Now that conversation did not have malicious undertones, the mums were just having a laugh at our expense and it was probably true. That is not the point. My strongest memory of that moment was the burning indignation I felt as a little boy and the overwhelming desire I felt to scream out:

"Don't make fun of boys!"

It seems simplistic and childish yet I knew that the little five-year-old me felt an instinctive revulsion when women and girls gathered to giggle about and mock men or boys.

Twenty-five years ago I began expressing my indignation about the treatment of men in our society in a small exercise book which I still have. I must say, at that time when the internet was years from becoming a part of our daily life, I am happy to say I nailed most of the issues which caused me so much angst and the things I wrote then are echoed in everything I write now. The only difference now is that I can connect with likeminded people and have a wider audience for the views I express. I can also verify with evidence what I once only felt in my gut.

So, to Sunday mornings. Maggie and I like to sit in bed and read the papers over a cuppa and some toast or chocolate. What was once a soothing, enjoyable weekly ritual for both of us has become the equivalent of treading through a minefield. I can state without exaggeration that as each page turns I wait for the headline or article which is going to twist my gut into knots or get my heart pounding way above a healthy rate. Sadly, Maggie and I are rarely spared this now familiar response to what we read.

So stop reading the papers I hear you suggest. If I were to shut myself off from every source of information about gender issues I would have to become a recluse who has no television, radio, computer or newspaper. I am not willing to do this. Another reason is the fact that you must know your enemy if you are going to fight your enemy.

So I accept the inevitable tummy knots and heart palpitations and I turn the pages.

What delights have I uncovered these past couple of weekends? Let me share some.

Our Sunday Herald Sun has a lift out magazine which caters to women, naturally.

There was an in-depth interview with Lynda Carter, the women who played the iconic Wonder Woman in the TV series of the same name back in the eighties.

Carter said that she was amazed by the fact that she is still recognized and stopped by people at airports or even a hospital when she visited a family member.

She said: "It is really touching (Wonder Woman) represents some enduring place where fans feel connected and safe- and wanting to hug me. How cool is that?"

Very…so far.

The 65 year old is also regularly stopped by people just wanting to tell her how the character's strength made them feel. Women tell her that Wonder Women, with her bullet proof power bracelets and golden lasso of truth, did them a world of good at a time when they were struggling in their youth.

Men tell her how they fantasized about her or had her picture on the wall of their room or "their bathroom" …..but she's not quite as keen to hear about that.

Carter's image is still fetishized by some, something she has not always been comfortable with:

"I never thought a picture of my body would be tacked up in men's bathrooms. I hate men looking at me and thinking what they think. I know what they think; they write and tell me."

So, Lynda Carter dressed up in a costume which deliberately highlighted her breasts and a tiny tight fitting pair of pants which were more like underwear than outerwear and yet she expresses dismay and barely concealed disgust at the thought of teenage boys and men finding her image sexually stimulating.

[image]

What a hypocrite.

There has been an incredible double standard surrounding the sexualizing of rock/pop stars, actors and men in general throughout the many decades they have appeared on stage and screen.

The healthy, natural sexual attraction boys and men feel about an attractive woman is condemned as dirty, toxic and somehow deviant. The far more violent and hysterical sexual attraction young women and girls feel for male entertainers is cute and worthy of a good chuckle.

There are countless examples of male pop stars being clawed, scratched and having their clothes torn from their bodies. We have all seen the frenzied screaming and frightening mob mania when the Beatles were at their peak.

[image]

Tom Jones used to have women's underwear hurled at him as he performed on stage. Chuckle, chuckle.

Female groupies are notorious in the entertainment and sporting world yet rarely (if ever) have I heard such behavior condemned as disgusting, contemptible or even something we would rather not think about.

Male popstars have often felt genuinely fearful about their physical well-being when confronted by their female fans. That is why they have resorted to wearing disguises and sneaking out of back doors at hotels and restaurants. I know of few female entertainers who have been physically mauled by male fans. Yet it is once again males who are the subject of disdainful dismissal by the disgusted Carter.

Does anyone doubt the sexual attraction girls feel for the objects of their affection? Were the images in those posters of a half-naked David Cassidy, Brad Pitt or more recently Justin Bieber which adorned thousands of girls' bedrooms never incorporated into a female's fantasies as she lay her head upon her pillow?

[image]

Imagine the outright mockery Pitt would receive were he to express his discomfort or disgust at the thought a young woman might be using him as a lead player in her sexual fantasy. It is preposterous given the smoldering gaze and exposed six pack in so many of his photos almost imploring the viewer to drag him into their bed! Thankfully, male entertainers are not quite so hypocritical as some of the females.

Of course, Lynda Carter goes on to talk of her feminist activism and close friendship with and support of Hillary Clinton. Enough about this woman. I was already finding my toast a little harder to digest when I came across an article about a man I have derided for his sickening feminism.

Karl Stefanovic, a very popular morning breakfast tv show host has been in the news recently after ending his marriage of 21 years. The headline of the article should serve as a warning for those who have queasy stomachs.

Karls' Big Split: Star's divorce deal trades riches for his children

(the online link differs slightly from the newspaper article I am quoting.)

The opening lines state:

His Mercedes and his freedom.

> That's what Karl Stefanovic has retained as a result of his divorce from his ex-wife, Cassandra Thorburn, with the Today Show host walking away virtually empty handed as part of a whopping settlement.

Heart rate rising…tea cooling as I brace myself to read on.

> The couple have finally ended what the couple's friends describe as a "tough settlement" process which saw Stefanovic emerge with about $500 thousand worth of cash and assets.
>
> That figure is dwarfed by Thorburn's share of the fortune, with the 44 year old stay- at- home mum awarded about $6 million in cash and assets as well as child support and hefty alimony payments.
>
> The couple will share custody of their three children Jackson, 17, Ava, 12 , and River, 10.
>
> Thorburn also now resides in the former couple's new home-an $8 million waterfront mansion in Cremorne-which Thorburn was also awarded in the settlement.

A friend claimed:

> "Shared custody was Stefanovic's priority….he was quite prepared to walk away with nothing…hand over everything with the one condition that he be able to see his children whenever he wanted. And I think they have managed to agree on that."

I cannot begin to describe how sick this quote makes me feel. Mr Stefanovic had to throw millions of dollars and a luxury mansion into his ex wifes' lap in order to have the privilege of seeing his own children when he wants to rather than the accepted norm, where fathers have their own flesh and blood taken from them and denied them because our disgraceful laws punish men for simply being males and providers.

It astonishes me when people refer to men involved in custody disputes as "angry" as though that description is a slam dunk shutdown of any possible discussion on this issue of the gendered bigotry in our court system. Who in the name of Jesus would not be enraged if strangers told you that you can no longer see your own children unless supervised or only on the day or hour that suits your ex?

What kind of sick world insists that if you are a man and want even a chance of seeing your kids on a regular basis you have to bleed yourself dry financially, physically and emotionally?

Bill Burr makes some excellent comments on this disgusting, legalized extortion.

And feminists have the twisted gall to talk about the patriarchy subjugating women.

In the same paper only a few pages away was yet another article which made my pulse flutter. The headline read:

'You Are The Queen of Nasty'

This story involves another high-profile relationship which has come to a bitter end. The coverage has been decidedly one sided (who'd have guessed) and his wife's accusations of domestic violence have been given extensive coverage. The one piece of photographic evidence was a couple of tiny bruises on her forearm which could easily be the result of someone grabbing her arms in a defensive action.

The article in today's Sunday paper focused on a secret audio recording of Miss Landry's husband which is meant to paint him in a poor light. The article calls the tape ‘disturbing’ but I found it to be a rather damning testimony against his wife.

Here is some of what he screamed at her during this “disturbing” tirade:

> Look me clean in the eye, Kel, and say “ I’ve never cheated on you. Go on. Look me clean in the eye.”
>
> His wife denied the allegation.
>
> In the expletive loaded exchange Mr Bell accuses his wife of five years of living the “life of Riley” while he works his fingers to the bone under fucking financial duress.. And what do you do with that life of riley? You stick it in my face,’ he says.
>
> Mr Bell accuses his wife of having affairs, stealing from him, of lying, of memorizing his credit card number and “riding on my fucking coat tails.”

As far as I’m concerned, a person who does not believe they are being recorded would not make these serious allegations if they did not believe they were true. This does not mean they are, but it does point to the fact that Mr. Bell believes it.

Why would a man make such specific accusations when he thinks the only person who is hearing them is his wife? If there was no context to his allegations she would dismiss them as the rantings of an unhinged fool.

The only disturbing feature of this taped conversation is the fact that the accusations might be true.

Of course, Miss Landry has applied for an AVO which will have a court ruling in two weeks’ time.

There were many other moments throughout the weekend which caused me to furrow my brow. We had the annual Pink Ladies AFL game which saw the players representing the Melbourne Football Club wearing pink and blue jumpers in place of the usual red and blue with several images of pink ladies in skirts placed on their guernsey. This was all done in the name of raising more funds and more awareness for the most highly funded and most talked about cancer on the planet! Patriarchy.

[image][image]

During another game, a large banner was raised for players of both teams to run through as they entered the arena. It demanded that we all play our role in putting an end to men’s violence against women and the commentators spoke in suitably serious tones about this terrible scourge.

Gynocentrism is rampant in our society. It is unavoidable. It is inescapable if your eyes have been opened by swallowing that red pill. Is it a curse or a blessing?

I still haven’t decided.

Sources:

http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/stellar/lynda-carters-battle-for-female-empowerment-goes-on-well-excuse-me-women-have-breasts/news-story/483d97af087497a3d59c5b0d0f100fa5

http://www.melbournefc.com.au/news/2017-05-04/help-turn-the-mcg-pink-this-sunday

https://www.bing.com/images/search?view=detailV2&ccid=aygfvXXz&id=36B374AAE3831AFBC72042C695DB69816EA86BB0&thid=OIP.aygfvXXzZprQcLBbeuNhmgEsCz&q=pink+lady+melbourne+footy+jumper&simid=608014847684119819&selectedIndex=2&ajaxhist=0

http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/news/nsw/anthony-bells-foulmouthed-rant-to-kelly-landry-reveals-extent-of-mar riage-breakdown/news-story/071c2f645b8962f0a8015453c9dab7dd

http://www.msn.com/en-au/news/australia/kelly-landry-and-anthony-bell-secret-recording-of-couples-argument-emerges/ar-BBAPDro?li=AAavLaF&ocid=spartanntp

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Cd4fufLPj8w

https://www.bing.com/videos/search?q=girls+chasing+the+beatles&&view=detail&mid=44502F24C53795F9516E44502F24C53795F9516E&rvsmid=196CA9E79967F85021AC196CA9E79967F85021AC&fsscr=0&FORM=VDQVAP

The Everyday Hatred of Men: Hegemonic Masculinity

Tom Golden · 10 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Gregory Rurik, MD of Gig Harbor, WA “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 10 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Gregory Rurik, MD of Pediatrics Northwest PS has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Under “About,” we read about Dr. Rurik and his philosophy of care:

“‘I chose pediatrics as a profession because I enjoy working with children of all ages. I enjoy watching them grow from infancy through college. I am thankful for the opportunity to provide quality health care services to children of all ages. I consider myself the family’s health care consultant and emphasize preventive care.’

Dr. Rurik stays active in his community by volunteering for Northwest Furniture Bank and attending Harbor Covenant Church. He is married with four grown children. For fun, Dr. Rurik enjoys outdoor activities with his sons such as hiking, camping and visiting national parks.”

Dr. Rurik, “quality health care” does not include routine genital mutilation. When you ritually and routinely circumcise a baby, you’re not “treating” the child or preventing “disease,” you’re abusing and mutilating him.

Doctor, listen to the many men who are not happy with what you do.

Here’s a video from Dr. Rurik’s office telling us that their goal is to “keep your family healthy, safe, and happy.” That is assuming it’s “safe” to allow strange people to fondle and mutilate your baby’s genitals, and that he’s “happy” to have this done – just look at his smile while he gets cut.

Under “Services” and “Circumcision” (spelled “curcumcision” in the url) we see who does the cutting, and on video, there’s Dr. Rurik’s colleague talking about how you should swaddle your baby after he uses a tourniquet on his penis, and how you can watch it happen, because he “has nothing to hide.”

Here’s the video on YouTube:

Since Dr. Rurik has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Rurik’s practice information follows:

Gig Harbor Office
4700 Pt. Fosdick Dr. NW, Suite 211
Gig Harbor, WA 98335
253-851-5665 (tel)
253-851-5714 (fax)

> Gregory Rurik, MD of Gig Harbor, WA “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/Qoc6QvV7my #MGM #circumcision #FGM pic.twitter.com/IqwBL84F0y
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 10, 2017

Underneath the Red Pill Rage

Paul Elam · 10 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Red pill rage and the 6th stage of grief

August Løvenskiolds · 11 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Are the "5 stages of grief" – denial, anger, bargaining, depression, and acceptance – a good model of "red pill rage," or are there problems using this model as predictive rather than descriptive? Furthermore, is there, as I believe, a further stage of grief beyond "acceptance"? In this article I will discuss the last stage of grief from a red-pill perspective and speculate on what lies beyond.

Paul Elam has a powerful video on the subject you should watch here:

Elisabeth Ross's 1969 book, On Death and Dying, explains the 5 stages of grief as experienced by the terminally ill, and is a great gift to the world because it gave us a perspective on the behaviors and feelings of the dying, which allows thoughtful caregivers, friends and relatives an understanding that leads to greater compassion. I read the book in 1974 as a boy of 15 as my father was dying of leukemia, and as the pain and shoddy medical care of that era turned him from a loving dad into bedridden monster given to unpredictable and incomprehensible explosions of anger over even the kindnesses his confused and scared kids tried to bless him with. Ross's work helped me greatly in coping with my dad's outbursts.

Now, the utility of Ross's work is so powerful that we are tempted to universalize it beyond the feelings of the terminally ill to all areas of rancorous human conflict – I have heard it applied to not only "red pill rage" but also romantic breakups, business failures, family members of the dying, and even those poor losers suffering from Trump Derangement Syndrome – .as Ross's website notes, "many of the 'stages' of the dying described in the book have been subsequently simplified and publicly caricatured beyond recognition."

However, Ross's work only purported to explore the experiences of the dying and efforts to generalize it further may backfire because, among other things, the dying die but other grieving people may have to live on for decades, calling into question the assumption of "acceptance" as the final stage of grief for the non-terminal.

Other stages

As almost 50 years of review have refined our perceptions, other putative stages of grief have been identified and put forward:

- Shock, perhaps the Zeroth stage of Grief before Denial, when one first is confronted with the knowledge of one's impending death. In The Matrix this is perhaps when Neo, long before taking the Red Pill, sees the tattoo of the "White Rabbit" he has been told to follow "down the rabbit hole".
- Hope, an overarching faith in salvation, whether explicitly religious or not. For Morpheus, Neo was the literal embodiment of that hope.
- Partial Denial – the sinking feeling of slow realization that one's denials are futile. Neo's partial denial is stoked by his encounters with the Oracle who tells him that he is, in fact, NOT "the One", which Neo takes as a challenge.
- Decathexis – the final-final stage, sometimes known colloquially as "Closure", wherein one's energy and interest in dying is diminished or even withdrawn. Toward the end of The Matrix, Neo finds he can casually fend off the flying fists of Agent Smith, with an almost bored disinterest. Decathexis is, of course, the undoing of Cathexis, "the process of investment of mental or emotional energy in a person, object, or idea" such as personal death.

Stage 6 of Red Pill Rage: The Nexis of Revenge.

It is my contention that stage 6 of red pill rage is a nexis of cathexis, decathexis, and a new term, hypercathexis, characterized by anti-male psychotherapists as "excessive investment of interest in an object, person, or idea." In the feminist-dominated mental health fields any extraordinary male commitment or achievement is demonized with terms like "hypercathexis" or "toxic masculinity", ignoring the positive impact of men's achievements on civilization.

As active agents, men feel a compulsion to engage and solve problems, not just passively seek the emotional closure of decathexis. This is perhaps the greatest weakness of Ross's work – she could interview slowly expiring patients but could never practically study the sudden, violent deaths more common to men on the battlefields of war and industry. As a woman Ross had no insight nor understanding of men's innate need to DO SOMETHING to address a problem.

For example, in the aftermath of my father's wasting death, my younger brother not only became a physician, but he became a researcher into the leukemia that killed our father. This research bore fruit and the drug my brother investigated is now recognized as the cure for that type of leukemia. In short, my brother got revenge. The focus and determination of my brother to avenge our father's death might well be called "hypercathexis."

In stage 6 of red pill rage men chose between three paths:

- Decathexis – these are the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) who lose interest in pursuing relationships with women in favor of other personal interests. Various schools of MGTOW may also lose interest in engagement with gynocentric society to varying degrees.
- Cathexis – these are the PUAs (Pickup Artists) who recognize that society is doomed and settle for using their Red Pill insights to have as much sex with as many women as possible as society crumbles,
- Hypercathexis – these are the anti-feminists and/or MRAs (Men's Rights Advocates) who work actively and against long odds to restore equal rights to men to forestall or even prevent the collapse of civil society as advocated by "smash patriarchy" feminists.

Of course, men in stage 6 may jump from one path to the next or devise hybrid paths of their own reckoning.

We are men. We do stuff. We get revenge.

Study: 91% of mothers abuse children, fathers 7%

Paul Elam · 13 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In the lead up to ICMI-17 we will be republishing a few classics from the AVFM library. The following piece by Paul Elam from May 2013 remains as relevant as ever. – PW

Did the headine grab your attention?

I will get to the results of that disturbing study in just a bit, but first I want to tell you a related story that has to do with another group of studies regarding women and rape.

On June 19 of 2011 I wrote a piece here at AVFM, titled "Study Reveals Female Rape Victims Enjoyed the Experience." I cited several studies and some articles from Psychology Today that supported the idea that many rape victims actually enjoyed being raped and secretly yearned for it to happen.

The article drew a lot of traffic, and still occasionally goes viral somewhere. It did so yesterday to the tune of 11,000 hits.

The only glitch in the article was that none of it was true. I simply made up a conclusion that women actually enjoyed being raped and then went to find anecdotal evidence in magazine articles that would superficially support that completely insane idea. The "studies" I backed it up with were either non-existent, as in I fabricated them out of thin air – or they were studies that in no way made the conclusions that I claimed they did.

The whole thing was a bunch of malarkey designed to create a destructive and unfair characterization of the average woman's sexual psyche in the most misleading way that I could. Well, misleading up to the last paragraph where I explained to readers that they had "been had," and that the entire piece was a ruse.

At the end of that article, along with my explanation, I linked them to an article by esteemed social researcher Dr. Murray Straus. Unlike me, Straus wasn't kidding. His paper, entitled, "Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence," is an accurate and highly disturbing overview of how feminist academicians and researchers coerce, fabricate, mislead and even attack their way into ensuring that a feminist narrative on domestic violence – one of female only victims and male only perpetrators – is the only thing that sees the light of day in the academic world and subsequently the world at large.

In that reference to Straus' article, which is also now available on this site, I also explained to readers the purpose of my little ruse; to provide an example of how this kind of demagogic deception can harm.

Here's the rub. As Straus eloquently and courageously illustrated in his article, we live in a culture drowning in feminist deceptions. And they are not just limited to lies about the nature of domestic violence. Every time you see a headline about 1 in 4 women being raped[1], about a gender wage gap[2], about a billion women on Earth being beaten and abused[3] or about many other feminist canards that are the stock-in-trade of feminist fundraising and ideological expansion, you are seeing something no different than what you see in the headline of this article, or the one I concocted on women and rape.

It is exactly the same thing.

Well, there is actually one difference. Feminists will not try to grab you at the last moment and tell you, "just kidding." They won't let you know they are lying. They will, in fact, seek to silence you, demonize you, and even destroy you if you do not accept their false propaganda or do a very good job convincing them that you believe.

They will use false conclusions, "evidence" by citation, obstruction and harassment to generate funds, gain political clout, suppress opposing views and further their ideology with depraved indifference to the serious damage they are inflicting on the society around them.

Here is another excellent overview of how the problems manifest. It is well worth watching. (source 1menaregood1)

My Rape Study Reveals article has drawn a great deal of criticism. Most of it is from feminists who, without reading and/or comprehending the entire article, wigged out at my purported conclusions and either commented or emailed me to rage about it. A few of the feminists who have contacted me actually did read the entire piece, understood it, and raged at me anyway because they feared that potential rapists (read: all men) might misunderstand the intent and get the idea that it was permission to sexually violate women.

These, I must assume, would be the same feminists who have no concern whatsoever that the feminist narrative on rape and domestic violence might encourage some women to think they can get away with being abusive. Of course, in their defense, if your worldview does not even acknowledge that women rape or physically abuse men, children and other women, then I suppose it is reasonable that this concern would not enter your mind.

I have to wonder though, how many of them will ever have the light turn on, and come to realize that their outrage only proves the bias that I was pointing at to begin with? I wonder how many will stop to think that the only thing that separates my one article from the overwhelming body of feminist literature and research is that I actually yelled “April Fools!” at the end to let everyone know it was a joke?

I am betting very few.

At any rate, the article remains one of my personal favorites. It averages over 200 hits a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year, with a viral spike here and there that gives our traffic a big boost. Also, and even more importantly, it illustrates very well the nature of the double standard we are up against.

You can sell a long debunked bit of wage gap fluff directly through the mainstream media without having so much as one TV producer or newspaper editor ask for a fact check or an opposing view. At the same time, if you try to push a piece on the real and outrageous death gap where it concerns sex and suicide, you can hold your breath and not run out of air before someone pipes up to point out that you must include that women actually “attempt” suicide more than men, so they are still more affected by the problem.

That prejudicial bias is what you are seeing in all the outrage about my article from 2011. After two years the outrage keeps on coming, and it will for years to come because the plain fact of the matter is that it is perceived as a problem for women. If I were peddling lies that might be construed as harming men, I would not be hearing from any of these people.

Now, I don’t, even in my wildest imagination, think that I can make these people care about men. It is just not going to happen. But I can point out their hypocrisy and make them pull their fucking hair out while I do it.

Some days that’s good enough.

[1] 1 in 4 debunked http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/02/one-in-four-lie-demolished-once-and-for.html

[2] Wage gap debunked
http://www.bloomberg.com/news/2012-08-13/don-t-blame-discrimination-for-gender-wage-gap.html

[3] Julia Gillard debunked

It doesn't look like anything to me: Confronting Willful Blindness Against Men's Issues.

Zach Janssen · 14 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In HBO's "Westworld" advanced robots, verging on human intelligence, live in an old-West theme park, hundreds of them making up a cast to entertain visiting human tourists. These robots believe themselves to be humans living in an authentic, 19th-century environment. The tourists play dress-up, but occasionally slip and reveal to the robots a glimmer of the outside world–a photograph taken at Times Square dropped in the dirt, an out-of-place reference to some modern invention.

The robots' designers anticipated such lapses, and programmed a filter over their perceptions, blinding them to ideas they are not supposed to know. When confronted with these incongruous crumbs, the robots give a rote response, "It doesn't look like anything to me," and simply move on, the forbidden knowledge sliding past them like water off a Teflon pan.[1]

This eerie inability to perceive the obvious is familiar to anyone who speaks about men's issues. Indeed, a normal part of a person's men's-issues awakening happens after they latch onto an isolated fact, a part of the hidden truth. The fact often takes the form of recognizing a media distortion. It could be seeing through the wage gap myth, or noticing the definitional manipulations used to arrive at the supposed 1-in-4 sexual assault number, or learning that Boko Haram has kidnapped more than 10,000 boys while all the media covers is outraged pleas to "bring back" 276 girls.[2] Or it could be any other of countless similar discrepancies. That first realization feels like a stroke of enlightenment, like they have noticed a glitch in the Matrix.

A second moment for revelation often comes when they try to explain the issue to someone who adheres to the mainstream narrative. They initiate the conversation confidently, armed with the facts, so it comes as a surprise when the other person reacts with an awkwardness, dismissiveness, or even derision. The new men's advocate feels like Prometheus, having discovered fire and returned to Earth with it, only to be told, "It doesn't feel hot to me." This predictable callousness and the media distortion both arise from the same psychological cause.

Professor Jonathan Haidt is a moral psychologist who has grown so concerned over the ideological narrowing and fixation of the supposedly educated circles of society that he joined in the 2015 founding of "Heterodox Academy," aimed at steering American universities away from left-leaning political orthodoxy, and towards free expression and viewpoint diversity.

Dr. Haidt researches the psychology of how people make moral judgments. He uses the metaphor of a person riding an elephant, where the person symbolizes conscious reasoning, while the elephant represents unconscious intuition. The elephant is made up of "[a]utomatic processes [which] run the human mind, just as they have been running animal minds for 500 million years. . . . When human beings evolved the capacity for language and reasoning at some point in the last million years, the brain did not rewire itself to hand over the reins to a new and inexperienced charioteer. Rather, the rider (language-based reasoning) evolved because it did something useful for the elephant." In particular, "[t]he rider is skilled at fabricating post hoc explanations for whatever the elephant has just done, and is good at finding reasons to justify whatever the elephant wants to do next."

In other words, while our conscious mind has some limited ability to guide us, more often our intuitions take us where they like, and we then try to justify why that was a good idea. Rather than being guided by the rider, the elephants seek to move in packs, observing where others are going and staying with the crowd. Haidt noted, "Many of us believe that we follow an inner moral compass, but the history of social psychology richly demonstrates that other people exert a powerful force, able to make cruelty seem acceptable and altruism seem embarrassing. . . ." [3]

When wondering how society could be enraged by Boko Haram's kidnapping of 276 girls while ignoring over 10,000 boys, the correct answer is the obvious one: people do not care about men and boys. For evolutionary and historical reasons, our intuitive minds are tuned to view males as disposable. Upon hearing news of those poor kidnapped boys, most people's elephants would barely twitch.

Most people value women highly simply for being alive, while men and boy's only chance of being similarly valued lies in their occupying a significant role or position. For example, a parent loves their son because that particular boy fills an important role for them. We also value leaders, which causes many men to strive with single-minded, self-sacrificial obsession to win leadership roles, and thereby gain validation. A tiny percentage of these strivers actually achieve, at least temporarily, an apex position. For our intuitive elephants, these few come to signify all men–illustrating a logical fallacy known as the "availability heuristic," in which examples that easily come to mind are assumed to represent the whole.

If the space of possible moral attitudes were a two-dimensional field, most of the elephants would be massed together in a herd, squarely in the concern-for-women zone. Men's advocates can scream themselves hoarse about male suffering, and not a single animal will budge. The riders will invent ad hoc explanations, tortuous logic to justify the non-response. They may argue that men have done bad things in history, or point out that some men sit on corporate boards, or accuse the men's advocates of harboring sinister ulterior motives to subjugate women. The riders cannot admit to themselves that their elephants care more about females, and so they lie, blinding themselves with excuses.

Men's advocates spent decades trying to politely and carefully explain obvious issues, and then being surprised when people dismissed and vilified them for their efforts. The mainstream/feminist elephants simply feel very comfortable right where they are, surrounded by a large herd, occupying terrain that they believe to be the moral high ground. One cannot argue with uncaring, because each level falls back into the same recursive loop: they don't care; they don't care that they don't care; they don't care that they don't care that they don't care. To insist that men's advocates should further hone their arguments for presentation to the feminist-dominated mainstream is like urging Charlie Brown to man up and keep trying to kick Lucy's football.

In "Westworld," one robot finds an outside-world picture and mysteriously recognizes its significance, overcoming his programmed blindness. The experience drives him mad.[4] The consequences for nascent men's advocates are less dire. Their elephants break off from the herd and wander to a more egalitarian tract of pasture. There, they find a small but growing group who had preceded them. The riders here are much happier, no longer needing to perform illogical tap-dances, done living with the cognitive dissonance of claiming to value human beings of all groups equally, while at the same time being dismissive of men's hardships. The more this offshoot group grows, the more attractive it will become to members of the larger herd, and the more will join, happy to stop lying to themselves. The larger it becomes, the faster it will grow, as its success depends upon welcoming newcomers and keeping them engaged.

[1] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Txed66nXsUE#t=0m55s

[2] https://www.wsj.com/articles/the-kidnapped-boys-of-boko-haram-1471013062

[3] Quoted from, "The Righteous Mind: Why Good People are Divided by Politics and Religion," 2012, Jonathan Haidt, Random House, LLC

[4] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qkr-pj7HiqY

Customizing your new sexbot

August Løvenskiolds · 14 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to MiGal™ Corporation, your one-stop provider of all your sexual and reproductive needs for men. We know you have a choice in premium sexbots and we are grateful you've chosen to check us out. We won't be satisfied until you are.

Why choose MiGal™?

While women's sexuality is simple – 10 minutes in a vibrator shop and they are set for life or until the batteries need replacing (link is NSFW) – we at MiGal™ appreciate that men's sexuality is a billion times more complex. All a woman needs is her government check and the vibrating simulacra member of a man but the discerning man needs to consider all his senses when investing in a partner. Does she look attractive? Smell nice? Have a pleasing, melodious voice? Taste pleasant? Feel like she wants you? You know, there?

That is right – here at MiGal™ and unlike your other alternatives, we take full responsibility for meeting your needs as a man.

No longer must you settle for whatever half-drunken feminist barfly is still tottering about at closing time. What some deride as "objectification" we see as your right to seek happiness as your demanding standards permit. By choosing MiGal™, for once, YOU will have the power to not only choose but indeed, custom-build and later even reprogram your MiGal™ sexbot based on your changing needs and whims.

Fancy a virgin? Or a pro? Or something in between? Your MiGal™ can be set to up to 15 distinct levels of sexual accomplishment (available levels may vary depending on your choice of model), and can be manually reset at any time. Our deluxe models have optional learning modes where her own sexual skills can grow in tandem with yours – or, in LeapFrog™ mode, you will be hard-pressed to keep up with her.

Want to keep score? While in privacy mode no data is shared, in competitive mode your MiGal™ will compare your sexual prowess to that of millions of other owners across the planet. Want to be an alpha male? Your MiGal™ can rate your masculinity achievement – or even help you improve it. It is all up to you. We even have monthly tournaments – the only monthlies your MiGal™ will ever have. We guarantee it.

Want to guarantee her fidelity? Your MiGal™ comes with an optional chastity feature – the "Engagement Bling™" to keep her pure when you cannot be there for her. The one-carat Bling™ will restrict your MiGal™ to, at most, two other partners. The two-carat will reduce that to one, and with the super premium three-carat Bling™ she will fight "unto death" to protect herself from interlopers using our patented VicBlame™ technology. As a bonus, the three-carat Bling™ includes full replacement coverage should your MiGal™ be compromised or otherwise defiled. Please see the policy for full details.

Doesn't that all sound great? And you haven't even picked out her cup size yet. But wait! There is more!

Need an upgrade? Your shopworn MiGal™ can be refitted in our cutting-edge Cervix Department™ or even returned for a generous trade-in allowance at any time – and it won't cost half of all your stuff to buy a younger, hotter MiGal™!

Need motivation? Your MiGal™ comes with over 6900 personality options easily configurable by a password-protected remote controller. In shuffle mode she can have a new surprise personality every day for almost 19 years – and we are always looking to add more!

- Naughty/Nice Our RadioFreckles™ can make your MiGal™ naughty enough for a honeymoon or nice enough for a chair at Thanksgiving.

- Chatty/Reticent/Blessed Silence
- Happy/Moody RadioFreckles™ can turn her from a kitten to a spitfire in a heartbeat, just like a real woman except for the real heartbeat.
- Trusting/Jealous RadioFreckles™ can turn her from a loving soulmate to a vicious bitch for no reason. If you can't handle your Migal™ at her worst then you do not deserve her at her best or without the remote.
- Personality Disorder RadioFreckles™include both "Healthy" and the entire Dark Triad, including Narcissistic and Borderline.
- Manic/Medium/Stoned/Tipsy.
- Focused/Distracted
- Alert/Mellow/Sleepy
- Generous/Content/Needy

Need Power? Your MiGal™ is not only fully rechargeable but with our Shocking Maw™ solar power upgrade you can park her by the pool and not only will her batteries revive, but your motor may be revving as well. Sign up to be early in line for our tanning upgrade once it becomes available in the Spring of next year.

Worried About Maintenance? Your MiGal™ comes with her own VanityAlcove™ which will restore her to minty freshness condition in less time than it takes to run a load of laundry. Our higher-end ambulatory model will go to her VanityAlcove™ on command. Once a calendar quarter our service van can stop by to replenish her VanityAlcove™ fluid levels – or, you DIY types can order whatever you need from Amazon, Please note that the use of third party fluids is not recommended and may void your warranty / Cervix agreement.

Need your own unusual fantasy brought to life? Our R&DDD Department can help you if you need something really special. We recently completed a "Ghostbreasters" model that oozes slime from every pore. If we wind up using your idea to expand our product offerings, YOU may become eligible for compensation. Restrictions apply; only purchasers are eligible. Contact our legal department for details.

Are you ready to start picking hair and eye color yet?

We know our prices can be a shock but they are cheap compared to your other options in a companion. Your MiGal™ will protect your wealth as she makes you happy and healthy.

That is right – healthy. Our medical monitor upgrade will contact help immediately if something happens to you while your MiGal™ is close – and she won't be factoring in her inheritance in lieu of getting the ambulance…

What more could you ask for?

And by the way, we finance.

The Power and the Reflected Glory

Doug Mortimer · 14 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Bank robber Willie Sutton would probably be lost to history if not for one quotation. When asked why he robbed banks, he supposedly replied, "That's where the money is."

Sutton's profession was both lucrative and tax-free, but it was not high status. The truly ambitious seek money and power. Consider the case of Melinda French.

Born in Dallas on August 15, 1964, Melinda Ann French was the daughter of an aerospace engineer and a non-working mother. She was the valedictorian of her class at Ursuline Academy in the super-snooty Preston Hollow area of Dallas. From there, she went to Duke University in Durham, North Carolina. She earned a degree in computer science in 1986 and followed it up with an MBA from the same institution in 1987.

As far as resume-building goes, this is about as good as it gets at the front end. After finishing up at Duke, French went to work for Microsoft as a product manager and worked her way up to general manager of information projects before age 30.

When she started at Microsoft, the percentage of females majoring in computer science had already peaked. According to the National Science Foundation, women majoring in computer science fluctuated between 12-17% (I'm gleaning these statistics from a chart, so I'm estimating) from the mid-60s to the mid-70s. No surprise that the subsequent rise of computers in everyday life inspired more women to take up the field. The percentage peaked at 35% in 1985.

Since then, it's been a downward trend with the percentage leveling off at around 20%. In fact, 22% of high school students taking the Advanced Placement test for computer science are girls, so the current proportion of college majors would appear to be an accurate reflection of female interest in the subject. But females are supposed to be in ascendancy, so a decline in female participation in any area sets off alarm bells in the media, even when perfectly reasonable explanations can be uncovered without much digging.

For starters, consider how many subjects a college student can major in today – and that's not including women's studies or any other leftist in-gatherings. You could major in Puppet Arts at the University of Connecticut; Recreation and Leisure Studies at the University of North Texas; or Floral Management at Mississippi State. If you are fortunate enough to gain admittance to Melinda French's alma mater, you can major in Canadian Studies. What does that entail? Beats me. Maybe students get extra credit for attending NHL games in nearby Raleigh (home of the Carolina Hurricanes).

Curiously, the percentage of women majoring in physical sciences (physics, chemistry, astronomy, geology) in 1965 was the same (about 15%) as women majoring in computer science. Both percentages increased through 1985, then diverged. Physical science continued to rise while computer science declined. So a certain amount of the decline in computer science can be blamed on competition from other scientific majors! I don't know how that could be blamed on the patriarchy, but I'm sure a feminist could come up with an explanation.

So in the year 2017, what is the ideal percentage for women in computer science? Well, if you're not a Canadian Studies major, you can always consult Justin Trudeau. His position is left wing and Ottawa is his home base, but he doesn't play for the Senators. Pretty sure he's never been cross-checked in his life, but he knows the score:

The right answer to the above question is 50%.

Why?

Because it's 2017! Consider this quote:

Parity is success to me – when you have 50 percent of college computer science graduates as women….And then I would look to leadership positions, and see if we're getting 50 percent of the leaders of tech companies being women.

This is not Justin Trudeau speaking. It is a kindred spirit, however: our old friend Melinda French. Now she goes by the name Melinda Gates. You see, soon after going to work for Microsoft in 1987, she met head honcho Bill Gates. Coincidentally, this was the first year he appeared on the Forbes list of the world's wealthiest people.

In 1987, Gates was only 32 years old. By any criteria you use, other than personal appearance, he qualified as a good catch. I guess we could say he took the bait. On New Year's Day, 1994, Melinda officially reeled him in. That's a pretty long courtship, but the bigger the trophy fish the longer it takes to get him gaffed and into the boat.

After marriage, Melinda "retired" from Microsoft. On a more pedestrian level, her biological clock was counting down (she was 29 when she and Gates made it legal). The newly crowned queen had no time to waste if she intended to squeeze out some princes and princesses (she eventually gave birth to one of the former and two of the latter).

Of course, it would have been unseemly to keep working at Microsoft after marrying the CEO. Caesar's wife must be above suspicion, you know. Her salary, which was probably considerable, was nothing compared to the riches she had access to after marriage. After all, what could she have attained at Microsoft if Bill Gates had not been smitten with her? A vice-presidency of some sort? Squeaking in one last Piscean figure of speech, Melinda Gates had bigger fish to fry.

On the surface, she was a stay-at-home mom while daddy brought home the bacon in enormous slabs. But you can't characterize her as a tradcon housewife when hubby is as rich as Croesus and as powerful as anyone on the planet aside from the folks who have access to the nuclear launch codes.

Well, Melinda could have glided into the post-menopausal bliss of society matronhood and a life of leisure, but that wasn't enough for her. So in the year 2000, at age 36, she and Bill gave birth to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation They were right on schedule, as the behavior of the super-rich over the past century has shown.

It all started with the Revenue Act of 1913, which not only established the federal income tax and the Federal Reserve banking system, but also ushered in tax-free foundations dedicated to "promoting the common good and general welfare."

As you might suspect, what does or does not constitute the "common good and general welfare" can be a matter of opinion. Nevertheless, muckety-mucks of the highest order do not hesitate to define it for us. The Rockefeller Foundation, founded in 1913, is the template for these organizations. Its mission is "promoting the well-being of humanity throughout the world." This is almost the very dictionary definition of the word philanthropy.

Today, in addition to the Rockefeller Foundation, we also have the Ford Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation. Apparently, once you reach the highest stratum of money and power, you are obligated to become a philanthropist. That would seem to be a good thing, yet in some circles George Soros is considered a philanthropist.

A tax-free foundation is not just the ultimate status symbol for the solons of big business; it is also a great way to shelter income while influencing public servants and public opinion. It is no coincidence that public relations professionals started to proliferate around the time the Revenue Act of 1913 was passed.

If you go to the BMGF (as the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation is abbreviated) web site, the slogan is "the premise of this foundation is one life on the planet is no more valuable than the next." I find that statement downright laughable on its face, but coming from the richest man on the planet (estimated net worth: $86.9 billion) and his wife, it's a knee-slapper of biblical proportions.

Who would guess that a couple of Squatemalan peasants living in a tarpaper shack and subsisting on dung beetle stew were the equal of the world's richest power couple?

Aside from the obvious difference in income, benighted sods in third world countries do not lecture the world's people on how they should live. They are not in a position to influence or patronize others. Bill and Melinda Gates – Time magazine's 2005 Persons of the Year; 2016 Presidential Medal of Freedom honorees –have no such reservations.

BMGF is the world's largest private philanthropic group. Their goals include the usual global do-gooding, but empowering third world women is one of Melinda's pet projects. It was just a matter of time before she shifted her focus to first world feminism.

Hence her launch of Pivotal Ventures, her own foundation dedicated to gender parity. Given her background, she is particularly focused on the computer industry. "How is it that girls feel unwelcomed, and if they feel unwelcomed, why do they feel unwelcomed?" She asks the eternal question and then offers her answers in an article published in The National, Amtrak's in-transit magazine:

Right around when this drop [in female participation] started, computers were moving into homes. And the thing that really first got computers into the home were games, and the gaming industry was very male-oriented, and that seems to be when women started dropping out of the pipeline in droves. Something like that can have this momentum effect, where women don't see role models and so they don't get into the industry – it's a leaky pipeline that starts all the way back in kindergarten.

I think some of the tech companies that are newer, maybe those started by a young man or a couple of young men, you get that kind of rah-rah mentality. They don't necessarily come from a very mature place, and they haven't been around very long. And so some of those places, at least when I talk to women in the [Silicon] Valley, they don't feel very welcoming to women and women don't see women actually coding or running a project team; they don't see them as leaders.

If I'm the only one on the team, even if I'm surrounded by 10 great guys I enjoy working with, I'm just not as comfortable as I would be if there were more women on the team. That's when they say, "Eh, this just doesn't feel like a place I necessarily want to work."

She doesn't come right out and blame the patriarchy, but you get the message. What we have here is failure…failure to gynocentrize!

Well, I can't help but wonder if it wouldn't be more efficient to just jettison the lone woman on the team rather than recruit more women. Anyone who has studied anthropology knows that the male group is a fundamental social unit. Wouldn't all-male groups in STEM be more cohesive and hence boost morale, productivity, and profits?

No, no, a thousand times no! Any executive recommending that would be asked to resign within minutes if not seconds. Remember the unwritten law of corporate gynocentrism: female morale is always more important than male morale, even when males greatly outnumber females.

According to progressivism, if a selected field of human endeavor does not perfectly reflect demographics, heroic measures must be taken to achieve parity. Given that dictum, any grade school kid who knows fractions and percentages can tell you the "right" answer to the question of how many women should be in computer sciences.

It's all in the demographics. There's no need to take other factors into account. You'll just get confused. Curious how people think the likes of Melinda Gates are super-smart when they indulge in such intellectual laziness.

Of course, the rule of parity is selectively applied. If most women use computers every day, does that mean more of them should take up computer science? After all, American women flush toilets every day yet female plumbers are extremely rare. Almost all American women drive cars, but female mechanics are in short supply. In any occupation where you get your hands dirty, progressives are not clamoring for change.

Melinda Gates's prescriptions for social justice are no different from those made by parity-mongers of less prominence. But there is a delicious irony in her life.

As mentioned above, Melinda's education and work history were outstanding. She got a great start on a Silicon Valley career. But that wasn't what provided her with the exalted platform she enjoys today.

In the bad old days, two of the time-tested ways for women to move up in class were (1) marry money, or (2) marry the boss. Melinda French did both.

Willie Sutton stole an estimated $2 million in his career. Chump change, right, Melinda? You knew better than Willie Sutton where the money was.

And the power.

Beware the Jooze!

Paul Elam · 15 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Authors note: Recently I did a video on my YouTube channel, primarily targeting the fringe anti-Semite commenters that have popped up in small numbers. There were not very many, but just enough to annoy from time to time. In that video, I invited them to spew their bile elsewhere, perhaps not-so-politely. The result was a small shitstorm of rabid conspiracy theorists that was, to be honest, a little surprising. I suppose I have not lost all my naivety. It is still hard for me to imagine hate on this scale, apart from feminism.

I have made it a point to say, with as much frequency as necessary over the years, that I have never claimed to speak for the entire men's movement. I limit my authority to my own opinion, and to speaking editorially for AVFM and AEFM. In that spirit, I have done my best to draw firm lines between this corner of the men's movement. I won't provide a platform for misandrists, misogynists, homophobes, racists or for any other group whose identity is predicated on hating and demonizing another class of human beings. I've made efforts to clear them out of our ranks, citing feminism's abysmal failure to do the same and how that metastasized into the cancer we see today.

That position doesn't change with anti-Semitism.

With that, I am publishing the script of my video exactly as I read it, with instructions to the moderators to act with purpose on any attempts use the comments here as a platform to spread hate.

The day I feel obliged to provide a platform for people who hate is the day I will pull the plug on all of it. Thank you. PE

OK full disclosure here. Culturally speaking I don't know Jack about Jewish people. I was raised in mostly rural Texas. To us, Jews were those people in the 10 Commandments. And like the head Jew was played by Charlton Heston.

Heston, being the head Jew and all, lead the other Jews out of Egypt, and somehow managed to get lost. They wandered around looking for Israel for 40 years. Now, checking the map and seeing the short distance between Egypt to Israel left me with a lot questions about just where the heck there were lost, and how they managed to wander that long without stumbling on Israel, but that isn't the point and it's me that starting to wander.

The point is that as dutiful Texans, we didn't give Jews too much thought. Heck, I bet 9 out 10 people I knew had never met a Jew – much less had anything against them. Besides, most people in late 1960's and early 1970's rural Texas were too caught up in hating blacks and Hispanics, two groups for which we had a tote bag full of colorful descriptions, all of which I remember with varying degrees of embarrassment. I grew out of my need for such descriptors and indeed came to view them as less than amusing when I started growing up and using my brain, but there again I digress.

Anyway, I guess there was only so much hate to go around, and what with so many blacks and Hispanics already on our doorstep, we could not be bothered to hate on Charleston and his people just for having a bad sense of direction.

Fast forward about 45 years and I am pretty much the same way. I know a little more about Jewish culture, and of course I have learned all the stereotypes about Jews, and I have learned about a truckload of conspiracy theories about Jews owning the world, running things as a secret and no so secret cabal behind the scenes.

I've heard there were no Jews in the twin towers on 9/11 and a dozen or so other equally implausible examples of nutcasery. A lot of this can be found popping up here and there in the comments to my videos, which explains why I am talking about it today.

This talk is for you guys faithfully coming in here to defend decent god-fearing folk against the sinister Sons of Abraham.

I have seen you coming in here for years. I've seen your dutiful comments pointing out things like Sandberg is a Jewish name. I've seen you ask, to no one in particular, if we ever notice that there are so many high profile Jewish feminist activists. Some of you have come here looking so hard for Jews in the material that you think you have found one in me.

Incidentally my first death threat email was from someone who thought Jew was my first name. He called me Hey Jew, and he wasn't talking about a Beatles song.

That too, is ironic, considering I am a rabid antifeminist. I am not exactly a good fit with your Jewish feminist conspiracy motif.

I have gotten emails from you urging me to address this supposed elephant in the room in my videos.

And you know what. You're right. Since for whatever reason you guys are part of the landscape in the men's movement, then I suppose I am way overdue to address this in a video.

So, anti-Jew crusaders, today's your day.

To fuck off and die.

But before you do either, allow me to offer a response to your most common assertions. You can take it with you on your way out.

First of all, this business about all the feminist Jews. And, of course, the implication is that there was a structured conspiracy by Jews to use their fellow Jews to destroy the goyim's family structure and take over the world, which strangely they already supposedly own.

Apparently, Skepp Torr and the other Jewish MRAs I know didn't get that memo, but that is the basic theory, anyway. Feminism is a Jewish conspiracy. One of thousands, I suppose. And the total of evidence that this is true is the fact that a lot of feminists are Jewish.

But how about, just for a moment, we not indulge ourselves in totally dismissing Occam's Razor.

There are some people. Roughly anyone with a brain, I'd say, that think the Jewish culture is one that is predisposed to engage in political activism, particularly in areas that involve human rights.

There is likely something in Jewish history, though I can't put my finger on exactly what it is, that may have made that kind of activism appeal to Jewish people.

[image]Oh, that? Well, that, at least according to the turdburger fringe of the men's movement, didn't really happen. It was a hoax. Concocted by who else but Jews.

At the very least, even if you hate Jewish people, you must give them credit for cleverness. Faking a suicide is a very difficult thing to pull off. These motherfuckers faked genocide, and everyone on the planet but Chis Boyle and his merry band of knuckleheads swallowed it hook line and sinker, including yours truly.

So, to this point let's do a quick review.

We have two possible worldviews on Jews in feminism. One, about 20 years after the attempted extermination of the Jewish people, they developed an understandably heightened interest in social activism.

They also found themselves in the emerging cultural clash between right-wing conservative and leftist liberal movements. Perceiving the left, including feminism, as the heir apparent path a better world, not to mention preventing another Holocaust, they went that direction, admittedly getting caught up in the leftist delusion with everyone else on that side of things.

Consequently, many Jewish feminists rose to prominent awareness in the movement, thus their disproportionate representation among the ranks of feminists today.

In support of this, we also see the same over-representation across several leftist causes.

OK, that's one view.

The other is that Jews faked their own extermination, secretly took over all the banks, and quietly schemed up feminism in secluded, dark rooms, by the light of a menorah. And now, as a part of the master Jewish conspiracy, they are using feminism to enrich themselves and gain even more power. That's the other view.

Take your pick.

I would talk on more of the conspiracy theory stuff, but I already shoot fish in a barrel for a living. I don't need any more targets.

I do, however, want to address the urgent question of whether I am, in fact, a Jew.

Now to start out honestly. I must admit that Skepp Torr did declare me a conditional, honorary, temporary Jew without benefits some time ago, but I am sure that has expired, and besides, that title would not count on a Kibbutz anyway.

Nonetheless, Chris Boyle, one of the more frequent visitors here from I-don't-like Jewsville, insists that I am Jewish, and points out to me rather bluntly that Elam is a Jewish name if he ever saw one.

Where he got that tidbit of insight I don't know, but I was quite tickled by it.

You see, I used to think of my name in terms of much deeper history. If you look through a chronology of world maps you will see that the nation of Iran used to be called Persia. And before that it was called Elam.

[image]Elam, later known as Persia, then Iran. Jewish to the core I tell you.

But that really isn't the story. I used to think my name came from that ancient land and was proud that it was reference in as far back as Genesis in the Bible.

Genealogy corrected me. My name goes back to the county of Elham, in England, another historically odd point of origin for a Jewish man.

I say all this at the risk of all the denizens of I-hate-Jewsville rushing into the comments here to tell me that I am defensively denying my own heritage.

After all, they have demonstrated enough creativity in their beliefs to conjure up just about anything.

But the truth is I almost wish I was Jewish. If I was, I'd probably never stop pointing that out to the "feminism is a Jewish thing" crowd. Just one more bit of fun in my otherwise fun life.

Now, why does any of this matter? Well, this is our community. Like it or not, we have some outliers that need more help than reforming family courts is going to give them.

The temptation is to just boot and ban them on site. After all, other than saying, "Look, there's another Jew!" there's not much they have to offer. And, even more importantly, the left-wing media, which they also regard as a Jewish conspiracy, loves to point to them as representative of the men's movement. It's a burden that both MRAs and MGTOW bear with relatively equal frequency these days.

But I also like the idea of letting the challenged dig their own holes in life. So as long they don't cause a real distraction, I am inclined to let them stay, and perhaps have a shot at some common-sense rubbing off onto them from the other commenters. [note to mods: I have since revised this policy to be far less forgiving]

Anyway, I know this talk is a bit off topic, and not what you expect me to do, so I anticipate some down votes and the comments to go with them.

That is part of the package here, though. I stay on topic till something puts a burr in my ass and I have to stop and take it out. I will be back on the wagon and doing my regular gig come the next video.

Meanwhile, as always, I hope you've enjoyed, see you next time, and Shalom.

Another attempt for civilization to get civilized

Gary Costanza · 17 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Norway has just joined an august group of truly progressive nations that have attempted to protect all infants from genital mutilation by seeking to ban the routine circumcision of baby boys.

A libertarian and neo-liberal populist group called the Progress Party (FrP) of Norway has voted recently and passed a platform that includes banning routine circumcision of boys under 16. The platform includes a ban on wearing hijabs in public schools and was criticized as an attack on minorities. The European Jewish Association called on other Jewish organizations to help them oppose this and any other legislation that they consider anti-Jewish.

Voted down was a compromise that only banned government-funded circumcisions.

The Progress Party is the third largest in Norway and has a coalition with the Norwegian Conservative government. It's platform doesn't dictate law but shows support for the ban in upcoming elections later this year.

The Independent reported it this way:

"Norwegian ruling party votes to ban circumcision for men under 16 years old Anti-immigrant party is third largest in country and works in coalition with Norwegian government"

> A political party in Norway has voted to ban the ritual circumcision of boys under the age of 16 and several other measures which have been blasted as an attack on minorities.
>
> Advocates claimed that circumcision resulted in mental and physical harm to children and was a serious violation of human rights.
>
> The party leader, Siv Jensen, told the Aftenposten newspaper that she was against forbidding circumcision.
>
> The reportedly last-minute and chaotic voting schedule meant that the proposed compromise – banning state funding for circumcision – failed.
>
> Ms Jensen insisted the move was not designed to target minorities and that her party had consistently defended Israel.
>
> The vote in Norway comes a day after Belgium's Parliament of Wallonia voted in favour of banning ritual slaughter, which would affect Jewish kosher and Muslim halal rituals. It comes into effect in September 2019.

Let's get real here.

You're a Nordic country that never had the nasty habit of mutilating infants at birth, and then come immigrants with those habits as well as other rituals and customs that need addressing. Some newcomers want to slaughter animals for religious reasons. Many want to cut the genitals of both male and female children, also for religious reasons.

What to do?

Some things are just wrong. There must be standards of human rights and decency in our laws that are consistent and complete.

Consistent when circumcision is banned regardless of its funding.

Complete when they protect both girls and boys from genital mutilation.

Religion does not, for example, allow the murder of someone, so how can we allow ritual maiming of unconsenting infants, an obvious assault? The answer is… we don't legally allow it (most common law countries guarantee protection against bodily harm), and we shouldn't do it, but most of us don't know (or deny) this is a human rights issue. Those who deny that the Constitution protects infants from the same bodily harm as adult citizens are denying those children their very humanity.

Can we agree infant boys should have the same protection as animals, and heaven forbid, girls?

The line is drawn at bodily integrity for all persons (of all ages) and animals.

Across the board, we must protect the most vulnerable of us from harm. It's obvious that Norway and other countries are not against any particular race or religion as evidenced by the fact that their immigration has caused these issues. Either we value and enforce the right to bodily integrity for all, or we're on a slippery slope that allows human rights violations to continue against infant boys.

It's clear what any civilized society would do: pass the ban.

Unfortunately for male infants, some countries have a history of allowing, even promoting, abuses such as routine circumcision, allowed for various erroneous reasons, including religion, to the point that even non-Jews and Muslims are routinely cut. Just because those countries have an insidious and morbid stake in infant genital mutilation, that does not make it right, just as some once believed that slavery, or multiple wives, or virgin sacrifice, or female genital mutilation was right.

When enlightened people realized slavery was wrong, that battle for human rights was on. Those without slavery stayed free, while those with slaves struggled – some through civil war – to end it.

From The Independent, here are some of the many comments in support of the proposed ban:

> Cephalon
> This party does not care about the rights of babies or children. This is yet another stick to beat foreigners with. The ugly thuggish European values still live on – they just pretend they are defending something positive with a very negative ulterior motive.
>
> Lightf00t
> "thuggish'
>
> Because there's nothing less thuggish than assaulting kids.
>
> borabosna
> You can understand it. It's simple. Humans get stuck with stupid things throughout cultural evolution. Genital mutilation is about primitive beliefs regarding preventing adultery and signaling loyalty, reducing sexual pleasure (which is supposed to be a bad thing), and in the case of boys, a violent rite of passage toughening them up to a hard life of hunting and warring by giving them pain early on (many cultures circumcise not at birth but later). Some claim that in ancient Egypt, where circumcision originated as far as we know, male > priests would cut their genitals to offer to goddesses, and the practice became streamlined and mainstream later.

I leave you with this final comment, to which I fully concur:

> jaakari
> So a progressive policy bringing in the same safe guards to boys that girls have….
>
> A step forward.

Is feminism killing young boys?

Tim Patten · 17 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In a late-2015 TEDx talk, The Boy Crisis: A Sobering Look at the State of Our Boys, Dr. Warren Farrell discussed how those who support equality for all promote perspectives that shortchange one group, in particular: young males. Among other things, he noted that nine-year-old boys are killing themselves four times as often as girls, and yet women's organizations have remained oddly silent. These so-called advocates of fairness have been quick to claim ownership of the "gender equality" megaphone for their own purposes, but have not taken its message to heart in a meaningfully inclusive way.

In truth, feminist's efforts to level the playing field are targeted in one direction – toward the privileged and protected class of women. Rob Whitley Ph. D. reported in Psychology Today, The European Parliament Committee for Women's Rights and Gender Equality produced a February 2017 report that was adopted by Parliament and ignored any issues for boys and men. The United Kingdom's boy suicide rate parallels America. There is a disturbing lack of interest in dealing with boys' equality concerns, especially those related to the challenges young males face and how they are treated – or mistreated – during those times in their lives when they are most vulnerable. Simply put, the gendered lens has been firmly fixed on female inequality and the national conversation on this topic is focused solely on them. Sadly, our boys are losing out.

Women's Studies is Constructing Androphobia

Women's studies propagandists have played a major role in bringing this situation about. Because of their relentlessly one-sided, self-serving mantras, we live in a lopsidedly biased world where all females are viewed as the victims of male aggression, violence, sexual abuse and inequality. Instead of being key social members to community growth and survival, boys are portrayed as merely stereotypical rapists and women-beaters in training.

Unfortunately, the influence of these college studies has been painfully far-reaching. The violent statements made like "all men are rapists", "eviscerate white men" and "dismantle patriarchy" carry dangerous messages. Over time, many of those who've been exposed to their toxic theories, including impressionable students on college campuses, have developed an antipathy toward males that borders on religious fervor. By not promoting an open and honest discussion about genders issues for men and women, these so-called egalitarians have fostered widespread androphobia – an abnormal and persistent fear of men and a hatred of the male sex. It is not surprising that festering crises such as the boy suicide epidemic is at hand.

Western Society is Unlearning Masculinity

Still, what is more surprising is how feminism ignores the boy's crisis and instead attempts to make boys more like girls. But not everyone accepts this state of affairs where boys should be overlooked or emasculated. The Chinese, for example, are actively serving up antidotes to notions that spawn over-protected boys who have become neutered or physically and emotionally weak. Among other things, they are teaching masculinity in grades 4-5 and recruiting male teachers that can serve as positive role models. One of their primers, Little Men, advocates for bravery, independence and confidence, in contrast to Western countries that blur gender identity by teaching feminist concepts and enforcing gender neutrality. Although some children undoubtedly benefit from learning about LGBTQ topics, for example, they may confuse those without the proper grounding.

Role models and inspirational life examples for young boys are necessary but hard to find in the U.S., where the situation is anything but progressive. For 10-year-old American males, the gender lens is jam-packed with stereotypes and micro-aggressive mantras that belittle their sex – especially males who are straight – and masculinity. Subjected to endless pronouncements about hegemonic masculinity being toxic and violent, they are regularly told they are not "fitting in," while female peers are given positive feedback "atta girl" and "high-fives" all along the way. Meanwhile, the federal government urges educators to encourage young females toward our STEM – science, technology, engineering and math – future, but does not do the same for boy counterparts.

From most young boys perspective the message coming through loud and clear is that boys are effectively disposable, a jaded distortion that can burrow deep down and severely undermine the psyche of sensitive youngsters. This notion that boys are "bad" and girls are "good" or "why can't boys be like girls" is a form of bigotry that has not only been systematically embedded into our mainstream consciousness, but has, astonishingly, somehow been transformed into one of our society's higher truths.

Needless to say, this creates profound and disturbing ethical issues. In a culture where boys are confused about their gender, place and purpose in the world, it is not hard to see how communally constructed sexism is promulgating mental health issues that often manifest themselves in self-destructive or anti-social behaviors – including, as noted earlier, boys killing themselves.

According to a Psychology Today article by Dr. Miles Groth, "Young Men Who Commit Suicide," little is understood about what motivates boys and young men to take their lives in such numbers. Of great concern is the fact that little effort is being made to get to the bottom of this development. Parents, educators and communities that might otherwise be outraged by any number of trivial issues affecting their children are ignoring a growing crisis, masked in part by the falsehoods of feminism, and failing to identify what is driving our youth toward the depths of depression and despair.

Dismantling Patriarchy

Sadly, many strains of feminists are more intent on imposing their will on others than addressing what really ails boys and men. They harbor a burning obsession to dismantle or "smash" patriarchy and destroy civilization as we know it. Some are so fearful and emotionally wounded that they believe true vindication can only come from eradicating the current societal framework and eliminating men, even if that leads to vulnerable young boys ending their lives.

In an interview with Joe Rogan, Dr. Jordan Peterson argues that women's studies propagandist are determined to instigate a social revolution and restructure our society from the ground up. They seek to bring about anarchy and replace the current system with matriarchy, a system that has rarely survived for long in its prior incarnations. To realize their ambitions, they are willing to undermine civilization and all of the true progress that has been made throughout the ages.

If these anarchists get their way, it may well mean a world buffeted by shortages and failings of what most of us take for granted, including our infrastructure, water and food production mechanisms, and transportation systems. Getting rid of men will devalue or even devastate an evolutionary process that has kept many of us safe and secure in the face of home grown and foreign threats. More than likely, instead of achieving feminist nirvana, the outcome of such misguided ambitions will be horrors such as mass starvation and death by dehydration.

Conclusion

During the steam engine era, many people believed that traveling more than 30 miles per hour would be dangerous to human health, but it wasn't long before that threshold was exceeded by a wide margin. Indeed, supported by a male-dominated system that die-hard feminists condemn, innovation has allowed us to blow through endless constraints without even blinking an eye. In the view of astrophysicist and author Neil deGrasse Tyson, the patriarchal institutions of the sciences, technology and engineering will skyrocket our world towards tomorrow at speeds most have probably never imagined.

Feminism has become undignified and whether this anti-male crowd accepts it or not, patriarchy has shaped our history and can successfully sculpt the uncertain future ahead of us. It has been the foundation of monumental accomplishments and helped fuel endless exploration and creation for the benefit of all. Hopefully, as this truth becomes more widely understood, it will accelerate the shift in gender politics that are already underway. Social awareness will check feminism's power and a true balanced equality approach will exist. Eventually, the empty ideologies promoted by feminist dinosaurs and the delusional scholars responsible for the women's studies-driven war on men will be seen in retrospect as ancient folk tales. The old feminist utopia meme will be truthfully reinterpreted as a byproduct of resentment and fantasies based on jealousy and mental health problems.

As society assimilates the “Red Pill’s” progressive reawakening of social justice, suicide will be understood, schools and parents will begin to guide young boys and girls through healthy life paths by identifying what truly ails them and intervening with gender and age-appropriate solutions. People will learn to embrace, rather than deny, gender differences that uplift, inspire and empower human rights for girls and boys, and for society as a whole.

Cassie Jaye's presentation at the Institute of Noetic Sciences. A MUST WATCH.

AVfM Video Source · 18 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Cassie Jaye, putting on a clinic of personal accountability and professionalism. Eds https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iCgQAiy21dA&t=277s

Peer Review: A (not so much) gender perspective

Jakob LeFleur · 18 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A little while back I stumbled upon a paper[1], highlighting the unfortunate position of women in academic fields. More specifically, this paper addresses the issue of a gender-bias in peer-review processes and reports that female authors are not only underrepresented as peer reviewers, but also that they get disproportionally published less because of peer review processes.

According to the authors, this is due to the unconscious bias of publishers who prefer work or select a reviewer of their own sex. Since more men are active within the academic field, this one-sided explanation might satisfy some gender-studies scholars, but couldn't there be more at play here?

As a PhD researcher at a rather progressive university, I see gender discrimination on a day to day basis, but more of the 'positive' kind, in favor of female coworkers and students rather than their male counterpart. Just recently even, several students presented their MSc Thesis, which is pretty much their last obstacle to face before entering the working world. Only this year it had a slightly different aftertaste. See, one student's father was namely diagnosed with stage-three cancer at the beginning of academic year and was spending his last months on his deathbed at the hospital. I was already impressed that the young man even showed up to his project's final dissertation.

Now in all objectivity, his work wasn't well done, but he did enough to obtain a passing grade for the majority of the jury except for one female professor who felt that he `abused' his dying father's condition to justify the poor work.

Now, one could compliment the scientific integrity of this professor in keeping her high standards, and to keep professional and personal life separated. But here's where it gets funny. A female student then came to present her work and, objectively (I'm speaking for several other jury members and myself), it was beyond horrible. Her actual research, as well as her work, were below academic standards and was by all definitions worse than what the male student (with a dying father) accomplished.

After some jury members started going more in depth, she started crying and mentioned how stressed she was and how tough working towards this deadline has been for her. Finally, when deciding on the grades, the same female professor decided to settle for a `B+', since it would give her a bit of confidence for her next step in life.

But let's be clear here, this is not a unique case to begin with. Multiple colleagues of mine have admitted favoring women over boys whether it's in correcting of exams, assigning grades, simply helping female students more with their work, or simply even answering e-mails (ironically, often out of the fear to be called 'sexist'). And couldn't it be that this gender-bias is reflected in the results of this study as well? If women get pushed less, and face less critique during the scientific process, isn't the rejection they face in peer review due to the poorer quality of work?

If men, get verbally and mentally exhausted, don't they push themselves more to come back stronger and end up excelling more in their field of work? Even if the gender bias favors men over women, as posed by the authors, how come that so many papers find ambiguous results using double-blind peer reviewed studies and women still publish proportionately less?[2] Can't the underrepresentation of female peer-reviewers be partially explained by the differences in quality of work?

As much as their answer is one-sided, so does mine only reveal a small fraction of a much larger phenomenon. I do not admit that women are less skilled for an academic career, I even happily admit that some of my female colleagues are way more qualified than I am. But it does not mean that the scientific process that we know should be generalized to fit the sexist narrative we all know we get exposure for.

The real issue might not be sexism that is at play, but rather that the academic world desperately wants it to be sexism.

[1] https://elifesciences.org/content/6/e21718

[2] http://blogs.nature.com/peer-to-peer/2008/06/no_demonstrated_gender_bias_in.html

More than an orgasm

Jason Faris · 19 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

I recently had the opportunity to take part in a "Man Panel" for a wonderful mothers group at a local church and I agreed. My wife is a member and they were extremely supportive of us when we went through some tough times. All I would have to do is sit with a few other fathers and answer a series of questions we received a few weeks in advance. When the day came it was pretty obvious that the men had given a lot of thought to their answers. They were honest and did a good job covering some pretty sensitive subjects.

Everyone ate coffee cake, laughed, and enjoyed the conversation. But at the end one of the women raised her hand and asked what the men on the panel wished women knew about men – but didn't. It wasn't one of the planned questions and the other men looked a little panicked. So I decided to take advantage of the opportunity by saying…

"That for men, sex is actually very rarely just about having an orgasm."

Well, you could tell that this was not an answer that any of them had expected. Within the span of three seconds I had about thirty women looking at me with the most confused faces you have ever seen. So I took a deep breath and went on… "Why do you think guys love playing basketball or football? It's one of the very few situations where it's OK for us to touch each other and show affection. It is very common for men to go for days without anyone touching us in a friendly, loving, or intimate way. For single men it can be a lot worse. It can go on for months… or even years. Now, I know that's pretty hard for you to understand because you're women. It's been completely different for you for your entire lives. It has always been OK for you to hug, or sit close to each other, to hold hands, give each other foot rubs, or even snuggle under a blanket. But how would you feel if you saw your husband doing any of those things with one of his friends?"

Then I paused and for a moment it was so quiet in that room that you could have heard a pin drop. I could tell from their expressions that they had never even thought about this. Somewhere along the way they had allowed it to slip into that mental category of things that just were.

So I went on, "You need to understand that one of the very few times that a man gets to feel pure, unfiltered, and completely open physical love is during sex. A lot of the time for us it's the only chance we get to feel some intimacy. To feel your skin on ours and run our hands over you. To be genuinely close and not just hear the words "I love you", but actually FEEL them. To feel them in the way you hold us."

“Now I know that’s probably very hard for you to understand because you’re women. You get to feel that every day with your friends, mom, sisters, or kids. But for us it’s so rare that every single time it’s significant. It’s one of the very very VERY few times that we get to feel really, truly… loved.”

I stopped there and another long silence stretched out as they sat looking completely stunned. Then after a moment one of the younger woman spoke up to say “Oh my God he’s right. That’s so… so… horrible” and she began to cry. Afterwards I was astonished by the number of women who came over to thank me for opening their eyes. Despite being some of the most compassionate and giving people I have ever met they had been completely unaware. But I don’t blame them for that. It’s just not a part of their world and as men we are equally unaware of a lot of the things that women deal with.

The Bible says “Each one of you also must love his wife as he loves himself, and the wife must respect her husband” (Ephesians 5:33) and I think there’s a lot of wisdom in that. After all, if we dedicated ourselves to a deeper understanding of each other’s burdens, isn’t love the inevitable result?

The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct: A Sokal-Style Hoax on Gender Studies

Dr. Peter Boghossian & James A. Lindsay · 20 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The Hoax:

> The androcentric scientific and meta-scientific evidence that the penis is the male reproductive organ is considered overwhelming and largely uncontroversial."

That's how we began. We used this preposterous sentence to open a "paper" consisting of 3,000 words of utter nonsense posing as academic scholarship. Then a peer-reviewed academic journal in the social sciences accepted and published it.

This paper should never have been published. Titled, "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct," our paper "argues" that "The penis vis-à-vis maleness is an incoherent construct. We argue that the conceptual penis is better understood not as an anatomical organ but as a gender-performative, highly fluid social construct." As if to prove philosopher David Hume's claim that there is a deep gap between what is and what ought to be, our should-never-have-been-published paper was published in the open-access (meaning that articles are freely accessible and not behind a paywall), peer-reviewed journal Cogent Social Sciences. (In case the PDF is removed, we've archived it.)

Assuming the pen names "Jamie Lindsay" and "Peter Boyle," and writing for the fictitious "Southeast Independent Social Research Group," we wrote an absurd paper loosely composed in the style of post-structuralist discursive gender theory. The paper was ridiculous by intention, essentially arguing that penises shouldn't be thought of as male genital organs but as damaging social constructions. We made no attempt to find out what "post-structuralist discursive gender theory" actually means. We assumed that if we were merely clear in our moral implications that maleness is intrinsically bad and that the penis is somehow at the root of it, we could get the paper published in a respectable journal.

Manspreading — a complaint levied against men for sitting with their legs spread wide — is akin to raping the empty space around him.

This already damning characterization of our hoax understates our paper's lack of fitness for academic publication by orders of magnitude. We didn't try to make the paper coherent; instead, we stuffed it full of jargon (like "discursive" and "isomorphism"), nonsense (like arguing that hypermasculine men are both inside and outside of certain discourses at the same time), red-flag phrases (like "pre-post-patriarchal society"), lewd references to slang terms for the penis, insulting phrasing regarding men (including referring to some men who choose not to have children as being "unable to coerce a mate"), and allusions to rape (we stated that "manspreading," a complaint levied against men for sitting with their legs spread wide, is "akin to raping the empty space around him"). After completing the paper, we read it carefully to ensure it didn't say anything meaningful, and as neither one of us could determine what it is actually about, we deemed it a success.

Consider some examples. Here's a paragraph from the conclusion, which was held in high regard by both reviewers:

> We conclude that penises are not best understood as the male sexual organ, or as a male reproductive organ, but instead as an enacted social construct that is both damaging and problematic for society and future generations. The conceptual penis presents significant problems for gender identity and reproductive identity within social and family dynamics, is exclusionary to disenfranchised communities based upon gender or reproductive identity, is an enduring source of abuse for women and other gender-marginalized groups and individuals, is the universal performative source of rape, and is the conceptual driver behind much of climate change.

You read that right. We argued that climate change is “conceptually” caused by penises. How do we defend that assertion? Like this:

> Destructive, unsustainable hegemonically male approaches to pressing environmental policy and action are the predictable results of a raping of nature by a male-dominated mindset. This mindset is best captured by recognizing the role of [sic] the conceptual penis holds over masculine psychology. When it is applied to our natural environment, especially virgin environments that can be cheaply despoiled for their material resources and left dilapidated and diminished when our patriarchal approaches to economic gain have stolen their inherent worth, the extrapolation of the rape culture inherent in the conceptual penis becomes clear.

And like this, which we claim follows from the above by means of an algorithmically generated nonsense quotation from a fictitious paper, which we referenced and cited explicitly in the paper:

> Toxic hypermasculinity derives its significance directly from the conceptual penis and applies itself to supporting neocapitalist materialism, which is a fundamental driver of climate change, especially in the rampant use of carbon-emitting fossil fuel technologies and careless domination of virgin natural environments. We need not delve deeply into criticisms of dialectic objectivism, or their relationships with masculine tropes like the conceptual penis to make effective criticism of (exclusionary) dialectic objectivism. All perspectives matter.

If you’re having trouble understanding what any of that means, there are two important points to consider. First, we don’t understand it either. Nobody does. This problem should have rendered it unpublishable in all peer-reviewed, academic journals. Second, these examples are remarkably lucid compared to much of the rest of the paper. Consider this final example:

> Inasmuch as masculinity is essentially performative, so too is the conceptual penis. The penis, in the words of Judith Butler, “can only be understood through reference to what is barred from the signifier within the domain of corporeal legibility” (Butler, 1993). The penis should not be understood as an honest expression of the performer’s intent should it be presented in a performance of masculinity or hypermasculinity. Thus, the isomorphism between the conceptual penis and what’s referred to throughout discursive feminist literature as “toxic hypermasculinity,” is one defined upon a vector of male cultural machismo braggadocio, with the conceptual penis playing the roles of subject, object, and verb of action. The result of this trichotomy of roles is to place hypermasculine men both within and outside of competing discourses whose dynamics, as seen via post-structuralist discourse analysis, enact a systematic interplay of power in which hypermasculine men use the conceptual penis to move themselves from powerless subject positions to powerful ones (confer: Foucault, 1972).

No one knows what any of this means because it is complete nonsense. Anyone claiming to is pretending. Full stop.

[image]

It gets worse. Not only is the text ridiculous, so are the references. Most of our references are quotations from papers and figures in the field that barely make sense in the context of the text. Others were obtained by searching keywords and grabbing papers that sounded plausibly connected to words we cited. We read exactly zero of the sources we cited, by intention, as part of the hoax. And it gets still worse…

Some references cite the Postmodern Generator, a website coded in the 1990s by Andrew Bulhak featuring an algorithm, based on NYU physicist Alan Sokal’s method of hoaxing a cultural studies journal called Social Text, that returns a different fake postmodern “paper” every time the page is reloaded. We cited and quoted from the Postmodern Generator liberally; this includes nonsense quotations incorporated in the body of the paper and citing five different “papers” generated in the course of a few minutes.

Five references to fake papers in journals that don't exist is astonishing on its own, but it's incredible given that the original paper we submitted had only sixteen references total (it has twenty now, after a reviewer asked for more examples). Nearly a third of our references in the original paper go to fake sources from a website mocking the fact that this kind of thing is brainlessly possible, particularly in "academic" fields corrupted by postmodernism. (More on that later.)

Two of the fake journals cited are Deconstructions from Elsewhere and And/Or Press (taken directly from algorithmically generated fictitious citations on the Postmodern Generator). Another cites the fictitious researcher "S. Q. Scameron," whose invented name appears in the body of the paper several times. In response, the reviewers noted that our references are "sound," even after an allegedly careful cross-referencing check done in the final round of editorial approval. No matter the effort put into it, it appears one simply cannot jump Cogent Social Science's shark.

We didn't originally go looking to hoax Cogent Social Sciences, however. Had we, this story would be only half as interesting and a tenth as apparently damning. Cogent Social Sciences was recommended to us by another journal, NORMA: International Journal for Masculinity Studies, a Taylor and Francis journal. NORMA rejected "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct" but thought it a great fit for the Cogent Series, which operates independently under the Taylor and Francis imprimatur. In their rejection letter, the editors of NORMA wrote,

> We feel that your manuscript would be well-suited to our Cogent Series, a multidisciplinary, open journal platform for the rapid dissemination of peer-reviewed research across all disciplines.
>
> Transferring your manuscript:
>
> - Saves you time because there is no need for you to reformat or resubmit your work manually
> - Provides faster publication because previous reviews are transferred with your manuscript.
>
> To ensure all work is open to everyone, the Cogent Series invites a "pay what you want" contribution towards the costs of open access publishing if your article is accepted for publication. This can be paid by you as author or by your institution or research funder. Many institutions and funders now provide financial support for open access publishing.

We took them up on the transfer, and Cogent Social Sciences eventually accepted "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct." The reviewers were amazingly encouraging, giving us very high marks in nearly every category. For example, one reviewer graded our thesis statement "sound" and praised it thusly, "It capturs [sic] the issue of hypermasculinity through a multi-dimensional and nonlinear process" (which we take to mean that it wanders aimlessly through many layers of jargon and nonsense). The other reviewer marked the thesis, along with the entire paper, "outstanding" in every applicable category.

They didn't accept the paper outright, however. Cogent Social Sciences' Reviewer #2 offered us a few relatively easy fixes to make our paper "better." We effortlessly completed them in about two hours, putting in a little more nonsense about "manspreading" (which we alleged to be a cause of climate change) and "dick-measuring contests."

The publication of our hoax reveals two problems. One relates to the business model of pay-to-publish, open-access journals. The other lies at the heart of academic fields like gender studies.

The Pay-to-Publish, Open-Access Journal Problem

Cogent Social Sciences is a multidisciplinary open access journal offering high quality peer review across the social sciences: from law to sociology, politics to geography, and sport to communication studies. Connect your research with a global audience for maximum readership and impact.

One of the biggest questions facing peer-reviewed publishing is, "Are pay-to-publish, open-access journals the future of academic publishing?" We seem to have answered that question with a large red, "No!"

There is, however, an asterisk on that "No!" That is, the peer-review process in pay-to-publish, open-access journals cannot achieve quality assurance without extremely stringent safeguards (which will come as no surprise to anyone familiar with the debate). There's nothing necessarily or intrinsically wrong with either open-access or pay-to-publish journals, and they may ultimately prove valuable. However, in the short term, pay-to-publish may be a significant problem because of the inherent tendencies toward conflicts of interest (profits trump academic quality, that is, the profit motive is dangerous because ethics are expensive).

The pay-to-publish mechanism should not affect the quality control standards of the peer-review process. Cogent Open Access claims to address this problem by using a blind review process. Does it work? Perhaps not always, if this case is any indication. Some pay-to-publish journals happily exploit career-minded academicians and will publish anything (cf: the famous Seinfeld hoax paper)[1]. Is that the case here? Gender studies scholars committed to the integrity of their academic discipline should hope so, and they have reason for suspecting it. For a minimal payment of $625, Cogent Social Sciences was ready to publish, "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct."[2]

There seems to be a deeper problem here, however. Suspecting we may be dealing with a predatory pay-to-publish outlet, we were surprised that an otherwise apparently legitimate Taylor and Francis journal directed us to contribute to the Cogent Series. (Authors' note: we leave it to the reader to decide whether or not NORMA: International Journal for Masculinity Studies constitutes a legitimate journal, but to all appearances it is run by genuine academic experts in the field and is not a predatory money-mill.) The problem, then, may rest not only with pay-to-publish journals, but also with the infrastructure that supports them.

In sum, it's difficult to place Cogent Social Sciences on a spectrum ranging from a rigorous academic journal in gender studies to predatory pay-to-publish money mill. First, Cogent Social Sciences operates with the legitimizing imprimatur of Taylor and Francis, with which it is clearly closely partnered. Second, it's held out as a high-quality open-access journal by the Directory of Open Access Journals (DOAJ), which is intended to be a reliable list of such journals. In fact, it carries several more affiliations with similar credentialing organizations.

These facts cast considerable doubt on the facile defense that Cogent Social Sciences is a sham journal that accepted "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct" simply to make money. As a result, wherever Cogent Social Sciences belongs on the spectrum just noted, there are significant reasons to believe that much of the problem lies within the very concept of any journal being a "rigorous academic journal in gender studies."

Postmodernism, Gender Studies, and the Canon of Knowledge

In 1996, Alan Sokal, a Professor of Physics at NYU, published the bogus paper, "Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity," in the preeminent cultural studies journal Social Text which is in turn published by Duke University Press. The publication of this nonsense paper, in a prestigious journal with a strong postmodernist orientation, delivered a devastating blow to postmodernism's intellectual legitimacy.

Subsequently, Sokal and the Belgian physicist Jean Bricmont noted in their 1997 book, Fashionable Nonsense, that certain kinds of ideas can become so fashionable that the critical faculties required for the peer-review process are compromised, allowing outright nonsense to be published, so long as it looks or sounds a certain way, or promotes certain values. It was standing upon Sokal's shoulders that we proceeded with our hoax, though we perceived a slightly different need.

Sokal's aim was to demonstrate that fashionable linguistic abuses (especially relying upon puns and wordplay related to scientific terms), apparent scientific authority, conformity with certain leftist political norms, and flattery of the academic preconceptions of an editorial board would be sufficient to secure publication and thus expose shoddy academic rigor on the part of postmodernist scholarship and social commentary.

A primary target of Sokal's hoax was the appropriation of mathematical and scientific terminology that postmodernist "scholars" didn't understand and didn't use correctly. (We included "isomorphism" and "vector" in our paper in subtle homage to Sokal.) Fashionable Nonsense pays particular attention to postmodernists' abuses of mathematical and scientific terminology. That is, Sokal took aim at an academic abuse by postmodernists and hit his target dead-center. His paper could only have been published if the postmodernists who approved it exhibited overwhelming political motivations and a staggering lack of understanding of basic mathematics and physics terminology.

The scientific community was exuberant that Sokal burst the postmodern bubble because they were fed up with postmodernists misusing scientific and mathematical terms to produce jargon-laden nonsense and bizarre social commentary carrying the apparent gravitas of scientific terminology. It appears that Social Text accepted Sokal's paper specifically because Sokal was a recognized scientist who appeared to have seen the light.

Our hoax was similar, of course, but it aimed to expose a more troubling bias. The most potent among the human susceptibilities to corruption by fashionable nonsense is the temptation to uncritically endorse morally fashionable nonsense. That is, we assumed we could publish outright nonsense provided it looked the part and portrayed a moralizing attitude that comported with the editors' moral convictions. Like any impostor, ours had to dress the part, though we made our disguise as ridiculous and caricatured as possible—not so much affixing an obviously fake mustache to mask its true identity as donning two of them as false eyebrows.

Sokal exposed an infatuation with academic puffery that characterizes the entire project of academic postmodernism. Our aim was smaller yet more pointed. We intended to test the hypothesis that flattery of the academic Left's moral architecture in general, and of the moral orthodoxy in gender studies in particular, is the overwhelming determiner of publication in an academic journal in the field. That is, we sought to demonstrate that a desire for a certain moral view of the world to be validated could overcome the critical assessment required for legitimate scholarship. Particularly, we suspected that gender studies is crippled academically by an overriding almost-religious belief that maleness is the root of all evil. On the evidence, our suspicion was justified.[3]

As a matter of deeper concern, there is unfortunately some reason to believe that our hoax will not break the relevant spell. First, Alan Sokal's hoax, now more than 20 years old, did not prevent the continuation of bizarre postmodernist "scholarship." In particular, it did not lead to a general tightening of standards that would have blocked our own hoax. Second, people rarely give up on their moral attachments and ideological commitments just because they're shown to be out of alignment with reality.

In the 1950s, psychologist Leon Festinger revealed the operation of the well-known phenomenon called cognitive dissonance when he infiltrated a small UFO cult known as the "Seekers." When the apocalyptic beliefs of the Seekers failed to materialize as predicted, Festinger documented that many cultists did not accept the possibility that the facts upended their core beliefs but instead rationalized them. Many Seekers adopted a subsequent belief that they played a role in saving the world with their fidelity; that is, they believed the doomsday-bringing extraterrestrials were so impressed by their faith that they decided not to destroy the world after all!

It is therefore plausible that some gender studies scholars will argue that the "conceptual penis" makes sense as we described it, that men do often suffer from machismo braggadocio, and that there is an isomorphism between these concepts via some personal toxic hypermasculine conception of their penises.

We sincerely hope not.

Conclusion: A Two-Pronged Problem for Academia

There are at least two deeply troublesome diseases damaging the credibility of the peer-review system in fields such as gender studies:

1. the echo-chamber of morally driven fashionable nonsense coming out of the postmodernist social "sciences" in general, and gender studies departments in particular and
2. the complex problem of pay-to-publish journals with lax standards that cash in on the ultra-competitive publish-or-perish academic environment. At least one of these sicknesses led to "The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct" being published as a legitimate piece of academic scholarship, and we can expect proponents of each to lay primary blame upon the other.

"The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct" underwent a blind peer-review process and yet was accepted for publication. This needs serious explaining. Part of the fault may fall on the open-access, pay-to-publish model, but the rest falls on the entire academic enterprise collectively referred to as "gender studies." As we see it, gender studies in its current form needs to do some serious housecleaning.

To repeat a critical point, this paper was published in a social science journal that was recommended to us as reputable by a supposedly reliable academic source. Cogent Social Sciences has the trappings of a legitimate peer-reviewed journal. There is no way around the fact that the publication of this paper in such a journal must point to some problem with the current state of academic publishing. The components of the problem are, it seems, reducible to just two: academic misfeasance arising from pay-to-publish, open-access financial decision-making; and unconscionable pseudo-academic inbreeding contaminating, if not defining, the postmodernist theory-based social sciences.

On the other hand, no one is arguing, nor has any reason to argue, that respectable journals like Nature and countless others have adopted a peer-review process that is fundamentally flawed or in any meaningful way corrupt. Much of the peer-review system remains the gold-standard for the advancement of human knowledge. The problem lies within a nebula of marginal journals, predatory pay-to-publish journals, and, possibly to some degree, open-access journals—although it may largely be discipline-specific, as we had originally hoped to discover. This is, after all, not the first time postmodernist academia has fallen for a hoax.

This hoax, however, was rooted in moral and political biases masquerading as rigorous academic theory. Working in a biased environment, we successfully sugarcoated utter nonsense with a combination of fashionable moral sentiments and impenetrable jargon. Cogent Social Sciences happily swallowed the pill. It left utter nonsense easy to disguise.

The publish-or-perish academic environment is its own poison that needs a remedy. It gives rise to predatory profit-driven journals with few or no academic standards that take advantage of legitimate scholars pressured into publishing their work at all costs, even if it is marginal or dubious. Many of these scholars are victims both of a system that is forcing them to publish more papers and to publish them more often, to the detriment of research quality, and of the predatory journals that offer to sell them the illusion of academic prestige. Certainly, we have every reason to suspect that a majority of the other academics who have published in Cogent Social Sciences and other journals in the Cogent Series are genuine scholars who have been cheated by what may be a weak peer-review process with a highly polished edifice. Our question about the fundamental integrity of fields like gender studies seems much more pressing nonetheless.

"The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct" should not have been published on its merits because it was actively written to avoid having any merits whatsoever. The paper is academically worthless nonsense. The question that now needs to be answered is, "How can we restore the reliability of the peer-review process?"

Notes:

1. For more here, read about "Dr. Martin Van Nostrand's" famous hoax paper.
2. Portland State University has a fund dedicated to paying fees for open access journals, and this particular journal qualified for disbursement. For ethical reasons, however, we did not apply for funding, which in this case was virtually guaranteed. Instead, the article was externally funded by an independent party.
3. Our suspicion arose from countless examples documented on the anonymously run Twitter feed @RealPeerReview.

Published under Creative Commons license.

A music break

AVfM Video Source · 20 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

What the hell, every now and then we have to let our hair down here at AVfM, and listen to some good music. This one is for all those men who feel suicidal… it may be difficult to find a woman (or man) who cares, but at least the song extends compassion. PS. Add your own tracks below. – PW

Violent Men: When Harry Hit Mary

Paul Elam · 22 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I talk from time-to-time about so called “gender violence” – but mainly to point out that violence isn’t really a gender issue. In the effort to bring female violence out of the shadows and into the light of day we’ve had a tendency to overlook something else that’s pretty important – that would be a more thorough examination of men’s violence in the home without the feminist spin.

Women! Can't live with 'em you say? Sure we can

Bryan Scandrett · 24 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The modern MHRM that I entered back in 2011 has had an absorbing transition over the years characterized by a heartening series of victories.

It was a hard slog to keep up the work and the morale in that environment of powerful opposition and almost complete mainstream media silence, broken only occasionally by a slew of hateful propaganda and wilful misinformation on what came to be known as the manosphere.

How times have changed!

With our success has come a few growing pains and I will attempt to address one of them now.

Women!

Without doubt, the strongest voices in the MHRM are women. We only need think of Karen Straughan and her legion of YouTube subscribers or Cassie Jaye and the center stage spotlight she commands today. Just two of a wide variety of females throwing energy and reputation on to the table for a gender other than their own.

And yet this fact brings with it a persistent criticism of the MHRM, from within the MHRM itself, lamenting the weakness of its men in giving space to such women and a fear we are at risk of being 'feminized' and/or emasculated by these femme fatales.

Personally, I bear not such concern.

Rather, at the risk of being branded a cuck by the ignorant and stupid, I rejoice in the presence of and power these women lend to our shield wall. The old term, Shield Maiden is enough give me a bemused chuckle.

This male insecurity over women's voices in the MHRM being more powerful than men's stems from a lack of understanding of both the history of the MHRM and gynocentrism itself.

The MHRM is hundreds of years old and until recently was depressingly tiny and almost completely male. It has long been a simple matter to dismiss, denounce, condescend to and ignore those male voices. Any woman only needed to play the victim of it and the entire movement simply failed to move.

That was the horrific reality for generations of dead men, piled high.

When I was a boy, male suicide and the life gap were statistical realities and known quantities and yet are still being ignored over half a century later!

The modern MHRM however has four antidotes to that longstanding and seemingly intractable problem.

1. The internet. The ability to publish into the information super highway is a game changer in and of itself.
2. Gladly enduring the walk of shame and refusing to be tone policed.

There is no traction in telling a man he has a small wiener and he must to sit down and shut the fuck up if he refuses to respond and continues using his voice. He has taken his walk of shame and is not returning to the plantation. This is why the term Men's Rights must never be toned down to appease the sensibilities of the gentile. The instant we allow ourselves to be policed, we are co-opted. Compromised and prone to take over by something other than the truth and the open competition of ideas.

See Alison Tiemans 19 video playlist on Threat Narratives, Gender Roles, Slavery and the Rise and Fall of Empires.

Yeah, it's long, it's heavy and you need to HTFU and do it or you may miss your own freedom.

3. Being unignorable. Think Paul Elam and Bash a violent bitch month. One of the most important trolling's in human history. Still merrily harvesting today. The MSM still largely refuses to acknowledge that the Jezebel website was the real sexist in that epic or that women are more often the perpetrators of domestic violence.

4. feMRAs. It's a simple fact of gynocentrism that you cannot dismiss, denounce, condescend to, and ignore a woman talking about the shitty behaviour of women in the same way a man can be dismissed as a sexist because of what is between her legs.

She has a vagina obviously!!!!!

The Karens and the Cassies etc. nullify the white knights and strip the gynocentrists of their proxy violence, their central anchoring tenant of power.

No man is going to punch Cassie Jaye in the face to shut her up.

Cassie has no female victims.

In fact her cries for help for men is as powerful as our adversaries' false allegations.

Which is why feminism is so fucking desperate to kill her movie.

This is what makes the The Red Pill movie such a game changer for us. That documentary can red pill a hard core, over entitled, domestically violent, Australian feminist in two hours flat. Wouldn't have believed it myself if I hadn't seen that very thing with my own two eyes. Like an Admiral aboard an aircraft carrier ordering a lighthouse to get out of his way, your global paradigms are coming up for a bruising beat down.

The incessant bleat of some men in social media about MRAs being pussies for accepting women in the movement, simply because women have a stronger voice in the face of gynocentrism than men, is a tad insecure.

Personally, I am glad for it as we need those voices to defeat the gynocentrists who call on white knights. The ability of Cassie's work to drop an Aussie bush pig cold is calibre enough for me.

And lastly, neither feminism nor women can take over the MHRM because of Point Two, so long as we refuse to allow ourselves to be tone-policed because of gynocentricity.

The Empire of Gyn is dead and doesn't know it yet.

The day Karen or Alison start to spruik gynocentrism, they will be called on it. Immediately and savagely. They won't be spared because of what's between their legs. The widespread affection all these women command is down to their personal intellect and integrity.

The MHRM is an open competition of ideas. A simple meritocracy.

I find the very idea that the men of the MHRM should have any problem with the women of the MHRM to be frankly feminist.

“Martyrs of Marriage” – a review

AVfM Video Source · 24 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Our own Lucian Vâlsan got a chance to watch Martyrs of Marriage the documentary that will be screened for the first time outside India at the ICMI17 in Australia.

Martyrs of Marriage is a documentary film that documents the injustice that has been perpetrated on people because of misuse of section 498A of Indian Penal Code.
It’s a first-person feature-length documentary by independent journalist Deepika Narayan Bhardwaj.
An absolute must-watch for those interested in practical politics.

Get your Conference tickets, here.

You can buy separate tickets only for the screening, here.

Subscribe to Lucian’s Freedom Alternative, here.

Women and the evolution of romance writing

Peter Wright · 24 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The sexual relations contract encoded in courtly love fiction was at first celebrated among the upper classes, but made its way by degrees eventually to the middle classes, and finally to the lower classes – or rather it broke class structure altogether in the sense that all Western peoples became inheritors of the customs of romantic love regardless of their social station.

Today the romantic novel is the biggest grossing genre of literature worldwide, with its themes saturating popular culture and its conventions informing politics and legislation globally.

The growth of this genre beyond the upper classes where it was born to become the lived story of all Western women is represented thematically here:

[image]

Upper-class beginnings

The three-stage evolution of romantic love saw its first chapter begin in 12th century France. Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie De Champagne together elaborated the military notion of chivalry into a notion of servicing ladies, a practice otherwise known as 'courtly love.'

Courtly love was enacted by minstrels, playrights and troubadours, and especially via hired romance-writers like Chrétien de Troyes who wrote stories to illustrate its principles. Under the continuing guidance of Marie it was elaborated into a code of conduct by Andreas Capellanus in his famous tract titled 'About Love' (in English The Art of Courtly Love).

The aristocratic classes who developed this trope did not exist in a vacuum. The courtly themes they enacted would most certainly have captured the imaginations of the lower classes though public displays of pomp and pageantry, troubadours and tournaments, minstrels and playwrights, the telling of romantic stories, and of course the gossip flowing everywhere which would have exerted a powerful effect on the peasant imagination.

We cannot know for certain but it is likely that those of even lower classes adopted some assumptions portrayed in the public displays of courtly love, such as the importance of chivalrous behavior toward women and perhaps a belief in the Lady-like purity and moral superiority of women.

Middle class adaptation

The Victorian era saw the birth of mass novel writing, with much of it written by female authors. Whatever aspirations women had to romantic love in previous centuries, it was now actualized in writings by and about middle-class women, and the themes penned would become ritually enacted, ie. lived, by millions. This development is viewed by some researchers as marking a liberating revolution for middle class women.

Victorian peoples loved the traditional medieval romances of knights and ladies and they hoped to regain some of that noble, courtly behaviour and impress it upon the people both at home and in the wider empire. A new approach however saw it pitched beyond the upper classes to a larger group of people.

In her book Male Masochism, Carol Siegal[1] gives an overview of Victorian women's novels by focusing on the continuation and evolution of the romantic love themes found in medieval romances:

> [image]"A great deal of what [Victorian] women's literary works had to say about gender relations may have been as disquieting as feminist political manifestos, and ironically so, in that the novels seem most anti-male in the very places where they most affirm a traditionally male vision of love. While women's lyric poetry tended to reverse the conventional gender roles in love by representing the female speaker as the lover instead of the object of love, women's fiction most frequently reproduced the images, so common in prior texts by men, of > the self-abasing male lover and his exacting mistress. For example, in Wuthering Heights, Heathcliff declares himself Cathy's slave; in Jane Eyre, Rochester's desire for Jane is first inspired and then intensified by his physically dependent position; in Middlemarch, Will Ladislaw silently vows that Dorothea will always have him as her slave, his only claim to her love lies in how much he has suffered for her. In several Victorian novels by women, men must undego quasi-ritualized humiliation or punishment before being judged deserving of their lady's attention. For instance, in Olive Schreiner's Story of an African Farm, the fair Lyndall condescends to treat her admirers tenderly after one has been horsewhipped and the other has dressed himself in women's clothes to wait on her. Although Victorian women's novels do explore the emotional insecurities of the heroines, their apparent self-possession is also stressed, in marked contrast to their lovers' displays of agony, desperation, and wounds."

Siegal suggests that male masochism and the dominatrix-like behavior of women in these writings is continuous with courtly love literature from the Middle Ages. And whilst some libertines self-consciously chose their lowly position in relation to women, the men described in Victorian women's novels lacked such volition:

> [image]"These texts also insist that the true measure of male love is lack of volition. While the heroines make choices that define them morally, the heroes are helplessly compelled by love, and not judged to love unless they are helpless. In this respect Victorian women's fiction recovers the ethos so often expressed in medieval courtly romance that love must be "suffered as a destiny to be submitted to and not denied." It also departs from the conventions of medieval romance in describing the helpless submission to love as an attribute of true manliness, and thus Victorian women's fiction directly attacks the degeneration of chivalry into the self-conscious and controlled "gallantry" of eighteenth century libertines."

Those who have read medieval romance literature will agree with Siegal that the sexual relations contract embedded in Victorian Romance novels provides the continuation of a medieval trope, and not a fresh vision generally speaking. It is an example of pastiche.

To be sure there are new elements in the Victorian novel, such as the stronger emphasis on emotion and the relaxing of class distinctions, but we are not dealing with a new animal in terms of larger trope structure, i.e. it is more like a new costume for an old play.

Said another way, the essence of the feudal relationship was extracted from the medieval class system in which it was born, and applied by authors of the Victorian era to people of the middle classes. With a passage of time and a further dissolving of class distinctions to which this trope might apply, it would be eventually applied to all people – class codes be damned.

The medieval structure in question is one we might call sexual feudalism. It is symbolized, for example, in the marriage proposal which sees men of any class go down on one knee – a ceremony originally intended for a feudal relationship contract in medieval times.

C.S. Lewis referred to the transfer of the feudal contract into intimate relations as "the feudalisation of love," making the observation that it has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched. And perhaps more importantly this sexual feudalism – or romantic love as it is popularly called – no longer relies on a feudal society or class structures for its existence.

Taking an earnest look at the power wielded by protagonists in the Victorian woman's novel, and of the novel's real-world consequences for women, Nancy Armstrong[2] observes that the sexual contract can overrule the social contract, and that love can be the most powerful regulating law between two parties – a possibility that appears little considered by feminist writers.

Adaption by all levels of society

Romantic love today is the great leveler, smashing all class distinctions in its path. Women of low means can marry men of high station (and visa versa) because the love contract is capable of overruling the social contract. While there are literally millions of novels and movies that display feudalistic love overriding the social contract, the movie Pretty Woman, featuring Richard Gere and Julia Roberts, will suffice as a modern example:

> Edward Lewis, a successful corporate raider in Los Angeles on business, accidentally ends up on Hollywood Boulevard in the city's red-light district, after breaking up with his girlfriend during an unpleasant phone call. Leaving a party, he takes his lawyer's Lotus Esprit luxury car, and encounters a prostitute, Vivian Ward. He stops for her, having difficulties driving the car, and asks for directions to Beverly Hills. He asks her to get in and guide him to the Beverly Hills Regent Hotel, where he is staying. It becomes clear that Vivian knows more about the Lotus than he does, and he lets her drive. Vivian charges Lewis $20 for the ride, and they separate. She goes to a bus stop, where he finds her and offers to hire her for the night; later, he asks Vivian to play the role his girlfriend has refused, offering her $3000 to stay with him for the next six days as well as paying for a new, more acceptable wardrobe for her. That evening, visibly moved by her transformation, Edward begins seeing Vivian in a different light. He begins to open up to her, revealing his personal and business lives. [image]
> Edward takes Vivian to a polo match in hopes of networking for his business deal. His attorney, Phillip, suspects Vivian is a corporate spy, and Edward tells him how they truly met. Phillip later approaches Vivian, suggesting they do business once her work with Edward is finished. Insulted, and furious that Edward has revealed their secret, Vivian wants to end the arrangement. Edward apologizes, and admits to feeling jealous of a business associate to whom Vivian paid attention at the match. Vivian's straightforward personality is rubbing off on Edward, and he finds himself acting in unaccustomed ways.
>
> Clearly growing involved, Edward takes Vivian in his private jet to see La Traviata in San Francisco. Vivian is moved to tears by the story of the prostitute who falls in love with a rich man; after the opera, they appear to have fallen in love. Vivian breaks her "no kissing on the mouth" rule (which her friend Kit taught her), and he offers to put her up in an apartment so she can be off the streets. Hurt, she refuses, says this is not the "fairy tale" she dreamed of as a child, in which a knight on a white horse rescues her.
>
> Meeting with the tycoon whose shipbuilding company he is in the process of "raiding," Edward changes his mind. His time with Vivian has shown him a different way of looking at life, and he suggests working together to save the company rather than tearing it apart and selling off the pieces. Phillip, furious at losing so much money, goes to the hotel to confront Edward, but finds only Vivian. Blaming her for the change in Edward, he attempts to rape her. Edward arrives, punches him in the face, and throws him out.
>
> With his business in L.A. complete, Edward asks Vivian to stay one more night with him — because she wants to, not because he's paying her. She refuses. On his way to the airport, Edward re-thinks his life and has the hotel chauffeur detour to Vivian's apartment building, where he leaps from out the white limo's sun roof and "rescues her," an urban visual metaphor for the knight on a white horse of her dreams.[3]

The trope of romantic love is ubiquitous and pervasive through all levels of Westernized culture, and is rapidly infusing into remaining pockets of Asia that had been historically secluded from its influence. Romantic love is the number one selling genre in literature, movies and music globally – a testament to its all encompassing power.

The fact that women have been front-and-center in crafting and promoting this medieval "love" contract flies in the face of women's presumed powerless in the world. The two-spheres approach underlining powers unique to males and females is at play, and while only 1% of males traditionally controlled the political sphere, 100% of women possess the leverage of romantic love in the relational sphere. Further, I would go so far as to claim the political sphere governed by that 1% of men is now so captivated by the dictates of romantic love that its mission has become synonymous with the enactment of chivalry, both in social project spending, and in law.

The old saying is "Love conquers all." However the author of that phrase had in mind a very different kind of love from the all-conquering power we today refer to as romantic love, and women have played a pivotal role in bringing the later to bear.

Sources:

[1] Carol Siegal, Male Masochism, Indiana University Press, 1995 (pp. 12-13)
[2] Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel, Oxford University Press, 1990
[3] Pretty Woman plot, from Wikipedia

Addendum:

I'm suspicious of scholarly works which "find" romantic love all over the world and in all periods. After reading many such essays I've come to the conclusion they confine themselves to biological universals such as the desire for sex, the need for attachment, limerence, social interaction and so on and so forth — all of which falls short of the complex European-derived phenomenon known as courtly & romantic love.

Those academic descriptions omit the idiosyncratic elements that might cast doubt on their universality thesis – details like male masochism, uniquely stylized feudal relationships from France or Germany, the conceptualization of the Virgin Mary and her purity and how that plays into conceptions of gender and love, along with other complex behaviors and influences which make up the courtly love complex arising in medieval Europe.

When Gaston Paris first coined the phrase 'Courtly Love' (1883) he was referring precisely to those idiosyncratic elements that render the phenomenon distinct from the universals many scholars reduce it to.

Gaston Paris' description of courtly love can be summarized as follows:

> "It is illicit, furtive and extra-conjugal; the lover continually fears lest he should, by some misfortune, displease his mistress or cease to be worthy of her; the male lover's position is one of inferiority; even the hardened warrior trembles in his lady's presence; she, on her part, makes her suitor acutely aware of his insecurity by deliberately acting in a capricious and haughty manner; love is a source of courage and refinement; the lady's apparent cruelty serves to test her lover's valor; finally, love, like chivalry and courtoisie, is an art with its own set of rules." [1]

Thus courtly love as defined by Paris has four distinctive traits;

1. It is illegitimate and furtive
2. The male lover is inferior and insecure; the beloved is elevated; haughty; even disdainful.
3. The lover must earn the lady's affection by undergoing tests of prowess, valor and devotion.
4. The love is an art and a science, subject to many rules and regulations — like courtesy in general.

It's clear that what we call romantic love today continues each of these conventions with the sole exception of illegitimacy and furtiveness. With this one exception romantic love can be regarded as coextensive with the courtly love described by Paris.

Many scholars researching this area conveniently overlook (or refuse to mention) the sexual feudalism inherent to the European-descended model of romantic love. Attempts to homogenise and cast romantic love as a global universal, while avoiding all mention of the unsavory sexual feudalism that might render it more problematic and complex, is unhelpful to say the least, and misleading at worst. European-descended romantic love, now the dominant version globally, deserves to be considered separately and need not be confused with more simple theoretical constructs on offer.

Note: [1] Roger Boase, The Origin and Meaning of Courtly Love: A Critical Study of European Scholarship, p.24, Manchester University Press, 1977

Jihads and dark gods

Doug Mortimer · 24 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM takes no stand on religion, neither endorsing nor opposing religious principles. However in the light of recent suicide bombing in England we have decided to post the following piece by Doug Mortimer, with the caveat that the opinions expressed are his own. – Eds.

When asked about the recent tragedy in Manchester, Katy Perry replied:

> I think that the greatest thing we could do is just unite and love on each other, and like, no barriers, no borders, like, we all need to just co-exist."

In leftist circles, Muslims are classified as an oppressed group. That might account for why the media soft-pedal some of their misdeeds, but the response of feminists is more of a puzzlement.

Why are hijabs, burqas, honor killings, and other eyebrow-raising aspects of Muslim culture so often relegated to the no-go zone as feminist discussion topics? Why do European feminists constantly complain about "rape culture" in western nations, but remain silent when their countries are inundated by gropy, grabby Muslim immigrants? Why are western men excoriated for the slightest slight – real or fabricated – while Muslim men are given free reign to be…well, Muslim men?

What gives here? Well, when logic fails, turn to the illogical. To help us understand the great Muslim conundrum, let us turn to an unlikely source: British novelist D.H. Lawrence, who was born in 1885 and died in 1930, long before Muslim immigration was a hot topic in northern Europe.

I don't know if Lawrence's books are still on college reading lists, but there was a time when he enjoyed cult status among female English majors. By today's standards, he would be scorned as an exemplar of toxic masculinity, sexism, the patriarchy, male privilege, or whatever you want to call it. But women recognized that Lawrence had special insight into what makes them tick.

Lawrence is a difficult writer to pigeonhole. His work does not fit into any genre or literary movement, but he definitely leaned towards paganism and primitivism, as he invoked the "strange gods" in the "dark forest of the soul." More than likely, he was under the influence of Nietzsche, Freud, and Jung.

Lawrence's ideas about men, women, and sex were not likely to win him any fans in the suffragette community of his day. Neither would he find favor with the left (progressives, socialists, communists), or the right (fascists, conservatives, traditionalists). In fact, he despised social reformers and do-gooders of all sorts. He believed in a mystical man-woman, yin-yang ideal, so he would never have advocated going MGTOW.

For the purposes of this essay, Lawrence's theories about dominance and submission are on point. In short, he felt that true freedom lay in submission. A woman's submission to a man was essential for her happiness, as a man's submission to his god or gods was essential for his happiness. Atheism and agnosticism were dead ends. But let's let Lawrence speak for himself:

Unless a woman is held, by man, safe within the bounds of belief, she becomes inevitably a destructive force. She cannot help herself…Let a woman loose from the bounds and restraints of man's fierce belief, in his gods and in himself, and she becomes a gentle devil. She becomes subtly diabolic.

Unless a man believes in himself and his gods, genuinely; …his woman will destroy him. Woman is the nemesis of doubting man. She can't help it.

Men are free when they are obeying some deep, inward voice of religious belief. Obeying from within. Men are free when they belong to a living, organic believing community, active in fulfilling some unfulfilled, perhaps unrealized purpose.

Liberty is all very well, but men cannot live without masters. There is always a master. And men either live in glad obedience to the master they believe in, or they live in a frictional opposition to the master they wish to undermine.

Having digested all that, let's apply these ideas to the Muslim situation.

A modern western woman would never admit that she wanted to submit to a man – no matter how much her reptile brain urges otherwise. Such an admission would be alarmingly retro. If you've ever been to a wedding where the wife-to-be vowed to obey her husband, you're probably old enough to collect Social Security.

At the same time a woman is casting about (subconsciously) for a man worthy of her submission, dominance in men is overwhelmingly vilified, often dismissed as male privilege, insensitivity, or downright bullying. The savvy alpha male knows he can't come on too strong today. He has to walk a tightrope.

So a modern woman searching for a man worthy of her submission has a big problem. There has never been a supply of dominant men sufficient to meet the demand, and there never will be. Today, however, the candidates are fewer and farther between. And the higher the woman's place in the food chain, the harder it is for her to slake her hypergamous appetite.

On the surface, the modern woman may applaud the male feminists, white knights, progressives, or whatever you want to call them. Obviously, these guys wouldn't dream of asking females to submit to them. Not that it would do them any good, as they do not inflame the female soul.

The tradcons are hardly worthy of respect either. They earn money, their wives spend it. There was a time when that might have worked, as men controlled the purse strings and doled out household money as they saw fit. Today, however, they just hand it all over to their wives. If the paycheck is big enough, it might pacify the female for a while, but as long as she controls spending, the man is no longer dominant.

Of course, there are always the bad boys to submit to. For a number of young women, consorting with tough guys is exciting but potentially dangerous. Safer to strike up a correspondence with some psychopath on death row – which frequently happens and occasionally results in marriage!

Then there's the fantasy men of popular culture. Think Rudolph Valentino in The Sheik, the silent film about an Arab (presumably a Muslim) who lords it over a Thoroughly Modern Millie. Think of Gone With the Wind and Rhett Butler, the only man in a 1,000+ page novel capable of handling the strong-willed Scarlett O'Hara. More recently, we have Christian Grey in 50 Shades of Grey.

All of the above are variations on stereotyped male characters in melodramas and bodice-rippers. The heroine of such works has some leeway on the passive -active spectrum, but the man must be dominant. Imagine a publisher launching a line of romance novels in which women come under the spell of beta, if not downright submissive, males. I can't think of a faster way to go bankrupt.

Romance novels notwithstanding, are there any men in the western world openly advocating male dominance and female submission? Let's have a show of hands here…hmmm, a few pickup artists and that's about it. Understandably, any non-Muslim who believes in female submission cannot go public. Ironically, the sort of man women yearn for is now illegal, de facto if not de jure.

The acceptable options for men in the western world are to allow women to dominate them (and the culture), or to acknowledge parity and equity, albeit only in high-status, highly-compensated pursuits. Officially, men are not allowed to dominate. In the military or some business ventures, it may happen naturally, but it can never assume the status of policy. Don't put it in writing and don't let anyone videotape you espousing such sentiments.

Given contemporary obsession with egalitarianism, it is highly unlikely that western men will ever recapture the urge to dominate. More important, however are creeping materialism and secularism. If Lawrence was correct, then without religious fervor, there is no quickening of masculine energy, and hence no male dominance.

There was a time when clergymen were exalted members of the community. Right up there with doctors and lawyers and such. Women respected them and looked up to them. Today, mainstream preachers are no longer dominant figures. In fact, female preachers – even bishops – are now common in Protestant sects. So what's been the result? A drastic decline in attendance in "mainstream" churches. That should come as no surprise, since female participation in certain professions inevitably erodes the status of that profession. What kind of God – the ultimate alpha male – would permit a woman to expound on His glories to mortal men?

A contemporary man looking for a god worthy of his service is a bit like a ronin looking for a master. Unfortunately, the only deity approved for worship today is the golden calf. Belief in God, a god, or gods is pretty much relegated to the realm of superstition (though feminists can refer to the goddess or goddesses without fear of ridicule).

In some circles, a kind of egalitarian pantheism is acceptable (the Force is in everything, Luke), as it courses through all living things without discrimination. You don't serve the force, you use it. It's kind of like a natural resource you can tap into…light or dark, just like ordering chicken or beer. But this is not the same thing as a god who stands above and apart from man and commands him.

So let's pause and review.

A woman yearns to be dominated by a man but egalitarianism and democracy inhibit the appearance of such men.

A man yearns to dominate a woman but egalitarianism and democracy inhibit public expression of such a sentiment.

Enter the Muslim man.

The Muslim man is not egalitarian or democratic. He is authoritarian and totalitarian. And he is a true believer. Allahu akbar!

Radical Islam? The chicks dig it. At least they don't condemn it.

The Muslim man is the answer to western woman's secular prayers. He does not wish to be their equal and he will not submit to them. If Muslims eventually take over Europe, western women will be required to submit. That is it, pure and simple. We dominate, you submit. No debate, no backtalk, no nuance. We don't need no stinking dialogue! Allah said it, I believe it, that settles it. Separation of church and state? What binary nonsense!

Binary has its place, however, when it comes to worship. Once the prayer rugs are unfurled, women take the hindmost. How shockingly retrograde! Yet mosques are going up everywhere while churches are deconsecrated and rebranded for various commercial purposes…bars, restaurants, craft breweries, bingo parlors, whatever.

Muslim men have Sharia Law on their side. They don't have to persuade women to submit. There will be no Muslim equivalent of Vatican II. No need for a referendum or ballot initiative pertaining to male dominance, as Sharia law dictates it. In western civilization, secular courts of law vary from country to country, from state to state, from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and from judge to judge. All that plus legions of weasel-word shysters.

The Muslims are not going gently into the new world order. They have no interest in global government, unless Allah is running it. They don't care about wishy-washy democracies and their corrupt elections and their bloated human rights agendas.

You may not agree with Muslims, you may not like them, you may even recoil in horror from them. But you'd better respect them.

If you are a western man, you are the subject of female scorn. If you are an underachiever and/or unemployed, you are largely invisible. On the other hand, if you are a Muslim man, you can be all that and less (e.g., violent and illiterate) and still command respect. Can't remember where I read it, but I remember the saying "One man willing to die for what he believes in is worth 1,000 men willing to vote for what they believe in." Actually, I can't remember if it was 1,000 or 10,000, or 100,000, or 1,000,000 men, but the point remains nonetheless. Keep that quote in mind the next time you read about some "cowardly" suicide bomber.

At any rate, I think D.H. Lawrence was a pretty astute diagnostician regarding the plight of western man. So what's the remedy? Clearly, not democracy, equality, or diversity. Western men exerting pushback against Muslim men might turn things around, particularly if the Muslims are ultimately expelled or defeated, as has happened previously in Europe. Those conflicts, however, occurred when western man believed he was serving God and the only skyscrapers on the horizon were cathedrals.

In the current clash of civilizations, one side has a high birth rate, is intolerant, and narrow-minded; the other side has a low birth rate, and exalts tolerance and diversity. Gee, I wonder which side I should bet on.

Of course, there is always the possibility of some sort of religious revival, but after the Enlightenment, centuries of scientific progress, and increasing secularism, that is unlikely, barring some sort of collective epiphany like the Great Awakening of the 18th Century. They say everything old is new again, but it's hard to envision that old-time religion making a comeback.

So what's the answer? New gods maybe? Who would they be? Where would they come from? Would they descend from the heavens in flying saucers? Have we been visited by them before? Dunno, but in the meantime, keep watching the skies.

Meanwhile, remember what they say about what to do if you can't beat 'em.

Might not hurt to get a head start by downloading a Koran into your Kindle and studying it in your spare time.

Manhating TV Ads – No Joke Janice

Janice Fiamengo · 26 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Paul C. Bennett of Dunedin, New Zealand, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 26 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Bennett, why is it called “female genital mutilation” and not “labiaplasty?” The same reason we call circumcision “male genital mutilation:” it’s INVOLUNTARY [image]Dr. Paul C. Bennet has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

And yes, the doctor does perform labiaplasty, but of course mentions its “controversy” (see below) and that it’s done to adults who actually want it. No such controversy cutting unsuspecting little boys.

“About” Dr. Bennett, from his website drpaul.co.nz:

“I was born and raised in Hastings and came down to Otago University in 1971. I completed a degree in biochemistry and then graduated with my medical degree in 1978.

That year I moved to work at the Palmerston North Hospital. I returned to Dunedin to undertake a Diploma in Obstetrics and subsequently joined Dr’s Chin and Williams in their Cargill House Practice in December 1980.

Obstetrics was a large component of my practice for many years. In December 2000 I ceased obstetrics, 20 years to the day I started in private practice.

As well as general practice, I have undertaken minor surgery and have extended this interest over the years. I also have a special interest in Men’s Health.

My wife Cheryl and I enjoy gardening; especially the roses and rhododendrons.

Between us we have five adult daughters who are scattered about the planet.

I also love to get into the kitchen and cook, and have an enthusiastic interest in wine appreciation!”

Did he really say he has a “special interest in Men’s Health?” “Special” as in amputating normal tissue of men-to-be?

Under “Procedures” > “Circumcision,” we read:

> [image]What is circumcision?
>
> Circumcision is the removal of the foreskin, which is the skin that covers the tip of the penis. The circumcision procedure is best performed on babies between one and two weeks old, or a small baby 2-3 months old, generally no older. I do not do older child or adult circumcisions.
>
> I have been performing infant circumcisions for over 30 years, using a device called a trimmer. This method results in an excellent cosmetic outcome, and does not require stitches.
>
> What is involved?
>
> What happens during the circumcision procedure?
> [image]
>
> Firstly, the penis is anaesthetised with local anaesthetic. The nurse then holds the baby while I perform the procedure.
>
> It only takes a few minutes – there is virtually no blood loss, and the baby feels no pain.
>
> When the procedure is finished, tape is placed over the penis shaft, and can be taken off after a day or two.
>
> Most parents report no problems with their baby after the circumcision procedure. For most babies, pain does not appear to be an issue, but an appropriate dose of liquid paracetamol is effective if the baby is upset

> What are the major issues and considerations of circumcision?
>
> I continue to perform circumcisions despite current trends in New Zealand, because I wish to provide a safe and experienced service for parents who want their son circumcised. Most of these young patients are circumcised for religious and cultural reasons.

It's the year 2017, doctor, and no one in their right mind believes that any human – let alone a newborn – "feels no pain" when undergoing surgery of this type with little or no anesthesia. Actually, the American Academy of Pediatrics warns against surgery of this kind in infants, due to their immature nervous systems.

Too bad infants can't tell us the pain they feel; how fortunate for circumcisors like you that those babies can't sue you or fight you off, and gee, what a coincidence that you "do not do older child or adult circumcisions." Perhaps because an older child can fight back and express his wish to be left alone? A lot easier to mutilate helpless infants.

The doctor should be ashamed – and jailed – for mutilating and risking the lives of these children for admittedly religious (not medically valid) reasons.

> [image]Where religion and culture is not an issue, I urge parents to think very carefully about why they want the procedure done. Cosmetic appearance is probably not a good argument, and once the procedure has been done, there is no going back.
>
> There are a lot of websites that give both sides of the arguement. Please take the time to look at them if you are considering this important decision and form your own opinion.
>
> http://www.circinfo.net/circumcision_websites_online_discussion_groups.html > http://www.circlist.com/circhome.html

I commend the doctor for admitting there is no medical reason to amputate normal genital tissue, but parents should not be allowed to "think carefully" about any surgery not necessary and not involving THEIR OWN BODIES.

And no, the above links to websites do not include both sides of the argument, they are both pro-circumcision.

> Recovery
>
> Are there any side effects or after effects of circumcision?
>
> Complications that can occur with the method I use are infection and meatal stenosis. Other methods of circumcision can result in more serious complications, which is why he uses the trimmer alone.
>
> Meatal stenosis occurs where the urethral outlet of the penis narrows, usually as a result of recurrent irritation or infection from nappy rash. The narrowed urethral outlet sometimes requires surgical stretching to maintain urine flow. I personally have never seen an infection or meatal stenosis in any of my patients.
>
> On the positive side, cancer of the penis is virtually unheard of in circumcised men. The usual treatment for this is amputation of the penis.
>
> Some reports claim less transmission of infections, including sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS, in circumcised men when compared to uncircumcised men.
>
> Some studies also show less cervical cancer in the partners of circumcised men.

Further on we see "Labiaplasty:"

> [image]Labiaplasty involves the surgical alteration of the sides of the vulva, or female external genitalia, which are composed of two folds of tissue; the labia minora, on the inner side, and the labia majora, on the outside.
>
> Why is vaginal surgery controversial?
>
> It is controversial because who really decides what is "right" or "wrong" or what these structures "should" look > like? It has been proposed that pornographic films have been involved in setting the “standard”. Some opponents classify it as genital mutilation.

>
> Most ladies requesting vaginal surgery have asymmetry or have experienced significant enlargement of the labia, sometimes following childbirth.
>
> I take the approach that if a woman is unhappy with the shape of her labia and has seriously thought things through, I am happy to undertake the procedure.

Since Dr. Bennett has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Bennett’s practice information follows:

Broadway Medical Centre
2 Broadway
Dunedin, 9016, New Zealand
Phone: 03 477 4335
Fax: 03 477 4337

> Dr. Paul C. Bennett of Dunedin, New Zealand, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/lb7dbCu3Gd #MGM #intactivism #circumcision pic.twitter.com/ZM8v9ioQOf
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 27, 2017

Never mind disease. Guess who wants to talk gender as a preexisting condition?

Zach Janssen · 26 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

"Is rape considered a preexisting condition under your amendment? Yes or no?" Cheers erupt in response to the question, which is directed by a seventeen-year-old girl named Daisy to Republican House Representative Tom MacArthur.[1] The two are standing in the center of a town hall meeting, surrounded by a crowd of seated onlookers and a ring of video cameras. The amendment Daisy refers to had been added by MacArthur to the Republican Obamacare replacement bill, helping it secure enough votes to pass in the House of Representatives days before.

As Representative MacArthur begins his answer, Daisy interrupts, "Yes or no! Yes or no! One word! One word!"

Unwilling to accept the "one word" rule, MacArthur explains, "Folks, you get to ask the questions, and I get to answer them."

"Yes or no!" Daisy interrupts again, bringing echoes from the crowd. "Yes or no! Yes or no!"

Minutes pass as MacArthur endures the outburst before he is finally able to answer without interruption. "You cannot be denied [health coverage] or charged more because of having been raped," he says.

Daisy won viral acclaim for the encounter, the video of which was circulated widely on Facebook and Twitter. In an article on www.bustle.com, Katherine Speller gushed: "in a time when we so desperately need heroes to stand firm with politicians, act up, and speak truth to power, Daisy's promise to MacArthur might be the most inspiring part of this story: She told him that she'll absolutely be at the polls next year, as a voter at 18, to cast a ballot against him. Performing civic duties has never been more bad-ass." [2] The website thinkprogress.org also lauded Daisy, and took umbrage on her behalf that MacArthur called focusing on the law's affect on rape survivors overblown "hysteria," noting that the word derives from the Greek term for womb and "was once used as bogus medical disorder levied at women." How triggering.

But is it hysteria? Apparently so. The fact-checking website www.snopes.com evaluated the issue and came out in agreement with MacArthur's answer, stating that under the bill's provisions, "Rape and sexual assault are legally not allowed to be used as pre-existing conditions for health insurance."[3] Even bustle.com's Speller admits that the "answer to [Daisy's] question is broadly 'no'—as most states already ban providers from factoring a history of abuse into premium costs and there's no explicit mention of assault survivors in the bill's language."[4]

Daisy seems to be a child of her times, raised to expect female victimization around every corner, and taught that every Rorschach ink blot depicts a rape. National Public Radio, which also covered the Daisy confrontation, explained that she is far from alone, noting that "the idea that a rape victim could be denied health care," whether truthful or not, is "a notion that has caught fire nationwide through social media."[5]

Health care policy is a perverse place to try line-skipping to the head of the victim queue. The list of ways a person could suffer is as numerous as the entries in a medical encyclopedia. To barely scratch the surface, the condition could be cancer, or a heart or brain defect, or a crippling infectious disease. The person could have been born with it, or had it emerge in childhood. Daisy's outburst pulled attention away from legitimate debate.

Instead of talking about cancer survivors who might be denied coverage, the media talked about rape survivors who would not be. The liberal think tank Center for American Progress lists the most common preexisting conditions as, "high blood pressure, behavioral health disorders, high cholesterol, asthma and chronic lung disease, and osteoarthritis and other joint disorders."[6] Gender is not where focus belongs in this debate.

Disproportionate attention to women's health is a habit constantly reinforced by a society that elevates women to the point of holiness. Placing women first is ingrained in our etiquette, and goes far beyond Emily Post trivialities like holding a door or pulling out a chair. In this case, it includes ignoring men's health to prioritize women. In his February 2017 address to a joint session of Congress, President Trump promised "to invest in women's health,"[7] with no similar mention of men. Obamacare had already created "at least 7 new agencies and departments devoted solely to women while there is not one office for men or male specific ailments."[8]

This disparity of concern is illustrated perfectly by cancers of the breast (a female condition) and prostate (male). As Warren Farrell has pointed out, both diseases have "almost the same level of death," yet "prostate cancer is funded at one seventh the level of breast cancer."[9] The Obamacare statute contained "over 40 mentions of [the word] 'breast,'" but "not one mention of 'prostate.'"[8] October has been popularly dubbed, "Breast Cancer Awareness Month," with tremendous social, corporate, and media promotion, while nothing similar exists for men.[10] All of this is happening while women are already significantly healthier and better cared for than men. Women live an average of over 5 years longer, are more likely to have health insurance, and are more likely to receive regular medical care.[8]

It remains unclear whether the Republican health-care proposal will ever become law, and my purpose here is not to take a position on the bill. The proposal would relax Obamacare's prohibition against insurance companies charging higher rates to individuals with preexisting medical conditions. Consequently, people with challenging medical histories could be priced out of health care through no fault of their own. Supporters and opponents of the bill agree on this point, even though they may disagree over what role government should play in healthcare.

Anyone who would be charged more for coverage due to a preexisting condition deserves sympathy. But to many people, women matter more; their suffering matters more. They shamelessly insist on placing women first, while the list of other innocent victims is so tragically long. Women are half the story, not all of it. They do have important and differentiated health care concerns, such as pregnancy and more involved reproductive health. Men do also, including generally poorer health and early death. The healthcare debate should not center on either gender, but on a much more relevant and disadvantaged demographic: the sick.

[1] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=R8yNumzQFlc

[2] https://www.bustle.com/p/young-woman-confronts-congressman-about-rape-as-a-pre-existing-condition-57162

[3] http://www.snopes.com/sexual-assault-pre-existing/

[4] https://www.bustle.com/p/young-woman-confronts-congressman-about-rape-as-a-pre-existing-condition-57162

[5] http://www.npr.org/sections/health-shots/2017/05/11/527938951/is-rape-a-pre-existing-condition-not-exactly

[6] https://www.romper.com/p/what-are-the-most-common-types-of-pre-existing-conditions-the-ahca-could-impact-millions-57101 (quoting the CAP)

[7] https://www.whitehouse.gov/the-press-office/2017/02/28/remarks-president-trump-joint-address-congress

[8] https://notehub.org/hpp2i#lifeexpectancy, quoting, with link, "The Daily Caller"

[9] http://www.menweb.org/svofarre.htm

[10] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Breast_cancer_awarenes

Military Commanders pressured to convict dubious rape cases

Michael Conzachi · 27 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This is something we already know, but in a startling admission, a retired Navy Admiral has made an admission that he was coerced and had his career threatened, if he did not uphold a rape conviction of a Navy Seal, that he believed was innocent.

The Daily Caller and other news organizations are reporting that recently retired U.S. Navy Rear Admiral Patrick J. Lorge has admitted that political pressure placed on him, caused him to convict Navy Seal Keith Barry of rape in 2014.

[image]
Rear Admiral Patrick Lorge (Retired)

Lorge has provided an affidavit which is part of the appellate package submitted by Barry's attorneys who have filed a motion with the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, who describe Barry's conviction as one of the worst examples of Unlawful Command Influence since the implementation of the Uniform Code of Military Justice in 1950.

In his affidavit, Lorge writes;

> "I did not find that the Government proved the allegation against Senior Chief Barry beyond a reasonable doubt,"
>
> "Absent the pressures described [in my affidavit], I would have disapproved the findings in this case."

He also claimed that the political pressures came from as high up as the White House and the U.S. Senate. He further added in his affidavit;

> "At the time, the political climate regarding sexual assault in the military was such that a decision to disapprove the findings, regardless of merit, would bring hate and discontent on the Navy from the President, as well as senators including Senator Kirsten Gillibrand."

Lorge alleges that then Judge Advocate General of the Navy; Vice Admiral Nanette DeRenzi discussed with him the importance of convening authorities in sexual assault cases, and that he eventually was swayed by then Rear Admiral James Crawford, who is now a Vice Admiral and the Current Navy Judge Advocate General.

In further describing the conversation Lorge had with DeRenzi at the time, he recalls;

> "She conveyed the importance that the convening authorities held and how tenuous the ability of an operational commander to act as a covering authority had become, especially in findings or sentences in sexual assault cases due to the intense pressure on the military at the time. "She mentioned that every three or four months' military commanders were making court-martial decisions that got questioned by Congress and other political and military leaders, including the president. This conversation reinforced my perception of the political pressures the Navy faced at the time."

Here is a photo of now retired Rear Admiral Nanette DeRenzi, who is now Chief Operating Officer of Jefferson Business Consulting based in Washington D.C.

[image]
Nanette DeRinzi

In Barry's motion, Lorge recalls that he was told by Admiral Crawford;

> "If you disapprove the findings, it will ruin your career."

Well; one thing is good that at least Barry's attorneys have filed for motion to have the conviction reversed.

What concerns me is; why didn't Lorge show some cajones and dismiss the conviction at the time he reviewed it, if he felt that Barry was innocent?

I think the answer is in the quote directly above. He knew if he did the right thing, his career would be over. At the time, he felt that his career was more important than sending an innocent man to jail, but at least he is being honest about it now.

In an interview with a major newspaper, Barry's civilian defense attorney; David Shelton stated that admirals are "attempting to sweep" the actions of senior officials "under the rug."

In another recent similar article, I described the case of Air Force A1C Brandon Wright wherein the Air Force Judge Advocate General at the time; Lieutenant General Richard Harding made the following statement to another convening authority, when SIX Air Force prosecutors agreed that A1C Wright's case should have been dismissed at the Article 32 (preliminary) hearing.

> "the failure to refer the case to trial would place the Air Force in a difficult position with Congress; absent a "smoking gun," victims are to be believed and their cases referred to trial; and dismissing the charges without meeting with the named victim violated an Air Force regulation."

These two cases represent what we have known all along, but are now just coming to light in lieu of appellate cases; that in almost every instance; even in cases that lack sufficient probable cause, or cases in which it is believed that the accusing party is not honest, senior military officers; in these cases, both the Judge Advocates General of the Air Force and Navy, are exercising Unlawful Command Influence. In the case of Rear Admiral Lorge, threats to end his career if he didn't uphold a wrongful conviction.

Navy Seal Senior Chief Barry had engaged in a steamy sex affair with a female for about a month, then decided that he did not wish to continue with the relationship. After the female accuser was advised by Barry that he didn't wish to continue the relationship; well, you guessed it, she yells rape.

During an interview with NCIS agents, the female accuser described their first sexual encounter as;

> "like crazy sex. It's a little rough… I am in the hands of a sex god and he is doing things to my body that I had no idea."

Only after she was dumped, did she make a claim of sexual assault.

It is doubtful that we will get any truthful or specific information from either the Air Force or the Navy and so we can only rely on published appellate court information and decisions.

In the meantime, it is hoped that Navy Seal, Senior Chief Keith Barry will have his conviction overturned, but he can never recover the loss of three years in confinement for a crime that did not occur nor did he commit.

This is completely getting out of hand folks and I will state again, that the U.S. military is THE most dangerous and hostile work environment for males in this nation. Not only are the inherent dangers present in combat operations, but the mere utterance of the word rape will set forth in motion an eating machine in which the objective; by any means necessary is to convict, even if an admiral has to be threatened with his career.

This is lunacy on steroids, times infinity squared!

References

http://dailycaller.com/2017/05/19/admiral-admits-political-pressure-caused-him-to-convict-navy-seal-accused-of-rape/?utm_campaign=atdailycaller&utm_source=Twitter&utm_medium=Social https://www.navytimes.com/articles/admiral-claims-that-politics-swayed-verdict-for-seal-convicted-in-sexual-assault-case http://www.sandiegouniontribune.com/military/sd-me-seal-case-20170519-story.html

http://www.caaflog.com/2017/05/15/retired-admiral-wishes-he-had-disapproved-a-conviction-when-he-had-the-chance/http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2017/may/12/patrick-lorge-retired-admiral-charges-pentagon-bra/http://ncfm.org/2017/04/news/discrimination-news/discrimination-against-men-news/ncfm-adviser-michael-conzachi-victims-are-to-be-believed-and-their-cases-referred-to-trial-general-richard-harding-air-force-judge-advocate-general-lieutenant-even-if-the-accused-is-innocent/

http://www.jeffersonbusinessconsulting.com/nanette-derenzi/

http://www.militarydefense.com/

Chief of Police refuses to protect Evergreen College professor from angry mob

Gary Costanza · 29 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Kent State was bad enough, but the pendulum has swung so far left that the lunatics are now, in fact, in charge of the asylum.

Here's an article about the story with the professor and Tucker Carlson on video and another video showing dramatic wimpiness by the college president.

But here's the real ugliness, where the liberal professor of Washington's Evergreen College is told by the chief of police that he better beware because her police force will not help him.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SzUuQ6LkE94

Here's the official video with better audio.

Suicide

AVfM Video Source · 30 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

For suicide hotlines in your area see here: ■ Suicide Hotlines
For more services in your area see here: ■ Support Services

The following is a small selection of videos and articles on the subject of male suicide. The collection will be added to over time.

Videos:

Men's Suicidal Life

Suicide Causes and Prevention

Male Suicide / Feminization of Mental Health

Toxic Masculinity and Suicide

Male Suicide: The Feminization of Mental Health

The Truth About Male Suicide – Part 1

The Truth About Male Suicide – Part 2

Soften the Fuck Up

Articles:

The clock is ticking on male suicide
Male/female suicide rate differential increases again
When anger is legitimate
Why men must not commit suicide
Men's suicidal life
Male suicide: a question of value
Men committing suicide on the rise

Captain Raymond Olafson: Another victim of the modern military witch hunts

AVFM · 30 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This report is reposted with permission from MilitaryCorruption.com PE

On this Memorial Day 2017, we had planned on writing about some of the many men and women who have made the ultimate sacrifice for our country. But a phone call from a grieving Navy widow abruptly changed our plans.

Marcia Olafson was married to her beloved husband, the late Captain Raymond Olafson, for 50 years. He was a career medical officer and highly-respected throughout the fleet.

It was some 18 years ago, when hell was unleashed upon him in the form of a young, aggressive Navy lawyer, Bethany Payton-O'Brien, who would make it her crusade to put this gentle, Christian man behind bars.

Olafson was a superbly-skilled physician who didn't suffer fools gladly. A female enemy he made took it upon herself to write a false accusation that the four-striper had "molested" his children. Even back in 1999, the "find them (men) all guilty, no matter what," politically-correct policy was in effect.

Ambitious and driven "women," like Payton-O'Brien, were in on the ground floor of a growing industry – sending men to prison for "sex crimes" whether they were guilty or not (see Related Stories below). It proved to be a propitious career path, as the much-feared and despised Payton-O'Brien is now a captain herself and a military judge.

"BULLDOG" WELLS CALLS OUT PAYTON-O'BRIEN

Famed military defense attorney, CDR John "Bulldog" Wells, USN (Ret.) tells us that "Payton-O'Brien was one of the worst JAGS I've ever had the misfortune to know. When I went up against her in the Todd Forbes case, she pushed for a useless trial and conviction long after we had produced evidence which proved his innocence.

[image]

"As a prosecutor, Payton-O'Brien resisted all attempts to ensure a fair trial, even when acquittal seemed certain. She bailed and forced one of her subordinates to take the losing case to trial. Although my client eventually was vindicated, Payton-O'Brien cruelly put him through months of hell and high cost – both emotionally and financially.

"I am sorry to see the Navy has enabled her to last this long. How many others have been harmed, their lives and careers destroyed by her? A long list, I am sure. In my professional opinion, Payton-O'Brien lacks the temperament and ethical integrity to serve as a military judge. Based upon the recent revealing remarks about her by ADM Lorge, I can only conclude that nothing has changed."

SHE "PERSECUTED" AS WELL AS
"PROSECUTED" MY HUSBAND

"I'll never forget how she persecuted – that's right, persecuted – not just prosecuted my husband," Marcia Olafson told MlitaryCorruption.com (MCC). "In an effort to prove her false charges against Ray, she bullied and traumatized my children, trying to get them to say their loving father had hurt them. They all refused.

"I remember one time Payton-O'Brien tried to intimidate and interrogate my daughter Amber," Olafson said. "When my teen-ager emerged from the room, she was shaking like a leaf, tears streaming down her face. I held her in my arms and tried to calm her down, giving her a cup of water.

"That evil bitch JAG emerged from her office and screamed at us, her face twisted with hatred. She threatened my daughter with jail and vowed to put my husband 'behind bars for the rest of his life'.

"My son, Alex – mind you, Payton-O'Brien was bullying and trying to suborn perjury from the very children she claimed were “victims,” – was so angered by her obvious obsession to harm his father and our family, he told her “back off”‘ in no uncertain terms.”

CUT OFF FROM CONTACT

[image]

Mrs. Olafson was prevented from even speaking with her husband and after his “railroad job” conviction, it was many months before the captain could communicate with his loved ones. “He suffered greatly during that time,” his widow said.

“I’m from Iowa and 90 per cent Apache,” Marcia told MCC. “Somehow the other inmates at the DB learned of this. They were impressed by Ray’s quiet dignity and were won over by an instance where he helped save the life of a sick prisoner. Word went out throughout the prison from the Blacks and Hispanics that no one was to hurt Ray in any way. The Native-American inmates especially loved and respected my husband.”

THE LAST DECISION HE MADE

“We didn’t get Ray back home until 2001, and by then, he was suffering from Parkinson’s Disease and was a broken man. The ordeal Payton-O’Brien put us through wiped out our life savings. Ray had no income, and our legal bills took years to pay off. She surely has a hot place in hell waiting for her someday.”

“It was two days after Christmas, and Ray was fading fast. The once-handsome, six-foot-tall Naval officer and doctor I loved and married had shrunk to only a shell of himself.

“I rose from our bed and quietly opened the closet door. There on a hanger, along with his other civilian clothes, was the dress uniform of a Navy captain, blue and gold.

“Darling, do you want to be buried in this?” I gently inquired.

“Ray was silent for a few seconds, as he gazed in my direction, then a tear ran down his cheek and he slowly turned his head away. He said not a word, but I had my answer.,

AN OPEN LETTER TO CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS, ADM JOHN RICHARDSON

Dear Sir,

We respectfully urge you to retire CAPT Bethany Payton-O’Brien as a Naval officer and military judge as soon as possible.

In view of her record, it would be a mockery of justice for such a person to be promoted to flag rank or remain in a position to continue harming Naval personnel and their families. Thank you.

MAJ Glenn MacDonald, USAR, (Ret.)
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
MilitaryCorruption.com

[MCC EDITOR’S NOTE: — In a spirit of fairness – something alien to the obnoxious Bethany Payton-O’Brien – we offer her equal space on these pages to write her rebuttal to any of the charges and criticisms contained in this special investigative report . Our only condition is that you respond truthfully to our questions in the Olafson and Forbes cases and numerous other instances in your long and disgraceful legal career.]

Senator Anne Cools discussing men, women and radical feminism

Anne Cools · 30 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

125 Reasons for Laci Green to hate feminism

Anne Claude · 30 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

MTV and YouTube personality Laci Green has made two tortured YouTube videos so far, about her taking the red pill (supposedly) and wanting open dialog/debates with anti-feminists. Laci now paints herself as still a feminist/Social Justice Warrior but one that nevertheless commits the apostasy of supporting free speech, a stance that is garnering her rising and harsh rejection by her feminist/SJW peers, who see free speech as an attack on their social privilege of dominating gender inquiries and perspectives. Most of the video responses from the anti-feminist community have been cautiously optimistic (more so than with our initial reaction to Cassie Jaye's "The Red Pill" film project).

Will Laci follow Cassie to the point of dropping the feminist moniker, or is this just some sort of ruse on Laci's part? I have no idea but Laci did raise one interesting point I want to address.

One of Laci's requests was for anti-feminists to spill their "ah-ha" moment when they first became disillusioned with feminism. Implicit in this request is the assumption that rejecting feminism is a sudden emotional break and not a long thought out rejection of feminist theory and practice. Still, Tom Golden made a nice response that is worth watching.

When you join social media groups that discuss men's rights or anti-feminism, one of the first things you hear are questions like Laci's about why? Why to you hate feminism? Most of the time their incredulity revolves around the claim that "feminism is just advancing gender equality – read the dictionary!"

Everyone has an answer or two to this but I wanted to merge them all because there are issues beyond "feminists hate motherhood" that should be dumped in the well-greased laps of the ladies who have been duped by feminist gaslighting.

Over the years I have posted different versions of this list on Twitter (got me banned) Quora (banned) and Facebook (thread cut off comments at 90 reasons) but I wanted to revamp and record the entire list in one central location, and AVFM was kind enough to offer me a platform to do this. This list will continue to grow as time goes on and my understanding of feminism deepens.

Shall we get on to it, Laci?

1. I hate feminism because feminists dupe unsuspecting newcomers into thinking feminism is concerned with gender equality when it is actually about women's supremacy. That feminists hide behind a dictionary definition they know is false just makes it worse.
2. I hate feminism because feminists purport to represent women. They do not – most women want nothing to do with feminism and yet we get blamed when people conflate women with feminism at the implicit urging of feminists.
3. I hate feminism because feminists claim women deserve credit for "emotional work", ignoring that men are expected to bodyguard all women 24/7/365. A man who fails to be her bullet sponge knows he will be seen as a coward for the rest of his life. His only reward is when a feminist calls his vigilance "toxic masculinity." THAT is what emotional work looks like.
4. I hate feminism because feminists seek specific women-only parental termination rights (such as the "Morning After" pill) for women and deny them to men, violating feminism's claim to gender equality.
5. I hate feminism because feminists demonize men and exalt women, violating feminism's claim to gender equality.
6. I hate feminism because I find their advocacy of women-only domestic violence shelters to be a gross and sexist violation of the principle of gender equality, which calls for equal resources being available for all victims of domestic violence.

7. I hate feminism because feminists claim domestic violence is a gendered issue, erasing male victims and painting men as primary aggressors.
8. I hate feminism because feminists squelch efforts to build domestic violence shelters for men because this wrecks their narrative that all men oppress women.
9. I hate feminism because I find their advocacy of women-only protection from involuntary genital mutilation to be a gross and sexist violation of the principle of gender equality, which calls for both girls and boys to be legally protected from such barbarism.
10. I hate feminism because I find their advocacy of women-only primary child custody in cases of divorce to be a gross and sexist violation of the principle of gender equality, which calls for 50/50 default child custody.
11. I hate feminism because I find their advocacy of women-only voting privileges to be a gross and sexist violation of the principle of gender equality since men are forced to sign up to be drafted to secure their voting rights..
12. I hate feminism because they assert hegemony over all work interactions between men and women and criminalize and ostracize men who do not comply with that hegemony.
13. I hate feminism because they want to destroy families and let the state take over the rearing and indoctrination of children.
14. I hate feminism because its imposition of gender quotas guarantees mediocrity instead of the striving for excellence that buoys societal growth.
15. I hate feminism because its imposition of gender quotas demeans qualified women.
16. I hate feminism because its imposition of gender quotas humiliates the unjustly advanced underqualified women when those women inevitably fail.
17. I hate feminism because its imposition of gender quotas alienates the highly qualified men who are critical to maintaining and advancing society.
18. I hate feminism because feminists wrote into law a rule that a woman cannot be charged with raping a man via forced envelopment.
19. I hate feminism because feminists seek to define what is legal and illegal between consenting adults.
20. I hate feminism because feminists want to turn tipsy sex into rape, removing my choice and turning my romantic partner into either a rapist, or a craven prude unwilling to indulge my sexual moods and preferences lest they be used against him in the future.
21. I hate feminism because feminists teach that if a woman takes measures to protect herself from rape, she is “victim-blaming”.
22. I hate feminism because feminists purport to speak for all women yet demonize dissenting women who, for example, oppose abortion.
23. I hate feminism because feminists lie about the supposed wage gap despite unequal pay being illegal since 1963.
24. I hate feminism because feminists teach that if a woman escapes being raped, she should feel shame that the rapist might attack someone else.
25. I hate feminism because feminists wreck the nuanced pleasures of seduction by imposing ponderous and irrational consent rules that no one follows.
26. I hate feminism because feminists reject fair trials in favor of a “believe the woman” ethic that allows a woman to lie in 99 trials and still be counted as credible in the 100th because her extensive history of lying cannot be discussed in the 100th trial.
27. I hate feminism because if you deny you are a feminist they will not take “no” for an answer and will try to coerce or otherwise rape you into feminism.
28. I hate feminism because its claim of “sexist air conditioning” makes all women look like idiots.
29. I hate feminism because feminists think air conditioning is oppressive to women yet you never see them out picking crops in their menstrual-stained thongs.

30. I hate feminism because even as they assert that women can dress however they like, feminists attacked a great male space scientist, Dr. Matt Taylor, for wearing a shirt made for him by a close woman friend.
31. I hate feminism because feminists assert that women who do not support candidates with vaginas are gender-traitors who will be punished.
32. I hate feminism because feminists focus on abortion, a woman-only privilege with nothing to do with gender equality.
33. I hate feminism because feminists extol women's sexuality while demonizing men's sexual feelings as "objectification."
34. I hate feminism for encouraging women to view men not as complementary partners but rather oppressive competitors.
35. I hate feminism for pushing "patriarchy theory" that demeans women by claiming that men have always controlled everything to the detriment of women.
36. I hate feminism because feminists promise to address men's issues, too, and then follow through by pulling fire alarms to disrupt meetings of men discussing men's issues.
37. I hate feminism for erasing successful professional single women from history because their existence demolishes patriarchy theory.
38. I hate feminism for its Gynocentrism, the series of societal protections, provisions, and preferences given to women as a class at the expense of men, similar to a matriarchy but one where women obscure their role in controlling society both to avoid accountability and to masquerade as the perpetually oppressed class in need of more gynocentrism.
39. I hate feminism because I find its using the cloak of equality to push a slate of women-only privileges dishonest and despicable.
40. I hate feminism because its gendering poor behavior as "toxic masculinity" demonizes men and pedestilizes women.
41. I hate feminism because feminists deride women who empathize with men as having "internalized misogyny".
42. I hate feminism for refusing to let men discuss men's issues without the repressive purview of feminism.
43. I hate feminism for damaging the educational strategies used to teach men and boys.
44. I hate feminism because feminists are relentless in using shaming tactics and if you make the mistake of apologizing to them, they take this as weakness and redouble their assault on you and your character. And job. And family.
45. I hate feminism because feminists cannot stand male sexuality, or any woman who defends her bodily autonomy by choosing to work servicing men's desires.
46. I hate feminism because feminist TERFs (Trans-Exclusive Radical Feminists) try to deny that men have any business becoming women or even sympathizing with women's issues.
47. I hate feminism because the racist 1st wave of feminism is often promoted as being a noble, worthy cause because feminists have erased their horrible past.
48. I hate feminism because the baby-killing, family wrecking 2nd wave of feminism is often promoted as being a noble, worthy cause because feminists have erased their horrible past.
49. I hate feminism because feminists eschew men's issues, claim men need to start their own movement, then impede every meeting and effort by men to assert men's concerns for actual legal equality.
50. I hate feminism because feminists call Fathers' Rights groups "an abusers' lobby".
51. I hate feminism because feminists troll through colleges looking for rape victims but refuse to verify the wild tales the fakes use to damage everyone around them, as in the Rolling Stone "A Rape On Campus" debacle.
52. I hate feminism because feminists use their position of privilege to refuse all open, public debate with their detractors because they know we have them dead to rights.

53. I hate feminism because feminists claim that I am somehow prejudiced if I don't want to submit to sex with a demi-trans semi-girl humaniform hedgehog.
54. I hate feminism because feminists claim that a man telling me a naughty joke is somehow oppressing me and I should wreck his life by reporting him to human resources.
55. I hate feminism because feminists want to regulate how men sit on public transport – so-called "manspreading". Intrusive regulation of anyone's public acts voids the feminist claim of tolerance for all.
56. I hate feminism because feminists claim "not all feminists" but blame all men as a class for rape.
57. I hate feminism because feminists claim "not all feminists" but blame all men as a class for "patriarchy".
58. I hate feminism because they force women to be narcissists – I can't dress up to attract or please a man because that would be "internalized misogyny;" I am told I can only try to look nice to "please myself" as if I should be oblivious to both my sex drive and the effect of my attractiveness on men. The further implication that I should mute my empathy for men's desires is both mentally damaging and divisive to building harmony between men and women.
59. I hate feminism because feminists say men are misogynists if they catcall women (even just saying "hello" counts as catcalling) and misogynists if they avoid interacting with women because the men have been so burned by feminism that they withdraw from friendly social interaction.
60. I hate feminism because feminists assert hegemony over all social interaction, denying men's flirtatious overtures and women's appreciation of men's boldness.
61. I hate feminism because feminists belittle men for not expressing emotions but then feminists mock men endlessly when men dare to open up about how they feel.
62. I hate feminism because feminists engage in pointless and flamboyant public protests, with no good reason, that make all women look like idiots.
63. I hate feminism because although women do 85% of all spending, feminists claim we are not paid enough. They can't see that it does not matter who makes the money, only who gets to spend it.
64. I hate feminism because feminists tell non-feminist women that they deserve to be raped.
65. I hate feminism because feminists claim that, even though women are a majority of the populace and live much longer than men, that it is impossible for women to be sexist against men because of some bullshit power theory that would not be applicable even if it held water.
66. I hate feminism because feminist "safe spaces" reinforce the idea that women are weak and need special protections, ideas that fly in the face of gender equality.
67. I hate feminism because feminists' paltry grooming standards are designed to sicken people to the presence of women and thereby weaken women's natural sexual power.
68. I hate feminism because the feminists colonize Christian churches, attempting to impose their licentious and anti-child values on gentle people of that faith.
69. I hate feminism because the feminists turn a deaf ear to Muslim women crying out for their help.
70. I hate feminism because at the first feminist conference in Seneca Falls in 1848, men were told to sit in the back and shut up, violating the feminist claim to gender equality.
71. I hate feminism because the feminists deny that misandry (man-hating) is a thing yet revel in "drinking male tears", which they are too ignorant to recognize as a metaphor for semen.
72. I hate feminism because the feminists promote extreme obesity as being acceptable, putting women's lives and fertility at risk.
73. I hate feminism because the feminists hate men.
74. I hate feminism because the feminist hatred of masculinity is feminizing men to the point where "trans-trenderism" is generating dozens of imaginary genders to enforce a cultural jihad on anyone not familiar with arbitrary gender number 57.

75. I hate feminism because feminists attempt to co-opt anti-racism groups because feminists are desperate to find a cause that actually has a case and convert it to feminism.
76. I hate feminism because feminists attempt to co-opt environmental groups because feminists are desperate to find a cause that actually has a case and convert it to feminism.
77. I hate feminism because feminists are insistent that women invade men's-only spaces and issues but freak out when men dare to speak on issues like abortion.
78. I hate feminism because feminists teach women that when they are told to take responsibility for themselves, it is "victim blaming" and "misogyny" yet feminists demand that all men take responsibility for every real or imagined slight a woman might concoct.
79. I hate feminism because feminists have no central authority, making them unaccountable for all the stupid and hateful shit that they do.
80. I hate feminism because feminists shame me for liking men and not being a lesbian.
81. I hate feminism because feminists want more women CEOs yet blame successful women for being complicit with patriarchy/capitalism.
82. I hate feminism because feminists lazily refuse to explain their esoteric points, telling questioners to "educate themselves".
83. I hate feminism because feminists fight against equalizing gender enrollment on campus by attacking men's scholarships while promoting women-only scholarships.
84. I hate feminism because feminists want to waste resources to "coax" or "direct" women into studying subjects like STEM that most women have no interest in and that men need no encouragement to engage.
85. I hate feminism because feminists lure women in by promoting "individual choice," then denigrating "choice feminism" as contrary to the collective good, then demanding women comply with cultish feminist man-hate.
86. I hate feminism because feminists co-opt socialism/Marxism by placing women's interests ahead of those of the workers.
87. I hate feminism because feminists co-opt capitalism by placing "work-life balance" over the hard-work ethic that built civilization.
88. I hate feminism because feminists denigrate men's focus and achievements as "toxic masculinity," ignoring massive societal advances due to men's passionate pursuit of goals that women ignore in favor of "work-life balance" (laziness.)
89. I hate feminism for creating the fiction of a "rape culture" as a convenient device for feminists to manipulate women by placing us in constant fear of men, and denigrating men's overarching desire to keep us safe.
90. I hate feminism for its fraudulent efforts like "HeForShe" that bait men in with false sympathy for men's issues, then coerce men to pledge to help women only, as if some Hogwarts' spell will then magically address men's issues.
91. I hate feminism because feminists excuse women who make false rape claims, undermining the credibility of women in cases of actual rape.
92. I hate feminism because feminists are unwilling to let men discuss men's issues outside of a feminist framework that blames men and only men for men's problems.
93. I hate feminism because feminists force men into fatherhood obligations a moment after ejaculation but let women opt out of motherhood via abortion and baby Moses laws for more than a year after birth.
94. I hate feminism because feminists happily force men into 18 years of child support yet deny men any voice in abortion or fatherhood.
95. I hate feminism because feminists tell me I am somehow wrong for being naturally and viscerally repulsed by the bizarre things they do to their bodies.

96. I hate feminism because feminists culturally appropriate men's creations like "Ghostbusters" and then shame us if we reject their ruining of them.
97. I hate feminism because, if your baby somehow escapes being aborted, feminists are introducing feminist indoctrination into preschool, usurping your parental authority.
98. I hate feminism because feminists co-opted and perverted GLBT rights movements, forcing them to put Lesbians first and delaying marriage equality because feminists detest marriage.
99. I hate feminism because feminists trashed Karen DeCrow, then the NOW President, because DeCrow favored men being able to opt out of fatherhood like women opting out of motherhood.
100. I hate feminism because feminists oppose free speech and art when they might be construed by some crazy bitch as somehow being hateful to women's feelings.
101. I hate feminism because feminists use irrational tricks like Kafka-trapping: such as telling you that your denial of being sexist is proof that you are sexist (and hence, they claim, we need more feminism.)
102. I hate feminism because feminism has no goal and no end-game – it is an endless cry for more special privileges, resources, and angst against men.
103. I hate feminism because feminists place women's lives and well-beings at risk by teaching us not to be responsible and take reasonable defensive measures in hostile environments.
104. I hate feminism because feminists seek endless, new government handouts like free feminine hygiene products, as if I want to put a government-issued tampon anywhere near me.
105. I hate feminism because feminists teach men not to help women by making men fear accusations of "mansplaining."
106. I hate feminism because feminists try to convince us that masculinity – the driving force that built all of civilization – is toxic.
107. I hate feminism because feminist "patriarchy" theory implies that women are helpless and did nothing to help the world because, of course, we were just too oppressed by men.
108. I hate feminism because feminists try to obscure their naked man-hate by invoking "patriarchy theory."
109. I hate feminism because feminists obscure the potent sexual, reproductive, social and educational power that women exercise covertly, which is more than a counterbalance to men's accountable institutional power.
110. I hate feminism because feminists try to put women into political positions based on quotas, not interest or qualifications.
111. I hate feminism because feminists try to put women into elite business positions based on quotas, not interest or qualifications.
112. I hate feminism because feminists' efforts to "promote women" are humiliating to women because they imply we cannot earn high rank without their unwelcome intervention.
113. I hate feminism because no means no, except when you say no to a feminist, and then they go ape shit.
114. I hate feminism because feminists have criminalized workplace banter and flirting, wrecking careers and souring men's willingness to serve as mentors to women.
115. I hate feminism because feminists look on babies with horror and mothers with contempt, especially if the mom is stay-at-home and they cannot get their barren claws on the kid.
116. I hate feminism because feminists block those with even a mild counterpoint to their arguments.
117. I hate feminism because feminists CLAIM to want equal rights but in reality seek special, woman-only privileges over things like voting rights, abortion, birth control, child custody, rape shield laws, genital mutilation, jokes, speech, and domestic violence law based on the Duluth model.
118. I hate feminism because feminism demands that we "prioritize" women's voices, not realizing that putting men last in speaking order actually maximizes men's voices. Stupid.
119. I hate feminism because feminist lies and misrepresentations damage the academic careers of scholars like Tim Hunt.

120. I hate feminism because feminists create crazy crimes like “birth rape,” a ludicrous notion that puts moms at risk, damages doctors without reason, and makes all women look like nutcases.
121. I hate feminism because feminists manufacture crazy rape statistics like “most women victims do not report rape,” implying women are too weak and stupid to report violent crimes.
122. I hate feminism because if feminists had their way, deaf people could never have sex because no verbal consent would be possible.
123. I hate feminism because feminists demonize men’s sexual desires but exalt female sexuality, a blatant violation of the claim that feminists seek gender equality.
124. I hate feminism because feminists promoted “no fault” divorce laws that allow wives to fuck around but still requite men to pay money to their cheating wives and ex-wives.
125. Feminism is cancer.

Join in Karen Straughan's Australian Q&A on Mark Latham's Outsiders

Bettina Arndt · 31 May 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In Australia exciting times are coming. Fabulous women are coming to town.

For a start there's the young filmmaker, Cassie Jaye whose movie, The Red Pill has been causing such a stir. Australia is now the country with the shameful record of banning more screenings of the movie than anywhere else in the world. Some prominent local cinemas caved into pressure from feminist extremists and cancelled screenings – although more and more movie theatres are now showing the documentary to appreciative audiences.

Cassie is speaking at the International Conference on Men's Issues (ICMI) being held at the Gold Coast, June 9-11 and then she will be in Sydney for a few days. Cassie will be all over the Australian media during her visit. Locals should watch out for her appearances on Channel 10'sThe Project on Thursday June 8 and on Weekend Sunrise on June 11, and will be with Andrew Bolt on Sky News on June 12.

But we'll also be seeing the amazing Karen Straughan. Karen, also known as GirlWritesWhat, is one of the most popular women working for the men's movement. She has more than 160,000 subscribers on her YouTube channel and her 2011 vlog on "Feminism and the Disposable Male" video has almost 1.5 million views.

Karen is extraordinary – totally brilliant, well-informed and an incisive, ferocious debater. Few feminists are willing to debate Karen after seeing what she did to other members of the sisterhood. See Karen demolishing Naomi Wolf on a televised panel discussion.

Or have a look at this wonderful blog where Karen dissects a pathetic attack by a women's studies professor on The Red Pill.

Karen will be in Sydney for the week prior to the conference and her host, Bettina Arndt, has been organising a bunch of media events for her. The really exciting news is that Karen is doing a Q&A with viewers on Mark Latham's Facebook page on Tuesday June 6. Live streaming from 8.00 pm. We want you to all start thinking of questions or comments. You can send in short video questions or written questions or comments – send them to Bettina Arndt at bettina@bettinaarndt.com.au or wait until that evening and post them on the facebook page for Karen to answer. It should be great fun.

Karen will also be doing an hour-long interview with Rowan Dean and Ross Cameron, on Sky News' The Outsiders at 10 am on Sunday June 4.

And for Sydney locals – a chance to see Karen in person. On Wednesday June 7 she is speaking at the well-known think tank, The Sydney Institute on Why Marriage is Too Risky for Men. The event starts at 5.30 pm, Level 40, Governor Phillip Tower, 1 Farrer Place, Sydney. There are still limited places available and you are welcome to attend – non-members pay $10 for entry. But please urgently contact Bettina at bettina@bettinaarndt.com.au if you would like to come along as we need to sign you in.

Here's Karen summing up the risks of marriage for men:

"From a woman's perspective, marriage still provides significant benefits over single life –in fact, marriage as an enterprise has only improved for women since the 1950s. A woman now has the right to say no to sex with her husband. If he's abusive, she has an entire public-sector industry itching to help her. If a woman decides she doesn't want to be married to that jerk who doesn't help with the dishes, has mommy issues and leaves his dirty socks lying all over the place, well, she doesn't have to be. She won't be stigmatized, she won't be financially destroyed and she won't lose her children. For women, marriage is all benefit and zero risk, and that's why women are whining about men's reluctance to tie the knot. But for men, it's the other way around–no guaranteed benefit, and the kind of risk an adrenaline junkie would eschew."

And to give you a further taste of Karen Straughan's brilliant, refreshing take on gender politics, read these extracts:

About women's privilege

Women are so rarely held accountable for their actions and decisions and burdens to the degree they should be as human beings:

- If a woman can't be successful, it is because the business world is sexist.
- If a woman wakes up after getting black-out drunk at a party full of horny young men to discover she was violated, any hint that perhaps getting black-out drunk at a party full of horny young men is maybe not the smartest decision anyone ever made, means you're blaming the victim and you're an awful human being.
- If a woman takes five years off from the workforce so she can be a stay-at-home mom, and her re-entry into her career is less than spectacular, it's never because sometimes life comes down to making a choice between something you want and another thing you want more–it's because government/society doesn't do enough to help her.

This is MY life. I am the architect of it. If I fuck it up, it isn't something that merely "happened" to me–I was an active participant in the sequence of decisions that led to the fucking-up. Make no mistake, modern feminism isn't about women's rights. It's about women's privilege. It may not look like privilege to everyone, but that's what it is.

On male disposability.

Male disposability has been around since the dawn of time, and it's based on one very, very straightforward dynamic: when it comes to the well-being of others, women come first, men come last. This is just the way it has always been. Seats in lifeboats, being rescued from burning buildings, who gets to eat. Society places men dead last every time, and, society expects men to place themselves dead last every time.

Domestic violence

Violence against women in any form has been a HUGE cash cow for feminism. The more they inflate their claims regarding its pervasiveness in society, the more money pours in, and the more power they have to tinker with legislation and policy.

Women lying about rape

Pretending women never lie about rape is not only dishonest, it sends a despicable message to victims. "Women never lie about rape," tells victims they should always be believed, on the spot, and therefore the normal investigative process is a revictimization rather than a necessary evil….A justice system that refuses to punish women who lie about rape is demeaning and belittling the experiences of rape victims, and allowing false accusers to damage the credibility of every legitimate victim without any accountability for the harm they do. And it demeans and belittles a justice system that is supposed to protect ALL victims, including victims of false accusations.

Female self-interest

Feminism has done nothing but exploit this dynamic of the expectation on men to put everybody else before themselves. Especially women. Women's safety and support, women's well-being, and women's emotional needs, always come first. This is the most stunning piece of society-wide manipulative psychology I think I have ever come across. Feminism has been down with old-school chivalry right from the start. They might seem like strange bedfellows, but they're not. Because both concepts are built on a firm foundation of female self-interest.

If you know anyone in the media in Australia who might like to interview these wonderful women please contact Bettina – bettina@bettinaarndt.com.

“Known Genital Mutilator” Dr. Michael Read of Southport, AU bloodies up the Gold Coast

Gary Costanza · 2 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Michael Read has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

From his website gccircumcisions.com.au under “Home” we read:

“Gold Coast Circumcision – Infants, Boys and Adult Circumcision

Gold Coast Circumcisions is operated by Dr Michael Read MBBS. For more than 25 years he has performed penile circumcision. Dr Read recognized the need to offer a dedicated, high quality male circumcision service to all age groups He has focused his surgical practice on performing infant circumcision, childhood circumcision, ADULT circumcision and vasectomy. The circumcisions and vasectomies are performed in his clinic without requirement for hospital admission for any age group.

At Gold Coast Circumcisions the operating rooms we have mean there are no hospital or day surgery costs. Baby circumcision and the circumcision of pre-pubertal boys are performed with minimal discomfort because of an effective pain relieving cream applied to the penis and foreskin. A Plastibell device is used for boys and babies.

ADULTS require a different procedure, but this is also free of significant pain during and after surgery. We make a determined effort to ensure our patients are comfortable throughout their operation and we receive many spontaneous positive comments about this.”

Come on, doctor, who’s kidding who – you’re mostly cutting unconsenting infants who’re unable to make any “comments,” and if they could, they certainly would not be “positive.”

Also, doctor, what are you doing with all those foreskins? Are you selling them to skin care companies for additional blood money, or are you simply throwing those poor babies’ genital parts into the trash?

Under “Important Circumcision Information:”

> You decide what you want. Circumcision can be performed simply because you want one. You may prefer the appearance, the enhanced hygiene and ease of management. Your girlfriend, wife or partner might simply prefer it. The accumulation of urine and smegma under the foreskin produces an offensive smell that often can’t be stopped by the most fastidious attention to cleaning.
> Foreskin removal appears to be protective against a number of STD’s particularly HIV and could be considered an insurance policy.
> We make no discrimination based on sexual preference. Teens, young men and older men, homosexual, bisexual and heterosexual all happily access our service without barriers.

Doctor, when you say “you decide what you want,” does that apply to the most precious and vulnerable of us all, infants? For them it’s ‘we decide, you lie there and submit.’

Wait…you say soap and water can’t clean human skin, so it must be amputated, and smegma, a natural part of the human body is, according to you, unnecessary and offensive? Not only are you mutilating infants against their will, but for ignorant, mundane, and selfish reasons.

And even if circumcision prevented STDs, which it does not, this argument wrongly assumes sex without condoms is safe, hardly “an insurance policy.”

Again, I’m happy for those few adults choosing circumcision without discrimination, extremely sad and outraged for those infants without that choice.

And then we see:

> Foreskin Problems – Medical Indications
>
> Of course circumcision is often performed for a medical problem. Many stoical men persevere with foreskin complaints that can be readily fixed.

Glad to hear you fix actual medical problems. Shouldn't that be all that you do to infants?

Under "Plastibell Circumcision" we read:

> For infants and boys Dr Read uses a Plastibell device. A small ring fits over the head of the penis under the foreskin. The ring size is selected appropriately at the time of surgery. A tie is applied to the outside of the foreskin compressing the skin against the Plastibell ring. This effectively clamps off the blood flow to the end of the foreskin and allows it to be removed.
>
> The Plastibell is designed to produce a good cosmetic outcome and contributes to a safe circumcision. The clamping effect of the tie around the prepuce or foreskin ensures complete blood vessel occlusion. Bleeding should not occur. In addition, it is an effective barrier against any infection spreading above the tie.

It's a tourniquet on a boy's genitals, crushing and pinching the organ until it dies off. For what, doctor, the parents' religious ritual? Lies about keeping clean? Some people's disgust for the intact penis? Extra money for unethical doctors?

And finally, "The Circumcision Procedure:"

> We like to discuss the procedure beforehand, advising our patients about what to expect and to listen to their expectations. This is often done on a day prior to a scheduled surgery date but it is possible to schedule the consultation and surgery for the same day. My staff need to make appropriate scheduling for this and need to be clearly advised if you want same day surgery.
>
> Generally the procedure is performed without complication but patients are advised of risks such as bleeding and haematoma, infections and removal of too much or too little skin, damage to the glans, changes in sensation or non pleasing aesthetics. Patients are advised to abstain from intercourse for six weeks to ensure adequate skin healing.
>
> Shaving of the scrotum and pubic hair is performed pre-operatively. A consent form is provided for signature before surgery.
>
> The surgical procedure is known as a sleeve technique. Many of our patients have encountered terms like high and low, tight and loose. These refer to the location of the cut or scar and the amount of skin removed. Almost all men request a low scar of medium tightness. This generally replicates the appearance of circumcision performed in infancy. Open discussion about your own style preference is encouraged.
>
> The surgery itself will usually take an hour. A fine, skin coloured, absorbable stitch is used. Every endeavour is taken to ensure a good cosmetic outcome. I certainly see and revise circumcisions that have not provided a happy aesthetic outcome. Without proper attention it is possible to get significant scarring, irregular mismatched stitch lines, skin bridging and tunnelling, loose skin tags and overly tight or loose outcomes.

The above excerpt must refer to adult circumcisions, as "advising our patients about what to expect and to listen to their expectations" is impossible for infants. But does that stop the doctor? No, he forces the mutilation on a defenseless baby.

Why would any parent risk all the above complications (the doctor 'forgot' to list death) for an operation with no upside, but is guaranteed to change "sensation" because the highly erogenous foreskin is totally removed.

Under "Before Your Circumcision" we read:

> Before surgery you are asked to sign a consent form and the baby is provided with an identification bracelet. The baby is taken and Dr Read with the help of his experienced nursing staff will perform the procedure. Your boy will be returned to you for comforting and feeding after the procedure and Dr Read will explain the post operative management.

Before who's surgery? As if the infant can read this.

Oh, I see, one person consents to another person's permanent and risky surgery – as long as that person is an infant who can't sue or fight back it's easy to deny their human right to bodily integrity. Is that legal? Probably not. Definitely immoral and unethical, certainly ignorant.

Then, under "After Your Circumcision" we see:

> The numbing cream works very well for the procedure and happily provides several hours of post-operative benefit. By this time the nerve endings are dead and the boys often experience little discomfort . Sometimes there can be some stinging from the urine on the glans or head of the penis. The glans can be a little raw for a couple of days in those boys where it is necessary to separate it for the circumcision. The post-operative ointment, Kenacomb is usually protective. Occasionally it is necessary to apply some numbing cream to the glans.
>
> It is important to see your boy around 3 weeks after his circumcision. It is often necessary to separate some shaft skin from the head of the penis and discuss follow up with you. If this is not done skin can adhere to the glans and smegma can accumulate under this adherent skin. Smegma is a creamy liquid that is a mix of old mucus and dead skin cells. Smegma will always accumulate under the foreskin of the uncircumcised. It is one of the desirable benefits of circumcision that it will be easier to clean and not accumulate.

To those who think this surgery minor, the doctor admits it results in "dead" nerve endings, nice thing to do to a healthy infant.

Again, surgery instead of soap and water? What about labiaplasty or FGM to also keep things clean? Maybe remove babies' breastbuds to prevent breast cancer, or eyelids to stop eye-crud? Ridiculous, right?

Since Dr. Read has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Read's practice information follows:

Gold Coast Circumcisions and Vasectomy Venue
2nd Floor, 95 Nerang Street
Southport Queensland 4215
(50m from the Light Rail Station)
Free Undercover Parking

Phone: 1300 4 A CIRC
Phone: 07 5531 1170 for appointments
Fax: 07 5531 3697

> "Known Genital Mutilator" Dr. Michael Read of Southport, AU bloodies up the Gold Coast https://t.co/Xssa3iekAw #MGM #circumcision pic.twitter.com/WEzydv5ulB
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) June 2, 2017

Karen Straughan appears on Australia's 'Outsiders' program

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 6 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Straughan Q&A – live on the Mark Latham show

AVfM Video Source · 6 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A message for Andrew O'Keefe

AVfM Video Source · 12 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Australia: Our feral media attacks Cassie Jaye

Bettina Arndt · 12 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Our Australian media has disgraced itself by putting Men's Issues campaigner and film producer Cassie Jaye through the most hostile, unfair interviews she has ever experienced.

What is going on in this country? I've spent the last few days looking after Cassie Jaye, the filmmaker who produced the wonderful documentary on men's issues – The Red Pill. As we have explained on Mark's site before, Australia became the first country in the world to ban the movie last October. We then saw a series of screenings closed down due to protests from tiny groups of feminist extremists, with cinema owners even given death threats for daring to show the movie.

Cassie is in Australia to attend last weekend's conference on men's issues at the Gold Coast which was an outstanding success with people gathering from all over the world who are concerned about what's happening to men and boys.

But our media has disgraced itself by putting Cassie through the most hostile, unfair interviews she has ever experienced. Last Thursday June 8 she appeared on Channel 10's The Project (21.50 mark) which introduced her segment with the most appalling introduction video), which repeated many of the lies feminists have been spreading about the movie and included quotes from one of our most notorious man-haters, Van Badham, slamming the movie. Completely false information was included such as the claim the movie was funded by men's rights groups. Cassie Jaye explained in her interview that she funded the movie with her mother and fiancé and only chose to launch a Kickstarter campaign in order to raise post-production funds needed. The Kickstarter backers had no stake or influence over the movie – as the producers had been told beforehand – but The Project chose to ignore the truth in order to attempt to taint Cassie's credibility.

Then she was ferociously attacked by the entire panel with only about a third of her interview even being shown, denying any opportunity for this calm, intelligent woman to properly explain what the movie is all about.

Next on her media schedule was Weekend Sunrise and I sought assurance from the producers that she would not be given similar treatment and specifically that she was not to be interviewed by Andrew O'Keefe, one of the presenters who is on the White Ribbon Board and known for his feral attacks on anyone who challenges the misinformation White Ribbon promotes about domestic violence. When Mark Latham and Miranda Devine were on his show debating this issue he nearly blew a gasket. I was assured Cassie would not be interviewed by him.

Surprise, surprise, there he was, tearing into Cassie, not giving her any opportunity to answer his rude, ill-informed questions and his female co-host joined in. As to the presenters' claims that they hadn't been able to see the movie, here's the proof that they were given the link a month in advance.

Click for Proof

This is trite, tabloid journalism at its worst. Rather than look at the big story as to why Australia is proving itself to be one of world's most repressive country when it comes to debates over men's issues, these mainstream TV shows chose to buy into the distorted feminist narrative and attack the filmmaker rather than allowing her to explain the issues.

How come the producers feel that is what their big audiences want to hear? The reality is this movie is hugely popular, winning a series of awards including a recent Women in Film award at the Hollywood DigiFest Film Festival. It is currently the second best-selling movie on YouTube in Australia and last month was the number one best-selling movie on YouTube in the USA. Don't you think Australian audiences deserved to hear from the filmmaker as to why it is proving so popular?

Weekend Sunrise received so much negative response to their appalling interview that they took down the link to the segment from their Facebook page. But we hope you will contact both these programmes and voice protests about how they treated Cassie. Here's some ammunition (some coarse language) for you to use.

You might also like to sign this petition asking The Project to release the unedited version of their interview with Cassie.

Despite all that the conference raised many exciting issues which we will be discussing on the Mark Latham sites over the months to come. You might like to see the media stunt I pulled together to question why our society ignores male suicide. Please note the supreme sacrifice I made appearing in public so wet and bedraggled – but for a very good cause.

And a final treat – here's the link to the great talk Karen Straughan gave to The Sydney Institute.

A response to the 'Weekend Sunrise' interview in Australia

Robert Brockway · 12 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

At the conclusion of ICMI17 the following message was read out on stage by Robert Brockway in response to the 'Weekend Sunrise' broadcast on the Seven Network in Australia earlier in the day. For those that haven't seen it the interview can be seen here. –Ed

We invited Cassie Jaye to this country to attend the conference and take part in other media events during her visit.

I've had the opportunity to meet Cassie Jaye in person. She is a lovely young woman who has made an amazing documentary.

The way that Cassie has been treated by certain media programs in this country is absolutely appalling.

'The Project' on Network Ten and 'Weekend Sunrise' on the Seven Network have been entirely unprofessional in the way that they have dealt with Cassie Jaye. As an Australian I am ashamed that our media would treat a foreign visitor, or anyone, that way.

The manner in which the hosts of Weekend Sunrise spoke over Cassie and acted in a very unprofessional manner during an interview is astounding.

There is much that could be said about the Weekend Sunrise interview. I am going to focus on only one point.

Referring to conversations about men's issues Andrew O'Keefe said "Why not have them with regular men not guys who are in charge of the most misogynistic, anti-woman, anti-feminist organisations in the world."

I'm the managing editor of A Voice for Men, and the president of the soon-to-be-incorporated Australian Men's Rights Association. I live in South East Queensland.

Would Andrew O'Keefe come here to South East Queensland, look me in the eye and call me misogynistic and anti-woman to my face with media looking on?

Andrew, do you have the courage of your convictions?

Jordan Peterson: why there are so few women at the top

AVfM Video Source · 13 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A thank you to all for another ICMI success

Paul Elam · 13 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Over the past weekend we saw the third International Conference on Men's Issues come and go. While I did not have the pleasure of being on the Gold Coast of Australia to enjoy the event, I was able to stay in communication with AVFM staff and volunteers during the festivities. I am happy to report that everything went splendidly – a fact that has been confirmed by a stream of congratulatory emails over the past 24 hours from speakers and attendees.

Accordingly, I wanted to take a moment to take note of the kind of sacrifice it requires to put on a three-day event of this kind. In our case it meant 15+ hour work days for everyone involved. It meant working without breaks, even breaks for meals. It meant making sure that every aspect of the event happened on-time, every time. That included the logistics of transporting speakers and staff, assuring that every speaker was on and off stage on-time, that meals were prepared and served at the correct moment for hundreds of people, that everyone there was safe and secure, and that all the audio/video services were operating at all times so that all those unable to attend will be able to enjoy the speeches beyond the conference itself.

In short, it is a small group of people who endure months of preparation and at least four days of working hell to provide education, pleasure and support to a much larger group – and to further our cause of shining a light on the issues faced by men and boys.

I can speak to all this with authority because I have been there myself a couple of times. To say thanks are in order is a massive understatement. However, thanks are all we really have.

In giving these thanks I am aware that we have people who are not inclined toward public appreciation. They don't do this work looking for recognition, and I expect that in offering these public accolades that it may not sit as well as I would like with all the recipients. To that I say, sorry, but too bad. Like it or not, you are role models. You are the examples to which others aspire and that makes you invaluable to the future of the MRM. Just consider these inadequate public thanks as your last act of duty for the conference.

With that, on behalf of AVFM and the men for whom we advocate, heartfelt thanks to the following:

Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys, emcee and general conference workhorse. A more dedicated MRA I have never met.

Robert Brockway, AVFM's managing editor, emcee and slave to the event. That is Robert B-R-O-C-K-W-A-Y. For those not attending, that spelling was an inside joke you will get when the videos are released.

Bryan Scandrett, AVFM's Facebook page administrator, in charge of conference registration, logistics, general whip cracking (and a dozen other assorted matters).

David King, AVFM CIO in charge of wires and plugs strewn like spaghetti across the event, ticketing, artwork and a handful of other matters that I pretty much don't understand.

Bettina Arndt, keynote speaker and media coordinator who pushed well and hard for awareness of the conference and ticket sales.

John Lambert, who jumped out of a perfectly good airplane to raise awareness of men's suicide on top of working diligently on artwork for the event – among other things.

Daisy Cousens, media liaison and moderator of the press conference.

Kristy Roberts, volunteer chef that kept the troops fed. And a special note here. Most conference responsibilities are a burden. They pale in comparison to the job of waking every morning at 2 AM and heading for the venue so that everyone in attendance can come in 7 or 8 hours later to a freshly prepared breakfast – then to prepare whole animals roasted on a spit by lunchtime. Kristy deserves special recognition for every cut, burn and additional hour she put up with to make this event better than the ones before it.

Tom Caulfield, who for the second time consecutively came to ICMI on his own dime to provide us professional level video documentation of all the speakers.

Other volunteers, all of whom played very, very important roles in everything from food service to transportation, registration and all other support services, are as follows. Some of these are the requested screen names from those who prefer to remain anonymous.

Peter Wright

Neal

Brett Ezure

Kristina

John

Forty-two

Luke

Russel

Tom Volts

Adrian

Dana

Frog

Mrs. Frog

MGTOW Man

Chris Vogel

Solaris

Special thanks go out to all the speakers, and to the staff of the Albert Waterways Community Centre, who stuck by us with professionalism and courtesy all the way through the event. And finally to the attendees themselves. Without your willingness to purchase tickets and take time out of your busy lives to attend, none of this would be possible.

Everyone involved committed their time, sweat and often their own money to play a very important role in one simple but difficult objective: furthering compassion for men and boys. They are owed deepest thanks from AVFM and indeed from anyone concerned with decency and fairness for all human beings. I hope and trust you will join me in saying thank you.

Here's to all of you, with gratitude and looking forward to ICMI'18.

Paul

Welcome to the rebirth of A Voice for Men

Paul Elam · 14 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A Voice for Men has just wrapped up its third International Conference on Men's Issues and by all reports it was once again a resounding success. My congratulations and sincere thanks go out to all the speakers, attendees and especially the AVFM staff who worked tirelessly to make it happen.

Aside from their more obvious purpose, each ICMI event is also a time of assessment and reflection. It's an opportunity to think about our mission, how we are doing with our goals. And to be truthful, it didn't take an ICMI to draw some very encouraging conclusions along those lines.

"Changing the Cultural Narrative" as a site tagline, and as a goal, has enjoyed profound success. AVFM and a small handful of others (mainly the Honey Badger Brigade) have spawned a legion of social commentators that are doing just that. Feminism has rightly become a dirty word. Feminist ideologues are back on their heels trying to defend their hateful ideology to a world that has grown weary of their corrupt message. We have been so successful, in fact, that antifeminism has become a cottage industry, with the new purveyors taking in huge audiences.

To paraphrase Alison Tieman from The Red Pill Movie Q & A, when the wisdom of "antifeminism as men's activism" was challenged, she said 'We don't even have a choice about that. The antifeminist narrative has popularized and grown beyond our control. We could not stop it if we wanted to.'

None of this is to say that the battle is over. Feminist interests are deeply entrenched in the State, in our establishments of higher education, in the political realm, in the media and throughout the corporatocracy. The change in narrative, however, has become a freight train, and if this follows previous shifts in collective social consciousness, the eventual demise of feminist influence, and its permanent stigmatization as an evil, is inevitable.

If true, that leaves us with the question, where do we go from here?

The answer to that is twofold. First is the AVFM mission. Second is how we go about accomplishing that mission.

Current realities reduce "Changing the Cultural Narrative" to something akin to beating a dead horse. We are better served with more relevant objectives. With that in mind I have drafted a new mission statement addressing the needs of men regarding physical, emotional and financial health, with the latter being focused on protection of assets, from the state, and from interpersonal relationships.

A quick look above shows the new AVFM tagline. "Men's Health – No Apologies." It is simple, concise and will be doggedly pursued.

With AVFM's thousands of internet backlinks in place, assuring a permanent, healthy flow of traffic to the site, we will leverage those assets to further a message addressing men's overall health, sans the traditional gynocentrism, and sans the unhealthy paradigm of feminist ideologues who see masculinity itself as a problem in need of correction. Indeed, it is our position that blind traditional gynocentrism and feminist dogma (barely discernable from each other) are equally deleterious to the well-being of men and boys.

With some specific exceptions, all future content on the site will reflect the new mission. Men's mental, physical and financial health will dominate the discourse here with an especially intense focus on mental health. I fully intend that the content will remain as engaging, entertaining and informative as it always has.

More importantly, the content will be designed to be of more utility to men and boys than just bashing ever-so-bash-worthy feminists. Over the past year at my An Ear for Men YouTube channel, I have focused a great deal on men's interpersonal relationships. I've been exploring topics that are an integral part of the lives of everyday men. Relationships, marriage, divorce and children. Adjusting to red pill life, dealing with the red pill rage and red pill grief. Issues of self-respect and self-worth. Matters that reach to the core of men's identity in modern life, delivered with the same blunt candor for which AVFM has become so well-known.

I have tried to create a message that not only resonates with men, as the material here always has, but that also proves useful. In short, the idea is to more to serve the needs of men, not just invite them to ruffle feathers by challenging the status quo. It's a lesson from our counterparts in India, who have grown their movement based on being of service to men who need it.

And make no mistake, we are not shedding the antifeminist or antigynocentrist sentiments. You will see them quite plainly in the days ahead, all of it relating to the overall health of men and boys.

To inform you about the second objective, about how we go about accomplishing this, I need to give you some history. In the beginning, eight years ago next month, AVFM was established as a one-man blog. We quickly grew into hundreds of writers over the years and eventually took on a formal business structure in the form of AVfM Education, LLC.

We benefitted a great deal from this. It afforded us some measure of legal protection, gave us much better organization and helped us manage assets to cover the rather weighty financial burden of maintaining top level security and multiple servers.

All this was enormously helpful for the mission of the times, but it also came with a cost. The burdensome processes that come with any business structure bled away some of the spontaneity and creative elements that put us on the edge of things to begin with. At heart, we have always been an activist organization. A reality check informs us that hearts and businesses are not always comfortable under the same roof.

Today, we begin to recover the heart of AVFM.

In the very near future, AVfM Education, LLC will be dissolved. All operations here will be brought under the purview of Red Pill Solutions, LLC, a one-man show (yours truly) with highly informal operations. I will leave the beans to the bean counters, and basically run things at AVFM as I did back in 2009.

AVFM will return to a very select group of contributors, by invitation only, who will have permissions to enter articles into the WordPress editor, and with solid self-editing as a standard. No more passing articles through a series of people to get them on the site. And no more need to burden editors with the tedious (and quite thankless) job of correcting spelling and grammar. Those who can't or won't provide well-edited material simply won't see their writing on these pages. All contributors must be able and willing to come into the WordPress editor at AVFM and completely prepare their articles for posting.

Commenting policies will change, too. The temptation for me is to go to a generally unmoderated style, with of course the ability to remove and ban idiotic trolls on sight: no strike system, no ombudsman. We will do this, mind you, with a revised attitude about our comment section. Our approach will be something akin to laissez faire moderation, allowing men to speak their minds up to the point it becomes apparent their only reason for commenting is to disrupt and antagonize.

This won't be an easy transition and I welcome feedback from our readers before the new system is implemented.

There is one thing that won't change. AVFM will never, ever be silenced. We will publish what we believe to be the truth, without mincing words, and without apology and without compromise.

I am sending a link to this post to many of AVFM's past contributors, hoping that I don't leave anyone out.

This will be a somewhat challenging phase as we downshift to crest another hill in the journey of A Voice for Men. With your support, we will make it happen. After all, making things happen has been our business for 8 years.

When Anger Is Legitimate

Peter Wright · 17 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Men who speak out about personal issues, along with others advocating for men's issues, are sometimes charged with being 'angry men.' The accusation is designed to reduce a man's story to a single emotion; he is no longer a man telling his story with a tone of anger, but a story-less freak whose entire manhood is synonymous with anger – angry man – no more and no less than a single taboo emotion.

By labeling him an angry man, a complex human being is reduced to a one-dimensional caricature that dehumanizes him, discredits his claims to a wider audience, and ultimately aims to censor his evidence of pain or unfair treatment. The implication is that angry men are irrational and should be listened to only after they have calmed down and domesticated the raw emotionalism. However calming down would be better termed as pushing down, because that's what happens to a man's concerns and sense of passion in the face of the angry man charge.

Calming down leads that initial anger, which longs to effect positive changes to the world, to look for another outlet. Sometimes it intensifies into destructive or violent acting out, or worse, is converted into a neurotic self-censorship through the aid of drugs, depression and not infrequently suicide. If censorship is the desired aim of the angry man taunt, then suicide is delivering it in spades.

One would assume psychotherapists and counselors are savvy to the therapeutic benefits of anger, and sometimes they are. The more aware therapist knows that even the famous and talented are driven to greatness by giving expression to anger, with the trick being to direct it intelligently toward a goal.

The bulk of the therapeutic industry however is captured by the feelgood cliches of PC culture, advising men to find ways other than anger to express themselves, referring to it as an 'anger problem,' or 'toxic anger' or perhaps simply 'unhealthy anger.' Such practitioners are unlikely to consider any expression of anger acceptable, preferring instead to nip it in the bud with kindly admonishments about it being a barrier to progress and personal growth.

While we can agree that some expressions of anger move beyond healthy expression and into the rage-zone, these incidents often come on the tail of being ignored, perhaps serially and over a long periods of time when a man is expressing anger within more normal ranges. That rejection is what the PC therapist ironically tends to specialize in through his refusal of the anger that a man might otherwise use to articulate what's pissing him off.

For many men anger is the vehicle that gets the message out, a message that remains buried in its absence.

The purpose of emotions, or rather the aim of them is to find a way out; as tears on the cheek, smiles on the lips, clenched fists, or the quivering of the bowels.

Anger likewise wants out – as outrage. By this move anger finds a target; it rages out at the family law courts, the misandric TV ads, the lack of funding for male health problems, infant circumcision, male homelessness. Outrage gets political – takes its concerns to the polis; letters to politicians, making a stand at the polling booth, a placard in the street, or thoughts written on a blog. So too with a man's personal life; his long hours in a shitty job, his pressurized marriage to a nagging wife, his lack of liesure time, all of which might be tackled with some healthy outrage.

We don't even need to have solutions to the things we're angry about, at least not initially. As the late psychologist James Hillman suggests we can start out with an empty protest:

> Take your outrage seriously, but you don't force yourself to have answers. Trust your nose. You know what stinks. Don't try to replace the helpless frustration you feel, the powerless victimization, by working out a rational answer. The answers will come, if they come, when they come, to you, to others, but don't fill in the emptiness of the protest with positive suggestions before their time. First, protest! I don't know what should be done about most of the major political dilemmas, but my gut (my soul, my heart, my skin, my eyes) sinks, > creeps, crawls, weeps, cringes, shakes. It's wrong, simply wrong, what's going on here.[1]

How different his advice from that of the average therapist! The idea here is that we follow our animal response to the insults and thoughtlessness of the world around us, and not follow the therapists' advice that we have cold rational answers before we open our mouths in protest.

