. In a few years alumni donations will start to collapse as men who are employed in computer science jobs will be donating to the universities they went to and not the University of Cincinnati. All the womens studies and ethnic studies alumni will not be able to make up for the lost alumni donations. The womens and ethnic studies alumni are going to government, quasi-government, and other government mandated jobs that are going to collapse in the near future. A alumni with no job or a job where they have to say, "Would you like fries with that?" will not be able to donate to their alma mater. Research grants will fall apart for the University of Cincinnati as they will not be able to make use of them.

In a way it's good that the University of Cincinnati made this decision. Instead of hiding what they're really about, now everyone knows.

Children Raised on TV and Promises

Delusion Damage · 20 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine you're watching a nature show, but instead of a narrator telling you things like "now the male is displaying his mating dance to entice the female", there is no narrator and instead they get to interview the animals.

You can still spot the mating dance, you can see the herd hierarchy dynamically change through threat displays and status competition right before your eyes, and then you get to hear what the participants have to say about it.

…and that's where it gets really interesting, because this is not happening in nature, where the laws of nature, survival and reproduction, natural selection, and the like, reign supreme.

No. This is what would happen if George Orwell were here to see today's cultural trends and teamed up with Stephen King to write a dystopian horror novel about it. This is what would happen if you raised eight people on nothing but pop culture, advertising and entitlement mentality, and then gathered them up in their mid-twenties and put them in a house together. This is MTV's hit reality show "Jersey Shore", perhaps the most intellectually stimulating and socially relevant program on air today. Why? Because, if you were born after 1980 or so, it lets you see clearly what would have happened to you if your parents had let you be raised solely by the cultural and social environment that's been brewing for the past few decades.

This is your life without adult supervision.

Used to be, if you were a man you would strive to be a respectable one, and some nice girl next door would likely find you that way and make a home with you. If you were a woman, you would strive to be an agreeable one, and would likely manage to make enough of an impression on a decently respectable young man that he'd ask you to spend your life with him.

Not today.

The Jersey Shore man laughs at the thought of gambling even one night's prospects on a single female. You always gotta have a back up plan. The deal isn't closed until it's closed, and until such a time you're insane not to line up another girl or three on the back burner in case this one slips away. The planning these guys put into a night at the local dance club would make a battlefield general shirk away in shame.

The Jersey Shore woman isn't looking to get hitched either. She's just having fun – except when she's crying about not being able to find love with a nice hot-bodied gorilla juice head. Yes, these are the qualities which rank highest among what makes the perfect man: a gym-sculpted physique, large physical size, and liberal use of steroids.

What then, on the Jersey Shore, makes a perfect woman? Ha, don't be crazy, you gotta pump them and dump them. Rule #1 is "never fall in love at the Jersey Shore". Even this group of guys knows nothing good can come of it, and with this assessment I can't but agree.

The one couple that, against all odds, ends up forming from among the eight participants, challenges Hell to reclaim its reputation as the place where bad matches are made. Someone call the Guinness Book of World Records because we need to revise the entry on how loudly two people can scream at each other. The relationship between these two is built on the same solid foundational belief that our children are learning from countless messages our culture bombards them with every day: the shamanistic act of concluding in conversation that you and another person are now "boyfriend and girlfriend" imbues you with a wonderful, magical love, which makes sure you will never feel less than exuberant about anything as long as you remember never to compromise on anything or acknowledge that you may have been wrong about something. If ever a problem does arise, it is only your natural right to get angry, throw things, punch each other, have sex with other people for revenge, then crawl into bed next to each other in the evening and pretend for a moment that nothing was ever wrong, until such a time as you happen to be feeling bad, which is a sign that it's time to selectively dredge up those of the old transgressions which suit your mood and to loudly and one-sidedly blame your partner for all your unpleasant feelings. After all, it's never your fault. You just did whatever you wanted like you're entitled to.

It's no wonder that a constant supply of new partners is an essential requirement for the Jersey Shore life, and luckily for the male cast members, the local night clubs are always filled with scantily clad young women in need of being half-led, half-carried out of the club and back to base camp, where the mission is to "get it in" (direct quote) before they pass out.

Of the Jersey Shore cast, the guys actually seem to have it together admirably compared to the girls. Aside from the girl who can't stop crying over her "I love you so much"/"We're done!"/"You're my everything"/"Just get away from me" beau, there's the girl who's just desperate to find that magical love that's always promised but never seems to materialize – with a hot gorilla juice head, of course. Then there's the girl who, between bouts of rubbing her tightly wrapped assets on various "gorilla juice heads" at the clubs and screaming at her "long-term boyfriend" on the phone for not catering to her needs, describes her dating philosophy in the quote "After I have sex with a guy I will rip his head off" and, with a straight face, includes the expression "wow" in her nickname. This is not the worst nickname in the group.

This is just TV, though, right? They pick the craziest people for these shows, right? There's no way your kids could turn out this way, right?

Well, not quite. Look at the messages our society is sending teens about how they should relate to the opposite sex, and you will find all the building blocks of this Orwell-King joint feature already there. Women are encouraged to behave in completely intolerable and utterly uncompromising ways under the guise of "respecting themselves", and to "empower themselves" by squeezing all the available sexual mileage out of their brief window of natural beauty until eventually no one will have them even for that one night any more. Men are quickly learning that "marriage is for losers" – a message which, unlike the ideas fed to women, has serious value in the environment created by those ideas. To marry a "self-respecting", "empowered" woman is to ask for a lifetime of suffering. By taking every precaution to avoid that trap, a TV-educated man can pass that lifetime of unhappiness onto the child who's going to be born into the single-mother household with a "self-respecting", "empowered", alcoholic party girl for a mother if daddy succeeds in "getting it in" before passing out drunk. The risk of child support is as low as the chance that mommy will remember daddy's name in the morning, much less in a few weeks when the test comes out positive.

Much has been said about how a time should or shouldn't be judged by its cultural icons, and whether fame is always a sign of admiration or if it can be the opposite, but one measure of value is not as open to interpretation…

A star of Jersey Shore can get paid upwards of $10,000 to appear in public for a few hours. At a night club. To party.

This is not because people have negative feelings about them. In fact, it strongly suggests the opposite.

Between arrests for street brawling, visits to doctors' offices for alcohol-induced internal bleeding, and collecting four-figure hourly wages for dancing in public, these people are real flesh-and-blood role models for kids and teens all across the Western world.

Although not a parent myself, I have it on good authority that trying to always set a good example for your kids can be hard work at times, and you can sometimes feel tempted to take a break from the job of role model for a moment. Next time you start feeling like that, just to remind yourself of what's at stake, turn on your TV and see who's next in line for the position.

“Pauly” is ready to teach your son to adorn himself with corporate advertising. In permanent ink. “Jenni” is ready to teach your daughter to crush life’s obstacles with a thrust of the twin battering rams affixed to her chest.

This is their world now and Mister Rogers is dead.

The delusions about men and women propagated by our society cause massive damage to everyone in it. The mission of Delusion Damage is to help you reduce your suffering through understanding problems in a wider context where more “outside-the-box” solutions become available.

Feminist scavenger hunt

W.F. Price · 20 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Dalrock

The feminist fantasy always runs the same way. A tough no nonsense woman tries to break in to an all male sphere. To prove herself she must first pass, no, exceed the ridiculous and unnecessarily high standards which men diabolically erected hundreds or even thousands of years ago in preparation for this very day. At first the 1 dimensional macho characters all mock and deride her. But eventually they come to learn that she is every bit as tough as the guys are, in addition to her extra abilities which she has by virtue of being a woman. Ultimately they can't help but respect her determination and ability, and dare I say it, girl power. She's "opened the door", and now women eagerly flood into the previously all male sphere! Roll credits.

I'll stop typing for a bit so the feminists in the audience can savor the moment… Smoke em if you got em.

Everyone back? Here's the problem; most of the time it simply doesn't work that way. At least, not for a long time it hasn't. And quite often it is the feminists themselves who screw it up. They sell you GI Jane, where Demi Moore shaves her head and knocks out one armed pushups like they are going out of style. But that is just the picture on the package. What's inside the box is something totally different. And women and men fall for it every time. The thing is the feminists don't really care if they deliver as promised. In fact, so long as they can make the package with an impressive picture they don't care if anything is inside it. So they sell you a woman aviation pioneer, just as good as the guys. What they deliver is a woman who is almost all attitude, and very little skill. Then they lose interest as soon as they can check the box and say "See, women do that too!"

Strangely for feminists make believe is just as good as the real deal, and before you know it they are off focusing on the next item on the prove women are just like men to-do list. Actually maybe it isn't so strange, because after all of the girl power cheering stops, being the only woman in the grease pit doing oil changes or any number of dirty, dangerous, and physically demanding jobs stops being exciting and glamorous.

More importantly, the initial high of being accepted as being as-good-as-the-men more often than not never actually happens. The men see the ridiculous contortions the employer was forced by feminists to go through in order for the woman to be hired in the first place. The woman gets as much respect as the nonathletic kid who everyone knows only made the team because his dad is the coach. In theory a truly exceptional woman would be able to make the cut without feminists butting in demanding they put their thumb on the scale. Such a woman in all likelihood would gain the respect of the men. But feminists always insist on screwing that up by demanding that the rules for women should be far less stringent. Or when a pioneering woman does manage to break some barrier, they ruin the moment by crying about how few other women actually made it, and demand the standards for women be rolled back anyway.

Think about it, your great great granddaughter will still be complaining that men won't really let her do x, y, or z. We have women today complaining about men not doing enough to encourage them to write open source software, or edit wikipedia.

But if women don't even get to bask in the we-are-the-same-as-the-guys feeling, why must we continuously move heaven and earth for each new item on the to-do list? For example, why rework our nuclear sub fleet and antagonize the men who man them so a handful of women can work in stressful conditions and cramped quarters with men for months at a time? Per the US Navy Press Release:

> On July 28, 1994, Congress was notified of policy changes to expand the number of assignments available to women in the Navy. At that time, opening assignments aboard submarines to women was deemed cost prohibitive and assignments on submarines remained closed. Currently, women make up 15 percent of the active duty Navy – 52,446 of 330,700. Integrating women into the submarine force increases the talent pool > for officer accessions and subsequently the force's overall readiness, ensuring that the U.S. Submarine Force will remain the world's most capable for ensuing decades.

Women only make up 15% of the active duty Navy after decades of hand wringing and excuse making. With the opening of submarines, the only position in the Navy women aren't welcomed into is the SEALs. My question to the women reading this is at what point is proving women can do x not worth it. Is any cost too high? What if only one woman at any given time ends up having the desire and ability to serve in the sub fleet, but the other 99% + of the submariner force is less interested in staying in the job because they no longer see it as elite, or because their wives no longer feel the same way about their service? Would the warm feeling of checking off the box marked __ Submarines be worth a billion dollars? How about 2 billion, or 10? 100 billion? Is any price too high to pay in order to check off the box?

This isn't just a theoretical question. Consider the LA Fire Department. Women had to check the LAFD box, so in the 1990s LA County spent millions refitting fire stations. From Christine Pelisek's LA Weekly article Women Firefighters: The Gender Boondoggle:

> To prove its point, Los Angeles City Hall — just like Seattle, Miami, San Francisco, San Diego and other major cities, together with state governments — spent millions to recruit, train and house women. Los Angeles outfitted most of its 106 fire stations with costly women's lockers and women's showers, while politicians as well as fire chiefs Donald Manning and William Bamattre engaged in years of lip service, conjuring up an image of a new, professional class of woman firefighters.
> Women came to figure prominently in the praise party on the LAFD's Web site, www.LAFD.org, where the Hero of the Month, for six months running — in a department of mostly men — has been Tamara Chick, a woman so key to the department's goals that she is now in charge of female recruitment.

They proved their point. Some women can be firefighters. I'll pause so the feminists can get their pencils out to check the Firefighter box, high five each other, and bask in their accomplishment.

Pelisek continues:

> There's just one problem, and it's a problem no fire chief, mayor or recruiter wants to admit. In a department of 3,940 people, the second largest municipal firefighting force in the U.S., the Weekly has learned that the women who work on the fire line could squeeze inside a Hummer limo.
> Just 27 women are actually fighting Los Angeles fires.

This isn't unique to Los Angeles:

> No firefighting women died during the attacks on the World Trade Center, because New York City has just 31 women out of 11,600 firefighters. Women represent only 2.5 percent of the nearly 300,000 professional firefighters nationwide.

But wait, isn't this proof that women are discriminated against? How hard can it be to hold a hose or climb a ladder? Men have hatched a diabolical plan to keep women from running into burning buildings! Except that isn't true. Christine Pelisek interviewed the women who washed out of the training:

> What these two women saw — and experienced — is not what you might think.
> Nobody tried to make either of them fail. No "old boys" got in their way. Mary was admired by her male boss and encouraged at each step to be a firefighter. "I was just too slow," she says. Firefighting equipment, like the one-man ladders, started "getting heavier," and she began to realize she wasn't strong enough to repeatedly lift > it — a necessary skill. Eight weeks into the training — which causes plenty of men to wash out — Mary was stunned to realize that her body had begun "breaking down."

Big deal you might say. So what if they demoralized the entire force with a game of make believe and blew millions of dollars on showers and locker rooms which now sit mostly unused. But those millions could have been spent in any number of productive ways. What training did the firefighters not receive which could have prevented injuries to them or the death of those they are charged with rescuing? What new equipment could the department have otherwise purchased which would have lessened the burden these men face? More importantly, what did the LAFD as an organization really get for its money? Can the 27 women fight fires any better than the men they displaced? That seems highly unlikely.

Paula Bronstein, Getty Images

But what about the military, and combat in particular? How strong do you have to be to fire a gun? Maybe firefighters have a physically demanding job, but combat surely can't be that difficult. After all, we have all of those nifty gadgets! Gooseberry Bush links to an article which makes much the same point in her blog post Soldier Barbie:

> Heather Pfleuger — an exuberant, all-American, girl-next-door — was transformed when she arrived in Afghanistan. She'd shrug into her body armor, strap on her helmet, yank on gloves, goggles and scarf, and slide down behind her turret-mounted Mark-19, a 40mm grenade launcher. From there, she could kill an armored vehicle and everybody in it a mile away.
> When she whooped with glee and led a convoy outside the wire, local Afghan fighters, hard men who'd faced down the Russians and the Taliban, fell respectfully silent.

See! All we have to do is outfit each woman with a big enough truck and a belt fed weapon, and men will fear them! But the argument that women are already being allowed to do nearly all jobs in the military -including those which can involve firing a weapon- doesn't prove that we should open the the few remaining all male jobs up to women. According to the article only 14% of the military are in jobs not open to women. Keep in mind that the services picked the jobs women were best suited to first, and even then had to massively lower the standards for women to put them there.

The military is the last area where women don't have the same or better opportunity as men, and even there we are only talking about the last 14%! 86%, massively lowered standards, and a rework of the entire culture of the armed services isn't enough. I'll come back to this question a little later. Right now I'll share some more information on the remaining 14%. I explained in my last post on the topic that Iraq and Afghanistan have shown that for the infantry war being a very physical fight hasn't changed. Actually it has gotten more physical, partly due to those nifty gadgets. Per the Washington Post:

> In Afghanistan, soldiers routinely carry loads of 130 to 150 pounds for three-day missions, said Jim Stone, > acting director of the soldier requirements division at the Army Infantry Center at Fort Benning, Ga. In Iraq, where patrols are more likely to use vehicles, loads range from 60 to nearly 100 pounds, he said.

> "It's like a horse: We can load you down, and you just don't last as long," Stone said.
> Injuries — the bulk of them muscular-skeletal — are the main cause of hospitalizations and outpatient visits for active-duty Army soldiers, leading to about 880,000 visits per year, according to Army data. The injuries include sprains, stress fractures, inflammation and pain from repetitive use, and they are most common in the lower back, knees, ankles, shoulders and spine. They are one of the leading reasons that soldiers miss duty, said Col. Barbara Springer, director of rehabilitation under the Army surgeon general.

Everyone seems to agree that our Soldiers and Marines are carrying too much, but what would you have them do without when out in the field and the firefight starts? Should they make do with less water? Food? Protective gear? Ammunition? Less powerful weapons? These men are working at the upper limit of what the human body - the male human body- can carry under battlefield conditions. No amount of impassioned argument about good ol boys will change the need for infantrymen to carry the implements of war. Men can barely carry the load. How many women can we honestly expect to do this? And why should we believe for a nanosecond that they wouldn't insist on a separate standard for women, the same as they have for the other 86% of the positions.

The problem feminists have is a powerful case of diminishing marginal returns. The first barriers women broke down had lots of opportunity and were often things women were very well suited for. Over the decades, as they were more and more successful, they have had to shift their efforts to the much smaller opportunities where women are less and less suited for. So they had to fudge a bit, and then a lot, to keep opening doors for women. In a way I kind of feel bad for them. No amount of make believe will open these last doors. They may be able to dictate the change, but they won't be kidding anyone.

So why do they do it? Why all of the knashing of teeth in an obviously futile effort, for a minuscule opportunity the vast majority of women would pray to never have to do? Feminists can't help themselves. It comes down to who they are, and what makes them tick.

Feminists lay awake at night consumed with the knowledge that somewhere out there there are men who are proud to be men, and there is no woman there to tell them she is just as good as they are.

I almost feel sorry for them.

Christianity, Patriarchy and the MRM

Novaseeker · 21 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There has been quite a bit of nonsense written recently around this corner of the internet regarding the relationship between Christianity, and its patriarchal value system, on the one hand, and the men's rights agenda, on the other. Specifically, claims are being made here, for example, to the effect that because the men's rights activist community (MRAs) is a diverse group which includes many secularists who embrace various aspects of the contemporary "liberal" (classical or progressive) scene, it is therefore to be shunned as worthless, and traditional Christians, at least, should avoid participating in it.

This is an understandable, yet fundamentally misguided view, for the following reasons.

- MRA is neither a religion nor a political party. The MRA community is not organized around a specific ideological agenda or religious belief or identity system. It is organized around one basic idea: improving the lives of men in the here and now real world, in brass tacks terms. What does that mean? It means that MRAs are all over the map in terms of ideological disposition, religious affiliation (or none), and political engagement. What unites MRAs is a common sense that men are not being given a fair deal in the real world, and that men need to share ideas about how best to rectify this situation.

- MRA is about practical issues facing men. This means that the MRA world is primarily focused on the following: what problems men are facing in our society currently and what can men do, collectively and individually, about these problems. It is a pragmatic focus, and one which, of necessity, transcends ideological and religious convictions.

- MRA does not offer "one size fits all" solutions to men. Because the MRA is a diverse group, the solutions that men within the MRA community come up with for the various problems facing men are also diverse. In other words, MRA does not propose that all men do "X". Rather it offers varied solutions to men based on their own personal situations, and personal ideological/religious commitments, all with a view to alleviating or mitigating the problems that all men face in the current social, legal and cultural environment. It's claimed by some in the traditionalist and Christian communities, for example, that MRA is insistent that no men marry. There are certainly some MRAs who are insistent about that, but this kind of blanket statement about MRA as a whole overlooks the many married MRAs who propose no such thing, and instead propose other solutions for men who are inclined, for religious or other personal reasons, to seek marriage with a woman. Again, the MRA is a clearinghouse of strategies for men given the current social, cultural and legal situation that we face – it is not a one-size fits all "programme" which advises all men to follow the same path.

For a Christian who is engaged in the MRA community, it's clear that there are things that are expressed in the MRA community that are not Christian. But this should be no more surprising to a Christian than the fact that what he might encounter in a political party, or other non-religion-based group, may also be inconsistent with Christianity. That's because neither MRA nor a political party is a religious organization, but rather is something that brings people together, regardless of their religious commitments (or none) around common ideas or problems. In the case of political parties, this commonality is increasingly a political ideological commitment. In the case of MRA, the commonality is the shared experience of the difficulties men face in the current environment, together with the conviction that by banding together to share ideas, experiences, and strategies, we can enhance the ability of all of us to avoid some of the worst pitfalls the current environment throws at men, while nevertheless pursuing whatever goals any particular man may have in life, be they based on religion or something else. The specific ideas, strategies and solutions offered, however, are diverse – as one would expect in any group which draws people around an idea or an issue, rather than around an identity.

So, the solutions offered in the MRA community run the gamut from "men going their own way" (which can either be secular or religious, by the way), to "pick-up artists" (which, again, can be used in various ways), to "running married game" (the idea being to maintain happy marriages and avoid divorces) to political activism (changing the laws that impact male/female relationships to be more fair) and beyond. These solutions are inherently contradictory because no man is expected to pursue all of them! The idea is to be a clearinghouse for different kinds of approaches based on what a particular man seeks to get out of life – which in turn will be informed by his own ideological, cultural, personal, and religious orientation, something he brings to the MRA and keeps with him thereafter.

In reality, this is not very different from the experience of belonging to a political party. I know many Christians who are Republicans and many Christians who are Democrats. I don't know very many of them who, despite their political ideological commitments, agree with everything either party stands for, or who agree with everything every other member of their party says or advocates. Yet they remain in their political parties because that kind of diversity of views does not obscure what holds them in common – and it isn't religion (Christians being represented pretty well in both parties). This kind of "well I don't like what some people in that party say, therefore I can't be a member" isn't something that most Christians – whether Protestant, Catholic or Orthodox – really consider very much when picking a political side. It's taken as a given, rather, that much of what each party holds will be, to some degree, inconsistent with this or that aspect of Christianity, because these parties are, after all, broader coalitions of people who are Christian and not Christian, and are not organized around Christianity as such (at least not normally). The MRA is similar to this in that a certain amount of what is advocated in terms of personal solutions for men is not consistent with Christian teaching, in the form of specific solutions, but these are not the specific solutions Christians will generally pick from the clearinghouse. Instead, Christians will pick other solutions that generally suit their own life goals and orientation, based on their faith, from the MRA clearinghouse of strategies. And they will not feel alienated from other MRAs who pick other strategies because what binds them together is not the individual coping strategies that they select, but, again, the underlying, common conviction that men face daunting and novel difficulties in the current social, legal and cultural environment, and that all men can do better in this life, in practical terms, by sharing experiences, ideas, and strategies.