The real danger here is that if you don't get the anger out, if you don't engage in outrage, it always finds another way. One of those ways is through conversion of anger to psychosomatic symptoms, often crippling ones which cause long-term disease and disability. Alternatively the reaction might be to convert anger into a less outwardly destructive mood such as depression, which is all too common. The old saying "Anger turned inward is depression" rings true for far too many men.

The process of anger morphing into depression can be referred to as sublimation, a swapping of a supposedly unacceptable emotion for a more acceptable one in the eyes of our PC culture. The end result of that process is often suicide, and the therapeutic industry is directly implicated for some of those suicides by reason of its suppression of male clients' anger.

On the other side of that coin, depressed people who receive encouragement to express anger often experience a lessening of their depressive symptoms and suicidal thoughts. Psychologists have given moving accounts of men who, when put in touch with the things that anger them, experience a lifting of depression and witness the blood flow back into their cheeks. The upshot is that contrary to the therapists who recommend we men bury our anger, the opposite is a likely way to bring about psychological health.

In summary it is therapeutic per se to express anger,[2] and when allowed that opportunity it's less likely to be intensified into uncontrolled rage or conversely transmuted into a death wish. The man-friendly therapist encourages expression of anger as a prophylactic against depression and suicide, and as a way to potentially reverse depression and suicidality in those already there. Outrage might even bring the bonus of changing an ugly world into a better one, because a man sticking apologetically to his convictions compels the world to sit up and listen.

Reference:

[1] James Hillman and Michael Ventura: We've Had a Hundred Years of Psychotherapy and The World is Getting Worse, HarperOne 1993
[2] Catharsis, Dictionary.com

How to spot a borderline from a mile away

Paul Elam · 17 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Before we get started, let me make a few things clear. What I have to say is not designed to demonize women, or men for that matter, who have personality disorders. The content here is designed to benefit those who have been victimized by personality disordered individuals and to arm those who may encounter them in the future.

If you look back at any of the previous work I've done on this subject, you will find comment areas saturated with complaints, many of them by people who identify as having personality disorders. There are claims that the work is stigmatizing. There are allegations that I am causing people with personality disorders to feel bad about themselves; that I am callously insensitive to those suffering from those disorders.

Allow me to make it clear here that I do not give a damn about those complaints. It is not because I am insensitive or callous. And it is not because I wish to demonize or stigmatize people with personality disorders or anyone else for that matter. The purpose of my work here is to offer support and information to the victims of personality disordered individuals, particularly male victims.

And if you look through the complaints levied against me, you will see that they validate what I have been saying all along. People with personality disorders have an unfortunate tendency to abuse people, then demand sympathy from their victims. They want to punch someone in the face and then complain that the victim's face made their knuckles hurt.

That attitude will not get any sympathy here or any more of my time. There are countless online and real world resources for people with personality disorders, many of them an enabling part of the problem. That's not my purpose here, so please consider that your trigger warning.

I am going to talk here in straightforward, blunt terms, to and about victims. And I mean real victims; namely, the people who endure physical and emotional abuse, false allegations, constant drama and hysteria, and the grinding tension that marks the lives of those who live with personality disordered individuals.

If you have a personality disorder, I wish you luck in getting the support and treatment you need. Look for it elsewhere. If you choose to come here demanding attention and sympathy in an environment designed to offer those things to the people you have victimized, then it is very likely that I will delete your comments and prevent you from commenting here in the future.

Now, let us proceed.

The best thing anyone can do to prevent the havoc a disordered personality can inflict on your life is to prevent contact with them as much as possible. Stay away from people with personality disorders much in the way you would stay away from heroin addicts, meth heads, pedophiles, and pyromaniacs.

In the same way you won't let a junkie have access to your bank account, don't let a BPD have access to your daily living. To do that reliably, you have to know one when you see one. As a baseline, I am going to use the diagnostic criteria from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) 4. There is a different version of this in the DSM 5, but it has changed, I think for political reasons, so I am sticking with the old book.

Every man who still considers pair-bonding a natural part of his life should keep these things in mind every time he meets a prospective sexual or romantic partner. The borderline personality disorder is identified by some or all of the following nine traits.

1. Frantic efforts to avoid being abandoned by friends and family.

Keep in mind here that the borderline's capacity to feel abandoned is nothing short of staggering. She will be threatened by your friendships, family relationships, even by your hobbies and thoughts — if they do not focus on her. I conducted groups which had borderline members who felt abandoned if I did not take the seat next to them.

Some borderlines are so extreme that they will feel abandoned and react irrationally to any need for autonomy or privacy you express.

Most are not quite that bad, but if you start seeing a tendency for a woman to cling to you in ways that are irrational, you are well advised to pay very close attention to it.

2. A pattern of unstable and intense interpersonal relationships characterized by alternating between extremes of idealization and devaluation.

What does this bit of word salad mean? It means that her relationships are freaking crazy. She loves you one moment, more than anyone else in the world. She idealizes you and puts you on a pedestal. Then, the moment she perceives anything in you that triggers her abandonment reflex, she knocks you off that pedestal and hates the ground you walk on. In this, she is capable of becoming vicious and retaliatory.

This is particularly dangerous. When she is in the devaluation state, she is capable of doing anything to punish you for disappointing her. This can include anything from verbal abuse to physical attacks and false allegations. If you see this pattern in her, you should not need more prompting to convince you to run. Get out, and quickly.

3. Identity disturbance: markedly and persistently unstable self-image or sense of self.

Translation: Borderlines tend not to know fuck all about who they are. This comes with its own problems, both for the BPD and those around them. The condition lends itself to wild mood swings that typically result in someone, like you for instance, taking the brunt. If you think you are the exception, you are being foolish.

The takeaway? If she seems unpredictable, it is because she is. You can never know when or where the sudden blowup is coming, just that it will. If that is a suitable arrangement for you in a relationship, I would advise therapy.

4. Impulsive behaviors that can have dangerous outcomes, such as excessive spending, unsafe sex, substance abuse or reckless driving.

Of course. This is bound to happen with borderlines. It's where we just start getting into the deep end of the crazy pool. That wild, crazy sex that attracted you to her? Don't kid yourself that you are the only pony she is going to ride.

Borderlines are often attractive and highly sexual. You can see it in the woman who wears "come-fuck-me" pumps, excessive makeup and skin-tight clothing to the office. Hint, if she works in a law firm and dresses like she works in a brothel, add it to the diagnostic criteria. She is either a borderline or close enough that it doesn't really matter.

Sex is the hook for so many of them. They lead with a highly sexualized persona and will be the first to allege sexual impropriety on your part, when, not if, you fall out of favor. It does not exactly take spidey-sense to figure this out. All you have to do is be thinking from the neck up.

By the way, don't get in a car with a borderline driving. One nosedive into her feelings and you could end up as a hood ornament. Don't even put it past her to pick a fight so she can turn into a deranged Dale Earnhardt behind the wheel.

If you are nuts enough to be attracted to this brand of insanity — and more than a few guys are — more power to you. But know it can end very badly. Please be kind enough to warn your friends and family that you are going down with the ship.

5. Suicidal and self-harming behavior.

Suicidal ideation and self-mutilation aren't just an expression of the borderline's misery. They are also tools for manipulation and emotional blackmail. I once drove three hundred miles to visit a friend. We were going to watch the SuperBowl together in a sports bar two miles from his home. He showed up in the middle of the third quarter because his girlfriend was saying she would kill herself if he went. She finally relented and gave her blessings after she knew that she had ruined the event for him.

If you are more than 17 or 18, you have likely either experienced something like this or know someone who has. Controlling you with threats of self-harm is her ace in the hole. And yes, this is a nightmare for her, too, which she will remind you is the only thing you are allowed to talk about the moment you get tired of the manipulation.

If she tells you those marks on her forearms are chicken-pox scars, do yourself a favor by suspending belief, lest the scars will eventually make their way to you.

6. Periods of intense depressed mood, irritability or anxiety lasting a few hours to a few days.

Since the focus here is on you, the only thing I have to say about this is to look at your life. Living with a borderline will produce exactly those results for you. Misery loves company is the borderline's motto, and solemn oath. Expect to be depressed, on edge and anxious. Not for hours or days, but constantly. If you end up killing yourself after a few years living with a borderline, you would not be the first or last. Think about that, as I say it again, with feeling. If you end up killing yourself after a few years living with a borderline, you would not be the first or last.

7. Chronic feelings of boredom or emptiness.

Which she will fill with one drama after another, mostly with her as the main character and you as supporting actor and emotional pincushion. She will have other ways of breaking that boredom, too, like doing drugs, drinking and driving, maybe banging your friends. That is if you have any friends left that she has not run off.

Borderlines are constantly plagued by emptiness and boredom, which is unfortunate because they don't have any real tolerance for it.

8. Inappropriate, intense or uncontrollable anger—often followed by shame and guilt.

First of all, inappropriate and uncontrollable anger should be followed by shame and guilt. But don't think her emotional experience of that guilt provides her the moral rudder that it does for most people. The guilt she feels isn't corrective. It is as transient as her anger; just part of a mood swing, not a learning experience that comes with making mistakes. She will feel guilty for a brief period of time but will be capable of another identical tirade in 5 minutes.

Finally:

9. Dissociative feelings—disconnecting from a sense of identity, or "out of body" type of feelings—and stress-related paranoid thoughts. Severe cases of stress can also lead to brief psychotic episodes.

OK, now, this is wandering into the deepest end of the pool, but it is important to remember that you can drown in the shallow end. It is not the extreme ends of the borderlines condition that will get you, but the mildest of their symptoms chronically inflicted on your daily routine. It is a death by a thousand cuts.

The point here is not to make light of what is clearly a disorder that causes great suffering for the person afflicted but to point out to you that the suffering will not be contained to her. She will quietly blame the nearest target, again, that would be you, for all of her inner turmoil. Borderlines don't just feel pain and suffering, they dish it out to anyone close to them. Again, I caution you about the folly of the fantasy that you will be an exception – or that by acting as her sacrificial savior that you will do her or you any good at all. Your tendency to white knight with this particular wounded bird should be invited to take a back seat to your better judgment.

You don't have to hate her to get this, and any anger you have toward her is pointless, even if it is justified. Negative feelings about borderlines are worthless unless they serve to direct you out of their path.

The question is whether their condition mandates that someone like you tolerate their abuse. That, of course, is up to you. But my experience tells me that men who cling to this kind of relationship have their own psychological issues that warrant attention.

All we can do from here is to inform men of what to look for and leave them with the responsibility of making choices that don't lead them to land in a ditch.

Boys and girls emote differently: can't we be OK with that?

Tim Wright · 17 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Man-up! Take it like a man! Shake it off!

Most boys hear those words and exhortations constantly throughout their lives.

Men don't cry!

Men suck it up!

Act like a man!

Recently, I've been hearing push back on that phrase, with a growing number suggesting that Man Up! is one of the most damaging phrases a boy can hear.

Anyone raising a boy or seeing the way boys are often robbed of the ability to express what we often categorize as "soft" emotions would have a hard time disagreeing. We seemingly live in a culture that has a difficult time allowing boys and men to show any emotion other than anger—and we don't like that emotion, either. Crying, for example, is often pegged as one of the most anti-manly things a guy can do. It's a sign of weakness and a guy can never show himself to be weak.

You'll get no disagreement from me on the problem. I think we do a great disservice to our boys and the rest of culture when we socialize good, healthy, emoting out of our boys.

But, contrary to much of what I've been reading and hearing as of late, the answer is not to socialize boys to cry more or to nurture them to be more verbal with their emotions (or to put it more bluntly, it does not help boys emote by insisting that we can nurture/socialize them to emote more freely like girls often do).

To start there is to do a great disservice to our boys.

My friend, Dr. Michael Gurian, has been using brain science research for over 30 years to help educators better teach to a boy brain and a girl brain. Brain science research has found at least 100 differences between the male and the female brain. While males and females are mostly the "same," those over 100 brain differences make a big difference.

In addition, at the risk of oversimplifying, males are made up primarily of testosterone—an aggression/action hormone. Women are made up primarily of estrogen and oxytocin—bonding/tend and befriend chemicals. While males and females are mostly the "same" those hormones make a big difference.

Boys generally do not emote the way girls emote. For one thing, because of the way boys brains are wired, they access and express their emotions differently than girls.

Ask a girl how she's feeling about something and generally all you have to do is step back and listen to her verbally express her feelings instantaneously.

Ask a boy how he's feeling about something and what you'll often get is a blank stare or a mono-syllabic grunt…not because he doesn't want to answer the question…but because he doesn't know. Dr. Gurian tells us that it can take a boy 30 minutes to over a day to access his feelings and put them into words.

Girls tend to processes stress in the front of the brain enabling them to verbalize the stress. Boys tend to process stress in the back of the brain, moving them to a fight, flight, or freeze response—i.e., a response that doesn't use a lot of words.

Where a girl's brain is wired to tie emotions and words together, a boy's brain is not.

Women throughout the world have higher levels of prolactin, which controls, among other things, the development of tear glands…hence, generally, wherever you go (even in a culture that is friendly to male tears, like Italy), you see more tears from women's eyes than from men's.

Leadership and the Sexes, Michael Gurian and Barbara Annis, pg. 14

My point is not that we should not nurture our boys to emote in healthy ways, but that you can't start a discussion on helping boys emote more freely and healthily by focusing first on nurture. When we start with nurture, usually to the exclusion of nature, we tend to assume that boys can be socialized to express their emotions and feelings like girls—who tend to do it more openly and verbally. But this, in the end, will only frustrate boys more. Because it is trying to nurture them to emote in a way that isn't a part of their nature.

Many will claim that the brain has great elasticity, meaning that it can be molded and shaped through socialization and nurture, which is true. But the brain also has some set points, so to speak, that make a male male and a female female. These cannot be changed.

Boys' emotive nature, however, can be recognized, affirmed, and nurtured to respond accordingly. Meaning, if we want to free up our boys to express all of their emotions, we need to understand how boys are wired to emote, and then free them to do so. We start with nature, and then nurture their nature.

Most boys will not emote like most girls. But boys are wired to emote and to do so in powerful, profound, healthy ways. (Movement is always a good starting point for most males—get them moving and it will energize their brains to verbalize better, bond, shed some tears, emote, access feelings, etc.)

Our job is not to nurture boys to express emotions the way girls do, but the way boys do.

In other words, when we exhort a boy to Man Up! we should pour a rich understanding of nature and nurture into those words, so that we are truly inviting a boy to man-up into the healthy, thriving man he is created to be.

Father's Day 2017: reflections on some of Dad's money and life lessons

Anwar Y. Dunbar · 17 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Last month I wrote a piece in celebration of Mother's Day, so it's only fitting that I write something in celebration of Father's Day as well. The Mother's Day post was about a specific piece of advice my mother gave me about my engagement and looming marriage a couple of years ago. As jokingly stated in that post, Dad didn't give me much advice in that particular instance. He did give me lots of guidance throughout my life though. Over on my "Heroes and Quotes" page, his is the first quote which was some advice he gave me at a young age about how to succeed academically.

There was much more though, particularly in way of advice about money, women and other things – lots about money and women. He sometimes consciously taught me things, and some things I learned simply from observation. With two of the key principles of my blog being "Creating Ecosystems of Success", and "Empowering Others", I'm going to reflect on some of his money lessons and some of their deeper and associated life meanings/significances – some of which I had to question. As in most cases, I didn't understand everything that was being said then as I do now.

As I go through some of this stuff, keep in mind that fathers are important – biological, step-, or mentors of all sorts. According to data from Kid's Count in 2015, 66% of African American kids were raised by a single-parent while the national average was 35%. My parents divorced when I was three-years old and I thus grew up in a single-parent household for the majority of my childhood. While I've sometimes looked back and wondered what it would've been like to have my father in the house, the blessing was that while he wasn't physically there, it was important for him to be as visible and accessible as possible.

"Always make sure your children know who you are." He tried hard to keep up with the words of his own father who died during his teens. It sounds like a simple thing, but as I grew into adulthood myself, went through college and even started dating, I realized that not every father did this, especially in the black community. The results often times were catastrophic with long lasting ramifications, especially in dating or 'pair-bonding' – a separate topic all in itself.

* * *

"You just did something I don't like. You didn't count your change. How do you know that the cashier gave you the correct change?" I was an early teen when this discussion took place. I had just paid for something, took the change the cashier gave me and immediately stuffed it into my pocket. A stern man, his words, "You just did something I don't like," stopped me dead in my tracks. I didn't think he was paying attention, but sure enough he was – in general Dad was always paying attention to the most minute details even when you thought he wasn't. He also remembered things long after you forgot them and would bring them back up when you least expected it.

When I discovered what he was unhappy about, it made sense to me and I started counting my change. I even started calculating in my mind the change I was supposed to get back from cashiers before they gave it to me. The lesson here was to be careful with my money, and to trust no one. Years later he observed that I was in fact careful with my money. I told him that I had gotten the behavior from him. He replied saying something very profound, "Well son, when you have to make child support payments, you have to be very careful with your money."

"You always keep your receipt because you never know when you're going to have to return something." I don't know which came first, this lesson or the change counting lesson, but they weren't far apart. His father had gotten on him about this when he was younger. He had allegedly gone into lower Manhattan to buy some underwear and returned home without the receipt resulting in his getting scolded.

"When you get paid, you want to account for all of your expenses." This was an early lesson about budgeting. We didn't sit down and do one right then and there, and I wouldn't master it until at least ten years later, but I always remembered the discussion.

"You always pay yourself first." This lesson came shortly after I started working, though again as a teen, I didn't grasp the power of this advice until later. It had tremendous implications in one's prime earning years where diligent individuals save for both emergencies and investments and build wealth while others spend all of their income.

"You don't quit your job unless you have another one to go to." Dad gave me this sage wisdom between my junior and senior years of high school after quitting my very first job at the Denny's Restaurant, near the Buffalo airport. I lasted three months at that job which consisted of washing dishes, cleaning up the restaurant, and taking out the garbage. I didn't last long enough to have to shovel snow in the winter. The place where I really wanted to work for my first job was McDonald's. At the time it looked fun to me. I was happy to have an income, but after a while I grew tired of working at Denny's – coming home sweaty, greasy, and exhausted. Without talking to anyone, I quit that job right there on the spot with no other job to go to. It was then that I came to the understanding that I had no more cash flow – a sign of immaturity. The only positive thing about that situation was that I was still in high school and wasn't required to contribute to any of my mother's household bills. Some adults quit their job without having a replacement and put themselves in a pickle; often burdening those around them.

"You always keep money in the bank because you never know when an emergency is going to arise." There's a very funny story behind this lesson and it involves a woman – something very dramatic and stressful according to Dad. For my own safety, I'll just stick to the lesson. At an early age, Dad stressed the importance of having money in the bank due to unforeseen emergencies which inevitably happen to you, or to someone around you. In this particular quagmire he had gotten into, having some money in the bank helped him get out of it. He also regretted once not having $5,000 available for a mortgage down payment on a house he was renting.

"You can keep dating her if you want to. You might have to miss your electric bill." This sobering advice came during my first year in graduate school in my mid-twenties. It was one of my first experiences learning something that Dad had talked about for most of my childhood – women and money. At least most of the ones we knew came with a price tag, and wanted to be wined and dined.

I had, unfortunately, taken a liking to someone whom I dated for one to two months who openly admitted she was needy, which I didn't understand at the time as she had already started her own career. Inexperienced at dating, she grew frustrated with my meager finances and my lack of understanding of what was expected of me. Dad's advice here, which came in a hurtful and mocking tone, was simply communicating that I needed to determine whether or not I could afford this particular female. I decided that I couldn't.

It's an important set of questions for all men to ask themselves when meeting a potential partner. Can I afford her? Does she line up with my priorities? Will she tank my finances? This was also one of the first times I could personally feel the pain, the scars, and the poor fortune my father experienced in the dating jungle after he and my mother split – as there was lots of despair, and little hope or encouragement in his words.

"When you have to make child support payments, it forces you to be very careful with your money." I have to be very careful here as this is a sensitive topic, and my mother generally proof-reads my articles. Throughout my childhood, Dad sometimes lamented about making child support payments – not because he didn't want to support his children, but because I think he had a hard time making ends meet on his own end. During my childhood, he eventually took a second job in the military to pay the bills. It's a sensitive topic because while he felt maxed out, my mother felt as though he wasn't doing enough. And I'll stop there, but suffice it to say that in many instances men and women see money (and life) differently. In some instances, as the ones being asked to provide, it can seem like your best is never enough – a hard pill to swallow. He and I talked about this a lot as I got older and I started experiencing my own scrapes and bruises with the opposite sex.

"The bank is going to want to look at all of your bank statements when you apply for a mortgage, and $2,000 isn't any money," Dad scoffed at me, making me feel five feet tall. I was still living with the big guy during my Postdoctoral fellowship. I had started reading Robert Kiyosaki's Rich Dad Poor Dad series and had joined my local Real Estate Investment Club. I wanted to make an ambitious move and get my first investment property – a duplex which I would live in and eventually rent out for "Passive" income. I needed some help with the closing costs and associated expenses, so I asked him for a loan. It was one of the worst experiences of my life.

Instead of a nice teachable discussion about the ups, the downs, and the ins, and outs of trying such a thing – it turned into him putting me in a proverbial headlock. It dragged on for days and days as he mulled over it, and asked me random pointed questions about it – his analysis and communication styles. After a while I just wanted to drop the whole thing, and I concluded that I never wanted to be in a position to ask his help for anything money-related, though I did once more, and returned to the same conclusion.

In hindsight while it was smart to want to create a passive income stream, it wasn't a good idea in that particular instance. I wasn't going to stay in that area long-term, and I wasn't experienced enough, and didn't have enough money to manage a property from a long-distance. What was funny was that many people don't even have $2,000 in the bank they can access quickly. That said, he was right in that it wasn't a substantial amount of money. He was also right in that prior to qualifying you for a mortgage, the banks do want to know everything about your financial history.

Dad was also jaded in terms of being a landlord from a prior experience, as he once had a tenant in his lower unit – an older woman. According to him, he went downstairs to collect the rent one day, and the woman transformed into a malevolent, ominous, and demon-possessed state. It scared him at the time and forever soured him on being a landlord.

"I wouldn't invest in the Stock Market if I were you." This bit of advice was given to me in my 30s when I expressed that I wanted to buy some stock by the end of that particular year. Because of his own life experiences, Dad was averse to losing money. Coincidentally, one of our closest cousins recommended I get in the game and buy stock, and even today experts like Dr. Boyce Watkins, strongly advocate blacks getting into the Stock Market. So who was right in this case? Who was to be believed and trusted?

This gets back to one of the points I made in my 2017 Mother's Day post. As we grow into adulthood, I think we all get to a point where everything our parents tell us can't be taken as the gospel and in some instances must be questioned and or pondered critically. In this particular instance, yes investing in stocks does involve potential loss. An important consideration going in though is whether or not you understand that there is a potential for the loss, and whether or not you can absorb the loss. In other words, do you have emergency money in the bank, and is the amount to be invested allocated for that reason? Can it be easily replaced for another round? This is a much different thought process than simply stating, "You're going to lose your money if you do that."

* * *

If the tone of this blog post was in part melancholy and mixed, then it reflects our father-son relationship which has been full of contradictions and mystery. When I look back at my youth many of my childhood experiences were marked by concerns over money. I'm not saying that I grew up in poverty because I didn't by any means. I don't really remember my mother, whom I spent the majority of my childhood with, talking about money a lot, but I think she shielded my brother and me from some things – sheltering us, as one of my aunts often said. I did look around at peers, such as my best friend and realized that I didn't have Air Jordans, Starter Jackets, Karl Kani, or any of the trendiest apparel of our cohorts.

Most of the money-related talks as I grew up actually came from my father and as you might have gathered from this post, many of them had some sort of pain associated with them. As I've gotten older, I understand things much better now. As we get older we start to see that our parents are people who make mistakes themselves, and are not perfect though at one point we may have thought they were. In some instances we start to understand their pains and struggles.

Over the years our father-son relationship has gone through a lot of changes – some good and some bad with multiple ups and downs. Overall I'm grateful for everything my father has done for me, and I tell him that every time I see him now (my mother too). That said, as I think President Obama said years ago, for children whose biological fathers are missing, there can be other fathers too. And even if a child's father isn't a good one, or can't supply everything needed, there can again be other fathers to fill in those gaps. I certainly have many.

There are a lot of podcasts and men's stations on places like YouTube these days – many talking about the importance of fathers. My favorite in this current station of my life is Paul Elam's "A Voice for Men" – content I would recommend for any man still figuring things out in our society – personal values, dating and marriage, and finally gender/societal roles. Fathers are very important if for no other reason than to lend a balanced perspective on the world. This is true for both boys and girls who themselves will eventually both grow into men and women.

Thank you for taking the time to read this post. If you've found value here and think it would benefit others, please share it and or leave a comment. To receive all of the most up to date content from the Big Words Blog Site, subscribe using the subscription box in the right hand column throughout the site. While my main areas of focus are Education, STEM and Financial Literacy, Health & Wellness are very, very important as well. I therefore encourage my readers to visit Positive Health Wellness for valuable and up to date information regarding: diet, fitness and lifestyle.

Groundbreaking documentary: “American Circumcision”

Gary Costanza · 19 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

“American Circumcision,” a documentary coming out later this year is as important and ground-breaking as “The Red Pill,” and will be the equivalent game-changer for intactivists worldwide.

Here’s the movie’s website or watch the full trailer here:

Rachel Corbett, The Red Pill and zombie journalism Down Under

Paul Elam · 19 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I don't think I ever imagined I would get tired of talking about The Red Pill movie. Then again, I never imagined the level of idiocy that the movie would inspire. I should have factor weighed for Australia before imagining either. The feminists in that country, especially in the media, have proven to be under-socialized misfits, aggressively ignorant on a galactic scale.

It's as though they should change the name of the country to pornography, just to escape the embarrassment.

Rachel Corbett, writing for the Daily Telegraph, has come out with an attempt to salvage whatever remains of the integrity she imagined she had before participating in the attempted tag team ambush of Jaye on the Australian issues program, The Project.

As might be predicted when someone tries to reclaim something they did not have in the first place, Corbett only managed to fall again, this time directly on her face next to Andrew O'Keefe, Monique Wright and the rest of Australia's yellow brigade of hack journos.

I am going to share her article with you, most of it anyway, and give my response. When I'm done, I am going to treat myself to some relief and go back to what is important to me. The lives of men and boys. I won't be writing any more articles on Australian grade zombie-journalism. There is just too many of the walking dead Down Under to bother with it any more.

Perhaps I will revisit this in better days, like after Australia is annexed by China, or some other country with a better press corp.

Anyway, let's look at what Rachel Corbett had to say.

> UNTIL recently the Men's Rights Movement and its controversial "leader" in the United States, Paul Elam, might not have been familiar to many Australians.
>
> But after the documentary The Red Pill was banned from Australian cinemas and the film's director, Cassie Jaye, claimed she'd been treated poorly by the media on her publicity tour, the phenomenon has hit a few more people's radars.
>
> As a panelist on Network Ten's The Project the night Jaye was interviewed, I was one of those accused of bad behavior.

I wonder if Rachel understands the meaning of cause and effect. She took part in a heavily biased hack job, an ideologically driven agenda to discredit an innocent person so that she could try to shut down an honest discussion of men's issues. Forget what I said about cause and effect. The challenge here is Corbett's understanding of the word journalism.

She is wrong about something else, too. While it is true that the majority of Australians have likely never heard of me, I take some pride in pointing out that people from Australia, a nation of 22 million, represent a disproportionately high percentage of traffic to AVFM, and to the financial support AVFM gets from across the globe.

Anway, Corbett goes on to dig her hole deeper.

> While many have claimed the interview was an attempt to silence her, the truth is there were things in the film that needed to be called into question. If all she'd wanted for her film was an advertisement she could have bought one in the commercial break.
>
> And before you start screaming that this is classic lefty feminism and I clearly couldn't deal with the issues > raised in her film let me assure you: just the opposite is true.

Feminists have trigger alerts. I have bullshit alerts and I am issuing one now. Corbett is letting us all know that she is the reasonable one in her clan of misfits. No, she's not at all like Carrie Bickmore or Waleed Aly, who did nothing but spout disingenuous feminist dogma during the heavily edited portion of the interview we were allowed to see.

Corbett must have excused herself to the little girls room while her compatriots alleged that The Red Pill was funded by MRAs and that Cassie was a mouthpiece for the MRM, only to have those lies completely debunked and consequently find home on the cutting room floor.

Oh no, Corbett had no part in that. She's the reasonable one, as she is about to go on telling us.

> I'm one of those women who finds it difficult to identify with the word "feminist", she says, because I want equality for everyone, not just women.

Hold the presses. I want to take a moment to enshrine that statement. It is the first time I have seen an MSM journalist, much less one in Australia, actually admit that feminism is not about equality for both sexes. And since you cannot, ever, have equality for just one group, it is also a tacit admission that feminism isn't about equality at all.

I don't think she actually realizes what she's admitted to, and neither have her peers or she would have her professional head on a spike by now. But she does go on, quite strong in her convictions.

> I don't think an overly simplistic view, says Corbett, that men have it easy and women are hard done by does anyone any favours and that's why I thought many of the issues raised in Jaye's film were worthy of discussion.
>
> And yes, I watched it. Twice.

Once again, Corbett says a mouthful without fully realizing what she is saying.

"And yes, I watched it. Twice"?

It is clear that Corbett is well aware that when it comes to the handling of the Red Pill Movie as an Australian journalist you have to tell your readers that you actually watched it. It's bragging rights in a media environment where the natural assumption would be that she had not bothered watching it before forming an opinion.

It's like a sports reporter covering the Super Bowl and triumphantly declaring to the audience, "And yes! I watched the game!"

Rachel Corbett, a career television journalist, is bragging about having watched a movie before commenting on it. One to wonder if it registers on her how completely lame that is, and precisely what it says about her associates on Project and throughout Australian media. She goes on to demonstrate her keen understanding of the issues.

> Topics like child custody, men's suicide rates and domestic violence where the perpetrator is female are all areas where issues facing men are often overlooked and they shouldn't be.
>
> In an interview with a number of so-called Men's Rights Activists or MRAs for short, they raised the point that while men's work has been valued over women's work, women's lives have been valued over men's and continue to be so.
>
> These activists pointed to events such as 2009's famous Hudson River plane crash when rescuers asked for woman and children to exit the plane first. Surely in an emergency, they asked, shouldn't we be seen as identical amorphous blobs equally worthy of immediate rescue no matter what bits we were born with?
>
> Observations like this are important to add to the conversation as well as questions about whether Family Law

> Courts unfairly favour mothers or the fact that we often don't take male victims of domestic violence as seriously as we do female victims.

She even moved on to an almost balanced account of my writing regarding a piece I did titled, "If you see Jezebel in the road, run the bitch down," more popularly know as Bash a Violent Bitch Month"

> One of Elam's more controversial articles on his website A Voice for Men, suggested the month of October should be "bash a violent bitch" month. This was written in response to an article on Jezebel which made light of women beating their male partners.
>
> Again, there's no doubt there is a double standard there that needed to be called out but while Elam claims his article was a piece of "Juvenalian satire", I don't think it's unfair to question whether there might have been a less aggressive, more intelligent way to express himself. Particularly when couching arguments in that kind of vitriolic language ends up making you look less like a person with a genuine point and more like a misogynist with an axe to grind.

Of course, Rachel, it's fair to question anything and everything. It's also fair to expect the questioner to be intelligent enough to understand the answers. In a better world, and by that I mean the world outside Australia, it's also fair to expect seasoned journalists to ask intelligent questions, and this isn't one.

But no harm I suppose in asking stupid questions, so I'll offer an answer. As to whether there might have been a less aggressive, more intelligent way for me to express myself. Yes, there might have been a less aggressive way but it would not have been more intelligent.

The entire point of writing satire is to provoke thought and discussion. The only way to write satire that forces any kind of meaningful discussion on issues faced by men and boys is to be aggressive about it.

And why? Because anyone who understands a damn thing about the men's movement knows full well that a hundred years of impeccably reasonable, button-down collar advocacy for men and boys has resulted only in the world shrugging and moving on without notice.

Because, as Cassie Jaye has said publicly on several occasions herself, without that satire she would never have noticed the men's movement and would have never done the movie.

So, Rachel, you tell me what is intelligent. Sparking enough controversy that journalists wound up making asses of themselves by condemning a movie they didn't bother to watch, prompting you to write a column parroting men's issues and pretending like you support discussing them? Or maintaining a blog with wonderfully inoffensive content that the world would promptly ignore?

If you are going to look down your nose at my style, Rachel, you might want to consider that it is people like you, and only people like you, who made the harsh satire necessary. After all, where were you and your phony cohorts when a leading feminist publication like Jezebel was literally bragging and laughing about bashing their husbands and boyfriend? Where were you when insanity dressed up as women's advocacy took over your nation? Was all that during another trip to the girl's room?

Next Corbett goes on to try to close the deal on convincing us that she is the one good reasonable voice that stands above the distasteful rest of us, feminists included.

> The same can be said for feminists who scream about how all men are bastards and that women need to rule the world instead of us all having a crack at it together. But on Elam's website things have been written that should have been challenged in a documentary that was supposed to be about the movement, warts and all.
>
> All through his A Voice for Men website, viewers see points we should be discussing alongside language like "Valentine's Day, for far too many men, is actually Lighten Up and Don't be such an Insufferable Bitch Day, > but only if you get the present right." Language the writer might believe is a work of Juvenalian art but that just sounds juvenile.

I won't dwell on the fact that Jaye did challenge me on my writing, and indeed featured one of those challenges as an integral part of the film. I won't even question the strangeness of Corbett's complaint given she watched the movie. Twice. I will say, however, that Corbett's true colors, despite her attempts to build a reasonable, even somewhat sympathetic façade,now emerges. Corbett wants to shame me, no us, for being uppity. By speaking our minds, directly and honestly, we are resembling those pesky black people from 1960's America who didn't know how to mind their betters.

America's family courts, criminal courts and college disciplinary systems represent the biggest civil rights rollback since Jim Crow. Men of all colors are suffering and even dying from these injustices. It's happening in Australia, too. And now Corbett, like a plantation mistress, wants to clutch pearls and virtue signal because men are starting to deride sacred gynocentric traditions that put the onus on men to please women at all costs. She is tone policing like an irate librarian as she rattles off enough lip service to men's issues to put on a front of open-mindedness.

At least Andrew O'Keefe was more up front and honest about his bigotry.

The rest of her commentary gushes out like a nobility fit.

> I want to live in a society where we can have complex, robust, uncomfortable conversations. I want everyone, particularly those who don't fit the stereotype, to have their views heard because assuming we know everything is arrogant and dangerous.
>
> Being challenged and opening your mind to different points of view is important but it has to go both ways. If you want me to listen to you and appreciate where you're coming from you don't need to call me an "insufferable bitch" before we've even gotten the introductions out of the way.

Rachel, let me give you a 101 on the men's movement, generally speaking. No one really gives a damn if you are listening, or if you appreciate anything we are saying.

The men's movement, at least the most active part of it, is not about men's advocates trying to convince the world of anything. It is about men talking to each other, inviting tone police to piss off while they do it. It's about men giving themselves permission to treat the opinion of women like you with the dismissal it deserves.

It's about creating an intellectual haven in which women and men like you don't matter. That's because we have finally started to figure out that in every way possible, whether it is domestic violence, suicide or any of the other issues about which you have feigned compassion, we have never mattered at all. Be thankful that "Bash a Violent Bitch Month" was the worst of what happened.

The rest of Corbett's article amounts pretty much to a schoolmarm's lecture on how we are all in this together, the pitfalls of zero sum games, the dangers of extremism, and pretty much everything else that feminists have suddenly found passion for when they realized a growing number of men would no longer be silenced.

It is just amazing how some people drone about how 'we are all in this together' the moment the people they were ignoring decided they would not be ignored any more.

A survival guide for men in couples therapy — Part one

Tom Golden · 21 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

When men enter into couples therapy with their wives or significant female others they will often come into what seems like foreign territory. Things don't make sense and the language used is not so familiar. It seems like they are "out of place." The first section of this article intends to offer men a primer on the basics of why they may feel out of place. The later section will focus on ideas about what they can do about it and tips for getting the most they can from the experience.

It is worth noting that for biological reasons there are probably about 1 in 5 men who will feel more comfortable in the couples therapy setting. It is also true that 1 in 5 women will be more like most men. When this article addresses "men" it is directed towards that 80% of men and 20% of women. Bottom line? We are all very different and if you are a man or a woman and want to know more about the nature of couples therapy you may find this article useful. (For more information on these differences see my book The Way Men Heal at Amazon)

Men and Couples Therapy – Why is this hard for men?

The whole idea of sitting face to face and talking about emotions and hurt seems odd to many men. Men might feel more comfortable taking this sort of problem and hashing it out as they play a game of horse or shoot 18 holes of golf. They may feel more comfortable shoulder to shoulder or even by themselves but that is not the way this system of couples therapy is set up. This is just one of many factors that make this experience one that is more difficult for men.

Language

Couples therapy uses a unique language that most men simply don't know but most women speak fluently. This has an impact on what happens in couples treatment. Imagine visiting France. Your wife speaks fluent French and you speak a little. A Frenchman invites you to his table at a restaurant and a conversation unfolds. Who is he going to speak with? How will the conversation flow?

Likely you will be secondary since you are simply not as fluent and your wife will translate to you the details that you miss. You rely on her to keep you informed about what is happening and you make your best guesses about the rest. Both your wife and the Frenchman will probably not judge you harshly for not being fluent but even so, you will likely feel on the outside. Now think about a couples therapy session. You are likely not as fluent as the therapist and your wife, you will probably feel on the outside in a similar manner but there may be a difference.

In the couples therapy arena when you are not as fluent you are likely to be judged and seen as inferior, ignorant, even as cold and uncaring. The truth is that many therapists think that men should be fluent in the language of feelings and tend to judge them for their apparent deficiency. They believe that men, if only they wanted to, could easily learn this feeling language and would then want to talk about their emotions. Simple right? "Just try a little harder honey, it's not so hard if you will just try."

What these therapists don't seem to know is that men's biology is working against them. Their brains are more geared towards building and understanding systems and are not as interested in the emotional side of things. There is some evidence now that testosterone actually limits a man's ability to articulate emotions even when in the midst of feeling them. Men have a very different way to process emotions but this difference is rarely acknowledged in couples therapy and men's unique ways are often interpreted as being deficiencies or are simply ignored.

Another aspect to the language problem is that it likely creates a bond between your wife and the therapist and just as you depended on her translations at the French restaurant you now depend on her. The difference is that in a couples therapy scenario, she may be antagonistic towards you since your interests are now in conflict. The likelihood of getting a good translation goes down as you must depend on her emotional maturity and only a truly mature woman will be considering your needs at a time like this. I have seen women use their fluency in the language of emotions as a tool to prove her side and to show the man as being the problem.

Details

Another difference is in the details. Have you ever noticed that women seem to remember in great detail relationship events from years ago? You know, the time you insulted her by saying she was fat in 2007. She remembers. You don't. Why is it when you are in a session with a couples therapist, she can rattle off a long series of your indiscretions over the past several years? All the while you are struggling to remember the events she is describing much less coming up with your own examples.

This sort of memory gives women a distinct advantage in couples counseling since they have a much better grasp on details of problems and disagreements from the past. She often keeps a scorecard. You usually don't. Her barrage of memories and your silence make it appear that you have no case.

We don't know why women remember and men don't. Maybe it's that men seem to treat their relationship problems and upsets like fishing. When they catch a fish that is too small they simply throw it back in, forget about it, and focus on catching the next one. Most men don't keep score and catalog the small everyday relationship deficiencies. Could it be that men see small indiscretions in relationships as being like the small fish and let them go by just throwing them back in rather then hold on to them and file them into a growing pile of hurts and resentments? Could it be that men are simply forgiving and letting the small stuff go? Perhaps when it comes time for couples therapy the men don't have a huge stockpile of past hurts since they have already let them go while his female partner has a bucket of old hurts which seem geared to prove he is an uncaring sort? You be the judge.

Avoiding Men's Emotional Pain

Also at work are misandrist attitudes that are held by almost everyone in the US culture that have an impact on men in couples treatment. These attitudes are led by the idea that a man's emotional pain is basically taboo. No one wants to touch a man's pain, no one wants to hear a man's pain, no one knows what to do with a man's pain. Men are aware of this distaste for his emotional pain and avoid publicly emoting. No brainer. Men are simply not dumb enough to emote publicly. They know the judgement they would face. Contrast this with the norm for female emotional pain which rather than being taboo is more a call to action.

When people see a tearful women in public the first thing that comes to their mind is "How can I help? Oh, poor thing, she needs support." When they see a tearful man they will often see him as someone dangerous who needs to be avoided. These vastly different responses to men and women's emotional pain has an impact on couples treatment. I have noticed that at least some therapists carry a portion of this bias. Those who do carry it seem unaware. It is obvious that if this bias is present in therapy the man's emotional pain is going to get little attention while the women's emotional pain will likely be the focus of treatment.

Add on to that many couples therapists are female and this will give the female therapist a much better understanding of what it is like to grow up as a girl and be a woman but leaves her devoid of the same understandings about men and boys. She will be more likely to compare him to the female norm she has in her minds eye.

This sort of thing can leave the man terribly misunderstood. I have known men who had huge stressors like recent major surgery, the loss of a job, and the death of a parent all having happened in the previous month and the therapist decides not to focus on his pain but instead focus on the wife's emotional pain from something much less significant. She questions why he hasn't been more attentive to her needs. This simply disenfranchises his reality and reinforces the therapist's and the wife's avoidance of the man's pain. My experience has been that when the men's emotional pain is avoided in therapy the men are left feeling even more bewildered and alone.

***

There is another important and related factor involved in the bias we see in couples therapy. It has to do with sex roles. Women's sex roles have been changing over the last 40-50 years but men's? Not so much. The traditional male sex role calls for him to provide and protect. Specifically, it calls him to do those things for his spouse that provide her with the supplies she needs/wants while also offering her a safe place. This idea of a safe place can and does include the idea of being cared for. If a woman does not feel cared for she is likely not going to feel safe, so it is rolled into one big package for which the man is responsible. Bring her the provisions she needs to do her job and help her feel safe and cared for.

On the other hand, the traditional sex roles of women were to birth, raise, and nurture the children and care for the home. He may get some benefit from this but her focus is not on him, it is on the kids and the home. These roles link the spouses in a very different manner. Her happiness is linked directly to how he performs in his providing and protecting. Does he give her what she wants? Does he give her a safe place? If not, he is open to judgement and criticism from his wife. This is his primary responsibility, to make money to provide and to insure safety. Her needs are his responsibility and his needs and his happiness are not attached in a similar manner. He needs to get the job done first and provide for her. This makes it simple to see the flow of energy in a traditional marriage as being from man to woman, and her flow of energy is from woman to children and/or home.

This gives the woman a platform to judge his success or lack of success in providing for her. It gives her reasons to complain about his failures. Her needs are seen as primary. But what about his needs? No one is responsible. His needs are his problem. There is no one mandated to provide and protect for him. No one. It's easy to see how this plays out in couples therapy. The woman's needs and satisfaction are a primary element. His needs are much less front and center, if they are even dealt with at all.

This being the case it would be easy to see how most couples therapists will have a tendency to focus on her and not so much on him. It would also be more likely that he wouldn't even think of focusing on his needs and wants. He is programmed to care for her needs, not his. Plus, he is graded on how well he performs his providing and protecting for her but she is less likely to receive a grade for her treatment of him. "I can't do everything, I've been taking care of the house and kids."

To make matters worse the man's role of provide and protect leaves him with a mandate to maintain his independence. Being dependent or needy is not acceptable. In order to be the best provider and protector he needs to be independent and he will usually struggle to do so. What do we ask of men in therapy and specifically in couples therapy? We ask them to talk about their problems, their vulnerabilities, and their feelings. All of the above are huge signs of dependency and neediness. So we are asking men to do a 180 degree turn and suddenly they are supposed to just magically be comfortable with showing neediness and dependency.

Women think this should be easy since their roles are not as demanding of them to be independent. In fact what are the old demands of women's roles? Nurturing and caring, right? So just imagine for a moment putting women into a situation where they had to talk in ways that would show they were not nurturing and caring! Would they have an easy time with that? I don't think so. We need to have some compassion for our men and the bind they are placed into by coming into couples therapy.

Therapy is Friendly to Women

Therapy has evolved over the years to be friendly to women. Why? Well, it's pretty simple, women are the ones who come into therapy. Therapists will naturally move towards creating an environment that caters to and welcomes those who are showing up and paying! This is one of the reasons that therapy is based on the more feminine ideas of who is relating to whom and who cares about whom. This is the currency. This is what drives things. In a more masculine environment the currency would more likely be who is governing whom or who is admiring or respecting whom. These are very different spaces.

If you are presently in couples counseling it is likely that your wife is attempting to make the point that you simply don't care about her and she will go through the litany of things you have done that prove you don't care. Caring is the index. She attempts to convince the therapist that you have committed numerous sins of not caring and now need to change your ways and that her negative behaviors are justified by your indiscretions. This puts you into a defensive position.

You spend most of your time defending yourself and trying to rebut her claims about your uncaring behaviors. This is yet another problem for men in couples treatment. They will often find themselves in such a defensive position that they neglect telling their own story, their own needs etc since they are so overwhelmed with just trying to defend themselves.

This sort of imbalanced approach neglects to look at the man's side of things. He probably isn't even thinking about voicing his own needs. It is partly his fault for not bringing things up but he is all too often under water in trying to defend himself and feeling out of place in a world that shows little interest in his needs or his feelings. This pattern has been going on for thousands of years and continues to this day, that women voice what they need in relationship whether it is about their own safety or the provisions they feel they require.

Men do their best to provide what is requested or protect them if they are in danger. Men are then evaluated on their performance. It's easy to see how in couples counseling it would be simple to focus on the woman's complaints and needs and expect the man to step up and meet those needs while at the same time placing his wants and desires a step down. The byproduct of this formula is that men's emotional pain and needs are marginalized and avoided.

Yelling

Another problem that often surfaces is that of volume. Women have a very different threshold for determining when someone is yelling. Two men can be actively and politely arguing a point at what seems to them to be reasonable volumes but if that same tone and volume is used with their wives, she often claims he is yelling. This often frustrates the man no end. He simply says, "I am not yelling." And in his mind this is the objective truth. But remember when entering couples therapy your masculine rules and limits stop being applicable. You have entered a more feminine space.

The biggest danger of this dreaded "you are yelling" meme is that it is sometimes used when the man is making a very good point, a point that can't be easily countered. By claiming he is yelling the focus of the conversation shifts quickly and completely. Now the focus is whether or not he yelled, and how hurt she is that he was yelling at her (remember the keyword is "caring", a caring person wouldn't yell). Now the focus is off his point and instead centers on how hurt she is and his responsibility for it. This is a devastating development and leaves the man feeling ambushed, helpless and completely unheard.

It also importantly lets her off the hook.

Next, we will change gears and look into what a man can do to improve the chances of couples therapy being helpful to him and his relationship in part two.

Dr. Jeff Tarr of Sippy Downs, AU “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 22 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr.Jeff Tarr has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org

From his website drtarr.com:

“Dr Jeff Tarr is a Circumcision and IVF Specialist based at Sunshine Coast Private Hospital in Buderim
Dr Tarr graduated in medicine at the University of Queensland in 1972. He obtained a D. Obs (RCOG) in 1975, and the specialist MRCOG qualification in London in 1980.

He returned to Australia in 1981 , the FRACOG following in 1982 & the FRANZCOG in 1998. He has been in practice as a Specialist Obstetrician / Gynaecologist on the Sunshine Coast since 1982 but retired from these in 2015.

Dr Tarr is a fertility specialist for IVF Sunshine Coast and a Specialist with Queensland Fertility Group, and has performed Circumcisions for over forty years.

He also has extensive experience in Obstetrics (delivered 5000+ babies), laparoscopic surgery and general office gynaecology. His experience in pelvic floor surgery is extensive, having inserted over 1000 permanent & biologic meshes since their inception in 1998.”

Dr. Tarr must think of a baby boy as a dog needing to be fixed, just an animal with no human rights or self-determination.

Doctor – after delivering thousands of babies and mutilating many of them – have you lost your humanity? For shame.

Under “Circumcision” we read:

> Dr Tarr performs circumcision on Sunshine Coast, Queensland. If you are expecting a baby boy in the near future, you may be considering whether or no to have him circumcised. The procedure is often done according to religious or cultural traditions or for personal or medical reasons. Circumcision has always been a debated practice, but in recent years, the controversy surrounding circumcision has grown. If you are considering having your baby boy circumcised, it is important to weigh both the risks and benefits of the procedure so that you can make the best decision for your family. Circumcision is a medical procedure that removes a boy’s foreskin from his penis. The foreskin is a sleeve of skin that covers the lower shaft of the penis, working to protect the head, or “glands” of the penis. Circumcision is typically performed one or two weeks after labor and birth.
> For an extensive online resource on circumcision check out www.circinfo.net/

There are no medical reasons for circumcision, and to perform this risky, unnecessary surgery ritually for religious reasons is unethical. The website given is wildly pro-circumcision produced by the notorious Brian Morris, author of the propaganda pamphlets below.

Under “Circumcision Procedure” we read:

> Your baby’s circumcision will be performed using a Plastibell. This is a small plastic ring which fits inside the foreskin over the head of the penis. A ligature (string) is tied on the outside of the foreskin so that the foreskin is compressed between a deep groove on the ring on the inside and the ligature outside. There are several advantages to this Plastibell technique.
>
> - The clamping cuts off circulation of the foreskin so it should not bleed.
> - Because the circulation is cut off it is difficult for infection to ascend beyond that point.

> - The clamping cuts off the nerve supply so that it should be relatively painless afterwards.
> - Because the Plastibell is sitting over the head of the penis it accurately defines the level at which the circumcision occurs.
> - No dressings are necessary. You can bathe him normally and the ring will drop off of its own accord several days later.
> Some people are under the impression there is no cutting involved but this is not so. It is normal practice to trim off the surplus foreskin above the ligature point as this skin becomes vascular and will die off anyway. Removal of this part of the foreskin is part of the Plastibell procedure so that when the procedure is over circumcision is complete.

Yes, it's as horrible as it sounds, it's not needed, it ruins normal genitals and robs the boy of having a normal sex life with a normal penis.

Under "Deciding on Circumcision" we see:

> Circumcision is a highly personal decision that your and your partner must make together.
>
> Here are some tips to help you make the right decision for your child:
>
> Make an appointment to talk about circumcision.
> Talk with other parents who have had the procedure performed on their children.
> Watch a circumcision being performed, either in person or on videotape.
> Be sure to consider your religious beliefs and cultural attitudes.
> Reduced Sexual Enjoyment: The foreskin contains highly sensitive nerve endings which help to increase lubrication and enjoyment during sexual intercourse.
> Increased Hygiene Care after Birth: Circumcision may actually increase the amount of personal care you give your child after birth. The wound must be carefully cleaned and bandaged to prevent infection.
> Some parents may also be against circumcision as they view the practice as a type of mutilation, instead preferring to let their child make the decision whether or not they would like to be circumcised when they are older.

Please heed the doctor's warning: watch a circumcision, respect your son's "sexual enjoyment," and let him "make the decision."

Listed are some ridiculous pro-circumcision propaganda that would be funny if not so tragic:

"Sex and male circumcision: What every woman needs to know"

And from the brochure "Have you heard about the benefits of Circumcision" we have this gem:

> In conclusion
> Circumcision confers a lifetime of medical benefits. Many uncircumcised males will develop a medical condition leading to suffering and, in some cases, even death. In contrast, circumcision can prevent most of these medical conditions. The surgical risk from medical circumcision in a modern setting is extremely low, while the long-term functional and cosmetic outcomes are generally excellent.

All lies, unfortunately.

Since Dr. Read has incomplete information about circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr E.J. Tarr
Ochre Health Medical Centre,
9 Ochre Way
Sippy Downs QLD 4556
Phone: 07 5373 0700

> Dr. Jeff Tarr of Sippy Downs, AU "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/9sUClqcC2a #circumcision #MGM pic.twitter.com/jzlLiuGkIB
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) June 22, 2017

Interview with Joakim Ramstedt, Swedish Fathers' Rights Activist

AVfM Video Source · 23 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Our own Lucian Vâlsan traveled to Sweden earlier this month to document the situation in the most feminist country in Europe.
Among other people, Lucian got to interview Joakim Ramstedt, at one moment the operator of the biggest political blog in Sweden.
Most of the interview is focused on sexual politics, fathers' rights and the iron fist of feminist governance exercised by Swedish feminists.

For other videos from Sweden, check out this playlist.
You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Red pill isolation

Paul Elam · 24 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's not going to come as any great surprise to red pill men that the red pill life isn't all roses. We enjoy the freedom that comes with it; the escape from chivalry, hypergamy and other artifacts of gynocentrism. We enjoy the fact that we are not bound to knee-jerk white knighting and slobbering endorsement of whatever glory du jour is being lavished on women because they can tie their shoes as well as a man. Most of us know that we will never, or at least never again, face the perils of family court and that we won't be sweating the bills to support women who think that showing up with a vagina is the only requirement they have in a relationship.

Even those of us in relationships, if our red pill dosage is sufficient, never worry about the hysterical wrath of a woman scorned, and we don't bother ourselves satisfying a woman's childish demands. We are perfectly prepared to invite her to seek that kind of satisfaction elsewhere, from someone else self-loathing enough to bend to that kind of infantile pressure. We don't sleep on sofas because a woman is displeased, and we don't retreat into a doghouse for anyone. In short, as far as lives go, it's a pretty good one.

If you sense a but coming, you do so correctly.

There is another side to red pill life. A cost that comes with the shattering of the old paradigm. I've covered this in the past, writing on red pill rage and red pill grief, both familiar topics to red pill men. In those efforts, I did my best to paint the picture of both phenomena as processes, with anger and grief both being transient states for the most part. We can get stuck in either with results that are counter-productive, but in general, we expect them to pass and we expect to move on to a less angry, less depressed state of being.

This article is about one of the things that can keep us stuck in both grief and anger, that can retard our efforts to move on. I'll call it red pill isolation. I think it is a pretty good label because it precisely describes the problem. And unlike red pill rage or grief, it isn't a process. It's not something that will just resolve on its own with time. It is a problem that you must fix in one way or another. The problem with the red pill awakening is that it takes you out of sync with a massive part of life that, for better or worse, is all you've known.

It truly makes you feel like the odd man in the crowd. Being completely open with people around you, talking about what you think and how you feel almost completely assures social rejection. Try being in a mixed group of men and women and saying you think chivalry is for chumps and see what happens. Try saying that only an idiot would marry a woman. Or just wear a t-shirt in public that says, "Men's Rights are Human Rights" or "MGTOW for Life", two innocuous, healthy statements that are held in disdain by the world around you.

For that matter, consider how many family members react to their own who make the red pill change. Mothers clutch pearls. Fathers show disappointment and contempt. Siblings shake their heads and judge. I see it here in the comments and get emails on a regular basis about how going red pill creates hardship and division between family members. I hear a lot more frequently about men who opt to say nothing to friends and family about their red pill experience because they can easily predict a hostile reaction, followed by some form of rejection.

The same is even truer in the employment setting. In workplaces, where employees even banter about subjects like politics, you won't find men speaking a word on their thoughts about hypergamy and gynocentrism. And they are wise to remain silent. You'd stand a better shot staying employed talking about your retail meth business than to come to work with your opinions about the dangers of being vulnerable to the average woman. There is no other way to put it. If you are red pill, you are pariah. Though I expect no one needed to tell you that.

It's why you see so many red pill men online who take great care to keep their identity hidden. Nobody wants the trashing of their reputation that comes with a lack of this kind of conformity. And to whatever degree you do choose to reveal who you are to the world around you there will be a price to pay for it. One look at the mainstream media's coverage of MRAs and MGTOW tell you everything you need to know.

This isolation, the red pill isolation, isn't a process that will resolve on its own. It is not a stage to pass through on the way to something better. And it has very serious implications for those whom it affects. You can see some of the attempts to compensate for this in the comments on this website and others that deal with the same subject matter. Most of these comments, while understandable, are lacking.

It's going to take a lot more than video games, porn, sexbots, YouTube, and online MGTOW buddies to solve the problem.

In fact, if we are not careful, some of those understandable alternatives to human contact can become unhealthy allies in our quest to fill in the missing gaps. Human beings, with very few exceptions, need other human beings. In fact, if you look at this chart of Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs, also known as Maslow's ladder, you see the basic, or what we call deficiency needs. Food, water, shelter, safety and physical security.

[image]

The very next level up on the pyramid is the psychological needs. Belonging, social connection, intimacy, love. I note that Maslow was astute enough to not have included marriage in his hierarchy, and sure enough, marriage isn't required for psychological health. In fact, in these times it can be a significant contributor in men for the loss of psychological health. But the need for people, for social connection and acceptance, is an undeniable constant. And we would be less than honest, practicing a blind refusal to follow the evidence, to come to any other conclusion than the fact that the red pill awakening puts those badly needed things in peril.

It would be easy at this point, understandable even, to conclude that ignorance is bliss; that the price to pay for enlightenment about the real nature of sexual politics is too great. That we are just better off with blue pills and life on the sexual plantation. I am not buying that, though. First, there is not much we can do about the enlightening. You can't unswallow the red pill. Like it or not, you've turned on the lights in the room, and at this point, there is no turning them off.

Second. The fact that 99% of the people around you are walking around in a fog of sexual indoctrination doesn't mean their psychological needs are being met either. Performing like a circus animal for your dinner doesn't make the meal nutritious. Men who sell out their self-respect and their dignity to please women aren't getting their psychological needs met. They are getting pats on the head from their trainers, and they have to invest a lot of energy in the fantasy of being loved.

I am convinced this is at the root of a lot of depression for married men. Or, as the noted psychiatrist RD Laing said, "The person who does not act in reality and only acts in phantasy[sic] becomes himself unreal. The actual 'world' for that person becomes shrunken and impoverished."

We see those fantasies shattered a million times a year in our family courts. That is the more obvious manifestation of the problem. More commonly, but perhaps less visibly, we see the result in the darkness of that shrunken, impoverished world. We have seen it in men who have simply died inside after struggling for years to maintain the illusion of being loved and valued, in marriages that constantly rub their faces in the fact that they are neither. We see it in that common consequence of marriage; the deterioration of social support for the man. The withering of all of men's psychological needs.

Sure, there are some marriages that turn out much better than this. But a growing number of men are figuring out that rolling the dice on that isn't a good gamble in 2017. And there are certainly families healthy enough to embrace the person, even if they can't or won't embrace their ideas. But again, the audience for red pill thinking doesn't typically come from these unicorns of family health.

I say all that to point out that gratifying the true human psychological needs isn't easy for anyone. We all yearn for human connection, affection and belonging, yet can quite commonly feel like we are missing the boat. Even in the age of social media, with access to other people previously unimaginable, we seem to be drifting further and further apart from each other. In the middle of all this darkness, I think there is a point of light for red pill men. Red pill men should have the easier go of this hard road because their relationships aren't grounded in fantasy. They have been down that path and seen it fall apart. Indeed, that is what brought many to this place.

And they have a job ahead of them in carving out a place in life where the needs for social connection are not met at the cost of living lies. Sadly, I think the trauma that so often leads men to go their own way, also sours them on humanity. Thus, we see the push for the artificial remedies of a virtual existence. And while no one in their right mind would stand in harsh judgment about men seeking refuge in those things, our need for each other remains as it always has. Maslow's ladder withstood the test of time.

Obviously, each man who beats the red pill isolation will have his own way of doing it. I think though, if my own path is any indication, that it requires the willingness to risk, to roll the dice on people, even though people are more often a source of disappointment than satisfaction. That reality only proves that we face the same dilemmas as blue pill men, only our radar for the disappointments is a little sharper.

The point about Maslow's ladder is that it charts the path to human self-actualization, or the realization of achieving your full human potential, including, importantly, the creative elements of your existence. Maslow's contention was that each rung on that ladder is essential to getting to the next level up. There is no skipping past one part on the way to the other. We need human contact, approval, acceptance, and love in whatever form that comes, lest we remain stuck at the level of deficiency needs, chained to an existence that can only be defined as meaningless. I think he was right.

We don't need commitment to women to forge that path, but we do need people. It is my hope, for the men who consume the red pill that they keep that constant in their journey. That in coming to avoid that which has harmed them in life, they don't cut themselves off from the things and from the people, that will heal them.

I'm not saying it's easy. I'm just saying there is nowhere else to go.

Nutrition for mental health: The importance of protein

Aaron Mello · 27 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This is my first post for AVfM. I'll be writing about men's health and nutrition, and nutrition for mental health in particular. Many men who are dealing with the kinds of problems we discuss on AVfM also experience depression or anxiety. Whether their situation involves a vindictive ex wife, domestic violence, or something else entirely, mental health problems are often a result.

I focus on helping men improve both their mental and physical health through nutrition. I realized Paul Elam is already aware of the importance of healthy food when he put out his video "White Food is Evil" last year. I want to expand on his ideas and provide more detailed, useful information that men can implement in their own lives to improve their health and manage their mood.

If you find yourself in a trying situation like a biased battle in family court it's easy to fall into a diet of fast food or just skipping meals. But you need to be as clear-headed as possible to give yourself every advantage you can. That means eating good food! Today I'm going to talk about the importance of protein when it comes to mental health. Protein is a natural mood stabilizer and I'll explain the science behind this shortly.

A little bit about me

But first, so you know I'm not full of shit, let me tell you briefly about myself and where I come from. I became a Master Nutrition Therapist after my own experience with bipolar disorder in my early 20s, during which time I went through a suicidal psychiatric nightmare. I took more psychiatric medications than I can recall, I was hospitalized in both outpatient and inpatient programs, and I even tried electroconvulsive therapy (ECT) before figuring out that the missing link in my debilitating depression was a junk food diet.

By fixing my diet and nutrition I was able to recover from my illness and go back to work after years of being too sick. I was so inspired by my recovery that I quit my previous career in IT and went to school to become a Nutrition Therapist so I could bring nutrition for mental health to other men who are suffering. After recovering enough to go back to work, I became interested in the men's rights movement when I discovered a second causative factor in my depression was internalized misandry. Misandry had led me to conclude that I had no positive role to play in the world as a "patriarchal oppressor" and I realized I had to unlearn that toxic self-flagellating bullshit in order to truly recover.

I won't bore you too much with the details of my story. I just want to make it clear that I'm not some male feminist in disguise, here to tell you to talk more about your feelings like a woman would while eating celery sticks and drinking herbal tea. I know how devastating depression can be, and how misandry can twist the knife and make you feel like you don't even deserve to get better.

We all know the hateful feminists who want men to kill themselves are out there and I believe one of the best ways we can fight back is to take care of ourselves by looking after our health. I tell men, "fix your biochemistry and you will fix your mood." When you've got that solid biochemical foundation through good nutrition, you are that much more capable of fighting gynocentrism and feminist misandry.

The importance of protein

These days a lot of self-professed "nutrition experts" will tell you about the benefits of what they call a "plant-based diet," which is really just a euphemism for a vegetarian or vegan diet. And if you're dealing with depression or anxiety, that is about the worst diet you could choose. Vegetables are important and many people don't eat enough. But that doesn't mean the solution is not to eat any meat. As I said earlier, protein is a natural mood stabilizer, so it's important to eat adequate protein with each meal. That doesn't mean you need to eat a steak the size of your plate, but a moderate portion of quality meat is important to keep mood stable.

[image]

Protein stabilizes mood through several mechanisms. For one, it slows the metabolism of refined carbohydrates, which can lead to a blood sugar rollercoaster that can exacerbate mood issues. Protein helps keep blood sugar more stable, as do healthy fats. In a future post I'll write more about the role of healthy fats in a stable mood, but for now just remember that every meal should include adequate protein as well as some healthy fats, like avocado, nuts and seeds, coconut oil, and/or butter.

In addition to stabilizing blood sugar, protein plays an essential role in mood by providing the amino acids from which the body builds neurotransmitters like serotonin and dopamine. If you've ever gone to a medical doctor or psychiatrist for help with depression, chances are s/he offered to put you on a "selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor" (SSRI) antidepressant such as Prozac, Zoloft or Paxil. These drugs work by boosting serotonin in the brain. Some other SNRI antidepressants work by increasing norepinephrine, which is related to dopamine.

What you might not know is that these neurotransmitters are all made out of amino acids, which are the building blocks of protein. You can probably see begin to see why adequate protein is so important for men dealing with depression, and why a vegetarian or vegan diet is probably not a good choice for a guy in this situation. In addition to being important for building muscle, the amino acids which make up your steak, fish or chicken breast literally become the neurotransmitters which promote a stable mood and alleviate depression.

Tryptophan and serotonin

You've probably heard of tryptophan in the context of your Thanksgiving dinner and the drowsiness you feel after eating a heaping portion of the Thanksgiving turkey. This is not just an urban legend. Turkey is a good source of the amino acid tryptophan, which is converted in the body into serotonin, which promotes feelings of happiness, contentment and relaxation. And in fact, some serotonin is further converted into melatonin, a primary sleep hormone which some insomniacs supplement in order to sleep better. If you've experienced that blissful post-Thanksgiving happy drowsy feeling, you've felt the power of tryptophan in promoting a good mood.

Tyrosine, dopamine, epinephrine and norepinephrine

Tyrosine is another important amino acid, especially for people with what I call "blah" depression, a type of depression characterized by low energy, low enthusiasm, and difficulty concentrating. Tyrosine is converted into dopamine in the body, which helps with energy and focus. Some tyrosine is further converted into adrenaline, also known as epinephrine, which is what courses through your blood when you're racing a motorcycle or driving go-karts with your kids. It's what helps you make split-second decisions and is sometimes referred to as the "fight or flight" hormone. If your depression is the "blah" type, low tyrosine might be at the root of your struggles.

Boost your digestive fire

If you're struggling with depression, it's worth taking a look at your diet. If you're on a low-protein diet or if you skip meals, simply eating protein with every meal may be a good starting point to get back on the right track. And for most people, a reasonable portion of animal protein is the best source of these crucial amino acids. Some preachy vegans might tell you that animal protein is hard to digest, and they do have a point. It does take good, strong stomach acid to digest protein. But that doesn't mean you should give it up. Instead, strengthen your digestion.

An easy way to strengthen your digestive fire is to boost stomach acid by drinking fresh squeezed lemon juice or organic apple cider vinegar in your water shortly before a meal. If you're at a restaurant, just ask for lemon slices to squeeze into your water at the beginning of your meal. If eating meat tends to give you heartburn or you feel like you have a rock in your stomach after eating a big meal, boosting your stomach acid will probably help, as heartburn is paradoxically often a result of too little stomach acid, not too much. Important: if you are on an acid blocking medication for hearburn or GERD, do not try this step without first talking to your doctor or a Nutrition Therapist!

Picking healthy proteins

When I say to include adequate healthy protein in your diet, I'm not talking about Spam or hot dogs. Healthy proteins are real meat that is minimally processed. Here are some things to look for when preparing meals and picking out healthy protein at the grocery store:

- Pick an appropriate serving size: A piece of meat about the size of the palm of your hand
- Eat protein with every meal
- Emphasize beef, lamb, bison, chicken, turkey and cold-water fish like wild-caught salmon
- Eat real meat, not processed "meat products" like hot dogs
- Choose organic meat whenever possible (yes, it really does matter)
- Look for grass-fed or pasture-raised options
- Eat eggs that are labeled pasture-raised, not just "cage free"

In conclusion

Eating adequate protein is an important component of supporting a healthy mood through diet. If you're on a vegetarian or vegan diet, try reintroducing meat. You might be surprised how much better you begin to feel! Taking care of your health is something you can all do to help us all combat the gynocentric feminist juggernaut that seeks to destroy men and masculinity.

Otto Warmbier, Philando Castile, and the out-group derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 29 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Otto Warmbier

Typically, when a human being dies, no matter how despicable, their families are awarded the ability to grieve, and the departed is granted some dignity. (See: Death and Funeral of Richard Nixon) This however, is not true when we believe the departed or their family to be subhuman. People we believe we are superior to are known to social scientists as an out-group.

Out-group members (a.k.a. "them") when viewed by in-group members (a.k.a. "us") are not perceived as individuals, but as part of a subhuman group. All humans are subject to in-group/out-group dynamics. All out-groups are perceived as non-individual, subhuman examples of their group's stereotype.

When bad things happen to out-group members, including death, in-group members justify the suffering and claim that the group is the cause of their own misfortune. Usually, this will be justified by alluding to the behaviors of the stereotype.

For example, the New York Post reported that 62 year-old Professor Dettwyler, an Anthropologist from Delaware, apparently did not recognize Otto Warmbier, the young American who'd died days before, as part of her in-group. Her comments regarding the young man's death (after stealing a N. Korean New Year's Eve Poster) are a perfect example of in-group behavior. According to the article, she suggested that the young man, "Got exactly what he deserved".

She went on to discuss how he was not an individual, but a representation of the stereotype. She said, "These are the same kids who cry about their grades because they didn't think they'd really have to read and study the material to get a good grade".

She then, in nearly textbook fashion, lays the blame on his parents for his indiscretion. She warns others, "His parents ultimately are to blame for his growing up thinking he could get away with whatever he wanted," she continued.

Perhaps, in the most surprising twist, she conflates his death with actions she attributes to his out-group, "Maybe in the US, where young, white, rich, clueless white males routinely get away with raping women. Not so much in North Korea." She further admonishes the parents for their poor parenting and clarifies that they also deserve what they get, "And of course, it's Otto's parents who will pay the price for the rest of their lives.".

All of these comments are what is known to social scientists as out-group derogation. Derogation is subtracting, removing, debasing, and/or dehumanizing by applying a group stereotype. This is often done without prejudice.

Philando Castile

In the US, when a black man is shot by police, the local media usually runs the highest quality, most easily accessible image. More often than not, this is conveniently supplied by the government. One reason the media might run that image versus a social media image is that seeing a mugshot makes some people more comfortable that the system is working just fine and that the world is a just place to live in.

In other words, when they see a black man's mug shot, they rationalize that the stereotyped person deserved whatever they got because "all of them" are like that. It's considered bad or racist to think of a black *man a*s deserving to die, but it's less disturbing to think that about a black "criminal." Black criminals are an out-group, and as such are perceived implicitly or explicitly by the majority of Americans as subhuman.

In the case of Philando Castile, there was no mug shot available from the government. Philando Castile had never been arrested, ever, for anything. Philando Castile was a model citizen. Philando Castile beat the odds of a system that was stacked against him from the beginning. Philando Castile was a hard working union member. Philando Castile remembered the food allergies of the kids he served lunch at a St. Paul Public School. Philando Castile supported his girlfriend, and loved her little girl as if she were his own.

Philando Castile was an awesome man, by all accounts, one that any community would be happy to call their own. This all ended in 2016, because a police officer became frightened because "the car he pulled over smelled like pot." Philando Castile was shot and killed while surrendering a legal, licensed firearm in the course of the classic government shakedown technique known as a Routine Traffic Stop.

His entire family was destroyed on Facebook Live when a St. Anthony Police Officer misjudged his attempt to reveal and surrender his legal and licensed firearm as a threat. Philando Castile was killed over a misunderstanding, based on a stereotype.

If you think Philando Castile "got what he had coming" or if you believe Philando Castile "acted like a stereotypical black man" and that was probably the reason he was shot, YOU ARE AN IGNORANT RACIST WHO CAN NOT SEE PAST YOUR OWN OUT-GROUP BIAS TO RECOGNIZE INDIVIDUAL HUMANITY. YOU SUCK.

It's easy to understand why ignorant racists might think these types of thoughts, or post them to social media. They're ignorant and they're racists. Racists are proud of being a certain type of stupid.

Prof. Dettwyler's statements, however, unveil a surprising insight; Even a social scientist with a sophisticated understanding of in-group dynamics and out-group derogation can fall victim to the all-too-human trappings of social bias. If an Anthropology Professor could fall into such a textbook case of out-group derogation, should it be surprising that mainstream media outlets echoed her sentiments?

What could the impacts be for law enforcement, the court systems, or even social work and education?

In a series of articles for A Voice for Men we'll explore the remarkable science of grossness, (parasite and pathogen stress) and explore its role in human group dynamics. We'll also explore how men, as a group, may be at greater risk of out-group derogation.

Warning: While there are gross topics covered in these articles, nothing is more disturbing than the deaths these two men faced or the bigoted responses their deaths elicited from in-group members.

To read all of the articles in this series:
Article #1 – Otto Warmbier, Philando Castile and the Outgroup Derogation of Men Article #2 – Grossness as a Human Value Indicator Article #3 – A Weak Case for the Humanity of Men
Article #4 – Oh Fuck; We're Doomed and Only Women Can Save the Day Article #5 – Philando Castile, Justine Damond, and the In-Group Bias Toward Woman

Why you should never breed with a BPD woman

Paul Elam · 30 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

OK, so I'm writing another article for men about women with Borderline Personality Disorder. This time, unlike others, I am not issuing a disclaimer for the sake of those who have the disorder.

That said, most of my other material has focused on why men should avoid relationships with these women. I've outlined the likelihood for the potential hazards borderlines bring with them. Chronic manipulation, false accusations of physical and sexual abuse, self-mutilation, suicide "attempts," substance abuse and infidelity are just some of a string of possible living nightmares that await you in any relationship you might have with one of these women.

And as hazardous as being attached to a borderline can be, it only gets worse when you break up with or divorce one. As always, my first and only real suggested reaction to encountering borderline women in your relationship life is to run like Forest Gump.

However, let's assume for a moment that you lack the sense to not run into a minefield wearing snow shoes. Perhaps the allure of the crazy hot sex is just too much. Maybe she has love bombed you Hiroshima-style and you are sitting up on that savior's perch she built for you, stupidly confident that she will never knock you off. Maybe you just need to be a white knight, being as you can't handle birds with intact wings. Stranger things have happened.

But if none of the pitfalls of being tethered to a borderline woman is enough to dissuade you from taking that kind of plunge in life, I am hoping the information you are about to read will at least give you a contemplative pause before you ever entertain the idea of breeding with one of these women.

And in case you are wondering, it's not because of the potential for child support, parental alienation and the other side effects of breeding with your average cluster B, though those things are certainly on the table.

What I am talking about is the physical health and developmental well-being of your child, both of which are placed in jeopardy when a child has a mother with borderline personality disorder –from the moment they are conceived. Borderlines have an unfortunate tendency to smoke, drink and drug their babies into premature delivery, low birth weight and birth defects like fetal alcohol syndrome. Not to put too fine a point on it – borderlines are just plain bad for children, during pregnancy and every day afterward. This isn't a matter of speculation on my part. What I am about to tell you comes straight from medical and psychological research.

We will begin with a 2015 study on Perinatal Psychiatry by The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists titled, "Borderline Personality Disorder in the Perinatal Period: Early Infant and Maternal Outcomes" (sorry, paywall). They utilized a control group of 14,313 women classified as healthy and an experimental group of 42 women with a clinical diagnoses of Borderline Personality Disorder. Both groups were studied over the same period of time in the same medical facility. From the results, we start to get a picture of life for the child of a mother with borderline personality, from the point of being a newborn and on into late infancy.

From the paper:

> Results: Women presenting for obstetric services with a clinical diagnosis of Borderline Personality Disorder experienced considerable psychosocial impairment. They anticipated birth as traumatic and frequently requested early delivery. High comorbidity with substance abuse was found and high rates of referral to child protective services. Mothers with Borderline Personality Disorder were significantly more likely to have negative birth outcomes such as lowered Apgar scores, prematurity, and special care nursery referral when compared with controls.

A few brief explanations are required for some of the terminology used in this description.

Psychosocial impairment, also known as psychosocial dysfunction or psychosocial morbidity, refers to abnormal emotional and cognitive features of a person's personality. As you will see going forward, this can have a profound, negative impact on maternal functioning and subsequently on your child's psychological development.

Comorbidity, in the psychiatric sense, simply means the simultaneous presence to two or more psychopathologies in one person. In the case of borderline personality, we frequently find comorbidity with substance abuse, depression, and other disorders.

Apgar scores measure your child's physical health at birth, assessing heart rate, respiratory effort, muscle tone, response to stimulation, and skin coloration. Apgar scores are actually the results of two tests, one at one minute after birth and another at 5 minutes after birth. The one minute test assesses how well the infant tolerated delivery. The five-minute test determines how the infant is faring outside the womb.

On average, the children of borderline mothers score lower on both tests. This is significant, as the study results show that babies born to borderline mothers are more than twice as likely to have physical complications that require placement in neonatal intensive care units or specialized skilled nursing facilities. Fully one-third, 33.3% of newborns to borderline mothers required specialized placement. 12.6% of the control infants scored lower than 7 on Apgar assessment compared to 25% of infants from borderline mothers. Again, more than twice the risk.

Unfortunately, that is not where the problem ends, it is where it starts. Once the birthing process is done there are developmental perils facing the children of borderline mothers that occur during the crucial time of early infancy. To start getting a picture of this, I refer you to the British Journal of Psychiatry in a study titled, "How Mothers with Borderline Personality Disorder Relate to Their Year-Old Infants" The study primarily concerns itself with the consistency and stability of the mother's emotional bonding with their infants.

The results were unsurprising given the pronounced instability in relationships demonstrated by borderlines with other adults. Reading from the study, they concluded that "…a higher proportion (85%) of women with borderline personality disorder than comparison groups showed disrupted affective (or emotional) communication with their infants.

They were also distinguished by the prevalence of frightened/disoriented behavior." They went on to say in their conclusions that, "Maternal borderline personality disorder is associated with dysregulated mother-infant communication."

To understand the real-world implications of this clinical language, and to reframe it in a more plainspoken vernacular, I refer to the Encyclopedia of Child Behavior and Development, and to their definition of the synonymous, Disorganized/Disoriented Attachment.

From their web page, it is, they inform us that, "… a child who exhibits behavioral disorganization or disorientation in the form of wandering, confused expressions, freezing, undirected movements, or contradictory (i.e. "unorganized") patterns of interaction with a caregiver. Most of these children have histories of maltreatment and may exhibit fear of the caregiver."

Another paper from the British Journal of Psychiatry that explores the unhealthy impact of borderline mothers on the development of their infant children is titled, "Still Face Interactions Between Mothers with Borderline Personality and their 2-month-old infants." The paper's authors described the borderline mothers who participated in the testing as, "intrusively insensitive" toward their infants.

The infants in the study were noted to have, "increased looking away and dazed looks." They also said that the interactions for the infants were less satisfying and that the infants demonstrated lowered affect after the still face interactions. In other words, the infants began shutting down, emotionally.

To illustrate this more clearly, let's take a look at the following short video, demonstrating what happens to the infant's state of mind when the mother presents affectively consistent with what we would see in borderline mothers.

At this sensitive stage in life, the interactions of a child with his or her borderline mother are quite possibly damaging. If you've ever had ongoing interactions with a borderline woman, then you know the destructive effect they can have on the individuals with which they have formed an emotional bond. These studies imply the possibility that even in the nonverbal realm of communication with their own infants, love, or even maternal instincts don't override the pathology to provide protection for the child.

If you use this information to form a template for what the child can expect over the term of its developmental life, it would be entirely reasonable to see it as predictive of multiple ongoing blows to the child's mental health.

Compare now what we know of the children of borderline mothers to those not suffering from disorganized attachment. Children of healthy mothers show distress upon separation from mother, not from her presence. Mothers of securely attached infants can quickly have a soothing effect on their children when distressed. Not so when the attachment is disorganized, as it is with borderline mothers.

It is very important here to point out something about the groupings in the Australian study. The group labeled "healthy" might have been better-named non-borderline, as it included a variety of psychopathologies other than borderline personality, including major depression and schizophrenia. The control group did not screen out these other disorders.

Obviously, and as the studies concluded, the borderline patient presents some real challenges for obstetricians and related health professionals providing neonatal care. It is imperative that services be shaped to address the added risks that come with these patients, for the patients themselves, and for their children.

It is also vitally important to reach out to men contemplating fatherhood with this information. They need to be able to make informed decisions that will give them the best shot at providing a healthy start for their children.

President Trump, Psycho Joe Scarborough and Mika “Facelift” Brzezinski

Paul Elam · 2 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Most of the time I steer away from politics in my work. It’s not from a lack of political convictions. I have plenty. I’ve just never seen mainstream political banter as particularly relevant to the men’s movement. All I have ever seen of mainstream politics is bullshit on both sides, almost all of it being spread at the expense of men.

On the left, we have feminism and statism, and on the right, traditional gynocentrism and, you guessed it, more statism. Watching Democrats and Republicans put on their dog and pony show of manufactured ideological grandstanding lost its entertainment value for me about 20 years ago. Somehow, the spectacle of two crime families fighting with each other for the right to spend my money doesn’t have much appeal as a pastime anymore. It seems like a pointless battle, so I usually stay out of it.

Once in a while, though, the political news cycle delivers the perfect storm. It seems to be happening a little more frequently with Trump in office. The latest brouhaha that sent the Washington press corps and both political parties into a meltdown comes predictably from President Trump’s Twitter feed.

In an apparent reaction to MSNBC’s Morning Joe co-host Mika Brzezinski’s continuous stream of personal invective against him, Trump, in true Trump fashion, punched back hard. In two consecutive tweets, Trump said, “I heard poorly rated @Morning_Joe speaks badly of me (don’t watch anymore). Then how come low I.Q. Crazy Mika, along with Psycho Joe, came to Mar-a-Lago 3 nights in a row around New Year’s Eve and insisted on joining me. She was bleeding badly from a face-lift. I said no!”

The effect was instantaneous and traumatic. CNN and MSNBC launched into a spontaneous apocalypse of moral outrage. The Washington Post opined about how the tweets disempowered women everywhere. Joe and Mika put their vacation on hold for a whole day to return to work so they could make a heroic stand against literally Hitler. Even Shepherd Smith, FOX NEWS’ resident token butthurt liberal, shuffled his deck of gender cards and dealt so hard it threatened to make his mascara run.

Predictably, Nancy Pelosi, echoing the sentiments of everyone with a D behind their name and something ambiguous between their legs, was incensed. “It’s really sad,” she sniffed at the cameras. “This is the president of the United States. Something’s wrong there.”

And then there were the Republicans. And by Republicans, I mean weak, cowardly facsimiles of men who defined New York Second by how long it took them to throw Trump under the bus the moment he was falsely accused of offending the sacred institution of womanhood.

RINO Lindsay Graham said that the tweet was beneath the office of the president. Paul Ryan condemned it. FOX NEWS’ Greg Gutfeld said he didn’t like it and Jesse Waters called it ungentlemanly as co-hosts Kimberly Guilfoyle and Dana Perino nodded and smiled in privileged approval. All this because Trump fired back personal insults at a woman and a man who have built a mediocre career on calling the president everything under the sun except Mr. President.

Oh, wait. That is not exactly right. Trump insulted both of them. He called Joe Scarborough a psycho, a pretty personal insult. But, of course, no one really gives a damn about that. Joe has a penis. No place on the outrage bandwagon for him. A woman has been insulted. Trump took a shot at her vanity. He shamed her for petty shallowness, which of course does, in the real world, touch a nerve with women everywhere.

God Damn, I love this man.

Six months into his administration and he is already the best president since Lincoln. And I don’t say that from a political perspective. I say it as a men’s advocate. Donald Trump is doing more for men’s mental health than Sigmund Freud could have ever dreamed.

Trump's presidential saga is a microcosm; a story that has been told in the lives of men everywhere for the last 50 years. A plainspoken real estate developer from Queens, Trump realized white collar ambitions without ever shedding a bit of his blue-collar mentality. He's successful, salty, straightforward and unrepentant. He's everything feminists hate about men. Everything they take such delight in attacking and everything they wish they could be, but can't.

He has the qualities that most men aspire to, and to which so many men are shying away from publicly because feminists have been successful in demonizing those qualities. He's the kind of man male politicians lack the guts or integrity to be.

He isn't, of course, without faults. He white knights at times, which I suspect is more out of political expediency than anything else. But despite that, there is one thing he never surrenders. He never quits being Donald Trump.

They have been attacking him savagely since the moment he set foot in the political arena. They have gone after his family, fired salvos at his character, made fun of his body, including his, uh, hand size. They have made repetitive references to killing him. They have talked impeachment since before he was even sworn in. And he has had almost no meaningful backing from obsequious quislings that now dominate the Republican Party.

His response to all of this? A big fat "fuck you" to anyone who doesn't like him.

I could never put myself on the same level with a man who carried balls that big, but I have to admit that part of my admiration for The Donald is based in identifying with his style, and with the cost. Donald Trump is standing up in front of the whole world and defiantly doing what men should have been doing in response to gynocentric shaming for the last half-century. He is showing the guts that most men only wish they had. The kind of guts, if shown by even a tenth of other men, would have put me out of work as an MRA before I ever became one.

If more men were like Donald Trump, feminism would have been stillborn.

One of the things that his sheepish, fair weather supporters have criticized about his tweets is that they claim it distracts from the accomplishments he is making on his agenda. They pointed out how when the news cycle should have been focusing on how he was winning the PR war with CNN, and the travel ban going into effect, that he derailed it all with his tweet to Psycho Joe and Facelift Mika.

I don't buy that crap. First, the news cycle? Please. That is for mainstream, blue pill zombies. It's garbage in, garbage out. They weren't covering the news I cared about anyway. I had to go to an alternative news source like PJ Media to read that the Trump administration has started the process of dismantling the organized sexual assault witch hunts targeting young men on college campuses that have been going on since 2011 under the previous administration. Nobody in the mainstream news is giving it any attention to speak of, largely for the same reason you never saw a single Republican with the sack to ante up and speak about it, until Donald Trump came along. Nobody in Washington was doing shit for men until we elected a president with the appropriate number of fucks he didn't give.

It is what we should all be doing.

Like I said, I don't usually address mainstream politics in my work. And perhaps this time isn't much different. I don't really see Trump as a politician. He is more like an anti-politician wrecking ball with a dim view of all the rules that effectively gag lesser men, which is pretty much all of them.

To tell the truth, he is not even a Republican. And I'd vote for him with any letter behind his name. He is not the solution to all of our problems, but he is the template for men to follow in their own lives if they want to see so many of the problems we are concerned about going away.

Donald Trump is the closest thing we will ever have to an MRA President. Big League.

How do we define healing?

Jim Thompson · 4 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I am a man of some seventy one summers, single and with an active life. I work part time and have several creative and fulfilling hobbies. I am a supervisor for one of the morning sessions in our local Mens Shed. I read and study a wide range of technical literature and online forums and technical publications. I would describe myself as something of a polymath. My interests range from the Enneagram, psychology to electronics and composite construction methods as used in aerospace, just to name a few.

I mention this to indicate that my days are very full. I have the sense of a certain urgency to learn a lot while being aware that my time is limited. The older I get, this sense grows stronger. Carpe Diem is the expressions that sums up this feeling. Not at all uncommon for us older folks.

I have a very good woman friend who has been quietly but consistently trying to get me to go out on various social occasions, film screenings and such. She is persuasive to this end; something that I appreciate the spirit of. Not for the reasons that I think that it will work by her definition, but because of the expression of care, consideration and love that it conveys. I will refer to my woman friend as M.

I had told her some weeks ago that she probably did not realise just how radicalised I had become over the last ten years or so. I use the term radicalised here to refer to the degree of Red Pill awareness that I had accumulated over this time. However our following discussion, which I will relate later, may have convinced her to some extent.

I have started to go out to lunch once a week with M and some of her women friends. During one conversations with them, the subject of relationships was, inevitably, discussed. I then stated quite simply that I would never live with a woman again. My friend M said quite sharply and dismissively; “you’re fucked then”!

I said nothing at the time, as others were talking and I was a bit stunned. Besides, I knew my response required some considerable thought to articulate it well and convincingly. So I went away and thought about it for the rest of the week.

The next week we met for lunch, it was only me and M.

After the usual small talk and ordering of lunch, I told M that I had been thinking all week about her appraisal of my situation and my response.

I said that she was completely off the mark and that she might like to reflect on the many times I have been truly ‘fucked” in the past (to use her terminology) due to abuse, cruelty and deception at the hands of women.

Starting with my abduction by a total stranger woman at age six, which I have already written about here. Then with my being serially cheated out of house and possessions. My own Mother cheated me out of my first life savings. Was I fucked then I asked M?

Or she could consider my experiences of being falsely accused of assault by not just one, but two women? Did she consider this “being fucked”?

The second time this occurred I was saved by another woman mutual friend who turned up and challenged my partner to be honest and not call the Police. She had already called the local womens refuge and was just about to make the call to the Police.

I also asked M if she thought I was fucked having my only child stolen from me never to be seen again.
I sure figure that I was!

It took me a long while to be even able to talk about this major traumatic event in my life; I will never truly get over it in the full sense of the word.

I continued on with my monologue, which was by now turning into more of a rant and I was beginning to shake with repressed rage; much to my chagrin, as she did not deserve such an outburst.

To M's considerable credit, she listened patiently with increasingly obvious unease. I continued on with a couple more similar accounts.

Then I stopped talking.

Then, M said; But don't forget there are women out there actually being abused by men.

At this stage my rage was no longer repressed and I found I was raising my voice.

I explained that society had been hearing about violence against women daily for at least forty years that I know of. On every mode of media, many times a day and with a vast number of organisations set up expressly to organise and disseminate discussions about female grievance. All at the taxpayers expense. There is a huge industry based on the victimhood of women. As soon as some of us Men start to discuss Mens Issues, there is nearly always a woman somewhere in the audience who wants to turn the attention back to their celebrated and inflated sense of entitlement by saying, "what about us". Let's bring the discussion back to women!

I was clearly angry by this stage.

M was still taking it well. Astonishingly so!

Many women would have stormed out in tears or worse in her situation. I was so emotionally affected, I barked unfairly at the waiter for bringing us the wrong order. (For which I later apologised profusely).

With that, we both stopped talking for a while.

Then M said she would like to see me seek some form of healing for my vulnerability and for the obvious damage and the resulting pain. Many suggestions followed, mainly of esoteric forms of "healing". She was fully aware of the degree of my scepticism about such forms of healing as we have discussed such subjects at length over the years.

I explained that men generally are vulnerable in modern society and I don't consider myself to be at all exceptional in that regard. When I was in my middle years, I enjoyed a normal degree of attraction to, and from, the opposite sex. I enjoyed a good sex life when not burdened by a fog of depression (which, to be fair, was much of the time). It was then that I was much more vulnerable than I am now! At times I shudder when I recall some of the dangerous situations I found myself in with pathological women in the past. My full awareness of this only became apparent much later.

I suggested to my friend that healing may come in many unlikely forms and definitions. It may be difficult to recognise and is almost certainly seldom, if ever, absolute.

I consider myself to be healing by the process of:

1. Becoming aware of reality as distinct from fantasy.
2. Learning to practice care for self. In the full sense of the word.
3. Becoming aware of what part I played in my unfortunate past experiences and
4. Working to stay alert to the danger of repeating the past.

In short, growing up!

What I did not have the heart to say was that true healing will not be founded on the concept of romantic love.

The Violent Sex

Joachim I Krueger Ph.D. · 9 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]In Scrubs episode #77 (season 4, episode 9), "My malpractical decision," which aired on September 21, 2004, we meet Neena Broderick (Julianna Margulies), an attractive malpractice lawyer who came to the hospital to check on her sick father. JD is afraid of her. "Ok. Stay calm. You can handle this. She can't be that much of a ball buster." In fact, she is. To the tune of "One singular sensation" she hits 10 men in the groin with a stick and kicks another 5 in the same spot with her pointed shoes. This takes barely 30 seconds. Only the orthodox Jew, whose hat she takes, remains unscathed. Perhaps she spares him because he is not the typical predacious, testosterone-poisoned white male. The man whose cane she takes to bust balls just tumbles to the ground, groin intact. Frightened JD exclaims: "I'm wearing a cup!" She retorts: "Thanks for the crotch update."

Now that's entertainment—and stereotyping. Or is it? According to the cultural stereotype, men are the violent sex. Aggression is the male domain. Men love violent play, men go to war, men beat women (or worse). On the theory that the media create and reinforce stereotypes, one would expect depictions of violent men and victimized women to be abundant. It seems, though, that the contents of the most popular shows, and comedies in particular, are precisely the opposite, and Neena is a representative sample of 1.

The frequency and ferocity of female-on-male violence on TV has fascinated (and appalled) me for years. Men, and in particular dates, boyfriends, and husbands, are regularly slapped, hit, or kicked, whereas the reverse hardly occurs. Test my assertion by sitting through 3 or 4 comedy shows and tell us your count. If my observation is correct, the question is why violence against men is considered funny. Does anyone believe that a kick in the groin feels rather like a pinch on the forearm? Add the psychological dimension to the physical one. A kick in the behind may be humiliating; a kick in the groin is degrading and castrating. For this to be considered funny, something else must be added to the mix. But what? Is it the idea that men, being the truly violent sex, deserve to be taken down a notch during primetime? It is noteworthy that much of the violence against men is unprovoked. A man need not be an individual offender, or would-be offender. If the guilt of male aggression is a collective one, any individual male will do—as demonstrated by Neena. Is the point of violence against men on these shows to exorcise fear of men?

I submit that by showing violence against men, TV can actually reinforce the stereotype that men are more violent than women. I have repeatedly heard the argument that it is ok to show men being beaten because they can take it. They are strong enough to defend themselves. In contrast, showing violence against women would be truly horrific because women cannot defend themselves; they are definitively victimized. I am not impressed by this argument. The Neena episode, though it is over the top in terms of the number of victims per second, uses a typical script. The men do not defend themselves, although they could, at least in theory. They look puzzled—as if they're trying to hold onto their stereotype of the pacific female. The show cleverly reinforces that stereotype. Neena is only acting tough and the serial detesticulation occurs only in JD's wimpy fantasy. In fact, Neena is just a scared and vulnerable girl, who is worried about her dad. This is brilliant. Woman gets to be violent and vulnerable in one stroke—so to speak.

So what about the stereotype of the violent male? Is it true? Well, yes and no. If we look at criminal records, it turns out that men out-aggress women by a factor of about 10. When it comes to domestic aggression, there is only a small gender difference, and it is the opposite of what most people expect and it is consistent with what we see on TV. Women are more likely to hit, kick, or threaten their partners with a weapon. When violence occurs in a couple, usually both partners participate. When only one partner is violent, it is twice as likely to be the woman than the man. Many people find this hard to believe. But take a look around or check out the research literature, such as:

Archer, J. (2000). Sex differences in aggression between heterosexual partners: A meta-analytic review. Psychological Bulletin, 126, 651-680.

Straus, M. A. (1999). The controversy over domestic violence by women: A methodological, theoretical, and sociology of science analysis. In X. B. Arriaga & S. Oskamp (eds.), Violence in intimate relationships (pp. 17-44).

Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

Shaming men doesn't build healthy sexuality

Dr. David Ley · 12 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Male sexuality is intensely under attack, in the increasingly vitriolic social dialogue related to pornography. Though women watch and make pornography, most of the current debates focus on aspects of masculine sexual behaviors. These behaviors include masturbation, use of pornography, prostitutes or sexual entertainment like strip clubs. Promiscuity, sex without commitment, and use of sex to manage stress or tension are all things that are frequently a part of male sexuality, whether we like it or not. But, male sexuality is not a disease, not a public health crisis, it is not evil, and it does not overpower men's lives or choices. Shaming men for these behaviors isolates men, and ignores powerful, important and healthy aspects of masculinity.

There is a common perception of male sexuality as intrinsically selfish, overly focused on "scoring" and sexual conquests, on anonymous, "soulless" sex, and on the outward manifestations of virility. But there are other, oft neglected sides of male eroticism. Straight men are far more focused upon women's needs, and upon closeness with women, than we give them credit for. Nancy Friday wrote that "Men's love of women is often greater than their love of self." Men give up friends and male camaraderie and accept a life of economic support of women, even leading up to an earlier death, all in order to be with women. More than half of all men describe that their best sexual encounters came when they "gave a woman physical pleasure beyond her dreams." Men redirect their selfishness away from their own satisfaction, and toward a sense of fulfillment and accomplishment, by giving sexual satisfaction. Male sexuality often involves an intense focus on the needs of their partners, and men gain great pleasure, even a strong sense of manliness, from giving their lover sexual pleasure.

In fact, men's desire to sexually satisfy their partners comes at the price of their own satisfaction. When a man is unable to make his partner orgasm, many men report incredible frustration, disappointment, and self-doubt. Women even complain that men put so much pressure and intent upon helping the woman achieve orgasm that the act ceases to be pleasurable and starts to feel more like childbirth. In such cases, women fake orgasms, not for themselves, but to satisfy their partner's needs. Until a woman has an orgasm, a man doesn't think he's done his job, and his masculinity hangs in the balance.

[image]Men are taught from a young age that they must be sexually competent and sexually powerful with exaggerated and impossible ideals. Surveys of sex in America find that, compared to women, men are far more insecure and anxious about their sexual performance. Nearly 30 percent of men fear that they ejaculate too soon, most men sometimes experience erectile dysfunction connected to anxiety, and one man in every six reports significant worries about his sexual abilities to satisfy his partner. These are huge burdens that men carry, and are just one reason why many men pursue other forms of sex such as masturbation to pornography.

Compared to women, men actually experience greater pain and psychological disruption from the ups and downs of romantic relationships. Not only do the negative aspects of a romantic relationship hurt men more than women, but the positive aspects and benefits of that relationship have greater impact upon the man than the woman. Because women are better able to access outside support from friends and family, they often fare better than men. Men are often isolated and burdened with the expectation that they shouldn't feel pain, or if they do, they must suffer alone.

For men, physical affection and sex is one of the main ways we feel loved, accepted, and regarded. For many men, it is only through physical love that we can voice tenderness and express our desire for togetherness and physical bonding. Only in sex can we let down boundaries and drop our armor enough to be emotionally vulnerable.

Sex plays a greater role in the lives of men as a form of acceptance and mutual regard than it does for women. Women touch each other all the time, with hugs, holding hands, closer body contact, and smaller "personal space." Men shake hands. Really good friends might, at best, punch each other in a loving way, do a careful "man hug," or even swat each other's buttocks, if it's during an approved masculine sporting event. (Many homosexual men experience this differently, when they come out and are part of the LGBTQ community) So the body-to-body contact that sex offers feeds an appetite, a craving, one that is often starved near to death in men.

Male sexuality is portrayed as something that men must guard against, and it is often described as though it is a demonic force, lurking within our souls, which must be constrained, feared and even rejected. Men are portrayed as powerless to control themselves, in the face of sexual arousal that is too strong. Men are painted as weak, harmed and warped by sexual experiences such as pornography. As a result, men are told to be ashamed of the sexual desires that society has called unhealthy, and told to forego those condemned sexual interests. But an essential part of man is lost when we encourage men to split themselves from their sexuality.

Unfortunately, as we teach men to be men, to understand, accept, and express their masculinity, we rarely attend adequately to the loving, nurturing, and amorous side of men. The most positive way that society and media currently portray male sexuality is when it is depicted as bumbling and stupid-making, a force that turns men into fools, easily led by our penises. But more often, male sexuality is depicted as a force that hovers just on the edge of rape, rage and destruction.

What is necessary for a healthy man, for complete masculinity, is the integration, consolidation, and incorporation of ALL the varied aspects of our sexuality. When we try to externalize our desires for love and sex, excising them from ourselves as something external and dangerous, we run the real risk of creating men without compassion, without tenderness, and without the ability to nurture. It is easy to suggest that what we are trying to excise are the base, primitive parts of men's eroticism, those desires to rape, dominate, and satisfy oneself selfishly. But in truth, those desires, as frightening as they can be, are integrally linked to male emotional desires for safety, acceptance, protection of others, and belonging.

Those things that make men admired and respected—their strength, courage, independence, and assertiveness—are the same things which contribute to the differences in male and female sexuality. By condemning these characteristics, we run the real and frightening risk of abolishing qualities that are essential to healthy masculinity.

A healthy sexual male is one who accepts and understands his erotic and sexual desires, along with his drive for success, dominance (and often submission as well) and excellence. Healthy sexual choices come from internal acceptance and awareness, not rejection and shame. Research has shown that all men have the ability to exercise control over their levels of sexual arousal and sexual behavior, but no men can fully suppress their sexual desire. Healthy men can be men who go to strip clubs, visit prostitutes and watch pornography. They are men who make conscious sexual choices, accepting the consequences of their actions.

Our culture needs a sexual ethic focused on personal relationships and social justice rather than particular sexual acts. All persons have the right and responsibility to lead sexual lives that express love, justice, mutuality, commitment, consent and pleasure. Grounded in respect for the body and for the vulnerability that intimacy brings, this ethic fosters physical, emotional and spiritual health. It accepts no double standards and applies to all persons, without regard to sex, gender, color, age, bodily condition, marital status or sexual orientation. – The Religious Institute

We need to begin encouraging personal integrity, responsibility, self-awareness and respect, both for oneself and one's sexual partner(s). This is, I think, the goal for all men – to make their sexual choices an integrated part of who they are, and the kind of man they desire to be. Unfortunately, as long as we continue to shame and condemn men in general, and for specific sexual acts such as watching porn, we are merely isolating men. Further, we are exacerbating the problem, because removing porn or shaming men for their desires or fantasies, does not teach men how to be a sexually healthy man.

Reform of Family Law strikes at the heart of gynocentrism

Robert Franklin · 13 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Of all the issues facing MHRAs, reform of family courts and laws is the most important. If you know my work, you know that most of what I've written about over the past nine plus years are the many ways in which family laws and policies conspire to separate fathers from their children. During that time, I've come to the conclusion that to reassert fathers' importance in children's lives is to strike at the heart of the phenomenon responsible for the anti-male bias that is evident in much of our culture. I refer of course to gynocentrism.

Gynocentrism arises in part from the evolution of sex roles that require males to protect – often at the cost of their lives – females and children. Humans, like other social mammals, are born immature, take a long time to reach sexual maturity and require long periods of nurturing and socialization to become contributing members of society. Human females typically give birth to a single offspring at a time who, until recently, had a good chance of dying before reaching adulthood. And, again until recently, females ran a significant risk of dying in, or as a result of, childbirth. Plus, a single male can impregnate a number of females at a given time. Accordingly, for the species to survive, females and children had to be the favored individuals in any group. That made males their protectors and consequently the disposable sex.

Such is the origin and the persistence of gynocentrism. But now of course the human population is no longer under threat unless it be from too many humans. The species Homo sapiens has survived and thrived and the march of civilization now means that, in most places, females and children are in no serious danger. They therefore no longer require the type of protection from males as before. So MHRAs justifiably question the utility of male disposability. It's no longer necessary to our survival and, since it's damaging to men, why not set it aside?

And yet we don't. For untold millennia our gynocentrism made sense. Now it no longer does, and yet it persists. Even a casual glance at public policy and the everyday news demonstrates gynocentrism to be alive, well and largely unquestioned by the great majority of people. The question is, if it's no longer necessary, why?

Part of the answer is found in the foregoing. We've succeeded in the business of survival due to males' willingness to protect women and children and we don't easily abandon what's worked so well.

But there's another part to the answer. There's another cause of gynocentrism beyond the age-old need for males to protect females – the mother-child dyad. Plus, unlike the protection of women by men, it's one that can be altered because, for perhaps two-hundred thousand years, we've been programming ourselves to do so.

When a child is born, its "job" becomes learning how to be a fully-functioning member of society. To do that, it has to learn. For the first and most formative years of its life, the person doing the teaching is mostly its mother. Humans are a bi-parental species, but mothers have always done the lion's share of hands-on parenting. Even in this era of feminists hectoring women to abandon motherhood in favor of paid work, they still do.

So, for just about all of us, our most basic learning consists of learning to please mother. In the earliest months of life, children learn that the primary parent is the source of all good things – food, warmth, cuddling, etc., and the "serve and return" interaction with parents that's vital to the child's well-being not only in childhood, but all its life. That primary parent is usually Mommy. Later on, as the child becomes able to act of its own volition, it learns to comply with mother's desires. Pooping in the potty comes to be understood to be better than doing so elsewhere. To a huge degree, the child's life is a matter of learning mother's wishes and figuring out how to meet them.

That learning is nothing but the building of neuronal structures in the brain that remain with us to the grave. So it's no surprise that, as adults, one of our strongest impulses is to please women. We give power to women, accede to their wishes almost as a matter of course, because our earliest learning was to do exactly that. Doing so brought us the necessities of life, so, as individuals, we're powerfully inclined to do the bidding of women.

What else explains some of the truly irrational and self-defeating public policies that we continue to adopt despite science and over two centuries of Enlightenment values that clearly contradict those policies? As but one example, due process of law has been bought with blood over hundreds of years. It is one of the most precious rights we enjoy. At least since the Code of Hammurabi (circa 1750 B.C.) it has been recognized as one of our most valuable defenses against state power. Abandoning it would be catastrophic for individual freedom and the exercise of individual rights. And yet, based on the most transparent falsehoods of feminists, routinely exposed and debunked, we see due process eroded on campus and in virtually every tribunal dealing with allegations of sexual misconduct.

I could add example after example, but MHRAs know the details without my doing so. The point is that these dangerous and nonsensical policies may not have a reason, but they do have a cause – gynocentrism. And part of gynocentrism is learned in the cradle.

It may be simply a coincidence, but the advance of feminism has come, to a great degree, on the coattails of the Tender Years Doctrine that all but removed fathers from children's care during the first seven years of their lives. Unsurprisingly, feminism promoted the Tender Years Doctrine, despite the fact that increasing the role of mother actually contradicted other feminist goals such as more women in paid work and public life. It may be that the removal of the father from children's lives and his replacement by a full-time mother has been the sine qua non of feminism.

What if we did what we can to insure that Mom isn't the only parent around as little Andy or Jenny grows up? What if we reformed family law to bring Dad back into the picture? What if, through our laws and court practices, we informed all and sundry that fathers are every bit as important to children as mothers? What if we required mothers to inform men that they have a child and punished them for wrongs like maternal gatekeeping and parental alienation? What if we did away with adoption laws whose sole purpose is to facilitate adoptions by removing Dad from the legal process? What if we punished paternity fraud? What if we presumed 50/50 parenting time post-divorce? What if parental leave policies treated fathers and mothers the same?

All those reforms would be good for kids, as much social science already tells us. That alone should be enough to have enacted major changes long ago. But they would also allow children, from their earliest moments of life outside the uterus, to identify as important figures both Mommy and Daddy. The biology of human attachment means that infants attach equally to both parents as long as they're allowed to do so. Learning fathers' wishes would become as important as learning mothers'. Children would reach adulthood with a balanced view of the importance of each sex. No longer would our most basic learning be confined to pleasing women.

Men come hardwired to be fathers. Hundreds of thousands of years of evolution have equipped us with the same parenting hormones that women have and receptors on the brain that respond to them to produce parenting behavior. That means that a change in policy on families, far from contradicting our evolutionary tendencies, would correspond to them. Unlike efforts to negate the male tendency to protect women and children, reform of family courts would abet the natural inclination of human males to parent their offspring. As such, change would be both easier to accomplish and more effective.

Needless to say, reform of family laws won't alone solve our problem of gynocentrism. But it will address one of the two causes of its existence. As such, it's the most important single thing we can do to right what's so grievously wrong with our current gynocentric culture.

Healthy fats for a healthy mood

Aaron Mello · 18 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In this series for AVFM I'll be writing about the role of nutrition in men's health, and men's mental health in particular. In my nutrition practice, I focus on men's mental health specifically. It comes as a surprise to some, but the food we eat can have a significant and dramatic impact on mental health. And that's important, especially for us involved in the men's rights movement. We've got to take care of ourselves so we can continue our work to help men and combat feminist misandry. So read on to learn more about the surprising benefits of healthy fats!

In this post I'll cover the importance of healthy fat in addressing depression and anxiety. Fat is a critical nutrient that has been unfairly maligned for decades. Beginning in the 1940s and '50s, bad research like Ancel Keys' "Seven Countries Study" set out to establish a correlation between dietary fat saturated fat and heart disease. As it turns out, the Seven Countries study was seriously flawed and relied on cherry picked data while ignoring data from other countries that clearly contradicted the hypothesis that eating dietary fat leads to an increased risk of cardiovascular disease.

Today, 60 some odd years later, the battle is still raging on. The American Heart Association's recent recommendation to avoid coconut oil because of its saturated fat content has made headlines in recent weeks. If you're interested in learning more about the benefits of healthy fats, as well as what types of fat you should eat and which fats to avoid, keep reading!

In my last post I wrote about the importance of protein for mental health. All food we eat can be broadly divided into three categories called macronutrients, which are protein, fat and carbohydrates. In this week's post I'm focusing on dietary fat, and I'll move on to carbohydrates in my next post. Understanding how to eat an appropriate ratio of the macronutrients (protein : fat : carbohydrate) is a crucial first step in constructing healthy, well-balanced meals.

Why eat healthy fats?

Fats are essential for human health. Whereas dietary protein is primarily utilized for functions like building muscle and neurotransmitters like serotonin, fats and carbohydrates are our two main energy sources. They are used to provide the calories necessary to fuel the body's many metabolic processes. Both carbohydrates and fats provide energy for the body and both are necessary for proper health.

In contrast to carbohydrates, which provide a quick burst of energy that quickly burns out, healthy fats provide stable, long-lasting energy, and that's exactly what we want. Eating excessive carbohydrates can be likened to throwing kerosene on a campfire – it makes a big flame, but that flame doesn't last long. In contrast, fats are like a big Oak log that burns for hours and turns into a nice bed of coals that emits steady, consistent heat that's long lasting.

In western countries like the United States, many people overconsume carbohydrates, especially refined carbohydrates, and don't eat enough healthy fats. I'll talk more in my next post about carbohydrates, so stay tuned for more about that. Many Americans also eat too many unhealthy fats. I'll explain more about which fats are healthy and unhealthy shortly. But fats don't just provide long-lasting energy; they also play many other roles in the body, which I'll go over briefly in the next section before getting into which fats are healthy and which should be avoided.

The many roles of fat in the body

Dietary fats are indispensable nutrients that are necessary for many bodily functions in addition to providing energy. For example, every cell in the body is surrounded by a semipermeable membrane that is made out of fats, also known as lipids. This lipid membrane separates the water-soluble contents of the cell from the water-soluble fluids that surround the outside of the cell. Without fats, we could not have cells in the body. Many different types of fats and cholesterol make up cell membranes and assist in numerous critical cellular functions.

A second crucial function for fat in the body is providing electrical shielding for nerve impulses, which enables the nervous system to transmit messages through the body. Individual nerves, called neurons, are coated in a fatty substance called the myelin sheath, which provides electrical shielding. This shielding allows electrical signals to be conducted very quickly – at about 200 miles per hour – and without electrical interference.

[image]

The myelin sheath is what deteriorates in conditions like multiple sclerosis, or MS. Some people with MS suffer from movement problems and lose muscle control because the nervous system isn't able to communicate with skeletal muscle. Because of the role the nervous system plays in transmitting emotions, some MS patients also experience emotional changes and mood swings.

Because the myelin sheath is made from fat, it's essential to consume adequate healthy fats in the diet. Without the proper building blocks for the myelin sheath, the nervous system can degrade and mood issues can follow. Eating healthy fats is important not just for stable energy, but also for emotional regulation. Without the myelin sheath, nervous system communication that is important for mood cannot take place, and mood suffers.

In addition, the brain itself is made up of about 60% fat and considerable research has demonstrated the importance of fats for brain health (1). These are just a few examples of how important it is to consume dietary fat, especially when it comes to mental health. With an understanding of how important fats are, I'll define what healthy and unhealthy fats are in the next sections.

Which fats are healthy?

There are three main types of fats, and it's important to eat a variety of each of the different types. Here I'll review the types of fats and which foods are good sources of each. Then I'll review unhealthy fats and which foods should be avoided, as not all fats are healthy.

Monounsaturated fats: These fats are called *mono*unsaturated because they have one double bond. Because of that double bond, these fats are somewhat unstable under heat and are best consumed with minimal heating. They are not generally good fats for cooking.
[image]

- Avocados
- Olives and cold-pressed extra virgin olive oil (2)
- Poultry fat from turkey, chicken, goose and duck
- Macadamia nuts
- Peanuts
- Walnuts

Polyunsaturated fats: These fats have more than one double bond, hence the name *poly*unsaturated. The most well-known and healthy polyunsaturated fats are the omega-3 fatty acids EPA and DHA, which are anti-inflammatory.

- Wild-caught cold-water fish like salmon, sardines and anchovies (3)
  - Choose fish lower on the food chain
  - Although larger predatory fish like tuna and swordfish also contain omega-3s, they are higher in mercury
- Hemp seeds

- Sunflower, pumpkin and sesame seeds

Saturated fats: Although these fats have long been attacked as being unhealthy, artery clogging and heart attack inducing, the science really does not support this contention. Saturated fats contain no double bonds and are the most stable under heat, and so are the best choice for cooking and frying.

- Organic butter from grass-fed cows (like Kerrygold)
  - Yes, really! Good quality butter is a health food
- Organic unrefined coconut oil
- Dairy fat in whole-fat organic milk, yogurt and cheese
- Uncured bacon and pork lard
  - Yes, really!
  - Look at the ingredients on lard. Sometimes it is preserved with BHT, which should be avoided
- Tallow (beef fat)
- Fat on steaks from organic, grass-fed cows, bison and lamb

Unhealthy fats to avoid

I've spent a lot of time praising the importance of healthy fats, but not all fats promote health. Some other fats are decidedly unhealthy and really do contribute to cardiovascular disease and other health problems.

- Trans fats (4)
  - These are typically vegetable oils that have been chemically modified through a process called hydrogenation to be solid instead of liquid at room temperature
  - Even if a food item says it has 0g trans fats, it can still contain some trans fats if they are less than 0.5g per serving, thanks to an FDA loophole
  - Look at the ingredient list. If you see any partially hydrogenated oils listed, such as partially hydrogenated soybean or partially hydrogenated vegetable oil, it DOES contain trans fats and should be avoided
  - Trans fats have been implicated in cardiovascular disease
- Vegetable oils
  - These oils include soybean, Canola, corn, vegetable, sunflower and safflower
  - They are unstable and turn rancid easily
  - These oils are high in pro-inflammatory Omega-6 fatty acids
- Fried foods (5)
  - These are almost always fried in vegetable oils and contribute to inflammation
  - If you're a chip lover, a healthier option is Jackson's Honest chips, which are fried in coconut oil

Takeaways about healthy fats

Although healthy fats are high in calories, many people find that they lose weight by eating more of them. The reasons behind this are complex, but revolve around stabilizing blood sugar. This helps to stabilize mood as well, and can actually help reduce the risk of metabolic disease like diabetes. In closing, here are a few easy ways to include more healthy fats in your diet:

- Pan fry vegetables in a liberal amount of butter or coconut oil
- Eat 1/4 to 1/2 an avocado with meals, sprinkled with sea salt
- Drizzle olive oil on food

- Make an easy salad dressing and use it liberally:
  - 1 part vinegar (apple cider or balsamic)
  - 3 parts olive oil
  - Salt, pepper, and garlic powder to taste
- Sprinkle raw or sprouted nuts and seeds on meals (6)
  - Walnuts, almonds, macadamia nuts, or cashews
  - Pumpkin, sesame, sunflower or hemp seeds
  - Snack on nuts like pistachios instead of carbohydrate-heavy crackers or chips
- Add butter and/or coconut oil to your coffee or tea

In conclusion

Healthy fats are an important part of a well-balanced diet. See if you don't feel better and stay full longer by including more of them in your diet. Stay tuned for my next post about carbohydrates, which is another important piece of the puzzle. Limiting refined carbohydrates while increasing healthy fats can help improve your mood, help you lose weight and reduce your risk for diabetes (7) and cardiovascular disease (8).

Solving men's social isolation

Tim Patten · 19 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In many respects, women's needs have been placed above those of others since time began; typified by when disaster's strike and a call for 'women and children first' is sounded. Unfortunately, this alongside decades of the women's movement a disturbing result exists today: a supposedly progressive society that is, in fact, highly discriminatory and that extols humiliation, distrust and abhorrence towards all males, but specifically straight white men. This potentially induces some men to isolate themselves. But a growing number of males have decided that enough is enough, and that it is time to counter a trend that has damaged them. As history's true masters of the universe, men are again taking matters into their own hands, sculpting masculine destinies free of the misandry, abuse, and isolation that has become commonplace in recent years.

Among the movements playing a critical role in this struggle to overcome the wrongs are Red Pill Awareness, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and Japan's Herbivore Men. Collectively, they and groups like them represent a world-wide brotherhood of the modern men's liberation movement. It has an increasing fanfare of female advocates who are forward-thinking individuals with the intent on empowering men forward. They and the Red Pill men are also keeping an eye out for men who have been waylaid into a so-called isolated existence, by women who have systematically secluded their partners from friends and family.

The online organizations such as A Voice for Men and MGTOW.com have raised awareness about male social isolation and about what is right… as far as any male is concerned. Certainly, there are some men who consider a hermit-like existence to be blissful, and the notion of being inaccessible to other people is not necessarily a bad thing. However, evidence suggests that enforced social isolation among males is a growing epidemic that has had tragic physical, mental and emotional consequences, including promulgating shame, low self-esteem, and substance use; all increasing the numbers of male suicides. They may also feel unwanted, unrewarded and depressed, overwhelmed with self-loathing and a sense of hopelessness. First, isolation needs to be defined.

Admittedly, many view social isolation and loneliness as one and the same, but there is a difference. When a person is lonely, it generally stems from a temporary lack of contact with others or a particular loved one. However, when someone is isolated, it reflects a complete or near-complete separation of interaction between that individual and all other people. It doesn't have to be caused by tangible barriers or direct intervention. A man weighed down by the struggle to feed his family, or whose children have been cut off or taken away from him by an ex-wife, can readily fall into such a state.

But once we know what to look for, and then take the necessary steps to either prevent it from happening or to reverse a slide toward deeper isolation that has already begun, then we can make a big difference when it comes to somebody who is at risk. In the case of Red Pill men, for example, they are becoming well attuned to such developments in an effort to limit and prevent it from happening to themselves and their brothers. Even given the fact that men typically don't need or rely on others as much as women; Red Pill men can turn things around for themselves.

Abolishing Social Isolation

Indeed, as the most resourceful beings on Earth, we men can use our inherent ingenuity to address such difficulties. It takes desire, creativity, and an open mind:

- Adopt a pet.

A house pet can turn even a threadbare accommodation into a warm and loving home. However, instead of going to a pet shop or a puppy mill, why not adopt a pet from an animal rescue shelter? Your new friend will be more loyal than almost any human you can think of and will love you for just being there and taking care of him or her.

- Smile and say "hello!"

Unlike me, some members of my family lives deep in the woods in northern Wisconsin's quietest parts. Still, no matter how secluded any of us might be, we will generally have some contact with others, even if it is only those we meet in a store or who bring deliveries and mail to our doors. When such moments occur, why not look into their eyes, smile, and say "hello"? And maybe have a chat with them or share a joke. Their day will likely brighten because you took the time to acknowledge them–but so will yours. While such interactions help reassure our place on Earth and bridge our differences, they mostly teach us that life is connected.

- Maintain a daily regimen.

One ritual that many have found to be conducive to a healthy mind and body is to run, bike or work out every day. In my case, after I eat an orange and drink my morning coffee then I head out the door for a 30-minute walk. I return and engage in some writing, and finally, I do 20 minutes of yoga. That first bit of walking during the morning helps me to sort out and prioritize my thoughts for my article or book or whatever else I might end up doing on any given day.

There are many times when I say "good morning" to everyone I meet–even the homeless men wobbling slowly to their feet as the sunshine unfolds. When I do this I know that I am intentionally radiating energy outward toward others, and yet somehow I also feel a warm glow myself. Perhaps it is a kind of karma? Regardless, I share in this way because it can give meaning and a personal connection to a boring little 6 a.m. walk around the streets of San Francisco.

- Invite someone into your life.

Once you move beyond an oppressive female or whatever else that had been relegating you to the basement man-cave, why not transform your entire home into such a space. Go for the glory and make it the place where you relish in your hobbies and secrets – whether they be electronics, art, sports, war memorabilia or something else. Invite coworkers and friends over to watch the game on an HD-TV, and provide some refreshments and goodies. You will have demonstrated the power of MGTOW without even saying a word, no proselytizing necessary.

Studies have found that connecting with friends, family and coworkers can help those who are single to improve their health and increase survival. Most of us have a hobby or interest – hunting, fishing, camping or hiking; landscaping or gardening; church, traveling or going to concerts; taking classes, playing sports, lifting or fighting; or metalworking and the fine arts – that others may be interested in. Why not take the lead and ask one or more friends to join you? If you can, pick up the tab and make it easy for them. Don't be shy about sharing the moments that you love.

A few years ago, I bought 10 days worth of tickets to see the San Francisco Giants at nearby AT&T Park, where the thrill and comradery of witnessing a home run hit on the home field is always electric. I invited various friends to come along and join me at the center of the action. While some paid their way, most did not, but that really didn't matter.

One Saturday afternoon, I took a coworker and her father, Ed, to a game. Even though the old man had lived in the East Bay all his life, he had never been at the stadium alongside 40,000 cheering fans. As his family's sole provider, he had spent most of his life working his fingers to the bone. But now, as the Giants pounded out three homers, you could see he was really enjoying himself. When he passed away a few years later, I was happy that I was the one who had given him such a memorable experience. To this day, it still warms my heart.

Conclusion

Red Pill warriors around the world are avoiding placing women before themselves and instead are developing self-awareness, building a male-centric infrastructure that can facilitate appropriate interaction whenever needed. Most thank their lucky stars as they look forward to a drama-free life of personal freedom and genuine masculinity. Governments need not help because the paradigm shift is here and the brothers are doing it for themselves. Any man who needs help can reach out to comrades in the MGTOW and men's movements, where many lives have already been saved.

Sex addiction's diversity problem

Dr. David Ley · 21 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I was recently interviewed in a CNN piece covering the continued controversy over sex addiction, and I noticed something: everyone interviewed in the article is white. Not just white, but educated, and middle class or above. Why is that? Increasingly, panels of experts are expected to represent the diversity of our country, but most publications discussing sex addiction solely include expert opinions from white professionals. I'm not blaming the media for this lack of diversity – I think it's hard to find people of color in this debate. And I think that says something. I'm just not sure what.

As a long critic of the sex addiction industry, I've gotten to know most of the folks in this field, on both sides. The field is dominated by white professionals. Most are white males. There are some gay men both arguing for and against sex addiction, but very few, if any, lesbian women in the field. Perhaps this is because the debate about sex addiction is overwhelmingly focused on male sexuality, given that 90-95% of alleged sex addicts are male. In the paraprofessional side of sex addiction, the online bloggers and activists who promote the ideas of porn addiction are also consistently white males, typically of middle class or above.

Around 40% of the US workforce is made up of people of color, and around 25% of the medical/doctoral field is filled by a diverse population. The field of psychology and mental health is somewhat less diverse, where around 16% of psychologists are not white. No data exists to my knowledge, regarding the ethnic makeup of the sex addiction industry, though one African-American therapist has written about her rather negative experiences in the sex addiction industry, She is one of very few people of color working in sex therapy or in sex addiction treatment and is involved with an association for black sexologists, to bring greater attention to the lack of diversity. While training in sex addiction therapy, she was told "Black people don't come to [sex addiction] treatment."

This appears to be somewhat true in the people who seek out professional sex addiction treatment. Terry Crews and Tiger Woods are two prominent men of color who have publicly identified as sex or porn addicts. Both are also quite wealthy men, and their wealth and celebrity status makes them far more consistent with the rest of the celebrity sex addiction field, which is filled with white male sports stars, politicians, musicians and actors. (In contrast, African-American basketball legend Wilt Chamberlain had sex with twenty-thousand women in his life, and never felt his sexual behaviors were a problem…)

In December, 2016, the porn addiction industry got a surprising endorsement from notorious Louisiana white nationalist and Ku Klux Klan leader, David Duke. (I choose not to link to the post, but it is easily found.) In a blog on his website, Duke described porn addiction as a scourge perpetrated on males and society by a Jewish conspiracy. He described porn as inherently addictive, shaping malleable brains, and "heartily recommends" that readers watch a Ted Talk video by the leader of Your Brain on Porn, identifying it as eye-opening and offering helpful ways to recover healthy "mentality." I'm not suggesting that the leaders of the sex or porn addiction industry are themselves racist – I know many of them and don't believe they display overt racism. Instead, the racial exclusiveness of the field's professionals and patients may make the concept and industry more tolerable and conducive to racism as espoused by those such as Duke.

Source: Wikimedia Commons

Data published by Rory Reid of UCLA found that in a representative sample of people in sex addiction treatment, 92% were white. Around 40% of the US population is people of color, including Hispanics. It raises real questions as to why whites are disproportionately represented in sex addiction treatment. I work extensively with people in poverty, dealing with homelessness, drug and alcohol problems, and chronic mental illness. In our country, persons of color experience disproportionate impacts of these issues. I commonly see people who have lost their homes, careers and families due to medical conditions, mental health issues, and the related financial impacts. In my career, I've never seen a single homeless person who blamed sexual addiction for their homelessness, nor have I ever seen a homeless person complain of sex addiction or receive sex addiction treatment, though most have extensive histories of treatment for drug, alcohol or mental health issues. Why would these sexual problems be different from other behavioral health issues, and also not exist at a higher rate in minority populations?

In that same study, 75% of sex addicts make over $50,000 a year. For comparison, the US median household income is around $51,000. So, 75% of these sex addicts make more than half the families in the US. According to the US Census Bureau, only around 9.5% of men in the US make over $100,000 a year. But surprisingly, 40% of men in sex addiction treatment annually bring home a six figure salary. Based upon these data, we cannot assume that sex addiction is a problem relevant to the general population, but may be limited to a very narrow slice of demographics, weighted towards the wealthiest, whitest and most conservative people in our country.

"For years, Rob Lowe had a sex addiction. But he cured it by getting less famous." David Spade

Why does this diversity problem exist, and what does it mean? Here are just a few potential issues involved:

- Sexual privilege – throughout history, wealthy, powerful men have held the ability to engage in sexual behaviors such as promiscuity, polygamy or infidelity, which are restricted and punished in women and those of lesser means. It may be that the people seeking sex addiction treatment are these individuals, acting on this established sexual privilege, in a society which remains rather conflicted about whether these sexual privileges should still be allowed;
- It may be that white, wealthier people have relatively more opportunity and ability to pursue sexual behaviors or relationships, and thus get themselves into sexual problems, compared to people of color;
- Conversely, it may be that people of color may for some reason either self-manage sexual urges more effectively, or are less likely to feel their sexual behaviors are out of their control. There may also be cultural differences at play, regarding the acceptability of various sexual behaviors. During the Tiger Woods infidelity scandal, many in South America viewed his behavior as normal, in cultures where machismo is demonstrated by a man's publicly displayed mistresses;

- Treatment for sex addiction, and sexual behavior problems at large, are rarely covered by health insurance, much less by Medicaid or public sector funding. As a result, the majority of professional sex addiction treatment is provided on self-pay basis, limiting its availability to those with the financial means to afford out-of-pocket treatment expenses. Public sector healthcare which is more available to people of color focuses more on aspects of STI prevention and contraception and rarely addresses more sophisticated areas of sexual health;
- Free or low-cost group treatment involving 12-Step support for sex-related issues is available in many communities. I'm unable to find any data regarding demographics of people attending these groups. If racial disparity in sex addiction treatment is related solely to financial restrictions on access, and not to other social factors, then one would assume these groups would include much higher rates of persons of color. Anecdotally, most attendees I've interviewed report that these groups also tend to involve high numbers of wealthier whites, though there are a plethora of these groups and their different approaches may be more or less accessible to minority communities.

The American Association of Sexuality Educators, Counselors and Therapists recently issued a position statement on sex addiction, indicating that they believe the sex addiction treatment model is harmful, inadequately informed by information on sexual health, and insufficiently supported by scientific research. I would add to their position that there are significant concerns of potential cultural or racial bias, stigma or privilege raised by evidence that sex addiction is disproportionately diagnosed and treated in a specific demographic and racial category.

The etiology, or course, of the problems commonly called sex addiction at this point appear inextricably linked to issues of culture, gender, race, religion, morality and sexual experiences. In order to best assist and understand why this specific, narrow group of people are being treated for such sexual problems, proponents of sex addiction treatment have an ethical obligation to explain why their model is so prevalent in wealthy, white Americans. If research suggests that the lack of diversity on sex addiction treatment is an issue of financial access to treatment, then sex addiction therapists should fulfill their commitment to the public good by working harder to make their treatment more widely available to those of lesser means.

In the United States, African-Americans constitute nearly half of the prison population. This is one of the most startling and clear indications of gross racial disparity in our society. The fact that sex addiction is diagnosed and treated in an overwhelmingly white population reflects an equally gross racial disparity. The reasons behind this disparity deserve explanation.

Temple Street Children's University Hospital in Dublin, Ireland, two-faced "Known Genital Mutilators"

Gary Costanza · 21 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
Mona Baker, CEO

Temple Street Children's University Hospital and it's CEO Mona Baker have been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Temple Street Children's University Hospital is a two-faced institution that claims it will "put the experience & voice of the child at the centre of how services are designed and delivered," but at the same time commits genital mutilation on those same infants.

From Google:

"two-faced
ˈtoo ˈˌfāst adjective
insincere and deceitful.
synonyms: deceitful, insincere, double-dealing, Janus-faced, hypocritical, backstabbing, false, fickle, untrustworthy, duplicitous, deceiving, dissembling, dishonest, disloyal, treacherous, faithless, traitorous, cheating, lying, weaselly"

One face says they put the care and welfare of the child front and center, the other face ignores their own Statement of Strategic Intent and forces many of those children to be sexually abused and mutilated. Temple knowingly ignores these facts:

- no medical organization recommends routine circumcision
- there are many risks involved, including a lifetime of pain, disfigurement, and death
- 100% of these babies lose normal sexual function and pleasure
- 100% of these babies have bleeding and scarring
- unequal protection of female babies vs. male babies
- violates your Hippocratic Oath, "First do no harm" (maybe they have this confused with hypocrisy)
- studies have shown this traumatizes the infant and damages his immature nervous system
- permanent elective surgery requires informed consent by the actual patient, especially an amputation of a normal body part (this is not "the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, … or excision of minor lump" see below)
- infant genital mutilation is a human rights violation as outlined by the United Nations, and is most likely illegal in most countries
- Germany and Norway's recent attempts (among others) to ban MGM for many of the reasons outlined above
- the worldwide intactivist movement to ban all forms of infant genital mutilation

"Two-faced" is just one way to describe people who's Strategic Intent is to "put the experience & voice of the child at the centre" and then go ahead and mutilate those children's genitals for no medical reason, and certainly without the child's voice being heard.

We read under "Mission, Ethos & Values:"

> We pledge ourselves to reverence the dignity of human life at every level of its existence, believing that every person is made in the image of God. We respect the basic human rights of all persons and treat patients and > their families, colleagues and all those who collaborate with us with respect, dignity and professionalism.

>
> We exercise responsible stewardship by providing an equitable, efficient service, always mindful of the most vulnerable and advocating on their behalf when resources are required to meet their needs appropriately.

These doctors know that Female Genital Mutilation (FGM) is wrong, and the law and common decency tells us not to allow it. Then why would the same revolting procedure be allowed, promoted and profited from at the expense of unconsenting baby boys? Your very own mission statement compels you to provide "an equitable service," yet you treat infant boys and girls very differently. That makes these practices two-faced, unethical, immoral, and inequitable.

I usually name the names of the actual genital mutilators along with their picture, however here at Temple Street I have no idea whom actually does the cutting. I suspect the cutters to be underlings at the hospital whom are forced to do it under threat of discipline. I'm pretty sure the CEO and the board of directors keep their hands clean of this bloody act, but their hands are by far the bloodiest.

What you're doing is just wrong, and obviously a violation of civil and human rights.

And who is responsible for this deception? Under "Corporate Structure" we have the answer:

> Individual with overall > responsibility and > accountability – CEO Mona Baker
>
> Board of Directors, TSCUH
>
> Sean Sheehan (Chairman)
> Ms Mona Baker (CEO)
> Ms Siobhan Brady
> Mr John Caird
> Ms Mary Cullen
> Ms Grainne Bauer (Director of Nursing)
> Dr Michael Drumm
> Mr John Fitzpatrick (Finance Director)
> Mr Fionn MacCumhaill
> Mr Derek McGrath
> Mr Frank McManus
> Ms Aveen Murray
> Sr Margherita Rock

So, it's CEO Mona Baker and the above Board of Directors who are ultimately responsible for these genital mutilations, more so than the underlings they direct to perform their bloody deeds.

Under "Paediatric Surgery" we see:

> Paediatric Surgery consists of six main categories:
> • Neonatal surgery – this involves the surgical correction of congenital abnormalities in the newborn period
> • The surgical management of children with rare conditions that require specialist expertise – some children have unusual conditions (e.g. cystic hygromas or Hirschsprung's disease which require specialist care > • Management of children who have complex medical conditions – some children have other medical problems that might complicate surgery or make it more hazardous (e.g. poorly controlled diabetes or heart problems) and these children might need to be referred to a specialist centre, like Temple Street, even for minor surgery if their condition becomes serious

> • Paediatric urology – this encompasses surgery on the renal and reproductive tracts of children
> • Adolescent and young people's surgery
> • General paediatric surgery – this refers to the surgery of relatively common conditions that do not usually require a specialist unit. These conditions can either be elective e.g. the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, circumcision, or excision of minor lumps. Alternatively, the operations may be emergency procedures e.g. appendicectomy, or torsion of testis

ALL of the above procedures seek to correct or treat a disease or condition EXCEPT circumcision. Imagine this amended listing for General pediatric surgery above:

> …These conditions can either be elective e.g. the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, circumcision, or excision of minor lumps. You may also chose to excise your daughter's labia from her vagina here at the centre.

Again, which of the following procedures have nothing to do to improve health or cure disease?:

> Surgery Related Leaflets
>
> Care After Your Child's Circumcision
> Care After Your Child's Hernia Repair
> Care After Your Child's Hydrocele Operation
> Care After Your Child's Undescended Testes (Orchidopexy) Operation
> Surgery. How to Care for a Child's Wound

Temple says they want to know what you think, so if you have a minute why don't you tell them by sending them a link to this article along with your comments.

Since Temple has NO information about the risks of circumcision, you can learn more from the video and research listings at neonatalcutting.org.

Temple's contact information follows:

Temple Street Children's University Hospital
Temple Street Dublin 1
Tel.: +353 1 878 4200
Email: ei.huc@noitamrofni

CEO Mona Baker 01 878 4230/ 01 878 4232

> Temple Street Children's University Hospital in Dublin, two-faced "Known Genital Mutilators" https://t.co/wNKCtB7l2l @TempleStreetHos pic.twitter.com/0tOVpyfwL6
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) July 25, 2017

Supreme Court hands fathers tool to fight the biased family law system

Jon Joy · 24 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

> [Under American laws] women have the right to children but men have to fight for children. – Dr. Warren Farrell

On any given day, tens of thousands of men are fighting in family courts to remain in their children's lives. They argue their cases before biased judges, who apply biased laws, in a system built around that idea that mothers are the more important parent, and that fathers' proper familial role is limited to mailing a child-support check. Many men lack the financial resources to even fight, as legal expenses can easily run into the thousands before even a single court date.

It is against this bleak landscape that the United States Supreme Court issued in June 2017 a promising new father's rights case, Sessions v. Morales-Santana. In doing so, the court has handed men whose wallets have the wherewithal for a fight the potential to wipe some sexist laws off the books—not only benefiting themselves, but also leveling the playing field for the future.

Anyone not living under a rock has heard the feminist dogma that, "Sexism against men is an oxymoron." This idea is taught in universities and parroted by the media, but it is not the truth, and not the law, and anybody who believes it is a different kind of moron.

The Morales-Santana case strikes down a legal preference received by mothers over fathers, finding that it violated the fathers' rights to equal protection under the US Constitution. The case is one of only a few Supreme Court cases that have decided family-law issues on the basis of fundamental rights, making it especially important because the constitutional principles it sets out will now apply to all laws, both state and federal, everywhere in the country. The Court seems to have used this case to make a deliberate statement about father's rights. The court had the option of deciding it on a very narrow basis of "justiciability," meaning that it would reject the case because its unique facts gave no way for the court to craft a legal remedy (more on that below). In fact, Justices Thomas and Alito argued in a concurring opinion that the court should have done just that. But most of the justices disagreed, leading the court to issue a much more sweeping opinion, written by liberal icon Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

The decision stands for the principle that it is unconstitutional for the law to assume either that: (1) unwed fathers are less qualified, entitled, or willing than mothers to take responsibility for their children, or (2) the mother's relationship with the child is more important than the father's. Unfortunately, the court does not synthesize these ideas into precisely such clear and sweeping terms, meaning that it would take some argument and analysis to bring them across in litigation. (Although, the case happened to deal with unmarried parents, its ideas should apply with at least as much force if the parents are married.)

The crux of the Morales-Santana case lies in striking down a law that assumes unwed mothers influence their children more than unwed fathers. The specific issue involved a peculiar legal area of whether or not a child born outside the United States to unwed parents, one of whom is a US citizen, is themselves a US citizen from birth. A federal statute from 1940 governed the question, and the court articulated the concept behind the statute as being that the child would receive citizenship if they were adequately "American in character," based on how American (or not) the people influencing them were. The Americanness of these influencers (specifically the child's parents) was measured by (1) whether the parent was a US citizen, and (2) how many years that parent had spent in the US.

Combining (a) this goal of measuring the child's Americanness with (b) the assumption that mothers have more influence than fathers, Congress enacted a rule allowing the child to be a US citizen if (1) the father was a US citizen and the father had lived in the US for at least ten years[1], at least five of which occurred after the father reach age 14, or (2) the mother was the US citizen and the mother had lived in the US for at least one year, at any time in her life. In other words, the father needs to be much more "American in character" (ten years in the US), than the mother (one year)—based on assuming the father is less important to the child.[1]

The court explained:

> Th[e traditional] unwed-mother-as-natural-guardian notion renders [the law's] gender-based residency rules understandable. Fearing that a foreign-born child could turn out 'more alien than American in character' the [law's writers] believed that a citizen parent with lengthy ties to the United States would counteract the influence of the alien parent. Concern about the attachment of foreign-born children to the United States explains the treatment of unwed citizen fathers, who, according to the familiar stereotype, would care little about, and have scant contact with, their nonmarital children. For unwed citizen mothers, however, there was no need for a prolonged residency prophylactic: The alien father, who might transmit foreign ways, was presumptively out of the picture.

The court had thus set up the pins: finding that the law assumed that children born out of wedlock are influenced more by their mothers than by their fathers. And proceeded to knock them down: invalidating the law as an unconstitutional violation of fathers' equal-protection rights.

"[N]o important governmental interest is served," the court wrote, "by laws grounded . . . in the obsolescing view that unwed fathers are invariably less qualified and entitled than mothers to take responsibility for nonmarital children." More generally, when a law's "objective is to exclude or 'protect' members of one gender in reliance on fixed notions concerning that gender's roles and abilities, the objective itself is illegitimate."

Even if the underlying sex-discriminatory assumption is statistically true, it still violates equal protection. The court wrote:

> Overbroad generalizations . . . have a constraining impact, descriptive though they may be of the way many people still order their lives. Even if stereotypes frozen into legislation have 'statistical support,' our decisions reject measures that classify unnecessarily and overbroadly by gender when more accurate and impartial lines can be drawn.

The court noted that it had previously warned of the dangerous self-fulfilling nature of stereotyping women, and went the further step of acknowledging the same risk as to men:

> Laws according or denying benefits in reliance on stereotypes about women's domestic roles, this Court has [previously] observed may create a self-fulfilling cycle of discrimination that forces women to continue to assume the role as primary family caregiver. Correspondingly, such laws may disserve men who exercise responsibility for raising their children.

The court also included language from which to argue that the law must regard the child-father relationship as on par with child-mother. The court noted that "laws treating fathers and mothers differently may not be constitutionally applied where the mother and father are in fact similarly situated with regard to their relationship with the child." Wonderful, but what does it mean for the father and mother to be "similarly situated"? The court looks to the father's admission of paternity and formation of a relationship with the child. The court distinguished its prior 1983 decision Lehr v. Robertson, stating that in Leher "[t]he similarly situated condition was not satisfied . . . [because] the father in that case had never established any custodial, personal, or financial relationship with the child." The court then contrasted the current facts, writing that "[h]ere, there is no dispute that [the father] formally accepted parental responsibility for his son during [his son's] childhood."

In a cruel twist for Mr. Morales-Santana himself, the court ultimately concluded that even though he was right that the mother-favoring law was unconstitutional, he was not entitled to any relief. After rejecting the mother/father difference, the court had to decide which single rule should be applied to both. Based on a review of the overall statute (which includes other permutations, such as married parents, etc.), it found the unwed mother rule to have been intended as a narrow exception, meaning that it was invalidated, and the father rule should apply to everyone. (This lack of remedy is what led Justices Thomas and Alito to argue against the court even considering the equal-protection argument.)

This new case opens up numerous opportunities for fathers to fight biased laws, but such challenges will not be easy or automatic. They will require dedicated fathers, armed with patience and resources. But in a world where businesses and institutions view anti-male discrimination as not just acceptable, but laudable; where they engage in it openly and with impunity; and where the claim that sexism against men is a definitional impossibility has become de rigueur among the supposedly "woke"; this recent decision provides a welcome reminder of what equality is really about, written by a liberal hero, and delivered by the highest court in the land.

Notes:

[1] A later version of the statute reduced the residency requirement from ten years to five.

[2] Guessing at the child's Americanness may seem a bizarre way of viewing this parental-years-of-residency test. A more obvious tie-in might be that Congress was guessing at how likely the parent would be to return to the US with the child. Nonetheless, Americanness is what Congress discussed in enacting the statute, and is what the court accepted as the law's purpose.

[*] Style note: quotations from the case are simplified to remove internal quotation marks, ellipses, and citations, and to treat footnotes as occurring inline with the text.

A new class of victims: abuse of Title IX at the University of Southern California

John Doe · 29 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Title IX has become increasingly controversial in post-feminist America. The crisis began with a small band of militant feminists pushing Alexander v. Yale (which yoked sexual harassment claims to Title IX theory) to its logical extreme, an effort crystallized in the 2011 Dear Colleague Letter. Like all extremists in history, these "activists" had little concern for the welfare and happiness of the vast majority. The 2011 DCL sought to favor accusers and penalize the accused by depriving the latter of important legal protections[1] and shielding the former under a general metaphysical principle best known as "trauma theory."[2]

Many institutions in the nation have already undergone two waves of legal push backs, first from female complainants and then from male respondents, both groups citing Title IX to defend their civil rights. Generally speaking, the Obama administration has come under fire from libertarians and criminal defense lawyers for what was perceived as unlawful overreach. However, some institutions have also gone far beyond anything ever required by the Obama administration and in an iconic move, the Department of Education condemned Wesley College for systematic bias against the accused.

The legal case against the University of Southern California [hereafter, USC] is complex and massive. The dossier contains at least eight lawsuits pending at the Superior Court, all by male respondents who have contested the fairness of their sanctions. Among these lawsuits, one of them is final: Doe v. University of Southern California. Here, USC attempted to suspend a male student not because he was accused of rape but because he did not stop a different male from committing "sexual assault," the assault in question being an instantaneous butt-slap that happened during otherwise consensual sex.

The Second Court of Appeals sided with Doe and particularly condemned the institution for using hearsay instead of material evidence; the verdict was written by Audrey B. Collins, former Chief Judge of the Central District of California. Other lawsuits are ongoing, but it is worth noting that USC's lawyers have jeopardized the independent conscience of the Court with the prospect of potentially violent protests against judges if they were to rule against the institution [BS163736]. Nor can the University ever defend its actions by saying, "we were applying gender-neutral laws." The University has been in legal trouble with the Department of Education for dismissing the sexual assault complaint of a male student, filed against a female martial artist.[3]

As of April 2016, the Federal investigation was expanded in scope to investigate allegations of systematic anti-male bias and denial of counselling to male students. The Department has also recently opened a retaliation investigation because USC threatened the male complainant with de facto expulsion. The evidence of anti-male bias compiled during the investigation far exceeds the Leval standard set in the Second Circuit of Appeals, recently adopted in California in Doe v. Regents of the University of California, 2:15-cv-02478. There are other documented incidents, such as a feminist group attempting physical violence to stop a gay man from attending Women's March.

So, the question is – why does USC sustain such a hostile atmosphere against male students despite so much legal trouble? Back in 2013, USC found itself under fire by celebrity lawyer Gloria Allred, who filed a federal complaint with the Department of Education on behalf of Tucker Reed. Reed was a radical feminist who believed her rape accusation was unjustly dismissed. She waited for +700 days before coming forward with her claims, however, which coincided with his boyfriend breaking up with him; she was pregnant with the lovechild of the accused man after the alleged incident.

She was hospitalized due to mental health issues; it is also worth noting that she murdered her uncle after a property dispute in the summer of 2016. Gloria Allred's complaint specifically asked the Department to go beyond the already excessive accuser protections adopted in the Resolution Letter with the University of Montana. For example, Allred insisted that %99 of all sexual predators are men while repeating the oft-cited and much-rebuked "1 in 4 women are raped in college" statistic. Neither claim can be taken seriously anymore.[4] Allred nevertheless insisted that USC should monitor the student population until at least 40% of all rapes were reported and disciplined under Title IX theory. If 1 in 4 women are raped and if USC has ~20,000 female students, Allred's proposed model would have the University prosecute/punish approximately 2,000 male students every year.

There are other reasons behind this institutional bias, such as investment in identity politics and the fact that Title IX lawsuits filed by women lead to six-figure settlements while due process complaints filed by men receive far more modest settlements.[5] There are also more parochial reasons unique to USC, such as the fact that the area surrounding the University Park Campus has been undergoing gentrification. The neighborhood has a high crime rate; gang violence and murders are not unheard of. This is a cause of ongoing embarrassment for an institution which demands the highest tuition rates in the nation. Supercilious hysteria about general campus security also infects Title IX proceedings.

USC is currently using an eccentric version of the single-investigator model. In this system, a Title IX investigator collects and reviews the evidence and writes a report which also decides whether a breach of policy occurred or not. One person acts as police, prosecutor, and executor. The report is then relayed to Panel E, who decide whether any sanctions would be appropriate, despite facing discretionary limitations.

The decision is then relayed to the Appeals Panel, who arrive at a final conclusion.[6] This system may seem like a multi-tiered and neutral approach but the illusion unravels under closer scrutiny. Much of the investigative/adjudicative power is concentrated in the hands of two highly biased individuals, Kegan Allee (Assistant Title IX Director) and Gretchen Means (Title IX Coordinator). Kegan Allee is an ultrafeminist fanatic hired soon after the 2013 debacle. She has no legal training but boasts dual degrees in Sociology and Women's Studies.

A detailed analysis of her investigative practice reveals bias at every stage. For example, she engages in dissuasion towards male students who want to file sexual harassment complaints against women, while seeking to maximize the punishments against men. She invents allegations of her own not voiced in the original claim and routinely cites hearsay above material evidence. She even changes dates and merges events whenever necessary. Also, her policy seems to be towards persuading female students to press charges even when they would decline to do so, including situations that involve mutual intoxication.[7] As for Gretchen Means, she is a former prosecutor who specialized in sex crimes in her past. Her bias is less ideological and more professional, but multiple individuals have raised concerns about her integrity and neutrality.

For example, after she has engaged in verbal harassment against a male student by ridiculing his appearance and calling him a "motherfucker," she denied making the comments in Court papers. Needless to say, a male administrator to utter such words against a female student would have been relieved of her duties immediately. The University received protest e-mails after her ugly behavior, but no action has been taken.

The damage caused by their fanaticism is significant. Multiple star athletes have already been ruined by their Title IX policy, including Bryce Dixon and Matt Boermeester. Their archaic "women cannot commit crimes" mentality, coupled with their "always believe the woman, even when evidence says otherwise" policy, has created a systematic pattern of invidious and blatant discrimination. The enrollment rate for male students at USC has dropped down to 45%, an unprecedented low, for 2016-17.

Many male students have confidentially reported that they had to deal with Title IX terror during their education at USC – which led them to experience ostracism, negative mental health, and dropping grades even in situations which did not lead to suspension and expulsion. The fact that there are eight lawsuits and a Federal investigation should speak for itself; since many students fear retaliation and/or cannot afford legal counsel, this number is only a minor fraction of the male victims harmed by Title IX terror at the University of Southern California.

.

[1] Critics have noted that the 2011 DCL contradicted the principle of double jeopardy by allowing accusers to appeal a non-responsible finding while abandoning cross-examination rights, once called “the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth” by the Supreme Court.

[2] There is no clear agreement on what “trauma theory” means. In practice, it is a much-abused principle which is cited to justify even the worst excesses of false reporting, including retroactive withdrawal of consent.

[3] The female perpetrator has also filed a victim-blaming complaint against the male complainant, since “he was manipulating [my emotions by telling me that he was never attracted to me” and “I felt threatened by the way he was making himself a victim” [verbatim statements].

[4] The myth that “all rapists are men” has been sustained for decades due to an archaic definition of rape as “unwanted penetration.” Perhaps the most radical challenge to this myth came from Lara Stemple, Assistant Dean at UCLA. According to her studies, men are equally as likely as women to report sexual violence and the majority of men report female perpetrators. Changing the definition of rape to “coercive sex,” which allows men to speak up against female perpetrators, reveals that men and women suffer and perpetrate almost equal degrees of sexual violence (even though men are far over represented in prosecution).

Also, a Department of Education study entitled Educator Sexual Misconduct: A Synthesis of Existing Literature has found in 2004 that %43 of all teachers who engage in sex with underage partners are women, even though more than %95 of all disciplined/prosecuted individuals are men. The “1 in 4” statistic has been repeatedly debunked for pandering to confirmation bias, defining sexual assault as “any unwelcome act,” and bribing female students (with $5 per survey) into reporting that they have been harassed.

[5] As noted by Stephen Henrick in A Hostile Environment Against Student Defendants.

[6] The Appeals Panel is very effective at rubber-stamping the decisions served in front of them. Ainsley Carrey, who currently leads the Appeals Panel, was involved in the Auburn University decision which found Joshua Strange guilty of rape despite exonerating evidence.

[7] As can be inferred from her citation in a 2013 article, A World According to Rape: “in Allee’s experiences with sexual assault victims, she has noticed that many of them are unaware they have been raped. The victims find excuses to mask rape in college, such as saying that the man was drunk as well” (p. 5).

The legacy of men on their knees

Paul Elam · 2 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Please take a moment to study the feature picture. It was posted to Twitter by an account called History in Pictures and was accompanied by the caption, “Man begs forgiveness in the Chicago divorce court. 1948.”

Let’s take a little thematic apperception test, and put stories into the imagery. What do you imagine is going through this man’s mind? Is he begging for forgiveness for having had an affair? Or is he just promising that he would pay more attention to his wife and be a better, more attentive husband than he had in the past?

Is his kneeling part of an act? Is he artificially contrite, feigning remorse because she has the upper hand and is about to, as saying goes, take him to the cleaners?

Or is he his lover’s fool, pleading with her not to leave him because he cannot imagine his life without her?

And what do you imagine she is thinking, standing there in her fur coat looking at him on his knees? Is she thinking, “That bastard hit me, or cheated on me, or some other unforgivable sin and I am not taking him back.”?

Or is she thinking, “Hell no, he’s a loser. I can keep the house, half his money and continue having sex with the pool boy.”

Maybe she’s thinking, “Now I have him. He’s begging. Maybe I will let him come crawling back through the back door and he will think twice before he ever says no to me again.”

And you know what? All these scenarios are possible. Indeed, whatever you happen to think is the story hidden in this picture, it really doesn’t matter. The point here is that a hundred totally credible stories in any given marriage could result in a man on his knees begging. Power is often hidden in plain view.

The other point here is that we are not dealing with a systemic boogeyman like feminism. We are talking about what men socially evolved to do with women. You are looking at the one true dominance hierarchy. You’re seeing a man emulating the bottom line between men and women – if it isn’t put in check by the man.

I don’t say this as a segue into another anti-marriage rant. Avoiding marriage is a given in most of my work. The point here is something more than that.

It starts with the time of the photograph, almost 70 years ago, clearly a full generation before men-on-their-knees™ gave feminists the power to contaminate everything in their path.

In 1948, with our men finally back from World War II, we were just two years into the great baby boom. It was the heyday of the then modern family, marked by white picket fences, legal marriages of one man to one woman and family units that were largely expected to stay intact. It was a culture that spoke of divorce in whispers.

Yet I am sure that the people of 1948 would have had no problem coming up with their own stories to explain the scene in the picture. Divorce was far less common then, but when it happened it was no less likely to result in man-on-their-knees™ with women making life altering unilateral decisions.

Hail patriarchy, right?

I brought all this up to say that while many men’s issues are definitely tied to feminist doctrine, we would do well to remember that feminism did little more than exploit weakness men were already demonstrating a very long time before feminist power was a thing.

Think of it this way. Most denizens of the online men’s movement are familiar with the loaded gun metaphor. The rationale being not to marry because the state effectively puts a loaded gun in her hand which she can use with impunity any time she wants.

Look closer at the picture. This is the real loaded gun. And it has a man’s finger on the trigger.

Not just as it relates to family court, but as it relates directly to most any of the negative things afflicting men's lives, as expressed in suicide, substance abuse, depression, male disposability, and even male violence.

This is also the only power feminists have or ever have had. Without men-on-their-knees™, there would be no feminism.

We have evidence, through history, that the picture from 1948 doesn't just tell the story of a single man begging for a woman's mercy in a midcentury Chicago courthouse. It shines the light of reality on who men are. And in the worst possible way, it represents the natural order of things.

We started to see this image being expressed over 900 years ago at the dawn of romantic chivalry but there is no telling how long it was a looming part of the collective unconscious.

All of this is likely driven by the reptilian tendency in men to prioritize reproduction immediately after food and shelter. It's that cursed little lizard in our unconscious that ranks the opportunity to scatter seeds up there with breathable air, which our conscious mind continually rationalizes behind walls of denial. With rare exceptions, we will tell ourselves anything but the truth where it comes to women.

Gynocentrism, with all its lamented detriment to men, is seen expressed almost exclusively in the actions of men.

And so for me, what all of this boils down to is a really disturbing thing to think about. We are unlikely to ever see full and sweeping change in how most men relate to women. Those of us who can be honest with ourselves, and who chose to act on what we know rationally, are an aberration; an anomaly that the world doesn't exactly take a shine to.

So many of us have been relegated to the dark comedy section of the world stage. We watch, comment, grieve and sometimes roar in dark laughter about how average men allow themselves, with no help at all, to be broken by average women. You can take that up with God or Darwin as you prefer, but it is what it is.

Blaming feminists or even women is a miss. This is men doing harm to themselves. They have grown accustomed to living life on the lower rung of the dominance ladder with women. And they look to continue doing it to themselves for the next few millennia.

Like I said, the prognosis is bad, globally speaking. Even if we could destroy feminism completely, men would start the cycle again of giving women too much power in their lives. Poor bastards just can't help it.

As I am so fond of reporting, though, there is an answer to all of this for us lowly outliers. The internet, at least for the time being, is enabling an open critique of gynocentrism, and it is finally starting to reach the disparate minority of men capable of brushing aside the gynocentric fog and seeing themselves worthy of something better.

It is providing men a range of options on what to do and arming them with red pill knowledge. Some, as in MGTOW, just pull the plug. They look at the great big stinking mess and say no thanks. Other men take a less absolute approach and use what they know about the real nature of men and women to improve their reproductive odds, hopefully using that same knowledge to decrease their odds of big problems in the process.

Still others do something more minimal, like getting a strong prenup and actually evaluating a woman long enough to determine that she is not a raging personality disorder.

Each way, of course, comes with different levels of risk, but they are all better options than most men have ever been able to learn about in public forums.

Gents, you are living in the first time in human history that men have near universal access to a corrective response to the on-your-knees narrative. This, to me, is as good as it will ever get. At this point in my life, I am happily prepared to look at the world of men and just be satisfied to the point of smugness that all those bent knees and long looks down the nose are not a part of the way I live, or that I will ever live.

I sincerely hope that does not come as callously indifferent to men who are suffering in ignorance and unteachable.

I would not wish the consequences of blind gynocentrism on anyone. But the fact is now that we can point to a virtual Mount Everest of highly thoughtful commentary on what is actually happening between men and women. The truth, with truckloads of support, is a click away from anyone curious. I am all for letting Mr. Darwin take it from there.

And that is a good thing because the more this new narrative opens up, the more we are seeing that a lot of men aggressively pursue the path of ignorance. I suspect that is also a function of the gynocentrism. That gynocentrism, if viewed objectively, provides ample reasons for lower functioning men to stay in the dark about who they are. After all, who wants to look at themselves when it means a look down?

It's a shame that most of them can't see that a dose of introspection and a little bit of logic would bring them to their feet.

Masturbation and marriage

Dr. David Ley · 4 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Married people do masturbate. Let's just get that out of the way at the front. The idea that marriage fulfills all sexual needs, and that married people have no need to masturbate, has been pretty thoroughly destroyed by modern society. Married people do, in general, end up having more sex than single people, on average. And numerous studies do show that being single or newly divorced often predicts an increase in both porn-watching and masturbation (mostly in men).

But, being married isn't a "cure" for masturbation. Historically, masturbation by married people was seen as taking something away from marriage (here, it's called "The secret that ruins great sex"), and often was seen as an indication that something was wrong in the relationship, especially if it involves fantasy about people other than one's partner. Either the wife was not giving her husband what he "needed" or the husband's desires were out of proportion for the marriage.

People masturbate for a variety of reasons, including desire for sexual pleasure, stress release, and to experience private, self-focused sensations without the distraction of a partner. But when people masturbate within the context of an intimate relationship, it can be valuable to understand the motivations behind it.

Two main theories have been promoted about the relationship between masturbation and partnered sex. The complementary theory proposes that people masturbate within a relationship in order to enhance their partnered sex. So, masturbation might increase and improve the partnered sex. In contrast, the compensatory model suggests that people in relationships masturbate as a means to substitute for sexual desires (whether in quantity, quality or type) that go unmet within the relationship. Alternatively, it has also been suggested that masturbation and partnered sex are two separate, perhaps even parallel behaviors, meeting different needs.

Men and women appear to approach the issue of masturbation and marriage differently, and it has been suggested that men use masturbation in compensatory ways, and women use it in complementary ways. But, as with many things, the reality turns out to be more nuanced.

A recently published study by Regnerus, Price and Gordon examined this issue, with a very large sample of Americans (7648 men and 8090 women). This was a nonclinical sample, and was drawn by probability methods, so these data are the best estimate of how this issue is reflected in the general population, allowing us to generalize these results. The study controlled traits such as age and gender, which correlate with masturbatory frequency, and included an important, highly revealing third factor.

This study, for the first time, also considered the question of how sexually contented/satisfied a person is within their relationship. Though this seems pretty intuitive, this variable had not been considered in the past.

Overall results indicated that the frequency of recent sex within the relationship had little connection to the frequency of masturbation. But, when the variable of sexual contentment was considered, strong relationships started to show up in the results. Notably, People who reported being sexually content within their relationship were thirty percent less likely to report masturbating in the last two weeks. In a probability sample of this size, a thirty percent difference like this is indicative of a large effect.

Gender differences emerged in the results as well, showing that women who were more sexually content with the amount of sex in their relationship were actually more likely to report masturbation. Women who were sexually content, but reported no sex in the last two weeks disclosed masturbation at rates of 21%, compared to other women who were sexually content, reporting sex four or more times, 33% of whom reported masturbation.

In men, these relationships were even stronger. Men who were sexually discontented reported the highest rates of masturbation, and showed the strongest relationship between frequency of partnered sex and masturbation. Sexually discontented men who had no sex recently reported high rates of masturbation (79%), compared to only 60% in men who had had sex four or more times. But, sexual discontentment was less predictive of masturbation in women, with much less relationship to sexual frequency. Women who are sexually unsatisfied, but have an active sex life are more likely to masturbate, compared to unsatisfied women who weren't having much sex. Interestingly, sexually contented men who had sex once in the last two weeks were more likely to report masturbation, whereas sexually contented men who reported no sex were much less likely to have masturbated.

What these results suggest is that the variable of sexual contentment works as a mediating variable between the frequency of sex and frequency of masturbation, but appears to work differently for men and women.

The authors suggest that the different theories explaining masturbation and marriage fit men and women, based on the issue of sexual contentment. Sexually satisfied women's masturbation fits a complementary model, suggesting that these women's masturbation is working to enhance partnered sex, essentially "priming the pump." But for men, the compensatory model fits, but only for sexually dissatisfied, discontent men. If the man is unhappy with the frequency of sex in the relationship, he's more likely to masturbate more frequently when he has less frequent sex. But, if the man is sexually content with the frequency of sex, he doesn't masturbate more often when he has less sex. Interestingly, sexually discontented women masturbate about as frequently as sexually contented men.

An important result emerged, which helps to understand the importance of the sexual contentment variable. 57% of women in this sample reported feeling sexually content, compared to only 42% of men. This means there are a LOT more men out there in relationships, feeling unsatisfied, and masturbating to meet their needs. In both men and women, feeling dissatisfied with sex in the relationship predicted more masturbation (64% vs 35%). Masturbatory frequency is often used as an indicator of libido and sexual desire, and so in these results, the level of dissatisfaction and masturbation frequency likely indicates couples with mismatched libido, where one partner wants sex more frequently than the other.

But, masturbation was strongly tied to sexual discontentment, and not as much to sexual frequency. So, the mental state of being sexually dissatisfied is not likely to be met or changed just by increased sexual frequency. Instead, people masturbate more when they are sexually unsatisfied, to meet needs other than just frequency of orgasms. It's not about the number of orgasms, but more about the mental state and qualitative factors involved.

People who are content having little to no sex masturbate very infrequently. Women who are having lots of sex, and feel sexually content, masturbate more, whereas men who feel sexually dissatisfied and are having less sex masturbate more.

This research is critically important to begin to understand the nuanced, varying relationships between porn use and marriage. Men who watch porn in secret often experience negative relationship outcomes. Why are these men watching porn in secret? Because they are sexually unsatisfied, can't talk about it or negotiate it within the marriage, and are masturbating to porn to compensate.

In men, around 95% of porn use involves masturbation. So, we must begin to consider the question of sexual contentment as we examine the effects of porn use. It's likely that women who watch porn are more sexually content, and watching it in a complementary manner, whereas male use reflects a level of sexual dissatisfaction. The feelings of sexual contentment are the important issue to examine, and frequency of porn use or masturbation appear to be an indicator of sexual satisfaction. Therapists can best help couples by assisting them to discuss their sexual needs, negotiate around sexual frequency, and develop win-win approaches to sex.

Opioid overdose epidemic sex-biased toward male deaths

Douglas Galbi · 7 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Opioid Overdose Deaths By Sex
(deaths per 100,000 in U.S. in 2015)

age group	women's death rate	men's death rate	men / women death ratio
ages 15 to 24	4.7	11.3	2.4
ages 25 to 44	13.5	31.7	2.3
ages 45 to 64	13.4	21.3	1.6
Source: Rudd et al. (2016b), using official data.

The number of persons killing themselves with drug overdoses is rapidly increasing. Drug overdose deaths in the U.S. rose 211% from 1999 to 2015 to a total of about 52,000 drug overdose deaths in 2015.[1] Deaths from drug overdoses number nearly three times greater than homicide deaths.[2] Many persons worry about guns in the hands of others. Drugs that persons put into their own bodies are a far more prevalent cause of death. Persons' own despair kills them much more often than other persons' violence does.

A large and rapidly growing category of drug overdose deaths is opioid overdose deaths. From 2014 to 2015, opioid overdose deaths increased 22%. In 2015, about 75% of drug overdose deaths involved an opioid. About a third of opioid overdose deaths involved heroin.[3] Heroin is a drug that's not legally prescribed for anything. Heroin is a drug for intentional self-destruction.

About twice as many men kill themselves with opioid overdoses as do women. The age pattern in the sex ratio of opioid overdose deaths underscores men's sexed despair. The sex ratio drops for persons ages 45 and over.[4] Sexual competition decreases considerable as persons age out of midlife. Men's despair is connected to men's sexual interests.

A profound cause for men's despair is lack of public concern about men's deaths. Men die from violence more than four times more frequently than women do. While the facts of men's higher violent death rate and lower lifespan are readily available, they are publicly ignored. Underscoring contempt for men's lives, the U.S government has committed billions of dollars to programs addressing violence against women. No such programs exists for violence against men. Elites proclaim that violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem in the world today. Media reports on the opioid epidemic similarly ignore that the opioid epidemic is sex-biased toward men's deaths.[5]

Public leaders must address the real reasons for men's despair. Societies in which a large and increasing number of men are killing themselves are sick societies. Ignoring that problem, and viciously suppressing discussion of injustices against men, makes for an unprecedented age of deceptions and lies.

Notes:

[1] Hedegaard, Warner & Miniño (2017), calculated from the data for Figure 1.

[2] Homicide deaths in the U.S. are readily available from the WISQARS system of the U.S. National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC.

[3] Calculated from Tables 1 & 2 in Rudd et al. (2016b). Here's a spreadsheet showing the details of my calculations and additional data. Rudd (2016a) provides a longer term perspective on opioid overdose deaths.

[4] Calculated from Tables 1 & 2 in Rudd et al. (2016b). See spreadsheet. Men are also more likely to suffer dose escalation and overdose death in clinical use of opioids. See Kaplovitch et al. (2015).

[5] Since 1999, men's and women's opioid deaths have risen in tandem, with men's deaths consistently about twice women's deaths. Men's and women's lives are intimately related. Men's despair is a primary source of women's despair.

References:

Hedegaard, Holly; Warner, Margaret; Miniño, Arialdi M. 2017. "Drug overdose deaths in the United States, 1999–2015." NCHS data brief, no 273 (February). Hyattsville, MD: National Center for Health Statistics.

Kaplovitch, Eric, Tara Gomes, Ximena Camacho, Irfan A. Dhalla, Muhammad M. Mamdani, David N. Juurlink, and Barbara Mintzes. 2015. "Sex Differences in Dose Escalation and Overdose Death during Chronic Opioid Therapy: A Population-Based Cohort Study." PLOS ONE. 10 (8): e0134550.

Rudd, Rose A.; Aleshire, Noah; Zibbell Jon E.; and Gladden, R. Matthew. 2016a. "Increases in drug and opioid overdose deaths — United States, 2000-2014." Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report. 64 (50-51): 1378-1382.

Rudd Rose A.; Seth, Puja; David, Felicita; Scholl, Lawrence. 2016b. "Increases in Drug and Opioid-Involved Overdose Deaths — United States, 2010–2015." Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report (MMWR) 65 (Dec. 30):1445–1452.

Published under Creative Commons license.

For real love to arise, romantic love must die. Part one.

Paul Elam · 8 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I am going to start this with an email I received, with thanks to a young man named Jason who sent in a question that came with an overview of part of his life. In my mind that question was incisive and relevant enough that I want to answer it publicly, which he has granted me permission to do.

Without further ado, here's the email:

> I'm 21. I dated once when I was 16, and the way it ended hurt pretty badly. Naturally I blamed myself in the end, but looking back on it I see that, while I made mistakes, she was just as guilty. It took me until now to even discover the Men's Human Rights Movement, and the more I watch, the more concerned with how cynical I become. I'm a University student attending school for a degree in Business Administration with a minor in Gaming Entrepreneurship with goals to go into the Esports Entertainment industry. I've never once considered anything other than the fact I was doing it for myself, so I'm not questioning my choices. However, there is one thing that I have become concerned about.
>
> You are right when you state in multiple videos you've posted that humans are naturally inclined to pair bond. I suppose my biggest concern is that, knowing female nature, and knowing that society is largely to blame for allowing it to get this far, is it possible to still love a woman and accept that nature may still exist even if she does respect your boundaries and values? I don't want to believe swearing off women forever is the answer like MGTOW suggests, but I also have a hard time buying that I'll really ever trust a woman knowing these things about how most women are. Really, the question boils down to this; is being Red Pilled synonymous with being cynical?

Ok, that's the complete message; two brief paragraphs that cut to the core of a very important crossroads for those just ingesting the red pill, especially those doing it in the earlier parts of their lives.

Jason is 100% right about the paradox of modern relationships from a man's perspective. Most of my observations force me to conclude that we live in a culture where men and women collude to produce a female psyche that, as it stands, is nothing short of a miserably poor investment for men.

It starts with the way we laud and encourage women for showing contempt for us.

If you don't believe that, think of it this way. One of the subjects we see visited and revisited in men's movement literature is that of male bashing in commercial advertising. We take issue with retailers for their treatment of men and fathers as hapless idiots who can't tie their shoes without instructions from the women in their lives. With some regularity, you still see commentary and comments about boycotts of these companies.

What we don't talk about too much, perhaps because it's painful, is that advertisers are only doing what works. Stumbling, bumbling, pathetic men are a go-to option for advertisers because that is what the majority of women consumers want to see. Belittling and insulting men triggers them to buy.

Not to keep flogging the dead horse, but for this and other reasons we instill a level of assumed entitlement in women that we could reasonably use as part of the diagnostic criteria for personality disorders. We passionately encourage women to indulge in and brazenly exploit double standards that favor them as a part of the natural order. We make heroines of women when they viciously use the powerful tools we put at their disposal any time their privilege is denied.

If you notice I keep saying we, it's because I mean it. None of this crap happens in a vacuum, which red pill men are well-served to remember (and often don't). Remember the hateful way advertisers sell to women? Well, the trashing of you, your sons, your brothers and fathers has zero impact on male spending. You can belittle, bash, berate and derogate men all you want and their typical response is to reach in their wallet and give you their hard-earned money.

Like I said. WE.

So, Jason, is being red pill synonymous with being cynical? Well, to some degree it better be but I imagine that short answer doesn't get to the heart of your question.

What I am really getting from this email is the question of whether your informed outlook on women will rob you of the positive parts of the pair bonding experience. It's worth exploring, because as Jason pointed out quite rightly, another bit of reality in this picture for red pill men is that most all of them will continue to pair bond. That being inarguably true, we need an answer to the very legitimate question of whether taking a red pill is dooming a man to consciously chosen isolation for life.

Are there only two options for red pill men, the often-lonely life of a monk that most men don't want, or living in hypervigilance, constantly wary of the women they're with – and the lingering sense loneliness that surely comes with that?

It's almost enough to make a man want a red pill detox. Almost.

I happen to think I have figured out a path through this problem. It's a narrow, difficult path, but one that can at least nudge the problem toward the solved category. And it has a big plus. It is ultimately a huge step toward end-game red pill. It reveals the incredible usefulness of red pill thinking that goes far beyond our choices about women by forcing us to walk through some fire about our relationships with them.

I can even present you with a specific formula to make it happen. I call it, 'how to stay red pill in a relationship with a woman in three incredibly difficult, torturous and painful steps.' OK, that's a bit of an exaggeration, but you get my point. This stuff isn't easy.

Step one is to get the difference between love and romantic love. This isn't something you can intellectualize yourself into understanding. It is a big, big deal. It is so important that you are well advised spend a good deal of time thinking about it, and challenging yourself.

Romantic love, the kind that western humans have been steeped in for nearly a thousand years, is a gynocentric cancer that you have been afflicted with, likely since your days in the womb. You don't need to be cynical to see this. You only have to have your eyes open and set in front of a functional brain.

Romantic love is a narrative of male sacrifice in exchange for sex and to some degree approval. It is likely based on and driven by the state of infatuation, a naturally occurring form of psychosis that serves human reproduction. Romantic love takes that temporary insanity and turns it into a mandate for men to maintain it in perpetuity. On its face, it's a perfect storm of sexual selection, male sacrifice and male disposability, which is really just three different ways of saying gynocentrism.

It's a fairy tale, gents; a dime store romance novel that should have no more place in the thinking of sane men than the synonymous self-castration. It is the "You complete me," Jerry McGuire bullshit fantasy of love that delivers the upper hand to women. And it needs to be dispensed with.

It is funny how some westerners look condescendingly at arranged marriages. In other words, marriages between people who may not even have met, and who know next to nothing about each other. These are marriages that don't originate with the spark of infatuation.

I have seen lots of westerners talk about these marriages in mocking terms, as though they were the quaint practices of some primitive cultures that are not up to their enlightened standards.

They sneer at the formation of arranged families, and fancy that marriages starting with a temporary, insane rush of neurochemicals is a more sophisticated standard. And in doing so they all but totally destroy the possibility of love.

Love and romantic love are two entirely different things. Love is a product of learned experience, negotiating conflicts and outright battles for control. It comes from enduring hardship as a team and to some degree developing mutual dependence.

It is an arduous, often bloody affair that requires both people share interests that serve them both, and sometimes to scratch and claw at each other resolve conflict. And interestingly, for couples first bonded by romantic love, it requires them to grieve the loss of that which brought them together. The expectations and standards of romantic, or more accurately gynocentric love, are simply impossible to maintain. And trying to only breeds a toxicity of which men are the primary victims. So, for love to arise, romantic love must die.

The point here is not to just compare east and west in how they traditionally choose to pair bond, but to point out that as a western, red pill man, your programmed beliefs about pair-bonding are deeply flawed.

Just because you have found great benefit in learning red pill philosophy doesn't mean you are no longer affected by those beliefs. After all, ideas can change rapidly with new information. Beliefs, on the other hand, linger. They quietly and unconsciously pull strings in our thinking long after information to the contrary registers consciously.

Changing this requires a man to constantly challenge his beliefs. If a man thinks that women are responsible human beings capable of accountability, but he struggles to treat them that way, then it is because despite what he thinks, what he believes is that it is wrong to hold a woman's feet to the fire. Thus, he feels guilty and stays silent and cowed.

Note what Jason said in his email. I am going to quote him again. "Naturally, I blamed myself in the end," he said, "but looking back on it I see that, while I made mistakes, she was just as guilty."

Naturally, I blamed myself in the end. Or, allow me to paraphrase him slightly here, 'Blaming myself is natural.'

Straight out of the gynocentric handbook. A living artifact of romantic love, powerful enough to prompt any man who really looks at it to find an escape, into sexual isolation or perhaps into lifelong cynicism.

And here is where I am going to suggest that pragmatism is a lot more valuable than cynicism to a man contemplating pair bonding. The problem with romantic programming, which I remind you is your programming, is that infatuation, the very foundation of romantic love, prohibits pragmatism. It lends you toward creating an idealized picture of the woman, and then creating a fiction around her that fits your unrealistic view. In other words, it tends to have you making shit up because reality might destroy the neurochemical glow of infatuation.

How many times have you heard men say, "Oh, no, my Cupcake would never do that," when cupcake is broadcasting at 50 thousand watts that she can't be trusted any further than you could throw her car?

Most men, the lion's share, are utterly doomed to mindlessly waxing poetic about Cupcake till she moves in for the kill. They are hopelessly mired in the gynocentric bog. They won't be heard from again till archeologists in the 30th century unearth their mummified, and completely fleeced remains.

I don't think that Jason has to be one of these men, and I don't think that cynicism, or the isolation of a monk's life is what is going to prevent it. If he chooses, Jason still has at least a shot at the only kind of love or contentment with pair bonding people ever really experience, as long as he is willing to hold his own feet to the fire, as well as any woman with which he gets involved.

I will be explaining all this in part two of this series, coming next.

A word between men from Paul

Paul Elam · 9 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

As any AVFM old timer could tell you, those who have worked together here, with the dedicated support of readers, have a lot to smile about. AVFM cut a huge swath through the social discussion about sexual politics, opening a lot of new ground for men's issues – and challenging the hell out of feminist corruption.

So far in nine years, our battle-pitted armor has gained some patina with the hosting of three International Conferences on Men's Issues, aiming for a fourth. We survived continuous takedown attempts by a legion of fake news outlets. And we attracted a filmmaker who started out to expose the supposed misogyny driving this movement but ended up blowing the lid off modern feminism and highlighting a host of men's issues in a way that leaves audiences in tears.

Make no mistake, without AVFM the Red Pill Movie would never have been made.

What's that you say? Paul is bragging about AVFM, he must want money.

Well, this is indeed a pitch for your support of this important website. As I announced not too long ago, the plans for AVFM's future are reflected in our new tagline below the logo. "Men's Health. No Apologies."

Since we have kicked in the door on the idea of having the discussion, and the gynocentrists no longer have the floor to themselves, AVFM can finally serve men and boys better with guidance on life solutions in the nongynocentric realm, specifically in the area of men's mental health.

The tough part is that for us it means starting over and gradually rebuilding AVFM into the new model. We will be screening, selecting and working with mental health professionals as potential contributors to the literature here. The conferences will continue but I am also drafting a model of weekend workshops/retreats for groups of men that can be replicated.

Going from in-your-face antagonism of the status quo to real world outreach takes a lot time and effort, especially on a shoestring budget. So, I am coming to you for help.

At the top of the right sidebar to this site, you will find a subscription button, where you can contribute as little as a dollar a month. Five dollars a month means you won't see Google ads on the site. And you can subscribe at virtually any amount you want. You will also find a donation button, where you can make a one-time donation in any amount. There are options there to mail checks or money orders for those who prefer to avoid PayPal.

I will be leaving this request up in this annoyingly high-profile spot for the next 10 days with hopes that you will part with a little of your hard-earned money to help us get from where we are to where we want to be. Help us build an emotional, intellectual underground railroad for men escaping the dead end of blue pill life.

Thanks in advance to all those who pitch in.

When distaste overrides logic

Jewel Eldora · 11 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In my recent series for AVFM, I've discussed the universality of social bias, even among sophisticated professors in the fields that study bias. Today, I'll be explore how very smart, very logical, very rational people can sometimes believe things and ignore contrary evidence if they find its implications distasteful.

A (now former) Google Engineer, James Damore recently wrote a memo about what he perceived as an ideological echo chamber at the search giant regarding limits of expression in regard to the biological differences between men and women.

Damore, who studied systems biology at Harvard, released the document, which created internal conflict and then circulated widely, and is now receiving much scorn for its alleged ignorance and misogyny.

I find it interesting that none of these articles linked to the actual research he was citing. Below we'll post his entire article, including links to the scientific research he references. We'll also include the commentary from the CEO and statement from Google's newly minted Vice President of Diversity, Integrity, and Governance, Danielle Brown, as well as a link to Damore's interview with Jordan B. Peterson.

As my readers know, my articles aren't always written to tell you what to think, but to challenge commonly held beliefs to open discussion. As a result, the comments tend to be more informative than the articles.

First, let's dispel the notion that Googlers are simply stupid ideologues.

Google is a mission and data driven company, to a degree most people would never realize. Googlers are likely smarter than you, understand logic better than you, are more technical and better educated than you. This isn't necessarily a reflection on you as an individual, it's just to say that as a distribution of individuals, Googlers tend to share these attributes in greater quantity than the general public.

Googlers are among the smartest most driven people in the world and Google is always hiring. Always.

Google has been getting its ass sued by the US Government for not hiring enough women and minority engineers. Google spends tons of money on programs to get more women and minorities into tech careers, because they need them. They are not spending millions and millions of dollars getting people into tech careers. This is likely because Google is an organization made of humans, and the majority of humans view men and boys as function objects who should be able to solve problems on their own.

A Different "Google" Perspective

The Minnesota Google Women Techmakers lead is the smartest woman I know. Her father taught nuclear engineering at a naval college and when she was a little girl, she loved solving logic problems like other girls liked NKOTB.

By day, she works for a metal fabrication engineering firm and at night, runs a media production and web development company. She is constantly researching new technologies and gets off on teaching others to leverage technology in their own lives. She organizes multiple tech groups, gives technical talks at conferences, teaches television production engineering, and fixes the computers of the old ladies in the Minneapolis neighborhood where she grew up.

If you are in the Twin Cities tech scene, you probably know who I'm talking about, and you know I'm not exaggerating about her – she's badass. She burns the midnight oil. Every. Single. Night.

If you ask her what kind of feminist she is, she'll ask you, "What kind of feminist was Grace Hopper?", referring to the Navy Rear Admiral who won the first ever Computer Science Man-of-the-Year Award in 1969.

"When 60's feminists were tripping balls at Woodstock, Grace Hopper was running the Navy Programming Languages Group, in the Navy's Office of Information Systems Planning" she continues, "or maybe I'd be a feminist like Hedy Lamarr" referring to the movie bombshell engineer who patented Bluetooth in 1942.

This woman loves technology, she loves people, and she loves Google because they make difficult things easy and accessible. She believes accessibility solves for ultimate diversity, and that the individual is the ultimate minority.

This is where she agrees with James Damore's statements, and finds his firing for falling outside the accepted belief systems to be distasteful. The most important kind of diversity is not that of gender or race, but of thoughts and ideas. When we squelch the open discussion of things, even when they're uncomfortable, we shut down true innovation and progress.

Maybe if we don't look at it, it won't exist

Googlers are smart, logical people. Perhaps even smart, logical people will look away from facts they view as complex or unnerving. Perhaps an open discussion about the biological differences between men and women is so complex and boundary violating, we dare not even look at them or share our opinions.

As this column is dedicated to Grossness in Human Relations, we intentionally look at unnerving things, where others would happily avert their eyes.

A reader wrote recently, "When the house gets flooded and backed up, drains wash shit all over. You've gotta overcome your disgust response and get fucking cleaning." James Damore may just serve as the Little Dutch Boy who stopped the dam before it broke, or maybe it's already broken. As always, you get to decide.

The following shows biological research which suggests men and women may be biologically different, and the reactions of people who find the implications of that offensive or distasteful.

You have been warned.

Interview with Jordan B. Peterson:

Update 8/13: "Business Insider" article characterized Dr. Jordan B. Peterson, who identifies as a Classic British liberal, as a "far right" and he defends himself.

Google CEO Response:

From: Sundar

Subject: Our words matter

This has been a very difficult few days. I wanted to provide an update on the memo that was circulated over this past week.

First, let me say that we strongly support the right of Googlers to express themselves, and much of what was in that memo is fair to debate, regardless of whether a vast majority of Googlers disagree with it. However, portions of the memo violate our Code of Conduct and cross the line by advancing harmful gender stereotypes in our workplace. Our job is to build great products for users that make a difference in their lives. To suggest a group of our colleagues have traits that make them less biologically suited to that work is offensive and not OK. It is contrary to our basic values and our Code of Conduct, which expects "each Googler to do their utmost to create a workplace culture that is free of harassment, intimidation, bias and unlawful discrimination."

The memo has clearly impacted our co-workers, some of whom are hurting and feel judged based on their gender. Our co-workers shouldn't have to worry that each time they open their mouths to speak in a meeting, they have to prove that they are not like the memo states, being "agreeable" rather than "assertive," showing a "lower stress tolerance," or being "neurotic."

At the same time, there are co-workers who are questioning whether they can safely express their views in the workplace (especially those with a minority viewpoint). They too feel under threat, and that is also not OK. People must feel free to express dissent. So to be clear again, many points raised in the memo — such as the portions criticizing Google's trainings, questioning the role of ideology in the workplace, and debating whether programs for women and underserved groups are sufficiently open to all — are important topics. The author had a right to express their views on those topics — we encourage an environment in which people can do this and it remains our policy to not take action against anyone for prompting these discussions.

The past few days have been very difficult for many at the company, and we need to find a way to debate issues on which we might disagree — while doing so in line with our Code of Conduct. I'd encourage each of you to make an effort over the coming days to reach out to those who might have different perspectives from your own. I will be doing the same.

I have been on work related travel in Africa and Europe the past couple of weeks and had just started my family vacation here this week. I have decided to return tomorrow as clearly there's a lot more to discuss as a group — including how we create a more inclusive environment for all.

So please join me, along with members of the leadership team at a town hall on Thursday. Check your calendar soon for details.

— Sundar

VP of Diversity and Inclusion's Statement:

Googlers,
I'm Danielle, Google's brand new VP of Diversity, Integrity & Governance. I started just a couple of weeks ago, and I had hoped to take another week or so to get the lay of the land before introducing myself to you all. But given the heated debate we've seen over the past few days, I feel compelled to say a few words.
Many of you have read an internal document shared by someone in our engineering organization, expressing views on the natural abilities and characteristics of different genders, as well as whether one can speak freely of these things at Google. And like many of you, I found that it advanced incorrect assumptions about gender. I'm not going to link to it here as it's not a viewpoint that I or this company endorses, promotes or encourages.
Diversity and inclusion are a fundamental part of our values and the culture we continue to cultivate. We are unequivocal in our belief that diversity and inclusion are critical to our success as a company, and we'll continue to stand for that and be committed to it for the long haul. As Ari Balogh said in his internal G+ post, "Building an open, inclusive environment is core to who we are, and the right thing to do. 'Nuff said. "
Google has taken a strong stand on this issue, by releasing its demographic data and creating a company wide OKR on diversity and inclusion. Strong stands elicit strong reactions. Changing a culture is hard, and it's often uncomfortable. But I firmly believe Google is doing the right thing, and that's why I took this job.
Part of building an open, inclusive environment means fostering a culture in which those with alternative views, including different political views, feel safe sharing their opinions. But that discourse needs to work alongside the principles of equal employment found in our Code of Conduct, policies, and anti-discrimination laws.
I've been in the industry for a long time, and I can tell you that I've never worked at a company that has so many platforms for employees to express themselves—TGIF, Memegen, internal G+, thousands of discussion groups. I know this conversation doesn't end with my email today. I look forward to continuing to hear your thoughts as I settle in and meet with Googlers across the company.
Thanks,
Danielle

Link to James Demore's entire memo (with research)

Text-only of the memo:

Reply to public response and misrepresentation
I value diversity and inclusion, am not denying that sexism exists, and don't endorse using stereotypes. When addressing the gap in representation in the population, we need to look at population level differences in distributions. If we can't have an honest discussion about this, then we can never truly solve the problem. Psychological safety is built on mutual respect and acceptance, but unfortunately our culture of shaming and misrepresentation is disrespectful and unaccepting of anyone outside its echo chamber. Despite what the public response seems to have been, I've gotten many personal messages from fellow Googlers expressing their gratitude for bringing up these very important issues which they agree with but would never have the courage to say or defend because of our shaming culture and the possibility of being fired. This needs to change.

TL:DR
Google's political bias has equated the freedom from offense with psychological safety, but shaming into silence is the antithesis of psychological safety.
This silencing has created an ideological echo chamber where some ideas are too sacred to be honestly discussed.
The lack of discussion fosters the most extreme and authoritarian elements of this ideology.
Extreme: all disparities in representation are due to oppression
Authoritarian: we should discriminate to correct for this oppression
Differences in distributions of traits between men and women may in part explain why we don't have 50% representation of women in tech and leadership. Discrimination to reach equal representation is unfair, divisive, and bad for business.

Background [1]
People generally have good intentions, but we all have biases which are invisible to us. Thankfully, open and honest discussion with those who disagree can highlight our blind spots and help us grow, which is why I wrote this document.[2] Google has several biases and honest discussion about these biases is being silenced by the dominant ideology. What follows is by no means the complete story, but it's a perspective that desperately needs to be told at Google.

Google's biases
At Google, we talk so much about unconscious bias as it applies to race and gender, but we rarely discuss our moral biases. Political orientation is actually a result of deep moral preferences and thus biases. Considering that the overwhelming majority of the social sciences, media, and Google lean left, we should critically examine these prejudices.

Left Biases
Compassion for the weak
Disparities are due to injustices
Humans are inherently cooperative
Change is good (unstable)
Open Idealist

Right Biases:
Respect for the strong/authority
Disparities are natural and just Humans are inherently competitive
Change is dangerous (stable)
Closed Pragmatic

Neither side is 100% correct and both viewpoints are necessary for a functioning society or, in this case, company. A company too far to the right may be slow to react, overly hierarchical, and untrusting of others. In contrast, a company too far to the left will constantly be changing (deprecating much loved services), over diversify its interests (ignoring or being ashamed of its core business), and overly trust its employees and competitors.

Only facts and reason can shed light on these biases, but when it comes to diversity and inclusion, Google's left bias has created a politically correct monoculture that maintains its hold by shaming dissenters into silence. This silence removes any checks against encroaching extremist and authoritarian policies. For the rest of this document, I'll concentrate on the extreme stance that all differences in outcome are due to differential treatment and the authoritarian element that's required to actually discriminate to create equal representation.

Possible non-bias causes of the gender gap in tech [3]
At Google, we're regularly told that implicit (unconscious) and explicit biases are holding women back in tech and leadership. Of course, men and women experience bias, tech, and the workplace differently and we should be cognizant of this, but it's far from the whole story.

On average, men and women biologically differ in many ways. These differences aren't just socially constructed because:
They're universal across human cultures
They often have clear biological causes and links to prenatal testosterone
Biological males that were castrated at birth and raised as females often still identify and act like males
The underlying traits are highly heritable
They're exactly what we would predict from an evolutionary psychology perspective

Note, I'm not saying that all men differ from women in the following ways or that these differences are "just." I'm simply stating that the distribution of preferences and abilities of men and women differ in part due to biological causes and that these differences may explain why we don't see equal representation of women in tech and leadership. Many of these differences are small and there's significant overlap between men and women, so you can't say anything about an individual given these population level distributions.

Personality differences
Women, on average, have more:
Openness directed towards feelings and aesthetics rather than ideas. Women generally also have a stronger interest in people rather than things, relative to men (also interpreted as empathizing vs. systemizing). These two differences in part explain why women relatively prefer jobs in social or artistic areas. More men may like coding because it requires systemizing and even within SWEs, comparatively more women work on front end, which deals with both people and aesthetics.

Extraversion expressed as gregariousness rather than assertiveness. Also, higher agreeableness.
This leads to women generally having a harder time negotiating salary, asking for raises, speaking up, and leading. Note that these are just average differences and there's overlap between men and women, but this is seen solely as a women's issue. This leads to exclusory programs like Stretch and swaths of men without support.

Neuroticism (higher anxiety, lower stress tolerance). This may contribute to the higher levels of anxiety women report on Googlegeist and to the lower number of women in high stress jobs.
Note that contrary to what a social constructionist would argue, research suggests that "greater nation-level gender equality leads to psychological dissimilarity in men's and women's personality traits." Because as "society becomes more prosperous and more egalitarian, innate dispositional differences between men and women have more space to develop and the gap that exists between men and women in their personality becomes wider." We need to stop assuming that gender gaps imply sexism.

Men's higher drive for status

We always ask why we don't see women in top leadership positions, but we never ask why we see so many men in these jobs. These positions often require long, stressful hours that may not be worth it if you want a balanced and fulfilling life.

Status is the primary metric that men are judged on[4], pushing many men into these higher paying, less satisfying jobs for the status that they entail. Note, the same forces that lead men into high pay/high stress jobs in tech and leadership cause men to take undesirable and dangerous jobs like coal mining, garbage collection, and firefighting, and suffer 93% of work-related deaths.

Non-discriminatory ways to reduce the gender gap
Below I'll go over some of the differences in distribution of traits between men and women that I outlined in the previous section and suggest ways to address them to increase women's representation in tech and without resorting to discrimination.

Google is already making strides in many of these areas, but I think it's still instructive to list them:
Women on average show a higher interest in people and men in things
We can make software engineering more people-oriented with pair programming and more collaboration. Unfortunately, there may be limits to how people-oriented certain roles and Google can be and we shouldn't deceive ourselves or students into thinking otherwise (some of our programs to get female students into coding might be doing this).
Women on average are more cooperative
Allow those exhibiting cooperative behavior to thrive. Recent updates to Perf may be doing this to an extent, but maybe there's more we can do. This doesn't mean that we should remove all competitiveness from Google. Competitiveness and self reliance can be valuable traits and we shouldn't necessarily disadvantage those that have them, like what's been done in education. Women on average are more prone to anxiety. Make tech and leadership less stressful. Google already partly does this with its many stress reduction courses and benefits.
Women on average look for more work-life balance while men have a higher drive for status on average
Unfortunately, as long as tech and leadership remain high status, lucrative careers, men may disproportionately want to be in them. Allowing and truly endorsing (as part of our culture) part time work though can keep more women in tech.
The male gender role is currently inflexible
Feminism has made great progress in freeing women from the female gender role, but men are still very much tied to the male gender role. If we, as a society, allow men to be more "feminine," then the gender gap will shrink, although probably because men will leave tech and leadership for traditionally feminine roles.

Philosophically, I don't think we should do arbitrary social engineering of tech just to make it appealing to equal portions of both men and women. For each of these changes, we need principles reasons for why it helps Google; that is, we should be optimizing for Google—with Google's diversity being a component of that. For example currently those trying to work extra hours or take extra stress will inevitably get ahead and if we try to change that too much, it may have disastrous consequences. Also, when considering the costs and benefits, we should keep in mind that Google's funding is finite so its allocation is more zero-sum than is generally acknowledged.

The Harm of Google's biases
I strongly believe in gender and racial diversity, and I think we should strive for more. However, to achieve a more equal gender and race representation, Google has created several discriminatory practices:
Programs, mentoring, and classes only for people with a certain gender or race [5]
A high priority queue and special treatment for "diversity" candidates
Hiring practices which can effectively lower the bar for "diversity" candidates by decreasing the false negative rate
Reconsidering any set of people if it's not "diverse" enough, but not showing that same scrutiny in the reverse direction (clear confirmation bias)
Setting org level OKRs for increased representation which can incentivize illegal discrimination [6]

These practices are based on false assumptions generated by our biases and can actually increase race and gender tensions. We're told by senior leadership that what we're doing is both the morally and economically correct thing to do, but without evidence this is just veiled left ideology[7] that can irreparably harm Google.

Why we're blind

We all have biases and use motivated reasoning to dismiss ideas that run counter to our internal values. Just as some on the Right deny science that runs counter to the "God > humans > environment" hierarchy (e.g., evolution and climate change) the Left tends to deny science concerning biological differences between people (e.g., IQ[8] and sex differences).

Thankfully, climate scientists and evolutionary biologists generally aren't on the right. Unfortunately, the overwhelming majority of humanities and social scientists learn left (about 95%), which creates enormous confirmation bias, changes what's being studied, and maintains myths like social constructionism and the gender wage gap[9]. Google's left leaning makes us blind to this bias and uncritical of its results, which we're using to justify highly politicized programs.

In addition to the Left's affinity for those it sees as weak, humans are generally biased towards protecting females. As mentioned before, this likely evolved because males are biologically disposable and because women are generally more cooperative and agreeable than men. We have extensive government and Google programs, fields of study, and legal and social norms to protect women, but when a man complains about a gender issue issue [sic] affecting men, he's labelled as a misogynist and whiner[10].

Nearly every difference between men and women is interpreted as a form of women's oppression. As with many things in life, gender differences are often a case of "grass being greener on the other side"; unfortunately, taxpayer and Google money is spent to water only one side of the lawn.

The same compassion for those seen as weak creates political correctness[11], which constrains discourse and is complacent to the extremely sensitive PC-authoritarians that use violence and shaming to advance their cause. While Google hasn't harbored the violent leftists protests that we're seeing at universities, the frequent shaming in TGIF and in our culture has created the same silence, psychologically unsafe environment.

Suggestions

I hope it's clear that I'm not saying that diversity is bad, that Google or society is 100% fair, that we shouldn't try to correct for existing biases, or that minorities have the same experience of those in the majority. My larger point is that we have an intolerance for ideas and evidence that don't fit a certain ideology. I'm also not saying that we should restrict people to certain gender roles; I'm advocating for quite the opposite: treat people as individuals, not as just another member of their group (tribalism).

My concrete suggestions are to:

De-moralize diversity.

As soon as we start to moralize an issue, we stop thinking about it in terms of costs and benefits, dismiss anyone that disagrees as immoral, and harshly punish those we see as villains to protect the "victims."

Stop alienating conservatives.

Viewpoint diversity is arguably the most important type of diversity and political orientation is one of the most fundamental and significant ways in which people view things differently.

In highly progressive environments, conservatives are a minority that feel like they need to stay in the closet to avoid open hostility. We should empower those with different ideologies to be able to express themselves.

Alienating conservatives is both non-inclusive and generally bad business because conservatives tend to be higher in conscientiousness, which is require for much of the drudgery and maintenance work characteristic of a mature company.

Confront Google's biases.

I've mostly concentrated on how our biases cloud our thinking about diversity and inclusion, but our moral biases are farther reaching than that. I would start by breaking down Googlegeist scores by political orientation and personality to give a fuller picture into how our biases are affecting our culture.

Stop restricting programs and classes to certain genders or races.

These discriminatory practices are both unfair and divisive. Instead focus on some of the non-discriminatory practices I outlined.

Have an open and honest discussion about the costs and benefits of our diversity programs.

Discriminating just to increase the representation of women in tech is as misguided and biased as mandating increases for women's representation in the homeless, work-related and violent deaths, prisons, and school dropouts.

There's currently very little transparency into the extend of our diversity programs which keeps it immune to criticism from those outside its ideological echo chamber.

These programs are highly politicized which further alienates non-progressives.

I realize that some of our programs may be precautions against government accusations of discrimination, but that can easily backfire since they incentivize illegal discrimination.

Focus on psychological safety, not just race/gender diversity.

We should focus on psychological safety, which has shown positive effects and should (hopefully) not lead to unfair discrimination. We need psychological safety and shared values to gain the benefits of diversity

Having representative viewpoints is important for those designing and testing our products, but the benefits are less clear for those more removed from UX.

De-emphasize empathy.

I've heard several calls for increased empathy on diversity issues. While I strongly support trying to understand how and why people think the way they do, relying on affective empathy—feeling another's pain—causes us to focus on anecdotes, favor individuals similar to us, and harbor other irrational and dangerous biases. Being emotionally unengaged helps us better reason about the facts.

Prioritize intention.

Our focus on microaggressions and other unintentional transgressions increases our sensitivity, which is not universally positive: sensitivity increases both our tendency to take offense and our self censorship, leading to authoritarian policies. Speaking up without the fear of being harshly judged is central to psychological safety, but these practices can remove that safety by judging unintentional transgressions.

Microaggression training incorrectly and dangerously equates speech with violence and isn't backed by evidence.

Be open about the science of human nature.

Once we acknowledge that not all differences are socially constructed or due to discrimination, we open our eyes to a more accurate view of the human condition which is necessary if we actually want to solve problems.

Reconsider making Unconscious Bias training mandatory for promo committees.

We haven't been able to measure any effect of our Unconscious Bias training and it has the potential for overcorrecting or backlash, especially if made mandatory.

Some of the suggested methods of the current training (v2.3) are likely useful, but the political bias of the presentation is clear from the factual inaccuracies and the examples shown.

Spend more time on the many other types of biases besides stereotypes.

Stereotypes are much more accurate and responsive to new information than the training suggests (I'm not advocating for using stereotypes, I [sic] just pointing out the factual inaccuracy of what's said in the training).

[1] This document is mostly written from the perspective of Google's Mountain View campus, I can't speak about other offices or countries.

[2] Of course, I may be biased and only see evidence that supports my viewpoint. In terms of political biases, I consider myself a classical liberal and strongly value individualism and reason. I'd be very happy to discuss any of the document further and provide more citations.

[3] Throughout the document, by "tech", I mostly mean software engineering.

[4] For heterosexual romantic relationships, men are more strongly judged by status and women by beauty. Again, this has biological origins and is culturally universal.

[5] Stretch, BOLD, CSSI, Engineering Practicum (to an extent), and several other Google funded internal and external programs are for people with a certain gender or race.
[6] Instead set Googlegeist OKRs, potentially for certain demographics. We can increase representation at an org level by either making it a better environment for certain groups (which would be seen in survey scores) or discriminating based on a protected status (which is illegal and I've seen it done). Increased representation OKRs can incentivize the latter and create zero-sum struggles between orgs.
[7] Communism promised to be both morally and economically superior to capitalism, but every attempt became morally corrupt and an economic failure. As it became clear that the working class of the liberal democracies wasn't going to overthrow their "capitalist oppressors," the Marxist intellectuals transitioned from class warfare to gender and race politics. The core oppressor-oppressed dynamics remained, but now the oppressor is the "white, straight, cis-gendered patriarchy."
[8] Ironically, IQ tests were initially championed by the Left when meritocracy meant helping the victims of the aristocracy.
[9] Yes, in a national aggregate, women have lower salaries than men for a variety of reasons. For the same work though, women get paid just as much as men. Considering women spend more money than men and that salary represents how much the employees sacrifices (e.g. more hours, stress, and danger), we really need to rethink our stereotypes around power.
[10] "The traditionalist system of gender does not deal well with the idea of men needing support. Men are expected to be strong, to not complain, and to deal with problems on their own. Men's problems are more often seen as personal failings rather than victimhood,, due to our gendered idea of agency. This discourages men from bringing attention to their issues (whether individual or group-wide issues), for fear of being seen as whiners, complainers, or weak."
[11] Political correctness is defined as "the avoidance of forms of expression or action that are perceived to exclude, marginalize, or insult groups of people who are socially disadvantaged or discriminated against," which makes it clear why it's a phenomenon of the Left and a tool of authoritarians.

Carbohydrates and men's mental health

Aaron Mello · 11 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This post is part of an ongoing series for AVFM about how men can support their mental health and alleviate symptoms of depression and anxiety by changing the food that they eat. I am passionate about supporting men (and women) of the Men's Rights Movement. It's easy for us to neglect our own health in the pursuit of a larger cause larger than ourselves like the MRM. But it's essential that we take care of ourselves because, first and foremost, we deserve to live long, happy and healthy lives, and also because we need to be healthy to continue our fight for men's rights.

In my last two posts I wrote about the roles protein and healthy fats play in men's mental health, which along with carbohydrates make up the three macronutrients that we must all consume through the food we eat. All three are important for a stable mood, and in this post I'll focus on the role carbohydrates play in mental health. Maintaining a proper ratio of fat, protein and carbohydrate in the diet is important for mental health. This post will complete the discussion of the macronutrients and from here I'll move on to discuss other aspects of nutrition for mental health in future posts. So keep reading to learn which carbohydrates you should eat, and how much of them!

What are carbohydrates?

Carbohydrates are sugars and starches that, along with healthy fats, fuel the body's many metabolic and biochemical processes. Dietary fibers are also classified as a carbohydrates, although they don't typically provide much in the way of fuel and instead aide in human digestion by promoting healthy bowel movements. In nutrition science and biochemistry, carbohydrates are referred to as saccharides, which comes from the Greek word for sugar.

The smallest and simplest sugars are called monosaccharides like glucose and fructose, which are paired together to form disaccharides such as sucrose (table sugar) and lactose (milk sugar). These simple sugars are quickly and easily metabolized in the body and result in a rapid rise in blood sugar. Larger and more complex carbohydrates are referred to as polysaccharides, which includes starches and dietary fibers. Many plants store their energy in the form of polysaccharides, and use fibers like cellulose to create structure for their leaves, limbs and stalks.

If all this discussion about different sugars and starches seems unnecessarily complicated, just remember that carbohydrates are generally categorized in terms of their size, from small simple sugars up to large starches in which many sugars and bound together in a long chain. This is important because larger starches are metabolized more slowly than simple sugars, which is advantageous because it helps to keep blood sugar stable. As I've explained in my previous posts, maintaining stable blood sugar is critical for men who struggle with depression and anxiety. Before I get into what carbohydrates you should eat and which you should avoid, I'll next review why dietary carbohydrates are important.

The functions of dietary carbohydrates

When we eat starches like potatoes and grains, we metabolize the energy stored in them to fuel our bodies. These carbohydrates give us energy to run, lift weights, and think about things – the brain consumes significant energy, especially when thinking hard and problem solving. Many students observe this when attending class and studying, as learning new information burns a lot of energy. I know when I was in school I ate a lot before and after class. Even though I had just been sitting at a desk, my brain consumed a lot of energy and I was ready to eat a whole meal again after class!

In fact, common symptoms of hypoglycemia, or low blood sugar, include confusion and difficulty thinking. Unlike other tissues in the body like skeletal muscle which can store backup energy in the form of glycogen, the brain cannot, so when blood sugar plummets, cognitive functions are often the first to suffer (1). When this happens, we tend to crave simple carbohydrates like sugars because they are the quickest and easiest sources of sugar for the body to bring blood sugar back up.

The importance of adequate blood sugar

The body can rapidly metabolize (absorb and utilize) sugar and starch directly from the mouth before even swallowing the bread or candy bar we're eating before it even reaches the small intestine, which is where most absorption of all nutrients, including carbohydrates, takes place. As soon as we begin chewing on a carbohydrate-rich food, enzymes in saliva begin breaking down starches so they can be absorbed directly across the lining of the mouth.

This accounts for at least part of the reason why a "hangry" person seems to instantly feel better upon getting food in his mouth, before even swallowing a bite. The existence of this mechanism to quickly raise blood sugar indicates how important adequate blood sugar is to the body. Next, I'll talk about other roles carbohydrates play in the body before moving on to what carbohydrates you should eat.

Other functions of carbohydrates

Like the other macronutrients fat and protein, carbohydrates play many roles in the body. I've already alluded to the importance of dietary fiber, which provides physical structure to the stool and helps promote healthy bowel movements. Eating a fiber-deficient diet is a surefire way to become constipated, which in addition to being uncomfortable and even painful contributes to poor health through a phenomenon called autointoxication. A primary function of bowel movements is to remove waste and toxins from the body through feces.

But in the case of constipation, impacted feces remain in the colon for an extended period of time, which results in toxic contents of the stool being absorbed across the lining of the colon and back into the bloodstream. Consequently, these toxins must be reprocessed and this lead to an increased toxic burden, which over time can overwhelm the body's detoxification mechanisms. An elevated toxic burden is implicated in many health conditions, including mental health problems like depression and anxiety. Given this reality, it should be clear why dietary fiber is important, given its role in promoting regular bowel movements that remove toxins from the body regularly and prevent autointoxication.

The importance of stable blood sugar

I talked quite a bit in my previous posts about the importance of stable blood sugar when it comes to mood, as unstable blood sugar leads to an unstable mood. Two primary culprits when it comes to unstable blood sugar are refined carbohydrates and sugars. Bread, pasta, tortillas, pancakes and muffins are all examples of refined carbohydrates, and refined sugars include candy, cookies, cake, ice cream and soda. Because these foods provide high levels of sugars and carbohydrates that are not bound by fiber, they produce a rapid increase in blood sugar.

The body works hard to maintain blood sugar levels within a fairly narrow window, and levels that are either too low or too high lead to health problems. The pancreas normally secretes insulin in response to rising blood sugar levels after a meal, which causes blood sugar to be shuttled into cells where it can be burned for energy. As a result, blood sugar levels decrease. Over the course of several hours after eating a meal, blood sugar levels gradually decline back down to baseline, at which point you would simply eat another meal.

Reactive hypoglycemia

However, when we overconsume refined carbohydrates and sugar, blood sugar rises so rapidly that the pancreas may "overreact" and secrete so much insulin in its attempt to control dangerously high blood sugar levels that blood sugar levels end up dropping too low, resulting in a form of hypoglycemia (low blood sugar) called reactive hypoglycemia. In this chart, you can see blood sugar levels on the vertical axis and time on the horizontal axis. Where we get into trouble is the dip in the red line where blood sugar levels drop too low.

[image]

Reactive hypoglycemia is a form of dysregulated blood sugar that is strongly correlated with depression and anxiety, as well as aggressive behavior and an explosive temper, also known as being "hangry." The low spot on the red line is when these symptoms tend to be the most pronounced. With an understanding of the importance of stable blood sugar in mind, let's move on to the next section in which I'll explain what foods provide healthy carbohydrates that do not lead to reactive hypoglycemia.

Good sources of carbohydrates

Not all carbohydrates are created equal. Now that we have an understanding of why dietary carbohydrates and stable blood sugar are important, let's move on to foods that are good sources of healthy carbohydrates. As opposed to refined carbohydrates which spike blood sugar, lead to reactive hypoglycemia and provide no nutritional value, complex carbohydrates are a much healthier option. In fact, refined carbohydrates actually deplete nutrients like B vitamins, which are required to metabolize them (2).

In contrast, complex carbohydrates are broken down more gradually, leading to longer lasting energy and a more gradual increase in blood sugar. In addition, they usually provide the nutrients that are required to metabolize the carbohydrates they contain because they have not been refined, a process which removes these critical nutrients. For these reasons, it's preferable to get your carbohydrates from whole food, unrefined sources.

So without further ado, here are the best sources of carbohydrates:

- Sweet potato
- Carrots
- Taro root
- White potatoes
  - Especially if they are cooked and cooled before eating
  - This forms resistant starch, which is good for your intestines
  - You can reheat them before eating
- Yucca root
  - For all of the above root vegetables, slather them in plenty of grass-fed, organic butter like Kerrygold!
- Fruits that are low in sugar and high in nutrients like:
  - Organic cherries
  - Organic berries (blueberry, strawberry, blackberry, cranberry)
  - Pomegranate
- Green plantains
  - You can slice and fry them to make tostones (fry them in coconut oil)
  - Or use them to make grain-free pancakes!

Concentrate on getting your carbohydrates from the above list, and avoid these refined carbohydrates and sugars:

- Refined carbohydrates:
  - Bread
  - Pasta
  - Tortillas
  - Pancakes & waffles
  - Muffins
- Refined sugars:
  - Soda
  - Candy

- Cake (also high in refined carbohydrates)
- Cookies (also high in refined carbohydrates)
- Ice cream
- Artificial sweetners
  - Stevia is ok, but avoid aspartame (NutraSweet) and saccharin

Portion control

Before wrapping up this post, let me add one more point about portion control. In addition to focusing on healthy, unrefined carbohydrates and avoiding refined carbohydrates and sugar, it's important to limit carbohydrates to reasonable portion sizes. Like so many things in life, our diet is all about balance. In general, you want to limit carbohydrate to about 20% of your plate. Concentrate on including adequate protein, some healthy fat, and lots of nonstarchy vegetables like broccoli, cauliflower, Bok choy, Brussels sprouts, dark leafy greens like kale, mustard greens, collard greens and Swiss chard, asparagus, garlic, and onion.

As a guideline to help you eat a good ratio of carbohydrate, fat and protein, use my Ideal Dinner Plate chart as a template for building well-balanced meals. If your current diet is significantly different than what is shown here (and many people's diets are) work on making gradual changes, rather than making sudden and drastic changes. Give yourself time to integrate changes into your life. Imagine this pie chart as your dinner plate and include proportions roughly as shown here:

[image]

In conclusion

The food we eat has a significant impact on our mental health as well as our physical health, and simply by adjusting the ratio of the macronutrients fat, protein and carbohydrate to each other we can do a lot to keep mood more stable, primarily by stabilizing blood sugar. This post, combined with the previous two on fat and protein together should provide you a good groundwork to support a healthy mood through your food.

In future posts I will write about other aspects of nutrition for mental health, as well as nutrition for men's health generally. What are you interested in learning more about? Leave me a comment below with your ideas for future posts!

References

1. Murray MT, Pizzorno J. Encyclopedia of Natural Medicine third edition. New York, NY: Atria Paperback; 2012:
   707-711.
2. http://www.fao.org/docrep/004/Y2809E/y2809e09.htm

Eating disorders in boys and young men

Alexis Conason · 12 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It is widely believed that eating disorders primarily affect young women. Most research in eating disorders is conducted with female participants and most interventions are developed with women in mind. Even most professionals who specialize in the treatment of eating disorders are women. Women are far more likely to be diagnosed with anorexia nervosa or bulimia nervosa than men. But could this focus on women lead to an under diagnosis of eating disorders in men?

Traditional definitions of eating disorders have focused on desire for thinness. While body image dissatisfaction for women is typically centered on weight loss and desire for thinness, men tend to be more focused on muscularity than thinness. In "Prospective associations of concerns about physique and the development of obesity binge drinking, and drug use among adolescent boys and young adult men," Field et al (2014) assess a range of concerns with physique and eating disorders amongst males. They included questions about muscularity (ie. wanting bigger, more toned, or more defined muscles) and use of supplements (including creatine, growth hormone derivites, anabolic steroids, and a variety of other substances) to improve appearance, gain muscle, or gain strength. The researchers used data from the Growing Up Today Study (GUTS) to prospectively assess 5500 males who were between the ages of 12-18 in 1999 and followed the participants until 2011. In addition to body image and eating disorders, they also assessed body mass index, binge drinking, drug use, and depressive symptoms.

By adulthood, nearly 18% of the sample reported extreme concern with their weight and physique and at least 7.6% were also engaging in potentially unhealthy behaviors in an attempt to attain their ideal physique. Only 2.5% of the sample reported high concerns with thinness alone, less than 3% met full or partial criteria for binge eating disorder, and less than 1% met full or partial criteria for bulimia nervosa or purging disorder. However, 31% reported some eating disorder symptoms including infrequent binge eating, purging, or overeating without loss of control. Results indicated that concerns with muscularity increased with age, but concerns with thinness did not.

High concern with muscularity and use of supplements was associated with increased risk of frequent binge drinking and drug use. High concern with both muscularity and thinness was also associated with increased risk of drug use. High concerns with thinness but not muscularity, infrequent bulimic behaviors, and overeating without loss of control were all associated with increased depressive symptomology.

The authors conclude that traditional measures underestimate the prevalence of eating disorders in men because they focus on desire for thinness and do not assess for concerns with muscularity. Focusing on the cognitive aspects of eating disorders (for example, undue influence of weight and shape in self-evaluation) may help detect eating disorders that do not fall into the traditional categories, as is the case for many men. In addition, the different subtypes of eating disorders in men reported in this study indicate that each subtype may be represent different risk factors for substance abuse and depression.

For more information about the focus on fitness in eating disorders, read my post Strong is the New Skinny.

Reference:

Field AE, Sonneville KR, Crosby, RD, et al. Prospective Associations of Concerns About Physiqueand the Development of Obesity, Binge Drinking, and Drug Use Among Adolescent Boys and Young Adult Men. JAMA Pediatrics, 2014, 168 (1): 34-39.

For real love to arise, romantic love must die. Part two

Paul Elam · 13 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

As you may recall from the first part of this series, I was addressing some efforts men can and should be making when choosing to pair bond in the current climate of sexual politics. This generally involves three steps, or perhaps more accurately three giant leaps, that you can take to give yourself a better shot at not ending up with your ship or your shit on the rocks.

As a reminder, all of this is said assuming you have the good sense to not marry, and to not cohabitate in a way that leaves you vulnerable to being considered married by the local authorities. And if, by chance, that is still debatable in your mind, I have left some reference links[1] for you that you really need to explore. I won't dwell on it. Horse, water…all that, but I do suggest the reference material first as you may be too dangerous to yourself to act responsibly on any of the material in this series.

Moving on, I talked about step one in part one, and that was your need to get the difference between love and romantic love. And more than to just get it — to let it permeate your conscious mind and act as a profound influence on every decision you make regarding women.

It's important to be vigilant and continually cognizant of the fact that romantic chivalry, or gynocentric love, is woven into the DNA of your personality. Most every heterosexual man in this world is one good blowjob away from beta cuckitude. And yes, that includes many men who call themselves red pill.

The gynocentrism behind that sad reality is a soul withering, destructive force that lies always in wait, and it is unleashed from behind the wall of denial that comes with romantic love and infatuation. That's the state of temporary insanity that will have you glad to do things that you would die before doing if you were in your right mind, like lay all your assets out for the taking while you whistle and look the other way. Or burning a longstanding friendship with a male friend because a female you've known for a month doesn't like him.

So, it is hard to overstress how important it is challenge yourself on what is driving your behavior with women, and whether your fairytale image of women and love are at the core.

Step Two: Screening

It is just as hard to overstress the importance of step two. When meeting women, you have three basic objectives. You need to screen. You need to screen and you need to screen. Mainly with the understanding that most of the screening will be screening out.

This is not just a test of how well you have worked with step one, but it is a clear measurement of how much red pill thinking you have absorbed in a meaningful way. As I keep stressing, what you think and what you believe (which is what drives your behavior) can be radically different. You'll likely never intellectualize yourself into meaningful action.

It all boils down to whether your true beliefs leave you focused on attracting a woman (that alone being your measure of success) or if you are more focused on preventing the wrong women from getting anywhere near you. In my world, blue pill, gynocentric men worry about getting laid. Red pill men worry about getting laid without getting bent over.

You cannot possibly imagine two more different kinds of men, but there is a very thin line between them. Or, as I said, sometimes they are only separated by a good suck.

So, what do I mean exactly by screening? I mean, in no uncertain terms, your willingness to send packing any non-hackers who don't meet your non-gynocentric expectations. Gold diggers. Out. Feminists. Out. Princesses. Out. Single mothers. Out. Borderlines. Out. Wannabe housewives. Out. Those who insist on marriage. Out. Those who can't find their purse at dinner. O-U-fucking-T. Add anything else you want to your personalized list of instant disqualifiers.

It is important for you to take this very, very personally. The biggest mistake I ever see men make with women is settling. And I suppose it is understandable in a way. The pickins are already slim and I just rattled off a short list that would rid you of 90% of the ones available. We are not having a rosy, feel good conversation.

And I never said this was a series of talks on how to attract women. I assume that if you are a regular reader here, you're less interested in attracting a woman than surviving one with your money, your mind and your heart intact.

And this is where one thing comes into play that deserves to be written in lipstick on your bathroom mirror. This shit is on you, not on women. Feminists, and sad to say women in general these days rely almost exclusively on a victim narrative. The haggard, repetitive mantra of women in relationships is that "it's not my fault," especially when it is. It's gotten so bad that a lack of personal accountability in women is now considered good breeding.

You are welcome to follow in that mold if you want to, or any other line of thinking suited for three-year-old's. If you do, though, you might as well quit reading now. You're screwed by your own hand.

Everything is on you and for good reason. None of the things about women I mentioned, the gold diggers, the feminists, the slackers, the welfare queens, the cloying stench of the children of privilege, are hidden from you. With very, very few exceptions, there is nothing about any woman you have ever known that you could not have spotted in short order if you were thinking from the neck up. Or in other words, if your mind wasn't clouded by gynocentric infatuation. And if you weren't making excuses, swimming in denial, or chirping out some ignorant bullshit like, "Love is unconditional, I'll take her crumbs and all," even if the crumbs are constantly putting you down and putting the smackdown on your wallet.

If the crumbs you don't mind taking include her making you miserable every time she doesn't get her way, then the only thing I can suggest is that the next time you see a red pill, actually take the sum-bitch.

If you think I am being hard on the men here, you're right. I don't think it is me, though. That's just the challenge that comes with rooting out and breaking ties with our gynocentric programming. It demands brutal personal accountability, and unrelenting critical self-assessment. It's something feminists never dared to suggest for women as the path to empowerment, and wisely so because women have been socialized to interpret the demand for personal accountability as an act of abuse.

The point here is that in severing the umbilical cord that leaves you dependent on women's approval is a massive shift in consciousness and ultimately self-perception. You move from being a scavenger for anything remotely female, including the garbage specimens, to being a discriminating selector of what women you will even allow to pass through your door.

That difference in personage also indicates whether you are ingesting real red pills or whether you have the high-fiber kind that pass through your system completely without being absorbed. Ingested, but not digested.

Just look at whatever woman you are with, or are interested in being with, and ask yourself if she has any potential for playing a role in a red pill framework for a relationship.

Can she take the word no without acting like a child? Have you tested that by telling her no and carefully gaging her reaction? What would she say if you told her you subscribe to red pill philosophy, that you welcome a robust, healthy relationship with a woman but you won't finance it, or maintain it with servitude. Can she see that attitude in you, through your words and actions? Have you told her that you will always maintain your friendships and interests regardless of whether you are in a relationship? Did you pay close attention to her words and her body language in response?

There are countless other ways that you can probe and test and assess a woman at any stage of a relationship, all structured according to your personal values and standards. The only test for you is whether you are honestly testing her, and whether you are willing to endure the discomfort of letting women go who fail.

Guys, women cannot hide the answers to these questions, or beat the testing. Their beliefs and their attitudes are written into every word they say. Women are blinded to their own selfish nature (just as men are), by socialization and by constant male enabling. The bad apples don't stand a chance in hell of escaping detection because they are not aware enough of their own behavior. To them, all the red flags you are looking for are totally normal. You can literally meet them, test them, have them fail and rid yourself of them without them even knowing what happened.

Keep in mind here that I am not suggesting you are looking for the woman who passes all the tests. None of them will, because if your tests are thorough, no woman can pass them all. The big question here is whether a woman can score close enough to indicate she is possibly trainable.

I don't think it helps to try to ascertain precisely what personality characteristics lend a woman to being trainable. I am not sure that is even knowable. I just know that some women, with proper training applied, can come to realize the wisdom of a more wholesome, non-gynocentric attachment. And even some that can't fully wise up, can be made compliant enough to be tolerable to some men.

For men that are persistent and values-based, this can open the opportunity to explore pair bonding with a woman who can handle their end of the bargain without shamming her way out of it using female privilege. I can be a rewarding place to be, when friendship, parity and mutual benefit are allowed to rise above the lopsided, ignobly unfair mandates of gynocentric love.

I'd like to stress that all this testing is not about beating her over the head with questions and making her walk on coals to prove her worth. After all, men of all people should know the shitty proposition that is.

Testing is quite subtle, and much more along the lines of studious observation than constant engagement. The conflict that results from the tests not going well are supposed to happen inside your own mind, where you struggle with your own gynocentrism to make good decisions. It is not a conflict that should occur between you and the woman. She is just being who she is. If you are in conflict with her about that, it is likely because you are trying to change the writing she put on the wall. This is where, once again, your personal accountability comes directly into play.

If she gives you a dead fail demonstration, like cutting you off in the bedroom because you didn't want to take her to a chick flick, and you react with more testing, then you are doing it to yourself. Period. Fini. End of story.

If you find yourself on the hamster wheel of constantly trying to figure out why she keeps doing all this harmful stuff, scratching your head and then going back in for more, you are the problem. Cut that shit off and move on, man, and quit whining about the shitty woman you are involved with. Once that sinks in; once you establish that she is an emotional, financial or psychological train wreck, then let it go off the rails. Dust yourself off and get on with your life.

I noticed in a comment recently by a man who said he was in a 13-year relationship with a borderline woman, with the last 10 years knowing she was a personality disordered. He complained that he was miserable and that she was a terrible person.

I quickly moved on to other comments without responding. After all, if he won't invest 5 minutes of his time in a mirror, there is little I could say to help him. All I can say is, better him than me.

As I said in part one, the three steps I am outlining in this series are incredibly difficult and painful. No matter how hard you try to work on them, they will do no good if you can't see yourself and see her in the clearest possible terms, and if you are not ready and willing to act on what you see deliberately, even when it is painful.

And of course, even if you see clearly, act deliberately and steadfastly allow yourself to be guided by your values, you have no guarantees for success. We are talking about human beings: too complicated to be sorted out by a single set of actions. The point here is just improving the odds for red pill men who want to roll the dice on pair bonding. That alone is a very rough path. And be aware, your psychological acumen and interpersonal intelligence will have a major impact on outcomes. It's not exactly territory that is friendly to slow thinkers. Not trying to be cruel, just honest.

Next up, the final installment of this series.

[1]https://goo.gl/LL4uFn

Your belief in porn addiction makes things worse

Dr. David Ley · 17 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Porn addiction is the idea that people (namely men) can become addicted to the widespread pornography, now so easily available on the Internet. You can't turn over a rock these days, without finding some article, website, advocacy group, or therapist, claiming that porn addiction is a dangerous public health problem. The concept of porn addiction has a self-sustaining momentum, with online self-help groups, websites, TED talks, nonprofit groups, discussion boards and television shows, all promoting the idea that pornography triggers reward processes in the brain, and thus has the potential to become an addictive, destructive behavior. But, in recent years, chips have begun to appear in the facade of this monolithic morally-based concept.

In January 2015, Joshua Grubbs of Case Western, published powerful research showing that seeing oneself as a porn addict was predicted not by how much porn one views, but by the degree of religiosity and moral attitudes towards sex. Now, Grubbs has published explosive follow-up research, demonstrating that believing oneself is addicted to porn actually causes pain and psychological problems, in contrast to the idea that identifying as a porn addict is a part of a road to recovery.

Grubbs is a careful and thorough researcher, whose methodology is always well-planned and detailed. He's not a "one and done" kind of researcher. Instead, his research often involves multiple connected studies, which serve to demonstrate the replicability of his findings, and offer the ability to follow threads of causality and theory through multiple groups and strategies. This study is no exception.

Grubbs started with a large cross-section of adults (1,047 total; 619 women, 422 men, six prefer not to say) drawn from Amazon's Mechanical Turk workforce database. 713 of these participants acknowledged using porn in the past year (338 women, 370 men, five prefer not to say). Researchers then assessed frequency of pornography use and perceived addiction to pornography, by looking at self-perceived compulsivity, how much effort the person puts into viewing porn, and degree of emotional distress related to porn use. Next, researchers identified several components of psychological distress, including depression, stress and anxiety. Finally, they measured personality traits, to ensure that they could rule out effects of personality, from the effects of pornography, and perceived porn addiction.

In these data, daily porn use was weakly related to feelings of anger. But, seeing oneself as a porn addict was strongly correlated with depression, anxiety, anger and stress. The effects of personality traits such as neuroticism, which would predict higher levels of negative emotional states, regardless of other issues, were statistically managed to assure that the effects detected were related to the variables of perceived porn addiction.

Grubbs' team then replicated this study with another cross-sectional pool of participants, this time from three different universities. Out of 3,055 students assessed, 1,215 (396 women, 816 men, three prefer not to say) admitted to using porn in the past year. Results supported again that actual porn use had no reliable relationship to emotional issues, but perceiving oneself as addicted to porn did (again, anxiety, anger, stress, and especially depression were predicted by how strongly someone felt they were addicted to porn).

Cross-sectional research design is a common limitation to interpreting causality, especially in research with porn or sex. Cross-sectional research only allows a "snapshot in time" and cannot truly reveal causation or "what came first, the chicken or the egg?" So, Grubbs' team then did a one-year follow-up on the students. Longitudinal research in this manner is the gold-standard for better understanding what things actually cause the problems, as opposed to merely finding a correlation.

392 of the students were eligible for the one year follow-up, and 106 completed the follow-up assessment. While that might seem like a small number for follow-up, analyses between this group and the other baseline participants showed that there were no significant differences. Thus, this followed-up sample is a good representation of the larger group.

Analyses confirmed that the self-perception as a porn addict predicted distress one year later, where either porn use or personality characteristics did not. If someone believed they were a sex addict, this belief predicted downstream psychological suffering, no matter how much, or how little, porn they were actually using.

This means that the large-scale promotion of the concept of "porn addiction," in the media, on the Internet, by self-proclaimed experts and by an industry that preys off of an unrecognized disorder, appear to actually be hurting people. By telling people that their use of porn constitutes a disease, they are promulgating suffering and anxiety, instilling into people that their use of pornography means there is something wrong with them, and that this use has potentially dire consequences.

The word iatrogenic describes illnesses or damages that are acquired as a result of treatment. If you go into a hospital for an appendectomy, and get a staph infection in the hospital, that's iatrogenic harm. The porn addiction treatment model is iatrogenic, creating harm under the guise of providing treatment and support.

The model of porn addiction is one which serves many people, those who sell treatments for it, those who believe that sex and porn should be feared or controlled, and those who believe that they are helping others by spreading the word about the dangers of porn addiction. Unfortunately, this concept is now shown to do a disservice to the very people it purports to help.

It's no surprise to me that the label of porn addicts predicts fear, distress, depression and anger. Over recent years, I've seen many vulnerable people call themselves a porn addict, with much shame and fear, despite using less porn than many other people. As with Grubbs' research, I've found that this self-imposed label has much to do with moral values about sex and pornography, and often comes from an impoverished understanding of human sexuality. People walk into my office reporting this, and contact me online, after they've been shamed and labelled in online discussion groups. When one has little understanding that ALL people struggle at times with their sexual desires, it's very easy to listen to moralizing proclaimers of doom, and declare one's sexual desires to be abnormal and unhealthy.

The large industry of intertwined media, therapists, coaches and advocates who have obsessively and gleefully promoted the idea that porn is addictive, claim that they help people by providing an explanation and an intervention for the problems related to porn. In response to Grubbs' findings, it's now their obligation to demonstrate empirically that their label, their treatments and their theories are beneficial. Because right now, the evidence suggests that their treatment is hurting people.

The people who are making money and fame from the idea of porn addiction may claim that science hasn't looked at their theories the right way – or looked at the right people. They may try to discredit the work done by Grubbs, and challenge his findings. These proponents of porn addiction treatment will have to produce real research that supports their actual work, rather than mere extrapolations from other findings. Until then, the model of porn addiction is an unethical, harmful treatment which exploits people, just like the hucksters who sold snake oil and things like radioactive materials as medicine were engaged in harmful, dangerous and illegal practice.

The evidence is strong that that proponents of porn addiction treatment are actually causing psychological suffering. People who listen to them, and who fall into believing that porn is addictive, actually get worse. Medicine is supposed to help people — "first, do no harm." The idea of porn addiction is hurting people. It's time to pull the curtain away, expose the charlatanry and snake-oils of this industry, and prevent them from infecting more people with their iatrogenic model.

People who believe themselves to be porn addicts need help with understanding what their use of porn means, and why they may have problems around their sexuality. They deserve help unpacking the conflicts between their sexual desires, and the moral/religious society around them. They also need help to understand how and why porn use is not an addiction, and how viewing themselves as a porn addict may affect their self-image and emotional health. These men (and some women) deserve help in understanding their sexuality and their porn use. They don't need the shame and stigma that comes along with the "addiction" label.

Mindhive update: seven days to the great Minnesota moral panic

Jewel Eldora · 18 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

One week until the Minnesota State Fair, and one month since Justine Damond, the Australian yoga teacher, was shot dead by police in the streets of Minneapolis. Our last article explained some unique Minnesota phenomena, including being ground zero of the most terrifying and deadly moral panics in the history of mankind. [1][2][3][4][5]

The Trump and Turnbull Administrations have ignored my requests to stop the fair and prevent the next global panic, I feel an obligation to warn the world of what's been happening here in MN in hopes we might stop another tragedy. While the 494/694 boundary is small (less than 30 miles across) there is something in the water here that starts worldwide witch hunts.

Mosquitos, Minnesota Nice, the quasi-political nature of the University of Minnesota, I can't say for certain, what causes it, but I do know the phenomena is real. These moral panics have similarities, they all have a taboo or scandalous topic, that represents a perceived threat to women, children or vulnerable adults, they all result in popular demands for an expansion of the police state, and worst of all, they all spread worldwide.

The last wave of panics started shortly after the 1980 landslide victory of Republican Ronald Reagan. The election of Donald Trump seems to be causing the same kind of panic in the population. These panics spread like the 1918 flu.

[image]

The moral panics of the 80's and 90's have cost millions of lives worldwide and countless 100's of millions of dollars. If the pattern is indeed repeating, we may be readying for a similar bumper crop.

If I'm wrong, perhaps my last article is merely comical; If I'm correct, we need to be on the lookout for things in the pre-Minnesota State Fair news cycle. For 10 days, nearly two million visitors from around the world make the center of the Twin Cities one of the most populated places in the world. This year, there will likely be demonstrations increasing stress, given the increase in high profile police shootings and current news cycle, people will be looking for a police state solution to stress they can't openly or honestly discuss.

While this metro area is quite small, the top local stories over the last month since Damond was shot may just melt your brain. These stories are likely to mix and mingle with world and national news, pig's shit, and food on a stick at the Minnesota State Fair to create and export a certain type of panic which will be headed to a town near you.

Sex Slavery

The mindhive is abuzz with news that the owner of a very popular, world class, award winning Thai restaurant in the inner-ring Minneapolis suburbs, has been keeping a black male sex slave, whom he purchased from the Dominican Republic, chained in the restaurant's basement.

All across the Twin Cities, white women are mourning the loss of the delicious, fresh delights of one of their favorite ethnic restaurants. While the media is reporting very little on how the prices for such world class food were subsidized by the years of torture, bondage, and rape that this young black man (and others) endured, everyone else is talking about it in hushed tones.

Deray McKesson, who has deep roots in Minnesota, has not made any comment on the black man who was literally chained in an Asian restaurant's basement sex dungeon for several years. BLM Minneapolis and BLM St. Paul have not yet made any statements regarding the actual enslavement of a black man within 6 miles of either city.

Lynching of a Black Man at Indian Mounds Park

Both BLM St. Paul and Minneapolis did a fine job spreading panic throughout the Twin Cities however by sharing a photo of what they reported to be the corpse of a black man, allegedly lynched by white supremacists.

The photo was shared on social media over 11,000 times in just a few hours, spreading terror and panic around the cities with the message "This so damn foul!! I'm so fed up with this s! They're still killing us and we still killing each other! #MakeGoViral." The park where the body was found is an historic Native American burial ground, and famous for having the only view of both Twin Cities.

As it turns out, it was not a lynching, but the suicide of a 50 year old white man. Major news outlets shamed BLM for spreading this erroneous message, yet none mentioned the suicide epidemic amongst white males of that age group.

One web only outlet did briefly mention the MN health department's note that half of the alarming increase in state suicide had occurred among men ages 25-34. They also offer the condescending advice that if you are suffering from depression, you should get help. In the state that was the conceptual home of the Duluth Model, they may as well just hand out rope and shotguns.

Many men's advocates speculate that the Duluth Model is the number one cause of the current male suicide epidemic. No factor other than being male (80%) is a greater predictor of males committing suicide than exposure to the Duluth Model of Domestic Violence.

The Duluth Model combined with Borderline Personality Disorder may be one of the greatest killers of children in the U.S., maybe even the world.

Explosions at a Mosque and a Pre K-12 Private Christian School

The Minnehaha Academy in Minneapolis exploded, killing two, and a mosque near the Mall of America was bombed. No suspects have been named, but Governor Dayton assures everyone that it is certainly an act of terrorism.

"If a bias motive is proven, this attack would represent another in a long list of hate incidents targeting Islamic institutions nationwide in recent months," said Amir Malik, a local civil rights director. While no suspects have been named, most people in the 494/696 boundary suspect it was done by male right-wing white nationalists.

Skinheads, White Nationalists and Charlottesville

In the 1980's, skinhead violence was an epidemic in the Twin Cities, with several graphic, high profile murders involving baseball bats, hammers, and the biting off of victims noses and ears. Some of these murders took place in walking distance from Indian Mounds Park in East St. Paul. Two rival skinhead gangs, the racists from the recently devastated working class town of South St. Paul, who drank a lot of beer and talked about national socialism, and the Minneapolis anti-racist terrorist group, the Baldies, who beat the shit out of people of all colors if they suspected them of being racists or racist sympathizers.

On the topic of terrible infections that start in Minneapolis and spread around the world… In the late 80's, the Baldies formed Anti-Racist Action, which morphed into the first American incarnation of the European group known as Antifa, which stands for Anti-Fascist Action. Apparently, this type of violence helped form a groupthink so successful at creating an echochamber that they have likely infected your city too. Ours was made of middle class kids, your results may vary.

Perhaps you've heard of Antifa due to their involvement in the mayhem in Charlottesville this week. (Author's note: The Programming Manager at the Minneapolis Television Network (MTN) is a skinhead who had very close ties to the Baldies. MTN is the previously mentioned public access station that illegally blocked the Anti-BLM content that could have saved Justine Damond's life.)

[image]

Earlier this year, Linwood Kaine, son of 2016 Vice Presidential Candidate Tim Kaine, was arrested in St. Paul Minnesota for suspicion of 2nd-degree riot after allegedly throwing a smoke bomb into the State Capitol which struck a 61-year old woman.

Senator Tim Kaine is close personal friends with the Mayor of Charlottesville. Linwood has been treated like a classic senator's son, likely due to his close Democratic ties. No one has declared throwing a bomb in the state capitol a terrorist act, not even Former U.S. Senator, now Minnesota Governor, Mark Dayton.

More Sex Slavery
Earlier this summer, 19 men were arrested as a part of a major sex trafficking ring. This was a part of multi-million dollar program for increased training and sex sting operations leading up to the Super Bowl which will be held at Death Star Stadium in February of 2018.

The University of Minnesota has just released two major studies analyzing the patterns of sex buyers.

Who's buying the sex? Middle class white men. (duh)

"Johns live all over — rural towns, suburbs and cities — and tend to be married, between 30 and 50 years old and from middle and upper socioeconomic backgrounds. They are mostly white, reflecting the state's population. While some men of color and women also buy sex, they do so at much lower numbers" the report said.

Many of the studied men were court-ordered to attend and pay $750 for the "John School" hosted by the St. Paul nonprofit Breaking Free, which provides housing and services to adult victims at the expense of men caught in sting operations. The report states that 84 out of 103 men arrested for prostitution-related offenses didn't use a public defender.

The data and tactics in this report are shared with law enforcement worldwide. Nationwide, adult men 24 and up, already at risk of suicide, can now look forward to greater police surveillance, targeted sting operations, and arrest and conviction quotas due to this report.

In addition to the widespread press, this apparent epidemic, is guaranteed to be a topic of conversation at the fair due to the exorbitant amount of public dollars being spent to put it at the forefront, including a public awareness campaign in Duluth, Minnesota, to "openly discourage men and boys from buying sex", which began this month.

The Minneapolis Men's Center has not issued a statement on the ethics of the John school, the biased study, the state crackdown, or the horrific tragedy of a black man being held captive in a Twin Cities food-sex dungeon. Nor have they made a statement about the high profile suicide in nearby Indian Mounds Park, though it seems like that might be a good piece for an outreach opportunity.

White Woman Commits Heinous Act

The morning news stations are abuzz with news that Jennifer Kline, former host of ShopNBC and former Mrs. Minnesota, was convicted in a fraud-scheme of buying clothes from an Edina, Minnesota mall, changing the tags, and then returning them. Shocking, I know.

This is just a brief description of the scandalous stories over the last few weeks in this tiny little metro area since Justine Damond was killed in a dark South Minneapolis alley.

These tasty topics will be top of mind as people go into the Fair, and these ideas will mix with national news stories, fear, and pig's shit. Millions are going to get together, gossip, people watch, eat tons of shitty food, scream at the police, and look at butter sculptures in the 80 degree heat. Then, they'll go home, get the kids off to school, and quickly login to spread moral panics around the world.

While it's safe to say that if my theory is correct, the next moral panics likely to be exported by the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce will be one of the following:

- Sex Trafficking/Prostitution
- White Nationalists/Bomb Threats
- Women Committing Department Store Fraud

It will likely be influenced by whatever the hell happens here in the next week. If there is any hope to stop the next moral panic, it is public awareness, It's become clear even Trump and Turnbull are not capable of stopping the 2017 Minnesota State Fair.

The Good News

Another Minnesota-based moral panic, which I did not mention in my previous article about Minnesota generated worldwide moral panics, is one that might shed some hope.

In 1983, second wave feminists teamed up with "activists from South Minneapolis" and the Minneapolis City Council to pass the Dworkin-MacKinnon Antipornography Civil Rights Ordinance. Ms. Dworkin taught at the University of Minnesota for one semester that year and found Minneapolis a fertile ground to put her theories into practice.

Minneapolis was the first of several cities in the U.S. and Canada to pass the ordinance, destroying several independent bookstores. It was eventually overturned by the U.S. and Canadian Supreme Courts as unconstitutional, but not before many small businesses were ruined. Neither of the authors or the activists were ever held accountable for their actions and they lived free to inspire a whole new generation of Minnesota activists.

You likely saw some of them in Charlottesville last weekend.

Please help us, Dwayne "the Rock" Johnson, you're our only hope.

18 truths about #Charlottesville

Paul Elam · 20 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Till yesterday, I had just about decided I was going to be able to avoid writing on Charlottesville, Virginia, where a protest of the removal of a statue of Civil War General Robert E. Lee escalated to deadly proportions when protestors and counter protestors clashed in the streets.

It's not that I don't have opinions on the matter. I've got plenty. I had just hoped to pass on this one because the fracas is only tangentially applicable to the men's movement – and because people tend to get stupid when you talk about these matters honestly.

However, true to their typically disingenuous form, Salon.com has pulled A Voice for Men into the controversy. There is an article by Amanda Marcotte revealing that one of the ringleaders of the white supremacists who were staging the Charlottesville rally formerly wrote for AVFM. Marcotte attempted to establish that the men's movement was a gateway for violent racism. She linked to a HBO broadcast of a Vice Magazine documentary in support of her article.

The title of her article perfectly reflects the sentiment she was shooting for. "Weeping Nazi started off as a men's rights activist, which is hardly surprising." It was subtitled, "Christopher Cantwell's trajectory from men's rights to white supremacy is sadly typical for the alt right."

Weeping Nazi, by the way, was a reference to Cantwell getting maced a couple of times during the melee. Cantwell, incidentally, had a few pieces published by AVFM a few years ago.

Using this guilt by association, Marcotte makes the men's movement and me personally a target for blame in the Charlottesville disaster, and in that, I suppose, a candidate for retaliation. So, if you are against me speaking to the matter, get your down vote and nasty comment ready. I will leave you to imagine my concern about your objections.

Now, this entire mess is complicated. And I suppose it is my job in this talk to not just point to the Marcotte's trademark mendacity, but to uncomplicate matters, even if I know that uncomplicating matters will piss even more people off. That's the trick about matters like this, especially those with racial implications. Any intellectually honest critique gets you placed directly into the crossfire.

Such is life in a society driven by the raw emotionalism of cable news and websites like Salon.

With that I want to start this talk with what I consider to be a succession of relevant truths, starting with Christopher Cantwell and moving forward to the bigger picture of racism, free speech, political violence and America's future.

Truth #1. Christopher Cantwell did write articles published by AVFM. None of the pieces we published included racist or violent sentiments.

Truth #2. Christopher Cantwell was disinvited from writing anything else for AVFM after I discovered advocacy for politically motivated violence he had penned on his own blog. This was in keeping with AVFM's anti-violence stance that has been in our founding principles since inception.

Truth #3. Christopher Cantwell made his disagreement with the decision to no longer publish his work quite public, blaming liberals at AVFM for the decision.

Truth #4. It was not liberals at AVFM who made the decision, it was me. And I am not a liberal. I am a conservative who doesn't see violence, or the people willing to engage in it, as a healthy or legitimate means of effecting political change.

Truth #5. Christopher Cantwell has and must have a right to express his opinions without being sprayed with mace or subjected to other forms of violence aimed at silencing him. I did not want his work at AVFM, but that is my free speech being exercised through control of my own intellectual property. The question of whether he has the right to express himself on his own ground, however, was never even a question worth asking. He either gets to speak his mind or eventually none of us do. The only way to not know that is by lying to yourself.

Truth #6. Christopher Cantwell's opinions and beliefs, however distasteful to some, do not confer moral superiority or extralegal privilege to those who want to silence him. Calling yourself anti-fascist or anti-racist does not give you the license to pick up a baseball bat and wade into a protest swinging it at people. You may think it does, and you certainly have the unquestioned right to say so. But when you do that in practice, it leaves you fairly and legitimately in the crosshairs of people protecting their freedoms. Make of that what you will. I don't care.

I note this is the bone that the left media has been picking with President Trump. Their claim is that Trump erred by stating the fact that there was violence and wrong doing on both sides. That was his big sin, and naturally it is proof of his racism.

As we all know, racism is bad. It's very bad: an overarching, absolute evil. So, in a clash between people who are supposedly racist and those who are supposedly anti-racist, the supposed anti-racists aren't guilty of immorality or criminality due to the alleged moral superiority of their cause. That, of course, is utter bullshit that corrupts the very idea of constitutional freedoms. It's just another excuse for another kind of evil.

But it is a powerful form of bullshit. It even had President Trump, who is a remarkably resilient and steely resistor to pressure for political correctness, failing, when he relented to pressure to name groups he didn't include Antifa and Black Lives Matter, whose utter hatefulness and propensity for violence has been on full public display for some time.

And while I am pissing some people off, I will add that virtue signaling is a direct path to rationalizing violence. There is a lengthy historical record of white men reacting that way to the fear that blacks would rape their women. That record makes Charlottesville look like a Sunday picnic and a fender bender.

Moving on to the matter that sparked this fiasco, Truth #7. From pre-revolutionary war history to modern times, we have made heroes of men who owned slaves. They are indeed immortalized in monuments across the land but only a minority of which are even associated with the American Civil War. They include the names of founding fathers like Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison and John Hancock. Even George Washington, our first president, the namesake of our nation's capital whose image is emblazoned on our currency, was an owner of slaves.

Truth #8. The racism that inarguably lingers from that history is nothing compared to problems that are more self-inflicted in nature. The biggest modern threat to the black community is the black community. A short walk through the blood-filled streets of Chicago should be enough to convince anyone of that. The number one cause of death for black men aged 15-34 is other black men.

Truth #9. While black on black violence represents a community turning its problems inward on itself, the primary architects of that rampant misery are white liberals, with the complicity of virtually every widely recognized black civil rights leader and organization.

By stringing entire inner-city enclaves out on public assistance and financially rewarding black women for having children without having fathers for them, they created a dangerous culture of fatherless black boys who find father figures in gang leaders and other criminals. The impact of the right's war on drugs and the left's Violence Against Women Act created two more very deep, terrible wounds. The amount of despair resulting from this is incalculable, and it desperately needs attention.

Truth #10. The police presence that always follows the folly of right-left politics is poorly-trained, poorly-paid, poorly-educated and woefully under-screened for psychological problems, like excessive physical aggression. The screening and the training are closely related. Most any given episode of "Cops" is enough to show that police are prone to use violence as a first option, often without discretion and frequently as a thuggish, abusive response to mental health crises that could be managed non-lethally, and with far less violence. The most reliable predictor of whether police abuse will occur is sex, not race, with men on the short end of the stick and black men on the shortest end.

Truth #11. Tearing down a statue of Robert E Lee isn't going to solve this problem.

Truth #12. Blaming President Trump, especially when people like President Obama are more a part of the dysfunction, isn't going to solve this problem.

Truth #13. White nationalism is not going to solve this problem.

Truth #14. The Ku Klux Klan is not going to solve this problem.

Truth #15. Antifa is not going to solve this problem.

Truth #16. Black Lives Matter is not going to solve this problem.

Truth #17. Hack journalism by mendacious political operatives like Amanda Marcotte is not going to solve this problem.

Truth #18. Truths 1-17 are all factors making this problem worse, because they all point us directly away from any solutions that might be employed, creating false boogeymen in the process. Just because some racists are anti-feminist doesn't mean they have anything close to answers.

Not that the wrongly labeled anti-racists are any better. At the end of the day, after you tear down every Civil War monument in the nation, and after you rename a thousand towns, cities, streets, schools and parks, you will still be left with scores of impoverished, fatherless black men killing each other, and police, doing the bidding of politicians from both sides of the fence, responding to the core problems with the politically expedient abuse of the victims.

As we've seen play out throughout our history, blacks are just the canaries in the coal mines. White culture isn't exempt from the same debilitating effect of political policies and feminism. Most of the protestors surrounding and participating in the destruction of the statue of Robert E. Lee were white. They are the same breed of white people who manufactured and presided over the ultimate destruction of the black family. And I will lay dollars to donuts that the clear majority of those white thugs came from homes without fathers. They weren't just stomping on Robert E. Lee, if you know what I mean.

All this, mind you, is just a superficial examination. The forces behind the rise of violence on the streets that is surely on the way, don't care about the destructive impact of fatherless children. They don't care about racial equality, either. And they don't care about our real history except to the extent that in the case of the radical left they want to erase it.

Does anyone really think that the sole objective here is to create a culture that quits glorifying the leaders of the South in the American Civil war? Does anyone really think that is all they want to destroy?

If you do think that, you are foolish. There are already calls to destroy Mount Rushmore. One of the counter protesters in the HBO sham documentary said something to the effect that just getting rid of Lee didn't mean much when the slave owner was still sitting on top of the hill at Monticello. She was of course referring to Thomas Jefferson.

This is not about ridding proper, enlightened America of the hailed images of Southern Civil War Heroes. That is just the target of opportunity. What they mean to do is to rid America of America. They want to destroy our history, all of it; destroy our icons, our way of life and our freedoms.

In fact, you've been seeing this happening right in front of your eyes in the corporate wing of the modern left. Google, with its search engine delisting of speech it does not approve of, is now leading the way. And Google is not alone. A Voice for Men, the site that rejected Christopher Cantwell's violent rhetoric, is blocked by Norton's safe search so that many people in public hotspots can't see the site.

O2 in the UK has done the same thing, preventing many people from reading A Voice for Men. And this has been going on for years.

The real battle over this is yet to come. So far, it is mostly extremists who have shown up. Virtue signal all you want about how terrible they are, the only reason the Christopher Cantwells of the world are here is because the political establishment has failed to do its sacred duty to uphold the constitution. The Charlottsville Police Department put on a clinic in that for sure.

But don't expect help from a Republican party who threw the constitution under the bus a long time ago. The collective silence of Republican snowflakes who don't want to be accused of being "alt right" has left the fight in the hands of the wrong people. They are no different than Democrats who have surrendered their political advocacy and will to the likes of Antifa and Black Lives Matter.

This is normally where I would try to offer some sort of solution to the problem. I don't have any. Well, I take that back. I could suggest the destruction of cultural Marxism, the restoration of fathers in the family and the furthering of a non-violent men's rights movement that has solutions to these pressing social problems. But that would mean taking on gynocentrism head on.

For all that is worth I could also recommend that politicians have balls, tell the truth and put the welfare of the American people over their continued quest for power. Oh yeah, and the media could start reporting news honestly.

Like I said, I don't have any solutions.

The best we will do for now is to continue to foster red pill philosophy, encouraging men to go their own way, support those who work for change in the ways they are able, and importantly, to expand this intellectual refuge for people who just can't swallow any more blue pills.

We can't yet fix the boatload of stupid that has spread across American culture on both sides of the political aisle. I don't know if we ever will. It may just have to crash and burn before anything meaningful can rise out of the ashes. But that, too, is probably a pipe dream. Ashes have a way of rising and turning into the same crap that started the fire.

Sexual Consent – Yes, No, Maybe.

Bettina Arndt · 1 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Candice Jackson, a top Trump Education official, hit the headlines recently by claiming ninety per cent of sexual assault claims on campuses involve couples who are both drunk. Judging from recent media reporting of our own campus rape crisis the same might be true here.

“I didn’t think I could even walk by myself. I think I knew what was going to happen but I was so drunk that I just like went along with it,” said Tasmanian University student Lorna Nilssen appearing on the ABC’s 7.30 Report claiming the Human Rights Commission survey showed alarming levels of assault and harassment.

The same programme featured ANU law student Freya Willis alleging she was raped by a fellow student at a campus event. “We were both quite intoxicated. I was much more intoxicated than he was and he separated me from my friends and we went back to a room where we were both staying and that’s where it happened.”

So many stories of drunken young women being taken advantage of – often by equally drunk young men. There were horrific tales of women falling victim to groups of men, having their drinks spiked or falling into the hands of serial predators. These are the cases highlighted by media promoting the feminist position that all sexual activity involving an intoxicated woman is sexual assault as she cannot give consent. And that discouraging female students from drinking risks blaming the victim and shaming such women into not seeking help.

Yet that’s only part of the story as shown on SBS’s recent Insight programme on sexual consent. President of the Law Society of NSW, Pauline Wright, talked about a boyfriend and girlfriend out on a date. They’ve had a few drinks, they regularly have sex. “They both get drunk, they go home and the usual thing for them would be to have sex. The girl might be saying yes but perhaps the next day thinks that was wrong.” Maybe they split up the next day, maybe there was reason for the girl to redefine her experience, suggested Wright. “It bothers me that because she was drunk the law might say that she didn’t have the capacity to say yes. That becomes really difficult for a young man.”

Very difficult, because as Candice Jackson pointed out, these regret-sex incidents can easily end up with a young man being charged with sexual assault, even many months later.

Wright also described a hypothetical first date where the girl thinks she doesn’t want to have sex but then they have too much to drink and do have sex. “The next morning, he doesn’t call, he doesn’t ring, she feels humiliated. Is that then a sexual assault? ” she asked.

Certainly most juries wouldn’t think so. They rarely convict in the date rape cases involving contradictory he-says, she-says evidence which constitute the bulk of campus rape allegations. That’s why the activists are pressuring universities to getting involved in such cases, promoting their simple narrative of men as perpetrators and women victims.

Just a few months ago the University of Canberra website included a Party Safe page advising students to “pace yourself if you are drinking and stay alert. When you are drunk or using drugs, you are more likely to do things you normally wouldn’t do when you are sober.” This advice was attacked by activist Nina Funnell on abc.net.au who denounced universities for still teaching “don’t get raped” rather than “don’t rape”. The advice has since been removed from the Party Safe page.

“Don’t get raped” is conspicuous by its absence in the universities’ virtue-signalling activity following the August 1 release of the HRC data. Our universities are strenuously ignoring the fact that the HRC data showed mainly good news – thankfully small figures for sexual assault, 1.6 per cent over two years, and the harassment was mainly unwanted staring, which most of the women dismissed as not serious or not requiring help.

Yet with most of our media choosing to misrepresent the figures and promote the fake news rape narrative, our universities have fallen into line and funded measures including online sexual consent courses consent courses which put the onus for preventing sexual assault squarely on the shoulders of young men.

These online consent courses are intriguing. Most are adapted from an Epigeum course constructed by proud feminists including Californian consultant Alan Berkowitz – a man who boasts of his ongoing battle against "unconscious sexism and male privilege." The programme pretends to be gender-neutral and includes case histories involving some gay couples and a few female perpetrators such as a woman who ponders going down on her sleeping partner and is later congratulated for restraining herself. But the programme is mainly pitched at teaching young men to decipher women's messages regarding consent:

"Verbal consent can be given directly in loads of different ways. Your partner may say things like: 'That feels good. Do it this way. Fuck me .YES! More! Keep going. Don't stop!…'"

"Always stop if you hear your partner say: 'No. I don't know. I'm not sure. Not now. I'm worried. Stop. Get off! Fuck off! Don't do that. Ouch. Not again. Do I have to?"

What's really odd is the person sending these messages are so rarely directly addressed in the programme. It's assumed the women are inert. They are like pot plants on a gardening show teaching people how do determine if the plant has dried out. Are the leaves wilting? Flowers dropping off? Insert fingers into the soil to test for dampness.

RMIT social justice professor Nicola Henry, an expert adviser to Epigeum, boasts on video that their courses focus on perpetrators and bystanders rather than victims. These "don't-rape" courses have no interest in teaching women to take proper ownership of the decision-making process that leads to a yes or no, let alone encouraging them to express those wishes clearly rather than keep men guessing.

Back in the 1990s I made a programme on sexual consent – Yes, No, Maybe – as a guest reporter on Four Corners. I had no trouble finding women who acknowledged they deliberately drink to avoid making decisions around consent. Women who admitted to playing games where they said no but wanted men to push through that resistance – a popular theme in hugely popular bodice ripper novels.

None of these complexities are addressed in the sexual consent programmes. The gender-neutral course contains only small nuggets of advice which even arguably target women: "You always have the right to change your mind about any kind of sexual activity – even right before or during sex." And "If someone forces (or tries to force) you to do something sexual that you don't want to do, remember that it's never your fault and it's not okay."

No one would deny the importance of the 'don't rape' message – sexual assault is rightly a very serious criminal offence. And it makes sense to change the culture so bystanders are empowered to intervene when women (or men) are being harassed or attacked. Yet it's shocking that feminists have persuaded our universities to absolve women of all responsibility for behaving sensibly and not putting themselves in harm's way.

Camille Paglia, speaking at a Battle of Ideas, pointed out that back in the 1960's women fought against women being locked up at night in single sex dormitories. "We are the ones who said, 'Get out of our private lives.' The colleges said, 'No, the world is dangerous. We must protect you against rape.'

And the response to from Paglia's generation of women? "Give us the freedom to risk rape. That is true adulthood, " said Paglia.

Evidence suggests that the current revival of paternalistic attitudes towards women won't protect them. An article, Efficacy of a Sexual Assault Resistance Program for University Women, published in the New England Journal of Medicine two years ago showed the passive-woman sexual consent programmes aren't working. "Most campuses use programmes that have never been formally evaluated or have not proved to be effective in reducing the incidence of sexual assault," said the leading author, Canadian sociology professor Charlene Senn spelling out disappointing results for programmes similar to those being introduced in Australia.

Senn's resistance program, which teaches women to recognise dangerous situations and resist sexual coercion, apparently reduces the incidence of date rapes by almost 50 per cent. Rape resistance is about teaching women how to say “no earlier and more effectively”, helping them to be “more confident and sure of their own desires” and “get past emotional roadblocks to resist unwanted sexual behaviour.”

It sounds promising, although Senn, who describes herself as a “feminist activist”, defines sexual assault to including having sex because “you feared you’d lose your relationship if you didn’t.” And the professor is dead against telling women to let fear restrict their lives: “If you are drinking 12 drinks, there’s no risk of rape unless there’s someone around who’s willing to rape. The risk is not in the alcohol.”

This argument is insulting to women and unfair to men suggests Canadian men’s rights activist and YouTube vlogger, Karen Straughan: “In the feminist narrative regarding drunkenness and sex only men retain agency. Women are reduced to infantilized objects without the capacity for volition. She was drunk. Enough said. She bears no responsibility. Yet the drunken man’s identical decision is subject to heightened scrutiny. He instigated the entire thing, and his drunkenness does not absolve him of responsibility, but in effect, makes him more morally culpable.”

Isn’t it odd that we encourage female responsibility in other aspects of life such as persuading young women not to drink and drive? They know they’ll face the consequences if they get plastered, drive and kill a pedestrian. Being drunk isn’t an excuse if they stab a homeless man to death, or molest a child. Where’s the logic in women not being in any way accountable if they get drunk and make stupid decisions exposing themselves to sexual harm?

This is a hot button issue for our drug and alcohol organisations who readily supply international data showing the clear link between intoxication and risk of sexual assault. “It’s well known that both victims and perpetrators of assaults and sexual assault have often been drinking prior to the event but this is largely ignored in the public debate,” says Michael Thorn, CEO of the Foundation for Alcohol Research and Education. Thorn is frustrated that data on drinking by both victims and perpetrators of violence is not being systematically collected or reported and he suggests the issue may well be “being downplayed for ideological reasons.”

The issue is critical to properly tackling sexual assault on campuses, according to Peter Miller, professor of Violence Prevention and Addiction Studies at Deakin University: “One of the key issues to address is the high levels of drug and alcohol consumption among university students, both male and female. We need to teach male and female students to stay sober enough to make good decisions around sexual consent.”

Advice to young women on how not to get raped? Given the grip the feminists have on our university that’s just not going to happen.

Fathers matter. Father's Day matters.

Robert Brockway · 2 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

It's Father's Day today! Well, in Australia at least. Many countries have seen attacks on Father's Day but Australia had been spared, at least until this year. A women who calls herself Red Ruby Scarlet has called for Father's Day to be replaced by Special Person's Day in Australia. She's received some media attention and fortunately significant push-back from the community. Scarlet was apparently arguing that celebrating Father's Day would be exclusionary for people without fathers. Taking this argument to its logical conclusions leads to absurdity. My 10 year old daughter suggested that if we took this further the US should abolish Independence Day since not everyone lives in an independent country.

Father's Day has been under attack for years as regular readers of AVfM will know. There have recently been some suggestions that Mother's Day has been under attack too. Fortunately today we have tools that help us quickly address this possibility. Let's see what Google Trends says.

[image]

This term was taken from a similar hashtag. Searching for the hashtag and other similar phrases led to similar results.

The occasional article argues for getting rid of both but the graphic above shows that the bulk of the attacks are directed against Father's Day alone.

Fathers matter. Fathers add value in the lives of children. Mothers and fathers play differently with children. The activities that fathers bring to play often include elements of rough and tumble and spontaneity that are beneficial to children.

A US government report on the value of fathers for the healthy development of children found that:

> Children with involved, caring fathers have better educational outcomes. A number of studies suggest that fathers who are involved, nurturing, and playful with their infants have children with higher IQs, as well as better linguistic and cognitive capacities. Toddlers with involved fathers go on to start school with higher levels of academic readiness. They are more patient and can handle the stresses and frustrations associated with schooling more readily than children with less involved fathers.

Not everyone can have a dad. Not every man can be a dad. We also know all too well there are people in our community who have been deprived of the chance to be a dad through parental alienation, sometimes with the assistance of the state. The value of fatherhood should spur us on to prevent this from happening.

Let's celebrate fatherhood and make sure that Father's Day continues to be a day to celebrate fatherhood and all of the many benefits it brings to children and to the family.

I'll bring this article to a close as I'm taking my daughter out to ride her bike, and then I'm helping her with maths. Fathers matter and Father's Day matters.

Does porn really destroy relationships?

Dr. David Ley · 9 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In 1989, researchers Kenrick, Gutierres, and Goldberg published a powerful study examining the impact of pornography on relationships and attraction. In the study, subjects were exposed to photos from Playboy and other types of erotica. Subjects who had viewed these nude images then found other women—especially their wives—to be less attractive. The subjects also reported that they were actually less in love with their wives after viewing the pornographic images.

This research has been heavily cited in academic literature, but also in general media discussions of the effects of pornography. The fact that porn could make men feel less attraction and less love for their wives is commonly used as a foundation for arguments against it. But while the idea that porn leads men to compare their wives to unrealistic ideals is a concern cited by activists and spouses, new research reveals that porn no longer appears to have this effect—if it ever did.

You may be aware of the ongoing "replication crisis" in social-science research. In essence, recent research has attempted to replicate some of the hallmark findings of some heavily-cited, influential research in psychology and the social sciences. Surprisingly, attempts to replicate many of these research findings have failed, suggesting that in many cases, the original studies were limited by statistical strategies, methodological flaws, or just over-interpretation by enthusiastic researchers eager to publish sensational findings in an academic market that feeds on hype.

Balzarini, Dobson, Chin, and Campbell recently undertook research to recreate the findings from the 1989 study, particularly the impact of porn on feelings of attraction and love for ones' romantic partner.

The authors first "pre-registered" their research, announcing their intent to test the study, and then constructed three different attempts to replicate the findings, over three distinct experimental tests. In each trial, the researchers were unable to replicate the original findings. It appears that there is no evidence to support the belief that exposure to pornography, or nude images of idealized women, leads men to feel less attraction toward, or less love for their partners.

Addendum – an important point to consider in this, is that the original 1989 study involved only 63 subjects. The current replication study involved a total sample (across the 3 studies) of 630 subjects. The researchers suggest that the original study's sample size was simply too small to either detect a real effect, or to generalize from to the general population. This raises again, the very important issue of not drawing sweeping meaning from studies with small, non-representative samples.

It may be that the culture, men, and sexuality have substantially changed since 1989. Few adult men these days haven't seen pornography or nude women—nudity and graphic sexuality are common in popular media, from Game of Thrones to perfume advertisements, and in many states, women are permitted to go topless. So it's possible that men in the more recent study have learned to integrate the nudity and sexuality they see in porn and everyday media in a manner which doesn't affect their attraction or love for their partners. Perhaps the men in the 1989 study had been less exposed to sexuality, nudity, and pornography.

In any case, we can, for now, put to bed the belief that porn kills love, or that exposure to it reduces the love or attraction that men feel for their partners. There are men who feel diminishing love or attraction for their partners, and these men often turn to pornography to find solace, excitement, arousal, and soothing. But we shouldn't necessarily blame porn for these relationship struggles—that's a cheap, deceptive, and untruthful answer.

Women hold up half the sky?

J T · 17 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

"Women hold up half the sky."

What does it mean?

Now and then, on a sunny day, when strolling over Mount Everest, I look around to see where these women are—the ones holding up half the sky. Clouds are made of water and water is heavy, so I suspect they have quite a challenge going on.

But where are they?

Hmm…

Pulleys.

That's it. Maybe they're using a pulley system.

They must have wrapped cable around the moon, and are using it as a pulley system and are holding up the sky by pulling down on the pulley from the valleys. There you go.

Hmm…

Death Valley, Khumba Valley, Douro Valley: nothing. I can't see any feminist down there in any of these valleys, let alone a cable coming down 'round the moon.

Of course, they might mean the ladies of the Erechtheion.

The Erechtheion is a temple on the north side of the Acropolis

But these are stone statues; and it's in Greece; and they're shouldering a roof, not a sky.

Women shoulder pregnancy, childbirth, and are the heartbeat of the family. That is a daunting obligation, and one that every civilization should esteem. The beauty, compassion, majesty and love that is woman is awe inspiring—the devotion of a child for its mother defines love; and poetry is but a pale comparison. Men write poetry about love; women give birth to love.

However, famous feminists have said this:

- "The nuclear family must be destroyed… Whatever its ultimate meaning, the break-up of families now is an objectively revolutionary process." Linda Gordon.
- "Marriage as an institution developed from rape as a practice." Andrea Dworkin.
- "Since marriage constitutes slavery for women, it is clear that the women's movement must concentrate on attacking this institution. Freedom for women cannot be won without the abolition of marriage." Sheila Cronin, the leader of the feminist organization NOW.
- "I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act." Robin Morgan, Ms. Magazine Editor.

So supporting children, families and husbands, is not what feminists have in mind, when they say that women hold up half the sky.

So what do they mean?

I look around. I look out my window. I see construction. I see buildings going up. I see men doing it, not women. I see the plows taking away snow at 2AM: men. I see the sanitation workers, firefighters, oil riggers, foresters: men, men, men, men. I attend the Opera— men wrote 98% of the music. I go to museums and note that men created 95% of the beauty housed within. I check the math theorems: men. Physics? Men. The literature? Mostly men.

Who slaved to build the Pyramids, Angor Watt, the Cathedrals and our cities? Men. What about the explorers who trudged across plains, scaled the mountains or sailed the oceans? Men, men, men. I look at the tombs in Arlington and the unimaginable sacrifice revealed by rows and rows of white marble: men.

[image]Of course, the contributions of some women have been astounding: Emmy Noether, Hypatia, Sophie Germain, Curie, Thatcher, Catherine the Great, Boudica. The list is almost endless. Some say women's compassionate sacrifices to aid humanity have also been overlooked; and I agree. However, let's not overlook the depth of the contributions of masculinity; and how men built our houses which, um, you know, hold up the roof from the rain.

Now we are in an epoch where women can contribute and men no longer have to be the only ones lying in military cemeteries or suffering 90% of all workplace fatalities. This is great.

However, I don't see feminists having held up their half before this time, to justify the saying in the present tense.

If we let that toxic feminist expression—"holding up half the sky"—remain un-repudiated, we indirectly diminish both the achievements and sacrifices of masculinity. We must not allow that. Those men buried in Arlington did not only hold up half: they gave their lives. If women held up half the sky, why is it men lying in those graves? If feminists toss "toxic masculinity" at men, and blame us for the immense horrific evils such as murder and mansplaining, then we deserve our share of credit for the good; and it's a lot more than 50%.

So let's summarize so far:

- We have ruled out holding up clouds.
- We (well, actually, feminists) have ruled out holding up families.
- We have recognized that their contributions and sacrifices are relatively recent by comparison. Will women hold up their half soon? Of course.

So what have feminists been holding up until now?

You see, it's a saying—an expression; and sayings say whatever the sayer feels like thinking—but without the burden of providing evidence. Expressions rely on emotion.

That is the essence of fem-splaining: using pseudo-poetic emotional visualization in place of logic and evidence.

There are lots of sayings that mean, like, whatever.

Here's one: "butterflies are free."

I hear that, and I'm like: "Wow! Man! Butterflies are free. That's, like, awesome, dude."

Or "double rainbow across the sky."

Well, not only do I know what that means, I also know what he was smoking when he said it.

Or that other saying: "I never said I was a perfect candidate, and I certainly have never said I ran perfect campaigns, but I don't know who is or did. And at some point it sort of bleeds into misogyny."

I don't know what that means; and she admitted she was drinking when she said it.

That saying about "women having held up half the sky," vacillates between comical and disparaging. Stripped of family (by feminists themselves) it is laughable at face value. It disparages the achievements and sacrifices of masculinity by reducing it to half.

When they insist on this trite saying, feminists are like children who demand desert, but won't eat their peas. "No I will not eat the peas," they say, "men can eat the peas and the broccoli; I want that NY Super Fudge Chunk that I deserve for holding up half the…" holding up half… holding up.

Eureka! That's it.

Feminists are holding things up.

Women in science and engineering have contributed; feminists are holding things up.

Seriously, now: no one is holding up the sky. The sky is not falling. Most good men and good women are now achieving good things, doing work that respects each other. Chicken Little has spent too much time in a Woman's Studies class.

The next time feminists shout "Women hold up half the sky!" ask for the evidence. Short of evidence, one must accept that feminists are just holding things up. Otherwise, you might as well be spitting on the gravestones in Arlington—the tombs of those men who helped us rise up, from their self-sacrificial six-feet-under.

JT is also the author of a novel: http://nynovel.com

Learning from women: tears will gain you forgiveness for all your crimes

Douglas Galbi · 24 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A 35-year-old woman planned and carried out a series of rapes of a 12-year-old boy. A news headline explained that she had engaged in "clandestine sex trysts" with the boy. The headline reported that she "burst into tears" at her criminal sentencing. Can you imagine such a headline describing a 35-year-old man raping a 12-year-old girl?

"Former Ravens Cheerleader Completes Weekend Jail Time For Rape Of Teen Boy." She was 49. He was 15. If a 49-year-old man had raped a 15-year-old girl, would he have been sentenced just to weekend jail time?

A 35-year-old English teacher raped a student eight times in the classroom and in a car. The teacher was sentenced to 10 years of probation. The teacher-perpetrator was a woman, and the student-victim was a boy. Do you think that gender pattern biased the criminal sentence?

While mainstream media and legal authorities largely ignore gender bias in the criminal justice system, ordinary persons are starting to notice the terrible injustice of gender-biased criminal justice. Suppose a woman rapes a boy. Suppose the rapist gets pregnant, doesn't chose to have an abortion, doesn't chose to legally abandon the child, and doesn't chose to put the child up for adoption. Under what kind of justice system would the rape victim then be legally forced to make large monthly payments to his rapist? That happens under the U.S. justice system, and probably under other justice systems around the world.

Grass-roots activists have interpreted gender injustice in new ways that are far more significant than the gender ratio in particular employment categories. The point, however, is to change gender injustice. For that task, the medieval Latin masterpiece Speculum stultorum provides vital guidance. With freedom of speech that probably would not be acceptable today, that medieval Latin work boldly described cloistered nuns in England:

> They're serpent-bodied, siren-voiced, with breasts > of dragons, Paris's heart, Susanna's charms.
> But still they have one motion that rebuts all,
> a ceaseless flow of tears before their God.
> With these they pray to God and win his grace, > with these they cleanse their hearts of all their crimes.
> { Corpore serpentes, sirenes voce, dracones > pectore, Susanna smigmate, corde Paris.
> Sed tamen illud habent, unum quod cuncta refellit, > ante Deum lacrimas quae sine lege fluunt.
> His Dominum placant semper veniamque merentur, > his sua cunta lavant crimina, quicquid agunt. }

Men too deserve forgiveness for all their crimes. To achieve gender equality with women, men must cry openly and profusely in the face of appalling injustices against men.

God hears the cries of the poor, even while gynocratic society ignores them.

Notes:

The above quote is from Nigellus Wireker, Mirror of Fools {Speculum stultorum} ll. 2379-84, Latin text from Mozley & Raymo (1960) p. 67. I've adapted the English translation from Regenos (1959) p. 114.

[image] Woman crying. Image created by the U.S. Marine Corps for National Domestic Violence Awareness month in 2009. Via Wikimedia Commons. The U.S. criminal justice system gender-profiles men for arrest for domestic violence. The U.S. also administers separate and highly gender-unequal services for victims of domestic violence.

References:

Mozley, John H., and Robert R. Raymo, ed. 1960. Nigellus Wireker. Speculum stultorum. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Regenos, Graydon W, trans. 1959. Nigellus Wireker. The book of Daun Burnel the ass: Nigellus Wireker's Speculum stultorum. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Article published under CC license.

Forcing men to make monthly payments to their rapists

Douglas Galbi · 25 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

U.S. courts have uniformly affirmed that the state can lawfully force boys and men to make monthly payments to their rapists. The circumstances that produce this outcome are:

1. woman rapes boy or man with a sex act of reproductive type [1]
2. rapist gets pregnant from the rape
3. rapist gives birth to the baby, rather than aborting it
4. rapist doesn't get rid of the child under safe-haven infant abandonment laws
5. rapist doesn't give the child up for adoption

The rapist can then legally receive a "child support" order that requires the raped boy or man to make monthly payments to his rapist. The size of these payments depend on the rapist's income, not the child's needs, and there's is no legal requirement that these payments actually be used to financially support the child. Moreover, if the rapist is granted state payments under the welfare program Temporary Assistance for Needy Families, the state will require the rapist to name the raped father of the child. The state will then on its own motion establish a "child support" order against that boy or man, and the state will collect on behalf of the rapist any payments made under that order. Circumstances of men being legally required to make monthly payments to their rapists have been numerous enough to generate more than seventeen court cases. All the court cases addressing these circumstances have affirmed that a raped man is legally obligated to make payments to the woman who raped him.[2]

Requiring raped boys and men to "pay child support" is truly a marvel of sophistry, delusion, and social exploitation. Courts typically gesture to the best interests of the child. The irony of referring to the best interests of the child seems to be lost is cases imposing child support on boys of ages twelve and fifteen who were victims of statutory rape. Courts hold up the principle "every child has a right to support from both parents."[3] But what about single parents? Should law, public policy, and courts discourage single parenthood? If the public concern is about the financial support of children, two parents are surely better than one parent. But three or more financial parents is better than two. Why not impose child-support orders on grandparents as well as the brothers and sisters of the parent? The best interests of the child would be better served by imposing child support orders on the whole village.[4]

Boys and men being legally forced to to make monthly payments to their rapists indicates that elite men and women devalue fundamental interests of ordinary men. Legal platitudes about the best interests of the child and the virtues of two-parent families are emotive superstructure above base interests. A law review article published in 1992 asked:

> Men also have interests in their genetic progeny and in their reproductive autonomy. If we object to what some characterize as coerced motherhood, can we close our ears to pleas about coerced fatherhood? [4]

Two decades latter, the answer unquestionably is yes. What that answer fundamentally means for open, free, democratic societies remains to be seen.

* * * * *

Table: child support rape cases (Excel version)

Notes:

[1] The outcome is the same if a woman acquires a male's sperm through fraud or theft. See Higdon (2011) pp. 18-20.

[2] Here's a list of child support rape cases. Many such cases probably occur in low-level family court proceedings that are largely opaque to external policy evaluation and analysis. For example, online searches don't show the Ohio child support rape case described obliquely in a newspaper article. Moreover, given the unanimity of courts' opinions, a rape victim might wisely judge that bringing such a case isn't worth the cost. Forcing boys and men to make monthly payments to their rapists is more bizarre to reason than unusual in practice. On courts' unanimity in making such decisions, see Hidgon (2011) p. 13.

[3] See, e.g. County of San Luis Obispo v. Nathaniel J., 50 Cal. App. 4th 842 – Cal: Court of Appeal, 2nd Appellate Dist., 6th Div. 1996 at 845.

[4] Two law review comments (London (2004) and Johnson (2005)) and two law review articles (Jones (2002) and Higdon (2011)) have focused on requiring boys and men victims of rape to pay child support. Three out of four of those authors are female. London (2004) considers the issue from a highly gynocentric perspective. Higdon (2011), p. 12, observes:

> Few would argue with the proposition that, if a man voluntarily has sex with a woman and a child results, then he should be liable for child support.

Two decades ago, few would argue for gay marriage. A law review article published in 1994 declared authoritatively, "As a direct consequence of biological differences, reproductive choice is a right exclusive to women." See Thompson (1994) p. 393. Thus biology is destiny, and men don't get reproductive rights because men don't get pregnant. That's wholly specious. That men don't get pregnant simplifies the moral issue of reproductive rights from aborting a fetus to not having the state impose unplanned financial parenthood on a man for no act of his own other than having sex of reproductive type. Higdon (2011), p. 41, begins its conclusion:

> Despite the noble policies upon which it is premised, the practice of holding biological fathers strictly liable for child support is not without its shortcomings.

These polices are no more noble than circumlocution in describing gross injustice.

[5] Shultz (1992) p. 93. Higdon (2011), p. 26, states, "courts simply have to start taking a different approach to this issue." Higdon (2011) still has not been published in a law review. Law reviews themselves are quite capable of ignoring and obscuring the gross unreasonableness of this area of law.

References:

Higdon, Michael J. 2011. "Fatherhood by Conscription: Nonconsensual Insemination and the Duty of Child Support." (February 14, 2011). University of Tennessee Legal Studies Research Paper No. 139. Available at SSRN: http://ssrn.com/abstract=1761333 or http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.1761333

Johnson, Dana. 2005. "Comment, Child Support Obligations that Result from Male Sexual Victimization: An Examination of the Requirement of Support." 25 Northern Illinois University Law Review, pp. 515-538.

Jones, Ruth. 2002. "Inequality in Gender-Neutral Laws: Why Must Male Victims of Statutory Rape Pay Child Support for Children Resulting from Their Victimization?" 36 Georgia Law Review, pp. 411-63.

London, Ellen. 2004. "Comment, A Critique of the Strict Liability Standard for Determining Child Support in Cases of Male Victims of Sexual Assault and Statutory Rape." 152 University of Pennsylvaian Law Review, pp. 1957-99.

Shultz, Marjorie M. 1992. "Abortion and Maternal-Fetal Conflict: Broadening Our Concerns." 1 Southern California Review of Law and Women's Studies 79.

Thompson, Angela. 1994. "International Protection of Women's Rights: An Analysis of Open Door Counselling Ltd. and Dublic Well Women Centre v. Ireland." 12 Boston University International Law Review 371.

Article published under CC license.

Here's why you are uneasy with Star Trek: Discovery, Anita Sarkeesian

August Løvenskiolds · 26 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original Spoilers ahead. For the New York Times review, see here.

Anita Sarkeesian fancies herself a fan of Star Trek but in a recent video review of the new vagina-washed series Star Trek: Discovery, (hereafter ST: Diss) Anita expressed unclear misgivings about the new series available only by subscription to the pricey CBS All Access streaming service. Don't be alarmed – I watched it so you don't have to.

As a feminist booster it is a moral imperative for me to step in and mansplain to Anita the sources of her inarticulate unease. To her credit or perhaps shame, Anita was able to speak her hatred for a black girl's hair – she and a friend "Ebony" (no kidding) nattered on and on about it being not nappy enough for their tastes – but there are other, deeper features of the pilot episode that Anita seems to have missed.

It is no small irony that after decades of complaining how women in power are judged and commented on their looks, the very first place Anita and Ebony go is right down the same track.

Stereotype one. The opening scene depicts an Asian woman, Captain Phillipa, wandering aimlessly in a desert – the woman is even depicted walking in literal circles. I wish I were kidding about this but as Anita often says, one has to always point out such stereotypes. One would think that the trope of a clueless Asian woman driver would be familiar to Anita.

Attention Rachel Dolezal. Walking tête-à-tête with the Captain is Commander Michael Berman – a female-presenting trans-Vulcan – meaning that Michael, the show's protagonist, is trans-racial in that she was born human but was raised on Vulcan as a Vulcan by Sarek and Amanda, the parents of the famous Mr. Spock. A radfem like Anita is likely to be quite conflicted about both the trans sexuality implied by a girl named Mike AND any sort of trans racial identity. Anita might have also been annoyed by the show writers' breaking of canon – until now, Spock has never had a sister, adopted or otherwise, nappy-haired or not. [Corrected.]

Attention Dr. Freud. Phillipa and Michael find an elusive hole in the desert which they hope make moist with their tools. Sure enough, after a bit of fumbling and a pregnant pause, a gush of fluid sprays them both after Phillipa teases Michael with a promotion to a command of her own. The undertones of sexual harassment could hardly be clearer but Anita completely missed it.

A bridge of fainting couches. The third in command is a craven alien bloke named "Saru" as if to reflect his overly sorry, fearful Nancyboy nature. Although radfems like Anita cultivate such losers, they also hate them viscerally for their failure to meet attractive masculine norms but rarely do feminists admit this openly as it alienates their fancy male allies. Indeed, the milquetoast Sarek is the most masculine character in the show, creating a dearth of humanoid eyecandy for the ladies outside the Klingons.

Breaking the Klingons. The longtime bullies of the galaxy, the Klingons, have been redesigned again to look more alien and blue-black than ever before. In addition to mangling their canonical look, the writers futz with their well-established death rituals.

In the Star Trek: The Next Generation episode "Heart of Glory" the Klingon death rituals are shown in detail – the eyes of the dead warrior are forced open, his Klingon companions roar to warn the afterlife that a warrior is on the way, and the body is then discarded without burial as it is of no further interest to the living. In ST: Diss, however, there is no guttural outcry of warning nor discarding of the corpses – the dead are mummified and placed in coffins that festoon the exterior of the Klingon ship, sort of like how the Reavers used the dead in Serenity. These new Klingons are sex-segregated and on a holy Jihad in such a manner that comparisons to Islam are inevitable, and so, of course, the feminist unease with depictions of Islam as violent should make Anita's skin crawl.

The super virtual signal. The Klingons ignite a massive beacon with the intent of drawing other Klingon groups to their cause – sort of a flashy 9/11 virtue signal. The Klingon commander chooses a shunned, light-skinned (albino?) Klingon to trigger the virtue signal. That is correct – there was a virtue signal inside a virtue signal.

Tears in the ladies' room. Woman-only professional environments are highly toxic and ST: Diss slavishly gets this perfect: the lady Commander Michael begins a mutiny against the lady Captain Phillipa by stabbing her in the neck with drugs. No kidding. [Edited to add: can a human perform a Vulcan neck pinch? Obviously, a trans Vulcan would use drugs to supplement her efforts in the same way other trans folk do.] An open depiction of female on female violence should have made Anita rip out her loopy earrings. Who needs Klingons for war when you have surly chicks on the bridge?

There is much more – Michael gets a full vagina pass for being stabby like Cora in the series The Sinner – but I think you get the point, Anita.

Enjoy the show.

.

Dr. Altaf Mangera of Coventry, UK, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 30 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Altaf Mangera has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org

From the website of the “Qualified Circumcision Clinic” where he works, we read:

“Dr (Mr) Altaf Mangera MBChB(Hons), MD, FRCS(Urol), FEBU, is a NHS Consultant Surgeon in Urology working at the prestigious Royal Hallamshire Teaching Hospital.

Dr (Mr) Altaf Mangera is the lead consultant surgeon at QCC and has been performing and teaching both major and minor surgery procedures for 10 years. He is qualified and experienced in the surgical procedure of circumcision.”

Mike Buchanan and Justice for Men and Boys have been following the story of a 12-year-old boy facing unwanted circumcision (also known as assault) at Dr. Mangers’s clinic. Follow the story here at Mike’s website and Dr. Mangera’s response to planned protests at his clinic.

Elsewhere on the website, from the ‘isn’t it obvious’ department, we see the heading “What Adult Patients and Parents Say About Us…” Some of those comments:

> “Brilliant customer service. I would definitely recommend this service to family and friends.”
>
> “The surgeon was excellent my son slept through most of it.”

What’s obvious is that the infant patients involved can’t give their say about being strapped down and permanently mutilated, and I suspect they wouldn’t be so welcoming and grateful.

Since Dr. Mangera has no information about the risks, legality and ethics of routine infant circumcision, you can read and view videos about that at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Mangera’s practice information follows:

Sheffield

Clinic Address: Dovercourt Surgery,

3 Skye edge Ave (off City Road), Sheffield, S2 5FX

Coventry

Clinic Address: City of Coventry NHS Healthcare Centre

Stoney Stanton Road

Coventry, CV1 4FS

Phone: 07954858060

> Dr. Altaf Mangera of Coventry, UK, “Known Genital Mutilator” https://t.co/fzX0p5KyvY #MGM #circumcision #intactivism pic.twitter.com/wmNtgyFtTM
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) September 30, 2017

The fourth International Conference on Men's Issues will be held in Birmingham, UK, 13-15 July 2018

Mike Buchanan · 30 September 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Note from Paul: After the rousing successes of the first three ICMIs, we push forward again with the next conference being held in Birmingham, UK. ICMI has quickly become an institution of an event for the human rights of men and boys, as well as an annual oasis for the red pill adherents of the world. The event is social, political, cultural and a hell of a lot of fun for attendees and speakers. I hope you will be able to put this on your calendar and secure your place at the event right away. By doing so you will be joining hundreds of other past and present attendees who were glad they did. I look forward to seeing you there! PE.

IMPORTANT: Please do not book travel or accommodation until we've officially stated (on this website) that the conference is definitely going ahead. We shall do this at the earliest opportunity, following receipts of sufficient £22.00 deposits (see below). You will be informed as soon as anyone else if you subscribe to this website's auto-notifications.

Justice for Men & Boys is a British political party. Since our launch in 2013 we've been the only party in the English-speaking world campaigning for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts. In 2016 we hosted the very successful second International Conference on Men's Issues, and we're hosting this conference, the fourth in the series, in association with A Voice for Men.

The list of conference speakers is here. We'll update it as new speakers are confirmed, we're aiming for a total of 15.

We've booked an outstanding venue for the conference, in Birmingham, over 13-15 July, 2018.

We're confident the conference will be the biggest, most interactive, and simply the best conference in the series to date. It will be held in St Andrew's Stadium, the home of Birmingham City Football Club. The club's website is here, the page on conferences and events here, the brochure on the venue's rooms etc. here. The brochure includes information on room capacities. Mike Buchanan is your guide in a video tour (18:13) of the venue – here.

We've booked the venue over the three days of the conference, it consists of the following rooms:

- Legends' Lounge (main room for presentations)
- Jasper Carrott Suite (breakouts, dinners)
- International Suite (breakouts)
- City Room (breakouts)
- Boardroom (workshops, seminars…)
- Boardroom Club (lunches, tea and coffee…)
- 3 x Executive Boxes (18 seats)
- 13 x Executive Boxes (10 seats)

Collectively these rooms can hold over 1,100 people, seated. The main room for presentations, the Legends' Lounge, will hold 350 people, seated. Rooms will be available for hire during the conference, click on the Room hire tab for more information.

We need to be sure that a sufficient number of people plan to attend, to make the event financially viable. So we're starting (as we did with the London conference in 2016) with a request that you make a deposit of £22.00 as soon as possible. The sum will be refunded in full if the conference doesn't take place.

Your deposit will guarantee the availability of an Early Bird ticket, the deadline to pay the £203.00 balance will be four weeks after the announcement that the conference is definitely going to take place. After the deadline you can pay the balance of £243.00 before 24:00 GMT 14 April, during which time tickets will be priced at £265.00. We need to set an early deadline for ordering tickets because we need to ensure we have the money to pay for major outlays such as speaker flights, hotel accommodation etc.

You do not need to have made the £22.00 deposit to later order a ticket, but if you don't:

- you won't be guaranteed ticket availability
- you'll be adding to the risk that the conference is cancelled simply because not enough people have paid the deposit to give us confidence about likely attendance numbers

You can pay your £22.00 deposit here:

Media representatives are invited to apply for tickets, they will only need to pay £31.50 per day, to cover the costs of lunches and light refreshments.

Ticket prices are unchanged from the London conference (2016) but this time lunch and light refreshments (tea, coffee, biscuits, on arrival and during morning and afternoon breaks) will be covered by the ticket price.

Feel free to suggest additional speakers to those already appearing – we're planning to have 15 speakers – and/or suggest what you'd like to see happen at the conference. It's your conference, and we want to make sure you have a great experience. Email Mike Buchanan (mike@j4mb.org.uk) with suggestions for speakers, activities, etc.

International Conferences on Men's Issues – ICMIs – have been held since 2014, and all have been highly successful. The first was hosted by A Voice for Men, the second and third by J4MB and AVfM respectively, in association with others. Details on the conferences, and links to the presentation videos and other materials, can be found here:

2014 – Detroit, USA

2016 – London, England

2017 – Gold Coast, Australia

We look forward to meeting you in Birmingham, and taking the next step in the battle for the human rights of men and boys.

Please email J4MB (info@j4mb.org.uk) if you have queries on ordering tickets, or any other conference-related matters.

The gynocentrism of Jordan Peterson

Peter Wright · 1 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Most by now will have heard the name Jordan Peterson, who has become quite the internet sensation as he tackles the excesses of postmodern philosophy and it's negative impact on society. His fight against the deconstruction of traditional cultural forms, along with the existential vertigo and nihilism that inevitably follow it are commendable. However there's a question mark over what Peterson deems to replace that postmodernism with, which I'll get to in a moment.

Peterson works largely, though not exclusively, with Jungian terminology – especially with what Jungians term the 'archetypal patters' of human behaviour. Carl Jung was among the first to document universal patterns of behavior among humans which he called archetypal patterns, which he later gave discreet titles such as the child archetype, father archetype, mother archetype, and so on. Jung identified literally hundreds of such archetypes and discovered that classical mythologies also tended to record these archetypal themes in story form.

Jung believed that all people perceive the world through archetypal filters of one kind or another, and are often unconscious of the fact they are perceiving the world through a limited archetypal lens.

With that brief description of archetypes I come back to the question of what Jordan Peterson wants to replace postmodernism with. Does he want to replace it with what was there before it, a wide variety of archetypal forms? The answer to that appears to be no, he has a much more simplistic prescription to fill the void: that men become heroes and women become mothers.

After all the good of cautioning against the excesses of postmodernism, Peterson would unwind it by advocating an equally excessive cult of motherhood as the necessary alternative. He is caught by the spell of what Jungians refer to as the Great Mother Archetype, and doesn't realize he's caught.

The overwhelming amount of emphasis and air time he gives to discussing good mothers, bad mothers, the Great Mother, Oedipal mother, devouring mother, nurturing mother and so on far exceeds the airtime he gives to other themes. Mentioning career women occasionally (often in the negative) doesn't make the emphasis any less obsessive.

[image]

In the early pioneering days of Freud and Jung there was a huge fad of interest in parental figures, especially the mother. Theory has since moved on from mothers and the mother archetype, but Peterson appears trapped there compliments of his fascination with Jungian literature. This is the Achilles heel of his pitch for improved gender relations and it deserves unpacking.

The first thing we need to know about the Mother Archetype is that it is linked to her archetypal son – The Hero.[2] In myths and stories around the world we read of Mamma's hero-son moving through the world slaying dragons, a theme Peterson specializes in discussing.

The possession of Peterson's mind by the theme of the Great Mother and her son The Hero compels him to ask young men to lift heavy weights, and ask young women to be mothers – great mothers. Anyone with a strong understanding of archetypal psychology will see immediate problems in this proposal.

Here's an excerpt from post-Jungian James Hillman which I think captures the issue well:

> In their early discoveries, Freudian and Jungian psychologies both were dominated by parental archetypes, especially the mother, so that behavior and imagery were mainly interpreted through this maternal perspective: the oedipal mother, the positive and negative mother, the castrating and devouring mother, the battle with the mother and the incestuous return. The unconscious and the realm of "The Mothers" were often an identity. Through this one archetypal hermeneutic, female figures and receptive passive objects were indiscriminately > made into mother symbols. What was not mother! Mountains, trees, oceans, animals, the body and time cycles, receptacles and containers, wisdom and love, cities and fields, witches and death – and a great deal more lost specificity during this period of psychology so devoted to the Great Mother and her son, the Hero. Jung took us a step forward by elaborating other archetypal feminine forms, e.g., the anima, and I have tried to continue in Jung's direction by remembering that breasts, and even milk, do not belong only to mothers, that other divine figures besides Maria, Demeter, and Kybele have equally important things to say to the psyche and that the women attendant on Dionysus were not turned into mothers but nurses. Like those frescoes of the madonna Church which conceals a congregation under her billowed blue skirts, the Great Mother has hidden a pantheon of other feminine modes for enacting life.[1]

With his monotheism of the Mother, Peterson narrows the prescription for young men and women, this in contrast to Jung for whom the archetypal possibilities for a human life are 'polytheistic' (ie. multi-optional and varied); thus living out the Mother and Hero archetypes alone – Peterson's preferred template – reduces that variety to singular options.

Asking all young men to be worldly heroes, to lift heavy weights to compliment the maternal principle, and asking young women to be mothers when they may not be suited to motherhood at all, limits the possibilities dramatically and may fly in the face of a person's calling to be something else entirely.

In order to get past this mother-monotheism we need to lift Madonna's skirt to allow all the many archetypal forms to walk out and stand independently on their own two feet. By relativizing the Mother Archetype, by removing that word "Great" that appears before it, we allow it to be just one archetype among many, no more or less important than the rest.

Many men want to be heroes, and women mothers. However there's a problem resulting from what's left out of that picture. The omission of other archetypal styles and perspectives likely leads people away from things they might be better suited to. For example some men are not called to be worldly heroes and don't want to be – they might be spontaneous Peter Pan's, introverts, gay men, Zeta males, bachelors or intellectual explorers. Likewise women might not be first and foremost identified with their wombs and kitchens – they might have a strong desire to be childless and perhaps to pursue some other life calling; to study, to have a career, help the homeless, or whatever.

It's insufficient to argue that "mothering has its basis in biology" and thus the Mother Archetype is the most important archetype to push. All archetypes have their basis in biology, that's Jungianism 101 and therein lies the problem: Peterson talks only about mothering as biologically based but does not grant the same basis in biology for the other archetypal patterns women might enact.

The mother Goddess Demeter is not the only Goddess…. there are others like Artemis (a freewheeling virgin huntress); Athena (a virgin Goddess focused on civic responsibility); Aphrodite (Goddess of beauty, sexual pleasure and love); Hestia (a virgin Goddess of the hearth); or Hera (Goddess of social power and status) just to mention a few. Psychiatrist Dr. Jean Shinoda-Bolen elaborates some of the many feminine archetypes that Peterson neglects in her book Goddesses in Everywoman: Powerful Archetypes in Women's Lives.

Many of the archetypal figures in myth were not primarily mothers, but nonetheless the biological impulses that give rise to their patternings are equally as valid as those underpinning mothering.

To underline the point more starkly we can say that even the destructive spectacle of feminism that Peterson rightly resists is a biologically-based archetypal pattern.

To summarize, the danger in Peterson's advice is that it narrows the possibilities too much, and too forcefully in favor of Mother and her Hero son.[2] Moreover, many men have become tired of the onerous demands placed on them by traditional gender roles, and who can really blame them?

Traditional gender roles were workable when held in balance, with careful reciprocity guiding the arrangement. However in modern society the contractual emphasis on reciprocity has gone by the wayside in favor of extracting all you can from the other person and from the relationship. That makes traditional relationships potential places of exploitation and likely failure.

Yearning to return to better models of the past doesn't guarantee we'll get them, as so many people discover. What we get instead are onerous gendered-expectations and demands with little payoff – or worse asset loss, parental alienation, false accusations and public shaming, not to mention the psychological sequelae that comes with it.

For men, such mother-serving heroics serve to further an already lopsided gynocentric culture, one asking men to put themselves into the service of marriage and womankind in an environment that is unlikely to provide much if any reciprocal payoff — for women long ago cast off society's demand that they play the role of mother and dutiful wife, and men are now seeing fit to do the same.

Men's Rights Activists have long known that postmodernism, feminism, and marxist SJW's are bankrupt. That's what we fight. Likewise we know that traditional gynocentrism is bankrupt. This article attempts to show that Peterson too understands the bankruptcy of postmodernism, feminism, and marxist SJW culture, which he describes articulately and with passion….. but then proceeds to fumble for a working model to replace it. For him the replacement is a return to traditional stereotypes of mothers, marriage and women-serving heroes. Traditional gynocentrism. The problem today is that neither women nor men are willing to define themselves solely by relation to the opposite sex, which they view as an exercise in exploitation and control…. so Peterson's solution simply doesn't work for many people of today.

MRAs have elaborated one solution in the Zeta / MGTOW life orientation that doesn't view male identity primarily on the basis of how it benefits the opposite sex. And as part of that adjustment many men who want relationships with women – the red pill kind – are beginning to approach them as relationships between peers (Marc Rudov), as intimate friendships, or as forms of non-gynocentric traditionalism…. or they may frame them as something else entirely. What they are doing is weaving a middle path between Scylla and Charybdis, and refusing to swap one poison for another.

Sources:

Videos by Jordan Peterson.
Analysis of Sleeping Beauty
Is it right to bring a baby into this terrible world?
The Oedipal Mother in a South Park Episode
The Positive Mother Gives Birth to the Hero
The Failed Hero Story vs The Successful (Freud vs Jung)
The overprotective mother or 'how not to raise a child'

Reference:

[1] Hillman, J. Abandoning the Child, in Mythic Figures, Vol 6. Uniform Edition

Notes:

[2] There are a number of variations on the hero theme, as detailed by Joseph Campbell in his book The Hero With a Thousand Faces. Campbell wasn't a Jungian, and he was suspicious of many Jungian dogmas.

When referring to the hero archetype in the article above I'm referring exclusively to the classical Jungian understanding of that term, and Peterson's reliance on same. The hero archetype in Jung's writings is intimately bound up with the mother archetype (being a hero for mother / or fighting against the dragon mother, etc), as contrasted with Campbell's focus which held that a hero's journey need not imply mother. Jung's mother-tied definition of the hero – Mother's Hero – is laid out in his Symbols of Transformation.

One poster on the Peterson facebook page recently wrote, "The hero's journey as described by Joseph Campbell begins by 'Separation,' the departure from the status quo. To me this personally I associate this to stepping out of and leaving the gynocentric view of the status quo." That is a true stepping off into the unknown, a more gutsy hero's journey, as compared with stepping out into the world as mother's hero to do her bidding. As Campbell characterized it, the true hero journey entails leaving the mother-world behind and seeking atonement with the father.

See also: A brief critique of Jordan Peterson's use of "Jungian" sources

Fighting to keep the message alive

Paul Elam · 8 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

As many of you know, for the past couple of years I have dedicated most of my writing to video scripts for my YouTube channel, An Ear for Men. Producing an average of two videos per week, I have focused my efforts on providing material for men of an interpersonal nature that enhances their well-being and supports a red pill lifestyle. The channel has been successful, growing to over 40,000 subscribers, many of them men who contact me to say that the channel's message has been helpful, and in some cases life-saving.

Unsurprisingly, it did not take long to encounter problems with internet thug Google in monetizing the videos. Recently, I opened my channel page to find that large groups of videos were demonetized as being advertiser unfriendly. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to the videos that were targeted. They even demonetized a video I did on the therapeutic benefits of dogs.

[image]

Given that I have some support for my work via my Patreon page, I elected to simplify matters by just not monetizing videos. I hoped that this would keep Google censors out of my hair. Of course, I was wrong.

Today I was notified by Google that a video of mine, "Why Men Shouldn't Have Children With Borderline Women," had been removed from my account and a strike issued against my channel for "spam or misleading content."

[image]

Of course, the video is in no way spam or misleading, so I appealed the decision. It took them less than 10 minutes to reply that my appeal was denied.

[image]

I have no choice at this point but to respond to Google's bullying with different, if less attractive options. First, I have uploaded the targeted video to a different video site. Vid.me.

I will begin the process of uploading all my videos there over the weekend and will put new videos on that site as well. I will continue to post my work to YouTube until Google fabricates a reason to pull my channel, which I see now as a matter of when, and not if.

In taking this new direction, I must ask the moral supporters of my work to take even more supportive action, allowing me to continue to reach out to men and boys with information and a narrative that is in their interest.

Doing so is simple and painless. First, please follow my new channel on Vid.me. I need 50 followers there before I can bypass their bandwidth limitations and upload all my videos.

The other thing is to support the videos through my Patreon page. Google/YouTube can and likely will ban me from using their platform eventually, but I will still have the ability to create and post videos to Patreon through the vid.me.

Patreon support need not be a financial burden. You can select how much you want to pledge per video and cap it wherever it suits you. If you so choose, you can pledge one dollar per video and cap it at one video per month. So, for a dollar a month you will get an email notification of every video I release and instant access to it on Patreon and the Vid.me platform.

I produce on average two videos per week, week in and week out. Each video represents an average of more than two full days work writing, editing, recording and post production. In other words, it is a full-time job all on its own. It is not something I can afford to do without support from the men whom I am trying to service.

So, we are at a crossroads here, friends. The world, as you know, is a hostile place when it comes to honestly discussing the issues faced by men and boys. I have been hacking away at it online for almost ten years now and they are still trying to silence me.

I am still wholly committed to defiance but just as it has been since the beginning, I need to count on you to help me make this happen.

Please visit the Patreon page and make your pledge today, no matter the amount. And please follow me on vid.me, where I will be working to build a new subscriber base.

Thanks to all in advance who choose to help.

Harvey Weinstein, Hollywood and hypocrisy

Paul Elam · 10 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

One of the few trivial things I detest in life is our cultural obsession on the lives of celebrities. I've never given a damn about Brangelina, about who is married to or divorcing who, or any other sordid stories about the lives of people I have heard of but don't know. As far as I am concerned, taking Hollywood gossip to heart, as though you know the people involved and have an investment in their lives, is an activity reserved for people who lack the creativity to have meaningful lives of their own.

That said, Hollywood and the media obsession that follows it, often gives us object lessons on the current state of sexual politics. Sometimes the lessons are hard. Robin Williams was a tragic example of that. So is Bill Cosby. The disgusting saga of Francis Shivers and his years long struggles with professional liar and restraining order terrorist Pauley Perrette, is yet another. I've offered commentary on all these cases in the past.

The value in these stories is that they highlight what is happening to scores of men across our culture. And unfortunately, it also shines a light on the fact that when this stuff happens outside the city limits of Tinseltown, nobody gives a damn. Frequently, not even the male victims.

Now enter Harvey Weinstein, co-founder of Mirimax Films and a major player in Hollywood movie making. I should say Harvey Weinstein, co-founder and ousted employee of Mirimax Films. Weinstein was just giving his walking papers from that organization after a string of accusations that he sexually pressured women, leveraging his textbook Hollywood power against them to coerce sexual favors.

Of course, the case against him, as it was with Cosby and so many others, is absent a few things we normally associate with sexual assaults. Like police reports and criminal charges. Like any kind of forensic evidence. Like any kind of evidence at all save the word of women who have collected money from Weinstein on the weight of their allegations over the years.

In fact, if there weren't another dimension to this story, which is now blowing up into a witch hunt on anyone refusing to throw Weinstein under the bus, I would be writing on something else.

The latest targets are Matt Damon and Russell Crowe, who are now being subjected to public flogging by the likes of homophobe Rose McGowan, and the patently insane Lena Dunham, for indirectly contributing to Weinstein's defense. The same is happening to fashion designer Donna Karan, who, according to the Daily Mail, defended Harvey Weinstein during a red-carpet interview at the CinéFashion Film Awards. She told a reporter that we "have to look at ourselves and question how women are presenting themselves and their sexuality."

You might want to read it soon, before the sisterhood comes for her with pitchforks and torches. That kind of bold honesty won't go unpunished.

Make no mistake, Weinstein appears to probably be guilty of pressuring women for sex. At least as much as you can use the term "guilty" with a straight face in an industry where the dicks sucked in exchange for opportunities to pursue the limelight can be measured by the mile.

Women in Hollywood don't just dive onto the casting couch, they pick the fabric and the color that will make them their sexy best. The same goes for men who bend knee for gay male decision makers in Hollywood but of course no one will take issue with that. The scenario of alleged male victims won't find column space in Variety. And as far as Hollywood goes, I am not sure it should. The place is a cesspool in its own league. Reporting on itself honestly would be an act of suicide.

Based on his easy payoffs to silence his accusers, and alternating rounds of guilt-ridden contrition and awkward defiance, I think Weinstein probably did do things that resulted in all this condemnation and sanctimonious gasping from the Hollywood crowd. He's all but admitted to as much. In Hollywood, though, the casting couch and the fainting couch fit are interchangeable props on the same set.

That's the ironic, flatulent elephant in Hollywood's living room, and for that matter the rest of the world. President Trump was right. When you are rich and famous, scores of women will happily let you grab them by the pussy for half a shot at some of those precious resources produced by affluent men. And some women will even get outraged if you don't. Not grabbing them by the pussy informs them they don't have that shot. It completely ruins their plans.

Like it or not, that is straight up truth. People hating the truth doesn't make it any less true. It just makes it easier to sue. And of course, suing is the next best way to grab those assets, whether they grabbed the pussy or not.

The thing that should bother all thinking people about this godawful mess of uniquely human conduct, is that it operates blindly, in complete denial of our uniquely human nature.

When I was a younger man, I often heard the term, "Men use love to get sex and women use sex to get love." I used to think it was a very insightful, even poignant observation of human behavior. And while it still holds a shred of truth, it now strikes me as incomplete and largely naïve.

The Weinstein and many other affairs point to a more accurate aphorism. Men use power to get sex. Women use sex to get power. It's got nothing to do with love.

Men and women have negotiated over this exchange for eons. Women have been hitting their knees to enrich their professional lives, be it for money, more authority, power over other employees or career advancement. It's been happening for as long as women have been in the workplace. And it's modeled exactly on how women use sex to gain power from men in private life.

Of course, for those of you who clutch pearls much faster than the average snowflake, this doesn't diminish the fact that many women also gain power in the workplace and their private lives on their own merits. I know women personally just like this, but it has nothing to do with the big picture in this argument.

Women, just as they always have, get the bulk of their advantages in life drawing on the resources of men. Men, just as they always have, use their power and resources to attract what they want from women: their bodies.

Now, women using sex to get power meets with little or no criticism in modern times. By hook or crook, they can swallow and get paid for it and it bothers exactly no one. Men usually won't complain because their main objective is sex.

But on the other side of this longstanding social contract, men don't enjoy the same social laxness. They are vulnerable when participating in the same, exact arrangement. Even years down the road the women who willingly and aggressively pursue using sex to gain power from men can suddenly and successfully paint themselves in the light of victim and cash in a second time, usually to much more painful effect.

I am sure some will say, wait a minute, it's different when women surrender sex under threat or coercion than it is when men volunteer to bestow power and assets in exchange for consensual sex. And to maintain intellectual honesty, I must agree. In those cases where real coercion and threats are employed, then there is a moral difference that cannot be ignored.

However, I also won't choose to ignore that every time a woman gets a promotion or a raise from fellating her boss, someone else, probably someone harder working and more deserving, gets left out in the cold. Often, it's other women who are less attractive, or who won't suck dick for an edge at work.

In the exchange of sex for power between men and women, moral high ground is an illusion. And in places like Hollywood pursuing that illusion turns all the phony moral outrage and histrionics into a grand comedy.

Oh my, a movie mogul had a casting couch? Who would have ever thought?

I am sure that none of the aspiring starlets angling to get their way into Harvey Weinstein's office, and onto said couch, never imagined things worked that way.

If I were to do an adequate eyeroll to all this bullshit, I'd have to do stretching exercises and a good windup first. It's that much of a bloody joke.

It's the same old story with the same old players. The easiest path to wealth and success for attractive women is through their open legs. Nobody cares. The easiest path to sexual success for men being in control of the assets and power for which many of these women are not inclined to work. When it goes sour, everyone loses their minds and wants to go postal on the man.

Cue the outrage machine and make plenty of room under the bus for all the male offenders and their enablers. Take that, Will Hunting. Who's the gladiator now, Maximus?

Roll out the pedestals and script the teary-eyed monologues for all the hunky dory female victims. Hollywood, as it has for a long time now, has some more bullshit to sell you. Unless you're red pill. Because if you are, you aren't buying.

It's time to hold the door open for the girly Boy Scouts

Paul Elam · 11 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

OK, so now we are going to allow girls to join the Boy Scouts. That's the latest word today from the 107-year-old organization, previously a boy's only club. On first blush, it just seems like another move by the Great Unseen Minister of Diversity in the Sky; a new policy of including the oppressed and downtrodden class of girls, even though they had their own organization, the Girl Scouts of America, which was founded just two years after the organization for boys.

That's not the case though, according to Michael Surbaugh, the Boy Scouts chief executive, who characterized the unprecedented move as one of convenience for families.

"We believe it is critical to evolve how our programs meet the needs of families interested in positive and lifelong experiences for their children," he said. I suspect that anyone watching him make this statement could also watch his nose get longer as he talked.

Of course, the problems driving this new policy are simple and monetary. Boy Scout membership has been taking a nosedive for over a decade. With lackluster efforts to recruit minority boys into the organization failing abysmally, there was literally only one other place to go for new blood, and that was to cut into the Girl Scouts share of the youth indoctrination market.

The Girl Scouts are already pissed off about it, accusing the Boy Scouts of what they absolutely did without question: wholesale headhunting for fresh membership by pilfering what they can from the competition.

Girl Scouts president Kathy Hanan called it a "covert campaign to recruit girls."

And it should be the perfect heist. The accomplishments of men and boys are universally more attractive than the accomplishments of women and girls. That, in large part, is because the accomplishments of men and boys are, uh, more accomplished. More important. Boys Scout leaders knew exactly what they were doing when they held out the promise of eligibility for the coveted rank of Eagle Scout to girls.

Before you get huffy, can you name the highest rank attainable by Girl Scouts? Of course, you can't. Neither can anyone else. It's actually called the Gold Award, not that anyone cares.

The National Organization for Women recognizes this reality, too. As recently as February of this year we can see them whining about how the Boy Scouts are hurting girls by not allowing them in, ignoring the fact that they already have their own organization. So, it seems that the Great Unseen Minister of Diversity in the Sky is connected to the new policy after all, even if indirectly.

I am sure NOW will soon be lauding this as progress for women, and taking credit for the change, even though it will serve to gut the membership of a respected, century old all girl's organization.

Now, I must admit to a dichotomy of reaction on this one. Part of me, the old fart who still reads newspapers made of paper and blurts out every ten minutes that the world is going to hell, sees this story and blurts out that the world is going to hell.

I mean, it's crazy, right? We have the Girl Scouts and the Boy Scouts already in place. What sense does it possibly make to pit the organizations in a war with each other, pillaging for membership that does not even qualify according to the organization's title?

And of course, part of me, that same old fart with the newspaper, laments about the feminization of our boys and about the destruction of perhaps the last remaining organized male space in existence.

All these concerns are well-founded, mind you, but the old fart railing about it is not the strongest voice in my head. There is someone else in there who's a lot louder. And amidst all the pre-scripted reactions to girls moving into Boy Scout troops and taking over the show, that voice is rising with two thunderous words.

HELL YES.

Let girls into the Boy Scouts. Let them in now, and let them in through floodgates. Let's also insist on quotas for female Scout masters. 50/50 or no charter, I say. And because Scouting is a patriarchal construct, by its very existence oppressive to girls, we will need to disassemble the organization from the ground up and rebuild it in the image of women.

There should be merit badges for feelings and other important stuff, like creating your own Tumblr account without anyone helping you.

We can all but do away with Scout rankings, because it's unfair. At the very least all scouts with a rank of Second Class, an excluding, demeaning designation, will be instantaneously promoted to First Class. Once that is done we can then promote everyone to the rank of Eagle Scout because nobody should ever feel left out.

Of course, I am just kidding. At least about ranks and merit badges. What I am not kidding about is going balls to the wall letting girls into boys scouts. It will be another giant leap for MRAs and MGTOW.

The admission of females to Boy Scouts means the wholesale admission of gynocentrism. There will be, without any doubt, special (code speak for easier) provisions made for the girls. It may start small but it eventually will take over completely. As with every other institution where women are admitted, women will be given precedence and privilege over men.

It will eventually morph into an organization where every Boy Scout oath and pledge, once reserved for God and country, gets retailored to benefit women and girls. Boys will be given new marching orders about their conduct and language, indeed about their beliefs and convictions. Sooner, rather than later, the Boy Scouts of America will become another feminist organization; a million-member strong cabal led by snowflake queens and their white knight quislings, aimed at shaping boys into what women want them to be. Obedient and easily exploited.

Now, I know some of you are freaking out. You are wondering why the hell I would want such an awful arrangement for boys. And speaking in literal terms, I don't. I do, however, believe in making lemonade out of lemons.

Rampant, political gynocentrism is here. It's in our primary and secondary education. It dominates the media and has its tendrils snaking through our governance. It has complete primacy in our culture of consumerism.

As such, that gynocentrism, expressed in increasingly insane and oppressive ways, is also the primary driver of the red pill counter-culture. In other words, you are reading this article and it is resonating with you because of that gynocentrism. You have been harmed by it, just as most men have but unlike many you have awakened to what is happening. That fact made you a part of the counter-culture reaction.

I have had many men comment over the years on my articles and videos that they wish they had these insights at a much younger age. I am more than familiar with that feeling. Enough that it should qualify me for a future Girly Boy Scout merit badge.

Since the fact remains that Boy Scouts are going to admit girls, and since any connection to reality informs us that doing this will also make Boy Scouts all about girls, we are dealing with something inevitable. The Boy Scouts of America as about to launch into a mode of operation that will start teaching boys, at a younger age than ever, of their total lack of worth compared to girls.

Many of those boys will buy the indoctrination. And truth tell, they were likely to go in that direction anyway. Most men turn out to be feminized Boy Scouts and always have.

But it will also provide, at a very young age, an environment that will open red pill understanding to the minority of boys who are capable of getting it.

I can predict with some certainty the nightmare stories that will issue from this change. Charges of sexual harassment and sexual assault against 12-year-old boys for acting like normal 12-year-old boys. Merit badges for checking your privilege, just for boys who learn to keep their mouths shut and nod approvingly at everything the girls say. Emma Watson will address legions of Boy Scouts of both sexes at Scout Jamborees, pushing #HeForShe. There will be special programs on rape culture and domestic violence, complete with signed pledges by boys only.

And there will be anonymous snitch lines for girls to call in and report mistreatment of all manner without the burden of leaving their names. The accused will face immediate consequences because #BelieveTheGirlBoyScout.

If you think any of this is outlandish, please stop and think about every time in the past two or three years that you spotted a story in the mainstream that at first you could not believe was possibly true, but it was.

I had that experience just yesterday when I read that California was making it illegal, with possible jail time, for those who use improper pronouns for transgender people.

Oh, and trust me, where women barge in and start running the show, the politicized transgender community will soon follow, bellowing outrage and demanding merit badges for hormone treatments.

The general rule these days is that you can no longer imagine any crazy scenarios in the realm of sexual politics that are too crazy to happen. Too crazy to happen has already happened a million times. Nothing I have mentioned here is out of the realm of possibilities. And the fact that the Boy Scouts initiated this insanity for fiscal reasons won't change the consequences to the boys one bit.

Our job in this is not to prevent girls from going into Boy Scouts. It is not to try to prevent gynocentric brainwashing from taking over every troop in the club. Besides, that was already pretty much the story before the Boy Scouts set sights on pink uniforms. They are just now making it official.

Our job here, gents, is to shine the mocking light of truth on the whole mess as the inevitably stupid results of the venture surface, which they most certainly will. Our job is to try to reach boys who get drummed out of the Scouts, who get persecuted by the mean girls who will without question find primacy there, and help them understand why it happened.

As I have said before a number of times. There is no war to win against gynocentrism. It is the natural if dysfunctional state of humanity and always will be. Gynocentrism will win every major battle because 99% of people are gynocentric.

That has not stopped us from achieving a minority subculture with profound benefits for the participants. We have grown powerful enough that all manner of blue pill adherents, gynotrads and feminists alike, have joined forces in fear of our message.

That's good enough for me, and I bet it will be good enough for a lot of future Boy Scouts who will make quick work of ditching the organization. They will add new and ominous meaning to the old Scout motto, "Be Prepared."

Public discussion of rape based on ignorance, bigotry and superstition

Douglas Galbi · 13 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

High-quality, nationally representative survey data indicate that rape of men is about as prevalent as rape of women. Moreover, under current understandings of rape, women rape men about as often as men rape women. At the same time, criminal justice systems are highly biased toward punishing men. That produces a stark gender inequality. On any give day around the world, about fifteen times more men than women are sitting behind bars as prisoners of authoritative criminal justice systems. When is the last time you heard any public concern about that life-destroying gender inequality?

While important, largely untold facts about rape aren't difficult to learn, contemporary public discussion of rape is mainly based on ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. A recent scholarly study declared:

> Contemporary understandings of sexual victimization have been informed by the reality that men's sexual violence toward women was ignored for centuries and remains dangerously well tolerated in many regions of the world. [1]

In reality, claims that a man committed sexual violence upon a women have been taken with deadly seriousness throughout history. Roman men, and subsequent historians, accepted Lucretia's claim of rape without questioning. Lucretia's claim of rape reportedly generated a bloody war and led to the founding of the Roman Republic. The ancient lives of saints Eugenia and Marina show that accusations that a man raped a woman were extremely damaging for the accused. Around the world and throughout history (except for recent decades), false accusations of rape have been a matter of intense concern. If men's sexual violence toward women was historical ignored, historical concern about false accusations of men's sexual violence toward women makes no sense. Belief that "men's sexual violence toward women was ignored for centuries" reflects ignorance, bigotry, and superstition among scholars studying sexual violence today.

Un missionnaire du moyen âge raconte qu'il avait trouvé le point où le ciel et la Terre se touchent...

Pressure to honor orthodox dogma produces astonishing intellectual contortions in studying rape and sexual violence. A study of female perpetration of sexual violence declared:

> While in no way seeking to minimize the very real phenomenon of male perpetration, we examine female perpetration so as to explore the gender dynamics at play and to understand sexual victimization more fully. In so doing, we argue that new attention to female sexual perpetration serves important feminist goals. [2]

In order to be well-regarded, scholarly work today must strive to serve feminist goals. In fact, the very real phenomenon of female perpetration has been much more commonly minimized than that of male perpetration. This study itself referred to "professionals & a culture of denial":

> Perhaps even more troubling than misperceptions concerning female perpetration among the general population are misperceptions held by professionals responsible for addressing the problem. Female perpetration is downplayed by those in fields such as mental health, social work, public health, and law [3]

One means of downplaying female perpetration is playing up female excuses. This study advocated research that "attends to women's past victimization issues" and urged "taking into account the troubled background many such women possess."[4] In studying men perpetrators of sexual violence, no equal concern is shown for those men's past victimization issues and the troubled background of those men. Not surprisingly, the study called for "feminist approaches" to studying female perpetration.[5]

Scholarly ignorance, bigotry, and superstition constrains understanding of sexual violence. Within the mass of thoroughly anti-men gender-bigoted scholarship relating to criminal justice, one can find a rare nugget of good reason:

> We conclude by recommending that public health and policy responses embrace a new, gender inclusive response to sexual victimization. This ought to entail, among other things, the attention of healthcare and criminal justice professionals to the reality of female perpetration, the inclusion of inmates in our national conversation about sexual victimization, and an expanded research agenda to study sexual victimization more comprehensively. [6]

Providing more funding for established scholars to pursue "an expanded research agenda to study sexual victimization more comprehensively" isn't necessary. The public response to sexual victimization should reject gender bigotry, recognize the reality of female perpetrators, and include inmates, who are vastly disproportionately men. Rejecting ignorance, bigotry, and superstition isn't a matter of doing more research under current scholarly incentives. Embracing truth and good reason requires a new commitment to enlightenment.[7]

Notes:

[1] Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) p. 303. A nearly identical claim occurs in Stemple & Meyer (2014) p. e19. For discussion of the latter, see my post on rape of men.

Although about four times more men die from violence than do women, the international elite has prioritized violence against women:

> For the last few decades, the prevailing approach to sexual violence in international human rights instruments has focused virtually exclusively on the abuse of women and girls. … There are well over one hundred uses of the term "violence against women" — defined to include sexual violence — in U.N. resolutions, treaties, general comments, and consensus documents. No human rights instruments explicitly address violence against men. … another term employed in human rights instruments dozens of times, "gender-based violence," might reasonably be thought to include both males and females. … {however, } "gender-based violence" is used only > to describe female victimization, thereby leaving no room for much-needed gender analysis of male rape.

Stemple (2009) pp. 605, 619. For related analysis, Stemple (2011).

[2] Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) p. 303. Stemple elsewhere explains that "neglecting male rape is bad for women and girls." Stemple (2009) p. 606. Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) shows further concern to be consistent with the dominant ideology:

> A focus on female perpetration might be skeptically viewed as an attempt to upend a women's rights agenda focused on male-perpetrated sexual victimization. But attention to female perpetration need not negate concern about other forms of abuse. Moreover, a close look a sexual victimization perpetrated by women is consistent with feminist imperatives to undertake intersectional analyses, to take into account power relations, and to question gender-based stereotypes, as we explain.

Id. See also id. p. 309. This article doesn't consider that it might be skeptically viewed as attempting to forestall thorough, deconstructive critique of the dominant ideology's anti-men gender bigotry.

[3] Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) p. 309. A section heading in the article is "6. Professionals & a culture of denial."

[4] Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) p. 309. The study declared, "female perpetration is frequently intertwined with women's past experience of their own victimization." Id. p. 304. It also urged "taking account of issues specific to lesbian and bisexual women," thus excluding gay and bisexual men. Id. p. 309.

[5] Stemple, Flores & Meyer (2017) p. 309.

[6] Id. p. 303. The actual conclusion inserts excuses for female perpetration. See id. p. 309 and discussion above. Popular media has treated as stunningly revelatory Stemple's reporting that women and men commit sexual violence in roughly equal proportions. What's actually extraordinary is that a legal scholar has acknowledged that truth, even while striving to avoid undermining the dominant ideology.

[7] Lack of commitment to truth and good reason makes much scholarly literature on rape and sexual violence an ugly spectacle. Scholars have almost always lacked the courage to describe honestly the problem. Consider:

> In 1975, Susan Brownmiller famously described rape as "nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear." With the might and imprecision of a sledgehammer, Brownmiller's words forced sex and gender to the center of the rape discussion. This perspective, usefully provocative in its era, reads today as an unreasonable generalization, particularly the author's accusation that all men consciously use rape to intimidate. By creating a perpetrator class of men, Brownmiller dangerously sets up men as implausible victims.

Stemple (2009) p. 634 (internal footnotes omitted), citing Brownmiller (1975) p. 15. Underscoring her equivocal appreciation for Brownmiller's work, Stemple credits Brownmiller with concern for male prisoner rape, but comments, "her claims strike me as dated {sic} and unreasonable." Id. p. 634, notes 240, 241. Brownmiller's claims are more honestly described as false, sexist, and hateful toward men. Nonetheless, Brownmiller's claims became famous and enormously influential. They have contributed to expanding the criminalization of men seeking women's love.

[image] Depiction (Flammarion engraving) imagining medieval view of a flat earth. From Flammarion (1888) p. 163. Image thanks to Wikimedia Commons. Here's a colored version.

The caption under the engraving states in English translation: "A missionary of the Middle Ages tells that he had found the point where the sky and the Earth touch." The engraving itself dates to no earlier than the late eighteenth century. Since the 5th century BGC, learned persons, including those in medieval Europe, have recognized that the earth is spherical. See note [7] and associated text in my post "earth's a square, heaven a circle."

References:

Brownmiller, Susan. 1975. Against our will: Men, women and rape. New York, NY: Simon and Schuster.

Flammarion, Camille. 1888. L'atmosphère: météorologie populaire {The Atmosphere: Popular Meteorology}. Paris: Librairie Hachette.

Stemple, Lara. 2009. "Male Rape and Human Rights." Hastings Law Journal. 60 (3): 605-646.

Stemple, Lara. 2011. "Human Rights, Sex, and Gender: Limits in Theory and Practice." Pace Law Review. 31 (3): 824-836.

Stemple, Lara, and Ilan H. Meyer. 2014. "The Sexual Victimization of Men in America: New Data Challenge Old Assumptions." American Journal of Public Health. 104 (6): e19-e26.

Stemple, Lara, Andrew Flores, and Ilan H Meyer. 2017. "Sexual victimization perpetrated by women: Federal data reveal surprising prevalence." Aggression and Violent Behavior. 34: 302-311.

Article published under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

A Father's Lament

Paul Schwennesen · 14 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A clamor is rising in America over the issue of "Men's Rights." Some scoff, considering it offensively outré to suggest that men might be the victims of structural sexism or reverse discrimination. A dawning consensus, however, acknowledges systematic injustices — particularly against fathers, and particularly in the legal realm. Documentaries like "The Red Pill," and a recent Supreme Court verdict (which struck down some aspects of maternal legal priority) add to a groundswell of recognition that this generation must right wrongs on both sides of the gender equation. At the very least, the blatantly unequal treatment of fathers under the law gives the modern rallying cry to "dismantle the patriarchy" a rather ironic twist— it is fatherhood, not male dominion, which is being systematically dismantled.

In divorce and custody arbitration, something rotten is buried within the legal code—reflexive favoritism toward mothers and insufficient attention to due process is disproportionately harming men, and this harm has devastating consequences for children and families. This problem is especially magnified amongst the working poor, where relatively "minor" financial iniquities (in the minds of courts) can have outsized effects.

I freely admit, I was one of the scoffers. I thought rumors of unequal legal treatment were overblown. Until it happened to me.

Here's my story:

A couple of years ago, my wife of fourteen years went down to the courthouse and filed for divorce—nothing noteworthy in this I'm afraid, except that it initiated a legal process that utterly wrecked me and my family. I was evicted from my home, isolated from my children, and compelled to bankroll an extraordinary legal vendetta against my natural role as a father—all without the slightest legal pretext. After two and a half years, I've come to recognize the dismaying truth that the legal deck is overwhelmingly stacked against me, and that only with a full commitment of every ounce of resolve and resourcefulness can I hope to reclaim my role as father. The desperation caused by this stunning iniquity is unhealthy for me and my children, to be sure, but the problem is even broader than that: fatherhood, especially what I call "working fatherhood," is under assault, and our culture is willfully oblivious to it.

I knew nothing of the impending divorce— it hardly bears repeating that men can be astonishingly obtuse. I only note it here to establish the considerable disadvantage faced by the "surprised" spouse in divorce filings. Our marriage was on the ropes (as many so often are), and I had readily admitted my full share of faults, and was working to turn a new leaf. The complicated calculus of divorce, however, was being altered by a background influence of court-incentives that my then-wife was anything but blind to—I was too busy working on our "recovery" homework to notice her legal preparations. It was comic in a way; she secretly filed for divorce in the midst of the marriage counselor's "radical honesty" module, meaning the fatal blow was perfectly timed. She'd done her homework, as is often the case. After the fact, I discovered she'd transferred over $40,000 in advance so that she'd have plenty of "padding" when the fireworks began. She'd pulled all the bank statements, started her own accounts, paid off her new car, made sure all the credit debt was in my name, retained an attorney—you know, the basics. Smart. I credit the strategic acumen. My only contention is that the legal system hands the "prepared one" an additional, overwhelming advantage after a divorce is filed.

Courts are quite accommodating. No questions asked, they granted her Ex Parte Temporary Orders that sent a process server to our door who notified me I had fifteen minutes to evacuate the home or the "police would take me away." He recommended I get a lawyer. Stunned, I waved away his advice in utter disbelief—I thought it was a joke. In a foggy daze, I lived in my car because I didn't think to bring any cash and was worried about spending money from our joint account. I didn't know what to do—I was a devastated wreck…words cannot convey. I say this not for sympathy, but to emphasize that the person thrown from their home is at an extraordinary emotional, physical, and financial disadvantage in the first round of a very serious legal matter that has enormous long-term implications for every member of a disintegrating family.

To this day I have no idea what my children felt when Papa didn't come home that night. Did they think I had abandoned them? Were they scared? I couldn't speak with them or give them a hug goodbye.

I can only imagine it is that much worse for families with fewer resources. All around the country, fathers are summarily ejected without notice or cause and forced to engage in a rear-guard legal action without any of the advantages of preparation or adequate defense. According to Liz Mandarano at the Huffington Post, "…men are drastically more likely to be the spouse who has an order enforced against them" which means they are dramatically more likely to be at a strategic disadvantage in a divorce. I spoke yesterday to a young black father, David, who is experiencing a very similar set of forces arrayed against him. The only difference is that for him, the relative disadvantages mean he can't see his eldest son. Ever. Men like to believe they are tough—I'm old fashioned enough to consider it a manly virtue to accept adversity with minimal complaint. General fortitude, however pretentious it may be, is no justification for unequal treatment under the law.

I was desperate to see my children, but the Temporary Orders explicitly gave my ex-spouse residential custody and allowed her to grant me "reasonable visitation." Yes…"visitation." In a prison, it denotes a basic incapacity—complete with overtones of marginalization, exclusion, and shame. My ex-spouse felt it unreasonable that I should "visit" our children any more than once every couple of weeks. Faced with sudden homelessness and childlessness, I tried as best I could—finding a new place to live, setting up new bank and utility accounts, begging for my personal belongings, all while hoping for reconsideration and working futilely toward some kind of reconciliation. I was still too shocked to fully believe what was happening. Again, though, try to imagine this burden imposed on society's less fortunate, good men like David, where adequate housing and basic provisions are proportionally harder to access.

A month in, the other shoe dropped: a worksheet at the end of the Temporary Orders, calculated by the court using input only from my estranged wife, notified me that I was required to send her a child support payment each month for $1,720. This is not a small number, and represents over a third of my income—an immense burden for someone attempting to regain their bearings after a bolt from the blue. This type of financial load regressively affects poorer parents (overwhelmingly fathers) all the more. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 86.2% of parents receiving child support are mothers, and though women are 33.5% of higher earners, they represent only 3.8% of alimony payers. Title III of the Consumer Credit Protection Act allows up to 60 percent of earnings to be garnished for child support, even if custody is split equally. The New York Times noted that, "Poor fathers are often asked to pay significantly more, as a percentage of their income, than middle- class fathers…[and] when it comes to poor fathers, state and federal laws penalize and isolate men, usually without helping mothers or children." David explained to me how, after working minimum wage 50 hours a week, he was left with $130 a month to live on.

And herein lies the core of the problem: in nearly all jurisdictions, Temporary Orders decrees are granted without due process. This invariably places a tremendous punitive weight on Respondents/Defendants who are then obliged to defend their rights from an impossibly disadvantageous position. Believe me, it is not easy to sweep the broken pieces of your life back together when you haven't the benefit of a home or resources and are suffering the anguish of having your children removed from your life. In fairness, this "Temporary Orders" advantage would have theoretically gone to me if I had been savvy enough to preemptively file for divorce. But most men, it appears, don't think that way—women file 69% of all divorces. Even if men did file in rough parity, it seems inconceivable that courts would actually kick mothers out of their homes with minutes notice, squeeze their children from their lives, and force them to pay their estranged ex-husbands thousands of dollars a month while trying to reclaim their status as "Mom."

I eventually reluctantly retained an attorney as it became increasingly clear this was a "To be a Father, or Not to be a Father" showdown. This was not an easy thing to do: my ex-spouse had locked up all the attorneys in our town, "interviewing" all of them before filing for divorce so that each would have a conflict of interest if I came seeking their counsel. This is a well-articulated trick, promoted by Internet sites like womansdivorce.com, which are dedicated to ensuring women exploit every strategic legal advantage. Again, I can hardly fault anyone for making the best of the rules, but it's disappointing that the rules are so easily exploited.

After retaining counsel from out of town, and after almost a year trying, I was able to request that the court alter its Temporary Orders. The court ordered a "temporary" modified parenting plan that now gives me 35% of parenting time. Expending considerable resources, I had managed to claw my way back to one-third of parenting time—a depressing sort of win that still leaves my children largely without a father figure.

Attorneys and men's groups I've talked with claim my situation is "above average." I cannot help but wonder: are fathers really expected to passively accept that they are one-third of a parent? What loving father would willingly concede away a major portion of their children's lives? I have no choice but to tenaciously fight for equity despite the structural disadvantages. Many working men aren't so lucky: they simply cannot withstand the overwhelming odds and run out of time, money, or heart before they can attain justice. Children suffer, fathers suffer, and frankly, mothers suffer as well—it's a legally sanctioned social tragedy.

Despair

I weathered the initial storm. After the first frightening period of watching my children fade from my life, I have managed (through extraordinary efforts facilitated by a flexible schedule) to realign myself in their lives. I no longer lie awake at night wondering if they will ever really know who their father was. Again, though, imagine that instead of a fairly comfortable academic career I was instead a lonely father who has to be on a paving crew every morning at 5 am for a 12-hour shift at minimum wage. Between being forced to find new lodgings, enduring the inestimable loss of the company of his kids, and suffering under substantially reduced means, many men simply give up. One can hardly blame them.

Men take their own lives at an astonishingly high rate: according to the Centers for Disease Control, 77.9% of suicides are committed by men, and divorced men are twice as likely as non-divorced men to kill themselves. In women, poignantly enough, no statistical difference exists between divorced and married suicide rates. Although roughly as many men die by their own hand (over 32,000) as women die of breast cancer (39,000) each year, society appears blind to the epidemic—how many marches, bumper stickers, and lapel pins have you seen calling attention to male suicide? The reasons for this are being explored, but as a study published in the Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health noted, "…societal institutions tend to ignore or minimise male problems as evident in suicide statistics." The study went on to note, "…it may well be that one of the fundamental reasons for the observed association between divorce and suicide in men is the impact of post divorce (court sanctioned) 'arrangements'." As I can personally attest, the indescribable heartache caused by the trauma of divorce, coupled with the inequity of custody law is enough to make anyone despair. If you're poor, it's that much worse—it's easy to imagine that the addition of more prosaic burdens like making rent is enough to push many men over the edge.

In my case, despite the change in parenting time, the support payments went unchanged ("pending final orders" was the explanation). My flexible schedule allowed me to be the primary caregiver to my kids, especially after school, yet the court insisted that I contribute to daycare expenses incurred because my ex-spouse was unwilling to allow me to watch the children after school. Though the mother could not be present during her parenting time, and I was willing to step in, the court found that there was no "cause" to adjust my crushing support payments. How many thousands of working men have to work even harder to stay solvent and current on their child support payments so they can pay for the privilege of not seeing their own children?

I'm a reasonably well-educated and reasonably well-off father of three adoring children. I can well imagine, however, the desperate plight of fathers with fewer resources who are driven away from their homes and families because the system reflexively rewards the first-to-file for divorce— an advantage that disproportionately privileges women. I also happen to be lucky enough to be struggling within the jurisdiction of a comparatively benign legal code—Kansas is better than most states to weather this kind of legal tornado. Despite these relative advantages, it has taken every ounce of emotional, financial, and logistical reserves I can muster to achieve any semblance of parental equity under the current configuration of the law. Forty-three states received a "C" or below rating from the National Parents Organization for legal parental equity. In state after state, there are tens of thousands of fathers who are marginalized or completely eliminated from their children's lives under hostile legal codes and crushing financial burdens. In David's case, he is fighting an impossible battle to gain custody of his daughter against a deadbeat mom who would rather play softball than be a parent—and yet he is forced to pay her child support.

Thankfully, I'm an optimist, and confident justice will prevail in my case and that I will remain a central figure in my children's lives. If I do, it will be despite, rather than because of, the current legal structure. I doubt if David will be so lucky. Moreover, my case is far from over—the extraordinary time it has taken to explain and defend my position is one of the more warped aspects of this ordeal, highlighting yet another awful injustice buried at the foot of custody law: the time it takes to achieve judgment is itself an injustice.

Justice Delayed is Justice Denied

Judges, understandably enough, don't like to make alterations to Temporary Orders before a final trial, and this points to another ugly element in the vicious cycle: an expeditious trial is not in the interests of the party that is sitting on advantageous "temporary" orders. My ex-spouse's attorneys have delayed a final trial for well over two years on technicalities that postpone my opportunity to present compelling evidence for equal parenting. Despite two separate court-ordered child custody investigations that strongly support my equal role as a parent, the status quo established by Temporary Orders is that "mom" be given Primary Residential Custody, that she raise the kids 65% of the time, and that I subsidize this state of affairs to the point of bankruptcy. This is extremely advantageous legal high ground that the petitioning side has no intention of giving up without a fight—they have sought and received five separate delays of final trial.

If that weren't enough, the lengthy delay has generated an additional set of perverse incentives: over the last two years I have been the target of two "anonymous" child abuse accusations (both found to be without substance), an attempt to exclude me from the military installation where my kids go to school (also defeated), a ludicrous "Protection From Stalking" order (denied for lack of grounds), accusations of stealing my kids' lunch money (rebuffed), and an ever-growing litany of Motions to the Court for every bump, blister and bruise my rambunctious children get while under my care. I've experienced the distinctly unpleasant mini-trauma of having the police called on me for me seeing my children off at the bus stop, and sitting handcuffed in the back of a police cruiser until the false report was realized. I'm a kind and decent man, and defending myself against these "extra" abuses places an immense emotional strain that is difficult to convey—my body says it best: I've gone gray and have become a hollowed shell of my former self.

Systematic abuses are nothing new. In fact, they are often aimed at the father who wishes to remain relevant in his children's' lives, under already enormously adverse conditions. Yet each new spurious allegation receives the tacit initial approval of the entire legal matrix. And it's not just me: between 2 and 3 million protective orders a year are issued, and studies show they are overwhelmingly frivolous or tactically abusive. If it's tough for me, it's tougher for the man on the street. As David says, "false accusers are the abusers…"

Emotional strain aside, the delay in trial also generates an ever-mounting financial challenge. My ex-wife now makes over $100,000 a year, while I make roughly half that managing my own business and teaching. The Temporary Order, though, still requires me to pay nearly $2,000 a month (equivalent to a mortgage payment on a quarter-million dollar home) directly into her bank account. I will have paid over $51,000 by the time we get to final trial, assuming no more "delays." This sum, which is probably not going to backpacks and notebooks, let alone a college savings account, is almost certainly being funneled toward legal fees. She has retained a large law firm and now has FOUR lawyers working to delay justice while I do my best with an attorney who "only" charges $175 an hour. Moreover, as an attentive dad I spend nearly $2,000 a month on top of the child support payment in order to provide my kids with the groceries, clothes, and sundries that come with modern parenting. It's a double bind: as a "Non-Residential" parent I am considered by the court as an absentee provider, but in an adversarial environment I dare not economize on anything relating to childcare—her attorneys have already indicated they believe I house the children in "substandard" conditions in my barely affordable two-bedroom apartment. As the "out" parent in this deplorable legal environment, I face an uphill battle that only gets steeper as time goes on, since I am actually bankrolling my own legal attack. This situation is that much worse if you are the working poor with limited means and limited time. David was in tears of desperation about how to get his lights turned back on while his wages are garnished to pay child support to a mother who is never around. I just can't imagine the strain he is under—I worry for him.

Like beans-and-bullets in a protracted military campaign, the finances of a custody dispute often determine the outcome more than the merits of the case. Despite being confident of the justice of my cause and the virtues of my fatherhood, these delays in justice exacerbate a financial imbalance that benefits the side generating more billable hours. In an indication of things to come, the other side has already requested award of legal fees—they might just have the manpower to pull off such a claim…

Reflections

Thank goodness for tragedies I suppose. This crisis in my life has highlighted just how important my children are to me, and has drawn us together in unexpected ways. It has also highlighted something awful in today's legal setting: families are being obliterated by a set of perhaps well-intentioned, but ultimately counterproductive incentives flowing from the courthouse. People respond to incentives, whether or not those incentives are intended by the "system." It is well-known folk wisdom, for instance, that men get the "short end" of the stick in divorce and custody suits. Women, logically concluding that they get the longer end, not surprisingly are considerably more inclined to file for divorce than men. Granted, this is not the sole reason people (again, mostly women) choose to enter the harrowing gauntlet of a divorce. But ceteris paribus, court incentives should be negligible or non-existent factors in the complicated decision to end a marriage and break up a family. Instead, existing legal incentives practically beg for the logical "fire first" strategy, a prisoner's dilemma structural setup with nasty implications. It's impossible to estimate how many families suffer as a result of this inappropriate legal incentive.

The structural discrepancy in legal treatment of the non-filing parent (most usually fathers) is in desperate need of review and rectification. While there is room for legitimate dialogue about the role of the state in the institution of marriage, it would seem logical that to the extent the state has a role to play, it ought to generally err on the side of preventing broken homes and children raised by single parents. As it stands now, in nearly every state in the union, it is the reverse. The "first-fire" advantage given to the plaintiff, coupled with default Temporary Orders giving them residential custody creates a death spiral of desperation and pain that often leads to the severing of the bond between fathers and their children. In my case, even in the best of outcomes, the more than two years spent under deeply unfair Temporary Orders will never be returned to me—the golden years of my children's lives have been distinctly tarnished by a destructive legal code. And I'm lucky: for countless working fathers, those two years would have been enough to exclude him completely—ironically probably earning him a "deadbeat dad" epithet to boot (pray for David…).

A Way Forward

State legislatures could make two simple administrative changes that would have enormous implications for children and families across the nation. First, at the very least they ought to adopt an "equal parenting" statute to govern courts in establishing Temporary Orders. Alaska and Arizona have already done so, and the Governor of Missouri just signed House Bill 1550 that does the same. We are working on one in Kansas. Second, legislatures should adopt a "Back-your-Claim" clause for divorcing parents. If one spouse wishes to unilaterally seek a divorce, they need to bear the most immediate repercussions of that decision. If the divorcing spouse knew that after signing the order s/he couldn't go home that night, had to find a hotel to stay in, had to schedule "visitations" with their kids, and had to pay the non-divorcing parent a third of their income in support payments, the perverse incentives would practically evaporate. Indeed, it would probably go some significant way toward preventing divorce, a not-altogether deplorable idea. At the very least, it would ensure (in Solomon-like simplicity) that the active party bears the burden of the change in status quo, and that all parties would be motivated to seek an amicable settlement or expeditious reckoning in court. As it stands currently, the incentives are structured in reverse—with all the predictable results.

I hope to see equity and justice prevail in my case. I pray that my kids will get their father fully (well, “halfly”) in their lives and reap the emotional, physical, and psychological advantages that come with having me back. For the children of many men, I’m afraid, this is a luxury they simply cannot expect, and that their fathers simply cannot afford. According to the US Census Bureau, only 17% of children in broken homes have the advantages of equal parenting. Working parents, especially fathers with limited means, are forced out of their homes and away from their children by a systemic inequality that treats them as lesser parents. The disturbingly common legal default is that the mother is primary, the father a distant second. Men—particularly poor men—bear this structural injustice disproportionately, while the system imposes enormous emotional and financial burdens that cut deeply into the lives of countless separating families. The time has come for society to recognize the problem and work to fix it.

Sex robots: part 1 — Elam's Law of Sexual Robotics

Paul Elam · 15 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Last month I did a talk on sex robots, a topic heating up in the media of late. It was a cursory glance at the subject, looking more at the motives of women who object to the technology than the technology itself. From the response to the video, which got more than three times my average views, with a great deal of activity in the comments, I decided to take a closer look.

And once again I won't be delving into all the minutia of the technology. After spending the last few weeks reading up on the subject and considering the information, I have come to two conclusions that sum up everything relevant to the subject at this point.

One, as it stands today the technology is not nearly at a place where the presence of sex robots will have any grand implications for relations between men and women. Sex robots are in their technological infancy. On perhaps the most important level, that of physicality, we are still talking about an innovation not that much more advanced than a fleshlight with a wig.

Replicating the feel of human skin, and therefore physical human contact, is an incredibly difficult objective. We are nowhere near the technological advancement required to produce a simple handshake that could pass for human, much less the daunting goal of approximating full, body to body contact complete with full sexual activity.

And that, after all, would seem to be the tipping point. It's not just inventing a robot that you can fuck. It's inventing a robot that fucks you. That objective, the punishing demand of the animatronics needed to enable a sex robot to approximate responsive sexual intercourse, is staggering in its difficulty.

And that will be the game changer, especially for blue pill men. As things stand most of them will balk on taking the robotic dive. If they wanted to hump a cold, unresponsive and inanimate lump of artificiality, they'd just get married.

To say these obstacles are considerable is a massive understatement. But that also serves as a fitting segue into my second observation.

All of this will eventually happen. The fact is that sex dolls, even in their most rudimentary form, have created a 30-billion-dollar world-wide market. They have captured the imagination and interest of a considerable number of men. And where men and money line up, innovation is inescapable. Where men and money line up enthusiastically, innovation is expedited.

When sex robot research and development produces a physically attractive product capable of a realistic sexual experience, that 30 billion will look like chump change compared to the market it awakens. When this will happen is anyone's guess, but happen it will. There is no stopping it.

The same is true for another major component of what sex robots are destined to become. Passably interactive.

Matt McMullen, largely regarded as the pioneer of sexual robotics, is gearing up to release Harmony, his next generation sex robot with AI. According to the promotional material, Harmony will be able to engage in small talk, tell dirty jokes and learn the user's preferences, ultimately tailoring itself into the "girl" of the user's dreams.

The reality at this point, of course, is that conversing with Harmony is like conversing with your Amazon Alexa. It's novel, mildly entertaining and quickly gets boring. However, just like the physical aspects of sex robots, it will drastically improve with time and money.

The future will bring realistic voices, massively boosted processing power and AI that can literally trick the human brain into relating to the machines as though they were the real thing. That is, if groundbreaking entrepreneurs like McMullen don't blow it.

In an interview with a Daily Mail journalist, McMullen demonstrates Harmony's lingual skills. In asking the unit questions, it usually answers back with one variation or another of being interested in pleasing its owner. Not so with all the questions though.

"Can I talk with other girls?" McMullen asks, and Harmony answers with, "Fuck no, what kind of question is that?"

I think McMullen may have watched The Matrix too many times and is perhaps concerned about sexbot owners rejecting programming that creates too perfect a world. Or maybe he thinks the robotic version of possessive jealousy might create the illusion of being wanted for some users.

Either way, I think McMullen's path ahead suffered a slight, ultimately irrelevant misstep with this one.

Sex robots will flourish, though. Make no mistake about it. They will create the largest new consumer market since the invention of the automobile, not as a replica of real women, but as a viable alternative to them. This of course, is what is fueling the fears of anti sex robot activists, sparking their rallying cries about how sex robots will worsen their imagined rape culture and how they objectify women.

I won't bother responding to that nonsense at any length, except to say that where it concerns the objectification of women, they are doing bloody well on their own. A 2003 article in The Economist claims that the women's sexual enhancement industry, including makeup, hair care, cosmetic surgery and other products rings in at a cool 160 billion dollars annually. And at that time it was growing by 7% a year, more than twice the rate of the average industrialized nation's gross domestic product. The effort of women to artificially create false projections of themselves that are suitable for objectification by men still eclipses the efforts of men to do a better job of it.

So far.

And to the core of matters, this is where we find ourselves today. In a competition between the sexes for who can create the most attractive and believable fake woman. Thus far, men have been handicapped in the contest by a lack of technology. Now that times are changing, women will get blown out of the water.

And it is not that robotics will likely ever produce a female alternative that surpasses the physical assets and the nuanced capabilities that women can provide naturally. At least in the next thousand years or so.

Not that it even matters today. It is what robots don't bring to men that will strike the decisive blow. Which is where McMullen made a mistake by giving Harmony the capacity to act like a shrill bitch. He is better off, when it comes to approximating the female tongue, to focus on matters of temperature, elasticity and agility than to program something that just reminds users of why they bought the sex robot to begin with.

Of course, nothing about any of this is so conveniently simple. Men will purchase sexbots for a variety of reasons. Some will do it because they aren't very competitive in the marketplace of sexual selection. Sexbots won't care if you're ugly, or obese, or tongue-tied with women. Smoothness or social prowess won't matter. Neither will affluence, except to the degree that some financial wherewithal will be required to own one.

It might be tempting to view this segment of the market as a replacement driven rather than alternative driven, except for the fact that sexbots, unless McMullen really blows it, won't include many of the things that real women are prone to. They won't possess the smug dismissiveness women show to men who they aren't attracted to. They won't size up their owner's cars and jobs. They won't reject their owners sexually. To that end, this corner of the market is seeking an alternative to women, not a replacement.

Other men, and I think a lot of them, will make up the more purist alternative market. This market has less issues with competing in the real world sexual market. They are successful with real women, which is why they want a robotic alternative.

Sexbots don't come with lawyers. They can't sue you. They don't nag, don't withhold sex to punish or get their way. Other than the sticker price and maintenance, they don't spend your money. They don't lie about you, steal from you, hold your children over your head or demand that you see things their way.

They don't harp about the clothes you wear, or how you spend your free time. They don't nag about your friends, or sleep with them for that matter. And importantly, they don't change personality after you have spent time with them. The kind, naughty companion you buy will remain the same, from the day it comes out of the box, until you replace it for a more advanced, sophisticated model.

In other words, it won't be human, which in this case is a good thing.

In fact, considering all the information available, our certainty of astonishing technological advances, and the equally certain appetite in men for satisfying sex without effort, hassle and danger to life and limb, it leaves me to make a scientific sounding but patently unscientific declaration.

It's Elam's Law of Sexual Robotics. And the law states that for each technological advancement in sexual robotics, there is a proportionate increase in MGTOW. The greater the advancement in sexual robotics, the greater the increase in men going their own way.

With enough time and advancement, a tectonic shift will occur in sexual politics. Women will find that they have to compete with machines, and they will quickly find that they can't. Even the fastest sprinter in the world can't outrun a Porsche.

You can see it now, even in Matt McMullen's Harmony, with her tinny, electronic voice and cold, rubbery skin. Watch the video in the Daily Mail piece. Study the female reporter's face as she reacts to Harmony talking about pleasing her owner.

Hear the all too human insecurity and concern in her tone. Note the questions she starts asking, all directed at what we should fear about these emergent technological wonders.

It's like a small blueprint of what is to come. And it is what I will address in parts 2 and 3 of this series. The impact that robotics will have on sexual politics in the future.

Hint, it's going to be ugly, in a very pretty way.

Sex Robots: Part 2 — The “good enough” threshold

Paul Elam · 16 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In this series of articles I wanted to look at a bigger picture than just the obvious sexual benefit to men that will come with sexbots that can physically pass muster. I realized quickly that the audience for that kind of discussion is small, limited mainly to the fine gents in the red pill community.

The larger population of men won’t be interested in this conversation, or likely to grasp it if they were. I did some searching for fiction works on this theme and was unsurprisingly disappointed. A search for sexbots in Amazon books brought back the sad story. The first option was “Cannibalistic Sexbots from Space,” a scant 148-page booklet that the writer had the balls to call a full trilogy.

Up next was the aptly titled, “Sexbot,” a book about a genius robotics engineer, of course a woman, who downloads her consciousness into something called Sexbot #9 just before she is murdered. Apparently, the rest of the story is about how she rides the cock carousel for information that will help her solve her own murder. I am sure it’s an ensconcing read.

Rounding out the top three was another book titled SexBot, only this one had the subtitle, “Book 1: Love Bites” The brief storyline provided played it as a tale about using sexbots to, ahem, help adolescents sort out their sexual confusion.

There were a few other options, including a few serious explorations of robotics in general. And of course, I found one story about how a man gets a sexbot replica of his handicapped wife and starts to replace her with it. The bastard!

Overall that pretty much sums it up. The only thing missing was a chop sake kung fu superspy sexbot who has sex with 20 men and beats them all up at the same time. Then again, I didn’t look at all of them.

It’s pretty sad, if predictable. At least according to Amazon sales, while this society races toward what may be the biggest game changer ever in sexual politics, we get a glorified Xena, Hot for teacher sex fantasies and the hypervigilant ideations of a bored housewife who probably knows she’s a good candidate for replacement.

That’s the kinds of conversations the blue pill world wants to have about sexual robotics. To be fair, it’s not much different than a lot of the red pill world, that sees sex robots solely in terms of their capacity to replace women and help users stay away from them. Though that at least is a survival reaction, not sexual deviance or gynocentric paranoia.

Still, I’d rather have a conversation about the interpersonal implications of what it will mean to even come close to the kind of technology we are talking about. What will it mean for men in the context of relationships with real women? How will it impact women? Oh, don’t worry, MGTOW, I am not suggesting you should care what women think. But in terms of sexual politics, I do. And I think robotics will eventually force women to think very differently than they ever have about themselves and about men.

At the core of it is men having a second-best option to women. I am not talking a gazillion years from now when we have mastered cybernetics and created sexbots that are virtually indistinguishable from the real thing — and a hundredfold more sexually appealing. Nor when we can upload consciousness into the cloud, with the help of an ingenious, daring woman STEM savant.

I am talking about when the technology reaches the point that most users will experience the sexbot as something more than masturbation. Not like a real woman, but not jerking off. Something better.

Let’s call it the good enough threshold. That’s the watershed in my book; the event horizon in reaching a new paradigm with men and women.

The good enough threshold will include communication as well as physicality. While the body and sexual attributes of the sexbot become good enough, so will the ability of the AI to simulate human interaction.

If you think that's crazy, thing again. An article in Psychology Today is titled, "A Robot May be Your Next Therapist." In it, the author assumes that like dozens of other specialized professions, psychotherapy will likely be provided by AI.

In their research on "An Executive's Guide to Machine Learning", he writes, the consulting firm McKinsey concludes machine learning will empower it to arm coaches, speakers, and writers with more than just descriptive insights and predictive measures — it will begin to play a major role in the self-improvement process itself.

When that is achieved, the good enough threshold will be forever surpassed for a considerable number of men, especially since I am betting that a therapist that can deliver a blow job will have some appeal.

It's not that men will have a sudden shift in consciousness. The change will start gradually, and interestingly it will start with men who are in relationships.

Consider this. Men typically face an onslaught of emotional and psychological challenges in relationships with women. Many men constantly face the conflicting demands to preserve their self-respect against a range of behaviors in women that threaten it. When making someone happy means surrendering to irrational demands and abusive control, self-respect is the primary casualty.

Not only does this mean that the self will suffer, it also means that failure to deliver on her mandates also carry the risk of sexual rejection. When mama ain't happy, mama doesn't put out.

Of course, all of this starts with courting and dating, where the core of the rituals revolves around a man's demonstrated willingness to make life about what she wants. Hypergamy, human gynocentrism and the reproductive drive are powerfully synergistic. It places most men constantly off-balance and at an interpersonal disadvantage with women.

In one situation after another men are faced with double standards, petulance and insanely unrealistic expectations. And outside the red pill world, most men generally feel trapped and powerless over this because the woman holds the trump cards of peace and sex. They constantly live in want for a solution, but of course the solutions are completely controlled by women.

Until we pass the good enough threshold. Once there it will start with men who, out of frustration, turn to the purchase or rental of a sexbot instead of another woman. By then they will have heard critiques online, everything from "it's a talking flesh light in a wig," to "It's so good it will make you leave your wife." The curiosity on where he will fall on the spectrum combined with an increased presence of the sexbot in the dialogue of the culture, will tip the scales until he goes with the flow.

And of course, there is no telling where he will land after he takes the leap. He may feel ridiculous and back out. He may try it and find it completely inadequate, and then feel ridiculous or he may find it good enough to register as an option in his mind.

When that happens; when some men see sexbots as a possible, passable short-term alternative to their women, the world for those men will be forever different. Because once that shift happens, the only thing for certain is that men will make use of it.

Sure enough, as they become acclimated to the use of the units, and especially as those units deliver more and more of their desired effect, the men who use them will face the litany of no-win scenarios with women with an ace in the hole; with, in fact, something that makes the scenarios winnable.

For men who initially fall into the sweet spot of good enough, the honestly heartfelt words "I don't need this shit," are soon to follow.

In that light, I can see a time when sexbots are a viable resource to assist men transitioning out of abusive relationships, which is to say nearly all of them. A robotic rebound, as it were.

The value in this is hidden, of course. The robotic rebound has utility in one specific set of circumstances. It pales in comparison to the inner awakening in a man who can no longer be controlled by a woman's sick games.

The MasterCard commercial would be a hoot.

An evening with a sex robot – $100

Buying a sex robot – 20 grand.

Walking out on an overgrown 4-year-old who is screeching at you that you don't do enough to make her happy.

Priceless.

Making that experience available to blue pill men as a wake-up call is worth the many billions of dollars in R & D it will take to get us there.

Now, I have noticed in the comments one or two guys who seemed a little rattled by this exploration of possibilities. One regular even commented that "People constantly make the mistake of extrapolating into the future," and went on point out that we don't have any way of knowing how long or even if these innovations will be possible. I am betting he is wrong about that, but I get his point.

What can I say, though? Prognostication is a uniquely human thing. And besides, it is fun. Everyone should loosen up a little and indulge in their anticipation of future possibilities.

And I am happy to do it in a way with dual purpose, a playful exploration of what may well turn into reality, and an object lesson on what men can learn to do on their own, with just a few red pills and a little bit of spine.

I will continue this talk in part 3, coming soon.

Misandry and castration culture repress alternate lifestyles for men

Douglas Galbi · 19 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In the growing movement for men's liberation, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) has been highly influential. MGTOW is an alternate lifestyle for men that emphasizes men's intrinsic human worth. MGTOW rejects men being merely tools in service to particular women and to gynocentric society in general. The backlash against MGTOW brings the dominant forces of misandry and castration culture to wage war on men. That isn't a new phenomenon. When men in medieval Europe pursued an alternate lifestyle, they too were attacked with misandry and castration culture.

Men who sought to change their lives radically in medieval Europe could join monastic orders as conversi, also known as lay brothers. The conversi made monastic vows, but they were often illiterate and lacked deep knowledge of scripture and church teaching. Monks who were ordained as priests celebrated the sacraments, sang sacred music, and pursued advanced learning. The conversi worked in the fields and around the monastic houses to sustain the mundane life of the community. Some conversi sought to reform themselves from wrongful behavior in their prior, non-monastic lives. Others sensed oppressive, unholy circumstances in the secular world. Seeking an alternative, they became conversi.

According to the twelfth-century Latin masterpiece Speculum stultorum, the donkey Burnel threatened Cistercian conversi. Burnel had taken a path across the field of a Cistercian monastery near Lyons. The Cistercian brother Fromundus urged his dogs upon Burnel. The dogs tore into Burnel. One even bit off the end of his tail. Acting in the person of a papal envoy, Burnel cursed Fromundus for all his days.

Burnel's lengthy anathema drew upon misandry and castration culture to threaten conversi. The papal envoy Burnel declared:

> Those converts {conversi}, better known as perverts, > and from their actions drawing certain names —
> if anyone catches them outside the church, > destroy their right-side eyes and feet.
> And if bells not hang around their necks, > let the penises attached to them be cut off.
>
> { Istos conversos, quos perversos magis esse > constat, ut ex factis nomina certa trahant, > ecclesiae portam quisquis conspexerit extra,
> mox oculos dextros auferat atque pedes.
> Et nisi compana collo dependeat una, > mentula tollatur quodque cohaeret ei. }

Conversi were men pursing an alternate lifestyle relative to peasants and priestly monks. The papal envoy first attacked them by stereotyping them as sexual criminals. The papal envoy then sought to confine the conversi to church as if they were priestly monks. Like associating toxicity with masculinity ("toxic masculinity"), the papal envoy required that bells be attached to these men's necks so that all would be warned of their coming. If men didn't wear this signal of their menace, they would have their penises cut off. That's how misandry and castration culture have functioned throughout history.

Men today have good reason to flee the lifestyle typically imposed on men. Be a worker drone, financially support women and children, and die for your country. Even before those roles were as devalued as they are today, what man would want only them for his life? Few men would. Misandry and castration culture, among with myths of misogyny, patriarchy, and rape culture, are necessary to keep men confined within the soul-destroying structures of gynocentric society.

Notes:

The above quote is from Speculum stultorum ll. 977-82, Latin text from Mozley & Raymo (1960) p. 53, my English translation, with some help from Regenos. Regenos translated those lines as:

> That all those converts, rather perverts as > They're known, get certain names to suit their deeds.
> Who catches sight of them outside the church
> Let him forthwith their eyes and feet destroy.
> And if a bell be hung not from their necks,
> Then let them be emasculated too.

Regenos (1959) p. 66. My translation follows the Latin more closely in vital words, e.g. penis, and is more easily readable, I hope.

In the above quote, the context of specific physical organs (eyes and feet) make clear that the proper translation for mentula is "penis." The same is true in Bernardus Silvestris's twelfth-century Cosmographia, Microcosmus 14.166.

[image] Medieval Cistercian conversi at work. Illustration from a psalter on the life of Saint Bernard of Claivaux. By Jörg Breu in 1500. Image thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Mozley, John H., and Robert R. Raymo, ed. 1960. Nigellus Wireker. Speculum stultorum. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Regenos, Graydon W, trans. 1959. Nigellus Wireker. The book of Daun Burnel the ass: Nigellus Wireker's Speculum stultorum. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Article published under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Meeting The Enemy: A feminist comes to terms with the men's rights movement

AVfM Video Source · 20 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Fermented foods for healthy moods

Aaron Mello · 25 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In this article I'll explain why fermented foods are beneficial for preventing and alleviating symptoms of depression and anxiety. I'll also explain what kinds of fermented foods you should eat, how much to eat, and how you can incorporate fermented foods into meals.

At the end, I'll include easy instructions to make your own real fermented sauerkraut. It's makes a great activity for dads and kids!

If you don't already know, I became a Nutrition Therapist focused on men's mental health after my own experience with bipolar disorder. After years of suicidal psychiatric hell, I finally recovered when I discovered there were two primary causes of my suicidal depression:

1. A junk food diet was contributing to the mood fluctuations I was experiencing, driving the soaring highs to crushing lows
2. Feminist misandry had convinced me that as a man I was a hopeless blight on the planet and the whole world would be better off if I was dead

After recovering from bipolar depression, thanks to both holistic nutrition and unlearning the misandrous bullshit that had plagued me for years, I decided to repurpose my life to helping other men who struggle with depression and anxiety. I'm especially interested in helping men of the MRM, as they (you) are warriors for a cause I feel so strongly about!

To this end, I'm excited to write blogs for AVfM about how men can support their health in general and their mental health in particular. So with that goal in mind, let's get into how and why you should incorporate fermented foods into your diet.

My last few posts have been about the role of carbohydrates, protein and healthy fats in mental health. These three posts lay the groundwork to create a healthy diet that will support a healthy mood. In this post I will expand on what we've already covered by explaining how and why to include fermented foods in the diet.

To understand why fermented foods are important, you need to first understand a little bit about how intimately connected the gut and brain are.

The gut-brain connection

In my life, and in many of my clients, a junk food diet leads to digestive problems. And because the central nervous system, or brain, is strongly connected to the nervous system in the gut, known as the enteric nervous system, gut health problems can cause mental health problems. The two nervous systems communicate constantly via the vagus nerve.

Problems with the gut can and do affect the brain profoundly. This is now well-established in research (1) (2) (3).

Two important factors in maintaining a healthy gut are:

1. Eating fermented foods regularly
2. Limiting refined carbohydrates and sugars in the diet

The Standard American Diet is the polar opposite of a gut-healthy diet. It is high in refined sugar and carbohydrates and contains little to no fermented foods, creating a perfect storm for gut problems like constipation, diarrhea, dysbiosis, and overgrowths of pathogenic yeast and bacteria.

Refined carbohydrates and sugars feed pathogenic bacteria in the gut the probiotic bacteria would ordinarily help to keep in check.And because the gut and the brain are so intimately linked, mood and other mental faculties suffer (4).

You might be wondering how fermented foods help keep the gut healthy. Before I get to that, let's learn a little about the science of fermenting food!

The fermentation process

Fermentation is a process by which naturally occuring bacteria metabolize, or "eat" the natural sugars and starches in food and produce lactic acid, extra nutrients and various strains of probiotic (friendly) bacteria. The process also preserves the food and improves shelf life.

Although the prospect of eating fermented foods seems bizarre to many people today, especially Americans, people around the world have been consuming fermented foods for thousands of years. German sauerkraut and Korean kim chi are two common and ancient types of fermented vegetables. People have also long fermented milk into yogurt, and soy into miso. In contrast, most Westerners don't eat fermented foods at all, to the detriment of their health.

In general, foods can be fermented by one of two methods:

1. A cultured food like yogurt, in which a certain strain of bacterium (lactobacillus) are introduced to a food (milk)
2. A wild ferment like sauerkraut, in which the native bacteria present on the vegetables do the fermentation

Benefits of fermented foods

Fermentation provides many health benefits, many of which relate directly to gut and brain health. These are benefits of fermentation that have been established in the research at this point.

Benefits of fermentation:

- Synthesizes nutrients not already present in the food
  - B vitamins
  - Vitamin K2
  - Isoflavones
- Improves digestion and gut health
  - Strengthens stomach acid
  - Synthesizes enzymes
  - Provides probiotic bacteria
  - Prevents pathogenic infections
- Makes foods more digestible
  - Breaks down lactose, making dairy better tolerated
  - Eliminates anti-nutrients like phytates (5)

These health benefits conferred by fermentation are all helpful for curbing and preventing symptoms of depression and anxiety. Now that we know why to eat fermented foods, let's get into which ones we should eat.

Real fermented foods

It's important to distinguish between real, raw fermented foods and foods that are pickled. Real sauerkraut is alive, perishable and must be refrigerated. The canned or jarred sauerkraut in the dry goods section of the grocery store is not real fermented sauerkraut; it is usually pickled and heated. Pickled vegetables aren't bad, but they don't have the health benefits listed above.

Happily, most health foods stores now sell raw, fermented sauerkraut in the refrigerated section. They even have it at my Costco in Denver now. Your basic sauerkraut only has two ingredients: cabbage and salt. Some varieties add other vegetables and spices to change the flavor. Look at the ingredients on the Nutrition Facts label. If it contains vinegar or anything except vegetables, salt and spices, it's probably not real sauerkraut.

If you are a DIY kind of guy, you can easily make your own sauerkraut at home. I'll include a link to instructions on how to make your own sauerkraut shortly.

Including fermented foods in the diet

Now that you know how great fermented foods are for you, how can you go about adding them to your diet? This section will answer questions like:

- What the heck do you do with sauerkraut?
- How much should you eat?
- What are the best fermented foods to eat?

Keep reading to learn the answers to all your sauerkraut questions…

What to do with sauerkraut

Admittedly, sauerkraut and other fermented foods are a bit of an acquired taste. If you like sour foods or candy, you'll probably love sauerkraut. If not, you may have to try it several times to develop a taste for it. Give it a few tries.

How to incorporate sauerkraut into your diet:

- Eat sausage and sauerkraut, the German classic
  - Look for sausage made from organic, grass-fed meat like Teton Waters Ranch brand
  - Pair with a sweet potato with plenty of butter and something green – green beans, asparagus or kale/chard/spinach
- Add a side of sauerkraut to your eggs for breakfast
  - I know it sounds weird, but it's SO GOOD
  - My personal favorite is eggs fried over-medium on a bed of sauteed veggies
- Put sauerkraut on your salad
  - If you enjoy a big, hearty salad, throw a little sauerkraut on top
  - Make it a delicious, filling salad, not some crappy bland iceberg lettuce nonsense
- Add a side of sauerkraut to just about anything
  - It goes well with a lot of meals
  - Put some on your beans and rice, or baked chicken with veggies, or whatever you're eating

How do you eat sauerkraut? Share what you like in the comments!

How much sauerkraut you should eat

If you aren't already eating fermented foods, it's best to introduce them gradually. Start with one or two tablespoons of sauerkraut per day and gradually increase. In general I don't recommend eating more than about 1/2 cup per day, even after easing into the habit. A little bit goes a long way.

The best fermented foods to eat

I've focusing on sauerkraut here because it's the mostly commonly available fermented food, and it's really easy to make. And if you're of European descent, it's probably a food your people have been eating for thousands of years or more. There are advantages to eating an ancestral diet.

If you're of Korean descent, or if you just want to expand your horizons, try kimchi. Similar to sauerkraut, it's also most commonly made from cabbage and sometimes radishes that are combined with spices like chili powder, garlic and ginger. I love kimchi also; it has a great sour-spicy taste!

Asian cultures have also long fermented soy into products like miso and tempeh. I don't recommend much soy to men, as soy contains phytoestrogens that can throw off hormone balance and interfere with healthy testosterone levels (3).

Another benefit of fermentation is that it reduces those hormone problems to some extent, so fermented soy products in limited quantities are generally well tolerated. Fermented soy is far preferable to non-fermented varieties like tofu and edamame.

In addition to fermented vegetables and legumes, another option is fermented milk (yogurt), which is often better tolerated than non-fermented dairy because of the reduced lactose content. Cheese is also fermented and hard cheeses in particular, like cheddar and Parmesan are typically better tolerated than soft cheeses.

And although I don't usually recommend eating bread or gluten-containing foods to my clients, if you're going to eat wheat-based bread, good fermented sourdough bread made from organic wheat is probably your best option.

Finally, fermented beverages are another option. The most common example is kombucha, which is fermented tea. Others include beet kvass, kefir and jun tea. Many of these are also relatively easy to make. I have been making kombucha for several years.

How to make your own sauerkraut

Now that we know the benefits of fermented foods and how to incorporate them into the diet, let's learn how to make our own sauerkraut!

Sauerkraut making supplies

Making sauerkraut may seem kind of complicated at first, but it's really simple. Pretty soon you'll be making sauerkraut without even looking at the recipe! When I make sauerkraut I don't even measure anymore; I just eyeball it.

Before I get into how to make the sauerkraut itself, you'll need a few supplies:

1. Wide mouth mason jar(s), 1/2 gallon – I get mine from Kmart
2. Airlock lid to vent off CO2
    1. You can either buy a premade one like this
    2. Or make your own if you have a drill (a fun activity for dads and kids):
        1. Plastic lids
        2. Airlocks
        3. Rubber stoppers
        4. Drill a hole for the stopper in the plastic lid, insert the stopper, then stick the airlock in the stopper
3. A food processor with a slicing blade

    1. Way easier than doing it by hand
4. Big cutting board
5. Sharp kitchen knife
6. 1 or 2 big mixing bowls

Be sure to thoroughly wash your jars and lids before starting.

How to make sauerkraut

Making sauerkraut basically involves shredding cabbage, mixing it with salt and packing it in a jar. To learn how to make your own easy, delicious sauerkraut at home, check out these instructions.

In conclusion

Sauerkraut is a powerful health food that is good for most people, and especially powerful in preventing and alleviating symptoms of depression and anxiety. Adding some fermented foods to your diet is a delicious and powerful way to look out for your own health. Whether you buy sauerkraut from the store or make it yourself, adding sauerkraut to your diet on a regular basis can make a big difference in your health.

featured

* · 27 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Birmingham City Football Club breaches contract then lies about It

Paul Elam · 4 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

International Men's Day

AVFM · 5 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

International Women's Day, International Day of the Girl Child, International Day of Zero Tolerance to Female Genital Mutilation, International Day of Women and Girls in Science, International Widows Day, International Day of Rural Women, International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women.

These are all the days pertaining to females recognised by the United Nations.

There are none for men and/or boys. In fact, the unofficially recognised International Men's Day (19th November) is celebrated by the U.N. as World Toilet Day. Apparently the contribution men and boys have made to the world are unremarkable and the following issues are unworthy of being marked and struggled against:

7 males are circumcised for every female globally.

Globally, of 72 million children out of school, 46% are boys. In the developed world, boys struggle more at school, are more likely to be excluded or drop out and less likely to go to university, boys born in 2016 are 75% less likely to go to university than girls (U.K.), they also can be expected to see less success there if they do.

They are the majority of workplace and combat deaths, homicides and suicides.

They die younger and yet far less money is spent in researching "male illnesses" as compared to "female illnesses".

Men are the majority of the homeless.

There is still, over half a century after the invention of the Pill, no hormonal contraceptives available to men wishing to avoid pregnancy.

When there is a baby, it is often up to the grace of the mother whether or not the father gets to have a meaningful input into their child's life- and if she decides against it fathers have little sway in the secretive, ideological, morally bankrupt family courts.

If a man desires not to be father, while a woman can choose to abort, have their child adopted or even abandon them; If she decides to keep the baby, he has no legal option to opt out of the responsibility.

Men experience domestic abuse at a rate similar to women and find that police are often unwilling to help them and that services for them just don't exist.

Men find prejudice in the Criminal Justice System where sentences are far greater for men than women.

Governments and global organisations like the UN have special departments (as well as events) for women and girls and yet nothing for men and boys faced with complementary challenges.

And on top of all this, men are subjected to contempt in the public square on a scale unimaginable for women. This misandry can be seen in the media, in interpersonal interactions, education and even in the law with toxic, man-hating feminist beliefs written into bills and public policy.

But, hey, as a wise man once said: "fuck 'em", fuck the U.N. because International Men's Day is going ahead and; in London, we're saying fuck you to the institutionalised hate filled supremacy movement that is the weaponised branch of gynocentrism that entrenches neglect/contempt for men, boys and their issues (aka feminism)- because the Men's Day March Committee is putting on two proudly pro-masculine, anti-feminist events this IMD in London.

We're kicking off proceedings with a March for Men that'll take us from Trafalgar Square, past the Royal Courts of Justice and onto Parliament carrying purple balloons with labels for us to write our own personal messages about men, boys and masculinity.

We're then moving on to a conference with 13 speakers, none of whom are friendly to feminism:

We have a special film being prepared by Fidelbogen, the strict anti-feminist philosopher. He will be delivering a piece on strategy for dealing with feminism.

We have Joanna Williams, author of Women vs Feminism. Jo has questioned the very need for a Men's Day (as well as a women's day) and will be talking about the need for men and women to work together, appreciate each other and give up the competition over who is most oppressed.

We have Mike "Doctor Randomercam" Stephenson, Honey Badger. He will be discussing: why men are funny, but not happy.

Mike Buchanan, leader of the Justice for Men and Boys (and the women who love them) Party, prolific author and organiser of the International Conference on Men's Issues. He will be making the case that male genital mutilation is not only abhorrent but also illegal in the U.K.

Belinda Brown, anti-feminist writer and researcher. She will be promoting the role of fathers.

Will Franken, the finest comedian in the U.K. and social critic who will be exploring masculinity.

Jordan Holbrook, M.R.A. blogger, vlogger, and researcher. He is to present his research on the human gender empathy gap.

Neil Lyndon, author of the first U.K. mainstream media article that attacked the feminist narrative and raised men's issues, as well as the book No More Sex War (to be found in this collection). He will be advocating for the role of women in securing men's rights and well being and calling for a Family Union to uphold the fundamental interests of men and women.

Adam Bulford, M.R.A. Honey Badgers contributor and founder of the Men's Rights Community Facebook group. He will explore how the feminist definition of patriarchy continues to demonise men and in doing so justifies anti-male discrimination and obscures men's problems and the harms that they suffer.

Mark Pearson, who came to the movement after being falsely accused of sexual assault, will be updating us on the status of the case he has against British Transport Police for their farcical handling of his the original case.

William Styles, who tried and failed to set up a Men's Forum at Plymouth University, will be relating his experiences.

And Steve Moxon, author of The Woman Racket and Sex Differences Explained (as well as many scientific papers) will be exploding feminist myths about inter-personal violence with the latest science.

So, there will be a mix of issues being raised as well as celebrations of masculinity and it's set to be a great day all round with plenty of food for thought- and action. You can find out more about our events at our site and buy tickets here. I hope to see you there, but if you can't make it, we will also be uploading footage from the events to our YouTube channel.

Vancouver women’s shelter sues the victim

AVfM Video Source · 6 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

MRA vs MGTOW: Explaining the MRM

Paul Elam · 9 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The men's rights movement is stupid. All MRAs are doing trying to change laws, sending men right back on the plantation. MGTOW is the only way.

Now, I have read that kind of comment, in a hundred different forms and expressions over the past several years. I have heard similar sentiments expressed on some MGTOW YouTube channels that I follow.

It leaves me in a bit of a quandary. On one hand I think red pill philosophy, especially MGTOW, is probably the greatest gift to men ever. I'm in awe of it's potential for men and boys. On the other hand I detest ignorance, even when practiced by people I otherwise admire.

So here I want to tackle the us vs. them-ism that sometimes shows itself between MRAs and MGTOW, and what I think is mostly at the root of it, which is a failure on the part of some MGTOW to understand the MRM.

Having said that, that I think the source of misunderstanding is mostly the mythology embraced by some men who identify as MGTOW, I also have to say that I don't see these guys as representative of most men who identify as going their own way. Not only that, it isn't that I am claiming perfection on behalf of MRAs.

I have been at this long enough to meet and interact with ignorant assholes on both sides of the fence. Unfortunately, plenty of them. I say this because it's true, and because I want to in advance invite anyone who claims I am attacking MGTOW to stick it where the sun don't shine. If you need to be a victim that bad, feminism is a better fit for you.

What I want to do here is explain what the MRM is and do it with the relatively new denizens of the red pillasphere in mind; those who haven't been a part of this through all the growing pains. And I want to do it against the backdrop of the false, "MRAs are working with the system" narrative.

In doing this, it's also important for me to point out that my only experience with this is through AVFM. While I think AVFM is now definitive of what we call men's rights activism, it's not the end word on the subject. The MRM is small, but not inconsequentially so.

But from the AVFM perspective, and mine personally as an MRA, it is hard to imagine how anyone could be so completely wrongheaded as to conclude that we were trying to work with the system. Or that we were trying to change laws.

First, I extend a very cordial invitation to anyone to sift through the 6,000 plus articles on A Voice for Men and find one example to support the claim that we took up any sort of political or legal advocacy. I can save you the trouble, though. You will pull up a goose egg.

What you would find, though, if you were to scour though that mountain of text, is a long history of social provocation. You will see time after time where AVFM sends the gynocentric outrage machine into overdrive, triggering the shit out of the very same people and groups you will see denounced and criticized in every MGTOW forum and video channel across the web.

There is a reason for that, which I think may have escaped some MGTOW commentators. It is to send more men directly to those forums and YouTube channels, and into red pill life.

By pissing on sacred cows and crossing lines that most good cucks would not dare of crossing, we drew outrage from the mainstream media, which was the only attention the men's movement was or is going to get.