Therefore, the notion that Christians, or traditional Christians (or what have you), should shun MRA is not only wrong, but is terribly bad advice for the men who are Christian or traditionalist Christian and yet are suffering in the current environment. No traditionalist Christian church is really going to give a man advice as to how to maintain his marriage, in brass tacks rather than pie in the sky terms, given the cultural messages that even his devout Christian wife is constantly bombarded by, for example. No traditionalist Christian church is going to tell men what actually attracts women in the current climate (yes, including traditionalist Christian women). No traditionalist Christian church is going to lobby the state governments to change the family law, as Glenn Sacks and his group do tirelessly on behalf of all men (oh gosh, Glenn is actually politically liberal, which I guess to a traditionalist means he is undeserving of their support despite all of his hard work on behalf of all kinds of men, including traditionalist Christian men). Rather traditionalist Christian men could benefit greatly by participating in the MRA community, in pragmatic ways that their churches are simply not in a position, or even inclined, it would seem, to provide.

One final note. It's often claimed by traditionalists – Christian and otherwise – that the MRA is a tiny, insignificant group compared to the robust, fecund traditionalist community. I think this is a big misperception. MRA is growing by leaps and bounds these days, especially among younger men. It isn't an "organized movement", but rather a set of ideas that is now in quite wide circulation. Just 5-10 years ago, the kinds of memes addressed by the MRA community about the current situation and environment were not widely present to any significant degree in the public discourse. That has changed to a substantial degree, a recent example being the interesting comment thread at Kay Hymowitz's Wall Street Journal op-ed this past weekend, where a huge number of the comments reflected MRA memes to one degree or other. In fact, MRA memes are catching on to such a degree that it's clearly bigger than the very small traditionalist community, despite the latter's presumed fecundity (often overstated because many traditionalists are white hairs). This makes sense, because MRA is not tied to any political or religious commitment, but rather to the common, shared experience of men – a very broad commonality indeed. Therefore, these kinds of claims about MRA being insignificant as compared with traditionalism are rather misplaced and, to me at least, represent wishful thinking rather than the actual facts on the ground, as it were.

College Under Fire For Letting Shortstop Play After Rape Accusation

pierceharlan · 21 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

This time, a college athletic director got it right. If you agree with my assessment as you read this, perhaps you could drop a line to Pete Garcia, Director of Athletics at Florida International University. Mr. Garcia's email address is pgarcia@fiu.edu.

Mr. Garcia should be commended for doing the right thing, the tough thing, in the face of catcalls that he should do the politically correct thing instead. Mr. Garcia allowed FIU shortstop Garrett Wittels to play when his team's season began Friday night, despite a rape charge hanging over Garrett's head stemming from an alleged incident in the Bahamas late last year. Going into Friday's game, Garrett had a 56-game hitting streak, two shy of Robin Ventura's NCAA Division I record. Alas, on Friday, Garrett went hitless.

It took guts for Mr. Garcia to say the following: "We believe you are innocent until proven guilty. Therefore, Garrett will be playing."
http://www.statesman.com/sports/ncaa-hitting-star-to-play-despite-rape-charge-1260171.html He also explained his reasons: "Let me tell a little story. Back in 1967 a couple with two kids decided to leave a country and leave everything behind. One of the reasons was because in that country, you're guilty until proven innocent. Here, you're innocent until proven guilty." Garcia was one of those two kids. His parents brought him to America in 1967 from Communist Cuba.

For those with short memories, in contrast to Mr. Garcia's decision, in the aftermath of the Duke Lacrosse false rape claim, before the facts were adjudicated, Richard H. Brodhead, president of Duke University, suspended the remainder of the lacrosse season. By any measure, that decision was an atrocity.

The Rape Claim

In case you aren't familiar with the case, Garrett and several friends were arrested on December 20, 2010 in the Bahamas and charged with the alleged rape of two 17-year-old American girls, who, of course, have not been named in the news accounts, at the Atlantis Resort and Casino. The girls told the young men they were students from the University of Arkansas. The girls' families were also staying at the resort at the time of the alleged crime.

Surveillance video from the resort shows that the girls were drinking at the resort's Dragon's Ultra Lounge (the drinking age in the Bahamas is 18, and the girls were both 17), and occasionally kissing each other when Wittels and his friends approached the bar area. A source said the video shows the girls gesturing for the young men to join them, and that Wittels and two friends obliged.

The video showed that the two young women followed the young men to a private party, where the incident allegedly happened. Garrett and two friends, both 21, were charged with rape. The three young men admit to having sex with the women, but insist it was consensual. The age of consent in the Bahamas is 16, so age is not an issue in the charges.

At issue is that the girls claim they don't remember what happened. The charges stem from the allegation that the girls were so impaired that they were unable to consent to the sex. That, of course, is a curious conclusion in light of the fact that, we are told, a video shows that the girls were perfectly capable of gesturing for the young men to join them, and later were perfectly capable of following the young men to a room where they had sex, and still later were able to make it back to their own hotel room after sex.

The father of one of the girls called police after his daughter and her companion returned to their hotel room, a source said.

It is well to note that no one – including that father – prevented the underage girls from drinking illegally. It is also well to note that if the bartender did not believe that the girls had imbibed to excess when he or she was serving them, it is questionable whether Garrett and his friends should have reasonably suspected that the girls were too drunk to engage in a sexual romp.

Police in the Bahamas conducted blood tests to see if the young women had been slipped a date-rape drug. The tests revealed no sign of drugs. Garrett was released on a bond of $10,000 after a court hearing.

Wayne Munroe, a Bahamian attorney who is representing the young men, said it is “easy” to get arrested for rape in the Bahamas. “If somebody is charged with rape, the general inclination is to think there must be something to it,” Munroe said. According to Munroe, many rape charges in the Bahamas should not be filed in the first place. Munroe said this arrest-first, ask-questions-later policy evolved from a complaint by a former U.S. ambassador who alleged the Bahamian police did not take rape cases seriously.

If that is an accurate depiction of law enforcement in the Bahamas, it is, of course, a repulsive contortion of anything remotely resembling justice. Sadly, it is a policy too often followed in too many jurisdictions in the United States. A prominent example is found in the Hofstra false rape case. It is much easier simply to arrest any male accused, without regard for his possible innocence, rather than sort out the facts first and assume the remote risk that the accused will “rape again,” and thus embarrass the law enforcement official who “delayed” making an arrest.

Garrett’s preliminary hearing is April 18.

Catcalls: Garrett Shouldn’t Be Allowed to Play

The reason allowing Garrett to play was the right decision is because no man or boy should be punished for what is nothing more than a “he said/she said” rape claim. Not allowing Garrett to play would have been a form of punishment for something he only “might” have done. FIU is to be commended for not depriving a young man a chance to play a sport at which he excels based solely on the unsubstantiated accusations of seventeen-year-old girls.

Legion are the cases where women have destroyed the lives of innocent males just by uttering the “r” word, without anything more. While rape liars need no reason to falsely accuse a hapless man or boy of rape (one woman sent a man to prison for five years by falsely crying rape because, she admitted, she was bored; in another case, an 18-year-year-old boy was hauled out of class, arrested, and jailed for a month on a random false rape claim by a girl he had never even met), the fact scenario presented in this case is one where false rape claims are all too common: a girl having sex with more than one guy. The reason this scenario often prompts a false rape claim is obvious: how on earth can she possibly explain that to a boyfriend, a parent, or a friend? How will she hold her head up on campus? Most sane young women will deeply regret that encounter after-the-fact and will worry that if word got out, it would destroy what’s left of her reputation. The fear of “slut shaming,” as the feminists call it, seems to spawn off-the-charts regret, and that is a false rape claim waiting-to-happen. In other cases, the girl would never be able to explain such a tryst to her parents, so she cries rape. We often warn young men that they should never, ever put themselves in this awful situation, for their own sakes.

Despite every indication that rushing to judgment in this case is as wrong as can be, Miami Herald columnist Linda Robertson said Garrett should have been suspended. In one of the most outrageous statements we’ve read in a long time, Robertson wrote this: “No one except the people in a Paradise Island hotel room knows what happened inside it Dec. 20. But something happened.” http://www.miamiherald.com/2011/02/17/v-fullstory/2070867/fiu-should-have-suspended-garrett.html#ixzz1ESrxWWlf. That “something,” Ms. Robertson, more likely than not, is that two teenage girls have wrongly accused innocent young men of a vile crime in order to save their sweet asses from their parents’ wrath. We don’t know that for sure, but I am certain I follow these kinds of cases more closely than Ms. Robertson, and that is my educated surmise.

The FIU student newspaper agreed with Robertson’s inanity and said that allowing Wittels to play would make the school’s Athletics department “look bad on a national scale.”

http://fiusm.com/2011/01/24/the-beacon-editorial-suspension-of-wittels-maintains-vital-precedent/.

Because heaven knows, the school's image on a national scale is more important than doing the right thing. The more appropriate course, apparently, is to allow any random seventeen-year-old girl, whose identity and character are unknown to us, to deprive any male of his chance to participate in collegiate sports just by crying "rape."

How that is fair to the young man, his team, or the school is anyone's guess, but, then again, fairness has no place in the public discourse when it comes to the loopy, gender-politicized world of rape accusations.

Garrett isn't letting it bother him. "Every single night I put my head on my pillow, I know what went on that night, and I have no trouble sleeping at all," he said. "I'm just worried about strikes and balls, and wins and losses right now. I can't worry about the haters."

The High Road

Delusion Damage · 22 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There comes a time in every man's life when he has to make a choice. These days, there come at least a hundred times in a man's life when he has to make this same choice. You will not be forewarned as to when you will face it, it will be sudden and unexpected, it will jump at you in the most innocuous of situations, but the cumulative effects of all the times you make it can be significant. What is that choice? It's how you choose to react to a woman in your life who has been infected with feminism.

Option A:

Alice: So, this is my new couch. Nice, huh?
Bob: Yeah, hey, what's this book you've carelessly thrown on the couch?
Alice: It's a collection of lesbian love poems, I'm a Women's Studies major and a feminist!
Bob: Wow, you know that's a bunch of crap, right?
Alice: What?!
Bob: Well, Women's Studies is a make-believe degree and feminism is stupid, you know that, right? Really, "Women's Studies" is more sexist than anything "the patriarchy" ever dreamt up. Its very name implies in no uncertain terms that all the real sciences are for men and that women should stay in the academic kitchen studying Marilyn Monroe and spring fashions. Why feminists would encourage such a sexist thing makes no sense – but then, feminists never did have two sensible thoughts to rub together and their entire ideology, in fact, flies in the face of all rational thought with such bravado that I can barely wrap my linear male brain around it at all.
Alice: Contradicting yourself is superior to not contradicting yourself because vaginas are dualistic and phalluses are monistic!

Don't try to argue with a feminist. That's impossible. Instead, only try to realize the truth: If she were the kind of person who could be persuaded by rational argument, she would hardly be a feminist in the first place. You can save yourself the trouble by taking a few moments to first consider how likely someone who has managed to acquire, hold onto and emotionally invest in an ideology that requires as much self-contradiction, willful blindness to evidence, and flat-out denial of the reality on the ground as feminism does is to respond to reason.

If your conclusion is "not fucking likely", you may be inclined toward an alternative approach. Feminists believe that to be against feminism is to be against women, and expressing your anti-feminist beliefs to one of them can be counterproductive to other aims you may have, such as mounting a frontal assault on her southern trench, or whatever your favorite two-player game involves. Quite a few aspiring trench invaders have figured out that they can bypass this issue by paying lip service to her feminist ideas.

Option B:

Alice: So, this is my new couch. Nice, huh?
Bob: Yeah, hey, what's this book you've carelessly thrown on the couch?
Alice: It's a collection of lesbian love poems, I'm a Women's Studies major and a feminist!
Bob: Cool! That stuff is so important!
Alice: Yeah! Thank you for your balls, I'll just be keeping them here in my purse for you until you're too old to labor for my amusement any more!

Being familiar with the male sex drive I accept as an unfortunate fact that many men will choose the prospect of female affection even at the cost of personal integrity and the future of the Western world, and that's a shame but something we will have to live with. For those men who are currently harming us all by making this sacrifice, as well as those who are not willing to sell their souls and would still like to keep from upsetting their potential dance partners, I suggest a third option:

The high road.

Let go of your anger for a moment, let go of your primal desire to fight an offending idea wherever you encounter it, refrain from personal attacks, refrain from voicing your conclusions regarding the mental capabilities of the kind of person who'd hold certain beliefs, and realize that she's just a girl, same as any other, she just wants to be happy, and she's gotten hopelessly lost in her search for a way to achieve that. She was born with the capacity to be a wonderful human being, and whatever deluded belief came into her later to stop her from expressing that nature is not something she chose in order to make your life harder. Treat your delusion-addicted friend like you would a drug-addicted one. Don't attack her for denying the harmfulness of her ingrained habit, don't judge her for falling prey to its deceptive allure, just let her know that you care about her and are worried about her because she's hurting herself and others around her. Expect her to lash out angrily at you to defend her behavior, but don't get sucked into a debate. You know she's on a harmful path, you know she refuses to see it, and you're going to offer her what help you can, that's all.

Secret Option C:

Alice: So, this is my new couch. Nice, huh?
Bob: Yeah, hey, what's this book you've carelessly thrown on the couch?
Alice: It's a collection of lesbian love poems, I'm a Women's Studies major and a feminist!
Bob: Oh, I'm sorry.
Alice: What?!
Bob: Well, it's your choice of course, but in my experience getting involved in feminism tends to make people angrier and bring unnecessary unhappiness into their lives.
Alice: Where the hell did you get that?!
Bob: Whenever a new scientific study on happiness is published, it seems to me that they always show that women's happiness in the Western world has been steadily declining since feminism has been gaining popularity, and that women in less feminist countries are happier. This supports my personal experiences. Women who talk about feminism a lot always seem to me to be angry and distraught, and happy women who are pleasant to be around never seem to talk much about feminism. It just seems to me based on all of this that feminism is really bad for women. I mean, you and I were having a good time just now, but it didn't take a minute from the mention of feminism for you to start swearing at me.
Alice: That's because you hate feminism and that means you hate women!
Bob: No! I love women! I've just never seen feminism do anything good for a woman.
Alice: What about voting?! What about equality?! Do you think women should just cook dinner and stay at home with the children?!
Bob: Of course not, but you don't have to be a feminist to have options these days. Whatever changes happened in society decades ago and whether feminism had anything to do with them or if it was just inevitable because of technological progress and stuff, I'm not really an expert on all that. I just know what I've seen in my life which is that women who choose feminism seem to be making a bad choice for themselves. That's my experience and if you have a different one I accept that we can disagree on this, and I'm okay with that. We probably don't have the same religious beliefs either and I don't think that should stop us from being friends. I know you're just trying to be happy like everyone else, and if you think feminism is the way to do that I just think you're making a mistake, that's all. It's nothing to get offended about and it doesn't mean I don't like you as much as a person, I want you to be happy too and I don't think feminism can give you that. I just want you to do what's best.
Alice: And you know what's best for me?!
Bob: I'm just telling you my experience, just like you're telling me yours. That's really the best any of us can do in this world.
Alice: (Well you're wrong, but) I guess I can't blame you if you (are really dumb enough to) believe that stuff since you don't seem like you want to oppress women.
Bob: I sure don't. My experience with women has been that they're generally pretty nice.
Alice: Oh Bob, that's sweet. I'm sorry for getting angry at you. I see how you could have a viewpoint like that with your experiences (and there might be something to it, which I'm probably never going to admit to you, but now every time I see unhappy feminists and happy non-feminists I'm automatically going to be more likely to notice the difference and this will inevitably affect my own view of feminism).

The choices you make shape the world you live in, both on a personal level and the level of greater society. Attack provokes defense and counterattack, but concern provokes questioning. Take the high road. If you can't find it in yourself to do it for her, then do it for you and me and anyone else who is harmed by feminism. No matter which way you slice it, getting favorable results is better than not getting favorable results. The purpose of any communication is the response you get, and the response you want is for a feminist to become less feminist. For that to happen, you must make her listen to you enough for something useful to sink in. The most effective way to reinforce her idea that men are the enemy, and to stop her from understanding anything you're trying to tell her is to make her feel angry and threatened. The most effective way to facilitate her letting go of beliefs she's emotionally invested in is to make her feel safe. Feminists do not respond to reason, only emotion – you already know this.

You can "love your enemies", or if you can't do that, you can at least fake it for your own purposes, but the behavior that gets results is always the thinking man's choice, whether you're thinking of her benefit or your own. I've been down both roads. I once thought that feminists were "enemies" to be "fought", that if they really think they can compete with men in any area and will be allowed to take advantage of our kindness indefinitely, then we should certainly take it upon ourselves to swiftly and decisively disabuse them of that notion. If that's what you're thinking right now, trust me, I know where you're coming from. I've been there. I've moved on though, and I hope you can follow me because I can tell you it looks a lot better from here. Following changes in my overall perspective on life, my view of feminists has undergone a massive change as well. I now mostly feel sorry for them, formerly decent girls who got lured into a destructive cult, ruining both their own lives and those of people around them. No one is born a feminist and no one chooses to become one for any reason besides the lifelong search for happiness and contentment that we all share. If someone managed to deceive your daughter or your sister into thinking that men are causing her unhappiness and the only way to live an enjoyable life is to make men the enemy and destroy them, could you honestly blame her for making that her mission? I can't. I can only feel sorry for her – an ironic reflection of the basic feminist victim mentality, I know – and the fact is that they are victims, victims of their own delusions, and we, as members in the society they're shaping, are victims of their delusions as well. In a practical sense, they are hurting us, this is true, but I can't bring myself to feel angry at them any more. I've had enough of anger, and I forgive them for they know not what they do. I'll hurt one in self-defense if I must, but whenever a constructive solution is available that offers the best outcome for both of us, I hold no grudge and I make an effort to take the high road every time.

If you, too, can stop thinking of a poor, misguided girl as "the enemy", you will be amazed at the effect it will have on your results. If we really are men of reason, we have no choice but to go with the optimal strategy. If we can't do that, we must confront ourselves with some difficult questions.

The delusions about men and women propagated by our society cause massive damage to everyone in it. The mission of Delusion Damage is to help you reduce your suffering through understanding problems in a wider context where more "outside-the-box" solutions become available.

Blackstone's Formulation is Universally Respected, Except When it Comes to Rape

pierceharlan · 23 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When it comes to the subject of false rape claims, every feminist becomes an actuary. She examines the cooked statistics promulgated by the sexual grievance industry, rejects contrary statistics due to imaginary flaws in "methodology," and declares that the risk to innocent men and boys is both de minimis and socially acceptable compared to the purported far greater harm of actual rape. This gives her moral license to trivialize the harm to the falsely accused, and to see those victimized by rape lies as less than human.

This attitude, which is manifested with seemingly infinite invention, flips on its head the long-settled principle famously expressed by the celebrated English jurist William Blackstone, who said it is "better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer." (Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765.)

The debate about whether it is just to punish the innocent in order to insure that the guilty are punished has been settled since the time of Abraham, as chronicled in Book of Genesis. When God was deciding what to do about the evil in Sodom and Gomorrah, Abraham put the question to him: "Are you really going to sweep away the innocent with the guilty?" After repeated probing, God made it clear he would not destroy the guilty if it meant destroying the innocent with them.

In modern times, "Blackstone's formulation," or as it is sometimes called "The Blackstone ratio," has been imprinted on the DNA of our jurisprudence. Our Supreme Court, in various ways, has underscored that it is one of the pillars under-girding our jurisprudence.

Justice Douglas, a liberal icon for much of the 20th Century, stated: "It is better, so the Fourth Amendment teaches, that the guilty sometimes go free than that citizens be subject to easy arrest." Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98, 104, 80 S. Ct. 168, 172 (1959). Justice Harlan wrote: "I view the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in a criminal case as bottomed on a fundamental value determination of our society that it is far worse to convict an innocent man than to let a guilty man go free." In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 90 S. Ct. 1068, 25 L. Ed. 2d 368 (1970)(Harlan, J. concurring).

This principle is, in fact, so fundamental to our criminal jurisprudence that it is rarely even discussed, much less challenged. Yet, brazen sexual assault advocates have worked tirelessly for decades to undermine it. Some openly question centuries of accepted wisdom by wondering aloud why this formulation should have any validity in the rape milieu.

Is the pain of a rape survivor in seeing his or her rapist go free in any sense comparable to the injustice inflicted on an innocent person deprived of his liberty? The question scarcely survives its statement.

"Terrible as it is for a victim to see a rapist escape punishment, it is far, far worse for an innocent person to be convicted of a sex crime." Until Proven Innocent: Political Correctness and the Shameful Injustices of the Duke Lacrosse Rape Case, S. Taylor, K.C. Johnson (2007).

Take, for example, Dwaye Dail, who was convicted of a rape he did not commit as a teenager and spent the next 18 years in prison. While in prison Mr. Dail was repeatedly and brutally victimized by the same crime that he, himself, did not commit. His life was shattered, and it is fair to assume he will never be whole after his unspeakable ordeal. Can anyone seriously assert that the pain of the alleged rape victim in Mr. Dail's case was in any sense lessened by having this innocent man destroyed?

Rape victims whose misidentifications lead to wrongful convictions often develop deep psychological trauma when they learn what they've done. Many false accusers, such as Biurny Peguero Gonzalez, experience such unbearable guilt for the harm they've caused an innocent man or boy that it can only be relieved by recantation. Actual rape victims have no interest in punishing the innocent and are often among the most vocal critics of false rape accusers because they know that every rape lie diminishes the integrity of every legitimate rape claim.