That outrage, and all the hit pieces that came with it, wasn't backlash we were trying to limit. It was the exact result we were looking for. The gynocentric outrage machine isn't just harsh. It's high profile. High enough profile that the effect of badmouthing us so feverishly also sent people right through our front door.

MRAs and MGTOW both benefitted from that, which is to say that the men who found us benefitted from it. And the benefit wasn't with changing laws or endorsing politicians. It was in having the lights turned on when they found our material. Many men, not being able to unsee what we have shown them.

With the work that we did, we attracted a young feminist filmmaker who wanted to document our hateful ways and ended up having her world rocked. She ultimately made a movie that shoved another big fat red pill down society's throat.

Now there is red pill everywhere. And it continues to be seen as the threat to gynocentrism that it is. Even Maroon 5 is under fire now for their new album, Red Pill Blues, though I doubt Adam Levine is anything less than a confirmed gynocentrist.

Much of this happened because of AVFM's brand of activism, which had nothing to do with working with the system. Hell, we never wanted to work with the system. We just wanted to kick it in the genitals, as an equal opportunity kicker.

AVFM has had three taglines. We started with "Take the Red Pill" and now go by men's health, no apologies. In between those two, and by far for the longest time, our tagline was "Changing the Cultural Narrative."

Not changing laws. Not changing politicians. Changing the narrative. The same exact thing MGTOW commentators have been doing during the same time. And largely with the same message. Criticizing gynocentrism, supporting the marriage strike and encouraging men to take a second, much closer and more analytical look at the world they live in, and to adapt effectively based on the new information.

We have stayed so in focus on these matters that we have sometimes tested the resolve of non-gynocentric traditionalists who have been long time supporters of our work. Yeah, I am talking to you TMOTS and GOM, with great appreciation for all you have done.

Now, for the sake of full disclosure I have to admit there are a lot of legal and political changes I'd like to see. And we have already seen some of it, a prime example being the gutting of Obama's Dear Colleague Letter by the Trump Administration.

Now, Trump isn't any more red pill than Adam Levine, but he doing some things right, taking real action to correct the Title IX nightmares among them. Even the mainstream media recognizes that boisterous criticism, which ultimately culminated in Trump's actions, originated with men's rights activists. Well, they were partly right. MGTOWs were making noise at the same exact time for the same exact reasons. If you are MGTOW, you know this to be true. And don't worry, I won't accuse you of working with the system just because you played a role in the system changing.

I figured out a long time ago that cultural change precedes legal change. And that cultures change when their narrative changes, hence the time-honored tagline at A Voice for Men.

Now, I really understand the confusion. When you identify as an activist for certain rights, the modern western mind conjures up images of protests and lobbying politicians. All I can say about that is that the subtlety of social activism in the way AVFM does it isn't going to register with people, even red pill people, whose ability to interpret the world is detrimentally literal.

That is not to say that the more standard activism is not practiced. It certainly is. There is shared parenting advocates in most states now. People who are looking to reform divorce laws and who try to use traditional means to deal with things like parental alienation.

Guess what the last thing they want to be called is? You got it, MRAs. I have several groups right now that bcc their email list communications because they don't want others on the list to know I am even watching. The men's rights movement, in their minds, is like their rich, embarrassing uncle, only in this case we are the uncle that has some media reach, not money.

I don't offer these groups any assistance, and don't even know why they want me secretly in the loop. I've known for a long time that they want to use MRAs when convenient and would disown us in a nanosecond if they ever got caught talking to us. They'd sooner be shot than make a public proclamation supporting men's rights.

Still, they are very useful. Doing good work in their own way. And whenever anything they do goes public, they serve as the same gateway for some men to red pill life as does MGTOW and the MRM.

Even the few MGTOWs I have taken issue with; those so obsessed with hating anything vagina that they can't see or think straight, serve the same purpose, even if they are the same ones clutching pearls over myths about the MRM. They carry the same torch. And after all, this movement, which I now prefer to refer to as Red Pill vs MRA or MGTOW, was born of the walking wounded.

We became a movement, albeit in different forms, because the lives of men and boys are being destroyed. Personally, I think getting hung up on a label, or peddling false narratives, or seeing the route back to the plantation around every turn, is a bit foolish, or at the very least simple-minded.

But I still think it is better than life as a blue pill zombie.

These guys who somehow perform the mental gymnastics to conclude that AVFM, myself personally or the MRM generally speaking is out to get them, are an occasional annoyance. But I try my best to remember well that they too are playing a role in freeing men from the bondage of gynocentrism. They are as valuable to the red pill movement as anyone else, perhaps because of their feral ways rather than in spite of them.

To be sure, this is not an appeal for a kumbaya moment where we all just join hands and, in the words of Rodney King, just get along. It's just an effort to set the record straight and sweep some of the bullshit off my own porch.

Trump proves that anti-feminism isn't enough

Paul Elam · 10 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In the interest of fairness and intellectual honesty, I am going to have to say some unkind words about Donald Trump. At the very least about his new tax plan.

As regulars here know, I have been quick to point out when Trump has gotten things right. I lauded him for giving political correctness the swift kick in its genderless crotch it so totally deserved. I was ecstatic recently when he did away with the Deal Colleague Letter and all the sexual assault witch hunts it created. And I have barely had a chance to do my happy dance when I recently caught up with the news that he will appoint Penny Nance as his ambassador-at-large for global women's issues. Nance has been trashing feminists and the butthurt political arm of the LGBTQ community for quite some time.

And yes, I know full well that Nance is from the neosimp, cuckservative wing of modern politics. I'm not fooled for a moment into thinking she gives a rat's ass about men. Still, since Trump isn't going to nominate Karen Straughan or Alison Tieman to the position, so I'll enjoy Nance's appointment for the pure spectacle of it, anticipating she will create a feminist purgatory and fill it with fresh souls.

Again, I'm not imagining an MRA-MGTOW victory dance about any of this stuff. Trump is a gynocentrist, and of all the positives he serves up as president, red pills aren't one of them. He's a man who buys trophy wives and doesn't mind the millions it costs him when it's time to trade in on a newer model.

Which may explain the big, blue pill he slid into in his newly proposed tax plan.

As we all know, the biggest problem divorced men who pay alimony and child support have is what to do with all the stacks of cash that are cluttering up their Beverly Hills Estates. At least you'd think as much from the way the President's tax reform proposal aims at relieving them of some of those stacks.

The proposal removes the federal income tax deduction on money paid out for alimony. True, alimony itself is straight up government theft; another way to grab cash from the havers and doers and give it to the have nots and do nothings. And the tax deduction is just a way for the government to appear magnanimous while they bend you over.

But it is, after all, a tax deduction, maybe enough to help a lot of men keep food on the table. Of course, to people in Trump's circles, losing the deduction isn't even an annoyance. It's just something they pay a team of other people to bother with — without breaking stride or breaking a sweat.

If Trump's plan to reduce taxes passes, it will come with a sadistically stiff tax on every divorced, alimony paying man in America. Well, for 99+% of them, anyway. There is that small fraction of men who will litter the highways with fucks they don't give from behind the wheels of their Maseratis.

…while they're getting blow jobs.

This is how President Trump will help pay for his tax cuts. By taking money from men and giving it to women as personal income. And then tax the guy who it was taken from.

The women, of course; the one's receiving the money as income, are not taxed for it. Oh, no. We can NOT have women paying taxes on their income. That's the man's job, says our patriarchal government.

Maybe the rationale is that since women don't actually do anything to earn that money, then it would be wrong to tax it. Or perhaps it is some sort of reparations, like for the slavery women endured back in the day, just like happened to black people. I wouldn't put any of that kind of thinking past feminists or their male quislings.

There is little else to say about the specifics of this oh-so-typical raw deal for men. Gynocentrists gonna gynocentric.

You can write your congressman if you like. You might even scratch out a few words on some of that cash you got laying around. Still won't do you any good. The system is FUBAR.

The only saving grace we have is the larger lesson; the value in this story that proves some very red pill points in a very graphic way.

One, as I have jabbered about for some time, you could end feminism today and gynocentrism would still be the most oppressive force in our society. Men would still be getting screwed, MRAs and MGTOWs would still be getting trashed in the media, sexual assault allegations would still be acted on with brutal mindlessness by state functionaries, media across the spectrum would still be trashing men, boys would still be getting mutilated at birth and men across the board would still be getting raped in family courts while the society chants, "You go girl!"

All of this is so certain that "antifeminism is not enough," was once a candidate for AVFM's tagline.

Second point, every bit as important as the first. Let this be some icing on your reminder cake. Don't get married. Just whatever you do, don't get married. Marriage, or anything resembling marriage in the eyes of the law, is the most bewilderingly pin-headed move a man can make. It's a government constructed honeypot, a gynocentric flytrap aching to snap shut on your scrotum.

That's not cynicism, it's fact. Even if you escape divorce and the clutches of family court, you are as likely to end up miserable as you are happy, probably more so. And the rules say that as long as you chase that pipe dream, you will work yourself to death to keep it going.

If you need any more convincing, please marry the nearest woman so some other poor schmuck doesn't have to.

If you really want or need a woman to share a life with, I really suggest holding out for one with a moral code that prohibits her from allowing the government to place the loaded gun of marriage in her hand. You will most probably wait in vain, or you might get lucky, or you may find you have the right stuff to train a woman correctly. Whatever the case, the values driven outcome is so much better than being dragged by your cock down the suicide isle.

Finally, and visiting the first point yet again. Today's politics; the modern versions of left and right, both want to cut your balls off. If you want to, go out and dedicate your life to pushing for shared parenting. Put your soul into it, your money and your time. Then count on the fact that you only have two outcomes that are possible. One, you lose, hands down, because the left will fight you on it like Kamikaze pilots — and the right will whistle and look the other way while it happens.

Or two, you get something passed, but only after it gets watered down to nothing, or until gynocentrists figure out a way around it. Despite decades of attempts on fixing this problem, there is still no such thing as a family court in any state in the US that treats fathers in a just way, or that doesn't shake them down like Tony Soprano.

The only thing that will solve these issues is public demands, and we are light years from having that. For every red pill man out there, there is a thousand weak-kneed cucks and at least that many princesses, feminists, and purely gynocentric traditionalists.

The only thing that will create the public demand for change, is a change in the cultural narrative on a scale that does not appear possible. That, my friends, is a blessing in disguise. When you see the world for what it is, you wrest your life and your fate out of the hands of politicians. When your only refuge from the insanity is the one you create in your own mind, you can get comfortable there. You carve out your safe space, and I don't mean that in a snowflake coed sort of way. I am talking about the real safe space, walled off by personal agency, accountability and wisdom. It's the red pill man's raison d'être.

To be honest, I still like President Trump. I've known exactly what he was from the start. And I still think hands down he is the best alternative to crooked Hillary that the current culture could produce.

But whether he is better, worse or no difference, it really doesn't matter to me, politically speaking. For the most part, I've resigned myself to view politics as entertainment and little else. That's what you do when you realize that the average politician is a reflection of the average voter. And the average voter is either a zombie, a moron or both. All you can do is enjoy the ride and hope you live long enough to see it burn down.

And of course, you can be entertained while you wait for the great fire. For that, we've stumbled on to a big, fat pay streak with The Donald. The most entertaining president who ever lived, or likely who ever will.

But in spite of his election, and in some ways because of it, the gynocentric machine rolls on, ready to consume your wallet, your balls and your blood. And that leaves us with the certainty of what any thinking man must do in this crazy, crazy world.

Set your course wisely, guys. Keep your hand firmly on the rudder. Know the waters you are in, and know how to swim. Your ass is yours and yours alone. Keep it covered.

Time to throw the baby out with the bathwater

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 11 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

A friend once suggested that when it comes to marital discord couples fight more over one issue: who is going to play the child in the relationship and who is going to play the responsible parent.

His comment rings true on its face, with men historically being the ones who take on the parental role in marriage. It's witnessed in the centuries of men taking responsibility for the financial and other security concerns of wives, and also hinted at in the relationship age gap. Males marry younger females — not to control their sexuality (as we are frequently misled to believe), but because women seek an older male to place in the responsible, paternal role, to enhance the child theme they intend to play out in the relationship.

Women collectively spend billions annually to neotenize their appearance, enhancing their efforts to assume the infantilized role.

We see the same theme appear in our language when men are shamed for being 'Peter Pans' or 'man babies' along with the injunction to 'man-up' — which has no counterpart for women; they are phrases intended to jolt men out of any inclination to regress to a childlike state of dependency. Never do we hear women being chastised as immature Wendys, woman babies, nor do we ever hit them with the demand to 'woman-up.'

To be fair we may see the occasional man playing a full-time child to his female partner, and we can say that all men experience occasional moments of regression to boyhood in their relationships. However, society frowns upon men indulging too much of the child within. And such indulgence is roundly met with sexual rejection by women. The child role is reserved exclusively for women within the relationship context.

The stresses that this dynamic places on relationships and especially on men cannot be overstated; the catering to a child within an adult's body is exhausting and ultimately demeaning to both the infantilized woman and the parentified man. Standardizing childishness in one partner and hyperagency in the other prohibits any sort of relationship between adult peers. Instead, it breeds contempt and conflict.

The structure of this type of arrangement ultimately results in an assured relationship killer. Hostile dependency. It is impossible for the infantilized partner to maintain respect for, or a healthy emotional connection to, her chief enabler. And it is impossible for the chief enabler to maintain respect or a healthy emotional connection to what amounts to a financial, emotional and familial parasite. Self-respect in both parties is also a casualty of this arrangement.

Before getting more into the dynamics posed by this dysfunctional relationship, we'd like to elaborate a bit more on the concept of the adult child which is something quite different from the literal child we look after when they are small. The 'child' is also one of the fundaments of the human psyche, operating equally in biologically mature adults and in children, thus the popular qualifier of 'the inner child.'

The great 20th century psychologist Carl Jung wrote a paper on the inner child, or what he preferred to call the child archetype,[1] where he outlined its main psychological features which include 1. growth toward independence, 2. vulnerability, and 3. a state of innocence.

1. Growth toward independence (but never reached)

This aspect of the child archetype is concerned with futurity, and is captured in the phrase 'what I want to be when I grow up.' It reflects the ongoing state of becoming without ever arriving at the destination – it remains an eternal child. In this respect the child archetype differs from the archetype of development, a more heroic path that does eventually culminate in mature autonomy and self-reliance.

The ambition for perpetuated childhood, as we commonly see in modern women (and enabled by men), is the inevitable outcome of the child archetype. As men and women collude to remove the destination of adult autonomy from the life-map, they effectively kill the hero archetype of Jung's writing, the hero of true potential. And they give birth to the child of static permanency. Individuals dominated by the child archetype will always position themselves as eternally incapable of personal agency, even relying on the chief enabler to help fabricate a web of denial about their true nature.

This is reflected in the spiritual, financial, or relationship 'growth' workshops attended largely by women, who appear to pursue adult goals but who are in reality only participating in a charade. The true goal is more dependency and more childhood. These pursuits are often funded through the hard labor of the hopelessly paternalized male.

We also see this acted out in the psychodrama of the modern housewife, "taking charge" of such matters of household finances and other matters of home and hearth, without any responsibility for creating wealth, taking the risks that come with those efforts, or any other matter of real consequence. The perpetuated child chooses the colors but cannot buy the paint or climb the scaffold with brush in hand.

2. Vulnerability

Vulnerability is one of the main guises of the child, and so the woman dominated by this archetype is constantly signalling threats to herself from the surrounding environment. She is in danger of getting lost, hurt, abandoned and frightened, and just like the child of fairy tales she projects herself as lost in the woods with snarling bears and wolves, or afloat on the river Nile in a flimsy basket where she is in danger of getting lost or going under.

She is "at risk" at all times, including the risk of exposure to her chief enabler's frustrations or his wishes for her to realize adulthood.

The vulnerable, permanent child, communicates with the wider world through these threat narratives[2] which most everyone is familiar with through the archetypal damsel in distress — tied to the railway tracks, the locomotive of adult agency barreling down on her, or being held prisoner by a dragon from which she must be freed by your parental, sacrificial rescue.

3. Innocence

The child's way of defending its perpetual dependency is to project its innocence: "I don't know", "I didn't realize", "I didn't mean anything", "It just happened", "I got carried away by my feelings." Yes, her own emotions can be the villain in her threat narrative. And the understanding of a hyper-responsible male is required to save her from it. Because she claims ignorance she divests herself of all responsibility for what happens, leaving others to pick up the tab – most likely her male partner if she has one.

We see this even in women's general predisposition to gravitate toward victim politics, supporting male candidates who offer enabling paternalism from the state, and the vision of woman as perpetually in distress.

Moving on from Jung, perhaps the best conceptualization of the child archetype comes from Eric Berne, whose transactional analysis shows three possible relationship dynamics:

- Child relating to a parent
- Parent relating to a child
- An adult relating to another adult.

The first of these – child to parent – encompasses all that we've said so far about the child archetype and its exploitative style of relating with others. The second – parent to child – represents the parental relationship to a child. And the last one – adult to adult – represents a healthier mode of conducting relationships based on steering a middle path between the more extreme demands of both parent and child. This latter is where we might hope to be along with anyone we might choose for pair bonding.

The perpetual child, however, demands that the default relationship setting be parent to child, an emotionally incestuous arrangement that affords some comfort to the irresponsible child, but that does so at the expense of a healthy adult connection.

Eventually, and we think invariably, this results in the parentified male viewing the infantilized female as inept, incapable and deserving of pity over respect. It can also breed a lot of anger that goes both ways, from the frustrated, overburdened male, and the dependent, irresponsible female whose life is a constant reminder of her lack of meaning.

The parental brain

Juvenile characteristics have long been known to evoke in caretakers a neurological state known as the parental brain. Children's faces and various other child gestures provoke hormonal changes that prime parents to be more sensitive towards infant cues and needs, resulting in nurturance, caretaking and protectiveness.

Adult women who learn to mimic child features through cosmetics, and the feigning of childlike behaviors of innocence and vulnerability, evoke in their male partners a very similar parental response. Like parents of literal infants men can be seen to respond with care-taking and protection, and if women are skilled at peppering the routine with threat-narratives she gains the ability to prompt him like a philharmonic concert conductor. Such is the obedient, reflexive state of readiness to rescue that defines the lives of so many men.

Readers here are no doubt familiar with this charade being played out between men and women, one which was not lost on Esther Vilar when she gave a sardonic description of it in her 1971 book The Manipulated Man. There she writes:

> Woman's greatest ideal is a life without work or responsibility – yet who leads such a life but a child? A child with appealing eyes, a funny little body with dimples and sweet layers of baby fat and clear, taut skin – that darling minature of an adult. It is a child that woman imitates – its easy laugh, its helplessness, its need for protection. A child must be cared for; it cannot look after itself. And what species does not, by natural instinct, look after its offspring? It must – or the species will die out.
>
> With the aid of skillfully applied cosmetics, designed to preserve that precious baby look; with the aid of helpless exclamations such as 'Ooh' and 'Ah' to denote astonishment, surprise, and admiration; with inane little bursts of conversation, women have preserved this 'baby look' for as long as possible so as to make the world continue to believe in the darling, sweet little girl she once was, and she relies on the protective instinct in man to make him take care of her."[3]

Vilar hits the nail right on the head; that many women have been taught they will be protected while having every whim catered for by simply playing the child.

This, perhaps more than any other theme entertained by MRAs and MGTOW, captures the dilemma we are wrestling with under the heading of gynocentrism – that being more than sexual attraction, more than pair bonding, more than romantic love and all the other social mandates. Our biological urge to care for children is king, and it's also an Achillies' Heel for those who abide by it unconsciously.

The good news is that our vulnerability to abuse is corrected in one move: by men refusing to play parent, whether indulging or trying to correct women who are perpetual children. Instead we have to insist that our female partners woman-up right alongside us, showing reciprocal responsibility between two adults. Or be prepared to show them the door once it's apparent that the task is too much for them to take on.

Esther Vilar's comment that a woman's greatest ideal is 'a life without work or responsibility' requires someone to facilitate it, and that someone is almost always a man. But men need not play the role of parent and we do have the option to seek a relationship between adult peers: two responsible adults supporting each other in the walk through life. Such a woman may be a unicorn but unicorns do exist. And success, if you are lucky enough to get it, will be more likely tied to the women you reject than the woman you seek.

References:

[1] C.G. Jung, 'The Psychology of the Child Archetype' in The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious, Princeton University Press (1969)
[2] Alison Tieman, Threat Narrative series
[3] Esther Vilar, The Manipulated Man (1971)

The Pervert Flu: watching Hollywood burn

AVfM Video Source · 13 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

We don’t post podcasts here very often any more, but we thought you might like this one. Eds

Male suicide: a question of value

Chris Silverman · 13 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: This article is published here under a pseudonym. It was written by a mainstream journalist who encountered significant push back and refusals when he tried to have it published in more mainstream channels. Thus he turned to us here, where the facts matter more than the narrative. PE

The Seattle Times released an article earlier this year explaining that the suicide rate for teenage girls has skyrocketed: 524 died by suicide in 2015, a 200 percent increase from 2007. The article is filled with questions on the state of modern teenage life and hypotheses on the rise of teenage female suicide. Within the article, whispered at the end of a paragraph for passing context, is a far more startling statistic: 1,537 teenage boys died by suicide that same year.

Males in the U.S. die by suicide so much more than females that the rate is an astounding 3.5 to 1, or 78 percent of all suicides. That equates to once every 15 minutes. The "gender paradox in suicidal behavior" has been the case as far back as records go — and though there are variations from country to country, this disparity is also present throughout the world. Men and boys of all cultures kill themselves more than women and girls.

Yet the professional response to this is one of neutrality. The website for the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention (AFSP) has comparative graphs of suicide by state, age, and even race, yet none for gender. There is no mention of gender beyond the 3.5 statistic, and no section discussing male suicide. Even in its opening video on the front page there are no men, save a few in the background of a crowd. There is similar sparse acknowledgement from the American Association of Suicidology (AAS) and the Suicide Prevention Resource Center (SPRC). The SPRC has an underdeveloped section about men in their "populations" tab.

Speaking with experts revealed a similar attitude. In a phone interview, Dr. Yeates Conwell of the University of Rochester Medical Center was asked by the author "if I wanted to lower the disparity in the U.S., what should I do?" His response was "I don't know if I agree with that premise. The way we look at it is that there's close to 45,000 deaths by suicide every year [in the U.S.], and the objective is to reduce that mortality."

Doctor Jill Harkavy-Friedman, vice president of research at AFSP, expressed a similar attitude during a phone interview. Questions about the disparity were met with noncommittal responses: we are trying to keep all suicides down, and perhaps men should seek mental healthcare more.

This is not the medical community's usual approach to a problem that affects a subgroup so heavily. Breast cancer, for example, is a gendered problem that is admitted as such. The American Cancer Society, breastcancer.org, and webmd.com/breast-cancer are explicitly female focused. We have charity drives and pink ribbons. The NFL launched the "A Crucial Catch" program in 2009, which raises about $1.9 million annually. The awareness programs are filled with celebration, panache, and a large viewership. There is no concomitant response for male suicide.

Males do have an organization or two around the globe. There is Movember, an Australian movement about men's health issues (including suicide) whose growth to worldwide fame was driven by their public relations move of sporting a mustache every November for awareness. The Coalition Against Living Miserably, or CALM, is a British organization and the only significant one in the world whose prime directive is male suicide prevention. There is the quasi-joke site Man Therapy, which is more a slight against men than anything: they can only understand their feelings if wrapped in a package of leather boots and Clint Eastwood movies.

Why is there a reluctance to approach suicide in a gendered manner when nearly 80 percent of all suicide deaths are male? It may come from the murky explanations for the disparity itself, leaving experts wary of committing to something that may lead to further suicides if wrong.

Experts have no concrete theory, but they do have hypotheses. Males on average have a smaller social group over time, so they have less support when they need it. They see their doctors less, so are less likely to be flagged as having a physical or mental problem that could put them at risk. Males also use more guaranteed methods of suicide, such as firearms, whereas females most often choose overdosing.

The basis for these are social, in the form of gender roles that can easily paint unflattering stereotypes about men: emotionally simplistic tough-guys who bottle up their feelings until they one day use a "manly" method to inflict self-death instead of reaching for help. Toxic masculinity teaching men that they should rather die than allow themselves to be vulnerable in a therapist's office. The problem with the data available is that there is no concerted, field-wide analysis of it, which leaves both medical professionals and laypeople open to creating any number of theories and narratives.

The male disparity in the U.S. is 3.5 to 1, however females attempt suicide three times more than males; a curious reverse of the ratio. Dr. Julie Cerel, president of AAS, has said that "men notoriously don't seek help," which is true for doctor's visits, but its connotation of men being stubborn may be misleading. The reverse ratio for attempts may mean that at the moment when someone can reach for help or reach for suicide, it is females who reach for suicide far more — and who could be called the "stubborn" gender, if we feel we have to make the judgement Cerel seemed to be making. The Seattle Times article noted Professor James Mazza of the University of Washington as saying "males have higher rates of ADHD, substance abuse or anti-social behaviors that are easier to spot, so they might have a better chance of receiving help [for a depressive episode]," yet females are diagnosed with the suicide risk of depression twice as much — meaning their gendered risk factor is being caught and getting a similar "chance of receiving help."

Every theory can be easily filled with implicit blame, further encouraging the suicide prevention community from taking anything other than a neutral stance.

Among the theories available for the disparity, a discerning form comes from Dr. Silvia Canetto of Colorado State University, who applies to suicidal behavior what is called "cultural scripts theory." According to cultural scripts theory, we all have scripts written out by culture, characters to play and lines to read, that tell us what to value and why we are valuable. How cultural scripts theory fits in with the values of men and women can be shown in the one exception to the rule for the worldwide gender disparity in suicide: China.

In China females die by suicide at a rate of 3 to 1, concentrated in the rural areas. Women in rural China are the glue and workhorse of the family unit, expected to maintain care and keep the peace in households that are often multigenerational. The culture of China pressurizes this position. For example, when women are hospitalized due to mental illness, the average length of stay is more than 28 days, whereas for men it is more than 38. Dr. Su Zhonghua, vice president of Daizhuang Hospital, Jining Medical School, explained in a World Health Organization (WHO) article that "many female patients are [asked to be] discharged as soon as they show signs of recovering," because they are needed at home. Add in a cultural script that supports suicide as a way to avoid shame and the widespread access to lethal means in rural China in the form of farming pesticides, and you have a lethal recipe: women who feel perpetually overworked, undervalued, and encouraged to die by suicide if they commit some social wrongdoing.

Perhaps, then, feeling valued is a key component to the problem. Is it easier for males to feel worthless than females? Do negative mental health factors build up or stay longer in males? Canetto's research into the suicide rate of elderly men and women suggest that elderly men may be more rigid and narrow in their concept of what to value and what makes them valuable. Elderly men, for example, do not bounce back from their spouse dying or divorcing them as well as elderly women. They define their spouse as having value, and if that value vanishes, it is difficult for them to fill that void.

Harkavy-Friedman explained that "4.8 million people lost their jobs [in the recession] and they didn't all kill themselves." Even though mental illness is present in the majority of suicides, it is still the minority of people with mental illness who practice fatal and nonfatal suicidal behavior, and most people who suffer through extreme hardship do not become suicidal. Harkavy-Friedman suggested that there may be a separate "suicidal urge" that turns these risk factors dangerous. This may give further credence to the value idea within cultural scripts theory: it is not any specific factor or factors, it is these stressors reaching a mysterious tipping point that falls over into making someone feel valueless. A male rigidity in replacing values when the old ones are gone may be a component in the larger mysterious tipping point in males.

Whatever the reasons are for the gender disparity, there are only two areas to look at: nature and nurture. Research tends to focus on nurture. There is a body of research investigating biological causes, though it is somewhat underdeveloped. Conwell explained "I know people who have proposed to study the role of testosterone, for example, and its effects on suicide. I don't know that that's panned out. There is a body of neurobiological literature which says that altered neurotransmitter function, in particular serotonin, is a predisposition to impulsive and aggressive behavior. There may be gender-related differences in how that abnormality or imbalance in chemical messengers plays out in men."

The long shadows of our bigoted past still haunt us in the present, threatening to birth new movements based on inaccurate interpretations of research. Cultural fears aside, however, is this an avenue worth pursuing?

Transgender people are much more likely to die by suicide if their chosen gender identity is shunned rather than accepted. The prevailing expert opinion is that transgender people are born that way, meaning there is a strong biological component. It would only do damage to suggest to transgender people that they can lower their suicide rate by going against biology and not reassigning their gender. If expert opinion is that transgender people's brains differ in certain ways, do the brains of heteronormative men and women differ?

The answer is that they do. The gender disparity may be caused in part by biological drivers, compounded by cultural expectations that create additional pressures that are gender specific. Going back to Canetto's research on the elderly: if, for example, males are biologically less flexible regarding value, the addition of the cultural expectation of the independent man who can hold his own only makes a difficult problem more complex and entangled. How biology and culture interact can be a crucial area of inquiry. It is important to note here that while research shows male and female brains differ, what that means is not understood enough to say anything definitive — if it means anything at all.

Cultural scripts theory still leaves out the value of value: whether what we currently tell people to value or not to value is a good idea or not, whether our cultural scripts are valuable or not. This must be answered before taking preventative steps, because we do not want to attempt to lower the gender disparity by telling males to stop performing a cultural script that we would be better off having (e.g., if you are pro-military and believe encouraging men to go to war and possibly coming back with the suicide risk factor of PTSD is worth the risk). The same issue is present in females who attempt suicide three times as much as men. Every cultural script has pros and cons, and it is a dangerous task discerning which outweighs the other.

The issue with addressing the gender disparity, as we are starting to see, is not necessarily that there is a lack of research; it is that to reduce male suicide, experts have to step outside of statistics and move into moral philosophy. Experts would have the job of taking the pen from biology and society and rewriting our cultural scripts — which if written wrong will literally kill people. And as we have seen with the enormous difficulties the "right to die" movement has faced in amicably ending the lives of those with terminal illness, presenting suicide and its risk factors in any way except blanket condemnation is met with swift resistance.

So experts abstain from addressing that side of the argument, instead providing the public with a list of risk factors floating in the medical aether: difficult access to mental health care, having a mental illness, early trauma, head injury, being overly stressed, access to lethal means (e.g., guns), and having a close relative that has died by suicide. The primary protective factors are social support and access to mental health care. They produce these lists and wait for other forces to write the novel of society.

The mental health community vehemently cares about suicide in general, and many have devoted their entire lives to saving both genders, but to highlight the higher suicide rate of males is to be viewed as off-message.

There is a clear gendered problem to suicide, thousands of men disproportionately killing themselves, and yet the suicide prevention community suggests “reducing the [total] mortality” and forwarding joke sites that belittle men. The AAS has a “suicide myths” section saying “Myth: only white males die by suicide… Fact: while some demographic factors contribute to a higher risk for suicide, it is important to remember that suicide does not discriminate.” Seventy-eight percent of all suicides complicates that statement.

Reading this article took about 15 minutes. And so another man goes, from being to nothingness.

If you or someone you know needs help, go to suicidepreventionlifeline.org or call 1-800-273-8255. For help outside of the U.S., find your country here.

My #MeToo confession

August Løvenskiolds · 16 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The #MeToo hashtag has exploded rape hysteria from the cesspool of academia into the entertainment and general populations. A bevy of fulsome feminist men, liberal Hollywood actors like Kevin Spacey, scientists like Neil DeGrasse Tyson, and even President George H.W. Bush have found themselves choking on the bitter effluvia of overwrought harpies for alleged evil doings of decades past.

And I fear the storm is headed my way.

Accordingly, it is time for "me too" to come clean about my own sordid past. The story is not pretty but I take full responsibility for what happened. What follows is my recollection of events as they took place 31 years ago in a small Texas college town..

We were standing and facing each other. Ginny raised her right hand as if to strike me. I grabbed it with my left and with my right I pulled her hips toward me. I could feel her too short ovulation skirt ruffle against my pant legs. Her arm was forced to my shoulder as our eyes locked and I took three steps into her. She backed away but otherwise did not struggle. A sudden side step to the right with a quarter turn and we were at it.
It takes two to tango, they say, and that is how it goes when you are in a ballroom dance class.

[image]

Some context will help show the full extent of my crime. A project manager, "Gail Ann", at my employer – a tech company – taught a ballroom dance class that met on Thursday evenings over an eight week course from mid September to November in 1986. The class was oversubscribed by two people, both women. Ballroom dancing gender roles of that era were very specific, meaning the two extra women needed male partners to take part in the class.

Gail Ann knew from my job interview that I was a lifelong student of dance, so she asked me if I could partner with one of the extra women. At the time I was single; my girlfriend had died in an accident a few months earlier and I was still mourning her passing. I agreed to Gail Ann's request, thinking I would be paired with some older land whale but at least I would look like a team player to my boss, and it would get me out of the house in a town where there was little else to do culturally.

My partner, Ginny, was more than a pleasant surprise – early 20's, girl-next-door pretty, and grateful that I was filling in as her partner. How was this charming girl possibly single? It turns out, she wasn't – she was married but her husband was working overseas in a country where women led highly controlled lives. Ginny was lonely and looking for a diversion. Me.

The chemistry between us was electric and obvious to everyone – Gail Ann, who had set all this up, wondered out loud and on more than one occasion if we were "an item", the lingo of that era for "hooking up" or just "shipped". Other class members expressed the same thought and even invited us out as a couple to other activities.

But we were not having an affair – Ginny was married and I was mourning. My denials just stoked outside interest in us. It did not help matters that Ginny never flaked on a class and wore increasingly daring outfits as the weeks went by. She seemed to find the attention flattering after her time as a lonely wife of an absent husband. I found all this mildly annoying but Ginny was good company and a fair dancer; I knew the dance class course was just 8 weeks and out.

And so it was – Ginny and I never met outside of class and once the class concluded I never saw Ginny again. So what was the nature of my crime?

A sex-positive feminist of that era might well argue that by failing to seek a sexual relationship with the obviously willing Ginny I was displaying misogyny – leading her on cruelly with no intention of servicing a lonely, empowered woman. Every feminist I knew back then was having an affair – and now they are accusing the men of that era with sex crimes.

Of course, had I made even the gentlest of sexual overtures, or had I just let things escalate naturally, a feminist of the current era might well castigate me for “toxic masculinity” as a “sexual predator”.

A blue-pilled man or a pickup artist might shame me for wasting an obvious sexual opportunity.

A fat-positive feminist would certainly rip me for appreciating Ginny’s trim body as well as my helping Ginny perform calorie-burning dance routines. A gender-queer feminist would scream hopelessly at the sky over ballroom dance having clear gender roles.

An intersectional feminist would slam me for dancing with a white woman.

Lists of assorted crimes pushed by feminists can be quite unintentionally hilarious as well as ironic, especially given women’s traditional reluctance to make the first sexual move, a responsibility, like all responsibilities, happily and passive-aggressively ceded by women to men.

But I care about none of that – none of those social justice apostasies was my #MeToo felony.

My crime is that I left myself open to being accused of a crime. By socializing with a woman in a dance class and frustrating Ginny’s sexual presenting, I left myself open to whatever trendy and wild accusation she might scheme up three decades later.

THAT was stupid of me. I should have just left her to her own vibrating devices.

Ginny is perhaps a grandmother now, and I hope she has forgotten me for a happy life of diapers and junior soccer leagues. I hope she never remembers how I failed to validate her as a sexually attractive woman in her youth, especially now that the bloom is off the rose.

Avoid the trap, guys. Let women fester in the bitter prison of their own creation. The dance is not worth the pittance to the piper any more.

Go monk.

International Men's Day events not run by feminists

Robert Brockway · 17 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

International Men's Day (IMD) is nearly upon us again. Feminist groups are trying to appropriate IMD to talk about how men and boys should change and be better. We'll I've got a message for the feminists. Men and boys are just fine as they are. What needs to change is how society treats men and boys. Paul Elam and Tom Golden had a discussion about a feminist attempt to co-opt IMD in Australia. The audio can be found on Paul's channel here.

In order to counter these efforts we are offering a list of IMD events being run by MRAs and/or friends of our movement.

If we become aware of any additional events we will update this article live.

Australia

- Sydney

A planned Brisbane event has been cancelled. We are reliably informed this event will be on for 2018.

India

- Jalandhar
- Kolkata Press Club
- Kolkata
- Pune
- Mumbai
- Chandigarh

Some additional Indian events have not been publicly announced but we're seeing if we can get permission to publish additional information.

United Kingdom

- London Street March
- London Conference

An open letter to the Chair, Board of Directors, White Ribbon Australia.

Robert Brockway · 24 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Following is a reproduction of an open letter sent to Nicholas Cowdery, Chair, Board of Directors, White Ribbon Australia by the President of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA) two days ago. It's fitting that we're able to publish this letter on AVfM today, White Ribbon Day.

AMRA has made it clear that from this point on they will be directly contacting organisations and individuals pushing the gendered feminist narrative using open letters and asking them to justify their claims and actions. –Ed

---

Robert Brockway
President of Australian
Men's Rights Association Inc.
Email: [Redacted]

Nicholas Cowdery AM QC
Chair, Board of Directors
White Ribbon Australia
Email: [Redacted]
Mr Cowdery,

White Ribbon Australia bills itself as "preventing men's violence against women." Within this context much of the activity of White Ribbon Australia is focused on domestic violence (DV) and intimate partner violence (IPV). Taking this approach, while ignoring the larger picture of DV and IPV, disadvantages not just men who are victims of DV/IPV but women who are victims of DV/IPV as well.

Reciprocal IPV involves intimate partner violence in which each person in the relationship is both a perpetrator and victim of IPV. The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge (PASK) Project, the largest meta-analysis of DV/IPV research ever undertaken, shows that more than half of all IPV is reciprocal.[1]

The Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study found high rates of reciprocal IPV among study participants. The document "Findings About Partner Violence From the Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study" released by the US National Institute of Justice found:

> When the data were analyzed, victimized women were 10 times more likely to be perpetrators than other women and male perpetrators also were 19 times more likely to be victims than other men."[2]

The National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health also found that about half of all IPV is reciprocal IPV. The study examined differences in injury rates between reciprocal and non-reciprocal IPV and found that injury rates are higher in reciprocal IPV than non-reciprocal IPV.[3]

One of the key indicators of whether a woman will be a victim of IPV is whether she is a perpetrator of IPV.[3] It follows then that one important way that a woman can avoid being a victim of IPV is to not be a perpetrator of IPV. Research by Capaldi has found that this holds true.[4]

Models that ignore reciprocal IPV can inhibit violent women from receiving the support they need to stop their violence.[5]

White Ribbon Australia completely ignores reciprocal IPV as it advances a gendered narrative. By ignoring the prevalence of reciprocal IPV White Ribbon Australia is preventing effective interventions as its approach discounts the need to intervene with violent women. This will contribute to the continuation of reciprocal IPV and actually make it more likely that the women involved will be injured. By ignoring reciprocal IPV White Ribbon Australia is contributing to violence against women.

The evidence overwhelmingly shows that the approach taken by White Ribbon Australia is fundamentally flawed. I encourage White Ribbon Australia to respond, explaining whether the organisation intends to address the shortcomings in its approach to IPV and if so, how.

Please note that this is an open letter and will be published in various locations online. In the interests of transparency we strongly encourage White Ribbon Australia to publish a response. From time to time we will report to our readers as to whether a private response has been received or a public response published.

Robert Brockway
President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc.

References:

[1] PASK "Partner Abuse State of Knowledge" project, the largest meta-analysis of DV/IPV research ever undertaken. http://www.domesticviolenceresearch.org

[2] "Findings About Partner Violence From the Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study" http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/170018.pdf

[3] "Differences in Frequency of Violence and Reported Injury Between Relationships With Reciprocal and Nonreciprocal Intimate Partner Violence" https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC1854883/

[4] "Researcher Says Women's Initiation of Domestic Violence Predicts Risk to Women", discussing the work of Dr Deborah Capaldi. http://www.huffingtonpost.com/glenn-sacks/researcher-says-womens-in_b_222746.html

[5] "Domestic violence is most commonly reciprocal" http://pb.rcpsych.org/content/35/1/33.1

The Alienating Parent

Dr. Travis Gee · 26 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Some of the people reading this article will have;

a) lost access (possibly completely) to your children due to "hostile aggressive parenting" by your ex-partner, or

b) Someone has sent you this link because you are working hard to destroy your ex-partner's relationship with your child.

Either way, please set aside your prejudices and self-confidence for five minutes, and consider the following.

What is HAP? Basically, it is parenting a child in a way that undermines the child's relationship with the other parent. It is often done by a parent who describes themselves as 'protective.' "Protective" is a concept that has a lot of grey areas.

It is clearly protective when one parent's drug addictions, alcoholism and general propensity for violence is harming the children, and the 'protective parent' flees, doing everything in their power to protect the child from harm.

It is less clearly 'protective' when one parent is unhappy with the relationship with the other, and starts magnifying every fault of the other parent, to the point of relationship breakdown. The other parent is not a threat like in the first example, but mountains are made of molehills and this is expressed to the child.

"Daddy yells a lot" or "Mummy used to smack you a lot, remember?" are given as a reasons for relationship breakdown, in a tide of blamestorming. Involving the child in this is the beginning of HAP. Once it has begun, it becomes a spiral where is hard to pull back and concede that one might have been unreasonable in the first place.

There is a scale now for quantifying 'hostile aggressive parenting' (HAP). Over 500 points is a 'high risk' to children's well-being. I have seen one score over 3000. This is a modern tragedy.

For example, once the child has been told that the 'targeted parent' is a liar, the parent engaging in HAP becomes the child's only source of 'truth.' However, this 'truth' is mere propaganda, and the child's ability to distinguish truth from falsity is undermined along with their relationship with the targeted parent. If you are a targeted parent this is as plain as the nose on your face. If you are doing the targeting, you may be living in a world of denial about the harm you are doing to the child.

This harm is not limited to distinguishing falsehoods. It is is easy to create a state of anxiety in the child if, while he or she is in the care of the other parent, police welfare checks are called in, especially after bedtime. Children being woken by police "making sure they are ok" creates a sense that somehow they are in danger at the targeted parent's house. Constant monitoring of calls with the other parent on speakerphone, and visibly recording it "to protect them" exacerbates this effect and puts them off wanting to talk. Eventually, "they don't want to talk to you" becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy."

The terms and conditions of a domestic violence order also affect the children. If the targeted parent is banned entirely from seeing them, it is easy to tell them that the other parent doesn't love them anymore, because the other parent cannot provide living examples of love for them to experience. So instead they experience rejection and heartbreak, all of which solidifies over time into hatred and a pathological alliance with the hostile-aggressive parent. HAP, in the little echo-chamber of someone calling themselves, incorrectly, a "protective parent" produces a layer of denial that prevents that parent from seeing the effects on the children. Indeed, it is yet another thing to blame on the targeted parent.

Later, letters, if written, are "Dear Harry" instead of "Dear Dad." The new step-parent is "Dad," and are not to express love but express hatred. Moves can be made to erase the other parent by changing a surname. The effect on the children's sense of personal identity and their place in the other half of the family tree matter less than winning in court.

Constant litigation can erode the other parent's resources to the point where they cannot fight anymore and simply vanish from the children's lives, many to suicide. Constantly breaching orders by refusing access, compelling the targeted parent to file contraventions, is a simple passive-aggressive tool for this. Then, not only are financial resources the children could have benefitted from destroyed and handed to lawyers, but the valuable input the other parent could have made to their lives is gone forever.

From this it is easy to create a scenario used readily in court, where a family report writer who does not acknowledge this dynamic takes at face value the children's stated fear of the target, with no consideration of the 'brainwashing' that has happened along the way.

If you think abstractly about the kind of actions described above, and the harm they produce for children, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that there is something seriously wrong with a person who would do that. And yet, the layers of denial that such people place over their actions, describing themselves as 'protective' against a parent who was a great parent prior to separation, and was only demonized afterwards, is hard to see through from the outside. The myth that domestic violence is a one-way street reinforces mothers who do this to fathers, because they are presumed guilty, and so social support is readily available even when DV claims have been obviously faked, as I have seen in some cases.

Behind the mask is what is known about memory. It is reconstructive. If we picture something that might have happened, and are biased towards interpreting it badly, it gets worse every time we bring it to mind, and it still feels like a memory. Even when it is not. It is a highly elaborated reconstruction. This is how "he pushed me out of the way when I wouldn't let him pick up the child," becomes "he slammed me into a door for no reason." It is an insidious process, but well-understood in the scientific literature. Things that never happened can be "remembered," and this is especially true for children. The famous "Lost In A Mall" research by Elizabeth Loftus is a classic illustration.

So if you've managed to make mountains out of molehills, or indeed, anthills or even a flat beach, the children will remember it the way you have put it in your head. And they will elaborate on it. Siblings may, in the quiet of their room, swap stories and start to "remember" things that the other one reported, simply because they can visualize it after a few tries. Once it can be visualized, "it must have been real." This fits with the myth that "children don't lie about such things."

I have seen adults who believe they grew up "remembering" awful things daddy did to them in the cradle. Except it's false. "Infantile amnesia" prevents it from being true. It is a pseudomemory from something suggested many years later as a so-called "repressed memory." And isn't creating a traumatic memory, that is inherently upsetting when recalled, not sort of equivalent to actually doing to the person what they have become convinced happened to them?

There is enough trauma in separation for the children that are involved without using tactical psychological child abuse as part of your campaign strategy. If you make it adversarial, your ex has no choice but to fight back on behalf of the children. That the court systems are only starting to open their eyes to this as a tactic, rather than a reflection of a reality, does not bode well for your children.

If you are using hostile-aggressive parenting, please see a psychologist about your anger issues, and any personality disorders they may want to investigate. If you and your children are victims of it, please ensure that your lawyer follows through on making sure that any childrens' lawyers and report writers are well-versed in it, and have access to your evidence that HAP is happening.

If you children's lawyer refuses to provide your evidence of HAP to the report writer, make absolutely certain that you mention that evidence in your interview, and inform them that their professional ethical responsibility is to make inquiries into it, as they are more than reasonable to pursue.

And if the report goes in without mention of your evidence of HAP, talk to your lawyer to make sure that this deficiency is noted, and leave to obtain a second opinion is obtained. If this motion is denied, get a second opinion anyway, but one written in a way that can provide a critique of the failings of the report in such a way that your solicitor can discredit it with pointed questions.

If you know someone who is suffering the court-enforced loss of children, while that person is statistically very likely to be male, the following page would apply equally to women, as far as things to avoid saying when supporting them:

http://www.dadsindistress.asn.au/news/latest-news-articles/seven-things-not-to-say-to-an-alienated-father

Lastly, for the alienating parent, there is the matter of the Internet and ready access to materials such as the present page. These pages are growing in number. Support groups for alienated children are scarce now, but are starting to be out there:

https://www.place2be.org.uk/our-story.aspx

This will only grow as recognition of this problem increases. They will find out the truth. They will not appreciate what you have done to them. I have worked with children in this situation already, who left to live with the other parent, only to discover that everything that had been told was a lie. Including the bit about the other parent being the liar. Some won't find out until they are older, if the other parent survives, but the research on them is out there.

Parent without the hostility and aggression. Love is not a zero-sum game. The more love the children experience, the more they will have to go around. HAP stifles this growth, and they learn – from you – that love is like money, more for me means less for you. That's not how it works. If you think it is, please find a therapist.

*The above article was originally published at www.drtravisgee.com

The sex robots are here and they are all you will ever need

Jon Joy · 1 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

There will always be naysayers. Blue-pill thinkers insist that men[1] can only find satisfaction through a living, breathing, flesh-and-blood woman. Meanwhile, science fiction prophets have painted a future full of robotic dream girls, perfectly indistinguishable from their human templates. Here on Earth, demand is soaring: companies are pouring R&D dollars into the problem; artificial intelligence is improving daily; and robot brothels are opening to meet a swell of demand from curious men.

Some men look at the current models and see the glass as half-empty (not life-like at all), while others see it as half-full (all of the holes work). Both of these responses are fair, but there is one category of man who has become lost. He is enthralled by the idea of these robots. He sees them as a game-changer, and the solution to his problems. He tells himself that he is almost ready to quit women. All he needs first is an electronic one.

The cyber-dolls we see in fiction are a metaphor for men gaining the power to quench their thirst without women; for being freed from the deprivation that biology has imposed on us, and that stands as a gauntlet that each man individually struggles with throughout his life. In that metaphorical sense, the robots are already here. A man can already have a perfectly happy and fulfilling sex life without ever coming into contact with a woman. The fact that so many self-identified red-pill men have become lost in the metaphor demonstrates how subtly blue-pill ideas can disguise themselves.

Women have no such fixations on us. Their sex toys are not full male forms, but simple, utilitarian tools, designed to hit the right nerve endings, which they do with super-human prowess. The story of a man going head-to-head (so to speak) with a Hitachi Magic Wand would end like John Henry's encounter with the steam engine.

Henry Ford is famously quoted, "If I had asked people what they wanted, they would have said faster horses." An even better analogy is the history of inventing the airplane. Designers struggled without success to create, in effect, mechanical birds. The breakthrough did not come until the Wright brothers set aside imitating nature, and used every advantage available to mechanical objects. Not propulsion by flapping wings, but by a propeller, a technology that is impossible for a living thing.

Every man's primary sex partner, throughout life, is himself. This is true whether the man has a fifty-year marriage or is a life-long celibate. For decades, sex educators have encouraged women to take ownership of their bodies, explore them, and figure out how they work. Men have not received this message, presumably on the assumption that naughty boys cannot keep their hands off themselves, anyway. Sex robots are not a pinnacle that, once reached, will solve everything. They are merely one peak within a mountain range of techniques, toys, and activities for personal satisfaction. Just like no bird can fly as high or as fast as a Boeing 747, these options present men with variety, feeling, and sensations that women cannot provide, all to be indulged in selfishly and at will. Hoping for life-like sex robots should not distract from what is available today, including pornography, erotica, toys, internet chats, and much more.

So why is that seemingly red-pilled men fixate on the dream of artificial women to soothe their cravings, while leaving unmentioned the banquet table of options already spread out before them? Gynocentrism is a factor, of course. By fixing our gaze on the female form, men avoid ever having to overcome our natural but immature disgust and fear of our own bodies and sexuality. Homophobia, which is perhaps gynocentrism's greatest invention, plays a role too. God forbid that a man would allow others to understand his sexual energies as directed at anything other than a hot chick, even in this case a plastic one.

For men unable or unwilling to clear this mental hurdle, the fight was lost before it began. Such men must realize: you are attached to women in a way that women are not attached to you, and you will have to pay the price. If the female form is your idol, sooner or later you will worship. And if a billion men, all stuck in the same trap, cannot even talk about it without centering the female form because we are too squicked out by male bodies and sexuality and are afraid of sounding gay, then we are in no position to complain about a ladies-first world.

Nobody should be ashamed to own a sex robot or any other toy, but it is misguided to see robots as the single answer, rather than just one piece of the puzzle. Men with robot fixations are over women like Noman Bates is over his mother. In a commercial for doll vendor, “The-Doll-House,” robotic spokesdoll Celestina cleverly challenges the idea of dolls as creepy and unappealing by asking the plaintive, pouty question, “Do you think I look creepy? Don’t you think I look real?”[2] It is genuinely funny, but the idea of designing robotic women to be passive aggressive also recalls the scene from Psycho when Norman receives an imagined dressing down from his mother’s desiccated skeleton.[3]

One major lesson of the red pill is how society binds men through shame. The manosphere helps individuals fight back by naming shaming tactics for what they are and standing up against them. Our societal narrative for sexual shame says that that it comes only from religion, or conservative upbringings. This creates a blind spot that prevents many of us from recognizing it within ourselves. The safe, comfortable path is to leave the shame alone, to deny its very existence, to tell ourselves that we feel no shame, but that we are just healthy, “normal” men, and all we need is a woman—or, if that has been ruled out, a robot. The red pill helps men rise beyond shame, and represents the only path available in today’s climate for men to live in fully actualized self-acceptance.

The options available to men today for self-stimulation dwarf what they were at any time before in human history, and they are increasing with each passing day. Metaphorically, the sex robots are already here. Nobody should waste a moment waiting for the rubber-and-silicone ones to catch up.

[1] This article addresses the experiences of most straight men, and is directed specifically to the MGTOW-minded. For brevity, the existence of other men is ignored.

[2] At the end of https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=i4WwoNWotMw

[3] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dfXhEqADfd8

Husband's sexual obligation to wife is matter of life & death

Douglas Galbi · 2 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[image]A wife having sex with her husband when she doesn't feel like doing it is now regarded as her husband raping her. In the more enlightened Middle Ages, the situation was much different. Christian spouses had an obligation to grant each other's requests for sex, even if one didn't feel like doing it.[1] The Christian marital sexual obligation was know as the marital debt. But this marital sexual obligation wasn't merely understand in contractual-commercial terms. A medieval husband's sexual obligation to his wife included action saving her life and preserving her mental health.

In medieval Italy, a young, newly married woman was gravely ill. She lay on her back, her eyes closed, scarcely breathing, and looking like a corpse. Everyone thought that she would soon die. The young, newly married husband despaired greatly of her mortal illness. Showing manly initiative, he rose into action:

> The husband was lamenting that his wife, with whom he had been sexually intimate so few times and whom he loved greatly, was being so soon snatched away from him. He therefore decided to have sex with her before she expired. After having sent away all bystanders by mentioning vaguely the performance of some secret act, he engaged in sexual intimacy with his wife.
>
> { Dolebat vir tam cito eripi uxorem sibi, quam raro cognoverat, et eam, ut aequum erat, summe amabat. Decrevit ergo cum uxore, antequam ea expiraret, coire. Semotis omnibus (cum nescio quid se acturum secreto dixisset), uxorem cognovit. } [2]

The effects of marital sex were miraculous:

> Immediately, as if her husband had injected new life into her body, she began to draw in breath, she opened her eyes, and after a little while she began to speak. With a gentle voice, she called for her husband.
>
> { Illa e vestigio, tanquam vir novam vitam in corpus ejus indidisset, coepit spiritum ducere, atque oculis subapertis, post paululum loqui, et submissa voce virum appellare. }

As most husbands do, he responded promptly and obediently to his wife's call. She asked for some food and drink. He got them for her. She was thus fully restored to good health. The course of the wife's illness leaves no room for doubt: without the husband's sexual service, the wife would have died. That's a stressful burden for husbands to hold in the marital bed.

A husband's obligation to have sex with his wife was also regarded as vitally important to his wife's mental health. In medieval Tuscany, a wife was suffering from frenzy and delirium. To get her to a folk-healer for a prognosis and treatment, the husband and his helpers had to transport her across the Arno River:

> In order to cross the Arno River, they put the woman on the back of the strongest man. Immediately she began wriggling her buttocks, simulating sexual intercourse, and crying out in a loud voice, "I," she said, frequently repeating her words, "want to be fucked!" Thus she voiced the cause of her illness.
>
> { Cum per Arnum fluvium transituri mulierem supra dorsum hominis validioris imposuissent, coepit illa vestigio nates movere, similis coeunti, ac magna vocce clamitans: "Ego," inquit, saepius verba iterans, "vellem futui!" quibus vocibus causam expressit morbi. } [3]

Everyone laughed at the husband and attributed his wife's illness to him:

> The one who was carrying the woman poured out such a fit of laughter that he fell into the water with her. All the rest burst out laughing with knowing the cure for this insanity. They asserted that, not the work of a folk-> healer, but sexual intercourse would restore her to sanity. And they turned to her husband, "You," they said, "will be the best doctor for your wife."

>
> { Qui ferebat foeminam, adeo est in resum effusus, ut una cum ea in aquam caderet. Tum ridentes omnes, cum insaniae medelam cognovissent, non esse opus incantationibus asserunt, sed coitu, ad sanitatem restituendam. Et in virium versi: "Tu," inquiunt, "optimus uxoris curator eris." }

All then returned home. As soon as the husband had been sexually intimate with his wife, she perfectly recovered her mind.[4] Husbands were thus held responsible for wives' mental health. That's a heavy burden of sexual responsibility for husbands.

Medieval wives never forgave husbands who failed to fulfill their marital sexual responsibilities. Consider a medieval husband asking his dying wife for forgiveness for any injury he might have done her. He reminded her that he had been a good husband. He explained that he had never failed to pay his marital sexual debt to her, with one exception:

> excepting that time when she was not in good health, because he didn't want to fatigue her with sexual intercourse.
>
> { eo excepto tempore, quo illa non recte valeret, ne coitu fatigaretur.} [5]

His wife, lying gravely ill in bed, responded:

> "This," she said, "by my faith, I can never forgive you. I was never so sick or infirm that I wasn't able to be flat on my back."
>
> { "Hoc," inquit, "per fidem nunquam parcam neque remittam tibi: nullo enim tempore adeo invalida atque infirma extiti, quin commode possem resupina jacere." }

Husbands must learn to infer what their wives are actually saying. To any but the dullest husband, this wife's message to her husband is clear: get to your marital sexual work, now!

Throughout history, young, beautiful women have sexually harassed men. But within medieval marriage, sexual harassment wasn't a concern. Spouses were expected to have sex whenever one of them desired. Husbands had the longest and hardest part of this marital responsibility. For those drooping in their duty, beatings and other forms of punishment stimulated only a small share of men with peculiar predilections. A medieval proverb offered women more generally useful wisdom:

> she who would have her husband soothe her tail must pile endearments on his head. [6]

Today, men are incarcerated for not being able to make monthly payments to woman with whom they had sex. Being incarcerated greatly harms a father's ability to provide emotional and material support to his children. Loving men, or least treating them humanely, is a much better way.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] If both spouses never requested sex, Christians could live in a sexless marriage.

[2] Poggio, Facetiae 112, "Of a husband who was sexually intimate with his sick wife, and thus restored her to health {De viro qui uxorem aegrotam cognovit, et postea convaluit," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, p. 180. Here and subsequent quotes include my English translation, drawing upon that of id., but tracking the Latin more closely. The subsequent quote is from id.

[3] Poggio, Facetiae 24, "A frenetic wife {De muliere phrenetica}," Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 50-2. The subsequent quote is from id. Cf. John the Baptist, e.g. John 1:23, "I am the voice of one crying out {ego vox clamantis}.

[4] Classical Arabic literature preserves a similar understanding of the importance of men sexually serving women:

> It is said that the virgin, if she be kept too long from copulation, will suffer from a condition that the physicians call "constriction of the womb," which leads to delirium and melancholia in the brain, to the extent that she may be thought mad, though she is not; suffice that she be fucked for the ill to vanish immediately.

Nu'aymī (2009) p. 128.

[5] Poggio, Facetiae 42, "A husband who asked his wife for forgiveness while she was sick {Vir qui mulieri dum aegrota esset veniam postulavit}," Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 74-5. The subsequent quote is from id.

[6] Gautier le Leu, "La Veuve {The Widow}," from Old French trans. Hellman & O'Gorman (1965) p. 155.

[image] A holy family in medieval Spain. Illumination from a Book of Hours. Made in Spain in the 1460s. On folio 48v in Ms. Add. 18193, British Library, London. Thanks to the Web Gallery of Art.

References:

Hellman, Robert, and Richard O'Gorman. 1965. Fabliaux; ribald tales from the old French. New York: Crowell.

Nu'aymī, Salwá (Salwa al Neimi), from Arabic trans. Carol Perkins. 2009. The proof of the honey. New York: Europa Editions.

Poggio. 1879. Gian Francesco Poggio Bracciolini. The facetiae or jocose tales of Poggio, now first translated into English with the Latin text. Paris: Isidore Liseux (vol. 1, vol. 2).

This article originally published at Purple Motes

The fourth International Conference on Men's Issues (ICMI18) is ON

Mike Buchanan · 3 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Following the completion of contract negotiations with a London venue, we're delighted to announce that the fourth International Conference on Men's Issues (ICMI18) will be held in London over July 20-22, the long weekend after the weekend in which the World Cup final will be played. The venue is of a similar quality to the one where ICMI16 was held, a venue which received universal praise from conference attendees. Following the experience with Birmingham City FC, we shall be keeping the venue confidential, revealing it to ticket holders only, shortly before the event.

Many of the people who've paid £22.00 deposits towards their ICMI18 tickets were at ICMI16, and they tell us that as well as enjoying the talks, much of the pleasure they derived from the conference related to socialising with like-minded people over the three days, especially in the evenings.

Paul Elam will be the keynote speaker, with a talk titled, 'The Men's Movement – Past, present, and future'. The speaker list is here.

We shall be having dinners on the first two evenings, details of menus and ticket prices will be emailed to ticket holders a month before the event. During the first dinner we'll be presenting Paul Elam with our Churchill award.

We've set ticket prices at the same level as they were at ICMI16:

- £225.00 (Early Bird ticket, available to order until 24:00 on 31 December, whether or not you've already paid a £22.00 deposit)
- £265.00 (Full price ticket, payable with one payment, or, if you prefer, three consecutive interest-free monthly stage payments. You'll have to make the first stage payment no later than 24:00 on 31 January.)

You can book your tickets here. You can save the cost of your ticket by taking advantage of a generous offer from a leading portrait photographer who has taken official photographs of many well-known people. Details here.

We recommend you subscribe to this website, because you'll then be notified of any news as soon as we publish it.

Tickets will not be available to order after 24:00 on 31 March.

Mainstream media and the shameless manipulation of women

William Smyth · 4 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Note: Also available in Portuguese.

Over a year ago, Donald Trump was elected as the latest US president, in a surprise result which hit the mainstream media (MSM) hard. The problem was that the biggest media players in the US, and indeed worldwide, had nearly completely (and mostly unofficially) endorsed his competitor, Hillary Clinton. The MSM suddenly was faced with the unpalatable truth, that they had failed to adequately influence the outcome of the US presidential election, despite their gargantuan efforts to the contrary. The somewhat surprising result was that the public thought for themselves and the MSM was left with the knowledge that its potential to manipulate public perception on important issues was not as great as it had hoped or thought.

A consequence of this, is that it shone light on the media's attempt to manipulate democracy to push their ideological position, which usually aligns with their financially advantageous goals.

In an age where newspaper circulation is down and alternative media influence is up, newspapers need to maintain a business model which is realistic and profitable, while retaining their dwindling relevancy. They achieve this mostly through advertising – and they are increasingly desperate to increase their online advertising revenue as hard copy sales take a hit. Companies pay newspapers to advertise their products so as to reach their target demographic. Interestingly, many people fail to realise that most companies' preferred target demographic is women.

Wordlwide, 80% of all purchases are made by women. Let that fact sink in for a moment. Men may make more money than women, by working longer hours, engaged in more dangerous careers and entering professions which are more difficult but pay better, such as engineering – but women still spend more money that men do. If you want to sell your product, even if that product is aimed at men, you also target women, as they usually control the purse strings in relationships and the family unit. So when advertisers want to sell something, they know their best chance of capitalizing their return on advertising investment (ROI), is to reach out to the main decision maker in financial matters, which is usually women.

So, in their desperate quest to maintain profit margins, newspapers need to deliver the female demographic to potential advertisers. Doing so gives good ROI to the advertisers and makes strong business sense to the publisher.

So how do newspapers deliver the female demographic to their advertisers? The answer is ruthless manipulation, for which longterm exposure is damaging to women, men, and society as a whole. Before explaining how this manipulation works, there are some facts which need to be stated.

The first fact was already included above, in that 80% of purchases are made by women.
Secondly, women hold a disproportionate amount of wealth compared to what they earn. In the US for example, women own 60% of the wealth, yet earn only 40% of it through salaried or self-employment.

By 2020, one report states that women worldwide will spend the equivalent of 28 Trillion US dollars, yet earn only 18 Trillion of that themselves. One can easily speculate where the shortfall of 10 Trillion is coming from.

Additionally, when in a position of power, women are roughly 4-5 times more likely to exhibit positive sexism to their own gender, than men. This means that a female CEO is 4-5 times more likely to promote equivalently capable/qualified women over men, than a man is to promote men over women. One needs only look to Yahoo's female CEO to see the changes she implemented to the company management and the consequent legal cases brought against her as she changed the gender ratio from 80% men to 80% women in a matter of 18 months.

Thirdly, women, enjoy seeing men fail. A controversial statement, but backed up with various studies. Whatever the reason, research shows that women are more likely to buy products when men are painted in a negative light, and women in a positive one. This creates a feel-good factor among women, and encourages them to buy products where this misandristic power-dynamic mechanism is in play. Television adverts and comedy shows have been exploiting this effective technique for a long time now.

Where the MSM comes in, is taking this mechanism one step further. By disseminating material which makes women feel good, they grab a slice of the female demographic and offer value to their advertisers. Women will consistently come back to read publications which make them feel good in some way. We are currently experiencing a race to the bottom to see which media publishers dive lowest to cater to the latest fad which boosts women's self esteem, usually at men's expense.

Fact-based journalism has given way to emotion-based journalism, in order to secure female readers. Whether that is the "Body-positive" movement, which dangerously aims to legitimize and remove stigma from obesity, to the fake "Wage gap" discrimination myth, which is constantly being rolled out as clickbait to secure women readers and get people commenting and arguing online – a good flame war is MSM's new obsession in securing reader interaction and hence value for advertisers. Nowadays, a self-pitying female reader and an incensed angry male reader makes good business sense in terms of page views and online clicks, not to forget interacting with the comments section.

MSM will publish any material which teaches women they are victims and suffer oppression. Certain women read this material vociferously and become hopelessly addicted to it, as it helps them feel they are not responsible (in their own mind) for their weight problem, or following a gender studies course rather than an engineering one, or some other such insecurity and poor decision/attitude in life. The MSM is ruthlessly exploiting and misleading these women into thinking they have somehow been disempowered or oppressed. The method of choice to do this most effectively, is to embrace Feminism.

For those who care to read about these things, Feminism is a movement whose stated goals and actual goals are very different. Gender equality is the stated goal, whereas female privilege and misandry is the actual goal. The media gets a steady stream of "evil men" stories which many women love to read, and "poor female victim" stories, which again women love to read. A two-pronged attack which is incredibly effective at manipulating women into feeling victimised and/or not responsible for their own mistakes in life – and eventually parting with cash.

A knock-on effect, is that these women who are effectively addicted to victim status and being disempowered, need their next fix of "confirmation bias" from the media. It is truly an addiction. Contentious and ill-conceived concepts such as "patriarchy" are used to reel these women into reading more and more bigoted material on a daily basis, on why their flaws and failures are in fact the fault of men everywhere, and that society has an inherent bias against women in favour of men – which is demonstrably wrong. The end result is a disempowered woman and an aggrieved man – but a happy advertiser, who can now consistently reach the demographic with the most buying power. The MSM cares not for the damage it causes to any of the affected parties; its main goal is revenue generation. The long-term consequence, is the destruction of relations between men and women, which incidentally has been a stated feminist goal since the 80's.

Another benefit of harvesting female readership, is the manipulation of democracy. Most floating/swing voters are women. Indeed, at every age in Western countries there are more female voters than male voters. Politicians are acutely aware of this, which is why few will criticise the feminist hate machine. Besides for the last election, the outcome of the previous five US elections was determined by floating voters, i.e. women. Political parties need to win their vote. So not only do we see the media trying to portray all women as frail and vulnerable, but we see politicians exploiting this shameless tactic to try and win their vote.

As a real-world example, in the '80's, there was only limited financial resources in the UK National Health Service for medical treatment, but as an election pledge, women were promised free breast-cancer screening to ensure their vote, and it worked (this was the infamous gamble Margaret Thatcher made in the UK to win reelection – no equivalent service was offered to men for screening of testicular or prostate cancer). By giving women victim status and promising special treatment, both the MSM and political parties benefit. At least they do short-term. The bigger picture however, is that decades of embracing feminism and anti-male propaganda, has made society fail both men and women in many ways, and it is being noticed.

Men's Rights Activists (MRA's) are fighting back against the negative portrayal of men in society by both the MSM and politicians. However, they are being demonised and accused of being misogynists (the feminist, and indeed the Left's, go-to ploy to silence dissent or criticism). Just look at the furore over John McEnroe's factual (in essence) comment that female competitors in sport have a biological disadvantage against males.

When Donald Trump defeated the opportunistic and corporate-sponsored Hillary Clinton, something bigger happened than just an election win. The public won. They sent a clear message to the MSM and politicians that their manipulation is transparent and will no longer work. The question remains to be seen, if this message reaches the ears of advertisers and if change is coming in the way that men and women are treated in pursuit of profit.

Until that moment arrives, if ever, women need to be aware of the MSM and politicans' exploitation of females' latent anti-male bias. It is time women silenced the hate rhetoric of feminism for good, and instead promote true equality. The problem is not feminism though, that is just a symptom; the problem is female antipathy towards men's suffering and society's lack of empathy for the same. Until women stand together with men, inequality will exist and women will be ripe for exploitation by the media and politicians chasing an easy election victory or quick profit.

Pathetic stupidity of cucks described in medieval Latin literature

Douglas Galbi · 6 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Men are concerned about women's sexual fidelity for good evolutionary reasons. Associated with that evolutionary psychology is millennia of world literature expressing men's justified concern about being cuckolded. Medieval Latin literature, which provided men with a relatively good opportunities to express their interests and protest against gynocentric oppression, depicted cuckolds as pathetic, stupid men.

Egbert of Liège's early-eleventh-century schoolbook for young boys provided the basics. In easily memorized Latin hexameters, Egbert drilled into boys contempt for cuckolds:

> A cuckold burns devotedly for an adulterous wife. He excuses her when she's under suspicion and forgives her stumblings in advance.
>
> { Zelotipam curruca suam devinctius ardet, > suspectam excusat, prior offensacula donat. } [1]

Women have long been privileged in formal criminal justice systems. Yet a man need not personally uphold such female privilege. If he doesn't want to risk paying "child support" for children that aren't his biological children, he must have the courage to stand up and confront his wife or girlfriend. That tends to be quite difficult for most men. Good education of boys can help them to develop into strong, courageous, no-nonsense men.

Medieval Latin literature depicted cuckolds as men so ignorant that they don't understand the obvious. For example, a man knocked loudly at the door of a woman's house. Imitating her husband's stuttering voice, he called out to be admitted. Then:

> The stupid husband, who was at home, hearing that voice, said to his wife, "Giovanna, open the door, Giovanna, let him in, for he seems to be me."
>
> { Vir autem stolidus, domi existens, audita illius voce: "Joanna, aperi, Joanna, introduc illum," inquit: "nam videtur idem, qui ego, esse." } [2]

In another case, a wife named Petruccia asked her husband to buy her new shoes. Like most husband do, he fulfilled his wife's request. But when he was out of the house and his wife saw a young man passing by, she signaled to him to come in. She went upstairs with the young man and in her haste lay down right near the stairs. That place could be seen from the doorway. Then she did what literary scholars today would regard as rape if a man did it:

> Pulling the youth down upon her, embracing his buttocks with her legs and feet, she focused on the work of her desire.
>
> { Superimposito autem juvene, clunes ejus cruribus ac pedibus amplexa, concupito operi intendebat. } [3]

Her husband brought a friend home for lunch. The husband entered the house first:

> seeing near the stairs his wife vigorously waving her feet above a young man, he said, "Hey, Petruccia! By the ass of a donkey (their favorite oath), if that's the way you walk about, you'll never wear out those new shoes!"
>
> { visaque apud scalas uxore supra juvenem pedes commovente: "Ohe! Petrucia," inquit, "per culum asini!" (ut mos es illis jurandi) "si hoc mode ambulaveris, nunquam istos calceos consumes." }

It's one thing to imagine that your wife walks upon the clouds. But if your wife's back is on the ground, another man is on top of her, and her feet are waving in the air, you should have sufficient mental functioning to suspect that you're being cuckolded.

Being a cuckold is a miserable way to live. When she saw her husband about to enter their house, one wife hid her lover under the bed. She then accused her husband of wanting to be thrown into prison. She said that the sheriff's officers were looking for him to imprison him for debt. Trembling with fear, the husband begged his wife for advice. She told him to climb up into their pigeon house. She would then lock the door and remove the ladder so that no one would suspect that he was there. The husband followed his wife's advice. After he was securely locked up in the pigeon house, she brought her lover out from under the bed. The wife and her lover then pretended that the Sheriff's officers had returned. The lover took the role of the sheriff, and the wife pretended to defend vigorously her husband. Hiding in the pigeon house, the husband shook with fear. After the wife and her lover had finished that act:

> both went to bed and devoted their night to the work of Venus; meanwhile the husband was withdrawn in hiding among the pigeons and their feces.
>
> { ambo in lectu profecti ea nocte Veneri operam dederunt; vir delituit inter stercora et columbos. } [4]

Cuckolds spend their nights with sub-human birds. They live immersed in shit. Don't let that happen to you.

Men must learn practical means to avoid being cuckolded. Delusions that women are naturally much less evil than men don't help. Men must be wary of gynocentric and demonic advice. For example, in fifteenth-century Rome, Francesco Filelfo dreamed that a demon told him:

> "Take this ring," he said, "and finger it diligently on your finger. So long as it is held there, your wife will never, without your knowledge, have sex with another."
>
> { "Cape hunc," ille inquit, "annulum et diligenter in digito serva. Nam dum in eo gestaveris hunc, nunquam uxor, te inscio, cum alio concumbet. } [5]

Such technology would be even more helpful than DNA paternity testing. But Filelfo soon realized that he was in an unsustainable position:

> Joyfully he awoke from sleep and perceived that he had his finger in his wife's cunt.
>
> { Prae gaudio excitatus a somno, sensit se digitum habere in uxoris cunno. }

Scholars will soon better recognize that Ovid's ring poem (Amores 2.15) is associated with the supernatural.[6] The progression from Ovid's ring poem to the medieval Latin De pulice indicates the mundane devaluation of men's sexuality under gynocentrism. Men cannot count on demons and the supernatural to save them from cuckolding.

In the Byzantine Empire, both physical statues and sophisticated literary romances addressed men's risk of being cuckolded. In the highly developed societies of today, men are disparaged even for being concerned about being cuckolded. Yet men aren't necessarily destined to be pathetic, stupid cuckolds. With study of literature, particularly medieval Latin literature, men can find enlightenment and be more sophisticated men.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Egbert of Liège, The Well-Laden Ship {Fecunda Ratis} 1.659-60, Latin text and English translation from Babcock (2013) pp. 72-3. Despite the soundness of this teaching, Egbert of Liège generally provided schoolboys with gynocentric lessons supporting the demonology of men's sexuality.

[2] Poggio, Facetiae 68, "Of a stupid husband who mistook for himself a man imitating his voice {De viro stolido qui simulantem vocem credidit se ipsum esse}," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 110-1, with my English translation, drawing upon that of id., but tracking the Latin more closely. All the subsequent English translations are made similarly.

[3] Poggio, Facetiae 66, "What a Perugian said to his wife {Dictum Perugini ad uxorem}," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 107-8. The subsequent quote is from id.

[4] Poggio, Facetiae 10, "Of the woman who deceived her husband {De muliere quae virum defraudavit}," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 28-9.

[5] Poggio, Facetiae 133, "A vision of Francesco Filelfo {Visio Francisci Philelphi}," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 2, pp. 20-1. The subsequent quote is from id.

A similar story subsequently appears in Rabelais, Gargantua and Pantagruel 3.28 ("How Friar John comforted Panurge in the doubtful matter of cuckoldry"). This story became famous in many languages. It's commonly known as "The Ring of Hans Carvel."

[6] Laskaris (2018).

References:

Babcock, Robert Gary, ed. and trans. 2013. Egbert of Liège. The well-laden ship. Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 25. Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press.

Laskaris, Julie. 2018. "Ovid's Enchanted Ring Poem: Amores 2.15." Paper to be presented at the 149th meeting of the Society For Classical Studies, Boston, January 4-7.

Poggio. 1879. Gian Francesco Poggio Bracciolini. The facetiae or jocose tales of Poggio, now first translated into English with the Latin text. Paris: Isidore Liseux (vol. 1, vol. 2).

Originally published at Purple Motes

The unexamined brutality of the female libido

August Løvenskiolds · 11 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Snow White is a rapist, claim the Seven Dwarfs. Video confirmation follows below.

In a bizarre and intensely sexist article in The New York Times entitled "The Unexamined Brutality of the Male Libido", Canadian (of course) soy boy Stephen Marche posited all male sexuality was brutal and, echoing dead feminist Andrea Dworkin, that men need to have sex only with flaccid penises, if at all. Marche fulminated unironically against "the often ugly and dangerous nature of the male libido."

Oh, please.

Feminists like Laci Green and even Jessica Valenti reacted with savage libidinous rage of their own.

Green tweeted dear @nytimes, please do not compare men as a whole to the harvey weinsteins and bill cosbys of the world ever again. just because your writers are rape-sympathizing creeps doesn't mean all men are. thx bye.

Valenti, who otherwise never met a problem she didn't blame on men, nevertheless jumped in as if fearing a backlash. She tweeted

> This is bad & dangerous: Men's sexuality is not inherently predatory and claiming it is normalizes assault https://www.nytimes.com/2017/11/25/opinion/sunday/harassment-men-libido-masculinity.html …

> When people make broad generalizations like "the male libido is brutal" all I hear is "my libido is brutal." This piece says more about the author than men.

All this led me to wonder – what were these feminist women so scared of that they would jump to the defense of men they otherwise assail at every turn? Was it that, in a gender-equal world, the door was opening to explore the brutality of the female libido as well as the male?

Using Marche's article as a template, let's see what deep secrets of the FEMALE libido we can tease out, and how they compare to the hell of normal male desires.

Let's start with Marche's source Dworkin. In addition to her standard feminist man-hate, Andrea Dworkin was quite fond of incest and pedophilia, as she made clear in her 1974 book, and so her craving the flaccid penis of an unwilling underage boy is likely the origin of her limp dick fetish, and this suggests a feminine libidinal brutality on a scale far beyond that of a grown man pestering a grown woman for a date, a crime that would destroy a man's career today.. That Marche writes approvingly of this lunatic is, at a minimum, concerning and if I were a parent living in his neighborhood, I would be unnerved by his proximity.

Marche gets a lot of other things wrong, and let's go over a few of them. [Marche's text in italics below.]

In the third century A.D., it is widely believed, the great Catholic theologian Origen, working on roughly the same principle [as Dworkin], castrated himself.

Actually, in my Unitarian church, it is speculated that Origen, Arius and other early Christian teachers castrated themselves to avoid false accusations of sexual impropriety, since the religion classes they taught welcomed women as well as men. Modern college professors would do well to take note – a brutal maiming is the feminist ally new thing to do. This flips Marche's reasoning on its head – self-castration was not about male libido but rather as a defense to the unstable behavior of libidinous women. It makes a lot of sense to me that Green and Valenti would be keen to cover this up.

Moving on.

Fear of the male libido has been the subject of myth and of fairy tale from the beginning of literature: What else were the stories of Little Red Riding Hood or Bluebeard's Castle about?

The "beginning of literature" is The Epic of Gilgamesh, over 4000 years old and the second oldest surviving human story. Gilgamesh fends off the libidinous and marital advances of abusive Goddess Ishtar:

Ishtar, the goddess of love, invites Gilgamesh to her palace and proposes marriage. Gilgamesh turns her down, however, because she treated her previous lovers badly, often turning them into animals. Enraged by his refusal, Ishtar threatens to smash the doors of hell and release the dead unless her father, Anu, releases the Bull of Heaven to destroy Gilgamesh. Because of her threat, Anu does so.

So, if we are to compare – the male libido in Little Red Riding Hood devours grandma. In Gilgamesh, the frustrated female libido threatens the end of the world via zombies. That is harsh, ladies, and an echo of how society will collapse into chaos and starvation as men walk away.

And when it comes to fairy tales, in the latter half of this video, YouTube creator Sugar Tits does a good job compiling examples of expressions of the brutal female libido.

At this point in his article and after having made his flawed case, Marche mellows a bit, arguing that men's independence and self-reliance makes men ignorant of the schemes and wiles of women. Of course, he says this in a quite roundabout way:

The men I know don't actively discuss changing sexual norms. We gossip and surmise: Who is a criminal and who isn't? Which of the creeps whom we know are out there will fall this week? Beyond the gossip, there is a fog of the past that is better not to penetrate….Very often, when I interview men, it is the first time they have ever discussed intimate questions seriously with another man.

This is the part that most deeply terrifies feminists – that men might actually talk about these issues in a framework that looks a lot like the mythical patriarchy of feminist nightmares. One source put it this way:

The next fear is that men will get so nervous that they're going to be accused of harassment that they will simply stop hiring, meeting or socialising with female colleagues. There are reports this is already happening. We will get shut out of the room where important decisions are made because men fear our presence? How ironic would that be?

This is where we need to go, guys – our futures are important and risk reduction is essential to a happy life and good business. Live the Mike Pence rule and avoid unrelated women so that you can reduce your exposure to feminist false accusations of sexual harassment.

And remember that, unless she is conscious and begs for it on camera, cardio-pulmonary resuscitation of a stricken woman is rape. Just let her die alone as Marche and Dworkin intended.

The insidious nature of reverse sexism

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 15 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

My wife and I traveled with another couple to Amish Country in Pennsylvania. It was during that trip that an instance of reverse sexism occurred.

The other couple was a white male and an Asian female. The Asian female, having been raised in China to be pleasing and understanding to her man, appeared outwardly to be submissive. The man appeared outwardly to be dominant. At one point they were taking pictures of each other in front of an Amish buggy. They had only taken three or four pictures when a tall white woman strode up behind the man, tapped him on the shoulder, and said, in a rather nasty and condescending tone, "Excuse me, we'd like to take some photographs if you don't mind."

My friend, who was raised to yield to others (having been the youngest in his family), stepped aside and allowed the woman and her husband to take photographs. Only later, when we were all sitting having lunch, did he realize how angry he was at the woman who interrupted him. "Why was she being so pushy and nasty?" he wondered. "Why couldn't she just wait her turn?"

[image]
I agreed and told him that I had noticed her and her husband watching. "She seemed angry even before she interrupted you, as if she was offended by you."

"I don't know why she would be offended," he replied. "All we were doing was taking pictures of each other. She acted like we were taking pictures forever, but we had only been doing it for two minutes."

"You weren't just taking pictures. You were a politically incorrect couple taking pictures and acting very happy and in love with each other, and that was what was offensive."

I went on to explain my psychoanalytic take on the proceedings. Many people today have a particular conception of how a relationship between a man and woman should be. The man and woman have to demonstrate their version of equality. Many people today immediately view a white male who marries a submissive Asian woman as a sexist. They are offended by such a relationship and judge such men as wanting to control a woman and manipulate her and exploit her. They make a prejudgment about such couples. It is a kind of prejudice.

On top of the prejudice or reverse sexism in this case was discrimination and persecution. The woman acted out her prejudice by persecuting (punishing) the male by snapping at him and bullying him, thus belittling him in front of his wife and in front of us.

The woman knew nothing about my friends. They in fact had a very equalitarian relationship insofar as they engaged in constructive communication, shared their thoughts and feelings honestly with one another, had equal and mutual respect, and made decisions and compromises together. Neither tried to control the other, and both were devoted to making the other happy. He was not sexist in his behavior toward her, and she was not toward him.

This is the essence of equality: mutual caring, empathy and respect. It is about men respecting women and women respecting men. Equality is not about who has the most money or power or rights. That's not equality, that's competition. One of the reasons I admired my friends was that they weren't concerned about who did this or who did that. They were concerned about listening, sharing, being self-objective, and doing whatever it took to make their relationship work.

Hence, the woman's judgment and action toward them had nothing to do with my friends and only to do with appearance and how she interpreted appearance. This is an insidious kind of reverse sexism because, first of all, it goes on without being noticed. Over the last century men have been demanded to look at their sexism. Women have not. Few women writers have written about female sexism. Nor have many men written about it. It is as though it doesn't exist.

The above instance is but one of a multitude of small and large renditions of reverse sexism. It happens in families all the time, as when a woman judges a man through some preconceived notion of what a man is or should be, or raises her boys differently than her girls because of some preconceived notion of what boys are or how they should be.

One comes across reverse sexism whenever women make generalizations about men, such as “men are cheaters,” “men only want one thing from women,” or “men just don’t get it.” All such generalizations represent stereotypical and prejudiced thinking, but today it appears to be okay for women to make such generalizations about men, but very not okay for men to make them about women.

Perhaps it is time for women to examine their own sexism and how it may be harmful to men, to children and to our culture.

Marriage rejection: an ancient form of men's rights activism

Peter Wright · 16 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

While it may seem like a topic of modern MRAs and MGTOW, the burning question of whether men should marry, or more to the point, not marry, is centuries old. That men are rejecting marriage in increasing numbers is well documented, however cynicism about the virtues of marriage is nothing new.

In the premodern period there appeared a movement called the Querelle des Femmes or quarrel about women, which approximates to the current debate between feminists and antifeminists. The centuries-long querelle revolved around discussion of the rights, power and status of women. At its extremes the debate showcased hatred of women on the one hand, and extreme adoration or love of women on the other.

In its broader sense, the querelle encompasses all writing in which the relative merits of the sexes are discussed to ultimately draw gynocentric conclusions. If we consider the longevity of this revolution we can say that today's feminism is the tail end of a longer advocacy machine for women.

The timeframe of the querelle begins in the twelfth century, and after 800 years of debate finds itself perpetuated in the feminist-driven reiterations of today (though some authors claim, unconvincingly, that the querelle came to an end in the 1700s).

The following excerpt from a paper discussing the querelle, by historian Joan Kelly, is instructive. It was written with a feminist focus, thus leaving out all but the most superficial characterization of the male experience of gender relations. Nevertheless it provides much important history about the longer gender debate and how it underpinned the growth of modern feminism:

> We generally think of feminism, and certainly of feminist theory, as taking rise in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Most histories of the Anglo-American women's movement acknowledge feminist "forerunners" in individual figures such as Anne Hutchinson, and in women inspired by the English and French revolutions, but only with the women's rights conference at Seneca Falls in 1848 do they recognize the beginnings of a continuously developing body of feminist thought. Histories of French feminism claim a longer past.
>
> They tend to identify Christine de Pisan (1364-1430?) as the first to hold modern feminist views and then to survey other early figures who followed her in expressing prowoman ideas up until the time of the French Revolution. New work is now appearing that will give us a fuller sense of the richness, coherence, and continuity of early feminist thought, and I hope this paper contributes to that end. What I hope to demonstrate is that there was a 400-year-old tradition of women thinking about women and sexual politics in European society before the French Revolution.
>
> Feminist theorizing arose in the fifteenth century, in intimate association with and in reaction to the new secular culture of the modern European state. It emerged as the voice of literate women who felt themselves and all women maligned and newly oppressed by that culture, but who were empowered by it at the same time to speak out in their defense. Christine de Pisan was the first such feminist thinker, and the four-century-long debate that she sparked, known as the querelle des femmes, became the vehicle through which most early feminist thinking evolved.
>
> The early feminists did not use the term "feminist," of course. If they had applied any name to themselves, it would have been something like defenders or advocates of women, but it is fair to call this long line of prowomen writers that runs from Christine de Pisan to Mary Wollstonecraft by the name we use for their nineteenth- and twentieth-century descendants. Latter-day feminism, for all its additional richness, still incorporates the basic positions the feminists of the querelle were the first to take.[1]

The paper is worth reading in full, but as mentioned above the author leaves out a substantial exploration of the male experience within the querelle. For the record I would also place the beginnings of the Querelle back further, and least to the writing of The Romance Of The Rose and earlier to the treatise The Art of Courtly Love which both discuss the themes of the emergent querelle, and both generated lively social debate on women's status and gendered issues.

Isaac Newton proposed the law that for every action there's an equal and opposite reaction and, by extension, we could say the same law applies to trends within human society. By this reasoning we can assume that a counterforce to the querelle des femmes must have been in full force from the Middle ages through to the modern period. But what form did it take?

As mentioned, the querelle des femmes was part of a more general quarrel between the sexes (querelle des sexes) in which men and women argued in favor of their respective issues. In that context surely men had something more to say for themselves beyond obsessing with the status of women alone; what about their own experiences as men, and where was that experience most detrimentally played out?

Marriage, in a word, is one place where men's concerns most critically clustered – at least in terms of their literary activism.

During the pre-modern period men's issues resembled the concerns of today's MGTOW and Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs), which revolve around discrimination against males in the relational sphere – both public and private.

I recently chanced upon another article which outlined the deeper history under the heading the querelle du mariage or quarrel about marriage. Being a chicken and egg scenario we cannot easily determine whether the querelle du mariage or the querelle des femmes came first, however it is clear that the two traditions served as vehicles for male, and female advocacy respectively.

The following book excerpt provides more detail about this tradition:

The early manifestations of the quarrel often focus on marriage, one of the pressing problems of the late Middle Ages and the early modern period: An uxor sit ducenda (Should One Take a Wife) was a question much discussed by Italian men, and in Germany it could appear as Ob einem manne sey zu nemen ein eelichs weyb oder nit (Should a Man Take a Wife or Not? – Albrecht von Eyb, 1472). In answer to this question male misogamy (hatred of marriage) is expressed as misogyny (hatred of women) and philogyny (love of women) as philogamy (love of marriage).

Christine de Pizan's praise of women was directed against the misogamists and misogynists of her time, the anonymous text Les quinze joies de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) deplored the loss of male liberty in marriage, and a century later Erasmus of Rotterdam presented the misogamist virgin in his Virgo misogamos (The Misogamist Virgin – 1523), who desperately wants to enter a convent but inspired by love she thinks better of it at the last moment. Philogynous texts questioned why women were punished more strictly for adultery than men or why a husband had to be brought (by a dowry); misogamists and misogynists, eg. In England, answered the question by stating that women tend to squeeze money out of their husbands.

In Germany this aspect of the querelle has been largely ignored (interest has focused on voices which argued in favor of women's intelligence and reason), although the querelle du mariage played an important role here: the wide-ranging marriage debate during the Reformation, in particular in its sensational and scandalous early phases – public betrothals of monks and nuns, closures of monasteries and convents, an epidemic of marriages in Germany to which even French reformers travelled who wished to marry – must be read as an integral part of the European querelle des sexes and the same goes for the marriage debates of the Counter-Reformation. Martin Luther's Von chelichen Leben (The Estate of Married Life – 1522) speaks quite in the manner of a querelle text by turning against the traditional misogamist attitude:

> "What we would speak most of is the fact that the estate of marriage has universally fallen into such awful disrepute. There are many pagan books which treat of nothing but the depravity of womankind and the > unhappiness of the estate of marriage […]. So they [young men listening to the advice of a Roman official] concluded that woman is a necessary evil, and that no household can be without such an evil. […] For this reason young men should be on their guard when they read pagan books and hear the common complaints about marriage, lest they inhale poison . For the estate of marriage does not sell well with the devil, because it is God's good will and work. This is why the devil has contrived to have so much shouted and written in the world against the institution of marriage […]. The world says of marriage, 'Brief is the joy, lasting the bitterness."[2]

I have long wondered where and in what form male activism existed in response to traditional European gynocentrism, but was not clear on what forms it took. From the above description, and from the many anti-marriage texts abounding through old Europe, it's clear that a historical form of men's rights advocacy concerned itself with both gynocentrism and the dangers of entrapment within marriage.

Gynocentrism is coming under sustained pressure within the internet age, seeing it increasingly criticized even as it remains powerful as a cultural force. Will the current pushback against cultural gynocentricity see it weaken further? That's anyone's guess, but if nothing else we can take pride in the fact that our resistance to it extends back far longer than the laughable Wikipedia article on Men's Rights would have us believe.

The Wikipedia entry would have us believe that men's rights advocacy started in the 1970s as a feminist initiative which then deformed itself into an antifeminist backlash. Clearly this is a monumental con driven feminist editors of the Wikipedia entry, one which denies blatant evidence extending back to Ernest B. Bax and before. With the longer history on men's activism outlined above, I hope you will join with others in calling bullshit on feminist denials of men's history and lived experiences.

References:

[1] Joan Kelly, Early Feminist Theory and the "Querelle des Femmes", 1400-1789
[2] Gisela Bock and Margarete Zimmerman, The European Querelle des Femmes, in Medieval Forms of Argument: Disputation and Debate (p.134).

Alpha Males and Alpha Females

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 18 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Alpha Males

The term "alpha male" comes from studies of animals. The dominant male animal in a particular group is called the alpha male. Alpha males are able to compete with other males and rise to the top of a tribe. They can then have just about any female they want, and because of their position of power, they can exploit these females. Recently the term has been applied to humans, and the human alpha male, like the alpha males of lower animals, tend to use their positions of power to exploit women.

No doubt alpha males have existed throughout human history and have often been viewed as heroes. One thinks of Genghis Khan, who in addition to conquering Mongolia in the 1100s, was also one of history's greatest ladies men. One also thinks of Achilles, William Wallace, Napoleon, and John F. Kennedy, all known for their dominance of men and having their way with women. Are such men born that way, or do they become that way as the result of environmental factors? Usually it is a combination: they are born with the biological makeup such as an athletic build to dominate, but they are also brought up in an environment that fosters such dominance. Famous gangsters grew up in the mafia, which extolled brutality of all forms, including rape.

One could argue that alpha male sexuality is not something a man chooses, but which is to an extent instinctual to him. But there are many people, mostly women, who would disagree with this notion. The recent rash of accusations of inappropriate sexual behavior, sexual harassment and sexual abuse by males in high places may be in reality an attack on alpha males, an attempt to criminalize what is actually normal behavior by such males.

For the past few months alpha males have been accused of sexual misdeeds. One of the recent celebrities to be accused was Charlie Rose, a television personality known for his gentlemanly interviews. Nine women have come forward and described various improper behaviors on his part. The Washington Post first reported on eight women had charged him with "unwanted sexual advances toward them, including lewd phone calls, walking around naked in their presence, or groping their breasts, buttocks or genital areas." Rose apologized for his conduct, saying he didn't realize his behavior was harassment. He was immediately fired by CBS and PBS and almost everybody assumed he was guilty without a trial, without a verdict, without a sentencing by a judge.

The focus in each case is on the man or men. It suddenly appears that women all over the media are expressing criticism about and suspicion of men. The spate of accusations makes it seem that men in general are sexual predators that can't be trusted. They make it seem that all men in high places, men with positions of power, need to be monitored. Indeed there have been some notions that have been floated around that men are innately sexists and that white men are particularly sexist as well as racist.

Although feminists have contended from the inception that their goal is equality between men and women, their emphasis at present is entirely on the feminist interpretation of equality. For example, the present outcropping of accusations of noted men by women has been almost always reported from the women's side. It is assumed by most that each of the men is guilty, whether he denies it or not, and there is a rush to judgment about the men. Often, like Charlie Rose, the men lose both their reputations and their jobs. One of the slogans of feminism is that "women should be believed" when they report sexual abuse. Hence there is a tendency by people, both male and female, to accept the accuser's version of the events they describe without question and to shut down anybody who expresses an opinion that is different from theirs.

This occurred when Geraldo Rivera took to Twitter to complain that "News is a flirty business & it seems like [the] current epidemic of #SexHarassmentAllegations may be criminalizing courtship & conflating it [with] predation." Rivera's employer, Fox News, made him apologize for his tweet, and indeed we have had a plethora of apologies over the last few weeks by men.

Alpha Females

In studies of tribal animals, the highest ranking individual is sometimes designated as the alpha. However, according to Wikipedia both males and females can be alphas, depending on the species. Where one male and one female fulfill this role together, they are sometimes referred to as the alpha pair. Other animals in the same social group or tribe will be submissive towards the alpha or alphas. Alpha animals usually gain preferential access to food and other desirable items or activities, though the extent of this varies widely between species. Male or female alphas may gain preferential access to sex or mates; in some species, only alphas or an alpha pair reproduce.

However, just as there are alpha human males, there are also alpha females. Males are not the only ones who get into power positions and use their power to exploit the opposite sex. Women also engage in inappropriate conduct, harassment and sexual abuse of men. However, while male sexual misconduct and abuse has to do with exploiting women's sexuality, more often than not alpha females use their power to not only to exploit males sexually, but also to psychologically castrate men, which means they dominate men by taking away what feminists call their "cock privileges."

In fact, the ways in which alpha females castrate men can be seen in the manner such women have recently gone after male sexuality. There seems to be a lynch-mob mentality among such women, an "off with their heads" attitude. Alpha females are unable to make distinctions and they classify men who come on to women in a clumsy way ("misconduct") in the same category as men who rape women. Misconduct is not a crime while rape is, and among alpha females and the men and women who follow them the distinction between sexual misconduct and rape is lost.

Garrison Keillor, the elderly humorist who for years distributed a folksy show called, "A Prairie Home Companion," was fired after a woman accused him of inappropriate behavior. Minnesota Public Radio didn't explain (which has been the case with many of the recent firings), but Keillor addressed the incident by immediately saying, "I put my hand on a woman's bare back," he wrote. "I meant to pat her back after she told me about her unhappiness and her shirt was open and my hand went up it about six inches. She recoiled. I apologized. I sent her an email of apology later and she replied that she had forgiven me and not to think about it. We were friends. We continued to be friendly right up until her lawyer called."

This may be a kind of mass hysteria, which throws out the baby with the bathwater, and is in itself an abusive kind of behavior. The tyranny that shuts down and punishes men like Rivera who have an alternate opinion of events (rather than a political correct opinion) is another form of abuse. It is easy for women to point the finger at men, but it is not easy to point the finger at themselves. Sexual misconduct, harassment and abuse is not just about men. After 40 years of being a psychotherapist, I can say that there is an equal amount of men who hate women as women who hate men. Neither sex is entirely guilty or innocent. A slew of female high school teachers have in recent years been caught having sex with teen-aged boys. This has become public. But many day-to-day abuses of men by women are never reported because men don't report them.

I'm talking about women who lead on and then reject men; alpha females who put down men's sexuality as an innate kind of sexism without any empathy for the difference in men's and women's sexuality; women who have taken over many parts of our culture, such as the educational system from nursery school to college. Almost all elementary school teachers today are women, and they may be presenting, wittingly or unwittingly, a biased attitude toward boys, which may be the reason why today two-thirds of college undergrads are women.

A Case in Point

Recently I became acquainted with a case involving a professor who had taught at a college in Manhattan for about 15 years. During that period many students had challenged him, as students are apt to do, but one case stands out in particular.

During the second class of his Introduction to Psychology course a young woman came up to him and said she would like to talk with him in his office. Since professors are required to put aside an hour of time for students who had problems with particular assignments, he agreed to see her. They met later in the office assigned to Adjunct Professors and before he knew it she had started talking about her problems. He had been a licensed psychoanalyst in private practice for many years, and he had made this fact known during the first class, while introducing the course. This student, a young woman of about twenty, apparently decided that he was therefore available to do therapy with students.

She spoke in a very soft voice and, even though it wasn't his job to do therapy with students, he decided to hear her out. She talked for about twenty minutes about her problems with men. She said she was always seeing men on the street, on the subway, in the parks, and finding them attractive. But once she noticed that the men looked at her, she was immediately disgusted by them. She particularly felt angry and envious of men in positions of authority, and would think to herself, "Who does he think he is?" She said at times she hated men so much she only dated women. At other time she hated men her own age and limited herself to dating women and older men. She spoke in a very soft and fast and circular way, and at times it was hard to understand her. At one point she said she had seen a church counselor but had stopped after five sessions.

It was then that the professor broke in and said he thought she should return to the church counselor or to some other counselor. He pointed out that free counseling for students was available at the college. He closed by saying, "I think you still have some things to figure out in therapy, such as why you're so angry at men, why you are so attracted and then nauseated as soon as a man looks at you. You need to figure out why sometimes you're only interested in dating women and sometimes you only date older men."

At that point she suddenly laughed at him and said, "I never said I was interested in older men." She laughed at him with contempt, and it occurred to him that she had found what she was looking for. She found a reason to have contempt for him, taking his words out of context and giving them a different meaning. To her it was as though he were asking her if she was interested in older men. She quickly got up and left the office, backing out as if he had done something inappropriate.

He pondered about what to do. It was a delicate situation. Women all over the country were accusing men of sexual misconduct, and they were always believed. He suspected that if he brought this to the attention of his superiors at the college, who were all women, it might not go well. He questioned whether they would believe him or her. It was apparent to him, from what she had said, that she probably suffered from a histrionic personality disorder. She was angry and particularly envious of men in authority and he was a teacher, a man in authority. It may have been that she found him attractive and then disgusting and wanted to find a way to knock me down.

He decided not to do anything about it, to just go back to teaching the class. But she started acting out in class, sleeping during several classes, talking to the woman who sat beside her for long stretches of time, texting on her cell phone during class and asking him disrespectful questions during class. He gave students a class participation grade, and at one point he called her up after class and informed her that her class participation grade was a C and that whether it went higher or lower was up to her. She sort of smirked at him and walked shaking her head. The next class he found out that she had gotten vengeance by telling students he had come on to her in her office by asking her if she was interested in older men.

Two students who had formerly liked this professor now played a game with him one day when he entered the class. The teacher who taught before him was just finishing his class, and the two women students began making a big deal over how young this teacher was. "Oh, you're such a young professor. What do you teach? You don't even look like a professor. Oh, my, I think I want to sign up for your class." They were being inappropriately seductive to this young professor, and their professor could tell the young man was confused. Their game was meant for his ears. When he put my briefcase down on desk desk, one of the women asked, "Are you all right professor?"

These women had immediately believed this woman (the result of the well-known feminist demand that women be believed) and concluded that their professor was a pervert. He was anything but a pervert. He had tried to help this young woman with her problems, and she had jumped in and twisted what he had said to suit her purposes. He thought about confronting this student in the next class, but since there were only a few classes left in the semester, he decided to let it go. However, one of the two women who had at first liked him now dropped the class. Another woman, who had planned to do a research project with him stopped speaking to him.

This case shows the power that women now have over men and particularly how an alpha female can use the present anti-male atmosphere—in which all women who make charges against men must be believed—to her advantage.

An Equal, Loving Relationship between the Sexes

We need to have a truly equal relationship between the genders in which there is a real dialogue between them and a real agreement on how to accomplish the resolution of the divide between males and females. Ordinary men and women, not alpha males and alpha females, need to be in charge of this dialogue.

An interesting study on stress bears on this discussion. Robert Sapolsky, a psychologist, studied stress in a baboon tribe in Africa, which he documented in a famous video called, Stress: Portrait of a Killer. Sapolsky was interested in stress levels of the tribe, so he took the blood of each baboon in the tribe, measuring the degree of stress hormones in their bodies. He found that the alpha male and the alpha female had the least amount of stress hormones in their bodies. They were able to dominate all the males and females under them. Meanwhile, the baboons who were at the bottom of the hierarchy, the so-called "runt of the litter," whether male or female, carried the most stress hormones. These were the baboons who were picked on the most and least able to fight back.

Sapolsky learned many new things about stress, and he also learned about the antidote to stress. This happened by a random happening during the years he covered this tribe. At one point the tribe discovered a garbage dump. The alpha males and females got first dibs on the food in the garbage dump, keeping all others away. They were the only ones to eat the food, which had gone bad. All who ate the food from the dump died, which meant that all the alpha males and females died. Those who were left in the tribe were the more healthy and loving members of the tribe. The males weren't into bullying other males or exploiting women, and the women were also not those who were into bullying other women and playing games with men. As the result the tribe enjoyed a peaceful and loving existence. When Sapolsky later took the blood of the survivors of this tribe, all of them had fewer stress hormones in their blood.

Love, according to Sapolsky, is the antidote to stress. In order for males and females—whether baboons or humans—to form a loving and peaceful relationship, they have to be able to love each other. In order to love each other, they must respect each other. They must reach agreements through love and respect, not through battles for domination and control.

Feminism is basically a club for alpha females, which is attempting to force its values on the rest of us. Those of us who are sane must resist the feminist misrepresentation of all males as perpetrators of sexual harassment and abuse against females.

Victims of domestic violence: running the gauntlet

Dr. Travis Gee · 23 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The concept of domestic violence (DV) is often phrased in legal terms as a "gender free" idea, where there are "perpetrators" and "victims".

In practice, however, police, courts, and many sectors of the public widely believe that perpetrators are generally if not entirely adult males, and victims almost entirely adult women and children of either gender.

However, life is rarely this neat and tidy, and even though the laws are often written in gender-neutral language, the reality is that men will be assumed to be the perpetrators, and that the alleged victims will be in need of some kind of protection.

What Constitutes Domestic Violence?

This is a thorny issue, because the idea of DV also has expanded to incorporate non-physical acts, such as raising one's voice, swearing, or basically doing anything that might make another person fearful. Indeed, the behaviour is less relevant to whether a domestic violence order (DVO) is issued than the fear that the alleged victim expresses.

Think for a moment on your reaction to the words you just read: "alleged victim." Legally, that's what it is until proven, right? Yet "victim" is so widely used without that qualifier that it seems odd when we see it. There is a presumption of truth in claiming to be a victim which is not warranted without evidence being tendered to a court. And yet, evidence may not be necessary in the DV court. Why? Because the words 'I'm afraid' cannot be tested. There is no way to know for sure if the person applying for a DV order is in fact, afraid. Sometimes, they clearly aren't, and are using the DV order to get a leg up in family law proceedings in a different court. However, impugning an alleged victim's claim of being afraid makes for bad press for police, courts and government ministers. So alleged behaviour of the alleged perpetrator isn't subject to a criminal standard of proof, and in fact, isn't even clearly defined. The violence is whatever the other person says "makes them afraid."

In short, the crime is not in what you do, but how someone else reacts to it.

The perpetrator is "reasonably expected" to know that others will react negatively to something, and is typically assumed to be using that knowledge to manipulate or control the other person, even when the raising of the voice is for a reason as simple as an unwitting response to the running-down of a hearing aid battery.

Unfortunately, neither the public nor the police, nor many court officials, are aware of the research in the area. Since the 1970's research has shown that there is basically "gender symmetry" in perpetration of violence, that is, women are about as likely as men to initiate violence of some form. Because of physical size differences, men are somewhat more likely to inflict damage in many cases.

However, to compensate for that size difference, many women may choose to use a weapon first up, and domestic homicides ending in a dead male victim are more common than a reading of the press would lead us to believe. For the man this is a dangerous situation, not because disarming the woman is difficult (though it can be), but rather, because once the woman is disarmed the man is left holding the weapon when police arrive. This does not bode well for his freedom, his ability to return to his own house, the chances of ever seeing his children again, or even maintaining employment in some fields.

There is the further issue of attributions that are made after the fact. Whether a man defends himself or not, there is a tendency of people around him and officials managing the case to assume that the woman was only attacking in self-defense because she was afraid of something. Uninformed minds boggle that a woman might initiate and carry out rather serious violence, or even hurt herself in the absence of the alleged perpetrator, then call police to have him arrested. I have seen too many cases where exactly this has happened, and the men involved are confused that they can be incarcerated and stripped of their children on the say-so of a former partner.

Consider Dave, whose partner was smaller than him, but had a history of violence towards past partners. When he found a heavy wooden cutting board speeding towards his skull after a heated discussion over some trivial thing he couldn't even remember, he blocked the swing grabbed her arm to prevent himself from potentially serious or fatal injury. This left red finger marks, over which she called police – who promptly arrived, arrested him and threw him in the watch house for the weekend.

Dave said that he felt "very stupid" when he first saw me, because he'd gone to visit the children the next week, when she was very apologetic and nice, but still insisted that he come to her house for the visit – technically in breach of the orders, but he trusted her to play nicely.

He realized he'd "taken the bait" and when she started yelling at him again, he raised his voice again. The neighbors had apparently been warned by her to listen out for trouble, and now he was facing jail for breaching the interim order, by " not being of good behaviour" when visiting the children, in a context he didn't choose, where he was readily set up for some payback. He joked that he should have just let her cave his skull in, because as a "vegetable in a hospital bed" he would be free of the terror that he was facing now at the prospect of jail for "wife-beating".

A research-informed DV specialist will be aware that the cycle of violence may well be a dance between two people who both have poor conflict resolution skills, and will hear both sides of the story non-judgmentally to arrive at a way forward for both, when both wish to preserve the relationship, minus the violence. The famous Duluth model, for all its popularity, generally assumes a perptrator and a victim, but the complexity of real situations where roles may not be what it predicts, or may shift according to circumstances, makes it fall down rather badly.

Legal Proceedings

Where legal proceedings are in place, however, and there is no desire to rekindle the relationship, there is usually some kind of court order involved about dealing with anger and violence issues that may not even be present in the person ordered into therapy. A delicate balance between legal requirements and handling the need to have therapy for problems that don't exist is difficult to maintain, but ultimately is achievable.

Objective testing as part of any assessment is a first priority. There are established tests that, if the accused perpetrator does not have personality disorders or other psychopathology, will show a "normal" profile. Such tests can contain sub-tests to look out for people who respond dishonestly to try to skew the results.

If a solicitor is involved, it is best to make sure your psychologist has instructions from that solicitor, but also is able to discuss it with your legal eagle to make sure that everything gets covered that needs to be covered, if there are gaps in the instructions.

Medicare does not cover psycho-legal reports, so there may be some expense in engaging a psychologist to help with your DV matters. You can expect a request for a retainer up front, and a condition that the report be paid for on delivery out of money placed in trust with your solicitor when the report is commissioned.

It may be difficult to get a precise estimate of costs, because it may not be known in advance how much additional documentation may be required, or how much extra work is needed to "make all necessary inquiries," which is a condition any expert witness has to live up to. That is because ultimately, for an expert report, the duty of the reporter is to the court to provide as accurate a picture as possible on which to base decisions.

Your solicitor may encourage you to see a psychologist, however, you do not have to admit that you are the perpetrator and in need of treatment to attend. Indeed, sorting this out out early in the process may be helpful, because you are getting yourself assessed up front and independently, and if in fact you do have some issues, documenting that you are working on them may help if you find yourself in damage control mode in three to six months. This requires a good degree of self-reflection and honesty, because if there are legal proceedings afoot, there may be other witnesses who can attest to some previous outbursts, all of which may go against you.

However, with support and guidance through the process, the initial shock of finding the machinery of the state arrayed against you can be buffered, to help you focus on your defense at a time when you may well be thinking it is time simply to give up.

Article originally published at http://www.drtravisgee.com/

Should we execute women who delayed their #MeToo accusations?

August Løvenskiolds · 23 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine a gender-equal world in which both men and women are held to the same harsh standards of responsibility that now apply to men only. In such a world, I contend, the current crop of years-delayed #MeToo accusers would face execution as traitors to humanity, and their fate would be considered just.

#MeToo is a widespread wave of accusations of sexual impropriety, many of them years or even decades old, being leveled against men (and rarely, women). The alleged perpetrators of these crimes are only now facing summary punishment in the court of public opinion for crimes, and even non-criminal behaviors, that are alleged, unproven, and lack any evidence or due process of law.

A lot of recent articles suggest that there will be a backlash to #MeToo – that men will shy away from women, or that companies will demur from hiring women because hiring a woman is the same as signing up for a losing lawsuit when she inevitably claims sexual harassment when a male coworker tells her "good morning" in too cheerful a tone. See here, here, and here. One feminist even suggested that companies be forced to pay multi-million dollar fines when a male employee is accused, accurately or not, of offending a woman.

In law, delaying or failing to report a dangerous sexual predator might well be called "depraved indifference" to the risk to others (in the mildest of cases), and charges like "harboring a criminal" or even "conspiracy" or "misprision" become tenable. The definition of "misprision" is "the deliberate concealment of one's knowledge of a treasonable act or a felony." In his much-maligned article on libidinal brutality, Stephen Marche disparaged men who overlooked second-hand (hearsay) accounts of sexual impropriety. Covering up a first-hand eyewitness account of a man criminally complimenting a women has to be an order of magnitude worse of an offense than merely ignoring a possible specious account of the same.

In the military, the failure to report or respond to an enemy threat can be punishable by death. For example, consider the case of Jack Dunn, who was sentenced to death for falling asleep while on guard duty. In Dunn's case, no enemy attacked and no loss of life or material was associated with his negligence. Dunn had lots of excuses – he had just returned to duty after an injury and was filling in for another soldier for the second straight night. None of this mattered – Dunn was still sentenced to die.

The cases of the delayed #MeToo harpies are arguably much, much worse than Dunn's nodding off. Their failure to report resulted in sexual predators being unchecked, possibly for decades, compared to Dunn, whose negligence harmed no one in an actual, practical sense. Dunn's sentence was designed to keep other soldiers on their toes, protecting everyone in their military purview. In contrast, a woman who fails to immediately report a sexual assault arguably places every other woman around her at risk from the predator that is known to her and, perhaps, her alone. As with Dunn, no excuse should matter – neither her exhaustion, nor fragility, however poignant, are relevant excuses, just as Dunn's exhaustion and recent combat injuries were of no matter in his fate.

If a sentence of death is called for in Dunn's case, it is more than justified in the case of, say, Rose McGowan, who took a cash settlement to cover up the sexual peccadilloes of Harvey Weinstein twenty years ago, allowing Weinstein, allegedly, to continue his sexual reign of terror for two decades. Executing McGowan would send a clear message that covering up sex criminals for cash should not, and will not, be tolerated in a gender-equal society.

If we are serious about gender equality, fighting sex crimes, and punishing those who cover them up – and we should be serious about all of that – then a woman who puts other women at actual risk (by squelching timely reports of a sexual predator) should face execution as a consequence of her avarice or cowardice, just like a male soldier always has been for the crime of neglecting the welfare of others.

In the US, all men, at age 18, are required to register for the military draft, regardless of their victim status. Women should be compelled to face the same legal responsibilities, and associated penalties, for covering up crimes, even when they are the alleged victims of those crimes. When it comes to protecting society from criminals, THAT would be gender equality – the gender equality that all feminists always seek to prohibit and destroy.

Is calling for justice a backlash? Of course not, and if you want men to regain trust in women, this would be a great first step. Of course, we will require other concessions, as well.

Is male circumcision a violation of human rights?

Gary Costanza · 24 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This reprint comes to us courtesy of Kasim Kahn at educateinspirechange.org

By Collective Evolution

While flipping through the WestJet TV lineup on a recent cross-country flight, I reluctantly settled for a popular daytime talk-show (my other options included Days of Our Lives and re-runs of Here Comes Honey Boo Boo), which saw a panel of 4 diversely opinionated women duking it out to see who could make their co-host seem like the bigger idiot. Sigh.

Interestingly, however, the subject they were debating that day happened to be male circumcision, a surprising topic for daytime TV.

Two of the female hosts in particular were taking the stage with polarizing views on the matter. One host saw the medical procedure as a hygienic practice that lowered the risk of disease while the other saw it as an archaic and highly irrelevant surgery.

In the end, the audience was left undecided. I, however, was left with an ignited curiosity about a medical procedure that I had never really taken time to question.

I was impressed by the research the anti-circumcision host had prepared for her debate, and it got me thinking intently about the ethics behind the globally rooted practice.

How Did Circumcision Come To Be Globally Recognized?

While the true origins of circumcision are largely obscured, the procedure undoubtedly has ancient roots, as documented in findings from several ethnic groups, including ancient Egypt, Greece, and Sub-equatorial Africa.

It has been proposed that the procedure began for a number of reasons, including serving as a rite of passage marking a boy's entrance into adulthood or as a form of sympathetic magic to ensure virility or fertility. It could also have been started as a means of reducing sexual pleasure, marking those of higher social status, aiding hygiene where regular bathing was impractical, or even humiliating enemies and slaves by symbolic castration.

By the 1890s, it became a popular technique to prevent, or cure, masturbatory insanity.

Sadly, female circumcision is still practiced in certain areas of the world today, although efforts are being made to put a stop to it.

Clitoridectomies (removal of the clitoris) were also performed for the same reason, and were widely practiced in the US until 1925. This of course was until someone recognized the absurdity of such an invasive and irrelevant medical procedure.

Yet even still, male circumcision continued onwards unto further generations of men.

Today, the World Health Organization (WHO) has estimated that globally one-third of males aged 15 years and over are circumcised, with almost 70% of those being Muslims.

To Cut Or Not To Cut

Surprisingly, even though circumcision is still performed by most surgeons today, many leading medical institutions show no favour towards the procedure.

Take the New England Journal of Medicine, for example:

“Failure to provide adequate control of pain amounts to substandard and unethical medical practice.“

The American Academy of Pediatrics Policy Statement on circumcision:

“Existing scientific evidence demonstrates potential medical benefits of newborn male circumcision; however, these data are not sufficient to recommend routine neonatal circumcision.“ (AAP 1999)

The British Medical Association:

“[P]arental preference alone is not sufficient justification for performing a surgical procedure on a child.” (BMA 2006)

Even the Canadian Paediatric Society has reservations about circumcision:

“Circumcision of newborns should not be routinely performed.“ (CPS 1996)

Perhaps the reason most medical institutions show no favor towards circumcision has something to do with one of medicine’s first code of ethics, “First, do no harm.”

Removing a normal, healthy body part and causing unnecessary pain is in fact doing harm.

Pardon my rudeness, but the common rebuttal that states “the pain only lasts for a minute” is both incorrect and inhumane.

We know that a baby has nerve endings in their genitals at birth, therefore surgically cutting a newborn’s penis undoubtedly causes extreme pain for the baby. Even if it were only for a ‘minute’ (which it’s not), such an argument also implies it is okay to inflict unnecessary pain on an infant, even if only temporarily.

Furthermore, circumcision without anesthesia is inconsistent with ethical guidelines that prohibit performing surgical procedures on live beings without anesthesia.

Money, Autonomy, and Misguided Parental Decisions

In her article, “Circumcision Ethics and Economics,” author Darcia Narvaez states that her anti-circumcision stance comes down to money, autonomy, and parental intentions.

For one, Narvaez explains how much money we actually waste on the procedure.

> Medicaid spends $198 million each year on routine infant circumcision in the 33 states that still pay for it, a procedure its own guidelines consider to be medically unnecessary. Private insurance programs are reimbursing an additional $677 million, raising prices for us all (Craig 2006.) In addition to the cost of circumcision itself, correcting its complications are said to double the cost, bringing the total bill to $1.75 billion each year. Is this what we should be spending money on during a recession and at a time when healthcare costs are skyrocketing?

Complications indeed, not to mention the average 117 neonatal circumcision-related deaths (9.01/100,000) which occur annually in the United States.

Secondly, Narvaez points out that everyone has a right to bodily autonomy and self-determination, and that the only person qualified to make the medical decision is “the owner of the penis, as he is the one going to have to live with the results, not his parents.”

Another valid point brought up by Narvaez comes down to the fact that parents’ “aesthetic preferences are not valid reasons for circumcision.”

While all of her points speak truth in some regard, there are arguments for circumcision that should also be looked at.

Risk of Disease?

The most common arguments for circumcision comes down to hygiene and risk of disease. Increased risk of spreading and contracting HPV, cervical cancer, and HIV are the big ones most commonly mentioned.

However, when one actually takes the time to look at the studies which suggest this correlation, it’s extremely easy to see how weak that correlation is (fortunately).

A 2002 paper in the New England Journal of Medicine studied men in Europe, Asia, and Latin America, and found that circumcision was correlated with a decreased risk of penile HPV infection (this correlation is corroborated by a 2009 study in African men), but that there was not a significant correlation between circumcision and incidence of cervical cancer.

Does circumcision truly reduce the chances of contracting or spreading HPV and HIV? Is there enough correlation to draw conclusions?

When they restricted their dataset to women with only one sexual partner, there was an increased risk of cervical cancer in women whose partners were uncircumcised only if their partner was already considered at high risk for contracting HPV (as determined by age at first intercourse, number of sexual partners, and sex with prostitutes). So, in men who already engage in risky sexual behavior, circumcision does offer an advantage for protecting their partners from cervical cancer.

Yes, circumcision reduces the mucosal surface area, thereby potentially minimizing the interface for abrasion and transmission of viruses, but again, this is a weak reason for surgical intervention.

Women also have many crevices and folds in their genitals, yet we don't automatically assume to surgically remove their labia for hygienic purposes.

It's called showering.

Facing Reality

Routine infant circumcision is a 90-year aberration among hundreds of thousands of years of our time here as homo-sapiens.

Furthermore, manmade traditions have never been the basis for scientific principles, so why have we chosen to hold on to such an archaic way of thinking with regards to circumcision?

Thankfully, these traditions are on their way out soon, with only 30% of American boys circumcised in 2009. It seems that more and more parents are seeing through the silly traditions of our past while looking to create a more reasonable future for us all.

Perhaps one day we will look back at a list of all the strange things we once accepted as normal and laugh, with circumcision topping the list of these absurdities.

Dear #MeToo, I'd like to introduce you to #MikePenceRules

Paul Elam · 24 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Author's Note: Merry Christmas and happy whatever to the lot of you, including my heathen, non-believing brethren out there. I'm wishing for all of you to have something to be grateful for and something to look forward to in this crazy life as red pill men in a blue pill world. PE

Welcome to the calamity now popularly known as #MeToo.

Now, I did a talk on the current sexual assault and sexual harassment hysteria back in November when all the attention was on Harvey Weinstein. I did that in anticipation of all the high profile liberal asshats and cuckservatives who would go right under the bus as the femifrenzy went into overdrive.

Some people felt that talk was a little heartless. And you know what? They're right. I have grown a little heartless about the self-inflicted blue pill misery of pompous blowhards who never gave a rat's ass what was happening to their fellow man as long as they were fat with cash and living in the dream-state of being above it all.

These are the same people, rich and powerful movers and shakers, who have buried their noses in feminist ass till cheeks met cheeks, for politics and popularity at cocktail parties, while good men died like dogs right at their feet.

So yeah, watching these prigs fall over like so many dominoes doesn't exactly qualify as a bummer in my life. Matter of fact, I am enjoying the show.

I am particularly enjoying the outrage of Tavis Smiley, who is now railing publicly about being fired by PBS without any kind of fair hearing. He is moaning about how this, "…has gone too far," to anyone who will listen, which isn't very many people.

Yeah, Tavis, it has gone too far. And I guess you noticed this when? When they crawled up your ass, ended your professional life and totaled your legacy like a train plowing into a Volkswagen?

Seriously, I admire Smiley for fighting back, but just who did he think he was working for? A Voice for Men? PBS, driven in large part by our tax dollars, is one of the main players in furthering the agenda that eventually, finally bit him in the ass.

And I am supposed to take pity on him or feel outraged?

Sorry, but I've already seen too many men crucified who never took part, by omission or otherwise, in promoting these witch hunts. And, in fact, I have known good men who went down trying to fix the problem. So, as far as I am concerned, this not only hasn't gone too far, it hasn't gone far enough.

And, praise Jesus, the best is yet to come. Not only are we going to get to see a whole lot more men bend over and take a great big fat one for the team in the days ahead, the payback for #MeToo craziness isn't going to end there. The real repercussions will be played out over the next generation or two.

You see, in the midst of all the mayhem another highly relevant story has risen to the occasion. Vice President Mike Pence strolls into the landscape cool as a cucumber. As you may have noticed, Vice President Pence has been complete Teflon, untouchable, even as allegations are flying through the air at everyone else like stray bullets.

There is no grand secret to Pence's success. The good Vice President has rules about women. He never allows himself to engage socially with them while alone. Never, with any of them, save his wife. And he won't attend any events that feature alcohol without her there, either. He is obviously practiced at this, to the point that it is woven into his standard operating procedure.

Thus, he remains Mr. Clean in the political arena, his future and his reputation protected.

Let's call this #MikePenceRules.

There has already, and quite ironically, been hit pieces on him about this in the media. The Washington Post made a mentally retarded attempt at doing a number on him, implying that his motive for being averse to women was that he didn't trust himself around them, or some such nonsense.

The article, penned by some cuck named Paul Waldman, displayed the Olympic level mental gymnastics required to come up with the narrative.

"Let's take just a moment to consider this pair of rules Mike Pence has for himself," writes Waldman. "He obviously thinks that every interaction he has with a woman is so sexually charged that it's safe to be around them only if there are other people there, too."

Now, I am sure this probably made sense to Waldman, and to WaPo's regular readers, in the same way that 2 + 2 = 5 to that crowd. But of course, like with every other matter of sexual politics, they are all wildly off the mark.

And that is probably a good thing, too, because while they conjure up derisive, pseudo Freudian attempts to shame men like Vice President Pence as being fearful of human sexuality, other men will pick up on the wisdom of his actions.

Vice President Pence won't be alone with women for one simple reason. It's because he knows full well that women are dangerous. It is hard to imagine anyone doubting that any more, but for anyone who does, they can just grab the latest headline in the current news cycle. Unless we are in the middle of bombing North Korea, the headline will prove them dead wrong. Well, unless they're dead stupid.

I am not usually in the business of making predictions. But I've got no problem at this point in time in saying that I see the Mike Pence Rules carving themselves into the social landscape, deeply and permanently.

It's nothing new to me, mind you. I started leaving the door open 30 years ago when counseling women with drug and alcohol problems, especially borderlines. Even in the blue pill world of mental health services, nobody questioned why I did it. They already knew.

Again, that was three decades ago. Today we have entered an age where Mike Pence Rules will be invoked across the board in all areas of life.

Of course, feminists will rage about it. They want men in vulnerable positions and will scream about oppressive sexism when men protect themselves, but it won't do them much good.

They will have to try, though. You see, the thing is that as the inherent danger that most women now represent becomes increasingly apparent to men, the only rational response available to them is risk reduction.

That doesn't just mean that men will be more careful around women. It doesn't mean just being more prone to covering your ass at parties and other social situations.

It involves all areas of life where men interact with women. The big one that comes to my mind is employment. Sooner or later, and I am thinking sooner, men are going to figure out that your employee can't file a sexual harassment charge if you don't hire them in the first place.

Now how funny is that? For the past 50 years or so we've heard feminists bellyache about employment discrimination against women in hiring, despite that fact that it didn't happen that much.

Well, now it is going to be happening for real. With the advent of #MeToo hysteria, I can already hear the sound of tens of thousands of employment doors quietly closing in women's faces. And, as one of my followers on Twitter conveyed to me, he's going to, "Slam the damn thing shut."

Here's the rub. Every time a female job applicant walks in the door the employer, who may well be female, has two possible risks to consider.

One, if they don't hire her, she may sue them for sexual discrimination. Or two, if they do hire her, she may sue them for sexual harassment or something else along those lines.

Personally, if I am an employer, I am going with risk number one. I am going to discriminate against women in hiring. And I think anyone with two brain cells to rub together is going to do the same thing.

Complaints about employment discrimination are bothersome, but routine. The EEOC stays busy with thousands of such complaints, most of them bullshit. Companies I have worked for in the past considered small settlements on these cases just the cost of doing business.

Getting sued for anything involving alleged sexual offenses against a woman is bothersome, expensive, and gets your company all over social media with something like a #MeToo pinned to their company logo . When your company gets accused of sexually predatory behavior (and if you hire enough women, it will) heads will roll, investors will run for the hills and the first thing the higher ups will do is find a scapegoat to crucify. You can bet on it.

The solution is simple and easy. You take the risk on employment discrimination over being publicly stained as a rape apologist/enabler employer. You don't need to have Lena Dunham interviewing in your office to know to leave the door wide open and file 13 the application the minute it is over. In the future, all female employment prospects are Lena Dunham.

You see, when you set aside the hastags, the fake news coverage, and the pathetic spectacle of a thousand talking heads competing with each other to be the most outraged at men misbehaving, we have that old nemesis called the truth.

And the truth informs employers that the current hysteria wasn't sparked by women running down the street, bloody, dresses torn and pleading for help. The #MeToo Movement emerged out of the shadows, quiet and calculated; ghosts from decades past with Gloria Allred in tow, mugging for cameras and looking for money. And it leaves the true victims, the accused, no way to defend themselves in the arena of public opinion. The arena of public opinion believes the woman. Every goddam time.

That's what #MeToo is going to do to women. It's going to cut them down by the thousands without them ever knowing what happened. And as entertaining and comical as the hundred or so stories of arrogant, hypocritical men being marched the guillotine is, it is nothing compared to what is coming.

There is literally no way of stopping it. Nobody will have to suggest to employers, though I will as vociferously as I can, that the way to reduce risk is to reduce the presence of women.

The #MikePenceRules will be written silently into their practices. It won't, of course, prevent all women from being hired. But it means with complete certainty that there is no such thing any more as equally qualified when it comes to hiring.

Two prospective employees, one male and one female, may have near identical qualifications; identical experience, identical education, identical prospective value to a company. Identical everything, except one of them is a woman, who comes with substantially more risk.

If employers are acting in the best interest of their organizations, which is their responsibility, they will choose less exposure to risk every time they can. Untold numbers of them will find a way to hire the man.

#HardToBlameThem

None of this is really surprising. Feminism has been defined by women shooting themselves in the foot, and pressuring others to do the same for half a century. They have driven literally millions of women out of the homes they really wanted to be in, out of the futures they wanted, and into millions of dead-end, mid-level, life-sucking jobs as corporate slaves. They've convinced women that their children are better off in day care, and without fathers; that child support and alimony are preferable to an intact family.

And now, apparrently not content with fucking up women's old lives as wives and mothers, they have set their sights on fucking up their new lives as wage earners and taxpayers.

#MeToo, and most every other feminist initiative, is screaming to the world that women are dangerous and to be avoided. It's end result will be to damage and diminish what little women have left.

And women, writ large, will band together to make sure it happens, or at the very least remain silent in collusion. Absolutely stunning.

Mind you, I don't say any of this out of concern for this preponderance of the female demographic. I've no more concern for the hashtagging lot of them than I do for the likes of Harvey Weinstein and company.

I don't know how other people will handle this, but I do know my own plans. I'm making popcorn and getting ready for ruckus. This is going to be one hell of a show.

To the men who haven’t seen their kids in a long time

Robert Brockway · 25 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Christmas is upon us again so we wanted to make a short post on a problem facing men around the world.

Parental alienation can take many forms. One parent may bad mouth the other when they are alone with the children. The alienating parent may make it difficult to arrange visits, cancelling visitation at the last minute or insisting on rescheduling without reasonable notice. In its most extreme form parental alienation involves one parent preventing the other from seeing their children for long periods of time, sometimes years.

There isn’t anything we can say that will soothe the pain of parental alienation. It is criminal to keep innocent men from their children. That the state should allow (and facilitate) this makes it beyond criminal.

We know that some of our readers haven’t seen their children in years. We can’t promise you that the future will turn out the way you want it to. What we can promise is that we will not let the world forget the evil that is parental alienation. It harms parents and it harms children.

If you are with your kids then count your blessings, give them a big hug and spare a thought for the fathers who won’t get to be so lucky.

Merry Christmas from the crew at A Voice for Men. Let’s all work towards a better future.

The rush to paint men as sexual abusers

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 26 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Recently there has been a spate of accusations against men. One after another women have been speaking up, charging men with having sexually abused them, often years ago. Let's make no mistake about it, sexual abuse, rape, sexual harassment are serious matters and when a woman accuses a man of such a deed it should be taken seriously, investigated and prosecuted.

However, few of the present charges, which now seem to be in the hundreds, have been investigated. People rush to judgment about these accusations almost as soon as they are made. Oftentimes people lose their jobs and reputations without the case ever being investigated. One accusation follows another, as if it is a case of "monkey see, monkey do." While sexual abuse is wrong, this kind of piling on is also wrong. It paints a picture of men as sexual abusers and women as innocent victims.

Any woman can make such a charge against a man, knowing that the facts of the case will most likely not be investigated. They can drop their bomb and then walk away, without anybody ever questioning them. Women are seen as victims and men as victimizers. Nobody is allowed to question a woman and women don't question themselves. Few people can see themselves objectively and this applies equally to men and women. If a woman lies about a man sexually abusing her because she was rejected by him and she is now jealous of his achievements, is that not a case of a woman abusing a man? If a woman is simply mentally disturbed and acts out her disturbance by smearing a male celebrity, is that not also a case of a woman abusing a man?

Why are women allowed to make these charges without being held to account? In 1987, Tawana Brawley, a fifteen-year-old African-American girl, was found on the side of a road, naked, covered with a sack filled with human feces and racial slurs written on her body. A grand jury found that she had concocted a story that a local white sheriff and an attorney and another white man had held her captive in the woods, raped her and left her on the road. The sheriff was fired and the attorney lost his reputation as a national uproar followed with charges about racism. When it was discovered by the grand jury that she was lying, she was never charged with any crime, and though one of the men filed a law suit against her for defamation and won, she never paid a cent of what she owed.

Harvey Weinstein is accused of having a "casting couch" in his office and he has been "convicted" by the press before going through any legal process. If he offered a woman a role in a movie in exchange for sleeping with him and the woman made the choice to do so, was that abuse? Was that rape? She was not forced to sleep with him. She freely made a choice. But people don't make fine distinctions anymore. People are seen as either good are bad. Weinstein produced some good movies, and did other good things. His use of the casting couch, if true, was an abuse of power, indicating a man who was not able to or willing to seek sex with a woman in a normal manner.

There are many men like Harvey Weinstein, but there are also many women like him. Men like Weinstein may have dominated Hollywood and the government and certain other industries. However, at present women dominate the fields of education, social work and nursing. Teachers can be abusive to their young students, and teachers can have double standards in the way they treat boys and girls. At present about 2/3rds of college students are female. Is this a reflection of how boys and girls are treated in elementary school? Are girls encouraged and boys discouraged? Do female teachers view all boys as potential sexual abusers? These are questions that need to be asked.

Over the years there has been a lot of talk and writing by women about equality. Women seem to see equality in terms of society having an equal number of male and female senators and judges and doctors and soldiers. This is not equality. This is bean counting. Equality means that each gender shares equally in carrying the burdens of society and takes equal responsibility for its contribution to any conflicts between the sexes. Equality means that each gender is willing to engage in a dialogue with the other, to give and take, to be mutually respectful.

The sexes are a mirror of one another. When you look in a mirror and you smile, the mirror smiles back. If you swing your arm toward the mirror, the mirror swings back. If you frown at a mirror, the mirror frowns back. It is sort of like the Third Law of Thermodynamics. Every action has an equal counter-reaction. Each sex is equally guilty of abuse. Mass accusations of male abuse are an act of abuse themselves.

Children's literature contributes to this problem. The children's story, "Little Red Riding Hood," portrays men as wolves and predators. A famous nursery rhyme says, "girls are full of sugar and spice and everything nice," while boy are "snails and puppy-dog tails." From the beginning there is a disparity in how the genders are viewed.

If a mother treats her son as if he is bad–if she tells him he will probably grow up to be a sexist like his dad–he will most likely grow up to be exactly what she predicted. If a mother abuses her little boy, he will grow up to abuse women. And if there are a lot of men who abuse women, these women will become mothers who abuse their sons. It is easy to blame others and to deny one's own flaws. Confucius once said, "I have yet to meet a man who can point the finger to himself." He might have added, "or woman."

If you look hard enough, you can find something bad in anyone. If women look for sexual abuse, they'll find sexual abuse. If they look at men with respect, they might find something else.

Feminism and ‘gender narcissism’

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 29 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Named after the mythological figure Narcissus who saw his reflection in a pool of water and fell in love with himself, the modern concept of the ‘narcissistic personality’ is familiar to most of us. We see it in both men and women in varying degrees, and in the worst cases we call them Narcissistic Personality Disorders.

Most instruments designed to test people’s score on narcissism scales tend to rate males (as a group) as more narcissistic than females. Yet intuitively most impartial observers would rate women as equally if not more narcissistic than males.

Why do we get these skewed findings; is it really a fact that males are more narcissistic than females, or might it be that the instruments and thier factor structures are biased in favour of finding male-preferred expressions of narcissism?

Whatever the case it’s an anomaly worth exploring, and one psychoanalyst has added a theory of narcissism that might help to broaden the conversation. Gerald Schoenewolf proposed an alternative called Gender Narcissism (article below), a gender neutral construct that brings a female profile of narcissism more sharply into focus. Explored through the lens of psychoanalytic concepts the hypothesis of female gender narcissism resonates with insights from the men’s movement, and we can only hope future researchers begin to study it along with other expressions of female narcissism (the posture of ‘victim narcissism’ for example) and incorporate them into the testing instruments.

The following essay was published in 2010, and is republished here with permission of the author. – PW

General Characteristics of Gender Narcissism

Although I had written previously about gender narcissism (1989, 1991),* I had not systematically studied the topic. In reexamining the psychoanalytic literature and reviewing the histories and psychodynamics of a group of gender-narcissistic patients, I was able to corroborate the basic theories of classical psychoanalysis, including the much-debated theories of female development, as well as delineate the characteristics and manifestations of gender narcissism.

In selecting patients for the study, I looked for the following features:

1) Inferiority/superiority feelings about one’s gender;
2) Excessive concern about one’s genitals;
3) Envy of or disgust toward the genitals of opposite sex;
4) Resentment of one’s gender role and envy of the role of the opposite sex;
5) Bitterness about feeling castrated or cheated (females), or rage about feeling psychologically castrated (males);
6) Fears of castration (males) or annihilation (females);
7) Oedipal guilt;
8) Idealization (grandiosity) about one’s own gender and devaluation of opposite gender;
9) Idealization of mothers and devaluation of fathers.

One of the first things I noticed, upon selecting 30 patients for the study—16 males and 14 females—was a link between gender narcissism and sexual psychopathology. All 30 reported severe problems in their sexual relationships.

In contrast, those 20 patients selected at random for the control group (10 males and 10 females) reported fewer sexual problems and showed much less gender narcissism. Among this second group were cases whose narcissistic issues generally revolved not around gender but other issues such as intelligence, height, or basic self-worth.

Female Narcissism

All of the 14 females in the study voiced resentments about being female, about the female role, or about their female reproductive organs, which I traced to castration and masculinity complexes. In contrast, the control group of females expressed considerably less resentment about gender issues.

Typically, gender-narcissistic females would complain that their femininity was a “handicap,” the role of wife and mother was “demeaning,” and their reproductive organs were “disgusting” or “a monthly pain.” One borderline stated angrily about her genitals: “I wish I could just have them cut out of me and be done with it.”These negative attitudes had apparently been introjected from their parents. If their mothers had harbored similar feelings of resentment about their femininity, these attitudes were passed along to the daughter through verbal and nonverbal messages (i.e., devaluing the daughter’s looks, discouraging her sexual curiosity or masturbation, bemoaning femininity and the feminine role, or favoring a son over the daughter). The daughters then unconsciously devalued their own femininity but did not blame it on their mothers, with whom they were too attached, but on their fathers, who were often passive or distant. All maintained intense relationships with their mothers, more intense than with any other person.

They reported a generalized anger about what they saw as “men’s attitudes toward them,” which contrasted with the more positive reports about relations with men of women in the control group. Some of the former made no distinctions between “good” and “bad” men, while others, utilizing the defense mechanism of splitting, saw some men, generally heterosexual men, as all-bad (inherently sexist) and some men, generally homosexual men, as all-good (nonsexist). At the same time, they generally idealized women, citing their moral superiority. I interpreted this as their projecting negative judgments about their femininity onto men while erecting a narcissistic armor of female grandiosity. Many gender-narcissistic women made men the scapegoats for their inner conflicts about their femininity, vocalizing sentiments that have become common among militant feminist circles such as, “Men are the cause of all the problems of women.” Thus, they were competitive with men, rather than cooperative, wielding the attitude expressed in the song lyric, “I can do anything better than you can.”

Five of the gender-narcissistic females were homosexual, three were bisexual, two were heterosexual, two were prostitutes, one was a strip-teaser, and one was abstinent. All maintained intense friendships with women. In contrast, all of the females in the control group were heterosexual. The former tended to have relationships of the narcissistic varieties described by Kohut (1971)—idealizing or twinship models. Either a younger woman would idealize an older one, particularly her aggressive femininity, and thus feel special by being close to her, and have the experience of being initiated by her into the realm of womanhood; or two women of equal age would idealize one another and feel as though they were two superior and special women (in particular, superior to men). There was often a vengefulness in their exclusion of men from their intimate lives (one noted that she had fantasies of her father jealously and angrily watching her make love to another woman), and a resentment of traditional women who were openly receptive to men and to the roles of wife and mother. I had the sense that since they were prevented by their mothers from bonding with their fathers and men, they did not want any other women to do so.

Those who had sexual relations with men often chose passive men whom they could control, only to complain about their passivity. I interpreted this as a way of reversing roles and enacting resentments stemming from their castration and masculinity complexes. If they had lesbian relationships, each could likewise act out her masculinity complex, one by playing the masculine role and the other by identifying with the one who was playing it. Their sexuality, whether oral or manual, consisted primarily of mutual clitoral masturbation, which had the symbolic meaning of asserting their clitorises, and thereby gratifying their clitoral narcissism. This symbolism could be traced back to memories, fantasies, and dreams about discovering the differences in male and female anatomy and feeling deeply cheated and disappointed, without getting adequate soothing from either parent; of being discouraged from masturbating (hence becoming fixated in such masturbation); and of having their femininity disparaged by both parents (as when a father, feeling excluded by mother and daughter, reacted by constantly teasing the daughter about her body). There was an additional aspect of their relationships of wanting not only to exclude men but to make men feel jealous of them (left out) and show them that their penises and their masculinity were unneeded. This represented a reversal of the envy they felt toward men.

Some women could only relate to men in conditional ways. One used strip-teasing to elevate her low female self-esteem. She could show off her body while keeping men at a distance, thereby asserting her femininity and receiving affirmation from men while acting out rage by emotionally castrating them. This vocation also represented an act of spite at her mother, who had called her a “slut” whenever, as a child, she had made infantile sexual overtures to her father. Prostitution served a similar purpose for two females, enabling them to make men pay for sexual services while emotionally rejecting them. Another woman, whose religious views prevented her from being lesbian, acted out her penis envy and female grandiosity by retreating from sexual relations entirely, rationalizing that it was a “dirty business” and she was above it all. A therapist by profession, she worked primarily with younger women, whose complaints about their husbands served to reinforce her rationalization for remaining abstinent. Invariably, she would encourage her patients to leave marriages rather than try to resolve them.

All female narcissists voiced sentiments of penis envy, while only three of 10 control cases did so. Penis envy could be deduced from a resentment of men, envy of their roles, and revulsion toward penises. Penises were seen not as attractive objects of pleasure and procreation, but as unattractive and frightening. One obsessive-compulsive had an obsessive fear of men’s penises and of rape that took the form of agoraphobia. Along with this penis envy was an accompanying aversion to playing the traditional female role of giving birth to and nurturing children. This role was seen as making them subservient to a man, of forcing them to be penetrated by “his arrogant cock,” to bear and nurture “his” children, which would symbolically mean submitting to their fathers and competing with their mothers. Any such thoughts aroused primitive fears of maternal annihilation.

Gender-narcissistic females also generally had more painful menstruations. Twelve of 14 reported severe cramps and/or headaches accompanied by feelings of resentment about their femininity. The severe menstruations were related to their resentment about playing the female role of giving birth and nurturing “his” children. Only four of the ten control cases reported menstrual pain, and only occasionally. I interpreted severe menstrual problems as a somatization of gender narcissism.

Whatever their sexual orientations, all had histories that matched the profile described by Freud and others with regard to the development of castration and Oedipus complexes. Their mothers had bound them to themselves and prevented them from forming relationships with their fathers or other men. Sometimes these mothers were overly affectionate, so that there was an undertone of incest in their relationships with their daughters.

Sometimes they were anxiously protective, masking an underlying animosity and competitiveness (the result, perhaps, of their own unresolved Oedipus complexes). Sometimes they were openly hostile or competitive. Invariably they were controlling of their husbands and their daughters. When fathers were in the picture, they were generally passive men or hostile. When the girls turned to Father (or surrogate) during the oedipal phase, Mother, through verbal or nonverbal cues, interrupted that turn. Mothers would draw the daughter to themselves and confide in them about problems with Father (“All men care about is using you for sex.”) Father would retreat passively or angrily from the field of competition, yielding to Mother. Hence, there was an unspoken barrier between Father and daughter. The daughters would end up despising the fathers for allowing this to happen, while repressing their anger at their mothers (sometimes developing reaction formations). I note here that a number of feminist psychologists have stressed that separation from mother is not necessary, even harmful (see Gilligan, 1982), a position with which I strongly disagree.

In a many cases siblings figured into the equation. An older or younger brother would be favored by one or the other parent. He would, of course, have an organ that the girl did not have, and he would be given favored treatment. If he was older and he was competitive and rejecting of her, she might then grow up hating him and displacing that hatred on men in general. If he was younger, she would feel resentful that he had taken her mother’s attention away, and conclude that it was because he was a male and had an organ she did not have.

Nearly all of the gender-narcissistic females either had rejected entirely the role of motherhood and opted instead for a career, or had waited until after they had established a career to have children. Their resentment of the motherhood role was transformed into an obsession with “equality” in their relationship with their husband, and a demand that he share in the childrearing. In the case of lesbians, one woman usually played the masculine role and the other the feminine role. The one who played the feminine role did not resent nurturing a child since she was not doing it for a man but for a woman (symbolic of Mother).

In their relationships with me, father, mother, and sometimes sibling transferences were prominent. The mother transference was evident in their fear of being controlled by me. The father transference was demonstrated in an extreme ambivalence toward me as a sexual object. One day they might be seductive, the next they would eye me in a fearful way. Upon analysis, they often admitted that they feared that I was going to use or rape them. Their ambivalence had to do with alternatively wanting to submit to the rape (and get it over with) or to repel it. It was difficult for them to conceive of a warm, trusting relationship with a man. This was related to a deep, infantile craving to bond with Father and equally deep fears of incest, maternal annihilation, and their own repressed animosity. When talking about their histories, it was much easier for them to talk of their anger at their fathers than at their mothers. They had a need to idealize their mothers (harking to fixations during the rapprochement stage), whom they felt they would be betraying by opening up to a male therapist. Many would struggle with all of this and be overwhelmed; then one day they would disappear.

Their female narcissism had the two components found in all narcissism—grandiosity and rage. In working with them, I had to be very careful to serve as a self object, mirroring and joining them with regard to their idealization of their own femininity and their feeling that they were victims of male oppression. If I said or did anything to the contrary, it would arouse the deepest wellsprings of rage and bitterness. I would suddenly find myself in the “enemy camp” and unable to dig my way out of it. In that case, the patient might quit therapy in a huff, castigate me, or threaten to report me for violation of ethics, sexism, harassment, etc. My few successful cases involved women with a lesser degree of gender-narcissism. Generally gender-narcissistic females avoid male therapists and instead look for female therapists who suffer from a similar gender narcissism to whom they can form collusions.

*Schoenewolf, G. (1989). Sexual Animosity Between Men and Women. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson. (1991). The Art of Hating. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.

Source:

Above essay from: Schoenewolf, G., Gender Narcissism, chapter 4 in Psychoanalytic Centrism: Collected Papers of a Neo-Classical Psychoanalyst, published by CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform (2012)

#MeToo hysteria and the virtue signalling of Young, Paglia, and Sommers

Janice Fiamengo · 30 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In the following video Janice Fiamengo tackles the #MeToo sexual assault hysteria currently sweeping the Western world, along with the virtue-signalling of people like Christina Hoff-Sommers, Camille Paglia, and Cathy Young who have been quick to throw men under the guilt-bus.

When the #MeToo scandal began to expose not only the men accused of sexual misconduct, but also women who had not 'spoken up' about it soon enough, the chattering elite were pressured to signal their proverbial virtue. Sommers, Paglia and Young quickly rose to the podium to wag a finger at the alleged perpetrators and the alleged culture of male sexual deviancy as if it were an unassailable, proven fact.

With the hysteria and virtue signalling climbing to a fevered pitch, Janice Fiamengo proposes that #iDontBelieve should provide a rational and counterbalancing trend for 2018

Relational Aggression: Is it a trap for men?

Tom Golden · 9 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A gynocentric world is a dangerous place for men. The hazards are many including traps that are simply beyond the awareness of most. Relational aggression is one of those traps. Most of us are aware of the physical violence of many women and the cultures disinterest in holding women accountable but this is different. Relational aggression is more insidious due to its invisibility and the encouragement from the culture at large. Let's have a look at this trap called relational aggression.

We have spent nearly 50 years warning women about men's physical aggression. We've created laws, built institutions and flooded the media in efforts to protect women. In the process we have been told repeatedly that this is not just a problem of a few men who are out of control but instead is a problem of all men and their masculinity. This is Crazy stuff.

All the while there has been a muffled silence about women's aggression. Some has trickled through like a bit of attention on mean girls but the reality and lethality of women's aggression has rarely leaked into the media. The sad news is that women's aggression is really a trap for men. Being aware of the trap may help you navigate and steer clear.

With that background let's have a good look at women's relational aggression, how it works, where it starts and the dangers and traps that men face as a result. We will also spend a little time in looking at how this form of aggression impacts nearly all men's issues and importantly how feminism is literally based on this form of aggression but is never called out for it.

Let's get started.

Relational aggression starts early. The youngest female researchers have identified practicing relational aggression was 2.5 years old. But what is this thing called relational aggression?

The best definition I have seen calls it "Bullying without physical violence." That sums it up pretty well. Researchers define it something like this:

> Behaviors that harm others through damage (or threat of damage) to relationships. "

They go on to talk about how relational aggression is meant to destroy feelings of acceptance, friendship, or group inclusion. Basically attacking someone's identity and trying your best to hurt them without being violent.

How is this accomplished? Well through excluding, ignoring, teasing, gossiping, secrets, backstabbing, lies, false accusations, rumor spreading and hostile body language (i.e., eye-rolling and smirking).

These may sound more tame than physical aggression but think about it. How many suicides have you heard about that were due to someone getting beat up repeatedly? Maybe a few. But then think about how many suicides you have heard about from people being ostracized or shamed by groups? I have heard more of those and I am betting you have too.

So this stuff is lethal. It may sound harmless but that is simply not the case. It can lead to very serious consequences including what is being called 3rd party abuse which is when relational aggression tricks authorities into unwittingly continuing the abuse.

Relational aggression is also stealth. With physical aggression you leave bruises, scars, or broken bones. These things can be seen. People gasp when they see them. But how about relational aggression? You can't see it. It Is basically invisible. If that wasn't bad enough, the invisibility also makes it very difficult to challenge. Try proving someone gossiped and spread lies about you. Try disproving a false accusation. Both nearly impossible but both potentially lethal. This leaves relational violence a stealth tool that is so easy to deny. “Who me? I didn’t do anything, why are YOU so upset about nothing?” And of course gynocentrism plays its ugly part in all this in protecting the lying female making matters worse still.

This is not to say that there are no physically violent women. There are. The research has found some interesting things about violent women. It seems that those women who are physically aggressive and men who are relationally aggressive have been found to have more psychological pathological than their counterparts. So be on the lookout for relationally aggressive men and physically aggressive women. Danger Will Robinson. Danger!

Some are seeing that one precursor for relational aggression is what they are calling “hostility attribution bias.” Basically this means that the person assumes wrongly that a hostile act has occurred and wrongly assume it was directed towards them. Say a young girl sees two friends whispering and wrongly assumes it is about her. She is a experiencing hostility attribution bias and this apparently occurs more with girls and women in relationships.

How many times as a man have I heard something from a woman claiming that I thought a certain way or did something for a certain reason. I know it is completely false but she is beyond convinced that she is right and I am lying. This ever happened to you? I bet it has, repeatedly. The researchers are saying that sometimes it is this hostility attribution bias that stimulates the relational aggression. Makes sense to me and it gives us a clue about how to defend ourselves. Beware of the hostility attribution bias. This is a red hot danger sign. Run if you can.

One researcher, Nicki Crick, studied young boys and girls and found some very interesting results. She noted that 15.6% of the young boys used physical aggression but only .4% of the girls. She also found that 17.4% of the girls used relational aggression and only 2% of the boys. Crick totaled these and realized that the boys and girls were equally aggressive, they just had different paths to get there. The boys were more physical, the girls more relational. More and more of recent research is working to measure both relational aggression and physical aggression but you still don’t hear much about that in the media.

[image]
One might assume that if boys and girls have similar levels of aggression that you would find that the culture would address both. Right? Wrong. Our gynocentric culture perseverates on the aggression of males and ignores and even promotes the relational aggression. Men’s violence is seen as atrocious and wicked and women’s relational aggression is ignored.

One indicator of this bias was shown by researchers when they studied the animated films of Disney. What did they find? They found that 100% of the animated Disney films contained relational aggression and specifically found that the average was 11 relationally aggressive acts per hour. That’s an act every 6 minutes or so. The relational aggression was often portrayed as justified and shown to have few negative consequences. The worst news is that such aggression was often portrayed by female characters who were attractive, rich, and popular.

The media is literally training our young girls that it is okay to be relationally aggressive, in fact it is what rich, attractive, and popular girls do. There are no calls of concern from parents or teachers to stop this. I hope you are getting a picture of how dangerous this is for men and boys.

The trend for girls to be more relationally aggressive than boys continues into adolescence and beyond. There is some evidence that men start using more relational aggression as they get older but I think the accepted idea is that women are more likely to use relational aggression. It does make one wonder why.

Why Relational Aggression?

The evolutionary psychologists have some ideas about that. They say that men for eons have had to aggressively compete with other men in order to seek reproductive access, in other words, get the girl. In doing this they would form hierarchies not unlike other primate males who physically compete for alpha status. The higher your status in the hierarchy the more likely you get the top female. Men became accustomed to competing with their fellows and taking their place within a hierarchy of winners and losers and all those in between. Women on the other hand didn't have the same need to aggressively compete for a mate. She was a chooser not a competitor. Instead women needed a community to aid her while she was dependent due to being pregnant and raising children. This pushed women to not compete, but to strive to be an accepted part of the group. If a woman tried to elevate herself above the others in her group she was seen as an outlier, someone who was betraying the group by trying to make themselves appear above the others and this was discouraged or even punished. So the idea was to only be aggressive if it was stealth and could be easily denied. This insured their place in the group.

Present day psychologists see this tendency in the workforce where if a woman appears to be succeeding and doing better than the other women at the office she is often subject to relationally aggressive attacks by the other females. Gossip, finger pointing, rumours, lies etc. This hides their aggressiveness since open aggression would be seen as counter to the group cohesiveness. Making the attacks quiet keeps the group stable. She doesn't sacrifice her group inclusion.

Researchers have found that Women's in-group preference, that is an automatic preference for their own gender is over four times as important as a male's in-group preference is for him. Women depend on other women and are reluctant to risk exclusion.

Another example of women being dependent upon the group is the recent understanding of how women heal from loss and stress. Shelly Taylor's research found that women, when stressed, move towards interaction and other people. Women depend on others, mostly other women, to aid in their healing unlike men who tend to heal through action, or inaction on their own. This makes a women's group of friends important to her for her own healing and offers us more reasons why she would not want to appear overtly aggressive and risk being excluded.

This actually explains something I saw in a research study years ago. The study had men and women playing a computer war game. The subjects were to decide how much to bomb the opponents. Under most conditions the women bombed far less than the men, but in one condition they bombed as much or more than the men. That was when others could not see how much the women were bombing! As long as no one could see, it was bombs away! The researchers were puzzled but Again, this seems to show the female preference for relational aggression that can be hidden and easily denied.

Men's Issues

So how does relational aggression play out in men's issues? Simple. It is embedded in just about all of it. Think about divorce and parental alienation. What an alienating mother does to the child is all relational aggression. She is telling lies to the child about the father, she is attempting to use those lies to hurt the father. This is relational aggression. And it is obviously lethal.

Think about false accusations. Falsely accusing a man of rape is straight up relational aggression. It is lying with the intent to cause pain.

Both cases, the Parental Alienation and the false accusation show us something important. The lies that are used are very difficult to disprove and are very easily denied. If the father or the falsely accused man challenges the woman it is simple for her to deny and blow it off. If it ever gets to the point of her needing to admit she did this she can then say, "I didn't mean to hurt anyone." It is nearly impossible to disprove a false accusation. And keep in mind in both of these instances it is likely the authorities will get involved and become a tag team with 3rd party abuse.

Think of domestic violence. The feminists have maintained for decades that domestic violence is all about violent men beating innocent women. But is that really the truth? There are likely a small minority of couples where the husband is a sociopath and the feminist version is close to being correct but I think those situations are very rare. Research has shown us that most domestic violence is reciprocal. That is, both parties are involved in the altercations. So how did they get to the point where the man would hit her? It doesn't take much creativity to realize that she likely used relational aggression of some sort that lit his fuse and eventually moved into their violent interchange. [image]It's a very good guess that she is using her relational aggression skills to create as much pain in him as she can and then he blows his top and the feminist oligarchy comes in and ignores her part in igniting the fuse and only focuses on his overt violence. Then the entire 3rd party abuse Duluth treatment regime takes over and officially sees him as the problem and her as the victim. That is insane.

It wasn't always like that. When I worked at a mental health center in the 1970's we were trying to help female victims of DV. At that time the feminists did not have a stranglehold over the services like they do now. There were competing voices. One of those competing voices was those doing family therapy. They believed that in the majority of cases (excluding the sociopaths) that what was needed was to help the couple with conflict resolution. This of course really pissed off the feminists since it negated their idea of bad man victim woman. A huge fight ensued between the two groups and as you can imagine the feminists won. Who knows what sorts of relational aggression they used to get their way. They needed to be sure that their basic assumption of men bad women victim was not tarnished or given a secondary place. Thus the feminists submarined any kind of attention that might have been paid to the woman's side of the problem. Only men were the bad guys.

Feminism is Relational Aggression, They are the mean girls.

Where did that come from? Think back to the hostility attribution bias. Remember that? When you wrongly assume intent? The whole of feminism has a massive hostility attribution bias in their assumptions that men are the root of their problem. They blame men. Individuals misinterpret single interactions while groups like feminism misinterpret huge swaths of reality. The feminists have misinterpreted men's providing and protecting of women for ages as being the oppression of women. That's hostility attribution bias on steroids. Somehow they have convinced nearly everyone that this falsehood is the truth. Of course it is not and it is merely a mistaken assumption but in this case it is a deadly one.

Feminists start by swallowing a huge hostility attribution bias but they go much farther. In so many ways feminists act like mean girls. Don't disagree with a mean girl, if you do you will pay a huge price. Same thing with feminism. Try disagreeing with a feminist and see what happens. Mean girls. Feminists bully by relational aggression. They have been telling lies and spreading rumors about men for decades and everyone assumes they are being honest. That's Relational aggression. They threaten their own members with exclusion if they don't follow the exact party line much like the mean girls do. They bully. They use the same exclusionary threats with legislators when they demand their bills are passed or else they will exclude them and label them as misogynists. Our cowardly legislators have been unable to rise above the bullying and the open blackmailing and this has left us with laws that are written by bullies with a huge bias.

[image]Mean girls know they lie, and so do feminists. But they also lie about lying. Take false accusations as an example. The false accusation itself is purely relational aggression. It is a lie told that is meant to hurt. But the mean girl feminists add on to that. They lie that women never lie. This entire idea of forcing everyone to always believe the woman no matter what, is actually a relational aggression since it is simply a lie on top of another lie. I mean really. Could these people really believe that women never lie? They don't, but they are willing to lie in order to get their way, just like the mean girls.

In the end it is all about power and control. The two very things they accuse domestic violence abusers of doing. Mean girls demand power and control and so do feminists. I think it is time we started to call feminists mean girls, and point out their relational aggressiveness every time we see it.

We need to do the same thing with the women in our lives whether it is our spouses, sisters, mothers or whoever. We need to keep our eyes peeled for hostile attribution bias and for relational aggression and call them out when we see them. Most importantly we need to maintain our cool and calmness as we confront. Speak the truth and don't back down. Remember the relational violence is intended to get you upset and pissed off. Don't let it. Your upset WILL be used against you. Calmness will help you turn the tables. If you disallow them to piss you off it will likely backfire and instead they will be the ones to blow.

So guys I hope you are seeing that relational aggression leaves men in a very vulnerable state. Women are literally encouraged to practice this stuff at your expense and the expense of your children. Use caution and keep in mind that men are good, as are you.

*This article also published as a video talk. If you like Tom's work please consider supporting him at Patreon.

Dr. Hadar Waldman of Los Angeles, CA, Known Genital Mutilator

Gary Costanza · 13 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Hadar Waldman of Los Angeles, CA has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

She practices as an Ob/Gyn at Century City Women's Health and as a sideline uses her skills to ritually vivisect and mutilate baby boys' genitals.

Here's an excerpt from an article about how the "Doctor Steps Up to Keep the Religion in Circumcision:"

> When she became a physician, Hadar Waldman expected to improve the quality of people's lives — but she never expected religion to be part of that equation.
>
> Then she became a mohel or, more precisely, a mohelet — joining a rarified group of American physicians certified in Jewish ritual circumcision.
>
> At 42, Waldman specializes in obstetrics and gynecology and has a private practice in Century City. Born in Israel, she bopped around the United States to accommodate her father's work as a doctor, living in Atlanta, Baltimore and Cincinnati, before landing in New York to attend a pre-med program at Columbia University. She describes herself as "your typical Israeli-American Southern New Yorker with Midwestern roots."
>
> After graduating from Sackler School of Medicine in 2006, she began her residency at Staten Island University Hospital, where she performed routine circumcisions on newborn boys.
>
> "Today 60 to 70 percent of the American population is circumcised," Waldman said. "People who are not Jewish circumcise their babies all the time."
>
> Non-Jewish couples would cite cultural or cosmetic reasons for wanting the procedure. Most Jews, on the other hand, especially the large Orthodox clientele at Staten Island, preferred the traditional circumcision — a brit milah with a mohel. So it wasn't until Waldman moved to the West Coast and started her own practice that she noticed how many secular Jews were choosing hospital circumcisions and forgoing the Jewish ritual entirely.
>
> "I became aware that a lot of my Jewish patients were opting out of brit milah ceremonies because they preferred a doctor to perform the circumcision in a hospital, which they perceived to be a safer environment," Waldman said. "Over time, this troubled me because I saw it as missed opportunity. Too many boys were not entering the covenant of Judaism."
>
> Last August, Waldman performed her first ritual circumcision. "The way I do it is as compassionate as possible," she said, noting the cultural debate over genital mutilation. "I do believe in using local anesthesia, a small amount of lidocaine locally, and I give the baby a sugar water solution to comfort him as much as possible."
>
> She has since performed an additional six ritual circumcisions for local Jewish families. "There was a true need in the community for someone who was a physician and a surgeon, and also a woman and a mother."
>
> Waldman said being a mother of two has attuned her to the emotional experience of a fraught religious rite. "First-time parents in particular find the whole birth process very overwhelming, and I felt like the brit milah was really no different," Waldman said. "I am skilled in being able to calm parents. As a doctor, I can prepare my patients for uncertainties; and as a mother, I understand their fears."
>
> Waldman said she also has been affected by serving as a shaliach, or emissary, for the sacred ritual.
>
> "I never thought of circumcision as emotional or spiritual when I did the surgical procedure in the hospital, but seeing the emotional reaction of these families has been really rewarding."

What about your oath to "First, Do No Harm" in the absence of any disease? And to claim you are "as compassionate as possible" while harming innocent babies and ruining their future sex lives is just outrageous.

And if the first mutilation isn't acceptable she will do it again – hopefully with consent this time – with a Hatafat Dam Brit.

From reformjudaism.org, we see that Dr. Waldman and other ritual circumcision advocates claim to take a stand against sexual violence and advocate for reproductive/women's rights, civil rights, and religious freedom.

Ha ha ha ha ha!

Yes, you read that right. People who strap down innocent, unconsenting babies and sexually and physically assault them with a knife want you to believe they are civil rights champions and are against sexual assault. Male genital mutilation is all of those, and what they mean by "religious freedom" is an attempt to justify the mutilation of babies without medical necessity.

From the same website, we see that these pro-circumcision advocates have noticed the human, intactivist, and men's rights movements:

> Reform Judaism has done away with a number of ritual observances that conflict with our contemporary cultural and aesthetic sensibilities. And it is difficult to imagine any ceremony that stands more at odds with the views and habits of modern civilization than berit milah, ritual circumcision. Critics of the procedure, including a not-insignificant number of Jews, condemn it as a gruesome and dangerous procedure, some calling it "genital mutilation." Many would add that a ritual from which females are naturally excluded calls into question our Reform Jewish commitment to gender equality.

They then try to explain how this "ancient tribal rite" belongs in modern civilized society:

> The question remains, however: why do we Reform Jews, who do not hesitate to remove outdated prayers from our siddur (prayer book) and to excise archaic ceremonies from our practice, insist upon maintaining an ancient tribal rite taught to us in Genesis?
>
> I think that the answer to these questions lies largely in the words "ancient tribal rite." For that's what berit milah is. That's why we do it, and, really, it's the only reason we do it.
>
> Of course, we don't customarily explain our ritual observances as "tribal rites." This is partly because the word "tribal" sounds so, well, tribal, jarring to our modern, sophisticated ears. It's also because we Jews have a long history of seeking ta`amei hamitzvot, "explanations for the mitzvot" that reflect the higher intellectual and cultural temper of the present age rather than the original ("tribal") background of those practices.
>
> Berit milah is our classic ceremonial acknowledgment that we, descendants of Abraham, consider ourselves a community set apart from all others and set aside in covenant with God. That is the story we have always told, and continue to tell, about ourselves. To assert our sense of particular Jewish identity as Jews is therefore in and of itself a mitzvah of the first rank. And of all the ritual practices by which we have historically made that declaration, none is more physical, more visceral, or more tangible than berit milah.
>
> In an era when the forces of cultural assimilation pose such a daunting challenge to our continued existence as a distinct people, this admittedly ancient tribal custom bears a message that we do well to hear.

No amount of chicanery can justify harming children. Unnecessary surgical amputation or mutilation of a baby's genitals, male or female, is wrong for any reason other than medical necessity.

I'm unconvinced that genital mutilation is ethical or legal for religious or medical reasons, and quite the contrary is a human rights violation against unconsenting infants.

Here is their take on circumcision, where you'll find the revolting piece "Why You Should Say Yes to Circumcision" by another "Known Genital Mutilator," Dorothy F Greenbaum.

Also, see the "Benefits of Circumcision" FB page if you can stomach it, for the last gasps of a dying breed of pro-circ fanatics.

Since Dr. Waldman condones the indiscriminate practice of routine circumcision and has no concern about informing parents about the harm and possible risks involved, including death, you can read about that information here and watch informative videos at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Waldman's practice information follows:

Century City Women's Health
10309 Santa Monica Blvd Ste 300
Los Angeles, CA 90025

Phone(310) 556-1427
Fax Number(310) 282-8567

> Dr. Hadar Waldman of Los Angeles, CA, Known Genital Mutilator https://t.co/BAEIOGqEG4 #MGM #circumcision pic.twitter.com/Pi5IwPJJtt
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) January 13, 2018

Can women be chivalrous? Damn right they can.

Peter Wright · 16 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Is chivalry attractive to most women? According to a recent study the answer is, unsurprisingly, yes.

A 2013 study on benevolent sexism by Matthew D. Hammond of the University of Auckland[1] found that a high sense of entitlement disposes women to endorse chivalric customs, for example that women need to be protected, cared for and pampered by males.

Hammond and his colleagues had more than 4,400 men and women complete psychological evaluations to measure their sense of entitlement and adherence to sexist beliefs about women. The beliefs included statements such as, "Women should be cherished and protected by men" and "Women, compared to men, tend to have a superior moral sensibility."[2] This group of individuals was tested again one year later. The researchers found a sense of entitlement in women was associated with stronger endorsement of benevolent sexism. Women who believed they deserved more out of life (and who likely received more out of life) were more likely to endorse benevolent sexist beliefs and their adherence to these beliefs increased over time. The association between a sense of entitlement in men and endorsement of benevolent sexism was weak, by contrast, and did not increase over time.

These findings provide evidence that female-benefiting sexism practiced by women is responsible for sexist attitudes toward their own gender, as well as toward men — attitudes which contribute more broadly to the maintenance of gender stereotypes and inequality on both sides of the fence.

The relationship between narcissism and chivalry

In the study female narcissistic attitudes are underlined as the motivation to garner resource-attainments and self-enhancements via the generosity of male chivalry. Some of the core features of narcissism include an inflated sense of self-worth; need for praise, admiration, and social status; an undeserved sense of entitlement; a sense that one deserves nice things; and a belief in one's superior intelligence and beauty – all without a commensurate level of validity or deservedness.

A woman (or man) with narcissistic disposition seeks to gain status and resources by fair means or foul, including by charm, feigning confidence, and an energetic approach to social interactions. She will take personal responsibility for all successes that come her way, while attributing all personal failures to external sources – most likely men. Narcissistic traits ensure that the individual will act selfishly to secure material gains even when it means exploiting others, and those practicing benevolent sexism tend to encourage such behaviour. According to the authors:

> "Benevolent sexism facilitates the capacity to gain material resources and complements feelings of deservingness by promoting a structure of intimate relationships in which men use their access to social power and status to provide for women (Chen et al., 2009). Second, benevolent sexism reinforces beliefs of superiority by expressing praise and reverence of women, emphasizing qualities of purity, morality, and culture which make women the "fairer sex." Indeed, identifying with these kinds of gender-related beliefs (e.g., women are warm) fosters a more positive self-concept (Rudman, Greenwald, & McGhee, 2001).
>
> Moreover, for women higher in psychological entitlement, benevolent sexism legitimizes a self-centric approach to relationships by emphasizing women's special status within the intimate domain and men's responsibilities of providing and caring for women. Such care involves everyday chivalrous behaviors, such as paying on a first date and opening doors for women (Sarlet et al., 2012; Viki et al., 2003), to more overarching prescriptions for men's behavior toward women, such as being "willing to sacrifice their own well-being" to provide for women and to ensure women's happiness by placing her "on a pedestal" (Ambivalent Sexism Inventory; Glick & Fiske, 1996)…
>
> In contrast to the overt benefits that benevolent sexism promises women, men's endorsement of benevolent > sexism reflects making sacrifices for women by relinquishing power in the relationship domain and providing for and protecting their partners (Glick & Fiske, 1996). Moreover, although benevolent sexism portrays men as "gallant protectors" (Glick & Fiske, 2001), it does not emphasize men's superiority over women or cast men as deserving of praise and provision." [3]

Judging by the above study we can conclude that women's expectation of chivalric treatment has altered little over the course of the last 800 years since chivalric responsibilities were first instituted. For example we can take the voices of two women from history who give a traditional voice to the findings of the study; the first is by female author Lucrezia Marinella who in 1600 wrote:

> "Women are honored everywhere with the use of ornaments that greatly surpass men's, as can be observed. It is a marvelous sight in our city to see the wife of a shoemaker or butcher or even a porter all dressed up with gold chains round her neck, with pearls and valuable rings on her fingers, accompanied by a pair of women on either side to assist her and give her a hand, and then, by contrast, to see her husband cutting up meat all soiled with ox's blood and down at heel, or loaded up like a beast of burden dressed in rough cloth, as porters are. At first it may seem an astonishing anomaly to see the wife dressed like a lady and the husband so basely that he often appears to be her servant or butler, but if we consider the matter properly, we find it reasonable because it is necessary for a woman, even if she is humble and low, to be ornamented in this way because of her natural dignity and excellence, and for the man to be less so, like a servant or beast born to serve her."

Or from another woman Modesta Pozzo who wrote this in 1590:

> "For don't we see that men's rightful task is to go out to work and wear themselves out trying to accumulate wealth, as though they were our factors or stewards, so that we can remain at home like the lady of the house directing their work and enjoying the profit of their labors? That, if you like, is the reason why men are naturally stronger and more robust than us — they need to be, so they can put up with the hard labor they must endure in our service.

Chivalry today continues to be understood as a male obligation toward female beneficiaries. In the past however it appears there were some exceptions showing that the attribution "chivalry" could be applied equally to any women who demonstrated it. From a search of published literature several examples of female chivalry do appear, such as the following with dates and search-terms in bold/italics:

Female chivalry

1792 "Mr. Burke remarked, that however the spirit of chivalry may be in the decline amongst men, the age of female chivalry was just commencing."

1918 "Spenser, following Ariosto, laments the decay of female chivalry since the days of Penthesilia, Deborah, and Camilla."

1938 "This tendency among women of making concessions to men for their inferior moral strength I would like to term "female chivalry." It is chivalry in the strictest sense of the term because it makes concessions for the weakness of the opposite side. In a society which is so primitive that its women have not yet developed in their conduct with men this moral chivalry, no doubt the woman is an inferior and subordinate member, an object of masculine pity. But the moment she brings into play upon the field of our social behaviour her superior moral strength (manifested through the developments of her inherent powers of sacrifice, endurance and self-discipline) she not only qualifies herself for equality of treatment but records a moral victory of first magnitude over the opposite sex."

Woman's chivalry

1847 "It may be, too, that such pursuits belong to woman's chivalry, in which she accomplishes tender victories, and with silken cords leads into bondage the stouter heart of man. Happy triumph: in which there is equal delight to the victor and the vanquished."

1924 "There are poems of the human soul cut off from God by its loveleasness — the hell of separation of the finite self from the infinite; poems of the "white flame" of a greater love; woman's chivalry towards woman ; woman's chivalry towards man: and in the end, peace."

1936 "Neuilly, but something — perhaps a woman's chivalry to another woman — prevented her from doing it."

Chivalric female

1864 "The order of Sisters of Charity, therefore, as constituted by St. Vincent de Paul, and whose deeds are known to the whole world, may be considered an aristocratic or chivalric female army of volunteers of charity, bound to short terms of service, but generally renewing their vows, and performing prodigies of usefulness."

Chivalrous women

1857 "It must be confessed that the spectacle of those three chivalrous women, so magnanimous in face of an evil cause… preparing to plunge into the medley of battle, instead of remaining at a distance to watch the fortune of the fray, instead too of shutting themselves up in some luxurious dwelling there to await the intelligence of the result – but armed and mounted – with martial plumes waving over their heads, fire in their eyes and decision on their lips… could have no other effect than the most inspiring one over those who beheld it."

1896 "For a lady is among other things a woman with a sense of chivalry, and a chivalrous woman uses her finer gifts to supplement the blunt honesty of her husband (if she is the happy possessor of an honest husband)."

1904 "The self-sacrificing chivalrous woman, with whom duty is a first consideration."

1906 "Those chivalrous Women seem to be chosen instruments for the world's betterment—all in the general economy of nature — evidence of growth which sometimes takes us by surprise and makes us sit up and think."

1912 "Yes — women can he chivalrous! — women can live and die for a conviction! My terrible confession is made easier by your belief!"

1918 "to the free and chivalrous women of America."

1919 "they called upon the free and chivalrous women of America to make these wrongs their own and, in so far as possible, to try to redress them, and to safeguard the future of the race by standing for the independence of historic Armenia."

1920 "This mighty work of hospital redemption, now so nearly accomplished in all civilized countries, so appealed to chivalrous women that there seemed no end to the stream of incoming probationers."

Chivalric woman

1897 "We are glad to know that such a noble and chivalric woman has her being among the toilers of the overwrought East End, and trust that her good deeds have not gone unrewarded."

Stripped of the usual gender conventions, romantic chivalry reduces to little more than displays of altruism and generosity toward another human being. With that in mind, the sooner women start extending such "chivalry" toward men and boys, and calling it "chivalry," the sooner we might call relationships reciprocal. Until then we will continue to see male-only chivalry by workers on the gynocentric plantation.

We live in a time now of great safety and convenience, and if relationships are to mean anything going forward they will need to be based on some kind of reciprocal chivalry. Men and women can demonstrate their brands of chivalry differently if they wish, a 'co-chivalry' that can be respectful of similarities or differences as agreed between individual men and women. With that move toward reciprocity the one-sided chivalry that the modern world has been so captivated by can be finally put to death.

Sources:

[1] Matthew D. Hammond, Chris G. Sibley, and Nickola C. Overall, The Allure of Sexism: Psychological Entitlement Fosters Women's Endorsement of Benevolent Sexism Over Time
[2] Eric W. Dolan, Self-entitled women are more likely to endorse benevolent sexism, study finds
[3] Matthew D. Hammond, Chris G. Sibley, and Nickola C. Overall [Ibid]
[4] Ruth Styles, The fickle face of feminism: Women are fine with sexism… as long as it benefits them
[5] Lucrezia Marinella: gynocentrism in 1600
[6] Modesta Pozzo: gynocentrism in 1590

Visions inspired daughter to reject life of female privilege

Douglas Galbi · 20 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

About 1700 years ago, Christian monks recorded a story memorializing female privilege and urging young women to turn from it. The setting is straight-forward:

> A good man, who was very simple and God-fearing, every day labored in the fields and with the work of his hands earned a mediocre living. His wife, in contrast, stayed all day long in the home, eating and drinking with dissolute companions. Whatever her husband was able to acquire, she consumed in self-indulgent living.
>
> { homine bono, qui simplex erat valde et timens Deum, et cotidie laborans in agro de labore manuum mediocriter vivebat. Uxor autem in domo remanens tota die cum leccatoribus manducabat et bibebat, et, quecumque maritus ejus poterat acquirere, luxuriose vivens consumebat. }

Many wives throughout history have been reluctant to share the burden of working outside the home. Today, many wives work outside the home. However, many of them consider work outside the home to concern their personal fulfillment rather than fulfilling an obligation to reduce the burden on their husbands. These wives often withdraw temporarily or permanently from the workforce while denying their husbands similar opportunities to quit their jobs. Those wives thus betray ideals of gender equality and set a bad example for their daughters.

In this case, the couple had one daughter. After her parents died, the daughter had to determine the course of her life. Should she live a life of female privilege as a wife idly exploiting the labor of her husband? Or should she be a strong, independent woman who courageously supports a stay-at-home husband and provides him with a wide range of opportunities for eating, drinking, enjoying the company of dissolute friends, and freely seeking personal fulfillment?

> She began to think about whether she should imitate the life of her father, or the life of her mother. The devil placed before her eyes the life of her father. His life had always been excessively hard and rough. He had always lived in sadness and misery. Her mother, in contrast, had lived in great pleasure and joy, and in great happiness. At this point, her soul was nearly induced to have contempt for her father's way of life and to imitate her mother.
>
> { Que cepit cogitare utrum vitam patris aut matris sue deberet imitari. Dyabolus autem ante oculos ejus ponebat quod vita patris ejus dura nimis et aspera fuisset, et quod in dolore et miseria semper vixisset; mater vero ipsius in magnis deliciis et gaudio et in magna felicitate vixerat. Et jam pene adhuc animus ejus inducebatur ut, contempta patris conversatione, matrem imitaretur. }

Many women today falsely believe that their mother, grandmothers, great-grandmothers, and all the women in their lineage going back to the beginning of humanity lived much more oppressed and constrained lives than those of all the men in their lineage. That's delusional, as the lives of this ancient couple makes clear. The devil presented to the daughter the truth that her mother had a much easier and more pleasurable worldly life than her father did. Most women and men would prefer to live the worldly life of her mother.

In Christian understanding, the Lord hears the cries of the poor and vindicates the oppressed. While female privilege and oppressing men is today regarded as virtuous or at least deserved payback, Christianity more truthfully supported gender equality. The daughter thus experienced visions:

> The next night an angel of the Lord appeared to her in a dream. It seemed to her that he led her to some horrible and fetid place of torment, where she saw among other condemned her mother burned black by a fire of intolerable flame. Serpents were gnawing and tearing at all her limbs with bitter bites. Then she began to cry as if howling: "Come, my daughter, see that because of vile and transitory pleasures I endure torments without > end and never obtain pardon. Take heed therefore, my daughter, do not imitate my miserable and most shameful life, because you would not be able to escape eternal torments." Then it seemed to her that she was led to a most beautiful and glorious place, where in the company of holy and honored spirits she saw her father shining brighter than the sun and crowned with glory and honor. To her the angel said: "Which life do you wish to imitate, your father's or your mother's?" She responded: "Lord, I swear to you, I promise that I will never imitate the life of my mother, but the example of my father I want to follow completely in penance and labor." The next morning to do so, she gave whatever she had to the poor, and withdrew to live in a cave and follow a most laborious life.

>
> { Proxima vero nocte angelus Domini apparuit ei in sompnis, et videbatur ei quod duceret eam ad quedam fetida et horribilia loca tormentorum, ubi inter alios dampnatos videbat matrem suam nigerrimam igne intollerabili igne succensam, et serpentes omnia ejus membra morsu amarissimo corrodebant et laniabant. Tunc ilia cepit quasi ululando clamare: "Veni, filia, quia propter viles et transitorias delicias sine fine cruciabor, et nunquam veniam obtinebo. Cave igitur, filia mea, ne miserabilem et turpissimam vitam imiteris, quia nullo modo posses evadero cruciatus eternos." Postmodum videbatur illi quod duceretur ad locum amenissimum et gloriosum, ubi in consortio sanctorum et honorum spirituum videbat patrem suum sole splendidiorem, gloria et honore coronatum. Cui angelus ait: "Cujus vitam vis imitari patris tui aut matris?" Cui ilia: "Domine, juro vobis, promitto quod nunquam matris mee vitam imitabor, sed exemplo patris mei in penitentia et labore vitam meam volo consumare." Mane autem facto, quicquid habebat pauperibus erogavit, et artissimam vitam ducens in spelunca se reclusit. }

Many men have lived lives of hard work spent mostly in seclusion in their man-caves. Many women have no appreciation for the difficulties of men's lives. Through these visions, the daughter gained sympathetic appreciation for her father's life and recognized her father's righteousness.

Parents, teach your daughters to reject lives of female privilege! Many education resources today for teaching about gender equality merely perpetuate modern ignorance, anti-men bigotry, and superstition. Through the largely unheralded work of medieval Latin philologists, vitally important medieval Latin literature has been transmitted to the present. Medieval Latin literature offers one of the best available resources today for teaching truly about gender equality.

* * * * *

Notes:

The story above is exemplum 289 in the preaching handbook Sermones Vulgares of the early thirteenth-century European church leader Jacques de Vitry. The Latin text is from Crane (1890) pp. 121-2. The English translation is mine, drawing upon the English paraphrase of id. pp. 260-1. This exemplum comes from a more detailed story in the Vitae Patrum {Lives of the Fathers}, a collection of stories mainly from the third and fourth centuries. The stories are drawn from the lives of Christian monks living in the deserts of Egypt and Syria. The story above was disseminated in the variety of medieval collections, including Libro de los Exemplos and Magnum Speculum Exemplorum.

Feature image by CIAT

Reference:

Crane, Thomas Frederick. 1890. The exampla or illustrative stories from the Sermones vulgares of Jacques de Vitry. London: David Nutt.

Article published under Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Five feminist lies we take for granted

Pierre Lescaudron · 23 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original > Sexuality is to feminism what work is to Marxism… the molding, direction, and expression of sexuality organizes society into two sexes: women and men. This division underlies the totality of social relations."

[image]
Catharine McKinnon, one of the founders of 'radical feminism'
Some years ago I began an unexpected journey down the feminist rabbit-hole. It was in 2014 when my Grandma asked me about the winner of the Eurovision Song Contest and I found myself unable to explain who the winner was: Conchita Wurst, a man who dresses like a woman and wears make-up, but sports a beard.

In hindsight, I realize this journey was a painful process, probably because it touched something deep in me. The data I discovered were in conflict with my protective instinct, something that is deeply wired in males. While females are hardwired to nurture and care, men are wired to provide and protect.

So when a man is exposed to victimized women (as depicted by the feminist narrative), it triggers his core instinct and social duty to protect. In addition, the instinctual hijack and deep cultural values tend to inhibit any proper intellectual functioning.

The above might be one of the reasons why the victimhood of women is so central to the feminist ideology. It might also be one of the reasons why so many men blindly embrace feminist narratives.

Feminism didn't invent anything by using the victimization of a population to further its political agenda. Long before the feminists, the French revolution was justified by the victimization of the 'tiers état' (the farmers), the Bolshevik revolution by the victimization of the proletariat, and the Nazi revolution by the victimization of 'Aryans'. But history shows that the revolutionaries, whether in France, Russia or Germany, never cared about the alleged victims. Each time the victimized population ended up in a far worse situation after the 'revolution' than before it.

The alleged victims are only a pretext to point the finger at oppressors (the nobility, the clergy, the Jews), destroy them and seize their rights and assets (leaving aside their duties), and that's exactly what we are witnessing today with the feminist movement.

We are bombarded daily by stories about affirmative action, women's rights, women's empowerment, women's initiatives, women's organizations, women's events, women's shelters, women's marches, women's safe spaces… all these political claims are based on one single foundation: the victimization of women, which is widely taken for granted. But does the victimhood Feminism proffers actually exist?

1/ Women are the victims of domestic violence

Narrative: It is widely believed that domestic violence is a rampant epidemic affecting a vast proportion of US households:

> "Half the women in the US are abused."Langley & Levy 1977, Wife Beating: the Silent Crisis

According to the widely-accepted narrative, most of the domestic abuse epidemic is due to men:

> "Women were seven to fourteen times more likely to report that intimate partners had beaten them up, choked them, threatened them with weapons, or attempted to drown them."
> Arias et al, .2002

Reality: First and foremost, domestic violence affects a minority of couples. Depending on the method and samples, between 85 and 99% of US couples do not experience any kind of domestic violence.

[image]
Poster published by Domestic violence awareness based on statistics from Straus, 1977
In addition, males are far from being the sole perpetrators of domestic violence, quite the contrary. Unilateral violence (i.e. non-reciprocal violence) is more often committed by wives than by husbands:

> "70% of the perpetrators of unilateral conjugal violence are female."
> Whittaker et al., 2007 CDC national survey

The higher prevalence of domestic violence perpetrated by women also applies to severe assault:

> • 10% of married couples and 13% of cohabitating couples reported females using severe violence when the male partner was non-violent (husband battering)
> • The reverse pattern (wife battering) was 6% -7%.
> So husband-battering was about double wife-battering
> Stets and Strauss, 1989/1992

In the most comprehensive domestic violence study ever conducted (a meta-analysis with a sample size 64,000 subjects), the conclusion was that:

> "Women are slightly more likely than men to use intimate violence" d' = .05
> Archer, 2000

Interestingly, the prevalence of domestic violence committed by females is more pronounced in younger generations, as shown in a study conducted among college students (19 countries – 9,549 subjects).

> "On average, female partner violence had a 21% higher incidence than male partner violence."
> Douglas and Strauss, 2006

While the myth that domestic violence is primarily perpetrated by men is still widely accepted, even feminists recognize that women are the main perpetrators of domestic violence.

> "Women are doing the battering, as much or more than men."
> Betty Friedan, It Changed My Life: Writings on the Women's Movement

Confirming that the highest prevalence of domestic violence is committed by females, and totally removing any male influence from the equation, are the statistics about lesbian violence. Lesbian couples have the highest violence rate, about 50% higher than the violence prevalence in heterosexual couples.

> "Lifetime prevalence of rape, physical violence or stalking by an intimate partner, focusing for the first time on victimization by sexual orientation. In their study, there was a victimization prevalence of 43.8 percent for lesbians."
> CDC 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey

Conclusion: domestic violence is not as rampant as depicted. Over 95% of couples report no intimate violence (Laroche 2005). For the minority of couples where violence has occurred, females are more frequently the perpetrator than males. This trend is worsening and we observe higher female-perpetrated violence in younger generations.

One factor in why men batter less than women is likely the strong taboo around men beating women:

> "Only 2% of North American men agree with 'it is ok to hit your wife to keep her in line'."
> Simon et al., 2001

Conversely, women beating men doesn't seem to be taboo. Such behavior is actually perceived positively by most witnesses who see it as a sign of empowerment or harmless self-defense. Watch this interesting social experiment where women beat men (in a public park) and the supportive reactions of the witnesses:

Now, compare this to the reverse situation where a couple (portrayed by actors) in a London park gets into a heated argument and the man begins to physically abuse his girlfriend. Onlookers, male and female, immediately notice and take action:

2/ Women Are The Victims of Rape

Narrative: According to feminist voices widely echoed by mainstream media, the Western world is undergoing a rape epidemic that stems from a deeply-rooted 'rape culture'. Basically, all men are rapists, at least in potential if not yet in actuality.

> "Men, by and large, have a rape switch. All men are capable of rape."
> Greg Laden

The 'figures' provided to back up the 'rape epidemic' are troubling.

An American woman has allegedly a 26% chance of being raped in her lifetime. The situation on campuses is even worse: allegedly, 1 in 5 women will experience sexual assault in college. For example, the rape rate in Berkeley was estimated at 3,000 cases per year (Gilbert 2005). So, with 20,000 female students over an average 4-year period, the overall rape rate is more than 50%.

Reality: Let's take the Berkeley case. Out of the 3,000 projected rapes per year, only 40-80 students seek guidance each year from the rape counseling center and only two reported to the police. (That's a report, not a conviction)

> When Koss' victims were asked directly, > – 73% who had had attempted unwanted sex did not believe they had been raped
> – 42% had sex later with the man who "raped" them
> Dutton, 2008

[image]
Cal State Fullerton Undie Run: Spring Edition 2016
If the rape rate on campus was more than 50%, do you think female students would participate in 'undie runs', like the one depicted in the image on the right?The Berkeley over-inflated rape epidemic is not an isolated case. The report on Violent Victimization of College Students is based on actual police reports (not claims) and tells a very different story from the Berkeley narrative.

> "Between 1995 and 2002, the DOJ found that there were six rapes or sexual assaults per thousand per year. This means a 2.5% annual rate rape."
> DOJ – report about Violent Victimization of College Students

In addition, the same DOJ statistics show that the overall rape rate is in sharp decline: since 1995, the rate of female rape or sexual assault has decreased by about 60 percent.