But the feelings of those women are in stark contrast to the sentiments of feminists who dominate the public discourse about rape. Too often, they evince an indifference to the plight of the falsely accused that is motivated by twisted notions of retributive gender justice. Too many would serenely tolerate the punishment of an innocent male to atone for the perceived sins of others of his gender. Of course, determining questions of guilt and innocence on the basis of one's birth class has no place in an advanced society.

While an individual is capable of doing terrible things to another individual, including rape, the state itself should never fall to the level of a criminal and risk doing a terrible thing to another human being. Charging a man or boy for rape on the basis of doubtful evidence is among the most terrible things that we, as a society, can do, and a jurisprudence that tolerates that is one bordering on pathology.

A wrongful acquittal is a terrible thing, too, of course. But a wrongful acquittal is never, ever the equivalent of a wrongful conviction — morally, legally, or any other way — and to suggest otherwise is nothing short of morally grotesque. Why? The answer is simple: the victim of a rape is not at risk of losing her liberty for decades if her rapist goes free. But innocent men or boys imprisoned for rapes they did not commit, like Dwayne Dail, are often destroyed by the experience, as are their loved ones, including the women and children who depend on and love them.

Dictators throughout history have justified the ruthless imprisonment, torture, and murder of the innocent to insure that the "guilty" — who usually happen to be their enemies — are destroyed. It is a monstrously barbaric, and singularly un-American, practice. The reason Blackstone's formulation retains its validity, even when it comes to rape claims, is self-evident: it is the very hallmark of a civilized society.

British Judge Clears the Way for Secret Trial of Assange in Sweden

W.F. Price · 24 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

On Thursday in a London court, Judge Howard Riddle ruled that Assange should be extradited to Sweden, where he will face a secret trial for rape allegations. In relevant news, documents released by Assange's Wikileaks website have played a pivotal role in the Islamic revolutions sweeping the Arab world, which represent the biggest diplomatic and political challenge faced by the US State Department in decades.

Assange and his lawyers have seven days to appeal the decision.

Because rape trials are secret and closed to the public in Sweden, the trial is likely to fuel speculation that the prosecution is politically motivated. Those declaring that this couldn't possibly be the case are hopelessly naive, as it is almost impossible to believe that the US Dept. of State, headed by Hillary Clinton, has not expressed some desire through some channel to see Mr. Assange punished for his journalistic endeavors. The rape accusations may simply be a lucky coincidence, but the prosecution on such flimsy grounds certainly does not look to be so.

Of SYMs and Red Herrings

While I haven't yet had the chance to read Kay Hymowitz' latest book, Manning Up: How the Rise of Women Has Turned Men Into Boys[image], I did have the opportunity to read her article more or less plugging the book in the WSJ a few days ago. As Hymowitz' writings have been the subject of two posts of mine in the 2 1/2 years of blogging, I would be remiss were I not to weigh in on this latest effort. For sure, her scribblings have not gone unnoticed in the manosphere, a great many of whom have answered Hymowitz' plaintive query "where have all the good men gone?" in their own idiosyncratic ways, a selection of which I sound-bite below:

- Whiskey: women contribute to the child-man phenomena by choosing sexy men over responsible men.
- Ferdinand Bardamu, who, in citing Spengler's law of Universal Gender Parity, suggests that women and men deserve each other and that women had better be "womaning up" before they dare to utter the words "man up!"
- MikeT: Today's single young men (SYM)s are merely the mirror image reflection of Hymowitz' SYFs…and that today's culture simply does not reward mature behavior in men
- The Damned Olde Man: Men rationally responded to women's lib by liberating themselves as well from the male gender roles of provider and protector–and women don't like it.
- Dr. Helen: "After 45 years of being told they are pigs, sexist, and good for nothing, men have quit trying to please others, so they slap on a baseball cap and don't talk much. And with good reason"
- Captain Capitalism: "[A] life of bachelortude and singledom [is] more attractive an option (economically, socially and romantically) than marrying [women]"
- Mike @ Crime and Federalism: Women have said for decades that they don't need men. Now they have it, and they don't like it.

As for me, if the WSJ article/advert Hymowitz penned is indicative of the main thrust of her book, Manning Up[image] will likely be a book-length rehash of her earlier work writing cultural human-interest articles for the Manhattan Institute's City Journal e-zine. It was in this publication where she first profiled single young men–SYMs–two years ago, reducing the rational-slackerhood responses of young men to the new post-sex-rev reality with catchy quips like "child man in the promised land" and kvetching about the equalizing impact Game has had on the formerly fem-favorable dating scene. And it is in the context of these writings that I find the controversy surrounding Manning Up to be interesting, for while she has previously chronicled the rise of the SYF–the Single Young Female and the custom-made-for-the-SYF New Girl Order–she has also continuously failed to publicly connect the dots between the SYFs and the SYMs who are the subject of her book. Thus I suspect Manning Up will also fail to connect these dots, which is a shame because the two phenomena are not independent creatures, and I contend that one begat the other, namely that the SYF created the necessary conditions for the SYF's counterpart, the SYM, to blossom and take root.

The text of Hymowitz's WSJ article suggests that her new book still views the SYM through female socon glasses, lenses that grade the worth of men according to their ability and willingness to marry and financially support wives and children. To wit:

> For today's pre-adults, "what you do" is almost synonymous with "who you are," and starting a family is seldom part of the picture. Unlike adolescents, however, pre-adults don't know what is supposed to come next. For them, marriage and parenthood come in many forms, or can be skipped altogether. In 1970, just 16% of Americans ages 25 to 29 had never been married; today that's true of an astonishing 55% of the age group. In the U.S., the mean age at first marriage has been climbing toward 30. What explains this puerile shallowness? I see it as an expression of our cultural uncertainty about the social role of men. It's been an almost universal rule of civilization that…boys had to pass a test. They needed to demonstrate courage, physical prowess or mastery of the necessary skills. The goal was to prove their competence as protectors and providers.

> Single men [are] more troubled and less successful than men who deliberately choose to become husbands and fathers.

Generally speaking–and I do not think I am overreaching with this claim–it is usually only women who think in terms of gaining personal satisfaction or fulfillment through their work. Contrast this with men, whom often endure soul-killing jobs they don't like, and whom generally resign themselves to shoveling the effin gravel rather than engage in urinary olympics about who has the most glam occupation. Men work because it pays the bills, because they don't have any other alternative. Women work for different reasons: partially because it pays the bills until they can get married, but also because, after they don't have to pay the bills anymore, their work becomes a hobby or even a status symbol.

But the more troubling message here is that Hymowitz clearly thinks that a key marker for a man's manliness is his willingness to present himself as a suitable candidate for a three-way marriage (man, woman, State). But they don't, thereby stymie-ing women's ability to choose to work in self-fulfilling occupations, and therefore achieve self-actualization Nirvana for herself. SYMs marriage avoiding behaviors–or failure to qualify for a marriage to one of those wonderful snowflakes–are at the heart of our culture's plummeting marriage rates and refusal to reproduce itself. If only those latter-day Peter Pans would grow up and be worthy of a woman's hypergamous marital ambition, already. Come on, you boys! Man up!

The problem with Hymowitz' female-centric indictment of the SYM is three fold: First, she forgets that where women go, the culture follows. I am on record as stating that, while men transmit civilization to the next generation, women are a civilization's center of gravity. If one wants to change the direction of a culture, one somehow must convince the female half of the species to talk/walk/think/act differently. Thus, all this focus on how SYMs are shiftless losers who can't get a date and are therefore the cause of the marriage dearth is a diversionary red herring, distracting from the real work at hand, which is readying girls and young adult women to be able to form enduring patriarchal marriages with men and therefore beget the next generation of civilization.

Second, women themselves are adrift, casting about for their moorings in a culture that decided two generations ago to discard all the old touchstones of what it means to be valuable contributing female member of society. Hymowitz herself proves useless in helping girls identify these markers that help girls make the transition to womanhood, claiming

> It's been an almost universal rule of civilization that girls became women simply by reaching physical maturity

This my friends is idiocy raised to the idiot power. A girl becomes a woman merely by sprouting breast buds and pubic and axillary hair? A marker of maturity for her is shopping, travelling, and buying Jimmy Choo shoes? No test to pass, no criteria to discriminate between a girl and a woman, nothing to qualify them for membership in the club of fully formed adult females except the ability to consume or successfully gestate a baby? Nothing to distinguish them from mere social parasites? No wonder many girls go on to become SYFs who dither away their youth in shallow materialistic consumerism and alpha/thug/jerk carouseling, only to run, not walk, to a sperm bank in their mid-30s to quell the thunderous ticking of their biological clocks, all because their beta male peers couldn't measure up to their romantic fantasies. There is no expectation for them to do anything but. And what of the girls who do settle for Mr. Right Now? Well, some may find marital bliss, but a great many of them will find that Mr. Right Now becomes boring or contemptuous and desperately wanting a way out…and why not? She settled for him, rather than the Mr. Big she deserved.

If Hymowitz and the culture at large is going to demand that, to be counted as a man, that men should get a job and get married, individual women, to be counted as a woman, should become a wife, spawn some kids, and raise them. Ouch, such high, fun-killing standards. Whodathunkit that for a woman to demand that a man "man up!", she must first "woman up" as well, with all that requires.*

* Womaning up includes getting and staying married, till death do you part, having at least 2.2 kids, having sex with your husband often, and shoveling the effing gravel that being a wife and mother entails. No divorce allowed, except for barbarous abuse and infidelity.

The third problem with Hymowitz' indictment of the SYM is especially tragic because she almost touches upon it…and that is the culture's near-universal disenfranchisement of the nice guy, the rock of a stable society, the non-glamorous beta male provider:

> Today's pre-adult male is like an actor in a drama in which he only knows what he shouldn't say. He has to compete in a fierce job market, but he can't act too bossy or self-confident. He should be sensitive but not paternalistic, smart but not cocky. Today, with women moving ahead in our advanced economy, husbands and fathers are now optional, and the qualities of character men once needed to play their roles—fortitude, stoicism, courage, fidelity—are obsolete, even a little embarrassing. Women put up with him for a while, but then in fear and disgust either give up on any idea of a husband and kids or just go to a sperm bank and get the DNA without the troublesome man.

Hymowitz says next to nothing about the cultural conditions and social attitudes that have obliterated most of the reasons for men such as these to aspire to be husbands and a fathers, the two conditions that Hymowitz and her ilk would presumably use as indicators of male maturity. In fact, Hymowitz would do well to study how women have teamed with the machinery of government to make husbands and fathers largely irrelevant. Thus, having been declared a fish to a woman's bicycle–and loudly told this since birth for the last 40 years–is it any wonder that men would eventually take women at their word and seek amusement and fulfillment elsewhere? Isn't this what women wanted, after all? Control, suffrage, work, influence, responsibility? No? Hmmm.

So, where indeed have all the good men gone? A good question. I suggest that Hymowitz start by encouraging her sisters to look in a mirror to begin to answer to this question.

Sarah Palin is a Feminist

careyroberts · 24 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Sarah Palin regards herself a feminist, no doubting the fact. At a May 14, 2010 meeting of the Susan B. Anthony List, she declared herself a "feminist." And in America by Heart, the former vice-presidential candidate announced, "It surprises some people to hear that I consider myself a feminist."

So exactly how does Mrs. Palin view this gender liberation creed?

To some, feminism means men and women should have equal opportunities – and responsibilities — at school, in the workplace, and in society. Presumably, equality should benefit men and women alike. This is what some call "equality feminism."

This squares with the constitutional notion of equal treatment under the law, and most conservatives, I believe, are comfortable with that.

To others, feminism has a radically different design — it means women should equal (or surpass) men, even if it entails government-imposed quotas, set-asides, and other social-engineering schemes. These "gender feminists" do not fret if these programs end up shortchanging men. Girls rule!, the preening rad-fems exclaim.

Which school of feminist thought does Sarah Palin ascribe to?

At first, it would appear that she belongs to the equality feminism school. She writes in American by Heart, "The original feminists were interested in securing equal rights and opportunity for women in a man's world. But at some point feminism began to be about emphasizing women as victims…In short, the message of feminism became, 'No, we can't—at least not unless government helps.'" (page 141)

Most conservatives would applaud that pronouncement.

But a mere two pages removed from these words comes forth the voice of a different Sarah Palin, a woman whose athletic aspirations can only be satisfied by, yes — a government-backed quota system. In her words, "I also consider myself a grateful beneficiary of the movement for female equality, particularly Title IX, the federal law that mandates equal opportunity for women in high school and college sports."

This was not Palin's brain addled by an aurora borealis during a long Alaska night. The former governor espouses similar views in her Going Rogue book.

Palin goes on to cite Tilting the Playing Field, a riveting chronicle about the transmogrification of Title IX by Bill Clinton's Education Department. Quoting from Jessica Gavora's exposé, Palin rhapsodizes about the "liberating effect of Title IX on women's sports."

But that misrepresents Gavora's thesis. Maybe Title IX did serve to liberate women's sports — but the feat was accomplished at the expense of males. In Gavora's words:

"The gender-quota logic . . . begins with the presumption that men and women, boys and girls are identical in their athletic interests, equally eager to kick a soccer ball or wield an oar. And if interests are equal, then "equity" between men and women dictates that actual participation must also be equal…Anything less is prima facie proof that someone is being discriminated against."

How is it possible that a shotgun-toting, abortion-shunning, federalism-embracing Hockey Mom would end up touting a monstrous brainchild of the former Clinton Administration?

Here's why: because Mrs. Palin ardently believes "women's talents and capabilities are equal to men's" (America by Heart, p. 140). So let's think this one through…

Since women have "equal" capabilities as men, Palin reasons, and since the number of male athletes has greatly exceeded the number of female athletes, something is very wrong. Obviously, the government needs to step in.

In America by Heart, Palin heralds the American military man as "working or fighting from before dawn to well after dusk…can field strip a rifle in 30 seconds and reassemble it in less time in the dark…digs foxholes and latrines and…He'll even split his ammunition with you in the midst of battle when you run low."

Amazingly, Palin takes this gritty tribute and then turns it into a sales-pitch for gender feminism, insisting this encomium applies "to both sexes equally."

As a person who served in the U.S. Army and observed women first-hand in the Armed Forces, I will simply note that Mrs. Palin, who never wore a military uniform, appears to be operating in a different reality.

So it's hard to escape the conclusion that Mrs. Palin is a gender feminist who welcomes feminist-inspired government policies that have excised equal opportunities for men, in the name of guaranteeing equal outcomes for women.

But the very idea of a conservative icon working to advance a gender-feminist agenda is oxymoronic. It's mind-boggling, really.

The Future After the Death of Feminism

Delusion Damage · 25 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is going to die. Soon.

After the sun has set on feminism's final day, the world that's left for us will look very different – whether it's a decent place or not will depend on the methods we use to get there. Some of feminism's most enthusiastic opponents are of the mind that "winning the war" is all that matters right now and rebuilding can be figured out later. I hold that "the war" will win itself in any case, and that now is the time to look to the future and plan for it, because an ounce of preventing undesirable side effects of the impending transition to a non-feminist society is worth a pound of cure after the fact.

Interestingly, the possibility of feminism ending within any time frame relevant to currently living people has never been spared a thought in anything written by a feminist that I've ever come across.

Also among those opposed to feminism, the fear that it could go on forever is widespread. Comments have even been thrown about to the effect that current anti-feminist action is "not good enough", that the fact that it's getting worse means that it will keep getting worse. However, as alluded to by The Futurist in his call to activism, a transition to non-misandrist society will happen no matter what, and the impact the men's movement can make is not on "if" but "how":

> I remain as convinced as ever that The Misandry Bubble will correct by 2020 no matter what due to the Four Horsemen of Male Emancipation. However, there is much to lose if the correction is turbulent, rather than orderly. Millions of innocent men and women can be saved from wrenching misfortune if we act now to fight the culture of misandry that is cancerously pervading the entire Western world.

I'd like to highlight a different set of four factors that will bring feminism to an end: four methods men are using to dismantle it, which will shape the world we're left with once feminism is gone.

1. Educating Men – A noble effort is being made by men of various backgrounds to educate other men about the evils of feminist society through whatever means their particular circumstances provide.
2. Leaving Women to Fend for Themselves – A number of men are "going their own way", refusing to foot the bill for the feminist gravy train and distancing themselves from feminist society both for their own protection and to withdraw support from a destructive system.
3. Violence – Still relatively rare but growing in number are those men who, pushed far enough into disillusionment and despair, decide to push back with full force and embark on a murder-suicide shooting rampage as their final protest against the society that made their lives unlivable. We may yet see some Western men take it upon themselves to punish feminist behavior in our streets and public spaces on a day-to-day basis. What with the oversensitivity of our cultural climate to misinterpreting any mention of violence as a call to it, I feel a need to state unequivocally that I am not encouraging violent action against feminists here, but only stating as fact what is happening today and making a prediction regarding what may happen in the future.
4. Educating Women – Little effort is currently being made by men to educate women about the error of their feminist ways, and very few women are inclined to listen. As women come to face more and more abandonment and violence from the growing number of disillusioned men, more and more of them will be forced to look beyond feminism for solutions, and this approach will become more effective and very important for the building of a better society.

Feminist society is inherently unsustainable because it functionally encourages all of these strategies, and therein contains the seeds of its own destruction. A sadly forgotten fact among today's generation of women is that they survive only on the good humor of men, who, whether in the guise of husbands, fathers, taxpayers or police, have always been and will likely always be the only thing standing between women and a swift and brutal death. The fundamental contract between the sexes is based on women making themselves worth the trouble by giving men something in return for this favor. It might be possible to conceive of a society in which women could enjoy a decent standard of living even without the willing help of men, but any sequence of events that could lead the Western world to such a state of affairs in the near future appears astronomically unlikely. The fact is that quality of life for women, as a group, depends to a great extent on men's kindness, and that kindness is predicated on the women not pissing the men off too much. Until recently there's been a healthy buffer of male goodwill towards women keeping society in balance. It's been known by names like chivalry and gentlemanly conduct, and expressed in myriad written and unwritten rules like the ubiquitous "never hit a girl" we all learned as children, but the major portion of it doesn't have a name and can only be described as an overarching tendency to always treat women a bit better than other men. The now aging generation of women has used up a major chunk of that collective male goodwill – they've partied with abandon on credit, leaving the bill to their daughters. At the current rate, the amount of kindness-reducing behavior among the female population is fast approaching "too much", and when it reaches that point where the male population as a collective entity has had enough and "general public male opinion" switches from being pro-feminist to being anti-feminist, things will change very rapidly indeed.

Most men are by default more than willing to discuss things and find cooperative solutions that benefit everyone, but faced with someone who refuses to do that and is intent on getting her own way no matter who gets hurt, most men are also perfectly willing to control such a danger by force. The unwillingness of feminists to engage in rational cooperation is eventually going to lead men to give up on trying to talk to them as equals and instead unilaterally decide that the party is over and it's time for feminists to shut up and cook dinner. It is in the best interests of both men and women to shape a future in which women voluntarily let go of feminist stubbornness and cooperate with men for the greater benefit of all involved, rather than be forced to submit. When women realize that these are the only two options and that the feminist utopia they've been taught to expect is a practical impossibility, they will fall in line very quickly.

The future holds many exciting possibilities:

1. Western society weakens under irrational feminist policies and its population is absorbed into a culture with stronger values, such as Islam.
2. As a result of withdrawn male support in the form of labor and economic production, the economic safety net collapses and women are forced to abandon feminism and learn to please men in order to be provided for. With no working social security system, we get to join the third world with skyrocketing crime rates, consequent rampant corruption and a reduced standard of living for all but the most ruthless robber barons.
3. Men in law enforcement professions become disillusioned with increasingly irrational feminist rape and domestic abuse laws and start turning a blind eye, consequently also removing the sensible protections women have enjoyed by law since the dawn of civilization and effecting de facto legalization of forceful control of women. The protection of women falls to the men in their lives, private citizens now forced to arm themselves and fight sexual competitors for women conquered as war trophies. Like the wild west, but a lot more crowded.
4. Women influenced by feminism realize their mistake and agree to cooperate in building a new system that benefits both sexes. Needless to say, this would be the best option for all involved, and the best we can say for the alternatives is that they have to exist in theory and, I fear, to some extent as examples before a major portion of feminists will realize the necessity of cooperation.

It should be the concern of any man or woman not wishing to live under Islamic law or in a new wild west on the ruins of a collapsed civilization to make sure that feminist women realize their mistake and are offered a cooperative solution out of the pit they've dug as soon as possible, before our society has descended into lawlessness. If the societal breakdown is allowed to happen, it will cause a lot of unnecessary suffering to all of us and be very hard to fix. To this end, I advocated reducing feminist ideas in women through peaceful and cooperative means in my previous article, The High Road. While a minority of readers expressed their appreciation for my suggestions in the comments, a much more vocal contingent of commenters criticized my approach as too moderate and voiced their own opinions to the effect that no communication should be had with any woman influenced by feminism. Given the ubiquity of feminist indoctrination in our society, I am mighty curious as to whether these men ever speak with their mothers, sisters, daughters or colleagues, and if they do, whether their behavior does justice to the positions they express with such gusto when safely behind their keyboards. If there is a man among them who has never talked to a feminist-influenced woman twice, he's got my respect, and as for any who don't meet the criterion upon which they found it appropriate to base their criticisms, they are cordially invited to give themselves a healthy slap in the face.

Feminism is everywhere, it cannot be avoided. Many of those very same men who would criticize polite disagreement as too soft can frequently be found sitting around offices and dining tables silently bearing witness to all manner of feminist chatter. This is a problem in the men's movement – there are no signs of movement from the men who count: brothers, husbands, friends, etc. As long as the only opposition to feminist ideas a woman gets is from a keyboard halfway across the world while the men close to her shut up, smile, and direct all their own frustrations toward other computer screens on the other side of the world, the chances for her to change are not great. Someone on the internet may disapprove of her treatment of men, but all the men in her life seem to be accepting it without so much as a peep! Who would you believe?