Interestingly, rape analyses virtually always focus on female rape, as if male rape did not exist. In fact, male rape did not exist legally until 2013. Before that, the FBI definition of rape explicitly excluded men from the victim count:

> [rape is] "the carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will."
> UCR – FBI

Once the new definition was applied and men were not excluded from sexual assault or as potential rape victims, the figures provided by the CDC (US Center for Disease Control) paint a much more balanced picture:

> "Rates of non-consensual sexual contact basically equalized, with 1.270 million women and 1.267 million men claiming to be victims of sexual violence."
> CDC

The new definition includes instances where men were made to 'penetrate'. Because of cultural factors, we generally assume that if a man has an erection, he must want sex. After all, men are sexually insatiable, right?

So, imagine for a second that we apply the same logic to women, knowing that a number of women show signs of physiological arousal during rape:

> "I've assisted more young women than I can count with this very issue…There have been very few studies on orgasm during rape, but the research so far shows numbers from 10% to over 50% having this experience."
>
> Popular Science

[image]
Supervisor McCormik was found guilty in a case involving 12 juvenile inmates who sued for sexual and physical abuse.
In both cases, signs of physiological arousal are not proof of consent. If men's arousal is not there, there are many ways to artificially create it.

This point is illustrated by the following South African case where three women kidnapped a man, held him for three days and gang-raped him while forcing him to take Viagra and energy drinks. That had been the 5th such incident in South Africa of abduction and gang-rape of a male by a female trio in the space of a couple of years.

The CDC study showing that sexual violence is equally distributed between men and women doesn't provide the whole picture because the prison and jail data are not integrated in their report.

Compared to the rest of society, prisons exhibit very high rates of sexual violence, with a prevalence varying between 9 and 23%, depending on the sources.

While common belief portrays rape in prison as a male-to-male crime, the few surveys about sexual assaults in prison reveal unexpected results:

> "Those surveys turned up the opposite of what we generally think is true. Women were more likely to be abused by fellow female inmates, and men by guards, and many of those guards were female. For example, of juveniles reporting staff sexual misconduct, 89 percent were boys reporting abuse by a female staff member. In total, inmates reported an astronomical 900,000 incidents of sexual abuse."
> Stemple and Mayer, 2014

The number of total sexual assaults perpetrated in US prisons comes straight from the Department of Justice and dwarfs the number of sexual assaults committed outside prison:

> "More men are raped in the U.S. than women, according to figures that include sexual abuse in prisons. In 2008, it was estimated 216,000 inmates were sexually assaulted while serving time, according to the DOJ figures. That is compared to 90,479 rape cases outside of prison."
>
> The Guardian

3/ Women Earn Less Than Men

Narrative: Feminists and mainstream media have been repeating for decades that women are paid lower wages compared with men. Even Barack Obama, in his 2016 State of the Union Address, repeated the feminist mantra according to which "women make 77 cents to every dollar a man makes." This is naturally held up as 'blatant proof' of systemic sexist discrimination against women.

Reality: First, let's note that in the 1970s women were said to make about 65% of what men did. Today that number is about 80%. So, whatever causes the wage gap, it has narrowed since the 1970s.

Obama's 77% figure is simply the difference in median annual incomes of full-time male and female workers. It's comparing apples and oranges, since it does not account for differences in occupations, positions, education, job tenure or hours worked per week.

When such relevant factors are considered, the wage gap narrows to the point of vanishing. More than vanishing, in some countries, like in the UK, the pay gap is inverted:

> "When hourly rates are compared, a recent UK survey reveals that, the pay gap is inverted from 20 to 40 years old. Figures compiled by the Press Association show that between the ages of 22 and 29, a woman will typically earn £1,111 more per annum than her male counterparts. The 'inverted pay gap goes on for workers between 30 and 39 years old with women earning 0.2% more than men."
> The Guardian

These figures only take into account the hourly rate and leave aside the fact that men and women don't work in the same way.

Below are factors that generally favor men and help explain why men earn more. It shows that men tend make more money not because they are privileged but because their work input is different. This list was compiled from Warren Farrel's excellent book, Why Men Earn More: The Startling Truth Behind the Pay Gap – and What Women Can Do About It:

- Men gravitate more towards higher-paying occupations in technology and hard sciences (e.g., petroleum engineer).
- Men choose higher-risk, higher paying occupations with greater safety risks for occupational injuries and fatalities (e.g., oil field worker, roofer, and logging).

- Men are more willing to work outdoors in uncomfortable, physically demanding work environments (construction, oil field workers, commercial fishing, logging).
- Men are more willing than women to choose demanding, intense jobs where you can't check out at the end of the work day (e.g., corporate attorney, senior White House staff).
- Men select jobs with higher pay but with lower personal fulfillment (tax accountant).
- Men select jobs with higher financial and emotional risks (e.g., venture capitalist).
- Men are more willing than women to work the worst shifts during the worst hours.
- Men often choose higher paying sub-fields (e.g., surgery and anesthesiology).
- Men are more willing to work in dirty or unpleasant environments with minimal human contact (e.g., prison guard, steel worker, truck drivers).
- Men work longer hours per week and more weeks during the year than women on average.
- Men more frequently than women invest in updating their skills with greater financial payoffs (e.g., master's degree in computer technology vs. master's degree in education).
- Men are more likely than women to have more years of continuous experience in their current occupation.
- Men are less likely than women to be absent from work (doctor's visits, sick days, taking time off when children are sick, etc.).
- Men are more willing than women to tolerate longer commute times.
- Men are more willing to relocate, especially to undesirable locations at their company's request.
- Men are more willing than women, on average, to travel extensively on the job.
- Men are more willing than women to take the risk of a variable income, e.g., to be paid by commission vs. a fixed salary.
- Men often produce more output, e.g., scholarly research articles for university professors

The graph below illustrates the first point addressed in the above list and shows how males predominantly choose high-paying careers while females choose predominantly lower-paying jobs:

[image]
Highest and lowest paying job by gender and average wage
Eventually, even feminists had to backtrack on years of propaganda and finally admit that the pay gap is mostly due to women's choices:

> "The American Association of University Women (AAUW) has finally admitted that the 'gender pay gap' is caused primarily by women's choices, not discrimination."
> Leadership Institute

This backtracking is little more than lip service, however, since the pay gap myth is still widely propagated in the mainstream media, academia, and schools.

4/ Men Are Child Abusers

Narrative: Men are inherently violent. They beat their wives and they beat their children. That is what Kahneman and Tversky (1982) called a 'representative heuristic', where batterers have the attributes of maleness, and they alone pose a risk to the child.

Reality: Actually, two major studies about violence against children drew very similar conclusions. Mothers are more likely than fathers to be violent towards children.

> children are almost three times more exposed to violence from mothers > • 4.3% exposed to severe male to female violence
> • 11.4% exposed to severe female to male violence
> McDonald et al., 2006

In a Health Canada survey from 2001, mothers were found to commit 4 out 5 types of violence more frequently than fathers:

> Biological mothers (as compared to biological fathers) are more likely to be the substantiated perpetrator of:
> • physical abuse (47 vs 42%)
> • neglect (86% vs 33%)
> • emotional maltreatment (61% vs 55%)
> • multiple categories (66% vs 36%).
> The biological father is the most likely perpetrator of sexual abuse (15% vs. 5%).
> Dutton, 2008

An American survey on child maltreatment conducted in 2004 among more than 700,000 individuals revealed an even larger gender gap than the Canadian survey: it found that mothers are more than twice as likely as fathers to mistreat their children.

[image]
Perpetrators of children maltreatment by parental status
Mistreatment of children, perpetrated by mothers, is higher in terms of prevalence and also in degree. According to that 2004 American survey, among all cases of children who died of maltreatment in 2003, 30.5% were caused by the mother and 18.2% were caused by the father.

The fact that mothers tend to spend more time rearing children than fathers is likely a factor of course, but these data dispel the myth that it is predominantly men who are cruel to children.

5/ Female accuser = Victim

[image]
Andrea Dworkin, the other founder of radical feminism
Narrative: When it comes to matters as personal and sensitive as sexual abuse, women have no reason to lie. In fact, it takes a lot of courage to overcome the shame and share such painful memories.

Reality: Men and women both lie. This is exacerbated when the legal system excessively protects the accuser, strips the accused of his most elementary rights, and reverses charges where the burden of proof is on the accused rather than the accuser. The concept of being 'innocent until proven guilty', which has prevailed for centuries, has been turned on his head. In a dreadfully totalitarian spin, many men are today deemed guilty until proven innocent.

Today women are encouraged by social workers and attorneys to file accusations against partners and spouses, they have financial incentives (getting the house, alimony), they have total anonymity (while the name of the accused is widely reported), they are immune to being sued for making false accusations, civil courts offer lower standards of evidence, and more.

Papers about the politically sensitive topic of false rape accusations are scarce, but they nonetheless exist:

> "Purdue University sociologist Eugene J. Kanin found that '41% of the total disposed rape cases were officially declared false' during a nine-year period, "that is, by the complainant's admission that no rape had occurred and the charge, therefore, was false.
> A follow-up study at a university found 50% of accusations were false, again purely by the recantation of the accuser.
> Unrecanted accusations certainly put the actual percentage of false allegations much higher. Kanin concluded that 'these false allegations appear to serve three major functions for the complainants: providing an alibi, seeking revenge, and obtaining sympathy and attention'."
> Stephen Baskerville, The New Politics of Sex

Here are two examples of blatant and fully-documented false accusations. First, a cheerleader calls the police and claims her boyfriend choked and beat her. The police are about to arrest the man when he provides a video showing that it's actually the exact opposite to what happened:

In the second case, the girlfriend of a young lawyer threatens to make a false domestic violence accusation against him in order to get him out of their house:

How many other cases are there where the men did not gather evidence of false accusations, and so ended up in prison solely based on those false accusations?

A critical factor when lying to the authorities is whether or not the lie will be believed. The following paper assessed authorities' biases in domestic violence cases, depending on whether the perpetrator was a male or female:

> • When a woman called the police to report IPV (domestic violence), the man was ordered out of the house in 41.4% of cases. When a man called, the woman was ordered out of the house in 0% of cases.
> • When a woman called, the man was threatened with immediate arrest in 28.2% of cases. When a man called, the woman was threatened with arrest in 0% of cases.
> • When a woman called, the man was threatened with arrest at a later date in 10.7% of cases. When a man called, the woman was threatened with arrest at a later date in 0% of cases.
> • When a woman called, the man was arrested in 15.2% of cases. When a man called, the woman was arrested in 0% of cases. In 12.1% of cases when the man called, the man himself was arrested.
> 1985 US National Family Violence Survey, carried out by Murray A. Straus and Richard J. Gelles

These surveys show that men are very unlikely to report violence (rape, domestic violence, child maltreatment) committed by their spouse because, at best, they won't be believed and, at worse, they are the ones who will end up behind bars. Interestingly, that is precisely what many women claim happens to them when they report rapes.

Conversely, women are encouraged to make reports because their allegations (whether true or false) are more likely to be believed, and even if the allegation is false, they won't face any legal repercussions.

As a result, all the above statistics are probably biased by male under-reporting and female over-reporting. Taking into account this reporting bias would further increase the prevalence of domestic violence, child maltreatment and rape perpetrated by females.

An example perfectly illustrates the very Machiavellian effects of the feminist lies: foster care. Those facilities are, in theory, designed to protect children from maltreatment experienced at home.

The prevalence of false allegations about child abuse during custody disputes is strikingly high: 55%. So, the majority of the cases are at best distorted, at worst purely fabricated.

But false allegations of child maltreatment can lead to the very real placement in foster care of a child who had until then lived a peaceful life, free of neglect and violence. In foster care, the child will probably experience a far less peaceful life:

> "[There is] 10 times the rate of physical abuse and more than 28 times the rate of sexual abuse of children in group homes than in the general population."
> Stephen Baskerville, The New Politics of Sex:

It is more than a little ironic (and decidedly tragic) that the result of feminist exaggeration around child abuse in the family unit is the facilitation of the removal of children from safe family homes to placement in foster care facilities where the child is most likely to experience abuse.

Conclusion

Rape, domestic violence and child abuse are confined to a small part of the population and, overall, the figures reveal a general decrease. It's also clear that the gender gap is grossly distorted. Men and women earn money, perpetrate rape, batter and abuse their children in comparable proportions.

This is a very important point and should prevent any kind of gender-oriented generalizations. Figures show that a small percentage of adults do act violently. The most important predictors for such behaviors have little to do with gender but are strongly correlated with factors like personality disorders, negative emotionality, trauma experienced during childhood, etc.

Despite this gender equality in terms of violence and salary, the upward trend of female-perpetrated violence in recent years is noteworthy.

[image]
Actual quote from Andrea Dworkin, the other feminist leader (and advocate of incest and pedophilia).
One might wonder if this is not the result of feminist lies infecting some minds? For decades feminists have depicted women as victims: abused, raped and discriminated against by men. This might have unleashed a wave of resentment, entitlement, 'empowerment' and hate among many women, which have, in turn, led to an increase in male rape, child abuse and domestic violence.

Here you might see the very Kafkaesque nature of the whole feminist movement. The feminists fantasize about a world dominated by rape culture and violent men, yet they are creating almost the opposite: a world where women increasingly embrace crime and violence against men, the people to whom those very same crimes were wrongly ascribed in the first place.

There will always be pathological individuals around, along with their destructive ideologies. That is something we cannot change. What we can change is how we perceive and address this problem. These are the same pathological individuals that create revolutionary movements by pointing the finger at a scapegoat population (the nobility, the bourgeois, the Jews).

It's a diversion, plain and simple, that channels people's justified anger towards the wrong culprit: the scapegoat instead of the pathological puppet masters.

Feminists tell women that all of women's problems are due to men. This scapegoating technique can be very effective because it offers a very comfortable lie, which is then projected onto the other and in doing so exonerates women of any responsibility.

This is the very core of the feminist/postmodernist credo, where the other is hell, the other is the source of all suffering, the other is domination. I think that the take-away message is just the opposite; let's stop projecting onto others our own weakness, fears and shame; let's stop trying to change the other with our arbitrary, despotic and dystopian vision of what good is.

Let's focus on the only thing we can potentially change – ourselves – and instead of feeding our self-importance – whether expressed in the form of self-pity, victimizing, grandeur or guilt – let's take responsibility for our lives and our societies and see the world and ourselves not as we would wish them to be, but as they are. Only from a position of full understanding of ourselves and others can we ever hope to make the right decisions that result in a better world for all.

The real news about domestic violence in Australia

Bettina Arndt · 25 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Here's some good news that passed unnoticed late last year – our official statistics reveal there's no epidemic of domestic violence. In fact for the last decade there's been no increase in women being abused by their partners. That was the story that dropped through the cracks when the Australian Bureau of Statistics announced the results of their 2016 Personal Safety Survey last November.

Our mainstream media failed to report this vital fact, highlighting instead the few areas where violence against women still shows some slight increase – like sexual harassment and abuse.

Somehow it also escaped the media's attention that the big news in the latest survey results was all about men. The Bureau's figures reveal that since 2005 the proportion of men reporting violence in the last year from their current partners has risen more than five-fold while those experiencing emotional abuse have more than doubled.

These results emerged despite efforts to encourage more female victims to disclose by using only female interviewers to conduct the latest survey – a move which required Gillian Triggs at the Human Rights Commission to give the nod to this discriminatory move. But surprisingly it ended up revealing the true extent of women's violence against men.

No one really knows whether more men are being abused or whether men are now more willing to admit to being victims but, as my latest YouTube video shows, women's role in family violence is emerging ever more clearly. Every third victim of intimate partner violence is a male. Almost half the people being emotionally abused by their partners are male. The biggest leap in sexual harassment over the past five years involves men being harassed by women.

The complexities of family violence revealed in these latest statistics fall in line with over 40 years of international research showing domestic violence isn't just about dangerous men terrorising their families. Over 1700 peer reviewed papers show that children growing up in violent homes usually witness their mums and dads having a go at one another rather than dad being the only villain.

Of course that's not to deny that men's strength means violence against their partners is more likely to have serious consequences. It's shocking that a woman is killed through domestic homicide almost every week in this country and it is critical we make every possible effort to protect women in these circumstances.

But the latest homicide figures from the Australian Institute of Criminology show that domestic homicide results in one man being killed every ten days. Women are more likely to use weapons in domestic abuse hence their violence can also be lethal but few of the 75 males killed in the most recent domestic homicide incidents (2012-2014) attracted the media attention given to female victims.

Naturally police know all about these dangerous women. Listen to this member of the Victorian police force who is trying to protect her granddaughter from a violent mother: "Everyone in the job will tell you they see plenty of violent women in the homes we're called out to, drug addicts, angry drunks, women with mental problems. Kids hiding not just from dads but from vicious mums. Yet often cops will take the woman's side without question and ignore male victims."

That's official policy in Australia as we see every time one of our politicians talks publically about domestic violence. Domestic violence is simply about "respect for women" Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull solemnly intones as he boasts of spending hundreds of millions of dollars on this one-sided approach to the problem. The Federal Government has recently been re-running that television campaign showing a little boy slamming a door in a girl's face, advertising which demonises men and boys and denies the complex issues underpinning the problem – poverty, drug and alcohol abuse, mental illness and children witnessing violence from both their parents.

Thousands of bureaucrats are currently employed in a mighty propaganda industry defending the one-eyed policy on this issue. Mention the inconvenient truth revealed in the latest Safety Survey results and you'll see them leap into action, denying that the survey represents the true picture on domestic violence in this country. They'll offer statistics showing growing numbers of police reports and deny these figures are artificially inflated by women obtaining AVO's to gain strategic advantage in family court battles, as publicly acknowledged by retiring judge David Collier from the Parramatta Family Court. Plus police reports now reflect the ever-expanding definition of domestic violence including threats of abuse and 'economic' violence.

Yes, the Personal Safety Survey provides the "most comprehensive data on prevalence of violence" in this country admitted a squirming bureaucrat put on the spot last year in a senate committee by David Leyonhjelm who is making repeated attempts to expose the distorted government policy on this issue. The bureaucrats being questioned by Leyonhjelm have failed to produce any proper evidence that domestic violence is all about "respect for women."

With official data now there to prove them wrong perhaps it's time to seriously lobby for help for all victims, including support for men and their children seeking to escape women's violence.

How to get your man to punch you in the face

Paul Elam · 27 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Since the early 1970s, we have had an ongoing public dialogue about violence against women. Rather I should say, we've had an ongoing feminist diatribe about the subject. Feminists, as you know, aren't much interested in anything resembling dialogue, unless your idea of dialogue is "march or die."

And to be fair, traditionalists have been prattling the same way about it going much further back than feminism's second wave. Where it concerns violence against women, traditionalists are just feminists without funding and hashtags.

The result is that after a half century of so-called feminist scholarship, squandering billions of other people's dollars on government acts like VAWA, the only perspective we've gained on the subject from feminists is a dead match for the time-tested, traditionalist edict, "There is no reason for ever hitting a woman. Ever."

It's the domestic violence version of Nancy Regan's vapid, "Just say no to drugs."

Whether preached from the mouth of Jessica Valenti or your great-grandfather, that virtue signaling, along with the entrenched belief that men are inherently bad, serves as the unquestioned foundation for thought on the subject. Hundreds of generations of psychosocial evolution and 50 years of corrupt ideology now intersect at the same gynocentric platitude, like two ticks latched on to the same clueless dog.

We are informed that violence against women continues to be a scourge demanding panicked, high profile intervention…..on men, and men only. And we've embraced a model that sees men as aggressors whose attacks happen in a vacuum, as though their pitiable female victims were not even remotely involved in their abuse till fist met face.

It appears that violent men are fires that set themselves. And that fire is the only thing that matters. Not the causes and not the means of prevention.

It serves feminists and traditionalists well to take that position, too, because if they ever stood back and took a good, strong, clear-eyed look at the big picture, they'd have to acknowledge something that would send foundation shattering shock waves through their worldview.

When it comes to violence against women, many of them ask for it.

What's that I hear? A great big collective gasp? The clatter of pearls being clutched? Aye, all that and the sound of fainting couches being rolled out across floors of outrage.

That's the false piety of modern times. In saying that some women play a role, that they have direct responsibility in getting their asses kicked by the men in their lives, I have committed social sacrilege. I've tread on the inviolable belief that any hint of female culpability for their physical abuse is inherently immoral – even sinister.

Fine then. Let us all twirl our moustaches and continue.

The never blame the victim, sloganeer's approach to this issue is confounded by the fact that what I am saying about many women's culpability in their own victimization is true. 100%, undeniably factual.

To explore this further, I am going to refer to a talk by Tom Golden, a friend of mine who also happens to be a licensed clinical social worker.

His talk is about relational aggression, or what I prefer to call the other intimate partner violence. And as you may suspect, it is predominately the domain of women. Tom provides the research to back that up.

Now, in going into this, I want to be careful not to give the impression that physical aggression is a male characteristic and relational aggression is a female characteristic. Exhaustive research proves that in intimate partnerships, women are as likely or more likely than men to initiate physical assaults.

We also know that in unidirectional, or one-way, unreciprocated physical violence that women are the perpetrators 70% of the time. All of this about women's physical violence is well established, empirical fact.

What I am talking about here is the least studied, least understood and most widely misunderstood kind of intimate partner violence; that of unidirectional, unreciprocated, male violence against women. And in particular, the correlation between relational aggression in women and resulting physical violence in men.

Now, admittedly the best we can do is make educated guesses about this. As Tom pointed out to me, there hasn't been much, if any, research on the correlation between relational aggression in women and physically aggressive responses from men.

And I'd venture to say we won't see any such studies anytime soon. There's no money in it for feminists, and no sanctimony for traditionalists. Nope, the only insight we are going to get about it will come from red pill analysis.

Let's start then, with a definition of relational aggression. Researchers define it as behaviors that harm others through damage or threat of damage to relationships. In short, relational aggression is bullying without violence.

It's important to note here that the relational aggression studies Tom refers to are not focused on intimate partnerships as much as they are social groups. Behaviors such as excluding, ignoring, teasing, backstabbing, lies, false accusations, rumor-spreading and hostile body language are cited as forms of predominately female relational aggression perpetrated within social groups.

It does not take much of a stretch, however, to see that some of these aggressions are also common to women in intimate partnerships. All it takes is a small measure of common sense, and the willingness to commit the taboo of holding women accountable for their actions, to conclude that it can and does result in their being physically assaulted in retaliation. Or, in plainer vernacular, they were asking for it.

Part of the problem here is that relational aggression in women, unlike men's physical aggression, is a form of violence that is encouraged. Women are socialized into relational aggression as an active and normal part of their behavior in relationships.

Again, referring to Tom's talk on the subject, a study of Disney Films revealed that they averaged 11 acts of relational aggression from attractive, rich and popular female characters per hour. Those acts were depicted as justified, and did not result in negative consequences for the aggressor.

The problem, of course, is that life is not a Disney Movie, even with as much as we train women to have the expectation that it is.

To understand the real-life consequences that do happen as a result of women's relational aggression, we have to keep in mind the fact that relational aggression is relationship violence.

Feminists have been in lockstep with this idea going back a long way. Men who verbally berate and abuse their female partners, men who exercise excessive control, who routinely criticize, judge and devalue their intimate partners, are committing acts of violence in the relationship – at least according to the feminist and prevailing mental health industry narrative.

Feminists have routinely rushed to the defense of women who react to this kind of treatment with physical violence, even with women who took that reaction to lethal ends.

The problem is, and the research does bear this out, these kinds of behaviors, all examples of relational aggression, are much more common in women than they are in men.

In fact, let's take a look at the notorious Duluth Power Wheel, the go to model for feminist use as a guideline for defining abusive behaviors in men.

As you go around the wheel and look at the identified abusive behaviors you get a perfect template for predominately female relational aggression.

How many men are coerced into isolation in their relationships, giving up friends and interests, even family members? How many men have had their objections to unfair or abusive treatment in a relationship denied and minimized? Oh, and using children as a tool to coerce and manipulate?

Well, we did not coin the term parental alienation because fathers were doing this so much. It was because of mothers.

You can even take a look at the section of the wheel containing economic abuse. Feminists, as they are often want to do, have flipped this one on its end. They use it to tag men who cut their intimate partners off financially as a form of domestic abuse, even when the women are spending compulsively and irresponsibly.

Compulsive, irresponsible spending is the real abuse here, exploiting men who work as primary breadwinners, and robbing the family of financial stability.

It is one more example of women's relational aggression. As are false allegations, belittling, questioning a man's masculinity and the like.

I read a tweet just recently from a man who worked twelve hours a day with a long commute, only to come home to a stay-at-home wife who nagged him incessantly about his being a poor provider, worthless as a man.

That is relational aggression, and if it one day results in that man punching her in the face the only criticism I would have is that he should have left before making himself legally vulnerable to even more of her relational aggression. That, too, is part of the picture. Relational aggression from women is also associated with third party violence, from the state, and from outsiders who rush in to act on the abusive woman's behalf.

Domestic Violence pioneer Erin Pizzey understood the problem of relational aggression all too well. In fact, she coined an aptly descriptive term for these women in her book, Prone to Abuse. She called them emotional terrorists. And here is what she had to say about them, and their horrific effect on the family.

> The family well may be characterized as violent, incestuous, dysfunctional, and unhappy, but it is the terrorist > or tyrant who is primarily responsible for initiating conflict, imposing histrionic outbursts upon otherwise calm situations, or (more subtly and invisibly) quietly manipulating other family members into uproar through guilt, cunning taunts, and barely perceptive provocations. (The quiet manipulative terrorist usually is the most undetected terrorist. Through the subtle creation of perpetual turmoil, this terrorist may virtually drive other family members to alcoholism, to drug-addiction, to explosive behavior, to suicide. The other family members, therefore, are often misperceived as the 'family problem' and the hidden terrorist as the saintly woman who 'puts up with it all.

This is, in my mind, the perfect description of women's relational aggression. Like Erin, I've seen this play out over decades in family after family seeking help for troubles with addictions and violence. And it is for this that many women ultimately find themselves on the business end of a knuckle sandwich. And far, far worse, which surely sets the feminist and traditionalist outrage machine into high gear.

Now, there is sadly little to do with this information other than file it away from whatever purpose it may serve. Men who fight back, and make no mistake, losing it an punching someone so abusive to you is fighting back, will pay an unfair price for doing so.

Perhaps the only real value in this information is to benefit masochistic women. So, to those women I say, if you like pain, if you want to get beat up, find a man who has self-respect and a snapping point. Many of them do, but they are not everywhere, so choose carefully.

Once you've found him, belittle his efforts to take care of you. Shame him for doing anything for himself. Use his children against him. Question his masculinity, preferably in front of his friends and family, but strangers will do in a pinch. Just keep doing what you've been trained to do by the world you grew up in, and with a little luck and a bit of hard work, you'll get the beating you've been asking for.

And if he is lucky, you will set him on the path to red pill wisdom. In the end it could be a win-win

Why I don't care what you think about my style

Paul Elam · 30 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I recently got a couple of comments from what I assume to be supportive subscribers to my channel, expressing concern about the title of my last YouTube talk, which was "How to Get Your Man to Punch You in the Face."

The objection, to paraphrase it from the comment, was that the title was unnecessarily inflammatory, that it was the type of thing that could and would be used to discredit the MRM, and that I should employ less controversial, less provocative descriptors of my work. Here's a link to the comment..

Historically, I've tended to just reject this stuff out of hand as concern trolling. After all, I have heard these same concerns since the first time I posted anything about men's issues on the internet. It is not like I've never considered the consequences of my method of delivery.

And indeed, my initial reaction was dismissive, inviting one commenter to go find another channel if he didn't like what I had to say, and in a later comment inviting him to be the change he wanted to see, rather than trying to get me to be that change. That part was in response to his suggesting that I should be emulating, of all people, Jordan Peterson, the man who called MGTOWs weasels.

Now, like I said, my general tendency is to read these comments and keep moving, perhaps after a quick eye roll. And if I am going to be totally honest, that is a practice I will continue. I will read them, occasionally respond, and then put them into File 13.

What I could do from time to time, however, is do a better job explaining why I do what I do and the way I do it. This will at least give anyone interested an opportunity to consider the motivations behind my methods. I realize it is not likely to change minds, any more than admonitions are going to change mine. Changing anyone's mind isn't and never has been on my list of priorities. Still, I'd like to provide some clarity those with questions.

To begin with, my advocacy for men predates my efforts on the internet by nearly 20 years. It was my experience in the mental health business of the late 1980's and early 1990's that first awakened me to the need for male-centered advocacy.

I came to that realization in an environment that was incredibly, savagely hostile to men. An environment that lured men in with the promise of compassion and help, only to abuse them with gynocentric, politicized garbage.

When finally saw what was happening and raised objections to it, I became the target of complaints and attempts to ruin my career. That isn't a plea for your sympathy. I don't need it. It is just a simple statement of fact that accurately reflects the depth and scope of the problem.

And I assure you, I never uttered any words near so provocative as I use today. I encountered the hostile backlash for talking in the most reserved of terms to professional peers who allegedly acted in the interest of their male clients.

I was once threatened with my job for asserting in a staff meeting that we needed to spend more time holding female clients accountable for their lives and less time telling them their problems were the fault of men. It was as though the idea was blasphemy, even though what I was saying was consistent with the idea that full personal accountability for your life and actions was a requirement for recovery from addictions.

In other words, I was just speaking the truth, and in the softest of ways. And I discovered that it was the truth, and not the method of telling it, that was the problem. That was true in 1988, and it is just as true now, 30 years later. In fact, things are much worse today than they were then.

I was not able to put it into words at the time, but I was learning that gynocentrism was, is, a nearly unstoppable, destructive force in the lives of men. I managed to hang on to my work till I voluntarily departed, but I was constantly up against that force in the mental health system.

Not being a glutton for punishment, and knowing that I would lose a war against the system, that left me at a crossroads. I had taken too many red pills to turn back, but I realized that no amount of truth, nor purity of motive, would push me through the gynocentric barrier, at least in groups of people, which are much more gynocentric collectively than the individuals in them.

What I did find though, was that telling the unvarnished truth to individual men, one on one, was a much easier path, and much more productive.

To illustrate this, I want to ask you to imagine you are seeing a man as I saw so many of them, limping into counseling, or perhaps dragged there, full of more shame than you can possibly imagine. A man with a serious drinking problem and all the humiliating failures that come with that; a man in a train wreck of a marriage. A man brimming with hidden pain, who had exploded more than once, at times becoming physically violent with his wife, even if that violence was in response to violence and/or relational aggression she had committed against him.

He's a man who doesn't need anyone to tell him that he is a piece of shit. His family has told him that, including his own children. The cop who arrested him told him that, and so did the judge who put him in jail.

And certainly, his wife, who now lords over him in the absolute, righteous power of her victimhood. She reminds him every day how worthless he is, and with the entire treatment team behind her, she sets conditions for him to get himself out of the doghouse.

In fact, examined with clarity we find that his participation in treatment is every bit as much about getting out of that doghouse as it is to save him from the self-poisoning of alcoholism. Even more so.

Now imagine, just for moment, creating a space for this guy to look at his life, his marriage and all, without viewing it through the lens of his shame and self-blame. Imagine that sorting through the details of his marriage we find that he is living with an emotional terrorist, a woman who emotionally and psychologically abuses everyone in her realm, especially her husband.

Or even if she wasn't abusive in the classic sense, that he still finds that his life had been swallowed up by her gynocentric privilege. That in things being all about her, there was no room left for him.

Imagine him waking up to the insight that he didn't have a problem with booze or violence till after he was married. Waking up to the cold fact that he had every reason to drink as an escape. And that he had not only never been able to articulate his circumstances, but that he had been trained his whole life to deny those circumstances existed. He had been conditioned as a man to heap all the blame on himself, something of which his wife and the rest of the world was only too happy to follow suit.

Now imagine that all this new insight shakes him to his very core, unleashing a torrent of rage. Not the confused, pathetic rage that engulfed him when he hit her, but solid, easily tractable rage that stemmed from his lived experience, from things he had previously been conditioned to never think about.

"That fucking bitch," he says. No more talk of getting out of the dog house. No more questions about how he could grovel enough to get in her good graces. Just the pure, raw anger of an abuse victim coming out of denial.

And so, what do I do with this? Do I tell him his language is improper? Do I shame him some more by minimizing what I know to be the truth? Do I fall in line with his wife and kids, the cops and sadly the other members of my treatment team and continue to label him as the families identified problem?

Or do I honor his anger, knowing full well that he will never move past it, he'll never heal, long as that anger is denied?

Do I honor and respect that anger, encouraging him to vent it as hard and fast as he wants, between him and I, away from the prying eyes of an ignorant and unjust world?

Do I in fact, agree with him that his wife is a fucking abusive bitch? And importantly, do I live by the certainty that anger that is denied expression is anger that will never be purged?

Do I fulfill my role as his advocate and support him for telling the world, including his wife, how he really feels? Or do I sell him out and urge his silence so he won't be an inconvenience to the people who matter?

And there's the rub, gents. Fluffy talk in deference to mainstream sensibilities makes for nice cozy conversation over latte and scones. It's great coffee-house banter for those who want to feel good about themselves, and who want acceptance from people who ultimately don't give a rat's ass about men's problems.

In the context of my work, that mealy-mouthed prattle is utterly useless.

Mind you I should say here that the purpose of doing all this was not to emulate the end-game victim complex we reserved for women. It wasn't to just blame his problems on her and call it a day. Ultimately, he had to take account of himself. Not just his drinking and the damage it caused, but also to his choices. Who he married. What he tolerated. What, in fact, he indulged in as though it was healthy when it wasn't.

Now, do you imagine that this man gaining the insight he needed was a product of talking in platitudes? Do you think for a moment that it was attained without talk that would outrage an alienate his wife and all the other forces that had coalesced to hang him on a cross?

You may be thinking at this point that I am using a false equivalence; that what I say and do with a single man behind closed doors is vastly different than what is said and done on a high profile internet platform.

But here's the rub, and I want you to know this. That man I was asking you to imagine is in my audience, right now, as you read this. Even though I put this on a public platform, what every last one of them boil down to is a personal talk between him and I. Between you and I. Damned the world and its phony sensibilities. Damned public sentiments the delusional pipe dream of beating the gynocentric system. I learned better than that 30 years ago.

The talks I do, every last fucking one of them, is a talk with that man. He is the man that matters to me, and nothing more. Not public approval, not the positive regard of people who only lift a finger when reaching for their latte. Nothing, absolutely nothing else matters.

One part of the critical comments I mentioned from the start of this talk is that we were now in post Red Pill Movie society. That the ways that brought us to that film were no longer needed.

This is entirely missing the point.

My interest today is what it always has been, the pre-Red Pill Movie man. The guy who needs to hear this in terms he'll relate to and understand and in ways that will leave him feeling less alone. The guy who needs to hear someone stand up and express the outrage about that which he has been bullied into silence.

That is my purpose, and the purpose of this channel. It is our decidedly male space, where we can talk carelessly, in the plainest of terms, public consensus be damned, because it is public consensus that is the problem.

I am here to do now what I was doing then behind the cover of the closed door to my office with each man who came my way. And to do it without reservation.

I am not interested in convincing the world that men are human beings, deserving of choice and compassion. I am only interested in convincing you of that, right here and now.

And this is the way I have chosen to do it.

Jordan Peterson exposes feminism's clay feet

Bettina Arndt · 1 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

British journalist Douglas Murray said he'd never seen a television interview more catastrophic for the interviewer. Others are naming TV journalist Cathy Newman's grilling of Canadian psychologist Jordan Peterson as a pivotal moment exposing modern feminism's clay feet. Within three days of the 30 minute Channel 4 interview being posted on YouTube it had attracted over 2 million viewers and Newman's performance was greeted by widespread hilarity on the twittersphere.

Channel 4 now seems to have woke up to the self-inflicted damage the interview is doing to one of the station's stars and is in damage control with Newman playing the victim role claiming she's receiving "vicious misogynistic abuse." Station management is employing extra security to deal with what they claim are threats to Newman's safety. Whilst there is no evidence the flood of online criticism of Newman constitutes any threat, Peterson has responded by telling his supporters to constrain their comments.

Ironically the major gotcha moment in the interview was all about freedom of speech. Newman decided to grill Peterson about the reason the Canadian psychology professor had first attracted international attention – namely his refusal to use manufactured gender pronouns now mandated under law in his country. After a series of ill-informed, aggressive attacks failed spectacularly to disconcert her calm, reasoned guest, Newman asked Peterson, "why should your right to freedom of speech trump a trans person's right not to be offended?"

The good professor responded: "Because in order to be able to think, you have to risk being offensive. I mean, look at the conversation we're having right now. You're certainly willing to risk offending me in the pursuit of truth. Why should you have the right to do that?" he said, acknowledging her attacks had made him rather uncomfortable but that was fine. "You're doing what you should do, which is digging a bit to see what the hell is going on…But you're exercising your freedom of speech to certainly risk offending me, and that's fine. More power to you, as far as I'm concerned."

His answer left Newman totally floundering. The good-natured Peterson smiled sweetly and said: "Ha, gotcha!"

But it was on the classic feminist issues that Newman was exposed as a vapid ideologue incapable of defending her cherished beliefs. Peterson's rational, fact-based responses to questions about women's achievements in the workplace went totally over her head. Newman responded to evidence with anecdotes, claimed he'd made statements he hadn't. Their discussion on the gender wag gap started like this:

Peterson: Multivariate analysis of the pay gap indicate that it doesn't exist
Newman: But that's just not true, is it. That nine per cent pay gap, that's a gap between median hourly earnings between men and women. That exists.

P: Yeah but there's multiple reasons for that. One of them is gender but it's not the only reason. If you're a social scientist worth your salt you never do a uni-varied analysis. You say, well, women in aggregate are paid less than men, then we break it down by age, occupation, interest, personality.

N: But you're saying basically it doesn't matter if women aren't getting to the top, because that's skewing that gender pay gap, isn't it. You're saying that's just a fact of life.

P: No, I'm not saying it doesn't matter. I'm saying there are multiple reasons for it that aren't being taken into account.

N: But why should women put up with those reasons? Why should women be content not to get to the top?

P: I'm not saying that they should put up with it, I'm saying that the claim that the wage gap between men and women is only due to sex is wrong, and it is wrong, there's no doubt about that. The multivariate analyses have been done."

And so went on, with Newman incessantly straw-manning, niggling, attacking and wilfully refusing to listen to Peterson's responses.

Many, like British sociologist Nicholas A Christakis, found themselves in awe of Peterson's cheerful, reasoned responses. "This man Jordan Peterson is preternaturally calm and composed in the face of a hostile interviewer who also had simply not thought adequately about her ideas and approach. Facts and reason are powerful allies," he tweeted.

But unfamiliar territory for feminists who are rarely confronted with this type of evidence, particularly in public. UK conservative politician Paul Weston points out that what's so extraordinary about the Peterson interview is that it managed to refute the ideological claptrap which holds sway throughout much of the mainstream media. As he says in a YouTube video posted this week, the anointed liberal elite which controls the media knows it doesn't represent popular opinion but "works tirelessly to make damn sure no one's allowed anywhere near the media bubble to propose a learned valid legitimate opinion."

Yet Peterson slipped through and Newman and her team were shown up for not doing their homework to discover why it is that this formidable man attracts literally millions of followers online. Journalist Tim Lott, writing last year in the Spectator UK, said that after listening to hours of Peterson's videos, he concludes the man is "one of the most important thinkers to emerge on the world stage for many years." As Newman discovered to her peril.

Bettina Arndt talks about the demonization of men in Australia

Bettina Arndt · 7 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Bettina Arndt gives a speech to Liberal Democrats about the demonization of men in Australia.

Cassie Jaye to attend ICMI'18 in London

Mike Buchanan · 8 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: A note to all. You have just seven weeks left from today's date to purchase your tickets for this years conference. Don't miss your chance to meet all the key players in the men's movement in one place. PE https://icmi18.wordpress.com/book-here/

We're delighted to report that Cassie Jaye, the American filmmaker behind the groundbreaking film The Red Pill, will be joining us at the conference. She'll be happy to stand for pictures, sign autographs, and will have The Red Pill merchandise available for purchase. She would also like to do interviews with some attendees for her YouTube channel. Evan Davies, who did all the camera work on The Red Pill, will be bringing his equipment. If you would like to be interviewed, let them know by sending an email to: info@theredpillmovie.com

We're delighted too that Barry Wright, a Norwich-based man, will also be attending the conference. He generously funded two screenings of The Red Pill in January 2017, and paid for the travel and accommodation of a number of people including Cassie, Erin Pizzey, Paul Elam, DoctorRandomercam and myself. A couple of photographs taken during that time, starting with Barry and Cassie:

[image]

[image]

Must-see, in-depth discussion on circumcision – Cassie Jaye and J. Steven Svoboda

Gary Costanza · 12 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

J. Steven Svoboda of Attorneys for the Rights of the Child (ARC) and NCFM is interviewed for Cassie Jaye's groundbreaking film "The Red Pill." Below is the full interview released by Jaye as part of her Red Pill/Raw Files series (#RPRF).

It doesn't get any better than this: enlightened Red-Pill filmmaker interviews longtime MRA and intactivist attorney J Steven Svoboda, discussing every aspect of circumcision and the movement to end it.

“You make me want to be a better man”

Raymond Cormier · 18 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Editor’s note: The following article exploring the courtly love trope in modern movies continues our series on the history of gendered customs. Note the deceptive appeal of romance, promising to “redeem” both men and women through their enactment of the medieval pantomime — when the more likely outcome of romantic love is disappoinment, sickness, ruin, and not infrequently death. – PW

ABSTRACT:
The title, “You Make Me Want to Be a Better Man”, is an unforgettable quotation from As Good As It Gets, the Jack Nicholson–Helen Hunt masterpiece (with Greg Kinnear). It occurs at about the midpoint in the 1997 film and Carol (played by Hunt) responds to Melvin (Nicholson) that it’s the best compliment she’s ever had in her life. As Roger Ebert quips: “It becomes clear that Melvin has been destined by the filmmakers to become a better man: First he accepts dogs, then children, then women, and finally even his gay neighbor.” Nevertheless, Melvin does change his ways and, under the influence of love, completely redirects his behavior.
Below I explore courtly love values in several contemporary movies, for example, Casablanca (1942), Roxanne (1987), Pretty Woman (1990), Beauty and the Beast (Disney 1991), Hercules (Disney 1997) Slumdog Millionaire (2008), and Tangled (2010). The hero or heroine saved through love and/or self-sacrifice constitute a guiding thread of the article; another focus is the “major personality shift” of the hero/heroine under the influence of love; and a third theme is the “quest and rescue” of the beloved. My diverse sources (comparanda) reach back to Marie de France’s courtly lai, Lanval as well as to the ineffable motifs of troubadour love service and the joy and largess/generosity emblematic of St. Francis of Assisi.

In his recent monograph, The Making of Romantic Love, William Reddy observes that the eleventh-century Gregorian Reform brought with it condemnations by the Church—seeking to eliminate “polluting” sexual desire among Christians—and thus proposed severe new constraints on marriage and sexual behavior. It is argued further that in response, European secular poets and romancers—like the troubadours—devised a furtive way around the whole matter, namely, by inaugurating what is called today romantic love. This dualistic new creation, which opposes love and desire and was forged in the context of honor and secrecy, is found by Reddy to have a far-reaching influence (361), though not universal, yet uniquely Western and principally cultural in origin (i.e., not biological or neurological).[1]

With regard to romantic love, Reddy’s three case studies (medieval Europe, South Asia and Heian Japan) examine court codes in particular, and for the Europeans, he deduces that spiritualized love incorporated selfless devotion (370) as well as radical dissent (352) from the Church’s “cosmic order.”[2] Adherents to the new values embraced, it would seem, individual conscience over blind obedience to the Church. Relative to our topic (in a work devoted in fact to women troubadours) one finds these words ‘of new values:’

> “In exchange for their prostration, the troubadours expected to be ennobled, enriched, or simply made ‘better’: ‘Each day I am a better man and purer / for I serve the noblest lady in the world […]’”.[3]

Some of the films considered here belong to the “romantic comedy” genre, analysis of which is exemplified by the 2003 study by Deleyto, “Between Friends.” For such works, a tripartite categorization is proposed[4]: “nervous romance (tension filled),” “new romance (featuring independent women),” and “deceptive narratives” (fashionable and highlighting “constructions of a representation” in spite of soundtracks with old love songs).

Deleyto finds that friendship, in many films, is more important than love (171), and that the greater presence of female friendship signals the malleability of the genre (176). Deleyto writes (168): “[… an] unexpected new tendency has arisen within [the genre] over the last fifteen years or so in a growing number of contemporary romantic comedies, heterosexual love appears to be challenged, and occasionally replaced, by friendship.”

In this article, however, I intend to explore not friendship, not film weddings and not specifically the romantic comedy film in any significant way. Rather, I examine what may be named courtly values—as part of the courtly legacy from the Middle Ages—in over a dozen modern movies, from Casablanca (1942) to Tangled (2010). "Hero/heroine saved through love and/or self-sacrifice" will be one guiding thread of the analysis. Another focus is the "major personality shift" of the hero under the influence of love (as seen to a degree in As Good As It Gets, even more so in Pretty Woman). A third theme is the "quest and rescue" of the beloved (this can even be from a loveless marriage, as found in Excalibur). Films were selected among a number of successful productions, because they illustrate the prevalence of the themes in question.[5] Limitations of space will prevent examination of other films that may suggest to some readers further links to courtliness, to the courtly legacy or to any number of medieval costume dramas.[6]

My hypothesis should be stated clearly: courtly values were palpable—neither a medieval fantasy nor a Romantic invention. This conjecture still needs to be put to scientific testing, which I will leave to other scholars to prove or refute. A more systematic survey, for which there is no space here, would likely reveal a significant imprint of the same themes on a wide range of contemporary films.

Such values and courtly love (the usual term is fin'amors, "true, fine, refined love") survive to an extent today, a viewpoint not shared by all scholars.[7] In his monograph Ennobling Love, Stephen Jaeger, while not using the fraught terms "courtly love" or "courtly legacy," does assert that medieval "spiritualized" or "charismatic" love did not die out as such (5-6), though in his conclusion (212) he observes that "the paradigm of ideal love", once established in medieval, early modern and modern narratives, is then destroyed "by revealing its false and destructive side."

The term itself was invented in the late nineteenth century as a way of characterizing relationships found principally in French romances and poetry popular in the twelfth and thirteenth century, which were produced in and for, and which have been seen to emblemize court settings.[8] Such love (for me, obviously, much more than a stylized game of flirtation), in the poetic context, is true, joyful and intense; it harmonizes with the commonweal and with divine intentions. Love brings, as we shall see, abundant feelings of liberation, of transformation and self-actualization. Jane Burns concedes the significance of courtly love when she concludes (48):

> […] despite its heteronormative veneer and its tendency to displace and occlude women as subjects, courtly love, when taken as the full range of amorous scenarios staged between elite heterosexual couples in a court setting, offers models for love relations that disrupt the binary and exclusive categories of male and female and masculine and feminine used typically to structure the Western romantic love story.

While the influence of powerful troubadour motifs is undeniable, let us cite here one brief northern French text as a kind of shorthand, for emphasis. It is a brief narrative or lai that illustrates certain courtly values.

Lanval, Marie de France's eponymous hero, is a sad, forlorn Arthurian knight, abandoned, lonely, and helpless. An otherworldly sequence brings to him a wealthy and supremely stunning noblewoman (a fairy princess) with whom he becomes "well lodged." His liberation from the bonds of solitary abandonment lead to liberality (he now gives freely to all comers), the medieval ideal of generosity, "the queen of virtues."[9] Kindness and love rescue him, as they do several male characters in modern film.[10] Northern French poets emphasized too the "chivalry topos," that is, that love motivates the knight in love and he becomes a better person through his adventures, thus meriting his beloved all the more. Noble love ennobles; in this better world too (for Auerbach), the apolitical "feudal ethos" encompasses "self-realization" (116-117). Clearly, we cannot accede to the damning proclamation of D. W. Robertson:

> The study of courtly love, if it belongs anywhere, should be conducted only as the subject is an aspect of nineteenth and twentieth century cultural history. The subject has nothing to do with the Middle Ages, and its use as a governing concept can only be an impediment to our understanding of medieval texts. (18)

Courtly thinking existed in the Middle Ages and is manifested in the modern era.[11] Each of the films we analyze here will of course not yield up every feature of the courtly mode, but still I sense that there is enough medieval residue and resonance in each to justify the argument, that, as some might put it succinctly, "courtly themes continue to generate artistic creation." Along these lines, one wonders if the strong continuity of the Troubadour ethos—in particular that longing for a "far-away love"—is what underlies the resonances and residues. Love stories, requited or not, remain viable even in today's hip-hop world.

It has been reasoned that the two principal and most admired modes of courtly behavior were generosity and joy. Aristocratic courtly culture held that "the lady" was lord, and the lover's role was to serve her, to sing about her merits and qualities, and carry out all imaginable actions to remain or become worthy of her, in a word, to deserve her.[12] The function of love in this context was as dictated by the De amore of Andreas Capellanus (ca. 1185): "Love easily attained is of little value; difficulty in obtaining it makes it precious" and "Everything a lover does ends in the thought of the beloved."[13] For Auerbach, the synthetic term corteisie embodied values like the "refinement of the laws of combat, courteous social intercourse, service of women" (117).

In what is dubbed the long European twelfth century (1050-1250), French humanism predominated, a phenomenon already analyzed historiographically at length. As Italianist Ronald Witt recently put it (2012: 317): "The term 'humanism' aptly describes French culture in the period […]." In this context, interior monologue and dialogue arose from a new awareness of the interior life (the unique individual is now consciously separate from the court), which was further linked to the chivalric adventure/quest whereby audiences yearned for the unusual and the marvelous—now stimulated especially by wondrous stories brought back from the East by returning Crusaders (in particular the First-ca. 1100, and Second-ca. 1150). In discussing this particular type of medieval love, Aldo Scaglione has written (559):

> The radical interiorization of the love experience carried with it the impossibility of communicating with the love object (topos of ineffability). Not only did poets profess themselves incapable of communicating to the beloved the depth of their passion, but the very lack of communication was for them both a sign of its depth and a consequence of it, to the point of entailing the complete physical absence of the lady.

Transformation through kindness and love, the frequent quest motif, the rescue of the hero/heroine—such are the narrative innovations associated with these elements (even the ineffable moment can be noted in at least one film, Roxane). Allied terms include honesty and humility—for perfection of the knight depended on his courtly worth, manifested through continuous bravery and feats of arms, humbly accomplished so to enhance and vouchsafe his honor and his nobility. Such aims for flawlessness were mirrored by the lady's perfection, inspired too by her knight/liege. Of course, adultery occurs as co-incidental in this context, as does a "religion of love," whereby mutual suffering and adoration are obligatory[14]. Let us see how all this plays out in the series of films selected for analysis.

The romantic comedy As Good As It Gets, the Jack Nicholson and Helen Hunt masterpiece (with Greg Kinnear), has provided the main title of this essay. The iconic line, "You Make Me Want to Be A Better Man," is spoken by the misanthropic Melvin Udall (Jack Nicholson), whose obsessive-compulsive behavior and pathological germophobia strangle all of his human interactions. In the penultimate sequence, after he affronts and insults Carol (played by Hunt), his apology, necessary to get back into her good wishes, is a confession that he wants to merit her and deserve her respect (enough so that he can have their relationship return to its prior arrangement). One can say that all his motivations are selfish (arranging to care for Carol's asthmatic son, putting up with his gay artist neighbor and then the neighbor's dog), yet he is redeemed in the end, having moderated somewhat his odd manners.[15] If not mere empathy, a kind of love is born in Melvin's heart—even for his gay neighbor, for the dog, even for his neighbor's African-American agent, and especially for Carol. For in the end, he is "a better man."

Perhaps no genuinely touching and dreamlike modern film has captioned courtly features as much as Pretty Woman (1990), in which the Richard Gere character (Edward) undergoes a major personality shift, from ruthless business tycoon to generous shipbuilder, as a result of his experience of love for/with (an apparently) blonde streetwalker named Vivian (played by Julia Roberts).[16] The wig disguises, as it were, her true personality. Over and above the film's obvious Cinderella theme, it has been argued in fact, in a reversal of traditional gender roles, that it is she, Vivian, who, as the "Fair Unknown" (Scala 35), is transformed from "veiled" Hollywood Boulevard prostitute into a truly "noble character," a change attributable to soul-sharing (with Edward—neither "wimp nor wild man"[17]), catalyzed by the experience of a San Francisco opera performance focused on the heroine Violetta (La Traviatta). Vivian's real character is revealed too in an early scene when she drives, like a NASCAR expert, Edward's sports car, then again in the bathtub scene, where she sexually enfolds him in her extra-long legs.

But, after their goodbyes, when Edward unexpectedly returns (in a white stretch limo) to Vivian's apartment at the very end of the film, he scales the fire escape (in spite of his fear of heights) to "rescue the princess in the tower." He has undergone a total conversion, from emotionless corporate raider to brave, forgiving and loving human. Tellingly, he asks the now red-haired (and post-feminist) Vivian what happens after the knight rescues the princess, she replies that she saves the hero "right back," another revelation of a "reversal of gender roles" (Scala 38).[18] And, as Genz recently put the question of the "post-feminist woman" (PFW). The PFW wants to "have it all" as she refuses to dichotomize and choose between her public and private, feminist, and feminine identities. She rearticulates and blurs the binary distinctions between feminism and femininity, between professionalism and domesticity, refuting monolithic and homogeneous definitions of postfeminist subjectivity.[19] Reddy, in his analysis of this film posits it as a mirror of the sexual revolution of the 1960s and 1970s (380-381), whereby prostitution is permissible and sexual desire is destigmatized, but still stands in opposition to love, since both characters, now mutually devoted to each other, give up their life of "mere appetites."[20] Edward is thus a better man, Vivian a better woman.

Going back now to the World War II era, we will glance briefly at the great 1942 classic, Casablanca, in which, again surprisingly and ironically, the bitter and cynical refugee hero Rick Blaine (Humphrey Bogart) is transformed not by passionate love, but in this case through a self-effacing compassion. He just wants his beloved Ilsa (the woman between two men story), played famously by Ingrid Bergman) to be happy, for, as he remarks to her—"We'll always have Paris." In the final sequence, Rick, his tough-guy veneer now gone, surrenders two objects, one tangible, the other human—i.e., the vital letters of transit for transport out of Morocco, along with his chance for love with Ilsa. In a meeting with her and her husband Lazlo (the Resistance-fighter) at the Casablanca airport, the now-noble Rick swallows his resentment toward her and yields himself to a new emotion, empathy mixed with admiration for both Ilsa's devotion and Lazlo's political cause. And he opines: "It doesn't take much to see that the problems of three little people don't amount to a hill of beans in this crazy world." In a dramatic gesture of magnanimity, Rick turns Ilsa over to the freedom fighter. Generosity and self-sacrifice redeem the hero as it will the other protagonists, even in different ways.

At this point, we will turn to three animated films (one of which is inspired by a live-action archetypal film produced just a few years after Casablanca). I refer to Beauty and the Beast, known today mainly through the 1991 Disney version. The lesser-known account that inspired the modern and magical remake is the Jean Cocteau classic, a contemporary parable based on a seventeenth-century French tale. The flawless Belle—to pay for her father's transgression and obliged to dwell within the Beast's castle—finds the beast repulsive, but, eventually, love is the potion that will transform both her and the Beast within; he is saved through Belle's own generous change of heart as she responds to his kindness and favors. Similarly, Belle's pity, patience, growing admiration and slowly-receding fear of the Beast, brings her to lower her guard and embrace the creature. Once she does love him (as foretold), the enchantment magically evaporates, the Beast is tamed and everything is joyfully transformed—by their love and new-found respect for each other.[21]

Redemption of a different sort rescues the mythological hero Hercules from the depths of weakened loss and despair. In this 1997 Disney film, the once-powerful and immortal youth attempts to save the life of Megara, his beloved (to provoke the hero, she was slain by Hercules' nemesis Hades). His awesome powers had been taken from him by the villain but Hercules miraculously regains his strength through mutual love, and is on his way to become a “true hero”— just as (Samson-like) he lifts a huge column that had fallen on Meg. He is wholly and joyfully restored—by love—as a proper and divine hero, and elevated to Mt. Olympus.

In Disney’s 2010 Tangled, the heroine Rapunzel undergoes a major personality shift as a result of her encounter with the hero Eugene. It is in fact he who is responsible for getting her out of the imprisoning tower (using a ruse along with the appeal of the mysterious tiara—it’s hers, it is discovered, and she’s the princess!). In an interesting twist and role-reversal, Eugene tells Rapunzel that she was his new dream and Rapunzel says he was hers. Eugene dies in Rapunzel’s arms. In despair, Rapunzel sings the “Healing Incantation,” and begins to cry. Moved by her love and kindness, the last remnants of a magical flower’s enchantments condense in her tear, which heals Eugene. Later, the two return to the castle to meet her parents and eventually marry, living happily ever after. Rapunzel is redeemed through reciprocal love.

One must expect courtly themes in a medieval film like Excalibur (1981), set presumably in the late fourteenth or fifteenth century, bearing “mythical truth, not historical,” according to its director John Boorman.[22] When the charismatic character of Lancelot first appears, he battles with Arthur’s knights, then with Arthur himself. Summoning such superhuman power that the sword Excalibur is cracked in half, Arthur overcomes Lancelot, though the new champion enigmatically but with great nobility bows to the king and offers him fealty. With the twelve-year peace across Britain established, along with the Round Table and its famed fellowship, Arthur proclaims he will marry. The relationship between Lancelot and Guinevere at first encapsulates what Scaglione named (see above) the “impossibility of communicating with the love object (topos of ineffability).”

But then, while escorting the bride Guinevere to the wedding (each, now love struck, having already undergone a coup de foudre), Lancelot is asked by her if he will find a soul mate to love and marry. His reply goes like this: I have found someone. It is you, Guinevere. I will love no other while you live. “I will love you always as queen and wife of my best friend.” Several scenes later, the queen is charged with adultery and Lancelot (now aware of her unhappy marriage) is at once named her champion—to defend her honor.

Such a scenario is familiar to scholars, but surely the millions of non-specialists who have seen the film must relate somehow to this courtly episode. As if enacting a Occitan love lyric, each has been mightily unfaithful: Guinevere in her longing glances, Lancelot in his fixed staring. But finally they must surrender to their passion. Their shameful infidelity, a deep wound, paralleled by Arthur’s own (unwilling) incestuous coupling with his half-sister Morgana, brings on a terre gaste, a horrid, morbid and gross wasting of both Arthur’s body and the land. The courtly and anti-courtly elements here predominate: the lovers’ religion of love easily nullifies any idea of a stylized game of flirtation. No one is improved this time.

In the romantic comedy, Roxanne (1987), brilliantly adapted by Steve Martin from Rostand’s Cyrano de Bergerac, the astronomer heroine (Daryl Hannah) argues with the genuinely courtly hero (C. D. Bates, Martin’s tennis-playing fireman). In the final sequence (to this woman between two men story) the hero reveals himself as the epitome of generosity by interceding for another man and wooing the heroine on his behalf. Bates says in the end that all Roxanne wanted was the perfect man who was both physically beautiful, emotionally mature and verbally adept. Finally, Bates (who loved her from the beginning, but direct communication with her was not possible—once more, the ineffable!) and Roxanne forgive one another as she confesses her love for him, in spite of his extraordinarily characteristic nose: it gives him uniqueness, she thinks, observing that flat-nosed people are boring and featureless. Feelings of compassion, admiration, tenderness and understanding change her point of view. The joyful humor and big-heartedness of the film charm the viewer.

We turn next to a blockbuster, the mysterious 1999 science fiction “cyberpunk-cyber thriller,” The Matrix. Amidst all the computer-generated graphics, amazing action scenes and visual effects, futuristic costumes, the enigmatic significance of The Matrix itself, and the secretive feelings Trinity (Carrie Ann Moss) experiences for the hero, Neo (Keanu Reeves), the story really embodies a simple and beautiful fairy-tale component. Trinity’s destiny was to fall in love with “the One” (prophesied as a savior-healer and super manipulator of The Matrix). The romantic relationship of the two is not revealed until the very end of the film, but Trinity’s act of kissing Neo powerfully resuscitates him within the sentient world (his interfaced physical body) and within The Matrix as well, where his avatar has been active. It is a phenomenal moment when the obscure meaning of The Matrix, Trinity's love (from afar!) for Neo and Neo's resurrection and fate are revealed all at once. Trinity does not have to quest for Neo: his sentient body remained right there with her in the laboratory. One can argue that Neo's life is saved (literally) through the efforts and love of a beloved: Trinity has loved Neo all along. One can also posit that Neo's acceptance of his destiny as "the One" is augmented by his awareness of Trinity's love for him.

At the very opening of the film's sequel, The Matrix Reloaded, the two have now become lovers, and, in one of the film's final sequences, Neo has a choice: save mankind from extinction (it would happen through a "system reboot"), resulting in the survival of the destructive machines (but not humanity), or choosing to save Trinity's life: in a face-to-face battle with an Agent (humanoid robot of The Matrix), she crashes out of a window and a bullet pierces her heart. In his abbreviated and breathtaking quest, Neo catches her in mid-air, but she dies. Loath to allow Trinity's death, Neo uses his superhuman abilities to remove the bullet and revive her. The balance of the two scenes is perfect: in The Matrix it is Trinity who rescues Neo, while in the sequel Neo the hero saves his beloved through love. These films do not illustrate every aspect of courtliness or court culture, but the revealing moment does transport the viewer to a realm of heightened emotion. As in Hercules, love reigns supreme.[23]

Our final film is Slumdog Millionaire, billed as a kind of bildungsroman, a straightforward story about Jamal Malik, an eighteen-year old orphan from the slums of Mumbai. But the film has multiple strata, and underlying the story is Jamal's search for his "far-away love"—a theme made legendary by twelfth-century Occitan poet Jaufre Rudel's amor de lonh.[24] As the film's narrative revolves around "Kaun Banega Crorepati," the Indian TV version of Who Wants To Be A Millionaire? each chapter of Jamal's increasingly layered story reveals where he learned the responses to the show's seemingly impossible questions. To witness the unfolding of Jamal's life journey—surviving as a street urchin/career thief, his many colorful adventures, gang encounters, his job serving tea in a call center—helps to explain several mysteries, like how and why he ended up as a featured contestant, but most especially how he knows the answers. His life story—in reality a quest—includes being orphaned at an early age; growing up with an older brother, who was both his guardian/protector and antagonist (a kind of rival and dark "other"); and having a relationship since childhood with another orphaned child, a girl named Latika.

A parallel plot line deals with the law—in the present-time episodes, the police grill him to determine how Jamal can be doing so well on the show when others who are brighter, more educated and wealthier fail. Is he cheating? Is it purely luck? But the fact is, the complex and interwoven story is simply a tale of love: every action of Jamal is motivated by his search for his lost childhood love, Latika. The resplendent joy manifested in the final sequences—an emblem, we recall, of courtly life (Battais 135)—unlocks all the puzzles and enigmas of the film.[25] With great generosity of character, Jamal, enduring and shaking off all sorts of suffering and pain, was searching endlessly for Latika: that is why he found a way to get himself recruited to be a contestant for the game show, for he knew she would be watching and that they would be able to meet together, finally, at a designated locale, and no doubt live "happily ever after" and in joy.[26]

As we have seen, in these selected films (and in many other contemporary ones) transformation through kindness and love frequently manifests itself as a part of the finale. The quest motif very often subsumes the conversion—not necessarily as dramatic as an Augustinian one—yet nevertheless resulting in the rescue of the hero/heroine, where rescue is a generic term including redemption, resuscitation and/or vindication. Melvin Udall, Edward and Vivian, Lancelot, Neo and even Rick Blaine—all are made over or made better by love. Beauty and the Beast, Hercules, Rapunzel and Eugene—these are characters transformed from within; Jamal Malik's life quest, motivated by a far-away love, ends in a glorious epiphany. An explanatory rationale for the preceeding essay might suggest how faintly aware of these themes our readers might be, but the need remains to inform them of their exact correspondence with courtly love themes. However much it has been transplanted, the courtly legacy sustains. And "the better man" (or woman) survives today.

Works Cited

- 10. Dir. Blake Edwards. Orion Pictures, 1979. Film.
- Aberth, John. (2003). A Knight at the Movies: Medieval History on Film. New York: Routledge.
- As Good As It Gets. Dir. James L. Brooks. Gracie Films, 1997. Film.
- At First Sight. Dir. Irwin Winkler. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM), 1999. Film.
- Auerbach, Erich. (1957). Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature. Trans. Willard Trask. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor.
- Battais, Lise. "La Courtoisie de François d'Assise: Influence de la littérature épique et courtoise sur la premičre génération franciscaine." Mélanges de l'Ecole française de Rome—Moyen-Age, Temps modernes 109 (1997): 131-160.
- Beauty and The Beast ("La belle et la bęte"). Dir. Jean Cocteau. DisCina, 1946. Film.
- Beauty and the Beast. Dir. Gary Trousdale and Kirk Wise. Walt Disney Pictures, 1991. Film.
- Bernau, Anke, and Bettina Bildhauer. (2011). Medieval Film (Filming the Middle Ages). London, Reaktion Books Ltd.
- Bogin, Magda. (1980). The Women Troubadours. New York and London: W. W. Norton.
- Burns, E. Jane. "Courtly Love: Who Needs It? Recent Feminist Work in the Medieval French Tradition." Signs, 27 (2001): 23-57.
- Casablanca. Dir. Michael Curtiz. Warner Brothers Pictures, 1942. Film.
- Deleyto, Celestino. "Between Friends: Love and Friendship in Contemporary Hollywood Romantic Comedy." Screen 44, 2 (2003): 167-182.
- Driver, Martha W., and Sid Ray. (2004). The Medieval Hero on Screen: Representations from Beowulf to Buffy. Jefferson, North Carolina: McFarland.
- Duby, Georges. "Le modèle courtois," in Histoire des femmes en Occident, ed. G. Duby and M. Perrot (v. 2, Le Moyen Âge, ed. Ch. Klapisch-Zuber). Paris: Perrin, 1991.
- Elliott, Andrew B. R. (2003). Remaking the Middle Ages: The Methods of Cinema and History in Portraying the Medieval World. Jefferson, North Carolina: McFarland.
- Excalibur. Dir. John Boorman. Orion Pictures; distributed by Warner Bros., 1981. Film.
- Fatal Attraction. Dir. Adrian Lyne. Paramount Pictures, 1987. Film.
- Finke, Laurie A., and Martin B. Shichtman. (2003). Cinematic Illuminations: The Middle Ages on Film. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins UP.
- Galician, Mary-Lou. (2002). Sex, Love, and Romance in the Mass Media Analysis and Criticism of Unrealistic Portrayals and Their Influence. Routledge Communication Series. New York and Oxford: Routledge.
- Genz, Stephanie. "Singled Out: Postfeminism's 'New Woman' and the Dilemma of Having It All." The Journal of Popular Culture 43 (2010): 97–119.
- Grossel, Marie-Geneviève. "Remarques sur le motif du 'service d'amour' chez quelques trouvères des cercles champenois." Cahiers de Recherches Médiévales 15 (2008): 265-276.
- Grice, Paul. (1989) Studies in the Way of Words. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Hercules. Dir. Ron Clements and John Musker. Walt Disney Pictures, 1997. Film.
- Hume, Kathryn. (1985) Fantasy and Mimesis: Responses to Reality in Western Literature. New York: Routledge.
- Jeffers-McDonald, Tamar. (2007) Romantic Comedy: Boy Meets Girl Meets Genre. London and New York: Wallfower.
- Johnson, Kimberly R., and Bjarne M. Holmes (2009) "Contradictory Messages: A Content Analysis of Hollywood-Produced Romantic Comedy Feature Films." Communication Quarterly 57, 3 (2009): 352–373.
- Kantor, Jodi. "Elite Women Put a New Spin on an Old Debate." New York Times June 22, 2012. Consulted online: .

- Kelly, Douglas. “Courtly Love in Perspective: The Hierarchy of Love in Andreas Capellanus.” Traditio 24 (1968): 119-148.
- Kim, Ji-hyun Philippa (2012). “Pour une littérature médiévale moderne: Gaston Paris, l’”amour courtois” et les enjeux de la modernité.” Coll. Essais sur le Moyen Age, n° 55. Paris: Honoré Champion.
- Leithart, Peter J. Zizek and Courtly Love. 4.29.15. http://www.firstthings.com/blogs/leithart/2015/04/zizek-and-courtly-love. Retrieved 12 July 2015.
- Lewis, C. S. (1936) The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition. Oxford: Oxford UP.
- Marcabru. “L’autrier jost’una sebissa.” In The Medieval Pastourelle, vol. 1, edited and translated by William D. Paden, 36-41. New York: Garland, 1987.
- Marie de France.(1954) Lais. Ed. A. Ewert. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Monson, Don A. “The Troubadour’s Lady Reconsidered Again.” Speculum 70 (1995): 255-274.
- Novak, Michael. The Myth of Romantic Love. 2.14.11. http://www.firstthings.com/web-exclusives/2011/02/the-myth-of-romantic-love. Retrieved 12 July 2015.
- Peberdy, Donna. “From Wimps to Wild Men: Bipolar Masculinity and the Paradoxical Performances of Tom Cruise.” Men and Masculinities 13 (2010): 231-254.
- Poètes et romanciers du Moyen Age, (1952) Ed. Albert Pauphilet. Pléiade. Paris: Gallimard.
- Pretty Woman. Dir. Garry Marshall. Touchstone Pictures and Silver Screen Partners IV, 1990. Film.
- Pugh, Tison, and Susan Aronstein, Eds. 2004. The Disney Middle Ages: A Fairy-Tale and Fantasy Past (New Middle Ages). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Raw, Laurence. “Imaginative History and Medieval Film.” Adaptation 5, 2 (2012): 262-267.
- Reddy, William M. (2012) The Making of Romantic Love: Longing and Sexuality in Europe, South Asia, and Japan, 900-1200 CE (Chicago Studies in Practices of Meaning). Chicago: U Chicago P.
- Robertson, D. W. (1968) “The Concept of Courtly Love as an Impediment to the Understanding of Medieval Texts.” in The Meaning of Courtly Love, ed. F. X. Newman. Albany, NY: State University of New York, 1-18.
- Roxanne. Dir. Fred Schepisi. Columbia Pictures Industries, IndieProd Company Productions, L.A. Films, 1987. Film.
- Saturday Night Fever. Dir. John Badham. Producer: Robert Stigwood Organization (RSO). Distributed by Paramount Pictures. 1977. Film.
- Scaglione, Aldo. “Petrarchan Love and the Pleasures of Frustration.” Journal of the History of Ideas 58 (1997): 557-572.
- Scala, Elizabeth. “Pretty Women: The Romance of the Fair Unknown, Feminism, and Contemporary Romantic Comedy.” Film & History 29 (1999): 34-45.
- Schultz, James A. (2006) Courtly Love, the Love of Courtliness, and the History of Sexuality. Chicago: U Chicago P.
- Slumdog Millionaire. Dir. Danny Boyle. Fox Searchlight Pictures and Warner Brothers Pictures, 2008. Film.
- Tangled. Dir. Nathan Greno and Byron Howard. Walt Disney Pictures, 2010. Film.
- The Matrix. Dir. Andy Wachowski and Larry Wachowski. Village Roadshow Pictures, Silver Pictures, Groucho II Film Partnership; distributed by Warner Bros. Pictures, 1999. Film.
- The Matrix Reloaded. Dir. Andy Wachowski and Larry Wachowski. Village Roadshow Pictures, Silver Pictures; distributed by Warner Bros. Pictures, 2003. Film.
- The Princess Bride. Dir. Rob Reiner. Act III Communications, Buttercup Films Ltd., The Princess Bride Ltd., 1987. Film.
- The Wild One. Dir. Laslo Benedek. Columbia Pictures, 1953. Film.

- Walsh, P. G., ed. and trans. (1982) Andreas Capellanus on Love. London: Duckworth.
- Witt, Ronald G. (2012) The Two Latin Cultures and the Foundation of Renaissance Humanism in Medieval Italy. Cambridge: Cambridge UP.
- Zipes, Jack. (2011) The Enchanted Screen: The Unknown History of Fair-Tale Films. New York: Routledge.

Notes

[1] William A. Reddy, The Making of Romantic Love, 14-16; on "desire as sexual appetite," see 105-107, 220, 351-352; on romantic love and anthropology, 16-21. See as well James Schultz, Courtly Love, the Love of Courtliness…, xvi, xxi, 91-94 (on the courtly paragon)—another recent publication, more specifically on courtly love itself, that posits an eroticization of noble power arising from paradigmatic roles of refinement and social distinction.
Also topically of interest is Galician's work, Sex, Love and Romance, more negatively-oriented self-help guide than scholarly analysis, deals with "rescue fantasies" (26), courtly love, 28-29, as well as more than a few films, including Coming to America (156), Ever After and Far and Away (169), Legally Blonde (199), Jerry Maguire (206) and What Women Want (138).

[2] Reddy's focus unfortunately occludes the influences on twelfth-century European verse and romance of, among others, antecedent Arabic poetry as well as Marian devotional lyrics.

[3] Magda Bogin, The Women Troubadours, p. 56.

[4] Celestino Deleyto, "Between Friends," 169.

[5] Selection was nowhere near as systematic as that found in the modern media study by Johnson and Holmes; their "RomCom" films all had implications for adolescents, containing in fact (they concluded) contradictory messages (366) with both desirable and undesirable outcomes to romantic relationships; only four of the forty films studied seemed familiar to me (You've Got Mail, Runaway Bride, What Women Want, and Sabrina—all still non-courtly it would seem).

[6] This essay is dedicated to a colleague and friend of over forty years, Deborah Nelson-Campbell of Rice University.
Regarding other films I might have selected for study here, or recent scholarship that I might have "engaged" with, lack of space obliges me to disregard a spate of references to medieval legacies in cinema: medieval scholar Kathryn Hume deals mainly with fantasy, not courtly matters; extreme and heavily theoretical works like Bernau and Bildhauer's Filming the Middle Ages or Pugh and Aronstein's The Disney Middle Ages (major recipe discovery: traditional gender roles are reinforced in Disney movies, and Tangled is labeled "racist, speciesist…"—204). In theme-based studies like A Knight at the Movies, Aberth is oriented more to epic than romance and to films like Camelot, El Cid, Robin Hood, Seventh Seal, The Navigator, or to Joan of Arc films, and he does not mention any potential aspects of courtly values; while comprehensive and definitive Finke and Shichtman's Cinematic Illuminations focuses on historicism and film conventions and does not deal with courtly subjects, nor does Elliott's more recent Remaking the Middle Ages while offering innovative semiotic and historiographical analyses. Driver and Ray's The Medieval Hero glosses over chivalry and knighthood (12-13, 44-45, esp. 73-87) but does not confront courtly issues directly. Laurence Raw reviews several other recent books in this category.

[7] See C. Stephen Jaeger, Ennobling Love: In Search of a Lost Sensibility. For D. W. Robertson, the medieval phenomenon never existed: "I have never been convinced that there was any such thing as what is usually called courtly love during the Middle Ages" (1).

[8] On fin'amors see Reddy, 164-167; also, Burns, Kelly and Monson provide full details and background on the subject; see Kim for the term "amour courtois."

[9] On this work, Burns writes with urgency (47): "As courtly heroines resist, recast, and manipulate paradigms of femininity, the standard scenarios available for male lovers shift as well. The anomalous and highly courtly fairy heroine in Marie de France's twelfth-century Lai de Lanval, for example, openly displays the stunning beauty and refined behavior of the classic, commodified courtly lady while riding heroically to defend her seemingly helpless lover in a legal suit. The effect of this woman's uncharacteristic participation in the legal system at King Arthur's court is to disrupt it substantially and to defy simultaneously our preconceived notions of gendered options in the courtly world […]. While this heroine plays both parts of lovely lady and heroic knight, her lover Lanval is cast as stunningly 'beautiful' but not effeminate. He is a courtly suitor propositioned atypically by the lady's expression of desire and a lover not required to prove his chivalric mettle in deeds of prowess"—obviously a view of the text quite different from mine.

[10] My methodology will not include reference to courtliness or to the pragmatics of politeness/impoliteness (see e.g., Grice, Studies in the Way of Words); nor will I deal with obsessive-compulsive, erotic and neurotic Tristan & Iseut-type passionate love, as demonstrated in the movie 10 (George fanatically pursues Jenny) and/or Fatal Attraction (psychopathic Alex hounds Dan endlessly). As Genz observes (119), "[t]he film's villain, Alex Forrest (Glenn Close), is forcefully prevented from 'having it all' as her joint desires to succeed in her career and have a child with her lover are represented as equivalent to madness and ultimately resulting in death. Thus, the backlash reinforces the division between professional and domestic world […], maintaining that women have to opt between a typical existence as a woman and independence." On the other hand, At First Sight features a generous female (another "gender-bending" role reversal) who attempts to "save" the blind hero (i.e., find a way to bring him sightedness) but complications thwart her success.

[11] Contemporary relevance is found as well in the writings of theorist Slavoj Zizek who saw courtly love as masochistic; one reviewer wrote that Zizek "sees courtly love everywhere still. It's not a medieval phenomenon only, but a contemporary one. The femme fatale is an heiress of the cruel lady of courtly love […]." (Leithart, "Zizek and Courtly Love"—a account of The Metastases of Enjoyment: On Women and Causality by Zizek.)

[12] Battais, 133-135. Cf. G. Duby, "Le modèle courtois," in Histoire des femmes en Occident, 261-276. Reddy, 108-109, 219-220, describes what he calls a "longing for association" in the context of romantic love.

[13] De amore, ed. Walsh, 1.6.371 (146), 377 (148), 399 (156); 2.8.44 (282).

[14] See C. S. Lewis, Allegory of Love. On "love service" to/for the Lady, see Grossel's essay.

[15] Surprisingly, the final scene of Saturday Night Fever in which Tony and Stephanie conclude the story, reveals a similar sentiment: Stephanie—"There were other reasons why I was hanging around you. / Tony—What do you mean? / St—You made me feel better. You gave me admiration, you know? Respect. Support. / T—Stephanie, maybe now, when I'm going to be in town, maybe we could see each other. I don't mean like that. I know you're thinking I'm promoting your pussy. I mean like friends. Like you said: we could help each other. / St—You want to be friends? / T—I'd like to be friends with you. / St—Do you think you know how? Do you think you could be friends with a girl? Could you stand that? / T—The truth? I don't know. I could try. That's all I can say. / St—OK." < http://www.script-o-rama.com/movie_scripts/s/saturday-night-fever-script-transcript.html>. Accessed 12 Oct. 2015.

[16] For Deleyto (170), this film curiously reveals a "postmodern aesthetic of ironic vampirization of traditional rituals."

[17] See Peberdy's article. For Pretty Woman, Reddy, 176-179, 180, sees parallels with the Lancelot romance by Chrétien de Troyes ; for Lancelot and adultery, parallels with Casablanca.

[18] Perhaps a stretch, but I see a parallel here with the famous pastorela of innovative Occitan troubadour Marcabru: the rhythm and tone of the dialogue, its frankness (the shepherdess, in the chilly wind, has admirable nipples; the knight wants to see her beneath him to do together the "sweet thing" (per far la cauza dousanna), etc.) remind me of the banter between Edward and Vivian, particularly during the first half of the film.

[19] Genz, 98. The term today is the "higher-harder-faster school of female achievement" and, in the oracular proclamation of Ms. Sandberg (CEO of Facebook): "require your partner to do half the work at home, don't underestimate your own abilities, and don't cut back on ambition out of fear that you won't be able to balance work and children." (Kantor NYT)

[20] In this regard, see Jeffers-McDonald on the sub-genre "radical romantic comedy" of the sixties (59-84), that interrogates romance's ideology itself, a result of the profound social changes of the era; she perceives in such films a conspicuous self-reflexivity, self-consciousness and self-absorption—what one called narcissism back in the day.

[21] Fairy-tale specialist Jack Zipes has this to say about the numerous Beauty and the Beast films: they are "self help films [that] basically [offer] variations on the same theme: how to help attractive, seemingly strong women realize that appearances are deceiving and that happiness in wedlock is within their grasp if they understand the goodness of good-hearted men" (239).

[22] As for relevance and continuity of appeal, one may note the film's total domestic gross: $35 million—a testament to its success with audiences.

[23] Chaos, death and mayhem reign in yet another film worthy of mention in this context: The Wild One (1953): the motorcycle hooliganism cannot overshadow the eight-minute romantic and quiet interlude (the hero safely escorts the girl away from violence), during which a desperate Kathy (Mary Murphy) expresses to the brooding Johnny (Marlon Brando) her yearning for salvation by "someone" who will rescue her from small-town mediocrity.

[24] See, for example, Jaufre Rudel, "Quan lo rius de la fontana…" (amors de terra lonhdana) and "Lanquan li jorn son lonc en may…" (l'amor de lonh) in Poètes et romanciers du Moyen Age, ed. Pauphilet, 780-784.

[25] Channeling St. Francis of Assisi, Battais observes (136) that pain delights the courtly lover since it can no doubt lead to ultimate happiness.

[26] Michael Novak observes, on the very subject of that "rarefied spiritual passion" in a "higher sphere" known only to romantic lovers:. "Romantic love is a transfiguring force, something beyond delight and pain, an ardent beatitude, purer, more spiritual, more uplifting than physical "hooking up." It is not a sated appetite, but in fact quite the opposite. It loves the feeling of never being satisfied, of being always caught up in the longing, of dwelling in the sweetness of desire […]. This is why romantic love desperately needs obstacles […]." On this, Zizek would say that such impediments elevate the value of the beloved (see note 10).

Republished under Creative Commons licence 4.0

Documentary: Forgotten Fathers

AVfM Video Source · 19 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A million American couples get divorced every year. What happens to the millions of children stuck in the middle of a judicial system that makes one party a parent and the other a visitor? Courts give custodial rights to mothers year after year, only one in six fathers becoming the custodial parent. RT America's Manila Chan explores unequal custody laws. She talks to family law attorney Steve Goldman and to Dr. Ned Holstein, public health consultant and founder of the National Parents Organization. We'll also hear from psychiatrist Dr. Mark R Banschick, author of 'The Intelligent Divorce.'

Adapting to the modern hateful zeitgeist

Paul Elam · 23 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is a message intended for my Patreon supporters, both present and future. The announcement just came from the SPLC that AVFM has been designated a hate group. That is a badge of honor, of course, but I do expect their smear campaign to be parlayed into efforts to remove my work from major social media platforms, and importantly, to undermine my funding.

Fortunately, there are new outfits like MakerSupport, which are filling a growing demand for social media platforms that reject censorship of content creators.

Henceforth, I will be dual posting, both to Patreon (for as long as that lasts) and to MakerSupport, hopefully for future, long-term security. When the day comes, and it will, that Patreon goes fully blue pill, I will be relying on MakerSupport to fill the void created.

If you have been supporting my work through Patreon, please consider transferring that support to my MakerSupport account today. You will get the same content, with the same notifications and the same opportunity to participate in discussing the material.

And if you have been considering tossing in your support, the time and place is perfect.

This is our future, guys. Long term, red pill material will be increasingly targeted on the major, commercial social media platforms. They are going to try to starve us out and choke off our traffic.

They can't succeed at this unless we let them.

My response to the SPLC

Paul Elam · 23 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM and I have been tagged as a hate group by the Southern Poverty Law Center.

What's that you say? You thought they already did that years ago? Well, yes and no. Let's go through what actually happened.

Back in March of 2012, Arthur Goldwag, writing for the SPLC blog, penned a piece on what he imagined to be misogynistic websites. It included A Voice for Men and a host of other websites, some no longer around, like Pierce Harlan's False Rape Society, Bill Price's The Spearhead and Ferdinand Bardamu's, In Mala Fide. Others are still around, like Roosh V's Return of Kings.

The article was all that was needed for leftist feminists to churn out the false rumor that the SPLC had designated these sites are hate groups. Despite the fact that the SPLC later issued a clarification stating that none of the groups were considered hate groups, the false narrative continued, with the help of propagandists like David Futrelle.

Interestingly, filmmaker Cassie Jaye, dug into the urban myth in making the Red Pill Movie, and she contacted Mark Potak, then a senior fellow for the SPLC and director of that organization's intelligence project. Potak said that the blog post was not representative of the SPLC position and that AVFM was never named as a hate group.

According to Jaye's records of the exchange, Potak said that AVFM did not fit the SPLC criteria for a hate group because we don't have an official group policy and because we are just blog posts and forums. That, by the way, was accurate then, and it is accurate now.

AVFM is a website. Nothing more. We have certainly made a big impact as "just" a website, but that doesn't change the fundamentals. AVFM is a personal website, owned and operated by yours truly. And we are actually far less organized now than at the time Mark Potak said we did not qualify for organizational reasons.

But something has changed at the SPLC, because in the past couple of days they have announced, with some fanfare, that A Voice for Men and Return of Kings both have been judged by them to be hate groups and have been included on their list alongside the KKK, Stormfront, and other similar organizations.

So, there you have it. In a nutshell, this is where things stand. Twenty-five years of speaking out about men's issues and reaching out to men living in blue pill hell, speaking the truth as I see it has earned me a place in what mainstream sensibilities assumes is the dark underbelly of modern hate. My name forever stained with an allegation that paints me as being at home in white sheets, saluting like a Nazi.

The question for the moment, just as it was in 2012, is simple. What now? What do I do with my work, my writing, my podcasts, my efforts to dispense as many red pills to as many men as I can in my life?

What do I now, since all my sincere efforts to help my fellow man are being treated as an offense to all decent sensibilities?

And, of course, the answers to all this were apparent to me before I ever finished typing the questions. What do I do now? Well, I buckle down and work harder.

I take the SPLC manufactured crap about who I am what AVFM is about, and I treat it like what it is. Bullying.

The SPLC is trying to scare me into silence. Indeed, they are trying to scare all of us into silence. Mark Potak, absolute scumbag that he is, knows full well that left wing wackaloons out there have used his material to target people for violent action.

Oh, and by the way for those interested and not already in the know, the SPLC is as corrupt financially as it is ideologically. I could go into an exhaustive diatribe about that right now, but I will spare you. Instead, you can click here to get started. Pro-tip, though. Make a large pot of coffee first, you have an ungodly amount of reading to do.

Anyway, as I was saying. The SPLC is trying to bully me into silence, and I am thinking…….fuck that and fuck them.

My audience tells me everything I need to know about my work. So do my haters. Any way I dice it up and look at it, from whatever angle, I am doing the right thing.

SPLC. My ass.

So, if any of you have already heard about the SPLC's hateful attack on my work, and was wondering what it meant for the future, just stay tuned to A Voice for Men and my YouTube channel. In the days ahead, as I continue to do the work I've always done, I will remind you from time to time that I consider being labeled a one-man hate group SPLC one of the greatest honors of my life.

If I have managed to make that group of leftist con artists and shysters stand up and take notice, I must be doing something right.

I will, however, take this moment to remind you that what I do does not come easy, and it has a cost, even more than just dollars.

Now, I am going to keep doing what I do as long as I possibly can, but I really do appreciate and need help from those who can afford it.

Below this video, you will find a variety of options, including my Patreon page, links for one-time and recurring donations and a Bitcoin link. There are also donation and subscription buttons at the top right of this website.

Please use one of those options that works for you, and remember, there is no such thing as a small donation. All of them help, every last one.

I ask you about this now because the current SPLC stunt is not the last of this struggle. These people are terrified of what you are hearing here, and censorship is getting worse all the time.

I will be back with more later. Thanks in advance to all who chip in, and thanks a million to those who already do.

PATREON https://www.patreon.com/PaulElam
DONATE/SUBSCRIBE http://anearformen.com/donate/
Bitcoin https://www.avoiceformen.com/bitcoin/

A letter to the boys and young men of America

J. Ishiro Finney · 27 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A response to mass shooting in Florida.

The bodies aren't even cold yet and already you are being blamed.

Yes you.

All of you.

The boys and young men who will grow up to become one half of America's future.
Once again, due to society's failure to raise you, to teach you, to properly guide you on your path to manhood, your mere existence is being held responsible for seventeen more deaths—this time in Florida, and once again, at a school. The headlines of the last few days say it all:

> "Guns don't kill people; men and boys kill people, experts say"
> -USA TODAY
>
> "Michael Ian Black reacts to Florida shooting: Boys are broken"
> -New York Daily News
>
> "How Gun Violence And Toxic Masculinity Are Linked, In 8 Tweets"
> -The Huffington Post
>
> "Toxic white masculinity: The killer that haunts American life"
> -Salon
>
> "Toxic Masculinity Is Killing Us"
> -The Boston Globe
>
> "Toxic Masculinity Is Killing Us"
> -Harpers Bazaar
>
> "Don't Blame Mental Illness for Mass Shootings; Blame Men"
> -Politico

[image]

In the handful of decades I've been alive, I've seen America shift from a culture of responsibility to one of blame. We don't solve problems anymore. We cry, we pray for, we seek to find closure, and then finally, slaughter a sacrificial lamb for our sins. When I was young and Columbine happened, that lamb was Marilyn Manson and video games. Before that, it was D&D and Twisted Sister. These days, though, as body counts continue to rise and excuses continue to vanish, the lamb America has chosen to sacrifice is you. Rather than take responsibility for the seeds we've sown, the culture we built, and the disaster you've been left to inherit, we as a nation have chosen to lie to ourselves. To listen and believe those who claim that the answer is simple: "Boys are simply born bad."

As an aging Gen Xer watching this tragedy unfold, I can't help but look back at my youth and realize we were the dry run for this "crisis of masculinity" as the media likes to call it. In my time I've watched as fathers were pushed out of the home, separated from their children, and their role in society debased and devalued. Like you, I was taught male behavior was bad behavior. That I was broken and needed to be fixed. Drugs, therapy, mass socialization were required to save me from my most innate instincts—

—the need to compete.

—the drive to create.

—the urge to protect.

—the desire for female affection.

Like you, I was told these instincts were not only wrong, but dangerous. That due to my Original Sin of being born a boy, I was destined to mature into a lustful monster and an oppressor of women. All this was burned into me before I even reached college, where campus policy actually assumed all men to be rapists waiting to happen.

It isn't hard to see how we got here, to an age when America is more than willing to sacrifice its boys. To quote Fight Club, "We're a generation of men raised by women." And the women who raised my generation had a saying: All men are pigs. But there's another saying those same women were enamored with and that is: The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world.

So here we are, coming close to fifty years of single mothers raising their boys as if they were animals. Two generations of young men raised to believe they're broken, immoral, and dangerous. That their natural state, if left unchecked and unmedicated, is a sexual ticking time bomb of rape and abuse. Half a century of academia peddling a grim version of history that holds your gender personally responsible for all the wrongs ever to have happened in the world. And a press, that at this very moment, is blaming YOU for every school shooting to have ever occurred.

After all this, how could there not be a crisis of masculinity?

So to the boys and young men of America, believe me when I say it isn't you who should be apologizing for the state of our world today. This mess was set in motion long before you were born.

You are not bad.

You are not broken.

You are not inherently evil or a sexual abuser in waiting.

You are boys who were robbed of your right to be men.

All your life you've been told to act, think, and behave like women. To suppress your passions, your pride, your need to compete and drive to achieve.

Now society is crumbling around us.

Feminizing boys didn't make better men. It's resulted in broken homes and shattered families and record suicide rates. It's destroying any notion of a healthy partnership between men and women, and is pushing us ever closer to total collapse of gender relations.

Boys, we don't need you to be like women, the world has plenty of women, already.

What the world needs now more than ever is for you to be men.

For you to grow-up, to grow strong, and do what men do.

For it is men's strength and determination that tamed the wilderness, built civilization, and has kept the world fed despite all predictions we'd all die starving before the year 2000. It's men's curiosity that lead us to explore the oceans, to conquer space, and peer into the tiniest of microcosms of the human body. It was men who built the cities we inhabit, the luxuries we enjoy, the medicines that keep us alive. Men built the road, the plumbing, the electrical grid, the phone in your hand, the internet it's connected to.

Men have always been innovators, explores, defenders, and leaders.

But most importantly, men have always been fathers.

So to the boys and young men of America, please read this and take every word to heart.

The world needs you.

-J. Ishiro Finney, Feb 2018

Josh Ishiro Finney is a working author, occasional artist, and creator of the graphic novels Casefile: Arkham, World War Kaiju, and Utopiates. He blogs at jishirofinney.com

We are four weeks from closing ticket sales to the London conference!

AVFM · 3 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

We are now just four weeks away from the deadline to purchase your tickets for the forth International Conference on Men's Issues, in London 20-22 July, 2018.

If you've never attended an ICMI, you don't know what you are missing. This one in particular promises to be one of the best ever. Aside from regular ICMI speakers like Karen Straughan and Paul Elam, you will also see the addition of Allison Tieman (Typhon Blue) and Carl Benjamin (Sargon of Akkad). In attendance and available for you to meet will be Cassie Jaye, Erin Pizzey, Mark Pearson and others.

Get your tickets here.

Also, and especially if you are not able to attend this year's conference, please help us fund the production of professional video of all the speeches. It will help us create a permanent record of the event that you will enjoy and will educate and entertain others well into the future.

Please donate here.

Everyone from AVfM and J4MB looks forward to seeing you there!

Is watching pornography a form of cheating? It depends

Dr. David Ley · 4 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Pornography is a hot-button issue of the day, and every season, more states add themselves to the list of legislatures that have declared pornography, and Internet pornography, to be a public health crisis. Often, these legislative efforts identify pornography as having blanket negative effects on people, and especially on couples. Historically, many have claimed that porn use causes divorce and marital difficulties on the basis of pretty sloppy data and research. Recent research is finding that the effects of porn on marriage vary greatly, depending upon some characteristics of the marriage and the porn use. Nonreligious couples who watch porn together seem to be quite well insulated from experiencing any negative effects from porn use.

But, isn't watching porn the equivalent of cheating—getting sex outside the marriage? Dr. Phil has suggested that watching porn is "not OK" and likely opens the door to cheating. Antiporn group Fight the New Drug proclaims that watching porn is cheating, because it feels like it, and because of oxytocin. (They suggest that watching porn releases oxytocin in the brain, which causes you to "bond" with the porn, rather than your real life partner). And the explicitly religious organization Covenant Eyes declares that using porn is cheating, because it is "engagement with a digital prostitute despite one's vow to forsake all others."

So now, research sheds some interesting light on this question, and helps to reveal that not all people view porn use as cheating—in fact, most don't. And further, the people who do view porn as cheating tend to be a certain group of people.

Negy, et al. recently published research where they examined people's attitudes about porn and cheating. They also compared respondents in the U.S. to respondents from Spain. First, a very large portion respondents in both the U.S. (73%) and Spain (77%) believe that porn use is not cheating.

Things get really interesting when Negy and researchers examine what characteristics predict a person's viewing porn as cheating. First, being from the U.S., compared to Spain, was associated with viewing porn as cheating. So were being single (not in a relationship at the time) or being a person who doesn't watch porn. Finally, people who have low self esteem are more likely to view porn use as cheating, but only if they are from the U.S. Interestingly, there weren't any gender differences. Women were not more likely than men, across the board, to view porn as cheating.

So what's going on here? Well, when people are not in a relationship, they may be more likely to have idealistic and more rigid views about what constitutes cheating than those who are currently in a relationship and who may have somewhat more pragmatic, accepting, and realistic views.

People who watch porn tend to have less concern and fear about the impact of porn than those who don't. Other researchers have found that couples in which one or both partners use porn commonly report that it has "no negative effects" or positive effects on their relationships.

What about the U.S. vs. Spain comparison? First, the U.S. has much stronger, negative and rigid negative attitudes about infidelity, compared to Spain and many other European countries. What was even more interesting in this research however, was the finding that in respondents from the U.S., being religious also predicted the view that porn is cheating, whereas Spanish respondents showed no effect of religiosity. About 70% of Spaniards identify as Catholics, but only around 9% of the citizens attend church at least monthly. In contrast, as much as 42% of Americans attend church weekly. Multiple studies on the effects of porn find that it is attendance of church services, rather than identification as religious, which appear to be mediating variable on the impact of porn on a person and relationship.

In general, Europeans, and Spanish Catholics, tend to be less punitive about sex in general, and also less dogmatic and energized about their religion, compared to many U.S. evangelical church-goers. These differences probably lie at the root of these interesting findings, affecting how people from different cultures view their religion and sexuality.

So, is watching porn cheating? It depends. If you are from the U.S., attend church, don't watch porn yourself and are currently single, then yes, it's pretty likely you will judge watching porn as a form of cheating.

But, what if you're wondering if your partner will view watching porn as cheating? Should you run through a demographic checklist?

No: You should ask your partner, and talk to them about their views of porn and infidelity in general (such as whether a behavior like talking to an ex on Facebook is seen as a betrayal). This is an important conversation that far too few couples have, usually because they're scared of what they might hear, or what cans of worms might get opened. Most people don't view porn use as cheating—so your odds are pretty good, actually. But if they find out you are watching porn in secret, or have lied about it, then there are issues of secrecy and deception to deal with. If you start to talk about your sexual and relational values, then you can start to have a deeper, more accepting, honest relationship, where you can even discuss issues such as sexual privacy, or how the two of you might deal with temptations of infidelity. Ultimately, these are foundations that build strong relationships, whether porn is involved or not.

Why men don’t listen to women

Marty Nemko · 5 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Women often complain that men, especially when in a long-term relationship, don’t listen to them. Many of these women claim that men can’t communicate. A woman once said to me, “All men want is sex.”

Women may be wise to recognize that many men decide it’s unwise to engage in certain conversations.

For example, a man may predict that listening to his wife or girlfriend “process her feelings” will not make things better. Rather, it will exacerbate her illegitimate feelings of victimhood, often at the man’s expense.

For instance, if a man forgets his wife’s birthday, he might fear she’ll go into a tirade about how it makes her feel unloved. He may worry she’ll exaggerate how bad it makes her feel so she can extract maximum guilt and recompense from him. He may be afraid that, to gain still more brownie points, she’ll bring up some past faux pas he committed—like catching him watching porn or, “John, you insisted on watching that stupid football game when you knew it was important to me and the family that we visited grandma. I feel totally not loved. I don’t count at all!” (Another exaggeration to extract maximum recompense from him.)

In such a conversation, he may be aware she’s overreacting, and to allow her to vent uninterrupted would give undue legitimacy to her grievance. Yet if he defends himself, for example, by pointing out incidents of her selfishness, she’d accuse him of expanding the argument. Nor is she likely to be assuaged if he offers examples of the many ways he has shown his love. She’ll likely feel or assert that she’s unheard, invalidated: “Does that really justify your watching porn or forgetting my birthday? Just listen. Stop defending yourself! I just want to be heard. Can’t you just listen for once?” He’s in a Catch 22; he loses either way.

So understandably, he wants to avoid the conversation, whereupon the women might incorrectly believe that men can’t communicate, that “All men want is sex.”

Indeed, many women demand being listened to and that the man dare not offer a solution to her problem lest he be restricting her agency. “I just want to vent. I want to share my feelings. When I’m ready to solve the problem, I will.”

Many men get frustrated when the woman he loves has a problem he could solve but he’s forced to sit there with his mouth shut. Rather than being frustrated, he preempts or short-cuts the conversation, or simply spaces out, whereupon the woman may say or think, “Men can’t communicate. All they want is sex.”

A study by Georgetown gender communication specialist Deborah Tannen debunks the conventional wisdom that women talk more than men. Fact is, men talk approximately the same amount—16,000 words a day.

The difference may be that many men resist talking unless a constructive outcome is likely—men just may not be as dumb as some women proclaim. Nor is sex sufficient to manipulate a man…although it couldn’t hurt.

When it comes to men’s rights, all is not well in Israel

AVfM Video Source · 8 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

As in the rest of the world, things are not going well in Israel when it comes to men’s rights. The following documentary captures the ravages of feminist culture and governance.

Is toxic masculinity a valid concept?

Gad Saad · 9 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The two fundamental objectives in the evolutionary game of life are to first survive (natural selection) and then to mate (sexual selection). For sexually reproducing species including humans, evolution has endowed males and females with universal mating preferences that map onto sex-specific recurring challenges faced by each sex during our evolutionary history. This is profoundly obvious to anyone with a grade 8 level understanding of human biology and human psychology.

Female fiddler crabs and hens prefer males with extravagantly large claws and tails respectively. Ewes (female rams) will mate with the ram that wins the brutal intrasexual head-butting contest. They reward targeted aggression by granting sexual access. Needless to say, there are innumerable other examples of sexual selection that I might describe but I suspect that you get the general gist. Are rams exhibiting toxic masculinity? Are female fiddler crabs succumbing to antiquated notions of masculinity as promulgated by the crab patriarchy?

Let's now apply the exact same evolutionary process (sexual selection) to humans. Evolutionary psychologists have documented universal patterns of mating preferences that are invariant across time and place. In no culture ever studied have women repeatedly preferred to mate with pear-shaped low-status tepid men possessing high-pitched nasal voices. In no documented culture do women's sexual fantasies revolve around granting sexual access to unemployed unambitious men who occupy the lowest stratum of the social hierarchy. Instead, women are attracted to "toxic masculine" male phenotypes that correlate with testosterone, and they are desirous of men who are socially dominant, are strategically risk-taking in their behaviors, and who exhibit patterns of behaviors that will allow them to ascend the social hierarchy and defend their positions from encroachers.

Of course this does not imply that women are not attracted to intelligent, sensitive, kind, warm, and compassionate men. The ideal man is rugged and sensitive; masculine and caring; aggressive in some pursuits and gentle in others. Think of the male archetype in romance novels, which is a literary form almost exclusively read by women. He is a tall prince and a neurosurgeon. He is a risk-taker who wrestles alligators and subdues them on his six-pack abs, and yet is sensitive enough to be tamed by the love of a good woman. This archetype is universally found in romance novels read by women in Egypt, Japan, and Bolivia precisely because it caters to women's universal evolved sexual fantasies. When engaging in sexual role-playing in the bedroom, few women ask that their male partners wear their Google C++ programmer uniform. They ask for the fireman suit to make its presence. James Bond, the epitome of "toxic masculinity," does not cry at Taylor Swift concerts. His archetype is desired by women and envied by men.

The inimitable equity feminist Christina Hoff Sommers wrote a book back in 2001 titled The War Against Boys: How Misguided Feminism Is Harming Our Young Men (see our chat on my show THE SAAD TRUTH_144). How prescient she was! There has been a relentless ideological attack on masculinity stemming from radical feminism, the most recent instantiation of which is the bogus term "toxic masculinity." It literally seeks to pathologize masculinity in ways that are profoundly harmful to the existential sense of self of young men. If a man witnesses a woman being attacked on the street, should he intervene? Well, according to the bogus feminist notion of benevolent sexism, it might be best to look away (see THE SAAD TRUTH_38). Male saviors are likely oozing toxic masculinity! I should add that male criminals are not exhibiting "toxic masculinity" anymore than female adulterers are exhibiting "diabolical femininity."

The great majority of men are attracted to feminine women who do not possess the body type of Michael Phelps. Beyoncé is desired not because of her "diabolical femininity" but simply because of her femininity. Similarly, most of the traits and behaviors that are likely found under the rubric of "toxic masculinity" are precisely those that most women find attractive in an ideal mate! This is not a manifestation of "antiquated stereotypes." It is a reality that is as trivially obvious as the existence of gravity and no amount of campus brainwashing will ever alter these facts. Let us stop pathologizing masculinity. Instead, let us appreciate the endless ways by which men and women are similar to one another as well as the important ways by which the two sexes differ.

Originally published at PsychologyToday.com

Ernest Belfort Bax on feminism's relation to chivalry

Ernest Belfort Bax · 10 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

E.B. Bax talks of first-wave feminists soliciting, expecting and receiving male chivalry for the benefit of women. His assessment below prefigures how "chivalry feminists" have continued to operate through second and third-wave feminism. Indeed it can be argued that feminism's most effective source of agency has always been its reliance on male chivalry.

E.B. Bax quotes:

> I decline to bow down before a sexual principle, or to admit the justice of granting privileges on the basis of a sex-sentiment. What I contended and still contend is that the bulk of the advocates of woman's rights are simply working, not for equality, but for female ascendency. It is all very well to say they repudiate chivalry. They are ready enough to invoke it politically when they want to get a law passed in their favour – while socially, to my certain knowledge, many of them claim it as a right every whit as much as ordinary women.
>
> Source: No Misogyny But True Equality in To-Day, October 1887, pp.115-121

> Notwithstanding the state of law, public opinion, and custom, the "shrieking sisterhood," and their male lackeys continue to invoke male "chivalry" in defence of every usurpation or act of injustice perpetrated in the interest of female domination… In the early middle ages, when strength of arm was commonly called into requisition for defence, "chivalry" had a meaning; in the nineteenth century it has none, and is merely an excuse for the privileges and domination of the female sex. In fact, if "chivalry" means taking the side of the weaker, it would be shown more often to-day, in championing the cause of the man against the woman, than that of the woman against the man. Hegel said that every typical character appeared twice in history – once as tragedy and once as farce. If we apply this to the chivalric type, and take King Arthur or Sir Launcelot (regarded for the nonce as historical personages) as the embodiment of the former we may certainly find the latter in the person of the great cheap-jack of London journalism, and exponent of the sorrows of husband-hunting wenches. The drop is certainly great from the hero of the "City of Legions" to the "Northumbrian boy."
>
> […]
>
> In this great step toward real as opposed to sham equality between the sexes [we require] the repudiation by women themselves of the anachronistic notion of "Chivalry," as being due to them from men. If we are to have equality and fellowship, let it be equality and fellowship, and not a hollow fraud masquerading under the name.
>
> Source: Some Heterodox Notes on the Woman Question (1887)

> "THE justification for the whole movement of Modern Feminism in one of its main practical aspects – namely, the placing of the female sex in the position of privilege, advantage and immunity – is concentrated in the current conception of "chivalry." It behoves us, therefore, to devote some consideration to the meaning and implication of this notion. Now this word chivalry is the dernier ressort of those at a loss for a justification of the modern privileging of women.
>
> […]
>
> "It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward.
>
> […]
>
> "Every outrageous pretension of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, "manliness." It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of "manliness."
>
> […]
>
> "Such is "chivalry" as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men.
>
> […]
>
> But these considerations afford only one more illustration of the utter irrationality of the whole movement of Sentimental Feminism identified with the notion of "chivalry." For the rest, we may find illustrations of this galore. A very flagrant case is that infamous "rule of the sea" which came so much into prominence at the time of the Titanic disaster. According to this preposterous "chivalric" Feminism, in the case of a ship foundering, it is the unwritten law of the seas, not that the passengers shall leave the ship and be rescued in their order as they come, but that the whole female portion shall have the right of being rescued before any man is allowed to leave the ship. Now this abominable piece of sex favouritism, on the face of it, cries aloud in its irrational injustice.
>
> Source: Chapter-5 'The Chivalry Fake' in The Fraud of Feminism, 1913

> "Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of' "What! Hit a woman!"
>
> Why not, if she molests you?

> “Treat a woman in this way!” “Shame!” responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender.”
>
> […]
>
> “In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.
>
> Source: Chapter 7: The Psychology of the Movement – The Fraud of Feminism (1913)

> Let women have the franchise by all means, provided two things, first of all: provided you can get rid of their present practical immunity from the operation of the criminal law for all offences committed against men and of the gallantry and shoddy chivalry that now hedges a woman in all relations of life.
>
> Source: The “Monstrous Regiment” of Womanhood (1907), in Essays in Socialism New & Old (1907), pp.108-119.

Men as beasts of burden

Marty Nemko · 13 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

There are five widows for every widower.

Kevin, 37, is a computer programmer, making $80,000 a year, $48,000 after taxes. His wife, Lisa, stays home to take care of their two-year old. She is pregnant with another child, and eager for them to buy a home. Kevin doesn't like being a programmer, but fears that a career change will mean a salary cut.

I asked Kevin, "Is owning a home important to you?" He replied, "It's very important to Lisa." I asked him how he felt about having the second child. He sighed, "Okay, but Lisa really wants it."

I asked, "When you first called me, you said you feel the stress is killing you. Should you be shouldering all the family's financial responsibilities?" He pursed his lips: "Lisa reminds me that before we got married, I agreed to have two kids. She says, and I guess I agree, that to bring our kids up right and maintain a home is a full-time job. And she doesn't have my earning capacity." Kevin rubbed his head.

Over the past 17 years, I have been career coach to 1,500 middle and upper class women and to 500 middle-to-upper class men. Because of our relationships' confidentiality, I have learned much about what women really think on a number of issues.

Most surprising to me, is that at least half of the women, including many graduates of elite colleges, either don't want an income-earning job or will only work part-time in an unusually pleasant job.

A recent New York Times article suggests that my clients are not an anomaly. It reported that the number of stay-at-home moms has increased 13 percent in less than a decade, and among working women, 2/3 work part-time. This is true even of graduates of prestigious colleges, women who were bestowed a fiercely competed-for slot at an elite college on the assumption they would use that coveted degree to make a big difference in the world.

Few of those women's application essays indicated they planned to be housewives. Yet among Stanford's class of '81, in just their first decade after graduation, 57 percent of mothers spent at least a year at home full-time. One in four stayed home full-time for three or more years. A survey of the women from the Harvard Business School classes of 1981, 1985, and 1991 found that only 38 percent of all women—even if childless–were working full time. And beyond the elite colleges, among white men, 95% of all MBAs in the U.S. work full time, while the number for white women was just 67 percent.

And "full-time" doesn't mean the same for men and women. Among my 1,500 female clients and many friends, very few are willing to sacrifice work/life balance to work the 60+ hours a week it normally takes to rise to the top of a profession.

Yet women's groups complain that women are "underrepresented" in the power professions: senior executives, professors, etc., because of a glass ceiling they claim is erected by men.

Of course, there are many ambitious, achieving women who are men's equals or superiors. But many of my female clients and friends prefer the life of a housewife, perhaps augmented by a pleasant little part-time job, even if it means their husband, whom they claim to love, must work long, hard hours on jobs few women would consider. For example, the vast majority of people who work in iron foundries, coalmines, and other clanging, polluted environments are men. According to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, 92 percent of workplace deaths occur to men.

Dan, a client of mine (name changed) avoided breathing carcinogenic air, but his life is still at risk. He has two masters degrees in counseling, but in the big city, where it seems there's a therapist under every rock, hasn't been able to land a job as a counselor. He has a few private clients, which in total earn him $6,000 a year. He adds $8,000 as a mock patient in a medical school, and at night, Dan, 54, moonlights as a waiter at a large restaurant. He says, “It’s almost ¼ mile from the kitchen to the farthest table, so when I get home at one in the morning, I’m exhausted. But I’m still so wired, I need a couple of glasses of wine to get to sleep. If I’m lucky, I get five hours of sleep before I have to get up again.”

Dan’s wife Denise, a Cornell graduate, is 47 and says she’s a musician. But in their years together, her net income has averaged just $800 a year. When Dan encourages Denise to get a job that pays, she objects:“ But I love being a musician. I’m trying to make a living at it.” He keeps urging her to get a paying job, but after a while, he gives up. He can’t make her get a job.

Meanwhile, Dan continues to drag himself through life like an ox yoked to a plow, a beast of burden. “I don’t know how long I can keep this up.” Statistically, he’s right. Medical science is unequivocal that stress and overwork kills. No doubt, that contributes to their being five widows for every widower.

To be fair, many men prefer their wives to stay home, but often, the impetus comes from the woman. Many women use dubious arguments to convince their husbands that they should have, at most, a part-time job:

It’s better for the children. Yes, on average, kids with a stay-at-home-mom do somewhat better, but that is largely because couples that can afford to have mom staying at home are, on average, from a higher socioeconomic class, which confers many other benefits on the child.

A number of studies indicate that being a working mom doesn’t hurt and may even help the child. For example, the most recent study (July 2003) Caring and Counting: The impact of mothers’ employment on family relationships by Tracey Reynolds, Claire Callender and Rosalind Edwards, reports, “…the mother’s work had a positive impact on their family relationships. The mother’s employment provided skills and resources that meant they could meet their children’s emotional, developmental and material needs better. Their relationship with their partner was enhanced because they shared the financial burden of providing for their family and had more common interests.”

The book, Ask The Children, is based on in-depth interviews with 600 parents and more than 1,000 children in the third through twelfth grades from diverse backgrounds. It found that “having a working mother is not predictive of how children assess their mothers’ parenting skills, based on a number of attributes strongly linked to children’s healthy development and school success. These include ‘being someone I can go to when I am upset’ and ‘knowing what is really going on in my life.’” This study’s results were reported to the public in a cover story in Working Mother magazine called “Hey Moms, Drop the Guilt!” Millions of children with working moms do just fine. What counts most is quality time: reasonably consistent, loving, limit-setting but not punitive parenting, even if it begins after the workday.

Lest you think I haven’t practiced what I preach, my wife went back to work full-time, nine weeks after our daughter was born, and she turned out just fine: well-adjusted, voted UCLA’s outstanding undergraduate student, whereafter she got a White House internship, after which she went to Yale Law School, is now a successful attorney and about to marry a wonderful guy.

And even if a child accrues some advantage from having a stay-at-home mom, that advantage is usually more than outweighed by the pressure added to the husband’s life and the lifestyle decrement that comes from the lack of a second income. One such decrement is that men who must earn all the family income are precluded from considering rewarding but not lucrative careers such as teaching, and most jobs in non-profits, the arts, journalism, etc.

Adding to the unfairness, women, on average, are more motivated than their husbands to have children to begin with. The man is often pressured, subtly or not subtly, into parenthood, with all its added financial and time demands.

Taking care of the kids and home is a full-time job. These women stretch homemaking into a full-time job with activities far less beneficial than a second income to the family and certainly to her husband’s health and quality of life: preparing home-cooked dinners most nights, sitting with other moms watching a playgroup when a babysitter could do that, etc.

Being a homemaker is at least as stressful as being in the work world. These women point to their having to deal with a frequently crying baby or claim that being at home is a three-ring circus. But fact is, a significant percentage of many stay-at-home moms' days are spent on low-stress tasks such as supermarket shopping, playing with the baby, making dinner, and chatting with friends while baby is napping.

That life is much less stressful than most out-of-home jobs, which are filled with unpredictable commutes, ever increasing workloads because of the relentless downsizing, bosses with unrealistic expectations, co-workers who don't pull their weight, and tough tasks, which if not completed satisfactorily can result in criticism or even firing.

I don't have your earning power. Dr. Warren Farrell's research debunks the flawed research that claims women earn 79 cents on the dollar. When controlled for hours on the job, performance evaluations, and years of experience, women earn $1.01 for every dollar men earn.

And the reason women have fewer years of experience is that they disproportionately elect to stay home with their children, or even if they work "full-time," they work far fewer hours than their male counterparts so they can spend more time with their kids or on their avocations. Many more women than men —full-time workers and not– ensure they have time for yoga, get-togethers with friends, art class, gardening, and visits to the day spa. Since 2000, despite the economic downturn, the number of spa visits nationwide, the vast majority of which are made by women, has doubled!

Women don't just spend on day spas. They're, overall, the bigger spenders. Yes, men buy more tools and technotoys but women, even when they contribute little or nothing to the family income, are the predominant spenders: clothing, jewelry, therapy, home redecorating of no interest to the man, etc. Most shopaholics are women. Every expenditure loads additional pressure onto the primary breadwinner, which is usually the husband.

Most of my male clients have accepted their plight of having to work, work, work at unrewarding, even dangerous jobs. Biology, parents, and society have programmed men to be the hunter, the provider, to keep their nose to the grindstone, no matter what. Too many wives only encourage it. Just today, a client of mine who earns more than $200,000 a year as a not-partner attorney at a major law firm, exclaimed, "If I don't push NOW to make partner, my wife will kill me!"

Usually, the wife won't kill the husband, but often will divorce him, at least in part because "he wasn't a good provider." And most courts reward her with custody of the child and a requirement that the father pay child support and/or alimony.

When I ask a male client to step back and think about it, many of them realize that their wives have tried—usually successfully–to subtly or not so subtly coerce them into being the primary or sole breadwinner, the beast of burden. Those women make the above arguments, plus use manipulative techniques such as crying, guilt-tripping, screaming, avoiding the topic of getting a job, and forever promising to look for work but making feeble efforts.

Meanwhile, many men live bleak lives: work 10+ hours, commute home, and drop into the couch exhausted. And their reward: an early grave. Despite obesity being more prevalent among women, there are five widows for every widower. Yet all we hear about is another fundraiser for breast cancer.

If a husband hasn't done so already, he should consider having an open discussion with his wife about work and money. For example:

- "Will buying a house or having another child put too much financial pressure on us?"
- "If we decide to make those high-cost expenditures, do we want to put all the financial burden on one partner so the other can stay home to raise the child? Or should it be divided more evenly?"
- "Should I refuse to work at an unrewarding high-stress or dangerous job?"

The elite colleges should issue the following exhortation to their students, male and female: "As you well know, the diploma you will receive from this institution will open the doors of influence: from medical research to non-profit directorship, from corporate leadership to stewardship of the arts. In accepting one of the precious few student seats at this institution, you tacitly accept the responsibility to society to make the most of that coveted degree. We encourage you to aim high, to use that degree to make the biggest difference you can for humankind. As important as being a good parent is, you don't need an elite degree to do that."

(I changed a few irrelevant details about my clients to protect their anonymity.)

Comedy combats misandry: reflections of the 'late' Louis C.K.

Eva Barb · 21 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

On November 9, 2017 The New York Times published the voices of five women accusing comedian Louis C.K. of sexual misconduct, to which C.K. replied in confirmation of the allegations that he masturbated in front of these women and apologized for causing them harm. Consequently, C.K. was dropped by his manager and television network, and a variety of his projects were cancelled, including the New York premiere of his 35mm, black and white film, I Love You, Daddy. Amidst a barrage of sexual misconduct allegations against men in popular culture, C.K. has been wrung through the feminist-frenzied echo chamber that is mainstream media, resulting in the loss of a prolific and talented stand-up comedian, writer, producer and director.

As a fan of C.K., the allegations against him were disheartening, not because I thought him gross or abusive, but because they meant, for all intents and purposes, the end of his contemporary career. Perhaps C.K.'s downfall feels like justice to the women he made feel uncomfortable or to anyone who is now disgusted by him, but, I imagine, his downfall was heartbreaking to a great deal of people because he is one of a handful of comedians whose work—in all its existential and self-deprecating nuances—challenges society's normalization of the mutually exclusive ideal that men are predators and women are prey.

Significantly, his semi-autobiographical television series, Louie, which ran from 2010-2015, consistently shows the protagonist (Louie) victimized by both women and society for not being the economically stable, testosterone-fueled epitome of the man that our culture both condemns and enforces—Louie cares too much, seeks female attention too desperately, and should probably get a "real" job.

One of the show's recurring narratives is Louie's turmoil as he pines after a female friend, Pamela. After four seasons of rejecting Louie, she enters an "open-relationship" with him, and eventually breaks up with him in the episode, "Bobby's House," (S5, E4). In this episode, Louie is attacked by a female pedestrian whom he was attempting to help. Afterwards, he shamefully faces his daughters and Pamela as they laugh at him for being beat-up by a girl; effectually emasculating him, perhaps in the most degrading way possible. Having asked Pamela to cover his scars with make-up, she (without being prompted) also applies eyeliner on him, initiates a gender role-reversal (to which Louie plays along), and penetrates Louie from behind with a strap-on. She then proceeds to break up with him, and he cries.

C.K.'s work is important not only because it subverts the binary model of male (predator)/ female (prey), but his work is also a laying-bear to the traumas we experience on a daily basis in having to navigate a world that lacks empathy, one which rations out who gets to feel what. In this world, our current world, "Bobby's House" is praised as an allegory for misogyny and women are considered the proprietary victims of sexual assault and emotional abuse. Chris Cabin, in reviewing and lauding the aforementioned episodic details, writes: "In one way, the sequence serves as an upending of chauvinistic behavior; a play off of the familiar misogynistic ploy to get one last lay in before breaking the relationship off." In such a way, Louie isn't seen as a man who is emotionally and physically degraded. Instead, Cabin reads the role-reversal and penetration scenes as Louie metaphorically becoming the women (prey), because within the popular paradigm women are never predators and men are never prey, but this obviously isn't the factual case.

If we deconstruct our current social order into a string of binary oppositions, it becomes evident that historically subaltern sides of these pairs are being granted open arms and attentive ears. Gay/straight, female/male, black/white, trans/cis are only some of many examples of socio-political dualities being reversed in order to, ideally, combat oppression. But what happens to the now less-than side of each binary? One of the largest issues with basing civil rights movements off of binary models is that an oppressed side is innate to the conception of a functional binary, and oppression should never be okay. As is evident in mainstream feminism, revenge can be a form of savagery.

I find that C.K. addresses this issue best in his most recent Netflix stand-up special, "2017." C.K. says: "I envy transgender people, though. I do…they figured out what's going on with them, and they fixed it!…I would give a million dollars to just wake up, 'Oh, I'm an owl. That's what the thing is.'" In this joke, C.K. engages in the deconstruction of language. First, by juxtaposing envy and transgender, C.K. paradoxically places the non-trans viewer in a position to empathize with a trans subject, therefore allowing transgender to grow in metonymic meaning. Secondly, the linguistic transformation from transgender to owl questions the integrity of words as essential signifiers of self. Recently, comedian Ricky Gervais, in his Netflix stand-up special, "Humanity," paid what can only be seen as homage to C.K..

In response to criticism that Gervais made a trans-phobic joke while hosting the Golden Globes, he says: "If you feel you're a woman, that makes you a woman. I'm not one of these bigots that think having [sex reassignment surgery] is science going too far. In fact, I don't think it's going far enough—'cause I've always identified as a chimp." Both C.K. and Gervais, respectively, ask: Is it not insidiously ironic to ration out who gets to feel what?

By granting a select group of people the privilege to feel what are otherwise universally defining emotions of human existence (confusion, loneliness, sadness, etc.) in terms of how historically oppressed their linguistic signifiers make them is reductive of our organic human capacity to feel empathy and in-turn marginalizes the flip-side of a binary. In the case of the jokes quoted above, this flip-side is the, presumably, cisgender individual. In the anecdote of C.K., and in the lives of men, whether gay, or transgender, or black, or poor, their maleness is that which marginalizes them.

A major tenet of post-structuralist literary theory is the idea that language is the very lens through which we view the world and experience living. Whether this is (essentially speaking) true or not is up for debate, but I do find this philosophy is present in the way society treats people based on their minority-value. Comics, specifically male comics, are combatting these unfair social schemas by making people laugh. Even though C.K. may not re-surface into popular culture for a while, I do believe that the tradition of questioning the paradigms that construct our normalized misandrous behaviors will continue and does continue through the work of his fellow contemporaries (Bill Burr, Ricky Gervais, and Michael Che are a few).

After discovering the Male Rights Movement, it has become increasingly difficult to swallow the anti-male rhetoric (protected by the impenetrable halo of feminism) that abound on the news, on social medias, in everyday conversation, even in university classrooms. Although I'm a woman (identifying as such) I find myself censored from calling out this anti-male rhetoric for what it actually is: bigoted. This censorship is no doubt what many MRAs and men perpetually face. People don't want to stand in opposition to current paradigms (despite peoples' desire to be the inciters of paradigm shifts).

It's not easy having your entire worldview turned upside down (this is why I admire Cassie Jaye), yet The Echo Chamber's refusal to welcome controversial ideas is turning us into a people (generally speaking) that not only stray from thinking for ourselves but also opt to not feel for ourselves. With our emotions now subject to cultural editing, sifting, and allocation, comedians (alongside educators, activists, and artists) might be the pioneers to turn to for sanity, clarity, and companionship.

References:

Cabin, Chris. "LOUIE: Why 'Bobby's House' May Be Season 5's Best Episode So Far." Collider, 1 May 2015, http://collider.com/louie-why-bobbys-house-may-be-the-seasons-best-episode-thus-far/.

C.K., Louis, performer. "2017." Louis C.K., 2017. 00:55:40-00:56:20.

Gervais, Ricky, performer. "Humanity." Ricky Gervais, 2018. 00:14:10-00:14:27.

Ryzik, Melena, et al. "Louis C.K. Is Accused by 5 Women of Sexual Misconduct." The New York Times, 9 Nov. 2017, https://www.nytimes.com/2017/11/09/arts/television/louis-ck-sexual-misconduct.html.

Eva Barb holds a BA in English literature. She works as a freelance journalist and can usually be found playing video games and hiding from humanity with her husband in their tiny NYC apartment.

The virtue-signalling men allowing women into Men's Sheds

Bettina Arndt · 26 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Bettina believes people involved in the Men's Shed movement need to take action to protect these male sanctuaries that enrich the spirit and even save the lives of some men. Stand up for men!

The real reason so few women are in the boardroom

Marty Nemko · 28 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

On average, women are rated as slightly better managers than men. Also, women better understand the female consumer's mindset. That's important because women make most purchases. So why are only 11% of Fortune-500 senior executives women?

The standard answer is "glass ceiling," a term that evokes the image of a cabal of top male executives scheming to preserve an old boy's club.

While vestiges of old-boy hiring may remain, most top executives at Fortune 500 companies are too worried about the bottom line to let any clubby cravings affect who they hire as senior executives.

The primary reason for the 11% figure is that men, on average, are willing to devote more time to their career. And time it takes. A study conducted by The Business Roundtable, an association of CEOs, found that the average CEO works 58 hours per week. Fortune 500 CEOs likely work even more.

Unlike in typical media portrayals, few male senior executives spend much time hang-gliding. In the real world, here's how it more often plays out, as reported to me by my many clients who are male senior executives. Their exercise is more likely to be on a treadmill while doing professional reading. If he's married, when wife urges him to do more of the domestic chores and parenting, he is likely to say something like, "I want to rise to the top and you want me to, too. I like my work and you like our lifestyle. That requires lots of evenings and weekends. I spend as much time with the family as I can."

Most women make different choices. The October 10, 2004 lead story on 60 Minutes and the September 2003 New York Times Magazine story documented that a majority even of Ivy- and Stanford-educated female alumni did not work full time. Harvard Business School reports that only 38% of its female MBA graduates, during their childbearing years, work full-time.

Dr. Warren Farrell, author Why Men Earn More (Amacom, 2005) found that a key reason men earn more than women is number-of-hours worked. In addition to providing abundant statistics, he interviewed a number of successful senior executive women. Each one stated that crucial to their success was their willingness to work longer than most women are. For example,

When I interviewed Lillian Vernon, (of Lillian Vernon Corporation), she said, "Many people who dream about their own businesses and don't have one, are not prepared to work that hard—to think about their job while they're getting dressed, showering, waiting for somebody— to think of every minute as an opportunity."

Theresa Metty, senior VP at Motorola agreed, "Successful people don't see after-hour 'demands' as demands, but as opportunities. The opportunity to surprise, invent, create…"

All this doesn't surprise me. Having been career coach to 2,000 professional clients, 2/3 female, I know that more women than men prioritize work/life balance, wanting more time for family, home, friends, and recreation.

In the privacy of my office, many capable, highly educated women who, in public, may mouth politically correct mantras decrying the dearth of women in the boardroom, admit that what they'd really like is to work part-time if at all, and only on a pleasant job, so they can have ample time for home, family, friends, etc. Far fewer women than men are willing to work 58+ hours a week and to take work home or do extensive after-work professional development activities during evenings and weekends.

Steven Rhoades, author of the book Taking Sex Differences Seriously, cites study after study indicating that the main reason most women want ample family time is their biological drive to have children and be the primary family caregiver. Feminist activists argue that is social conditioning by "the male hegemony." But if that were true, then why do women take on most family caregiving in every society from Iceland to New Guinea, in every era from ancient times to today, and in all political contexts from communist to capitalist? Women's desire to prioritize family caregiving is mainly biological predisposition, not cultural brainwashing.

Some women argue that it's men's fault that women don't spend more time at work. For example, Career Journal senior correspondent Perri Capell wrote, "If more women had men at home doing for them what women traditionally do for men, they might be able to stay at the office longer."

Fact is, many women don't do it for men. They do it for themselves. On average, it is women, more than men, who want to have children. So it is unfair of them to insist that the men share heavily in the child rearing.

It is the woman, on average, who cares more about having lots of time with children (And the data doesn't support the importance of that–after controlling for socioeconomic status, quantity of time matters little.Quality of time does). Even many wealthy women, who could afford and have access to high-quality child care, choose to forego that so they can be with their children. If quantity of family time matters more to women, it is unfair for them to impose that value on their husbands.

And regarding domestic chores, most men aren't as concerned about a tastefully decorated and sparkling clean home. On average, women care more about this.

It is unfair for women to force men to spend time on what the woman wants. If a man were to insist that a woman devote equal time to the things he cares about–for example, financial and tax issues, that fix-it/build-it project, or playing basketball, most people would think that unfair, selfish. Yet when women do it, we're expected to consider it reasonable.

I predict that if women–before they got married–informed their career-minded future husbands that they insist he fully share domestic and child-rearing responsibilities and that they don't expect to earn much money, many men would decide it isn't worth getting married. So, most women withhold those demands until afterwards.

A 2004 study by Catalyst, a women's advocacy organization, found that women aspire to senior executive positions at the same rate as men. But a woman (or a man) can't have it both ways. If she wants a moderate workweek, for the reasons I will outline below, she cannot fair-mindedly aspire to the boardroom.

Corporations, governments, and non-profits need plenty of good 20 to 40 hour-a-week workers, but not in the top spots. Here's why.

Imagine you were the CEO of a company and were considering two employees for a senior position. Candidate A had—over her or his 20-year career–worked 50 to 60 hours a week, and in spare time, made great efforts to keep upgrading skills. Meanwhile, Candidate B worked 40 hours a week, and in spare time, focused on family, home, friends, and recreation, and had taken years off to raise children—thereby losing professional contacts and currency with the latest information and technology. You'd almost certainly hire Candidate A. Fact is, more men than women are like Candidate A. That, and not a sexist glass ceiling, is the main reason why women represent only 11% of senior executives in Fortune 500 companies.

But let's say that you, the CEO, did what feminist activists advocate: install a family-friendly workplace that prioritizes work-life balance, and hired many women who had worked only 40 hours a week and taken years off to raise children. You might hire lots of people like Candidate B. If so, your company would likely go out of business.

Here's why. Your competitors would hire lots of Candidate A's. That would result not only in those senior executives–the company's more important people–being more productive, but their supervisees too. Dedicated, passionate leadership is infectious.

A company with such committed employees is an exciting, passion-filled place. The argument that working more than 40 hours a week is ineffective and leads to burnout is not true. What leads to burnout is meaningless or too difficult work in a passionless workplace, not additional hours of meaningful, doable work in a passionate environment. Some of the most alive people I know work long hours. The argument that working more than 40 hours a week leads to burnout is unsupported by sound research. Such rhetoric is a shoot-from-the-hip pitch that feminist advocates use to sell work-life balance to employers. We all know how being around dedicated people makes us more energized, not less.

A workplace with long, hard-working passionate people results in the company's products being better or more cost-effective, which makes thousands of people–the customers–happier. Aren't you grateful when your home, TV, car, etc., is wonderful, reliable, and didn't cost too much? Creating excellent products, in turn, causes a company's profits to grow, which allows the company to invest in more innovation, provides money to the thousands of shareholders who entrusted their savings to the company, and increases the sense of pride and passion among the company's employees.

Meanwhile, your employees, mostly Candidate Bs, zealots for work-life balance, in the short-run, will appreciate being able to leave work earlier than workers at your competitors' companies. When, in the middle of a brainstorming meeting, someone says, "Sorry, I have a parent-teacher conference. I have to leave," and you say, "Fine," everyone will smile at how family-friendly their workplace is. But inside, those with passion about their work will feel that passion just slightly diminished. Each such event—for example, every time an employee takes advantage of the Family Leave Act– diminishes your workplace's passion just a little more. A number of your employees, who had taken years off to raise a family, are less up-to-date and lack current professional contacts. In the intermediate term, your employees will be working for a company in decline because their competitors, filled with more passionate, dedicated, more knowledgeable, better connected employees, are producing a better product. And in the long-term, such companies are far more likely to go out of business, leaving your boardroom with 0 percent women and 0 percent men.

The media's headline message is, "Hire more women and make the workplaces more family-friendly. Stop demanding that executives work 50 to 60 hours a week. Be more like France that mandates a 35-hour average workweek." The media is far less eager to trumpet the fact that despite France having a better educated population and 35-hour work week, its unemployment rate is more than twice the US rate and there's talk of changing the law. Advocating "family-friendly, work-life balance" workplaces will likely create different headlines a few years from now: "More jobs offshored to India. "More companies open new facilities in China." "Unemployment soars."

For the reasons stated at the outset, if I were a CEO, I would certainly want to hire women in senior positions, but only those with a proven track record of having put in long hours at work and in professional development, and who could be counted on to continue doing so. Those are the same criteria I would use to evaluate male candidates.

Women, if you want to be considered for the boardroom, it doesn't cut it to say you're working smart so you needn't work long hours. There are plenty of men competing for those slots who work both long and smart. You can't have it both ways: either plan on working long and smart or accept a lower-level job in exchange for work/life balance.

There would be plenty of room in my company for women and men who want to work a moderate workweek, but not at the top. I don't care whether my executives have a y chromosome, but I want their priority not to be work-life balance, but rather, helping my company to ethically develop the best products in the world.

Why I'll be speaking out for downtrodden men

Belinda Brown · 30 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The International Conference on Men's Issues is a vital annual event which gives much needed publicity to the devastating issues affecting men and boys today. It was founded by two men – Paul Elam, who set up A Voice for Men, and Mike Buchanan, who founded the political party Justice for Men and Boys.

The first such event I attended was in 2016. It impressed me with the range of views as well the people it brought together by the general feeling of dismay about the devastation feminism has wreaked on society, and the particularly dire consequences for men and boys. The anti-feminist and men's rights movements had come together to challenge the ever more extreme thinking that has come to dominate public and social policy.

I am honoured to have been invited to speak at this year's meeting in July. Some of you will have read my critiques of feminism on this site. This conference gives me a chance to present my most recent thinking about an alternative way of understanding men and masculinity, based on what I believe to be their essential role in the family, something I call responsive masculinity. I am looking forward to seeing how the men there will respond to it!

Among the many other speakers this year will be Canadian Professor Janice Fiamengo, who'll be talking about the demonisation of young men on college campuses in the USA and the accompanying sexual misconduct trials; Nick Langford, a family law expert, on the damage feminism is doing to the family through changes in family law, and Ian McNicholl on a subject only rarely discussed in the mainstream media, the impact of domestic abuse on men, and the fact that men make up considerable numbers of domestic abuse victims.

The really wonderful thing about the conference, apart from its questioning of received wisdoms, is the chance to meet so many people from so many different fields working in different ways to bring about positive change to shortchanged men and boys. One of the highlights for me will be Anil Kumar, who has done so much to grow the men's movement in India.

Nor will it be without some vim. For the first time all three of Canada's three leading anti-feminist women, known as 'Canadian Honey Badgers' – Janice Fiamengo, Alison Tieman and Karen Straughan – will be speaking in the UK on the same platform. If you don't know why they call themselves honey badgers, just check out the fearless reputation of their namesake! You can get a preview of what they each think here, here and here.

If that's not enough by way of strong opinion, the conference will also hear The Conservative Woman's 'Rebel Priest', the Rev Jules Gomes, on the damage feminism has done to the Church of England – a theme close to my own heart.

For more details about the conference and its speakers click here.

[image]
Belinda Brown is author of 'The Private Revolution' and a number of well-cited academic papers. More recently, she has started writing and blogging for The Daily Mail and The Conservative Woman. She has a particular interest in men's issues and the damage caused by feminism.

The employer's guide to the Men's Rights Movement

Gerard Nicol · 30 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A few months ago I was in Los Angeles meeting with a partner and he was telling me how the day before they had undergone sexual harassment training. He mentioned that it made the men uncomfortable, and I asked why. He explained that it was because only men commit rape.

I found that interesting, not only because it is not actually true, but because if the falsely accused group were not men, I doubt the demographics of the perpetrator would have even been mentioned.

> According to the US Center for Disease Control, the crime of Made to Penetrate (the rape of a male by a female) is reported as often as rape, and that doesn't even include men raped by gay men.

Now, had the person giving the presentation been talking about another crime, say murder, would it be acceptable to say that people with black skin commit more murder than people with white skin? I would hope not, and if it did, I would walk out of the room, and hope that everybody else followed me.

So why is it unacceptable to mention true statistics about race and murder, and acceptable to mention false statistics about rape and gender? Well, probably because most men just don't know the real statistics.

But what if they did? How would the other people in the room respond to the initial objection? I think we all know how that would end, and when it ended with the employee being ostracized, he (or possibly even she) would have a very good case for a sexual discrimination lawsuit against their employer.

> What if some of the men were themselves victims of sexual assault? I know a lot of men who are, and the perpetrators were both men and women.

Like it or not, but a lot of men (and women) are turning to the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) for a whole range of reasons.

Parental Alienation after separating from their partner

Many men come to the MRM when they discover that when they divorce, the laws which involve resolving custody of their children are seriously biased against them. Depending on the country, this can range from women being given sole custody by default (Israel), to giving favorable consideration for sole custody to the "Primary Carer", code for mother (Australia).

Being a victim of and being falsely accused of Domestic Violence

Many men are victims of domestic violence, and even when they can prove they are victims, the system in most western countries will treat them as the perpetrator or cause of the violence. In Australia the government agencies explicitly say in their guide lines that if there is a dispute between what a man and woman say is occurring, the woman is always to be believed over the man, irrespective of the evidence to the contrary.

Fear of being falsely accused of sexual harassment and not being given a fair hearing

The fear of being falsely accused of sexual harassment is a fear that most men share, and that fear is justified given the militant rhetoric from feminists who regularly proclaim that it is good that men have this fear, even if they themselves have lead a life of exemplary behavior. It is not uncommon for men and boys to kill themselves after being falsely accused of sexual misconduct, even when they have completely proven their innocence.

Fatigue from constantly being vilified as a male

This is probably what is driving most other men towards the MRM. It is a realization that they have been raised to believe in, and support the idea of a social contract, and the realization that feminism has hijacked the social contract for the purposes of punishing and vilifying men.

Men are learning that they are just as likely to be victims of domestic violence and sexual assault, having spent a life time advocating for and defending women, only to realize that they are considered no better than a convicted rapist in the eyes of many women. The belief that all men are violent, and all men are potential rapists is a core element of many factions of feminism.

In some environments, even identifying as a Men's Rights Activist (MRA), or somebody sympathetic to men's rights, can result in the employee being ostracized, shamed and bullied, and with 70% of HR Managers being female, this creates a complex situation for employers, especially when many of these women publicly identify as feminists.

A few generations ago, if a man wanted to cut down a woman in the workplace when she raised a concern, he would probably crack a joke about it being that time of the month for her, and rightfully so, such a comment must have been really annoying to deal with, but yet today, women regularly do the same thing when they accuse a man of mansplaining.

> So, as a HR Manager, what would happen if a male employee was speaking and a female colleague accused him of mansplaining, only to be told herself that she should keep her misandric comments to herself, or people will thing that it's that time of the month for her?

Is one slur more acceptable than the other, and can one be sanctioned when the other is ignored, or even encouraged? I see this as being a real problem, especially if the HR department is dominated by women, and those women can't see that one is no worse than the other.

So, if you are in HR, perhaps it's in your best interests to understand exactly who you are dealing with when you have a male or female employee who has strong feelings on the subject of men's rights. These people usually fit into one of the following categories (and sometimes more than one):

Men's Rights Activist

A men's rights activist, or MRA, is a man or woman who advocates for the rights of men. Most MRAs are men, but the movement is also full of women, and many of the leading MRA advocates are female.

MRAs include gay men, who see gay rights as a men's rights issue.

Anti Feminist

Anti Feminists are men and women who believe that feminism is and/or has never been a movement that advocated for gender equality. They see feminism having squandered the opportunity for a more inclusive and harmonious version of gender equality where forced gender roles have been eliminated.

From my experience anti feminists know far more about feminism than most feminists, and have a stronger belief in gender equality than most feminists.

Woman against Feminism (WAF)

Most Women Against Feminism (WAF) identify as anti feminists, but differ from most anti feminists in that they do not necessarily oppose feminism on the grounds that it is discriminatory towards men. WAF women include Traditional-Conservative (Trad-Con) women who believe in traditional gender roles and oppose feminism for destroying a woman's right to live within a traditional female gender role.

Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW)

Men going their own way (MGTOW) are men who believe that the best way to avoid the risks of relationships with women is to avoid all forms of long term commitment. Many of these men come to MGTOW having learned the hard way that they faced biases in the family court system when seeking joint custody of their children after separation.

MGTOW are described as a phenomenon and not a movement, and as such focus heavily of analyzing female nature for the purposes of avoiding being enticed into a long-term relationship.

As a result of this focus on female nature, MGTOW have a large glossary of terms used to describe women (and men) and the way they behave. Some of these terms can be obnoxious, but others have found their way into common use within the broader MRM.

The Red Pill, the Red Pill Rage, and the Red Pill Isolation

The term Red Pilled is used widely with the MRM to describe the awakening that men and women experience when they learn the truth about gender relations. The term originates from the movie the Matrix, in which the character Neo is given a choice between taking the red pill and learning the uncomfortable truth, or taking the blue pill and going back to sleep.

Once you take the red pill. you cannot go back to the blue pill world, and you must live among the majority of comfortably blue pilled people. This creates two well discussed phenomena; the red pill rage, where people become angry at the betrayal they perceive from having previously lead a blue pilled life, and the red pilled isolation where they feel isolated and vilified by the blue pilled world.

Why do employers need to know this?

Well, apart from reasons of empathy and equity, there is one really good reason to understand this, and that is that women and men who identify as part of the MRM are highly educated in the statistics and contradictions of modern gender politics and as a result they are very likely to speak out against feminism, and the mistreatment of men who are being vilified because of their gender.

> As the MRM grows, employers should expect men and women to start filing sexual harassment claims; claims that have the potential to be heavily exacerbated by a failure of the employer to acknowledge or truly understand the discrimination.

If you are interested in learning more about this topic, a great film to watch is a movie called The Red Pill. This movie was made by a woman named Cassie Jaye who originally set out to make a documentary that exposed the Men's Rights Movement, and found herself questioning her own identity as a feminist.

Another MRA who is also worth watching is a woman who goes by the name Karen Straughan.

Doctor Jordan Peterson also touches on a lot of issues that resonate with the MRM.

@Twitter and @BuzzFeedNews working together to end free speech

Paul Elam · 2 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Twitter, the increasingly censorious social media platform, has blocked me from use for 7 days. They did so because I tweeted about Buzzfeed approaching me for an interview on the men's movement. This is the same Buzzfeed that dug 35 years into my past, looking for dirt so they could use it to take the focus off the men's movement and put it on me personally.

I tweeted my rejection to their request, and they apparently reported me to Twitter for doing it, as you can see in the image below.

Setting aside the ridiculousness of my even being able to harass Buzzfeed, it leaves me with the unavoidable conclusion that the leftist pigs in both organizations are happy to work together to bully and silence dissenting views.

I am also including the email for your review. And just a suggestion. It might be fun to see the headline to this post have a stronger presence on Twitter than my little love slap at Buzzfeed.

They will probably lifetime ban me for this, and that is fine. Social media platforms are the new public utilities. They are in the very dangerous position of making themselves arbiters of who can speak, when they can speak and what they say.

If we don't take a stand soon, and maybe even if we do, free speech will die.

[image]

[image]

Martyrs of Marriage now on Netflix

Deepika Narayan Bhardwaj · 3 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It was an overwhelming experience when credits of my documentary “Martyrs of Marriage” rolled in presence of several delegates at International conference on Men’s issues, ICMI 2017 last year. As the last frame appeared and I started walking towards the stage, everyone stood up applauding the film. For a first time filmmaker, a response like that is a dream come true especially when the audience know very little about the subject, it being a very country specific problem. But the core idea remains the same – innocent men being prosecuted and victimized, made victims of injustice, in the name of giving justice to women.

Martyrs of Marriage touches upon the subject of misuse of dowry laws in India and how countless men and their families have suffered because of false cases under IPC 498A also known as the anti dowry law in India.

The image of India in eyes of the world is that of a country which just doesn’t know how to treat it’s women. It’s because of the selective media stories projected in front of a global audience. No one shows to the world how men are suffering here. Women centric laws are misused brazenly with system doing nothing to address it and several men have lost or are losing lives because of false accusations of dowry, rape, sexual harassment, etc…

Martyrs of Marriage brings forth horrible tales where false cases under section 498A of Indian Penal Code have caused havoc in the lives of people, pushing many to suicide. The law has been misused to such an extent that the Supreme Court of India has once equated it with Legal Terrorism.

After travelling to several cities in India and abroad, the film has now released on NETFLIX. The title is available in most countries except few.

Here’s the link to the film – https://www.netflix.com/in/title/80239988

If you are unable to see it on Netflix in your country, here’s the vimeo link of the film in both Hindi and English language.

Martyrs of Marriage (English) : https://vimeo.com/ondemand/martyrsofmarriage/242216175

Martyrs of Marriage (Hindi) : https://vimeo.com/ondemand/martyrsofmarriage/242210921

I hope more and more people watch this film and take notice of the injustice happening to men and their families in the country.

The wife of Bath

Eva Barb · 5 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The Wife of Bath is, arguably, the most notorious of Geoffrey Chaucer's pilgrims in his unfinished work, The Canterbury Tales (1387)—consisting of 116 tales and narrated by 29 distinct pilgrims. The generally accepted notion among scholars is that Jankyn (the Wife's fifth husband) and his book, The Book of Wicked Wife (an anthology of women-on-men violence), is misogynist. On the contrary, Jankyn's book is a collection that narrates male victimization, violence against men, and misandry.

The Wife is a skilled cloth-maker, self-identified nymphomaniac, and an out-spoken, dressed-for-battle veteran of a traveler who has been analyzed in light of psychoanalytic theory, feminism, Marxism and queer studies. Despite feminist scholars who celebrate the Wife of Bath as the representation of resistance to Church-imposed patriarchy, her qualities (feminist and anti-feminist alike) are violent and destructive.

Most importantly, they revolve around a systematic manipulation of men into subhuman positions of silence. Using the instance of the Wife's assault on Jankyn as the premise for this analysis, I interrogate the erasure of male victimization that occurs in the Wife's Prologue as well as a similar, but more damning, omission of these narratives throughout the critical history of The Canterbury Tales.

The Wife of Bath provides a sharp juxtaposition to the meekly dressed and soft-spoken nuns among the pilgrims. Her Tale recounts the story of a knight who is convicted of rape and must pay penance by traveling the world in order to find the secret behind what women most desire (which turns out to be absolute sovereignty). Setting up a direct precedent for her Tale is a Prologue that focuses on what she's learned throughout her five marriages. The Wife's convictions on matrimony and the dynamics of wife/husband can be identified as existing on the following tenets, (which implicate each corresponding point):

1. The husband's marital obligations are to provide money, property, and sexual fulfillment to his wife. The Wife explicitly refers to these obligations as "debts."
   A) A wife's obligation(s) to her husband is/are (for the most part) non-existent, despite the fact he is perpetually indebted to her.

2. In the Middle Ages, a woman's only way of experiencing her sexuality was through multiple marriages by way of widow-ship.
   B) The death of the husband is the sexual freedom of the wife, all the while she reaps the deceased's possessions.

3. A woman's education is defined by her experiences in matrimony and the knowledge on men and masculinity passed down by her mother.
   C) Perspectives on men and masculinity are defined by female agents.

4. Women are inherently irrational and deceptive.
   D) The Wife is an unreliable narrator who, perhaps, shouldn't be taken at face-value.

5. Women most desire complete control over men.
   E) All the world's qualms can be solved by giving women tyrannical rule over men—an ideal echoed in mainstream feminism by mantras such as: "The future is female," and so on.

Jankyn is the Wife's youngest, most handsome, Oxford-educated husband. He is also the only one of the five husbands that she claims to truly love. He's good in bed, has a possessiveness comparable to that of the Wife's, and enjoys routinely reading from his Book of Wicked Wives. Intriguingly, the Wife prefaces the stories Jankyn recounts from the Book of Wicked Wives by echoing a medieval version of the Fable of Aesop: "Who peynted the leoun, tel me who?" (692). This version goes: a man and a lion were arguing over which of them were the stronger animal. The man shows the lion a painting of a man killing a lion, to which the lion asks, "Who painted the lion?" Then the lion eats the man (Boenig and Taylor 159). When the Wife asks: "Who painted the lion, tell me who?" she's suggesting that the painter's product directly correlates with his/her biases. Therefore, the male theologians that she spends the entirety of her Prologue disagreeing with are prejudiced to depict women in a negative light because, she claims, they are angry and sterile (707-8).

Contrary to the general consensus among scholars, the stories in The Book of Wicked Wives are not misogynist. In fact, there is no question about how vividly they convey misandry. The more relevant examples from Jankyn's book convey two significant points of contemporary misandry, 1) The feminine objectification of men by way of enforcing male sexual fidelity, and 2) The masculine obligation to fight in war, but most importantly, the social erasure of the pandemic male genocide that is war. These are as follows:

1. Hercules sets himself on fire, after his wife, Deianira, gives him a poisoned shirt in the hopes that he would remain faithful (Boenig and Taylor 159).

2. Socrates's wife, Xantippa, throwing urine on his head. "He sits still, as if he were dead," (729-30).

3. Clytemnestra conspiring with her paramour and murdering her husband, Agamemnon, upon his return from war (Boenig and Taylor 160).

4. When Amphiaraus hides in order to avoid a mandatory draft, his wife, Eriphyle, betrays his hiding place for a brooch of gold, and Amphiaraus is consequently killed on the battlefield (741-45).

Jankyn goes on to tell the Wife about other women who poisoned their husbands for political prominence and to avenge being cheated on. There is also more than one instance of murder via botched love potion. Perhaps the most grisly of these tales is when Jankyn speaks of an unidentified woman killing her husband and then proceeding to have sex with her lover next to the deceased's corpse.

If we treat The Canterbury Tales as a contained piece of poetry, whether it does or doesn't parallel reality, it nonetheless presents narratives of men being forsaken and murdered by women. Further, as we turn to the assault scene between the Wife and Jankyn, an uncanny and perplexing result becomes of it: Jankyn's submission to the Wife.

After hearing the complete aforementioned stories and more, the Wife gets so angry at Jankyn that she rips a page out of his book and punches him on the cheek so forcefully that he falls backward. In a moment of instigated anger, he gets up and hits her on the head, making her deaf in one ear. She falls to the floor, feigning death (or perhaps she was actually knocked unconscious). In a dramatic moment of utter nonsense, the Wife accuses Jankyn of having killed her for her land, and then goes on to kiss him one last time before she "dies." It is important to note that as the Wife recounts this story to her fellow pilgrims, she puts emphasis on how "gently" Jankyn kneels beside her, begs for forgiveness, (she then hits him on the cheek, again, and pretends to be dying, again). Ultimately, Jankyn grants the Wife absolute sovereignty over their estate and domestic life, burns his Book of Wicked Wives, and they (supposedly) live happily ever after.

Chaucer is known for his sense of humor. The assault scene in the Wife's Prologue might be hilarious in its incoherence, except when one begins to look at what really happened during this quarrel. Drawing from the Wife's unreliability as a narrator and her desire for absolute power over men, we can conclude that many, if not all, of the details she recounts are either entirely fabricated or edited to meet her needs.

Most suspicious is what makes Jankyn have such a sudden change of heart; strong enough to burn his beloved book and submit all of his independence to the Wife who just punched him (twice). This can easily be read as an example of the actual dominance women hold over men, especially when they've committed perhaps the most condemned of actions: hitting a woman. Plausibly, this is enough for Jankyn to give up all of his freedom and livelihood. If anything, we can see how Chaucer explicitly initiates narratives of male victimization and consequently exemplifies their erasures through the burning of the book, but also through Jankyn's Othering into a position of silent obedience.

In medieval times, misogyny (which consisted mostly of philosophers and theologians claiming that women were inferior to men) and agents of misandry (chivalry, matrimony, and pretty much everything the Wife says) existed on separate spheres. They were then, and still are now, forms of bigotry that have no relation to each other, except when feminists say misogyny! at the expense of misandry! Thus, erasure of violence against men perpetuates. Chaucer's Wife of Bath is the epitome of misandry, and in a cleverly ironic narrative construction, her Prologue both emphasizes male victimization and shows how easily, seamlessly, and without question it undergoes erasure.

Reference:

Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Canterbury Tales. "The Wife of Bath's Prologue." Edited by Robert Boenig and Andrew Taylor. Broadview, 2012, pp. 147-162.

Eva Barb holds a BA in English literature. She works as a freelance journalist and can usually be found playing video games and hiding from humanity with her husband in their tiny NYC apartment.

Book review of 'Governance Feminism: An Introduction'

Peter Wright · 8 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

> "The long march through the institutions is complete and feminists now occupy pivotal positions of power and decision-making throughout the world."

Despite being a feminist-friendly book with some of the usual agitprop, Governance Feminism: An Introduction caught my eye because I have never seen an overt discussion of feminist institutional power by a feminist. It's a topic classified taboo for academics and authors despite the effects of that power being experienced by peoples around the planet daily .

The book intrigued and perhaps even excited me for the prospect that a veil of denial and secrecy surrounding feminist power might be perforated for the first time.

The four authors of the work dubbed their topic Governance Feminism (GF), by which they mean "every form in which feminists and feminist ideas exert a governing will within human affairs." This definition follows Michel Foucault's definition of governmentality in which feminists and feminist ideas "conduct the conduct of men." Governance Feminism is proposed as a new phrase, but it deserves mentioning that MRAs have been using the synonymous phrase 'Feminist Governance' for many years.

The work looks at feminist infiltration into positions of institutional and cultural power – the long march through the institutions that so many of us have been monitoring. Feminists have infiltrated the UN, World Bank, International Criminal Court, every layer of national governments, and further into universities, schools, NGO volunteer orgs, and in HR departments at most medium to large scale workplaces. Not to mention Twitter, Facebook, Youtube and other social media platforms where most of the world's people communicate with each other. We would not be off base to say that feminist gatekeeping now regulates much of the planet, from top to bottom. They are everywhere.

But of course when questioned about holding such positions of power, feminists are quick to remind us that they still work for the "oppressed" sex and are thus justified in using positions of power to correct global imbalances. Ironically feminists consider power per se to be bad, a judgment rendering any admission of their own institutional power regulated by a strict taboo – for such an admission is akin to a Catholic nun who undertook vows of chastity, and being faced with admitting she is now in a sexual relationship. The authors tell:

> The first and most persistent form of resistance we have encountered is based on an idea that governance is per se bad, often expressed as an understanding that our describing governance feminism is identical with denouncing it. We do not think it is a gotcha to say that feminism rules."

The lead author Janet Halley admits elsewhere to being an occasional feminist – in other words a feminist if/when the need arises. Nevertheless her adoption of utopic feminist narratives is apparent throughout the pages, as for example when she characterizes feminism, and more specifically Governance Feminism as an "emancipatory project":

> Feminism is by aspiration an emancipatory project, and GF is one kind of feminists' effort to discover pathways to human emancipation. In the process, GFeminists have been, in some cases, highly successful in changing laws, institutions, and practices, very often remarkably for the better. Just scan the canonical first-wave manifesto for change, the 1848 Seneca Falls Declaration of Sentiments,[4] for once-impossible, now well-established changes in the legal status of U.S. women: the right to vote; the rights of married women to form contracts, to sue and be sued, to acquire and manage separate property, to select their place of residence, to be criminally and civilly responsible for their own actions, to seek a divorce and to seek child custody on > formally equal footing with husbands and fathers, and other powers formerly denied to them by coverture; to formally equal access to paid employment; to formally equal access to "wealth and distinction"[5] and to the professions; and to access to education.

>
> These are all basic elements of a liberal feminist agenda for women. Women have devoted entire lifetimes to achieving them. None of them came easily. They are not complete emancipation, surely. But compared with lack of all franchise, coverture, and categorical exclusion from the public sphere and all but the most grinding and ill-paid work, they are immense achievements attributable almost entirely to GFeminist efforts. One reason to describe GF is to be clear about its immense emancipatory achievements.

I can hear the reader's objections now, that Halley's overview of three waves of feminism as 'emancipatory' is a laughable gloss over the violence, censorship and tyranny perpetrated throughout that history. No doubt Halley is here giving a mandatory nod to the narratives of her more powerful "sisters" in order to avoid a backlash.

Framing feminist aspirations as emancipatory, and not as an urge-to-power by ruthless gender-ideologues, softens the tyrannical use of power, painting instead a soothing pastel picture. Said more directly, feminist use of power has to most observers been far more tyrannical and destructive than this glowing characterization reveals. With that in mind the authors might equally have characterized Governance Feminism as unadulterated power-seeking (ultimately for women) and been more on point.

To be fair the authors do go on to tackle some of the excesses of Governance Feminism after their apparently mandatory hand kissing of feminist theorists, and this deeper critique is where the true value of this book lies. The authors admit that many feminist visions of "emancipation" have been left at the station when various governance trains took off, confirming that the '"selective engagement" of feminist ideas into governmental power has left some diamonds in the dust.'

Further, they state;

> In our view it has also done some damage: some governance feminist projects strike us as terrible mistakes; others have unintended consequences that are or should be contested within feminist political life. As some Governance Feminist projects become part of established governance, we find ourselves worrying about them more, or differently, than we did when they were unorthodox, "outsider" ideas. We are, therefore, inviting a robust discussion within feminism and between feminism and its emancipatory allies about which elements are emancipatory and which may, after all, be mistakes. [italics mine]

The authors go on to critique a number of these 'mistakes,' while remaining at times uncritical about assumed feminist successes. As touched on above, Governance Feminists also go to great lengths to hide their grasp on power, while taking every opportunity to exaggerate and demonize male uses of power:

> Gender mainstreaming has located feminists in many organizations, from the UN to college administrations, almost always as bureaucrats. Here they wield not judicial power, not the sword of punishment, but the more fine-grained power of administration. Gender mainstreaming, which aims to universalize feminist ideas in governance and convert every governmental entity into a branch of Governance Feminism, paradoxically produces gender specialists."

For most readers this quote encapsulates the danger of feminist power. Feminist ideologues have been inserted into every institution around the globe as gatekeepers dictating who does/doesn't get employed, get assisted, financed, approved, credentialed, included, heard and so on. It can even descend to who gets food aid, who gets to rent a house in a scarce rental market, or who gets a job as a cleaner.

As an example, Jordan Peterson recently talked about HR departments at workplaces serving as foci for the feminist social manipulations. This development is insidious because the practice is hidden in supposedly menial bureaucratic positions, ones that just happen to wield pivotal power over the work-lives of citizens and the associated family outcomes – not to mention the outcome of amplifying gendered expectations and conventions that inevitably get instituted culture-wide through this process of rewarding or punishing via biased bureaucratic decisions. With this in mind it's no exaggeration to call feminists social engineers who have succeeded in running the world.

Beyoncé 'Who run the world: girls'

Some years ago I read a paper on the topic of "administrative discretion" which refers to the flexible exercising of decision-making allowed to public administrators. The discretionary opportunity is made available by the wiggle-room in the bureaucrat's code of practice, and she or he uses that to deliver preferred – and often unfair – outcomes. The use of administrative discretion typifies the modus operandi of Governance Feminism, which is utilized to implement a radical feminist ideological agenda through all levels of society. Feminism-inspired women are increasingly dominating HR roles, and as revealed by teacher-preferencing biases in elementary schools they are exploiting administrative discretion to favor females over males.

Janet Halley lays much of the blame for the failures of Governance Feminism at the feet of two forms of feminism that form an operational alliance: Power Feminism (PF) and Cultural Feminism (CF). The book provides a useful overview of both, stating that they have formed an unholy alliance that came to dominate the internal battle for supremacy between different 'feminisms.' Power and cultural feminism meld into each other or appear side by side, writes Halley, and together they are frequently dubbed Dominance Feminism. She adds that Dominance Feminism finds male domination in two distinct forms: in the false superiority of male values and male culture, and in the domination of all things Female by all things Male:

> American dominance feminism is a top-down, bottom-up model of M/F relations: there are perpetrators (men) and victims (women); people with an individualist ethic (men) and people with an ethic of care (women); people feminists advocate for (women) and people they accuse (men). This model of right and wrong is highly assimilable to criminal law and tort law frameworks. Thus the very visible elements of Governance Feminism that use the penal powers of the state to "end" sexual violence in all its forms are saturated with dominance feminist ideas. Especially where power feminism makes its influence felt, it makes sexuality the core of the problem: dominance feminist thinking places sexual wrongs front and center, and assimilates other seemingly nonsexual wrongs to sexual ones.
>
> This is, we think, a manifestly narrow, crabbed, and even paranoid view of the gender order in the United States, and it is hospitable to quite ethnocentric, neocolonial construals of the gender order prevailing in the global South. It is remarkably indifferent to distributional consequences. Why does it play such a large role in Governance Feminism today?"

In Chapter 3. Halley discusses Governance Feminists' need to reflect on generating, owning, and critiquing their own governance power, which as mentioned above is hamstrung by feminism's denouncement of power structures combined with its own denials about both possessing and wielding real power.

When the authors first encouraged the sustained study of Governance Feminism in 2006, some feminists told them that "they simply did not understand how marginal and fragile feminist gains in state and near-state power really were… If some feminist ideas and interests had managed to find their way into law, these were crumbs from the table, compromises with patriarchy on patriarchy's terms not worthy of the name "feminist," tiny fragments of the full feminist agenda, which was not merely to ride along on the back of power but to transform it."

Such a response is breathtaking in its denial, and I would add predictable, leading the authors to assert that not only do feminists hold such world-changing power, they need also to ethically critique their use of it:

> We think such acts of public critique are absolutely essential now that feminists and feminist ideas are so firmly embedded in legal institutions and legal power.[25] But they can be costly: insider-insiders often feel compelled to attack any feminist who does it, at the very least by depriving her of her insider credentials and her insider job and at the very most by marshaling major institutional resources to discredit her and her ideas, defund her projects, and leave her constituents out in the cold."

In the final chapter Halley implores Governance Feminists to develop an ethic of responsibility; to both admit to the power they preside over, assess its impact both negative and positive, and own the outcome. This lofty appeal is frankly laughable when considering the ideological agendas and unethical practices that Dominance Feminists are known for. Asking them to take a more ethical approach is as likely of success as asking Mao Zedong to develop an ethic of individual liberty and a policy of free-market capitalism.

Antifeminists around the world have a very different suggestion to that of going hat in hand imploring Dominance Feminists to show more ethical and considerate behavior. Their alternative is to shine a harsh light on the moral corruption of feminist ideologues, and work to neutralize their destructive programs via effective counter-activism. The antifeminist counter-movement is in full career and I'm certain that Governance Feminists around the world are already feeling the heat. Halley's book contributes to that insurgency move, perhaps unwittingly, by demonstrating just how much power these ideologues have been wielding. The book is therefore useful in that it speaks the unspeakable… the cat is finally out of the bag.

The authors conclude by mentioning a second volume is in process titled Governance Feminism: Notes from the Field, which will provide case studies describing and assessing national, international, and transnational Governance Feminist projects by a range of feminists engaged in building them. No longer operating in the shadows, Governance Feminists are now being scrutinized in broad daylight…. and with that move they will have a lot of explaining to do for their transgressions.

Single fathers have alarmingly high mortality rates

Samuel Veissière, Ph.D. · 9 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

For better or for worse, the traditional family unit has changed a lot since the 1960s. Once a cultural oddity amid an ocean of nuclear families, single-parent households have now become the norm in many segments of modern society. While stigma against divorce is slowly shifting, single parents are still facing many challenges. Beyond the economic burden of single incomes, single parents have long been recognized by public health specialists as being at a higher risk of poorer health, higher stress levels, and increased mortality. Most investigations to date, however, have focused on single mothers.

A recent study published by the Lancet Public Health sought to address this gap, and compared the health outcomes of 871 single fathers to 4,590 single mothers and partnered couples (16,341 fathers and 18,688 mothers) over an 11-year period. The results are alarming. Even after controlling for differences in lifestyles, age, and socioeconomic status, the researchers found that single fathers' likelihood to die early was more than twice as high as that of single mothers or partnered parents.

The findings are alarming, but the real cause for concern may be more difficult to discern. A recent report on the study by the CBC—Canada's most prominent news platform—was quick to package the story with such bold headlines as Men Don't Take Care of Themselves as Well, and emphasize such dimensions as "binge-drinking" and "eating worse" while presenting men in general as "high-risk individuals."

This negative bias in the portrayal of men is commonplace in the media and public health, but like other forms of implicit bias, it can be hard to recognize and overcome. Before identifying and addressing this bias, we should pause to consider the broader lack of public discussion surrounding men's issues.

Public silence is consistently recognized by experts as one of the biggest challenges faced by the men's rights movement. The what, you might ask? You read it correctly the first time. The notion that men's rights constitute a non-laughable, legitimate cause of concern in 2018 may seem odd, or outright preposterous to many readers. This, experts argue, is part of the issue.

Robert Whitley, a Professor of Psychiatry at McGill and specialist on men's mental health, points out that public attention is typically geared toward women's issues (and increasingly, transgender issues) when questions of gender and equality are raised. In a recent study led by Whitley, McGill researchers found that Canadian news and media items focusing on mental health tended to portray women in a markedly positive light, while articles about men were significantly more negative. Articles that focused on men were much more likely to showcase stigmatizing content and emphasize violence. Those depicting women, in turn, were significantly more likely to discuss mental health interventions, quote experts, and promote key resources for recovery.

It may still be a surprise to many, thus, that men overwhelmingly fare worse than women in many key indicators of wellbeing. In addition to higher early mortality rates, men also experience much higher rates of suicide, incarceration, workplace accidents and workplace-related deaths. Government statistics confirm that men typically receive harsher sentences in both criminal and family courts, with only seven percent of them receiving full custody of their children. Domestic violence statistics also present a counter-intuitive story. Equal proportions of men and women report domestic abuse in Canada. In turn, moral panics about women's educational achievements and underrepresentation in research and science also seem to miss the mark by far. Women now represent 60% of all university graduates across disciplines, while boys, particularly in Quebec, drop out of school before earning a high-school diploma at a rate almost double that of girls. Kay S Hymowitz, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute and author of the book Manning Up, noted in 2011 that this trend reflected a general shift in Western countries since the 1980s, when considerable efforts and resources were invested to ensure that girls could 'catch up' with boys in schools, the workplace, and public life. By Hymowitz's account, this important effort was largely successful….at the expense of boys in the next generation.

In a recent Psychology Today piece, world-renown psychologist Philip Zimbardo (father of the Heroic Imagination Project) identified an "empathy gap" surrounding men and boys' issues. Zimbardo points out that this gap is most prevalent in schools and universities, in which training programs on the dangers of "toxic masculinity" have seen a rise in popularity. By Zimbardo's account, the problem goes beyond the silencing of men's issues. It is masculinity itself, rather, that is increasingly seen as a "risk" and a disease.

Shifting public opinion on the importance of men and boy's issues is likely to remain an important challenge. Public and university screenings of The Red Pill, a documentary that showcases contemporary men's issues, are almost invariably met or shut down by protestors. Men's rights associations like the Canadian Association for Equality, similarly, are routinely targeted at public events by crowds of protesters and accusations of misogyny.

Why such polarization?

The feminist critic Laura Kipnis, who rose to recent controversy by raising concern over the culture of sexual paranoia on university campuses, once commented ironically on the increased tensions between genders following the feminist revolution of the 1960s. Wasn't there a risk, she joked, that one of feminism's darkest contributions may have been to redistribute domination equally among genders, so that couples could now argue equitably over dishes or who gets to go out at night? By the same token, and so particularly in the context of social justice wars and a rising culture of victimhood, the men's rights movement may carry the risk of turning equality debates into competition for victim status.

I make no such claim or argument here. Oppression and victimhood are not naturally occurring features of the world. More to the point, it takes a cultural invitation to interpret the world that way. The problem, rather, lies in the all-too-common mental flaw of ascribing a simple essence to categories of persons (e.g., "high-risk", "vulnerable"), and simplifying complex social processes to the actions of bad perpetrators and the passivity of good victims. Contrary to common claims, the public narrative has now heavily shifted toward negative portrayal of men and boys, and condescending portrayal of women.

In pointing to anti-masculine culture as a hidden risk for the health of men and boys, I speak as man, an educator, and a father raising two boys. But I also speak as an anthropologist and cognitive scientist, and as a human concerned with the species as a whole. My plea is for mutual recognition, respect, and dignity for all—all, as the now old-fashioned goes, regardless of sex, race, or creed.

We may be blind to our biases and to the cultural forces that modulate them. The next step after recognizing these forces is to work intentionally to change them.

Judge allows men to challenge male-only draft

Cameron Langford · 10 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

HOUSTON (CN) — The National Coalition for Men can proceed with its class action lawsuit challenging the government's men-only mandate for registering for the military draft, a federal judge ruled on Friday.

Although the U.S. military is now an all-volunteer force, to stay prepared for a major war the Military Select Service Act requires men age 18 to 25 to register with the Select Service System.

The government held its last draft, for the Vietnam War, in 1973.

All men, including undocumented immigrants, who do not register and keep their contact information current can be sentenced to five years in prison, fined up to $250,000 and be disqualified from federal financial aid and citizenship, though no man has been prosecuted for failing to register since the 1980s.

The National Coalition for Men, represented by Marc Angelucci in Los Angeles, sued the Select Service System in April 2013, claiming the male-only draft registration rule is unconstitutional gender discrimination. The Pentagon in January 2013 lifted a ban on women serving in front-line combat positions.

The coalition seeks an injunction ordering the government to make both men and women register for the draft.

As of February there were 213,851 women in the military, about 16 percent of the 1.3 million total members, according to the Department of Defense.

U.S. District Judge Gray Miller on Friday denied the government's motion to dismiss the coalition's class action.

The government claimed the coalition's co-plaintiffs, James Lesmeister and Anthony Davis, lack standing, as neither has been drafted, nor are they at risk of being prosecuted, because they have registered for the draft.

"Regardless, both have a continuing obligation to update SSS with changes to their information. That obligation, paired with the requirement to register with SSS, constitutes an injury sufficient for Article III standing," Miller wrote.

In its dismissal motion, the government said the challengers are trying to intrude on Congress's authority to oversee military affairs, and their claims are precluded by the U.S. Supreme Court 1981 ruling in Rostker v. Goldberg, involving men who made similar sex-discrimination arguments about draft-registration rules. Justices Byron White wrote a dissent, joined by Justice William Brennan, who also joined a separate dissent by Justice Thurgood Marshall.

The 6-3 majority in Rostker held that because women were excluded from combat, there was no need to draft them, so the male-only rule was constitutional.

But Miller ruled that the coalition has made a viable gender discrimination claim under the Fifth Amendment's equal protection clause, due to the military's new policy of letting women fight on the front lines.

"Regarding Rostker's holding that the male-only draft did not violate the Constitution, the factual circumstances of this case are different. … Now, women can serve in combat roles," Miller, a George W. Bush appointee, wrote in an 8-page order.

The coalition filed the lawsuit in April 2013 in the Central District of California. U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer dismissed it, but the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded. Fischer again nixed the coalition's claims in November 2016, finding it lacked standing since its only co-plaintiff, James Lesmeister, was not a coalition member.

Fischer transferred the case to the Southern District of Texas because Lesmeister lives near Houston.

The coalition filed an amended complaint in August 2017, adding class claims and its member Anthony Davis as a plaintiff. Judge Miller found the addition of Davis was enough for the coalition to establish “associational standing.”

The coalition, founded in 1977, is based in San Diego, California. It helped bring a lawsuit in 1985 against Hancock International Airport in Syracuse, New York, for having diaper-changing tables only in the airport’s women’s restrooms.

Settlement of that case led to the placement of changing tables in men’s bathrooms throughout the United States, the coalition says on its website.

Its attorney, Marc Angelucci, is vice president of its board. He started its Los Angeles chapter in 2001.

Angelucci said in a statement Sunday the coalition is pleased with Miller’s order. But he said its goal is not necessarily to force the government to make women sign up for the draft.

“NCFM takes no position on whether the best approach is to end mandatory draft registration or to require both men and women to register. Nor does NCFM take any position as to whether women should be in combat, as the draft can include noncombat positions. As a men’s rights organization, NCFM’s concern is with the unconstitutional sex discrimination against men. How to resolve the illegality is up to the federal government,” he said.

The Department of Justice did not respond Sunday to an email seeking comment on Miller’s order.

Source: Courthouse News Service

Introducing Max Bromista

Paul Elam · 13 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I just wanted to share this tweet, and a link to this young comedian's website.

> @anearformen Hi Mr. Elam. I am a 13 year old professional comedian. If you go to 1:35 on this video there is a joke that you will LOVE. I promise you will love it!https://t.co/TXkq56yBKQ
>
> — Max Bromista (@MaxBromista) April 11, 2018

Paul Elam on gender roles and family courts – Red Pill Raw Files

AVFM · 16 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Register-her.net: It’s here. #MeToo #MenToo

Paul Elam · 19 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Twitterbirds Unite!

Video on Souad Faress
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cyIIDZGHuqQ&t=19s

Mark Pearson Tells His Story
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aJlAWbHNj7k

REGISTER-HER.NET
http://register-her.net/

Lillibolero Inc.
http://www.lillibolero.com/

Tilting laws to advance the feminist agenda

Bettina Arndt · 19 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The icy grip of feminism on our key institutions has been exposed in a series of alarming stories emerging over the last month. Last week the Daily Telegraph announced UTS in Sydney has introduced special committees to judge other students accused of sexual assault or harassment. These extra-judicial panels comprising students and some staff members will examine evidence, conduct interrogations and recommend punishments – expulsion from the university or withholding of degrees. The university has caved in to feminist demands and is foolishly blundering into legal territory potentially undermining proper process in what could be serious criminal matters.

For the past eight months I've been supporting a young PhD student at Adelaide university who was pursued by a similar committee following an accusation of sexual assault from another student. The Adelaide committee didn't include students but rather 'student affairs officers' who handled proceedings in a totally unprofessional manner. The result was a Kafkaesque nightmare with the committee trying to persuade the student to attend meetings, despite giving no detail of the actual accusations. I found a criminal barrister to advise the student on how to handle their ham-fisted efforts to force him to comply – scary times indeed for the young man because the committee had the power to recommend his PhD be withheld. The university ended up dropping the case and backtracking madly when they realised the committee was at risk of denying basic legal rights to the male student.

None of this should come as a surprise, even though you may have thought the campus feminists would have given up after last year's fake rape crisis proved such a fizzer. They'd persuaded the Human Rights Commission to spend a million dollars trying to prove there was a rape crisis on our campuses and all they came up with was some unwanted staring. Despite this setback they are still pushing to persuade universities to take over the investigation of sexual assault cases simply because they believe our criminal system doesn't convict enough date rape cases. Juries won't convict where there isn't sufficient evidence to determine whom to believe in a 'he said, she said' scenario. Hence the push from these gender warriors to encourage universities to break down traditional protections for the accused such as access to all relevant evidence.

We've seen where this leads in US universities where Trump is winding back the college tribunal system; with universities facing massive legal costs from falsely accused students and their families. Just this month 130 leading law professors and legal experts signed an open letter condemning the use of investigative 'victim-centred' practices subverting the objective collection and presentation of evidence in such sexual assault cases, particularly on campuses.

Shocking evidence has emerged of a report, funded by the US Department of Justice and produced by a group called 'End Violence Against Women', which calls on police investigations and personnel conducting investigations to 'work for a successful prosecution' – meaning, obtain a conviction by using a number of unethical strategies. These include: making the complainant 'appear more innocent'; 'not writing a detailed report' to minimise the possibility of inconsistent or conflicting accounts; and writing the report in such a way that the incident does 'not look like a consensual sexual experience'. The influence of this group's 'Start by Believing' campaign underpins many of the miscarriages of justice cases now rebounding on the universities.

Meanwhile Britain has been rocked by the collapse of a series of rape trials due to deliberate withholding of key evidence by prosecutors. Alison Saunders, the former Director of Public Prosecutions, has recently stepped down; all current rape and serious sexual assault cases are currently being reviewed; and Metropolitan Police are now ditching the practice of 'believing all victims', according to the Times.

The BBC reported that over the past two years there's been a 70 per cent increase in the number of prosecutions in England and Wales that had collapsed because of a failure by police or prosecutors to disclose evidence. Last year, 916 people had charges dropped over a failure to disclose evidence – up from 537 in 2014-15.

The most notorious example involved the trial of Liam Allan, who faced 12 counts of rape and sexual assault.

Allan's trial was halted and charges dropped when it emerged evidence on a computer disc – which police had looked through – showed messages from the alleged victim pestering him for 'casual sex'. Feminists have long argued that such social media messages should be withheld from rape trials – evidence which often helps the accused. Clearly Britain's public prosecutors have been doing just that.

But tilting of the law in rape cases is only part of the story. In Perth a few weeks ago, an experienced relationship counsellor was fired from Relationships Australia for posting on his Facebook page my article 'Silent Victims' (published in the Weekend Australian) giving the true facts about domestic violence. Here is a government-funded counselling body which proudly proclaims their domestic violence policies are based on a 'feminist analysis of gender power relations' – an analysis which denies women's role in family violence and paints men as the only real perpetrators. Somehow the managers of this notoriously male-hostile organisation felt entitled to summarily dismiss this respected counsellor for exposing his own experience with both violent men and women in his counselling practice.

Relationships Australia now faces an unfair dismissal case which will highlight efforts being made by many organisations to silence those who publicly challenge the feminist dogma they are promoting. That will be just the start of a major campaign, including crowd-funding, to pay the young man's legal fees but also to expose the scandalous fact that such government-funded bodies feel entitled to promote dangerous ideology rather than properly address the real causes of domestic violence and provide help to all its victims. As I point out in my article, most children growing up in violent homes are cowering not just from fathers but often mothers as well. We are failing these children by allowing feminist ideology to warp proper debate on this issue.

Source: first published in The Spectator

Edit: I'm finding it very discouraging that after organising a lot of publicity about what has happened to this young man – national television, a couple of radio and newspaper stories – the video interview with him only attracted about 3,000 viewings. Let's face it – no one cares about what happens to men. Why is it that the many thousands of Australian readers of this site can't be bothered spreading the word about this scary development – the fact that our universities are following down the dangerous US path and are taking on the role of investigating rape cases? This should be big news and all men should get on board in spreading the message that this is happening. YouTube has done its best to bury the video but it has been still able to be accessed through the direct link shown above. Yet hardly anyone bothers. Why is that? – Bettina Arndt

A response to a recent announcement by Mike Buchanan

Robert Brockway · 20 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Mike Buchanan recently made a blog post that he will now be publicly presenting himself as a Gender Equality Activist (GEA). Mike stated:

> Speaking personally, I'm happy to be described as a MRA or a GEA, and for the great movement in which I've worked full-time for many years to be described as the MRM or GEM. But henceforth I plan to generally publicly present myself as a GEA, and our movement as the GEM. I invite other MRAs to join me.

I respect Mike and I respect his decision but I don't agree with it. Others have dropped or de-prioritised the term Men's Rights. I think this is a mistake.

I will continue to be calling myself an MRA and encourage others to do the same for the following reasons:

- There is no way to compel MRAs to switch. No matter what you do some will never abandon the term Men's Rights. As a result any attempt at rebranding will result in a split community. Within six months the new term will be demonised as much as Men's Rights but now you'll be left with the split community.

- If you advocate for men and boys you will be called an MRA regardless of what you call yourself. Feminists routinely label people as MRAs even when they explicitly reject the title. Examples include Matt Forney, Roosh Valizadeh and even Milo Yiannopoulos.

- The term Men's Rights protects us. Feminists routinely infiltrate and take over other movements. They've done this with earlier incarnations of the men's movement, the Skeptics movement and even the open source movement (which I have been involved with for 25 years). They have so demonised the MRM they can't infiltrate it. A few feminists have actually tried, only to have the rest of the feminist community turn on them. The term Men's Rights protects us. This effect is so powerful that I can openly admit this, as I have done in the past, and it won't make one iota of difference.

As anti-feminism and interest in the welfare of men and boys gains traction it is more important than ever to embrace the term Men's Rights. We're already seeing a pattern where the wider society is absorbing the ideas of the MRM via intermediaries. Many in society are now agreeing with at least some of what we are saying even as they continue to be hostile to the MRM itself.

The MRM may never be large but it is essential that we keep the flame burning. It may continue to fall to others to repackage the message in a more palatable form for consumption by the wider society. That's fine as long as the message gets out, and it is getting out.

Amateur documentary on (mostly young) British MRAs

AVfM Video Source · 21 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Chris Leyman-Nicholls presents his documentary about contemporary British MRAs

Lest We Forget

Mark Dent · 24 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It's ANZAC Day in Australia and New Zealand. This is a day to remember those who have fallen in the many wars in which these nations have fought. One hundred years ago the First World War ended. We're reprinting an outstanding article written by Mark Dent and published on AVfM three years ago. –Ed

Every year I attend the ANZAC Day clash between Essendon Football Club and my beloved Collingwood, two traditional rivals playing in the Australian Football League. Aside from the adrenaline which pumps through my veins as I anticipate the spine tingling roar at the conclusion of our national anthem, there is another moment when I must physically brace myself to contain the swirl of emotions which assail my body. No-it isn't in reaction to an outrageous umpiring error or a player's costly mistake. This reaction comes long before the first bounce to commence the clash.

I know that the ANZAC Day ceremony will entail a tribute. This tribute will invariably call upon the one hundred thousand people gathered there to bow their heads as they recall the selfless sacrifice of our brave men and women.

That's right-the brave men and women.

Being something of a history buff I wonder if perhaps the details of our female battalions who dug in at the Somme and endured the freezing conditions, slept in the mud, blood and guts of their girlfriends and charged the enemy trenches with fixed bayonets had eluded me.

I never saw footage of limbless, blind, deaf, shell shocked, facially disfigured young girls being carried or wheeled off ships as they arrived home to resume their civilian lives. Perhaps the cameras weren't operating that day.

Yet year after year we pay tribute and give equal standing to both the men and women. How is this gross misrepresentation of the facts allowed to go on unquestioned? Of course if one was stupid enough to raise the issue at a dining table the response would be as predictable as the effects of gravity. People would screech in indignant outrage: "Our women worked in the factories, nursed and cared for the wounded and suffered the grief of losing their husbands, brothers and sons!"

Hilary Clinton's infamous line about women being the primary victims of war comes to mind.

If a women was ever harmed in war time, particularly in World War One, it was as a result of an unexpected accident or illness. No woman ever fought side by side with the men nor were they expected to fight. Yet, I repeat-they receive the same gratitude, respect and acknowledgement as the men. It is incomprehensible and makes a disgraceful mockery of the Remembrance Day ceremonies.
A handful of men suffer from breast cancer. Can you imagine the outcry we would hear from women if all of the breast cancer awareness campaigns spoke of the dreadful devastation of breast cancer wrought upon our women and men without any reference whatsoever to the enormous statistical discrepancy in which gender is most badly affected? It doesn't bear thinking about. There's no need to wonder as it would never happen.

This issue of our media never being gender specific about issues negatively impacting upon men's lives was brought to a head for me over this weekend when a full page article on suicide titled, You're Not Alone appeared in the lift out section of the HeraldSun.

As I greedily scanned the paragraphs, hoping I would stumble across the sentence alerting the world to the fact that the terrible tragedy we call suicide disproportionately affects our men, I quickly realised my search was a futile one.

Over 75% of suicides are committed by a male. This of course doesn't mean we should focus solely on males, but given the disparity in the figures one would think we would be thrown a crumb of sympathy, an empathic wink or a pat on the head. Nope…nothing. No mention of men as a gender throughout the entire article. In fact the personal focus was on women who had lost a male partner and how difficult life was for them as a consequence.

On the same day as this article appeared the murder of a little boy by his mentally unstable father was receiving wall to wall coverage. Each time the story was told the announcer reminded everyone that domestic violence was a scourge which overwhelmingly affected women although a small minority of men were also victims. Suddenly it seemed very important for the public to understand that this is an issue that harms women and that is where all of our attention should be focused.

This very deliberate censorship can be found in a number of other issues which overwhelmingly affect men. I have never watched, listened to or read a media story on death and disability in the workplace which states-men are the overwhelming victims of death and disability in the workplace. In fact when the Victorian Government ran a campaign on this issue a few years ago, all of the television, radio and print advertisements referred to the Deaths of Victorians in the Workplace.

Oh- and the dead are referred to as people or workers in all of the documentation. We would never refer to the female victims of domestic violence as people or family members. We would be left in no doubt whatsoever that it was a woman who was slapped, pushed, beaten or verbally abused. Isn't it funny how gender is of no consequence when males are dying?

When our media speak or write about our homeless-that is all we ever call them. We don't mention the fact that 67% of our homeless roughing it on the streets are males or 75% taking shelter in boarding houses are males. Can you imagine this percentage remaining a non issue if it were females wandering our streets and making up 70% of our homeless?

Why is this deliberate deception and censorship so prevalent in our media? One could be led to believe there is some kind of agreement in media circles that anything which could focus attention upon the hardship, loss, grief and injustice men endure is to be hidden, glossed over or ignored.
Some claim that more women are victims of family violence. Nevertheless a very substantial proportion of men are also affected. Understanding this, all domestic violence ads still focus exclusively upon women.

Men are not referred to at all, other than as perpetrators of course.

Imagine a suicide campaign with the same resources behind it as the Domestic Violence Industry has. This suicide awareness campaign would involve huge billboards, advertisements on television and a barrage of print articles in our major papers. Women would not be referred to in any way whatsoever. They would simply not exist as victims in the world of suicide. When outraged women ask why we are not concerned about female suicide they would be informed that less women kill themselves and for different reasons. Perhaps we could suggest that if they are so concerned about the plight of women who kill themselves they could start up their own movement to bring awareness to the problem. Our focus just happens to be upon the men. That would surely soothe their indignation.

I would like this revised version of the pre-match ANZAC Day tribute to be read during the pre-match ceremony. It would go some way to addressing the rather absurd, insulting, inaccurate and somewhat deceitful insinuation that women have sacrificed as much as men throughout the many wars we have endured.

Ladies and gentleman, could we please be upstanding as we pause and offer a minute's silence in tribute to the courage and sacrifice of tens of thousands of young Australian men and boys who died so that we might live in a peaceful, free society. Others gave great support to our soldiers and we acknowledge the tireless work of the many nurses who took care of our men and gave them comfort in a time of need.

Featured image was originally posted to Flickr by NZ Defence Force at http://flickr.com/photos/56631565@N06/5650697092. It was reviewed on 7 April 2012 by the FlickreviewR robot and was confirmed to be licensed under the terms of the cc-by-2.0. –Ed

Twitter censors reference to Souad Faress' #FalseRape accusation

Hannah Wallen · 24 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine one night you are accosted by strangers, bound, stuffed into the back of a car and driven to a building where you are put in a cage. Your family has to pay ransom to get you back, but not until after your captors have interrogated you, accused you of a reprehensible act, publicly attacked your reputation, and threatened to throw you back in the cage as retribution for your alleged wrongdoing. It's up to you to prove the allegation wrong, or it's the cage for you.

No, you have no recourse for the kidnapping and mental torture. No, you can't get your money back. No, you can't even get your name fully cleared, and you're going to have to fight tooth and nail to get it mostly cleared.

And by the way, you're not allowed to tell anyone who your accuser is, because the nature of what you're accused of makes that illegal.

[image]
Souad Faress, false accuser
That's the position Mark Pearson found himself in when he was arrested and questioned over a rape complaint made by award-winning Game of Thrones actress Souad Faress. The accusation itself was ridiculous. Pearson passed by Faress in Waterloo Station in London. Afterward, Faress accused him of reaching up under her skirt and into her undergarments, and penetratively sexually assaulting her for two or three seconds. She claimed to have staggered and yelled, and that people stopped all around her. On behalf of the actress, Mr. Pearson was plunged into what he described as "a year-long "Kafkaesque nightmare" of being arrested, investigated, publicly humiliated and subjected to a trial.

To secure a conviction, the state slowed down CCTV footage of their brief encounter in an attempt to make it look like there had been more time for the assault to have occurred, and Mr. Pearson's attorneys had to fight to get it played correctly for the jury. Even slowed, the footage did not show any contact, nor any reaction by passers-by.

To secure a conviction, the state slowed down CCTV footage of their brief encounter

Viewed at the speed at which it was recorded, the footage clearly demonstrated that the assault was physically impossible. There was less than a second of time when the two were even close enough to touch. Mark Pearson was carrying items in both hands, and the positions of his hands didn't change from frame to frame at all.

The jury in his case took 90 minutes to return a verdict of Not Guilty.