Speaking our minds to feminist-influenced women only when we're sitting at our keyboards or boycotting feminism only in those people who are so unimportant to our lives that we cut them out without a second thought is shamefully, pitifully, laughably insignificant. It is in our personal lives where our efforts count. If you are ever going to effect an involuntary change in anyone, it will be in people who absolutely cannot ignore you, because all those who can, will. If you are willing to tell your mother and your daughter to pack up the delusions they picked up in college and leave your life forever, I have no issue with that, but I doubt men who would do this are many even in these circles. If instead you stay quiet and let them broadcast their delusions unopposed and unanimously reinforce each others' superiority complexes, you are behaving like less than a man and should feel bad. If you are like most of the audience here – just a guy, just disappointed, not ready to wreck your life even for a good cause and yet not content with standing idly by doing nothing while injustice is rife all around you – for you, there is The High Road. No apologizing, no hiding of your views, no fighting with your friends and family, just realizing that your goals are ultimately best for everyone and repackaging your true cause as a concerned appeal to her self-interest. For best results, the men's movement needs both good cops and bad cops. Someone has to raise the cost of being a feminist, and someone has to offer women an enticing opportunity for defection.

The basis of feminism is unabashed selfishness, and women will hold onto it exactly as long as they perceive it to be their best option. If we let them believe that it's "us vs. them" and we're not taking prisoners, they can hold onto it until no woman is left standing and maybe they can take freedom of religion, social security and/or democratic rule of law down with them. This would obviously be bad for everyone. While a better option for women to defect to is not being made widely available, desperate women are going to cling to their sinking ship.

Where we end up is our choice to make, but we have to start making it now. The law of Islam, the law of the jungle, or a new law for men and women to peacefully coexist in a society that recognizes, understands and fulfills the different needs of both. Feminism will go down, and peacefully, cooperatively, violently or indifferently, you will be involved in burying it. There will be educators and rebels, agitators and bystanders, there will be objectors, defectors, killers and mediators. All will play their parts in the inevitable disassembling of feminist society, but what we really need are those who can help us build a decent future after it's gone.

The author took care in writing this piece, considering its implications and limitations, and hopes that those who might disagree in the comments make a similar effort .

The Game is Getting Worn Out

W.F. Price · 25 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, I noticed a comment zed wrote that reflected my thoughts on the matter of this unending stream of vapid, clueless and/or provocative articles we've been seeing from female journalists for years now. Forbes, The Atlantic, The New York Times, and now even the Wall Street Journal are publishing them regularly.

Here's an excerpt from zed's comment:

> I would be slacking on my job as wingman and coach if I didn't point out to a guy when he had been hooked by a neg and his hamster was going like it was having an epileptic fit.
> If she and her publisher make money on this book, they will put out another one. If that one makes money, they will put out another one after that.
> This is just another type of emotional porn for women. It makes them all tingly in anticipation of all the attention they are going to get from it.
> Would men with options waste one second of their lives responding to a woman who treated them this way in real life?

It's a good point, and one that's been going through my head recently. I used to think they were simply writing this stuff to make a buck, but it seems that there's more to it than that. As zed points out, these women really get a kick out of our responses. And in the meanwhile they are getting paid a lot of money to pleasure themselves by pushing our buttons. There's no doubt that they are paying attention to the men's blogosphere, and one can only imagine the happy little feelings they get from seeing us worked up and indignant — over them! Women, particularly of the exhibitionist type that characterizes female journalism, absolutely love it when someone makes a fuss over them.

A friend sent me another horrible article published in the WSJ a couple days ago that followed close on the heels of Hymowitz's disingenuous article about how men are refusing to grow up. In this article, a youngish woman writes about how she had a great honeymoon because her new husband couldn't find his passport and was stuck behind for a few days. She lustfully describes the Italian men she met, and suggests that she'd love to do it again, hinting at a divorce before she's been married for even a season.

> I took a water taxi to my hotel and the driver, a gorgeous man named Davide, insisted I take command of the boat, although I explained that I was from New York and didn't even know how to drive a car. "I teach you," he said and sort of slapped my butt and also touched my stomach while shifting gears. He gave me his number on a scrap of paper.
> "I'm married," I said for the first time. "I'm on my honeymoon." He thought this was very charming and American and pretended to look overboard in the murky brown water for a groom. "Call me," he said.

She goes on to describe the shopping, the food, the joys of being without one's husband, and of course the men again:

> The next day I bought five hand-tooled leather journals from a bookbinder named Ustino and began writing in one of them at Locanda Cipriani, a restaurant in a quince orchard on a tiny island called Torcello. I ordered cannelloni again and wrote, "I'm eating cannelloni all aloni." I wandered that night over bridges and bought a silk jacket with rats painted on it for $500.
> I had dinner that night at Vino Vino on Calle de la Rotonda where you order from three dishes at the counter. It would have been perfect except for the waitress ignoring me during my lemon cake—and oh yeah, I > remembered, my husband not being there.

> Waiting for him, I took gondola rides and drank wine with beautiful men. I soaked my feet in the bidet, listening on the phone to my husband complain about how he'd taken Metro-North to the county clerk's office in White Plains to get his birth certificate. I went to the Peggy Guggenheim Collection and the Accademia, lounged on my king-sized bed, got chocolate on my trousseau.

She ends the piece with a little line she probably thinks is guaranteed to upset men:

> The scrap of paper with Davide's phone number on it is still on my refrigerator. In case I ever want a second honeymoon.

We could get indignant, point to this woman as another example of a naughty wife, and make a fuss over her. But the thing is, this kind of bad behavior is no longer shocking. These Cosmo-style themes are so common and pervasive in every form of mainstream media that they've begun to dull people's outrage, and now it's just starting to look embarrassing — like a national shame of some sort. Our women are acting out in public to such a degree that I wouldn't be surprised if other societies felt some pity for us, just as one would pity the family who had to deal with a mentally-ill daughter who repeatedly exposed herself in public.

But despite how bad it makes us look as a society from the outside, the most important matter is the change within. The reason this shamelessness has gone on for as long as it has is that it has been effective. The women have succeeded in getting our attention. But it's reached a saturation point, and now the question is what's next?

It seems that men are approaching a psychological tipping point where they will no longer respond to each new outrage with much more than knowing resignation. The women of our society have invested so much effort into provoking and testing us that we're developing a cultural immunity to it, which is unprecedented in the history of modern Anglo civilization. For a couple of generations, our women have been unraveling centuries of carefully constructed myths and facades built around the feminine, and from all indications it appears that they will not stop until the job is entirely complete. Perhaps we should consider that although there have been a lot of bright guys far ahead of the curve in recent years pointing to the gaping holes and craters on the facade, the real credit for its destruction should go to women themselves. In all likelihood, without the wrecking ball of feminism, men would have plodded on and on in blissful ignorance, accepting all the pretty lies without a second thought.

Some conservative women may be nervous about the implications, but Hymowitz and the like are no different from their less circumspect sisters in the most important matters. These conservative women crave the same attention and fuss as Lady Gaga; they simply go about securing it in different ways. Even if they were the only ones making noise the end result would be the same, because they are all looking for the same thing.

We can't predict exactly what the effect will be of the vanishing of these illusions built around women, but women have certainly sown the seeds of their own disempowerment. When enough men react to these provocations with nothing more than a roll of the eyes – and that time is almost upon us – it's going to take the steam right out of this aging feminist movement. In a way it's too bad, because when women were mysterious and venerable, they had a certain charm about them, and it's going to take a long time for that to come back.

Daddy's little girl can do no wrong

If you're like me, you missed the Superbowl this year. Truth be told, if you're like me you probably missed the Superbowl last year as well.

Whether or not you care, you know about the mishap that took place during the singing of the National Anthem. Christina Aguilera missed one of the lines to the Star Spangled Banner, while the camera registered the wincing faces of soldier and coach alike.

Since I don't live in America, I can't really tell what the reaction was from my immediate social circle. Because the song in question was highly patriotic in nature, my thoughts and feelings bear significantly less weight. Nevertheless, I admire the United States as both a neighbor, and cultural twin to my own Canada.

I couldn't help but think; what would the reaction have been if it were a male vocalist who botched the anthem? Would they receive the same mercy and sympathy that Aguilera got?

Since Christina Aguilera agreed all those months before the show to sing, she must have invested some preparation before the big date. It's a complicated ballad, and takes talent and work to get it right. Given her vast wealth and fame from a long singing career, she didn't have much to lose or gain from agreeing to it though.

After the fact, I caught snippets here and there of various talking heads giving their 2 cents on what had happened. There was no shortage of consolation to the poor girl who everyone seemed to unanimously agree, was under great stress and deserved our collective pity. Sadly predictable was the statistics on how many Americans don't know the lyrics. It would seem that any who expressed anger and disappointment were either heartless, or hypocrites who expected too much from her.

However, it's not like Christina Aguilera isn't used to performing for massive crowds. Nor is she simply "losing her groove" so to speak. It comes with the territory, and the Superbowl isn't exactly something she can cancel and reschedule. (honestly, I don't know if the organizers had a plan B).

Despite all this, still the question on my mind was: what would the reaction be if it were a male singer who messed up the lyrics? How would the American public respond? What repercussions (if any) would it have on his career?

To those reading this and saying that I should seek psychiatric help for obsessing over something this trivial and mundane, I say: wake up and smell the Astroturf. This society where I live in, I'm forced to see everything through the emerald of Marxist dialectics. (Why not more women doing this, being that etc.)

Those of us on this site see time and time again the shortsightedness of fathers in relation to their daughters' capacity for folly. "Daddy's little girl can do no wrong". Seeing how lax and apathetic the reaction to Aguilera's mistake was, leads me to believe that the problem has surfaced. It became visible to those who know that it is getting more and more costly to be a man in this day and age.

A part of me wants to blame it on the overall decline witnessed in America, the complacency, the lowered standards. I soon after realized that standards are lower. We've allowed those turncoats who we refer to as "Manginas" and "White-knights", to get rid of the standards for our women altogether. Ironically, Aguilera knows this more than anyone. Years ago she propelled her career by choosing to make provocative performances, and sexually "empowering" songs.

Christina Aguilera made a mistake: messing up an American song, on an American event, and an American day. Where chastisement was due, pity and tears were given. Lets learn from all this while the memory is still fresh. What holds true in the courts, schools, workplaces, halls of government, is now true for the Superbowl halftime show: "Daddy's little girl can do no wrong".

Offensive and Defensive Strategies and Tactics in the Gender War

zed · 26 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I started this out as reply to a comment by Elusive Waipiti on this thread, regarding the reaction of the Manosphere to Kay Hymowitz's latest man-bashing screed in the Wall Street Journal. But, it quickly became too long to bury in the comments to another post, and I think it is relevant enough to merit a post of its own.

> I still think there was value in the strong manosphere reaction to Hymowitz' blatant man-baiting.

I wasn't saying that there was no value in it, EW. I really was playing wingman and coach and trying to point out the Game she was running.

When I was growing up, this was something men used to do for each other. I remember well one incident when I was a young horny fool having drinks in a bar with a guy about 5 years older than I was, who definitely had Game. Our waitress was a wholesomely pretty young woman in her early 20s who was engaging in friendly "waitress patter" which included lots of smiley references to hard times she was pluckily going through. I don't remember the details but it was probably something like paying her way through school and having a sick mother and stuff like that. (This was long enough ago there would have been no "single mom" stories.)

After she flounced off, Larry cast me a sideways glance and said with smirking half smile – "She's hustling us for a bigger tip." That was all it took for me. The next time she came around I took a half step back from trying to play "big strong generous man out to rescue a girlie in distress and be her hero for a nanosecond" and watched her.

He was dead right.

I watched her dealing with other customers – working the eye contact, the strategic flash of a bit of discrete cleavage (this was over 30 years ago), the laughter at customers' jokes she had probably heard thousands of times, the hair flips, the innocent almost accidental touches on the arm and shoulder. This girl was passing out IOIs like there was no tomorrow, and guys' wallets were flying open like she had said "open sesame."

I still left a generous tip, but probably nothing like what I would have dropped on her if Larry hadn't clued me in.

So, my pointing out what Hymowitz was pulling was in the vein of pointing out the Game she is running, in order to do this - > while we are part of the amen choir, our brothers and sons may not yet be. How instructive was it for one of them to read Hymowitz' article–consider that the problem may be indeed with him, as a male, like he's been told his entire life–and then bam! He sees the reaction of other men who call shenanigans on the entire deal?

That part I totally agree with. I say lets go a step further and start to really pick apart her game, shenanigan by shenanigan.

Human beings have huge catalog of reactions controlled in the hind-brain or brain stem, and mediated by the hypothalamus. At least 99% of all our behavior is automatic and autonomic. We don't have to remember to breathe, or blink, or have our skin raise goose pimples when we get a chill. A pretty girl with a pretty smile will bring a smile to man's face without him ever having to think about it.

Most women are instinctively concert pianists when it comes to knowing how to play on and play these reactions in men. Bat their eyes, flip their hair, flash a smile, and most men's IQ immediately drops 50 points.

In the past, cultures had value systems which restrained people from being too manipulative and destructive with their use of their ability to manipulate other people. For example, most people were aware that women had the power to "lead men on", and would criticize it, not condone it.

And, more than anything else, what “women’s liberation” demanded was “liberation” from any restraints on their ability to manipulate men.

One of my earliest posts here was about how men need to hone their “rhetoric of ridicule.” Women are masters of using words to play on men’s emotions like they would play a violin, and I believe that men need to study their Game and learn not only how to defeat it, but to turn it back on them.

One of the most fundamental and powerful reaction complexes is something called the “fight flight syndrome.” All animals, humans included, respond to threats and attacks with systemic arousal which puts them in the best position to either fight back against the threat or flee from it. Higher processing centers in the brain are shut down, the bloodstream is flooded with adrenaline and other performance-enhancing hormones, senses become more acute, and reaction time is lowered.

It is the perfect way and time to use a feint to sucker a man into reacting in a less-than-intellectual manner.

Hymowitz’s screed was an all out, full scale, attack on men, delivered in a manner honed by women through millennia of practice – with words, and indirectly enough to be “plausibly deniable.”

In football, if the opposing team can sucker you into jumping off-side, you get a penalty. We need to study the other teams tactics and watch closely for false moves and be able to tell them from a real snap.

The most powerful method a man has to counter attempts to manipulate him is something which has been called the “Hypothalmic Pause.” In all reflexive behavior Response generally immediately follows Stimulus in the manner – S->R. In order to get control of his own reactions back from other people attempting to exploit them to his detriment, a man needs to insert a pause after the stimulus, get control of his autonomic responses, rev his higher order thought processes back up, and choose how he reacts instead of reacting instinctively which makes him utterly predictable – S->P->T-(c)R. After the Stimulus, Pause, Think about what is going on, and then choose your Reaction. Thus is the way of the superior man.

Think of the constant stream of man-bashing articles as the aerial shelling of the gender war. The entire purpose is to keep us in the emotional state of being under attack and keep us off balance so we respond instinctively, and predictably. Think of Hymowitz’s screed as simply another carpet-bombing run in the Blitz of the Gender War. She launched a shotgun attack against men, hoping that the sheer scale of her attack would throw men off balance. She got out a wire brush, jerked down their knickers, and proceeded to royally chap their asses in hopes their attention would be so focused on that they would not catch her palming the card for her next trick of parlor magic.

It succeeded to a large extent. Sure, a lot of guys rallied to do a pellet-by-pellet refutation of her BS, which was the entire point of flinging so much poo at them at once – to keep them busy and wear them out defending themselves on stupid idea after stupid idea that I am sure the mule-faced woman herself does not believe. But, as a tactic it achieved her strategic objective of putting men on the defensive, keeping them so busy with defending themselves against bullshit that their time would be wasted doing that instead of working on their own strategy and tactics.

The lack of any real research at all, even bogus “advocacy research”, was the telltale giveaway – known to gamblers simply as “the tell.” She just strung together a bunch of assertions that she knew would piss off men, and kept piling them on in the belief that if she kept going long enough she would find something to piss off just about anyone. And, all the hackles she raised would have the side benefit of putting money in her pockets as guys bought her book to try to tear apart one stupid argument at a time.

The most important strategy for men overall and individually is to take away women’s ability to control them through manipulation. The way we do this is not to go chasing one bullet or zinger at a time, trying to neutralize them one at a time, but to take out the sniper sending them our way. Imagine her book as a very loud, very foul smelling, verbal fart ripped by one of the matrons in the middle of the Royal Wedding. It was so loud that the minister was actually interrupted in his service, and stunk so bad that everyone sitting close to her moved as far away as they could.

Now, let's really start to go for the jugular.

Now that we have gotten our reflexive instinctive reactions under control, what is she really saying? Look at the woman she chose to use for her example – a used up slag who by her own admission has been pumped and dumped by half the male population of Manhattan.

She is actually bitching about the inevitable consequences of "women's liberation", and caterwauling that women like this can't find nice, stable, high-earning, accountants to finance the post-sluttitude lifestyles to which they would dearly love to become accustomed.

[image]

Well, as the old saying goes – no shit, Sherlock.

As Mr. Price has already pointed out, there is no point in looking for a wife because most of what is out there on the market either look, or act, or both, like the woman in this picture.

And, to all the NAWALTs getting ready to swoop in with their NAWALTs, take your NAWALTs and shove them where the sun don't shine.

What really frightens Hymowitz, and all the slags she is fronting for, is that the very targets of her attack are the men who have figured out the game and how to beat it. It is embarrassingly pathetic to watch her to try to invoke the very social values that feminists have worked for the past 5 decades to destroy, in order to sucker young men into rescuing these slags from the inescapable consequences of the destruction of those values.

Too late, carp-breath.

As Mr. Price says, the game is wearing out for some of us. Younger men have figured out that there simply are no jobs any more which would allow them to live up to their old roles, they have been raised their entire lives with those old traditional roles having been spat upon, so Skadi/Lara/Kathy Hymowitz's complaints about them are falling on deaf ears.

Unfortunately, the only young men left who are ripe for the plucking of either being some Yugo grrl slag's kitchen bitch, or to finance her impulses to Eat, Pray, and Love, are the unfortunate sons of traditionalists who are turning to cannibalism and offering their own sons up to be cannon fodder for the industrial war machine of the Divorce Industry. Younger guys like Ferdinand Barmanu are of the opinion that the Baby Boomers are out to kill him.

In the case of women like Hymowitz, Ferd is probably correct – they would happily boil him in a pot to give some used up slag just one more shopping trip to Nordstrom's. They have not one tiny shred of care or concern for the well being of men – only fear that women's sense of entitlement may go unmet. Arguing with them, trying to refute the things they say that even they know are lies even as they say them, isn't going to accomplish anything.

It is an utter and complete waste of our time, as well as a very foul betrayal of our brothers and sons, to bother fisking what any feminist – right wing or left wing – says detail by detail, and then turn around and give a male voice to the same message and harass them with RealMansprecht

Articles like this are indicative of a last gasp attempt to salvage a hopeless situation. They are nothing more than the latest incarnation of a White Feather Campaign being used as a last ditch attempt to try to sucker young men into sacrificing themselves to bail some used up whore out of the consequences of her own feminist-inspired choices, trying to send them to their deaths which will only serve the agendas of others, by shaming them.

These boys have the right idea, and I suspect that more than a few of them really don't need older manginas and former manginas rushing to their defense. All they need us to do is to not side with their enemies.

Of all the fisking of this article that went on, I think The Damned Olde Man nailed it best, it is all, and only, about women's sense of entitlement –

> Kay seems to believe that women are entitled to a man who will support them in marriage and after divorce. Women are entitled to take a man's children and demand that he hand over his paycheck until they're grown. Women are entitled to men who are willing to go die for them. Women are also entitled to reject men entirely if they so choose. But men are entitled to none of it.
> Instead, men should be happy to find a promiscuous slut who already has a couple of kids for him to support and who will live with him just long enough to produce a couple more before leaving him and claiming that she is now entitled to half his stuff and lifelong support payments under threat of allegations that he was abusive.
> Sorry Kay, men don't want the nightmare offered by the modern, liberated women.

Kay H: "Men, MAN UP!!"
Men: "No. Now shut up and go away."

End of discussion

Know how to win every argument with a woman?
"Argue with my ass, bitch, I'm late for the door."

There is a huge amount of discussion here and thousands of other places on the web about macro strategy – how do we change the entire culture and its values to conform to what we want? Those discussions are useful, but they are long term and it is likely that many of us will not see any results in our lifetimes. Whatever happens, for the time being it really is "every man for himself", and every man has to come up with an individual strategy which will work for himself to survive the years between now and when the new Garden of Eden gets established on earth.

My strategy is fairly simple. I have often quipped that the best way to kill a bad idea is to implement it as fully and quickly as possible, and to make sure everyone knows who is responsible for the idea so they know who to blame when it goes bad. If you fight it and allow it to be implemented a little bit at a time, its advocates can paint you as obstructive and reactionary. They can claim that all the world's problems would be solved by their plan, and blame those who oppose it for those problems not being solved.

Implementing it rapidly and without opposition allows its failures to be immediately apparent, and the people who suggested it are viewed as idiots by those that got hurt by the idea.

Before feminism, women had by far the better half of the deal. A real re-balancing of the social roles would have benefitted men as much or more than women. But, feminism has remained true to its name – FEMININE-ism – and has been relentless in securing as many possible entitlements for women as they could, while leaving nothing at all on the table for men.

Well, with nothing on the table for men, there is no reason for men to continue to sit there and put bread on it simply because women feel entitled to forcing men to do that. So, the men have left the building – to the women who wanted to be men.

Welcome to the world that feminism built for you, grrls. Women are now the new men. Now, go get 'em.

AVfM Radio Show Schedule

Paul Elam · 27 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two days now, folks, and A Voice for Men Radio will make its first landing on the misandric landscape. One small step for the men's movement; one giant leap backward for feminists, manginas, and white knights.

And so today is an auspicious time to announce the schedule for the first month of programming. Here is what you have to look forward to over the next 30 days.

Episode one- March 1, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..

An Introduction to the Men's Movement

Our debut show at A Voice for Men Radio. This program will give an overview of the men's movement, take as many right hooks at feminists and manginas as we can in an hour, let you hear exactly why the men's movement is growing, and why it isn't going to stop. Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com and former Editor-in-Chief of Men's News Daily is your host. One listen to this show and you will find out why the New York Times, CBS News and Ms. Magazine all have their panties in a twist over the work of Mr. Elam. Strap in and buckle up for this one. This is A Voice for Men you have never heard before.

Episode two- March 8, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..

Violent Women and Government Lies

Join host Paul Elam and listen while he strips the sugar coating off the problem of Domestic Violence in western culture. Find out who is lying to you and why, as well as learning a lot about women's capacity for violence that you probably didn't know. This show will hit you right between the eyes, with the truth!

Episode three- March 15, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..

Cry Rape! The Plague of False Accusations

If you think the rape stories about Hofstra and Duke Lacrosse were isolated incidents, think again. Some estimates put the incidence of rape claims being false at nearly 50%. It's a fact that has cost many innocent men their freedom, reputations and livelihood. Learn how to protect yourself from women who will turn personal regret or embarrassment into a cry of rape. It happens to a lot more people than you would think! [Still awaiting confirmation of an appearance by the crew at False Rape Society]

Episode four- March 22, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..

Psycho Women From Hell- With Special Guest Dr. Tara Palmatier

Life with someone two cans shy of a six pack can range from interesting to stressful to quite dangerous. In this show Dr. Tara Palmatier, psychotherapist and the no nonsense founder of shrink4men.com, joins us to talk about women with personality disorders and the men whose lives they often ruin. Consider this show the first anti Oprah installment at AVfM Radio. "Dr. T" will be a regular guest, well into the future.

As you can see, we have some real goodies line up for you, and we know that as we move along it will only get better. Our show producer Keyster will be handling your calls in to the show as well as pushing all the right buttons during the broadcast.

So, if you haven't already, now is the time to make yourself a part of something sure to bring your views of the world to a much larger audience.

1. Register with Blogtalkradio.com (just click on the sign in and follow the prompts)
2. Click the "follow" button on the show page. (!! Very important)

3. Buckle up. This is going to get interesting.

Please note that registering with BTR and following the show will enable you to call in via Skype, and also give you access to the show's live chatroom which is available only during the live broadcast. Keyster will be monitoring the chat as we broadcast and messaging me with your thoughts and ideas.

This is going to be an interactive experience on every level we have available.

I look forward to seeing you and hearing you there. And now for a message from show producer, Keyster:

Some side notes for the listening audience:

1) When I take your call I'll need your name and location.

2) You will then be taken out of "call screening" mode and be listening to the broadcast live while waiting for your turn to talk.

3) You will show up in the caller que and Paul will announce he's taking your call when it's your turn and you will then be put live on the air with Paul.

4) There is about a 5 second delay (just like AM talk radio) so PLEASE turn down your volume on the AVfM player, and listen on your Skype connection or via phone only while you wait to talk and are switched to live, or you will be trying to listen to the delayed version and live version at the same time.

5) There is a chat room feature which I will be monitoring where people can discuss things and pose questions or topics…(although I hope everyone will be listening more and typing less!) We may turn to the chat room now and then to discuss on the air anything interesting or late breaking that might be in there…depending on how the phones are going.

Please do call in and remember CALLERS MAKE THE SHOW as much as the host.
I'm not sure how active the lines initially will be, but we'll do our best to get to everyone…and run over if we have to.

This is gonna be fantastic!
Spread the word!

Democrats Attack the Statue We Said is Not Sexist as 'Sexist'

pierceharlan · 27 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The enlightened, self-important left is quick to cast dreaded conservatives as, among many other ghastly things, narrow-minded censors of the arts. One of the Democratic Party platforms from the 90s said this: "We believe in public support for the Arts, including a National Endowment for the Arts that is free from political manipulation and firmly rooted in the First Amendment's freedom of expression guarantee." That was at a time when photographer Andres Serrano was upsetting the sensibilities of Middle America with his "Piss Christ" that depicted a plastic crucifix submerged in a glass of the artist's urine.

It turns out that tolerant and open-minded Democrats only tolerate opening their minds when it comes to art that doesn't offend their victim group constituencies. Art that depicts the Virgin Mary alongside elephant dung and female genitalia might be fine and dandy to far left politicians because it intrudes on beliefs cherished by traditional Americans. But if a Democratic Party victim group yells "foul," the artwork must go, with angry, snarky rebukes.

I fear that The Spearhead, and a piece I wrote for it, must have triggered the latest uproar. Does it seem a little coincidental that we posted a piece here last month explaining why a largely forgotten statue isn't sexist, and now, prominent Democrats are attacking it as sexist? This statue was not in the news at the time I wrote about it, and I am confident that the post we ran here gave women's groups the impetus to do something they do very well — be offended.

The piece I wrote traced the history of "Civic Virtue Triumphant Over Unrighteousness," an 89-year-old, 22-ton marble statue by sculptor Frederick MacMonnies that created a stir even before it was unveiled outside New York City Hall because it offended women's groups. The statue portrays a nearly nude, sword-wielding, strapping male youth, his foot crushing the necks of two writhing female sirens, Corruption and Vice — one defeated, the other cowering — in an exultant posture of triumph. It is an allegory of triumph over temptation.

But let's get one thing straight: a siren is not a woman. A siren is a mythical creature, a seductresses who was said to lure sailors — who, of course, were human males — with their enchanting music to the rocky coast of their island, causing the men to shipwreck.

What was so offensive about this statue? MacMonnies had the audacity to give vice a feminine face, and to depict virtue as decidedly male. Defenders of the statue prevailed in 1922, pointing out that the genders are often reversed in art – with vice depicted as male and virtue as female – without protest. Last month on The Spearhead, I wrote this: "How do we account for the irrational vitriol of so many women to this statue? Perhaps it is as simple as this: the protestors were, and still are, so accustomed to picturing vice as 'male' that when it is given a feminine face, it is so jarring that they assume it is somehow wrong and must be 'sexist.'"

Fast forward to last week, and enter tart-tongued Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y., who spoke at a protest – a protest! – about the statue: "It doesn't represent civic virtue of any sort, it represents an eyesore." Weiner called the statue sexist and complained that he can see it from his office window. See here.

Weiner is a darling of women's groups for his unconditional support of whatever abortion policy they happen to be pushing. He's joined in the anti-statue crusade by Queens Council Member Julissa Ferreras, and various women's groups. Weiner even took it upon himself to draw up an ad to sell the statue on Craigslist. The ad is below — note, he insists on calling mythological creatures "women," and few people are bothering to call him on it. Here's the ad:

Sexist Statue for Sale

For Sale: 22-ton (sexist) marble "Triumph of Civic Virtue" statue by renowned sculptor Frederick MacMonnies.

Own a (tasteless) piece of New York City history! Triumph of Civic Virtue created by sculptor Frederick MacMonnies – the artist behind iconic figures such as the Quadriga in Brooklyn's Grand Army Plaza – is now up for sale for a limited time.

This controversial and offensive statue crudely depicts a young man with a sword triumphantly standing over the defeated bodies of two women. In 1941, then-Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia had the good sense to banish the figure from its initial location in City Hall Park.

Unfortunately, it ended up in Kew Gardens, where it remains to this day.

Now, community leaders want to see it go.

All proceeds from the sale of this sexist eyesore will benefit the city of New York. Shipping is not included.

And isn't that position typical of progressives when it comes to gender issues? They twist and pound the facts beyond all recognition to fit their victim narrative. They cry "sexism" where there is none. And they toss their noble and enlightened sentiments onto a scrapheap of indifference whenever those sentiments don't advance their political agenda.

With all the pressing issues facing America, isn't it nice to know that a prominent member of Congress took time out of his busy schedule to inject himself into local politics in order to pander to his core constituents by bellyaching about imaginary oppression?

What a disgrace.

The Unfiltered, Genuine Draft

Jack Donovan · 27 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There have been many spirited discussions of tactics around these parts recently. Everyone seems to be talking about how to handle these trendy but timely drive-by opinion pieces on "The End of Men."

Should men ignore them?

Should men respond?

Are men even the intended audience for these pieces?

Are we being baited?

Does what men do or say even really matter?

All good questions. For my part, I want to add that so many of the issues brought up by Rosin, Hymowitz, et al., were foreseen by Lionel Tiger all the way back in 1999. Tiger also handled the issues more thoroughly and thoughtfully, though I believe the solutions he offered would ultimately be inadequate and they would require the kind of "macro-rationalism" that he believes humans generally fail to manage. In reviewing his book, The Decline of Males, I came across the following passage. It seemed particularly relevant to the exchanges taking place throughout the "manosphere" right now, so I hope he doesn't mind if I post a lengthy quote from it here.

> Men in groups do not appear to perceive themselves as men in a group. They do not define themselves as members of an assembly with a collective interest. To the extent that they are conscious at all of any problems they face, men seem to assume these will be solved in the traditional public way. Their fantasy is, all they have to do is behave in reasonably civil, even gentlemanly ways. Everything will turn out peaceably and well.
> But they are enduring illusion and self-deception. In truth, "they just don't get it" and don't get what they're about not to have. They fail to understand the implacably coercive breadth of what is in their faces. What is under way is so imprecise but so general and atmospheric they do not realize what is happening to them. In response, men pursue a strategy that they barely even recognize is a strategy, perhaps because it is a failure. To maintain agreeable lives, they will use traditional tools and modes of power. But this strategy is also one that is clearly foundering. It is accelerating the decline of men. The new outcome for men is not yet clear.

I have yet to see so much as an appreciative hat-tip to Tiger—or even a substantive refutation of his ideas—in any of these "decline" pieces. There are still so few books on the topic that these omissions seem willful, ideological, bitchy and unprofessional. Tiger saw all of this coming. Though I don't agree with everything Tiger wrote or share all of his sentiments, I highly recommend his book. It is still relevant over a decade after it was published—perhaps even more relevant—and I don't think it ever got the attention it deserved.

Regarding the quote above, I think that the collection of writers we have here at The Spearhead and around the web at affiliated or sympathetic blogs are signs that men are beginning to get "what they're about not to have." I feel a bit SWPL writing this, but the task at hand is not so much organizing, jock strap burning or marching on Washington.

It is "raising awareness."

Feminism isn't going to go away if you ignore it, or give it the silent treatment, or take the high road. It's going to fail because, as Tiger pointed out, it is as inhuman as Communism. It has to be enforced at the end of a gun. However, there's no guarantee that one day we will simply wake up and see that feminism has failed. It will probably be a long, distasteful process, and a lot of men are going to get screwed over along the way. Men need to think about what they want, and how to re-assert their own interests. They need examine and understand the root causes of the problem and wrestle with the difficult philosophical dilemmas that underlie what Tiger called a "struggle of sexual classes."

The second piece I wrote for The Spearhead was titled, "Writing About Men Is Important."

It still is.

Those of us who write have a lot more important writing to do.

If more academics want to get involved like Tiger has, good for them. They have the time and support to work at a different level of detail than I can afford to as a working stiff who has to set aside nights and weekend mornings to write. But academics have gatekeepers and filters and obligations. They have to deal with an entrenched orthodoxy that favors feminist means and aims, and has no real reason to cede territory. Academics have to make compromises and concessions.

We have the freedom to say things that they simply can't.

We are the unfiltered, genuine draft.

I say, keep it coming.

As young men question the lies that our society tells them about themselves–as the scales fall from their eyes–they'll need somewhere to look for a different take on the issues as they come up. There will be differences of opinion and philosophical disputes between men, and that's fine, but feminists can't be allowed to monopolize the discussion about The Way of Men.

Activism/Promotion Opportunity — Confronting Dow Chemical on Misandry

Featured Guest · 28 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Dow Chemical Company has announced a virtual conference Tuesday, March 1st, called The Future We Create. "Covering topics from mentoring young women and fostering executive leadership to gender differences, the hour-long virtual conference will address the issue of how stakeholders can work together to expand women's leadership in chemistry and the sciences."

Quoting from their Facebook page: "Did you know that only 15 of the 72 members elected into the National Academy of Science (NAS) in 2010 are women? : Join 60 of today's leading minds for 60 minutes to discuss, debate and define how women can move the field and industry of chemistry—as well as other sciences—forward."

The implication is that only when parity is achieved – in practice by ousting men from the leadership positions they've earned or eliminating opportunities for new male leaders – will their mission be complete.

Of course, this is all in an effort to promote diversity and inclusion. Accordingly, all 60 of the conference speakers are women.

I thought that A Voice For Men and Spearhead readers might enjoy an opportunity to enhance diversity and inclusion on The Future We Create's Facebook page by ensuring that men's views are represented there too.

Accordingly, I will donate $5.00 to AVfM Radio for every pro-male comment posted on the Future We Create Facebook page, up to a maximum of $400. [offer upped to $7.00 per comment by KARMA] Please also copy your comment as a reply here so I don't miss it. Note: You have to click the "Like" button at the top to be able to post (sorry). If you do not have a Facebook account, you will need to create one.

As an added bonus, I will also donate $1 to AVFM Radio for every person who adds Paul Elam as a friend on Facebook and $1 to The Spearhead for every person who "Like"s The Spearhead Facebook page by the end of the week.

If you're interested in crashing the conference itself, it takes place at 11 AM ET on Tuesday on Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn.

Warning: Link contains head shots of the conference speakers.

While you're at it, why not use your new Facebook account to sign up to follow A Voice For Men Radio, which has just one thing in common with the Future We Create conference: it debuts Tuesday (at 9 PM ET).

- Signed, Your Diversity & Inclusion Watchdog

Addendum: Future We Create is auto-deleting comments on their Wall, but replies to their own comments do not seem to be effected. It is better to respond to an existing comment rather than posting directly on the Wall. And please copy your post here to AVFM in case it gets deleted immediately, so we will get credit..

Liberating Egypt from Female Genital Mutilation

Featured Guest · 28 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: Mr. Pellissier sent me this article for publication a couple days ago, and I wondered how it directly concerns men's issues. After some thought, I realized that it does, because as men we as likely to be fathers of daughters as sons, and if there is anything I'm sure of, fathers do not want their daughters to suffer needlessly. So, the question is, is it really the "patriarchy" that supports the practice?]

Hank Pellissier

Ethical Technology

"That woman in Cairo," I wonder as I stare at the dramatic photo in Washington Post, "the one with the Egyptian flag and the black headscarf… does she have a clitoris?"

Perhaps my question is intrusive and impolite. Perhaps discussing clitorises is a more taboo topic than if I, for example, announced that I don't have a foreskin, or that I do have a hemorrhoid.

I don't know. What I do believe (mutating stanzas from 1963's Marat/Sade by Peter Weiss) is this:

> What's the point of the Egyptian Revolution
> If it doesn't stop female genital mutilation?
> If girls are chopped bloody, sexually-deducted,
> Was the 18-day struggle at all productive?
> Egypt gave itself a Mubarak-tomy
> Now its time to end clitoridectomy
> Let us condemn
> F-G-M

Is female genital mutilation (FGM) a transhumanist issue? Yes. "Enhancement" is championed by technoprogressives as a basic human right; this suggests that the opposite "reductions" like FGM deserve condemnation as a violation of the same entitlement. The H+ desire to be "more than human" should be linked to a protest against non-consensual amputation. The Transhumanist Declaration also strives for the "alleviation of grave suffering."

Do I believe male circumcision of infants is also a non-consensual "reduction" that transhumanists should oppose? Yes, I do. In San Francisco, where I live, there's a proposal circulating that would ban the unnecessary, sensory-reducing procedure. The measure intends to make it "unlawful to circumcise, excise, cut or mutilate the whole or any part of the foreskin, testicles, or penis of another person who has not attained the age of 18 years." The law, if passed, would punish the new crime with up to one year in jail and a $1,000 fine, and it's getting my vote.

However, female genital mutilation is not circumcision—it's a far more dangerous and debilitating attack on the flesh. Abolishing FGM unfortunately was not an agenda item that any Egyptian revolutionary spokesperson mentioned, and it was generally ignored as a subject of discussion by international media until CBS reporter Lara Logan was assaulted in Tahrir Square on February 11 by a mob of up to 200 men.

The Sunday Times reported that "sensitive parts of her body were covered with red marks… from aggressive pinching." She was also "stripped, punched and slapped." Suddenly, misogynist horror in the land of the Pharaohs was in the spotlight, and why not? The attack on Logan, who was rescued by Egyptian women and policemen after 20 to 30 minutes of abuse, serves as a potent reminder that even with Mubarak gone, it's often a nasty men's world in the Nile nation.

“Rampant sexual harassment, public fondling and groping of women… is used as a way to keep women indoors,” writes Asra Nomani in the Huffington Post. A 2008 survey by the Egyptian Centre for Women’s Rights says 83% of Egyptian women and 98% of foreign visiting females experience sexual harassment, and the Arab Human Development Report (2009) claims 35% of all Egyptian women have been physically attacked, a figure they suggest is grossly under-reported. The 2010 Global Gender Gap Index, a Swiss study that rates progress towards women’s equality, places Egypt in the international cellar: #125 out of 134 nations surveyed. Egypt’s rank is abysmal because it excludes women from good jobs, especially managerial positions, and only 2% of parliament is female.

Abuse of Egyptian females often occurs early in life, with female genital mutilation. Although it was banned in 2007 by the Ministry of Health following the death of 12-year-old Badour Shaker—who overdosed on anesthesia in an illegal clinic—its prevalence has only dropped from 97% to 91% in recent years, according to Nfissatou Diop, program coordinator of a joint project by UNICEF and UNFPA (United Nations Population Fund).

The Grand Mufti of Egypt has said FGM is “prohibited,” the Al-Aabar Supreme Council of Islamic Research says it shouldn’t be practiced because it has no basis in Islamic law, and even the former first lady—Suzanne Mubarak—denounced it as “a flagrant example of continued physical and psychological violence.”

So…why does this barbarity persist?

UNICEF claims that FGM’s primary raison d’etre is to “reduce the sexual desire of a female…[to] maintain a girl’s virginity prior to marriage and her fidelity thereafter.” Traditions insist that FGM makes girls “clean,” “beautiful,” and “pure,” because it removes the “ugly” and “dirty” genitalia. Superstitious propaganda also contends that men become impotent or sick if their penis contacts a clitoris, that a mother’s milk will be poisonous if she’s uncut, that her face will turn yellow and she’ll get vaginal cancer without FGM, and (perhaps most frighteningly) she’ll masturbate excessively or become a lesbian.

My sociological opinion is that FGM’s intent is to terrorize young females into lifelong submission to male authority.

Archeologists believe FGM’s origins probably lie in the pyramids’ shadows. Unraveled mummies were found with FGM, and a Greek papyrus from 163 B.C. notes that Egyptian girls were given the operation when they received their dowries.

Today, an estimated two million girls per year are excised. Here’s a list of high percentage nations, tabulated by Rosemarie Skaine in her book, Female Genital Mutilation: Legal, Cultural, and Medical Issues—Burkina Faso (71.6%), Chad (60%), Cote d’Ivoire (44.5%), Djibouti (90-98%), Eritrea (90%), Ethiopia (69.7-94.5%), Gambia (80-90%), Ghana (40%), Guinea (98.6%), Liberia (60%), Mali (92%), Mauritania (71%), Sierra Leone (90%), Somalia (95%), Sudan (91%), Togo (50%), Iraqi Kurdistan (72.7%), and Egypt (78-97%).

Egyptian feminist Nawal El Saadawi—who had her clitoris excised when she was six—became a doctor who regularly observed the “terrible physical damage female genital mutilation could cause.” In 1972, when she was director general in the Egyptian Ministry of Health, she wrote a book, Women and Sex, that criticized FGM. She subsequently lost her job.

Ayaan Hirsi Ali, the Somali/Dutch/American writer, is probably the most famous chronicler of her own genital mutilation experience. In her biography, Infidel, she describes her cutting, followed by infibulation:

Women held my legs apart. The man… picked up a pair of scissors… The scissors went down between my legs and the man snipped off my inner labia and clitoris, like a butcher snipping the fat off a piece of meat. A piercing pain shot up between my legs, indescribable, and I howled. Then came the sewing: the long, blunt needle clumsily pushing into my outer labia, my long and anguished protests…”

Many girls die during or after their excision, from infections. Other complications cause enormous, more or less lifelong pain… My once cheerful, playful little sister [Hawaya] changed… never the same afterwards. She became ill with a fever for several weeks… horrible nightmares… she just stared vacantly at nothing for hours…

Later, her sister dies young, after years of psychosis.

Hearing this stuff drives me, personally, crazy with rage and bewilderment. How can anyone who claims to love their children simultaneously subject their innocents to such ghastly abuse? To care for one's children is to keep them from harm, not dissect their young bodies with filthy tools.

The civilized outcry against FGM is not 100% universal, due to "cultural relativism" infecting some circles of feminism. The Village Voice reports that in 2006, Patricia Clough, director of the Center for the Study of Women at CUNY, "declined to call female genital mutilation wrong." Rogaia Mustafa Abusharaf of Brown University has also defined FGM as "a site of identity formation."

But generally, condemnation of FGM in the Western world is substantial, led by many European women's groups, such as GAMS FRANCE, GAMS BELGIUM, END FGM, FGM- HILFE (Austria), Female Integrity (Sweden), FSAN (The Netherlands), FORWARD (UK), and others.

If FGM persists in Egypt after democracy (we hope) is installed, it will be an embarrassment in the pages of their progress. Ignoring FGM at this time would resemble the shame American people of conscience feel when they regard the year 1870, when black men were given the vote via the 15th Amendment, but women of all colors were denied—for another 50 years (the 19th Amendment).