InBrief.co.uk reports that

> Under s 5(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 (CLA 1967), (Wasting Police Time) it is an offence to cause a wasteful employment of the police by knowingly making a false report – either orally or in writing – to the police or anyone else that:

> - an offence has been committed;

> - there is a real threat to the safety of any persons or property; or

> - they have relevant information concerning some police enquiry.

The site also describes another crime that is relevant to this case:

> Perverting the course of justice
>
> If a false report you made has particularly serious consequences, the police could charge you with perverting the course of justice instead, which carries a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. Police are more likely to charge you with this more serious offence, rather than wasting police time if:

> - the false report was motivated by malice;

> - you continued to stick to your false story, even when there were ample opportunities to retract;

> - you falsely accused someone of a crime and they were charged and remanded in custody or tried, convicted and / or sentenced;

> - the person you falsely accused suffered major damage to their reputation;

> - you have a history and/or previous convictions of making false reports.

Mark Pearson is not a criminal. He did not, by any definition, commit a crime, and yet he has been arrested, interrogated by police, jailed, brought before a judge, and publicly slandered as a criminal.

His accuser, however, did. In filing her impossible complaint with police, she wasted police time and perverted the course of justice. Equivalent crimes in the U.S. would be filing a false charge and committing perjury.

Souad Faress is not a victim. She isn't even just a witness in a court case. She is a criminal… a perpetrator of Wasting Police Time, and Perverting the Course of Justice. She has not been assaulted, assailed, harassed, or even mildly inconvenienced against her will in this case. She wielded the justice system as a weapon of torture against another human being for a year.

And she got away with it. Not only did she get away with it, she was accommodated. She received victim's assistance, including financial aid. At her behest, police rounded up and questioned a complete stranger, jailed him, extorted money from him, publicly humiliated him, and put him on trial. She was able to do this all anonymously – so much so that even in court, where the jury should be able to evaluate witness behavior to weed out lying, she was hidden from view when testifying.

No charge will be filed against her for her criminal acts. Her victim has no legal recourse to seek justice for what she did to him. He cannot even file a criminal complaint.

Her anonymity is still protected. While other crime victims are encouraged to publicly name their perpetrators, Mark Pearson isn't even allowed to privately tell friends or family who victimized him.

That is the law in the UK; All of the mechanisms of the criminal justice system are reversed when a woman commits the crime of filling a false police report of sexual assault, sticking to the false story even when there are ample opportunities to retract… and then participates in the process as if her lie were true when the accused is charged, remanded in custody, and tried for a crime based on that lie, suffering worldwide damage to his reputation and mental torture in the process.

But that's the UK, right? Outside the country, anyone can name Mark Pearson's false accuser. I've named her repeatedly in this article. I'm going to do it again: Mark Pearson's false accuser is Souad Faress, award winning actress, most recently known for her role as the High Priestess of the Dosh Khaleen in Game of Thrones.

I could jump up and down outside on my back patio shouting about it, naming her over and over like that character being stoned to death for Taking the Lord's Name in Vain in Monty Python and the Holy Grail, and aside from odd looks from my neighbors and maybe a potential noise complaint, I'd face no repercussions.

I would not expect UK police forces to show up on my doorstep to put a stop to my perpetrator-naming antics. Nor should I, as the United States declared independence from Britain generations ago. UK law doesn't apply here, right?

Apparently Twitter thinks it does. The site spent the last week suspending accounts over tweets, some a year or more old, naming Mark Pearson's perpetrator.

I first noticed it when my account was suspended. The tweets didn't even all get flagged on the same day.

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 2 of 4

Hannah Wallen 🐸 gab.ai/oneiorosgrip
@Oneiorosgrip

#LessonsFromGoT If you're famous & female like Souad Faress, you can file false charges with impunity. https://t.co/CXxnQUbC3O

5:18 AM - 27 Jul 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 3 of 4

Hannah Wallen 🐸 gab.ai/oneiorosgrip
@Oneiorosgrip

Has #GameOfThrones Actress Souad Faress ever even apologized for filing false charges against this man? https://t.co/CXxnQUbC3O

11:07 PM - 16 Jul 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 4 of 4

Hannah Wallen 🐸 gab.ai/oneiorosgrip
@Oneiorosgrip

Has GOT Actress Souad Faress ever even apologized for filing false charges against this man? https://t.co/CXxnQUbC3O #GameofThrones7

3:20 PM - 16 Jul 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 1 of 1

Hannah Wallen 🐸 gab.ai/oneiorosgrip
@Oneiorosgrip

#YouMayBeANinjaIf you can do what Souad Faress falsely accused Mark Pearson of doing. https://t.co/qQRP9ZNoHf https://t.co/BRF74FgZsl

6:01 AM - 27 Jul 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

I asked around and found that others have experienced the same thing:

> View post on imgur.com

Yes Margaret? @MargaretsBelly · Apr 17
Weird, I just got locked out of my Twitter for this tweet from 2+ years ago on the same topic. Someone following you must have went looking for #SouadFaress tweets to report.
Your account has been locked.
Yes Margaret?
@MargaretsBelly
What happened?
We have determined that this account violated the Twitter Rules.
9
7
18

Delete Tweet.
Richard Jackson
Delete

12:20 PM T-Mobile 100%

Twitter

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 1 of 5

YellowViolin
@thangylingi

@ezraluthors Thankfully, Souad Faress was nowhere near Snyder in these shots, or she would've falsely accused him of fingering her.

2:55 PM - 22 Sep 2016

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

12:20 PM T-Mobile 100%

Twitter

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 3 of 5

YellowViolin
@thangylingi

Good thing Souad Faress isn't in #GameOfThrones anymore. No man is safe from being falsely accused of rape by her.

10:13 PM - 30 Jul 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

12:20 PM T-Mobile 100%

Twitter

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 4 of 5

YellowViolin
@thangylingi

@IGN Thank god Souad Faress is no longer on GoT or else this dir. might've been falsely accused of rape, and IGN wudnt b able 2 interview him.

10:33 PM - 7 Aug 2017

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

12:21 PM
T-Mobile 90%
Twitter
Delete Tweet.
Tweet 5 of 5
YellowViolin
@GameOfThrones With false rape accuser Souad Faress no longer on Game of Thrones, there will be indeed quiet in the realm.
Delete
If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

AT&T
10:12 PM
Options
Delete Tweet.
Tweet 1 of 1
Eric Castaal
@luimnea @instapundit According to @deanesmay it was Souad Faress: https://t.co/2JNwy6lguq
Delete
If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

iPad 11:53 am 98%

Options

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 1 of 1

Simone Norton

@POsroff Agreed. It was wrong of GoT actress Souad Faress to falsely accused Mark Pearson of sexual assault. @SexyIsntSexist @PaulSJones23

5:41 AM - 13 Feb 2016

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

Options

Delete Tweet.

Tweet 1 of 1

Peter Wright gab.ai/PeterWright

[Article] Souad Faress is a false rape accuser? #SouadFaress #FalseRape #FakeRape #RapeLiar https://t.co/fXc7VEFcuS

2:37 PM - 8 Feb 2016

Delete

If you feel that your account has been locked in error, you can appeal by contacting our support team here.

UK law does not apply outside the UK. Twitter is not a UK company. It's an American company with its main headquarters in the U.S. It should not be applying UK law to citizens from other countries, especially those which, like the U.S., fought a war for independence from the England… but in the name of feminism's "believe the woman" narrative, that is exactly what is happening. An American company, in apparent deference to UK law, is silencing the speech of American citizens and people in other nations not under the UK's authority, all for having the audacity to discuss the reprehensible behavior of a criminal.

If social media moguls wonder why they're the target of so much public criticism, why they're in the hot seat before the U.S. congress, why regulation of their business is under consideration, here's a clue:

Governments do not like competition. Social media platforms presuming to apply any nation's laws but those of their own to the speech of citizens in foreign countries are likely to draw the ire of those countries' leaders, as well as their own.

The revolutionary war was triggered by citizen ire over government imposition of laws on the American colonies without any representation of the colonists in the decision-making process. Citizens here aren't disposed toward tolerating the imposition of UK law on our speech.

It's not surprising that Twitter's administrators cannot figure out that it's wrong to protect from criticism a criminal who spent a year exploiting loopholes in the UK legal system to torture another human being. After all, the perpetrator's actions were in line with their publicly displayed political outlook. Their inability to distinguish themselves from a one-world government entity, however, is rather eye-opening. It's almost as if, like Facebook's Mark Zuckerberg, they're actively angling for government regulation of social media.

A New Aristocracy

Peter Wright · 28 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

When Marxist activist Rudi Dutschke looked at ways to stage a neo-Marxist revolution he hit on the plan of "a long march through the institutions of power to create radical change from within government and society by becoming an integral part of the machinery." His strategy was to work against the established institutions while working surreptitiously within them. Evidence of the attempt to implement his plan can be seen today through many levels of society – especially in universities.

Marxists however are not the only ones to use this strategy. In fact when we look at the numerous political forces attempting to infiltrate and influence our cultural institutions we see that another, much more influential candidate, has twisted its tendrils through every layer of society – and it existed long before Marx and Marxism was born. That force is political feminism,[1] whose culture project has been in play now for several hundred years.

Protofeminists like Lucrezia Marinella, Mary Wollstoncraft, Margaret Cavendish, Modesta Pozzo, or Christine de Pizan were advocating a 'long march' through institutions for centuries before Marxism emerged and began its tragic experiment. Pizan's main book for example titled A City of Ladies sketched an imaginary city whose institutions were controlled completely by women, and each of the protofeminists advanced some theory of female rule or 'integration' of women into governing institutions. Later feminists followed suit, such as Charlotte Perkins Gillman wrote the famed book HerLand (1915) envisioning a society run entirely by women who reproduce by parthenogenesis (asexual reproduction), resulting in an ideal (utopic) social order free from war, conflict, and male domination.

A survey of protofeminist writings reveals consistent advocacy for the superior abilities of women as functionaries: women's greater compassion, virtue, nonviolence, intelligence, patience, superior morality and so on, combined with a concomitant descriptions of male destructiveness, insensitivity and inferiority as we see continued in the rhetoric of modern feminists.

Via that polarizing narrative feminists sought to grab not just a big slice of the governance pie; as contemporary feminists have shown they would stop at nothing but the whole pie. Nothing but complete dominance of the gendered landscape would satisfy their lust for control, and it appears they have succeeded.

We see that dominance in women's occupation of pivotal bureaucratic positions throughout the world, from the UN and World Bank all the way down through national governments, schools and universities, and HR departments in most medium to large workplaces. Feminists not only govern the world via these roles, but as surveyed in Janet Halley's recent book Governance Feminism: An Introduction, that governance is far from the utopia early feminist promised.

The long feminist tradition underlines the danger of viewing 'the march through the institutions' as a Cultural Marxism project, because it deflects us from the historically longer, more powerful, more dangerous and ultimately more successful project that is political feminism.

Moreover, the protagonists of Marxist and feminist worldviews are not one and the same; the former aims to dismantle social-class oppression, and the latter gender oppression. While there are some individuals working to amalgamate these two contrary theories into a hybrid of Frankenstein proportions, their basic theoretical aims remain distinct.

Like Marxism, feminism too can be imagined as a socio-political ideology, in this case modelling itself on a medieval feudalism which was structured with two social classes: 1. A noble class of aristocrats, priests, princes and princesses, and 2. a peasant class of serfs and slaves overseen by indentured vassals.

Stripped of its medieval context we see the purveyors of political feminism working to institute a new sex-stratified version of feudalism which serves to maximize the power of women. With this move we have seen an increased tendency to emphasize women's "power," "dignity," "honor," "esteem" and "respect" – descriptors historically reserved for dignitaries.

As in medieval times, the assets and wealth generated by the labour class – predominately men – are taxed and redistributed to the new quasi-aristocratic class via a plethora of social spending programs of governments, or alternatively via asset transfers like alimony, child support, divorce settlements and other court mandated conventions. Children themselves form part of that asset portfolio which men are often forced to relinquish to women in the event of divorce. In the face of such practices men are reminded that women's "dignity" is very much at stake, and their acquiescence mandatory.

The push to establish a female aristocratic class has long been recognized, as mentioned by the following writer from more than a century ago (1896), who in his 'Letter To The editor' observed the granting of unequal social privileges to female prisoners;

> A paragraph in your issue of the week before last stated that oakum-picking as a prison task had been abolished for women and the amusement of dressing dolls substituted. This is an interesting illustration of the way we are going at present, and gives cause to some reflection as to the rate at which a sex aristocracy is being established in our midst. While the inhumanity of our English prison system, in so far as it affects men, stands out as a disgrace to the age in the eyes of all Europe, houses of correction for female convicts are being converted into agreeable boudoirs and pleasant lounges…
>
> I am personally in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment, as I am of existing prison inhumanities, for both sexes, but the snivelling sentiment which exempts females on the ground of sex from every disagreeable consequence of their actions, only strengthens on the one side every abuse which it touches on the other. Yet we are continuously having the din of the "women's rights" agitation in our ears. I think it is time we gave a little attention to men's rights, and equality between the sexes from the male point of view.–YoursYours, &c.,, A MANLY PROTESTOR."[2]

Another comes from a 1910 Kalgoorlie Miner which reported a push to set up a female aristocracy in America. It was entitled The New Aristocracy:

> A question of deep human interest has been raised by The Independent.
>
> "To be successful in the cultivation of culture a country must have a leisure class," says the editor. "We Americans recognise this fact, but we are going about the getting of this leisure class in a new way.
>
> In Europe the aristocracy is largely relieved from drudgery in order that they may cultivate the graces of life. In America the attempt is being made to relieve the women of all classes from drudgery, and we are glad to see that some of them at least are making good use of the leisure thus afforded them. It is a project involving unprecedented daring and self-sacrifice on the part of American men, this making an aristocracy of half the race. That it is possible yet remains to be proved. Whether it is desirable depends upon whether this new feminine aristocracy avoids the faults of the aristocracy of the Old World, such as frivolousness and snobbishness."[3]

Lastly a comment from Adam Kostakis who gives an eloquent summary of feminism's preference for a neo-feudal society in his Gynocentrism Theory Lectures:

> It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they aim to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass."[4]

By many accounts what we've achieved today under feminist modelling is the establishment of a neo-feudal society with women representing an aristocratic class and men the labour class of serfs, slaves and peasants who too often spend their lives looking up from the proverbial glass cellar. When men do rule, it is usually not with a life "free of drudgery" as mentioned above, but with hard-work as CEOs, executives and prime ministers in service of the ruling female class who are busy with little more than lifting their lattes.

This gendered enterprise is now several hundred years in the making, enjoying further consolidations with every passing year of feminist governance. That a widespread female aristocracy now exists is undeniable, at least in the Western world, although we remain reluctant to name it as such for fear of offending our moral betters. We can only hope that the recent petition to abolish the House of Lords becomes infectious and begins to tackle the unearned privileges of those new aristocrats who serve nobody but themselves.

Sources:

[1]. Ernest Belfort Bax coined the phrase 'political feminism' in his book The Fraud of Feminism. London: Grant Richards Ltd, 1913
[2]. A Privileged and Pampered Sex, Letter to the Editor, Reynolds Newspaper, 1896
[3] New Feminine Aristocracy; Narrowly Trained Men, Kalgoorlie Miner, Wednesday 5 January 1910, page 2
[4]. Adam Kostakis, Lecture 11: The Eventual Outcome of Feminism –II, Gynocentrism Theory Lectures, 2011

*An earlier version of the above article published in Feminism And The Creation of a Female Aristocracy.

Sexual selection theory has weaknesses relative to field reports

Douglas Galbi · 30 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Like current law governing reproductive rights, the traditional theory of sexual selection emphasizes female choice. A leading biological anthropologist has explained, "it is the female who is ultimate arbiter of when she mates and how often and with whom."[1] According to that understanding, the female directs a male to copulate with her whenever she desires, and he obeys. Another anthropologist has explained:

> Men must compete for sex but what is there for women to compete for? Not for copulations – any male would be more than happy to oblige her [2]

This theory reduces men to brainless, indiscriminate vagina-seeking penises. Scholars have criticized this traditional theory of sexual selection as undervaluing female sexuality.[3]

Much less authoritative field studies of human sexuality indicate very different sexual behavior. According to these studies, men prefer young, beautiful women with long hair and who like men. According to these studies, most men have absolutely no interest in copulating with old, ugly women who hate men, even if those women have socially impressive job titles and long lists of scholarly publications. According to these studies, men also are generally averse to copulating with obese women. These studies tend to be dismissed as superficial or hateful. But much the same could be said of the above highly credentialed scholarship on traditional sexual selection. Sexual selection theorists should adopt more inclusive thinking and consider uncredentialed field reports in relation to their theories.

Scholars of sexual selection have lamented lack of appreciation for female sexual aggressiveness and female sexual promiscuity. An anthropologist has observed:

> Females have been observed soliciting copulations in virtually every primate species that has been studied, and in the majority of species, females initiate the majority of copulations. [4]

Another anthropologist lamented:

> In retrospect one really does wonder why it was nearly 1980 before promiscuity among females attracted more than cursory theoretical attention. [5]

Could that be because gynocentrism creates belief that women exist on a higher moral plane than men do? On the other hand, in gynocentric society, everything, including failure to discuss sufficiently the prevalence of those the uneducated call sluts, is the fault of socially constructed belief in patriarchy.

All aspects of female sexuality surely are worthy of attention. A highly respected scholar noted:

> In her piece entitled "Bride Wore White, Groom Hopes for Parole," journalist Donatella Lorch (1996) describes women from a wide range of professions – bankers, journalists, judges, teachers, for whom resources are obviously not the issue – who marry men whose freedom of mate choice is severely circumscribed by the fact that they are in prison. … This vignette of sex-reversed claustration makes a serious point about just how little we know about female choice in breeding systems where male interests are not paramount and patrilines are not making the rules. [6]

Once again, fieldwork-based applied studies are far in advance of narrow-minded academics. Persons seriously engaged in field studies have long recognized that chick dig jerks. More conventional social-scientific experiments are starting to explore that long-established practical principle.

If the science of sexual selection is to advance beyond misandry and fashionable cultic nonsense, it must take seriously the amazing body of work that uncredentialed, applied researchers are producing.

Notes:

[1] Hrdy (1981) p. 18. This statement refers to male and female organisms in general, not just humans. Commodity markets for sperm (sperm banks) make sufficiently wealthy women the ultimate arbiter of when, how often, and with which sperm donor she is inseminated.

[2] Campbell (2002) p. 310.

[3] Small (1993) Ch. 4. The alleged disparagement of female sexuality in sexual selection theory contradicts the women-are-wonderful effect.

[4] Smuts (1987) p. 392. See also Small (1993) Ch. 5. In the European Dark Ages, persons were more enlightened about female sexual ardor and female promiscuity.

[5] Hrdy (1986) p. 127.

[6] Hrdy (1997) p. 32. Of course, male interests have never been paramount, and male rulers make rules to serve females. Thus in the thirteenth-century French popular romance, The Romance of the Rose, an old woman declares:

> I called all the others lovers, but it was he alone that I loved. Understand, he didn't value me at one pea, and in fact told me so. He was bad — I never saw worse — and he never ceased despising me. This scoundrel, who didn't love me at all, would call me a common whore. A woman has very poor judgment, and I was truly a woman. I never loved a man who loved me, but, do you know, if that scoundrel had laid open my shoulder or broken my head, I would have thanked him for it. He wouldn't have known how to beat me so much that I would not have had him throw himself upon me, for he knew very well how to make his peace, however much he had done against me. He would never have treated me so badly, beaten me or dragged me or wounded my face or bruised it black, that he would not have begged my favor before he moved from the place. He would never had said so many shameful things to me that he would not have counseled peace to me and then made me happy in bed, so that we had peace and concord again. Thus he had me caught in his snare, for this false, > treacherous thief was a very hard rider in bed.

From c. ll. 14480-14520, trans Dahlberg (1995) p. 247. The figure of being caught in a snare is common in the historical literature of men's sexed protests.

[image] A young White-fronted Capuchin Monkey. Thanks to Whaldener Endo and Wikipedia.

References:

Campbell, Anne. 2002. A mind of her own: the evolutionary psychology of women. Oxford ; New York, Oxford University Press.

Dahlberg, Charles, trans. 1995. Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun. The romance of the Rose. 3rd ed. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1981. The woman that never evolved. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1986. "Empathy, polyandry, and the myth of the coy female." Pp. 119-146 in Ruth Bleier, ed. Feminist approaches to science. New York: Pergamon Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1997. "Raising Darwin's Consciousness: Female Sexuality and the Prehominid Origins of Patriarchy." Human Nature 8 (1): 1-49.

Small, Meredith F. 1993. Female choices: sexual behavior of female primates. Ithaca, Cornell University Press.

Smuts, Barbara B. 1987. "Sexual competition and mate choice." Pp. 385-399 in Barbara B. Smuts, Dorothy L. Cheney, Robert M. Seyfarth and Richard W. Wrangham, eds. Primate societies. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

*Article published under creative commons license.

The verdict is in: we're all Bill Cosby now

Paul Elam · 1 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

OK, the verdict is in and Bill Cosby is guilty of three counts of sexual assault. And we now await sentencing, where the current take is that we will hear, in one form or another, how America's Dad will spend the rest of his life behind bars.

The #MeToo and #TimesUp crowd is jumping for joy, and undoubtedly a slew of Cosby's alleged victims are lining up to take aim at pillaging his estate. I can just see them all, jumping up and down like first-graders at the ice cream truck, screaming Me too! Me too!

Gynotrads, too, will be getting their jollies; basking in what they imagine is schadenfreude as Dr. Huxtable is tossed into a small cage to live what will undoubtedly be a much shorter version of what remains of his life. Such is what he deserves, right? He harmed all those women, and now he has to pay.

At least that's the point of view of those dumb enough to be blue pill; people whose thinking is guided by hash tags and other popular slogans of sexual politics.

And mind you I have to say that I am not exactly bleeding sympathy for old Bill. Whether he committed actual sexual assault aside, it is clear that over decades of life he was a completely dedicated pussy hound; a gynocentrist of the first order, driven to arrange his life around women. That alone is begging for problems, never mind the abandonment of self and values that come with the territory. Guilty or innocent of the criminal charges, Cosby's own petard blew up in his face.

And of course, that ought to make any man with a bit of common sense take notice. There but for a streak of dumb luck go a lot of good men.

To illustrate this further, I want to take a closer look at 1970's drug culture, the very environment from which so many allegations sprang; allegations from a slew of women who are bound by two common denominators. Accusations against Bill Cosby and the expiration of their sexual use-by dates.

Full disclosure here. As an overly active part of 1970s drug culture I have my own stories to tell, and I remember one clearly that paints a pretty damned good picture of the times.

I was at a party. I think it was around 1977, but to be honest those were some very fuzzy years. There was this dude sitting there across from me on a sofa. He dropped a respectable sized rock of cocaine on a mirror and began ritualistically chopping at it with a razor blade. I remember thinking he was practiced, working the blade with blinding speed, turning the rock into powder and then turning the powder to a fat line that ran crossways on the mirror.

As he shaped and reshaped the line of coke, a rather fetching young woman took a seat next to him on the sofa. She was ample breasted and wearing a low-cut sweater. She leaned toward him and smiled, her breasts more or less on full display, and put her hand on his knee.

The guy just kept working the cocaine. Finally, the woman said, "That line really looks delicious."

He stopped for a moment and asked her name. She smiled and told him. He then asked her what she did for a living.

"I'm a stewardess," she said.

"Oh," he said, "I guess you make a pretty good living at that" He pulled a short straw out of his shirt pocket.

The woman smiled again and said, "Yeah, I do ok."

"Well, then, tell me," he said, "Why don't you have any cocaine?"

Then he bent forward and Hoovered the entire line up through the straw.

Now, of course I was way too gynocentric at the moment to appreciate the awesome display of red pill awareness that I had just witnessed. Or maybe it wasn't red pill awareness. Maybe it was just a guy used to shooing women off to hang on to his stash. Either way, it would take me many more years and a few rounds of getting burned to begin waking up on that level.

And the scenario did paint a similar picture of my life at the time, too. I used a lot of drugs. I wasn't what you call a big-time dealer, though I often did buy drugs in some quantity and sold enough to friends to help defray the cost.

And one thing was certain. Whenever I was flush with drugs, I also had women around me. So did a lot of men. Money and fame both have the same effect. The more you have, the more women flock to you. That was true in the 1970s and it is true today. Resources attracts women like moths to a flame. You can #MeToo and #TimesUp all day every day but it won't change the fact that access to resources and power through men is the primary attractor for women. How much action would ugly ass Mick Jagger have seen in his life if he was a cab driver?

And of course, that makes me think about Bill Cosby in the 1970s. Rich, famous, powerful and undoubtedly with access to plenty of drugs. I was a 20-year-old nobody in 1977, and as long as I had drugs I had all the tail I could handle.

So, I am sitting here wondering just why Cosby was reduced to doping women, slipping them drugs so they'd lose control and he could access them sexually.

Oh, but wait. That isn't what happened. At least not for the three counts of sexual assault for which he was convicted. In reading through accuser Andrea Constand's account, she didn't even allege that he slipped her drugs without her knowledge. She alleged that Cosby gave her three pills and some wine, telling her they were just pills that would relax her. This was, according to her, after Cosby had made at least two attempts at being sexual with her, which she rebuffed.

So, let's see if we can paint this picture accurately. A grown woman went alone at night to Bill Cosby's residence after he had twice attempted to have sex with her, took the drugs that he offered without knowing what they were or even asking, had sex, and then sold that story as a rape.

And of course the jury believed her. After all, women don't lie about these things. And they take drugs from men who are pursuing them sexually without knowing what they are all the time, right? It doesn't cross their minds that the rich, powerful man handing them drugs late at night; men who've already established sexual interest, might still have sex in mind.

Poor darling. I am sure she thought Cosby invited her up for a bible study and some Jell-O.

Another pitiable dear I read about found herself drugged and having sex with Cosby several times over a period of years. But I shouldn't judge. I am sure the woman bore no responsibility for being raped in the same way by the same man over a period of years. After all, its not like she could just quit being around him.

That story and a lot of others came from an article at thecut.com, where 35 of Cosby's accusers tell their own stories. None of the stories are particularly remarkable, mind you. Each one pretty much told some variation of all the others. Some women claimed to have apparently been slipped drugs, but that was not what Cosby was convicted for.

They all went to Bill Cosby's place alone, partied on with him, had sex, uh, excuse me, were raped and then spent the next few decades summoning the courage to talk about it. The only other thing remarkable about the cut.com article is that there are pictures of all 35 women. All of them, every last one, is dressed, quite intentionally, in white.

Of course, the preferred color of pure, unblemished brides at the altar…and coke whores.

No wonder they say we live in a rape culture. At least half the sex between all westerners in the 1970's was rape, apparently, thanks to retroactive definitions and hashtag movements.

This is all part and parcel to what feminists want in the world. It's been speculated quit a bit that the #MeToo movement probably had an influence on the Cosby trial. And I think it obviously did. Consensual partying and sex, sends a man to prison decades later, because rape, my friends, is whatever women want it to be.

And it's why they are pushing so hard now for an end to the statute of limitations on sexual assaults. Feminists want to go after any man, and the more powerful the better, at any time, for any reason, and completely crucify him. Not just in the court of public opinion, but in courts of law. Gents, we're all Bill Cosby now.

Chalk this up as a score for the sexual robotics industry. At least until they criminalize that, too.

♦♦♦

Afternote: I want to close with a note on register-her.net. It appears to have already have had good effect. Once we launched I was tweeting about it regularly, with names of the women who are now listed on the site. Now I've been given a lifetime stretch in Twitter jail. They claim that my tweeting the truth about women who lie about rape is targeted harassment. Oh well, screw them and the false accusers they want to protect. There's more going on in social media than Twitter.

Meanwhile, your tweeting this article should be safe, if you know what I mean.

The real reason why geeky men offend the church of feminism

Rachael Lefler · 5 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

> "I never forgot it, confusing as it was, no fun with no guilt feelings."
> – Alanis Morisette, 'Forgiven'

When I say "bad boys", what you might be inclined to picture is a man in a leather jacket with tattoos, hair gel, chain necklaces, and a motorcycle. The kind of guy with an irresistible "not giving a fuck" attitude that women go nuts for. But the digital era has created a new kind of "bad boy", in terms of what the Church of Progressive Feminist Capitalism defines as "bad":– the geeky guy.

Outside the fact that we spend money on toys, cosplay, and collections, us geeks are bad consumers. We still define ourselves by what we consume, but we don't mass consume what everyone else is consuming. Our money gives more power to small "ma and pa" businesses and small niche content creators on the internet than it does to the huge corporations. Corporations are trying two strategies to fight their losing revenue. For one, make their same idiotic blockbusters they've always made to impress the masses, but get a 'geek culture' franchise label. This is what Marvel does. This is what the Star Wars and Star Trek movies are now. Even Doctor Who has lost its way somewhat. This is why journalists said gamers are no longer the target of game companies. Games are now for the dull-brained masses.

The mega-corporations have one other strategy against us; women. Whether you watch Ready Player One, Big Bang Theory, Atypical, I.T. Crowd, or anything featuring a male character who is geeky or autistic, that character will invariably be defined by their success or lack thereof in dating, and the fictional stories about geeky and autistic men you're likely to see on TV or in the mainstream movies are all about sex and dating. This is not by accident, but by design. The dateless male geek nullifies the threat that geek men might just enjoy existing without women. The message is clear: good men want pussy, and good women will work hard, like Penny in Big Bang Theory, to tame geeky men who redeem themselves by giving up what they want for what women want.

Why is that so important to pop culture? Well, pop culture is not, for the most part, what is organically created by independent creative thinkers. It's planned by what amount to think tanks of newly hatched English major graduates. It's a carefully thought-out product, and a huge team effort, with the result engineered much like a car or a building. So no part of say, a Marvel movie or an episode of a best-selling sitcom is accidental. And the primary purpose is to make money through ad deals.

To make money through ad deals, your show has to encourage a consumerist cultural mindset. These people writing this crap will claim to be progressive or Marxist even, but they really aren't. Being Marxist means you want to dismantle capitalism. The people don't want that and never will. They want to perpetuate everything that sucks about capitalism (the idea that you should define yourself by the junk you buy, and keep buying and buying, like a hamster on a wheel) and diminish everything that's great about capitalism (freedom of expression, individuality).

But why sex? Well, sex sells. Even sells crappy cultural ideas. But what they're not selling men is sexual freedom. I often roll my eyes when I see another reminder that the sexual revolution is just something that women got. Men are still pushed into the traditional role; breadwinner and faithful to one woman, even if she sleeps around. It's also the only thing the geeky male appears to lack. It's inconceivable to someone steeped in our juvenile, sex-obsessed celebrity culture that some people are happy and just fine without its endless pursuit.

The sexless geek is seen as similar to a drug addict, a poor unfortunate soul needing rehabilitation. It also makes sense from a narrative perspective; as stories need conflict, and geeks don't run into as much conflict that's fun for an audience of lay people anywhere but in the realm of dating. But I also hear the message when I put on my "They Live" glasses and watch something like the first episode of Atypical:– REPRODUCE! Don't go your own way! Your own way means you won't be financially obligated to support a woman and children. So we will control you less. And we hate that.

I'm not a man. But I am a lifelong geek. And as a bisexual who is very much attracted to the female body, I sexually experience the world the way a man would – I like Ivy's tits in Soul Calibur, and I don't want to be shamed for it. But what I'm finding is that men are shamed for liking breasts, while women are not shamed for wanting to show their bodies off for strangers to see. So there's been this awkward culture of fear around sex created by, like I said, the fact that the sexual revolution has freed women but not men to such an extent.

Feminists like to claim they're fighting for men and that men don't need their own movement. But if feminists fought for men 20-40 years ago as much as they did for women, why is it that it's considered normal for a 16 year-old girl to be on birth control, and weird, creepy, perverted, and wrong for a man to have a collection of sexy anime dolls? Either sexuality is cool or it isn't. Enough with double standards that victimize men. It's all about getting you to repent for the sin of seeking happiness independently from the control of women. Don't be a good consumer. Don't go gentle. Go your own way.

Instruction of boys in the arts of chivalry

Peter Wright · 5 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpt is from the 1825 classic The History of Chivalry Or Knighthood and Its Times, by Charles Mills. Like many historical articles it shows that chivalry came to be about much more than military conduct, becoming conflated as it were with deferent and servile behaviour toward women – as it does to this day. The following describes the process whereby young boys were inducted into the cult of chivalry.

The education of a knight generally commenced at the age of seven or eight years, for no true lover of chivalry wished his children to pass their time in idleness and indulgence.

At a baronial feast, a lady in the full glow of maternal pride pointed to her offspring, and demanded of her husband whether he did not bless Heaven for having given him four such fine and promising boys. “Dame,” replied her lord, thinking her observation ill timed and foolish, ” so help me God and Saint Martin, nothing gives me greater sorrow and shame than to see four great sluggards, who do nothing but eat, and drink, and waste their time in idleness and folly.” Like other children of gentlebirth, therefore, the boys of this noble Duke Guerin of Montglaive, in spite of their mother’s wishes, commenced their chivalric exercises.

In some places there were schools appointed by the nobles of the country, but most frequently their own castles served. Every feudal lord had his court, to which he drew the sons and daughters of the poorer gentry of his domains ; and his castle was also frequented by the children of men of equal rank with himself, for (such was the modesty and courtesy of chivalry) each knight had generally some brother in arms, whom he thought better fitted than himself to grace his children with noble accomplishments.

The duties of the boy for the first seven years of his service were chiefly personal. If sometimes the harsh principles of feudal subordination gave rise to such service, it oftener proceeded from the friendly relations of life; and as in the latter case it was voluntary, there was no loss of honourable consideration in performing it. The dignity of obedience, that principle which blends the various shades of social life, and which had its origin in the patriarchal manners of early Europe, was now fostered in the castles of the feudal nobility.

The light-footed youth attended the lord and his lady in the hall, and followed them in all their exercises of war and pleasure ; and it was considered unknightly for a cavalier to wound a page in battle. He also acquired the rudiments of those incongruous subjects, religion, love, and war, so strangely blended in chivalry ; and generally the intellectual and moral education of the boy was given by the ladies of the court.

“Generally the intellectual and moral education of the boy was given by the ladies of the court.”

From the lips of the ladies the gentle page learned both his catechism and the art of love, and as the religion of the day was full of symbols, and addressed to the senses, so the other feature of his devotion was not to be nourished by abstract contemplation alone. He was directed to regard some one lady of the court as the type of his heart’s future mistress ; she was the centre of all his hopes and wishes ; to her he was obedient, faithful, and courteous.

While the young Jean de Saintre was a page of honour at the court of the French king, the Dame des Belles Cousines enquired of him the name of the mistress of his heart’s affections. The simple youth replied, that he loved his lady mother, and next to her, his sister Jacqueline was dear to him. “Young man,” rejoined the lady, “I am not speaking of the affection due to your mother and sister ; but I wish to know the name of the lady to whom you are attached par amours.” The poor boy was still more confused, and he could only reply, that he loved no one par amours.

The Dame des Belles Cousines charged him with being a traitor to the laws of chivalry, and declared that his craven spirit was evinced by such an avowal. “Whence,” she enquired, “sprang the valiancy and knightly feats of Launcelot, Gawain, Tristram, Giron the courteous, and other ornaments of the round fable of Ponthus, and of those knights and squires of this country whom I could enumerate : whence the grandeur of many whom I have. known to arise to renown, except from the noble desire of maintaining themselves in the grace and esteem of the ladies ; without which spirit-stirring sentiment they must have ever remained in the shades of obscurity? And do you, coward valet, presume to declare that you possess no sovereign lady, and desire to have none ?”

Jean underwent a long scene of persecution on account of his confession of the want of proper chivalric sentiment, but he was at length restored to favour by the intercession of the ladies of the court. He then named as his mistress Matheline de Coucy, a child only ten years old. “Matheline is indeed a pretty girl,” replied the Dame des Belles Cousines, “but what profit, what honour, what comfort, what aid, what council for advancing you in chivalrous fame can you derive from such a choice? You should elect a lady of noble blood, who has the ability to advise, and the power to assist you ; and you should serve her so truly, and love her so loyally, as to compel her to acknowledge the honourable affection which you entertain for her. For, be assured, that there is no lady, however cruel and haughty she may be, but through long service, will be induced to acknowledge and reward loyal affection with some portion of mercy.

By such a course you will gain the praise of worthy knighthood, and till then I would not give an apple for you or your achievements but he who loyally serves his lady will not only be blessed to the height of man’s felicity in this life, but will never fall into those sins which will prevent his happiness hereafter. Pride will be entirely effaced until the heart of him who endeavours by humility and courtesy to win the grace of a lady. The true faith of a lover will defend him from the other deadly sins of anger, envy, sloth, and gluttony ; and his devotion to his mistress renders the thought impossible of his conduct ever being stained with the vice of incontinence.”

Source: Charles Mills, The History of Chivalry Or Knighthood and Its Times (1825)

Dr. Joana Dos Santos of Toronto, Ontario, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 6 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Joana Dos Santos has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

She ‘works’ at the Newborn Circumcision Clinic at SickKids of Toronto, Ontario. She either performs or supervises infant genital mutilations, also known as circumcisions, on healthy (not SickKids) newborn baby boys, and alas, for no medical reason.

She knows this amputation of healthy tissue is unnecessary, unethical, and risky, yet she continues to perform it and/or force others to perform it, under threat of termination.

Here’s her bio from the website:

“Dr. Joana Dos Santos, MD
Medical Urology Staff, The Hospital for Sick Children
Assistant Professor of Paediatrics, University of Toronto

Dr. Joana Dos Santos joined the Division of Urology at SickKids in July 2015 as the first Medical Urologist in Canada, and subsequently to the University of Toronto as an Assistant Professor of Paediatrics. After completing medical school at the Federal University of the State of Rio de Janeiro, she underwent paediatrics and paediatric nephrology residency training at the Federal University of Sao Paulo, Brazil. Dos Santos started at SickKids in 2011 as research fellow in Paediatric Nephrology, later to become a true pioneer as the first Medical Urology Fellow with training focused on clinical management of urological conditions.

Dos Santos developed a new grading system for the management of Antenatal Hydronephrosis, which has been recently published. She is an active researcher interested in congenital abnormalities of the kidneys and urinary tract (CAKUT), renal stones, and bladder and bowel dysfunction in children. Dos Santos is responsible for the Medical Urology Clinic, as well as the Newborn Circumcision clinic, which has recently expanded to 1-2 times per week, and is closely involved with the Combined Urology Nephrology Stone Clinic. Dos Santos is passionate about the medical management of urological conditions and continuous improvement of the care of children.”

Under “What to expect during your visit,” we read:

> You and your baby will meet a urology fellow and a registered nurse. Before circumcision, the doctor who will perform the procedure will speak with you. This is a discussion of the reasons for circumcision, the benefits, risks and alternatives, and ensures that you understand what will happen during the procedure. You will have lots of time to ask questions.
>
> You should discuss what pain control measures will be used during and after the procedure. Your doctor may use a local anesthetic. Swaddling, oral sugar solutions or acetaminophen (Tylenol) may be given as well, but should not be used as the primary method of pain relief.
>
> To perform the procedure, the doctor places the baby on a special table and cleans the baby’s penis and foreskin. First, the baby gets medicine so he won’t feel pain. This might be a cream on the skin or a needle into the base of the penis. Then they use special tools to cut off the foreskin. The doctor completes the procedure by wrapping a bandage (called gauze) around the baby’s penis to protect it from rubbing against the diaper.
>
> The baby may cry during the procedure and for a short while afterward. Local anesthesia can greatly reduce your baby’s discomfort.

The baby will feel pain, despite the above lie, and the alternative to this is no circumcision , with no risks, unlike this procedure that results in scarring, loss of sensitivity, loss of foreskin function, sometimes lifetime complications needing further surgery, and death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the controversy and risks of circumcision, you can read that here and watch videos here.

Dr. Dos Santos' practice information follows:

SickKids
555 University Avenue
Toronto, Ontario
Canada
M5G 1X8

General inquiries: 416-813-1500
Patient information/locating: 416-813-6621

> Dr. Joana Dos Santos of Toronto, Ontario, "Known Genital Mutilator" https://t.co/BUhfsci50M #MGM #circumcision pic.twitter.com/levY8SkKbN
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) May 6, 2018

Post-structuralism and men's liberation/rights

Eva Barb · 7 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Post-structuralism is an interesting theory to consider as the academic field of men's studies slowly emerges into coherence because it is the very theory that has provided premises for feminism to unravel into second and third waves. Only now—after feminism, queer theory, and trans studies—is men and masculinity studies (barely) a feasible academic discipline. Perhaps this progression of gender discourses says enough about the social erasure of the disenfranchisement of men in contemporary society. After all, can we really be so vain as to think that men are banal creatures unworthy of discourse?

To only scarcely begin peeling away one of the many thick layers suffocating this question, I identify the basic formation of post-structuralism as well as how it has been mis-appropriated within socio-politics. I use Michael Messner's analysis on the formation and progression of the men's liberation movement ("The Limits of the 'Male Sex Role'") because his essay provides insight into how this movement was overshadowed, partitioned, and discombobulated by feminism.

The structuralist tenet of Saussurrean signification proposes that a sign consists of two psychological parts: a sound pattern (signal) and a concept (signification). Hence, the word man can be linguistically dissected into the English sound: \'man\; and the signification of man is defined by cultural associations with what a man is or represents.

Two significant details of Saussure's signification model are that language is both innately arbitrary and a unique social institution in that society's "natural inertia exercises a conservative influence upon it."[1] Therefore, the main structuralist query is: How does language define and therein monitor our paradigms and the ways in which we experience the world around us?

Take, for example, the modern phenomenon of a "queer" vocabulary: agender, non-binary, trans, intersex, androgyne, pangender, gender-fluid, etc. Language is the very scope that brings these non-traditional genders into visibility. The "natural inertia" of society within the past century as well as the acute wave of (trans)gender activism in the 1990s has ultimately influenced the creation of a Wikipedia entry titled, "Gender-neutral language,"[2] which accounts for some of the aforementioned words.

The undoing of society's visible gender spectrum through a gradual evolution of language from sex to gender, from hermaphrodite to intersex, from androgynous to bi-gender (and so on), corresponds with changing notions on the signification of these words; thus, reconfiguring linguistic paradigms in order to fit the normative of social majorities. Ironically, this progression of marginalized and minority communities into the mainstream sphere innately Others what society considers to be the privileged oppressor(s) of said groups. Namely, straight white men.

Derridean deconstruction (generally referred to as post-structuralism)—drawing from, and challenging, Saussure's theory on language—asserts that a sign is more than just its signal and signification; a sign can also be taken apart by the dualities, or binary pairs, that sustain its meaning. Language is no more than a clusterfuck of dichotomies; these dichotomies are the very mechanisms that give a word meaning, so that true meaning is elusive and in a constant state of deferment. Similar to Karl Marx's notion of the "abstract, reflected anti-thesis,"[3] each side of a binary pair reflects and gives meaning to the other—transgender/cisgender, black/white, straight/gay, queer/normative, proletarian/bourgeois, liberal/conservative, etc. Despite all of these binary pairs that our society, driven by language, can be divided into, one resounds above all, for it was perhaps the birth of the modern "gender zeitgeist:" man/woman, which feminism subverted into: woman/man.

One of the main issues with feminism—and the identity politics it has helped foster—is the faulty appropriation of post-structuralism upon civil rights issues. In establishing positions of 'us v. them,' these movements abstract human beings by using language to victimize/blame, resulting in the reduction of the intrinsic complexity of both language and people. Modern civil rights movements consequently Other and demonize masculinity and maleness because man has culturally evolved into signifying the inverse of any form of disenfranchisement. One need only consider (as Messner does)[4] the poor white man to demystify the damnation of a universalized and privileged man.

In tracking the men's liberation movement of the 1970s (and so forth), Messner examines the varying discourses of men's liberation/rights and its use of male/female role ideologies to pioneer pro-feminism, anti-feminism, and the middle ground: Warren Farrell-ism. Messner provides a rather comprehensive timeline of these three overlapping—yet diverging—sects of the men's liberation movement.

Early men's liberation activists provided equilateral weight to the oppression of men and women, while mediating the tensions between male privilege/male victimization. As a result of feminist criticism, by the mid 1970s MLAs had begun focusing on how men are inherently oppressive. Thus, the male feminist was born.[5]

Messner also discusses the opposing side of the aforementioned phenomenon (i.e. anti-feminism):

"It is instructive to examine the slippage in the discourse from the symmetrical mid-1970s men's liberation language of 'equal oppressions' faced by women and men to an angry anti-feminist men's rights language of male victimization in the late 1970s and 1980s."[6]

Messner implies that this "slippage" from symmetrical examinations of social gender roles into "angry" criticism of matriarchy is a result of the paradox that institutionalized patriarchy presented to men's liberationists. He suggests that the catalyst for anti-feminism was when some MLAs realized that feminism was not the cherry-topped, pro-humanist ice-cream sundae they thought it to be; indeed, it was explicitly anti-male and critical of any suggestion that men could be victims.

Though Messner's essay is quite dated, he manages to account for how the men's liberation movement split into the binary: pro-feminist/anti-feminist, and how this incited the contemporary movement of men's rights activism.

Men's rights, as both a civil cause and an academic discipline, has perhaps undergone such deferment because of an unconscious insistence on the validity of binary models. In subverting a presumptuous patriarchal gender binary, feminism forced (and is forcing) maleness and masculinity into subaltern positions of muteness, which is reinforced by discourses such as post-colonialism and queer theory that consider hetero, white maleness as their antithetical. All the while, these academic discourses are premised by the arbitrariness of binary systems. Lacking self-awareness, it seems, academia is a playground for the active exclusion of man. How, if at all, do we begin digging maleness out of the anachronistic hole it's been placed in?

Sources:

[1] Saussure, Ferdinand de. "General Principles: Nature of the Linguistic Sign." Course in General Linguistics. Translated by Roy Harris. Open Court, 1986. 108.

[2] "Gender-neutral language." Wikipedia. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gender-neutral_language. Accessed 26 Apr. 2018.

[3] Lefebvre, Henri. "What Is Modernity?" Introduction to Modernity: Twelve Preludes, September 1959-May 1961. Translated by John Moore. Verso, 1995. 178.

[4] Messner, Michael A. "The Limits of the 'Male Sex Role': An Analysis of the Men's Liberation and Men's Rights Movements' Discourse." Gender & Society, 12.3 (1998): 265. Accessed 26 Apr. 2018.

[5] Ibid. 270-1.

[6] Ibid. 268.

Why my son (or daughter) will never be a boy scout

John Bird · 8 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

My friends and I were boy scouts. We'd meet at a bank in Rio Vista, Texas, hoist our packs onto our backs, and hike five miles to camp.

We were teenagers, ranging from 12 to 18, and a rowdy bunch. We tackled each other. We fought. We dipped snuff. We peed in the woods. We played shirts and skins football. And we learned a lot from our all-male leaders. Most of all, we benefitted from our time together, us boys and men.

Even in the 80's, boys spent most of the time around women. Some of my friend's parents were divorced, and they lived with their mothers. The luckier ones (myself included) lived with both parents, but still spent more time with our moms. Moms took us to school, picked us up from school, and were with us while our dads worked evenings. We spent our weekdays at schools led by women, in an environment that wasn't natural for boys (sitting still, staying quiet, singing songs, coloring in the lines), where the girls excelled, and we got punished. In the evenings, we came home and watched sitcoms and commercials that showed dad as a dope (Al Bundy, Homer Simpson) and mom as the hero. The less fortunate of us also had to spend part of our weekends in female led Sunday school classes, singing feminine songs and receiving more reinforcement to the idea that something was inherently bad about being a boy.

We needed those campouts. We needed that time together. We needed those men, those masculine men, to take us on adventures, to organize challenging activities, to call us out when we acted like sissies, and to let us be boys. We needed that time away from our mamas, our teachers, and the little girls who looked down on us during the week. That's not to say we didn't love our mamas, our teachers, and the little girls who looked down on us during the week. We did love and appreciate them, and we still do, but we also needed time away from them.

It's worse for boys today. In our country, it's offensive to suggest that there's anything unique about being male (unless it's anger, violence, addiction, sexism). Men are the enemies, all complicit in rape culture and "toxic masculinity." Dads in the home are rarer than ever. Dads involved in their children's lives are rarer still. How are boys to become good men?

The more extreme feminists may believe it's best for women to do the raising of boys. Besides the female led institutions, let the women also coach little league (or better yet, co-ed soccer), lead the boy-scouts, and write the sermons. Then we can be done with toxic masculinity once and for all.

But I disagree. Boys need men. Boys need good men to look up to and imitate. Boys need men who will lead at home, who will coach teams, who will take them camping. If more men would step up and take responsibility, fewer women would have to fill these roles. And men need men, too. At a time when suicide is becoming one of the number one causes of death of men and boys in our country, men and boys need each other. And they need those times to get away from their wives, their mamas, their grannies and their teachers, and just be boys.

The recent boy-scout decision to include girls and change the name from Boy Scouts to Scouts is an attempt to be inclusive.

But instead of becoming inclusive, the organization became worthless. With little girls joining, fewer men will be leaders. What man wants the liability of taking teen-aged boys and girls into the woods for a camping trip? Who wants to put themselves in a position to be accused or suspected of inappropriate behavior? The jokes we and our leaders used to tell on campouts? Big trouble. No more peeing in the woods; that would be a crime. I've never heard a "Me too" story involving a boy scout camping trip, but they are sure to follow. Now, mothers will have to go on the campouts, which will also make the men, and many of the boys, not want to go.

When my son asked to join the scouts, I told him he had enough female led activities in his life. Boy scouts is becoming an extension of Elementary School, much like cub scouts. Instead, he and I go hiking and camping on our own, where we can cut loose, relax, and be ourselves. My daughters haven't asked to join scouts, but if they did, my answer would also be no. There's nothing for them to gain. I'll take them camping, hiking, and fishing, but I won't have them take part in the downfall of what used to be a good organization. Also, there's no way I'd send them on an overnight trip into the woods with a bunch of boys.

Feminist ideology's grip on Australia's key institutions

Bettina Arndt · 11 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Why are we putting up with feminists silencing debate on key social issues like domestic violence? A major drama has been playing out in Perth this week where I am orchestrating a campaign to protest the dismissal of Rob Tiller, a male counsellor from Relationships Australia WA, who was fired for posting on his private Facebook page an article I wrote on domestic violence.

My article, Always Beating Up on Men, summarised the latest official statistics and research on domestic violence, providing evidence that most family violence is two-way, involving women as well as men. Relationships Australia WA (RAWA) denies this evidence and promotes a feminist analysis of gendered power relations." This means in policy and in practice men are treated by the organisation as the sole perpetrators of family violence. Unlike the equivalent organisations in some other states, RAWA offers no support to male victims and in effect, denies their existence.

Rob Tiller got into trouble by talking about counselling violent couples in email discussion with a professional men's network and saying that the research evidence I presented rang true with his professional experience. That was enough to get him fired.

Rob Tiller is an experienced, well-respected counsellor who worked for this government-funded counselling organisation for the past eight years and has had an exemplary record. He was much in demand as the only male counsellor working in Perth, running their workshops in addition to seeing his clients. His work colleagues and clients are vigorously protesting his dismissal.

Most people are well aware that the feminist promotion of men as the only perpetrators of family violence is a deliberate distortion. For every child who grew up in a family cowering from a dangerous man, there are just as many who tip-toed around a violent mother. I mentioned in my article a major 2001 national survey, Young People and Domestic Violence study, involving 5000 young Australians, found 23 per cent of young people were aware of domestic violence against their mothers or stepmothers but an almost identical proportion (22 per cent) were aware of domestic violence against their fathers or stepfathers by their mothers or stepmothers.

When people are asked about victims of domestic violence, about a third of the people claiming to be victims are male, according to the latest Australian Bureau of Statistics figures. But when you ask who commits this violence, over 1700 peer-reviewed studies find equal numbers of men and women will admit they took part. "Thirty years of international research consistently shows that women and men are violent towards each other at about the same rate," says Queensland University psychology professor Kim Halford whose own research shows such patterns even in young couples.

It is extraordinary that this government-funded key organisation shamelessly promotes a totally misleading ideologically-driven policy which lacks support from the broader community. Surveys on whether women are willing to call themselves "feminist" usually show only a small minority are willing to be associated with what is now an extreme movement – numbers swollen, of course, by young graduates from ideologically-driven humanities courses in our universities.

Tiller has taken RAWA to the Fair Work Commission claiming unfair dismissal. See my YouTube video talking to Rob about what has happened. A national campaign has been launched, including a crowd-funder for money for his legal fees and the costs of establishing full-time private counselling and workshops.

Relationships Australia is trying to silence discussion about the whole business, making phone calls to Perth media organisations claiming Tiller isn't telling the truth about what happened. Clearly, they now realise their rash move in firing Tiller is exposing the feminist grip on their taxpayer-funded organisation. Not a good look.

I'm hoping that everybody who is fed up with this constant bullying and silencing by feminist activists will come on board and protest The Dismissal. Come on good people, maintain the rage!

*Article first published in The Spectator Australia

Metoo? #NotMe!

Elizabeth Hobson · 13 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It goes without saying (as far as any reasonable person is concerned) that we, as a society, are against the rape and sexual harassment of women. We all want to combat these scourges – but I do not see a place for the #MeToo movement in doing so. #MeToo is bad for men, bad for women and bad for society. It is a prime example of feminist aggression into the lives of ordinary, non-feminist people who do not need feminists to dictate acceptable behaviour.

There are three types of #MeToo participant. First, the type who shares an account of a serious incident or incidents. She is misguided in seeking justice through social media which can only be obtained through the law – and in legitimising other participant-types.

The second is the type who conflates innocuous behaviour (such as unwanted compliments) with serious incidents. She serves to feed the victimhood culture; which is afflicting a proportion of women in our society and is terribly unhealthy for them psychologically and also alienates a proportion of men from women in general, inhibiting them so they feel less comfortable in women's company – and may, in a professional setting, choose not to mentor a woman, for example.

And finally, #MeToo is a safe space for the liar who seeks to ruin the reputation of an innocent man. Men are losing their jobs and their friends over petty and false allegations due to #MeToo and there have even been fatalities, such as Carl Sargeant who took his own life after being suspended from his job as a Welsh government minister and his membership of the Labour Party whilst under investigation over claims (that were kept secret from him) of sexual misconduct.

It is important that there is a public dialogue about rape and sexual harassment but this hysterical, finger pointing movement does not represent a sensible way of approaching it. There are dangers implicit to #MeToo – to innocent men, to cultural perceptions of women and to women's perceptions of themselves. #MeToo is fermenting the idea of women as delicate, fragile snowflakes unprepared to face public life, toxifying gender relations and sustaining the feminist Sex War. There are male and female victims and male and female perpetrators. These are human problems that we need to work on together.

There are male and female victims and male and female perpetrators. These are human problems that we need to work on together.

In addition, in working on preventing rape and sexual assault, it is imperative that we resist the assumption of #MeToo advocates – that things will be better if only we homogenise human relationships and neuter ourselves in interactions with others. Bearing in mind the human instincts to love and to fuck, sometimes even with colleagues, it is far more difficult than they suppose, to categorise most behaviour as absolutely always appropriate or absolutely never appropriate. Flirting happens, and sometimes it's a beautiful dance and sometimes it's misjudged – with comedic or uncomfortable or sad outcomes. Romantic pursuit is human and should be allowed to take place without the threat of being outed online for a well-intentioned misjudgement.

Even unsolicited touch is a critical part of human communication – showing camaraderie or sympathy as well as, sometimes, sexual interest. Most human beings crave touch and suffer if they lack it in their lives. If an individual clearly informs their pursuer that their boundaries have been over-stepped and the individual fails to cease in their behaviour, it becomes a problem but most of the time people manage to negotiate what is acceptable in every relationship that they participate in effectively.

Men and women must take a stand against the feminist #MeToo train-wreck. Women in particular, as we enjoy a social shield from the most negative of consequences and more easily brush off charges of misogyny. We must inform these authoritarians that they are not needed, nor wanted in the non-feminist sector and that, actually, we cherish the fact that (broadly speaking) men and women work fantastically well together. And together is how we must work, if we are to tackle the scourges of rape and sexual harassment.

The role of ladies in the first sporting tournaments

Peter Wright · 14 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The following by Charles Mills (1825) documents interaction between men and women at the first sports tournaments, a tradition from which we derive much of the structure and symbolism of today's sporting tournaments. Have we moderns lost some of the gynocentrism of the early sports tournaments, or have we added to it? You be the judge. – PW

Ladies were judges of the tournament

[image]
The ladies were the supreme judges of tournaments, and if any complaint was raised against a knight, they adjudged the cause without appeal. Generally, however, they deputed their power to a knight, who, on account of this distinction, was called the Knight of Honour. He bore at the end of his lance a ribbon or some other sign of woman's favour, and with this badge of power he waved the fiercest knights into order and obedience.

The heralds read to the knights the regulations of the sport, and announced the nature of the prize they were to contend for. The dames and maidens sometimes proposed jewels of price, a diamond, a ruby, and a sapphire, as rewards of valour. But the meed of renown was often more military, and the reader of Italian history remembers that at a tournament celebrated at Florence in the year 1468, Lorenzo de' Medici bore away the prize of a helmet of silver with a figure of Mars as the crest. It was the general wont of tournaments for a vanquished knight to forfeit his armour and horse to his victor.

Knights were led by ladies

The knights then trooped to the listed a plain, with lords, ladies, and damsels, the chivalry and beauty of the country, mounted on gaily-caparisoned steeds and palfreys, whose housings swept the ground. Sometimes a lady fair led the horse of her chosen knight, and in the song of the minstrel the bridle became a golden chain of love. At the day appointed for a merry tournament, in the reign of Richard II., there issued out of the Tower of London, first, three-score coursers, apparelled for the lists, and on every one a squire of honour riding a soft pace.

Then appeared three-score ladies of honour; mounted on fair palfreys, each lady leading by a chain of silver a knight sheathed in jousting harness. The fair and gallant troop, with the sound of clarions, trumpets, and other minstrelsy, rode along the streets of London, the fronts of the houses shining with martial glory in the rich banners and tapestries which hung from the windows. They reached Smithfield where the Queen of England and many matrons and damsels were already seated in richly adorned galleries. The ladies that led the knights joined them; the squires of honour alighted from their coursers, and the knights in good order vaulted upon them.

Knights wore ladies' favours, who imitated the dress of knights

The tilting armour in which knights were sheathed was generally of a light fabric, and splendid. Its ornaments came under a gentler authority than that of royal constables and marshals. If the iron front of a line of cavaliers in the battle-field was frequently- gemmed with the variously coloured signs of ladies' favors, those graceful additions to armour yet more beseemed the tournament. Damsels were wont to surmount the helmets of their knights with chaplets, or to affix streamers to their spears, and a cavalier who was thus honoured smiled with self-complacency on the highly emblazoned surcoat of his rival in chivalry.

The desire to please ladies fair formed the very soul of the tournament. Every young and gallant knight wore the device of his mistress, while, indeed, the hardier sons of chivalry carried fiercer signs of their own achievements but they were unmarked by the bright judges of the tourney, for their eyes could only follow through the press their own emblems of love. Nothing was now to be heard but the noise and clattering of horse and armour.

Knights thanked by ladies

Every preux cavalier had by his side a lady bright. The minstrels tuned their harps to the praise of courtesy and prowess, and when the merriment was most joyous, the heralds presented to the ladies the knights who had worthily demeaned themselves. She, who by the consent at her fail companions was called La Royne de la Beaulte et des Amours, delivered the prizes to the kneeling knights. This queen of beauty and love addressed each of them with a speech of courtesy, thanking him for the disport and labour which he had taken that day, presenting to him the prize as the ladies' award for his skill, and concluding with the wish that such a valorous cavalier would have much joy and worship with his lady.

"The victory was entirely owing to the favor of my mistress, which I wore in my helmet," was the gallant reply of the knight, for he was always solicitous to exalt the honor of his lady-love. As tournaments were scenes of pleasure, the knight who appeared in the most handsome guise was praised and, to complete the courtesies of chivalry, thanks were rendered to those who had travelled to the lists from far countries.

Source: Charles Mills, The History of Chivalry Or Knighthood and Its Times (1825)

See also: Sporting tournaments: a gynocentric tradition?

Women of color feminists are bringing white woman feminists to their knees

Peter Wright · 16 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Ruby Hamad's recent Guardian article How white women use strategic tears to silence women of colour carries the byline "The legitimate grievances of brown and black women are no match for the accusations of a white damsel in distress."

How white women use strategic tears to silence women of colour

Ruby Hamad

The legitimate grievances of brown and black women are no match for the accusations of a white damsel in distress

Sign up to receive the latest Australian opinion pieces every weekday

The article is interesting for a number of reasons, among them being that European 'white woman feminism' (WWF) is being called out for the farce that it is, and secondly those WoCs calling it out are reducing it to its knees.

While its true that women cry far more often and easily than the average man – a biological fact examined by several research articles – there is no doubt that European white women have leveraged the crying game through the intricate culture of damseling that has made people hypersensitive to white women's tears. An Arab woman cries? who cares. A black woman cries? meh. A white woman cries? – Quick call an ambulance!!

Hamad refers to this anomaly as the weaponising of white women's tears, and adds;

> As I look back over my adult life a pattern emerges. Often, when I have attempted to speak to or confront a white woman about something she has said or done that has impacted me adversely, I am met with tearful denials and indignant accusations that I am hurting her. My confidence diminished and second-guessing myself, I either flare up in frustration at not being heard (which only seems to prove her point) or I back down immediately, apologising and consoling the very person causing me harm.
>
> It is not weakness or guilt that compels me to capitulate. Rather, as I recently wrote, it is the manufactured reputation Arabs have for being threatening and aggressive that follows us everywhere. In a society that routinely places imaginary "wide-eyed, angry and Middle Eastern" people at the scenes of violent crimes they did not commit, having a legitimate grievance is no match for the strategic tears of a white damsel in distress whose innocence is taken for granted.

Feminist women of every skin color share a belief in the existence of an oppressive patriarchy, female victimization at its hands, and the need to increase the power of women in every imaginable way. That mandate is enough to raise my resistance to each and every feminist pitch regardless of skin color – including supposedly male friendly feminists like Christina Hoff-Sommers and Camille Paglia who would institute a feminist utopia based on traditional male chivalry, their imagined golden era of the past that third wave feminists have undermined.

Added to those core beliefs, the cultural background of feminists often gives their behaviour a different accent or twist. I find myself agreeing with WoC feminists that white women have culture values embedded in their feminist project that render it, shall we say, different. This difference is why WWF has been accurately described as victim feminism, safe space feminism, and even fainting-couch feminism – a kind of battle between fragile maidens and those who would hurt them.

To be specific, white western feminists have their cultural roots in the European practices of damseling, chivalry and courtly love, practices that many WoC like Arabs, Asians and Africans do not. White Western feminists lean on European tropes to gain advantage over their WoC sisters, including the belief in (white) women's moral superiority, extreme vulnerability and fragility, and the need for a protective chivalry that can be assumed or otherwise elicited with a few well-timed tears. The elements of the trope are used to foster an aristocrat-like status of white Western feminists, which is evidenced in their appeals to "dignity" "respect" "status" and "esteem" etc. – words usually reserved for dignitaries.

The cultural conventions that enable such behaviour closely resemble the sexual fetish of Subs to Doms, as seen in the European practice of a man going down on one knee to propose to a White Lady. That behaviour has traditionally been extended to feminist WoC who have likewise been expected to go down on a metaphorical knee, so to speak, before their white women feminist betters. But WoC feminists are having none of it today – they are done with taking runner-up prize in the Oppression Olympics.

The fact that WoC want none of it is a death sentence for their own brand of feminism, for without the European customs mentioned above feminism simply cannot be; it absolutely requires damseling and a supportive culture of male chivalry in order to survive. That's what has made WW feminism the one and only kind of feminism, ensuring its life and longevity, and without adopting elements of the European trope WoC feminism is dead in the water. At best WoC feminists could expect to get some platform for the simple act of attacking their well heeled and pedestalized sisters, but little more.

To be sure the dividing of WoC and WW feminisms is somewhat superficial, for despite their denials many WoC have already adopted WW European practices, especially African American feminists, and wield them every bit as much as their ivory sisters.

Back to the question of crying, I believe the author has a mild case, if simply articulated, for the unique ways culture entwines itself with the tears of white Western feminists. That unique European brand has sometimes been referred to as 'Anglosphere feminism' – it is not something you will find in China, Iran or Sudan for example.

A feminist takes a well-earned break from being empathetic to men in pain.

White feminists have been busy drinking male tears for years, and they may find the prospect of WoC feminists drinking their tears somewhat disconcerting – and hopefully a reminder of just how badly they've been treating their menfolk. Judging by the current trajectory that's exactly what will happen, or rather is happening – a callous disregard for white women and their issues by WoC. The result is that WW feminists are finding out their hands are tied in some of the same ways that men's hands are tied based on the formula that perceived privilege = gag orders.

How do WW feminists and women feel to be in the same pit with white Western men? Will they take comfort from the usual 'suck it up' mantra reserved for Western males? Whatever their next moves its clear that European white women's damseling and status-seeking has reached the teleological end of its evolution, called out by none other than women of color.

See also: Did you know the "Damsel in Distress" trope has a feminist origin?

Penelope faithful, but Ulysses was afraid to return home poor

Douglas Galbi · 19 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Ulysses, also known as Odysseus, had spent ten years in the brutal violence against men of the Trojan War. Many men died fighting for one woman, Helen, who described herself as a "shameless whore." Ulysses then spent another ten years struggling to return home against hostile seas and sex-starved goddesses.

At home, Ulysses's wife Penelope refused to forsake her husband even as others were claiming he was dead. She yearned for the warmth of being in bed with him:

> Your Penelope sends you these words, too-slow Ulysses;
> it is of no use to write back to me: come yourself!
> Troy has certainly fallen, hated by the daughters of the Greeks;
> but Priam and all of Troy were hardly worth so much to me.
> Oh would that, when his fleet made for Lacedaemon, > the adulterous lover had been obliterated by raging waters!
> I would not have lain, cold, in my lonely bed, > nor deserted, would I now complain of days' slow passing
>
> { Haec tua Penelope lento tibi mittit, Ulixe > nil mihi rescribas attinet: ipse veni!
> Troia iacet certe, Danais invisa puellis;
> vix Priamus tanti totaque Troia fuit.
> o utinam tum, cum Lacedaemona classe petebat, > obrutus insanis esset adulter aquis!
> non ego deserto iacuissem frigida lecto, > nec quererer tardos ire relicta dies } [1]

Like Dhuoda, Penelope sought to touch her beloved through her written word:

> Whoever turns his wandering ship to these shores > is asked many questions about you before he departs, > and he is given a letter written by these fingers > to give to you if he ever sees you anywhere.
>
> { Quisquis ad haec vertit peregrinam litora puppim, > ille mihi de te multa rogatus abit, > quamque tibi reddat, si te modo viderit usquam, > traditur huic digitis charta notata meis. }

Penelope wasn't naive or an ideologically benighted woman. She understood many men's hard position:

> It's the hardest thing of all to defeat your nature;
> when you see a girl, to stay pure in mind is torture.
> As young men we can't obey such a harsh injunction, > or ignore the silky-soft female form's attraction.
>
> { Res est arduissima vincere naturam, > in aspectu virginis mentem esse puram;
> iuvenes non possumus legem sequi duram > leviumque corporum non habere curam. } [2]

With respect to Ulysses, Penelope lamented:

> Whatever dangers the ocean has, whatever the land, > these I suspect to be the cause of your long delay.
> While I foolishly fear these things, such is your appetite > that you may be captive to a foreign love, > and perhaps you tell what a country wife you have,
> that only her wool is not coarse.
> …
> My father Icarius drives me to leave my widowed bed, > and rebukes me continuously for my long delay.
> Let him rebuke me; I am yours, it is right that I be called yours.
> Penelope will always be Ulysses' wife.
>
> { quaecumque aequor habet, quaecumque pericula tellus, > tam longae causas suspicor esse morae.
> haec ego dum stulte metuo, quae vestra libido est, > esse peregrino captus amore potes.
> forsitan et narres, quam sit tibi rustica coniunx, > quae tantum lanas non sinat esse rudes.
> …
> Me pater Icarius viduo discedere lecto > cogit et immensas increpat usque moras.
> increpet usque licet—tua sum, tua dicar oportet;
> Penelope coniunx semper Ulixis ero. }

Men have the enormous gender disadvantage of being subject to cuckolding. Cuckolds, for good evolutionary reasons, have been widely regarded with contempt throughout human history, with the possible exception of the past few decades of intensified gynocentrism. With a perceptive sense of social justice, Penelope was profoundly loyal to Ulysses. He had no reason to regret marrying her. He had good reason to struggle to return home.

While Ulysses was still far from Penelope, he learned of her fidelity. The prophet Tiresias told Ulysses what he would find when he finally returned home:

> Penelope, your wife, you'll find is poor and aged by grief.
> She lives in poverty because she's chosen chastity.
> If she'd become a whore, she'd have no lack of food in store, > and your son would have horses — who now, since Penelope > despises her suitors, lives on chaff. But better not to eat enough > than to become a dirty prostitute and have food in plenty.
> She lost what used to keep the household — herds of cattle and sheep — > to keep her body's honor protected from the hundred suitors; > with every sheep or ox those lechers grabbed out of her flocks, > her glory gained more ground. If she were willing to be kind, > her enemies would turn to friends, and they'd be kind in turn.
> She'd rather be oppressed by want, and lose what she possessed, > than stoop to prostitution; but now she may, courageous woman, > die from cold and thirst and loyal love for you, her husband.
> Hurry, put your hand to sail and ensure that justice will prevail.
>
> { Penelopem cernes inopem vetulamque dolore.

> Vivit mendica, quia maluit esse pudica.
> Si fieret mecha, non esset inops apotheca, > natus haberet equos. Modo vivit acu, quia mechos > mater contempsit; et malo, quod esuriens sit, > quam foret immunde meretrici victus habunde.
> Perdidit armentum pecudesque, domus alimentum, > a mechis centum corpus lucrata redemptum;
> perdidit omne pecus, quod sustulit advena mechus, > obtinuitque decus. Set, qui hostis erat, foret equus > et blandus fieret, fieri si blanda valeret.
> Paupertate premi, sua malebat quia demi, > quam sua cum scortis sors esset, femina fortis > nunc algore, siti morietur, amore mariti.
> Iustitie zelo fuge, redde manum cito velo } [3]

For three years Penelope entertained 108 suitors in her home. They consumed much wine, cattle, sheep, and other food from the stocks she and Ulysses had acquired. They also pressured her to marry one of them. As has been commonly true, men seeking to marry makes no sense. A perceptive scholar observed "the oddly irrational nature of the suitors' behavior, who simultaneously wish to consume Odysseus' goods and yet put an end to this activity as quickly as they can."[4] Homer may have adapted an earlier gynocentric myth of a woman having a harem of 108 men whom she struggled to support in the manner in which they were accustomed. Penelope seems to have flirted with such desire, yet like a man paying eighteen years of "child support" for a one-night stand, she resolutely refused to pursue further heterosexual relations.

Classical scholars today commonly regard Penelope as unrealistic. In reviewing diverse recent representations of Penelope from a common, misandristic perspective, an acclaimed classical scholar declared:

> no modern reader can find her emotionally plausible. She is not angry at being abandoned or deprived of more children, sexually frustrated, suspicious of her husband's fidelity, dissatisfied at being in charge of the household, or resentful of having to relinquish space when Odysseus returns. She does not even complain when, on their first night together, he says that he will leave her again. [5]

Not all women are like that, especially if they haven't received a modern classical education. The eminent medieval abbess Heloise loved Abelard with a quality of love as high as that of Penelope's love for Ulysses. The great ninth-century Byzantine poet and hymnographer Kassia didn't engage in self-absorbed, shrewish complaining. The brilliant twelfth-century author Marie de France showed profound appreciation for time men spend away from their wives. Classical scholars today might regard Penelope as "a rare bird on this earth, exactly like a black swan {rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cygno}."[6] But that doesn't mean that Penelope is unrealistic. More women today could feasibly strive to imitate Penelope.

Her husband Ulysses was overjoyed with Penelope's fidelity. Within gynocentric culture, women's strong, independent sexuality is celebrated. Women are encouraged and expected to cuckold their husbands. Ulysses's son Telemachus himself expressed uncertainty about his father:

> Mother has always told me that I'm his son, it's true,
> But I am not so certain. Who, on his own, > has ever really known who gave him life?
> Would to god I'd been the son of a happy man > whom old age overtook in the midst of his possessions!
> Now, think of the most unlucky mortal ever born — > since you ask me, yes, they say I am his son.

>
> { μήτηρ μέν τέ μέ φησι τοῦ ἔμμεναι, αὐτὰρ ἐγώ γε > οὐκ οἶδ᾽: οὐ γάρ πώ τις ἑὸν γόνον αὐτὸς ἀνέγνω.
> ὡς δὴ ἐγώ γ᾽ ὄφελον μάκαρός νύ τευ ἔμμεναι υἱὸς > ἀνέρος, ὃν κτεάτεσσιν ἑοῖς ἔπι γῆρας ἔτετμε.
> νῦν δ᾽ ὃς ἀποτμότατος γένετο θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων,
> 220τοῦ μ᾽ ἔκ φασι γενέσθαι, ἐπεὶ σύ με τοῦτ᾽ ἐρεείνεις. } [7]

But to Ulysses's great joy, Penelope wasn't like other women:

> He wept, and yet rejoiced, but dared not openly express > the secret joy he harbored now that he felt so reassured.
> …
> A woman who turns down a bribe deserves a precious crown
> (so prone to bribery is their sex): then he said inwardly:
> "Now cast away your fears, and now stop weeping: dry your tears;
> you have a faithful wife, and one who is alive and safe.
> Quick, see to the ship's canvas and make a sacrifice to Pallas!
> Your fate is wonderful, not harsh or dreadful after all;
> a woman without greed, although she's poor, is a rare bird.
> A woman who rejects the tempting blandishments of sex > and can't be beaten down by harassment or lured by gain > or sweet-talked into sin is worth more than King Cyrus's crown.
> …
> I wonder at her powers: ignoring all her suitors prayers, > although her sex is frail, alone she managed to prevail.
> Resisting all compulsion, by force or by intimidation, > resolutely opposed the wickedness those men proposed,
> no flattery or force could move her noble course.
> She fought with all her might — more than a man's — for what is right.
>
> { Plorat, set gaudet neque vult monstrare nec audit > vir bene precinctus, que gaudia mens habet intus.
> …
> res precio prona, preciosa digna corona, > cum precium reicit. Tunc secum talia dicit:
> "Iam depone metus, iam desine fundere fletus > et lacrimas sicca, socia vivente pudica!
> Vela cito repara, fac fumet Palladis ara!
> Sors tua preclara iam nec gravis est nec amara, > dum sit auis rara mulier pauper nec avara.
> Spernere iam Venerem nec posse capi mulierem > aut irretiri pretio dampnisve feriri > vel prece molliri prius est dyademate Cyri.
> …
> Miror, quod tantum potuit tot ut una precantum > vitarit nexus, monitis levis obvia sexus.
> nec commota minis neque vi nec fracta ruinis.
> Nec dum vicinis vicium negat, illa rapinis > nec blandimentis ruit alte femina mentis, > iusticie miles, vires transgressa viriles.” }

Women today might complain decades later that they were repeatedly forced to have sex with a man whom they repeatedly visited in his hotel room. In her own way, Penelope was stronger and more independent than them. Like a husband who learns, against outrageous legal obstacles, that his wife’s children are also his own biological children, Ulysses knowing Penelope’s chastity felt joy and comfort that he prudently didn’t express under repressive gynocentrism.

Misunderstanding of his own virtue as a man made Ulysses hesitant about returning home. Ulysses didn’t understand that his masculine being was sufficient for her. He was afraid to return home materially impoverished:

> It’s necessary and urgent, since she’s in this predicament, > that I should put to sea. But first, good prophet, answer me:
> when, as you recommend, I go back home to join my friends, > what will there be to enjoy if I’m as penniless as they?
> Shall I go full of grief to Ithaca, no cow or calf > to my name, and only water to drink? Wearing these rags I’d rather > go off to visit Thrace, Persia, or Britain — any place — > than go home in this state, with neither grain nor fruit nor meat, > nor wine to drink, nor any wool or linen for my family.
> As filthy and unshaven as I am, I’m likely to be driven, > my standards notwithstanding, to one who should be honoring > me, and grovel to him, a tenant-farmer who’s become > greater than me; now poor, I’ll ask for scraps at his front door —
> I who so fiercely tore the camp’s gates open in the war;
> I’ll stand there on the step begging for bread, and dogs will leap > at me, whose armed assault caused Troy’s rebellion to halt > when I attacked its walls. So often that rich city called > it death-doomed men to move against me, when Hector was alive.
> Shall I set out once more and sail to that familiar shore > while looking like a bear or like a bristle-covered boar?
> …
> how can the things I’ve lost be mine again? Should I go first > to my father, if I myself can’t give my family any help?
>
> { Taliter oppresse foret huic opus atque necesse > nos intrare rates. Sed dic prius, optime vates:
> credo, quod, ut dicis, redeo reddendus amicis;
> set quis erit ludus, cum nudos videro nudus?
> Ibo dolens Ithacam, nec habens vitulam neque vacam > et bibiturus aquam? Set mallem visere Tracam > hos gestans pannos aut Persas sive Britannos, > quam miser ire domum, cui nec seges est neque pomum > nec caro nec vinum nec lana meis neque linum.
> Nec mea me virtus redimit, quin turpis et hirtus > quemlibet implorem, michi qui deberet honorem.
> et me maiorem villanum vilis adorem.
> cum pro morsello miserabilis hostia pello, > qui ferus in bello castrorum claustra revello, > assiliuntque canes, dum quero per hostia panes.

> cuius ad assultum tollebat Troia tumultum.
> dum quaterem muros. Totiens in me perituros > excivit cives urbs Hectore sospite dives!
> Incipiam rursus ad cognita littora cursus, > esse volens ursus vel qui setis tegitur sus?
> …
> perdita restaurem. Quid enim? Citius properarem > patris adire larem, nisi meque meosque iuvarem. }

Penelope thought that Ulysses appreciated her fine wool, while Ulysses misunderstood his wife's wool as a good that he needed to provide. Like a woman-server, he thought he had to rush home to relieve his wife's material poverty. He was infected with pride and corresponding shame. His pride depended on his possessions, his appearance, his social status, and his prowess in killing other men. The Homeric hero Ulysses learned nothing from Diogenes's subsequent, prominent example of embracing poverty.

Christians regarded Ulysses's pride as a great sin. The fourth-century scholar and church leader Gregory of Nyssa taught Christians:

> The Lord became poor, so be not afraid of poverty. The one who for us became poor reigns over all creation. If therefore you share poverty with the impoverished, you will surely also share his kingdom when he reigns.
>
> { Ἐπτώχευσεν ὁ Κύριος, μὴ φοβηθῇς μηδὲ σὺ τὴν πτωχείαν. Ἀλλὰ βασιλεύει πάσης τῆς κτίσεως ὁ δι' ἡμᾶς πτωχεύσας. Οὐκοῦν ἐὰν πτωχεύσαντι συμπτω χεύσῃς, καὶ βασιλεύοντι συμβασιλεύσεις. } [8]

In twelfth-century Europe, sermons commonly exhorted Christians "to follow naked the naked Christ {nudus nudum Christum sequi}." That saying was central to the credo of the Franciscan order of monks.[9] The Homeric hero Ulysses was oblivious to popular Christian teaching in twelfth-century Europe.

Men today should aspire to be greater than Ulysses, and women should support them in that aspiration. Under the dominant, oppressive gender ideology prevalent throughout history, a man's worth is measured in this ability to provide material goods to women and children. "Child support" under law today literally means court-mandated, monthly payments that men vastly disproportionately are forced to make to women. This grotesque misrepresentation of child support re-enforces entrenched gender ideology that's oppressive and demeaning to men.[10] Enlightened men should understand their own intrinsic masculine being as a virtuous treasure — one that they possess and that they can share. Enlightened women should work long and hard hours to provide money and material resources to men and children.[11]

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Ovid, Heroides, "Penelope to Ulysses {Penelope Ulixi}," ll. 1-8, Latin text from the online Latin Library, English translation by James M. Hunter. Hunter translated lento as "truant." That seems to me to inject moral disparagement that jars with the context of Penelope's longing. I've used instead "too-slow." As is conventional under the gynocentric excusing of women, Penelope blamed the Trojan War on the adulterous lover Paris rather than on the whorish Helen.

The subsequent two quotes from Heroides, "Penelope to Ulysses," are similarly sourced. They are ll. 59-62 (Whoever turns his wandering ship…) and ll. 73-8, 81-4 (Whatever dangers…).

[2] Archpoet, "Estuans intrinsecus ira vehementi {Deep inside me I'm ablaze with an angry passion}" (Poem 10), Stanza 7, Latin text and English translation from Adcock (1994) pp. 114-5. The poem has survived as Poem 191 in the Carmina Burana. Here's the full Latin text and A.Z. Foreman's English translation, and here similarly with the English translation of A. S. Kline. The Archpoet was a Goliardic poet writing in Europe in the twelfth century. This poem is thought to have been writing in Germany in the 1160s.

The Archpoet's reference to "pure in mind" echoes Matthew 5:8. The last two lines of stanza 6 of his poem are:

> Female beauty wounds my breast; but if I can't win her
> I commit adultery in my heart upon her.
>
> { meum pectus sauciat puellarum decor, > et quas tactu nequeo, saltem corde mechor. }

Trans. Adcock (1994) p. 115. Cf. Matthew 5:28. Compared to the Archpoet's cavalier attitude toward these biblical injunctions, many men today live in fear and trembling of having engaged in the "male gaze." A vast academic literature exists on that mortal offense.

[3] Hugh Primas, "Post rabiem rixe redeunt bilustris Ulixe {After ten years of ragging struggle, Ulysseus returns}" (Poem 10), ll. 31-45, Latin text and English translation (with a few minor adaptations) from Adcock (1994), with the Latin corrected with the text of McDonough (2010). Adcock's Latin text is based on that of Meyer (1906), which draws from both Berlin theol. lat. Oct. 94 (B) and Oxford Bodleian MS Rawlinson G 109 (R). McDonough's Latin text is exclusively from the Rawlinson manuscript R. Compared to B, R lacks verses 1-8, 63-5, and 96-101 (the end of the poem). Here's a reasonable good Latin text of the poem online.

The subsequent two quotes above from this poem are similarly sourced. Those quotes are from ll. 51-2, 56-65, 69-74 (He wept…) and 77-96, 100-1 (Shall I go…).

[4] Konstan (2015) p. 10.

[5] Hall (2008) p. 120. The text literally states, "satisfied at being in charge of the household." In context, that seems clearly to be a typographical mistake. On that assumption, I've corrected it above to read "dissatisfied…."

Hall's discussion of the episode with Circe in the *Odyssey*provides good insight into modern classical scholarship. Perhaps echoing Anne Porter's A Defense of Circe (1954), Hall characterized Circe's drugging of Odysseus's men and their directly subsequent transformation into pigs:

> Nor did she {Circe} turn any man into a pig: her drugs simply cause men to reveal their true natures.

Id. p. 21. Comparing Chapter 8 ("Rites of Man") and Chapter 9 ("Women's Work") in Hall's book shows the extent to which men's gendered concerns have been silenced in the reception of classical literature. Along with that silencing of men's gendered voices, misandristic voices have been given prominence in the most prestigious organs of broad intellectual life.

Hall's book was selected by Choice as the "2009 Outstanding Academic Title." In a review of Hall's book in the New York TimesSunday Book Review, editor Steve Coates declared:

> Is there anything in the Western literary canon with more abundant, potent or frolicsome offspring than Homer's "Odyssey"? Clearly not, to judge by "The Return of Ulysses," Edith Hall's enlightening and entertaining cultural history. … Hall, a research professor of classics and drama at Royal Holloway, University of London, fills her pages with sharp and often surprising observations about the "Odyssey" and its spiritual children. … Reading her good-humored and accessible book is like conversing across the ages.

This seems to me more like intellectual life in Moscow under Brezhnev and reading Izvestiya.

[6] Juvenal, Satires 6.165.

[7] Homer, Odyssey 1.215-20, Greek text from A.T. Murray, Loeb Classical Library (1919), via Perseus; English translation from Fagles (1996) p. 84. Hall dismisses this poignant passage as "a standard complaint of men in the days before genetic testing." Hall (2008) p. 108. Undue influence, misrepresentation and wrong administrative service are acute injustices in paternity establishment today. Even with genetic paternity testing, courts have often preferred to uphold a long history of legal fiction about paternity. Following the political tradition of the four seas law of paternity, the U.K. and France have outlawed men seeking genetic paternity testing without the consent of the mother. Mothers who cuckold men are unlikely to volunteer such consent.

[8] Gregory of Nyssa, Homily 1, On the Beatitudes, Greek text from Patrologia Graeca 0330-0395, via Thesaurus Linguae Graecae and Cooperatorum Veritatis Societas; English translation from Hall (2000) p. 31.

[9] The expression nudus nudum Christum sequi appears in Eusebius Sophronius Hieronymus (Jerome), Letter 125. On that expression more generally, Constable (1979). Hugh Primas's poem, l. 80, alludes ironically to that saying with Ulysses's phrase "what will there be to enjoy if I'm as penniless as they? {set quis erit ludus, cum nudos videro nudus?}." McDonough (2010) p. 257, note to l. 69.

[10] Gynocentrism greatly impedes men's development of an independent, masculinity-affirming identity. Hall rightly observed:

> Masculinity and the male initiation rites that signify its maturation are in every culture defined by being Not Feminine.

Hall (2009) p. 108. Under gynocentrism, "feminine" is the dominant, default cultural value. Masculinity and male initiation rites must be given room of their own to develop a strong, independent, affirmative masculine identity.

McDonough read Hugh's poem to provide a positive portrayal of Ulysses:

> The medieval poem …. portrays a kind of heroism that acts to correct the negative evaluation of Ulysses as the deceitful character offered by Horace, Virgil, and Austustine (De civitate dei 5.12).

McDonough (2010) p. xxiii. That interpretation seems to me to reflect the culturally entrenched gender ideal of men as providers to women and children. Taking a critical perspective on that gender structure is difficulty for many, particularly older men.

[11] Reforming gross anti-men bias in family courts and providing men with reproductive rights / choice would also be useful actions for developing a society that effectively upholds men's human dignity and that encourages men to value their intrinsic being rather than merely what material and status goods they can provide to women.

References:

Adcock, Fleur, trans. 1994. Hugh Primas and the Archpoet. Cambridge Medieval Classics 2. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Constable, Giles. 1979. "Nudus nudum Christum sequi and parallel formulas in the twelfth century." Pp. 83-91 in Williams, George Huntston, F. Forrester Church, and Timothy George, eds. Continuity and discontinuity in church history: essays presented to George Huntston Williams on the occasion of his 65th birthday. Leiden: Brill.

Fagles, Robert, trans. 1996. Homer. The Odyssey. New York: Viking Penguin.

Hall, Edith. 2008. The return of Ulysses: a cultural history of Homer's Odyssey. London: I.B. Tauris.

Hall, Stuart George, trans. 2000. "Gregory of Nyssa, On the Beatitudes." Part I (pp. 3-92) in Hubertus R. Drobner and Alberto Viciano, eds. Gregory of Nyssa: Homilies on the Beatitudes; an English version with Commentary supporting studies. Proceedings of the Eighth International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa (Paderborn, 14-18 September 1998). Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

Konstan, David. 2015. "In defense of the Suitors: A Reading of Homer's Odyssey." Paper presented at I Colóquio Internacional sobre Poesia Grega Arcaica do NEAM/UFMG: Homero e Hesíodo, Belo Horizonte, Faculdade de Letras da UFMG. October 28, Minais Gerais, Brazil.

McDonough, Christopher J., ed. and trans. 2010. The Arundel lyrics; The poems of Hugh Primas. Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 2. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.

Meyer, Wilhelm. 1906. Studies: medieval Latin. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Article reprinted under Creative Commons licence.

Is gender equality necessary, achievable, and practical?

Gerard Nicol · 25 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In medieval times, trial by combat was a thing, and to make marital duels equitable, the husband was buried to his waist, while the woman was free to assault him without restriction. This was an early attempt to create gender equality in a situation where a man and a woman had to compete.

> One has to wonder, if marital duels were still a thing today, how we would as a society ensure they were fought on equal grounds?

I'm guessing that the husband would still be buried to his waist, but the wife would be given an AR-15, and the police would be on hand just in case her weapon jammed, and the husband managed to dig himself out. Even then, feminists would argue that the woman was still being oppressed by both the husband, and the system.

Kira Hooker 2d
Psychometry Intern at Pine Rest Mental Health Services

The simple facts that almost every individual who seems to agree with this article is a man, that almost every woman who has commented disagrees, and most importantly, the notion that this article was written by man, shows us why we need feminism.

Just more men asserting their authority, speaking for women on issues that which they have never experienced.

Side note: "Men's rights" isn't a thing. Men have had all rights of which women have been historically robbed (i.e. To address the issue of women receiving custody of children more frequently than their male counterparts, feminism often sees this as problematic due to societal constructions of gender roles within the family - women are seen as solely caretakers).

Another side note to those who clearly misunderstand the term: The goal of intersectional feminism, in its most basic form, is equality.

Like Reply | 8 Likes · 5 Replies

Gerard Nicol 2d
Father, CEO, Programmer, Red Pilled Free Thinker

Actually I counted the gender of the likes and it's almost exactly 50/50.

The majority of the shares are by women and the comments are also pretty much equal.

From the comments left by feminists on my previous two posts, it would appear that feminists see themselves as anointed to be the sole advocates for gender equity, and that any attempt by those who don't identify as feminists to pursue their own advocacy will always be met with hostility, and ridicule.

> But what constitutes gender equality, and is it necessary, achievable and always practical?

When I was young, I remember feminists complaining that men would challenge a woman's right to work in certain industries by suggesting that her menstrual cycle would interfere with her ability to work. Not that I ever heard men say this, but in fairness, I would not have always been in a position to hear it. None the less, I now find myself reading articles where feminists are demanding paid menstrual leave with the argument that menstrual cramps are as painful as having a heart attack.

> To be completely honest, I'm not sure I want to be a passenger on a 747 where the pilot is experiencing the pain of a heart attack, so I'm really confused on how gender equality is meant to apply here.

Are female pilots to receive an extra 2 or 3 days of paid leave each month due to their gender, and is that a requirement of safety, equality or both?

> As a frequent traveler my only concern is making it to my destination in one piece, but if I ran an airline where is the line between accommodating women and gender equality?

Should that pilot fall pregnant, I'm guessing that she would not be able to fly while heavily pregnant, that she would need some time off to recover from the birth, and that she would also require some time off to be with her child when it was a newborn.

> Gender equity already requires that women receive this right, and with the exception of paid maternity leave, a male really has no equivalent claim to an equivalent right under the auspices of gender equality.

But what if, rather than wanting to keep the child, the woman wants to terminate the pregnancy? Well, in most western countries a woman has the right to an abortion, and putting aside any moral and ethical arguments over abortion, most reasonable people would agree that abortion should be safe, legal and uncommon.

Without going into the many reasons a woman might terminate a pregnancy, feminists would argue that the right to keep the child, or to end its life should be the mother's alone, but in the event that she chooses to keep the child, she will also have the right to demand that the father pay his share of the costs of raising the child.

> This is where the concept of gender equity becomes a point of contention.

The cost of raising a child is considerable, both emotionally and financially, and according to research, these factors are the main reason women decide to terminate a pregnancy. This however, is just one of several options available to the mother if she does not want to raise the child; she can abandon the child once it is born under safe harbor provisions, or she can put the child up for adoption (all conceivably without the knowledge or consent of the father).

REASONS GIVEN FOR ABORTIONS: AGI SURVEY, 1987 [3, 4]

reason	% of abortions
rape or incest	1	(0.4-1.3)
mother has health problems	3	(2.8)
possible fetal health problems	3	(3.3)
unready for responsibility	21
is too immature or young to have child	11	(12.2)
woman's parents want her to have abortion	<0.5
has problems with relationship or wants to avoid single parenthood	12	(14.1) husband or partner wants her to have abortion	1 has all the children she wanted or all children are grown	8	(7.9)
can't afford baby now	21	(21.3)
concerned about how having baby would change her life	16 doesn't want others to know she had relations or is pregnant	1
other	3

> So why should the father not have equivalent rights? Why should a woman have the right to choose, yet the man only have the right to pay or be imprisoned as a deadbeat dad?

For obvious reasons, the father can't put the child up for adoption, or leave the child at a police station without the mother's knowledge, but why can't the he sign a release saying that he wants nothing to do with the child during the same period in which the mother could herself terminate the pregnancy?

Feminists argue that if men do not want the expense of raising a child, then they should not have sexual relations with a woman, but overlooking the fact that the same could be said for a woman, men have been forced to pay child support for children conceived when they were raped as a child, for children that aren't even theirs and for children conceived when the mother deliberately inseminated herself.

> In Sweden, a country renowned for its feminist government, the centralist Liberal Party has proposed such equality for men, yet the proposal has been met with disinterest from the wider society and opposition from feminists.

For many men, the cost of raising a child can be life changing, and in some US states, it is estimated that 1-in-3 men in prison are there as a direct consequence of not being able to pay child support, or for crimes relating to the poverty created by the burden of having to pay child support.

If feminism was really a movement that advocated for gender equality, one would think feminism would support the right of men to have the same parental rights as women, but whenever a conflict between the rights of men and women arises, feminism does what everybody expects it to do; it advocates for the rights of women.

So what would be the implication of giving men these equal rights anyway?

I'm guessing that in many cases it would result in women seeking abortions that they would not otherwise contemplate if they knew that they could use the weight of the law to force the father to pay for the cost of raising the child. The remainder of pregnant mothers would continue the pregnancy, and the burden of raising the child would be the mother's alone, or in the case the mother couldn't manage, the burden would fall on society to ensure the child was not neglected.

> Feminists would rather deny a man the equal right that is a cornerstone of their own movement; the right to not be forced to incur the expense of raising a child after it is conceived, rather than compromise the choice of the mother to continue the pregnancy.

Clearly feminists have a conflict of interest in this particular example, and usually when someone has a conflict of interest they recuse themselves; this begs the question of who would advocate for equality in the absence of feminism, given feminism's insistence that it be the sole advocate and arbiter of equality?

> Feminism is built on the flawed pretense that only women face gender discrimination, but clearly, parental rights are evidence that men also face inequality?

Is it necessary to address this inequity? Is it desirable to address this inequity, and is it practical to address this inequity? If it is not, then what is the criteria for confronting or ignoring inequity?

What we have today, is a recursive form on inequity, where we fail to address gender inequalities faced by men, because they are faced by men, which in turn results in further gender inequality against men; discrimination when addressing gender inequality is a slippery slope.

> If feminists claim that the role of feminism is to address all gender inequity, then feminism is failing to meet its own goals, and it is failing because it is too focused on opposing its own goals.

As a society we need to clearly define a set of principles for gender equality; a task that feminism has neglected to undertake. Then, once we have agreed on these principles, the principles should be then applied equally, to create a set of values that are fair to both men and women.

If there is one thing that feminists, non-feminists and anti-feminists alike can agree on, it is that we do not live in a world where gender equality has been achieved. One would hope that all of us can also agree that a gender equality based on agreed principles is the only way to stop the gender conflict that has infected our societies for way too long.

*Connect with Gerard Nicol on LinkedIn.

An open letter to Terri Reilly, CEO Relationships Australia – Western Australia

Robert Brockway · 27 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Following is an open letter to Terri Reilly, Chief Executive Officer, Relationships Australia WA by the President of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA).

From:Robert Brockway
President of Australian
Men's Rights Association Inc.
Email: [Redacted]

To:Terri Reilly
Chief Executive Officer
Relationships Australia WA
Email: [Redacted]

Ms Reilly,

Relationships Australia WA (hereafter RAWA) bills itself as having a vision to:

> Better lives for all Western Australians, their families and their communities, within a society that is inclusive, responsive and supportive of all, and where strong, healthy relationships are promoted and valued.

Recent media reports suggest that RAWA may be conducting its activities without the benefit of research covering the full scope of intimate partner violence (IPV) and domestic violence (DV). This disadvantages not just men who are victims of DV/IPV but women who are victims of DV/IPV as well. It is important that an organisation like RAWA uses the best available research on intimate partner violence and domestic violence to underpin its work. This letter contains a brief overview but I trust it encourages staff at your organisation to review research on the subject matter.

Intimate partner violence (IPV) can be broadly divided in to two categories. Reciprocal IPV in which each person in the relationship is both a perpetrator and victim of IPV and non-reciprocal IPV in which one partner is the perpetrator and the other the victim. The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge (PASK) Project, the largest meta-analysis of DV/IPV research ever undertaken, shows that more than half of all IPV is reciprocal.[1]

The Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study found high rates of reciprocal IPV among study participants. The document Findings About Partner Violence From the Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study released by the US National Institute of Justice found:

> When the data were analyzed, victimized women were 10 times more likely to be perpetrators than other women and male perpetrators also were 19 times more likely to be victims than other men."[2]

The National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health also found that about half of all IPV is reciprocal IPV. The study examined differences in injury rates between reciprocal and non-reciprocal IPV and found that injury rates are higher in reciprocal IPV than non-reciprocal IPV.[3]

One of the key indicators of whether a woman will be a victim of IPV is whether she is a perpetrator of IPV.[3] It follows then that one important way that a woman can avoid being a victim of IPV is to not be a perpetrator of IPV. Research by Capaldi has found that this holds true.[4] Models that ignore reciprocal IPV can inhibit violent women from receiving the support they need to stop their violence.[5]

The National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health found that women were the perpetrators in more than 70% of cases of non-reciprocal IPV.[3] PASK found a similar result, with 67.2% of non-reciprocal IPV involving female perpetrators and male victims in large population samples.[1]

Recent media reports suggest that RAWA adheres to the Duluth Model of domestic and intimate partner violence, with or without using it by name. The Duluth Model entirely ignores reciprocal IPV. As can be seen from the evidence presented earlier in this article the position on reciprocal IPV espoused by the Duluth Model runs entirely counter to the reality of intimate partner violence. We can see that the Duluth Model regards IPV as something that men do to women by observing the Duluth Model Power and Control Wheel.[6]

Looking at the Duluth Model Power and Control Wheel we can see examples of IPV such as Making and/or carrying out threats to do something to hurt her, destroying her property, humiliating her, taking her money and finally there is an entire category called USING MALE PRIVILEGE.

A research paper by Dutton and Corvo entitled Transforming a flawed policy: A call to revive psychology and science in domestic violence research and practice shows clearly that the Duluth Model is not empirically supported and is thus flawed.[7] The organisation that administers the Duluth Model, Domestic Abuse Intervention Programs (DAIP), has sought to deny this through the release of a response to Dutton and Corvo entitled Countering Confusion.[8]

A post on the blog Dalrock entitled Setting the record straight on Duluth is itself a response to Countering Confusion and demonstrates that not only does Countering Confusion fail to successfully reject arguments set forth in Dutton and Corvo but it in fact demonstrates them within its own text.[9]

Reciprocal IPV shows gender parity. Non-reciprocal IPV shows a predominance of female perpetrators in studies of large population samples. The Duluth Model is flawed. That is what research shows.

If RAWA is not using an evidence based approach to DV/IPV then it is doing a disservice to the West Australian community. In particular, any organisation that ignores the prevalence of reciprocal IPV is preventing effective interventions as its approach discounts the need to intervene with violent women. This will contribute to the continuation of reciprocal IPV and actually make it more likely that the women involved will be injured.

I encourage RAWA to respond, explaining whether the organisation intends to address the shortcomings in its approach to IPV and if so, how. Please note that this is an open letter and will be published in various locations online. In the interests of transparency we strongly encourage RAWA to publish a response. From time to time we will report to our readers as to whether a private response has been received or a public response published.

Robert Brockway
President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc.

References:

[1] PASK "Partner Abuse State of Knowledge" project, the largest meta-analysis of DV/IPV research ever undertaken. http://www.domesticviolenceresearch.org

[2] "Findings About Partner Violence From the Dunedin Multidisciplinary Health and Development Study" http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/170018.pdf

[3] "Differences in Frequency of Violence and Reported Injury Between Relationships With Reciprocal and Nonreciprocal Intimate Partner Violence" https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC1854883/

[4] "Researcher Says Women's Initiation of Domestic Violence Predicts Risk to Women", discussing the work of Dr Deborah Capaldi. http://www.huffingtonpost.com/glenn-sacks/researcher-says-womens-in_b_222746.html

[5] "Domestic violence is most commonly reciprocal" http://pb.rcpsych.org/content/35/1/33.1

[6] Duluth Model Power and Control Wheel

http://www.theduluthmodel.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/03/PowerandControl.pdf

[7] Dutton and Corvo research paper http://www.researchgate.net/publication/257141198_Dutton_and_Corvo

[8] Countering Confusion http://www.theduluthmodel.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/03/CounteringConfusion.pdf

[9] Setting the record straight http://dalrock.wordpress.com/2017/02/06/setting-the-record-straight-on-duluth/

How they hijacked anthropology

Philip Carl Salzman · 2 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Perhaps the greatest shift in any academic field in the past 30 or 40 years has been in anthropology. Call it an epistemological paradigm shift away from science.

Three main influences led to this shift: One was the morphing of symbolic anthropology into interpretive anthropology under the influence of Clifford Geertz, who distanced himself from science and likened anthropology to literary criticism. The second was a Marxist and feminist commitment to political activism and advocacy. The third was the postmodern rejection of objectivity. The three influences merge, in that the removal of scientific knowledge as a goal opens the way for political activism and advocacy.

How Did Anthropology Change?

- The goal of objectivity and the use of the insight of the cultural outsider were replaced by an exclusive belief in subjectivity and the bias of "positionality" of race, nationality, gender, religion, sexual preference, age, etc.
- Knowledge of the author's background through positional reflexivity would allow the reader to detect the author's
- The responsibility of the researcher and the authority of the author were set aside in favor of local subjects' voices and stories, so as to resolve what was called "the crisis of representation."
- The author's anonymity and impersonality were substituted with autobiographical accounts of field research and the author's experiences.
- The search for scientific truth was deemed to be invalid because there was thought to be "many truths" of many actors, all stories equally valid.
- The mandate of anthropology to study society and culture, and to find explanations of various forms has been negated in favor of the study of individuals and the reporting of their "stories."
- Scientific anthropology sought to discover social and cultural patterns, but this effort has been rejected because patterns and descriptive generalizations are deemed to be "essentialism" and "reification," distorting "objectivist" and "positivistic"
- The construction of theories and models to explain social and cultural similarities and differences has been abandoned because "master narratives" are deemed no longer acceptable.
- The Enlightenment scientific epistemology as a means to discover reality is set aside and replaced by epistemological relativism that reflects "many realities."
- The scientific approach requiring systematic collection of standardized information through careful methodological techniques, now thought to be "positivistic," has been jettisoned in favor of personal experiences and impressions of the researcher.
- The seeking of objective scientific truth, and the establishment of authoritative knowledge, now deemed a futile effort for an impossible result, has been replaced by advocacy for the oppressed "subaltern," by the activist anthropologist advancing the cause of favored categories of people.

Anthropology generally, if not every single anthropologist, has thus abandoned the quest for objective, scientific knowledge in favor of political advocacy and activism. This is seen clearly in feminist anthropology, which given that most cultural anthropologists are now females, is dominant in anthropological research and teaching in which women around the world are shown to be both victims and strong.

It is also seen in the neo-Leninist postcolonial theory, which posits that all structures and problems around the world, e.g., castes in India and tribes in Africa, have been caused by Western colonialism. This marvelously anti-historical theory allows blanket condemnation of the West and of capitalism, which appears to be the first priority of contemporary anthropologists. At the same time, celebrating cultural relativism, anthropologists refrain from condemning oppression and atrocities committed by non-Western powers, such as the oppression of women and ethnic cleansing of “infidels” in the Muslim world, and the imperialism of China in Inner Mongolia, Xinjiang Chinese Turkestan, and Tibet.

Anthropologists, including six of my Departmental colleagues and our Graduate Students Association, do exempt Jews from their cultural relativity, parading their antisemitism in their implacable condemnation of the Jewish national home of Israel, and in their apologetics for Palestinian terrorism. The half-million citizens recently murdered in Syria, however, fall under anthropological relativism and are never mentioned.

The rejection of scientific anthropology in favor of political advocacy and activism reflects an abandonment of academic responsibility replaced by moralizing and virtue signaling. Unfortunately, this devolution is not unique to anthropology but is representative of the state of the “social sciences,” humanities, education, and social work, and to a great degree of university administrations. Higher education has given up the attempt to understand the world and become little more than radical feminist and anti-Western political indoctrination.

*Article first published at MindingTheCampus

Dr. Armando Lorenzo, “Known Genital Mutilator” of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric “treatment”

Gary Costanza · 2 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

SickKids of Toronto, Ontario has a “clinic” that encourages and performs infant genital mutilation on *Un*SickKids, ironically a symptom of a sick society that lacks medical ethics and devalues boys, men, and male sexuality.

Dr. Armando Lorenzo has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He ‘works’ at the Newborn Circumcision Clinic at SickKids of Toronto, Ontario. He either performs or supervises infant genital mutilations, also known as circumcisions, on healthy (not SickKids) newborn baby boys, and alas, for no medical reason.

He knows this amputation of healthy tissue is unnecessary, unethical, and risky, yet he continues to perform it and/or directs others to perform it, under threat of discipline or termination.

Want to see what he does to newborn baby boys who can’t defend themselves from him, his parents, or this “hospital?” Click here.

Here’s his bio from the website:

“Armando Lorenzo, MD, FRCSC, ABU Board Certified
Paediatric Urologist, The Hospital for Sick Children
Associate Professor, Department of Surgery, University of Toronto

Dr. Armando Lorenzo is a native of Panama, where he completed medical studies graduating easily at the top of his class. He completed his Urology Residency at the University of Texas Southwestern medical School, in Dallas, Texas and began his fellowship at SickKids in 2004. Lorenzo has consistently won top medical and urological honours in his native panama, the US and Canada.

Most recently he was the recipient of an American Urological Association Research Fellowship for 2006-07, where he has been working with Dr. Darius Bägli in the field of bladder pathomechanics. Equally versed in the language of basic science and outcomes research, he will be specializing in the latter following completion of an MSc in Epidemiology though the Faculty of Medicine Department of Health Policy, Management and Evaluation.

Well published in several areas of Urology, Lorenzo also has a keen interest in enhancing minimally invasive surgical alternatives for patients, and establishing a field of outcomes research in paediatric urology which has not formally existed up to now. Lorenzo is a superbly gifted technical surgeon with an inquiring mind, and boundless enthusiasm for improving the life of the young patients we all care for.”

Under “What to expect during your visit,” we read:

> You and your baby will meet a urology fellow and a registered nurse. Before circumcision, the doctor who will perform the procedure will speak with you. This is a discussion of the reasons for circumcision, the benefits, risks and alternatives, and ensures that you understand what will happen during the procedure. You will have lots of time to ask questions.
>
> You should discuss what pain control measures will be used during and after the procedure. Your doctor may use a local anesthetic. Swaddling, oral sugar solutions or acetaminophen (Tylenol) may be given as well, but should not be used as the primary method of pain relief.
>
> To perform the procedure, the doctor places the baby on a special table and cleans the baby’s penis and foreskin. First, the baby gets medicine so he won’t feel pain. This might be a cream on the skin or a needle into the base of the penis. Then they use special tools to cut off the foreskin. The doctor completes the procedure > by wrapping a bandage (called gauze) around the baby's penis to protect it from rubbing against the diaper.

>
> The baby may cry during the procedure and for a short while afterward. Local anesthesia can greatly reduce your baby's discomfort.

The baby will feel pain, despite the above lie, and the alternative to this is no circumcision , with no risks, unlike this procedure that results in scarring, loss of sensitivity, loss of foreskin function, sometimes lifetime complications needing further surgery, and death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the controversy and risks of circumcision, you can read that here and watch videos here.

Dr. Lorenzo's practice information follows:

SickKids
555 University Avenue
Toronto, Ontario
Canada
M5G 1X8

General inquiries: 416-813-1500
Patient information/locating: 416-813-6621

> Dr. Armando Lorenzo, "Known Genital Mutilator" of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric "treatment" https://t.co/aPemwL5Qs3 #circumcision pic.twitter.com/6Cyxfb5kZs
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) June 2, 2018

Slaying the dragon

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 3 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In an earlier piece Chasing The Dragon, we outlined Nikolaas Tinbergen's concept of the supernormal stimulus (or superstimulus), which he characterized as an exaggerated environmental stimulus to which there is an existing tendency in animals to respond, or a stimulus that elicits a response more strongly than the stimulus for which it evolved.

Tinbergen demonstrated the phenomenon by placing a larger artificial egg in the nest of an oystercatcher bird which lays several eggs and then chooses the largest one to incubate. The bird made fruitless attempts to retrieve the oversized egg and place it in the nest, while neglecting its own real, normal-sized egg. Even though giant eggs never occur in nature, larger eggs are usually healthier so the animal generally improves its genetic success by retrieving a larger egg first. In another experiment, Tinbergen placed a football-sized egg in the nest of a herring gull who showed preference for the grotesquely large egg, even though it was unable to move it into the nest and kept sliding off when attempting to sit on it.

[image]
Supernormal stimuli are bigger or more intense than normal in color, shape, texture, or smell; eliciting an abnormally exaggerated response from the animal or human. We referred to that exaggerated response as a superresponse; one that, applied to humans, contributes to the increasing discord, unhappiness and confusion among men and women today. Just like the herring gull we are sliding off the egg in every which way, failing to identify the mechanism behind it.

Humans are wired to respond to superstimuli, having numerous biological tendencies that can be misdirected through the deployment of an artificial stimulus. Even in the beginning, human babies will smile at an oval shape cardboard cut-out with two dark circles where eyes would be, providing one of the earliest examples of the human face as a sign stimulus and a 'releaser' of the innate response mechanism.

Think also of the nipple to which a human baby automatically gropes and begins sucking, and of the larger-than-normal plastic pacifier that infants will hungrily suck as an early example of the superstimulus at work. No breast, no milk, indeed no mother but it will pacify just the same. Examples of the phenomenon multiply as humans mature, acquiring as they do a habituated attraction to superstimuli that the modern world is now manufacturing on a scale unprecedented in human history. All of this, we think, forments the kind of unsustainable lunacy that now characterizes human interactions — especially those which are sexual in nature.

Attempts to deconstruct the insanity abound but almost none seem to be making a difference to our relational malaise. While offering some sharp observations, the theorizing from gender studies departments, nutty liberals, politicians, religious conservatives or evolutionary psychologists have done little to explain the root biological mechanisms for the madness, and that's where supernormal stimuli, and their unhealthy growth in the modern world, might provide a new area of exploration and discussion.

One reason for avoiding discussion of the supernormal stimulus theory may be that people like to rest on more mechanistic, determinist and ultimately reductionist explanations for human behavior, preferring as they do a less manipulable 'lock-and-key' explanation. That approach eschews the ramifications of supernormal stimulus that would place more onus on a variable environment and its manipulations in regards to human behavior. Those with a reductive bent might like to fool themselves into believing that infant pacifiers, artificial intelligence, silicone breasts, cosmetics and sexbots have been with is since the Pleistocene, but of course such superstimuli are relatively new to the human species.

Evolutionary Psychologists for example, especially those cherishing a fantasy of 'traditional gender roles' to guide and ultimately bias their research, tend to omit the theory of superstimuli from their discourse because it indicates primal urges can and do overrun their evolutionary purpose – eg. pathological displays in even 'traditional' gender relations as case in point. The operation of the supernormal stimulus reveals their "normal biological response" of "traditional evolutionary sex roles" to be a pathological perversion, in which case the theory is swiftly overlooked. That move however leaves a lacuna in the theoretical base of Evolutionary Psychology, and its research results may equally suffer.

Dierdre Barrett, author of Supernormal Stimuli: How Primal Urges Overran Their Evolutionary Purpose remarks that many evolutionary concepts have been applied to human behavior either formally in Evolutionary Psychology or have just crossed over into popular conversation. "However the importance of superstimuli" states Barrett, "doesn't seem to have been fully appreciated in either of those arenas."[1] She states (quote);

> Evolutionary Psychology has picked up a lot of Darwin's ideas, and some ethology ideas which is the Darwinian branch of animal behavior that Tinbergen was a part of. But somehow Evolutionary Psychology never adopted the idea of supernormal stimuli, and I really think that of all the evolutionary concepts it's the most important and the most directly relevant to human behavior."[2]

Independently of Barrett we have been applying the concept to human populations, and with her believe it to be the most important and relevant fact to human behavior today, particularly as it shows in the addict-like behaviors plaguing modern humans and relationships.

[image]
Venus of Willendorf, statue exaggerating body and breast stimuli.
While the influence of superstimuli is responsible for a range of destructive and potentially anti-species outcomes, it is not altogether new. Observe for example the Venus of Willendorf whose exaggerated body parts would have elicited a possible superresponse in those who carved and first gazed on her. Think also of the cave paintings in Lascaux with their stylized renditions of animals, or of shaman dressed in animal costumes, not to mention the ritual enactments of animal behaviors in traditional cultures who routinely adorned themselves with animal skins or feathers and engaged in theatric play that would have acted as supernormal stimuli inducing longing, wonder, fear or hunger in the audience.

Mythology itself has been suggested as a form of supernormal stimuli, a position forwarded by the late Joseph Campbell in his Masks of God series. There he states

> There is a phenomenon known to the students of animal behavior as the "supernormal sign stimulus," which has never been considered, as far as I know, in relation either to art and poetry or to myth; yet which, in the end, may be our surest guide to the seat of their force…
>
> Within the field of the study of animal behavior— which is the only area in which controlled experiments have made it possible to arrive at dependable conclusions in the observation of instinct—two orders of innate releasing mechanisms have been identified, namely, the stereotyped, and the open, subject to imprint. In the case of the first, a precise lock-key relationship exists between the inner readiness of the nervous system and the external sign stimulus triggering response; so that, if there exist in the human inheritance many—or even any—IRMs of this order, we may justly speak of "inherited images" in the psyche. The mere fact that no one can yet explain how such lock-key relationships are established does not invalidate the observation of their existence: no one knows how the hawk got into the nervous system of our barnyard fowl, yet numerous tests have shown it to be, de facto, there. However, the human psyche has not yet been, to any great extent, satisfactorily tested for such stereotypes, and so, I am afraid, pending further study, we must simply admit that we do not know how far the principle of the [stereotyped] inherited image can be carried when interpreting mythological universals…
>
> [A] functioning mythology can be defined as a corpus of culturally maintained sign stimuli fostering the development and activation of a specific type… of human life. Furthermore, since we now know that no images have been established unquestionably as innate, that our IRMs are not stereotyped but open, > whatever "universals" we may find in our comparative study must be assigned rather to common experience than to endowment; while, on the other hand, even where sign stimuli may differ, it need not follow that the responding IRMs differ too. [3]

As detailed in Chasing The Dragon, nascent experimentation with superstimuli by our remote ancestors slowly increased from stone carvings, shaman costumes and mythological imagery, and went into overdrive in the Middle Ages with the birth of mass-produced cosmetics, the fashion industry, romantic love tropes, and the invention of the printing press. That revolution has been furthered by the invention of plastic surgery and the harnessing of electricity with its mediums of cinema, radio, television, internet, cellphone and the gaming console; all serving the superstimuli trends of the culture in which they were born.

In Chasing The Dragon we reviewed three domains of human instinct that have been hypnotized by the creation of superstimuli. Briefly reviewed as follows these are:

1. Neoteny and the parental instinct

While there are notable exceptions, adult women are not generally endowed with neotenous features sufficient to provoke men to find them cute in the way of a small child. Artifice however makes up for it by allowing women to imitate the features of children through the application of cosmetics or cultivation of childish gestures, with the ultimate aim of shirking responsibility and being cared for by a man and society with the least amount of effort on her part. Naturally such a routine robs her of agency, parentifies the man, and becomes a drag on relationships.

The following instruction video for women from the Fascinating Womanhood Movement provides an example of how this biological ruse, essentially a feigned neoteny, is a result of cultural learning (1.37 to 2.33):

The instruction for women to feign childlikeness is now endemic in the Western world, which may account at least partially for the tradition of 'women and children first' – a statement that captures not only that women look after children, but that they themselves are children in need of saving – in which sense the phrase might be more accurately rendered as 'Children and children first.'

2. Sexual stimuli and sexual arousal

We regularly hear hand-wringing about the increase in skimpy, sexualized clothing among women and even young girls, along with the booming trend in tummy tucks, butt implants, botox injections, lip augmentation and boob jobs. We are told that women become overly reliant of these powerful methods of superstimulating men's sexuality, and we are equally told that this makes sex like a powerful drug and leads to sex addiction. In a sense they are not completely wrong – the supersizing of sexual phenomena do result in an addiction-like intensity or what we have called the superresponse.

Many men and MGTOW have said NO to the exploitative potential that comes with female use of superstimuli, men who ironically opt out of relationships with real women in favor of more superstimuli in the form of internet porn and neotenous sexbots – superstimuli over which they secure full control. While a certain degree of superstimuli may prove healthy in catering to one's sexual needs, it is up to each man to determine whether the stimuli are catering to a healthy expression of needs, or into an overly intense superstimulus and unhealthy superresponse.

3. Pairbonding – secure and insecure

In the pre medieval period simple courtship practices and arranged marriages ruled, leaving little room for the supernormal exaggerations of attachment security that we see in practice today. Modern rules for pairbonding are encapsulated in the notion of romantic love, which unfortunately turns out to be a cornucopia of destructive superstimuli. Romantic love is geared to fostering an extreme tension between feelings of possessing and losing a pairbond. It relies on an oscillation between secure and insecure attachment that generates a supernormal intensity of lovers' feelings for each other, with the downside of inner turmoil and insecurity that feeds relational dysfunction and not infrequently psychological illnesses.

The poets are not lying when they say love is like a roller-coaster ride.

Frank Tallis' book Love Sick: Love as a Mental Illness elaborates on the kind of pathologies that come hand-in-hand with the romantic-love based approach to pairbonding. From the blurb on Tallis book we read;

> Obsessive thoughts, erratic mood swings, insomnia, loss of appetite, recurrent and persistent images and impulses, superstitious or ritualistic compulsions, delusion, the inability to concentrate — that exhibiting just five or six of these symptoms is enough to merit a diagnosis of a major depressive episode. Yet we all subconsciously welcome these symptoms when we allow ourselves to fall in love. In Love Sick, Dr. Frank Tallis considers our experiences and expressions of love, and why the combinations of pleasure and pain, ecstasy and despair, rapture and grief have come to characterize what we mean when we speak of falling in love. Tallis examines why the agony associated with romantic love continues to be such a popular subject for poets, philosophers, songwriters, and scientists, and questions just how healthy our attitudes are and whether there may in fact be more sane, less tortured ways to love. A highly informative exploration of how, throughout time, principally in the West, the symptoms of mental illness have been used to describe the state of being in love, this book offers an eloquent, thought-provoking, and endlessly illuminating look at one of the most important aspects of human behavior.[4]

Tallis traces the sickness-making version of pairbonding to its origin in the middle ages, and rightly suggests there are less tortured ways to love. Humans have loved less tortuously in the long past, and we might hope it's possible to relate that way again in the stability and simplicity of a secure attachment. To love in that way however requires a slaying the dragon; finding alternative modes of pairbonding to those we've been duped into following.

Recognition of supernormal stimuli and their proliferation in the modern world answers the Why question, which leads us naturally to the question of What – what can we do to manage this biological and cultural travesty? As concluded in our previous article we can begin by recognizing we've been hypnotized by a stage show of sound and light, and deciding that we no longer wish to indulge it. As we suggested there it's as simple as choosing not to chase the dragon, but to slay it. In essence we can say the dragon represents our unmoderated appetite, given freely and stupidly over to the snares of superstimili, and our thus-far untapped discernment and discipline can serve as the sword of redress.

Slaying of the dragon demands we employ our substantial neocortexes which are designed for overriding primitive impulses that lead us willy nilly into pain and injury. With that we can construct a defensive, self-protective approach toward the activities and the people we might choose to associate with, activating the traditional values of restraint, delayed gratification, conservation and self-protection against the arrival of superstimuli in our field of vision.

Think of it this way. By overriding our knee-jerk attraction to the false neoteny created by women's makeup and sexually exaggerated dress, we build in a defense against gynocentric obedience as well as a protective measure for screening out personality disordered women from our lives. That is one application of many.

By that path we find a way forward, but also strangely a way back – back to the protective values of past cultures; to Buddhist teachings about pleasure as an illusion and potential suffering; to the Christian teachings of the Seven Deadly Sins and how to resist them; or to the messages of classical myth which invite us to hold fast to our values like Odysseus who tied himself to the ship's mast in order to resist the Siren's call, knowing that all the boons of Penelope await him at Ithaca as a result of his intelligent avoidance of gratification.

[image]

References:

[1] Deirdre Barrett, Ph.D. Talk on Supernormal Stimuli, at TAM 2012
[2] Discussion with Dierdre Barrett and Natasha Mitchell, Radio National Science, Technology and Culture Program, 2011
[3] Joseph Campbell, Primitive Mythology, Vol. 4 in Masks of God Series, 1959
[4] Frank Tallis Love Sick: Love as a Mental Illness, Da Capo Press, 2005 (GoodReads synopsis)

A response to a complaint/threat regarding Dr. Michael Read, sexual mutilator of children

Paul Elam · 3 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A couple of weeks ago, I got the following in my inbox.

Frankie Lee wordpress@voices.avoiceformen.com via mail.wpengine.com May 21 (13 days ago) to support

Name: Frankie Lee

Email: frankie@contentremoval.com

Enquiry type: Complaint

User name or site slug (if any):

Brief description: Abusive Content of Dr Michael Read

Detailed description of problem or inquiry: Our client Dr Michael Read is been viciously targeted by a smear campaign on his work and good name within his profession. Not only that his personal image has been stolen from his Facebook, LinkedIn and Website and used to personally defame him.

The two links hosted on your server are:

This information is harmful to Dr Michael Read as it attributes him to acts that could be considered criminal or, at least, immoral. Apart from being totally unfounded, its internet referencing is clearly harmful to his reputation, as his professional and personal surroundings can access it by typing his first and last names on the internet.

Please remove this content and confirm by email as soon as possible.

Kind regards

Frankie

Here are the links mentioned in the email

AVFM Article

And as referenced at J4MB

Dear Frankie,

Thank you for your message. As the owner and publisher of A Voice for Men I have reviewed your request and reject it in its entirety. At AVFM, we stand by our constitutional right to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and the freedom to publicly identify and shame those who practice the sexual mutilation of children for profit.

Also, Frankie, I note that your email originates from a web service called Content Removal, and that currently you boast that you have 304 satisfied clients, with 13,457 urls removed. I trust that impressive track record won't be sullied by your complete failure here to impress or threaten anyone. Your client sexually mutilates children for money. If you want to be of service to them, suggesting a different career path would be more helpful.

Sincerely,

Paul Elam, Founder and Publisher, A Voice for Men

I had a really lovely experience today

Anonymous Contributor · 5 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The author of this piece is an MRA. This was first related to a group of MRAs during a casual chat online. Published with permission. The author naturally needs to remain anonymous. –Ed.

I had a really lovely experience today:

I'm doing my first placement as part of my teaching degree and they've put me in a boys school. I had my first lesson with some eighth grade students today. They're loud, rambunctious and fidgety, but there's no malice in any of them.

For the first few minutes I was advised to let them get to know me – I gave them some selected work history and education and asked if they had any questions. They asked where I was born, if I knew my IQ, where to go to get your IQ tested and then a boy at the back asked:

> What do you think about feminism?

I thought quickly and decided to be honest.

> I think it's cancer.

The room erupted. They were applauding. Some were on their feet. One Italian boy was pointing at me yelling to his friends "I love him, I love him! He's my guy!"

They were great for the rest of the double lesson.

While I'm very happy that the next generation seem to be pre-red pilled, I'm a little worried about backlash on this.

Should I have been more circumspect?

Intersectional feminism: what's up with that?

Gerard Nicol · 5 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

10 years ago, my red pill journey started when I read Malcolm Gladwell's best selling book The Outliers.

Gladwell is a writer with very liberal views, but his 4 books are well researched, well written and based on actual scientific research.

The basic premise of The Outliers, is that success relates to being at the right place, at the right time, in the right part of your life, with the right amount of practical experience (10,000 hours according to Gladwell).

It starts with an explanation of how a disproportionate number of professional ice hockey players are born in January, and ends with a story about Gladwell's own African roots.

> In the final chapter (A Jamaican story), Gladwell tells the story of his own slave roots, as a way of introducing the idea that the consequences of multi generational oppression can take up to 400 years for any oppressed group to fully recover from.

Gladwell is a great storyteller, and his use of statistics and expert testimony, make a compelling argument that the descendants of enslaved Africans not only experience a lasting social legacy, but a resilient genetic memory, that will take another 200 years to fully disappear.

I doubt many feminists have read any of Gladwell's books, but today, intersectional feminism is an attempt to cast aside the historical fact that feminism has previously been the realm of wealthy white women, and reposition feminism as an umbrella for all of the world's oppressed.

> If you're infertile, gay, trans, uneducated, or just generally unattractive, feminism wants you.

> Do wealthy white women really deserve a place among the oppressed, and do the rest of the oppressed feel comfortable being dragged by feminists into the one tent?

Feminism has relied almost exclusively on the narrative that women were not allowed to vote until 100 years ago, and putting aside that this is not actually true, and that most men couldn't vote either, how exactly does a woman today even have a lineage back to a woman who couldn't vote early last century?

> If my ancestors were black, or working class, both my sister and I would have a defined pathway back to past oppression; but if my ancestors were wealthy and white, how exactly does the fact that only my great grandfather could vote differ between the inherited privilege of my sister and myself?

The reality is that it doesn't, and intersectional feminism is just a cynical attempt by white feminists to associate themselves with others who may, for any number of reasons, continue to face systematic oppression.

> But just as an academic exercise, the concepts behind intersectional feminism overlook key facts which are just too inconvenient for feminism to acknowledge.

The idea that someone can be oppressed just because of the color of their skin or their gender is just not supported by the facts.

Historically, the British treated the Irish appallingly, as they did with the Boers, and all of them were white.

Over the last century, most of the genocidal atrocities have been perpetrated by people who had the same skin color as those who they have oppressed.

> Sexism against men, and outright misandry is also a real thing, but all of that aside, let's look at the considerations that are noticeably absent from the intersectional feminist wheel of oppression.

Borders

As an Australian I can come and go from my own country as I please, I can also arrive in 174 different countries and obtain an entry Visa on arrival, and none of that has anything to do with my gender, because so can my wife and daughter,

However, for most people from Africa, South America, Eastern Europe and Asia, leaving their own country just isn't possible, even for those who can demonstrate that they are not an overstay risk.

The average wage in Australia is US$60,000 per year, but globally, the average wage is US$16,000.

Why does the average person in Haiti only make US$2,000 a year? Borders.

> Whether feminism is a socialist movement, or a movement of privileged white women is of little consequence, because both are completely reliant on excluding the poor masses from having access to equality.

IQ

Feminism has long argued that the idea of IQ is sexist and racist, because majority of people with extremely high IQs are male.

Here Is The Highest Possible IQ And The People Who Hold The World Record

- Christopher Hirata (IQ score of 225)
- Kim Ung-Yong (IQ score of 210)
- Edith Stern (IQ score of more than 200)
- Christopher Michael Langan (IQ score between 190 and 210)
- Garry Kasparov (IQ score of 194)
- Philip Emeagwali (IQ score of 190)

Irrespective of the method used to measure intelligence, science supports the position that people are born with varying intellectual capacities, and that these capacities are primarily based upon the intelligence of the the child's parents (intelligence is inherited).

> There is a direct statistical correlation between IQ, and one's ability to earn and to build wealth, and the majority of people with lower IQs are male.

Given that feminists argue that women are oppressed because they earn 20% less than men; applying the same logic, the 10% of the population who have IQs below 80 and earn 40% less than the average wage, are twice as oppressed as women. Two thirds of these oppressed people are male.

> Experts are already predicting that 1-in-3 jobs will be replaced by robotics; it will be those with low IQs who will be the be the first to see a robot take their job.

The Fatherless

Irrespective of a child's gender, race or disability, not having a father places children at a significant disadvantage.

> The fatherless are 63% of youth suicides, 85% of children with behavioral disorders, 80% of adult rapists, 71% of high school dropouts, 85% of juveniles in prison, 70% of adults in prison and the majority of teenage pregnancies.

That is not to say that if one does not have a father, one is doomed to a life of disadvantage, but from a statistical perspective, being fatherless significantly increases ones chances of experiencing social disadvantage exponentially.

Gladwell wrote about this in his 4th book David and Goliath, while analyzing the failed experiment of mandatory sentencing of criminals; where long term damage is done to society for the short term benefit of permanently removing criminals from the population.

Prison has a direct effect on crime: it puts a bad person behind bars, where he can't victimize anyone else. But it also has an indirect effect on crime, in that it affects all the people with whom that criminal comes into contact. A very high number of the men who get sent to prison, for example, are fathers. (One-fourth of juveniles convicted of crimes have children.) And the effect on a child of having a father sent away to prison is devastating. Some criminals are lousy fathers: abusive, volatile, absent. But many are not. Their earnings—both from crime and legal jobs—help support their families. For a child, losing a father to prison is an undesirable difficulty. Having a parent incarcerated increases a child's chances of juvenile delinquency between 300 and 400 percent; it increases the odds of a serious psy- disorder by 250 percent.

the criminal has served his time, he returns to neighborhood. There's a good chance he's been maged by his time behind bars. His em- have plummeted. While in prison, he's

> So if the argument is that being non-white or non-CIS creates disadvantage, these statistical levels of disadvantage pale into insignificance when compared with the statistical impact of growing up in a household without a father.

Genetics

In the last couple of years, DNA testing has become so accessible that for $100, companies like 23andMe can not only provide you with details of your racial history, but also a highly detailed profile of your genetic susceptibility to cancer and other diseases.

Disease Risks (100)

Elevated Risks	Your Risk	Average Risk
Gallstones new	11.1%	7.0%
Restless Legs Syndrome	2.5%	2.0%
		more »

Decreased Risks	Your Risk	Average Risk
Prostate Cancer	12.7%	17.8%
Alzheimer's Disease new	4.9%	7.2%
Colorectal Cancer	4.2%	5.8%
		more »

See all 100 risk reports...

Carrier Status (24)

Hemochromatosis	Variant Present
Alpha-1 Antitrypsin Deficiency	Variant Absent
Bloom's Syndrome	Variant Absent
BRCA Cancer Mutations (Selected)	Variant Absent
Canavan Disease	Variant Absent
Cystic Fibrosis	Variant Absent
Familial Dysautonomia	Variant Absent
Factor XI Deficiency	Variant Absent

See all 24 carrier status...

Traits (50)

Alcohol Flush Reaction	Does Not Flush
Bitter Taste Perception	Can Taste
Earwax Type	Wet
Eye Color	Likely Brown
Hair Curl	Slightly Curlier Hair on Average

See all 50 traits

Drug Response (19)

Warfarin (Coumadin®) Sensitivity	Increased
Abacavir Hypersensitivity	Typical
Alcohol Consumption, Smoking and Risk of Esophageal Cancer	Typical Clopidogrel (Plavix®) Efficacy	Typical
Fluorouracil Toxicity	Typical

See all 19 drug response...

In countries like Saudi Arabia, where it is legal to marry your first cousin, the government already require that couples undergo a genetic test before marriage, to ensure that they are aware of the risks they face in having children.

In the foreseeable future, couples will expect to share their genetic profile before having children together, and this will create an underclass of people who will either be encouraged not to reproduce, or who will have no choice by to reproduce with other people who themselves had genetic problems.

Arguably, this has been occurring for thousands of years, as both men and women preference partners who posses traits that are indicator of good genes (height, intelligence, weight, body shape etc), but DNA testing will take a lot of the guesswork out of selecting an optional mate to have children with.

The things that attract us to other people are often very subtle, and not even conscious, so in a world where people share their DNA results on social media, a person with good DNA will be more attractive than someone with bad DNA.

This subject was explored from another angle in the Man on Fire episode of the Netflix series Black Mirror (which I highly recommend).

So, in the scheme of things, when you take into account the real statistical indicators of how tough one's life will be, intersections of race, gender, gender identity and sexuality really don't amount to much; considering the impact of borders, IQ, fatherless, and, in the near future, ones's genetic strength as a partner and mate.

> Given that intersectional feminism is an attempt by feminism to gain mainstream credibility, why would anybody think that it could gain credibility while clearly ignoring the significant factors that are just too inconvenient for it to acknowledge?

*Connect with Gerard Nicol on his LinkedIn page.

You simply must watch this short video

Paul Elam · 6 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qPnDJjWuVsQ

My comment, and I hope you add your own:

The curious effect of most of women's peccadilloes is that it makes men work far harder than is necessary for the simplest of things. It's why we get tired of listening to them and dealing with them. Or rather why we should. Continuing to work at communication with someone too lazy or otherwise incapable of a simple yes or no, is precisely where men should quit asking and do what they want to do. Sadly, most men, almost all of them, won't wise up to that. I hope they enjoy life on the hamster wheel because I am damned happy to not live that way.

An open letter to President Joseph E. Aoun, Northeastern University

Robert Brockway · 10 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Following is an open letter to President Joseph E. Aoun, Northeastern University by the President of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA). –Ed

---

From:Robert Brockway
President of Australian
Men's Rights Association Inc.
Email: [Redacted]

To:Joseph E. Aoun
President
Northeastern University
Email: [Redacted]

CC:Suzanna Danuta Walters
Professor of Sociology
Professor and Director, Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program
Northeastern University
Email: [Redacted]

Dear President Aoun,

Although many people deny it, we live in a society where misandry is common. Even as I write this my editor underlines the word misandry, indicating an unknown term. When I write misogyny this does not occur. The term misandry is increasingly appearing in dictionaries though, with Merriam-Webster describing it simply as a hatred of men while Oxford Living Dictionaries describes it as a Dislike of, contempt for, or ingrained prejudice against men (i.e. the male sex).

I wish to bring to your attention an article written by Professor Suzanna Danuta Walters recently. A preamble to the article states Suzanna Danuta Walters, a professor of sociology and director of the Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program at Northeastern University, is the editor of the gender studies journal Signs. An archived copy of the article can be seen here.

This article is not a satirical piece. Ms Walters mentions a variety of topics to justify her advocacy of man-hating including arguing that sexual violence is something men do to women and invoking the alleged gender wage gap.

This letter is not intended to be a critique of Ms Walters' article but it is worth noting some problems with her claims.

Ms Walters states:

> But this recognition of the complexity of male domination (how different it can be in different parts of the world, how racism shapes it) should not — must not — mean we forget some universal facts.
> Pretty much everywhere in the world, this is true: Women experience sexual violence, and the threat of that violence permeates our choices big and small. In addition, male violence is not restricted to intimate-partner attacks or sexual assault but plagues us in the form of terrorism and mass gun violence.

Perpetration of sexual assault by women on men is grossly under-reported, with organisations such as the FBI only counting such assaults within the last few years. All readers are encouraged to read the research paper The Sexual Victimization of Men in America: New Data Challenge Old Assumptions by Lara Stemple, JD[a,b] and Ilan H. Meyer, PhD, as a starting point.

A selection of results from this research paper are presented here:

> Not only does the traditional sexual victimization paradigm masks male victimization, it can obscure sexual abuse perpetrated by women as well as same-sex victimization. We offer a few counterparadigmatic examples. One multiyear analysis of the NCVS household survey found that 46% of male victims reported a female perpetrator.23 Of juveniles reporting staff sexual misconduct, 89% were boys reporting abuse by female staff.33 In lifetime reports of nonrape sexual victimization, the NISVS found that 79% of self-reported gay male victims identified same-sex perpetrators.34

> The NISVS's 12-month prevalence estimates of sexual victimization show that male victimization is underrepresented when victim penetration is the only form of nonconsensual sex included in the definition of rape. The number of women who have been raped (1 270 000) is nearly equivalent to the number of men who were "made to penetrate" (1 267 000).5 As Figure 1 also shows, both men and women experienced "sexual coercion" and "unwanted sexual contact," with women more likely than men to report the former and men slightly more likely to report the latter.5

> Without seeking to outline an entirely new classification scheme, we posit that "rape" as currently defined by the CDC and the FBI will continue to foster the underrecognition of the extent of male victimization. Terms such as "sexual assault" and "sexual victimization," if defined in gender-inclusive ways, have the potential to capture the kind of abuse with which federal agencies ought to be concerned. They can be used more consistently and with less gender and heterosexist bias across crime, health, and other surveys. This would facilitate important cross-population analyses that inconsistent definitions now limit.

Ms Walters' article also talks about the alleged gender wage gap. In reality what we have is a gender earnings gap. This is a topic that has been researched by academics and governments for decades and the results are virtually always the same. The bulk of earnings differences between men and women (typically 93-95%) can be explained by known factors that have nothing to do with discrimination. A small proportion of the difference (typically 5-7%) remains unexplained. This is definitively covered for the US labour market by the CONSAD Report.

Ms Walters also raises the notion of The Patriarchy to justify her feelings towards men. The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is a myth and shows, at best, a very naive view of history. The existence of the feminist notion of The Patriarchy, historically or in the present time, has been thoroughly debunked elsewhere.

Ms Walters finishes the article with:

> So men, if you really are #WithUs and would like us to not hate you for all the millennia of woe you have produced and benefited from, start with this: Lean out so we can actually just stand up without being beaten down. Pledge to vote for feminist women only. Don't run for office. Don't be in charge of anything. Step away from the power. We got this. And please know that your crocodile tears won't be wiped away by us anymore. We have every right to hate you. You have done us wrong. #BecausePatriarchy. It is long past time to play hard for Team Feminism. And win.

Her suggestion that men should abandon all positions of power and authority is, at the very least, extraordinary.

While Ms Walters is entitled to her opinion and may hate those she chooses to hate, I question her suitability as a professor at your institution. Many university students are young and impressionable and often lack significant life experience before attending university. It is troubling to think that a woman such as Ms Walters would have the opportunity to express her extreme views to impressionable young students in a university lecture setting.

Please note that this is an open letter and will be published in various locations online. In the interests of transparency we strongly encourage Northeastern University to publish a response. From time to time we will report to our readers as to whether a private response has been received or a public response published.

Yours sincerely,

Robert Brockway
President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc.

How feminists developed 'toxic masculinity'

Elizabeth Hobson · 14 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A man named Wisdom asked me a great question today: how did gender activists come up with the term 'toxic masculinity'? After giving it some thought, I have identified the falling of three dominoes that I think have contributed to the explosion of the term in popular culture.

The innate human suspicion and critical view of men (especially as compared to women), added to the hegemony of the feminist perspective (and their revisionism of history), and the fact that several generations of Western women have not sent their men off to potentially die for our security has made us susceptible to the myth of 'toxic masculinity'.

Men exist in dominance hierarchies. A very traditional dominance hierarchy would be strength or hunting skills. The strongest men and best hunters would acquire prestige and status which would give them access to the best females for mating with. In our modern societies, many men exist in many dominance hierarchies, they could be based on wealth, or intelligence – even gaming and trainspotting appeal to men's instinct to compete in dominance hierarchies. According to Gad Saad;

> Women are attracted to "toxic masculine" male phenotypes that correlate with testosterone, and they are desirous of men who are socially dominant, who are strategically risk-taking in their behaviors, and who exhibit patterns of behaviors that will allow them to ascend the social hierarchy and defend their positions from encroachers."

Because where a man sits in any given dominance hierarchy potentially confers upon them access to women therefore opportunities to pass on their genes — ie. the second most important human instinct, after survival. Dominance hierarchies and male behaviour (and transgressions) are policed stringently, both by women and men. So, women and men instinctively have a very… Critical view of men.

We also happen to have a very sympathetic view of women because they are the limiting factor in reproduction. Women are less productive when it comes to reproductive potential – one baby per year-and-a-half for two or three decades is the absolute maximum potential for women (and with breast feeding and the all-but-historic chance of death in child-birth, it's usually significantly less) – as compared with men's virtually boundless capacity to inseminate.

This disparate potential is both why it has been discovered that 8,000 years ago 17 women reproduced for every single male and why men have evolved their competitive instincts so strongly as compared to women. It's also why we view women so much more favourably than men; in tribal societies most women just had to be considered worthy of reproduction, whereas only a small pool of men were technically required so they were judged far more harshly. This is the evolutionary basis that had to exist for human beings to reach the point where a significant portion of us could sincerely discuss the 'existence' of 'toxic masculinity'.

The second domino is hundreds of years of increasing feminist activism. According to Peter Wright, in his book 'Gynocentrism: From Feudalism to the Modern Disney Princess';

> "Feminists today refer to courtly ladies of the late Middle Ages as the first feminists, or protofeminists" [because] "In the 12th-14th centuries evidence shows that women began to agitate for increased authority over the 'correct' way for men and women to conduct relationships, with particular emphasis on what they felt were acceptable roles for males in a dignified and civil society."

He goes on to say that; "women were widely viewed as men's moral superiors" and that "Courtly love began with a social shaming of men for bad behaviours… The idea was launched by powerful women of the medieval aristocracy who cited the worst behaviours of the most unruly males and extrapolated those behaviours to the entire gender."

The second generation of feminists, known as The First Wave, included misandric Suffragettes such as Mona Caird who called for man (as a social class) "to suffer, inch by inch, pang by pang, for that which he has inflicted" and The Declaration of Sentiments, signed at the Seneca Falls Conference in 1848, is a list of grievances beginning with the statement "The history of mankind is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations on the part of man toward woman".

The third generation, or Second Wave, was even more extreme – by the 1960s-70s it was considered acceptable behaviour for future tenured professors to say that "All sex, even consensual sex between a married couple is an act of violence perpetrated against a woman." (Catherine MacKinnon) and Neil Lyndon reports, in 'No More Sex War', that at a dinner party in 1976 (or thereabouts) his hostess – a well respected literary journals editor – informed him that "All men are Idi Amin".

And so we come to the growth in the use of the term 'toxic masculinity'. A term originally coined by the Mythopoetic men's community to describe hypermasculine male chauvinists who they asserted were primarily raised without male role models in the 1980s-90s. Fourth generation/Third Wave feminists jumped on it. To them, after dropping the suggestion that women may be involved in its conception (naturally), the term offered a stick to beat men with and a way of acknowledging male disadvantage (such as their sky high suicide rates) whilst blaming men themselves for their disadvantages.

[image]
The final domino that I believe has fallen in the modern Western world, to create an environment where such an egregious theory could become as popularised as it is, is the fact that women haven't had to rely on men to save us from an existential threat for generations.

Not since World War Two have the majority of women (including in the academic classes) had to wave goodbye to their men-folk, unsure if they would return, and staking all of their hopes for the survival of their way of life on their victory. In such situations, I believe that most women would naturally develop a fierce loyalty and defensive attitude to their men and their men's reputations which would insulate them from the ravages of toxic feminist theory.

'Toxic masculinity' is the result of thousands of years of evolution and hundreds of years of thought; to the point we've now reached where many academics are pathologically ideological enough to develop it, and a sizeable proportion of the public are bigoted enough (with regards to men) to swallow it. And the backlash against toxic feminism has been active for over 100 years, with consistent futility.

The final domino, I hope to God won't be re-erected, and the first domino cannot be. Our only hope lies with righting the second domino and combatting feminism. Despite its ingrained nature and hegemonic status, I do believe that we're on the cusp of something potentially wonderful; A Voice for Men is vastly outperforming Everyday Feminism; the concerted feminist campaign to eject Philip Davies from his seat in Shipley in 2017 failed dismally; and reports from friends on campus involve students quoting Jordan Peterson and bemoaning over-privileged, feminist Millennials. I live in hope.

The myth of female voicelessness

Mark Dent · 14 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists lie all the time. They don't misspeak or misinterpret the facts. They know they are lying and they know that they continually get away with it because no-one has the courage or the public platform to call them out when they do.

The very fact that no-one in our media or government dares to point out the truth demonstrates where the real power resides.

One line often spoken by ranting feminists in debates or lectures in universities and the media is that women to this very day have no voice. To prove this assertion, they point to the number of men in positions of power in our government and compare that to the number of women. It always seems a little ironic that so many women in powerful public positions are those who complain most loudly of their lack of voice.

Women only constitute one third of all politicians they proclaim. This clearly shows men still dominate our society. Men hold the power. Most men sit in silence, apparently shamed by the stunning clarity of this argument.

They are either cowards or stupid fools.

My first response to this ridiculous assertion would be this. Please point out to me exactly how men as a group, have benefited by the fact that there are more men in governmental positions. The answer is of course, there have been absolutely no benefits or advantages afforded to males despite their dominance in the political sphere.

My next step would be to point out the countless advantages/privileges women have been given by male dominated governments during the past few decades.

Let's list them:

- There is a minister for the Status of Women-none for men.
- Hundreds of millions of dollars are devoted to the prevention of violence against women. Almost zero money goes into prevention of violence against men
- Women receive generous maternity leave-men only recently won a paltry week or two which recent surveys say are often not taken for fear of their position at work being affected.
- Women have reproductive rights protected by law-men have none.
- Women are almost always the default winners of custody of the children in a marriage break up simply because they are women.
- Women are supported with quotas and affirmative action to gain employment that men have had to earn through merit. Quotas are never used to promote gender equity in workplaces dominated by women.
- Genital mutilation of girls is against the law. Genital mutilation of boys is permitted.
- Women receive far more lenient sentencing than men for committing the same crime. Men receive on average 63% longer terms in prison.
- Funding for women's health far exceeds that provided for men's health.
- Entry standards into the army and police force are lowered to enable more women to enter these professions.
- Women have the right to call drunken, coerced sex, rape. Men do not.
- Women have the right to exclusive tax benefits for being a business owner
- Countless domestic violence shelters have been provided for women. There are none for men.
- In a domestic dispute woman are always presumed to be the victim and the man automatically cuffed and arrested.
- Women can choose to kill their unborn child without the man having any say in the matter but if she decides to have the baby he is legally bound to financially support it until adulthood.

- Businesses are permitted to advertise for women only to fill job positions but are not permitted to advertise for men only. The Equal Opportunity Board has given the green light to discrimination in favour of women.

Given these facts, we can see that governments dominated by men overwhelmingly give their attention and more importantly funding to help improve, protect and support the well being of women and girls and ignore or downplay the many terrible issues damaging men and boys This is indisputable.

The second aspect of the argument of women having no voice pertains to the media in all its varied forms. Feminists insist that our newspapers, news outlets and radio stations are dominated by males and this again is proof of the lack of a voice for women in our society.

Once again, nothing could be further from the truth. If we were to count the number of radio shows hosted by men or check the gender diversity of major newsrooms we may well find that more men are behind the microphone or in front of the camera (though I would question this regarding our newsrooms on television). But let's agree, for argument's sake that men indeed are the predominant gender in the media.

What do men talk about on our radios and televisions or write about in our newspapers?

They focus on economics, sport and politics. Their discussion or editorializing is entirely gender neutral, however if they do focus upon gender as an issue it is always to speak in support of women's issues be it health, domestic violence or financial security. This support is manifested in men often raising millions of dollars for women's health initiatives like breast cancer or ovarian cancer.

It is incredibly rare to hear any male in the media speak about the countless societal injustices and obstacles facing men and boys. If they dare to do so it is usually presented with an almost apologetic tone and an insistence that this should in no way deflect from the importance of focusing on women's issues.

Now. Let's focus on the women in our media. What do women write about or speak about from their public pulpits?

They talk about women's issues.

Every day they write endlessly about things which women must endure or suffer whilst often laying the blame for this purgatory at the feet of men. Whether it be violence against women (the only violence that concerns feminists), women's health (I am yet to hear of a women's sporting group or any other female group raising funds for male specific diseases) or promulgating debunked myths like gender being the reason for the pay gap between the genders, this is the all consuming subject matter for women.

They whine about sexism in politics, never for one moment acknowledging that males are abused and judged even more harshly than females. Men do not exist in this female media realm except as perpetrators and oppressors.

These women write about nothing else. Think of journalists here in Australia. Susie O'Brien, Wendy Tuohy, Clementine Ford, Mia Freedman, Kasey Edwards, Tracey Spicer, Jane Gilmore, Jessica Rowe, Kathy Lette and many more who write exclusively about women and what affects them with little or no regard for males other than as mentioned before-perpetrators of one form of oppression or another.

There is not one male journalist in any form of mainstream media who does for men what these women do for females. In other words men are the truly voiceless gender when it comes to the promotion of issues which most deeply affect their fellow males.

When any man dares to speak out about men's issues or questions the endlessly self-serving and often hateful feminist agenda he is immediately branded a misogynist, a supporter of violence against women and rape or someone who is threatened by powerful, successful women. It does not matter if this man's life and the way he has lived it make a lie of each one of these accusations. A three-minute interview is never going to provide him with an opportunity to defend himself against such vile slurs.

Women in power routinely speak about their desire and aim to improve women's lives, to seek better work environments and more favorable conditions for women, to pour yet more funds into fighting violence against women and no-one is concerned or dares question this blatantly bigoted approach to politics. Sadly, the male politicians do exactly the same-whether it be Obama in America, a conservative like Tony Abbott or Malcolm Turnbull, or a left-wing union man like Bill Shorten-the one thing that unites them is their obsession with women's issues and their total disregard for the men they are meant to represent with equal concern and fervor.

If any of the societal ills which overwhelmingly affect men-suicide, homelessness, workplace death and injury, plummeting university enrolments, biased sentencing based solely upon their gender, Family Court bias and reproductive rights were in fact affecting women in the way they are men, there would be outcries proclaiming our national shame over the lack of value we place upon the lives of the women and girls in our society. But it is men who are suffering, and for most people in power, this simply doesn't concern them.

Yet feminists continue to tell the young people in our universities or audiences at talk shows or the broader community during election campaigns the same big, fat lie-women still don't have equality and it's a national disgrace which must be addressed.

People nod solemnly and do not dare to contradict this lie.

Let me demolish another myth before I finish.

I was recently standing in a Kmart store in a Melbourne shopping Centre with my wife. We were looking for a clothing shop for men and it was a challenging task.

We began to marvel at the endless array of shops catering only to the needs and tastes of women. We saw handbag shops, shoe shops, nail salons, hairdressing salons, perfume and make up stalls, jewelry stores, countless clothing outlets and even in the larger stores which held men's clothing, the merchandise and actual area devoted to men's accessories was truly insignificant in relation to the floor space provided for the goods targeting women and girls.

It was astonishing. I think a simple trip to the local shopping mall would or should open the eyes of every female, even those who have been brainwashed in gender study classes.

The Kmart store seemed to demolish a few feminist myths simply by existing. Who is the store's biggest marketing audience? Women and girls. How do stores decide who they will target? They do it with very thorough research and their daily experience which tells them it is women who spend the most money in their shops. So, what does this tell us about the economic impoverishment of women we are so often told about? It tells us this too, is a myth. Women are our society's biggest consumers and often they are spending money they didn't personally earn. Hardly the kind of environment one would expect to find in a culture that oppresses women and does all in its power to look after men.

It also destroys the myth that gender is a social construct. Feminism has spent decades telling girls they should drive tractors and wear pants, yet to this day it is the nail salons, hairdressers, dress shops and jewelry stores which continue to rake in the profits because girls are still naturally drawn to these things.

Who would have thought a Kmart store could provide such an eye-opening education for those who are willing to look and learn?

Feminism is based upon lies, myths and half-truths. It has thrived in recent decades due to the apathy and cowardice of men and the manipulative, power hungry women in this movement who crave the very thing they claim to despise in men — power, privilege and entitlement. Sadly, it seems they have succeeded.

Sources:

https://thoughtcatalog.com/janet-bloomfield/2014/08/5-legal-rights-women-have-that-men-dont/

http://she-conomy.com/facts-on-women

https://www.forbes.com/sites/bridgetbrennan/2015/01/21/top-10-things-everyone-should-know-about-women-consumers/#48ec64816a8b https://goodmenproject.com/ethics-values/sentencing-gap-men-likely-go-prison-mrzs/http://www.ifeminists.com/introduction/editorials/2002/0423a.html

http://www.news.com.au/lifestyle/health/men-die-earlier-but-womens-health-gets-four-times-more-funding/news-story/6bfc4ea7da62ad84743d7451de6de960

https://www.upcounsel.com/woman-owned-business-tax-benefits

https://www.moneyaction.com.au/superannuation/business-women-get-super-men/https://www.helpguide.org/articles/abuse/help-for-men-who-are-being-abused.htm

https://www.aph.gov.au/About_Parliament/Parliamentary_Departments/Parliamentary_Library/pubs/rp/BudgetReview201516/DV https://www.lifeline.org.au/about-lifeline/lifeline-information/statistics-on-suicide-in-australia http://australianmensrights.com/Men_Suicide_Statistics_Australia/Male_Suicide_rates_in_Australia-Family_Law.aspx

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2016-12-04/financial-abortion-men-opt-out-parenthood/8049576

See also: Republicans and Democrats, both Gynocrats

Are nerdy men hated for non-mainstream shopping habits? A response to Rachael Lefler

YetAnotherCommenter · 16 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

Rachael Lefler recently wrote an article for A Voice for Men which proposed an explanation for why feminists seem so hateful towards "geek" or "nerd" culture. In other words, Lefler is trying to come up with a theoretical explanation for what Mytheos Holt called "The #WarOnNerds".

The #WarOnNerds, at least as a broad phenomenon, is ultimately what led to my own red-pilling and fall down the proverbian Rabbit Hole. Geeky men are indeed considered enemies by the official feminist movement (indeed, the way Incels are now being targeted seems like the next phase of this campaign). As the feminist #WarOnNerds is my primary empirical interest within gender politics, I will be commenting on Lefler's theory.

Explaining the #WarOnNerds is not an easy thing to do. Perhaps the best explanation so far was proposed by Mytheos Holt; Holt argued that the #WarOnNerds was ultimately a reaction by the Clerisy (the established media, academic/intellectual and artistic/cultural classes) against the subculture which created the internet and thus deeply damaged their ability to control the broader culture whilst simultaneously smashing their profits. Through disintermediation of culture, the institutional platforms which gave the Clerisy such power were faced with a sudden onslaught of dramatic competition.

Not only did they lose some prestige, they lost the massive profits which they once enjoyed (the record industry being an obvious victim given how the internet slaughtered a CD-based business model). This left many artists, intellectuals, journalists, and those whom were educated in these fields, facing pay cuts and substantially reduced future job prospects, which helped ferment a grudge against those making piles of money in Silicon Valley. So it comes as no surprise when journalists paid by the click call to "bring back bullying" of those whom they blame for their fading prestige.

This argument certainly makes sense in the aftermath of the Great Recession, and Holt's argument certainly has substantial explanatory power.

Unfortunately, I can't say the same about Lefler's. As I am going to be critical, I would like to make the following clear; firstly, I am greatly sympathetic to Lefler's project and I think much more writing should be done on the subject of the #WarOnNerds. Secondly, I absolutely consider her an ally given she is both a geek herself and has a long history of publishing on AVFM. Thirdly, any theory that tries to explain such a complex social phenomenon as the #WarOnNerds will almost certainly be incomplete, because complex social phenomena have multiple contributing factors and it is hard to reduce everything down to one thing. I hope this article will be taken for the constructive criticism it is.

A Reconstruction Of Lefler's Argument

Like Holt, Lefler argues that the #WarOnNerds is fundamentally an economic phenomenon. Lefler, however, argues that it really comes down to big corporations wanting to make profits and increase market share; as Lefler points out, "nerdy" consumption patterns typically favor smaller businesses rather than the "mainstream" ones. In Lefler's view, this makes nerds "bad consumers" because we aren't necessarily funding big corporate entities with our spending. Mega-Corporations are trying to 'fix' this and prevent nerd money from going to producers that serve niche markets; one way of doing this is to make mainstream blockbusters which bear the names of traditionally "nerdy" intellectual properties. This, in theory, would get the nerds buying from the largest Mega-Corporations once more and integrate nerds into the "mainstream" consumer base.

Lefler then moves onto a second, and substantially less clear, argument that Mega-Corporations want to encourage nerdy men to pursue romantic success with women. The threat of geeky men not having relationships with, and thus not spending money on, women is argued to be threatening to the profits of Mega-Corporations. I honestly cannot be certain about the chain of logic in this argument; it seems like Lefler believes these mainstream entertainment products (being sold to nerds through the use of the right brand names or the invocation of poseur nerd cred) try to persuade nerds to keep trying to "win the girl" so that nerds will ultimately end up with a wife and child and thus, again, feed into the mainstream patterns of consumption. I fully concede I may have misinterpreted this argument, and I am sure Lefler would be happy to indicate to me if I am wrong, but for the purposes of this article I will presume this to be a fair summary.

In brief, Lefler argues the #WarOnNerds is an attempt to re-integrate nerds into mainstream consumption patterns either through rebranding mainstream products with nerd names or faux-nerd reputations, or encouraging nerds to get with women and start families so as to become mainstream consumers.

Again I do not want this to be seen as an attack, but I think that as a theory neither of these arguments make sense, nor do I believe the meta-cause Lefler postulates (an attempt to get nerds away from niche businesses and into supporting big businesses) to have much explanatory power. Lefler's theory simply doesn't seem consistent with the evidence.

Where Lefler's Theory Fails

I am going to state my assumptions up front. First, I will assume that nerds like specific things about the IPs they enjoy; if one removes those specific things, one will lose the nerd market. Second, I will assume that nerds are indifferent to whether or not the IPs they like are produced by large or small firms (or whether or not those firms are proprietorships, partnerships or corporate entities); what determines whether or not a nerd likes an IP is whether or not they like the content of the IP, and nothing else.

The first counterargument I can think of with Lefler's theory is that simply making mainstream, non-nerdy movies branded with nerdy IPs has been a catastrophic failure, as evidenced by the new Disney Star Wars movies. Lefler implicitly presumes that merely branding a film with a nerdy IP is sufficient for that film to capture the nerd market, but empirically speaking this has not been shown to be the case. The way that Marvel Comics have now become achingly politically correct has been demonstrated to alienate the nerd market, rather than retain it. Interestingly, the Marvel Cinematic Universe has not lost the nerd market, and it has also gained mainstream attention; I would argue this is because it preserved what nerds liked about the basic IPs within movies that also were able to please more conventional audiences. Either way, if branding "standard issue" entertainment products with nerd IPs is a strategy to get the nerd market to buy these entertainment products and become loyal consumers of conventional entertainment products, then the strategy so far has been a miserable failure, just as my assumptions predict.

The second counterargument I can think of is that branding a mainstream entertainment product with a nerdy IP's name is simply not necessary for a large corporation to get the nerd market's spending. Let us presume that there is a small entertainment firm S and a large entertainment firm L, with the former making a niche product for nerds n and the latter making mainstream entertainment product m. Why would L buy the rights to n but then use the name of n on product m? Couldn't they just purchase S and otherwise leave S alone to keep producing n? This is more than sufficient for L to get all of the nerd spending. In addition, S is more likely to have better knowledge of the audience for n than L does, just as L may have better knowledge of the audience for m; presuming that an entertainment product which satisfies its audience more will make more money, the profit-maximizing thing for L to do may simply be for L to purchase S but let S just keep doing what its currently doing.

It should be noted that record labels often did precisely this; they may have been producing tons of mainstream pop, yet at the same time they often had smaller subunits (often with their own "vanity label") that produced music to target niche markets. This is arguably true in the publishing industry too, where large publishers will establish smaller imprints to serve smaller/specialized markets. Even in very concentrated industries, large corporations often preserved niche marketing as subunits within a larger business rather than tried to make niche markets buy the mainstream product.

Let us also extend this particular argument; it is very rare for the revenue from any entertainment product's purchase to only extend to niche companies, and not to give any benefit to mainstream companies. For example, Amazon makes money from every e-book sold even if that e-book is self-published or published by a small independent publisher. Treating "nerd consumption" as if it doesn't have any benefit for large corporations only makes sense if you ignore complicated supply chains and presume that even niche market entertainment producers are completely vertically integrated. This is of course a false presumption.

The third problem I can see with this argument is that if nerd culture is viewed as an "enemy" to feminism because mainstream entertainment companies want nerds to become integrated into the mainstream consumer base, why is nerd culture alone being targeted for sexism? Why don't we see shaming campaigns directed at say, goth culture? I mean Metropolis Records hasn't been purchased by a large corporation yet! In addition, why didn't the attacks on nerd culture cease when Marvel and Star Wars were purchased by Disney (and DC by Warner Brothers)? This argument is even further undermined if we note the fact that subculturally speaking, many feminist/SJW types are hipsters, and hipsterism is defined by avoiding mainstream consumption and instead preferring artisanal/boutique/alternative producers. Why hasn't hipster culture been declared an enemy of women?

A fourth problem I can see with this argument is that it presumes that if nerds get married and have children, they'll start engaging in mainstream consumption. This may be true if he "gives up his childish hobbies" as a result of marrying/kids, but again this seems like an atrociously indirect route of trying to capture the nerd market; why shouldn't the mainstream company just buy the niche-market company and let the profits flow, irrespective of whether or not a nerd who marries ends up giving up his hobbies?

A fifth problem is that the argument describes a man going MGTOW as something that large entertainment corporations are terrified of. Why, exactly? Wouldn't a MGTOW, due to not having to support a wife or children, have more disposable income to spend on their own entertainment (which could be mainstream or otherwise), thus resulting in a smaller number of higher-spending consumers? Presumably, the problem is that one nerdy man who does not reproduce is a smaller number of consumers than one man plus one woman plus a non-zero number of children. But what this justifies is mainstream cultural producers generally pushing a "pro-natalist" agenda. Do they really? Do mainstream entertainment companies encourage campaigns against abortion (which terminates a potential future customer) for example?

Do mainstream entertainment companies encourage big families and promote the idea of women being enthusiastic mothers with multiple children? Many people make the accusation that mainstream entertainment companies pander to feminist agendas, which often don't include room for large numbers of children; if this is correct, then mainstream entertainment companies can hardly be accused of pro-natalism. Not to mention that yet again, it is questionable that a pro-population-growth (and thus pro-market-growth) corporate agenda would justify a selective targeting of nerd culture in particular. Why nerdy males? Why not go after SJW feminists? I mean they're not exactly lining up to enthusiastically start families and have plenty of children.

The sixth issue with Lefler's theory is that it relies upon the idea that the feminist movement is some sort of coordinated entity which is merely acting in accordance with the profit-maximizing aims of large entertainment corporations. But how can this be the case? Feminism clearly predates nerd culture and has an intellectual history going back long before the establishment of today's large entertainment corporations. Not only that, but whilst feminist organizations exist the fact is that Intersectional Feminism (the kind of feminism that has prosecuted the #WarOnNerds) is fundamentally a set of ideas rather than an organization. The #WarOnNerds seems to be a product of individuals enacting ideas which they were taught in universities; no evil corporate mastermind is necessary. Was, for example, Anita Sarkeesian given money by Viacom to go into video game culture and lecture it for being sexist (and by the same token, how could anyone at Viacom believe that feminist lectures would change the consumption patterns of gamers?)?

As Sarkeesian's Master's Thesis makes clear, she had the beliefs she did back when she was in college; how could her convictions be merely the product of entertainment conglomerates attempting to make nerds consume mainstream entertainment products? Doesn't it simply make more sense that she, due to being a radicalized feminist, was hostile to cultural artifacts which didn't promote her preferred views of women?

Indeed, if contemporary feminism were merely about trying to make nerds purchase mainstream entertainment products, why do feminists (and SJWs generally) constantly critique mainstream entertainment products as well as "nerdy" ones? Doesn't this go entirely against what mainstream entertainment conglomerates want? Why would Harvey Weinstein's misconduct and #MeToo – both of which caused much damage to the reputation of mainstream Hollywood – become celebrated feminist initiatives if encouraging the consumption of mainstream entertainment were a goal of feminism?

A final critique which I must make of Lefler's hypothesis is that a very critical moment in the #WarOnNerds, specifically Elevatorgate and the resultant sundering of the New Atheist movement, cannot be reconciled with her theory. If the #WarOnNerds was merely about trying to drive nerds towards consuming mainstream entertainment products, how can this be consistent with an attack on an intellectual movement that did not even remotely center around the consumption or purchase of any entertainment products at all? Why would New Atheism be a target in the first place?

Additionally, the closest thing to entertainment products which New Atheism produced were the books and television appearances of people like Christopher Hitchens, Sam Harris and Richard Dawkins. This was not "nerdy" consumption; the core texts of the New Atheist movement were published by mainstream publishers and sold quite well even to audiences outside the New Atheist movement. To the extent that New Atheism created consumable products, those products were monetized by mainstream corporations. The spokespeople of the New Atheist movement frequently appeared on mainstream television networks; how were the profits or market shares of mainstream corporations preserved or enhanced by Rebecca Watson's temper tantrum? I can simply see no way in which Lefler's theory explains why the #WarOnNerds tore New Atheism apart.

Conclusion

How can we explain the strange, almost paradoxical hatred displayed by Intersectional Feminists towards a culture of people who don't live up to traditional gender norms and suffer as a result? How can we explain the fact that Intersectional Feminists have attacked the tech industry, STEM, video games, New Atheism and comic books? Why would the spaces of "nerd culture" be so systematically and thoroughly targeted for entryism, attack and cultural colonization?

This is certainly an interesting question, but Rachael Lefler's proposed explanation simply doesn't make very much sense. The feminist #WarOnNerds cannot be merely about safeguarding and increasing the market share and profits of large entertainment conglomerates. In a world where massive conglomerates can pander to market niches by creating specialized subdivisions or buying out smaller companies and turning them into subsidiaries, the nerd market can be easily monetized. Attempts to make nerds purchase hollowed out versions of IPs they cherish have failed miserably, and in a world of platforms, formats, license fees and supply chains large corporations benefit from nerdy consumption as well. Not to mention that SJW feminists are, themselves, typically members of a subculture which is nearly in-principle hostile towards mainstream consumption and non-mainstream subcultures other than nerds have generally remained unmolested by feminist entryism.

How can feminist hatred of nerds be merely a product of a desire to deter nerds away from non-mainstream media when feminists have been stridently critical of the mainstream entertainment industry as well? Indeed, the idea that mainstream entertainment conglomerates would try to incubate a women's movement that would attack nerds so as to drive nerds away from non-mainstream entertainment consumption is an absurd Rube Goldberg Machine of a theory. And indeed, it does not explain the scope of the #WarOnNerds, which extends beyond video games, comic books and science fiction.

Holt's explanation certainly makes more sense. And even the "Red Pill" explanation – that feminist women hate non-sexy men and it is those men who dominate nerd culture – makes more sense.

I will not pretend that I can offer a single, integrated, flawless explanation for the #WarOnNerds, at least not yet. I am highly skeptical of the notion that there is even “one reason” for these events. Lefler should be commended for offering a theory in the first place, but the theory she proposes is severely lacking. As much as I appreciate, and echo, the call she gives at the end of her article for men to go their own way, I cannot find myself in agreement with her theory of the #WarOnNerds.

♦

YetAnotherCommenter is an Honey Badger Brigade writer and MHRA who primarily focuses on the issues of non-traditionally-masculine men. He’s a long-time veteran of the recent culture wars, having been in the atheist-secularist movement back during the days of Elevatorgate.

An obituary to feminism

Belinda Brown · 17 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It is high time that feminism was recognised as a hate movement, that its ideology was felt as an embarrassment and being a feminist was seen as a badge of shame.

While the article by Suzanna Danuta Walters has been reassuringly and roundly condemned from all quarters – feminists appear to have been embarrassed into silence. Perhaps they are mortified that a mainstream, high profile, feminist academic has shouted from the rooftops those thoughts they knew to keep private and has made unambiguous the association between feminism and hate.

While Connor Friedersdorf of the Atlantic was quick to assure us that Walter's article was not mainstream feminism – I would beg to differ.

We may dress it up prettily in Suffragette colours but there should be no mistake made. Feminism is rooted in hate.

Christabel Pankhurst, early feminist and doyenne of the Suffragette movement argued in her treatise "The Great Scourge" that most men had venereal disease. She told us 75 to 80 per cent had gonorrhoea, 20 to 25 per cent had syphilis – she was very precise. She said this was the cause of childless marriages and the high rates of infant mortality. She argued that the only reason men were against Suffrage was because they thought it would stop women's promiscuity. Oh, how wrong she was there!

However it wasn't till the sixties that the pandora's box really opened up – Christabel had been ahead of her time.

The following quotes all from feminist icons are not just prescient. They helped to formulate feminism and we can see their fruit around us. Quoting feminist platitudes, like those of Emma Watson, jars painfully with what I see.

Andrea Dworkin:

"Only when manhood is dead – and it will perish when ravaged femininity no longer sustains it – only then will we know what it is to be free"

Robin Morgan:

"I feel man-hating is an honourable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class hatred against the class that is oppressing them".

Shulamith Firestone:

"So the end goal of feminist revolution must be,…not just the elimination of the male privilege, but of sex distinction itself"

Catherine Mackinnon

"In a patriarchal society, all heterosexual intercourse is rape because women, as a group, are not strong enough to give meaningful consent".

And while Valerie Solanas with her S.C.U.M (Society for Cutting Up Men) Manifesto might be seen as an extreme example it is worth knowing that this work was translated into over a dozen languages and is excerpted into several feminist anthologies. While some tried to claim her work was a parody she insisted it was 'deadly' serious. I think the author would know.

Besides she was not alone when she said that civic minded responsible females ought to eliminate the male sex. There have been four books where the authoresses have fantasized about male free "utopias" which have all involved elimination of males and various forms of parthenogenesis. Mizora (1890), Herland (1915), The Female Man (1975) and The Wanderground (1978).

These sentiments have been echoed since.

Sally Miller Gearhart, the author of The Wanderground said in her 1982 pamphlet "The Future, if there is one, is female":

"The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race".

When we think of crimes against humanity we think of violence – genocides and holocausts.

But perhaps we need to think about more subtle definitions if political power is going to increasingly move into women's hands.

As recently as 1999 these sentiments were echoed by Mary Daly in an interview called 'No Man's Land' for the Enlightenext magazine with Susan Bridle:

"If life is to survive on this planet, there must be decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. People are afraid to say that kind of stuff any more", she ruefully adds.

Sally Gearhart combining her wishful thinking with pseudo science had some ideas about how this could be done:

"It's not genocide, exactly. It's more like job attrition, the way employers cut back positions without actually firing anyone. A 75 per cent female to 25 per cent male ratio could be achieved in one generation if one half of a population reproduced heterosexually and one half by ovular merging".

These people were not left field but tenured professors in high profile colleges. Gearhart's website describes her as a human rights activist. Daly's work is written about reverentially at Goldsmith's College today.

It is not a long shot to suspect direct linkages between these mainstream feminist writings and the destruction of fatherhood. This wishful thinking is implicated in the social changes described by Hanna Rosin in "The End of Men". Indirect linkages to the reduction in testosterone, the decline of the male gene and certainly to our complete failure to do anything about this could also be found.

Connor Friedersdorf in his otherwise decent commentary on Suzanna Danuta Walters assures us that when she insists men should "Pledge to vote for feminist women only. Don't run for office. Don't be in charge of anything. Step away from the power" – these comments are actually a perversion of #teamfeminism.

No. They are not. They express the aims of #teamfeminism very well.

Just a couple of days ago a Treasury Committee report told us that senior men should lead by example by working flexibly to show it is not just for women.

A couple of months ago the Women and Equalities Committee insisted that fathers should get 12 weeks use it or lose it leave to get rid of the gender pay gap. Ruth Graham recently wrote in an article in Slate:

"Think of all the financial and emotional damage that could have been avoided if men simply stayed at home where they belong"

Voicing a question we could ask of women but would not dare even think.

She then goes on to ask whether:

"men really have the judgement and intellectual abilities to be entrusted with our most important resources" and concludes that they should not.

I suppose this is what they call "sassy" or "ironic" feminism but when we look at what Graham or Walters writes in a historical or contemporary perspective what they are saying is morally repugnant and I admire those men who withhold their hate.

Throughout history work has been regarded as a burden not a privilege and it was always men who were whipped, beaten and who sacrificed their lives to hard labour so they could feed and clothe the women and children in their family. Men have done the vast majority of all work throughout the world and throughout human history and to the extent that they were rewarded they largely gave these rewards away. While females participated in the labour force at various points their contribution was significantly less than the male contribution and it was always men who took the dirtiest and most dangerous work. It was only when work became prestigious, easier, more comfortable and convenient than women decided to enter the fray. For those who don't believe me read about it here.

But perhaps we should not get too hung up on the declarations of feminists – perhaps their deeds are more important than what they say.

For if you sit idly by while boys flail around in schools, if you winkle men out of families, if you believe that men working long, hard hours at stressful employment oppresses you, if you criticise the way men speak, sit or even dance, if you believe a man telling you he finds you attractive and even gently touching you is actually harassing you and abusing you – isn't that sufficient to show how much you hate men?

One of Walter's justifications for hating men is that they are more violent than women. But men themselves are the vast majority of the victims of this violence. Is a solution to human weakness really to put men down? Evidence suggests that women get just as angry as men do but they have other ways in which this anger is expressed. They are more likely to seek the aid of allies and to engage in indirect aggression through the manipulation of social relationships and attempts to inflict relational damage. As feminism shows us, the effectiveness of this female strategy is great.

Besides violence is never far from the surface of feminist thinking. It is marked by gratuitousness – think Andrea Dworkin (here) , or the sisters of Jezebel (here), or even our dear old Suffragettes. Nor does there appear to be shame associated with it – Lucy Worsley's triumphant documentary about Suffragette violence has already been shown twice. When Bahar Mustafa tweeted #killallwhitemen, rightly or wrongly she did not lose her job. https://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/crime/bahar-mustafa-charged-with-sending-malicious-message-after-tweeting-kill-all-white-men-a6683241.html It is used for making money – see here and here. Even Walters herself refers to a radical feminist 'smackdown' and insists that we all go Thelma and Louise and Foxy Brown (bywords for gratuitous violence for those not in the know).

In my musings about feminism I ask myself what is the most damaging thing feminism has done? Is it the destruction of the family? Is it the damaging of relations between women and men? Is it the institutionalisation of selfishness and making personal benefit the yardstick by which everything is judged?

For me the best description of the damage of feminism comes unwittingly from Hans Christian Andersen in his story The Snow Queen. He describes a mirror made by the wickedest magician – 'a real demon':

"One day he made a mirror which had the magic power of making everything good and beautiful that looked into it, shrink almost to nothing; but all the things which were useless and ugly were thoroughly magnified and grew worse. The loveliest landscapes reflected in this mirror would look like boiled spinach and the very nicest people would turn ugly…and their faces so distorted that no one could recognise them…."

You get the idea.

Feminism was created from the hearts of women who sometimes were damaged and twisted. And sometimes they were literally sick. Others may have been genuinely well intentioned and imaginative but their product was poisonous because they were working with assumptions and lies.

Relationships between men and women are the bedrock of our society and provide a template through which other conflicts of interest or perceived imbalances of power can be resolved. This would unleash enormous constructive potential; the benefits would be great. But this can't happen while women are trying to copy men rather than understand them or while they are busy telling men what they should be and what they should do. Understanding requires dialogue and this can't happen while women dictate the terms. If women put a bit more effort into understanding men they might find out more about themselves. And then they could revel in being women in their multitude of guises and let men get on with just being men.

Dr. Walid A. Farhat, “Known Genital Mutilator,” of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric “treatment”

Gary Costanza · 19 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

SickKids of Toronto, Ontario has a “clinic” that encourages and performs infant genital mutilation on *Un*SickKids, ironically a symptom of a sick society that lacks medical ethics and devalues boys, men, and male sexuality.

Dr. Walid A. Farhat has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He ‘works’ at the Newborn Circumcision Clinic at SickKids of Toronto, Ontario. He either performs or supervises infant genital mutilations, also known as circumcisions, on healthy (not SickKids) newborn baby boys, and alas, for no medical reason.

He knows this amputation of healthy tissue is unnecessary, unethical, and risky, yet he continues to perform it and/or force others to perform it, under threat of termination.

Here’s his bio from the website:

“Walid A. Farhat, MD, FRCSC, FACS, GPLLM
Paediatric Urologist, The Hospital for Sick Children
Professor, Department of Surgery, University of Toronto
Associate Surgeon-in-Chief of Education
Surgical Undergraduate Coordinator
University of Toronto

Dr. Walid Farhat is a Professor with the Department of Surgery, University of Toronto, and a Paediatric Urologist with The Hospital for Sick Children. After joining SickKids in 1998, Farhat has gradually developed a unique niche within the urology field in the education, clinical and research arenas. His most recent expansion of practice has been within the medicolegal area after completing his Global Professional Master of Laws with the University of Toronto

Farhat is the Fellowship Program Director in the Division of Urology, as well as the Associate Surgeon in Chief of Education for the Department of Surgery. He is continuously involved with the hands on education, and successfully initiated and organized the Pediatric Urology Laparoscopy Course (PULC) for the past 11 years, teaching the basic skills of laparoscopy through didactic lectures and hands on pig lab (www.sickkids.ca/lap).

His research in robotics, investigates the mechanical restrictions in small animal models and the technical and ergonomic details for successful multi-quadrant surgical approaches. To enhance collaboration and fasten the development of robotic surgical tools, Farhat has created a robotic forumhttp://lab.research.sickkids.ca/purc/forums/. Farhat also oversees several science research projects in urinary bladder tissue engineering, and the basic structure of the urinary bladder, its physical characteristics with particular emphasis on the early stages of urinary bladder development in animal models.”

Under “What to expect during your visit,” we read:

> You and your baby will meet a urology fellow and a registered nurse. Before circumcision, the doctor who will perform the procedure will speak with you. This is a discussion of the reasons for circumcision, the benefits, risks and alternatives, and ensures that you understand what will happen during the procedure. You will have lots of time to ask questions.
>
> You should discuss what pain control measures will be used during and after the procedure. Your doctor may use a local anesthetic. Swaddling, oral sugar solutions or acetaminophen (Tylenol) may be given as well, but > should not be used as the primary method of pain relief.

>
> To perform the procedure, the doctor places the baby on a special table and cleans the baby's penis and foreskin. First, the baby gets medicine so he won't feel pain. This might be a cream on the skin or a needle into the base of the penis. Then they use special tools to cut off the foreskin. The doctor completes the procedure by wrapping a bandage (called gauze) around the baby's penis to protect it from rubbing against the diaper.
>
> The baby may cry during the procedure and for a short while afterward. Local anesthesia can greatly reduce your baby's discomfort.

The baby will feel pain, despite the above lie, and the alternative to this is no circumcision , with no risks, unlike this procedure that results in scarring, loss of sensitivity, loss of foreskin function, sometimes lifetime complications needing further surgery, and death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the controversy and risks of circumcision, you can read that here and watch videos here.

Dr. Farhat's practice information follows:

SickKids
555 University Avenue
Toronto, Ontario
Canada
M5G 1X8

General inquiries: 416-813-1500
Patient information/locating: 416-813-6621

> Dr. Walid A. Farhat, "Known Genital Mutilator," of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric "treatment" https://t.co/sQgZEmPrBE #circumcision #MGM pic.twitter.com/a6r7suCFFs
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) June 19, 2018

Julia Gillard achieves the impossible

Mark Dent · 22 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

There's a silly little game played by people when someone is going to deliver a speech. The bigger the occasion and audience, the funnier it is to the participants. It goes something like this:

"I'll bet you can't use the word elephant in your speech." The speaker may be talking about the economy, fashion, sport or ship building. There is always a gasp of delight from those in on the secret gag if the speaker manages to place the word somewhere and use it in a manner which raises no eyebrows.

Julia Gillard, former Prime Minister of Australia, must surely have been involved in a similar stunt a few weeks ago when she penned an article on suicide prevention in Australia. Gillard was recently appointed the Chair of Beyond Blue, an organization devoted to addressing the scourge of depression and suicide in our nation.

Now, her version of the game differed in one key aspect. The challenge set before her was an astonishing one, which few people would think anyone could possibly accomplish and yet she did it with aplomb. Julia had to write a detailed article about suicide in Australia without using the word men.

Challenges on a par with the difficulty of this one might be:

- Writing an essay on the greatest English writers in history without mentioning Shakespeare
- Writing about the origins of Christianity without once referring to Jesus.
- Writing a book about space exploration without mentioning the moon landing.

When Gillard was the leader of our country she was very concerned about another serious issue- violence. Well, to be more accurate, it was a particular kind of violence, the kind which harmed women and children. She created a National Plan to Reduce Violence Against Women and Their Children.

I know it's been said before but the words "their children" feel like a kick in the testicles to every father who reads them. I suppose that is exactly what they are meant to be.

But back to this multi-million-dollar national plan.

Here we have an issue which incontestably affects men, women and children. There is overwhelming evidence researched by many experts in the field of family violence which shows that this issue is far from being one which almost exclusively harms women. Nevertheless, Julia and her government decided to create a national plan which unapologetically focuses in both name and action upon one subset of the people affected.

The Federal Government estimates that approximately $1.9 billion is spent every four years on addressing domestic violence and sexual assault through payments, programs and services.

*Of this $1.9 billion, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be directed to phone counselling services for men affected by domestic violence. (*Hey-we did get a mention!) That equates to 0.07% of the total funding for domestic violence victims.

Julia explains why the focus is upon women (and their children).

One in three Australian women experience physical or sexual violence, but only one in five report the violence. Another manipulated figure which fails to hold up under scrutiny but let's just take it at face value. When this woman has actually appeared in a video presentation about violence against women where she claimed "One billion women will be raped or beaten in their lifetime.." – you know you are dealing with someone who doesn't place a strong emphasis on facts.

"One billion women will be raped or beaten in their lifetime.."

Gillard fails to provide any statistics on violence perpetrated upon males in the home in her national plan. As Prime Minister you would think she would care about all of the citizens in her country. So how does this woman tackle the problem of suicide which overwhelmingly affects males and the people who love them?

She begins her article with these paragraphs.

About 200 Australians attempt suicide every day and in about 96% of cases, the attempt does not result in death. But sadly, that doesn't mean those people are out of danger.

In fact, no group is at greater risk of suicide than those who have previously tried to end their lives.

You have to acknowledge the clever way in which Julia has written something which could be called "true" without telling the truth. The truth being that being male is what makes your chances of death by suicide most likely.

I read the statistics released by Mindframe: Facts and stats about suicide in Australia, which bases its data on The Australian Bureau of Statistics.

It tells us:

Consistently over the past 10 years, the number of suicide deaths was approximately 3 times higher in males than females. In 2016, 75.1% of people who died by suicide were male.

- Overall, the age-specific suicide rate in 2016 was highest in men aged 85 or above (34.0 per 100,000), which has been the age group with the highest rate since 2011.*
- *With the exception of those aged over 85, in 2016 age-specific suicide rates were highest among middle age men (i.e.30-34 and 40-54 age groups).

Rather than state the raw facts about suicide and who is most likely to commit it, something which one would hope the Chair of Beyond Blue would be aware, Gillard chose to write about those who attempt suicide and how we can stop a second attempt. Funnily enough, it is women who attempt suicide more than men. The blokes seem to be far more serious about the business of ending their lives.

Why are we not pouring two billion dollars into a problem which sees over 2000 men killing themselves each year?* That's 44 men a week! Where are the hundreds of millions of dollars in funding being directed into prevention of male suicide -particularly in the most vulnerable age categories and in our rural communities?

Approximately fifty women being killed in family violence incidents a year is considered to be an epidemic. I don't know what word we should use to describe the deaths of more than 2000 men annually.

Let me give you a feel for the way in which Gillard makes the word men disappear while writing about an issue which overwhelmingly affects men. Remember, her justification for making women and children the focus of the billion-dollar funding by her government was that women were twice as likely to be victims. Well, it just so happens that men are three times more likely to be victims of suicide.

Let's list her manipulative ways. Rather than mention men she says:

- Dads, mums, sons, daughters, neighbours and co-workers
- people
- they
- individual
- the person
- eight people will die today

There is absolutely no reason why Gillard could not have used the same language when writing about her domestic violence initiative but she chose to be very gender specific in her language, and more appallingly, in her funding. Men were given a tiny crumb and very brief mention in her national plan, yet they constitute at least a third of all victims.

Three quarters of suicide victims are male. Two thirds of domestic violence victims (fatalities) are female. The gap between gender in the two is wider in the area of suicide yet no-one refers to the scourge of suicide as a "gendered issue" nor do they focus almost exclusively on one gender when it is warranted by the standard set on family violence.

Who are the grovelling cowards at Beyond Blue who hear this woman speak and read what she writes and refuse to stand up and say, "Enough!"

The real crime is the fact that a self- proclaimed radical feminist could have been given such a prominent position for a problem which should be branded a male crisis.

Once again, we are left to ponder why anyone at Beyond Blue thought a woman who sees a misogynist wherever she turns and probably thinks one lurks under her bed would be the ideal choice to be the voice and face of a problem which has had a devastating impact on the men of Australia. It is a decision of indescribable stupidity and unforgivable ignorance.

References:

*(In 2016, preliminary data showed a total of 2,866 deaths by suicide 2,151 males (17.9 per 100,000) and 715 females (5.9 per 100,000). There were 3,027 deaths in 2015 (12.7 per 100,000) www.mindframe-media.info/for-media/reporting-suicide/facts-and-stats

www.oneinthree.com.au/

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/julia-gillard-we-all-have-a-role-to-play-in-putting-a-stop-to-suicide/news-story/d8a52cb7aa38f6b1895a3cc3d8e744fc

www.leadershipforwomen.com.au/images/docs/FACT%20SHEET%20NATIONAL%20PLAN%20ON%20VIOLENCE%20AGAINST%20WOMEN.pdf

https://www.theguardian.com/society/2016/mar/09/highest-australian-suicide-rate-in-13-years-driven-by-men-aged-40-to-44

https://www.beyondblue.org.au/

Consumer Reports veers off into PC territory, advocates laws to muzzle women's choice and the free marketplace

Gary Costanza · 23 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Consumer Reports succumbs to feminist propaganda that sees targeted marketing as a "Pink Tax"

I wrote a letter to the editor at Consumer Reports concerning something in the "Building a Better World, Together" section of the June 2018 issue that announced CR's awareness of something they call the "Pink Tax"

> You may not have heard of it, but if you're a woman, you've almost certainly been affected by it.
>
> The so-called pink tax is a nickname for a phenomenon whereby women are charged more than men for virtually identical products and services, from razors and soaps to dry cleaning and haircuts. In many cases the only difference between the "male" and "female" versions is color.

Under "What You Can Do" they suggest readers write their representatives to support the Pink Tax Repeal Act.

I think some feminist ideologues will find discrimination anywhere they search, and here they wrongly claim it happens in the free marketplace.

I've been a longtime subscriber to Consumer Reports, and when its' current president and CEO, Marta Tellado took over, I knew it was only a matter of time that CR would stray from its' solid record of consumer advocacy and research. Nothing is wrong with CR exploring questions of immoral or illegal business practices, but to embrace nonexistent causes without independent research is unacceptable.

Here's Marta's bio:

> Marta L. Tellado became the eighth President and CEO of Consumer Reports in 2014 following more than 25 years of experience as a frontline advocate for social justice. Born in Cuba and raised in New Jersey, Marta has dedicated her public service career to a range of issues, including consumer advocacy, economic fairness, and civil rights.

Ironically, one supporter, AxThePinkTax.com sells and markets waxing services to, I assume, women:

> At European Wax Center, we are working together with our partners, on behalf of women, to help level the playing field where inequalities exist. Women need to know about The Pink Tax, so they can be empowered to #AxThePinkTax.

I'll note here if my letter gets published, however I will post it to their FB page regardless.

My letter:

"As a non-political organization, CR should refrain from taking up unsubstantiated causes such as the so-called "Pink Tax" ["Tackling the Pink Tax," Building a Better World, Together].

The "Pink Tax" is a misnomer that describes targeted marketing and women's buying preferences as a tax, which it is not, so please don't give credence to a term not based in fact. It should be no surprise that companies market to kids, men, upscale buyers, penny-pinchers, and of course, women.

Most of these products, if not all, are more than a different color. They have features that women prefer or they wouldn't be produced and women wouldn't buy. Some journalists have debunked the notion that there are a multitude of "virtually identical products" that are priced higher for women, showing that most products targeted to women ARE different and women buy them for that reason.

You advocate laws that seek to regulate the free marketplace that is the cornerstone of free enterprise and capitalism. Is the intent to tax the violators? Ban marketing to women? How would that work? If it's pink (a stereotype) or if it says "for women," is that the criterion?

Besides taking your advice to buy the "blue" product, your equality strategy should also tell women to forego spending billions on make-up, handbags, and expensive shoes and the like to save money just like men who don't buy that or buy the simpler and cheaper shoe or wallet and forego make-up altogether.

There are entire industries that women have created, support, and spend their money on, and the men's equivalent product is non-existent (free). If women want to spend the same as men on handbags, make-up, high heel shoes, and jewelry, they could, and that would be zero dollars!

Why do men pay more for life and auto insurance? You'd be right if you said they're more of a risk. But wouldn't that be a "blue tax" regardless, if we make the same false assumption about the "pink tax?"

Will you tell women to stop paying huge amounts for designer make-up, shoes, and handbags because they don't need them, they're overpriced, and they should buy (or don't buy) what men buy or don't buy.

The fact is women know what they're buying. And they sometimes prefer products for them that are made for them, and don't mind paying for them. Obviously it's a winning strategy for marketers and their customers. Women buy what they like, and for some things price or "necessity" doesn't matter.

I'm all for women saving their "fashion" money and walk around "make-up free" like men, but will you tell women that too? And do you really think that's what women want?

If you're selling less of the blue product vs. the pink product, you may want to discount the blue one. Basic marketing and economics, yet you propose banning this basic Constitutional and capitalist freedom.

It's more of a male discount than a pink tax as men don't buy many things as often as women, if at all. Women influence about 83% of all consumer spending. Why else do you think that more than ¾ of store floor space is geared toward them?

CR, do the research with an unbiased view – look at all sides. If you stray into politics, get it right."

The beginning of the end

Mark Dent · 25 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If ever a moment encapsulated the state of utter insanity we have reached in this country it was captured on Friday 15th June evening during an epic rant by a rabid feminist on a show called The Project. The female anchor was delivering a disgustingly misandric monologue due to the fact that a woman had been raped and murdered in a park in Melbourne. Her sadly predictable tirade raged about the fact that policemen continued to say women needed to take precautions when going out in an effort to lessen their chances of being assaulted. She screamed,

> Why are we asking women to change their behavior instead of telling men to stop raping? It's time for all men to change….."

What was most appalling was the fact that two of the regular male hosts sat in mute, shame faced silence throughout her rant. They literally dared not betray a twitch of dissent or flicker of objection to being branded by the fact that they shared the gender of the assailant. Then this woman turned and finally decided to include these sacrificial lambs in her poisonous attack on masculinity.

> Guys…you have to talk to your mates. They must understand that violence against women is unacceptable ……"

And these two men nodded like petrified sheep facing the slaughterman's knife. They had the dazed look of a rabbit caught in the spotlight and the only words to be spoken by one of these quivering cowards were:

> Well done, Lisa….so brave"

It was stunning. It was truly shocking. This is what we have come to. Men mutely accepting the role designated to them by a pampered, multi -millionaire who claims to belong to an oppressed, frightened group too scared to leave their homes.

Our newspapers and screens gave saturation coverage to the candlelight vigil where thousands gathered to show their solidarity with women and condemnation of men. The usual suspects lined up to give their vicious bitter take on what this murder told us about men and masculinity. The Prime Minister and leader of the Opposition party held candles as did the Premier of Victoria. They all spoke of men having to change their behavior and the fact that we can prevent another murder by learning to respect women. What made this all the more galling was the fact that a trial was taking place during the same week in which a woman had been charged with burning her boyfriend alive last year in Sydney. The coverage was minimal and there were of course, no candlelight vigils for the poor man whose parents saw him screaming as he burned.

How sick are these men who gleefully turn upon their innocent brothers? They are scum. How disgustingly twisted must a man be to so readily leap onto the man hating bandwagon? How self -loathing? Is it an attempt to win votes? Are they impressing a woman into bed? Perhaps they are simply unwilling to push against the overwhelming tide of opinion expressed by the people who hold the power and the platform in our media, education system, entertainment industry and politics?

Read the words spoken by the Premier of our fair state. They were also posted onto his Facebook page.

> 'Eurydice Dixon was 22 years old. She was an aspiring comedian. Smart, funny. She lived in the inner north. Surrounded by friends…
>
> "In a few days, women across Melbourne will gather in Princes Park for a vigil of her life.
>
> "And they will do so firm in the knowledge that Eurydice died because of her attacker's decisions – not > because of her own.

>
> "They're right. And we need to accept that fact, too.
>
> "We'll never change a thing until we do.
>
> "We'll never change this culture of violence against women. All women.
>
> "We'll never change the fact that one woman in this country dies every week at the hands of a partner or former partner – someone they loved, in the safety of their own home.
>
> "We'll keep asking "Why didn't she leave him?" instead of asking "Why did he hurt her?".
>
> "We'll keep asking "Why was she alone in the dark?" instead of asking "Why was he?".
>
> "We'll keep ignoring the real problem, instead of actually fixing it.
>
> "So our message to Victorian women is this: Stay home. Or don't.
>
> "Go out with friends at night. Or don't.
>
> "Go about your day exactly as you intend, on your terms.
>
> "Because women don't need to change their behaviour.
>
> "Men do."

How do sick freaks like this man, Dan Andrews, continue to hold positions of power? Every word he wrote is sheer bullshit. None of it makes sense. However, in the midst of the torrent of hatred of men which these events always unleash, I saw some remarkable proof that the tide is most definitely turning.

There is a small but ever-growing light of hope shining amidst the frenzied male bashing storm which would not have existed a decade ago. Aside from some excellent videos made by Australian YouTubers, Gary Orsum and "Bearing", there have been a number of articles in mainstream newspapers pointing out the madness of this predictable feminist assault on masculinity. This is the most significant aspect of the pushback. We have always had our rebellious individuals on the fringes of society, attempting to speak truth to power. But now that rebellion is beginning to manifest itself in media outlets with huge audiences.

Nichola Wright (managing editor at LibertyWorks) responded to the Facebook post by the Premier of Victoria with these words:

> The wrongness of Andrews' comments can be seen if we replace 'men' with another identity group. In Perth in 2016, a lesbian woman murdered teenager Aaron Pajich and buried him under a concrete slab. Imagine a Facebook post that said: 'Our message to teenage boys is this: Go about your day exactly as you intend, on your terms. Because teenage boys don't need to change their behaviour. Lesbians do.' Sounds jarring, doesn't it? That is because it is wrong to say lesbians must share the blame for the actions of one psychopath. And so it is for men, too.
>
> Telling men they must 'do better' and stop 'tolerating' violence against women does nothing to prevent violent behaviour. It ignores the fact that the majority of men already reject violence against women. The tendency to blame society as a whole for the actions of a few individuals was brilliantly criticised by Ronald Reagan: 'We must reject the idea that every time a law's broken, society is guilty rather than the lawbreaker. It is time to restore the American precept that each individual is accountable for his actions.'

As someone who has been red pilled for decades I could only have dreamed of reading even the most minimal pushback against the notion of men holding collective responsibility for the crimes of a tiny fraction of the male population. The journalists who penned two of the stronger articles (both female) ridiculed the notion that there was an epidemic of violence against women and eviscerated the attack on men.

Another well known media commentator, Andrew Bolt, wrote an article which tore apart a few feminist lies, the first being that two women die every week at the hands of a man who once said, ”I love you.”

Bolt did a little research and discovered that the statistics reveal much closer to one woman dies a week and when you dig a little further you discover other facts overlooked by these liars. He writes:

> I have checked many of the cases and found a picture far more complicated than the one being portrayed, of a supposed culture of male violence that leaves no wife safe.
>
> For a start, that list includes at least two women killed by other women. Others, including Dixon herself, were not killed by an intimate partner.
>
> One was murdered during an aggravated burglary, and another when a thief tried to steal her car.
>
> Sons or grandsons have been accused of the killings of some of the women: one was a schizophrenic and another a drug addict who also killed his father. These don’t seem to have been killings driven by men’s attitude to women.
>
> Then there were at least two killings of Aboriginal women, one in a pack attack said to have involved other women.
>
> Aboriginal women are in fact more than 30 times more likely to end up in hospital from domestic violence, which suggests we should worry more about Aboriginal culture.
>
> At least two of the women were killed by men who also killed a male — and that should remind us that two-thirds of murder victims are, in fact, men.
>
> Then there’s Nancy Barclay, who was 83 when she was killed, allegedly by her terminally ill husband. Police say he told them she had Alzheimer’s disease and that he strangled her to put her out of her misery.
>
> So, no, this list of 31 murders suggests many more factors than a culture of male violence.
>
> Let’s not blind ourselves to so much else that we should confront.

Having words like this appear in Australia’s biggest selling newspaper is very heartening.

I experienced my usual gut churning, adrenaline charged response when I first watched Lisa Wilkinson spew her vile hatred and dirty, manipulative lies. But in the days since I have come to see that we have made progress in the “real world” outside the media bubble and gender study classes.

It is evident in the comments sections in newspapers and online whenever issues like this are presented as a problem for men to solve. The readers are educated and passionate enough about this endless propaganda to take the time to write. I note that one of our greatest exponents of exposing the fraudulent nature of feminism in the comment sections below articles is “Bev” who I have also seen commenting on AVFM articles over the years.

This is another sign of enormous progress which can so easily be overlooked when we are constantly subjected to a barrage of endless misandry in the media. It is clear that despite the overwhelming power feminists have at their disposal through their dominance of all of the social institutions that influence thought and opinion in society- the vast majority of people in the suburbs and country towns of Australia see through their lies and hatred.

AVFM, and other websites alongside the articulate, provocative YouTubers and Facebook users, have made a real difference. Keep fighting my brothers and sisters. The cracks in the dam wall are real and they are widening just a little with each passing year.

I urge you to check out the links below (a few are pay-walled) and read some of the very heartening words about these constant attacks on men.

Sources:

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/andrew-bolt/andrew-bolt-violence-of-men-not-full-story/news-story/69711e31d4560d3b746ccf61c8b82594

https://www.theaustralian.com.au/news/inquirer/eurydice-dixon-rape-culture-facts-just-dont-fit/news-story/fdb16c36d04d48889fb4e181fb98e913

https://libertyworks.org.au/eurydice-dixon-lets-direct-out-rage-at-the-right-targets/https://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/rendezview/this-isnt-victim-blaming-its-common-sense/news-story/541ed3a57862600398c43448a2f60c0b

https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/personal-safety-future-violence-andy-gough https://www.smh.com.au/national/nsw/woman-charged-with-murder-over-fire-that-engulfed-sydney-granny-flat-killing-her-boyfriend-20180614-p4zle0.html

Videos:

Gary Orsum on the evil Lisa Wilkinson-host of The Project

Bearing takes apart The Project and Lisa Wilkinson

The Project

Morally Gray

Feminism: toxic masculinity

Gerard Nicol · 26 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

On the 14th of June this year, a 46 year old Sydney woman was was charged with burning her ex-boyfriend to death last October.

It is alleged that she disabled the water mains, to ensure that the fire could not be put out, and then set the granny flat at the back of the man's parent's house alight to ensure that he perished.

The man died 2 days later from his burns, in the arms of his mother and father.

Three weeks before the women was charged, another women had doused her male partner in gasoline and set him alight, all while their 11 year old son was in the next room listening to his father scream.

> But is this typical female behavior; are women capable of being violent to men?

Well, we will probably never know, because even before the female perpetrator has a chance to accuse her victim of being abusive to her, society is already doing it on her behalf.

Even if there wasn't abuse, it would appear that a simple unfounded accusation that the man sought the comfort of another woman, is enough to blame the victim for his own injuries.

> In the eyes of Katie Kurly, if a man cheats on a woman, that's enough to excuse setting him on fire and exposing his son to his screams of pain.

There is no accusation that the man did anything to deserve being set on fire, but if he had been having an affair, perhaps the woman would have been better off trying to run down her husband and his lover in her car, because the media seems to think that's pretty amusing.

But, according to the Australian Bureau of Statistics ("ABS"), this violent behavior is not typical of women; it is typical of men, who commit these crimes 5 times more often than violent women.

> This has resulted in the accusations, that men are inherently violent, that masculinity itself is toxic, and that all female violence can be explained as self defense against a violent majority.

The evidence seems irrefutable; murder is murder, there is a dead woman, and the man killed her, but as we can see from the comments of Katie Kurly, even when a man is burned alive, he has to be to at fault because women don't do anything to men unless they have good reason.

If the ABS are simply reporting domestic violence deaths from murder convictions, and we know that women are half as likely to be charged, and half as likely to be convicted, one could argue that these figures are not reflective of anything other than an anti male, pro female bias that exists, not only in the legal system, but in the wider community

> Feminists argue that male violence towards women exists because society tolerates violence against women, but the comments of feminists clearly demonstrate an acceptance of violence towards men.

Recently, a grass roots Australian group calling itself Domestic Violence Awareness Australia, started collating news reports of domestic violence deaths, and over the past two years they have found the ABS statistics are not reflective of domestic violence deaths as a whole.

So what is going on here, well let me explain…

1. The ABS statistics are binary, they presume that every murdered woman was killed by a man, even though 7, of the 19 women killed this year were killed by women.
2. Children are excluded from the statistics, and this year, of the 20 male children killed (no girls have been killed), women have killed 75% of those boys. Almost 1 in 3 domestic violence deaths are people below 18, and 100% of them are male.
3. These statistics are based upon news reports of women being arrested for killing others. They do not reflect the possible innocence of the women (or men), or the possibility that the woman will be convicted of manslaughter, and not murder.
4. Each of the DVA deaths have a name attached to them, yet the ABS stats don't.

> Unfortunately the ABS do not publish their raw statistics so that a simple comparison can be done to determine if the DVA statistics have captured all of the reported deaths.

In the information age, there is no excuse for not releasing raw government data, there is no excuse for releasing manipulated data, and there is no excuse for using data that is half a decade old.

Governments need to stop controlling access to the data they collect because every citizen, male and female, has a right to know the raw truth about violence and crime; especially when those statistics are being used to justify hatred against a group of people in that society.

> Given the negative attitudes towards men, and the positive attitudes towards women, one can not determine that there isn't a serious legal and social bias at play here.

For instance, it is unheard of for anybody to publicly suggest that a woman, who had been set on fire by a man, probably brought it upon herself because she was unfaithful; and even if someone did, society would be quick to point out that women should never be judged for infidelity.

In an equitable society, we must ask ourselves whether or not, men face extreme levels of prejudice, both as victims and accused perpetrators of violence, but instead, the Australian Greens, a party who have held the balance of power in Australia, are discussing their vision for a world where women are never imprisoned.

Time	Session 2A	Speakers	Session 2B	Speakers
12.55 -2.10	"Peace in our time"? What's the road to a peaceful world? A peaceful Australia?	Sen. Lee Rhiannon (facilitator) Adam Broinowski Gem Romuld (ICAN)	Change the rules or break the rules? Rebalancing power at work – what do we need to do?	Adam Bandt MP Erima Dall Tom Raue
2.15 - 3.30	Justice not Imprisonment: Abolishing Women's prisons. Can we end incarceration?	Kat Armstrong Helen Eason Facilitator: Dr Mehreen Faruqi MLC	Climate change, climate justice and just transitions for urban, regional and front-line communities.	Sinead Frances-Coen (Newcastle Greens) Sven Teske (UTS) Anna Nadolny (ANU) Facilitator Danielle Wheeler (Greens Cr Hawkesbury Greens)
3.30 - 4.10	Closing plenary	Report back – Responses to each session 1

> Only time will tell if the women who set men on fire will be charged, convicted and imprisoned, chances are they won't be, but one thing is for certain, as a society we show no sympathy for male victims of crime.

If a woman kills a man, it's just too simple for society to turn a blind eye, and assume the man deserved it, even if there is no evidence of this, because the reality is that nobody wants to send women to prison; so she will be offered an attractive plea deal, the charges will be dropped all together.

Instead, we now openly discuss masculinity as being toxic, and blame all violence, no matter who committed it, on men, based upon the belief that men have power, and exercise it though patriarchal violence.

After all, the statistics show that men are 10 times more likely to be victims of violent crime, and that in most of those cases, it is someone else's son who commits that violence.

> But has it ever occured to anybody that male violence, is a product of a society that has no real value of male life; while at the same time, highly valuing the life of every women?

> In a world where male life has no value, and feminists argue that it is completely OK to hate men, would it not > seem more probable that male violence is a manifestation of the lowstatus of men?

Boys in Australia are dragged into school halls and lectured by feminists not to ever hit a woman; all while their female peers look up at them as perpetrators of future violence.

> In such an environment, is it any wonder that the statistics collected by Domestic Violence Australia have no resemblance to the statistics published by the Australian Bureau of Statistics?

Perhaps one day we may discover a true irony of the advice pinned to government Facebook pages around the world; The same pages that claim domestic violence is a gendered crime committed by men, against women.

Even if only one in one million perpetrators of domestic violence were women, one would think that feminists would insist that girls also be forced to pledge to never to hit a man, women or child; but feminism is not about gender equality, it is about shaming, reputation destruction, power and control.

> Feminists will always defend a woman accused of violence, while condemning every man, all before the legal process has even started; the very definition of prejudice.

*Connect with Gerard Nicol on his LinkedIn page.

Men are not the problem. Masculinity is not the problem.

Robert Brockway · 26 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is a reproduction of the text of a change.org petition started by Robert Brockway. Readers are encouraged to review and sign the petition which can be found here. Readers may also wish to leave their thoughts on the original Facebook thread linked below. –Ed

A young woman, Eurydice Dixon, was recently raped and murdered in Victoria, Australia. Following this Mr Daniel Andrews, the Premier of Victoria, stated in a Facebook post that men needed to change their behaviour in order to reduce violence against women.

Mr Andrews should not be calling on men to change their behaviour because it is not intrinsically male behaviour that is the problem. Most men are law abiding citizens who are far more likely to help a woman than ever hurt her, and this is true even for women they do not know.

If Mr Andrews believes that he can get a group of people to collectively choose to change their behaviour then he should simply ask criminals to change their behaviour. Most people would find it self-evident that this will not work.

Increasing numbers of Australian men are running out of patience with being collectively blamed for things they didn't do and would never do.

Mr Andrews' call for men to change their behaviour is nothing more than political grandstanding at the expense of men. Further, his statements do nothing to help women in this country.

Victoria Police have a suspect in custody for the rape and murder of Eurydice Dixon. Let justice be done.

If Mr Andrews seeks to reduce the rate of violent crime in Victoria he should take the time to look at research in to the causes of violent crime and establish evidence based policies to reduce violent crime. Casually blaming innocent people for the actions of others will do nothing.

I call on Mr Andrews to retract his claim that men need to change their behaviour and apologise to the men of Australia.

Women and the 34 hour work week

Paul Elam · 30 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Original
Article: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-5814559/Men-Mars-women-Venus-terrifying-truth-experts-call-shortened-work-week-girls.html

Men Work Longer Hours Than
Women: https://www.forbes.com/sites/karinagness/2016/06/30/new-report-men-work-longer-hours-than-women/#6d94fd2118b4

Subscribe to An Ear for Men here: https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCXNNG0ej_6rU9SxCZ4dyq6w

A man takes a stand

Mark Dent · 4 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I have a new hero. His name is David Leyonhjelm and he is a senator in our federal parliament. Last week he caused a furore here in Australia when he told a rabid feminist senator Sarah Hanson Young to "stop shagging men." When she confronted him with confected outrage he simply told her to "fuck off."

Why did he say it?

I have already written about the rape and murder of a young woman in Melbourne a few weeks ago. The issue of protection for women was being discussed in the Senate. Let Mr. Leyonhjelm explain what happened in his own words.

> "She called out something that I'm 99% sure was 'If only men would stop raping women,' so she was saying that in the context of why they need something for self defense (mace was suggested), the inference being that men are collectively responsible for such attacks as happened in Melbourne. I responded by saying 'Stop shagging men.'
>
> "She was effectively saying 'the enemy is men.' I was responding by saying, 'you're sleeping with the enemy'. What I was objecting to was the misandry, the blaming of men for the actions of individual criminals."

What followed can only be imagined. The media melted and expressed outrage over this dinosaur..this uncouth relic from a dark, bygone era.

Ms. Sarah Hanson Young demanded an apology from Leyonhjelm as well as his resignation. She made a few grand speeches about not remaining silent anymore, and accused him of slut shaming, and threw in a mention of her young daughter.

As always, one man's criticism/comments directed at one woman, immediately becomes a slur on all women.

Sarah said:

> "Senator Leyonhjem should do the decent thing and resign. It is a sad refection on society that even in 2018 attacks like these occur to women after they have spoken out about sexism, sexual harassment and abuse in their workplace and daily lives.
>
> As a woman, a sister, and a mother, I have a responsibility to stand up against this treatment. I will not be intimidated or bullied by offensive and sexist slurs on my professional reputation."

Well, the Prime Minister stepped in and demanded an apology from Leyonhjelm. Other ministers spoke of his disrespect and called upon him to apologize. I, along with many Australians waited for what we thought would be the inevitable back down and cowering mea culpa.

To the unbounded delight of the silent majority Leyonhjelm not only refused to apologise, but called the Prime Minister a "soft cock" and a "pussy" for failing to condemn misandry. These words could not be more appropriate.

David's refusal to back down is only bettered by the way he took his defiance to the next level each time he was interviewed. When he appeared on the notoriously feminist program, "The Project" (home of Lisa Wilkinson who delivered the "all men are guilty rant" I covered in the article The Beginning of the End) he defended a tweet in which he called Angela Bishop a 'bigoted bitch' for refusing to allow a male panelist on Studio Ten explain exactly what the term misandry means.

He engaged in a heated debate with the presenter Hamish MacDonald on ABC Radio National. Here's a taste of what transpired:

"What's your problem with women?" MacDonald asked.

"I think you're mischaracterizing it as sexist abuse when it is just abuse," Senator Leyonhjelm responded. "I am an Australian. I will tell people they're bastards or bitches or to fuck off, irrespective of their gender. If I think they should shut up, I'll tell them to shut up.

I don't discriminate between men and women. I will tell them both equally if I think they are wrong I will call them out, I will tell them to shut up," he said.

Leyonhjelm explained why he called our Prime Minister a pussy yesterday after the Prime Minister called on him to apologise to Senator Hanson-Young.

"Misandry is as bad as misogyny. The Prime Minister is on record as having called out misogyny. Fine. I'm happy to call it out myself. But he should also call out misandry. It's equally as bad. It's also sexism. And for not doing so, he's a doormat basically. Senator Leyonhjelm said.

A month ago, immediately after the murder and rape of Eurydice Nixon, Senator Hanson-Young said:

"It's not women's fault that men behave like morons and pigs!"

Leyonhjelm took this to be an attack on all men which it clearly was. Simply apply the fliperoo. Imagine if the Prime Minister had said:

'It's not men's fault that women behave like pigs and morons!" Senator Hanson -Young would have been leading the lynch mob, rope and torch in hand. She is a most vile hypocrite.

There are many more admirable actions Senator Leyonhjelm has taken in his defence of men and criticism of feminism. Last year he eviscerated two representatives from the Violence Against Women campaign. You must watch the fifteen-minute clip. It is shocking to see how ill prepared they were for his questions and how deceitful and deliberately misguided the whole domestic violence industry is.

In a much briefer clip, our hero chose not to wear a White Ribbon last year when every man and his dog was wearing one with pride. Watch his blunt, brief assessment of the value of the White Ribbon day and campaign It is so refreshing in a world peopled by cowards and sycophants.

I received an email from David tonight thanking me for a rather lengthy email of support. I will conclude this little tribute with Senator Leyonhjelm's words.

Dear Mark,

Thank you for contacting me and for your support.

Apologies are only appropriate when there is fault. I am not the party at fault – misandry is not something that can be excused.

Regards,
Senator David Leyonhjelm
Liberal Democratic Party

Links:

https://www.ldp.org.au/membership https://www.ldp.org.au/regular_donation

https://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/rendezview/leyonhjelms-words-are-fair-game-in-a-feminist-world/news-story/86853e7d8092b8f0bac8d3aaa638a887

An interesting take on the consequences of toxic feminism

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0DLZa37LJTg

Senator Leyonhjelm Grills leaders of violence against women campaign

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EdOMSrYE8xU white ribbon day is virtue signaling bullshit says Senator Leyonhjelm

https://www.msn.com/en-au/news/australia/its-the-last-time-im-going-to-be-silent-about-it/ar-AAzv8SS?ocid=spartanntp

https://www.msn.com/en-au/news/australia/turnbull-calls-for-apology-over-hanson-youngs-s-t-shaming/ar-AAzv8SS?ocid=spartanntp https://www.nowtolove.com.au/news/local-news/cory-bernardi-medicare-rape-abortions-42843

https://www.msn.com/en-au/news/australia/studio-10-panel-faces-off-against-david-leyonhjelm-over-b-h-slur/ar-AAzyfoK?ocid=spartanntp

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h-XdsEggPMI

What's the problem with men supporting Jordan Peterson?

Mila Davis · 7 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Jordan Peterson, bestselling author of 12 Rules for Life, University of Toronto psychology professor, and influential public speaker, has taken the media by storm. To the dismay of feminists and the radical left, the number of his supporters keeps skyrocketing. Both, men and women like Peterson, but you would never guess from reading most articles about him. Whether it's The New York Times, The Chronicle, or The Guardian, they all make sure to highlight the maleness of Peterson's followers.

It's not just that an objective observation about the genitalia of his supporters is being made, however. The media just can't stop rubbing, scratching, and clawing. It's as if the aforementioned genitalia are infested with crabs. In the now infamous Channel 4 News interview, journalist Cathy Newman asked Peterson, "Does it bother you that your audience is predominately male?" While at first this question may not appear unusual or even critical, it certainly is. Has anyone ever asked Oprah a similar question about her female audience? Of course not.

So, what's wrong with men supporting Jordan Peterson? Well, I believe it's not just the male sex that bothers his opponents, but the message that men hear through Jordan Peterson. He appeals to their goodness, potential, and their manhood. He leaves his audience feeling empowered.

Empowerment is good, right? Not really. Unless it focuses on women, empowerment is presented as oppressive, patriarchal, sexist, or simply a joke. Consider New York Times' description of Peterson's followers: "Mr. Peterson is a celebrity in the men's rights community, a loose collection of activists who feel [emphasis added] men have been subjugated or betrayed by social progress."

What if, instead of empowering his male supporters, he would shame them about their supposedly toxic masculinity and privilege? What if, instead of telling them to strive for greatness, he would urge them to accept their fate? And what if, instead of pointing out the dangers of political correctness, he would argue against offensive speech? Well, then no one would have a problem with an auditorium filled with mostly men.

But wait, there's more. Feminists don't really like female empowerment, either. They like female victimhood. While they claim that they fight for women's empowerment, it is Jordan Peterson who actually empowers them. He doesn't accept that women are mere victims of oppression or innocent bystanders of their fate. He treats them as accountable individuals who possess agency, aka adults. This is also the reason why the women at Jordan Peterson's talks are presented as some kind of groupies with crushes on him. It's as if his female followers couldn't possibly be reasonable or intelligent. That would destroy the leftist and feminist narrative that Jordan Peterson's message is oppressing women.

Well, I don't have a crush on Jordan Peterson. I am a supporter of him because of his positive influence on men, and because of his influence on me, a reasonable and intelligent woman. Peterson has a far greater understanding of my struggles as a mother and wife than any feminist that marches against "mansplaining" or the cost of tampons. Yes, I understand that he doesn't support the women's movement, but neither do I. The "women's" movement is not representative of the average woman, but representative of the average feminist. That's quite a difference.

And here's what his opponents don't understand (or maybe just don't want to admit): I'm not the only one. I'm just one of many women who identifies herself with Peterson's message. We are women who are coming to understand our capacity for both good and evil, who are ready to take responsibility for our lives, and who don't feel threatened by empowered men.

*Originally published at libertarianhouse.com

Feminism: Qu'est-ce que c'est?

Gerard Nicol · 9 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

For anybody considering becoming a feminist, anti-feminist or something in between, the question has to be asked; what is feminism?

Back in 2004, the National Institute of Health ("NIH") ran a study on Gender Bias titled Why Do Women Like Women More Than Men Like Men? which was published in the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology.

The study found that women have a remarkably stronger in-group bias, and that men lack an inbuilt mechanism to favor their own gender.

The hypotheses given for these clear results was that children bond to their mother more than their father, and that the more favorably men look upon sexual intercourse, the more men show bias towards women (interesting given that this research was done at a time when Freud's Oedipus Complex Theory had been long discredited).

> Or put another way, women have a sexist bias towards women, and some men show bias towards women because they associate unconditional support for women with access to sex (and their mothers).

This isn't research sponsored by the men's rights movement, it is research performed by the world's leading health research body; a body that is often criticized by men for showing feminist biases.

> Taking this into account, there is no other conclusion to reach; feminism is a shield the lazy use to indemnify themselves from criticism of their own personal gender biases.

Now I understand that will outrage feminists, but my conclusion is based on reasoned thought; if feminism was something clearly defined, and constructive to society, I would consider supporting it…

> But it isn't; in fact it is exactly what one would expect from a movement based on women's own bias towards themselves; feminism is chauvinism.

To truly understand what feminism is, one needs to look at the many ways feminism is seen.

Something that is by definition the fight for gender equality.

Feminism is the advocacy for women's rights, based upon the assumption that there is a full set of rights, which all men have, and all women don't.

fem·i·nism
/ˈfemə ˌnizəm/

noun

the advocacy of women's rights on the basis of the equality of the sexes.
synonyms: the women's movement, the feminist movement, women's liberation, female emancipation, women's rights; informal women's lib
"a longtime advocate of feminism"

Any objective analysis of history, shows that men and women have their own respective privileges, and that in the scheme of things, gender is probably the least significant delineator of inequity.

Something that was started to fight for gender equality.

Early feminists fought for women to have the right to vote, while at the same time as they demanded men fight wars to "redeem their promise to women"; a promise to lay down their lives in the protection of women ("Women and children first").

> If early feminists actually believed in gender equality, they wouldn't be expecting men to do anything for them; the least a man could do was stay safely on the safe side of the English channel.

Something that is whatever each person says it is.

This is probably the most common definition I see of feminism; feminism is whatever I say it is.

> Logically, if feminism is the fight for gender equality, how can equality be based on the beliefs of each individual person?

Nothing could be more gynocentric than the belief that each individual woman has the right to define equality in a way that suits her personally; for things to be equal they must be the same for all, and to be the same for all there must be agreement on what that same will be.

The belief in Patriarchy Theory.

Then you have good old Patriarchy Theory which ranges in narrative from:

> "Patriarchy is an unjust social system that is harmful to both men and women. It often includes any social, political, or economic mechanism that evokes male dominance over women"

Through to….

> "The systematic domination of women by men in some or all of society's spheres and institutions".

On one hand it is a social structure that hurts both men and women, and on the other hand it is the domination of women by men, presumably for the benefit of men, who according to other feminists derived no benefit.

Apparently all of this oppression was going on while every man of fighting age had sworn to protect women, and when they failed to do so, had to be shamed into doing so with a white feather.

> Feminists themselves can't agree on what Patriarchy is; mainly because they range from Communists who want to live in the Utopia of Venezuela, to women who drive their Prius to Starbucks for a Latte while Instagramming on their iPhone X that was made by slave labor in another Communist Utopia.

A movement of opposing factions.

As if every feminist doing their own thing wasn't bad enough, when feminists organize themselves into factions, things get even worse; and sometimes violent.

Sex Worker Exclusionary Radical Feminists (SWERFs)

SWERFs are feminists who oppose sex workers. So is sex work empowering or oppressive?

When President Trump directed the FBI to shut down the Backpage.com website because it was being used for sex trafficking of children, feminists criticized the site being shut downas a violation of women's rights.

Trans Exclusionary Radical Feminists (TERFS)

TERFs are feminists who oppose trans women being considered women and have been known to get into street brawls with trans women. So if being a woman sucks so much, why would you exclude a man who identified as one?

According to some feminists, TERFs are like Nazis. So according to feminists themselves, feminism includes feminists who are fascists.

Slut Walkers and the Hijab

Then you have Slut walkers, who organize parades to argue that women should be able to wear whatever they want, but you have the feminist leadership with women like Linda Sarsour who believe in the Islamic requirements of modesty.

Pro Life Feminists

40% of American women believe abortion should be illegal in all/most cases, and women who oppose abortion are banned from attending feminist rallies. So is a feminist allowed to oppose abortion?

Something that has brought benefit to women.

My grandmother was born in 1906, in Bellbird NSW. She was raised on a farm and was taught to grow her own food and cook it.

When she was in her mid-teens, she left school, moved to Sydney, stayed with her aunt and worked as a seamstress, until falling in love with my grandfather.

She had two sons, who she doted over, and she was heartbroken when my grandfather died, leaving her alone for the last 30 years of her life.

> She had a quote by Helen Keller on her kitchen wall that read “I cried because I had no shoes until I met a man who had no feet”.

My grandmother had complete contempt for both sides of politics, and her only goal in life was to be left alone to cook and eat the food she grew.

My grandmother didn’t need the assistance of any man to live her life. She loved men, but she didn’t need their help any more than men needed her’s.

> I doubt many feminists today could go a day without the undivided attention of others.

In conclusion

As I write articles on feminism and gender equality, I am discovering that the vast majority of feminists can’t argue the case for feminism beyond the defense of feminism as an identity.

Of the few that do actually understand feminist ideology, they seem completely aware that if other women knew what feminist ideology was, they would have more of an argument with the casual “coffee shop” feminists, than they would with me as an anti-feminist.

> Feminism is sustained by the nonsensical view that women need feminism because people are sick of hearing the complaints of feminists.

No movement should be above criticism, and all good movements welcome criticism; if feminists actually had a cause to push, they would welcome engagement with those they hoped to win over, but the only engagement they seem to enjoy is the fight.

> At the end of the day, feminism is a fractured movement who can't even agree between themselves on anything other than a divisive vocabulary of terms; terms that serve no purpose other than to cause confrontation or retreat.

Feminists would much rather fight over their identity as feminists, than over gender equality itself, and I am yet to engage with a single one of them who could last 15 minutes of sustained cross-examination on their views.

> How can gender equality ever be achieved until women understand that they have an inherent bias towards their own gender, and until men break free of their association between sex, and showing bias towards women?

*Connect with Gerard Nicol on his LinkedIn page.

The answer to feminism is not gynocentric traditionalism

Peter Ryan · 13 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Dysfunctional Gynocentric Cultural Values Must Go

Black Pigeon Speaks (BPS) did a video recently titled, "ONLY Patriarchy Builds Nations * / & Other Uncomfortable Truths"[1]. The video raised a number of pertinent factors to consider in what makes developed civilisations sustainable and in this article I will provide my thoughts on that and where Western society went wrong.

As the societal consequences from decades of feminism become more and more apparent, there is a push in some corners of society for a return to gynocentric traditionalism[2]. However, the answer to feminism is not returning to promoting gynocentric traditionalism by encouraging chivalry and infantilising women. Gynocentric traditionalism allowed feminism to gain traction in the first place. We got to where we are because we treat men as expendable and we do not hold women accountable for their actions and treat them like they are children. These dysfunctional gynocentric cultural values have allowed the feminist trojan horse to take over society and have led to the marginalisation of men and boys. This marginalisation of men and boys will eventually trigger socioeconomic collapse, or the "Fempocalypse" as Karen Straughan coined it[3].

As BPS's video addresses, there is an obvious need for the population of a country to reproduce and developed nations are at risk of dying out because of fertility rates falling below replacement levels. However I would add that investment in survival of the civilisation is just as important. There is no point breeding if there is no properly functioning civilisation, economy and infrastructure etc to support the survival of the population. Men are required for that to a much larger degree than women and always have been.

Men are responsible for designing, innovating, building, maintaining, running and leading civilisation and no amount of feminist social engineering over the last 50 years has changed that. Indeed in one of BPS's other videos[4], he cites research on how only men pay taxes and how this covers what women as a group take out of the system. He is not the only one to point that out either. Even female consumer spending is substantially fuelled by income earned from their male partners and the result of male dominated industries and male driven economic activity and taxes, ensuring the viability of the female dominated service sector and public sector. There is much less money for women to spend and welfare to use without men participating in the economy.

Like the low fertility rate, a silent time bomb is growing every year from the decades of neglect of boys in the education system and the epidemic of fatherlessness. We can see from the plethora of research available, the enormous costs of fatherlessness[5] and the boy crisis in education[6]. These problems are going to have serious economic, financial and social consequences in the coming decades. Male unemployment and crime will skyrocket. These problems will eventually implode our economies into a depression, governments will default as fewer men will be in a position to pay taxes and social cohesion will erode from widespread crime, poverty, broken families and substance abuse. Society will come apart at the seams socially and economically.

We have seen what happens to societies when large numbers of men become disenfranchised. It does not end well for the society in question. Revolutions and civil war originate from such conditions and it is something to be avoided. Our civilisation runs because of men. If even one percent of men walked away from society for a day, we would have serious problems. If all men walked away from society for one day, it would collapse. Men are not expendable. It is quite the opposite and we are going to pay an enormous price as a society if we fail to acknowledge men actually do have value.

Feminism, the epidemic of fatherlessness and the boy crisis in education have all grown in large part precisely because we treat men as expendable and do not care about the consequences that come from marginalising men and boys. To treat men as expendable is to treat civilisation as expendable. Without healthy, productive and well-adjusted men that can make use of their potential, there is no future for civilisation. As I have mentioned before, even if we see men as machines, we understand the need to look after those machines to keep them working for us. If you don't replace the oil in your car, it won't last very long. Men are not machines, men are human beings. Looking after them properly requires more than basic parental investment. Men and boys must be treated with respect and compassion.

MGTOW is about men living life in their own way and refusing to be expendable. That is a good thing. Why? Because men have value to society and if men value themselves then they protect society and themselves from wasteful sacrifice of male potential. Men going their own way is not antithetical to civilisation. It is quite the opposite. Western civilisation was based around recognising the rights and freedoms of the individual for very good reasons. It is what made the West the success it became. Valuing individuality and respecting the rights and freedoms of the individual, is the basis of a free market economy and a free society. It generates tremendous economic prosperity and drives scientific and social progress and innovation. These Western principles of valuing individuality and protecting individual rights and freedoms is a very MGTOW concept. It is the group identity of the feminists and far left that is antithetical to MGTOW and advanced civilisation. Men naturally contribute to civilisation without coercion. It is literally in our DNA to invent, build, explore, discover, maintain, repair, protect and provide. We find it naturally fulfilling, we do it without coercion.

What MGTOW is about, is applying men's natural gifts and desires to do these things, in ways that are authentic to the man. If anything, MGTOW boosts the prosperity of society by preventing the huge waste that comes with treating men as disposable and preventing men from being exploited and used by a parasitic, corrupt and unsustainable gynocentric social system. MGTOW can instead freely apply their gifts and abilities in ways that are genuinely positive for society and for themselves (These are not automatically mutually exclusive things).

There are countless men throughout history that have contributed to the advancement of their society enormously and did not get married or have children. Sir Isaac Newton, Orville and Wilbur Wright, Nikola Tesla, Ludwig van Beethoven and Adam Smith, are just a few of these men. Their scientific discoveries, intellectual and social contributions and technological breakthroughs, still have lasting impacts on Western civilisation and the world many years after their deaths. Getting married and breeding offspring is not the only contributing factor to the continuation of civilisation. Contributions to a civilisation's scientific and technological knowledge base and intellectual capital, can be just as important and arguably be an even greater factor in ensuring the longevity of civilisation.

If we are going to give women equal rights as a society, then they must be held equally accountable. Otherwise it creates an imbalance that destroys society. Having reciprocity between the sexes is critical not just for individual relationships, but also for society. Treating men as expendable provides no resistance to groups like feminists emerging and treading on men's rights and marginalising men and boys. When men are regarded as expendable and you give women equal rights with no accountability, it does not take a genius to predict feminist groups will emerge and take advantage of that and they have.

By marginalising men and boys and treating them as expendable, you also reduce fertility rates below replacement levels. When fewer and fewer men have the finances and work status to meet the hypergamous expectations of women, thanks to the impacts of growing up in fatherless households, the boy crisis in education being unaddressed for decades and feminist initiatives like female hiring quotas, fewer and fewer children will be produced. When men are treated as expendable and put through the divorce and family court extortion and exploitation pipeline and women have no obligation to be accountable in relationships and roughly half of marriages end in divorce (the majority of which are initiated by women), many men will understandably start deciding not to marry and have families.

If we want a sustainable and prosperous society, we must recognise the value of men and boys and stop treating them as expendable, we must hold women equally accountable to men and encourage individuality over groupthink and identity politics. The parasitic feminist welfare state has to go too, which is something Stefan Molyneux has recently spoken about[7]. Like a parasite, it feeds off male taxpayers and supports female lack of accountability and eventually destroys society. If you regard men as expendable and don't hold women accountable, such a parasitic system will emerge. These dysfunctional values must go if we want civilisation to continue.

Jordan Peterson Is Not A Messiah For Men

Unfortunately it is quite often the case that social critics of feminism ignore the destructive influence of gynocentrism in our culture and society. Whilst I agree with a lot of what Jordan Peterson has to say, he is not the Messiah for men he is made out to be and has a number of serious flaws in his reasoning that cannot be ignored by the men's movement or the MGTOW community. He is very big on self-responsibility (which we all are in the manosphere), except when it comes to women and girls taking self-responsibility and accountability for their actions toward men and boys. He remains dead silent on that. Responsibility for Jordan appears to be conditional based on your sex being male.

Even in the Cathy Newman interview[8], Jordan starts the interview off talking about man-children and then spends the remaining 85% or so of the interview talking to an adult woman and explaining to her that women's choices have consequences. Despite having a first-hand example right in front of him in that interview, that the problem in society is not men not taking responsibility, but women not taking responsibility for their own actions and choices, he continues to wilfully ignore the elephant in the room like most traditionalists. As Alison Tieman once said[9], "we need to stop blowing smoke up women's asses". Exactly! We have to stop shielding women from accountability as a society if we want real change. Men in particular need to stop doing that.

His remarks about MGTOW both before and after the half-hearted apology he gave[10], expose his own gynocentric programming. Jordan is a traditionalist. If men are not protecting and providing for women, getting married and raising children, then they are suddenly man babies. There is no scope in Jordan's gynocentric worldview for men to go a different path in life.

There are plenty of men like myself for instance, that have full-time jobs, are independent and self-sufficient. We are men that have chosen not to get married or have children by choice, because of the pathological and predatory nature of the gynocentric societal system we live in. Apparently we are all man babies if we don't follow his version of what a man is. It has never dawned on Jordan that perhaps taking responsibility involves acknowledging the substantial risks divorce, family court, domestic violence, sexual harassment and sexual assault legislation, feminist policies and the metoo climate, really present to men and not recklessly ignoring or downplaying these risks.

That taking responsibility involves making smart and informed decisions and mitigating avoidable and substantive risks from these predatory elements of our gynocentric social system. That perhaps not producing a child in a world that does not respect fatherhood and wilfully ignores major social and economic problems, might be a responsible decision to make until those issues are recognised and addressed. That perhaps supporting men's organisations, individuals and communities attempting to address these imbalances and who shed light on these issues, instead of pretending they don't exist, might be taking responsibility and the initiative. It has not dawned on him that the greatest form of responsibility, is to take ownership of your own life and set your own direction in life. That being responsible means being brave enough to go your own way and not take the easy way out by conforming to what someone else's ideal is of what you should do with your own life.

It is also interesting Jordan does not apply his own principles of what a male adult is to the plethora of childless, unmarried single women out there. It never dawned on him that perhaps men might be avoiding women to increasing degrees because there is something wrong with women and this culture. Jordan will scrutinise men, feminism, politics, the left and the culture, but never or rarely the elephant in the room- female behaviour and the collective in-group bias of women[11]. We literally have had hundreds of thousands of women in the streets protesting the election of Donald Trump over the last two years, with vagina hats on their heads, because a candidate with a vagina did not get elected President. I am not a sycophant of Trump, but I find the two year temper tantrum after his election tiresome. Jordan Peterson frequently skirts and avoids criticising or discussing the role of women in creating multiple generations of fatherless children and how women do to a substantive degree use the legal system as a weapon against men, particularly in divorce, family court and false allegations of rape, domestic violence and sexual harassment. It is the old saying in action, “to learn who rules over you, simply find out who you are not allowed to criticise”.

Quite often in his interviews, talks and lectures, he shows a reverence for femininity and has great difficulty by his own admission when speaking with Camille Paglia in their interview[12], in holding women accountable for their actions toward men (particularly crazy women). He is all for men taking responsibility as long as men make choices with their lives that fit his traditionalist worldview. He does not seem to encourage men to take responsibility in standing up for themselves against women who mistreat them. He appears to be stumped on how men should take self-responsibility in their interactions with women. On how men should deal with crazy women and how to simply learn to say no to these women, call them out on their bullshit, stand up for themselves and walk away from them.

His simplistic view that MGTOW are just not attracting women and therefore there is a problem with these men and they should work on it, is a strawman he is fully aware is false. MGTOW won’t bow to gynocentrism and Jordan does not understand how men could not put women at the center of the universe, therefore there is something wrong with them. Jordan is aware of the heavy bias against men in family court and divorce and then counters that by saying not all women are like that[13]. Yeah that is right, but not all women have to be like that for the risk to be too high for many men to not choose marriage and family. Not all areas of a minefield have mines, but you only have to step on one to end your own life. The numbers on divorce and family court outcomes etc are not trivial, they are substantial. The consequences can range from financial servitude and imprisonment by your ex-wife, right up to men taking their own lives.

Something tells me that if we reversed the sexes, Jordan would have no qualms in discouraging women from getting married and having children. Taking precautions to protect yourself from a predatory gynocentric social system (metoo, VAWA, college campus policies, divorce and family court etc), is not just smart, it is taking self-responsibility. Once you don’t follow Jordan’s gynocentric pathway to what a man is, self-care and taking responsibility for your own well-being as a man, does not appear to be what Jordan has in mind regarding responsibility.

Jordan simply cannot comprehend men going their own way and deciding what to do with their own lives, beyond the traditional gynocentric pathway. Like Christina Hoff Sommers, Jordan speaks a lot of truths, but he says a lot of things that are seriously flawed too and frequently omits valid and well warranted scrutiny of the supposedly “fairer” sex in the problems facing the relations between the sexes. We should not be ignoring that in the manosphere. Paul Elam[14], Karen Straughan[15], Peter Wright[16], Stardusk[17] and others have called him out on these erroneous opinions and omissions. I would strongly encourage people to watch and read all of that criticism of Peterson which I have linked to this article, before they blindly follow every word he says. I like the guy mostly, but I do find his wilful ignorance and selective application of his own principles where they conflict with gynocentrism very irritating. It is the “playing it safe” strategy of so many social critics these days. Criticise easy targets everyone agrees is wrong with the culture and then ignore the difficult problems like gynocentrism. Men and boys deserve better.

A Return To Chivalry Is Not The Answer

Last week we had the mainstream media in Australia go into meltdown over remarks made by Senator David Leyonhjelm, in response to comments allegedly made by Senator Sarah Hanson-Young. I will not be discussing that in this article, as it has already been discussed in a previous AVFM article linked here[18]. What I was more interested in was observing and discussing the ease with which the mainstream media on both sides of the political spectrum, were quite willing to quickly condemn Senator Leyonhjelm for his comments and almost entirely let Sarah Hanson-Young’s alleged comments go without scrutiny. There were exceptions. This week Senator Cory Bernardi has also spoken out[19] against Sarah Hanson-Young’s commentary in Parliament and had quite a few things to say about her conduct in the senate. As the saying goes, “people in glass houses should not throw stones”.

One response though that was particularly intriguing, came from columnist Miranda Devine in her article, "Leyonhjelm shows women lose in post-chivalry world"[20]. Her article which I have read requires a subscription to access, her interview on the article is linked here[21] for those that do not have access. Like Jordan, there is a lot of what Miranda says I agree with, however I do not agree with her comments regarding male chivalry and her criticism of David Leyonhjelm. I am not a supporter or opponent of David Leyonhjelm, but I don't blame him or condemn him for responding in the way he did. It is about time that a politician stood up to the pervasive misandry in our governments. In her article, Miranda warns women that the senator's remarks were a glimpse into what future society is going to look like, in a world without male chivalry. Miranda goes on to explain how chivalry is a tradition that takes advantage of men's protective instincts and uses them to serve the supposedly "weaker" sex. Chivalry is indeed a tradition of male service to benefit women without reciprocity. It places women above men. It is a tradition that encourages one standard of accountability for men and a lower standard of accountability for women toward the opposite sex.

Women might be physically weaker than men, but the last time I checked they have all the same rights and privileges men do in Western society and some people make solid arguments they actually have more. Women are quite capable of being just as vicious verbally and socially as any man and many would probably argue they are more capable. Women are not the fragile powerless snowflakes some people would have men believe. Women and girls are excelling at every level of education over men and boys and doing quite well in the workforce. They enjoy a multibillion dollar international feminist empire that puts their interests ahead of everything else in numerous sectors of Western society.

This exclusive support for women and girls pervades the mainstream media, academia, legal system and education system, politics, private industry, government policy and public health just to name a few areas. We even have entire government departments devoted to women and girls. There is no comparable set of organisations or level of support for men and boys. I think I speak for a lot of men and boys when I say we are getting sick and tired of women and girls pretending they are weak and vulnerable creatures when there is a wealth of evidence to the contrary.

Chivalry is a bigoted tradition that enabled the very demonisation of men and boys that Miranda later discusses in her article, to go on unchecked and without opposition for decades. If women in politics or in the mainstream media want to make bigoted generalisations about the opposite sex, then shielding them from the consequences with chivalry is not the answer. All it does is keep the cycle of demonising the male half of the population growing and growing without opposition. If you make bigoted remarks about the opposite sex, then you are not the victim and that suddenly does not change when the person making the bigoted remarks happens to be female. Chivalry does not have a place in a modern society where women have equal rights and freedoms to that of men. If you make bigoted remarks against men, you do not get to play the victim because the men around you respond in a manner you do not approve of.

Several years ago Miranda Devine discussed a concept called, "Female Entitlement Mentality"[22]. It takes a sense of entitlement to expect men to behave like gentlemen toward women that act like bigots. Indeed Peter Wright wrote an article[23] discussing a research study showing the link between entitlement in women and their disposition to support chivalry in men. Women have no place lecturing men about acting like gentlemen, when feminist lecturers write articles in the Washington Post titled, "Why can't we hate men?"[24]. It is time for women to get off their pedestal and start taking accountability for their own words and behaviour. If you want men to be respectful toward you, then be respectful toward them. Two thousand years ago, a man called Jesus spoke of a simple concept to treat others the way you would like to be treated.

I certainly think women have it in them to empathise with men, accept accountability for their own choices and for their behaviour and words toward men. Karen Straughan's own blog is called, "owning your shit"[25]. The name says it all regarding accountability. There are plenty of other examples of women displaying these qualities I have come across both online and in my personal life. A more recent example for instance popped up on my YouTube feed over the weekend. Her name is Sydney Watson. Here are two videos of hers for people to look at regarding recent events in Australia concerning men and feminism, link[26] and link[27]. Of course there are the Honey Badgers, Janice Fiamengo and numerous other women.

I am not buying the idea women can't overcome gynocentrism, anymore than the false assumption men cannot overcome gynocentrism. Sure there are challenges, but gynocentism can be overcome provided it is recognised as a problem by society and a pathology that should be discouraged. As I explained in my article on normalising gynocentrism[28], gynocentrism is so common because we have normalised it. Encouraging women that go against the gynocentric grain of the culture and holding women and girls accountable for their words and actions toward men and boys, would be a key step in the right direction in reducing gynocentrism in society. We most likely are never going to completely eliminate gynocentrism to absolute zero, just as we will never completely eliminate obesity. We will always have a residual level of pathological behaviour in society because human beings are imperfect. However we can reduce gynocentrism by a considerable degree from its present levels and make it far less common and a fringe behaviour rather than a normal behaviour in society. We have the behavioural control to do that as discussed in my earlier article, but only if we recognise gynocentrism for the pathological set of behaviours it is and we make an effort to reduce it.

I am certainly not suggesting Miranda does not have empathy for men, she has spoken[29] at an international men's conference. Like Jordan there are a lot of things I like about Miranda and agree with her on. However I am not going to remain silent when I see gynocentric double standards being encouraged and I do not care who it is from. Male chivalry toward women is a tradition of gynocentric double standards. Dr. Warren Farrell had a famous saying, "women can't hear what men do not say". As long as men remain silent for fear of offending women, absolutely nothing is going to change and that silence will contribute to gynocentrism remaining normalised in the culture. So start speaking your mind to women if you are a man and stop self-censoring, because it is about time men found their voice. That is why A Voice For Men exists. Use the platform. Calling men and women out on their gynocentric bullshit is not spreading hate, it is generating powerful and badly needed cultural change and demanding an end to hypocrisy and sexist bigotry.

References:

1. ONLY Patriarchy Builds Nations * / & other UNCOMFORTABLE TRUTHS. Black Pigeon Speaks. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
2. Traditionalism vs. traditionalism. Peter Wright & Paul Elam. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).
3. Fempocalypse!!. Girlwriteswhat. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
4. Research Shows ONLY MEN Pay Taxes. Black Pigeon Speaks. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
5. The Consequences Of Fatherlessness. National Center For Fathering. (Accessed July 2018).
6. The Boy Crisis: Why Our Boys Are Struggling and What We Can Do About It. Dr. Warren Farrell & Dr. John Gray (2018).
7. DEATH BY WELFARE. Stefan Molyneux. FreeDomain Radio. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
8. Jordan Peterson debate on the gender pay gap, campus protests and postmodernism. Channel 4 News. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
9. Tucker On Single Motherhood w/ Dr. Warren Farrell | HBR Debate 8. Honey Badger Radio. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
10. Jordan Peterson – I Regret Calling MGTOW Pathetic Weasels. Bite-Sized Philosophy. Original source: Transliminal Media. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
11. Gender Differences in Automatic In-Group Bias: Why Do Women Like Women More Than Men Like Men? Rudman, Laurie A.,Goodwin, Stephanie A. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, Vol 87(4), Oct 2004, 494-509
12. Jordan Peterson – Men Can't Control Crazy Women. Bite-Sized Philosophy. Original source: Jordan B Peterson.

YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
13. Jordan Peterson responds to MGTOW backlash. Davie Addison. Original source: Rubin Report. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
14. Jordan Peterson Steps In It (MGTOW). An Ear For Men. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
15. Response to Jordan Peterson's comments on MGTOW. Karen Straughan. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
16. The Gynocentrism Of Jordan Peterson. Peter Wright. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).
17. Jordan Peterson | The Responsible Man. Stardusk/Thinking Ape. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
18. A Man Takes A Stand. Mark Dent. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).
19. Bernardi on Sarah Hanson Young. Liberal Democrats (Australia). YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
20. Leyonhjelm shows women lose in post-chivalry world. Miranda Devine. The Daily Telegraph. July 4th 2018 (Accessed July 2018).
21. 'Sarah Hanson and the greens are demonising men' | Miranda Devine on David Leyonhjelm | Today. News Bite Global. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018). Original Source: Sunrise – Channel 7 Australia
22. Women believe they live in the age of entitlement. Miranda Devine. The Daily Telegraph. May 20th 2012. (Accessed July 2018).
23. Can women be chivalrous? Damn right they can. Peter Wright. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).
24. Why Can't We Hate Men? Suzanna Danuta Walters. The Washington Post. June 8th 2018. (Accessed July 2018).
25. Karen Straughan http://owningyourshit.blogspot.com/
26. WE NEED TO TEACH MEN NOT TO RAPE?. Sydney Watson. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
27. 4 REASONS WHY FEMINISM IS FULL OF HYPOCRISY. Sydney Watson. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).
28. The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism. Peter Ryan. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).
29. ICMI'17 Miranda Devine – Feminism's Final Salvo. An Ear For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

[1] ONLY Patriarchy Builds Nations * / & other UNCOMFORTABLE TRUTHS. Black Pigeon Speaks. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[2] Traditionalism vs. traditionalism. Peter Wright & Paul Elam. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

[3] Fempocalypse!!. Girlwriteswhat. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[4] Research Shows ONLY MEN Pay Taxes. Black Pigeon Speaks. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[5] The Consequences Of Fatherlessness. National Center For Fathering. (Accessed July 2018).

[6] The Boy Crisis: Why Our Boys Are Struggling and What We Can Do About It. Dr. Warren Farrell & Dr. John Gray (2018).

[7] DEATH BY WELFARE. Stefan Molyneux. FreeDomain Radio. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[8] Jordan Peterson debate on the gender pay gap, campus protests and postmodernism. Channel 4 News. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[9] Tucker On Single Motherhood w/ Dr. Warren Farrell | HBR Debate 8. Honey Badger Radio. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[10] Jordan Peterson – I Regret Calling MGTOW Pathetic Weasels. Bite-Sized Philosophy (Taken from the original interview prepared by Transliminal Media). YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[11] Gender Differences in Automatic In-Group Bias: Why Do Women Like Women More Than Men Like Men? Rudman, Laurie A.,Goodwin, Stephanie A. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, Vol 87(4), Oct 2004,

494-509

[12] Jordan Peterson – Men Can't Control Crazy Women. Bite-Sized Philosophy. Original source: Jordan B Peterson. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[13] Jordan Peterson responds to MGTOW backlash. Davie Addison. Original source: Rubin Report. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[14] Jordan Peterson Steps In It (MGTOW). An Ear For Men. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[15] Response to Jordan Peterson's comments on MGTOW. Karen Straughan. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[16] The Gynocentrism Of Jordan Peterson. Peter Wright. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

[17] Jordan Peterson | The Responsible Man. Stardusk/Thinking Ape. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[18] A man takes a stand. Mark Dent. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

[19] Bernardi on Sarah Hanson Young. Liberal Democrats (Australia). YouTube. (Accessed July 2018). Original source: 2GB.

[20] Leyonhjelm shows women lose in post-chivalry world. Miranda Devine. The Daily Telegraph. July 4th 2018 (Accessed July 2018).

[21] 'Sarah Hanson and the greens are demonising men' | Miranda Devine on David Leyonhjelm | Today. News Bite Global. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018). Original Source: Sunrise – Channel 7 Australia

[22] Women believe they live in the age of entitlement. Miranda Devine. The Daily Telegraph May 20th 2012. (Accessed July 2018).

[23] Can women be chivalrous? Damn right they can. Peter Wright. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2012).

[24] Why Can't We Hate Men? Suzanna Danuta Walters. The Washington Pos. June 8th 2018. (Accessed July 2018).

[25] Karen Straughan http://owningyourshit.blogspot.com/

[26] WE NEED TO TEACH MEN NOT TO RAPE?. Sydney Watson. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[27] 4 REASONS WHY FEMINISM IS FULL OF HYPOCRISY. Sydney Watson. YouTube. (Accessed July 2018).

[28] The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism. Peter Ryan. A Voice For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

[29] ICMI'17 Miranda Devine – Feminism's Final Salvo. An Ear For Men. (Accessed July 2018).

The mysterious invisibility of men's good deeds

Mark Dent · 14 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes the easiest way to view a problem is to look at it in the simplest, almost childlike manner. I think Hans Christian Andersen knew this and that is reflected in his masterpiece, The Emperor's New Clothes.

As I sat on my couch and watched the news each night last week I saw endless footage of hundreds, if not thousands, of men working to save the lives of twelve young boys and their teacher. One of these men died trying to save them. I did not see a female in any of the footage in the caves or outside the cave. Perhaps there were a handful. None of them to my knowledge were in any way involved in the actual physical rescue of the boys.

https://www.cbsnews.com/live-news/thai-cave-rescue-soccer-team-all-out-of-cave-in-thailand-2018-07-10-live-updates/

Another story covered the floods in Japan. Again, all footage showed men and only men, rescuing people while risking their own lives.

www.abc.net.au/news/2018-07-10/japan-death-toll-rises-to-134-as-rescuers-continue-search/9971820

This event was taking place at the same time as outrage was bubbling away in our media over Senator David Leyonhjelm's crude words to a female senator in the aftermath of the rape and murder of a young woman. This crime led to an outpouring of vile attacks on men and boys. We were all responsible in one form or another for the aberrant behavior of the crazed killer.

So, the crimes of one mentally unstable man instantly became representative of masculinity and its toxic nature.

But what of the lifesaving men?

What struck me was the sheer invisibility of what these men were doing. Oh, it was covered in great detail. There was endless praise for the "rescuers", "doctors", "soldiers" but not once did I hear anyone focus on the commonly shared biology of the rescuers. Suddenly masculinity and maleness was irrelevant to the story.

It's quite astonishing when you stop and reflect on this. Literally hundreds of men were risking life and limb to save strangers during the passage of one week, but this was not a catalyst for even the slightest praise or gratitude for men as a collective. The evil of one man outweighs the goodness and courage of hundreds.

Like the little boy who pointed at the King and asked why he was naked, the simple question is: Why are the good deeds of men rarely if ever attributed to men?

Some individual males receive wonderful acclamation and gratitude but these men are of a particular kind, the kind that denigrate their own gender. Obama is a good example. He poured scorn and derision on men at every available opportunity. He lectured the nation about deadbeat dads and absent, flawed fathers on a day which was meant to be set aside to reflect on all that is good about dads.

mssinglemama.com/2008/06/16/obama-calls-out-dead-beat-dads/

He constantly repeated absurd, bigoted statistics about the high probability of a girl being raped or sexually assaulted at her university or women being paid less for doing the same work. That's how you ensure you are loved by feminists, both male and female.

So I try to imagine I am a little boy again. I hear the endless scorn about men and the endless misery and hurt they cause. I watch the advertisements which show a daddy beating his wife or child. I am bombarded with the message-men are dangerous, violent oppressors. I attend a school which insists that boys must respect all females simply because they are females. There is no suggestion that men or boys are worthy of the same respect. I hear of men being challenged to swear an oath that they will never harm a woman, as if such an oath might avert their natural desire to unleash hell on females.

The little boy watches the tv screen night after night. He sees men rescuing, protecting and comforting those who are weak, vulnerable or endangered. He feels his dad's strong arms embrace him and he knows he is in the safest place on earth every time it happens.

What does he make of the world? People he trusts (teachers, entertainers, politicians) constantly feed him a message which is completely alien to his lived experience.

This for me, is one of the most heartbreaking aspects of the poisonous ideology which has enveloped our culture. Our boys are absorbing the message even if they don't fully comprehend it.

Cowardice, or some may call it self-preservation, is at the heart of the problem. Too few men are willing to publicly make a stand for masculinity. If enough male politicians pushed back in the way David Leyonhjelm did the hypocrisy and hatred that fuels feminism would be exposed in no time.

If Malcolm Turnbull (our Prime Minister) had said "Well, David was certainly uncouth in his choice of words, but Sarah Hanson Young has a history of saying some very vile, hurtful things to her fellow senators, so I have very little sympathy for her." Can you imagine the reaction it would bring?

If one honest man had called out Barack Obama as he claimed women had a one in five chance of being sexually assaulted when they attend a university can you begin to dream of the tremors such a simple but powerful action would cause?

"Excuse me, Mr. President. There is no way you or any father would allow their daughters to attend any university if you really believed that statistic. It's a bald faced lie."

You could then debunk the lie itself.

time.com/2934500/1-in-5%e2%80%82campus-sexual-assault-statistic/

I remember that hideous moment when Sharon Osbourne and her female co-hosts on The Talk laughed gleefully as they discussed the story of the day. A woman had hacked off her husband's penis and mutilated it.

If the male cameramen had any balls, here was their moment. They were presented with an opportunity to make a stand. Switch the cameras off but only after walking up to the women at their desk and saying:

"You disgust me. How dare you mock a man whose life has been destroyed by an evil bitch!"

More tremors.

I despise the men who continued to film that program and by doing so supported these vile witches and all of the poison they spewed to their national audience.

Who could blame them if they had walked off in protest? What possible argument could be raised in defense of what these women did? It was a golden opportunity lost. Those cowards valued their jobs and safe anonymity far more than their dignity. Just roll with the mob.

Imagine if the two male panelists on The Project had responded to Lisa Wilkinson's request that they talk to their mates and let them know violence against women is not acceptable by saying:

"That's absurd! How dare you even insinuate the men I call my friends would need to be told that! Why don't you go and tell your female friends that killing babies is not acceptable!"

Earthquakes. Explosions. Implosions

But no, the cowards know who butters their bread.

Today, every man who stands behind the king nods in furious agreement as their gender is attacked, demonized and blamed for all that is wrong with the world.

https://www.facebook.com/SenatorDavidLeyonhjelm/videos/1780404388701788/

They are the sycophantic fools who cannot see the beautiful cloak and it's multi colored patterns but dare not say there is nothing to see for everyone else claims to be astounded by its beauty. The cloak of course is invisible because it doesn't exist. It is a fabrication, a lie created by people who know the power of the mob. Don't fall out of step. Don't dare to question what the mob insists is right there before your eyes. Don't look at them in bewilderment and tell them they are all insane. Just nod in agreement and all will be well. It is comforting to be in step with the mob. One day, after endless nodding with everyone else, you may even come to believe that you can see the beautiful cloak.

The little boy watches the men on TV as they climb through dark tunnels, filled with water to rescue the lost boys. He watches men comfort the boys with blankets, food and gentle reassuring words. He sees men running to a burning car, dragging the driver from the flames or climbing ladders and entering burning buildings to save those trapped inside. But most of the adults around him don't see the good men saving, reassuring and protecting. They see something entirely different and insist that men are dangerous, violent and predatory. Be careful when you are in their presence. You never know when they will pounce.

Our wailing and gnashing of teeth has achieved wonders. But if only there were a few brave men with the power and platform to shake the foundations of feminism. One "boy" who trusts the evidence of his own eyes and loudly proclaims:

'Look-the emperor has no clothes.'

References/further reading:

##The first few articles below all preach the same mantra. Of course, not all men are violent but all men must change their behavior. It sums up the sheer idiocy of feminism. America's favourite male feminist, Michael Kimmell also wrote an article which was published in the Melbourne Herald Sun.

Check out the final two links below and contrast Obama's words on Father's Day with his speech on Mother's Day. This slick operator was a despicable gender bigot.

https://www.adelaidenow.com.au/news/opinion/michael-kimmel-when-a-jerk-engages-in-sexist-behaviour-the-good-guys-have-to-speak-up/news-story/e078f432920f4ec6bf67725390aeb8a2

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/susie-obrien/susie-obrien-talking-about-violence-perpetrated-by-men-doesnt-mean-all-men-are-violent/news-story/f592dbba433c2728bb17719e379b6ee3

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/wendy-tuohy/melburnians-are-fed-up-that-little-has-changed-since-jill-meagher-murder-writes-wendy-tuohy/news-story/344fc445d967ec49794bde51a6a69751

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/abby-gilmore-men-must-stop-making-degrading-comments-in-front-of-boys/news-story/5f2440c11fb6648bf122b96b22233662 https://www.heraldsun.com.au/rendezview/men-we-should-learn-from-womens-discomfort/news-story/c42f73fa28728082cc384be5e9bbbb53

https://obamawhitehouse.archives.gov/the-press-office/2016/05/07/weekly-address-happy-mothers-day-president-obama ttps://www.huffingtonpost.com.au/entry/obamas-fathers-day-speech_n_107220

Gary Orsum on the evil Lisa Wilkinson-host of The Project

Bearing takes apart The Project and Lisa Wilkinson

Walk away (from misandric culture)

Robert Brockway · 16 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Misandry is on the rise across the Western world. An American academic has recently asked why can't we hate men? in The Washington Post. A Canadian academic wrote a book arguing that women should have a right to kill their husbands if they've (allegedly) been victims of intimate partner violence.

Meanwhile in Australia feminists keep calling for a curfew for men. Aside from the inherent immorality of trying to enforce a curfew on an entire gender the idea of a curfew for men has some interesting implications. Such a curfew would have to apply to all men – no exceptions. Since women constitute a small minority of police and fire fighters a male curfew would doom all women in these occupations to permanent night duty. In addition supermarket shelves across the country would start to empty out as trucks are used extensively to move food around Australia and a curfew for men would, at the very least, mean that these trucks were not moving half of the time. Meanwhile Australian men are being bombarded with demands that they must change (in to what exactly?).

While we work towards confronting the misandry prevalent across the West we can cast our eyes outward. It's long been the privilege of the wealthy to be able to have homes around the world or to be able to buy an island to get some privacy. While buying islands will remain out of reach for most, the reality is that increasing options are opening up for middle class Westerners. With misandry sky rocketting across the West it may be time for MGTOW, MRAs (both single and those in a relationship), and like-minded people to start planning their exit strategies.

Law and order as well as infrastructure are improving in many developing nations. This, combined with a lower cost of living, means that retiring to, or residing long term in, the developing world has never been so attractive. In general nations have financial, health and character tests that need to be passed before long stay visas will be granted.

In addition to the obvious financial advantages, many of these nations are far less touched by feminism than Western nations. The purpose of this article is to demonstrate that there are other options than continuing to live in nations dominated by feminist laws and institutions.

Malaysia

Malaysia is developing nation with a low cost of living and good infrastructure. While many parts of the country are generally safe some Western governments discourage travel to the region of Eastern Sabah. The country has maintained good economic growth since independence nearly 50 years ago. The Human Development Index of Malaysia is considered to be high at 0.789 (as of 2016).

The Malaysia My Second Home programme offers a renewable visa to live in Malaysia long term. The visa may be renewed for periods up to 10 years. The programme is open to citizens of any country recognised by Malaysia as long as the requirements are met.

Applicants under 50 must hold liquid assests of at least MYR500,000 (USD125,000), open a fixed deposit account in Malaysia with a balance of at least MYR300,000 (USD75,000) and demonstrate an income of at least MYR10,000 (USD2,500) per month. Those 50 or over need to open a fixed deposit account in Malaysia with a balance of at least MYR350,000 (USD87,500) or demonstrate an income of at least MYR10,000 (USD2,500) per month.

Visa holders may be able to work part-time subject to government approval.

Thailand

Thailand is a developing nation with a very low cost of living and ambitious infrastructure improvement projects underway. Thailand is generally safe although Western governments emphasise not entering the Yala, Pattani, Narathiwat and Songkhla provinces in the far south. Thailand has a Human Development Index of 0.740 (as of 2016), categorising it as a country with high human development.

The recent successful rescue of 12 boys and their coach from a cave in Thailand would be a significant challenge for any nation. The willingness of Thailand to request foreign assistance in a timely manner and the effective way in which the rescue was carried out demonstrates maturity in the state institutions of Thailand.

Thailand offers a retirement visa that is renewed annually. Visa holders must hold THB800,000 (USD24,000) in a Thai bank account, or have a monthly income of THB65,000 (USD2,000) or a combination of the two.

Uruguay

Uruguay is generally a safe country with a low cost of living. The Human Development Index is 0.795, qualifying the country for high human development. Uruguay is often described as having a European feel to it which may appeal to Western retirees.

It is relatively easy to obtain permanent residence status in Uruguay however the country takes a dim view of people who wish to use it as a passport of convenience, intending that permanent residents will reside long-term in the country. Uruguay does not set a fixed income requirement for applicants for permanent residence that intend to retire, however having a monthly income of USD1500 is recommended for a single retiree. Interestingly married couples are entitled to citizenship after three years of residence while single permanent residents must wait for five years.

Jamaica

Jamaica is the wildcard entry on this list. Like Malaysia and Thailand, Jamaica is a developing country. Jamaica is not a prime location for retiring today but that seems to be changing. Jamaica is close to the US and Canada with flights from Miami only taking around 90 minutes. They also offer a lovely view of Cuba on the way. Jamaica is even fairly close for Europe compared to the other options on our list. It has an upper middle income making it more expensive than many other prospective retirement options. The Human Development Index is the lowest on our list at 0.730 (as of 2016) but this still qualifies it for high human development.

After decades of government corruption and a stalled economy Jamaica has turned a page. Recent years have seen the country make real headway against the problems it faces as a result of an ambitious economic reform programme backed by the International Monetary Fund and other international organisations. The crime rate and unemployment are falling and the standard of living is rising. Encouraged by these successes the Jamaican government is being granted additional funds to further the economic reforms.

While Jamaica cannot be recommended as a retirement location today if it continues on the current path for another 10-15 years it may become a viable option.

Conclusions

This article is for informational purposes only and should not be taken as immigration advice. Many countries offer reasonably priced options for retirees and the countries here just represent a sample of the options available. Prospective migrants are encouraged to explore a variety of alternatives.

Anyone interested in migrating to any country should spend the time to learn about their prospective new country, including its laws and culture, and the requirements to legally migrate there. Where circumstances allow it is recommended to visit the country at least once before migrating, all the while being aware that visiting a country as a tourist and living there are two very different experiences. Proposed costings for health insurance, housing and other expenses should be done before relocating.

Links to corporate websites in this article should not be taken as an endorsement of the services offered by these companies. In some cases the explanations offered by these companies were more clear than those on the official government websites and so were used in preference. Use of a registered migration agency can streamline the process of migration but naturally this comes at a financial cost.

Exchange rates presented were calculated a few days prior to publication using the site XE.com.

The title for this article was inspired by a song from the iconic Australian rock band Hunters and Collectors and was selected before the recent #WalkAway trend was known to the author. The song is Blind Eye. –Ed

Palmy men versus balmy women

Doug Mortimer · 18 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I went to a boys prep school back in a day when exclusivity – not inclusivity – was a virtue. Consequently, my teenage years were very different from those of my public school peers. To this day, I have a hard time watching movies about high school life. It's almost like watching a science fiction movie about a parallel universe.

One film that I could relate to was Dead Poets Society, a 1989 release starring the late Robin Williams as a teacher at a New England prep school. Aside from the fact that the film took place at a boarding school and I went to a day school, the secondary education depicted was a close match to my own. The film took place in 1959, just a few years before my experience began.

Williams is very good (Oscar nomination for Best Actor) as an alumnus who has returned to the school as an English teacher. As it turns out, he is a very good teacher – too good. He encourages the boys in poetry and drama and they respond enthusiastically – too enthusiastically. Without going any deeper into the plot, let's just say it all ends badly.

I don't recall any inspirational teachers, but I do recall that the general cultural level of the teachers and the student body at my school was much higher than at the public school I transferred from. A passing knowledge of poetry, art, languages, and music (let's call it PALM) could be dismissed as mere dilettantism. On the other hand, if you want to move up socially, you have to move up culturally lest you be dismissed as a philistine or exposed as a parvenu. But there's much more at stake than social climbing.

Did I mention that all my teachers (actually, they were called masters) were men? In English class, almost all the works we studied were by male authors. An estrogen-poor environment persuades male students that being a man of letters is an honorable status, even though it may not directly prepare one for a lucrative profession. To a certain extent, we all keep score with money, but the ledger of life has room for numerous assets you need not itemize on your tax return.

When I went on to college, English classes were more or less 50/50 in regard to male and female students. From what I read about college life today, liberal arts colleges are majority female, and English classes are overwhelmingly female. Female professors are more numerous than ever, and all texts are subject to feminist interpretation. The courses offered and the attendant reading lists are compiled accordingly.

Today there is a push to get more women into STEM, but there is no move to encourage more men to go into PALM. While the feminist party line encourages men to be more sensitive, to be more expressive, to get in touch with their feminine side, or whatever you want to call it, there is no welcome mat put out for men in PALM. How can this be?

Over the centuries, that good old patriarchy provided a reliable supply line of talented males in all the arts. Museums across the land are chock full of evidence. There's no reason to suspect that there's a shortage of male talent today, but the will to develop it seems to be lacking. How can we explain that?

If more men get involved in PALM, that means less room for women in PALM. And if men at the far-right end of the gifted-and-talented bell curve turn their attention to PALM, they may very well dominate the arts, as they should, and overshadow the women, even as women outnumber men at art institutes, music schools, and creative writing classes.

Today PALM has been taken over by females not because they are outstanding but by default. To a large degree, the male competition is standing down. Declining male enrollment in academia is one reason; another is the difficulty of landing a high-paying job to pay off student loans necessitated by inflated tuition rates. Aside from these factors, the implicit message is that when it comes to PALM, men need not apply…unless they are nonwhite or one of the protected classes included in the alphabet soup (LGBT, et seq) of minority sexual persuasions.

At publishing houses, art galleries, and concert halls all across the land the push is for more and more female empowerment. Thanks to Harvey Weinstein, et al, even the movie industry is bending over backwards to accommodate females. So I understand the average young man's lack of enthusiasm for PALM. Alienation is the inevitable result of the influence the loony left wields over culture. A toxic culture is like a rattlesnake; upon encountering it, one's instinct is to keep one's distance.

In some countries, outstanding PALM men were like rock stars. In Russia, great poets like Pushkin were national heroes. Vaclav Havel became prime minister of Czechoslovakia. William Butler Yeats was a Senator in the Irish Free State. Giuseppe Verdi was a key figure in the Italian nationalist movement.

In the early days of the nation, the USA usually took a back seat culturally to Europe, but by the 1920s, American literature was teeming with male talent. Maxwell Perkins, an editor at Scribner's, was renowned for his work with Ernest Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Thomas Wolfe, and many other notable writers. Of course, Perkins was interested in book sales, but he was also interested in serious American literature…encouraging it, publishing it, and promoting it.

Today the likes of Maxwell Perkins are nowhere to be found. In fact, male editors of any taste are rare. An article ("Publishing industry is overwhelmingly white and female, US study finds") in The Guardian posted on January 27, 2016, took a survey of 34 US publishers and 8 journals and discovered that 78% of the workforce was female. (This didn't seem to concern the article's author, Alison Flood, so much as the fact that the workforce was "blindingly" white at 79%.)

I don't think The Guardian fudged the numbers. Look at the "Acknowledgment" blurb in recent books and see how many editors, agents, proofreaders, researchers, etc. are female. Now I'm sure some of them are true lovers of literature and would be more than happy to assist outstanding male authors, but given the college upbringing of most of them, I have to believe that they peruse and parse manuscripts through feminist-tinted reading glasses.

If there is even the slightest hint of misogyny (always easy to find when you're looking for it) or inequality or mild criticism of the fair sex in a text, what are the chances of getting it past the gatekeepers? Given the contemporary marriage of estrogen and ink, one wonders if it will ever be possible to publish any sort of "manly" fiction again? Could Hemingway and Henry Miller or Norman Mailer get published today?

Nevertheless, I realize that encouraging men in PALM is a daunting task. I'm sure there are plenty of low-paid, debt-ridden male humanities majors (guess we could call them Palmers) who rue the day they passed on more lucrative pursuits. In fact, if they wanted to form a social media for Never Again Poetry, Arts, Languages, and Music, they could name it #NAPALM.

Of course, the original purpose of universities was scholarship, but that would be a tough sell today. "You are a gentleman and a scholar" used to be a compliment. Today they would probably add "a sucker" to the chain.

Men build things, women use those things. A home builder is one thing, a homemaker is another. The same is true of culture: men create culture, women live in that culture. By turning their backs on PALM, men are in effect turning the culture over to women. Even if you never read serious literature, go to art museums, or chamber music concerts, this concerns you.

Consider the meaning of culture in biology. A culture is a medium for organisms. Think of your society as a giant Petri dish. The culture you're immersed in can enhance your life or degrade it.

Now think of horticulture, agriculture, aquaculture… living things depend on it. So whoever husbands (note that verb) that culture makes all the difference in culture in every sense of the word. Absent husbandry, the plants and animals run wild.

Women too.

Big Edna and the decline of the arts

James Gervaise · 21 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Back in the 80s, when I was just beginning my career as a TV writer my newly acquired agent secured me my very first job. It was writing a little in-house doc for the then NSW Film Corp. The film was to be used to educate school principals on the joys of multiculturalism. I threw myself head first into it just like any other fresh faced and overly keen cadet and did my research. Within in a day my heart sunk. As I explored the theme of the doco I quickly came to the conclusion that "multiculturalism" was simply a concept. It did not exist. It was someone's idea. And worse, it was a very bad idea and, when held up to the sunlight, could not hold its shape or form in reality.

Imagine my dilemma. The person running the NSWFC at the time was a formidable woman, "Big Edna." To get an accurate picture of Ed think Doris Lessing, up-sized, wearing a house dress, grey hair tied back, chardonnay marinated face devoid of make-up. From what I had been told Ed had been a Gough Whitlam appointee in the "arts" bodies and had managed, over the ensuing years, to lever her way into various positions she was wholly unqualified for. Similar woman went on to dominate all the Australian Film funding bodies and still do. They are entirely political and have a ruthless agenda.

So, this young and keen writer attended a script meeting as the only male in the room and I expressed my concerns about my subject – "I am trying to spin something that there is no working model for and isn't that just propaganda? And from the extensive personal research I have done in our ethnic communities I have discovered that it is these very communities themselves who do not want multiculturalism. They have, in fact, very little respect for each other's cultures and worse, their religious differences not only make true multiculturalism impossible but show that unless there is one dominant "culture" that forms an umbrella for the rest to sit under even a watered down version is out of the question. "

Look at the Ottoman Empire I said – other religions and cultures were tolerated but only if they acknowledged the supremacy of Islam. Unless we establish some hard and fast ground rules or at least a blue print of how we envisage our secular multicultural society working we are simply making a rod for our own backs.

After a very long and thick silence Big Ed stood up and said: "Have you got an abo into it?" I shook my head. "Get an abo into it. And a crip if you can." Then she walked out. I'm not making this up, that's what she said.

I wrote the thing. It was shown throughout the Australian education system and was very well received. When I saw it years later there was no writer's credit on it. These are not nice people. Those women hated men like me then and they still hate us now. And make no mistake: "multiculturalism" is entirely a "feminized" crude attempt of social engineering, a theory stemming from a warped idea that a bad person and indeed an unsuitable culture can be all made good under the billowing aprons of mother.

I recall a story regarding the playwright/scriptwriter David Williamson. He had been giving a scriptwriting workshop at some private venue. After the event he was standing in the bar chatting when a young and very keen budding scriptwriter approached him to offer: Mr Williamson, I loved your lecture. Your work has really inspired me. I'm going to stop what I'm doing and become a television writer." David asked what he was currently working as. "In real estate" the acolyte replied. David smiled and said; "And I bet you think you've met some cunts…"

Never a truer statement. As Jack once asked: Can you handle the truth?

Ask yourself this and make sure you are old enough to properly answer it: Has television got better or worse over the last thirty years? Think about it and you will soon realize that the feminization of our television and entertainment industry has been an absolute disaster. (As it has in nearly every area of life where it has been allowed to be dominant. Even cars – the style, pizzaz and performance has gone only to be replaced by those loaves of bread on wheels called SUVs with the easy park system.)

Do the research. Look at the viewer demographics. Why did awful day time drama get the name "soap?" Because that's what was advertised around the program to its mainly female viewers. What started off as a small grass snake has now grown into a bloody great python that swallows everything in its wake. Advertisers, seeking to get some of the huge "femidollar" have had a direct and dire influence on programming. Soap has been disguised as mainstream drama. We no longer think of it simply in terms of junk food for the brain. It is now our staple fair.

"Women's drama" (playing with Barbies as I like to call it) has now become the main course. Note the recent Emmy Awards and the lauding of both "A Handmaidens Tale" and that turgid little film about "domestic violence." Both of them are of the "It made me want to cut my own throat" variety yet we are supposed to quell our nausea and politely clap the makers of this stuff onto the podium. This is not about good drama. This is about ideology. And it's about money. Women have the financial power to create their own world within a world and they are doing just that.

Have you done the demographics yet? Reality TV. Think about shows like Big Brother, The Bachelor, Survivor. What is the underlying theme of all these shows? Well, how well you can lie, how great you can cheat and pretend. How good are you at being a rank hypocrite who can serve it up to your fellows behind their back? Can you shed crocodile tears when needed? Women love a good stitch up. It feeds their limbic system the juices their need to outdo each other on a quotidian level.

And then there are the food and DIY shows – so let's sum it up:

It's all about killing off your competitor in love, securing the "romantic wedding," getting the poor sap to build you a house then happily stuffing your face while watching soap (and if you get as fat as a walrus then it will be "his" fault for not loving you enough). Keep in mind, the TV soap story is nearly always the same warped theme: girl caught in a dilemma – the boring good guy or the exciting bad guy. Eventually, she marries safe, beta male – Brian – then she fucks rebel alpha male – Jack. Of course she agonizes about it for a while, that's what gives it legs, but in the end she succumbs to Jack's charms even though she's been the one driving the narrative right from the start.

And it goes way back to Jane Austen, the writer who started the entire "He loves me, he loves me not" form of storytelling, the one feminists love to try and put on a pedestal even though deep down they know Jane is utterly unworthy of the term "literature." Now, Soap is masquerading as prime drama. It and the cynical reality programs have been result of the total and relentless feminization of our television and yet, this is not the worst of it. It has a much darker side.

Female cop shows now swamp the airwaves. Every drama currently gracing our screens has to have a heavy dose of sexual politics. Of course the male writers know this so they cynically load their stories up with SexPol fodder so they can get the thumbs up from the menopausal monsters who call themselves commissioning editors. I tuned in to the first episode of George Gently the other night thinking at least a cop show set in the (now) 70s would be safe. But no, the first ep was entirely about "women's issues." Entirely. In fact the very first word of dialogue was "misogyny." Yet a cop show with a female lead can be made brilliantly: take Vera, it does not get better. Please note the absence of sexual politics.

Blame the awful Swedes.

Some more research to keep you busy: see if you can find one Nordic drama made in the last five years that does not show a woman hitting, kicking, slapping, biting or inflicting an act of violence against a male. You won't. The message is clear – we can do it to you but if you do it back then you carry the stigma for eternity. We can hit. You cannot. Full stop. I blame the chain smoking, now mercifully dead, Stig Larson for much of it. In his overly praised series of novels (The Girl with the etc) created a totally ludicrous character in the form of a slightly built, punk styled female sociopath who goes around beating up men, some of them mean-as-shit bikers.

Don't get me wrong, I'm all for super heroines but let's call them that. Let's acknowledge the fantasy, not pretend it's real and have to legislate laws to protect the idiots who carry the fantasy to the streets, offices or homes. If you want a really good example of the "fantasy as real" genre watch the Swedish series Modus. The bad guy, a professionally trained special-forces assassin, manages to elude and indeed fight off every attempt to bring him to heel until the penultimate scene where he is bested by an angry mum with a kitchen knife. I am not making this up. And it isn't just the Swedes: I recently tuned into a UK cop show to see a woman stabbing a man viciously in the hand with a pen for breaking off his relationship with her. And she was a cop! The act was never mentioned again and he just walked through the following scenes with a bandage. Now swap genders and try to imagine how that would pan out. Is it any wonder that Wonder Woman is due to become a female role model? Ahh…she's not real.

If you want to see how women fight watch them on the MMA circuit. It's pathetic. And these girls are the best at it. Here's the cold hard truth: street fights. 90% of the time, end in grappling on the ground. Then it's all about strength and body weight. So it's highly unlikely that woman will best a man. And this is a good thing. Consider the over emotional, blind, knee jerk violence women excel in and you will thank god on a daily basis that they are the "weaker sex."

Of course the Nordics make great drama to: Borgen, Lillyhammer, The Killing, The Bridge and many more. But the urge to substitute irrational polemic for reality means that much of what they are offering up is tofu dressed up as the Sunday roast.

So, while you still have Google up… Find out how many male book editors are currently working in Australia. And while you are at it, find out how many male Heads of Drama there are. No one would deny that women are now in a position not just to influence society through both the arts and the news but dominate it. Of course, they will say that this is a good thing while in the same breath argue for sexual equality in every other industry. Do not ever make the mistake that these women are rational. Their agenda is portrayed as a nightmare manifested by the limbic brain, wholly lacking in logic and reason. It's ok, in their heads, to discriminate against me in terms of my skin colour, gender, sexual orientation while in the same breath say how sexism, racism etc. should be fought against. It's Orwellian double speak and if you dare to question it then you risk the wrath or Big Brother, or worse Big Edna.

Getting back to multiculturalism…

You will also notice that Nordic drama, as well as tirelessly promoting feminist issue and actively undermining masculine integrity also spruiks multiculturalism ad nauseum. You will never see a Nordic, and in many ways European, drama series that does not have a rich mix of diversity, in fact so rich that obscures reality. Muslim women are the favourites to tell a story about – the plight of the poor refugee who wants nothing more than to live peacefully in your country while trying to undermine your culture so it becomes just like the one she ran from. And if you absolutely cannot find a story about immigrants then at least pepper the background with hijabs to show how normal it all is, or at least, will be when you've managed to sway an entire generation to your thinking so they can happily commit an act of collective suicide while all the while think they are being "tolerant."

Which brings us to SBS, a TV channel set up with the very best of intentions. A broadcaster whose purpose was to provide news and entertainment to "new Australians" so they did not feel too alienated or excluded while trying to establish a new life in their chosen country: A worthy exercise if it had have stayed as a sort of "way station" on the way to learning English, understanding Australian values and respecting our free and secular culture. Yet somewhere along the line the hollow theory of multiculturalism took over. The concept that had no working model, anywhere, at any time, became the beat for the SBS drum. In the same way an entire nation can go to bed one night thinking they live in a free society yet wake up the next day under a Stalinist government, we woke up and turned on SBS only to discover it was no longer the channel that was to help migrants integrate but one that actively promoted the superiority of holding on to the old values and raising a middle finger at the new. SBS became the propaganda arm for the multiculturalists. And the multiculturalists were, by proxy, all cultural Marxists. Just like Big Edna.

A dream within a dream….

Let's jump cut forward a tad because SBS has morphed again. Instead of being solely the multicultural channel it has now transformed itself into "the progressive channel." SBS has now become the champion of gay rights and LBGTQ (etc) issues. It uses tax payer's money to promote things crass disguised as "fun kitch" like the Eurovision song contest, or the gay mardi gras, something that started off as a sort of protest – and a somewhat worthy one – to become an exercise in bad taste and excess embarrassing to most Australians, even some of the gay ones… So what is SBS up to? Ask the people who run it – you'll find that many of them are British. Most are, like their sisters in the other channels, alpha females who surround themselves with lesser, sycophantic females and a few beta males just to keep up appearances (Just like the Catholic Church and the UN there are lots of gays at SBS – but let's not mention that).

These people see no contradiction in actively spruiking for the "yes" camp in the gay marriage plebiscite, even though the people most opposed to it are the Muslim and Chinese communities, you know, the ones that they have been tasked to serve. Or maybe they have decided "integration" can be a good thing when it fits their agenda. No hypocrisy there. Or have they finally admitted that they never wanted to serve any community in the first place but only every saw their task as undermining the existing Australian society that punches their tickets? SBS News Service is as biased as it's possible to be without waving a hammer and sickle flag and should be shut down. In fact, the best thing that could happen to SBS is that they are made to go back to their original mandate and show a diverse mix of cultural programming. The only news they should be allowed to broadcast should be news made in other countries. Whoever gave them the right to unashamedly try and shape society to match their personal progressive masturbation fantasies?

Many are saying that Europe is finished. It has committed suicide by influx. If this is the case then those most to blame, after the politicians, are the women (and a few emasculated men) who have come to dominate our arts and culture institutions both in broadcasting and universities. These people see the whole of society through the blinkers of "white male privilege/patriarchy" – something akin to a sociological disease to be despised and destroyed. Hence, they become enemies of the very society that nurtured and educated them. These people, now in positions of authority, actively undermine society with a view to its destruction. Make no mistake, the feminist politicians in Germany and the Nordic countries who are calling for mass immigration of Muslims do not give a toss about them in truth. They simply know that they can be used as a tool to destroy a society they have been taught to hate. And here is the really amusing part: the Muslims that they willingly embrace often hate them "to death" in return.

The terrible truth of the matter is that the hijacking of the arts by the bitter, unfulfilled women who call themselves feminists deals a fatal blow that it may never recover from. The censoring of the creative voice of strong men, alpha males, has and will have a devastating effect on society. Do you honestly think that if writers like Hemmingway, Miller, Orwell, Steinbeck, Golding, Mailer, Cendres, Behan, Joyce, Thompson were writing today they would get published? Of course not. Playwrights like Beckett and poets like Bukowski would be unknown. One female theatre critic in the Guardian (what else) recently described Shakespeare's McBeth as a "bad play." The great TV scriptwriters like Dennis Potter, Paul Schrader and Troy Kennedy-Martin would never get a meeting let alone a commission.

And yet, here we are, in 2018 with more choice than ever before. We no longer have to be at the whims of the free to air channels, we have Netflix and a host of other providers. Yet, conversely, ironically, if one talks in terms of content and theme and of the socially constructed crucible our drama is made in we have less choice than ever. The message is like a solitary drum beat that rings out monotonously, a cultural call to prayer that we must all bow down and submit to. And in doing so we pay homage to ravenous God of Mediocrity.

But do we? It's easy enough to simply make a conscious decision not to buy a product whose advertising belittles men – and we all know there are many of them. It's a little bit more effort to write to the company and tell them why you have put a personal embargo on their product. But it takes commitment to note the advertising around a program that promotes values that you consider abhorrent and complain robustly to. Yet, the truth is, if enough of us did it would have an impact. Make no mistake, advertising influences and even feeds content.

Of course, given that I work in the industry one might assume that I too am committing "career suicide" by writing what is never really said out loud in the plastic hallways of television. However, as an argument for my overall sanity let me just say that it's harder for a white, male heterosexual to get a novel published or a script commissioned in Australia in 2018 than it is for Pauline Hanson to walk down the streets of Tehran without a bourka. So it's like that indigenous saying: "If you're up a tree and you begin to fall…relax."

I am not an ideal agog. I am a jobbing writer who has written for some of the worst and some of the best TV series over the last 30 years. But drawing a line in the sand is what real men do. It was once called honour and it was valued. I will not kiss Big Edna's flabby arse and I will not get an "abo or a crip in it" just to get my pay cheque.

The fake news has already started in on ICMI'18 in London

Paul Elam · 25 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

After what by all reports was another smashing ICMI success at the hands of Mike Buchanan, the feminist fake news media has begun the expected attack. This comes complete with cherry picked and out of context quotes from feminist and fake news "journalist" Lara Whyte. Reporting for the George Soros funded, far left website, opendemocracy.net, Whyte practiced the shopworn tactics of attending the actual conference and then reporting on the one that happened in her empty little head.

I urge all those who value truth in journalism over leftist propaganda to make your voice heard in the comments.

Cheers, Paul

Internal memo

Robert Brockway · 25 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Following are status reports for various men's rights projects currently underway around the world.

For MRA eyes only.

In Paul We Trust.

Operation Make Me A Sammich!

Our plans to get all women back in to the kitchen barefoot and pregnant have run in to some delays. Destroying the entire world's supply of women's shoes has proven more difficult than originally anticipated. We are continuing to work on the problem. Since most women's shoes are made by child slaves in the developing world we're working on infiltrating the factories with midgets.

Fortunately the technology to allow aerial spraying to impregnate all women is showing promise.

Undercover Ops

Our agents operating undercover are having great success passing as feminists. It turns out that the strange hair colours sported by feminists represent relationship status within the feminist collective. The last feMRA we sent in had hair colour that was announcing she was in a relationship with three demisexuals and a tortoise. This elevated her status significantly and she's now treasurer for her local Marxist-feminist commune.

Secret Base

We've successfully convinced the world that the Cave of the Patriarchs is named after some old Jewish dudes rather than the leaders of the global men's rights conspiracy. Great work from the propaganda team working out of Bilderberg.

Female Agency Reduction Tool

Initial testing of the prototype device was carried out at ICMI17. All rabid Australian feminists in the vicinity of the venue were directed to go home and do cross stich.

A year on and a portable version is being tested. The portable version appears to be a pair of regular reading glasses. When the man uses his male gaze while wearing the device the woman loses all agency. So no change then. Work on the portable version continues.

Mind Control Training

Classes in neurolinguistic programming and other word salad are scheduled for next month. Once an MRA passes the course he should be able to disarm even the most rigorous of academic thinkers.

We no longer use the Phased Array Ultraslow Learning Apparatus as it just caused confusion.

Robot Army

Our plans to build an army of robot Paul Elams is on track. At nearly 8′ tall these lifesize copies of Paul Elam will be able to crush any opposition when we finally send them on to the streets. Unfortunately Paul had to miss ICMI18 recently as he was needed in the lab to put the final touches on the robot exteriors.

Just like the real Paul Elam the robots will be able to shoot lasers from their eyes.

Shadowy Cabal

Once the robot army has been put to work we plan to replace all world governments with a Shadowy Cabal of Faceless Men. Applications for membership in the Shadowy Cabal are still open. Successful applicants will need to look sinister while sitting in a darkened room. Ability to inspire fear by smoking a cigar highly regarded.

Robert Brockway
Kommandant der Albernheit

The author advises this article was inspired by a hit piece about ICMI18 on VICE. — Ed

Feminism: Infinite monkey theorem

Gerard Nicol · 27 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Orwell wrote in his book The Road to Wigan Pier:

> "The truth is that, to many people calling themselves Socialists, revolution does not mean a movement of the masses with which they hope to associate themselves; it means a set of reforms which 'we', the clever ones, are going to impose upon 'them', the Lower Orders. On the other hand, it would be a mistake to regard the book-trained Socialist as a bloodless creature entirely incapable of emotion. Though seldom giving much evidence of affection for the exploited, he is perfectly capable of displaying hatred—a sort of queer, theoretical, in vacuo hatred—against the exploiters."

Orwell, like most of the authors we read in high school, had a unique insight into the human condition; an insight that educators once thought was critical to share with young minds.

A simple Google search on the greatest authors of all time shows the gendered reality of literature.

Infinite Monkey Theorem

Infinite Monkey Theorem is the idea that an infinite number of monkeys at keyboards will inevitably create the works of Shakespeare if given enough time (and a free typewriter on which to strike keys).

After reading Jennifer Garrison's opinion piece on Jordan Peterson last week, I was left with the impression that feminists such as Garrison see themselves, and all other women as nothing more than monkeys at a typewriter.

Garrison's article was poorly written and damaging to women, yet it was published because there is an insatiable appetite for articles that attack male genius, and promote the idea that women are denied a voice; even though it is clearly evident that there is no mainstream market for masculine voices.

OPINION

Jordan Peterson exemplifies the harm in our love for male genius

The cult of genius comes at the expense of a vibrant intellectual life and thriving democracies

Jennifer Garrison · for CBC News · Posted: Jul 14, 2018 5:00 AM CT | Last Updated: July 14

She says:

> Our obsession with Peterson reveals a larger cultural problem that threatens to cripple our universities: our adoration of the individual masculine genius."

But what is the obsession, who has the obsession, and and why should Peterson's message even have to come from a man?

Long before Peterson hit the mainstream, women like Karen Straughan had been presenting much the same message, and in a far more accessible way.

She is every bit as brilliant as Peterson, yet works under an alias because the attacks against women who break away from the identity politics of feminism are far more vicious, and dangerous.

Had the media taken the same interest in Straughan that they took in Peterson, it is Straughan who would be selling out concert venues around the world right now.

I sat with my wife and my son to watch Peterson walk the stage in a sold out Denver auditorium, and to be honest, I think Straughan would have done a much better job.

But in a market that is so tightly controlled, you can only buy the tickets that are on sale, and I'll still pay to expose my kids to a diversity of thought.

Feminists are angry because in the matter of a year, Peterson has swept away a decade of feminist narrative, and there are literally no feminists in the world who are capable of standing up on a stage to present a coherent, well reasoned counter-position.

There are women who continue to identify as feminists; women such as Camille Paglia who I would gladly take my family to see, but the media ignore these women because they are more critical of feminism than the average anti-feminist, so they are denied a voice.

At some point, feminists are going to have to come to terms with the fact that the majority of recognized geniuses are male, because to be recognized as a genius you need to be a genius, you need to survive the many dangers that geniuses face (such as socialism which sends most genius to the gulag), and you need to be recognized.

If feminists want to see female genius recognized they need to recognize female geniuses. They need to stop obsessing about the male genius they see as their oppressor, and they need to put aside the hope that one day a monkey at a keyboard will stumble upon genius.

We read Orwell, Bradbury, Shakespeare and Lee in schools because each of their books teaches us a valuable lesson about the human condition.

We study Harper Lee in schools because she wrote a book about a black man falsely accused of rape, and defended by a man who stood for justice.

In years gone by, feminists have fought to build a case that Harper Lee was a feminist, even though she never once identified with the movement, but today they fight to have her book removed from school reading lists because it tells the uncomfortable truth about how rape allegations can used to oppress, silence and eliminate men.

Feminists are willing to throw one of the few female authors under the bus, leaving nothing but male authors behind, just to erase the inconvenient truth of the last #MeToo movement from history.

We now live on a planet of 8 Billion souls, all competing to be heard, and in such a marketplace, the harsh reality is that there will be even more geniuses who go unrecognized.

In such a marketplace, the recognition of female genius is even more unlikely, especially while feminists champion female mediocrity.

The idea that academia and democracy thrive when mediocrity is championed will inevitably be the end of both institutions, and the evidence that women would be willing to compromise both, in return for being anointed as the elite, is exactly the phenomenon that Orwell is seen as a genius for identifying.

We all benefit from the works of Shakespeare and Orwell, and to argue that we should elevate mediocrity to genius in the interests of gender equality deprives both men and women.

*Connect with Gerard Nicol on his LinkedIn page.

Anthony Bourdain's toxic masculinity

Paul Elam · 28 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Anthony Bourdain killed himself on the 8th of last month, which by today's standards for news cycles makes it ancient history. Just the same, and despite the fact that I've already addressed this, I want to take a second look at what happened considering information that has come to the surface in the days after his death.

I took the position at the time, and still do, that his suicide was primarily a product of being suicidal. Or in other words, he died because he wanted to. No great mystery to unwrap. Well, unless you're one of the nutcases I found in the comments who are bent on claiming that Bourdain's supposed suicide was actually a CIA black op conducted on behalf of Hillary Clinton. I have taken the liberty to assume, to hope actually, that this is the same group of intellectual cripples that claim that school shootings like the one in Florida were also staged by government agents.

Stupid. It grows on trees these days.

Alex Jones worthy conspiracies aside, there is another reason to take a second look at the death of Anthony Bourdain. The story behind it is a worthy one in spite of the outcome, which, as I've already belabored, had a fixed outcome. Anthony Bourdain was bound to take his own life. Driven by some form of clinical depression, life trapped in an anhedonic fog would eventually do him in. He was destined to find a reason to kill himself.

What is interesting to me is that his reason, his personal back-breaking straw, appears to have been a familiar trait in so many men of his ilk. Toxic masculinity. And yes, it is surely, most certainly a thing. It's not the bullshit about men from feminists. That toxic masculinity mostly exists in the warped minds of the gender studies crowd.

Toxic masculinity, the kind I am talking about, is actually something much more real. And Anthony Bourdain had it, really, really bad. In fact, he had such a profoundly toxic sense of his own manhood that it surprises me that it took him almost 62 years to find an existential crisis that would bring the curtain down on his life.

To understand this, we need to look at the one factor that can always, reliably tell us how sick a man is. Relationships with women. Because relationships, if you'll pardon the religious reference, are god's way of showing us just how sick we really are.

In the case of Anthony Bourdain, his primary relationship in life was with a woman named Asia Argento, an Italian actress with a lot of b-role work. She is also a singer and a feminist activist who levied a claim, 20 years after the supposed fact, that Harvey Weinstein forced her to give him a massage and forced her to allow him to perform oral sex on her.

Uh, yeah. And I am sure that Argento's desire for fame and fortune in Hollywood had nothing to do with her massaging Weinstein's fat, hairy back or letting him go down on her. After all, women don't do those things for movie roles, right?

Anyway, twenty years later, Argento made an Oscar-worthy performance of her totally unsubstantiated claim at the Cannes Film Festival as soon as it appeared that the MeToo movement was gaining traction. In other words, as soon as there was blood in the water.

This is who Anthony Bourdain fell in love with. And not just in love, but crazy in love. After his death a Daily Mirror article came out titled, and I quote, "Anthony Bourdain was 'so crazy in love' with girlfriend Asia Argento before suicide that 'friends were worried'"

It was subtitled, "The intensity of the tragic TV chef's feelings is said to have been a 'red flag' for friends before his suicide." Now, that article uses unnamed sources, which may or may not cast doubts on its authenticity, but Bourdain's well-documented public reaction to Argento's damseling over Harvey Weinstein and the rest of the male world hardly contradicts it.

Bourdain wasn't just a supportive boyfriend, standing by his girlfriend as she fought through 20 years of oppressive patriarchy to push valiantly for justice. An article in the Independent revealed a streak of sadistic fantasy in Bourdain quite common to toxically masculine men.

“However much people want to see Harvey Weinstein dead or in jail, he’s in fucking Arizona,” Bourdain said, unable to resist his trademark condescension of American flyover country. “He is in Arizona, eating in restaurants in Arizona. And at off-the-grid restaurants in Arizona, so he can’t even eat at the best sushi restaurant in Scottsdale.”

“He’s gotta go to some shit fucking place,” Bourdain continued, “So Arizona, I mean, as much as I’d like to see him, you know beaten to death in his cell.”

In addition to his thoughts on Arizona being Weinstein’s hell, the article said, “Bourdain also revealed his theory around Weinstein’s eventual death – which he imagined will occur in a bathtub.”

Picturing him “naked in his famous bathrobe,” Bourdain suggested that Weinstein will be brushing his teeth and holding his cellphone when a massive stroke hits him.

Stumbling backwards into the bathtub, Bourdain imagined that Weinstein’s life will end as the ex-Hollywood producer “scrolls through his contacts list trying to figure out who he can call, who will actually answer the phone.”

According to Bourdain, Weinstein dying “knowing that no one will help him” and that he does not look his best, will be fitting.

All this, because Asia Agento claims that Harvey Weinstein forced her to oil up her hands and give the movie mogul a massage. Because she alleged that he forced her to allow him to go down on her.

One might wonder if, in the fervor of his white knighting, it did not occur to him to ask her what she was doing in Harvey Weinstein’s hotel room. Maybe he didn’t even wonder what stopped her from getting up and walking out. Was there a gun to her head? A knife? A threat of bodily harm? Did he put the lotion in her hands, or did she put it there herself? Where the ever-loving fuck was her agency in any of this?

It appears that asking any of these questions wasn’t in Bourdain’s otherwise considerable skillset. He was too busy donning armor and calling for his trusty steed to bother with a moment’s consideration for just how lacking in plausibility Argento’s story is. But that is hardly surprising for a man whose feelings for the woman was raising red flags among his friends.

Blind infatuation with a woman. The most prolific source of toxic masculinity there is.

It appears that Bourdain’s feelings for Argento knew no bounds. Not of reason, nor rationality, nor even of basic human decency. And so, too, were her feelings for him. At least if you take her word for it.

“I am beyond devastated,” she tweeted after hearing of his death. “He was my rock.”

Perhaps that’s true. Perhaps he was her rock. But it appears that while he may have been her rock he wasn’t her cock. At least not exclusively.

In the days just prior to Bourdain’s suicide, Argento, 42, was photographed canoodling in public with a French reporter named Hugo Clément, 14 years her junior and 33 years younger than Bourdain, while Bourdain was on set filming an episode of Parts Unknown.

An Italian photographer apparently snapped photos of them in the act and had them online. He reportedly pulled the pics down immediately after news of Bourdain’s death broke.

Now, to be fair, there is a lot of parts unknown here. I can’t prove that Anthony Bourdain ever saw those pics, or that he heard the truth about Argento cheating on him before deciding to hang himself in his hotel room just 5 days after those photos were taken. I can’t prove that his suicide was even remotely connected to his relationship with the MeToo poser, Argento.

I am satisfied, though, that the series of events point to the plausibility of an Argento betrayal of Anthony Bourdain that served as the final straw on his clinically depressed back, leading to his suicide. And I can imagine that with a lot more credibility than any ridiculous notion that it was a black operation constructed by the deep state. Least credible is the notion that the day he committed suicide was arbitrary.

Something triggered him to snap, fatally, and my money says it was Argento's knife being plunged through his misguided, chivalrous heart.

It appears very likely from the public record that Anthony Bourdain was crazily, toxically in love with Asia Argento, who cheated on him publicly while they were separated by work. That served as his reward for loving her; for the fake gallantry of white knighting for someone who was ultimately just out for one more ride on the cock carousel.

For all his vengeful fantasies and sadistic ideations about Harvey Weinstein's death, it is Anthony Bourdain dead in the ground, even meeting his untimely end in the bathroom of his hotel room with the belt of a bathrobe, eerily similar to the way he imagined Harvey Weinstein dying. He didn't even have the luxury of being sentenced to life in Arizona.

I hope, as always in life, that there is more here than just an opportunity to looked smugly on the foolishness of blue pill men. That at the very least their folly at life serves the larger lesson.

Surely, Anthony Bourdain is dead because he had a malady of thinking, of perceiving life that diminished its importance to him. That is a formidable thing to oppose, both for the victim and the society around them.

But what is also apparent here is that for all his creative genius, his uncanny capacity to step outside of himself and shape a story about people and places in this world, he could not apply those gifts to himself. He could not see himself, even for a moment, outside the gynocentric mold. He invested everything, down to his very identity, in a woman, and he inevitably choked on it.

I don't feel smug in the least saying this. There's no gloating here. Just gratitude that there are ways to elude the tragedy that Anthony Bourdain couldn't. And I hope that anyone contemplating this bad ending is able to see that the ability of a man to reimagine himself, away from all this gynocentric madness, this toxic masculinity that perverts and degrades the self, may also bear the ability beat back the demon of depression; to restore and revitalize not only the will to live, but the determination to do so with passion.

Men committing suicide on the rise

John Davis · 28 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Part I
Gender Cleansing

> "No man is an Iland. . . .
>
> Any mans death diminishes me,
>
> For I am involved in Mankinde;
>
> And therefore, never send to know
>
> For whom the bell tolls;
>
> It tolls for thee."—John Donne (1541)

Unnoticed, in our gynocentric world, the rate of men taking their own lives has dramatically accelerated in the last half of a century.

Suicide is now the single most common cause of death for active duty service men; there are now over 38,000 suicides in the U.S. each year, and, of those 38,000, 30,400 victims are men; 83 men commit suicide every day; men commit suicide at 4 times the rate of women.[2] The rate of men being afflicted more than women has been increasing in the past 14 years, and, the rate at which men commit suicide, more than women, has been skyrocketing in the past ten years.[3]

[image]
Refusing funding for Male Suicide research is a form of "gender cleansing."
The fact that these tragic suicides of Men goes unnoticed in the media provides us with a strong indicator of the cause of men leaving us through suicide.

Why Are Men Committing Suicide?

Most people, and institutions in our culture just don't care than men are committing suicide. Our culture has become so misandrist (hateful of men), and so gynocentric (centered on pleasing women) that institutional misandry in universities, government, religion and the media compels us to ignore the fact that men, as a group, are suffering tremendously in our culture from gender oppression.

This "gender oppression" arose from relentless feminist influence on our institutions over the past 50 years. At first, that feminist influence appeared to be benign. Feminism pretended for five decades to be a movement towards "equality" between men and women. Feminism, however, was a disguised movement to provide women with massive privileges, at the expense of men. This has lead to an almost habitual discrimination against men in our culture, and in our institutions. This discrimination and hatred of men is only recently coming to light. The extent of this discrimination against men has become so extreme, that only now can we begin to get a glimpse of the design of how our institutions are knowingly, and purposefully, trying to use "passive-aggressive"[4] means of eliminating men in larger and larger numbers.

Health Funding Denied for Suicidal Men

Let's take an example, of male oppression, for clarity. Under the influence of the feminist lobby, the U.S. Congress appropriates $500,000,000 (Five Hundred Million Dollars) each year to Planned Parenthood. Although Planned Parenthood renders some token services to men, in order to have the illusion of gender fairness, the vast majority of Planned Parenthood's budget is earmarked specifically for "women's health." Modern feminists protest loudly at any attempts to cut Planned Parenthood's budget as "an attack on women's health" (not men's health), or, they protest that a cut in Planned Parenthood's budget is "part of the war on women."

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D. Mass) is the leading spokeswoman proclaiming (and admitting) that the half billion dollars spent on Planned Parenthood is primarily for the benefit of Women's Health (but not inclusive of men's health issues).

> A vote today to defund Planned Parenthood is not a vote to defund abortions. It's a vote to defund cancer screenings, and birth control, and basic healthcare for millions of women.

She continues,

> Let's be really clear about something: The Republican scheme to defund Planned Parenthood is not some sort of surprised response to a highly-edited video. Nope. The Republican vote to defund Planned Parenthood is just one more piece of a deliberate, methodical, orchestrated, right-wing attack on women's rights. And I'm sick and tired of it. Women everywhere are sick and tired of it. The American people are sick and tired of it.—Elizabeth Warren[5]

As benign as Planned Parenthood may be, in providing health services for women, why is there no counterbalancing funding to provide critical health services for men—especially for men who are suffering from clinical depression and suicidal tendencies? "Reproductive health services" are important, but how much more important are life saving health services for men who are suicidal? Is this gender inequality something that is acceptable? Or, is this gender inequality something that may be insidious, intentional, and part of a war on men and masculinity? Is it part of a plan of "gender cleansing?"

Is feminism Driving Gender Cleansing of Men?

Sen. Warren and her followers are ardent feminists. Does that mean that they are seeking “equality” between men and women, or, does that mean they have declared war on men and masculinity? Our corporate controlled media has, for decades, portrayed feminism as a benign movement for equality between men and women. However, an examination of the true roots of feminism shows that it may very well be an intentional war on men, and masculinity; it may very well be a deadly war in which the objective is to cleanse our modern industrialized populations of both men, and masculinity.

“The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at 10% of the human race.” Sally Miller Gearhart (First Wave Feminist Leader)

One way to advance a war against men, and masculinity, is to promote the death of men through suicide, and passively-aggressively denying aid to men who are suicidal. Denying a fair amount of government funds to prevent men from committing suicide, and, fostering gynocentric programs that, arguably, are partly the cause of men committing suicide, may very well be an intentional plan on the part of feminist lobbies, and, the politicians, industries and media who gain from serving gynocentric powers.

The concept of a deliberate (or at least a socially accepted) “conspiracy” to reduce the number of men in our culture is no less probable than the feminist accusation of a “patriarchal conspiracy.” From first wave feminism to the present, feminism has accused men of actively conspiring to suppress women’s rights, keep women in subservient roles, deny women access to men’s “privileges,” and deny women “equal opportunities” in all areas of our culture. Yet, many people find it implausible that feminists, in conjunction with the self-seekers who support them for economic or political benefits, are deliberately orchestrating a means of eliminating men from our culture much as a beehive purges itself of male bees just before winter.

As feminism has gained power in the corporate media, government, education and other institutions, it has succeeded in increasing the disposability of men. Men fought wars for human freedom; men labored at great personal cost to physically build our infrastructure; men devoted their lives to the development of arts, science and philosophies that serve humanity; men gave their lives to fight for decent wages, decent working conditions, and they fought, at great expense to their health and longevity, to raise the standard of living for every human on the planet. Now that men have built modern civilization, they seem to be “irrelevant” to those who want to enjoy the benefits of that civilization without shouldering the burdens of its creation. If there is a deliberate tolerance of such policies, or, even an unaware indifference to such policies, it is sufficient to be one of the principal macro-causes of men committing suicide.

Misandry and Demonizing Men as a Cause of Suicide

Hatred of Men has become an obsession with feminism and the institutions (media, government and education) that support feminism. Hatred of Men (misandry) has risen in intensity over the past 50 years to the point in which it is considered an acceptable and encouraged aspect of our culture.[6] In the name of political correctness the organized and corporatized media in our culture has emphasized, relentlessly, that men are nothing more than buffoons (and especially through their sexuality and feelings) are nothing more than nuisances to those who are currently in power. In other words, men are disposable.

This organized and deliberate campaign to demonize men, their sexuality, their values, their history, and every incentive that Men have to participate in our culture, can have no other effect than to completely demoralize Men, and, drive Men into despondency over their natural birthrights.

This organized campaign to demonize and demoralize Men, because of their animus[7] and gender differences, seems aimed (either recklessly or deliberately) at the most vulnerable among us. Suicide is rarely a matter of "choice" or a rational decision. Although Men in desperate circumstances have sometimes committed suicide as a rational act (suicide was common in warrior cultures such as the Samurai culture in Japan, and, among warriors in Ancient Rome), modern suicide by men is almost exclusively an act of hopelessness, despondency and despair that is part of clinical depression.

In future articles in this series we will explore some of the specifics of clinical depression as it affects Men, and, how misandry promotes clinical depression in men. We'll also explore some of the aspects of our culture, and its open hatred of men, that causes men who are vulnerable to clinical depression to commit suicide. Finally, we'll try in future articles to advance some solutions to the problem of Men leaving us through suicide.

References:

[1] Bacheloris Artis, Case Western Reserve University 1975; Juris Doctor, Seattle University School of Law 1981; Legis Magister, New York University School of Law 1984.

[2] Suicide in America: Frequently Asked Questions (2015), National Institute of Mental Health. http://www.nimh.nih.gov/health/publications/suicide-faq/index.shtml

[3] Suicide Statistics, American Foundation for Suicide Prevention (2016). https://afsp.org/about-suicide/suicide-statistics/

[4] Definition of passive-aggressive in English: passive-aggressive, adj., Of or denoting a type of behavior or personality characterized by indirect resistance to the demands of others and an avoidance of direct confrontation, as in procrastinating, pouting, or misplacing important materials. Oxford English Dictionary, http://www.oxforddictionaries.com/us/definition/american_english/passive-aggressive

[5] 162 Cong. Rec. 124 (August 3, 2015) (statement of Sen. Elizabeth Warren) [Pages S6215-S6228] https://www.congress.gov/congressional-record/2015/8/3/senate-section/article/s6215-1

[6] See generally, Nathanson, Paul & Young, Katherine, *Spreading Misandry: The Teaching of Contempt for Men in Popular Cultu*re, McGill-Queen's University Press, 2d. Ed., 2006; Nathanson, Paul & Young, Katherine, Legalizing Misandry: From Public Shame to Systemic Discrimination Against Men, McGill-Queen's University Press, 2006; Nathanson, Paul & Young, Katherine, Replacing Misandry: A Revolutionary History of Men, McGill-Queen's University Press, 2015.

[7] animus, animi, noun, L. declension: 2nd declension gender: masculine. Definitions: male air, male feelings, male heart, male intellect, male mind, male soul, male spirit, courage, character, pride. Oxford Latin Dictionary, 1982.

ICMI Keynote speech: Karen Straughan

AVFM · 30 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

ICMI’18 William Collins

AVFM · 31 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Brews before shrews

Doug Mortimer · 1 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Having witnessed the demands feminists have made on a number of male-dominated enterprises, I reckon we're due for a campaign against the brewing industry. You know the drill…we need more women in the brewhouse and the front office because…well, just because we say so. Not only that but alcohol fuels global violence against women – so the brewers owe us!

Well, World War Beer hasn't started yet but a skirmish of sorts has occurred in Belgium. For a small country (11.35 million people), Belgium brews an amazing array of palate-caressing beers, and many of them are exported to the USA.

One of the Belgian brews I enjoy is Delirium Tremens, a Belgian Strong Pale Ale from the Huyghe Brewery in Ghent. The brewery has changed hands over the years, but it has an eminently respectable pedigree dating back to 1654.

Given the name Delirium Tremens and the pink elephant on the label, one is immediately clued in that this beer is no lightweight (it registers at 8.5% alcohol by volume, roughly double the strength of a typical mass-produced lager). Also available is Delirium Nocturnum, a Belgian Strong Dark Ale, also 8.5% ABV, and the Christmas beer Delirium Noel, weighing in at 10%.

I thought those three brews were the only Huyghe offerings available in the USA, but one day while browsing at a local big box booze store, I happened upon a Huyghe brew called Deliria. I immediately latched onto it. Wondering how it differed from the other three brews, I read the label. A few seconds later I put the bottle back on the shelf.

The label proudly stated that Deliria was brewed by women. In fact, it is brewed annually to commemorate International Women's Day in March. Guess I didn't notice the pink elephant in the room.

If you have even a cursory knowledge of the history of beer, you know that women have been brewing beer for centuries. Today an alewife is a fish, but in times past it was literally a housewife who brewed beer. Brewing was an integral part of hearth and home. A woman who brewed beer for commercial purposes was called a brewster (like brewer, it became a widespread surname in England).

Of course, that was then and this is now. Baby, you've come a long way, from Ninkasi, the Mesopotamian goddess of beer, to the hatchet-faced suffragettes who moonlighted as Prohibitionists, to the Amy Schumer wannabes throwing up in the restroom at your local pub. Thanks to more and better birth control, women can drink with impunity. After all, if a woman never gets pregnant, she never has to worry about fetal alcohol syndrome. The demographic winter does have its upside!

In recent years, the craft beer explosion has been overwhelmingly male. Many of the most popular beers on tap incorporate hair color into the name of the beer. A good example of this is Twin Peaks (primarily known as a breastaurant, but they brew their own beer), where you can get Dirty Blonde (white ale), Knotty Brunette (brown ale), and Dropdead Redhead (amber IPA).

The Blonde appellation is widespread, as blonde is also the name of a style of ale. Several years ago the Deep Ellum Brewing Company of Dallas came up with the slogan "Goes Down Easy" to accompany their popular Dallas Blonde beer. The reaction from local feminists was predictable. Actually, I'm surprised no one has come up with a play on words pertaining to a bottle blonde and a bottle of blonde.

At some craft breweries, however, the brewsters are making a comeback. One example, also in Dallas, is the Bitter Sisters brewery (the "bitter" refers to hoppiness, not attitude) which includes three sisters and a sister-in-law among the brewery owners. Significantly, their India Pale Ale is called Cat Fight. A cold-weather concoction, Winter Bush, has a logo of an upside-down Christmas tree, which looks like…well, like the before photo of a set of before-and-after photos at a Brazilian waxing salon.

I have visited the Bitter Sisters taproom and order their beer when I see it in pubs. So why did I pass on Deliria? I have no doubt it is an enjoyable brew. I'm not saying it's inferior because it was brewed by women. On the contrary, this year's batch was the result of a contest that spawned 65 entries from distaff brewers. Like Delirium Tremens, it is classified as a Belgian Strong Pale Ale (the difference is likely due to the strain or strains of yeast used or the adjuncts).

One could certainly do worse than drink a femme version of Delirium Tremens. But I have to reject a beer that is marketed as being brewed by women, as though it's my duty to devote part of my beer budget to promote female empowerment. I guess we could call it progressive tithing.

The female empowerment approach is more likely to be found among small businesses and startups than in longstanding companies. For example, a storefront in my neighborhood had a grand opening and a sign in the window proudly proclaimed it was "a woman-owned business." I've seen similar proclamations in advertisements in local publications.

Did you know there is a Women's Yellow Pages? At least in Philadelphia, Memphis, and St. Louis. Possibly more cities. That's right, you can empower women simply by publishing a woman-only directory. Sounds discriminatory to me, but I guess if you frame at it as a freedom of speech issue, it'll fly.

For the progressives, all's fair in love, war, and social justice. Unfortunately, when I get a whiff of eau de guerrier de la justice sociale, (Liberté! Égalité! Sororité!), I smell a rat. I reflexively do an about-face and retreat. Call it a one-man boycott.

Now if a brewery wants to brew and sell a beer made by women, there is a way to do it properly. As evidence, let me introduce another brewer that, like Hughye, goes back to the 17th Century. That would be Fuller Smith & Turner (popularly known as Fuller's) based in the Chiswick section of London. It is the largest and oldest brewery (the building was erected in 1816) in London. A lot of their ales are not available in the USA but London Pride, ESB (the progenitor of the Extra Special Bitter style), and 1845 (the year the brewery officially became Fuller, Smith & Turner) are not too hard to find.

Like many longstanding breweries, Fuller's offers special seasonal brews. Their Vintage Ale (English Strong Ale) dates back to 1997. Each 500 ml limited edition bottle comes with a serial number and is packaged in a gift box. The brew measures 8.5% ABV but the taste varies from year to year thanks to different combinations of malt and hops. Like the Belgian ales, the beer is bottle-conditioned; in other words, it has live yeast cultures so it continues to ferment after it is bottled.

What makes Fuller's annual Vintage Ale unusual is that it has an even longer shelf life. Most Belgian ales can be kept in the fridge for a year or two before drinking. Fuller's Vintage Ale recommends putting the bottle aside for three or four years before opening but claims it will still be quite enjoyable even if you keep it around for another couple of years.

Obviously, Fuller's has a lot riding on this prestigious brew. They would never entrust their reputation to a anyone less than a master brewer. So I must admit I was surprised to find out that there was a new Head Brewer in town and her name was Georgina Young. Apparently, she has been with Fuller's for eight years and impressed top management enough to earn a promotion.

I suppose Fuller's could have put a starburst on the box saying "The beer not brewed by a bloke!" or something to that effect. No, Fuller's packaged their Vintage Ale the same as in years past. The difference was that this was the first time the brewmaster's annual memo inside the package was signed by Georgina Young.

So there you have it. No virtue signaling, no grandstanding, no preaching, no self-congratulating. Every year at Fuller's we make this special brew and, oh, by the way, this year we have a new brewmaster. FYI it's a she. Moving right along…

It is somewhat surprising that Fuller's hasn't received more publicity. I suspect it's because they haven't sought it. Even so, you might think the usual suspects would be out there exhorting women to buy Fuller's Vintage Ale. Even if you don't like beer, even if you don't drink, you have to buy this beer to support the sisterhood!

Well, the proof is in the brewing. Beer lovers have their favorite styles and brands, but they are also open to new concoctions. Many will go to great lengths to track down legendary beers and they will pay a pretty penny for them when they find them. I don't think an overtly feminist beer would qualify.

On the other hand, the craft beer industry revels in quirky beer names and anti-feminism offers any number of possibilities.

Anyone for a Slut Walker, a Hoppy Harpy, an Old Termagant, a Toxic Vixen, or a Sloppy Trollop?

Open Democracy? Nah, closed minds.

Robert Brockway · 1 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article is in response to an article posted on the openDemocracy 50.50 website entitled "Young men should be furious": inside the world's largest gathering of men's rights activists. I'm not going to respond to the specific problems with this article as Hannah Wallen has already done that. Rather, I'm going to talk about what happened after it was published.

It all started with a hit piece [archived copy]. Lies, half-truths and misrepresentations abound in this fine example of feminist reporting. I was among the first to notice publication of this article as I happened to be searching for new articles on ICMI18 only half an hour after it was published. I started reading. It was awful. I emailed Mike Buchanan and Paul Elam. A few of us dived in to the comments and that's when the fun began.

I made my first comment and asked for the author to back up some of her claims:

> View post on imgur.com

Some 12-24 hours after making my first post I noticed that two replies to my original post (above) had silently disappeared. While it was possible I was looking at a problem in WordPress, I suspected something more nefarious.

Others started to report their posts silently disappearing too. Eventually the openDemocracy 50.50 admins posted this:

> View post on imgur.com

So every comment that was deleted had this occur because of a breach of their policy huh? They backed themselves right in to a corner. The deletion of one post in particular seemed entirely out of order:

> View post on imgur.com

After I complained this post actually got restored!

> View post on imgur.com

Now posts were marked as deleted so at least so they were easier to keep track of.

Then the deletions really kicked off. Deletions were copious and erratic with some innocuous posts deleted while others were left. The post they had restored was deleted again! The moderators at openDemocracy 50.50 seemed to be on a (small) power trip.

> View post on imgur.com

I think this post speaks for itself:

> View post on imgur.com

They even started deleting comments by radical feminists who were being openly misandrist. I was disappointed with these deletions too as I could counter their points easily.

In the end I had 19 posts deleted and 9 were left but I was never banned. Many others had the same experience.

It was becoming quite a problem as conversation threads were breaking down under the strain of comments disappearing in an eratic manner. Many of us did have a good laugh at openDemocracy being so authoritarian though. Their true nature shone through.

I still insist that they answer my original question or withdraw the statement. To wit, what claim did Lara Whyte hear Mike Buchanan make that she doesn't think was backed up sufficiently and requires more evidence?

These are our opponents. Authoritarians who cloak their activities in the nomenclature of openness and inclusiveness.

Rumour Mill

One Reddit user claims that Lara Whyte is planning a more extensive article on ICMI18. I'm sure it will be just as honest and fact-filled as her first article on the subject was.

ICMI’18 Darren Deojee

AVFM · 3 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

ICMI’18 Mike Buchanan

AVFM · 3 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A roomful of what? ICMI, London, 2018, day 1

Hannah Wallen · 3 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Page 3 (back)

Paul's video was followed by a talk from Save Indian Family Foundation's founder Anil Kumar on "Focusing on innovation for growth of organizations for the movement: Experiences in India."

SIFF is a men's rights organization centered in Bangalore, India. The organization was formed in 2005 as an advocacy group against misuse of Indian laws related to dowry harassment, and has had successes in drawing attention to the need for legal reform to stem the tide of such abuse. The group operates a helpline, and has used life coaching to assist men in dealing with the trauma of being the target of a false intimate partner or sexual violence case.

Anil gave his observations on lessons learned as the organization has grown and expanded, pointing out that the movement as a whole has a lot of knowledge on the issues, but our knowledge of organized dynamics is limited.

He went on to explain that in order for an organization to thrive, its members must understand its value system and organizational culture, and recognize the difference between tools the organization can use, like social media groups and commentator platforms, and the actual organization. He warned that as an organization grows, people management can become a full-time job, complete with expectation management and dealing with people's tendency to resist change, to stagnate in their values, or to experience degradation of values over time.

He emphasized the importance of a "no free lunch" attitude, in which no dead weight is tolerated in the organization. Participants must be there to participate, to contribute to the organization.

He also cited a need for training within the organization, particularly on the values and culture of the organization, with leadership mentoring participants to ensure a continually working, growing organization. Activism, he explained, "must be based on values. Men need clearly defined roles, structure, values, and culture." The organization should operate like a machine, with different parts organized around that value system, the related training, and participants' performance.

This formula has resulted in successes for SIFF, which has published a 498A (dowry abuse law) survival guide, operates a helpline, counsels men facing false accusations, has countered feminist arguments on 498A in the Indian supreme court, and plans to have 5 candidates in Delhi elections next year.

Ms. Whyte, the supposed only woman in a room full of white men, declined to include any mention of Anil Kumar or anything about the Indian men's movement in her article

Nor did she mention Nick Langford's speech, "An exercise in futility: Generation iPhone and the 'Democratisation' of the family."

Mr. Langford opened with the point on the damage the feminist rape culture narrative has done, informing the separation of kids from their fathers, inciting the day care panic, and raising an anti-male cult. He went on to describe a rapid decline in adolescent mental health, with few getting needed support, a problem more prevalent in boys. Fatherlessness is a major cause of this, he explained, as intact families show better emotional and mental health, with statistics showing married parents achieve the best results for their kids, and cohabitating but unmarried having the worst. The U.S. and the UK have the worst rates of fatherlessness, with extramarital births having skyrocketed since the 70s. The government, he noted, assumes men are the problem, and child support is the answer, leading widespread parental alienation, as society no longer honors fatherhood.

Contributing to this: Family Justice review sought to simply and reduce expense of family court but failed to consider pro-father evidence and concluded that paternal rights are expensive and not good for kids. Women's aid opposed due-process for men accused of domestic violence or subject to no contact orders, making such accusations tools for mothers to obtain custody.

Along with known impact of fatherlessness, he cited 4 potential factors contributing to this mental health crisis:

- Changing of youth to compulsive consumers.
- Extensive time spent by youth using social media on devices like smart phones, spending 8 hours a day on them.
- Institutionalization of childhood (kids spending all of their time in organized, institutional settings like classrooms.)
- Reduction in childhood play, which in turn reduces synaptic development and associated psychological development.

The detrimental role of father absence is also accompanied by the breakdown of the family via cohabitation, and the state's attack on co-parenting. The system needs to be fair," he explained, "and recognize that the best parent is both."

This is not happening, however. Mr. Langford described the family court's bias against fathers, informed by well-funded anti-father politics connected to domestic violence activism, and feminist efforts to eliminate paternal contact with kids. Feminist organizations have opposed fathers' rights and due process.

Mr. Langford concluded by reminding the audience that the 21st century had begun with a witch hunt seeking pedophile rings, an attack targeting mostly men who are innocent, leading to a modern child protection movement that has warped itself into a secular anti-male church.

The variety among the first day's speakers alone could have been enough to inspire a series of articles requiring a journalist to engage in research and careful consideration of the facts. It's a shame that Ms. Whyte didn't take that opportunity to understand either the issues the conference exists to address, or the people involved in discussing them. As always, the far left leaves that up to us, and we in the men's movement will continue to rise to the challenge.

This article will be followed by two more, one for each of the remaining two days of the conference, over the next several days.

Page
1 2 3

A roomful of what? ICMI, London, 2018, day 1

Hannah Wallen · 3 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Page 2 (back)

Given feminism's "toxic masculinity" narrative, you'd think even a feminist writer from a progressive publication would have taken an interest in Darren Deojee's talk on Positive Masculinity: Standing on the shoulders of giants. Perhaps the sticking point was the nonfeminist tone, beginning with the lament that men are growing up terrified of their masculinity, have fallen behind women in terms of rights and social acceptance, and that the sexes need to work together again.

Mr. Deojee asked the audience, "How can we trust a logic that allows people to be judged by the deeds of others?" This is the environment men face; collective guilt, the myth of a nefarious patriarchy, and the attacks masculinity has suffered. Even men's clothing, with status demonstrated by stifling cuffs and collars (white, blue, etc.) The meaning of masculinity, he explained is found not in safe spaces, but "at the edge where it is not safe, facing the teeth of the night." He went on to describe the need for space and support for developing skill with one's emotions just as children are given when developing manual dexterity during infancy.

Was Darren Deojee's idea of boys and men developing the ability to take charge of their masculinity, to create change, to temper what is brittle and unpredictable about masculinity into a useful edge too much in conflict with feminist narratives? Perhaps, as he did go on to lament what he referred to as the "Cosmo man," a man characterized by doing what he thinks women want, according to what women say. Women want masculine men, but they want to tame them. In the end, they end up breaking them.

He went on to point out that the spirit of masculinity manifests in men, when tested, striving to make things safer and easier for the next person crafting what is needed to achieve that, mean our ancestors are in everything we have, from old laws to tools and structures we use to protect ourselves from the horrors they faced, and from which they learned. Feminism, he said, "wears those masculine gifts like a robo-suit, using gifts of masculinity to wage war on men." His final challenge to the listener: "What are the men of today going to add? Find your temper. Move when the charge is live."

Following this was Professor Eric Anderson, speaking on A nonfeminist approach to Masculinities. Mr. Anderson, coming from a feminist-dominated academic setting and a history of fighting homophobic violence, challenged the audience with the position that homophobia has been made a means of proving heterosexuality in our society, and that younger men (millennials) are moving away from identifying as masculine.

He went on to describe the concept "Inclusive masculinity theory," the idea that the "stratification of men" (social ranking) is related to homophbia and as homophobia dies, so does stratification, with modern men not considered popular unless they maintain "genuine friendships with a variety of types of men."

On the gender politics front, he pointed out that his feminist training didn't teach him about men's issues, nor did he learn about ways in which women's behavior doesn't match feminist narratives. He gave the example of the gender paradox, a phenomenon of women being more likely to go into STEMM professions in countries that don't interfere with their choices than in those that push women in. These egregious exclusions are due, he explained, to academic gatekeeping by feminists like Michael Kimmel. These gatekeepers prevent publication of that which contradicts the narrative, with no-platforming, and the use of the micro-aggression narrative, safe spaces, and trigger warnings to kill intellectual discourse. However, as feminism self-destructs and the internet expands the availability of platforms, that gate is opening to a wider variety of schools of thought.

Out of all of the speakers, Eric Anderson's speech met with the most pushback from the audience, in their questions and their responses to his points. One of the most challenged was the idea that feminism's demonization of the men's rights movement could be countered by relabeling ourselves to something harder to oppose, like "gender equality," the way the LGBT movement relabeled "homosexual" to "gay." Veterans of the movement, many of whom wear the label “MRA” because it was slapped onto us as a slur by feminists who found it easier to label and shame than to challenge our ideas, bristled at the idea, but it and the points on masculine identity led to quite a bit of discussion among attendees.

Mr. Anderson’s stimulation of discussion also didn’t make the cut for Ms. Whyte’s article. Perhaps she didn’t want to highlight the group’s willingness to discuss ideas, even when we don’t see eye to eye with their presenter on their nature.

She did, however, mention Paul Elam, the next speaker, whose talk “The men’s movement: Personal and political” was delivered by video as he was unable to attend. One quote made it into the post, sandwiched between bits of unfounded anti-MRA-narrative to poison the well, proving the point with which Paul actually started: The men’s movement is demonized. We must not expect a watershed victory, or an end to gynocentrism. Don’t expect the world to suddenly start caring about men’s vulnerability out of hand.

Instead, he pointed out, (unmentioned, of course, in Whyte’s article) that our safety is in being tough enough to deal with tough issues – in our spines. The men’s rights movement, he explained, offers men “a clear path away from personal destruction,” and “the greatest majority of men’s issues can be addressed by their personal choices.”

That didn’t make it into Whyte’s article, either. Perhaps she didn’t like what came after it: Hard truths about the cancerous nature of modern marriage, and the financial threat divorce represents in a society that as Paul explained, “socializes women to be mercenary.” He cited MGTOW as “the largest, most functional part of the men’s movement,” one that is moving away from the norm of volunteering to potentially be the next victim of a predatory divorcing wife. He explained that the path to winning the gender war is in taking responsibility for one’s own decisions, MGTOW being one example – not as an attack on marriage, but as a response to its current state, warped by family court and modern traditionalist conservatives into an attack on men.

He continued by pointing out that populist movements present a chance to gut feminism’s funding, something gynocentric Republicans have failed to do even in response to their attacks on the family structure, and the left hasn’t even tried, as the feminist movement and the left go hand in hand.

He admonished the movement to encourage men and boys to view their intrinsic worth, to smash the gynocentric pedestal, and to keep reminding the world that men are human beings.

Paul’s speech was followed by a video of Mike Buchanan presenting him, long-distance, with the National Coalition For Men’s Winston Churchill award, and Paul’s response that this is one of the greatest honors of his life, and his expression of gratitude for the award.

Page
1 2 3

A roomful of what? ICMI, London, 2018, day 1

Hannah Wallen · 3 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

What do you get when you confront a feminist with men's unfettered humanity?

Shock. Horror. An article full of defamatory lies, published on the deceptively named "Open Democracy" blog, 50.50.

The supposed "only woman in a room of entirely white men" failed to notice the sex and color of several of the event's speakers, including the first up, Karen Straughan.

Maybe this is because Karen spoke about something Ms. Whyte, as a feminist, doesn't like to acknowledge: Women's power, and the responsibility that rightfully comes with it.

Karen began her speech, "Why women must consign feminism to the dustbin of history," by recalling the Temperance movement and the suffragettes, both of which were successful due to women's social and moral power. In part because the anti-suffragettes were all about keeping women above the dirty business of politics, the suffragettes had to turn to morality to get the vote.

She described the work of Mary G. Harris Jones, aka Mother Jones, who was called "the most dangerous woman in America" for her success in organizing mine workers and their families against the mine owners, and the role of "for the women" in mitigating opposition to her efforts. Karen pointed out the sense in Jones's view that the obligations men face on women's behalf should go both ways. "You can't help women by hurting men, and you can't help men by hurting women," she explained. She went on to describe how women in the movement are frequently asked why we support men, while men have always supported women's causes, and are never asked why.

In describing the problem, Karen went on to highlight women's complacency in the de-sexing of traditional masculine virtues, while labeling harm "male," and in feminism's use of claiming to speak for women to push past men. While women as a whole are not to blame for feminism's wrongs, we do have a responsibility to counter their narratives.

She went on to explain that as the movement has progressed in the public arena from our points being outright denied by feminists to their having to try to put a spin on them, from being ignored by media to being sought out for interviews, more women have joined and will continue to join our ranks. She concluded by first describing what is going to be challenging as we move forward; that we're fighting against feminism's exploitation of men's protective, gynocentric instincts, and then explaining that our activism – women's activism – can gain ground there. While as Karen stated, socialization doesn't outweigh natural tendencies, both sexes can be taught boy's experiences matter, and that feminism also harms women. Men should and do matter to women. As more women realize the need to emphasize this, feminism will deteriorate and fade away.

Horrified by the description, Whyte labeled Karen's talk "decontextualized," as if there could be some context under which it would become reasonable for women to accept the idea that human rights can only apply to one sex, and as a result, demand that sex be their own.

No wonder she decided she had to lie to Mike Buchanan about her true nature to get into the event. Her choice to ignore the points William Collins's speech, "Men and boys in the UK, Edited lowlights," is very telling. As an open opponent of the movement willing to flat-out lie about our associations, she certainly would not want to honestly highlight, as Mr. Collins did, the reality of the circumstances faced by UK men and boys.

His speech began with the point that men's rights activism is not identity politics , which would entail relying on victim olympics and entrenching men's identity in victimhood. Rather, it is a discussion on specific inequalities that can be remedied. He went on to note details of these inequalities:

UK men are treated more harshly in criminal justice, much the same way US men are, with higher rates of arrest, prosecution, conviction, and far higher rates of imprisonment than women for the similar crimes and similar circumstances. Boys face the same issue, being the vast majority of incarcerated youth, yet the children's commissioner, when examining incarcerated children's cases, chose 10 out of the 27 girls in detention, and none of the 913 boys. While the UK is building more prisons for men, current policy includes a presumption against incarceration for women. As Mr. Collins put it, we have compassion for women, punishment for men.

He went on to highlight several other issues:

- There is a gap between boys' academic success, and the higher success of girls, which increases as they go through school, especially in STEMM fields of study. The department does not fund initiatives to address underachievement in boys, instead eclipsing the issue behind a PC narrative.
- In the area of health care, men are more harshly impacted by a plethora of health issues than women, including suicide, cardiovascular issues, and most cancers, yet the nation's focus is mainly on women's health, to the detriment of men's.
- UK fathers have no right to know if their child is biologically theirs, and medical ethicists are promoting the idea that DNA doesn't determine paternity.
- Family court promotes parental strife, Domestic Violence allegations, Parental Alienation, and fatherlessness, with 45,000 "children's act" private family law cases in the UK, half of which involve DV allegations, with less than 1% subject to findings of fact. Women's aid cherry-picked data to frame parental killing, more frequently perpetrated by mothers, as evidence of fathers' danger to children. MPs were swayed into slanting family law against fathers.
- The 1918 act, the primary purpose of which was to give WWI vets – mostly working class men – their voting rights, is only celebrated for giving voting rights to women.

Ms. Whyte also omitted Mike Buchanan's talk on equal rights for men and women, and the link he shared to the Nonfeminist Declaration. She probably couldn't stomach hearing that the majority of people are nonfeminist, and that we as a group reject feminist hegemony, culture, and dominance. Likely even more offensive to the feminist was Mike's point that feminism's industries fearmonger for money, a behavior which has resulted in state assault on the rights of men and boys for the purported benefit of women and girls, and that the public is waking up to feminism's fraud.

It must have been interesting to a woman planning to return to her organization's blog to lie about the event to hear that the men's movement needs to engage media more, especially with the BBC becoming more open to different viewpoints… and that we need to spend more time challenging the alliance between feminists and the state.

Or perhaps she didn't mention Mike's talk because he cited equal parenting rights as an area of particular importance. Feminists do have a history of opposing that.

Page
1 2 3

ICMI’18 Professor Eric Anderson

AVFM · 4 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Kimmel. Just another Harvey Weinstein #MeToo

Paul Elam · 6 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Kimmel, long-time feminist "scholar", liar and purveyor of all manner of anti-male ideology, has been hit with the accusation that he sexually harassed one of his female students. In a report by the Chronicle of Higher Education, Kimmel's accuser alleges that he suggested they sleep together six weeks into her graduate studies program.

Ironically, the anonymous female accuser also claimed that Kimmel told her she would have to work harder for equal recognition because she was an attractive woman.

Kimmel denies the accusations, stating "I've spent my entire career advocating for gender equality, and believe I have been professional and respectful in my relationships with women."

Meanwhile, medium.com, a left-wing propaganda website, wasted no time in throwing Kimmel directly under the bus. In a piece titled, "What We Need From Accused Perpetrators Like Michael Kimmel #metoosociology" the standard feminist demand was issued for Kimmel to "Acknowledge and believe the survivor even if their account does not fit with his sense of self."

That's feminist codespeak for "Admit you did it, you slimy bastard."

Of course, whether Kimmel did it or not is now beside the point. He's been accused. In the world Michael Kimmel worked feverishly to create, that is no different than a guilty verdict in a court of law. This is the moment that destroys him.

Notwithstanding that, the proper thing to do here is to point out that the charges are not proven (and they aren't), that Kimmel is entitled to due process and the presumption of innocence (which he is) and that despite his longstanding professional efforts to minimize the problem of false allegations, they are a very real thing (and they are). It is proper, also, to question the very foundation of the accusation's weight; whether asking another adult to sleep with you, if it even happened, is harassment.

Still, the editorial opinion of AVFM is to enjoy the schadenfreude. We know of no one else who deserves the unfair disgrace, the stigma of accusation and its ruinous effects on their lives than this lowlife academic fraud.

Enjoy the level of public attention you've always craved, Michael. It's finally here and it looks damned good on you.

Three Easy Pieces of the Red Pill

Jon Joy · 7 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Three Easy Pieces of the Red Pill

- MGP: Men Got Problems
- GA: Gynocentrism Awareness
- CW: Caution of Women

In a healthy debate, the sides agree on where they disagree.

As wise as some commentators in the manosphere are, the movement's major value lies not in the teachings of any individual, but rather in the mere fact that these discussions are taking place. The mainstream reacts with fear and hysteria to the knowledge that we men are talking to each other seriously about our lives and issues; witness this reaction as evidence that these discussions are necessary, substantial, and impactful.

Paul Elam has described trying to express the full scope of the men's rights movement as akin to understanding a blizzard one snowflake at a time. An alternative, simplifying perspective would be to view it as a tree. The leaves are numerous, but most trace back to a few major branches. The danger of simplification is that ideas not easily categorize may be pushed to the margins. However, there is also much to gain.

The manosphere can be a confusing place. Newcomers encounter a cacophony of ideas, many tinged with anger or frustration. Outsiders bent on demonization can cherry-pick the most offensive bits and hold those up as representing the movement's core beliefs, like the Southern Poverty Law Center inventing a straw man "male supremacy movement."

There is also the internal sniping: pick-up oriented men call MGTOWs pussies, while MGTOWs call them stupid and deluded, and both call MRAs ineffectual chumps, while MRAs call both immature or extreme. It's good fun. The point is not for us to agree, but to map out where we differ, and understand what separates us all from the normies. The fact that we focus on our disagreements may add to the fog, but it is also healthy and natural, a necessary part of people hashing out ideas and stumbling towards a clearer picture.

In this article, I will pursue a particular categorization of arguments that results in a definition of the red pill, based on three necessary components. In the tree metaphor, these three ideas are branches coming off a single trunk (i.e., different perspectives on one deeper truth, selected to succinctly capture the most important red-pill lessons). The three ideas are not new, and this article will not focus on proving/documenting each one, but instead will explore how different perspectives on them divide the manosphere into its sub-groups. Abandoning the tree imagery, the remainder of this article will use the metaphor of an atomic particle ("Redpillium"), with the three essential ingredients making up the nucleus. In the role of electrons are other, related ideas which are influenced by the nucleus.

A key distinction is that the blue-pill world (1) is unfamiliar with the three nucleus components, while (2) being aware of the electrons, but viewing them differently than would a person possessed of red-pill knowledge. No doubt, some in the manosphere have versions of the red pill where the nucleus includes more ideas than the three below. Stretching the atomic metaphor, those could be other red-pill isotopes, which is fine. This article discusses three necessary components, though some may see them as not sufficient. That is, in my humble view, the lack of any one of these three elements renders a person not red-pill.

The Manosphere Sub-Groups

The participants in the manosphere often disagree on the details or consequences of the three nucleus ideas. We argue about them constantly, and our different viewpoints divide us into factions. I will attempt to describe these groups, recognizing that my definitions are imperfect, that many people do not fall neatly into any one group, that I am surely missing nuances, and that the situation is evolving so rapidly that much of what I describe will quickly become outdated.

First, are the Men's Rights Activists (MRAs), who seek to ease problems that afflict men, such as homelessness, suicide, incarceration, under-education, and forced alienation from their children. Second, are Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs) whose guiding principle is to deny women influence/control over their lives, specifically by never marrying or cohabitating. Third, are traditional conservatives (Tradcons) who, as I will argue below, fail the test of being red-pilled, yet they are relevant because (1) they recognize that society's indifference and demonization of men is undermining men's ability to be strong, productive citizens, and (2) their association with political conservatism allows them a large platform to influence mainstream discussion.

The fourth, and final, group currently lacks an established name. Exemplified by Rolo Tomassi, Richard Cooper, and the "Red Man Group," they have transformed what was previously called the pick-up artist (PUA) community into something more sweeping, rendering the PUA moniker inadequate. For the sake of this article, I will call them the "Red Men." Like prior PUAs, the Red Men have a focus on succeeding with women, but they do not see this as a stand-alone issue. Instead, they promote an overall philosophy of taking on life unapologetically, with open eyes, discipline, confidence, and resilience. They believe that such a stance makes a wide array of life accomplishments attainable, including with women.

This can-do mentality is not inherently red-pill. Shelves could be filled of mainstream self-help books touting similar messages—so in the Redpillium framework, those ideas are electrons. What makes the Red Men different, and will ultimately determine their place in the manosphere, is their promisingly firm commitment to open eyes, which includes taking in red-pill knowledge.

The distinction between Red Men and MGTOWs can be hazy, which is ironic given that MGTOW's defining characteristic is avoiding women, while Red Men are associated with pursuing them. Stepping down below the obvious, the most common definition of MGTOW is men who will not marry or cohabitate. A Red Man might pursue women while never intending on a serious commitment, and while doing so may not personally identify as MGTOW. Yet other MGTOW might regard him as one of them whose current hobby is chasing women, and might predict that he will eventually find the hobby unrewarding and scale it back.

The Three "Nuclear" Components: MGP, GA, and CW.

Nuclear #1: MGP

Men Got Problems, but society does not recognize/emphasize those problem to the degree it would if they afflicted women.

The litany of these problems is likely familiar, and includes suicide, homelessness, incarceration, early death, parental alienation, among many others.

For MRAs, MGP lies at the center of their red-pill thinking, leading them to advocate for relief of men's problems and raising social awareness.

Many Tradcons understand MGP (which makes them the closest thing the manosphere has to a mainstream ally). For example, a Tradcon might raise MGP in order to attack the left by undermining the left's claim of moral high-ground (i.e., the left claims to be compassionate, but their indifference to men shows their hypocrisy). Another common Tradcon invocation of MGP is that society needs to stop undermining men, or else men will not be able to fulfil their traditional producer/provider roles.

MGTOWs and Red Men are aware of MGP, but believe it is fruitless to try to convince society to care about men. When Red Men focus on MGP, they see it as demonstrating the need for men to strengthen themselves and become resilient, because they cannot expect caring or sympathy. MGTOWs mostly agree with Red Men, but place greater emphasis on (1) men's solidarity in this shared burden, as well as (2) contempt for the women who constantly moan about their own problems while completely ignoring men's.

Nuclear #2: GA

Gynocentrism Awareness: society idealizes women, overemphasizes them and their wants, and enforces this through shaming and threat narratives.

For example, society says that feminism should be the sole movement with a monopoly on discussing gender relations (gynocentric: only the female perspective), MRAs dissent and are met with shaming (MRAs are a bunch of pathetic losers), and threat narrative (what MRAs really want is to abuse women or turn them into second-class citizens). Some in the manosphere believe that gynocentrism is an inextricable part of human nature, while others think it is something we can fight back against, now or in the future.

Tradcons are lacking in GA. Some recognize the female-idealization aspect, but miss the female-overemphasis. Possibly, some would agree that women are emphasized more, but quibble over the judgemental statement that women are "overemphasized." For example, they could follow an evolutionary perspective and argue that men's proper place it to be considered disposable. (I would consider this thinking an example of the "appeal to nature"/ "naturalistic" fallacies.[1])

MRAs and MGTOWs grasp GA, and emphasize the illegitimacy of the social control mechanisms that enforce it (i.e., shaming and threat narratives). They encourage men to develop internal, psychological resistance to these tactics.

Similar to their view of MGP, when Red Men address GA they tend to see it as heightening the need for mens' toughness and self-reliance.

Although GA is perhaps the deepest and most far reaching of the three ingredients of the red pill (for example, it causes MGP), no group makes it their primary focus (it is more often the cause behind the focus).

Nuclear #3: CW

Caution of Women.

No woman in our culture could escape the message that she would be foolish to blindly trust an unfamiliar man, but the reverse side of that message is missing. Men are encouraged to seek fulfilment and existential validation through their relationships with women. We naturally want women to love us, and society does its best to whip that desire up into a desperate obsession. In view of the many potential dangers women carry, a more mature culture would teach men to keep that urge in check. Instead of shaming men when they fail to put women first, we should shame them for ever letting this woman-thirst steer their lives. The third piece of red-pill thinking is for men to develop their own personalized sense of CW.

With some exceptions, MRAs are soft on CW, striking a gentlemanly stance of, "We would very much like men's issues to be addressed, but in seeking this must honor the feelings and uphold the reputations of women as a group." The MRAs are still better than Tradcons, who seem to lack CW entirely, and prefer for men to march dutifully ahead in their traditional, disposable role. When Tradcons address CW, it is usually an attempt to talk men out of it. MTOWs and Red Men embrace CW with gusto, though approaching it from different angles.

My own CW odyssey began about two years ago. At that point, I had been dipping into men's issues for awhile, and had gradually become convinced that MRAs were sharing important information that was unrecognized in society. At that point, I firmly expected that women would get onboard, if only they knew. How naïve. I can now confidently inform readers, based on repeated experiences, both of my own and others I know, that almost all women respond to the very notion of men's issues with revulsion and discomfort. To most readers here, this is like telling you that the sky is blue. Both men and women surprised me, though not in the same way: towards women, men are loyal to a fault; while women are loyal only to themselves. I resisted this new information for some time, but eventually understood that I needed to correct my opinion of women.

To merely say that I started rethinking my assumptions about women shortcuts a great deal of psychological work. First, I needed to understand that I was allowed to view women differently. Men are inclined to see the best in women, to not judge them, to try to understand their point of view, forgive them, not hold them accountable, and most especially to believe that harboring ill feelings towards women as a group would make us deplorable. It took me about a year to let go of that idea and realize that it is fair to judge women by what they do and say. I support women's freedom to act and speak however they choose within the law, but they cannot also insist that men see them as angels.

In developing their CW, men often turn to scientifically based principles such as female hypergamy, Briffault's law, and women's dual mating strategy. The process is personal, practical, and situational. For example, if a man believes that he would not receive adequate due process in the case of a female accusation, his CW should incorporate this. CW conversations often offend normies' gynocentrism, resulting in boilerplate reactions of shaming and threat narratives. (GA: man-hating draws shrugs, while woman-hating draws torches and pitchforks.) Society is biased to assume that if women are allowed to share and discuss freely, the resulting ideas will be virtuous, but men enjoying that same freedom would produce something toxic. I disagree, and am not afraid of men talking.

As noted above, MRAs tend to tiptoe around CW, while Tradcons try to dispel it. The real evolution of CW thought is occurring distinctly between MGTOWs and Red Men. MGTOWs fight the issue at the root, attacking the idea that being with a woman is even desirable. A common catchphrase is, "The juice is not worth the squeeze." A MGTOW-lite philosophy holds that men will be happier if they de-prioritize women in the lives, which includes fighting their thirst enough to not put up with bad female behavior. (E.g., Paul Elam.) Some MGTOWs' interpretation of CW is to avoid all romantic contact ("MGTOW monks"), though nobody knows what percentage.

Unlike MGTOWs, Red Men's discussion of CW does not focus on reasons women are undesirable—although they do caution against imagining any woman to be solution to one's life ("oneitis"). Instead, they more try to understand the ways that women are crazy, so as to avoid going crazy themselves.

The Electrons

In the "Redpillium" model, the nucleus is surrounded by electrons—ideas that are not unique to red-pill individuals, but that are influenced by red-pill thinking. Here are a few examples:

Electron #1 Pick-up Game.

Many men follow a simple strategy for finding romantic partners. They work hard, maintain themselves, get their lives in order, and then they wait for a promising opportunity. Sometimes, they wait years; sometimes, the opportunity never comes.

Men wanting a more proactive approach need to develop a set of strategies ("game"). Game, in of itself, is a part-way red-pill concept. Players need to be practical about the nature of women (CW). A man who works up the gumption to approach women will usually be rejected. When keeping up game on a regular basis, these rejections threaten to be ego shredding. He works hard and takes care of himself; he knows that he is not chopped liver; but women do not feel about him anything like the way he feels about them.

His resilience to carry on can be boosted by the knowledge that men see women in a much more generous light than vice versa. Men find the average woman fairly attractive, while women are only physically attracted to a small fraction of men. The gaming man can de-personalize his rejections by understanding the statistical truth that women are cruel in their evaluations of men.

The women's-nature side of CW is inescapable for the pick-up community. Promisingly, the Red Men now also hint at the other half of CW: questioning how much they should prioritize romantic success, and unlearning the programming that women are the measure of a man.

Electron #2 Self-reliance.

As the red pill teaches men about their own disposability in the eyes of society, it reinforces in them the need for strength and self-reliance. They cannot expect others to recognize their humanity. This realization tilts many red-pill men towards libertarian thinking, while also having the healthful effect of prompting them to take ownership and responsibility for their lives because, with nobody to help them, bootstrap power is all they have.

Electron #3 Gender Politics.

Whenever our politicians take up a gender-related policy, their gynocentism is in the driver's seat. Both the policies themselves, and the debates surrounding them reek of the assumption that women and their wants deserve primacy. Personally, my GA and MGP make me skeptical that a decent political discussion of gendered issues is even possible in the current cultural climate.

Electron #4 Welfare and Taxes.

In a democracy, as long as men are loyal to a fault, while women are loyal only to themselves, tax-based wealth redistribution will take money from men and give it to women. This fact nudges red-pill thinkers to favor conservative/libertarian low-tax policies, but that view is not a consensus. Others, instead, recognize the female favoritism as a blemish on the policy, but are willing to accept that burden in order to help people through the benefits.

Conclusion

For readers who identify with the manosphere, I hope that my descriptions of your attitudes rings true. If not, please contact me and explain. You can email me at jon@rappelant.com. For other readers, I hope that this introduction helps you to understand what lies at the core of red-pill thinking.

[1] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Appeal_to_nature, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Naturalistic_fallacy

Circumcision lawsuit crowd funding campaign

AVFM · 7 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

From Elizabeth Hobson at Justice for Men and Boys. -PE

Khari Boyd is a young combat veteran living in Philadelphia. He is seeking $10,000 to fund a move away from the family who gave permission for him to be mutilated and have subsequently responded with scorn to his distress over the issue – and a criminal case under Pennsylvania's child sex abuse statutes.

[image]

GoFundMe link – links to Khari's blog and social media accounts can also be found here.

Intactivism Strategy Forum, TONIGHT

Elizabeth Hobson · 8 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Tonight, Wednesday 8th April, 7pm Pacific Time – call in or join online.

We all Know It: It's Time to Take Intactivism to the Next Level.

Discussion will centre around a proposal for a new organization – Next Level Intactivism – whose main goal is to ensure all opportunities for Intactivism are expressed to their fullest potential! Mainly this means working with other organizations to improve their own outreach and to provide whatever support they may need. The main goal is to increase communication between the Intactivist community, increase support and generate donations, mobilize a volunteer force and educate intactivists so they can answer any question or rebuttal thrown at them.

Next Level Intactivism will be comprised of volunteers only. The organisation will not seek a budget at this current time, except for individual donations to cover printed materials drives or to pay for a website or other tangibles. All donated funds will be posted on the central website and payouts costs will be listed.

Next Level Intactivism will run an online web portal which will include:

1. Articles from contributing Intactivst groups. Intactivist organizations can solicit donations, inform Intactivists of their goals, events, and use the platform to educate Intactivists.

2. Online central magazine style hub for all Intactivist groups including scheduling all Intactivist events across the globe with easy filtering for Intactivists to find events in their local areas.

3. Online pool of volunteer opportunities for Intactivsts to share between groups.

In addition to a central online hub, Next Level Intactivism will be comprised of various committees each with clearly defined goals and objectives.

Sample of the proposed committees:

Print Flyers/Cards/Stickers/Brochures Committee
Website Development and Maintenance Committee
Donation and Funds Development Committee (to distribute between non-profit members)
Intactivist Historical Society
Mutilators Accountability Project
Doctor Accountability Project
Volunteers Organization/Action Committee
Legal Committee
Educate Intactivists Committee
Politician Outreach Committee
Scientific Research Committee
Victim Support Group

Lets put some BUTTER on the skids of Intactivism. ITS TIME!!!!

There are no plans at present to publish this conversation. To be involved:

Dial-in number (US): (515) 739-1015
Access code: 349-162-231#
International dial-in numbers: https://fccdl.in/i/349-162-231
Online meeting ID: 349-162-231
Join the online meeting: https://join.freeconferencecall.com/349-162-231

Male Suicide: Why are Men Leaving?—Part II

John Davis · 9 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Part II
Clinical Depression in Men

> "Battle not with monsters, lest ye become a monster, and if you gaze into the abyss, the abyss glares back into you."[1] —Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900)

In the first article in this series, we gained a brief view of the the problem of Men committing suicide in our modern age. We pointed to some of the most important factors that cause suicide—clinical depression, and willful indifference to men committing suicide. We also discussed how society's misandry (hatred of men) accelerates the causes of suicide in men.

[image]
Our institutions are designed to abandon men and encourage them to die
In this second part, we are going to take a look at some of the science that applies to men committing suicide.

Clinical Depression—The Abyss

Suicide is rarely a rational choice. Some cultures (such as the Samurai) adopted suicide as a rational choice in some circumstances. However, in modern times, most suicide in Men is a result of a medical condition known as "clinical depression."

Clinical depression is a medical condition. Two components contribute to clinical depression. The first involves biological conditions in men that make men vulnerable to clinical depression. For example, we know that, currently, the largest number of men committing suicide are white men in their mid fifties to early sixties. A biological factor that is probably causing that group to be vulnerable to clinical depression, and suicide, is the diminishing amount of testosterone that occurs in men who are aging. Another biological factor in clinical depression, and suicide in men, involves genetic factors which can make some men, of some races, more pre-disposed to suffer clinical depression than others.

In addition to biological factors that cause depression, there are psychological factors that are also causes. Someone who is constantly abused by his status in a culture, for instance, can develop clinical depression. A man who has had a run of "bad luck" in employment, or relationships, or in any area of life endeavors, can become "clinically depressed" as a result of consistent feelings of despondency and hopelessness.

Clinical depression is different from "depression," or "sadness," or "grief," or "feeling down." Clinical depression is an actual physical condition, involving the brain, central nervous system and a man's entire body. Clinical depression usually requires medical intervention to reverse a complex cycle of despondency and emotional pain causing physical changes. Those same physical changes in the body generate even more emotional pain, despondency and despair in a man.

The pain of clinical depression in its victims is very real. It is physical, as well as emotional, and, can become so devastating that it compels a man to end his life as the only means of escaping its seemingly endless torment.

Cultural Causes of Clinical Depression –

If we examine our current gynocentric culture, we can find the psychological factors that are contributing to clinical depression in men.

Our most reliable, objective indicator, is the timing at which the disparity in suicide, between men and women, began to skyrocket. The following graph shows that the disparity arose at about the same time that feminism and gynocentrism began its domination of our culture.

[image]
The Gender Suicide Gap coincides with the onset of Feminism in our institutions
In analyzing a graph like this, we cannot absolutely conclude that the skyrocketing suicide rate of men, occurring at the same time as the rise of feminism and gynocentrism, was caused by feminism and gynocentrism. However, there are many observations about the rise of feminism that argue, by themselves, that the rise of feminism and gynocentrism is the cause of men committing suicide at a much greater rate than women.

Feminism began in the benign disguise of creating "equality" for women. With 20/20 hindsight, however, we can see that feminism was something else.

Gender roles in cultures developed over thousands of years. Those roles were often necessitated by the harsh realities of survival. They represented a "division of labor" between the genders based upon their respective strong and weak points.

With the advent of the industrial revolution, many of those gender roles, and the necessity for them, began to change. Women sought changes, for their own gratification, to a social contract that was thousands of years old.

Our culture immediately saw the profit available for advancing women's interests [at the expense of men]. Flooding the market with women workers would automatically lower the cost and demand for labor. Madison avenue (the mainstream media) astutely recognized that although men earned money in our economy, the social contract called for women to control that money. Women were, therefore, targeted by corporate interests as being superior to men for purposes of corporate profit. Promoting feminism and gynocentrism then became an obsession with corporate America (and other countries imitating American corporate rule) and richly rewarded all businesses that pandered to the principles of feminism and gynocentrism.

This obsession is about profit . . . . It has nothing to do with "gender equality" except as a deceitful narrative.

With heavy, and organized support, from all institutions that were dependent on the profits of multi-nationals seeking profits from gynocentrism, our culture began to shame, demean, accuse and hate men and masculinity. Feminism, from the beginning, as well as those who profit from it, recognized that it was easy to manipulate voters and consumers, and men, through attacks on men and masculinity.

What should have been a rational re-negotiation of gender roles, under the social contract governing our civilization, became an all out war on men and masculinity, for profit, based on hate.

The Rise of the Feminist State—Monsters & the Abyss

This campaign of hate gave rise in Western cultures to a Feminist State.[2]

"The Feminist State" can best be described as a profit-motivated, concerted effort on the part of government, media, religion and multi-national corporations, to engage in the open hatred of men. At the same time, the "feminist state" justifies the hatred, and, uses it as a premise upon which to grant women special privileges, at the expense of men.

To persuade voters and consumers and "leaders" to adopt this campaign of hatred of men and masculinity, it was necessary for a wide, and relentless, dissemination of hateful media that demonized men, degraded men, and ultimately condemned men for their feelings, needs, historical accomplishments, and their masculine essence.

For fifty years, our culture, through mass media, has relentlessly portrayed men as worthless, rapists, wife beaters, undeserving, violent criminals, exploiters of women, child molesters, etc., etc., etc. All of this demonizing hate came from medieval stereotypes that the mass media perpetuated in its campaign of unrestrained misandry.

Is it any wonder that the skyrocketing rates of male suicide coincide with the onset of the feminist state, and, the hate campaign it inspired?

[image]
The “Society for Cutting up Men” has now become institutionalized in Western Culture and pervades all of our institutions
This campaign of mass propaganda, relentlessly pressed over a period of a half of a century, was psychological warfare on men. This misandry provided the psychological component to clinical depression that drove countless hundreds of thousands of men to suicide over that time.

Was this intentional “gender cleansing” on the part of the feminist state? At the very least the feminist state was, and remains, willfully blind to its war on men and the casualties.

In the next part of this series, we will take a look at Robin Williams, and, how the feminist state, and its hatred of men, caused the suicide of a gentle, loving man whose talent graced the lives of everyone he touched.

References:

[1] Wer mit Ungeheuern kämpft, mag zusehn, dass er nicht dabei zum Ungeheuer wird. Und wenn du lange in einen Abgrund blickst, blickt der Abgrund auch in dich hinein.” — Aph. 146

[2] The term: “feminist state,” was first coined by Prof. Linda Kelly in her law review article from 2003. Kelly, Linda, “Disabling The Definition of Domestic Abuse: How Women Batter Men And The Role of The Feminist State,” 30 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 790, 824 (2003).

Dear Young Men

Elizabeth Hobson · 10 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

#MeToo is a deeply flawed movement – and, besides the innocent lives that it's claimed, one of the most pernicious effects it's having is the re-engineering of human interactions. Men, collectively, have been doing nothing wrong. Women, collectively, have no aversion to men showing sexual interest in them. And yet, I keep seeing young men wracked with shame, believing that their instincts are base and promising to lead their lives according to feminist dictates. Gentlemen, you are breaking my heart and you are on paths to break your own.

Before I go on, I want to address the MGTOW reader: I fully support your decision and I wish you a secure and fulfilling life. With this piece of writing, I am not advocating for young men to choose to pursue romantic relationships with women – I am, rather, aware that many will choose to do that and I want to talk to them about navigating that way of life without the undue shame that so many are self-reporting.

Historically, there have been swings between prudish oppression of sexuality and liberation. We are highly lucky to be living in a time of relative liberation. But we need to defend our freedoms. There is an innate goodness in the natural romantic interplay of human beings – sometimes funny or tragic when misdirected, sometimes utterly beautiful when it brings two people together to create something meaningful.

#MeToo tells us that women suffer a lack of respect from men – that this is a societal problem and that it needs to be fixed. This is a delusion. Women in our society are privileged, celebrated, shown concern and support by men on individual levels and in policy. The worlds of men and women have collided in recent history – and the experiment has gone remarkably well, especially for women. In the vast majority of cases, people have proven themselves to be capable of navigating complex relationship events completely without reference to feminism.

Of course there are antisocial individuals, male and female. And the best safeguard against children growing up to engage in antisocial behaviour that we know of is (as a rule) ensuring that they have meaningful relationships with their fathers as well as their mothers. Funny then that we don't see many feminists protesting the systemic destruction of father-child relationships in family courts. What will not help is demonising an entire sex, driving a wedge between men and women and harking the archaic notion of female moral superiority.

Young men: your desires are not shameful. Your techniques to express sexual interest in women (even if they're clumsy, as long as you take no for an answer when clearly expressed) are not shameful. Romantic experiences are not always going to work out as you would hope – but if some radical extremist overreacts, then the problem is with her, not you. I worry that you're internalising feminist narratives but I think you have the capacity to recognise such situations. If your intentions were good and her response leaves you shocked and confused (if she tells you that your expressions betray misogyny or entitlement in particular) – there is a strong likelihood that you are a victim of hysterical and prejudiced emotional abuse with nothing to apologise for and nothing to beat yourself up over.

I highly recommend Darren Deojee's engaging and important International Conference on Men's Issues talk, 'Positive Masculinity: Standing on the Shoulders of Giants'. In it, Deojee advocates for young men to be shown patience and love and given space to mature emotionally. This culture of bullying men and boys needs to stop.

Think about the kind of language and the accusations that #MeToo advocates are using about men. Privilege, entitlement… They are all designed to perpetuate a cultural Marxist (oppressor/oppressed) narrative wherein the ends (protecting women from men) justify the means. This attitude has been shown consistently to be massively harmful – and the fact that it's now being applied to gender relations (the foundation of society) is utterly disturbing and tragic and we should all be furious about it. It is this myopic misandry that is cultivating atmospheres where wolf whistling or asking for a woman's phone number can be considered hate crimes.

There's a thoughtful piece by David Shackleton in 'Sons of Feminism' that describes, amongst events, an experience he had when he led a men's group. Three feminists came in to facilitate a discussion on whether men as a whole benefit from male violence against women in society. Without getting into details, nearly everyone in the room experienced others as powerful and themselves as disempowered. Shackleton writes that “power, between the genders at least, is very much in the eye of the beholder”. This suggestion that men express sexual interest in women (by vocalising it, looking at women, touching their knee…) because they feel entitled to women’s time, attention and bodies is ludicrous. It is my belief (tell me if I’m wrong) that you guys feel more like I have when expressing sexual interest in a potential partner – anxious, hopeful, and fundamentally certain that the power in the situation lies with the person in the position to accept or reject the offer.

Masculine energy is a powerful force (as is feminine energy) but our societies are not showing you how to harness it and they’re shaming you for your innate natures. Natures that are critically important to our societies, in large ways (that drive our development) and in small (personal) ways. Don’t accept the shame. The shame is rightfully on our societies. On our institutions, who have allowed a feminist minority to speak for us. On #MeToo that wants to govern the minutiae of your behaviour and subordinate your soul. Most women are non-feminist and more are waking up every day and rejecting this toxic ideology. We don’t hate you, because despite what Suzanna Danuta Walters claims, we have no right to hate you. Be authentic anyway – “it’s better to be hated for what you are than loved for what you are not”.

H.L. Mencken and the manosphere

Doug Mortimer · 11 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If you were browsing in a used bookstore and encountered a tome called In Defense of Women, you might immediately dismiss it as the handiwork of a male feminist and drop it like a turd. Author H.L. Mencken, however, was anything but a white knight, and his observations on "the woman problem," though made a century ago (the book was originally published in 1918 and an updated edition was published four years later) when the women's suffrage movement was in full swing, are still insightful and relevant today.

Mencken, was a huge literary celebrity in his day. The books and articles he wrote were considered cutting edge, as were The American Mercury and The Smart Set, the literary magazines he edited. As a young man, he took it upon himself to read great works of literature. He honed his distinctive prose style as a journalist in his hometown of Baltimore. In 1919, he turned out The American Language: An Inquiry into the Development of English in the United States, the definitive work on American English at that point in the nation's history, and remained relevant enough to go through three more editions. Pretty good for a guy who never spent a day in a college classroom.

Despite his abbreviated formal education, Mencken was a culture hero to generations of college students. His April 1926 visit to Boston (because an issue of The American Mercury was literally banned in Boston) drew throngs of admiring college students. Collections of his papers are housed at Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Dartmouth, and Johns Hopkins.

Mencken's paper trail was not only lengthy but littered with verbiage sure to distress modern-day social justice warriors. An appearance by the likes of Mencken at any of the aforementioned colleges today would result in false fire alarms, bullhorn-wielding activists, virtue-signaling faculty members, and slogan-chanting mobs.

As much as Mencken criticized, vilified, or simply poked fun at people, collectively or individually, he did not take sides. If he tore into a Republican incumbent, that did not mean he was endorsing the Democratic challenger. If he berated captains of industry, that did not mean he was a champion of the working man. He simply called 'em as he saw 'em, and the battle of the sexes was no exception. As biographer Fred Hobson (Mencken: A Life published in 1995) , put it, "Depending on the position of the reader, he was either a great defender of women's rights or, as a critic labeled him in 1916, 'the greatest misogynist since Schopenhauer.'"

Mencken defies categorization, but today he would probably be most at home in the classical liberal or libertarian camps. Interesting to note that The H.L. Mencken Club, founded in 2008, bills itself as "a Society for the Independent Right."

Mencken was sympathetic to Nietzchean philosophy (Mencken was born in 1880, so Nietzsche's writings were still fresh when he was young) and detested democracy and egalitarianism as he felt that they allowed lesser men (think beta males) to impose their will upon "first-rate men" (think alpha males), a phrase he used often.

Unlike elitists today, however, Mencken did not seek to manipulate the masses or impose his values on them. He was no reformer. Statism as a vehicle for social engineering was just getting started (Prohibition and women's suffrage both took effect in 1920) in America. Russia was much more "progressive" in those days.

The American manosphere was a very different place 100 years ago…or was it? True, a lot of the terminology in common parlance today wasn't around back then, but consider these quotes from In Defense of Women pertaining to:

HYPERGAMY:

They [women] are harder to please, and hence pleased less often.

Not one woman in a hundred ever marries her first choice among marriageable men.

The woman of true discretion, I am convinced, would much rather marry a superior man, even on unfavourable terms, than make John Smith her husband, serf and prisoner at one stroke.

MALE DISPOSABILITY:

The most civilized man is simply that man who has been most successful in caging and harnessing his honest and natural instincts – that is, the man who has done most cruel violence to his own ego in the interest of the commonweal. The value of this commonweal is always overestimated. What is it at bottom? Simply the greatest good to the greatest number – of petty rogues, ignoramuses and poltroons.

MGTOW:

It is difficult, in all history, to find six first-rate philosophers who were married men.

Nine men out of ten would be quite happy, I believe, if there were no women in the world, once they had grown accustomed to the quiet.

PATRIARCHY AND RAPE CULTURE:

There are, of course, women who spend a great deal of time denouncing and reviling men, but these are certainly not genuine man-haters; they are simply women who have done their utmost to snare men, and failed. Of such sort are the majority of inflammatory suffragettes of the sex-hygiene and birth-control species. The rigid limitation of offspring, in fact, is chiefly advanced by women who run no more risk of having unwilling motherhood forced upon them than so many mummies of the tenth dynasty.

The woman who is not pursued set up the doctrine that pursuit is offensive to her sex, and wants to make it a felony. No genuinely attractive woman has any such desire. She likes masculine admiration, however violently expressed, and is quite able to take care of herself.

All the more intelligent women that I know, indeed, are unanimously of the opinion that no girl in her right mind has ever been actually seduced since the world began.

NEOTENY:

Oldish men are so often taken by girls in their teens. It is not that age calls maudlinly to youth, as the poets would have it; it is that age is no match for youth, especially when age is male and youth is female.

FAMILY LAW COURT INJUSTICE:

Under the contract of marriage, all the duties lie upon the man and all the privileges appertain to the woman.

Let him [the husband] undertake the slightest rebellion, over and beyond mere rhetorical protest, and the whole force of the state comes down upon him …. She is under no legal necessity whatsoever to carry out her part of the compact at the altar of God, whereas he faces instant disgrace and punishment for the slightest failure to observe its last letter.

THE MALE GAZE:

I give you my word that there were not five women at either national convention [in 1920] who could have embraced me without first giving me chloral. Some of the stateswomen on show, in fact, were so downright hideous that I felt faint every time I had to look at them.

The average man, whatever his stupidity, is at least keen enough in judgment to prefer a wink from a genuinely attractive woman to the last delirious favors of the typical suffragette.

The way to put an end to the gaudy crimes that the suffragist alarmists talk about is to shave the heads of all the pretty girls in the world, and pull their teeth, and put them in khaki, and forbid them to wriggle on dance-floors, or to wear scents, or to use lip-sticks or to roll their eyes.

Now don't infer from the above that Mencken believed in male superiority. On the contrary, he thought that the average woman was superior to the average man. He might have been observing the effects of the bell curve in which more women than men gravitate towards the mean. At any rate, here are his thoughts on the subject:

I am convinced that the average woman, whatever her deficiencies, is greatly superior to the average man. The very ease with which she defies and swindles him in several capital situations of life is the clearest proof of her general superiority.

The very fact that marriages occur at all is a proof, indeed, that they [women] are more cool-headed than men, and more adept in employing their intellectual resources, for it is plainly to a man's interest to avoid marriage as long as possible, and as plainly to a woman's interest to make a favourable marriage as soon as she can.

His inherent sentimentality is the chief weapon in the hand of his opponent. …it makes him, above all, see a glamour of romance in a transaction which, even at its best, contains almost as much gross trafficking, at bottom, as the sale of a mule.

"The woman problem" Mencken wrote about 100 years ago is small potatoes compared to what it is today. Indeed, these days we are more likely to hear about "the man problem." I would not presume to put words in Mencken's mouth, but if he were around today he would likely have nothing flattering to say about either sex.

His opinions about women aside, Mencken's celebrity status assured he did not lack for female attention. A lifelong proponent of bachelorhood, he finally tied the knot at age 50. Predictably, his critics said he was a traitor to the cause. Well, he married a woman 22 years his junior (a writer/English professor), so even he was not immune to neoteny. Ironically, his wife was not in good health, and he outlived her by 21 years. He chose not to marry again.

Mencken should serve as a posthumous spokesman for the manosphere. Like any contemporary MRA, he saw the legal injustices perpetrated against men and pointed them out, all the while leading a MGTOW lifestyle.

Most importantly, Mencken not only championed free speech, he was its most eloquent practitioner. In today's world of tweets, texting, and sound bites, a dose of Mencken is a reminder that there used to be such a thing as a prose style. If you don't believe it, just type in his name at any of the internet sites devoted to famous quotes. Or you can read the complete text of In Defense of Women by going to www.gutenberg.org.

It's a first-rate read by a first-rate writer and a first-rate man.

Spain's new sex czar

John Davis · 13 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The birthrate in countries that pander to feminism and misandry (man-hating) are, without exception, showing huge declines in their birthrates and net population increases.

Spain, Denmark, Germany, France and the UK are all panicking because their fertility rates are so low, that their indigenous populations will be extinct within a century. In addition, all of those countries have huge social obligations to aging populations, and, those obligations are coming due as there are not enough young people to pay into socialist systems for the care of their elders.

One of the ways that the elite, in Western European countries (and the US) are trying to see if it will improve the declining populations, is to have open borders so that men will come from North African countries (mostly) to have sex with Western European women.

Feminism, in Western European countries, has been unchallenged for over 60 years, and, is now de rigeur in all institutions, especially Europe's public indoctrination (education) system. Hatred of men, and masculinity, in Western European nations, is open and oppressive to men. It is one of the factors driving the gender suicide gap world-wide (in which men are committing suicide at 4 times the rate of women). It is also the principal reason behind the decline in birth rates, and, the net population decreases.

Spain's approach has been to appoint a "sex czar" to encourage Spanish men to have sex with Spanish women.

Edelmira Barreira Diz—Spain's new "sex czar."

The problem is that Spain hates men, so much, that virtually every aspect of Spain's institutions, its economy, its politics and its social interaction between men and women is now so toxic for men that only men with nothing to lose can afford to have sex with Spanish women.

Let's take an example. If a woman who is spiteful in Spain (a large number of women fall in this category) all she has to do is accuse a man of sexual misconduct, or "domestic violence" and he is thrown in prison. No questions asked. If he can prove he is innocent, he might get out. If he can't, he's branded a rapist, or a wife-beater, and, the rest of his life is ruined. Whether the accusations against him are true or false, the Government immediately pays the woman for making the accusations (at the rate of 400 euros per month). This scheme is reminiscent of the fascism of Franco's rule when, in 1944, he enacted laws punishing "contempt for gender" (which were exclusively enforced against men).

Spain has 106 courts set up to punish men (but not women) for domestic violence.

The last time a nation set up a demographic court to punish one particular demographic was in 1930 when the Nazis set up a system of courts to pass judgment on jews.

Spanish men (much like American men) are employing the "deadly rattlesnake strategy" when dealing with Spanish women. If you are surrounded by rattlesnakes, the best strategy is to get away from them. Spanish men, as they are in the US, are simply staying away from Spanish women.

The Spanish government, as in most fascists governments, thinks the best way to force men to have sex with Spanish women is to impose even more government control and regulation on men, and masculinity, to get men to have sex with rattlesnakes. In the meantime, Spain's net populations growth since the spread of feminism has been, and remains, plummeting.

With the spread of feminism in Western Europe, Spain's birthrate and net population growth is plummeting. (The grey dotted line shows the number of deaths exceeding the number of births (yellow dotted line).
The Spanish government, notwithstanding its "sex czar" has been, and, remains, clueless.

Next, we will explore the Orwellian attempt in Denmark, in which Denmark (unsuccessfully) promulgated a massive propaganda campaign, on mass media, to try to get Danish men to have sex with Danish women "for mom" and "for the State." [You can't make this stuff up.]

From Denmark's state sponsored "do it for the country" sex propaganda to try to get men to have sex with Danish feminists.

Denmark begs men to have sex with its feminists

John Davis · 18 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

> "Something is rotten in the state of Denmark." Hamlet (1.4), Marcellus to Horatio

Klampenborg Park in Coppenhagen

I love Denmark, and the people of Denmark. Some of my fondest memories are of riding on horseback through Klampenbourg Park and meeting men and women who were generally kind, thoughtful, helpful and friendly people.

Denmark, however, has fallen ill to a festering infection known as "feminism." It is the same illness that has taken hold of the rest of Scandanavia, Western Europe and the UK. Because of this gender infirmity, Denmark's birth rate, and, its population growth, has been plummeting (as is true with most of Western Europe).

Feminism has given women in Denmark an immunity from civility, and, license to openly hate and ridicule men. For example, it is not uncommon for girls to be sitting on a bus, in a group, and have them openly point to a man and discuss how unattractive he is. The Danish legal system is set up so that once a woman has "been impregnated" by a man, the man is completely disposable in divorce, and, the man's role as a sperm donor is further degraded by requiring him to pay for the child for the rest of his life so that the impregnated woman may enjoy her fulfillment as a modern feminist.

Denmark still imposes all of the obligations of men that have survived medieval chivalry, yet, virtually sees men as nothing but completely disposable sperm donors (who are occasionally allowed to work in the Danish socialist job market).

Denmark's feminist culture, laws and government view and treat men as nothing but disposable sperm donors. The result is that only about 20% of Danish men are actively in the dating pool. Danish women are constantly complaining about not having enough men to satisfy their desires for sexual and social intercourse. Yet, Danish women will viciously guard their feminism, hatred of men, life plans to treat men as disposable, and the concept that men are irrelevant except to give the woman sperm, and, the child some semblance of legitimacy.

One with intellect, sensitivity, education (instead of the indoctrination that feminism requires) and human dignity might think that the solution to this problem would be to encourage women to learn something about human compassion, respect, human value beyond sex, and, the beauty of binding interpersonal relationships.

The Danish government doesn't have any of those problems . . . . Here is the Danish government's solution. This is just one advertisement of an intense propaganda campaign the Danish feminist government undertook to try to beg men to inseminate Danish women (for "Mom" and for "The State").

* TRIGGER WARNING * This will offend your intelligence, and, if you are a man, it will grind down your dignity and self-respect with a boot-heel.

Spies Rejser is the Danish state travel agency.

Note how the advertisement features a prominent man-hating feminist in the narrative in order to appease the fascist feminist lobby that controls the country's social laws and norms.

Note how the advertisement relegates the man to a mere decoration and accessory and sperm donor.

Note how the key solution, in the minds of the feminist State, is for women to seduce (and rape (she employs force at the end of the video which would be a serious crime if a man did it)) the man, as opposed to an honest interaction between two adults seeking mutual love, respect and compassion for each other.

"Do it for Denmark!"

The mass media feminist propaganda campaign was an abysmal failure in Denmark. The government remains clueless.

"Something is [indeed] rotten in the State of Denmark."

Let’s imitate Hungary and make a bonfire of Women’s and Gender Studies

Janice Fiamengo · 19 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Hungary is bidding good riddance to the academic junk food of Gender Studies and Women’s Studies. Last week, the Hungarian government announced plans to withdraw funding from gender studies programs at state-funded universities “after determining the programs serve no identifiable purpose and are based on ‘ideology rather than science.’”

The decision will affect only a small number of students, according to the report, because such programs are not yet popular or widespread in Hungary. In many parts of the English-speaking world, in contrast, tens of thousands of students take courses and earn degrees in Gender Studies, which is sometimes called Women’s Studies, or Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality studies.

Defunding such programmes in more liberal parts of Europe and North America and Canada, would trigger off feminist paroxysms of apocalyptic proportions. But if Hungarian officials are correct that they serve no purpose and are based in ideology rather than science, should we not seriously consider abolishing them?

I have argued for years that the answer to this question is an emphatic and unqualified yes. Evidence drawn from the programs’ own websites suggests that, far from serving no purpose at all, they exist to create foot soldiers for feminist social change, mainly by transforming the role of women and greatly enlarging the reach of the feminist state.

Take a look, as one random example, at the two professors who head up the University of Warwick’s Centre for the Study of Women and Gender. Both emphasise their involvement in feminist activism. Director Nickie Charles researches how women “through involvement in social movements can bring about social change.” Deputy Director Maria Pereira “maintains an active involvement in feminist movements.” Gender studies programmes make no pretence of pursuing knowledge for the sake of truth.

On the matter of the content of the courses, the Hungarian government is unquestionably correct. Women’s and Gender Studies programmes produce and promote ideology rather than science or objective knowledge. In particular, they advance theories of oppression and resistance, often employing a range of different kinds of feminist, Marxist, queer, post-modern, post-colonial, eco-critical, and other theories.

While theories are often employed in academic research and teaching, their purpose in legitimate disciplines is to be tested. Feminist theories are not tested except through comparison with other feminist or related (leftist) theories. They are almost never tested against non-feminist (or anti-feminist) theories. The fundamental tenets of feminism—that gender is a social construct and that all major world cultures, especially western cultures, are built on a deep-seated misogyny resulting in the subjugation of women—are not up for debate. These tenets are presented as truths to be learned.

That hundreds of thousands of students across the English-speaking world learn dogma as truth is a staggering testament to the triumph of ideology at institutions of higher education.

A good example of the unproven/unprovable ideological biases of gender theory can be found in the reading material for a course offered at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, Canada in 2015 called "Gender, Race, Sex, and Power," described as an introduction to "intersectional feminist scholarship and debate." The required reading on the subject of gender was a chapter called "Introduction to Gender" from a textbook Language and Gender by Penelope Eckert and Sally McConnell-Ginet.

The authors of this text are typical of most feminist ideologues in adhering to the theory that gender is a social construct, telling us in the opening pages of the chapter that "the very definition of the biological categories male and female, […] is ultimately social." Given that anything humans do in language is ultimately dependent on society, of course the labels male and female are in that sense social. But Eckert and McConnell-Ginet mean far more than that.

Eckert and McConnell-Ginet mean that gender is something we "perform," (a very popular word in gender discourse) with little or no basis in biology. They assert that "Labelling someone a man or a woman is a social decision," i.e. it has no natural or biological basis that pre-exists language. Everything in the chapter follows from this key plank of feminist thought, which mandates a consistent downplaying or outright denial of natural, biological differences in male-female nature and development.