Egyptian feminist Nawla Darwiche has stated that "all the men were very respectful during the revolution… sexual harassment didn't occur during the revolt." Let's hope, and insist, that this cessation of abuse becomes a permanent feature in the new, ancient nation. The words "Egyptian Revolution" have a glorious sound, but not if we simultaneously hear the screams of girls.

The Post-Feminist Future is a Feast for the Free

by Alphabeta Supe

With the recent talk of post-feminism, I've been casting my mind forward to 2020, when some say the misandry bubble will burst and men will regain political primacy. I'm 10 years older, have a nice house, a nice car, good friends, meaningful work. I've gone my own way and have no kids. I've a pile of money invested wisely and am master of all I care to survey. My thoughts now turn to the question that has been boring a hole in my mind since the bubble began to inflate:

Who'll inherit my stuff when I'm gone?

I dream on…the misandry bubble has indeed burst and men who had the foresight to see what was coming are emerging from their bunkers. Feminism as an ideology lies in ruins, having been exposed to the quick for the arrant fraud that it was. The Stockholm Declaration - the instrument that sealed its doom, has been signed. Hard-core feminists and their collaborators have been hunted down, tried, found guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced to Sweden, now effectively a labour camp, for the terms of their natural lives. Julian Assange, the facilitator of the downfall, has been endowed by King William V of Great Britain with a new order of chivalry in memory of the pivotal event – Knight of the Leaky Wick.

Gender relations around the world are starting to improve. Feminist propaganda is banned on pain of death. There is no internet in Sweden. The time has come for MGTOW to return to the mainstream, find suitable mates and fill the Promised Land with the fruit of their loins.

In this post-feminist dream a beautiful young woman, full and fresh with the ripeness of healthy youth, has sought refuge in my lands. Her heartbeat races at twenty paces and there are tingles in her loins when we touch. Her deep-as-the-sea, hero-worshipping eyes make it clear we must breed. Problem is, she was born to Eve but raised by Jezebel so while her heart is pure her soul is tainted by the poisoned apple of misandry.

In other words, she has never been taught how to not hate men.

What would I say to her? She has denounced feminism with all her heart and has tearfully prostrated herself before me. She begs to be taught. What could I say to her? What words could unravel the steel-threaded cocoon of feminist lies and deceit without garrotting the soft pink chrysalis inside?

"F*ck off and die, you blood-sucking parasite!"

…thunders A Voice from the left, forever riding shotgun.

"Let's get you out of those dirty clothes…"

…croons the crimson artist, from le Château dans les nuages.

As tempting as these suggestions would be, I think I'd say something more like this – a sort of post-feminist manifesto for women who survive the disease:

- Don't be narcissistic. A woman should never think she's more important than men or children. Marketing departments delight in exploiting a woman's tendency to think they are. They promote 'women's only' this and that, and many women buy into it. This appears sexist but it is really a marketing ploy that works because most women are narcissistic. Companies know they can charge more for goods and services by using the words 'women only'. Narcissistic women are easily exploitable women. Be neither.

- Don't let others make choices for you. This should be self-evident but many women allow themselves to be told what to wear, what to buy, what to eat, how to dress, where to go, how to think – in clubs, gyms, magazines, websites, books, stores and by TV talk show hosts. They seem to need a step-by-step guide through life, which they follow like sheep as companies exploit this ‘need’. Don’t swallow the same poison. Don’t believe the same lies. Behave like a sheep if you must but obey the sheepdog, not the wolf. Better yet, be a woman who can think for herself.

- Get rid of the self-induced schizophrenia. Don’t insist you’re strong, confident, capable and independent one minute, then weak, frightened and vulnerable the next, especially when you’ve been caught doing something wrong. Don’t chop and change your character whenever it suits you – choose one and stick with it. Admit when you’ve done something wrong. Don’t suddenly remember that you suffered abuse in the past or have some kind of mental illness or other instability, then use it to get yourself off. If you never sought help for these problems before you were caught, don’t use them as an excuse afterwards. Be a woman who accepts responsibility for her actions.
- Don’t let the law take responsibility for crimes women commit. Speak out against women routinely receiving shorter sentences than men for the same crimes. If the law punishes women as it does children, treat them like children and encourage other women to do so too. Don’t call these women victims and say ‘they’ve suffered enough’ because they’re women. Believe in, and stand up for, equal justice on the basis of gender.
- Don’t believe everything women and manginas in the media tell you. Many serve up slop by the bucket – celebrity gossip, slimming tips, sex tips, man-shaming tips, rape fantasy stories, etc. TV shows like Oprah and Dr Phil are filled with advice on how women can transform themselves into victims and blame everything on men, while constantly ridiculing them. Partake of more nutritious fare than this. Get your infotainment from equitable presenters. Always be aware of the cultural status quo from both perspectives.
- Don’t fake solidarity with other women, especially in public. Don’t pretend that all women are your best friends when everyone knows nothing could be further from the truth. Openly acknowledge the reality that many women despise each other unless there’s personal advantage in not doing so. Game has taught post-feminist men how to see through attempts at deception, so a woman’s lies don’t travel far. Don’t be a liar, especially not an obvious one.
- Speak out against misandry. The main reason for its proliferation is that good women have remained silent. Silence in the face of this injustice is cowardly. It allows loud, obnoxious women to preach hatred with impunity, which reflects badly on all women. When you speak out against the rubbish misandristic women throw at you about men, you do all women a favour. Don’t be a coward and don’t be silent.

This is the chalice I offer to women who wander into my future realm. It carries a distillation of the conciliatory parts of the anti-misandry narrative to date, so the post-feminist woman who draws from it has a chance at new life, both in her belly and in her heart. If she rejects it, her future will perish in the cold, barren wasteland of the feminist soul. It’s her body, but the future of mankind is NOT her choice.

Did my breeding beauty drink? I don’t know…I woke up.

Desperate Single Mothers Turn to Incest to Woo Online Lover

W.F. Price · 1 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a sad story that shows just how depraved American society has become, a fat, chinless, middle-aged used car salesman managed to persuade a half dozen women to produce child porn with their underage children, one being only three years old at the time.

Steven Demink, the internet lothario, posed as a single father of a 14-year-old girl, using head shots of male models to make himself appear desirable. Calling himself "Dalton St. Clair," he also claimed to be a psychologist, and used the phony credentials to convince the women that molesting their children was a form of therapy. To further encourage them to commit these crimes, which involved lewd acts in front of a webcam with their children, he would offer to date the women if they complied.

What is interesting here is the method Demink employed. Although it is suggested that he "duped" the women, what actually appears to have happened is that the parties merely exchanged one form of pornography for another.

As has recently been discussed in our corner of the internet, many women crave "emotional pornography" to the same extent men crave the visual kind. Demink, for all his mundane qualities, appears to have had a remarkably astute understanding of this proclivity, which he used for criminal purposes.

Although the women are characterized in the linked AP article as having been convinced by Demink's assertions that incest would be good for their children, any reasonable person would realize that no psychologist would suggest such activity as therapy. These women may not have been particularly sharp, but they were judged competent to stand trial, and a couple have already been sentenced to hard time in prison.

It is encouraging to see that the women who participated in the crimes are also being held responsible under the law, but it is likely that a number of people, including prosecutors and judges, and definitely reporters, are missing the quid pro quo inherent in these acts. This was not a case of women simply acting negligently, but rather an example of a man and women swapping different forms of pornography online, and collaborating in its production.

Demink's creation, the fantasy of the sexy, high-status single father, gave these pathetic single mothers something they craved, and in return they put on some truly vile productions to indulge the lust of an equally pathetic man. This unfortunate case demonstrates how readily some single mothers will victimize their own children to satisfy their own desires, and leads to the question of whether the female form of pornography, although not recognized as such under the law, is not at least as depraved as the male.

Featured Guest · 1 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By M. M.

Political correctness is such a pervasive ideology that everyone must deal with it during the course of his undergraduate education; I went one step further and shelled out $40,000 to spend an additional two years in one of its bastions. My purpose was to obtain my Masters of Fine Arts degree. Unfortunately, I chose to pursue this degree through a particularly flakey New England university's graduate program, the head of which, it bears mentioning, was a self-described, practicing witch who once got an abortion and bragged about it on YouTube. During my time there as a closet conservative, I learned the following social and spiritual beliefs which the fringe left espouses when insulated from wrong-thinking people:

The key to enlightenment is to internalize a cryptic caste system whereby the further removed an individual is from white, heterosexual, Christian manhood, the higher on the social and spiritual totem pole he—I'm sorry, she—resides. Once this is accomplished, many truths which seemed fantastical begin to make sense.

Women have a supernatural kinship with the moon. I found this out when the program head read her poem recounting the circumstances of her first period. She had been standing on the porch with her family staring at the night sky when the image of the moon took hold of her and she began to freely menstruate. Think that scene in The Exorcist where Reagan crashes her mother's cocktail party, tells the attending astronaut "You're going to die up there!", then urinates herself.

The skin of an Inuit has cleansing properties. This became apparent to me when the program head asked an Inuit student to wear a stone necklace she wanted "cleansed" against her skin for 24 hours, then threw a public fit when she "caught" the student without the necklace later in the day. The student explained to us that she had been afraid to wear the necklace because she "didn't know what it contained." Dark forces, presumably.

Following the non-politically motivated shooting of a politician in a southwestern state, it is for some reason necessary to exorcise the specter of right-wing fanaticism by publicly burning a newspaper photograph of the shooter, particularly if one is the program head of a New England university with no connection to the event.

Racism can cause a minority man to cheat on his wife by performing oral sex on other men; fortunately, that man can become a cultural hero by relating his infidelity and his rationalization for it. I was taught this by a Japanese-American professor's public description about the way in which the daily oppression of Asian-Americans (as evidenced by their significantly higher than average income levels) compelled him to act out his subordinate role through a string of submissive, homosexual encounters, and the many allusions to his bravery from students and staff which followed.

Supreme Court rulings prohibiting religious expression at publicly funded university events don't apply to the chanted refrains of a Wiccan "invocatory" poem praising the earth, and students therefore have no right to complain about their forced participation.

When we are sick, we are naturally attracted to plants that heal us. This was divulged during a presentation given by a visiting author promoting her book on the topic.

When faced with a major life decision, the best course of action is to walk into the woods with your eyes closed until you "feel compelled to stop," spin clockwise three times, then open them. The first thing you focus on will be your "omen." I learned this during a presentation on "omen gathering," after which students were told to try the method out in the woods behind the seminar meetinghouse. Some of us didn't "feel compelled to stop" until we had reached the dorms.

Finally, pointing out the hypocrisy of male-bashing while enjoying all the modern amenities which men have invented, such as automobiles, contraception, vaccines, etc… to a brittle, middle-aged feminist over breakfast will invite derogatory comparisons to her “enlightened” husband. Informing said feminist that her husband “is a pussy,” will subject you to both a strident lecture on the backwardness of using a female sex organ as a derogatory label and being called an asshole. Explaining, in response, that the asshole is a male sex organ, and that if the feminist has any doubt about this she can always ask her husband since it “sounds like he enjoys taking it up the ass,” will make you a pariah in your program for the rest of the semester. You will also be branded a homophobe, even if you are openly gay.

Such were the fruits of my graduate education.

A Contrast in Audio

W.F. Price · 2 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It was a real treat to hear Paul on the air last night — putting men's issues on air was something that needed to be done. Paul's got a knack for conversation and a good voice for radio, and Keyster's got the tech skills to make it a good production. But aside from the quality and obvious demand for this programming, it accomplished on the very first day something I hadn't expected, or even considered.

Before I heard the first AVfM broadcast, I listened to an NPR program a friend pointed out. The show featured Kay Hymowitz and Michael Kimmel, who supposedly come from opposite sides of the spectrum, but as far as I could tell agreed on everything but the details. It was a 30-minute program, during which both discussed the plight of men. NPR fielded some calls, and it was obviously a subject a lot of men wanted to talk about. The premise Hymowitz and Kimmel were operating under was that there's something gone wrong with men. For Hymowitz, they aren't "manning up," and Kimmel asserts essentially the same thing by saying that adolescents and young men live in this toxic "guyland." According to both of them, young women are doing just fine. It was typical fare, but a few guys called up and took issue with it. Amusingly, one young woman called up to say that while she wanted "mature" guys, she also enjoyed "free-spirited" men and wasn't really interested in a sober, family type, thus proving what guys like Ferdinand Bardamu have been writing about young women.

If that NPR show were the only discussion we had about men's issues, we'd be in a depressing situation indeed. As Jack Donovan has pointed out to me, people like Hymowitz and Kimmel live in a cultural bubble of academics and pundits in New York. No matter what position they take on issues, they're essentially part of the same club. They may be of various ethnicities and religions, some may be Republicans and some Democrats, but when it comes down to it they share a similar set of values and lifestyle. They know the same people, attend the same cultural events, send their kids to the same schools, etc. Given the size of our greater civilization, they are a tiny little slice of the whole, but somehow they have seized the cultural podium, and we're far more likely to hear their opinion than representatives of any other cultural group. Sometimes, when they come up with their incredibly off-base assessments I wonder whether they really are that removed from ordinary reality. That might be the case.

After listening to the NPR program, I tuned in to hear the second half of the AVfM opening broadcast, when Paul Elam was taking calls. I heard stories just like my own. I heard guys from all over North America. I saw a blazing chat board. Men were coming in from everywhere — all over the place. And all sorts, too: White men, Black men, Asian men, you name it. The contrast between the NPR show and the AVfM show couldn't have been greater. On the one hand you had a discussion between insiders – representatives of a tiny group of people – and on the other there was this broad movement of men from all over the map. It was extraordinary, and really put things in perspective. From this contrast, it became apparent that we don't really have to worry about what Michael Kimmel and Kay Hymowitz have to say — our message and our group is bigger. Our potential is far greater. All they have is a few fading institutions, while we have a wide open land.

As much as I looked forward to hearing the first AVfM broadcast, I didn't expect to get such an optimistic first impression, nor did I expect to come away so convinced that there is a popular mandate for change. And the best thing about it is that this is just the beginning. Although I'm not sure everyone is going to want to spend much time listening to Hymowitz and Kimmel on NPR, after hearing AVfM you will have an entirely different impression of these two people living in a cozy little elite bubble. You will hear a couple chummy people talking as though they are at a dinner party in the Manhattan — talking to themselves for all intents and purposes. They may still think they are talking to the "right people" and the "people that matter," but the men we are talking to are legion, like the sands of the desert and the stars of the sky.

It's a big world out there. Much bigger, even, than Manhattan. And it's ours for the taking.

Charlie Sheen finds out how they deal with troublesome men

W.F. Price · 2 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Charlie Sheen, whose feud with employers at CBS has spilled out into the open, has been on a tear lately, taking no prisoners and saying all sorts of outrageous things. There's no doubt he's been ruffling some feathers, annoying people, and coming off as a bit unhinged, but he seemed to think he had the situation under control. Today, the other shoe dropped, and police entered Sheen's home and seized his children at the behest of his ex-wife, who allegedly has a substance abuse problem like him.

Sheen may be acting a bit crazy, but if he's recently gone cold turkey, that's to be expected, and it doesn't appear that he's broken any laws with his outbursts and off-kilter antics. However, there are other means to deal with men who are causing a stir, and they often hit closer to home than the threat of a spell in the county lockup. In short, they go for what you really care about: the children.

> LOS ANGELES — Troubled Hollywood star Charlie Sheen told U.S. television Wednesday that police acting under court order removed his twin sons from his home overnight after his estranged wife expressed concern for their welfare.
> The actor told NBC television's "Today Show" program that his two-year old sons, Max and Bob, were removed by officers from the Los Angeles Police Department.
> "I said, 'I love you, and I said, don't say good-bye. Say "see you later." Later is, as we believe, to be very soon," Sheen said, describing his parting from the two boys.

The same threat was leveled against Mel Gibson, who has had his own behavioral issues, not all that long ago.

Plenty of people have reason to dislike Mel Gibson, although those who know the man personally tend to defend him. He can be abrasive, offensive and about as politically incorrect as possible. Parallels have been drawn between him and Charlie Sheen. Perhaps there is something about acting that demands a certain volatility of character. However, nobody besides opposing parties in custody disputes ever suggested that Mel Gibson – or Charlie Sheen – were anything but loving fathers as far as their children were concerned.

Despite that fact, the NY Times came out with an article that should be extraordinarily worrisome to any divorced father. It was titled "In Family Court, a Reckoning for Gibson's Career." The article implied, accurately, that determinations made in family court can have a profound effect on a man's life prospects. What it did not do, however, was get to the next logical conclusion: family court can also be used to coerce men in matters beyond their families. Indeed, this is part of the problem with contemporary family law — it has the potential to be used as a tool of social control. Don't like someone's political views? Seize their children and hang on until they shut up. Have a beef with an employee or coworker? Call his ex-wife and tell her you'll give her a hand in court. Custody disputes could be used to blackmail, intimidate or simply lay low one's enemies.

Although Sheen comes off as unstable and strange to a lot of people who have heard him lately, there's something quite menacing about this seizure of his children, which was accomplished with an ex parte restraining order. The truth is, it could happen to any number of men, including some who have perfectly legitimate complaints (and for all we know Sheen's complaints may be legitimate).

I think Americans have stop and ask themselves something very important:

What is a Constitution that prohibits warrantless seizure of our property and persons worth if someone can walk into a courthouse and have a judge rubber-stamp an order for the police to come into our homes and seize our children?

The Decline and Fall of Antioch College

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 2 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In my last post I predicted that the University of Cincinnati would collapse due to its embrace of feminism and leftism at the expense of real scientific disciplines like computer science. Several commenters brought up the example of Antioch College which had collapsed due to its embrace of feminism and leftism.

Antioch College was originally founded in 1853 in Ohio by the Christian Connection movement and the Unitarian Church. Beginning in the 1940s it became a hotbed of progressivism and one of the first colleges to experience leftist student activism. This continued to the 1960s when Antioch College became one of the primary locations of student radicalism, the New Left, the anti-Vietnam War movement, and the Black Power movement in that part of the US. The 1970s were more of the same for Antioch College, but it expanded to include several satellite campuses under the name of Antioch University. In the late 1970s Antioch College started having problems with its finances and experienced a decline in enrollment from around 2000 students to around 1000 students. While Antioch College's financial situation stabilized in the 1980s it never was able to increase student enrollment beyond 1000 students.

Antioch College started having problems again in the early to mid 1990s when its "Sexual Offense Prevention Policy" received national publicity. According to the policy, consent for sexual behavior must be mutual, verbal, and reiterated for each new step of sexual behavior. The original version policy was created at Antioch College's "Womyn's Center" due to the agitation of a group of students called "Womyn of Antioch" and called for immediate expulsion of any man accused of a sexual offense with no rights given to the accused. A revised version of what the "Womyn's Center" wrote became policy for Antioch College. Even the revised version was so absurd that it became the basis of a Saturday Night Live sketch called "Is It Date Rape?"

Things continued to deteriorate at Antioch College so that by 2000 Mumia Abu Jamal and transgendered rights activist, Leslie Feinberg, were invited to be speakers at that year's commencement. This also recieved national publicity, and in the few years after enrollment declined to 600 students. By 2003 the situation at Antioch College deteriorated to the point where a renewal plan was started. This was done alongside deep cuts in staff which included eliminating Antioch College's Office for Multicultural Affairs. The led to a student protest called the "People of Color Takeover". Antioch College created the "Coretta Scott King Center for Cultural and Intellectual Freedom" in response to that protest but Antioch College still deteriorated. By 2007 enrollment had declined to 370 students. Also during 2007 the faculty of Antioch College filed a lawsuit against its Board of Trustees. Soon after operations were suspended at Antioch College, and it was closed in 2008.

Currently there are plans to reopen Antioch College in the fall of this year. Even if Antioch College reopens it is unlikely that it will ever regain the status it had.

Proposed Reforms Will Make it Easier to Convict Your Son of Rape, Even if He's Innocent pierceharlan · 3 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Since the great wave of feminist reforms first struck our peaceful shores thirty years ago, the goal of reformers has been to transform rape law to make it easier to charge and convict men and boys. These reforms typically are being made under the radar, without fanfare and often without any public debate. Most readers will assume it can't get any worse than it is, but trust me, it can get worse. This article will chronicle some of the more dangerous proposals. Before we do that, it is well to summarize the history of these reforms to underscore the sexual grievance industry's incredible track record for effecting change.

History of Rape Reforms Since the Dawn of the Feminist Revolution

Starting in the 1970s but especially in the 1980s and 1990s, our politicians kowtowed to the sexual grievance industry, which insisted that rape was grotesquely under-reported and that reforms were needed to do justice to countless women who supposedly suffered the brutal indignity of rape in silence. So they set to work to solve a problem that no one can prove even exists.

They adopted laws that eliminated the requirement of corroboration. Other crimes had no such requirement, they said, blinking at the fact that rape is not like other crimes. In many cases, the sole evidence of rape is precisely the same as the sole evidence of the most common act of love, performed innumerable times throughout the world every day. That act of love can be transmogrified into an alleged felony merely by claiming it was performed without consent. In practice, the elimination of corroboration essentially flipped the old law on its head: now, women don't need any corroboration of their claims, but men and boys accused of rape are arrested, jailed, charged, and sometimes tried and convicted, solely on even the far-fetched say-so of any woman or girl if the men and boys can't produce corroborating evidence of their innocence. It is literally guilty until proven innocent.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we adopted rape shield laws that barred the admission in a rape trial of almost any evidence of the accuser's prior sexual history with persons other than the accused. There is no evidence that rape shield laws have had more than minimal effect on the incidence of reports of acquaintance rape, but who cared? Rape shield laws too often have been abused, sometimes resulting in the conviction of an innocent man or boy. They have been used to exclude relevant evidence that the accuser has made prior false rape claims; that the accuser has used the same modus operandi to seduce other men; and that the accuser is a prostitute. In one famous case, a woman claimed she was tortured and sodomized; the man claimed the act was consensual. She denied ever expressing interest in sado-masochism, and he tried to introduce into evidence emails showing that she had expressed interest in sado-masochism. The email evidence was excluded, and her lie was permitted to go unrebutted.