Eckert and McConnell-Ginet chronicle what they term the scripting of masculine and feminine identities from human infancy to adulthood. In their argument, un-gendered infants are made into boys and girls by conditioning and modelling; their masculinity and femininity are an effect of cultural programming. The implication throughout the discussion is that boys and girls can and should be re-conditioned and re-modelled at will.

The authors also include a section on what they call the manufacturing of heterosexual desire, which is also not natural, they tell us, but "highly structured and learned" through "dominant socially endorsed images." This claim is also a common plank of gender ideology: in particular, the chapter argues that girls and women are taught to desire men not because it is natural but because girls and women are bombarded from a young age by images of heterosexual romance. The implication is that there is something potentially nefarious about this process, and that girls might be better off learning a different way of being.

The authors also discuss the supposed devaluing of the feminine in culture, claiming that male activities are more highly valued than female activities, and that girls are often told that their femaleness will prevent them from pursuing conventionally-male professions and activities. As an example, they claim that a girl will conventionally learn that she cannot be an astronaut when she grows up because she is a girl.

Another section of the chapter emphasises the pervasive inequalities and injustices that work against women in everything from household chores to the order in which men and women tend to be mentioned in sentences. The emphasis of this section is on the multifarious ways in which girls and women are consistently disadvantaged in relation to boys and men in our society. Such assertions are likely, of course, to produce resentment and anger in female readers who accept that the history of humanity is a history of injustice against their sex.

What is especially notable about the chapter is that it gives no indication that such claims about gender are in any way contentious.

"It's so cool! If you use your imagination, you can blame men for everything!"

Students aren't made aware of the hundreds of studies that have revealed significant biological differences between men and women. They're not even told that there is a debate on the matter, or that trained scientists have reached a consensus about the biological basis of sex that cannot simply be denied. In fact, readers are given the opposite impression, that the social constructionists have the far more sophisticated case.

It is presented as fact that "Gender is the […] process of creating a dichotomy [between male and female] by effacing similarity and elaborating on difference, and where there are biological differences, these differences are exaggerated and extended in the service of constructing gender." Here the authors (reluctantly) admit that there may be some biological basis to sex difference but maintain that it is significantly exaggerated by both researchers and popular commentators.

The authors cite some few scientific studies in support of their position, but no student reading the chapter and being introduced to the idea of gender as a social construct would have any idea that a majority of scientists have come in good faith to the opposite view of the physiological and biological basis of sex difference. For a compendious summation of hundreds of studies of sex differences, see Steven Rhoads' Taking Sex Differences Seriously.

What is perhaps most shocking in the feminist introduction to gender is the strong suggestion by Eckert and McConnell-Ginet that any researcher who focuses on biological differences between men and women is corrupt. Readers are told, for example, that everyone from scientists to journalists to the reading public has an insatiable appetite for sensationalistic gender news: "Any results that might support physiological differences are readily snatched up and combined with any variety of gender stereotypes in some often quite fantastic leaps of logic. And the products of these leaps can in turn feed directly into social, and particularly into educational policy, with arguments that gender equity in such 'left-brain areas' as mathematics and engineering is impossible."

The authors give no examples of these "fantastic leaps of logic," but the statement tells students in no uncertain terms that whenever they encounter a claim about natural differences between male and female, they can reliably shut their minds to it. They can be certain that "gender stereotypes" and "fantastic leaps of logic" are at work in biased, ideologically-driven individuals, probably misogynists who want to prevent women from achieving what they're capable of in mathematics and engineering. It is never admitted that the authors of this chapter, who are not scientists—in fact, they are both linguists—might themselves be choosing their examples and studies to support an ideological position for which there is scant evidence and abundant counter-evidence.

On every major facet of gender knowledge, the chapter opts for feminist orthodoxy over unbiased, research-based discussion, distorting students' understanding by telling them not only that social constructionist theories are true but also that scientific facts about sex difference are false.

Students emerge from such programs misinformed about the world and filled with a revolutionary zeal as baseless as it is dangerous. Gender and Women's Studies are about as academic or scientific as Tooth Fairy Studies or Yogic Flying or Voodoo Studies. Taxpayers should not be forced to fund these Mickey Mouse courses and students should flee from these fake disciplines like the prophet Elijah fled from the wicked queen Jezebel.

*This article first published at The Rebel Priest.

Memes that will get you banned from social media #1 Asia Argento

AVFM Meme of the Week · 21 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Feel free to send us yours to submissions@avoiceformen.com. We will post up to 1 per week. PE

[image]
Mandatory Credit: Photo by Vianney Le Caer/Invision/AP/REX/Shutterstock (9685943u)
Actress Asia Argento speaks about being raped by Harvey Weinstein during the closing ceremony of the 71st international film festival, Cannes, southern France
2018 Closing Ceremony, Cannes, France – 19 May 2018

#WhatAboutUsBlokes

Rob Tiller · 22 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist commentator Clementine Ford would be a nightmare in couples counselling I suspect. If her crazy-making political antics translate to her love life, she'd be whipping out her frequent flyer victim card and pointing the blame finger before Mr Ford could spit out his first gripe. How could any therapist help one of the shrillest radical voices in Australia get along better with her partner when deep down she doesn't appear to like or respect men very much? Senator Leyonhelm recently termed it "misandry", the female version of misogyny.

In one of Ford's more recent Fairfax rants she sarcastically professes, "as everyone knows, the most oppressed person in the world today is the humble white man". For a split second, I caught myself feeling sorry for her son's father, a white guy, for the racist rants he must frequently cop. In my private practice, I generally view relationship partners as 'volunteers' and try to avoid dealing victim status to either gender unless there are significant levels of unilateral partner violence. Even if Ms Ford is keeping her hands to herself, I imagine Mr Ford might benefit from some military-grade assertiveness coaching.

Ten years as a couples counsellor has taught me that men and women both can act out aggressive tendencies during conflict. Bettina Arndt, in her classic article Always Beating Up on Men, notes "most family violence is two-way aggression, with international research showing about a third of couples have a go at each other — pushing, slapping, shoving or worse".

Lena Dunham, America's version of Ford, said during the Trump election "white men can't understand what it's like to be under attack". Tell that to the thousands of boys abused and neglected daily by their Aussie mums or the growing numbers of Australian men shaking off the stigma and revealing they are bashed and bruised both emotionally and physically by their female partners regularly. Of course, some women act out aggressively and, yes Ms Dunham, women attack men.

They also attack other women. In her article, Ford paused from trashing men and shifted her cross-hairs to Sydney Watson who's organized a March for Men in Melbourne this Saturday. Sydney has a masters in journalism and a growing YouTube audience interested in Australian conservative values and free speech (free speech isn't protected by the Australian constitution). Sydney says, "As far as I can see society is unlikely to be functional if we continue to put down one entire gender in order to prop up the other — what we're trying to do (with the march) is show we care about the men in our lives and we care about the issues that concern them."

There is a crisis of masculinity and no Ms Ford, not because of 'patriarchy' or 'toxic masculinity'. Terms she, and others like her, deploy as divisive red herrings designed to discount men's humanity and the very real suffering many men across Australia experience daily. Imagine being told by a defunct family court system that as a father you aren't allowed to see your children but it's okay to go neck deep in debt continuing to provide for them. Or boys being singled out in public school classrooms by a demeaning, tax-payer funded White Ribbon campaign whose questionable agenda forces them to stand up (while girls stay seated) and endure a public shaming for being male. Boys and men both internalize these culture-wide 'men suck' messages and our masculine self-image and mental health are damaged as a result.

Six Australian males kill themselves every day and while culture and government are being hoodwinked by Ford's style of polarising anti-male propaganda good men everywhere are falling through the cracks. The truth is every one of us personally knows a male in crisis, if not several, in our family or community. Which means our community and national leaders are continuing to drop the ball when it comes to accurately assessing and effectively supporting men's physical, mental and emotional health (try googling "Australian minister for men's affairs").

As families and friends, we can all actively check-in with close men by asking questions regarding how they're coping and hanging in for answers even if they go stoic or try to shrug you off. If red flags outnumber positive signs take action by helping them access male-friendly support. Do your research as many government-funded community mental health agencies frame their treatment models on Ford's destructive brand of feminism. More than you might think.

The March for Men is this Saturday, August 25, from 1 – 4:00 pm at Federation Square in Melbourne. Please join us in standing together to show appreciation for the men and boys in our lives and celebrate the value of masculinity in our society. You can find us on Facebook at MarchforMenAus.

A declaration of values

Peter Ryan · 26 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday I attended the March For Men in Melbourne, Australia and I wanted to write about some thoughts from that day. There has been a lot of media spin both before and after the march and I felt it necessary to set the record straight and explain why from my own individual experience, men and women like me were marching.

It was a great day, we had great weather and hundreds of people came to show their support and march. There were also the violent and disruptive protestors from the universities (hosts for their protest are listed as: National Union Of Students LGBTI, National Union Of Students Women's Department, Books Not Bombs and Campaign Against Racism and Fascism) and a heavy police presence required to protect my own personal safety and the safety of others attending the march. The March For Men was about showing men that they matter too, that men have particular issues that need to be addressed and are worthy of support and that both men and women can stand together to support men.

I attended the march for many reasons. I wanted to show my support for men and for the individuals that stuck their necks out on my behalf to make this march possible. I marched for my own rights and also for the men I have personally known that have committed suicide or attempted it. I marched to make the point that I should be able to march freely in support of men in a democratic and developed country.

I marched because if nothing is done to address the serious and growing issues facing men and boys, then sooner or later civilisation will collapse under the weight of these problems. This is the Fempocalypse Karen Straughan has discussed. I am talking particularly about the multi-decade impact of not addressing the boy crisis in education and not addressing fatherlessness and the serious long term social and economic consequences that will unfold as a result over the next 20-30 years. Alison Tieman was correct when she said at the 2018 International Conference On Men's Issues, that these issues affecting men and boys will eventually impact everyone. Men, women, boys, girls, men's rights activists, feminists, governments, the private sector and the wider public alike, will all be negatively impacted. There will not be a single corner of society unaffected from letting men's issues remain unaddressed and continuing to let them grow.

The main reason that I marched though, was to declare my values and march for them. My participation was in quite a literal sense about me walking the talk. I have supported the men's movement through my writing and also through my donations. But when the opportunity came to March For Men, nothing was going to stop me, not even the feminist protestors that we ended up outnumbering 3 to 1. I am a man going his own way and I also support the men's movement and individuals and groups that support men. I do not hate women and I am not a male supremacist or a Nazi. I am not a racist or a bigot. All the feminists could do was throw these labels at us and strawman to the max. They have no argument and no defence for their appalling behaviour.

This is what I believe in, just to make it clear. I believe that men and women should be held to the same standard of accountability and are worthy of the same level of compassion. I believe that men and women's lives are of equal value and that both men and women are equally deserving of respect. I believe that the true value of a human life is based on the irreplaceable and unique nature of each individuals mind and body. There will be no one else like you or me on the face of this Earth again. I believe that people are at their best when they can freely be their own individual self and take responsibility for setting the direction of their own lives and make their own choices. I make my decisions and form my opinions based on facts and I do not blindly follow ideology. I consider myself an individual first and I think for myself. I am a man that goes his own way and sets his own direction in life according to his own values. I do not let other people dictate to me who I am, what to think, what to do with my own life or what choices I should make. That is what MGTOW is about, it is about going your own way and not someone else's way. The fact some people interpret that as hatred of women, shows you how terrified some people in society are with men making their own decisions and thinking for themselves. No one has the right to dictate to another person who they are and what to do with their own life. No one.

I firmly believe that men and women are naturally driven by our biology to be together. We are a pair bonding species and the sexes have co-evolved together. Men and women are really two halves of one biological unit to perpetuate the genome. Our species and our civilisation has the best chance of survival and prosperity, when men and women maximise working together as partners and supporting each other. I believe one key measure of the health and future prosperity of a society, is how well men and women treat each other. The degree of antagonism between men and women will determine the rate at which society declines.

If one sex suffers then both do eventually and so do the children. Cooperation between the sexes is not something that is hardwired to always occur and antagonism between the sexes is not something that is hardwired to always occur either. Society has to actually be structured around and based on functional values that foster cooperation between the sexes and discourages antagonism. There is nothing to be gained in the long run from feminism demonising men and boys, except decades of needless and avoidable suffering for not just men and boys, but women and girls as well. Our civilisation is going to pay a heavy price for marginalising the male half of society. The nuclear family is an essential building block of developed civilisation and it is dependent on maintaining strong, fair and healthy relations between men and women, based on mutual trust and respect.

These are ideas, values and principles that the far-left feminist protestors do not want to accept and vehemently oppose. They claim to be for equality and yet will not let men and women come together to show support for men and the issues they face. It has never been about equality for feminists. They want female supremacy and they want to impose their agenda on everyone else. They are not interested in reason or facts. This is about power and control. At no point during the entire march, did any of these protestors attempt to listen or have a civil discussion with any of us. Instead they decided to be disruptive, violent and blow horns.

Why do I have to be concerned for my personal safety when attending a March For Men? I was not at a Nazi hate rally. I was at a march that simply was showing support for the male half of the human race. That was all the march was for. Why was a heavy police presence required to protect my personal safety? Why does men and women showing compassion for men, attract violence and hatred from feminists who claim to be about equality? What does that say about the state of the society men and boys have to live in?

What I saw from the protestors resembled a cult of brainwashed individuals. Feminism is a hate movement and if people doubt that then they can read this Washington Post article from one feminist professor titled, "Why Can't We Hate Men". This is hardly an isolated incident of a feminist academic openly expressing a hatred for men and boys. There are numerous other examples of this. So it is hardly surprising that the people protesting the March For Men came from the universities, where there is such a misandric and bigoted feminist presence at these supposed institutions of "higher learning". Our universities have indeed become "institutions of higher indoctrination", as Studio Brule described.

If people doubt that this is a problem, then watch this video. What happened on Saturday at the March For Men, has happened before at other events attempting to discuss men's issues all over the world. Feminists from the universities have regularly attempted to disrupt any discussion of men's issues in not just Australia, but also Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, just to name a few places. As Prof. Janice Fiamengo said at the University of Ottawa 4 years ago, "It's the signature of a totalitarian ideology to attempt to quash dissent". It is indeed! Much of what feminism claims to be fighting against is projection. They are the fascists. Feminists are the ones that are out to violently disrupt men and women from peacefully discussing and marching for men's issues. Feminists are the authoritarians.

Feminists tried to shut us down. They tried to use violence, aggression and fear to prevent us from attending and marching for men and they failed. They will continue to keep failing and they will continue to get more and more bigoted, hateful and desperate as time goes on. But in the end it will amount to nothing. People are starting to wake up to them. Reasonable and sensible people are starting to see feminism for what it really is- a female supremacist hate movement. The only thing feminists accomplished at the March For Men, was to make themselves look like hypocrites and bigots.

I wanted to close this article by thanking all of the organisers I did not get to personally thank. I did get a brief moment to thank Sydney Watson and Rob Tiller personally for what they have done over the last few months. It was good to meet them in person. Although there was not enough time for me to tell them who I am and what I do and although I have to keep my identity private for personal and professional reasons, I was happy to at least let them know in person how thankful I was that they have stood their ground and done what they have.

I said this to Rob Tiller and I will say it again, I am a pretty private and quiet guy and I do not go out to marches on a regular basis, but for this march I really wanted to come and show my support. It was the least I could do and I am glad that I did. As I said to you at the march, thank you again for having the courage for standing by your values and for taking a stand and for helping support this event. It was disgraceful what happened to you, but it is their loss. The truth on domestic violence needs to be told and the stance you have taken both before and since, is so badly needed right now, particularly in Australia and is an incredibly brave thing to do given the level of feminist thought policing when it comes to domestic violence. It is not something I will forget and I was happy to donate some money to you under my actual name a few months back.

As for Sydney Watson, I knew I was right about you when I first cited your work in one of my articles and you have not disappointed. It takes an exceptional individual to do what you did and organise this march in the feminist capital of Australia and take all the shit you did from the mainstream media and from our local feminist university mob. You had my respect before you organised this march and now you have my admiration. Your values reflect my own. You are a courageous woman and set an excellent example for people to follow. I will definitely be supporting you further on Patreon.

It is important that men see that there are women who care about men and it also important that those women see that men value that quality in women. This is particularly important when many men and boys, including myself, go to work, go to school, turn on the TV and on a daily basis get barraged with hateful messages simply for being a man or a boy, or worse experience discrimination and marginalisation because of our sex being male.

It is entirely possible for men and women to rise about feminism and the gynocentric aspects of our culture. I do really believe it is within our grasp as a society to treat men and women with equal compassion and respect and also to hold men and women to the same standard of responsibility and accountability. It will be men and women working together in solidarity, that will generate the social change required to make that possible. Whilst I know the path forward will be a long one, as long as we stand up for our values and support each other in doing so, I am confident that given time we can rise above gynocentrism and feminism as a society.

On a practical note, the seeds of the feminist cancer on society are the universities. Reforming the universities and removing hateful feminist ideology from these institutions as Hungary has recently done, is going to be critically important to the future survival of Western civilisation. Our future journalists, teachers, policy makers, law makers, academics, lawyers, mental health professionals, HR professionals, politicians and business leaders come from these institutions.

The spread of feminist ideology through our institutions, governments and major corporations has been facilitated by the feminist control of the universities and their indoctrination of students that go off to work in those areas. If we are going to stop feminism from doing further damage to society, then the universities have to be taken back. That must be a top priority. I have seen the problem myself when I was still a university student years ago and I saw it on Saturday. It has a solution, but pressure will have to be applied for the universities to change. Feminism has to be ripped out of university.

For those that would like to see what happened at the March For Men I have linked the video here. The talks start at the 41minute and 46 second mark.

Is feminism hate speech?

Philip Carl Salzman · 27 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Belinda Brown began her recent article "An Obituary to Feminism" by arguing that "It is high time that feminism was recognised as a hate movement, that its ideology was felt as an embarrassment and being a feminist was seen as a badge of shame."

Is this a fair assessment of feminism?

Let us examine statements by prominent feminists to gauge their sentiments. And, as a trial exercise, let us substitute the referent, in most cases "men," with other referent categories, to see how we feel about the altered statement.

"The Future is Female"

This slogan was displayed on a T-shirt sold by a feminist bookstore in 1975, and reproduced in Los Angeles in 2015. According to Rachel Berks, who is responsible for the resuscitation of the T-shirt, "It's thrilling to see people embrace something that came out of the '70s lesbian separatist moment."[1] The popular shirt with its slogan is widely displayed in North America.

But the slogan was not entirely original in 1975, Sally Miller Gearhart, the author of The Wanderground, said in her 1982 pamphlet "The Future, if there is one, is female." Nor is the idea deemed out of date, as the popular T-shirt shows. Addressing the 2017 MAKERS conference, Hillary Clinton said, "Despite all the challenges we face, I remain convinced that, yes, the future is female."[2]

Once critic, Heather Wilhelm, asks, "What does "the future is female" even mean? Is one half of the human race going into hiding? Fading into irrelevance?" [3]

Let's try some substitutions: What would we think of the slogan, "The future is Asian"? A bit racist? Or, "The future is Muslim"? A bit supremacist? How about the most obvious one: "The future is male"? A bit sexist? A bit misogynist?

"Man-hating is an honourable act"

Robin Morgan takes the view that "man-hating is an honourable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class hatred against the class that is oppressing them".[4]

Morgan, along with many other feminist authors, deal conceptually only with global female vs. male categories, a Manichean opposition of good females vs. evil males. Treating all men as if they are exactly the same, half the people in the world as if they are all the same, is, to say the least, lacking in nuance.

Suzanna Danuta Walters agrees. In her article "Why Can't We Hate Men?" she insists men should "Pledge to vote for feminist women only. Don't run for office. Don't be in charge of anything. Step away from the power. We got this."[5]

Let us try some substitute referents: "Asian-hating is an honourable and viable political act." "Anglophone-hating is an honourable and viable political act." "Jew-hating is an honourable and viable political act." Well, yes, honourable, if you believe that racism and antisemitism are honourable. How about "woman-hating is an honourable and viable political act"? Or, "Why Can't We Hate Asians?" "Why Can't We Hate Whites?" "Why Can't We Hate Jews?"

Not very civil. Advocating hate is not very civil.

We need a drastic reduction of the population of males

In order to ensure that "the future is female," some prominent feminist argues that the population of males must be reduced. Sally Miller Gearhart said in her 1982 pamphlet, "The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race." She suggests first steps: "It's not genocide, exactly. It's more like job attrition, the way employers cut back positions without actually firing anyone. A 75 per cent female to 25 per cent male ratio could be achieved in one generation if one half of a population reproduced heterosexually and one half by ovular merging".[6]

As recently as 1999 these sentiments were echoed by Mary Daly in an interview called 'No Man's Land' for the EnlighteNext magazine with Susan Bridle. "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. People are afraid to say that kind of stuff any more", she ruefully adds.[7]

Let's substitute: "We should reduce the population of natives by 80%." "We should reduce the population of Muslims by 80%." We should reduce the population of whites by 80%." Just a partial genocide; nothing to object to.

"Toxic masculinity"

Suzanna Danuta Walters says that we live in "the land of legislatively legitimated toxic masculinity." According to the site "geek feminism," "Toxic masculinity…refers to the social-constructed attitudes that describe the masculine gender role as violent, unemotional, sexually aggressive, and so forth.[8] Do all men exhibit "toxic masculinity"? Suzanna Danuta Walters does not exempt any men.

The critic Gad Saad objects to "the bogus term 'toxic masculinity.' It literally seeks to pathologize masculinity in ways that are profoundly harmful to the existential sense of self of young men."[9] The message that feminists appear to send with the phrase "toxic masculinity" is that all men are evil.

How would these fly? "Toxic African Americans"? "Toxic Muslims"? "Toxic Asians"? Or even "Toxic females"?

"Destroy the male sex"

As early as 1967, Valerie Solanas with her S.C.U.M (Society for Cutting Up Men) Manifesto advocated destroying all men: "there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation and destroy the male sex."[10]

Robin Morgan recommended starting at home: "Sexism is not the fault of women – kill your fathers, not your mothers."[11]

Here we do have recommendations for outright murder and genocide, hate acted out in the most extreme possible fashion. Among some feminists, the project of the Holocaust seems happily applicable to men. If this is not hate speech, what would be?

♦

[1] https://www.nationalreview.com/2017/02/future-is-female-problematic-feminist-slogan/

[2] https://www.nationalreview.com/2017/02/future-is-female-problematic-feminist-slogan/

[3] https://www.nationalreview.com/2017/02/future-is-female-problematic-feminist-slogan/

[4] https://www.brainyquote.com/authors/robin_morgan

[5] https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/why-cant-we-hate-men/2018/06/08/f1a3a8e0-6451-11e8-a69c-b944de66d9e7_story.html?utm_term=.54159b94771f

[6] https://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/an-obituary-to-feminism/

[7] https://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/an-obituary-to-feminism/

http://amazonfeminist.tumblr.com/post/22123001572/no-mans-land-an-interview-with-mary-daly

[8] http://geekfeminism.wikia.com/wiki/Toxic_masculinity

[9] https://www.psychologytoday.com/ca/blog/homo-consumericus/201803/is-toxic-masculinity-valid-concept

[10] https://www.amazon.com/SCUM-Manifesto-Valerie-Solanas-ebook/dp/B0120AUAIY/ref=tmm_kin_swatch_0?encoding=UTF8&qid=&sr=&dpID=41PLFsimFHL&preST=_SY445_QL70&dpSrc=detail

[11] https://www.brainyquote.com/authors/robin_morgan

AVFM’s politically incorrect meme of the week

AVFM Meme of the Week · 1 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

The terrorists of Jezebel and Splinter News: Stupid enough to make terrorist threats, not brave enough to own It on wikipedia

Paul Elam · 1 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

"Jezebel" is a brand name which needs no introduction to the audience of A Voice for Men, of course. Many will remember Jezebel's ugly and inhuman attacks on male victims of domestic violence, for example, in a 2007 article.[2] The audience may be less aware of Splinter News, a faction of journalists closely allied with Jezebel. Jezebel and Splinter News are owned by the same company, UniVision, which is currently in the process of liquidating them.[3] One can only wonder why, given their history of illegal and unethical behavior.

Splinter News had its brief moment of international fame[4] last month, when one of its "journalists" (Hamilton Nolan) openly called for terrorist threats against the White House. This may sound like a hyperbole, except it isn't. In an article called "This is Just the Beginning," Hamilton Nolan described in minute detail some of his terrorist fantasies against the Trump administration:

> This is all going to get more extreme. And it should. We are living in extreme times. The harm that is being done to all of us by the people in the American government is extreme … I do not believe that Trump administration officials should be able to live their lives in peace and affluence while they inflict serious harms on large portions of the American population. … Read a fucking history book. Read a recent history book. The U.S. had thousands of domestic bombings per year in the early 1970s … The day will come, sooner that you all think, when Trump administration officials will look back fondly on the time when all they had to worry about was getting hollered at at a Mexican restaurant. When you aggressively fuck with people's lives, you should not be surprised when they decide to fuck with yours.

You might think that such terrorist threats would be condemned by the Splinter News editorial board or fellow journalists. You'd be wrong. One of the most enthusiastic supporters of Hamilton Nolan is Molly Osberg, who retweeted Nolan's article days after it was released. She later deleted her tweets in a desperate bid to conceal her ugly behavior, but the Internet never forgets, alas.

[image]

To the right is a picture of Hamilton Nolan, a well-fed Marxist whose Utopian vision involves violent terrorist attacks against innocent targets, including the White House staff. To the left is a picture of Molly Osberg, a feminist philosopher whose important contributions to human society include retweeting these bombing threats, abusing journalistic ethics, and preaching the creed that women should have as many sexual partners as possible. Truly, the best that feminism has to offer. You can reach out to Molly Osberg at any time. Please call 718 751 5918. After all, turnabout is fair play: Splinter News doxed a Republican politician despite universal condemnation.[1]

Molly Osberg's "journalism" makes one wonder whether Splinter News is some kind of gutter for journalists who are so degenerate that it is impossible to parody them, Poe's law notwithstanding. One of Ms. Osberg's important achievements in life involves writing an article which praises sexual promiscuity in women. The article extols the most fundamental virtue of feminism, if you know what I mean, by arguing that women should have as many sexual partners as possible. "Seriously Though: What's So Great About Monogamy?" is the title of this gem of wisdom. Molly Osberg, the high priestess of Jezebelite feminism, spells out the most important value of feminism with great enthusiasm: "After all, transgression is hella sexy, and the allure of adultery is at least partially rooted in sneaking around."

Interestingly, the wannabe terrorists of Splinter News are not brave enough to own their actions in a public forum. A Voice for Men has received a tip from an MRA who reported that the feminist mafia in Wikipedia has prevented an editor from introducing a link about Hamilton Nolan's article into the relevant Wikipedia page. The introduction of such a link is warranted given the international coverage and given the fact that, well, the public has a right to know that Splinter News is harboring terrorists. And yet as soon as he introduced the link, he received a ban from a Wikipedia user whose name just happens to be “Jezebel’s Ponyo” (whom we identified as Margaret Hartmann, a previous contributor to Jezebel). It is a violation of Wikipedia’s conflict of interest policy for an editor to abuse their authority in this manner, especially since Margaret Hartmann has engaged in unethical behavior to protect her employer. Then again, we already know that “feminist ethics” is an oxymoron.

Contact Univision at (713) 662-4545 univisionhouston@univision.net

[1] https://splinternews.com/heres-stephen-millers-cell-phone-number-if-you-need-it-1826985626

[2] https://jezebel.com/294383/have-you-ever-beat-up-a-boyfriend-cause-uh-we-have

[3] https://arstechnica.com/gaming/2018/07/two-years-after-buying-univision-wants-to-sell-its-gawker-onion-portfolios/

[4] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-5891615/Left-wing-writer-warns-Trump-administration-opponents-carry-BOMB-ATTACKS-against-them.html

Girl power in Mudville

Doug Mortimer · 1 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

At first blush, Sunday, August 26, appeared to be a typical game day (actually it was a night game) for the Frisco RoughRiders of the Texas League. With a little more than a week to go in the season, the Riders were pushing to win the second half of the season and the right to advance to the post-season to meet Corpus Christi in the playoffs. Aside from that, a few members of the team were auditioning for a possible call-up to the team's big league affiliate, the Texas Rangers, during the month of September.

As usual, it was Kids Sunday Funday at Dr Pepper Ballpark, which meant that before the game against the Midland Rockhounds the wee folk could play catch on the field before the game and enjoy a fireworks display after the game. Also, ice cream sandwiches were available for just $1.00 all night long. Obviously, you get more bang for your buck on Sunday Funday, but piling on promotions is common in minor league baseball.

On this particular Sunday, Frisco sweetened the pot with an additional promotion: Girl Power Night! The videoboard's girly logo for same featured a baseball with pink stitches. Maybe they had some for sale in the team shop…I forgot to check!

The date selected for Girl Power Night coincides with National Women's Equality Day, so-called because on August 26, 1920, the United States Congress passed the 19th Amendment to the Constitution, thus enfranchising women. Ironically, then-President Woodrow Wilson was incapacitated by a stroke, and his wife was more or less (depending on which historian you consult) running the executive branch of the government.

You might wonder what the hell all this has to do with baseball. Well, minor league baseball is noted for off-the-wall (pun intended) promotions that would never pass muster in the more dignified realm of major league ball. Many of the promotions are clever, some are just plain weird.

Any promotion even remotely political, however, is usually taboo. Unfortunately, minor league teams, like their major league counterparts, often have corporate partnerships so a certain amount of virtue signaling is inevitable. Consequently, Girl Power night should hardly come as a surprise.

At this point in time, the theme of female empowerment has become so mainstream it is beyond controversy. We're all on board with it, right? We all agree that it's a good thing, right? If you have a problem with such a promotion, well, you must be a misogynist. What other explanation could there be?

So what did the Girl Power "festivities" entail? Upon entering the ballpark, fans were handed a 2018 Topps baseball card of baseball great Joe Torre, who was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 2014. This giveaway would seem to be totally unrelated to the theme, but it turns out that the Joe Torre Foundation features an anti-domestic violence program called Safe at Home (get it?). Apparently, Torre's father was abusive so domestic violence has become his pet project.

Now I don't have anything against such a charity, but I have to wonder why it is associated with Girl Power night. After all, roughly half the children who are victims of domestic violence are boys. Of course, you could promote the charity during Boy Power night … whoops, I forgot! You can't schedule a Boy Power promotion (and God forbid you should hand out Boys Rule! t-shirts) unless you want to ignite a social media firestorm and elbow your way past demonstrators blocking the gates at the ballpark.

Pocketing my Joe Torre card, I entered the park and noticed that the regular public address announcer was shunted aside in favor of a female (a pleasant enough voice but she made three mistakes before the evening was over). This is not quite as revolutionary as it sounds, since some major league teams (most recently the Mets) have hired female PA announcers. Thankfully, when the Girl power sub announced the starting lineups, she did not refer to the first, second, and third basemen as basepersons.

When it came to the national anthem, a Girl Scouts color guard was called upon to enhance the ceremony. The singer, of course, was female, but that is nothing new.

Once the game got underway, males were in short supply. Aside from the players, umpires, and members of the grounds crew (another one of those dirty, low-paying yet essential tasks), male presence on the field was scarce. Even the bat boys were given the day off in favor of bat girls.

All the between-innings games (e.g., water balloon toss, human dot race) that are part and parcel of minor league games were restricted to girls and good role models (female first responders).

There were a couple of visible men. A common feature of ball games today is a salute to veterans for their service. Typically, one vet is selected to stand up and take a bow as a symbol for the armed forces. On Girl Power night one might assume they could have found a female vet without too much trouble, but, miracle of miracles, a man was selected. I can only assume they goofed and had to pick a man at the last minute.

Another male exception was the guy who was selected to take on Wonder Woman in the Amazonian Run. His task was to race a video image of Wonder Woman on a ribbon board along the outfield fence. Care to guess who won? Jesse Owens in his prime would have been overmatched.

Finally, we were treated to video interviews of prominent women in sports, either athletes or broadcasters, and a video of Girl Scouts being prepared for leadership roles in today's world. Gee, wonder if there'll be enough room at the top for all those girls being groomed to believe it's their rightful place..

To top off the evening, the fireworks display featured a loop of female athletes in action and ultimately triumphing…doing the dogpile, raising the trophy, etc. Unspoken in all this is in the rush to female empowerment in sports is how many intercollegiate male sports – baseball among them — have been sacrificed thanks to Title IX.

I'm not aware of any other team doing a Girl Power promotion. There are so many minor league teams in our fair land, it would require hours of research to figure that out. More to the point, when August 26 rolls around next year, will the Riders (if they're at home that day) do it again? Will other teams take note and institute a Girl Power night so that it spreads and eventually becomes an annual promotion throughout minor league ball?

International Men's Day is November 19, long after the end of baseball season. I'm sure if it fell during the baseball season we would be commemorating that at the old ballpark? Right?

Well, November 19 falls on a Monday in 2018. What a great opportunity for Monday Night Football! Are you listening, ESPN?

Wonder how Commissioner Goodell would react if the players took a knee to protest feminism.

The benefits of video games

Peter Wright · 2 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Two thirds of children and adolescents, and a substantial number of adults now play video games. Such popularity has drawn in the usual pessimists from the research community looking to spy a catastrophe in the usage of the new technology.

Gaming addiction was recently classified as a mental disorder in the World Health Organization's International Classification of Diseases (ICD), however there appears to be a lack of research to back the claim of addictive properties of games.

The lack of evidence is an indicator that some other factor is motivating researchers to prematurely formalize serious gaming as a disorder, but more important is the fact that the rush to demonize gamers falls mostly on the shoulders of boys. Now why might that be?

Most likely because of an addiction to misandry.

I hope the WHO will consider placing that diagnosis in the ICD, right next to gaming addiction disorder.

There are more than 2.5 BILLION gamers across the world, with men and boys constituting significant majority of players overall and, interestingly, with the sexes showing a clear divide on their preference of game genres. Here is a table showing female game preferences, which unsurprisingly indicates an inverse to the typical game preferences of males:

The primary motivation for males is competition, goal-oriented destruction, and completion of game, while discovery and power (powerful character, gear, stats) are the least common.

For women completion of game (gathering all stars/collectibles, and finish mission), along with fantasy (being someone else, somewhere else) is highest in importance, while excitement and challenge (practice, highly difficulty missions) are the least common.

For all the debate about gender similarities in mainstream public life, the private world of gaming is suggestive of differing gendered motivations, leading to the question of whether these preferences are biological echoes of hunters and gatherers and not merely evidence of cultural learning.

As boys' natures and physicality are demonized as 'violence-promoting' and therefore socially unacceptable, boys have been turning to more private arenas of expression; spending less time on the sports field or hiking mountains and more time running and fighting through landscapes in an online world of imagination.

I'm not suggesting gaming is simply a compensation for the demonisation of boys in mainstream culture, although that would be one factor contributing toward its popularity; to be gaming is to be away from the daily shit show. The fun of the game itself, of the adventure, teamwork, the warm male camaraderie, the skill and competition would be sufficient to draw a lot of males to the medium in even a non-misandric culture, though perhaps in that male-friendly environment the number of hours played would be lower and interspersed with other recreational activities.

Naturally blue pill society is very uncomfortable with boys finding a source of shame-free joy, so the 'addiction' hysteria has been building strength for over a decade, especially from the older generation and also by young women who see in computer gaming a lack of male usefulness and a Pandora's box of pathologies: the response is to shame boys out of going their own way.

Accentuate the positive

As a teenager my son Connor was deep into gaming like most of his male friends, and yes we fought over the amount of time he spent gaming like so many parents and sons do. Much of that fight was due to my ignorance (being fed popular negative stereotypes about gaming), and part of it was due to his excessive usage habits. By way of compromise we ended up making a timetable of allowed gaming hours for each day of the week; 4 hours per day on weekdays, and 6 hours on weekend days and holidays.

Later, after chancing on some research by clinical psychologist Isabela Granic I was delighted to learn there were many positives to gaming, and having a psychology background was able to appreciate it immediately in terms of my son's attraction to and use of the medium. In her research paper The Benefits Of Playing Video Games Granic provides a synopsis of the negatively framed research on video gaming, while suggesting a new and more positive way forward:

> Video games are a ubiquitous part of almost all children's and adolescents' lives, with 97% playing for at least one hour per day in the United States. The vast majority of research by psychologists on the effects of "gaming" has been on its negative impact: the potential harm related to violence, addiction, and depression. We recognize the value of that research; however, we argue that a more balanced perspective is needed, one that considers not only the possible negative effects but also the benefits of playing these games. Considering these potential benefits is important, in part, because the nature of these games has changed dramatically in the last decade, becoming increasingly complex, diverse, realistic, and social in nature.
>
> A small but significant body of research has begun to emerge, mostly in the last five years, documenting these benefits. In this article, we summarize the research on the positive effects of playing video games, focusing on four main domains: cognitive, motivational, emotional, and social. By integrating insights from developmental, positive, and social psychology, as well as media psychology, we propose some candidate mechanisms by which playing video games may foster real-world psychosocial benefits. Our aim is to provide strong enough evidence and a theoretical rationale to inspire new programs of research on the largely unexplored mental health benefits of gaming.

Granic and her colleagues outlined numerous benefits of gaming, including the fact that gaming promotes a wider range of cognitive skills that can enhance educational performance; instills a sense of life motivation stemming from repeated seeking of game goals; provides regulation of emotional states and teaches the managing of moods to enhance emotional states; and provides an avenue to participate in team play and social interaction that strengthens social skills, to name just a few.

In the light of Granic's research I decided to support Connor's interest in gaming when he was younger, and eventually allowed him to skip the last two years of school (even though he was more than capable and willing to do them) so he could go straight to college to study a certificate-4 in graphic art. That was his calling and his passion. He completed it with flying colors, and is now two thirds of the way through a diploma course on game construction and is top of his class in all subjects – even creating games in his spare time so that he becomes more skilled in the art.

As a bonus of supporting his passion we've developed a deeper, more loving father-son relationship, one that was facilitated by smashing the generation gap and getting real about the realities of gaming. In a recent conversation he mentioned he's inspired by the story of Steve Jobs and other entrepreneurs who started in their garages, and is working on getting together a team of motivated game-creators to form a small business. With gaming now grossing far more than Hollywood movies, and with the necessary motivation and diligence, he stands a good chance of making it financially.

Why don't we hear more about the positives? Because it doesn't chime with the global habit of shitting on everything enjoyed by males while denying all benefits. How many other sons are waiting for the social and parental demonizing to stop and for the support for their calling to begin?

Those who decide to support their sons can still discuss the hot issues such as the problem of spending too much time behind the screen; the need for more exercise, for vitamin D, for adequate sleep, for maintaining basic hygiene and housekeeping; and we might even discuss the more dubious charge that young men are not spending enough time with their girlfriends, that they are supposedly failing in the chivalric contract — a conversation that hopefully ends in dismissing the demand as a gynocentric complaint holding no moral value in the age of true equality and self-determination.

But much more important is to understand all that's good, no great, about gaming, and to celebrate it with a world that is fixated on the negatives. In this task our boys need us to have their backs.

Fiamengo File: Two “journalists” attended ICMI 2018

Janice Fiamengo · 7 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The unspoken burdens of men

Mark Dent · 8 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I attended the March for Men in Melbourne with my wife a couple of weeks ago. Maggie and I were deeply impressed with the professionalism and planning of those who organized this event. I can't really add to the words others have already written about the experience, but I do want to expand on some thoughts I had while we marched down St Kilda Road.

One of my concerns before I decided to attend was how I would manage to control my emotions if confronted by one of the ranting lunatics who were protesting our gathering. When I saw the huge police presence on our arrival the images I had pictured on the train trip into the city began to dissolve. I felt sure the scenario I pictured, of a purple haired, tattooed woman screeching in my face and poking her fingers into my chest was now highly unlikely. My fear was based upon the idea that I would be placed in that age-old dilemma all men fear. When an aggressive woman gets in a man's face his options as far as responses go, are extremely limited.

What should you do? Smile and try to look composed and cool even as the woman's spittle is on your face and she is branding you a Nazi, KKK member and a woman hater in a shrill, enraged voice? So much easier said than done.

Do you shout back and immediately give the media fodder for the angle they have already decided to take? That angle being one which focuses on the "angry, aggressive misogynists who are marching because they want to remove women's rights and encourage rapists to rape."

Do you actually dare to push the screaming banshee out of your personal space knowing she will hysterically accuse you of groping her or assaulting her?

Do you simply turn and walk away-looking mute and impotent in the face of her righteous fury?

Well, I suppose the final option is the most sensible if you want to avoid the very thing the hater wants- a confrontation where she gets to play victim.

This whole issue came back to me when I watched a recent interview Jesse Watters had with a feminist professor. I know Watters plays dumb and is rather passive in these interviews because he believes these morons expose their own bigotry and ignorance when they open their mouths. I prefer to pushback. Among her many claims about male privilege was the old chestnut about women living in a constant state of fear because at any given moment they could be assaulted or raped.

I believe the claim is a complete and utter denial of the reality and norm in our daily lives. Being female protects you from so many things which males must endure. This woman really seems to believe what she is saying. I have no doubt women feel vulnerable and afraid at times and on rare occasions their femininity will be taken advantage of by an out of control male. But honest people will concede that such events are extraordinary rather than commonplace.

Why do so many women feel free to scream in men's faces or even physically assault them? Are they insane? Who in their right mind would choose to antagonize and invade the space of someone who could literally physically destroy them in most circumstances should he choose to respond to their aggression? The answer (we all know) is that women know that being female is their greatest asset when it comes to remaining safe from physical harm.

We have seen this attitude represented on our tv and cinema screens for decades. Women slap and punch men with impunity. It is simply a reflection of the reality in our everyday lives.

I have no doubt there are burdens and obstacles women endure which men will never understand. That is a given. Our media relentlessly talks, speaks and writes about these obstacles, whether real or imagined (or exaggerated) every day. Women menstruate. Women become pregnant. Women have to balance their working and mothering roles. Of course, there is much more but we have all been subjected to years of indoctrination with regard to the difficulties endured by women.

When the media decides to focus on men it is always to tell men and women that males are privileged, powerful and pampered. No-one has the courage to talk or write about the countless things that can make being a male scary, confronting and overwhelming throughout a lifetime. This doesn't in anyway negate the many wonderful benefits of masculinity. The two strands exist side by side.

I learned at a very young age that courage is a very important quality every man or boy should possess. It began when I played football in primary school and I quickly became aware of the words "jib" and "squib". These words hovered threateningly over every boy who has played Aussie Rules. To be branded a jib is as shameful as it gets in our footy culture. I am sure there are synonyms for these words in all sporting cultures around the planet. It simply means you are a coward who places his physical safety before the success of his team.

Another very local accusation in our footy culture is to be accused of "hearing footsteps." In our game players often have to stand under a high ball and wait for it to descend whilst you can literally hear the thundering footsteps of the approaching pack coming from behind you. This pack can physically maim you with knees to the ribs or fists to the head under the guise of attempting to prevent you from marking (catching) the football. If you turn your attention from the ball or drop it because you are distracted by the ominous noise behind you-you are a squib. You feel the shame so deeply.

Listen to the acclaim given to footballers who display courage when their moment of truth arrives.

I was a reasonably brave footballer but I still vividly remember the day I jibbed it. I was actually captain of the reserves team. The ball was bouncing toward me and a pack of players were thundering after it. Rather than dive on the ball and cop the knees to the head and back I stuck a hand out. The ball was swept forward and they scored a goal. I knew it looked terrible. I knew my mates knew exactly what had happened. Worse was to follow. A coach I loved approached me in the huddle at quarter time. "What happened out there, Denty? It didn't look good mate." That was it. He then turned and began to talk to other players.

I actually wanted to cry. I was devastated. My coach had been disappointed and surprised by my moment of weakness. I remember how hard I tried to get injured by some brave act that would wipe the slate clean and win back the approval of my coach but the opportunity never came throughout the final three quarters of the game. We won the game but I remember the sickly, hollow feeling in my guts as we showered and changed and all the usual banter went on.

Years later, I read Stephen Crane's classic novel: The Red Badge of Courage. My God-I felt the very same emotions as the young man in his first battle felt. He had failed the test and was terrified by the idea that his comrades had seen him run in the face of the enemy. His shame was so deep he could not bear the idea of living with it. He was desperate to redeem himself and prove he was a man of worth. He wanted his red badge of courage…a wound to prove his bravery, a simple but clear symbol of his manhood that no-one would question. Oh how envious he was of those men who had a bullet in their arm or leg or a bayonet wound in their gut.

Oh yes-I had tried so hard to win a blackened eye or get knocked out on my own field of battle. That was preferable to the red-hot gnawing shame.

At times he regarded the wounded soldiers in an envious way. He conceived persons with torn bodies to be peculiarly happy. He wished that he, too, had a wound, a (little) red badge of courage.

Women walk through life aware of so many of their perceived burdens. There is one burden of which they are for the most part, blissfully free. The enormous pressure to act in a moment requiring action. To protect, to risk, to help, save or even die in preference to ignominy and shame.

When was the last time you saw footage of a woman running into a burning house or car to rescue the occupants? When have you seen footage of a woman swimming across a raging river to rescue a stranded dog? I am not suggesting there are not many courageous women nor that a woman has never done these things. I am saying it is an absolute expectation that a man take these actions and an incredible surprise and a subject of much hype and celebration when a woman does it.

How many females have longed to be a maimed or simply bruised in order to prove their worth? I am not blaming women for this state of affairs though some use the innate shame men feel so quickly when their courage or manhood is called into question to manipulate and pressure them. I am simply pointing out just one of the many invisible, yet frighteningly real burdens males must endure.

In recent weeks here in Australia there has been a focus on the toxic bullying that apparently only affects our female politicians.

When these women were asked to give examples of this shocking behavior their evidence for this outrageous gender-based nastiness was what could only be called non -existent. One woman cited the pressure she felt to decide about who she was going to support in the impending leadership ballot!

It is truly laughable, yet the headlines continue to cry out about the abuse of our females in the dirty game of politics. Where have these headlines been the past 100 or so years? Again- women expect special treatment whilst proclaiming their equality and fitness to hold positions usually occupied by men. The abuse, bullying, backstabbing and humiliation meted out to countless male politicians is simply expected and absolutely not newsworthy.

If a male politician were to cower, scream in fear or run when an assassin attempted to attack him his image would be in tatters and his political career dead. A female Prime Minister could literally wet her pants in a moment of danger and not lose any credibility in the eyes of the media or public. Oh-be assured, there would be some brave cartoonists who might mock the female and snide jokes in the local pub. But the media would form a protective circle around her as would her colleagues.

Imagine what would happen if Trump were to display fear or panic in front of the cameras.

These again, are the never mentioned crosses males must simply endure.

Another article screamed about the way female retail workers face abuse because they are women before finishing with the statistic that 85% of all retail workers have been abused. Abuse of men doesn't register as newsworthy in any field.

Young males must learn to deal with their incredibly powerful sexual urges. We can all recall our teenage years where we felt we were likely to fucking explode if we didn't find release through a furtive session with dad's Playboy or bra ads in some women's magazine. We were walking cum machines. Joe Rogan does a brilliant job of trying to explain how it feels to be a man in this conversation:

We can laugh now but it was no bloody joke back then. It was an all-consuming physical affliction that had to be accommodated on a daily and sometimes even more frequent basis. If it was not dealt with it had a profound affect on your mood, concentration and wellbeing. Even now when so called experts talk about young males and their sexuality it is usually as the butt of jokes and with smirks or knowing eye rolls rather than a subject to engender compassion and understanding.

Young women receive nothing but understanding and enormous sympathy for the problems which uniquely afflict them, be it body image (which also affect boys and men), periods, eating disorders or teen pregnancy.

A woman recently blamed a weight loss drug for dramatically increasing her sex drive before she groomed a 15-year-old student for sex.

She avoided any jail time. No man could present his high sex drive as a defense for sexually abusing an underaged child. I am certain that many men who do commit such acts also have a very strong sex drive. Most teenage boys live with that very powerful distraction every day for many years. How about some acknowledgement of the remarkable fact that despite the highly sexualized world they now find themselves in, the overwhelming majority of boys control these drives and behave appropriately most if not all of the time. Don't wait for any breaking news story on this phenomenon.

The feminist professor who so arrogantly lectured Jesse Watters about male privilege and the burden of womanhood is an ignorant fool. She can never understand what being a man really means and her vacuous words proved it.

Why would a woman support the men's rights movement?

Elizabeth Hobson · 10 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Why would a woman commit herself to working within the Men's Human Rights Movement?

The answer is that I am a gender equality activist; committed to a struggle for equal rights, treatment, opportunities, choices and respect for all. That's what the Men's Human Rights Movement is all about.

Despite the universally held presumption that women get a raw deal and that men benefit from the oppression of women, the rights of men and boys are assaulted on many levels everywhere in the West. The well-being of men is self-evidently not a priority. In my home country, the U.K., men are discriminated against in education and workplaces (often explicitly through quotas favouring women or by missing out on support only available to women), in the criminal justice system (in which men are treated far more harshly than women) and, as fathers, where they are likely to be systematically erased from their children's lives if they're unlucky enough to find themselves in a family court.

As the Director of Communications at Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) – or J4MB – I am part of the only political party in the Anglosphere that campaigns for the human rights of men and boys. We are invested in achieving equality and justice for men and boys across a wide range of issues. For the past three years, however, our primary campaigning issue has been the non-therapeutic circumcision (male genital mutilation/MGM) of boys in the U.K.

MGM is the only surgery that is performed on children without a diagnosis in the Western world. Many insist that non-medically necessary circumcision of male minors is not equivalent to Female Genital Mutilation (FGM). This is physiologically true of some forms of FGM but in fact there are a number of forms of both that are more or less similar – and, actually, the most common form of MGM is more severe than the most common forms of FGM. However, the degree of physiological harm is an irrelevance because MGM and FGM are morally identical. Unnecessary procedures on the genitals of boys or girls (or intersex children) are affronts to their bodily autonomy. A person's body is their sole property. That idea is widely accepted when it comes to girls and women yet the empathy gap has proven too big a bridge to cross in advancing the truth that it's also the case for boys and men.

MGM is a violent, dangerous and traumatic violation. Marilyn Milos (widely regarded as the 'founding mother' of the U.S. movement against MGM) was a nursing student in the late 1970's. Watching a procedure was a turning point in her life, in an interview she describes the event as follows:

> "We students filed into the hospital nursery to find a baby boy strapped spread-eagle to a plastic board on a counter top. He was struggling against his restraints—tugging, whimpering, and crying helplessly.
>
> When the doctor began the operation, the baby let out a piercing scream. He screamed when his foreskin was pinched and crushed as the doctor attached a clamp to his tiny penis. The infant's shriek intensified when the doctor inserted an instrument between the foreskin and the head of the penis, tearing them apart [the foreskin is attached to the glans with connective tissue in newborns, which is designed to dissolve during the first few years of life].
>
> Then the baby started shaking his head back and forth. It was the only part of his body he could move. He started shaking his head when the doctor used another clamp to (lengthwise) crush the foreskin, which he then cut. This made the foreskin opening large enough to insert a circumcision instrument designed to prevent the head of the penis from being severed during the surgery.
>
> During the last stage of the operation, the doctor crushed the foreskin against the circumcision instrument. Then, finally, he amputated it. By that time, the baby was limp, exhausted, spent."

Common early complications include: pain, bleeding, swelling or inadequate skin removal, which are treatable.

Amputation of the glans can occur and deaths from excess bleeding happen even in the U.K. In 2012, Tim Hammond conducted the Global Survey of Circumcision Harm in which 1000 circumcised men shared their experiences. In 2016, Hammond presented his findings to the International Conference on Men's Issues.

The survey found that participants reported suffering from a myriad of harms, including the following:

10% had partial/total loss of the penile body.

56% had little to no shaft skin mobility on erection.

45% had hair along the the mid to upper shaft causing friction during sex.

67% reported an insensitive glans.

75% reported a dry/keratinised glans (requiring lubricants before sex)

31% reported erectile dysfunction (with circumcised men being 4.½ times more likely to take pharmaceuticals for this condition)

6% reported penile bleeding during sex

8% reported that the scar is painful

27% reported that the scar is numb

Emotionally, the men surveyed reported feeling:

Anger- 71%

Frustration- 72%

Shame- 37%

Betrayed by lack of protection from harm by my mother- 55%

Betrayed by lack of protection from harm by my father- 50%

That my human rights were violated- 73%

62% of the participants reported that their condition impedes their sexual relationships.

MGM is an indefensible practice, absolutely on a par with FGM. The supporters of each practice sound remarkably alike and the root motivation for both practices lies with the damaging of sexual function in the victim for supposedly moral purposes, as the young American Jewish academic Eric Clopper eloquently explained in his 'Sex and Circumcision: An American Love Story' presentation to Harvard University in May 2018. He was later fired for having published this piece on YouTube.

MGM has to die – for individual autonomy, human well-being and equality. And the feminist movement needs to re-examine their position on the matter. A German court effectively banned the practice in 2012, but the ruling was overturned. A law was later passed making it legal. Feminists were among those active in opposing 'The Cologne ruling', perpetuating myths about hygiene and, in the case of Alice Schwarzer, calling opposition to circumcision "an unrealistic political correctness" and "unnecesary". Katrin Altpeter chimed in with the assertion that there is "no way to compare [MGM with FGM]" in her criticism. Mayim Balik, who circumcised her sons, rails against FGM. Ashley Judd, a United Nations Population Fund Goodwill Ambassador has said that what she wants "for girls is to create a safe space in which we can move with freedom, without constraint, with bodily integrity, with sexual autonomy… That's what we're doing when we end these harmful practices [including FGM]" while promoting MGM via her Twitter account. Feminists claim that they want for men to more readily express their feelings. Many are expressing their feelings on MGM – and they are angry. Can feminists hear them? Do they care?

No parliamentary override exists in the U.K. to permit the non-therapeutic genital mutilation of male minors, and the practice is obviously an 'assault occasioning bodily harm', which is illegal under the Offences Against the Person Act (1861). The Criminal Prosecution Service (CPS) sentencing guidelines with respect to actual bodily harm, identify eight aggravating factors indicating higher culpability which are relevant to MGM:

1- A significant degree of premeditation
2 – Use of weapon or weapon equivalent
3 – Deliberately causes more harm than is necessary for commission of offence
4 – Deliberate targeting of vulnerable victim
5 – Offence motivated by, or demonstrating, hostility based on the victim's age, sex, gender identity (or presumed gender identity)
6 – Ongoing effect upon the victim
7 – Presence of others including relatives
8 – Abuse of power and/or position of trust.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified in the U.K. in 1991) contains the following relevant passages:

Article 24.3: "States Parties shall take all effective and appropriate measures with a view to abolishing traditional practices prejudicial to the health of children."

Article 2.2: "States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that the child is protected against all forms of discrimination or punishment on the basis of the status, activities, expressed opinions, or beliefs of the child's parents, legal guardians, or family members."

The convention also enshrines the rights to freedom of expression and religion.

MGM is, therefore, justifiably illegal in the U.K. It is an outrage that we, at J4MB, remain part of only a small number of groups and individuals taking a stand against the fact that the CPS is failing to uphold the law and protect children.

I am a woman in the Men's Human Rights Movement because this community is a progressive vanguard. We are compassionate, we are moral and we are right – about the issue of MGM and many other things. We are also defamed, we are misrepresented — and we are not gonna stop until men and boys have the equal rights, treatment, opportunities, choices and respect that they deserve.

More information on MGM can be found on a playlist on Mike Buchanan's (J4MB party leader) YouTube channel.

Dr. Darius Bagli, “Known Genital Mutilator” of SickKids, Toronto, plus: circumcisor or pedophile, what’s the difference?

Gary Costanza · 11 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]What’s the difference between a pedophile and a circumcisor?

- Both perform unnecessary acts on a child, but the circumcisor always draws blood, cuts away healthy tissue with a weapon, and leaves permanent scarring.
- The circumcisor always risks the very life of the child he/she abuses.
- The circumcisor, aided and abetted by ignorant parents and a self-serving medical industry consider this ‘good touching’ and ‘good trauma’, while in reality the victim is equally traumatized by both the pedophile’s ‘bad’ and the doctor’s ‘good’ sexual abuse.
- Some ritual circumcisions involve what society deems ‘good’ infant penis sucking, while, absent the religious ritual and/or doctoral degree, it’s ‘bad’ abuse and warrants jail for the abuser.
- We know pedophiles have a decidedly negative impact on individuals and society, yet we encourage the same behavior by supposedly learned professionals without any research as to its efficacy, purpose, or health impacts.

Some of you may be thinking ‘but it’s elective surgery that the parents consent to’ unlike a pedophile who gets no such permission. Plus, it’s done for hygiene and/or cosmetic reasons.

But that’s the point exactly. The victim himself gives no such consent. And just like FGM, human rights law and ethics doesn’t allow genital mutilation or sexual abuse against minors without their consent for anything other than medical necessity.

It’s not just me that’s making this comparison – just google “circumcision pedophile.”

[image]
Two men stand next to signs that read “yes to circumcision” and “religious freedom.” A third man wearing a tattered raincoat tells them: “I know what you mean. I, too, get told by invisible men to mess around with boys’ penises.”
It’s actually worse than you think. Here’s what a “Dr. Wilson” says about circumcision:

> WHAT IS THE FORESKIN AND WHY REMOVE IT?
>
> The foreskin of the penis is a small piece of tissue that normally covers the head of the penis, which is the most distant and most sensitive part of the penis. The foreskin has been described as being like a sheath, or cap, or hood.
>
> The foreskin can be pulled back mechanically with the hand, to clean the head of the penis that is underneath it. In fact, this is the only way to clean this part of the body. Many men fail to do this when they shower or bathe. This is not good, as the fluid builds up and bacteria can grow on the smegma fluid causing infection, in some cases. This is less of a problem today, but it was one reason for circumcision in the past.
>
> During sex, the foreskin is supposed to pull back by itself, or it can be pulled back by hand. This exposes the head of the penis, which is quite sensitive to touch and makes the man more interested in sexual intercourse. It also makes the man more jumpy, in a way, that does not occur if the foreskin is removed when the man is just a baby or young child.
>
> INTENTIONAL WOUNDING OF MEN
>
> No anesthesia is used when a baby is circumcised in the Jewish tradition. One could say that in ancient times, this was because anesthesia had not been invented. However, this is not quite true. Physicians of the time period knew about and used herbs such as cloves and others to numb parts of the body when surgery was > required.

>
> I am told by rabbis that no anesthesia was allowed for other reasons. First, the safety of anesthesia is not always complete, so avoiding it prevents some possible problems.
>
> Secondly, circumcision is considered a type of wounding of a man. This may sound cruel and barbaric, but it is not. What it does is help prevent the man from raping and harming women in the future. Jewish men are known to rape women much less often than most other groups. They also tend to treat women much better than other ethnic and religious groups on planet earth.
>
> Thus, the concept of wounding of men is not a cruel concept. It is related to women's health and safety. It is also a type of rite of passage for men. Women bleed every month, so they have a different rite of passage, but men do not experience this. Circumcision, in fact, is only the first of the rites of passage for men that the Hebrew Bible insists upon, and which our current society is sorely lacking.

It gets far worse as one reads further on at his website. Check out the "Angry Intactivist" website and other answers to the pedophile/circumcisor question. And fuck you, Taylor Swift.

Now, back to the more 'mainstream' circumcisor, Dr. Darius Bagli, who doesn't even use the religious delusion.

SickKids of Toronto, Ontario has a "clinic" that encourages and performs infant genital mutilation on helpless and healthy infants, ironically a symptom of a sick society that lacks medical ethics and devalues boys, men, and male sexuality.

Consequently, Dr. Darius Bagli has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He 'practices' at the Newborn Circumcision Clinic at SickKids, and he either performs or supervises infant genital mutilation, also known as circumcision, on healthy, *un*SickKids for no medical reason.

He knows this amputation of healthy tissue is unnecessary, unethical, and risky, yet he continues to perform it and/or force others to perform it, under threat of termination.

Here's his bio from the website:

"Darius Bägli, MDCM, FRCSC, FAAP, FACS
Associate Head, Division of Urology
Associate Surgeon-in-Chief
Attending Urologic Surgeon
Senior Associate Scientist, The Hospital for Sick Children
Professor, Departments of Surgery and Physiology, University of Toronto

Dr. Darius Bägli became a member of the surgical staff at SickKids and the Department of Surgery, University of Toronto, in 1995. He is certified in Urologic Surgery by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, the American College of Surgeons, the American Board of Urology and is a Fellow of the American Academy of Paediatrics. He directs a laboratory in cell and matrix biology in the hospital Research Institute, as well as oversees a busy clinical practice in paediatric urology and reconstructive surgery.

He is one of the few paediatric urologists with an independent cell and molecular biology program in North America and the only one in Canada. Bägli continues to hold peer–reviewed funding for his research and is actively involved in both the basic science and clinical training of the paediatric urology fellows at SickKids."

Under "What to expect during your visit," we read:

> You and your baby will meet a urology fellow and a registered nurse. Before circumcision, the doctor who will perform the procedure will speak with you. This is a discussion of the reasons for circumcision, the benefits, risks and alternatives, and ensures that you understand what will happen during the procedure. You will have lots of time to ask questions.

> You should discuss what pain control measures will be used during and after the procedure. Your doctor may use a local anesthetic. Swaddling, oral sugar solutions or acetaminophen (Tylenol) may be given as well, but should not be used as the primary method of pain relief.
>
> To perform the procedure, the doctor places the baby on a special table and cleans the baby's penis and foreskin. First, the baby gets medicine so he won't feel pain. This might be a cream on the skin or a needle into the base of the penis. Then they use special tools to cut off the foreskin. The doctor completes the procedure by wrapping a bandage (called gauze) around the baby's penis to protect it from rubbing against the diaper.
>
> The baby may cry during the procedure and for a short while afterward. Local anesthesia can greatly reduce your baby's discomfort.

The baby will feel pain, despite the above lie, and the alternative to this is no circumcision , with no risks, unlike this procedure that results in scarring, loss of sensitivity, loss of foreskin function, sometimes lifetime complications needing further surgery, and death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the controversy and risks of circumcision, you can read that here and watch videos here.

Dr. Darius Bägli's practice information follows:

SickKids
555 University Avenue
Toronto, Ontario
Canada
M5G 1X8

General inquiries: 416-813-1500
Patient information/locating: 416-813-6621

> "Known Genital Mutilator" Dr. Darius Bägli of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric "treatment" https://t.co/ACceCRtdOG #MGM #circumcision
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) September 11, 2018

Stooges behaving badly

Doug Mortimer · 13 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

When I was in grad school way back in the early 1970s, I had a visiting professor from the British Film Institute. One day he was digressing about how he had put himself through school by working as a projectionist. He reminisced about the comedy short subjects that had once been a fundamental part of every presentation but were now obsolete. He mentioned a number of comic actors and wondered if their names had gone down the memory hole (they had) and then asked if anybody in the class had ever heard of The Three Stooges.

The raucous response shocked him. He had no idea that the Three Stooges had been resurrected on American television and were an integral part of the childhood of just about every student in the room.

The Stooges were arguably more popular in the 50s and 60s than they were during their vaudeville and cinema heyday in the 1930s and 1940s. That would probably not be true today. They may well be available on some cable channel and some of their shorts in the public domain may be out there on YouTube, but there is much more competition for viewers' attention today, so their impact can't help but be lessened. In some circles, that would be considered a good thing.

I suspect that any enterprising soul trying to host a Stooge-a-Thon at a local college campus today would be met with a feminist/SJW task force intent on closing it down. Of course, Mrs. Grundy has never approved of the Stooges but today her disapproval encompasses more and more aspects of male behavior.

In my youth it was common knowledge that one of the fundamental differences between the sexes was that men loved the Three Stooges and women couldn't stand them. I think that's a topic worth exploring. As Moe was wont to say to Larry and/or Curly, "I'll explain it so even you can understand it." At least I'll try.

At this point in time, I fancy myself something of an expert on the Stooges as I have just finished watching in sequence all Three Stooges shorts (97 total) made during the Curly era (1934 – 1946). If I still had to write compositions about how I spent my summer vacation, I would have my theme. Since each short runs about 20 minutes, it was a time-consuming chore but thorough research is a must if sound scholarship is to result. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised to find out that somewhere a gender studies program has integrated the Three Stooges into the study plan. God knows they've studied stranger material in those classes.

It is a fact of life (which means feminists deny it) that women value high-status men who are good providers. Given this premise, it's no wonder women detested the Stooges. They embody everything women don't want in a man. When employed, the Stooges have menial jobs with no future. In addition, they are short, ill-mannered, and they dress funny. When the Stooges made their comedies, their haircuts were considered way out. Given today's hipster hairstyles, however, the Stooges' coiffures are almost mainstream.

In their films, more often than not, the Stooges are unemployed or underemployed. When they do work, they almost never have white collar jobs (it is difficult to imagine any of them sitting behind a desk). Of course, blue collar jobs are more physical and offer more opportunities for slapstick. The Stooges, however, are less than ideal spokesmen for the dignity of the proletariat.

Even when the Stooges portrayed professional men, they were lacking in gravitas. Ironically, the only Oscar nomination (for comedy short subject) they ever received was when they portrayed doctors in "Men in Black" in 1934. Of course, they graduated at the bottom of their class and are hopelessly incompetent, but incompetence is a recurring theme in humor. Male competence is the key to any functioning society – but it ain't particularly funny. Female incompetence is also funny (e.g., "I Love Lucy"), but no comedienne could get away with it today. "We can do it!" and "Girl Power!" y'know.

Despite the Stooges' overall lack of sex appeal, they do occasionally forge relationships with women. In fact, they portray married men in some of their shorts, but they are hardly the heads of their households. Often, they are content to let their wives be the breadwinners while they sleep late. Worst of all, they do not help with the housework, which is probably just as well, given their incompetence.

The Stooges have never been held up as role models. Mothers used to worry about their children imitating their violent interactions. I think the phrase, "Kids, don't try this at home" likely originated when the Stooges ruled the airways. Today the internet has much worse activities that might inspire imitation. Also, the "Jackass" TV show and movies make the Stooges look like sissies. Nevertheless, there are problematical elements in the Stooges' films pertaining to acceptable behavior in the enlightened, progressive America of today.

Since the Stooges live together, domestic violence is a recurring problem. Typically, Moe, the father figure, abuses the "children," Larry and Curly. Clearly, these movies should not be shown today without a trigger warning or an 800 number referring viewers to a domestic violence hotline.

Women are occasionally the brunt of the abuse (but when slapped they almost always slap back). Perhaps more distressing is the matter of female dignity, which often gets trashed. Women high up on the social scale are the most popular targets, as the humor in such situations is in inverse proportion to the social status of the person being humbled. Making a washerwoman the butt of a joke just doesn't elicit as much laughter.

The class struggle, in fact, is a recurring motif in the Stooges' films. Then as now, the nature-versus-nurture debate raged on. In "Hoi Polloi," a 1935 short, two wealthy gentlemen make a wager as to whether heredity is more important that environment or vice versa. Turning the Stooges into gentlemen is the acid test. Of course, it proves to be a fool's errand, but the plot was so good it was recycled in "Half-Wits Holiday" (sadly, Curly suffered a career-ending stroke on the set) in 1946. As late as 1958, the same plot was resurrected for "Pies and Guys," with Joe Besser in the Curly role.

The upshot of these shorts is that attempting to uplift the underclass is a waste of time and effort. In other words, inequality rules. This a controversial conclusion sure to upset social justice warriors, who generally deny any sort of inborn differences in human behavior (particularly gender roles) and decry those who assert otherwise.

Then there is the problem of insensitive language. Moe is the chief offender, given to calling Curly and Larry "imbeciles/idiots/morons." Of course, we no longer use those terms today. You can almost see psychologists rolling their eyes every time they hear one of these pejoratives. I guess if the Stooges were around today, Moe could say, "You special needs/special ed/mentally challenged persons!"

Among the most cringe-inducing Stooges' shorts are those in which they appear in women's clothing, thus making light of the plight of trans people. Curly is particularly egregious in this regard. He is more believable than Moe or Larry, perhaps because he is more neotenous. But his missteps go beyond cross-dressing.

Curly is obese and his appearance plays a big part in the humor. In ye olde cinema, fat people (e.g., Fatty Arbuckle, Oliver Hardy) were fair game for humor. It was socially acceptable to laugh at fat people simply because they looked (and walked) funny. Of course, in those days people laughed without looking over their shoulder to see if anyone was offended. Unfortunately, the fat-shaming in Stooge films isn't limited to Curly. One particularly insensitive scene occurs in "False Alarms" (1936) when a land whale (thankfully, no yoga pants back then), savoring a night on the town with her friends, exults, "Let's go places and eat things."

In a sense, insensitivity is integral to being a Stooge. If you have to absorb a lot of physical abuse, it helps to be insensitive. So let's take a look at the insensitivity of each Stooge.

Women may admire a man who takes charge, but I don't think Moe is what they have in mind. Moe has serious anger management problems, yet his ire is almost never directed at women. He never hits women and rarely hits on women. He just isn't a ladies' man. Though he acts the part of the alpha male (I think the adjective "bossy" applies here), he isn't any smarter than Larry and Curly. Moe is the demanding boss who issues commands right and left, the irascible father who dishes out corporal punishment, the drill sergeant given to humiliating tongue-lashings (think R. Lee Ermey with a funny haircut and without the uniform). Moe is the epitome of toxic masculinity. He would surely be described as a fascist today — and not without justification. Building on his authoritarian personality, he impersonated Hitler in two shorts ('You Nazty Spy" in 1940 and "I'll Never Heil Again" in 1941). I wouldn't say he was literally Hitler but it did seem like type casting.

Larry is the most passive of the stooges. A 1984 biography of Larry (written by his brother) was entitled "The Stooge in the Middle." We might describe Larry as a classic cuck. For the most part, he is a beta (at best) male who just goes with the flow. When it comes to punishment, he frequently takes it and only rarely dishes it out. For the most part he is a nice guy, albeit clueless, the guy who never gets the memo. Larry occasionally tries to ingratiate himself with attractive women but never gets anywhere. His big mistake is hitting on women with high sexual market value. If he sought out older women who have hit the wall, he'd probably fare much better.

Then we come to Curly the man-child. Every comedy team has one (Stan Laurel, Lou Costello, Harpo Marx, Jerry Lewis). His role is to be irritatingly childish or endearingly childlike. As a potential husband, he is worthless, but he sometimes awakens the maternal instinct in women. Today he would probably be diagnosed with Peter Pan Syndrome. Failure to launch doesn't begin to describe his flaws. Curly was not shy and was given to addressing strange women as "Toots" (probably not a wise move for pickup artists today).

Of course, no essay on the Stooges is complete without referring to the pie fights. The origin of this sort of humor dates back to vaudeville and British music hall, but it would be a wild goose chase to try to figure out who threw the first pie or who was the first person to get pied (yes, it is a verb). The Stooges, however, are among the foremost practitioners of the craft.

One of the primary targets for their pies was the hoity-toity female. Any number of elegantly-coiffed and draped women saw their dignity destroyed after a well-aimed pie. Feminism was on the back burner when the Stooges' films were in theaters, but I have to believe that if they were around today, they could really wreak havoc at, say, the NOW annual convention or a university feminist workshop. Why fight feminists with debates, arguments, lobbying, persuasion, statistics, or appeals to reason when you can pie them? A surprising number of high muckety-mucks have gotten this treatment but the perpetrators are usually captured by the high sheriffs.

Now I am not recommending that readers actually go out and shove a pie into anyone's face (though it might make the skirmishes between antifa and the free speechers less lethal). Depending on where you live, you could be charged with assault, battery, and maybe a hate crime. Besides, I don't like the idea of wasting baked goods. Still, given the wealth of feminist wrath on YouTube, anyone with a smidgen of smarts pertaining to video editing and CGI could probably match up shots of the Stooges or other slapstick artistes throwing pies at feminist targets.

I think it would be funny. How about it, Curly? Are you up to putting a pie in the puss of a sanctimonious harpy?

Soitanly!

Nyuck-nyuck-nyuck-nyuck….ad infinitum.

Toxic Feminism

David Solway · 14 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The damage that radical feminism has done to our education system is incalculable. Yet the movement continues to grow exponentially, and gender studies faculties, which promote female empowerment at the expense of what is called "toxic masculinity," continue to multiply.

Feminism has patently skewed the syllabus in the direction of gender asymmetry. In the name of diversity, equity, and inclusion, women have progressively come to dominate campus life regardless of aptitude and competency. Hiring protocols are female-friendly, as are faculty postings and grant opportunities. Qualified male candidates need to make alternative arrangements. (As Heather Mac Donald of the Manhattan Institute muses, in the prevailing climate, Einstein might have trouble getting hired for a professorship.) Male students, already in declining numbers, are under threat of allegations of sexual assault or harassment, ad hoc tribunals, and arbitrary expulsion. McGill University anthropology professor emeritus Philip Carl Salzman warns parents in a comprehensive essay for Minding the Campus, "Your sons will learn they should 'step aside' to give more space and power to females."

Unfortunately, too many careers have been built on gender studies and feminist theory to allow surrender. Leftist government bureaucrats, university administrators, "diversity and inclusion" officers, and faculty across the entire academic landscape are dependent on preserving perhaps the greatest scam in the systemic apparatus we call education. Investing in a false theory or inequitable practice never prevented its adherents, whose reputations and livelihoods are at stake, from surrendering their perquisites. Rather, educrats and their cohorts will double down and increase their efforts to further their agenda. They will persist in finding ways to evade the most far-sighted and ethically determined efforts to redress the parietal imbalance by refusing to implement new directives from enlightened government agencies.

[image]One way is to pursue legal action against elected administrations bent on reform, as in the U.S., where women's groups are suing secretary of education Betsy DeVos for rescinding Obama's guidelines on how to manage Title IX investigations regarding (male) sexual assault. These organizations are intent on defending a regime predicated on unsubstantiated allegations rather than due process. Similarly, in the Canadian province of Ontario, the left-feminist teacher union is suing the recently installed Conservative government for attempting to repeal the current sex ed curriculum. That this curriculum introduces very young students to sexual practices for which they are emotionally unprepared is of no account to these insurrectionary preceptors. Rather, the perpetuation of what is nothing more than a pedagogical sinkhole is their purpose, as is the case with Title IX proponents.

Another way to stymie the remedial enterprise is to stack the deck with ever more fellow-traveling faculty personnel, thus relying on critical mass to fortify a doctrinaire position. Professor Art Hill, chair of the Department of Food Science at the University of Guelph, points out: "One thing that concerns me is hiring policies. Our provost at the University of Guelph hosted a session on Academic Freedom … mostly strategizing on how to limit expression of 'undesirable' views without making martyrs. There was little evidence of sincere respect for differing ideologies. His last slide advised that Universities can limit expression of unacceptable views via selective faculty recruitment … especially in the social sciences and humanities." Recruitment proceeds "according to ideology." (Personal communication.)

Not content with having ruined the humanities beyond repair, the radical sorority and its male apostles are insinuating their campaign into the STEM disciplines, now being steadily infected by the gender cathexis. There is no doubt that the study and practice of science as we know it will be drastically weakened. Toni Airaksinen at PJ Media cites a recent instance of this monetized ideological swindle, which is in fact representative: "The University of Tennessee-Knoxville will spend more than $700,000 in federal funds over the next four years to get more women into STEM, despite their proposed intervention having zero record of success." Some of the bogus issues being addressed involve, as to be expected, the so-called "culture of implicit bias," which simply does not exist – except insofar as it privileges women – and that strange eidolon known as women's "emotional labor." One does not know whether to blush or laugh.

Airaksinen pulled her punches when she should have gone for KO. "Perhaps this program might be helpful for women in STEM, and ultimately, scientific discovery at large," she suggests, perhaps ironically, though "considering that the NSF has poured millions of taxpayer funds into similar projects and hasn't been able to document any results, it seems unlikely." It is not merely unlikely, but entirely implausible. Just ask Sir Tim Hunt, Larry Summers, and Matt Taylor. Science is a discipline with intrinsic standards of replication and objectivity that cannot be adulterated by peripheral concerns entailing social projects, cultural preoccupations, or the fashions of the day while remaining science.

"Emotional labor" has nothing to do with science. Gender has nothing to do with science. Stringent analysis, top-tier math, controlled experiment, endless testing, and honest commitment to the task of advancing human knowledge and exploring the universe are what science is about. If a man can do it, good. If a woman can do it, good. If an immigrant from Mars of indeterminate sex can do it, also good. But if hiring and staffing depend on extraneous factors, mediocrity is the inevitable consequence. Standards must apply across the board.

The same is true, if in various ways, of any profession. Canvass the best candidates, the most capable, the most dedicated to the field, and the most willing to work punishing hours. These are, or should be, the invariable criteria of selection and preferment. Such is undeniably the case – or should be – when it comes to the schools and colleges. Wise administrators, learned and effective teachers, and real subjects are – or should be – the essentials that underpin true education.

Feminist dogma is not one of these essentials. Departments of Gender Studies – as well as the myriad other faux "identity studies" programs like queer studies, race theory, critical theory, fat studies, sexuality studies, whiteness studies, ad vomitatum – do not constitute real subjects; they are centers of radical indoctrination or specimens of academic frivolity. Bruce Bawer's definitive examination of our vaudeville education network, The Victims' Revolution, is an adversarial classic and should be consulted by skeptics. Grouped under the rubric of "social justice," identity studies programs largely explain why our universities are well on the way to becoming third-world institutions. Feminism is the mother of the "social justice" obsession that is devastating the culture and destroying education.

As I have argued before, the academy cannot be reformed, despite a decent government's best intentions. It must be abolished or gradually phased out and replaced by schools and universities and online delivery programs founded on the traditional mandate of moral accountability, exacting scholarship, discipline-specific authority, open debate, and responsible instruction. A redoubtable task, no doubt, but one that is absolutely necessary. Feminism must have no part in it. With its reliance on false assumptions, phony statistics, affective resentment, and glib verbosity, feminism is the most potent carcinogen attacking both the body social and the health of the education system. It is toxic. It is talk-sick. It needs to go.

This article was originally posted at American Thinker and was reposted here with permission from Mr. Solway.

David Solway is a Canadian poet and essayist. He is the author of The Big Lie: On Terror, Antisemitism, and Identity, and is currently working on a sequel, Living in the Valley of Shmoon. His new book on Jewish and Israeli themes, Hear, O Israel!, was released by Mantua Books. His latest book is The Boxthorn Tree, published in December 2012. Visit his Website at www.davidsolway.com and his Facebook page here.

In praise of dead white men

Philip Carl Salzman · 17 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Every age has its obsessions. Religious differences among Christians led to brutal and bloody religious wars a few centuries ago. National conflicts among European powers led to worldwide wars in the 19th and 20th centuries. In the West, our 21st century obsession is identity politics and its conflict between genders, races, sexualities, ethnicities, economic classes, and religions.

Advocates of identity politics divide the world into oppressors and victims: male oppressors and female victims; white oppressors and people of colour victims; heterosexual oppressors and gay, etc. victims; Euro, Asian, Caribbean, and other Canadian oppressors and First Nations victims; prosperous oppressors and impoverished victims; Christian and Jewish oppressors and Muslim victims. Those aware and supportive of victims are considered "woke" and righteous.

Representatives of victim groups demand recognition and celebration. Bruised collective egos must be stroked, as a matter of "social justice." One strategy of enhancing the presence, importance, and value of victim categories is a determined effort to gain or grant greater representation in paintings, movies, statues, plaques, awards, advertisements, appointments, and assignments, through diversity requirements. A complementary strategy is to lobby for or comply with removal of representations of members of oppressor categories: hide their portraits, tear down their statues, remove their names, do not assign their works, do not cite them. This strategy applied above all to "dead white men," now deemed to be evil oppressors throughout history.

North American, and Antipodean university students and professors have rebelled against the study of Western Civilization, now deemed exemplary only in white supremacy, imperialism and colonialism, and slavery of people of colour and suppression and extermination of native peoples. Classical studies too are rejected, because the ancient Greeks and Romans were white. Medieval studies are now in an uproar because they are too white, and allegedly of interest to white supremacists.

These "social justice" views are ludicrous in their anachronistic and ahistorical preaching. Why such advocates imagine that their 21st century preferences for gender, race, sexual preference, and ethic diversity should or could have been honoured in the Ancient World, the Middle Ages, or the 18th and 19th centuries is beyond reason. Their demands are ethnocentric in the extreme. They contradict their multicultural claims of cultural relativity by demanding that others, in the past no less, conform to their values.

Two bludgeons energetically used todays by social justice advocates are slavery and native peoples. The arguments go along these lines: The American founding fathers were evil slave holders, so everything that they said or did, including the Constitution of the United States of America, must be rejected, along with their names, images, and works in toto. So too with any other slave holders, whatever else they did, especially if they built cities or universities; their names and images must be erased, a la Soviet historiography. For Canada the great sin is not viewing native peoples, First Nations as we now call them, according to the ideas of the 21st century. As mentioned, an anachronistic and ethnocentric demand. The founding leader of Canada, John A. Macdonald stands condemned among social justice activists and politically correct conformists. Teachers Associations demand that no schools be named after Macdonald; the capital city of British Columbia has taken down its statue of Macdonald.

It is generally regarded as rude, if not racist, to refer to historical facts in discussing social justice demands. But I will risk the condemnation on behalf of truth and reason. Slavery was not unique to the United States. In fact, slavery was widespread throughout the world in all of history up to the 19th century. The Greeks and Romans and many others were slaving societies, with mainly white slaves. The Arab Islamic Empire from the 7th century made slaving of both whites and blacks a major policy. The Ottoman Empire followed up by slave taking of whites in the Balkans. North African Muslim "Moors" slave raided in southern Europe, all the way up to Ireland. West Africans traditionally captured slaves for their own use, and later slaved to feed them into the North Atlantic slave trade.

South Asians did not need slaves, because they had “untouchables.” Russians had serfs. Even tribal peoples took slaves; both the Baluch of southeast Iran and the Turkmen of northeast Iran captured Persians which they kept or sold as slaves. Canadian Northwest Coast natives made slaves of prisoners taken in raids and warfare. So the framing of slavery as whites enslaving people of colour is historically and ethnographically false.

Why was slavery almost ubiquitous throughout the world and throughout history? The answer is simple: Economic production depended upon human and animal power, and the amount produced was low. That meant that food security, prosperity, and wealth were almost impossible to accomplish. There was only one possible solution. That solution was to capture labour that would be uncompensated, which means that most of what was produced could be appropriated for others. In other words, adding uncompensated labour to the economy would raise the total amount produced, but would draw little from the total, thus increasing the products available to others, especially the elite. This uncompensated labour consisted of slaves. That is why imperial expeditions and expansions had as one of their main goals to capture foreigners to serve as slaves in the metropolis. The slaves laboured, and the citizens and their elite enjoyed the fruits of the slaves’ labours.

Today, fortunately, slavery has largely been suppressed. It exists mainly in certain Muslim countries and Islamic movements, such as the (now happily defunct) Islamic State, and in small scale human trafficking. How did slavery come to be outmoded? The answer, again, is simple. In the 18th century white men in Western Europe generated first an agricultural revolution and then the industrial revolution, both of which raised the level of productivity to unheard of, high levels. For the first time in human history, economic productivity was able to provide foodstuffs and materials to satisfy basic human needs and even a degree of prosperity. This took place in the wider context of the Enlightenment and the invention of science, all also the work of European white men. It was during this period that slavery started to be banned by white men in various American states and European jurisdictions. In 1807, white men in the United States made engaging in the slave trade a felony, and in the same year white men in the United Kingdom abolished slave trading and sent the Royal Navy to suppress the maritime slave trade. From the early 19th century the American abolition movement, which consisted largely of white men with the aid of some white women, as blacks continued to be enslaved, pressed for the end of slavery.

Lincoln’s Emancipation Proclamation in 1863 freed the slaves in the secessionist states. Blacks were admitted to the Union Army and Navy, some 200,000 serving and fighting for their freedom by the end of the Civil War. The current social justice initiative of portraying white men as evil slavers may be good anti-white propaganda, but it is false history, and racist.

Throughout history, around the world, native populations have fought one another for territory, material resources, prestige, and slaves. North American native tribes fought one another, enclaved captives, and tortured captives. Middle Eastern Bedouin tribes fought among themselves from Arabia to Morocco. East African tribes raided each other for livestock, or for precedence and control of the state. South American native tribes fought one another, to steal women, among other goals. And everywhere, when native peoples came into contact with more powerful societies, they were killed off, enslaved, maintained as a subordinate population, or assimilated to the culture of their conquerors. You will recall that the Jewish tribes of ancient Israel were captured and carried off by the Persians eastward to slavery in Babylon, and then, having returned to Israel, were enslaved in Egypt. We see enslavement of conquered local peoples also with the Roman Empire that enslaved the tribes of Britain and central Europe, the Arab Muslim Empire as they conquered and enslaved many in the Christian and Jewish Levant and Berber North Africa, as well as Al-Andalus in the Iberian Peninsula, the Mongol Empire in Russia and the Middle East, and the Inka Empire in South America.

So why would it be a shock to us that a 19th century Canadian politician trying to build a new state would include among his priorities the control and assimilation of the native population? Why on earth would we imagine that he would take our 21st century, culturally relativist, multicultural, and social justice perspective? It is anachronistic, ethnocentric, and absurd to condemn 19th century men for not being 21st century men.

Having addressed some lines of the social justice attack, I now want to turn to the positive. We know perfectly well that dead white European men invented Western Civilization, the Enlightenment, and modern society through their scientific, agricultural, and industrial revolutions. Unlike social justice advocates, I would argue that this is good reason to celebrate dead white men, rather than to reject Western Civilization, the Enlightenment, and modernity. It is the achievements of dead white men that provided the prosperous and open society that enables ungrateful social justice warriors to make their claims, no matter how unjustified.

On a more positive note, I would like to mention a few dead white men who happen to be my personal favourites. I will leave aside the two streams of ancient cultures that were foundational for Western Civilization: the Hebrew and Christian, on the one side, and the Greek and the Roman on the other. As the generators of the Hebrew and Christian cultures were Middle Eastern Jews, their skin hue is uncertain, maybe tan or coffee coloured, perhaps off white, so we do not need to defend them for being white. The Greeks and Romans were certainly white, or at least Mediterranean olive skinned. Do I really need to explain why it would be childish to dismiss as irrelevant and unimportant Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Sophocles, Aeschylus, Euripides, Aristophanes, et al? Or Roman law? I'll limit myself to a few favourites among the moderns, as examples.

Let's begin with the great empiricist philosopher, David Hume (Scottish, 1711-1776), who showed that philosophy can be both realistic and enlightening. Hume quote: "A wise man proportions his belief to the evidence."

Next are the scientific pioneers James Hutton (Scottish, 1726-1797) and Charles Lyell (1797-1875), who conceived of and documented "uniformitarianism," the doctrine that the physical earth can be explained best by the constant working of natural forces over time. Uniformitarianism rejected supernatural intervention and catastrophism as explanations for physical forms on earth. Hutton and Lyell were white men who invented modern geoscience.

Next is a man of practical invention, John Laudon McAdam (Scottish, 1756-1836), who invented the macadam road surface, the first modern road construction, and thus transformed transportation. Another dead white man.

Now I would introduce a dead white woman, Jane Austen (English, 1775-1817), brilliant author of six mature works, including Pride and Prejudice, Sense and Sensibility, and Emma, all beloved, repeatedly drawn on in television series and in feature length films. An author of great wit, warm heart, and unforgettable prose. The first sentence in Pride and Prejudice: "It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife."

Returning to dead white men, I would draw your attention to music. The richness of Western music is recognised around the world. The names of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven are legend. But my personal favourite is grand opera composer Gioachino Rossini (Italian, 1792-1868), who wrote the glorious, inspiring, uplifting, and always surprising music for "The Barber of Seville," "William Tell," "La Cenerentola [Cinderella]" and some forty five other operas.

The American Founding Fathers: George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison, John Jay, Alexander Hamilton and others, drawing on the European Enlightenment tradition, built a country based on a vision of the rights of man, and designed a democratic government independent of religion and based on a division of powers.

Dead white men all, but their work was instrumental in giving birth to the most productive and powerful country in the world today, a country built by immigrants who became Americans, and who enjoyed freedom and opportunity that they had never known.

The founders of British Social Anthropology, both dead white men: Alfred Reginald Radcliffe-Brown (English, 1881-1955), foundational Professor of Social Anthropology at Oxford University, whose crystalline theoretical essays in inspired generations of anthropologists. Bronislaw Malinowski (Polish, 1884-1942) who set a standard of long term, participant observation in ethnographic research seldom matched, and whose vivid accounts of the people of the Trobriand Islanders inspired anthropologists since.

One white woman and two white men, none of them dead, are favourite novelists:

Annie Proulx (American, of English and French-Canadian ancestry,1935-) wrote The Shipping News, set in Newfoundland, winner of the Pulitzer Prize and National Book Award, a wonderfully uplifting book of personal redemption.

Richard Russo (American, 1949-) won the Pulitzer Prize for Empire Falls, one of several novels about run down, post-industrial, northeast American towns. His others, such as That Old Cape Magic and Nobody's Fool are equally compelling. Straight Man is one of the great campus novels.

David Adams Richards (Canadian, 1950-) writes novels recounting the lives of poorer inhabitants of New Brunswick, some in the Miramichi, each novel more devastating than the other: Mercy among the Children, which was awarded the Giller Prize, Nights below Station Street, which won the Governor General's Award, and Crimes against My Brother, among a dozen others. His happiest is his latest, Principles to Live By, although the protagonist…. [censored as a spoiler]. He was appointed to the Canadian Senate in 2017.

My final favourite is Ayaan Hirsi Ali (Somali, Dutch, American, 1969), who is not white, not male, and (happily) not dead. Her autobiography, Infidel, is a brilliant, informative, compelling book. I assigned it to the students in my seminar on "Immigration and Culture," a subject on which Infidel is incomparably rich. Many students read ahead, beyond the day's assignment; they could not stop reading. Ayaan Hirsi Ali is not only a person of talent, but also of great dedication and courage.

My selection of persons to celebrate is brief (you are welcome!) and personal. Others would have different favourites. But one thing is clear: anyone who says that the most important thing about a person is their race, gender, sexual preference, ethnicity, origin, or religion, and who wishes to block their exposure to anyone who is not of their identity category or a member of an alleged "victim" category, is impoverishing themselves. Anyone who wishes to edit history on those same grounds is being dishonest. Individuals and their works should be engaged and praised for their character, their heart, and their accomplishments, whatever their identity category, as I have tried to do here.

♠

Philip Carl Salzman is Professor of Anthropology Emeritus at McGill University, Senior Fellow at the Frontier Centre for Public Policy, Fellow at the Middle East Forum, and a Director of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East. His public interest articles can be found at the Frontier Centre, the Macdonald-Laurier Institute, Gatestone Institute, Middle East Forum, Minding the Campus, C2C Journal, Areo Magazine, and Dogma Review.

Women must submit to men for successful relationships

Contra Mundum · 19 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The following was a message from one of my patrons that grew out of our weekly online meetings, and has been adapted into an article for your enjoyment with permission from the author. PE

So – I'm going to miss today's meeting (9/15/18), as I have to travel from the gynocentric slave-state where I live, to an even more gynocentric slave state, to visit some friends there. In the meantime, you asked last week for thoughts on the idea that guys might feel they are missing something if they aren't able to engage in reciprocal, healthy relationship with a woman. I think I agree. You know a little bit of my own situation, which I admit in this day-and-age is rare. I am in a medium-term marriage with a wife of 16 years. I've noticed at this stage that the long-term pair-bonding process is taking hold, and we both have found contentment in our relationship.

We have lots of good times – stuff I don't generally talk about during the meetings because I know many of the other guys have been so badly burned, and the last thing they want to hear about is what seems to them pie-in-the-sky relationships with women who don't exist in any large number. Plus I really enjoy the meetings – listening is fascinating.

When it comes to pair-bonded relationships, I think you are correct. Most guys will feel that are "missing something" going full-monk MGTOW, and they will in fact seek out some sort of relationship with a female, even though in this day the risk is huge, and disasters abound. When I am asked by younger men and women for advice on marriage, what I say usually pisses off most of the women and encourages the men. This is understandable. To be successful, long-term, pair-bonded relationships between men and women must enhance the man's independence and authority. They must feature male and female in proper evolutionary alignment, with the man leading and the woman following.

Why is this? It has to do with how a boy becomes a man, and what he achieves in doing so. A boy is formed in the body of a woman, is born into the world of women, and there he remains until he matures. During this time, he is completely dependent on his mother and other women for everything — at the beginning even for the food that sustains his growth. As he matures, he struggles to leave this world and become independent of it. He fights for his ability to take care of himself, make his own decisions, and choose his direction in life. At least that is how it is supposed to be.

If a boy completes the rites of passage, the trials, and the necessary lessons to become an independent man, why the hell would he want to return to the world of women, to once again be subject to them? The only answer I can find is heterosexual desire. If it weren't for that, I think 99% of men would have nothing to do with women. When a man gives up his independence and authority over his own life to once again become subject to a woman, all sorts of bad crap happens.

I think of my own situation. I wasn't looking for a woman to shelter me, to take care of me, or do any of the things that feminists claim a woman does in a "healthy relationship." I had already achieved independence, and I had a very successful career as a businessman. When I married, I had built and was running a 200-person company with annual revenues of $40 million. I didn't need a woman to help me do that.

Still, something was missing. I was looking to fill a void that I decided could only be filled by being the head of a family. I went looking for a woman to do that with, and my wife and I found each other. She also wanted a family, and had been living successfully on her own, teaching in the New York City public schools. Having had enough of teaching other people's kids, she wanted to raise her own. There is also a religious component – we were (and still are) both orthodox Christians, and we wanted an orthodox family life. She was not interested in emasculating me; to have her feminist way with me. In fact, we decided beforehand to follow the very traditional path of me providing for the family both spiritually and physically, while she raised babies. That has worked well for us. As was discussed last week, our scriptures (Ephesians 5:22+) are very clear on how families are organized and how husbands and wives relate to each other.

Husbands love their wives, and give their very lives for them, with the intention of making them holy. Wives fully submit to their husbands in all things, and they must show respect at all times for their husband's sacrifice. This is a great arrangement for both. We believe that God gives the husband grace to lead his family, and we believe he will reward a faithful wife who follows.

When it comes to alpha [f]ucks and beta bucks, the scriptures are right on the money. Women love to have sex with the bad boy, but they want the provider to take care of them and their children. Well, nothing drives the dominance that a wife loves in her husband like her willing submission to him, and this in turn helps the husband resist becoming beta-male, emasculated cuck, which is the distortion that occurs when the husband sacrifices and the wife greedily abuses him.

So, to wrap it up – if men want to be fulfilled in their relationships with women, they should look for women who are going to submit to their will, and take their leadership. They should cultivate these qualities in themselves so they will attract the kind of woman that will make them happy. Then they should watch all your videos and realize that such a woman is incredibly rare in our culture, and they are likely to get screwed if they get married. And that's sad.

Rape liar Christine Blasey Ford and the #MeToo Shuffle

Paul Elam · 21 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Hawaiian Senator Maizie Hirono, speaking in reference to the sexual assault allegation ambush against Supreme Court nominee Bret Kavanaugh, said men should just step up and shut up, further admonishing us all to believe any woman who makes a claim of sexual assault against any man.

In her brief tirade against all the men of the world, which she delivered with all the brio of an irate librarian, Hirono points out with trademark feminist ignorance that it is just men perpetuating sexual assaults. Evidently, she didn't get the memo on #MeToo figurehead/sexual predator Asia Argento or the epidemic of female school teachers who groom and abuse their young male charges, but alas that is a talk for another day.

And, of course, I don't want to waste your time with windy speculation Kavanaugh's innocence — on the transparent political motivation behind the accusations against him or on the stink of mendacity on the breath of rape liar Christine Blasey Ford.

The fact that rape liar Christine Blasey Ford has zero credibility was established the moment that Diane Feinstein tossed the accusation into the gears like a wrench to delay Kavanaugh's confirmation till after the mid-term elections, when the Dems hope to have the votes to deny him the appointment more officially. If you can't see that you were probably lobotomized at birth. Check with your mom.

The teachable moment in all this, the one that appeals to my red pill sensibilities, is the absolute spinelessness being displayed, not by Kavanaugh's detractors, but by his so-called defenders. Prominent from all these hombres sin cojones is the new dance in Washington DC. It's called the #MeToo shuffle. One feminized conservative after another is going on and on about how you have to treat rape liar Christine Blasey Ford like a kitten that someone tried to drown; how you have coddle her hunky dory ass, bring her warm milk and cookies and build her a safe space with your bare hands; one so roomy that it would make any west coast university jealous.

Don't want to come to big bad Washington DC? 'Don't worry, princess,' says Republican Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley. 'We'll fly the whole fucking government anywhere in the world you want to meet. We'll cast some puppy videos from YouTube to the big screen and try not to ask you any hard questions.'

Sean Hannity, about the best defender of Kavanaugh out there, reminds his audience roughly every five minutes how rape liar Christine Blasey Ford needs to be heard; how she must be given every opportunity to feel warm and fuzzy while she persecutes and destroys an innocent man.

Meanwhile, rape liar Christine Blasey Ford's leftist activist attorney plays 'let's torch due process' a little more with one offer for testimony after another that only someone at gunpoint would accept. And make no mistake, you do the #MeToo Shuffle because you know that gun is pointed right at your career.

Her latest non-offer is one in which Kavanaugh is supposed to go first in testimony, so that he can try to defend himself before he hears the accusation. Kavanaugh's a brilliant legal mind, but I still don't see how he pulls that one off. Oh well, never mind that, a woman claims to have been wronged. We're supposed to shut up and listen. Or step up and shut up. Or some other stupid shit. Anything but think and ask questions.

What we have here is an unending stream of Democrats screaming for fake justice, hating on men and itching to tar and feather an innocent man, and a herd of mousy republicans dancing like court jesters, hoping to get Kavanaugh approved without getting in trouble with the women.

And that makes a particularly ironic Joke of this whole affair. In a world where men supposedly have all the power; where women are put upon little snowflakes who can't look you in the eye and tell you their side of the story, we sure are getting a strange picture. The leftist men are playing mighty mouse, chests puffed out like they were full of silicon, parroting whatever leftist women want them to say. And conservative men look even more comical, stepping on each other's dicks, as well as their own, doing the #MeToo shuffle.

That's what mindless gynocentrism does to any institution it infects. It turns a bunch of weasels into a bunch of baboons.

But it works for the female gatekeepers of this particular menagerie.

New York Senator and 2020 presidential hopeful Kirsten Gillbirand has been out there shrieking at any camera brave enough to get close to her that we need speshul rules for women to make claims about sexual assault; rules that don't involve evidence or due process, because, as she says, "it often comes down to 'he said, she said,' and when that happens people always believe the men."

And of course, that's what happens all the time. From the Scottsboro Boys to Duke LaCross, Hofstra, Tawana Brawley, rape liar Jackie Coakley of the UVA Rolling Stone rape hoax, destroyed politician Dominique Strauss-Kahn. All these stories and hundreds more are punctuated by men paying ruinous prices for things they absolutely did not do, because in he said, she said cases, people believe the men.

Tell that to all the blacks who got lynched in the south because a white girl raised a crooked finger. Oh wait, they're dead. Never mind.

But hey, you can still tell that to Clarence Thomas. He's the last guy they tried to keep out of the Supreme Court with trumped up accusations tossed in at the last minute by a woman of questionable motivation and even more questionable credibility. That was 18 years ago, and Thomas got in by the skin of his treacherously male teeth.

And it may be that Kavanaugh beats back the attempt to ambush him. After all, his accuser wants to ruin him without having to dirty her hands (or perjure herself) at a hearing. Rape liar Cristine Blasey Ford's behavior tells me she expects to get slaughtered at a fair hearing. Even with Team Kavanaugh acting like whipped puppies. I guess not remembering when or where she was sexually assaulted takes a little wind out of her bullshit sails.

Even with all the stink from her flatulent story, if Kavanaugh makes it now, it'll be because his accuser is weak, not because his defenders are strong. They've just got enough fire in them to do the MeToo Shuffle.

Feminism, Gynocentrism and the Future Matriarchal Gynocracy: The Different Types of Societies and the Feminist Zero Sum Game (Part one)

Yoav Levin · 22 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is part one of a two part article by Yoav Levin in which he gives an introduction to his work on gynocentrism and related topics. Part two will be published on A Voice for Men in the near future. Yoav is working on several books as he extends this work. Yoav will shortly be publishing two works: The Last Taboo and The Origin of European Gynocentrism. –Ed

First of all let's determine in anthropological terms the different types of societies in human history:

A) Matriarchal society: This is a society where both political, as well as informal power, is primarily in the hands of women. This type of society has never existed.

B) Patriarchal Society: This is a society where both the informal as well as the formal political power is in the hands of men. This type of society has also never existed.

C) Gynocentric society:

It is divided into:

1. Matrilineal: This society is one where either the inheritance or finances are almost solely distributed as well as family or religious lineage is based upon the mother. It is a power dynamic which basically reflects female informal power while the political formal power still stays in the hands of men. Therefore, informal and formal power is shared between men and women. The Mosuo in China and Judaism (especially in terms of religion as well as national lineage) are two examples.

2. Matrilocal: This society is one where the husband moves in with the wife's family after marriage. Informal and formal political power is shared between men and women. There are a few such societies especially in the east (Tibet and India).

3. Matrifocal: This society is one where the mother and kids make the family unit, and the father plays a lesser role. Informal and formal political power is still shared between men and women.

4. Patrilineal: this is a society where either inheritance or financial redistribution of resources as well as the familial or religious lineage is primarily determined by the father. Informal and formal political power is shared between men and women. Historically, various patrilineal aspects were always included in all Gynocentric societies to balance the distribution of power between the sexes and to enable both a more harmonious society as well as relationships and marriages.

5. Patrifocal: This is a society where the husband with the children is the focus of family and the wife is less important. This type of society has also particularly never existed as it goes against the gynocentric nature of all primates including the human species.

6. Patrilocal: This is a society where the wife moves with the husband. Informal and formal political power is shared between men and women.

So going by accepted anthropological definitions, there is no known instances either today or in the past of any matriarchal or patriarchal society. There are merely examples of gynocentric matrilineal, matrilocal, matrifocal, patrilineal as well as patrilocal societies, but they are not the same thing.

The reasons why societies were defined in this or other ways were normally:

1. Evolution
2. Survival
3. Economical Scarcity and better survival in terms of economic planning and distribution of wealth
4. Balancing formal and informal power between men and women in relationships and society

Truth vs Myths

The History of Human Power Dynamics, Relations and Interactions in Society

Unlike the gigantic myths we've heard and the massive lies we've been told by feminists, when it comes to basic rights both in ancient history as well as in medieval times neither men nor women had any of them (or at least almost none). However, even in those times as we will see immediately if there was anything to gain for the poor masses of society it weas mainly women, not men, who could benefit and enjoy it. Yet, on the other side, when it comes to human rights like having the right to education, the right to vote and running businesses, it was women gaining them long before men could have dreamt of. Moreover, even during the colonial days of the US, women were groundbreaking in journalism and advertising. In the Encyclopedia of Women in American History we learn that the first person to ever own a printing press in 1638 was not a man but a woman. Her name was Elizabeth Glover of Cambridge MA. Additionally, there were also already 25 other women who ran newspapers and presses plus another 26 cases where a woman opened up her own firm with her own money. When we read further down, we also find out that a woman named Mary Katherine Goddard was chosen to be the first person to even print out the first copy of the Declaration of Independence of the US. Does this sound much like a patriarchal or even a patrilineal society to you? I don't think so! All of this just shows and helps us not only to refute some of the massive lies we've been fed by feminist bureaucrats, officials, teachers, governments, schools and the mainstream media but it also enables us to demonstrate one of the basic principles of the matrifocal gynocentric society namely that not only that women are the privileged sex, not only that the society revolves around women but that they also always come before men and even prior to children. Consider for example that in a case of birth complications it is the mother but not the child that would be saved. Yes, I know, it is evolutionary feature of biological gynocentrism. Yes, I know, it is required for survival. Yet, it only emphasizes our observation that our society is neither patriarchal nor patrifocal but basically gynocentric and matrifocal.

The Right to Vote: Women Come First

As a part of their campaign of hatred, vindictiveness and incitement and in order to demonize and dehumanize men, one of the biggest lies and greatest myths spread by feminists on the basis of a selective, false and manipulative analysis of history is the infamous claim that men have exploited and oppressed women throughout history, denying them the right to vote while men lived a luxurious life and enjoyed every moment. As we have already seen above this is a not only false but an evil lie spread by feminist propaganda. Now, let's examine and scrutinize this lie a little bit more. First, we should note that these lies are at the basis of the war of on men, boys and fathers. As part of joint state – feminist cooperation, this war is led by women's organizations and is supported by governmental institutions that discriminate against men and boys in favor of girls and women. As we will see, men never oppressed, exploited or deprived women of the right to vote or allegedly any other right. Men simply lacked the power, rights and financial resources to do so. As women do today, men have also never abandoned them in the struggle for human and civil rights.

However, today as women embody the most privileged class in society, they misuse and abuse their power and abandon men who fought for it. Through the feminist war on men they attempt to take the matrifocal and gynocentric society and to establish a matrifocal gynocracy which is, in fact, nothing more than a tyrannical gynocentric matriarchy. Here it is important to note, as we shall see immediately, that until the 20th century no one had the right to vote. It wasn't a matter of gender but rather of status. In practical terms, as explained below, women were given the right to vote before men. Especially those men who were sent into two world wars, without having a say about their destiny while women being safe at home could vote and send men to their deadly fate. Let's look at the timeline of American history as an example of this dynamic which basically reflects again the matrifocal and gynocentric principle of putting women's needs, rights and desires above those of everyone else which among other is also a derivative and an historical heritage of medieval chivalry and gynocentrism :

1. 1600 – women own businesses and assets
2. By 1867 most men could not vote due to property laws ensuring that only affluent men could have the voting right
3. 1870 The 15th Amendment of the US Constitution eliminates restrictions based on race/color regarding elections in the US
4. 1900 Property laws ensure that all women who own property can have voting rights
5. 1918 Men and women can vote – certain property laws still exist
6. 1920 Property laws are eliminated – the right to vote for everyone

Here, we should first bear in mind that women actually owned businesses from the middle Ages. As we have mentioned above already by the 17th century women were the first to own the printing and press businesses in the United States. It was long before the average man could dream of this. This data refutes the feminist lies about the discrimination and oppression of women by men or any imaginary patriarchy. It proves that being a (stay at home) mother, having a family or alternatively choosing a career were personal choices made by women. They were not oppressed, exploited, forced to do so by an evil patriarchy or ever abused by men. In fact, long before men had any economic or political rights, women were already in positions of economic, political as well as societal power, they were influencing public opinion through the press and the advertising tools they owned, while the only right men had at that time was to be sent to wars, be slaughtered on the battlefields, to serve as cannon fodder for women, and to return home in pieces.

Women also inherited the husbands wealth so that not only half of the husband's money and resources, as we will see below, but up to 70% were in the hands of women. Even though women did not work for it! As I said and will elaborate in detail in the next paragraphs women in the early 20th century also controlled between 70 to 80 percent of the nation's wealth – something that is true even today in "patriarchal India"! It is also important to remember that during the colonial period, prior to the establishment of the American federation, the vote was reassigned to the head of the family in most states in the US. Women, as well as men, had no voting rights in the original 13 colonies, but it was only because of the original British voting system that required ownership of land and assets to be able to vote in elections, which did not exist for most poor and average men too. Thus, even men who did not own land and assets were not allowed to vote in the United States. However, if the man was not available for voting for any reason, then the woman would vote for him. In addition, whether there were no male heirs and the woman inherited the property or vice versa she actually had her own property without having the need to inherit it (as we have seen this was possible already from the 17th century), she could have voted as the owner of the property too. As more and more colonies (and territories) joined the Union, they automatically granted women the right to vote. In the amendment concerning universal suffrage, the Fifteenth Amendment to the 1870 Constitution, there were more women in the United States who had the right to vote than men. This is also most probably reflected in the electoral system of the US elections that presumably evolved from the family level to the communal one. Moreover, it should be also noted that feminists opposed the right to vote for men and in general for all minorities including women for purely racist reasons. The origin of modern feminism is in the American Ku Klux Klan. Based on the WKKK ideal feminists were in favor of the right to vote but solely for white women.

Those who initiated the change were all conservatives but not liberals (including the feminists). Therefore, the right to vote for women is not the result of the feminist struggle, but rather the continuation of the conservative fight for civil rights for everyone. Women were given the right to vote before most of the men were given this right as a part of this struggle.

From here we can learn and draw a number of conclusions:

1. The right to vote for women was guaranteed even before the feminist movement was established and allegedly began to fight for the right to vote.

2. Women, as well as men, did not receive the right to vote because of the partisan activity of the feminist movement that promoted selective rights for women (and not for the entire population) but it was good men who fought for the right to vote (as well as many other civil rights) for everyone including women.

3. (Affluent) Women received the right to vote before the majority of (poor) men.

4. At the time of the 15th Amendment of the American Constitution, more women than men had the right to vote and later most women and men received the right to vote together

5. Women worked and therefore owned businesses long before the twentieth century and the emergence of the feminist movement. This also isn't the result of a feminist struggle.

6. Similar to Europe, where the process was spread over a period of several decades and at the same time, the right to vote for women as well as men were not established by feminists but was granted to everyone as a part of a wider struggle for human and civil rights for everyone. A struggle led by men and not by feminists. In two bloody war men who were sent to their death by affluent women (who could already vote) paid the price for those human and civil rights with their own life. It was not women.

To sum it up: Although men never abandoned women and always treated them like everyone else in the struggle for civil rights, women's organizations today have uncovered their true face. Today, women have betrayed men as well as the agreement and social contract that existed between the sexes so now when men demand true equality – in parenthood, career, work, health, law, recognition of their contribution to society and their suffering – women and especially feminists have stabbed them in the back. Today women are not fighting for equality, but for privileged status in society and female supremacy.

Bettina Arndt: Campus rape tour making waves

Bettina Arndt · 23 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

As many of you will know, Bettina Arndt has been on a speaking tour of Australian universities to bring attention to the fake rape crisis being peddled by feminists and social justice warriors on university campuses. Naturally her tour has opened up a hornet's nest of protest and mud slinging, but it appears she is making headway. Below is an email summary from Bettina detailing recent developments. – PW

My Campus Rape Tour is Making Waves

I have put together a series of letters to Vice Chancellor Michael Spence asking firstly that he return the security fee to the students because the security guards were unable to control the unruly protesters.

But more importantly, I have asked that formal complaints be taken against key organisers of the protest. I have spelt out in detail the various codes of conduct and bullying/harassment policies breached by these organisers and provided abundant evidence, including video footage of these breaches. We have included witness statements from members of my audience who were bullied, abused and harassed by the protesters.

My new video reveals who these key protesters are and gives a few glimpses of them in action.

Plus shows some of the relevant university regulations. This is designed just as a first stage. We are have plans to follow up, with legal action if necessary.

I also had a call from Dan Tehan, the new Federal Education Minister who is looking into what happened.

Here he is talking to Alan Jones about it: https://www.2gb.com/i-think-the-horse-has-bolted-has-political-correctness-ruined-australian-universities/

The Sydney Morning Herald has just reported on Tehan's discussions with Vice Chancellors this week about it all. Tehan is now proposing a plan for protesters to have to pay for security rather than the people they are protesting against – here he is on ABC's Insiders programme this morning. http://www.abc.net.au/insiders/dan-tehan-joins-insiders/10295792. See from 8.39 to the end.

I will be sending Tehan my letter to Spence which provides all the evidence about key protesters disrupting the Sydney talk – showing it is quite possible to identify people who gleefully take ownership of the protest. Perhaps he will use this as a test case.

Tehan has also been floating the idea that universities could bolster their commitments to academic freedom and freedom of speech through a charter modelled on the one adopted by the University of Chicago and other US colleges. Among other things, the charter declares: "Although faculty, students and staff are free to criticise, contest and condemn the views expressed on campus, they may not obstruct, disrupt, or otherwise interfere with the freedom of others to express views they reject or even loathe."

https://www.smh.com.au/politics/federal/you-protest-you-pay-education-minister-s-bid-to-bolster-free-speech-at-universities-20180921-p5057h.html

Meme of the Week

AVFM Meme of the Week · 24 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

History in Maine as prosecutors forced to pay up in Filler case

Robert Franklin · 25 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

For the first time in the history of the State of Maine, prosecutors and their enablers are being forced to pay money to one of their victims. In this case, that victim is Vladek Filler although, the way Filler turned the tables on his tormenters, it's hard to know who's the victim.

I've written about Filler many times before. During his divorce and child custody suit, his wife Ligia leveled charges of rape against him. Her claims were false and plainly intended to wrest custody from him and marginalize Vladek in his children's lives. The police were happy to assist Ligia in her lies, withholding exculpatory evidence, among other things. That brought to center stage ADA Mary Kellett who seems to have never heard a claim of sexual assault she didn't believe. She took the case to trial and won a conviction until it was overturned due to her outrageous and unethical behavior. Undeterred, she brought a misdemeanor charge of assault against Filler for allegedly splashing water on his wife. Yes, she really did that.

Filler was again convicted and again had it overturned due to, once again, prosecutorial misconduct. Meanwhile, the family court, being less gullible than Kellett, the police and the criminal court, had recognized Ligia for what she was – a wife who'd stop at nothing to separate her kids from their dad – and handed sole custody to Vladek.

Now, at that point, about 99% of people in Filler's shoes would have heaved a deep sigh of relief and gotten on with their lives. Not Filler. He went on the offensive. He charged Kellett before the Maine state bar association with numerous ethical violations. The bar agreed, finding she'd committed seven in her mistreatment of him. She's still the only Maine prosecutor in memory (and maybe in history) to be sanctioned for her behavior on behalf of the state. Shortly thereafter, Kellett resigned from the District Attorney's office.

But Filler wasn't finished. He sued the police, Kellett and numerous others who'd conspired to deprive him of his civil rights. The latest news is that 17 of the 18 defendants have turned tail and run, offering to pay Filler and his lawyers if he'll just leave them alone. The 18th defendant had a default judgment taken against her, apparently secure in the belief that she's judgement-proof.

Remarkably, the defendants paid Filler and his lawyers despite his refusal to sign a confidentiality agreement. Those of course are standard in settlements of civil suits. But, in keeping with his pugnacious approach to everything that's happened to him, Filler demanded that the world know what had happened.

This is the first time in Maine's history that the DA's office has had to pay for its denial of the civil rights of a person it falsely targeted as a criminal. With any luck, Filler's successes will encourage others to pursue their rights, and ADA's across the state to start behaving in accordance with the law and ethical precepts.

Vladek Filler is a stand-up guy. He's done a huge service for the people of Maine. He' shown that the state isn't immune from suit and that it can't run roughshod over We the People. For that, I say he's a hero. Plus, he's a heckuva good dad.

Dr. Christine Ford, Brett Kavanaugh, and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 29 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Why do you believe/disbelieve Christine Ford or Brett Kavanaugh?

Half of the people in the United States now know that Brett Kavanaugh is guilty of being in a teenaged country club rape gang. If you don't believe his accusers, you're probably one of those angry men who believe that "rule of law", "due process" and "presumption of innocence" are more important than taking women's allegations of sexual misconduct seriously.

Or, perhaps you're a pro-life Republican, willfully ignoring the seriousness of the allegations, because you don't think women should get to have control over their own bodies. Maybe you think this was a long time ago and it's not that big of a deal.

Last year, I laid out a case that all men are flawed, we're doomed and only women can save the day.

This may be a tough idea to sell to AVFM readers, but honestly, AVFM was the only platform to agree to publish the series. I believe by the end I persuaded greater than 0% of the readers to my way of thinking.

In a new series, "Men, as a group, are idiots, they could learn a lot from women, and they'd better ask for help," I'll explain how it is that half the population knows that Brett Kavanaugh was part of a serial rape gang, even without an FBI investigation. I believe I will also persuade you that, in fact, men as a group, are idiots, they could learn a lot from women, and they'd better ask for help, immediately.

Now, many of you are likely to argue that there's no way to corroborate Dr. Ford's allegations of activities from a teen pool party 35 years ago and you'd like to argue how the circumstances of one man can't possibly be every other man's fault. My response to this would be that you are bringing a knife to a gunfight. Worse, if you're relying on facts to make your case about men's issues, confirmation bias will ensure that you're pointing the knife at your own argument.

Thirty-five years ago, Brett Kavanaugh, like Brock Turner, was a wealthy teenager, a boy of significant privilege, socialized among only other boys. This week, he was "credibly accused" of sexual assault by Fullerton, California Psychology Professor, Dr. Christine Ford and others, while he ran wild with a drunken rape gang.

Women who have been victims of sexual assault believe Professor Ford because the experiences she's describing are so very similar to their own. Unless you've experienced what Scott Adams has experienced, you can't really understand what that is like.

Tucker Carlson, Scott Adams, and greater than 0% of AVFM readers have a shared experience which we'll be exploring in great detail over several articles. If you're familiar with Scott Adams and you've read my previous articles, you're likely thinking this is going to be quite a trip.

If you're not already a fan of Scott Adams, I'd recommend that you subscribe to his podcast or buy his books. Particularly his books on persuasion, he is an expert in that field, and his work is historic, right on par with that of the groundbreaking persuasion researcher, Dr. Robert Cialdini.

We are experiencing a time of perceptual stress, and if human beings are going to survive, men are going to have to learn to take a joke, which means men would do well to learn how jokes work.

Fortunately for all of us, Scott Adams is quite an expert at jokes; he's written over 15 thousand of them.

Editors note: There is no physical evidence that Judge Kavanaugh was involved in sexual misconduct.

Authors note: This does not matter.

The envelopment of the free and open source community by SJWs continues

Robert Brockway · 30 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article will likely contain some software concepts not clear to some members of our community. While some effort has been made to explain these concepts there is a limit to what can be done within the confines of a single article. If any software concepts are unclear feel free to raise this in the comments. –Ed

This article discusses the recent Linux Code of Conduct controversy. I want everyone to know why this is important to all of us.

I'm an MRA, anti-feminist and actively fight against political correctness and identity politics. I've also been active in the FOSS (free and open source software) community and been using & administering Linux systems for 24 years. I have also held positions of responsibility within the FOSS community over the years.

It is important to clarify at this point what Linux is and is not. Linux is central to FOSS today. Linux refers specifically to a piece of software known as the kernel. The kernel is the core of any operating system and arguably the most important component. The kernel is essentially invisible to most people using a computer but it is a complex piece of software that users rely on to get even the simplest tasks done. The term Linux is sometimes used to refer to any operating system built on top of the kernel but in this article refers only to the kernel itself.

FOSS runs the world. That's the reality. Even Linux itself is largely dominant today. A variant of Linux powers Android phones (more on that later). Linux dominates the server market. A high proportion of routers (used to move data around on the Internet) use Linux. A high proportion of embedded devices run Linux too. Even Microsoft's Azure cloud solution is beginning to be dominated by Linux and this trend is continuing. The site top500.org is a list of the 500 most powerful computers on Earth. The first Linux system appeared on this list in 1998. As of 2017 all 500 of the most powerful systems on Earth are running Linux.

I have watched with concern as SJWs extend their reach into the FOSS community. Like many communities before it, SJWs demanded a seat at the table. Once they got it they started demanding special treatment for certain groups and to dictate the terms of the conversation.

In 2015 a prominent member of the FOSS community, Eric S Raymond, stated that he had information that some members of the women-in-tech group the Ada Initiative were attempting to trap prominent men in the FOSS community with false sexual assault allegations. It is also claimed that Linus Torvalds, the founder of the Linux project, is aware of these risks and is never alone at FOSS events. Interestingly the Ada Initiative was shutdown a few weeks before these allegations were made. Raymond went on to warn about the growing presence of SJWs in the FOSS world but was largely ignored.

The Linux project has recently adopted a new Code of Conduct (CoC) called the Contributor Covenant. Those behind the CoC, such as Coraline Ada Ehmke, specifically reject meritocracy as flawed. They admit that FOSS is a meritocracy today. They are by their own admission seeking the change the fundamental nature of FOSS. The new CoC also draws heavily on identity politics as can be seen in the first paragraph when it singles out groups based on physical characteristics for special consideration. The Contributor Covenant has apparently already been adopted by 40,000 FOSS projects.

In 2015 we also saw an example of how a CoC like this can be applied in practice. Elia Schito, a developer for the Opal FOSS project expressed an opinion that was considered to be transphobic by Ehmke. Ehmke then filed a bug report with the project insisting that Schito be removed from the project. With a CoC like the Contributor Covenant it is very likely that Schito would have been removed from the project.

This pattern will be familiar to readers of AVfM as we know that SJWs demand orthodoxy in all areas of life. They do not accept that people may express opinions that they do not agree with. People who do so must be punished.

Anyone who believes they are being marginalised in a FOSS project, or the project is not going in the direction they want is free to fork the project. People not familiar with FOSS may be unaccustomed to the idea of a fork but many projects have used this approach successfully to resolve technical and serious interpersonal problems in a FOSS project. A fork involves a complete copy of the source code being taken and copied to a new project with a new name and possibly new leadership and rules. There is no need for anyone to try to impose their own will on others in a FOSS project because any person is always free to fork a project and take it in a new direction. Android is a fork of Linux.

A suggestion has been made that developers who are ejected from the Linux project as a result of the CoC could revoke the licences to use their code within Linux. It is this that has been the focus of recent news coverage on the Linux CoC. When someone contributes code to Linux they (or their employer) retain copyright to the code. It was first proposed to me more than 20 years ago that FOSS code already submitted could have its licence revoked by the copyright holder, so this is not a new idea. It is, however, a distraction from the real issues.

The presence of SJWs within the FOSS world and their rejection of meritocracy still needs to be addressed as this is the real problem. Until they are stopped they will continue to try to dominate the FOSS community as they have so many others. For this reason, all FOSS projects should reject any CoC that draws from identity politics and is associated with a rejection of meritocracy.

Buoyed by the wide acceptance of the CoC we will see, in time, SJWs demand stronger and stronger measures to increase their control of FOSS projects. It is only a matter of time before they demand quotas within projects for certain identity groups. Because of the importance of FOSS in the modern world this is a danger to us all.

Cover image depicts Linus Torvalds done in a graffiti style. Presented at the "Abode of Chaos" museum of contemporary art, in France. Resized and cut for use on this site. Licenced under CC-BY-2.0

Trump to woman, “Sit down”

Mark Dent · 4 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I read a headline yesterday which said, “Trump tells woman to sit down”

Trump tells woman to sit down.

As always, the quote was taken out of context (not that one should be required) but the headline summed up the shocking new world we live in. Once such a headline would have drawn a response along the lines of “and?”

Now- the newspapers believe that those words say all that needs to be said. A man (and a white man too) told a woman to sit down.

Disgusting.

What a low life pig.

Scumbag.

Rape apologist.

Hater of females.

The Brett Kavanaugh debacle has not revealed anything we didn’t already know about the current status of men and women, but it has underlined in a very stark way, the frightening reality of the hatred of men we see in our most powerful institutions.

I am an Australian but I have followed the American political scene with a zeal only matched by my passion for the Collingwood Football Club. This new-found passion coincided with Trump announcing he would run for the presidency of the United States.

At first I found Trump amusing – but not in the CNN way where people laugh at him. From the beginning I found his self- awareness and comic timing hilarious. He is a funny man. I know AVFM has no time for politics but I cannot write this without treading on toes. I began to be drawn to this man for far deeper reasons. He didn’t back down when the rabid, feminist left attacked his every word. He spoke about women with a casual freedom which reminded me of days when anyone with a vagina was not considered to be an elevated, superior species, incapable of displaying any of the countless vices afflicting men.

He was rude to men and just as rude to women. Unlike many Republicans, he didn’t grovel or seek forgiveness from the people who despise and hate them. He stood by his words.

This was incredibly uplifting. He was the first man in the political world I had ever seen behave in this way. He made it clear then that he likes men and still does today.

His predecessor hated men. He grabbed any opportunity to denigrate, mock and dismiss them. He blatantly lied about the pay gap and he lied about sexual assault. He endeavored to widen the divide between the genders and feed the seemingly insatiable desire for victimhood so many women seem to crave with yet more fodder. He attacked fathers on a day set aside for families to express their love and appreciation for their dad. Many women lapped it up just as he knew they would. He threw men under the bus time and time again and no one – not one journalist with any clout called him out for this disgusting behavior.

During the press conference where Trump told the arrogant, rude, female journalist to sit down, he explained why he had sympathy for Judge Cavanaugh. In response to the female journalist’s question about his personal experience of being accused of sexual abuse, Trump spoke of the numerous occasions when the media quoted women’s unsubstantiated lies.

There were times when they literally made up quotes and attributed them to women who actually respect and admire Trump. When these women called out the lies there were never any retractions or apologies. Of course, these experiences made him sympathetic to Kavanaugh and reminded us all that some women lie for money and some for revenge and fame. He didn't hesitate to make this point and when the woman continued to aggressively question him (after his lengthy response) he told her to sit down, just as he has done to countless male journalists.

Trump's son spoke out about his fears for his own sons in this world where people who are accused of sexual assault are presumed guilty before a shred of evidence has been presented to corroborate the charge. He too was attacked for stating the bleeding obvious. Whoopi Goldberg screeched that only a man who thought his sons were likely to rape and abuse women would be concerned about them.

Goldberg entirely ignores the countless lessons history has taught us with regard to false accusations and the fact that the most exemplary men can be caught up in this hideous web and have their lives and sometimes their bodies torn apart on the basis of nothing but allegations, often proven to be false, but too often only after the damage has been done. How many black men were lynched because a white woman claimed he touched her or even looked at her with lust in his eyes?

There was a time when liberals would have viewed Atticus Finch as a hero and everything a young boy should aspire to be. If Atticus was not a revered fictional character but a real man of history, the left today would call him a victim blamer and a rape apologist.

Jeffrey Toobin is a regular on CNN. He is a lawyer. I watched in disbelief as this scumbag spoke with utter contempt about the notion that white men should be fearful of any injustice.

These words were in response to Don junior voicing his concern for his sons and the future they may have to face-a most reasonable and justifiable concern. But this creep reduced millions of individual white men to an amorphous tribe who are privileged and powerful. A group that never suffers hardship or injustice. A protected, pampered species.

As I sat there I offered up a prayer that this contemptible man would be confronted with false allegations from his own past and enjoy just a taste of the hell Brett Kavanaugh and many other men have endured. This is simply a wish for justice. This disgusting man made a mockery of the notion of innocent till proven guilty, and all that a person of his standing should hold sacred. He pretends that the whiteness of men's skin protects them from any possibility of suffering at the hands of a false accuser when he knows without a shadow of a doubt that many men-many of them white men, have suffered that hideous fate. I believe all of the Duke Lacrosse team with one exception were white. Did that protect them from the lynch mobs who demanded their incarceration and would literally have lynched them had they been given the opportunity to do so?

Did their whiteness protect them from the endless character assassinations in the media? Does the whiteness of a man's skin prevent the courts from ripping his flesh and blood from his life? Does the whiteness of a man's skin make the biting chill of a winter wind any less painful as he huddles under a newspaper in a cold, concrete back alley?

And then we come to the supporters of Kavanaugh. Most of them trot out the same groveling words.

"I have no doubt Ms. Ford has suffered some trauma in her past and she is as much a victim as Judge Kavanaugh."

Cowards. Sickening, spineless cowards. Hearing that woman's testimony and calling her credible is simply insane. Only a partisan hack could say it and really mean it. These men know Kavanaugh is the victim of a political smear campaign of the most vile and disgusting nature but they are still terrified of being seen to impugn a woman's word. So, they stumble and stammer and declare their belief in Kavanaugh while at the same time calling his accuser brave, credible and a victim. With friends like that who needs fucking enemies?

So we come back to Mr. Trump.

[image]

This week at a Mississippi campaign rally he questioned the veracity of Ford's claims and simply quoted her very own words to the large crowd. After doing so he was savaged by the media for "mocking a sexual abuse survivor." This confused me. If using the very words of a person's testimony is considered mockery, what does it say about that person's credibility?

Trump's empathy for men has led to concrete action.

Trump acted to change the disgraceful Obama administration's new approach to the way colleges and universities respond to allegations of sexual misconduct where it was decided that:

> a "preponderance of evidence" is enough to establish that misconduct occurred, a less rigorous evidentiary standard than the "beyond a reasonable doubt" that applies in most criminal cases.

This disgraceful change in the way in which an allegation of sexual assault was investigated led to the ruin of many young men's careers and reputations.

When Trump's changes were implemented Education Secretary Betsy DeVos said:

> "This interim guidance will help schools as they work to combat sexual misconduct and will treat all students fairly," said DeVos. "Schools must continue to confront these horrific crimes and behaviors head-on. There will be no more sweeping them under the rug. But the process also must be fair and impartial, giving everyone more confidence in its outcomes."

Trump Administration Rescinds Obama-Era Campus Sexual Assault Guidance

If this was all Trump's administration did for young men during his presidency, it is already more than almost any president who has served before him.

Trump goes where no other man in his position dares to go.

I was once a wide- eyed lefty many moons ago. I am not trying to sway anyone or win political plaudits. I am simply acknowledging the one man with a powerful, public platform who gives a shit about men.

I recently ordered a Tshirt with an image of Abraham Lincoln wearing a Trump cap. I am reasonably brave, but not stupid. I wear it under my jacket or hoodie because flaunting it openly could cause me to come to physical harm even Down Under. That's how far Trump derangement syndrome has spread its filthy tentacles. But knowing I have it under my hoodie gives me enormous satisfaction. It's my secret, FUCK YOU, to all of the rabid, violent, feminist, man- hating humans on the planet.

[image]

Besides all that, he makes me laugh.

Making the case for a dudeless Deliverence

Doug Mortimer · 4 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The current trend of remaking male ensemble movies (Ghostbusters, Ocean's Eleven) with female casts has attracted more attention than it warrants. Certainly, it could be leftist filmmakers making a symbolic gesture about the dispossession of men. On the other hand, it could just reflect a paucity of imagination. It doesn't really matter because the original films remain the gold standard.

Well, rather than deplore this trend, I'm going to flow with it. In fact, I'm going to make a recommendation. How about a female reboot of the 1972 classic, Deliverance?

Admittedly, Deliverance has all the trappings of an old-fashioned stag film…four attractive young women in the woods, they meet a mountain man, and nature takes its course. In fact, I wouldn't be at all surprised to find out that there is already some sort of Deliverance-derived porno movie out there. But my female Deliverance would be dead-on serious. In keeping with the original, it should involve a group of middle class suburban women – maybe one of those women-only Outward Bound excursions. But that doesn't mean it should not be an L.L. Bean fashion show with butch lesbian models.

Of all the movies I could have picked, why do I think Deliverance deserves this treatment? Well, if you're casting about for a film to embody the symbolic replacement of men, you could hardly do better. Need I point out that Deliverance is a white boys club? Not only that, but there's all those white water scenes! Perhaps some sort of non-toxic dye could be dumped into that lily-white river to diversity it.

Deliverance has been showing up on the repertory film circuit of late due to the death of Burt Reynolds. Of the four main actors in the film, Reynolds is the first to die, albeit 46 years after the film's release, so his death doesn't qualify as untimely. Only one of the other three actors is less than 80, and he (Jon Voight) will become an octogenarian before the year is out. So place your bets now on who will be the last man standing. At the time of filming, of course, all four men were in their prime.

In a female version, the casting would have to mirror the original. The actresses would also have to be in their prime, a long way from hitting the wall. Here are my suggestions; feel free to make your own.

Lewis, the macho man of the group, was played by Burt Reynolds. I nominate Gal Gadot for the remake. Sure, she has that Wonder Woman persona working for her, but she also has a background as a combat instructor in the Israeli Defense Forces. So she would probably be believable as a woman capable of taking care of herself in the wilderness.

Next we have Ed, the Jon Voight character, the everyman of the group. A relaxed, easygoing fellow, he is called upon to do things, physically and morally, that we could certainly describe as challenging. Most importantly, he gets a battlefield promotion to alpha male after Burt Reynolds is disabled. I think Emma Stone could take over for Ed (let's call her Edwina). She's on a roll and this role could only enhance her career.

Ronny Cox (making his film debut) was Drew, the idealist of the group. As soon as you see him with his guitar, you nod sagely and say to yourself, "Ah, a classic folkie." Just a matter of time before we have a campfire scene and he breaks out in a rousing rendition of "If I Had a Hammer." Ever the naïve idealist, he is the only one who wants to notify the authorities after the justifiable homicide incident. Signifcantly, he is the one member of the group who doesn't survive the ordeal. I envision Natalie Portman in this role. I don't know whether or not she plays the guitar, but if so, that would be a plus.

Bobby, the roly-poly guy in the Deliverance quartet, was played by Ned Beatty, also making his film debut. He was eminently believable as a flabby New South Babbbitt who should have stayed home with his barbecue grill. For his female counterpart, how about Rebel Wilson? Granted, she might sink the canoe, but I think she's a good fit.

Now that I've done my casting, I realize that I've made the mistake of creating a white girls club. That's adhering a little too closely to the original, and clearly not acceptable in 2018. What to do? OK, let's consider subbing Leslie Jones for Rebel Wilson. OK, everybody happy? Moving right along…

Yes, a distaff Deliverance would certainly be a project to reckon with. Women in the wilderness! Women doing manly things! Girls gone wild…but with no nudity. Keep those life vests on, ladies.

An interesting sidebar to the original film was that the actors performed all the physically demanding scenes themselves – without insurance policies! Needless to say, there was no CGI back in 1972. Of course, the four actresses in the remake would have to match the men for derring-do. No stunt women or CGI allowed. Four women plus a film crew – that's it! Well, OK, maybe a Medevac helicopter on call.

As is the case with any memorable movie, some scenes are particularly vivid. Deliverance is no exception. One scene stands out above all others. You know the one I mean:

This little piggy went to market. Wee wee wee!

Ah, yes, the notorious anal rape scene when Bobby meets the backwoods backdoor man. Mercifully for all concerned, it was filmed in one take.

In an all-female remake, it would be a female (Rebel Wilson or Leslie Jones) getting anally raped. Of course, the scene has very different overtones depending on whether it's a white or black woman on the receiving end of a peckerwood's pecker. The chattering classes would have a field day with this scene.

Of course, if you want a film that's gynocentric across the board, the rapist could also be female, albeit with a dildo or other object. However there won't be any female rapist, as GLAAD (Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation) would raise holy hell about a female rapist. You can take this edginess thing only so far. So let's stick with a male rapist.

The original rapist was played by Bill McKinney, a character actor who played an assortment of nasty roles in the 1970s. His famous "Squeal like a pig" line was not in James Dickey's novel or the original screenplay. It was made up on location.

Since then that line has inspired countless giggles. Hell, even I made light of it a few paragraphs ago ("This little piggy…"). In fact when Bill McKinney was alive (he died in 2011), his web site was squeallikeapig.com. The line has had a surprisingly enduring presence in pop culture. I can't think of anything close to it in the anal rape category. Admittedly, that subject doesn't come up often.

Having just one line endure for almost half a century would be enough for most movies, but Deliverance actually has two. After the infamous anal rape scene, the rapist's toothless companion turns to Jon Voight, who is tied to a tree, and says, "He's got a real purty [pretty] mouth, ain't he?…You're gonna do some prayin' for me, boy. And you better pray good." A recitation of this line, or some variation thereof, frequently meets with snickers, and I'm not talking about the candy bar.

So there we have it. Two famous quotes, one pertaining to anal rape, the other to oral rape. We have to keep that dialogue in mind when we rewrite the script for a female cast. Today a recitation of these quotes is usually accompanied by giggles if not guffaws. In fact, when I saw the film recently, there were people reciting these lines on the way out of the theater. Predictably, they were grinning, chuckling, sniggering, smriking. Do you think any of these guys exiting the theater would be laughing if they had witnessed a scene involving anal rape and/or oral rape involving a female victim? Of course not. They would be verbally shamed by everyone around them and maybe even assaulted.

Of course, a drooling white man ordering a woman, white or black, to squeal like Miss Piggy while anally raping her is hardly refutation of toxic masculinity, white privilege, oppressive patriarchy, etc. But there's more at stake than that.

The man as rape victim is the stuff of comedy. If he is raped by a female, the response is always something like "lucky stiff." Har har, nudge nudge, wink, wink.

As for men raping men…well, boys will be boys. It's all too common in prison. Always has been. In fact, when a man is convicted of a particularly barbarous crime, many people like the idea of his being sent to a "pound 'em in the ass" prison. Rough justice, you know. Just what he deserves. It's not written into the penal code, but it is certainly part and parcel of the "rehabilitation" process as administered by the Department of Corrections.

Now when a boy is raped by a man, the outrage is palpable. Clearly, a child is off limits, and even the prison inmates share that belief. A man convicted of child rape will find it tough going if he has to do a stint in the joint. The slang phrase "short eyes," which originated in the prison population, refers to a pedophile. Getting sent up the river for pedophilia will not gain you any street cred in the pen. It might get you killed.

But abuse of a grown man excites no such outrage. In the public, it ranges from apathy to humor. Chalk it up to male disposability. I have no better explanation.

All that goes out the window if Deliverance is remade with four female protagonists. Then we're into damsels-in-distress mode, and that's as old as the movies themselves (The Perils of Pauline was filmed more than 100 years ago). Even today the young female in danger is still the best vehicle for audience empathy. In today's more bloodthirsty cinema, she is more likely to be victimized than merely threatened, but that only enhances the despicability of the villain.

So there are a number of intriguing possibilities in an all-female Deliverance. You want talking points? You got 'em. Publicity is guaranteed.

How could a studio fail to greenlight this project? I think the world is waiting to see a tale of four valiant women escaping from…hey, come to think of it, how about an all-female version of The Great Escape? Wow! Imagine a whole prison camp of brave, resourceful women escaping from real Nazis?

Scott Adams, Tucker Carlson, and the automatic out-group derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 5 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Scott Adams and Tucker Carlson have something in common. They've both been accused of doing terrible things by very convincing people. It is also worth noting these convincing people were also credible, even though neither of these men had even met their accuser.

If you've never experienced what they've experienced, you couldn't understand how that feels. In part because men are fundamentally flawed.

In my last series, I said some pretty terrible things about the male stereotype. ie, "Men are all the same, all of you have bad intentions, and you deserve everything you get, as you are the architects of your own misfortune" etc.

Even after saying all of those terrible things about your group, I'm pretty sure I can still persuade you that it's the fault of men, as a group.

Why am I so convinced I can persuade men, that it's all men's fault?

Men do not have the mechanism for automatic in-group bias.

As an automatic out-group, men are representative of the male stereotype. By definition, they are the architects of their own misfortune, and they have bad intentions. They deserve harsher punishments and greater burdens, and any man who complains or protests this reality is weak, evil, or criminally ignorant. They are the bad guys from across the river; the automatic out-group.

I'd like to persuade you to that men, as a group, are idiots, who could learn some things from women, and we'd all be better off for it. I understand from my last article that some of you think, "Not All Men Are Like That."

Let's take a test.

If you are a man and believe you are somehow capable of exhibiting automatic in-group bias, take a look at a couple of videos. I'm going to ask you to look at them a couple of different ways.

What do you see when you watch this slow speed chase?

a) A man, pushed over the edge, whose cocaine addicted wife and the CA Family Courts endangered the lives of his children despite multiple attempts to get custody.
b) A man whose first degree murder trial was a clumsy farce, to everyone, who actually watched it beginning to end.
c) The black guy who got away with murder.
d) All of the above.

Now, watch it again.

What I did there was get you to see what Scott Adams refers to as "seeing a different movie." When you watch this movie through a different lens, you may feel a different way about it.

What do see when you watch this movie?

Because men are an automatic out-group, other men will not make logical or ethical leaps to protect them unless there's some additional tribal affiliation. As a result, when men are accused, facts are not persuasive. Fortunately, or unfortunately, facts do not affect how humans make decisions, especially when they're under stress. We may be heading into a massive, persistent, international moral panic unless we can pierce the veil of out-group derogation with narrative and emotion.

Take for instance this Clarence Thomas video. I believe this video would be more far more persuasive to women than someone saying, "Anita Hill lied." If you agree, please say why in the comments. As always, I try to respond to every comment.

Tucker Carlson and Scott Adams have both highlighted the plight of men and are persuasive for different reasons.

Tucker Carlson is both smart and funny. Scott Adams is an expert on persuasion. I recommend his books on the topic, as he is a leading expert. I also suggest you subscribe to his podcast. He may hold the secret which will help us avoid a seemingly slow-motion, gynocentric disaster.

Feminism, Gynocentrism and the Future Matriarchal Gynocracy: The Different Types of Societies and the Feminist Zero Sum Game (Part two)

Yoav Levin · 8 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is part two of a two-part article by Yoav Levin. Those who haven't done so already should start with part one.

The Redistribution of Financial Resources: It's All About Women – Economic Gynocentrism and how it Works to Exploit Men

Additionally, according to studies conducted in the US, as early as in 1931 the number of female millionaires was identical to the number of male millionaires. This was the case even though the rate of participation of women in the labor force was then under 40 percent. During the said period, women also constituted the majority of the shareholders of the large corporations and in addition, they constituted between 35 and 40 percent of the customers of the investment bonds. Moreover, as early as 1951, women controlled 70% of national wealth, although they still constituted less than 50% of the labor force.

Accordingly, women also constitute the majority of purchasing power. This is the period of time that the feminist liars of gender studies have declared greedy and egotistical men to be the exploiters of women only concerned with taking all of their money for themselves and oppressing them. Ask yourself the following question? What group or another oppressed class in history has worked fewer hours than the oppressive class yet dominated most of the national wealth, 70 percent of the big corporations, held between 35 to 40 percent of the investment bonds and constituted the majority of the purchasing power in the economy?

As a result, we can conclude, among other things, that women could have actually not only in theory run the entire domestic sphere of affairs in the decision-making centers of the formal power, but they actually do so even without the need to be present there, based on their combined economic strength, while they also control all the informal power positions and while the percentage of men in the formal positions of power is only a small and insignificant fraction of all men. In such cultural and societal conditions men at the centers of decision-making and formal power have no choice but to surrender and submit to the dictates of women's organizations and feminist lobbies.

We are talking about puppets in a theater that are guided by these lobbies and organizations. That's the reason why we are witnessing a dynamic where it does not matter what the political worldview of those men at the position of power is because they will always surrender to these dictates. In order to do the dirty work, there is no need for women to be in key positions, but it is enough that men who lack a backbone will submit to the dictates of feminists. In this way women's organization and feminist lobbies achieve three main objectives:

A) Their policy is implemented;

B) They do not have to do the dirty work and therefore publicly they always appear clean and good;

C) They can continue to incite against men;

Thus it is another classical feature of matrifocal gynocentrism: the formal power is left to men, yet without the informal power which is in the hand of women it's worth nothing. Thus male power as already acknowledged by Warren Farell and Carol Rogers is nothing but a myth and delusion. It's also a taboo and one upon which all of the matrifocal gynocentric construct is built and rests.

The main thing here is that according to the narrative of the fake news media, the ignorance of our pseudo academy promotes nothing but stupidity and dismal science alongside the false historical feminist narrative. This is the garbage we learn in school, universities and media, namely that women are buried in poverty by greedy men and that all men are pigs, rapists and patriarchal abusers. Moreover, through the laws of inheritance and divorce, it is apparent that this claim is nothing more than a fraud and an illusion. In fact, the divorce and inheritance law makes sure that the men serve as tools for transferring resources from men to women with the aim at enriching them even if the woman does not work even one single day.

This is the basic dynamic that is identical everywhere in the world. Think (hypothetically) about a woman who does not work a single day in her life. She is married to a man. This woman profits from divorce in at least three principal channels: real estate (apartment or house), social benefits, property, child support, alimony and many more. Moreover, on the day she divorces her husband, she would receive half of the house, half of his pension, half the provident funds, half executive insurance, and half the business (if there is any). The husband will receive little if it is the woman that holds them.

The meaning of this is not only that the definition of what the husband earns in a marriage is not his own but half of it is also hers but actually the husband owns less than half the ownership of his assets and resources already from the "get go" while the woman is in a possession of at least seventy to eighty percent of family assets and resources from the same starting point. This is the shortest explanation of the gynocentric inheritance and divorce laws. They may alternate between different countries but the basic dynamic is identical.

Moreover, it is important to understand that the law is written in a way that on its surface reflects equality, but is, in reality, a gigantic fraud. What is important is the interpretation, not the written law itself. In practical terms, even though the law is written on an equal footing, the deception is carried out by the fact that while the formal power is changing in favor of women there is no change in the informal power to balance it in favor of men. Yet, inheritance and divorce laws are all based on the informal power and not vice versa. Therefore, even if a woman for example earns more still in general calculation the man has to pay and to transfer all of his resources to the woman. Therefore, in practical terms, women pursuing careers and working outside the home do not ostensibly serve equally in the sense of reducing the burden put on men to provide for the family, but on the contrary it weighs on it, as he will continue to serve as a tool for transferring money, assets and resources and for the economic exploitation of men.

In a matrifocal and gynocentric society, women pursuing careers and working outside the home are therefore not really working towards equality but rather for greater economic exploitation of men. The feminist fables and tales about patriarchy, the exploitation of women and so forth are nothing but false – both historically and in factual reality of modern day to day life. The real situation is exactly the opposite! Feminists claim that feminism is good for all, that traditional gender roles are bad for men, that they hurt them, that this everything is toxic masculinity; that women going to work will help to reduce the burden of men providing for the family. In fact, just as in everything else feminism claims and feminists say this is nothing more than fraud and lies.

Feminism is not really about changing the traditional gender roles, but rather exploiting them even more. In the favor of women, of course! Not only will the man according to feminist gender roles continue to serve as breadwinner but now the burden of providing will only increase until he becomes a slave and even worse a mere subservient and subordinated tool to his wife. Feminists are also not interested in changing the gender roles of the man as a knight who protects women. Today, they limit that role and ask the men by "affirmative action". Which, as we have seen, is not intended to correct anything but to radicalize the situation, to give up all the positions of formal power so that women can control men even more through the long dreamed of matriarchy. And there is the man's role as a sperm donor. And that's why, exactly for this purpose, all the dynamics and laws described above were put in place.

The bottom line, in such a matrifocal Gynocentric society, is that men are exploited merely as cash machines. The economic reality for men means that and even with joint-spending on fathers and children, women still spend more money on themselves than the shared father-offspring spending. This can even be observed in the floor space allocated to women's products in malls and shopping centers actually designed for men.

Men also earn 25% the income of a woman due to her working shorter hours, less difficult and dangerous jobs but her spending 90% more money than she makes. Women earn around 38.5% of the household's income but spend 75% of its domestic spending. Men earn around 61.5% of all income but only account for 25% of spending. Men only spend 40% of what they earn after tax. In case of divorce women got more than 70% of all resources while fathers less than 30%. This is real exploitation; and this is real sexism. This characteristic which puts the female needs and desires about everyone else's including the children is the basic property and dynamic of a Gynocentric matrifocal society where men and children are mere tools and designed to serve women. Gynocentric society is therefore the embodiment of female supremacy aiming at exploiting not only men but children too.

To create such an extremely female-focused environment, this kind of matrifocal Gynocentric society exploits and takes advantage of the basic evolutionary condition that every human being – man, woman and children – have been raised and instilled with a woman's point of view from birth. This is called Gynocentrism 0:1 and it is an evolutionary feature also existing in all primates. However, taking advantage of that condition, in the matrifocal society the Gynocentric ideology conditions men through social engineering to give women special treatment from birth and women are taught to expect privileged treatment from men. The matrifocal gynocentrism as a social construct is by definition a supremacist ideology. However, it has become the default social model for most of the societies on the planet. Men are trained to suppress emotions and always be considerate of a woman's feelings, men are trained to sacrifice, work and die to provide for women's happiness. They are trained to be socially subordinated slaves to their wives and other women in their life.

Furthermore, men and women are also trained to always take the woman's side over a man no matter how wrong she is and the man is right. Additionally, women are taught to support each other and view men's pain and suffering as less important. Men are indoctrinated in doing the opposite while dismissing, ignoring and suppressing their own pain and suffering. Men are taught that fighting, dying and sacrificing themselves is noble but women experiencing, that any emotional distress is terrible and that their pain and suffering is invalid! This sexist attitude and female brainwashing has seen men literally dying to protect women who quite often take the sacrifices men make completely for granted. This is again real sexism and it is taught at a very early age and reinforced in our society through media, academia (pseudo-science) education and legal system.

This is the reason that all of the ancient Gynocentric cultures prior to societies having gynocentrim 0:2 as a social construct and ideology were a combination and a mixture of matrilineal, matrilocal, matrifocal as well as patrilineal and patrilocal elements within the Gynocentric societies. Even gynocentrism 0:2 still exhibited such kind of alternating combinations and variations. Feminism, namely gynocentrim 0:3, which is a derivative of Gynocentric ideology and society aims at creating a matriarchal society by destroying the traditional balance and harmony between men and women in the context of older Gynocentric cultures. It should be achieved by shifting all of the formal power from men to women while keeping the informal power in the hands of women too. This is the feminist end goal and the zero-sum game.

Further Reading

Women control two thirds of the world's and family's wealth

Saudi women control 70% of customer banking deposits

Never Underestimate the Power of a Woman

Trending: Women Fuel Outdoor Industry

FACTS & STATS – Tracking Issues in Women's Leadership

Women and Finance

Statistics of the purchasing power of women

Female millionaires

Millionaires 1931

Table showing that the labor force participation rate for women

Table

Women owning just as much stock as men

Stock ownership 1931

In 1950 Women Controlled 70% of the Nation's Wealth despite having a labor force participation rate of less than 50%.

In 1950 Women Controlled 70% of the Nation's Wealth

Women in Colonial America owning Businesses

No Misandry blog

Federal Reserve Bank of St Louis

Additional Sources for cross checking the data were:

1. Muhtar Kent, Chairman of the Board and CEO, The Coca-Cola Company
2. Nielsen Consumer
3. Federal Reserve, MassMutual Financial Group, BusinessWeek, Gallup)
4. U.S Bureau of Labor Statistics
5. Integer Group and M/A/R/C Research
6. Consumer Electronics Association
7. Food and Drug Administration
8. Natural Marketing Institute
9. Pew Research Center
10. Business Week
11. New York Times
12. Harvard Business Review, Boston Consulting Group Survey
13. Forbes
14. U.S. Census Bureau

Help Us Keep AVFM Online (GoFundMe)

Paul Elam · 10 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A Voice for Men has been online for 10 years, relentless in its mission to change the cultural narrative regarding men and boys, challenging the hateful ideology of feminism and offering men an alternative to the sick dictates of gynocentrism.

Recently, the cost of doing this, even the fundamental cost of keeping the site online has gone up. At this point the web hosting/managed server fees alone are $290.00 US per month. That is the basic price for keeping the site online. That is before we purchase images or do anything else to bring you content on a regular basis.

We have regular subscribers who help defray these costs but the recent price hikes in web hosting puts us in a pinch. We need to call on regular readers for the solution.

Henceforth, we will be doing a GoFundMe every four months in an effort to meet the basic cost of staying online. The goal of this fundraiser is $1,275.00, which, after GoFundMe fees, will cover AVFM's web hosting/managed servers through the end of January, 2019.

It's a small price to pay to keep AVFM and An Ear for Men online. Your donation to this cause, in any amount, is greatly appreciated. You enable us with the basics and we'll take it from there.

You can donate though the GoFundMe here.

[image]

So What If Kavanaugh Was At The Party

Janice Fiamengo · 10 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Lock up your sons

Jonathan David Farley, D. Phil. · 11 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

"Look at thus [sic] chorus of entitled white men justifying a serial rapist's arrogated entitlement," wrote Georgetown University professor Christine Fair, referring to Senate Republicans and the guilty-until-proven innocent Supreme Court nominee (now Justice) Brett Kavanaugh. "All of them deserve miserable deaths while feminists laugh as they take their last gasps. Bonus: we castrate their corpses and feed them to swine? Yes."

"It is hard to read an article like this and avoid the conclusion that we live in a culture that hates women, just hates us," spat Chloe Angyal on MSNBC, referring to the University of Virginia "rape" case. A woman Rolling Stone called "Jackie" had claimed that several members of a fraternity took turns raping her at a party. The magazine ended up paying $1.65 million to the fraternity because "Jackie" lied. But the fact that it was so easy for so many to believe the outrageous lie shows, in truth, that we live in a culture that hates men.

"But really, guess who's perpetuating all of these kinds of actions? It's the men in this country," Senator Mazie Hirono(D-Hawaii) said recently. She was referring, of course, to the assault allegation against Kavanaugh. "And I just want to say to the men in this country: Just shut up and step up. Do the right thing, for a change."

Never mind that in March a 36-year-old woman in Hirono's home state was indicted for sexually assaulting a 16-year-old boy. Never mind that 88 percent of police—the people who protect women from assaults—are men (i.e., only 12 percent of those who've "stepped up" are women). Never mind that 96 percent of firemen are men. Never mind that 85 percent of our military personnel are men, and 100 percent of the people with Selective Service numbers (for military draft eligibility) are men.

Men doing the "right thing," using their natural aggression to protect others, is the norm. If Hirono had made her comment about a racial group ("It's the blacks in this country"), she would be forced to resign. If a male politician had told the women of America to "Just shut up," an army of purple- and red-haired Amazons would be outside his office with pitchforks.

Shifting Narratives

Our society in fact adulates women. More than 80 percent of the men on The Titanic died, while 75 percent of the women lived; yet clearly men, being stronger, could probably have taken all of the lifeboats if what Chloe Angyal claimed were true. A Baltimore woman was able to get a mob to murder a man just by falsely claiming that the man had raped her. Though disputed, some say that in Muslim jurisprudence, the word of a woman is sometimes worth half that of a man, and, we in the West look down our noses at that. Yet it is undisputedly the case in our society that the word of a woman is worth more than that of two men.

Kavanaugh's accuser, Christine Blasey Ford, named four people at the alleged party where Kavanaugh allegedly attacked her. Kavanaugh categorically denied this. A second man said he had no memory of such a party or incident. A third man said he had no knowledge of such a party. None of that mattered. The fourth purported witness, a woman, said she has been a lifelong friend of Blasey, but could not recall ever being at a party with Kavanaugh.

That was when the media conveniently started discussing a second accuser.

Deborah Ramirez says she was drunk and cannot clearly remember a college party where Kavanaugh allegedly showed her, in the presence of several people, something of his she did not wish to see. Indeed, it was only "[a]fter six days of carefully assessing her memories and consulting with her attorney" that she could remember. Even though "The New Yorker [had] not confirmed with other eyewitnesses that Kavanaugh was present at the party"—indeed, "two of those male classmates who Ramirez alleged were involved in the incident, the wife of a third male student she said was involved, and one other classmate, Dan Murphy, disputed Ramirez's account of events"—The New Yorker published the story anyway. The word of one drunk girl is worth more than that of three men.

Ramirez claimed that she was scarred by the experience because she only ever wanted to see a naked man after she was married. And yet she later attended Kavanaugh's wedding, posing with him, smiling, for pictures.

Protect Men From False Claims

This gives us the solution. Today, there are "rape shield" policies that allow women, like Jackie, to make anonymous accusations with impunity. Courts are forbidden to discuss the history of accusers, even when it is relevant, as in Ramirez's case (she says Kavanaugh exposed himself to her, and this was bad because she only ever wanted to see such a sight after she got married. We're discussing when he lost his virginity; so, did she wait until she got married? If not, this suggests that she's not truthful. Knowing if she was a virgin bride, as she implies she wanted to be, enables us to assess her credibility) or in Bill Cosby's case (one of his accusers pled guilty to prostitution; prostitutes literally will lie with men for money, no drugs needed).

If it is relevant what a friend of Kavanaugh's may have once told an ex-girlfriend about a party not involving Kavanaugh (!), why can't we discuss Blasey's high-school yearbook—we're discussing his—or the rumor that Blasey boasted of having been with 54 men in high school? Someone like that may have tussled with more than one male and gotten her parties confused. In an era of slutwalks, when women can legally go topless, laws protecting the "honor" of women are anachronistic.

Laws protecting men are needed. Women are the perpetrators in 70 percent of cases of one-sided domestic violence.

A few years ago, a woman threatened my life, touting her connection to the mafia (a credible claim) and saying that I might wind up "in the news." I reported this thinly veiled threat to police. After I filed charges, I got an appointment with two women working for the office of the state's attorney. One of those women literally laughed in my face, saying it's good to be "in the news."

Our society is dripping with the hatred of women—for men.

Today's "Josef K" is Kavanaugh. Tomorrow it's your son.

♦

This article first appeared at American Greatness and is republished here with permission from the author.

Believe Women

Mark Dent · 11 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Only one of the statements below is considered intellectually sound and morally acceptable. Let's see if you are in tune with what's hot and what's not in the year 2018.

[image]Believe redheads

Believe bald men

Believe Italians

Believe amputees

Believe teenagers

Believe gymnasts

Believe dentists

Believe white people

Believe lawyers

Believe women

If you chose believe women give yourself a pat on the back.

You will be embraced by countless angry, mentally deranged, illogical, hate fueled hypocrites. Sadly, it seems there are millions of them.

It's time to believe all women parody
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-FZ7Zq6q1TY

Can you begin to comprehend the warped mind of any moron who chooses to wear the Tshirt telling us to "Believe Women?" It's even more incomprehensible when you see male Hollywood celebrities promoting the slogan with solemn self-righteousness. One can only imagine that must they think they are protecting themselves by leaping into the arms of the very beast which will most likely devour them.

I believe it was Winston Churchill who once said of these weak, sickly creatures:

'An appeaser is one who feeds a crocodile, hoping it will eat him last.'.

I am truly trying to crawl into the skin of one of the many women or men who proudly walk the streets wearing the shirts. What in the name of God are they thinking? The primary school children I teach would be embarrassed if asked to walk about wearing such a ridiculous, patently absurd pair of words on their chests.

Just imagine how many of these shirt wearing women have been friends with or enemies of other girls in high school or college and have bitched to their latest besties about the lies and backstabbing behavior of a former friend? I would suggest every woman who walks the earth has experienced the deceitful and manipulative ways of another woman. That these women can promote, chant and celebrate such shockingly ridiculous words is frightening- truly frightening.

Every one of the people who choose to wear a believe women shirt or simply joins in with the mindless chant is a despicable liar and hypocrite because none of them believe all women. Not one.

When you remind such fanatics of Bill Clinton's past and his treatment of women you expose the ugly underbelly of these hate filled liars. They have no shame. To see Hillary ranting on her latest tour makes a person pause and seriously consider her mental health. The wife of a serial groper and alleged rapist lecturing us on the importance of believing accusers-the very same people she eviscerated in defense of her Bill.

But, it was a different time.

Okay, then may we ask about Keith Ellison- the second most powerful person in the DNC whose former girlfriend says he beat her on a number of occasions and was abusive throughout their relationship.

She even had photos of her injuries.

The Democratic party has given him the all clear after their own investigation into the allegations. They said Ellison denies any such behavior took place and that is good enough for them! Let's move on. Of course, the media coverage of this allegation was minimal on most of the mainstream outlets and the outcome didn't seem to be regarded as being of any consequence.

A lawyer investigating a woman's claim that she was physically abused by Minnesota Rep. Keith Ellison has concluded the allegation is unsubstantiated.

That lawyer was an attorney hired by Minnesota's Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party to investigate the allegation against Ellison.

https://slate.com/news-and-politics/2018/08/keith-ellison-abuse-allegations-democratic-lawmaker-vehemently-denies-any-wrongdoing.html

This comment from a journalist in Washington:

The Washington Post's Dave Weigel pointed out on Twitter that the story (Ellison's alleged abuse) had been circulating for a while in Minnesota but there were no stories about it because the allegations didn't hold up "under media scrutiny."

They have no shame.

Apparently Blasey-Fords allegations did seem credible as did Julie Swetnick's allegation of gang rape and Deborah Ramirez's claim of indecent exposure even though none could be in any way corroborated and had no witnesses. Suddenly journalistic integrity and credibility is unimportant.

And that's that!

But fuck the dirty politics of what was once a relatively respected party.

They don't believe all women-just the ones whose claims will hurt their political enemies.

Why has no-one simply raised the rather inconvenient issue of false rape and sexual abuse allegations which have destroyed the lives of countless men during the past 200 years? I have compiled a frightening number of links to individual cases. There were pages of them so I will post a few down below and you can do your own research.

Believe women?

Which ones?

The crack addicts who would sell their baby for another brief high? The alcoholics who lie and deceive their closest loved ones as they attempt to convince the world they are on the wagon? The many wives who, with the coldest, most vicious deliberation tell the world that the man to whom they once proclaimed their eternal love has been raping or sexually assaulting his very own children for years-simply to destroy his reputation and make sure he loses contact with them?

Perhaps we should trust the word of the women who haunt the casinos, poker machine venues or local pubs to feed their insatiable desire to have another bet? What about the women who openly joke about spending hubby's hard-earned money on shopping sprees he doesn't need to know about? What about the women sleeping with other men behind their husband's or boyfriend's back?

Of course, we could also mention the many women who have become pregnant to a lover and deliberately led another man to believe he is the father, so they can suck him dry financially for twenty-one years.

All of these women exist. They are not a theory or even just likely to exist. There are thousands of such women in every city on our planet and not even the most rabid left-wing ideologue could deny it without looking even more insane than they already do.

Should we believe a female politician who is so dishonest that even when there is visual evidence to contradict her claims of being under gunfire when she arrived at an airport in Bosnia she stuck to her story and then continued to thrive in politics.

What about the women who openly support the idea of tricking their husband into inseminating them so they can have another baby?

Of course, just as many men fit these categories but no-one would ever be stupid enough to suggest all men should be believed because they are men.

Yet-believe women

I watched a clip from CNN (I held my nose and gritted my teeth) and saw yet another example of the thinking which has brought us to this Believe (all) Women culture.

A conservative guest was questioning the validity of Blasey-Ford's testimony. The host and other panelist were outraged. The host asked the conservative what he believed was a 'gotcha" question.

"Would you believe your own daughter if she came to you and said she had been raped?"

The conservative guest responded by saying he would listen to her story but if her four friends she cited as witnesses denied her story or failed to corroborate and she couldn't recall countless important details like where and when it happened he would doubt her.

It seemed perfectly reasonable and responsible to me.

The horror on the faces of the other panelists was a sight to behold. It was genuine dismay followed by condemnation and disgust. How dare he suggest he would not automatically believe his own daughter-his very flesh and blood! Heads shook in bewilderment and the host said for the sake of the conservative's daughter they would move the discussion along.

I wanted to throttle that host. He set up a theoretical situation concerning the guest's daughter and that guest gave him a response based on a theoretical situation and then the host tries to pretend this man has just announced that he doesn't trust his own daughter! They are snakes and utterly beneath contempt.

Watch from around 3:55

These were two mature, highly educated, articulate people and neither one of them saw the perfect reasonableness of the man's comment. All they heard was human with vagina disbelieved by her own father!

Have these two ignorant or perhaps deceitful people never heard of a false allegation being perpetrated by a woman against a man? Are not all these false accusers the daughters of a mother and father? So clearly, we have precedent that tells us with great clarity why we should never just accept the word of a woman, even when she is your own daughter.

If you wonder why women continue to falsely accuse men, often for the most trivial reasons, here are some common ones-fare evasion, not being able to smoke in a taxi, anger over a parking ticket or embarrassment at being caught watching porn, all of your questions will be answered simply by watching this one clip.

Breathtaking isn't it? The false accuser's lawyer argued for a lenient sentence (2.25) for his client so other false accusers wouldn't be too scared to come forward and confess to their crime. Fuck the fact that a man's life and reputation has been destroyed! We must think of other false accusers!

The primary concern of almost all of the judiciary is how these false accusers are making things more difficult for other women who are true victims of rape. Time and again this is the rationale given by presiding judges as they prepare to sentence the woman who lied. No-one seems to have any concern for the innocent men whose lives have been destroyed. But isn't that always the way?

There are very rarely any severe consequences for women even when they have been caught lying. It doesn't seem to matter whether the innocent man has rotted in prison, had his reputation torn to shreds, had his family turn their backs on him or even lost his life.

Imagine a judge berating a man in court who has been charged with bashing his girlfriend to the point where she was hospitalized.

"Young man, the greatest tragedy that arises from your actions is the damage it does to the reputation of all men, especially those who don't bash their girlfriends!"

How is the above statement any less outrageous than the one so commonly uttered by sick, twisted gender bigots in our court system when a female's lies have destroyed a man's life?

Can you imagine how you would feel sitting in a court, only a few seats away from the woman who ripped your son from your life only to hear the judge talk about how this makes it harder for real (female) victims of rape to be believed? The consequences for coldly, calculatingly destroying a young man's life? Weekends in prison for two months?

I think I might explode right there in the courtroom. This is just one case but the same thing happens repeatedly when these witches get found out or choose to confess.

I would have thought a just and severe punishment would cause potential false accusers to understand that the stakes are high and they will pay a price if caught out in their lie.

But no, women know they can turn on the tears, play victim even as they confess to their lie and the court will usually wrap them up in its loving arms and give comfort and succor to these evil creatures. Just try to imagine what kind of human being could let a boyfriend rot for nearly five years for a crime she knows he never committed? A boy you once proclaimed your love for. Imagine placing your head on your pillow each night and actually sleeping! That is as evil and frightening an act as rape. Unquestionably.

Why are the accusers also allowed to remain anonymous? Think of the outrage when Blasey-Ford's name was leaked to the media. Why wasn't this poor female allowed to destroy a man while she remained in safe, snug obscurity? This makes the temptation to destroy someone's life even more appealing for it can be done while the accuser hides behind a delicious cloak of anonymity-watching their vicitm's life dissolve before their eyes all in the full glare of the public eye.

But back to the notion of believing women. These women all loudly proclaimed (on very public platforms) that they would leave the United States of America if Trump became the president: Lena Dunham, Chelsea Handler, Miley Cyrus, Amy Schumer, Barbara Streisand and Cher.

All of them are still residing in America.

Believe women.

There were literally pages of links listing false allegations by women. I've made a random selection for you to check out

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TNTc5xpiiv8

Statistics cited by feminists on the very low incidence of fake accusations of rape are a lie. Watch this excellent clip which exposes yet another feminist myth www.fighting4fair.com/uncategorized/on-the-issue-of-false-rape-allegations/

This link contains literally hundreds of links to actual false rape/abuse cases

'Ten reasons why false rape accusation are common' by Jonathan Taylor (1 August 2014)

https://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/13-women-who-lied-about-being-raped-and-why-they-did-it/

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=lW2pXu97Yvo

Bill Burr-women are overrated

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_tFu8f6L7y8

Believe women

Emmett Till: Woman who triggered 1955 murder of African American boy admits lying about harassment human-stupidity.com/stupid-dogma/mens-rights-feminism/rapists-proven-innocent-are-majority-57-of-prisoners-released-by-innocence-project

(29 January 2017)

https://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-5829315/Teenager-18-said-ex-boyfriend-drugged-raped-admits-wasting-police-time.html

www.abc.net.au/news/2017-11-27/woman-fined-after-falsely-accusing-taxi-driver-of-sexual-assault/9197732

Dr. Martin Koyle, “Known Genital Mutilator” of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric “treatment”

Gary Costanza · 14 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Martin Koyle has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org.

He ‘works’ at the Newborn Circumcision Clinic at SickKids of Toronto, Ontario. He either performs or supervises infant genital mutilations, also known as circumcisions, on healthy (not SickKids) newborn baby boys, and alas, for no medical reason.

He knows this amputation of healthy tissue is unnecessary, unethical, and risky, yet he continues to perform it and/or force others to perform it, under threat of termination.

Here’s his bio from the website:

“Martin Koyle, FAAP, FACS, FRCS (Eng.), FRCSC
Head of the Division of Urology, The Hospital for Sick Children
Women’s Auxiliary Chair in Urology & Regenerative Medicine
Professor, Department of Surgery, University of Toronto

Dr. Martin Koyle joined SickKids as the Head of the Division of Urology and the University of Toronto as a Professor in July of 2011. He was previously Division Chief at Seattle Children’s and the University of Washington in Seattle, Washington, where he held the Michael Mitchell Endowed Chair in Paediatric Urology.

After completing his medical school education in Winnipeg, Canada, at the University of Manitoba, he undertook residency and fellowship training at Los Angeles – USC Medical Center, Harvard University and in San Francisco.

Koyle recently completed an M.Sc. in Quality Improvement and Patient Safety (QIP) at IHPME at the University of Toronto.

During his more than a quarter century in academic urology, Koyle has been known for his innovations and contributions, specifically to the fields of paediatric urology and transplantation.”

Under “What to expect during your visit,” we read:

> You and your baby will meet a urology fellow and a registered nurse. Before circumcision, the doctor who will perform the procedure will speak with you. This is a discussion of the reasons for circumcision, the benefits, risks and alternatives, and ensures that you understand what will happen during the procedure. You will have lots of time to ask questions.
>
> You should discuss what pain control measures will be used during and after the procedure. Your doctor may use a local anesthetic. Swaddling, oral sugar solutions or acetaminophen (Tylenol) may be given as well, but should not be used as the primary method of pain relief.
>
> To perform the procedure, the doctor places the baby on a special table and cleans the baby’s penis and foreskin. First, the baby gets medicine so he won’t feel pain. This might be a cream on the skin or a needle into the base of the penis. Then they use special tools to cut off the foreskin. The doctor completes the procedure by wrapping a bandage (called gauze) around the baby’s penis to protect it from rubbing against the diaper.
>
> The baby may cry during the procedure and for a short while afterward. Local anesthesia can greatly reduce your baby’s discomfort.

The baby will feel pain, despite the above lie, and the alternative to this is no circumcision , with no risks, unlike this procedure that results in scarring, loss of sensitivity, loss of foreskin function, sometimes lifetime complications needing further surgery, and death.

Since the doctor has incomplete information about the controversy and risks of circumcision, you can read that here and watch videos here.

Dr. Martin Koyle's practice information follows:

SickKids
555 University Avenue
Toronto, Ontario
Canada
M5G 1X8

General inquiries: 416-813-1500
Patient information/locating: 416-813-6621

> Dr. Martin Koyle, "Known Genital Mutilator" of SickKids, Toronto, where UnSickKids get barbaric "treatment" https://t.co/Lf7d5X2WG2 #nocirc #mgm pic.twitter.com/dKQ7iNkQCA
>
> — gary costanza (@jerrytheother) October 14, 2018

Senator yin and senator yang

Doug Mortimer · 16 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The US Constitution provides every state, no matter its acreage or population, with two senators. At first blush, it may not make sense to provide tiny states, such as Rhode Island or Delaware, or thinly populated states, such as Alaska or Montana, with the same level of representation as California or New York, but it is a safeguard against the tyranny of the majority. In the United States Senate no state is more powerful than any other.

In 1788 the only way the founding fathers could hammer out a Constitution acceptable to all 13 states was to compose a compact that addressed the fears of sparsely populated or smaller states, whose representatives were worried about the potential of being dominated by the states that were settled first and had more inhabitants (e.g., Pennsylvania, Virginia, Massachusetts). 37 states later, those fears still exist.

States' rights aside, by providing for two senators per state, the founding fathers have unwittingly set up a system conducive to gender balance. Why not a mandatory quota system? In other words, one female and one male senator from each state? Why is this a good idea?

Because it's 2018!

Just kidding. There are more compelling reasons than the calendar.

Of course, it would take another Constitutional Amendment (No. 28, if you're keeping score) to make senatorial gender balance a requirement for each state, but it would make complaints about gender balance in the Senate go away. Forever. And it wouldn't require much legalese.

Article I, Section 3 of the Constitution states:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years…

The Seventeenth Amendment, providing for election of Senators by the voters of the state, not the state legislature, conveys that profound change by swapping out just one word:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years…

All we have to do for the Twenty-Eighth Amendment is add four words:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators, one man and one woman, from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years…

To be sure, amending the U.S. Constitution involves heavy lifting. Any proposed amendment must be approved by 2/3 of the members of the U.S. House and Senate, as well as 3/4 of the state legislatures. That's a tall order, but that's the point. The Constitution should not shift with political whims. An amendment is not something to be taken lightly.

Ratifying a Constitutional amendment is difficult but not impossible. Not counting the first 10 amendments (the Bill of Rights) we've had 17 of them. The last one, pertaining to compensation for members of Congress, took effect in 1992. It only took 202 years to be ratified.

Remember Prohibition? That was the Eighteenth Amendment. Despite the aforementioned hurdles, an overwhelming majority of legislative bodies in the U.S. thought they could stop people from drinking alcoholic beverages, a practice that dates back to the very beginning of civilization. If Prohibition could pass muster (admittedly, it was nullified by the Twenty-First Amendment), then a gender-balanced amendment pertaining to the Senate should be a snap, and it shouldn't take 202 years to ratify it.

Of course, a Constitutional amendment must be sold to the public just like a political candidate, a product, or service. A carefully crafted public relations campaign is essential. So is a catchy slogan. Maybe something like "Even Steven/Even Stephanie in the Senate."

Also a must is a pithy acronym like the ERA (Equal Rights Amendment), something that would fit easily on a button or a bumper sticker.

Maybe we could call our amendment SEA (Senatorial Equality Amendment). Then proponents will be able to thump the tub for "SEA change."

[image]
To promote passage of SEA, the word "equality" should be repeated over and over again. You can't say it too often. The word positively reeks of virtue signaling. Half the population is male, the other half is female; so half the Senate should be male, and the other half should be female. That's equality, right?

Yeah, I know all the arguments about equality of opportunity versus equality of outcome, but for the sake of getting the amendment passed, let's pretend the former doesn't exist and the latter is the ultimate definition.

Elected representatives voting against SEA will have to explain how and why they voted against equality. The very idea! Don't you know that equality is right up there with truth, justice, and the American way? Yeah, I know, truth, justice, and the American way ain't what they used to be, but we still have to genuflect to them.

Let's assume the SEA gets passed. What's that you say? Devils? Details? Unfortunately, even a concept so as simple as guaranteed gender equality is riddled with ramifications. Change is always the enemy of vested interests, who never go quietly.

When would the amendment kick in? By a given date, say, January 1 two years from now? The Seventeenth Amendment safeguarded existing Senators' seats until the next time they had to stand for election. But if the Twenty-Eighth Amendment requires a Senator of each sex, what would happen in states that have two male senators? Would one be ordered to step down at the next election cycle? Or would he be grandfathered in for as long as he wanted to remain in office?

Or should I say great-grandfathered in? A secure seat in the Senate is a nice gig and some Senators are understandably reluctant to step aside. John McCain (R-AZ) died in office, even though he had brain cancer. He was a few days shy of his 82nd birthday. The senior geezer in the Senate is now Dianne Feinstein (D-CA), who is 85. Guess no one told them the graveyards are full of indispensable men – and women.

Under SEA, state and/or federal legislation would have to be enacted to ensure that whenever a male senator dies or retires from a two-male state, the new senator named by the governor (as is done now when a senator resigns or dies in office) will be female. When the next election rolls around, only females would be permissible nominees.

In the long term, of course, it would make no difference, as attrition would eventually assure equality. But what about the short term, which seems to occupy the efforts of most politicians?

If SEA were to kick in as of this writing, four states would have to give a female senator the boot. In addition to the aforementioned Dianne Feinstein, California also has Kamala Harris. Washington has Maria Cantwell and Patti Murray, New Hampshire has Margaret Wood Hassan and Jeanne Shaheen, and Minnesota has Tina Smith and Amy Klochubar. All are Democrats.

Knowing how important gender equity is to both women and Democrats, I have no doubt that each of the four states named above would have no trouble persuading one of its senators to step down to make way for a male senator. Sure, it would be a loss of power for women in those states, but it's all about equality, isn't it? And equality is all good, right?

The most important question to ponder is that of voter eligibility. Would men and women still be allowed to vote for both senators, or would each voter be restricted to voting for the senator who is a match gender-wise?

I like the idea of only men voting for the male senator. Women tend to get what they want when women are in office. The same is not true for men when men are in office. Male politicians not only have to cater to the female vote, they have to tread lightly lest they inadvertently anger women via an “insensitive” comment.

One example that readily comes to mind is the case of Clayton Williams, a classic West Texan (both oilman and cattleman) who ran for governor in 1990 and had a seemingly insurmountable lead over Democrat Ann Richards. All it took was for him to compare rape to bad weather: “If it’s inevitable, just relax and enjoy it.” Texas women were not amused by the plainspoken plainsman, so Ann Richards took up residence in the Governor’s Mansion in Austin.

One can’t help but wonder what would happen if a male candidate for the Senate had to appeal only to male voters, and female voters had no veto power over him. Given that arrangement, men’s issues would surely get more exposure than under the present setup, in which every candidate must cater to the female vote to some degree to have any realistic hope of getting elected. Paradoxical as it may seem, while SEA would seemingly enhance female influence by guaranteeing 50 female Senators, single-sex voting would likely diminish gynocentrism.

Ah, but if we turn the Senate into a Boys Club/Girls Club, what would happen to people with gender dysphoria? Well, even they would be restricted to one sex or the other. They would be instructed to pick a sex and vote accordingly at the next election.

Suppose some of those voters are gender fluid and switch to vote for the opposite gender in the next senatorial election? Obviously, there is a danger here of flip-flopping to affect the outcomes of both elections. In a you-call-it election, there is also the danger of a political party exhorting some of its members to identify with the opposite sex just to tip an election. Equality is no safeguard against gaming the system.

Despite all the questions SEA brings up, I would like to get the ball rolling. Time to make this topic an issue…on talk radio, internet posts, letters to the editor, whatever. Make it like ERA, an issue that won’t go away. That proposed amendment isn’t dead, by the way. Feminists are still working to get it passed.

For SEA to become reality, it will need regiments of foot-soldiers. It will more than likely take on the trappings of a crusade, inspiring all sorts of rhetoric, posturing, grandstanding, virtue signaling, and moral logrolling. It would all be very entertaining. The talking heads could chatter non-stop for months if not years. The corporate media pundits could display color-coded maps showing which states had ratified and which had not.

Imagine a world where the men’s vote is wooed with as much ardor as the women’s vote. Imagine all the issues aired out on this web site being addressed by senatorial candidates. Think of all the times you’ve heard some female politician start off a speech with “As a woman, I . . .” Have you ever heard a male politician say, “As a man, I…”?

If we had male-only voters voting for a male-only senate seat, maybe that phrase would be heard throughout the land. And it might go viral. It might spread to the House of Representatives…state legislatures…gubernatorial elections…city councils…

As a man, I can dream, can’t I?

Century-old female gender privilege

Philip Leigh · 17 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A hundred years ago last month, pioneering aviatrix Katherine Stinson became the first woman to fly for the U. S. Post Office airmail service, which began with a route between New York and Washington in May 1918. In those days the Post Office operated its own airplanes because there were few commercial airlines.

Authors Janet and Michael Bednarek describe the incident in their 2003 book Dreams of Flight as follows: "On September 26, 1918 Stinson, along with an escort pilot and plane flew the mail route between Washington, D. C. and New York City. The next day she and an escort flew back to Washington. Her flight failed to permanently break the gender barrier barring women from flying the mail. For reasons never explained Katherine Stinson resigned immediately after her one and only airmail flight."

The matter is remembered differently by Benjamin Lipsner, who was the Washington-based manager of the service. While he was busy planning new routes, the aviatrix arrived in his office one day and announced, "I am Katherine Stinson and I would like to fly the mail." Dozens of male pilots had already applied to Lipsner through normal channels. He kept their applications on file and intended to select the best among them as the service expanded to other cities. Although Lipsner knew Stinson was a famous stunt pilot he realized that flying over a fair ground was unlike carrying the mail aloft in all kinds of heavy weather. Thus, he turned her down gently.

Soon after she left, however, the Postmaster General's office phoned Lipsner and ordered him to accept Stinson as a pilot. Several days later she returned to Lipsner and explained that she could not fly any of the fleet's planes because they were equipped with then-modern control instruments. She could only fly airplanes furnished with instruments used in the outdated aircraft of the Wright [Brothers] Company. She asked Lipsner to reconfigure one of the planes especially for her.

After Lipsner explained that such a modification was out of the question a silent Stinson departed. But within an hour the Postmaster General's office phoned again to tell Lipsner that he must accommodate Stinson, despite the added expense.

Eventually Stinson got a modified plane to fly on the first leg of the Washington-New York run, which terminated at Philadelphia, not New York. Despite doubling the cost, Lipsner assigned another pilot and plane to escort the lady in order to ensure that she did not get lost. The next day she returned to Washington where her male escort gallantly allowed her to land first. As Lipsner recalls, the city's newspapers erroneously reported the episode with headlines such as "Katherine Stinson Beats Veteran Airmail Pilot to Washington."

Unlike the Dreams of Flight authors who are at a loss to explain why Stinson left the airmail service after only a single flight, in 1971 author Arch Whitehouse, who was also a pioneering aviator as well as a prolific author, wrote: "After all the top-level pressure, the expensive equipment changes, and the publicity she [Stinson] decided that cross-country airmail flying was not her idea of a paying profession and that she could make more money performing aerial stunts over county fair racetracks."

There's no record explaining what became of the airplane expensively, and uniquely, modified for Stinson's solitary flight.

Sources:

Arch Whitehouse, The Sky's the Limit (New York: Macmillan Company, 1971)

Janet and Michael Bednarek, Dreams of Flight: General Aviation in the United States (College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 2003)

Benjamin Lipsner and Len Hilts, The Airmail: Jennies to Jets (Westchester, Ill.: Wilcox and Follet, 1951)

Phil Leigh has authored seven books on American history, which may be inspected at his Amazon Author Page where more biographical information is readily available.

High school girls make false sexual assault accusations against boy because they 'Just don't like him'

Robby Soave · 19 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Seneca Valley School District in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania is facing a lawsuit from a former male student who was forced out of school—and investigated for sexual assault—due to a series of false accusations made by female students.

The girls—dubbed "mean girls" in the lawsuit, a reference to the 2004 Lindsay Lohan film—admitted on tape that they made up the assault story. One said, "I just don't like him" and "[I] would do anything to get him expelled," according to The Toronto Sun.

The false allegations were life-derailing for the accused, who is referred to as "T.F." in the lawsuit. On October 3, 2017, one of the girls told other students that T.F. had sexually assaulted her at a pool; a Seneca Valley guidance counselor overheard the accusation, and reported it to Childline, the state's child abuse prevention agency, as required by law. T.F. was swiftly charged with indecent assault and harassment, and received six months of probation as part of a plea deal.

Months later, in March of 2018, T.F. was again falsely accused, according to the lawsuit. Another girl invited him over to a house party; a few days later, she told the school guidance counselor that T.F. had broken into her home and sexually assaulted her. The lawsuit claims she was coached by T.F.'s first accuser. As a result of this accusation, T.F. was charged with assault and criminal trespassing. He was removed from school in leg and wrist shackles, and spent 9 days in juvenile detention.

The lawsuit elaborates on a number of other indignities T.F. suffered:

> He was released on house arrest on April 18, 2018, with an ankle monitor, and specific instructions from [Juvenile Probation Officer] Michael Trego that he could not tell people about the ankle device, and he could not wear shorts or other clothing that revealed the ankle device, even though it was during some of the hottest days of summer. He was not permitted to have any visitors, phone, or internet access, and could not leave the house except for therapy, which he requires to deal with the psychological trauma he suffered, and to attend church. After 28 days, he was allowed outside the house only to mow his lawn, which he had to do in long pants regardless of the temperature. He was unable to play during most of the high school baseball season and was told by the Athletic Director that she was not sure he could play baseball because every time he was wearing a Seneca Valley jersey, he was representing the school. T.F. was unable to play baseball or work at his summer jobs for part of the summer.

By the end of the summer, the conspiracy against T.F. was unmasked: other students came forward with Snapchat messages that contradicted the claims of the "mean girls," who eventually admitted to lying. All charges against T.F. were dropped.

But T.F.'s family is understandably distraught that the girls have suffered no consequences: neither the police nor the school district have taken any action against them, according to the lawsuit. And so the family is pursuing legal action against the girls' parents, the school district, and the district attorney.

T.F's attorney, Craig Fishman, did not respond to a request for comment, but he told Penn Live that his client "was basically being tortured in school by the other students and investigators, but the administration was only focused on protecting the girls who were lying."

In a statement, a spokesperson for the school district said that privacy laws prevented officials from commenting on specific details of the lawsuit, but that they believe it is "without merit."

“We have followed all applicable laws, and we will vigorously defend ourselves throughout the process,” the statement read.

On Monday, School Board President Jim Nickel said that “there is quite a bit of misinformation and misperception out there.”

“Just because something is contained in a lawsuit complaint does not mean that it’s fact,” he said.

From the school’s perspective, it had no choice but to involve Childline when it learned about a possible sexual assault. And school officials can’t punish any of the female students for their bad behavior outside of school.

These are valid points, and it may very well be that the school did everything it was required to do. I’m making note of this case because of the national conversation we seem to be having about the existence of false sexual assault accusations in the wake of the Brett Kavanaugh hearings. False accusations may not be common, but they do happen. To pretend otherwise, as fourth-wave feminism’s believe-all-victims mantra demands, is to ignore a large number of cases involving young people—often young black men—wrongly accused of sexual misconduct.

---

*Article first published at Reason.com

We meme'd awareness into reality

Lucian Vâlsan · 20 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Say what you want about memes and meme culture in general, but the fact remains that the politically activated non-feminist sector of this civilization has been memeing its messages into reality quite successfully. This is interesting in many ways, not least because a Men's Rights Movement has been around for more than 100 years yet it is this particular rendition of it, started a bit over 10 years ago, that has achieved the most cultural success.

Admittedly, the bar wasn't too high. Previous renditions achieved essentially nothing in terms of practical results or cultural shifts, no matter how tiny. Sure, some would argue otherwise but it is nonetheless interesting to see an idea (an what are ideas if not memes, after all?) succeeding where dozens of previous attempts failed.

Older readers might remember the Don't be that girl campaign of five years ago. The message (and ultimately the meme) of that campaign went far and wide in places one would expect the least. Over my recent tour in Jordan and Israel I met young men who got inspired to get into the hard work of influencing sexual politics after they saw a Don't be that girl poster somewhere on the internet. They didn't even remember that AVFM was part of that.

All of these campaigns by both this organization and many-many others have had a drip-drip effect on the culture. And some of that exploded during the hearings of Brett Kavanaugh. Suddenly a lot of people found their courage to speak up against the Always believe the victim narrative and, if one pays attention, many sounded like we've been sounding for the past 10 years. Indeed many of those who stood up for due process (but not necessarily for Kavanaugh personally, let's be clear about that) do indeed mention having had flashbacks of the many comments and, yes, angry rants and memes they saw on the Internet about the dangers of false allegations.

Some noted gynocentrists who made a career out of putting men down under the guise of "making good men" have been shattered by the flashbacks of all the messaging they've ignored to such an extent they've publicly announced their joining to the wider non-feminist majority.

Now, does that mean the Don't be that girl campaign is responsible for so many good things? No, of course not. But it does mean that the collection of campaigns done by many organizations and individuals, past and present, to raise the awareness have started to pay off.

Here's another example: Four years ago, the Cathedral Media was writing dismissively about the issue of false allegations. GQ, covering the first ICMI back in 2014 was saying:

> And don't even get them started on all those "bogus" rape cases. It's enough to make a certain kind of man join a revolution.

While GQ has remained the same militant gynocentric-subverted cesspool, the rest of the Cathedral has slowly moved away. Too slow for many in our ranks who are (understandably so) eager to see change. But moved away they did. To the point where the word redpilled no longer appears in scare quotes and its meaning is assumed to be known and understood even by the most ardent opponents of the non-feminist narrative.

Getting the opposition to speak our language is a huge win.

If someone had told me back 2010 that before the end of the decade even the opposition will speak in our terms, I would've called that person over-optimistic – but not crazy. Because this is largely the point. Changing the cultural narrative takes time and will, but it can and does happen.

Now what?

Now we meme harder. No, seriously!

Until we innovate a new strategy (which we will have to do at some point), sticking to what works tends to be the best strategy. Our predecessors from Ernest Belfort Bax to the turn of the 21st century failed in ways we didn't because they were unsuccessful in memeing their way through. Much can be written about why this is the case but let's not digress.

Our opposition is slowly catching up to this and is trying (for now rather inefficiently) to neutralize this strategy. In the European Union, for instance, one will soon need a VPN in order to meme.

And on American-owned social media, distributing anything other than fluffy kittens is becoming a nightmare. Even quoting the American constitution can be haram on… American-owned social media.

But when all is said and done, the constant push from our end has to continue.

The reason this article even exists is because the tendency to give up is quite high. Attrition is the first step to demoralization.