That wasn't enough, so we extended rape shield laws to civil actions in Federal Courts and in a growing number of state courts. The Advisory Committee that pushed the federal rule change expressed its hope that this protection against invasions of privacy, potential embarrassment, and unwarranted sexual stereotyping will "encourage victims to come forward."

That wasn't enough, they said. So we adopted laws that eliminated the requirements of force and resistance, and innocent men and boys who mistook the acquiescence of a woman as consent were sent to prison.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we eliminated the mens rea requirement for rape. Historically, in a rape prosecution, the guilty defendant must have had the intention to have intercourse with a woman without her consent. Too stringent, said the sexual grievance industry, and the requirement was lightened or dropped altogether.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted laws in the UK and a handful of US states that legally forbade naming rape accusers. Moreover, in the US, news agencies and outlets have, by common consensus, agreed not to name rape accusers. The mere allegation of rape by the anonymous female, without any other evidence and no matter how far-fetched, often causes a man's name to be splashed all over the newspaper, TV, radio, and Internet for the world to titillate to the details of his humiliation, destroying the man's good name forever. In contrast, his accuser's identity is guarded with all the tenacity that Clark Kent uses to shield Superman's.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted laws that lengthened and even eliminated statutes of limitations for rape, but not for other crimes, and now, men are sometimes accused of, and charged with, alleged rapes that occurred 20, 30, 40 or more years after they supposedly occurred. This, of course, effectively forecloses the accused from mounting a meaningful defense because the evidence that might have proven them innocent — corroborating witnesses, after-the-fact letters suggesting consent, receipts showing he was actually out of town that day — has long disappeared.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted VAWA which, among many other things, pays the legal bills of alleged victims of sexual assault. VAWA pays none of the legal bills of men accused of rape, the presumptively innocent. Not even the falsely accused.

In the UK, it's worse. The UK compensates alleged rape victims, even the ones not subjected to any physical force, no matter how slight their injuries. In contrast, the UK does not compensate men falsely accused of rape, no matter how egregious their harm. And, yes, sometimes false rape accusers are compensated.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted laws that exempted rape accusers from taking polygraph tests as a condition to proceeding with the investigation of their rape claims. But polygraphs are considered just fine — when they are used on men and boys accused of rape. If males refuse to submit to them, often even flimsy charges won't be dropped. (Moreover, polygraphs are routinely used to insure that sex offenders, predominantly male, are adhering to the terms of their probation, and a refusal to take the polygraph will land the refusing party in jail. Worse yet, men and boys are subjected to penile plethysmograph testing, a sort of junk science polygraph of the penis, which typically requires the subjects to engage in self-arousal.)

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted rules on college campuses making it easier and easier to expel males accused of sexual wrongdoing, with kangaroo courts that forbid confronting accusers and that employ inquisitorial, as opposed to adversarial, hearing processes that dispense with silly things like due process. Most colleges have lowered the burden of proof from "beyond a reasonable doubt" to "clear and convincing evidence" or a "preponderance of evidence" – just for charges of sexual assault or harassment. Many college campuses also adopted rules that forbid charging rape accusers with underage drinking in connection with their accusation, thus providing young women looking to evade an underage drinking charge with yet another motive to lie about rape.

That wasn't enough, they said. So we enacted draconian Federal Rule of Evidence 413, and many states adopted similar laws. With this law, unlike any other criminal charge, including murder, robbery, even planning the World Trade Center attacks, a rape trial in federal court and in various states allows evidence of the defendant's commission of prior offenses of sexual assault to show that he has a propensity for committing the crime at issue. This rule, which is unique in all of American jurisprudence and widely condemned by legal scholars, allows the jury to hear about the defendant's prior acts, whether or not the defendant takes the stand. Even mere accusations of prior sexual offenses that occurred years before — and even criminal allegations for which the defendant was acquitted — are admissible if the alleged prior act is proven by just a preponderance of the evidence (far lower than "beyond a reasonable doubt"). This law was enacted specifically to nab more rapists – if you show the jury smoke, they'll assume there must be fire even when there isn't.

But surely all these massive reforms must have cut into underreporting of rape? Surely after decades of one reform cascading upon the next to encourage women to come forward, the women must be lining up, right?

Well, no, we are told. In fact, the sexual grievance industry insists that nothing has ever worked to curb alleged underreporting, and that it is supposedly still rampant. So, what do we to curb the problem? Why, we keep listening to the same people who've been taking our tax and tuition money, and who haven't been able to solve the alleged problem.

Here's the reality: it's all nonsense. The sexual grievance industry needs rampant "underreporting" to perpetuate the rape cottage industry. So they manufacture it from whole cloth. There are powerful and entrenched financial interests at work that depend on rape hysteria. But they're not finished.

I honestly can't think of a single serious rape reform proposal that hasn't eventually been enacted. The track record of the sexual grievance industry in getting their way is astounding. Here are some of the most dangerous proposals they want to enact:

THEY ARE NOT FINISHED:

Sex Will be a Presumed Crime When a Woman Cries Rape

Most readers think this is already the case, but trust me, it's not. Few non-lawyers appreciate the importance of placing the burden of proof "beyond a reasonable doubt" on the prosecutor in criminal trials. Under present rape law, the prosecution must prove the essential elements of the crime, including the alleged victim's non-consent, beyond a reasonable doubt. While far too many innocent men and boys are arrested and charged on flimsy false rape claims, most avoid lengthy prison terms simply because the prosecution bears that burden.

The Holy Grail of rape reform for feminist legal scholars is to flip the duty of proving consent to the accused. In Addressing Rape Reform in Law and Practice(2008), Professor Susan Caringellaof Western Michigan University's Sociology Department, posits one such proposal. She says: "It is high time to give victims a fair shake, to dismantle the zealous overprotections for men accused of this crime, which have been buoyed up by the myths about false accusations, ulterior motives, and so on, commonly embraced when rape charges are levied."

Among other things, Prof. Caringella lays out an elaborate legislative scheme to reverse the presumption of consent for rape. Most rapes are of the acquaintance variety, and consent often is the sole issue in dispute in a rape trial. Under this professor's plan, if a woman alleges rape, non-consent would be presumed, and the man would be required to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the act was consensual. In most of those cases, there is no significant evidence aside from the testimony of the accuser and the accused. If the jury doesn't know who to believe, as is often the case, the male will go to prison for many years. (And we have reported innumerable cases on False Rape Society where false rape accusers were found to be very credible.) The male will have lost the trial before it has begun.

This rule also means that the accused in a criminal trial will be forced to testify on his own behalf if he wants to stay out of prison – the same as in many countries ruled by dictators that have no regard for due process.

Think about the implications of this proposal: this feminist scholar wants to turn the most fundamental act of love, the act of procreation, that has been performed countless times every minute of every day of every year since the beginning of time the world over — into a presumed crime whenever a woman cries rape. This, of course, is a jurisprudence bordering on pathology.

Professor Michele Alexandre has an even more drastic plan. Currently, rape law adheres to a contract law standard of consent, where consent may manifested in any way that it actually occurs. In matters of romance, people toss formalities to the winds and typically express their desires in body language, smiles, nods, and caresses. There are, in fact, an infinite variety of ways people signal consent. Many, perhaps most, couples establish routines where unspoken conduct cues responses in a willing a partner. Currently, the law recognizes that whatever ways parties actually manifest consent is admissible evidence of it. That can't possibly be unfair, right?

Well, wrong. Professor Michele Alexandre wants to junk all of that and severely limit the way consent may be legally manifested. She insists that the contract theory of consent treats women's bodies as goods. She proposes that consent not be presumed; when a woman cries rape, the sex act is a presumed crime. The burden is on the defendant to prove "that express and present consent was explicitly obtained at the time of the actual sexual interaction, not before or after . . . ."

Moreover, she would junk all the non-verbal manifestations of assent: ". . . express consent entails verbal or written assent that leaves no doubt as to the victim's agreement to the sexual interaction. . . ." (The other-worldly proposal about written assent is a dead giveaway that this professor is operating in a different universe than the typical bedroom where real couples are getting it on.)

She continues: Only if the defendant is able to establish "express, present, and uncontroverted consent to the sexual interaction at issue" does the burden shift to the prosecution to prove withdrawal of consent, and "withdrawal of consent can happen at any time during the sexual interaction."

In this professor's world, past sexual behavior – all those routines a couple has established over the course of months or years, all that private, unspoken language – none of it may be cited as evidence of present consent, and sex that occurs as a result of such flawed consent is rape. See M. Alexandre, 'Girls Gone Wild' and Rape Law: Revising the Contractual Concept of Consent & Ensuring an Unbiased Application of 'Reasonable Doubt' When the Victim is Non-Traditional, 17 American Univ. Journal of Gender, Social Policy & the Law 1, 41, 55-56 (2009).

And it isn't just the eggheads sitting in their Ivory Towers who buy into this inanity. Feminist superstar Jessica Valenti recently wrote this ". . . we should look to [Swedish rape laws] as a potential model for our own legislation. . . . In fact, some activists and legal experts in Sweden want to change the law there so that the burden of proof is on the accused; the alleged rapist would have to show that he got consent, instead of the victim having to prove that she didn't give it."

If you think this is science fiction, you'd be wrong. It's already happening in Washington state. Prof. Richard Klein describes it:

"The Washington State rape statute defining consent as requiring 'actual words or conduct indicating freely given agreement to have sexual intercourse,' was . . . silent as to where the burden lay as to the showing of consent. The defendant in State v. Camara claimed that judge's charge to the jury improperly inferred that the burden was upon him. The Washington Supreme Court determined that there was 'support in the history and purposes of rape law reform' to conclude that the intent of the legislature was to shift the burden of proof to the defense. As a result of the Camara decision, Washington courts typically included the following instruction to juries in rape cases:

"'A person is not guilty if the sexual intercourse is consensual. 'Consent' means that at the time of the act of sexual intercourse, there are actual words or conduct indicating a freely given agreement to have sexual intercourse. The burden is on the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the sexual intercourse was consensual.'"

R. Klein, An Analysis of Thirty-Five Years of Rape Reform: A Frustrating Search for Fundamental Fairness, 41 Akron L.Rev. 981 (2008).

Laws Forbidding Women Who Falsely Cry Rape From Being Charged

Shifting the burden of proving consent onto the male accused of rape isn't the only thing on the sexual grievance industry's wish-list. In the aftermath of the arrest of a woman in the UK for apparently falsely recanting a rape charge against an allegedly abusive partner, the government is establishing guidelines for charging women who recant. The director of public prosecutions, Keir Starmer, will need to approve all efforts to charge women who recant rape allegations and, Starmer said, "we will monitor them closely." Specifically: "If the victim has decided to withdraw a rape allegation, we must explore the issues behind that, particularly if the victim is under pressure or frightened."

In fact, this is a step on the road to achieving what prominent sexual grievance industry leaders have advocated: not charging rape liars with crimes. Lisa Longstaff of Women Against Rape has been quoted as saying the following: "Every prosecution [of false rape claims] puts women who have been raped off reporting it." Another time, she called efforts to prosecute women for making false rape claims "a concerted witch-hunt."

When a 17-year-old New Zealand girl was arrested after falsely claiming that she was dragged off by three youths and sexually assaulted at knifepoint, Dr. Kim McGregor, director of New Zealand's Rape Prevention Education, was quoted regarding false rape complainants: "I would recommend some form of therapeutic intervention rather than charging them." Dr. McGregor claims that "someone needed to be 'pretty distressed' to make a false allegation of sexual assault," and that "very few women made false complaints as a form of revenge."

Scrap the Adversarial System in Rape Cases in Favor of an Inquisition

Dr. Kim McGregor is also on record as favoring a change from the adversarial system that pits one person against another in terms of their credibility. She would like to see an inquisitorial form where both parties must answer questions in court. But, she has cautioned, the new inquisition for rape needs to be wary of male judges who would interview women and children because this may increase a victim's anxiety. Don't fear – she wouldn't require all female judges in rape cases. She says that the anxiety could be avoided by the way the interviewer questions the victim. (Apparently sensitivity training would be required for male judges.)

The disciplinary procedures in many colleges already have scrapped the adversarial system when it comes to sex allegations.

Quasi-Quotas for Rape Arrests and Convictions

Two years ago in the UK, it was a pet project of then Labour's deputy leader, Harriet Harman, to jack up the conviction rates for rape. Ms Harman floated a trial balloon that indicated she was toying with the idea of establishing targets for prosecutors and police to secure more convictions. This likely would have entailed police and prosecutors being required to furnish reports explaining the reasons the "targets" were not met, with all manner of negative consequence imaginable for "unsatisfactory" explanations; further, it is reasonable to suspect that police would be deprived of certain government funding in the event their responses were not "satisfactory."

What effect would this have on innocent persons falsely accused of rape? Let's furnish an example. In the United States, law enforcement agencies are notoriously afraid of losing highway dollars from the federal government if they fail to make a sufficient number of DUI arrests. A DUI expert famously contended on American television that innocent people who have nothing to drink are taken to jail after submitting to roadside field sobriety tests. The charges are later dropped, but presumably the incarceration is sufficient to help meet a quota.

Under this quasi-quota system, innocent men and boys not only would need to worry that a woman might decide to lie about their relationship, now they would also need to worry about whether the police department has hit its numbers in a given month when a woman falsely accuses them.

Harman is out of power, but my guess is we'll be seeing this proposal again sometime. And given the sexual grievance industry's track record, don't be surprised if it becomes law.

The Grizzly Truth: Identity Politics and Conservativism Don't Mix

careyroberts · 3 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Sarah Palin has emerged as the nation's foremost advocate of conservative ideals. By design, she has also become the most prominent purveyor of feminist identity politics.

In numerous speeches, Mrs. Palin has proclaimed herself a feminist. In America by Heart the former vice-presidential candidate announces: "It surprises some people to hear that I consider myself a feminist."

Exactly what does this mean?

"Feminism is all about power for the female left," explain Suzanne Venker and Phyllis Schlafly in their hot-off-the-press sizzler, The Flipside of Feminism. "Feminism, like communism, depends on hypothesizing an oppressed class."

Palin might gainsay that description. She would likely point to this statement in Going Rogue, where she describes herself as a "believer in individual rights and responsibilities rather than heavy-handed government; in free-market principles that included reward for hard work; [and] respect for equality." (page 45).

And what does "respect for equality" mean?

Well, it turns out Sarah Palin is an avowed supporter of Title IX. In her words, "I also consider myself a grateful beneficiary of the movement for female equality, particularly Title IX."

But as we know, Title IX is the very epitome of a "heavy-handed" government program that certainly does not reward men for their "hard work." Instead, it imposes a rigid feminist quota on college athletic participation that has spelled the demise of thousands of men's sports teams.

Equal outcomes, not equal opportunities – that's the socialist ideal, and this policy is writ large at the U.S. Department of Education. Sarah Palin is perfectly fine with that.

Marxist class analysis also gave rise to a patchwork movement that many call identity politics. The term "identity politics" was first coined in the 1970s during the civil rights movement. Before long the women's libbers latched on to the concept, as Zillah R. Eisenstein documents in his book, Capitalist Patriarchy and the Case for Socialist Feminism.

In The Disuniting of America, historian Arthur Schlesinger probes the rise of identity politics and its effect on American life. Noting that democratic societies require a unifying cultural, social, and legal fabric in order to function, he concludes the trend threatens the cohesiveness of civil society.

The phenomenon of the Mama Grizzlies, of course, is a prime example of identity politics. In her recent America by Heart, Sarah Palin devotes an entire chapter to the topic. Exactly who are the Mama Grizzlies?

They are the "new generation of American women leaders, many of whom I've met on the campaign trail and in the towns and cities of America," Palin adumbrates. These women are "strong," "tough," "formidable," "serious," and "confident," in Palin's own words. What's more, these women "ran cattle" and even "ploughed the fields."

If this is beginning to sound like a women's liberation consciousness-raising exercise, that's exactly what it is.

And like any card-carrying feminist, an occasional You-go-girl! shout-out to her female comrades will not suffice. While we're at it, why don't we indulge in a cavalcade of gratuitous gender-baiting and male-bashing, as well? This appears on page 132 of America by Heart:

"Women have a unique perspective. Typically, they are less ambitious for superficial power than men [It's a relief to know that dust-up about Nancy Pelosi's demand for a military plane was all a misunderstanding], and more focused on providing for the needs of others [Men who work a 60-hour week to put bread on the table are doing this for some weird ego boost]. I think we appreciate, more than some men, the fullness of American life, everything from raising decent kids to protecting our national security [A proven fact!]."

Palin continues…

“And we’re not afraid to work hard and get our hands dirty [A high-five to all the female oil-rig, construction, and mine workers out there]. We’re busy enough to know that time must be spent efficiently [No more inefficient trips to the beauty salon!]; in fact we’re too busy to waste time with typical political games and power struggles [Busy governors have no time for political gamesmanship, I’m happy to announce].”

But sensible-talking Suzanne Venker and Phyllis Schalfly offer a different prescription: “We must stop talking about women’s rights, women’s needs, women’s problems, and progress for women….When we frame the debate in feminist lingo, we foster a war between the sexes. It’s time to end the war between the sexes. Men are not the enemy.”

I certainly endorse Sarah Palin’s vision of individual self-reliance, strong families, and limited government. I admire her resolute defense of conservative values.

But this paroxysm of identity politics that seeks to empower women at the expense of men is an anathema to respectful gender relationships, strong families, and traditional values.

Hero Mexican Girl Who Fought Cartels Runs for the Border

W.F. Price · 4 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I first saw this story quite while ago. A Mexican girl who decided she'd take on the job of police chief in a Mexican town slammed by the drug war down there was widely lauded as an example of female courage and bravado in the face of the drug gangs. The local men had essentially given up on the fight. Outgunned and facing the likelihood of death and dismemberment at the hands of the criminals, the guys just gave up. Who can blame them? When being a cop means you're likely to be killed and have your body parts flung about the town square, the job suddenly doesn't seem all that appealing.

Enter Marisol Valles García, the brave and pretty chick who would take on the Zetas like Lara Croft. Yeah, she's pretty cute, but it doesn't seem she was all that good at kicking ass, and perhaps at this point her schtick is getting worn out. Now, facing some rough treatment, she wants us gringos to bail her out.

When I first read about Marisol, I assumed that she was only taking the job because nobody – not even the drug lords – would take her seriously. Sure enough, she spouted the platitudes one might expect from a 20-year-old female college student:

> Afraid? Everyone is afraid and it's very natural. What motivates me here is that the project [to make the community safer] is very good and can do a lot for my town. I know that we are going to change and remove this," she said.
> The weapons we have are principles and values, which are the best weapons for prevention…

Well, if you ask me, the weapons needed are probably a lot more tangible than that. There are towns in Northern Mexico I wouldn't even enter without being inside of an M1A1 Abrams tank.

After some time, it seems the local criminal elements had enough of her, and made it known that she'd better sign up with them — or else.

Now, according to reports, she is in the US, and ICE won't return calls about the status of her asylum request. How brave of her.

Now, if we're giving asylum to girls who unwisely take on dangerous jobs in towns swept up in the Mexican drug war, I'd like to know what we're doing for the thousands of Mexican men who face a very real threat of death every day, probably in most cases a more serious threat than this girl. Are we going to give asylum to all of them? Of course not. Yet here we are celebrating this girl's "bravery" by giving her a free pass to flee a situation she very willingly got herself into. What's bravery if you never have to face the consequences?

Oh yeah… That's female bravery.

You Should Be Dancing: Tony Manero & "Ataru Game"

I get my high when I'm dancing."

- Tony Manero, Saturday Night Fever

I want to thank everyone for their interest and participation in these Game-related posts over the past few weeks or so; as I was reviewing the site stats for the past month (and which will be released this coming Sunday) I was taken aback by the uptick in reader interest, expressed in unique site views. This tells me what my readers what to see more of, and I hear you loud and clear. So, with that said, let's continue with our perusal and study of Game…

Two commenters in particular, from our previous post, CSPB an DJ, made a powerful point about the importance of dancing in a Man's seduction repetoire; and it's true – a Man who has moves on the dancefloor instantly has a decided advantage over other guys when it comes to upping his notch count. There's simply no getting around that fact. Dancing is one of a number of proxies Women use to gauge a Man's sexual prowess, and has been with us as long as they have been Human Beings, and for that matter, animals of all kinds, on the planet. They don't call it the "mating dance" for nothing, don't you know.

I made a reference to the smash hit film, "Saturday Night Fever" in my last post, and since one of my commenters particularly enjoyed said reference, and because two other commenters talked at some length on the importance of the dance, and since I've talked about the different styles of Game a Man can have and deploy, I thought I would illustrate a bit of what I meant by using SNF as a prima facia example of one of the "forms" or styles of Game, which I refer to as Ataru Game. Also, please understand something: you can and should avail yourself of as many sources of material to learn from, for the student of Game is constantly learning, observing, trying out new things, and the like. Just because something is fictional does not mean that it isn't relevant or useful; indeed, SNF's enduring success, more than 30 years after its release, means that it has struck a very deep chord of resonance in people worldwide, and which of course, made John Travolta an instant household name.

As I've said previously, Ataru Game is is a style of seduction which is focused on the body, where often the Man in question uses his body for maximum effect along these lines. SNF's Tony Manero, is a picture perfect example of this principle in action – in addition to being tall (and even taller given the platform heeled shoes he wears), he uses a style of dancing that's "big" – if you watch the film, you will notice that his dance moves takes up a lot of space; he often has the entire dancefloor to himself. When dancing with a partner (or two, or three) he often uses his long arms a lot, so even when there are other couples out on the dancefloor, they tend to be "crowded out" by his manner of dancing. He "makes a hole" whenever he's on the floor. This is even true when he and Stephanie enter the niteclub's dancing contest, and they choose a more sedate song to dance to – they moves are still such that takes up the entire floor and are broadly expressive. Whether he's line dancing, doing the Tango Hustle, or whatever, Tony's style is very high energy, and is irresistable to the ladies because of it.

But that's only a part of Tony's Game; another part of it is in the way hePeacocks. Right at the very beginning of the film we see him walking down the street of his Bay Ridge Brooklyn neighborhood, and what is he wearing? RED shoes, and a matching RED shirt – he looks like a tall rooster or something – but there he is, conspicuously standing out from everybody else, Male and Female alike. And this is on a regular workday, as he's carrying a can of paint to his job, the local hardware and paint store. His gait is literally like that of a rooster, in fact. Guys who work a lot of Ataru Game tend to do things like this.

And then there's the iconic white suit Tony wore for the dancing contest – he had an innate understanding of the theatrical and knew that he had to make a powerful impression on the dancefloor in order to have a chance at winning the prize (which was more than mere money; it also meant Stephanie, too). Even in a discotheque at the height of the Disco phase, he stood out – that's Ataru Game to the max. And think about it – when's the last time you saw a guy wearing an all white suit anywhere? Other thanTom Wolfe and Colonel Sanders, one is hardpressed to think up an instance. The last time I personally saw something like that was last Summer during the Ralphael Siddiq concert in Central Park – he wore an all white suit and matching white short-sleeve shirt, and he looked great. No one else came even close.

Because Ataru Game puts such a focus on the body, it works best when a Man's body itself is "extreme" in some way – either really tall, or really short. Or if you're older than might be expected for the venue, or the other way, a lot younger. Or if you're a guy like The Wire's Bunk Moreland or The Green Mile's Michael Clark Duncan, or if you're more dimunitive, like say,Allen Iverson or Prince or Bruce Lee. Ataru operates on the extremes of the principles of Game, indeed it thrives there, and really makes an impression when you combine that with all the energy and wide, sweeping moves this style is known for, because for Ataru Game to work best, one needs lots of room to roam.

Tony's understanding of feminine psychology and the like weren't anywhere near as developed as the other things mentioned here – what many in the community refer to as the difference between Inner Game and Outer Game – still though, we can observe a number of his actions and learn from them. For one thing, notice how he constantly (though negatively, much of the time) negs Annette, his original dance partner. She expresses feelings for him, which he often rebuffs. Recall what I've said previously about the ability to resist giving in, at least too soon, to a Woman's charms; it will almost always have the effect of her wanting you to have her even more. Second, notice in the opening shots of SNF, Tony attempting to apply "Holla back Game" on two ladies walking down the street, and how it does NOT work, LOL. Again, as a rule, hitting on Moving Targets isn't a good idea, unless you do it a certain way, which I'll get to later in this series. One of the major reasons why Tony failed at both attempts to holla at the young ladies he saw on the street was because he lacked the fundamentals of Game that would have equipped him to drive for a better outcome – it still would have been difficult, but he could have improved his chances. This is why one should if nothing else, be firmly rooted in Shii-Cho Game because of the stress it lays on the fundamentals.

We see Tony fail again when walking Stephanie home from dance practice, and instead of merely doing it – walking her the rest of the way home – he asks. Asking "Mother, May I?" is a tremendous DLV - if you think you could have, you could have *and you should have. And of course, his attempts to seduce an older, more urbane Woman has some serious fits and starts, as she easily bests him in terms of sophistication, conversation and life experience; the ONLY thing that saves him is his good looks and his great dancing skills. This is a powerful lesson here for the student – gunning after Women like Stephanie – Women of substance, class AND beauty – require quite a bit more than flashy displays. Had Tony been rooted in the fundamentals of Game, he would have had a much better time with Stephanie, although, of course, him doing so would have ruined the movie's plot, LOL.

There is one time in Tony and Stephanie's courtship where he clearly gets the upperhand (which is what Women want to happen): in the dance studio, after Stephanie cuts Tony down to size several times, he closes in on her and says, "I hear you're training to be a bitch; is that true?", and then shimmies away from her. Note how she's stunned by this well-placed and well-timed Neg. Things begin to open up for Tony from there, and here we see yet another very important principle of Game: the more beautiful, and "all that" the Target is, the more you MUST employ the Neg.This is important; Stephanie constantly namedrops – she's met Eric Clapton, Paul Anka, and so forth – so in order for Tony to be successful with her off the dancefloor, he's gotta bring her down to earth, and routinely shocking her into compliance with Negs is one of the best ways to do that.

Now, this is completely different from what Tony does to Annette, and here again we see a very important principle wrt the Neg – Women who either aren't very beautiful, and/or have deepseated (and apparent) LSE (Low Self-Esteem) you should NOT Neg as much, if at all. Such a thing isn't useful and often can be quite counterproductive, as we saw later in the film. Annette isn't ugly by any estimation, but she clearly lacks the worldliness of Stephanie, which includes the realm of dancing, and all this makes Annette feel quite insecure. Tony's treatment of her was quite bad, and something I do not condone or endorse. He's under no obligation to be romantically involved with her, true, but he's also outta pocket for the way in which he treats her, too. Always remember: save for your Negs for the Women who truly deserve them.

Going back to Negging and how they work in the seduction dance – Tony and Stephanie grow closer together as a result of their spending time to practice for the contest and during the dance-off itself, at one point in their routine, they kiss – in fact, it is very common for really great dancers like Tony to be kissed by the Women they dance with (recall the earlier scene where Tony dances with two Women at once and one of them demands that he kiss her, nearly passing out afterward and saying that she kissed Al Pacino! Something I found particularly interesting, since Pacino is quite a bit shorter than Travolta, LOL). Dancing achieves the goals of Kino and escalation all at once, something we'll be talking about more in the posts to come (H/T to CSPB for broaching the topic!), which is another reason as to why if you can do so, definitely aim to be a great dancer. Lastly, note how Tony and Stephanie end their dance routine for the contest - Tony leads them off the dancefloor. Fellas, Women want to be led, and if you're not doing the leading, eventually, someone else will.

A few concluding thoughts are in order here. Both CSPB and DJ mentioned the importance of dancing especially if you're a White guy, and I couldn't agree more – John Travolta is hands down one of the best White guys on the dancefloor since Fred Astaire and Gene Kelly, and Hugh Jackman is no slouch in the dancing department either. I can't speak for the other three, but I know for a fact that Travolta got his moves by observing closely Black guys working it out on the dancefloor, and let's face it – a White boy getting down like a Brotha (or in some case, better) makes him an instant hit with the ladies, White or Black (Robin Thicke is another example in more recent years that easily comes to mind). It's the idea of playing against type – recall how President Barack Obama was/is always noted for his being so "articulate". The same could be said for actor Sidney Poitier, who was always known for his elegance and grace, particularly under pressure. Again, Black and White Women alike loved him. Yes, it may be correct to say that we shouldn't peddle in stereotypes, but the student of the Game understands that this is how human minds work. They don't lament the world as it is, but merely uses it to gain a decided advantage in it.

The other point that is worthy of mention here is the fact that both CSPB and DJ said that often other guys will try to shame or deride guys who are great dancers as being gay or somehow not masculine. Although of course, such crude arguments are largely baseless since if a Man wants to dance in a Gay Male setting, especially in a Gay-friendly place like NYC, he can easily do so, it is nevertheless interesting to note that Disco and later, House music got their start in large part, because of the Gay community's openess to new sounds. Much of the moves and looks, of both genres borrowed quite a bit from the Gay community, and it would do a Man well to try to learn what he can from Gay Men along these lines (Lesbian Women can greatly inform a Man's understanding of Women in general as well). The popular tv show, "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" is a play or take on this principle, of how Gay Men have an eye or sensibility for fashion, art and music that most straight Men simply do not have, and would do well to cultivate, especially they have any intentions of seducing the Stephanies of the world. So, the AFC haters do have a point, but as per usual, they miss the forest for the trees.

I don't know how much it cost to make Saturday Night Fever, but according to Wikipedia, it has grossed nearly a quarter of a billion dollars – which suggests that it is among one of the most commercially successful films ever to be made. Talk about Game being right under your nose in plain sight…

Now adjourn your asses…

Arab Leaders' Arrogant, Feminist Women and Wives Helped Bring on Revolutions

W.F. Price · 5 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As Rebels clash with Kadafi's loyalist troops and Nubian mercenaries, one can clearly discern the populist rage behind the fight to oust the unpopular Libyan leader. But what has been lost in recent reports is that one source of the discontent was a building resentment fueled by reports of the alpha-male lifestyle these Arab strongmen have been leading. Many have wives who decked themselves out in the finest bling, some have foreign concubines, and in the meanwhile young men are reduced to hawking knick knacks and produce on the street.

Assange's Wikileaks provided much fodder for Arab dissidents, as lurid reports of Middle Eastern leaders' love lives were leaked to the public. Kadafi reportedly has been carrying on with a Ukrainian nurse described as a "voluptuous blonde." Recent information from Russia indicates that his mistress fled last week as Kadafi's rule and government have come under siege.

Perhaps most relevant to readers of The Spearhead is that a clique of Arab leaders' wives heavily involved in the Arab Women's Organization, which promotes the Western brand of female "empowerment," have acquired a reputation as corrupt, arrogant women who serve themselves first.

Founded by Suzanne Mubarak, wife of the recently ousted Hosnia Mubarak, the organization was heavily promoted by Leila Ben Ali, wife of recently deposed Tunisian President Ben Ali. Another wife who is under scrutiny is Queen Rania of Jordan, King Abdullah's wife. The glamorous 40-year-old has appeared on Oprah and touts herself as a supporter of Palestinian rights, but she has come under fire for seizing land for family members.

Interestingly, it seems that a number of UN and EU grants have helped fund the activities of the AWO, which should prompt Americans and Europeans to question whether our money is being used to drape gold and diamonds on the necks and wrists of women connected to deeply unpopular Middle East strongmen.

The secret is to get down on one knee and ask an American woman to become an American Wife. All you have to do is say four words and your life will be changed forever: "Will you marry me?"

Don't believe me. I expected it. Below are a few testimonials:

> I found out one year ago that my wife cheated on me with her ex. for the first 6 months of our marriage in 2003. We have been to counseling but I continue to obsess over the affair and the limited knowledge that she has provided me. I am taking 2different antidepressants and several other medicines for different medical problems, all that have appeared in the past two years (I am 47). I cannot achieve an erection anymore, even with Viagra and Cialis. Knowing that her ex. was well-endowed has caused me to feel very inferior and inadequate sexually.
> We get along quite well these days and she really does treat me well now, but I cannot stop obsessing about the affair and all the lies and the sexual aspect of it. I have basically quit living and am just waiting to die. I think my only hope is to divorce her and find somebody that I can trust. Any suggestions would be appreciated.
> xhttp://www.loveshack.org/forums/t82492/

Does that sound boring?

Then we have:

I'm thinking that the word "chaste" would be appropriate here…

> HELP! My husband is too small
> I need help! I've always thought that my husband was kind of on the small side*…we've recently had some* swinging experiences and now I KNOW he's tiny. I love him very much*, but* now that I've had a big cock again (my ex boyfriend well endowed) I can't stop craving to have one again*.*
>
> I didn't even realize how small my husband was until I felt somebody with so much more girth and length. I have great pictures of these latest experiences*, but instead of turning me on like I thought they would,* they only make me sad to see what I have to live with, and what I'm missing out on*. Please help a girl!*
> xhttp://www.lpsg.org/41117-help-my-husband-is-too.html

She could be your wife.

Finally the hero:

I've known you an hour…but it feel like two hours! Let's go!

> When will I get over my wife's affair?
> In Brief: I have been married 7 yrs. My wife and I are late 30's. I thought things were good in the relationship with my wife. My wife had enough of my controlling and "take over" way that I handled the relationship. So, she started going out with some single friends in Feb 2007. First weeknights..then Fri or Sat nights. We were still having sex…and overall things were "good" (I thought).
> March 24 she meets "hunk" in singles bar. He literally asks if he can have sex with her (after knowing her 1 hour). She says yes. She leaves later with him and then has sex (I am on a camping trip with our 5 year old adopted son at the time). She thinks that is the end…and feels bad (she later tells me). Next wekend though she and friends go to same bar…and he is there. She does not want to talk to him…but does and…guess what…sex again at his place. She even comes home to me at 2am (we then we even have sex!!!).
> 2 weeks later…I find text message with her trying to now initialte a meeting*. The truth is now out. (I "felt" something wrong so I snooped)*
>
> After lots of talking, tears, therapy…we are on the right road. BUT – I cannot forget and cannot seem to get over the trust issue. She HAS been TRUTHFUL and she LOVES ME THis is the only time she has done this. I don't think she will do it again. She admits the mistake and is remorseful.
>
> But – when will I get over this? Can I? Should I? Is it really posisible to build a better relationship? I DO feel we have a better communication platform now and a more "equal" relationship (in most ways). BUT BUT BUT – the betrayal eats away at me. Many people say that time will heal…but HOW? I want her to feel the pain I do…but how can I let it all go and focus on our relationship…should I?
> How do I stay committed to this person for the rest of my life feeling the way I do and knowing what she "did to me".
>
> Thank you in advance for your advice…
> Xhttp://www.askmehelpdesk.com/marriage/when-will-get-over-wifes-affair-130466.html

Have you figured out the secret? Do you know how to have the life of the Hollywood star? I'll tell you one last time?

Dutch Send Women to do Men's Job, Rescue Bungled

W.F. Price · 6 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a failed attempt to rescue a Dutch national working in Libya, the Dutch sent three marines, including at least one women, in a lynx helicopter with a good deal of ammunition and weaponry to pick up the man near Sirte. Two of the marines, one man and one woman, were displayed on Libyan state TV. The man's uniform indicates that he was the pilot, so it is likely that the female was sent along to "man" the guns, which are all now in Libyan hands, and do not appear to have been fired once.

The helicopter was easily captured by a Kadafi loyalist militia with nothing more than warning shots. In the meanwhile British and German special forces have successfully carried out rescue missions of their own.

Libyan state TV is using the marines, helicopter and armament as propaganda to suggest that the ongoing revolution is tied to foreign intervention.

Hey Kay, We Are Manning Up...That's Why We're Walking

Featured Guest · 7 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

BY T.L.

There has been a lot of discussion of Kay Hymowitz's article about "Manning Up" Here is the response that needs to be made:

You don't get it Kay. We ARE manning up…that's why we are dumping YOU.

The feminists of America have descended into this horrible web of deceit and self-destruction, and men finally are saying… enough. We are doing the best, most mature, and most appropriate thing to do in this case, the right thing thing. We are walking away.

You say "what about society, what about children?" We ARE doing the best thing for society. We ARE doing the best thing for children. Women as a group have become a giant Charlie Sheen…crazy, drug-addled, abusive, paranoid, destructive of themselves and their loved ones, and above all, utterly, utterly in denial of their vile behavior. Women are on a relentless tear, not only destroying their own happiness but dragging all around them down as well. And we men, after 40 years of being the quiet, enabling co-dependent spouse, after cleaning up and justifying and covering up your abuse, putting on face makeup to hide the emotional bruises you give us and hiding the emotional scars you give our children — finally having been pushed to the point where we see very clearly that this this process is headed towards real honest-to-god tragedy, we are doing what anybody in these situations learn to do. What any good counselor or physiatrist would tell recommend. We are walking away from you, and letting you crash.

We aren't being immature and we aren't scared of strong women, Kay. Today's men are just fine…more sober, more sane, more responsible than we have been in years, facing and recognizing the truth: that women simply cannot be trusted any longer to care for or protect a healthy society…that's it's up to us men, for the good of our sons AND our daughters, to start pulling back and letting you have the sole burden for your own neuroses.

And just as an aside, let me point out that you and other women like you aren't "strong women", unless you call being batshit crazy "strong".

So to all you men…walk away, walk away. Women have twisted marriage and gender relations into an extraordinary web of lies. They are all too willing to drag all us, men, families, and children too, down into that. It is time to say no more.

Walk away, men, preserve yourselves, not just because it's the right thing to do personally, and it is, but because it's the right thing to do for society.

And Kay, after you and your fellow nutcase feminists have finished your descent into narcissism, neuroses, man-hate, family-hate, and self-hate, after you've finally burned into ashes that last of your life on the pyre of feminist deceit, we can only hope, that the shock of seeing yourself abandoned and loveless might cause you to look in the mirror and recognizing how ugly you have become.

Maybe you will start to put yourself back together again and maybe then we'll come back in force. Or more likely, you'll simply continue as you are, meaner and loopier than ever, and it will be your daughters — those girls who will judge you a thousand times more harshly than men ever could, as daughters have judging their mothers for thousands of years — it will be your daughters who will be the ultimate "walk aways", who will reject the feminist viral infection of their mothers, who will stop attending man-hate classes at the universities, who will slowly and painfully attempt the job of rebuilding that joyous life of marriage and family which their great-grandmothers sacrificed so much to build, and which your generation trampled. It will be your daughters who will curse your name, as they deal with the loneliness of broken homes and the financial poverty which is an inevitable result of marriage-averse men.

Maybe in the future we will all live in flying cars and zip between skyscrapers full of techno-wonders. Not likely. More likely we'll live in a nation like Brazil, with a few ultra-rich living behind walls to protect them from the masses of the slums. And what your daughters will learn, as so many thousands of years of women have known, is that when money is scarce and poverty threatens, a good husband and his second income is the one sure-fire way to lessen the odds she and her children will live in squalor. And so many of those daughters, living in the marriage-averse society which you are bequeathing them, will not be married, will not have your high-end jobs (which long since disappeared), will not have any money bequeathed from you (since you will have long since squandered it on trips to Italy and Thailand to "find your bliss").

Your daughters may live to see their children, your granddaughters, living in squalor, may live to feel that agonizing despair that parents feel when they cannot provide for their children. And feeling that agonizing despair, those future women will think back and they will damn you.

That is your most likely destiny Kay. Time for you to face it.

For us men, we hope to avert that future, at least partially. So we choose to walk away NOW, as early and fast as possible. We want that necessary pain to start early, to get it over with faster, so those future generations of women see more clearly what you have done and will reject you faster, so that our future generation of sons will see again, that they have a choice bequeathed to them by fathers who had the self-respect to say "no!".

The fastest way to repair marriage is not to repair marriage. The fastest way is to let it crash and burn, let you finish your job of destroying it, and let you see the consequences that you have so diligently refused to acknowledge for all these years. This is shock therapy. It's painful. That's the point.

Now as you read this Kay, I don't doubt that you are carefully constructing all your refutations of these points. But, none of those refutations matter, because men have stopped debating. You will win any debate, as you always win debates, by the fact of your sheer refusal to deal in any sense of reality whatsoever. Living in an alternate Feminist universe of your own creation, you will always win your alternate-universe-crazy debates. It's a waste of our time and we know it. We choose instead to simply walk away, the ultimate argument throughout history, and (apparently) the only thing that will get through your thick skull.

Having met that non-debate, I'm sure your next step will be (*yawn) the usual name-calling ("loser, misogynist, probably still living in your mom's basement, probably haven't gotten laid in years or divorced and bitter"). The point is Kay, none of the usual names apply. Most men are not those things. Most of us are just normal guys…mature, healthy, married, boys, men, dads… guys who take care of their families and neighborhoods. That's what you need to get Kay. You and other feminists have finally crossed the line, and even we men who are content, we men who are not (knock on wood) divorced, are taking notice. When we teach our sons about marriage, we'll be teaching them to avoid you and your kind. When we teach our daughters about life, we'll try our damnedest to steer them away from women like you.

Kay, why don't you write about all this. This is the reality of the other 50% of the population. What a book you could write about it.

You Are A Scientist and Engineer of Men's Rights

Jay Hammers · 7 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two recent comments at The Spearhead and A Voice For Men struck me. I couldn't say for sure where the comments were posted because I read each site daily. I make it a point to read both of these sites and False Rape Society every day since they are happening.

One comment was suggesting that AVfM Radio, at some point, should move toward focusing on current events, not general comments about men's issues. Here it is, by mgtow:

"Going forward AVfM must up its entertainment value. Don't just inform, that gets old after a while. Instead, focus on the current issues. For example, this week there's a new 'Eat Pray Love' type of chick flick, or a new pussy pass served in court, or a new misandrist article (think Kay Hymowitz), or a scientific survey debunking some long-held feminist dogma. Focus on those current events, and expound on them."

A radio station that doesn't focus on current events (at some point) won't get very far. Of course, I'm sure the folks at AVfM Radio already know this, and will work to find the appropriate balance between commentary on men's rights issues, current events, and call-in topics. The first episode of AVfM Radio laid the foundation of what the men's rights movement is all about for its viewers, also warning feminists and misandrists that their time has come and we are here to stay. Future episodes will focus on specific topics, such as violent women and the government that supports them, and false accusations and their effect on men. Sooner or later, I'm sure current events will receive close attention, just as they have in so many articles at A Voice for Men, The Spearhead, and False Rape Society.

The other comment I recall, but can't seem to find again, was a reader stating that they like to see articles about things going on today rather than the more more abstract articles we've had a lot of recently at both AVfM and TS. In fact, a lot of the articles in the men's movement are like this: abstract, insightful, and yes, mind-blowing. See Adam Kostakis's series on gynocentrism at AVfM or early Spearhead articles. If you haven't yet, read Zed's Spearhead articles, or how about Novaseeker's? The very first Spearhead article was written by Novaseeker on September 22nd, 2009.

Theoretical articles are extremely eye opening, especially to the newcomer, but "keeping it real" and relevant will hold readers' attention. Paying attention to current events and misandry in popular culture is very important, especially since current events give us opportunities to engage in activism, spreading the word to the masses.
